One of the Marine units guarded the area for a few months. As the NVA body decomposed, passing convoys would stop and rebuild the "Road Marker of War," keeping the symbol of the carnage from the 24th alive, by using empty brass cannon shells as legs and Vietnamese grass knives as arms.

February 10: An NVA artillery shell exploded next to Earl. Earl went flying and flipping through the air about thirty feet. He was lying there motionless on his left side, knocked unconscious from the blast with a big piece of shrapnel protruding through his flak jacket into his heart. Thinking he was dead, we slowly rolled him onto his back to see if there was anything we could do to save him. After a close examination, and to our total amazement, the shrapnel was stuck through his flak jacket and into his pocket Bible he carried in his fatigue pocket over his heart. He had just been knocked out and was badly bruised. We all stood there in disbelief looking at each other. It took a few minutes before he woke up and regrouped his senses. He never knew what hit him, so we had to explain over and over what had happened, until it finally registered in his rattled brain. We never heard the end of it. God's Bible had saved his life and now we had to pray even more with him. We appeased him by telling him to have his Mom send us a case of Bibles. I am glad Earl survived. We have become great friends. I pray I will never see him get killed or severely wounded.

Dear God, please protect my crew and my friends. Never take them to your palace until they are very old men and have lived a full life. When they come to you, please let them sit in Heaven at your right side. They are all good men, God. They have only disobeyed your teachings because it is war and they live here in Hell with me. If you have to blame someone God, blame me. I have taken them down another path and forced them to obey my rules. God, I promise I will do my best to keep them safe and still believe in you and your teachings. God, please keep a place open for me on your left, we need to talk.

February 11: Dusters at Ca Lu destroyed four NVA bunkers.

February 12: On this day, I was training one of the guys named Danny to be a Driver. I went through all the basics with him. Because the Duster has an automatic transmission, it was easy to drive. It had low, high, neutral, reverse, park and a gear that made the Duster turn 360 degrees in a complete circle. It was not hard to get it going and you steered it with a bicycle handlebar. I explained that, to be a good driver, you must think you are slow dancing with a beautiful girl and push the steering bar real slow as though you were sashaying her across the dance floor. Don't jerk it or you will give whiplash to the guys up in the turret. We decided that we would practice combat conditions and requirements another day. He jumped in the Driver's seat and I sat next to him in the TC seat. We drove around Camp Carroll for about a half hour, practicing shifting from low to high and stopping. He seemed to be getting the feel of the Duster but, like all new guys, was still very nervous. He was used to being up in the turret loading the 40s, not driving. We were driving from the southern back area of Carroll up the long straight-a-way road that lead back to the main gate and our position. I told him to ride on the right side of the shallow drainage ditch that ran alongside the road because there was a convoy assembling and lining up to leave Carroll.

We no sooner crossed the ditch when the first volley of NVA artillery shells hit Carroll, exploding to our far right. As usual, they were trying to zero in on the assembling convoy. I told him to speed it up and get back to our position in case there was also a ground attack. For some unexplainable reason, he slammed on the brakes and jumped off the Duster and into the ditch face down, digging for China with his bare hands. I kept screaming at him to get back in the Duster and I would drive. Frozen with fear, he just laid there. Marines, trying to avoid the flying shrapnel, started jumping out of the convoy trucks into the same ditch. Sprinting up and down the length of the ditch, I was screaming at the Marines to get back in their trucks and get the Hell out of Carroll, because the enemy was trying to hit the convoy. I could see the next volley hit closer to our ditch. A few of the Marines got their trucks moving and some still lay in the ditch, hoping the enemy artillery would miss them. The next volley sent me flying in the air and covered me in smoldering dirt and black smoke. Landing with a hard thud and out of breath, I saw another shell land on the Marines in our ditch, about three hundred feet in front of me. Everybody started running for their lives in all different directions, as the NVA walked the shells down the ditch. I grabbed Danny by the scruff of his neck and dragged him screaming with fear through the next volley of artillery explosions. I then threw him head first into the TC hatch of the Duster. In high gear, I drove back to our position through another volley of exploding shells and parked the Duster in its three-sided parapet home.

Now totally pissed off and out of control, I yanked Danny out of the TC hatch, dragged him to our bunker and threw him inside, head-over-heels. Our Section Chief Chester Sines took cover in our bunker. As the bombs continued to explode all around us, I screamed that Chester best get rid of this guy or I would kill him. Ranting and raving, Earl held me back from kicking his ass. Still screaming, I told everybody to get on the Duster and see if they could see where the enemy was shooting from and shoot back and kill the bastards. "Chester, Danny stays in the fuckin' bunker and you do his job or else I'll have to shoot him and you." After the smoke cleared, I visited Roger at the Water Point and told him what happened. Roger just smiled and said "Joe, what-da-ya-fuckin'-expect-from-some-fuckin'-doggie-Army guy?" "Roger, I'm in the Army." "See, what did I tell you in the past – you guys are all fucked up." I just laughed and said "gimme some of that good liquid you Marines call drinking water."

February 14: Lou Block's track C121, while shooting at an NVA rocket position, took a direct hit on the rear deck. Four of Block's crew were wounded. It was Lou's lucky day; he didn't get a scratch.

February 17: Our position was hit by seven NVA rockets. I hate those damn things. The men now had a new saying about the enemy "Kill Them All, Let God Sort Them Out".

February 20: Our new Duster, "Float 4", ran over a mine. The NVA tried to finish us off with some close mortar rounds. They blew some holes through the turret, hitting Earl Holt and Dave Lewis with shrapnel. When we finally got back to Carroll, we had to cut off Earl's boot to fix his wounds. He is okay but needs a new pair of boots. Every crewmember now has a "Purple Heart" or three. Dave Lewis' Purple Heart would be his ticket to a Duster unit in the Saigon area. Damn, I am going to miss Float 4.

February 23: Our crew hitched a ride on a convoy to Dong Ha and got another Duster. At Dong Ha, I inquired about my personnel records and was informed they were not to be found and must have been destroyed again. Those records would be the only evidence of my service to my country. My father always showed me his from WW-II. I wanted to share the same experience with him and my future children. Plus, I wanted the Army to confirm the day I was supposed to go home. I guessed they'll keep me here until I die.

February 25: I was called to attend an awards formation. Captain Tedesco pinned on our Purple Hearts. Earl Holt received an Army Commendation Medal. We thought we were getting Silver Stars like the other guys or maybe something even better. No other medals were awarded to us. After the ceremony, one of the other officers asked for my medal back, claiming they did not have enough Purple Hearts for the next group. I was only allowed to keep the certificate. All the soldiers getting awards knew each other, and I was the only person singled out. It was obvious that someone was getting even for my defiance. Purple Hearts have your name engraved on them. Who else is named Joseph Belardo in this unit? It probably got tossed in the shitter. My big mouth is always getting in the way.

February 27: Back at Dong Ha with another convoy, we heard they were serving steaks in the Battalion Mess Hall. We never had steaks where we lived. As we waited in a long line to get a hot meal, Dong Ha started getting hit by NVA artillery. Dong Ha had a loud alert siren and everybody ran into their bunkers for cover. The shells were landing by the airport about a half mile away. It was a rule in Dong Ha that you took cover when the siren blasted. My crew, who was used to being hit on the head by the shells, waited until the line of soldiers had taken cover. Once inside their Mess Hall, we loaded all their steaks and a few veggies into the insulated metal storage containers used to bring food to the men in the field. Hidden inside the Driver's compartment, we instantly took off for Carroll. When we returned, we shared our stolen treasurers with our friends. Steak never tasted so delicious.

March 1: Lt. Hardin informed us that he was restructuring our crew in preparation for Sam Lewis' return home. We would be individually assigned to other Dusters. To my surprise, Lt. Hardin made me the Squad Leader. I knew Sgt. Chester Sines and Sam Lewis had given him the recommendation. After a heated argument with the Lieutenant, I was allowed to keep Earl "Tex" Holt and train him as my Driver.

In the next few weeks, my crew constantly changed. I brazenly demanded to pick my crew from the new men arriving from Dong Ha.

March 2: Vince Tedesco has replaced Captain Easter as Charlie Battery's Commander. Tedesco took the time to visit and get acquainted with every Duster crew in our Battery. Instantly, we all liked this new Captain. All of us knew we finally had a great team leader. He recognized my crew from the awards ceremony and asked how we got wounded. When we told him we were the other Duster in the January 24th battle, he could not believe it. He looked stunned and amazed. He had heard rumors after the battle that there was another Duster in the battle, but no one seemed to be able to confirm the rumors. He had dismissed them, since he did not see us on the battle field, and was only instructed to retrieve the convoy, one tank and one Duster. Because of the awards ceremony, he knew we were wounded on the 24th but thought it was from another fire-fight. We exchanged stories of the battle. Each story filled the mental void of not knowing what really happened on the battlefield after we returned to Carroll.

March 3: Dusterman, Rodrigo Velazquez, was killed. I had only met him once, in Dong Ha.

March 4: I have been training Earl to be a Driver. He is a "natural" at it and got the feel of the Duster after only a few runs around the base. He only has one problem. He is slightly claustrophobic and got a little rattled when he had to crawl inside the hull of the Duster and practice retrieving ammo. I told him I had a simple remedy that would cure his nervousness. As he crawled into the bowels of the Duster to retrieve the last can of ammo, I had the guys quickly close the front door and hatch doors of the Driver's compartment and TC hatch. We then started pounding the sides of the Duster with hammers and fired off a few Duster rounds, simulating combat. After fifteen minutes, we opened up the doors and casually asked Earl if his claustrophobia was cured.

March 5: Tonight, we made camp with a platoon of Marines at the bottom of the hill below Carroll. Supposedly, we are some kind of blocking force. All we know is that we are again left as NVA bait and will be here for about a week. We are alone and isolated. We dug little one-man holes and used the dirt for our sandbags. It was better than nothing. I got tired of sleeping on the ground with the leeches and cockroaches. Our Duster made a run to the black market at Cam Lo. It was amazing what you could buy for an American dollar. We bought cots, sleeping bags, tarps, lawn chairs, and chaise lounges. We are now ready for upscale jungle-life living.

March 8: There were hundreds of dead NVA all along Route 9. You always don't have to see them. Your nose gives their positions away. The bodies turn almost black and swell like a helium balloon, moving as if alive from the maggots eating them. They finally burst and emit an odor that makes you want to throw up. I cannot believe how fast their bodies decomposed. Within a few weeks only their bones and a few clothes remained. It was a sight and smell beyond imagination. I hated running over them when we pulled off the main road.

March 14: We took Don Wolfe to the LZ on the south side of Camp Carroll where he waited for the chopper that would take him to Dong Ha. Don was going home. It was his last day in the 44th. We all wished him well and said the traditional "see ya later". It was getting harder to say good bye to my trusted old friends. Don was one of only a few men who would risk his life to save others. He had gotten wounded trying to save me and my crew. I didn't know how to thank him and just gave him a big hug. I had to compose myself as I turned away and waved goodbye.

As Don Wolfe's chopper lifted off of Camp Carroll, he could see the first of the NVA artillery shells hit Carroll.

I have just gotten a new Gunner, named Wally Owens, from Tennessee. He claims he has the eyes of an eagle and can shoot the balls off a monkey at two miles. Wally was being initiated into Charlie Battery with a fine meal from Camp Carroll's mess hall. As he gulped his first bite, I heard the popping sound of the NVA artillery shooting. Before anyone could hear the screaming and whistling sound of the NVA artillery shell flying through the air, the mess hall started to empty. By the time I grabbed Wally, we were the last to run out of the mess hall for cover. It was too late. As we dove threw the back mess hall door and hit the ground, the NVA artillery shells blew the mess hall in half. Fifteen more NVA shells were fired around the mess hall. Wally and I were really shaken-up. We never made the bunker and just hugged Mother Earth about ten feet from the mess hall. During the enemy artillery barrage, Doc Butler and Paul Conley ran around like crazy men helping all the wounded. Doc and Paul were two very brave people.

After the shelling and the smoke cleared, someone always yelled "All Clear". I always wondered who the asshole was who decided it was ever "All Clear" in a combat zone. We began to scavenge for scraps of food, as we bitched at the NVA who had destroyed our beautiful mess hall. Our mess hall was the pride of "Artillery Hill."

Don later radioed me from Dong Ha to see who had got hurt and how bad the mess hall was hit. After a short conversation, we wished each other well and said our farewells.

Dear Diary

On the Outside Looking In

It seemed as a young man I had a special bond with nature. I spent hours exploring her, hiking her and enjoying her. She taught me to be patient, and my eyes and mind could and would be filled with her wonderment.
On the outside, I could look in and see her, like the song, beautiful and spacious skies, amber waves of grain, majestic mountains. I knew she had spread her grace on me.
I began to give my attention to others, by watching their eyes. Their eyes would tell all emotions.
I learned through eye contact, happiness, sadness, confusion, romance and love.
I experienced from the touch of the hand, the hug, that eye contact is what I thought a real man should be about.
Uncle Sam cast his eyes upon me and gave me the look of one of America's best. The new look fit me like a glove.
I enjoyed the hairy eyes the drill instructors could give. The stare-down the officers would try to show. I would return any look required. I knew sustained eye contact would give them away.
This Army Dog was now attached to the Halls of Montezuma. Like most GIs of my era, I was sent to the "Land of the Dragon"
My eyes could not believe her beauty. It was a feast for eye and mind. God didn't make this land for killing or dying, man did.
Uncle Sam sent me north to the ZEE. My eyes became filled with confusion.
I took on another new look, Squad Leader on a M42 Duster, a Twin 40 Millimeter Ack- Ack Gun.
It was our job to give the North Vietnamese Army the look of death. Something my eyes and mind had never seen or experienced.
The Duster separated men from man. There was no room to duck, no place to hide, nowhere to run. It was straightforward, face-to-face, eye-to-eye dueling; very little guessing of who was killing whom.

While the battles blazed, I could see from my open turret the Marines I supported. My eyes would agonize the feeling of others. Marines running, jumping, yelling, shouting, killing, screaming, wounded and dying. Arms, meant for hugging lovers, were now holding friends, wounded or dying.
All eyes now filled with horror, sorrow, fear, hate and pain.
...eyes screaming at each other for help.
...eyes looking for targets hiding in the shadows.
...eyes unbelieving.
...eyes fixed in stares, glazed by their final journey to their God.
I began to wonder, why my God allowed me to see these atrocities of life...these eyes of others.
The squeeze of the trigger was easy, but the eyes of the suffering and dead were forever
...regardless of who was on whose side.
I will go home a broken warrior.
Eyes and mind spent from too many firefights, too much Incoming.
Eyes being witness to the dark side of life.
My Uncle Sam had completed my training, eyes do tell all.
My eyes now walk this earth, half filled with tears.
Hoping never again to be "On the Outside Looking In".

March 21: Earl's case of Bibles has arrived. He was thrilled as we eagerly took the Bibles. We quickly stuffed them in all our jungle fatigue pants and jacket pockets, and thanked him for our extra Godly body armor. We needed all the protection we could get. Tex dropped to his knees and begged God to forgive us for our heathen ways. We still said our prayers with him nightly, holding our bibles tight.

March 25: Our crew had three Dusters destroyed by the NVA in a one-month period. We now hold the battalion record of five. God was with us again, none of us got a scratch, lots of tiny shrapnel splinters, but no real body damage. We are "Bodacious Bastards", the Marine tank retriever's number one customer. Our new Captain, Vincent Tedesco, sent Tex and me to Dong Ha to pick up another refurbished Duster. It was Earl's birthday and we celebrated the occasion with two cans of chili and beans, chased down with hot cocoa. I sang him a solo happy birthday song as he blew out a single candle (a match). It was Earl's well deserved few minutes of happiness.

I talked Earl into stealing the Colonel's prized toilet seat. As I played "chickie", Earl low crawled to the Colonel's shitter. It was the best thing we ever stole. When we got back to Carroll, Earl, on hearing that whoever stole the seat was going to get court-martialed, buried the seat in a place only he knew. He is a good Christian and prayed for forgiveness and our redemption.

At our 1990 DQS reunion at Fort Bliss, Texas, I called Colonel House and Earl Holt to the podium. I started telling the story of the Colonel's prized toilet seat. Members of the 1/44th cheered as I regaled them with the story of the precious white toilet seat. The Colonel started yelling. "I knew it was you, Belardo, I knew it was you." Earl had no idea I was going to do this and immediately started blaming me for the theft. It was hilarious. I casually presented the Colonel with a box. In it was a big white toilet seat and a piggy bank in the shape of a toilet with brass engraved plaques dedicated to the Colonel from Earl. I handed it to Earl and said "Earl you can now give the seat back to the Colonel. It's about time you got court-martialed." The place went wild as I held up my arms in victory.

To my surprise, the new Duster we got was one of my old tracks, C131, "The Track From Hell." This Duster has had more engines, transmissions, tension-bars, idler wheels and road wheels replaced than any other Duster in the Battalion. The track is full of bullet holes, dents, dings and two RPG holes in the lower chassis. Past crews joked about all the miles on it and that C131 saw more firefights than anything or anyone else did in Nam. Earl and I looked at each other, laughed, and said, "Wonder if the turret still jerks to the right when you shoot?" It still does.

In her future battles, the enemy would tattoo her beautiful green skin with two more RPG holes, twenty-three more bullet holes, and several more scratches and dents. Her battle scars were many, but we still loved her. This metal woman was still a born-again killer.

March 26: My crew now consists of Driver Earl Holt, Gunner Wally Owens, Cannoneers George Lewis and Benito Sitello. Earl is a big strong Texan over six feet, a kind, religious man whose faith always keeps him steady under fire, my second in command and my right hand man. We know each other well. Wally, a cigar smoking country boy, is steady and calm under fire and the best Gunner in the Battalion. He is always talking about fast cars and running moonshine. Benny is a Mexican who thinks he is Poncho Villa with his crisscrossed bandoleers and bad intentions. He keeps us serenaded us with his guitar, singing Spanish songs (Cielito Lindo being my favorite) with his fantastic falsetto voice. George, who everyone calls "Kung Fu George, is a big Californian, who carries a big 24 inch razor sharp Enfield Bayonet down the back of his flak jacket and is more than willing to demonstrate his martial arts and knife skills.

To my surprise and pleasure, they all rose above and beyond the call of duty. We were a team from the start. They easily learned each other's jobs. We trusted each other's judgment and fighting ability. Each of them possessed the right amount of courage and fear, a mixture in a man's soul that cannot be taught. I trusted them with my life, and they equally trusted me with theirs – a bond and friendship that will last forever.

Wally has the only set of hand-held hair clippers. All of our heads got their first good haircut. Wally should charge for his services; he would make a million. Grunts will buy anything and always need a trim.

Deep inside, I am proud to be their Squad Leader. They really know how to fight as a team. We give each other the needed confidence that each of us will make it home. My crew is unbelievably superstitious.

Again, they removed my "Grim Reaper" insignia from between the 40mm barrels. I just laughed and told them someday it would be back: We are the Grim Reapers.

If we aren't doing convoys, we are doing search and destroy missions behind Carroll deep into the southwest, towards Khe Sanh. We continually see tracks from a suspected NVA PT76 Russian-made tank, which we hope our team will be the first to destroy.

CHAPTER 12: RELIEF FOR KHE SANH

March 27: Khe Sanh has been under siege by the NVA since around January 19th. The Khe Sanh area is now engaged in the largest battle we ever have had with the NVA. Our government does not want Khe Sanh to fall. The NVA has already attacked many American bases throughout Vietnam. The only success they achieved was with our newspapers and politicians. The enemy was beaten severely militarily, but that did not count. The newspapers still make us look like some losers. Thank God they did not report about WWII. We would be speaking another language. Why can't they tell the truth or at least back the soldier? We are trying to fight for another person's Freedom.

Our Duster was one of two Dusters assigned to meet the Army's 1st Cavalry Unit near Delta-5. The area they assembled in was a large, flat expanse of land we called the "Plains of Delta 5". It seemed like they had more equipment than all of the Third Marine Division. As the sun rose, we could smell food coming from their make-shift mess hall tent. I asked one of their officers if we could eat with their men. The officer rudely replied, "You live with the Marines, go eat with the Marines." I told the cocky Army bastard where to stick it and gave him the finger. I climbed up on the Duster and then pissed in his direction. The crew thought it was great and heckled him as we sat and ate our C-rations. We did our job and escorted the "Cav" up to Route 9 and west to Ca Lu, which was now being transformed into LZ Stud. Stud would be the jumping off point for Operation Pegasus. Pegasus was the name given to the reactionary forces assigned to reopen the road to Khe Sanh and relieve the troops stranded there.

We would fight alongside the Cav for a few days. It was slow going with a lot of shooting from our group and very little return fire from the enemy. I'm sure the Cav had some firefights up in the hill areas, but this particular group of the 1st Cav would brag how they saved the Marines from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh and how they kicked NVA ass. The NVA ass had already been kicked and beaten by hundreds of Marines, jets, and a million pounds of bombs dropped by the B-52s, and Dusters, Quad-

50s. On the whole, the resistance the NVA gave the Cav was minimal compared to the NVA's actual fighting abilities. That "minimal" gave the Cav a lot of trouble. Yes, they saw some action, but nothing like it was in the prior months. Yet the "Cav" always claimed bragging rights and that's okay. Even now, forty years later, they're still bragging.

April 4: LZ Stud was hit by 50 NVA artillery shells. Our job was to help the "Cav" open Route 9 from LZ Stud to Khe Sanh. I always thought they were supposed to be helping us. The going was slow and the fighting sporadic.

April 8: We finally rotated and got a rest. Our new position is back on top of Hill 250. I must have been back on someone's good list. If I could have chosen a place to spend my tour, it would be 250. Hill 250 is giving us a chance to regroup. But, we miss Roger's hot showers at The Water Point. The view from Hill 250 is magnificent. At daybreak, you stand above the low clouds, and as the mist lifts, you can see the horizon. It is breathtaking, and yet… it takes the breath away from the enemy because of the firing and shooting advantage from that hill. It is a shame how war mixes and twists our emotions… my emotions. I feel safe here, and that alone allows my brain and body to get much needed relaxation.

April 10: My crew got credited for shooting three NVA artillery rocket positions in three days. The secondary explosions were fantastic. We yelled with a madman's joy as the enemy positions were destroyed. Dead gooks meant no Marines would die that night. I enjoyed shooting the Marine .50 caliber sniper rifle from the lookout tower on top of 250. It was an awesome experience.

April 11: The Rockpile got hit by six NVA rockets. One of the rockets damaged a Duster and wounded one of the crew.

April 12: We were on a search and destroy mission with the Marines behind an old plantation slightly southwest of Delta-5. All of a sudden, 30 Viet Cong (VC) walked out of a tree line. They were all holding their hands and rifles high, yelling "Chieu Hoi – Chieu Hoi" (I surrender). We expected it to be some kind of trap. Almost all of them were dressed in their traditional daytime white pajamas. The Marines searched them and confiscated all their weapons and we marched them all to Delta-5. We kept them huddled in small groups outside of D-5. It was funny, because when we first radioed Carroll that we had captured 30 of the enemy, they thought we were joking and told us to shoot them. The leader of the VC constantly spoke and caused unrest among the prisoners and had to be separated from the other prisoners. We isolated him and had him stand tall at attention, with the Marines guarding him and orders to shoot if he moved. It took all day before some trucks finally arrived with an interpreter and took the VC away. I always wonder where they take all of the prisoners.

April 13: Along with the Cav, Larry Roundtree's Duster was one of two Dusters to be the first to drive into Khe Sanh after the 77 day siege.

April 14: Another 30 NVA rockets hit The Rockpile. One of our Dusters at The Rockpile spotted the NVA forward observer and hit him with a fast-eighty 40mm rounds. The NVA stopped shooting for the rest of the day.

We got a call on the lima-lima from Lt. Hardin, "Saddle up, you're going to rotate to Khe Sanh in the morning. We are relieving and replacing Duster "A" Battery who have survived the 77 Day Siege of Khe Sanh. Be at the main gate at 0600 hours." I was shocked when he told me to choose the other track that would be sent with me. To this Steve and I had gone from boot camp to Nam together. Steve might have never known it, but he was a courageous soldier and had a good crew. If the Khe Sanh I knew had changed like they said it had, Harris is my first choice. I also knew that Lt. Hardin would love to send Harris. A few weeks ago, Harris and Lt. Hardin had exchanged some serious words about an ambush they were in on the road to Khe Sanh. This was going to be a first; Dusters C131 and C132, sister tracks, would be together, defending one base.

Harris, who was stationed at the Khe Gio Bridge, seriously cut his foot while bathing in the river, and has been medivaced to Dong Ha. Another real good friend from boot camp, Frank Bardone, became acting Squad Leader. Bardone will take Harris' crew to Khe Sanh.

Steve was never told, and I mean never, that he was going to Khe Sanh. He wasn't even told that his track had left for Khe Sanh without him. Rumor had it he was really pissed when he got back to the Bridge and found that his track, complete with crew, was gone. I understand he got very upset with me when he was told I had volunteered him for Khe Sanh. What are friends for? It was a month before he caught up with his Duster. I was told they gave him KP and shit-burning details while he waited to catch a chopper to Khe Sanh. To this day I feel guilty for suggesting Steve Harris' track. I knew he would jump at the request, and he knew I would choose him.

April 15: We met Captain Vincent Tedesco, our new CO (Commanding Officer), at the main gate. He had never been to Khe Sanh and wanted to take the ride in his jeep, driven by his driver, Smitty. I looked around and saw no other vehicles or Marines. "Sir, are we waiting for the convoy to assemble?" "No Joe, we'll pick up the other Duster at the Khe Gio Bridge and then head out to Khe Sanh. Is that a problem?" "No, Sir." My crew looked at each other and smiled. We were not going with another convoy or the security of any other group, just three vehicles: Tedesco and his jeep driver, Smitty, Duster C132, and my Duster C131. Captain Tedesco is the best Commanding Officer we ever had at C-Battery. He leads us with courage and a true understanding of how the NVA fight and how to fight back. However, I thought driving to Khe Sanh with just three vehicles was a bit crazy. But, what the hell, you can't live forever! I am always comfortable when Tedesco is in charge. He treats all of the Duster and Quad crews with respect, asks for our advice and opinions, and listens to what we had learned in combat situations. The Captain and I hoped our little convoy would not become a casualty on the ride to Khe Sanh.

We were the first and, as far as I know, the only idiots ever to make a solo attempt to drive to Khe Sanh. Casually, we drove past The Rockpile, LZ Stud, Ca Lu and Joliet. We were about one third of the way to Khe Sanh when my engine blew. Black smoke was pouring out the engine grates. The Duster, known to be fast, was now reduced to a top speed of less than 5 miles per hour. Our track was now a great target for any decent NVA sniper, RPG team, or satchel charge thrower. We briefly stopped along the road to assess the damage. Tedesco informed us that he and the other Duster would proceed to Khe Sanh, with all due speed. If anything should happen, he would send help and return with all the Dusters and Quads at the base. Earl Holt, who never cursed or used God's name in vain, uttered his first words of profanity under his breath. Tedesco and Bardone departed for Khe Sanh, assuring us that we were great soldiers and knew how to fight, "You can just radio us for help." Bardone yelled, "Remember, we don't make house calls.

We waved goodbye to each other as the dust from the departing Duster hid us from view. Déjà vu of January 24th and other battles rushed through my brain. We even took pictures of their Duster as it sped down the road on the other side of the valley. I ordered my crew to unlock the turret, open the upper ammo boxes, slowly traverse back and forth, and stay extremely alert. I instructed Owens that, if shit happened, he was to shoot the first minute with both 40s on full auto as I swept the area. Cannoneer Lewis was to remain seated, holding four hand-grenades, ready to pull the pins and start throwing, before he started loading the 40s. The other Cannoneer, Sitello, was ordered to squat and use the M60 machine gun to cover the hill and cliff above our right side, and never stand up. All were instructed to keep a low profile and not talk, absolutely no talking. Talking to each other while on the road or during "INCOMING!" was something I absolutely forbid. All attention and concentration has to be on one's job, the enemy, and the direction of any enemy encounters. They are a great crew and knew what had to be done. It was routine business for Road Warriors. The balance of the ride to Khe Sanh seemed to take all day. We all thanked God that nothing bad happened. Over three hours alone on Route 9 to Khe Sanh was no place to be.

Years later, at a reunion, we joked with Tedesco and Bardone about how they left us on the road that day, and how Frank would not accept collect calls if we were attacked. I told them the only reason the NVA let them through was because they feared my Duster, The Grim Reaper. I guess we really were the only idiots to ever ride that section of road from Camp Carroll to Khe Sanh all alone and not get wounded or killed.

I had not been down the entire length of the road to Khe Sanh in many months. During Operation Pegasus, I could not believe how this once picturesque winding road had changed. The all out American push to save Khe Sanh had destroyed the area. The weeks of artillery, napalm and B-52 strikes had leveled everything. I told my men, "Welcome to Death Valley." Almost all the trees were gone or splintered, and the terrain looked like the earth was scorched and upside down. It made my hair stand on end. We had already chewed up Route 9 from Camp Carroll to Ca Lu. The area was filled with bomb craters, napalm scars, and dead NVA decaying along the sides of the road. The smell of death burned my nostrils and the rotting flesh upset my stomach. But this sight was like nothing I had ever seen. Our slow crawl to the infamous Khe Sanh changed our souls even more. None of us thought we would make it there alive and were relieved when we finally saw the main road leading into camp.

Our arrival at Khe Sanh turned into a bad omen for my superstitious crew. Captain Tedesco was with Bardone, having him take over the Duster position on the north side of the base at the east end of the runway by the old ammo dump. Our combat section from Charlie "C" Battery was relieving Alpha "A" Battery which was commanded by Lt. Bruce Geiger. "A" Battery had withstood the test of time during the infamous 77 day siege. Tedesco went back to Dong Ha escorted by Larry Roundtree's Duster, the two Dusters from Alpha Battery, and two Quad 50s, one of which was being towed. Also accompanying them was a convoy of Marines.

Our new position was the bunker at the northwest end of the runway across from "Charlie Med.". The "A" Battery Duster was pulling out of the parapet as we arrived. They expressed their joy about leaving. Two Marines, waving goodbye to them, stood in the mouth of the track's three-sided parapet which was next to our new bunker position. The NVA opened up with a barrage of artillery from Co Roc, a mountain enemy fortification in Laos a few miles away. The first shell was a direct hit on the two Marines. We never heard it coming. They were blown to smithereens. Parts of them were scattered all over our parapet, bunker, and Duster. As the enemy artillery rained down on the base, Tedesco and the convoy left as quickly as possible. We helped the Marines quickly bag as many parts of their comrades as we could find, and ran them across the runway to Graves Registration.

Our new position was still covered with the remains and blood of the two unfortunate Marines. My crew stood there in disbelief. Nobody had ever been killed right next to our bunker. Being killed twenty feet away was okay, one hundred feet away was even better. For some strange reason, anyway or anywhere you died on the road was okay and understandable. We had seen death many times and knew all about dying and suffering and picking up the pieces. But this, a direct artillery hit on a fellow American next to what was our private sanctuary, our bunker, our home, was totally unacceptable. It happened so fast; there was no time to take cover. We did not have time to close our eyes or blink. We just watched in total disbelief.

My crew had done their fair share of what we called "being smoked," a term we used when the 40mm cannon shell hit an NVA soldier. When one of ours got "smoked," it had a whole new meaning. My men would remember this day forever. On our Duster we carried rakes, picks and shovels. As my crew checked out their new bunker, I hastily raked the rest of the Marines' remains into a pile. I then shoveled the pile into an old rusty half of a 55 gallon drum. I had the crew carry the drum about a one hundred feet west of our bunker. I then shoveled dirt on all the blood stained ground around our area. Holt backed up the Duster into the parapet. We were now ready for the NVA. As a team, we quickly finished our task of "it's only a thing" and went back to business. After we were settled into our bunker, I burned the remains in the drum.

As the ashes rose, Earl walked over and read from "the Good Book". The five of us huddled together around the drum to give a final salute to America's best. The words of God took the mental edge off what now had turned into a very bad day. Unbelievably, we stood there, stoically, while the billowing smoke allowed the NVA to hone in on our position. Bombs began bursting around us, but nothing or no one could or would interfere with our ceremony. At the end of our ceremony, we casually walked back and entered our new home.

We would find parts from those Marines until we left Khe Sanh. The drum would become our area's crematorium for all the body parts that never made the body bags. We hoped the NVA artillery would not hit our crematorium and kill more of our friends. Empty boots, pairs or singles, some whole, some in pieces would stand guard duty at our crematorium. Body parts were added daily. Earl's words from the Bible continually healed our fragile souls.

Dear Diary:

FEAR

Nam, where lives are lost and saved everyday without thought of its psychological consequence.
I remember the many days of being shot at and the sight and inner fear of seeing a friend shot or dead. Bullets are like something reaching for me, unseen, but heard, unbiased and deadly.
My mind cannot grasp the swift change of events in an all out fire-fight. My trained reflexes have me running, dodging, hiding and returning fire.
The shadow of death is all around me. The sounds of war, the suffering, the dying, is in itself...unbelievable.
The fear of perishing, that struggle for self-preservation, keeps me going. It was just like they said it would be, all blood and guts. The only thing they left out was John Wayne.
The military could train me for just about anything, except the harassment and interdiction of artillery warfare. It was like nothing I could imagine. The sound alone made my heart stop. I can only relate to this by having you lie between railroad tracks and have the Baltimore Express pass over you.

One artillery shell fired at you isn't too bad. It only lasts for a few seconds and only hits one spot. When the barrage begins, the destruction is devastating. The long lasting artillery attack plays havoc with my mind. If I'm caught in the open, I'm scrambling for the nearest shelter, preferably a bunker. Once inside I'm still not safe. All I have accomplished is the elimination of a lot of shrapnel. We just sit and wait in huddled masses. Listening, wondering, waiting for the one with your name on it. That endless time, working on your nerves. Minutes seem like hours, hours feel like days. Screams from the wounded, sighs of the dying, the helping that never seems to be enough.
I begin to wander, dreaming of home, my loved ones and the things we haven't done, but want to. I begin to pray, praying silently, praying in groups.
Fear has come a-calling and I have to suck up all that is holy to me, all that has made me what I am, all that will show the men around me that I will get them though this and send them home in one piece.
Like the scream of a murdered woman, a shell lands close and reawakens me to my surroundings. A twelve-foot cube, seventeen feet below Mother Earth, totally in darkness.
Finally it's quiet and we crawl from the bowels, the womb of our Mother, exhausted from mental fatigue.
"Thank God I'm alive."

April 19: A Convoy heading to Khe Sanh with Marine Unit G-2/9 was ambushed by the NVA. Dusters provided direct fire support on NVA main positions, enabling the Marines to extract their wounded and dead. Four Dustermen were wounded in action protecting the Marines.

My crew and I hate Khe Sanh. It is a stagnant position and we are road warriors. The siege is over, except for a few snipers that are always trying to kill us. The "INCOMING!" never stops, and the big guns from Co Roc, Laos, never stop pounding the base at will. Hundreds of enemy artillery shells hit the base daily. Living conditions are deplorable. The NVA has blown the base into little pieces. Garbage and debris are strewn all over the place. The only true things that rule the base were the rats. The rats are as big as rabbits. They grow larger by the day as they feast on the dead NVA in Death Valley. We share our bunker with families of rats. A rat crawling on you during your sleep is an everyday common occurrence. Often, a rat sits next to you while you eat your C-rations or write a letter home.

April 25: We have inherited a dog, or should I say a puppy, named "Rex" from a Marine named Bruce. The dog's name was instantly changed to Comanche, the handle given to Dusters from Charlie Battery. The dog breaks the monotony of the constant "INCOMING!" and that lonely isolated feeling. He is a good dog and is the mascot of everyone on the northwest end of the runway. Today, Comanche started frothing at the mouth and shaking. We feared he might have rabies. He is still just a pup and likes to gnaw on our fingers. Panic set in. We all thought we had rabies. Rabies meant getting two weeks of shots in your belly, something we all dreaded. We preferred fighting the NVA rather than dying from rabies.

April 27: I came up with this great idea and gave the dog a name, Pvt. Charles Comanche. On the next medivac chopper, we sent George Lewis and Pvt. Comanche to the hospital in Da Nang. We knew George would find a doctor to treat our dog. Avoiding rabbi shots in all our bellies depended on him. Comanche was diagnosed with distemper and was sadly put to sleep.

George was no fool and stayed a few extra days at China Beach. He claimed he could not get back to Khe Sanh. His stories about the USO show were refreshing. We were all jealous.

April 29: Our new Lt., who we call Lieutenant Dan, has arrived. He took up position at the other end of the runway just past the Quad-50s. The Lieutenant doesn't even know George and, therefore, doesn't know that he is gone. Captain Tedesco has placed me in charge of the Dusters and the two Quad-50s. The poor Lt. is new and the guys just nod their agreement to his instructions and then ask me if his instructions are correct.

It was a very long, life-threatening trek between Dusters, a journey the Lt. seldom made. When he did come, he had collected an assortment of strange souvenirs along the way and sent them back to Camp Carroll on the next convoy.

Khe Sanh Combat Base

CHAPTER 13: ABANDONING KHE SANH

May 2: To break the monotony, we are always playing jokes on each other – Army versus Marines. I caught another rat, a nice big two pounder. My crew helped me tie a long rag to the rat's tail. Just before it got dark, we doused the rag with gasoline, lit it on fire and dropped it in the long trench that went around Khe Sanh. Like a flaming bottle rocket, the rat ran down the trench. The Marines, thinking that some tiny flaming gook was running at them, jump out of the trench, screaming and shooting at the rat.

May 4: The Marines got even today and threw a teargas grenade into our bunker. Choking, coughing, gagging, with saliva drooling out of our mouths and snot running out of our noses, we crawled out of our bunker. Our friendly Marines cheered with joy at their victorious payback.

It took about a week for the teargas to disappear. We had no windows to open and only one doorway into the bunker. Since teargas is heavy, it clung to our underground bunker. It was the only time I used my gas mask.

May 8: The NVA artillery from Co Roc seems endless. Huddled in our bunkers, we just take all they can give. After it subsides, we check our area for any wounded or dead. Today, we found two dead black guys, blown to shreds. I told the guys in the area we had to gather them up and bring them to Graves Registration. We only had two ponchos in which to put them. Leaving them with their assignment, I continued on my mission checking out the area. On my return, the men were just finishing up their gruesome task. In their haste to rebuild these two guys into human shapes, they inadvertently mixed parts. One guy was a very light skinned black, maybe even Spanish, and the other guy was very dark. They looked at me in horror when I instructed them to rebuild them properly. "They Have Mothers."

May 10: I played with a rat I trapped under one of the empty ammo cans. Using the asbestos gloves from the Duster, I tied a wire around the rat's body and then attached a piece of parachute cord to the wire. I then tied my little harnessed friend to a long stick. You should have seen everybody jump when I walked past them with my pet rat.

May 14: Dusterman Jose Diaz was killed today.

May 17: It has been well over a month since our last shower, and sponge baths are few and far between. Earl noticed a gross-looking giant blackhead sticking out of Wally's ear. Instantly, Earl wanted it removed and Wally was not in agreement. George, now in on the removal idea, started chasing Wally all around the base with Earl in hot pursuit, screaming "C'mon Wally, it won't hurt, it'll be a cinch! We're just going to do a little surgery! After what seemed like a hundred yard chase, Wally was finally tackled and dragged back to our bunker area. There they were, two big guys, pinning poor Wally to the ground. Earl was sitting on his chest, pinning his shoulders down, and George was kneeling on his head so Earl could get a good look in the ear. Like crazed men in a fox hunt, they pulled out their bayonets and told Wally they were going to cut that disgusting thing out of his ear. Wally was kicking and screaming, thinking they would cut off his ear. Agreeing that the bayonets were too big, they decided to use two big ten-penny nails, using them like giant tweezers. After a lot of screaming, the two held up their prized piece of surgery, stuck to the end of one of the nails. They then proceeded to pour surgical alcohol in Wally's ear, announcing "Now it won't get infected." Poor Wally...

May 20: I got a call on the radio. It was Tank. Casually, as if it were a Sunday phone call, his voice chirped with enthusiasm "Joey, this is John Huelsenbeck and I'm going home." We both screamed with joy. John had done his year in Hell. I was happy for him and yet sad that he was going home. We had become great friends and had gone through a lot of terrifying, horrible shit together. John is one of the bravest men I have ever met and I respect him to the utmost. When he was with you, you knew your back was being covered. It gave me and the rest of the men a comfortable feeling. I don't think there's another soldier or Marine on the DMZ who can fill John's shoes. I owed my life to this man and prayed he would get home safely.

May 22: Khe Sanh has removed what little was left of our shame and modesty. The constant "INCOMING!" has blown up almost all the shitters. The empty 40mm cans have become our depositories. The cans, filled with a little kerosene, were placed in the trenches or brought into the bunkers. God, it is embarrassing. The airtight lids keep the smell down. It is only bad when in use. Burning shitters at Khe Sanh has become a no-no. The NVA can see the burning shit smoke for miles and will put an artillery shell on top of you as you take a crap, a mess that nobody treasures cleaning. Anywhere from five to sixteen guys are crammed into our twelve foot cube bunker. We made bunk beds from old scraps of wood and used an old M-16 ammo can converted into gasoline lantern as light. Opening the 40mm can and taking a shit in the center of our bunker is a nightmare. Jokes are endless, toilet paper is rationed. When the bunker is full of guys, the guy taking the dump is shown no mercy. Nothing is sacred. We all laugh and it relieves the cruelty of war, if even for a moment.

May 24: Our Duster still has a bad engine and is used only to retrieve recon teams and Marines close to our perimeter. I guess that is good for us, because we can't do convoys, mine sweeps, or search and destroys.

Instead, we have other tasks such as digging out the wounded and dead out from the bunkers hit by the NVA artillery. Hoping to hear sounds of life, we dig feverously with our hands. We can't use shovels and picks because they will cut up or kill the friends you are trying to save. The constant body recovery has fried our brains and gives a whole new meaning to brotherhood.

May 25: Water is a prized commodity at the base and we are unable to get our own water, so I got the idea to build a shower. The guys thought I was crazy because we didn't have enough drinking water, no less shower water. We had been taking little baths out of our helmets. I had them cut the lid off an old Agent Orange drum and clean the inside out with rags and dirt. They then put a hand release fire hose nozzle in the drum's small screw hole. We wedged the drum on top of the bunker and announced to the Marines that we had a shower. My plan is to make a deal with the Marine Lt. who is in charge of the Marines who live in the trenches on our north perimeter. We will provide showers for all his men, if he supplies us with water.

He agreed. Our position, thereafter, always had water, thanks to our shower. We used our gasoline pump to draw the water up into the drum. It was great while it lasted.

May 26: We had been ordered to abandon the KHE SANH COMBAT BASE. This was something we thought would never happen. This must have been another one of Robert McNamara's brilliant ideas. We had kicked NVA ass all over the DMZ. We were winning the war. The troops thought it was time to keep the ground for which we fought and march on Hanoi. Abandoning this base would destroy all the reasons we had fought. It was political suicide and the warrior did not count. So many Americans had died in vain. So many Americans were severely wounded, both physically and mentally. We all knew it was the turning point of the war. Even though I do not like the war, it is not in my mental makeup to give up, quit, retreat, or lose at anything that costs lives. The warrior in me will rise to the occasion, step to the front of the line, face my adversaries head on, and be mentally and physically accountable.

 Abandoning Khe Sanh was a personal insult to all Vietnam Veterans ******

May 28: One of the other items we never have enough of is C-rations. Our convoys bring us ammo and mail, but always seem to forget to bring rations on their weekly jaunts. I have lost another thirty pounds during my stay at Khe Sanh. I now weigh around 145 pounds and have lost over 60 pounds since I had arrived in Nam. We started to monitor the helicopter drops each evening at our end of the runway. Tonight, after the chopper was gone, Gary Dahlheimer's Marine Ontos crew and my crew raided the shipment. Our stretcher was used to carry off all usable items and food. This, our best raid yet, yielded dehydrated hamburgers. They looked like little gray cardboard squares. We placed them in our mess kit frying pan, added water and a little heat from C-4 --Ole' hamburgers! Gary opened a big can of string beans and we all ate like kings.

May 29: It is like the original 77-day siege has never ended. The NVA continually pound the base with heavy artillery. I stopped counting incoming at 250. My brain is beginning to falter. I am losing track of time and dates. I really don't give a shit. I walk the area tall and proud, defying the snipers. My men don't question me.

May 30: The convoy brought me an extra man named Simon. Benny, my Cannoneer, will take Simon under his wing and teach him what is expected and what was happening at this base.

Lt. Dan told me that I was going on R&R to Formosa for five days. I told him I didn't want to go because I was waiting for an opening to go to Australia.

June 1: Before I could fill two sandbags, I found myself landing in Formosa. Bruce, the Marine who gave us the dog, was on the same plane and the two of us teamed up together.

June 6: Bruce and I had partied for five days. The head cook and manager at the hotel had gone to school at New York University. It was like old home week for me, since I came from New Jersey. Bruce and I drank and ate like it was our last meal. We got so drunk that they had to drag us to our rooms. I guess somewhere in one of our drunken stupors we got a haircut and a manicure. As Bruce and I sat in the hotel lobby, I noticed something shiny on my fingernails. Still drunk, it took me a while to realize someone had put clear nail polish on our fingers. Bruce and I started laughing our asses off. Stumbling and crawling, we made our way back to the hotel barber (a woman) and had her remove the polish. God, what would the guys back at Khe Sanh think?

June 7: Bruce and I returned to Khe Sanh. Bruce asked me to hold his Yashica camera and take care of his personals while he went on patrol.

Bruce never returned. I will always miss his crazy laugh and stupid jokes. I still have his camera.

June 8: To amuse ourselves, we have wrestling and boxing matches with the other Duster crews who come in on the convoys from LZ Stud. Our crew, because of our bad ass Kung Fu Master George Lewis, is always the winner. Occasionally, we even have a rock throwing fight. We are totally nuts. Yesterday, I got hit in the face with a big rock and now have a giant black eye. Captain Tedesco arrived out of nowhere on the next convoy. I think he came just to bust my balls and tease me. "Belardo, I heard how you got that black eye, and you're not getting another Purple Heart," the Captain bellowed. My crew thought this was great. We could have all been dead and the Command would not have known or possibly even given a shit. Get whacked in the head with a rock and the whole DMZ knew about it. I was known to have handed out a few black eyes. This must have been God's way of getting even. The joke was on me and that was okay.

June 9: Dusterman Manuel Martinez from Alpha Battery, who survived the 77 Day Siege of Khe Sanh, was killed today.

We all feel guilty that our brothers-in-arms from the 3rd Marine Tanks were killed just outside the gates of Khe Sanh. Marine Sgt. Clifford Evans was killed. He was one of our best friends. I had fought a lot of battles with him on that "Road to Hell". Our engine is now almost completely dead. If they had replaced our engine in a timely fashion, we might have been able to help or save them. Cries for help on the radio will ever haunt me. We questioned everyone, over and over, if they were sure Evans was dead.

June 10: The new guy Simon has rubbed everyone the wrong way. We had a C-ration policy that each person on the crew took turns eating the famous beanie weenies. Simon was left alone today to guard the bunker while our Duster went to the other end of the camp to shoot at a suspected NVA position. After our return, George Lewis discovered that Simon had eaten his beanie weenies. George is a very large, very strong man, much larger than Simon and a Kung Fu Master to boot. He is truly a real badass man, not someone you want to piss off. George, who carries an old razor sharp "Enfield Bayonet" strapped to the back of his flak jacket, took it out and wanted to carve up Simon. It was amazing how a simple can of food could make a man crack. Simon thought it was a joke, but George went ballistic. If I could not calm George down, Simon was going to die. I had never seen George get so angry with anyone about anything. Simon had crossed the wrong bounds and broken crew trust. Trust in each other is the only thing we have to offer. It is sacred to my men. To appease George and the rest of the crew, I ordered Simon to cover our bunker with a new layer of sandbags. Simon filled, tied, and stacked every sandbag by himself, with George as his personal watchdog.

June 11: I explained the situation to our Lieutenant, and about my fear for Simon's safety. He agreed with my concern and will send Simon back to Camp Carroll on the next convoy.

June 13: The convoy from Carroll was scheduled to arrive at noon. Simon was leaving us but, before he left, I made him empty all the sand bags he had filled, plus a few hundred more. We were taking Khe Sanh apart. Plus, no one fucks with my crew.

June 14: A Douglas A4 fighter plane from one of the aircraft carriers signaled "Mayday" to the base, indicating that it must attempt an emergency landing on Khe Sanh's short runway. The edges of the runway were already filled with planes and helicopters destroyed during the siege and since our arrival. The base came alive. Men scurried from their holes to get a better look at what might be added to the collection of relics along the runway. Poised with shovels, fire extinguishers, stretchers, and water, we waited with cameras around our necks for the jet's arrival. It was the most excitement we have had since the chopper had left dehydrated hamburgers and grapefruits on the runway for us to steal.

The A4 plane landed with its brakes locked and engines in full reverse thrust. It came to a screeching halt a few feet short of the end of the runway. Everyone ran to its aid. The pilot was a little shaken, but seemed to be in good health. The jet had a small hole in its fuel tank and had run out of gas. The pilot was lucky that the plane's tail hook didn't catch on something as he came down the runway. We were all fortunate that the NVA were not shooting at the base from Co Roc. The fighter plane was dragged off the runway and into an old helicopter revetment for protection.

June 16: This day, the A4 was dragged out from the protection of the revetment and positioned on the end of the runway. With his plane's gas tank repaired and its tail hook strapped to the fuselage, the pilot was eager to take off. As the pilot got into the cockpit, he gave all of us the "High Sign." The "thumbs up" gesture made us all start cheering. We all waved and screamed as the jet roared down the runway, lifted, and was gone from our sight. Minutes later, the pilot flew the jet a few hundred feet over the base, doing victory rolls and spiraling into the sky. It was a good day for all. The monotony was broken with joy and excitement, and no one was injured.

June 19: Eric Metler, one of the mechanics from Camp Carroll, arrived on the morning's convoy, riding shot-gun on the boom-truck with a Duster engine strapped to the deck for our Duster. It was like every NVA artillery piece in the area took aim on his truck and our new engine. We already had prepared for our engine's removal and had disconnected all the connections. I think it was the first time in Duster history that an engine was removed and installed during an enemy artillery barrage. As the driver raised the boom higher to remove the old engine, it acted like a homing device for the enemy artillery. The exploding bombs covered us in hot shrapnel and earth. I felt sorry for Eric, the truck driver, and my crew, but the convoy was only staying for an hour or two and the engines must be swapped. My crew finished the final assembly after the convoy left. I never heard a Duster crew pray and curse out a Duster engine in the same breath. Eric was thrilled when he finally left Khe Sanh. He didn't even wave goodbye. It was great to have Grim Reaper running again.

June 21: I celebrated my twenty-first birthday today. Eric had brought me a care package from my family and girlfriend. They sent me cookies, popcorn, pepperoni and provolone cheese. All of us thought we were at a feast as we celebrated my passage into manhood. I cannot remember when the actual passage took place. It must have happened between the enemy artillery explosions. We ended our feast with our favorite meal from home, Lucky Leaf Baked Apples in a can. I carefully cut each apple so that each of us got the same size piece. We then drank the syrup a spoonful at a time. We finished our delicacy with each of us taking turns putting our tongue in the can and getting those last tasty licks.

June 22: We have been having trouble with a helicopter pilot and crew who get their kicks hovering over our position and causing a dust bowl. This helicopter arrives twice a day to pick up Marines leaving the base. The pilot hovers a few feet over our bunker and has his door gunner point his gun at my men. The red clay dust clung to the oiled 40mm cannons. They make so much dust that we have to re-clean the guns every time he comes. We do not want them to jam when fired.

June 23: I met the helicopter at the runway and advised the pilot that his intentional dusting had to stop. The pilot was an arrogant bastard with a severe attitude problem and told me where to shove it. I told him it wasn't a game and I would love to kick his ass, and that my men would love to shoot his mangy butt out of the sky.

June 24: Today, the same asshole helicopter pilot repeated his routine. As the helicopter was hovering over us, we heard a loud popping noise, and the chopper burst into flames. It crashed just outside our perimeter wire. We ran out and saved the mangy bastard, his crew, and passengers. They were lucky only to have some broken noses and minor cuts.

June 25: A group of officers showed up at our bunker today and accused us of shooting the helicopter out of the sky. I laughed and advised them that if we had shot them, they all would be dead. I told them they should go check out the helicopter. It was located on the other side of the wire and visible from the perimeter. I told the questioning Colonel that they should give us a medal for saving their sorry asses. We were never questioned again.

June 26: I got hit in the left shin with shrapnel. A long piece of thin shrapnel was sticking out my pant leg. I reported to what was left of the aid station, Charlie Med, across the runway from our bunker. I was not questioned as to who I was or what unit I was with and the Marine doctor quickly treated me. After viewing all the Marines with much more serious wounds, I was overcome with shame for seeking treatment for my nicked shin. I spent the next couple of hours assisting as a stretcher-bearer for the wounded and the dead.

June 27: My crew and I helped out at Charlie Med and Graves Registration, a poignant reminder of the small price I have paid compared to so many others. Stretchers, carrying the wounded and the dead, are a daily vigil. My crew helps the Corpsmen with the wounded, separating them in accordance with the severity of their wounds. For moral purposes, those dying are moved away from the aid station and given morphine to ease their suffering. I help administer the morphine shots. When needed, we help Graves Registration clean and care for the dead. We clean their faces, or what is left of their faces, before we load them onto outgoing choppers. It is the least we can do for their mothers. Sometimes the whole crew helps. We called this detail "Cleaning Faces," an ordeal of mixed emotions that, I am sure, will haunt me a lifetime.

Months later, a small rusty spot appeared on my left shin from the shrapnel. It's been over forty years and the rusty spot still appears. Putting on my socks each day is a daily reminder of my stay at Khe Sanh.

June 28: My crew did not get upset when they found out I had added the symbol of the Grim Reaper back on the front gunplate. I had upgraded from my skull painting to a real NVA skull. The hardships of war had collapsed my moral fibers and my Christian upbringing, plus NVA bones were everywhere. To my surprise, the crew thought this was the greatest. They nicknamed the skull "Ho Chi." Kissing their first two fingers, they each took turns patting the skull for good luck. By now we speak openly of never going back to the real world. Nam is now our home and this is where we will die. My crew and I have crossed over to the dark side of life. It is becoming hard to focus on anything nice or anything real. If it wasn't for our CARE packages, perfumed letters from home, and mail call, I think we would have totally flipped by now.

June 29: As instructed, without haste, we continue to dismantle the base. I had been put in charge of our area and was told not to leave anything standing. All trenches and foxholes were to be filled. All buildings, bunkers and shelters were to be torn down. If we cannot take them down, we were to blow them up. Nothing, not even the garbage, will be left for the NVA. Our bunker and the Ontos crew's bunker next to us will be the last to be destroyed. These bunkers will be used to shelter the remaining clean-up crews from the enemy artillery.

The NVA snipers never stop shooting and the NVA artillery from Co Roc increased their fire missions to well over 300 rounds a day. As trenches and bunkers disappear, our living conditions have become a nightmare. As far as we are concerned, the "Siege" is still on. Hundreds of enemy artillery shells hammer us twenty-four hours a day. I stop counting each time when the hundredth round hits. We strip all the bunkers of their sandbags. As the sandbags are removed, we cut them open and dump out the earth. All metal roof decking, ammo cans and empty brass used for roof artillery deflecting material are gathered, loaded on trucks, and shipped off the base. We use the Dusters to pull the big roof timbers out of the bunkers. Bulldozers fill the empty bunker holes and the area is leveled.

My men and the Marines continually scamper into the few remaining small holes and trenches trying to stay alive. The rats scurry over the debris, men search for cover and their own place to live or die. Rats, our other enemy, have become comrades trying to stay alive. When we awake each morning, there is always a family of rats huddled against us, seeking our body warmth for comfort. We just look at each other, their little red eyes staring at us for help and food. Each morning I yell "Good Morning, Mr. Rat." "Good Morning, Mr. Belardo." "If you get any bigger I might just eat you." Living under the Dusters has become home to the Marines. The enemy knows we are abandoning Khe Sanh. Some asshole reporter had it plastered all over the front pages of every newspaper in the world. The press has gotten a lot of great young Americans killed. The enemy continues to increase their daily artillery barrages on the base. Now I stop counting at three hundred. The NVA shelling is unbelievable, killing and severely wounding many of the Marines who live in shallow shelter holes they had dug in front of our Duster. There is no safe place to hide. We stack the dead and wounded by the old "Charlie Med." A small group of Corpsmen assist those brought to this area the best they can. Convoys and helicopters come and go on a daily basis.

June 30: Khe Sanh has all but vanished before our very eyes. We didn't waste time and leveled the Ontos' bunker with the use of C-4 explosives. "INCOMING!" was fierce. We took cover in our bunker, the last full standing fortification. As we crowded in this 12 foot cube, 17 feet underground, an enemy artillery shell hit. The bunker buster round exploded and collapsed the left rear corner of the bunker, burying Wally and me alive. The only thing that kept us alive and from being crushed to death was the homemade bunk beds we took cover under. It took the guys about twenty hours to dig us out. When you dig for men, you dig slowly so you don't cut them in half with the shovels and picks. It took hours for them to clear the sandbags, ammo cans, old 40mm brass, and runway matting off our bunker. Wally was lucky and only had small cuts and lots of black and blues. My left leg had been partially pulled out of its hip socket and had turned purple, red and blue. I must have been in shock because it didn't hurt and I don't remember much. At the aid station, the guys held me down as the Doc pulled my leg back into place. It hurt like hell and I passed out. The good old Doc gave me a bottle of that military cure all-pill, the APC's (all purpose capsule – aspirins), and sent me back to my position. Mother Earth under the Duster had become our home. I watched as my men slowly removed about five feet off the remaining top portion of our bunker. Hundreds of enemy artillery shells pounded the area around our position. Hell would be a better place to live. My men slept in the fetal position as if hoping to return to the womb and get a new chance at life. I couldn't take it anymore, went back to work and ordered the bunker to be leveled by C-4. I don't want any more of my men to die from exposure to the enemy artillery. We all prayed with Earl.

Now, years later, I suffer from circulation damage, a bad back, and numb legs due to this incident.

July 2: The only thing we left was the three-sided earthen parapet for the Dusters, Quad-50s, and Ontos. We slowly moved our clean-up crew toward the east end of the runway. Our Duster accompanied us as a portable artillery shelter and bunker. We eventually rendezvoused with Steve Harris's crew at the other end of the runway. Most of the Marines have already been evacuated from the base. Our Duster crews and a hand full of Marines guarded the entire length of the north side of the old runway area. It is July 2nd and the mighty Khe Sanh is no more, reduced to a flat plateau with a small group of America's Best guarding her virtues.

July 3: I do not want the NVA artillery getting a fix on us, so we frequently move the Duster to different locations around the base. The biggest targets left standing on the base are our Dusters, giant silhouettes on a barren plain. Each evening, to keep the NVA in check, we continue the Vietnam tradition of shooting from the camp perimeter. Some call it "Mad Minutes". I call it "Moments of Madness". The Twin 40s clear the perimeter nightly of any NVA, hoping to get close to the base until we can leave for good.

July 4: The day we celebrate Old Glory was spent watching the choppers speed across the base, trailing different colored smoke grenades. This is hopefully our last night at the infamous base. The NVA, who always seemed to have good intelligence, knew this could be their last chance to shoot at Khe Sanh.

The constant "INCOMING!" had, without my knowledge, fried my brain. July 4th now takes on a whole new meaning. Fourth of July fireworks have become my "Achilles 'heel".

My family and friends joke at my involuntary twitching and my fast departure from our country's yearly display of freedom. My family thinks it's the explosion of the fireworks that makes me anxious. I try to explain to them that fireworks are like Dusters shooting. The attack starts real slow, a few bursts here and a few there. There are lots of white flashing and sparkling lights, as if the enemy is probing the wire and we're popping illumination flares with smoke trails floating away in the breeze. Then come a few bigger explosions, and then a few more, followed by lots of whistling ones and colorful ones. A noise rises from the crowd, screaming their "oohs" and "aahs". Explosion after explosion, momentum builds and builds, to the Grand Finale. Then comes the final push from the enemy, a human wave rushing at you, with guns blazing as if they were special ground effects. The crew of the Duster, holding fast in their turret, waiting, waiting, waiting, anticipating that terrifying moment, the heart stopper of every battle when someone screams "Enemy In The Wire!" The Duster, on full auto-fire, becomes the Grand Finale, shooting 240 high-explosive cannon shells a minute point blank at the advancing enemy, producing a kaleidoscope of exploding colors with deadly intentions. Ripping the enemy to shreds, like giant red, yellow and green fluorescent paintballs, each round is followed to its target by a sparkling burning tracer of death in its tail. Explosion after explosion can be heard, followed by the roar of war - giving witness to your day of killing. Like the 4th of July, it ends as fast as it started and the only thing left is the smell of sulfur and that quiet hazy calm.

July 5: Marine Unit 2/1 departed Khe Sanh in the middle of the night. I was shocked when I checked the perimeter and found no Marines. Nobody told us they were leaving. I radioed the other Duster and Quad 50s to stay on 100% alert. It was eerie to look through our Starlight Scope and see no Marines manning their respective positions. Lt. Dan was radioing everyone for assistance and help. Nobody came or helped.

July 7: Khe Sanh has become a very lonely place. All of our friends are gone. Lt. Dan and I are on the radio constantly, calling and trying to find out why we have to stay here. I think they thought we left with the other convoys. It's like talking to deaf ears.

July 10: We drove around the base today. We had never been to some of the areas. It was interesting. Nothing was left behind, everything is gone.

July 13: The last few troops from Khe Sanh were loaded on trucks and convoyed back to LZ Stud. Steve Harris and our Lt. Dan took out the first convoy. I was asked to be the rear security on that last small convoy. It was a terrible feeling seeing everyone on that last convoy standing in their vehicles, taking that last look at what was once Khe Sanh. A Marine officer asked if we could drive around the abandoned base looking for stragglers. The Marines, who were short on radios, were afraid that all their men did not get the word to leave. As we drove around the base picking up the stragglers, the NVA artillery gave us their final goodbye artillery barrage. So as not to be caught in the NVA artillery, we loaded the last of the Marines on the last truck in our convoy and instructed them to leave the base and that we would catch up.

I told my men to take a good look and say their personal goodbyes, because we are the last Americans to leave Khe Sanh. We were even nutty enough to stop and take a few pictures and make some personal comments about leaving. Standing on the Duster, we each paid a silent homage to our stay at the famous "Red Clay". The NVA artillery was getting closer and heavier. It was time to catch up to the convoy. I told Earl to put it in high gear; it was time to go home. It was going to be good to get back to Camp Carroll, hot food, showers and seeing our old friends. We have been gone for almost four months.

July 14: I forgot that Steve Harris and I were still on the top of someone's shit list. We only got as far as LZ Stud. I guess we will have to wait a little longer to get our showers and real food. Harris took the north side of the camp, and we had the higher southern slope. We were issued a tent, cots, shovels and picks. An officer I did not know told us to make this our permanent position. The officer ordered us to dig and build a bunker. After we finished, we could get rid of the tent.

July 19: The ground is so hard that, after five days of digging, we had a hole only about a foot deep and ten feet square. My men, who have already helped fill in by hand an area about a half-mile square at Khe Sanh, refused to dig anymore. Instead, we helped each other make shallow, individual little "graves". We surrounded our graves with sandbags and rocks. During "INCOMING!," we would lay in our graves face up trying to see the enemy shells flying over us, laughing with fear, cursing and yelling "Hit me-Hit me" and praying out loud with Earl. We scrounge each day for building material, so we can build our own above-ground bunker. I don't think we will ever build this bunker and I really don't give a shit.

July 20: Today I had a visit from two of my hometown friends, John Paulus and Leon Rejman, who were in the Marines. I knew they were at LZ Stud because I would get calls when I was at Khe Sanh that they were looking for me. It was good to talk of home and see old friends, reminiscing of our youth and growing up in good ol' South Plainfield. John and I had played football and hung out together at the Jersey shore. Our minds drifted back to happier times. Hopefully we will spend the next few days together, before we have to say goodbye and get back to the war.

Years later, Leon died from Agent Orange-related cancer. I recently gave his sister, Stella, some old photographs of us from Nam. John owned a few restaurants in New Jersey, fabulous places with great food and service. He has since retired.

July 21: The Grim Reaper is finally back on "The Road", running daily from LZ Stud to The Rockpile. Ambush Alley is still holding true to its name. The rear deck of our Duster is again stained burnt umber from the wounded and dead. Our hot exhausts smell of burning flesh and blood. We return daily to our shitty little tent, now riddled with shrapnel holes. It is a different existence because we have no consistent means of illuminating the inside of our tent. We have no burning homemade gasoline lights and no electricity. We only have a few candles to see inside the tent, but someone always yells, "Lights out, keep it low, keep it down." Maybe someone cares if we get killed. We surely don't give a rat's ass anymore. Our inner core is drained, and we are running on a reserve of pure hostility and hate.

August 1: I volunteered our Duster to be security for the Marine Medical Unit that visits the Montagnard Village out past the old base called Joliet. It has been months since I have seen these wonderful people. I remembered the last time I was there we ate with the Chief. Sitting around a communal pot in their customary squatted position, we ate some kind of brown soup mixture which I thought was vegetables, chicken, pot belly pig, dog, monkey, lizard and other nameless ingredients. There were very tiny bones in the soup and God only knows what little animals or creatures we ate. Holding various types of bowls to our mouths, we slurped the concoction and nodded with approval. The children thought it was so funny and screamed with joy as I fell over trying to eat and squat at the same time. Not being accustomed to their food, I spent a lot of time on the shitter following our visits.

After all these months, I was surprised the Chief recognized me and greeted me with their traditional bow and a single quick handshake. It was also very noticeable how small the village had become and how few people were left alive. He was amazed and delighted by the NVA skull on my Duster. His smile was a smile of sweet revenge. Climbing on the Duster, he examined it very closely. I wished I could talk to him in his language. We just stood there bowing, nodding, and smiling. The Vietnamese advisor said something to him and he was even happier. Maybe the skull was the revenge he was waiting for. As the Medical Team conducted their examinations, the Chief signaled for me to follow him. At an old kiln that looked like something from the Stone Age, he hand-forged me, from a piece of 55 gallon drum, a beautiful grass knife with a bamboo handle. I looked on in amazement as he made the Vietnamese machete. No one would ever guess it was once a piece of drum. Holding the knife sideways, he bowed and handed me this personal gift. With a slow bow, I accepted this fantastic gift of friendship. Even though we could not communicate, we had a mutual respect and understanding for each other.

His gift is my most treasured possession from the war.

CHAPTER 14: THE SHORT TIMER GOES HOME

August 5: We finally returned to Camp Carroll and have been pre-assigned to the "Water Point" position. We arrived just before lunch and headed directly to the Mess Hall. The last time we had a real hot meal was at Carroll, almost six months ago. Steve Harris and I had our Dusters pull up and park next to the Mess Hall. Charlie Battery guys were assembling, waiting for the doors to open. We were away from base camp for so long that we hardly knew anybody. Most of our friends had already gone home or were dead. All the guys waiting to eat walked over to my Duster and stared at the skull. Wally told them we called the skull "Ho Chi." The men explained that Captain Tedesco always told them crazy war stories of the Grim Reaper crew and their skull. They all thought that he was just trying to get them ready for war and that we were not real. But now, there we were, bigger than life, dirty, smelly, unshaven, with pants full of holes, rolled up above our boots. We must have been some sight. I explained to the guys that we hadn't had a hot meal in months and would appreciate it if we ate first. A few guys got a little mouthy until George pulled out his sword and waved it around. Inside, the cook asked us who we were and did not want to serve us. It was starting to get ugly. Thank God, Tedesco came walking in and explained we were part of Charlie Battery and calmed things down. I spent the first fifteen minutes at the milk machines, drinking a glass of white and then a glass of chocolate and then had several helpings of hot chow. By the time our two crews left the Mess Hall, we had drunk almost all the milk.

It was great seeing Roger Blentlinger again. He welcomed us with a hot shower just for my crew. It was a wonderful feeling having the hot water run over our dirty bodies. I had lost sixty pounds since I left Carroll and needed some better clothes. After our shower, we rode over to the Duster Motor Pool and took fatigues out of the rag barrel. Those were the extra clothes discarded by the men going home and were in a lot better condition than our clothes.

August 8: I am now a short timer and scheduled to leave Charlie Battery, 1st/44th on August 10th. Earl, Wally, and I openly discussed having Earl become the new Squad Leader. George would become the Driver, and they would get a new Gun Bunny. I am becoming very uneasy about leaving. I have trained my men to the best of my ability, but I am not sure if that was good enough. I thought about re-upping. My insides churn with mixed emotions about going home. Will they all make it home? It isn't the leaving that makes me restless. We have lived and breathed and fought as one team, one unit. I only hope that the "Newbee" replacing me will not let my men down.

August 12: My last day at Camp Carroll was spent in the lookout tower next to the Water Point. I could not help but think of the many battles and all the "INCOMING!" and the young men who died in my arms. Before God took them, I learned about their family, friends and pets. I was the last person they would see or talk to. One guy told me he had a pet dog, another, a pet pig, another, a parrot and a cow. They would tell me the strangest things. I just held them tight, gave them morphine and promised I would tell their mothers how brave they were. Nam has been a long year and the view from the high tower sort of puts things in perspective. It is my time to leave the DMZ.

To my surprise, my crew had what looked like a new set of fatigues for me to wear home. George gave me a new razor to shave with, Benny handed me a new bar of soap, and Earl gave me some aftershave and deodorant. After one of Wally's haircuts and another one of Roger's hot showers, I felt like a new person. Before I could leave, my men took turns changing the way I looked, first cleaning off my boots, then blousing my pants, then rolling up my pants, then tilting my boonie hat sideways and finally rolling up the hat edges and sitting it square on my head. They were thrilled with my appearance. There I stood looking like some nerdy geek. Roger boomed in his deep voice "only your mother will love you." They could not stop laughing as they snapped pictures of their prized workmanship.

Captain Tedesco, to my surprise, asked me for my personal night vision Star Light Scope. "Belardo, I don't need to know where you got that scope, and I'm not sure if I really want to know how you got it, but I want it," spoke the Captain. Someone was still squealing on me. "Captain, my boys can't shoot gooks in the dark if you take our scope," I replied. We both smiled and laughed. Tedesco joked, "Joe, all of us can now take turns shooting gooks in the dark. You shot your share. It's time for you to go home." Captain Tedesco was a great officer. He made a difference in our lives, through his true leadership, and was the best Captain that Charlie Battery ever had. I knew he would look after my men. I considered him my friend and knew my men could trust him and his combat judgment. We shook hands and patted each other's backs as we said our farewells. Before I let go of Tedesco's hand, I thanked him and reminded him how my crew would follow him to Hell and fight the Devil for him. I thanked him for not sending me on the Dong Ha Mountain missions. I always felt that mountain had my name on it.

I said our traditional "So long, see you later" to all my friends. I was going home. We never said goodbye; goodbye was forever and bad luck. Leaving was an unbearable emotional mental pain. Part of me has never left my Duster or Route 9. We would joke and say we knew each other "When". You can add a lot of endings to the word When. When....nothing you held sacred was sacred anymore. When....you thanked God you lived when another died. When....you stopped thinking about dying. When....you stopped thinking of home. When...you.....?

In Dong Ha, I was given my unit separation papers and casually handed another Purple Heart with masking tape holding the medal box closed. "We think this is yours, Soldier," the personnel Section Chief said drolly.

Everyone going home from the 1/44th met at China Beach. The officers never knew that we had made arrangements for one of our convoys with about twenty men from Charlie Battery and Headquarters

Battery to meet us at "The Beach." Major parts and supplies had to be picked up at the Da Nang docks. It was an excuse to party for three days. China Beach was glad to get rid of us. We had taken over the whole place. All of us (Steve Harris, Frank Bardone, Larry Roundtree, John Gunesch, Noble Grinner, Wayne Bailey, Hayden Waite, Paul Raymond and Ray Ellis) were singing, dancing, drinking, eating and acting twenty-four hours a day as if this were our last day on earth. It felt great. Jim "Doc" Butler was the last to shake my hand. We said our goodbyes because this was a forever farewell. Then we all caught the next plane to Cam Ranh Bay. At the Cam Ranh Bay Departing Center, they gave us a quickie debriefing and shipped us the next day to Fort Lewis, Washington. We left Vietnam singing "Summer Time and the Living is Easy" as Paul Raymond strummed his guitar.

As I flew home in what we called "The Freedom Bird", I could not help but think about my past year: no electricity, limited food (C-Rations), water rationing, hundreds of enemy artillery barrages, occasional bathing, no bathrooms, burning shit, and living with the rats, scorpions and insects. I remembered things crawling on me in our small dark bunker many feet underground, using Agent Orange to defoliate the area around our base positions, friends wounded and dying, taking turns helping at the medical stations and Graves Registration, carrying the wounded, wrapping, tagging and bagging the dead and picking up the pieces, and taking another's life. The small scars on my wrists and on the corner of my right eyebrow would become my daily reminders of extinguishing another human's life. On the plane ride home, I asked the stewardess for a piece of paper and a pen to write my last thoughts of Vietnam.

As the plane descended toward the runway in Washington, all the men on the plane started screamed with joy. When the wheels touched down, the screams became a roar. One at a time, as we exited the plane, the men dropped to their knees and kissed the ground. It was an emotional experience. Fort Lewis, Washington was nothing special, old barracks with no hot water, traditional military food and everything "hurry up and wait." The military had it down to an assembly-line process. Thirty-six hours later on August 17, 1968, fitted in a custom-tailored dress uniform, complete with new shoes and skivvies, I received my separation papers from the Army. True to the end, my personnel files were all screwed up. I was discharged from the Army with what they call "Temporary Records and a Soldier's Affidavit".

Adding insult to injury, we all missed the last plane out of Seattle and had to sleep overnight in the airport. Several thoughtful men bought us free drinks and food at the airport bar. My family and girlfriend Nancy had no idea that I was back in the States. At first, I thought I would surprise them and just show up on their doorstep, but my friends all agreed that would be too much of a shock and encouraged me to call with my plans. I held my breath waiting for someone to answer my parents' telephone. It was the first time we had spoken in a year. After tears of joy, I told them to meet me at Newark Airport around 5:00 pm the next day. I would be coming in from JFK Airport on a helicopter.

Ironically, I had to take the last step of my journey home in a helicopter from JFK to Newark airport. On August 18, 4:59 PM, I emerged as a civilian, still dressed in military clothes, from the shuttle helicopter at Newark Airport, NJ. As we approached the helipad, I could see familiar faces yelling and waving from the top passenger viewing platform. My family, girlfriend, and a handful of relatives and friends greeted me. I was surprised about how frightened I was about getting off the chopper. I had changed and did not want them to know. It would break their hearts. I never wanted them to know the other Joe Belardo, the Warrior King. After a few restless minutes in the chopper, the pilot told me it was time to go. Like nothing ever happened, I fixed my hat, straightened my tie and put on my sunglasses. This was going to be a mental firefight. Frightened and concerned, I took a deep breath and stepped out of the chopper to meet my family. My father was the first to meet me. We just stared at each other. We both knew the price of war and did not need to speak. He extended his one hand to me and just said, "Well." I removed from my wallet his small red scapula and placed it in his hand and thanked him. "You can have this back when I die," Dad said softly. He hugged me tightly and kissed my cheeks and cried. "Now go say hello to your mother, Brenda, Kenny, Nancy and the rest of the family." I was fortunate, my homecoming was wonderful. I was loved and had forgotten how good it felt.

When we arrived at our house, my father had placed a banner on the front lawn that said "WELCOME HOME SON".

The previous was the last entry in my diary. I was thankful that my tour had ended and that I was welcomed home with the loving open arms of my family and friends.

My mother and father were thrilled when we took down Allen Ginsberg. I came home in time for the South Plainfield Annual Labor Day Parade. The local newspaper asked to do an article about my tour in Nam. The parade was in my name, and I rode with Mayor Gaynor in his Cadillac convertible. It was a great homecoming. The following month my parents had to change their telephone to an unlisted number. The twenty-four hour a day calls never ended. Nameless voices yelling, "Baby burner – child killer – rapist – bastard – village burner – war monger," and a hundred other terrible names. My mother cried, and my father questioned my tour. I was never so sad. The war was bad enough. I thought what we read in the papers was journalistic bullshit. I was wrong. My fellow countrymen hurt me more than I can ever express. For years, if I were introduced to someone as a Vietnam vet, the reply would be a single expressive word "Oh". I always wondered what that "Oh" meant. That little word cut me like a knife.

The 1st Battalion 44th Artillery was one of the most highly decorated combat units in Vietnam. It earned the Army Presidential Unit Citation, Army Valorous Unit Award, Army Meritorious Unit Commendation, Navy (Marine) Presidential Unit Citation, Navy (Marine) Meritorious Unit Commendation, The Republic of Vietnam Cross of Gallantry with Palm, The Republic of Vietnam Civil Action Honor Medal and countless Battle Ribbons.

It took years of letter writing before I was reissued my Purple Hearts, Good Conduct Medal, and my other Unit Citations.

Nineteen years would pass before I spoke to an officer from 1st/44th. Out of the blue, I had this overwhelming urge to talk to Captain Easter, Lt. Hardin, and Captain Tedesco. I had left Nam and said my goodbyes to Tedesco, but had never said goodbye or apologized to Easter and Hardin for giving them a lot of trouble. I had to tell them I understood and hoped they would understand. They would know what I meant. I wanted to thank them for getting me home. Maybe without any of us knowing it, they gave us that inner drive to make it home. I know they did what they thought was right and I did what I thought was right. I could not find an address for Easter or Tedesco, but Hardin had signed my New Jersey flag and added his hometown to it. After three calls, I was talking to his mother. I was amazed that she knew who I was. She told me the now Lieutenant Colonel Hardin would love to talk with me. I called the old lieutenant the next day, and we spoke on the phone for almost three hours. Like magic, speaking with Lt. Hardin released my mind and soul from years of Vietnam mental confusion and frustration. It was time for my mind to lock the other Joe Belardo deep in the back of my brain and get on with my life. Talking to the lieutenant was great. I still hope someday to find Captain Easter and tell him I am sorry for giving him so much trouble. He was only doing his best.

He told me he did not know what happened to Easter, but gave me the now Colonel Vincent Tedesco's home telephone number at Fort Bliss, Texas. The good ol' Captain couldn't believe it was me. We spoke for hours. He told me that John Huelsenbeck and Hugh Roberts from the Charlie Battery had started a military club called "Dusters, Quads, and Searchlights".

I went to my first DQS Reunion that year in Indianapolis, Indiana, at Steve Harris' house and was reunited with my "brothers" once again. It had been years since I last seen my friends. I was very nervous and wondered if anyone would remember me. John "Tank" Huelsenbeck was the first Dusterman I would meet from my old unit. Although many years had passed, we did not have to be introduced. It was an amazing "Welcome Home." It was simply "Hi, Tank – Hi, Joey," as we just stood there staring at each other with tears rolling down our cheeks. He turned and introduced me to his wife, Sally, and said, "This is the Joe I've been talking about." Our mental armor fell to the floor unnoticed as we hugged, cried and patted each other backs as Sally wrapped her arms around us, sharing tears with her men finally coming home. The next hugs and tears came from Steve, followed by dozens more as other Dustermen arrived at the reunion. It was as if we had never left Nam.

A few years later, we all gathered at a military reunion at Fort Bliss, hosted by Colonel Tedesco, Colonel House, and Lieutenant Colonel Hardin. The hugs, tears, and stories were the best. The reunion helped us all bury a lot of demons.

In 1989, I started a yearly tradition. Each year on November 10th, we men of the DQS assemble as honorary Marines in front of the Iwo Jima Memorial and participate in the Marine Corps Birthday ceremony. On the 11th we meet at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial ("The Wall") in honor of all our fallen brothers. At the end of the Veterans Day service, we lay wreaths, honoring the men who gave the Supreme Sacrifice serving on Dusters, Quads and Searchlights and as Khe Sanh Veterans. I cannot express the feeling it gives me when we lay a wreath at The Wall. Before the Veterans Day service begins, we leave a small plaque or piece or war memorabilia for our brothers who are inscribed on the wall. Imagine, fifty to one hundred old veterans, standing tall and feeling young, standing in a single line and marching at the half step down the walkway of The Wall. No language is spoken; no calls of cadence are given. The only sounds heard are the footsteps hitting the walkway. The formation stops and in perfect harmony we do a right face, salute and place our right hands on The Wall. A pre-chosen veteran kneels and places a plaque in memory of a fallen Brother. As he stands, all hands come off The Wall and salute as one. The lead person in the line turns and hugs the next veteran in line and says "Welcome Home - pass it down." The Welcome Home is passed down to the very last man. Our Duster Association also has the honor at each anniversary of the Wall to read the names of those who gave the Supreme Sacrifice. I call these two days "The Gathering of Ancient Warriors".

To my surprise and pleasure, several of my personal items left at the Wall are being used in an exhibit of memorabilia which travels throughout the country.

In honor of my journey as a Dusterman, Diane Evans Carlson, President of the Vietnam Women's Memorial in Washington, DC, gave the DQS the privilege of being the Honor Guard at the dedication of their memorial. Five years later, I was one of the guest speakers at their Candlelight Memorial Service. At the Gold Star Mothers' National Convention held in New Jersey, Gold Star Mother President, Judith Young, gave me the privilege of addressing the Mothers in attendance. It was a very humbling and emotional experience.

In 1996, the Air Defense Artillery Magazine did a feature article about the January 24th ambush. Thanks to this article, John "Tank" Huelsenbeck, Earl Holt, Chester Sines, and I were awarded the Bronze Star with "V" for Valor. I had made a promise never to forget Roger Blentlinger, the Marine who risked his life for mine and every other Dusterman and Marine. We refused the medal unless Blentlinger was also awarded the same medal. It was nice that we all finally got some recognition for our service to our country. It was even a better day when I called Roger and told him he was getting an Army Medal. It made a big impression on my family that I was receiving this medal. I was so proud, and it was finally going to give credence to all the Vietnam stories that I had told to my family and friends.

Vietnam would reaffirm my family's teaching that all men are created equal. It is how we treat each other on this glorious planet that separates man from other beasts. Where else on earth could men or women bond in an unspoken brotherhood? Where else on earth, regardless of race, color or creed could you share a can of food with one spoon for five people? Where else on earth could you share the intimacies of families, friends, religion and politics and be willing to die for each other without question? Where else on earth could you share your inner most fears, witness men in their glory, and help them through their deepest sorrows? Where else on earth are you stripped of everything you consider holy and do things you never thought you were capable of doing? Where else on earth do you really hope God will forgive you? Where else on earth do they send you home and have you start your life all over like nothing ever happened? These were the best of "Life's Lessons" you could ever learn and they could only be taught on the combat playing field called "War". Yet, for some strange reason, some people never seem to learn from these lessons.

It was a Hell of a Year and it wasn't until recently that I would admit with great sadness, confusion and pride, the mental cost of being a proud Vietnam Veteran. Maybe it was the year, the time, the turmoil, the homecoming, or the separation from the brotherhood that Vietnam produced. Maybe it was the waiting to be recognized for something that had become a bad dream. Despite all this, and for some strange reason, Nam was "The Best Year of My Life".

Life has its ups and downs. Vietnam filled them both. To this day, I tell everyone that I was "A DUSTERMAN", one of the "LAST GREAT GUNFIGHTERS" and damn proud of it.

Joseph Belardo

We had the pleasure the other day of meeting 21-year old Joseph Belardo, a fine young man who made us feel that America is not raising a lost generation after all.

Joe just returned from Vietnam after a tour of duty with the Army. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph V. Belardo of 224 Geary Dr. and should be the pride of any family.

If you're as fed up as we are with the hippies and the phony intellects who have been tearing down America at every turn, we suggest you meet this young man and find out about the other side of the coin. It certainly restored our faith.

South Plainfield can be justly proud of Joe Belardo.

EPILOGUE

Veterans Day, November 11, 1997

I was at The Wall in Washington, DC, with Earl Holt, Wally Owens, John Huelsenbeck, Lt. Steve Moore, and a few others from Charlie Battery. As we slowly walked down alongside the Canyon of Heroes, we rubbed our fingers across the names of old friends and told a brief story about each one. Our emotions were full of memories long forgotten, but now rushing to the surface. As we walked, Wally asked if we could stop at Panel 22W. As we stood there, Wally slowly moved his finger to Line 111 and rubbed his finger on the name of Richard Lee Davis. In a soft whisper, he asked if I ever knew what happened to our Duster C131, "The Grim Reaper." Wally explained that on June 22, 1969, the Duster hit a landmine and Richard Lee Davis was killed, with C131 destroyed forever. We all hugged and cried and exchanged over 25 years of stored-up tears. I could not believe the words he was saying, but down deep inside, I knew they were true. The Track from Hell lived up to its reputation.

I could not help but think, June 21st stateside, is June 22nd in Vietnam. As my family and I celebrated my 22nd birthday and the coming of our first child, a fellow Dusterman, halfway around the world was killed on my Duster C131 - "The Track from Hell." Each year since then, as I blowout my birthday cake candles, I think of Richard Lee Davis and say a prayer.

From The Author

I tell everyone that I am a "Blessed" person. I've had a successful career and have a loving family. I have a wonderful wife who has listened to all my stories, over and over again and has given me her love and support since we were high school sweethearts.

Then God honored me by having me meet the most courageous men on earth. Not only were they fearless and brave under the most horrific, terrifying war conditions, but they were also the kindest, gentlest men you could ever meet. They became my best friends. To this very day, we still talk to each other weekly and see each other at our yearly reunions. If something is wrong, we are still there for each other. From our friendship, we now have extended families.

There are a few out there to whom I owe my life, but there are hundreds of Dustermen, Quad-50 Men, Marines, Seabees, Medics, Corpsmen, Soldiers, and Chopper and Air Force Pilots who came to my rescue and to the rescue of my friends and crew. Hopefully, my story has done justice to all these brave men.

I have dedicated part of my life to giving speeches and seminars at high schools and colleges about what it was like being a combatant in the Vietnam War. I explain to them that we believed that we were fighting for another human's freedom and civil rights. My heart has always been broken by the journalistic slanted rhetoric against all Vietnam Veterans. I cannot change how history was written, but I can give young Americans a true accounting of the war. I also tell them what a much better world it would be if wars were solved with thumb wrestling contests instead of weapons. At the end of each lecture, I ask the audience what freedom is worth and how much would they be willing to pay for their liberties.

I can only hope and pray that my efforts as a Dusterman have made a difference in someone's life and that difference has made them a better person.

Thank you all for my life,

Joe Belardo

A NEW OPPORTUNITY

Is it possible? A quarter-century since the Siege? For most of us, Khe Sanh, the people we knew there, and what we experienced there is always with us. We were welded together as a large family, in the heat of battle, FOREVER. Those we came to know there are forever significant to us; the experience is etched in our souls.

Our Khe Sanh newsletter gives us: the means to re-connect with lost buddies; a way to complete "unfinished business"; to say "thank you"; find out what happened to so-and-so; a chance to express in story, art, and poetry the feelings we have; a means of remembering our lost brothers so they are not forgotten. Because of our newsletter, many have had their own,

AN APPEAL

I am currently collating reference material for a proposed book to mark the 25th anniversary of the Siege of Khe Sanh. The working title is: KHE SANH, VISIONS AND RECOLLECTIONS.

The proposal is to document the Khe Sanh experience using a manuscript composed of passages of personal recollections and memories by those of you who were there. Aside from a few introductory paragraphs the main body of the text will be stories and anecdotes as told by the Veteran.

In order to further illustrate what life was like for those inside the wire and on the hills, I would like to include a selection of original photographs taken by individuals at the time. Additionally, I am keen to include studio photography of Khe Sanh memo-

A Message from the Editor

THE OTHER ERNIE

"To all ye present, greetings." I'll always remember that opening line from the Marine Corps promotion certificate. I guess the reason that line sticks in my memory, is because promotions were rare among the Marines I knew. The only silver spoons my guys had, were in their back pockets, along with the jewelry and cash they had stolen. Ah, well, memories, memories.

I now, warily step, into-the-spotlight. It sure is nice, isn't it, folks, to just be able to enjoy our newsletter? I hope I have not bitten off more than I can chew, or you can digest.

I ask all of you to join me in a hearty round of applause and cheer, on a job well done, for our departing editor, Ernie Husted. He has toiled these last seven years, and single-handedly produced our newsletter. I, like many of you, I'm sure, eagerly read it cover-to-cover as soon as it arrived in the mail. No matter what our personal calling since Khe Sanh, we'll never forget that experience, nor those who shared it. We savor any memories or news from that time.

Ernie Husted was recon, I was infantry. You will see our contrasting styles in the newsletters to follow. Ernie Husted relied on individuals who felt motivated to send in their unsolicited, reflective works. I intend to go after you guys. I have no intention of just sitting back and waiting for the muse to blow inspiration in your ear. Being an old infantry type, I intend using all the fire-power I can get my hands on. I will seek out, and extract from our members, their thoughts, ideas, and stories. Talk to me folks. Tell me your lies. Abuse me. Use me. Get it all out. Express yourself. Your feelings and opinions are worthy and valid.

I promise to work with you. If you are self-conscious about your writing, don't worry. I'll turn your writing into a "silk purse." Your experiences and feelings are the stories I want. As your editor, I'll help you present yourself in a moving, intelligent way; that's my job, and challenge. Those of you who know my writing style, know that I don't mess around. I write in a style that Vietnam veterans understand. I've helped many vets with their writing projects. I'll do the same for you, if you give me the opportunity, O.K.?

As to the content of our newsletter, I will try to run articles that will ENLIGHTEN, EDUCATE, and ENTERTAIN our readers. I will follow the mandate of our organization. There is only one, truly unique clause in our Articles of Incorporation and By-Laws, it is also the stated objective of our organization, which I quote:

> "To promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of Khe Sanh, Houng Hoa District, Quang Tri Province Republic of Vietnam, during the period of 1961 through and including 1971; To locate and account for all who so served; To preserve the memory of those who so served and are now deceased, either while at Khe Sanh or since; To promote preservation of an accurate historical account of such service; To promote research and understanding and healing with a regard to those who so served; and to promote artistic expression of the Khe Sanh experience."

Those of you who share my interest in history have witnessed, first hand, how often our history has been distorted. Our newsletter can clarify and redefine what really happened. Your experiences and feelings in regards to what happened at Khe Sanh or elsewhere in Vietnam and your life before and after Vietnam is the history I'm interested in publishing in our newsletter. Ken Pipes said it best, one day, while he and I shared a beer. "Yah know Spence," he said, sneered, sipped deeply, then continued, "nobody above battalion level, and I mean, rifle battalion, had a clue about what was really going on over there."

The big boys, special interests, and professional writers, who've ripped-us-off, have had their shots at writing history to suit their own narrow agendas. In our newsletter, and with some of the other projects we plan to produce, we can set the record straight. We are a "last man" outfit, guys. Let's preserve the record of that time, our time, on the line, for our children, and grandchildren.

Talk to me, now, you hear?

A New Opportunity

private, reunions. Some have embraced friends they thought were dead, and undoubtedly, Ma Bell has made tens of thousands of dollars!

Up to this point, we have scraped by and managed, without dues, unlike most organizations. "We paid our dues," was our refrain. The early lists and newsletters were donated by those who prepared them. Some, like Jim Davis, did the printing at his own expense. This became impractical when our membership increased to over 800.

We then asked for donations. During the past four years, some have been very generous. Two have donated $1,000!, a few $100 or $50. One even donated $8.81—you can guess where he was. But, in all honesty, the number of persons who have donated anything, represents only a tiny fraction of our total membership. As a consequence, we could only issue one or two newsletters per year.

Now, with the explosive increase in membership, nearing 2,000 at last count—and by the way, isn't that really a miracle!—and with the subsequent increase in printing and mailing costs, and our utilization of professional printing services (provided by the Marine Corps Association), it is unrealistic to assume that donations will cover our expenses. In order to keep our newsletter going, and to undertake some of the causes and artistic projects we wish to fund, it has now become necessary to begin charging dues.

Remember, all dues and donations are tax-exempt contributions. We have the IRS letter confirming this.

Ernie Husted has performed a marvellous job of getting the newsletter to where it is now. His contributions—which have included hundreds of man-hours of work—have been a true labor of love. Ernie Spencer—note how the newsletter is remaining with the "Ernies!"—has had experience in other veteran newsletters, is highly motivated, has assembled a group to assist, and we anticipate interesting newsletters that will be valuable to you in the future.

Please know, that we request dues, only as a last resort. We wish we could continue without doing so, but it is impossible. Dues are essential, if we are to keep our newsletter alive. We will request annual dues of only fifteen dollars per year, more if you can afford it. And for those of our brothers who are financially strapped, we will not insist upon payment of any dues. For them, we ask that they give something to show their support. Shortly, you will receive in the mail a formal request for dues. Please take the time to fill out the dues card and mail it in. Remember, you must at least answer the mailer by returning the dues card in the self-addressed envelope that will be provided, in order to continue receiving our newsletter and membership roster. Please know also that your dues not only reflect what you get out of the newsletter but also helps your brothers keep connected in meaningful relationships. Your contribution will provide your brothers the forum, whereby they may freely and fully express themselves through story, art, poetry; and help them to get in touch with their own feelings. Do we not, all, treasure their contributions? The rest of the world will never fully understand or appreciate what happened to us. But we, ourselves, can provide the means for one another to freely express that experience called Khe Sanh.

God bless you all—always.

ANY TIME, EVERY TIME

Hey Ernesto,

Just a short note to see how you are and what's happening. No big changes on the home front.

Have included a flyer from Kevin Lyles, the Brit who did the battle print of the 30 March 68 action of Bravo Co. We passed out the flyer at the reunion. He asked if we could run it in the next issue of the Khe Sanh Newsletter—told him I would pass it on to you. Hope you can work it in.

Give us a call when you can. Hope all is well with you.

Semper Fi, my brother,

Ken, Sharon and the boys

Ed. note: There are only two people I never say no to—my momma and Bubba. The artwork Ken refers to is the piece titled PAYBACK which has previously run in our newsletter. I understand sales have been slow. The limited editions are all individually signed by Bubba (Ken Pipes). The Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. is being cut-in on the sales. This guy Lyles, according to both brothers Pipes and Breeding, is a "good guy," who can be trusted, and cares about us. So read article "An Appeal" that starts on the cover and support the guy, guys. What he's doing is consistent with our organization's purpose.

Letters to the editor are encouraged. Contributors may discuss any subject or issue that interests them. Whether you've got a burr under your saddle that's getting to you, or have a song in your heart you wish to share, tell us about it. Don't worry about what the readers will think. Your feelings are your feelings. However, all opinions and feelings expressed in INCOMING are those of the writer. Readers should not infer that such letters express either the editorial or political opinions of the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. We are a non-profit, non-political organization.

MINI REUNION CHICAGO

Dear Ken and Berniece, and all the KS survivors:

Thank you for allowing us to entertain you. You know, sometimes my life is so empty because of things that happened to me in that war, and being on the road so much.

I wanted you to know, when I left your reunion, I felt filled with things I have not felt in a long time. The best of those wonderful, powerful, positive feelings I felt was PRIDE. You folks have more pride and good feelings for each other than I've seen in any group that I have played for. I've played in Kokomo, Indiana, where there was over one thousand vets. I've played "Rolling Thunder" concerts all over the country. You people are without a doubt, the tightest and best vet group I've ever met. The others don't even come close to matching your good vibes.

Even though many of your people have either physical or emotional wounds, I never heard one person complain. I never heard anyone feeling sorry for themselves. All I saw was positive input. You folks could teach a lot of veterans organizations how to treat a vet. But, then, it all makes sense when you think about it, you folks from Khe Sanh taught the world what it means to be an American.

God bless you all,
Danny Parker

Dear Ernie:

Thank you for dragging me to the Khe Sanh reunion in San Diego with yourself, Jim Epps and Dick Claire. I was concerned that I would not know anyone and that everyone there would be OLD, tight, friends. I erroneously felt that I would end up being an outsider among a tight group. Well, that did not happen. From the minute we got in the car to go to San Diego (about nine hours away) we never stopped talking—until we returned home five days later! It was amazing.

I met so many people that I became friends with, it would take me a full page just to name them all. I think of them all the time and have talked to many of them on the phone since the reunion. Not one day has gone by that I haven't thought about next year's reunion in Washington D.C. around July 4, 1993. I can't wait to meet more of our brothers.

As you know, I served in C.A.P.-O-1 in Khe Sanh village until Jan. 22, 1968, then spent the next 77 days at FOB-3 with my twenty-five Marines and the Bru. I was sure none of my men were going to be at the reunion, so I did have mixed feelings in thinking I would not know anyone. But, it was not long before I realized that we all experienced a big event in our lives together, which makes us brothers in a very elite fraternity of survivors. Survivors of Khe Sanh!

Thank you for your friendship, concern and thoughtfulness.

Semper Fi,
John Balanco
C.A.P.-Oscar

Ed. reply: My pleasure, brother John. I wish we could convince the brothers sitting out there reading this, who don't do reunions, that they are missing a very, very important event every time they pass one up. I watched a bunch of old, old men, hobbling around at the last reunion (it was the 50th anniversary reunion of the 3rd Marine Division). I watched those guys and thought to myself, my God, next year is our 25th. Twenty-five years will have passed by next year. Twenty-five years, or more, since we stood together at that mystical place called Khe Sanh. I look at our Khe Sanh roster and see all the names of guys who live right around San Diego and were not present. Why weren't they there? Could some of you out there reading this, who do not do reunions, enlighten me? Share with us, if you will, why you stay away? If you "blink," and pass on this next one, in D.C., you'll wake-up and it will be 50 years. By then, a lot of the brothers will be gone.

THANK YOU, GUYS

Dear Ernie:

I attended your July reunion in San Diego for two reasons: (a) to begin to distribute an anonymous and confidential survey of Vietnam Veterans for a research project connected with the University of California at Irvine where I am pursuing a degree in Social Ecology, and (b) to "be there" for the Khe Sanh Vet whose life I share. (Ed. she talking about Tom Rice, a new member who did the hill fights, 881N. in 67.)

I enjoyed a courteous reception from all of you, regardless of your interest in completing my questionnaire. I appreciate the time and thought of those members who have already sent in completed surveys.

Observing your process during your reunion offered me an occasion for growth that I did not anticipate. Like most people, I've often attempted to skirt around problems rather than dealing with them. You people attended your reunion with abundant knowledge of the pain that you might encounter. I was inspired by watching your outpouring of courage and fearlessness. I'm speaking about all of the members I came into contact with.

The spirit of brotherhood and unconditional acceptance you exhibited towards each other deeply touched me. It seemed especially unusual, considering the amount of time that has passed since you served together. Your love for each other earned my respect for you as individuals and for the military training and experience that generated your ability to love each other.

Thank you, for teaching me more valuable lessons than any available at my University. Thank you, for sharing the wisdom born of the experience you share as Khe Sanh Vets.

Kathy Oliver

Ed. note: I had a chance to visit with Kathy at the reunion. She's for real guys, no B.S. Do us all a favor please, do a survey. The instructions are in the section on HEALTH ISSUES, in this issue. This project is in line with our organization's purpose. You'll get a copy of the survey when it's done. I'll publish the results. Come on! It's not going to cost you anything. We'll learn more about ourselves. Knowledge is a precious thing. Thank you, Kathy.

A HAPPY EVENT

Dear Ernie:

Just dropping a few lines to let you know how much I appreciate the work you have done putting the newsletter together. The newsletter is one piece of mail I always look forward to. Whenever I pick up my mail and find the newsletter, I go outside, sit on a bench, and read it from cover to cover—before I even look at any of my other mail. You have done an excellent job, turning a simple mailing list into a fine newsletter. Keep up the good work.

I would like to let you and all our Khe Sanh brothers know that last year I got married after living the life of Riley for so many years. This year my wife and I were blessed with the birth of our first child, a baby boy. Anthony Joseph Patricio, who reported for duty on January 27, 1992, at 2:50 pm, weighing in at eight pounds-four ounces, and twenty-one inches long. (Ed. Sounds like some big fish you got, Fish!)

Anthony has given Lisa and me much joy and happiness. We can hardly wait to show him off at the San Diego reunion. (Ed. I met little Anthony, and he's just like his dad, feisty, can't sit still, but a real nice boy)

I have included a list of names to add to our Khe Sanh Vet list, most are former members of Delta 1/26 that I have located recently, and a correction to include my new telephone number. I have sent them (the new members) copies of the last newsletter and informed them of our organization and reunions.

Thanks for doing a fine job and getting us together.

Semper Fi,
Sid "Fish" Patricio
D/1/26

Ed. note: Fish is in charge of the Delta Co. membership. If any of you would like to get involved in our organization, by locating some of your brothers, give Fish a call and he'll tell you how to do it.

Dear Ernie:

Just a note, to let you know how much I enjoyed the latest edition of Red Clay. You obviously put a great deal of time and effort into it, the result being a very professional newsletter.

I joined the Twenty-Sixth Marines shortly after the siege at Khe Sanh. But many of the men in my unit were old vets. As a very young and new arrival in Vietnam, I recall being mesmerized by their stories of the battles that took place. Back then, it all had a certain glamour and air of excitement to it. If only I knew then what I learned very quickly, a few months later. I guess there is something to be said for naivete.

I've just recently started making contact with some of the Vietnam veterans in my area. Admittedly, I've always been "turned off" by some of the vets who still walk around in their camouflage utilities, and appear to be caught twenty to twenty-five years in the past. We all have vivid memories of Vietnam, but life goes on. We owe that much to our many fallen comrades. Enough of my rambling.

I'm amazed at how many former members of the Twenty-Sixth Marines live in the Chicago area. I had the pleasure of meeting with Mike Worth (E 2/26) several months ago, and looking at his pictures and scrapbook. I didn't know Mike in Vietnam, but he has a picture which included me. It was taken on the Unfortunately, I had most of my pictures in my seabag and someone threw them out when I was wounded. Mike was kind enough to have copies of his pictures made for me.

I haven't found anyone from my gun team in the newsletter, but look forward to that possibility in future editions.

A BUDDING BARD

Dear Sirs,

I came across your address in a book on the Vietnam War by Ernest Spencer and am writing in the hope you may be of some assistance to me.

I am currently in the throes of writing a novel, (my first one) which I am basing during the Vietnam War. I have spent the last 9 months researching almost every book I can find in the bookshops here in England—mainly first hand accounts by Vietnam Vets. I am still looking for 2 lots of information which so far, none of the books I've read have covered. 1) Graves Registration and 2) Personal accounts by POWs held in jungle camps (as opposed to Hanoi POWs).

Could you please advise whether you could assist me in this, or else direct me to someone who would be able to assist. The information I require for Point 2 is self-explanatory—I want information on the every-day regime of jungle POWs. For Point 1, I require the following sort of information: 1. Process gone through in graves registration from the time a KIA received to shipping home. 2. Length of time deceased kept before shipping home. 3. Were bodies shipped home in coffins or body bags? 4. Were staff in graves registration transferred in from other units or were they medical people? 5. What was first port of entry for returning KIA in USA and what process had to be gone thru? 6. What was the Presidio? 7. If the KIAs were shipped back in coffins, and not body bags, were the coffins opened by anyone on their immediate return to the States? 8. What procedures had to be gone thru before release of the body to next of kin/friends, etc.?

Any information you could give me pertaining to the above would be appreciated but if you are unable to assist in this matter, please advise me who else I may contact in this regard.

Should you or any of your fellow vets have any other information you think I might be interested in, as well as photos taken during the war, newsletters you produce, etc., all this would be gratefully received.

Yours faithfully,
Sandra Hill

Ed. note: I sent Ms. Hill a note and suggested she contact the Vietnam Veterans of America via their national magazine THE VETERAN. I know we have members out there who were involved in this very difficult MOS (graves). Though the subject matter is very painful to us all, it is a matter of our history. And Ms. Hill is correct, this matter has not received the exposure it so rightfully deserves. I have, myself, been struggling with my first novel for the past seven years. I've done tons of research and six versions, and it's still not right. I sympathize with her struggle. Should any of you see fit to correspond with her, please share your observations, also, with us.

ALCOHOL OVERDOSE LIKELY CAUSE OF DEATH

April 4, 1992 Lincoln Neb.(AP)- Lancaster county authorities said it appeared that a 43-year-old Vietnam veteran died of an alcohol overdose at his Lincoln house.

Lancaster County Attorney Gary Lacey said police found Monday afternoon the body of Gary L. Kuchera inside the southeast Lincoln house where he lived alone. The yard was decorated with signs bearing messages on veterans, prisoner of war and missing in action issues.

Kuchera gained attention as a voluntary chaplain for Vietnam veterans. He also gained news media attention when he burned an Iraqi flag in the front yard of his house during the Persian Gulf war.

Dear Ernie:

I'm sending these newspaper clippings so you can keep your files updated, etc. I believe Gary was in M 3/26. We came home from Nam together in 1969. We didn't know each other in country but met on Okinawa afterwards. He asked me where I was heading when I got back to the world, and I told him Omaha, Nebraska. He hollered that that was where he was going too! We partied our asses off. He lived about sixty miles from me, but we'd often visit and b.s. at our parents' houses. He came to my wedding (my first one I should say.) He got cut loose from the Corps after that and I still had some time left, so we went our separate ways. We always knew the other one was around and saw each other at Nam reunions, but never talked about our experiences to each other again.

Gary's yard was full of signs about POW-MIAs and about Vietnam vets not getting the treatment they should be getting. His neighbors bitched and the cops would come, but he wouldn't take down the signs. He put the issues in peoples' faces. They were big signs, you couldn't help seeing them while driving or walking down the street. People didn't like it.

When his neighbors didn't see him for awhile, they called the cops—who sent a swat team. The news said it was because of the threats he had made to the police; actually, it was the police who made the threats. He had previously told them to go f— themselves. Anyway, it's pretty sad when they have to send a SWAT team to check on the welfare of a veteran. Two Purple Hearts, PUC, CAR, Navy Commendation, Cross of Gallantry—9 medals and ribbons and all. Khe Sanh, 881 N. and S., Rock Pile, Hue/Phu Bai, Hai Van Pass, Hill 190, Hill 10, Hill 55, An Hoa, and they gotta send a SWAT team?

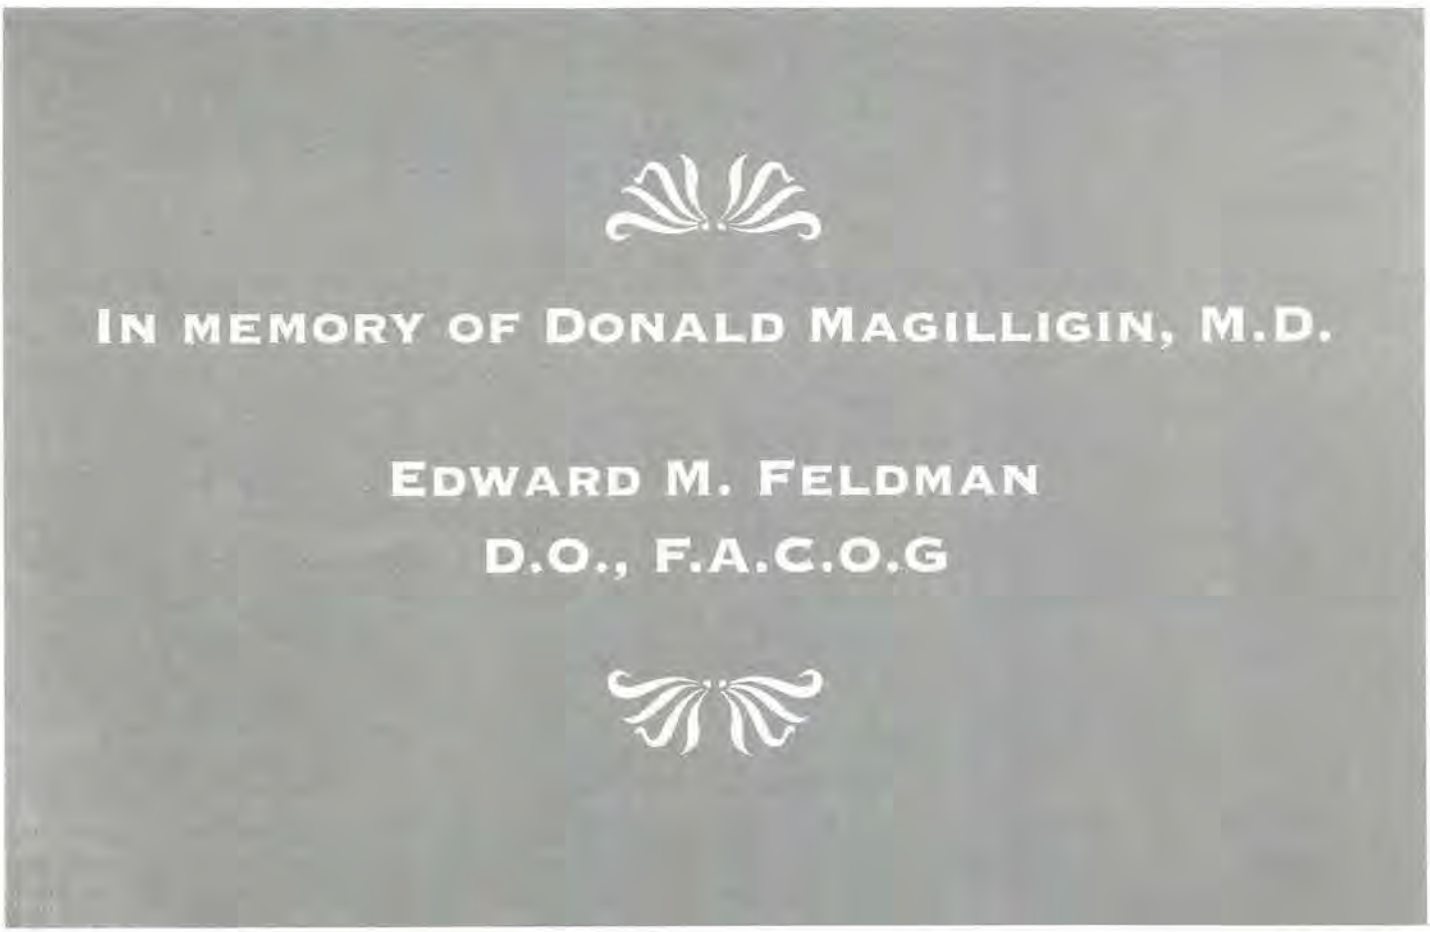
The more I write the more pissed-off I get. Gary had two sons and an ex-wife. At the cemetery, there wasn't even a color guard. Two of the funeral party people stepped up and folded the flag and gave it to his oldest son. Quite a send off for such a decorated veteran.

I guess, I would think a little differently if Gary was a criminal or something, but all he was was a Vietnam vet, a proud Marine who cared for his country, his fellow Vietnam brothers, and what happened to the POW-MIAs.

Maybe this is what is in store for all of us.

Semper Fi brother,
Don Lacy
H&S 1/26

Ed. note: Let's hope not, brother. Come to Washington next July 1993 for our reunion, and we'll share a prayer and pay tribute to Gary and all our fallen brothers—at the WALL.



ANOTHER SALVO FROM DON

Dear Ernie:

I'm the guy that asked you about Cpl. Deschaine at Nashville (1990 reunion). It was real nice to see you at San Diego. I like the fact that you and Earle Breeding can find the time to be with your people. I can tell you, it means a lot to them. (Ed: Far more to us I assure you.)

The Nashville deal really kicked my butt. I almost left and drove back to Nebraska when you told me about Frenchy. I was about to put my fist through the glass window of that divider in the restaurant but caught myself in time. I have learned over the years that shit like that doesn't change anything, and only gets yourself hurt and in trouble. And, hey, for twenty-two years, at least I got to think that Frenchy was alive, living up in Maine, and having a good time. Like I told you at the reunion, he always rode up front when we trucked somewhere, and he always had a way of making me feel good though I was only a boot PFC. (Ed: See piece titled FRENCHY in this issue.)

Also, I wanted to say, I am sure, I was your driver when you went from Quang Tri to where the doggies got their butts kicked, in spite of all that armor and APCs. When I read that in your book (WELCOME TO VIETNAM MACHO MAN in the chapter "Hot Breakfast"), I showed it to my wife, then went and got my journal, and showed her where I had written the same thing. Yeah, I couldn't believe those people could sit there for several days and not dig-in, or put up any wire. I guess they figured that armor would just scare those little rascals into going somewhere else.

I like your idea of trying to get some aid to the Bru. I will help in anyway I can, but I don't know what to expect from the association, as a whole, when most members won't even donate a few bucks to keep the newsletter coming out. A little money in the right hands can go a long way and hopefully, we can fit ourselves in there someplace. Please keep me informed, as I would like to help out. I wish I could have brought back one of those little Bru crossbows. I remember being jealous of the guys that had them. (Ed: knowing the Delta boys, I'm sure they didn't pay for theirs.) By the time I got to Khe Sanh, about March 1, 1968, getting a crossbow was not at the top of anyone's list. Thanks for signing my book, and thanks for adopting me into Delta Company—it means a lot to me. Thanks again.

Semper Fi, friend,
Don Lacy

Ed. note: Brother Don was inducted into the loyal order of Delta Company, Khe Sanh Survivors Assoc. non-incorporated at the San Diego reunion. We accept applications for membership in Delta Company—in person only—during our annual reunions from those so inclined and willing to ruin their good name and reputation. We might or might not have been the best rifle company the Marine Corps has ever fielded, but we were its BADDEST. We now openly flaunt our past, knowing full well, the the statutes of limitation have expired.

MORE MEMORIES OF MIKE

Ernie:

First of all, would you please change my unit in the Red Clay to read—Mike 3/26 3rd. Plt., not Mike 3/36. Thanks, it's been wrong since the newsletter came out (Ed. note: probably still is. In time we'll standardize how the unit designations read so that we can group members by units rather then just alphabetically. But, it's a big, costly project, so bear with us. If you guys pay your dues, maybe we can undertake this project. Every change costs money.)

Second, this June will be twenty-five years since the death of two of my Khe Sanh brothers, PFC James H. Presley (KIA after the siege during Operation Mamaluke Thrust), and PFC Herb Gay (KIA the same day.) I want their families and friends to know that they will always be remembered as two of the finest men God ever put on this earth. I was proud to have known and served with them. I'll never forget you guys. Thanks, for being there so many times, when I needed you. If any of their family reads this, please write me.

Ed. note: We're all family, brother Ken, and we read you 5 by 5.

DOING A GOODBYE

June 1, 1991

Dear Ray:

It was good talking to you on the phone today. You helped me to look at my mom's death from a different point of view—that is absolute love. I was thinking about how I could of done more for her and that bothered me a lot, because she was the most important person in my life, and a perfect mother. I enclose her obituary for you. I also enclose a copy of the letter I got from Vietnam Magazine. I don't know why he thought I was a forward observer. Anyway, I wrote him and told him he might be interested in writing to you. I also inclosed an article from John Kaheny titled "LEAD IN HIS PACK." CBS was thinking about doing a TV special about the Patrol, but it didn't work out and they're not going to do it. (Ed. note. Les is referring to the Bravo Company patrol led by Lt. Don Jaques.)

Hope all goes well with your dad, say hi to your mom for me. Till next time.

God Bless,
Les Faurebrac
Bravo Company, 1/26

Ed. note: Brother Faurebrac ended his life on Jan. 7, 1992. I understand he visited with or called many members of our organization during the last months before he left us. Closures, I believe the process is called. If any of you out there care to, please enlighten us on this subject. I hope brother Les is at peace now with the rest of our brothers who've passed away. What do you think they would say to us if they could share their wisdom? Makes you stop and think, doesn't it? What's really important?

MACV-SOG COMES IN FROM THE COLD

Dear Ernie,

Am enclosing a pittance offering for the Khe Sanh Newsletter. I have received the excellent, definitive history book about our beloved Khe Sanh; co-authored by our renowned Rev. "Sky Pilot" Ray Stubbe. Even though it has been edited from 2,000 pages it stands as an excellent tribute to the men who lived and died for the red clay of Khe Sanh.

My book, MACV-STUDIES AND OBSERVATIONS GROUP, BEHIND ENEMY LINES, A HISTORY OF THE MEN AND MISSIONS, was finally compiled on 23 March 1992 and is the definitive history of MACV-SOG. A brief encapsulation:

The men from SOG, while posted in South Vietnam, were sent repeatedly behind enemy lines (North Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia) by American Presidential order. This unit's guerrilla operations against North Vietnam during August 1964, caused the "Gulf of Tonkin Incident" and led to the build-up of American forces in the Vietnam War. It was the only unit which was directed from the "Oval Office" and its every move was orchestrated by the American President. From this unit, a familiar statement evolved; "if you accept this mission and are killed or captured, the President will disavow any knowledge of your existence" or basic words to that effect.

I am currently, and actively, looking for a literary agent to handle the 1,400+ page book, screenplay rights, and movie rights. I will keep the Khe Sanh Newsletter posted on its progress since it covers "the siege" from the FOB's top-secret point of view.

Semper Fi, Ernie...

Harve Saal

Ed. note: I wrote brother Saal and asked him to consider sharing his manuscript or excerpts from his manuscript with us. I used to watch those black choppers lift off from Khe Sanh and fly to Laos and think to myself, "Man, oh, man, I'd sure like to hear those dudes' war stories some day." Any of you others out there sitting on your works, please consider sharing it. Speaking for myself, as one who's been published, sharing your work and having excerpts done, enhances your chances of being published.

THE FIRST MAN OF OUR LAST MAN ORGANIZATION

Dear Ernie:

I want to inform you, and the Khe Sanh vets that Col Jack Padley, U.S.M.C. ret., died of a heart attack at Camp Pendleton Naval Hospital, on Dec. 6, 1991.

As you know, Colonel Padley formed the 26th Marines at Camp Pendleton in the spring of 1966, and took the Regiment to Vietnam and eventually to Khe Sanh.

He returned from Khe Sanh in August of 1967 and retired at Camp Pendleton in 1968.

Jack and I graduated from the University of Dayton in 1940. Jack was a great football player in college.

Enclosed, please find a check to help you with your publication and these wonderful Khe Sanh heroes.

Sincerely,
Shirley W. Padley

P.S. Jack is buried in Arlington National Cemetery

Ed. note: I'm sure many of us will pay our respects to the colonel during our reunion next year in D.C. We would be honored to have you join us, Mrs. Padley. I understand our colors (26th Marines) are stored at Headquarters Marine Corps. Maybe we can get the Marine Corps to unfurl our colors for the colonel, one-last-time.

CORPSMAN UP

Dear Ernie,

The memories of Khe Sanh will never end. But then, who would want to forget good friends? We all survived for a reason. To share the joy and meaning of the season. Merry Christmas.

"Doc" Dave Steinberg

A REQUEST

Dear Ernie:

First, I want to thank you for all your hard efforts in putting together our newsletter. As a psychotherapist who works with Post Traumatic Stress Disorder, the therapeutic value in knowing that we shared an experience is invaluable.

My request, is that you please ask if there are others who were at Khe Sanh who have had any, or all, of the following health problems: Premature heart attacks (I had one at 40), severe allergy problems, extreme visual sensitivity to light.

Please ask brothers who have such disabilities to either write or call me.

Again, thank you so much for your efforts. I'm sure that there are others who appreciate the work which you do so that we can keep in touch, or find those that we spent so much time with during a difficult period in our lives.

Sincerely,

Ed. note: Drop the Doc a line or give him a call, guys. Maybe he can share his findings with us.

FAST TURNAROUND

Dear Ernie:

It was nice to get your letter. I am especially honored that you would like me to write for the Khe Sanh Newsletter. I enclose a piece you can use for the newsletter on PTSD. (see HEALTH ISSUES) Let me continued on page 12 know how often you plan to publish and I will be sure to get articles to you in plenty of time. (Ed: the gods willing, we'll have three issues a year, plus an annual membership listing.) My wife Kathy does all my typing, so she will type everything so you can just use it as it is or if there is a special format, let me know. (Ed: I just want writings, I'll take it any way I can get it.)

I am a Marriage Child and Family Therapist, Intern. I am working on finishing my 3000 required hours to be licenced in California. We have the strictest requirements of any state. I want to work for the VA in the Vets Outreach Centers. (Ed: I use the Vet Centers. It is the best counseling service, by far, of any that I've used, and trust me guys, I've had my head done by a lot of clowns, trying to pass themselves off as shrinks. And, the best part is, its free at the Vet Centers.)

I got my Master's degree in Psychology, and received financial assistance to do so as part of the VA Education program so that I could work with other veterans. I haven't been able to get a job interview with the VA. I wrote my congressman and senators, as well as Derwinski (Secretary of the Department of Veterans Affairs), and all they ended up doing was sending my letters which ended up back with the Vocational Counselor at the VA, who was not doing anything to assist me. I will be licensed by next year and am currently working in private practice and at a school with adolescents who have behavioral problems.

I was a corpsman with M/3/9 from Nov. 66 to Nov. 67. I did Hue, Con Thien, Khe Sanh, Dong Ha. I don't remember a lot of the details about my experiences in Vietnam. Kathy has been writing other vets through her computer and a Bulletin Board Service called PRODIGY. She put the word out about the Khe Sanh Newsletter. I've gotten feedback from other vets, some who were at Khe Sanh, and their stories have helped me to remember.

It's great that you have been able to work on your PTSD issues. It is amazing, how much just one year in our lives can so influence and can take over our entire life, if we don't work on it. I also read your book. Let me know where I can get a copy.

I look forward to hearing from you and getting the next Khe Sanh Newsletter.

Regards,
Tony Edell

Ed. reply: You can get the book by coming to our reunion in D.C. I have donated 200 first edition hardbacks to the Khe Sanh vets. If you just can't wait until then, send $20 to Earle Breeding and he'll send you one. Include $2.50 for postage and handling. If you're cheap, like most Marines, I believe it is still in circulation by Bantam. Ask your local book store, they can tell you. As for your next article, anything you want to do is fine. Readers, see Tony's piece titled "POST TRAUMATIC STRESS SYNDROME" in our section on HEALTH ISSUES.

DOING THE TIME

Hi Ernie,

It's me again, I've stumbled through, yet another week of sleepless nights. I wanted to share with you my word game. I thought maybe, if there's room for it in one of your issues, you could publish it. (Ed: See Mannie's puzzle in this issue.) I also sent you a poem awhile back and I'm wondering if you had thoughts of publishing it. (Ed: I've asked Mannie to consider re-doing it as a prose piece.)

I hope you all met at the reunion in July 92, Ken Penn too. I can't be there. I'm on California's death row, but I'll be there in spirit.

No excuses, but I sometimes wonder if my PTSD from two tours has anything to do with my present circumstances. I do the best I can to get along with everyone, so far no big problem in my space. I could use visits, but that's a personal problem I'll have to deal with. Ernie Payne used to visit, but we no longer have an out-reach center that gives a damn. It has to do with a shortage of funds.

Could you put my address with this, in case any of the brothers out there would like to write me?

GET US OUTTA HERE!

Ernie:

Thank you for the effort that you put into this magazine. The effort is well appreciated by veterans like myself.

I would like to correct my Marine affiliation, which was erroneously published in your newsletter. My unit was HMM 164. I was crew chief of a CH46A, #6, "Charlie's Chopper." My gunners were Jerry Suidzinski and John Berg. We had the dubious honor of flying all day on January 19, 1968. We were pulling bald eagle emergency recon extractions all day long and the following evening. The next morning, I was flying into Khe Sanh with my wingman "ATTA BOY #1", crewed by William "Doug" Landford and his gunner Leland "Jim" Mylander. We joined up with a CH46 Super D that had the purple fox emblazoned on the tail. We were the only three medium Marine helicopters flying during the beginning of the first week of the siege. My hack was Major Ralph Nelson and/or Col. Rick. His right seat was Lt. Tim Timmons. I have vivid memories of the emergency recon evacuations, medevacs, and the re-supplies of 881 and 861.

I recall the early morning of the 20th, flying into Khe Sanh, and seeing the ammo dump go up. I also remember a certain prisoner, that was wrapped in a diaper, (Ed. It wasn't me, I swear. I was on R&R at the time, on Oahu, doing the hula and hustling tourists) who I picked up at Charlie-Med. He was placed on my plane by a squad of MPs. It was cold, I gave him my blanket, and I caught unapproving stares from the Marine medevacs I was bringing out with him. When we landed at the Alpha Med. at Phu Bai, there was a squad or more of MPs who picked up this individual. He must have been someone super special.

I stand 6'4" and have retained all my blond hair. Every once in awhile, someone comes up to me and says, "I know you from somewhere." When I tell them I was a Marine crew chief at Khe Sanh, every so often, they say, "That's It! You took me out. You pulled our bacon out of the fire," or something similar. My response has always been, "I was 21 years old. I had no idea what I was doing. I just knew it had to be done and was only too glad to do it."

I'd like to thank Sergeant Jim Kaylor of E 2/26, for it was he who submitted my name to be included in the ranks of the Khe Sanh Vets.

Sincerely yours,
Charles E. Nowotny "Fubis Figmo"
HMM 164

Ed. note: Brother Nowotny, like brother Kaylor, now works in law-enforcement. He included the names and addresses of those he mentioned. They'll be added to our roster. If any of you know of any other Khe Sanh brothers who are not on our roster, please let us know.

LISTENING TO THE MUSE

Dear Ernie:

I have just finished writing a letter to Ray, and I sit here staring at the letter you wrote me awhile back. I had used the back of it to write out some thoughts, a few nights back. It was the handiest thing around at the time, and, as is my way so as not to lose track of my thoughts, I use the nearest paper. Pens are no problem, as I have them laying all over the house, including the toidies. But paper with clean sides is another story. Napkins, newspapers, anything goes. So anyway, I still have this energy to write tonight, so I thought I would go ahead and drop you a few lines or so, just for the bejeebers of it. As with when I write Ray, I really do not know ahead of time, what it is that will end up on paper. My thoughts flow and my fingers follow what I see within my mind and being. Very rarely do I exercise censorship over what comes forth.

So tell me, Ernie, what is a nice guy like you doing in a letter like this? Have you ever, in the quiet of the night, figured out what it was that decried the reasons for the roles we now find ourselves in? How much of what we are today was determined by the smallest of immeasurable distances, or a sideward step, instead of forwards? A glance instead of a stare? I do not know much about what your past in Nam entailed except that you served with the 26th Marines, but a long time ago I learned that each path we take is a teacher if we let it be. In a rice paddy, I found within me anger and rage for some who should have been my comrades. They lay, cowering, immobile, while their help was desperately needed. The supplies they carried, so important to the others up ahead. At the time, I could have shot them. Later, I would not associate with them. I still harbor resentment towards them, but it has been tempered with understanding of the awesome effects that war has on each of us. We all react differently to the same set of circumstances. The only difference between a "hero" and a "coward" is perception. Neither one, at the time, is doing anything that they see as being wrong. Both act in the interest of self-preservation, and both act because they find themselves in a situation of violence far beyond their ability to cope.

On the ship heading over to Nam, I often wondered how I would react to the first time. It was a rather perplexing question, one that has been played and replayed, throughout generations.

Since Nam, the world is seen as a different place by me. It took years, and much inner turmoil, to come to this point of view. What I see men strive for seems to make little "real" sense, and is even less important. Fifty weeks of work, and a rushed two weeks of vacation. Forty-plus years on the job, and a retirement, too old to enjoy. A society where we outlive our usefulness when we are perceived as being different. Age, characteristics, race, religion—it doesn't really matter. To those who don't fit the ideological image, society has found subtle means of letting them know they are not conforming to what is "good for society." They are trouble makers without knowing it. They are made to feel guilty, for who, how, and what they are; instead of the acknowledgment that ALL the parts of the world make up the WHOLE world. Without individualism, we would not have the creativity that has brought the enjoyment of the world to us. Even the most pleasurable of all we enjoy grows stale when presented in the same way all the time. A grilled-out hot dog tastes real good after two weeks of filet mignon. Mankind must find within itself, the tolerance of love and compassion, regardless of personal opinions. If my actions do not hurt you, or those around me, what is the need for judgement? Let me express myself as an individual, and let me live as an individual. It has to be one of the most basic of all rights. A right that must extend to all living things. A right transcending man's willfulness to wage war and wreak unwarranted destruction. That from which life has been removed is forever changed. A loss which cannot be measured for the future, is beyond our power to see. Conjecture of what might have been is a ridiculous attempt at appeasing one's guilt. The effects of war are well documented and attested to by millions of graves and countless tears. So to say that we did not expect that to happen, when we pulled the trigger, is a rather naive and absurd declaration. Only the truth of the finality of those actions on an individual basis remains to be resolved.

This is my soapbox this night, Ernie. For better or worse, it goes out to you. I meant what I said when earlier, I wrote that I had no idea what would come down on paper. These are my extensions this night of the world within me. A world that is me, and that is mine. I hope that you find it as fascinating as I do.

Take care and God Bless,
Talis Kaminski

Ed. note: Thank you, brother. Being a philosopher myself, by education, I see some Spinoza in your writing. Heavy stuff, man. I hope you're getting some independent head time for it. I get mine done regularly at a Vet Outreach Center. It's the only good thing I feel that our VA has done for us. I find, when I spend too much time talking with my muse, I lose track of the real world, and what's going on around me. No offense intended, brother. You are a very talented writer and thinker. But then, it's not really about reason, is it? It's about pain.

REACH OUT AND TOUCH SOMEONE

Dear Mr. Claire:

I got your name and address from the Khe Sanh Vets newsletter. I was the CO of Delta Company 1/26 and also the S-2 (intelligence officer) at Khe Sanh. I remember your brother Kenneth (Tarzan).

There is a reunion in San Diego coming up in a couple of weeks. It is for the 3rd Marine Division, but the Khe Sanh Vets also will be there for their annual reunion. Besides myself, there will also be others who knew your brother. I will be rooming with your brother Kenneth's commanding officer who is also my best friend, Col. Kenneth Pipes. I know this is a late invitation, but I just thought of it. I will be driving down with two other Khe Sanh vets from the Bay Area and you would be welcome to join us if you wish. We will leave July 8 and return July 12. We will spend the evening of July 8 at Ken Pipe's home in Fallbrook and drive on to the reunion in San Diego on the 9th. You could bunk on the floor of one of the hotel rooms that we've already got reserved. I don't mean to intrude on your life, but thought you might like the opportunity to meet some of the guys who did the siege with your brother.

Let me know.

Regards,
Ernie Spencer

Dear Ernie:

I have tried to write the perfect paper. Four weeks of trying and I have given up. I talked to John Balanco yesterday and he said, "Stop trying to make it perfect!" I have taken his advice, and here is what I have come up with:

When I received your letter inviting me to the 24th reunion of the Khe Sanh vets, I immediately decided not to go. My wife and I had planned a trip to Canada during the same time period. But, that wasn't the real reason. Ken was my kid brother (7 years younger) and his death was a tremendous loss to our family and our community. Ken's kid brother (the youngest) still hasn't recovered from Ken's death, and my mother still just blanks it out. Our dad died a couple of years ago and he never reconcilled Ken's loss. I still walk downtown and have Ken's football buddies come up with tears in their eyes and talk about the wild times they had together. It had taken me 22 years since my brother Ken's death to come to terms with the tragedy, and I really didn't want to bring back old memories that would upset my family or me.

I also knew a lot about what had happened to Ken on February 25, 1968, because Ken's point man had visited my father and mother a year after Ken's death and had given us an eyewitness account. His point man, Ed, was one of the first men hit in Ken's squad when they attempted to outflank the ambush they were caught in. Ken pulled Ed and another wounded Marine into a trench line. Ed said that Ken was shot three different times in the space of an hour or so while he returned fire at the enemy. Ed, who lost his entire lower jaw and had to talk to my folks through a voice box crawled away after Ken and the other man were killed. He apparently got back to the base the next day, but was unable to communicate with anyone and was medevaced out.

Ernie your letter got me thinking again, about all this, and at first I was very angry with you, for bringing this all back up, but then I started to think. I decided that the only piece of my brother's 20 years and three months of life I didn't know much about was the 11 months he had spent in Vietnam.

I read your letter at least eight times, trying to make up my mind whether or not to go to San Diego. I honestly wondered how I wouuld be accepted by Marine veterans since I was never in Vietnam and hadn't even been in the service. I finally decided to forget my trip to Canada and go to the reunion. It was the best decision I have ever made.

My trip to San Diego with yourself, the "wild man", John Balanco and Jim Epps was a real eye opener for me. I learned just why it is that Khe Sanh was so special to my brother and the rest of the people who were there. You are some of the funniest people I've ever met. And, the craziest. I also learned just why it is that my brother's patrol is of such interest and why "Tarzan Claire" was well known to other people.

At San Diego the learning process continued, and many of the pieces of the puzzle to my brother's 11 months in Vietnam came together. I learned why my brother had so much respect for his fellow Marines and why he joined in the first place. The individual men and women I met not only accepted me, but they helped me to put to rest many questions my family and I had concerning the way Ken spent his last days on earth.

The most important thing I learned, however, was not about my brother. I learned about the incredible togetherness the Khe Sanh veterans have and the warmth they feel for one another and for the families of those men that did not make it. It was one of the most positive experiences I have ever had in my life. And for that, I can only say, thank you, for reaching out to me.

Hope to see you soon,
Dick Claire

A FINAL WORD FROM OUR SPONSOR

Dear Ernie:

We have been saddened by the passing of these Khe Sanh brothers:

Richard Romine, HMM-165, born 3 June 1930; died, 31 July 1991. Survived by his wife of 37½ years, and one son. He had been shot down while on a SOG mission, on his birthday in 1967. Through his undaunting courage and leadership, saved over 70 men who were in a desperate fight inside Laos. They had been launched from Khe Sanh.

John J. Padley, who died 6 December 1991 of a massive heart attack. Survived by his wife Shirley. Colonel Padley was CO of the 26th Marines at Khe Sanh, just prior to Colonel Lownds. He is remembered by many as the tall, lanky, grandfather-like officer who constantly visited around the Khe Sanh Combat Base, walking with a slight jerk from an old football injury. He is remembered as one who cared so much for his men.

William Jabush, H&S 3/26, born 01 July 1949; died 09 November 1991, age 42. Survived by his wife and three children, ages, 9, 12, and 14, and a dear friend, Dave Shurter, M 3/26. Bill had advanced leukemia but fortunately was able to receive a bone-marrow transplant from his sister which seemed to take. Unfortunately, he became infected with a fungus that settled in his brain, and died from that. He attributed his leukemia to Agent Orange and was with us at the reunion in Nashville (1990). (Ed. note: See our article on Agent Orange in this issue.)

Les Faurebrac, Bravo 1/26, died 7 January 1992 and is survived by his wife. Les attended several of our reunions, and was close to many of our members. He was a good friend who cared very deeply, and was very sensitive to the hurts and pains of many of us.

We are also deeply saddened by the death of the wife and two children (the entire family) of Mark Ward, Golf 2/26, due to an automobile accident.

We rejoice at the birth of Ryan Eric on 13 December 1991. The third child and first son of Paul Dargan, Bravo 3d Recon

You are strongly encouraged to either send a cassette tape recording, summarizing your experiences at Khe Sanh, or arrange for a taped interview covering your service at Khe Sanh with:

Mr. Ronald Drez of the University of New Orleans, Eisenhower Center, Metro College, New Orleans, LA 70148, Ph. (504) 286-7110. Many of you have already done this and more are encouraged to do so. The Eisenhower Center has established an archive of materials on the Normandy D-Day invasion of World War Two, and one on Khe Sanh. They hope to preserve the voices of participants, records and photographs so that historians, a hundred or more years from now, will be able to hear the voices of those who were there. Imagine what it would mean today, to be able to hear the stories of those who had been at Bunker Hill, or in the battles of the Civil War? So give Mr. Dres a call and help them with this worthy project. I think we should be very gratified that of all of the battles of Vietnam, we who were at Khe Sanh, should be selected to be the focus of interest here!

Ed. note: This is consistent with our purpose as an organization. Come on, get off your lazy duff and do something worthwhile and meaningful. If you've found the time to read this newsletter, for however many years you've been receiving it, you damn sure should have the time for a little "payback". Besides, you'll feel better about yourself. Get involved, guys. Get involved. We need you. Not him, YOU.

rabilia of any description—as long as the item was genuinely worn/used or otherwise acquired during your tour.

Obviously, the success or failure of this project depends entirely on how much material I can collate and on the willingness of veterans like yourself to participate. To this end, I am seeking;

1. PHOTOGRAPHS:
   Taken by individuals during their tour(s). Color or black-and-white, prints, negatives or transparencies. Quality is not critical though obviously has to be in a reproducible state. Any subject matter—particularly those depicting Marine Corps personnel and Khe Sanh-related scenes.

2. VIETNAM ERA ARTIFACTS:
   Anything of interest—the only proviso is that it must have been genuinely worn or acquired by Marine Corps personnel during their tour. Again Khe Sanh-related items would be especially welcome (e.g., Marine Corps uniform/field gear-helmets, flak gear, soft covers, etc. Captured enemy souvenirs—uniform items, flags, canteen, belts, etc. Paperwork: Medals and citations, maps, orders, letters, etc.)

3. PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS:
   Your stories and anecdoted thoughts and impressions of Khe Sanh in particular and Vietnam in general. Even a few lines would be useful, as would any poems, song lyrics or sketches done at the time.

If you can help with any of the above it would be greatly appreciated. You are requested to send anything of this nature to the address listed below.

Please remember to identify items, so that I can do likewise in print. E.g., 'NVA pack captured on Hill 861A by Cpl.....of Echo 1/26 etc.' Also it would be helpful if you were to describe the circumstances leading to the acquisition of an item or just your thoughts and memories of wearing/using or acquiring it.

Importantly with photographs please identify individuals, exact locations, units and dates wherever possible.

All photographs and other items will be fully credited to you. For this reason, please remember to include your rank, M.O.S. and unit at the time.

I will endeavor to meet any postage incurred and because this is a long-term project, I would have to advise against sending anything of great value.

If enough of you respond, it is realistic to expect publication to be in the early months of 1993, with a percentage of sales going to the Khe Sanh Veterans Association.

I thank you in anticipation and look forward to hearing from you. Address all correspondence to:

REUNION BRIEFS

THE BRU

As part of our healing process (see our by-laws), we agreed, during our most recent reunion, to try to help the Bru. The Bru are one of the smallest tribes of the Montagnards. We understand some still reside in-and-around Khe Sanh. The Bru were our loyal allies before and during the siege. Our members in CAC worked with them and can attest to their loyalty (Ed: I'd like some letters from you CAC guys on this!) The Bru were not allowed on our base during the siege, and as a result, thousands of them were killed. Those of you who know about the psychological process, in healing the wounds of war, will recognize what we're attempting to do in this regard. It's called ATONEMENT. We will attempt to get medicines to them as soon as possible. They are suffering epidemic rates of malaria, TB, and malnutrition. The government of Vietnam has been less than caring, in regards to the Montagnards. Politics and diplomacy come into play in this project. Fortunately, our government will not stand in our way. Humanitarian aid to Vietnam is not only allowed, by the U.S. government, it is encouraged. Any of you who'd like to help, or have ideas on this, please contact the editor in writing (Ed: Sorry folks, you can attempt to call, but I cannot afford to return calls. I will answer all mail with a note or letter.)

OVER 100 SHOW

Sixty-three members signed our Khe Sanh roster at the San Diego Reunion. 24 states were represented. AZ-2, CA-26, CO-1, GA-1, IL-6, IN-1, ID-1, KS-1, MD-1, MI-1, MN-1, NC-2, NE-1, NJ-2, NM-3, NV-1, NY-2, OR-1, PA-2, TX-2, VA-1, WA-1, WI-2, DC-1. Not all Khe Sanh members attending signed in. The list does not include spouses or children. Thirty-five filled out a questionnaire. Twenty-five who did, stated that they definitely planned to attend our next reunion in D.C., in 1993. Fourteen of those who did the survey went on Third MarDiv. tours. Eleven felt the tour prices were fair, two felt they were too high, one felt the prices charged were moderate. Seventeen who did the survey, did not go on any Third MarDiv tours. Seven give no evaluation, seven felt the costs were too high, three lived in the area and were not interested in the tours offered. Only nine of those who did the survey, stayed at the Third MarDiv. arranged, Town and Country Hotel. The rest stayed elsewhere.

Official logo approved at San Diego Convention.

SO, SHOW US HOW!

Ken and Berniece Penn, who are doing our reunion bookings, have found that it is common practice for hotels, tours, car agencies, etc., to offer kick-backs or discounts and freebies. You will notice from the prices offered for our D.C. reunion, discounts have been used to cut the price charged for your room. Your president, Earle Breeding, says that our rate of $59.00, for a hotel room in Georgetown, is fantastic. We will also give the free rooms, which the hotel gives for each block of bookings, to our members, in a lottery-type drawing. If you book before the March deadline, you stand a one-in-thirty chance of getting your room for free! All our savings are going back to the members, which is as it should be, don't you think? Our hotel only has 300 rooms, don't delay, or you'll have to book elsewhere.

TELEVISION'S VIETNAM: THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH

That's the title of an hour long video being shown at the American Film Institute Theater in the JFK Center for the Performing Arts, Washington D.C. on November 10, 1992 at 1:30 p.m.; This film is part of the Veterans Week Activities of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund. For more info call or write, Peter C. Rollins, Dept. of English, Oklahoma State University, Stillwater, OK 74078 ph. 405-744-9474. Peter is not a Khe Sanh vet, but is a Marine and Vietnam vet, who made this film as a labor of love.

sitters (during our banquet and some of our evening ceremonies), to watch the younger children. If you have a teenager who's willing to help—so that mom and dad can enjoy some of our evening activities—sing-out. Give what you can, folks. Ken and Berniece Penn are doing it all as of right now. Give them a break, please! One or two hours is all they ask. Write them at 206 Imperial St., Park Ridge, IL. 60068. Pretty Please?

BRING YOUR PICTURES

When you come to our reunion, don't forget to bring your photos from Vietnam. We will have a special area, set-up in our hospitality suite for people to display/share their photos. Brothers and family members love looking at pictures from Vietnam. You'll have brothers requesting a copy of some of your photos. Many of us (your editor included) had their photos destroyed before we could get them out. We will have envelopes and note pads so that people can informally, work-out the order arrangements with you. Naturally, while you're making a copy, we ask that you make an additional one, and donate it to our archives (see below).

WARNING, WARNING, WARNING

If you have slides taken in Vietnam, you are in imminent danger of losing them. If you have slides, photograph negatives, or audio tapes, it is time to make duplicates. The plastic base or carrier has gotten old and brittle, and will start cracking when handled. The emulsion, whether photo sensitive film, or a coating that receives magnetic audio tracks, has been deteriorating over the years, and will begin losing definition. Color photographic prints have already faded, and will accelerate in aging. You can copy audio tapes at home. A photographic studio can make duplicates of your negatives and copy original prints.

And, while you're making a copy or redoing them, how about making an extra, and donating it to the Khe Sanh Veterans? We want to run your photos in our newsletter. Ultimately, we'll donate the entire collection to the University of New Orleans archives (see Ray's plea, in INCOMING). If you send us a copy of your set, we promise not to use them for any purposes other than artistic projects funded by the Khe Sanh Vets unless we first obtain your written permission. Come on guys, you have to copy your stuff anyway. Make a worthy donation. Don't forget to number your slides, and provide an accompanying directory that clearly identifies each one. State, where the slide or photo was taken, who's in it, and any other comments that are pertinent. Hey, we might print your picture on the cover of the Newsletter, you never know.

WANTED: A FEW GOOD MEN

We want to develop a regular group of writers for our newsletter. You'll notice, in this issue, writers with great promise who I'm working with. More are needed. If you have a buddy you'd like to honor, do a BIO on him. The format is simple: the Vietnam part is your recollection of the guy, the rest is straight biographical data. We want to know who our members were, before Vietnam, and, what happened to them since Vietnam. If you have a poem, share it. If you'd like to do a recap of your tour, like Jug's (in this issue), send it in. Don't demean yourself by thinking that you can't write. Your story is what we want. I'll help you with the writing—that's my job.

THE HILL FIGHTS

A growing portion of our membership is made up of veterans of the "Hill Fights," now called the First Battle of Khe Sanh. This powerful and bloody 12-day ordeal has not yet received the recounting that it deserves. Our newsletter will provide the forum for the accurate, and as of yet, under-reported accounting of that monumental battle. This is an open call to our readership to submit articles, memoirs and poetry about the hill fights. (See Jim Epps' poem, this issue) In upcoming issues, we will publish major works by Dave Rogers, Tom Rice and Jim Cannon, who did the Hill Fights.

BROTHER, CAN YOU SPARE A DIME?

John "King Rat" Balanco (CAC-O), would like to hear from you. John is in charge of our fundraising and advertising. We need advertising, to help offset the high costs incurred in trying to put out a quality newsletter. Note the "In Memory" advertisements, in this issue. We did not have enough money to print this newsletter, without the ads. A pretty sorry state of affairs, don't you agree? So give, guys. It's your newsletter, for crying-out-loud. If you rate a business card, we ask that you run an add in our newsletter. The rate is minimal. Brothers might give you some business. Come on, Pay-Back time, guys. Contact John Balanco at ph. 510/828-0166, fax 510/828-4793 or write him at P.O. Box 1147, Danville, CA 94526

LESSONS FROM KHE SANH

(From the Chicago Tribune)

> Enjoy the view while it lasts, since the Royal Air Force mercy flight into Sarajevo seems at first to be soaring right over the mortar-pocked runway.
> But as he approaches the lip of the concrete strip, British Flight Lt. Chris Ford points the C-130 cargo plane straight down at the runway in a stomach-wringing nose dive that ends only when he yanks the aircraft level just yards off the ground.

It's called the 'Khe Sanh Maneuver,' invented by the American pilots to guard against anti-aircraft fire while resupplying besieged troops in Vietnam.

NAM STATS

More than 2.6 million Americans served in Vietnam from 1965 to 1973. Most were enlistees. The draft only supplied 25% of the total manpower, but most of the Army's combat arms were filled by draftees after the war's first year.

Only 9.7% of draft-age males actually served in Vietnam. Two-thirds of all men of the so-called Vietnam generation avoided active duty; 60% evaded any type of military service.

In Vietnam, the ratio of support to combat troops was 5 to 1. Perhaps 14% of GIs actually fought while another 15% provided close combat support. When American troops were at peak strength in 1969, out of 543,400 troops in Vietnam, only 80,000 were in the field attempting to engage the enemy.

SPEAKING OF HISTORY

There is something very, very wrong with our Khe Sanh history as it is being told by the Marine Corps Historical Center. Get this: according to their Part V of a Chronology, May 1954–May 1975, The U.S. Marine Corps and the Vietnam War: 1968, pg. 22 of FORTITUDINE, Historical Bulletin Volume XX, Fall 1990, No. 2, it states: "31 Mar—Operation Scotland, codename for Khe Sanh operations, ended in Quang Tri Province with 1,561 enemy dead and 204 Marines killed. The operation, which began on 31 October 1967..." Would not an uninformed reader interpret that statement to mean, the siege of Khe Sanh ended on 31 Mar., and that the total casualties of that siege were only 204 American KIA's and 1561 enemy killed? If you didn't know better, isn't that what you would think?

Ray Stubbe has done, a unit-by-unit count. He has the individual names of those killed, or who died of wounds. To give but one example of the nonsense being published by the Marine Corps Historical Society which, incidentally brothers is the "official" Marine Corps history, Ray's break-down of just Marine KIA's at Khe Sanh from 20 Jan. through 31 Mar. (the Historical Society supposedly counts from 31 Oct. 67 to 31 Mar. 68, and supposedly includes additional Marine Corps casualties in I Corps not directly associated with the Siege), shows 327 Marine KIA or died of wounds from Khe Sanh alone. How is the Historical Society so far off? For one thing, they don't count those who were wounded, medevaced out, and subsequently died from wounds received at Khe Sanh. They don't count our brothers who were shot down or crashed while flying into or around Khe Sanh. It is not, what they (Historical Branch) say that is false, it is rather that they do not tell all. As a history minor myself, it is my understanding that legitimate historians try to be as "inclusive" as possible when reporting historical facts, not "exclusive" like the Historical Branch has been in recording our history. To give the "impression" that only 204 Americans died at Khe Sanh demeans our experience and gallant effort. What about our brothers in the Navy, Air Force and Army who died at Khe Sanh? To exclude them and only report Marines, gives a very distorted view of the Siege. The Siege was, if anything, during the entire Vietnam War, a joint operation of all the branches of our Armed Forces. To have the audacity and arrogance after twenty-two years of information to the contrary, to state that only, 1,561 North Vietnamese were killed during the entire Scotland operation—not just at Khe Sanh—demeans the significance of the Khe Sanh siege. The NVA is now estimating upwards of 40,000 were killed. Incidentally, Ray's count of KIA's for Khe Sanh from 20 Jan. through 17 Apr., 1968, shows a total of 849 Americans. Ray has the names. Names don't lie. Our brothers and their families have a right to have those "not counted" correctly accounted for, don't you think?

I was talking with a Chosin Marine the other night. He said this supposed Historical Branch has done the same thing with the Korean War history. I've heard a lot of speculation as to why they (Historical Branch) keep publishing data known to be patently false and misleading. We don't give two hoots why, we just want it corrected. We're a last-man outfit. If we don't change it, it's going down as the official history.

If any brothers out there, have attempted, on their own to get the Historical Branch to right these errors, please write and let us know about your attempts. Needless to say, guys, our history and its accuracy is vital to our organization. Do we want future Marines to think that Khe Sanh was just some minor, "junk-change" operation?

Subj: Official Regimental Colors & Specific Historical Data

Sir:

Having recently mustered a good many men of my beleaguered company, in the past few months, we were able to gather in San Diego recently for a reunion. Next year in July, we plan to meet in Washington D.C. to pay tribute to our fallen Marines. As my company has many names inscribed in granite, it is particularly painful that we have a 27 man block on the wall which represents our so-called, "ghost platoon". It is our wish to go to the Wall, not as just visitors, or ex-Marines. We wish to go as a unit, as we fought, as THE 26TH MARINES! It is our wish to carry with us the official Regimental Colors, with all the correct battle streamers. I am not entirely sure this is allowable under current Marine Corps regulations. However, we feel we are entitled, all things considered.

We respectfully request your help in this matter. We wish to somehow, obtain the Colors w/streamers and staff. Any official insignias etc.

We also, respectfully request, clarification of a historical fact. Did the 26th Marines raise the flag on Mt. Suribachi?

Thank you for taking the time to read this request. Please forward to the proper departments. I anxiously await your reply.

Respectfully submitted,
Michael E. O'Hara, Sgt. USMC ret.

Ed. note: Yes, dear friends, another example of the truth about Vietnam. It was the enlisted who got things done. We in the officer corps, you must realize, had difficulty accomplishing even the most simple tasks such as morning toilet. Many of my brother officers, I'm sad to say, had great difficulty distinguishing between toothbrush and paper. This condition grew more pronounced with each increase in rank.

COURAGE

George, you carried me back to safety and life
And, now, you are dead and I am alive...and...
You knew George
You actually knew,
Beyond the concertina, beyond the smiles and laughter
It was waiting and you knew.
And yet, you never wavered or complained.

KHE SANH HISTORY
ARMY OF RATS PLAGUES KHE SANH MARINES

(from the Pacific Stars & Stripes, March 28, 1968)

Khe Sanh, Vietnam (AP)—The 5,500 Marines at this U.S. combat base are fighting a losing battle with a foe as persistent as the North Vietnamese battalions surrounding them—rats.

Thousands of rats have moved into the sandbagged base where underground tunnels and plenty of food provide them with a rodent's paradise.

One of the Marines' chief weapons for beating back the invasion is peanut butter fortified with zinc phosphide, a poison.

For some reason, the rats show a marked preference for peanut butter over cheese. (Ed: If the reporter had bothered to try our cheese-spread, he would not have made such a stupid comparison—Brie, it definitely was not, Amigo!) And since one out of three C rations contains peanut butter, there is plenty around. (Ed: unless you were on 881 S. or 861 A, where they were starving and even ate the Ham and Mothers.) Several thousand traps and globs of poisoned peanut butter are spread over Khe Sanh base. (Ed: I think the reporter might be confusing our involuntary accidental discharges caused by incoming with peanut butter.)

A major problem at the base is that North Vietnamese shell fire makes sanitation duty hazardous (Ed: Here again, the pogue misses the point. Sanitation was not a problem. The "friggen" incoming was the problem.) Once the Marines carefully dumped all their trash and garbage into a ravine 500 yards outside their base. Plows covered up the piles of trash as they accumulated.

Now with 5,500 Marines opening nine C ration cans a day (Ed: Man, I know now for sure this clown didn't do time at Khe Sanh. Who ate nine cans a day? See why we've got to set history straight, guys?) and snipers shooting at the dump, the Marines' trash details have contented themselves with getting most of the empty cans and trash out to the dump where it lies uncovered, the home of uncounted rats and flies.

The refuse is pilling up inside the barbed wire as well, much to the dismay of James E. Dupuy, a Navy corpsman who as preventive medicine technician commands the antirat attack (Ed: Any of you guys, remember Dupuy? What did he use, a broom? Going, "Shoo!")

Numerous men have been bitten by rats and the bite is worth a trip out of Khe Sanh. But the trip involves 14 days of painful shots to prevent rabies.

Many men joke about sleeping with their toes out of their blanket and a daub of peanut butter on each toe.

The threat of plague is low, although the disease sometimes sweeps through wide areas of Vietnam. The Marines all have shots to protect them.

Most Marines have learned that the "rats will leave you alone if you leave them alone," as one said. "We're all in this together," another joked.

Ed. note: Everyone who did the siege has a rat story. Send yours in. We'll print them in SHORT ROUNDS. Remember guys, this is history.

CLOUD COVER, ENEMY MORTARS MAKE MISSION ON 881 ROUGH

(from Sea Tiger Feb. 16, 1968)

Quang Tri—Marine resupply helicopters operating from Quang Tri found flying conditions difficult when diverted to pick up a wounded Marine near Hill 881.

Two Ch-46 Sea Knights of Marine Medium Helicopter Squadron 262 flew under almost impossible weather conditions.

Two separate attempts were made by HMM-262 pilots to get into the landing zone. The first was by Capt. S. Dickey (Tacoma, Wash.). "The area we were called into was so cloudy that you could hardly see," he said.

"We made three attempts to get into the zone but just couldn't make it. I brought the copter to the base of the hill and was trying to hover my way up to the landing zone when we started receiving fire. Two mortars went off below us and as we were pulling off, a third just missed," he continued.

After the unsuccessful attempts by Dickey and his crew, another try was made to reach the Marine by another HMM-262 helicopter.

The pilot, Capt. R.F. Yeager (Roslyn Heights, N.Y.) and his co-pilot, 1st Lt. C.L. Corookall [sic]

(Staten Island, N.Y.), under the cover of darkness, tried to locate the landing zone—this time with success.

"By flying at night we had hoped that the clouds would have lifted and we would have no problem getting in and getting the wounded man, said Corookall. [sic]

"When we arrived in the area," he continued, "we found it almost impossible to see. We had some idea of the zone's location but we weren't sure. After making three passes at the area we finally spotted the zone, thanks to the help of a flareship and illumination by Marines on the ground."

The wounded Marine was then transported to Khe Sanh and later taken to Dong Ha for treatment.

A Marine helicopter crew attempted to evade North Vietnamese mortar rounds on Hill 881 to medevac Leatherneck casualties. They ended up displaying more heroics when a round trapped them on the hill, gaining the gratitude of the casualties' friends.

1st Lts. Russel E. Hohman (Colorado Springs, Colo.), the pilot and co-pilot Anthony M. Davitt (Des Moines, Iowa), were flying a UH-34D helicopter while resupplying the Marines at Khe Sanh and surrounding hill outposts.

An emergency medevac call found Marine Medium Helicopter Squadron-362 aircraft nearest to 881.

The Marines on the hill advised Hohman of the situation and that every copter that had landed there that day had drawn NVA mortar fire.

Immediately after the copter landed, Marines were lifting one casualty aboard when a well-placed mortar round landed behind the aircraft. It sent fragments into the tail section and wounded Cpls. David W. Routon (Corpus Christi, Tex.), the crew chief, and Ronald A. Johnson (Bow, Wash.), the gunner.

Howman tried to take off but discovered that the controls were damaged. The wounded corporals grabbed the Marine ground casualty and moved him to safety. Johnson collapsed from his wounds and efforts of moving the casualty.

Later, another helicopter was able to safely land to evacuate the casualties, including Johnson.

As the remaining three crew members waited for a third aircraft to pick them up, Marines individually crawled to them to offer thanks for the effort of trying to evacuate their friends.

The three crew members have returned to duty at Phu Bai. Johnson is expected to recover and be on duty within a week.

Ed. note: Brothers Crookall (misspelled in Sea Tiger) and Hohman are members of our organization. Would either of you care to share any additional info on this? Do either of you know what happened to any of the other guys mentioned in this article? Did they all live?

MACHINE GUN FIRE SUPPRESSES ATTACKING ENEMY ON HILL 861

Khe Sanh—"Yeah, it was hell...there ain't no getting around that," said LCpl. Billy R. Moffett (Henryetta, Okla.), describing a battle on Hill 861.

"Everyone may not have been as calm as they could have," he added, "but everyone did their best, and we beat them NVA good."

The battle erupted at 3:30 a.m. when an estimated battalion of North Vietnamese regulars assaulted the positions of the 26th Marines. The Marine rifle company was dug in on the slopes of Hill 861, the strategic ridgeland [sic] northwest of the Khe Sanh combat base.

Moffett was manning a .50 cal. machine gun assigned to his 4.2 inch area hardest hit by the NVA. His assistant gunner was killed beside him, and the NVA broke through and came upon his position from the rear—but he managed to keep his gun in action throughout the battle.

"If it weren't for Billy, things might have gotten real bad," said his platoon sergeant, Sgt. Mike Stahl (Del Rio, Tex.), that big machine gun really held the enemy back."

The NVA had struck with an intensive barrage of mortar and RPG (rocket launcher) rounds directed primarily at a small section of the company's perimeter. The sector was located next to a deep, jungle-covered ravine on the northwest part of Hill 861. Moffett's heavy machine gun was located about 20 meters above the main perimeter on the steep slopes of the hill.

"It was real foggy that night," he said (Ed. note:

We all refer to the "fog" at Khe Sanh, actually it was clouds.) "We started firing down along our own lines, over the heads of our troops. The NVA spotted our position right off. They began firing RPG rockets at us. About 20 to 30 landed in our section of the perimeter."

But, the NVA managed to break the lines by concentrating their heavy weapons fire at one point of the perimeter. Moffett kept firing.

Suddenly, his assistant gunner pitched forward after being shot from behind by infiltrating enemy soldiers. Moffett saw the NVA standing a few feet in back of his emplacement, but he couldn't move the big gun, so he grabbed his own rifle and opened up on him [sic].

The Marine returned to the .50 cal. and fired into the breech the NVA had made in the lines. He stayed on the gun until the enemy broke contact early that morning.

In the morning, 14 enemy dead were found and another seven were captured. The break-through had been mended before daylight.

Ed note: Brothers Stahl and Moffett are both members of our organization. Brother Stahl received the Navy Cross for that battle. What did Moffett get? Billy Moffett still lives in Henryetta, Oklahoma. Either of you guys care to add anything? The NVA KIAs (14) sound mighty low to me. [Sic] means error. I employ that editorial devise whenever I can on other publications, since I am notorious, myself, for spelling and grammatical errors.

A MIRACLE AT KHE SANH

Khe Sanh—A well-placed miracle here and there during an enemy rocket attack never does any harm.

One such 'miracle' occurred at Khe Sanh, late January, in the Twenty-sixth Marine Regiment's aid station, according to HM3 Robert J. Topmiller (Cincinnati, Ohio).

An artillery round detonated as it hit (sic) roof of the aid station in which a doctor and six corpsmen were treating three wounded Marines. The explosion knocked down some of the medical personnel and dropped the roof into the room; however, there were no casualties from the blast. (Ed: but I'll bet there was a lot more "peanut butter" rat bait left on the ground.)

The aid station had been hit at least twice before. The first time a white phosphorus shell started a fire in a medical storeroom.

A chief hospitalman dashed into the burning room and extinguished the blaze to prevent serious damage to the supplies.

A second round struck a combined living and storage area. The living quarters were shambles but cabinets, built by the Seabees only a week earlier, prevented serious loss to the medical supplies.

Ed note: Brother Topmiller is a member of our organization. Care to add anything Bob?

Brother Dennis Thayer (A Co. 1/26) is the chief executive officer of an outfit called Global American Medical Relief Services Inc. This non-profit corporation ships medical supplies to Russia. Its purpose is to help support the Russian people develop their health care system. "The work has been incredibly healing for both me and the Russians," according to Dennis. "The friendships and bonding that are taking place are replacing the anger and pain that we have had locked in us for so many years."

We're hoping Dennis' outfit will be able to set up a similar program for the Bru. PROGRAM IN SOCIAL ECOLOGY

Dear Khe Sanh Veteran:

We would like to inform you of a study of Vietnam Veterans being conducted by researchers from the School of Social Ecology at the University of California, Irvine and the University of Massachusetts, over the next few months.

The research study consists of an anonymous questionnaire about your experiences, both at war and since your return. The goals of the study are to gain insight into the ways that people cope with the traumatic experience of war, and to obtain a better understanding of Vietnam Veterans.

War is a major event, experienced by people in this country and others and although some research has been conducted about its impact on military personnel, very little of that work has been done except in hospital settings. This study is not, repeat not, affiliated with the Veterans Administration or with any other governmental agency.

With the cooperation of the Khe Sanh Vet Newsletter, we are inviting all members of your organization to participate in this study. Participation would involve completing a questionnaire that we will mail, upon your request, and returning it anonymously, in a pre-addressed stamped envelope that we will provid. Your name and address will not be requested on the questionnaire, and any information you give us will be reported in a statistical fashion which will not identify participants.

Although you have no obligation to participate in this study, we believe you will find the experience interesting and worthwhile, and your help will be of great value to us. We will mail you a survey if you call us at 714/725-2192 and leave your name and mailing address on our voice mail system. Sorry, no collect calls. The telephone company informs us that a one minute call, to leave a message, will cost you less than $1.00, between the hours of 5:00pm and 8:00am. You may also write us: Attn. Roxane Silver, Ph.D., University of California, Irvine, School of Social Ecology, Irvine, CA 92717

NOT JUST THE PLANTS GOT IT

If you did a tour in I Corps, you were exposed to Agent Orange. They were spraying it north of us at Khe Sanh and inside Laos. Winds blew. That herbicide drifted with the winds. We drank the water it polluted. The Agent Orange Assistance Program gave me no trouble, about whether I was exposed or not, once they saw my DD 214 and the unit I was with.

If you are currently 100% disabled either by the VA, or Social Security, you'll get full funding from the Agent Orange Fund (amount varies). Depending on what happens in the politcal arena, more of us might be granted benefits in the future. It is your right, you paid your dues. File an Agent Orange claim even if they turn you down. When and if our government assumes responsibility for using that herbicide—that they knew was toxic and yet exposed us anyway, and when they agree to assume responsibilty for poisoning us—you'll be on file. The way the system works, guys, if you don't file, they'll never offer to voluntarily help you. When and if the rules change, there will be an avalanche of claims. So don't sit around waiting for a ruling. You've been doused, brother. Stand-up and be counted.

The following is reprinted from the Dec. 91 Free Fire Wire:

> If you want to know if you were exposed to Agent Orange, and/or how to get covered by the Agent Orange Class Assistance Program, here are some steps you can take:
> 1. Request a Herbicide Exposure Match by writing to: U.S. Army and Joint Services, Environmental Support Group, Ft. Belvoir, VA

22060-5387. Furnish the ESG with your name and address for mailing, branch of service, service number, military unit in Vietnam (division, regiment, battalion, company, platoon) and list all firebases or commands you were assigned to and the dates you were there. I suggest in addition to firebases, you list provinces, towns, and hills, if known. The more accurate this is, the better.

The herbicide match is done from the "herbs" and "Ranch Hand" tapes. It costs nothing but a letter and a stamp. It is not part of the Agent Orange Program, but is only for your information to be used in conjunction with the following suggestion. (It may also come in handy down the line if the government "loses" the tapes)

2. Request a VA Physical Examination. While it is often called an "Agent Orange physical", it cannot reveal whether you were exposed or not in Nam. However, it may uncover previously undiagnosed medical problems. If you have medical problems, you may be eligible for partial disability payments through th VA. At this time, the only things officially recognized as linked to Agent Orange for which you can receive disability benefits are non-Hodgkins Lymphoma and soft-tissue Sarcoma (both are forms of cancer) and the skin disease, Chloracne. (Soon to be added! Peripheral Neuropathy, a nervous condition that causes numbness and tingling)

3. The Agent Orange Veteran Payment Program is for total disability or death. The Agent Orange Veteran Payment Program will operate until December 31, 1994. In order to be eligible for compensation at any time during the life of the Payment Program, an applicant must meet a number of eligibility criteria. The applicant must complete the various application forms and submit documentation to demonstrate that the applicant meets each requirement.

Service: The veteran must have served in the United States Armed Forces in or near Vietnam at any time during the period from January 1, 1961 through December 31, 1971.

Disability or Death: The veteran must be disabled from or have died from a non-traumatic, non-accidental and non-self-inflicted cause. The death or disability must have occurred before the veteran's 60th birthday. (Long-term total disability as defined in the Social Security Act)

Exposure: The veteran must have been exposed to Agent Orange while serving in or near Vietnam. Exposure to Agent Orange will be determined by an exposure test that compares the veteran's locations and time of service in Vietnam with computerzied records of spraying missions.

To request forms for the Agent Orange Veteran Payment Program, call 1-800-225-4712 or write. Agent Orange Veteran Payment Program, P.O.Box 110, Hartford, CT 06104

4. The Agent Orange Class Assistance Program makes grants to support programs and organizations which address the needs and concerns expressed by Vietnam veterans and their families. A grant of $134,943 was given in April of this year to Florida State University to be used for developmental and diagnostic assessments for children of Vietnam veterans, marriage, spouse and family counseling. The emphasis of the program is specifically directed at the needs of Vietnam veterans' children with disabilities. The telephone number for this program is 904/644-1588. Ask for information and help with the AOCAP program.

From the San Francisco Examiner, Aug. 24, 1992:

SON OF AGENT ORANGE?

Add a new group of veterans—Persian Gulf soldiers—to the thousands of other U.S. vets suffering from health problems that developed after wartime exposure to toxic chemicals and hazardous conditions. Bronchial ailments, skin rashes, night sweats, hair loss, chronic fatigue and bleeding gums are some of the complaints gulf vets are bringing to doctors' attention. Many vets believe their exposure to Kuwait's oil fires—there were over 600 of them—may relate to their current troubles. High levels of hydrocarbons found in a Navy veteran's blood support this possibility.

Some Army specialists say it's probably stress. Sound familiar? That's the same diagnosis specialists initially used to explain the the health problems of our "atomic soldiers"—many of whom developed cancer and leukemia following exposure to radiation during the U.S. occupation of Nagasaki and Hiroshima, where, the United States dropped atomic bombs during World War 11. That's the same diagnosis specialists initially used to explain the chloracne many Vietnam veterans developed after exposure to the defoliant Agent Orange, used in the Vietnam war. It took deaths and lawsuits before a bill was passed to give disability benefits to vets suffering from Agent Orange-related illnesses.

"Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it," said the philosopher George Santayana. Luckily, there are signs the government has learned some lessons from the Agent Orange nightmare. Recently, the Veterans Affairs Department asked Congress to create a Persian Gulf Registry to track health complaints of gulf war veterans, give them complete physicals and provide follow-up. The registry is voluntary, but the VA expects around 55,000 gulf war vets (10 percent of all troups) to register. The Pentagon has also created a research group to look into the health effects of Kuwait's petroleum fires and make safety recommendations for future soldiers.

When will we learn? War doesn't end when the last body bag is emptied, or when the last smart bomb is put in storage. For too many veterans, the return home is just the begining of a new set of problems, both physiological and psychological.

Ed note. The government is great at buying studies, isn't it? Too bad they lack the ability to comprehend, or the resolve to act on, their findings.

POST TRAUMATIC STRESS SYNDROME

by Anthony (Doc) Edell, MA

PTSD (Post Traumatic Stress Disorder) is the mind's way of reacting to a stressor. Because of the wide-spread publicity about many Vietnam veteran's experiences, it is commonly thought of as only being a reaction to being in "Nam." However, victims of violent crime, natrual disasters, and abused children suffer from it. It is defined in the American Psychiatric Association, Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorder's, Edition 111-R, as: "The development of symptoms following a psychologically distressing event outside the range of normal human experience. It is usually experienced with intense fear, terror and helplessness."

Each of us, in my opinion, will have some symptoms or reactions from the stimuli of having been in a violent environment for an extended period of time. For example, a veteran with mild PTSD, might react in a startled fashion when a car backfires, thus triggering a flashback to Khe Sanh, or his other combat experiences. Another veteran, might have a depressive episode, abusing alcohol (or other drugs), have extreme rage and react with a violent episode. Because we are each, distinct individuals, we react individually, based on our perception of the war, how well equipped we were to coping at the time, and how we adjusted after our return home. We may suffer sleep disturbance. We often deny that we were affected because our society did not encourage feelings in men. Some of us have cut off our ability to feel because it is too painful. Others have been able to talk out their experiences with our brothers, and experience some relief and healing.

Still, some of us have physical challenges that we must face on a daily basis from the war. Agent Orange has also affected many of us. Many are still fighting a war against the VA, or one at home, with their families. One of the first steps to "getting over" PTSD is just acknowledging that it exists. It is a part of us. It is NORMAL for those of us who faced the continual trauma of watching those around us die, being helpless, and out-of-control of our situation. We were proud soldiers, who were told to be brave, to face what was ahead of us, and we did. Then, we needed to hide our fears and anxiety and just try to do our best, and we did. It is not our fault that this thing (PTSD) happened to us. A victim of a crime usually faces that situation only once. We were immersed, for months or multiple tours, in the trauma of war.

What can you do about it? Seek a support group, a therapist, another veteran who understands, or someone who will listen and talk with you about your feelings. We were told when we got home, "Just forget about it." Wrong! It does not subside or go away by trying to forget it. There is "pay-back" due. We need to talk about it in order to heal those debilitating wounds which diminish and threaten our lives. PTSD kills, if left untreated.

KHE SANH

by Ray Stubbe

Like the American Civil War, the Vietnam War is likely to affect our national life and be the subject of attempts to explain and understand just what happened and why for centuries. For this reason, it is very important to record the real stories, experiences, and persons before they are lost.

In a war such as Vietnam, it was the individual person who mattered, more so than battlefield tactics or overall strategy. Like a tapestry woven of many strands, the overall picture that emerges requires the contributions of countless individuals.

This was certainly the case at Khe Sanh in early 1968. Despite daily shelling, mainly by the heavy stuff—122mm rockets and 130mm and 152mm field artillery, delivering accurate fire of up to 1200 rounds on a base only half a mile wide and one and a half miles long—out of the thousands there, only a handful "cracked-up." During the incoming, artillerymen still manned their guns to fire counter-fire, the wounded were carried to the medical centers or to safety during the attacks. Within seconds after a barrage, senior NCOs were out to see to the welfare of their men—one, the Sergeant-Major of battalion 1/26 who had been a prisoner of war in the Philippines (Bataan) during WWII, and who had volunteered to come to Khe Sanh for his final tour in the Marine Corps before retiring, was killed while visiting his men and seeing to their welfare. Uncommon valor was indeed a common virtue at Khe Sanh.

One saw Shore-Party men moving pallets of ammunition with their forklifts, engineers building sturdier bunkers. One saw corpsmen rushing litter patients to waiting helicopters—all the while mortar and rockets exploded everywhere. One Marine, who had made application to be a Conscientious Objector just prior to the Siege, remained with exposed litter patients, covering their bodies with his own during the attacks until he himself was killed—and posthumously awarded the Navy Cross for his bravery.

One chopper pilot arrived around midnight, with little light to guide him, low on fuel, and delivered urgently needed whole blood. Chopper pilots braved almost certain death to remove medevacs from the outlying hill outposts.

On a more humorous side, one corpsman ran to a trench during incoming, breathing heavily, he exclaimed: "My patient outran me to the chopper, I wasn't able to attach his medevac tag on him!" And there was the scout dog who ran into a chopper, cowered between the pilots, and refused to deplane despite coaxing from his handler; he just wasn't going to spend another moment at Khe Sanh.

In those days, we were frequently out of water or chow for days at a time, and when we did have chow, it was usually only two C-rations per man, per day, if that. Yet, it was not uncommon for men to share their last drops of water or bits of chow with someone who had none.

These are the men who didn't collapse under the unrelenting pressure of enemy shelling or the knowledge of being surrounded by thousands of enemy troops who could at any time, mount human-wave assaults against our lines. For the first time in the war, the use of tanks by the enemy was not just a possibility, it had become a reality. The well-respected historian Arnold Toynbee concluded that civilizations do not fall on account of external forces; they first crumble from within and then an external force conquers them. This did not happen at Khe Sanh. It was the men, mostly 19-year-olds, who are the real story of Khe Sanh.

Oh yes, there was massive air support, both tactical and resupply. And yes, there was excellent intelligence due to electronic sensors (first used in a major battle at Khe Sanh), photo, signal intercepts and pattern analysis of enemy radio transmissions, and so on. And yes, there were more bombs (total tons) dropped at Khe Sanh than in the entire Pacific theater of operations in WW11 in 1943 and 1944. And yes, there was massive air resupply. And yes, even President Johnson had his eyes focused on Khe Sanh and the JCS made a statement that it would be held. But, in the final analysis, it was the young men who held Khe Sanh while maintaining their dignity and sense of humor throughout. Napoleon once observed, "In war it is not men, but the man who counts."

Now, almost 25 years latter, we have an organization of Khe Sanh veterans—anyone who served there (1961-71) from all branches of our Armed Forces. I have written a book on Khe Sanh (with co-author John Prados, published by Houghton-Mifflin in December, 1991 called VALLEY OF DECISION) which, although it tends to emphasize strategy and the rational aspects of war rather than the individual stories which I would have preferred, it is, I feel, the definitive account of Khe Sanh at this point. We have wonderful, healing reunions. We have our very own newsletter. Hopefully, our stories—which together make "the" story of Khe Sanh—will be preserved. We now have the means to support each other by communicating with those who we know, "know" our experiences. Together, we can fill-in-the-blanks of that experience we shared, called Khe Sanh. We can learn the missing details of what happened to our friends.

THE DEAD AND THE MISSING

My friend was still up there when the B-52's, Phantoms, Crusaders knocked the top off Hill 861, spread it around like a bulldozer.

We celebrated his new son the night before we left the states; not three days later he wandered up that numbered hill on a patrol stumbled into their positions from the rear, not knowing until he was in their center.
Seven out of thirty got back.
They sent out a Company to take the Hill and found a North Vietnamese Army Division, poised for attack. More losses.
They pulled back and pounded the piss out of that Hill for three days, blew 23 feet off the crest, then sent us in to find the missing, and the dead who had been sent to find them.

They flew us in to mop up:
to clear bunkers,
blow dead bombs, stuff dead NVA back into their foxholes and blow the walls in on them.
Searching out the Laotian border, fanned out over high hills, wading in pools in the bottoms of bomb craters, down in the gullies and creekbeds the smell of death hung in the air no stomach for food, finding rusty M-16's in impossible places ten days over and over the insistent almost a wisper-on the radio:
"Find us the bodies of the missing; tell us the names of the dead."
At night the outposts saw the leaves of bananna palms moving, broad and as long as a man.
I wondered about by friend.

Thunderstorms in the summer monsoon washed away the bomb-strewn soil as we set up our patroling base, digging in, digging a trench line, digging down through the loose dirt, down to the jungle floor that oozes gray in places when it rains late at night, deep into the midwatch, the next day's patrol planned, the night fires called in, the radio watches set, digging my own hole, wondering with each shovelfull if I would turn over his dogtags, would find my friend.

THE REUNION

What is it that binds combat veterans together? It isn't friendship. We all have friends. You can go to a company picnic or a convention, yet you will NOT feel the same emotion, in the air, as when you attend a veterans' reunion.

It is something beyond regular friendship. It is the knowledge that "YOU AND THEY HAVE BEEN TO HELL AND BACK." It is the deep-rooted emotion that brings you together. It is the knowledge that when things were tough, you and your buddies stuck it out and lived through it all.

You can attend high school reunions, and college reunions, company conventions, and the whole civilian works, but there isn't the BAND OF BROTHERS feeling that is felt when combat buddies get together.

You and your buddies may have less hair on top and a lot more inches around the belt line, but deep within all of you is the same comradeship that you had during those horrible days of war. When combat buddies meet, whether it is after ten or even forty years, it seems like, yesterday. The memories assemble in your mind, memories that you thought had been pushed back into the recesses of your memory bank. "WHATEVER HAPPENED TO..." and "REMEMBER WHEN..." You try not to let on that these old veterans mean a lot to you, but by the time the flag is furled, the bills paid, and the car packed, there is a lump in your throat, a tear in your eye, as you part company with the men who once lived and fought beside you.

You tell your wife: "DAMN, IT WAS GOOD TO SEE THEM AGAIN." And it was! Yes, memories flood your mind as you head for home. No one knows the feelings, except those of us who were there. You wonder if you will see any of them again. Combat was hell, and you may have many terrible memories of death and destruction, but the memory of total camaraderie, with men who shared that hell, will forever be embedded in your heart. There is no friendship like that of combat buddies. It is something that lasts forever.

Ed note: The following piece was written several years ago, when some of us were asked to participate in a TV special to be filmed at Khe Sanh. That deal fell through, but we haven't given up on the idea. Watch for further developments. We'll do one ourselves. It takes money, and it takes connections. We're working on both of those critical components, right now.

THE LEAD IN HIS PACK

by John M. Kaheny
A 1/26

Marines and soldiers who serve in the infantry are nicknamed "grunts." The moniker is derived from the guttural sounds they make while carrying heavy packs, weapons and equipment over unbroken, uneven ground. Grunts who serve in wartime carry two packs. One is on the back and is filled, very carefully, with just enough to survive. The other pack is carried in the heart, and is filled by fate with memories of those who shared the grunt's burden and paid the grunt's price.

Excess weight in either pack is called "lead." Novice grunts soon find out that lead weighs you down and grinds your pack-straps into your shoulders; it makes your skin sweat in the cold and your brain bake in the sun. Some grunts have heavier packs than others. These are the grunts that, on Memorial Day, cannot rid themselves of images of comrades left in uncovered graves upon the field of battle, denied an honorable rest.

And so it was for the surviving men of Bravo Company after Jacques' fatal wrong turn in the foggy dew. It claimed twenty-two of Bravo's best that twenty-sixth day of the siege. The White House ordered no retrieval, at least, not until the more important battle of New Hampshire was over. "No more bad news from Walter Cronkite was needed!", they said. Restrained by orders from on high, Ken Pipes, the stoic but sensitive commanding officer, and his stunned Marines, could only gaze across their parapets, eight hundred yards—out to where their fallen comrades lay. The living stood watch—and waited. Their lead got heavier with each passing day.

For over a month, they thought of their shame and of the honor of their fallen; while finely honing their bayonets and charting the course for their return. Soon, both the impenetrable fog and the infamous orders were lifted. At long last. Forward observer, Hank Norman opened the door for the corpsmen's mission of mercy and the Marines' mission of vengeance. Rolling barrages of sparkling steel cascaded from above. It was the 30th day of March, the second to the last day of the siege, the 33rd day of Bravo's novena. The score was settled fourfold on that closest, most personal of all levels, but Hank and eight more fell into Ken's pack, joining Jacques and his twenty-one.

Years later, a miracle walked off a plane from Hanoi and out of Ken's Pack. Brother Ridgeway—listed as a KIA and supposedly buried in a comman grave back in the world, with six other unidentifiable brothers from Don's patrol—was alive! Rejoice! But, divine intercession is rare, and Ken continues to carry the rest.

It was just a few days past twenty years from that day of righteous revenge when Ken called to say that Walter's old network, CBS, now wanted Ken to go back to the rejuvenated green hill of the valley. "What do you you think?", he asked.

I said: "Go back, Ken. And guard the truth against those who profit from our sorrow." I also prayed, that his trip back will heal his soul, and allow him to leave his lead on that sacred field from whence it came.

Bio. Brother John Kaheny did an extended tour with 1/26 in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968, and a tour in Saudi Arabia during Operation Desert Storm. He is a Reserve Marine colonel and a Deputy City Attorney for the city of San Diego.

Brother ("Bubba") Pipes, is a retired Lt.Col. USMC, works for California Edison at the San Onofre, nuclear power plant, just outside the Marine base at Camp Pendleton. He is also a volunteer deputy sheriff.

Brother Bob Ridgeway, lives in Texas, and works for the Department of Veterans Affairs.

REMEMBERING

SOME CALL IT FLASHBACKS, I SAY IT'S MEMORIES OF 68
I'M AT AN AIRPORT WITH SEA BAG, GOING THROUGH THE GATE
WEATHER IS BALMY, NIGHT IS CALM MIND RACING THOUGHTS OF THIS PLACE, CALLED NAM.

TWO HUNDRED TWENTY-FOUR WALKING IN LINE
THIRTEEN MONTHS TO GO, OF "PULLING OUR TIME"
THE LONG PLANE RIDE NOW SEEMS SHORT IN THE NAM PLAYING BALL IN THEIR COURT.

SOON WE SEPARATE, SENT ON OUR WAYS
IT WAS THEN I BEGAN, COUNTING THE DAYS
OLD TIMERS GREET US, SHAKE THEIR HEADS FACES WONDERING, HOW MANY, SOON WILL BE DEAD.

CHECKED INTO OUR UNIT SENT RIGHT TO THE BUSH
I GET KHE SANH AS TET MAKES ITS BIG PUSH
THE REALITY OF WAR, FRIENDS BEGIN TO DIE
HEAVY PRAYING, PLEADING HELP FROM THE SKY

HILLS, STREAMS, EVERY DAY A DIFFENERNT PLACE
I'VE BECOME AN OLD MAN WITH FRAIL BODY, GAUNT FACE NOT MANY OF US LEFT, WE BOYS TURNED TO MEN
SO MANY LOST BROTHERS WITH NEXT OF KIN

WOUNDED TWICE YET THINKING, HOW LUCKY CAN I BE WILL LADY LUCK GIVE ME A JODY AND RUN OUT ON ME
WE HAD A SAYING, YOU HAVEN'T LIVED TIL YOU'VE ALMOST DIED
HOW TRUE THIS IS, HOW WE SUFFERED AND CRIED.

YEARS HAVE PASSED, NOW WE HAVE NO SHAME
NO USE IN BITCHING ASKING WHO'S TO BLAME
WE SIGNED OUR NAMES, TOOK IT IN STRIDE NOT LIKE THOSE CANADA BOYS WHO TRIED TO HIDE.

MEETING AGAIN, HUGS, KISSES, SHAKING HANDS
REKINDLING BONDS MADE IN FAR-AWAY-LANDS
BROTHERS, SISTERS, WE PRAY THIS WILL LAST A BRIGHT FUTURE, NEVER FORGETING OUR PAST.

HEADS HELD HIGH, MAKING TOASTS TO OUR FRIENDS, FROM COAST TO COAST
PLANS FOR OUR NEXT ONE, WHERE WILL IT BE WITH OUR BROTHERS ON THE WALL, 93, IN D.C.

REFLECTIONS: CONTACT!

by Talis Kaminski
CAC O

Why did we come to this battlefield? What purpose will this patrol of nine men serve? Overhead, the blue sky quietly escorts the floating clouds while here below, men wait to inflict darkness once more on the world. Somehow, it seems that even animals sense the events that are so soon to transpire. Everything is still. An eerie placidity feeds the fear growing within each participant. For some, the waiting is the worst part; for others, it is a dessert for the feast to come. Mental preparations. Rehearsing. Over and over, the mind plays tapes of possible alternatives of what will be. Yet, how often does anything transpire as planned or hoped for? Where battle and war is concerned, the answers to pleadings and prayers is so miniscule, they cannot be measured. The tension increases. The mind pleads for mental release. Strangers we have never met before are held responsible for what is about to occur. We have come here to kill and are ourselves so afraid of being killed. We need someone to blame for our predicament. It is far, far easier to blame an unkown foe than our so-called leaders. They lead us from afar, as though they are too precious to be involved in the carnage. This role is left to us, the expendables, with young bodies, and minds easily swayed to causes neither understood nor honestly explained. Once on the field of battle, they know we will revert to the most ancient of all reasons to kill. "Better you than me." At that point, it will no longer matter why we are here, or what we are doing here. It will only matter, that in order for us to live, the other guy must die. A very simple equation, a battlefield lesson in math, if you will. Soon it will occur. The strange premonition that so often warns the mind is here. No escaping what is about to happen. Resignation replaces desperation and hope. The patrol is turning into emotionless participants. The time of the blood has come. There is no more room to feel. Blazing weapons spew out their power! Speeding missiles cross the distance without warning to wreak havoc on bodies and earth. Screams! Cries ring out but only betray the location of their origin. The peculiar sounds of bullets on flesh punctuate why we are here. It is over. On the ground lay five dead bodies that only seconds before were living, human beings. Now, they are nothing. The instant of death has removed the definition of life from them. They are not human; they are not life; they are now only statistics, and memories; a bit of history that we have taken part in. A bit of history that will only mean something for the nine of us. And, a memory for someone who will never know what really happened to their loved one.

ONE PILOT'S PERSPECTIVE OF KHE SANH

by C.G. "Jug" Gerard

The Khe Sanh Vet Newsletter has done a commendable job of keeping those who participated in Khe Sanh conscious of some of the major events of the Vietnam war. The ground units unquestionably were the major players, as the newsletter interest shows, but the air units also made a big contribution. Our membership carries the names of many Marine pilots, crewmen, and support personnel who I knew and worked with. I would like to provide a few personal observations on the aviation participation during the siege of Khe Sanh as I knew it, and can, after twenty-four years, still recall with some degree of accuracy. I also invite other aviators to tell their stories.

The helicopter squadrons at Quang Tri were the advance units of MAG-36, headquartered at Phu Bai. They provided support for the 26th Marines at Khe Sanh from about January 1, 1968 onward. Prior to that, the Khe Sanh direct helicopter support came from Phu Bai. The Quang Tri squadrons later became Provisional MAG-39. Other aviation support included elements from MATCU-62, the crash crew, and the aviation fuel farm.

Although I had previously flown in-and-out of Khe Sanh, I first joined the Khe Sanh defenders on the last day of 1967. On that day, VMO-6 took over from VMO-3, the UH-1E detachment supporting the 26th Marines. I took the first VMO-6 detachment of two UH-1Es to Khe Sanh on December 31, and relieved VMO-3, headed by Major Joe Sales. The transfer consisted of one, fourty-five minute area checkout flight, and an introduction to Colonel Lownds. We took over a hootch, down the hill from the command bunker (Ed. note: You can tell it's an aviator talking, "hills"? on the combat base?) and across the street from the post office. The next morning, support flights began. We got our flight requirements from the S-2 (Major Jerry Hudson), through the regimental air officer, a 1st Lt. We received augmentation support from Quang Tri, on request, to meet any additional requirements the ground units needed. We flew gunship support for the transport helicopters resupplying the hills, 881 South, 861, 558 and 950; reconnaissnce missions, control of artillery, and aerial support for the engineers on Highway 9, based at Camp Carroll.

Three notable events occurred during those flights:

1) In support of the unit at Lang Vei, we surveyed the face of Co Rock mountain, just inside Laos. We were not allowed to cross the river into Laos but unquestionably, we could identify artillery positions that had been tunneled into the face of Co Rock.

2) On another, late afternoon flight southwest of Khe Sanh village, we spotted three elephants out to pasture. A request to destroy these pack animals was denied by the HQ.

3) Two days of "sniffer" flights, conducted by our CO, Lieutenant Colonel Bill White, "painted" a pattern of human enclaves all throughout the areas north, west, and south of Khe Sanh. The sniffer was a probe extended under the helicopter, which during low level flights, chemically detected concentrations of human urine. Supposedly, monkey urine (Ed. note: might have been Delta Company guys out pissing-around, looking for something to steal.) also would set off the sniffer sensor but from our previous use, we knew the sniffer was reasonably accurate at its intended design, in detecting people. The siege which followed within a couple of weeks, certainly confirms our sniffer finding that there was, in fact, a lot of humans around Khe Sanh.

The money was short; the presents few.
I was depressed last Christmas, but changed my view remembering the Nam, so many years ago.
We had so little then, as we all know.
No presents, just mud, pouring rain, and those damn C-Rats that made us insane.
Lonely as hell without family near,
the death and dying, the constant fear.
Over and over it ran through our minds:
"Will I live to see my family just one more time?"
Look around, thank God, we've made it home.
We have our families, we're not alone.
Financially, like me, you may not have a lot;
have a Merry Christmas, be thankful, for what you've got.

The weather during the first two weeks of 1968 was generally good, and no support flight was postponed or canceled. There were no fixed wing support flights conducted, and no hostile fire was directed at any of our daily flights throughout the Khe Sanh tactical operating area (TOA). After two weeks, we were relieved by Major Dave Workman's UH-1E detachment. My next trip to Khe Sanh was vastly different. Conditions had radically changed.

Flying Crane

After the initial attack by the NVA during the night of January 20, larger and larger numbers of the Marine aviation assets were dedicated to support missions for Khe Sanh. The UH-1Es principal mission became tactical air control airborne (TACA) direction for the fixed wing attacks on NVA positions and escorting the resupply and medevacs of the hills and the combat base.

On the afternoon of the twenty-first, I returned with a two aircraft flight to provide TACA support. We parked on the hardstand near the fuel farm, since the revetments north of the runway were filled. While the crewmen serviced the aircraft, the four pilots headed for the command bunker to get the S-2 briefing. While running down the road to the command bunker, an incoming artillery round hit about 40 feet away, and knocked us all down with its concussion. No injuries to us. We continued on, in a daze, and regrouped at the bunker. We got a hurried briefing and got back into the air as soon as we could. You grunts can have the ground! The rest of the afternoon was spent directing fixed wing aircraft onto targets around the TOA. I remember running several fixed wing strikes on enemy troops in the open around the Special Forces camp at Long Vei. For me, that afternoon was typical of what everyone at Khe Sanh must have been experincing. Fear! Though still shaken from that artillery round, I tried to make every air strike count, and get the battle under control. My copilot that day, was only on his second or third flight in Vietnam. I know he must have been wondering what he had gotten himself into. Twelve more months... of this?

I did a lot more nights at Khe Sanh, over the next few months. We moved into the basement of the leveled Air Force bunker, where the rats joined us at night. The positive side of those nights came from the comforting sound of the arc light drops. When called out on a mission, we were never sure if the UH-1Es would still be intact, or if the fog would allow us to get off the ground. Several times, we had to find our way in very thick fog, by going from one familiar land mark to another. We moved in a hover-like, croutched fashion (the aviator version of the Khe Sanh shuffle) until we reached our aircraft.

Eventually, the loss of helicopters on the ground due to artillery, mortar and rockets, in spite of the revetments, precluded leaving the helos overnight at Khe Sanh. Flights were then provided "on call" from Quang Tri.

I was at Khe Sanh the night of February 7 when tanks were used against Lang Vei. It was noon before the fog lifted enough for us to lift off and do a visual reconnaissance. Three immobile tanks were evident; one, just inside Laos, another, east, near the river, and the third, inside the wire of Lang Vei just west of a bunker. Contact with the Lang Vei force and the HQ confirmed that the survivors intended to stay, and a reinforcement was being sent (Ed. note: this is a very, very, contentious point, among the higher-ups, and big-time, mucky-mucks). My flight was relieved by Captain Ed Kufeldt, who came in with the troop-carrying helicopters. After the troop insert, Ed's flight got caught in a helo trap over an area half way back to Khe Sanh village. An American voice called for an emergency evacuation. There was no corroborating evidence of the emergency, but the voice was convincing—help was needed. Ed elected to approach the LZ to confirm the need for help. On the final approach, his helo was hit by ground fire. The copilot, First Lieutenant George Rosental, was wounded in the arm and leg. Ed barely managed, to get the UH-1E back to Khe Sanh, before fuel starvation from holes in the fuel tank caused him to crash.

Soon, resupply of the hills became too big of a problem. The established practice had been to provide a pair of CH-46s for Khe Sanh support. These crews would conduct repeated flights to the hills from the Khe Sanh combat base until resupply was complete or daylight ran out. But, enemy mortar shelling on each arrival of the helos made this practice increasingly difficult. Adding to the problem, was the difficulty in having to prepare the resupply loads on the airstrip during constant incoming that was aimed at the helos. Lieutenant Colonel White, along with the H-46

COs at Quang Tri, developed a new approach to the resupply problem and came up with the "Supergaggle". It was launched with 1st MAW concurrence, on-or-about Febuary 24. The lifts were prepared at Quang Tri. Upwards of twenty CH-46s would make the resupply, in one simultaneous super-lift. After launch, they flew at high altitude past the Khe Sanh combat base to the hills; then, went in daisy-chain fashion, one-after-another. They would saturate the LZ with enough supplies to last several days. This tactic eliminated the vulnerable target presented when a lone helo or pair of helos made repeated lifts.

Supergaggle flights were escorted by several flights of UH-1E gunships and A-4s. Using his knowledge of the area, Major Bob Neff of VMO-6 did the initial coordination with the fixed wing, while flying in the back seat of a TA-4. An added benefit derived from this approach of resupply was that on many days, the fog and clouds would preclude flying into or out of the combat base, but the hills would be above the clouds. "Supergaggle" worked well. Support improved, and losses to aircraft dropped off.

During a flight back from Khe Sanh to Quang Tri, I came closer to being wiped out in one, quick swipe than during any of my other close calls in Vietnam. It happened after a full day of support work. We were just comfortably, cruising home at 5000 feet and 500 feet above a solid layer of cloud cover. The sun was setting behind us. It was a beautiful, placid setting, at the end of a hectic day. Then, BOOM! A Marine, VMCJ RF-4, punches right-up in front of us, through the clouds, going straight up! It is less than 100 feet in front of us. They never see us. They pass so close, I can see both crewmen looking away from us. I can see the detail, the green and orange pattern on the back and tops of their hard-hats; every word on the side of their aircraft, as well as the after-burner cones from the tail pipes. Almost immediately, we pass through the turbulance from the jet, which pitches, and rolls us, out-of-control. I fight to regain control of my aircraft, and in just seconds, all is quiet, and calm again. No one is hurt. Our helicopter is unscathed, but my flight suit sustains major damage in certain areas. If we were a split-second earlier, we would have been knocked out of the sky.

I always marveled at the 175mm fire missions that I controlled. They were located at the Rock Pile. When a round was "on the way", we would wait, maybe a minute and fifty seconds, then, watch it impact. It was like fire control, in slow motion.

Another time, I led an Army H-54 Flying Crane to Khe Sanh on two successive flights—one, to deliver a back hoe, and the other to deliver a fire truck. The Army Warrant Officer, flying the Flying Crane, seemed shakey. He radioed me and said, "Marine, you let them fire ONE round at me, and I swear, I'll drop this thing." Like, I had some special, personal relationship, with Mr. Charles? Fortunately, we got him in-and-out without incident. That backhoe dug trenches around the perimeter, and the fire truck was used repeatedly, over the next couple of months, at the airstrip.

I was also at Quang Tri the night units of the 26th Marines were relieved, and airlifted out. Some of the Marines were coming out wounded by rocket fire. After all those months of incoming, Marines were still getting hit, right up until the very end.

Although VMO-6's participation was but one small part of the total Khe Sanh effort, we did lose many UH-1Es, as well as several crewmen. We had a real stake in the outcome, from start to finish. I remember a photo, by the photo journalist, David Duncan. It is a picture of a destroyed VMO-6 UH-1E taken in the Khe Sanh revetments. Painted on the nose is the pained-faced of the cartoon character, Wile E. Coyote, with the words: "WHY ME". How apropos.

Bio. C.G. "Jug" Gerard did his initial tour in Vietnam from August 1967 to August 1968 as a UH-1E pilot with VMO-6, and as the CO of H&HS-39 at Quang Tri Airbase. He came back to Vietnam twice for a total of eighteen months, between 1971 and 1973, as the Air Operations Officer, USS Tripoli (LPH-10), finishing up with the mine sweeping operations of Haiphong Harbor. He retired for the Marine Corps, as a Lieutenant Colonel in October 1981, and has worked since then for Sikorsky Aircraft Company in Connecticut. He is a Quality Assurance Chief for Technical Manual development. Jug says: "For anyone who has not already done so, I highly recommend Chaplain Ray Stubbe's book, VALLEY OF DECISION, which superbly portrays the detail of personal participation, and actions of the Khe Sanh conflict."

Ed. note: I concur with Jugs' assesment of Ray's book. I also would like to say—Jug, you did good, my man. Your piece is precisely the type of historical memoir we want to publish. S.L.A. Marshal, shmarshal, yours is the history that really tells it like it really was. War isn't about any big-picture. For us, the warriors who did the fighting, war was individual deeds and actions. Good job, Jug. And—you other aviators out there, do what Jug said. Write us.

I'LL REMEMBER YOU
(song title, by the late, Kui Lee)

by Ken Hillard
M/3/26

It's hard to believe...twenty-four years have gone by since TET-68 at Khe Sanh. I close my eyes, and it seems like yesterday. I imagine it's that way with a lot of you. Some of us try to forget. Some try to remember, and some will never forget. However, there were a lot of good times at Khe Sanh.

REMEMBER, the bull-shit sessions and card games in between rocket and artilley rounds from Co Rock? Or, how about sharing, a gallon can of peaches with buddies, after making a raid on the mess tent? And, how about all that runway matting you guys stole, right off the damn runway, at night, and put on your bunkers? And you guys wonder why the KC-130s didn't want to land? Hell, half the runway was stolen. I'm joking, but you get my drift, don't you? Some of you stole for the hell of it. (Ed: Stand-up and take a bow, Delta.)

REMEMBER, that letter from home, that you let your buddy read, because he didn't get one that day? You wanted him to stay in tune with the happenings in the real world. Or, maybe you just wanted to help him keep his sanity because you knew he would do the same for you.

How about that case of the "screaming me-mes" you had? Wasn't that a gas? My backside still hurts when I think about that. And you wonder where they get Kendall motor oil from? I don't know about the rest of you, but I went over weighing 190, and came back 135. Lean, mean, with no ass. It took me twenty-five years to gain the weight back, but my butt is still over there, somewhere. Probably, still in some fox-hole full of water, where it fell off during a rocket attack.

How about those ham and mothers? Made you want to quit eaating all together, didn't it? Onions and hot sauce could cut that crud, if you could find any.

How many of you guys still cut your shirt-tails off, and stain your water? Gets pretty embarassing in a resturant, doesn't it? Hey, don't laugh, my wife thinks I cut my shirt-tails off to check the oil in my pick-up.

Ed. note: Oh, mercy, Kennito! I had trouble typing this. I kept falling out of my chair, laughing. Good stuff.

BRAVO REMEMBERED

by Michael O'Hara
B 1/26

When I arrived at Khe Sanh in November of 1967, the first person I encountered was a young second lietenant by the name of John Dillon. He tried to act stern and play the part. Little did I know then how much he would affect my life. Next, I met Jake, my squad leader, and finally, the man himself, Capt. Ken Pipes. When I left in early April, I was glad to get out—but still, it was hard to leave the people who had so changed my life forever.

I remember the day Jake took a round in his back, that took almost 200 stitches to close, but he refused to be medevaced.

I remember the day a pilot punched-out in front of our lines. We were being shelled hard that day. Lt. Dillon was through the wire and had that pilot back to safety before anyone else ever thought to look up.

I remember the day that Captain Pipes got hit real bad, and lost the whole command group, but he stood his ground, didn't flinch, and calmly called in air and artillery. He just wouldn't quit until all of his men were back safe.

I remembered all these men, all these years, and made a vow, to seek them out someday, and thank them, for being the men they were and are. I have always thanked the good Lord for blessing me with excellent leaders, at a time in history when true leaders were very rare.

Two years ago I found Jake (The Snake, Quiles Jacobs) and that led to me going to San Diego. I would have walked from Indiana, if I had to; just for the opportunity to shake their hands, and personally say, thank you.

However, when that moment arrived, I found these people were even more than I had remembered them to be. I suppose that is why they have been in my mind all these years. I have never felt such a warm feeling in all my life as during the reunion. I spent three of the most wonderful days of my entire life, with not only my Bravo brothers who I had come to be with, but with everyone there; all the people that were at Khe Sanh who I didn't even know. I simply cannot find the words to express the depth of my feelings, nor can I begin to describe the incredible, positive energy that filled the air.

Ernie, when I told you how much I was enjoying myself, you cautioned me that I might come down off of the high I was experiencing in a week or two, after I returned home. All you did was make me more resolute and determined not to fall; and when I feel I am beginning to lose a little altitude, I do what I have always done, these past twenty-four years—I think back to Mar. 30, 1968, and the last time I saw my Skipper, who would not give up, despite his serious wounds, because his men meant so much to him, and I just say to myself, "Michael, it ain't never gonna get that bad that you can't handle it."

What I got out of the San Diego reunion was right before my eyes all these years. SEMPER FIDELIS truly means, ALWAYS FAITHFUL.

OLD CORPS

by Wally Persoma
81's 1/9

I did my two weeks active duty at Camp Pendleton again this past spring. I've become "old fashioned." I wore my uniform when I checked in. I always generate conversation when the new generation of Marines see this 43-year-old S/Sgt. with 10 ribbons. This time, I had an E-7, Gunny, ask about the ribbons on my bottom row. You know the ones, ARVN Cross of Gallantry and the standard Nam package. Talk about feeling old! Here's an E-7 that didn't know or recognize Vietnam ribbons. I asked him how many years he'd been in the Corps. He joined in 1977. He should have known better, but his excuse was, "that's an old war and a lot has happened since then." Needless to say, we had some words. It might be an "old war" to that guy, but a lot of us remember it as though it were yesterday. Our war wasn't some 100-hour ground action, and our enemy was very determined and dedicated. Our enemy did not walk around with their hands up, all the time, looking for someone to surrender to. Our time in the bush wasn't some cake-walk in the sand, especially not that time at Khe Sanh. Hey, but whenever I mention Khe Sanh, the kids take a step back, they might not know ribbons, but they know Khe Sanh.

During my summer tours, I've noticed some definite changes over the years. There are now very few mess halls, most have closed. The Marines eat at McDonalds and Burger Kings which are on base, or from their refrigerators. The few mess halls there are, are run by civilians, no more KP. Living quarters have definitely changed. There's very few of the old "huts". All the old roads are now paved. As I roamed the base at Pendleton, I could not help but reflect back to that time, when all those thousands of Marines passed through the base on their way to Vietnam. Many ended up in units at Khe Sanh. Many never returned home alive. Many came back changed forever. I watch the young Marines of today, their innocence, eagerness, and the comforts they now have that we did not. I hope their their youthfull innocence isn't changed forever, like ours was.

My two weeks this year, was spent at Regimental S-3. They were organizing and preparing for a "war game" out at the "Stumps". For our exercise, we set-up camp, first at Pendelton before going out to Twenty-Nine Palms. The modern tents are quick to set-up but weigh a lot. Not like the tents we used to be able to carry on our backs, out in the bush. They've got computers, big map boards, and all kinds of radios. Man, do they have gear. I couldn't help wondering how long that stuff would last out in the bush. The tents would stand-out, computers would not last in the rain, heat and mud. That stuff would be strewn along the trails, if they had to pack it like we did. I guess Regiments today figure they'll always be stationary or have good transportation. Dream on guys. I tried to imagine us, and whether we'd ever pack that stuff. No way. Times have changed!

POLICING UP

by Ron Taylor
1/11

I want to mention a couple of items that some of the Khe Sanh vets may find interesting. These incidents all happened after the siege, when I was there.

On June 1, 1968 we took a lot of incoming. One Marine was killed and three were wounded at Gun 6 of Tango Battery (155 towed) 1/11. That night, an NVA soldier, fully armed and equipped, walked through the lines on the south-west side. He was not challenged at all. The soldier walked over to Tango Battery, and into one of the living bunkers, and gave himself up to the Marines occupying the bunker. The men were already jumpy that day so you can imagine the shock that gave them. This happened during one of those dark Khe Sanh nights, when you couldn't see your hand in front of your face. I understand someone burned over the lax security.

This next incident might also be a first and only for Khe Sanh. On June 9, an A-4 Skyhawk from VMA 211 made an emergency landing on the Khe Sanh airstrip. I saw it come in. One of my buddies took pictures. The jet ran off the end of the runway and had to be pulled back onto the landing matting. The plane had a full bomb load. After it was fixed, it took off and then proceeded to do low passes and barrel rolls. We were firing fire missions at the time. He's lucky we didn't shoot him down. We had to check fire, because of his antics.

We appreciated the strong bunkers left by the guys from the siege. However, we were given the word that the base was being abandoned and were ordered to tear them down. We had no tools other than E-tools and machetes and we had to rip up each individual sandbag and dump everything out. We worked from early morning until long after dark. We got a lot of incoming from Co Rock during this time because of all the men that were above ground all over the base, working on destroying the bunkers.

The worst part of that incoming was that the first things we destroyed were the living bunkers. We had nowhere to hide during the incoming. The base looked weird with the bunkers down and gone. We hauled all the torn down material out to the garbage dump. They made the mistake of burning while we were still dumping. I saw trash catch fire to the material still on the back of the trucks. Some trucks were cut-off by fire, and had to drive through walls of fire to get out of the dump. Rounds and grenades were cooking-off in the dump, the whole time. This went on for several days. But, we did get revenge on the rats. There must have been hundreds or even thousands of them killed in that dump during this time. You would hear Marines yell and watch them chase rats around the dump, while trying to bayonet them. It was funny. (Ed. note: I can just see it now—some fifteen-plus years latter, a kid asks: "did you ever do hand-to-hand combat in Vietnam, daddy?" "You bet," the fat, balding, geezer says, takes a deep drag on his cigarette, shoots the smoke out the side of his mouth in a hiss, pauses, stares hard into his son's eyes, sips his beer, and continues, "I used my bayonet on him. Had to fight the SOB for over two hours, finally got the upper hand, and stabbed him to death. The sucker had buck teeth and long wiskers. Caught him trying to eat our garbage. He was a nasty, filthy little thing! Yep, boy, don't never mess with your old man, he's one, strak Marine." "But, pops," the kid says, "how come the dude just wounded you around your ankles?" "They was just a bunch a dirty, low fighters," his dad says, not missing a beat.)

Ron Taylor continues: In one of the past newsletters it was mentioned that some brooms were brought to Khe Sanh to clean it up when the place was to be abandoned. I'm here to tell you that it was true. On July 4th, when my unit pulled out, we had to form a line, and just like in the states, police-up the whole area, pick-up all the trash. We could not believe they were making us do this. When we boarded the trucks to leave, one of our guys, who had poured fuel on the trash, lit a match and touched it to the fuel soaked pile. The thing blew-up and burned him so bad that he had to be medevaced. We thought we were being hit by incoming and jumped out of the trucks.

We were surprised that we were not hit on the road outside of Khe Sanh since, just a few days earlier, the gooks were hitting the road one shell at a time, like they were registering their artillery. We also had all our grenades taken away before we left since someone had tear-gassed the Gunny's bunker. I was the only one on the convoy with any frags, because I hid mine until we left.

FRENCHY

by Ernie Spencer
D 1/26

Hey Frenchy! O.K., you win. We quit. You got us good. We admit it. Much as Delta guys hate to admit we were had, we do. I knew it had to be you behind it. Had to be, I got you last.

Remember that time I nailed you with a can of ham fried? We were up in the Ponderosa, early seige in 68. The day before Fish and seventeen other guys were out side

Cpl. Normand "French" Deschaine

jerking around, grab assing, and got nailed by a 61 mortar round. No K's, but that one pop from Charlie, and Delta gets 18 more purple shafts. Typical Delta. Remember Espy, screaming he thought his nuts were gone? Bloods did worry about the important things. Espy was o.k.,that time. You f-----s used to piss me off sometimes. I told you guys to stay in your bunkers. You guys just wouldn't listen to me. Charlie was not going to upset a Delta social hour. You guys liked grab-assing around with each other almost as much as kicking Charlies' ass.

What do I see the very next day? After all that screaming, yelling, and beating on you guys I did, who do I see the very next morning, sunning himself, like a prairie dog, outside, but you. I crawled back up the trenchline to my bunker, got a can of ham, and snuck back up on you. I raised up, aimed for your head, and let fly with all my might. Hit you flush on your shoulder, and you jerked like you were hit. Oh shit, I thought, after I saw your look. I went too far, this time. God, if looks could kill. I just stared you down and pointed to your bunker entrance. You crawled down in, glaring at me. For the next couple of days, I was real nervous. I thought you'd do me.

I had to do you Frenchy, it was my job. Sure. I loved you something special. You had married a Hawaii girl. "Hey, my kids are going to look just like you, skipper," you proudly said to me the first time we met. You were like that. That's why the guy from motor T loved you. You were always so open, caring, and giving of yourself, and your time. Jesus Christ, Frenchy, what a politician you would have made. Not like these slime balls we've had to endure since we got back. You were the type of politician we Nam guys would have picked, if we could. Maybe that's why we don't have any now, Frenchy. All our good ones, like you, died over there.

Remember how we used to shoot your tonk-gun at the ridge-line, on the west side of 861? You always whipped me. We laughed, bullshit, target shot. You were from Maine, but promised me you'd settle in Hawaii with me, after you got out. We were going to just kick back for awhile, in a cool shade, and see how many six-packs we could do.

We never got the chance. Two days after I got back, June 7, 68, you got it. I'm sorry I didn't go to your wake and funeral, Frenchy. I read your obituary, the open plea from your family, for me to come. They buried you in Hawaii, my home, but I couldn't go. I was in full blown denial then. What let me hang on, over in Nam, was the solemn promise I made, to myself, that I'd forget all the bad shit, when I left. I wanted it all to be over with, Frenchy. I thought I needed for it to be over. I know now, that it's never over with. It should not be. You guys are worth too much for us to ever forget. I know you understand, and that's why were talking now. I remember being so f-----g angry with you, at the time. Late into the night, I sat up, after my wife had gone to bed, with your obituary in my lap. "How dare you," I hissed at your picture on your obituary. "How dare you follow me home this way. "Damn you Frenchy," I said, tears streaming down my face. "I f-----g told you to stay down. I f-----g told you!" IFs don't mean shit, I know. But, you know I wish it could have been different. I know Frenchy, we're Marines, and that's our destiny. It was your turn, and not mine.

What a beauty of a chain jerking you gave me, Dick Grenat and Fish. Chick Kelly also went with us from the reunion to the Wall. Remember, Chick? It was Father Kelly when you knew him. I think he might have done the last rites on you and the other guys, that day you folks got hit. Hannah and his radioman. Espy and Jack. Plus a ton of WIAs. None of these million dollar wounds either. Delta guys were going out gunshot, period. All up close, and personal.

Dick told me about it, the fight. Dick put it to me in simple Delta terms. "It got real hot and heavy, skip. We

TRIBUTE AND TRIBULATION KHE SANH REMEMBERED

To the men who scaled their mountains
and Seized that far flung plateau,
To the men that held the arena
Against the best the enemy could throw.

Who walked the jungle covered valleys
And waded the leach laden streams;
Who moved through the green shrouded alleys,
Till their muscles cramped and screamed.

To those who fell wounded and bleeding,
Yet rose to fight on 'til the end.
To those who fell wounded and bleeding,
Never to rise up again.

To our comrades who carried the rifle;
Who fired both cannon and gun.
To those that supplied and fought with us
We knew that they'd never run.

To the pilots who flew the fast movers,
And herded choppers all over the sky.
Who calmly watched the green tracers
As they went arching and howling by.

To Gentleman Jim, our commander,
And Jacques, Claire, Morris and Chief.
To Snake, Mike, Chaves and Spencer,
And other heroes we respect and keep.

To Stubbe, our brave navy chaplain,
Who interceded for us as our link.
And to DeMaggd, our battalion surgeon,
Whose skilled hand drew us back from the brink.

To Blanchfield, and our navy corpsmen,
The finest and most courageous of all;
Who daily and nightly fought to reach us,
Refusing to succumb to the law.

So now as we move far from the valley,
And the years march away to the fore.
We and our families remember,
All those who made it happen; and more.

was rockin' 'n rollin', with hot lead flyin' everywhere. Jets came in and bombed, right on top of us." How come Dick's got that Southern accent when he's from Indiana? You know Frenchy, when I think about how much gun-time, you and the Delta guys did, and I listen to some of those World War Two guys, talk their macho bullshit, I go crazy.

I was the one, who told Dick you had died, eighteen years after the fact. Grenat was with rockets and was right behind your squad, when you went down. Charlie hit you first, dead on. You clown, laughing and joking with the guys when they lifted you on the medevac chopper. Chest shot, and you're still screwing around. You were macho, Frenchy. That's why Dick and the guys didn't think you died. Somehow, someway, you just suddenly died a couple of days latter. Fitz told me about it when I went to see him at Trippler Hospital on Oahu, a couple of weeks after the fight. Fitz still has a lot of pain about all you guys going down. I saw him again, for the first time in 22 years, at the reunion in Nashville.

The first hint you give, was when that guy from motor T came up to me at the reunion and asked if I knew, a Norman Deschaine. Your ol' sensitive skipper, goes: "Yeah, he's dead." I thought the poor guy was going to faint. Dick latched on to him and filled him in on what had happened that day you got it. This guy drove alone from Nebraska to Nashville just on the odd chance that he might meet you. He said that you were the greatest guy he'd ever met. Remember how motor T was right next to our bunkers during the siege? You left a hell of an impression on him, Frenchy.

You know my love of rain as a metaphor, and you hit us with rain all the way to D.C. It was beautiful. The storms locked the four of us in as we journeyed to you, washing and splashing around us. Tears, you shed, so that we would not have to. You took most of our tears. You wanted our undivided attention for what you had planned.

What a time we had—me, Fish, Dick and Chick in Fish's motor home. You know Dick and Fish, but what's Chick like? I guess Fish said it best. He was filling the gas-tank, during one of our stops. Fish says to me, "Holy shit, skippah, can you believe dis guy? I used to go to confession to dis guy, and now he's asking me about broads?" God, we laughed and reminisced on that drive up to you. We had no idea we were being set up.

The storms lifted just as we pulled into D.C. Perfect timing. It was 0130 hours. All the turistas were in bed. It was hot, still, and sticky, just like back there. You hit us good Frenchy. Fish has been coming to say hi and be with Jack since the wall opened. All these years, all this time, and you stayed hidden on the same panel. You're right above Espy, and Fish missed you. "Look at this, skip!," Dick said, when he noticed your name. He had looked at the pictures of your panel Fish sent him, and only noticed Jack and Espy, before. Now, your name bloomed, new, and fresh, right before our eyes, as we stood there, and all saw you for the very first time. Chuck Norris my ass, you're the star, Frenchy.

We went back in the trees, towards the reflecting pools afterwards, and sat L.P. for you guys. We watched the sun come up. Remember that special feeling we used to get when we went on those long patrols out in the jungle around Khe Sanh? How we'd watch the sun come up, after going from pitch black, still and mosquitoes to morning with a slight breeze? Just another Delta day. We'd saddle up and go get 'em again. F--- John Wayne.

I am really impressed by the show you put on for us, hiding all these years on the WALL like that. Outf—ing-standing! Dick, Fish and Chick were also profoundly moved. So, I'm calling it quits. You win, Frenchy. Hell bro, I can't top your act—EVER.

From: Michael O'Hara
Vice President Elect

I am looking for a "few good men" and women to help establish a nationwide network of volunteers within our ranks. I need people from each state to step forward and help.

I have been duly appointed by our President, Ken Penn, to set up Regional (each time zone) State and District Coordinators to personally get "in touch" and keep "in touch" with each member in your state or district. I have recently done this in my home state of Indiana and found it to be very rewarding. I recently

Where Do We Go From Here

Our reunion in D.C. this past July blew me away. The reunion, going to the Wall together, was like being back at Khe Sanh. What was missing was the fear and trauma. It was all so...positive. Ken and Bernice did a Big-Time Reunion essentially alone. To pull off what they did is nothing short of a miracle. Four of us contracted with National Geographic Society to film the reunion. National Geographic loved it. The piece aired on TBS, November 14. Though only a couple of minutes of the 12 hours that we filmed were used, the producers and editors at National Geographic Society praised the power of our reunion story. They regret not being able to use more of the footage. We are in the process of editing and producing our own version of the reunion. Johnny Balanco is putting it together. We'll donate the video sales proceeds from our version to the Khe Sanh Vets to be used for further artistic projects. We have a brother on Death Row out here in California who should have his story told. His story, I feel, should be on film. Dare I dream? Speaking of dreaming...guilty, your honor. You'll notice we're back to the same format that we started with last fall. I wish I could have done more color, but budgets and reality dictate otherwise.

We decided to get real and stop harping on money. The gods will decide. But, please donate what you can (the flyer is on the last page.) Our new president, Ken Penn, as well as Ray Stubbe feel very strongly about holding onto members. It has been and will continue to be our policy to seek new members via any means. If anyone knows of someone who served at, over, or around Khe Sanh between 1961 and 1971, and that person is not on our roster, please let Ray know. We don't ask members to join. We send them the roster, a few back issues, and add them to our listing. We will do what we have to do to not lose track of any members.

If anyone knows of a sugardaddy who might be interested in corporate sponsorship or advertising, please let us know. If we could get a couple of corporate sponsors to buy color ad space, we could fund a more professional looking magazine. We have the content.

Speaking of content, you will notice that the level of dialogue is becoming more personal. There are statements made in this issue that might well challenge your agenda and beliefs. To preserve the Khe Sanh story, whatever it its, we must allow all members and their families free and uncensored access to our magazine. I feel no obligation, however, to print the work or letters of non-members.

I'm sorry that I have not personally responded to all the letters sent me as editor. Excuses are like backsides, everyone's got one, but I had to budget my time. If I plan to use your letter and no clarification is needed, I often do not acknowledge before it appears in the publication. I'm backed up with excellent poetry and memoirs which I hope to give more space in the next issue. The historical Sea Tiger and Stars and Stripes pieces we ran in the Fall '92 issue generated great interest. When we can, I hope to do more of them.

Dear Ernie,

With reference to our telephone conversation on March 29th. It was a pleasure talking to you. I certainly appreciated the information concerning the newsletter and the reunion. I have made reservations at the Holiday Inn-Georgetown and my wife and I will be attending the reunion.

I noticed that the Fall issue of the newsletter mentioned the possibility of a trip back to Khe Sanh. I am enclosing an article that appeared in the April issue of "Travel & Leisure" concerning travel to Vietnam, including a day trip to Khe Sanh. I would be very interested in making such a trip with the Brothers (if my "employer" will allow it). Please keep me informed of developments and let me know if I can be of assistance in any way.

Looking forward to seeing you and the Brothers at the reunion.

Jack H. Howe
3/26 (Dec 67-Dec 68)

Dear Ernie,

This is just a short note from a fellow Marine who served in support of you fellows taking the brunt of the action at Khe Sanh in February 1968. I was with India Company, 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines, running interdiction patrols and convoy security for Khe Sanh. Our outfit is the one that disbanded the base in late June and July. We were kept busy fighting off the rats so kindly left behind for us by our predecessors (they proved to be a worthy adversary), while we were trying to avoid the sampling of rockets and artillery that the NVA had saved just for us. It was rather disheartening trying to avoid the incoming while we were destroying the bunkers and trenches designed to protect us from that very thing; we were running out of places to hide fast!

The one thing that bothers me is that I have been unable to locate anything recognizing us for having participated in the events that took place at or around the base, even though we received Commendations for our operation there. We were not as significant as those of you that endured those 77 days of misery, however, we were there and would enjoy and greatly appreciate it it you could possibly make some mention of it in your next edition. I'm sure my Brothers and yours of "I" 3/9 would appreciate the recognition.

I appreciate the effort of you and your courageous comrades while defending Khe Sanh and would be honored if you would allow us to become part of your elite group.

I have sent a check for the membership dues and am looking forward to your next edition.

Dear Mr Maves,

I am in receipt of the dues notice for The Khe Sanh Veteran and am returning the form with a change of address. Also, I felt that you should be made aware of my current situation.

I cannot afford to send any money because I do not have any. For the past 17 years I have been in prison serving a life sentence. If I could send something, I certainly would. However, I have nothing to give.

If I cannot be carried in the organization any longer I will understand, as it is not the first time I will have been dropped from a vets group because I have no money or because I am in prison. I do not mean any disrespect whatsoever. I am merely explaining that I will understand.

When and if I ever come into some money, I will send a donation, but this is merely speculative on my part, based on the total lack of family or resources.

Thank you for your time and please wish everyone at the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc, including their families, a Merry Christmas and joyous New Year filled with peace and happiness.

Dear Ernie,

Congratulations on producing a truly fantastic newsletter that all Khe Sanh vets can be very proud of. Enclosed please find a copy of some cartoons that I produced for my local VVA Chapter a few years ago. I also have slides that were taken at Camp Evans, Dong Ha, Khe Sanh Combat Base and Hill 881S trenchline (including the American flag flying on top of the hill). As you may know, I was the Corpsman for 3rd Plt. India 3/26. I was with 3/26 from November 67 to June 68 (Khe Sanh, Perfume River Bridge and Patrols, and Leech Valley outside of Da Nang). I also have many slides of my second six months at Third Med Battalion, Phu Bai and Quang Tri, China Beach in-country R & R and Spooky, (C-47 gun ship in its revetment in Da Nang).

Please feel free to request any cartoon and I will do the original in a camera-ready format for your use, and if you send me some experiences of others, I can scribble them into a cartoon as I did for Ray Stubbe. I'm not a good artist and I'm glad I didn't need to make a living from it, but I did these type of cartoons on Hill 881S and hung them across from the trenchline shitter along with my daily commentary.

I am willing to share all my photos and memories. Most are already in the Marine Corps

Dear Mr Husted,

I've gained a lot of respect for, and made many friends with, the men who served at Khe Sanh. My book opened doors I didn't even know were there, so I'd like very much to stay in touch through the newsletter.

Please change my address to reflect the Leland P.O. Box as indicated below.

Many thanks.

Dear Ernie,

I am a very recent member of the Khe Sanh Vets organization. In fact, so recent that my first year's membership fee is enclosed. I was squad leader of 2nd Squad, 3rd Platoon, Foxtrot Co. 2/26, when we arrived in early January 1968. As I recall, my Platoon leader was Lt. Reardon. I am having a lot of trouble remembering a lot of the guys I served with in 3rd Platoon, Foxtrot. I do remember O.D. (Butch) Karter of Atlanta. We are still in contact on an annual basis. I also recall Corporal Rudy Garza. I was only at Khe Sanh until January 26th. I was due to rotate out on that day. I remember flying out on a C-123 transport, flown by Koreans I think, and I remember we had to jump on as the plane hardly stopped. As we took off, shells were hitting the airstrip only 50 meters behind us.

I was relieved to get out, but I did feel like I was abandoning my squad. I could smell death among them. I remember seeing Captain Divelbiss as I was leaving the field. I was his company driver back in Phu Bai, Sep-Oct '67. He was shot sometime during that span of time and he was returning to the field as I was leaving. I see in Ray Stubbe's book that Captain Divelbiss got into a heap of shit on the 7th April 1968. I would like to hear from anyone who was there (Hill 558) on April 5-8. Sorry I had to leave you there guys, I really wanted to come back and help. Did anyone else feel as guilty as I did about leaving?

I am a Baptist Minister and grandfather now, and I see those days from a very different perspective. But through it all, I AM STILL A MARINE.

God Bless my fellow Marines

Dear Ernie,

Thank you for your effort in editing the newsletter. I enjoy it thoroughly. I've enclosed an essay I wrote recently. You're welcome to publish it if you like it. I'm working on a collection of essays for possible publication.

I was a Special Forces Medic at FOB 3 during the Siege. I'm sure you'll understand when I say the experience was a pivotal one in my life. I'm currently working as a Registered Nurse in the Emergency Room of our local hospital and enjoying my work.

Dear Mr Maves,

I've been receiving copies of your newsletter and have enjoyed reading about Khe Sanh and old friends.

I'm enclosing my first dues for 1993 and an additional $15.00 since I think I first received your newsletter last year. Sorry to be so late. Keep up the good work.

Respectfully yours,

Dear Ernie,

Enclosed is a list of paid life members we should be working on getting cards made for — something that won't too rapidly fall apart in the wallet.

The names listed below* have volunteered to be our steering or advisory committee for whatever they may be needed for in regard to reunions, locations, planning or whatever. They all approached me at the reunion and offered their services, this would be a good opportunity to get some more people actively involved. Each one of these guys would be getting feedback from their area of the country.

I'm also enclosing some mail that came with the checks for you and some general interest items. My transfer of funds from Washington DC to Bank One here in Wisconsin is in the process and should be done any day now. Will be getting back to you again shortly Ernie, meanwhile, take care.

Dear Khe Sanh Vets,

Last December, after seeing your ad for the 25 year Tet Offensive commemorative license plate in the DuPage County Chapter of VietNow's newsletter, I ordered the plate. Since it was received, I have been displaying it on the front of my car, since the license plate was torn (I have a replacement on order).

I was unable to attend the 25 year reunion in Chicago because of a sales meeting in Miami Beach, but have been proud to display the commemorative license plate.

The other day, after working all day in Peoria, (I sell hospital beds all over Central Illinois), I was driving back to my apartment when I noticed a pink piece of paper stuck under the windshield wiper of my car. It was the flap from a pink envelope. Someone had apparently noticed the license plate and had taken the time to write the note. I am attaching a photocopy of both sides of the envelope but, in case it is hard to read, I also include a transcription on this page:

"Just wanted you to know — I feel this country really gave the Vets a hard time when you returned, taking their animosity of war out on the Vets instead of embracing the Vets for surviving a war of animosity. Although it was a long time ago and I was just a kid, I still thank the Lord for this country I live in and especially for the men and women who served. THANK YOU!"

As a Vietnam Veteran and a survivor of Tet, I accepted this note with gratitude and am passing it along to you in hopes you will share it with others. Often, Vietnam Veterans are overlooked or shown in a bad light. It is heartening when we realize that there are people out there who care, even if they don't remember.

We should never forget. Thanks again for making the license plate available.

Dear Ernie,

I have been getting the magazine and newsletter for a couple of years. I signed up for The Khe Sanh Veteran at 3rd Marine Div. reunion in Tampa, Florida. I served with Bravo, 1st Bn, 4th MAR, 3rd MAR Div during 1967. I am sure my 12 months in the DMZ were in the Khe Sanh valley. We were all over.

I work as a Counselor at the Vet Center in White Plains, New York. I was wounded twice and have the Silver Star for action on October 27th, 1967 on Operation Granite.

I am a member of DAV (Life); VFW (Life); Mar. Corp League (Life); Order P.H. (Life) and 3rd MAR. Div. Assc. (Life). I think the reason people don't join organizations like yours is because we live in difficult times. Some people can, some can't. We get copies of your newsletter at our Center and it is displayed for all the Vets.

I am enclosing my annual dues. Thanks.

Dear Ernie,

I had to drop you a line and tell you what a great Khe Sanh Veteran issue you just put out. It sure has come a long way and you are doing a good job. I enjoyed the Chronology and the list of KIA's to look up people.

One thing that I can't understand is that in all the books I've read and even this Chronology, it says that Khe Sanh was abandoned by the end of June and for sure by July 2nd. I find that odd because my unit pulled out of Khe Sanh on July 4th and there were still Marines there then.

I didn't know that the reporter leaked news that the base was to be abandoned. We did notice the increase in incoming but thought it was because we had so many working parties above ground tearing down the bunkers. Some of the first bunkers we tore down were our living bunkers. We spent all of our time running for cover.

Take care and keep up the good work.

Dear Ernie,

I returned yesterday from the wonderful 1993 Reunion "25 years after the siege". I cannot stop thinking about the people and events of the past six days nor can I stop thinking of the people and events 25 years ago. Remembrances, some good and some bad, some ignored and some buried deep in my subconscious have flooded my mind. This was the first veteran gathering I have been involved with and, frankly, I was apprehensive about attending. However, I found the experience to be the most therapeutic and emotionally rewarding experience of my past 25 years.

I met people that I had not seen or spoken with in 25 years. I discovered some persons that I had thought made it out had not, but conversely, I discovered some that I thought had not made it actually did survive. I was able to put faces on people that, 25 years ago, were only a radio call sign to me.

I discovered that everyone is carrying around "baggage" from the war. I further discovered that everyone I had contact with, no matter what they had sacrificed at the time, felt that they should have or could have done more. An incredible characteristic of Marines, or Khe Sanh Marines.

It was an honour meeting you, and I thank you, Ray, Earle, Ernie (H), Ken and Bernice, and the many others for your foresight in identifying the need

Dear Sirs,

I saw your advertisement in the Veterans' magazine and I am very interested in joining. I am not a Veteran myself but I am an associate member of the VVA, Chapter 500 in Sacramento. I originally joined the VVA in August 1992. I had an uncle that was killed in Quang Tri on October 5th, 1967. His name and organization was L/Cpl Danny Elie Reid, USMC, H&S CO., 3rd BN, 9th MAR, 3rd MAR DIV (REIN) FMF. I have been trying to locate other people who might have known him over there. I do have a list of names of people who possibly might have known him: Kenneth Birdsong, Frank Breth, Bill Dancy, Harry Hutchinson, Dennis McLean, Toby Hooten and Charles Tisby.

I have contacted the In Touch program and sent them all of the information needed. I have also placed a locator message in The Veteran. I just decided to write to your organization so as to "broaden my horizon" so to speak. I figured the more organizations I contact, the better chance I have of finding someone who knew my uncle.

I don't know if your organization accepts associate members like the VVA does, but I would be interested in joining if you do. This really means a lot to me. Thank you for taking the time to read my letter. I look forward to hearing from you. By the way, it may be 25 years late, but 'Welcome Home'.

Dear Ernie,

You don't know me but I just wanted to write and say "thanks" for what you did in Vietnam. It's a shame that it's taken so long for people to recognize Vietnam vets.

Until my husband received a thank you letter recently, I've always said thanks, but in a different way. I've done volunteer work at the Vet Center and I've worked at a Vietnam Veterans Reunion. I spoke to a lot of guys at the reunions and told them how I felt about what they did. It made me feel good to finally have a chance to say thanks.

Jack served in Da Nang in 1971-72. He was in Recreations for 6 months then was a door gunner for 4 months. The Army asked the Air Force for volunteers for door gunners and he went. He spent 21 years in the Air Force and retired in 1981.

I've decided to write to as many Vietnam Vets as possible to thank them. It will take quite a while, but it's worth it. I got your name from Manuel Babbitt and the VVA Directory. I would like to hear from you about your tour, if you're able to talk about it. Even my husband of 4 years still has trouble talking about some of it.

Guess I'll close for now.

Take care.

Hello Ernie,

How are things with you and yours? Fine I hope. This letter leaves us well. We have some shitty problems but we can handle them. Sorry I didn't make the DC thing — maybe next time.

Colonel Pipes called me and informed me that you requested a photo for film dubbing. I'll send you two of them. Hope you can use them. The newsletter is outstanding — keep up the good work and give 'em hell! Tell John Balanco I said hello when you see him and pass my best on to all our Brothers.

Dear Ernie,

I was assigned to VMO-2 and flew UH1E and 01B aircraft in I Corp from April '65 thru April '66. I also "drove" C-130's in-country, while TAD to VMGR-152 from my Stateside squadron VMGR-352, October '66 thru September '68. Our mission and operations took me into and around Khe Sanh during that 31/2 year period.

I read the Khe Sanh Chronology, which appeared in the Spring 1993 issue, with great interest. It brought back many memories of flying UH1E's in and around Khe Sanh plus "Gunship Escort" for ARVN (Vietnamese) H-34 aircraft into Laos in support of Operation Shining Brass further South. It also reminded me of operating C-130's in and out of the very short airstrip on that mountain top and of the airdrops (parachute) to resupply the folks cut off near Lang Vei.

It was when I reached the Honor Roll that things went into the toilet for me. I read the names of several friends and past squadron mates that I knew had "bought it" at Khe Sanh but I was both shocked and saddened to see the name of an old friend of mine on page 39.

Captain Lufkin Scott Sharp and I were room-mates while undergoing flight training as Marine Aviation Cadets at Naval Air Station Whiting Field, Florida in 1962. I was not aware that Scott had been killed and I am interested in hearing from anyone that can fill me in on the circumstances of his death on 19th June 1968 while he was assigned to HMM-161.

Also, I believe that the USMC C-130 of VMGR-152 that crashed on 10th February 1968 was piloted by Khe Sanh Vet member Harry Wildfang. My understanding is that they had taken some hits while airborne and were on fire during the forced emergency landing. The fire was being fed by a damaged fuel bladder that was being carried in the cargo compartment. Upon landing, the props were "reversed" causing the loose fuel to unavoidably spill forward, burning most of the crew and killing Flight Engineer MSGT John D'Adamo and also L/Cpl Jerry Ferren.

Ernie, thank you again for enlisting me into the Khe Sanh Vets. I am proud to have served with all of our Vietnam veteran brothers and sisters and I take great pride in once again being associated with such distinguished Americans.

Dear Ernie,

Congratulations on a great edition of The Khe Sanh Veteran. You and Ray Stubbe are the greatest! Thank you for reminding us all where we came from 25 years ago.

This year, I celebrated the 25th anniversary of getting wounded outside Khe Sanh on April 8th — the day the Siege was broken by my unit, the 1st Air Cavalry Division. I have had a strong identification with all the veterans of Khe Sanh ever since. You are the best. Let me know how I can ever help in any way.

I won't be making the reunion but would like to contribute a few bucks to the cause. Please do something special with the enclosed.

Dear Mr Maves,

Hi! Enclosed is a check for regular membership, including a small donation. John has missed several reunions since he started working in Saudi Arabia. I expect him to be home the third week of September, around his birthday.

John has received many calls while he's been away working and I've had the pleasure of talking to John's Marine comrades. Some day, I hope to meet you all. I wish we could have celebrated with you good people at the 25th Reunion in Washington D.C.

I would like to share my thoughts about the most recent issue of The Khe Sanh Veteran. While reading the summer issue, I realized how important this 25th anniversary was for all who served at Khe Sanh. Of course, I'm especially proud you chose John's photo for its cover! I think the soldiers picture uniquely honors those faces known and unknown and gives the recognition these "great heroes" deserve!

I visualize a friend, a father, a brother, a husband, a lover. I believe most people can make a connection with the soldier. Thank you for allowing me to share my opinion.

In closing, this and all issues are very interesting and thought provoking. I enjoy reading The Khe Sanh Veteran. Where can I contact Campbell Buttry for a larger photo to frame?

Sincerely,
Beverley Bersano

Dear Ernie,

I was astounded and amazed when a retired Master Gunnery Sergeant gave me a copy of your newsletter and I learned for the first time of the existence of your organization. Few of the Vets I know in the St Petersburg area are aware of your existence and we will try to get the word out as much as possible.

It was interesting to read the membership rolls and see a lot of the names from the past, learning for the first time that they survived Vietnam and got home. I was pleased to see the name of John Cargile, who was acting Commander of Delta Company and later became Commander of C Co, 1/9. He was a fine officer and it's good he made it. I also noticed Bill Gessner, who was an outstanding medic attached to D Co. and it is my understanding he later became an officer in the Army.

I noticed that some of the casualty figures did not appear to be the same as we were told during the actions taking place, but I guess that sort of thing happens when a variety of organizations are reporting the same incidents. It was my belief that on 16 April 1968, 1/9 took considerably more than the 17 WIA not evacuated and the 15 WIA who were evacuated, but sometimes I guess memory does not always match reality.

I look forward to receiving your next issue and hope to see articles and updates on more of the personnel with whom I served while a Scout with 1/9.

Sincerely,
Carey McGiffin

Dear Mr Spencer,

I must tell you first off that I did not send my dues after seeing the Spring issue of The Khe Sanh Veteran. I had been told of your magazine a few months before it came out, so I sent you A LOT of stuff, and had not heard anything, then I got the Spring issue — nothing but names and places, BUT I have just received the Summer issue and was blown away by the intimacy of the letters and all the memories (good and bad) that it brought about. I must say that the 3 poems you printed were great, especially when two of them were mine! ("Then" and "The Vets Hospital"). You've got my check — it's enclosed. I don't know if you want me to send more, or if you copied some of the other stuff?

Dear Ernie,

Like so many Khe Sanh vets, I feel ashamed that I have gotten behind in my dues. Just don't tell Ken Pipes or he'll probably fly here to Springfield IL and kick my ass (Ed: Your secret's safe with me..)

I was sure wishing I could have made it to the Washington D.C. reunion but I just made a new job change in May of this year.

Dear Ernie,

Thanks for the flick and the note. It's like I told you guys in D.C., whenever I go to my mailbox and there's something there from you guys I am like the cow that jumped over the moon.

I just received info from Ray on the reunion highlights. I know our next newsletter will be "atomic". I'll sell pencils on the corner if that's what it takes! Hang tough, we will make it.

I made a lot of new friends in D.C. and have found 4 new members since returning home. One more from Bravo ha ha!

I wrote Dorothy Norman and have received a warm card in return.

Still, it is you, Jake and Johnny Balanco who I hold so dear to my heart. No man could ask for better friends. Here at my house it is pouring down outside — rain and foggy. Sound familiar? That is why I chose to write to you today.

These are days we stop and think, of other times in a distant place and as I write these words in ink, I hope a smile is on your face.

Have a nice day.

Dear Ernie,

While reading Volume 1:3 Summer 1993 of The Khe Sanh Veteran, I came upon an article "Fireteam Plus One" written by a former platoon member with India 3/26. I was in the first squad.

My request to you is that you forward the enclosed letter to Mike. I have not had any knowledge of his condition or whereabouts since he was wounded on 10th September 1967, then medevaced. This event occurred during Operation Kingfisher, the statistics of which I never acquired. I was the point-man on the morning the operation started. My squad leader was the first KIA, we walked into a horse-show ambush. This ambush should not have happened. Before it was set off, I had radioed to my squad leader that NVA were in the area and had left signs that they were right in front of us. I was told "keep going, keep going". Finally, my squad leader came up to the point to see what I had been relaying to him. He was shot by automatic fire which was the onset of the ambush, and Operation Kingfisher was underway.

After all this time, (from Nam until now), I am just starting my healing process. This has happened because I read The Khe Sanh Veteran.

Dear Ernie,

I want to thank you for sending me Sam Letbetter's letter. I will definitely write to him. I am, however, extremely sorry to hear of his present circumstances.

Your letter arrived at a time when I was debating when I should contact you. I just couldn't bring myself to address the situation.

My friend, Joseph Wrobleski, died approximately 2 weeks ago. He served with M and H&S 3/26 for 18 months in Nam. He was with 3/26 for the Siege and the battle around Con Thien.

For professional reasons he had changed his name to Chuck Everst, but I always called him Ski. Even when he called me at work the messages always said 'Ski called'.

It is with an extremely heavy heart that I ask that Joseph Wrobleski be listed as a deceased comrade. Also, that the name Chuck Everst be removed from our roster. No one from the Corp has a clue who Chuck Everst is. I am positive more than one will remember Joe "Ski" Wrobleski.

Thank you for the work you are doing. It is appreciated by many of us.

Dear Ernie,

Just a short note to thank you for sending me your book. The sad part is that the administration won't let me have it. The policy here is that any book coming in must be sent either from the publisher or directly from a book store. It can't come in from a private residence.

I have talked to the Security Captain and what he suggested was to have it sent back to you at your address and ask that the next time you are in a national chain book store (like in a mall), to give it to them and see if they would send it in as if you had just bought it there. It should then be allowed in without any problem. Sounds strange I know, but then the Department of Corrections' rules aren't meant to make any sense, they're just meant to cause aggravation and humiliation. It normally takes about a week to ship something out of here so you should get the book back pretty soon. I'd really appreciate it if you could get a book store to send it back to me.

I am trying to acquire several books from Vietnam authors to start building up a small library for the Vets in here through our Vietnam Veterans PTSD group. We are trying to start a group of incarcerated Vietnam Vets which in addition to offering PTSD treatment, will also help Vets who are going to be getting out soon by pooling our job knowledge for employment help, disability claim preparation and other positive and constructive efforts. We will also be throwing a little in the kitty so that a guy gets a little kick from us when he leaves. When you get out of here, you are only given $100 from the prison; that doesn't even buy a guy a set of clothes to wear for a job interview, or buy groceries, let alone pay for a roof over your head until you get a job. We have decided to put some money aside to help our own when the time comes and they need it. We would also use it for other things, like flowers for a death in the family, emergency at home, etc. We, as Vietnam Veterans, have been looked at like crazies for a long time, most of you out there know how that goes. Imagine being a Vet coming out of prison. A convict who is also a Vet is considered not only a crook, but a crazy crook, and our group has decided to see if we can start some kind of positive action, both here and in the public community, to attempt to start effecting a change. I myself donate a portion of each mirror I do to the kitty and the starting of the Vet library was my idea.

Other things we are tossing around are a monument here. Doing talks and speeches on Veterans in trouble to schools, groups, social organizations, from first hand knowledge. We, of course, can't leave the prison, but have kicked around the idea of video tape. We would welcome any suggestions that you or any other members may have as right now, this is all still in the planning stage and we need ideas to bat around in order to decide on one or two constructive directions in which to head. It also has to meet the approval of the prison administration, so getting us all together to dig a tunnel is out — so is learning to fly helicopters or entering shooting contests!

Running out of paper here so I'll let you go. Just wanted to warn you about the book and thank you again.

Dear Ernie & Bros.,

It's been almost three weeks since I left you all in Washington and even though I've had some depression and nightmares after leaving my friends, I wouldn't trade my 4 days with you people for anything in the world. My daughter was playing a softball tournament in Boulder Co. that weekend and I missed it to see you.

I am going to the Topeka KS. VA PTSD Ward next Wednesday, 28th July, and I just had to write to thank everyone who had a part in making the reunion a reality. And a special thanks to Gunny Penn! That lady is the greatest and helped me at The Wall. My biggest regret of the weekend was not having more Seabees and Recon people there. If it hadn't been for this reunion, I may never have gotten up the nerve to go to The Wall, and I have wanted to go ever since I found out about it, but I always came up with some excuse not to go, money, time, whatever.

I also found people there who, like me, keep seeing the faces of lost Brothers but can't remember names. It has helped to know that I am not alone with this problem but it doesn't stop the film from running night after night. I may never know the names and may never lose this emptiness I feel inside, but I found friendship and love that I have missed for 25 years.

Captain Pipes and 1/26 Thursday, in the Hall taking pictures. A hell of a racket you set up! I woke up and knew it was Marines or Seabees. I opened my door and it was Marines, wives taking pictures, I didn't know what to say! But Capt Pipes asked me my name, etc., and I replied "Seabees 301". I will never forget his hug and words, that we Seabees were more Marine than the Marines! Thanks Captain: I have always thought of myself as a Marine, not a Squid, your words continued on page 10 expanded my chest and head size and my love of the Marines!

My closest friends next to Seabees were Recon Marines and Wenger (our yeomen at Khe Sanh), and I found B-Recon and Lost Brothers. I love you guys and will never forget you. Thanks for being there.

Bagpipes at Arlington, in The Bar and at The Wall, chills from head to foot, I cried then and even now remembering that sound. There is no comparison of bugle to bagpipe and both bring tears, but the pipes moved something inside me and I thank Jim Taylor and hope to hear him play again. Thanks Bro!

I am a loner, I don't get close to people and I have to make myself civil in my everyday dealings with people, but that weekend I found myself talking to Brothers and not feeling hostile. I hope to make another reunion and renew friendships and spend more time talking.

Before I close, I want to thank you Ernie for the hard work you put in on The Khe Sanh Veteran. I wished we could have sat down and talked, gone through my pictures and other works, but you were so busy and had so many people to talk to. I hope you got to enjoy some of those 4 days!

And one last time — thank you, Bernice Penn!

Always Forever,

Skipper,

Thanks for the picture of us in front of the "Three Fighting Men". Reading your book has brought back many memories of the Patrol you wrote about. I remember grab-assing and laughing and looking you in the eyes as we crossed the stream that night heading back to base. I guess we were as pissed as you were. We wanted a fight and didn't give a shit. We knew you were pissed — we all were.

The reunion for my wife and I will be treasured in our hearts. It was our first, as it was for many who attended, and was very special. God, how I missed you all through the years. If I keep writing I'll start crying, for my PTSD pain is still very much with me.

My Dearest Friend,

I'm finally home and made time to get you off a few lines. I really appreciate the photos and your thoughtfulness in sending them.

As we discussed, I am still sorting through the 4th July weekend — what a fabulous 4 or 5 days — all supercharged with emotions. I was at ease with my best friends with me — Sharon, you, Mike, the Snake, and the guys of the late companies "B" and "D". What a time!

I suppose what surprised me more than anything was Sharon: First because she said she wanted to go to the reunion with me and second, that she had a great time and felt at home with all the guys. Each one treated her with a tenderness and softness that still brings tears to my eyes when I think of it. The flowers that she got the night of the "guide on" was so special to her. She is now asking and discussing going to the next reunion.

Ernie, I'll close for now. Thanks for everything — the reunion, the photos, the companionship, the support, but most of all for being a close friend and a shining beacon in the darkness.

We all send our love.

Ken, Sharon & the boys

P.S. Got a card from, and sent a letter to, Gil Wall.

Dear Mr Stubbe,

I got your name and address from a mutual friend, Mr Tom Bystrom of Tower, MN. It is with sadness that I inform you of the death of Tom last November 21st, 1992, in a one vehicle rollover. Tommy was a true friend and an inspiration to all who knew him. I and my family sure do miss him. Tommy told me about you and your presence at Khe Sanh. He also turned me onto your book. Well done.

Several months before Tommy's death, he asked me to write a song about the Siege you all lived through. (I'm a chimney sweeper by trade/songwriter by vocation). He told me there was a Khe Sanh Survivors Association (?) that was tentatively planning on a reunion in Washinton D.C. this coming summer, or perhaps it was the 3rd Marine Div. Association (I'm Army, so please forgive my ignorance of Marine designations!). Anyway, he and I talked about attending together. He was so taken with the song I wrote he wanted to share it with his Brothers. I am enclosing the lyric sheet. You may reprint it if you so desire. I also have a cassette recording of the song plus several others I have written about that period in our history. It's yours for the asking.

Tommy mentioned some of you were working with the Bru back in Vietnam and he himself was dreaming of going back to help. Is there anything I can do in his memory?

Yours in Christ,
Paul Maki

Dear Ernie,

The Summer '93 issue of The Khe Sanh Veteran is great! Well done — much to think about and remember, and thanks to your powerful endorsements of my work. I fully expect to be up to my ears in iron before long. That's just the way I like it. I deeply appreciate what you are doing, not just for myself, but for all the guys.

I'll be moving back up to Siskiyou County either the 1st August or 1st September — at this time I'm not sure which. Last month I got permission to put one of our Khe Sanh sculptures at the LMSG, but first they want me to do one called "Hot LZ" involving two helicopters — a Huey on the ground and a Cobra in the air — plus 9 figures (2 pilots, 2 co-pilots, 1 door gunner, 1 crew chief and 3 grunts). The model for that one is nearing completion.

Here's a little helicopter story. Sometime during the summer of '68, we were flown somewhere to begin a sweep and landed on a bombed-off hilltop. The LZ was not contested. I remember jumping out, moving out from under the propwash and sitting down on a rock to check out the countryside. Looking at the ground between my feet I noticed a ladies high school ring just resting there in the dirt. It was from Kailua High School, 1968, had a blue stone with a surfer riding a wave and initials inside the band. I put the ring in my pocket and we moved off the hill. I still have it.

I enjoyed the recent issue of The Khe Sanh Veteran very much. It's very professional.

I took a tour to Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos in January-February of this year. We (14 of us) flew to Da Nang, got a bus up to Hue then went back to Da Nang. We were scheduled to fly to Nha Trang but the only plane for that flight had been wrecked and so we went by bus (no shock absorbers) down Route 1 with pot holes the size of craters now "surfaced" with crushed rock!

The countryside was green and lush and there were beautiful vegetable gardens and paddies. Saigon was as expected; too much traffic, beggars, dirty, etc. From the remarks of one of the others in the group who had had a regiment at Da Nang in '68-'69, the cities were worse now than during the fighting. Nothing had been rebuilt, hotels didn't have heating (it was cold in Hanoi, Dalat and Hue) or hot water. I didn't see Khe Sanh but I thought of all you men when we were near there.

On the whole the visit was interesting, but for us "Marine Connected" members of the group it was also emotional. Souvenir stands were selling U.S. dog tags in Da Nang and Hue — that upset me.

Thank you for mentioning Colonel Padley being buried at Arlington Cemetery. He's in section 60, grave # 3340. I hope you have a most meaningful get-together over July 4th.

Sincerely,
Shirley Padley

Ernie,

I thought I'd drop a letter to The Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter. I'm presently an IRR Marine and usually do my 2 weeks Active Duty time instructing today's "grunts". It's hard to believe we were once that young and "innocent" before Vietnam and Khe Sanh!

Usually, during a break, a couple of Marines drift in my direction to B.S., since I'm "older" and still in the Marines, and have mentioned in classes that I did a couple of tours in Vietnam. They usually inquire into what my most memorable "event" was, and obviously I always state "the Siege of Khe Sanh"! Since most recent wars or combat actions are measured by days or hours of "combat", they are amazed we held Khe Sanh for the 77 days of the Siege. I remind them that all the servicemen at Khe Sanh were dedicated men, mostly Marines, and hopefully in the future, if they have the same situation confront them, they'll do as well as we did.

The present day Marines still remember the history of Khe Sanh Vets and we will be remembered forever in the Corps.

Ernie,

The July reunion in D.C. is now over and I, unfortunately, haven't yet made one. Being a retired police detective, now County Juvenile Sexual Abuse Counselor and Individual Ready Marine Reservist, with a loving wife, 2 teenagers and living in Montana thousands of miles from a reunion, I hope that some year I will be able to attend one!

Anyway, like many other Khe Sanh Vets, I regularly write to Rev. Ray Stubbe. I also receive my monthly Marine Leatherneck magazine and had noticed a small article and photo of Tom Scott in Vietnam this last year. Out of interest, I wrote to Tom to determine if he had a photo he would "share". Tom indeed "shared" and sent me about 50 colour photos of Khe Sanh, the DMZ, Hue, Hwy 9 and many other I Corps locations. Needless to say, I was totally amazed that he was so willing to do this for me and had so many photos he was willing to share at the cost only of reproducing them. I could hardly believe I had recent photos of a country I did two tours in as a "grunt". After showing my two teenagers the photos, to the point where I finally noticed I was talking to myself in the kitchen, I quickly wrote to my old pen pal, Ray Stubbe. Within a few days, I was talking to Ray on the phone. There was no regret by myself to forward the photos to him to reproduce and read Tom Scott's explanation on the back of each photo. The timing was excellent as Ray had the copies in time for the D.C. reunion. If anyone deserved, or was appropriate to have a copy of the photos, it was the Rev. Ray Stubbe! I knew he would insure all Khe Sanh Vets would be able to enjoy them too. I applaud the energy he puts into the Association and his friendships. God holds a special place in heaven for Ray!

25 years after Khe Sanh, I'm still in the Marines, IRR only. I do 2 weeks a year at Pendleton or Le Juene instructing either tactics or the M60 to a lot younger Marines. I was also called to Active Duty for Desert Storm but was assigned instructor duties at Warrior Training BN at Camp Pendleton instead of being assigned to the infantry in the Gulf as I had requested. Instructors always have time to B.S. and the conversation usually ends up on myself, being an older S/Sgt (44 years), asking if I had "combat" experience. I explain my rank, or lack of it, to my being out of the Corp from 1970 until 1990. I had received a Combat Meritorious to S/Sgt with 2 years, 11 months in the Corp, and upon requesting re-enlistment to the Reserves, was lucky to keep my rank at all, so I don't complain!

The subject of combat seems to quieten the "Gulfers" when I respectfully testify that I was with 1/9 at Khe Sanh. Being they ("Gulfers") measure their combat in hours and Khe Sanh Vets by days (77), all the new younger Marine instructors show great interest and respect for the Khe Sanh Vet instructors, who are very few! Even though I was away from the Corp for 20 years, now being a Reservist, I feel like I never missed a day. The newer Marines still greatly respect and appreciate what we did for our country and the Corps 25 years ago. Truly, the tradition lives on!

With friends like Rev. Stubbe, Tom Scott and Ric Payne, I appreciate my roots in the Corps, going back to my first year in the Marines at Khe Sanh.

Dear Ernie,

I finished your book — it's great! "Welcome To Vietnam Macho Man" was a real revelation to me. There are so many similarities between you and me that I had to re-read "Macho Man" to glean more of the facts and recollections. The feelings jumped right out at me where there were similarities, such as wanting to be there, wanting to fight, not believing in rushing your men, top dog pays whether your fault or not — if you want to be a leader, e.g. J.B.'s responsibility when Lt Jacques got it. I remember I was at the wire that day when his troops brought him in through the wire in a poncho.

I guess payback was on a lot of people's minds for a long time. Ken & 'B' Co. got their dead bodies back at the end of February. I was in on that planning along with them, Charlie Davies S-3, Bill Smith — Arty Officer, Steve Longo — Air Officer, all 1/26. We didn't get air that day but arty did good without dropping any short rounds. The NVA were boxed in on both flanks and to their rear, so they couldn't get reinforcements and they had a hard time getting out. 'B' Company troops did a job on the NVA that day. Like you said in your book, they got their dead. That was the main purpose of the assault on their trenches. I had the aid station and doctor move forward to best aid the wounded. Our troops killed a lot of NVA in their trenches — even used flames. I talked to one of the flames at the reunion — what a revelation!

Ernie, there are so many other similarities far outweighing the dissimilarities that I could go on and on, but for that we need to sit down together and drink everything in sight! Right now, you need to be congratulated on a very fine performance as a writer. It's unique, but "Macho Man" is great. I thought my language was bad, but whew! Yours tops mine! I guess you were gone then but Reyes from California, my radio operator, and several other CP troops appeared one morning having printed "McEwans Fucking Bastards" on their helmet covers. I guess it was at that point that I asked the Sgt Major and Corporal — "do I swear a lot?"

You brought back many memories for me, such as the Sgt from 'A' Co. who got killed by his own grenade. Ray Snyder was Co. Cmdr. Jim Champion took Ken's place as C.O. 'B' Co. Jack Eggar, C.O. 'C' Co. got killed right away with that 130 round right into his bunker. If I can find a letter from his wife Jane, I'll show it to you someday. It's a good letter. Jack Daniel took over 'D' Co. — I guess from you. Times were fast Ernie. Later on, Jack saved my life by shooting an NVA soldier who was aiming to shoot me in the back. It was on the road to An Hoa — we were opening it up on a 10-day operation. Whilst walking over some dead gooks in the trenches, one who I'd just passed got up and aimed an RPG-2 at me when Jack yelled out and shot him. I'd thought he was dead when I passed him — but he wasn't. Jack got him.

When I told you to go home, I was concerned about your last few days in-country. I wanted you to be safe in the rear, at least for a few days. You'd earned it. It was the same thing with Ken Pipes a little while later. Ken was ready to go back. He was a great S-3 and a great Co. Cmdr. You too Ernie, you were a great Co. Cmdr., same thing for S-2.

The memories are too many and too great to cover in a letter so I need to hang it up on this note. We need time to talk some day. There are too many good memories in spite of the adversities. All the humor, the troops individual concern and loyalty for one another, their dependability on each other — just being a part of that makes a person feel good.

It was good to see you, to meet your daughter Evie and to have a few moments together with that great group. My wife Gerry and I had a wonderful time. We were with a different group every night and had a ball.

Looking forward to another reunion and a get-together with you.

SEVENTH MARINE REGIMENT (REINFORCED) FIRST MARINE DIVISION (REINFORCED) FLEET MARINE FORCE, PACIFIC

for service as set forth in the following:

★ CITATION ★

For meritorious service in action against North Vietnamese Army and insurgent Viet Cong forces during Operations ALLEN BROOK and MAMELUKE THRUST in Quang Nam Province, Republic of Vietnam, from 4 May to 6 July 1968. Displaying aggressive, tenacious tactics, the Seventh Marine Regiment (Reinforced) found, fixed, and severely mauled the 36th Regiment, 308th Division of the North Vietnamese Army and various Viet Cong units preparing to initiate offensive operations in the Da Nang and Thuong Duc areas of Quang Nam Province. The demoralizing losses inflicted on the enemy included 1080 killed in action, 14 prisoners of war, significant quantities of weapons and supplies captured and numerous prepared positions destroyed. By their effective teamwork, aggressive fighting spirit, determination and individual acts of valor and courage, the gallant officers and men of the Seventh Marine Regiment

(Reinforced) not only pre-empted the enemy offensive against Da Nang and the Special Forces camp at Thuong Duc, but also decimated a fresh, combat-ready North Vietnamese Army regiment with the con-comitant destruction of irreplaceable Viet Cong Main Force units in Quang Nam Province. As a direct result of the achievements of the Seventh Marine Regiment (Reinforced), the enemy was unable to seriously threaten Free World Military Assistance Forces units or installations for the remainder of 1968. The Seventh Marines' exemplary courage, devotion to duty and performance in the face of a determined enemy resistance were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service."

Col. John B Sollis, Commander,
Marine Barracks,
8th & Eye Streets SE,
Washington, DC 20390

Dear Colonel Sollis:

I am writing, Sir, to point out that you blew an opportunity to do some good at the parade on Friday July 2, 1993. Present that evening, as your staff was well aware, were some 100 veterans of the siege of Khe Sanh with their loved ones. And you ignored them.

I was in attendance that night as the wife of a Khe Sanh veteran, who was Commander of M Company on Hill 881S during the siege. Quite familiar with the format of the parade, having attended every Friday for two summers (1969 and 1970) while my now husband was Commander of the special ceremonial platoon, including the silent drill team and the Marine Corps color guard, I fully expected formal, possibly grateful acknowledgement of the presence of these men gathered together twenty-five years after the siege. I thought it even possible that Viet Nam would be mentioned in the litany of battles represented by the various banners attached to the Marine Corps color. Naive am I, apparently. The veterans of Khe Sanh had learned in 1968 to expect to be let down.

I expected better of 8th and I. It's one thing for civilians, even the Federal Government, to ignore these men who lived through hell for us, but the U.S. for-God's-sake Marine Corps to fail to recognize them? Pathetic!

No disrespect to the distinguished officers who reviewed that parade and accompanied the reviewer, but it did add to the irony that their current job titles sounded a lot more like Admiral-in-charge-of-counting-paper-clips than hero-getting-shot-at-while-desperately-trying-to-medevac-a-dying-Marine.

All in all, your performance that evening managed to fuel the sense of abandonment that many of these veterans have nurtured for twenty-five years. The only thing good about it was that it supplied a new anecdote for those cataloging the snubs that Khe Sanh Vets have received. Surely I don't have to tell you about the lack of support perceived by Viet Nam veterans. Are you aware, as well, that Khe Sanh veterans still feel keenly the failure of the country, the military establishment in general, and even the U.S. Marine Corps to support them — then or now? I wonder. A couple of young Marines milling around the front gate earlier that evening admitted that they had never heard of Khe Sanh. Odd. Our contemporaries had been taught about Guadalcanal — Belleau Wood even.

At this point I respectfully suggest that you send an apology to the Khe Sanh vets. You might address it to Mr Ken Penn, Reunion Chairman and newly elected President, The Khe Sanh Veteran Inc., c/o Ray Stubbe, 8766 Parkview Court, Wauwatosa, WI 53226.

Sincerely yours,
Mrs J Thomas Esslinger

Dear Mrs Esslinger,

Thank you for sharing with me your concern and obvious distress regarding our shabby treatment, as you have characterized it, of some very special people, the heroes of Khe Sanh and their loved ones. Rest assured, you have seized my undivided attention!

Most of the personal letters I receive are very warm and effusive in their praise of the young men and women of this barracks who knock themselves out to represent and uphold the high standards of the Marine Corps in general, and Marine Barracks, 8th & I, in particular. That much remains unchanged from your husband's days as an 8th & I Marine. The "noblesse oblige" of being a Marine — of always striving to be a worthy successor to those who have gone before us — is no small "burden". But in my mind, that's precisely what makes a Marine different. Ounce for ounce, we may not be any better than our sister service counterparts — I'm sure we're not, but the mere notion that we're supposed to be better — that we bear the weight of many generations' worth of pride, professionalism, heroic achievement and uncommon valor to live up to — has always animated a higher order of self-consciousness and commitment from Marines, on and off the parade deck, as on and off the battlefield.

Occasionally, as in this instance, someone writes to air a complaint or to offer constructive criticism. Those are the letters I read and regard with greatest interest and attention. Clearly, Mrs Esslinger, the point of the exercise on Tuesday and Friday evenings is to pay tribute — to demonstrate our immense pride, respect and reverence for those who have gone before us — my father, your husband, the heroes, celebrated and unknown, whose example of service and sacrifice each of us has chosen to emulate by our being Marines — certainly not to ignore or offend our Nation's heroes or to "fuel their sense of abandonment".

Your opening salvo is irrefutable: by failing to recognize the veterans of Khe Sanh at our 2 July parade, we did indeed blow an opportunity to do some good. Sadly enough, we blow the same opportunity every Friday night throughout the parade season — not deliberately, with perverse or callous indifference as your letter suggests — but for the simple reason that literally dozens of worthy groups (veterans' groups and Marine Corps reunions, in particular) make the 8th & I pilgrimage every week. In point of fact, they're the ones whose approval and "Old Corps" endorsement we're striving to obtain. But if we were to pay tribute to each of them, (something they arguably deserve as much as the parade itself), the ceremony would last several hours. As a matter of policy, we formally recognize our guests of honor and forego the opportunity to acknowledge others. That's a calculated choice. The parade is a tribute to all our forebears. Most people asking to be recognized understand, even if they are momentarily disappointed.

I don't know who you encountered "milling around the front gate" before the parade, but I agree that it's a shame our young people — our young Marines and their civilian peers — seem to know so very little about the defining experience of our generation. When your husband was commanding his company at Khe Sanh, I was a freshman in college. I certainly knew about Khe Sanh; we all did. Three years later, when I was on my way to OCS to become a Marine officer — just like your husband — my college classmates thought I was insane. Most of the young Marines at this barracks weren't living during the Viet Nam era. Sadly, the immediacy of that period for us — the flood of conflicting emotions and the yearning for meaning — is beyond their grasp. The "MTV generation" has yet to "discover" Viet Nam. In time, they will. But to most of them, the whole of Viet Nam is essentially indistinguishable from the Korean War, World War II and the Banana Wars.

When I commanded a battalion during Operation Desert Storm, all I thought about was the Marines of Viet Nam and Korea: "How in God's name did those guys do it!" Our vignette was mercifully short. I would never presume to compare the 100 hours I experienced with the protracted hell-on-earth your husband and the heroes of Khe Sanh withstood. But as someone who has cradled a dying Marine in his arms in the middle of a minefield, I can assure you there's a part of me that grieves his loss every day of my life, just as surely your husband grieves the loss of his men. I know what that pain is all about.

Surely, you must understand, Mrs Esslinger, because we certainly did, that the immense outpouring of public support and affection for the men and women of Desert Storm had far less to do with us, with our "mini-series" of the moment, than it did the men and women of Viet Nam — and Korea, "the forgotten war". If there has ever been such a thing as a public apology to the military by the American people as a whole, there it was, for all the world to see and acknowledge. Moreover, our senior leaders were certainly attuned to and shaped by the experience of Viet Nam. None of them was about to let what had happened then — what had happened to many of them — happen to us. And we all thanked God for that! After all, today's commanders-in-chief, and even the generals and admirals-in-charge-of-counting-paperclips, as you dismiss them, were the young officers of Viet Nam. None of them has fogotten Khe Sanh.

You have suggested that I tender an apology to the Khe Sanh vets. I respectfully decline the invitation. I believe I understand your disappointment — even the pain and lingering sense of outrage that the veterans of Khe Sanh have not received just credit and recognition for their heroic service and sacrifice. I quite agree. And should you choose to take a shot at me via Mr Spencer's newsletter, or anywhere else, I'll absorb the full impact. On reflection, I would hope you would accept that where no offense is intended, as in this instance, none should be taken. On the other hand, should you choose to be offended by our failure to acknowledge the presence of your husband's group at our parade, I don't imagine that any explanation I might offer will change your feelings. In my view, your outrage, while entirely understandable, is altogether misdirected.

To your husband and the other heroes of Khe Sanh, I offer my appreciation and deep respect. There's not a Marine alive — those of us who know anything at all about 1968 — who doesn't feel the same. And to you, Mrs Esslinger, I offer my very best wishes. I sincerely hope you and your husband will return to the Barracks. It will always be our pleasure and honor to welcome you home.

ED: Thank you so much, Colonel, for reminding me why I didn't want to do more than one tour.

My interest in the Vietnam War was awakened a couple of years ago after seeing two documentaries on British television on the POW/MIA issue, the contents of which were so powerful that I was compelled to read up on the subject. I soon discovered there were precious few books on the issue available in the U.K., so I turned my attention to the war itself. After absorbing my first few Nam books, the floodgates opened and I just got swept along — wanting to learn more and more. I wanted to understand why the American public so vilified the Vets and I tried to see the war through the eyes of the men who fought it. I've since accumulated and read 39 books on Nam to date and am currently on my 40th — Ray Stubbe's "Valley of Decision" — which is excellent (thank you Ray).

With the vast majority of my reading material being Vets' personal accounts of their tour of duty, I've learned a lot about what life was like in the field; the conditions under which men lived, the fear of not knowing what lay around the next bend in the trail, the frustration of facing an adversary which rarely stood its ground to fight, the ever present threat of death or maiming by booby-traps and the amazing camaraderie and indestructable special bond that was forged under such conditions. But I can only begin to understand what it must have been like for the Vets, to have experienced the exhilaration of making it out of the war zone alive, only to be returned to 'normality' back in the world and be expected to pick up where they left off like nothing had happened, having just endured a lifetime's experiences crammed into 13 months. I think one of the most important things I've learned is that war isn't something that can be simply walked away from; those who it doesn't manage to annihilate indelibly carry its scars for life.

My father saw action in WW II, but even though the war in Europe ended in 1945, it kept on going inside him for decades after. I relived his war for the first seventeen years of my life. War does something to the soul, it buries itself deep inside; it's invisible, but its always there. Unlike their American counterparts, the British have never been hot on reunions or Veterans Associations. They certainly don't support each other the way you do — and I think that's sad because I can see what the Vets get out of it.

Having read so much about Khe Sanh, I arranged a special trip up there during a visit to Vietnam in November '92. The calling card of the B-52's was plain to see alongside Route 9, huge craters gouged out of the rolling hillsides — the scenery was truly breathtaking. The only thing that spoilt the day was the weather. Walking along Khe Sanh's access road, a fierce gale howled across the exposed plateau sweeping a wall of torrential rain ahead of it, making it difficult to even stand up. Whilst the northern part of the base had been overtaken by nature once more, with head high elephant grass, the bulk of the base resembled something akin to a moonscape, pockmarked with excavations where the locals had been digging for metal and with a faded Vietnamese memorial standing on the edge of what used to be the airstrip. Knowing its history, being at Khe Sanh was like walking on hallowed ground, the sadness of the place almost tangible. Compared to other major events during the war, Khe Sanh is unique because it was a triumph of human spirit against seemingly overwhelming odds. The Marine dogma of offense went out the window once the Siege got under way, and it was only on the rare occasion you got 'payback' — like on the 'Plateau Sweep' mentioned in "Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man". Khe Sanh isn't so much what the Siege was about, but more about the men who fought there. After all, three months following the end of the Siege, the base was abandoned. In retrospect, the real estate had little to do with it. It's not the place but the people who are 'Khe Sanh'.

I thought Danny Parker's letter (printed in the Fall issue '92) very insightful when he said that the Khe Sanh Vets were the most caring and tightest group of Vets he'd ever encountered. Wherever you are now, or whatever your present circumstances, never forsake the memories of what you endured, and accomplished. It's an integral part of you. It sets you apart from all others. Khe Sanh will always be wherever all of you are.

Dear Ernie,

Thought you guys might be interested in some pictures I took at and around Khe Sanh right before the siege. I was a radio operator with HQ BTY 1/13, in the FDC. Sometimes during the siege, we (each radio operator) would be handling as many as four or five fire missions each. It really got hectic at times. A lot of our bunkers took direct hits.

Both me and my buddy, Dan Lipos, are going to try to be in Washington for 4th July.

Dream Peace

Even in my graying years I heard the noise of days bygone,
I cannot shake the tears I have shed while watching my comrades die.
I think of the Blackwall and I miss them all.
So many names a soul for each,
my prayer that they have a place in heaven.

Something I once heard on a distant beach that should have been said to each.
That too was so many years ago, perhaps seventy or seventy one;
six months earlier I was in the jungle and I carried a gun.

I walked through dense brush knowing Agent Orange had been sprayed, and even in my dream I see the lives fade.
I thanked God I won; why was I spared? I got away in the hot sun;
I stared, and I still remember being quite scared.

Not a good reward finding myself on death row in this decade;
I still wait for the sad memories to fade.
Dream of peace my Brothers.
We, the living, are the only ones who can make it happen for all the Brothers and Sisters.

On the Blackwall, who lived and died for us all;
Dream of peace my Brothers.

The ones' missing to get some slack, dream of peace and let's bring them back.

The Smell

It was Tet of 67-68.
The night patrols of the Marines were being wiped out on a regular basis.
So we were sent out, mostly to find the lost patrols.
We found that Mr Charles had been stacking the bodies in piles.
They would booby trap them.
They put traps in open wounds, under and around them.
You had to put your hand in and remove the set grenade.
On one occasion, I lifted a body and I heard the spoon fly!
I slammed the body back down and it blew.
I got a hot piece of shrapnel burnt into my right wrist.
I hope he will forgive me, I can't seem to forgive myself.
But this is not what I wish to talk of.
I wish to talk of the smell.
It never goes away!
I got me a medal for things of that time.
It smells too.

We are sad to learn that one of our brothers died 27 Feb 1993: LAGRAND BURKS of Montgomery, Texas, who served in VMO-2.

Manuel Babbitt and John Hargesheimer (both of the ONTOS section at Khe Sanh) would like to locate the following who were also in ONTOS: D.W. SMITH; "GRANDPA" LORENZ; JIM PATTON and the family of RAY FERRY (KIA 9 April at the age of 18). If any of you know, please write to Manny Babbitt or John Hargesheimer.

The reflection of peace in every letter.
The reflection of peace in every line.
The reflection of peace with each and every memory, of a face and time that will never age.
A tear finds its way across a very weary face that strives desperately to prevent betrayal of the emotions that course within its soul.
In the finger that shakingly points and nears the etched remembrance, are the thoughts of that last goodbye.
Many times unseen, many times unsaid, many times unable to be mourned.
Many times a singular sad farewell, unwanted to be expressed at the time.
Replaced with a miserly gratitude of still being among the living.
A harsh description for a very hard time.
An instant's separation that only comrades who have lived in that fine margin that war's reality brings, know.
The suddenness of the final parting is a cruel quirk to those who have shared so much in so little time.
Beyond understanding of the grim finality lies a confusion as to why.
Reach out the helping hand and there is not one to accept its aid.
Bend the elbow and ponder the empty palm, the outstretched fingers, and slowly it closes into a fist, as the rage builds on the reality.
There has been an emptiness, a loss, a non-replaceable parting of the ways.
Your path has stopped, and mine; mine is still a perceived yellow brick road.
And the wizard I seek is the evasion of your fate.
Down that road I seek an answer to a question that I dare not verbalize.
I cast the shadow of an emotion that I must cut short.
I care for you! I have cared for you! We have shared!
And now - now you have been taken a way I will do all I can to avoid taking.
You have given me cause to feel betrayal.
And I do feel betrayed.
Alone I stand, my finger tracing what others only see as your name;
but I see a place and time that has not ended, nor will it ever end.
Never have I shared what we shared.
It is you, there, and I, here. It is "we" again.
We, who can pass on to the children what we have given so often.
Not the pain, not the hurt, not the anguish of the tortured being, but the beauty and warmth that only friendship reveals.
The growing bonds of friends that time and distance cannot break.
The true meaning of what sharing a last Marlboro entails.
My comrade, my friend, I share my tear.

SEQUENCE OF EVENTS AT DEDICATION OF MEMORIAL PLAQUE AT ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY CEREMONY, 02 JULY 1993

The plaque was set within red Wisconsin granite and also included a ginkgo tree, chosen because for its tenacity of holding onto life despite adverse environmental conditions. It is one of the oldest living things; fossils exist of the ginkgo.

All All-Service Color Guard was posted. Ray Stubbe provided a prayer in the form of a poem.

The Commandant of the Marine Corps, GENERAL CARL E. MUNDY, JR, provided a stirring address, emphasizing the importance of the battle of Khe Sanh and the importance of each individual who served there.

The children and the grandchildren then placed a wreath at the Memorial. KEN PENN said: "In years to come, it will be the future generations that will come here and look at the Memorial and touch the tree and say, 'My forefathers were alive when this tree was planted.'"

Mr JAMES TAYLOR played "Amazing Grace" on the bagpipes while the wreath was being placed.

Red clay from Khe Sanh was sprinkled on the plaque.

EXCERPTS OF SPEECH MADE BY CMC, GENERAL CARL E. MUNDY JR. AT DEDICATION OF KHE SANH MEMORIAL PLAQUE AND TREE,ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY, 02 JULY 1993

"I am honored to be here. I am a veteran of Khe Sanh.

"Each of us here has our own powerful set of memories about Khe Sanh; some good, some not so good — some bad. I remember the green beauty of the plateau in June of 1967, when I first flew in there. I also remember how it was when I went back well after the Siege.

"It's now been 25 years since we fought and won the battle of Khe Sanh. In any war, there are a few battles that are truly decisive; fights that have strategic importance that can end a war if lost, or can let it continue if they're won. In World War II, the Normandy Invasion was such a fight. In Korea, it was the Chosin Reservoir. For the French in Vietnam, it was Dien Bien Phu. And for us, and for the United States at large in Vietnam, it was Khe Sanh. But then all battles are decisive when someone's doing their best to kill you. There were certainly other battles that were equally hard-fought — Con Thien, for example. But the effects of losing Con Thien would have just been tactical; we would have adjusted, we would have compensated, we would have taken it back, we would have continued. I'm not sure if that would ever have happened had we lost Khe Sanh, because only Khe Sanh had strategic importance as a single battle in that war, particularly after the media back here at home began to emphasize the parallels between Dien Bien Phu and the existence of the United States and its effort, and our allies in Vietnam, to that battle. Certainly, General GIAP and the North Vietnamese — to them it was an opportunity to repeat their strategic victory at Dien Bien Phu. And they did their level best to win, bringing in against us, amongst others, the elite 304th Division. That was a Guard's formation. In any nation in the world — Guards are the first-line troops; they are the finest that that nation has to put forth. It had won at Dien Bien Phu. All told, it outnumbered us on the ground by more than four to one.

"The NVA were defeated in the Hill Fights of 1967 and in the Siege of 1968. We took the best they could offer and then we outfought them, face to face, eye to eye, on the ground. That's where battles are won: on the ground, by men who face up to the crucible of conflict, and bear it and win it.

"Our victory at Khe Sanh was the result of a thousand different individual actions; each one here had a part to play in that. Individual acts expressed through team work, not just by Marines, but by all Services represented by our magnificent joint-Service Color Guard brought here this morning — the Army, the Navy and the Air Force. Everyone standing here today, and every Khe Sanh veteran who could not be here today, and those who paid the ultimate price and will never be here to see this monument — everyone's actions were important to the outcome of the battle, to the strategic victory that was Khe Sanh.

"The Marines of today talk about you with the awe that they once reserved for the Marines that went in with the first two assault waves at Tarawa or those cold, frozen warriors at Chosin. Khe Sanh has become a part of the Corp's rich legacy of pride, of courage, of history.

"There are many heroes of that battle. Some are very close to where we stand today. Just across the green hillside that way is the Henderson Hall Memorial Gymnasium named for a Corporal named TERRY SMITH, a Tennessean who died on Hill 881-South. Many here will remember him and what he did there; fighting with Mike Company, Third Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, looking out for his fellow Marines; spirited, daring, a young American like we would like all young Americans to be. Everyone at Khe Sanh was a hero, because survival there required a daily act of heroism, just being there, just surviving. And survival meant more than simply personal survival; it meant taking care of your buddies, it meant carrying out the mission. As our Monument says, 'WE ARE ETERNALLY BONDED". That says it all.

"I believe that so long as this Republic lives, and so long as its citizens honor their fighting men and women, our fight, the good fight, the hard fight at Khe Sanh, will never be forgotten. It is my privilege to stand amongst you here today. Thank you."

MINUTES OF ANNUAL MEETING — 03 JULY 1993

EARLE BREEDING called the meeting to order at 0925.

A quorum was present. A sign-in log was distributed and signed by 116 Khe Sanh veterans.

EARLE BREEDING read the Minutes of the annual meeting of the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc., held in San Diego, July 11th, 1992, summarized as follows: Annual dues to be $20.00 and members have the option of stating that they are unable to afford membership. KEN PENN was designated the Reunion Chairman. The place for the next reunion would be Washington D.C. ERNIE SPENCER was also appointed Chairman of the Publications and Fund Raising committees. The "Wreath with Globe and Anchor" logo was adopted. ERNIE SPENCER advised of the situation of the Bru and the possibility of our sponsorship of some activity that would aid them.

EARLE BREEDING entertained a motion to run the meeting by simple majority and to limit speeches to no more than two minutes. All appointments made are hereby cancelled so the incoming President can make his own appointments, with the exception of ERNIE SPENCER as Editor of our magazine.

MAC RADCLIFFE was appointed to audit our Treasurer's books.

KEN PENN noted that he had had a call from DANIEL BALDWIN who was with SOG, who couldn't make the reunion because he had terminal cancer.

BILL MAVES gave the Treasurer's Report noting that we moved from operating on donations to dues, which had become necessary in order to print our magazine. The magazine currently runs about $80.00 per page. For example, the last check to the Marine Corps Association for printing and mailing of magazines was $6,978.00.

Nominations were opened to the membership assembled. KEN PENN was unanimously voted as our next President STEVE FITZGERALD moved to accept all the slate of officers. Motion was seconded and unanimously approved. KEN PENN presented the following candidates for the Board of Directors: JOHN KAHENY, JIM WILKINSON, JOHN BALANCO, JIM DAWD, D.J. BLAND, GARY PARKER, CARL OKSNEE and EARLE BREEDING. The Board of Directors was seconded and unanimously approved.

Officers are:

PRESIDENT, Ken Penn
VICE-PRESIDENT, Michael O'Hara
TREASURER, Bill Maves
SECRETARY, Ray Stubbe
CHAPLAIN, Ron Exum
SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, Ed Diaz

Board of Directors (includes all officers):

JOHN KAHENY	JIM WILKINSON
JOHN BALANCO	JIM DAWD
D. J. BLAND	GARY PARKER
CARL OKSNEE	EARLE BREEDING

One of the members suggested that notices be sent to the VFW, American Legion, etc., to announce our reunions and the fact of our group's existence.

KEN PENN asked for volunteers for assistance in future reunion activities.

ERNIE SPENCER suggested that we not hold formal reunions every year in order to give the reunion chairpersons a break, and proposed they be held every two to three years so that a larger group of members would probably attend. EARLE BREEDING expressed concurrence. He also noted that since we have election of officers every two years, that next year we were free to do pretty much whatever we wanted to do, perhaps just a "fun time", and then two years from now, a formal reunion. He mentioned that the generational gap that exists in the 3d Marine Division Association's association with Vietnam Veterans has been noted by them and steps will be taken to address and close this gap. BILL MAVES agreed with the 2-year plan: it could be better planned, will be less costly to many of our members and membership dollars would go further. GEORGE PETERSON noted we have an affinity with 5th Marine Division more than 3d Marine Division. (NOTE: Historically, the 26th Marines belong to the 5th Marine Division, but was sent to Vietnam where it subsequently came under the Operational Control of both 1st and 3d Marine Divisions at one time or another, but during the Siege was under 3d).

GRANT KNIEDLER moved that we officially meet every two years and leave the Board of Directors to decide the location of the reunion. The motion was seconded.

BRUCE JONES: "My name's BRUCE JONES. I was the 81's FO radio-operator with Bravo Company (1/26) and what I'm seeing in this room is really upsetting. I just spent three days with the men who served at Khe Sanh. They were not just Marines. They were not just Army. They were not just Navy. They were men that served at Khe Sanh! And I'll tell you what: this is a Khe Sanh Vets organization, and we should meet every two years just like the By-Laws say — we should meet as men who served at Khe Sanh. If you people want to hook yourself on to some other association, then you go do it in the off-years! We should get together like we did at Khe Sanh, and we should form in two years again and celebrate the beauty that we've already done for three days." The membership gave hearty applause.

LARRY SEAVY-CIOFFI: FO of 1/9. "He's got a good point. We have a distinct historical definition. We should keep our definition as a unique military organization."

JIM WILKINSON: "What we're seeing here is an organization that started small a few years back, and we've had some great meetings and they're getting better. As we grow, we're getting bureaucratic. Let's not get tied into a lot of By-Laws. Let's just keep what we've got; the comraderie. Let's just plan two years down the road."

BILL JAYNE: "I belong to a lot of organizations. This one is pretty unique. You get a lot of bureaucracy, you get a lot of motions, a lot of going through the motions that don't matter a hill of beans. I feel there's almost unanimity here. What we're talking about is that we're going to meet every two years as a Khe Sanh association."

WAYNE NEIGHBORS called the question. Motion: THAT THE OFFICIAL KHE SANH VETERANS REUNION BE EVERY OTHER YEAR AND THAT THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS DETERMINE THE LOCATION. The motion was unanimously carried.

BILL O'CONNOR: Volunteered to chair the reunion in 1995.

NORM LAFOUNTAINE: "Concerning our reunions — we should keep it fun, keep it camaraderie, keep it simple. (Spoke from his experience with the Marine Corps Helicopters Association). Don't bog it down in bureaucractic bullshit; no one wants to sit through boring meetings — let the Board of Directors meet on their own and do the business."

The meeting was adjourned at 10.40 but continued on an informal basis, with small groups here and there, and general announcements in the room.

BILL JAYNE: "I work for the VA National Cemetery System. (NOTE: BILL is in charge of it). Anybody that's interested in putting a memorial to Khe Sanh Vets in one of the VA cemeteries, we'd love to have it too. It would probably cost a heck of a lot less than Arlington."

WARREN WIEDHANN: "I belong to the 1st Marine Division Association, the 3d Marine Division Association, Vietnam Veterans Association and two small unique organizations called the "Chosin Few" and the "Khe Sanh Veterans Association". Never ever lose your uniqueness! Keep it Khe Sanh! Always keep the Khe Sanh Veterans Association unique."

CEREMONY AND REMARKS AT VIETNAM VETERANS MEMORIAL WALL

The sun was just setting as we were all bussed to the Memorial. Prohibited from doing anything at the Wall itself that might be construed as a demonstration or ceremony, and through very meticulous prior coordination by KEN PENN with the Park Service, with a letter of authorization from them and personal visits beforehand, we all gathered near the Wall in a circle. It had become dark. Using a bullhorn megaphone, one by one, those gathered there, as they were moved to do so, spoke of those they wished to remember.

KEN PENN: "... joined our battery less than a month before and he was our youngest Marine. We sent him up the hill as a replacement for someone who had rotated. The following day I had to go down to Charlie-Med and identify him. I'd also like to dedicate — HARVEY WYSONG told me something that happened 26 years ago to 1/9 when they got hit particularly hard — and anyone who wants to come down and say anything, we'll have words and then we can go down to the Wall."

RAY STUBBE: "KEN has mentioned 1/9, and learned this evening that 26 years ago this day, 116 Marines died in one day

north of Con Thien in a place called "Market" I believe. My personal involvement was with many, but my own Clerk was killed there — as were all the chaplain's clerks — I don't know if you know that: every one of the battalion's chaplain's clerks was killed at Khe Sanh. This fellow was a Conscientious Objector and had just arrived, so we transferred him to C-Med to help with the stretchers from one of the line company's supply, and he worked in C-Med to organize stretcher bearers, and JONATHON NATHANIEL SPICER became sort of a "tiger", and he organized. All of the recon people that are here might remember when they were working parties, he'd get them to carry out the wounded. On the 5th March he was doing that when — to a 46 — a mortar round came in and he got shrapnel in his heart and died two weeks later from infection. I tried to contact his mother down in Florida. I wrote to her twice but never heard — I guess it's still too painful for them. There are many."

MIKE LOEHRER: "I'd like to say a word for Corporal REUBEN CARL McMACKINS JR. On April 14th, 1968, he was with Lima, 3/26, retaking Hill 881-North. He was charging the hill with hand grenades when he took a round to the chest. He died immediately. He received the Bronze Star for his efforts that day. He was a dear, close friend and I pay him tribute tonight, and to the other men that died on the hill that day."

JIM WILKINSON: "I would like to dedicate my visit to all the members of 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, in particular Sergeant-Major GAYNOR. Sergeant-Major GAYNOR was at Corregidor when World War II broke out. He was taken prisoner and kept a POW for about four years. Obviously, when he got to Vietnam he was a very senior Sergeant-Major, and he really did not belong to an infantry battalion; he probably belonged in Da Nang. I asked him why he was there. He said he wanted to be with the troops. And he was a fantastic Sergeant-Major. One morning we were checking the lines — pretty heavy incoming. I took the radio operator and said: 'Sergeant-Major, you go and see Charlie Company and I'll go around to the Gray (Sector) side and see Bravo, and I'll meet you at a certain point.' While we were doing this, several rockets came over and one scored a direct hit on Charlie Company's bunker, injuring Captain DAVE ERNST, killing his radio operator and inflicting a very serious head wound on Sergeant-Major GAYNOR. We got him medevaced and they took great care in Charlie-Med but he died on the helicopter. To me, he personified bravery and the dedication of all the Marines and other military forces that gave their lives at Khe Sanh. His wife called me three months ago. I'd not heard from her in years. We had a nice emotional talk and I told her I would visit the Wall and pray for the spirit and soul of Sergeant-Major GAYNOR and all our other comrades. Thank you."

TOM ESSLINGER: "Those of us from India, 3/26, have been talking about MIKE THOMAS and TOM BRINDLEY and the other people who died on the 20th January, the first day of the Siege, and I just want to publicly acknowledge the most painful day for me. It was the 23rd February when, as the Company Commander of Mike Company, I lost two Marine Gunnery Sergeants to one round. They had over forty years of Marine experience between them. Lost: Gunnery Sergeants EUGENE WIRE and PAUL ROBITAILLE."

VOICE: "I would like to say something about a couple of Marines. As Ray indicated, we lost all the chaplain's clerks and one chaplain. Along with the chaplain, who was Father BRETT, we lost ALEXANDER CHIN. The day — a couple of hours actually, before he was killed, he had been asking for the address of my parents so he could drop by and tell them I was in a safe position, a safe area and there was nothing to worry about. I finally gave him the address of my parents who lived in the Washington area. He was from the Baltimore area. Also, unbeknown to me, my next-door neighbor, PFC .., was on the hill adjacent to mine and he was killed on March 30th, 1968. I only discovered a couple of years ago that he was on that particular hill. I dedicate this to all the Marines and everyone who was at Khe Sanh. Thank you."

JOSEPH BELARDO: "I'd like to dedicate this to all the Duster and Quad (.50) units that served with the Marines, keeping the road open to Khe Sanh and at the Combat Base at Khe Sanh."

KEN PIPES: "My name is KENNETH W PIPES. I would like to take this opportunity this evening to recognize, not by name, but by number — from the beginning of the Siege until the end of the Siege, the 65 men that Bravo Company (1/26) lost, both in the lines and outside the lines. I would have to mention the name of Lieutenant DON JACQUES, Staff Sergeant GEORGE MCCLELLAND and Corporal KENNETH KING CLAIRE, who represent the very best of those 65 men that died throughout that 77 days. But more than that, not only them, but all the other men that served with us and aren't here with us this evening, and those whose names are on the Wall, I think would feel glad and happy inside that we're here tonight — those of us who are fortunate enough to be here to honor all of them and the sacrifices that they made for us."

JOHN SEITZ: "My name is JOHN SEITZ. I'd like to dedicate my visit here to all the men whose names are engraved on that Wall, especially to PHILIP VAN DEUSEN, GALE GOTTI, Sergeant TOMMY ANTRIM — all from Alfa Battery, 1/13. Thank you."

ROB PAINTER: "My name's ROB PAINTER. I served with Bravo, 3d Recon. On 24th January, 1968, I was in the bunker that caught the direct hit. I dedicate this is SCRIBNER, ROSA, POPOWITZ and DOC MILLER; to the rest of Bravo, 3d Recon that died at Khe Sanh and the rest of the brothers that are on the Wall."

(At this point one of the women present broke down in loud anguished sobs).

WILLIAM J. O'CONNOR: "I was the Commanding Officer of Charlie, 1/13. I just want to remember all of the artillerymen who served at Khe Sanh. Of course, whenever we got incoming, my troops were the guys who had to get on the guns. And I think they did their job well. And just one other point is that on St Patricks Day, remember that was my Battery, Charlie Battery, that fired the green smoke. So when you're drinking a drink to all the Irishmen in the world, drink one to Charlie Battery!"

JOHN J BALANCO: "My name's JOHN BALANCO. I was the senior advisor with CAC, out in the village. It would be unjust not to mention my Bru (Montagnards). Out of the 225 of us that were up at Khe Sanh, only 25 of us came out. We left 199 there, abandoned. For me, I feel the true heroes of the Khe Sanh battle and Siege were the Bru people. There are no Walls for them. There's not an article about them. There's not a newspaper. There's nothing about them. They lost 80 percent of their race, 80 per cent of their tribe. And we, as Americans, as well as the enemy, participated in annihilating that race. I'd just like to honor them, as well as the Marines we lost, and thank all of you people who supported us out in the ville. Thank you."

JEROME THOMAS: "I'm "Doc" THOMAS. I was with Golf 2/3, and I'd like to make a dedication to my best friend in Vietnam, Lance Corporal MIKE TURNER, killed April 21st, 1968. I'd also like to remember all of the pre-Siege and post-Siege people who died at Khe Sanh. Thank you."

JAMES DAWDY: "On November 16th, 1967, four men from the FLC Para-Delivery parachuted out preparatory to a cargo-drop; as you'll remember, we got pretty much everything by air-drop. During the drop, one of them fell through the other one's parachute and they both hit the ground out in front of our position, out in front of the wire. We went out there. The Corpsman attempted CPR on one of them but it was obvious that that was going to be futile. It was, for me, the time when I felt the most helpless, the greatest despair that I'd felt in my life. And at that time, it occurred to me that somewhere, there was a mother or father, sister or brother, good friend, girlfriend, that in just a few hours or a day would hear that their loved one had died. So there's 50,000-plus names that are on that Wall, but there's a whole lot more people behind those names, and I dedicate my visit to all of those people."

VOICE: "I'd like to dedicate my visit to my good friend, WALT JONES. He was an F-8 pilot and Forward Air Controller, and while calling in airstrikes, he took a round. He was the best pinochle player at our table and we were just waiting for him to come in that evening so we could start our pinochle game when we found out that WALT had taken a direct hit. I'd like to dedicate my visit to WALT."

DALE FERGUSON: "My name's DALE FERGUSON. I'd like to dedicate this visit to all of the Marines and all of the armed service personnel that lost their lives, and also my brother, Second Lieutenant DAVID C FERGUSON, who lost his life March 5th, 1969."

RON EXUM: "My name's RON EXUM, and on March 28th, 1968, in the trenchlines of Khe Sanh, I lost two friends. I found my best friend right here, but I still lost two more. We were in the trenchline; we were digging the trenchline a little bit deeper because they kept sniping at us, they could see the tops of our heads as we moved about, so we had to dig it deeper. That's all we were doing was just digging when a mortar came in and killed both my buddies. The Lord allowed me to be spared. I'm here for them."

CARL OKSNEE: (with great emotional difficulty) "To 1/9."

VOICE: "I'd like to dedicate my visit tonight to a friend of a lot of us named HOWARD JOHNSON of the Communications Center, Headquarters 26th Marines, who was killed just a couple of days after we first started receiving incoming at Khe Sanh. Also, I'd like to dedicate this visit to friends of mine that I graduated from high-school with: JIM PAGE, LARRY BEAUFORD and ROBERT MARLIN, who were also killed in Vietnam."

BRUCE JONES: "My name is BRUCE JONES and I'd like to dedicate my visit today for JOE CASTILLO who was killed on July 21, 1967, on Route 9, and I'd also like to dedicate this for ALBERT R. SANFORD who died on March 30th when he went out to get the bodies from JACQUES' patrol. I've been to the Wall many, many times since 1986, and what I would ask you to do is keep in mind that there are many men, many spouses or significant others that have never seen this Wall, so when we get down there, just remember to reach out if you see a brother or a spouse having a tough time. Don't let them stand there, and don't think it's inappropriate — there's going to be some support needed when we get down there. So, please remember that."

TALIS KAMINSKIS: "My name's TALIS KAMINSKIS. I served with a CAP unit with the Bru at Khe Sanh. Tonight, I want to talk about a Bru Sergeant I shared a bunker with. Unlike most of the guys here, I shared my life with the Bru. As a boy, he started fighting the Japanese. He fought the French. He fought the Americans. Now he's fighting the North Vietnamese. In a conversation one night, he asked me why I was there. And he looked at me and said, 'In one year, you probably will go home, but I am home.' Somewhere in the red clay of Khe Sanh, I hope tonight he is home. Thank you."

QUILES JACOBS: "My name is QUILES JACOBS and I dedicate my visit here tonight to a lot of Marines that died with us. As EXUM said, we lost two buddies. The same two buddies he's talking out — he was just there that day. They'd just left my hooch about five minutes before they were killed. I'd also like to dedicate this to GEORGE ... who died as my Squad Leader. ...was killed on an LP. The way it happened was that two guys were on watch and two guys off watch. He happened to be off watch at the time. He was reading his little hand Bible when a round came in and he took shrapnel right in the brain reading his Bible. I'd also like to dedicate this to SCOTTY, another one of my men that got killed on June 5th — he took two rounds right in the throat. To all of the men of Lieutenant JACQUES platoon: About 13 of my buddies got killed there — we went all the way through Boot Camp, ITR, LeJeune, Cuba; we all went to Nam together. Then, of course, on the 30th — a lot of my friends got killed there. So I want to dedicate this to all of them. Thank you."

BILL DABNEY: "DOC WICKLIFFE, Corpsman, killed tending wounded in a hot zone on 881-South. Through him, all those magnificent Corpsmen, who kept us alive up there."

JOHN DI GAETANO: "My name's JOHN DI GAETANO. I'd like to dedicate my visit here today to all of the men of Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, and especially those who went out on March 30th to retrieve the bodies of the men who were killed several weeks before, especially if there's anybody here who is a relative of Corporal WAYNE MOORE, who died that day. I dedicate this to him — he was a fine man."

ROBERT BATES: "My name's BOB BATES. I served with Whisky, 1/13. My dedication would be to all the Marines who made it out of Khe Sanh, but didn't make it back home. One of those was Sergeant ROBERT ARNOLD, who died August 18th, 1968."

ARVN VIETNAMESE: "It's very difficult for me to speak in English. This is the first year of my freedom in the United States after I was detained for 15 years in a Communist re-education camp on the border of China and North Vietnam. As a former

Captain of Counter-Intelligence of the Republic of Vietnam's Army, I have many, many American friends: US Marine Corps, 101 Airborne, the Rangers and some Air Force pilots. I come here on behalf of myself and on behalf of the Vietnamese people, to dedicate and to express my gratitude to all our American friends who fought in Vietnam, and to all parents of our friends who were there and who are in the United States. I take this opportunity this evening to once more thank you, all the parents who bore the brave sons of the United States. Thank you.

KEITH PRICE: "My name's KEITH PRICE. I was a Corpsman with Bravo Company, 9th Marines, during the early months of 1967, before anybody had heard of Khe Sanh or 881-North or 881-South. On March 16th, the Company from 2/9 got ambushed on Hill 861. They left 10 men there and we left 8. I'd like to dedicate my visit to the men who died March 16th, 1967, on Hill 861."

VOICE: "I'm in Tank Battalion. On behalf of myself, JOHN HARGESHEIMER and GARY DAHLHEIMER, I'd like to dedicate our visit to ROB PAYNE and RAY FERRY who were both killed at Khe Sanh, plus all the other brothers over there.

LARRY CLARK: "My name's LARRY CLARK. I'd like to make this dedication to all the 155 artillerymen that lost their lives during the Siege of Khe Sanh. Throughout the whole Siege, with all the artillery duels we had with NVA 152 artillery pieces, and all my fellow Marines that lost their lives there on the base. Thank you."

LARRY MCCARTNEY: "My name's LARRY MCCARTNEY. I was a PFC with Echo Company, Second Battalion, 26th Marines. I just want to dedicate this to all of those fine Marines — and that includes our Corpsmen — they were just as much Marines as us, that served at Khe Sanh on Hill 861-Alfa — all of those that did not make it off that hill. In particular, I'd like to mention some names of some of the men that did make it off that hill but didn't come home at a later time: WILLIAM ALAN HAYES, ANDY LARSON, ROBERT BRETT, JIM HAGGIE, DAVE DUMAS, JOE ROBLES, WARREN SANCHEZ, STAN PETTIT, BOB MCLAUGHLIN, JIMMY DOME, GARY GAFFIN, CLIFF SPILDER — the list goes on — we haven't forgotten."

FRED MCEWAN: "My name's FRED MCEWAN. I came into Khe Sanh in July, 1967 and I left some time in April, 1968. On the 15th March, JIM WILKINSON showed me around the First Battalion when I joined that outfit. I want to remember four Khe Sanh Marines that were killed after Khe Sanh: BOB ONSLOW, as we were on our way to Con Thien; Staff Sergeant TOLENTINO, who was killed down on Go Noi Island; Staff Sergeant HINSON who was killed on Dodge City/Arizona — Arizona Territory they called it, and I want to remember JOE LOGHRAN from the Third Battalion, 26th Marines, who was killed outside of Quang Tri. We were all real close together when this happened, and it's vivid in my mind, in my memory, and but for the grace of God and lots of luck, there go I. But I also want to remember the Marines that are still alive and continue to fight and win; they won good. Thank you."

DAVID ROGERS: "My name's DAVE ROGERS. I was with Mike Company, Third Battalion, Third Marines, during the Hill Fights in the Spring of 1967. My company suffered 27 killed and 51 wounded, but during the entire Hill Fights, there were approximately 155 killed and over 500 wounded. I'd like to make my dedication to all the Marines who lost their lives and who were seriously wounded during the Hill Fights. I'd also like to say one thing about an individual that I was personal friends with whose name was HANK NORMAN, a real gentleman. He was killed during the Siege of Khe Sanh. Just one other comment. I did get to talk to HANK's mother here this past week, and she really appreciated somebody coming over and talking to her and telling her she had a fine son. If anybody knew HANK, his mother's address is in the newsletter and she would appreciate it if anybody would take time out to write her a letter. Thank you."

MIRIAM EATON: "I'm here because my son cannot be here, and I know he would have come if he'd still been with us. He was a photo-journalist. He was with you for six weeks. He went out, he delivered his pictures and his bosses said 'they're marvellous'. He said, 'I'm going back in because I want to be with those men and come out when they come out.' He would have been here if he could have. Thank you." (The son's name is ROBERT ELLISON, who was killed in the plane crash along with 48 others who were returning to Khe Sanh on March 6th. His photos appear in the March 18, 1968, issue of Newsweek).

MAURICE DESCHAINE: "My name's MAURICE DESCHAINE. My cousin was Corporal NORMAN DESCHAINE from Delta Company 1/26. My reason for being here today is that I served from '67 to '69 in Logistics. I was not part of the Marine Corps but I unloaded all the ammo you guys used. You used a helluva lot! I couldn't get a day off! (laughs). I had a big decision to make. It was my 30th class reunion. When I woke up on Friday morning I told my wife, 'I'm sorry, I've got to go to DC.' All week long I woke up thinking about NORMAN, who I think about every day of my life. I came down here and met ERNIE SPENCER, and that's how I became involved with the Khe Sanh Vets. The reason I'm here tonight is, maybe I lost my cousin, but I found a lot of brothers. I would like to dedicate this visit tonight to all the Khe Sanh veterans, all the Corpsmen and all the nurses. Thank you."

VOICE: "Giving honor to God and to all of those Marines who are living and those who lost their lives in this battle. I just thank the Lord for you. I can remember when I looked at the news and they would say there were 6,000 Marines at Khe Sanh with 40,000 Viet Cong surrounding them. And I'm telling you, I called different places for prayer for you. We were praying for you. And we thank God that He brought some of you back, including my son — I thank God that He brought him back."

RICHARD PELOQUIN: "My name's DICK PELOQUIN. I was India Company's First Sergeant, Third Battalion, 26th Marines. I'd like to dedicate this brief moment in time to friends I had who died from India Company — not only the ones that I knew personally, but to the members of the battalion, the regiment — to all those that were there at Khe Sanh — attachments, ARMY, US NAVY; it doesn't make any difference. We wound up being a part of history. I think we really assisted somehow in the preservation of a civilized society. I just have to say, God Bless Marines! But not to be slighted, not to be left out, please don't forget the Marines that are still alive, those that are still here suffering some degree of mental anguish, some of the wives that are still suffering some mental anguish, some of the relatives, some of the mothers, sisters, brothers, you name it — we all share the same experience."

JOHN MACIAS: "My name is JOHN MACIAS. I was with India Company 3/26, Guns, and I'm here for my best friend (very choked with emotion), ... Jr. 25 years later, I still see his face and hear his voice, and I still love him like a brother."

JACK KILBRIDE: "My name is JACK KILBRIDE. I was with India Company, Second Platoon, Guns. I'd like to remember Lieutenant THOMAS and Corporal ROBERT ARTHUR WIEDEMAN — and everybody else."

VOICE: "I just want to remember: a lot of Marines don't remember the names of the guy that's next to them. We'd only been at Khe Sanh. We got there the day before Christmas. About a month later, the line companies were losing so many people that they came and said that they needed some extra troops from our gun — from our 60 mortars there with Lima Company. I was standing with this one guy. I only knew him as "JJ". He looked at me and I looked at him, and he said, 'Well, I want to go for a hike anyways — I'll see you in a week.' I guess I'll take a walk down there (the Wall) to see his name."

DAVID SPRY: "I'm DAVID SPRY, Echo Company, 2/26, Khe Sanh Combat Base. My best friend, PHILIP GREGORY WIGTON, Mike Company, Third Battalion, 26th Marines, survived Khe Sanh — but only until May 9th. He didn't have very long to brag. The funeral card that his mother sent me reads: 'PHILIP WIGTON, born April 4th, 1946. Died Quang Tri Province, May 9th, 1968.' And a poem:

"Safely home
I am home in Heaven, dear ones
Oh so happy and so bright
There's perfect joy and beauty
In this everlasting light
All the pain and grief is over
Every restless tossing past
I am now at peace forever Safely home in Heaven, at last"

HENRY GAGNE: "My name is HENRY GAGNE. I was with the Second Platoon, Delta Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, and got to Khe Sanh in June 1967. I left the following March. On January 27th, 1968, a young man from Columbia, Tennessee, arrived at Khe Sanh. He was killed the same day, and I'm here in memory of him. Also, another man from my platoon, who is from my home state of Maine, NORMAN DESCHAINE, whom I thought had made it back from Vietnam, but I just found out three or four months ago that he died five or six months after I left. I'm here for him also."

VOICE: "I'd like to dedicate my visit to someone who isn't on the Wall, but another 'black cloud' that I've been carrying — that's my wife, who died. If I hadn't been so concerned with myself I could have helped her a little more." (great sobs and cries)

BILL DABNEY: "I went back to Khe Sanh in 1971 with the Vietnamese Marine Corps. They moved into Laos and captured Tchepone. Their names are not on the Wall. Out of that Division, 1,640 of them didn't come back out, and I'd like to keep them in mind."

RICHARD SOTO: "My name is RICHARD SOTO, FOX 2/26. I'd like to dedicate my visit here to Lance Corporal JAMES DOUGLAS RICHARDSON. He was my Team Leader. Also to other men of FOX Company and two high-school classmates: JOHN ..., United States Marine Corps and JOE MENDOZA, United States Army. Lest we forget."

LEE BURGER: "My name's LEE BURGER. I was attached to Bravo 1/26 as a flame-throwerman. Of course, I'd like to dedicate everything to the guys who died, but in particular, on the 30th when I was hit and I came back, and I was being taken care of — the man I remember the most that day was Chaplain ... I remember him coming over and praying over me and comforting me, especially when I was rather scared. So I'd like to thank you Chaplain."

MARK SWEARENGEN: "I'm MARK SWEARENGEN. I was in Khe Sanh for about a month and a half — roughly 40 days, and I was responsible for coordinating the fires of the 175 millimeter guns. I have some good friends whose names are on the Wall. I'm here to remember them tonight. I ask you all though, to please remember everyone — everyone; all the men and women who died in Vietnam. Thank you."

KEN PENN: "If that's all who would like to remember their friends publicly, we will take our Wreath down and place it approximately where the middle of the Siege was. Give us about two minutes to get down there and then just come down — you can't march, just come down. There's no smoking at the Wall itself. We cannot have a procession with the Wreath — we just have to be individuals. Come as individuals as best you can, as a band of brothers. Thank you."

NOTE: The Wreath was mounted on a board on which everyone present at the Reunion had a chance to sign. Once in place, F. JAMES TAYLOR, standing atop the section of the Wall where the Wreath was placed, played "Amazing Grace" on the bagpipes, followed by one stanza of the Marine Corps Hymn. CALVIN BRIGHT placed a Bronze Star Medal and Purple Heart Medal on the Wreath board. ROBERT PAINTER and several from the Recon Company burnt Sacred Sage in the area of the panel containing the names of SCRIBNER, ROSA, POPOWITZ and DOC MILLER. The Wreath was covered with plastic prior to our departure and so was still there the next day, July 4th, the entire day. DAVID G. ROGERS wrote a poem, "RED CLAY" and left it at the Wall.

RED CLAY

These hills, say the Bru, were a paradise to roam
Alive with cool brooks and wildlife running free
High, very high, they soared into the heavens
Oh, such a beautiful view for the eyes to see!
And the earth therein was free of man's sin
As it bore the wild fruits of the day
These ancient, majestic, green laden hills
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

With rains from monsoons to moisten in winter
The roots of dense flora and canopying trees
Cleansing the good earth season after season
As the rivers briskly flowed to the deep seas.
And in the summer, radiant and abundant sunlight

Providing a rainbow thru the beam of each ray
In these hills which shared the sun and rain
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

Each hill was high as it pointed to the sky
Many unnamed, whilst others by altitude named
But as sure as the sky appears blue to one's eyes
Still these hills will forever remain untamed.
Three joined hands and their names ended in 'one'
Joyfully greeting each other day after day
And they were steep for the Bru's tough feet
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

Still others soared high seeking their place
Amongst the clouds and streams cascading
They, too, had names as they grew in fame
Standing straight and tall as if parading.
Though not as glorious, they possessed great might Showing brute strength in the sun as they lay Humbling those who dared to climb their height
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

So the story is told by the hills themselves
As they speak in jargon unfamiliar today
That a Marine came along stalking the "Cong"
With his rifle to "search and destroy" his prey.
His comrades came too, to render support
Each finding ruggedness causing them to say
These hills are infested with a potent enemy
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

The big guns soon followed, some called it 'arty'
Supporting those in danger by adding to the tally
As incoming showered them, they held their positions
Pinpointing death on hilltops and bowl-shaped valley.
Waiting for the call from a forward observer
Helping the 'grunts' as they hunted their prey
Back in these hills, exploding after shrills
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

The fast jets with big bombs were also there
Carrying napalm to provide close air support
Shrieking high to low like a clap of thunder
Broadcasting "tallyho" in their fly-by report.
As helicopters provided emergency evacuation
Sweeping down from their lofty perches each day
Down onto these muddy, now turned bloody
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

Thus sparkled the prelude to death and destruction
Like a typhoon filled with torment and grief
Striking with vengeance, taking no prisoners
Its forceful, wide path causing much disbelief.
The garrisoned force of thousands of brave men Held their positions heroically history would say
As the hills bellowed forth as if to retort
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

For 77 days and nights the Siege took its toll
As life turned to death, cut to pieces by steel Lifeless bodies became burdens to fearful souls
As "The Lord is my Shepherd" many began to feel.
Still all fought on as in these denuded hills
Pitting the NVA against Marines by night and day
Pouring forth by red glare, the curse of death
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

No safe haven would the hilltops or distant valley be
As the combatants emerged from their hidden caves
Only to be repulsed by courageous young Marines
Leaving the unfortunate to rot in shallow graves.
Our "Arrow of Death" declared three of the hills
Is a final resting place for many men to lay
As we live on where gallant people have died
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

As ever so slowly the Siege began to falter
Still skirmishes continued to kill and taunt
Those left in the hills to defend with true grit
Leaving lasting visions of a bloodshed to haunt.
As the foe withdrew and thoughts were collected
Thinking "We have fought a victorious fray!"
In our passage through these perilous hills
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

And so it was in these miserable hills and valley
As human mortality was put to its gravest test
That our comrades served with honor and valor
Only to be returned in a casket to rest.
Back home to be close to loved ones and friends
In graveyards they were destined to eternally lay
After each lost their life in these lawless hills
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

Though the years have passed by ever so quickly
Still the wounded hills stand tall and named
As they heal over time by Mother Nature's hands
Still they remain to the Bru scarred and maimed.
So it is with each other as we join hands together
Asking that the wounds of war be healed as we pray
For all of our comrades who fought in these hills
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

In our remembrance of all inscribed on 'The Wall'
Having shared our comradeship with each name
Let us pray for each soul, immortal may it be Having laid them to a peaceful rest be our claim.
Remembered, not forgotten; this be our legacy!
For our comrades eternal peace is what we pray
And for the untamed hills may they echo peace always
These hills of Khe Sanh made of red clay.

KHE SANH REUNION VIGNETTES

LITTLE SNAPSHOTS OF EVENTS HERE AND THERE

KEN PIPES is staring out of the window of his hotel room, looking at the pool area and talking with a friend. Slowly, silently, men gather in his room. Someone says, "Turn around!" The room is filled with men from Bravo Company that he commanded. Despite the devastating losses of 25 February and 30 March, the room is completely filled. He's choked with emotion. He says, "I couldn't have done it without you." Someone else says, "We wouldn't be here if it weren't for you, Skipper."

A TEAM FROM FORCE RECON that had operated at Khe Sanh in January of 1967 is together for the first time since those days. One man, CLAYTON ERNST tells about a particularly violent experience in which the first Marine to be killed at Khe Sanh was hit. After relating the incident, he admits that he has less than a year to live and wanted to get the story told to preserve the memory of this man.

A WIFE is about to leave the hotel, and her husband. She attends the meeting of the wives, sharing in the telling and emotions, and she remains.

"CAPTAIN" BILL DABNEY (retired Colonel) appears; his first reunion. Those from India Company are beaming to see him there. He brings along the old India Company guidon, full of holes from flying atop 881-South, along with one of the American flags that flew atop that hill during the Siege.

HALF A DOZEN (or more) men bring their precious memorabilia and photo albums and leave them in the courtesy room for others to see.

DAVID DOUGLAS DUNCAN donates some 200 copies of his book, "I Protest" which were recently discovered in a warehouse, to be given free to the first 200 who registered.

MRS MIRIAM EATON, mother of BOB ELLISON, photographer for Newsweek, meets with ED EVANS and others who knew her son at Khe Sanh while he lived in the trenches with them for some three weeks prior to his death.

THREE FORMER ARVN SOLDIERS who had been imprisoned for 15 years in a North Vietnamese Re-education Camp, one of whom spent five years in shackles, tell of how much they appreciate what we, as Americans, did for them.

CALVIN BRIGHT leaves his Bronze Star and Purple Heart Medals on our Khe Sanh Wreath at the Wall.

JAMES TAYLOR played "Amazing Grace" and the Marine Corps Hymn on his bagpipes at the Wall during the laying of our Wreath.

BILL YATES is getting into an elevator as DAVE RODELL suddenly spots him and yells: "Billy Ro! Billy Ro!" DAVE had pulled BILL to medical help through a mortar barrage whilst mortars were still exploding all around and thought that BILL had died. He didn't know that he had survived.

BERNICE PENN, in the midst of coordinating and supervising, suddenly spotted BILL YATES entering the hotel with bleeding feet from his sandles. She took him to her room and washed his feet with hydrogen peroxide and bandaged them up.

THE COMMANDANT OF THE MARINE CORPS gives a stirring speech — in the rain — to some 200 or so — also standing in the rain, on the occasion of the dedication of a plaque honoring Khe Sanh in Arlington National Cemetery. WE HAVE OUR OWN MEMORIAL IN D.C.!

THE POPE sends a letter. He will be praying for all of us from Khe Sanh during our reunion.

A SPECIAL WALL CEREMONY in which all who are there can spontaneously participate by making testimony to some buddy, is said by one who participates in a lot of these ceremonies to be the "best" one he's been in — and it was not planned!

THE TAPE RECORDING OF THE NATIONAL ANTHEM fails, but someone starts singing it at our formal dinner and eventually everyone is singing it with a great spirit, animating everyone present.

There is a COMPLETE LACK OF ANIMOSITY and, in fact, a complete spirit of "family" among the different units and branches of service that are present, despite some heavy drinking in the wee hours of the morning.

Special T-SHIRTS and a PEWTER ANNIVERSARY PIN are available and given out, along with books on Khe Sanh, magazine articles and maps.

ONE MAN calls after returning home a week and says his constant Khe Sanh nightmares have disappeared.

ONE MAN calls after returning home. His fellow workers notice that he has much less anger and bitterness; he no longer flies off the handle.

ONE MAN says that he expected some "heaviness" and some healing. This was there. But what he also received, and didn't expect, was the fun and the warmth.

There are perhaps dozens and dozens of other "vignettes" that could be included as well.

With thanks...

Just wanted you to know
I feel this country really gave the Vets a hard time when you returned.
Taking their animosity of war out on the Vets instead of embracing the Vets for surviving a war of animosity.
Although it was a long time ago,
and I was just a kid,
I still thank the Lord for this country I live in,
and especially for the men and women who served.
THANK YOU!

Dear Ernie,

Here is a 5th Marine Directory Handbook for your collection. I kept it from my Camp Pendleton tour. Please note that it was "F" 2/28 that raised the flag on Mt. Suribachi and that 17 men serving with 5th Marine Division received the 'Medal of Honor'.

Dear Ernie,

Good to meet you at the Reunion. Man did I need that time! I have been detached from my feelings for a long time. I bought your book while there. It's in our library but it's constantly checked out — apparently a lot of Vets are reading it. Anyway, I read it and was amazed at how open you could be with what you felt and experienced.

I was with 105's down on the east end of the base. I didn't do anything heroic, just did my duty, burned the shitters in the fog, dodged incoming, took some shrapnel like most everybody else and watched helplessly as my friends died. It was hard to sit and take it. I got to know very well a hero at Khe Sanh. Not many people knew him because he hadn't been there very long before he died.

I got to know Mac (Reuben Carl McMackins) at Camp Pendleton. Whenever we got a weekend pass he would come up to my home. He was a great guy! A grunt's grunt. An expert rifleman, machine gunner and weapons specialist. He didn't get to Khe Sanh until March 5th and I only got to visit with him once before I was medevaced out on April 4th. He died retaking Hill 881N on April 14th. Enclosed is his citation for a Bronze Star and a description of how he died. If anyone out there got to know him and was with him that day, I would love to hear from you.

Sincerely,
Mike "Spider" Loehrer

P.S. I'm enclosing a little something for the Bru. Keep up the good work!

★ CITATION ★

"For heroic achievement in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam while serving as an Antitank Assault Squad Leader with Company L, Third Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, Third Marine Division. On 14 April 1968, Corporal McMackins was a member of the lead platoon as his company assaulted the crest of Hill 881 North, defended by an estimated North Vietnamese Army battalion utilizing automatic weapons and small arms fire from well entrenched positions. Unable to employ his rocket launcher due to the proximity of friendly troops, Corporal McMackins completely disregarded his own safety as he armed himself with hand grenades and daringly maneuvered forward to assault the enemy positions. Unhesitatingly exposing himself to the intense enemy fire, Corporal McMackins repeatedly threw grenades into the enemy positions until he was mortally wounded. His heroic actions and aggressive fighting spirit inspired all who observed him and contributed significantly to the accomplishment of his unit's mission.

Corporal McMackins' extraordinary courage, exceptional professionalism and selfless devotion to duty were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life in the service of his country."

Dear Ernie,

Thank you for taking the information on Lance Corporal Wilbur Stovall.

After reading the newsletter listing of the names of those killed at Khe Sanh, I noticed "Willie" was not listed. L/Cpl Wilbur "Willie" Stovall, born August 16, 1947, was a tall, thin Marine from Harrisburg, PA. He was one of seven Marines I shared a hooch with while with Hdqs. Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines at Khe Sanh. He was killed on March 9, 1968, during a daytime rocket attack.

Willie was a short-timer, having only about 15 days to go until he rotated back. One of my last memories of him was his statement: "I can't wait to get some of Ma's fried chicken". He was really excited and anxious to get back to his family. Another Marine, Paul Turnbull, and I ended up taking Willie to graves registration and helped to survey his gear.

Years later, I tried to contact his Mom to share memories and a picture I have of Willie, but I learned she had remarried and moved and have been unable to locate her.

Although Willie is on The Wall (44E Line 1), I hope you can include him on your Khe Sanh list. He deserves the recognition for the sacrifice he made.

Dear Ernie,

I noticed a few members of 3/26 have contributed to recent editions of our magazine. As both a Khe Sanh vet and a former 3/26er, I wish to commend you on the fine work you are doing in publishing The Khe Sanh Veteran. I would appreciate it if you would help me publicize the second 3/26 Reunion in a future edition.

Initial arrangements have been made to hold the 2nd 3/26 Reunion at the Sheraton Premiere Hotel in Tysons Corner, Virginia, during 21-24 July, 1994. Tysons Corner is about 15 miles from downtown Washington DC. Although there is no firm schedule yet, attending members and their families can anticipate visiting Arlington Cemetery, the Marine Corps War Memorial (Iwo Jima statue), the Vietnam Memorial and the Marine Corps Museum. Additionally, we will attend the famous Sunset Parade at Marine Barracks, 8th and I. For further information, contact Walter L. Whitesides, 10063 Wood Sorrel Lane, Burke, VA 22015. Thank you.

REUNION MEMOIRS

In July, 1993, the Khe Sanh Veterans Association held a reunion in Washington DC to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the 1968 battle at Khe Sanh. I had never been to a veterans reunion before. Over the years I had become more curious, not less, about Khe Sanh. In January, 1993, I had the opportunity to return to Vietnam and to the site of the combat base. Now came my chance to get together with the people who served there. That chance was too much to pass up.

About 300 Khe Sanh veterans from all the military services, plus their supporting personnel, overran the Holiday Inn in Georgetown in an operation that commenced on 30 June 1993. The reunion chairman, Ken Penn, did an outstanding job, thanks in no small manner to the large-caliber backup of Bernice Penn, who manifested the organizational manner (as well as the voice) of a regimental sergeant major.

Ken had served in Mortary Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, my old unit, and I found it disquieting that I could not remember him, could not place him at Khe Sanh. This confusion ended when I heard someone refer to Ken as "Lieutenant Penn". Ah! Light bulb! The Lieutenant! I think it was that fine handlebar moustache that threw me. Ken turned out to be the baby-faced fire direction officer who looked like a college freshman vaguely lost on campus, always searching for the respect second lieutenants found so elusive. I never thought of him as "Ken" and wanted to call him "Lieutenant" throughout the reunion in the interest of continuity.

The Marine Corps was heavily involved in the Khe Sanh Veterans' reunion and their support was impressive. On 1 July, the Marine Corps provided buses and drivers to take our group to the Marine Corps Combat Development Command located at Quantico, Virginia. We spent most of the morning touring a series of museums containing exhibits depicting Marine Corps air-ground operations from 1900 to the end of the Korean War. The collections were all first-class and professionally arranged. The only disturbing thing about the Marine Corps museums at Quantico is that there is nothing devoted to the Vietnam War. The official reason is lack of building space, but it is hard to believe that in its multi-billion dollar budgets, the Marine Corps cannot manage to provide another dilapidated steel building to illustrate its participation in Vietnam, the longest and biggest war in Marine Corps history.

After the museums, we toured the facilities of the Marine Corps Association, publishers of quasi-official Marine Corps magazines such as "Leatherneck", (which all recruits "volunteer" to receive while in boot camp), and "Marine Corps Gazette", the professional journal of Marine Corps officers. The Association maintains an excellent book store of military titles ranging from Clausewitz to the Gulf War.

The Khe Sanh vets were treated to a fine lunch in the Officers' Club hosted by a Brigadier General. The General gave a very emotional speech informing us how grateful the Marine Corps was for our sacrifices at Khe Sanh. The General's version of our sacrifices included the relating of such events as searching through the dump for uneaten C-Rations to ward off hunger and sucking the morning dew off sandbags when water in its more conventional form was unavailable. Once back on the buses, one vet announced that there would be a specific unit reunion for all the Marines that were involved in this sandbag dew-sucking. I don't know how many showed up.

In the afternoon we were allowed to visit Quantico town, a small Virginia ville on the outskirts of the base. Here was a fine opportunity to replace the military clothing we had outgrown since our enlistments' expired. After visiting Quantico town's uniform clothing stores, which it seems to have in lieu of fleshpots and bars, we were bussed to the Basics School, where all Marine officers receive their final infantry training. A lecture on training goals was followed by an exhibition of weapons that are organic to today's Marine infantry battalions. Most of the weapons I recognized. One exception was a slick Belgian-made light machine gun to replace the BAR. The M-79 grenade launcher was gone (known as the "blooper" in Vietnam), but this loss was more than compensated for by a grenade launcher machine gun that fired the same 40mm round, but at a firing rate of several hundred rounds per minute. 60mm and 81mm mortars were on display but not the 4.2" mortars with which my battery had been armed. The only 4.2" mortar I saw at Quantico had been relegated to the Korean War era museum. The active duty young Marines at Quantico seemed to view the Khe Sanh vets as museum pieces as well.

On the third day of the reunion, the Khe Sanh vets travelled by bus to the Arlington National Cemetery. There, in a warm and steady rain, children of Khe Sanh veterans participated in a wreath laying ceremony at the Khe Sanh Veterans Memorial. Indicative of the official support was the presence of Marine General Carl E Mundy Jr., Commandant of the Marine Corps, as the featured speaker.

In the evening, the rain further dampened the plans of the Khe Sanh vets. On the schedule was the Marine Corps Evening Parade held at Marine Barracks, 8th & I Streets, Washington DC. This is the oldest post in the Corps, occupied since 1801 on a site approved by President Thomas Jefferson. After sitting on Marine Corps buses for over an hour, the Marine Corps decided to take a chance on the weather and proceed with the parade. Although it had rained most of the day, the clouds disappeared as we arrived at the Marine Barracks. A First Sergeant magnificently attired in dress blues assured us that the weather would co-operate for the duration of the program. Within minutes, the moon was visible.

The Evening Parade is an extremely impressive ceremony. The Khe Sanh vets, as guests of honor, were given reserved seating. First up was a concert by the Marine Corps Band, "The President's Own". Second was the appearance of the Marine Corps Drum and Bugle Corps and near the end, with the sun fully set and the parade ground illuminated by floodlight, was the Silent Drill Platoon Rifle Inspection. These men are truly dazzling and do things with fixed-bayoneted M-1's that I would have not thought possible. At the end of the ceremony, the grounds were plunged into darkness. Breaking the stillness of the moment, a lone Marine appeared bathed in spotlight on the roof of the barracks. The magical notes of "Taps" lent solemnity and dignity to the end of the ceremony. It was impossible not to be proud of being an ex-Marine.

On the evening of 3 July there was a Banquet at the hotel. The invocation and benediction were given by Ray Stubbe, who had been the base chaplain at Khe Sanh during the siege, as well as co-author of the best history book of the battle at Khe Sanh. The special presentation guest speaker was Nguyen Tuong Anh, Regional Director of the Vietnamese Nationalist Peoples Party. Anh thanked the Khe Sanh vets for their sacrifices and ended his talk with the presentation to the veterans of his party's flag; red stripes on a yellow field (a la the Republic of Vietnam Service medal which we were all entitled to wear).

Following the Banquet was a memorial service at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial at the Mall. This was the first visit to The Wall for many of the Khe Sanh vets, and given their history, they were certain to find many familiar names. No vet walks away from The Wall unaffected.

Some Khe Sanh vets began to trickle home on the 4th of July. Most stayed. No formal activities were scheduled by the reunion committee but there is always plenty to do in Washington in the summer. In the evening, 450,000 people were at the Mall for a spectacular fireworks display above the Washington monument. This was the best fireworks display I had ever seen, but a vet standing next to me was overwhelmed by it, especially when numerous rockets would go off simultaneously. Fireworks don't particularly remind me of Vietnam, but this vet was forced to turn away, ears plugged, eyes closed tightly and fear evident on the face that pressed into my shoulder.

A good number of the vets I met were involved with police work. The best t-shirt read: HOMICIDE CHICAGO POLICE: OUR DAY BEGINS WHEN YOUR'S ENDS

One of the most satisfying things about this reunion for me was my ability to appreciate the stories I heard. Often, when I talk with vets, the places and events are foreign to me, but not at this reunion. Most in attendance were Marines and most had spent their tours of duty in I Corps in the late 1960's. If I hadn't been to the places they described, at least I had read about them and could find them on a map.

Life at Khe Sanh had been difficult. Often there were insufficient rations. It was impossible to keep clean, and most of our gear had been destroyed by incoming. Hundreds died. I left Vietnam shortly after leaving Khe Sanh, certain that my unit and the others that had experienced the siege would be in for easier times. This, however, was not the case. Virtually everyone I spoke with ran into greater difficulties after departing Khe Sanh.

One former Corpsman, recently retired from the Navy, told me over breakfast of his experiences at a place called LZ Margo. After two days of battle, only two men in his platoon of 58 remained unscathed. An entire squadron of medium helicopters was required to evacuate the casualties.

One individual I knew well in Vietnam receives a 100% disability for PTSD — something I never heard of before. When his unit got overrun by VC sappers on the Cao Doi Peninsula, killing nine Marines and wounding 18, this Marine, a clerk, wound up beating an enemy soldier in the face with his rifle butt. But the M-16 is not as robust as the M-14 we used for hand-to-hand combat training, and it was necessary to use a bayonet to finish off the VC sapper. The VC threw a satchel charge into one bunker killing all the occupants except one. The bodies were badly burned and had to be identified by dental records. The lone survivor was at the reunion.

Some of the best times at the reunion were at the hotel bar. I met a music teacher from upstate New York and a South African journalist who were completely mystified by this strange collection of people. Neither had even heard of Khe Sanh before wandering into the bar. Several vets brought slides from Khe Sanh and projected them onto the wall. It was interesting for me to hear them argue about what these slides depicted. They couldn't agree on much, each sure of his own authority because, you see, each had been at Khe Sanh.

"What do you mean that isn't Hill 861! Right there is where John got hit!"

"Hill 861 is where I got hit! That's not a picture of Hill 861, goddamn it! I oughta know Hill 861 when I see it! I lived there for months!"

And on and on...

I never visited any of the hill positions during the siege. We felt that at some point the NVA would attempt to overrun the base and that the hill positions would be attacked first. Life on those hilltops seemed to be particularly bleak. They were more exposed to enemy fire and clearly at the end of the supply line. I expressed these sentiments to a Marine who spent the siege on Hill 881 South, explaining how badly I felt that they had had to spend the siege there.

"We felt badly for you guys on the base!" he replied with a huge smile. "We could hear the rockets and artillery pass overhead on its way to your position, and see every round impact into the base. We were glad to be on the hills!"

One vet from the 3d Recon Battalion told me of sending home an M-79 grenade launcher, an M-14 capable of firing fully automatic plus several fragmentation grenades in a sea bag. His mother followed instructions and did not open the bag when it arrived home. The thrill of possessing such firepower diminished over the years and he eventually threw the fragmentation grenades into Great South Bay off Long Island, inadvertently killing a sea turtle. The M-79 rounds were placed in concrete when he built an addition onto his house. When I jokingly suggested he might want to sell the M-14 to a drug dealer he admitted that he had been offered 4 ounces of cocaine for the rifle. We discussed the possibility of my acquiring the M-79 grenade launcher but nothing came of it.

This vet also related a story whereby he acquired a knapsack from a dead NVA soldier. The pack contained some clothing items, letters from home, some photographs, two balls of rice and a quantity of marijuana. My experience with marijuana in Vietnam was that it was very strong stuff. My battalion alone fired tens of thousands of artillery rounds into the NVA positions and the airstrikes were continuous. It must have been quite a sensation being caught in a napalm strike whilst stoned on industrial-strength marijuana — especially with nothing to munch on except rice balls.

Many of the anecdotes involved Marines helping each other.

One infantryman told me of being medevaced after being sprayed with shrapnel. He was terrified of riding in a helicopter and quickly became cold as the chopper gained altitude. Recognizing his fear and discomfort, the door gunner covered the injured Marine with his coat and stuck a lit cigarette in his mouth.

Maybe it's the memory of such little things that made these people want to get together again. Men are notorious for their inability to show affection, especially to other men. I don't know why that doesn't seem to be the case in war. In terms of camaraderie, these men lost none of it in the twenty five years since Khe Sanh. Former battalion commanders huddled and talked with former privates. Best of friends who had not seen each other since their Vietnam days spent hours together in the bar, bringing themselves up to date. Men who still had physical problems from their war experiences were helped by men who went home unscathed. The sense of "family" was overwhelming and very satisfying.

At Khe Sanh we mostly lived in bunkers and trenches. I had no occasion to meet people from other units. The marines occupying the hill positions I never even saw. On the combat base we were forbidden to be above ground unless we had a need. Whatever we did at Khe Sanh in 1968, we mostly did in isolation from one another. I, for one, am grateful for the opportunity to meet these people.

At breakfast, one vet greeted a friend from his unit. "Hey dude, how you doing?"

The reply was: "I'm doing just fine. I haven't slept this good in years!"

Dear Ernie,

Sorry for being AWOL for the last few years. In May I got The Khe Sanh Veteran spring issue. I was taken back to say the least by what I read. While reading the Chronology and wiping a little moisture that collected under my eyes from old memories, it showed that on April 24th, 1967, 1st and 3d PLTs of B/1/9 made extensive contact with NVA on Hill 861. So that's what they called it. We, K/3/9, arrived April 26th. We were on the N.W. corner of the strip, by the tree stump that Charlie used as an aim stake. Anyway, we left the strip on the 28th to help B/1/9 on 861. When we finally got to the hill, we were carrying wounded and dead off for hours and eventually got to the last of the Company at the 3rd stairstep that afternoon. Where the hell was 2/3?

Then it states: "Hill 881 South captured by 3/3 May 2nd, 1967". A few things seem to have been lost in the shuffle — things like how, the day before, 224 Marines from Kilo Company 3rd BN 9th Marines tried to go up 881 South. That afternoon and early evening, 159 walking and wounded were pulled back down the hill, across that little stream and up on hill 600 for the night. That night, choppers landed by candlelight in B-3 cans to resupply us. The next morning, after the arty and air kicked ass, we went back up the hill. I was the first Marine over the top that morning. I got to find our dead from the day before. If 3/3 was there, they must have been further to the North and closer to 881 North. There are a lot of things we've forgotten in 26 years, but there's a lot we'll never forget either. History may show the victory to 3/3, but for all those killed from 3/9 Kilo, I had to say something.

There is also one more thing, if you will indulge me. Several days after taking the hill, we started looking for our MIA's. We found a Marine who had been dead for some time. Graves Registration was called and the gentleman came out. The reason I'm writing this is one, to say I'm sorry to that man and two, for saying how glad I am that those people existed and did such a great job in finding out who the dead were and seeing to it that they got shipped home. This man came to the site and started collecting the dead Marine's personal effects; rings, watch, and bagging them. I got mad about how he was doing his job and started yelling at him and trying to get him to fight. I was 19 and had never seen such horrors as I had in the last 2 weeks. Now, at 45, and having thought about it throughout the years, I just hope that man has forgiven me for my stupidity. We "Combat Vets" think we had it tough. I haven't read or heard anything about these courageous people. There is no way in hell I could have done their job without going nuts. These men saw more horror in one week than we probably saw in our whole tour.

Sincerely,
John Porter
K/3/9

P.S. Thanks for allowing me to get a few things off my chest. Maybe a few more memories can be softened now.

Dear Sir,

I've read the volume 1:2 Spring 1993 edition of The Khe Sanh Veteran and found the Chronology very interesting.

On the 2nd July, 1968, Delta Company hit some shit off 689. Our Commander was Col. Archie Van Winkle (Ole Arch), Medal of Honor winner in Korea. For a while, possession of the hill was in question. At one time the NVA flag was near the top of the hill. On the 6th July, we (A/1/1) left Hill 861 and reinforced "dying Delta" (our nickname for Delta Co. — they were similar in make-up to the "Walking Dead" 9th Marines).

Ole Arch devised his 'body snatcher' teams idea after looking over the area from my fighting hole. He would then head back to his command post on the airstrip side of 689. It was an honor to have him reconnoiter from my position, but it soon grew tiresome. He would be there long enough to draw the NVA's attention and almost enough time for them to set up the mortars and snipers, then he'd leave, graciously permitting A/1/1's 1st Platoon to be the proud recipient of his incoming!

For many years I'd thought I was the very last Marine to leave the valley. I was part of the last fireteam out and was the very last one to leave. We hololifted from K.S. Hill 689 on 12th July. I have mixed feelings now in finding out that some of the 4th Marines remained behind on 950 and the honor of covering our rear went elsewhere, and not to me.

Also, it should be noted that Corpsman Clausen, a Khe Sanh veteran, was killed S.E. of Con Thien a short time later, along with the Platoon radioman and our Lt. Later still, in the Dodge City area south of Da Nang, we lost Billy Pless and "Clancy". (God, I wish I could remember their names better — I remember their smiles and every hair on their face, their laughs — they certainly deserve so much better from me). These guys were at Khe Sanh and brought great honor on themselves and us. They never slacked off at all. They gave me my courage and love for all the members of the "brotherhood".

I'm a member of the Boulder Vet Center in Boulder, Colorado, which is where I discovered your newsletter. Like a lot of us vets, I'm only now finding out that I'm not alone. I've endured 25 years of sadness and anger. Thanks to the people at the Boulder Vet Center, and people like you and your newsletter, I and others can come home without abandoning the memories of our times and fellow warriors.

Thank you very much.

Dear Ernie,

In the Fall '92 Khe Sanh Veteran, there is an article on page 24 about Hill 881. Being part of the Shore Party Helicopter Support Team on 881, I was involved in the medevacs. As usual, the cloud cover was inpenetrable and I had to radio Khe Sanh for the aircraft for the evac. Due to the cloud cover, we used 81mm mortar illumination to try and guide the aircraft in. In the clouds as you know, sound direction is diffused. I recall shooting pencil flares to pinpoint the L.Z. which was on the top of the hill. There were only three L.Z.'s on 881, these being at the east end, the top of the hill and the saddle.

As mentioned in the article, almost every aircraft was mortared. Unfortunately, I can't remember many details — I guess there was just too much shit going on. Captain Dabney wanted to come up with a better resupply plan. This was due to the lack of L.Z.'s. We discussed painting 105mm shell boxes different colors and moving them at night. The super gaggle system took care of that. I can only remember one man who was KIA because I couldn't get him off the hill because of weather. In my opinion, the aircrews have got balls the size of an elephant. To fly at night and with no visibility is incredible.

I also want to inform you of my future trip back to the Nam. I'm going in June. I have previously visited a small village outside of Dalat where the government has moved these hill people (approximately 35-50 people) to work in a chopstick factory! You would not believe the abject poverty there. Anyway, apart from taking clothing and medical supplies over for them, I've also started a collection for a pig fund; this is to buy 2 sows and 10 chickens for the village.

At the February reunion in Chicago, I told Ken Penn that I will bring back 20 Montagnard bracelets for the P.X. at D.C. I'm also going to throw in a couple of 'Apocalypse Now' T-shirts — they are really neat!

Finally, would you put my brother's name on the membership roster. Earl Breeding was his C.O. in 1967. His name is L/Cpl Gerald A Lee, 32810 Sutton, New Baltimore, Mich. 48247. He was in 1st Platoon, Echo Company, 2nd BN, 3rd MAR in 1967. He got hit on 861 during the hill fights. I got hit on 881 in February 1968.

See you in D.C.

Dear Ernie,

First of all, let me say that not only have I enjoyed all issues of the newsletter, but I've appreciated them as well. While I've always had contact with one or two of the guys that I served with, it was always a very lonely feeling; just a few of us left. The Organization and the Newsletter helps combat the sense of isolation.

As much as I would like to write some interesting, insightful, thought provoking article that would be a valuable contribution, I am unfortunately unable to do so. You see Skipper, I know my limitations and writing is one of them — that's why I never got past the title for my book, "Lima Papa 3".

I am being somewhat lighthearted in the opening of this letter because I don't want you to take any additional comments in a manner in which they are not intended. You see, I'm not trying to be critical and if it comes across that way, then I apologize in advance. I guess my Vietnam service in general and Khe Sanh in particular just means a lot to me; it's had such a dynamic, positive (despite the setbacks) impact on my life that I refuse to forget it, despite advice to the contrary from well-meaning civilians. Not only do I not want to forget it, but I want to push for preserving accurate memories of the people, as well as the events. Bearing this in mind, here are my comments: In the Honor Roll listing of those killed, you listed Jack C Boggard, KIA 02/05/68 as serving with Echo 2/3. Boggard was Echo 2/26, one of our 7 KIA's when the NVA very unwisely tried to exercise eminent domain on Hill 861-A. If you recall, Echo Company 2/26 decisively instructed the Hanoi government in the legally binding concept of "Squatters Rights".

In the listing of Khe Sanh veterans who were later killed in action, many names were omitted. In the 1991 Fall issue, I made a dedication to ten members of Echo 2/26, "Khe Sanh Veterans All", who were later KIA. I will admit to terrible spelling (how many did we know by nicknames?) and atrocious handwriting, but I was close and I did have the dates correct. Anyway, here is a relisting:

Cpl Ken Schabel	(6/6/68)
L/Cpl Denny Dabozzo	(6/6/68)
L/Cpl Danny Prock	(6/6/68)
PFC Bill Campbell	(6/6/68)
L/Cpl Stan Pettit	(9/15/68)
L/Cpl Gary Daffin	(9/16/68)
L/Cpl Joe Robles	(9/16/68)
PFC J.C. "Bull" Durham	(9/16/68)
S/Sgt Juan Sanchez	(9/17/68)
L/Cpl Jim Haggey	(12/6/68)

In addition, I've since learned of two other Khe Sanh veterans who were killed during later operations. L/Cpl Cliff Spillver was WIA on 9/16/68 and died of his wounds on 9/28/68. The story of PFC Mike Hayes is self-explanatory once you read the newspaper articles I've enclosed. One article I took out of The Toledo Blade whilst the other articles were sent to me by Mike Worth: It's just like Jim Kaylor not to blow his own horn!

Finally, I am enclosing a name, address and phone number of a new listing. Just found out last week that my current USMCR Commanding Officer (for the past year and a half no less) flew choppers (46's no less) in and around the combat base. I have photocopied the reunion registration and information and mailed it to him, so he should be there.

P.S. Speaking of The Wall, I won't go into the reasons why, but I will say that I've always had a very bad attitude about The Wall. I've refused to go in the past when I've had the opportunity. I could even be the disgruntled veteran (God, how I hate the word 'disgruntled'; it denotes unjustified, and my feelings are most definitely not unjustified) that Lew Puller refers to in his book "Fortunate Son" after a conversation we had approximately 10 years ago when I was in D.C. and didn't go to The Wall. I'll be there for the 25th because I've decided "to go to The Wall with the guys who went to the wall with me" — the ones who went to the wall with me in '68 when I needed them.

23 YEARS LATER, HERO GETS HIS DUE

"On a blistering summer day in Vietnam more than 23 years ago, a 19 year old Marine from Chicago named William Allen Hayes died saving another Marine's life by charging an enemy machine gun, helmetless, bare-chested and with a grenade in each hand.

"On a biting winter morning in McHenry on Friday, Bill Hayes was honored for what he did on June 6, 1968. With the man he saved standing nearby and a Marine color guard behind them, Hayes' surviving brother and sister accepted a Certificate of Commendation from 1st Sgt Randie Scobee of the Marines' Inspector-Instructor staff in Waukegan.

"I'm glad I got it off my chest," said Jim Kaylor, a big man with a mustache to match his size, who is now a sergeant with the Los Angeles County sheriff's Department.

"At least the family knows. That was the most important thing."

Dear Ernie,

I'm trying to locate a buddy from Vietnam. Clarence Carlson and I are trying to get in touch with Stanley Lopez. Carlson thinks he was from San Antonio, Texas.

The three of us were survivors of a recon mission to investigate results of a B-52 bombing of a location some 15 clicks northwest of Khe Sanh. We were in 3rd Recon, Alpha Company at Khe Sanh during April and May of 1967. It is my understanding that our mission started the first battle of Khe Sanh. All three of us were wounded on that mission. Four did not come home on that 10th of May. While I was in the hospital in Japan, I was told by Lopez that there had been 13 attempts by choppers to pick us up. I was also told that most of the pilots and co-pilots were wounded during the extraction attempts. I would very much like to hear from those crews. I want to thank them.

On May 9th, we were to be taken out to a location 15 clicks northwest of Khe Sanh at dawn. In fact, we were actually choppered out there around 4.00 p.m. We found an extensive bunker complex approximately 300 yards from the L.Z. Whilst no one was at home in the 50 or so bunkers, indications revealed that the NVA had been there and had left in many directions. My team leader, Sgt Tycz called in after we had completed our mission but for some unknown reason, we could not be extracted that day. In order to avoid the risk of ambush in trying to get to a different L.Z., we were ordered to set up a small perimeter on high ground among the bunkers. During the night, the NVA returned from all directions and re-occupied their bunkers again. We decided to let them settle down and then attempt to crawl out. However, that idea soon went out the window when two of them walked right up on us whilst crossing their compound. Lopez killed those two but not before they wounded Lt. Ahlmeyer, who was attending our mission to learn the ropes. He was on his first mission in Vietnam. Then all hell broke out. The Lt. and Sgt Tycz were wounded in the opening salvos. The Lt kept groaning and grenades were zeroing in on his moans. Sgt Tycz was in close proximity with the Lt and threw back three grenades before one wounded him in the face. Then he began to moan as well. Carlson treated both men, administering morphine to calm them down. At that point we called in artillery on our own position but it turned out that we were out of range. We called Puff in on our position too.

The closest bunkers were about 10-20 yards downhill from us and we threw grenades at them, returning as many of their grenades as we could find. At that time we were in 3 feet high elephant grass. I remember throwing one back myself. L/Cpl Sam Sharp Jr. was shot through the head right next to me. I saw him fire an automatic burst into the ground. I crawled over to see how he was but he had a hole the size of a silver dollar in the back of his head.

A few minutes later I was wounded by a bullet that I later found out had bounced around my insides, tearing up much of my intestines. But I was still able to fight. Lopez was to my left and Carlson was across the perimeter from us. Sometime, I'm not sure when, the Lt., Sgt Tycz and one other man whose name I can't recall, died.

Not long ago, I found out Carlson was wounded a number of times. Lopez was wounded, I think, four times.

I can recall only three attempts to extract us, when the inbound chopper would turn its lights on about 50 feet above the ground. The NVA cross-fired machine gun fire at them. I got wounded in the back by a concus- continued on page 34

sion grenade and lost consciousness. The next morning I awoke to dirt hitting me from air strikes. Carlson saw me and told me to grab a weapon, ammunition and canteens and move closer to his position. Napalm was dropped at the bottom of the hill. As the fire from the napalm burned up the hill toward us, we were being fired at by snipers. Two Jolly Green Giants were sent to draw fire on each side of the hill and a Huey swept in to pick us up. I laid down cover fire for Carlson and Lopez as a sniper was firing at me and I had an idea where he was. When I dove for the chopper, I didn't have strength enough to get in and the door gunner grabbed my arm as we took off. We took one round through the chopper as I was pulled in.

Needless to say, I was scared shitless. This was my first and only combat contact while serving with 3rd Recon. Lopez told me that he and Carlson thought I had died. He also told me that between the two of them, 29 NVA fell from their small arms fire. They must have been more interested in getting the choppers than getting us. The NVA also didn't know how many of us there were. Lopez said he and Carlson would cease firing and lay quietly and the NVA would send only a few at a time to see if they were still conscious. He said they picked the NVA off as they silhouetted in the moonlight. He states that of the 29 killed, he can only account for 4 of them. Carlson must have been really busy! I have had contact with Carlson but he is having trouble remembering what happened. Lopez has his perspective of what happened. He was our radioman and was on the radio almost continuously. If the three of us can get together, maybe we can be successful in getting Sgt Tycz or Clarence Carlson the Medal of Honor.

As I understand it, our rescuers that day were Major General Bruno Hochmuth's crew, who volunteered to make one last attempt to extract us and, thankfully, were successful. Unfortunately, later the same year, the General and his crew were all killed whilst attempting to rescue fellow Marines. If anyone out there knows the names of the General's crew, I would very much appreciate this information.

P.S. Enclosed you will find a check for my dues. Also, I am in full support of the monument project at Khe Sanh. However, I feel it would be much more meaningful if it could somehow represent both sides. After all — the NVA fought there too.

Dear Mr Spencer,

A lot has happened since that episode my husband has written about. Britt spent almost two years in and out of the hospital recovering from wounds received whilst in Vietnam. He and I married in November 1971 and he was finally able to get a job in 1974 with the National Park Service. He stayed with the NPS but over the years we have had to move 28 times. In February 1992, Carlson located Britt and called him. That call brought back all the memories Britt had bottled up for the last 25 years. It all became too much and Britt broke. Since that time, he has attended the Waco VA being treated for PTSD and it has not been pleasant.

Britt never talked about Vietnam or associated with anyone who had been over there until he got that call, so all this is new to me and the kids. (The kids are aged 10 and 12 and are adopted. Britt's battle wounds prevented us from having any of our own).

I am very glad he is now opening up. Thank you.

VIETNAM DESIDERATA

(Found in an old bunker at Khe Sanh — 1969)

❦ O placidly amid the artillery fire and rocket explosions and remember what peace may be found in body count. As far as possible be on combative terms with all people. Speak your truth with firepower and listen for signs of VC and NVA ambushes.

❦ Avoid loud and aggressive AK-47 fire for it is a vexation to staying alive, and you may likely incur a sucking chest wound. If you compare your M-16 with the AK-47, you may become bitter or vain, for always there will be greater and lesser weapons than yours — namely the damn Soviet B-40 rocket. Enjoy your achievements as well as your plans to kill more.

❦ Keep interested in your survival; however humble, it is the only way you will ever get laid again. Exercise caution in your business affairs for the jungle is full of booby-traps, mines and devious eyes with vindictive and malicious inclinations toward you. But let this not blind you to what virtue there is, and to what Phantoms can do. Many people strive for a successful search and destroy mission, but Tac-Air can make it a reality. Especially do not be inhibited about shouting "Medic!" Neither be cynical about war — remember, it has given our girl "Hollywood Jane" an opportunity to exercise her ambition to become a foreign film star.

❦ Be youself — no matter what the Sergeant-Major wants you to be! Avoid altruistic behavior while in the bush, and remember that when you've got 'em by the gonads, their hearts and minds will become very cooperative to your ways.

❦ Nurture strength of spirit and firepower to shield you on those occasions when the defecation hits the cooling apparatus. Do not distress yourself with imaginings; Charlie wants to rip your ass apart with high-velocity projectiles and that's no jive! Many fears are born of fatigue and loneliness, but that ain't nothing compared to the fears born in the midst of the mud, and the blood, and the bullets. Take kindly the counsel of years (if you live that long) and gracefully surrender the things of youth, but not your claymores. Beyond a wholesome discipline, be gentle with, and protective of yourself; when in doubt you must pull the trigger.

❦ You are an American soldier of the universe — no less than John Wayne, or napalm, or white phosphorous. So, be at war with whatever the hell gets in your way. And remember, with all life's sham and drudgery and broken dreams, there are still awards and decorations. Press on in the face of political adversity — some protesters at home will never fathom the philosophical depth of it, but one reason you are in the Nam is to defend their continued rights to disagree with you.

❦ Therefore, step lively in your unselfish and noble purpose to defend the freedom of a struggling country. However cliche, freedom ain't free. Ours was bought, paid for and reinsured by hard-fisted American patriots.

returned from a Veterans Reunion in Kokomo, Indiana, along with Ken, Bernice and many other Khe Sanh vets. I personally met 20 existing members and signed up another 38. I can remember no time in my life when I was able to make 58 new friends in one day.

That was the "up" side. The down side came when I called a member to see why he didn't make it to D.C. this summer. His widow explained that he had passed away 9 months ago. I sent a card — but nine months after the fact is unacceptable. We need to be there for each other as soon as possible. Had we had this network in place this would not have happened. Communication is the key. It is the key to success in times of emotional need, the key to our growth and stability, the key to accomplishing the ongoing mission of this organization.

We wonder why so many do not attend our reunions or fall off the active membership rolls. My personal experience, having talked to all of my men in Indiana was that many have still not found that personal friend they shared a meal with. Many of my new friends came to Kokomo at my request simply because I picked up the phone and let them know that I cared. They don't realize how good I felt that they cared enough to come and see me. We all survived Khe Sanh because we were there for each other. Do we not all now deserve the fruits of our labor?

I need special people for this project. They need to be compassionate. They need to give of their time and have the ability to withstand the attacks from "MA BELL". They must be able to write letters on occasion and respond with cards when necessary. It will be a very simple chain of command. District Co-ordinators will be appointed by State Co-ordinators. When all State Co-ordinators are in place, I, as Vice President, will appoint Regional Co-ordinators. Each will be responsible for members in their respective districts. We will try to keep each district at no more than 100 members. Each Co-ordinator will keep in touch with his members and seek out new membership whenever opportunities present themselves.

There is no pay or reimbursement authorized. Monies may be donated for flower funds only subject to approval by our President or Board of Directors.

I am also sending out the challenge to all of the wives or "significant others". This is 1993 and although I live "back in the sticks", I am acutely aware of, and very sensitive to the needs of the women. After all, you have put up with us all these years (sometimes I wonder why), and like it or not, you are a part of the experience known as "Khe Sanh".

I have enlisted the help of a very special person, Janet Parker, to head up the "Khe Sanh Women's Network". Some of you met Janet in Washington D.C. I know she is just the right person for the job. This will give everyone the opportunity to write and communicate your own experiences. I know 3 days just doesn't do it.

I have talked with Ernie Spencer and he agrees wholeheartedly that the other half of this organization has more than earned the right to voice their feelings in our newsletter, and has indicated to me that space will be made available to the "Khe Sanh Veterans Womens Network". Letters for now should go to Janet Parker.

REUNION BRIEF

While on vacation at Yosemite, one of my colleagues met an ex-Marine, Vietnam combat vet who is now a harbor cop in L.A. My colleague told him about Manny Babbitt and he was very interested in Manny's situation and asked us to send him more information about the case. The network is growing.

For the past four years I have been deeply involved in the case of Manny Babbitt, a Khe Sanh vet who now sits on death row in California. In the course of my representation of Manny, I have sought to reconstruct his life leading up to his commission of the crime for which he has been sentenced to die. Without a doubt, no other event in Manny's life had more significance in terms of shaping his future than Vietnam, and in particular, Khe Sanh.

A couple of months ago, I received a phone call from John Hargesheimer, who served with Manny in the 3d AT's. John, who has been corresponding with Manny for some time, had given us a powerful and moving affidavit for Manny's case about his memories of Manny at Khe Sanh and what they both experienced there. John called me to find out how things were going for Manny, and during our conversation he told me about a 25th reunion of Khe Sanh vets scheduled to take place in D.C. over the 4th of July. John thought he might go and suggested that I might want to go on Manny's behalf as well. I thought it was a great idea. So did Manny.

Before I actually booked a plane reservation, I talked to Ernie Spencer, Ray Stubbe and Bernice Penn, who all responded with enthusiasm to my request to attend the reunion on Manny's behalf. Ray, like John, had already contributed significantly to Manny's case, and Ernie had previously corresponded with Manny and knew him from his contributions to the newsletter. I was quite amazed, however, that Bernice knew who Manny was before I even mentioned his name.

In spite of my conversations with Ernie, Ray and Bernice, I still felt somewhat apprehensive about how everyone at the reunion would feel about my presence, since I was an outsider and a public defender, no less!

Within five minutes of my arrival at the Georgetown Holiday Inn, I knew that everything was going to be just fine. It was 7 a.m. on Thursday morning and I was standing outside the hospitality room waiting for Bernice to open it so I could register. Jack Kilbride and John Macias and their wives, who were standing there with me, turned and asked me who I was. I told them and then braced myself, waiting for them to give me some awkward response and turn back to their conversation. Boy, was I ever surprised when they not only responded with genuine interest and empathy for Manny, but told me how great they thought it was that I had come all that way to attend the reunion on his behalf.

The rest of my experiences over that reunion weekend were very similar to the one I've just described. There were so many people who expressed concern about Manny, as well as gratitude that I was trying to help one of their brothers. The warmth and kindness was simply overwhelming. I never once felt like an outsider. I truly felt like I belonged.

Although I spent time talking to a lot of different people during the reunion, I spent the greatest amount of time with Gary Dahlheimer, Fred Swets and, of course, John Hargesheimer, the guys who served with Manny in the 3d AT's. I had absolutely the best time with those guys and after only four days felt like I had a real bond with them. The only thing that made me sad was thinking about the fact that Manny should have been the fourth member of that quartet, how positive and healing the experience would have been for him and how much everyone would have enjoyed him as well.

When you guys were at Khe Sanh I was just 12 years old. Before I met Manny I had only a vague idea about what a Marine was. I'd never heard anyone say "Semper Fi" or if I had, it made no impression on me. After spending four days with the Marines who were at Khe Sanh, I think I have a much greater understanding of what that motto means. Thank you for including me. I sincerely hope to see you all again soon.

Dear Friend,

I am writing to once again ask your assistance with our In Touch program. As you may recall, In Touch is a locator service to connect families, friends and fellow veterans who lost someone in Vietnam. We have found that these connections are very rewarding and help the healing process for both families and veterans.

Originally, it was intended that when a family and veteran wrote in about the same person who is on the Wall, we would put them in contact with each other. However, we have found that by networking we have been more successful and can expedite the process.

Any publication and distribution of the lists of names increases the likelihood that we will locate people that knew the veterans...therefore a match. We have been pleasantly surprised by the number of matches that have been made this way and are deeply appreciative of your help.

You can also assist by spreading the word about In Touch. Anyone desiring to find the family, friends and fellow veterans of a KIA or MIA veteran can participate in the program.

Please call if you have any questions or comments. Any help you can give us in these areas would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

Dear Sir,

My name is Lee Craig and I am the Director of an all volunteer vet for vet outreach center in Redding, California. We call our store-front center L.Z. Dust-Off, a term I became quite used to as an R.T.O. with the 1st Cav Division in 1968. I have just returned from my fourth trip to Southeast Asia to work with Bob Taylor and Mike Harris of World Aid. Mike is a very good friend of mine and we have done a lot of work together over there in the last few years. I put teams of vets together to go over and work with them. While there, he showed me your newsletter. I found it quite interesting. I think it would make a great addition to the literature we make available to the veterans that utilize our center. I would like to know what it costs, or if there is a possibility of receiving a free copy. We operate completely on private donations so our financial base limits us.

Mike told me that your organization has considered doing some work with them to assist the tribals there. It is a great experience and very rewarding. It has been a very positive experience for me and those that I have been on team with. Please feel free to contact me on this matter, or any others. I am usually in the office Tuesday thru Friday. My fax number is (916) 243-8127. If there is a time that you are coming north, please let me know and stop by and see us.

In service to others.

Aloha Ernie,

I sent you a letter a few months back and you gave it to Ray Stubbe. I received a very good letter from Ray. Thank you for that because I am corresponding with him now. I am still struggling with PTSD and his letter gave me a little boost of confidence which I surely need right now.

Please accept this donation of fifty bucks to your fine organization. I look forward to receiving your newsletter. I flew with VMGR-152, HMM-362 and other HMM's from February '67 to March '68. I was in and out of Khe Sanh many times and flew all over I Corps.

Keep up the good work Ernie. Are you from Hawaii? I married a Hawaiian girl (Makuakane) and live in Keaukaha (Hilo) on the big island. The gentle and caring "Aloha spirit" from my o'hana has kept me sane these many years. I wish all vets could find this peace and forgiveness that I've found here. God bless you Ernie.

Aloha

ED NOTE: I am a Hawaii country boy, born and raised.

Dear Bill,

Sorry for the delay in my response but I have been diagnosed with cancer and all my thoughts and efforts have been concentrated on fighting this illness.

I would like to be able to send more money to support the cause but at this time, I am out of work on disability and only receiving half pay. When I get back on my feet I will try to send an additional contribution, for I believe what Ray, Preacher Husted and the rest of you have accomplished is remarkable.

I would stress that for those who have not done so, they be tested for Agent Orange, as I was recently tested. The probability is quite high that my results will come back positive, because the areas in which I served on my two tours were heavily sprayed with it. I put off getting tested because I guess I didn't want to know. Try and encourage others not to make the same mistake I made. The deadline for testing for Agent Orange and applying for benefits is December 1993. The benefits would principally be for one's surviving children should they incur medical problems.

I have to close now. Once again, sorry for the delay in my response.

Dear Ernie,

Having just finished reading your latest issue of The Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter and then pacing the floor for a few minutes, I have decided to write you this letter. I would like to congratulate you and those others who have been responsible for such an important and needed outlet for us Khe Sanh vets.

Now, after those well thought out words of praise, can anybody tell me why in the MMMM it's taken me so long to find out about you guys? For years I have wondered what has happened to all my buddies in 3/26, and especially Hill 881, India Company. Looks like through the Khe Sanh vets, I may now have a chance to find them again.

I stumbled upon your Fall 1992 newsletter while attending a counseling session at our local Vet Center. Unfortunately, PTSD is alive and well in my life but with the help of my counselor here, I think things are going to start having a better outlook.

Ironically, I just began this week to write my own memoirs of my experiences in Vietnam, especially during the TET Offensive. I was in and out of Khe Sanh with 3/26 from September '67 until after the Offensive. The majority of the time I was on Hill 881S with India Company 81mm mortars. I was a 2511 Wireman who spent a lot of time giving that familiar "Incoming Co Roc" warning to my brothers down in Khe Sanh Combat Base throughout the Siege.

I hope to hear from anyone who remembers me. I have needed this newsletter for some time. I do thank you.

Dear Ernie,

Having just finished writing my first letter to you, I thought it was time to write another one! I know — where did this guy come from...did he have just a little too much fruit cake or ham and mothers?

No, the truth is that I am really excited about discovering The Khe Sanh Veterans.

Your newsletter has come to my attention at one of the most critical times of my life. PTSD has only recently reared its ugly head in my life and I have spent the last year trying to understand both the condition and myself as well. I have found that I've suffered from this condition since my tour and, of course, it has had profound emotional and psychological effects on my family life and other relationships, as well as other areas of my life like job, social, etc. But enough of that — the real purpose of this is to introduce myself a little more thoroughly.

As stated previously, I am a Khe Sanh vet, having served in Nam from August '67 thru September '68. I spent my entire tour assigned to the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines. Shortly after ending my enlistment, I married my wife Pam and we began our life and family together. We have three wonderful children; Mark 21, Marcia 17 and Michelle 10. I have worked in the banking business, owned our own family restaurant and now work for a Native American organization as the Director of a JTPA employment and training program.

Rather late in my career I earned a Masters degree from the Wichita State University in Sociology. I have used both my education and life experiences to help those needing direction and focus in their lives with regard to employment needs. I have developed my skills as a career counselor and in grant management and administration of a non-profit organization. Although not Native American myself (I am Mexican American), I have been able to serve Native American Indian vets on a more personal level because of my Vietnam experience and particular awareness of the difficulties we all endured after our tours.

Despite the influence of PTSD in my life, I am proud of the accomplishments I have achieved and feel compelled to assist other persons, vets or not, who are afflicted by the disorder. I think that The Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter may be just the forum to accomplish this. Please send me any registration information I may need in order to be part of your organization. I look forward to a long relationship with your organization and would be honored if the newsletter would consider publishing any material which I might submit in the future. I would like to attempt to offer a sociological perspective, especially culturally, of the Vietnam war. It's more than time to view the war as affecting the lives of millions of individuals, not only the vets but also our families, employers and others

I also have much to share with anyone interested in specific events of the Khe Sanh Siege and especially the 3rd Bn, 26th Marines and Hill 881S. Fortunately, my parents saved the letters I mailed to them during my tour and they have become my most reliable source of reflections from that time. I am also employing these letters and other material I have accumulated in the writing of my own memoirs of those days. I have in my possession mementos such as the battalion cigarette lighter given to us while at Khe Sanh before the Tet Offensive began. I spent Christmas Day '67 on the Khe Sanh base and still remember the helicopter flying around the base with a great big Santa painted on its nose. Also, the light planes which flew over playing Christmas music from their loud speakers.

I knew people who were wounded and died on both the hill and on the base. I have permanently stored all the memories of those days and I feel obligated to share them with whomever is interested. My deepest wish is to communicate with my closest buddies whom I shared bunkers and fighting holes with. I shamefully admit that I can only remember parts of their names. This is something that is difficult for me to admit, but it is true that I can barely remember the names of people who, at one time, my life depended on. Names such as Munday (nickname), Jimmy Jordan, Eddy, Ski, Gion, Perez, Sgt Mac (McClenton), and others that come and go. Possibly the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc will assist me in locating these men and the many others.

ED: I'd love to have a peek at your memoirs.

Dear Ernie,

I was recently in the Eugene Veterans Center and came across a copy of The Khe Sanh Veteran and think it's a great publication. What do I have to do to get onto your mailing list? I am the Treasurer of the Springfield Chapter of Vietnam Veterans of America and I know we could benefit from the newsletter.

On my second tour I was assigned to A/1/26 and arrived at Khe Sanh on or around January 25th 1968. I wasn't there very long because in late February/early March I was medevaced back to Oakland Naval Hospital and reassigned elsewhere in the World.

There is only one person I remember by name from Khe Sanh. His name was Wilkensen. We shared a bunker for a while that was right outside the company CO's. The day that I was medevaced, 1307 rounds of arty rained down on us. It was truly the end of my sanity for a long time. I still suffer from that bullshit. However, enough of that — now to the point of this letter.

I have in my possession a booked titled "The Battle For Khe Sanh", written by — who else? — the Marine Corps. Captain Moyers S. Shore II, USMC Historical Branch, G-3 Division Headquarters, is the author. It includes maps and aerial photos, and Lt General R. E. Cushman wrote the preface. This book can be purchased from me. I cannot give the book away for obvious sentimental reasons. If it must go, I want it to go to those who will appreciate it.

Once again, I would like to commend you on your newsletter. It is very good and very special. Thanks.

JOHN WAYNE LIVES

Dear Mr Spencer,

This letter is as much intended for President Earle Breeding as it is for you. I hope that he gets to see it.

I have belonged to our group since shortly after its inception. (Ray Stubbe can vouch for my credentials). I await with anticipation each new issue of the newsletter as I thoroughly enjoy its contents. However, excellent as the latest issue is (Vol. 1:3 Summer 1993), there are two items in it which I am compelled to take you to task for.

If we, to whom Khe Sanh has a special meaning, have nothing more in common than a piece of real estate in S.E. Asia, then some of us are sorely missing the point. The word MAN, defines a state of mind more than it does gender, or male sex. The state of mind that identifies with expressions such as "Now, there goes a man..." exhalts virtues such as honor, integrity, courage, loyalty, and the ready willingness to accept the responsibility for ones own actions, not to mention unselfish sacrifice — qualities so sadly lacking in today's society. Khe Sanh to us should mean a place and time where the mettle of men with those values was tested, and they were found "not wanting". Our Khe Sanh experience should be looked upon as the cohesive force that binds men of like ilk together — one of a kind, exclusive, to be remembered and revered.

In Khe Sanh, if you were anti-Communist, then your reason for being there was political. If you were there because you wanted to help an oppressed people come to self-rule and freedom, then your reason for being there was political. If you were ashamed, revolted and angered by the draft card burners, the commune living, the "anything goes, and if it feels good, do it" attitudes of the 60's and early 70's, then your reason for being there was political. If names like Jane Fonda, Ramsey Clark, Kent State and Woodstock made your blood boil, then your reason for being there was political. If you cringed at the words of George McGovern when he said that he would "...go on his knees before Ho Chi Minh and beg if it would save just one American life." (Whatever happened to the spirit of Patrick Henry?) — then your reason for being there was political. If all of us who fought in Khe Sanh shared just one of the above feelings, then a part of our bond is political.

So, to say that as a group we are non-political does misrepresent a major element that sets us apart from the draft dodgers and others who furthered their own, individual agenda under the all encompassing cloak of "the desire for peace". As we who were in Khe Sanh can relate to the comfort of the weight of a .45 on our hip, or the distant chatter of a chopper that you know is coming to extract you after six days out on a four-day patrol, so can we relate to the politics that got us there. As an organization, we can deem it prudent not to support any one candidate or any specific cause. However, to deny us a forum to express criticisms of a morally bankrupt administration takes away from the worth of what we did and sheds shadows of doubt on our reasons for doing it.

As far as Bill Clinton representing the "majority of our generation", again, I beg to differ with you. For a start, all eligible voters did not vote, and of those who did, only 43% voted for Clinton, (hardly a mandate). Of those 43%, many now wish they had voted otherwise and many more will not admit that they voted for him in the first place. This administration of perverts, deviates and delusional pseudo-intellectuals, and its President, were put into office because a majority of that 43% voted their "pocketbook" and not for the political ideology of the party, not for the integrity (non-existent) of its candidate.

Now, about all this "healing" you talk about throughout your articles. Either I don't understand it or I just can't relate to it. Where Vietnam is concerned, and Khe Sanh was a significant part of that overall effort, I have no remorse, no nightmares, and regret only the loss of life and the human sacrifices made by our troops daily which were so misreported Stateside in the media. I did not shirk my duty, I honored my contract and I feel good about what I did. Let the "healing" be done by those who felt impact when we felt recoil — they knew that all they stood for was wrong. Let them heal who turn their heads and avert their eyes, while ours tear up as colors pass in review — let them heal the disease that they carry within, the shame of cowards.

I, for one, strongly urge you not to do the "White House Reception" bit. To meet with Clinton would be compromising a principle that many have died for and some still bleed from defending — that the truth is more important than the feelings of those that exposing it will hurt, be that nationwide.

In conclusion, (here I have a feeling that you must be glad I'm finally ending), I would appreciate it if you were to give this letter to Earle Breeding to read prior to the reunion meeting. I regret that I am unable to attend this year. I hope to meet you at one in the future. Please give my best to Ray Stubbe.

Ritual Cleansing for the Vietnam Veteran

I do not claim to speak for other veterans of the Vietnam Experience, (it seems to me that Jimi Hendrix named it better than those who call it conflict or war); however, I know from contact with other veterans that mine is not a unique perspective of that experience. I also do not claim to speak from the lofty heights of formal education in the working of the mind. I took the minimum course work in psychology and sociology necessary for a degree. I stand upon the ground of experience, unique and personal, just as does any other veteran of that experience. There surely are enough similarities among the experiences of the group to delight the statistics-generating sociologists, psychiatrists, psychologists, and any other "...gists" who delight in trying to understand a vicarious experience through objective data in the absence of the subjective experience.

After the generally derogatory remarks in reference to "...gists", I think it is only fair to say that I stipulate to their overall intentions as not being bad, perhaps even being good and extending from a sincere desire to help. Unfortunately, the "...gists", like most scientific medical doctors are not healers. The sci docs have in the last century or so taken control of medicine and sit in exclusive authority over what is accepted medical practice and the "...gists" covet the approval of the scientific community including the sci docs in order to gain acceptance and recognition. Therefore, the "...gists" are, by training, inclined to scientific approaches to understanding the experiences of others, coupled with a scientific approach to "treating" those whose thoughts and actions are classified as being among the "disorders". Treatment, of course, is aimed at transferring the one being treated from one set of categories to another, i.e. "Abnormal" to "Normal". Now these are broad generalizations and I don't mean to label anyone as abnormal or any other label, after all, I think everyone is normal when the totality of their life experience is taken into account. The point of all this rambling is that the scientific approach is not aimed at healing any more than a mechanic seeks to heal a motor by replacing the alternator.

Despite my unenthusiastic view of the scientific approach to medicine, I have read numerous articles about Vietnam vets, how they are, how they differ from other vets, why they are the way they are, etc., etc. I separated from the Marine Corps in January 1969. I left the Corps a veteran of the Siege of Khe Sanh, Tet Offensive of 1968, Operation Mameluke Thrust and Operation Meade River; I had been wounded and recommended for decorations for actions under fire. I had been a Platoon Leader and a Platoon Sergeant as both an E-5 Sergeant and E-6 Staff Sergeant. I had faced the enemy in close combat and survived. I had performed my duties well and with honor and, by all that I had been taught, my return home would be to the acknowledgement of my service. Instead, I came home and discovered that being a Vietnam veteran was not popular except maybe with other vets. This was a major disruption in my life.

I grew up hearing about my great-grandfather who was a career army officer and his experiences in WW I and the rebuilding of San Francisco after the great quake. WW II experiences and souvenirs from my father and uncles all contributed to the idea that military service was a noble endeavor. All the great adventures and biographies I read had a military involvement and I read the history of the French Foreign Legion, the United States Marine Corps, and the life of Chesty Puller before graduating from high school. When I joined the Corps, I did so as an idealistic romantic who believed that military service was a noble and just cause. After four years in the Corps and twenty years in law enforcement, I continue to believe that service to one's society is a noble cause at whatever level one serves. I have come to see such service as the role of the modern warrior.

Through discussions with others and various articles and books, I have studied warriors of many different eras and societies and found that there are basic similarities among all warrior classes:

- A code of conduct and behavior
- An authority to break certain taboos, chief among them the taboo against the taking of human life
- A charge of responsibility for helping and protecting society and its members against peril
- The undertaking of specialized training and acquisition of skills not generally found among other members of society
- The acceptance of physical death and, therefore, the dedication to living life fully
- The wearing of an uniform or other special attire which sets them apart
- The ostracism of the warrior class by the rest of society members

Among the articles I have read about 'Nam vets and warriors are several in Esquire magazine. George Leonard, an author and contributing editor to the magazine wrote an excellent piece on being a warrior in modern times and William Broyles Jr. wrote an excellent piece on why men love war. The pivotal article for me, although I did not realize it at the time, addressed the issue of the taboo against killing and the requisite cleansing that must accomplish that act if a warrior is to be allowed to re-enter society. I wish I could recall the author but I can't, and I'm not sure if the article was in Playboy or Esquire. I do remember that it was in the early '80's that I read it and it had a profound effect on my way of thinking.

The article explained that a society granted to warriors the special authority to break the taboo against killing and then explained the need for ritual cleansing before the warriors were allowed to return to live among the other members of society. Various rituals were cited, including the sweat lodge ritual used by the Navaho. The victory parades at the end of WW II fulfilled the need for a ritual for returning veterans and military units and allowed their reintegration into society. The article went on to state that returning Vietnam veterans were denied the brass bands and welcome home ceremonies that other veterans had experienced and so were denied their cleansing ritual. This made a great deal of sense to me at the time and I continue to agree with the idea in general.

A simple solution would be to have the parades and ceremonies, albeit somewhat late, and something akin to that happened in the mid-'80's when Oliver Stone and others began making movies about Vietnam. There was some sort of national breast-beating and self-examination about how 'Nam vets had been mistreated. Then with Desert Storm, there was supposed to be a national healing, and returning troops were given their cleansing rituals, but what was extended to 'Nam vets was done out of apparent guilt instead of honest belief in what those vets had done. Many 'Nam vets felt that the attention they received then was not honest and, often, too little, too late.

The point is that there still hasn't been an honest, sincere ritual for those of us who served in Vietnam, and there probably won't be on a national level. Sad though that may be, it is the way things are, and can and probably should be accepted as such. The good news is that a national ritual is not necessary. Really, for addressing many of the memories that plague 'Nam vets, a ritual serving individuals or groups can provide the release of the negative aspects of those memories and the healing that accompanies that release as well as, if not better than, some national action so long after the fact.

Ritual is a powerful tool, particularly in spiritual matters, and I am talking about the need for a healing of the spirit. The symbolic actions that occur during a ritual act upon, and with, the spirit of the individual who partakes of the ritual. Religions make a lot of use of ritual, whether it is used to outline the form of worship or the performing of sacraments. But ritual is not restricted to religion. The Marine Corps is rich in tradition and rituals and their power is often so strong as to be nearly tangible, so it should be easier for former Marines to experience the power of ritual than for others who have never been a part of such a close-knit group.

Our lives are made up of a series of experiences which shape and mold our very being. I doubt that anyone who went through the Vietnam Experience would dispute that it profoundly changed their life. The effects of that experience are widely varied but even among those such as myself, who feel that they generally had a grand adventure and personally grew and benefitted from it, there are negative aspects of that experience which can be haunting. The other end of the spectrum is grotesquely negative and horrifying. As I stated, my own experience was more along the lines of a grand adventure than a nightmare but still, I had very strong feelings of guilt associated with the death or injury of those under my command or supervision. I was particularly haunted by recollections of sending out a reconnaissance patrol during Operation Mamaluke Thrust and having the entire patrol killed or injured when they tripped a string of M-26 grenades set up above head height in the trees. This occurred less than 200 meters from our company perimeter. I have thought about that patrol, the selection of the personnel and what happened countless times and have never found any significant changes that I would have or should have made. Still, for years I carried a sense of guilt within me for what happened that day. There were other things that happened that I felt responsible for and carried with me, events that happened after I left the Corps, and all events which, in retrospect, were the result of good decisions at the time. The burden of guilt and responsibility associated with events was apparently strong enough to hide itself away, for while I felt discomfort at thinking of them, I still felt generally good about the overall Vietnam Experience.

One night, I was shown the light by Jose Cuervo and a friend who had the good sense to observe and handle me like a seizure victim, letting me go through the event without undue restraint and only a minimum of personal injury. Long story short: I discovered that there were events bottled up inside of me that I did not even realize were bothering me until they erupted like a boil filled with putrescence, and would not have known it then had my friend not discussed it with me and filled in the gaps of what I had said and done. That event, combined with the discovery of the power of ritual triggered, for me, the healing process I needed.

In 1989, I visited the Hopi Indian Reservation in Arizona. I did this out of interest in the Hopis and their culture and out of a wild idea that I might find an acquaintance from 3/26 whose name was Hoapile, but was known as Gunny Hop. Everyone had said he was a Hopi so I thought I'd try and find him. After all, he won a Navy Cross, and I figured that would set him apart and make him easy to find. I didn't find Gunny Hop but I had the good fortune to meet a medicine woman of the Hopi tribe and spent some time talking with her about studying the natural ways of healing. When asked why I wanted to study, I replied that I had a hole in my heart that I wanted to heal and at the same time, help others too. She and I corresponded, and the following year after I retired from law enforcement, I lived with her and her family for a week on a reservation.

I learned many things during that week, mostly about daily living, but I also learned that I was carrying guilt from those past events which were still bothering me and which I had to let go. I also learned that I could do this through a ritual. The beauty of it was that the ritual was largely of my own design: I certainly couldn't learn to perform a Hopi ritual in a week since I did not speak the language or understand much of the mythos. When I returned to my home, I set about conducting the ritual following a very broad outline as to performing some very basic actions and accomplishing some specific goals. The specific contents of that ritual are not important, but the success is.

What I discovered is that it is possible to release the feelings of guilt associated with being responsible when things beyond your control, and probably things within your control, go wrong. Some people have found similar release through therapy or other routes, but I would venture to say that whatever route those who succeeded have followed, there was ritual involved, either overtly or covertly. What I am suggesting is that the overt employment of ritual is a powerful tool which can promote the process of healing wounds which have festered for far too long.

Ritual is particularly appropriate for those with military experience because, as stated earlier, the military has so much tradition and ritual as a part of daily life. Colors is a ritual. I know we call it a ceremony, but there is so little difference as to not matter. Perhaps the most significant aspect of a ritual that is not always present with a ceremony is that with a ritual, there is a desired or intended outcome of a spiritual nature. I suggest that anyone can create and perform a personal ritual that will have a strong healing effect, especially when focused on the kinds of problems that have plagued so many of us who experienced Vietnam.

The beauty of such a healing ritual is that it can be totally private and personal. No one else need know that you are doing it, so there is no fear of looking silly or being embarrassed, therefore, there is virtually no risk, and so no reason not to try. The only investment is some time, and a willingness to face briefly what you haven't been able to successfully dodge anyway. If you are in need of healing and peace, it might be difficult to face your fears and demons, but the fact is that if you don't face them for the ritual, they'll come and get you later, any time they want. In thinking about your experiences for the purpose of the ritual, at least you're doing it consciously and are thereby exerting some control over the situation. I urge everyone who has the need to try this, you have nothing to lose and so very much to gain. Among the gains is the ability to remember friends and comrades-in-arms without the haunting; you gain the ability to remember without the crippling pain, and so you can then give the memory of the fallen the honor it deserves.

The basic form of the ritual is very simple. After looking over the following, think about what you are going to do and what items will be used. I used some items given me by the medicine woman, but that is not a requirement. The only requirement is sincerity. Arrange to have the time and area you will need without interruption; disconnect your 'phone; don't answer the door; have family absent unless you want to include them. Preparation should begin with a cleansing:

bathe, shampoo and shave. Dress and then settle yourself comfortably in a quiet place and calmly think of the things that you want to release — the actions, the events, the people, the guilt that you feel in association with these things. I suggest that you give this some preliminary thought so that your thoughts are not too scattered when you reach the final contemplation. As you consider these things, tell them and yourself that you are about to release them with your ritual. Once you have your thoughts composed and are focused on what you want to accomplish, prepare a simple meal for yourself and take a pinch of each item and place it on a corn husk, include salt and pepper if you will add that to your meal before eating, and a few drops of whatever beverage you will have with your meal. Fold the husk securely and take it outside to a place of your choosing. Thank the events, the people and the memories that you want to release for being a part of your life. It may sound strange and feel odd or silly, but it is important that you sincerely offer your thanks, release whatever you are dealing with and present the food as an offering. Then go back inside and eat your meal. Results may range from simple enjoyment of a quiet meal to some transcendental event. My personal experience was that I began to feel relief as I ate and that the sensation of relief continued to grow until I found that I was able to do exactly what I had said during my ritual. I had thanked those who had died while under my supervision and said that I was releasing them but not forgetting them. I am now able to recall them with fondness and not guilt. I feel better about them and about me.

I live in Arizona now and am a student of the Hopi medicine woman. I have her permission to share this information and her encouragement to help directly where I can. Individuals or groups wanting detailed information or direct assistance can contact me. I don't charge any fees but can only absorb so much in travel expenses. If you are travelling in Arizona, please feel free to drop by.

AND NOW FOR SOMETHING COMPLETELY DIFFERENT...

Dear Ernie,

I'm enclosing two items which you might like to feature in the new issue of the newsletter. One is "Home From the Woods" by Bill Stross. Bill was a Corporal in G/2/3 during the Hill Fights of '67. We met while both of us were in the Stress Disorder Treatment Unit (SDTU) of the VA in North Chicago IL., and indeed were in the same small therapy group and shared much.

Bill died on 17 April 1988. Apparently, he had become drunk and while entering the bathroom during the night, fell and hit his head on one of the fixtures, and that's how he died. Just a few months prior to his death, he finally located his father who had been a Marine in WW II, and who was buried in Quantico at a National Cemetery site there.

The attached was read during an "open house" at the SDTU by Bill, as people were milling around here and there, and a small gathering of about ten or so were in the hallway outside his room as he read this. It's really a well-done piece, from the heart. His comparisons of the woods of Khe Sanh and the woods back in the States gives almost a "Deerhunteresque" motif.

The second item is a clipping from our local Milwaukee newspaper which speaks of how the continued presence of the past — in this case the unexploded ordnance — still continues to wreak havoc at Khe Sanh.

See you next week in D.C.

HOME FROM THE WOODS

by Bill Stross
G/2/3

As I stood on the hangar deck with its empty spaces that could have held 5,000 strong men — only a wooden crate stood, full of broken equipment, broken dreams and blood-stained web gear, staring out at me.

All that was left of untold numbers of brown haired, sandy haired, bright-eyed, innocent young — oh so young warriors.

I felt compelled to touch and turn over, and hold every piece of metal, every piece of material, trying to feel, trying to bring back, trying to remember the faces, the smiles, the names of the men — the boys, that only a few days before had been my friends, my comrades, my buddies. My point man, my radio man, my tailend Charlie.

I tried to remember what had brought me to this hollow wooden graveyard so cold, with the sweet smell of death still surrounding it. I was numb. I was going back, almost running into the hills — the hills called Khe Sanh. Somewhere else called the foothills of Ohio, or Kentucky, or Pennsylvania, but remember, come back, you are not home. Remember you are in the mountains, the mountains of Khe Sanh, of the country of Vietnam, of the Province of Quang Tri.

This is the season for walking through the woods, dog at my side, rifle at the ready. Keen eyes, alert senses, await the rabbit or squirrel soon to cross my path.

Remember — remember, this is the season for walking in the woods, but these are not the familiar warm woods of Ohio, Kentucky and Pennsylvania. These are the woods and trails of the mountains, the mountains called Khe Sanh.

My rifle is at the ready, my senses are keener and sharper than they have ever been. For no squirrel nor rabbit will this day grace my game bag. For today we are after bigger game, game that is wiser and knows the ways of these woods, the hills called Khe Sanh. They live here, they have lived here for untold thousands of years. These are the men of the woods, the woods called Khe Sanh.

We are the intruder, we are the trespasser, we don't belong, not in these hills, these hills called Khe Sanh.

I stopped by the local grain and feed store to buy my hunting license for a mere fee. For a mere fee, I could be master of the woods I walked.

But remember — remember, these are the woods, the woods of Khe Sanh, and no licence has been issued. You are here, but not invited. You are here, but not wanted. You are here and they know, they know, these men, these men of Khe Sanh.

They watch, and they wait, these men — oh so patiently they wait. They have waited for decades, before I was born, before my father was born. They wait, these men, these men of Khe Sanh.

As I run and hide behind a tree, I lose my breath, in the woods, the woods of Ohio. I can hear my heart pounding, pounding so loud that my friends can hear it, and I will be found, and it will be my turn to find them. But remember — remember, these are not the woods of Ohio, these are the woods, the woods of Khe Sanh.

My heart is still beating, harder, faster. These woods with the silent eyes of the owners — watching, waiting, silently, patiently.

We move, we stop, we look, every head in a different direction, every sense smelling, breathing, a different smell, a different feeling.

We are getting close. The woods are quiet now, the only sound is the perspiration as it runs off the tips of the noses, on the forest floor, and splashes like a giant waterfall.

These young men — the pride of their families.

Fresh from the Prom, and remember the smell of her hair and softness of her cheek, the warmth of her face, the smell that arose from her ivory neck.

Come back, come back, remember — remember, you are in the woods, the woods of Khe Sanh. We are through the field and valley and into a treeline. We stop, almost in unison.

I feel the tension — should we move on line, should we recon by fire, should we throw grenades? Oh God what should I do?

I look to my left, and then to my right. Joe and Ray nod, and John and Bill smile. Yes, it is my decision — they trust me and why not, I have led them through many valleys, and many treelines, through untold streams and hills.

They trust me, they believe in me.

We move closer, the signal is given, the decision has been made, in the time it would take to drop a cigarette to the ground. They were all down, all these fine young men, bloodied and twisted, life being pulled and jerked from their still not grown bodies.

I hear the dog barking and he is excited, a clean shot, he should be running back, through the woods, these warm, pleasant woods of Ohio.

But remember — try to remember, these are the woods, the woods of Khe Sanh.

Their patience and silence had paid off, for the men of the woods, the woods of Khe Sanh.

Twelve young, shiny-faced, unassuming men — boys from the land, the lands of Ohio, Kentucky and Pennsylvania, and everywhere the Stars and Stripes fly.

I pulled myself up on my elbow, can it be, these men of Khe Sanh, with their shoes made of old tires and hats of straw, have beaten and won over our shiny new rifles, our helmets of steel, and our flak jackets of the bullet-proof type.

I am getting tired now, I feel the life running from my body, nourishing the floor of this forest, these woods, these woods of Khe Sanh.

I call out names, but no one answers.

Ollie, Ollie is free, can't you guys find me? I call out the names but these are not the names of my childhood days.

These are the names of my comrades, lost — never to speak my name again, nor I theirs.

I am drifting now, all is quiet and peaceful. I have done my best, I am due for a rest.

My men and I have come home, home to the woods, the woods of Ohio.

From The Milwaukee Journal
Feb. 21, 1993

"Le Dai shuffles slowly down the path carrying a simple hoe and scythe on one shoulder and dragging a left leg made of wood.

"I stepped on a mine," he explains. "I was seeking the steel."

Twenty five years after one of the fiercest and most controversial battles in the Vietnam War, the former U.S. Marine base at Khe Sanh is still claiming victims. Officials say at least 5,000 people have been killed or maimed here and at other battlegrounds near the former border with North Vietnam since the war ended in 1975."

Hello,

I served with Hotel Company 2/3 from February '68 to March of '69. I was an M-79 man until I was made squad leader and had to give my "bloopers" up. I was hit twice, awarded two combat promotions and was an E-5 in sixteen months. From March '69 to October '69 I was a Sgt Instructor for PLC's at Quantico and was then discharged.

I've written several poems. I just start with one line and the words seem to come to me. I guess it's a gift from my late mother. She taught Sunday School and was always good with words. She sent stories out and was asked to write, but never did.

I am a welder by trade, where I have been certified in two inch pipe and above, structural steel and 100% X-Ray stainless steel tig. I've been G.M. employed for the last sixteen years. I was married for twenty-one years and have one son (16) and am now divorced. I then remarried and now have a step-daughter (14). I am very active in a number of organizations: I'm a two-time Commander of VFW Post 4986, Vice Commander of American Post 762, life member of the D.A.V., Third Mar. Div. member, Khe Sanh Vet member and on POW-MIA committees.

I am an avid hunter and shooter. White-tail deer and squirrel hunting are my favorite. I pride myself as an excellent woodsman. I use muzzle loaders for deer as I like the challenge of the one shot only and the sporting chance. Weapons and Nam never hurt me enough to make me want to quit the sport of hunting. My late father had me on hunts since I was four and it's in my blood.

Myself and a few others started searching for our brothers from our Nam tour in 1988. We started with seven and as of now, we number fifty-four on our roster. We've had annual reunions since 1988. We are holding our 25th in June 1993 at the Wall. I urge everyone out there to try and locate their brothers. It's an experience that no words can describe and the feelings are unreal.

Brother Ray Stubbe has helped me no end. In my darkest hour, he had me reach up and take hold of my life once again. I regret, and I'm not ashamed to say, that if it were not for our talks on the phone, letters and prayers, I would not be here today. My life and the things that were done to me during my divorce were that bleak. Thank you Ray. I love you for being there for me.

I hope I've made some sense and you can make this out. I appreciate you printing my poem and I'll send you others if you want. I wrote "Remembering" for the guys at this past June's reunion. They all liked it and it made my day.

Take care, and I'm looking forward to the "news" as I always do. God Bless.

Vision Home

Grey turns to grey, until all that is left is the night.
Then once again, all turns to grey...
It was grey, it was shades of grey.
Two carried one,
laden, yet, not burdened.
For two, grey to linger;
for one, a new light.
Holding a mirror to this place;
images of hell itself.
Once virgin, now ever present,
this vision, home.
It was grey, it was shades of grey.
For two, the journey at its end;
for one, so silent, it had just begun.
All pass through the corridor of darkness.
Escape lies beyond the mirror, but only forty find light.
Grey turns to grey here, until all that is left is the night itself.

THE WORST PLACE I EVER SLEPT

by Russ Mann
FOB 3

"To sleep, perchance to dream" as Shakespeare said, is occasionally an elusive goal in our fast-paced, high-pressure society. To the disgust of my wife, I never have trouble sleeping. The U.S. Army trained me in power sleeping. I'm sure that was not their primary intent, but the lesson has stayed with me even though others have faded. The first thing an army private learns is: "Sleep when you can, your next rest may be a long time coming." Sleeping while standing in formation and sleeping in the chow line are small skills, preparation for the real tests ahead.

In early 1968, I was assigned to the Khe Sanh combat base in South Vietnam. The Assignment Fairy must have been in the mood for practical jokes because Khe Sanh was placed under siege by 40,000 North Vietnamese the day I arrived. We were under constant artillery, rocket and mortar fire (and the occasional infantry assault) for 77 days.

The thunder and flash of incoming and outgoing artillery fire was punctuated by the ear-tickling rumble of nearby B-52 strikes. On clear days, the banshee scream of fighter jets delivering rockets and napalm to our front yard added to the chorus. The occasional cries of the wounded completed this devils' symphony. This discord was underscored by the ever present shadow of imminent death.

You would think sleeping would be impossible under these conditions, and so it was for the first few days. As you go longer and longer without sleep, it begins to move up your list of basic needs. Given enough time, the need to sleep eventually becomes more important than the fear of death. You begin by rationalizing, "I'll just close my eyes for a moment," then wake with a guilty start wondering how long you were asleep. These schizophrenic cat naps gradually lengthen until you are able to sleep several hours at a stretch. A month or so into the siege I was able to sleep all night and take an occasional nap during the day.

My subconscious became so adept at filtering sounds that I could sleep through bombs, artillery fire and machine guns, yet awaken instantly at the sound of a stealthy footstep. More than once a soldier crept into my bunker at night to wake me for guard duty and found me wide awake with a cocked .45 caliber pistol pointed at him.

Halfway through the siege an enemy more furtive and elusive than the Viet Cong made their presence known... rats! We were besieged by rats from within and by the North Vietnamese from without.

When the siege began, sanitation measures understandably fell off somewhat (nobody wants to die taking out the garbage). The smell of our mounting trash and unwashed bodies was an irresistable Siren's call to the rats. Our hell was their heaven. They ate, slept and fornicated with no thought of the human suffering that had created their paradise and their next generation grew bigger and stronger on American fortified rations.

We might have coexisted peacefully if it weren't for the rats craving for salt. Because we had been unable to bathe for some time, the salt of our perspiration had accumulated on our skin and especially in our hair. The rats became bold (as is their nature when faced with a weakened opponent) and began nibbling the hair of sleeping soldiers. Even this might have been tolerated were it not for their habit of standing on your face to gain added purchase. The nights began to be punctuated by the anguished cries of soldiers locked in mortal combat with salt crazed rats. This new assault on our sleep was too much to bear. We declared war on the rats.

We poisoned them and trapped them and shot them and stabbed them. Rat killing became an art. Every group of soldiers had a favorite recipe for rat poison or a "guaranteed" bait for traps. We became adept at holding a flashlight in one hand and a pistol in the other as we slept. Our genocidal frenzy was so great it was considered good etiquette to shoot a rat off your sleeping buddy without waking him first. If he startled the rat on waking, it might spoil your shot and the rat would get away.

As all things in nature do, we achieved a balance with the rats. We became minimal irritants to each other. The rats occasionally interrupted our sleep and we occasionally killed them.

The siege of Khe Sanh ended with a whimper, not a bang, as the North Vietnamese gradually faded away, leaving the rats and the Americans in an uneasy stalemate. Soon after the siege lifted, the American forces deserted the once contested ground claiming it was no longer of strategic value. The rats, I'm sure, still control Khe Sanh and tire their children with tales of the great battle they won there. To conclude this somewhat rambling anecdote, I have no patience with, or understanding of, a person who tells me they have trouble sleeping.

PRISONERS OF TIME

I have just finished reading your 'Memoirs' article (last page) in the summer '93 Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter. In your article you mention (our) City of Refuge and how sacred places cannot ever be destroyed. How absolutely correct you are.

The Ancients called it "Pu'u Honua O'Honaunau", or "City of Refuge". The Refuge lies on the south side of a small bite along the coast of the Big Island, just two miles or so from Cook's obelisk at Kealakekua Bay. The Refuge is under the protection of the National Parks Service these days.

If you go there, you can stand on a quiet beach, water lapping gently in the sand at your feet. Around you are hundreds of giant coconut palms providing shade from the tropical heat of the day. Beyond lies an ancient rock wall twelve feet high, four feet thick, running a hundred yards or so that demarcates the King's favorite lagoon and brackish fish pond from the Place of Isolation. Within the wall are large thatch huts, built on stilts, elevated by lava rock pyramids where the Kahuna's buried the dead. 'Hieau's' they are called. Nothing is more sacred to the Ohana than their Hieaus.

I stood there alone, looking across the lagoon, then traced the path inside the Refuge, past the towering Tiki's facing the island, standing guard, a post they've stood for centuries. I see the long Koa canoes offshore. A man dives into the ocean and swims hard and fast. Moments later six warriors in the canoe carrying 'war clubs' studded with the teeth of the tiger shark (mano paele) dive into the blue water to give chase. They gave the first man, condemned to isolation within the Refuge a head start. If they can catch him before he reaches the shore they will beat him to death with the clubs.

In ancient times there were no minor crimes. Any indiscretion, great or small, was punishable by one means — death! The King pronounced death — sometimes imprisonment within the Refuge. If he did, the condemned had to run a gauntlet of his peers who tried to kill him. If he made it, he was allowed to live. If he left the Refuge, he was subject to immediate execution.

This warrior made it to shore safely. A few yards away lies a large flat slab of pakoehoe (lava) rubbed smooth by the centuries of tidal forces. On it's face, the lucky warrior has inscribed for eternity his petroglyph — the 'stick-man' image of a man, arms raised in victory, feet spread, waving his weapon in defiance to the enemy.

I often come here. I think of 'us', the Marines (even though I was just a lowly 'Doc'). I have never thought of myself as Navy. Hell Ernie, I'm not even a Khe Sanh brother! I was one of those independent kind of guys running amok in the jungles further south — you know the story.

And so, at the risk of sounding like some flaked out 'I Ching' philosopher, we find ourselves, twenty-seven years later, standing in our cities of refuge. For me, it is the isolation of the mountain, Mauna Loa, home of Madame Pele, whose compassion for the 'Aina' is absolute; whose compassion for puny mankind is not so resolute, since she periodically covers all trace of our existence with her molten fires. As though we were never here — as though we were minute fleas on the back of geologic time.

Like the ancient warriors struggling for life, attempting to reach the Refuge, we find ourselves repeating history, as we are compelled to do. Someday, maybe never, the Royal Decree will pardon us for our sins and allow us to re-enter society. Our crime was that we went to war, as we were trained to do. The act of survival was the damning evidence against us. We were allowed to run. We were allowed to reach our Pu'u Honua's. If we made it, we were allowed to live. If not, we perished. Times have changed. We can no longer hope the benevolence of the King's unilateral decision to set us free will be forthcoming. We have no King's anymore. We can't count on Government. Who can? And, it is a foregone conclusion that a collective concensus from society will not be handed down, setting us free.

Those of us who have sought refuge have, in one manner or another, carved our petroglyphs of defiance into our art, our statues, our bodies or journals, our prison walls.

I have lived for over eighteen years out here in the islands. I have assimilated the culture. It is more a part of me than my childhood midwest. I understand the City of Refuge. As you have requested, I have spoken to the Kahunas on behalf of the Khe Sanh brothers and the other warriors who fought and died a quarter of a century ago. They are all there. Their petroglyph just happens to be a large granite wall in Washington, that's all.

P.S. Sorry Ernie! Didn't mean to parenthese the Hawaiiana. You know what they mean. You're more of a local boy than I will ever be. This medium apparently is rapidly becoming my petroglyph of defiance. It works for me. Mahalo.

Now and Then

Impressions from Tet Remembered '93

They touched,
they laughed and cried together then,
as boys who must be men.

From here and there,
now far beyond their ken.
Just boys who must be men.

So young, so tough, proved time and time again,
not boys, but truly men.

They shared,
they fought as brothers, more than friends,
our boys who must be men.

All one, one all,
with courage each of ten,
the boys who must be men.

They touched and laughed, and now became as then,
for boys who must be men.

KHE SANH WOMEN'S NETWORK

Dear Friends,

I am very pleased to welcome each and every one of you to the Khe Sanh Veterans Women's Network. This network is for the wives, sweethearts, sisters and mothers of the men who survived the awesome experience that has come to be known simply as "Khe Sanh."

When my husband Gary and I went to Washington in July, I was anticipating seeing friends I had met in San Diego at the Third Marine Division Reunion and four days of male bonding (talking, drinking, laughing and crying.) I came away from that experience with a deeper understanding of both my husband and our relationship, and the meaning of Khe Sanh as it applies to his life. Through his eyes and the eyes of several "new friends," I learned a great deal about friendship and commitment, war and survival. I met several wonderful women who, through their courage, intelligence and sensitivity, have supported their loved ones through thick and thin.

You never know what life has in store for you. When I was asked to say a few words at the banquet in Washington, I informed those present that I had not served in the military and that I was not speaking for the wives of the Khe Sanh vets. Please know that I do not consider myself an expert in counseling or an expert on

Au Revoir

Well, dear hearts, it's time to say goodbye. This will be my last issue as your editor. It is time for me to move on to other exciting projects. Apparently, our magazine is not to everyone's liking. Some of our members are offended by the content and style (or lack thereof) of our magazine. There is a debate going on as to what the editorial content and direction of our magazine should be. I encourage you to voice your opinion. Until a new editor is named, please send your submissions to Ray Stubbe. Doing the magazine this past year and a half has been very rewarding for me artistically, but it was also very time-consuming and emotionally draining. I took risks with our magazine. I make no apologies for the content or style. As for my editorial philosophy, I followed the advice of W.H. Murray.

From the Scottish Himalayan Expedition:

"Until one is committed there is hesitancy, the chance to draw back, always ineffectiveness.
Concerning all acts of initiative (and creation), there is one elementary truth, the ignorance of which kills countless ideas and splendid plans:
that the moment one definitely commits oneself,
then Providence moves too.
All sorts of things occur to help one that would never otherwise have occurred.
A whole stream of events issues from the decision, raising in one's favour all manner of unforeseen incidents and meetings and material assistance, which no man could have dreamt would have come his way.

I have learned a deep respect for one of Goethe's couplets:
'Whatever you can do, or dream you can, begin it.
Boldness has genius, power, and magic in it.'" possible inclusion in our next magazine, among which was a listing of newly-discovered KIAs, I've come across another batch of KIAs that should be added. I've combined these new ones with the ones I've already sent you and attach them to this letter. They should be included.

Khe Sanh was a special place. Its magic lives through each and every one of you.

The other items that perhaps should be included is a listing of our Life Members. Several of them have contacted either Bill Maves or myself saying they have received no indication they are life members—no card, etc. Perhaps in the future we might have a card for them but in the meantime, perhaps a listing of them would suffice—and more importantly, perhaps encourage others to become Life Members also, and thereby increase our treasury.

Also attached are copies of a Meritorious Unit Commendation to B/1/26 for the March 30th operation, the Meritorious Unit Commendation for 1/13 and a copy of the message from Westmoreland.

Subj: Meritorious Unit Commendation, recommendation for; case of Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines

Ref: (a) DivO P1650.1C
(b) 26th Marines Msg 100912Z Apr 68

Encl: (1) Copy of Congratulatory Msg from General Westmoreland

1. Section VI of reference (a) sets forth provisions for unit awards. Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines is recommended for the Meritorious Unit Commend-ation for its action in a company size assault upon an estimated North Vietnamese battalion on 30 March 1968.

2. The action of Company B is described as follows:

a. On 30 March 1968, Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines proceeded from the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Under the cover of morning fog, the company moved to the assault position very near to the fortified position of an estimated North Vietnamese Battalion. Immediately upon commencing the assault, the company was brought under extremely heavy mortar, RPG, automatic weapons and small arms fire from the heavily defended and mutually supporting fortified positions. Almost immediately, the company command group was decimated by the enemy fire. The wounded company commander unhesitatingly reorganized the remaining few members of the command group and continued to press the attack. While undergoing withering enemy fire, the company brought small arms and supporting arms fire to bear upon the enemy position while continuing the attack by fire and maneuver. Numerous enemy bunkers were destroyed during the fierce attack mounted by Company B. Company B rapidly penetrated the fortified positions, killing 115 North Vietnamese soldiers and routing many others, many of whom were wounded, while sustaining only moderate casualties within its own ranks. Company B destroyed and captured numerous enemy weapons and items of equipment. During the mopping-up phase, Company B recovered the body of one Marine who had been listed as missing in action from a previous assault conducted in the same area by a platoon from Company B.

3. A very significant point is that Company B consisted principally of new men who had only recently joined the unit and had no previous experience in company size offensive tactics. This fact notwithstanding, the members of the company performed individually and collectively in a manner normally expected only of seasoned troops. This brilliant feat is a tribute to the commander and troops alike and is deserving of special recognition.

4. Enclosure (1) was passed from General Westmoreland and is submitted for consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY
HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS
WASHINGTON D.C. 20380

The Secretary of the Navy takes pleasure in presenting the MERITORIOUS UNIT COMMENDATION to FIRST BATTALION, THIRTEENTH MARINES for service as set forth in the following:

★ CITATION ★

FFor meritorious service while providing close, continuous, direct and reinforcing fire support to Marine, Army, Navy and Republic of Vietnam forces in connection with operations against the Communist aggressor enemy in the Republic of Vietnam from 1 May to 31 August, 1968. Throughout this period, while First Battalion, Thirteenth Marines, displaced in its entirety on four separate occasions, with subordinate firing batteries displacing 22 times, accurate and responsive fire was delivered while all units were critically short of combat-essential equipment that had been destroyed by enemy fire during the siege of Khe Sanh. On numerous occasions, firing units were lifted by helicopter into precarious fire bases deep in enemy-controlled territory with little advanced notice and only minimum opportunity for reconnaissance; however, all deployments were completed successfully and were directly instrumental in the accomplishment of the operational mission. During this period, timely and accurate artillery fire was provided to Marine units being directly supported, to U.S. Army Special Forces and Regular Army units participating in joint operations, to U.S. Navy Advisors at remote locations which could be reached only by long-range fires and to Republic of Vietnam Army and Popular Force units operating within the area of operations. This varied and uncommon support of units with divergent requirements, which were dispersed over wide areas, necessitated exceptional flexibility of weaponry, extreme exploitation of communications facilities, rapid reaction to fire requests and superior coordination of delivery means. While headquartered at Cao Doi Peninsula, Phu Loc, the First Battalion was responsible for the fire support of 41 miles of National Route #1 from Hai Van Pass to Phu Bai. In rendering complete coverage of this area, which included responsibility for the support of vital daily resupply convoys between Danang and Phu Bai, 12 Combined Action Platoons, several Special Forces Forward Operating Base units and numerous reconnaissance inserts, as well as directly supported Marine forces, it was necessary to fragment firing units with only organic command and control resources to constitute the increased requirements of this dispersed deployment. By their effective teamwork and aggressive fighting spirit, the officers and men of the First Battalion achieved an illustrious record of courage and skill while delivering 64,653 rounds during 12,162 support missions against the enemy. The ability of the First Battalion, Thirteenth Marines, to react rapidly to the hazardous and constantly changing requirements of combat, to maintain a peak of combat efficiency while deprived of essential equipment and provide close, continuous artillery fire while in a repeatedly fluid tactical situation was without parallel and transcended those accomplishments normally displayed by a unit performing similar service. This outstanding record not only achieved significant results, but also exemplified those qualities of professional skill, uncommon initiative, unfaltering devotion to duty and inspiring courage, which were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

All personnel attached to and serving with the First Battalion, Thirteenth Marines, consisting of the following units, during the period 1 May to 31 August 1968 or any part thereof, are hereby authorized to wear the MERITORIOUS UNIT COMMENDATION Ribbon.

KING OF THE HILL

NVA and Marines playing king of the mountains in the green hills of Khe Sanh.
The NVA stake their claim,
the bully Marines come in and take it away.
It's just a game, one as kids we played;
then we used sticks and stones, around Khe Sanh it was bullets and bombs.

I watched these boy-men day in day out, on my dozer pushing dirt;
they left by helicopter and on foot.
From the quarry my truck loaded with rock,
I pass dirty, ragged men, fresh from the bush.
5, 10, 15 days in the bush, no cot, no pillow for their body or head.
24 hours a day they hump in them hills,
12 hours a day I sweat working on that strip!

With Recon I sit,
"What's it like in the shit?"
Stories they tell - I soak them up like a sponge!
Jan, Feb, March 1968 I found out,
I was in the middle of a lot of shit!
Who wants to be a Marine?
Hell no, not me!
I'm a fighting Seabee fixing the strip.

You boy-men go ahead and hump those hills,
I'll set on my dozer or drive my truck!
When Charlie shoots at me I'll dig my own hole in that red clay.
Westmoreland laid claim to this patch of red ground, he put us here and said, "Don't back down!"
Now you and I are king of this hill.

Some little yellow guy out there is challenging us for the crown.
He's got guns and bullets made in Russia, mortars and rockets from friends in Red China and a tank or two thrown in just for fun!
As I sat peeking out from underground,
I remembered another piece of ground,
it was in Korea.
A place called Pork Chop Hill!
Marines held that worthless piece of ground;
history repeated itself again at Khe Sanh!

KHE SANH WOMEN'S NETWORK

women's issues. You can imagine how shocked I was when our Vice President, Mike O'Hara, called me and asked if I would head up the Women's Network! He promised that space would be provided in the newsletter from now on for us to use as we see fit. In the last issue, Mike issued an open invitation for the ladies to contact either of us for more information on the network. I'd like to take this opportunity to thank Ken Penn, Mike O'Hara, Ray Stubbe and Earle Breeding for being sensitive to the needs of the women and for recognizing that we are an important element within this organization.

Many of us have been supporting our men for many years. Now it is time for us to support each other. This Women's Network can serve as a starting point for us to share our concerns, our pain and our joy. It can be a forum for self-expression or a resource for sharing information. Most of all, it is a means by which we can reach out to each other (a theme we've suggested for the 1995 reunion!)

I need to hear from you. Let me know what your needs are and your suggestions for the women/children activities for the next reunion. Let's have some input on how this network should function. I'm open to all suggestions and ideas. Please remember our collective strength will enable us to be strong for those who need us most—the Khe Sanh vets!

Good evening ladies and gentlemen, distinguished guests and Khe Sanh Veterans. Less than an hour ago I found out I'd be replacing your guest speaker, Mr Bresser. I beg your indulgence for a few brief moments; I won't take much of your time.

It's an honor for me to stand before so many heroes. It's been said that there are no American heroes anymore, no real heroes for our children to look up to. Ladies and gentlemen, I am most humbled to be standing before an entire room full of American heroes and I applaud all of you, and all the Khe Sanh veterans who could not be with us tonight.

I am not in the military. I have not served. I am the wife of a Khe Sanh veteran. My husband, Gary, was in the 3rd Shore Party Battalion. He spent some time in a faraway place called Hill 881S, where he was wounded. In the eleven years of our marriage, I have come to know what it means to be the wife of a Marine, the wife of a Khe Sanh veteran.

Each and every one of you is special. You lived through a special time and place. It was a difficult time for you, and for this nation, and I daresay your lives have been forever changed by your common experience. Each of you is at a different point along the long, difficult road of healing. I was not there. I will not stand before you and tell you that I understand your experience. Try as hard as I might, I could read and study for the rest of my life the historical accounts and documents surrounding the siege of Khe Sanh, but I will never fully comprehend your experience or your sacrifice.

I've spent the last 16 years in elementary education. As a teacher, it's part of my nature to look for important lessons of life. As I look over the faces in this room, I see there are many important lessons to be learned. You have a great opportunity here. This is our first reunion by ourselves as Khe Sanh veterans, separate from the 3rd Marine Division. I understand there was discussion in today's General Meeting of holding this gathering every other year. I don't pretend to represent the wives of all the Khe Sanh vets here. I would never be that presumptuous. After attending the Women's Meeting this morning and listening to their experiences as wives of Khe Sanh veterans, the women who were present felt it is important that we meet every year. I'll give you a quick example of why I agree.

Last night I met a gentleman who is on the road to healing. His story touched my husband and I so deeply that I don't want to wait two years to see him again, or see so many of the women here tonight. For many of the veterans and their wives, two years is too long. We simply ask that you consider keeping this an annual event. I know there are many economic and logistic issues involved in this and I don't mean to over-simplify a complex issue. Many of the wives and sweethearts voiced their concerns regarding the importance of our sharing and supporting each other. Yes, this reunion is important for you as veterans because it is a vital part of the healing process. We support that. Please understand that it is important for our healing as wives of Khe Sanh veterans as well.

In closing, I'd like to thank you for being who you are and thank you for your sacrifice and your service to our country. May God bless you."

COMMENCE FIRING

Gen. Carl E Mundy Jr
Commandant USMC
HQMC
Washington DC 20380

Dear Sir,

I am a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans. I am enclosing a copy of two letters which appear in the current winter 1993 issue of The Khe Sanh Veteran magazine. The letter from Mrs J Thomas Esslinger to Col. John B Sollis, Commander of Marine Barracks, I applaud. The unapologetic, insensitive, self-serving, long-winded and rambling response from Col. Sollis distresses me greatly!

Col. Sollis takes great liberty in his ramblings to convince Mrs Esslinger of the seemingly well-established tradition and procedure of Marine Barracks ceremonies. I ask you, sir, is Col. Sollis correct or is he the insensitive, self-serving ass he comes out as being?

My basic knowledge of public relations and communications makes it difficult to find an example or reason for such an insensitive and callous response to a letter written with such open sincerity and concern, especially when it comes from a person holding such a public relations sensitive and critical position as Col. Sollis does.

I feel a simple one-liner reflecting empathy and sensitivity would have fulfilled the distressed and concerned Mrs Esslinger. Instead, she gets an offensive, rambling, self-serving and aggressive lecture by Col. Sollis and the best example of poor judgment, poor taste and overkill!!

The Marine Corps, we its Vets and all else are in the dawn of the 21st century. Our challenges are great. I refuse to imagine that the poor judgment, insensitivity and LECTURING reflected by Col. Sollis's response to Mrs Esslinger is a model for the kind of leadership needed for facing the new century. We must do better.

Besides expressing my distress, there is little else I can do but mail a copy of this letter to Mrs Esslinger and let her know that she does not stand alone. I also hope The Khe Sanh Veteran will carry it in its next issue as a response to Col. Sollis.

I must tell you that I have held, like many others, supervisory positions and assure you that had anyone under my supervision ever displayed such callous insensitivity in dealing with the public as Col. Sollis did in dealing with Mrs Esslinger, their days on the job would be less than few.

The bullet used by Col. Sollis to shoot himself in the foot is ill-destined and divisive. It is something the Marine Corps Family must never afford.

Ernie:

Keep up the good work! I have mailed in my membership—would have done it sooner but confusion between me and my wife set in. I guess the letter speaks for itself—you can print it if you want. I will attend the '95 convention. Hope to meet you sometime.

SHOT-OVER, SHOT-OUT

February 10, 1994

General Carl E Mundy Jr.,
Commandant of the Marine Corps
Headquarters,
United States Marine Corps
Washington, DC 20280-0001.

Dear General Mundy,

As a founding member of the Board of Directors of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, I was saddened that my attendance at the U.S. Army War College final phase precluded my attendance at the Khe Sanh Veterans 25th Anniversary Reunion in Washington DC this past July. Having spent eleven of my eighteen months in Vietnam at Khe Sanh with the 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, you can imagine my disappointment. I was there from the close of the hill fights in May 1967 until our departure on April 17, 1968. One of my fondest memories involves my time as a liaison to your old unit, the 3rd Battalion upon their return in December of 1967. Then Major Matt Caufield turned it into a very positive learning experience for me about Marine Corps leadership.

Unfortunately, the attached letters indicate to me that we have somehow lost the way from the days of yore. Mrs Esslinger's comments should raise some serious concerns. Regardless of the merits of the issues, Colonel Sollis's response indicates to me that we have somehow failed our senior officers by not providing them with sufficient training and public relations guidance. I am sure that my good friend, Colonel John Shotwell, would not approve of the elitist reference to "noblesse oblige" combined with the lack of even a qualified apology. I am personally offended by the excuse that saying a few words of welcome to veterans who went through at least 77 straight days of hell for our Corps would delay the proceedings for several hours. That is a pretty condescending remark in my book and is not worthy of a spokesman for our Corps.

certainty that Colonel Sollis has regrettably missed the mark, and in so doing has not only insulted Mrs Esslinger but all of us who served in the V ring of the Vietnam War. I realize that he was acting with the best of intentions and meant no harm, but his remarks indicate that there is perhaps an unhealthy attitude in our Corps in regard to our traditions. As you know, this is no time for that sort of thinking. It is not in the best interests of our beloved Corps to alienate our most fervent supporters in the community.

Thank you for your participation at the Reunion. As I indicated, I am sorry I missed it. I hope my remarks are taken to heart.

"T-BONE"

Brother Ernie,

I have been meaning to send these photos to you for not more than six months and as usual, it's procrastination...! I don't know if you and your daughter had some photos of you both at the plaque and the ginkgo tree but if not—now you have some. If you already have some—here are some more!

I'm starting 1994 with a little different twist—usually I raise my expectations to an unrealistic level, you know—"this year I'm gonna..." Well not this year. What happens, happens. I was one sick puppy over the holidays; flu man! But now I'm doing better, so I figure it must get better as we move into the new year. I think this is the year of The Dog as Eastern beliefs go, so I'm happy for a New Year.

While I have no reason to complain (living in Wisconsin), the weather has been cold this week! (-15 to -25 below zero). I will be happy if it warms up. Hope you are well and things are OK for you. I'm thinking I might come down to the reunion in Kentucky this year on "my Hog." Make a nice relaxing road trip down to the Kentucky region. After Washington DC, I thought I'd had enough for a while, but here I am already planning next year. It's just not seeing you crazy fuckers that makes me want to go again and again. You guys are the best!

I saw the National Geographic video and it was great. A lot of folks in my family watched it and I think it taught them about the camaraderie all of us feel at the reunions.

Trane Company is still the job I show up for each day but I'm sure sick of the regimen and the predictability of day in and day out. I'm obviously beyond the love part of my job and just earning a living... Oh well, things could be worse.

I'm writing this in bed and I'm starting to nod out, so will close. Happy New Year Ernie. Stay calm and don't be too much of a radical out there in San Francisco.

Love,
Your Brother,

Bruce "T-Bone" Jones

Dear Ernie,

Thanks for returning our tape. I have just received the latest newsletter of The Khe Sanh Veteran. Unfortunately, we missed the November 14th airing but we hope to see it on a repeat. Remember, nothing could be worse than sweating it out in your foxhole on Hill 861 at night, while the V.C. and N.V.A. are trying to shoot and shell the hell out of you. If I can be of any help, please let me know.

This newsletter is very good. I will pay my dues soon. Take care and wishes for happiness in the future.

P.S. Felt the need to write to Walt Chapman—will keep you advised. My compliments on the drive and spirit to keep this experience alive.

Ernie,

Got your note and picture today of our memorial service at the Wall—thanks. It was quite a weekend!

I sent all our "guys" copies of pictures that I took. I think I sent off notes and pictures to Fish, Chapman, Swede, Gagne, Noonan, Bose, Hollywood, Fulwood and Segura—and Pipes too!

Sounds like you made great progress on the Reunion video. I'll go through some of my photos in the next few weeks and send you copies of the best ones from Khe Sanh area.

This Fall, my goal will be to get some of the guys in Jersey, New York and Penna together for a mini-cookout. I've gotten letters from Swede & Noonan both expressing interest in not waiting for another 25 years!!

Finally, your question concerning whether we (Sherry & I) had a military wedding—the answer is no. We were married after my discharge from the USMC(R).

Best,

Sept. 3, 1993

Dear Ernie,

I hope this letter finds you well and all is good with you after our Reunion in D.C.

Steve Riddle called me the other day concerning the pictures I took while I was at Khe Sanh. I feel that they belong to the Khe Sanh Vets more than they belong to me. I do have a project that I have been working on since early 1985 and that is a book entitled West Dickens Ave. If you remember when you viewed my pictures, that is one of the shots of my fighting hole in Khe Sanh and if I ever complete the project, I had intended to use the shot of that street sign over my fighting hole as a cover shot and tell the story from there of my experiences. This project will be by no means an in-depth study of details of the battle, it will be more along the lines of one man's outlook during the battle.

I do have many shots of the base. I was fortunate enough to have borrowed that excellent Petri 35mm with a reflex lens for a couple of days and a couple of rolls of film. The limited talent the pictures show is from my father wasting a lot of money on film for me when I was a kid. He let me do my thing with a camera and gradually I developed (at his expense) the knack of what to look for through a camera lens.

The reason the project is taking me so long is twofold. I shelved it for years. My time trying to adjust back to the world as a Khe Sanh Vet and my basic trait of laziness. I will gladly send you copies of all my pictures but I would like to know how you intend to use them and if my rights to them are protected if my script ever makes it to a willing publisher. I had several people want them at the Reunion and one that was bent on taking them up to their room and making a video of them. I am, by nature, a very giving person—but I do have to take into consideration my own goals.

If you could let me know if I will be able to publish them at a later date—and that your use of them won't hinder my ambition to use them in any way—I will send them to you.

God Bless

P.S.Do you know where I can purchase the Khe Sanh shirts they had at the Reunion?

ED: Jackie, my lad! You are true to your word. As of this time, you have still not sent me your exquisite collection of photos. You own all rights to your pictures unless you sell the rights. Anyone who uses them must have your prior permission. I might want to use some of your photos in our magazine.

Dear Ernie,

Well, you were pretty much on the mark when you told me it would be difficult to send these sketches to the newsletter. In the glow of the Reunion, it's easy to promise anything but a different story when you get back home and start putting everything back in its place.

When we talked at the breakfast table in D.C., I realized you were trying to prod us into expressing our feelings, letting go of what happened 25 or so years ago (not unlike the way you prodded us up, down and around those damn hills!) But just writing this note and sending the sketches is a result of the good feelings the Reunion left me. Since D.C., I've gotten letters from five different Delta guys sharing pictures and memories, so I guess they feel it too.

The sketches represent "mind pictures" I took when either a camera wasn't available or appropriate. Something to do when we came back in from the field when all the paperbacks had been read and the sandbags filled. I folded them up and sent them home in letters. These four I found later, while others were lost or just pitched.

Please use whichever ones you think are relevant to our group and send me back the originals when you're through. Drawing is again becoming an outlet for me and there's a few "pictures" from the Reunion I'd like to try. Thanks again to the Reunion Committee for a GREAT time!

Dear Beverly,

Ernie Spencer sent me a copy of your letter which mentioned the cover art, which was a piece I rendered from a small photograph. Ernie had a collection of photos which we poured over individually and together. During this time of decision, I had experimented with several photos from which to choose for the cover of The Khe Sanh Veteran.

At a certain point in the process of choosing and creating the final rendering, I was taken with the photo of John Bersano. His attitude and demeanor suggested to me the image of an American hero. Confidence, purpose, pride and good humor were implied in his stride.

Starting with the simple photo, I then used color overlays, experimenting with lighting and textures—pulling the focus close in to the man, his weapon and the long-bladed grass. A little magic happened as I was working. I'm very pleased that the technical tools I use were able to assist me toward completion of an image which became personal and universal at the same time.

Ernie was pleased with the results and I gave the image (on computer disk) to Leo Wong for placement in his final layout of the magazine.

I haven't written before now since I haven't been to the "service bureau" (a place where we artists/computer users rent sophisticated equipment to reproduce our images). The last time I visited my service bureau, I printed out a "color comp" which I am mailing with this letter. Hope you enjoy it.

Bill,

Enclosed is a check for $40.00 which will cover my membership fee and someone else's. The Winter 1993 newsletter was great! I can't tell you how much I enjoyed the Reunion in Washington D.C. I was a little disappointed that I didn't run into anyone from "H" 2/26. Several of the guys from my unit were from the east coast but I haven't been able to track them down. Anyway, thanks for a great newsletter. I'm looking forward to the next one.

Dear Ernie,

Good to hear from you today. Thanks for the picture. Enclosed is a photo of me as requested. It was taken at KSCB in Nov-Dec '67. When you are finished with it I would appreciate its return, if possible.

I'm interested to see the video of the Reunion you're doing. My pictures came out quite well. I'll have to sit down and organize some extras to send to you, Epps and the others. I found the Reunion a great event, one that left me feeling "good" all over. I will certainly try to make others if I have the money.

I just started working on the Poilane story today. I'm typing it on my computer so I'll be able to send you "neat" copies. I'll try and put it together based upon the number of words per page in the newsletter and will aim for 1-1½

ED: Where's the story Nick?

Dear Ernie,

It was great meeting you at the Reunion. It was the first time I've been with that many Marines since I left Khe Sanh. I have remained active with a few Veterans organizations and have met many Marines who served at Khe Sanh with the 26th and 9th Marines. It was like a dream meeting two of the guys from the ONTOS position that was next to my bunker. Brings back lots of memories, some good, some sad, some bad.

I appreciate all the good work you're doing for the organization. I'm the Head of the Board of Directors for my own Battalion—"Dusters, Quads and Searchlights." Keeps you going all the time. This I hope can help with some Marine history. At Khe Sanh, from its original days was a fire battery of two Dusters-Twin 40MM Ack Ack Tracks and two Quad-50 machine guns. The Dusters Unit was 1st Battalion (AW) (SP) 44th Artillery. "A" Battery served from January to March. "B" Battery served for about two weeks in March. "C" Battery served the balance, until Khe Sanh was abandoned. My Track was the last vehicle to leave. The Marine history book only shows "A" Battery. Along with the Dusters was "G" 65th Artillery (Quad-50s). I am presently putting together a listing of all Duster and Quad Tracks and Batteries that served at Khe Sanh from the beginning to the end. I am hoping to also include the names of the individual men.

Enclosed are some pictures you requested. I thank you for allowing me to be included in your video.

I read your book. I can't begin to tell the inner feelings it gave me. It's the first book about Nam I have read cover to cover. It was at times very difficult being attached to the 3rd Marine Div. I always felt that they under-used our fire power. But that was a long time ago.

I also enclose two writings I've done. I must say they were inspired from reading your book.

Sorry for all the bad spelling and bad English, but what can you expect from an old "Doggie". Thanks for everything.

Brother Ernie,

I apologize for not keeping in touch. When the sculpture business is grim I tend to crawl inside my mental bunker. This has not been a great year for my art. We're back at Suzanne's place midway between Yreka and Montague. Great view of Mt Shasta to the Southeast.

Built a small figure this week (dancing figure)—finished the thing, took a good honest look at it, grabbed the cutting torch and cut it into pieces. If it ain't right, it doesn't leave the workbench. I read somewhere that even Michelangelo had his lesser moments of creation! Back to the drawing board. Sometimes I feel like Wiley Coyote, trying to trap that damn Roadrunner—I'll get him one of these days!

Turned on the news yesterday. North Korea is getting belligerent. They want to "bloody the American nose." We've been flipping them off across the fence-line for 40 years, I guess I'd be a little irritated if I were wearing their moccasins.

Rip, from Easyriders magazine, came by and did a photo shoot out at the L.M.S.G. in October. Should get some good P.R. from that. He's a Korean war Vet. He gets paid to ride his Harley and write about his experiences. What a job!

Have a good Christmas—next year's got to be better.

Brother Ernie,

You certainly gave my Christmas spirit a boost. I'm about to begin the first large version of "Khe Sanh." I'll keep you informed as it progresses. If the membership is slow to respond, that's OK. The work will take a little longer to complete but the mission will be accomplished.

I've been wondering about Chick myself. Our last communication was last Summer when he sent me a copy of his letter which was printed in the newsletter. Maybe Stubbe has a fix on his position.

I will be ordering at least one of the Summer '93 cover posters (my primary M.O.S. was 0331) and at least one of your Reunion videos as soon as I am able. My plan for this year is to do no travelling, just stay in the studio and work. After 25 years at the workbench, it's about time I really got my act together.

Recently I re-read Macho Man again. Of my entire Vietnam library, I feel your book is the most honest—and the one most relevant to my personal experience and feelings.

Thanks for the beautiful card and the encouragement, assistance and inspiration. Hope you have a very excellent 1994.

From a book of quotations: "There is no way to peace. Peace is the way."

Hi Rev. Ray,

I hope everything is fine with you and yours. I'd like to say thanks for the new Vet. magazine—very nice copy, we are getting better and better.

I had a sleepless night so I put my thoughts down once again in a prose more of less. I had a friend type it over for me. I hope it might be worthy for print in a future issue. I'm broke most of the time but I can at least share poetry or stories with a letter now and again.

I know you will be going to D.C. in July so my very best wishes for a very nice trip and hope you meet my lawyer, Jessica McGuire; she will be there. Please give my best wishes to the vets and visitors and my prayers go up for you all to have a very peaceful and fun Reunion.

Dear Ernie,

I received the winter The Khe Sanh Veteran. As usual, I can't put it down until I turn the last page. For me, that takes all day. This is the next thing to a best buddy. I seem to relate to almost every article. As I was reading this at 7.00 a.m., tears ran down my face, then the warmth of a passive poem.

It is evening here in New Mexico. I am tired from the gambit of emotions brought forth by the Brothers' articles in your publications. Please don't stop!

I have always wondered what I could do to help fill in the emptiness I walk around with daily. I am a VVA State Council Co-Chair for Veterans Incarcerated. I enjoy talking to the inmates and helping them with any and all forms to help them get benefits for their wives and children. Also, to help them get medical help for PTSD and Agent Orange problems. There are also work programs they can get into for parole. This alone is not enough.

A few years ago I figured out the highest honor and best way to help my fellow Veteran is to build a Living Wall for them. The problem was how to get names to put on it. I decided not to invade anyone's privacy by using their name without their permission. This Living Wall would only have the names of Vietnam era vets. This is for men and women who survived Vietnam and are surviving now. I need to get names, so I thought that by starting a VVA here, I'd get names that way. That, together with flyers at truck stops gave me names and phone calls from all over the United States. I hope that by creating a place, Veterans can bring their families and touch their name embedded in a wall at no cost to the vet. There will be a play area for the kids, shops for everyone and a museum with memorabilia and poems, songs, pictures, etc. Most of all, acres and acres for all the people who are the survivors of the Nam. A place of peace and harmony.

I would like to get more names. There are NO State, Federal, Political or Veterans organizations involved. Please call: Al Logan (505) 546-7984

You're the best,

Al Logan

Dear Ernie,

Thanks for your letter and the cut-out of your logo; are there any particular colors to it, like, is the wreath green with a red bow like a Christmas wreath and the letters could be mirror silver??? I try to stay as close to the original colors and details as possible using mirror accents or in the lettering. I use mirror silver to separate colors also.

I served at Khe Sanh with 1/9. Went in in late Jan. '68 and we were at the Rock Quarry on the NW, outside the base a few hundred yards. I got the feeling we were in the middle between 861 and the base itself. I was evaced out on 26 Feb. and ended up in Hue at the tail end of that one and from there I went on down the highway to CAG. I was the RTO for 3rd Plt Bravo Co. and a grunt with the 3rd squad. I got to go to CAG because that was my second Heart at Khe Sanh and I had the time in to get 'skate' duty. What I didn't know was CAG wasn't skating anymore, except on thin ice.

I came home in Sep '68, stayed in until Oct. '71 and even did a tour on the drill field as a 3rd Bn D.I. I had, before my arrest, been treated for over 10 years off and on for PTSD and am diagnosed as chronic by the DAV, but have been constantly refused disability from the VA. Talk about instilling confidence in authority, you know?

I first heard about your organization back in 1988 from a guy in Florida who gave me Ernie Husted's name. I went to the reunion in Chicago in '89 that was held in conjunction with the 3rd Mar. Div. reunion, as I was then the President of the Rocky Mountain Region Chapter of the 3rd Div. Assoc., which takes in 6 Rocky Mountain states and was there to propose Denver CO. as a possible reunion site for 1991. If you are a member, you know we were successful in that, but I never made it.

As to my story, I don't know. I am not by any stretch of the imagination a writer and wouldn't know what to say. When I was first convicted, I wrote to every person I knew; Vets, friends, the VFW—of which I am a life member, the 3rd Mar. Div. Assoc., even my old platoon company, to try and raise some money to provide me with a defense. I received a grand total of $50.00, and that was from a guy in CAG that while in-country, we didn't get along all that well. Everyone else just turned their back on me and that was it. I grew very cynical with the "Brotherhood" that everyone was espousing and blew it all off.

I will say that I am guilty of committing a crime on the 4th September '89. I committed the crime of Felony Menacing and attempted suicide. I was charged with forcible rape at gunpoint and sentenced on that crime to 30 years here, that makes me eligible for parole in 221/2 years. The rape I was supposed to have committed was against my wife of 7 years. We were going through a divorce and she wanted a bit more than what I was willing to give. She wanted everything and knew just how to get it.

I have spent the last three years fighting my case with inept Penitentiary Dispatchers (Public Defenders) and finally got it together to go to school to become a paralegal. My first customer, of course, is myself, and after months in the law library I have very carefully put together a case that I believe might do me some good. I can and will file on my own behalf but I am still trying to get enough money for a good attorney to represent me in court. The guy I have in mind is number one on my list for two reasons. One, he believes in me and is willing to take the case if I can get his fee and two, he hasn't lost a criminal case in more than ten years as one of Colorado's biggest criminal law firms. He is also interested because of my vet status, but that's beside the point. My problem is raising the ten grand he wants for the job. I do have people on the street trying to get the money together but my mother is all alone and she is 82 years old so it isn't at all easy. She can't get a loan because of her age and my own brother who has all of the money in the world (rich) won't help because we haven't gotten along for years. He was a little old to be a hippy but he was anti-war in '67 and gave me a bunch of shit when I got home. I could take it from strangers and average assholes on the street, but my own family was just too much. Anyway, he didn't get rich by giving money away, if you know what I mean. He has copper stains between his thumb and forefingers.

Back to the mirrors I make. Each mirror is hand etched out of the back by scraping off the silvering then painting in the open areas. It is done with modified dental picks and exacto knives and takes about a week to do an easy one just to the point where I can paint it. I work with another guy in this and we only get three hours a night in the hobby shop if we are lucky. I really have already discounted the military art because some of the mirrors we do go from $65 to $150 each, but that is his baby as I am no real artist. I don't worry about taxes; don't need to with an income of around $400 a year, so I don't need a tax loss. I barely get enough to pay my school bills of $35 a month. If I could, I would pay my lawyer with mirror money, but that isn't even a thought.

What I could use is help, but I tried begging once and it didn't work then, but if anyone wanted to help out, I could arrange to get them paid back if the payments were around the same as a regular loan—$200 a month or so. It is just that my attorney won't take payments. He needs his money in advance—otherwise we could pay him.

Enough of this shit, I have bent your ear and bored you enough with my problems and in these days, you don't need any more out there.

If any of you want a mirror, please make sure you send me the money in a money order only. I can't take personal checks or any other kind of payment or they will send it back. All money orders must be made out to me personally.

Sorry I ran on for so long but yours is the first mail I have gotten in about three weeks and I guess I was getting a little bitter.

Dear Mr Maves,

Enclosed are my 1994 dues to the Association. I'm sorry if they are late, but my financial situation has been very tight.

My goal for the year is to become a Life Member. As a Veteran of Khe Sanh; 66-68 with the Marines as helicopter crew-chief; 69-71 with the Army as helicopter pilot (both Cobra's and LOH's), including Lorn Som 719, and as a helicopter pilot for Air America 72-74 in the Northern areas of South Vietnam and Laos—I find this Association as one of great honor.

We, who served at Khe Sanh, know all too well the costs that were paid by our Brothers.

Please extend my membership into the 1994 season and keep up the good work. My current address is listed on the attached page.

Greetings from the wilds of Idaho!

Enclosed is a check for my '94 membership. Are you going to offer a reduced life membership on a payment plan? I was looking for my Winter edition of the newsletter since Christmas and I finally received it on the February mail plane. It was awesome! One of the best issues so far. It took me a week to get through the whole thing. I had to stop every few items because of the emotions they caused. Wish you could go to press with it more often.

Even though I've never been able to make a reunion, I'm sorry to hear there won't be one every year in the future. I think I would like to attend one but don't know if I could handle it. Is there a chance that it would be held in the Winter or early Spring months sometime in the future? Like another one in Florida in February, or something like that.

Summer and Fall are a busy time in the outfitting business here at the ranch and I can never get away then. Also, I agree that we are an unique organization and should maintain our separate identity from other service organizations. Keep the reunions fun and simple, save the bureaucracy for the Board of Directors meetings.

Most of all, thank you and everybody else involved in putting together our organization and giving us a vehicle to get in touch with each other through the newsletter. Keep up the good work.

Hey Bill!

Nice to know you!! I'm Tom Friel, the gunner on the 60mm mortar from G 2/26 who supplied some of the illumination that dreadful night you guys were being hit Feb/March '68. I served in G company from Nov '67- Dec '68, except for 5 days R&R in Taipei in late October '68.

The Marines turned out to be a good thing for me to join—after it was all over—because being raised in the Bronx, I was constantly in trouble and going nowhere, except to jail. So becoming a Marine taught me a lot of values and self worth.

Don't get me wrong, I lost a lot of good close friends at Khe Sanh—mainly on Operation Pegasus when we swept that Hill 700 down the ridge from E Co. Mainly, it taught me a lot to be grateful for. I have four beautiful daughters (ages 22, 17, 21/2 and 6 weeks), a good job with the P.O. and retired from N.Y.C. Sanitation Department after 20 years. I truly consider myself one of the lucky ones.

See ya around the Base!!

Hi Ernie,

While in Washington at the dedication of the Women's Memorial, I was informed that the Khe Sanh veterans had formed an organization. I wrote to the Rev. Ray Stubbe to get some scoop on how to get on board and Ray sent me the Spring and Summer issues—and the fog of time began to lift.

When I arrived in Nam, I joined "E" Co. 2/26 at Phu Bai. In January '68 we moved up to Khe Sanh and wound up on Hill 861A. Our CO at the time is your current President, Earle Breeding. With the constant turnover of men, most with nicknames, I guess the fog of faces and names will never fully lift.

I am looking forward to receiving the next Khe Sanh Veteran and am proud to become a member.

Dear Ernie,

A few months ago when I wrote to subscribe to The Khe Sanh Veteran you suggested I write a piece about women in Vietnam. Well, I didn't do that, but I did write the enclosed article which you might be interested in. I originally wrote a slightly different version for the Red Cross newsletter but have since decided that I would like to reach a wider audience of veterans by sending it to veterans newsletters and magazines. I particularly thought of The Khe Sanh Veteran since so much of my attention while I was in Vietnam the first time, and so also this time, was focused on Khe Sanh and the Marines.

I am soon going to be leaving Alaska for the winter, first going to Washington for the dedication of the Women's Statue. It's going to be a great gathering! I hope your Khe Sanh reunion in July was wonderful too—I look forward to reading about it in the next issue. I will give you an address where I can be reached in the Washington area as well as my Alaska address in case you want to contact me.

Hi Skipper,

My fireteam leader and very good friend while on the hills, Wayne Silva, called me recently. It was great hearing from this guy—I've looked for him for a hell of a long time.

I guess that you were speaking at a Marine Corps function Nov. 10. After you talked, Wayne approached you. He tells me he's now a Warrant Officer, in the Corps of course. You guys live in the same town, just a mile apart. Isn't that something—that's great.

Just a short note to thank you for connecting two friends who shared each other's rations.

Merry Christmas to you and your family.

Dear Ernie,

My name is Ken Rodgers, and I served with Bravo Company, 1/26, 2nd Platoon from March 1967 until April 1968, including approximately 11 months at Khe Sanh. I have received three newsletters now and have found them to be very enjoyable.

When General Mundy spoke at the Dedication of the Memorial at Arlington Cemetery, I believe that his speech was left with Mr Penn. I thought that his talk was very moving and I was wondering if you might print a text of the speech in an upcoming edition of The Khe Sanh Veteran.

You have stated in past newsletters that if we had written anything on our Khe Sanh experiences, you would consider including them in future issues. I have enclosed two poems that I have written on a few of the things that stand out in my memory. "Red Mud and Rats" was written in February 1993 and "Christmas" was written in April 1993. Please use them if they fit.

I picked up a copy of your book while at the convention in Washington D.C. and found it both entertaining and provocative. Provocative in the sense of the memories that came back based on the incidents you described. I have always tried to make a regular habit of remembering the Khe Sanh experience and your story reminded me of some memories I had forgotten.

Dear Mrs Norman,

Hope you are doing well as the summer season approaches. My wife is preparing final exams this weekend and completing her 24th year of teaching high school math. Our daughter is attending her school's graduation ceremonies today at the Will Rogers Memorial Auditorium in Fort Worth. Next year she will graduate and is looking forward to attending college, though she hasn't yet decided where. Also, she is going to work as a lifeguard at Wet 'n Wild. I have finally completed my course at the University of Texas at Arlington and will take the summer off from studying. Connie and I hope to attend the 25th anniversary ceremonies of the Battle of Khe Sanh in Washington D.C. during the Fourth of July weekend and then join my sisters and brothers for a family reunion.

The tribute to Hank and picture were submitted to Ernie Spencer, Editor of The Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter. In response, he asked me if I would be interested in doing a series about Hank. In thinking about his request, I thought perhaps you or someone very close to Hank might want to submit to the newsletter for publication a short article, personal profile, letters, additional pictures or transcriptions of the tapes Hank sent home. If you or anybody else would be interested in submitting anything to the newsletter, you could send it either to me or Ernie Spencer, whichever you prefer. We will make sure everything is handled properly and will return anything you might want to keep.

I feel that the above recommended approach is the best way to handle a sensitive matter such as this. Most of what I remember of Hank was brought out in the tribute. However, if you prefer that I write an additional article(s) based on information provided to me, I would be more than happy to do so and then have you review it before publication.

If you are ever in the area, please give me a call anytime so that we can arrange to get together. Either you could come over to our home in Arlington or we could drive over to Garland or Mesquite.

Sincerely,

David G Rogers

Dear Khe Sanh Veteran,

As a fellow veteran of Khe Sanh, we shared great hardships through our tour of duty and made close ties with many men while we were there. But for most all of us, we watched those men get on a chopper, whether wounded, killed or just rotating back to the States. The moment was fading even as the chopper faded away into the clouds, but even 25 years later, these incredible experiences linger somewhere in the back of our minds and will always be a part of us.

This is why I think our fellowship amongst us is so important. Only another Brother that shared those times could possibly comprehend what we experienced during that short period of our lives.

Your organization and magazine contribute greatly to the effort of bringing those Brothers that once faded away into the clouds back together again. For this, I can't thank you enough.

I am enclosing my membership application and a small donation. I anxiously await my next magazine. Keep up the outstanding work.

Dear Mr Spencer,

My name is Ronald E Poteat, and I am a new member. I have been working with the POW/MIA issue for a little over ten years now. During this time, I have created a few designs for a postage stamp to commemorate those men and women who are missing from all our nation's wars. I have finally come up with a design which I think is so effective that I had it copyrighted.

I have put together a petition drive and created a T-shirt to further promote this issue. I have pumped a new life into the commemorative U.S. Postage Stamp. I am on the right track and I know in my heart that this time we will be successful and that a stamp will be issued to commemorate those who never came home from all our nation's wars.

To make this into a reality, we must get all the Veteran's groups to stand behind this idea for the commemorative stamp and push the issue until we get honor for the POW/MIAs. I ask for your help on a national level. This is a worthy cause that needs the attention of all us Veterans and the American people. I will enclose a sample T-shirt and petition so that you can see the idea and make up your mind as to whether I can count on the support of the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. on a national level. We can work out the details upon approval of your support.

TO REMEMBER THEM IS TO HONOR THEM. Please pray for them and their families. May God always be with them. God bless America and may she always be free.

Sincerely,

LIFE SENTENCE

"Sam", he said, looking me in the eyes,
"you're a prisoner of your mind.
It's time you broke free; escape!
Don't you know you're in misery?"

Sam, I look at you and my reflection comes back to me.
I look at you and see me!
A prisoner of Vietnam.
A prisoner of Khe Sanh.
Twenty five years a prisoner of my mind.

I look for ways to escape, but none can I find.
For years I tried to escape, two - sometimes three jobs.
A union steward, involved in baseball.
I am still a prisoner, but now I know my jailer, and I am still trying to find a way out.
A life sentence I have been given,
and if I give in, that life will be short.

In Ward 2-2c at the Topeka V.A. tools they have given to me.
I will take them as I leave and hope my jailer will not see.
A P.O.W. for the rest of my life I don't want to be.

Ernie,

How very moving and ironic that today is SOG's 30th Anniversary. I guess I should stand back today and wait this one out—but, as they say in Hollywood, "the show must go on!"

I am frequently asked why I'm not a raving lunatic, after having spent three continuous years in South Vietnam, and all I can reply is that I seldom fought in South Vietnam—more so in Laos and Cambodia. My war was truly a different war than most Vietnam assignees had been accustomed. I think I'd better let the memories flow and not comment or I'll write another novel.

Question Ernie: Did I or did I not propose a deal wherein a set of SOG books was offered for review of the SOG History? We're having trouble with our communications systems in this rather cold weather and have been unable to find a file which indicates this. Please let me know. All other similar offers came back by December last year and had been approved by the membership of each approached association. As I've said, our system is 'too cold' at this time to provide us with complete information.

In the meantime, I have enclosed the latest solicitation for the SOG History [see below]; all four books will be available for shipping in mid-February. A limited, one time special price offer will expire on 1 April 1994—at which time the books will be made available to the US public for the first time—and at full cover price for everyone (it's time for charity to benefit).

Have several other correspondences to prepare today, so Ernie, until later...

SOG

THE PORTENT OF OFFICIALDOM

In late 1990, in the second year of preparing the history of SOG, I had compiled a sizeable list of SOG casualties—not complete by any means, but more complete than was known to the US Government or any other researcher—and the circumstances surrounding their deaths and disappearances, from eye-witness reports when available.

I was contacted and asked to co-operate and provide testimony in the area of SOG (MIAs) during the Vietnam conflict for the Senate Select Committee on PW/MIA affairs during hearings which were held in 1992. I agreed, and with many other Americans watched the hearings with anticipation and waited to be called to Washington D.C. to testify.

As the hearings progressed, I was unimpressed by the testimony being presented by "higher echelon, desk jockey" bosses. The PW/MIA Committee had neither called nor questioned one US soldier who was physically present in Laos or Cambodia—recon men on the ground or pilots in the air—who watched helplessly as US remains were being carried away by the NVA. The NVA had taken SOG bodies and PWs (including pilots) from Laos/Cambodia and had to know where they were—and are—located!

Paranoia and Communist dogma required exacting, extensive reports on anything and everything—the NVA would have recorded precise information about US PWs or US remains in their possession. I felt certain they not only had US remains but had the paperwork which plotted their exact locations. This was something I had yet to hear come out of testifying mouths—but did not.

Very near the end of the hearings, in December 1992, I was notified by an investigative reporter in D.C. that the PW/MIAs hearings had been convened to "whitewash" the issue of possible living PWs in Southeast Asia with the normalization of trade as the driving force. The PW/MIA Committee was finalizing an era and adjudicating all existing cases concerning the status of possible PWs, to be resolved and closed. The only sincere Legislator on the board seemed to be "Smith", who, by the way, is still concerned and involved in the MIA issue.

Three weeks before the PW/MIA board adjourned, they had not yet called for my testimony. It was the second week of December 1992. On the Monday and Tuesday, I made contact with a D.C. reporter/friend (ex-SF) and, over a period of 5 hours, divulged the information I possessed. He took the information to the PW board and because of its significance, they departed for Hanoi the next day (Wednesday). I was telephonically notified to watch the television news closely the next few days. That Friday, the PW/MIA Committee was shown on US television, via satellite coverage, receiving approximately 20 containers of US remains, each in a small wooden box. This action turned a number of US remains over to US control, perhaps the most since US PWs had been released from captivity during 1973 in "Operation Homecoming."

Shortly after the PW/MIA hearings had been closed (4 January 1993), the US Government began a policy, enforced by those such as Ed Ross (Assistant Secretary of Defense), which declared the US would no longer bargain for US remains in Southeast Asia.

It was a while after the PW/MIA hearings had ended that I was again informed by an investigative reporter that the hearings had been held in an effort to "close" the MIA issue and normalize trade relations with Vietnam. I was told that the US politicians owed debts to "selected" US businessmen and the normalization of bi-lateral trade between the US and Vietnam would provide the President with some exceptional bargaining chips to play in the political/international game of reciprocal "favors." It could be very advantageous to the first US businesses allowed free trade between the USA and Vietnam. Resultant US business profits are incomprehensible and unimaginable.

Meanwhile, in the US Labs in Hawaii, while examining the containers of supposed returned US remains, it was determined that only a few of the boxes actually contained human remains—the remainder were animal bones.

Several weeks after the hearings ended, I was contacted by an investigative researcher who had uncovered my PW/MIA testimony, complete with name, address and phone number. He said he'd been researching and gathering facts about the US's deliberate reluctance to acknowledge living US prisoners in Southeast Asia, and in the process he accidentally uncovered my testimony in the Legislative Archives. He related to me that it was possible that someone in Washington did not want my testimony aired or discussed in public during the hearings and that, although retained in the Legislative Archives, my testimony was mysteriously unlisted in the official Senate Select Committee on PW/MIA Affairs testimony "record."

Several reports of US remains were filtering back into the USA. The reports were provided by valid, unshakable, credible sources. The reports were cross-checked for legitimacy; it was verified that the remains of downed US airmen were being hidden, protected and in the possession of persons other than the Hanoi government.

The US Government, nevertheless, steadfastly refuses to attempt recovery of US remains. Opting instead to demand that the possessor of the US remains take and turn them over to their nearest Vietnamese Governmental facility, such as a Police Station. It is known throughout Southeast Asia that any civilian who possesses US remains and turns them over to Vietnamese authorities has suffered an untimely demise. Entire families have been punished and killed for having knowledge of the whereabouts of US remains.

When known to them, it is US policy to notify the Hanoi government of the names of those who are reported to have knowledge of US remains. It is without wonder that no-one is willing to come forward and divulge their knowledge of US remains.

Therefore, in the final assessment of the PW/MIA issue, it is obviously and undoubtedly linked to the normalization of trade with Vietnam, and it can easily be concluded that the final outcome will only benefit US politicians as they provide unfair business advantage and privilege to the political cronies of their choosing. It is political rhetoric, bureaucratic insensitivity and insincerity together with a lack of moral ethics which have denied at least one family of their loved one. It is a deeply embroiled issue which is quickly dissipating within a smoke-screen of trade and profit.

This is seemingly an untenable situation which faces an uneducated, naive American public. "Damned if we let the cat out of the bag and damned if we don't—and still get caught and drown in the spiraling whirlpool."

Skid's down—exfil, lift off—till the flashing sparks of incoming gunfire subside.

Dear Bill Maves,

My name is Gary Bartle. I served in Khe Sanh during the siege with India Co. 3/26 on 881S. I was one of the men amongst many on Jan. 20, 1968, who went up 881N and ran into the NVA. That day I thought I would never again see my friends and family, but with the praying I was doing I guess someone heard me.

A few of the guys up there used to call me the quiet one. I usually always stayed in my bunker and very seldom ever came out. If someone talked to me it was like they talked to themselves. I remember one Marine, his name was Jim Payne. We went out to a downed chopper to get supplies when the NVA started to mortar us. We all took off like the devil himself was chasing us. At first, I got caught in the wire, then when I got to my bunker I just sat with my knee's drawn up to my face. Jim tried to talk to me and when I did answer, I found out we were from the same city of Utica, N.Y.

When he left in March '68 to go home I thought I'd lost the one person I could relate to. Well, in 1990, I picked up the Sunday paper and there he was! The paper interviewed him about being in the book Siege In The Clouds. If you haven't read it yet, try to find a copy.

I wasn't able to be at the reunion but I'd like to pay tribute to all those who died at Khe Sanh and to say to all who came home that we're all good buddies and we can at least help others know what Khe Sanh means to us.

I find it hard to bring myself to face the Wall. I've lost a lot of my memory of Khe Sanh and other parts of Vietnam I've been too also. In Khe Sanh, I had a mortar go off near me wounding several other Marines, but all I got was a bad headache and no hearing for about a week. All I heard was a lot of ringing and muffled voices. I refused to be medevaced out and stayed. The other time was somewhere outside Quang Tri. A mortar went off again and a piece of shrapnel missed dozens of others and picked me out.

These days I have trouble with names and some places where I was at. If anyone out there remembers me, I sure would like to catch up on some things. I first got on the hill Dec 15, 1968 but was in Khe Sanh Base in Nov. My MOS was 0331. I was on the side of the hill that faced Khe Sanh Base and Hill 861.

I broke my ankle at Khe Sanh when they took us off the hill. I walked around on it for two days before we found out it was broken. I do remember the LT. chewing me out.

I'm unemployed right now but will send in my dues as soon as I get back to work. I hope to hear from someone soon if they can remember me.

Semper Fi good buddies,

MORE FROM THE DUKE...

Dear Ernie,

From the caption and comment at the bottom of my letter, I'm led to believe that what I said has struck a raw nerve. Also, that you may have taken my comments personally. If that is the case, I'm truly sorry. It was never my intent to criticize your excellent editorial abilities nor your judgment. The letter's sole intent was to oppose, in the strongest way possible short of eyeball-to-eyeball contact, any inference of support by our organization of the present administration or any of its radical policies. A White House reception (I still don't know if there was one) would have meant just that in the eyes of many. The letter was intended as nothing more than a communication between you, Earle Breeding and myself. That you chose to publish it was a total surprise to me. Not that I mind seeing myself in print, quite the contrary. The truth, although it never needs defense, can use all possible exposure and I will continue to stand by everything that I have said. However, it does make me wonder about just what it was that motivated you to print it.

Before I go further, let me make it quite plain that this is a letter from me to you. Publish it if you like but, if you do, please don't edit it. I'll live with my spelling and grammar mistakes as long as the substance of what I'm saying remains intact. Introduction over, I'd like to respond by addressing your "ED" note at the bottom of my published letter:

- "You did your tour and I did mine": Figuratively speaking, that would seem correct. To take it a bit further, however, I extended twice on my first tour and then waived my overseas control date to go back two more times. Draw your own conclusions from that. I'm sure that I would agree, at least in part, with most of them.
- "When you take over as Editor, you can do it your way": Thanks, but no thanks. Everybody's not cut out to be an Editor. For one thing, the job calls for one to be too judgmental. I prefer to stick to the creative part of writing, such as it is.
- "The wonderful thing about the written word is that the reader has the option, at all times, of averting his or her eyes": You really surprised me with that one. You're endorsing the "head in the sand Ostrich act", the "See no evil, hear no evil" bit. How much history does it take to convince you that not speaking out against something is the same as endorsing it? That when someone calls a black person a Nigger and you turn your head and pretend that you did not hear it, it's the same as if you were saying it yourself. That if most of Europe hadn't "averted" its collective eyes when Hitler was a mere upstart, we might not have had to suffer through a World War. As for the "written word", my feeling is that the true beauty of it is that it is permanent. People can be held to account for what they write and so be exposed for whatever they are. Except, of course, if they happen to be members of the Clinton cabinet. Nightline—Lani Guinier: "Most important, I think, is not what I wrote but who I am." Ref. National Review, Nov 15 '93 issue, p.72).

- I won't comment on the "If you don't like it, don't read it" part. As for your last word, "Simple", Contraire! Contraire! When emotions tug at mens' hearts strongly enough to cause them to act, what follows is anything but simple.

Now, for the John Wayne part. You may have a slight backlash on that one. Not from me. I like the inference, even though I understand exactly just how it was intended. I'm talking about what if more readers like Leonard Venardos or Mrs J Thomas Esslinger choose to respond to it. Resurrecting The Duke would do little against the avalanche of Woody Harrelsons, Whoopi Goldbergs, Barbra Streisands and left-over Jane Fonda freaks that engulfs us now. Besides, the spirit of John Wayne, or rather that of the characters that he portrayed over the years, lives on. Just listen to some of the folks who call in to Rush Limbaugh. One last thing about John Wayne. He was an actor, a vendor of make believe. His characters, however, are very real to many of us who feel that their values should be ours and their principles are worth fighting for. We, you and I, are the real action figures as were all the defenders of Khe Sanh. There were as many stories left imprinted in that red clay as there were men who slogged through it. John Wayne, I think, would have been proud to act in and to tell any one of them. Again Ernie, I don't mind the John Wayne analogy at all.

(What the hell! It seems that I've already pissed you off, we might as well be on a first name basis)

P.S. That disclaimer at the top of p.3 is a good touch. I like it. I wonder what brought it about?

ED: It is obvious you are very angry. I feel, however, that most of it is misplaced. I sense that you're very hurt about what happened to you. Why don't you share with us what really happened to YOU in Vietnam. Tell us about all your combat experiences during your multiple tours. That's what our readership is interested in, not your political ramblings.

Dear Readership,

Enjoyed receiving my first copy of your newsletter. Although our plates are full of family, work and committees, it's nice to see that most will take the time to come forward to help each other.

I, too, can recall working up near Khe Sanh FSB as a member of the 11th Engineers (Feb 68-69). My return humanitarian trip back to Vietnam in Jan. 85 was a very positive experience for me. We walked all of those far FSB sites to include Khe Sanh. There seemed to be a stillness when we did our prayer for all who lost their lives at Khe Sanh. The American flag was once again raised during this moment in time. I have included a copy of our prayer that was placed at the Wall before we went back.

Our guide in the south was a former N.V.A. Lt "Lham", who was wounded. Can't tell you how respected the Marines are by our former enemy.

Dear John (Balanco),

Thanks for the very attractive Christmas greeting. It was certainly an appropriate one to send to linguists! We must have just missed you in Khe Sanh since we left on January 8th of that year.

We continue to get letters from Bru friends in the central highlands, in Southern Laos and occasionally from the area around Khe Sanh. Life has not been easy for them but they continue to adapt and go on.

Last year, we had a visit from two young men who had been children when we lived in a village near the border. They are now living in Laos but continue to make visits up to the Khe Sanh area, so we get news from the area. These men are hoping to come back again this year when the border is open for a major Buddhist festival.

You asked us in your note for a suggestion about how the Khe Sanh Vets could do something for the

Bru. Recently, we have had letters from several young people (or their families) who are pursuing tertiary education. This is a brand new thing for the Bru. At the time we were there, we never knew of a single Bru person to get beyond secondary education, and only a few who got that far. We are told that there are now a total of twelve Bru students who are in schools throughout Vietnam, either technical or university, or other institutions. It is very difficult for these young people because their families can scarcely come up with the funds needed for school supplies, let alone food and clothing. We have tried a couple of times to help some of them out in a small way but have not worked out a way to safely get funds to them.

If this is something you think the Khe Sanh Vets would respond to, we will try to work out a channel through one of the development agencies here in Thailand which has regular programs in Vietnam to set up a scholarship fund for these Bru students. We know of a couple of agencies which might be able to do this and can check it out with them if you are interested in pursuing this.

Our current research project here in Northeast Thailand involves several small language communities whose languages are closely related to Bru. We are enjoying getting to know these people and to once again be speaking Bru.

Looking forward to hearing from you again.

Sincerely,

John & Carolyn Miller

Dear Khe Sanh Board Members,

To tell you the truth, I was a little concerned that I hadn't received any correspondence from our Khe Sanh Veterans organization since the July Reunion. Well—not to worry, the Winter issue of the newsletter just arrived in the mail and I quickly sent out my dues check.

Now, to the reason for this letter to each of the members of the Board of Directors. I would like to get a running head start on planning for our 1995 Reunion. Lots of questions immediately come to mind:

- Where shall we have it?
- Should we hold the Reunion near a military base (Marine Corps or any service) or should we just look for nearby civilian type entertainment, e.g. a Disneyland type theme park?
- What should the theme of the meeting be?
- How long should the meeting be? I would assume 3-5 days and we should probably hold it over a weekend. For those who will be flying, it will be cheaper when you stay over a Saturday plus it is probably easier to get time off work.
- Not everyone brought their family to the last Reunion so a question arises in my mind—should we continue to have this Reunion open to Veterans and their families or limit it to just the Veterans?
- As far as accommodations are concerned—should we continue to hold the Reunion at a Holiday Inn or facility of that caliber or try for something a little cheaper?

That's just a short list of questions to get your creative juices flowing. As we make decisions, some questions may have already been answered by a previous question.

I see my role as Reunion Chairman as the person who is responsible for keeping things organized. This is a Reunion for the members to cater to the members wishes, but I feel it is incumbent on the Board Members to lay the groundwork and give guidance to the members.

Please review the attached questionnaire and let me have your comments. We could send this to all our members as an inexpensive one page mailer and ask them to send it back to me within 30 days. I will then summarize the results and report back to the Board.

I look forward to hearing from each of you.

Hello Ernie,

A very short note requesting two copies of the Spring '93 The Khe Sanh Veteran magazine. I found two Marine buddies—one in Texas and the other in Colorado.

Please bill me for the above request. I know they would very much appreciate them.

Seeking Marines and others who served with, or were attached to 3/9 in RVN during the periods of 1965-69.

I am trying to locate all survivors of 3/9 for a reference network which eventually will be available for all 3/9 Marines. The purpose of the network is to reunite 3/9 Marines with friends and buddies who served with them and to develop a network with 1/9 and 2/9 for future regimental reunions.

All correspondence will be in strict confidence and will not be available to anyone outside our own 3/9 network, and then only to people who agree to have their information passed on to their buddies and friends. I am not asking for, or expecting monetary help. If there are Marines who would like to be involved with this project, please print or type on a 5 x 7 index card the following information:

NAME: First, middle initial, last (nickname)
ADDRESS: Street, city, zip
IN COUNTRY: From Mo/Yr to Mo/Yr

At the convention, Jerry Hudson and I got our heads together (thus=1) and came up with the idea of making a plaque for Col. Lownds. I had the privilege of visiting him at his home in Naples, Fl. and ascertained that he has a den and wall, and a plaque would fit right in.

The artist is the same Phil Hardin who did the bolos and buckles I had on display at the convention. He and I worked out an unique, one-of-a-kind design: inlay on German Silver. Believe me, there is nothing but hand work. He sent the plaque or metal work to me and I then had it mounted on the wood in Roswell, trying to keep the wood simple so as not to distract from the beauty of the artist's handiwork. In effect, it is one big flat belt buckle with a flat brass buckle under it as a presentation plate. Keep in mind that even the best photos do not do it justice.

Lonely Soldier

Surrounded by the enemy, with no place to go.
Fists and rife butts, inflicting much pain.
Reality came quickly, how was I to know?
I stand to lose it all, with nothing to gain.

My family flashes, against the terror and fear.
Mom, Dad and Junior, what will they ever think?
Shirley and the babies, what awful news to hear.
Drastic change can come, in just a minute wink.

Forced marches were routine, they became pure hell.
There was no relief, for my wretched burning feet.
Sores gathered swiftly, they oozed a putrid smell.
Malaria and Dengue Fever, tried to hasten my defeat.

Hemp around my elbows, my arms suffering so dearly.
Isolation and hunger, ravaging my fragile soul.
Hope dwindled rapidly, as monthly turned to yearly.
My life seemed to ebb, so living became my goal.

Migrating from cave to cave, always on the move.
Where was I being herded, only God could know.
Resistance became weaker, nothing left to prove.
Who was I to impress, with some big gallant show?

I still cherish that day, when I finally saw Garcia.
Many months of suffering, but he still had a smile.
Silver and Bronze Stars, he had won them in Korea.
A proud old Sergeant, who'd been in for a while.

It still hurts today when I think of his fate.
Infection and diarrhea had taken their ugly toll.
When medicine finally arrived, it was a week too late.
I buried him with honors, upon a rising knoll.

Rumors came filtering down in late seventy four,
of a large prisoner release, northward in Hanoi.
Keen to sights and sounds, I knew there still was war.
I had given up on trust, the enemy was awfully coy.

Then one day came silence, it was early seventy five.
Celebrations of victory, my captors could not hide.
The stillness made me wonder, did anyone know I was still alive?
Great slaughter was to follow, it was hard to abide.

Death was all around me, the "puppets" were being purged.
They told of our withdrawal, it was very hard to believe.
I had to watch my allies, who one by one were scourged.
Life became a thread, my past was hard to retrieve.

Treatment started to improve, a small consolation.
Wounds began their healing, which brought ample relief.
I pray to my God daily with appreciable anticipation.
Hoping he will reward me for my perennial belief.

The war is obviously over, I have no place to go.
Much has been forgotten, when I dwell on my past.
Ma and Pa could be dead, it hurts to miss them so.
Even provided the chance, I probably wouldn't ask.

Shirley's even fading, where could she be today?
She could not be expected to wait so many years.
My heart has become so hollow, what could I even say?
Visions of the children, oh the anguish and the tears.

When will they come a marching, to free me at last?
I'm tired of propaganda, but maybe they are right.
Perhaps I am a criminal, and suffer for my past.
Thoughts I must avoid, if I continue my plight.

Twenty five years have gone, quickly before my eyes.
How slowly they have passed, since that fateful day.
The sun sets each eve, there is no new surprise.
As a scared little child, I have surely lost my way.

My God is my hope throughout this time of pain.
He's met me many a night to comfort my weary soul.
Some villagers he has sent to lift me up again.
They sneak me Bible verses to make my life seem whole.

Although still held captive, my spirit feels so free.
There is a life hereafter, His medicine is my cure.
Even though man's so evil, God's Spirit comforts me.
I know without a doubt that His love is very pure.

ANNOUNCING THE FORMATION OF

The Art and Humanitarian Fund

Using their contract payments from National Geographic Society for the filming of our Reunion in Washington D.C. as seed money, Ken Pipes, Quilles Jacobs, John Balanco, Jim Morris and Ernie Spencer decided to actively support the objectives of the Khe Sanh organization by establishing an Art and Humanitarian Fund.

"Khe Sanh" by Dennis Smith

By-Laws Khe Sanh Veterans Inc.
Article 1 – Objectives
Section 1 – General

The objectives of the corporation are as follows:

- To promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of Khe Sanh
- To promote artistic expression of the Khe Sanh experience

The Art and Humanitarian Fund will financially support Khe Sanh artists as well as our allies at Khe Sanh — the Bru.

Won't you please join us in this worthwhile endeavor?

Those contributing $50 or more will receive Ernie Spencer's independently produced video called "Khe Sanh Reunion," an artistic interpretation of our reunion held in Washington D.C. this past July. Those contributing $75 or more will receive the video and an autographed, first edition, hardcover copy of Welcome To Vietnam Macho Man by Ernie Spencer. This book is out of print.

The first artistic project we will help fund will be the statue "Khe Sanh" by Dennis Smith (B Co. 1/26). We hope to place this original work of art at Camp Pendelton (ultimately at Khe Sanh.) We need approximately $4,000 to build this statue at Camp Pendelton.

Our first Bru project will be a scholarship fund done in conjunction with our dear friends from Khe Sanh, the Millers (see their letter to John Balanco in this issue.) Those who were at Khe Sanh prior to the siege will recall that the Marines and Special Forces personnel held a fund raiser to build a house for the Millers (they were that highly regarded by us.) Former Special Forces and Khe Sanh member, Robert Shippen, has obtained written permission from the district chief at Khe Sanh (a Bru) for us to legally operate in and around Khe Sanh. Robert and his Special Forces brothers, along with John Balanco and his CAC brothers, are developing plans to provide health care and schooling for the Bru. Currently, Bru children suffer infant mortality rates of 50%.

Make your tax-deductible contributions to the Khe Sanh Veterans ABHF. Send your contributions to Ernie Spencer c/o Khe Sanh Veterans, 458 Holiday Hills Drive, Martinez, CA 94553. All monies will be kept and dispersed by our Khe Sanh Veterans office of the Treasurer.

Dear Assoc. Members,

We've all had times when we've felt life has passed us by or wished we had done things differently. Whilst most of us have fortunately been able to live "normal" lives, some of our members aren't able to have the everyday freedoms we share and are in our prison systems. Right or wrong, they're there and I would hope we all wouldn't "condemn them" or forget them just because their address is a state system and their service is now a prison!

Being a retired police detective, I've had to send a few Vets to prison, but I never forgot that the hands I put in cuffs could have very well been the same hands that dug trenches and filled sand bags at Khe Sanh, or helped with wounded in 1/9. Something happened or didn't happen in their lives that took them out of society again – as was the case when they were in Vietnam. Their present situation doesn't change what they did for their country or the Corps in Vietnam. I hope we don't all forget them.

In the last two years, I've been writing to Richard Payne. He had a change of address some time ago to the Crowley Colorado prison system. Being a retired detective I admit, writing to someone in prison, purchasing mirrors made by him in prison and seeing him not being one to feel sorry for himself, I stay in contact with him regularly. He keeps himself busy working in the library and hobby shop, but as expected the pay is obviously quite limited. Having a simple coffee pot is a prized article and a T.V. is beyond hope.

This vet deserves some consideration when you have a few bucks to donate or purchase a mirror via him. Remember that 'Semper Fi' stands for all Marines – in prison or out. The rewards of friendship shouldn't stop at the prison walls. Drop Rick a letter*, order a mirror or send him a donation to show him that even though we're on the other side of the wall, he's thought of as a Viet Marine first and not just another 'number'.

I'd be a hypocrite if I turned my back on them just because they continued with their behavior when they rotated home. "There but for the grace of God..." applies to me.

To Whom It May Concern

I learned of your organization through John Finn of Rego Park, N.Y. I had an uncle, LCPL Hensley McFadden "Mac" DILWORTH who was KIA in the province of Da Nang on March 30th, 1967. He was with 1st Platoon, A/1/26. I was wondering whether you know of anybody who might have known him, or served with him. I never knew him very well – I was only three years old when he was killed.

Aloha! Captain Spencer,

I have just finished reading your summer '93 issue. I was surprised by the article in 'Memoirs' titled "The Big Guns" by Doug Meredith, 175s USA.

By September '66 I had left 1/5 on Hill 54 and joined 3rd MAF. I was sent south. From September through November a small group of us operated off a small LZ near Quang Ngai and Mo Duc. We had one officer, a USMC Captain along with about 15 grunts. I was the token "Doc." The areas surrounding our position were filled with various Marine units on varied operations. Our LZ was about one hundred yards long and about forty yards wide, carved out of the jungle 15 years earlier by the French or even possibly the Japanese. There were definite remnants of aircraft berms along the edge of the jungle clearing. Our perimeter guard were two M-60's and 14 Marines – that's it! Our Western approach was loosely guarded by a unit of ROK's (about a click and a half out). Our Southern perimeter and Eastern approach was our responsibility – the other approach was essentially wide open.

One night, Charlie took out the ROK's with mortars. We called for fire support. Huge guns lit up the night, it was like a thunder and lightning show in the Midwest. The ground shook. I asked the Captain, "What the hell was that?" He replied, "175's, I think?" He didn't know we had them. It really wasn't all that surprising since whenever we called for support, we never knew who was going to be the savior. Usually it was the Phantoms or A-4's, twice it was 'Puff' and once it was the New Jersey.

Twenty-seven years later, the answer presents itself in The Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter. Meredith's 175's were probably the source of retaliation upon the V.C. for their attack on our ROKS. Small war, ain't it? I remember passing the ROK contingent at Binh Son as were moved South to our LZ. We passed them by while they were taking their ease in that little ville. Down the road we lost half our convoy in a big ambush on Route 1. What was left of us continued on to our objective.

Two or three days after the ROKS were taken out on the Western perimeter, we found an ARVN garrison completely destroyed—no-one left alive. The bodies were still lying about where they had died. The garrison was still smoldering. Bunkers were blown, a guard tower lay on its side, it's wooden pillars still burning. Many of the ARVN bodies indicated throats cut rather than gunshot or shrapnel wounds. The four of us had walked into a nightmare that had just occurred. We made a hasty didi mau back to our little LZ knowing full well that the force that did this was nearby – and much larger than us.

Following the discovery of the ARVN slaughter, we assumed that we were next. First the ROKS, then the ARVN, then 15 Marines and one scared Corpsman. It never came. We continued to get sniper fire but never had to deal with being overrun.

The force that took our ROKS and then the ARVN must have run into some of the Marine units operating in the area. They had more to deal with than us. We were inconsequential. During those months, I flew an average of 30 or more medevacs out of that LZ per month. The surrounding units were caught up in some heavy shit. I lost track of the Marine KIA's and didn't bother keeping a tally of the WIA's.

Some strange looking Marines showed up one day in their own little Cessna, painted white with black lettering. By strange I mean, how many middle-aged LT's do you see? They took one of the old berms that had caved in and filled it with red mud and water and used it to dump V.C. bodies. They concertina-ed off a small area and improvised an ad hoc screening and ITT for the busloads of prisoners being brought in.

There is much more to this memory, but I just wanted to let you know that the article on the Doggie 175's brought back another hazy memory and dropped another missing piece into the puzzle.

Next time, I'll tell you about the night on the LZ when a screaming spider monkey dragging two hysterical tethered chickens ran across the Captain in the dark while he was sleeping. He came out of sleep blazing away with his .45 and in response, the 60's opened up on the treeline. In the midst of death and destruction there is, incongruously, comic relief.

P.S. Congratulations on your 1/26 Reunion. I have decided to attend mine. It is for 1/5 in Houston August 4-8 '93. I have research to do. Aloha!

Dear Mr Spencer,

I am writing to ask if you would please run a request for me in your publication. I am trying to locate anyone who served with and knew the following person:

Cpl. Juan N Sedillo ("Johnny")
Radio Operator
Service No: 2269777
Birth Date: January 30, 1948
Death Date: April 8, 1968 (KIA – Khe Sanh)

1st Battalion, 9th Marines
3rd Marine Division
H & S Co.

Johnny was my fiance at the time. I would very much like to hear from men who served with him and remember him.

Also, I have really appreciated your book, Welcome To Vietnam, Macho Man, which I discovered only recently. Since Johnny wrote very little to me about the war, your book is valuable to me for insight into what his experiences in Vietnam were probably like.

Thank you for your assistance.

Dear Ernie,

Finally got my reprints back and have enclosed them along with a letter from Dr Albert Castel – don't know if you are into civil war history or not but his book has received excellent reviews and is now in the bookstores.

I've contacted all of the major newspapers in the area and sent them the press release. All were very receptive to the idea of publishing the information. Like you said, this information needs to be widely disseminated to reach a majority of those who might be interested. I've also sent copies to the Houston and San Antonio newspapers and will send out more.

I apologize for the lack of quality with regard to the pictures. They are a product of the hot, humid, dusty environment we all had to endure at the time. Have a great Veterans Day!

Dear David,

Your endowment of a scholarship for nursing at Fairmont State in the name of your mother is a splendid idea that has now been turned into a splendid deed. Nothing could have been more appropriate and I would like to think that Madge knows of what you have done and approves – although, being her, she probably feels somewhat embarrassed (if angels feel embarrassment!)

I read with great interest your letter to Don Hossack and think you are doing a fine thing in compiling a book of first-hand accounts of the "Hill Fights" around Khe Sanh. (Incidentally, "Hill Fights" makes a good title). What you and your fellow veterans are doing along this line reminds me of what Civil War veterans did once a certain amount of time had passed after the war and they began to reach a certain age. Many of them did not even like to think, much less talk or write about their war experiences right after the war and for years beyond that. Then, with the passage of time and increased age, they began to feel that they had seen and experienced things that should be recorded and preserved. In many cases, if not most, they were not thinking about future historians, but I can guarantee the truth of this: a lot of historians, including this one, are very indebted and grateful to them for what they did.

I doubt if you need concern yourself with copyrights, etc. as regards Vietnam magazine. First of all, the article I submitted is an abridgement of your account, and chances are you would want to publish the full version. Second, the article has to be accepted and published first – and so far, I've heard nothing from the magazine. This irritates me a great deal and as soon as I return from the trip to Kansas I am taking next week, if there is still no word I shall send a query to the magazine. By that time, one of its sister magazines, Civil War Times Illustrated, will be out with a long excerpt from my Atlanta Campaign book in it, and I'll tell the Editor of Vietnam that it is rather strange that at the same time I'm being featured in one of his company's magazines, I cannot even get the courtesy of an acknowledgment or rejection from his magazine.

As you probably know, I went to Fairmont early in September and spent a very enjoyable and profitable day with Mike doing research on the divorce case of Stonewall Jackson's sister. As I told Mike last night when he called, I plan to get to work on that article as soon as I complete another article and the trip to Kansas.

Mike called to inform me that the copy of my Atlanta Campaign book I sent him arrived safely. It is for all the Rogers family, and Mike says he will pass it on to John before reading it himself; so if you want to read it – you will have to wait your turn.

As soon as I know the situation with Vietnam magazine, I'll inform you.

Sincerely,

Albert Caster

On October 30, Bill Jayne, representing the association, met retired North Vietnamese General Nguyen Huy Phan in Washington D.C. General Phan is a medical doctor who is now recognized as a leading plastic surgeon in Vietnam. He was in Washington meeting with government officials because he is also the leader of an organization called the Vietnamese-American Association.

Bill discussed the possibility of a Khe Sanh veterans trip to Vietnam, our interest in helping the Bru people who live near Khe Sanh and meeting with North Vietnamese soldiers who faced us on the battlefield in 1967-68. General Phan was supportive of our wishes to make such a trip.

Washington sources familiar with travel to Vietnam believe such a trip is feasible. They recommend a trip of about two weeks duration that would include stops in Saigon, Da Nang, Hue, Dong Ha and Hanoi, as well as a side trip to Khe Sanh. Since much of the area around Khe Sanh is off limits because of unexploded ordnance, the Khe Sanh excursion would probably be staged as day trips from Dong Ha. Experts also think we should ask to meet with former South Vietnamese allies who fought with us, such as members of the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion.

Such a trip should probably be limited to approximately 15 Americans: eight or ten would most likely be the optimum number of participants. The cost would be $3,500 to $4,000 each, including approximately $1,700 in airfare. Individuals should also plan to bring ample spending money for incidentals ranging all the way from laundry to possible donations to the Bru.

An interpreter would be provided. The tour costs would also cover all transportation, lodging and food.

I joined the Marine Reserves in July 1966 at El Paso, Texas. After my six months active duty, I stayed with the 4th 8" Howitzer Battery until I went active for three years in August 1967. After going active, I was sent back through artillery school at Camp Pendleton to become an instructor. While I was at Schools Battalion, an opening came up for a PFC at Marine Barracks, Subic Bay, Philippines. I signed up for that opening and did not know that the orders I was given were for WesPac Ground Forces. I couldn't understand the orders anyway, I just knew I was to report to Staging Bn after leave. I learned at Staging that I was going to Nam.

I got to Vietnam Nov. 24, 1967, and was assigned to Hq Battery, First Bn, Eleventh Marines in the FDC section. I spent my entire tour with Hq 1/11 except for a two week stint with Whiskey 1/11.

When I was with 1/11, we were used as direct support for 1st Marines and went on their operations. The places we went to are as follows: Quang Tri, Camp Evans, Phu Bai and Hue City during Tet, Ca Lu during Operation Pegasus, Khe Sanh (April 24 until July 4), Ca Lu again, Qua Viet, then ended up south of Da Nang where we were OPCON to Eleventh Marines for the first time in eleven months. One interesting note; when we were at Khe Sanh, we had a total of 13 firing batteries attached to us.

I got out of the Marines in 1970 and after a year of college I joined the New Mexico State Police and have been with them for 21 years, presently holding the rank of Sergeant.

WILD WEST

Khe Sanh Feb. '68: The fog had just lifted, the incoming had just started. It was relatively light, intermittent and generally scattered throughout the Fire Base. An out of breath runner slid into the bunker to inform me that Major Matt Caulfield wanted me and 1st Sgt Gene Chism (M-Co.) to report to his S-3 bunker for a briefing. We waited for a lull in the incoming then started through the trenchlines toward the S-3 shop when we spotted two so-called repatriated North Vietnamese sons-a-bitches crouched down near the perimeter doing something that didn't appear normal. "Chism, what the fuck are those two assholes doing? Whatever it is, it don't look right – let's check it out."

We both drew our .45's, approached from the rear and laid them alongside their ear. They had their sleeves rolled up and had drawn on their arms the perimeter line to include weapons placement. We knew our immediate thoughts would not be justified under the UCMJ so reluctantly we turned them over to the S-3 who escorted them to the S-2 section for whatever.

That's the last we heard of the incident. Sure would like to know what the final disposition was! Anybody from the "2" shop recall?

I find that my relationship with Khe Sanh is probably a bit strange when compared to most of your other members. I served in/around and over Khe Sanh in three different capacities. First as a Marine, then the Army and then as a civilian.

I started in the Marine Corps as a 0331, but I was able to get into a helicopter unit. I was trained as an Aviation Electronics Tech (Radio-Nav) but after several months in an operating squadron, I cross-trained as a helicopter mech (crew-chief). After a six month stay at Gutmo (Cuba) and then a Veques Cruise, I returned on my 2nd Veques when Dom Rep exploded. Upon returning home, I headed for West Pack.

I spent some time in HMM-263 then joined HMM-262 ("Bill's Bastards") when they came in-country. We were down at Ky Ha for 5 months then moved to Marble Mountain. While at Marble Mountain, we kept four aircraft up at Khe Sanh, usually flying FOB missions. Being up at Khe Sanh was the best part as we were away from a lot of the BS and our time was spent doing the job we were trained for. After 7 months, HMM-262 went back to Oki to have our A model CH-46s beefed up and turned into CH-46Ds. A few of us extended and brought the first D models back in-country.

Tet '68 brought out the heaviest flying and toughest missions we had experienced. The hours were long and the missions were, to say the least, "HOT." I left Nam in April '68 after 19 months. The only reason I left Nam (and HMM-262) was because I received an inter-service transfer into the Army. In April '67 I received the Distinguished Flying Cross while serving as a crew-chief (for the Commanding Officer of HMM-262, "Wild" Bill Shadrick, BGEN Rtd). Because this was the first DFC awarded to an enlisted Marine since WWII, LTGEN Krulak came to Vietnam to present it to me. During the awards ceremony, the General asked if I was going to stay in the Marine Corps. Although I had been a Sgt (E-5) for a year, my goal was to become an aviator. He explained that I only had two years of college and even though I had a FAA Commercial Pilots License, the Marine Corps wasn't going to promote any more "Flying Peons" (enlisted pilots) , though we had one in our unit (an old E-8). The General arranged for me to be transferred into the Army and their Warrant Officer flight program. I transferred into the Army—on Oki—and was sent back to the States to go through helicopter flight school, but as usual, something went wrong with the paperwork and I was sent back to Nam, where I served as an 11B (grunt) for two months before they 'corrected the problem' and sent me to flight school.

Upon completing flight school, I returned to Vietnam as an Army aviator. I reported in at Dong Ha, flying Aero-Scouts and artillery spotting for the 108th ARTY Group. I spent from May '69 to Jan '70 flying out of Dong Ha. Many missions were down QL 9 heading for Khe Sanh, although normally, the furthest we were able to get was just west of Vandy. I also spent many an hour flying low level along the DMZ, especially within Leatherneck Square. I had several crew-chiefs (and aero-observers) get wounded while on these missions.

In January, I went to fly Cobras for C Battery 4th/77th ARA (Aerial Rocket Artillery), 101st ABN Division, based out of Camp Evans. The reason I extended to this specific unit was that the GRIFFINS (C Battery's call sign) were primarily the Cobra unit flying for MAC-V-SOGs CCN missions out of Quang Tri. I flew CCN missions for the Griffins for 13 months until Feb '71. MAC-V-SOGs missions were cross border into Laos and North Vietnam.

I had flown as a crew-chief for MAC-V-SOG out of the FOBs at Dong Ha and, of course, Khe Sanh. The MAC-V-SOGs operations prior to the summer of '68 were known as Shining Brass—for the Laotian operations. The missions into the northwest section of South Vietnam were called Nickle Steel once they crossed over into North Vietnam (just the south west corner of N. Vietnam). After a major changeover in '68, the Nickle Steel and Shining Brass operations were combined into an operation called Prairie Fire. As a Marine, I flew Nickle Steel and Shining Brass operations (inserts and extractions), then with the Army I flew Cobras on Prairie Fire missions. After checking my flight records, I see that I flew at least 426 hours (as a Marine crew-chief) and 1341 hours as a Cobra pilot flying these classified missions.

In February '71 I was transferred back to an Aero-Scout unit for the large push into Laos—called Operation LOM SOM 719. I flew with C Troop, 2nd/17th CAV, of the 101st ABN DIV. I flew in the Scout Platoon until June '71 when I was wounded (my 3rd Purple Heart). For at least three months I was back flying out of Khe Sanh again—and I loved it. I remember a reporter interviewing me (because I had been at Khe Sanh during the siege and hill battles) and he asked me for my feelings about Khe Sanh. Having lost many friends in the hills and air around the Khe Sanh airstrip, including the best man at my wedding—Jimmy Akstin, Khe Sanh evokes strong feelings in me. I told the reporter that although we were there—we were only there as guests of the NVA, for if they could withstand the B-52 bombing, they could sure make life very difficult for us there. An Army Captain (PIO) who was with the reporter tried to cut me off and I quickly reminded him that to the best of my knowledge, at that present time NO-ONE had more time at Khe Sanh than I (meaning in the area at the time.)

While flying for the CONDORS (C Troop 2nd/17th CAV) I was once again living, eating, refueling and breathing the Khe Sanh air. I loved it. I was home in an area I knew and respected, although flying scouts into Laos was the roughest flying I've ever done. Not a flight went by when we didn't get blasted/took hits, with more wounded than we wanted. LOM SOM will go down in the annals of helicopter operations as one of the toughest battles ever fought. Not only was the amount of enemy anti-aircraft fire accurate, it was the most intense that helicopter pilots had ever seen. The losses were staggering. Every helicopter unit had had its bad days, but during LOM SOM 719, all who flew day after day had nothing but bad days. For many, it was the first time they had flown in the air against 23mm/37mm and larger. It was the first time they had experienced flying in a formation when one—or two—of their flight would be hit by air bursts. This was like what their fathers had flown into over Germany during WWII. The acts of bravery were many and I am sure that very few of them were reported. You just didn't have time—you flew your ass off all day and passed out from sheer exhaustion at night. In 6 years of total combat—LOM SOM 719 was the worst.

Anyway, after getting discharged and after a stay at Womack Army Hospital (Ft Bragg NC), I went to work for Air America—flying back where I was at home—Northern South Vietnam, Laos and over Khe Sanh. There were times when I was tempted to do a low level fly-by of the air field, and once when I took a few extra rounds, I made it back to the Southeast and landed at Khe Sanh where my mechanic quickly patched us up and we proceeded back to Hue. I ended up spending 22 months with Air America.

Khe Sanh is interwoven in my life. I watched the lush, green valley slowly get scarred and pock-marked with bomb craters over the years, with two rapid changes: (1) Fall '67-Spring '68 and (2) Feb-Apr '71. During these two periods the valley, and especially the area around the air field, was able to start it's re-growth back to its green fields. But the push into Laos with LOM SOM 719 did 5 times the amount of damage that had happened when the Marines were there. Also, with the moving of the Yards to Mai Loc (just SWS of Camp JJ Carroll), the plantations and village disappeared and the wild green vegetation took over—even the red roads were quickly erased by the fast growing vegetation.

After I returned as a civilian, I would fly over the area to see how it was doing, though at times this proved to be hazardous, with the NVA moving into the area and no US/ARVN presence. Although my flights with AA were (and still are) classified, I do know that we had operatives working on the ground to the west of Khe Sanh—and from what I was told (in briefings), the area was crawling with NVA.

A little about me. I served in combat with VMO-2, HMM-263, HMM-262, 1stBN/6th INF 198th LIB, HHB (AVN Section) 108th Artillery Group, C Battery 4th/77th ARA 101st ABN DIV, C Troop 2nd/17th CAV 101st ABN DIV and Air America. I've got over 89 months overseas—with at least 68 months in Southeast Asia. I served as a crew-chief/door gunner on the following aircraft: H-34D, UH-1E, CH-46A and CH-46D. I've been a pilot/aircraft commander of the following aircraft: OH-6A, OH-23G, OH-58A, UH-1 C/D/H, AH-1G and Bell 204 (civilian helo used in Nam). All these listed aircraft were flown/crewed by me in combat. I ended up with many awards; from the United States, South Vietnam and yes, even one from the Laotian government! I have two children still in Vietnam (Da Nang area). I have two children Stateside along with two grandchildren. I have three stepchildren (one of whom served in the Navy during Desert Storm.) As you can tell, I am currently serving time in a California State Prison for killing the man who raped my stepdaughter.

I, along with a good friend, Mr Ernie Payne, started Veterans About Face several years ago to help our fellow veterans who have not fared so well since the Vietnam War. Though some of these include those incarcerated, we also have an active program for the men at the PTSD section of the VA Hospital at Menlo Park. We've also been able to help some homeless vets. Although we are not a large organization, we have been lucky enough to have very dedicated people and we don't have the normal politics that are found in groups such as ours.

I know a lot of Khe Sanh vets—both Army and Marine (and a few civilians as well.) I happen to be a member of several other organizations that include Khe Sanh Veterans, such as Special Operations Assn, Vietnam Helicopter Pilots Assn., Vietnam Combat Pilots Assn., Vietnam Helicopter Crew Members Assn., Association of Air America, etc., and I will start making an appeal to these groups to pass the word about the Khe Sanh Assn.

Dear Dallas Columnist,

You'll never convince Jennifer Young and Gilbert Wall of Dallas or Bruce Jones of La Crosse, Wis., that it's not a very small world.

Jennifer Young worked for the Red Cross in Vietnam in 1968 and '69. Like thousands of other Vietnam veterans from across the country, she donned her old uniform and went to Washington D.C. earlier this month for the dedication of the new "Three Fighting Men" statue at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, the long granite wall inscribed with the names of those who died in the Vietnam War.

"I stayed one day beyond that intense, emotional weekend," says Young, now a Vice President at InterFirst Bank. "Among the myriad flags, wreaths, letters, flowers and personal mementos placed all along the base of the wall, I noticed a note on colored paper which said: 'Gilbert Wall, F.O. 1st Bn. 26th Marines, Khe Sanh, contact Bruce Jones "T-Bone", in La Crosse, Wis.' There was an address and a phone number too.

"Obviously, it was written by a vet trying to connect with a long-lost buddy and placed at the bottom of a panel of some significance to them both," Young said. "I remembered that 12 years ago, I had interviewed and hired a Gilbert Wall when I worked at Mobil Oil in Dallas. On a whim, I copied the information. My first day back in Dallas I called the Mobil switchboard. Gilbert Wall still worked for Mobil. When I got him on the phone I said, 'Are you the Gilbert Wall who was a Forward Observer at Khe Sanh, 1st Battalion 26th Marines?' He said yes. Then I asked if he had attended the salute in Washington over the weekend. He said no. Then I said, 'Gilbert, T-Bone is looking for you.'

"Gilbert called T-Bone and they talked for two hours," Young continued, "and the note on the wall was taped to the list of 28 men Gilbert served with who were lost in a fire fight near Khe Sanh. Gilbert was one of only two men who survived the fight."

Jennifer Young and Gilbert Wall met for lunch after her phone call and the two talked about their experiences in Vietnam. Young was then a recent graduate of Purdue who wanted some adventure in her life before settling down to a career. In Vietnam, she was a Red Cross recreational specialist who flew by helicopter to secured landing zones and fire bases on the forward front to lead soldiers in playing game shows similar to those on television.

Young called Gilbert Wall "a bona fide hero."

Now a 40 year old accountant with Mobil, Wall lives in Irving and teaches boxing to kids in Oak Cliff. A Blackfoot Indian, he grew up on the reservation bordering Glacier National Park in Montana. He voluntarily joined the Marines in 1968 because, he said, he wanted to go to Vietnam. He spent 26 months there, was shot four times and has a Bronze Star for his efforts to save an officer during a fire fight at Khe Sanh. He also volunteered to be a Forward Observer, a job few soldiers sought due to its short life expectancy.

Bruce "T-Bone" Jones, a Marine radio man, was his best buddy in Vietnam.

"We arrived in Vietnam about the same time, served together for 13 months, got shot together and then lost track of each other when we came home," Wall said. "The last time I saw him was March 8, 1968. When we talked a few weeks ago, he told me he'd been trying to find me for years. He kept writing to the reservation in Montana but the letters never got to me or my family. He had no idea I'd moved to Texas."

Finding each other after all these years was a shock, Wall said. "Jennifer finding that note on the Wall was a one-in-a-million chance."

Now Jones and Wall are planning a joyous reunion. "T-Bone may come to Dallas in January or February on business," Wall said. "If that doesn't work out, we're going to meet in Las Vegas."

A MOTHER WANTS TO KNOW

We have received notice from Friends of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, In Touch program, that the mother of Cpl. Robert Franklin Owens is seeking contact with anyone who knew her son. Robert was with Delta Co. 1st Bn. 9th Mar. when he was KIA at Khe Sanh on April 16, 1968. Robert was a fire team leader with 1st Plt. If anyone out there knew Robert, please contact Friends of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, 2030 Clarendon Blvd., Suite 412, Arlington, VA. 22201, tel: 703/525-1107.

FROM DEEP WITHIN THE HEART

We've been together a long time now.
I know you so well,
and yet there's so much about you I don't understand.
Sometimes when I reach out you withdraw.
When I ask you to tell me about it you can't;
your silence weighs deeply upon my heart.
When I try to understand you push me away.
How can I make you see I really want to help?
Sometimes I just don't know how;
I won't give up;
I'll keep on trying.
Just remember,
the strength to go on comes from deep within the heart.

Dear Ernie,

I have been trying to sit down and write ever since I got out of the Topeka V.A. in Oct but I have had nothing but family problems. My Dad spent all of Nov. in the Leavenworth V.A. and I have had a hard time getting my own life on some kind of track. I still go every Friday for out-patient group and one-on-one.

I guess I missed out on all of the issues of The Khe Sanh Veteran and hope I can get any that have come out since our Reunion. I hope I can get back on the mailing list as I really miss my mag. I will be sending my dues as soon as I get my next workers' compensation check. I don't know when I wrote to you last, so I will be sending some names that I found in the book of Topeka P.T.S.D. Unit Grads from or around Khe Sanh.

I feel I found something at our Reunion that I have been missing since my return from Vietnam. I found compassion and FRIENDSHIP, and people whom I can relate with. Although I may never find the guys from B-Recon with whom I identify and call my Brothers, I, with another SeaBee, did find some Brothers from Recon and hope we will see each other again. I also found new friends from Khe Sanh and some women who really care about their Vet husbands and the rest of us also.

Well Ernie, it's now January '94 and I am doing my best not to bunker up as I have in past years. This is my nightmare season—it usually lasts for three or more months, so I have been told not to isolate myself and work on being with people. I really don't get along with people at this time of year; actually, it starts before Christmas. I really hate the holidays—I hate being around large groups of people. I am working on this, but so far no positive results.

I am sure you have tons of mail to sift through from other Vets so I'll close this letter and get it mailed. I want to wish you, your family, and if you print this—all my Brothers out there the best for the coming year. GOD BLESS YOU ALL.

Your Brother

Lewis Sam Messer II
C.B.M.U. 301 ('67/'68)

Dear Friend,

It was so good to hear your voice the other night. It gives me tremendous strength just knowing I have such special friends.

As you know, I chose to seek help within the Church. That was a tremendous step for me. (My Dog Tags from Nam are stamped "No Pref.") I have fought this for years. Guess what? I lost!

Yesterday in Church, the theme was, of course, to ask for "Thanksgiving". How true. I have such a beautiful, healthy family, a new found faith in the Lord and I have something most people never find in life. I have the most special friends in the world. It is such a comfort to know you are there. You must also be assured I am OK and I will always be here for you—anytime.

I have taken your advice and backed off—just a little. I can never quit. I have mailed the tape to Tom Eichler to take to the Penns on Saturday after Thanksgiving. I am going to spend my four days making Molly a cedar chest I had promised months ago and just hang out with Maxine around the house. The last two weeks kind of wore her out too.

Please tell Pat I send my love and I had a wonderful time at your house.

Your friend,

Mike O'Hara

Dear Mr Maves,

I have had correspondence with Brother Ray Stubbe and he was kind enough to send me a couple of back issues.

Your magazine is more than just a publication, it is a living part of our past and a thing we should never forget. Our experiences at Khe Sanh are unique to the Warriors who served there in the 'Hill Fights' of April and May 67 (my time) and the Siege in 68.

I will be discharged from the Miami V.A. Hospital by the time this letter reaches you. I have just completed a three month in-patient program for PTSD. We can never forget but we can learn to cope.

Respectfully,

SOUL SURVIVAL

by Sandra Hill
London

As a 19-year-old in 1938, my father joined the RAF Regiment, an outfit he was to stay with for 13 years. During World War II, the Regiment was assigned to artillery defence of British airfields, and it wasn't until the latter part of 1942 that the Regiment received orders to ship out to North Africa.

Cpl. Len Hill RAF

In mid-December 1942, they set sail on the merchant vessel "Strathallan", the Flagship of a huge 50 ship convoy. Loaded with military stores and 5,000 military personnel, the "Strathallan" also carried a crew of 431 and a compliment of 248 Queen Alexandra Nurses. Four days before Christmas, on the 21st, the convoy was steaming through a beautifully moonlit Mediterranean night. My father had gone up on deck sometime before midnight when the tranquility was brutally shattered by two huge explosions which virtually lifted the ship out of the water. Two torpedoes from an Italian submarine tore into the underside of the ship causing extensive damage, and as other destroyers in the convoy wheeled around to hunt down the sub, other ships steamed to the assistance of the crippled "Strathallan." In a desperate attempt to keep the ship afloat, within minutes of the attack the order was given to seal the lower decks. This effectively sealed the fate of thousands of military personnel still trapped below deck, including most of the nurses, the majority of whom had been asleep below deck at the time of the attack. Another ship took the "Strathallan" under tow but at 4 a.m. on the 22nd, the order to abandon ship was given. Those fortunate enough to have survived the maelstrom below deck clambered over the side into life rafts and shortly after, they watched the ship slide beneath the waves, consigning the majority of its human cargo to a watery grave. The loss of life was immense. In the wake of the attack, wartime censorship imposed by Winston Churchill dictated that the tragedy went virtually unreported, so as not to give the enemy a propaganda victory. "Official" losses were reported as 2 ships engineers, 4 crew and a small number of passengers (the magical numbers game was in play even way back then—"REMFs" playing God with the stroke of a pen). During the course of the ship's evacuation, my father, who couldn't swim, almost drowned. He recalls floundering in the freezing water before sinking beneath the surface and only vaguely recollects someone reaching down, grabbing him by the hair and hauling him back up and into a life raft. The "Strathallan" incident was the one experience of the war which haunted my father more than any other.

My interest in war history started at a very young age, having been virtually weaned on war stories. One of my earliest and most enduring recollections is listening captivated as my father recounted tales of his wartime experiences to visiting friends and relatives. Whilst being too young to comprehend the implication of his narrative, I knew he must have been describing something exciting the more animated he got. My father never talked to me directly about his experiences, I only learned about them as an observer. As his stories unfolded, I would turn my inquisitive gaze to his impromptu audience and see the resigned look in their eyes, or catch an exchanged jaded glance pass between them. They'd see me watching them but paid no heed, little realizing that despite my tender years, I'd sussed them. I remember feeling indignant about that—or whatever passed for indignation at such a young age.

In those early days, I remember my elder sister being the apex around which everything revolved; everyone's favourite (first born's are always special aren't they), and I felt pretty much left on the sidelines. So I turned to my father. I recall trailing around in his wake wanting some of the attention my sister was getting, but he was an emotionally distant man who had difficulty displaying emotion of any kind, and I was forever kept at arms length. Most of my young friends' fathers' hadn't been old enough to serve during World War II but my father, being 10 years their senior, did see action, and when I compared my friends' relationships with their fathers' to my experience, as young as I was, I knew something wasn't right. At around the same time, my parents were going through a very rocky patch and they were always arguing. My mother constantly moaned at my father for always recounting his wartime experiences whenever we had visitors—she wanted him to leave it in the past, and that was guaranteed to be the ignition switch for more arguments. Consequently, because I inclined more toward my father and was content to listen avidly to his wartime reminisces, my mother used me as a kind of 'whipping-boy' to get at him.

During those early years, my father was more like an observer than a participant in my life and I don't recall any respite from my mother's sniping—she didn't miss a shot to get at him via me. It was like being piggy in the middle, with no support from either side. In the end, I think it got to be a habit she just couldn't break. After a couple of years of this, things eventually came to a head when my grandparents had a huge showdown with my parents because I was threatening to run away—I was convinced they didn't want me. I was ten years old at the time. It culminated in my grandparents taking over my upbringing. Whilst I continued to live at home during the week, weekends and school holidays were spent with my grandparents. With them, I got what I couldn't get at home—attention, affection and peace. For my father's part, he buried himself in his great passion of photography. He was sufficiently proficient to be asked to officiate at friends' weddings as the official photographer on a number of occasions. He used to 'escape' into his studio-cum-darkroom at home where he practised his art of portrait photography—using us kids as 'subjects'. We were required to sit for prolonged periods as he set and reset camera angles and lighting, and it got to the stage where I developed such a loathing for the camera that to this day, my automatic reaction is to turn away when faced with one.

Things with my parents never improved, and the beginning of the end came at age 15 (the year of the Siege), when I got a place in college which I was only able to take up through the support of my grandparents. The two years that followed were a personal struggle, during which time things got pretty crazy. With the advent of the psychedelic 70's, I found the ultimate escape from all the trauma going on around me and I drifted off into stoned oblivion. I used to go home some nights totally spaced out and my mother never even noticed. My father did—although I suspect he thought it was booze. He may have kept a low profile but he never missed much. He was a watcher. Shortly after finishing college and starting work, I admitted defeat and threw in the towel. After yet another major confrontation, I went out and didn't go back. At 17 years old I left with my sanity but very little else.

Looking back with hindsight, and by studying war and its effects on its participants, I've learned enough to realise that my father's recollections of his wartime experiences were his therapy. He wasn't blind to the reticence of his sometimes reluctant audience—he kept on going because he needed to—confession being good for the soul. In the absence of Reunions or support groups, which the Brits have never been hot on, his only outlet was to those around him. When that became a problem for my mother, he just withdrew into himself, taking his memories with him. He always gave the impression of being restless, of not being satisfied with his lot, but he never did anything about it. To a great extent, war vets need their own kind. Only those who have shared the war experience can truly appreciate what lies behind the words and memories, and the need to share those memories. A bonding of kindred spirits. When I see what American vets get out of their Reunions and support groups I really feel for my father. He's never had that. He stopped sharing his experiences when he thought people didn't care enough to hear them anymore. There was nobody to say, "Hey! I know where you're coming from—I was there too" or, "Do you remember..."

My father's war experience lasted just over 4 years, at the end of which he came home to a grateful nation and a heroes welcome. In comparison, the Vietnam war rolled on and on, year after year. It was a "hit and run" type of war, where the enemy rarely stood and fought. You had to go in after them, got ambushed, booby-trapped, maimed in body or soul, or both, pulverized with artillery, and for those fortunate enough to make it back to the world, then faced the condemnation of their fellow citizens. That fact alone is almost as appalling as the war itself. When it comes to war, it doesn't all end with the cessation of hostilities or a tour of duty. The small print on the contract says, "We've got you for life".

As one whose outlook on life is that of fatalist, I firmly believe that destiny guides one and all. Those who returned from the war were pre-destined to do so. Those who didn't went on to fulfill their destiny elsewhere. When all is said and done, most war veterans possess restless souls desiring only to find the respect and peace of mind which so often eludes them. Most, unfortunately, have to settle for considerably less. Despite my father's shortcomings in the participation of my upbringing, I've always held him in high regard. In an oblique way, I wouldn't have developed such an interest in war history if it hadn't been for him. Throughout my life he's been like a shadow in the background, yet I've turned out pretty much like him. I've inherited his disregard for life's trivialities; his tendency to stand back and observe; his restless spirit—which is an underlying factor in my life, and of course, an avid interest in war history. I often wonder how different my early life might have been if he'd had support groups the way you guys do. I wonder...

I was watching the video "Dear America" recently, based on the book of letters men and women in Nam sent home to their families. There's a fair sized section on Khe Sanh and the Siege, and it featured a photo of Don Jacques and read out one of his last letters home before his patrol was ambushed and wiped out. It's really something—it's the third time I've watched that video and I've only just made the connection that he was the subject of the "Doomed Patrol" in "Welcome To Vietnam, Macho Man". You hear all these young guy's letters home, reassuring their families they're going to make it; so full of hope—then next day they're gone forever.

The final letter to be read out is one left by a mother at the Wall addressed to her long lost son, in which she told him she was visiting the Wall because she needed to see and touch his name once again, and that alongside his name on the Wall was her heart—which had been broken since he'd lost his life all those years ago in Vietnam. She concluded by saying that she would rather have had him for the 21 years of his life, together with all the pain she'd endured since losing him, than never to have known him at all. It's such a heart-rending letter it just demolishes me every time I hear it.

I wonder what people would have done if there'd been nowhere to channel their grief—if there'd been no Wall.

RAGING MEMORY

Khe Sanh was 59 minutes of abject tedium punctuated by 60 seconds of terror. Film is the whore of terror but a bitch that reviles truth. She genuflects to trauma, disdains the monotonous 59, hyperventilates with the adrenaline of the clash. The truth is, however, sometimes vividly mundane, humorous and unfit for the voracious small screen frothing for more blood. "Give us the 60 seconds!"

No, I won't. What you may have is a segment of the 59, some of the glue that molded the Brotherhood for its final minute. Before the 77 days, we were still Marines, patriots and citizens. Our identity did not begin January 21 at 0535. That was only the opening moment of our 60 seconds. But we were there before then—and so was Tom Meade.

Tom had mesmeric eyes. His "black Irish" features and quick wit were gifts denied an entire generation of young American peers. He was a principled man who truly believed in God and country without affectation. It was my deep pleasure to have known him. Like all deaths, I try not to dwell on the end. He was gregarious and cards were one of our few diversions.

Long before that January, "Saint Thomas" would convene the semi-regular "convocations" in the Delta Company S-1 tent. We would gather around the altar of adolescent greed and play poker. That silly "script" which replaced greenbacks in-country was almost too hideous to handle. It had a shale red tint, akin to bad cabernet. Throwing it away in a poker game seemed a logical pursuit in a place devoid of logic.

My last game with the S-1 troops who worked with Tom was replete with booze. I have no idea how it appeared. The Air Force would procure a "fifth" for any Marine at Khe Sanh for the beneficent sum of only $25. (ED: $25 was cheap—some paid $100.) To this day, you Airdales are still pricks. Lownds should have shitcanned your asses sooner. Anyhow...the game was on at Delta Company and there was enough of something that looked like Jack Daniels to make every one of us happy. As I recall, there were always about eight people in the game.

My exit came, however, when Tom asked me how much I'd lost. There was another raise. I passed—then looked at the funny money on the box desk that served as card table. After counting about $980 showing, I turned to Tom. My memory retains the original quote—but I can paraphrase:

"There's enough fuckin" ammo and booze here to stage a major firefight," I said to Tom. We were all so glib. My M-16 had 160 rounds lovingly draped around it with an "H-Harness" that had that reddish dirt that permeated the base. My ass may have been combat ready but I would have been an abysmal inspection piece.

Tom said that a little more booze and one or two frayed tempers might make the game a transition to combat. It's just that the tinted Monopoly money on the desk just didn't seem real. Tom did convince me that discretion needed to prevail when the S.Sgt next to me unhooked the handle strap to his pistol. I left the tent and went outside with Tom, visited the piss tube and felt elated that I had escaped with a mere $60 deficit and all my limbs appropriately attached. Then we laughed.

That's what I still remember about Tom. Not the end, but the beginning and the middle. He was only a Corporal there, but he's a celestial Sergeant Major now.

ED: During a taping that Ken Pipes did for National Geographic, he included a segment done at Camp Pendelton. I saw Pat pay tribute to Tom Meade, who was my company clerk (KIA 6 Feb 68). I called Pat and asked him to do a memoir on Tom. I told him that I have a rubbing from The Wall of Tom's name and it hangs over my computer. "Tom is my muse," I said to Pat. I did not realize how unsettling this would be for you Pat. I hope that in seeing this you can see how angry you still are. I hope our Air Force brothers forgive your unnecessary comments. I seriously considered editing them out but realized that to do so would negate your feelings, which are no doubt real.

I end by asking you, Pat, how long do you want to carry this?

All For Naught

Do not speak to me of honor;
Do not speak to me of pride;
Do not speak to me of nations;
Where - for naught - our valor died.

What care I for fancy logic?
What care I for reasoned thought?
I have buried the friends of my heart -
All for naught - all for naught.

What care I for politicians fighting over why we fought?
I have buried the friends of summer -
All for naught - all for naught.

What care I for fancy speeches?
I grow tired of shiny lies.
I have buried the friends of laughter -
All for naught, laughter dies.

Do not speak to me of sorrow;
Give my grief the peace I sought.
You are not fit to speak of men;
Dead in Asia, all for naught.

RETURN TO VIETNAM

by Nancy Smoyer

In April 1993, I went back to Vietnam for a month with the Veterans Vietnam Restoration Project. Our group was small, three combat veterans and myself, a Red Cross Donut Dollie. We spent two weeks renovating a clinic at Cu Chi and two weeks traveling north to Hanoi. We worked and traveled with former Viet Cong and NVA soldiers which added an unexpected, but very welcome and therapeutic element to the experience, especially since I was stationed at Cu Chi during Tet. It was an unsettling experience to be introduced to a fellow worker who was the head of the local veterans group, learn that he had been at Cu Chi during the entire war and realize that this man was lobbing mortars and rockets at me during Tet. However, during the two weeks we worked together on the clinic, we formed a special relationship in spite of our language difficulties. He gave me his gold star pin and I gave him a pin from the 10th anniversary of the Wall; we joked and teased and spoke of friendship and peace. His face became the face which humanized the enemy for me.

Nancy Smoyer on the road back to Khe Sanh

But I'm getting ahead of myself. The most important thing that happened was a process I found myself going through during my first week there which caught me completely by surprise. My primary reason for going back was to get over the feelings of anger and animosity I've carried for the Vietnamese for 25 years. Although I was well aware intellectually that my feelings were for the most part irrational, I also knew that I wouldn't get over them until I went back. From my experience on other trips to Third World countries, I was pretty sure that those feelings would disappear almost immediately, which is, in fact, what happened. However, there were other aspects I hadn't foreseen.

Even as we were driving from Tan Son Nhut to Cu Chi, I found myself thinking, "What are all these Vietnamese doing here; where did they come from?" and "Where are the GIs?" It was so strange and upsetting to see no American presence, nothing to indicate that we had ever been there. It made the whole thing—the war, the losses, the pain, seem even more of a waste. During the first few days I found myself getting more and more depressed as the guys in the group were getting more and more excited about how wonderful everything was. I wasn't interacting with the Vietnamese people on the work site or getting involved the way I normally do when I travel, and I couldn't figure out why I was acting so differently.

Then at the end of my third day I had a revelation. I realized that I was mourning the loss of "my" Vietnam. As I thought about it, I was able to identify the stages of the grief. My denial has been in thinking about Vietnam as being unchanged since I left, complete with GIs and fire bases and choppers everywhere. Instead, I was hit in the face with a completely different country, a new reality which I didn't want and couldn't accept. My bargaining had been that if I kept connected with the vets and activities related to Vietnam, then the experience stays alive and not over. The anger I've felt has been toward the Vietnamese people, the Vietnamese government and the American people and the American government. Those feelings of anger have spilled over in many parts of my life. And then there was the depression which I've dealt with in various forms for years, and which was hitting me full force again, right then and there.

As I understood this, I knew that I had already dealt with the anger toward the Vietnamese people—that left immediately, and after working with the Vietnamese veterans and going into their homes and meeting their families, it was impossible to continue carrying my negative feelings. As I read The Tunnels of Cu Chi and crawled through the tunnels, saw pictures in every home we visited of family members who had died in the wars, visited the massive graveyards and memorials to the war dead, heard about the 300,000 Vietnamese who are still missing, I gained a compassion and understanding which I hadn't allowed myself to feel before. I had accomplished what I came back to Vietnam to do.

But even though I now understood much of what I was feeling and had even gotten over my negative feelings toward the people, I was still not at the point of acceptance. As I told the guys, I wasn't ready to give Vietnam back to the Vietnamese. But then, after a week or so of being unable to talk about my changed feelings toward the Vietnamese people without choking up, I realized that it was over. I was done with Vietnam. Not done with the vets or with the after-effects of the war, but done with the country and with the people. It's their country, they fought for it (on both sides), they earned it, and although I now care for them—whereas I didn't before, that part is finished. I still have all the other aspects of Vietnam (the war, not the country) to deal with, but at least one is taken care of.

Now I have two Vietnams—the one in my memory, in my pictures and in my vets, and the Vietnamese Vietnam. It had been "my" country for a while—my GI Vietnam—and yet it was theirs, and should have been all along. I had been afraid of losing my Vietnam, of having to replace it with the "real" one, but now I realize I can keep them both—different but the same, separate but together, entwined.

So that was my experience. Traveling north after that was almost anticlimactic. It was wonderful to finally see Khe Sanh and other Marine fire bases, to get sand from China Beach, to go to the village near Da Nang where my brother was killed, to search for the Red Cross villa in Da Nang (which I never could find), to look for bullet holes in the Citadel, to visit the fascinating and disturbing war museum in Hanoi where the possessions of the POW/MIAs have been stored, and to just take care of unfinished business.

Other observations. The Vietnamese people really are as friendly toward Americans as I had heard. They carry no grudge that I could see. I asked several of the former enemy why that was and their response was that they had been told by their government, and they firmly believed, that American GIs were not there because they wanted to be but because their government sent them, so that made all the difference in their attitude towards us. After we had seen the museum and site of the My Lai massacre, our Vietnamese veteran guide told us that he didn't like going there because it wasn't representative of the American GIs, that this was an aberration. (His son was killed at Khe Sanh in 1972 and has never been found. The image of him standing on Khe Sanh with a Marine who had been there during the siege I will never forget).

The Vietnamese veterans are very puzzled and curious about Americans' PTSD. When I asked whether they experienced it they said no, because they knew what they were fighting for and their country's response toward them was totally different. However, we did observe some stress-related problems, which is not surprising after 40 years of continuous war.

I recognized nothing. Oh, Marble Mountain looked the same, and I think I recognized a field just before a bridge in Da Nang, but I could have been dropped anywhere for all I knew. The NSA hospital is empty sand dunes, the bomb craters are mostly filled in (especially in the south), the rice paddies are green, cows graze on Khe Sanh (at least inside the perimeter—mines are outside), there are tons of water buffalo, the kids are a joy—and the war is over.

Post script: I originally wrote this about a month after I got back, five months ago. Since the trip, something has happened which I hesitate to identify because I can't believe it's true or real. I had listened skeptically as I heard others talk about a change in themselves after going back to Vietnam, and yet somehow, that change has happened to me. Friends have noticed that there is something different about me—I'm a little more tolerant, a little less impatient, a little more open and less negative. Somehow, the cloud has lifted a little bit—I feel lighter.

I've heard that when one feeling leaves, space is made for something else to move in. I know that a lot of anger has left, but I can't identify what it is that has taken its place. I keep being afraid that the old me will return, and it may, but this reprieve has shown me that there is another side, another way to be. That realization is what makes me want to share this experience with others in hopes that they too might find, or make, the opportunity to let go of some of the pain.

Steve Riddle
1/26 Scout Sniper

Dear Ernie,

I enjoyed our visit at the Khe Sanh Reunion. In many respects it was akin to stepping into a nuclear reactor, the way the energy and emotions were flying around. It certainly triggered a lot of memories ranging from very painful to extremely humorous.

Per our discussion, I have enclosed some photos of some of the members of our S-2 scout/sniper section 1/26. In addition, I have included some recollections of my partner and bunkermate, Nelson Jones.

Nelson and I reported to the scout/sniper section together. He stood close to 6'4" in height and weighed about 230lbs solid. He and the great Cleveland Browns fullback, Jim Brown, could have been related. Sgt Garcia was the chief scout and Lt Sibley was in charge of our S-2 section.

We spent many hours filling sandbags and working together as a team, operating the TPS-6 troop detection electronics device. At that time, we mainly worked at night on Bravo, Charlie, Delta 1/26 and the ARVN Ranger perimeters. We also scouted for patrols once we started operating outside the wire.

When I first met Nelson, he appeared to be quiet, introspective and religious. When I got to know him, he definitely was quiet, introspective and religious! Nelson was also a fatalist. If something was going to happen, it would happen. This philosophy resulted in many hours of discourse between us. I never once heard the man curse. During quiet moments, I often observed him reading his military issue New Testament Bible. He told me that he derived a sense of peace and purpose from his religious beliefs. As we became better acquainted, he would sort of give me the silent treatment if I used blasphemous or foul language. It initially pissed me off, since being scared, under fire, tired, dirty and surrounded in the middle of nowhere, lent to the generous use of profane language as being the most apropos semantics, considering the overall situation. Nevertheless, an inappropriate expletive would cost me a bout of silence from my immense counterpart. This turned into a form of game between us. I, of course, would often slip, particularly with close incoming or unwelcome work details after we had been up most of the night. I usually could solicit a pretty good smile or even a laugh out of Nelson if I would sarcastically on occasion say to him: "Golly! But that was a close one!", then roll my eyeballs. Often, just to gig him, I would say something like:"For goodness sakes Nelson! Do you think that the Gunny figures we're the only two assholes on this whole fucking base that are so adept at digging holes, filling sandbags or burning shitters?" Of course, looking at him quizzically, with a glint in my eye.

One night, on the ARVN Ranger lines, we were taking incoming fire. A round came in real close and the concussion knocked me unconscious momentarily. When I recovered my senses, I was inside the ARVN command bunker. I was laying on the deck and Nelson was trying to get me to talk to him while checking me over to see if I had sustained any hits. I was so stunned that I couldn't even generate some sort of smart-ass comment. A couple of ARVN Rangers explained to me that Nelson had dragged and carried me from the fighting hole in the middle of the incoming fire to the bunker. I looked up at Nelson and told him I appreciated what he had done for me. He was squatting over me looking down with those huge hands of his just hanging there and nodded and shook his head like it wasn't any big deal. Later that night, I went back out and noticed Nelson in the close vicinity bird-dogging me to make sure I was okay. On reflection, it felt like there was a benevolent oak tree shadowing over me. I was very fortunate to have had a partner of his caliber and character working with me.

I separated from scout/snipers a week or two after we landed at Wonder Beach and was re-assigned to the 3rd Combined Action Troop in Phu Bai. Nelson and I lost contact after that. I later heard that Nelson was on the operation with Delta Company 1/26 and was in the close vicinity when Captain Hughes was KIA due to heavy machine gun fire. He may have been medevaced—I never found out.

For me, Khe Sanh represented my first three months in-country. I remember thinking, 'you only have ten months and a wake up to go!' I know Nelson made it back to the world because I didn't see his name on the Wall. I pray that life has been good to him and that he and his family are well.

I'll always remember Nelson as being a physically imposing individual whose quiet resolve far surpassed his physical capabilities, which were considerable.

Like so many others, Nelson and I had seen the elephant together. To have spent my time at Khe Sanh with that gentleman/Marine was a privilege and an honor.

THE OLD WOMAN

by Talis Kaminskis
CAC-O

She was old and wrinkled. It was easy to see all her features. Her body lay motionless in the grass just a few feet from the hooch she called her home. Only a few nights earlier a meal had been shared there between her and her family and a few Marines who shared the village with her son. The world had seemed such a safe place. A haven far from the violence of war that surrounded the country. The laughter and gaiety of the meal had caused all to forget why they were able to come together. Now the reality was harshly reincarnated. The sound of weapons had echoed from morning till now, and none had really paid attention to their destruction. In the world around it was rather common place, and for those who had lived with it for an extended period of time, taken for granted. But now, now it wasn't just another nameless casualty. It wasn't a warrior whose job it was to kill and/or die. It wasn't one whose death could be expected in such a place. It was a little old lady. Body aged beyond actual years. Wrinkles a roadmap to the life she had led. The stillness of death betraying the vibrancy she had so recently shown. Had raised a family in a world which had known little peace for generations. Taken pride in a granddaughter to whom she was passing on her ways. Welcomed the young strangers who came to help fight a war she had little patience for. But drawn into by the son who was a village Sergeant. She had chastised their mistakes and laughed at their awkwardness. Had served them food from her kitchen and waited for grimaces as they tasted it for the first time. But she never gave up. They were always welcome to visit. To leave the war behind. To have brief moments where they could escape and find such brief sanctuary. Now it was all gone. An "errant" shell from a friendly gun. A sudden blast. Caught out in the open, away from her bunker. It was all over. A life had been snuffed out. No marks betrayed the cause of her death, but that was of little consequence. The finality of death was all the proof that was needed. The body now being cradled in the arms of a mourning son was just as still. Marked or no-marked. Rocked to and fro in a futile attempt at restoring life, the permanence was non-removable. The Marines witnessing the scene turned away. Some did not know how to handle it. Others were afraid of how they would. None wanted to share the moment with the others. The unexpectedness of the war's latest victim had brought them all closer to a reality they did not wish to confront. The death of warriors was expected. The death of unknown civilians could be tolerated. But the death of one who had shown them kindness and a touch of home was not what was supposed to occur. In spite of all they had already experienced, because of their youthful years, they still had retained a hold on a bit of naiveness. That had been cruelly shattered by the personal touch the violence of war had inflicted on them. No, they weren't men because of it. But just young bodies, that much more tired. That much more aware of it. Knowing that as they stepped away from the scene, they were still part of it, and always would be.

THE MAD MOMENT

Manuel Babbitt
A.T's

Comrades, do you remember what we did with the old ammo? I remember a tree—or just the hint of one. The ONTOS, crosshairs in place, sighted in, one shell in the 50 cal. spotting rifle. One on each top gun 106 shell in each of the six guns waiting for the command. I know to the Grunts it was a sweet sound and often shook the ground when we fired a salvo; "all six at once", nothing alive should survive! Somehow, that tree-stump was not laid waste. Oh—it was dead alright, probably the Agent Orange found its mark. All the plant life around it was dried out. I cannot believe the NVA walked away unharmed—though many died there. I was left with much despair, I found it hard to breath the air. Red dust was everywhere, under my nails, in my pockets and in my close cropped hair. In my skin, I do believe I tasted it in my tears. It was caked in my boots, my cammies were soiled as well, but we all knew water was scarce in hell. It must have tasted like seasoning to the rats we shared our living space with. Some of us settled for sea rats. (one can each) for many days. I filled up on rice cakes I traded the scouts. Once a week I'd visit their camp just to make eye-contact; they were just as close-mouthed as I, but we had a common goal, to survive. They liked the hard peanut butter and cigarette samples. I was happy to see a smile; it was probably the only gesture that kept me sane. But in Vietnam it is wise to fear nature; it is wise never to forget they are home with unwanted guests.

THE COWARD OF KHE SANH

The coward of Khe Sanh - each day you see him rise.
He runs outside to take a pee then gives the high sign and runs inside.

The coward of Khe Sanh doesn't walk, doesn't run.
He's doing a shuffle, bent forward a bit at the hips.
At the sound of the mortars, rockets or arty he becomes the fastest man alive!

The coward of Khe Sanh works on the strip.
He hauls ammo from the dump to the pits.
He loads the rounds into the tubes.
He also wants to kill an NVA or two.

The coward of Khe Sanh sometimes leaves a trail - a trail of shit paper flying behind.
Some asshole yelled "incoming!"

The coward of Khe Sanh, see him run.
One hand on his head, one on his gun!
His weapon is for fighting - his gun is for fun...

The coward of Khe Sanh.
Nowhere can he run; nowhere can he hide.
So each day and each night he stands on the firing line.

The coward of Khe Sanh, he looks at you, from out of my eyes.

ON THE OUTSIDE LOOKING IN

by Joseph M Belardo
1st/44th—"C" BTRY

It seemed as a young man I had a special bond with nature. I would spend hours exploring her, hiking her and enjoying her. She taught me to be patient, and my eyes and mind could and would be filled with her wonderment. On the outside, I could look in and see her like the song, beautiful and spacious skies, amber waves of grain, majestic mountains. I knew she had spread her grace on me. I began to give my attention to others by watching their eyes. Their eyes would tell all emotions. I learned through eye contact happiness, sadness, confusion, romance and love. I experienced from the touch of the hand, the hug, that eye contact is what I thought a real man should be about.

Uncle Sam cast his eyes upon me and gave me the look of one of America's best. The new look fit me like a glove. I enjoyed the hairy eyes the drill instructors could give. The staredown the officers would try to show. I would return any look required. I knew sustained eye contact would give them away.

Like most GIs of my era, I was sent to the land of the dragon. My eyes could not believe her beauty. It was a feast for eye and mind. God didn't make this land for killing or dying, man did. Uncle Sam sent me north to the Zee. My eyes became filled with confusion. This army dog was now attached to the Halls of Montezuma.

I took on another new look. Squad Leader on a M42 Duster, a twin 40mm Ack-Ack gun. It was our job to give the North Vietnamese Army the look of death. Something my eyes and mind had never seen or experienced. The Duster separated men from man. There was no room to duck, no place to hide, nowhere to run. It was straightforward, face to face, eye to eye dueling. Very little guessing of who was killing whom. While the Marines blazed I could see from my open turret the Marines I supported. My eyes would agonize the feelings of others. Marines running, jumping, yelling, shouting, killing, screaming, wounded and dying. Arms meant for hugging lovers were now holding friends, wounded or dying.

All eyes now filled with horror, sorrow, fear, hate and pain. Eyes screaming at each other for help; eyes looking for targets hiding in the shadows; eyes unbelieving; eyes fixed in stares, glazed by their final journey to their God. I began to wonder why my God allowed me to see these atrocities of life. The squeeze of the trigger was easy, but the eyes of the suffering and dead were forever—regardless of who was on who's side.

I came home a broken warrior. Eyes and mind spent from too many firefights, too much incoming. Eyes being witness to the dark side of life. My Uncle Sam had completed my training, eyes do tell all.

My eyes now walk this earth, half filled with tears—hoping never again to be "on the outside looking in".

PAY BACK

by Robert Shippen
S.F. CCN FOB-3

I left the war in December '68 after 12 months in-country as a medic with the Army Special Forces. I went on with my life. For 25 years, Viet Nam continued to surface, usually when I least expected it. Smells, sounds, rain, low clouds, red clay, news accounts of trouble in other parts of the world, often reminded me of Viet Nam. Viet Nam has been like an old acquaintance who drops in to visit at awkward times, uninvited, not welcome. I may have left the war but Viet Nam hasn't left me.

I decided to confront Viet Nam directly. In October of '92 another veteran and I loaded two suitcases with donated medical supplies and returned by commercial airliner. This time we were armed with goodwill, medicines and a list of three medical facilities where we'd deliver equipment. Vung Tau has a clinic built by returning Viet Vets under the direction of Garberville, California Veterans Vietnam Restoration Project. Le Ly Hayslip's East Meets West Foundation has a clinic near Marble Mountain outside of Da Nang. The Medical Director of the regional hospital in Hue City had a need for supplies. These were our destinations to provide "humanitarian" assistance.

Approaching Tan Son Nhut aboard Air Vietnam on a flight from Manila, I felt palpable fear. Our country didn't have relations with the Communist Vietnamese. Would they arrest me? I imagined being shot down by a SAM or a U.S. F-4. Paranoia maybe, but the too-familiar anticipation of my pending death was very real. We landed safely and passed through customs with brusque indifference by young men and women wearing NVA uniforms. No guns visible anywhere. A returning Vietnamese aboard our flight befriended us with a ride to downtown Saigon/Ho Chi Minh City where we got a room at Hotel Saigon.

Dining in elegant restaurants, watching folk dances and ethnic musical performances at Maxim's and the Caravel helped us relax and recover from jet lag and ever-present anxiety. We visited museums and made friends with cyclo drivers, most of whom were former ARVN soldiers. We hired a car and took a day trip to nearby Vung Tau. Here we delivered medicines to the Friendship Clinic built in 1988 by the Garberville, California Veterans Vietnam Restoration Project.

When we left Saigon, we traveled north. My friend wanted to visit the waterfronts at Da Nang, Quang Tri and Dong Ha. He wanted a boat ride on the Cua Viet River where he'd operated small river boats. I wanted to visit Da Nang, Marble Mountain, Phu Bai and Khe Sanh. We booked a five day tour to these places through Vietnam Tourism in Ho Chi Minh City and flew to Da Nang. We were met at the airport by a courteous interpreter and driver with a late model Toyota Sedan. We stayed in first class hotel rooms and ate good food. Bottled water was provided. After delivering supplies to Le Ly Hayslip's clinic at China Beach, we toured Marble Mountain.

During the war, Marble Mountain was used as a field hospital for Viet Cong and NVA casualties. It was in the cavern where enemy patients had been treated that I met a group of about 20 high school students on a class outing. When they realized I was an American veteran I was asked to join them. They sang folk and love songs, shared their refreshments and practised pretty good English with me. I felt as if I was being welcomed home by Vietnamese the same age as soldiers I'd fought and killed not more than 500 meters from this mountain 25 years earlier. It was a homecoming more sincere and warm than any I've received in the USA. It was very emotional. After Marble Mountain I was no longer afraid in Viet Nam.

We drove up and over the Hai Van Pass, stopping at will to explore Japanese, French and American bunkers. We burned incense at a small VC cemetery along Highway 1 just south of Phu Bai. While in Hue, we visited the Citadel, rode a boat on the Perfume River and toured tombs and temples. At Dong Ha we rented a sampan for a trip along the Cua Viet. We then drove to Cam Lo and turned onto Highway 9. We drove past the turnoff for Con Thien and stopped at The Rockpile. We visited a Bru Montagnard village and performed an impromptu Med Cap on a young buffalo girl with severe malaria. We drove across new bridges and stopped to look at the ruins of the old ones destroyed during the war. Bomb craters became evident as we approached the plateau where we'd find Khe Sanh Village. We turned onto the access road leading to the Khe Sanh Combat Base. We were there. From this point on I was the guide as none of the Vietnamese had been there before.

The clay is still red. Low clouds and mist still send a chill along your spine and blanket Co Roc mountain in the distance. Hills 950 and 1015 stand as permanent sentinels over the plateau. The runway is now marked by a monument erected by the government honoring their sacrifices during the war. Many of our trenches have been excavated by people digging for scrap metal to sell. I was able to find my old position along the south and western perimeter of FOB #3. Memories from 1968 returned as if the decades had passed in the span of only a week. I gave private and reverent respects for those, friend and foe, who died or were wounded at Khe Sanh.

I felt depressed and didn't stay long in this place that to me continues to reek of loss, pain, death and war. It is still a very heavy place. Depressing, painful and real. I had confronted Viet Nam head on. Healing from war is a lifelong process. I know that my memories won't go away, nor should they. I need them to help with my future. Returning to Viet Nam helped me put my experiences there into context with the present. My memories of the war now are more in the context of where I've wanted them to be all along, the distant past. As Vietnamese continually say, "The war ended long ago."

Khe Sanh is still a dangerous place. An unexploded artillery round lay near a hole on the runway, wisely abandoned by whomever dug the hole. Several times a year people or livestock are injured or killed by exploding ordinance. I brought home souvenirs: a handful of spent rounds that littered the old access road, a USMC brass insignia excavated by a metal collector as I stood nearby and a handkerchief filled with dirt from my old position. I also left Khe Sanh with the intention of returning at least once more. My healing had just begun.

I went back in April of 1993 with a small group of American veterans. We went as Team Seven of the Veterans Vietnam Restoration Project to build a health clinic in Cu Chi. We consisted of a Navy vet, a Marine vet, a Red Cross entertainment worker and myself. After two weeks of daily labor building the clinic, side by side with former VC, we toured the country for another two weeks. All of us visited sites where we'd served during the war. We traveled from Cu Chi to the Delta, stayed in My Tho and rode a boat along the Mekong River. One of our group had served several tours as a Navy gunboat pilot in that area. We traveled north along Highway 1 overnighting in My Tho, Saigon, Vung Tau, Nha Trang, Quang Ngai, China Beach (2), Hue (2), Khe Sanh and Hanoi (3). The Marine had served at Con Thien, Khe Sanh and in the mountains along Hwy 9. Our route took us through the following places: Ham Tan, Phan Thiet, Phan Rang, Nha Trang, Tuy Hoa, Quy Nhon, Quang Ngai, My Lai, Tam Ky, Da Nang, China (My Khe) Beach, Hue, Quang Tri, Dong Ha, Con Thien, Mai Loc, Hwy 9 to The Rockpile, Ca Luu and Khe Sanh. We then took the train north to Hanoi where we visited museums and did the general tourist thing. Each of us had a personally healing experience on this journey. We provided one another with support.

This latest trip was booked through CCB Tours with headquarters in HCM City. This company is operated by the Cu Chinh Binh (CCB) or Vietnamese Veterans Association, their equivalent of all our veterans service organizations combined. CCB Tours specialize in taking groups of American veterans to visit former battlefields. If asked, they will arrange personal meetings with veterans who fought against us in specific fights. We met and worked with quite a few men and women whom we'd fought during the war. It was an enlightening and healing experience. We went to their homes, met their families and played with their grandchildren. They are aging veterans living simple lives, trying to get by peacefully. All of their eyes have "The Look" that comes from seeing too much. Some told me that meeting American veterans after more than 20 years has helped heal their psychological wounds. I highly recommend CCB Tours for making in-country travel arrangements, especially for larger groups or film crews.

It was through CCB Tours during our overnight at Khe Sanh Village that I met the Chairman of Huong Hoa (Khe Sanh) District, a member of the Bru Van Khieu ethnic minority. I received a formal invitation to bring teams of American veterans to work with the Bru, providing needed assistance in areas of medicine, agriculture and education. I'm currently trying to raise funds and other resources with which to actualize this venture. I'll keep you and the Khe Sanh Veterans Association apprised of progress in this project.

"In an April 25 letter to his parents, 21 year old Mountville Marine, Mitchell White wrote: 'Do you realize I only have a little over 11 months left over here?'

Young White was a private first class in the Marine Corps and had been in Vietnam nearly a month when he wrote that letter. Six days later, the young private was reported killed in action in the vicinity of Quang Tri, Republic of Vietnam.

He was the son of Mr & Mrs Thomas White of Mountville Road.

The Marine continued, 'The time is passing pretty fast. I wish it could go faster. My rotation date is April 9, 1969.'

In the third paragraph of his last letter, Mitchell asked about Dixie, a quarter horse who is somewhat wild. Dixie was given to Mitchell a year ago by a neighbor, Frank Lewis. The horse had been halter broken by the youth but that was as far as the training got. He told his family, 'If y'all have too much trouble with Dixie and can't get close enough to train her, talk to Dail and see what he can do. I'd hate for somebody to get hurt trying to train her. If I was there, I think I could handle her alright.'

Now Mitchell will never get home to handle Dixie and the horse will probably continue to roam the pastures. Mr White said the horse only comes down near the family about once a month.

The boy, a 1967 graduate of LaGrange High School was the only son of Mr & Mrs White. He had three sisters; Charlotte, an eighth grader at Hill St. Junior High; Susan, a LaGrange High senior and Gloria, who is married and lives at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

Mitchell was a boy who loved the outdoors. He joined the Marine Corps 'to get it over with' and said in his last letter he was thinking of buying some land in Mountville when he got out of the service. He wrote, 'There's not much happening over here now. Anyway, we haven't been doing anything. I like it like that. All we do is go on working parties and so forth'

The Marine was killed when he 'sustained shrapnel wounds of the body from hostile mortar fire while on an operation', according to General Leonard F Chapman Jr., Commandant.The family learned of the death of their only son yesterday afternoon. A Marine Officer from Atlanta, accompanied by the Rev. Buddy York of the LaGrange Dunson Baptist Church, told the family of the tragedy.

The Whites' were members of the LaGrange church but have been attending the church in Mountville since they moved to that community. Mrs White is a senior at LaGrange College and is working in the laboratory at City-County Hospital. The soldier's father is a long time employee of Dunson Mills here.

The family has not yet completed arrangements to have the body sent home."

COUNTRY BOYS

I come straight to Vietnam from Schools battalion. A C-130 put me down in Dong Ha around Feb 26, 1968. We wuz in some stagin' tent when a sergeant come in to give us our orders for where we were goin'. "Yates," he says when he calls my name, "Whiskey One Thirteen."

"Where'bout's that?" I asked him.

"Khe Sanh," he says.

I says, "I better write me a letter home tonight, this might be my last one."laughs. That night at Dong Ha we took incomin'. It wuz my first time bein' fired on. Sounded like a freight train comin' down the line.

I finally got me a chopper ride to Khe Sanh. I jumped out the chopper, left my seabag lay and headed for cover. We wuz takin' incomin', Charlie was hittin' us good. Finally, things settled down to where I could find Whiskey Battery. The gunney showed me where two rounds had just hit inside the battery area. That first night I wuz there, there's supposed to be an NVA assault. They wuz passin' out grenades. I had me my M-14 issued at Dong Ha. He assigned me a position just outside the FDC since I was a new guy and didn't know what I wuz doin' yet. I wuz real scared man! We fired all night from our battery and the next day we got word from the base commander that we'd gotten 71 kills from our battery.

I remember them parachutin' in the supplies. Stuff shook the ground when it landed. You could hear Charlie firin' up at the planes with automatic weapons.

I got ordered up to 861 that had been hit and partly overrun. We had two guns up there. I got up there March 6. You could see Khe Sanh real well from up there. That's the first time I got to fan fire my M-14 wuz up there. We'd shoot out over the wire. We wuz gettin' hit steady by mortars. Some of the guys who got medevaced left their M-16s, so's I took me one of those. One day I wuz on a work party buryin' com cables when Charlie dropped in a coupla rounds on us. It really messed up some of the guys. Next day, some of the grunts wuz outside the wire choppin' down the elephant grass so's we could see 'em before they could get up close. One of the guys hit a booby trapped grenade. The guy laid down there on the LZ for quite awhile waitin' for a chopper. He died 'fore the chopper could get him out. So, after he wuz dead, they didn't need the medevac. He laid out there on the LZ for over four days in the hot sun. He wuz in one of them big plastic bags. I'd have to walk guard every other night and had to walk by him. Made me remember to when I first got in-country. I wuzn't in Da Nang two hours 'fore they assigned me to a work party unloadin' bodies. That shook me up. Anyway, you could smell this guy's body clear up on top the hill. He wuz married and had a little girl who wuz five months old at the time.

We wuz bein' given two C rats and two canteens a water a day back then. Finally got to come off that hill April 28 and went down to Khe Sanh. Got to take a shower for the first time since I arrived at Khe Sanh. Felt real good! We wuz jokin' 'bout who we wuz goin' to get to go off with that night. Where we wuz goin' to eat. Go to a show, or somethin'.

From Khe Sanh we went to Ca Lu. Stayed there 'bout two weeks. There wuz a creek to wash in down there—that wuz nice. Then we went to Camp Carroll. It wuz at Camp Carroll that I got the news 'bout Mitch. We finally had a lot of our old mail come in. I see the letter from home with the old post mark. The clippin' fell out. I see Mitch's pitcher. I says, 'I wonder what Mitch done to get his pitcher in the paper...' And then...uh...I looked and saw the headlines and...uh. It wuzn't until after I got to Quang Tri that I found out what happened to Mitchell. He wuz my best friend and uh...well...he did all he could do, I guess.

They had hot showers at Quang Tri. I got me some pitchers from back home while there. We got hungry for some home food. One the men snuck into the ville, killed a chicken, brought it back and we cooked it. See, we do have some good times over here! You people think it's all just war. Most times we try to have good times. When we left Quang Tri we went to Da Nang. They had runnin' water in the bathrooms. Flush toilets and all that. I figured I'd flush them a few times for the guys that didn't have any.

Went out to Hill 85 the next day. 'Fore I left Georgia, I used to read 'bout all this stuff in the papers. Now I'm over here and it's real. I'm glad to be over here, do my part, but...uh...I'll be glad to go home. Get outtah this place.

(ED: suddenly, his voice changes in tone and intensity)

Roger...Roger. Stand by. Son-of-a-bitch! Deflection...zero...one...eight-five.

(ED: another voice goes)

Stand-by...Fire!

(ED: now I'm really confused, until a much older, more gravelly voice of the one I'd been listening to comes on. The tape is now much clearer).

Well...Lieutenant Ernie Spencer, this is William Robert Yates. Bob Yates. They called me Willie Roe for short when I wuz in the Marine Corps. That wuz a tape that wuz made September 2nd, 1968, at Cau Doi. Today is December 31st, 1992, in Franklin, Georgia. I thought I wuz gonna get all that fire mission on the tape but it ran out. I enclosed the old newspaper article and pitcher of my best friend, Mitchell White. It's a copy of the one fell out when I wuz at Camp Carroll. He wuz at Cua Viet, Camp Big John when he got killed. He wuz with weapons platoon 2/4. I thought he wuz a hero. It really shocked me when that pitcher fell out. He wuz such a good fella. Well...talkin' 'bout Vietnam, one thing I remember most when I was on Hill 861 wuz the rats. They wuz huge! In a bunker that another fella and I shared, I guess 'bout 8 by 5 feet, them rats be crawlin' all over you when you'd sleep. Scared to knock 'em off or they'd bite you.

And...burnin' shitters. I remember burnin' 'em, the winds blowin' North, I stand to the South side. Then it'd turn around and the wind would blow south. Didn' matter where you wuz, that wind wuz gonna blow that smoke on you! And...the piss tubes. They were pissin' in piss tubes. They'd be so full that it come out the top! You know, not many people know what I'm talkin' 'bout. Some do...not many.

I remember one night they had a patrol on the ridge next to us on 861. We had an infrared scope and we wuz watchin' 'em when they started gettin' hit. They got hit pretty bad. Medivacs...a few KIAs. One fella I remember particularly. I helped hold him. The corpsmen cut his throat, put the bottom half of an ink pen in his throat and taped it up. I dunno if he lived or died. But, I think 'bout that sometimes. The other time...a chopper come up to drop us off some supplies. It wuz goin' back down...then it went down between us and Khe Sanh. It wuz too far away for us to do any good and I guess too far away from the people at Khe Sanh. We could see 'em. We could see the people. We could see the NVA come outtah the bush, firin' at 'em. And Billy Moffet got on the 50 caliber machine gun and started firin' on the enemy for 'em. Reason I remember that so well 'cos I grabbed hold the barrel and got blisters on both my hands. Dumb boot! Eventually a chopper come got some of the survivors off the downed chopper. Another time I wuz on patrol, a water patrol. We went down between 861A, a little ridge next to us. We each had two 5 gallon cans. There wuz a small LZ over there. It was hot. Chopper come in and dropped off a pallet and left. Some of us went up there to see what it wuz. It wuz full a ice-cream—vanilla ice-cream! It wuz marked to go to a ship. I gathered up all the ice-cream I could hold and went back over to 861. I passed it out as fast as I could 'cos it wuz meltin'.

I had a lotta friends when I wuz at Khe Sanh. I'd like to see 'em. Maybe we can all get together at Washington D.C. Talkin' with you Ernie and all I told you, I don't write well. You asked for the tape, so I sent you this one, and...I got outtah the Marine Corps 'bout the year 1969. And, uh...July, went to go and try to get back in. But at that time

CHRISTMAS

'Twas a Christmas Eve on the Laotian border, twenty-five winters ago.
The air was heavy with fog; a fine mist was blowing, and the silence was so heavy it could be sliced with a blade.

The young sentry was ending his watch.
All was well on the perimeter in front of his position.
Relieved of his post, he retired to his bunker for a meal of ham and lima beans, hot chocolate and two camels - unfiltered.

Solitary, in the candlelight he was visited by loneliness, a haunting longing for home.
On this of all nights, why the hell was he here.
He should be in front of the tree with eggnog, with parents and sister, with sweetheart.

He knew there was a service at the other end of the line.
Christian, nondenominational, to celebrate the birth of a God.
He wasn't religious; gave it up years ago.
It wasn't reasonable; it was only mythology.

Being alone was ushering in melancholy, that would never do.
Out into the damp he climbed, bundled in field jacket and poncho.
A voice in the night asks, "Who's there?"
"It's Jones."
"What's the password?"
"Gunrunner."
"Pass on."

This repeated for two miles until arrival at the end of the line.
To the tent on the top of the hill.
To the nondenominational service.
The Chaplains were men Jones had learned to detest because of sermons on warriors dying for a blessed cause.

This one was young.
A Protestant type with a boyish face and naive attitude.
In the stillness of night the sermon was exhorted about the birth of the Christ child and how he died for man's sins.

The communion was started.
Men got in line for a taste of the flesh and a sip of the blood.
Not a sound could be heard along the trenches at the time.
The Chaplain led the men in a hymn for the season;
about the soldiers and sailors who had died for the cause in wars of the past and the wars of the present.
A crescendo of voices, some out of tune, emanating from rapt faces, ascended to the top of the tent.

they didn't need me. The recruiter told me they had more men than at anytime in Marine Corps history, but I always think it wuz 'cos on Feb 23 I wuz in Headquarters battery 1/13 gettin' ready to come home. My RTD wuz comin' up when they hit us. I got shrapnel in the side of my face. Then I got shot in the hip. Took pretty close to 200 stitches. Tore the muscles loose in my leg. I'll always believe that's the reason they wouldn't let me come back in...

I dunno, but uh, since I got out...I don't like to be around people. I get around people or a crowd and I feel like I don't fit in a lotta times. Strange to me, everybody you seem to talk to, well most times, some a them people like to say they's at Khe Sanh. They get to tellin' their stories—and you know they weren't there. You hear these kinds a people...that's why, you know...that's why I'm a loner. That's one reason I started drivin' a truck, just to be by myself and uh...course, I enjoy it. Nobody bothers me. Huhhhhhhh (long long sigh). Certain days a year it really bothers me...like February 23rd and durin' February, March, April on 861 and Khe Sanh, and we got overrun August 17th out at Cau Doi. Took heavy casualties. Wuz lucky then I didn' get a scratch put on me until I wuz gettin' ready to come home. I can be somewhere...I hear a song, it flows me back. I wanna stop. I can jus' smell it. You know? Vietnam. They play a song, Papa Topa Gen, or Harper Valley PTA or Jack Flash or...I dunno, there's so many of 'em. Puts me right back. I can almost feel like I'm there again. I didn' get married until I wuz 34 years old. And ah...it's been hard on my wife, but uh...sometimes I just like to go up in the woods by myself. Eat some cold pork beans. Sometimes I go up to the trash dump and sit Out there in the dark on the Laotian border, the enemy was moving, and Charley had been spotted.

A Listening Post hidden out in the fog called for mortars to be dropped on the enemy patrol.

While the congregation sang and exulted in the Christ child, the mortar battery outside the church tent starting firing rounds out into the nigh47t, and after the thunk of the firing, they whistled into the heavy black sky.

As Jones' skin was crawling, he heard the thunk and the whistle accompany the hymn as it was sung with fervor.
And he thought to himself sadly,
'No wonder I am lonely' because existence means nothing if the Christ child shoots mortars.

and ...uh...just smell it stinkin'. I dunno...maybe you know what I'm talkin' 'bout.

But nothing's done me any more good than findin' out 'bout this Khe Sanh Veterans. It's really been a big help to me. Run up some hellatious phone bills sometimes callin' people. I wish I could go back sometimes. I wish I could turn back the hands of time and I could do things different than what I did it, but I can't.

I just wanna tell you thank you for everythin' you're doin' for me and the rest of us. I hope I haven't bored you too much. So I'm gonna say, Happy New Year. Semper Fi and I'll be in touch.

ED: Brother Yates sent me this tape some time ago. After listening to it the first time, I set it aside to save for a special occasion. I cannot think of a more fitting way for me to go out than with this piece. I could never have imagined that forty years ago, as I dove in the crystal clear waters and roamed the rain forests of old Hawaii, that someday another country boy like myself from the other side of our country would share his soul with me like this. I say to you my Brothers and Sisters that Brother Yates and his kind are the true John Waynes' of Khe Sanh —we don't need Hollywood images.

American Spirit is the work of the only woman U.S. Marine Combat Artist allowed in Vietnam during the conflict — Trella Chris Koczwara, Professor of Art, Tennessee Technological University.. Her works from that era still carry with them the taste, the feel, almost the sounds of what went on there ... death ... life ... families torn apart ... their's and our's. Fixed forever in the mind, says Koczwara, even after all these years, are the sights and smells and emotions associated with each piece of art from that period. And the faces, she remembers the faces of all those with whom she came into contact, all those so young trying to stay alive in a world working against them at every step. She has since returned to Vietnam, but that's another story.

U.S. Marine Combat Artist Trella Koczwara visited President George Bush while she was in Baledogle, Somalia, Africa during January 1993 as part of Operation Restore Hope.

Bernice "Gunny" Penn discusses with Trella Koczwara (left) one of the many paintings on display at a showing of Koczwara's work. Stretching from Vietnam to the present, the show was held at the historic Parthenon in Nashville, Tenn., from July to August 1994.

The New Guy ...

Since I was appointed editor of the Khe Sanh Veteran earlier this year, I've been learning a great deal about what has gone on before my tour of duty began. As far as the magazine is concerned, we have a great deal for which to thank Rev. Ray Stubbe, Ernie "Preacher" Husted and Ernie Spencer. As I became the focal point for many of the letters, poems, photos, and phone calls, a tremendous appreciation grew for what Ray, Preacher and Spencer went through to pull this publication together.

For those of you who have been around a while, you know that it began as a newsletter of just 15 names and addresses, then grew to 100. Preacher volunteered to take it over from Ray and kept it going until he was activated for Operation Desert Storm. Then Ernie Spencer volunteered, developing it into a full-fledged magazine. I understand it was Spencer who introduced black and white photos to the magazine.

For reasons that are quite understandable, Ray Stubbe continues to be the contact point for many of you. That's okay, because Ray forwards your letters on to me so they can be shared with the rest of our brothers. You should know, too, that when you write directly to me, I also send Ray copies of your letters.

You'll find in this issue a message from Ray which discusses his desire to begin to "draw back" from being the focal point of the organization. As you read, you'll see he has his reasons. But don't panic. He'll never get completely away from us. During the annual reunion in Denver, 20 July 1991, Reverend Ray W. Stubbe, founder of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., was designated President Emeritus for Life. So, you see, we own him for life. But read what he has to say. I think you'll understand.

Now, I also need to offer an apology to all those who wrote to me as editor and never received an answer back. I wasn't ignoring you. But getting this issue out has been a little more hectic than I expect it to be in the future. By all means, keep your letters coming. Each one of you has a different perspective on the Khe Sanh experience. Each letter adds a little more wholeness to the shattered images we brought back, each one is an opportunity to help someone else see that another human being understands.

As you read through the letters, you will see we are all at so many different stations of life, dealing with life in as many different ways as it has dealt with us. For anyone out there who thinks they are the only one, that no one else will understand, we have among us others who mirror you. They have felt what you feel, have waded through the mires of disappointments, triggered the landmines of memories and flashbacks, have wondered why just as often. The survivors of Khe Sanh cut across several generations, across race, religion, politics, all the artificial designations. We are executives and artists, homeless and homebodies, time bombs and men of the cloth. We are the men of Khe Sanh, a chapter closed in time. There will be no more like us, no more when we are gone. But so long as we are still here, we know what you did, and we know who you are. Talk to us. — Ed Evans, editor

The Covington Reunion

Following the reunion dinner, Ernie Husted, Jr. (right), known to many through his efforts on behalf of the Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter, is presented with a plaque by President Ken Penn, expressing the organization's appreciation for his continuing support and past dedication. For many members, the newsletter as edited by Ernie became the touchstone that melted time and space and allowed them to come home at last. Before the reunion dinner in Covington, Ky., Ernie shared a slide presentation concerning the actual siege of Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Scenes From The Covington Reunion

Richard Collier provided wild memory trips with those long-ago sounds from his CD collection, shown behind him.

Ken Resnick says he can prove he was trained -- he never leaves home without it.

You never know who's still around after all these years, as the men of Whiskey/1/13 found out.

A scouting party of mixed members located a nearby German restaurant just right for chow time.

One of the great aspects of the Khe Sanh Veterans reunions has been that the vets don't come alone. They often bring their wives and significant others in order to share the reuniting experience.

The Gate Before The Wall

by Terry Lee Crosby, Sr.

Nineteen sixty seven and nineteen sixty eight, such a long time ago but I'm still standing at "The Gate."

I missed high school, football and being a kid and now I'm trying to live with what I did!

It was for God and country and freedom we went
But little did we know it was just lives that were "spent" for nothing, nothing absolutely nothing at all, but went "because of the call."

And it wasn't like the movies, no heroes or John Waynes, just lots of sleepless nights and much, much pain.

And with your buddies you learned not to get too tight because in the morning you'd find they were lost in the night, so you walked and walked lookin' for "the Cong"
and occasionally stopped to hit the bong.

And you did your job and did it well!!
Knowing if you didn't Vietnam would be your Heaven or Hell.
Hour's turned to days and daze to endless space, then came the day you'd leave "that place!"

Back to America, "the land of the free," but little did we know how things would be, signs and bottles were thrown in your face, no, no hero just confusion and disgrace?

The people, the mood, the songs were quite clear,
Vietnam Veteran, no-no, we don't want to hear.
So you close "The Gate" and keep it to yourself ...
hoping tomorrow it will be on the shelf.

But tomorrow comes and to your dismay ...
Vietnam is still with you
DAY AFTER DAY AFTER DAY!!!

So you go through life doing your thing but all the while you still "feel the sting" ...
Then many-MANY years later, "out of the blue"
America says "hey, we're proud of you"?

So you try to regroup and hold your head high ... but it's too late — TOO LATE, the dreams, the shame, all you can do is hang your head and cry and pray to God, why ... Why??

The only monuments to the war are the dead, the maimed, the despairing and the forlorn.

"Ask not what your Country can do for you, ask what you can do for your country"????

Surviving, coming back, that's the real hell!

Terry added that he wrote this "the night I first saw The Wall in Washington, D.C."

The Past Makes Me Gasp

by Terry Lee Crosby, Sr.

When I was in Vietnam
I TRULY believed my actions without a doubt were right and I swore to my God
I would pursue my convictions with "all" of my might!

BUT slowly reality crept in regardless how hard we kept trying all we were was PAWNS in a GAME — just men dying!

Even so "we" never gave up we took it to the "bitter" end
BUT all it created was a void a hole
you can NEVER mend!

During my second tour the void "engulfed" me a very RUTHLESS ... space for the horrid things I did
I'd convinced myself not to feel disgrace?

It seemed the less time
I had left — the shorter the days the fog got thicker a "blinding" haze

It gave me permission to do things that felt uneasy in my ... soul somewhere during the "body counts"
I lost grasp of my initial goal

I know now — but didn't then it was a HERO I wanted to be but the haunting wants of the past has only brought me to my "knees"!

Now what is needed is a place to be alone to cry to let the pain out a private place a needed place just a place where I can
"SHOUT"!

You Are

"NOT"

Forgotten

by Terry Lee Crosby, Sr.

There are STILL many corpses and MIAs, my brothers in Vietnam waiting — like dormant temporarily voided seeds not sprouting not sprouting in the souls of the "WONDERING" bewildered and
"WAILING" wives and mothers and fathers daughters and sons dormant souls — anticipating minds
"WAITING" for the government who are feverously shining brass on a sinking ship
a ship that is in debt WAITING for them to get off their ASS and end it end the WONDERING end the WAILING end the pain!

Recounts Trip Back

Here are some attempts to remember my trip back in Jan92. If these are not usable, it's fine. I also have written about 1968 and want to write more. I'll send more if you want them.

Bible Rash or Victory in Vietnam

by Kent Wonders

The week I got home from Vietnam, my Dad said, "I have a book you might like. It's Victory in Vietnam." I thought, "oh sure, victory in Europe maybe (my Dad had done that) but no way in Vietnam!" The book was a missionary story which really got my attention when I began looking at the pictures. Some of the pictures were of the leprosarium south of Da Nang where just days before I had spent my last days in Vietnam. The book shocked me. How could I have been so cold to the thousands of Christians struggling in the storm of war that we went through? The seed, knowing that there were Christians in Vietnam, isolated and suffering, was planted in my heart.

While the years of suppressing the memories of Vietnam went by, my wife and family developed a deep love for Christian missionaries around the world and were able to travel to visit and help many. Gradually I started to remember and read books about Vietnam. The missionary stories touched me the most. One book I read and reread was (edited out). The (edited out) worked for years living in the Khe Sanh area of Vietnam, translating the Bible into the (edited out) language, where I spent the most tense part of my life.

A few years ago at a family reunion, an aunt came up to me and asked, "Do you think about Vietnam?" Of course! "Do you ever want to go back?" I had secretly dreamed about going back for years — if it could be more than just sightseeing. I wanted to do something useful for the people, especially for the Christians if I went back, not like the first trip, to break things and ..... She told me about a vet Marine in her church who had been back with a group of Christians. She sent me some speaking tapes of Roger Helle. That was the start of my January 1992 trip to Vietnam.

Bill, our group leader for a tour of I Corps, had called a meeting of 12 of us in his room. We needed to be united as a group and dependent on the Lord for the goals Bill had in mind for the team. I was amazed with some of the things he wanted to do — after all there were always two to four Vietnamese tour guides and officials watching us, except in rooms, and even the rooms were said to be bugged at times. Only the government recognized churches are allowed to function; outside of these, Christians are persecuted.

Bill's luggage was one of only several pieces that had not made it to Vietnam with us. In his luggage were (edited out) Bibles! We needed his bags. Finally they did arrive before we left and without being opened! We prayed. God delivered. And we were off.

Bill had planted a lot of seeds with the guides about how this group really had a lot of interest in tribal people, especially the (edited out) around (edited out), and that we really wanted to visit three or four villages where tours don't usually go. So on the appointed day the guides agreed to go to three or four villages.

The warning the night before the 14-hour day of bus riding (on a Russian-made bus with "I" beams for springs), was that the trip would be a "ride from hell" through mountain roads to the border of Laos. I would have rather walked like my first trip. The goods were spread out between us and the plan was talked over.

The (edited out) villages were neat considering the steep hills and the partial jungle that was still left. The houses were long elevated communal structures made out of logs and thatch mats. We took turns being interested in the officials while others just spread out and disappeared.

The pig pen under the house was surprisingly clean but interesting to me because the pot belly sow was allowing a small puppy to nurse. The intensity was almost like 24 years ago — stealth, yes — weapons, no — mission, Bibles. Do not leave them with people, we were told, because it might cause a commotion, but leave them where they will be found. I'm walking along this house wondering if anyone is inside.

These Bibles are getting old; two stuffed in my underwear, bouncing on the bus for hours, walking around. I'm wondering how long it takes to get Bible rash?

I peer in through a small crack, trying to get my eyes adjusted to the dark inside, when I realize two children are looking back at me and adult legs are right beside my nose. Grandma is looking out an opening above me. I step back and smile. She stares. I point to a log with notches. Grandpa comes to the door and with time and gesture, I think I'm invited in. Slowly trying to get up the log without losing my Bibles or balance, I enter what smells like the inside of the world's largest Weber smoker. They squat around the open earthen hearth, the area above the flames acts as the chimney. Wow! I'm really squatting beside people dressed in black wrap-around skirts, grinning at me with betal-nut grins ...

To this day my heart beats faster when I see the (edited out) baskets and heavy wood pedestal sitting in my home. My heart jumps with joy when I think about who discovered the Bible written in (edited out) above the door lentil. I'm sure God well matched those taught in (edited out) literacy to the Bibles. I choose to believe that for all survivors of war, God has His plan to reveal Himself, even to the (edited out).

The primitive subservient (edited out), without a written language, the Vietnamese, the mountain isolation, Wycliffe Bible translators, the Marines, the NVA, the (edited out), the apparently "blind" custom inspectors and guides, the burdened hearts of returning vets and more, all by accident! No, I don't think so.

On The Chin

by Kent Wonders

Our guide to Da Nang and north started our tour with some jokes and some "do's and don'ts." One of the "don'ts" was, in effect, "Do not cause a riot." He went on to describe a recent incident where some well-meaning Americans, no doubt vets, threw out large amounts of candy on a street corner. It caused big problems. He described it as a near riot.

When the time came to start north from Da Nang, my heart started pounding. Da Nang had been disappointing because so very little was recognizable, but surely the road north could not have changed too much. It had. The hills, mountains, and bays were just as I remembered but the towns and villages were not recognizable, even to someone who spent weeks walking Highway #1.

I wanted to stop and walk again, and finally we came to a halt in a long line of traffic backed up from a bridge building project. The guide said we could get out, but stay close and "no problems ... OK?"

As soon as I got to the bridge I knew right were I was. The 1968 bridge was gone but the old French tower was still there (I had slept in it the first night with the platoon). The village was now a town but I had to see and remember, so left the crowds waiting at the bridge. I headed along the north bank of the river. This is where we came to buy bread and firewood on those cold rainy monsoon days after all-night ambushes ...

I was so deep in thought that I didn't see the boy following me. Soon I realized he was holding his turtleneck shirt collar over his chin so I took notice. I went over to him and lowered his collar, over his protests, to see a new clean cut, exposing his chin bone for about three inches.

With the boy in tow we headed back to the bus to see if I could scrounge up any first aid stuff. No one had sutures (many of our group had brought medical supplies to give to clinics and hospitals), but several had band aids and antibiotic cream, so we started our little "Medcap." But the situation at the bridge had changed! Schools had let out and the market was closing for noon hour. The road and bridge were packed with people.

While working on the chin, with several vets passing supplies out the window of the bus, we hardly noticed the crowd gathering. Finally, I got the message when I realized I was now pressed against the bus and the guide was yelling for everyone to get in quickly. By the time the two would-be medics got in and the door closed behind us, there were several hundred people all around, not hostile, but curious. The only hostile persons were the driver and guide, probably more worried about their job security than over some cut chin.

Sleepless in Vietnam

by Kent Wonders

After 24 years, the sense of daily anticipation was all around, even at 5 a.m. I couldn't sleep so I left the hotel to listen and watch "Good Morning Vietnam."

I walked to a large market and watched as the merchants prepared their stalls for the day. Many recognized me from the day before and greeted me with happy chatter; most of it I didn't understand but I smiled back with a "good morning."

After leaving the market I went out into the drizzling rain and wandered until, on a narrow side street, I found an open door to a warehouse. The attendant ignored me while he laid on large bags of rice. Feeling melancholy, remembering the past and trying to relate it to the present, I stood there staring at the rain. Soon a little girl walked out of the sole house on the commercial block and just quietly stood beside me. After awhile, she walked back across the street.

The girl soon came back and quietly took my hand and led me across the street to her home. Inside the small main room were two wooden bed frames with a single thin mat for bedding and a small table with two stools. A mother with three more young children greeted me with a smile, pulled out a wooden stool, and put it in the middle of the room for me to sit on. The children all sat on the edge of a bed, legs dangling, eyes wide open staring at me. Not one word in any language was spoken. The woman went to the kitchen, a lean-to at the side of the house, and put on a pot of water. She soon poured me a cup of tea and sat down.

I sat there in deep thought, wondering where I was and what year it was. I remembered the French-speaking train station master not far from here 24 years ago. He was friendly, invited us in for tea several times, until I had some of the men thoroughly search his little station and found ammunition ... No, this lady invited the melancholy traveler in out of the cold rain for a hot cup of tea. The whole trip was like this lady's hospitality, sincerely meant.

Con Thien

by Kent Wonders

Visiting Con Thien was an emotional experience. The memories started to flood back as soon as I saw the gate for the market at Gio Linh. It looked the way it looked 24 years before, one of the few structures recognizable to me.

The road north to Con Thien reminded me of the many battles fought in this small sector by Marines from 1966 to 1969. Over and over we fought for the same ground; now it was all a tree farm, except for a few acres left to scrap metal diggers. The "Hill of Angels" is hardly distinguishable, but reminders are everywhere.

The guide warns when we leave the bus, "Stay on paths. Still mines ..." The hill looked freshly plowed in parts by people looking for metal. I looked closely and soon found many things I recognized, such as a combat boot, with only a quarter inch left above the sole, the stainless steel plate still intact. I wish the boot could talk to me. Where's the Marine? Where is his foot? How many years have you been here? I took it home and it's on my bookshelf. Pieces of dark green sandbags were everywhere. I think I see the trench line in the southwest area and where the battalion command bunker must have been in July 1968.

I would have left feeling empty except for one of the most moving times of the trip — four or five vets holding hands, praying for healing and the spiritual revival of Vietnam.

Sounds To Send Your Head Back When

Chris B. Smoak sent me an audio cassette program with a wild mix of 60's-70's music, RVN atmosphere and some sounds we'd all like to forget. Chris advises, "Wait for the right moment ... fix your favorite drink ... eat a bowl of rice ... and clear your mind to listen to this RVN-1 music program." He's done an interesting job, somewhat like a musical poem, but not a poem. He adds, "Caution, this audio program contains profanity at four different locations ... not suitable for young children."

His tape is the sole responsibility of, concept design of, full arrangement of, and recording, says Chris, of Jampac Productions.

If you'd like a copy, contact Chris at 10238-M Manassas Mill Rd., Manassas, VA 22110. But please, don't expect him to crank these out at his own expense. Even cassettes cost bucks. — The Editor

The Time Has Come To 'Let Go'

The following letter is from Rev. Ray W. Stubbe to the KSV, Inc., President, Ken Penn:

Over a quarter of a century ago a very special group of men found themselves in the enchanted place called Khe Sanh, Vietnamese for "green river." For many, it was a place of surrealistic beauty, and for many it had become a place of terrors and devastation so great that one knew they were in the presence of something far more than human. The lush growth, cool air, playful and friendly Bru tribespeople we had promised to protect, all sat atop the crater of an extinct volcano (hence the red clay), an area born in great noise, heat and violence, a heritage we were to know. Those who found themselves there gave everything they had, shared the little they had with each other and for each other were closer than perhaps to other blood family members. That which is best in humanity: caring for each other, dedication to service, standing firm and even defiant in the presence of that which would destroy, all while feeling completely isolated, uncertain of support and survival, cut-off and in another world, became the setting of all who were there at Khe Sanh, whether this was in 1962, in the Hill Battles of 1967, in the Siege of 1968, in the mobile operations of 1969, the large 1971 operation or small outpost later that year, or the plane shot down over the airbase in 1972, or, in fact, any time. We were welded together as brothers forever in the heat of the battle. We learned how life was so extremely precious. Veterans of that battlefield have since contributed much to their communities, and have never forgotten their buddies who didn't make it back home, nor will we ever forget them, for they live in our souls, and we all are, as Kevin Macaulay notes, "better persons because we've known them."

It is now just about a decade since a listing of 20 Khe Sanh veterans became the nucleus of what would become Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Those first 20 were: Harper L. Bohr, Jr., Jeff Bodenwiser, Dick Cruz, David Doehrman, David S. Harrington, Robert Hatfield, Dennis Herb, Ernie Husted, Frank Iodice, Daniel Kelley, Christopher Lane, David E. Lownds, Kevin C. Macaulay, John & Carolyn Miller (missionaries), Scott Miller, Bert Mullins, Rick Noyes, Scott W. Richardson, myself, and James B. Wilkinson. Our group has rapidly grown from the small beginning of a few acquaintances to the approximately 3,000 member organization we now enjoy, which is quite a miracle in itself.

"Pappy" Schlack, XO of the recon company at Khe Sanh (which lost over 80% of its men dead or evacuated wounded during the Siege) was once quoted as saying that upon his return he would open a bar for Khe Sanh survivors, and if ever the crowd became two men deep, he'd know someone was lying!

Now, following a dedicated decade of gathering and nurturing, it has come time for me to "let go," to relinquish my part in the leadership team, and therefore tender my resignation as Secretary and Member of the Board of Directors effective 30 September 1994. (If you wish, I will continue those functions of the Secretary pertaining to membership record maintenance and development, mail our magazines to new members, until someone may be identified who has computer capability and is reliable and interested in doing the job. The parts of the Secretary's job I wish to relinquish are taking Minutes and the expectation of being present at future reunions or Board meetings.

This is in keeping with the gradual "letting-go" I had initiated almost from the beginning, with the giving to Ernie Husted the responsibility of our magazine, the transfer of leadership which Earle Breeding so aptly and with much dedication and effort on behalf of our group took up, and which you, Ken, have continued, during which we have dedicated our own Memorial in Arlington, seen our own group identity emerge as we gathered at two very successful reunions in 1993 and 1994 which were the direct results of you and your wife, Bernice, as great gifts to our brotherhood which have so healed and enriched us all. Despite my efforts to recede into the background, however, there appears to be a certain influence that I have been accorded that is unhealthy for our group. The group must abide by the will of the majority of both the membership and the Board with no single individual wielding undue or disproportionate power if it is to be healthy. The gifts of all members must emerge and be nurtured; this will only occur if members are permitted to contribute their talents and heart to our fellowship. Mike O'Hara's formation of Area Coordinators to keep in contact with members and develop leadership is a stroke of genius. Ernie Spencer has devoted his special artistic ability with the result that we have a first-class magazine. Carl Oksnee has developed a super PX. Janet Parker is beginning a Women's Network that should prove to be as invaluable for wives as our organization is for its members. Bill Maves continues to provide us with dedicated and meticulously executed work as our Treasurer. There are many, many who have provided us with names of new members, have helped at reunions, have shared their expertise and encouragement and vision. We truly have a very, very special family, our Khe Sanh Vets, Inc.! May our gracious Lord continue to bless us all that we may continue to be a blessing to others!

Suggestions To Consider

In a letter about marketing and advertising as it pertains to this magazine, Terrence D. Arndt added, "I would also suggest that you consider setting aside 10% of profits to help "Khe Sanh Veterans" in financial need. Many of them have suffered emotionally after the war. It always seems difficult to find an effective way to help our brothers. While there are other organizations, who better than our own. A suggestion for you to consider."

Vietnam Friendship Village Project

This poem (see "Vietnamese!" below) was written for the delegation of Vietnamese veterans who attended the International Conference on the Vietnam Friendship Village Project, held in Santa Cruz, Calif., May 10-15, 1994.

The delegation included Sr. Lt. Gen. Tran Van Quang (Ret.), who commanded the patriots in the area we called I Corps; Mr. Chu Do, chief combat engineer for the Vietnamese during the war; Mr. Hynh Van Trinh, negotiator at Paris, and Mr. Nguyen Van Huynh.

The poem was delivered, in English and in Vietnamese, at a luncheon hosted by American veterans of the Vietnam War to honor the Vietnamese, on May 12, 1994, at the El Palomar Restaurant in the Palomar Hotel in Santa Cruz.

I served at Khe Sanh, both on the Parachute Drop Zone and on the Airfield, with "Tailpipe Mike," the USAF Combat Control Team directing the aerial delivery of troops and supplies, in February and March of 1968.

Vietnamese!

Oh, patriots of Qui Nhon, Hue, Dalat, Khe Sanh,
Every city, town, and village in Vietnam:
We obeyed our rulers as soldiers ought to do;
Lying to everyone, they had us assault you.
Upon retreat from the ruin imposed by their stealth,
We discovered they were in a stupor with wealth.
Now we look to you for leads on how to revise
A moral order shredded by politic lies.

'... 20 feet From The Wire'

A friend I wrote when I got to Oki (from Khe Sanh) wrote back that they were getting tore up. He was with Whisky Battery. I stayed there on Oki for 1-1/2 years. I watched on TV there when the shelling started and I wanted to get back so much but felt there was little chance of getting back to Whisky.

As I remember when I/3/12 got to Khe Sanh at the end of Jan. '67, I don't remember any perimeter wire at all. Because I distinctly remember one time I got outpost duty. It was cold, raining, and we didn't have a fighting hole, no wire in front or nothing. It was already dark when they put us out. Me and my buddy, we sat or laid there all night in the rain trying to be invisible. And I tried to smoke a cigarette with my poncho on as everyone has and it didn't work, that smoke just goes back up in your face and nose. And your imagination runs wild with you.

Later, my (Whisky Battery) gun seemed like it was within about 20 feet of the wire looking down a slope, I think. When the C-130's didn't stop to unload, and the Bru stopped coming to the dump, and rumors about using nukes from the 105's, and I remember being issued a gas mask — well, I think I was ready to go home. Ha!

I remember when we got the Ontos and the Army Dusters with quad 50 calibers and twin 40mm cannon in March '67. They set up close to us and they were awesome. One night I remember them firing down in the valley by the river and hearing somebody screamin' bloody murder. And watching Puff do his thing. I saw the SR-761 Black Bird fly over a few times, too.

It says in the Marines In Vietnam '67 history book that in Jan-Feb. we were first authorized to fire into and across the DMZ. We couldn't reach the DMZ from Khe Sanh with 105's or 155's.

It says "while the allied forces were too small to be a deterrent to major enemy incursions, they did serve as an advance warning unit." Shit! I guess we were just a big LP then, huh?

New Look At Generation X

I felt compelled to write and share with my fellow Khe Sanh veterans an experience I had recently. This experience has changed my opinion of the so-called Generation-X and renewed my faith in the young people of our country.

I was a member of Alpha Company, 1/9 and managed not only to survive the siege but also the battles for Hills 64, 471, 552, and 689. Myself and other members of the old battalion are currently collecting information for a book in progress about Khe Sanh and it was due to this effort that I've enlisted the help of a commercial artist. Although she lives in Georgia, we agreed that our first work session would be at my home in Alabama. She and I spent the better part of this past weekend going over ideas for drawings of certain events and the more she heard about Khe Sanh, the more she wanted to know. We spent many hours looking at photographs and reading through all the sections of each book that had anything to do with the siege. Her interest in Khe Sanh has grown to the point that her local library has limited her to only two Vietnam books at a time.

Since she was due to leave for home early on Sunday morning, she wanted to spend a few hours late on Saturday night going over the books again, alone with he own thoughts. After closing the door to my "office", she didn't come out until it was well past midnight. We said our good-bys the next morning and it wasn't until Monday that I went into my "office" again. On my desk was my cherished copy of David Douglas Duncan's book, War Without Heroes. Laying on the cover was a neatly folded piece of paper which I picked up and started to read. I'm not ashamed to say that my eyes welled up with tears as I read what Jennifer had written. It's so powerful in its simplicity that you'd think only a Khe Sanh veteran could have written it. I wanted to share it with all those who survived Khe Sanh and I hope it will mean as much to them as it does to me. It was written by Jennifer Paisley Ferguson, 24-years-old, married with a baby daughter. If only there were more people like her in this world.

I Will Stand
by Jennifer Paisley Ferguson

As the sun sets behind a war-torn hill
I will stand
In the final seconds before chaos
I will stand
Under the red glow of the intruding lights
I will stand
Amidst the thundering quake of my hell
I will stand
With my last stretch of dignity
I will stand.

Catkiller 14: Air Incident

On 24 Jan. 68, a dark, overcast day, I was sitting in the Dong Ha Ready-room. The field phone rank that morning, a convoy had been hit on Route 9 north of Camp Carroll, was topped and needed emergency help. The weather was very bad: low ceiling and poor visibility, but we were undaunted and were off the "rescue." My observer, a major, and I ran to my O-1 named "Twiggy." We took off and quickly found the small resupply convoy, a jeep or two and a half dozen trucks with maybe 45 grunts. The convoy had been hit hard and repeatedly raked with small arms and RPGs.

When we arrived, all the vehicles were knocked out and were being used for target practice by NVA RPG crews. Some Marines were killed and many others were wounded; dead and dying men were in the vehicles, sprawled out on the road and laying in the drainage ditches beside the road where the survivors had congregated and were pleading for help.

The major called for a Camp Carroll — the 3rd MarDiv's artillery base — fire mission but the convoy was so close and below the artillery plateau that the tubes could not be elevated nor depressed enough to hit the enemy. The NVA had hit so close to our artillery that our field guns wee useless. This ambush was an example of shrewd NVA planning and execution that repeatedly cost us heavily in equipment and lives.

When the artillery was determined to be useless, we were far beyond the range of NFG, so we went to our last resort. We requested fighter-bombers, but the clouds were very low and the AF could not get in.

The grunts were pleading for a med-evac. We requested helo med-evac but none were available. I could not believe the Marines had no standby med-evac choppers for the DMZ! Next, we called on the emergency frequency for any helo to come get the wounded out ... none answered. We called again and established contact with a Marine CH-46. It replied but it was unable to come ... I thought the med-evac mission was not to liking of fat and safe transport choppers.

There was no help from the sky but there was a Marine M-48 medium tank with a dozer blade doing road maintenance with an Army 40mm Duster escort a mile or two to the west. The major made radio contact with them and they were told to stay out of the ambush zone but they came in close to look down the road and see for themselves. The tanker flatly refused to obey instructions. He picked up volunteers and with four or five grunts holding onto the side of the tank, dashed into the teeth of the ambush. The NVA were observed to fire one anti-tank rocket. The RPG hit the tank exactly where the turret turns on the chassis. The men on the side of the tank were blown off. The tank went off the road and crashed into the ditch. The crew crawled out of the turret and jumped into the ditch. The tank, its crew and the grunts never fired a shot.

The Duster crew saw their big buddy take the direct hit. They, too, were told to stay out. "We're comin' in!" was the reply. Seconds later the charging Duster was hit by a well-aimed RPG. The tracked and lightly armored vehicle stopped dead with one tread on the road and the other in the ditch. The crew ran from the vehicle to the safety of the ditch while one brave man fired the twin 40mm guns covering the other men until the loaded ammo was exhausted. The guns were never reloaded. The gunner abandoned the vehicle and hid with his buddies in the roadside ditch.

I overheard the major radio Camp Carroll that all those men should be put in for medals.

We could see the backblasts from the RPGs. The major knew we had to do what we could to help the grunts. I opened my windows and we started shooting our AR-15s. We had our magazines loaded with tracers. We pointed the muzzles toward the RPG nests, walked the tracers into the target area and then let our automatic rifles rip. Hot shell casings piled up and covered the floor.

Within minutes I got a call from Dong Ha Direct Air Support Center and was put in radio contact with a pair of A-4s out of Chu Lai which were holding over Dong Ha full of fight. The weather was a very dangerous 600-feet, ragged overcast. The mountain tops around me were well into and above the cloud layer. The weather was nearly impossible for jet traffic, much less an air strike! I described the mountainous terrain to the Marine aviators, ambush site and enemy situation. The Marine aviators said they were "coming in with snake and nape," and for me to mark the target.

The jets then called for a ground controlled radar approach (GCA) to Dong Ha. When they broke out of the clouds near the runway, they skimmed over the Marine base and picked up Route 9 flying just above it and westbound.

The jets radioed they were about a minute out. I tried to mark the target by diving "Twiggy" and firing my 2.75" white phosphorus rockets but they failed to shoot. I immediately realized in my rush to main the plane at Dong Ha I had not manually armed the rockets. I then did the next best thing. I grabbed two smoke grenades and threw them on the target areas, one on each side of the road.

No sooner was this done than the major and I picked up the jets visually. The small, light grey jets were dragging the road, one behind the other, with black smoke pouring from their exhausts. I had never seen such a low level and dangerous attack. What guts!

The jet jocks reported seeing the smoke and convoy. They broke away from the road with one on each side coming in as low and slow as possible. I observed that they were on a good target heading and radioed to them, "Cleared in hot!"

The first A-4 dropped two large canisters on the north side and his sister ship dropped his pair of canisters on the south side. The bombs broke apart and a hot, orange flame skipped and spread across the rolling, heavily vegetated terrain. The jets poured on the coals and immediately pulled straight up and in a flash they had disappeared into the overcast. They made two more attack runs each by way of the Dong Ha GCA and dropped pairs of 250-lb. bombs on each pass. When the air strike was over, the enemy was quiet but we did not know what would happen next.

The grunts informed us that men were dying of wounds. Something had to be done for them. I did the only thing I could think to do. I called Dong Ha tower and asked for any helo. I was told there was an Army "Slick" (Huey) in the refueling pit. I told the tower to ask him to come.

I made radio contact with the Huey pilot. He informed me he was enroute. I described the ambush site. The Huey was soon in sight, flying low and coming up Route 9 just like the jets had done. The grunts popped smoke. The major said for us to fly low over the enemy positions. "We have to draw the enemy fire!" I flew as low as I could over the enemy positions and was no fired upon. The Huey landed on the road and picked up many badly wounded men that were dragged to the chopper and pushed inside. The Huey lifted off, turned around at a hover blowing road dust and debris everywhere, and flew low level to the east and disappeared.

We told the other grunts including many walking wounded to hold on. There was an armored convoy forming up just outside of Dong Ha. Several minutes later this convoy was rolling like the cavalry coming to the rescue. A half dozen wheeled vehicles were led by a Marine M-48 tank, closely followed by two Army M55 tracked vehicles mounting quad-.50 cal. machineguns. A half mile from the ambush site the quad-.50's were pointed on either side of the road and commenced firing. The roar was loud as red tracers streamed and pulverized the terrain. Branches were snapped from trees and the beaten ground became obscured by clouds of swirling dust.

As the armored convoy rolled into the ambush site, the NVA never fired. I believe they had pulled out minutes before. Then came choppers, several of them. They landed on the road and more of the wounded and dead were taken away.

We were told to land and report to the 3rd MarDiv HQ bunker. The Asst. G-2 wanted to know from the major and me what had happened. We told him. He said that those grunts and aviators were dam brave soldiers ... but our losses were high, too high and the enemy's loss, if any, was unknown.

Such was life in the DMZ.

Hardy Z. Bogue
"Catkiller 14"

Editor's Note — Hardy Z. Bogue was then a second lieutenant Army aviator with five months in-country. He and other O-1 Bird Dog pilots from his unit, 220th Avn. Co., 1st Avn. Bde, operated regularly over the Khe Sanh area during January 1968 in support of the 3rd MarDiv.

He Was The Ammo Tech In The Ammo Dumps

I volunteered to come up to Khe Sanh at the first opportunity I had. I was an Ammo Tech in the ammo dumps. My father was a career Marine in Korea and Vietnam. Since the age of eight I was going to be a career Marine, too.

I knew this tour was going to be the ultimate in my life, I was not disappointed. There were times of guilt, when I was feeling so good about what I was doing at my job, yet in the hills the grunts suffering miserably.

I was wounded on 9 April 68 at ASP-1. I was drinking some orange juice in my bunker when I heard an explosion that sounded like it was in our dump. So, I ran out to check it.

When I got to the Grade III bunker, I noticed some people walking with a guy who was bleeding on his right side. There was tear gas in the area, so I ran back to my bunker and grabbed my flack jacket, helmet, shovel and put on my dirty gas mask. I couldn't breathe so I ripped off my gas mask. When I got down to the Grade III, I noticed a guy with his chest cavity gone. I didn't realize he was dead, so I picked him up and carried him behind another berm.

I then picked up my shovel and tried to throw dirt on the fire. My buddies were behind another bunker, yelling for me to get out of there, that it was going to blow. I tried one more shovel of dirt, and that didn't work, so I ran looking for shelter. I found some 4.2 illumination pallets. As I was trying to make myself the smallest target possible, I looked up and saw my best friend giving me a thumbs-up, meaning he was okay. I then heard a really loud explosion and everything turned a bright orange.

At this time I didn't realize I was on fire, I thought that it was a direct hit on my friend so I worked my way to where he was, still not realizing that I was on fire. I tried to breathe, but the air was all gone, and that was painful. I then got knocked down another time to my knees, and all I kept thinking was that I didn't want to make my wife a young widow.

I headed towards the Arty Bttry 105mm. While walking over there I tried to think of first aid for burns, shock and infection, now noticing that my right arm was melting. When I got closer to the gun park, there was a sentry wearing a gas mask. He told me to follow him, and he took off running. I was exhausted at that point so I went to the closest bunker which happened to be the Command Post.

As I was walking in their headquarters, there was a Major looking at me, still smoldering. He said, "My God, son, were you in all that?" He yelled for his corpsman and they took off my flack jacket, it was melted in the back. The corpsman said he couldn't help me. I told them to put some water on my butt, because it was still smoldering.

They asked me if I wanted to go to the Battery Aid Station, or wait until the smoldering was out. Another round landed close, so I said, "Let's go."

I was amazed how big it was underground. They cut my boots off, which had melted on my feet. The next thing I remember is I woke up in Charlie Med with a TV, and my Platoon Sergeant came up to see how I was doing.

I asked about Cpl. Charlie Stephens, and had been told that he got burned on his hands with WP that was on my shovel. I asked him to send him to see me and he said he was too busy. I thought that he was dead. A couple months later I received a letter along with some pictures of what happened to us. I really cherish those pictures.

However, HQMC Historical Branch says it never happened thus, no Purple Heart, all these years! But thanks to Khe Sanh Vet newsletter, the most recent edition was an article by the senior corpsman during the siege at Charlie Med, "Doc" Robert J. Topmiller. He just happened to receive a medal for that day, treating casualties from the ammo dump explosion from hostile fire.

This is what was left of the PC in the Grade III area where it all started.

The 4.2 illumination pallets where Tom sought shelter; note the PC bumper and powder cannisters.

I am going to send you three pictures. One is what is left of the PC that was in the Grade III area where it started, another picture is the 4.2 illumination pallets. If you can look in the center, you can see the burned area where I was seeking shelter, if you look close you can see the bumper from the PC, and some of the powder canisters.

The third picture is my favorite. The red flag was a red nylon seat out of the C-130 that was shot down near us. Whenever they would shoot at us and obviously miss, I would wave old "Maggie's Drawers" at them. The phrase was on a c-ration case, shall and will was mixed up not intentionally. I understand that no one was able to claim it, so he must be another name on the wall.

3/26 Reunion News

During the period 21-24 July, former members of the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines and their families and friends met in the Washington, D.C. area.

'For those who fight for it ...'

There were over 100 people attending the various events over the four-day period.

On Thursday the 21st, there was registration and a welcome reception.

On Friday, attendees took the bus tour of various sites of interest to the military in the D.C. area. The tour included stops at the Marine Corps War Memorial (Iwo Jima statue) in Arlington, the Arlington Cemetery (where we had the opportunity to visit the Khe Sanh vets plaque among the other sites), the Navy and Marine Corps museums and the USS BARRY at the Washington Navy Yard, and (finally) a trip to the Wall. Later that evening, after a short return to the hotel, we went to Eighth and I where we had a tour of the Commandant's house and observed the parade. The tour of the house was courtesy of the Commandant of the Marine Corps. General Mundy, a former S-3 of 3/26, was unable to attend since he was on an overseas trip to Guam and Hawaii.

Saturday was a day of rest and recuperation with no scheduled Activities other than the banquet. Major General Matthew Caulfield (Ret.) gave a moving and emotional speech at the banquet.

On Sunday morning, after a memorial service held by Chaplain Moore of Quantico, the members met for a brunch prior to departing. A drawing for membership in the Khe Sanh vets was held during the brunch and 10 annual memberships were presented.

The "organization" is planning to meet in the San Diego area in 1996. At that time we hope to elect officers and become a non-profit organization.

We are trying to expand our mailing list and welcome any additions.

Khe Sanh Veterans Women's Network

Dear Friends,

I regret not being able to attend the gathering this past summer in Covington. Professional duties as well as personal responsibilities made it impossible for me to join you. I certainly missed being with you.

Now that summer is over, I hope you look forward to autumn feeling refreshed and renewed from time spent with family and friends during vacations, picnics and barbecues. In nature, autumn is a time of preparation for winter. This is a good time for the Women's Network to begin preparing for next year's reunion in terms of our special needs.

What are your concerns regarding having a special meeting of our own, childcare, activities for the youngsters, etc.? I need your ideas and suggestions so that I can work with the convention chairman to make the next reunion an opportunity for us to see old friends, make new ones, spend quality time with our families and to support each other. Please send your comments, ideas and suggestions to me at: 23 North Navajo Drive, Waretown, N.J. 08758; (609) 698-7120 (after 7 p.m.).

In the next issue, I hope to share with you plans for the next reunion and outline some goals for the Women's Network. In order to do so, I need to hear from you.

The following is more from my darker, brooding side. For now, take care and be strong.

Trying To Keep Your Dreams Alive
by Janet M. Parker

The first order of the day is simply to survive, just to keep your heart and soul intact and your mind a fertile field.
Trying to keep your dreams alive in a world often unforgiving is like trying to catch a rainbow in a war zone called society.
Reaching out to one another is our anchor in the wind.
It's the tie that binds us close when adrift in a sea of pain.
And each day it gets harder to stand against the tide.
We're just searching for an answer, trying to keep our dreams alive.

Howdy, Brothers

Sorry it took so long to find you all! I want to let you all know I've been searching for the last 25 years. Trying to locate someone I was in Khe Sanh with, also for the last 14 years I've been trying to prove a "stressor factor" during the March 30, 1968 battle to the VA to help support my PTSD claim.

I received my benefits before I found you all, but I have a reevaluation coming up in August 1994. I've received support letters from several of my partners and CO's to help prove my PTSD claim and the "stressor factor" and eyewitnesses.

We need to unite together again and stand with one another and help carry our wounded in America. We need to go on another operation to find our dead and wounded in America. Civilian life to some of us was not favorable! In fact, life was F____D and there are still brothers out there that are wounded. They are out of ammo, and surrounded by PTSD! I know, I was there, but got med-evaced! Now that I survived it I'm trying to bring awareness to all of you that we need to carry an extra round, we need to hump another hill! I would like to call it Operation Scotland III! Come on, men, I have PTSD, too, but I will persevere. I was also on Operation Scotland I and II. We were already picking up our dead and wounded at age 18. Semper Fidelis must be living inside all of us.

Lt. Dillon, you were always the man! Thanks for helping carry my 60 mortar tube and base plate for me during Khu Bon 4 or Phu Loc 6! Can you help me again? Take care, I've never forgotten you, in fact, I haven't forgotten any of you.

Well, I could write forever to all of you. I just received info of the Khe Sanh reunion. I'm in Oregon so that's a long drive for me (I don't fly anymore). I am trying to figure out a way. So hope to see you there.

Hill Fights

Have been up to Khe Sanh for the "Hill Fights." We walked from KSFSB to 881 North and beyond. Saw the elephants, the flies and the B-52's giving close air support (God bless the USAF). Had we (2/3, 3/3 and 3/9) not met the NVA in those hills, the siege of Khe Sanh would have been nine months earlier, in late spring 1967. We of 2/3, 3/3 and 3/9 would have gotten more of them and lost less Marines if the XM-16E1's had worked.

I was released from active duty 2Feb68 and followed the siege on TV, in Life, Newsweek, etc. and etc. I knew you could hold out but the news media really thought they had an upcoming story as their mouths watered to report the NVA overrunning KSFSB and headline the story — "Dien Bien Phu Two."

Charles Patrinos sent me a few issues of the Khe Sanh Veteran. Now I want to sign aboard, so please sign me up to a regular subscription to your outstanding magazine and survivors' club. Check enclosed for $20.

Notes On A Few Who Are Missing, But Accounted For

Rev. Ray Stubbe sent in some information about several of our number who have died recently:

Daniel Baldwin — died 11 June 1994 as a result of stomach cancer. Daniel was the Commander of Command and Control North, the headquarters for the four FOBs in I Corps, and was at Khe Sanh in the beginning of the Siege as part of a force that re-entered Khe Sanh village after it fell and was evacuated in order to destroy classified information and food supplies and determine the activities of the NVA there. A very large amount of NVA armament was captured during this action. Daniel and his wife, Angelica, lived in Fayetteville, NC.

James Kinane — died 16 June 1994 as a result of cancer to the throat. James was shot in the throat in Vietnam, and possibly as a result of the effects of Agent Orange, later developed a severe cancer. Jim was a member of Co. B, 3rd Recon, at Khe Sanh. Jim and his wife, Peggy, lived in Long Island.

Robert L. Murphy — died, was a member of VMFA-542.

William J. Bartkoski — died 1 June 1994, had diagnosed leukemia as of last fall, but died as a result of a brain hemorrhage — possibly stress and high blood pressure. Was a very good friend of Tom Bystrom, who died recently as a result of a car accident.; William was a member of Alpha Battery, 1/13, and was a Life Member of our Khe Sanh Vets — actually, contributed over and above the Life Membership.

Road Honors POWs, MIAs

John Seitz, A/1/13, from Babylon, Long Island, NY, wanted us to know that, according to the newspaper article he sent in, "Long Island now can boast what is arguably the largest memorial to prisoners of war and soldiers missing in action in the state, perhaps the nation."

It came about when Gov. Mario Cuomo signed into law a bill renaming 109-mile Sunrise Highway as POW-MIA Memorial Highway. It runs from Long Island to the tip of Montauk.

The Case Of Joe Yandle

The following letter was sent to Bill Maves, who shares it with us:

Enclosed please find my check for enrollment of Mr. Joseph Yandle in the Khe Sanh Veterans organization. Joe served at Khe Sanh during the Siege as a member of A/1/9. Joe is presently serving a life sentence at the Massachusetts Correctional Facility, Norfolk, MA. His address is:

Bay State Correctional Facility
c/o Mr. Joseph Yandle

clerk — Mr. Joe Reppucci. According to the law they were both sentenced to life imprisonment without parole.

What initially got me interested in this case was a segment on 60 Minutes which aired a few months ago. During that show they compared Joe's case to that of Katherine Ann Power who had driven a getaway car in the holdup of a Brighton bank in which a Police Officer was killed. Ms. Power went into hiding for 24 years and recently turned herself in and received only a few years in jail. Joe has been in jail for 22 years.

I have researched Joe's case and met with him personally. I have also met his wife and his attorney. Joe was discharged from the Marines honorably and had not been in trouble prior to one week in July 1972 when he and his accomplice pulled a string of robberies which ended in the death of Mr. Reppucci.

I am convinced that Joe should have his sentence commuted and that he could again be a productive citizen and a credit to his community. I have written to Governor Weld of Massachusetts encouraging him to commute Joe's sentence.

I am also enclosing additional information on Joe's case (Editor's Note: The letter was accompanied by six newspaper articles relative to the Power's and Yandles' cases, and copies of letters written to the headquarters of the Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc., and to Governor Weld from VVA and the legal firm of Williams & Grainger regarding a commutation petition on behalf of Joseph R. Yandle.) and ask that we please publicize this case in our next newsletter. I would really like to see all of our members take an interest in this case and write to Governor Weld in support of Joe's petition for commutation. The Governor's address is:

20 Years Trying To Forget

My wife and I just got home from the Khe Sanh reunion. It was a good experience for both of us. I spent twenty years trying to forget Vietnam and now find that getting together with other Khe Sanh veterans gives me a good, positive feeling about life.

I had sent Ernie Spencer a copy of my book when he was editor of the Khe Sanh Veteran magazine, and he used several of my poems in the magazine. I'm also sending you my book to read and enjoy, and if you choose to publish any of my work, feel free to do that. (Editor's Note: Got it, thanks! Will share some as we go along.) Also included is my last poem, "Retirement", which, for me, gives some resolution to the Vietnam experience.

Hope this finds you in good health.

Retirement
by Kellan Kyllo

When the emotions of war finally started to slow down inside him he sold his guns, and then soon after that he began to forgive all the people who had ever done him wrong, and he prayed for each of them daily.
The next Spring
he went into his backyard for the first time in twenty-five years and planted a garden.
He grew tomatoes and gave them away to everyone.

Explore Vietnam By ... ... Sea Canoe?

An outfit by the name of Myths and Mountains is advertising a $4,900 per person, 16-day tour departing Bangkok, to explore "expansive inland lagoons and largely unexplored tidal caves." Led by a John Gray, "ecological pioneer," the tour will visit "the Vietnamese people who live on boat houses." If you're interested, they're at 251 Cheswold Land, Haverford, PA 19041. Ask if they'd like to advertise in the Khe Sanh Veteran!

Recognizing Khe Sanh's Veterans

Those who missed out on the reunion in Covington, KY, also missed out on meeting Constance Menefee, ad hoc historian for the CAP Unit Veterans Association and recent returnee from a trip to Khe Sanh, Vietnam. The following is a guest column she wrote for The Kentucky Post on Saturday, July 9, 1994, and reprinted here with her permission:

Members of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. are meeting through tomorrow at the Quality Hotel Riverview, Covington. Throngs have not clogged the streets to welcome them. As a matter of fact, few tri-state residents know they are in town. And, sadly, fewer still will care.

After all, Khe Sanh was no D-Day.

And, unlike knowledge about D-Day, most Americans know little or nothing about the battles in Huong Hoa District, Quang Tri Province, Vietnam. The historically astute may know that the 77-day siege at Khe Sanh was William Westmoreland's battle — "I don't want any damn Dien Bien Phu." Some may recall the bloody fights on Hill 861 and Hills 881 North and South. A few may remember the famous "tanks in the wire" cry over the radio that marked the beginning of a terrible struggle for the Special Forces camp at Lang Vei down Route 9 from the combat base.

Most do not know that the official count of American casualties at Khe Sanh has been disputed. And, certainly, if many do not know that the count of Marine Corps, Navy and Air Force dead and wounded has been questioned, they do not know how many thousands of our civilian and military allies — the montagnards (primarily Bru), the Lao and South Vietnamese — were killed or wounded on that remote plateau.

As with many battles, during many wars those who survived remember it was both thrilling in a way never again matched in peace and hell on earth.

The stench of diesel fuel and burning feces clung to every breath. Heavy fog and cold rain sapped strength and hampered air re-supply and casualty evacuation. Defenders still speak of the thirst and rats that were numerous enough to be standard issue equipment (more numerous, maybe, because they were not brought in by air). Awesome B-52 bombing raids shaking friend and foe alike punctuated the unrelenting din of incoming and outgoing artillery.

And who could forget the ubiquitous red clay?

Today, the laterite plateau is still ringed by misty, forest hills — once the site of unremitting ambushes and death. The airfield is a sterile red gash running generally west to east. Clumps of elephant grass, with the tough, saw-toothed blades that stymied every patrol outside the perimeter, struggle to survive. New thatched houses skirt the former combat base. Their inhabitants eke small gardens from the red clay.

Teen-aged scrap metal hunters wait at the abandoned air strip for vans of former American servicemen to pull in, accompanied by the requisite official guide acquired in Dong Ha. The boys eagerly show off the "real" dog tags found at the site. The cottage industry that keeps entrepreneurs well supplied with counterfeit war memorabilia is a sign of burgeoning capitalism.

The village of Khe Sanh is being spruced up. In April of 1994, there was evidence of major renovation. New orange tile roofs replace corrugated tin, and verandahs have blue, white and orange tile work. A journalist commented that in 1985, Khe Sanh was "... a gulag for recalcitrant Bru tribes people ... prisoners in a town constructed out of recycled airfield plating, beaten out oil drums and bunker sections."

If it is a gulag, villagers await the arrival of former American servicemen who come looking for some sign that the price they paid was not too high.

When the former defenders of Khe Sanh go back, they may stand on the remnants of the airfield, surreal ripples of forested mountains surrounding the plateau, and wonder if, many years ago, they were actually here, at war. They will probably think it was someone else, more certain, in another place, more awful.

When the former defenders of Khe Sanh are here, in our community, let us assure them that we understand and appreciate the sacrifices they made on that remote plateau.

George Walbridge

by Ed Evans

One of the advantages of being editor is that now and then you get to print your own stuff. There are at least two of mine in this edition, and I'll try not to abuse the privilege. But this one is about my friend, Staff Sergeant George Walbridge, USMC (KIA). I wish you had known him.

I came off the moving helicopter ramp running, but warily, as mortar blasts punched through the sounds of the CH-53's deafening engines. Ahead of me I could see the French paratrooper coat of Major General Rathvon McC. "Tommygun" Tompkins, commander of the Third Marine Division.

Figuring he must know where he was going, while I certainly didn't, through the fog and cordite stench, I ran across the clanking marston matting after him. I almost ran up his backside when he stopped on the runway to shake hands with David Douglas Duncan. With my cameras, tape recorder, camera bag, canteen, and 20 other necessary field items swinging off my offending frame, I made my apologies and headed for a line of buildings.

CRASH! The enemy had found the range of the turn-around ramp. Fragments of mortar shell and marston matting shredded the air. I hit the deck, rolled and was up running again. Two mud-smeared Marines carrying an occupied body bag laughed as they ran by me, headed for the chopper. Welcome to Khe Sanh, I thought.

Once away from the runway, I gained directions to the "public information office" bunker directly alongside the middle length of the runway. As I approached, my attention was held by the burned out hulk of what had been a C-130 Hercules, still resting on the edge of the runway about 50 yards from the PIO bunker.

"Fast Eddie!" I turned from the C-130 and saw Gunnery Sergeant Chuck McCormick climbing out of the bunker. After a few pleasantries, Chuck said, "You know George Walbridge burned up in that." He looked toward the C-130. I hadn't known. I had not even known George was in Vietnam. I dropped my gear where I stood, left Chuck and walked toward the wreckage, slowly. After a few minutes, carefully facing toward the plane so that if Chuck were still behind me he wouldn't see the tears, I pulled out my tape recorder and began to speak into it softly. Later, I would treasure this moment, painful as it was, as the last time I felt close to George.

I first met George at the U.S. Navy "Journalist B" School, Naval Training Center, Great Lakes, Illinois in September 1964. Somehow we became fast friends, battling our way out of many a bar along the strip out the gate, and the nightclubs across the county line — Ruby's, Sugar Shack, Shallimar, Ace In The Hole. Often we had to fight out way out because George would tell somebody he was a judo expert, which he wasn't. But I once saw George take on eight bikers in Ruby's one night because they were mistreating the waitress. Luckily for us, five Marine brig guards walked in about that time, took one look at our haircuts and the odds and proceeded to clean house. ARRRRRRUGH! It was great!

George was a real clown most of the time, a con artist, but he had a good heart and if he had something you needed, it was yours. Several times it was George's alliances with the Marine Detachment clerks that kept me from being shipped out of school; not because I couldn't pass the course, but mainly because George and I thought that as Marine Sergeants we were big and bad and had an obligation to prove it to the world. But the world didn't have much of a sense of humor in those days.

But none of that has nearly as much to do with why I feel as I do about George Walbridge, as the fact that he introduced me to my wife. She was then a Navy WAVE in my class. I had tried to get to know this beautiful young lady with the biggest, bluest eyes I'd ever seen, but it got me nowhere. She was driving me nuts. Then, one night George fixed me up with a blind date. He and his latest girl were going to a drive-in movie, and he asked if I'd come. First I said no, but George wheedled me into going. When he picked me up in front of the Marine Barracks, there she was in the back seat, the blue-eyed vision. Next February we'll celebrate 30 years of wonderful married life.

What is so poignant about all this is that big, bad George had one real weak spot. He wanted desperately to be loved. He would do anything for a girl, and often did. But they simply took what he offered them and ran off with somebody else. George's broken heart was a regular item. It seemed he was never destined for love and happiness.

I saw George a few times over the years, and he was always ready with a new "this is the girl I'm going to marry" story. But they always just broke his heart.

In 1967, as I went through the U.S. Marine Corps Combat Correspondents Orientation Course at Camp Pendleton, Calif., I ran into George again. But it was a new George. You could see it in his manner, his walk, the way he talked. He was married, and he was very much in love with her. I had to meet her, he said, and he was no more anxious than I.

That night, at his house, we reminisced into the wee hours. His wife, a very pretty Woman Marine with a hard look now and then, sat quietly through most of it. When it came about time to go, George left us for a moment to go to the head. She came over to me and fixed with a look like a bayonet. She let me know George meant a great deal to her, and if I had any ideas about taking him out and getting him into trouble like most of his old cronies, well, what she promised isn't found in anybody's book of etiquette. She said he'd been through enough, too much. She let me know he'd tried to go to 'Nam and they wouldn't let him, but I better not try to make George feel guilty about that. I loved her for that. She didn't know it, but I'd have decked any mother's son that said a word against her. George had found his jewel.

I thought about her as I stood in the wind, gazing at the burned-out hulk where George died, hoping she had family nearby, hoping it would go down easy. Knowing it wouldn't.

George had apparently been in country only a few days, but he wanted to be where the action was. He wanted to make up for lost time. As a new guy, without his buddies around him, he never really had a chance.

David Douglas Duncan took pictures of the burning wreckage, the attempt to get people out. He later published them in a book. I saw them and wept for George. I went to the Wall in Washington, D.C., in 1990 after avoiding it for so long. I found George's name there, touched the inscribed letters, and thought about him some more. I've never been able to listen to whatever is on that tape recording. Hell, buddy, what were you doing on that plane, anyway?

Hill 881, Khe Sanh

Hill 881, Khe Sanh
by John Culbertson

In trenches on vine covered emerald hill,
M-14 rifles faced cloudy morning's chill.
Under camo-netting sentinel muzzles thrust,
Toward communists — no Marines dare trust.
Slanting mortars salute the hazy sky,
No man hesitates to wonder why,
One man will live while another must die.
They fight as a unit trained from birth,
To give no quarter, to seek no mirth.
Their commander speaks, all troops listen.
Fix Bayonets, see razor edges glisten.
Charge the bullets into the breach.
Time for action too late for speech.
See the dark green shapes bend the grass,
Climbing our hill they cannot pass.
Aiming stakes define our fields of fire,
Machine guns track, gunners hands perspire.
Forty weapons aim as green silhouettes fan out,
Opening volley slams attackers, forcing doubt.
Could the defenders be forced to the rear?
Forty Marines well trained, fight without fear.
In trenches fierce Leathernecks silently kneel,
Wait to serve the enemy a taste of steel.
North Viets slipping through verdant grass,
Fight into oblivion, they shall not pass!

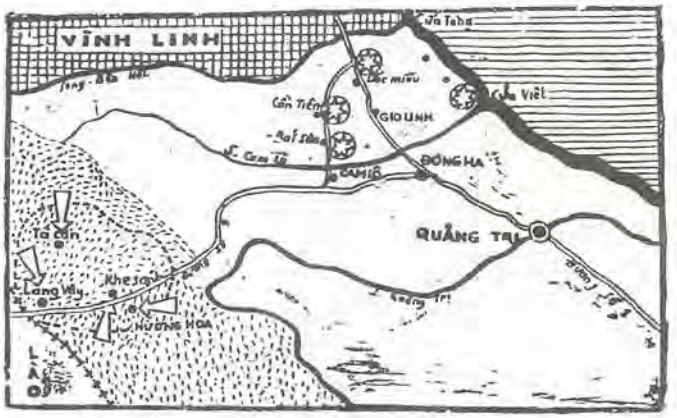
Enemy Intel Print Block

I was first informed about your newsletter when my friend Pat Hawn sent me a couple of copies of your newsletter. I read them both cover to cover but I took a couple of weeks. I had to stop occasionally to compose myself and sort out fragmented memories.

I've very seldom talked about my experiences in-country and I've only encountered 2-3 Khe Sanh vets and everyone has their own.

Pat has subsequently written and reprimanded me for not joining. So here's a check for dues. Please add me to your list.

I am enclosing a piece of history some of you may not have seen, and I would like to share it with you.



Captured Print Block

The original print block was found by me when I was attached to 3rdFRC during an insertion in the Ashau Valley. A team had found a command bunker complex. Two teams and a lieutenant and two engineers were sent to probe it and destroy it and blow an LZ so we could get out. Some of us did. I've had this print block over 20 years and shared copies with only a few. Now, I feel here's a fine place.

After Action Report Of The 1994 Reunion

by Ray W. Stubbe

Once again Ken and Bernice Penn have gifted us with a reunion filled with renewed friendships, time for thanking others, camaraderie, time for listening and appreciating, embracing, healing, sharing stories, answering "whatever happened to —," and just a lot of fun and feeling good for having been there.

Meeting in The Quality Inn, Covington, Kentucky — just across a river from Cincinnati, 7-10 July 1994, some 80 Khe Sanh veterans together with family and friends, proved once again that we are a distinct group, within which there is an absence of need to prove "I'm better than you," as Army Special Forces of the special SOG unit and Marine recon, and as infantry and arty and "air" units, and as Navy and Air Force, officers and enlisted realized again we are all family, we are brothers, not necessarily agreeing on everything, but still as though we were on the same fire team or team.

There were many special re-connections: four Shore Party Marines who had been on 881-South sequentially during the Siege recounted how each relieved the other. Four men from SOG recounted how two were carrying a stretcher when a round exploded, severing one's leg — he was there at the reunion on one leg — and wounding the other, while a third attended the wounds of both; all three of these were here, together. One recon Marine met his Team Leader for the first time since '68. There were five from the ONTOS section — quite a good showing from a small unit.

While an adjacent, quaint, antique, German-style, shopping center attracted some, and a series of exciting baseball games less than a mile away attracted others, there were no planned activities or tours as such to detract from the primary emphasis of providing the opportunity to share pictures, stories, experiences and memories and life since and life now, with long lost — or recently gained — friends, who appreciate and who understand.

A significant meeting of the Board of Directors, and a general meeting of about half business and half introductions and telling stories, together with a banquet (with informal dress), were the only scheduled events. There were slide presentations by Connie Menefee who recently revisited Khe Sanh, by Ernie Husted of photos before and during the Siege, and by David Given of photos which reflect the effects of war as seen through the spiritual journey of one person. The banquet was especially blessed by a great gift of a special piano rhapsody composed and played by a SOG medic, Denis Chercone, on the battle of Khe Sanh, weaving the Marine Corps Hymn within rushing arpeggios, reflecting the rushing and running during incoming or to rescue someone, explosions, and the sweetness of sharing and caring for each other, all expressed musically. Larry McCarney has since written: "My congratulations to the piano player ... The man is a genius and I believe that it was a stroke of genius having him. That number he played went a long way toward soothing the savage beast in me."

A hospitality room in which one man brought a computer to help locate people, and Rick Collier provided music from an awesome collection of CDs, soon became the nerve center for gathering and sharing, as did a nearby PX providing T-shirts, patches, books, caps — all on Khe Sanh.

Just prior to the banquet, Bernice Penn played recordings of all the different military service songs. From her vantage point facing everyone, she couldn't help but see how, as each service song was played, those there from that service stood taller. We are not a Marine Corps unit as such; we are Khe Sanh vets, composed of all branches of the service, and all times at Khe Sanh, 1961 - 1972.

The reunion also reemphasized what had been learned at D.C.: that we can stand quite well on our own feet, don't need affiliation with a larger reunion to provide planning and activities, and that we have our own very special bond. We were all forged together forever in the heat of that great battlefield caldron. Khe Sanh, after all, sits atop the crater of an extinct volcano. Heat, violence, explosion are the birth and legacy of the area.

We learned that local publicity is an immense asset, and must especially thank Connie Menefee for her articles in the local newspapers which drew at least a dozen local Khe Sanh vets — who had never before heard of our group. One was John P. Williams, former CO of B/1/9 and now President of the Greater Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce. He had never before attended a military reunion, but felt right at home now with his brothers from Khe Sanh.

What happens at a reunion? Our Khe Sanh reunions are not a drunken marathon, not a war-story rehash, not a therapy session, but rather are an opportunity to renew friendships with those who truly understand what we have experienced, a safe place to touch heavy and terrifying memories — if one wants to, an opportunity to say "thank you" to others for what they did — and to receive a thank you, too, and to realize we all participated in something very significant, a time to recount — and realize — that there really were some humorous times within all that desperation. Many have commented, after returning home, that their nightmares have lessened or disappeared, that they have become changed persons — not as violent or edgy; some have actually met others they were close to and thought were dead. (These latter are the legacies of our Washington, D.C., reunion.

The following are some excerpts from the business and comments made at our annual meeting:

Finances: We have both a savings account (where life membership dues are kept) and a current checking account. The savings account has approximately $5,700, and the checking account approximately $7,800. A PX was begun with Carl Oksnee in charge to generate more funds. Individual issues of our magazine cost from $3,200 to $5,600 each issue, depending on color and length. Ed Evans is our new editor.

Newsletter: The magazine is dependent upon people submitting poems, articles, pictures; it only consists of what is submitted. Members are strongly encouraged to send things in to the Editor.

Membership: A new membership Directory is forthcoming (Editor's note: Everyone should have their copy by the time you receive this.) We have gained several hundred during the past year due to the PX at different veterans' functions, and also mailing to the different VA Vet Centers. An ad will be placed in Vietnam magazine and other service-type publications.

Next Reunion: The Board voted to have our 1995 reunion in conjunction with the Third Marine Division's reunion in Las Vegas — if we can have our own Friday evening banquet, our own hospitality and meeting rooms, and gain the free rooms that are given dependent on how many register. We will have our own registration and maintain our own group identity, but simply will be having our reunion at the same time so that any of our members who have friends in the Association may meet them, and take advantage of any tours or activities of the Association. It was noted that in a survey most of our members, more than 50%, had suggested Washington, D.C., as our place for reunion.

Survey Results: A survey had been mailed out to the membership in order to obtain a description of our membership that might help in obtaining advertisers in our magazine. More than 265 had been returned, more than 10% of our membership. Results: our age is 46, 47, 48; income is pretty close to $50,000; solidly middle-class, mostly married. We have many police officers. Khe Sanh veterans, as a whole, seem to have done quite well.

Comments (Just a very few from the many made):

Robert Shippen, FOB-3 medic ... "I went back to Vietnam twice since the war ... both times I went to Khe Sanh ... It was very healing for me to go back and to see this place which for 25 years had represented the war, and see life ... people living their lives. They are very gracious, very polite, very courteous. I felt more welcome in Vietnam — several times I had an experience that brought tears to my eyes — I felt more welcome by them, even former enemies, than I have felt here at home. It was very moving and touching ... I met the Bru chairman of the Huong Hoa District ... and asked him: what are your needs? He said: malaria and goiter ... I've started to raise funds and know there's a format within this organization to raise funds to do work with the Bru. Malaria can be addressed by simply getting cheap mosquito netting ... we can get some wells dug there."

Ken Penn, W/1/13 ... "About three weeks ago I was asked to address a Vietnamese assembly ... I can tell you that the Vietnamese think that the Khe Sanh Veterans 'walk on water.'"

Russ Mann, FOB-3 medic ... "I would occasionally get the detail to drive the water truck. It was a dangerous mission because it was a large vehicle and it was moving so it became a target. When I got to the water point there would be a man there who was a water point guy, a special MOS. Next week, there'd be a different man; the former one was killed or wounded. Next week, another new man. So I asked: 'Why are you here? This is insane! You might be dead in three or four days!' And he said, 'Hey, it's my job. They need water.' I've always found that very impressive and an indication of the dedication to duty that Marines have, and am very appreciative of that."

Larry McCartney, E/2/26 ... "I was 18 when I joined the Corps in July of '67, landed in the Nam in December of '67, and was in Khe Sanh a month later. I had probably the best initial training I could of gotten in the Marine Corps from the Skipper, Earle Breeding, and the rest of Echo Company. I got off active duty in '71 and joined the Reserves. I've been hanging tough in the reserves ever since, a little over 27 years now, and without people like the Skipper, Mike Worth, and a whole bunch of the others, I just wouldn't of made it. I come here just so I can see people and pass back some of the good that I got when I was a kid." [Ken Penn noted: "Six months ago, Larry was promoted to Master Gunnery Sergeant!"] Larry continued, "To give you an idea of just how good a company the Skipper had, I'm the third E-9 and there's also one Major that were all PFCs up there on 861-Alfa."

Ernie Husted, B/3rd Recon ... "...I think what helped me more than anything is I've been to a couple of reunions. And I remember talking at one of them about a radioman who had been hit — had his legs blown off. 'PJ' [Pagano] — and how much I missed him. And I heard this voice in the back, said, 'I didn't die, dammit!' 'What!' It had been 20 years, and I didn't know he was still alive. We're all there is, folks. We share a very unique experience that will never be recreated ... I don't know everyone to thank, but if we didn't work together, we all wouldn't be here. So thanks to everybody!"

Gary Parker, A/3rd Shore Party ... "I was in the saddle of Hill 881-South in a hole about six-foot deep with Carlos Morales. I want to apologize if we kept anybody awake one night. We were told that the stuff was going to hit the fan, and they were coming over the side. Between Carlos and I we had about 35 hand grenades. They had come in and we never distributed them to the troops. We started throwing these hand grenades over the side, but mine weren't going off. I figured, there must be something wrong with these things. [Then I remembered] I had taped all of my grenades — because I was told if you're walking through the bush the spoon might get caught and they'd go off, and you're blown to shit. Anyway, I stayed up all night with my eyes wide open, waiting for these things to come back — without the tape on them!"

Mike Lee, A/3rd Shore Party "... If anybody knows any helicopter air crewmen, tell the dude that if he ever shows up, they don't buy no beers, 'cause they had more balls than anybody else up there. We had to stay around and take the shit, but they couldn't move. These guys, they came in to pick up bodies for medevacs, and there's no place for them to go."

Earle Breeding, E/2/26 ..."We're talking about about thanking people, and I often wonder if the family — the mothers and the fathers of the veterans who came back — ... realize they had a PFC fire team leader. He's come back — he's alive today — because of small unit leadership by 18, 19 year-old kids, and yes, some 17 ... They got back because of the ability and the expertise that were given to them by the small unit leader. That war, probably more than any war that we've ever fought in the United States, was a small unit war ..."

Carlos Morales, A/3rd Shore Party ... "I was on the hill with Gary Parker, and one night I'm sitting in the hole, and he's at the opposite side. I hear [he makes sounds of flying and snapping]. What the hell is going on? So I look over and I see Gary. I said, 'Gary, what are you doing?' He said, 'I'm eating flies!' Now, if he caught them and ate them, he marked down 'Killed in Action,' and if he just hit them with his tongue, they were 'Wounded in Action!' I still, to this day, laugh at that, and I thank him for my sanity!"

Stephen Street, A/1/26 ... "John Kaheny — I was his radioman for a few hours when we got hit, and if it hadn't been for him I wouldn't be here today. I haven't seen him for 27 years. Sometimes I get a phone call, a card from Khe Sanh people, and it just means everything!"

Earle Breeding, E/2/26 ... "I was invited to a Vietnam Motorcycle Club in Georgia. I went. We're talking black boots and black leather and tattoos. I strolled around and, since I was obviously not a motorcycle person, I was not greeted too fairly. I had not realized that to get into this place you needed to wear something to indicate you were in Vietnam. So I went back and put on a Khe Sanh t-shirt. And I was walking down this path where there were quite a few hard-core bikers there — and not all my stories are true, folks, because I'm a Marine — but this is a true story. I was walking down this path, and it was totally blocked with bikers. They saw me coming. And the path opened up [he chokes with emotion]. And I walked through there and I heard one of these biker's ladies say, 'Why did you let him through?' And he said, 'Khe Sanh.' Let me tell you something, we are a very unique group, and we must maintain our uniqueness."

A summary of the meeting of the Board of Directors, voting to:

- Approve the establishment of an Arts and Bru Humanitarian Fund, to accept monies already donated for this purpose; that no membership fees accepted would be transferred into this fund, and that it would only consist of donations made to it specifically and that it would be administered by five individuals (specifically the President, Vice-President, Ray Stubbe, Ernie Spencer, and John Balanco) who could expend up to $500, and the Board of Directors would authorize any expenditures over $500.
- To conduct an audit by an outside, non-Khe Sanh vet, CPA, of our Treasury within 90 days of this meeting and at least annually thereafter, with a Financial Statement made public to the membership, the initial publication not later than March 31st, 1995. That there be a three-person finance committee to oversee the finances of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., to include the annual audit.
- Express our deep appreciation to Carl Oksnee for what he had done with the PX for our organization.
- That Carl submit his expenses for approval by the three-man Finance Committee.
- That both the PX and the Reunion funds be transferred by 15 July to the Treasurer to form one account for Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and that the Treasurer provide checks to both for their expenses as required. That Carl Oksnee be given a $500 cash box to function.
- To form a By-Law Committee, chaired by John Kaheny, with Jim Wilkinson and Ray Stubbe as members.
- To form a Finance Committee consisting of the President, Vice-President, Treasurer and Secretary.
- To form a Publications/Editorial Committee responsible to the President to oversee the content and publication of the Khe Sanh newsletter, consisting of Earle Breeding, Gary Parker, and Ray Stubbe.
- To follow through with Ed Evans and Jon Dodd of Marine Corps Association to determine feasibility of publishing our magazine six times a year with the Marine Corps Association paying for it by means of advertising.
- That the Editor of our newsletter be determined by the President upon recommendations of the Editorial/Publications Committee.
- That the Board formally go on record expressing its very deep appreciation for the highly dedicated and professional work of Ernie Spencer in producing our Khe Sanh Vet newsletters for the past two years.
- That Life Member cards and certificates be made as per those who have volunteered to make them.
- That an ad be placed in Vietnam magazine for six issues at $47 per issue, advertising Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. The Editorial/Publications Committee will do this.
- That our next reunion would be in conjunction with the Third Marine Division Association meeting in Las Vegas in 1995, if we can have our own hospitality and meeting room, our own Friday night banquet, and free rooms associated with the numbers of those who register.
- That our membership should be informed of the need for additional State Coordinators (who maintain contact with Khe Sanh vets within their own state, contact new people, contact those with very serious illnesses, etc.).
- That our membership should be informed of the Women's Network which is chaired by Janet Parker (wife of Gary Parker).

- That Ken Penn contact those who have volunteered to do our next reunion, review the reunion situation, and put it in a written form to the Board to vote on it.

And two additional notes:

First, the Board was informed of the deaths of three of our members: Colonel Dan L. Baldwin, former CO of CCN; James Kinane, B/3rd Recon; and William J. Barkoski, A/1/13, Life Member.

The Board was notified that the maintenance of our historical files does not cost the organization a penny. Ray Stubbe is currently maintaining these files including putting all diaries, letters written home, logs maintained, comments and reminiscences now — on microfilm which has been deposited in various archives throughout the country in order to maintain the accuracy of our Khe Sanh history, what individuals did. This is an on-going project, and more materials are solicited by Ray Stubbe. So far, approximately 55,000 pages of documents on 11 reels of microfilm have been so distributed — all at no cost to our organization.

Notes From All Over

Keep Those Copies of Citations And Awards Coming In, Folks!

From Rev. Ray W. Stubbe ... While doing research for the writing of the book on Khe Sanh, one of the elderly (and perhaps former senior Marine Corps officers) that passed me one day at the Historical Center in the Navy Yard in D.C. said, "Have you looked at the Award Citation files on microfilm?" and added that they were a great source of information, not only on the individuals who did heroic actions, but also through the supporting statements, on details of actions and operations. I learned at the time that the originals had been destroyed after the microfilms had been made.

Unfortunately, many of the microfilms were not made correctly: some had a whole streak of black running the entire length of the film that blocked out half of the documents, and some were made six pages to a single frame, which on 16mm makes it almost microscopic! Nevertheless, I did manage to copy several hundred of these. Finding them was also a problem since there was really no order, it seemed, in how they were filmed. While we met in D.C. in 1993, I wanted to make more copies, and was then told that all the microfilms had disappeared! Therefore, what I was able to copy may very well be the only documentation left!

If any of you have copies of your own citations or letters that you wrote to support the recommendation for someone else to receive an award, please send me a copy. We need to preserve these sort of things! (I put all our Khe Sanh documents on microfilm of an archival quality — should last at least 300 years — and distribute them to the various archives throughout the country, to ensure that our story is never lost.)

Note From A 3rd MarDiv. Corpsman

Jim Armbrust, Corpsman, HM3, 3rd Marine Division, I Corps, 1967-68 ... One of the hardest things that I have ever done, was to watch a young man die before he had a chance to make love to a woman, play golf, hunt deer, or join the rest of us with what we are doing now.

It was hard for us, the doctors and the corpsmen. Chasing you guys around was a pain in the butt, but every one of you were worth it.

Ray Stubbe said that I could write a short article about what I think of Marines, but I am going to do him one better. I am going to write about the Marines at Khe Sanh:

There were no Marines that had greater courage, or more valor. There were no Marines that showed more than you did in the interest of the true spirit of Semper Fidelis.

Call me anything: an old anchor clanker, or any other of a bunch of silly nicknames. But, I just thought you might want to hear from a corpsman. I may be whatever you call me. But, as long as I am alive, I will be there for you. And so will Ray Stubbe. With respect to the proud, the few, the brave.

The Hollowing Out Of The American Armed Forces

by Congressman James M. Talent (R-Mo.)
Member, Armed Services Subcommittees on Manpower; Subcommittee on Research and Technology

The following are excerpts from an article published in the September 1994 issue of the The ROA National Security Report.

I have addressed on the House floor, on no fewer than three occasions, this subject of the hollowing out of America's armed services. In fact, in the middle of last year I formed an ad hoc committee on the hollowing out of the armed forces with Congressmen Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), and John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.). Since then, we have done special studies on the general issue of the hollowing out of the forces, on the collapse of modernization programs in the United States Army, and on the terrible situation we have with the shortage of ammunition all throughout the services. My remarks here address the subject of military pay, and, specifically, what happens when military pay lags behind civilian pay and also behind inflation.

History Shows What Happens

What would you expect under those kinds of circumstances? Well, you would expect that it would become more difficult to recruit high-quality people who are already serving there. My points are threefold. First, history shows that does happen. In fact, it did happen in the 1970s, when military pay lagged way behind inflation, and when we had great difficulty retaining the high-quality people we had in the services, and recruiting others.

The second point is that military pay is again falling behind inflation, to approximately the same degree it did in the 1970s.

The third point is that the force is again hollowing out in the sense that we are losing quality people from the services, and are finding it more and more difficult to recruit the kind of people we need to staff a high tech, modern American military.

. . . . .

... if you had served in the American armed services in 1975, and had stayed in the services through the end of that decade, you would have suffered, in real terms, a 15 percent cut in the compensation that you received.

Did this hurt the quality of the force during that period of time? There is no question that it did. This is documented, it is accepted by everybody.

. . . . .

The military gives tests to new recruits to determine how difficult it is to train them for military occupations. After those tests are given the recruits are placed into four different categories. Category four is very low trainability. People in category four are very difficult to train for any kind of a sophisticated occupation. In 1976, none of the recruits were placed in category four. So zero percent of the recruits were considered to be very low trainability recruits. By 1980, ten percent of the recruits were in category four. One out of every ten recruits in the American military in 1980 was considered a very low trainability recruit.

Skipper Refused To Shove Off

The quality of the force in those days got so bad that by early 1981, when the USS Canisteo went to the Brooklyn Naval Yard to be overhauled, the captain would not take it to the high seas after it was refitted because he refused to certify that there was an adequate number of skilled sailors for that ship to go on its mission. His decision was reviewed by higher level authorities in the Navy and was upheld. He acted correctly in that decision. It was the only time in the history of the US Navy a naval vessel was unable to take to the high seas because it did not have an adequate number of skilled sailors on board. That was the result of the 15 percent real cut in military pay that had occurred in the US Navy and the other services from the years 1975 to roughly the year 1980.

Sooner or later America's military is going back into battle. If it goes back hollow, without quality people, without high-maintenance units, without adequate ammo, without modern weapons, without spare parts, without adequate training, if it goes back hollow, a lot of people we send someplace around the world are not going to return. And it will not be because it was necessary for them to die.

Unless Congress acts, or the Administration changes its budget projections, military pay will be cut in real terms by ten to 12 percent by the end of this decade, from where it was at the beginning of the decade. The impact of these pay cuts is already evident.

In 1989, 100 percent of the recruits in the American military had high school diplomas. In the first six months of 1994, only 94 percent of the recruits had high school diplomas. We are already moving down in terms of the quality of the new recruits

This at a time when the technologies that the military must use are growing ever more sophisticated.

Many times in my service on the Armed Services Committee, I have heard admirals and undersecretaries say you cannot keep sailors away from the "homeport" and their families, in peacetime, more than six months out of the year. If you do, they will leave the Navy.

You can do it in war, because the sailors will sacrifice almost anything for America's vital interests, but they are not going to stay in the Navy if you make them do it in peacetime.

Paying Less And Asking More

So we are paying these men and women less, asking them to stay away from their homes longer. As we experienced in the 1970s, they will not stay in the Navy if we continue to ask them to do that. It is unfair, and if the trend continues many high-quality people will get out of the service.

. . . . .

When you have fewer people and more duties away from home, the remaining troops must stay away from home longer.

. . . . .

Recently, the Marines have experienced a classic example of this problem with extended deployments aboard. It is the kind of thing that destroys morale in the service.

It Happened To 24th MEU

It is what happened to the 24th Marine Expeditionary Unit (MEU). The 24th MEU had been stationed in a support role, or had been at sea in a support role, in Somalia and in Bosnia. They were at sea for six months. They came home very recently.

The typical procedure would be they would have a ten-day period completely off, when in essence they could take a vacation. And then they would have an extended period of time working at homeport and living with their families. Halfway through the first ten days home, they were redeployed and reassigned to ship and sent out to Haiti. They came home for five days. Their families expected that they would have a vacation of an additional five days, and then be home for months at a time. But they were put back on board ship and sent to Haiti because we do not have enough people to cover contingencies abroad.

That incident is going to ricochet, is ricocheting through the Marine Corps. What it says to the Marine Corps is that the Administration and Congress do not care about them, about their families, or about their expectations. To do that to those people at the same time we are reducing their pay is criminal.

This is not an academic debate or a political game. Sooner or later America's military is going back into battle. If it goes back hollow, without quality people, without high-maintenance units, without adequate ammo, without modern weapons, without spare parts, without adequate training, if it goes back hollow, a lot of people we send someplace around the world are not going to return.

And it will not be because it was necessary for them to die. It will be because Congress did not live up to its responsibility to adequately prepare America's military for battle.

The fault is going to lie at the door of the institution which is assigned the constitutional responsibility of maintaining the armies and navies of the United States. That is the Congress of the United States.

To hollow out the military, to make a mistake of that size once in a generation is a tragedy. To make it twice is unforgivable.

Marines Deactivate Legendary Battalion

The following article, brought to our attention by Charles "Doc Chico" Garcia (C/1/9 & Charlie Med) is reprinted with permission of The Orange County Register*.*

by Jeff Kramer

CAMP PENDLETON — In the end, it wasn't an enemy ambush that did in the 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment. It was a bureaucratic directive.

Yielding to the realities of military downsizing, the Marine deactivated the legendary "Walking Dead" battalion at an emotional ceremony here Friday, dealing a bitter blow to survivors of some of the worst fighting of the Vietnam War.

"I'm trying to temper my disbelief with my love for the Corps," said Dave Mora, 45, a Los Angeles carpenter who saw his best friend killed in a firefight in Vietnam.

The unit, first activated in 1942, earned the nickname the "Walking Dead" as it was losing 604 Marines in Vietnam, roughly one percent of U.S. casualties there. The battalion is viewed with reverence within the Marine Cops.

But tradition was not enough to save the 1/9.

With mortars from nearby practice ranges thundering in the background, current members stood at attention as the battalion's colors were lowered for the last time. They will be placed on permanent display here, and the unit's 800 active Marines will become part of the 2nd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment.

About 70 battalion veterans, many from out of state, attended the redesignation. Some wore business suits, others wore fatigues, jeans, beards and ponytails. Whatever they wore, they greeted each other like long-lost brothers.

"My highest of highs and lowest of lows were in my 13 months in Vietnam," said Pete Meade, a sales manager from Irvine.

Miraculous tales of survival were as commonplace as burgers at a barbecue.

During an ambush on April 15, 1967, Dave "Beetle" Bailey's left arm was shattered by a bullet and his chest was hit by shrapnel. He called for a medic, who arrived just as an enemy soldier lodged a rifle against the back of Bailey's head. The medic pushed Bailey's face into the ground and shot the North Vietnamese just as the enemy soldier fired. Bailey was hit in the side of the face, but he lived.

"I would recommend him (the corpsman) for a medal if I knew who he was," said Bailey, who lives in Anaheim.

He has made it a point to track down "1/9ers," living or dead.

Last year, he and Dan Baldwin of Fullerton collected from the Vietnam War Memorial Wall in Washington, D.C., tracings of the names of 500 fallen 1/9 vets and placed some of the names in an ammunition box as a tribute.

On Friday, the designees put the last of the names in the box. Lee Burns of La Puente, now a field supervisor for a security-guard company, cried afterward.

"Hopefully, this will be the end," he said.

Somebody Made A Mistake -- Please Return Photos

I attended the reunion in Covington, Ky., back in July. I put some pictures from Vietnam in the Hospitality Room for all to see.

The pictures had been enlarged on a color copier and measured 11" x 11". I also had one 11" x 17" map picture of the Cam Lo area. I probably had 12 to 15 pictures altogether.

After the dinner on July 9, I went to get the pictures, but they were all gone. I thought surely the Penns picked them up for safekeeping, but that was not the case. I talked to one other member, Rick Collier, and he said all his pictures were missing, also.

I would appreciate it in the next newsletter you could put a notice where all will see and maybe someone picked them up accidentally.

The only identifying mark I had on my pictures was "E/2/26" written on the back with a black Magic Marker. Thanks a million.

A Letter To CMC On Behalf Of Tradition

The following note, and letter to CMC, were sent to Bill Maves, Treasurer, who shares it with us.

Enclosed is a check for life member with the Khe Sanh Vets. It is indeed an honor for me to be associated with an organization such as yours. I find your magazine to be very honest and to the point. It gives our Vets a forum to express their feelings and experiences. Your organization should be highly commended for this. Their stories indeed need to be told. I know. I have been touched by many of the articles myself. Even though I did not know the people writing the letters, I could relate to what they were saying. I'm sure many of us can.

I am also enclosing a letter I forwarded to General Mundy, Commandant of the Marine Corps. I think the letter is pretty self explanatory.

I would like to especially thank Mrs. Esslinger for taking the time to write such a touching letter for us Vets. I think the fact that the wife of a Vet was the first to respond to our Corps' poor judgment says something about the Veterans of Viet Nam. I believe most of us were just too proud to rattle our sabers. They have also become used to a Country that has great difficulty in showing it's gratitude. Apparently, our Country and Our Corps has failed to see the value of such a special breed of men.

I wish you and the Khe Sanh Vets much success in all your efforts.

. . . . .

General Carl Mundy
Office of the Commandant
Arlington Annex
Washington, D.C. 20380-0001

Dear General Mundy,

I am the son of a career Marine that reached the rank of Master Gunnery Sergeant. My father was a professional not only in his field of Motor Transport, but also represented our Corps as a distinguished marksman on both the Marine Corps Rifle and Pistol Teams. The list of his other accomplishments over his 28 years service to the Corps before he died are much too long to mention. I will just say he was one hell of a Marine.

The reason I mention all this is because the way he held the Corps to the highest ideals of military professionalism is probably one of the greatest reasons why I chose to be a Marine myself. I might add I carried that same professionalism and esprit de corps throughout my four years of service.

My brother, now a staff sergeant in the Marine Corps is no different. He was named Plane Captain of the Year for the entire Marine Air Wing just a year ago.

As a young boy growing up at Camp Lejeune, I delivered the Washington Post newspaper on streets named after places where Marines had fought and died. Places like Tarawa, Inchon, Bougainville, and Iwo Jima, to name a few.

Tradition. It was all around me. I was raised with it. As a result, young men like my brother and myself have performed our duties for the Corps to the very best of our ability.

Tradition. Pride in the Corps. Pride in oneself. Three very important ingredients in the making of a Marine. If a man has these, you can teach him the rest. In the class of shooters my father shot with, you didn't shoot for the bullseye. You shot for X's and V's. I have applied this principle in many areas of my life since.

I remember the targets. I remember the scores. I remember the trophies he brought home. I took great pride in his achievements as a young boy growing up. It was like John Wayne living at my house.

It must be very difficult for parents to make such impressions with their children today, with the strong influences from the media and peer pressures. It must be especially difficult to make impressions of devotion to Country, duty, honor, courage, and of the price we and so many of our forefathers have paid for freedom. The stuff that real heroes are made of.

We live in a time when the family structure is disintegrating. Here in L.A. where I live, many kids resort to joining gangs for self preservation. Their heroes are either some rock group, sports, or movie star. These people do nothing but entertain and feed off the public as well as steer our children's minds down some blind alley.

Actually, we have many men who know these qualities of leadership well. They are men that gave more than most Americans will ever know. These weren't men that said, "What's in it for me?" They were there because our Country told them the Communists were out to destroy us and our way of life, and something had to be done about it. They weren't asked to do a rap, sing a song, or play a game of ball. They were asked to put their lives on the line and many did. The Wall is a testimony to that.

Most Vets I've met since coming home do not find it easy to speak of their experiences in Viet Nam and many are only now beginning to deal with this period of their life. I believe most of us experienced and learned more about life in general in that 13 months period than we probably have with the rest of our lives.

The significance that these men place on their military experiences and how their children perceive this information from their fathers and others around them is so important. If these impressions are positive they can instill those qualities I wrote of earlier. If they are negative or even indifferent, what sort of impression do you think they would make?

Whether these children go on to pursue a military or civilian career as they grow older is not important. What is important is the positive impressions that these children will carry with them the rest of their lives.

As a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans, I have had an opportunity to read two letters directed to your office by Mrs. Esslinger, and a Mr. Varela. Both letters touched me deeply because they were full of truth. I also read Col. Sollis' poor response to Mrs. Esslinger's letter.

His letter reminded me of a time when I stood guard over a fallen Marine's body during his funeral in New Jersey. I performed at many such burial details during my three years with a Marine Guard detachment at Lakehurst. On this occasion another Marine and myself were standing at parade rest on each side of the closed casket. They were playing the Marine Corps Hymn to a slow solemn beat as his mother entered the Chapel. We immediately snapped to attention. As she approached the coffin sobbing, she moved towards me saying, "He looks so much like my son." She wrapped her arms around my rigid body and cried her eyes out until someone finally pulled her away from me. I wanted so much to put my arms around her and console her over her loss, but I followed protocol. She deserved so much more. She would never embrace her own son again. I live with that memory along with those that I experienced in Viet Nam, but I will always regret not returning that woman's embrace.

Yes Sir, I have a heart and I would hardly call myself a wimp. I, like so many of my Veteran brothers have met the enemy in battle. I have taken his blood for my country. Life has taught me that there are times to be tough and strong, but I think it is our heart or spirit, or whatever you want to call it, that gives us the wisdom to know when, and when not to use this strength. I believe this is a quality that separates us from the rest. Only Col. Sollis knows whether he has a heart, but he sounded like that Marine I knew 28 years ago standing rigidly at attention.

I was not at the Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in July '93 when they attended the ceremonies at 8th and I, but I was there when my unit, the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines had its own reunion over Memorial Day '93. As you are probably aware, my unit did not get the nickname "The Walking Dead" for nothing. Those grunts truly have been to hell and back. I must say, I was upset just as my fellow Khe Sanh Veterans were at our Corps' lack of recognition for a unit that on so many occasions had given beyond the call of duty.

They gave to the Corps and Country. When we came home, our country, tired of war, gave nothing in return. Twenty-five years later, we came home again, together. To the home you now occupy at 8th and I. Many of the men had their wives and children with them, the evening we attended the ceremony. There were also two large sections of bleachers filled with school children. Our Corps could have made a lot of good impressions that evening, General. Not just the kids in the bleachers, but what about the young Marines standing on the parade deck. They might one day stand where we stood that evening.

Tradition. Pride in the Corps. Pride in oneself. It's the glue that holds us together. I don't believe every Veteran attending the ceremony expected his or her unit announced, but how much time does it take to give recognition to a large organization? If nothing else, I believe that all Veterans that have served their country could be asked to stand and then a moment of silence dedicated to those who paid the ultimate price.

This may seem a big too symbolic for you. But, if your son or daughter had been away for some time and arrived home while you had other guests, would you not acknowledge them before your guest as your own? Well Sir, in essence we are the sons of the Corps and we deserve no less.

The 1st Battalion, 9th Marines Network suffered another blow a couple weeks ago. We indirectly found out that our reunion plans to have our 1994 Marine Corps Ball with the active duty 1st Battalion, 9th Marines have been canceled because the unit is going into mothballs in September,1 two months before the Marine Corps Birthday.

At this late date, I don't even think the Commandant could change our Battalion's orders, but you could sure go to bat for us and see that acknowledgment be given to our unit's organizations when advance notice is given. If not for us, for the Corps itself.

Two years before I joined the Marine Corps a retired General attending a change of command ceremony at Camp Lejeune autographed a program for me. Along with his signature he wrote, "Live by the Tradition of the old breed." His name was Lewis B. Puller. I've always taken that message to heart. You could say it was one of those lasting impressions. Once a Marine, a part of me will always remain a Marine.

I salute you and our Marine Corps.

Needs Info On F/2/3 Of Foxtrot Ridge At Khe Sanh

I am a combat Viet Nam Marine still suffering from PTSD. I recently learned of your publication, Khe Sanh Veterans newsletter, and would like to subscribe.

A particular issue I am most interested in, is "Spring 1993" in which an article about the battle of Foxtrot Ridge on May 28, 1968 is published.

As a grunt in F/2/3, I was on Foxtrot Ridge. I've been researching F/2/3, 1968-69. I've been very disappointed that I have been unable to find anything on my old unit, or Foxtrot Ridge. I only heard about your story.

I arrived at Khe Sanh Combat Base April 28, 1968. Although the siege was over, F/2/3 remained in that general area most of my tour. We encountered many NVA between Route #9 and Laos, and from the DMZ on south of Khe Sanh. We spent time in and around Mai Loc, Ca Lu, Cam Lo, and all through those mountains.

I need all the information I can get about this place and time, so that I might better my PTSD. I'm not sure exactly what I'm looking for and why I'm looiking. But I know it is important.

Your courteous attention to this matter is greatly appreciated.

David P. Floyd, 44, Is Gone

I attended the funeral of a fellow Khe Sanh vet today (April 15, 1994). Dave Floyd was a friend of mine I met through our VVNW Post. I know he will be way missed by his family and friends. But lately I've been able to find some good in even the worst situations. Dave's funeral was no exception.

I met a man at the funeral by the name of James J. Rampulla, father of LCpl. Terry James Rampulla, A/1/9 KIA 16Apr68. It seems that Dave was with Terry when he was killed at Khe Sanh and Dave carried Terry's body back to the helicopter to be flown out. Somehow Mr. Rampulla and Dave met and Dave filled him in on some of the facts surrounding his son's death that he hadn't known before. Now today, Fred Salzman and I both talked to him and told him about the Khe Sanh Vets. So I told him I would write you and tell you about him and that I would write him and give him your address.

Isn't it amazing how things like this come together after all these years? I'm looking forward to the next reunion close to this area.

Sincerely,

Terry L. Parr

His name and address are:

(Editor's Note: According to the news clipping Terry included, David P. Floyd died at 5:45 p.m. Apr. 11 after a lengthy illness. He was the husband of Betty Jane (Runkle) Floyd. The couple would have observed their 19th wedding anniversary Aug. 11. Dave was a retired machine operator from Caterpillar, Inc. He was a member of Faith United Methodist Church in Hallam, the York County Veterans of the Vietnam War Post 35 and its color guard, the Red Lion American Legion Post 543, the Red Lion Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 1146, the York County Purple Heart Association and a life member of the Disabled American Veterans. The clipping noted, "He was a U.S. Marine Corps combat veteran, serving in Vietnam for 13 months and the recipient of the Purple Heart Medal, the Vietnam Service Medal with one star and numerous other medals and citations.")

A Message from the President

This time of year seems to be filled with anniversaries. November 10 is the birthday of the Corps. The next day is Veterans Day. As we all know Veterans Day is celebrated on the anniversary of the end of the Great War (World War 1). It is also the anniversary of the dedication of the Wall. January, of course, brings us our anniversary of the beginning of the siege. It is no wonder that we fill these days with quiet contemplation of the role our small band of brothers (and a few sisters) played in the fight for life on that remote plateau in Southeast Asia.

John Kaheny, Khe Sanh 1967

It is 28 years since I stood watch in the fire support coordination center of 1/26 and listened in awe to radios squawking chaos in the night as fire and steel rained in on us from the long range guns of Co Roc. When I recently retired from the Marine Corps Reserve, I looked back at all the events I had experienced over the last 33 years, none of them, including Desert Storm, compared in any way with the siege. I guess that maturity brings us a fuller realization of the impact on our souls of that gallant struggle against a most formidable foe.

Those of us who have attended our reunions are also keenly aware that we still have walking wounded among us whose scars have not yet healed and perhaps will never heal completely. That is one reason why our reunions are such an important occasion. As I indicated in my first president's message to you we do conduct some business at the annual meeting. However, the most important purpose of the gathering is to provide the opportunity to meet fellow warriors who stood shoulder to shoulder with you in those terror filled days of the siege and to listen to them freely express themselves in a caring environment. Many of us survived that battle with many unanswered questions. You may very well find the answers among your comrades. The reunion is a truly remarkable healing experience.

We will be meeting again in Philadelphia on July 24-25 1996. I encourage all of you, especially those who have not yet attended a reunion, to come and enjoy a couple of days with your fellow Khe Sanh veterans. It will be an occasion that you will long remember.

John Kaheny

Notice to All Contributing Writers

The Khe Sanh Veteran is your magazine. Without your contributions both monetary and written it would not exist. We are well aware that many of you who have sent in letters, memoirs, poems or other written work have not been published. This is due primarily to the confusion which has existed as to where and to whom to send your work. We have attempted to print everything that has been sent in, but know we have not printed the contributions of everyone. It is for this reason that we ask everyone who wishes to contribute written material to this magazine to go through Ray Stubbe. Send your writings to Editor c/o Ray Stubbe 8766 Parkview Court, Wauwatosa, WI 53226. Ray will see to it that a copy of your work reaches the editor. We ask that the poets send in their poems one at a time. Pick your favorite that has not already been published and send it to Ray Stubbe.

With this issue our known backlog is current, except for poetry and longer memoirs. Those who wish to have their memoirs published will have to cut them down to no more than two thousand words, or make special arrangements with the editor to publish in parts. Those memoirists who wish help in editing their work may contact Ernie Spencer the editor of The Khe Sanh Veteran and author of Welcome To Vietnam Macho Man. Those who do not feel comfortable writing, may; with prior arrangement, send their taped memoirs to Ernie. Write to Ernie Spencer at 458 Holiday Hills Dr., Martinez, CA 94553 or call him at 510/228-4756.

The Khe Sanh Veteran will not publish material of a political or sectarian (religious) nature. The By-Laws of our organization specifically state that we are a non-political, non-sectarian, historical, artistic society. This magazine is a forum for our members and their families to express their feelings and views about the Khe Sanh and Vietnam experience. Selected non Khe Sanh veterans work will be published at the discretion of the editor and the editorial committee.

Hey guys!

Just another grunt corpsman from Echo 2/26 trying to get you to take your malaria tablets. Let me look under your tongue. Dammit! Yeah, well they give me the runs too.

Being a two-time loser, I'm not keen on women right now after the divorces, but there is a woman here who has produced a video that I think you should see. It's called HOME OF THE BRAVE. For the guys still on the edge, maybe they should see it with someone they trust. You be the judge (it's the corpsman coming out in me).

Some of it hurts, but it seems to heal open wounds. We are not alone.

Here's the details: Home Of The Brave Foundation, 6303 S. Rural Rd. #3, Tempe, AZ 85283.

If any of you know of a nurse who owns a liquor store and has great legs, give her my address. What the hell, third time's a charm. I make great ham and muthas.

Semper Fi,

Doc Swanson

P.S. The dumb corpsman ended up getting malaria. Oh well.

Dear Editor:

I am enclosing some of the poems I have written about Vietnam and Khe Sanh. I hope you find some worth sharing in the newsletter. I am working on a deal for a book of Vietnam poems and I would like to use art in the book by Khe Sanh vets, if possible. If anyone wants to write and send a sample my address is: Charles Patterson, 725 S. Figueroa St. 1200, Los Angeles, CA 90017

I am a former Marine and Vietnam veteran. I served with Electronics Maint. Co., Maint. Bn, 1st. FSR in the Da Nang area or at Red Beach. I am trying to contact anyone who served with my high school buddy, Charles "Woody" Cronkite. He died of shrapnel from an RPG to the chest and right shoulder about 1600 hours 10 Sept. 67, near Con Thien. He was with India 3/26. Woody and I graduated from Suitland High School in Suitland Maryland in June of 65. When I was the "new kid" in Junior Hi, Woody introduced himself and then looked out for me. He made me feel welcomed. I attended the 3/26 reunion in Tysons Corner, Virginia. I met his fire team leader and the corpsman who saw him get hit. Woody was with 3/26 less than two weeks when he got hit. He had spent most of his time with MAG-16.

As the chaplain at the VA Medical Center, I am writing on behalf of two of my patients who were at Khe Sanh—Asberry York, F/2/4 and Stephen Foster, B/1/26.

Mr. York wrote a letter to the editor back in January in response to Phil Ball's request for information on F/2/3 of Foxtrot Ridge in the November, 1994 issue. He and I are concerned that maybe his letter got lost in the shuffle, so enclosed herewith is a copy of that letter in the hopes that you can publish it and that Phil Ball will be able to read Asberry's reflections on Foxtrot Ridge.

Yesterday, Stephen Foster, who brought me aboard the Khe Sanh experience after his attendance at your 25th anniversary reunion in 93, continued his Khe Sanh story with me. I was deeply moved as he described the 26th Marines Orphanage. Does anyone have any photographs related to that place and time?

Since Steve is temporarily without an address, I will take any replies for him at: VAMC, 2215 Fuller Road, Ann Arbor, MI 48105.

Thank you very much for your work.

Sincerely,

Chaplain Roland Schaedig

I really like the cover on the December 94 issue and what it represents, the lives lost and torn apart by all wars. One thing I wanted to ask is if any of you know of an orphanage I could donate to in Nam. I want to do something to help those kids. They were so cute and innocent, but were forced into the war too.

Ed note: Sam check out Bob Donoghue's article, in this issue

My name is William Prescott. I live in Georgia. I have been reading your magazine articles about the Viet Nam War and wanted you to know that I enjoy the magazine very much. The articles are direct and genuine and are not contaminated with any artificial colors or flavors. The articles are written by real people for real people and this I appreciate. Your magazine allows people to express themselves and they usually zoom in with surgical precision to cut away the cancer of doubt in the mind as to what the real world was in the Viet Nam Era. Americans may not like or appreciate the politics of the Viet Nam situation, but Americans should appreciate the efforts and sacrifices of the men and women who served in the war.

I served my time in the U.S. Army from 1961 to 1964 and before that I was a member of the Georgia National Guard from 55-61. My friend William R. Yates of Franklin, Georgia introduced me to your magazine. We both enjoy your magazine and certainly hope that it will continue to help promote and enhance the quality of all those who have served, are now serving, and will serve in our armed forces.

I greatly appreciate your contribution. Keep up the good job. It is important to do so.

Respectfully yours,

William Prescott

Ed note: Brother Yates' powerful memoir, COUNTRY BOYS, appeared in our Spring 1994 issue. He tries his hand at poetry in this issue.

My Sergeant Major

by Jim Wilkinson
CO 1/26

"Sergeant Major, why are you here with a line outfit?" I asked. I could not believe that a very senior sergeant major would be assigned to a line outfit. After all, from his record book, I could plainly see that the man would have been in the rear with the gear unless something or someone had intervened. He was on his "twilight tour." He had done Corregidor at the beginning of World War II. He was taken prisoner, did the Bataan Death March and survived as a POW until the end of the war. I was struck by his calm and friendly demeanor.

"This my final tour, sir," he said matter-of-factly. "I feel that I can make a difference with these young Marines. They need positive role models. That's what they've always needed. Third MAF Headquarters doesn't need my skills. These Marines do."

As the siege intensified and the incoming increased, I became concerned about the possibility of a ground attack, but Sgt Major Gaynor calmly said, "No, not yet. The incoming will have to get a lot more intense before they try a ground assault on us." Experience learned the hard way had taught him. Corregidor had schooled him for this, for Khe Sanh. What a man he was, all over the place. Visiting and comforting the young Marines and me. February 15 was a dreadful day. It didn't feel right to me. I couldn't put my finger on it, but I knew in my heart that something was happening. Sgt. Major Gaynor heard me ask my radioman to saddle up. I planned to tour the perimeter as was my custom. He insisted on accompanying us. It was my suggestion that we split up and each go in a different direction and meet at Charlie company's area.

I remember the dull gray sky that day. The heaviness in the air. The incoming was sporadic. When I was about two-thirds finished with my half, I saw a rocket pass over me and impact on the Charlie company line. The rocket had hit the company command bunker. The wounded were immediately taken to our battalion aid station.

When I got there, Dave Ernst, the company CO—a wonderful commander—was on the table with his shoulder bandaged and his arm in a sling. His radio operator was a KIA. Jim Gaynor was on another table, his head completely bandaged. Ed Feldman and his dedicated corpsmen were doing everything possible. Sgt. Major Gaynor was unconscious. I tried talking to him, hoping beyond hope that he"d come to. My pleas went unanswered. We had requested a priority medevac but nothing happened. I dashed down to Colonel Lownds' headquarters and asked that he intervene. He did and the medevac chopper from Dong Ha came.

Jim Gaynor was alive when he left Khe Sanh, but died in route to Dong Ha. I was devastated. I had to go and identify him. I am honored to have been given that assignment. He was my sergeant major. Although the difference in our ages was not that great, he was more a father to me than my sergeant major. The entire battalion was deeply saddened by his death. His steadfast bearing, his maturity and experience, his sense of humor, his dedication to the Corps and, above all, his inspiration to the young Marines at Khe Sanh is a lasting memorial to his indomitable spirit. I could not bring myself to visit him at the Wall until 1993 when we had our 25th reunion in Washington. I shall never forget the man. He was and remains forever a Marine's Marine.

I was stationed at Khe Sanh from September 66 to July 67. I was with the LSU ammo platoon in FLSG. I was the NCO in charge of making the original ammo dumps. We distributed ammo on a MULE. We helped pull out two Chinook pilots from Dong Ha when they crashed into a Huey sitting on the runway. Its blade came undone and was out in the runway when the Chinook hit it and crashed, burning before exploding. The second Chinook right behind the first one tried to swerve away but hit the first one. Both were on fire with rounds going in every direction. I climbed aboard and helped take the two unconscious pilots out. I handed them out to my guys in my squad. I had so much adrenaline pumping, they was light as a feather. Never got their names and never found out what happened to them. After we cleared the Chinooks we ran over to the Huey and pulled all its ammo off. Those ammo belts seemed a mile long. This all happened at night and when we got back to our tent we discovered that one of the helicopter blades went through our tent cutting the poles and our cots. We just looked at one another and shook our heads.

I remember the 26th Marines coming up to Khe Sanh. We took rockets real bad one night. Rockets and mortars. A lot of my friends were killed or wounded. We took about 80% casualties. I had an underground bunker with metal runway mating and four feet of sand bags. It saved my life! Does anyone remember this? I'm also trying to remember the name of our lieutenant. He was a 1st. Lt. and real green. When they shipped us barrels of CS gas he took us to the perimeter, set some in front of a claymore mine and we detonated it to see the results. The wind shifted making us cry and we ran from it. We used those barrels as shoring on the sides of the ammo dump.

Another time we took a load of captured and bad ammo, grade 3 and 105 short rounds to some bomb crater on Hwy 9. After we blew the ammo, there was a lot of frags that blew off the pile and weren't damaged. So we had to fire all the leftovers. After about an hour of this the NVA got interested in what we were doing and commenced firing on us. We got in the PC and shagged back to Khe Sanh, bullets flying and rockets hitting the road behind us. When we got back I hauled ammo in the truck for months before we discovered an unexploded chicom mortar round behind the seat. Not knowing if it were inert, my lieutenant ordered it blown in place. So don't call me if you need a tire fixed.

I think of all our buddies who died there and it stays with me every day and night. I don't talk about it to anyone much anymore, and it feels good to talk about it now.

Khe Sanh Reminiscent of WW1 Trench Warfare
by SSgt. Phil Hartranft

KHE SANH — Before the U.S. Forces began the big push during Operation Pegasus to link with the Marines at Khe Sanh. An old World War 1 Marine could have visited the northwestern most I Corps combat base and been filled with nostalgia.

Fifty years and three wars after he was fighting in France the "Devil Dog" would find that today's Leathernecks had been involved in a form of trench warfare strangely reminiscent of WW 1 days...

He would have found some changes though. The food situation was much improved with the nourishing rations of today. Of more amazement would have been the body armor worn by the Khe Sanh defenders...

Yet, in spite of the equipment and awesome weaponry things have changed little for the grimy men living in the trenches and bunkers...

It also still requires raw courage to hazard incoming artillery and rockets, or pick up a wounded Marine and return him to safety.

He would have seen that initiative and know-how of the individual Marine, combined with teamwork, still produces the wining results...

Return to Khe Sanh

by Robert J. Donoghue
SF, 27 October, 1994

I left Springfield on 6 October and arrived in Saigon on the 8h. Spent two days in Saigon buying mosquito nets and Chinese military surplus work uniforms. These are heavy, khaki colored, 100% cotton uniforms that the Bru prefer while working in the fields. A matching set of shirt and pants cost $6 US. The all nylon mosquito nets were $5 each.

Traveled in a 1967 Ford sedan for three days along Hwy 1 to Khe Sanh. The road is getting into better shape. There was major bridge work going on along Hwy 9.

The Bru around Khe Sanh are comprised of two groups, those who fought with the NVA and those who fought with the Americans. Some of the Bru who supported the NVA in other areas have resettled around Khe Sanh. The Bru have local government representation. The Bru who supported the Americans have received harsher treatment.

Rucked to the Bru community of Thon Cheng, in grid XD 836362 and linked up with my interpreter Tu. Tu's 3 year old son was very sick and near death. I arranged for a Viet with a Russian dirt bike to transport Tu and his son to the Khe Sanh hospital. Bac Si Thien treated Tu's child. The boy had a high fever and fluid in his lungs. The doctor prescribed antibiotics, high-dose vitamins and a calcium supplement. These items cost $4. The doctor did not charge for the hospital visit. He was very supportive and impressed me. This is a far cry from last May when we tried to have some Bru treated there. We were told that our May trip really embarrassed the local government and that they were trying to treat the Bru better.

While at The Bru community at Thon Cheng, I learned that one of my Bru from 68, Rai, had recently died. I was hoping to see him on this trip and was deeply saddened. Lee Dunlap asked that I check to see if a man he knew, named Ana who had been Deputy District Chief for Huong Hoa in 1967. Ana is still alive and was in a re-education camp until 1986. I rucked about 8km to Ana's community at grid XD 830430. He was out working in the fields when I arrived. I met Ana's mother who is over 100 years old. A Bru from the ville escorted me to the field Ana was working in grid 824419. It is about 4km SE of Hill 881 South. He seemed fit and remembers Lee Dunlap. I took photos. Ana's community is the closest one to Hill 950 also referred to as Lemon Tree or Kickory depending on the time period. I asked the Bru to guide me to the summit. They told me that 42 Bru have died from exploding ordnance on and around Hill 950. Went as far as the river and took photos of a waterfall in grid XD 843437.

At the Bru community of Tlhon Cheng I handed out mosquito nets and the work clothes. The clothes were received with great appreciation and they asked if it would be possible to acquire more from us. The average annual income for the Bru in this area is $80-100. I helped the head man set up a medical area in one of the houses. We provided various drugs and vitamins, antiseptics, and sundry medical supplies.

Lack of money is the primary reason the Bru do not use the Khe Sanh hospital. So I set up an emergency fund of $200 to be used for treating the Bru. Also set up another fund of $200 in Saigon to send a monthly package of mosquito nets and work clothes. My Saigon contact Nguyen Van Loi is a good guy who spent 8 years in re-education camps.

While there I also helped a small fish farm venture. I gave $50 to buy cement and rock to dam the stream and gave $50 to buy the starter or small fish. This will help provide them with protein which they desperately need. If times are hard they can also sell some of the fish.

Got a cattle project started. Thon Cheng is such a poor community that they have no cows. This is unusual even for Bru. I bought two pregnant cows for $350. Both cows were due in two months. I own the two mothers (so the community would not become jealous of Tu) and will give Tu title to the two calves as payment for taking care of the cows.

I met with the Chief of Social and Security of the village of Tan Lien. This is the village that administers the activities at Thon Cheng. We discussed starting a grammar school for the Bru children. We could build a two room class for about $1,000. We could have classes twice a day. Two teachers would cost $30 a month apiece. I figure we'll need $2,000 the first year and $1,000 thereafter. This would include books and maybe a school lunch program. The government wants a two year commitment to start the program.

Met Tu's brother-in-law who lost an arm a year ago to an explosion while working in the fields. I'm trying to arrange for a mechanical arm for him. There are foreign medical teams working out of Saigon and Hanoi that provide prosthetics. Didn't say anything so I wouldn't get his hopes up.

Took a trip to the well I put in last May. They had "Bob" written on one side. Boy, did that take the wind out of my sails. We hope to put in another well in the future.

Bru kids love bubble gum. I gave out 400 pieces of Bazooka Bubble gum in nothing flat. I also gave the men Marlboro cigarettes and some T-shirts. Also gave out six Buck knives. These they really need and love.

This was my third trip since May 1992. I'm already planning to return sometime in early to mid-1996.

I would like to share a simple THANK YOU to two nameless and faceless grunts who gave this young Marine PFC a bit of joy. Let me explain. I was assigned to Khe Sanh from 28 April through 27 June of 68. I came from LZ Stud, later renamed Vandy. I arrived via the first convoy from Dong Ha since January. We were a rag-tag outfit of volunteers from all over I Corps who formed a new "bastard" outfit under 3rd Mar Div called Task Force Hotel. When we arrived at Khe Sanh some noncom; few of us knew one another's names, advised us to find an empty bunker and crawl in for the night—we'd reform at dawn. I found an empty hooch and began setting up house in the hole in the ground. Shortly, two mud Marines crawled into the bunker. I thought I'd be evicted. They took one look at me and saw a FNG with only a couple of weeks in country. I still had on stateside utilities and boots. They welcomed me to share their hooch. Soon one of the guys broke out his writing gear and asked his partner what the date was and the guy said 'April 28.' A chill went through me.

"I...I think it's my birthday," I mumbled.

"What'd you say Mac?" one of the guys asked.

"Well if today is the 28th, then it's my birthday." They looked at each other and began to whisper so I could not hear. They then got up, grabbed their weapons and left. I wasn't sure what I'd done wrong...maybe it's unlucky to be around a FNG during his birthday. I was so boot to the Nam I honestly didn't know if I'd just broke some grunt taboo about birthdays and FNGs. God, I felt alone.

A few minutes later I heard someone crawling back into the hooch. It was the two mud Marines. The first one had a stub of a plumber's candle balanced atop what I soon learned was a C-ration pecan cake roll. The other guy handed me a canteen full of piss-warm lemon-lime Kool-Aid. They both sang their best rendition of Happy Birthday. After I blew out the candle one of them used a K-Bar after wiping it clean on his grungy trouser leg and cut the pecan roll into three pieces. If they saw my tears, they didn't let on and soon after, we turned in for the night.

In the morning I heard some shuffling around, but did not see them depart. I never saw them again or learned their names, but I shall never forget their kindness. If this rings a bell with any Khe Sanh vet out there, well, my unknown friend, a VERY SPECIAL THANK YOU and Semper Fi, Bro.

Dear fellow Khe Sanh veterans:

The members of the 1st Platoon of Alpha Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines have joined together in an effort to collect information about the NVA assault on our outpost, Hill 64, which occurred on Feb. I, 1968. The hill was approximately 500 meters outside the KSCB northwest perimeter, near the Rock Quarry. The attack took place in the early morning darkness and should have been visible to those at the Rock Quarry, the northern perimeter of the KSCB, and, Hills 881S and 861.

We would very much like to hear from anyone who can provide either specific or general information about the assault such as:

- Eyewitness accounts and any photos of the hill before, during or after the assault.
- Statements from anyone at KSCB who was mortared during the attack and or accompanied the relief force to the hill.
- Statements from anyone who provided supporting fire including flares, monitored radio traffic, called in air support or was in any way involved in the decision making process as to how to support the men on the outpost.
- Names of any news reporters at KSCB on the 8th. Any information about the dead and wounded from personnel who took care of them and any information on the NVA soldier(wounded) who was captured. Information such as his medical care, who questioned him, where, and what ever happened to him.

We want to stress that we want to hear from anyone who can add to our input. We hope to put together enough information to eventually write a book about the assault. If you would like to be a part of this effort, please contact me as soon as possible.

P.S. I hope this is okay to print in The Khe Sanh Veteran?

Ed note: I guess it was Dave, but we do have a request. We ask that those who respond share their input by routing their letters via Ray Stubbe so that we might share this wonderful idea with all the members. Let's make this the prime topic for the next issue. Okay guys out there, what were you doing on the 8th. of Feb. 1968? Let the letters roll!

BATTLE OF KHE SANH

1. The battle of the khe Sanh will certainly go down in annals as one of the most fierce in Marine history. Over the past sixteen days I have marvelled at and admired the courage of our individual Marines and the team work and determination of our units from fire teams to battalions.

2. A very determined and well disciplined enemy force has been defeated by the actions of every Marine and other members of our Armed Forces who participated in this action. This victory was gained by the team work of all the Services and the most completely integrated inter-service air-ground close support team I have ever witnessed. We can all be thankful we are members of such a fine team.

3. If there is one consolation in fighting a battle, it is knowing that the Marine in the front lines is being properly led. No Commander could ask for finer leadership than has been exhibited by the Second BN Third Marines and the Third BN Third Marines.

4. May God bless all of you and may He watch over our comrades who died or were wounded in gaining this victory. God speed.

It is interesting how things in life happen. While cruising on the Internet a short time ago I happened onto a "chat channel" in which Vietnam vets where chatting on-line. As it turned out, there is an Internet Homepage for Vietnam vets with much information on it that may be of interest to those who are computer nuts like me. Here is the Internet address if anyone would like to check it out: http://grunt.space.swri.edu

This page is administered by a former Marine named Bill McBride who lives in Texas. After chatting on-line with Bill, he steered me to The Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. I had no idea such an organization existed. I was pleased to receive a directory. I contacted all the guys from C company 1/26. I was a squad leader with 2nd Platoon, I think. The guys called me Sgt. Pete. I know at one time one of the guys had photographed our platoon. If anybody is aware of that photo, please contact me. I'd love to have a copy. I think it might have been lieutenant Paul Bush who took the picture. I just learned that he did not make it back.

I left Khe Sanh in December of 1967. I was discharged when I got home and never looked back until now. Jim Epps called the other night and told me that Lieutenant Paul Bush was killed during the siege. I was shocked. I had no idea he'd been killed. After all these years, it hit me as if it happened just today. Our emotions are not affected by time, distance, or space.

I'd like to thank everyone, especially you Ray, who put so much into this organization. You all have affected my life in a most positive way. All letters are welcome, especially from Charlie company.

CW3 Golab has brought great credit upon himself, the unit, the Illinois Army National Guard and the United States Army

dated 16 April 1994

Ed note: Ted served with Bravo company 1/26 during the siege.

VMGR-152 was stationed at Iwakuni, Japan from 60-65. In 65, we moved to Futema, Okinawa.

VMGR-352 was based at El Toro, California but had four KC-130s attached to Futema, Okinawa. From May or June of 65 until Xmas 67, four aircraft would fly every day. Two were TAD to Da Nang for 14 to 20 days.

VMGR-152 kept one and sometimes two aircraft at Da Nang from late 63 or early 64 supporting a H-34 chopper outfit that we brought to Da Nang From Soc Trang, in the Delta. The reason we were moved to Da Nang was because the Army H-21 choppers had no or very light lift. So the Army H-21 unit swapped locations with the Marine H-34 unit.

A Hawk battalion landed at Da Nang just before the 3rd Mar Div arrived. VMGR-152 kept four or five KC-130Fs at Da Nang from March 65 on. I flew over Khe Sanh a lot in 64 making air drops. My first landing in 64 was on a dirt runway. We moved a lot. No messhall. No showers. No water. We had four tents off the South end of the Da Nang runway. We stole food, etc. from our cargo, C-rats, two, three meals each, per day. The Special Forces had an A team with a heavily barb wired compound. Some of us with VMGR-152 would be invited by the Green Berets to drink with them at night. To get into their compound you had to go through two gates guarded by Nungs. Their wire was 8-10 feet high. Their club had two airconditioning units, hard liquor and ice. I drank a lot of their special called a "14." Actually it was more like two, three, or four 7 and 7 shots into a big goblet. Whenever we were scheduled to fly to Khe Sanh, the Green Berets asked us to fly a "load" for their guys up there. With what they were giving us, their requests were always granted. If they had a big load, they sometimes took days assembling it. They always established radio contact with their team at Khe Sanh before we'd load their stuff. They'd verify the weather. It usually cleared in the early afternoon over Khe Sanh, if it cleared at all.

New pilots would ask the crew where Khe Sanh was. We had enlisted navigators then. All our flights to Khe Sanh were VFR (Visual Flight Regs). We would fly up there two different ways. Either through the valleys N/W of Phu Bai or up the coast to Quang Tri, then left until you see the red dirt runway. After unloading, the SFs would wine and dine us. I mean really feed us. They had a big compound with a messhall and a picnic area. With our bellies full we would fly back to Da Nang before sundown. I made it into Khe Sanh about once or twice a month till the weather closed it down. My last load to the Khe Sanh Special Forces guys was just prior to Operation Starlight, July/August of 66. Both VMGR-152 and VMGR-352 flew many heavy, heavy lifts in support of Operation Starlight. The runway into Chu Lai was short and could only handle one aircraft at a time.

I started flying into Khe Sanh again in April of 66. We never stopped until February 68. Prior to the AM-2 matting which was super, they had marsdon matting. It would wave and sometimes buckle when we landed heavy and we were usually heavy when we landed. The main wheels could take it but the nose wheels suffered.

I remember one pilot who flew into Khe Sanh a lot. His name is Roland Banks from Texas. He is on the Khe Sanh roster. This guy was an 8mm movie nut. He constantly took movies out his left side coming into Khe Sanh. He had his co-pilot fly until just before landing before he'd put his camera down and land the craft. He might have some great flicks of Khe Sanh. I haven't seen him since 68. He did some great take-offs and landings at Khe Sanh.

My nickname was either Black Cloud or Magnet Ass, 'cause I was always having bad stuff happen during my shifts, flights, tour.

Enough of my rambling on,

Jim Veletto

Comments made by LT. Col Fred McEwan CO 1/26 at the memorial service at Wunder Beach 06 May 1968:

In this service, we have honored not only those who have died at Khe Sanh, but all those who were there. We have fulfilled our promise to the families of our Marines killed in action. Equally important for you men of this battalion is the fact you will always remember the Battle Of Khe Sanh. You will live with it for the rest of your lives and in so doing, you will always remember those who gave their lives.

To each of you men who were there, I have this to say. For three months, the eyes of the world looked at you and the enemy, who was unable to claim success. At another outpost and milestone in Vietnam's history, this same enemy claimed success at the battle of Dien Bien Phu and with it fell half of Vietnam. Had Khe Sanh fallen there would have been far reaching effects. But, Khe Sanh held. You held Khe Sanh living in the trenches, constantly subjected to heavy bombardment by mortars, rockets, artillery, recoilless rifle and sniper fire. You held because of your fighting spirit and indomitable courage. May God bless you and return you safely home.

LtCol Andy DeBona USMC ret. who served with M company at Khe Sanh and is now the 3/26 Memorial Scholarship coordinator collected $1300 from various sources. On November 17, 1994 I had the pleasure of presenting a check in this amount to Dr. James D. Riddle, VP for development at American International College in Springfield, MA. Accompanying me was Capt. Enoch J. Blasis, Officer Selection Officer for the Marine Corps Recruiting Station, Western New England, Chicopee, MA.

Dear Ray:

I've been wanting to drop you a line and pass along a condensed version of the book I'm still working on. I had no idea when I started this how difficult it was going to be, but I'm enjoying every minute of it. It has become a new hobby for me, something I look forward to every day.

I have located and interviewed about a dozen of the men who were there, but would like to talk with more. I know there is a small group from second platoon who get together every year, but I've yet to make contact.

Ray, I realize that I lack the professionalism necessary to get my work published and I'm open for suggestions. What would you do? I'm serious when I say that I'm not interested in selling a lot of copies, but I don't want to embarrass myself either. I have 75 pages ready for review as the first section. Two more sections of equal length are to follow in the next year or so. I know that almost every grunt who did Vietnam has written a book, but I want mine to somehow be different, no blood and guts or war hero stuff. I was just an average 19-year-old kid, thousands of miles away from home. I feel my main responsibility should be in documenting Fox 2/3 while I was a part of it.

You have already been such a great help, both with your information, knowledge, and inspiration and I want you to know that I deeply appreciate everything you have done.

Best wishes and God bless,

Ed note: Even if you do not get your work published it will become a part of the Khe Sanh archives. Who knows, maybe 200 years from now a scholar will find your work of sufficient interest to publish all or part of it. You are wise, my friend to tell "your truth" about what you believe or feel happened that May 28th day in 1968.

Dear sir:

I am writing in regards to the November 1994 issue concerning info on Foxtrot Ridge. I don't know if this will clear up the information brother Phil Ball needs, but here goes.

I served with F/2/4 in 1968-69. In December 1968 Fox 2/4 was in a battle from 12-11-68 to 12-19-68. The whole second battalion eventually got involved. We lost 17 Marines and one Corpsman on that ridge. The company commander of F/2/4 was 1st Lt. Gary E. Holtzclaw. I always thought that Foxtrot Ridge was named after Fox 2/4. There was a special ceremony held in January 1969 at Cua Viet to honor our fallen men who fought there in December of 1968 and that was Fox 2/4.

Fox 2/4 was a roving grunt unit continuously in the bush. Fox 2/4 launched operation Purple Martin from Khe Sanh. We fought at 881 North, 881 South, Tiger Tooth, FSB Nevelle, FSB Russell, Con Thien, Dong Ha, Dai Do. Conducted Operations into Laos such as Dawson River, Operation Georgia Tar. The last time that I was at Khe Sanh there was a small faded American flag and it was still flying. Fox 2/4 ran patrols around Khe Sanh into late 1969. We Fought at Hill 715, 691, patrolled around the Rock Pile, Hill 950 and other places I can't recall.

The Quintessence of Deceit

by Richard A. Goodwin
HM2 1/9

I once envisioned in the naiveness of youth
A dream, where I in the world would thrive.
But transformed was I, by the conflict of war,
To the reality that I might just survive.

In the war I was threatened, not secure as before,
Compromising my values along the bloody way,
Convictions and beliefs were destroyed by my will,
I was a traitor to myself every day.

Being taught and believing, that killing is wrong,
When offended you should turn the other cheek.
Abandoned those values and fell prey to false power.

I relinquished my aptitude to be meek.
The real me as I knew, went off to a war,
From the actions that ensued I was killed.
A living body came home, but the real me was dead,
I died, without my blood being spilled.

Now my family often wonders, as well as myself.
Why emotions are not a part of my life.
I buried the pain, which now live as nightmares.
I refused to succumb to emotional strife.

There wasn't time for compassion or regrets.
There were people who needed my care.
My wounded, my dead, were frequent and many,
Emotions had no place in my fare.

So the turmoil of past overide to the present,
Contradictions of self still war in the now.
I yearn to be true, to self, as once was,
The old me wants to live, but doesn't know how.

Thus the conflicts of war, of values, of emotions,
Continue to rage in this person of me.
I know not my feelings from moment to next.
O God, from this deceit, I seek to be free

I want to join the Khe Sanh club. I think it would be great. I am receiving disability and VA compensation, so it will take me a little time to get my monies together. Please let me in the Khe Sanh register.

Ed note: There were obviously a number of battles by various Foxtrot companies of different Regiments, at different places, which retained the name Foxtrot Ridge. It is interesting to note that brother York's unit 2/4 fought on Hills 881 North and South. These two hills saw numerous clashes between Marine and NVA units. See Phil Ball's letter in this issue concerning his "Foxtrot" ridge. Do any of our readers have other "Foxtrot Ridge" stories to share?

Dear Ray:

Enclosed are some drawings I made while in the hospital in Osaka, Japan, May of 68. These are just copies, as the originals are in a bound drawing book that I got from the Red Cross and no way will they ever be removed.

I used to draw a lot and while at Khe Sanh did quite a bit of flak jacket graffiti for the guys in our squad and other squads. This was a popular form of what I'd call self expression or rebellion. My camera and film were destroyed or ripped-off while staged at Khe Sanh Combat Base. In the hospital I drew what I had seen, and remembered. The thoughts and desires to do so were sporadic or non existent at times. I never had any real training in art. I just drew from my memory, mind to hand.

I wish I could have made the reunion, but medical bills and my daughter just graduating from college prevented it. I saw a name of a real good friend on the last reunion roster Arnot, Terry. I think his real name is Barry Steven Arnot. He was in 2nd Plt F 2/26. We met in staging in California and became good friends while there. I last saw him walking off Hill 700, wounded. That was April of 68. He's now a pastor in Maryland.

Was the month of July 1967
Just graduated, turned 18 and was close to heaven
Cause I was sweet on a girl
Who was pretty as could be
But I had a bad case of a thing called
Jealousy
One hot afternoon I called her on the telephone
It rang and it rang
But she was not at home
So I went to the pool where she often went to swim
There she was laughing and talking to Tim
I started to shake and I started to scream
Reached for her hand and I took back my ring
Said "oh my darling I'm gonna show you
I'll join the Marine Corps and I'll make you blue
In less than a week I was at South Caroline
At a place called Parris Island about to lose my mind
Thought to myself now this just can't be true
Sir, Mr. D.I. may I have a word with you, Sir
Don't take this wrong Sir but I don't want to stay
I had no idea that it would be this away
He started to yell and then he started to swing
He knocked me on my butt
I could hear the birdies sing
That was back then, now it's 1995
I went to Vietnam and I thank God I'm still alive
They put me in an outfit up on the DMZ
A little place called Khe Sanh we were making history
Now, in my dreams I remember it well
The fear the death the bravery in that man made hell
People tell me I lost what little sense I had
Guess it may be true, I'm only happy when I'm sad
You ask what happened to that girl from my childhood
I see her now and then and she still looks so good
She walks over to me, hugs my neck and wishes me luck
She married Tim, my psychiatrist
And me, I drive a truck

Dear Ray:

I have about an hour's reading to finish your book. I like it a lot. They mislabeled the Rockpile and 861, huh? (the map layout in the book) Still, very interesting. More action at Khe Sanh than in a 10-floor whorehouse on a good night.

Been to the Living Memorial up on Hwy 97. I have pictures and will send you some when I find them. Extremely moving. I've been up there four times, twice with people who were never in Vietnam. When you're alone with your thoughts there, it feels like nothing I can ever recall. You only have the breeze coming off Mount Shasta to the southeast, four miles as the crow flys. I'm always surprised because there seems to always be a new piece of sculpture, like saying, "Hey, I was there also." The same if each could breathe. I may be gone but I'll never be forgotten, thank you. That's the strongest feeling you get from it.

Semper Fi,
Mel Sopp

PTSD

By Joe Van Eeten
B 1/26

PTSD is like an ambush. It can occur anytime without warning and all of a sudden, boom! Look at what happened to Lewis Puller. Beware!

Denial is one of the symptoms of PTSD. PTSD is not something to be either afraid or ashamed of. People who have experienced combat will have PTSD at some level. Survivor guilt, moral pain are symptoms of PTSD.

Please brothers don't be proud. PTSD kills. Don't think you're beyond the effects.

I am 100% disabled with PTSD. VA certified. To me, it proves that I earned my Combat Action Ribbon.

I did not always know that I had PTSD. I did not receive my disability until 1992. Before PTSD actively struck me, I was a successful land developer and general contractor. I was happily married and have two lovely daughters. I went to church three times a week and was a leader in my community.

Then, in the early 80's I really changed. I began feeling really depressed. Anger and rage, hate became a part of me. I began having flashbacks again. PTSD is like some cruel sniper. By 1982, I had lost my wife, kids, business and God and was in jail. The next ten years were pure hell. During this time, I denied that I had PTSD. I'm OK, I kept hoping. I got it under control.

In 1991 I went to the VA and was subsequently diagnosed 100% PTSD. I am no longer ashamed of my PTSD. It is not fun to have, but it is real and I've learned to deal with it. People who survive single traumatic experiences such as a plane crash have what is called single PTSD. The Vietnam vet, especially combat vets have what is called multiple PTSD. We survived a plane wreck everyday for one year and twenty days. We survived death while our buddies didn't. We all suffer PTSD. Get real with yourself if you're still in denial.

We need to stand by one another and help one another file for PTSD with the VA. We didn't just pay our dues for it. We prepaid. The compensation helps. It's not some giveaway. It's part of our contract when we went in. Our government promised to care for us if our service connected disability caused us to suffer either physically or economically.

I beg you. Do not judge your brothers suffering from active PTSD. The world already did that when we came home. Be compassionate. I think the Khe Sanh vets should establish a PTSD hotline and those rated for PTSD should go on a roster. We can witness for one another and help each other with the necessary filings with the VA. The VA ratings boards are autonomous in each region. Some are real stingy with their ratings. Let's get involved. There are so many of our partners that we still haven't found. Come on guys let's not forget what Semper Fi means. The Khe Sanh Veterans network is one of the better things happening in our lives. It does not require that much effort to do a little more. Let's hump one more hill for a brother in need. Let's carry an extra round. Let's find the rest of us.

Ed note: Joe put his money where his mouth is. He took his initial VA disability payment and bought ten acres of forest land south of Portland Oregon and opened Base Camp Bravo. Bush vets have a safe, clean place to live at Base Camp Bravo. A man gets a camp site for $40 a month, if he can afford it. Now that's affordable housing!

If you are a veteran in search of a community of other veterans, or if you can help us build our base camp in Yamhill, Oregon -

JOE WANTS YOU!

All veterans welcome, especially Vietnam veterans!
Community support needed. Please call today.
Help us bring our warriors all the way home.

I'm beginning to master the fundamentals of the computer on a self-instruction CD ROM. Eventually I plan to use the computer for all my letters, sermons, reports, manuscripts, and so on.

In some senses I feel all of this is really a "chasing after the wind" and meaningless. I am already 57 as of last August the 15th and only have ten to fifteen years more creative life, I feel. There's only today and now. I've always felt this way since leaving Nam. When I returned home I could no longer make any long range plans. This intensified life and the significance of living, gave me an appreciation for art, beauty, love, peace. It's miraculous that I finished the Khe Sanh manuscript. It was not a project, but a compulsion, an attempt to rid myself of "foreign matter" in my soul.

CONGRATULATIONS to the following veterans of the siege who retired with 30 service: Captain B.D. Cole USN who was the Naval Gunfire Liaison officer in the 26th Marines Command Center. Colonel Bruce G. Clarke USA who was the District Advisor in Khe Sanh Ville when the siege began. He personally led the survivors of the attack back along the Poilane road and into the combat base.

We are saddened by the passing of our great friend, Quilles Jacobs who served with B Co. 1/26 during the siege. He died quietly at home on April 19, 1995, following a very long battle with cancer.

SYMBOLS AND SLOGANS: The phrase "eternally bonded" was suggested by Bill Griffith, E 2/26. The wreath symbol was done by a friend of Earl Breeding, E 2/26 and first appeared in our magazine in December 1989. The symbol of a rising sun, two hills and a river was designed by Michael Delaney, E 2/26. It appeared on our magazine in 1991. The phrase "home is where you dig it" appeared outside the bunker of Regimental S-4, Fred McEwen. It was used by our first editor, Ernie Husted. The phrase:

> for those who fight for it, life has a flavor the protected never know" was on a sign in the office of the CO of B Company 3d Recon Bn. in the late months of 67.

Sorry I missed the Las Vegas reunion. I had to fill in for our pastor who visited his family in Germany.

World Aid

World Aid is a non-profit 501(c)3 tax deductible organization based out of Seattle Washington. Our goal is to provide medical relief for those who are in such great need in S.E. Asia.

From June 1990 through June 1992, we worked in the Sepone (Tchepone) District of Laos adjacent to Quang Tri Province, Viet Nam. While there, we helped our beloved Bru with medical help from various volunteers from the states. We had been given a contract by the government of Laos to operate in this area. When our contract expired in June of 1992, the Laotian government refused to renew our contract. Only recently were we able to prevail upon the government and renew our contract to serve the Bru in the Sepone area. The contract is for three years. We were also successful in obtaining a three-and-one-half year contract with the government to provide a 30,000-40,000 word English/Lao medical dictionary as well as a three year contract to provide ophthalmology services in the infamous "Golden Triangle" region of northern Laos. The government of Laos does not pay us for any of this work. Their contract with us merely gives us permission to operate in the areas they agree to, and we are only able to perform specific tasks which are spelled out in the contract. We focus on medical services since there is such a great need in this area.

The average life expectancy for males in Laos is 48 years, for females 51. The average GNP per capita is only $200 per year. There is only one doctor for every 42,000 people. Fifty to sixty percent of the newborns in the rural areas such as Sepone District are dying from preventable diseases within the first year of life.

World Aid's goal is to train and equip at least one village health care worker for each of the almost 300 villages in the Sepone District. Many of these villages are Bru.

World Aid would like to introduce you to our "Adopt A Village" plan. For $25 a month, you, your organization, your special interest group, etc,, can adopt a village and help those who are in dire need. Your investment will provide a village health care worker with the training to meet the rudimentary medical needs of his or her village. It will supply basic medical supplies and training materials for these workers to not only function in their village, but to also train others to assist them. The $25 per month will keep a village supplied with the basic drugs required to meet its daily needs. Simple to treat diseases such as malaria, dysentery and TB are causing most of the deaths. $25 goes a long way in a poor country like Laos.

If you are a medical professional and would be willing to volunteer to teach, then World Aid welcomes you. If you are not a health care professional and would like to come to Laos to see what we are doing, please contact us.

Please, please give our request careful thought. Remember, the Bru were our allies when we were at Khe Sanh. They have never forgotten us. Write or call World Aid at 2442 N.W. Market St. #434, Seattle, WA 98107. Ph. (206) 784-7248 or Fax (206) 784-1120

duty, honor, fate

there are those times i walk down paths which share the sights and sounds of long past nights on distant trails amongst the hungry hounds

when death was my dear brother and blood was in the air and images swirled in my head of them–someone, somewhere as moonlight fell down endless vines no ripples on earth's floor we watched for them, they watched for us awaiting corner's whore and when we met, and when we fought to blend the fear and rage our souls were cleansed, so pure, so white self's trust fixed on the page

That no one was immortal except the each of us and no one would fall prey to death nor pass from dust to dust but those whose names are on the Wall did what we did not do and walked a trail of different sorts that no one wanted to and met their silence early on of duty, honor, fate yet left us here to question why our turns must come so late

Khe Sanh

by Robert Ratkevich
DET A 5COMM

In years to come some old gunny will tell
Of this place calle Khe Sanh on the border of hell
He'll tell some young boot bout the old Corps Marines
The tough fighting men of his mighty Green Machine
He'll tell of the days when the skies rained hot lead
Of the padre who knelt and prayed for our dead
In years to come some old gunny will tell
An he'll clilche the words–the words war is hell
But few will remember and less–less will care
Except for some Jarhead Marines that were there

Twenty–seven seconds for each mortar to fall
From Hill 881N "incoming" we did call
Twenty–seven years and the echo is still there
Those haunting memories, sometimes so hard to bare
Our lives go on, the older and greyer we become
But we remain eternally bonded equally as one

KHE SANH
FIRMLY STAND
THE FEW COURAGEOUS SHARING LIFE IN SERVING VICTORIOUS SEMPER FIDELIS
by Ray Stubbe

Was the month of July 1967
Just graduated, turned 18 and was close to heaven
Cause I was sweet on a girl
Who was pretty as could be
But I had a bad case of a thing called
Jealousy
One hot afternoon I called her on the telephone
It rang and it rang
But she was not at home
So I went to the pool where she often went to swim
There she was laughing and talking to Tim
I started to shake and I started to scream
Reached for her hand and I took back my ring
Said "oh my darling I'm gonna show you
I'll join the Marine Corps and I'll make you blue
In less than a week I was at South Caroline
At a place called Parris Island about to lose my mind
Thought to myself now this just can't be true
Sir, Mr. D.I. may I have a word with you, Sir
Don't take this wrong Sir but I don't want to stay
I had no idea that it would be this away
He started to yell and then he started to swing
He knocked me on my butt
I could hear the birdies sing
That was back then, now it's 1995
I went to Vietnam and I thank God I'm still alive
They put me in an outfit up on the DMZ
A little place called Khe Sanh we were making history
Now, in my dreams I remember it well
The fear the death the bravery in that man made hell
People tell me I lost what little sense I had
Guess it may be true, I'm only happy when I'm sad
You ask what happened to that girl from my childhood
I see her now and then and she still looks so good
She walks over to me, hugs my neck and wishes me luck
She married Tim, my psychiatrist
And me, I drive a truck

Why I Am Who I Am

by Richard A. Goodwin
HM2 1/9

You may wonder why I'm so different
Why I have so many unusual ways
But feel not alone, for I wonder, too
But in answer, this is all I can say
My life before Nam was quite normal
Not a prep course for what I'd encounter
And in your wildest dreams you'd never imagine How intense just living in Nam could be Well, here is part of the story of life in the Nam
Of how I was changed into what I am
Over there you didn't see a tree in a forest
You saw an ambush behind every leaf
There were no fields of grass to romp in Just another place for booby traps and pits
There were spiders and snakes, elephants, tigers, insects
None of which seemed to care much for me
And of course the people of a different culture
Who wanted me to die more than they cared for their own life
So listen to this story and find out who I am
I'm a man changed by the misery of Viet Nam
I have walked through a river of blood
While death tugged at my shirttail
I have slept with the corpse of a friend
Who hours before was my bosom buddy
I have lived in the stench of feces and urine
While rats scampered across my feet
I have held men to young to shave in my arms
While they gasped their very last breath
I have cried at the loss of a comrade
And I wondered why it was him and not me
I have eaten food with blood caked on my hands
While I sat among the wounded and dead
I have endured great hunger for food
While my lips were parched with thirst
I have lived in a hole in the ground with vermin
While my brains seemed to cook in the sun
I have invaded a land that was not my own
And I hated a people I didn't even know
I have had muscles ache from extreme fatigue
While my eyes bore witness to extreme horror
I have run unafraid through artillery and bullets
While wondering if the next round would get me
I have grown faint from fear
While my mind entombed the living nightmares
I have witnessed pain of intolerable degree

The Souvenir

An aviator friend of mine gave me a pair of sunglasses standard issue pilot's type M1A1
He had four kids
was the flight leader would stop and shut down in the LZ at Dong Ha he didn't really want to fly there just weren't any joy rides to Khe Sanh– only artillery rounds and land mines under fire touching down an extra time for the wounded.
He took in whole blood.

Did his four children flash in his eyes was he blind in the sun
when the 152 millimeter artillery round got his tail rotor and sent him spinning into an aircraft revetment broke his blades off like drumsticks sent them splintering through his cabin cut his co-pilot in two shattered his 50 caliber bulletproof vest tore his cockpit out?

I kept those sunglasses for five years had a replacement lens ground they were in a car that got stolen from me taken for a joy ride, abandoned without those sunglasses.

Ed note: Jim was the supply coordinator at Dong Ha during the siege. He helped put together the supplies for the Super Gaggles. The aircraft he refers to is the CH-53 which crashed just outside the 1/26 command bunker. A picture of it is frequently displayed in books which cover the siege. It is amazing how stories evolve. Jim's recollection comes from word he received at Dong Ha. According to what was passed back, a 152 arty round hit the CH-53. I remember it taking an 82mm mortar hit just after lift off. The round hit above the cockpit. I remember the crash and the loud screaming sound of the engine on full power after it crashed. The 1/26 air liaison officer, Jeff McElroy and I ran out of the 1/26 command bunker. He shut the aircraft engine down. I remember the pained look on Jeff as he directed the removal of the two pilots from the crumpled craft. Jeff is a member of our organization. Anyone else have any memories of that incident that they'd like to share? Tell what you remember of that day.

The Other War

You answered a call not meant for our ears,
Heard the cadence of drums and marched through our tears.
You picked up your pack, shouldered your gun,
And boarded the plane...A war had begun.

It ripped through the jungles, roared over the hills,
Made dust out of mountains, maimed loved ones and killed.
Please God, not my husband, please not my lover,
Not my father or son, please God, not my brother.

Such were the prayers sent up hour by hour.
We battled our fears and fought not to cower
Before thoughts of carnage, of blood and of pain.
We awoke every morning to fight on again.

In dreams conjured up by dread in the night,
We saw you blood covered, eyes without sight.
Hearts that awakened us pounding with fear,
Would not quiet when thoughts at last became clear.

It's over now, won by brave men like you.
I look in your eyes, still steady, still true.
Yet sometimes I wonder, in the dark of my night,
Did you know of the war the we had to fight?

Dear Editor:

I hereby present The Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., with a film which will add to the documentation of the Khe Sanh experience. The film is about me meeting two of my former enemies: Thanh and Cao Khai.

Thanh was a second lieutenant with the North Vietnamese Army's 72nd Local Force Battalion during the siege. He was entrenched close to our perimeter, and he survived our firepower. Thanh lives outside of Dong Ha. On a cold, misty day in March, we met one another at Khe Sanh.

In 1968, Khai was the commander of one of the battalions of the 36th Regiment, 308th Division. He remembers well that June 7 day, 1968. Khai ordered the ambush that my second platoon walked into. Our losses were so extensive that our platoon was deactivated. I was one of the serious casualties. Swedish television filmed Khai and myself at the ambush site which is near Liberty Bridge and the Thu Bon River, 25 kilometers southwest of Da Nang.

Swede and Hung

A two-man team, reporter and cameraman filmed me during the first part of my visit. Though the executive producer, I was given no say as to the film's final outcome. It was shown on Swedish television last spring. To get a full grasp of the film one has to not only understand the language, but also the Swedish culture and social history.

Approximately 50 percent of the 52-minute documentary film is straightforward. But the rest of the film is made up of the sly, subjective reporter's efforts to entertain the viewers. In doing so, he derides and insults me and frequently takes my words and sentences out of context to convey meanings different from what I originally said or intended.

The film looks good. The thrill of the journey, the fantastic people overshadows the bad parts of the film. After the film crew departed, I took a train from Hanoi to Lao Cai, on the Chinese border. We ascended the vast Hoang Lien mountains. Viet Nam's highest summit, Fan Si Pan at 10,311 feet, towers above the rest.

For me this was to be my ultimate act of reconciliation, I would climb this mountain with my former enemy. Nguyen Thien Hung was a tank commander with the 12th Regiment, 312th Division. He had fought us and the ARVNs and was now my guide and partner for my ascent of Fan Si Pan.

After a hard climb, at 7,000 feet we cleared the clouds. We were hit by strong winds and rain. The climb grew more arduous and treacherous. We crested the summit and were hit by hurricane strength winds and rain that seemed to whip at me, lashing at me. Dense, dark clouds forced our quick retreat, back down. The demanding climb drew Hung and I together. We became close. We laughed and cursed together. Slept side by side. We came to depend on one another during those four days. My four-day climb with Hung will forever remain one of my fondest, most treasured, incredible life experiences.

I have journeyed now to Viet Nam three times. I have met a good number of our former enemy. They had a cause, they sacrificed, they won.

We, Khe Sanh vets, believe we are special, we saw a lot of shit—"We did Khe Sanh." All well and true. But I believe that the ones who really did Khe Sanh were the NVA. My wish is that in the near future, we, The Khe Sanh Veterans Inc., will cooperate with our former enemy so that we will at last know and understand the complete history of Khe Sanh.

Beyond The Call Of Duty

March 1968, Khe Sanh

Certainly, there were countless acts of heroism at Khe Sanh, but few match this one. Many accounts of personal bravery and self-sacrifice have never been recorded, lost to failing memories and the passing of time. Mine is different. This story is forever etched in the minds of many who served with B Battery, 1/13. This is the whole truth and only slightly embellished.

I got word that my stateside buddy, Karl MacMackins had just arrived at Khe Sanh and was with Lima company 3/26. Lima was at the northwest end of the combat base. My battery was at the opposite end of the base. I had been with my battery since the beginning of the siege. We were less than a mile apart, but it might as well have been a thousand. Karl got word to me that he wanted to do a secret mission. Even the Lion of Khe Sanh did not know about it. Shoot fire, the CIA didn't know. My sergeant, a fella by the name of Hewitt, gave me eighteen hours leave to visit my buddy. His parting words of encouragement were memorable. "Get outta my sight! And, don't get yourself blown away. I don't feel like writing any more letters to the parents of stupid privates." Little did he know what we really had planned.

By this time, the siege was so old that I was brain dead. Evidence: I began covering the length of the base in broad daylight. I scurried from trench-to-hole-to-bunker-to-trench, on and on I made my way Westward. Horace Greely would have been proud. I took incoming twice, the second time it was real close. The rocket exploded in the hole next to the one that had just swallowed my skin and bones, but what almost killed me was the clumsy gyrene who dove in on top of me. Foxhole intelligence is sometimes stunning. "Hey, what are you doing here?" he asked with a bewildered look on his face.

"Providing padding for you," I quipped. "Now, do you mind getting your number 12s out of my face?" After a short round of "ride-em-cowboy," Texas style, I shook him loose and scrambled to another nearby trench line. I kept asking if anyone knew where Corporal MacMackins was and got replies such as, "Who is this headcase, what in the world are you doing here?" After stumbling around for what seemed like an eternity, someone finally muttered, "Yeah, I know him. He's right over there. He must be commandant or you must be dense, risking your hide to come up here." Being a private and the guy being an officer, I bit my tongue and did not show him my superior intellect by responding.

Seeing that Kentuckian, MacMackins brought tears to my eyes. We hugged and slapped each other's flak jackets until we were choking from the red dust. He was the only one who appreciated my bravery in reaching him. What a great guy! We retired to his hooch to plot and plan the commando raid.

As soon as it got dark we made our way over to where the old mess tent had been, and more important, the collapsed bunker which still held some culinary treasures just waiting to be liberated. Our objective was the sugar and sour cherries. Being fairly astute, I asked, "You gonna make a pie or something?" He pulled rank and gave me a look of exasperation.

"Brew," he said with a sneer. Thinking we would take the supplies to the Bru Montagnards, I became subdued. The raid went off without a hitch. Later that night I learned the real reason for our secret mission. It wasn't for the Montagnards at all. Given a secret formula, I could make cherry wine for medicinal and other purposes, like morale and such. I dashed back to my area under the cover of an early morning fog. With my stash of supplies held tightly to my chest I returned to my bunker. Chief, a native American Indian from Pocatello, Idaho shared my rat hole of a bunker. Lacking my newly gained insight, he said, "What are you gonna do with all that trash?" I revealed my secret.

"Brew," I said.

"Montagnards?" he responded.

"No. Medicine." He must have been part medicine man or something, because he immediately caught my drift. We artillery boys aren't as dumb as we look.

"How you gonna make it?

"Secret formula. All I need is a five gallon water can...full of water."

After he got up off the deck having fallen over in laughter, he replied, "Sure Spider, and I'm gonna make some pheasant under glass." He couldn't fool me. There wasn't a pheasant within five miles of Khe Sanh because of all the bombing and I told him so.

"There isn't that much water in our entire area. We only get a half canteen a day."

"Well, somebody someplace has water. We just gotta find it."

The next day Chief furtively filched five gallons of water from who knows where. He never would say. "I ain't risking my sugar and cherries on gook water," I told him. He assured me that it wasn't gook water.

Besides, he said, the fermentation process would purify it. So, after much debate I committed my ingredients to the mysterious water. Day after day we hovered over our secret, until one day someone asked me how it was coming along. Our secret had gotten out. I thought to myself that I was doomed and before I got court martialed, I'd strangle Chief. Chief was cool about it.

"Don't worry," he assured me. "No one's gonna tell the Gunny...they promised."

"Why should they promise," I rejoined.

"Cause they won't get any iffen they do," he said.

"Well, no stinken sardines!" We're gonna get caught. It'll get confiscated and we'll be shot at dawn," I said and pouted. But, Chief was right. The secret never got to the higher ups and the days turned into weeks and the stuff started fermenting out of the top of the can.

The Gunny was doing his rounds one day and asked me. "Loehrer, what the hell is that stench? Change your socks will you?" Indignantly, I reminded him that I hadn't worn socks since the last pair rotted off a month ago. He wandered away cursing the supply sergeant. Though very much a Marine, he obviously was a man of low culture. Imagine the ignorance of the man. Confusing my fine wine with the stench of old socks. Inferior upbringing no doubt. Wait till you need some medication, I thought to myself.

As the days stretched into weeks, the level of anticipation grew among the inner circle who shared my secret. What a laugh, watching the gun grunts trying to whisper above the sounds of incoming. Chief and I grew very nervous. Then, one morning it was Gone! Gone! I blamed Chief. "What happened to it Chief?" I said accusing him. "Where is it?" He swore he didn't drink it and didn't know who stole it. He laughed at my accusations until he was crying.

"I don't know who stole it, but if you wanna know who drank it go outside and look around. Everybody who had any is sicker than a dog. Go look. Anyone who's green around the gills drank some." He busted a gut laughing.

Chief and I could never agree on the cause of the sickness. I said it was the water. He says it was the recipe. Just after the incident I saw a water buffalo just outside our area that was painted with a sign saying "Non Potable water." In any case, I hope that everyone who drank my wine has amoebic dysentery for the rest of his life.

A FEW MOMENTS OF JOY WITH HIS NEW BOOTS

From Pacific Stars And Stripes
Monday 15 April 1968 pg. 11

By John Randolph, The Los Angeles Times

Khe Sanh — "It was the saddest thing of all...to have to cut his new boots off..."

Pale and haggard from lack of sun and sleep, wearing an overnight stubble and a stained and sweaty flak jacket, Lt. Donald J. Magilligan stood in the underground medical bunker and shook his head slowly and heavily.

His voice softened and deepened by compassion, the young but very tired Navy doctor had been telling the story of 19-year-old Jonathan Spicer, a laughing, round-faced little Marine whose death, even by the harsh standards of this place, was both heroic and pathetic.

And when Magilligan came to the part about those wonderful new boots that Spicer had wanted for so long, and had such a short time to wear, the tears welled up in his eyes.

Unusual

Private Spicer, the rarest kind of Marine—a conscientious objector—died recently in the U.S. Naval Hospital at Yokosuka, Japan. It was the tragic end of a desperate, week-long struggle by Navy doctors to save his life from shell fragments that hit him while he was serving as a stretcher-bearer at Khe Sanh.

Although "Marine" and "conscientious objector" are a contradiction in terms, young Spicer, son of a Methodist minister in Miami, Fla., had nevertheless been allowed to enlist in the Corps as a volunteer. And though his stipulation—that he not have to risk taking a life—was never officially conceded, the Marines solved the problem informally with common sense by "passing the word" and refusing to make an issue of it. When the shooting started, his outfit, 1stBn., 26th Marines, simply loaned him to the Navy medics for stretcher duty. In battered and beleaguered Khe Sanh, that is a duty almost as important as shooting—and even more dangerous.

"He was one of the bravest men in Khe Sanh," said Lt. Magilligan, a warmhearted Irishman from Brooklyn. "It was always the wounded first with him."

"And those boots...how he had wanted to get those boots...you were here yourself...you remember how happy he was..."

The Boots

Khe Sanh is a small place, full of chance meetings and coincidences and I had been there when Spicer got his boots.

It happened this way:

About noon, an enemy mortar shell had wounded a young woman freelance correspondent—Jurate Kazickas, 24, of New York and Chicago, a long-haired, laughing and unusually good-looking girl. Steel fragments had caught her in the forearm and lower leg and in the middle of the left side of the part she sits down with.

Word of her being wounded raced around Khe Sanh, and I got to the bunker just in time to see her and talk for a moment. Then a four-man stretcher crew led by Pvt. Spicer hoisted her up the wooden bunker steps and raced her at a run to a big medical evacuation helicopter that had just touched down, rotors roaring for a fast takeoff. Although the 150 feet from the bunker to the pad are well known to the communist gunners, and comprise by far the deadliest patch of ground in all Khe Sanh, Jurate was lucky. The Viet Cong didn't shoot this time, and the helicopter soared up and away.

The stretcher crew dashed back to "Charlie Med"—as C Co. 3rd Medical Bn. is called in Khe Sanh—and Spicer came clattering down the bunker steps. Suddenly, he seemed to remember something. With a quick dive, he reached behind a big metal tub used for old field dressings, waste, torn uniforms and castoff field gear cut off wounded Marines, and pulled out a pair of unusually tiny but perfectly new and authentic Army green jungle boots.

Spicer was grinning from ear to ear. I glanced at his feet and saw why. He was wearing the sleazy black high-topped sneakers issued to Vietnamese soldiers—obviously the only small size tropical boots that Spicer, a real half-pint had been able to get. He held the gleaming new ones up in his hands, almost dancing with pleasure. Then he suddenly noticed me watching him. His grin vanished.

For Friendship

"I think these were an extra pair she had with her pack," he explained. "See—the laces aren't cut. They would be if these were the ones Mr. Finnegan had cut off her with the surgical shears. She must have taken the others and forgot these."

Then he asked me if I would take them back to her when I left.

But friendship is one thing and suicide is another. The act of leaving Khe Sanh is by far the most dangerous moment of any visit—a desperate sprint, often under spine-chilling fire, for an airplane or helicopter that can hardly wait to take off. I was to leave the next day, and since half-a-dozen correspondents have been wounded on such dashes, I have mentally resolved to dump every last thing I had if it would help me reach that aircraft in time. Jurate's boots had no part in that program, and I told Spicer so.

He was enormously relieved, and his Christmas—morning grin blossomed out again like a big neon sign.

"Mr. Finnegan," he called out across the bunker, "the correspondent here says he can't take the lady's boots back to her. Is it all right if I keep them?"

"Sure," replied Finnegan with a smile. "Hope they fit."

Pure Joy

In a moment the sneakers were off and Jurate's boots were on—a perfect fit.

We talked for a moment. He laced up the boots, using a fancy pattern. I told him he should get some of the new style braided yellow nylon laces—they are springy and lace up and pop open more easily than the government kind. He said he thought he had some with his stuff at Dong Ha and would get a friend to bring them up as soon as possible.

I watched the funny, happy, little Marine hopping about, warming us all with his own joy. Then I left.

About two hours latter, they carried in a wounded artilleryman. His heart stopped. The doctors massaged it back to life. Then Spicer and his stretcher crew raced him to another helicopter and started back to the bunker. This time the Viet Cong were quicker. A heavy shell came straight into the center of that deadly pathway. Spicer upright and running, had no protection. Survivors carried him, unconscious, and literally dying, back down into the bunker.

Magilligan and Finnegan and their assistants managed to push death back.

When Spicer's own heart stopped, Magilligan and Finnegan massaged it back to life.

Then the man who carried so many stretchers was himself carried back along that deadly path to another helicopter—then to Dong Ha... Da Nang...Yokosuka...and death.

Ed note: There an inaccuracy in this story. Spicer was not liked in his unit when it became known that he was a C.O.. Ray Stubbe "saved" him by making him his chaplin's assistant. When the siege started all the chaplins' assistants became stretcher bearers. Every one of the chaplins' assistants at Khe Sanh was Killed-In-Action. Spicer received the Navy Cross posthumously. Father Driscoll, who was a stretcher bearer with Spicer that day, was also gravely wounded. Does anyone else have any memories of this man Spicer? Read on, for more on this story.

Dear Ernie,

You've asked me to write some words about the Las Vegas reunion last July. Several months have gone by and with them, the intensity of my feelings and impressions. Caught up now in the daily humdrum of my life—researching and writing, taking kids to school, seeing friends, working out—sometimes it's hard to believe those three days ever happened. Just like time and time again, I still can't understand how I ended up in Vietnam and ultimately Khe Sanh. Experiencing the war as a combat correspondent profoundly affected my life, but don't ask me to tell you how. One day I hope to be able to put it into words. One thing for sure, the shrapnel I picked up in Khe Sanh on March 8, 1968—especially the pea-sized metal I can feel rolling around my ankle—is a constant reminder that the war was—and still is—very real to me.

I am grateful that Rev. Ray Stubbe somehow tracked me down two years ago and told me about the Khe Sanh Vets. When I heard about this reunion, I hesitated about going but Bill O'Conner reassured me and indeed, he and his wife, along with John Kaheny and so many others made me feel welcome.

I wanted to go to the reunion because in April I went back to Khe Sanh and the emotions that brief visit stirred up overwhelmed me. And just like it had been for the past 25 years, when I came home, I could not talk about the war to anyone. People would ask perfunctory questions, but I could tell they weren't really interested. I never sought out any veterans all those years for the obvious reason that I was not a soldier. More likely though, I don't think I ever really wanted to relive the war.

But standing there on the barren nothingness that is Khe Sanh today as the red dirt stung my eyes, I felt such a connection, and I knew I had to find someone who would understand—without ever having to say a word. The vets of Khe Sanh.

In some ways, sitting in the chilly meeting rooms, I was the reporter again—observing and listening to life stories—like I did in Vietnam. I still have all my battlefield notebooks, filled with hundreds of names and hometowns and quotes about the politics of war, the horror of it, the fear, the loneliness, but also the pride of duty and courage. The warriors—they were all so young! I used to joke that I fell in love a dozen times a day out there in the boonies with the best. And they were the best! And I tried to tell their stories so people at home might understand what war was like and hasten its end.

But the stories were so different now. I was stunned to hear how many men admitted to broken marriages, alcohol and drug abuse, job instability and how many had suffered from PTSD. But how heartening that men could open up that way and share the pain and finally tell of recovery and rehabilitation. The men always took care of their buddies in battle. What so impressed me back then was how they loved one another! And once again, I saw that same compassion and caring as life sagas were revealed. I have the feeling you will never stop helping each other.

I was interested to see that for some, Vietnam is still the peak experience of their lives. In truth, nothing else in life could ever compare, rightly or wrongly. For some the war has given their lives meaning and purpose and it was gratifying to see how many work with vets in trouble. And then there were the successful business executives who emphasized that not everybody who survived Khe Sanh was still running around in camouflage and combat boots. But to me that's what made the gathering so special. Such a diverse group. You came from all over with the baggage of 25 years, men with different jobs and careers or no jobs at all, and in an instant, were equalized because of a year in time. And what a year.

I loved hearing those "war stories" and the laughter. God knows there were so many crazy and weird moments in Khe Sanh and hey, if you couldn't laugh, you had to cry. With every tall tale I could see how many memories were being stirred and I'm sure there were some long, late nights in Vegas when the time machine really got rolling. And once again, I thought to myself, oh how young we were then!

I had just turned 25 when I choppered into Khe Sanh for my fateful 24 hours there. I was on assignment for WOR Radio in New York to interview local Marines on how they were coping with the constant bombardment. Some of you at the reunion said you remembered seeing me (though I was a brunette then, by the way) and some even recalled serving me coffee! My feeble mind raced trying to remember the faces and names and truthfully, I've forgotten so much. But I had no trouble at all connecting with Dr. Ed Feldman who operated on me and removed that infamous chunk of lead from the base of my spine—as I prefer to describe it in my prim old age. What a hero he was with all the lives he saved and the emotion he showed in his words moved all of us.

But I could not help thinking of all those men who were not there. Who were not anywhere. In the end, I was left with such sadness because so many died in Khe Sanh, in Vietnam and we as nation will never stop asking ourselves—why? Leaving the reunion, I was filled with very conflicted emotions. As one vet said to me, "I don't know how many more of these I can take. It's too heavy." So many memories were stirred, so many suppressed feelings came to the surface. Maybe guys who have been in therapy over the years deal with it better. I'm not so sure I want to replay everything I saw in the two years I covered the war.

But Khe Sanh was unique. I may not have any right to label myself a Khe Sanh vet but I was there, I saw, I felt and walked away with a lifelong souvenir or two. The men who fought and died, who fought and lived are heroes—one and all—and I am proud to have met you and in the slightest of ways, shared your moment in history, your camaraderie, and even the terrible fire from the North.

Just last weekend I was wearing my red "Siege and Sacrifice" Khe Sanh sweatshirt when I went to a small grocery store in North Salem, New York. A fella in a baseball cap with a belly hanging comfortably over his jeans came up to me and said, "Welcome home," and I thought I was going to cry. It turned out he was a Marine in Vietnam in 1969. Of course, he assumed my husband was the Khe Sanh vet. But then he began to talk and talk and I just let him.

And that's what the reunion was about and why it was great. There was so much to say and at last, someone was listening.

Khe Sanh will always be more than a place. It was an experience like no other in the annals of the Vietnam war. Forgive me for rhetorically including myself but the Khe Sanh experience may have scarred us (literally for some) but in a profound sense it also transformed us, and every now and then, I think, especially after Las Vegas, even enriched us. And I'll repeat what a nurse said to me when I asked her if she regretted having gone to Vietnam. And she said it took a long while for her to reconcile it all but now she's glad she was there. "Because," she said, "Vietnam made me who I am today and I like who I am today."

What a legacy of war!

Love,
Jurate Kazikcas

Ed note: Sister, you are a Khe Sanh vet. No more apologizing, please.

REMEMBERING, NAME BY NAME

By Ray Stubbe

Some come, O Lord, this day to pause,
Remember our fallen, remember our cause,
Memorial Day of '94:

Here, precisely here, You're here!
In wars, on crosses, You're always near—
Our hurt, our heart, our groan—Your own.

Some are here, hearts full of pride:
They gave their all—life, love, and died.
Greater love hath no one than this:
To live Your life is to follow bliss.

Some are here—filled with anguish and pain,
In black hole graves, their spirit remains.
God shall wipe away all tears,
Shall comfort us, hold us, and calm all our fears.

Some with anger and rancor are spewing,
Primeval volcanic erupts, exploding—
Pierced, battle's incoming violence, seared—
Souls, branded, marked, feared.

Here, precisely here, You're here!
Perhaps unfelt, perhaps unknown.
In wars, on crosses, You're always near—
Our hurt, our heart, our groan—Your own.

In aircraft crashed, in planes of fire.
In jungle heat—mud, muck, and mire.
On sandy shores, in urban walls
In night of fright, in hurt heart halls.

Here, precisely here, You're here!
Perhaps unfelt, perhaps unknown.
In wars, on crosses. You're always near—
Our hurt, our heart, our groan—Your own.

In shattered body pieces—no peace.
In unhealing wounds of no release.
In results of warfare still unfolding,
In silent death, church bells still tolling.

On a heap of ashes an old woman gropes
Through her fingers pass the dust of burn hopes,
A serviceman writes home for some clothes for his friend:
A tribal child he's there to defend.

Here, precisely here, You're here!
Perhaps unfelt, perhaps unknown,
In wars, on crosses, You're always near—
Our hurt, our heart, our groan— Your own.

War is not soldiers who kill other soldiers,
War is not numbers on papers in folders;
War is civilians—in deep anguish ensnared,
War is the young man forever impaired.

Today, O Lord, we remember our dead.
O may, we pray, our life be led,
To honor these dead by serving the living;
As they gave so fully, may we be so giving.

We all recall the name of another:
A friend, a father, a husband, a brother,
O Lord, we place them in Your hand
Though fallen, they there will always stand.

Ken in a storm cloud who charges the fight;
He yells like a Tarzan, so wild and so strong.
He cares for his men through the terrors of night.
Fallen in ambush, his body doth lie;
Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by?

John is a cirrus cloud—so fleecy, so long.
He jumps in a river, although not a swimmer.
He drowns—saving tribesmen who struggle, who throng
He dies saving others—his cloud is so high.
Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by?

A cumulus cloud is James, Sergeant Major
He visits and cares for his troops—his demeanor
A shrieking rocket, Valkyrie's cry: Die!
Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by?

A comforting shade-cloud in battle's heats
Is Jonathan, a Conscientious Objector
He carries our wounded, many days, many weeks
When others take cover, beside them he'll lie
He covers their body, lays down his life
A mortar round kills him-there-in that strife
Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by?

Your sky, O Lord, all clouds contain
The bright ones, the dark ones, those that cause rain.
So hearts of pain, of pride, of fury
Within Your heart of love we bury.
Bless and keep us in Your way.
O Lord, Amen. Today we pray.

Ed note: Ray is referring to specific individuals who died at Khe Sanh. Ken is Kennith "king" Claire, John is John Hinson, James is James Gaynor (see cover) and Jonathan is Jonathan Spicer who received the Navy Cross posthumously (see Memoirs).

JAKE

Quiles Ray Jacobs died of Agent Orange-related cancer at home in Compton on April 19, 1995. His passing came, coincidentally, 27 years after the conclusion of the Siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Quiles was born, enlisted and returned to Compton. In the years following his honorable discharge, he became a highly successful general contractor, civic leader, and active member of the Khe Sanh Veterans organization. He was known to his family, friends, business associates and brother Khe Sanh vets, as a kind, loving and concerned man who was severely tested throughout his life.

His individual acts of courage and heroism, from the DMZ to the Arizona Territory, are legendary within the ranks of B 1/26. In addition to the Silver Star, his personal decorations include: the Bronze Star and Navy Commendation Medals with Combat "V," Purple Heart Medal with Gold Star, the Republic of Viet Nam Cross of Galentry with Bronze Star.

This fallen Warrior will be missed, his place in line difficult to fill. Sergeant Jacobs was escorted to his final rest in Inglewood Park Cemetery, Inglewood, California by his Khe Sanh Company Commander, Ken Pipes, Lieutenant Colonel USMC ret., and Reserve Gunnery Sergeant Patrick Fitch; friend and squad mate in B 1/26 during the siege.

The 'Snake'

by Michael O'Hara
B 1/26

When he arrived on Hill 881
I wondered about this big black man with a gun
His eyes had a sparkle apart from the rest
Soon I would learn he was one of the best
He was younger than I and had more stripes
Soon we would both engage in the fight
As the days wore on I listened and learned
From this big black man whose stripes he had earned
We soon left the hill to enter the fight
Soon thereafter we would both earn a stripe
Through dysentery, leeches, rats and the rain
With the big black man there was never disdain
With the loss of the Third our hearts would be broken
Our next patrol would only be token
He would be shot across the back
Only to turn and help pick up the slack
Three men down needing medevac
My help would be this man shot in the back
In little over a week, with his dressing still bound
We would return to the hill where our brothers would be found
And leading the squad as he had done in the past
We beat the NVA back, finally, at last
And now years later our love has grown
Far beyond what could ever be known
And after suffering through all of that strife
A hidden enemy now threatens his life
I no longer have bullets left in my gun
I only shoot prayers to the Almighty One
When you see shooting stars in the heavens at night
Be assured I am engaged in the fight
Committed to fight whatever it may take
To protect my friend they all call "The Snake"

A Message from the President

For a number of reasons, The Khe Sanh Veterans Association is a very special organization. One of the most obvious reasons is that we are the survivors of the longest single battle of the war in Vietnam. I am reminded of a remark made by Ken Pipes some years ago when we were talking about increasing our rather small membership. He stated, "Look, there just weren't that many of us to begin with!" The bottom line is that ours is a small but very unique group. Although our members have much in common, I am always amazed at the variety of the experiences described by our members in our newsletter.

The Khe Sanh experience cannot be evaluated in the traditional terms. Length of time spent at Khe Sanh varied, individual by individual, from a single day to almost a year, yet even one day could bring you the experience of a lifetime. It was a battleground without a front line or a safe area in the "rear." We had trench lines, but it wasn't at all like the fields of France in World War I. We had tremendous bombing and shelling but it wasn't at all like Iwo Jima. We were cut off by road but it wasn't at all like the Frozen Chosin. Depending upon where and when you served at Khe Sanh, your experience probably reflected a little bit of all those wars plus a whole lot more.

Khe Sanh possesses a haunting beauty, but there is a great deal of blood in that red clay. Perhaps what really binds us together are the things we all share in common. All of us experienced the knowledge that, although we were surrounded by nearly 40,000 NVA soldiers, we would never yield the field. No matter how bad the situation got, we did what needed to be done. While many on the home front worried about our survival we had tremendous trust in each other. We never doubted our resolve. Unfortunately many of our compatriots proved our resolve by contributing their own blood to the red clay of Khe Sanh.

We stand today with the knowledge that we are still a special group, sharing today the friendships that were formed by fire and steel so many years ago. Come to Philadelphia and renew those friendships and learn more about your organization and its future.

A Message from the Editor

Moths to the Flame

I'm pleased with this issue. The Fall '95 issue was a rushed job but with this one, I feel I got it right. I'm also pleased to welcome aboard David Rogers as an Associate Editor. Dave will do articles on the history of the different units that served at Khe Sanh. In this edition, he writes about Echo company 2/26. Earle Breeding provided the information on E company. If you would like your unit profiled, contact Dave at ph. (817) 460-7706.

I'm sure some of the articles or poems contained in this issue will provoke intense feelings in many of you. This is not by design on my part. I essentially print everything that comes in. If you are moved by an article or work of poetry, why not share your thoughts with us. I ask that you do not attack the writer, for he is only sharing his personal feelings on the subject of his choice. There are instances of factual inaccuracies. This is the way the writer remembers it, and therefore a legitimate part of our history. If you are moved by an article or poem, why not contact the writer and share with him. Writers are very insecure and need encouragement. If you do not have the will or where-with-all to write, at least you can encourage our writers to continue. Which brings me to the title of this piece.

It is very difficult for many of our writers to commit themselves, to expose themselves, "for all to see." I accept the fact that I must beg, cajole, and harass our writers to "put your story down on paper." Brother's have no problem telling me all over the phone, but freeze-up when it comes time to do the writing. This is due, in my opinion, to the fact that the subject of Khe Sanh and Vietnam are "tapes" that we're used to playing in our heads, but the written expression of those thoughts and feelings is something we're not used to. Speaking for myself, it was not until I wrote about my experiences in Vietnam that I began to really understand the enormity of that time and its impact on my life. Someone once asked me flippantly how much of a difference Khe Sanh made in my life. I responded: "Sine qua non." (Latin—without which nothing).

There was an error on the reunion notice mailed to you. The Zip code for our Treasurer is 92590.

This might well be the last magazine that you will receive if you have not paid your dues. We have struggled as long as we can to give this out to everyone on the list, but as you can see from the size of this one, it is unrealistic to expect generous donors to keep covering our shortfall in membership dues. We have always allowed those who cannot afford dues to obtain a waiver simply by sending in their dues notice to our Treasurer with the statement that they cannot afford dues at this time. There are a number of generous brothers who specifically make added donations to cover those in need. But, if you cannot even take the time to write to our Treasurer we can only assume that you are not interested.

Ernie and Family:

Salutations to you and yours my friend. May the season enrich your life and may you win the day and every day throughout the year! Cheers!

And, to all the brothers, I'd like to say:

My heart goes out to all of you. May you all have a bright future with the KSV. I'm broke most of the time, but I can from time to time send poems. I remember those nights I stood watch at Khe Sanh, on nights when I can't sleep. I will send what I can to make us stronger as a unit. I know it will get better. Thanks for remembering us who are locked in. I miss my KSV magazine and pray that we will once again have it. Yes, I know it takes MPC for it. Marines never did get much pay. Right now I'm getting even less. Please remember that my prison no longer uses the name Tamal. It's not easy getting mail into prison. Sure wish I could get Ernie's book "Macho Man," but, unless it goes from a book dealer, I don't get it. Anything you can do for me, Ernie?

P.S. I've got two nephews in the Marines, one a PFC on the USS Wasp (Bosnia mission) and the other a LCPl at Lejeune NC.

Ed note: I'll see what I can do about the book, Manny.

I am sending some long overdue donations. I was at Khe Sanh April, May and part of June 1967. I was a section chief CPL with F/2/12. In May of 1967, 3 of our 105 MM howitzers were helilifted onto Hill 881S. I was with one of them. Consequently, I spent my last 3 weeks in country on 881S. I rotated to the World mid-June 67.

Keep up the good work.

Dear Vince:

Here is my money for my 1996 dues and an extra $10 for a special entry in the directory for my friend Frank Nelson Uzzell, Delta Co. 1/26. KIA 1/27/68 at the Water Point outside Charlie Co. lines while taking out a 50. cal. that was shooting at the aircraft that landed at the Khe Sanh airbase. Frank was from Columbia, Tenn., 718 Woods Dr. 38401-4938

Thank you and Semper Fi

Dear Ernie:

I received my copy of the latest KSV newsletter and spent an enjoyable evening reading it. Campbell Buttry did a great job on the cover. I was really sad to hear of Jake's passing. One thing's for sure, his memory will live on long after the days of all those who served with him by way of the interview you taped with him and Mike O'Hara on your reunion video. Jake's just moved on to the next phase of his being—who knows where. But, it'll be suffering-free, wherever it is.

With regard to Mike Harris' letter asking for financial support (he of the World Aid charity), I intend to take the magazine into work and show Mike's letter to Craig, the Operations Manager and brains behind our Indochina Travel tour product. Our company not only takes tours to and through the various cities and provinces, but we support a few charities over there, e.g., the street children's orphanage in Saigon, which is run on a shoestring budget by an Irish lady. We've only just added Laos to our tour (Vientiane), and it might be that Craig will be interested in Mike's request. No guarantees—but it's worth a try.

When I was sifting through my things last weekend, I came across a folder with all your letters—which go back some three years (and letters from Ray Stubbe and Talis Kaminskis) and I spent a few hours reading through them all again. I ended up laughing, because in some of your letters you were very obviously suffering from chronic question-answering fatigue, from the barrage of questions I used to throw at you! And it was really something reading through Talis's writings again—God, some of his work is just so moving. What a talent that guy has. His PTSD has certainly been a mixed "blessing"—whilst he's obviously laboring under its great weight, it's given him a gift he might not otherwise have had. He writes straight from the soul. Anyway, I'll sign off for now. I hope you and Pat had a cool Yule and a Happy New Year.

Dear Mr. Griffith:

Please find enclosed a cheque in the amount of $40 to cover my membership dues plus an additional donation. The balance can be used as you see fit, perhaps to defray the additional postage costs of sending your excellent newsletter to the United Kingdom. I look forward to receiving another year's fascinating reading.

Yours Sincerely,

Dear Sir:

My brother Max Nelson was killed at Khe Sanh in February 1968. I got a lifetime subscription in his memory a few years ago. I am impressed with the quality and appearance of the new, improved newsletter. Enclosed is a donation in hopes you can continue to publish it.

I've thought about taking a trip to Vietnam someday. Do you know of anyone who has gone back to see the place? If you know of anyone that could offer advice or assistance about this, I'd appreciate getting their name and address.

Thank you,

Vince:

I recently visited Philly—stayed at the Franklin Wyndham or Wyndham Franklin Plaza. Easy to get to by vehicle ($8) and close to the heart of town. Good prices. Say hi to Jim Wilkinson, Ray Stubbe and Ernie Spencer when the board meets. I was XO 1/26 with Jim. July 67 to Jan. 68. Our mutual friend Jim Nash decided I should be re-assigned and I departed Khe Sanh just before TET.

Warm regards,

Dear Ernie:

I enjoyed our telephone conversation last week and I will contact Jim Epps and Ski about an anthology of Khe Sanh Vet poetry. I'd be happy to put some money toward it and see any proceeds go to the organization. I'm also enclosing a check for $250 for help with the cost of publishing The Khe Sanh Veteran.

I have also enclosed the poem about Hank Norman we discussed and some recollections about Hank and Kim Johnson. I am sending a copy of both to Ray for his archives.

I'll call when I hear more about the poetry. Thanks for your help and the tough duty in taking up the Editor's job.

MARION HENRY NORMAN KHE SANH-1968

by Chuck Patterson
3rdMarDiv

Ca Lu, March 1968

They took your life
As if it belonged to them.
If only they had told me
They needed a life,
I would have given them mine.

I wonder
What they did with your life?
Perhaps,
If they don 't need it now,
They'd give it back.

The World, 1983

I saw you dead
But never buried.
In my heart you've lived,
Laughing, smiling Hank.
I would keep you there forever,
In a memorial more perfect
Than hands could build.

Finding an end to my war
I can mourn you now,
And, in sadness, leave
This loving, painful
Magic caretaking.
So I may live
At peace.

To celebrate your death,
To elevate your life,
And its conclusion,
Which was neither sweet
Nor fitting.
Duty's harshest price
For which the consideration
Should have been honor.

Ernie:

Received my Khe Sanh newsletter on Wed. 6, Dec. When I saw it, I was pleased for 2 reasons: 1) to get the newsletter 2) I knew you were "back". Without reading the contents, I could tell by the cover, print, etc. that you were back in charge. Thanks.

As soon as I saw the newsletter, I said to myself that I have to get the Poilane papers to you, and I will. On Dec. 8, I got your note inquiring as to the papers. I will have it to you by January. I'll probably finish it over my Christmas vacation.

I'm also happy to hear that the reunion this year will be in Philadelphia. I plan to attend and look forward to seeing you and many others.

I have a kid in school named Khe Sanh Burch. His dad was with 1/9. Spoke to the father a couple of times. He shows no pride in being a Marine and shows no interest in our organization. His kid gets in trouble a lot.

One of our English teachers has a remedial reading class for special education kids. They found Ray's "SIEGE IN THE CLOUDS" in our library and got interested in reading it since I was mentioned in the book. I gave your book "WELCOME TO VIETNAM MACHO MAN" to the teacher as possible reading material. The teacher has chosen (edited) several passages for use in class. She loves it, and the kids love it even more. The good thing is that a reading specialist who works with a few of the kids said she could never get them to read anything—and now she can't get them to put "MACHO MAN" or other related Khe Sanh stories down. I've brought in the LIFE and NEWSWEEK magazines from 68. The kids have read articles and written papers about their readings. The teachers are just amazed at the response of the kids to the Khe Sanh experience. In a week or so, I'll go in with my slides and Duncan's "I PROTEST" and "WAR WITHOUT HEROES" to wrap things up. Khe Sanh is still working its magic.

Dear Ernie:

Many thanks to you for dropping me a few short lines. It's good to know that someone still cares. It's been 28 years and you are still concerned. Most people seem to give up and forget. But, you are still "Semper Fi." It's been very uplifting to visit with some of the guys by phone. As you know I was with Delta 1/26 as a squad leader in 1st Plt. My radio call sign was "Lone Star." In June 1968, I was medevaced after being wounded by machine gun fire near An Hoa. In the future, I plan to contact all of them who served their country with Delta company.

I am a custom farmer and commercial cattle rancher. It's a full time job tending to business. However, come hell or high water I will be in Philly come July of 96. I'm looking forward to meeting with all the men who fought at Khe Sanh. Keep in touch.

Respectfully and fraternally,

Greetings:

Wish there was a larger amount I could donate to a worthwhile cause such as our newsletter—for now the amount included will have to suffice.

I served as Arty F.O. 6-2 Actual attached to the 9th Marines and 26th Marines at Khe Sanh. At this time I would like to extend an invitation to a complimentary meal to any Marines that may happen to pass through our town. Identify yourself to our hostess, she will notify me and I'll come out to "shoot the bull." Sorry no Ham and Mothers.

Ernie,

I don't know if you ever received the report from Ken Penn. I assume not. If possible maybe you could put it in the next newsletter. I will be going back this spring to meet with them again and do more for the Khe Sanh combat base's future. I believe I could get funding to get some of the members there in 1998. I have some ideas for corporate and military donations. I'm glad you're back and realize that your job can be very depressing. When so, think of the good your efforts do for so many others and feel the pride you are entitled to.

Dear Brother:

I write to send a poem. John Pointer was at Khe Sanh and elsewhere in Nam. He worked as a deputy sheriff in San Diego and was at my corrections facility. I have made him aware of us and hope he will join. He has buried much of the past. He shared with me the poem I enclose and has given his permission to publish it. Can you see to it?

Best,

Dear Sir:

Enclosed is a donation. Keep up the good work. One suggestion: Perhaps every issue you could include an historical segment describing in detail perhaps several happenings simultaneously. Example;

March 1 through March 10th: in the US "Love Is Blue" is the hit record while...in Vietnam, the following occurred countrywide...At Khe Sanh, the following occurred...Obviously, the Khe Sanh piece would be the most detailed, drawing on both Ray Stubbe's remembrances, other written material, after-action-reports, personal remembrances, etc. After the first period is highlighted, you could ask for other personal remembrances for a specific period that will highlight the next issue.

The Vietnam countrywide part would be needed to give Khe Sanh some bigger content while the "what was happening in the States" part will serve to remind everyone of the whole period.

This type of historical piece along with some elementary sketches will probably encompass at least one page in each issue and I believe will both serve to educate and broaden everyone's experience and knowledge, as well as encouraging members to contribute in a more focused way.

It is important, I believe, to get the history out and to continue to build upon a historical content. After all, what has drawn us together is the history we shared.

That historical legacy should remain a centerpiece of the magazine and both the factual information as well as the personal, emotional remembrances should be co-mingled.

Hope these ideas help.

Name, unintelligible

P.S. You should also include some type of bibliography on books, articles, etc. to keep the history before people.

Ed note: Why don't you submit something for publication.

VIETNAM DAZE

We were all in vietnam for a year or more, some for love of Country, some for love of war.
Nobody knew for sure the reason for the fight,
some were defending home or their concept of right.
We knew nothing of the greed and the money politics.
We were just dub-ass city kids and green country hicks.

Time either passed slowly or lifetimes went in a single day.
In your mind's eye you saw yourself from very far away.
Attitudes were always changing; you laughed, but often wept, it depended on the action or the company that you kept.
There were things you did; things which you want to hide.
It was hard to accept when values, as well as people, died.

The war affected us all, no one escaped the change, relationships never the same again, forever a little strained.
Many came back with wounds not always evident or readily seen.
It's easier to see a limb that's gone, than a mind trying to flee.
There are family get-togethers with the always empty chair, as they grieve for their losses of sons no longer there.

The war, for some, was over years ago, while others can't seem to ever let it go.
They have memories which continue, hurts which linger on, when all the visible scars have healed, the limp all but gone.
Will their minds gradually withdraw, slowly begin to unbraid?
Will the unknowns they face always make them afraid?

It is good to have an organization of Veterans such as the Khe Sanh Vets. The Khe Sanh experience is unique in the annals of Vietnam history.

I qualify to be a Khe Sanh Vet but barely. While with 1/9, I saw more in a day than I saw in my six months of Khe Sanh. As a clerk with 1/9, I earned a Purple Heart yet I was in more imminent danger nightly on the lines of Khe Sanh.

The Vet groups such as the Marine Corps League don't seem to understand that we want to get together. While I can find some of my 1/9 buddies, there is little chance of finding my 1/26 friends. I wonder if it possible to break down the list by company and year served.

It would be nice to see a reunion in DC of all the Marines who served in Vietnam and to account for them. This could be a project of the Khe Sanh Vets.

At a 2/9 reunion, I met the man who had the serial number after me. We had entered Parris Island the same day to be split up into different platoons. We were both amazed to find each other.

I once talked with Ray Stubbe about forming a 1/26 network such as the one I belong to with 1/9. He thought it would be a good idea. I wonder if you could not promote this for at least all the battalions of the Khe Sanh Vets?

Ed note: A lot of people in our organization have suggestions that, while worthy and valid, require a substantial amount of time. I will say it one more time. Unless YOU are willing to carry the ball it will not happen.

You featured a story in The Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter (Fall '95) and it referenced my husband Asberry York, Jr. The error in your story is you put Asberry York, Sr. and not Jr. Since my father-in-law is still alive, this can be confusing. My husband would appreciate a correction. My husband is extremely offended if his name is not spelled correctly.

Thank you,

Hello fellow Khe Sanh Veteran,

I was in 3/26 K Co. on Hill 861 most of the siege. I was a squad leader with the 3rd. Plt. Please memorialize my friend L/Cpl. Francis Pennetti. I am including a donation. I have already paid my dues. I am enclosing three poems I wrote. Please send me a copy of the honor roll issue. Someone borrowed it, and I did not get it back. I am drawing 100% from the VA for a combination of both ears and PTSD.

midday war

the sweetened air of morning calm and sun's rays on the loom foretell the heat of midday war and shout the sense of doom for men who know not what they do for whom, for what, for why but give their soul its last hurrah last breath, and then to die in midday war, past morning calm when death some had not spared and heart's lone dream of going home was all that each had shared

Dear Vince:

For the past year, I've corresponded with Ray Stubbe, who has been sending me complimentary copies of The Khe Sanh Veteran. I finally decided I ought to pay for it, and wish to join the Vets.

Some stats: USMC from 8/65 to 6/69, honorably discharged as Sergeant (E-5). Vietnam Service from 12/66 to 1/68 Crew chief, Marine Observation Squadron Three (VMO-3), homebased at Phu Bai I manned detachments at Dong Ha and Khe Sanh throughout 1967. Flew Huey slicks the first half of my tour and pulled medevacs from 881 and 861 during the Hill Fights in May. Crew chief of the Huey slick that extracted the survivors of Recon Team Breaker from Hill 665 on May 10, 1967. Flew Huey guns the second half of the tour, running fire and support for inserts and extracts, and medevacs out of Khe Sanh during the second half of '67. Escaped to the World a few days before Tet.

Major Quamo
by Robert Cavanaugh
FOB-3

I received a call one night and was asked if I had ever worked for a man named George Quamo while in Viet Nam. The person calling was the editor of the KHE SANH magazine, and he asked if I could put something on paper about the man. I said I would try.

I was on my third and last tour and had volunteered for SOG and assigned as a recon team leader for a team called Oklahoma. There were two other teams Wisconsin and

Major George Quamo, USA – K.I.A. 4/14/68

Pennsylvania, our little group was called Special Projects. Each team had three U.S. and between six and eight BRU. When I arrived on site, I met my boss, MSG Minnicks, who was by far one of the best combat soldiers that I had ever served with.

Within a month we received a message that they were sending an officer to command our little group and he would be arriving within the week. Needless to say, we were quite upset and couldn't understand why the Army was fixing something that wasn't broken. Major Quamo arrived on site about three days later, and you can believe that he was not on friendly ground. Before the year was finished, I truly believe that every American on those teams would have followed him to hell to put out the fire if he asked. But, to get back to what I remember, the day before he arrived we had another meeting about what we were going to do. That was when I gave my little speech, I said what we were doing was wrong, that threatening to ask for reassignment and not giving the man a chance was not right, and for Uncle Sam to think that he had to put a Field Grade Officer in charge of nine enlisted men was either an honor or that he was such a screw up they were trying to get rid of him. (It was an honor.)

It is going on thirty years so I cannot remember everything he did except put total trust in all his team leaders. He was the only Field Grade that I know that was allowed to cross the line, which is what we called the border of Laos, where we ran most of our operations. I remember that he and I went to Lang Vei just before it was overrun to debrief the Lao Commander who was forced out of his camp in Laos and reported that it was tanks that made them abandon it. While we were there, Major Quamo begged him to work on his defensive positions—they were really in bad shape. But he seemed more interested in when the next rice supply was coming in. He would regret not listening to us.

A week later, Major Quamo was leading a relief force back to Lang Vei to rescue any men that were still alive. I still remember SFC Secor dueling an NVA position with a Korean-era bazooka that had us under indirect and direct fire. They stopped shooting first and Secor won a Silver Star for shooting longer and straighter. SFC Secor was also KIA on another operation.

I read in a report after the war that the CO of Lang Vei said that if it wasn't for George Quamo there would not have been any survivors.

After Lang Vei, Skip Minnicks' tour was over and I more or less became NCOIC of our group, our original mission of Recon had been forgotten as like everybody else we ran local patrols and George became more like the XO of our base working with the CO Major Smith, another good man.

The last time I saw Major Quamo he was talking to a lady reporter as I was passing by. He asked me where I was going. I told him I was getting ready to go on an early warning patrol that night. He said to be careful. Two days later, he was MIA and a little while later it was confirmed that he was KIA.

Dear Mr. O' Hara:

I read with interest about your research and association with the Battle of Khe Sanh in the the Veterans of Foreign Wars Magazine.

I am still on active duty as a US Army Special Forces, Major stationed at Fort Bragg, North Carolina. I spent 2 tours in Viet Nam as a US Marine Corps Sergeant and served with Company F, 2nd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment for the entire siege of Khe Sanh.

I never speak much of those days, due to the fact there are few left who actually know the meaning of being in hand-to-hand combat with a determined enemy soldier. I would be interested in learning of old comrades in arms from this era and corresponding with others who are knowledgeable of the facts and meaning of a soldier's sacrifice.

Yours truly,
Major J. Lynn Cooper

Dear Mr. Spencer,

We are two ninth grade honors students competing in National History Day in March. History Day is an academic competition in which students submit historical research projects and present them in front of a panel of judges. This year's theme is "Taking a Stand in History?" We felt that the Siege of Khe Sanh fit well with this theme. We are in the process of creating a documentary video on the Siege of Khe Sanh. We've spent the last four months doing "traditional" style research on this subject, but we feel it's important to obtain the accounts and opinions of the people who were there. We found your organization while researching on the Internet, and also read your book, "Welcome to Vietnam Macho Man," and found it to be extremely helpful.

Being able to interview veterans from the Siege of Khe Sanh would be a major advantage to our video. Mainly, we are interested in information on how to contact Khe Sanh veterans so that we could possibly do either phone or mail interviews with them. Also because we are creating a video, we would like to use as many photographs and video footage as possible.

Any information that you could provide would be greatly appreciated. We would be more than happy to talk with you at your convenience, and to send you a copy of our final video.

Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

Mr. O'Hara:

Got word about The Khe Sanh Vets from the Nov. 95 VFW magazine. I served as the BN. M.T. Chief, H.Q. Btry, 1/13 with the 26th Marines from July 67-March 68 at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The M422s, M-37s, M-35s, M543 Wrecker were operated by my unit at the west end of the runway. I had a sign over a small gate next to the road that said: WE MAY NOT BE THE PRIDE OF THE BN. BUT WITHOUT US THE PRIDE DON'T RIDE.

E/2/26: A Commander's Reflections

by Dave Rogers

Unfamiliar names of topological features such as Hills 362A and 362B, along with Nishi Ridge, were the sites of bloody fighting for the 26th Marines during World War II as they advanced northeastward on a tiny Pacific island called Iwo Jima. This Fifth Marine Division regiment, activated on 10 January 1944, suffered 650 men killed and 2,025 wounded during the 26 day campaign, and was deactivated after the war on 5 March 1946.

The 26th Marine Regiment was reactivated 1 March 1966 at Camp Pendleton, California due to the Vietnam War. The 1st and 2nd battalions landed at Da Nang, Republic of Vietnam, in August 1966 while the 3rd battalion arrived in October. Some 20 years after the battle for Iwo Jima, the 26th Marines, commanded by Colonel John J. Padley and later by Colonel David E. Lownds, found itself once again in terrain identified on topographic maps in meters above sea level. Numerous newly named hills, including Hills 881 South, 881 North, 558, 861 and 861A, near Khe Sanh in western Quang Tri Province, along with the Khe Sanh Combat Base, became a memorable part of the unit's history before it returned to Camp Pendleton in the fall of 1969. Although the losses suffered by the unit in this area were not comparable to those suffered at Iwo Jima, the same valor with which the Marines fought was not uncommon.

Echo Company of the Second Battalion, Twenty-sixth Marine Regiment was one of the rifle companies within the regiment challenged by enemy forces during its tour of duty in Vietnam, and particularly so at Khe Sanh. The company had moved to Khe Sanh on 16 January 1968 when the entire battalion, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Francis J. Heath, Jr. was ordered there from Phu Bai to link up with the remainder of the regiment. Prior to that time the company had served mainly in and around Phu Loc, located within the Phu Bai TAOR in Thua Thien Province, after arriving from Da Nang on 11 October 1966. It had also participated in Operation Hickory, which was conducted in May 1967 in the area just south of the DMZ known as "Leatherneck Square."

Captain Earle G. Breeding became the commanding officer of Echo Company in September 1967 after serving shortly as the battalion S-3 for 2/26. He remained the company's CO until 9 March 1968 when First Lieutenant Joseph R. Meeks replaced him after Breeding was assigned as the S-4 for the battalion. Prior to joining the 3rd Marine Division in July 1967, Breeding had formed companies B and C of the 5th Antitank Battalion at Camp Pendleton. He entered the Marine Corps in 1952, served with the 1st Amphibious Reconnaissance Company, then as Chief Scout with the 9th Marines under then Major David E. Lownds, during the Korean War, and was discharged in 1956 with the rank of Sergeant. Thereafter, he attended college under the GI Bill, and re-entered the Marine Corps in 1960 as a "Mustang" infantry officer.

During Christmas of 1967, Breeding found himself on R&R in Hawaii with his wife and daughter thinking, "This Vietnam thing ain't too bad." Upon returning to the Phu Loc area from R&R, Breeding learned that the tactical situation had begun to change dramatically as the Tet new year, beginning January 30, approached. Intelligence reports indicated that the North Vietnamese had begun encircling the Khe Sanh Combat Base, and a major confrontation was imminent for the 26th Marines. Breeding recalls the events of mid-January 1968 after arriving at Khe Sanh.

A day or two later, Echo company was ordered on a company size patrol a click or so north of Hill 558 where 2/26 was located and was to spend its time during the siege. On about the 26th, Echo was ordered back to Hill 558 and ordered immediately to go up on Hill 861A. This was a grueling task. We had walked, cutting every foot of the way with machetes, since early in the morning, and Lieutenant Colonel Heath ordered us up to Hill 861A as soon as we reached Hill 558. This was late afternoon of the same day. We were not afforded the time to eat, resupply, plan a route, plan fire support or air cover, for our unreconnoitered single file climb up Hill 861A. All we had going for us was the cover of darkness. Additionally, there was no way to get off the "trail"—no way. One machine gun would have decimated us if positioned properly. But Mars, Zeus or whoever smiled on us.

About midnight we reached the top and radioed 3/26 that we now belonged to them. I set the platoons in a circle more or less using a watch for sectors, told the platoon leaders to set security, etc. It was necessary to give them some orders, but I knew damn well nobody could remain awake after what we had been through the last several days. I also knew that one round of rifle fire close by would start the adrenalin on a high rush. Such always did.

Our supply, or resupply—whichever—was scant. For three days in the beginning, we had no water or food. We were not allowed outside the wire, which gave me great latitude since we had little wire, no sledge hammers or wire working gloves, you name it. But we did have ingenuity, bamboo and a little stream down the hill the Gunny found, somehow. Gunnies are remarkable! The stream turned out to be a small muddy pool but we did fill a canteen or two, and if you let the muddy water sit long enough you could drink more or less clear water off the top. How you got the sediment out of the canteen was not up to the Gunny.

Things went along normally with almost constant incoming mortar fire and no resupply until the powers that be decided we needed food. Then we had pallets of C's all over the LZ, then we got air drops of water. Smart, real smart. That finally resolved itself and the choppers, more or less gently, set pallets of containers (in every imaginable form) of water on the LZ in the daylight so we could be mortared getting it off the LZ. If we waited a while to go get it, the NVA waited (were we being watched?). The same for any supplies.

Anyway, trenches, pits for our 60's (we had no 81's), machine gun emplacements, auxiliary and supplemental positions prepared, the company CP and aid station fortified as best as possible (hey, I'm no fool). Actually this turned out to be a good move as the CP was hit several times with no internal damage, and later when the NVA attacked us and penetrated the company area, the CP was used as an adjunct to the aid station for housing flash-blinded Marines until they could regain their eye sight enough to be effective combatants.

This leads us to five minutes after three of the morning of the fifth of February. We were not permitted to have any Marines in front of the wire. A listening post from Don Shanley's first platoon, which I had placed on the north side in front of the wire at a distance of about ten meters, rather anxiously reported in words unfit to print that there were quite a few stalwart individuals very close and moving south, obviously intent on contesting ownership of our hill. Since the good citizens of the Polite and Demure North would have been better brought up than to come a'visiting unannounced at that time of morning, I decided to role play. I became a general in the Kanh's Hoard, a Tartar madman, a Saxon, a Teutonic Knight, a Moor in Spain, not to mention a great German general minus only his panzers. What the hell, if you gotta go (and there was no getting off the hill), you might as well go out in Semper Fi Glory. Those of us who were there the morning of 5 February 68 only know what we experienced, much of which was related to Captain Moyers Shore for the G-3 Historical Publication on the Battle for Khe Sanh, so there is really no point in being redundant here.

The bottom line is we held (any company of Marines would have). The platoon commanders, NCO's and troops were great. They did what they were trained for—what they were supposed to do. Some were outstanding, especially in the NCO positions, which were actually PFC's, LCPL's and junior NCO's filling billets of much higher rank. One acting platoon commander was a Platoon Sergeant.

One significant factor was that the shooting stopped about 7:30 A. M., and as soon as the extremely dense fog lifted we did start getting replacements and resupplies. Now recall we were OPCON to Lieutenant Colonel Harry Alderman's (another great leader, truly) 3/26. They and Colonel Lownds, the CO of the regiment, took good care of us and we got many replacements: cooks, MT types, and others of varying MOS's who turned out to be Marines as Marines should be. MOS's meant nothing. Even the 03 dirty laundry sent from some other rifle companies was great—we had good NCO leadership. Discipline was never a problem—good leadership at the small unit level regardless of the rank of the small unit leader.

A note about Colonel Lownds: I personally have the greatest respect for him. He was commanding a reinforced regiment with attachments from every service except the Coast Guard, and I don't know if there wasn't one or two of them around. There were ARVN, civilian, and who knows, probably NVA spies—for sure, in that combat base.

The days following 5 February 1968 Echo Company continued to take heavy mortar fire. For the NVA, it was like shooting ducks on the water; we had no place to go and you can only dig so deep. You can't stay in your hole all the time. Things were better at night, especially when fogged in, though when they hit us the fog was thicker than San Francisco ever had it. They didn't often mortar us at night, so we surfaced and used the "facilities," and socialized a bit, or whatever.

And that's about the way it went, day in and day out. No, it wasn't fun, but we never had it as bad as Echo did on Iwo, or Marines did at the Frozen Chosin, or Belleau Wood, or on and on. Nor did any other unit at Khe Sanh—we only had it longer.

The battle of Hill 861A is well documented in numerous books, including David Douglas Duncan's "War Without Heroes." A former Marine officer turned combat photographer and foreign correspondent, Duncan just happened to arrive at the Khe Sanh Combat Base the day before the NVA launched their pre-dawn attack on Hill 861A. He later went up to the hill and took pictures for his book of photography. He states in another one of his books, "I Protest," that E/2/26 suffered more than twenty dead and wounded, while more than fifty North Vietnamese lost their lives.

Captain Moyers S. Shore's book, "The Battle for Khe Sanh," describes the fighting that took place in great detail. He reported that seven men were killed while another thirty-five were medevaced. The attacking North Vietnamese, members of the 325C Division, lost 109 known dead and an unknown number were killed by mortar, artillery, air strikes and supporting fire. Similar casualty figures are mentioned in Ray Stubbe and John Prados's book, "Valley of Decision: The Siege of Khe Sanh."

In reflecting on the events which occurred during his Vietnam war experiences, Breeding believes that there are some inaccurate statements of facts, both written and oral, that he has read and heard in years passing. Says Breeding, "Point is: it's in a book, therefore, it's true. Mythological History. Many years from now, some worthy reader will believe what he reads, ergo, as we say, it is important for the true, unembellished facts to be in print. How nice it would be if one of our members could somehow get our newsletters into the Library of Congress and other libraries throughout the country for posterity before it's too late."

Dear Ray,

I've enclosed an article that I'd like to share with our fellow Khe Sanh veterans who may be contemplating a return visit to Vietnam. I am sharing this information in the hope that no other veteran or family of a veteran finds themselves in this situation. I would also urge everyone who sees this to pass this information on to other veteran organizations.

Dr. Barry Booth and David R. Ford thought they were doing something good that could bring closure to a fallen Marine's family. And the two Mobile area veterans still may have done just that in their effort to bring one of LCpl. James Caudill's military dog tags from Vietnam to his still-grieving family in Ohio. Their noble gesture, however, still may have been in vain. Though the identification tag may indeed be the real thing, so many bogus dog tags have flooded Vietnam that even Booth and Ford now question its authenticity.

The making of fake dog tags is a "cottage industry" in Vietnam, said Mike Nash, chairman of the Vietnam Veterans of America's POW-MIA Committee in Washington. He said he has heard of "Mom and Pop" outfits making American dog tags in Vietnam. "The dog tags are showing up hundreds of miles from where the American GIs were killed.

Booth,a Spanish Fort dentist, bought the single dog tag stamped "J. Caudill" in July 1994 while visiting his old combat base at Khe Sanh. Booth, who served as a Navy lieutenant and dentist in Vietnam, said several Vietnamese children approached him and offered to sell him dog tags belonging to American servicemen. "I bought the dog tags they had, and they had five," Booth said. The tags bore the names of four Marines and one Navy corpsman who served in Vietnam nearly 30 years ago.

"I brought them back with the intention of trying to get them back to the GIs or their families," Booth said, adding that the dog tags "looked authentic to me."

Caudill's dog tag even appeared to be blood-stained, Ford said.

But appearances can be deceiving, said Nash of the POW-MIA Committee. He said lists of American servicemen killed in Vietnam or missing in action are "available in the United States—available to anyone." He said entrepreneurs easily get the lists and sell them.

John Webb, deputy commander of the U.S. Army Central-Identification Laboratory in Hawaii, said in a recent telephone interview, "I've got 1,400 phony dog tags laying in my lab now. They were purchased by an American who was visiting Vietnam. It's very common. There are bogus dog tags turning up all the time."

Believing the dog tags he had bought were real, however, Booth returned home and asked fellow Vietnam veteran Ford if he would like to try to locate the owners or their families and give the dog tags to them. Ford, 46, a former Marine who served for a year in Vietnam, also was at Khe Sanh, a combat base in northern Vietnam near the demilitarized zone in 1968. He was there when the base was under siege by the North Vietnamese Army for 77 days. Now a chemical operator, Ford placed advertisements in veterans magazines trying to locate the servicemen. "I was hoping everybody was alive," he said. He also searched lists of Americans killed in action at Khe Sanh, but to no avail.

Finally, after seven weeks of searching, Ford contacted Wayne Welchel, a former fellow platoon member in Vietnam. Welchel—through a computer—had access to a list of those killed in action in Vietnam. "The only J. Caudill on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial is a James Caudill," Ford said. He said that—as a result of Welchel's help—he learned that Caudill was from Marion, Ohio. Ford said he learned that Caudill was 23 when he died In Vietnam on Aug. 18, 1968. Ford contacted The Star, a newspaper in Marion, and it ran a story. Almost immediately, Caudill's sister, Carolyn Avila of Galioni Ohio, responded and Ford gave the dog tag to the family. Ford said he learned that Caudill was killed at Danang and not at Khe Sanh where Booth purchased the dog tags. But, he said Caudill had been wounded earlier at Khe Sanh, and he could have lost a dog tag there. According to his brother, L/Cpl James Caudill served with Alpha Co., 1st Battalion, 26th Marines at Khe Sanh. Anyone who knew him is asked to contact: Everett Caudill 634 Cherry St. Galion, Ohio 44833

Melanie Gentile had gathered materials for a book on "Graffiti of Vietnam" which had been placed in temporary storage. When she was unable to pay the storage fees, the contents of her locker were auctioned off or disposed of. She lost 25 years of research. She asks for "Graffiti of Vietnam" that you wrote or remember reading and stories of tragedy surrounding the "Third Hole on the Left." (She hasn't elaborated on this). "This was to be my way of trying to thank you for all of your bravery and suffering." And she intends to donate most of the profits to Vietnam veteran organizations. Dear Sir,

This letter has reference to the November 95 VFW magazine and the article regarding your organization. I am formerly USMC Corporal P. N. Greene 2218486, VMO-6, MAG 36, 1st MAW. I was a crew chief on a Huey gunship. I arrived in Viet Nam in December, 66 and returned to the States in January '68. During 1967 our gunships were in and out of Khe Sanh daily. Our call sign was Klondike, and later in the fall of '67 we changed it to Cadaver. Most of the missions that I was associated with were working with US Army Special Forces on SOG missions in Laos and North Viet Nam. During the battles of 861 and 881, we were there with ground support and directing air strikes. Also, numerous insertions and extractions working with USMC Recon around the area.

If you might be interested, I have numerous color slides (35mm) of Khe Sanh and surrounding area, both on the ground and aerial.

Very truly yours,
Peter N. Greene

Dear Dave:

Your letter in The Khe Sanh Veteran, Fall 1995 issue, requests information on all types of support provided at the KSCB during February 1968. I am enclosing copies of my flight log for the period of January through March of 1968. When I checked the log for 8 February I found that the dates 6-14 February were not recorded. The reason for this was that while you were doing a great job on Hill 64, I was on R&R. (Someone had to go.) However, after talking to you on the phone, you stated that you would like the flight log copies anyway.

The flight log is a record of my flights as a pilot in Marine Attack Squadron 311. The remarks in the right column contain the map coordinates of each mission. TPQ indicates radar controlled bombing. CAS is Close Air Support. LZP is Landing Zone Prep. DAS is Direct Air Support. AR is Armed Reconnaissance. Other items are probably self explanatory.

VMA-311 was attached to MAG-12 at Chu Lai and flew numerous missions in support of KSCB. Two members of our squadron, Major Loftus and Capt. Dowling, were shot down over KSCB. These incidents were previously reported in The Khe Sanh Veteran.

Sincerely,
Darold L. Guttormson
Lt. Col., USMC (Ret)

Michael:

I noticed your note in The VFW, November Issue, regarding some details of Khe Sanh. I served in Viet Nam for one year as a Catholic Army Chaplain (Caps) from 1964 into 1965. I was with MACV, based in Hue. Because of the shortage of Chaplains however, I traveled out of Hue to Khe Sanh, to Quang Tri, to the Ashau Valley, to DaNang, Tam Qui and other outposts as well. Many times I simply hitched a ride with some aircraft going out into the outlying areas, often spending the night with the troops. In this manner I covered quite a number of Special Forces Outposts. For example: I was one of the first going into Nam Dong when it was overrun—where Capt. Dondlan received the Medal of Honor. Sometimes I had a Vietnamese driver or drove myself (jeep) to closer points along Highway #1 like Phu Bai or Quang Tri. When I came to Khe Sanh I would offer Catholic Mass as well as Protestant services for some of the men who so desired. At times like this, I often accompanied the medics out into the Montagnard villages where medicines and varied pills were dispensed. In 1967 when my tour of duty in Korea was ending, I was scheduled for transfer back to Viet Nam but about that same time, my Bishop in Wichita, Kansas contacted the military and said that he needed me back in the Diocese, so I had no choice but to return. I am now retired in Hot Springs Village and enjoy the peace and quiet here.

Sincerely,
Name unintelligible

Mike:

I served with Army artillery unit 2/94th B Battery from April 67 until just after Tet 68. Our base camp was J.J. Carroll, but we also were at Gio Linh, Con Thien, Cam Lo and the Rockpile. We fired support for Khe Sanh with our 175mm guns on numerous occasions.

Mike Jacobson

Dear Michael,

A recent announcement in the VFW magazine about the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. has prompted my letter.

I served with the 240th. FA, 108th. Artillery Group at Khe Sanh from March 5, 1968 to June 1, 1968. Although an Army unit, we were attached to and under the operational control of the 3rd. Bn, 12th. Marines, 3rd. Marine Div.

Our mission was to provide support for the 3/12 firing batteries by providing coordinates for enemy mortar, rocket and artillery positions. This was accomplished with a Counter Mortar Radar set which we operated and maintained. Whenever Khe Sanh or the surrounding areas were fired on by NVA or VC, our radar would pick up the source of the firing and we were able to immediately call Fire Direction Center for a fire mission on these coordinates. I recall that in one month we observed and called for fire on over 300 locations. On many occasions, secondary explosions were noted after counter battery fire was ordered.

I would be interested in learning more about your organization.

Sincerely,
Dick Kilian

Dear Mr. O'Hara:

This is in response to your article in the VFW mag. Yes, I was in Khe Sanh. I served with the 1st Air Cav. 1/77 F.A. We were in Khe Sanh for about 3 weeks. We supported the Marines when they were pinned down. This was in 1967(9?). We were all over Quang Tri. I have pictures and newsletters. Please write back.

Welcome home,
Fred Kinford

Dear Mr. O'Hara:

I am writing about the ad in the VFW magazine. I joined the USMC in 1967 and was discharged in 1969 honorably under medical conditions. I was in F company 2/1. I was wounded twice near Khe Sanh while with the 1st Marines. I was wounded in an ambush near Khe Sanh on May 19, 1968 and received the Purple Heart. I was a PFC 0311 rifleman in a foxhole with PFC Al Gillispie from Ohio, Akron, I believe. He was shot in the head and then I was hit with a grenade and shot in the right shoulder. I was taken to different hospitals. I remember being in Guam and then shipped to Chelsea Naval Hospital. I am sending a copy of my DD-214.

Thank you,
Albert Licciardone

Mr. Michael E. O'Hara

I read your article in the VFW with great interest. I served with the 3rd Shore Party Battalion, 3rd MarDiv. from Feb. 1968 to Mar. 1969. I served with various grunt companies as an H.S.T (Helicopter Support Team). My company was called up to outpost Ca Lu in March 1968 to prepare LZ Stud for operation Pegasus to lift the siege around Khe Sanh. The outpost was moved and later named LZ Vandergrift. I also worked the LZ in Khe Sanh for a short time, but mostly worked fire support for Hills 861, 881S and 471.

I was very pleased to read your article as I'm very proud of serving with the Marines in this area, as it is a part of history and I was there. If I can be of an other service, I'll do what I can or remember.

Thank you,
John F. Locke

Dear Mr. O'Hara:

I recently became aware of your new organization dedicated to researching the battle and the veterans of Khe Sanh, RVN. I served as a Navy Hospital Corpsman with the U. S. Marine Corps in Viet Nam in 1967-1968. I am a veteran and survivor of the entire period of battle that took place in that remote corner of South Viet Nam. I arrived in Khe Sanh in late December of 1967, prior to the onset of the battle. I was the senior corpsman of Company K, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, 3rd Mar. Div. (Reinforced) and we took our position on hill 861 on the 26th of December. Our position on Hill 861 was the initial target of the NVA Tet Offensive on January 21, 1968. We took considerable casualties during this attack, and our position was nearly over run during the early morning hours. The next morning began the "siege of Khe Sanh" that lasted through late April. I survived this period (wounded slightly), but as the senior medical representative, I medically evacuated (WIA or KIA) nearly all of the members of Kilo company that originally arrived on Hill 861 the previous December. Hill 861 was strategically positioned, and we experienced continued aggression and, from our excellent vantage point, witnessed the siege actions on the surrounding hills and the actual combat base through April.

Upon leaving my four-year tour of duty as a regular member of the U.S. Navy, I joined the Naval Reserve. I retired last March as a Master Chief Hospital Corpsman (E-9). My memories are very vivid of the Khe Sanh siege period, and I would be glad to contribute in any way to your organization and research. Please contact me at your convenience.

I have only been in the Cincinnati area for a little over a year after spending several years in the San Francisco Bay Area. I'm not sure where Nashville, IN is, but perhaps we are in close proximity.

Sincerely,
Rod Lyons

Ed reply: Rod, now that you're retired, why not do a more detailed piece on your experiences on 861, or, your career in the Navy.

Fire Mission

by Robert Mclane
F-2/12

I recently saw for the first time a copy of The Khe Sanh Veteran. I spent 45 days there in the late spring of 68 with a 105 battery. Enclosed is part of a chapter of a book I recently wrote about my year in the DMZ. Feel free to use it if you like.

The Lieutenant yells "Fire mission!" Does that make three this morning or is it four? This fever just won't go away. It's not any worse, but neither it nor the diarrhea will let up. There are no chills, it's not malaria, but I feel like I'm awake in a dream as I go into the bunker and walk over to a table. I set down my jug of Kaopectate and pick up a slide rule and wait...Crunch the numbers...Give the data to the fireteam leader...Wait for new numbers...The bunker shakes as one of Uncle Ho's jumbo economy sized artillery shells slams into the ground less than a hundred feet away. The next minute seems to take forever as the dust tumbles and dances like red snowflakes, covering the field radios, maps, log books, and faces of the officers and men of Fox battery. If the shell has a delayed fuse, we will know it in the next thirty seconds. It doesn't. "Azimuth!" Sergeant Medford shouts. I look at the slide rule..." Seven...four...two...three!"

"Negative Sergeant!" a voice from the secondary fire team calls out. "Work it again gentlemen," Sergeant Medford replies. I run the numbers one more time. I look up at Sergeant Medford.

"Seven...four...niner...six..."

"Affirmative Sergeant." The secondary team concurs. Lieutenant Adams gives the command to fire. Sergeant Medford walks over to me. "Are you OK?" he asks. "I'm fine." I smile. A few minutes later, the forward observer ends the fire mission. It is almost noon. I walk outside and lean against some sandbags. I take a shot from the Kaopectate. Sergeant Medford walks up beside me.

"How's your fever?"

I look at him. "About a hundred and one today." I grin. "Does it show?" He spits on the ground then lights a cigarette.

"Look Buddha, why don't you go to Dong Ha for a couple of days? Get rid of that fever. Catch up on some sleep. You can be back here next week, good as new." I bend over and start to open a can of C's.

"We're short-handed enough already. If I'm not here, that just means the rest of the guys will have to pick up the slack. They're stretched thin enough as is."

"Dammit Buddha! It's not worth the risk of getting our own people killed." I light a heat tab and set a can over it.

"Look Hal, our system's working. That's why we have a secondary team. They caught it. I've had this fever over two weeks and this is the first time I've made a mistake. Let me eat this can of ham and limes, and I'll be good as new." Sergeant Medford shakes his head and finishes his cigarette. "I want the Corpsman taking your temperature twice a day." I hold up the gallon of Kaopectate.

"He's already on top of this, Hal. Relax." My beans were ready. I find some shade and sit down to lunch. Rail walks over.

"I hear we're getting out of here," he says with a smile.

"Yeah, we're going to France," I reply. Since I have no use for them, I give Rail the small box of cigarettes that came with the box of C's.

"No man, everybody's leaving. They're shutting Khe Sanh down, dude. I heard it from some engineers. They're bringing in extra C-4 to blow all the bunkers. I'll bet you a hot beer on it."

"Bet," I reply. The rumor is true, but they take their sweet time about it. We spend the next two weeks shooting and ducking before the engineers finally start blowing up the bunkers. Fox battery is one of the last units out. A plywood shitter is the only visible structure still standing, as we hump our gear down to the LZ. A lone bulldozer is filling in collapsed bunkers. Enemy shells continue to fall. Nobody tells Charlie it's over. Koontz's folks had sent him a Monopoly set. He hadn't had time to play his first game with it. I don't think Koontz wrote his family very often. I'll never understand how they thought he had the time to sit around playing Monopoly. He carries it along with the rest of his gear. As he ducks and runs for the waiting helicopter, the box holding the game falls to the ground.

The prop blast scatters all the money, hotels, board, and every game piece including the little Scottie dog, into a huge swirling cloud of red dust as the twin blades wind-up to take off. The place looks like the set of a Fellini movie as the play money scatters in the wind. I stare out the window and say a silent goodbye. A lot of good Marines have died here and now we were leaving. Historians in tweed coats will argue about whether the blood sacrifice at this place was worth it. For my money, it is a senseless waste.

Fellow Khe Sanh Vet:

My memory is hazy at best. My recollection of the morning of 8th of Feb. 1968, there was a hell of a bunch of firing on OP Hill. All members of Alpha Company 2nd Platoon, everybody, fell out into the trench line. From the trench line I watched the battle rage.

As I recall, I never started toward OP Hill until after daylight. Me being a PFC, I didn't understand the strategy, except we probably would have been ambushed in the dark. Once there, me and a squad of Marines were on flank. I held a position next to the road at the bottom of the hill. I didn't get on OP Hill until mid-morning.

It's hard for me to recall names, but there was a red-headed lieutenant named Lovely running around with a 45 crying and screaming. I found out years later the reason being was his eardrum had been perforated by concussion.

There were three Marines dead in a shallow trench. I was ordered to check bodies. They were dead and rigormortis had already set in. When trying to convey this to the red-headed Lieutenant, he told me to check them again.

As for the NVA prisoner, I recall he had his lower leg from calf down nearly blown off and a Corpsman had applied a tourniquet. I think he was too weak to answer questions. Myself and a small group of Marines stood over him as he died. I can't recall how many of my fallen brothers I helped carry off OP Hill, at least 3 or 4. The hill was very steep and rugged, one of the hardest things I've ever done in my life.

I can't recall if we were mortared that day but at the end of the day after counting heads, we were Marines short. To the best of my recollection it was 2-3 days later when we went back to look for more bodies. We were mortared then. The dead NVA soldier was still laying by the path. I can't recall how many bodies we recovered, but I personally found a Marine in a caved-in bunker at this time.

To the best of my recollection, that's all I recall. The carnage of it all is hard to bear 28 years later.

Semper-Fi,
Andrew L. Metts 2nd Platoon Alpha Co. 1/9

P.S. Sorry I couldn't recall more.

Dear Ray:

I am so pleased that I found out about The Khe Sanh Veteran newsletter. I sent in my dues immediately. For the past 28 years, I've been trying to hook up with my brothers who served with me in the "Nam." I've only been able to contact a few Marines who were members of 3/26. One of the vets whose letter appeared in the Fall issue of the newsletter mentioned he was at a 3/26 reunion in Tysons Corner, VA.. I sure would like to attend the next one.

I joined 3/26 on Okinawa Sept. 1966. They had floated there from the West Coast. For the most part, they were green as grass. We floated to Nam and landed at Phu Bai/Hue around Nov. 1966. It wasn't long before we started Operation Chinook, north of Hue. Our first KIA was a 3.5 rocketman named Paul Evans. The Operation Chinook perimeter was named Camp Evans. We were relieved at Camp Evans around April 67. We convoyed up to Dong Ha on Hwy 1 then took a left onto Rt. 9. Our destination was Khe Sanh. After passing The Rock Pile, we came upon a blown bridge and had to be heli-lifted into Khe Sanh. We relieved the battle-worn troops who fought the initial battle for 881N and 881S. I remember the Frenchman who owned the coffee plantation. We ran sweeps and patrols around the area. Many of the original members of my outfit were transferred to other units. In Aug. of 67, I was pulled out of my line company. I had 30 days left on my tour. I was reassigned to Hill 950 for the remainder of my tour. I remember flying up to Hill 950. I was in the company of a sergeant and private. They filled me in on what had happened earlier on Hill 950. The hill was overrun by sappers about a week earlier. These two guys were the only survivors. The sergeant was from Philadelphia. I remember him telling me he was sent to Nam and he had only 9 months on his enlistment. He was a FNG. He'd only been on the hill a few days prior to it being overrun. I remember him still wearing stateside starched utilities and leather boots. When I was relieved on Hill 950, I started bugging our chief corpsman to let me catch a flight to Danang. I had 4 days left on my tour. As I was boarding the Chinook helicopter in Khe Sanh, a bunch of Hueys were delivering stretchers full of dead grunts. Within a few days, I was home attending a birthday party for my one-year-old niece.

Over the years that followed, I've made many attempts to contact former members of 3/26. I look forward to hearing from members of my old outfit. If any of what I mentioned is familiar, please contact me at 1156 Kingsley Rd., Camp Hill, PA 17011

Thank you,

Hi Mike:

I was the OpSgt of Special Forces FOB-3 from Sept. 67-May 68. Started at the old French fort and moved Nov. 68 up to be a bubble on the airstrip perimeter. We tied in with 1/9 Marines at the road that led to Khe Sanh ville. We accepted the Bru and ARVN of the CAC units and Khe Sanh ville into our perimeter when they were refused access to the base. I still have some air photo shots of the Marine Plt. that was ambushed on the road N. of the French coffee plantation. I flew long range LLRP cover (air) over teams that managed to get out of the base during the siege. We have many Special Forces (ret.) who were there and at Lang Vei.

Khe Sanh Crash Crew

When I arrived at Khe Sanh on a medevac chopper, the base was receiving heavy incoming and the pilot had to circle the base for about 30 minutes until it was safe enough to touch down. Watching everything for 30 minutes in 3-D and Living Color didn't do much for my nerves, and when we finally touched down I was out of that chopper running along the runway trying to find Crash Crew's bunker. I finally found the bunker and was greeted by the crew who gave me some c-rations. As a Crash Rescuman at Khe Sanh during the siege, things always worked in reverse for us. When we were being shelled, which seemed like constantly, and everyone was taking cover, we were being called out to perform crash rescue duties, and to fight fires.

As I look back, I can't remember anyone ever complaining about taking risks—we complained about everything else like rats, dirt and food, just like everyone else, but risks were part of the job, and just like everyone we had to take them. When we weren't doing Crash and Rescue, we helped with wounded, did runway damage reports for MATCU Co. Capt. Preston Haynes, often while under heavy N.V.A. fire. I remember Capt. Haynes taking my good buddy Gary Lebanc and me out on the runway while under fire to unload supplies from chute drops and that impressed me to see him taking risks right beside us. When we were on red alert, our guys did perimeter duty. We also fought fuel bladder fires and the dreaded ammo dump fires. Everyone in Crash Crew was tight, no rank, we were on a first-name basis. Our lives depended on it. I liked and cared for everyone, and they were the same.

I also liked the guys in the 26th Marines that we were detached to—M.A.G. 36. I don't remember names but I remember their faces. There were a lot of incidents. These guys stand out in my mind most clearly: Ralph Beck, Jerry Kunkel, Gary Leblanc, Carl Lewallen and Cecilio 'Yogi' Ybarra.

We got word on the evening of the 22nd of March that we were in a Red Alert condition. We immediately made preparations for a ground assault by the NVA. forces. At approx. 18:30 hours, heavy incoming started and at approx. 19:00 hours, Major Havlik contacted our bunker and asked for volunteers to fight ammo dump fires at the east end of the base that had been started by enemy artillery—damage unknown. Crash Crew immediately responded with six volunteers. Our Navy structural fire fighting truck was down for repairs so although our M.B.5. crash truck was used, it was not adequate for fighting ammo dump fires due to the fact that it did not have enough water pressure. It was painted a bright red,which made it easy to spot by N.V.A. gunners. As we started for the ammo dump, the east end was under intense enemy incoming and was lit up from flares that were being used to light up the eastern and southern perimeters. The fires were approximately 25 meters from the perimeter and the N.V.A. had seen us. As we proceeded to the fires, I could see that we were the only thing moving above ground on that end of the base. Every thing was lit up from the flares. The N.V.A. Gunners began firing directly at us with a recoilless rifle. We were fired on many times that night going to and from the base's water point. When we finally reached the ammo dump, it looked like a disaster. There were fires in the berms and rounds were cooking off as we fought the fires. We were forced to take cover several times when the incoming became too heavy. We made three trips that night between 19:00 hours and midnight to recharge the truck with water and drive the half mile back to the ammo dumps. Each time the enemy gunners fired on us trying to stop our progress. We finally managed to extinguish the fires and return to our bunker. Our truck had sustained heavy damage and was barely serviceable. We again got word on the morning of the 23rd that the dumps had reignited and were on fire from the heavy incoming. We made two more trips to fight the fires in the same area as the previous night. We were again pinned down by enemy incoming after we reached the ammo dumps. At this point, the berms that held the 105 bee hive rounds began exploding and we were caught in the open and showered by debris including the flechettes from the bee hive rounds. At this point, our whole crew was pretty badly beaten up, but we had once again extinguished the fires and B and C batteries were back in action and able to perform fire missions again. I was hit but never received a Purple Heart. Jerry Kunkel had to be medevaced out.

On April 9th, we responded to an ammo dump fire at A.S.P.1# with our Navy fire truck after it received enemy incoming that caused a huge explosion. We drove directly into this area until we reached a point where we could go no further due to the various ordnance that had been blown onto the access road. We had to remove the hot 155mm rounds that were blocking our way to the fires in the dump before we could proceed. This part of the ammo dump was still on fire and contained 4.2 illumination rounds, 81mm and 60mm white phosphorous rounds, Law's, 155mm illumination rounds and C.S. cannisters. It was extremely difficult to position the fire truck because of the live ordinance that was strewn about the area. We also had enemy incoming to contend with, and we had to fight this fire with our gas masks on due to the toxic fumes from burning magnesium, white phosphorous and C.S. gas.

On the final run of the third trip to the ammo dump, I removed my gas mask to better see what I was doing, I don't remember very much after that for a couple of days, except that I could not breath very well and I had a lot of chest pain.

I have been diagnosed as having reactive airway disease and asthma, I believe that this is the incident that it initially began, due to the fact that I breathed burning magnesium white phosphorous and C.S. gas that day. I never received the Purple Heart Citation for this wound.

The third incident involved a crash by Air Force Mission 603 on the afternoon of 4/13/1968. I was still feeling pretty bad from the ammo dump fire of 4/9/1968, but I was still fully involved in this crash and rescue. We reached the crash site in approximately three minutes. The aircraft was completely engulfed in flames. We managed to get the crew and passengers to safety with one exception. The civilian coffee farmer Felix Poilane, had been killed on impact. This was an extremely difficult situation because our M-B 5 crash truck was now inoperable due to the damage it had sustained during the ammo dump fires of 3/22 and 23/1968. As a result we were forced to use our navy structural fire truck, and we did not have any foaming capacity to fight fuel fires. As a result, we were forced to fight this fire with handheld fire extinguishers and water from our fire truck. We completely exhausted the K.S.C.B. water supply. There was a great deal of burning magnesium from the structure of the aircraft, and I was again affected by the fumes from this fire but was never treated.

Myself and my buddy Mike Haggerty were finally extracted in May exactly the same way we came in, under heavy incoming and by another medevac chopper.

I've been trying to verify my health problems for my V.A. claim. I have severe problems with my lungs and my eyes and hearing but without success, since my records were destroyed by fire.

If any one remembers any of these incidents, please write to me. I'd like to hear from you.

Ed note: It is indeed a small world. I was across the airstrip on the C company side when the crash of the plane that killed Felix Poilane took place. I remember a fistfight between one of the Air Force crewman and, I believe, some people from the crash crew. It was at the back of the plane while it was still smoldering and before it burned. Anyone else have any recollection of this or any of the other incidents brother Novotny mentions?

Dear Michael:

Saw your notice in the VFW magazine. I was in the Marine Corps and was at Khe Sanh in 67-68 during the Tet offensive. I commanded Alpha Battery 1/13. If I can furnish any info for your research, I'd be glad to.

Quacks At Khe Sanh?

by Ron Parsons
15 APS

While at Khe Sanh, I was Airman Second Class Parsons, who was one of the crazy guys who used to dodge artillery fire on the runway when the C-130s would come in. This letter is long overdue. I was a little disappointed when I went to the 25th reunion in July of 93. Have I procrastinated that long? I actually had a fantasy that I was going to be reunited with one or more of my brothers from Khe Sanh. Although I met some of the greatest guys in the world and I had time to share some laughs and some tears, I felt a loss because I don't know what happened to those guys. Maybe some of you can help me locate them. They were from either 1/26 or 3/26, and they lived on the northeast perimeter to the east of the water point. To this day I can't remember their names, but I got to talk to them almost every day of the three months I spent at Khe Sanh. One of the guys, the most outgoing of the two, was medium height and stocky. He had a large scar across one of his shoulder blades that he said he got during an ambush. His sidekick was short, thin and had curly hair. The most notable thing was that he had been bitten by a rat about April 1968. I think he had to get the shots. These descriptions could probably fit most of the guys at Khe Sanh, but this may help jog some memories. One day the ABC News reporters were around and they needed a guitar player so my buddies came over to the bunker and got me. Fifteen Marines and I sang: "WE GOT TO GET OUTA THIS PLACE" by Eric Burdon and The Animals. This played on coast to coast TV on the 11 pm news. Now, another memory jogger, one of the the guys sitting in the front of the group had a pet duck!! A duck at Khe Sanh? Yes, he did. Surely there weren't many guys who had ducks around.

I heard someone talking about a pet duck at the reunion, but I wasn't able to get any more information. That is why I wrote this letter. If you are one of the guys in the video or know one of the guys I'm talking about, please give me a call @ (508) 947-2276. If you can't afford it, call me collect. I sure would like to fill in some of the blanks in my memory.

If I didn't get a chance to say thanks for protecting my butt while serving with you guys, I'm thanking you now. Hope to hear from someone soon. I may have been in the Air Force, but Semper Fi sure has a special meaning to me.

God bless.

Ed note: Ron continues to serve us. He is a psychiatric nurse with the Department of Veteran Affairs as well as a Captain in the Army Reserves. And, Ron, if you do hear something about this duck, please share it with us.

Publication Committee:

I would be more than happy to send my dues on an annual basis, but this Fall 1995 issue is the first time I have received a newsletter since the winter of 94. As I don't see another amount in the notice from the pub. comm. I am enclosing a check for another $20.

On page 7 top left, list of units at Khe Sanh, it was the 20th TASS (Tactical Air Support Squadron) that was at Khe Sanh (USAF) not the 23rd. This is important to me as I was there from 12/26/67-March or April of 68. I was a radio operator with 20th TASS. We were the FAC's ,Birddogs or Coveys, whichever name you use. When all our aircraft pulled out, a couple of us remained there with you guys. Me being one of them and and E-6 named Red. We stayed to man the radios and keep the generators running and whatever else we USAF ground troops could do to assist you Marines. For most of the time there, you did not like us but after you saw that we were just as dirty, thirsty, hungry and, well, you know the story, you accepted us. We did not always stay in that now so famous bunker. I have never heard from anyone that was there except one Marine named Bill and I have not seen nor can I locate him now. I do have something that you guys have, everyday Khe Sanh takes up the biggest part of my thoughts, and I never get more than 3 or 4 hours sleep. And that is not sound sleep but one-eye-opened sleep. Anyway, 20th TASS, Tigerhounds, Birddogs, Covey, FAC's, at least give us that.

Dear Jim and Ski,

As I told you in our phone conversations, Ernie Spencer suggested that the three of us take a shot at putting together an anthology of poetry by Khe Sanh vets. Ernie's thought was that this would be a benefit to the membership and perhaps something to give to new members. If we can put together the poetry, Ernie thought he could find appropriate photos or other art.

I would suggest that each of us do the following. First, look back through old issues of The Khe Sanh Veteran or other sources for poems that we like. Second, put together some of our poetry about the war. Finally, exchange what we have found and what we have done and then try to pick the most meaningful ones for an anthology. There is a lot of good stuff here and it should be collected. The number of selections and types of subject matter will probably becomne clearer as we look at what we jointly come up with.

Thank you both for agreeing to help so promptly.

Chuck Patterson

Dear Sirs:

Enclosed please find my check for membership in The Khe Sanh Veterans. I served at Khe Sanh with Sub Unit #1, 1st Radio Battalion USMC from Aug. 67 to late March 68. Our unit was a small unit (usually less than 12) and generally operated independently from the main line units. I believe officially we were attached to the 3rd Bn. 26th Marines at Khe Sanh.

I just received your impressive-looking newsletter with my membership application. I have not yet had a chance to read it, but I do hope that its publication will continue and also that I will be able to receive the membership directory.

Back in 1969 I read the Marine Corps publication "The Battle For Khe Sanh." That book, a few casual bar conversations and an occasional question from one of my five children seems to be my only contact with Khe Sanh these past twenty-eight years. Hopefully, your directory may help me to contact some of the men I served with those may years ago.

Very truly yours,
Robert Schirtz

Dear Sir:

I am writing in response to your ad in the VFW magazine. I arrived at Khe Sanh in early summer of 67. I was a member of the Scout Snipper Plt. attached to Regimental Headquarters Company 26th Marines. My rank was corporal, and it was my second tour. My first tour was in Sept. 65 to Sept. 66 with the 2nd Bn. 4th Marines, 81mm mortar Plt.

I have no idea what you are after or what to include in this letter. Suffice it to say it has never bothered me to talk about the war. After the siege started, I was mainly attached to Hotel Company on base and spent a couple of months with India Company on Hill 881S with Capt. Dabney. I had a 3-9x Weaver mounted on an M-16 A1. It was rather unique and some others may remember it. Feel free to keep in touch.

Sincerely,
David E. Steller

Ed reply: David, since it doesn't bother you to talk about the war, why don't you? We'd love to read your memoirs about your first and second tours.

Dear Mr. O'Hara:

I am writing in response to the article I read in the Nov. 95 issue of my VFW magazine. I am interested in the details of this new organization. I served in and around Khe Sanh with the 1st. Bn. 26th Marines. We rotated from Hill 881N to 881S and back to the air strip. I received 2 Purple Hearts.

I am a VFW life member and past Post and District Commander. I have worked for the U.S. Postal Service for the past 25 years.

Sincerely,
Tony Stephens

Matt Syrajanen, a new member who served with the Seabees in late 1968 seeks anyone who might remember him. His nickname was 'Mad Marr."

Dear fellow 1/9 Khe Sanh Vet,

In response to the article about the assault on Alpha company's outpost on Hill 64, I would like to give my account of what occurred that day. I was the Platoon Sergeant for Weapons' Platoon Bravo 1/9. We occupied the top of the hill at the rock quarry. I was called Sergeant "T" short for Thibault. On the particular morning I heard small arms fire from your side of the quarry. All of a sudden they were asking for volunteers to get the NVA out and off of Hill 64. My Platoon Commander immediately was on his way. He was a young "surfer dude" from California. He had a thing about getting a Heart. Well, he must have gotten what he wanted because I never saw him again. While he was out there, he called in a fire mission for my 60 mortars. I threw in a couple of H.E.'s and he told me to keep it coming, so I let them fly. (All 300 rounds I had in my bunkers.) The Battalion Commander was not too happy about all of those rounds being fired, because it was too dangerous to resupply us. I just took my orders and the H.E. flew.

After a while I became curious to see where my rounds were impacting, so I crawled up the the very tip of the quarry. Unfortunately, the first thing I saw was my first dead Marine. He was a big Marine, sprawled out in front of an NVA bunker. I could see two NVA jungle hats with their little red stars moving around from my vantage point. It was impossible for me to stay any longer because of incoming rounds. Of course, you know we had a lot of incoming on our little hill.

I have PTSD and I have thought of the Marine many times. I would like to know if my supporting fire had any affect on the NVA.

Yours truly
Sgt. T, Bravo 1/9 Semper Fi

Dear Mike:

Found your ad in the VFW magazine. My name is Jim Zikaras. I served in Nam 68-69 with Lima 3/9 and HQ Company. My rank was Cpl.. We were at the Rockpile, Ca Lu aka Vandergrift, Khe Sanh, Quang Tri, Dong Ha, etc. Many of my brothers from 1/9 (The Walking Dead) were at that miserable dump during the siege, as well as a few from 3/9 and of course those poor bastards from the 26th Marines.

I have a friend who flew the Big Ugly Fuckers (B-52s) who would also like info on the organization. He wasn't on the ground during the siege, but if it wasn't for him and his friends dropping all that shit for us, not to many people would be writing to you now. His name is Bill Fox. He was an E-6 with the 4133 Bomb Wing (P) Utapao, Thailand.

Semper Fi,

Ed reply: Certainly, we welcome the Big Kahunas (B-52s) into our organization. We are open to all; civilian and military, who served at, over, or, around Khe Sanh between 1961 and 1971.

FOR WHAT I'M WORTH

by Manny Babbitt-10/17/95

This may go out as a fond prayer
That you who stand at my side be always there
I'm just a man with a good side and a bad
I came into the world like everyone else
With what I had

Lots of bumps along the way may not have been in my favor Whatever keeps me alive besides this human form I'm in I'm sure words spoken will play a great part in it
For those who speak the words
Let them come out in truth
And not things that were said somewhere in the past
And no one wants to come forward and prove I did or said these things

Whatever the future brings
I'm here to face that reality
And my heart is very sure it will fly off to a better place

Another Casualty of War

Sat up in bed early one morning his sleepy fingers wrapped around a mug of warm coffee closed his eyes inhaled the freshness sipped it slow quiet, while she slept on the far side of the bed turned away so careful not to touch him
as she had done for so long.
Deepened anger hard words old pain had shot back and forth loud between them all day everyday every day, silenced only by their exhausted sleep.
He reached out his hand and touched her smooth shoulder felt her warmth, soft tears remembered the good-ol'-days when they used to smile at each other so easy.

A MARINE'S THOUGHTS

David Sanders
Jeff Sowers
K/3726

I'm just nineteen, not much of a man,
But yet I'm old enough to go to Vietnam.
Is there a reason to fight) a reason to die?
I think there is, but most people don't know why
They go on burning their cards, and carrying signs
While our young men are getting shot, blown up by mines.
Picture in your mind a small child crying,
Lost, hungry, and alone, watching her mother dying, Shot through the head, stabbed in the side.
Imagine your father, tortured and blood soaked,
Because when his home was burned, he mistakingly spoke.
Picture your mother—molested and raped'
Her hands and feet tied, her mouth and eyes taped.
Your wife or your girlfriend laying lifeless and nude,
Murdered for no reason, robbed of their food.
Imagine it now, think about it while you can,
Because if we quit fighting, they'll set foot on our land.
Keep protesting in the streets, don't let us bomb, Withdraw our troops, get out of Viet Nam.
If you continue these demonstrations, I'll promise you
That all of the above will eventually come TRUE.
Should we give up our flag, freedom, and choice of profession
Simply because we ignored communist agression?
I don't want to die, but I'll carry the torch,
I'll give up my life to keep them off your front porch.
Heaven forbid, but if I'm slain,
I beg of you fellow Americans, don't let me die in vain!

Hello Michael:

While having my morning coffee this Veterans Day and reading the new issue of VFW magazine, I noticed the information about your organization in the "NOW HEAR THIS" page.

While I was awaiting the start of our annual Veterans Day parade later that day with my two younger children, I had time to reflect on reading the magazine and seeing the news brief about The Khe Sanh Veterans. I am not much of a joiner, but I felt maybe there was a reason, as yet unknown, as to why today of all days I just happened upon your organization. I felt compelled to reply in the hope that I might someday be glad that I did respond.

I served at Khe Sanh, Hills 881N and 881S with 3/26 in the 81mm platoon. I arrived in country in 67 and was twice medevaced out of country before I completed my 13-month tour. I'm still somewhat disabled from my second injury. Please drop me a line if I can be of any help to promote your organization here in upstate New York.

Semper Fi,
Del Chamberlain

Ed note: Del, I offer you a possible reason why you felt compelled. I quote Ray Stubbe, who said: "We are all pieces of a mirror that was shattered at Khe Sanh and by coming back together we can, once again, become whole."

Dear Sir:

Please take my husband's name, Patrick Coffey (India 3/9), off of your mailing list. He suffered with emphysema for several years, probably caused by Agent Orange. He passed away in April of 1995 during surgery to remove bad lung tissue to hopefully help him breathe better.

Thank you,
Judy A. Coffey

The Earthstewards Network

Hi Ernie:

Ray Stubbe suggested we contact you to tell you about an upcoming project we will be conducting in Quang Tri Province to remove mines and unexploded ordnance. Our second phase will entail planting a Friendship Forest Park with trees where the mines and bombs had been. We in Earthstewards Network have done 18 similar projects throughout the world. If any of your members would like to contribute to this project or be a part of it, please contact us. The Vietnamese government insists that their people remove the mines and unexploded ordnance, but we can participate in the planting of trees for the park. We are planning this phase for November or December of 1996.

I am a Ph.D. candidate in American History at Boston University. I am writing to you because I feel that my project might be of interest to your readers. It deals with the experiences of American women on the "homefront" during the war in Viet Nam. In my dissertation I will explore the effects the conditions of dissent and division over the war had on the lives of the wives, mothers and girlfriends of American men who fought in Viet Nam.

Much has been written about the Viet Nam era. Yet the perspective of women who sent their loved ones to fight is glaringly absent. I believe that for many women whose husbands, sons and boyfriends fought, and were perhaps wounded or killed in Viet Nam, the war was a pivotal experience in their lives. I would like to hear from women who would be willing to share their experiences about their lives on the "homefront." I welcome all letters from women describing any aspect of their experience, no matter how seemingly insignificant. I am very excited about hearing from them and hope you will find space in your publication to post this query.

Author's Query:

For a study of women's experiences during the Viet Nam War, I would appreciate hearing from the mother's, wives and girlfriends of men who fought in the Viet Nam conflict. Please include memories about the period your loved ones served overseas, including (but not restricted to) strategies for coping, networks of support, and attitudes of the population at large. Please also include a brief description of your background, including age, race, ethnicity, and the area of the military with which your loved one served. Send responses to:

Ray Stubbe responds: Your focus of research will definitely be a major contribution by considering a facet of the total Vietnam War experience that has hitherto been neglected. I might also suggest contact with servicemen who received "Dear John" type correspondence from wives and sweethearts unwilling to maintain a relationship during the year of service in Vietnam. Some of these were absolutely devastating to our men. In some cases, they repeatedly extended their periods of service there, perhaps as a sort of death-wish. Along the same lines were the POWs returned in 1973 whose wives had remarried. Another facet were the increased stress that resulted in devastating medical conditions to the wives (and, of course, parents): cancer, heart attacks, strokes, etc., which is also a possible aspect to research. I wish you the best in your pursuits to research and record this vital aspect necessary for a total understanding of what our experience has been.

Another Khe Sanh Veteran Troubled with PTSD

PTSD is a psychological disorder that will drive a man into a point of total extinction or very close to it. Being at Khe Sanh from the beginning to the end of the siege has left a horrible memory within me that is very difficult to erase. It is very hard to cope with society at times. It seems that at times there is a block between me and the outside world

You would never expect people that you worked with for many years trusting and faithfully would ever say and do things that brought tears to your eyes. A grown man crying because of the comments made about your race. These are people that were never there.When your are told that the reason so many Mexican-Americans were killed in Vietnam was because we looked the same as the enemy—that digs the PTSD deeper into your thoughts, nightmares and flashbacks. It doesn't matter how hard you try to forget—flashbacks,nightmares and these denigrating remarks about your race will always be there. It does not matter how hard you try to forget, there will always be something to bring back flashbacks and nightmares.

I have had many guilt feelings because I could not bring young men back to life again. I had many fears about not coming back alive. There are many days and nights that I sit on my bed and cry because I failed to do what I was supposed to do. When I go to an appointment with the Veterans Administration there are many times that I feel we are treated as guinea pigs.

To forgive and forget is something many of us try to do but in some cases, you cannot do either.

Sincerely,
A.F. Lucero, A proud American

Dear Ray Stubbe:

I should have wrote you sooner, but things have been so messed up the past two months. Roy T. Burns died this past Oct. 14th at the V.A. hospital in Mississippi. We all miss him. He has lived in my house for the past 6 years, so I knew him quite well, but he could not or would not quit drinking and it cost him his life. It is such a shame that he wasted it that way. He had a lot of good in him. His children and I tried to help him, but it all boils down to he had to do it himself.

Please take care and may God bless you.

Peggy M. Nock

Ray Stubbe note: Kevin Macaulay once told me that Roy Burns was the "premier point man" for their recon team at Khe Sanh. In conversations with Roy, I learned that he had grown up in the swamps of Florida and thus was very aware of things in nature that might indicate dangers. He prided himself that no one ever was killed on a recon team on which he was the point. Some of these patrols did involve collisions with NVA soldiers, but he was able to spot signs of their presence and move the patrol away from danger. I forget now just how many patrols he was on, but it was MANY. For the past year or so, he moved a disabled Vietnam vet who was in a wheelchair to live with him and his "significant other" in Florida. The note tells it all. Roy had a very bad drinking problem even at Khe Sanh. He was so good in the field that he was meritoriously promoted on numerous occasions, but upon return to the base, he'd get drunk and do something stupid and always get busted again.

Hank Norman

The poem I've enclosed, "Marion Henry Norman", has a story of its own. Much of that story, of course, has to do with Hank.

Hank and I shared a locker together at The Basic School. Both of us were older than the other Lieutenants in our class and married. Those coincidences alone might never have made us friends, but as many of you know, Hank was a hard guy not to like. There were six of us, including Kim Johnson and Dennie Peterson, the subject of the poem in the last issue, who became close friends, as did our wives. The knowledge that we would be going to Vietnam infused those friendships with an unusual intensity and immediacy. By March 1967 when we graduated, we were closer than brothers.

Hank was the warm one. When the group of us would get together at someone's apartment, Hank could always handle the small problems, like making a barbecue sauce from Karo and catsup or snow ice cream with a little vanilla extract. He always had that dry Texas smile that radiated a quiet confidence.

Kim as quieter than the rest and I did not see as much of him. He and his beautiful wife had the strength their Mormon faith brought them, but the tolerance to accept those of us who did not. I felt better about myself knowing that they were my friends. When we got to Vietnam in the summer of 1967, we were scattered throughout I Corps but tried to keep in touch. The first of the six, Steve Muller, was killed near Camp Carroll in the fall of 1967 and then Dennie Peterson near Quang Tin.

Kim was killed, if I remember correctly, early in the Siege. I had been in and out of Khe Sanh a number of times and the pain of hearing of his death after seeing him was great. With Hank it was even greater. I was in Khe Sanh at the end of February, a few days before he died. We spent some time in the ARVN Rangers area, and I think that was when I met Ken Pipes and some of the other Marines of Bravo. Before I left, we put a camera up on some sandbags and took a picture of the two of us. When I had the film developed a few weeks later, everything in the photograph was in clear focus except Hank's face. When I was back in the states I took the film to a developer and asked for another print, because I thought the print had been smudged. They told me it was in the film. His face was out of focus. No other print on the roll was out of focus..

I was at Ca Lu when I heard Hank had died. I wrote the first part of the poem then. It was fifteen years before I wrote another word. When Hank died, there were only two of us left and two of my cousins had died in that year. From that time I went numb. There wasn't any pain anymore. I came to believe that the only thing in life was death.

When I got back to the world, I told the last of those six friends that I felt that I had died in 1968, and I was just marking time until I was buried. I couldn't talk about Vietnam because I couldn't talk about death. At the same time I missed it, because it was the only time I'd really felt alive. In 1983, it all came rushing back (I don't need to explain that to you) and after awhile I was able to finish this poem and write the others. I still miss my friends.

Dear Ernie:

A few things for the next magazine:

NOTE: Anyone who recalls SGTMAJ Donald BEAN (H&S, 1/26), KIA on 11 March 1968, Khe Sanh Combat Base, please contact his daughter, Nita, at: 390 7th St., Taneyville MO 65759, tel: (417) 546-3368.

I just read in the Retired Officers Association magazine that JOHN HENNELLY had died. I called his home, talked with his wife, and discovered that he died 5 June 1995 from a very sudden heart-attack. He had been working on the roof, was very active right to the end. He was sitting in a chair and just fell over, dying before he hit the floor. He was the Commanding Officer of I/13, the artillery unit at Khe Sanh, and was in charge of the FSCC.

NOTE: Many telephone Area Codes have recently been changed or are in the process of changing. If yours has changed, please send in your new phone number to: Ray W. Stubbe, 8766 Park View Ct., Wauwatosa WI 53226.

ANNOUNCEMENT: Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., is offering a book which will contain a listing of the 1675 men KIA in the Khe Sanh battlefield area listed both alphabetically as well as by date. The listing by date includes unit, and in many cases, a brief description of the circumstances surrounding the casualty—how it happened or a little note about the person. There are also listings of those who were at Khe Sanh but who died after leaving Khe Sanh. (This listing needs much input from you, the readers, in order to be more complete.) There is a description of how to get to the two Khe Sanh Memorials (the one in Arlington and the two at Jefferson Barracks, MO), a summary by operations of casualties, notes on the civilian and NVA casualties. The book is 210 pages long. One of our Khe Sanh veterans donated $5,000.[00] to cover the costs of publication of 1,000 copies. These will be for sale at $12.[00] each. All proceeds from this sale (minus the shipping costs) will go to our treasury. Hopefully, we should make a good boost to our treasury through this sale. As of 29 February, the books have been printed and are in the process of being bound. Please submit requests to: Ray W. Stubbe, 8766 Park View Ct., Wauwatosa WI 53226, with checks made out to: KHE SANH VETS INC.

Hopefully a new Membership Directory should be forthcoming soon. We've added at least 500 (that's a conservative figure) since the last Directory, perhaps dropped about 40, and there've been perhaps 200 address changes. So we really need one, not only for these corrections and additions, but so that the many new men can have one.

Mike O'Hara had a note placed in the VFW national magazine about our organization which generated well over 100 responses from new men!! I just finished sending out letters to each of them together with a copy of our new magazine.

The month of February is finishing its days, and the Siege is winding down, although a few more days of terrific shelling and devastating personal loss remain, Ernie. Hope all is well with you. I definitely need to call you soon; we haven't really talked in some time, although I've been sort of "bunkerized" for the past several months.

I had a dream a couple of nights ago in which I was in a bunkered-kind of room—lots of timbers on the walls and ceiling. All at once everything is starting to collapse, and I am running here and there among all the timbers to avoid being crushed. I guess there is a feeling of the collapse of everything around me, perhaps tied in to the memory of bunkers being hit at Khe Sanh—mine, by the way, was indeed struck by a rocket, which penetrated the wall, but didn't explode. Several men have commented through the years about that—the ones that had come there to remove the round. Oddly, at the time, although the wall bucked, I was sitting there eating my C-ration and just continued as though nothing had happened! Anyway, you are one of the reasons the bunker doesn't completely collapse!

While talking to a psychologist the other day, I was telling of a helicopter on one of our ships being commissioned in Bremerton/Seattle in 1970. I got in it and they asked me to fasten my seat belt, and I remember how surprised I was to have to fasten a seat belt—in a helicopter! Then I remarked that it had windows—and then said, without even thinking, "This helicopter really isn't safe at all; it has no bullet holes in it!" The psychologist was shocked. I didn't even remember what I had said—although he promptly reminded me! I guess it was that the pilots hadn't been through the skirmishes, how could I trust them!

I realized that Sunday the 21st of January 1996 is the same as 1968—both being on Sundays, and have become aware that I am reliving each day more intensely than I have in times past! Even to the point of the "enemy" and the danger by venturing outside. Then it was, of course, the shelling and snipers; now it is the extreme cold. A couple of years ago, my car conked out and I was stranded in extreme below-zero weather for several hours waiting for assistance. Now I realize that every time I venture out I may experience the same thing, and so do not venture forth! I guess it's a kind of PTSD, but even knowing that really doesn't seem to help. One of the most difficult parts of this PTSD is that I just simply know that each day is my last. I "finish" things (like doing my income tax—which is really a joke anyway since my line 31 is usually around 10K or 12K, in the lowest 20% of the population) before I get all the information simply because I don't want others to do my tax forms when something happens to me. I need to get letters answered, bills payed—it's desperate—for the same reason. I can't have any long-term commitments or projects, because I just know I'll never complete them. Oh well, even knowing this doesn't permit me to escape it. Sometimes I think it's even a desire or hope that this will be my last day! Isn't it interesting how we all have PTSD in different forms?

Take care, my friend.

LONG BEACH—Twenty-seven years after Tom Winston was burned in a munitions dump explosion in Vietnam, he has received a Purple Heart. The La Habra man was honored Saturday in a ceremony at Long Beach Naval Shipyard during a graduation ceremony for the South Bay Young Marines, a Corps-sponsored youth program.The 45-year-old retired Marine master sergeant blinked back tears as the medal was pinned to his chest. He blamed a recordkeeping mix-up for the delay.

Winston, a Bakersfield native, is dying from Huntington's disease, a brain disorder.

Winston was 18 when enemy fire struck his unit at Khe Sanh on April 9,1968. The ammunition technician raced to fight a fire that threatened a munitions dump, which exploded. He suffered burns over 35 percent of his body but recovered and served three more years in Vietnam. He retired from the Marines about 12 years ago.

Wearing a black baseball cap and a black jacket bearing the Brothers of Vietnam logo and motto, "Lest We Forget," Winston received a standing ovation from several hundred people attending the combined ceremonies.

Winston's father, Willard Winston of Norwalk, a retired Marine, and his 18-year-old son, Thomas, of Minneapolis, attended the ceremony.

Researching Your Memoirs, eh?

by R. "DOC" Ferrell

I began my journal in 1973 on a whim, to pass time. I was bartending in a hustle bar in Waikiki. By 1980 the document had taken on novella proportions. I gave it a title. By 1979 I was back on the mainland finishing university in Nebraska. Then one bright morning television announced a new movie soon to be out in a theatre near me. My title was stolen. The new flick had my book title! In a fit of depression, I tossed the entire work in the trash, finished school and returned to Hawaii in 1983. In 1992 a VA counselor asked me to rewrite the whole thing from memory. All those years of notes, maps, and photos were gone.

I started over. It was a confusing, incoherent pile of paper no one, including me, could decipher. Choosing an outline format saved my work. It was rather simple actually. I spent 13 months in Vietnam. I simply divided my journal into 13 monthly sections or chapters. At that point, I painstakingly went through all my work and put it in the appropriate time frame. Within each monthly time frame, I tried to put entries in chronological sequence. Now I had something to work with. I could take each entry, expand on it, rewrite it, work with it until a somewhat more cohesive story began to immerge. Still something was missing.

Details! Details were missing! I'm talking about the itemized fabric of my memory over the last 28 years. Memories lost, hazy, distorted. More importantly, there were the details (events) that I knew nothing about in those days. Why I was in a given sector, why I was doing this or that? What was the overall mission? These were things I did not know then, nor was I privy to. How could I fill in these glaring gaps? In 1973, remembering 1966 was like yesterday. I could still clearly see the faces of the dead. By 1992, things were a bit fuzzy. Memories were no longer clear images but rather sounds, smells, small flashbacks of recollection generated by something as common as a look on someone's face or a sudden noise. Random access memory seemed only to apply to my computer. Mine was in the crapper. Then one day it hit me. The solution!

It was easy! I used the Internet. Finding the home page for the U.S. Marine Corps was a snap. I e-mailed the highest ranking officer who had the temerity to list his/her name on the home page asking the question: "Ah...do you guys keep any kind of archives? Did anyone take notes during the war? Where are they?" Bingo! Everything you ever wanted to know about the "green machine" is kept in archive at the Washington Navy Yard. Well, actually, it's not a yard, per se, lest they have to detail a bunch of E-1's to mow it but rather an impressive group of old buildings dating back to the King George III administration. I think it houses the JAG Corps if I'm not mistaken, but that's another story.

All units within the "crotch" keep what are known as A.A.R.'s (After Action Reports), be it a firefight or notes on a memorable night at the O-Club in Da Nang...you know, where officer pogues swilled beer, ate steaks, and generally toughed it out for an RVN ribbon while you and I humped the bush looking for little guys in tacky black pajamas.

These reports begin at the squad level, to platoon, to company, to battalion (kind of like whispering to a line of people relaying a message, hoping like hell it comes out at the end in it's original context.) Some poor E-1 prick got to type it up on a 20-year-old Army hand-me-down typewriter, where it was sent on through channels (yes...channels, whatever those are?), until it found its way to the Washington Navy Yard. At that point it was copied, and recopied until it's barely legible—marked over, deleted, retyped, folded, stained with Spam grease and coffee until at long last, it is photographed.

See, in those days the military did not have scanners and computers. The "crotch" still does not have scanners and puters. "Oh yeah? You say, How did you access the Corps' home page then?" Actually, the Commandant USMC bought his daughter a PC, the Corps uses hers until the Army gives us theirs. I digress. So what we have at the "yard" is our memories, our history, our lives on microfiche. Yes! Vintage celluloid. Miles of it rolled on little wheels like old movies.

Don't panic! Oh what the hell! Panic for christ's sake. Microfiche, while outdated, can be converted to hard copy or converted to a computer-ready page. You thread the microfiche wheel/tape on a special viewer (any library has one), then you scroll through the photographed pages. See one you like? Just drop a coin in the slot, and a Xerox machine attached to the viewer produces your hard copy of the film. For you puter geeks, just put the hard copy on a scanner. Note: You better have damn good OCR (Optical Character Recognition) software. Remember the way the original was typed? Old machines, damaged keys, typeface filled with the red dirt and sand of southeast Asia. Blotchy, smeared type and ink. Frequently unreadable in the original, I let my OCR have at it, and it was so confused its deciphered response looked like Russian 101. Go figure.

In reviewing the archives, after all these years you will still find records "blacked out" CIA style. Why? Who knows. I have actually seen the weather for a particular day blacked out. As we all know, meteorologists are never correct. What is the big secret? Another thing you will find are V.I.P. lists. Score upon score of politicians and general officers who dropped in for a visit to collect their ribbon or political brownie points. It's the who's who list of officers, representatives, senators, cabinet officials and military contractors who had a vested interest in our "cannon fodder" butts. You gotta love'm. Some of these pricks are still alive!

One other little item you will discover in the archives is that a particular event, as you remember it, is recorded somewhat differently for posterity. Ernie Spencer suggests I be a little less critical about such things. Strive to forgive the little mistakes concerning events I have or had no control over. He has no idea what he is asking of me. Nevertheless, when you discover your little piece of rewritten history—these convenient errors—try not to lose it completely. You will scare the crap out of the librarian. Remember her only defense is a glaring, puckered 'Shoossssh!' in reprimand. After that she faints, and you have to call 911.

For you Khe Sanh Veterans of a different persuasion, i.e., Air Force, Navy, Army, et al, you will have to locate your own archives. I have no idea where they are. However, a good place

Address your request to: Mr. Frederick J. Graboske, Head, Archives Section. Fred is a very accommodating kind of guy. He is extremely helpful and considerate. Tell him why you want the films. He can't send them to you personally. He will send them to you in care of your local library, so give him the head librarian's name and the library's address. In the meantime, let the head librarian know personally, from you, that these films are coming. The librarian will be very intimidated by the fact that you are getting this material, and will in all likelihood guard it like her virginity. Be so advised. Be prepared to show 3 forms of I.D., your library card, a note from your wife or girlfriend, your DD214, your FBI file, vaccination record, shirt size, your tax returns for the last 3 years, a picture of your first lover, a ham sandwich, and an autographed picture of the Honolulu Boy's Choir (Just kidding of course...the sandwich is optional).

So, if you're looking for the lost details of your memoirs, get these tapes. Read them, remember the events, the sounds, the smells. Let them transport you back to a time when you lost your innocence. It is your history. The Corps kept your memories for you. After all this time you can recover them and remember.

As for me, I ordered all the film files on 1/5 for the months I was with them. Fairly straight forward A.A.R.'s. My other search was when I was with III M.A.F., a substantially larger organizational hierarchy to sift through. I began by requesting the pertinent months. The reports were archived according to TAOR (tactical area of responsibility)—in this case, Provinces. I selected those two provinces from Chu-Lai to Quang Ngai city. From there, I scanned for reports on operations I was involved in. One thing leads to another. I began making copies. Sixty dollars in dimes later, I had a stack of paper. I had my research.

You get only two weeks to use them. After requesting them, they arrive in about a month unless your films are out on loan.

Some of the files have photographs. I have one taken at Chu-Lai—you can see the pogue in charge of frozen foods filling requests for the Chu Lai supply depot in front of the tent, while his assistant sells food to combat troops out the back door. It was the only way one could get food or ammunition it seemed. Actually, we obtained many needed items from the ROKs (Korean Marines) who were eager to please, no paperwork, and quicker then the supply personnel.

Then there was the time when we "borrowed" a jeep from a CIA field operative to steal ice for our hot beer ration, but...

Ahhhh the memories.

Brief Synopsis of My Khe Sanh Experience

by CPL Tim Haley
"C" Company 1/9 60 MM Mortars

We were leaving peaceful Camp Evans, which was a wonderful place with small brief encounters with the enemy compared to Con Thien and the DMZ. We had real food somewhat regularly, cots to sleep on and a relatively normal existence.

Packing up and moving out to the makeshift L.Z., boarding the big Chinook helicopters for a ride to some other unknown place, another battle, another Hell.

Up through the clouds heading west the jungle below giving way to huge mountains—mountains we had fought in before near Ca Lu and the Rockpile. Looking down, we could see the destination—an air strip, roads, bunkers.

January 21, 1968. The crew chief comes to me and yells above the roar of the motors, "They are taking incoming now. When we land, we'll let down the ramp and you guys haul ass." This was something we all had come to be pretty good at, hauling ass and finding cover. I passed the word in an attempt to get everyone ready. So what happens when we finally touch down? No ramp comes down and these guys leisurely taxi to a parking space!

Finally, we are off our rolling target and manage to find some relative cover but we are all bunched up and anxious to get moving. Once someone figures out what to do with us we are humping down a small road with waves of departing civilians and Arvns (the Arvns were always leaving.) We're going in and these people are all leaving.

Finally, we, 1/9, are settling in to the daily routine of constant enemy incoming, probing and spend most of our time being resupplied, reinforced and improving our defensive positions.

Significant recollections of encounters are of Lovato being killed on an L.P., Gook sappers getting in Bravo Company's trenchline, the ammo dump being blown up and CS gas blowing over us.

As the 60 MM mortar section leader, who now had 17 men I was responsible for, I began attending meetings with all platoon commanders and our C.O. for daily briefings as to our status and that of the NVA who had us zeroed in and surrounded. We were always surrounded.

The night Alpha Company's outpost was attacked and overrun, our mortar section was the only available immediate support. 81's were too close so for hours, our 3 tubes provided all we could to help those guys out. We were congratulated and told what a good job we had done. One lieutenant at our next meeting asked if he should now salute me and I was told I was to be promoted to E-5 meritoriously.

We pulled security on the drop zone several times The huge C-130, dropping their cargo with parachutes attached, was something to see.

Lang Vei had been overrun with NVA driving tanks. We were issued 3.5 rocket launchers, AWS'50 caliber machine guns and told where to aim at to knock them out. The worst part was being issued bayonets for the anticipated hand-to-hand combat that was inevitable with the pending human wave attacks that were to come at anytime.

Mid- or late March, there were 17 of us; by April 8th there were only 4 of us left.

Leaving our perimeter for Hill 471 was somewhat uneventful until we got closer to our objective. Coming around the side of a hill, there was a bridge-like finger that crossed directly in front of the NVA machine guns and their fields of fire. To get to the other side, one had to cross this individually, running like crazy. One guy was blown up right in front of us and tumbled down the hill. Alpha and Delta Companys were in the assault. Now, it was my turn to cross. Well, what do you know, I made it! Of course, the other side was no better, more incoming. We must have dug in 6 times that day, very hastily, shallow holes.

We kept setting up to support the assault of Hill 471, but amid all the confusion were never used. These guys were throwing grenades at the gooks on top as fast as they could. Very close fighting—a very surreal picture.

A newsman came to us for directions and the next time we saw him, he was blown to pieces, his chest and face blown away. The hill was now secure. We climbed up and were in a bomb crater planning our defensive positions and boom! incoming right in our bomb crater. The concussion was pretty intense. When the smoke cleared, there was lots of screaming wounded. Tom Allen, one of the best mortarmen in Nam was hit in the elbow and casually asked me if he could be medevaced. He had been standing about 3 feet from me. To my left about 5 yards away was Sergeant Bridges and the weapons platoon commander. Both had been blown up. We got the corpsman who took one look and declared them both dead, but we insisted Bridges was still alive and got him to the L. Z. I read his name among the dead, later, at a memorial service. We dug in, ate and settled in and by God if we weren't attacked that night, hundreds of NVA assaulted the hill. I had a 45 in one hand, grenade in the other. Bergland and all the guys on the line held them off and reports were 300 NVA didn't see the sun come up. We gathered up some prisoners, some wounded, and I'll never forget seeing DEATH looking back at me through the eyes of one NVA we were treating. Taking him down to the L.Z., there was a crater full of dead NVA from the night's fight, so for cover we put him in the hole until he was to be medevaced. There was in his eyes a living dead man. He ultimately was medevaced out.

This next event was the real icing on the cake. I look up at the sound of a jet and see all these projectiles falling toward us. At first we thought a whole bunch of NVA had fired RPGs at us. We dove in our holes. Then there were these loud thuds all around the hill. All duds?

All bomb duds! We had been bombed by our own plane. 20-25 bombs and not one went off. If they had, they would have wiped out what was First Batallion Ninth Marines.

The Army was coming up to relieve us. As we were going down the hill and passing each other, I actually believe these First Air Cav guys held us in awe. Here we had been surrounded, isolated for nearly four months, no real food, no showers. We broke out. Took a hill, defended it and were moving out to take Hills 558 and 689. We were red, our clothes were red. Our pants were torn. There were dead NVA everywhere. These Army guys had new clothes that were still actually green and instead of small tools for digging they had real shovels. One said, "Looks like you guys had a hell of a party last night, MARINE." This may sound corny, but for an instant I wasn't so afraid, I was not so disgusted and I felt a little prouder being a Marine. Please understand that 25 years have tempered a lot of my feelings and misgivings. And FEAR!

So onto Hill 558. By now, I have lost 3 of the mortar section. The assault began early. We set up to support the advancing platoons and at first light they had reached the top. All of a sudden artillery came screaming in from behind us. For 5 to 10 minutes, the grunts who had taken the hill unopposed were bombarded by our own guns. The Army was to prep the hill before the assault and were late. Unbelievably, no one was even scratched. This was amazing. Usually, one Gook mortar round would mess up plenty of guys.

Later, we moved onto Hill 689 which had also been abandoned. Perimeters were set up and I busily placed my gun squads in strategic locations with instructions to dig in and dig in fast. Secure in the knowledge that this was being accomplished, I jumped into an NVA gun pit and was eating a can of chicken and noodles when we were mortared with BIG STUFF. Still, unconcerned, I continued to eat. Next thing I knew, Applebaum from weapons platoon was leaning over my hole crying that I had to come quick. I had just lost my whole section. My reply was, "BULLSHIT! They're all dug in." He said 'no', that I had to come quick! I left the safety of the hole to view a sight of wholesale carnage. Wounded were everywhere. Garber's squad. Garber dead; 2 to 3 more wounded. Frazier's squad. Frazier dead; Gilliam badly wounded and Doc torn up bad. The X.O. was hit, the Gunny was hit, (he passed the company ledger to me) the Captain was hit. My last squad was decimated. Some officer had moved them from where they had dug in and now they were all wiped out. Four of us are left and now we move again, dig in. No food for 3 days, drinking the water out of the bottom of the bomb crater. I cried harder than I ever had. I was responsible for these guys, and they were all gone.

There was talk of going to Laos and Co Roc Mountain. While in my hole a big rat flops in and bites me on the hand.

I leave Khe Sanh and go to the rear. This is April 8th. At Dong Ha, I get rabies shots for 14 days. I serve as company supply Sgt. for 30 days. Charlie 1/9 suffers more bitter fighting in the hills around Khe Sanh during my rear position experience. I finally bid them farewell at their position at Cam Lo, depart for Okinawa and on to home. Their names are on the wall.

Foxhole Atheism—AMEN!

by Robert Shippen
c 1981-1996

Toward the end of the siege of Khe Sanh in May of 1968 the cloudy sky cleared for several days, allowing F-4 Phantom jets to give close-in support to the besieged American and Vietnamese allies. The Phantoms targeted gun emplacements set into the granite caves of Co Roc Mountain eight miles to the southwest in Laos. The enemy withdrew their heavy artillery into the caves on railroad tracks, unable to shoot at us while our planes bombed the entrances.

At Khe Sanh combat Base we cautiously emerged from trenches and bunkers to stretch in the sunlight. The Phantom bombing gave us a temporary break from the 152 millimeter artillery, rockets and mortars with which the Communist gunners relentlessly pounded us. Surrounded, dug in, and cut off from support, for months we had held on against continuous bombardment and almost certain ground attack by multiple divisions of NVA troops and tanks. Carnage rained on us day and night like a torrent from Hell.

I had arrived in Viet Nam in December 1967. As a very green 21-year-old Special Forces medic, my attitude was that we were helping the South Vietnamese people in their struggle against the Communist Viet Cong (VC) and North Vietnamese Army (NVA). I was idealistic and filled with enthusiastic trust in the righteousness of our mission. I was willing to die if necessary for the Vietnamese people.

Assigned to the I Corps area in the northern part of South Vietnam, I worked in the Special Forces field hospital near Danang where we took care of seriously wounded and sick Vietnamese soldiers and their families who worked at our A sites throughout I Corps. Here we treated gunshot wounds, blast and burn victims, set broken bones, amputated limbs, and practiced internal medicine with cases of malaria, dysentery, bacterial and viral infections. It was a regular rock-and-roll field hospital with a laboratory and well-equipped operating room.

Aside from working there, I had gone on several patrols into the surrounding countryside. I had participated in a Med Cap to Thuong Duc village to the east of Danang. I also had helped transport and store dozens of bodies of dead U.S. and Korean Marines. The nearby Naval Support Activity (NSA) hospital had more killed in action (KIA) than they could handle.

So many Marine KIAs were being brought in from the battles around Khe Sanh, Con Thien and the DMZ that helicopters bringing loads of casualties to the NSA hospital could no longer land to unload wounded or more dead. Body bags filled with remains covered the hospital landing zones and nearby parking lots. Several of us medics were tasked with driving down there to stack as many bodies as possible onto our trucks. We took them to our compound and stored them in large reefers for a day or so, returning them when the NSA Graves Registration called to say they could now process them.

I was adapting to Viet Nam as the war accelerated. I anticipated being assigned to an A team of 12 Special Forces soldiers at one of the camps. Many of our camps were being hit or overrun in January and February of 1968. It was only a matter of time before I would receive a field assignment.

Though inexperienced, I had been shot at several times, once by our own men mistakenly, and another time by Viet Cong during the early hours of Tet 1968. I had not yet been in what I thought of as a "real" firefight. Nevertheless, working on casualties and having several close calls did impress on me the fact that war is deadly serious and very ugly. I was afraid yet determined to face any foe, meet any challenge, and do my absolute best during my tour of duty in the war zone.

In early February a Special Forces A camp was hit very hard by enemy troops using tanks and flame throwers. A-101 at the village of Lang Vei, near where the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) separating North from South Vietnam intersects with the Laotian border was the the site of a horrendous and bloody battle. A-101 Lang Vei was overrun and lost to the enemy. Scores of Americans and allied Vietnamese soldiers were killed, wounded and captured. Hundreds of civilian refugees and families of our Vietnamese allies made their way to and were taking refuge at Forward Observation Base #3 (FOB 3), a Special Forces outpost about six miles to the east, near the village of Khe Sanh.

The fall of Lang Vei was part of a major enemy offensive. U.S. Marines, South Vietnamese Rangers, U.S. Special Forces, Laotian allies, Montagnard refugees and others—altogether about 5,000 people in that section of Viet Nam—were forced to consolidate in one location. A defensive perimeter referred to as the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) is where they dug in and where we were sent. The ferocious SIEGE OF KHE SANH had begun.

Four of us, my two friends Dale Lee and Willy Cripps (also green S.F. medics) and a lieutenant (whose name now escapes me) were assigned to catch the next available flight up to Khe Sanh. My initial understanding of our mission is that we were to go to KSCB and organize the Lang Vei survivors into assault elements. Then, using Khe Sanh as a base of support, we would fight our way into and reclaim the now destroyed camp at Lang Vei. So here we were, three Spec/4 medics with little or no experience and a lieutenant with even less, gearing up to take on a well-seasoned enemy army on the offense.

I know for sure that Lee, Cripps and myself were scared shitless as we packed up and waited for a chopper to take us to the airfield. Air transport to KSCB was difficult to arrange. Planes and helicopters were running a gauntlet of hostile fire as they landed and took off from the short runway at Khe Sanh. Most were hit and some crashed. We were ready and waiting.

Repeatedly postponed, we hung out in the bar at Danang headquarters. Entertainer Martha Raye was there and helped cheer us up. Drinking, talking and joking with us, she was great. Cripps played his guitar and he and Martha sang us songs, "The Ballad of the Green Berets" and others. It was surreal, as if we were characters in an old Bogart movie. Fear hung in the atmosphere like stale smoke and quietly scorched the lining of my stomach.

Someone crashed through the bar door on a run, yelling for us to "GO NOW!" As the chopper began winding up, Martha Raye gave us a quick last toast and we downed our drinks. She hugged us and invited us to visit at her home after the war, as if she had no doubt we would be okay.

We flew to Danang airfield, boarded a C-123 (a medium-sized plane used to transport troops and equipment) and took off. The cargo bay was filled with large metal Conex containers that were lashed to pallets and rigged with drag parachutes. The Loadmaster strapped the four of us into seats of nylon webbing near the ramp in the rear.

After gaining altitude we were able to walk around the plane and look out the windows. We spoke to each other energetically and casually with practiced bravado. We were high on adrenaline, adventure, danger...and fear. For me this was a new kind of fear, anchored deep in my solar plexus, with a strange texture and taste, sickening almost to the point of pleasure.

Our stomachs sank as the plane banked steeply to the left with a deafening roar. The Loadmaster pointed down through a small window and shouted "Khe Sanh!" We circled for a long time, waiting for an opportunity to descend through the clouds.

I got glimpses of the runway and the base perimeter. I saw wrecked aircraft on the ground and watched as a large crane helicopter, with a bus slung below, was shot down and crashed near the edge of the runway. Later, I learned that it was a hospital bus loaded with wounded casualties enroute to safety.

Tangible fear now turned to unreal terror as the Loadmaster screamed, "Hang on, here we go!" and, like it was all a bad dream, the plane dived almost vertically through the clouds. The G-force was so intense I thought the massive Conex containers would break loose and crush us. Over the roar of engines, enemy bullets slamming into the fuselage sounded like we were being hit by sledgehammers. Finally, we leveled off just a few feet above the runway and the ramp was lowered. The Loadmaster released a drag parachute which then pulled the entire chain of cargo pallets to the ground. Relieved of this weight the plane lurched upward until the pilot leveled it out and we touched down. Small puffs of grey smoke kept appearing on the runway just behind us. I heard the loadmaster yelling to the pilot through his headset and then realized that the puffs were exploding mortars barely missing us. The plane swerved in a powerful zig-zag, speeded up and then suddenly slowed. The loadmaster shouted, "RUN NOW!" The plane slowed just long enough for the four of us to run off the tail ramp and for a group of refugees to run on. Confused and terrified, the mountain people almost ran smack into the whirling propeller blades. A Marine in flak jacket and helmet frantically waved for us to run towards him. I lost sight of the other guys as I ran and took cover under the first thing I came to, rows of green bundles on the edge of the tarmac.

The plane turned for takeoff amidst a hailstorm of incoming rounds and roared into the clouds with jet assist rockets boosting the propeller thrust. When the mortar barrage finally ceased, my sense of smell was brutally assaulted by an overwhelming stench coming from these bundles. I had covered myself with body bags filled with dead Marines awaiting shipment to Graves Registration at Danang.

When I asked the Marine where the Special Forces were, he pointed towards an open field to the southwest. He said they were in that direction and, as an afterthought, added that he thought mines were between us and the FOB. I walked carefully around Marine bunkers and through trenches, generally towards the southwest. When artillery shells impacted I would simply lie down and then resume my journey when the explosions stopped. Then, I saw clods of dirt flying out of the ground and into the air with a rhythm. Walking in that direction I was reminded of the way doodle bugs kick sand out of the traps they dig.

I came across a trench line with two guys in it fervently tossing shovels full of red dirt onto a growing berm as they burrowed deeper. SFC Chaney and SSG McGovern were surprised to see me standing there. At first they joked about fresh cannon fodder sauntering up alone like he was looking for the best place to lay out a picnic. I was relieved to have safely found my unit. They took a quick break to wipe sweat from their brow and to orient me to the trench lines with directions to the headquarters bunker where I was to check in.

Chaney and McGovern feverishly returned to their digging. In fact everyone I encountered was digging, enthusiastically. I was beginning to catch on. Ever deeper was the theme here. Ever deeper consumed the time and consciousness between bodily functions and regular duty. Leisure activity consisted of refining the just dug, deeper. The more depth your hole had the more status you had. Everyone was getting down, ever deeper down. The underlying awareness that permeated this place was an immediate, passionate, incentive-driven desperation to get, to be, deeper.

At the FOB I learned that the attempt to retake Lang Vei had been canceled. I can't tell you how glad I was to hear that. The senior medic, SFC Scully, was glad to see me. He showed me around the medical bunker pointing out the various supplies for treating trauma cases. Scully showed me a large group of Laotian and Montagnard refugees for whom I was to provide medical treatment until their evacuation could be arranged. Women, infants, children and a few old men, they huddled together in shrapnel-shredded tents, the only ones without at least a hooch of sandbags to protect them.

I was assigned a place on the trench line with Chaney and McGovern who welcomed me into their underworld labyrinth of red clay. From them I learned the art of building grenade sumps into which we could immediately toss enemy grenades thrown at us. I learned to listen for enemy sappers digging beneath us by putting my stethoscope onto an engineer stake driven deep into the earth. And, I learned that divisions of well trained, well equipped enemy infantry surrounded us, dug beneath us, bombarded us and fully intended to kill us. They could overrun us at will. They could cut off our only source of water. We couldn't leave and reinforcements couldn't get to us. For now, the enemy seemed content to pound us with artillery while massing its troops for the big kill.

It didn't look good. One way or another we were done for. It was just a matter of when and they controlled that. U.S. air power provided tactical support, dropping supplies for us and bombs for them, but this was contingent upon clear skies. Khe Sanh was often so overcast that planes couldn't land or bomb the enemy. Here we sat in candle-lit bunkers waiting to die while preparing to kill as many of them as possible before giving up our ghosts. In these holes, we were living what was left of our lives to the hilt. No doubt about it, this was war and I had finally arrived. As the months wore on, war continued to rage in this place.

Sometime in April a rumor circulated that the siege was over, reportedly because American infantry units had fought their way to our location along Highway #9. Aircraft were landing with supplies and replacements. Familiar faces were no longer around and new people arrived. NVA troops had withdrawn from their trenches but were still nearby in force. Artillery continued to effectively blast us, although with less intensity. More selectively. A jeep here. A man walking there. The shower. The shitter. The water truck again. The four corners of the FOB. Targets chosen to remind us they could and would kill us at will.

Officially, the siege had ended. But, had it really? The NVA were still calling the shots, playing with us like a cat with a wounded mouse. Why had they still not cut off our water supply? Marine and Army units engaged in combat within sight of our trenches and on the surrounding hills. Artillery, rockets and mortars continued to fall on us. We couldn't afford to slacken our vigilance just because President Johnson had officially declared the Siege of Khe Sanh ended, an American victory.

After three days without incoming artillery a formation of our Bru Montagnard allies was ordered, above ground, on the berm of the perimeter, out in the open. This scared me because I thought it was unnecessary, a reckless gesture. An orderly group in plain sight was a flagrant challenge to the enemy artillery spotters. You can declare the siege ended if you want to but this wasn't a good way to test the theory that it was really over. Following orders though, we formed a platoon of extremely anxious men, totally exposed on the crest of an embankment.

My task was to present a class on emergency medical procedures to about 30 Bru soldiers and several Americans. I lectured and presented hurriedly, demonstrated the basics of stopping bleeding, clearing airways, positioning bodies and splinting broken bones. I didn't have with me the equipment need to teach administration of intravenous fluids in cases of shock and heavy bleeding. They lit cigarettes and relaxed while I ran forty yards to the medical bunker for IV sets, tubing and needles with which to demonstrate.

While walking back I heard a distant, muted and ever chilling sound...Puunhh. This is the first warning that an artillery round has left its distant tube and is incoming towards you. Running to the nearest trench I heard a spine wrenching. WhaWhuWhoosh. Too late. I should already be on the ground. The shell was piercing air nearby, fractions of an instant from impact. In seeming slow-motion, I threw my body with a final leap and floated through space towards safety as gravity prolonged its sluggish pull. Inches below, hard clay was plowed by shrapnel. I thudded into a hole as the blast showered debris around me.

Three large chunks of a Bru's body mark where the formation had been. I recognize him by teeth on a mangled head/shoulder segment. Earlier he had been appreciative after receiving dental work. I put the bulk of his remains in a body bag and zip it shut. The men carry it away. One more accurate and grim reminder that they will continue to kill us at their discretion.

The class is over. The Bru disperse to their fortified holes. A singing buzz emanates from a cloud of flies gathering to take advantage of fresh blood on the red dirt. Flies relish laying eggs in bloody mud. I clean the area and pick up a discarded piece of my friend's liver before kicking dirt over the bloody ground. Watchful Bru see me toss his liver into a 55-gallon trash barrel. Because of my apparent disrespect for death and this small part of a man's body, they keep their distance and lower their voices when I am near. Spooky!

It is now dusk. The western sky is breathtaking, filled with streaks of vivid crimson, orange and gray. A canopy of low clouds blanket somber mountains. Jungle greens accent ashen radiance of the red clay of Khe Sanh. Alone in a sandbagged position above the medical bunker, I am saturated with unspeakable contrasts. My senses voraciously absorb everything. Puffing thoughtfully on a Lucky Strike, I listen to a song by Edith Piaff on a small transistor and broadcast by Radio Hanoi. Not understanding French, I take momentary refuge in the life-affirming passion of her voice. Occasionally a tremendous explosion punctuates the atmosphere with a guillotine of sound. The vibrating after-slice of the blast fades, seeming to linger as an insidious hummmm. Mosquitoes mass for attack in their blood-lusting frenzy.

I feel the cosmic beauty of light and sound in this setting of grisly human slaughter. The terrain as far as I can see has been, is, the churning rip-apart death location for hundreds of North Vietnamese soldiers. The combat base has been, is, the end-life, begin-eternity, DEAD-SPACE for scores of young Americans. The sweet smell of burned human flesh wafts on the gentle and welcomed breeze. It blends with and is almost as appetizing as the hearty aroma of hot C-rations mixed with well-stewed rat meat. Shit-mixed-with-diesel burns steadily. The fumes drift my way on occasional eddies. This gentle shit-fog also wafts the mosquitoes away, temporarily.

My being quietly brims with sensory stimuli and philosophical cognition. I AM ALIVE as I quietly take in sight, sound, texture, odors and pensive feelings, as much as any being can absorb. Blood pulsates through engorged vessels. Hot liquid courses through my too alive self and seems to stop in my head. My head is compacted with sensation. It's as if my heart is being drained of feelings that pump into my head and merge, knowledge with pathos. And stop. And throb. Senses confirm existence. I AM.

My being is EXPANDED WITH KNOWLEDGE. Whore-war has had its way with me in the sump of mortal nature. We've had lethal intercourse in the dank pit. Seductive as gravity it smells like burnt sweetmeat and tastes of bile. Through my consciousness streak vivid images. War. Carnage. Death. Beauty. Egocentric power plays. Desperation. Terror. Life. Color. Sound. Smells. Shit. Mosquitoes. Trenches. Flies. Bunkers. Rats.

Concertina. Phantoms. Antennae. Existence and God. I KNOW the horror of what happens among humans.

I finish the Lucky. With the last puff a sensation of power surges through my legs, up my spine and fills my chest. I erupt in a cascade of omnipotent rage. I run to the western trench. Fully exposed again on the blood wet berm facing Co Roc Mountain, I scream towards the setting sun, to the universe and to God. I shake my fists, middle fingers extended, at God in Heaven. From the marrow of the bone of my soul, I curse God with the most vile, profane, insulting, contemptuous and demonic words I know. I damn God for allowing ALL OF THIS to happen. Enraged, on the berm, I scream and sling rabid obscenities with body language. Americans look at me aghast and yell for me to shut up before I bring down the wrath of God. I scream at them. "This IS God's wrath! Look around you with the guts to see what you're looking at. As far as my eye can see we're already Damned. FUCK GOD!" They move down the trenches putting distance between themselves and me.

I don't know if God gets my message. But, there is no doubt that the enemy's artillery spotter reads me loud and clear. As I fall to the ground hoarse and exhausted, my body is compressed in a cocoon of hot air and violently rattled. A 152 mm round lands several feet away and does not kill me. Luck? Miracle? Shattered back into present time/space with ears clanging and all senses vibrating, I curse an AMEN to the heavens and slither to safety along a slit trench.

Deep in the bowels of the medical bunker, I rage at God. Images of people mutilated in a chaos of dread fills me. Ghosts of thousands blasted from their bodies, now bewildered and afraid, haunt me. Their presence feels excruciating. I empathize with the angst of their lives unfinished, yet ended. I visualize mutilated bodies and almost imagine that I hear them. Sobbing anguished tears for my fellow human critters, I pass the surreal hours of darkness with rats keeping me close company.

Distant booms herald first light as Phantom jets spook the NVA artillery deeper into Co Roc's caves with bomb strikes. Dawn. Sunlight. Bodycounts. Sick call. Rat bites. Rabies shots. Dysentery. C-rations. Parachuted supplies. A new day. Another chance to live. Life is acute when energized by intimacy with profuse death. This day of new life for me is lived on the run. I have THE RUNS. My shit is a putrid oozing discharge. Sitting for a long time on the dugout latrine, surrounded by plywood walls, I reflect on the day and night just passed. It's then that it hits me abruptly. I'm overwhelmed by the clear realization of how mistaken it is to blame God for all this horror. The concept that God wasn't directing this atrocity shocks me. Soon, I am laughing at myself and can't stop. My sides ache. I can hardly breathe.

Shrieks of screaming shrapnel drown my laughter as jagged metal rips holes in the plywood leaving ragged gashes of sunlight. Deafening sound accompanies waves of exploding dirt. I slide onto the muddy floor still discharging uncontrollably. The thought of how I must look, lying in the mud laughing and shitting on myself as artillery explodes, makes me cramp with more laughter. The explosions stop, and I regain my composure. A little dingy, but alive, messy, but emptied. I clean myself with my fouled trousers. Naked except for boots, helmet and flak jacket, I crouch there waiting, thinking. Again, the mystical universe seems to be in synchronization with my inner process. Saturated with new awareness, I feel as if the core of my being has passed through a permeable psychic membrane, leaving me exposed and vulnerable. Something profound has just happened. Purged of self-righteous holy rage, I pardon God for allowing war.

My consciousness has traveled at exponential speed from the beginning of life on earth through eons of our history to the present. A flash of truth with ultimate implications now fills me. Never again can I take comfort in the wishful illusion that previously shielded my psyche. I have changed and cannot go back. These blasts of insight become the genesis of an endless struggle...THE defining struggle of my life.

From the dugout shitter near the medical bunker at FOB 3, Khe Sanh, I am launched on the longest range cross-border mission of all, searching out and controlling self-destructive tendencies in myself. God has not orchestrated us to kill one another in a frenzied dance of inhuman insanity. We humans, taking human action, doing humane deeds cause whore-war. We create our reality on earth. We generate our Hell on this planet.

When God was to blame for war, I wasn't responsible. It was out of my hands and up to a higher power to stop. I no longer have the comfort of that illusion. Sensing a fatal flaw in the evolving development of the human species, my being feels hopelessly immersed in more dread than ever before. While our civilized technical expertise increases, we continue to operate on an outmoded, yet seemingly insatiable band of self-predatory genetic coding. God wasn't doing it to us. I was. Billions like me have fervently destroyed one another since the beginning. Are we, with self-righteous and oblivious arrogance "advancing" toward self-extinction?

INCOMPREHENSIBLE SPIRIT OF GOD, MERCIFULLY HELP WE HUMANS. SHOW COMPASSION AND EMPATHY FOR OUR OWN, FOR OURSELVES. AMEN.

My Brother's Keeper

His arms wrapped tenderly around it, the young Marine carefully cradled the dirty and bloody head to his chest. It belonged to a stranger, a new guy, one who had just joined their unit, one whom nobody had an interest in knowing. He did not even know his name or anything about him. A brief while ago, there had been a battle. As with most battles, it had not lasted very long. Matter of fact, it could hardly even be classified as a battle. A few shots had rung out, the veterans of the Marine patrol scattered, returning their own fire. Some more rounds directed at them, and then there was silence. Almost!———almost! Laying on the path where he had fallen, the new addition to the war guttered forth with sounds betraying the wounds inflicted on his body. Blood seeped through his clothes, and one of his arms tremored uncontrollably. With the intuition born of too long in combat, the remaining members of the patrol knew what his fate would be. They stood there emotionless, seemingly non-caring at this stranger in their midst. Over him a corpsman did what he could, knowing that his efforts could not overcome the inevitable. The flow of the blood stemmed, he too stepped back. Watching. Waiting. Knowing. This would not be the first, not the last—more he would treat in the future. All was accomplished without the appearance of rushing, without the need of verbal communication. As if granted an answer to the silent prayers all present shared, yet none had dared to scream, the wounded soldier quieted his grating sounds and with conscious effort, slowly opened his eyes. They seemed to seek something, to find an answer in the waiting group. Some, blankly returned his look. Others, fidgeted self-consciously. None yearned to make the commitment that they knew he sought. At least not until they passed the face of a young Marine. Already his eyelids were starting to droop in resignation over his eyes. Overwhelmed by the pain and the effort. But in the young Marine, their message stirred something. Long ago, he had known pain. In another world, he had known what love and kindness were. From a deep recess of his being, emotions surfaced. Slowly he moved close to that pleading look. From it, the pain of the effort evident, the wounded warrior raised his good arm the small distance that he could, and it hung in the air motionless, wordlessly asking. The young Marine looked down at it, striving to find some excuse to avoid the request of it, yet knowing that he would, and could, not. With a deliberate movement, he slowly knelt to the side of the dying Marine, touching him tentatively, as if to verify the reality of the situation. His weapon laid aside, carefully he took the outstretched hand in his. As if he was still afraid of what this all meant. Fingers closed partially over his, their clasp a message to him. In return, his hand answered, giving to the one in need. Motionless, he caressed what he held. Withholding the tears that none need know about. Slight returning pressures shared the moments of pain as they intruded on the scene, washing through the being laying on the ground before him. From somewhere, a lit cigarette was passed to the samaritan, who gratefully accepted it with his free hand. Without any lessening of his hold, he further extended the smoke to the Marine on the ground, who gazed at it with seemingly thought, and then with a strained motion, just moved his head side to side, in a negative fashion. Saying no to the smoke, but yes to the kind offer. The young Marine kneeling over him saw and understood, and returned the cigarette to his own lips, using that as an excuse to turn his head momentarily away, gazing at the others, waiting for a reply that none would give. A moan, a wince, a sudden tightening of the grip, and his gaze went to the injured soldier's face. In it, he had seen the fear and resignation, especially the message conveyed by the fleeing eyes. Quickly he strove to avoid looking into them any longer than he had too. Minute distractions a welcome excuse to focus his look elsewhere. But he could not ignore what was happening, and he knew that this gaze had to return, to look with feeling directly into those tortured features. Thus it was he saw the spasm of pain coming, and the hold on his increased for just a moment, and then it weakened. Unable to resume its former strength. Much weaker, with a greater pleading. With both hands now, he held the wounded Marine's hand, but still could not satisfy the silent cry that was there. And he knew——— aaannnddd he knew. He knew what was the only thing he could do. From a recess far within him came the strength once again. With it the knowledge and hope that it would be enough. All he had submerged to survive this long, he would have to let go of. To make himself vulnerable, to shed the iron wall. With his available hand, he pried lose the seeking fingers of the wounded Marine, shifted position ever so slightly, he took the weight of his fallen comrade on his lap, and with both hands, cradled him to his chest. Imperceptibly, his body had begun to rock. Just enough to convey his new feelings, not enough to cause any pain. Sharing and giving the only thing he had left. Soft, soothing sounds issued from his mouth, betraying not the helplessness and frustration of all that he felt. In the face of the inevitable, nearing end, they gave the peace and tranquility the moment needed. His eyes rose from the face pressed to him, and fled away into the distance, letting only his touch be the communication between them. The only sense allowed. No rage, no anger was in his being at this unwelcome predicament. Permeating the scene was only the sense for a quiet, peaceful end. He produced what he could, oblivious of his surroundings, letting his feelings now guide his actions. And the two were as one. Life was life; and death was death; —— and here, in their mutual presence, the meaning was clear. He waited with a patience that he knew otherwise he would ever possess. Untiring were his arms, infinite motion of a yielding body, giving love that could never be repaid. In those moments, he was not aware of how unselfishly, completely and totally, he gave of himself. Never betraying externally the waves of emotion washing throughout him. Something seemed to warn him that the final breath was near. Just a mite tighter he held the dying body. Hugging it, loving it, making sure that the one he held knew that he was not now, nor would he ever be, alone. Ever so slightly, the head slumped against him, and then he knew that the need for his services was over, still he held the quiet body. An instant more did not matter to him, he did not want to abandon too soon, one with whom he had given the utmost, intimate, part of himself. His need for a sudden, deep breath, brought him back to the world that he lived in. Picking up his weapon, he rose, turned, and left. Not daring to look back, and with each step, the need not too, growing.

THE KHE*SANH VET

ISSUE 7-NOV-H Newsletter

Founder · RAY STUBBE Editor · ERNIE HUSTED

RAY'S WORLD

News from the Founder

Several important events have occurred recently. The book on Khe Sanh which I have been writing for several years, and which has involved many contributions from many of you (diaries, letters written during your time there, memories on cassettes, etc.) plus a thorough research of all official documents of the USMC, Army, USAF, CIA, DIA, has finally been completed and accepted for publication. A contract with Houghton-Mifflin Co., a very prestigeous publisher for some 200 years in the U.S., was signed in July, 1988. Publication will probably be in 1990 or before, in hard-cover. (VALLEY OF DECISION: The Siege of Khe Sanh)

The second item is the rather large gathering of Khe Sanh vets during the Tampa 3dMarDiv Reunion, two absolutely super slide presentations by Ernie Husted, and the decision by those there that we should formally organize by incorporating as a non-profit organization (for purposes of reduced postage, ability of companies to make contributions to us and write it off on their tax, etc.), and that we should continue to meet annually under the umbrella of the 3dMarDiv Association, letting them do all the planning (hotels, events, etc.) but having a night set aside just for us. By meeting with them we can get the best rates possible on hotels and airlines. With the stirring words of Earle Breeding (former CO of E/2/26), a collection of funds was made at the slide presentation to ensure the continued publication of our Newsletter. The next reunion is in Chicago, 12-16 July 1989. The following persons volunteered to be on a "Committee to Organize:" Calvin Gright, Earle Breeding, Bob Hanna, John Kaheny, Jack Kilbright, Ernie Husted, and myself. (Editor's Note: I was out of the room when I volunteered?)

A presentation was made by Mr. Ron Drez of the Eisenhower Center of the University of New Orleans. They have already established an archive on the Normandy D-Day landing which has been of great benefit to those participating in it: to hear the voices of their buddies, to fill in missing parts of their memory, etc. Now the archive is focusing on Khe Sanh, and asking for your stories on tape (can be done over the telephone). By being connected to a university, these materials will be available for hundreds of years in the future so the true story of Khe Sanh will be preserved. Mr. Drez was in intelligence in Viet Nam and also a company commander in the battle of Hue; his helicopter was shot down, broken in half, and he was one of the few survivors. Out of this he resolved to serve his brother Nam vets in this way. The director of the Eisenhower Center, Dr. Steven Ambrose, has published over 20 books, is a world-renowned scholar, perhaps the expert on Eisenhower. This is a worthy project, one which certainly serves us well.

For those who are not aware of some 3dMarDiv Assn. programs: any vet 100% Service-Connected Disabled can get a free life-time membership in the Association by providing proof of the 100% status. The Association maintains four humanitarian funds, the largest of which is the Memorial Scholarship Fund. Established in 1968, this Fund provides tuition assistance of up to $2,000 a year for four years to qualifying dependents of 3dMarDiv members who died as a result of combat service in Viet Nam. The "Lucy Caldwell Fund" provides limited financial assistance to Marines and corpsmen who served in Viet Nam, as well as to dependents of Marines and corpsmen killed in Viet Nam. Financial need is the main criterion.

Gen Westmoreland spoke at the banquet, saying that we at Khe Sanh prevented a major introduction of NVA units from assaulting and supporting fighting in the cities of Quang Tri, Da Nang, etc. He noted two items that are usually not discussed: the US armed forces had left Viet Nam two years before it fell--thus the military didn't lose the war (that was lost in Washington), and, he added, the Americans never lost a major battle during the entire course of the war.

With the republication of this Newsletter, let me add my personal request and encouragement that you submit your poems, stories of what happened to you, your impressions, anecdotes, etc. These are important to you (to get them out, to preserve any important expressions of "thank you" to someone you never got to thank) and they are important to others who may have missing blank spots in their memories, to help people realize that they are not alone in what they feel. Think in terms of images, what certain events and places and things meant to you--rains, rats, helicopters, desperation, frustration, some heroic things others did, etc. These are important to share in our Newsletter.

Finally--and I really didn't want this to get this long! (but preachers are notorious for length!) I want all of you to know you are important, that many of you are in my daily prayers and thoughts, and God bless you all.

Last-minute addition: The progress on incorporation: I visited the lawyer last week and signed the final papers. They were sent to our state's Secretary of State, and we should be getting the final incorporation letter in a week or so, and will be incorporated as a non-profit organization.

EDITOR'S DESK

News from the Editor

Well, I sure am late this time. Matter of fact I am so late it bothers me more than you all will ever know. No matter what my good intentions and how I plan ahead, life and its many responsibilities once again have put me so far behind the power curve that this is the only newsletter I've been able to get out in an entire year. From the phone calls and letters I receive I am reminded of how much this means to us all. Here are some examples from letters I have received, showing the good things that have happened because of the newsletter:

Without y'all's hard work and many hours of sweat we would not be able to reach our fellow vets from Khe Sanh. A couple of weeks ago all of y'all's work answered a prayer of mine. I thought I had lost a close friend of mine from Khe Sanh. He was hit March 1968. I had heard he died in April of 1969. Because of the Khe Sanh Vet someone saw his jacket with Khe Sanh on it and gave him a copy to look over. Well, Buddy called and we are keeping in touch with each other. Even after twenty years. I only hope that more of our brothers will reach out and just say "hello."

I am a Khe Sanh Vet and a member of a V.V.A chapter here in Chicago. At a recent meeting I struck up a conversation with a fellow Marine who was also in Khe Sanh, and he told me about the Khe Sanh Vet Newsletter. He loaned me his copy of Issue 3. In it I found the name of a buddy of mine whom I haven't seen or heard from in 20 years. From the head injury I received my memory is very bad, but I remembered this name. I have since called him and we are now back in touch again. It was a wonderful feeling. I think this organization is great. Thank you very much.

When I get letters like these it heaps the guilt onto me even more about not getting the newsletter out in a more timely manner. I realize part of the problem is we have grown over 400 percent since I turned the listing into a newsletter. Still, I apologize to all of you and hope you realize that I do care about all of you and hope you know that.

In this issue we have:

Copies of the original M16 manual which we were given while in Viet Nam (comic book form).

A reprint of one of the many short-timer calendars that were floating around during our time there. I hope that no one takes offense at the one I selected. It is intended to bring a smile to your memory and not to offend.

The last installment of the Marine's Vocabulary In Viet Nam by Ray Stubbe. If you have any additions please send them in and I will start a new list.

The new list of Khe Sanh members. PLEASE HOLD ON TO THIS LIST. THE NEXT NEWSLETTER WILL ONLY HAVE THE CORRECTIONS AND ADDITIONS, NOT AN ENTIRE NEW LISTING. THIS HAS BECOME NECESSARY, TO KEEP EXPENSES DOWN. ANY NEW FOLKS COMING IN WILL RECEIVE A COMPLETE LIST.

In the reflections section there is a good selection for you to read containing a short story, a poem, and thoughts and feelings. Keep the material coming guys.

Advanced information on the next 3rd Marine Division Reunion during which the Khe Sanh folks will meet and vote on our charter, and also have the great fellowship we always have when together.

(Editor's note: The folks at the reunion, on the whole, went out of their ways to make us feel welcome. There was a bit of a gap between some of the folks there and the Khe Sanh guys. This was not because they were WWII and Korea vets and we were Viet Nam vets, but more of a basic age difference. There are twenty years or more between our age and theirs. The special discount advertised for plane tickets turned out to be a real bummer for some who took advantage of it while many of us were able to get much better rates and straight-through flights on our own. Next time, I suggest everyone check several sources on his own. The last complaint was that we had to try to schedule our reunion in between the events the Division had already established. We will work hard with the planning committee to ensure these issues are addressed so we can have more time together to rap, hang out and generally enjoy visiting.)

The next issue will have copies of the general by-laws and purpose of the now-official Khe Sanh Vet organization. Look them over and please attend the next reunion or fill out the questionnaire I will be sending, and get it back to Ray. This organization is you all--not us. Let us know what you feel about things.

SITUATION REPORT

We currently have contact with 820 people who shared the experience we know as Khe Sanh, with another 38 people on the list who have a common bond with us; 12 of them are new. There are 326 new names on the list and 49 corrections. The biggest news is of course our incorporation. Another major factor that must be dealt with and addressed is our printing. Thanks to the unselfish efforts of Jim Davis using hours of his own time and his employer permitting him the use of a copier, our printing for several issues has been FREE. This has enabled us to get some money saved in our account. Jim has gotten a much better job and won't be able to help us with the printing any more. Until I started checking on estimates of what it would cost to print an issue, I never realized how much he had saved us. I realize now that Jim has saved us over two-thousand dollars. The biggest expense of the newsletter is the printing. If anyone out there has any ideas or is able to help with the printing, please let me know.

INFORMATION ABOUT KHE SANH

This is an ongoing list of publications available about Khe Sanh, as well as related information. I have gotten several of these and am pleased with them. This list includes some new ones.

The Illustrated History of The Vietnam War - KHE SANH - is a small paperback, published by Bantam Books as part of a series on Viet Nam. It is written by Michael Ewing who reported the war for the London Daily Mirror. In the acknowledgements there is one section I want to mention and I quote the author, "Finally, I am specially indebted to Lieutenant Commander Ray W. Stubbe, who was a chaplain at Khe Sanh and is now writing the definitive history of the combat base, for his guidance and comments on the manuscript and his help in accessing rare and hitherto unpublished photographs." I really enjoyed the book and it is now part of my collection. The cost is $6.95.

The Illustrated History of the Vietnam War - MARINES - is another of the small paperbacks published by Bantam Books as part of a series on Viet Nam. It is written by Edwin Simmons who was a Brigadier General serving in Viet Nam with the III Marine Amphibious Force and later as commanding officer of the 9th Marine Regiment. The book only touches on the siege of Khe Sanh but covers the Marine role in Viet Nam quite well. Because of the format and detail of this book I have added this one to my collection also. The cost is $6.95.

MARINE CORPS HISTORY: Viet Nam Veterans who served in 1967 in Northern I Corps can now read about themselves in Volume IV of a projected 10-volume operational and chronological series covering the U.S. Marine Corps' participation in the Viet Nam War.

Volume IV is titled: "U.S. Marines in Vietnam Fighting the North Vietnamese 1967." For your FREE copy write to: Reference Section (Code HDH-2), History and Museums Division, Headquarters, U.S. Marine Corps, Washington, D.C., 20380. Volume V is now in preparation. It covers the period 3 Jan to June 68.

"The Battle of Khe Sanh," in the small paperback, The U.S. Marines in Action, published by Villard Books, New York, 1986, pp. 43-46. There is one chapter written by Colonel Dabney, mainly about 81IS during the siege. The cost is $4.95.

The magazine Vietnam Combat, Vol. 2, No. 2, Fall, 1986 has several articles and quite a lot of photos on Khe Sanh, the hill outposts, and Lang Vei during the siege. Does not, however, contain anything new that isn't already covered by Shore's book on Khe Sanh.

An article by a retired senior official aerial recon and photo interpreter of CIA, Dino A. Grugioni, "The President, Khe Sanh, and the 26th Marines," in Leatherneck 49:9 (Sept, 1986), pages 22-25. Contains an interesting aerial photo of the Khe Sanh area and tells of President Johnson's personal interest and involvement with the siege.

As you may remember from the last issue, Ernie Spencer, the former Commanding Officer of DELTA Company, 1/26 in 1967 and 1968, had written a remarkably realistic and highly interesting book, Welcome to Viet Nam, Macho Man. The book is now out. Ernie has sent us an order form for those interested in buying the book. Not only has he reduced the price; he will also be contributing five dollars from the sale of each book to the Khe Sanh Newsletter to help us continue our work.

VIETNAM WOMEN'S MEMORIAL PROJECT

We need your help. For more than a decade some 250,000 women who served our country during the Vietnam era have gone unnoticed. The Vietnam Women's Memorial Project plans to remedy that with a program to recognize and honor America's female Vietnam-era veterans.

Since 1984, project staff and volunteers have conducted research, made presentations and written articles to encourage Americans to take notice and appreciate the contributions of the women who served during the Vietnam War. A nationwide grass roots network of volunteers has emerged - many of them Vietnam veterans, male and female, who have raised over $445,000, on our way to a $1.2 million goal which will cover the costs of research, education and recognition.

One of our fiercest hopes is to erect a statue of a woman on the 2.2 acres of the the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C.--a memorial dedicated by Congress "to recognize and honor the men and women of the armed forces of the United States who served in the Vietnam war." The project is well on its way to making the Memorial complete; however, it has met with deaf ears.

In October 1987 the statue proposal was rejected by the Fine Arts Commission after receiving an approval from Secretary of the Interior Donald P. Hodel, as well as endorsement from 25 national veterans, professional and civic organizations, including the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund. Congress has come to our aid and introduced bills that would allow the statue to be erected. Hearings on the bills are being held over the next few months.

Support for the project is enormous. The American people are speaking out through petitions, letters and phone calls to Capital Hill to make their voices heard; but to be heard they must first be informed. Won't you please spread the word about the VWMP? With your help we can give female veterans of the Vietnam War the recognition they so assuredly deserve. FACTS:

* Some 10,000 women were stationed in Vietnam during the war in military and civilian capacities.

* Women served in a number of positions that included doctors, nurses, officers, administrators and volunteers in the Army, Navy, Air Force, Red Cross, United Service Organization (USO), U.S.A.I.D., and CIA.

* An estimated 250,000 women were involved in the war in Vietnam and stateside.

* About ninety percent of the military women who served in Vietnam were nurses.

* The names of eight women are listed on the wall of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial; those names do not include non-military women who lost their lives, of which there is no accurate record.

☐ Yes, I want to help honor America's women Vietnam veterans. My tax-deductible contribution is enclosed.
☐ Send me more information about how I can help make this dream a reality.
☐ I am a woman who served during the Vietnam era.

VIETNAM WOMEN'S MEMORIAL PROJECT

WHO BETRAYED THOSE WHO DIED IN VIETNAM?

James Reston of The New York Times has suggested that it was the reporters and cameramen who forced the withdrawal of American power from Southeast Asia.

Robert Elegant, who covered the Vietnam War for the L.A. Times, says that the fate of Vietnam was determined "on the printed page and the television screen."

Reed Irvine, chairman of Accuracy in Media, says our military victory in the 1968 Tet Offensive, was transformed by our own media into a defeat, with tragic results. How this was done is graphically shown for the first time in "TELEVISION'S VIETNAM: THE IMPACT OF MEDIA." Brilliantly narrated by Charlton Heston, it shows how the billions of dollars we spent to defend South Vietnam from communism were nullified by the irresponsibility of our own media.

"TELEVISION'S VIETNAM: THE REAL STORY" exposes the lies some media are still telling about Vietnam and those who fought there.

Shown on public TV and now available on one 2-hour cassette for only $29.95 plus $3.00 for mailing. President Reagan said these are films "all Americans should see." Order now from Accuracy in Media, your media watchdog. Money back if not fully satisfied.

REFLECTIONS

I was a Marine with 2nd Battalion 26th Marines during the height of the Vietnam War in 1968. As a child I attended church and trusted Jesus Christ. My combat experiences deeply strained my relationship with Him and the church. I have learned, over the many years that have passed, that Christ had profound purpose in what I did and saw. I know now that all I needed was faith that He was leading the way. This is a short story of a combat experience at Khe Sanh, Vietnam, April 6, 1968. It may give some help in believing that Christ does give his angels charge concerning us.

Scotty was gone for a long time. It must be something big! Here he comes now. Ok, here's what it is: There is an N.V.A. regiment, possibly more, on hill 700. That is down the ridge from 861 south. We will be moving out at 0500 and expect to reach the hill by noon. Gulf Company and Fox Company will be used in the assault. Gulf will take the lead with 3rd platoon walking point. "That's us!"

I felt my stomach tighten into knots. Why did I ever join the Marine Corps? To serve my country, of course. To ask not what my country could do for me, but what I could do for my country. My country, yea! Right now my friends are back home at the drive-in movie while I'm being eaten alive by mosquitoes. I shouldn't complain because I volunteered for this, but I could die tomorrow and no one would ever know how or why.

"Woody, you and Don get the gun cleaned and pick up your ammo at the C.P. Take two cans each, six frags, and a couple extra magazines for your forty-fives. The grunts will be loaded with gun ammo. The captain said we are going to need it. Oh yeah, he also said there will be a lot of casualties; some of us won't be coming back tomorrow. All right, get busy. I'll be at the C.P."

Woody and I stared at each other for the longest time. Woody was a good Marine, stocky-built, dark brown eyes, and light hair. He also had a little mustache that he kept neatly trimmed. His muscles were toned from the long months he had spent in Viet Nam. He was a good, honest, loyal friend and an expert machine gunner. Woody taught me how to survive this place, something I was very grateful for.

As we stared we were asking, "Will we be coming back tomorrow?" We were both afraid, but we were seasoned Marines. Fear was a subject no one ever talked about, an emotion the Marine Corps trained us to suppress, and an ungodly pain we constantly lived with.

Soberly I asked Woody, "How are you feeling?"

"Sick! This dysentery is killing me!"

"You really don't look good. I don't think I've ever seen anyone as pale. Can't the doc give you something?"

"No, they're all out of pills. I guess I just have to suffer with it."

"Why don't you sit down and take it easy? I'll get the ammo." I wanted to talk to Scotty anyhow.

It was a relatively short walk to the C.P. C.P. is an abbreviation for Command Post. This is the center for an infantry unit. The captain is there, along with the lieutenant, radio man, corpsman, a few 60 mm. mortars and usually a gunnery sergeant or staff sergeant. All orders are received at this point and filtered down through the chain of command, captain to lieutenant, lieutenant to sergeant and so on to the private, the backbone of the Marine Corps. It was all neatly arranged and organized for maximum effectiveness. As I got closer I was glad I could get up and move around; my stomach was jittery and sour.

"Hi, Scotty. Hey, I'm worried about Woody. He's had dysentery for a long time now. Yeah, I talked with Doc Scarborough about it. He said Wood can stay here tomorrow if he likes. Down there in the bushes. He's real sick, but he insists he's going along."

"Well, not much we can do now! Let Woody take the first watch so he can sleep straight through the night. You take second, and I'll take third. Come on, let's get back to the gun position, it's getting dark."

I liked being with Scotty. He'd been my squad leader for the last five months. Even though he was only a year older than I (nineteen), he seemed much more mature. He was tall and thin, had dark hair and a thin mustache, and always wore a smile. Scotty didn't look as though he worried much. Something held him together. I guess it was because he would be going home soon. What would I do without him?!

When Scotty and I arrived at the gun position, Woody had come out of the bushes and finished cleaning the gun. We talked and laughed about our many childhood experiences. It was something we found great comfort in. Tomorrow was hard to to think about.

Woody took the first watch. He would wake me in a few hours to listen and wait for the enemy. I folded my shirt and laid it on an ammo can. It made a nice pillow. I pulled my poncho liner over me to stop some of the mosquito bites.

The night was calm and quiet, except for the incredible variety of insects. Bugs! I've never seen or heard so many bugs. Half awake and half into a dream, I thought of home. The comfort of a warm bed, clean sheets, the indulgence of a Lebanon bologna sandwich with potato chips, cheese, and mustard, the kindness of my mother and father. Oh how I missed them. I tried to picture their faces, but it was becoming hard to remember what they looked like. I felt far, far away in another world. I slowly sank into a deeper sleep wondering if I would be coming back tomorrow.

We reached hill 700 around 1300 (1:00). The place looked deserted. Hill 700 was located on a long range of hills that rose and fell like a roller coaster. The hill had no trees, only tall elephant grass. The only sign of anyone being there was a well-worn path to the top. It was uncomfortably hot and we were tired from the long march. For a few moments I though we were lucky and the enemy had moved on. I would soon be disappointed. We were at the base of the hill kneeling, trying to be quiet. The lieutenant gave the point man orders to walk to the top. The point was a young, handsome Marine. He was terribly nervous and hesitant to go. I could feel his tension. Walking point was probably the most dangerous job in Vietnam. After some deliberation, he started up. We all watched and waited.

As he reached the top, there was no gunfire. I thought, "Great. Let's get out of here!" He yelled to the lieutenant, "All clear, sir!" I was very relieved. He turned to start down when suddenly all hell broke loose. Machine guns, mortars, and small arms fire opened up on us from all over the hill. In confusion, we started to run up the path to reach the top. The platoon sergeant screamed at us to get on line and lay down the fire. Woody and I jumped into a huge bomb crater to take cover.

The noise was maddening. It was like a large pot of popcorn popping, which got hotter and hotter. There were explosions everywhere. To our front, we saw the muzzle flashes of rifles and machine guns. Dirt was blowing in our eyes from the explosions. Bullets ripped past our ears. There were Marines getting shot with bullets and hit with shrapnel on all sides of us. The platoon sergeant continued to yell, "Get on line, get on line!"

Woody suddenly ran to the right and started firing the M-60. Before I could get to him, he was hit with shrapnel from an explosion. Scotty immediately jumped on the gun. He was hit with shrapnel. I finally reached the gun! Pulling the trigger in small bursts, I aimed at the muzzle flashes in front of me. The intense firing continued. Dirt clouded my eyes. Burnt powder from the explosions, and gas from the machine gun burned my nose. Screams from my friends caused me to step up my pace. I squeezed the trigger with longer bursts. We were somewhat of a line now and moved forward. I saw hands in the grass throwing grenades. They were going past me.

The battle raged out of control. We were taking a terrible beating when suddenly, from behind, I heard Marines yelling, "Pull back, pull back! We've called an air strike!" To my left a Marine was weeping, saying, "Somebody help me with Ski." Ski lay on his back with his eyes wide open. There was no movement. I grabbed him by the foot and started to pull back.

We reached the middle of the hill and waited for the planes. I looked at the machine gun and there were only four rounds left. My 45-caliber pistol was my only protection. I looked around, dazed and exhausted. Medivac choppers were landing at the base of the hill. Wounded and dead Marines were being boarded. For a moment I prayed that I would be leaving for safety.

The planes arrived, making three or four passes. The explosions rocked the hill. We hugged the ground, praying for our lives. The enemy mortars continued. A rifleman was now my A-gunner.

I had two cigarettes in a C-ration pack. We each took one and tried to enjoy a moment of pleasure. I took my canteen out and wet my mouth. In an instant I was thrown through the grass. When I sat up, my ears were ringing. My nose was filled with burnt powder. I felt that something had gone through my arm. As I looked, my long shirt sleeve was saturated with blood. It was dripping off my fingers onto the ground. My first thought was, "I have a Purple Heart"; my second, "Maybe my arm is blown off."

In a panic, I yelled corpsman; there weren't any. Another Marine ran to me and took my battle dressing out of its pouch. He wrapped my arm as tight as he could. I tried to get to my feet, but my legs were wobbly. I put my good arm around his neck and he helped me to the base of the hill.

The A-gunner, Curtis, was being aided by two other Marines. Some of the fingers on his right hand were blown off, and he also had two sucking chest wounds. They carried him to the L.Z. The enemy continued to mortar us while we waited to fly to safety.

In the distance I heard the chopper. My heart began to pound as it got closer. I waited and prayed that I would soon be safe. The chopper suddenly landed, firing a fifty-caliber machine gun at the enemy. The enemy returned fire with machine guns and mortars. In a burst of energy, I ran for the rear ramp. Wounded Marines were being carried and dragged inside. In seconds the crew chief gave the pilot thumbs up. As the chopper gained altitude, I knew I was safe.

At that moment I had a deep conviction that Christ does give his angels charge concerning us.

This is dedicated to P.F.C. Authur Lee "Skip" Edmonds Jr. (American Indian) 2nd Batt. 26th Regiment H & S Co. (81 Mortars). He was killed in the Khe Sanh Base Camp February 13, 1968.

I am but one man. I am the voice of my people. Wherever their ears are, I talk. I want no more war. I want to be a man. You deny me the right of a white man. My skin is red; my heart is a white man's heart; but I am a Modoc. I am not afraid to die. I will not fall on the rocks. When I die, my enemies will be under me. Your soldiers began on me when I was asleep on Lost River. They drove us to these rocks, like wounded deer. I have told the white man heretofore to come and settle in my country; that it was his country and Captain Jack's country. That they could come and live there with me and that I was not mad with them. I have never received anything from anybody, only what I brought and paid for myself. I have always lived like a white man, and wanted to live so. I have always tried to live peaceably and never asked any man for anything. I have always lived on what I could kill and shoot with my gun, or catch in my trap.

A MARINE REMEMBERS ON MEMORIAL DAY
By John M. Kaheny

For most of us it is the first sure sign of impending summer and it is filled with parades, picnics and beach parties. Children, enjoying the day with their friends, may occasionally ask why a tear forms in their father's eye at the sound of Taps or the sight of Old Glory waving in the wind. It is difficult for the young to truly grasp why we set this day aside to honor those gallant veterans who fell at Lexington and beyond defending our freedom and protecting our lives. So far they have been spared the terrors of the night and the arrows that fall by day. Not so for the aging warrior whose memory on this sacred day leaps time and space to find a a grassy knoll four miles from Laos on another day in May of 1967. Marines on patrol, forty-three strong, are just five miles from the safety of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Alone, they are the last free men between Hill 881S and the Canadian border. Suddenly, the Cat of Death leaps from a treeline on the exposed flank of the platoon. Two young riflemen, each but eighteen years old, shun available cover, stand up, stand fast and fire into the charging horde. Taking the full force of the enemy's assault, they purchase with their blood a precious gift of reaction time for their fellow Marines. Helmets fade slowly into chest-high grass and soon disappear from view. Eventually forty-one make it back to safety but the two go on home to rest forever beneath silver crosses. Their names, Private First Class Thomas Edward Henderschott and Lance Corporal Roger Michael Hurd, are now etched in stone on the Wall beneath Lincoln's watchful eye. The years have passed but every day I see their sacrifice reflected in the smiling faces of my children. For had not these two brave men held their ground with everything they had, Coleen, Meghan and John Peter simply would not be - - because one of those they saved that day was me. And now you know why Taps brings it all back and makes me think of those young heroes and where they are today and why I know all too well the meaning of the epitaph:

And when he gets to Heaven to St. Peter he will tell,
"One more Marine reporting Sir, I've served my time in Hell."

The following was written by David Barnhart. David is no longer with us. He served with H&S Co. 106's, 3/3 from 68-69. His sister gave me the poem and permission to have it printed.

An angel named Tuc-Fien called out my name last night; he said to me, "Do you remember the thirteen eves ago the loneliness and fright of the night outside the wire? You and seven others, forgotten until twilight, praying to your God to get you through the night."

Year in, year out, I remember that night so well. We were deep inside the land of the Dragon. Who could tell what would happen?

Three hundred and eighty-five days and nights living the life of a grunt. Sure, we all had a lot of spunk. To survive in the land of the Dragon. You more or less had to if you were going to cope with living the life of a grunt.

I can recall every day the smell of death. It isn't easy to put my war to rest. I'm reminded about it with my spirit of Christmas past every year around this time while I'm out spending my last dime.

Freedom has its flavor for those of us who fought for it; living is a sacrifice until death. Everyday I put myself to the test, knowing I've been over the crest.

The Tet Offensive of 1968 is a reminder to a lot of us of the real meaning of the cherished word, "FATE."

Halfway around the world in the land of Viet Nam, day in and day out people are reminded what life is all about, or the soldier's unsung song will be carried on and on.

All you people that I see on my everyday stroll, I want to shout at you. (I'm no fool for I'm an instrument of America's finest tool. I'm proud to say I'm a retired United States Marine, and you don't know what or how it feels to be part of America's team.)

I salute all my fellow soldiers and grunts who gave their lives to keep what we have, and I pray and hope you'll never forget Christmas Past.

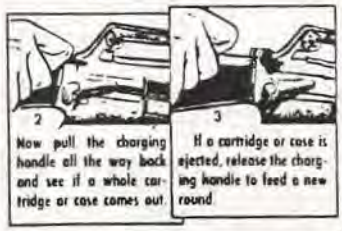
WHAT TO DO IN A JAM

If your M16A1 rifle refuses to pop off—or quits popping sudden-like—you've got a stoppage that needs immediate action.

Immediate Action: Instinctively doing the right thing to clear your weapon and get it firing again, soonest!

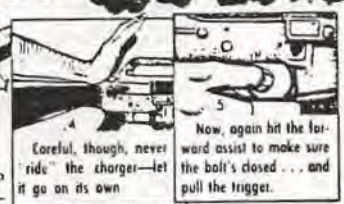
Here's a slow motion of the procedure you'd best make second nature:

1 Tap upward on the magazine to make sure it's seated right.



2 Now pull the charging handle all the way back and see if a whole cartridge or case comes out.

3 If a cartridge or case is ejected, release the charging handle to feed a new round.



4 Careful, though, never "ride" the charger—let it go on its own

5 Now, again hit the forward assist to make sure the bolt's closed . . . and pull the trigger.

If she won't fire, now look for the cause . . . a bad round, busted firing pin or hammer spring, or whatever. Table 3-3 in your -12 TM covers causes and cures.

If no cartridge or case ejects, first look for a round in the chamber. If none's there, once more release the charging handle to feed a round. Next hit the forward assist and again pull the trigger.

If she still won't fire, do what your TM says on trouble-shooting.

However, if you do find a cartridge or case in the chamber, be sure you remove it before you try to reload and recycle your weapon.

Now, remember, get these steps down pat.

CUES

If you really know it, respect it and treat it right, it'll be ready when you need it.

Here're some reminders from combat veterans—ideas they'd like to pass along to you to keep your M16A1 battle-ready. Learn 'em—use 'em—and you won't get caught short!

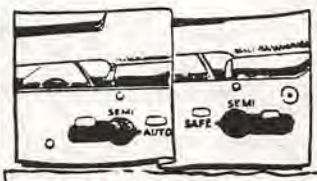
FROM GUYS WHO KNOW!

TIPS THAT'LL KEEP IT YOUR EVER-LOVIN...

SWEET 16

Here're a few cleaning and operating tips that'll help you get best results from your weapon. Some of these tips sort of put the accent on stuff you'll find in the rifle's bible—TM 9-1005-249-12 (1968) with Ch 1. Others are hexes and fixes direct from guys who've been living with this light-weight terror.

TIP...



Here's something you want to be real careful about. Don't—like Never!—close the upper and lower receivers while the selector lever's in the AUTO position.

Always—like Always!—point the lever to SAFE or SEMI before closing the receivers.

Here's why. If you jam the receivers closed while the selector's in the AUTO position, you'll force the automatic sear down and damage the automatic sear, and the sear pin, and will likely rough up the bottom of the bolt carrier.

That's 'cause when the selector lever's in the AUTO position, the tang of the automatic sear moves to the rear. You can see how it works by opening the receiver and turning the selector to AUTO and watching the movement of the tang of the automatic sear.

So-o-o . . . do it right . . . every time. Point the arrow to SAFE. Then the receivers will close without any interference.

TIP...

Speaking of magazines . . . every guy has his own idea of how firm or loose he wants the holding action of the magazine catch to be. Which is A-OK as far as it goes. But remember this: The tighter the mag's held in the receiver, the more pressure it takes to release it. And this: The farther the shaft of the catch sticks through the catch button, the tighter the magazine's held in the receiver.

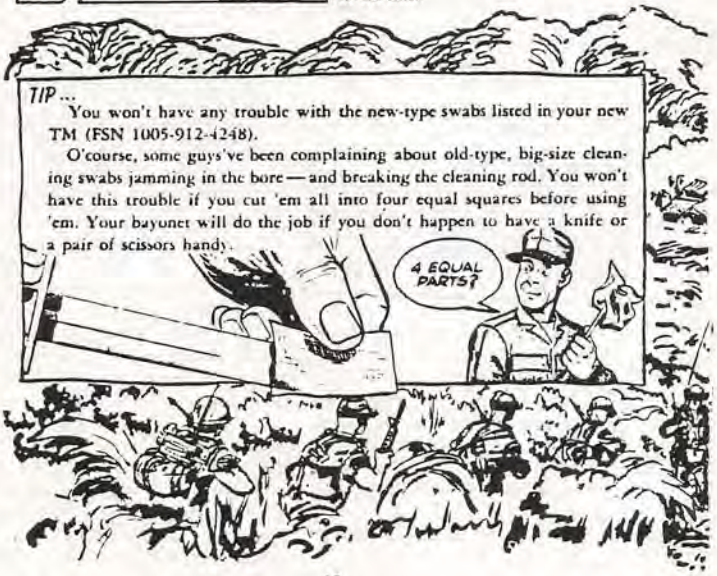
So, take a cue from experience. Adjust the catch button so's it's just about flush with the inner groove or just sticks out a tiny bit. This'll make the catch firm enough to prevent accidentally bumping the button and letting the magazine drop out—yet it won't be so tight that you can't pull the mag out for a quick re-load.

No sweat adjusting the catch the way you want it, either . . . and you're authorized to pull this deal. Just press the button on the right side of the rifle with the nose of a cartridge far enough so's you can turn the catch on the left side of the weapon. You turn the handle clockwise to tighten it and counter-clockwise to loosen it. Best of all, you don't have to take the weapon apart to do this.

TIP . . .

You won't have any trouble with the new-type swabs listed in your new TM (FSN 1005-912-4248).

O'course, some guys've been complaining about old-type, big-size cleaning swabs jamming in the bore—and breaking the cleaning rod. You won't have this trouble if you cut 'em all into four equal squares before using 'em. Your bayonet will do the job if you don't happen to have a knife or a pair of scissors handy.



YOUR M16'S MAXI-SKIRT . . .

ALL THE WAY WITH NÉGLIGÉ

Now that you've got a plastic coverall bag (FSN 1005-809-2190) to protect your M16A1 rifle against dust, sand, mud, water and such, here's how to use it in good health—yours and your weapon's.

First, make sure your rifle's cleaned and lubed before you bag it. This cover's an aid to PM, but it'll never replace the cleaning and lubing you'll always have to do regularly. In fact, with a rubber band closing—not to mention rips and tears—the bag's not guaranteed watertight, so-oo-o. . . .

Second, if you're gonna keep it bagged more than 24 hours, be sure you eyeball the weapon every day for signs of corrosion from any moisture or condensation that might form in the bag.

Putting it on—Stick the rifle in the cover, muzzle first. Then fold the cover end over the butt stock and slip the rubber band on.

Taking it off—Slip the rubber band off and unfold the cover end. Then slide the rifle out.

Put it on and off gently and you can use the cover several times.

IN A FIREFIGHT

Comes a sudden opportunity to bag an enemy, here're 2 ways you can work it:

1. Quick-rip the bag off with one steady yank. The bag'll come apart at the tear-line.

2. If absolutely necessary, you can fire right through the bag. You can operate the selector lever and trigger easy with the bag on. But, remember this: Ejected cases will be trapped in the bag and could cause a malfunction after the first round. So get it off as quick as you can.

Natch, after "emergency" use, you'll need a new bag.

Here's a round-up of the cleaning-lubing equipment you had better use to keep your M16A1 battle-ready.

About the only things different are the M11E3 cleaning rod and a PLASTIC BOTTLE for holding your LSA.

The big deal is to use this equipment every chance you get.

- 2 oz. PLASTIC BOTTLE

NEW CLEANING ROD

The M11E3 cleaning rod is a 5-piece affair (counting the swab holder as one piece), as compared to 4 pieces for the M11E1 and M11E2. Its over-all length is the same, though. Each section is shorter, that's all.

The threads on the E-3 are the same as on the E-1 and E-2, which means it takes the new bore and chamber brushes.

Don't sweat it, though. The new E-3's probably won't make the rounds till supplies of the E-1's and E-2's are gone.

BEWARE: DIFFERENT THREADS

Could be that some time you might have to use other cleaning tools in a pinch. If you do, here's what to look for: Different threads.

Your M16A1's own tools—cleaning rods and brushes alike—all have real fine threads . . . 36 to the inch.

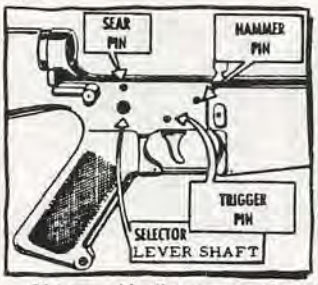
But, if you're ever in a spot where you have to use any other rod, like the M11 (FSN 1005-070-7812) or any other bore brush like the one that carries FSN 7920-205-2401, or any other chamber brushes, like the M1 (FSN 1005-691-1381) or the M14 (FSN 1005-690-8441), watch this:

Their threads are coarser (32 to the inch). They won't match up with your authorized equipment. Don't try to screw 'em together. Won't work!

No sweat, though, on swabs. If you have the 30-cal type (FSN 1005-288-3565), just cut these big ones into 4 equal parts . . . and go ahead with your cleaning.

WHY RISK THE DAMAGE?

Your M16A1's the spunky teenager of the small arms field, sure, but it's doing a man-size job. So it deserves reasonable treatment—especially in cleaning and lubing its lower receiver area.



Of course, this all centers on removing or not removing the components of the lower receiver to do the servicing job.

It's a fact. The 5.56-mm rifle doesn't like having its lower receiver taken apart for cleaning — and for good reason.

The lower receiver's made of aluminum to keep the weapon lightweight. But the pins that hold the automatic sear, the hammer assembly, the trigger and the selector lever are all made of steel.

So, if you keep taking the lower receiver apart, these pins'll bye-n-bye make the holes they go through bigger and bigger. First thing you know, the pins fall out and get lost — or the parts they hold won't line up right and your firing's 'way off.

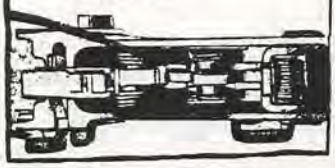
Truth is, you are not authorized to remove the lower receiver's parts at all. You can do a good cleaning job, if you do it this-a-way — and do it every day.

1. Soak your artist brush (FSN 8020-244-0153) or other similar type brush real good with bore cleaner. Then scrub all the parts like there's no tomorrow to get off all the dirt and carbon you can.

2. Tip the lower receiver sideways to drain the excess bore cleaner from the cavity and then wipe it dry.

3. Wrap a piece of clean cloth or cleaning patch around the brush handle and poke it into the hard-to-get-at places. Do the best job you can to get rid of carbon and gook that could keep the parts from working right.

4. When you're all through — and the lower receiver's dry — put a generous coat of LSA (FSN 9150-935-6597) on all of the insides of the lower receiver and on all of the parts.



A cleaning job like this will get rid of all the carbon and dirt that might keep your weapon from shooting right. Any stuff that's left after you do your level best won't make no never-mind. Of course, if the lower receiver ever gets so fouled up that the rifle won't fire right, then you let support have a whack at it.

Now you can understand why TM 9-1005-249-12 (1968) with Ch 1, does not authorize disassembly of the lower receiver group for cleaning by riflemen and armorers. Parts replacement and extra-tough cleaning jobs are for direct or general support only.

But, please don't miss out on that lubing job. All components of the lower receiver — as well as the bolt carrier group — must wear a coat of LSA at all times. No "buts" about it. Your rifle can't perform without it.

That's why "white-glove inspections" are too risky for this baby. There's always the danger that some guy might be tempted to give his weapon a shower or tub bath before inspection to get rid of dirt and lube.

Anybody who bathes his rifle is doing it dirt two ways: First, he's robbing it of the lube protection it needs. Second, he's liable to let water seep into the lower receiver extension. This could cause corrosion of the extension and rusting of the action spring — or it might result in a short recoil of the bolt carrier group, thereby preventing the bolt assembly from retracting far enough to strip a cartridge from the magazine.

When you consider that all this has a direct bearing on how well your M16A1's going to fire and protect your hide in a showdown, these angles make real good sense, don't they?

MORE POINTERS TO PONDER

Another thing: When you're crawling or walking through the brush, make a mental note to make sure you don't get the flash suppressor caught in a bush. It catches easy, y'know.

All the way . . . Educate your sixth sense to flip the selector lever all the way across to get from Safe to Automatic. In an ambush situation, you just might flip it only halfway — to Semiautomatic — when you'll need all the fire you can get.

You might practice flipping it all the time till this becomes second nature.

All in all, this M16A1's a real sweet number. It'll stay that way as long as you treat it like one.

Combat types can't emphasize this enough: Clean the gas port in the bolt carrier group every day — and take it real easy with the lube. Dirt and powder-fouling — plus an overdose of lube oil — will give you a sluggish rifle. . . . Numbah 10 Thou' in a combat situation!

So, when you get your baby stripped for cleaning, like it says in para 3-9 in TM 9-1005-249-12 (1968) with Ch 1, take an extra 5 seconds to get at the port hole down there in the front end of the gas tube. Like so:

1. Work a worn bore brush full of bore cleaner around inside the key.

Make sure you get the metal end of the brush in all the way — right into the bottom of the hole where the gas tube is seated in the carrier key — and then turn it to loosen the crud. That last 1/16-in in there is the most neglected part on most M16A1 rifles.

2. Then use a pipe cleaner or the like to poke the gook out of the port. Don't use wire, though, or you might scratch the tube and set up worse trouble later on.

FSN 9920-292-9946
PIPE CLEANER
NOW IN YOUR TM

3. Use another pipe cleaner — or air-dry it by waving it around — to dry the tube as well as you can.

4. Now doublecheck your job. Remove the bolt. Then stick the carrier body into the receiver slideway and push the carrier back and forth slowly to check that the carrier key and gas tube line up OK. The carrier should move freely . . . and should go all the way without friction. If it won't go all the way without a struggle, you've got some more cleaning to do. But, if it binds, turn the weapon in for repair.

Here's the Pitch: The front end of the gas tube is self-cleaning, thanks to the hot gases and high pressure from the barrel. But, if you don't keep the other end clean — the gas tube area where it mates with the carrier key inside the receiver — brother! You've got to clean this area with elbow grease to prevent stoppages. Hear!

Now, when you come to lube-preserving, stick to the dope in the lube guide pages 22-24 of this pamphlet.

NOTICE

For the past five years, the Khe Sanh Vet Newsletter has been published by donations from a few. With the rapid expansion -- fortunately!! -- of our listing (now some 1,100 names), the quantity of pages printed and sent has resulted in a cost of approximately $1200.00 per issue! The cost of the last 3 or 4 issues has been paid from numerous donations received in past years. The last issue (No. 8) was only made possible because of a $500.00 donation from DELTA Productions and a like amount from a retired member living on limited, fixed income. Even with this, it was not possible to print the listing of those killed at Khe Sanh, as we ran out of funds.

To help cut costs, we have decided to print the listing of our Khe Sanh brothers only once a year and only print additions and corrections in each issue. Issues will be devoted to sharing experiences of Khe Sanh, items of interest to Khe Sanh vets, and announcements of reunion, etc. Perhaps we might also consider including advertising as a source of payment for printing costs.

Right now, however, we desperately need more funds if we are to continue printing our Newsletter. We have no dues, but everyone who benefits from our Newsletter -- locating old friends, calling them when we want to and receive letters and Christmas cards, sharing exeperiences, getting the word on upcoming events, might want to consider sending in some support to help.

NOW IS THE TIME to dig deep into your pockets! Now is the time to see if your business or corporation where you work, or charitable groups to which you belong, might consider a donation to us. REMEMBER, WE ARE TAX-EXEMPT. All contributions are charitable deductions on your tax. For those who are working, a tax-deductible donation of $25.00 or $50.00, and for those in higher positions, a donation of $100.00 and more, and for all the rest, even a donation of $1.00 or whatever you can spare, will ensure our continued publication.

All contributions should be sent to our Treasurer, Mr. Earle G. Breeding, 529 14th St., S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003.

This Newsletter contains some very special items of interest to all Khe Sanh veterans, including the Minutes of our first annual reunion which include some very heartfelt and significant "reflections" made during the introductions of those attending; the current By-Laws (which have been simplified); the list of those killed because of Khe Sanh--giving dates and units as well as location on the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C.; a map of the Khe Sanh area and a diagram of the Combat Base (as of the beginning of the Siege); and a Chronology of events at Khe Sanh. These should help those who are experiencing "gaps" in their memory, who want to put things in some order, and a help towards viewing the "big picture" of Khe Sanh.

There are some very important actions you, as Khe Sanh veterans, can now do:

* Although we have no dues, we very definitely do need money for printing our Newsletters. Because of our Newsletter, some have indicated that they located a buddy they thought had been killed, and many more have renewed contact with some they had not heard from in over 20 years. Some have even travelled across the nation to visit with each other. If you find these Newsletters to be of value, please send your tax-deductible contribution to our Treasurer, Mr. Earle G. Breeding at the address at the top of this Newsletter, and make out the checks to: "Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc."

* We do need a symbol that could be the basis of a Khe Sanh patch - for caps, T-shirts, etc. If you can come up with a suitable design, please submit to Ray Stubbe at address on top of this Newsletter.

* Ernie Husted, our very dedicated Newsletter Editor, needs stories--reflections, poems, pen-and-ink sketches, cartoons, etc., for our Newsletters. Please submit these to him at address at top of this Newsletter.

* Write or telephone a fellow Khe Sanh vet.

AFTER ACTION REPORT

Whistler, Dr. Harvey Demaagd, Kenneth Pipes, Tom Borjas, Ray Stubbe and many visitors including John Wright, Duon Rose, and many wives and girl friends of Khe Sanh veterans in attendance. Other Khe Sanh veterans in attendance during the days of the reunion but not at the meeting included: Mike Barnerd, Rich Bryant, Tim Dwyer, Gary S. Davis, Lawrence N. Brown, Jr., and Dino (Lemus) Rivera.

The meeting was opened with the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag led by Fred Swets, and with Ray Stubbe reading Psalm 91 as an opening prayer.

Each Khe Sanh veteran present was then asked to stand, give his name, his unit at Khe Sanh, and when he was there, and then mention someone who did something special for him. This evolved into one-and-a-half hours of highly moving testimony which included some tragedy, some humor, much interchange of gratitude between those in attendance. Some in attendance had not seen each other since Khe Sanh.

Mr. Earle G. Breeding provided the Treasurer's Report as of 12 July 1989, as follows:

Cash on hand as of last balance sheet (6 March 1989)	136.45
Deposits since last balance sheet	1660.00
Sub-Total:	1796.45
Expenses since last balance sheet:
Minute Man Press (for last Newsletter)	1275.00
Amity Rubber Stamp Co. (for check endorsing)	14.58
Sub-Total:	506.87
Deposits in Transit	105.00
Total on Hand:	611.87

Mr. Jim Wilkinson was appointed to audit the Treasurer's Report. Motion was made by Fred Swets and seconded by Tom Boze to accept the Treasurer's Report. Unanimously accepted.

OLD BUSINESS:

Newsletter. Cost of the last issue was $1275.00. The list of names has increased to over 1,000; the pages have increased, and this is what it costs to print. We were unable to include the list of those killed in our last Newsletter because we ran out of funds.

NEW BUSINESS:

Dues: There are no dues. But we do need money in order to publish and mail our Newsletters so we can keep in contact with each other and share our experiences. Contributions are tax-exempt: they may be written off on tax as you would contributions to church or other charitable groups. PLEASE SEND CONTRIBUTIONS TO OUR TREASURER, MR. EARLE G. BREEDING, MADE OUT TO: "KHE SANH VETERANS, INC." Our Newsletter is very important! Almost everyone says they read it from beginning to end; some have saved all of them. Several have said they thought their buddies were dead, looked on our Newsletter and found they were alive! Some have travelled across the country to visit their old buddies, and undoubtedly "Ma Bell" has made thousands of dollars from all the telephone conversations that have resulted from these listings! (Perhaps AT&T ought to give us a tax-exempt contribution!). One man here has forgotten almost everything, looked over the Newsletter and found one name, a little thread, to that reality, that he could begin to remember. If you know of any companies you work for or other corporations that might want to donate and write it off on their tax, please suggest they do so.

Adoption of By-Laws. These are very short, even shorter than the version that appeared in the last Newsletter (Issue #8, June 1989). Ray Stubbe read and explained the meaning behind various parts of the By-Laws.

Motion was made by Ken Pipes and seconded by Skip Wells to accept the By-Laws as presented (and published in this newsletter). In Discussion, Earle Breeding noted that he will keep a very confidential record of who contributes what (should a member need verification of donations for tax purposes). He said we're going to need alot more money. He suggested that any money we might obtain in excess of operating expenses be invested so interest may be generated to support our newsletter expenses. All donations will remain within the purpose of helping our Khe Sanh veterans since even if we dissolve, our treasury then would go to the 3d Marine Division Association's Scholarship Fund. He said: "Dig as deep as you can!"

Vote: The By-Laws were unanimously adopted.

Resolutions of thanks: It was moved by Earle Breeding and seconded by Tom Boze that we adopt resolutions thanking the following:

* MR. JAMES DAVIS: for having donated the printing of our early Khe Sanh Veteran Newsletters.

* MR. ERNIE HUSTED for his dedicated efforts to ensure the Khe Sanh Veteran Newsletter was prepared, printed, and distributed, an effort that has meant literally hundreds of hours on our behalf and which we very deeply appreciate.

* MR. JOHN WRIGHT and Delta Productions, Inc., for their gift of $500.00 to our Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

* MR. CHARLES HUBER for his tireless efforts to locate Khe Sanh veterans.

* MR. ROBERT ELDER for his tireless efforts to locate Khe Sanh veterans.

* MR. ROBERT PISOR, MR. MICHAEL EWING, MR. DAVID STOCKWELL, MR. ERNIE SPENCER, AND MR. ERIC HAMMEL for their positive writings about our Khe Sanh experience. Their books assist towards a better understanding of our experience to the general public and help ensure preservation of our experience of Khe Sanh.

* 3d MARINE DIVISION ASSOCIATION and CONVENTION PLANNING SERVICES, INC. for making this meeting possible.

The Resolution commending all these people was unanimously adopted.

Special thanks are also extended to MR. TOM EICHLER for arranging our Khe Sanh room in this hotel and especially for stocking it so well!

Money-making projects: Mr. John Wright has volunteered to offer the use of his high-quality equipment to make videos of pictures of Khe Sanh such as those being passed around, plus maps and other materials. The profits from this will help our treasury. A show of hands from those present who might be interested in having such a video was almost unanimous.

GOOD OF THE ORDER:

Mr. John Wright of Delta Productions, working on a TV program called "Vietnam, the Second Tour," addressed the group: "We thought the way to talk about real Vietnam veterans was to take them back to Vietnam. And all of a sudden we find there is another set of real Vietnam veterans--the North Vietnamese, who know more about Khe Sanh than we do. That's going to come out.

"As soon as the program comes on the air, we'll make a $5,000.00 donation to Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

"It should be going in September (of this year), during the monsoons, and the air-date, we're looking at March (1990) on CBS with Bill Kurtis as narrator. And the important thing about the money and the contribution is very important because there would have been no TV program on Khe Sanh and all the good things that may come of it, without the Khe Sanh association. That's what put it together. That's what put alot of people together--put history together, so future generations are going to realize what went on, and the individual things we did.

"The thing that is happening at Khe Sanh this very moment is that the Vietnamese are pulling out of Cambodia. At this very moment there's 5,000 troops rebuilding Khe Sanh! So when they pull out of Cambodia, guess where they're going? I guess it was important!

Comments by Duon Rose. "I'm part of a Public Broadcasting System special that will appear next April on Khe Sanh and some other battles. I'd like to add my thanks to what's already been said, especially to those who have helped us today, some very powerful interviews that we did, and to everyone here and for those who will allow us to video tape in the future."

[Mr. Duon Rose is developing a TV program for WFUM (University of Michigan). If you are interested in being interviewed, you may contact him at home (313) 686-4263, and a 24-hr. hotline at (313) 762-3909].

Eisenhower Center at University of New Orleans is developing a Khe Sanh archive so that people a hundred or more years from now may be able to hear participants of Khe Sanh tell their stories. The man in charge, Dr. Steven Ambrose, is an internationally respected historian who has written on Eisenhower and American history. His assistant,

Ron Drez, a Vietnam veteran of the Battle of Hue, is collecting interviews which may be conducted over the telephone. If you are interested, contact either at The Eisenhower Center, University of New Orleans, New Orleans LA 70148, telephone (504) 286-7110. It is really signficant that of all of Vietnam, the 7 years, that there's going to be an archive on Khe Sanh in an academic situation and it will be preserved. If you want a cassette copy of your interview, they will provide you with one Microfilming project: Diaries, maps, letters written while at Khe Sanh, transcriptions of tapes you might send giving memories of Khe Sanh: these are being microfilmed with copies deposited at the Marine Corps Historical Center and other places such as the Naval War College, so that our people and what we did will not be forgotten. If you are interested, send documents (which will be copied and the originals returned to you) or tapes of your experiences to Ray Stubbe. (A typed transcription of what you send will be sent to you).

Newsletter: Please submit your stories, memories of incidents or people, poems, recollections, reflections, to our Newsletter Editor, Ernie Husted. (Useful ways to recall and write are to complete sentences beginning with: "Khe Sanh, it was a time when..." or "When I think of Khe Sanh I feel..." or "Someone who was special that I knew at Khe Sanh was..." or "When the attack began I was..." or, tell a story about a bunker, or about a typical day, a humorous incident in the midst of terror, etc.

Symbol: We need a design that might symbolize Khe Sanh so that we can have patches, caps, T-Shirts, and perhaps pins made. Someone suggested that the slogan "For those who fight for it life has a flavor the protected never know" be on the back of the T-shirt. (This slogan was first publicized due to a cardboard sign in a bunker during the Siege). If there are any of you who might suddenly get some inspiration or have some artistic talent (or even if you get an idea, but can't put it into a drawing), please submit to Ray Stubbe -- soon! We have a volunteer who will make these things for us of high quality, and the profits going to our organization.

GREETINGS:

The following are unable to attend our Khe Sanh Vet Reunion, but have sent us messages of greeting and well-wishes: Ed Prendergast, Dick Blanchfield (who called during our actual meeting from Alaska!), John Kaheny, Bob Hanna, Ernie Husted, Mike Guess, and Harry Lavan. Gilbert Wall had made reservations but was unable to attend due to work commitments; Ted Golab, John Kaheny, and Ernie Husted were all involved with reserve weekends.

Khe Sanh Vet Room: There is a courtesy room in this hotel, Room 3406, stocked with refreshments through the dedicated efforts of Tom Eichler, where we can gather for meeting with each other during the days of this Reunion.

NECROLOGY:

The following Khe Sanh veterans have died:

BILL STROSS, a Marine of G/2/3 during the 1967 Hill battles (born 24 July 1948, died 17 April 1988) was buried in Quantico, Va., with his father, also a former Marine. Ray Stubbe conducted a Memorial service for Bill at the chapel of the North Chicago VA Hospital on 26 Apr 1988. (His essay "Home From the Woods" was printed in our Newsletter No. 6).

JOHN RAYMOND died 28 Aug 87 at the age of 48. He had just retired from the Marine Corps in May where he served as military assistant to the Assistant Commandant as a full Colonel. After serving as CO of Co A/1/26, he departed Khe Sanh to form Co E, 3d Recon Bn. He was buried in Arlington.

ELECTIONS:

Ray Stubbe noted that the present officers were merely chosen in order to facilitate incorporation out of those who volunteered to get our group organized. Special thanks must be extended to these, who included: John Kaheny (Vice-President), Earle G. Breeding (Treasurer), Ernie Husted (Secretary), Jack Kilbright (Sergeant-at-Arms), and Calvin Bright and Bob Hanna (Members of the Board); these have the distinction of being on our Incorporation papers forever. Ray Stubbe noted that he did not particularly desire to be President, but would continue one year if necessary in order to ensure our group continue. He also noted that others should think in terms of whether they would like to hold an office or know of others who should be considered. Elections for a 2-year tenure will be held at our next meeting (if current officers are re-elected, since terms are 2-years). Ernie Husted, designated Secretary since he was handling all the correspondance, has said he really didn't want to be Secretary (take minutes, etc.) but definitely wanted to continue as Editor of our Newsletter. Earle Breeding works with the FBI and has repeatedly said, "Anyway I can help, just let me know". He has opened up a bank account for us, got checks printed, and should continue as Treasurer. Our current Vice-President is John Kaheny, a City Attorney for San Diego and a reserve Colonel in the USMC. He said he'd be willing to continue as VP, but did not want to be President since he is President of the Reserve Officers Association of America. Our Sergeant-at-Arms is Jack Kilbright, a policeman in New York City.

Jim Wilkinson nominated Ray Stubbe as President; several dozen seconded. There were no further nominations, and he was unanimously elected.

Earle Breeding then addressed the group.

John Kaheny was nominated and seconded for the office of Vice-President. There being no further nominations, he was unanimously elected.

A motion was made that all the current officers be nominated to hold their current offices and seconded. The motion was amended that John Kaheny also serve as Secretary and that Ray Stubbe serve as Chaplain. The motion was unanimously approved.

The offices of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., for 1989-1990 are:

President:	Ray Stubbe
Vice-President:	John Kaheny
Treasurer:	Earle G. Breeding
Secretary:	John Kaheny
Sergeant-at-Arms:	Jack Kilbright
Chaplain:	Ray W. Stubbe

Ernie Husted will continue to be Editor of our Newsletter.

Ray Stubbe noted that as we continue to grow that we do need to keep rotating leadership and have as many people involved in the leadership of the organization as possible. He suggested to start thinking if you would like to be an officer or serve in some capacity, or know of somebody who would or should.

Jim Wilkinson said: "Don't get the feeling you had to be a platoon leader or company commander to be an officer. Next year, let's broaden it out and get some people that were still young. Don't be shy; if you want to be an officer next year, then let people know about it."

CLOSURE:

There were no further comments, reflections, business, or second-thoughts. Motion was made by Cal Bright that we adjourn and have a good evening. Seconded. Unanimously approved.

[Note: In telephone conversations with Jack Kilbright and John Kaheny on Monday, 17 July 1989, both noted they were willing to hold the offices to which they were elected and eagerly looked forward to attend next year's reunion].

NEXT YEAR'S REUNION: 18 - 22 July 1990, in Nashville, Tennessee. Word should be published on details next year. In any event, you may contact Ray Stubbe (who is on the Board of Directors, 3d Marine Division Association).

OTHER REUNION NOTES:

The Treasurer's books were audited by Jim Wilkinson on 14 July 1989 and found to be in order.

Although no monies were solicited at our meeting, several made donations, including one former enlistedman, now retired, who donated a check of $500.00.

Several of our group accompanied Mr. John Wright Saturday, 15 July, to practice rappelling as part of preparations to re-visit Khe Sanh, where it may be necessary to rappell in order to land on some of the hilltops. These brave souls included: Ken Pipes, Ernie Spencer, and Quiles Ray Jacobs. Following the "terror by height" we were treated to lunch at a Vietnamese restaurant, Le Bistro, where the owner, Dung (pronounced "Zung") Dao told of how he, as part of a Project DELTA Special Forces group, in 1974 placed cratering charges in the Khe Sanh airstrip to make it un-usable for the North Vietnamese.

During the Reunion, both John Wright and Duon Rose were making video tapes of interviews of Khe Sanh Veterans in attendance. Much of this helped to bring things out, to be recognized as important, and helped those who were there to appreciate each other.

There were hours and hours of individuals talking with each other throughout the days and nights of the Reunion. Special thanks again must be given to Tom Eichler for arranging the Khe Sanh room for us. Although there were quite a few from Co D/1/26 present, there were some who were the only ones from their unit--A/1/26, some platoons of 1/9, and two from ONTOSS (who, by the way, hadn't seen each other since Khe Sanh!), and two from recon. All, however, noted that they found the Reunion to be a great time. One rather quiet man at the meeting who did not say much later said: "I probably should have said that I felt right at home in this room with these people."

One of our Khe Sanh vets happened to find himself alone one night, found an old WW II Marine from Iwo Jima, and they went off to eat together for the evening, exchanging their experiences, and had a wonderful time. No generational gap where sharing or honest feelings is concerned!

EXCERPTS FROM COMMENTS MADE DURING INTRODUCTIONS AT OUR MEETING:

CALVIN BRIGHT: "There is one incident--if it was not for him, I would not be standing here today. In fact, he would be in my place and I would be in his place. This man's name is CLAYTON THEYERL. I was point man on that patrol [25 Feb 68 - Jacques], and about 2/3rds of the way out he stopped me and said, 'This is your first patrol, and I think you and I ought to switch.' And probably 20 minutes to a half an hour later he was laying on the ground and I was still standing. And I think if it wasn't for him I'd be in his position and he'd be in mine right now."

RANDY HARDY: "I remember this guy that I've been looking for for a long time - still haven't found him. His name is TERRY RAYBURN. We were tight over there in the battery [B/1/13], and we were on Red Alert for about two or three nites. We were staying awake, constant firing. We thought one time that the base was going to get overran. We loaded up the guns, put the muzzle at point blank, and loaded up Beehives. And Terry got hit. And he saved me from getting hit. We had incoming. The shrapnel got him. And myself. I think it took his left foot off. Then we took a direct hit on the gun. I got concussion, lost my hearing."

FRED SWETS: "In December, 1967, a couple guys came in and said they'd been to a place called Khe Sanh, and 'Man, the one place you don't ever want to go to is a place called Khe Sanh because they can cut you off real quick. There's only one road in and one road out.' So I made it a point that I was never going to go to a place called Khe Sanh. And I think within 24 hours I had orders for Khe Sanh, and I was up there until they closed the place up...The one event I remember is getting lost in the fog up there. Communications got kinda messed up on the lines, and we had to pass communications by messenger, so somebody came to my bunker and gave me a message to go to the next bunker. I went to the next bunker and gave them the message. And on the way back I couldn't get back to my bunker. And I realized that the bunker I left had been built at an angle and I couldn't remember if it angled towards the lines or away from the lines, and if I was behind somebody's bunker or in front of somebody's bunker, and I didn't want to make too much noise! I remember creeping around and going [loud whisper] 'Don't Shoot!' And while doing that I heard somebody else going [loud whisper] 'Don't Shoot!' It was the guy who had come to my bunker; he had gotten lost too! Now both of us are out there. But somehow someone managed to not shoot and get us back to our bunker, and I sure appreciated that!"

JOHN HARGESHEIMER: "I was with ONTOSS--first time I've seen Fred in 20 years!.. The one kid--and he was an awfully young guy--he just turned 18. His CO got mad at him and as soon as he turned 18 he got orders. That was his birthday present; so they sent him up to Khe Sanh. And when the ammo dump went off in April, I was down in the ammo dump. And this kid, named DENNIS McKEEVER from Marine City, Michigan; he was just a little skinny--I don't know how he ever got in. But I got knocked semi-conscious, and Dennis picked me up. He came down and he picked me up and carried me out, and in a few minutes later the ammo dump really did go up. I think alot of Dennis. I haven't seen him. He got wounded about a week after that. And the last time I heard from him, he sent me a fifth of Kentucky Bourbon. And that was after we pulled out and we was down at Quang Tri. I don't know how he got it through the postal, but he did. He got it through. He was then in the hospital in Portsmouth, Virginia."

KEN PENN: "I was with the 4.2" mortars..I guess what I remember was the first night and our guys on 861. We had an 18-year old who got sent up there. We hardly ever knew him because he got to the main combat base and we needed somebody up on the hill. We sent him up there. And a month and a half later he got killed, so we had to go down and identify him. And while waiting around, the doc and I and the gunny-'WHOOP.' Before we could even duck, it hit. We got up. I looked. And the doc got hit, and I said, 'Where's the gunny?' The doc said, 'Where's the gunny?' I said, 'He's got to be here somewhere.' All of a sudden, from one of the bunkers comes this Marine. I just remember the look on his face. He had made it and we just got out of there and made it back to our position."

EARLE G. BREEDING: "I'm going to single out Tommy first [TOM EICHLER]. I probably wouldn't be here today if it weren't for him. You talk about cool, courageous leadership of a young corporal..While we're getting hit..and nothing above ground is really growing anymore, old Tommy Eichler is walking around from gun to gun, carrying ammunition, seeing how things are going... I want to single out one other group of people. One night, 5th of February 1968, when the entire North Vietnamese Army decided that they wanted to contest the ownership of the little hill we had. And we were drawing fire support from 5 separate locations.. There was a lull, and I decided that there should be more artillery fire coming in than there was at the moment. So I got on the radio. And I'm not known for proper radio proceedure, so to say, and since there's ladies present, I won't go into exactly what I said. But I assured the artillery folks on the other end that it would be to their benefit to continue firing, if they didn't want to meet my wrath when I did get down from there. And very calmly and cooly, I heard this voice from the other end of the radio say, 'No matter how many guns we loose, we will support you!' I found out later that in support of us, it was necessary to divert other guns..Now the point of this--and this is a choking experience everytime I think of that--.. as long as we have the youth of the nation today becoming the leaders of society and become our NCOs and officers of the caliber that we had in Vietnam, we're a safe nation. In my opinion, as long as there's one Marine alive on the face of the earth, the United States will stand."

QUILES RAY JACOBS: "I got shot the first time on March 21st, 1968, on a patrol out of Khe Sanh. There wasn't very many patrols that went out of Khe Sanh. But I came in, and Dr. Demaagd sewed me up, gave me 106 stitches in my back. And I was very fortunate and blessed because the bullet came into the right side of my back, hit my flak gear, and spinned inside my flak gear, over my spine, and out the other side of my back, and then came out. After that day on the 21st I was at the Battalion Aid Station for a few days. And then we were taking some incoming rounds. When the rounds would come in the doctors would run out and get in the holes and the patients were still stuck [laughs]. So I asked Dr. Demaagd if I could go back down to my lines, and he let me go back. I was there a couple days with the stitches in my back, ace bandages. And a couple of my buddies came to my hootch to see me, see how I was doing. They got called back to their lines. Right after they left my hootch, a round came in right between them, Kent and McRae. The round killed Kent, and I went down there with McRae, and he died on the table holding my hand. Two days later [30 Mar] we had another patrol. We ran into a big fire fight that day, and Dr. Demaagd was out there with the Battalion Aid Station... he was trying to save lives and patch up lives. And at the end of that fire-fight that day--I wasn't supposed to have gone out with them because I was all stitched up and ace bandages, but after my two buddies got killed two days before there was no way in hell they were going to keep me from going out on that patrol. At the end of that fire-fight, myself and another Marine--the last 2 Marines off the hill. I think I was carrying 2 or 3 different weapons in my hand. And we got down to the bottom of the road and turned around to Dr. Demaagd who was trying to save some of the guys. Some of the guys he wasn't able to save were just laying on the side of the road. The [Otter] came out and picked them up. It was just a real dramatic experience. It really threw me for a loop, that particular situation. But I feel blessed that all I have gone through I come back and can be here today to share this experience.

DAVID DOEHRMAN: "I remember a seriously wounded Marine that I found in the Triage on a stretcher, couldn't move. Artillery started to come in from Co Roc. I was sitting there with him. And he asked me if it was incoming or outgoing. And I lied, lit up a Marlborough [for him], and sat there holding his hand. And at that point I realized it really didn't matter what happened as long as we all stayed together through Khe Sanh."

DICK GRANET: "I don't really have one instance that I could mention. But I would like to say thanks to all the fellows that I was there with, the brotherhood and the relationships that we developed, and the things that we shared such as canteens, boxes from home, and taking leeches off of each other. And we gave each other alot of support through alot of tough times. And some of the fellows that I done that with are here tonite. And I really appreciate that.

PETE KUKURBA: "There was one individual: I bless him. If it wasn't for him, I wouldn't be here today. That was Tom Boze. My gun jammed; he was right behind me."

DAVE KOZICZKOWSKI: "I was an ammo humper, then a gunner, and had all sorts of experiences and have a hard time dealing with it. I am just really proud and thankful to be here so I can share this great experience."

TOM EICHLER: "I have to mention Cpl Billy Drexel. He was severely wounded, lost both his legs. He probably saved my life. Right after we got overrun [on Hill 861-A, 05Feb68] Billy had a premonition of death or being gravely wounded. He did not want to go up on Hill 861. We weren't up there 4 hours before a mortar round came in and took off both of Billy's legs. He said in his southern drawl, 'Ike, kill me; I don't want to go home this way.' I said, 'No, you're going to make it.' And he thought for a minute, looked down and said, 'Do me a favor, take a peek and see if I can still do it.' I reached down in his shattered legs and said 'It's still there!' He said, 'Well, the hell with it; I'm going home!' That was a Marine! Earle Breeding invited me to a 20-year reunion in Washington, D.C., of their officers. I was only an enlisted man there. While I was sitting there at the table, there were alot of our platoon leaders from Vietnam, and one of them had just received a letter from one of the men who had served under him, and he was just taken aback by the feelings that this sergeant had wrote about how he felt about him. And to me, I was amazed that he was surprised about it. I took it a point to get up and talk to all these officers, and I told them the same thing I'm going to tell you now: that it's ashamed there's not more of them come to these reunions, because they don't know how we felt about our platoon leaders--we loved you as much as these other guys, and to me there's no finer thing in the world than a Marine officer."

"SKIP" M.R. WELLS: "I remember alot and then sometimes I don't. I remember the people most, those that made it and those that didn't. And the thing I remember the most is that officers and enlisted--they pulled together. When you look back at it now after all these years, it doesn't really seem that bad. But it really was pretty bad. And what I do remember is that each day, every hour of the day, just drawing strength from each other, corporal-lieutenant, lieutenant to captain, corporal to corporal. That's what I remember."

STEVE JOHNSON: "I remember specifically my Platoon Commander, LT PHELTZ, who I have not seen since that time. But he was one of those officers that inspired the best in everybody. My corpsman, DOC MILLER, he did not make it. There were a couple of others. Since that time, after I got out of the Marine Corps, I was a police officer for 20 years, and just retired last August, but in the meantime, I really did miss the Corps. In 1982 I got back in the Reserves, probably the world's oldest E-5. I am now probably the world's oldest E-6!"

JIM WILKINSON: "Most of my time was with 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, as the Commanding Officer, and it was the proudest 8¼ months in my life... There's two events that sort of symbolize the bravery that took place on a day to day basis.. My first little story's about 5 real young Marines that had a 106 recoilless rifle in the lines. And they built their little bunker-bless their souls--with the limited material that we had available, scraps from the runway, sandbags, we tore the messhall down.. And they were very proud of this little bunker and they camouflaged the apeture. Unfortunately it was not camouflaged enough, because as we know now the NVA were looking right down the gun. Probably one round came in, and all 5 of those young Marines were casualties. And that symbolized to me the day to day bravery of five 18-year old Marines. The next story is about my Sergeant-Major. It was a tough war on 2d Lts, PVTs, PFCs, CPLs, SGTs, but the Sergeant-Major's--not all were in the rear. We lost several Sergeant-Majors at Khe Sanh. And when I got a replacement, I was sent one of the senior Sergeant-Majors of the Marine Corps. He had been taken prisoner at Corregidor. He had spent over 3 years as a Prisoner of War in Japan. And he volunteered to come to Khe Sanh. And we had many conversations. And we used to go out and visit the troops along the perimeter. And one day we went out, one afternoon. And I said, "Sgt Maj, some incoming rounds; we'd better split up: you go around Bravo and Charlie, and I'll go around this part of Bravo and hit the ARVN Ranger Bn, and we'll come around and we'll meet.' So I was on one side of the perimeter; he was on the other side. At that time he was at the Charlie Company Command Post with DAVE ERNST, which was a CP built above ground. One rocket came in. Dave Ernst was wounded. His radio operator was killed, and the Sergeant Major was seriously injured. I heard this on my radio; I had my radio operator with me. I immediately went to the Battalion Aid Station. The Sgt Maj was there with a very grave head injury. I held his hand while they patched him up. We got a helicopter. In fact, I was so insistent, I ran down to Regiment and said, 'Colonel Lownds, you got to get a helicopter in here; we're having trouble getting a medevac; my Sgt Maj's wounded.' Col Lownds got the helicopter in. They flew the Sgt Maj out. He died enroute... As I look around here, I'm like you. I wish we could look every one of those young and old Marines and corpsmen in the eye, shake their hand and say, 'Thank God you gave everything you had.' I just wish they were with us today."

TOM QUIGLEY: "I [remember] being badly wounded on March 30th with Bravo Company. We went out on the last revenge raid. I was Captain Pipes' radio operator. I was hit again when our CP got hit. Several mortars landed on top of us, killing our artillery FO, Lt Norman, who was also one of the finest officers I ever met, a super family man and just a terrific officer. We were all hit that day. My senior corpsman who was hit helped me get through the trenchline. My hands were bleeding real terrible, and I thought I'd lost a finger. Didn't even know I was hit in the back. And the senior corpsman who was hit in the butt put a battle dressing on me, and I asked him how bad I was hit. He told me, 'It's not that bad; don't worry about it.' Later on in the hospital, we were together in the same ward, Yokosuka Naval Hospital, he told me then that it was pumping out of me quite rapidly, but he didn't tell me because I'd of gone into shock. Going back to the bomb crater, Dr. Demaagd had his hands quite full. Dr. Demaagd came over to me. He remembered me--I was also trying to clean up my complexion and he used to use a pin on me. I might have shot him! He came to me and he said, 'Quig, you don't seem to be hit that bad.' I said, 'Doc, I'm fine. Do you have a smoke?' He reached down and gave me a full pack of Pall Mall cigarettes... And Captain Pipes was my CO. We shared a bunker together. We shared alot of things together--our moods... Sometimes he'd break out a bottle of Seagrams that I believe he stole from the Air Force, and we would have a couple of shots of Bourbon during the night. He didn't let me drink too much because I was on the radio watch. He was one of the real heroes of Khe Sanh for me. It's good to be here with you, and I've got to go over now and see a man I haven't seen in a long time. [Hugs].

KEN PIPES: "I bring--though I don't know everyone here--from my wife, Sherry in Fallbrook, and our 2 sons, their thanks. Because directly or indirectly all of you in the room today are responsible for letting me share with them an additional 22 years, the main reason being the people you have talked about tonite, made references to and remember so fondly. And of course Jacobs said it best when he said, I have come back to be as best as I can be, and to do everything that I could the best that I could do for all the folks that never had the opportunity... I'm just so thankful to be able to be here with you all tonite.

CHRIS LANE: "While I was sitting at the Phu Bai airstrip waiting to get out [to Khe Sanh], alot of the old 'salts' seen all my green, brand-new shining uniform and stuff like that, and they were telling me what was going to happen up there, that half the airstrip was held by the NVA, and I was going to have to fight hand-to-hand to get to my position [laughs]. Well I didn't want them to know just how frightened I already was, knowing I was going to Khe Sanh, let alone I was going to have to fight hand-to-hand 24 hours after getting in country. So I said, 'Well, that's OK. No problem with this.' [laughs]. I got aboard this transport. It had a pallet on the back that had 'Mother's Cookies' among other things. And we touch down and the parachute comes out and goes flat. the load is standing there. And the Loadmaster is shouting: Start plushing that sucker off! And we're all looking like this, and I'm thinking: I'm going to die for Mothers' Cookies right here! [laughs]. We fortunately got it off, but I was petrified about getting that off because I was wondering: when's this human wave assault going to take care of me? So for any of you that may have been in the trench when this green, boot Marine came running in with a fixed bayonet [laughs]--as soon as I got off the plane I fixed bayonet and I think the people in the trench were more frightened of me than any NVA in the area. [laughs]. Unfortunately the story did not end at that point. There were a couple of guys on the same flight with me. I was going to 1/26 and they were going to 2/26, I believe... They sent me to Charlie Med because I had to turn in some records. And they started yelling, 'Gangway, casualties coming!' And they brought in this guy, and he's got a pretty good stomach wound. He's not looking real good. And I took a look and he looked like the guy who came in on the plane with me. And they weren't able to help him, and he died. And I started thinking: I've got 395 days to go!.."

THESE KINDS OF THINGS ARE GOOD TO PRESERVE, AND ARE VERY HELPFUL TO OTHER KHE SANH VETERANS WHO HAVE "MISSING PIECES" IN THEIR MEMORIES. THESE BY-LAWS WERE ADOPTED UNANIMOUSLY BY THE MEMBERSHIP OF KHE SANH VETERANS, INC., AT ANNUAL MEETING, 13 JULY 1989, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

NOTES CONCERNING THESE BY-LAWS

1. The membership provisions are such as to include all who served or lived at Khe Sanh. This includes all branches of the American and Vietnamese armed forces, the civilians (French coffee planters and missionaries), and any enemy personnel.

2. The provision concerning "Associate Membership" so limited that 90% remains military veterans is necessary in order to qualify as tax-exempt under provisions of the IRS.

3. Although there are no dues, members are expected to make regular and significant donations as they are able. The intent on not having dues was to ensure that all who were at Khe Sanh are members. It should be noted that all donations are tax-exempt (if one lists contributions on income tax forms, or for corporations to make contributions to us). Our major, single expense is the Newsletter through which we keep in contact with each other and share experiences.

4. Our meetings are during the 3d Marine Division Association Reunion so that we may take advantage of reduced hotel accommodations and perhaps reduced air fares, take advantage of the other events of the Division Association's Reunion, meet other veterans and share experiences with them. The Division Association benefits by having increased attendance and input of membership. We are part of the 3d Marine Division Association eventhough 26th Marines is historically part of Fifth Marine Division since those who served at Khe Sanh were under the operational control of 3d Marine Division.

5. All provisions for an Executive Board (as in previously printed By-Laws) have been omitted since they are, at this point, unnecessary due to the small amount of business and number of meetings.

6. Provisions concerning the officers are standard.

7. Compensation not being given to officers is necessary in order to maintain our tax-exempt status.

8. Authorization to expend monies is necessary to ensure continued printing of the Newsletter. It enables a member or members to deposit funds temporarily to guarantee printing of the Newsletter.

9. The Dissolution provisions are necessary in order to obtain reduced mailing expenses from the Post Office. They are a prudent proceedure so that members know that any funds they donate will always be for good purposes that benefit the membership.

OUR BROTHERS FOREVER

A LISTING OF THOSE WHO DIED BECAUSE OF KHE SANH - (Those who died on the battlefield, those who died as a result of wounds received at Khe Sanh, those who died while enroute to Khe Sanh and in close proximity of the battlefield). The listing is based upon Memorial Service Bulletins, upon verification through the 3dMarDiv G-1 Casualty Section Logbook in May, 1968, upon the weekly listings of those killed as compared with the Casualty Cards in the HQMC Historical Division Library (to determine units that were operating at Khe Sanh when the casualty occurred). The listing is not complete since it does not include names from FOB-3, the Special Forces at Lang Vei, the Joint Technical Advisory Detachment, 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion, or various support units except as reflected in various Award Citation files or Oral History interviews. A complete listing of friendly casualties would be well over 1,000 names, perhaps approximating the Jean Dixon prophecy in August, 1967, of 1,200 killed at Khe Sanh. It does not include those killed subsequent to 16 April 1968.

There are several known additions that are not listed. 13 are listed from 1/13 in this listing; however, the 1/13 After Action Report for SCOTLAND notes 18 KIA and 2 DOW. 38 were killed from MACV Det 19 on 21 Jan, but only 4 are listed. 219 were killed at the fall of Lang Vei (10 USSF, 5 VNSF, 165 CSF, 34 MSF, and 5 interpreters); only 5 are listed. 59 US Army and 33 ARVN were killed during Operation PEGASUS; none are listed. 5 men from 1st Radio Battalion and 5 USAF crewmen were killed in the plane crash of 06 March; none are listed. In addition, only 30 of the total 44 Marines embarked on that plane are listed. 3 US Army Signalmen from 37th Signal Battalion were killed 2 Feb, but only one is listed. 5 Marines from 1st Marine Regiment were killed during Operation PEGASUS; none are listed. 326 USMC were killed during Operation SCOTLAND II (16 Apr - 11 Jul 68); only 54 are listed. Therefore, at least 650 more names should be included on this list up to 11 July 1968.

In addition, there were approximately 12,000 Bru tribespeople in the area. Only approximately 5,000 made it safely to the Cam Lo Refugee Village. It is a very conservative estimate that over 7,000 Bru were killed in the Khe Sanh area during the early months of 1968.

Intelligence reports confirmed that at least 10,000 North Vietnamese soldiers were killed during the Siege, and MACV estimated 15,000 based upon 2 killed per secondary explosion and other mathematical models. The Vietnamese government now notes and admits that 40,000 of their soldiers were killed Jan-Mar, 1968 at Khe Sanh. In addition, during the Battle of the Hills, Apr-May 1967, 824 were confirmed killed with another 551 probably killed; 206 were killed during Operation CROCKETT and another 417 probably killed; 113 were killed during Operation ARDMORE with another 210 probably killed.

KHE SANH VETERAN

For those who fight for it, life has a flavor the protected never know.
(From a sign in the recon command bunker at Khe Sanh originally the thought of an unknown recon Marine)

Issue No. 37, Fall, 1996. Published by Khe Sanh Veterans, inc., a non-profit incorporation registered in the State of Wisconsin 01 Sept 1988, and tax-exempt under Internal Revenue Code Section 501(c)(19) veterans organization by IRS letter of 10 Feb 1989, consisting of all who lived or served in the Khe Sanh battlefield area. Purposes of the organization are: To promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of Khe Sanh; To locate and account for all who so served; To promote preservation of an accurate historical account of such service; To preserve the memory of those who died there; To promote research and understanding and healing with a regard to those who served there; and to promote artistic expression of the Khe Sanh experience.

PHILADELPHIA REUNION 1996

Kevin Macaulay (B/3dRecon) was sitting in the small dining area of the hotel with some of his friends the last day of the reunion. "We come to reunions to find some friends; what we discover is more of ourself."

194 Khe Sanh veterans gathered at the Ramada Inn near the Philadelphia airport 24 to 28 July 1996, finding many friends and touching again the joy of comradeship we learned so well so long ago. Some were there for the first time, including Kenny Thompas who was the Marine at Khe Sanh who put out the sign in front of Fred McEwan's Regimental S-4 bunker: "Home is Where You Dig It," and Charles Lopez who was the pointman of a patrol of DELTA, 1/26, Marines who captured a NVA machinegunner just outside the northern perimeter in the opening days of the Siege. Bill Frye came all the way from Tahiti! Those from recon, DELTA 1/26, the Ontos section, and ALPHA 1/9 got together, and many one-on-one friendships sere renewed. A former platoon commander later mentioned that the reunion was a God-send, that he was hugged and given admiration from his men that he never expected.

Carl Oksnee's dedicated efforts to provide us with the lowest room rates in the area, a very adequate PX to purchase Khe Sanh and other kinds of memorabilia, and an excellent sit-down dinner (which emphasized a party; it was not necessary to dress-up) were the reason so many enjoyed so much. THANK YOU CARL! Some were amused at how much we've changed over the years. Is it really true, Carl, that your son, presently in the Marine Corps and seen wearing the impressive Dress Blue Marine Corps uniform, was actually wearing your uniform?

Actions taken at this reunion included:

- Relation to Third Marine Division: We are unique; merging might destroy our identity. it was decided we would remain separate but maintain a relationship. It was decided not to accept an invitation to join the Association as a non-geographic chapter.
- Ring for Khe Sanh Vets: Carl Oksnee will pursue this matter.
- Our Khe Sanh Memorial Plaque in Arlington Cemetery: The black laquer facing is damaged. Ken Penn will contact a company to make repairs.
- Erecting a Khe Sanh Memorial at Khe Sanh, Vietnam: No action will be taken now.
- Next reunions: The 1997 reunion will be held in St. Louis, Missouri, in July (when 3dMarDiv is not meeting). Part of the program for the reunion will be a trip to Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery where two large mass graves contain the remains of unidentified KIAs at Khe Sanh: one for the men of the patrol on 25 February and the other for the place crash of 6 March. It was felt that St. Louis was a central location, east and west, north and south, and has offered special incentives for meeting there. It is anticipated that the 1998 reunion, being the 30th anniversary of the Siege battle, will be held in Washington, D.C., or perhaps some nearby location (e.g., Quantico) and will include observances at the Khe Sanh Memorial plaque in Arlington and the Vietenam Veterans Memorial in the mall.
- By-Laws Committee: was formed with John Balanco, chairman.
- Khe Sanh Veterans magazine: Ernie Spencer has brought our magazine to first-class status, comparable to the best of glossy magazines and with professional and artistic expertise. A problem developed in connection with the cost of the publication (due to its professional appearance, dramatic increase in cost of paper this year, and nonpayment of dues by a significant number of those receiving the magazine). It was decided that a mailer would be sent to request dues or a reply that dues could not be paid right now but that a person would still like to receive the magazine. With the printing and mailing costs for three issues at approx. $15,000.00 and Ernie's request for approx. $5700.00, it was decided that Ernie would be given a contract, that we would determine anticipated fund receipts based on replies to the mailer, review our distribution list to remove those who apparently do not wish to receive the magazine, and proceed with payment to the Editor according to his request as we were able. Ernie declined and submitted the following:

KNOWING WHEN TO FOLD EM

I made what I felt was a just and fair offer that your Board declined. I am grateful to them for their decision. Now, I no longer feel any guilt in leaving. With the exception of one issue, I've been doing the magazine since 1992. That's long enough. If you the reader are concerned, get involved. Stop the blaming before it starts. We are a fraternal organization. We are about respect not dominance. We are about honor not control. This is YOUR magazine. Write in and say your peace. But please, let us not become divisive."

THANK YOU FOR ALL YOU HAVE DONE FOR US, ERNIE! No one fully realizes all the work of soliciting, the many phone calls and letters asking people to send in their poems and articles, all the work in typing and composition and page layout, not to mention the emotional toll that working with these memories and stories creates in the one working with them! Ernie, you've given us a very great gift from your love, and these things are never forgotten. Many dozens of our Khe Sanh vets have remarked that our magazine is a life-saver in a very, very real sense. The main editorial policy Ernie promoted was to make this magazine a forum, a sort of bunker after a patrol, a camp fire scene in the evening, where those who have experienced the things that are so difficult to verbalize could talk things over, fill in missing details, honor and spotlight a very special person, contribute their poetry and other artwork.

- Larry McCartney noted that the armed services have given until 19 February 1997 to resubmit recommendations for any personal decorations for heroic actions. This is especially significant for those whose recommended awards were lost. It would be necessary to obtain eye-witness statements, and preferrably to submit via a platoon or company commander.
- Mr. Vincent Griffith, our Treasurer, noted that during this past year we took in approximately $37,000.00, and expended approximately $30,000.00. Life Membership fees are placed in time certificates from which we are able to draw interest. In our operating funds, as of 30 June, we had $6590.00 in the bank and owed $6300.00.
- Mr. Mike O'Hara noted that in the past two years we have added approximately 500 new members.

BANQUET

John Kaheny pointed out two men sitting in a far corner, RUSSELL TURNER and NICK NICORVO. Had it not been for the heroic actions of these men, John said he wouldn't be here tonight.

The opening prayer was based on how we lived in the Siege battle where so many shared their last drops of water or last can of C-ration, even if it were a can of peaches, because we loved each other that much:

As we care and we share, we feed and are fed;
This is, O Lord, our Daily Bread.
For when we share what's even least
We taste of Your eternal feast.

From the seeds of our love in actions sown,
The bread that nourishes all is grown.
So bless this food, this night, we pray,
That those we meed be fed today
By life, our life, which we do give
Through loving living many live. Amen.

Medal of Honor recipient, Harvey Barnum, gave the main address covering his return trip to Vietnam and holding the Marines present at the banquet in the highest regard. (He had not been briefed that we have a significant number of Army folk there, including a considerable number who had served in FOB-3 and the Dusters). Reflecting the great man that he is, after being "ambushed" by John Balanco to meet with the former CO of FOB-3, he went to the table in the bar where he was, took off his MOH medalion, and the two had a very significant conversation for several hours!

Three former South Vietnamese Marines, in uniform, whose presence was arranged by DAVID SPRY, addressed everyone with the following:

Dear Friends,

This is not a speech but only a letter of a Vietnamese Marine writing to the US Marines, to you, the heroic soldiers in the Battle of Khe Sanh. You were in Khe Sanh in 1968. I was there in 1970. Nearly 28 years have elapsed, but the best memories I still retain of my soldier's life remain the indelible recollections of my deep feelings, of my pride in, and my admirations for the officers and men in the USMC and VNMC. These heroic soldiers have demonstrated the courage and exemplary fighting spirit in the battlefield. As a Marine I have to admire the courage and the discipline of the US Marines. You have done your job successfully. The Vietnam War has ended, but the spiritual and material losses have been heavy for the US and many American families. Many of your friends have left parts of their bodies on the Battle of Khe Sanh. On this occasion, I would like to express my gratitude to you and your families for the fine sentiments they have reserved for the Vietnamese for many years now, in the struggle for freedom, Democracy, and human rights of my country. On behalf of the National Association of the Vietnamese Veteran, I would like to express my deep gratitude to all of you for the nice invitation. Thank you and best wishes." TRAN THIEN HIEU, LTCOL, VNMC, Retired.

An active duty Marine Color guard presented the Colors during a very impressive ceremony, and TOM WINSTON, who is suffering from the terminal Huntington's Disease and who briefly addressed everyone, gave the command to Retire the Colors. It was most impressive to see TOM and to witness this ceremony.

CARING SESSION

A significant number of reunion attendees gathered in our general meeting room to share some of their memories of men that are no longer with us. We were introduced to special persons in a setting that enabled us to touch some of our special and tender areas of memory. The group was reminded of a very ancient statement in the Gospel of Thomas (a very old Christian document dating from the time of the New Testament, but not given the status of those books which were included in the Bible), where Jesus teaches: "If you bring out what is inside of you, what is inside of you will heal you, but if you keep what is inside of you inside of you, what is inside of you will make you sick." We all have pieces of the battle in us. Some of these pieces are extremely painful, just like jagged pieces of shrapnel, shaped like pieces of a jig-saw puzzle. If we bring them out and share them with each other, we are better able to form a whole picture, and this will help make all of us whole. The American Indians made sand paintaings and wove rugs to tell the story of their experiences, to put all the parts into a greater whole. Ancient peoples gathered around camp fires to retell the stories of their experiences, and thus developed many long epic poems and legends and stories.

BOB DONAGHUE PRESENTATION

Mr. Robert J. Donaghue gave an enlightening and motivating slide presentation and talk of his fifth trip back to Khe Sanh, 6 - 29 April 1996. Accompanying him were Charles Berg, Bruce Johnston, David "Bulldog" Smith, and Robert Shippen. Bob is helping the Bru tribespeople in the Khe Sanh area who were so close to so many of us, and whose needs are literally a matter of life and death. His accomplishments and projects include digging of water wells for the remote Bru villages, bringing medical supplies and developing a dispensary for the Bru, buying cows, etc. The hundreds of smiles on the faces of children pictured in his slides of the Khe Sanh area reflect the gratitude of those there. In many ways so many of us who served with the Bru continue to live under a guilt of having promised to help these people only to abandon them when our American interests became too costly or not in our selfish interests. They served us even to the point of laying down their ives, in many cases; we abandoned them. Now, Robert and others have returned to repay debts of love and gratitude, and, from the hundreds of photos Robert showed, this is being done. (NOTE: Several others in our membership have returned to Khe Sanh in recent years: Peter Brush, Mike Lee, Robert Shippen, Connie Menefee, Jurate Kazickas, David Spry, Larry McCartney, and Robert DeStatte. Any others?). Robert, your actions are a great inspiration to all of us! Trip #6 leaves in April, 1997.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

The ninth annual meeting in Philadelphia was a great success due to the efforts of Carl Oksnee and many others. Robert Donoghue's presentation on his trips to Khe Sanh was quite impressive. Of particular note was the announcement that Khe Sanh is on the internet. Robert and Mike

O'Hara both have established home pages which can be accesssed through the Vietnam Veterans home page. We were honored to have at the banquet as our guest of honor, Col Harvey Barnum, USMC (Ret). We had quite a large gathering, perhaps the biggest yet.

The president of the Third Marine Division asked the Board to recommend that we become a chapter of that fine organization. The Board recommended to the general membership that we table that recommendation as many felt such a move would cause us to loose our special identity. If you have any thoughts on this issue please contact me or any member of the Board. In the meantime, I would encourage you to join the Third Marine Division Association, if you have not already done so. It is a fine organization with many benefits and worthy programs.

We have been very successful with our membership campaign. As a result we will have to be more selective with the mailing list for the newsletter. The cost of mailing simply has exceeded our current capability. You will soon receive a note in the mail regarding this situation. I ask that you read it carefully and respond accordingly.

As the general membership meeting, it was decided to hold next years meeting in St. Louis. This will give us an opportunity to visit Jefferson Barracks where many of our fallen brothers lay in rest. We will also be honoring those who fought in the Hill Fights of April and May, 1967. We also will soon be observing the thirtieth anniversary of the Siege. Your Board of Directors are interested in hearing from you about special ways to commemorate these historic events.

As usual it was good to see old friends and to share fond memories. Don't miss out on it next year.

Semper Fi, John M. Kaheny, President

THOMAS STAMPER

Born 26 October 1934, died of cancer-related illness 04 September 1996. Tom was Commanding Officer of CAC OSCAR in Khe Sanh ville arriving 27 December 1967 to replace CAPT Ernest L. Elmore who had been wounded with three Purple Hearts and rotated. Tom enlisted in the Marine Corps, went up through the ranks, was a Drill Instructor at Parris Island, and commissioned in 1966. Tom had been a Platoon Commander with 3/3 at ALPHA-3, overrun the night before he arrived with every officer killed. During the Siege, Tom relocated his unit from Khe Sanh ville to the FOB-3 compound. He retired in 1975 and worked with the Navy at a ROTC unit of a high school, after which he became a lawn mower salesman. The following are some comments made during a conversation

CONVERSATION WITH TOM STAMPER

STUBBE: I remember you saying to me while we were at Parris Island together in 1969 that Colonel Lownds actually had tears in his eye.

STAMPER: He did! That old man cried. When we got out of that village and I went to his bunker, he looked at me and he said: You know, I would have lost that company [D/1/26] if I would have sent it in. He had tears in his eyes. He didn't let me down. he did all that he could possibly do in that position.... We were trapped in that village. We were completely out of ammo. And the Colonel told me that he was going to get us out and that we would be taken out by air. It would be a short-notice-type of thing. he says, Be ready to go when I pass the world, when the helos arrive. I had CAP OSCAR-2 standing-by [at the western edge of Khe Sanh ville]. So they came up the street and we evacuated that ville.

The Chorus is sung by men who never Could carry a tune before Conductors appear to lead the parade
But only from afar
Lest they be touched with the notes of the song
That they themselves have wrote.

MOYERS S. SHORE, II

The author of the first book printed on the battle of Khe Sanh, issued by the Marine Corps in 1969 and written by Marine Corps pilot, Moyers S. Shore II, The Battle for Khe Sanh, was killed 11 June 1974 when his plane crashed off Hawaii in one of the deepest areas of the Pacific Ocean. Only a few pieces of balsa wood were recovered.

KHE SANH LOGO?

The following logo is submitted as a possiblity for pins, patches, letterhead, rings, etc.:

The "V" stands for: "veteran," "Vietnam," "victory," "valor" (as in the small brass "V" in medals for heroic action in warfare), and the "V" in all the Tactical Marks on all supply Mount-out boxes in the 26th Marine Regiment (which has a blue "V") since the 26th Marines is a historic part of the Fifth Marine Division.

The "K" and the "S" emphasize sharpness, twistedness, the pain of the terrain: mountains, rivers, valleys, pathways, the geography of our patrols and the geography of our life ever since Khe Sanh. Khe Sanh's terrain and experience is sharp, painful, twisting within memories, difficult to discern where one is at any one time.

The nine-sided polygon (a nonagon) represents the multi-faceted nature of our organization, which includes all branches of the armed services, local people, civilians, and the nine or so years in which Americans served at Khe Sanh.

The design avoids extraneous details. It is not "busy" (or complex). It is meant to be universal, applicable to all who lived and served in Khe Sanh. It was completed 7 August 1996 by Ray W. Stubbe.

THE SOUL MATE

By Ray W. Stubbe

The blood on his hands
So alive with death
Gripped
Drying, dying, contracting, squeezing
Suffocating, suffusing,
Penetrating, transforming
So alive, so real, so near
So always
The brother's cry from his clay in violent shouts in words what is not said in feelings what is not felt in actions what is never accomplished in passing time what always is No washing of hands removes
The pain stain interpenetrated soul Within: always present, always shedding, always staining.
Red clay born in violenced mud
New birth bourn
in sacrificed blood:
Unseen on green
uniforms darkened;
Unseen in gleam glowed brass, colored medals - ribbons - rank - flags:
the rust of battle's reality stored in time capsule's self.
Living blood within retained in black hole unremembered memory unseen, unknown, pulling within released in lacerations by those who don't know in unhealing wounds that heal:
oasis of life in the valley exceedingly dried dismembered bones and body parts
The blood of God.

1967 HILL FIGHTS

Next year will be the 30th anniversary of the famous Hill Fights for 861, 881-South and 881-North at Khe Sanh in April and May. We are planning to do a special edition of our magazine to focus on this. If there are any veterans of those battles who would like to submit stories, memoirs, poems, either written or on a cassette tape (sometimes it's much easier just talking on a tape), please do so NOW and send them to Ray W. Stubbe ASAP.

HISTORICAL NOTES

Much of what happened subsequently in Vietnam may possibly be traced to roots in the thinking of President Roosevelt. The following is a quote from the Conference at Yalta (dialogue between President Roosevelt and Marshall Stalin, 8 Feb 1945):

THE PRESIDENT said he had in mind a trusteeship for Indochina. He added that the British did not approve of this idea as they wished to give it back to the French since they feared the implications of a trusteeship as it might affect Burma.

MARSHALL STALIN remarked that the British had lost Burma once through reliance on Indochina, and it was not his opinion that Britain was a sure country to protect this area. He added that he thought Indochina was a very important area.

THE PRESIDENT said the Indochinese were people of small stature, like the Javanese and Burmese, and were not warlike.." [From Foreign Relations of the United States, Diplomatic Papers, The Conferences at Malta and Yalta, 1945, Washington, DC: US Government Printing Office, 1955, p. 770].

The following appeared in the KSVT NEWSLETTER put out by our Secretary, Mike Loehrer, for Khe Sanh vets in Texas, May, 1995:

"I've been working in China the past five weeks. I was amazed to see what is going on in the Orient after 25 years. You've heard from McNamara, and you've heard the media's report of Vietnam 20 years after the fall of Saigon. Let me give you a report from one Marine's perspectives.

"Our purpose, plain and simple, in Asia after WW II was to check the spread of Communism from Russia and China. Korea was threatened. Vietnam was threatened. So was Thailand, Malaysia and Indonesia. We stemmed the tide in Korea. our purpose was the same in Vietnam; namely, to keep other countries in Asia from falling to Communism.

"In failing to confront the early spread of oppression prior to WW II, the US had to pay a high price later in fighting Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and Imperialist Japan. Our purpose in Korea and Vietnam was to pay a lesser price earlier. We did. I'm sorry, I don't think Reagan's efforts, no matter how important, caused the collapse of Communism. It seems to me that it was checked in Korea and it was checked in Vietnam until Russia and China were left weakened.

"At home, during the Vietnam War, after so many years of fighting, many lost sight of our purpose. Due to confusion of purpose, lack of resolve, the failings of a self-limiting strategy, South Vietnam was handed to the North. They did not win anything. But the war in Southeast Asia to check Communism was won. Evidence: Vietnam is now rapidly moving toward independence and free-market prosperity. Evidence: Other countries have not fallen. Evidence: China is opening up to the West.

The lives of American servicemen in Southeast Asia were not lost in vain. I don't care what anybody says, and I don't care if they say it with tears! I saw with my own eyes the new found freedom and love of liberty in the East among the young. As we say in Texas, 'The price of freedom is not free.' We paid the price, lest we forget."

In response to this newsletter, Mr. Walt W. Rostow (who is on our Khe Sanh roster as one who championed our situation to President Johnson as one of his closest advisors) wrote to Mike Loehrer: "In your newsletter of May 1995 you wrote a superb statement of what the war in Vietnam was all about—better than the enclosed which I wrote to clear my mind before a CNN interview.." [The following is what he wrote]:

VIETNAM

"The difference in perspective on the Southeast Asian experience can be simply stated: One group of Americans regard it as a war in Vietnam; from which we gradually withdrew; and which was won by the Communists who unified the country as the last Americans left Saigon in helicopters in great disarray.

"The other group of Americans included Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, and Johnson. They believed it was a war about the balance of power in all of Southeast Asia—from the South China Sea down to the critical Straits of Malacca including Thailand and Malaysia, Indonesia and Singapore, Australia and New Zealand. While, in the short run, the war in Vietnam was certainly won by the Communists, they did not conquer Southeast Asia.

"This view of the war in Vietnam against the background of all Southeast Asia is not taken with benefit of hindsight. Winston Churchill suggested SEATO to Dwight Eisenhower in the Waldorf-Astoria, before he took office in 1953, thinking of Singapore, and the two British battle cruisers lost to Japanese planes flying from a Cambodian airfield. We in the Kennedy administration inherited SEATO Plan 5, which was a plan for defending all of Southeast Asia from the anticipatged blow to the South from Hanoi. In 1965 Sukarno of Indonesia left the UN to join Communist China. He confronted Malaysia. It took 80 Commonwealth ships to contain that confrontation. Lee Kwan Yew at that time said, 'It looks as though we will again go through the meat grinder.'

"It was against the background of this crisis throughout Southeast Asia that Johnson made his reluctant decision of July 1965 to put American troops in large numbers into Vietnam.

"Southeast Asia doubled its income per capita between 1965 and 1975; found its feet and its confidence, creating along the way the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. Lee Kuan Yew's April 1973 prediction at the National Press Club in Washington proved true. He said that even if the Communists took over in Vietnam, it did not follow that the region would fall, as it would have done earlier. American intervention and the conflict that followed had, in his phrase, 'Broken the hypnotic spell on the other Southeast Asians that communism is irresistable, that it is the wave of history.' Twenty years after the fall of Saigon, Vietnam is an associate member of ASEAN.

"In short, we certainly lost the battle—the test of will—in Vietnam; but we won the war in Southeast Asia. And that was what it was all about.

"I repeat this point of view in part because I am thinking of the men lost in Vietnam and their families. This was surely not simply a pointless, lost war. I am sure the families and the veterans have suffered from this narrow view of the war in Southeast Asia.

"But I also do so because we are entering a century in which the South China Sea, the Malacca Straits, and the countries of ASEAN may again be at the center of diplomacy and strategy. We cannot afford again a split American perspective."

FIRE MISSION - BATTERY ADJUST

By Bill O'Connor

In the Spring 1996 issue of the Khe Sanh Veteran, Ernie Spencer responded to Capt Pardee (former CO, A/1/13) that he would like to hear his memoirs as he had not heard from any other Artillery people. Well something got to me recently that didn't sit well with me so now you are going to hear the Artillery's side of the story.

I came back home from Vietnam right out of Khe Sanh as one really angry Captain with a Regular Commission who thought the higher ups were a bunch of ———. I got out after eight years of service.

Let's set the record straight. The men of Charlie and Bravo Battery (I commanded both Batteries at Khe Sanh - we referred to ourselves as Charlie Battery Reinforced) were on the guns whenever the Command BATTERY ADJUST was sounded. it didn't make any difference that they were getting shelled by the 152s out of Co Roc or NVA mortars closer in. If you grunts think incoming artillery or rockets is a frightening experience when you are diving for a bunker try it one time running out of a bunker to man a 105 Howitzer. Let's also discuss the short round problem. LtCol Hennelly would have come right down my throat for a friendly fire incident and I do not remember that ever happening.

My Cannon Cockers stayed on their guns throughout the whole time of that first attack on the Combat Base and the surrounding hills. I had 3 guns on Hill 881 South, commanded by Lt. Biondo, and 3 guns at the Combat Base located next to the main ammo dump. That first night the ammo dump blew sky high but my troops stayed on their guns and returned fire even when their wire lines were knocked out. When we reported our ammo count that morning we only had one green smoke round left. They stayed on their guns and fired everything they had at Charlie. It takes a lot of balls to stay out in the open in the midst of a tremendous pounding of incoming artillery and rockets to return fire on an unseen enemy. What happened to that one green smoke round? Well I fired it off on the afternoon of St. Patrick's Day to wish Lt. Biondo - ERIN GO BRAGH YOU GUINEA BASTARD. Col. Hennelly chewed my ass out for that one but it was worth it.

I had a deal with my guys that if the grunts needed Artillery Support we would man our guns no matter what. On two separate occasions that I can remember we were taken under fire by NVA mortars which were in sight of the grunts on the line but no one took them under fire. I settled the problem by blowing the mortars positions away on both occasions with direct fire — on one occasion we actually pulled the gun out of the parapet, rolled it up to the wire and sent a couple of NVA to meet their maker.

On many occasions my guys had to clear live ammo out of their gun positions by hand in order to be able to continue firing. They also had to drive to the airstrip to pick up ammo resupply and drive back to the Battery position, while being shelled by the NVA artillery. Without ammo resupply we were out of luck.

Well, I think I have now worked a lot of my anger out of my system. Just do me a favor, every March 17th. St. Patrick's Day, think of the guys of Bravo and Charlie Batteries and raise a glass to toast to their bravery and then say a prayer for their souls both living and dead. God bless.

THE GUNNER ON HILL 881-SOUTH

(A Conversation with COL Bill Dabney, 29 Aug 1993)

DABNEY: It was one of those periods where we had very heavy mist, and we had had it for two or three days, which meant that we were getting no helicopters and we couldn't see a 'diddly.' I'm not sure if Khe Sanh was socked-in, but at 3,000 feet up, we sure were! So it was a period of very high alert. But at the same time a period of relative safety for us because it meant that we could work in the daytime, which we rarely could do, because the snipers couldn't see us. Yeah, they could pop their 120s at us, but we could hear those, especially in the quiet of a mist; you could hear the tube pop and get out of the way in time. And that made it a reasonable thing to do in the daytime. In that environment, one of the artillerymen—either on his own initiative or on orders from his NCO—I don't know—was up, swabbing out the bore on one of our guns. Now this gun had been on the hill from the beginning. And it had flat tires, as all of them did, from all the shrapnel. Once, I think I told you, they brought all the tires—and they bounced, and the things went rolling down—caused all sorts of hate and consternation—. We never got good tires! I don't think the fellow 'spooked,' because these were the 'PURPLE FOXES,' and these people didn't spook too much. But my suspicion is that anti-aircraft fire cut the sling—cause there was always stuff flying when they came in. I think one of the rounds just got lucky and cut the sling. The tires went bouncing down the hill. They must of bounced 200 feet in the air when they hit! They were inflated.

Well, as you know on the 105, the tire—the pneumatic tire is part of the recoil mechanism, which meant that its recoil mechanism was attenuated substantially anyway. The other thing you need to understand is that we used those guns on our own recognizance in the direct-fire mode. What I'm saying is: that when they fired indirect at distant targets, they were controlled from Jack Hennelly's bunker, but since I had operational control of everything that I could see, if I had a direct fire mission, I didn't ask for permission, I just notified that I was doing it. But in advance there was no need to do it. It was a straight shot from where I was to the target, and we often had targets. And what people would ask me is: Why don't you use the 106? We had a couple up there. The problem was that the target wasn't always where the 106 was sighted. We used the 106s on the two main avenues of approach, loaded with BEEHIVE, so that if someone came in at night, we could [?] em. But that was on the two ends of the hill. Well, humping a 106 through a trenchline is about impossible. In the first place the damn thing weighs 600 pounds, and takes six men or so to do it. In the second place, we could not make the trenchline straight, because then if a round landed in the trenchline, it wiped out a whole platoon. So the trenchlines had alot of kinds in them. And that meant that you had to carry the 106 over the top. Well, that was a very dangerous proposition: to put six men up there humping a 106 on top. Which is to say, only in extreme circumstances or when we had reduced visibility or at night did we try to move those 106s. I tried once, and lost most of the crew in the process. Well, that left us with the 105s, which were sitting right on top of the hill so they could fire 360. I hadn't sighted them there; Jack Hennelly's people had. That's where they were. Over the course of time those guns took a lot of shrapnel. And one of the results of that—we always had them up there with the sights off, because those guns are pretty tough, but the sights aren't. So we only brought the sights up when they had a mission to fire. The guns never had sights on them.

The other thing that happened, maybe a week before—a round had landed right in the berm with the gun, a big round, a 120, and it had put a hole in the right trail, a big hole. The trail was slightly bent and about two-thirds of it was severed, cause the round landed fairly close by, and that's a big round. Didn't hurt anybody, because at that point there hadn't been anybody firing a fire mission. It was just a stray round that they sent in and it happened to land in the berm with the gun. Luckily it landed in such a way that it did not ignite the rounds in the ready-box; it destroyed them as far as their usefulness was concerned, but it didn't ignite them. We always kept rounds in the ready box just because the missions were so quick...The 120s were aweful. I mean, they had a super-quick fuse, and the shrapnel was lethal to 40 or 50 yards. Any man in the open was 'dead duck' when that stuff came in.

Anyway, this guy was up there alone—which was my Standing Operating Procedure: if it didn't take two men to do the job in the open, only have one man doing it; send the other guy up after he comes down and check on it, if that's what you need to do, but don't put two or three men in one place unnecessarily because you just become a 'mortar magnet.' So anyway, this guy's standing up there, and he just finished swabbing the bore of the gun out. I'm walking around checking the troops down along the edge of the trenchline some ways, and it's pleasant, because I don't have to walk in the trench for a change. The snipers can't see me. And it's quiet, so we can hear their tubes pop. No airplanes around because it was zero-zero as far as the aircraft. All of a sudden there's sort of a valley in the clouds, looking straight towards the south, straight towards Lang Vei... Same ridge that we went out towards Laos on before the Siege started. [Note, 3/26 made a battalion sweep to Hill 918 just after arriving in mid-December, 1967]. So I've been over that ridge and I know it pretty well. It was a ridge where Tom Brindley got temporarily blinded. He walked into a VC bees nest! He was the point platoon for the battalion, and he and the pointman both got stung so badly that their faces swelled up and their eyes swelled shut and we had to medevac them. I think the point man hit it with his machette, and everything went downhill from there.

STUBBE: You could die from that.

DABNEY: You could, but Brindley tough boy and he was back in three or four days. Anyway, this guy sees this valley in the clouds, and he's finished his job and he's putting his swab away, and the breech is open, and this valley in the clouds drifts across. Well, it happens to be the gun was oriented towards the south, just by happenstance. And he glances over that way, and this is how it's described by himself and by a machinegunner on the same side of the hill who happened to be awake. Was just out watching. it appears to him that there's a little column of figures coming up a trail on the north side of the south ridge, in other words, exposed to us. And it looked to him, as he described it later, like they were carrying logs or something—the two of them, at least, were. These were images rather than definite sightings. All this is happening pretty fast. As best we could tell, it was possibly a section of 82millimeter mortars humping up the hill. The NVA was obviously using the cover of fog to move their troops around to redeploy in some manner, and we think it might of been a 82 mortar section.

This kid realizes this break in the clouds isn't going to last very long. And the time it takes to get a real fire mission going was an exercise in futility. So what he does is lean down and look right through the bore. It so happens that the trails are set well enough so he can bring the bore right to bear on these guys. And he can look at them through the bore of the gun by turning the wheels a little bit. So he does this, and immediately he grabs a round out of the ready box, fuses it—which doesn't take but a couple of seconds for a trained man, and slams it in and closes the breech. Well of course it's got Charge-7 in it; that's the way they come. And in a direct fire you usually want to fire with a Charge-7. He puts the first round right in the middle of them. He doesn't have his sights. And in quick succession—of course that startles the whole front line—with Charge-7 going right over their heads. The muzzle is probably twenty feet from this machinegun nest this other guy's—if he wasn't real alert before, he damn well sure was now! And firing a direct fire, Charge-7. In quick succession he put maybe four more rounds out, quick as he could load it. Of course by that time everybody's pouring out of bunkers and wondering what the hell's going on.

The machinegunner picks up on it cause he looks out the same way where the rounds landed. He sees the first one impact, and he sees the NVA out there. So he cuts loose. Now he's got it on a tripod so he'd fairly steady, although at 762—that's a fairly long shot. But still he gets 'clenching' fire on them. About the time the guy gets maybe his fourth or fifth round off, the cloud cover, the valley drifts back. For two more days we can't see diddly-squat, just mist. I'm talking about the kind of mist where you could put a trip flare fifty feet from you and you couldn't see the trip flare.

The point was—it's his gun, that's why he was cleaning it—and he knew damn well the trail was cracked. And firing direct-fire, Charge-7, standing between the trails on that gun, was an incredibly dangerous thing to do, and he was enough of an artilleryman to know it, because if that trail had broken with a Charge-7, that gun would probably have spun 360 and taken both his legs off. Because it had no other recoil except for the hydraulics. The tires were gone. One trail was three-quarters of the way cut through by a 120 round. The gun would have spun 360. That's a heck of a charge! And he's firing flat, so the ground didn't take any shock, remember. The tube is horizontal to the ground, probably, as a matter of fact, below horizontal, because he's shooting from 881 down to 764. That means without the tires, the trail has to take the full shock. You can imagine what would have happened if that trail had broken: everything would of been gone from the hips down, instantaneously....

WHO HAS THE PLAYBOY MAGAZINES?

I had returned to the States and sat glued to the TV nightly while you guys were surrounded and we feared another Dien Bien Phu. During that time period, Americans were asked to make various contributions to the 'cause,' such as 'letters to the guys,' etc. With tongue in cheek, I made a supreme sacrifice and shipped some twenty of my 'collector' issues of Playboy magazines c/o Khe Sanh Base, Vietnam. This seems silly, but for almost thirty years I have wondered if those Playboy magazines reached the guys and hopefully brought some distraction and reading pleasure from the war?

If any readers recall receiving this 'care package,' I look most forward to reading about it. I appreciate you printing this letter for me.

In the meantime I wish to take this opportunity to thank all of you who ever served at Khe Sanh or in Viet Nam. Here is a correspondant that is proud of you and what y ou did for freedom and the people of Vietnam. Thank you.

A LITTLE KNOWLEDGE

He had memorized
The muzzle velocity of the M16 rifle;
The effective casualty radius
Of a fragmentation grenade;
The elements of a five paragraph order; and
The Marine Corps Hymn

He understood the importance
Of maintaining
A proper interval on patrol;
Of accurate coordinates when Calling in fire;
Of dry socks; and
Keeping his weapon clean.

He knew the secret
Of how men die
On fog covered hills,
The secret
Of what they say
In that last flake
Of their time.

He had learned
The necromancy of the odds
And the spells that might cure
Their randomness.
He had learned
He was tired of the war.

Perhaps the weight
Of all that added knowledge
Was just enough
To trip the Bouncing Betty
That killed him near Khe Sanh.

RED CLAY ON MY SHOES

By Robert Topmiller

I stepped off of the bus and looked down. My shoes had faintly familiar red tint to them. I knew I had returned to Khe Sanh.

During the summer of 1996, I travelled to Vietnam to conduct research on my doctoral dissertation. While I spent most of my time in Ho Chi Minh City (Saigon), I decided to schedule two days in Hue in the hopes I could make a day trip to Khe Sanh. Upon arrival at my hotel, I asked the young woman about the DMZ tour and she told me to be in the lobby of the hotel the next morning at 6 AM. I spent the rest of the day touring pagodas in the Hue area while my excitement and apprehension grew about my next day's activities. The evening before I found myself slamming beer with gusto.

Finally, morning arrived. I got up at 4 AM and hurried down to the lobby by 5 AM, waking the desk clerk. After sitting in the lobby for close to 50 minutes, he asked me casually if I had a ticket for the tour. When I said no, that I planned to purchase it from the driver of the bus, he ran outside and quickly hailed a cyclo. I took a very fast and nerve racking ride across the city as I realized that I might literally miss the bus. When I arrived at DMZ Tours and told the manager what I wanted, he promptly barked out orders to two young men who jumped on motorcycles and sped away from the office. Only then did I realize that they were going after the bus. After an agonizing 15 minutes, the bus returned to the office and I filled the last seat. The irony of my position struck me hard. This represented my only chance to visit Khe Sanh since I had to leave the next day for Hanoi. I had come thousands of miles only to come within a whisker of not making it to Khe Sanh.

As we started up the road towards Dong Ha, I observed the pastoral scenes I remembered about Vietnam: old women carried improbably heavy loads on their shoulders while small children sat astride huge water buffalo as the expanding countryside filled with rice paddies.

I also began to realize that the Vietnam I once knew no longer exists. I first encountered this when I flew into Phu Bai airport, which n ow serves as the airfield for Hue. I associated Phu Bai with the huge base that resided there in 1968. Instead, no sign of the American presence remains except for a few deserted guard towers off in the distance. The Vietnamese Army has a garrison there but, like all of PAVN (People's Army of Vietnam) bases, it remains completely hidden from view except for the sign at the front gate. As we drove north along Highway One, I encountered the same conditions. I will always associate Dong Ha and Quang Tri with the airfields and hospitals there. Yet, they are gone. It seems as if the Communists determined that by eradicating the last vestiges of the US presence, they could claim complete victory.

One thing in plentiful supply, however, were graveyards. The further north we went the larger they became, always adorned with large monuments commemorating the sacrifice of the NVA and VC soldiers who fought there. Across the old DMZ, a huge cemetery holds the graves of over 10,000 North Vietnamese soldiers killed along the Ho Chi Minh Trail. Seeing the monuments called to mind some of the extreme ironies of the Vietnam War. The VCP (Vietnamese Communist Party) struggles with the realization that over 50% of the present population of Vietnam, born after 1975, cares little about the war and that young Vietnamese mainly emulate American values and cultural norms. American students, on the other hand, remain extremely eager to learn about the US experience in Vietnam. In the same manner, I have never met an adult Vietenamese in the US or Vietnam who did not know about Khe Sanh while I have seldom met an American who did except for veterans.

In Dong Ha we stopped and picked up our guide. A young, intense man who displayed a remarkable knowledge of the DMZ area, Le Duc Hoang, presented the history of the struggle for the DMZ in an even handed and well reasoned manner. he seemed quite familiar with the USMC side of the war and I detected a trace of admiration in his voice for the combatants on both sides....

We then traveled back down Highway One to Dong Ha and started up Highway Nine to Khe Sanh. I had never been on Highway Nine before since I arrived at Khe Sanh nine days before the start of the siege and the road remained in North Vietnamese hands at that time. As we moved down the road, settlements and people again thinned out considerably, but not the North Vietnamese army presence. I noted several large installations including the biggest base I observed in the whole country, just outside of Khe Sanh.

Our first stop was the Rockpile. As I looked over the landscape where so much fighting occurred, I was shocked to discover that it had completely recovered. It seemed as if the war had never happened and our involvement constituted more an illusion than reality. Vietnam, in its interminable history had again recovered from another foreign iinvasion. For my part, I suppose it was foolish to expect to return to a Vietnam as I remembered it. Nevertheless, I remained unprepared for such a drastic change.

After the Rockpile we proceeded up the road to a Montagnard village where Hoang carried on a conversation with several women who had been digging for American scrap metal. Think of it. Vietnamese and Montagnard women, some using metal detectors, dig in the ground around old military bases, an incredibly dangerous task, just to gain a little money in a Vietnam that remains desperately poor.

Hoang told us the government wants to alter the Montagnard practice of slash and burn agriculture and replace with permanent settlements. So far, they have only been moderately successful.

From the village, we drove to Khe Sanh. As we followed the curves in the road to climb the last hill to Khe Sanh, I saw a stunningly beautiful panorama of the valley that falls away from the Khe Sanh plateau. Entering the village (I had never been there either), I was impressed by the relatively n ice homes I observed. But, then I surmised that most of them probably had been built or rebuilt after the war. Suddenly our bus stopped and I saw Hill 1015 out of the window. I stepped on the ground and noticed it was made up of red clay.

We walked up a trail to a bare spot of earth where Hoang announced that we stood on the old airstrip. Hoang said nothing will grow on the strip, a statement that did not surprise me. As we approached the strip, a local man offered to sell me various American insignias he had dug from the ground. I was repelled by the thought, just as in Ho Chi Minh City when I saw displays of American dog tage in many souvenir stores.

Standing on the airstrip at Khe Sanh, as so many memories flooded into my consciousness, I again realized the value of my research topic. My main purpose in going to Vietnam was to conduct research for my doctoral dissertation on the Buddhist movement in South Vietnam from 1964-66. I believe that the Buddhists represented the last opportunity to prevent the unfolding catastrophe that became the Vietnam War. As I stood on the strip and remembered all of the young men who died—Vietnamese and American—over what is now a coffee plantation, I felt overwhelmed with sadness.

To my absolute astonishment, I realized that the land had reclaimed Khe Sanh also. The base is a huge coffee plantation with the exception of the air strip, which exists as a long red scar on the land. The pockmarked hillsides had also regained their lushness. It is hard to describe my feelings standing on the Khe Sanh airstrip after so many years. I realized with stunning force, for the third time that day, that the Vietnam I remembered, the place that resided so firmly in my psyche and has ruled much of my life, simply no longer exists. It is as if the land reclaimed its right to be Vietnam. I felt robbed and cheated. Surely there should be amemorial, some kind of reminder of the bloodletting that occurred here. Alas, I realized that the Khe Sanh we all share exists today only in the history books and our memories. I later mentioned this feeling to Ray Stubbe who pointed out that people who live in the past, which I suspect many of us do, live in the past alone. To Ray, the answer is that we have to depend on each other since all we have is each other. Perhaps, but for me the visit to Khe Sanh did not represent the liberating experience I anticipated. instead, if left me confused and full of ambiguity as I struggled then, and now, to come to terms with the reality of Khe Sanh. It is as if the land and the people are telling us it's time to move on. They had no choice, they had to adapt or perish. What about us?

Fortunately, my fellow travelers interruptged my revierie. An eclectic group of European young people, they crowded around me when one of the students asked if it was true that I had been at Khe Sanh. My reminiscing turned into a 'History of the Siege of Khe Sanh class' as I pointed out the various landmarks and I tried to explain what had occurred here 28 years ago. One young Irish woman asked me 'was it bad?' while a Dutch woman asked me if I felt strange being back here. Yes. Yet, I could not express in words to a bunch of strangers what Khe Sanh meant to me. I felt like a relic of the war, like the airstrip.

I wanted to walk around and perhaps locate some familiar landmarks, but our guide remained absolutely adamant that no one go off the trail. Only a month before a local villager died no more than 30 yards from where we stood as he dug in the ground. Amazingly, many Vietnamese worked in the field digging and hoeing, seemingly inured to the dangers lurking beneath their feet.

As I briefed the Europeans, I mentioned the persistent fog of Khe Sanh. Just then, Hoang said, 'Here it comes.' Sure enough, it started to roll in from the northwest and Hoang said it was time to go. As we walked down the trail, I noticed a color television in one of the Vietnamese houses in the village. One of my traveling companions said they were probably watching 'Little House on the Prairie,' one of the most popular shows in Vietnam. Despite the poignancy of the moment, I laughed uproariously at the irony of it all. It was a long ride back to Hue.

RETURN TO KHE SANH

By Donald M. Rait

I have just returned from a trip of Viet Nam. The highlight of my trip was a return visit to Khe Sanh.

After 28 years, much has changed in Viet Nam. The population has doubled to over 72 million (the huge majority are under 30 years of age). The areas along Route 9 from Dong Ha all the way to the Laotian border are full of cheerful, enthusiastic and productive families. The areas we knew along the DMZ are now rubber tree plantations and there's even a road between Gio Linh and Con Thien now. Electrification and TV have come to those areas with nearly every 'hootch' sprouting an atenna.

My desire in returning to Viet Nam was a very personal one. I, like most of the former Marines on the trip, was looking for 'closure.' After only several days there, I can honestly report that I felt what most describe as 'closure.' The simple and compelling fact is that the Vietnamese people have, for the most part, rethought, rebuilt and gotten on with their daily lives with great industry and an astonishing amount of energy. Seeing this in living color encourages me to do the same with my life.

All of us remember I Corps in particular and Viet Nam in general as it was nearly 30 years ago. For me it is pock-marked, scarred, smelly, red, brown and forever wet clay. Today, many areas have been reforested with a form of fast-growing eucalyptus tree. I thought the terrain features wouldn't have changed much after 30 years. Boy was I wrong. Camp Carroll is now a pepper plantation. Con Thien is covered with acre after acre of coffee plants.

I'll never for one second forget the horror and the honor of my Marine Corps experience of 1967-1968. Now I have an additional picture in my mind: that of a new vibrant, happy, energetic and growing Viet Nam to add to my forever frozen-in-time mental picture of the dismal and gut-wrenching times. For me that's enough to call it 'closure.'

For anyone considering a trip back to Viet Nam I say DO IT. For those who have no desire for a return visit, that's fine too, just realize that time hasn't stood still for those who have remained. Take it from one who returned slightly more than a week ago, it's a great place to visit and the real payoff is to put some very positive thoughts into place. Somehow the frequent horrible memories are now softened ever so slightly.

ANOTHER PERSPECTIVE

(From a letter from Bob Koury, 2 Jul 1996)

Bill Ring and I both served in and around Khe Sanh in early 1968. We were with D/1/1. I was a platoon and company commander. I came to Khe Sanh on Pegasus after being in and around Hue City during Tet. I spent about a month on 881 and more time on 558, 689 and 861. Bill and I revisited Khe Sanh, Hue City and most of Route 9 to Laos a few years ago. Couldn't get up on the hills, but humped in a bunch of beer to celebrate my birthday at Khe Sanh. nice place to visit, but you wouldn't want to live there. For all the bleeding hearts, the areas we defoliated with agent orange are now full of crops (mostly cashews) and doing fine, thank you. However, many of the hills have been clear cut to trade hardwood through Laos avoiding our embargo. After just a couple of slash and burn planting seasons, the soil runs out of nutrients, is abandoned and erodes into the valley streams below as mud and silt. They are also contaminating a number of the rivers while mining for gold with quicksilver—mercury poisoning for generations to come. Quite a mess.

BENEDICTION

The deafening guns are temporarily silenced.
We hear birds and the soft breeze of refreshment
We smell
fresh waters we touch
our family and our friends.
The battlefield of horrors and terrors we have known is replaced by fields of grass and trees and art and the beauty of these people here assembled Yet in the silence we hear ever ever still the guns and cries
And in the meadows
we still behold the unspeakable still within us.
For we are the living memory of human failure of justice and understanding
We are the living memory of our friends so violently taken from us.....[more follows]

[The following memoirs of experiences at Khe Sanh are included not only for their intrinsic value—they are direct from the heart, precious as rare jewels—but also included to perhaps motivate you, the reader, to make your own memoirs. In the first one, Gary Parker simply sat with a cassette tape recorder and let the thoughts just flow. He later said that he really didn't recall what he had even said. Carlos Morales, at the Philadelphia reunion, shared the cassette since he found so much value in playing it with his family. Jim Griffin wrote a letter to two highschool teachers. Coincidentally, the daughter of Sergeant Major Bean contacted us for information about her father who was KIA at Khe Sanh. She and Jim have since talked at length, to the great benefit of both. Kevin Macaulay writes in a different literary style indicating what happened and his thoughts and feelings about it. These writings are precious transformations which heal others and even the one writing them.]

TAPE FROM GARY PARKER TO CARLOS MORALES

My name is Gary K. Parker. I was born March 22nd, 1949. I joined the Marine Corps December 25th, 1966, and had the opportunity to serve in Vietnam. I arrived in Vietenam the 27th of December, 1967. When I got there I was stationed in Dong Ha, Vietnam. I was told I was going to be going up to a place called Khe Sanh a week, week and a half, after I got there. I had no idea what Khe Sanh was or what was going on up there. I'd only been in country for about a week and a half. I was working with Third Shore Party Battalion, which is what I was assigned to my entire 13 months there. Shore Party Battalion consists of groups of individuals who work with helicopters. They bring in supplies. They take out the dead and wounded. They resupply outfits that are out in the field.

When I got to Khe Sanh—I got there about the 15th of January, 1968, it wasn't all too bad the first week or so that I got there. After awhile they started getting incoming artillery which came in to the extent of a couple hundred artillery rounds a day. They set me up—I guess the second day after I got there—to one of the hills. They told me I was going to be going up and replacing a 'teamy' (which is someone who works with a Helicopter Support Team) who was killed up there; they needed a radioman. I went up to the top of the hill. I can remember my first impression getting there: the helicopter landed, I remember looking out the door, and just like watching a movie—you see people covered in ponchos and laying all over the hill—you knew that there was something going on.

I jumped out of the helicopter, took off. There was a radio at the Command Post for me which they told me had belonged to the person I was replacing. I had no idea what I was to do up there, being new in country. After about six hours I kinda got the hang of it real quick. The job of a support team person, HST Team, 'teamies,' is to go down every morning, find out from the Commanding Officer exactly what it is that they need for the day—ammunition, food, water—and then to get on the radio and call for those supplies and make sure that they're brought in. We were also used in evacuating MEDEVACs, people who are seriously or not seriously wounded, also evacuating the dead. I would have to say that it seems like every hour, we'd be bringing in helicopters to take out the wounded. Wounded were 'priorities;' the dead people were 'routine.' They could wait; there was no real need to get them to any kind of medical facility. We would just cover them as best we could and wait until the time cleared so we could get them out. It was a routine that went on, day in and day out. You have to worry about covering your own butt. At the same time you had to worry so much about taking care of other lives. You were so responsible for getting these helicopters out of there, or getting them to come in to take away the wounded. There'd be many a times when the incoming would be so bad that helicopters just couldn't get in to a zone and you'd be sitting there with one, two, three, or four seriously wounded people who were actually dying, and you felt almost as though you were God. You had the ability to get on the radio and get those people in. And you just feel so bad to watch these people—just—die—and not being able to get them out in time. Of course, the majority of them, we did get out. But there's always those cases where the overcast or the incoming would be so bad we couldn't get them out. You'd just sit there and you'd watch them die. It was an awful feeling.

There have been times up on Hill 881 in January and part of February where I would have done just about anything to get off that hill. We had three Landing Zones up there. Every one of the Landing Zones were zeroed in. I knew that if I were to bring a helicopter in I could get the first two of maybe five without any incoming. Anything after that, there was nothing that you could do; you had to continue to bring them in, no matter what type of artillery or rockets or small arms fire was coming in.

I can remember many a times standing underneath the helicopter directing them in. The only thing that you can hear is the dirt flying around the scream of the turbines on the chopper and yelling on the headphones to the pilot or copilot. You cannot hear the incoming. You don't know what is being thrown up from the blades and what's the incoming flak. All you know is: the life of these people is in your hands. Those that are rotating, those that are coming and going out, they have got to have that helicopter hover for so long before they can drop it off or before they can come down and load up. You can't hear anything. You're underneath there. And we lost so many Helicopter Support Team personnel just standing there talking to the helicopters, not being able to hear anything. I used to hate that. I used to hate having to go out there. Once a job gets started you can't turn back; you have to go straight through it.

I can remember I had a 'teamy' up there with me who was on the radio, and I could see him waving at the helicopters and I seen his fingers get blown off. Turn right around and put him on the same helicopter that took the other people, and work it solo until you get a replacement. Like I said before, it was just 'day in and day out.' It was hell.

I was on that hill for almost three and a half weeks. I thought I was going to go crazy. I finally got somebody to replace me. And I remember the person's name, Mike Lee, a very good friend of mine now. He came up to replace me. I can remember when the helicopter landed, that look in his eyes, and he got off, I gave him my radio and I got back on and went back down to the bottom of the hill. It was just as bad [on the combat base] as it was on the top of the hill.

Sometime in the middle of February after being at the basecamp for a couple of weeks, I was told I was going up to Hill 861-Alfa. I was going up there again as a Helicopter Support Team radio operator. I was told that I was to hook-up with somebody up there, that there was going to be someone there already to give me a hand. And I remember landing. There wasn't anything going on at the time, and I checked with the Commanding Officer and the XO up there and he told me to go down to the 'saddle' which connects the two parts of the hill and that I would find my compadre or my friend there. I can remember walking up to a foxhole or a fighting hole right there in the saddle, looking down and saw the red patch on the guy's hat and said, 'Are you a Shore Party guy?' and he said, 'Yeah, come on,' and he said, 'Yeah, come on, jump in.' It was Carlos Morales. What a guy. I can remember that first night that we were together there, stuck in that hole, and talking about different excitement and things that have gone on. And I'm not sure if it was the first night or the second night, but I remember one time we were in that hold together and we heard an explosion. Didn't think much of it because explosions were going on all the time. As long as you don't stick your head up over the hole, you're all right. The next morning, I remember somebody coming up to us, telling us we had to get a helicopter in for two people that were killed. They were about 35, 40 feet from us. They were in a shelter-half, playing around with a hand grenade, something to do with killing time, I guess, and the thing went off and killed them both. I remember we couldn't get them out for a couple of days. We had them wrapped up real tight. We had to worry more about the routine supplies—getting them in and out, and the Priority MEDEVACs. They went out in a couple of days.

I also remember a time in the hole—we'd be talking about trading each other's sisters: I told him I had a red-headed sister and he told me he had a sister. We were talking about meeting each other—each one of them as we got out of the Service and went back to the States. Just about that time (I believe) there was talk of being overrun on the hill. We got our hand grenades out of our pouches, and there were tracers flying all over the top of the hill. I can remember grabbing a bunch of hand grenades that I had, grabbing these things and throwing them over the side of the hill. We were right on the edge of the hill. Carlos and myself were throwing these fragmentation grenades off the side, and I could hear his exploding, but mine didn't seem to be going off. I couldn't figure out why. I thought every time you throw them you got five seconds and the stupid grenade's supposed to go off. Well after tossing about five or six of them things off the side, I looked down. We had a little candle in the hole there, and I realized, being the safe guy that I am and only being in country a couple of months, I had put electrical tape on the spoons of the hand grenades and was so afraid that I'd get it caught in a bush and it would go off and kill me, so I threw these grenades out there and had the tape on them. Well, needless to say, neither one of us slept the rest of the night because we figured the North Vietnamese were going to discover this little 'foulaw' here and take the tape off and throw them right back at us. Don't believe they did, though. We just did not sleep too good for a night or two. You could see shadows of people running over the top of the hill, and you don't know who'se who. All I knew was: I was not an infantry-type person, so I didn't worry too m uch about getting up there and getting into the thick of things.

That next morning, we discovered that we did have a slight overrun on the base area, and there weren't too many casualties. The next morning we had shipped out about a sozen dead and wounded on the choppers. It got to the point to where all you're dealing with is death. It was just mind-blowing. Here I am, 18 years old—Carlos same age—and didn't need that shit—really didn't need that at that age. We're supposed to be going out with girl friends and going to drive-ins and not really worried about getting somebody out before they bleed to death or reattaching a hand.

I guess what I'm trying to say here is that we were dealing so much with life and death that nothing else really seemed to matter. Personally speaking, I have probably been touched by the fact that when somebody is dead, it was just something that was there. It was just a thing on the ground. I really could not get attached to it. There was just so much of it that—well, I always thought that a dead person was supposed to be a scarry thing, supposed to be something that people felt bad for. I didn't. It's the wounded people you got very, very close to, especially those that didn't make it that you were talking to and those people that told you what nobody else heard and you heard the last things that these people ever had to say, the last requests that these people had. So many of them calling for their mothers, girl-friends—please tell my mother this or tell my wife that. Every single day. It just—you're not the same person when you come back.

I have been back 26 years and even sitting down doing a tape like this is very hard. I can't talk to anybody else about this but other guys that have gone through this. I feel very, very close to Carlos; we're like brothers. We may have only met for two weeks in an entire lifetime at the first meeting; in February of 1968 two people couldn't get much closer. And I know that he felt exactly what I felt. To this day, I know we both have those problems. You put up a real good front. You try to put up a shield or barrier. People talk to you—they weren't there. There's an old saying: If you weren't there, shut your mouth. That's pretty much the idea. It would be nice if I could talk to other people in the same way that I talk to other veterans—and again, when I say 'other veterans,' I do feel close to other veterans, but I don't feel any closer to any people than I do [as with] the people that I spent time in a hole with for two weeks, learned everything about somebody, and they learn everything about you; you have nothing more to talk about but your family and back home, cause you don't know if you're going to be there tomorrow. You don't know if you're going to be out there. You have a job to do. If the call comes and you have three people to get out, you've got to jump up there—I don't care—and you do. Nobody stays hidden. You go out there and you jump right in the middle of it, cause you've got your job to do first. I don't know what comes over you. We would jump right out of a hole, there'd be tracers going right over the top of your head—that's the last thing you think about because you know there's a job to do. You're out there. You bring that helicopter in. And those guys in those helicopters: sometimes I don't know how they did that. We can duck and hide; they gotta stay right out there and hover, and they got to hover the entire time—that somebody's got to jump in or jump out. They must be going through a lot of stuff too.

After 26 years I still keep very close with Carlos and his family, eventhough I've still never met his sister. You do stay close. And we both have problems. We try to work them out. We call each other if something's not right. But I could not talk to him for maybe five weeks, a month, two months, and it would be like I was talking to him yesterday. It's something that the normal person will never understand, and I really don't ever want anybody else to understand: I think it's a very personal thing that you go through in war. You hold the lives of other people in your hands, and they hold your life in their hands.

Khe Sanh was a bad place! There's not a day that goes by that I don't think about it. I look at life a lot different now than I ever did before. I never want to go through that again, but I'd never give it up for anything, and I'd never give up any of the friends that I've ever met. And I just hope in time that me and all of my friends, Carlos included, can come to grips with what happened and put it past. I'm waiting for that time I can wake up some morning and not have to think about this. There's not a day that goes by that I don't think about this. Every single day, dealing with death and destruction. 77 days of this.

I was there until the 13th of March when I was finally MEDEVACED out and could not be sent back. I was standing in the Drop Zone, the second time that I was wounded, and a mortar landed right in front of my face. And I remember seeing the flash. I said, well, 'good night, Irene!' This is it. And went out. Woke up, and I was in a hospital, but at the same time I was so glad that it was all over and I wouldn't have to worry about that anymore. All that in a split second. It's a very hard thing.

It's easy to cover it up. You can always put a shield on and pretend like nothing's wrong but deep down, inside, it just seems like there's something burnt and imprinted in there. It's never going to go away. I don't know what it is. I think until the day I die, I'll carry these 77 days with me. I don't think I'll ever, ever come up to anything that was even close to that. It's just a very hard thing to live with. But my shield still works, and I seem to be doing very well. It's just something that I hope sometime is going to heal itself. One thing that won't heal itself, and that is that Carlos and I will always remain very, very good friends, and we want that to stay that way, so if healing means not being friends anymore, I don't ever want to heal in that way. I guess that's about it. I can't think of anything else.

LETTER TO TWO HIGH SCHOOL TEACHERS

By Jim Griffin

Dear Brenda and Christa,

Thank you for inviting me to your class. Talking about Khe Sanh is much easier now than it was two years ago when, for the very first time, I spoke of my experiences in Vietnam and of my return to the 'world.' Even so, I lost it a little bit yesterday when I told the story of Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer and, because of the emotion, I omitted many details that are important. Spicer volunteered to coordinate the stretcher bearers whose job it was to ferry the dead and the wounded from the medevac choppers to Charlie Med when they were brought in from the Marine outposts in the surrounding hills. He was also responsible for coordinating the loading of the dead and wounded from the base and the hills when they were sent to Phu Bai and Dong Ha where the hospitals were better equipped and more secure, or, in the case of the dead, they were to be processed to begin the long journey home. His position on the airstrip was perilous because the NVA gunners always unleashed a withering barrage of mortar, rocket and artillery fire whenever helicopters and planes tried to land at Khe Sanh. Spicer's largely exposed position between the landing zone and Charlie Med (distance between your class and the cafeteria) was unspeakably dangerous. According to Ray Stubbe, our chaplain at Khe Sanh, Spicer often refused to take cover when we were under attack, choosing to remain on the exposed airstripa longside the wounded. And this he repeatedly did until, in early March, he was mortally wounded while he was helping to load onto a helicopter a large number of wounded Marines.

Spicer was a small, gentle boy of 19 or 20 with indomitable spirit and courage. If there is a heaven I know he is there.

I am also sending a picture of me and two friends, both killed in Khe Sanh, taken probably in early February 1968. I would like to tell you their stories. Corporal Gary Thorpe (on the left, wearing helmet) was from Montana. He was a gunner with a 106 recoilless rifle team whose position was on the l ine near the junction with the trash dump road, not far from Charlie Med, our field hospital. I got to know him while delivering water and sandbags to different points on the 1/26 line. An affable, seemingly carefree and fun-loving redhead, Gary was the kind of person everyone enjoyed being around. From time to time I would visit Gary in his 'sleeping bunker,' a grave-sized hold, only deeper, that could accommodate maybe three or four people sitting on the sleeping ledge but only big enough for one person to sleep. We would sit there talking, laughing at twice-told jokes, wondering how wonderful life would be when we got back to the 'world.' It was there one night that Gary told me and another Marine why he was ready to die. This is his story:

Gary was about 20 but he was on his second tour in Vietnam. I do not remember which unit he served with on his first tour, only that, as with so many Marines, he immediately volunteered to go back. Anyway, it does not matter now. During that first tour Gary was called on to fire in support of a squad of Marines that had been ambushed and pinned down. Close to the ambush site on the slope of the hill theere was a shallow cave and the surviving Marines had managed to scrabble into this cave and it was from there that they were desperately radioing for fire support. According to Gary, the NVA soldiers were almost at the mouth of the cave, lobbing grenades and firing almost directly into it when he was given the order to open fire. He said he remembered what happened in slow motion, that he could see it in his mind in great detail, that since that day he had seen it over and over and over again. The first round took out the NVA soldiers attacking to the right of the entrance and the second round was aimed at those approaching the mouth of the cave to the left. Gary said he knew as soon as he had fired that the second round was going into the cave, that he could see it, that he could see the faces of the Marines in the cave and that he knew they knew that they were going to die and that it was Gary Thorpe who was going to kill them. There were no survivors.

Gary Thorpe was killed on February 15, 1968, during an intense NVA artillery barrage. A shell, the kind we called a Co Roc Freight Train, scored a direct hit on his gun pit. There were no survivors. Sometimes, when I imagine everyone else in the world to be sleeping peacefully and dreaming sweet dreams I see myself huddled in that cave, reflected in Gary's pale blue eyes, awaiting the shattering onrush of deliverance.

I do not believe that Gary and Spicer ever met but I am certain that they are good buddies by now. I can hear Gary laughing, yelling at Spicer: 'You stupid -ucking shit, why did you do it, why are you still doing it?' And Spicer, embarrassed by the profanity, responds with a gentle smile: "It's okay, somebody had to do it and it still needs to be done and I'm here' as he sorts and sends off the dead and wounded souls of some other war.

The other man in the picture—who is not wearing his helmet—is First Sergeant Donald Bean—'Top,' as First Sergeants were and are known to all Marines. In a USMC infantry battalion there are five companies, four line companies and one headquarters and service company. Each company has a 'top,' and if God shined His grace on you, you had a Top like First Sergeant Donald Bean. Top Bean was First Sergeant for H&S, 1/26, and he was my Top and we all loved him dearly. This is his story:

I do not think I ever knew how old he was then, but he had the kind of youthful face you see in the photograph, that you would like to have when you are that old. Husband and father of two young children, he was also father and friend to us all. Like any good father or Top, his only concern was for the well-being of his boys, his Marines. Oh, he could lay some shit on you if you screwed up and he pushed us hard at times but we understood and rarely complained because we knew that he was always there ready to work with us.

In the afternoon, when the fog or clouds lifted, Top would come out of the bunker where he and four or five of us lived and fill sandbags with us and watch the airstrikes that were taking place just beyond the trench line. And when a sniper's round came whining by he, like we, would just laugh and duck and keep on filling those sandbags. We did not have much respect for snipers; afterall, a bullet was small and it had to hit you to hurt you, unlike those other things we had come to know too well. We did not laugh, though, when we thought about the NVA soldier in the hole with the .50 machine gun at the end of the airstrip. That was quite another matter, although he almost never shot at us but rather at the planes and choppers that tried to get in or leave when the clouds lifted in the afternoon. We all knew exactly where he was and while we filled those bags we watched, day after day, as our gunners directed a withering barrage of shells on his position. And after each Marine fire mission, we would hear the bloodcurdling thunk-thunk-thunk-thunk of that .50 and see those green tracers he used to let us know we had not killed him yet. And in time we began to call him not 'charlie,' not 'gook' or 'slope' nor 'zipperhead,' but 'Mr. Charles,' and in our own way we began to love him, to depend on him, even though he too was a killer and sooner or later we would have to kill him. One afternoon, as Top and I were filling sandbags, the powers that be in regimental headquarters had had enough. They called in an airstrike, a flight of three Marine phantoms to end once and for all our romance with 'Mr. Charles.' I see them now coming up the valley, east to west, rising high to form for the attack, then one by one swooping like a swallow, searching for, finding, then hurtling towards that soldier with the .50. On the first pass each dropped the 500 pounders, so close that blast and concussion and sound were one, and as always some of the fragments came whining and whirring into the base; on the second pass each phantom let tumble his load of napalm onto the soldier's position, and as we watched the roll of flames turn from white-hot to pink to blood-red, we knew that now there could be no living thing left at the end of that airstrip. And then the part we liked best, that we knew would come last, because these were Marine pilots, they were our brothers, and they were going to do it for us just for the hell of it. They formed high above the valley and one by one began their screaming, squirming swoop until they were parallel to the line about thirty or forty feet up. We stood there and watched as each Phantom passed through that sheet of NVA rifle fire, that unbearable ripping, rattling sound of popcorn popping on a hot burner, until there were no more shells to fire, and it was time for them to go home. When the third and last phantom cleared his guns we all just stood there and waited because in our heart we knew that the pilot would say goodbye with that Marine victory roll we had come to love so well. And as the pilot wrenched it up, jinking and rolling and reaching for safety we heard it, over and above the echo of the rifle and cannon fire and the roar of the phantom, the thrilling heart-throbbing fire-beat, thunk-thunk-thunk-thunk, of that murderous .50 and we watched, frozen in time, as those lovely green tracers rose into the afternoon sky to sting the tail of that phantom. We stood there, seeing it all for the longest time, until all at once Top and Gary and Funk and Snyder and I and every Marine on the line began to scream and cheer and weep for the absolute, magical, beauty of life.

I like to think that Top and I were very close. Maybe that is because I felt such a terrible loss the day he died washing clothes almost where you see him in the picture. He always had a smile for everyone, a kind word of encouragement when the going got tough. In the morning he would sometimes say 'rise and shine boys, pat your ass because we made it through another night,' and that was enough to get the day started on a note of hope. At night or early in the wee hours of the morning when I was on radio watch, sometimes he would get up and join me by the radio, our knees almost touching, and we would make hot chocolate or coffee and chat, not much, but a little. One night we even listened to Hanoi Hannah on a portable radio but not for long because she played 'Yesterday' by the Beatles and said things about the Marines at Khe Sanh that made us sad.

From the beginning Top would ask me to go here, go there, take this or that message to so-and-so and when there was a lot of incoming and someone had to go he knew I knew that he was going to say 'Griff, get your helmet on' and later when I made it back to the bunker wild-eyed and out of breath he would say, 'Took your time, didn't you?,' but I could see the smile in his eyes and I knew that he was pleased. Sometimes he would ask someone else in the bunker to go but usually he would ask me. I guess that is why I think Top and I were close, and because I think I was the only one in the bunker to see the sadness in his eyes the last few days of his life. The night before he died he was sitting on his cot looking at some pictures when I got off radio watch. He asked me to sit down, to keep him company while I drank my coffee. We did not talk much but I know he was thinking about his family, thinking of the things he would like to say to them, as we all so often did. I believe that Top knew that soon it would be his time to go home and this was his way of letting me know so that I would remember.

Now, you and your students can remember with me.

Thanks again for inviting me to your class.

Jim Griffin.

27 JAN 68 — JUNIOR — RIP

By Kevin Macaulay

THOUGHTS: Gotta get us, gotta fill more sand bags. Has it really been three days since the bunker got hit? It feels like a lifetime. This shelling is really getting to me. I think the gooks are just tossing some of these rounds in to mess up our minds. With the weather so screwed up, they can't see shit and neither can we. I wish the Captain would send us out on working parties out of the company area. This place is starting to look like a garbage dump; the tents and hardbacks are all blown away. All of our gear is just lying out in the open. Shit, this pair of utilities that I have on are my last pair. I'll be pretty ripe soon. There goes Pappy [Slack, XO of recon], maybe he's got some new scuttlebutt.

CONVERSATION: Hey, Lt., did we get any mail in yet? I didn't think so, the bags that I brought up to the post office the other day are still there. At least it didn't get blown up with that C130 yesterday. Do you think that the Col. will put us on the lines with the grunts? I hope so, this area is getting a little too dangerous for my liking. With the COC across the street, the airstrip just north of us, and the ammo dump just down the road, anytime the gooks miss the important stuff, the rounds fall in our area. Goddam rockets are the worst, you don't know where they're going to hit. Listen, doesn't that sound like a couple of mortars going off? I hope it's outgoing. INCOMING! INCOMING! Here we go again.

THOUGHTS: O God, those landed where the guys are filling sand bags. I hope we lucked out this time...

CONVERSATION: Corpsman. CORPSMAN! Come here Purefoy, come here man, stop running around. I'll help you. Where are you hit? Hands? Shit, your fingertips are all gone. Sgt. Wilder throw me your first aid kit. No, he's not too bad. His fingers are messed up. Pvt. Penny will help get him over to Charlie Med. I'm going to see if anyone else is hit. Someone is calling for stretcher bearers.

THOUGHTS: Ah, shit, more wounded. Doc Turner's hit too. He's still working on somebody, though. Who's he working on? Oh, good Lord, that looks like...

CONVERSATION: JUNIOR! No! Please, dear God, don't let it be Junior! Hey, Doc, how is he? How bad is he hurt? He don't look too good, Doc. He ain't breathing. Doc, you gotta make him breathe. Come on, Junior, breathe. Come on, buddy, you gotta help us help you. You gotta breathe. JUNIOR! LISTEN TO ME! BREATHE! COME ON, BREATHE! let's get him on a stretcher and get him over to Charlie Med. No, wait a minute. BAS is closer. Don't tell me it's too late. The doctors will help him. He can't be that bad. There ain't too much blood on him. Come on, Preacher, give me a hand with this stretcher. Get out of the way. Let's go. Hurry up. He's turning blue.

THOUGHTS: Come on, Junior, just hang on for awhile longer till I get you to the Aid Station. O God, why does it seem so far? Hang on, Junior, I'll take care of you. Just hang on. OK, Junior, we're almost there. Just around the corner. O Lord, let him live, he's got a wife and kid at home. He's my best friend over here. Please, God, let him live.

CONVERSATION: Hey, Doc, we've got a badly wounded man over here. OK, Preacher, put him up on the table. Doc, you've got to help him, he can't breathe. He's got just a little blood on his forehead, that's all. Oh, shit, I didn't see that. Junior, what did they do to you? It was only a lousy mortar, shit, they can't do that much damage! Doc, don't put him in the corner to die. He's only eighteen years old. He's got a wife and daughter home waiting for him. He's going home in sixty seven days. Doc, I can't leave him in a corner to die by himself. let me stay with him until he's gone. I'll be out of the way.

THOUGHTS: Junior, what's going to happen to us? I can't think of this place without you and me together. Junior, you taught me how to survive over here. If it wasn't for you I would have been blown away long ago. I should be the one lying there, not you. I'm the clumsy one, not you. Remember the first patrol I went on with you, I kept falling on my ass; you must have picked me up a hundred times on that patrol. The time I got separated from the team by the gooks? You and Preacher were the ones who came back for me. You saved my life too many times. I can't even save yours once. I can't even thank you. All I can do now is sit here and hold your hand and wait for you to die. This ain't the way that friendships should end. I was going to kick you in the ass as you got on the bird to go home. This don't make sense, buddy. I gotta go now, Junior, they say that I'm in the way here. Goodbye, Junior. I'll never forget you. I loved you, Junior. You knew that, didn't you, you were my best friend. This is for you then. Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed by Thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. lead us not into temptation and deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

CONVERSATION: OK, Doc. I'll be going now. Yeah, I'll notify his company commander. Bravo Company, 3rd Recon Bn., Doc. Yeah, we have taken a lot of casualties lately. His name? Junior, Don't let these grunts drop him on the way over to Graves. Thanks for trying, Doc. I guess he was gone from the time the mortar hit. No, I'm sure that I'm OK. No, I ain't crying, just some dust in my eyes from the explosion.

THOUGHTS: O God, where the hell am I? I should have gone right instead of left. There's the old "E" Club. Just walk a little while longer and I'll be on the road by the messhall. There it is, so the COC bunker is right over there and there's our company office. Goddam it, why can't I stop crying? We've lost people before, you're bound to lose people in a war. People, yes, but not your best friend. I just gotta get into my bunker. I'll be safe in my bunker. Yeah, sure I will. Just as safe as Scrib and the other guys were when the rocket came in the door. Ain't no safe place in Khe Sanh. I'm going to stay in here until it's time for me to rotate home. I gotta think what I am going to do. Think about what, though. Think about home and Ann and Mom and Dad. Can't think about that. I ain't going to make it home. I'm going to get blown away just like Junior did. I'm going home all right, going hom in a body bag, all blown to shit. Can't think about getting blown away. It'll drive me crazy, just like ——. Can't get medevaced for being a psycho. I can't think straight any more. I'm all confused. I don't know what to do next. if only I could stop crying. I'm acting like a little kid, sitting in the corner, hiding, and crying. I am a little kid, trapped in a man's body and playing war. Well somebody's playing with a different set of rules from what I remember. After somebody said Bang, you're dead, you could still get up and go home for lunch. God, I'm so tired. I wish I was still at Niagara. I'd be sitting in the student center with Ann, having a Coke or some fries. I'd even take a greasy hamburger. I can't remember when I ate something other than Cs. Goddam it, Junior, why did you have to die? I got nobody now to show me what to do. What's going to happen to your family, Junior? Who's going to break the news to them? Who's going to tell them that you're coming home in a box? God, how I miss you already. You and me shared some good times, Junior, didn't we? I wanted so much see Arkansas after we both went home. I ain't never been out of New York in my life. I don't even know where Arkansas is. Now I'll never get the chance. This ain't fair, Junior, you leaving me all alone like this. Who am I going to talk to? Who am I going to fool around with? Who's going to watch my back out on patrol? Junior, I was just getting good enough to watch out for you the way that you took care of me. I gotta get out of here or I'm going to go crazy. Someone's coming.

CONVERSATION: Who's there? Pappy? No, Sir, Junior didn't make it. They've already brought his body over to Graves Registration. I was supposed to report his death to Capt. Reynolds but I had to try and pull myself together first. Sorry, Sir. I ain't doing such a good job of it. I can't stop crying, Pappy. He was my best friend and now he is gone and I don't know what to do other than sit in this lowsy bunker and cry like a little baby. What can I do to make it hurt less, Pappy? I can't sit in here and cry on your shoulder for the next four months but I don't want to come out just yet. I feel like an old man now, we all have had to watch our friends get blown into hamburgers for this lousy piece of shit base. What are we doing here? The gooks are going to come in through the wire some night soon and blow all of us away. This battle is not going to look too good in somebody's memoirs. Aren't we the good guys? Aren't we the ones who are supposed to win? God is supposed to be on our side, isn't He? Then how the — do good men like Junior and Bryant and Tallent have to die? Shit, we ain't helping the South Vietnamese. All we are doing is ruining his rice paddies. This place looked like a park when I first got here last June. We would see elephants, tigers, deer, rock apes whenever we went on patrol. There are some places in the hills around here that the scenery takes your breath away. Now it's all messed up. Bomb craters all over the place, blown up trees, dead animals. And all the dead people. All the dead people with their neverending stares and their frozen smiles. What are they smiling about? Maybe, because they don't have to worry anymore. Their problems are over and ours are going to continue, if we survive this place, for the rest of our lives. How are we going to forget what it feels like to wipe your friend's brains off your hands? How are we going to forget how we lied to buddies when we told them that they'd be OK when they were cut in half? How can I forget the futility that I still feel having just held my best friend's hand until he died? I'm only twenty years old, but I feel like I'm sixty. I'm all burned out. God help me! I'll never be the same. Pappy, do you understand what I'm feeling now? Happened to you, too? God, what a brotherhood war creates. if you're not wounded physically, you're bound to be wounded psychologically. How do we go on? Yeah, I guess you're right, what with the gooks pounding on the door, we have to go on just to try and survive ourselves. Thanks for not telling me to forget about what happened to Junior. I don't ever want to forget him. He and I shared too much for me to forget. I've got to remember as much as I can about him so that I can continue our friendship. I'll be out of the bunker in a couple of minutes as soon as I write a letter to Junior's family.

TIME WARP

When tears gush from deep, deep springs unstoppable when now is then and the nightmares hang in the galleries of our soul
Then I know that what was, still is One never leaves the battlefield of terrors which never pass of griefs and guilts that never sleep
The old LP record repeatedly plays the annoying same song snippet needle stuck in its scratch woundedness
Until a friend picks up the arm and life's song continues to sing its melody in the chorus of humanity.

CARETAKER

When they died
Vietnam had petrified his heart
And all he had
Was a little time
To borrow words
From the worn libretto
Of death in war.
Words that would never fill the holes
Of mothers, wives and other friends
Much less his own.
They were gone, you see,
Every one of them.

Later,
When they came to him
In nightmares like flocks of crows
Bits and pieces, sounds and smells
Of blood and flesh
Or cold and silent as marble statues
From a Roman frieze,
He pleaded with them,
Wrote them poems,
And cried their names
In a hundred therapies,
Hoping his epitaphs, like headstones
Would hold them in their graves.
They would not leave.

Later,
When he came to understand
The gift that he'd been given
At the beginning of each day,
He began to mourn them.
He'd talk about them to his wife
And other friends,
He wanted to "make his peace with them,"
To "lay them all to rest."
He closed his eyes and prepared
To forget.
But they,
They were as clear, as young
And alive in him
As ever before.
They would not leave.

Now,
He waits for them to come,
Sometimes they surprise him
As when he found them
Sitting at a table in the sun.
Six brave men
In short cut hair.
But, when he rushed to join them
They broke into bits and pieces.

A smile, a laugh
A well remembered gesture,
The color of an eye,
The way the sunlight caught one's hair.
Or they surround him softly.
As when they sit beside him
As he watches a sunset
Or a river as it flows among the trees.
But, especially
When they come together
When he meets someone
Who knew them too
And they resonate full fleshed
Between the two.
And he prays
They will not leave.

A THANK YOU LETTER

[From David Carrasquillo to Ernest Spencer, 30 July 1996]

I do hope that by the time you get this letter, that you've had a safe and pleasant trip home. Before I go much further, please let me extend to you my heart felt gratitude and my appreciation for extending to me the privilege of being included in the company of yourself and the men of Delta 1/26, at the get together at the home of Dan and Mrs. McGravey during this reunion of the KHE SANH Vets. That wonderful gesture on your part touched me very deeply. So please accept my thanks for this. I would also like to personally thank you for the note of pride in your voice when you introduced me to Colonel McEwan and his lovely wife Gerry and the group of assembled guests and told them about my brother Angel's Navy Cross award as a member of Delta 1/26. On behalf ot the Mendez family and this Marine in particular, we thank you for that tribute to my brother Angel. I'm also very grateful to your men who were present at the reunion from Delta 1/26 in that they welcomed me not only as a fellow Marine, they also welcomed me as a brother. And this endeared them to me very much. These men are not just outstanding individuals, they are 'Good People' in my book and they and you I now consider members of my extended family. You all will be in my prayers for your good fortune and continued success always. I would also like to say that I was very moved by the comraderie and brotherhood that each and every one of you extended and shared with me as well. ... For my part, I was not only awed by being in the company of you and your Marines from Delta 1/26, I gained a new insight and a very real sense of comfort that my late brother served with men of your caliber and professionalism in Vietnam. And that he is remembered with pride by you and your Marines means a lot to me as well. I know now that his sacrifice was not in vain. In closing, again I thank you all for the brotherhood and fellowship and the comraderie that you all shared with me. God bless you and yours.

THANK YOU, MEL

In the book, The End of the Line by Robert Pisor, he describes the assault on Hill 861 on Jan 20, 1968. He states on page 95: "Captain Jasper's radioman, blinded by an explosion, relayed target coordinates to gunners on 881S as calm, cool and collected as a telephone operator in New York City." The radioman was Mel Sopp of California. Like many Marines of the Siege many heroic acts went unawarded. Therefore, I'd like to take up a little space in the KSV to say: GREAT JOB MEL, WE'RE ALL PROUD OF YOU!! Thanks. Wally Schaffenberg.

THANK YOU, IKE!

[Letter from Michael Worth, 23 June 1991]

I joined E Co almost immediatley when they were in Phu Bai. This is where I met IKE (Tom Eichler). He was a little older than the rest of us and seemed to be attached to the CP. He sure knew his stuff and all of us guys really looked up to him and respected him. He was a little crazy but the kind of guy you would like to have by your side if the tough times came.

I remember flying to Khe Sanh in C-130s and landing at the main base. We did not stay there long and were saddled up headed somewhere outside the wire of the main combat base. When I saw IKE a few months back he told me that the original mission was to take Hill 881 South. I guess E Co got lost in the unbelievably tall grass and somehow ended up on Hill 861-A. The hill was in a totally natural state. We had to start from scratch and cut all the trees and grass down in order to dig trench lines. After awhile we did not have any water and were licking leaves in the morning and cutting bamboo in order to drain the liquid. We strained it through a helmet liner and drank it with halogen tablets.

On the 5th of February with our trench lines about two feet deep and one layer of sandbags on top of them and one fence of wire surrounding the hill, the enemy attacked around 3 AM easily blowing up what little wire was there and setting a machinegun up inside our own perimeter.

They came up on the knoll of the hill where 1st Platoon was spread out in different areas along the trenchline. They killed all the Marines at the point where they came through the wire in no time at all they were in our trench lines and beyond. I was in 3rd Platoon about 3/8 the way around the hill. IKE was in the CP and immediately went down to where all the action was. I was in a fire team chosen to go down to the point and help counterattack.

My memory is somewhat fuzzy after this. Me and my best buddy Joe Roble (who was killed 7 months later Sept 16, 1968, at a place called LZ MARGO) and a guy named Wayne Sanders worked our way down the shallow trench line encountering some resistance from theenemy. I remember stepping on top of dead bodies and we reached the point where the enemy was coming through the wire.

The hill at this point was like daylight cause of all the illumination. When we reached the point where the enemy was coming through the wire, IKE unbelievably was standing above the trench line with no regard for his own life throwing one grenade after another and screaming at the enemy. The rest of us were trying to keep low. IKE was a sitting duck since the hill at this time was like daylight with all the illumination. There must of been an angel of the LORD protecting him. It was a miracle he was not killed. His continued grenade attack plugged the hole up where the enemy were coming through. This enabled the hill to finally be secured. The rest of us felt like if IKE had not plugged the hole up the enemy would of kept pouring in and eventually conquered the hill. We were only a company size unit not really fortified at the time of this assault. The enemy could of been battalion size or larger. I am not really sure what IKE did before this but I heard stories that he dragged wounded Marines out of the trenchline to safety and helped call in fire support. There was mass confusion during the initial attack, and some Marines killed other Marines not knowing who was who.

We all felt like IKE deserved THE MEDAL OF HONOR for his uncommon valor and bravery up and beyond the call of duty. His leadership and coolness under fire cannot be put in words to justify what he did. To me and all the other guys on the hill he will always be our hero.

When I think back the enemy must of been watching us when we first moved on the hill and thought what are these guys doing? When they saw us start to dig in they probably figured they better hit us before we get too fortified but did not know a guy named Tom Eichler would put a stop to their plans.

The days after the battle when the hill became more fortified IKE would always come around to each hole and talk and joke with all of us. I remember we were all talking about why we joined the Marine Corps and IKE said the judge said he had two choices: jail or join the Marine Corps. We all got a great laugh out of this.

If you have not seen it there is a great picture of IKE standing on the knoll of the hill the morning after the battle in the book called I Protest and War Without Heroes by David Douglas Duncan.

Your friend and Khe Sanh Vet, Michael Worth.

GLENN RAPPOLD AND HIS VIETNAM MEMORIAL

[In the St. Louis Post-Dispatch for Monday, May 27, 1996, front page, are two large colored photos. One shows a large granite memorial with a bronze plaque of art work showing some Marines in tall grass carrying a rifle, four plaques of the seals of the different armed services, and a plaque of words. There is a rifle stuck in the ground next to it with a pair of jungle boots at the base and a helmet on top. Three children are pictured looking at it. Above the photograph are the words "Veteran Keeps Memory Alive." The other colored photo is of Glenn in Marine Corps Dress Blues with white gloves, large medals, holding a Marine Corps flag. An extended story by Mr. John Sonderegger follows. A letter from Glenn accompanies the clipping in which Glenn writes: "It was a beautiful day. It was 90 degrees and sunny all day. The good LORD made that day. I thank GOD all the time for being with me and my buddies in Viet Nam. I thank God for my good help after my quadruple heart bypass 3 1/2 years ago. I don't work anymore. I got 100% disability from the VA, 100% Social Security and a check from the company I used to work for 19 years... Please pray for me and my family." Excerpts from the excellent story in the paper article by John Sonderegger follow.]

"Glenn Rappold has two Purple Hearts and 152 pieces of shrapnel in his body. He is disabled with battle fatigue and sees a psychiatrist every four to six weeks.

"The Vietnam War is something he doesn't try to forget.

"Rappold, 48, wears Marine caps and T-shirts. His Missouri license plates proclaim that he earned the Purple Heart.

"And he has built an eloquent Vietnam Memorial—in his back yard at 1 Inverness Court in St. Peters. When he dies, he wants the memorial moved to the City Centre area of St. Peters.

"Until then, anyone can come see it. Many already have.

"Some visitors have been so moved that they knelt and prayed.

"Rappold was a promising baseball prospect in high school. He wanted to be 'the next Stan Musial,' as his high school yearbook had forecase.

"'That was my first dream,' he said.

"An outstanding hitter, he tried to turn around and hit left-handed so that he could be a switch-hitter. Then he suffered an elbow injury while swinging from the left side and couldn't play his senior year at Affton High.

"With that dream shattered, Rappold did what he thought was the next-best manly thing. He enlisted in the Marine Corps.

"Four months after graduating from high school in June 1996, he was a Marine. He landed in Vietnam in May 1967. He was 19 when he began serving in Khe Sanh....

"In March 1968, Rappold was hit by mortar fire. 'It blew me 15 feet in the air, and I almost swallowed my tongue,' he said. 'Two days later, I was hit again in my left knee.'

"The only thing the medics could do was take him to a bunker and give him morphine to kill the pain.

"Before he was hit, Rappold fired a 105mm howitzer. he says the rounds took out two Russian-made tanks. He was presented two Purple Hearts for his service at Khe Sanh and nine medals, altogether, for his time in Vietnam.

"Before he left Vietnam, Rappold saw many of his friends die in battle. He made a promise to them that he would build a memorial to honor their memory....

"He says that coping with what happened during his 13-month tour of duty in Vietnam has been a lifelong challenge. Flashbacks, nightmares, cold sweats and seeing the faces of his young dying friends have never left him.

"Three years ago, at 45, Rappold suffered chest pains while cutting his grass. He underwent open-heart surgery, a quadruple bypass.

"He thought a lot about dying then and wondered what he would say when he saw 'my buddies up in heaven. They'd ask me about that memorial that I promised them.'

"So nine months ago, Rappold went to work on his last Vietnam mission. Everywhere he went for help, he ran into Vietnam vets who wanted to pitch in. A construction company donated a 3,300-pound piece of granite that became the memorial's centerpiece. The granite piece has a plaque that reads:

"'In Memory of All Vietnam Veterans. This memorial was erected in memory of the young individuals who went to war as kids and lost their youthful dreams, and some their lives, for a cause—freedom and honor—and came back as men with the horrors of war instilled in every fiber of their being and were never given the respect and honor they so dearly deserved from the public or United States government.

"'God will one day judge our actions. Until then, He will shine on the lives of each vetgeran now and forever more because He was with each of them in Vietnam. he is the only One that truly knows what they went through and are living with every day.'

"Another plaque, on a smaller stone, contains the names of 52 Missourians missing in action in Southeast Asia. Asterisks mark four of the names because those men's remains have been recovered and returned home.

"The 'living memorial' also includes a walkway and garden. The burning bushes stand for the blood spilled in Vietnam. Red, white and blue flowers bloom nearby.

"On Armed Forces Day, May 18, [1996], Rappold held a dedication ceremony for the memorial. Mayor Tom Brown of St. Peters was among the 275 people who attended...

"During the ceremony, two F-15 fighers from the Air National Guard at Lambert Field swooped down near the treetops on Inverness Court. A 21-gun salute was fired. A buddy played taps.

"Rappold embraced fellow Marines and friends, old and new. He said he was too emotional to speak that day..."

THANK YOU, GLENN !! GOD BLESS YOU !!

LETTERS FROM VIETNAM

[The following are some letters written home by Cpl Tim Haley from Vietnam. Perhaps we could make this a permanent part of our magazine. Would you, the reader, like to submit some of yours? Since they are so precious, I would suggest you send xerox copies of them rather than the originals]

2-12-68
"Mom, how about getting that group of yours to send us some packages? Sure would appreciate it. I know all the 'grunts' would. These guys haven't had hot chow or a soda in two months. I haven't either. We sure will be grateful. Okay, Mom?

2-20-68
"We are still waiting for the big day, which is a hell of its own, waiting. The longer they wait the better off we will be. I'm still trying to be optimistic about the whole thing and keep hoping they never come, but we keep getting told that attack is inevitable and that they will come.

"If they do come, the big siege is to last four days and three nights. Wow! That is a lot of time without sleep. I have a hard time making it through one night, let alone three.

"I'll be sure to keep you posted as to what is happening here.'

2-24-68
"Took all kinds of incoming yesterday, rockets and mortars all day long. Thought they were going to attack for sure. But it never came, thank God.

"They still haven't been able to get our mail out to us, but they say they are trying. This place is worse than Con Thien was; we get more incoming. It all seems to come from Laos.

"I am anxiously awaiting the arrival of your packages and letters. Hope we get some today." Love, Tim.

PURPLE HEART

[Tom Winston, who addressed us at our reunion, and who is presently suffering the ravages of Huntington's, was recently given his Purple Heart—from wounds at Khe Sanh! The following are excerpts from a newspaper story by Natalie Shore]

"Tom Winston was barely 18 when enemy fire struck his unit at Khe Sanh. It was April 9, 1968. The Marine Corps Private, an ammunition technician, rushed out to fight the fire, which was threatening a munitions dump.

"The last thing he remembered was a huge explosion. Everything turned bright orange.

"The intensity of the blast melted the skin on his right arm, along with his flak jacket and boots. He was left smoldering with burns over 35 percent of his body.

"Winston recovered. In fact, he served three more years in Vietnam.

"But Winston, a native of Bakersfield who now lives in La Habra, didn't get his Purple Heart.. It was some kind of bureaucratic mixup, he said..

"On Saturday, the nation did right by Tom Winston.

"In a ceremony at the Long Beach Naval Shipyard, the 45-year-old retired master sergeant received his Purple Heart. The medal was pinned to his chest during a graduation ceremony of the South Bay Young Marines, a Corps-sponsored youth program, at the shipyard's Naval and Marine Corps Reserve Readiness Center....

"Clad in a black baseball cap and a black jacket bearing the Brothers of Viete-Nam logo and motto, 'Lest We Forget,' Winston received a standing ovation from several lhundred people attending the combined ceremonies. Among his supporters were his father, Willard Winston of Norwalk, a 65-year-old retired Marine serveant major who inspired his son's military career, and Winston's own 18-year-old son, Thomas Anthony Winston, who surprised his father by flying in from Minneapolis for the ceremony...

"But no one is more honored by the medal than Winston himself, said friends and family. Ten years ago, he was diagnosed with Huntington's disease and is dying from the irreversable, degenerative brain disorder."

God and the soldier we adore

In time of war, and not before;

The battle ended and all things righted,

God's forgotten, the soldier slighted.

STANDING FIRM AT KHE SANH

[The following is an excerpt from a letter from Ann Mooney and Nathan Cover, dated 21 January 1996. The date, 21 January, is perhaps not without significance. Note that all the dates and days were the same this year, 1996, as they were in 1968. 21 January was a Sunday in both, for example]

"We are two ninth grade honors students competing in National History Day. History Day is an academic competition in which students submit historical research projects and present them in front of a panel of judges. This year's theme is 'Taking a Stand in History.' We felt that the Siege of Khe Sanh fit well with this theme. We are in the process of creating a documentary video on the Siege of Khe Sanh...."

[The following was written in response to this letter]

"Dear Nathan:...You have focused on one of the more neglected aspects of the experience of those who were at Khe Sanh, Vietnam: TAKING A STAND. Many veterans of that incident tend to look at 'Siege' or 'sacrifice' or even 'daily survival' while the obvious point to emphasize is the determination and dedication to duty that this position would not fall, that the enemy would be blocked from a massive onslaught to the more populated areas further to the east, and that our 'flag would still be there.'

"Despite the ravages of incoming barrages of rockets, mortars, and heavy artillery, and despite the daily devastation in which friends became wounded and even killed, and despite the loss of even such necessities as water and food for prolonged periods of time, and despite much uncertainty of resupply and enemy tanks and our isolation, our men never gave in, never cowered in the trenches. Although we'd take refuge in a ditch or a hole during incoming, all would spring back into life and action within a few moments after the shelling stopped, moving supplies, digging trenches, filling sandbags, repairing severed communications wire, moving medical casualties, checking on the welfare of troops, repairing what needed to be repaired, and so on. Except for less than half a dozen—and I was all over the base and was aware of the thousands of troops there—all maintained a sense of humor, a sense of not being deterred from doing one's job. Moreover, there were constant instances where one would dash through the incoming (which may be likened to going through a space of whirling lawn-mower blades and knives moving in all directions at once) to rescue a wounded buddy, or even someone wounded that one did not know. There were instances of people sharing their last drop of water in a canteen or their last bit of food from a C-ration, even a candy or a can of fruit.

"On the various outposts of the base, this was even more evident. Assaults against our fixed positions on Hills 861, Khe Sanh ville, Hill 861-Alfa, Hill 64, three assaults against the lines manned by the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion, and Lang Vei, were defended with fierce dedication. Only Lang Vei and Khe Sanh village were abandoned, and that due to overwhelming odds, while the other positions held.

The theme of your presentation, 'Taking a Stand in History,' is thus most appropriately congruent with the incident at Khe Sanh.

A LETTER FROM GEMANY

[Written by Mike Fielding]

I am writing in response to a lette published in the Spring, 1996, issue (Vol 2:2) on page 18. The lette was from Segeant 'T', BRAVO, 1/9. I am the 'Surfer Dude' to which he refes in his lette about the counteattack against the NA on Alpha Company's position, Hill 64. I did get my [Purple] Heart that day, my fist of two. I want to let him know, that thanks largely to his accurate and timely 60mm work, we accomplished our mission that day. Although I was still only a Second Lieutenant, I had been the acting XO for a few days, but was still responsible for the Third Platoon as well (which I had been since October 1967). At the time of this action, Khe Sanh was still an ugly struggle — limited amounts of concertina and sand bags, incessant incoming, NVA tunnels and trenches, NVA convoys (with their headlights on!) moving near Lang Vei. There were demoralizing rumors that [President] Johnson was stopping bombing below the 17th parallel; and, of course, the U.S.S. PUEBLO had just been seized by North Korea. Next stop for 1/9, Korea? I had come through Con Thien, Camp Evans (where we were strung out from Hue back north to the Rock Crusher near Evans, and where we were the first U.S. forces in the AShau (just prior to Tet) and found tunnels, full underground aid stations and the latest issues of Playboy, probably delivered by the likes of Hanoi Jane) and now Khe Sanh. I had seen my fellow Platoon Commanders all killed or med-evaced out at least three times over, so I had no illusion about escaping such a fate. Back at Con Thien I had been through a quick leadership lesson by my First Platoon Sergeant and one of our squad leaders (SSGT McGuigan and SGT Anderson) that I followed througout my Viet Nam tour. In my first fire right near Mortar Church, I had hit the deck at the first small arms incoming. Pieces of tree bark and limbs and bushes were alternately falling and jumping as the incoming cut them free from the foliage. In the midst of all of this, I felt a tap on my shoulder and heard some cutting words, 'Hey, Leiutenant, can't see much from down there, can you? You know, you can't hide from them rounds. If they're meant to find you, they will. In the meantime, shouldn't you be tellin' all these guys what to do?' From that day on, I gave up on trying to 'make yourself small' as we used to say. At Khe Sanh, I had the privilage of leading a 'suicide squad' outside the wire eventhough we were 'officially' bottled up. So, I knew the NVA trenches and tunnels around us better than anyone on the Rock Quarry. I volunteered to take the Third Platoon, reinforced with the suicide squad members (all volunteers,too) and remove the NVA from Hill 64, but, the Battalion Commander and Company Commander (LTCOL Mitchell and a Captain we called 'Hot Stuff' because of a Red Devil tattoo he sported) thought it would leave the company in a real mess if we failed. Hill 64 literally looked down our throat. If we failed, it would allow the NVA to walk right over us and on down the hill into the Combat Base itself. However, if we did nothing, Alpha was on its way to being totally wiped out and the NVA would have the key terrain dominating the Rock Crusher anyway. The solution, take two squads and only volunteers; I had the volunteers in ten minutes. We quickly coordinated radio freqs, some hasty On-Calls (only 60s and 81's), and got four M-60 and four M-79'ers 'even the odds;' the reports said an NVA battalion was the unit size of the attack on Alpha Company's position. We took the Hill but lost ten or twelve Marines KIA/WIA out of the approximately twenty we started with. I know we killed in excess of fifty NVA. I saw two 'clumps' of six to eight in two separate trenchlines and several two's and three's in fox holes as well as about twenty on the reverse slope as we consolidated the hilltop. Those dead didn't count those we had to kill one by one going up the hill as we alternately cursed God for the steepness of the hill, and thanked Him for it as ChiComs bounced off our helmets and bodies and rolled down the incline. For Sergeant 'T,' my thanks, and the thanks of all of us who survived Hill 64—both from Alpha and Bravo companies. Your rounds were on target and more than 'danger close;' just what we needed. I got hit badly enough that I spent a few days having little pieces of metal extracted from various parts of my body, then got an R&R in Hawaii, with little plastic tubes sticking out of shrapnel holes in several places, I didn't spend much time laying around the beach. i did however get to see my son who had been born in January. I rejoined 1/9 outside Hill 474, and we moved/fought our way back to CHARLIE 3. I lasted about two more months then got wounded again, this time as we moved with Task Force ROBIE, an Army unit. By then I was the Assistant S3, but since 1/9 was hard on company commanders and platoon commanders, I alternated between grease pencil and rifle. I preferred the rifle since as an 0302, it put me closer to men like Sergeant Thibault.....

To Dan Hudson, a former machinegunner of mine—where are you? I can be contacted at my residence in Germany:

MORTARS ON HILL 861-ALFA

[From a letter from Michael B. Delaney, 29 July 1996]

I was stationed in Khe Sanh on Hill 861A and 861 from about January 16, 1968, until we walked off in mid-April. I was assigned to Weapons Platoon, ECHO Company, 2nd Bn, 26th Marines, a crew member on a 60mm mortar.

I remember the morning of February 5, 1968, very well. I was awakened to the sound of weapons fire and the sensation that I was not breathing or unable to do so. This was brought on by the CS gas being used as the attacking NVA entered our wire. our 60mm mortar was positioned just behind the CP, kinda in the center of 861A. The battle seemed to last forever, never ending. Hand to hand fights were common, we had lost our north perimeter early on, and all of our initial rounds were fired in that direction. High Explosives followed by illumination at a rate that blistered our fingers. After a time it was apparent by the number of NVA running around within the perimeter we had lost or had little control of the wire. We shifted our tube straight up in an effort to reduce greatly the number of NVA that were fighting to control and overrun 861A. Our mortar crew lay as flat as we could around and in the gun pit so as to still operate our weapon, praying we could survive our own rounds. The spectacle and thought of what we were doing was beyond comprehension. The result was very gratifying. Our crew survived with only minor injuries noted while producing substantial casualties for the NVA. Our action was appreciated as we were thanked by many Marines in the early hours and days following the battle. Our tube was very instrumental in denying the hill to the NVA.

I would like to thank and applaud my 60mm Mortar Squad, who choose to make the difference:

Squad Leader - Billy E. Drexel, Jr., Cpl.
Gunner - James Appleman, LCPL
A-Gunner - J. T. Nangle, LCPL Ammo-Humpers - James Carmichael, PFC; Donald M. Wyatt, PFC, Michael Roberts, PFC, and myself Michael B. DeLaney, PFC.

OF NOTE

One of our members recently sent in a check for $150.00 anonymously for Life Membership for another member. (It was so anonymous, that the man receiving it was at a complete loss as to who had done this for him). That one would care for another to this degree only reflects the degree of caring that we all saw as men dashed through incoming explosions to rescue an exposed wounded man and bring him to safety or medical attention while risking serious injury or death.

9th MOTORS ON ROUTE 9

I served with CoA/9thMT from 4 Sept 67 to Nov 68. I started out years ago answering a request from Ray in the VFW magazine for photos and the like from those who served at Khe Sanh. First it was a note from time to time, then a newsletter. The group has really grown from that time. Not being a member of the 26th Marines, I don't know many of the members but I enjoy the stories in the magazine.

I was with the 9th MT Bn which was attached to the 3rd Mar Div at Dong Ha. We were not the Division MT but because the 3rd MT Bn was in Hue we did all of their work up North. A and B Co. each had a truck that was left at Khe Sanh after Route 9 was closed so each company had to provide a driver for the trucks for 30 days at a time. We supplied the bases north of Dong Ha (Cam Lo, C2, Con Thien, Gio Linh, A3, Camp Carroll, Rockpile, and Ca Lu). Our Bn along with 11th Eng. trucked in most of the supplies used to build up Ca Lu for Operation Pegasus.

Once Route 9 was reopened the 9th MT Bn trucked in ammo and supplies to Khe Sanh on a daily basis. The trip was not an easy one and took a convoy from 10 to 12 hours to make the round trip each day. It was even harder on the men who had to keep the road open. Made our last run the first week of July 68. —Mr. Lynn W. Dornan

RESUPPLY

[Letter from Michael A. Garoutte]

I thought you might like to see my perspective—I think it's considerably different from anything you've published so far. You see, I was a USAF C-123 pilot, stationed at DaNang AB, and my tour of duty included Tet '68.

During the tour, I made airdrops of supplies into both Con Thien & Lang Vei, and I landed at Khe Sanh about 40 times between March 67 and March 68. We were always warned, 'Don't fly WEST or NORTH of Khe Sanh!'

During the Tet offensive, Khe Sanh, Hue, and all of I Corps took the brunt of the attacks. The Air Force realized that attempts to supply Khe Sanh had become extremely dangerous to their aircraft and crews, so they issued an order that prohibited any further landings by USAF C-130s.

Henceforth, there would be only three methods of airborne supply: landings by daring MARINE C-130s; USAF LAPSE (Low Altitude Parachute Extraction System); and landings by USAF C-123s and C-7s.

Luckily, my unit, the 311th Air Commando Squadron, had a number of crews with solid experience in landing on Khe Sanh's tricky metal runway. When wet, its surface was compared to 'greased owl shit.' Our approach was always [from the east] to the west, landing uphill. We would turn off left at the first taxiway and start lowering the back ramp.

As we continued taxiing up the parking ramp—never coming to a complete stop—men would run on and off the airplane carrying baggage and supplies on litters! I was always amazed at HOW MUCH material could be transported in this manner. Departing passengers would 'hit the deck' as soon as they got on board. Two right turns would bring us back onto the runway, now facing east and ready for acceleration and a downhill takeoff. Total time on the ground was usually less than six minutes.

Because Charlie owned the hills to the north, we assumed they had pre-positioned mortar tubes that could pinpoint any spot on the ramp. We realized that at any moment it might simply come down to 'his timing vs. ours.' Of course, our arrival was also the most dangerous period of time for people at the base. Charlie knew that there would be alot of personnel moving around, and he wasn't aiming to just take out a plane but rather mess up your operations any way he could.

In the less-hectic months leading up to Tet, I had several occasions to sit and talk with our support staff at Khe Sanh. There were Command Post personnel who directed our takeoffs and landings, and there were Aerial Port personnel who controlled our cargo and passenger manifests. Once, I volunteered to bring in some of their favorite liquor. They stopped me cold with 'NO BOOZE ON BASE! That's the rule, and we strictly abide by it. Every man here has to be fully alert at all times!' Their next choice was Coke, and I brought two cases on my next trip! To all of you who were stationed there, I raise a toast—non-alcoholic if you insist—THANK YOU FOR YOUR SACRIFICE. It was NOT in vain.

HELO MISSION

[Letter from Peter N. Greene]

During the fighting for Hills 861 and 881 at Khe Sanh, our squadron (VMO-6, MAG-36) had four 'Huey'gunships assigned TAD at Khe Sanh working on SOG missions with US Army Special Forces. (Actually, VMO-6 had gunships in and out Khe Sanh almost daily for various reasons).

During one of these missions we were diverted to escort the insertion of USMC Recon. Our mission was to escort two CH-46s which would insert two recon teams into areas northeast and northwest of Hills 861 and 881. (Each 46 carried a 6-8 man recon team).

The four gunships and 2 CH-46s departed Khe Sanh flying directly north. After several minutes we arrived at the first recon team's designated drop site. VMO-6's call name was KLONDIKE, and the four gunships were KLONDIKE 4-1, 4-2, 4-3, and 4-4. I do not recall the call sign for the 46s. My plane was KLONDIKE 4-1. We were the lead gunship, and the pilot (I think) was Capt. Fairfield, who was the senior pilot.

Like most insertion/extraction missions, the gunships usually go into the proposed LZ first to examine the area. After arriving at the first recon team's site, we (KLONDIKE 4-1) go in first, followed by 4-2, and then 4-3 and 4-4. Gunship 4-1 swings left, 4-2 swings right. Both circle around and fly back into the LZ to cover 4-3 and 4-4, and so on.

With the first recon team on the ground, without incident, the first 46 climbs and joins the second one, both leave the immediate area while we (the gunships) hang around in case the recon team comes in contact with the NVA. After a short while the team leader reports that they have faded into the jungle and are alright. We join the 46s and depart for the second drop site.

After flying 5-10 minutes west, which would be northwest of Khe Sanh, we arrived at the second team's designated landing site. Again, KLONDIKE 4-1 and 4-2 drop down to ground level to scout the LZ. Unlike the first site, this area looks fresh with enemy activity. Crew Chief Cpl. Evans (I think), looking through binoculars spots newly dug trenches and foxholes. The drop site is a side of a mountain. The LZ is the south side which is covered with tall elephant grass; the north side is trees and jungle. A ridge running along the top of the mountain separates the grass from jungle, and a freshly dug trench had been dug there.

Capt. Fairfield called the second team leader, advises that an alternative site be found as this LZ does not look good. The team leader, a Lieutenant, declines and insists that they be inserted there as planned.

Again, we (4-1 and 4-2) make low passes over the LZ; then we make a fake landing with 4-3 and 4-4 covering us, still no fire.

Then came the time for the insertion of the second team. Gunships 4-1 and 4-2 lead the way, followed by the 46 carrying Team #2, with 4-3 and 4-4 bringing up the rear. As we were circling around the come in behind 4-4, and as the 46 was about to touch down, the trench line became alive with NVA fire. The 46 immediately creamed in on its left side, rotor blades breaking off, flying, and rolled on its side (downhill) and at once was afire. One after another the gunships strafe and rocket the NVA in the trenchline and surrounding area; the trenchline is only 50 yards from the downed 46.

On this day, we were carrying small rocket pods, but each VMO-6 gunship carried 14 rockets, had 6 or 8 M60 machine guns, as well as other personal weapons. I always had a M-79 grenade launcher with two cases of grenades. And, although it was prohibited, most of the crew chiefs had 5-6 fragmentation grenades (wrapped in duck tape) stashed in our planes, just in case. And, I had a M-16 in the event we went down.

Firing relentlessly and non-stop while trying to suppress ground fire, we could see the occupants of the downed chopper helping each other, crawling and stumbling out of the helicopter, to get to the down hill side of the 46, and away from the NVA. The fire and smoke from the burning 46 provided them their only cover.

And to make matters even worse, before long the voice of the pilot of the second CH-46 (which had been staying out of range nearby) came over the radio to announce: 'Okay, guys, my fuel warning light (20 minutes fuel left) just came on, and if we are going to get those folks out of there, we have to do it right now!' With that announcement, suddenly, we realize that we are just out of ordnance, and are getting real low on fuel.

As the pilots maneuvered the planes for the extraction, we frantically searched through the empty ammo boxes and canisters looking for and piecing together all leftover short belts of 7.62 for one final assault.

The pilot of the second 46 flew straight in, from east to west, and landed just below the burning 46, and as they gathered up the survivors, we expended every last round we had. All the rockets were gone, 15,000 rounds of 7.62, two cases of M-79, all the hand grenades, our personal weapons were empty, even my .38; no ammo left. Finally, the 46 is up and off the ground, all five helicopters make a bee-line for Khe Sanh. We don't even dare climb too h igh to stay out of range, because of the fuel problem; and I remember thinking: God help us if we go down.

There is a good ending to this story, at least as far as I know. On that return flight to Khe Sanh the pilot of the 46 called and informed us that all the crew of the downed 46 and the recon team were alive. Unfortunately, all missions did not turn out the same.

Thinking back to that day, I remember that we had to fly almost directly above 861 at low level, and taking fire almost all the way. I remember after we had sat down on the runway at Khe Sanh 4-3 ran out of fuel several feet off the deck and had a rough landing. And, after cleaning out my plane of all the empty ammo boxes, debris, and spent rounds I found one last M-79 round. A short time later, having refueled and re-armed our birds, and having chowed down on C-rats, we were ready to return to the SOG missions. I don't know the fate of the people who were on the downed 46.

I didn't know, nor meet any of the crew from the CH-46 squadron, either before or after this mission; nor the two recon teams. After almost 30 years I regret to say that I don't remember too many names of the guys in my squadron, but I do recall this particular mission like it was yesterday.

One last thing to say: there were sixteen members from VMO-6, eight crew from the CH-46 squadron (probably MAG 36 also), and 12 to 16 Marine Recon who were involved with this mission; perhaps their recollections may differ somewhat from mine, but I don't think that the USMC could have performed any better than we did on that day at Khe Sanh. Semper Fi!

A LAWYER IN KHE SANH?

By Chuck Patterson

"Hell, we got rats, it's no surprise to find a lawyer here." The Gunny who said that in November, 1967, when I first came to Khe Sanh made little effort to keep me from hearing as he went to get someone to help me find the witnesses I hoped to interview for a court martial which I was going to prosecute in the next month. It wasn't the first time someone had made similar comments and it wouldn't be the last.

Unlike the other services, the Marine Corps did not have a Judge Advocate General until late in 1968. Prior to that officers with law degrees were told that they would be used as lawyers secondary to 'the needs of the Corps.' Since non-lawyers cold try cases (and were sometimes preferred), 'the needs of the Corps' were sometimes bizarre.

In 1967 and 1968 the ordinary assignments for a lawyer would be as government counsel or defense counsel for formal investigations or courts martial, legal assistance officers and foreign claims officers. Of course government and defense counsel dealt with criminal charges, legal assistance officers prepared wills, advised on what to do with threatened divorces, unexpected children, marriages to Vietnamese women or women met on R&R, purchases of bars in Bangkok (a popular investment) and advice to the lovelorn. Foreign claims officers dealt with reparations paid for damage, injuries, or death caused to the civilian population by friendly fire or other actions by USMC personnel. Interspersed with these duties were the other 'needs of the Corps.'

I had come in country in July, 1967, and by the time I first got to Khe Sanh in November, I had been: the XO of First 155 Guns; in firefights with the Combined Action Company south of Phu Bai, particularly HOTEL 8; mortared at numerous locations; at Con Thien in September of 1968 during the heavy action there; all while a government counsel responsible for investigating and prosecuting charges.

Although trained as infantry officers and, at least in my case, having served as an EM, we were fully aware that we were considereda nuisance, no matter how necessary, to any combat command we joined. In short, we were poages, and we felt frustrated even when we occasionally became involved in an action, because we weren't making the kind of contribution the rest of you were. So most of us hitched rides everywhere we went. (I walked into Con Thien from Highway 1), asked for the Ham and Mothers when there were Cs, and generally tried to do our job with as little inconvenience to the unit as we could.

And that's how I ended up in Khe Sanh, trying to do the work at the unit level instead of at the division. I was at the base in November and December, 1967, for investigations and again for two stretches of four days each in February, 1968, again for investigations into different crimes. If any of you remember some lawyer questioning you about things that had occurred before the siege it was probably me. Other lawyers: Harry Shorstein, Phil Keith and Bob Wachsmuth were also at Khe Sanh during February and tried a Special Courts Martial. Eventhough I added only a little to the base by helping to dig some holes and fill some sand bags, I remember coming in (especially the last time when there were mortars impacting the strip), the time I spent there, and leaving.

A NEW MEMBER

[Letter from Robert J. Sullivan, A/1/13]

About a year and a half ago I first came across the Khe Sanh Veteran (Winter '93).. Inside were names (Wayne Neighbors, Dave Rodgers, John Seitz, Leonard Venardos) which I had forgotten but probably werre men with whom I served at Khe Sanh in Alpha Battery, 1/13. I would be interested in exchanging letters and photos, etc., with these men if that is possible.

I can best remember the faces, especially those of the grunts coming in from the field. I will never forget their haggard expressions and appearances and it would make me feel fortunate (albeit a little guilty) to be in artillery instead.

I had some regrets about rotating back to the States just days before the siege began but my time left in the Corps did not allow me to extend. Back at LeJeune I learned the fate of guys like Sgt Tommy Antrim and others who had stayed. Seven months before, two men (Rick Stewart and Bill Travis were killed [KIA 27 June 1967] by incoming mortars while we slept in a tent only several feet apart. I've often wondered why fate has dealt so kindly with me.

Recently I started working as a volunteer at a veterans hospital in Bedford, Mass, helping other veterans. Enclosed please find my application..for menbership with your association. Sincerely, Robert J. Sullivan.

THE LAST SURVIVING CHAPLAIN'S ASSISTANT

By Joseph P. Gibney

Reading the 1995 Fall edition of the Khe Sanh Veteran, I came across the article, "A Few Moments Joy With His New Boots." This article talked about Pvt. Spicer being a conscientious objector but with the help of Ray Stubbe and the Lord he marched to the same beat but took a different path that won him the respect of all who were wounded and dying. I too was marked with a scarlet letter and was accused of sleeping on post by my squad leader and platoon leader. Of course these two leaders had guard duty at night right after my watch and they refused tocome out of the bunker to stand their watch. This happened during the whole siege. From there on, I had the water pump house, listening post every night, point man every time, on ambush every time and was busted to Private. Spicer and I had a lot in common, and I do remember Spice on a few occasions. It appears that I am the only survivor of the Chaplains' Assistants. Father Driscoll, who was also a stretcher bearer, was a sight to see riding his motorcycle at Khe Sanh, dodging incoming. It just happens that Father Driscoll was a pastor at St. Patrick's grammar school, Lynn, Mass, where my brother, sister, and I attended. By the time I found out that it was Father Driscoll who was riding the motorcycle, I knew that I also was following the I was one of seven other Chaplains' Assistants on the Blue Sector side while thirteen Chaplains' Assistants volunteered on the Gray Sector side. Stretcher bearer was one of many responsibilities that we shared along with giving out Communion. It was Father [Charles] Kelly who sent the word out that he was looking for volunteers for Chaplains' Assistants. I was told that I was the only Chaplains' Assistant left on Blue Sector side and that a Special Forces at the beginning of the air strip (east side) hadn't seen a Chaplain in quite a few weeks since snipers were picking off our men. So I took a direct route, a straight line on top of the plateau instead of walking the trench line, gave Communion, and returned by the trenchline. I informed Father Kelly that the Special Forces were being interviewed by a French television crew for an hour special program and that the unit requested me to say Mass and give out Communion. At this time Father Kelly had just received notice from the "Archbishop" (I think), informing him that Chaplains' Assistants can no longer say Mass or give out Communion. Father Kelly and I went to the Special Forces area, Mass was said, and I became an altar boy. The last time I said Mass was on Easter Sunday 1968 right after we left Khe Sanh.

Like Spicer the word (scuttlebutt) got around but the truth finally surfaced that I had been framed and that my respect and credibility were finally restored. I would like to bring to all of your attention the day that the artillery round landed in Charlie Company's trench line which came from Laos. This was the same round that killed a Chaplain [Bob Brett, 2/26, and his assistant, Alexander Chin] and killed and maimed the replacements who were going to be choppered to the hilltops. The only thing that survived the attack unscathed was the chalice which had been used by the Chaplain. It was also during this time that the Chaplains' Assistants were used as stretcher bearers and had the task of cleaning up the trenchlines of bodies that were missing limbs, heads, and sometimes just the remains of a uniform as the body had been disintegrated. One of the hardest tasks was giving the Last Rites. We were told to say a special prayer over and over while not listening to the dying comrade's confession. Pvt. Spicer might not have been in the bush to experience life and death and all that we were trained for, but he did experience war from the inside (Khe Sanh) looking out (into the bush).

It was men like Pvt. Spicer who brought hope, faith and God to each bunker, foxhole, nook and cranny at Khe Sanh.

[Note: The Chaplains Assistants that were killed were those of Chaplains Brett (2/26), Heino (1/9), Hampton (3/26), and Stubbe (1/26). The assistants Joe notes were men appointed by Chaplain Kelly (who replaced Chaplain Stubbe in March '68) to distribute consecrated communion hosts since he knew he couldn't possibly cover the entire base. Although church officials forbid this, it has now become common practice.]

Johnny Chavarria writes: "Though we don't know each other, I'm going to ask a favor of you. I served in Vietnam in 1968 in the Marines with Corporal Thompson. We served with Bravo Co. lst Battalion 3rd Marines, 3rd Marine Division. Corporal Thompson was our platoon's radioman and before joining the Marines and landing in Vietnam, I believe he lived in Spokane, Washington. In late July or August of '68, I got malaria and was taken out of the field. It was during this period that my unit came under fire and Cpl Thompson was hit. When I recovered from malaria and rejoined my unit, Cpl Thompson was gone. My memories of our friendship are in my heart, my scrapbook, and a picture that hangs on my livingroom wall of two young combat Marines. I need your help in my search to find Cpl. Thompson or his family. I'm working with a Spokane telephone directory. I hope that I will be able to find someone who can bring an end to my search. Today Cpl. Thompson would be about 48 years of age. Thank you. Johnny Chavarria, 10 Lafayette Circle, Salinas CA 93906, Tel: (408) 442-5342."

Ron Parsons, attached to 15th Aerial Port Squadron, USAF, at Khe Sanh during and after the Siege, would like to locate some of the Marines he came to know (probably after the Siege, in May 68, and writes: "Maybe some of you can help me locate them. They were from either 1/26 or 3/26 and they lived on the northeast perimeter to the east of the water point. To this day I can't remember their names but I got to talk to them almost every day of the three months I spent at Khe Sanh. One of the guys, the most outgoing of the two, was medium height but stocky. he had a larfge scar across one of his shoulder blades that he said he got during an ambush. His sidekick was short, thin and had curly hair. The most notable thing was that he had been bitten by a rat about May '68. I think he had to get the shots. These descriptions could probably fit most of the guys at Khe Sanh but this may help jog some memories. One day the ABC news reporters were around and they needed a guitar player so my buddies came over to the bunker and got me. Fifteen Marines and I sang "We Got to Get Outta This Place" by Eric Burdon and the Animals. This played on coast to coast TV on the 11 o'clock news. Now the memory jogger, one of the guys sitting in the front of the group had a pet duck!! A duck at Khe Sanh? Yes, he did. Surely there weren't many guys who had ducks around!

If you are one of the guys in the video or know one of the guys I'm talking about, please give me a call at (508) 947-2276. Any assistance would be greatly appreciated.

If I didn't get a chance to say thanks for protecting my butt while serving with you guys, I'm thanking you now! Hope to hear from someone soon. I may have been in the Air Force, but Semper Fi sure has a special meaning to me. God bless.

From Bill L. Graham: I spent 2 tours in Nam. I am working on several service connected disability claims, one of which is for a hearing loss. I would like to find out if the Marine Corps kept records on Seabees who were TDY and worked with their units. If you have any information on any other Seabee of MCB-10 that might of had a hearing loss please let me know. You can contact me at: Bill L. Graham, 415 H St., Aurora NE 68818-2245, Tel: (402) 694-2712.

ANNOUNCEMENT

A special publication, The Final Formation, has been printed, listing those who were KIA at Khe Sanh. Following ten pages of tactical maps of the Khe Sanh area (with grid coordinate references, and one map showing the NVA headquarters area during the Siege), and an opening essay on the purposes of the book, the first part, pages 6-152, lists the KIAs by date and incident, with a little discussion about who they were or the circumstances surrounding their death. The period covered is 1963 - 1972. Then follows a summary of casualties: American, NVA, and Bru civilians. Pages 157-173 lists sources of information concerning the losses. Page 173 provides directions to the two Khe Sanh memorials (the one in Arlington National Cemetery, and the one at Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery). Pages 174-176 lists our brothers who served at Khe Sanh and died after leaving Khe Sanh (with unit, date, and cause of death). Pages 176-206 is an alphabetical listing of all KIA in the Khe Sanh area (with date and location on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial wall in Washington, DC).

1,000 copies of this book were printed in order to preserve the memory of our KIA brothers (and those who died since Khe Sanh) and to help those who are still alive with the details of name, location on the Wall, the circumstances, as a way of helping with some closure. The entire cost of the printing of the book (about $5,000.00) was donated by an anonymous donor. It is being offered for sale by Khe Sanh Vets, Inc., as a way to help us generate funds for our Treasury while at the same time fulfilling the two main purposes indicated. The cost is $12.00 per copy (which includes First Class postage of $3.00, giving our organization $9.00 for each copy sold).

For your copy, please send a request and check (made out to: Khe Sanh Vets., Inc.) to:

KHE SANH VETERAN

"For those who fight for it, life has a flavor the protected never know.

(From a sign in the recon command bunker at Khe Sanh originally the thought of an unknown recon Marine)

Issue No. 38, Spring, 1997. Published by Khe Sanh Veterans, inc., a non-profit incorporation registered in the State of Wisconsin 01 Sept 1988, and tax-exempt under Internal Revenue Code Section 501(c)(19) veterans organization by IRS letter of 10 Feb 1989, consisting of all who lived or served in the Khe Sanh battlefield area. Purposes of the organization are: To promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of Khe Sanh; To locate and account for all who so served; To promote preservation of an accurate historical account of such service; To preserve the memory of those who died there; To promote research and understanding and healing with a regard to those who served there; and to promote artistic expression of the Khe Sanh experience.

QUICK NOTES

NEXT REUNION: Will be held in St. Louis, Missouri, 09 - 13 July 1997. Details will follow. Our Reunion Chairman, Mr. Carl Oksnee, has already visited St. Louis and obtained bids on several hotels. Carl saved considerable money for those attending the Philadelphia reunion. The rate for the 3dMarDivAssn, also meeting in Phily, was $89.00. The first offer made to Carl was $79.00, and after telling the manager that we were not unruly Vietnam veterans, the price was reduced to $52.00 per room per night! Multiply that savings times the 192 attendees and the number of nights, and the savings are in the thousands!

THE KHE SANH VETERAN is printed three times a year and is the official publication of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Subscriptions are available at $20.00 a year and should be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. Vincent Griffith. Stories, poems, letters, should be sent to the Editor, Ray W. Stubbe.

OOPS!! The dues mailer which went out in November was sent to ALL who are on our mailing list. In order to mail this as soon as possible and to save expense in handling, those who are Life Members, those who had already sent in dues during the year, and the half dozen or so who receive complimentary copies thus also received the dues mailer. The idea was to encourage those who have been receiving our magazine, but who have NEVER sent in anything to support us, to send in a contribution. The response was overwhelming, for which we thank you. Please excuse us if you received a dues mailer and are a Life Member, one who already sent in dues, or receive complimentary copies.

In the future, dues should be sent to our Treasurer by Veterans Day (11 November) of each year, which will cover the following year.

AREA CODES: Numerous telephone area codes have changed recently. Please send our Editor your new phone number if it has changed.

IN MEMORY: The dues mailer included the possibility of making a donation "in memory." Several took advantage of this and sent in a special contribution. These are indicated in the center of this issue in the form of the Vietnam Memorial Wall. If you would like to make such a contribution, please send it (along with the "in memory" name or unit or cause indicated) to our Treasurer, Mr. Vincent Griffith.

HELP!! Please send the Editor poems, stories, letters of what you remember about a person, event, or situation at Khe Sanh, or letters you wrote while at Khe Sanh, diary entries, logs, etc. These are very, very important for several reasons: they will help you, they will very probably help someone else, and there will be a permanent record made for the future. What you write may jog someone else to write down something also. We have so little time in which to say "Thank You" to another, to record our experiences before they are forever lost so that an accurate record is preserved and the many good men who did so much good are not forgotten, and help others with details that may help their VA claims or simply to put things to rest, reconnect with a buddy, and clarify what may be a fuzzy memory.

A REACTION FROM A NON-KHE SANH VET: "..I had to take my wife to the hospital yesterday morning for a gall bladder operation and picked up the Khe Sanh newsletter on the way. I was reading the thing while waiting for the operation. My wife is OK and I will pick her up today. ... This is some powerful stuff.. This is not a newsletter. I don't know what you would call this but the word newsletter certainly does not do it justice. I have not finished it yet because I decided to go back over what I read and highlight certain things.. I can never hope to understand what it was like at Khe Sanh but this collection of stories has given me some idea of it. This is so powerful!"

A CREATIVE CONTRIBUTION: Mr. Charles Fox recently sent a check to our Treasurer with the following letter explanation: "I was the 2nd Squad Leader, 3rd Platoon, Charlie Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, and was at Khe Sanh from November, 1967, until we got out of there. I have enclosed a check for $29.75 and it is broken down in this way: $20.00 general dues; $9.50 for that bastard of a hill I had to climb and spend Christmas on, eating peaches in my turkey topped with ice cream and cranberry sauce; $.25 for December 25, 1967, when Lt Wells put a CS grenade down the garbage chute on 950, pissed the gooks off, and they threw a CHICOM back."

"HOME IS WHERE YOU DIG IT" : Kenneth R. Thompas, who located us during the reunion in Philadelphia, is the Marine who made the sign "Home is Where You Dig it" which hung outside the bunker housing the S-4 of Regiment, Fred McEwan (who later became CO of 1/26). He writes: "I received my issue of Khe Sanh Veteran and I was so thrilled to see my name, but not only that but to see Colonel McEwan whom I spent my time with, and by the way, requested a sign be made for the bunker.

You guys really made me feel special for that. Who would ever think it would be used for a logo. I wish I could remember alot of things but things happen over the years your memories start to fade.

I didn't have to know you personally but I know if we hadn't gotten our backs against each other we would have someone else writing these letters.

Special thanks go out to the recon boys whom I would talk with alot before they went out on recon patrols. I don't remember individuals, just events. But just knowing all of you Khe Sanh veterans is good enough for me past and present."

THE SHARP EDGE OF LIFE & DEATH
Gentlemen:

Sorry that I have been so negligent in compensating for your excellent magazine.

I was with Bravo Co. 3rd Recon and living in the bush with nothing between llife and death but your M-16 was a lot like living on the edge.

When the siege came we lost a lot of men (I lost a lot of friends).

It is hard remembering it. It is even harder talking about it.

I tell myself it didn't affect me but I know I lie.

As you can imagine I have a love/hate relationship with your magazine.

I love the articles, the poems, etc. and I read it cover to cover.

But it makes me remember and it still hurts." Richard W. Morris.

THE BEES!
"In the last issue, the Khe Sanh logo..conjured up some slightly different imagery for me. As soon as I saw it on the page, the 'V' became the valley of the Khe Sanh river. I tried to see the symbolism you use for the nine-sided border but all I kept seeing was the mountainous horizon that surrounded our little Asian resort. The 'K' and 'S' works for me. I've tried to describe the terrain around Khe Sanh to people in the following way. Take the Adirondak mountains in New York State, double them, and then cover them with everything from knee high elephant grass to triple canopy jungle. Of course, they don't understand.

Second thing. In the narrative..there was a mention of an attack by bees. That reminded me of an incident that occurred in, I think, June of 1967. Bravo, 3rd Recon had just moved from Phu Bai to Khe Sanh. I had only about two weeks in country, and as a fresh meat corporal, team leader-in-training, I had maybe two patrols under my belt and I knew next to nothing. Despite very good training in Recon school at Camp Horno, I was green as grass. I had just come from two years of Sea Duty so you can imagine the culture shock when I went from dress blues to camy sticks and bug juice.

Anyway, we were on a patrol west of the hills and on this trip I was tail end Charlie. Ahead of me in the patrol column was a guy from Noo Yawk City, whose name completely escapes me. He 'tawked loik dis' and at times was unintelligible to me. We were wading through chest high elephant grass near the top of a ridge when I noticed that up ahead there was considerable flapping of arms and general flailing about. It seems the patrol had blundered into a NVA bee ambush and was being cut to ribbons. 'Noo Yawk' and I stopped, pondering our options. The bees hadn't found us yet but there was no way to detour around the kill zone. 'Noo Yawk' turned to me and said in total seriousness, 'Maybe if we wuz ta buzz loik dem bees, dey'd tink we wuz bees too.' It took me a moment to realize he meant it and, since there didn't seem to be any alternatives, I said 'OK.' We proceeded slowly through the area, all the while quietly making buzzing sounds. The bees strafed and dive bombed all around us and even landed on us but WE WEREN'T TOUCHED! Not one sting! I swear on a stack of Marine Corps Guide Books! The rest of the team couldn't believe we had come through unscathed because most of them had hands and faces that were blown up like beach balls. Fortunately nobody was MEDEVAC material but there were some pretty sore puppies for a couple days." Steve Johnson.

"WINDS OF WORDS"
BY
JOSEPH G. CREED

The 'Winds of Words,' will bend the vision of the mind. When people lack the strength to weather lifes experiences, they become permanently bent from experiences of life's winds. If we accept this as being numerically commonplace by 'accident' within our fellow, everyday human kind, a feeling truth arises. We've become bent also. Rather than to tackle the task at hand, we reach for the easy 'sign' of prejudice to classify them. A 'sign' telling us to go around them by using a path of avoidance. As we accept this, we acquire an institutionalized way of thinking, becomeing a 'round about person.' 'Round' is the succession of many bends with connecting points. We actually become worse than what we're trying to avoid. We begin to enclose our minds! There are no doors to the inner circle of 'Round,' nor windows of light to illuminate the snare of our mental steps. We then become a food using ethnocentric bias as social transcendence. We become blind, mentally! The encircled mind loses the ability reason, falling victim to everyday fervors of hysteria and fear."

BREAD, MAN!

[A letter from Mr. Robert Pisor, the author of End of the Line, one of the first books on the Siege of Khe Sanh].

"I knew when fourteen North Vietnamese from Hanoi walked into my bread shop in Leland, a town of 250 souls in northern Michigan, that the world had surely turned. Animated, cheerful, curious, they talked about their months at the University of Michigan graduate school of business, and the work they do as middle and upper-level executives at various industries, utilities and monopolies in their home country. One of the women got up from the table at one point, walked back into my production area, and within minutes was operating an old molder-sheeter. Minutes later she was rolling out classic baguettes by hand—a unique skill that the French left behind when they left Vietnam. I sat and listened to the glottal music of that unique language and remembered 500 days and nights of a tad more tension.

"Two days ago I celebrated my first year as a businessman, running Stone House Bread in Leland, Michigan (stonebread@aol.com or 800-252-3218)—my penance after more than 30 years as a newsman. I'm kidding. I loved my work as a newspaperman, radio reporter and television anchor and analyst, but the news business has changed profoundly, and rather than sit there and whine I decided to strike off in new directions. I now make the best sourdough bread in North America (haven't lost any of that journalistic arrogance now, have I?), and I ship it to bread fanatics in nearly all of the fifty states (plus Puerto Rico, the Cayman Islands and Canada). Don't sit down to Thanksgiving Dinner without a sturdy loaf of North Country on the table.

"I keep in touch with some of the men I met while working on The End of the Line, I read nearly all the fiction and nonfiction that continues to come out of the war, I keep my vow never to speak in public without talking about Vietnam (it's rarely at the heart of my speeches, but it's almost always the most heartfelt—and I've surprised the Christian Women's Club of Traverse City, the Rotary Club of Suttons Bay, a dozen high school graduations and a whole lot of other audiences with thoughts I believe they should hear, and ponder), and I read the newsletter with passion. ..

"I'm working on a new military history in my spare time—this one set in the 4th century B.C. I'm finding it a little tougher to find eyewitnesses.."

I WONDER

"I wonder if the guys I knew so well still have their nicknames. A lot of them I've forgotten over the years. I remember Pee Wee. He was short but never a tunnel rat. he fancied the .50 caliber. We had P from the meadowlands. He was P.R. I called him Primo meaning CUZ. The Grit was a countryboy from ALA, Griffith, he was old or it seemed so. The first guy I saw get hit in the neck. Then we had a Georgia Museil head. Don't even remember his real name. I know he got hit in the head too and never left the unit. Saw him the next day with a bandage still yelling at everyone. I use to call one Gomer. He was a Second LT. Had his nose shot off on a patrol. Never saw him after that. Still there were many more from the unit 3ATs. We patched up the pigs [NOTE: slang for the Ontos] as best we could to see if at Khe Sanh we could do any good. Now I can not remember my nickname. Was it BABS, Rabit, Shruggs? Everyone knew I was from Cape Cod. I spoke English that sounded very strange and often got teased about it. It wasn't nutin! If you the reader remember me write a letter or spring for a 'cheep' CARD!! Semper Fi. Mannie"—Manuel Babbitt.

RETIREMENT

"At the 1993 Khe Sanh Reunion held in Washington, D.C. I heard you say that God's grace was in Vietnam. Until then I was only aware of the suffering that was so rampant in that war; it seemed to me that Satan had been given full control over our lives. But now, when I consider that so many men freely gave their lives to save others, do I realize how much love there was between all of us. Those who were not in combat in Vietnam will never understand how much love there is in a war.

My poem 'retirement' is about how I began to resolve my Vietenam War experiences and how I am now continuing to live the rest of my life..."

A TRIBUTE—DOUBLED

"This letter is to ask you to mention ALLEN FERG in The Khe Sanh Veteran. His birthday is October 16th. he will be 56.

"Allen is a Marine who was in Khe Sanh during 1967-68. He was a Lieutenant. I can't find out other information such as company name without asking him and I want this to be a surprise tribute and a delayed thank you.

"Allen was moved by your book [Ernie Spencer's book, Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man] which he picked up at the Philadelphia reunion in July of this year. You autographed it for him. He read it in a few nights then lent it to me. I admit - only another soldier who was there could possibly understand your experience.

"I went with Allen to the Wall in D.C. several years in a row over Memorial Day weekend. We went together to the NJ Vietnam Vets Memorial dedication and on a Harley 'Rolling Thunder' run on our motorcycles this past weekend and alone on our bikes several other times.

"Allen is lost in Vietnam sometimes now. He can speak about what happened there only for a minute or two at a time and becomes overwhelmed. He lives with Khe Sanh every day, every hour, and his pain has not evaporated, but has only covered over by the passing years.

"I was only 14 years old when Allen went to Vietnam. He joined the Marines for an adventure. He is a big man - 6'7" - and he came home in one piece. The wounds to his heart and soul are invisible, and his scars are deep and permanent.

"On his birthday, October 16th, I want to honor him for what he did and what he sacrificed. I want to thank him because he deserves my respect and gratitude. I am so proud of him - to know him was shown me what 'hero' means.

"Please tell him HAPPY BIRTHDAY in your magazine and thank you." Cynthia McNeill.

[Note: The above was received just as the last issue of our magazine was being printed, too late to be included. The following was received from Mr. Ferg in a card dated 8 Nov 1996:

"Thank you, belatedly, for the birthday card you sent. It was much appreciated.

"I know that Cynthia McNeill wrote to you hoping that her 'message' to me would be published on my birthday. That's of little moment. What really counts is the sincerity of her thoughts and that she took the time to express them. She is very special.

"Now I am grieving terribly for her as she died on Sunday, Nov. 3. ..She is the love of my life and I know that I will never experience again anything as wonderful and special as she..." Allen]

WHAT REMAINS

[In a card received from David M. Steinberg]

Khe Sanh was so very long ago to me
They now even have tours there for all to see.
No incoming, no trenches,
no body bags at all,
Not even brave warriors who would not let it fall.
Time passes, we get older, memories begin to fade.
Unfortunately, the ghosts stay with us every day.

LARRY GARCIA

Please be advised another one of our brother Khe Sanh Vet members, Larry Garcia..passed away in Oct. 1994 of Agent Orange related cancer. He was an engineer attached to one of the companies on one of the hills during the Siege. He is survived by his wife Cindy and son David.

ANDREW METTS

Andrew L. Metts suddenly died on 03 November 1996. Andy was with many of his friends, veterans of "A" Co., 1/9, at a Marine Corps Birthday celebration aboard the USS YORKTOWN in Charleston, SC, at which the guest of honor was their former Company Commander, H.J.M. "Mac" Radcliffe. The Colonel's remarks ignited those there into numerous "aarughas" as he recounted the history of the Marine Corps, of Vietnam, of Khe Sanh, of Alfa Company. Suddenly, he turned, saluted, and declared, "And here are the Alfa, 1/9 men!" It was one of those moments that will always be remembered.

Andy was with his wife, Patty, when he suffered a heart attack in the early morning hours after the celebration. Carl Oksnee and Leonard Cosner attempted CPR and later, Carl assisted Patty in making arrangements for the funeral attended by over 600.

The following are Carl Oksnee's remarks at the funeral: "I'm proud to say: Andy was a Marine, and most of all, Andy was my friend. Three of us were wounded in 1968 on the same hill, at the Battle of Khe Sanh, while serving with Company A, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines (The Walking Dead).

Almost 29 years later who would have believed that the three of us would be getting together again for a weekend to help honor our former Company Commander, Col Mac Radcliffe.

Leonard Cosner, Andy and myself did exactly that last weekend. it was a weekend which highlighted all the years—past, present and future. It brought back to us memories of where we had been and how far we have come, and how lucky we were to be here, together. It was a truly glorious weekend.

Andy was a proud Marine, as we all are. He loved the Corps, but like many of us, still had a lot of left-over scaring from Vietnam. His real healing began about the time we reunited at a Khe Sanh Veterans reunion in Chicago a few years ago. We became very close. We laughed and cried many times together. We talked extensively about what had happened to us and about our brothers who didn't make it back. We've shared a lifetime of thoughts and feelings.

When Andy passed away last Sunday, Lenny and I were still beside him, trying without success to bring him back and keep him with us. It was like Vietnam all over again—the 3 of us—but this time only 2 of us walked out. Andy died the way he would have wanted to. He was surrounded by his brothers, celebrating the Marine Corps Birthday, and honoring Col. Radcliffe, the man whom he had so much respect for.

Andy, I just want you to know, brother, that you will always be a part of us. The bonding that began many years ago in a strange land will remain forever strong. I'll miss you, brother, as we all will. Semper Fi, Andy.

MONUMENTS

PARRIS ISLAND: While the Alfa Co., 1/9, Marines gathered to celebrate Marine Corps Birthday, they visited MCRD, Parris Island, and noticed a special KHE SANH MONUMENT at the Rifle Range. It is a bronze plaque on a column of red bricks with 'KHE SANH' prominently on the front. The plaque reads: "KHE SANH, VIETNAM. During January-February 1968, the 26th Marines (Rein) successfully defended the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Attacked daily by hundreds of rounds of intense enemy artillery and rocket fire, the 6,000 men commanded by MGEN Tompkins and Colonel Lownds held their ground. Marine tenacity and combined arms firepower inflicted 12,000 enemy casualties and destroyed two NVA divisions."

Monuments were erected in certain areas used in recruit training so that recruits are constantly reminded about the Corps' heritage, and were dedicated by Major General Jarvis D. Lynch on 9 October 1990

(The monuments include: the Electric Pistol Range renamed Pusan Range; the Close Combat Pistol Range renamed Naktong Range; Range A renamed Khe Sanh Range; Range B renamed Hue City Range; Range C renamed Chosin Reservoir Range; Range D renamed Starlite Range; and Range E renamed Inchon Range).

MONUMENT ON KHE SANH BASE: A concrete monument was erected on the airstrip of Khe Sanh Combat Base with the following inscription. (Translation furnished by Mr. Peter Brush):

"LIBERATED BASE MONUMENT
The area of Tacon Pont base built by US and Sai Gon Puppet. Built 1967, air field and well constructed defense system. Co Luong Dong Ha Quang Tri. U.S. and Army puppets used to monitor the move movement and tried to stop assistance from the north into the battle of Indo China. After 170 days and nights of attack by the surrounding Liberation Army, Tacon was completely liberated. The Liberation Army destroyed the defense system for the Battle of Indo China. 112,000 U.S. and puppet troops killed and captured. 197 airplanes shot down. Much war material was captured and destroyed. Khe Sanh also another Dien Bien Phu for U.S."

ARLINGTON CEMETERY:
The Khe Sanh Memorial bronze plaque and ginko tree dedicated during the Reunion in Washington, D.C., July, 1993, is located in Section 2. It was the idea and result of the effort of Ken and Bernice Penn. Directions to it: From Main Gate, take Eisenhower Drive to McClellan Drive; take McClellan to Roosevelt Drive; go down Roosevelt to the Memorial.

JEFFERSON BARRACKS, MISSOURI:
Two group graves of remains which were not able to be individually identified are located in this National Cemetery near St. Louis. Both are located in Section 81. Graves 289, 290, and 291 contain 8 remains from the 25 February 1968 patrol, and Graves 327, 328, and 329 contain 35 remains from the 06 March 1968 plane crash. The cemetery is located 31 miles southeast of Lambert International Airport: Take I-270-South from the airport, make a left on Telegraph Road exit, travel north to first traffic light, turn right on Sappington Barracks Rd. 1/2 mile, cemetery is on right.

During our 1997 reunion in St. Louis, we plan to have a group visit and ceremony at this location.

MANNY

The following e-mail was received by Ernie Spencer from Bruno Bougie who recently visited Ernie and Manny Babbitt from the Netherlands: "... A sunflower bloomed in my garden, last summer. The fact itself is not so extraordinary, even not in Holland where I live, but the sunflowerseed was sent by Manuel Babbitt, a Khe Sanh Vet and for me: a penpal. He has been for 16 years already on Death Row in San Quentin Prison in California. I have visited him in October, 1996. As I told, I'm from the Netherlands, I'm married and have 3 children. The law-system in Holland is quite different from the American system: we don't have capital punishment; we consider death penalty as controversial with human rights, as inhuman and cruel. There exists a Dutch organization called 'Inside/Outside' who looks after penpals for American Death Row inmates. That was the way how I got Manny's name and address, years ago. I never have regretted one second that I've got his name. He became a good friend of our family, through the mail. Out of all his letters it became clear to me that his time as Marine and his time in Vietnam, and particular in Khe

Sanh, have had a very big impact in his life. He always signs with 'Semper Fi' and I'm sure it means a lot to him. I only knew the Vietnam war from long ago and from a distance; protest demonstrations in Holland at that time. So I started to read about it. I came in contact with Rev. Ray Stubbe and he was so nice to send me his book Valley of Decision. I've read other books, e.g. Born on the Fourth of July, A Fortunate Son, Hamburger Hill, Nothing and So Be It, Sorrow of the War and I saw some movies, but I'm convinced the reality is far much worser as it came to me in books and movies.

I planned to visit Manuel in Fall 96, and it was Ernie Spencer and his wife Pat who invited me to stay in their home in Martinez for the time I stayed in California. During one of Ernie's visits in the prison, Manuel told him about me. I was welcome immediately. Of course I was a little bit nervous: it was the first time I went to the USA, my host family was unknown to me and Manuel, the reason for my trip I only knew from mail. But no reason to panic: I felt familiar and at home from the first hours with Pat and Ernie. They are absolutely great, and I was overwhelmed by their hospitality, their friendship and support, and when I left I felt both sad and happy for I left not only one friend in San Quentin, but also two in Martinez. Of course Ernie told a lot about Vietnam and he showed me the video he made from the Khe Sanh reunion in 1993. He also showed me the pictures of the many sculptures made by Dennis Smith in the neighborhood of Mount Shasta. They impressed me very much and I hope to visit that memorial park in a next visit. When I left, Ernie gave me his book, Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man. I was very honored by this.

During 8 days I went to the prison, the maximum time that was possible, San Quentin, the 'fortress of horror' like Angela Davis describes it in her book With My Mind on Freedom, if you approach from the San Raphael Bridge it looks like a conference centre. A broad complex with white, cream and pastel coloured buildings, palm trees, flowers, and what we call in Europe, 'a Greek-blue-sky' above it. When you enter the prison your first impression is: rather relaxed atmosphere. At the different checkpoints they proceed me quite correct and friendly. Officers in the visiting room are nice and correct and they behave almost like good acquaintances of visitors and inmates.

That's, by the way, my general impression of California. Everybody is so nice, so polite and helpful, atmosphere seems so relaxed, the climate is so wonderful and San Francisco is a marvelous city. California could be a country that I might love and where I should like to live. But they have that horrible Death Penalty. Here the Government kills people to show that killing people is wrong. I can't understand that.

When I see all these men, on death row, I realize they are all here to be killed by State, in the Name of Justice. Lots of them carry the heavy load of remorse and even after living so many years on death row there doesn't seem to exist any forgiveness for them. 'Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us.'

Manuel: In reality he is as friendly and nice as in his letters. And he looks like the picture which I have from him. In spite of the many letters we often wrote to each other, there is still a lot to tell during these 8 days. We never were at a loss of words. he tells about his childhood, his parental life, the poor circumstances in which they lived, the Marines he joined. About his first and second tour of duty in Vietnam, the wounds he got there, physically and mentally. About his wife who could not deal with his strange behaviour after Vietnam, about his desperation, loneliness and misery. How he tried to survive and how he had sometimes two jobs at the time to feed his family after he left the Marines. He also told about his fatal night and what brought him in here and that he never wanted to hurt people. How it turned out that he suffered from a severe PTSD, but these facts were never represented to court by his first lawyer and how they sentenced him to death. He never had got adequate help to overcome this PTSD. He tells about life in prison, about the few friends who visit him, about the mail which is such an important part in his life, the poems he writes to express his feelings and about his hope that his death sentence will be overruled. I share this hope and I feel so very sorry for him and about all the misfortune in his life. Some of the fellow inmates in the visiting room come to me to tell that Manuel is very happy with my visit. All his relatives are living far away and there are only few visitors. They also tell me they don't consider Manny as a criminal. He doesn't belong there. Even one of the officers I spoke with had his objections about this sentence. How is it possible he is still in there? I wonder. I remember Matthew 5:38 and next verses. Why is there no forgiveness in several situations in the USA? Punishment in Holland is different too. People who commit crimes have to be punished, they have to realize what they did is wrong. And they have to know that they have to behave better. They can change their minds and they can get help. And when they changed their minds, they get a new chance. I'm convinced this is a human attitude.

I have very ambiguous feelings about California. I like it and I don't like it because of the death penalty. They punish people by killing them. And they also won't hesitate to kill Manuel. The same country, America, which he loves so very much and which he served in Vietnam, will kill him. I guess I'm not allowed to give Manny's address here. But if somebody can offer some help, if somebody wants to encourage him or to support him, I

RAT STEW

Brother Shippen [See Khe Sanh Veteran, Spring, 1996, pp. 28-31 made reference to my only hot meal that I remember from Jan. 21 to March 28, '68: Rat Stew. one day in late Feb. or early March while staring out of our fighting hole we saw momma-sans catching rats in the dump. I'm here to tell you Marines didn't have a corner on being crazy. We Seabees had a nut cake nick-named Frenchy and upon seeing the momma-sans heading back to the FOB, he said it's time for a hot meal. So four of us moseyed over and got an invite to share a hot meal. I was so hungry I didn't care what was in that stew. I ate the best meal I had the whole time I was there during the Siege...

I have a question for our Special Forces bro. Did any of you know a Green Beret by the name of John Bash? He is my cousin and he was here for awhile and then just up and left. Supposedly he did a tour in '65 and two in '67 and '68 and was in and out of Lang Vei and Khe Sanh, and at Khe Sanh on and off during the Siege. I would like to know what anyone can tell me about him. I am sure he is suffering with P.T.S.D. but I couldn't reach him. I couldn't get him to open up and get rid of some of his guilt. He's gone and says he will never come back. But I am still interested if anyone can tell me about him.

If anyone out there knows a white dude nick-named 'Lucky' who was in Recon at Khe Sanh Jan-March maybe longer please drop me a line on him. I would like to contact him if at all possible.

SIEGE KHE SANH SACRIFICE

By Joe Lola

I was only 18 when I was sent over seas
10,000 miles and rough terrain.
Then, all at once, came the monsoon rain.
I had orders to go to a place called Khe Sanh;
to serve with the few
the proud, the Marines
I went to Khe Sanh and I found pain.
The names I've forgotten
in the monsoon rain,
But Khe Sanh was home of the 26th Marines.
It was not so long ago
25 years or more
But, I still feel the pain.
Not in my wounds that healed long ago,
but in my mind,
where it can't show.
The N.V.A. knew that we couldn't leave.
We had orders to stay,
come what may.
We caught hell from the N.V.A.
And we paid them back
every single day,
but more were wounded than I care to say It's there in my mind and there it will stay.
77 clays into the fight,
I didn't last but 35.
I was hit and sent away to heal my wounds
But, it's there in my mind and won't go away.
The name of a place far far away.
It was called Khe Sanh.
And to this day the names are lost
But the faces are the same.
It's still far far away
But the name of Khe Sanh
Will always stay.

GET ME OTTA HERE!

Chuck Dahm

Getting into Viet Nam was easy. Getting out was expected to be the same.

The red clay of the area in and around Khe Sanh gave everything we had a red bronze tint to it. Clothing, gear, and even our skin had the reddish hue that made us an indigenous part of the very land we hated. Whether we liked it or not we were Khe Sanh. We made it what it was, we made it exist, we and only we would allow it to die.

The NVA could not take Khe Sanh away from the Marines. Maybe during the siege the enemy limited us to certain areas or for our own safety we placed certain restrictions on ourselves. Under no circumstances did they ever have us 'pinned down' as the media would have it. Daily patrols outside the wire were conducted, some lasting weeks at a time. I was in a special weapons platoon attached to L/3/26.

It's April '68 now and the enemy has relaxed a little, hitting us only every two or three hours with rockets. They continue their efforts on some of the larger cities south of us defended by the US Army and the South Vietnamese Army. The shelling, snipers, and raids in the wire will soon be of no concern to me because I have just received orders to rotate home. It just doesn't get any shorter than this. The five of us leaving together have orders to report to DaNang, to catch a flight home. Of course the only way out of Khe Sanh is by cargo plane.

All Marines will be leaving in the next few weeks as we are turning the defense of Khe Sanh over to the Army's First Air Cavalry. hearing this brings a strange feeling to us all. We're glad to be leaving but we have an attachment to this place in that it was paid for with our blood and energy and now we have to just give it up. According to Recon reports the enemy is regrouping in the southern areas and is planning major offensives and it's natural that Marines go where the fun is. I give some of my combat gear to my friends and say 'get some' for the last time.

The pace to the airstrip is fast and we discuss the first thing each of us will do upon arrival home. We can see the airstrip is cratered so badly that it can not be repaired fast enough. The constant bombardment of the rockets has taken its toll. Supply planes can not land to replenish food, ammo, and personnel, but American ingenuity will prevail. The Air Force devised a way of pulling the pallets out of the back of the aircraft with a drag chute as they slowed and skimmed the runway. The big cargo planes would land occasionally but only for medevac or to bring in troops. Taking troops out of Khe Sanh was number ten on the list of their priorities.

We were all exactly thirteen months and even a day or two over our required time in this tour and very anxious to leave. No amount of persuading including begging or bribing the traffic officer could get us on a plane that day. We scavanged food from somewhere and shared it with all. Then we waited. The next day, two or three planes actually land, now that the strip is repaired. They are unloaded in a few minutes and take off immediately, but not all are going to DaNang. We slept next to the control shack sandwiched between sandbags and our seabags full of clothes. Why they made us bring one hundred pounds of summer and winter dress uniforms to a combat zone I'll never know.

Dawn brings the same bad news: 'no authorization of troop removal from Khe Sanh Combat Base at this time.' All we can do is hang around the airstrip and wait. We really feel we're going to get out of here today; the traffic officer says there is a transport coming in about 1300 . One of the Marines, Corporal Flowers, has a camera so we walk to the rear area and I buy some film for it to take a few last minute pictures. As 1300 rolls around the plane lands, is unloaded and a few officers get off and it heads for the end of the runway. We ask when we are supposed to get on and are told there has been a change of plans: it's not going back to DaNang.

Sgt Marshall Jesperson of San Luis Obispo, CA, consoled us with his anger. I had been with Sgt Jess about eight months and I knew when he was determined to do something, it got done. He talked to the traffic officer for quite a while, being very animated with his gestures, pointing toward us, the airstrip, DaNang, and probably making some pretty strong statements for an enlistedman to an officer. All the time the officer was shaking his head no, only frustrating him more. It seems we are stuck here another day.

The morning of the third day we knew we were going to leave regardless of any consequences. The first plane landed early. Our only concern now was to determine where it was going from here. This one and each succeeding plane had a destination other than ours. Finally around noon, a camouflage C-130 cargo plane landed, was unloaded and was heading for the end of the strip to take off. Sgt Jess was talking to the traffic officer when I saw him abruptly turn toward us and said, 'This is it, come on.'

We grabbed our bags with one hand and M-16s in the other and ran across the airstrip towards the plane. By now it was at the end of the strip and was revving its engines getting ready to take off. The traffic officer was yelling we couldn't get on that plane and to get off the runway. I turned around to see him rip off the headphones and start chasing us. We never even broke stride. We fought for thirteen months for our country and now it's our turn and we will not be denied. The desperation has gone beyond worrying about any non combat traffic officer screaming commands at us. In a pure Marine style we are about to move forward against all odds.

At this point everything seemed to be in slow motion. I just can't run fast enough. The props are revving even faster, driving every piece of dirt and sand into my eyes. My chest is at the point of exploding. Pain shoots down the shin of my left leg. Sgt Jess is scraming 'c'mon, c'mon, we can make it.' His voice inspired us to ignore the pain and press even harder. The plane is moving down the runway now with the bottom of the back door almost all the way closed and the top starting to close. The plane is picking up speed and we are having a hard time keeping up with these heavy bags slamming into the back of our legs. We were due, we have taken fate into our own hands by disobeying an officer. There can be no turning back, no stopping. We must reach this plane. We're so close now I can see inside the back of the cargo hold. The door operator has his hand on a control box closing the rear doors and is motioning for us to stop and get back. Sgt Jess is closest and with a final effort swings his bag and gets it across the closing bottom door. This must be what scoring the winning touchdown at the Super Bowl feels like with one second left in the game.

The rear door controller seeing this talks into his microphone and the plane slows. The bottom door drops open slowly and we all throw our bags on, shoulder our weapons and climb in. I feel the rush of the plane as the engines reach maximum speed and in seconds we are airborne. Nobody talks, we are all too winded and the noise inside the back of a cargo plane is deafening. Even if we could talk we wouldn't have to. Our faces tell it all.

From here the trip home is easy. One day in DaNang, one day in Okinawa and on to California. In a matter of hours I'm in Wisconsin thinking three days ago this was only something I could dream about.

THE WALL

By Sandra Hill

[The sections in italic represent those souls within the Wall—the past looking out onto the present—while the sections in ordinary print portray those in the present drawn back to the past]

Panel 33E

Piercing, watchful eyes radiated out of the gloom like a beacon. He stalked her every step until she stopped not three feet before him. Stealthily he moved forward, wanting to be near her. Raising an unsteady hand she slowly traced her fingers across the etched name—and she touched his soul. Like a lost and lonely child she sought solace, but sanctuary he could not give her. Destiny drew her to the threshold of his world—from where he stood watching—and waiting.

His name was just above eye level on the black granite Wall. To fellow veterans he was just one of the many lost brothers in whose honor the memorial stood, but to her his name masked a time and a place from where he looked out onto her world and she into his. The hollow thud of an approaching helicopter pierced the meditative tranquility of the warm afternoon, and she raised her eyes skyward as an olive drab Marine Corps Sea Knight thundered overhead with a deafening roar. Poignant memories stirred within her at the evocative sound of the chopping rotors; a sound which had been the lifeblood of all who had known combat in Vietnam, and which for many was to be the last thing they would ever hear.

Soulful, dark eyes scrutinised what had once been his. Her spirit had sustained him on every nerve-tingling night ambush; she was never far from his thoughts when he'd humped the treacherous booby-trapped trails and paddies, and her name was the last utterance to slip from his lips as he fell beneath a hail of withering gunfire. The mind-numbing suddenness of their parting had exacted a heavy toll. Their mutual grief had been and still was profound; one not whole without the other. They were—and always would be—inextricably linked, eternally bonded.

Panel 36E

The object of his attention held him riveted. Just a babe-in-arms when he'd gone to war but now sculpted in his own likeness, his son was now a man. Time the great healer had done little to quell the tears of sadness which both now shed. Beneath his wistful gaze his son's embrace gently wrapped around another, and there before him writhed an infant of some twelve months—a grandson! Held aloft its tiny palms flailed a greeting. Wide, inquisitive eyes gazed intently into his own. Pursed lips mouthed words not yet learned. The need to reach out overwhelmed him. To hold, to be held; to love, to be loved. Instinctively he knew the child bore his name. What greater love than to be so honored. Gone—but not forgotten.

Panel 28E

Eyes that held a world of hurt gazed into the reflective blackness of the Wall. He stood alone but surrounded, a myriad lost souls reaching out from within. Mesmerised by the hypnotic gloom, its dark folds closed around him like a second skin, absorbing him, reeling him in. The stench of rotting vegetation permeated his senses. Steaming, oppressive heat took his breath away. Voices long since departed grew more distinct—until once more he stood amongst them. As they started down the jungle trail, something impalpable unsettled him; like a hungry shark it stalked the shadows waiting to strike. And there was no escape.

Deathly silence screamed a warning. No melodious birdsong resounded through the jungle canopy; no screeching monkeys crashed through the treetops in playful abandon. Somehow they knew. He could almost taste the danger. Like a well-oiled pendulum his wary eyes swept the trail seeking out the fate that awaited them. And too late he heard it. Death was dispatched with a tell-tale 'thunk thunk', but barely had the warning cry fallen from his lips than the mortars were amongst them. Sprawled face down on the red earth his head reverberated with the screams of the injured, not comprehending the screams were his own. Consciousness came and went in a morphine-dulled haze; air-conditioned cool swirled around the medevac's deck soothing his fevered brow. He savored the pleasure of waking between crisp, white sheets. But then they told him about his leg—which was gone, and about his buddies—who were gone. And then he was gone—back to an alien nation they called the world. Cast adrift on an ocean of indifference, the best he could manage was to keep from going under.

'Time is a great healer,' said the optimistic

Half a lifetime later and he was still trying to figure it all out.

'Seek and ye shall find,' said the well intentioned.

He was no longer sure what he was even meant to be looking for.

'Forgive and forget' said the misinformed.

Forgiveness he could contemplate, but to forget—. To have been spared the fate of those whose lives had touched his but were no more, what right had he to forget! There but for the grace of God—.

Panel 31E

He wasn't sure how he knew—he just did—for in his world there were no secrets. The look of resignation and the pull of his buddy's restless spirit did not escape him. The gaunt shadow across the upturned face bore testament to what he already knew. The unspoken truth known to each. Eyes that now pleaded for release had once danced with mischief. Best buddies from boot camp through to the Nam they'd been through it all together—bar brawls, whorehouses, baiting the MPs—and that was just their first month in-country. But then reality kicked in. Humping the boonies and one too many nights on LP quickly put paid to their innocence; from FNGs to old men in just four months.

The manner of his own demise, so long ago, was still vivid. It came and went in a heartbeat. It had been one of those days when the air held its breath. A steaming, sultry hot. Out on his own walking point, his trigger finger poised, he was primed. Like a predator homing in on its prey, his razor-sharp eyes willed the encroaching jungle to give up its ghosts. As if on cue, a startled bird suddenly crashed through the undergrowth sending a shockwave down the line as the Platoon hit the deck. His heart pounded in his throat as he waited for the opening burst of gunfire that never came. Ripples of nervous laughter fused with heart-felt curses elicited a swift rebuke from the LT. Momentarily distracted, he never did hear the fateful click underfoot.

The explosion hit him with the force of an express train. No whispered last words, no dying breath, no nothing. Just a vortex of burning, lacerating shrapnel which sucked him in and spat him out. Instant annihilation. But what had been torn asunder so long ago was about to come full circle. Karma stood set to play its final hand. Soon—very soon—they would once more stand together again. Brothers-in-arms, best buddies, reunited.

O-DARK-THIRTY

Night-time—his very own reflecting pool. Nothing stirred. Transfixed by the power of his surroundings he sat in solemn vigil; a captive audience of one. Beneath a starlit sky he watched over his charges protectively; or was it them watching over him? He sometimes wondered. He liked to think they were all looking out for each other—just like they'd done back in Nam. He felt at home here; a place where he could think, laugh, cry, be angry—be anything he wanted to be. Amongst his own. No explanations necessary. The only thing that fazed him was the profound silence; it was too quiet, too pure. Not like the in-your-face silence of Nam, where the cicadas hypnotic drone pulsated through the long, lonely nights way out in the boonies, and where the resonant thud of outgoing merged with the booming momentum of B-52 five-hundred-pounders, delivering their nightly sermon along the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

His recollections ran hot and cold. The Vietnam recently re-visited welcomed him with open arms and a ready smile. The Vietnam he remembered was where light and dark collided. Routine patrols run through countryside whose beauty could distract yet kill with impunity; erdant, rolling hills veiled in opalescent mist raining grim projectiles of death; lush tropical forests laced with exotic blossoms and trip wires; smiling, faithless mamasans propagating paddies by day and punjis by night. Death suffused the land. He walked over it, round it, through it; he breathed it, gagged on it, inflicted it. But ultimately he cheated it. It was denied. He had seen the elephant and heard its roar. He had answered the call. And now he answered the call once

Reflections...

He was 19 going on 47. Free to roam at will, time no longer a factor in his being. Many times he'd gazed upon familiar faces touched by age in a way that had bypassed him. He watched them trace every centimetre of every letter of his name. He reached out to them, and they to him. He cried their tears, felt their anguish, so desperately wanted to heal their pain—but it was out of his hands. So much to tell but no-one to tell it to.

They'd shared the best and the worst times together. He missed their camaraderie, their scuzzy jokes, the made-up R&R stories that grew more sensational with every telling. But when the incoming started, all they ever talked about was getting out and going back to the world. And one by one they climbed the steps and took their seat on the freedom bird home. But not for him the air-conditioned bliss of the passenger cabin, or the roar of elation as they climbed into the azure skies over the South China Sea, or the ministrations of pretty flight attendants. The cargo hold held so such attractions.

But there was no end, just a new beginning. A starting over of sorts. Inextricably bound to this place by virtue of his destiny, he had only to reflect to find himself back where it all started. With the big guns now silent, the hills echoed with an eerie peace. Many times he'd walked the barren plateau; a moonscape of red earth all that remained where bunker-city had once sprawled. Time-worn memories seemed but a few hours old. Hunkered down with his buddies amidst the incoming, just a transistor radio for their entertainment pleasure—'Coming at you from the Delta to the DMZ this is AFVN...this next one goes out to Penicillin Pete up there in the Dong Ha pleasure palace...I can't get no satisfaction...have any of you short-timers considered the benefits of extending...we gotta get out of this place...for all you gyrenes up there around the DMZ...born to be wild...and the beat goes on...Hill 861-A at Khe Sanh was attacked by an unknown number of enemy last night; NVA body count was 109 with 7 US KIAs...the hits just

"LAMENTATIONS" AND ITS UNKNOWN AUTHOR

By Dave Rogers

Lamentation means the outward expression of grief, usually by weeping or wailing. One normally associated this word with death or the imminent threat of death. The loss of a loved one would result in grief, while a slow, mournful musical composition would serve as a fitting lament for a loved one's funeral.

Lamentations is also a book of the Old Testament in the the Bible, which was composed by Jeremiah as a funeral dirge over the desolation of Jerusalem by Babylon. Jeremiah records his sorrow after the burning of Jerusalem in five poems. Tradition says that Jeremiah wept bitter tears and composed his mournful elegy in "Jeremiah's Grotto," near present day Golgotha.

The poem "Lamentations" addresses the issue of self-preservation amid environs filled with violence during the Vietnam War. Its author finds himself communicating with the surrounding hills near the Khe Sanh Combat Base in an attempt to interpret his destiny, perhaps prophetically, because he has sacrificed himself for an understandable cause—resisting "the boot and foot of oppression." His cause is noble; freedom is at stake. His concern is genuine; it is heartfelt. His fate is predictable; he may soon die for his "friends at home."

I became interested in the poem for two reasons. The first being its source, and secondly, because of where it was written. The poem was provided to me by Hank Norman's mother during a visit with her and members of his family in the summer of 1993. Hank was killed on March 30, 1968, during "The Siege," and we had known each other from our days together at the "Rockpile" and Khe Sanh. Mrs. Norman explained to me she understood that Hank had not written the poem. Rather, it was written by somebody he knew and was with while on Hill 881. Supposedly, he had copied the poem and mailed it to his family. The poem that I viewed was written in Hank's handwriting.

The fact that "Lamentations" was written on Hill 881 in November, 1967, was another item of interest to me, for I, too, had penned a poem in the same locality during "The Hill Fights" in Spring of the same year with the lamenting theme, "Death At My Door." As the unknown poet sits and writes, he finds himself in a similar situation, questioning why life, why death. Near the end of the poem, he finds solace by concluding that he must perform his duties with pride and honor, "Now I've found my reason: It's for those guys who've gone before."

I tried to find the author of this poem by writing the Pacific Stars and Stripes, thinking it might have been published. However, in a letter from them dated March 7, 1995, they advised me that they had searched their newspapers printed during that period and were unable to find any such poem.

Does anybody know who wrote this poem?

PAINTER: Yes.

STUBBE: That whole bunker that was hit on 24 January was DOCKLEAF, I guess.

PAINTER: Yes.

STUBBE: You had been shot out several times just trying to get into your zone. I remember baptising POPOWITZ: his face and the faces of his team mates that were with him, standing beside my bunker in the C Med area, were all camouflaged.

PAINTER: Trying to get water: just trying to get water we were shot out several times. We were trying to get water for ourselves because they wanted us left out there. We were spotting artillery. We got word Khe Sanh was being kicked with both feet. "We need you guys to stay." At that point we had already been four days without food and two days without water! And then they extended us to the 20th, and then the 23rd we were hallucinating for lack of water...

STUBBE: It was obvious that there were bad guys all around?

PAINTER: Yeah. They were just bounding—

STUBBE: How did you ever avoid them?

PAINTER: We crawled on our hands and knees everywhere we went. We didn't dare stand up in the daylight. And when the sun went down, then we were standing up, and we were trying to spot gun flashes and rocket flashes and trying to direct. And we had two different fire missions going on at once.

STUBBE: So you were forward observers?

PAINTER: They had us out there as long as we could, and then finally—MARTIN was out there with us, SCOTT MARTIN. He was with DOCKLEAF.

STUBBE: How did they get you all back?

PAINTER: They just sent the choppers out, because we said we're hallucinating. Doc said: They're hallucinating; they're out of water. We seen the bad guys everywhere. I was second point because I was the grenadier. RICK NOYES was point. And they pulled us in on the 23rd, and we spent the night down in that big Air Force bunker where the dentists were. A big bunker. We spent the night down there, and they kept hydrating us. They were feeding us water loaded with electrolytes because we we so dehydrated, and they sent us back on light duty. GUNNY says: There ain't no damn "light duty! You gotta dig holes!" So the morning of the 24th we were digging holes and eating C-rats. And I remember coming back in. They said: Painter, your camera is all messed-up. I said: Hey—I think that's where I started using 'shit happens.' It was real strange that day. All day long we were digging, and then they started hammering at us. And we're diving into different bunkers along the runway there. And that whole day, Ray, I just had this feeling: "Man, I'm going to get it!"

STUBBE: You just felt it?

PAINTER: Yeah.

STUBBE: That was not uncommon.

PAINTER: All day long we were laying there and the guys were—guys that had been there when they first started—were in the holes, and they're doing this [motions arms embracing one's own body] everytime one of them went off. And they went: "Painter, you ain't—how come you ain't jumping?" And I go, "I don't know, I guess I'm just used to it by now." I mean, there ain't nothing you can do about it. All we can do is just lay here in the hole—and—wait!

It was towards the end of the day. We secured from work detail. And I was walking back with a bunch of stuff, and they started right in on us again. And I'm caught out in the open! And everywhere I turn, something's going off—over there, something's going off over here. And then Scribner yells, "Hey, Painter! Get your ass over here!" And I went—three, four more guys, into the bunker.

Now Scribner was at the far end, close to the runway. And I went down a little bit. And I said, "Wait a second, I got something here for us." Aha! I had my little stash up there. And we fired one up. We were laughing and giggling. And stuff was hitting around us, and we're going, "Whew! That was close!" [pause]. And [pause]... We heard a loud THUMP! And zzzt! [pause...] That was a delayed fuse in that rig. It came in the door, hit the deck. Went, zzzzt! And at that same time, Scribner goes: "Shit!" [very loud]. And then it was like a fly: you know how that fly feels or that mosquitto that you slap between your hands? Everything went black! It just went black. And I—heard it go off. I actually heard the blast. So for me, the one that got me, I heard it; I heard it go off.

STUBBE: No blinding light, just the opposite: real dark?

PAINTER: Knocked my ass right out. Knocked me cold with the concussion. And I actually—then, some time passed. I have no idea. Some time passed, and I had a conscious thought: So this is what it's like to be dead? It's not so bad. And then, slowly, sounds started coming to my ears—screaming. And I realized it was me doing the screaming. I was screaming real loud. And I stopped, and I said to myself: I'm screaming! I'm alive! And at that point—I, then I actually stopped. My head was like this—this weight was on me. I was pushed down—. Because I was standing up in the bunker. The bunker went this ways, and I'm standing cross-ways in the bunker.

STUIBBE: So all the roofing and everything else—

PAINTER: The sandbags, just sandwiched me down. I was turned this way. I was ninety degrees to the blast, and I was facing the blast when it went off. And it turned, it spun me—and why I didn't have anything in—I had an abrasion across my stomach because my flak jacket was open.

STUBBE: Maybe the force of the concussion turned you before all the—

PAINTER: Shrapnel reached me.

STUBBE: Right.

PAINTER: And it just peppered my back.

STUBBE: I know, because I saw it!

PAINTER: And my neck. But I was saying: If you're screaming, you're alive! Some of the guys stated settling down. And I could hear someone coughing, "I can't breathe! I can't breathe!" Later on, I found out who it was—just recently; it was Ken Martin. He called me from Oregon because he read the ad. His wife prompted him into calling me. And he called me late at night, and we talked and cried for two hours on the phone.

STUBBE: Was it all the dust?

PAINTER: He was along full of cordite! Because he was on the far end. His ears were gone. My ears were bleeding too. I think I was bleeding from my eyes, my ears. Then somebody said, "They're coming to get us; they're going to get us. They're going to get us out of here." It was just until recently, I remember calling out: "Scribner! What happened? Scribner!" Because it was on his end. He took the full—right in his lap! ... MACAULAY—

STUBBE: Was digging you out.

PAINTER: Yeah. But the first person I saw was Gunny, our little bitty gunny,. And he was digging us out. And I saw his face as the light broke through, and I went: "Gunny!" [loud]. And he jumped! He thought I was a dead man. "You're still alive! There's some live people in here!" And Kevin—STUBBE: Was digging. And Rick [Noyes] was OK.

PAINTER: Yeah, he was down there at the same end as—I don't know who else was in there; I have no idea. That's why I have the ad. I'm desperately searching. I want to find all of us...

STUBBE: Do you remember anything right after that, like at C-Med or anything, or were you just really out of it? In shock—probably hear anything?

PAINTER: I was in shock. I remember you talking to me—but very vaguely.

STUBBE: And then they evacuated you right away?

PAINTER: They evacuated me the next morning. I spent the night in CHARLIE MED. I don't know whose care I was under. But I remember waking up during the night—OH! just the pain! in my back and my neck! Just constantly ached—for months after that.

STUBBE: It's amazing nothing got into your spine.

PAINTER: The surgeon that did the work on my back feels that there were two vertebrae that were cracked.

STUBBE: From that weight and crushing.

STUBBE: They took you in a jeep!

PAINTER: They took me in a ride—they took me in a jeep—and shit was still coming in! [laughs]. We were still being hammered and they're running me—I don't know who drove me up; I have no idea.

STUBBE: Were there others with you?

PAINTER: That I really don't remember. I remember Gunny saying, "Careful! Careful! Don't step on the guy below you!" And—this actually is one of the easiest times I've ever talked about it. .. As they were pulling me out they go, "Damn, Painter!" And I go, "All these months in the bush—43 days left to do in-country, and they had to bang my ass in the hole!" They had to beat me up in a hole!

STUBBE: 43 days.

PAINTER: It's all I had left. March One; I was out of there. ...

[NOTE: the story of this incident continues with the next item, from taped comments of Kevin Macaulay]

When Rosa and Popowitz and Miller and Scribner were killed, I went over and I started working on the bunker after it was hit. We were going to destroy the bunker because nobody wanted to stay in it. And I think we found Popowitz' body and part of his boot and part of his foot was still inside. And we found Scribner's helmet with part of his head still inside. And I started to shake, and he [1/Lt Carl J. Schlack, the XO of the recon company, called "Pappy" because he was older; he had been enlisted] grabbed me by the stock and swivel and pulled me over and said, "I want you"—Schlack, he says, "I don't want you to go near there again." He says, "You can't handle it."

I said, "Pappy, I can handle it; I've got to handle it. if I don't handle it I won't be able to handle anything. I've got to prove to myself."

And he respected me. he said, "All right. Just go over and sit by the side. There's no reason why you have to wade about through the gore of battle." He said, "You just sit there for awhile and reflect on these four men and think about these four men." And he snapped me out of it.

Miller—he had been wounded out on patrol two weeks before Christmas or a week before Christmas in '67, and he went down, I guess, to DaNang, and then they operated on him there. And he wasn't that seriously wounded. He took a round through the scrotum, and he came back about a week before we were hit in January. And he was one of the four that were killed when the 122 went in the door of the bunker..

We had so little over there, but the little that we had we shared with everybody.

We were rough son-of-bitches, I remember that. A fellow would show us a picture of his wife and we'd look at it and say, "Boy, is she a dog, how did you ever marry such a beast?" And we would joke back and forth, but the joking meant so much to us. It would take the edge off. Sitting in the bunkers, listening to the rounds impact—maybe three, four, maybe five minutes before a bunker took a direct hit we had four guys killed and—we were terrified, but the way we showed our terror: we would joke back and forth: "O listen to that one,that sounded pretty! Listen to that one coming in!" And then somebody would say that a bunker got hit. And we'd run over, and all the joking would stop, and we'd rip the bunker that had taken us five days to build; we took it apart in 30 seconds to get out the guys who were inside.

There were 22 men in the bunker. Four were killed and the rest of them were wounded. I remember pulling a fellow by the name of Painter out. He was covered with blood from the top of his head to the bottom of his feet, and he was in bad shape. But poor Scribner, of them, well, Doc Miller was in bad shape also. But Scribner looked like the rocket went off right in his lap...He was married to an airline stewardess.

..We shared, and I live better today because we shared. I learned a lot...

[The following is an excerpt from the diary of Ray W. Stubbe for 24 January 1968]

24 January 1968

PFC Robert C. Painter walked over to C-Med in complete shock, shrapnel wounds all over his back and face—little holes with small burn marks and blood dripping out of a few of them. Then more—Velardi, Noyes, others. My friends. We went into my bunker [in C Med] for safety, to wait in case we had another barrage of incoming. Five recon men in all. Then an Air Force Lieutenant Colonel who had minor shrapnel in his lower buttocks hobbled into my bunker. He removed his flak jacket and we all noticed immediately a tiny piece of shrapnel just below the neck, in the middle, where his spine was. Had he not been wearing his flak jacket, he would have been killed or paralyzed. Then a postal clerk arrived, shell-shocked. These seven, in addition to Dr. King—who had just moved in, the corpsman who has been staying with me the last several nights—"Goober" [Richard Heath]—and myself. It is now 2125 as I write this in my diary. No one talks; everyone just sits in silence.

Cpl Daniel F. Velardi had just returned from a recon patrol. There actually had been a small Marine patrol out during the past several days! Team FROSTBURG was near Hill 222, near Lang Kat (1) and (2) south of Route 9. Although scheduled for extraction on the 21st, they had to wait until today, the 24th, to return to the base. During their three-day delay, they spotted NVA with packs walking down Route 9. They had to wander around in the area north of Route 9 until they were extracted today by chopper.

PFC John M. Tighe crawled out with the bright day-glow orange cloth air panel into an open area to signal the choppers—and, fearfully perhaps, any enemy snipers that might be there. The choppers radioed that they could not spot the panel, to put it out further. Tighe's heart was pounding, he said, ready to explode with contained fear. Then the helicopters said they wanted smoke! As the choppers approached, one of the recon Marines fired! This usually scares the choppers away, or causes them also to fire! Cpl Velardi hit the man and knocked him out. He later said he thought he had seen something.

During the patrol, the Marines had to pass through some of the Bru villes. The Bru offered them sanctuary all during this time.

Now five of these men were sitting side by side on my metal frame rack in my bunker. The Air Force Colonel, sitting on the wooden palletted deck with his back against the wall then departed, perhaps to a more comfortable accommodation than just sitting on the deck all night. Rick Noyes was dabbing his head every now and then with a roll of toilet paper, causing a large pile of crumbled white paper died red in blood to accumulate on the deck. We all assumed, as did he, that he had a head wound. (Later, at daybreak when the corpsmen examined him, he was found to be only slightly wounded; the blood on his head was that of his dead buddies). Rick Noyes is only 19. On his helmet is written: "God walks with me."

Those sitting on my rack fell asleep during the night in their sitting position. I was curled upon the top of my field desk, an area about three feet square—if that. The surgeon, Dr. King, was lying on the floor as was the shell-shock postal clerk. Incoming kept pounding all night—a few rounds every now and then.

THE PATROL

By
Talis Kaminskis

The emotions of the night surged through the two young Marines. They sat together, the morning light now invading the outside darkness. On opposite sides of the table, each treasured his private space, avoiding any semblance of a glance. Except for military rank, there was very little difference between them. But it was that difference that hours earlier had started the problems between them. In a little while the Sergeant had to lead a patrol. And the other, one who had in the past accompanied the Sergeant without question, has said, "No, I will not go!"

The day before orders had come through that a patrol was to go and climb a mountain. Among those directly and indirectly affected by those orders, a somber and harsh discussion had ensued. All were aware of the fact that what was being asked was suicide for those who would go. Already their native counterparts had reported the presence of a large and heavily-armed enemy force that awaited any and all foolhardy enough to challenge that hill. But the powers to be would not accept the word of any but their own soldiers. So the word had been sent to the Marines that lived in the closest village to the hill.

Thus the night had been spent in deep argument over what to do. Some wanted a "ghost patrol:" go out, say they are there, and come back. Others insisted on just flatly saying No. To die as a soldier was one thing, but to die a sacrificial lamb was not. But the Sergeant said he had no choice but to do. And his friend—his friend who had walked with him through hell and high water, said, No.

As the conversation from the others quieted down, theirs increased. Harsher and harsher were the words exchanged between them. And over the mention of a female, a blow had been thrown. Quickly separated and calmed by their comrades, the two had resorted to sitting in silence on different sides of a table. Every so often a bottle that had appeared without asking, was passed between them. A means of communication that avoided the need for words. Cigarette after cigarette was lit and consumed. Thus the hours of the darkness, both outside and inside, passed.

The time of the patrol grew closer. Each in his heart knew that the patrol would bring death. They knew their village militia. They lived with them, ate with them, laid their lives on the line with them. Thus they had no doubt that the message they brought was true. On that hill an enemy far greater in power than the patrol that would seek them, awaited. The Marine who would not go glanced at the light outside and acknowledged that the time was near. His gaze sought out the Sergeant's face for the first time since they had sat down, and from his eyes unpreventable tears rolled forth,. It was evident that the emotions were mutual.

From their seated positions, both rose; and moved to an embrace that both sensed would be their last. The closeness told all. They had shared so much together; and each in his own way was to share what was about to happen. In spite of the previous hours, their friendship was still true, and each understood the reason for the other's actions.

For one it was the refusal to attend certain death; and the other, a letter from home saying his wife no longer needed him.

Not a word passed between, nor would there be. Outside noises of preparation interrupted their needs, and they quickly parted. One to attend to his final patrol, and the other, to sit and wait. In silence, alone, waiting for the sounds of violence that would signal the happening in the distance. Over the radio the last desperate plea for help, and in his mind, the turmoil of this decision.

"The tomb of a hero is in the hearts of the living."

—an inscription found on a stone wall of the marketplace where Joan of Arc was burned.

POEM

By Talis Kaminskis

Desperately seeking, my eyes are searching
waiting for a war without end
to end
Nights lay waking,
heart is trembling
waiting for a war without end
to end
In darkness are fought, battles of hope
waiting for a war without end
to end
Daylights fleeting, hopes and dreams are seeking waiting for a war without end
to end
On time worn faces, familiar tears leave traces waiting for a war without end
to end
Arms held empty, rock their loads gently
waiting for a war without end
to end.
Alone I do last,
living a long past
waiting for a war without end
to end.

CONTACT

During the Khe Sanh reunion in D.C. (1993), two veterans kneeled at the panel of the Wall and pointed to the name of their best buddy. Tears flowed. Two women stood beside them. The older said, "Did you know him?" "He was our best buddy." "He was my son; this is his sister."

JANUARY, 1966

By Ray W. Stubbe

On 03 January 1966 a company of Nungs arrived at Khe Sanh Combat Base to augment the camp's strength. At this point, the camp was only a small Special Forces camp. Also arriving were two US Air Force Bird Dog observation planes to begin the operations of Project TIGER-HOUND, flying 12 miles into Laos from the border to detect enemy supply routes, support the Special Forces operations of FOB-1 (which used Khe Sanh as a launch site for ground recon operations into Laos), and conduct visual recon.

Just at dusk on the 3d the evening formation was breaking up. It was the usual evening harrangue right before supper that had become a pattern over which the "A" Camp Commander, Capt John D. Waghelstein had become increasingly apprehensive. Without success he had attempted to convince the LLDB commander [the Vietnamese Special Forces] to cease these formations at such regularity.

Suddenly three rounds of 120mm mortars exploded in the midst of the formation, causing almost all of the casualties that were to be sustained during the ensuing battle. Khe Sanh had become the place where the NVA introduced 120mm mortars, his heaviest ordnance of the battle in Viet Nam to this point. [The 120mm M38 Soviet mortar can fire 12-15 rounds per minute, each round weighing 15.4KG. max range is 5700 meters; minimum range 460 meters. Weight of the weapon in travelling position is 500KG (1100 pounds)]. The newly-arrived Bird Dog planes had not yet been placed in large underground revetments that were to be dug by the engineers, and were severely damaged in the attack before they were put in operation.

The defenders scrambled to underground shelters and, once underground, took no further casualties. The enemy began shifting fires attempting to hit the bunkers. They did strike the team house where, because it was the coldest part of the year, there was always a fire. The fires from the bruning team house provided all the necessary illumination in the darkness of the night. The antennas began collapsing and the Communications Sergeant, McFadden, continued to maintain communications until he was eventually pulled out of the burning rubble and taken to the bunker in the center of the compound.

A large underground bunker in the center of the camp which had been used to store ammunition had earlier been cleared for use as an operations center and now, as a medical bunker. [This was later the 26th Marines COC during the Siege]. There were now 13 killed and some 50 to 60 wounded, some critical with traumatic amputations. Doc Cobb, the senior medic of the team, was unfortunately in DaNang, so Doc Robinson, the junior medic, the local missionaries (Nancy Costello and Eugenia Johnson—the Millers were temporarily away), and four Bru girls that the Army had been training as nurses, attended and saved the wounded. As a result of their work, of the 12 or 14 that were medevaced as critical, only one was lost.

Counter-mortar fire was impossible. The 120s were fired just outside the range of the camp's 81s but, although within the range of 105s, there were no recoil pits to allow 105 high angle fire. The enemy moved into this "dead space" with their tubes and fired unmolested, a tactic that was to be repeated at Khe Sanh during the 1968 Siege when the enemy moved into an area where they would be safe from B-52 strikes, but far enough from the perimeter to avoid fire from those manning the trenchline of the perimeter.

About midnight the "Ridgerunners"—Marine Corps medevac helicopters, landed inside the camp without assistance other than the light from the burning camp, and the critically wounded were lifted out as the enemy continued pounding the camp until about 0300.

There had been a rather strange CRUMP explosion, maybe one round out of ten. It was nowhere as loud as the other 120s and it was first assumed these were 81s. They were actually 120s with a delayed fuse, a round that would cut through 12-feet of the laterite soil and detonate. Those that landed on the PSP sheets of the runway only penetrated 6 feet. The enemy was obviously aiming for the bunkers, attempting to annihilate the camp. Fortunately they never hit the medical bunker in the center of the camp.

The next morning brought clear skies. The remainder of the wounded were evacuated, and fixed wing continued airstrikes that had begun during the night. The NVA forces had already departed from their mission to make recon of their activities in eastern Laos too costly for us (as well as holding the base at Khe Sanh which was the launch site for those operations). Another company of Nungs arrived, giving the camp commander a total of five companies: two Bru, one Vietnamese, and two MIKE forces of Nungs in addition to the Nungs already assigned to the camp.

The combined effects of this operation, together with B-52 strikes in the Khe Sanh area during the first two weeks of January, 1966, resulted in a report of a NVA unit moving some 200 wounded from a point six miles south of the DMZ to a tunneled area containing a hospital about six miles to the west. Project TIGER-HOUND commenced operations. FOB-1 continued operations which proved so valuable that in the summer of 1967, FOB-3 was formed at Khe Sanh along with a "Special Project" to create an indigenous guerilla force with the nearby BV-33 Royal Laotian battalion, "Elephant," to operate near the Chinese border, under the leadership of Major George Quamo.

JANUARY, 1967

By Ray W. Stubbe

On the night of 17 January 1967, Sergeant Thomas Dean Willson of the detachment of 3d Force Recon Company at Khe Sanh led a 7-man force recon patrol deep into enemy territory, some 14 miles north of Khe Sanh, far outside friendly artillery support range, near the DMZ. Their mission: locate enemy infiltration routes.

Although being fired upon during their insertion, the team made their way out of their IP [Insertion Point] and moved some 400 meters to a harbor site for the evening. During the night they heard shooting and chopping sounds, and at first light on the 18th, moved to an OP [Observation Post] to locate the source of the sounds. At 1220, while on this OP, a NVA patrol estimated to be 30-40, began moving towards them.

[The following is a conversation with Clayton Ernst of 02 July 1993 at the Khe Sanh Reunion in Washington, D.C. Clayton was most insistent that the record of this patrol, which involved the first Marine KIA at Khe Sanh. Clay was dying. He had been told he had about a year to live. He had been the Chief of Police of a large city in Florida. He died in January, 1995, spending his last months visiting his old buddies from force recon and bringing them together].

Ernst: Bessent—he was my radioman on that last patrol.

Stubbe: By "last patrol" you mean—

Ernst: When I got wounded and Scanlon killed.

Stubbe: That was—

Ernst: The 18th of January [1967], the first KIA.

Stubbe: He was a wrestler in high-school, and a short fellow, I was told.

Ernst: 5-foot. Senator Dodd of Connecticut put through the bill to get him admitted into the Marine Corps because he was only 5-foot.

Stubbe: And I guess he was—

Ernst: Everybody's "little brother."

Stubbe: The unit mascot almost

Ernst: He was the unit virgin. We tried to alter that... First the mission was screwed-up—to my way—I didn't like it. Lieutenant Schmidt came to me, and Tommy Willson. It was about two o'clock, and they told us to get a team together. We were going in. Bessent had never been with us. And the dog-handler's name was Boucher. And a PFC Thompson—black kid from "A" Company, 3rd Battalion Recon—he'd never been out with us. He didn't have much recon experience. And the rest was Tommy Willson, me, Scanlon, Doc Feyh, and Bessent the radioman.

Stubbe: Who was the Patrol Leader?

Ernst: Willson was the Leader; I was the Assistant.

Stubbe: And the communicator was Bessent?

Ernst: Yes, and Doc Feyh was the Corpsman, and a Dog Handler and two Scouts. So we went in a little past three. And as soon as the chopper cleared the area there was sound of wood chopping all the way around us, lower down on the mountain.

Stubbe: Was this close to the Khe Sanh Combat Base, or far?

Ernest: Well, the report says 14 miles north, but Tommy Willson was taken aside and briefed by Lieutenant Schmidt and given the only map. Later, in the hospital, a Major from G-2 came in, and I was a little drugged-out. And he told me: When you get back to the States, don't tell anybody where you were! When we got hit—when I got back up to the top of the hill and I said: Where's arty? And Tommy, laying next to me, says: We're out of range. And we were out of the 175s at Camp Carroll. I knew we were "out" somewhere!

Stubbe: Of course it's Force Recon's mission to be outside the artillery fan.

Ernst: Yeah, but there was no briefing on this patrol. Tommy and I usually took an overflight before we went out on a mission. Because Tommy Willson and I had made almost all our patrols together, as Leader and Assistant. We worked real good together. So as soon as the chopper was out of there, we heard the sounds of chopping and what sounded like a rifle range down in the valley below us somewhere. So we moved, O, maybe 500 meters to setup Harbor Site for the night, sat in for the night. And first thing in the morning, wood-chopping and shooting started again. So I took Scanlon. It was, O, about eight o'clock in the morning, and we went west on the ridgeline, checking out the ridgeline. It looked like a farmer once had tried to clear the land. It was about three-foot high elephant grass, and tree stumps all over the place, three foot-high.

Stubbe: Did you think this was a training camp, then?

Ernst: That's what it sounded like. There was 2, 3 shots, silence, 2 shots, 1 shot, silence—sort of like a training rifle range. We had a ridge, and it had a treeline running down the center. And they were set-up.

Stubbe: "They" meaning—

Ernst: The rest of the team we left as an OP here. And we headed west. And this was dotted all the way through with tree stumps. We got about five, six hundred meters out—just at eyesight until the ridge started bending off. Then we turned around and came back. The only outstanding thing about it was: all the wood was old and dry. We got back and set up for lunch. And then in the afternoon we were going to go to the east, and then come back and decide where we were going to move for the night. So, while I'm sitting here, Willson signals me from the top of the ridge that there's Gooks on the other side of the ridge, and coming over. So I told Scanlon to go and set up in a position behind me, behind a wooden split-log fence, like Abraham Lincoln used to build. This was all in three-foot-high grass.

Stubbe: So you could take cover?

Ernst: Yeah. There was a tree stump that he got behind, and I was behind one. I couldn't see anything yet. I turned around, and three times Scanlon was trying to stand up. I kept waving him down.

Stubbe: Using hand-and-arm signals?

Ernst: Yeah. And he was about twenty feet away from me, and I was about fifteen feet away from the fence. At that time I heard the voices and forgot about Scanlon. I was looking around beside the tree stump I was behind. And there werre three North Vietnamese with helmet on, with AK-47s at sling arms, walking down the trail.

Stubbe: Close together?

Ernst: Close together, just strolling—

Stubbe: Like—no cares in the world.

Ernst: They weren't patrolling. They got down past me. And I'm still watching behind the tree stump. All of a sudden I felt something. I looked up, and Scanlon had got up, ran around behind me, jumped over the fence, ran out about a yard towards the trail, and yelled, Halt!

Stubbe: O, I bet shivvers ran up your spine!

Ernst: I was just struck. What's he doing!? Then he opened up. At this time all I could see was the head and shoulders of one and the head of the other. But they went down. I don't know if he hit them or not. They were over the edge of the ridge. So—he stopped firing—he didn't reload or anything. He was just standing there, looking down towards the trail. I started to stand up, and I was about half-crotched, trying to think: What do you say? when it was a blast of fire like on the rifle-range. These three were a point for a company!

Stubbe: They were coming over?

Ernst: Yeah. They were coming over and the thing that struck me right off was: Who was firing? The next thought was: They are good! My quick reaction: I just hit the ground. So I crawled over to the fence, and Scanlon had been blown back against the fence and was laying flat on the ground. I counted five hits on him—his legs, his hip, his shoulder, and his chest. And I got up to reach over the fence to pull him over to my side and I could pull him up to the top of the hill. And as I got about half-way up to the fence, they opened up with automatic weapons on the top of the fence and just splintered.

Stubbe: Were you getting any support from the rest of the team?

Ernst: Yeah. They were firing up there and throwing grenades. So I hit the ground and I tried to pull a couple of the logs loose from the bottom of the fence—as a way to get him to my side. But—well-built fence. So I started throwing grenades and firing my weapon. And I had a M-79. And where the path crossed the ridge, I was firing the M-79 into the trees, letting them burst off the trees—.

Stubbe: Like an air-burst—

Ernst: Because some of the firing was coming from there. So while I was doing this from down the finger, they were sliding down the finger and below me. So down in here I saw about three of them crawling through the grass. And I pulled out a grenade and let the spoon go and counted two, and on "three" I was throwing it out, and I got hit in the right arm, through the elbow, and it snapped the grenade out of my hand—and I was still counting! I counted all the way to "eight," and said: You're a dud! And I turned around. And there was a North Vietnamese standing right over by the treeline looking at me. Later on I figured he had fired at my chest the moment I had swung to throw the grenade, and hit the arm instead of the chest. So I reached down and I just—didn't like him looking at me—so I reached down and grabbed the M-79, pointed at him and fired—caught him in the chest. And he ended up doing cart-wheels down the side of the hill. So I put my arm in my jacket, and I kept firing the M-79 single-handed, because that's all I could do anymore. And then four grenades came in on us. I looked up, and there's four ChiCom grenades arcing through the air. The thing that hit me is: They definitely know where I am. So I yelled at Scanlon, for some stupid reason, to lay flat. And I flattened out. And one went over my head and exploded, and one landed by my feet, which I kicked away. The third one I don't know about, and the fourth one landed on the other side of the fence.

Stubbe: Where Scanlon was.

Ernst: That's what I—. It sounded a little muffled. I'm the one who reported the muffled grenade. Cause the guys on the top of the hill by this time thought we were both dead. Because there hadn't been any real activity down there. So—

Stubbe: Now were they hit at all?

Ernst: No

Stubbe: The North Vietnamese probably didn't know they were there, probably.

Ernst: O, yeah; they were firing on them. And here you got that Bessent and Willson were wounded [referring to the book]. Doc Feyh was also wounded. He was manning the machinegun and got shot in the arm. And when the four grenades went off—and I didin't think anything of the funny sound. I said: They got me pinned; they know where I am. I can't do any fighting with one arm. So I jumped over and reached over the fence real quick and grabbed Scanlon and jerked him up. And as I jerked up, it felt like he grabbed my arms and squeezed my arm. And I looked down, and there's a big bone—the bullet hit the bone and blew out three inches of the arm. And I looked at him, and his chest was blown open, and blood all over him—which it hadn't been just a couple of minutes earlier.

Stubbe: From a burst of fire?

Ernst: I assume that was from the grenade that landed over there. So I just dropped him and I took off to the top of the hill.

Stubbe: So you had both arms out—

Ernst: Yes. Both were broken. I got to the top of the hill and just dove over the fence. And I landed at Doc Feyh's feet. And I spent the rest of the fire-fight laying there. We had air support in immediately, no artillery. We heard the choppers with the SPARROWHAWK coming, land beneath us, and we heard them fighting their way up to us. I could hear their voices shouting.

Stubbe: Yeah, infantry is noisy!

Ernst: And they got close, and fire was suppressed. And Willson had taken his sox, his spare sox—he made into a battle dressing. He tied those together and put them around his forehead—he was hit in the forehead with shrapnel. And I remember him bleeding and just tying the sox around his head to keep the blood out of his eyes. So, he told me and Doc Feyh to take the first chopper to get in. So we got up and we ran toward the chopper. That's when I got the leg—

Stubbe: The chopper landed—

Ernst: It couldn't set down because of the tree stumps. So we ran down there. And I didn't know about it until later, but I got hit in the leg while running to the chopper. We got to the chopper. And it was a CH-34. The step was right at my eyes [level]. All of a sudden I remembered I didn't have any arms [that worked]. So Doc Feyh—we're getting potted at—he kneels down—he's holding his bad arm. He wraps his good arm around my knees and lifts me into the chopper, and the Crew Chief finished pulling me in. The Crew Chief was white [with fright]—I don't know if it was his first hot mission or what. But he was as terrified—Doc's down there splattered with blood. The chopper got hit a couple of times and then pulled out. And I didn't know until they got—. Then they flew me down to Dong Ha. They cut off my uniform and told me I had been shot three times and had six pieces of shrapnel in me.

Stubbe: Then did Willson and the rest of them leave and the infantry just—

Ernst: The infantry got there within 10 to 15 minutes of my being evaced. They tried to drag Scanlon's body all during the firefight. It lasted about two hours. And—we had a tug-of-war with them. Bessent grabbed ahold of his harnass and they had ahold of his feet—.

Stubbe: "Them" meaning the NVA?

Ernst: The NVA! And Bessent's out there having a tug-of-war with Scanlon's body in the center. And they let go of the body and Bessent dragged it far enough back to our perimeter that we could keep an eye on him, because they took it out on the chopper with them.

Stubbe: What happened to Willson?

Ernst: He got commissioned in late '67, cause I went over to Camp LeJeune when he got commissioned and went out and partied. And then he was killed in a helicopter training exercise.

Stubbe: You were out for—

Ernst: I was in the hospital for ten months, and then in recuperation for another six. ... When I was in the hospital, the only people I saw was Lieutenant Capers—who came down to get the story, and this Major from G-2—"Don't say where you were." I was wondering: Does he mean Vietnam? Southeast Asia? How specific does he want me to be? And I spent 60 days out on narcotics, and they got me back. There were four major surgeries altogether, repairing my hip and my arms. It was funny: when I got shot in the elbow, I thought somebody had kicked me. The second time, in the left arm, I thought Scanlon had grabbed my arm and squeezed it. And when I got hit in the side of the thigh, I thought that was a muscle cramp. I had a big piece of shrapnel take off part of my hip, and I thought my weapons belt was pinching. It took a big chunk of bone out of the hip bone.

That about covers it. It says here [in the book, Valley of Decision] I threw a grenade and it was a dud: I didn't throw it; it was shot out of my hands. And Scanlon didn't shout a warning to us! A warning to them! He sprayed part of that magazine; that's all he sprayed. Then reloading he killed two more.

Stubbe: How was Capers when he visited? Besides getting information, he must of been devastated: he once told me that Scanlon had been his barber and like a son to him.

Ernst: O, he was upset! He was on the verge of crying; I was too. The one thing—he had somebody with him that I did not recognize. But there was a wounded Marine who was next to me who was weakly calling for a Corpsman. And the Corpsmen would ignore him for some reason. And Capers had just made Lieutenant. And all of a sudden he exploded, yelling: Get over and take care of this wounded Marine, now! And I was on Demerol and my memory's a little bit hazy on it, but I think the Marine that was with him restrained him to make sure he didn't punch out the corpsman.

Stubbe: He really cared for his people.

Ernst: Yeah, that was one of the big things. For years I've been trying to figure out what that man's got and how I can get it. I was Police Chief, and I wish I had his leadership ability. There wasn't a man in the platoon that wouldn't have died for him. We were asked to do alot of stupid things, but if it came from Capers and we knew that's the story, we did it. You knew he cared. If you had a problem, it was his problem. Nobody messed with you; you were his people. It was just his personality...He was my Troop Handler when I was in ITR, so he and I go back when I was right out of bootcamp. Then I spent a year in the infantry and two years on sea duty, and then I volunteered for Force Recon....

I got out of the hospital after ten months. Had a good CO down there in Key West, and gave me all the time I wanted to recuperate. then I reenlisted—the Marine Corps tried to say fradulently: instead of going to the hospital for my reenlistment physical I went to the Navy Base, to the Sickbay, told them my medical records had been lost. So, if you don't tell the doctor, he's not going to find it, and reenlisted, and went on embassy duty. While on embassy duty I was put up for commission. All the paperwork went through and they needed a physical. So I went to the Air Force—I was in Norway—took a physical, passed, no problem. But I didn't know that they pulled your whole record and sent it to the commissioning board. So about two weeks later I got orders—I had orders to Quantico—I got new ones to report to Naval Air Station, Jacksonville Naval Air Station for medical evaluation. The doctor said: You might as well retire or give me a [medical] profile. I was a Staff Sergeant by this time. A profile meant no sea or combat duty. And I said: I can't spend another 12 years in the Marine Corps, watch my battalion go off, and every time we go to war, so I got out.

The doctor's give me only about a year or so [to live] so I wanted to tell someone the story. I have a brain lesion, and I'm loosing everything over to the right. I can't feel my arm or leg and the side of my face no more, and the more it tears—it's just tearing a few thousandths at a time. I've told Capers about two weeks ago. I've seen four different doctors. My kidneys are failing on top of it, and they wouldn't recommend me for a transplant because I probably won't live long enough. So Capers is on his horse and charging off to do battle with the VA doctors—to get a new brain stem!

[MGySgt Tom Nicholson recalls: When Scanlon went to SCUBA school he was almost dwarfed by the air tanks. A red-haired kid, short and stocky, Mike was a high-school wrestling champion. Very mild-mannered, nearly timid, but extremely strong physically and with alot of energy. He was the victim of many practical jokes.

Mike Scanlon was recommended for a Silver Star Medal. His citation reads that as he started firing, approximately 20 additional enemy joined the first group on the Marine's left flank, laying down a base of fire and attempting to envelope the Marine patrol. Cpl Scanlon charged the enemy, killing two immediately and, changing magazines, killed or wounded two more on his second burst of fire as he held off the enemy troops at less than 15 meters. Outnumbered considerably, he valiantly held off the enemy as the Marines maneuvered to their defensive perimeter, although hit twice, once in the leg and once in the shoulder.

From all the blood plus a large hole, Sergeant Willson believed Corporal Scanlon had jumped on the grenade that caused the "muffled explosion" or pulled it under him to keep the other Marines from harm.

It was said that Sgt Willson had always anguished over a fear that it was his grenade that killed Scanlon, thinking he may have blown Scanlon away during the exchange of grenade tossings during those frenzied battle moments. This was in spite of others who were on the patrol convinced it was an enemy grenade.]

Courage

By Betty Anderson, 1989

There is a courage
A courage to live unafraid, tho tormented,
Counting coup on my last enemy, death..
Tearfully free from the bonds of others.
A leaping forward into the melee of struggle,
Undaunted
Rearing with the knowledge of pre-ordained hope!
I have come
I have waged battle and loved Fiercely,
Silently keeping vigil with Jehovah.
I live—yet, I die
I weep, yet rejoice.
It is all gloriously terrible.

[From a letter from David Anderson: "I'm sending my mother's poem...She wrote this out of her love for me, to try to explain what she see's happening to me with my struggles against the PTSD that is so much a part of my life."]

Three Poems

By
Talis Kaminskis

When the light that one turns to for help
Is actually darkness of a different tint
What recourse can an anguished cry Resort to find the peace it so desperately
Left buried on a distant shore
In a distant time that never has aged Controlling so completely that life is a fleeting
Glimpse of reality spread sparingly
For a cause beyond comprehension of a Mind that has never departed from
The spawning grounds of eternal despair
All for the purpose of a forgotten
Task laid before those whose youth
Would not permit the maturity needed
To preserve life as it once was and Never will be again for those chosen
To fulfill that chore that could not be FULFILLED.

*

Hush, hush
Quiet time is near Sound
so alive and vibrant today
Has fled
Leaving the field to one you will not hear
Without noise
It has come
Already it's leaving Silent journey Passing through time Eternal Sparing
Not one

*

Oh if the sky would only bring a traveling cloud to me
I'd dream, I'd fly, I'd soar
No place be safe from my approach
I'd find, I'd see, I'd know
The sea would wash my traveling feet
I'd sink, I'd rest, I'd sail
To depths of earth that few men see
I'd stop, I'd climb, I'd find
My heart would beat a million times
I'd feel, I'd give, I'd bind Till ends of times would swallow my way
I'd hasten, I'd speed, I'd go
But in the end it still be thus
I'd freed, I'd need, I'd heed
The epitaph of the final trip
I'd hide, I'd go, I'd keep.

Three Movements

Garden so lush, body so young
Beauty and joy, people all one Exuberant living, extravagant blessing
Intimate sharing, infinite caring
Enchanted place where spirits grew Primeval peace here is all we knew
Tigers, pythons, ocelots, rats
Elephants, centipedes, deer and cats
Playfulness, simpleness, innocence, unity
Breadfruits and fish and bananas on tree
A magical glen, mystical delight
A mythical realm in night and in light.

Night and fog and jungle shrouding
High above hearing, not knowing, not seeing Suddenly moonscape and red dust now lay
All life expunged, day after day
Flick of the switch: destruction unleashed Wreckage now wreaked, Hell's scenery peeked
Pieces of body: an eye, leg, or brain Redness of blood sprayed, effusion as rain
No food and no water, no light in the night
No future to plan for, no tears, no more fright
Constant sound of incoming round Animal and plant no longer are found.

Cast from Eden the fruit now eaten Knowledge gained that can't be unlearned.
Good and evil by high powers of ten Kept from reentry by sword of flames turned
Burnt by flames to dust brought low Sliced by sword from weal and from woe
Tree of life eternal and healing
Food for all from battle still reeling Together forever, forever made whole Cleansed into humus, humanity's goal. (28May96)

Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

Issue No. 40 (Fall, 1997)

Published three times a year by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a non-profit incorporation registered in the State of Wisconsin 01 Sept 1988, and tax-exempt under Internal Revenue Code Section 501(c)(19), veterans organization, by IRS letter of 10 Feb 1989, consisting of all who lived or served in the Khe Sanh battlefield area. Purposes of the organization are: To promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of Khe Sanh; To locate and account for all who so served; To promote preservation of an accurate historical account of such service; To preserve the memory of those who died there; To promote research and understanding and healing with a regard to those who served there; and To promote artistic expression of the Khe Sanh experience. Explanation of Logo: The 9-sided polygon suggests the multi-service, multi-year service at Khe Sanh; The "V" suggests Veteran, Vietnam, Victory, valor (as in the small "V" in medals and ribbons for heroic action) and the blue "V" on all 26 Marine supplies since 26th Marines is a historic part of the Fifth Marine Division; the sharp "KS" suggests the rugged, sharp, and painful Khe Sanh hills, and the twisted paths of the Khe Sanh experience then and since. "Red Clay" refers to the red ground of Khe Sanh, the result of weathered rock from an extinct volcano which formed the area of Khe Sanh Combat base in heat and violence, penetrating our skin to our souls.

Ken Pipes (former Commanding Officer) and Mike O'Hara, both from BRAVO, 1/26, placing wreath and saluting the mass grave of unidentified remains of eight Marines from the patrol of B/1/26 on 25 Feb 1968. Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery, 12 July 1997, during Khe Sanh Reunion, St. Louis, Mo.

AFTER ACTION REPORT: ST. LOUIS

When it was all over, "Doc" Jim Armbrust [C-Med corpsman] was telling others: "This is the best thing that's happened to me in thirty years. I've slept better than I have in the last thirty years. I had forgotten what a secure feeling it is to be surrounded by Marines, that somebody else is on watch. I'm just amazed that we can all get together in a camaraderie that we haven't had since Khe Sanh. This is the best therapy in the world. It's like we're one big family. It isn't a Khe Sanh reunion as much as it is a family reunion. There's not one person here that wouldn't sacrifice his life for you. There's a lot of love at this reunion."

Mr. Paul Schramm, a former law professor at Harvard University—a kindly, old gentleman—sat down in a small room to brief our leadership on our By-Laws and said: "I've never been around a group of people who have had visited upon them what each and every one of you have had visited upon you at Khe Sanh and in other parts of Vietnam. I have a deep respect for each and every one of you, and I tell you that it's an honor and privilege to be in your midst—and I really mean that." When he concluded his presentation, and as he was walking out, there were tears in his eyes.

The Gathering

Some arrived with great difficulty or at great expense. Charlie Huber (H&S/2/26, 81s) recently underwent a heart and lung transplant operation. Glen Rappold (B/1/13) recently had a quadruple heart bypass operation. Bill Fry flew in from Taihiti for the second year in a row. Tom Winston, (Ammo Plt), ravaged by the fatal Huntington's Disorder and barely able to speak anymore, beamed as he met with old friends. Charles Berg (FOB-3) didn't let the fact that he has only one leg—as a result of an explosion during the Siege—bother him.

There were Khe Sanh vets from almost every facet of service and MOS: Wayne Magee and Don Cleveland from the Air Force, Lewis Messer from the Navy Seabees, Marion Sturkey—a helicopter pilot from the '67 Hill Battles, Navy Corpsmen (Jim Armbrust, Dan Polland, Bob Topmiller), Army (the advisor to the 37th ARVN Ranger BN, Walter Gunn; the 175mm liaison officer who was on the Khe Sanh base during the Siege, Mark Swearengen; soldiers from SOG—Charles Berg, Ron Miller, David "Bulldog" Smith, Grenville Sutcliffe, and one from the 1971 LamSom-719 operation, Barry Buckley, who was in awe at the presence of what he had learned to be a "legend" in the Army, "Bulldog" Smith); there were 9 Marines from the ONTOS unit and 7 from the Ammo Dump section; there were men from Comm, from recon and Force Recon, from CAC OSCAR, and, of course, the infantry. There were three who were family of Khe Sanh brothers who no longer are with us (Nita Brown, daughter of SgtMaj Donald Bean; Patty Metts, wife of Andy Metts who passed away last November; and Bill Robles, brother of LCPL Joe Robles). There were former Commanding Officers: Earle Breeding (E/2/26), Ken Pipes (B/1/26), Mac Radcliffe (A/1/9), "Bulldog" Smith (FOB-3), and, for his first appearance at a Khe Sanh reunion, Colonel David E. Lownds. There were Marines from the '67 Hill Fights (Tom Rice, H.L. Brasher, John P. Colvis).

However, as several observed, former unit identification did not result in cliques. What we had in common as veterans of Khe Sanh broke down all barriers of service branch and unit and MOS, officer and enlisted, as those there sat together, hugged, laughed, shared their stories and scrapebooks, and realized once again our common brotherhood.

There were 46 first-time attendees out of a total 161 (121 of which were Khe Sanh vets, 3 were family of Khe Sanh vets who have died, and 37 family and friends).

What we had in common as veterans of Khe Sanh broke down all barriers of service branch and unit and MOS, officer and enlisted, as those there sat together, hugged, laughed, shared their stories and scrapebooks and realized once again our common brotherhood.

An active duty Marine, 20 years old, lean and short hair cut, PFC Adam Wade, was on his way to El Toro to his new duty station when he spotted our Khe Sanh PX van in the parking lot. He decided to stop and see who these men from Khe Sanh were, having learned in his training about Khe Sanh. He arrived in the early morning and was immediately "adopted" by everyone there. He was given a Khe Sanh T-shirt, beers, and shown scrapebooks, talked with Colonel Lownds and many dozens of other Khe Sanh veterans, and was still in the Hospitality Room enjoying our fellowship as of 10:30 in the evening—which is 2230, for those whose mind is still operating on a military program.

The Place

The Best Western West Port Park, where we met 9-13 July 1997, made everyone feel at home. A large sky-light atrium room provided an informal place to sit down and relax, either as a group or individually. A PX room, managed by Terry Wilson [1/3], managed to sell all of its reunion T-shirts along with other Khe Sanh materials. The hospitality room walls were covered with historic flags and penants—the last US flag flown at Khe Sanh, the Chicago City flag from 881-S, a Canadian flag signed by members of one of the past Khe Sanh reunions, unit guidons donated by Cynthia Soto, and a US flag sent by US Senator Max Clelland who lost his legs 8 Apr '68 during Operation Pegasus at Khe Sanh. Tables were filled with scrapebooks and memorabilia, and two tubs were kept well stocked with beer and sodas—gifts to us—along with snacks and other eats and coffee, all maintained through the effortts of Russell Turner and Gary Vonderheide. The hospitality room became a place where some showed their slides, some shared their clippings and photos, and many just sat and talked with each other in groups of 2, 3, 4, to share stories of what was then or what is now. Glen Prentice showed photos of a recent trip back to Khe Sanh with his wife in which they climbed around Hills 881 and 861 by themselves. They didn't meet any NVA—just two cobras!

As the reunion progressed, it was apparent that nothing negative could spoil our party; things that started out causing much concern were soon transformed by love and camaraderie, hugs and good will, swallowed up and dissolved or made better.

One of our members who attended eight of the previous nine reunions, Ken Penn, our former President, was unable to attend. The day the reunion began, he had a stroke and was hospitalized. During the few days of the reunion, Ken was in our prayers, and made a rapid and remarkable recovery, regaining most of his mobility.

During the reunion, Tom Winston received word that Ross Perot would pay the expenses of an experimental brain surgery to cure his Huntington's. Tom and all his friends were ecstatic. This meant that not only would he be given a chance to live, but also that others with Huntington's might have hope, including Tom's son, who already shows signs of the dreaded disease.

The Pilgrimmage

Four bus loads departed the hotel to make a pilgrimmage to the nearby Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery. It is at this old—and large—national cemetery that many mass graves of unidentifiable remains have been buried, many from World War II plane crashes or POW mass deaths. For Khe Sanh vets, two such graves became the focus of our concern: one held remains from the patrol from B/1/26 on 25 Feb '68; the other, remains from the C-130K crash of 6 Mar '68.

As the buses proceeded on an interstate entrance, Tom McIntyre [81s, 1/26] stood at attention beside his motorcycle alongside the road, saluting those in the busses.

We were fortunate to have Mr. Bill Jayne with us. Bill, a veteran of B/1/26, is currently the head of the VA's State Cemetery Grants Service of the National Cemetery System in Washington, DC, and gave us a brief of the mass graves which we were to visit.

Chaplain Ray W. Stubbe led a memorial service of prayers and a devotion based on Ezekiel's vision of the valley of dry bones [Ezek 37:1-14], relating this vision to the body parts and pieces at Khe Sanh, the fragmentation of hopes and dreams and future, the broken relationships of family and friends, and the healing that comes from God being with us in the valleys of the shadows of death, the sheer gift of calling to all the bones regardless of worth or status, the ever-present means of healing through the four winds, and the coming together into wholeness of individuals and the entire group.

After reading the names of those buried in the two mass graves, other present were welcomed to speak from their heart. Many (who later said they wanted to) were too choked with emotion to speak. There were sights of tears and sounds of sniffling in the small, modern chapel where every seat was taken and men stood along the walls. It was a profound moment.

"William Terrell was, like many of those young men up there, a fine young Marine," noted John Kaheny. "I wouldn't be here today if it hadn't been for him and another Marine from Third Platoon, Alfa Company, 1/26, by the name of Vickers, who was also on that plane ride. They were both incredibly fine people. And on a certain date in May of 1967, they saved my life, and I'll never forget it."

Ernie Husted [B/3dRecon] recalled "..listening on the radio transmission the day the platoon got in trouble and was later killed. And being in recon I was listening to this transmission and thinking how many times we had felt like that. I listened to the radio transmissions until there were not any more that day, and I felt so helpless.."

"..if you don't think a commander suffers when he loses people, you're sadly mistaken, because it goes deeply into your heart. It never leaves."—Colonel Lownds

---

Colonel David Lownds walked to the lecturn and said: "I speak for no individual. As a Commanding Officer, I speak for those who have no one to speak for them today. I want you to know—that although I don't know any of them personally—I may have patted them on the back, I may have shouted at them—but they were my brother, and they will always live within my heart, regardless of their name. And if you don't think a commander suffers when he looses people, you're sadly mistaken, because it goes deeply into your heart. It never leaves. The loss of one, single individual is more than enough. When it gets into a hundred, that's almost unbelievable. There are battles where thousands are lost; I can't imagine what the commanders of the units must have felt. So I speak for all the brothers who died, and I know that they are in all our prayers."

One after another spoke—Tom Winston, Wayne Magee, a man from the ammo dump. Someone spoke for a civilian who was on the 6 Mar plane crash and who had a connection to the patrol of 25 Feb, Robert Ellison: "Robert was the one who did the cover photo on the March 18th, 1968, issue of Newsweek of the ammo explosion, "The Agony of Khe Sanh." Robert had been a photographer in the Civil Rights marches with Martin Luther King, and his photographs appeared in Life magazine. He had done all the photos in the Newsweek issue on Khe Sanh that I'm sure all of you have seen. His mother, Miriam Eaton, says that she was told he lived in the lines with BRAVO Company, 1/26 and became real close to the Marines there. He took all those photographs from the 25th of February patrol, and he went to Saigon to his bosses who told him they were good photos and to take some time off. But, he said, my brothers, my friends, are still up there; I'm not leaving Khe Sanh until they do. So he went back to Khe Sanh. He was heading back to Khe Sanh—on that plane—that crashed. Being a civilian, he's not on the wall in DC, but he is one of us.

But, he said, my brothers, my friends, are still up there, and I'm not leaving Khe Sanh until they do. So he went back to Khe Sanh. He was heading back to Khe Sanh—on that plane—that crashed. Being a civilian, he's not on the wall in DC, but he is one of us.

The day was bright and sunny as the busses moved from the small chapel through areas of land blanketed with small white crosses and arrived at the two mass graves. After all moved around to pay their respects, Ken Pipes [CO of B/1/26] and Mike O'Hara [B/1/26] placed a wreath at the graves. Everyone moved onto the busses which departed and next arrived at the home of Glen Rappold (B/1/13) who had built a Vietnam Memorial in his backyard [See article on him in issue No. 37, Khe Sanh Veteran, pp. 22-23]. By now tears in the chapel had washed away a great burden for many, and what could have become a "downer" became transformed into a renewed community of brothers caring for one another.

The Hill Fights
By
John P. Colvis

What day is this?
A yesterday that doesn't go away!
A day of honor and deep sorrow dipped in blood to bond us all together.
A day whose sights and sounds and odors grabbed our souls and won't let go.
Who amongst us would not lay down his life for his friend?
Or go through hell to save one of our own?
Indeed, we've been there.
This is who we are.
Our covenant was written and sealed in blood on and around the hills of Khe Sanh.
Was it 30 years ago?
Today we live our lives—to each his own.
But on this ground we all agree:
Our hearts will not forget what took place at Khe Sanh.

The evening of 12 July was the time for our dinner together. Colors were posted by a multi-service Color Guard (to represent the multi-service composition of our group). Mrs. Pat D'Hondt, wife of the Gunny of A/1/9, shared a letter she had received and said, "Two weeks ago we received a telephone call in the afternoon from a gentleman who went on to explain that he is married to a lady whose father was killed in Khe Sanh...The reason I want to share this letter with you tonight is to encourage all of you—if you come across sons and daughters [of Khe Sanh KIAs], open your hearts and your homes. These loved ones of ours need healing..if you have an opportunity to meet the young people, remember they're your children." She then read the letter that had been addressed to the Gunny: "Dear Camille. Hello. It's been a wonderful feeling with me ever since I talked with you. I've waited for a very long time to find someone who knew and remembered our dad...We are all so happy. You can both write to me and tell me anything; we all would love to know more about our dad. We want to keep in touch with you always. I am very happy to know now I have two new members to my family...When you see Henry

When 2/26 officers and staff arrived at Khe Sanh and were briefed in the regimental CP bunker, Col Lownds suddenly turned to Breeding and said, "We will hold, won't we, Captain Breeding," much to everyone else's wonderment.

[MAC] Radcliffe, give him my address and phone number and have him contact me. It would be wonderful to hear from him...Love, Anna Marie Turner Leahy, First Sergeant Robert Turner's daughter."

A message from General Ray Davis was read: "Greetings to all you heroes from the battle for Khe Sanh. I am convinced from my visits with many of you while there that you endured one of the most serious challenges of the Vietnam War. And I heard not one concern or doubt that you would prevail. Your staunch, heroic defense inspired warriors everywhere. I was proud to observe your gallant actions and to know that you were a key part of our 3d Marine Division effort. Congratulations! Have a good reunion! Semper Fi!"

The staff of the hotel and the local Chamber of Commerce were recognized for their part in making this reunion so successful—Jackie McCormack and Leon.

Col HJM "Mac" Radcliffe (CO, A/1/9) brought up the other Company Commanders present—Earle Breeding and Ken Pipes—and made some introductory remarks about Colonel Lownds: "I remember on the 8th of February—I was going to say something today at Jefferson Barracks, and I just couldn't do it—I took a helluva hit—as did my fellow Company Commanders here. I lost 50 some Marines that day, about 30% of my Company...When Colonel Lownds made his comments today about what it means to loose one Marine, how it hurts—you can't show that when you're in command because you think you have to stand tall and not waver, and not be brushed aside by the horror of combat. You need to lead by example. Let me tell you something nobody has ever heard. After Alfa got hit, two days later, after we reconstituted and tried to rebuild the Company, coming into my perimeter is some unknown individual with a radio operator. I told my troops: Nobody gets into the Company perimeter I don't know about it. They called down and they said, We got somebody coming into your area. I said, Stop him! We had a lot of press people and others coming in. I said, Who is it? They said, I don't know who he is, Sir. They said, He has a moustache and a cigar and has his radio operator with him. Well, I knew right away that was Colonel Lownds. He looked at me and he said, How you doing, Captain? I said, Fine, Colonel. He said, No. He pulled me aside away from the radio operator, and he said, Mac, how you doing? And I said, I'm hanging in there. And he said, I know you will. And he gave me a cigar.

Just that touch, folks, just that touch. I knew what I'd known before, but reinforced the fact that we had a caring, concerned, intelligent, super Regimental Commander, who knew what the hell it was to 'take it,' 'take it,' 'take it,' and bounce back to be a Marine. Colonel, God bless you!"

"Your courage, your determination, your fortitude, your obedience—everything about you, is outstanding. I think I could stand up here for a week and I could never tell you what you have meant to me."

Colonel Lownds:

"You know how to bring a grown man to tears, that's for sure. I've known these three men for many years now. They're all outstanding figures as everyone else in the Regiment is, as far as I'm concerned.... Your courage, your determination, your fortitude, your obedience—everything about you, is outstanding. I think I could stand up here for a week and I could never tell you what you have meant to me.

"You're a band of brothers. Well, in my case, I guess you'd say, A band of sons. I don't know that people ever really realize that if you're in command of a group of Marines, not necessarily in combat, when you go home at night, they really all sit down at the table with you. I mean, you can't take them out of your mind. You're always thinking of them... You take those people home with you at night. They're yours and you love them."

Colonel Lownds then told of some incidents before and during the Siege, reflecting on the life and the humanity of the people that were there.

"My sister, Pat, when she was a youngster—my dad served in World War I in the Army. At Christmas time he'd always tell the story—or used to start telling the story, and say, Pat, did I ever tell you about the guy in the Army that I served with? And she'd say, Dad, don't do it. And he'd say, Well, let me tell you this; I'll tell you once more, Pat. He said: The mail call'd come and they'd call out the names—Lownds, here; Majorsky, here; Smith, here; Jones, here. And this poor old Corporal or PFC, with tears in his eyes, would say, No mail for me? He'd say, No. My sister—well, that was the end. She broke up.

"Well, just to show you how things come around—probably none of you know this, or maybe the gentleman's in the room today. I went out on Christmas Day and was walking the lines and I come beside this Marine who was sitting beside the road, crying. I asked him what was the matter? What is the matter, son? He said, Colonel, I just got here a few days ago, been in country now for about a month, and I haven't got any mail. And I said, Where have you been? He said, They keep transferring me.

"Well, right away, tears came to my eyes, because I knew what in the hell he was talking about because I had watched my sister cry many Christmasses. So I went back to the CP and said, I don't care what happens, I don't care if you move heaven and earth, this man gets mail today! Not tomorrow, today! They came back, Bad weather for helicopters. I said, I don't care whether the helicopters are flying or not flying, bring it up by carrier pigeon. [They said], Well, they can't find it. [I said], Find it! Find it! Or I'm going to see the General.

"And eventually the young man got his mail. The story has always stuck with me...

"I said I'd had about enough. I want something. How about you patch me through to the President."

"I don't know whether it's true or not, so I'm not going to state it unequivocably, but I'd have to guess that you people in this room came the closest to B-52 strikes as anybody. The JCS at the time of Vietnam had a restriction that said you can't come within a thousand meters of the troops [Note: a little over half a mile]. And that didn't quite satisfy me because I knew—or thought I knew—I guess I did, as it turns out—where their jump-off point would be. So I went to General Tompkins and said, I want a B-52 strike. He said, Well, they're already in the air. I said, I don't care. I had talked to the Air Force people to make sure that, Number One, they were accurate within 250 meters, and Number Two, that they could change it in the air. And he said, I'm sorry, Dave, I can't do it. He said, You're welcome to talk to General Westmoreland. He had a helluva Marine General down there [in Westmoreland's staff]. I don't know whether any of you ever served with him or knew him—John Chaisson. He was kind of the "3," the operations guy and a helluva officer, a Harvard graduate, intelligent as they come—rough as they come. I don't know it to be true, I understand that somebody gave him a bunch of sass at school when they were going to junior school, and he laid him out low, and kept his promotion down one year. And John said, I'll talk to General Westmoreland again. I said, I'd had about enough. I want something. How about you patch me through to the President. Oh! That shook them! So, to make a long story a little shorter, they finally said, OK, we'll change it; we'll put it where you want them. So I told them: 250 yards in front of the front lines by the early dawn. "Oh! Can't do it!" Said, How 'bout 500. I said, No, I want them 250. Said, We gotta go back to Washington. So they went back to Washington and Washington eventually gav e us permission, so we got our B-52 strike. Incidentally, I'm told that that B-52 strike wiped out two battalions or the better part of a regiment..."

Col Lownds then mentioned some stories about the Bru. [Note: Col Lownds had been known to walk the area around Khe Sanh by himself or with a radioman or one or two others on a frequent basis before the Siege. He gained much awareness of possible assembly points, places for strongpoints, mortar sites, etc., so that when the Siege began, he had a very good feel for the land. During this time, his S-4 (later CO, 1/26), Fred McEwan, relates how the two of them swam across the Rao Quan River by themselves one day to determine crossing points. Bill Craig from the Army Special Forces at Lang Vei once remarked how critical they had been of what they regarded as wreckless walking that the Colonel did. During the Siege, Colonel Lownds was frequently walking the Combat Base. Tom Buono [S-4 Regimental Supply] was the Colonel's driver when the Siege began and relates: "The morning the Siege started, Colonel Lownds was out and I had a hard time keeping up with him. We had mortars walking up main street right in front of Regimental Headquarters at about nine in the morning, and we had two guys hit. And he went out after them, and I followed him. The mortars were still walking towards us. And he grabbed one guy, and the other guy was limping towards him, and the other guy made it around the side of regimental headquarters along the wall. And the last of the mortars hit. Luckily it stopped about five or six feet short of the edge of that wall, or else we would all have been fragmented that day. He was out moving around the base very, very quickly that morning and all the rest of that day. And the following two weeks that I was driving, he was out and about. As a matter of fact, we were dodging sniper fire on the west perimeter of the base to check on the Forward Observers that were out there, so at one point we just abandoned the jeep; we crawled from bunker to bunker. At that time he had a handlebar moustache." George Myrick (D/1/26, and at his first Khe Sanh reunion) related how Lownds was visiting the "D" Company bunkers one day and the men were getting raggedy. He told them to get clothes where they could. A day or so later, he again visited their area, walking around. One of the Marines was wearing one of his shirts; it had his name on it! He had stolen it from a clothes line near the regimental CP. The Colonel saw it, but said nothing—at the time. Returning, he simply said, "You didn't take my sox, too, did you?" and walked away.

During his frequent walks through the area before the Siege, he came to know the Bru people, and like all who came in contact with them, felt deeply for them. There is official message traffic that relates how disturbed he was when the I Corps Commander, General Lam, permitted the 1200 Vietnamese in Khe Sanh Village to depart when the Siege began—on aircraft that had delivered many tons of ammo, but refused to permit the Bru to leave the area, saying "There's no place in Vietnam for them," voicing the racism between Vietnamese and Montagnards. So they were forced to stay. Neither could he permit them inside the perimeter—for several reasons: he couldn't provide shelter for them or food (we were frequently down to one C-ration a day ourselves, and without water for several days at a time) and it would have made for an insecure situation. Lang Vei had been attacked during the Battle of the Hills on 4 May when four Vietnamese, who posed as CIDG recruits but were actually NVA, and who knifed the sentries on duty, permitting a larger force to enter and kill the CO and XO. Captain Willoughby, CO of the Special Forces at the new Lang Vei camp, constructed in November-December, 1967, boasted how the new camp could take a regiment, and that there were no indigenous within the inner perimeter, only Americans. This explains why the Vietnamese and Bru from Khe Sanh Village were not allowed in the Combat Base perimeter, why the 37th ARVN Ranger Bn lines were a separate perimeter in front of our own lines, and why we had machineguns and perimeter facing in to the FOB-3 compound; in case the 15,000 NVA made a "human wave" attack and put the local Bru in front of them as a "human shield" the question always was: would the Bru fire on their own people?

It must have therefore been a most agonizing and heart-wrenching decision for Colonel Lownds to keep the Bru he had come to love so deeply and respect so profoundly, outside our wires.]

Col Lownds:

"I think that one thing that really impressed me: took the driver and the radio and went back in the hills to a village—a little boy standing there, naked, and he couldn't speak any English and I couldn't speak any Bru. But he held up something. Now this was way back in the woods. He held it up. And as you know there's plenty of clay there. He made himself a clay helicopter to proportion. And he had even gone on to the point of having the machineguns come out of the helicopter at the right spots. I got a picture at home. It's always impressed me that people say they were dumb. They're not dumb, they just never had the chance to have an education...

"There was an old man—and everybody knows my cigar; I got one right here...Way back, I had taken a box of cigars and gave them to the S-1 and said, Put these cigars so when I run out, I got a box to fall back on. We got a bunch of incoming. I was out of cigars. I needed a cigar to relax my nerves a little bit, so I said, Send me the '1'. The '1' didn't come in because, unfortunately he had been killed by that blast. But the Top Secret Clerk said, Your cigars were in the Top Secret safe, Colonel, and I hate to tell you this, but that blast took the Top Secret material out and took your cigars out. So I didn't have any cigars. Well, the people in the hills—on 881, if I'm not mistaken, sent me down a box.

"It had been my habit, when I went down to Khe Sanh Village—there was an old Bru man—he must have been 70, 80, and he would be sitting on the front porch, and we'd stop the jeep, go in and light up a couple of cigars. We'd sit down. I'd give him one, I'd have one, and we'd smoke together. I got an awful lot of information from him. He couldn't speak any English and I couldn't speak any Bru, but he had ways of transmitting stuff to me and he was really a big help. He was a grand old guy, and I always wonder what happened to him—I coud never find out. ..

As Colonel Lownds returned to his table, with the assembly standing and applauding, someone began "He's a Jolly Good Fellow," and the thunderous singing continued. "T-Bone" Jones won the 50/50 raffle and donated the $186.00 he won back to our organization.

THE NATIONAL CEMETERY SYSTEM

By William Jayne

In the midst of the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln, on July 17, 1862, signed legislation which authorized the creation of national cemeteries "..for the soldiers who shall die in the service of the country." During the course of that year, fourteen national cemeteries were established including battlefield cemeteries such as Antietam in Sharpsburg, Md., and several near troop concentration points in the north like Cypress Hills National Cemetery in Brooklyn, NY.

Today, more than two million Americans are buried in 130 national cemeteries in 39 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. They are the military veterans of every war and conflict in American history, from the Revolutionary War to the very latest times. Some veterans who served before the Civil War are buried in the National Cemetery System because some Army cemeteries that had been in use before the Civil War were later made part of the National Cemetery System. Two veterans of the Revolutionary War, for example, are buried at Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery in St. Louis, MO.

The spouses and children of veterans are also buried in the national cemeteries. The infant son of Colonel Zebulon Pike, the explorer of the Rocky Mountains, is buried at Jefferson Barracks...

I've worked for the VA since 1984 and for NCS since 1990. For six years I had the challenging task of public affairs officer of NCS. The primary mission was to communicate a sense of the historical and cultural significance of the system and to inform veterans and their families of their entitlement to burial benefits through NCS.

Who May be Buried in National Cemeteries

Members of the Armed Forces who die on active duty and most veterans of active duty service in the Armed Forces are eligible for burial in a national cemetery. In addition, the spouse or dependent child of an eligible veteran or armed forces member may also be buried in a national cemetery. There are some additional restrictions on eligibility for burial in Arlington National Cemetery [which is administered by the Army].

VA also provides headstones and markers for the unmarked graves of veterans throughout the world, regardless of whether they are buried in a private cemetery or a government-operated facility. Family members and friends of honorably discharged veterans may request a memorial certificate, bearing the President's signature, expressing the nation's recognition of the deceased veteran's service.

There is no charge for opening and closing of the grave, the headstone or marker (including the setting of the monument), or for perpetual care. Private cemeteries normally charge for all these services. On the other hand, a veteran's family cannot reserve a particular space before the need arises. A space is assigned at the time of death.

During the Persian Gulf War, I had the difficult task of dealing with macabre stories in the media aroused by fears of heavy casualties in the ground war. Thankfully, such fears proved unfounded. In the months before our forces attacked, however, such fears were real and they generated some unbelievable stories. Many reporters, for example, questioned me with the premise that the Department of Defense was buying up the supply of caskets and that VA was setting aside space for a huge influx of KIAs. Controlling my disdain, I tried to answer in such a way that reassured all the families who would read the newspapers that we would be able to discharge our duty to provide an honorable burial if necessary while at the same time absolutely quashing such irresponsible rumors.

Some of the national cemeteries have a structure called a "columbarium," an above-ground vault with niches for the placement of urns containing cremated remains. Arlington National Cemetery, although not a VA national cemetery, has such a structure. Any veteran with an honorable discharge is eligible for "inurnment" in the columbarium at Arlington. For in-ground burial at Arlington, however, the veteran must be retired from the military or have a valor award, Purple Heart or be 30 percent or more disabled. Most Khe Sanh veterans are probably eligible for an in-ground grave site at Arlington. If you chose to have your remains cremated, you can still be buried in an in-ground space if that is your choice. The columbarium, where one exists, is simply another option that can be chosen by the family.

The Future of the Cemetery System

While I was public affairs officer for NCS, the most consistently newsworthy topic I dealt with was the question of whether the cemeteries were "running out of room." The answer is "yes and no." Seventy-three of the 130 national cemeteries date back to the Civil War. More than half of them no longer have available grave space. VA maintains six national cemeteries in the vicinity of Richmond, VA, for example, all of which have exhausted available space. In most cases, these Civil War era cemeteries were able to provide service, at least for those who died on active duty, up through the Vietnam War. While honorably discharged (US) veterans have been eligible for burial in a national cemetery since 1873, burial in a national cemetery was not viewed so much as an entitlement, a veteran's benefit, as an honor offered by the nation especially to those who died on active duty.

With the mass armies of the 20th Century (some 26 million veterans plus their spouses and dependent children are now eligible for burial in a VA national cemetery), however, the benefit aspect of burial in a national cemetery has become more significant. In response to this trend, Congress transferred most of the cemeteries from the Army to VA in 1973 and instructed VA to expand to meet the needs of veterans and their families. VA has added 12 new cemeteries to the system, effectively doubling the acreage available for burials. So, while space may not be available where you want it, it's available on a nationwide basis.

The "inventory" of available grave spaces is augmented every year by expansion and phased dedvelopment of existing cemeteries even as new burials use up available spaces. Inevitably, older cemeteries such as Wood National Cemetery in Milwaukee finally exhaust all possibility of expansion and must close their doors to new burials. To deal with the challenge, VA has a three-pronged strategy: build new cemeteries where appropriate and when feasible; expand existing cemeteries when possible; and, third, encourage states to develop state-operated veterans cemeteries with the help of a VA grant that pays half the cost of development.

VA is now building a new national cemetery, called Tahoma National Cemetery, in Kent, Wash., near Seattle. Design is under way for four additional national cemeteries in Saratoga, NY, Joliet, IL, Dallas, TX, and near Cleveland, OH. Major expansion projects are nearing completion at Houston National Cemetery in Texas and Willamette National Cemetery in Portland, OR.

In January of this year I received a promotion to the post of Director of the NCS's State Cemetery Grants Service. This program provides half the cost to develop a new state veterans cemetery or expand or improve an existing cemetery.

"I was a typical sort of grunt with Bravo Company from October of 1967 through February 25, 1968."

We are currently helping to build several new cemeteries across the country including one near Milwaukee, one near Richmond, VA, and one in Fayetteville, NC. Several states including Indiana, Missouri, California, Massachusetts and Montana are moving toward development of new state-operated cemeteries.

Service and Memorialization

I was a typical sort of grunt with Bravo Company from October of 1967 through February 25, 1968. The story of Bravo Company and the 1st Battalion, 26th Marines in general on that day is well known to the readers of this magazine. Miraculously, I emerged from the battlefield of the Grey Sector with nothing more in the way of a physical souvenir than a small piece of shrapnel in my heel. I had no way of knowing that the memory of that day would become an integral part of my life from that point forward.

As I write this at home, a framed 1:50,000 map of Huong Hoa, Vietnam, holds a central place in my comfortable library. I know right where the Grey Sector is. The bookshelves contain a copy of Captain Shore's The Battle for Khe Sanh signed by Col. Lownds. One of my most prized possessions is Valley of Decision with Ray's inscription, "Bill—my good friend, God bless you always." How much healing is in the simple words of this wonderful man! My desk at work has a picture of me, my wife and Joe Sherman, my best buddy at Khe Sanh, at the dedication of The Wall in 1982.

After graduating from college (the University of California at Berkeley!) in 1973, my wife and I moved east and I found work in the suburbs of Washington, DC, writing about heavy construction projects such as new highways and the Metro subway system. It was a great introduction to working journalism but after a while, one runs out of ways to say, "dirt." After the fall of Saigon, I began reading and studying about the Vietnam War. I was astounded that, as screwed up as things were, it could ever have come to the point of people hanging on the skids of a Huey taking off from the roof of our embassy in Saigon. How did it happen? I read to try to figure it out.

When Jan Scruggs, the man most responsible for the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, called me at work in 1979 looking for volunteers to help him memorialize Vietnam veterans, I was ready to try. That fortuitous phone call ultimately led to a career in VA and with the National Cemetery System.

I think it's important work. The urge to memoralize, to remember the dead in some material and public way, goes back at least to the dawn of Western Civilization. As the built environment of every Civil War battlefield attests, no one feels the need to memorialize as deeply as the surviving comrade. We, America's Vietnam veterans, are lucky to have The Wall. Yet, all the hometown memorials, and all the cemeteries, like Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery, are perhaps more important. They are more accessible to people, both located closer and less encumbered by the baggage of national debate and national expectations. We should put memorials like our Arlington memorial in every national cemetery where Khe Sanh dead are buried. So those who come after us will not only remember the dead but also remember the bonds that strengthened and sustained us, the veterans.

The Bravo Company Group Burial

At 1100 on 10 September 1968, the commander of a joint services burial escort detail called his troops to attention at Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery in St. Louis, to begin a solemn committal service marking the burial of 21 men in four caskets in two separate graves. One group consisted of the remains of one US Army soldier, one airman, one sailor, six Marines and three Vietnamese civilians who lost their lives in a helicopter crash near DaNang on 19 February 1968; 12 dead in all. The marble stone ordered to commemorate the second group listed nine names, all members of Bravo Company, 1/26, who were lost on 25 February 1968 at Khe Sanh. The names were: PFC Michael B. Baptiste, LCPL Frederick A. Billingham, Jr., PFC Michael J. Brellenthin; PFC James R. Bruder, PFC David C. Scarbrough, LCPL Jerry Lee Dodson, LCPL Bruce E. Jones, PFC John A. Lassiter, and PFC Ronald L. Ridgeway. Their mothers and fathers came from as far as Massachusetts, Florida and Houston, Texas, to witness the unusual burial of the remains of nine Marines in two separate caskets laid to rest in a common grave with one monument to mark the grave.

The band played "Nearer My God to Thee" and the hymns of all the military services. Three chaplains conducted religious services. As the flags were folded, the band played "America the Beautiful." Pictures of the event give the impression of a hot, steamy day with the threat of rain. The families and friends of the dead, about 100 in all, were seated under several large tents. The ceremony's planners distinguished the two groups as "the crash" and "the patrol." The families and friends of the patrol faced the ceremonial flagpole of the old, historic military cemetery. The families and friends of the crash faced a large floral display. All around, the backdrop was a sea of orderly, identical headstones. The headstone of the patrol group was different, an oversized, scalloped marble stone placed on a granite slab. It listed the nine names along with the explanation, "Ambushed Patrol Died in Vietnam Feb 25 1968."

Group burials are not unusual in military cemeteries. Cold Harbor National Cemetery near Richmond, VA, contains one group burial of nearly 1,000 Union soldiers killed at the Battle of Cold Harbor in June, 1864. As medical and military technology evolved along with cultural sensitivities, however, individual identification of the dead became both a higher priority and more practical. Today, DNA testing could theoretically identify the remains of virtually any one killed in action. Yet, 29 years ago, and even in the Persian Gulf War, it has not yet proven practical or possible to identify all those killed in the myriad, destructive ways of war.

Because of its central location, the Army has often chosen Jefferson Barracks to be the final resting place for group burials of service members who died in a common event but whose remains could not be differentiated. More than 100 American POWs were massacred by the Japanese on the island of Palawan in December, 1944. Most were burned to death in a covered trench they had built to protect themselves from American air raids. Their remains are buried at Jefferson Barracks. The remains of many aircrews from World War II are also interred in common graves at the cemetery. It is a fitting location. Two veterans of the Revolutionary War are buried at the historic burial ground high above the Mississippi along with the dead of every war in American history. Six recipients of the Medal of Honor are buried there.

Ron Ridgeway

But, something went wrong with the burial of the Bravo Company dead. Today, the stone at Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery contains the names of eight Marines, not nine. After more than five years of captivity, Sergeant Ron Ridgeway came home from Hanoi on March 16, 1973, to a family that thought he had died on February 25, 1968. A new stone was ordered and placed on the grave without Ridgeway's name.

Ron Ridgeway is a remarkable individual. Today he works for the US Department of Veterans Affairs in Houston, Texas, his hometown. He is a veterans benefit counselor for the VA, and specializes in helping his fellow former POWs. Ridgeway was just 18 when he joined Bravo Company on Hill 881S in November, 1967. Like the rest of us, he saw relatively little action until 21 January 1968 when the NVA hit the ammo dump at Khe Sanh and began the "siege." Ridgeway spent a little bit of soft time in DaNang in early February when he was evacuated to have his broken nose fixed, a result of diving into a trench. (What a great idea!) (Pardon another parenthetical remark, but I've always thought it was a strange siege that allowed us to rotate people home at the end of their tour, send them out on R&R, escort them to the brig, etc.) Anyway, Ron Ridgeway hurried back and he was right there in the middle of the events of 25 February 1968. His story of that day and his subseqent honorable service while a captive in Hanoi is well worth telling and he should tell it. A rifleman in Lieutenant Jacques' Third Platoon, he found himself one of four wounded Marines left alive but cut off from help. As Chaplain Ray Stubbe wrote in Valley of Decision (pp. 401-402): "[Then-PFC] Ronald L. Ridgeway, Lance Corporal Charles G. Geller, a radio man, and Private First Class James R. Bruder all made a dash to the trench at the edge of the wood. When they looked back, nobody was following. They shot several incautious North Vietnamese, but Bruder took a chest wound and Geller one in the face. Ridgeway was hit in the leg and shoulder and broke an arm, as did Private First Class Willie J. Ruff, whom Ridgeway reached in the field just before collapsing. A jet struck the trench the Marines had left, spattering them with some napalm they managed to brush off. Drifting in and out of consciousness, Ridgeway was finally taken prisoner by the North Vietnamese." The battlefield was subjected to intensive U.S. shelling and air bombardment on the afternoon and night of 25 Feburary. We have been told, and we must accept that in the murderous logic of war, it was the tactically correct decision once it was decided that we could not mount a combat operation to recover the missing. The campaign went on with all its "Niagara" of bombs of shells. The remains of some 19 Marines were recovered more than a month later.

In the aftermath, those remains were identified and shipped home for burial in various national and private cemeteries around the country. It was different with the group burial. In essence, the Army mortuary command and the Marine reporting process had evidence indicating that they had the remains of nine individuals. Nonetheless, the anatomical evidence gave them a count of eight as the "minimum number of individuals." A member of the Army mortuary command explained that "they always tried to identify the greatest number" of individuals. It stands to reason. Their mission was to identify remains so they tried hard to identify all they could. Yet, even though the anatomical evidence indicated eight sets of remains, they had no evidence that would allow them to rule out any of the nine identified by other evidence. They were faced with a dilemma: Name all nine or leave all unknown. The decision was made to name all nine. Military and civilian professionals knowledgeable of the case still talk about it. My source says it was the only case in the Vietnam War in which the military made such a mistake of identification. Another distinction for Khe Sanh.

A LETTER

(From Mike O'Hara to Ken Pipes)

Dear Ken and Sharon:

What a joy it was to have you both in our home last week. It was a time that will not be forgotten I assure you. Maxine and I enjoyed your company so much.

Hopefully we will be able to get together here again in the future. Maybe then we both can simply spend our time along the banks of the White River "wetting our lines" like "Ole Huck Finn." Lazy and carefree finally at peace with the events of nearly 30 years ago.

Although our trip to the cemetery at Jefferson Barracks in St. Louis was emotional and heartwrenching, it provided us with the knowledge that "the circle remains unbroken."

When Jake [Quilles Jacobs, died 19 Apr '95] and I put out the call five years ago to all the men from Bravo Co to "Saddle Up," all responded in the affirmative.

By 1993 we had crossed the "line of departure" and were engaging in "fire team rushes." Our patrol posture was formed in classic textb ook fashion. We were determined to be successful in our mission.

By the time we had gathered in Las Vegas in 1995 we had begun to take casualties with the loss of our Squad Leader, Jake. [In a separate note, Mike writes: I talked to Jake only hours before his passing. He made me promise to always take care of the Skipper]. Being dutifully reminded of his previous instruction when he was wounded in 1968: 'Just take the point O'Hara, we need to complete the mission,' we forged on seeking victory at the summit.

But it is time to let them go. To do so is to pay them great tribute, for in so doing we have released them, finally, into the Hands of God Almighty.

As we were sitting in the chapel there were many thoughts which I did not have the strength to publicly share that morning. I had come to realize that although the men in that common grave were from Bravo Co., they represented so much more. Their loss transcends Bravo Co., even Khe Sanh.

That Marker which overlooks the Mississippi River represents the loss of a dream, a dream of a whole generation.

That Marker represnets the whole notion of "Camelot," of what might have been or what could have been.

That Marker represents—"The Best and the Brightest" this nation had to offer.

Is it any wonder why we have spent our lives grieving their loss?

It is certainly my prayer that as you approach your sixtieth birthday you have finally come to terms with our shared experiences of 1968, and can begin to be at peace with it all.

I know all concerned would agree when I say:

'No Marine ever had a finer Skipper
No man ever had a finer friend
No commander ever gained the love and respect of his men as you have done.'

"Now you are one with us, you know our tears,
Those tears of pride and pain so fast to flow;
You too have sipped the first strange draught of woe;
You too have tasted of our hopes and fears...
Must we not love you more, who yearn to under stand"
—E.M. Walker, "To America, on Her First Sons Fallen in the Great War" [A World War I poet]

A LETTER FROM WILLIAM CRAPSER

I hope this letter finds you and all our brothers and their families in the best of health and happiness. The Hill battles and siege of Khe Sanh, well, honestly men, how can I possibly, as a point man recon grunt of late '68 and all of '69..know that terrible combat you men were enduring during that period. That was the supreme moment of all the heightened awareness and truth of the Vietnam War coming together in the great cataclysmic battle that is the titans struggle in any war. All of you are the veterans of Iwo Jima, of the Chosin Reservoir, of the Battle of the Somme in World War I; you are the veterans of Gettysburg, you are the veterans of the great titan struggles of any war, when it hits its absolute fever pitch, and, with both armies massed to their absolute largest and strongest, clash together in horror and slaughter in the massive battles that have shaped our history before (but not since, thank God) all the way back to Thermopyle.

I feel great humility in your presence even here on paper...and a deep prayer... pray with me now for all the brave men, living and dead, suffering still and some still dying of their wounds, all the veterans of the battle of Khe Sanh. May those harrowing and deadly eternal moments that they lived through during the Hill Battles and Siege, that those moment by moment eternal deep recesses of their hearts find peace, there in the fog-shrouded valley of Khe Sanh. That through their uniting suffering, they have united again, that through their pain, the pain may be lessened by the larger hug of great brotherhood, that they all know in their own eternal moments the feeling of accomplishment..."

William Crapser has written a published book, Remains, a very moving account of his tour in Vietnam. He was involved in operations in the Khe Sanh area—Nanking, Dawson River West, Purple Martin, Maine Crag, Herkimer Mountain, Utah Mesa, Cameron Falls, and writes: "I have 16 other combat operations listed [in my SRB]. I don't know where the hell they were though my recon team was overrun Feb 17, 1969, on FSB Cunningham in the Ashau Valley, during Operation Dewey Canyon. We were with Lima, 3/9. I'd like to meet some day with a "Lima" who was on Cunningham with us that night.

I was assigned first to 3rd Marines, then to Ground Seismic Intrusion detectors school at Dong Ha. Then sent to A Co, 3rd Recon. I had three main jobs while there. I walked point on 37 of my 41 patrols, so I was a pointman first, plus I was the NCO in charge of running the patrols that implanted these Top Secret sensor devices, plus I was the Platoon Sgt of 3d Platoon. I'd run sensor patrols with teams from 1st and 2nd platoons. Always deadly patrols—80% contact rate, no boredom that I remember—then have to immediately turn around and run patrols with my 3 teams in 3rd platoon. Went crazy after 10 months, wasted by the 11th. I had my first flashback in the bush in Nam if you can imagine that...

Again, my deepest and sincerest hopes and blessings to all you brave men of the Hill Battles this year. If that damn Viking Boat, with all them banshees don't pick me up for Valhalla, I'll see you all next year, and, I hope, all of us, together, will see each other for many years to come. Thanks for listening.

THAT RED DUST
(Memorial Poem for the Khe Sanh Vets)
—By William Crapser, A/3dRecon 68-69

That red dust duller colored
Than red blood just shed
That red dust lightens
Where the last man
Ran past
And dove headfirst
Into the bunkered siege
At Khe Sanh.
That red dust brighter colored
Than Vietnam's red-sun mornings
That blood dust rises
Where the last man
Ran past
And dove headfirst
Into the bunkered siege
At Khe Sanh.
That red dust now all shines
Blood red, traces of
That dead dust dulls
Where the last man
Ran past
And dove headfirst
Into the bunkered siege
At Khe Sanh.
That red dust duller colored
Than red blood just shed
That red dust!

THE LOCAL PEOPLE

[Section on Vietnamese, Brou, Laotians. Note: The local Montagnard tribe in the Khe Sanh area call themselves "Brou" (pronounced by taking the "bro" from "broken" and adding the "oo" from "ooze", two syllables. American military in the area shortened it to "Bru", one syllable. Also, the name "Khe Sanh" is pronounced, in Vietnamese, "K" and "Schan", the "Sch" like the "sh" in "shop" with a "n". It literally means: "Green river."]

FRIENDS AND ENEMIES

BY BOB "DOC" TOPMILLER
[CORPSMAN AT REGIMENTAL AID STATION, 26MAR]

During the Fall of 1994, I entered a Ph.D. program at the University of Kentucky under the guidance of the renowned Vietnam war historian, Dr. George Herring. As part of the requirement for my doctorate, I had to study Vietnamese in a summer language program at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. Upon starting the language course, I soon discovered that one of my instructors, Dr. Dinh Van Duc normally taught at the University of Hanoi and had earned his doctorate in linguistics at the University of Moscow. Naturally, as a veteran, I was concerned how I would react to a professor from the other side.

Despite his impressive academic credentials, I found Thay Duc to be a warm, caring individual and an outstanding teacher. It was not very long before we had a discussion about the war in Vietnam and, to my utter amazement, Thay Duc told me that his younger brother had served as a medic with the NVA at Khe Sanh during the siege. Since I served as a Navy Corpsman at Khe Sanh during the siege, I was astonished over the coincidence. Further surprising me, Thay Duc told me that his brother, just like me, has had problems with his hearing ever since leaving Khe Sanh. Thay Duc urged me to come to Hanoi and meet his brother when I went to Vietnam to conduct research on my dissertation. Thus, I found myself earlier this month sitting in the lobby of the Viet-My Hotel in Hanoi wondering how I would react to meeting my former adversary. At the appointed hour, a small, very well dressed Vietnamese man walked into my hotel and introduced himself as Dr. Dinh Van Toan. He told me that he went to Khe Sanh at the end of 1967 and stayed there for a year. After one more year in the south, he returned to North Vietnam for demobilization, later earning a Ph.D. in Geology at the University of Moscow. Now he works as head of the Geophysical Department at the Institute of Geological Sciences in Hanoi.

A very kind soft spoken man, he seemed genuinely delighted to meet me. 16 years old when he joined the army and 18 when he got out, Toan said Khe Sanh was very terrible for the men in his unit, especially when the B-52s struck. Nor has he been able to completely recover from the war. He had me feel pieces of metal still in his back while he and Thay Duc said he could not hear anything for a year after his return to the north and only gradually regained partial use of his hearing. Often hungry at Khe Sanh, Toan and his comrades frequently captured American C-rats that had missed the drop point. He told me the rations tasted good, a potent indicator of the quality of meals the NVA had during most of the siege. When I told him about American casualty figures at Khe Sanh, he said that the NVA sustained far worse losses than ours, a statement that did not surprise me, although I did not press him for numbers because I thought it would be in bad taste.

I gave him about six pictures of Khe Sanh from my recent visits to the area which he really seemed to appreciate. He also loved my Khe Sanh T-shirt and I promised to send him one when I returned to the US. I told him about our Khe Sanh vets group and he said that NVA vets have an overall organization but not for Khe Sanh alone. We concluded that a joint reunion would be a good idea and I think it is something we, as an organization, should really consider. I envision a reunion where vets from both sides could come together and reminisce on our shared experience leaving behind much of the hostility that has separated us. Since my return, I have learned that at least one veteran's association is planning to have a reunion in Vietnam in the future.

During dinner, Toan asked me how I felt about the people of Vietnam. We both agreed that it is good that the war is over and the Vietnamese and American people are no longer enemies. Toan pointed out that most of us are alive mainly due to good fortune and the bitterness between American and Vietnam veterans should go away since we were subjected to the whims of politicians who used us as pawns in a larger game. When I told Toan and Thay Duc about my work on Vietnamese Buddhism, they became very excited and interested, agreeing that it is important to show how the conflict could have been prevented so future generations could escape the scourage of war.

Finally, we talked about our families and our dreams for their future. This mundane conversation represented the most important part of our meeting because we talked about the things that are common to all human beings leading us to understand that the things that unite us are far more important than those that separate us. As we left the restaurant, Toan turned and hugged me in a gesture of kindness, shared pain and understanding. At that moment, I realized that if every vet could do what I have done and connect the Vietnamese with their humanity and put a human face on our former enemies, much of the hostility between us would fade. What a terrible tragedy this has been: 20 years of bitterness and enmity between people who should have been friends.

For many years, I have felt a need to atone to the Vietnamese people for the horrors my country visited upon them. My dinner with Toan was another step in that process. Yet, my two recent trips to Vietnam have convinced me that most Vietnamese have forgiven us far more than we have forgiven ourselves. I entitled this piece "Friends and Enemies," to describe my changed feelings towards the people of Vietnam, but, in truth, I am not sure which is which anymore. My onetime enemies in Vietnam greet me with open arms while former ARVN hail me on the street everywhere I go in the south and tell me how much they still like Americans. At the same time, I abhor the actions of my government that stands by silently as Chinese and Vietnamese Communists trample on the human and religious rights of their people so that Boeing can sell more aircraft while men like Robert McNamara tell Vietnam vets to "sit down and shut up" when they question how any man could be so monstrous to continue a war for so long that he knew was so clearly wrong. I feel like the character in a movie who Robert Duval accuses of being the most pitiful of all creatures "you don't hate who you are fighting against and you don't love who you are fighting for." Like William Broyles, I have come to realize that I have far more in common with the people of Vietnam, on both sides, than with most of my fellow citizens.

Most Vietnamese seem to understand the nature of the war far better than us. What I find most galling in all this is the realization that it was not the Vietnamese who tried to ruin my life, it was my own government and people. On top of that, most Vietnamese do not even hate us. In fact, they like and admire Americans. What a stunning revelation to realize that all of the years of rage, hatred and resentment were wasted on a people who do not hate me in return. Yet, I think I knew all along who the real enemy was, but now I am sure. How could a country and its veterans ever get to this point? What a sorry state of affairs and a sad commentary for our time.

LETTER FROM COLONEL SOULANG ("Elephant")

[Note: Colonel Soulang Phetsomphou was Commanding Officer of BV-33, located in Laos at the Ban Houei Sane airstrip, on Route 9, approximately 12 miles west of Khe Sanh Combat Base (at XD 625379). 26th Marines had assigned as one of its missions, artillery support of this position. It has been supplied by Air America aircraft flying from KSCB. Pilots from Operation TIGER-HOUND, the O1s and O2s at KSCB as well as patrols from FOB-3 often visited this position. The position was overrun by tanks on 25 Jan 1968 and its defenders—who were like a local militia with wives, children, chickens, pigs, all streamed for refuge to Lang Vei Special Forces Camp. The tanks continued their progress eastward, and overran Lang Vei on 7 Feb 1968. Refugees of BV-33 were not permitted inside the KSCB perimeter; however, a message from the American Ambassador directed that they be flown to DaNang from where they would be flown to Savannakhet—but that the huge amount of "press" at Khe Sanh at the time was to be kept unaware of the presence of Laotians! (As though we could do almost any kind of miracle!). Col Jack Roberts, one of the pilots with TIGER-HOUND, had a very close relationship with Col Soulang, and on one occasion brought him serum to innoculate his people who were experiencing a disease. Col Jack enlisted the help of a medic from FOB-3, SFC SECORE (who later became the Army's first Physicians Assistant), dressing him as an Air Force Captain. The innoculations went as planned. Then Col Jack was ordered to DaNang and "stood tall" before half a dozen USAF Colonels who wanted to know who the Air Force Flight Surgeon was that conducted an unauthorized visit to BV-33, that they had looked through the entire western Pacific area and could account for all Flight Surgeons. He was severely reprimanded for giving unauthorized assistance to the Laotians. Col Soulang later returned to Laos and became the Chief of Staff of MR III and is presently living in the Las Vegas area and is a member of our Khe Sanh Vets organization]

Thank you for your interesting letter in which you are pleased to promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of Khe Sanh. I will be glad to furnish you the additional information about Khe Sanh battlefield, especially from the time H. Sane and Lang Vei had been attacked.

Background: Tchepone is situated at 60 kilometers from the Laotian-S. Vietnamese border, along a French colonial road called Route No. 9, which was running East-West and extending from S. Vietnam through Laotian border. As you know as well than I, all branches of Hochiminh Trail passed through the Tchepone area, and BA [Base Area] 604 was the encompassing NVA group—South-east of this grouping, and closer to the border, was BA 611, another major storage area along the trail. It was the main areas of communist concentration in Laos. I had the opportunity to fly over this zone, along with LtCol [Jack] Roberts (USAF); the zone that we suspected the location of the NVA Headquarters just to the north of my position. Yes, I was aware of the presence of this location when it was signaled by Khesanh base Headquarters. [Note: CIA memo of 13 Mar 68, "The Continuing Communist Military Threat in Northern South Vietnam" has a map in which the top, left-hand corner indicates the 'Khe Sanh Area Front HQ' as being 9 miles directly west of the DMZ. This was the headquarters of the NVA for directing the siege battle at Khe Sanh (a subdivision of the B5 Front designated 'B5-T8'). It is located in an area indicated on Sheet 6242-I (Series L7015) as a series of highly-fortified cave areas in small very steep hills which are located on a road that begins just east of the BV-33 area (and before the border), from whence it goes north to a point directly west of the DMZ, then proceeds east into the DMZ. In late 1967, the S-2 of 26th Marines used to refer to this area as the "Santa Fe Trail" portion of the Ho Chi Minh network. It paralleled the Lao/S Viet border. This was later the NVA headquarters that directed the counter-offensive against LAMSOM-719 in 1971. It was this location that Col Soulang had been asked about]

The town of Tchepone on the route No. 9 was overrun in May, 1961, due to the heavy attack by NVA forces. Before 1961, BV33 was known as Battalion Infantry [BI] No. 12, based at Thakong, a former French camp. As development of political situation in Laos changed, the 12 BI became BV33 and Tchepone subdivision for awhile, when it withdrew to locate at B. H. Sane sometime in 1961. Here, the BV33 was assigned to the new missions:—Territorial defense, to retake the control of population, to provide information about the activities on the Ho Chi Minh Trail, and to cooperate with US and SV forces in this area.

The position of BV33 was included in the perimeter of Khesanh base defense.

Composed of 4 companies from 60 to 70 men each, most of them were Bru or Khas and Phoutai people. The BV33 was articulated as follows: company one at 3 Kms west of my CP (post central), 2 company at 4 Kms SE of my CP, on the sky hill called Phou Kiou Lam (Hill of Heavy Wind), 3 Company at 2 Kms south of my CP, 4 company at 3 Kms south of my CP.

I was the last Commander of this battalion. Attacked at B. Houei-Sane and, later, at Lang Vei, the BV33 was evacuated first at Xom Cham Airfield [Note: this is Khe Sanh Combat Base. The name "Xom Cham" literally means "village of Chams"; the Chams were fierce pirate peoples that inhabited most of the coast of what was northern South Vietnam until they were wiped out, with refugees scattered—perhaps to what became KSCB area!], then to Danang, and finally to Savannakhet, Laos. Later BV33 needed to be reformed due to the heavy loss in material and personnel from the time it was attacked at Tchepone, H. Sane, and Lang Vei.

[Col Soulang was asked about Lao Bao, where the Xepone River makes a bend, just north of Lang Vei, one of the very few mountain passes through the rugged mountain range that separates Laos and S. Vietnam, called the D'Ai Lao. (The other two passes, to the north, are Mu Gia (WE8153) and Ban Karai (XE262117)). In 1282, the Chams attacked the Mongols, moving westward through Lao Bao on what is now Route 9, and in 1666, the Vietnamese extended their influence into Savannakhet, Laos, by moving through the D'Ai Lao at Lao Bao. In 1827, after their capture of Vientiane, Laos, Siamese armies moved against the Vietnamese and moved through the D'Ai Lao forcing the Vietnamese to retreat to Cam Lo by 1830. Soon thereafter, the Vietnamese reasserted authority over the D'Ai Lao and many Christians were exiled to Lao Bao or pressed into military service. In 1834, Vietnamese continued their persecution of French priests, and at the prison at Lao Bao, Father Odorico died of hunger in prison on 25 May. No one had been allowed to bring him anything to eat or drink. The prison at Lao Bao was visited in the 1920s by the American author, Harry Hervey (who wrote about his visit there in his book, King Cobra*). Between 1930 and 1932, Giap, his brother Nho, and several other influential Viet Minh were imprisoned at Lao Bao. It has been said that many of those sent there never returned, and even prisoners able to deal with the rigors of prison discipline at Lao Bao often succumbed to sickness due to the presence of malarial mosquittos and other diseases. Bill Colby (later head of CIA) writes about his visit to Lao Bao when he arrived in Vietnam, perhaps to make liaison with South Vietnamese guerrilla forces who were then operating in eastern Laos from Khe Sanh. The French fought a desperate battle at this location, and when the Viet Minh came through, the French planters in the Khe Sanh area took refuge in the prison there. Felix Poilane was wounded in his leg at this time at this place. Just before the 1968 Siege, FOB-3 had contemplated building its camp here, but opted, instead, to build it as an appendage to Khe Sanh Combat Base. POW/MIA records indicate that this was a holding prison place for Americans in the late 1970s and 1980s. The question to Col Soulang was whether the location was regarded as Lao or Vietnamese territory, since the name "Lao Bao" seems to indicate Laotian]*

For Lao Bao Village, it was and is at the present time considered to be part of Lao territory. "Lao Bao" means "Lao people," "Ai Lao" means "Lao brother". Under French colonial administration, Lao Bao was held by 7 Commando Company. This position represented a very important strategic point, not only it opened the access to South Vietnam, but also it formed a natural boundary between Laos and South Vietnam. By holding this position, we could control the whole pocket of Lao Bao where the NVA activities were intense.

BRINGING LIFE ON THE BATTLEFIELD

Mr. Bob Donoghue (FOB-3), a policeman in Springfield, MA, has made six annual trips back to Khe Sanh starting in 1992, the most recent being 16-30 April 1997, to assist the local tribespeople of the area, the Bru. Operating and motivated completely out of his own good will along with donations of money and supplies from others, he has been able to accomplish amazing results for a people who live on the edge of life and death.

[For those who are not aware of it, the various people who live in the western part of South Vietnam, in the mountains, and called Montagnards, are completely different racially from the Vietnamese, who probably pushed southward from China, driving the original inhabitants, who are more like the Polynesians of Taihiti and Malayans, into the mountains. Vietnamese speak on a "tonal" language of seven tones which give a word a meaning depending on which tone it is uttered, whereas the Montagnards, like us, have a non-tonal language. Montagnards are stocky, muscular; Vietnamese are more fine boned. There is intense racial hatred by the Vietnamese towards the Montagnards, and the Vietnamese have recently all but exterminated the Rhade tribe. There are 31 tribes of Montagnards in South Vietnam, all with different languages. The tribal area of the Bru extends deep into Laos, into the DMZ and North Vietnam, and far south of Khe Sanh.]

The average Bru family has about seven members and lives in a house constructed of wood, bamboo, and thatch. Medical problems include worms and diarrhea, malaria, dysentery, malnutrition, TB, and infections. For every 10 babies born, 7 will die during their first year of life. (Babies are not usually named until age 2-1/2 or 3 because so many die). The nearest hospital is located in the town of Khe Sanh. However, most Bru avoid it due to distrust of the Vietnamese as well as a lack of money to pay for treatment and prescribed medications.

Bob's work is in five Bru villes. Bob—and those sending donations to support his efforts—has managed to pay for and build four water wells in the villes. For the first time villagers do not have a water storage problem and can begin limited irrigation projects. Two pregnant cows were purchased in 1994. There are now 6, with one more pregnant. Since Bob brought vitamins for prenatal care to one ville, no infant has died (five had been born in the last year). This has eliminated the 70% infant mortality rate completely. It is hoped that the intestinal worm problem will be solved when the village is finally located to a more permanent location and latrines can be built. Bob started a school in 1994, now growing rapidly. School supplies have been donated by classes taught by Keith Gum [corpsman from C/1/26] at Homosassa, Florida. For his 1997 visit, he brought 500 pounds of supplies, mainly medicines.

Bob's work is life and death, not simply making life a little better. Some may question: Why should we do this? The answer may be that those who worked with the local Bru (CAC OSCAR, MACV Team 4, FOB-3, medcaps from the regiment and 1/26, etc.) came to love and respect them so deeply. They stood by us. Some hid our recon teams escaping from NVA during the opening days of the Siege. Many more fought heroically by our side and would not forsake us. The Bru had been resettled from distant hills as part of the Strategic Hamlet Program in the early 1960s. This was to deny their availability to carry supplies or as a source of food to the NVA, as well as to provide them security. We, the Americans, promised to take care of them. They were peaceful, hadn't even learned how to steal, had a child-like innocence, and early Special Forces researchers questioned whether or not they could be trained as soldiers due to their childlike and peaceful nature. When the Siege came, the Vietnamese General (General Lam, the I Corps Commander) permitted the 1200 Vietnamese in Khe Sanh village to depart, but forbade the Bru, saying there was no place in Vietnam for them. As a result, up to 12,800 Bru perished during the first three months of 1968 from NVA advancing into the area, or from our own artillery and airstrikes. Those who were fortunate to make it to the Cua Refugee Center, just south of Cam Lo, were dying at the rate of 50 a day in April and May of '68, from malnutrition, according to Dan Kelley, a Marine from CAC OSCAR at Khe Sanh who, with the Army medic, SFC Jim Perry, lived with the Bru for a year following the Siege.

Basically, while they didn't abandon us, we abandoned them—just like we did our own MIA, and just like most of American society did to returning Vietnam veterans. We know what it means to be treated thus! We said we'd protect and take care of them, then broke our word, our promise.

Guilt? Certainly. Anger? Some. Disillusionment and discouragement? Of course.

The significant thing is that people like Bob Donoghue don't simply criticize or stew in a boiling pot of anger, but do something. Bob—and those who accompany him and those who support and contribute to his work—present a sign of hope, a ray of light in a dark world, life in the midst of death, caring in a world of greed, power seeking, control seeking, and self-interest, love in terms of actions and not just feelings, and love in terms of what people really need, not what we think they should have.

A LETTER FROM BRUCE B.G. CLARKE

[Note: Colonel Clarke was an Army Captain in Khe Sanh Ville during the Fall of '67 , Officer in Charge of MACV Advisory Team #4. After the fall of the Seat of Government for Huong Hoa District, located in Khe Sanh Ville, the opening days of the Siege of '68, he relocated to FOB-3.]

This letter is in response to several articles in selected publications. My hope is to correct several misstatements of fact and thereby start the process of correcting the popular record (as distinguished from the actual record) about the siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

There are two mistaken perceptions about the battle of Khe Sanh—the struggle there was either an Air Force victory or another example of Marine valor. It was truly the later.. However, in this whole process the role played by the U.S. Army gets forgotten. The five American advisors who were with me in the village of Khe Sanh when the fight began with simultaneous attacks on the hills and our district compound are forgotten. So are the Vietnamese Regional Force (RF) company and Popular Force (PF) platoons along with the [Headquarters and one platoon of the USMC unit, CAC OSCAR] that stood the brunt of the ground attack on the District Headquarters on 21-22 January. They subsequently occupied a critical part of the perimeter of the combat base with other Vietnamese and Montagnards and Army Special Forces soldiers in Forward Operating Base (FOB)-3. Also overlooked are the brave soldiers—Vietnamese, Laotian, and U.S. Army, who were at the Lang Vei Special Forces Camp. CPT (now Major) Dave Stockwell, in his book about Lang Vei, Tanks in the Wire, has captured the valiant exploits of these soldiers.

Suffice it to say the soldiers of the U.S. Army also played a critical role in both the actual siege at the combat base, the events surrounding the siege and, of course, Operation Pegasus when the First Cavalry Division (rein) attacked to relieve the siege. To be exact the lifting of the siege contained one of the more poignant examples of the interplay of military strategy and politics that was the Vietnam War.

On 1 April 1968, as the helicopters of the 'First Team' were beginning the relief, then Major Paul Schwartz began a briefing to Major General Tolson (CG of the First Cav) on the Division's next mission—an attack into the Ashau Valley west of Hue. Major Schwartz's concept was to pursue the North Vietnamese into Laos, turn south along the Ho Chi Minh Trail and enter the Ashau from the rear. The idea was to use the existing stocks in the Khe Sanh area of operations, gain operational surprise, maintain the momentum, and to not allow the NVA to escape. General Tolson applauded the plan's audacity but cut the briefers short by saying: 'Didn't you hear the President last night? He announced a partial bombing halt of North Vietnam. In that light, what you are proposing is politically impossible!' The political approach of alternating violent action and concessionary political proposals had made a sound military approach and the destruction of major NVA units, that had already been badly hurt, impossible.

The doctrine of overwhelming force that was espoused by General Powell has its roots in situations similar to the one above. What Khe Sanh in particlar and the Viet Nam experience in general should teach us is not necessarily the criticality of overwhelming force. They should teach us the importance of military objectives being a clear translation of the conditions that a politician seeks for the U.S. military to achieve at the end of the conflict. There are three critical pieces of guidance that need to be developed during the policy making process before hostilities begin:

* A clear statement by the political authorities of the desired situation in the post-hostility and settlement phases of a dispute—what the area should 'look like' following hostilies.
* A clear set of political objectives that when achieved will allow the above vision to become reality; and,
*A set of military objectives that will, when achieved, allow/cause the above to happen.

Had the above guidance been developed it is likely that the Vietnam War would have been conducted differently and possibly the agony that was Khe Sanh might have been avoided. Obviously, we will never know, but we need to learn from our mistakes and ensure that we don't repeat them. We owe it to the next generation of brave soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines. They should not have to endure similar tests of their courage and determination.

[Note: It is planned that the next issue of this magazine will have extensive treatment of several US Army activities at the beginning of the Siege: the multi-team patrol on top of Co Roc Mountain in mid-January just a few days before the Siege, the three patrols to Hill 471, the action in Khe Sanh ville, and the activities of Captain Walter Gunn and the 37th ARVN Rangers, of Captain Mark Swearengen who was Liaison Officer for the 175s, of the 37th Signal Battalion detachment, and a discussion of the continuing controversy over Lang Vei.]

AIR FORCE AT KHE SANH

A Letter from Wm L Smith USAF

I read with interest the letter from Michael A. Garoutte ["Resupply," Issue No. 37]. I was one of those Aerial Port personnel he spoke of. I was in the 14th Aerial Port Squadron out of Cam Ranh Bay, on TDY to DaNang, when Tet '68 started. I was sent the next day to Khe Sanh to help with the loading and off-loading of the C-123s and C-7s. I spent the next 77 days there, mostly sitting in the trench line at the west turn-around ramp or filling sand bags at the east turn-around ramp, as that was our command bunker.

There were three of us on the crew and every time a plane started to circle, we knew we were going to catch a ton of incoming. We would crouch down low in a mortar or rocket hole that was at the south side of the ramp and watch as the plane landed and approached us. The rear cargo door would already be down as the plane entered the ramp. Guys and gear came spilling out of the plane as it was still turning around and that was the worst time, because we had to see if there was cargo on board that the Load Master needed help with. If there was, then we went to the plane and off loaded the contents and then back to the hole usually to find the new Marines had found it was the closest cover and were there before us, sometimes it was pretty crowded in there. If there was no cargo for us to help with, we kept low as the incoming was at an all time high as the plane began to take off.

The days were long for us as we waited for the planes to come, but those minutes of exhilaration, as the plane turned and we didn't know if we were needed or not, if we would make it back or not, those minutes are what I think about every time I hear the name "Khe Sanh." It became a game with us, but not the one that has a Game Over, Reset Button on it. We knew what could happen to us every time we left the security of that hole to go out to that plane, and honest to God, we never hesitated once. We were there when the C-`123 was hit on that ramp, first in the tail and then in the cockpit. Sometimes as we ran and dove into the hole we would sit and laugh hysterically for long minutes on end, for again having cheated the Devil out of our souls. What a RUSH!!! Too much for the fifty year old man that I am today.

I spent my 21st birthday at Khe Sanh. The guys got together, and believe me I have no idea where they got them, but they came up with new sox and shorts for me to change into and some hot water for a stand up GI Bath. A better present I couldn't have asked for.

I have been a member of the Khe Sanh Vets since I first heard about the organization and I marched with the Khe Sanh Vets in Chicago in 1986. I have not had the opportunity to attend a reunion, but maybe I can make St. Louis, definitely DC in 1998. Since I was not in the Marine Corps, but proudly wear the Marine Corps PUC for being attached to the 1/26, I am glad we did not become part of the 3d Marine Division [Association]; we are our own group, with our own experiences, Marine, Army, Navy, or Air Force.

Whenever I find a new issue of the Khe Sanh Vets Magazine in the mailbox a smile comes over my face as I know there are still people out there that share some of the same experiences I have and think of us now and then.

A LETTER FROM JOE A DERIAN, JR.

On February 22, 1968, I was waiting for a chopper to Hill 558 along with Pat Brophy of North Hampton, RI.

There were many other Marines there in the trenchline. As usual when a plane or chopper came in, the air strip got shelled. I called the air strip the V Ring. One round landed very close. There was a loud noise and dust and a shock wave that came down the trench. I said to Pat that seems like it landed in the trench., Then we hear corpman-up.

Pat and I and some other Marines ran over to see if we could help. We only had to go about forty feet. We helped pull a couple of the wounded out of the trench. There was a small bunker over the trench in there where the chaplain [Bob Brett] and his assistant [Alexander Chin—who, by the way, had already been wounded three times]. Pat and I helped remove the bodies from the trench and got them up on ponchos. I didn't get out of Khe Sanh that day. I have never forgotten that day.

A LETTER FROM TOMMY TOMPKINS

When I read about the mass grave for the 44 vets who lost their lives on 3-6-68 it sure brought back some old memories... I arrived at Khe Sanh in Dec. 67, stayed for a few weeks and was sent to Camp Hanson, Okinawa, with a Capt. Skinner to pick up some radios or something. The battle started and no one seemed in a hurry to get back.

Finally, in early March I was sent back to Vietnam. I was with the group sitting beside two C-123s in DaNang. The group was divided in two smaller groups. I remember a black Staff Sgt. walking through the middle of the large group counting heads and moving people around. When he divided us up he said the group to his left go get on the first C-123. He told my group we would be taken back to the R&R Center and would fly in the next day. A few hours later we were told the plane had been shot down!

The following morning my group boarded our C-123 and took off. We flew a short distance and started our approach, but I knew it was not Khe Sanh. We landed at Phu Bai. The pilots parked the plane and walked away. The crew told us the pilots were buddies with the guys that flew the other plane. We hung out for a couple of hours and finally two other pilots showed up and off we went.

We arrived that afternoon and I stayed at Khe Sanh until we all left in mid-April.

I've tried to find some other guys who were in my group, but no luck. I don't mind telling you I broke out in a cold sweat when I read about the mass grave. How easy it would have been to have been sitting to that Staff Sergeant's left insgtead of right. Or, why didn't he say the group to his right get on the plane!?! Who knows. But sometimes I sure feel guilty. I'm so sorry those guys died, but I'm so glad to still be alive.

FROM A LETTER FROM STEVE HECKNAUER

You mentioned that you suggest that others write their memories. I too wasn't sure that I wanted to do that and wasn't sure I could. Then one day it all started to flow. I would write pages and pages and then stop for a long period of time. Later it would hit me again and I'd dive back into it like I had to hurry before some type of deadline was reached. Many nights I didn't want to put the pen down at night. Once I completed my memoirs I felt a tremendous relief, like I had finally reached the summit of Hill 950. Please continue to recommend to others to write their memories. Khe Sanh will always live in all of us that walked her red surface, but we cannot live each second trapped by her memories.

[An excerpt from his memoire concerning time on Hill 950]:

The next month of so we did the usual crap—ran patrols that netted nothing—set in ambushes that only cost us lost sleep—standing fighting hole watch only to watch the rain—spent many days digging mud from our trenchlines which kept caving in due to all the rain. We were notified that our next duty station was to be hill 950. Hill 950 was a very steep hill that seemed to be cloaked in fog most of the time—we would make Hill 950 our home for a month. We were carried by choppers from Khe Sanh over the river (Rao Quan) and told to jump-off—they had this strange idea of not wanting to ground their bird—we flew in above the site of whipping elephant grass and jumped. What we didn't realize was that the damned grass grows six feet high or more. What a drop! With the load we were packing on our backs—the freakin' steel pot and all the other military necessities—when you hit the ground it was like a ton of bricks. Gear, helmets and other irtems scattered in all directions—but what the hell we have to save the damned choppers! What crap we kill ourselves to save their damned equipment. We humped our asses off!—Straight up—grabbing trees to pull ourselves upward. Leeches everywhere, one guy had a leech fall down inside his tee shirt and attached itself to the guy's chest. After we crawled, climbed, and pulled upward he bumped himself and squashed the leech—when he looked down he thought he had been hit in the chest by a sniper for blood was everywhere. We convinced him he wasn't hit and when he pulled up his shirt he discovered the leech. As we moved upward using the trees to pull-on you could hear them snap and guys would go sliding down the rain slick mountain a lot faster than they had been crawling up. Sure was happy that we weren't sneaking up on anyone! If we were we'd all be dead meat. The word was passed up the column that we had rock apes walking with us in our column. Lt. Wells sent word back down that if that SOB was in our column count em as part of our platoon. That gave us a little comic relief under such trying circumstances.

The sounds of falling, crashing and cursing filled the rainy, foggy air. After what seemed forever we finally made it to the summit, what a relief! Was assigned a bunker position, set up our watches, checked our fields of fire, set out claymores, attemprted to clean our equipment paying special attention to our weapons—everything in order and time to settle in for our month stay on top of the world. Our bunker was on the NE side of the hill and we had the exit gate to our Lighthouse [Note: Listening Post] area and the ridge to 1015 to the right of us. It seemed like we were all alone in this war so far removed from everyone else that it was our own country up here. I remember standing night watch many times and seeing into the darkness seeing nothing but darkness, often the fog would settle in and your visibility was measured in feet, not yards.

During the day we would sent out or go ourselves on patrols around this big tit. We'd exit on the south side—work our way down the mountain around to the east up a ravine and back thru the east gate. Sometimes we'd go out the east gate cross the ridge to 1015 work around the summit and back to 950. It was a rugged area and not easy to negotiate with trees, vines, rocks, undergrowth, all woven to prevent a casual walk in the woods.

I believe the origins of the Rock Ape Saga began with C/1/26 that December. As the facts are stated is as so. While on patrol to 1015 one of our guys happened upon a rockape—he decided that the ape would be an excellant platoon mascot so he reached out and took the ape by the hand. As they followed the ridge back to 950 a break in the fog allowed visibility of the bunker laden hilltop. Apparentkly the ape came to realize that he was in jeopardy so it swung the guy around—punched him dead in the mouth sending him sprawling over the steep side of the ridege—the ape then scampered back to 1015.

LETTER FROM JIM GRIFFIN

To be remembered and to remember, as you know so well, is particularly important for so many of us. My way of doing it is to write stories and poems and to give presentations to young people and teachers at the local high school and at the college where I teach. There is still such profound ignorance of the war in Vietnam and often an unwillingness to discuss it with those who experienced it. Perhaps that is why, even after so many years, some feel so duty-bound to pass on to another generation the memories of those whose lives and dreams so often seem to inhabit us. Perhaps through the medium of memory we somehow restore life to those who lost it and dignity to those for whom life in 'the world' has all too often been a struggle for survival. You and I have been blessed, but to be deserving of that blessing we must shoulder the burden of memory that our brothers have entrusted to us. You have borne it with grace and love for so many years and continue to do so...

A LETTER FROM CRAIG SWANSON

[B/3d Recon]

I read with great interest the interview between you and Robert Painter in the Spring, 1997, issue, regarding the shelling at Khe Sanh on Jan. 24, 1968. I did not remember the date, but I certainly remember the day.

I remember that whole period very well—that period when the NVA encroached around Khe Sanh, we stopped making patrols, and lived in bunkers—that period that we all came to know as the siege. I was platoon commander of 3rd platoon, Bravo Company, 3rd Recon Battalion at that time, and although I don't remember if Robert Painter was in my platoon, I do remember his name.

Reading the interview, I was reminded of another time during the siege when a Marine of mine was killed because he saved others. He was Lance Corporal [Timothy Michael] Barmer [KIA 30 Jan 68]. I'm not sure how many are aware of this story and I'm not sure if Corporal Barmer was ever recognized for his bravery, but I was moved to write about him after reading Mr. Painter's interview.

Those of you who were there remember that we could hear very clearly when the incoming was on the way. There was a distinct 'thunk,' which we all learned to identify very quickly, whenever a shell left the tube. As I remember, we had about 5 seconds to find cover whenever we heard that dreadful sound.

On a day like any other day during the siege, Corporal Barmer and a handful of other Marines were standing around outside their bunker, when they heard that familiar sound. Barmer quickly started hustling all the Marines around him into the bunker. The entrance to the bunker was small, and only 1 man could go through it at a time. While Barmer may have been the closest to the bunker, he insured that every other Marine in his group got into the bunker before him—grabbing them, pushing them, pulling them. Every one got into the bunker in time, except Lance Corpral Barmer. The shell hit near him killing him, before he could get in.

I'm sure the other Marines who were part of that group remember the situation well. But I'm not sure who else knows about it. And after almost 30 years it hit me that others need to know about it. I pray that if Lance Corporal Barmer's family does not know about his bravery, that this story might somehow find its way to them.

God bless all you Marines and Corpsmen who served in Khe Sanh. And thank you.. for continuing to put out the publication.

LIFE'S TIME AND SHAPE
By Michael F. Patton

Young boy so good in heart, staying in line, living his part, thrown out of school, no one understood his dream, no one took the time to listen, locked him up and threw away the key.

Scar's on his heart, fame on his mind, tear's down his cheek's no one took the time to listen, poor boy with a free soul down in the gutter shoveling coal.

Light from above overtake him now. Open his heart. Take away his frown. Love is all around him guide the boy to shore. Take away his gun that was given as a toy.

Time moved on, all his friends moved away, he was left all alone to find God's Light, and he didn't go astray. Now his words are listened to, he'll fill your heart with Love, he flashes goodness like a light bulb, he'll tighten your soul like a rubber glove.

His music is his weapon, like a saber it cuts so deep, his words are Heaven sent, and they can knock you off your feet. If you look deep into his eyes you'll see him at total peace, now see if you can find yourself before we all die from the evil disease.

LETTER FROM H. TOM HAMILTON

As far as C Med is concerned I am more than willing to discuss anything about it. I got to Charlie Med in November 1967 after coming back from R&R in Hawaii with my first wife. The site consisted of three tents, a chief's bunker, and a doctor's bunker lined up in a row. The first tent was triage, the second was surgical, the third was enlisted quarters with a stove to take the bits off the air. It also had a parachute strung from the rafter (thanks to the SeaBees). Chief Duschane had the first bunker again with a jerry-rigged oil stove. The walkway in front of the tents consisted of wood pallets to keep us from sinking in during rainy season. In front of the tents (the doors or entrances were 90 degrees from the taxi strip facing the Regimental C.P.) was a bunker and slit trench. All the tents had a two foot high wall of sandbags around them. As we found out later the only thing they would protect was from your knees down!

One of our better series of humorous incidents was our raid on the logistic group beside us. We accomplished this by putting a 2 x 4 across the concertina wire and pilfering a few cans of C-rats. We always took just a few so the loss wouldn't be noticed.

In December, 1967, Dr. Mercer and others decided a liquor run to DaNang was necessary. Since I was on my second tour (extension) the logical choice was me to make the run. I was told to be inconspicuous as possible on my return. Off I went with ration cards and a signed note by Dr. M., who was OIC [Officer in Charge], to purchase and transport the booze. MCB 7 helped me to get a pallet of beer to 15th Aerial Port where John Beaton, a grade school friend of mine disguised the pallet with heavy plastic and boarded aboard an Air Force Caribou for Phu Bai. At 3rd Med I picked mail for Charlie Med. On arrival back at Khe Sanh, Danny Sullivan [the Marine ambulance driver assigned to C Med] brought the "cracker box" ambulance up to the pallet. Quickly he, I, and HM2 Ebert stashed the contraband into vehicle. I believe I arrived back on Christmas Eve or Christmas Day. Needless to say, I had presents for everyone. New Years Eve was a blast.

I'll end right here and write about my experiences during the siege later. By the way, on the front piece of Michael Ewing's Illustrated History of Khe Sanh, I am right in the middle of the picture with a work detail of Recon Marines!

LETTER FROM DR. BATES NOBLE, MD

I was a general medical officer assigned to the First Marine Air Wing and served in Danang from November, 1966, to December, 1967.

A special unit had been formed in the Wing designated as the "First Marine Air Wing Reaction Force." I was the Medical Officer for the unit.

We were mobilized for the first (and only) time to be sent to Khe Sanh when the base came under fire following a misdirected Air Force bombing strike that hit a Montagnard village named Lang Vei near Khe Sanh. [Note: this was on 02 Mar 67] Lang Vei had served as a base of operations for a Special Forces unit. The wounded and some of the dead Montagnards were brought to Khe Sanh.

We went into Khe Sanh at first light following the strike and helped to reinforce the Marine unit at Khe Sanh which at the time only amounted to a reinforced company [B/1/9] and a Marine recon unit [Detachment of 3d Force Recon Co.]. I'll never forget the controlled crash landing we did in a C-130 to get in there and looking over the edge of the cliff at the end of the runway at the remains of aircraft that hadn't stopped in time!

My short stay on that strange mountain top surrounded paradoxically by even higher positions was one of the most memorable experiences of my life.

A LETTER FROM DAVID BROMBAUGH

My wife and I went to the Khe Sanh Veteran reunion in Cincinnati two years ago. It was so good to meet... after years of writing and phone calls. We presented him with a Bible to show appreciation.

I looked around but failed to see anyone that I had known from Khe Sanh and the hills. It was also great to meet Earle Breeding after hearing a lot about him and reading some of his work.

We ran into a couple when we sat down for the meal. I told him I was with HOTEL 2/3. To my surprise, he said 'Where the hell was 2/3?' It really bothered me. To those that don't know.

We were trucked north as far as Rt. 9 was open, and told to fight our way to Khe Sanh via the hills which we did. [Note: This was during Operation PEGASUS in Apr '68 when battalions 1/1, 2/1, 2/3, and 3/4 began to move into and occupy positions in the Khe Sanh area, displacing the 26th Marines and 1/9. Battalion 2/4 operated in the Khe Sanh area 31 May - 15 Oct '68 and Bn 3/9 04 Jun - 06 Jul] We were stranded too. We went seven days without food and four days without water. A CH-46 crashed on our hill bringing in replacements while we were burning a field of fire and no other choppers would come in.

We were the ones who went up Hill 689 and recovered the 1/9 bodies. We went up to recdover 49 and found 46. They were KIA April 16, 1968. We took the hill April 21 at a great loss of men. They only let us take our weapons and one E-tool per fourth man. They didn't give us much of a chance. 1/9 was caught in a U-shaped ambush and wiped out and they figured we were headed for the same fate. All our gear was left behind as they said they didn't want to give the gooks anymore gear than what they got from 1/9. We walked into Khe Sanh two days later. We were told we were the first to walk into the lines after the Siege.

We ended up at LZ HAWK in the sidees of Rt. 9 outside of Khe Sanh. I've asked Brother Ray about this other incident that bothers men. They had a rat patrol that ran from LZ HAWK to Ca Lu as it was called then at night to keep the gooks from mining the road. It was a tank with a squad of Marines riding on top. The tank was hit with sappers with satchel charges and blew off the road down a ravine. They sent my squad from H/2/3, second platoon, to go get them.

This is what bothers me. We got to the tank with another tank we came out with for the rescue. The tank was in the ravine and burning. I helped pick a Marine up and it was so dark and he kept saying how his leg hurt. I laid him up on our tank and doc had a red lens light he shined on him. His leg was a mess. I had blood all over me and it was all over the tank. It looked like he was thrown from the tank and it ran over his leg. I think of him and wonder to this day if he made it. I felt so sorry for him and doc was doing all that he could. If you are out there, Marine, I hope and pray that you are alright and would like to know. This was probably around April 25, '68. I never heard his name. The tank coming back to LZ HAWK kept jumping out of gear and we figured we'd have to push it. At daylight we went back and found the rest of the squad and tank crew alive. They had hid when we were picking up the wounded. They thought we were gooks messing with the dead. The tank driver was killed and never got out of it.

Semper Fi.

[NOTE: At 9 PM, 25 April, Tank C-21, accompanied by a squad of infantry from G/2/3, was on a road patrol heading east on Route 9 in the vicinity of Lang Kat (XD904398). The night was extremely dark, and after moving not more than 300 meters, the patrol was ambushed with satchel charges, RPG rockets, and grenades. The first round, a RPG, hit the tank, which caught fire and veered off the road down into a ravine. A relief force sent by Co H/2/3 recovered all the infantry personnel, but the fire and exploding ammo prevented the extraction of the tank crew. At that point, the casualties were: 8 Marines wounded and 4 MIA (the tank crew). (This is according to the 2/3 Command Chronology). The following morning, at 7 AM, Co H recovered 3 of the tank crew, 2 with minor wounds, one unhurt. The driver of the tank was dead, and the tank was a total loss. One dead NVA was found with a RPG launcher and rocket at the side of the road, apparently killed by a 90mm cannister tank round. (This is also according to the 2/3 Command Chronology). Gradually the three survivors were able to relate what had happened. A RPG round had struck the turret and was deflected off the front and down on the driver, killing him. The tank commander, Cpl Garry Hall, began firing the .50 caliber and machinegun and was radioing for help at the same time. When the .30 caliber machinegun jammed, Cpl Hall had the loader, PFC Charles Wilson Tucker, Jr., load cannister round after cannister round. Then the enemy began throwing grenades and a satchel charge at the crew, and the tank began to roll, went out of control, left the road, and plunged down a steep embankment. When it finally came to a halt in a ravine about 100 meters from the road, it burst into flames. While PFC Tucker and LCPL John Rodriguez sprayed the area with the .45 Grease Gun, grenades, and .45 caliber pistols, Cpl Hall attempted to make radio contact for help, but all the radios were out. He then worked to shut off the engine since it had already started to spread fire along the suspension. When small arms rounds began to cook off, Cpl Hall moved the remaining tank crewmen to a foxhole as he attempted to recover the driver's body from the burning tank. When the 90mm rounds began to cook off throwing debris throughout the area, Cpl Hall estab lished a watch until first light when they were rescued by the friendly troops. (Source of information: Bronze Star Medal files on Cpl Garry Lee Hall, PFC Charles Wilson Tucker, Jr., and LCPL John Rodriguez).]

A LETTER FROM GENE WERESOW

[NOTE: Gene's father, a classical music composer, composed Symphony #7, "Khe Sanh," Opus 57 for full orchestra].

As always, the KSV newsletter rekindles a lot of suppressed memories, and as I was reading, I started to think of the time I spent in Khe Sanh. I got there in the middle of May, 1967. I was with Bravo Co., 1st Platoon, 1/26.

One of the major memories for me was the day in June we got ambushed while on patrol off hill, I think it was 861 or it could have been 881. Anyway, we got hit and as I recall most of my squad was KIA and I think 2 were WIA. I walked out without a scratch that time. We were on patrol in a southwesterly direction. As we approached a knoll we were in a V-formation and my squad was on the left flank. They hit us with mortars first, then small arms fire. Our position was overrun. Most of the platoon fell back to the right side and I was stuck on the left side of the knoll with a wounded Marine, and gooks running all over the place.

We got immediate support from some 105s which were on the hill and they started pouring in rounds right over my head. Then Huey gunships came in and sgtarted pounding a tree line near me. Man, I thought I was gone at that point! In short order the gunships were followed by two F-4 Phantoms. By this time the NVA were in full retreat. As I ran back to the top of the knoll, I saw a M-60 gunner trying to pump out rounds and feed the ammo at the same time. I ran over to help him and as we lay there a NVA comes running across, about 50 yards out, in clear view. The gunner put out maybe 50 rounds and never touched him. We just looked at each other in amazement. By this time the 2nd platoon was on its way to assist us. I remember going b ack up the hill feeling disgusted and defeated, and a General, I think it was Gen Walt, said to me, "Good show, Marine." Who knows where he came from? At that point I was so disgusted all I could say was something like, "Yeah, sure."

As we got back into the perimeter, I remember watching the 2 F-4s do a couple of low passes over the hill. They came in so low that I had to look down the hill at them. This Captain was standing next to me taking videos of the planes. They passed so low that all ponchos and other shelters were blown all over the place. It would be interesting to see those videos. Anybody out there know where these guys with the video equipment came from? It's interesting that a General and a video crew suddenly shows up out of who knows where! What is your take on that?

I guess we did put on a show that day. But it was not without cost. The next morning I was sent down to KSCB to identify the bodies of most of first squad. I remember praying for them, but did not expect what I saw. Some had half a head missing. Others had limbs blown off. God what a bad scene! I think we lost about 15 that day. It was another bad day in the Nam.

Sure would like to hear someone else's recollection and thoughts osn that day. Anyone out there remember it? May help me to put that day together better. The worst thing is I can't remember the names of the guys who died that day. Why is that? I feel bad about that. I guess it's because I was fairly new to 1/26 at that time. I was with MIKE, 3/26, prior to that.

[Note: This action occurred 07 June 1967 when a two-platoon patrol from B/1/26, moved from Hill 881-South to Hill 800 (XD75944). Results of the contact: 18 USMC KIA, 16 USMC WIA, 63 NVA confirmed killed]

Then there was the day in July, 1967. We were doing a sweep down Hwy 9 south of Khe Sanh. Our mission was to secure the road for a convoy. My squad was walking flank security on the left through the hills overlooking the highway. There was a river to the right. We came to a valley and had to work our way back down to the road to cross a bridge and then work our way back up the hill.

As I was crossing the bridge our point walked right into an enemy position and the first two or three guys got hit. At that moment an enemy machinegun which was across the river opened up and I could see the wood splinters flying off the bridge at my feet. The guy in front of me got hit. I remember he was a black guy. As I dove off the bridege into the gully below, the gooks let go. I guess it was a RPG, and blew the bridge. At that moment our point man, the squad leader, and the radioman came rolling down the hill, both were hit badly. I remember administering first aid to one man who had a nasgty stomach wound. At this point there was 5 or 6 of us who were at the lead element and were pinned down by the machinegun and gooks on top of the hill. The rest of the company was on the road back around the bend.

I had never called in a fire mission before, but I took a stab at it. We had no other choice. I got the radio and called in the coordinates of where I thought the machinegun position was. A smoke was sent—looks good to me. "Fire for effect." God was on my side again. The far side of the river erupted. The machinegun fell silent.

In order to shoot back at the NVA on the hill we had to run out to the road to shoot up. The embankment was just too steep. We threw all we had at them and were down to throwing smoke grenades and a few rounds of ammo. I recall one of the guys melting down the barrell of his M-16 in the process of trying to gain fire superiority.

I went to the radio again. As I was looking at the map I heard the foliage rustle above me and saw a ChiCom grenade emerge out of the bush. As it hit the road I watched it spin and all I could manage was to staqrt ducking away. As it exploded I felt something hit me in the chest. I put my hand to my chest thinking I was hit, only to discover the plug from the grenade laying in the palm of my hand. God was good to me again.

As the dust cleared and the ringing in my ears subsided, I got back on the radio, a PRC-25, to call in another fire mission. After all, I was well qualified by this time. I already had one fire mission under my belt. Call in grid coordinates. "On the way. Wait." Hear the round. Run out to the road to spot. Puff—smoke. Looks good to me. "Fire for effect." Oh, jeeze. Wait a minute; it's too close! Too late. Rounds are on the way. I hear them coning. This is not going to be good. "Everybody take cover—duck!" A series of ear shattering explosions. Oh, I pray they hit the right place. Dirt, trees, branches, rocks, and miscellaneous jungle parts come flying down. We are buried. Dust fills the air. Thank you, God; we are in one piece. No more grenades, no more AK-47 rounds. The gooks are dead or gone. Regroup and sweep the area. Found bodies—a number of them, ammo and weapons, food and lots of claymore mines along the embankment. An ambush in place for the convoy? How did they know? Someone said, "You'll get a medal for this." I think, three or four Marines KIA, 3-4 WIA, another bad day in the Nam. Thank you, God. I don't need another medal!

Anyone out there who was with me on that day, I sure would like to hear another version of that day. Again, I can't remember the names. Maybe someone out there can recall. I often wonder what happened to the guy with the stomach wound that I patched up. He was medevaced and I never did find out how he made out. I think he was from Florida?

[NOTE: The day of this incident was 21 July '67. 175mm guns, along with a convoy of land mines, C-4, and other ordnance, had departed Camp Carroll for Khe Sanh Combat Base when patrols from M/3/26 and B/1/26, moving along Route 9, detected and sprung the ambush. The convoy and 175s immediately turned around and returned to Camp Carroll. Evacuation of the NVA presence by commanders at Khe Sanh at the time was that it was not to ambush this convoy, but to sever Rt. 9 during the rainy season and isolate Khe Sanh Combat Base for a possible attack. Col Lownds, who became CO, 26MAR, on 12 Aug 67, does not recall the incident, and Col John J. Padley, CO prior to that, during a conversation prior to his death, while recalling the incident, did not recall the reason for the 175s coming to KSCB. Two possibilities are: to provide the artillery support for BV-33, "Elephant," in Laos, which was part of the mission of Regiment; or, to provide support for the newly-forming FOB-3, whose patrols would be operating in the eastern Laotian and DMZ areas, to call in fire on large enemy units, supply, headqurters, communication facilities, oil pipe lines, etc.

Concerning Mr. Weresow's Symphony: a letter from a music reviewer notes: "..the Symphony is a work of considerable merit, great professional skill and high artistic content. One of those commenting ont he work is Mr. John Duffy... His organizagtion funds and receives grants for new compositions of a serious nature by new and unknown American composers. Mr. Duffy has carefully examined the score and reported to me that the work shows a degree of musical accomplishment beyond that of many composers who have established reputations. He informs me that this is a remarkable work.."

Think of it, men! We have a symphony! An examination of the score reflects that the music captures the Siege times and how life was for those of us who were there, in all its multi-faceted variations].

NOTE FROM LARRY MC CARTNEY

On July 1, 1997, I will finally retire from the United States Marine Corps Reserve after thirty years, one month, and ten days of service. No one can serve a successful career, six months or thirty years, officer or enlisted, active or reserve, without the positive influence of others, and I am no different. Actually I am most fortunate. I enjoyed serving with some remarkable people. As a young man I was rather hardheaded, luckily most recognized that as a positive trait in a Marine. Men such as Captain Earle Breeding, Lieutenants Joe Meeks, Fred DeSteffano, Nick Elardo, Don Shanley, Bruce Lewy, Jeff Lloyd, Jeff Bodenweiser, SSGT Merle Moritz, Sgts Vince Griffith and J.J. McDuffy, Cpl Tom Eichler and LCPLs Bob Reed, Jack Phillips, and Gary Daffin, all left their mark on me. Likewise positive peer influence was critical to my personal and professional growth. Men such as Eddie Ginn, Mike Worth, Joe Roble, Wayne Sanders, Matt Welsh, and Jim Kaylor to name just a few. Some of those men are gone now, gone for many years. Others continue to provide a positive influence just by continuing to maintain despite the difficulty involved. Not gone are the lessons I learned. Lessons of responsibility, respect, dedication, perseverance, and professionalism. I was not always a receptive student. Actually, in some instances I was a very difficult student, but learn I eventually did. I would like to take this opportunity to express my deepest appreciation to those Marines and the many others who had such a profound and positive influence on me; it is a direct result of your teaching while accomplishing a most difficult mission that I have been able to learn, grow, and continue on. Some of the people and incidents that come to mind include the non-judgmental, astute, advice of Lt Don Shanley, the quiet dignity of Lt Jeff Lloyd, the professionalism of Cpl Tom Eichler, the aggressive, mission-first, spirit of LCPL Bob Reed, and the leadership by example LCPL Gary Daffin consistently demonstrated. Gary had to know that his last act would lead to his death, but he didn't let that stop him from trying. He saw something that had to be done so there was never a question that he would do it. With leadership like that one can never fail. It is my sincerest wish that you all believe your efforts have been worthwhile. I hope I have achieved a degree of success in passing on to our youth of today that which I learned from you those many years ago. Semper Fidelis!!!

I'm looking for information about a close friend, [HM3] Frank Calzia..In 1966 Frank and I had been out of school for a year and we were 19-1/2 years old. Frank and another pal joined the Navy and I went in the Army just to be contrary to my all Navy family. By the summer of 67 were both going overseas and spent our last leave together. When we got incountry we wrote and planned to meet on R&R... Frank and I wrote to each other and confided our fears and hopes. When he didn't show up on R&R it seemed that another plan had run aground. After I got back to Kontum his sister wrote to me that Frank had died on 10 May ['68].

I must be looking for a sort of the closure on his last days as he was the kindest and most gentle of men and no matter how bad my own life seemed it was put in perspective by the letters of Frank.... He died in a mortar attack covering a chaplain with his body receiving a head wound. There just has to be more to this man's life. I'm sure he was loved by many... He must have stood out among his peers at least I want to think so. I hope that if you knew him or of him your life and others were made richer. Contact: Jack Mahan, 188 Live Oak Rd., Watsonville CA 95076.

[Note: Frank Calzia was a corpsman in B/1/26 and was in the 30 Mar '68 patrol].

THE ARMY AT KHE SANH

By Chaplain Ray W. Stubbe

The last issue of our magazine was to have been the last that I did as Temporary Editor, having done Issues No. 37, 38, 39, and 40. However, I had promised that there would be an issue devoted to the Army at Khe Sanh and knew that I was the only one who had much of the information that could be used to prepare such an issue.

I want to tell you a story. It is a story of people you probably don't know, eventhough they were at Khe Sanh. Like so many individual Marines who did so much and received so little recognition for what they did, those who served Army units have not received much publicity or acknowledgment. The reasons are varied: their classified missions, focus on major events and units to the neglect of smaller units and unreported events, the small numbers of personnel. In many ways this is a story of camaraderie and humanity, of actions of caring and commitment to serve and care for others. This is a very human story of strong heroes who cared tenderly without recognition or reward. Here are Khe Sanh vets we need to know better and appreciate; like all of us, they and their actions must never be forgotten.

There are some personal reasons for writing this story. Prior to the Siege battle, FOB-3 was a "mecca" for the Marines of the Combined Action Company platoon that was located just outside the perimeter of the Combat Base who came over to obtain various pieces of gear since the FOB-3 supply seemed virtually inexhaustable. They even had a large wooden box containing bottles of hard liquor! And they willingly shared it! One of the FOB-3 soldiers wanted to give me a Swedish K-gun; he explained that I was out with Marines on the hills and on their patrols and was in an unsafe area! Marines from the recon company on base would come with sandbags of broken K-bar knives and, in exchange, obtain some of the latest "hot dog" stuff. When LCPL Marion Lee Meggs of the Recon Company drowned in the Rao Quan River (16 Nov 67), I visited FOB-3 to ask for some nylon mountain line since all the Marines had was some parachute shroud line, and Major Lucius Campbell, the CO, gave me an entire spool of the nylon line saying, "Take it all, take anything, just get the Marine back!" I recall one very senior FOB-3 soldier, hard-looking with an animal's tooth hanging from a necklace, saying to me as we looked at the Laotian refugees from the fall of Lang Vei outside the wire: "Chaplain, I'm not a religious person, but please say a few prayers for those people outside there. I know quite a few of them." I looked into his moist eyes and beheld the goodness of humanity beneath all the mud, dust, battle, and hardness. I recall holding a worship service at FOB-3 during the Siege. The men seemed abnormally intense and intent with their eyes wide open, looking at me, almost in awe—until after I finished and, while leaving, gazed at a wood beam above me on which was tacked a large centerfold from a Playboy magazine!

Some of what follows may be some of the stranger aspects of the war and of what was going on at Khe Sanh, and it is time that their story is told.

JTAD

Americans walking the jungles of the Khe Sanh area and neighboring Laos in civilian clothes, former NVA now loyal to us reporting on NVA units operating in the area, reports of NVA regiments and battalions and of Russian advisors which made the Khe Sanh area—seemingly so serene, even a Garden of Eden—to be the playground of lurking demons of destruction which suddenly devoured life: this was the world of JTAD, the Joint Technical Advisory Detachment.

In mid-October '66 III MAF reported JTAD bilateral collection capability, and soon thereafter a JTAD Station was located at Khe Sanh. By the Hill Battles of '67, reports from JTAD began pouring into the command at Khe Sanh. For example, on 13 May, JTAD reported a long established NVA bivouac area at Co Roc (XD 741317) into which two battalions of the 95C Regiment had moved. On 27 May, capitalizing on agent reports from JTAD of 15 May, an afternoon of air strikes against a trail complex, harbor site and supply area, produced a virtual 4th of July fireworks display when, at 1305, jet strikes in an area 8 - 9 clicks directly south of Khe Sanh village produced one large secondary explosion and five secondary fires. Subsequent air strikes during the next two hours produced several additional large secondary explosions and fires. JTAD reported Russian advisors entering the Khe Sanh area accompanying NVA units. JTAD continued to report caves, 130mm mortars on rails, large troop concentrations, and logistic activity on the Co Roc area throughout the summer and fall of '67.

III MAF's G-2, MGEN Kenneth J. Houghton, was cautious, however: "They were a funny outfit," he noted, "They worked on turning prisoners around. In other words, we'd capture somebody, and then [we would] turn them around. We'd tell them about how great we were...They [the enemy soldiers] would be indoctrinated all their 18, 20 years on earth, and we'd get them for two months! And then, these people [JTAD] were 'undercover'. When I inspected them and took over as G-2, they were wearing civilian clothes! I said, 'Why are you wearing civilian clothes?' They said, 'Well, we're under cover!' Well, you know anybody who wore civilian clothes stood out like a sore thumb!"

Nagging concerns by those in the "2" shops who received their reports varied from "Are they saying this because this is what they think we want to hear?" (which is a typical Oriental propensity) to "Is their loyalty still to North Vietnam, and they're feeding us information to divert our resources or disregard a major enemy activity." Furthermore, the information was usually many days old by the time it was received, and then, there was no way to evaluate the information since the track record of individual sources was unknown. Their reports were always F-6.

Col Daniel Lord Baldwin, III (the SOG OP-35 desk at CCN, DaNang) when asked once if one could really turn the loyalty of a North Vietnamese or if they simply reported what we wanted to hear, said, "They brought back ears. They brought back some fantastic photos too."

Capt. Wayne Long, who flew in to brief Col. Lownds and his S-2, Maj Jerry Hudson, during the Siege during the last week of Feb '68 and the second week of March on what had been coming down the Ho Chi Minh Trail in Laos and what targets he could utilize, felt that the JTAD was quite successful: "I think that by the time the Siege started, the Regiment had a pretty fair intelligence picture that we updated and kept fairly accurate. I don't think there were any surprises in terms of forces." Col Lownds, nevertheless, would ask him, "Was this seen by a round eye" [an American]? (1Lt Wayne Long (later Col) operated out of Pakse, Laos, for a unit headed by Ray Gonzales which consisted of Road Watch teams observing the Ho Chi Minh Trail. "We were primarily working in the 'denied areas' with some indigenous assets. We'd set up a little base camp, sit beside the road for about 20 days, sometimes with an American, more often without one, and then we had a thing called a 'HARK' radio which had counters—a different frequency for each counter—for trucks, for weapons of various sizes, for people, and even for armor. A convoy would come by and one of our indigenous would just punch every time he saw one. The radio signalled up to a C-130 that orbited—had a succession of 130s that orbited 24 hours a day.)

JTAD was actually part of Company C, 519th Military Intelligence Battalion (and previously SMIAT, Special Military Intelligence Activities Team), which was part of the 500th MI in Japan. The Vietnamese counterpart was the 924th Support Group. The Combined Action Company OSCAR at Khe Sanh was tasked with the responsibility of feeding and housing the Americans of JTAD Station co-located in the MACV District HQ compound in Khe Sanh village.

From late '66 to mid '67, JTAD at Khe Sanh included a Sergeant James Turner and Sergeant Ed Bowman (known to the Vietnamese as "Mr. Ed"); but both wore civilian clothes, had civilian ID, and their cover story was that they were drawing maps of the area for National Geographic. They used a light blue truck at Khe Sanh with a STP sticker on the side door.

One of their informants was the Vietnamese official in Khe Sanh ville from the National Police. (This was a powerful person who had been seen, on occasion, torturing Bru with electric generators by Cpl Daniel R. Kelley who, when he reported it, was promoted to Sergeant, but transferred from the CAP in the village to the CAP just outside the main gate of the Combat Base). The National Police representative was known to be feeding information to the North Vietnamese and became a channel to feed false information to them.

Another contact was a coffee planter, not the Poilanes, but the Basque named Llinares (referred to as Leinterest in a III MAF area study of Khe Sanh) who was located southeast of Khe Sanh village near Lang Kat (1) and (2). It had been rumored that he had killed a Bru woman with an ax, and perhaps was connected with the death of Eugene Poilane in the 1964 ambush on Route 9. Llinares had been with Eugene when the Citroen car they were driving came under rifle fire, mortally wounding Eugene (who had arrived at Khe Sanh in 1918 following his WW I service in Vietnam, and who, because of his coffee plantation, is responsible for the origins and development of Khe Sanh village). Llinares had been very wealthy in North Vietnam, lost everything, and settled at Khe Sanh at the former plantation owned by M. Rome. During WW II, the French planter, Monsieur Rome lived here with his Japanese wife and a Japanese gardner. When the Japanese arrived at the end of WW II, they lived "pretty high," but then mysterious disappeared. According to Madame Madeleine Poilane, she spied both for the Japanese and the Viet Minh on French positions and was killed—some say by the Viet Minh, others say by the French. Her body was never found and the property reverted to the government.) It was here that Llinares had contacts with the Viet Cong; a network of VC was discovered in the village at the bottom of the Llinares plantation. Following this, the Bru were resettled, and any pro-VC Bru departed into the hills. Following a double assassination of two workers of Llinares in his house, his wife departed, demanded protection from the Province Chief of Quang Tri, and never returned.

James Turner recalls the Marine Force Recon detachment at KSCB in early '67, and the LtCol at the Combat Base who, when informed of NVA units operating in the area, responded, "O, these numbers—they can't be right." Turner replied, "I'm telling you, we checked them pretty good; they're right." The information was disregarded. The Special Forces also disregarded their reports "until they were nearly overrun one time [04 May 67] and we had given them the coordinates where the mortars were set up b efore they even started shooting. After that, they listened to us pretty well."

Ed Brown and James Turner frequently would go out for a week or so, no radios, perhaps deep into Laos. "We carried United Nations Non-Combatant cards. Supposedly you had two of them, duplicates, and if you got captured, you gave one to the enemy, kept the other, and they'd let you go!" Yeah! Sure!

"We'd just go out, and there were a couple of times we went out to learn the territory. We went around with the Montagnard troops that were stationed there in the village. We had one guy that went with us all the time who knew the area really well. We'd tell him where we wanted to go, and he'd take us there.. He knew where the North Vietnamese walked and he just took us. Sometimes we'd set up in the hills there and watch a battalion go by—it would be just tons of equipment. But it was kind of a crazy operation because we had no radios, they didn't know where we were, they didn't even know where we were going. If we turned up missing, they wouldn't have any idea what happened to us."

SPECIAL PROJECTS

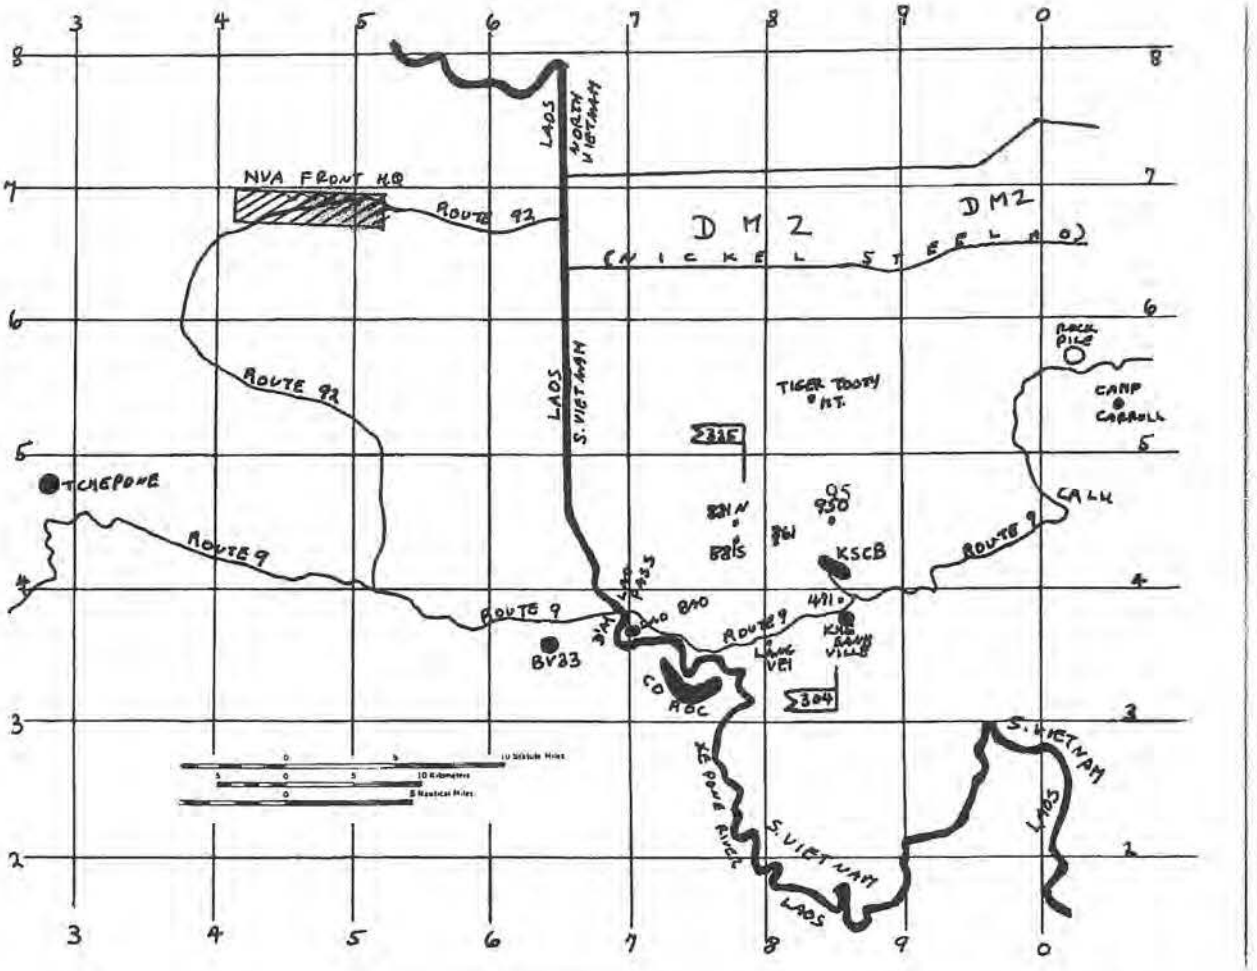
1. ELEPHANT

"Where are they?" They could only feel the reality of what was to unfold: we know they're everywhere, but we do not see them. In the eerie, silent, depopulated jungles of eastern Laos near the Co Roc Massif, the three Americans with their Bru soldiers of FOB-3 team PENNSYLVANIA waited, watched, wondered. They knew the NVA were there—and in large force. Patrolling this area was like moving on the surface of an enlarged, great hornet's nest: suddenly, without warning, they could suddenly, violently, be lethally stung. Vietnam was that way: you could be in peace and tranquility and then, like throwing a light switch, suddenly be in the clutches of terror.

They had visited the nearby camp of a Royal Lao volunteer battalion, BV-33, located (at XD 625379) astride Route 9 at the Ban Houei Sane airstrip, some 22 clicks due west of Khe Sanh village—roughly 13 miles, which may seem far except for the fact that the assigned mission for Operation SCOTLAND included artillery support for BV33.

BV-33 (or "ELEPHANT" as Americans referred to it), was a CIA-supported unit with drug-trafficing as a "cover"; North Vietnamese Army units supposed it to be simply a Lao group running drugs which obviously would have no connection to the Americans, and passed it by—until 25 January 1968 when they overran it with tanks.

The 500 soldiers of BV-33 were a sort of home guard or militia and lived at this location with some 2300 dependents, chickens and pigs, in an austere area offering no food other than fish and frogs from the nearby Xe Pone River, wild vegetation such as bamboo root, and an occasional deer or wild buffalo. The camp was resupplied by the CIA's Air America flights, originally from Savannakhet, Laos. On 05 Sep 1963, a CIA C-47 flight using Chinese National registry, made three resupply flights to BV-33, some 200 kilometers east of Savannakhet but less than eight from South Vietnam. The aircraft was piloted by Americans Capt Joseph C. Cheney and Co-pilot Charles G. Herrick. The radioman was Y. C. To, a citizen of Hong Kong, and the "kickers" (who threw out the supplies) were Eugene H. DeBruin (a former smoke jumper for the US Forestry Service), and three Thai nationals: Pisidhi Indradat, Prasit Promsuwan, and Prasit Dhanee. On their third trip, while passing over the major NVA logistics center at Tchepone at 4,000 feet, the C-47 was struck by 37mm antiaircraft and crashed at XD2748. DeBruin is still MIA. As a result of this incident, the CIA Air America flights to resupply BV-33 were subsequently launched from Khe Sanh, and then, mainly DaNang, though using Khe Sanh occasionally.



KHE SANH BATTLEFIELD AREA

The CO of BV-33 in 1967-68, Col Phetsomphou Soulang, had briefed team PENNSYLVANIA of NVA positions near the Lao/SVietnam border, including the newly-developed road, Route 92 that wended through some karst limestone spire-like formations full of caves some ten miles west of the DMZ, which American signal intelligence had indicated to be a suspected Front Headquarters controlling two NVA Divisions that were encircling Khe Sanh, not moving through the area, but remaining. The S-2 of 26th Marines, Maj Harper Bohr, Jr., referred to this trail and its associated network going into S. Vietnam as the "Santa Fe Trail." Col John Roberts ("Col Jack") of the USAF 20th TASS detachment at Khe Sanh (operation TIGERHOUND), was a good friend of Soulang and had flown over this developing route on numerous occasions, spotting "pink elephants" colored because of the red clay, along with numerous NVA. On one occasion, he had obtained the assistance of "Doc" Secor [MSGT Gilbert A. Secor] from Team PENNSYLVANIA to administer shots to the children of ELEPHANT during an outbreak of a disease. Wearing the uniform of a USAF officer provided by Col. Jack, he was flown by him to give the shots. A few days later, Col. Jack was called "on the carpet" to DaNang to appear before half a dozen Colonels to explain why he violated orders from Ambassador Sullivan by having an American Air Force "flight surgeon" in Laos! They asked who the Flight Surgeon was (since they had contacted all USAF flight surgeons in all of WESTPAC and could account for all of them).

2. WARNINGS

The information PENNSYLVANIA obtained only confirmed what had already been reported. The Khe Sanh Station of the JTAD had reported on 25 Aug 67 a NVA company camped in stone caves at the foot of Co Roc. Another JTAD report—this one dated 30 Sept—placed a 800-man NVA unit just inside the Laotian border, 16 clicks south of Route 9 (at XD687547), the eastern part of the NVA Front HQ (noted in a CIA report as 9 miles directly west of the DMZ).

A document captured 06 Nov 67 providing the NVA plans for the Winter-Spring Offensive, listed as its first objective: "the annihilation of a major U.S. troop unit and inflicting heavy casualties, to draw U.S. troops away from populated areas." By Dec., a CIA report warned "..the VC/NVA are undertaking something very much like an all-out punch.." FMFPAC's estimate of enemy capabilities (written in Dec 67) noted: "That the enemy would plan a major offensive in the western DMZ region was logical., and the Marine combat base at Khe Sanh would appear, to him, to offer some hope of military advantage."

Col Lownds, speaking to a group of Marines of B/1/26 in the chilling fog enveloping Hill 881-South on Marine Corps Birthday of '67 said: "We here at Khe Sanh are going to be remembered in our American history books!" making the scene even more chilling to those who heard him. Ironically, Lt Don Jacques had volunteered his platoon that day to do the patrol; he and his men were slipping through the muddy, slippery slopes and slushing in treacherous streams, bamboo thickets and razor-cutting elephant grass while Col Lownds spoke to the rest of their Company.

The day before, Gen Starbird visited the hill. Gen. Starbird, head of Defense Communications Program Group (DCPG), a CIA-front research agency at the Pentagon, was in charge of developing the electronic sensor program. Gen. Starbird and Maj Bruce Greene, CO of B/1/26, walked apart from everyone else and sauntered to the north side of the hill where the General pointed north, an omnious visual signal portending conflict.

During August and September, the rumor among the troops was a prophecy by Jeanne Dixon of "1200 American dead at Khe Sanh." [Note: During the period Jan 67 - 11 Jul 68, official records indicate 1232 American KIA at Khe Sanh].

Detachments from 1st Radio Co built strange huts on Hill 881-South and elsewhere, and reports from the "People Sniffer" missions gave literally hundreds of indications during October, 1967, when they first started flying these missions in the immediate area around Khe Sanh. The acetate overlay covering the tactical map, a red dot for each sighting, appeared to be solid red to those sitting in chairs for the briefing. [Note: Signal intelligence can easily be flawned by a transmitter placed here or there, broadcasting to resemble a regimental or Bn headquarters, even coordinated by having one transmitter respond to another, to reflect a "chain of command;" people sniffers (a device mounted on UH-1E choppers which fly 50 feet above ground level to detect ammonia smells given off by people) can detect the urine smell of families of passing monkeys or other animals; electronic sensors might detect noises from our own exploding rounds. (USAF numbers on NVA casualties, based on secondary explosions from most close air suipport strikes, are erroneous since, unknown to them, artillery at Khe Sanh fired into their boxes. It is only when all are integrated that the emerging picture of an enemy presence unfolds—and, at Khe Sanh, it was unfolding on a grand scale during the last few months of 1967!]

Those in command could only reflect on what was happening, waiting orders to withdraw or to be reinforced. The decision "on the top" (actually, all the way to the White House), was to reinforce Khe Sanh, make all of us there into a lucrative target, a bulls-eye, or fly-paper, to take advantage of the approaching large NVA force, engage and fix them and, like a wrestler, use their strength against them, destroying them.

3. "SKIP" MINNICKS

PENNSYLVANIA observed units of NVA in khaki and units of NVA in olive drab. "We knew that there was a huge, strong force." Part of the NVA plans included preparation of Co Roc, that massive dark theater-curtain-like sight one could see from Hill 861 that made one wonder when the curtain would be pulled back and the tragic play commence.

But now, Co Roc was shrouded in an eerie silence. It was mid-January, 1968, and no NVA were here! (Actually, as signal intercepts later confirmed, they had already moved most of their units into positions to attack Khe Sanh).

Among those standing atop Co Roc was Master Sergeant Charles "Skip" Minnicks and Maj George Quamo. At 38, Skip was the oldest SOG team leader; Maj George Quamo was probably the youngest SOG Major. Both were members of "Special Projects," an effort to develop a guerrilla force to operate in Laos in the area of Mu Gia Pass to Tchepone, the first leg of the Trail in Laos.

Overhead, a Birddog aircraft circled with its passenger, Col Harold K. Rose, that Skip recalls as "a wonderful, wonderful man." [Note: Col Rose died suddenly on 11 May 90 from an aneurysm]. Col Rose radioed to Quamo: "I want you out of there. I want you out of there now!" Quamo, in his black uniform—he had all his team dress in black—simply responded, "To my knowledge, I am in command at this location. Out."

Skip Minnicks stood in awe of this man—as did everyone who came in contact with him, a sort of "Lawrence of Arabia" of Vietnam, handsome, brilliant, forceful, charismatic.

It hadn't always been that way. The arrival of George Quamo to the small (one-half of an A-team) unit which was then located at the Old French Fort on the eastern edge of Khe Sanh ville (also called "Fort Dix") was not a happy event. Skip Minnicks recalls, "Here comes this new Captain. He looked like a kid I resented him! And I made it apparent." As deeply as he resented him, however, his admiration for this new officer would eventually know no limits, and Minnicks was not alone. Robert Cavanaugh recalls: "We received a message that they were sending an officer to command our little group.. Needless to say, we were quite upset and couldn't understand why the Army was fixing something that wasn't broken. Quamo arrived on site about three days later, and you can believe that he was not on friendly ground. Before the year was finished [the 3 months remaining in 1967] I truly believe that every American on those teams would have followed him to hell to put out the fire if he asked."

When Minnicks reported to the Sergeant-Major of CCN [Command and Control North, the SOG Hq in the northern part of S. Vietnam], he was told to report to FOB-1 (at Phu Bai) to become the temporary Sergeant-Major there since the SgtMaj was rotating back to the States. "I said, 'No, let's talk. This is my fourth trip. I didn't have to make any trips. The only reason I came here was because I was allowed to volunteer for this outfit. I want a team.' He said, 'You're too old. You can't keep up.' I said, 'Give me a shot. If I can't keep up, I'll be the first one to come to you.' So he begrudgingly gave it to me. I had team PENNSYLVANIA.'"

When he first arrived and took over a small detachment, there were three or four teams of Bru in the beginning of their training phase; the officer in charge, Maj Patton, had already departed.

4. FRED PATTON

Maj Fred Patton had preceeded Skip Minnicks here. First by himself, and later together with Charles Berg and James Hetrick, the Special Projects effort was launched at Khe Sanh.

Patton's arrival had been the result of a meeting in early October, 1966, attended by Secretary McNamara, accompanied by Nicholas Katzenbach (Attorney General of the US), Robert Komer (CORDS), Gen Wheeler (Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff), General Westmoreland (COMUSMACV), and Ambassador Lodge with Premier Nguyen Cao Ky. During the course of the meeting, Ky emphasized "his belief that a secret base of non-Communist Vietnamese should be established in the mountains along the Laos border in the southern part of North Vietnam; specially trained teams operating from such a base could do a great deal through sabotage and other methods to work against infiltration."

The problem of the "porous border" had been recognized and identified by the American Ambassador as early as Dec 1960, with the warning that if the border could not be closed, all our efforts would be in vain. In 1963—and, we may assume, years earlier—Vietnamese patrolled into the eastern Laotian area up to 15 KM.

[It should be of interest—although no one to my knowledge has yet written about it—that the borders near Khe Sanh, both the DMZ and with Laos, were highly in dispute—not simply "porous"—, and may have prompted subsequent conflict. Concerning the DMZ: The Potsdam Conferences of 1945, discussing arrangements for the Japanese surrender, divided Indochina at the 16th parallel, having the Japanese surrender to the Chinese (Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek) north of that parallel and surrender to the Brittish (Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten) south of that parallel. (The 16th parallel runs just south of DaNang.) At the Geneva Conference, however, the Demarcation Line (DMZ) was placed at the 17th parallel. The Vietnamese representative, Dong, insisted it be at the 16th parallel; Mendez-France insisted it be at the 18th, and Molotov said, "Then we agree that the split should be at the 17th parallel." Bernard Fall (in a very difficult to locate printed study) explains the 17th parallel as the result of "the conciliatory role played at Geneva by the USSR which in 1954 was trying to induce France not to join the European Defense Community." (The events in Europe were casting long, dark shadows as far away as Vietnam). The Khe Sanh area, as with all of Northern I Corps Tactical Zone, was thus an area of contention even before hostilities erupted. (Frances FitzGerald, writing in 1967, noted that when the French departed from Saigon in 1955-56, they left behind a "regroupment zone" just beneath the 17th Parallel, "..a political jungle of sects, local warlords, Viet Minh, partisan troops, and Saigon politicians, all of them rooted in provincial issues and family feuds." He writes that this Parallel, by including the southern half of the ancient empire of Annam, exposed the South to the larger political passions of such Central Vietnamese as Ho Chi Minh. During the 300 days of regroupment ("Passage to Freedom") nearly a million Northerners, mainly Catholics, moved south, but the former Viet Minh cadres waited to begin hostilities). Concerning the Lao/Vietnam border, a survey team investigating MIA sites discovered on 31 Oct 1992 that the border had been moved from just west of the 66 North/South line to the 63 line. Moving in the opposite direction, many Laotians regard Lao Bao as Laotian territory]

On 24 Jan 1964, MACSOG was organized, and in March, 1964, the Joint Chiefs of Staff advised the Secretary of Defense that the time had come to lift restrictions on any Americans accompanying patrols into Laos. In May of '64, JCS (along with the Dept of State and SecDef) authorized COMUSMACV to begin planning for limited patrols "..for the purpose of gathering information on VC logistic activities in the area of Laos between Route 9 and the 17th Parallel adjacent to the border," but no Americans were initially authorized to accompany these patrols.

As a result, Operation LEAPING LENA was conducted 24 Jun - 1 Jul 64. Five teams were inserted by parachute into Laos along Route 9 east of Tchepone. It was a dismal failure: only five survivors returned to Vietnam. They did detect, however, a NVA battalion crossing into Vietnam west of Khe Sanh.

In Mar 65, COMUSMACV assigned responsibility for operations into Laos from Vietnam to MACSOG, and a 3-phase plan was developed. Phase 1: 10-man teams penetrate Laos for up to 10 days to collect intelligence and acquire targets; Phase 2: duration is extended to 3 weeks and the quantity of missions increase; Phase 3: deep penetration for periods up to 12 months and "in specific areas, mission includes organizing indigenous into resistance and intelligence nets, physical destruction, sabotage."

In Jul 65, cross-border ops were to be conducted from the Forward Operating Base (FOB) at Kham Duc, and were given the nick-name SHINING BRASS. The first mission was 2 Nov 65.

By Apr 66, use of helicopters for insertion was approved. SOG teams were authorized to patrol up to 5 KM inside Laos and, in Jun '66, up to 10 KM with teams having no more than 3 American advisors.

It was during June '66 that Col Charles Norton arrived at the Special Forces Camp, Khe Sanh (later KSCB) and developed a launch site for FOB-1 (campsite located at Phu Bai). [It was important that the Launch Site be different than the camp site to have a minimum number of people at the launch site and, for security, to prevent conversations with Special Forces, natives talking with natives, etc.]. Billy Waugh also worked at the Khe Sanh Launch Site.

On 1 Mar 67 the nickname SHINING BRASS was replaced with PRAIRIE FIRE, and the main mission was: "to conduct special operations to counter enemy infiltration through Laos and into South Vietnam."

To implement Phase 3, and the concept of Ky, MACV in Mar '67 proposed that a guerrilla force be organized from the hill tribes of the Annamite mountain region. Training in South Vietnam, the force would then establish contacts with village leaders in Laos. PRAIRIE FIRE teams, accompanied by these trained personnel, would enter an area, establish contact and proceed in the classical role of developing a guerrilla force and conduct guerrilla warfare.

The American Ambassador in Vientiane, Laos, proposed in September, 1967, that the force train in Laos, operate under the Laotian Army, and that American personnel would not participate in ground combat operations with them. His suggestion was too late, however; Maj Patton had been with the Bru to determine whether or not they could be organized and trained for such warfare, and had started training them. The Bru tribe was optimal since its tribal area covered both eastern Laos and northwestern South Vietnam; they freely travelled back and forth as though the artificial national boundary didn't exist. The force being dedveloped was to operate in the area between Mu Gia Pass and Tchepone, but, as James W. Moore notes, "Now that was day-dreaming if there ever was!"

Maj Patton had determined that the Bru were especially good in the jungle, detecting the presence of others—almost magically attune were they to scents, noises, visual signs that they knew when someone else was nearby. Also, they had a mechanical ability: "They learned how to drive and take care of weapons faster than any group I've ever worked with."

The local missionary family at Khe Sanh who were involved with developing a written Bru language, making the Bru literate for the first time in their tribal history, and translating the Bible into Bru, provided a Bru boy to assist Patton who reciprocated by providing building materials to refurbish an old, abandoned French house to be their home. Mr. John Miller recalls that Patton said he was writing a history of the Bru tribe. Gradually, more and more Amereicans arrived for the "history" project, notes Mr. Miller, "but just how many people do you need to write a history?" The American group then gathered a dozen Bru to work with, then 20, then 40, and located at the Old French Fort.

The first arrivals from SOG temporarily ruined the local economy, paying an extravagant rent of 20,000 to 24,000 P [Piastres] per month! The Bru were very disturbed; it wasn't "right." When Mr. Miller informed the SOG officials that this was gross inflation, they replied that this was what they were required to pay. Some Bru received more pay than their village chiefs, the salaries ranging from 8,000 to `18,000 P per month. In addition, some Bru received "hazardous" pay for going on patrols, and could not understand why some should be paid more for doing that.

Skip Minnicks remembers the honesty of the Bru: "They didn't even have a word in their language for 'theft' or 'steal' or 'rob'. Here we come. The first thing we did—because we thought we were being generous—we gave them three uniforms, two pair of boots. Well, they found out immediately that they could trade, barter for food and necessities, and so they became capitalists like us. They began to steal from each other, and I thought, O my God!"

Maj Patton sought a location for his proposed Bru guerrilla force and focused on the abandoned prison site at Lao Bao where Route 9 passes through the Lao/Vietnam border. Located on flat terrain mostly surrounded by a loop in the Xe Pone River, the area afforded fields of fire of at least 1500 feet and contained an abandoned airstrip. Walls of the abandoned prison/fort were mostly intact except for one corner, and the interior walls were concrete several feet thick.

A Bru named "Onya" [pronounced "on" + "yah"], while not a "chief" in the Bru tribe (which was hereditary) was nevertheless a spokesman and representative for the Bru. Onya had been educated in Hue with Felix Poilane, the son of the original French coffee planter, Eugene, who had established his plantation here in 1918. It was said by some that Onya was actually Eugene's son by a Bru woman. (He did father ten children, five born after he was 60). Onya said he had been a guard at Lao Bao while Giap was imprisoned there. (There were many legends about Onya, who was a man shrouded in mystery. During the Siege, Dan Kelley of CAC OSCAR noted that he would disappear for several days at a time, and then reappear in the FOB-3 compound).

Onya promised Maj Patton 1500-2000 Bru to form a camp at Lao Bao. The plan was shot down, however, by the SOG HQ who noted it "was within mortar range of surrounding territory!" One might ask: what area in Vietnam wasn't? It is interesting to speculate what may have happened during the Siege with the force occupying massive bunkers that they had at FOB-3 if they had, instead, been situated at Lao Bao on the border.

Although much of the initial training was conducted in the Khe Sanh area itself, many of their initial efforts involved contact with BV-33 in Laos. On one "visit," Berg and Hetrick, together with about four "yards" drove from Khe Sanh to Ban Houei Sane in a jeep. Patton had ordered them, "Do not take any weapons." It was a direct order from Ambassador William H. Sullivan.

"Do you have a weapon," asked Berg.

"Yeah, I got two 9mm in my belt, grenades in the pocket," responded Hetrick.

Berg looked over to Hetrick, "Why are we doing this? O God, I don't believe all of this is happening! It's amazing how many grenades and how many magazines you can get for a 9mm underneath the top jacket or in baggy clothing—the baggiest ones you can find!"

One of their first missions involved working with a Special Forces A-Team on the Vietnamese side while the Special Projects team went over into Laos as a blocking force for their flank. A young Special Forces Captain who asked to accompany them as a "strap-hanger," started up a hill by himself during a break, triggering a battle which seemed like "the world opened up." Charles Berg was hit in both legs; he couldn't walk.

"Roll me down in the ditch here and cover me up in this gully with enough stuff and give me a weapon and ammunition and come back tomorrow," Berg told his Bru. "They'll just pass over it."

"Nah, I'm going to take you with me," said the short Bru soldier, who carried Berg on his back. Berg carried the weapon.

The two men got to the middle of the river. "Stay here!" yelled Berg.

Hetrick, on the other side, looked incredulous. "What the —— you doing?"

"The cold water feels so good in these bullet holes in my leg!"

"Get outta that water! Git!"

Berg was medevaced 14 Feb '67.

During the Battle of the Hills, Patton attempted on several occasions to tell the Marine staff where his training patrols in country had fixed NVA positions. In one case, a patrol near 881-S had located a cave in which the NVA force was staging. At one point, six Bru "dragged" Patton to a hill to show him. But the Marines wouldn't "buy it." "What cave?"

5. CODES & THE BRU

Fred Patton had been at Khe Sanh some six months when he departed to take over FOB-1, and Skip Minnicks arrived. Skip moved the cadre to the Old French Fort position (from the house directly across from the MACV District compound, referred to as the "Howard Johnson's"), an abandoned French military position on the eastern edge of Khe Sanh village. Frequent visits were made to BV-33 and from them, much was learned of the NVA activity in the area. Skip Minnicks was able to run 19 missions until the Siege abruptly stopped the development of their guerrilla force.

OLD FRENCH FORT (Photo by James H. Whitenack)

On one mission, he found his team being chased by a large NVA force. "I didn't know how large; I just knew it was large. We got too close and couldn't get out. They were actually looking for us with flashlights; that's how confident they were that they were strong enough. The next day, help came and I completely disregarded the KAK code—everything. I said, 'Birddog, this is me.' He said, 'You go ahead, me!'"

There were several expedient Shackle Codes, of course. [Shackle Codes are a word or two with ten non-repeating letters in which each letter is assigned a number. For example, using "CHAPEL FUND", C=1, H=2, A=3, etc., or, A=1, P=2, E=3, and C=9. Shackling the numbers of a grid coordinate is simply a matter of giving the right letters. Numerous shackle codes are possible, for example:

QUIET WORLD	WALT DISNEY	CHAIN SMOKE
BLUE SHADOW	QUIET WORLD	VIOLET RAYS
DOG WHISTLE	FLY QUICKER	PEARL S BUCK
COUP DE GRAS	SQUAD FORCES	TEN OF CLUBS
TURKEY LOAF	THE COMPANY	STOMPED BUG
WHITE VODKA	JOURNALIST	AFORESIGHT
BLUE MONDAY	REPUBLICAN	BLACK SHIRT
FRUIT CAKES	BASILONE RD	DIRTYWOMAN
BLUE SHADOW	BRICK HOUSE	BROWN CHIEF
TWO NUMBERS	PHONY FEAST	SHACKELING
CHARLESTON	WASHINGTON	ENGLISH BOY
CRIMSON TAP	BALTIMORES	HEAVY DRINK
TWO QUAKERS	VOLKSWAGEN	SQUARE MIND
BLACKSTONE	FIVE CLOCKS	QUADRICEPS
QUALIFY NOW	LONG SQUEAK	BRIGHT POLE
WRONG BLAST	BEAUFORT SC	HYDRAULICS

One shackle code used by SOG teams operating out of Khe Sanh was "TIGERHOUND," the name of the USAF operation of 20th TASS flying the Bird Dog aircraft. Another was "the famous word." If the shackle code was lost, the team would be asked to remember "the famous word," and give their location by shackling the coordinates using it. [The "famous word" is "MOTHER- - -K"]

Under Skip Minnicks, the guerrilla unit trained, conducted missions, and a very close rapport developed between him, the other Americans in the Special Projects unit and the Bru. "Once I got very ill while I was at Khe Sanh. I had black water fever. I wouldn't eat. I'd quit eating. And they brought me their food, knowing that I could not honorably refuse it. Twice a day they brought it, and then they would stand there. They brought me out of my illness."

6. MAJ GEORGE QUAMO

Captain George Quamo arrived around August/September, 1967, and was promoted to Major 01 Oct. He was 27. His mission was to move the "Special Projects" effort from the initial planning, conceptual phase, to an operational phase (training and then conducting a long-range UW role in the Mu Gia/Tchepone area). Strikingly handsome, brilliant and fluent in several languages, including Vietnamese (he even was an instructor in Vietnamese at the school in Monterey, California), charismatic, Gunny George Bailey (of the Marine 1st Radio Bn Det at Khe Sanh) referred to him as "the cat;" others thought he was the kind of person who might disappear and ten years later reappear having led a guerrilla force in some remote region of the world. He was a kind of "Lawrence of Arabia" of Vietnam. Capt Jerry Hudson, S-2 of 26th Marines during the Siege, remembers George sharing information he probably was not authorized to divulge, and yet it was the right thing to do under the circumstances. He notes:

"He was one super man. He and I spoke from the same 'Bible.' He had so much credibility; if he said it, I didn't care what somebody else said. Quamo was Special Forces to the heart. When Special Forces started I was a recon instructor at [Naval Amphibious Base], Little Creek, Virginia, and we got a message one weekend: we'd like you to train 50 Special Forces in submarine lock-in/lock-out. [Note: a technique for moving in and out of submerged submarines near a shoreline, day and night, to enter or depart for recon, involving use of special light signal devices, use of tanks, etc.] It was difficult to obtain a submarine—on a weekend—but I replied, 'Submarine will be available. Create curriculum. Be prepared to go.' This was in 1950 or so. We put 300 of them through there, 50 a week. And so we had very close ties with those people, and Quamo respected me because I knew alot of people he knew from back when that 'club' [of Unconventional Warfare types] was very small." He continues:

"Quamo wasn't directed by Lownds to come over; he came over on his own initiative. Quamo really saved us during the first few days of the attack by giving us all sorts of significant information—instead of simply forwarding it on to Saigon and then receiving, via Saigon, digested abstractions much later." [when the NVA units had long ago moved. The headquarters and units of the NVA were exceedingly mobile—even mortar positions. A Battalion or Regimental or Divisional Headquarters could be fixed in a specific location only to relocate very soon thereafter. There were so many NVA positions (sometimes manned, sometimes not), in fact, that the Target Information Officer in the FSCC, Mirza Baig, had over 3,000 targets within a 15 KM radius of KSCB (positions of anti-aircraft, automatic weapons, mortars, artillery, bunkers, fortified areas, trenches, logistic dumps, camp assembly areas, truck and track vehicle parking, rocket launchint sites, headquarters).

Quamo "..would sometimes talk in riddles: 'If you're looking for H&I fire, I would suggest this area here might be one super great area to concentrate on,' or 'If you're just not sure where to put your sensors and your other assets, this area over here seems to me to be alot of activity and you'll probably get some good target information if you concentrate in that area,' and that type of thing."

George Quamo had been an exceptional athlete in Averill Park, NY, high-school: he was either MVP or Captain of football, basketball, and baseball teams. He was Class President as a Junior, and the students wanted him as President the next year, but he declined in order to let someone else have the limelight. Colleges attempted to recruit him, but he enlisted in the Army on 23 Oct 1958, and trained at Ft. Benning, GA, and later attended the Officers Candidate School where he graduated as a 2Lt. (He subsequently attended Jump School, Ranger School, Vietnamese Language School). In Dec, 1959, he was assigned to Ft. Riley, KS, where he served as a Platoon Leader, XO, and Company Commander of infantry units on the post. Bob Stevens, his first commander, later wrote of George:

"I rode him hard and put him up wet every night. He spent a great deal of time at my house. I was a First Lieutenant and not making very much money but we enjoyed many a bologna sandwich together and he would fall asleep on our couch while watching TV.. My wife taught him how to dance and one lnight he was embarassed when my daughter kicked him as my wife was pregnant at the time. We both ended up in Special Forces with me joining first...

"We were assigned together almost continually. We were together at language school with George studying Thai and I had Korean. We met each other coming and going in Okinawa. It seemed that either one or the other was always off on mission. I had my car shipped over so he was never without transportation.. He used the car to cat around.. and people began to see the car parked in front of all the lively night spots.. When I was in Korea, George received orders for Vietnam. He bummed a flight over and we spent one hell of a week together. When I arrived in Vietnam we got together in DaNang for a weekend. George spoke fluent Vietnamese and was quite an operator.. The last time I saw George, he appeared concerned that he was predestined to die on that tour. He told me that he expected to go out in a big way and specifically mentioned an airplane crash. It worried me but both of us were doing a great deal of flying over enemy controlled territory and such a worry would only be a bit natural.

"We were close enough to embrace each other at departure and greeting times and did not give a damn who saw us or what they might think. Once we were walking in Carmel, CA, when we approached a group of hippie looking characters. I started to move aside when George said, 'Steve, this is our damn sidewalk and if it wasn't for guys like you and I these hippies wouldn't have a sidewalk to be on.' They moved aside very quietly. We were much closer than my brothers are to me... I am afraid that many men will go through life never knowing that kind of friendship and camaraderie. For that, I am truly sorry... Knowing that I had that type friendship made me much stronger as if I had a tremendous power base from which to operate. God, do I ever miss him."

Quamo was awarded a Silver Star for gallantry in action on 27 Mar '63 while moving through heavy enemy fire to put a friendly machinegun back in action and rallying the Vietnamese troops he was advising.

Then, when George Quamo reported as Team Commander of a SOG team in Mar '64, Don Koch recalls that Les Mason, the XO of the team, was several years older and a West Point graduate. George "..was absolsutely fantastic! He said, 'You guys all know what your job is; I don't have to tell you what your job is; let's go do it!' I mean, he didn't command that thing; he led it... He was brilliant. If they would have sent him to college, he would of got through college in a year and a half. The people around him were just magnetized by him, and if you didn't have the magnetism, he somehow transferred it to you.

Quamo received a 2-year college equivalency in '66, completed Advanced Officer's Infantry Course the same year, and returned to Vietnam, arriving at Khe Sanh a few weeks prior to his promotion to Major 6 Oct '67.

7. ON THE PRECIPICE

George Quamo, Skip Minnicks, Doc Secor, and the remainder of Special Projects unit, having made contact with Col Soulang at BV33 now moved east to scour the Co Roc Massif. Formed when the Kontum Massif collided into the Southeast Asia mainland, lifting up an ancient sea bed of what is now Laos (like shoving a hand under a stack of newspapers), this sheer cliff of the limestone sediment from that sea bed, doused with monsoon rains over many millenia, had formed numerous caves where the water trickled into cracks. Caves, in ancient myths, are openings to the realm of demons of the deep, an entrance to the underworld; evil beings bent on destruction dwell here. [Co Roc, located at XD 741316, is a boomerrang-shaped mountain 14.8 KM southwest of KSCB, just inside the Lao border. It rises dramatically out of the Xe Pone Valley to 825 meters (2,706 ft.) with precipitous east (facing KSCB) and south slopes. The entire area is covered by forest and laced with trails and streams.]

Special Projects had developed to include three teams: PENNSYLVANIA, OKLAHOMA, and WISCONSIN. [The Americans in Special Projects had sent off to obtain an engraved Randall knife for Maj Quamo with the teams' names engraved as the Bru pronounced them: ST WISSICON, ST OKLAHOME, and ST PENNSYLVANE. The knife was never presented, however, due to what happened to Quamo]. Each team had three Americans and about seven Bru.

SFC Robert CAVANAUGH, Team Leader of Spite Team OKLAHOMA, had enlisted in 1953 at age 17, and become a communicator. He reenlisted to become a CW operaqtor, trained at Ft. Gordon and, upon graduation, was "drafted" into Special Forces at a time when they lacked qualified CW radio operators. [Note: these are those who are trained in Morse Code; "CW" = "Continuous Wave"]. He had served in Laos in 1961 during Operation WHITE STAR with Bull Simon and then transferred to 1st Special Forces Group on Okinawa from where he served in Vietnam part of every year from 1963 to 1968. He always volunteered for these missions, was never ordered. He also served in Project Delta with Col Beckwith.

Operating 07-17 January, the Special Projects unit, led by Maj Quamo and SFC Minnicks, discovered extensive NVA positions in Co Roc. On 11 Jan, a team found a 50-man foxhole complex right on the top of Co Roc. Two days later, a patrol observed 75 NVA soldiers and sighted heavy ground fire, including .50 cal machine-guns, firing at an airplane. On 15 Jan, a team observed long wire antenna adjacent a hut with indications of heavy foot traffic in the immediate vicinity.

Then, on the 14th, SFC Cavanaugh—along with Harlan "Rip" Van Winkle, landed atop Co Roc in a H-34. As the chopper approached, just as it sat down, the entire left side of the chopper suddenly exploded seriously wounding the pilot, the helicopter door gunner, most of Cavanaugh's team, and Rip's platoon leader, Lua. Rip was on the skids at the time, ready to leap. When he hit the ground, he started to stand up "..and something just told me to get down again, and I started to duck. As I ducked, the blade of the helicopter flopped around and knocked my helmet off! It just did a 360! I said, God, if I'd of just stood, it would of taken my head right along with it.'"

From the top of Co Roc, one could view KSCB and Lang Vei, but not Khe Sanh ville. Cavanaugh said "What are we going to do with this thing?" and "Rip" replied, "Go ahead and burn it." Cavanaugh reponsed, "I hate to tell you this, but it's going to take more than an O-2 to tell me to burn this chopper," and called Maj Campbell at the FOB who gave permission to destroy the bird after the wounded were extracted. It was burnt by thermite grenades.

Sgt Fusco had been carrying an American flag for five-and-a-half months, looking for the proper place to put it. The top of Co Roc Moujntain seemed appropriagte to him, and there it was planted.

On the 16th, SFC Cavanaugh happened to peer over the edge of the cliff and spotted a peculiar object sticking out of the face of the sheer cliff. It was man-made, not natural. "I hit one of my Bru and pointed down there. O they got excited! Then we found a little trail—you could hardly see it—a little trail that went down this cliff face right there, and that's when we found the first of the big caves."

One cave contained two tons of rice. Three enclosed structures were located nearby which could house 30 men each. Approximately 900 meters southeast of the caves, an extensive bunker complex was discovered. The team counted 500 bunkiers and reported that many were of 10-man capacity. One large bunker was estimated to be a regimental command post.

Cavanaugh's team proceeded to burn everything. No NVA were encountered, but everyone knew they were there—somewhere. Donald Rumph later recalled: "Thaqt mountain top was unbelievable—the positions they had up there. It was just amazing. There weren't any troops there; they had gone some place else—didn't hurt my feelings at all!" The "missing NVA," however, did concern them: "..we talked about it afterwards; all of us knew that had there been anybody at all there, they would have eaten our lunches."

The three Special Projects team leaders (SFCs Skip Minnicks, Bob Cavanaugh, and Bob Baker) were reconning the area, came to a clearing near a river, and still hadn't made any contact. Cavanaugh said, "I'm going to check over the top of this rise—see if there's anyting over the top. You guys wait here." Skip and Bob Baker said, "No, we're going to go with you." "OK."

SFC Robert Baker was on SFC Cavanaugh's left; SFC Minnicks was on his right. The scene of what happened next is branded upon Cavanaugh's memory:

"We had maybe ten yards between us as we're walking up there, and to this day, I can still hear 'CLICK CLICK,' which is Bob and Skip taking their weapons off 'SAFE' and putting them on 'FULL AUTOMATIC.' I can hear that to this day. So we're going up there. As soon as we got to the hill, this guy jumped up out of a hole to shoot me, and when he did that, Bob was no more than three to four feet away from me, and the NVA swung his weapon away from me, and hit Bob."

SFC Baker took three very serious shots to his gut. Doc Secor went right to Baker and miraculously—considering the wounds—kept him alive. "I remember Bob kept hollering, 'I gotta take a crap! I gotta take a crap!' and Doc was saying, 'Don't do that! Don't do that! Just be good! Stay in there!' Doc told me later he didn't want Bob to take—it was something that was keeping him alive, giving him something to think about, keep his mind on something else."

SFC James W. Moore, at the FOB-3, heard Maj Quamo request the evacuation aircraft. "We were supposed to have our standard mission complement: 3 slick Hueys and 2 Cobras, and they pulled that off. So we had to ask the Marines—purely in asking, because their mission does not entail crossing that mythical border. When Maj 'Bulldog' Smith asked Col Lownds, Col Lownds said, 'I can't do that without permission from III MAF, even if I wanted to.' So, Maj Quamo, when he heard the answer: 'there will be no air extraction with the Marine helicopters at Khe Sanh—' he lost his temper and he became very profane; he came up on the Marine command frequency and he called some people a series of very bad names. Now some Marine pilot—a very large guy—in those H-34s—heard this, and he went up and got in his H-34."

A 200-ft. overcast and ground fog completely obscured forward visibility. The H-34 (Maj Charles R. Upshaw, Capt Bradford Jealous, Sgt. J.E. Johnston, Cpl Jesus L. Mena, Cpl Santiago Villarreal, and Cpl C.D. Chester), and a UH-1E (of FMO-3: Maj Charles R. Upshaw, Capt James H. Knox) proceeded at extremely low altitude, in and out of clouds, dodging mountains and hill masses, while also fully exposed to possible enemy ground fire.

SFC Baker was hoisted by the H-34 which then made the equally hazardous return trip to KSCB.

"..the weather was absolutely horrendous! A decision was made to try to get the whole team out, so we attempted to launch with 2 or 4 gunships and a number of transport helicopters—I forget how many., We didn't even make it to the end of the runway; we almost ran into one another. It was just an impossible weather situation to control that numb er of aircraft. So we all got back down on the ground—fortunately without a midair collision, and there was a debriefing. The Army people were screaming at us that we had to get this wounded guy out of there. An extremely gutsy guy named Charlie Upshaw, a Major, said that he would take a H-34 and go out and hoist this guy out if we would send one gunship to give him a little cover. Charlie led the flight over the treetops, up and down, in and out over the treetops. On at least one point I saw a guy run out of a hut, stand there in front of the hut, and opened up on us with a machinegun. All I did was give him 'the finger' as I went by—because if we turned around to go after the guy, we'd loose the H-34. We got to the zone, a depression, and Charlie found the team. He lowered his hoist and hovered motionless over this cliff situation—had to have been for 15 minutes—in this absolutely steady hover. They got the kid up in the plane. We made it back to Khe Sanh and all changed our underwear." [Note: the wounded man, SFC Robert Nelson Baker, died of wounds 21 Feb '68].

SFC James W. Moore recalls the Marine command at KSCB was extremely angry with the Marine pilots for the Co Roc rescue. [Note: Marine helicopters, unlike Army helicopters, are almost as rare as hen's teeth in combat, and this asset is very tightly controlled]. "But we told the Colonel—because we record everything that happens on the radio; we put it on tape: 'I don't know what you're going to do with the men, court-martial them or whatever, but we're going to put them in for a DFC for flying that kind of condition and making a rescue of a man under that circumstance.'"

The evening before the extraction, Maj Quamo had an early version of a "smart bomb" strike from Navy aircraft, and the morning of the extract, he fired a "mad moment," and the force departed with a bang by helicopter to Lang Vei (to brief them) from where they were trucked back to FOB-3 to brief both the Marines and FOB-3. SFC Cavanaugh's truck broke down shortly after departing Lang Vei, however.

"It's a funny feeling. When you run missions over into Laos, you always think when your plane picks you up and brings you to South Vietnam that you're safe. Our truck breaks down. I set out security. My guys were out dancing in the road. They had the booty that we got out of the caves. I'm sitting on top of my truck, and about an hour later, another truck comes down there. It's almost dusk. The only thing that I can think of that might of saved my butt out there from that stupidity was that the next night Khe Sanh was attacked." [The NVA obviously did not want to show their hand by triggering prematurely their attack].

THE VILLAGE

1. WEAPONS CAPTURED

The District Headquarters in Khe Sanh ville (MACV Advisory Team #4, Captain Bruce B.G. Clarke, and the Vietnamese government, Capt Nhi) together with the co-located CAC OSCAR abandoned their position in the ville the afternoon of 22 January following a ferocious battle leaving some 200-300 NVA KIA and an immense amount of weapons.

Col Daniel Lord Baldwin, III, the chief of SOG's Op-35 (Ground Studies Division) in DaNang (in charge of all the four FOBs in I Corps) learned of the weapons and was determined that the NVA would not regain possession of them to use against us.

The bearing, voice, and actions of Col Baldwin might easily remind one of Patton: audacious, bold, and very direct. He had been in Vietnam two-and-a-half years, attended Army Staff College as a Captain in 1960 from where he worked in the Pentagon as a junior member of the Army Chief of Staff office. Promoted to Major, he volunteered to go to Vietnam in 1962 and served as an advisor to a Vietnamese Ranger unit and then a Vietnamese Airborne unit until he was shot and received his seventh Purple Heart (he had three from Korea). He then started to work for the Agency. Now he was at FOB-3, Khe Sanh:

"I happened to be there at the time, so I made the decision to go in there [in Khe Sanh ville]. Singlaub and people down at Saigon were at my neck telling me I should get out of there, and I quoted a thing from the Manual: A Commanding Officer should be where he can best influence actions of his command. I called up Lownds and said 'make it a "No Fire Zone".' I was going to go on the ground, but they said, 'Sir, we need you in the air. Can you fly as Gunner?' I said, 'Asshole, let me tell you, I qualified as Gunner in 1964.'" And off he went into the wild blue yonder.

Lt Thomas Simcox, a OCS classmate of George Quamo, led SFC Bruce R. Pross' team as the ground element into Khe Sanh ville. Capt Bruce B.G. Clarke accompanied them. The weapons were loaded aboard helicopters because they had not brought enough C-4 to destroy them in place. GySgt Max Friedlander [17th ITT], upon seeing them, was in awe: "They had a whole row of captured weapons out and I remember how awe-struck I was by those weapons that I saw—how modern. I couldn't believe that they had that kind of weapons, some pretty potent stuff in there."

2. ODA-221

Lee Dunlap had grown up in Wyoming, attended Jump School at Ft. Campbell in 1959 and then had been an instructor in Jungle Warfare School in Panama. He served three tours in Vietnam starting in 1962-63 when, as a buck Sergeant, his mission (operating in III Corps) was "to go to the hamlets and villages wherever there was a Regional or Popular Force unit stationed. They were still equipped with French weapons, and we'd re-equip them with American equipment, remain with them a couple of weeks to train them to do basic maintenance, clean rifles, fire mortars, do ambushes." Upon his return, he attended Officer Candidate School at Ft. Benning, and then returned to Ft. Bragg where he was Officer in Charge of the HALO Committee [High Altitude Low Opening parachute operation] and Skyhook Committee [a device used to snatch up personnel from the ground by a C-130 aircraft in which the ground personnel send up a balloon which trails a line to which the personnel are attached. The plane has a U-shaped fork in front which swings forward, snatches the line, and pulls up the personnel who, by air movement, are swung into the rear of the aircraft and reeled in. Originally developed by the Navy to retrieve scientists in remote islands, it was picked up by the CIA and then by the unconventional warfare units such as Marine Force Recon, Special Forces, and SEALs]. He then attended language school at Monterey for Thai for a year and went to Okinawa.

First Special Forces Group on Okinawa was assisting the effort in Vietnam along with 7th Special Forces Group at Ft. Bragg by sending TDY [Temporary Duty] units which wer mainly border surveillance efforts to deny enemy infiltration [rather than the true mission of a Special Forces A-Team in which the 12 members develop an indigenous division-sized unit]. The augmentation effort was known as SNAKEBITE.

Captain Lee Dunlap led Operational Detachment A-221, 1st Special Forces Group, to Vietnam in July, 1967, reporting to Col Harold K Rose in DaNang who gave him orders to support the effort of FOB-1 at Phu Bai. The other team leaders, John Corley and John McClasky, were to report to FOB-2 at Kontum, and Joe Bain, to FOB-3 at Khe Sanh.

Although FOB-1 had been conducting operations into Laos from a Launch Site at Khe Sanh since the summer of '66—a fact of which he might not have been aware—Dunlap was delighted, as were his men: "Already the word was out that Khe Sanh was not the best place in the world to go if you really valued your life. I went back and briefed the team we were going to Phu Bai, and everyone went 'O whew! Thank the Lord!'"

Some two hours later, Col Rose sent for Capt Dunlap. "On second thought—and after discussing this issue with Capt Bain—I've decided to send your A-Team to Khe Sanh and Capt Bain's team to Phu Bai."

"Well, Sir, would you explain to me the reasoning

behind that?"

"Well," said the Col, "Capt Bain has a pretty good argument. He just graduated from the Defense Language Institute in Chinese and the majority of the recon team and Hatchett force at Phu Bai are Cholon Chinese [They were not Nung]. And so we feel because of his language ability, he'd be much more—"

"Sir, you know that's a bunch of crap! That's just a bunch of bull. He's just trying—this is not fair."

"Well, I've made the decision."

Dunlap returned to his team who probably thought, he felt, "this is some Captain we got as a team leader!"

Operational Detachment A-221 was issued weapons—but no ammo—and departed for Khe Sanh to become one of the three basic components of the FOB -3 (the other being the nucleus MACSOG, CCN, soldiers, and secondly, George Quamo's Special Projects group. Of interest, the nucleus group included Charles Berg who had been medevaced on 14 Feb 67, and, four months later, the FOB-3 Sergeant-Major, Dick Pegram, saw him in DaNang and said, "Come on up with me to 'Camp Yuk'!" Camp Yuk referred to Khe Sanh). SOG was one of those clandestine units that reminds one of the "Mission Impossible" TV series where "the Secretary will disavow any knowledge of you." They were told, "If you get caught, you're on your own. We're going to deny your presence."

There were no ID tags or Geneva card for these folk. Weapons were not US; it was all foreign weapons and indigenous clothing. Recon teams were called "SPIKE" teams, normally composed of 3 Americans and 9 indig. Maj Lucious Campbell was in charge and a Maj White was there for awhile as his XO. FOB-3 officially became operational on 01 Nov 1967.

Arrival at Khe Sanh would have made anyone feel unwelcome. The XO of Det A-221, Harlan "Rip" Van Winkle, recalls: "We hadn't even spent the night in DaNang when we flew in from Okinawa. We flew into Phu Bai on a Caribou and spent the night there. The weather was so bad, we couldn't get up to Khe Sanh until late the next afternoon. A big Marine helicopter brought us there about three o'clock, 3:30, in the afternoon. There wasn't anybody there at first to meet us. We called up the Old French Fort, and Sergeant First Class Walt Hetzler, who had been my Squad Leader back when I was in the 503d Airborne Combat Team in Okinawa back in 1962—he shows up with a sawed-off M2 Carbine and 2 20-round magazines taped back to back in an old, beat-up deuce-and-a-half.

"You got any ammo?" asked Rip.

"Nah, we don't need no ammo," replied Hetzler.

Thoughts raced through Rip's head like bullets from a sprung ambush he anticipated: five of the new team had been to Vietnam previously and the other seven Americans had read enough After Action Reports to make them true believers about the evils lurking in old French plantations. The monsoon season was pouring its misery and it was four days before the national elections (when one would expect enemy activity to attempt to disrupt elections). The area surrounding Khe Sanh was by no means pacified. And there were no damn bullets!

The men loaded everything into the vehicle and went down the dirt road from KSCB to Route 9: "We skidded into a hole that must of been 3-ft. deep, got stuck, and all of us piled out. Lee and I just got everyone off to one side of the road, set up a perimeter and said, 'Well, we'll throw rocks at 'em or something if we get attacked.' "Three of us had been in country before: Lee Dunlap, Chuck Treddenick, and James Fusco, nobody else."

Eventually the truck started up and all drove to the Old French Fort. It, too, was unwelcoming, not having been prepared. "The main building—the kitchen/operations room was best, and the rooms for Capt Wayne Snow and Lt Cripes and Tony Di Bello were decent, but as for the rest—we ended up building hootches outside."

They were soon briefed by Skip Minnicks, Bob Cavanaugh, Capt Wayne Snow, and Tony Di Bello: "..it was just solid 'red' around us. Well, I think we put the Marines in 'blue,' but other than that, I think there were 5 or 6 NVA Divisions that were damn near shouting distance, identified. [Note: on tactical maps, "red" indicates enemy positions and units; "blue" indicates friendly positions and units]. That had a tendency to get your attention in a hurry."

The unit began recruiting and training. Not all Bru were non-Communist. (A considerable number, in fact, were Communist and had fled to the hills back in 1962 when the Strategic Hamlet Program resettled most of the Bru near Route 9 and Khe Sanh village—to provide them with security. Following the Siege battle, the Bru were resettled at a refugee camp at Mai Loc, just south of Cam Lo, and a considerable numb er of the Bru refugees were "now-former" Communists that had previously fled to the hills and now fled to safety.)

Rip Van Winkle feels "we really thought that we were probably getting about one [Communist] out of four [recruits]. Certainly they weren't hard-core Communist, but they leaned that way. We ended up with what we thought was a pretty good nucleus. We never got as large a unit as what we were supposed to get, however. The mission was to develop a kind of "haymacker" force, a battalion of 250 Bru broken down into companies led by American NCOs. They would exploit targets detected by a Spike Team or a small "hornet" team, such as a motor park. [Note: A "hornet" team was a platoon of 35-40; a "hatchett" force was company-size, 80, up to a whole battalion, 250]. The Spike Teams were permanent party. The operational mission was to emplace electronic sensors across Laos as part of the "McN amara Line" electronic barrier project, IGLOO WHITE.

Marine recon teams occasionally stopped by the SOG unit at the Old French Fort. "Sir, if we find ourselves in a hum, can we count on you?"

The very seasoned soldiers looked at the 19-year-old recon team members: "You got it. By the way, it looks like you're a little over-loaded. Wanna leave a little bit of that crap here?" [I recall a soldier at Lang Vei telling me that it was a good idea to carry a belt with nothing but a knife on it, along with everything else. If you have to run, shed everything except the b elt with the knife so you can move faster and maneuver better].

Marine recon were familiar with the SOG soldiers. As the new FOB-3 was being constructed, the men regarded it as a gold mine of new equipment.

The SOG team continued to improve their Old French Fort positions and Bru and American soldiers filled sand bags. Capt Dunlap woke up one morning, lifted the tent flap, "..and there, squatting down on their haunches, were about a hundred Bru Montgagnard wives!"

"Hey, what's this?"

One of the Bru replied, "They here fill sandbag."

Every morning they arrived and were put to work, paid from a footlocker full of money—for intelligence purposes or whatever, avoiding the requirement for tons of paperwork.

3. FOB-3 AT KSCB

It had become evident, however, as early as late July '67, that enemy forces were moving in the area, and the SOG unit would have to relocate to the main Marine base for security. "We told III MAF there's a bunch of bad guys out there and they're going to come and jump on your bones, and they ignored us."

FOB-3 PLAQUE ISSUED TO STAFF SGT HARVE W. SAAL

The 65 Seabees of Detail JULIETT, US Naval Construction Battalion TEN (NMCB-10) arrived on 11 October from GiaLe to begin construction of FOB-3. That this was to be a major installation is reflected in the description of the work order: 54 underground bunkers, 16' x 36'; eight standard 16' x 32' tin-roofed huts; six underground bunkers, 32' x 36'; 10 standard burn-out heads (4-hole); one Strad building, wood 40' x 100'; 3 lounges, wood frame 20' x 60'; one wood frame vehicle repair 20' x 40'; 3 standard 250-man messhalls; 3 standard 400-man showers, 16' x 32'; one wood frame dispensary, 20' x 72'; one wood water tower; 3 electrical and water distribution systems, and 16 helo pads with revetments and matting. All material to be provided by the Special Forces. Of course, the proposed cost of $370,000. is only material and does not include labor! Phase I ended 28 Dec 67 when 11% of the project had been completed.

Maj Lucius Campbell, CO of FOB-3, ensured the construction effort proceeded despite the rains of Biblical proportions from the days of Noah. "If it hadn't been for Campbell, that place probably wouldn't of got built. He was dead on anybody who took one piece of material to build a creature-comfort thing. He understood that if we're going to get this place built, we need all these materials; we don't need guys building their own personal hootches. The other thing he was death on—he said: we only have so many trucks up here, and if I find you guys didn't pull maintenance on those trucks! Campbell was a super-duper manager."

Although still attempting to fill the teams and train them, commanders and their staffs in DaNang needed information on the rapidly evolving enemy encroachment and encirclement of Khe Sanh. Operational requirements were not lessened.

One of the first missions run by FOB-3 was a disaster, not because of unqualified or untrained men, but simply due to the overwhelming presence of NVA. Eastern Laos and the "Trail" were strategic areas for them, and they were not about to permit us to work that area; their counter-recon screen was highly successful.

On 05 Jan 68 SFC John T. Gallagher of FOB-3 launched in a UH-1D of the 176th Aviation Co. (Crew: Aircraft Commander CWO Dennis C. Hamilton, Pilot WO-1 Sheldon D. Schultz, Crew-chief SFC Ernest F. Briggs, and Crewman SFC James D. Williamson).

As Hamilton's aircraft approached the LZ (at 3,000 ft. AGL, Above Ground Level) it was struck by anti-aircraft fire, immediately entered a nose-low vertical dive, and crashed at XD701021 where, upon impact, it burst into flames that were 10-20 ft. high. Four attempts to get into the area of the downed helicopter failed due to intense ground fire. During the next two days more attempts to reach the wreckage failed.

4. PATROL TO KHE SANH VILLE

Once the Siege was triggered and General Tompkins laid the restriction of no Marine patrols (other than local wire checks), Col Lownds asked FOB-3, in effect, "Do you think that some of your folks would be willing to do some of the local patrolling?" It was not a tasking, simply a suggestion—for everyone's benefit, including FOB-3! The response: "I don't see why not. Right now we're in a pickle and we'd like to see what's out there too!"

When the Khe Sanh District HQ (along with MACV Advisory Team 4 and CAC OSCAR) relocated to FOB-3, debrief of Capt Bruce B.G. Clarke and discussions with FOB-3 staff raised a question as to what kind of a force had attacked the District. Indeed, a JTAD report had indicated that it was a NVA battalion which had attacked while two regiments lay in ambush to annihilate any who might attempt to reinforce or rescue them.

As a result, on 26 Jan, Maj Lucius Campbell, the FOB-3 Commander, at the request of Col Lownds, tasked HF DENVER to dispatch a patrol to determine the status of Khe Sanh ville, whether it was occupied by the NVA.

On 26 Jan, Capt "Rip" Van Winkle led the patrol (which consisted of six other Americans and 24 Bru) through the east gate of KSCB, through the garbage dump, and proceeded southeast along the ridge line through Poilane's coffee plantation to Route 9. At that point the patrol turned southwest, following the "highway" into Khe Sanh ville.

Meanwhile, MSGT William S. Wood, whose Spike Team (TIGER) had recently been filled with new Bru due to losses in connection with his team's involvement in the Gallagher recovery attempts, decided that he needed to train his team as well as find out what was in Khe Sanh ville, and proceeded out FOB-3, past the house of the Millers, the Wycliffe Bible Translators, to warn them of the NVA, but they had already departed. [Note: On Fri, 05 Jan, Col Lownds had "strongly suggested" to John and Carolyn Miller that they leave the Khe Sanh area with their children for their safety, but to do it in such a way to avert panic. Since there was a scheduled Bible Conference, there was a legitimate reason for them to leave, and they did. Amazingly, on 20 Jan 68, John Miller reappeared at KSCB, much to the chagrin of the regimental command. It was a day of Lt Tonc's appearance and of INDIA Company's contact on 881-North. The MACV J-2, LtGen Philip Davidson was visiting. Mr. Miller returned in order to rescue his Bru helper, and both safety departed].

Rip's team moved without incident the 2 KM to Route 9, another 1.5 KM northeast of the Old French Fort and another 2.5 KM to Khe Sanh ville. Later he noted: "In retrospect I feel rather foolish that we by-passed the fort and proceeded directly to Khe Sanh. For the next three days it was obvious the NVA had fortified the French Fort with anti-aircraft positions." Cautiously, the team proceeded on the south side of Rt. 9 to the east side of the village until they were approximately 150 meters east of the MACV compound. TIGER had tagged on to the rear of Rip's force just prior to reaching a small cement bridge. Rip was beginning to think that if NVA were there, they weren't there in strength.

SFC James Fusco, leading the point element, signalled Rip forward, and the decision was made to advance the point element up the highway to the MACV compound. Rip would move the first squad through the houses on the north side of the highway; the other squads would move through the houses on the south side of the highway. The point element would be 50 meters to the front.

The point element proceeded with SFC FUSCO number two in the order of movement, and the lead Bru made it to within 20 meters of the compound when heavy fire broke out, especially from 2 machineguns inside the compound. Miraculously, no one was hurt, but the point element became pinned down in a shallow ditch between the road and the compound.

Rip, meanwhile, together with four Bru, moving through houses on the north side of Rt. 9, had reached a position directly across the road from Fusco when the fire broke out, and was able to spot at least two NVA positions in the compound.

"Then occurred a humorous, albeit black humor, incident that I recall with great clarity. I'm not sure how funny Fusco thought it was, as he was on the receiving end. The only weapons immediately available were four M-16s and one M-79. The M-16s were not making much of an impression so we decided to try the M-79. The problem was the high fence running past the compound and less than 20 feet from Fusco and one Bru. I was about 20 yards from the fence. The gunner was unable to lob rounds over the fence and effectively bring fire on the NVA positions. Fusco was beginning to feel the heat and said he would appreciate more appropriate action. I took the M-79, told Fusco to get his butt down and attempted to fire directly through the fence. The round didn't make it through, detonating in the wire. The next instant Fusco is cussing and saying, 'Damn it! Captain, you shot me!' The next round made it through the fence and took out the enemy position. Within a minute SP5 John Frescura had commandeered a M-60 machinegun and charged up the middle of the highway laying down a solid base of fire. Under cover of this fire and some belated gunship support we were able to extract Fusco and the rest of the point element."

Meanwhile, TIGER fired into the back (south side) of the compound and received no return fire. When the gunships were called in, TIGER fell back to the ditch along Rt. 9 and worked his way up to the west side of the first road into the compound. Wood recalls "the loud, outraged yells of accusation from those across the driveway" when the M-79 round detonated in the wire fence. Wood obtained a M-60 from a Bru and fired a burst. SSG Gary Lee "Doc" Crone came up with Xom (Wood's 01) and Tu (interpreter) and the two Bru got inside the fence along the highway into the yard just east of the compound while Crone stood straddling Wood next to the fence. Wood shouted while all fired, enabling those on the west side of the driveway to dash back, one at a time.

Capt Lee Dunlap, meanwhile, had gone to the Marine COC on KSCB to request artillery support for the engaged patrol. Several Bru were dead, one of the medics was shot in the leg [Crone], and a Weapons Sergeant was shot—had a AK-47 bullet sticking out in the bump behind his ear [Fusco]. There were, quite obviously, no "friendly civilians" in Khe Sanh town!

The Marine Major replied, "I can't fire any artillery in there; there might be friendlies in the town." [Note: Remember, many, many rounds of artillery had already been fired into Khe Sanh ville in support of the District/CAC OSCAR on 21/22 Jan].

"There are no friendlies! My people are under fire!" replied the astonished Dunlap.

"I'm not going to help," was the response from the Major.

Dunlap walked over to the Air Force TIGER-HOUND shop. "What do you need?" asked the USAF LtCol. Dunlap explained, and within a few minutes of declaring a "PRAIRIE FIRE ALERT" "..had more jets than I could handle and they went down there and just blew the hell out of the place." [Note: SOG teams could do that. They had first priority on all air support and could declare an alert and receive aircraft from all over Vietnam within minutes]. A Marine FAC reported all that was happening to the regimental command, and Dunlap was summoned to report to the regimental commander ASAP. He expected he would meet with Col Lownds, be ripped, and he would say, "Well, Sir, I just had to use my best judgment as a commander."

Instead, as he entered the command bunker, he encountered the Major—Col Lownds wasn't aware of what had happened, having taken a rare break to catch a few Zs. When Dunlap explained what he had done, the Major became livid. "That was dereliction of duty! Consider yourself under arrest!"

Dunlap responded, "Well, Sir, fine. We will have to sort this out later. Now I got lots of stuff to do. My team is coming out."

"Marine! Restrain that person!" The Major's voice had become loud—arousing the sleeping Lownds.

Col Lownds, now awake, walked over, "What's going on here?"

Dunlap explained and Lownds said, "Captain, why don't you go on over and check on your men, and I'll take care of this."

Back at the MACV compound in Khe Sanh ville, Wood managed to cover the men coming back. A Bru crawled up with another couple belts for the M-60 and with a few bursts, everyone was back across the driveway. Tu and Xom left, being out of ammo, and Wood told Crone, the medic, to care for the wounded man (Fusco). Wood continued firing until he realized he, too, was very low on ammo, looked around and discovered he was alone.

"Cursing mightily, I started to pull back, and as I got up I noticed the muzzle flask from an apparent machinegun that was firing from a bunker where Hwy 9 bent to the left, about 600 meters to the west. By the time I'd moved 150-175 meters back, I'd started down the slope to the bridge, and he couldn't see me anymore. But I was also out of ammo. and became aware of someone moving among the houses on the south side of the Hwy, back about 12-15 meters from the road. What's worse, they were shooting at me. I took to diving across the remaining driveways, but still whoever it was (I think there was only one, or at most, 2 of them) put a bullet through my boot, just above the sole at the instep. Fortunately I was wearing a thick, Army issue arch support, which the bullet destroyed. Hurt my foot, too, but didn't break the skin."

Grenville Sutcliffe jokingly recalls that one of the reasons he specifically went on this patrol to Khe Sanh ville was to retrieve some bagpipes left there by PFC Taylor of the Marine CAC OSCAR Platoon O-2; Taylor's Scottish flag had been rescued, and was atop one of the main bunkers at the FOB, until it became a NVA aiming stake, but his bagpipes had remained in the ville, Sutcliffe thought. Actually, they had been retrieved!.

Sutcliffe recalls the scene of pandemonium of the tense withdrawal: "By this time the North Vietnamese were getting really hostile. They were coming back on us as we were withdrawing from the village. We started by laying down helicopter gunfire to keep them down. That was followed up by A1Es, propeller aircraft. They were able to shoot the NVA up enough that they stopped coming back after us. As we withdrew, we were going into houses to destroy rice and other things that would be beneficial to the NVA.

"The North Vietnamese started coming back pretty heavy. By this time we had the F4s coming over dropping cluster bombs. At this point one of the fighters was screaming overhead dropping cluster bombs. Instead of the bomb hitting the ground, the bomblets bouncing out and detonating, the main pod hit, bounced up in the air and the cluster bombs flew toward us and detonated. Fortunately no one was injured. My CAR-15 submachinegun jammed. I grabbed Sgt Fusco's M16. We were able to get a chopper in and get him medevaced.

"We continued our withdrawal under fire back toward Khe Sanh. We were being shot heavily, green tracers ripping in on us at one point and I returned a lot of fire. I'll never forget this green tracer coming straight at me. I kind of rolled to my right and that tracer ripped just above my shoulder and to the left of my head as I rolled down. It was really strange because everything was in slow motion.

"We continued to work our way back toward Khe Sanh. Just as we approached the outer perimeter next to the drop zone the NVA started dropping artilery on us. I was still pretty green and dove into a drainage ditch that was filled full of mud, which jammed my submarine gun. Everyone had a big laugh as the new lieutenant.

"As the artillery barrage continued a Sergeant and I started joking with each other. I got out of my ditch, ran over to his crater and jumped in. Artillery was blowing off all around us. Not to be out done by a Lieutenant he walked over to another crater holding his hands up as if it were raining. We should have both been killed."

SFC Fusco had been evacuated to C Med where a surgeon removed an AK-47 round from his neck, much to the relief of "Rip" who had assumed—as did Fusco—that it was fragments from the exploding M-79 round, never considering the possibility of him being shot by a NVA rifleman at the exact moment Rip fired the M-79. [Fusco survived, only to die of a heart attack while hunting shortly after his retirement]. A Den, the Bru platoon leader who had replaced Lua, had been killed, along with two other Bru.

Majs Campbell and Quamo told Rip that FOB radio intercept operators, who had been monitoring the NVA radios, determined that the NVA leaders were concerned about still holding Khe Sanh village, and a larger force was being dispatched to reinforce. Rip commented, "They're welcome to it. My mission was to confirm they were there. They are."

That evening, a delegation of Bru soldiers approached SFC Wood wanting to know if he could get the camp truck and return them to their villages—which were west of Lang Vei. They said they hadn't been home in two or three days. "Sometimes I wasn't sure the Bru were real," notes Wood.

5. HILL 471

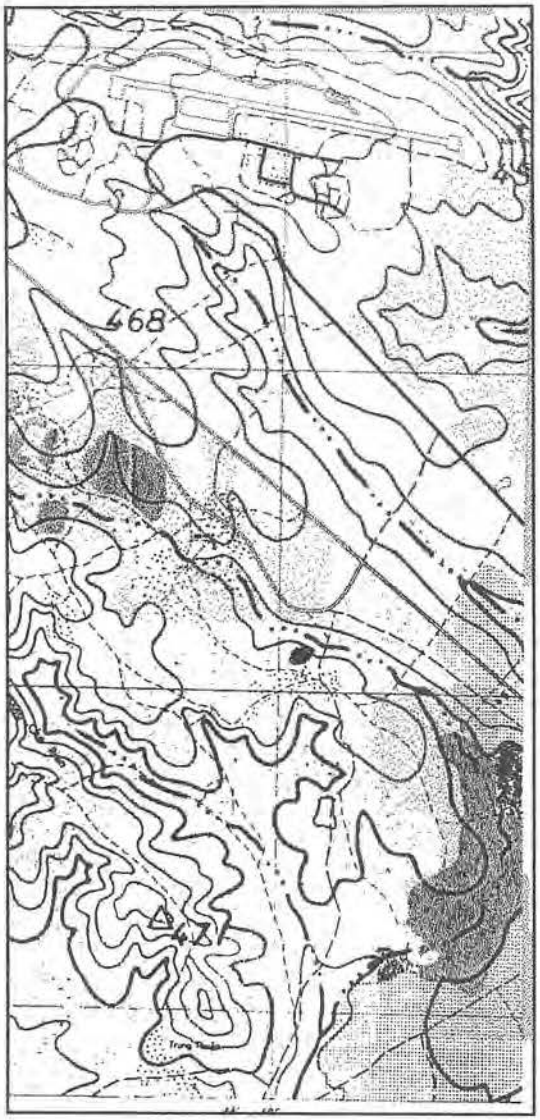
[The following is written by William Wood concerning the incident on Hill 471 involving his team, ST TIGER]

"On 29 January 1968 we left the camp later than I would like to have, and later than I'd planned. As I recall there was no one big delay, but several small, annoying ones. Among other things we had to turn in all our emergency radios: they were in short supply and another team was to launch that day. It must have been 0830 or later, and I was irritated, when we walked out the gate: me, Don Voorhees, Gary Crone, Xom, To, Tu, and 7 other Bru whose names I can't remember, and Mike Mahoney as a straphanger. Mahoney was new to the FOB and wanted to gain experience. I think he and Crone had known one another somewhere before, because I seem to remember Gary asking if his coming along would be all right. Maybe that was one of the things that held us up, getting Mahoney integrated into the patrol. Voorhees and 6 of the 7 Bru were new on the team. This would be their first patrol out of the FOB.

"There was a heavy fog that morning, which was one of the reasons I was hurrying. The fog at Khe Sanh usually lifted between 0900 and 0930, and I wanted to be close up under the hill mass before it did. We were going to the 'pimple' southeast of Hill 471 to look down into Khe Sanh town and, if necessary, up onto Hill 471 to take a look around.

"We moved directly toward the hill, across the shallow valley that exgtended west and southwest from our perimeter. Tu (the point man) chose a path where the weeds were shorter (avoiding the taller weeds where some others and I had spread the gasoline before) and we moved right along. Still, we were too slow. The fog lifted while we were in the middle of that open area, still 900 meters or more from the foot of 471. We continued to the hill and mounted it sorta diagonally, up across Hill 471 to the saddle. I noted the grass, which was everywhere about 2-1/2 to 3 ft. high, had been moved in a swatch 300 or more meters wide on the east slope of 471 itself. The fire lanes I had experience with were usually from 1 to 3 ft. across, so I ignored the short grass. There was plenty of evidence that the AF had bombed hell out of the general area in the last couple of days. Those bomb craters hadn't been there two days before.

"Upon reaching the saddle between Hill 471 and the "pimple" we stopped, or rather the Bru stopped so the rest of us, perforce, stopped too. The Bru could best be described as agitated, saying 'No! No! Beaucoup VC!' I motioned toward the top of 471 and agreed. They were all huddled together. After some minutes of talk I said something like, 'Well, come on,' or 'Well, let's go and started walking toward the pimple. In the saddle and on the nearest slope of the pimple the grass was normal length, 2-1/2 - 3 ft. The crest of the pimple was only 6 or 8 ft. higher than where we were, but that ridge got higher to my right front. And (this occured to me in the Casualty Clearing point at the airstrip) I was walking on a path. Not a bare-earth path but a trace where the grass had been worn down and beaten off by passing feet. At that time I never thought anything of it. It was not my most perspicacious day.



KSCB TO HILL 471

"About 12 or 15 meters along something caught my attention and I took a couple steps to my left for a closer look. All the grass on the front (east) of the pimple was mowed, too. This was a fleeting glimpse because as I stepped aside, we took fire from directly ahead of us, from a range of about 5 meters. I returned two magazines full auto but don't think I hit anyone, as the 5.56 bullet was notorious for its poor penetration in grass or weeds. About the time I finished firing a few (3 or 4) M-79 rounds hit the top of the pimple. I looked back to find that I was alone again. Crone lay face-up some 3-4 meters behind me and I could hear a lot of firing back about where we had stopped to talk. No more M-79 rounds came past me. I scrambled back to Crone to find he'd been shot in the right cheek, the right eye, and the right forearm, which was broken. He may have had other wounds, too. As I tried to find signs of life I noticed that his head was intact: the bullets hadn't exited although there was a large pool of blood under the back of his head. It causes me some embarrassment to admit that what distressed me the most at that moment was not Crone's death (we were good friends) nor the manner of it, but the fact that the cord to the PRFC-25 handset had been shot in two, and we had no other radios.

"While trying to get Crone up into a fireman's carry his .45 fell out onto the ground. I picked it up, finding I couldn't carry him; he was a big man, 6'1" or 2" and 200 lb. or more. Movement caught my eye from the grass on the near slope of the pimple. It was a soft cap (I think). I fired 3 or 4 shots from the .45 at it and it disappeared, and when there was no more movement there, I fired the rest of the clip into the radio. (Note: I am not that good of a pistol shot. Maybe I scared him, or maybe what I saw was a waving tuft of grass. If I hit him, with a .45 at a range of 10 meters, it would have been a miracle as great as any sanctified by the Church). Firing from the pimple had stopped. Maybe, in a crouch I was in defilade.

"Started to drag Crone back to the rest of the team, but a grenade came in and knocked me loose. I scuttled back to where the rest of the team was to find Xon wounded in the ankle, one Bru dead (the M-79 gunner) and only Voorhees and 3 Bru firing at the top of 471. Voorhees greeted me by asking: 'Did you see that wire?' I had not. It ran in the grass beside the trail and led to the pimple. It looked like the heavy WD-1, not WD-110. Now we were taking fire from the pimple, too. I counted 2 MGs and a couple of AKs there. I told Voorhees that Crone was dead and asked after Mahoney and the rest of the Bru. He replied while changing magazines that he didn't know. They had disappeared when the shooting started, presumably downhill, back to the east or northeast. He sounded a bit upset about it. Then (he was on the other side of a grass clump from me) he announced that Xon was killed. I remarked that in my opinion it was about time we left, and suddenly I was alone again. Not for long, though. After a hurried scan of the area (during which I spotted not less than 4 auto weapons on the military crest of 471) without sign of Mahoney or the other Bru, I was gone too.

"Caught up with Voorhees and crew in a bomb crfater 20 or 25 meters from the crest of the saddle. We may have been in defilade again, as the NVA had stopped firing. I mentioned that a bomb crater, unless you could see out, was a poor position. They scrambled out and we ran the roughly 50 or 60 meters to the foot of the hill, across the small dry stream bed there, and continued across the flat for 75-80 meters to a thin hedgerow at the foot of a fallow field. Voorhees and 2 Bru, in the lead, got through this hedgerow but Tu, apparently beat out, slowed to a walk just before reaching it. I slowed, too, put my hand on his shoulder (he was on my right) and was saying something like: Let's go, Tu, when more than one auto weapon opened fire behind us. I think we had come out of defilade, and one weapon was aimed directly at Tu and me. I could see the bullets striking just ahead of us. I think one or more rounds went between my legs and a couple between Tu and me. One went through my knee (it felt like someone slapped me with a ruler) and several hit Tu in the abdomen and chest. I pushed Tu through the hedgerow while screaming the oldest cliche in war movies, 'I'm hit!' and dived through myself. The firing stopped again. The burst that hit Tu and me was an almost classic example of what they used to teach in MG or BAR classes of what happens if you fire a bipodded weapon with your shoulder high. The bullet stream travels from lower left to upper right, where there is a cluster of holes.

"After ascertaining I couldn't help Tu I took out my CAC pad from the last mission (the only paper I had) and printed on the back of it: 'In deep trouble. Team split. Some wounded. Need out. Wood.' This I gave to the Bru and in my best pidgin Bru, mangled English, and hand & arm signals, told them to take it to camp and give it to an American. They left, moving carefully along the hedgerows and not hurrying.

"At that time I was wearing tiger stripe trousers and carried 3 field dressings and 2 cravats in my right hip pocket. I pulled up my trouser leg and checked the wound. It wasn't bleeding very much but from the position of the exit hole, square in the middle of my kneecap. I didn't think I wanted to try any marathon runs. I dug in my hip pocket for a dressing and in 5 tries produced 5 cravats. On the 6th try I gave up and tied a cravat around it.

"Turned out sending the message was unnecessary, as someone in the FOB had heard the firing and launched a gunship to see what was going on. By the time Voorhees had cached Tu's body under the hedgerow and I had bandaged myself (and given me a shot of morphine: I anticipated some strenuous activity) the gunship found us. We both frantically popped panels and tried a mirror flash, but there wasn't enough sun. Neither of us was willing to give away our position with smoke. The gunship overflew us and dropped a smoke grenade, which unfortunately landed about 500 meters south of us. Not being sure what he was doing, both Voorhees and I expended a couple magazines in that direction, then fled.

"We moved generally north under cover of the hedgerow, eventually arriving in a field of elephant grass north of a chain of the small triangular rice paddies that the Bru built in the ravines in that country. I don't know how we got there: we must have gone around them. For sure I wasn't wading any rice paddies. (One thing Voorhees said bothered him during this hegira: He was running along in a crouch and every time he looked back I was keeping up with him—crawling! If he'd slowed down even a little, I think I'd've passed him.)

"We weren't long in the elephant grass when Lt. Thieu (don't know if he was related to the President or not) appeared overhead in his raggedy old H-34. I scooted up to the edge of the rice paddy and popped a panel. Voorhees was popping another from the middle of the elephant grass and shouting: 'Why doesn't he come down?' with profane embellishments. Being more familiar with the way Viet pilots operated, I said: 'He's looking us over. He'll be down in a minute!' Sure enough, in about that time he 'dropped it on a wing' (if you can do that in a helicopter) and down he came, like those Viet pilots did—like a rock! Just before he hit the ground he pulled pitch and RPM. The airframe shuddered, the engine screamed, the rotorblades groaned, and he hovered 3 ft. above the rice paddy. From some part of 471 someone shot out the left windshield (so I was told) and the rest of the bird began to grow holes. I pointed at my knee and motioned him toward me. He came, sideways across the paddy. Scully jumped off, Voorhees came up, they threw me onto the chopper and scrambled on behind me. Scully asked about the rest of the team and I told him: we're it, meanwhile shouting for Lt. Thieu go Go! Go! Go! He looked down between his seat and the driveshaft housing and grinned at us, and flew away. I think at least one gunship was making runs on Hill 471 at this time, but I was busy with my own affairs. Also, I don't remember anyone on the chopper except Scully and the crew chief.

"Scully had a PRC-25 with which he talked to the FOB, so on our landing (very close to the aid station bunker) there were people there with a stretcher. Someone helped me shift my butt from the chopper to the stretcher and someone else grabbed my shoulders and laid me down. I bounced back up to a sitting position. He laid me down. I bounced back up, screaming, 'Wait a Goddamn minute!' and took off my belt. One cannot lie comfortably on loaded canteen covers. Besides, they should have been grateful. Without the belt I was 75-80 pounds lighter.

"They carried me down into the aid station bunker, and God knows how they managed the corners. After bouncing me up and down and flopping me from side to side to see if I had any more holes (they did me almost as much damage as the bullet had), Scully slit up my trouser leg, cut off my cravat, and said, 'You're going out,' and put a new dressing on the wound. Then he took off my boot and sock, cut my pants leg off, slit up my trouser leg into my pocket, took my lighter and put it into his own pocket. I protested. He said, 'You're gonna be evacuated and can get another one. I lost mine day before yesterday.' He gave me 2 books of matches and some kind of soul brought me my billfold, my checkbook, and 2 packs of cigarettes. Some others carried me up the stairs (there was a Bru involved here, because he held my hand as they put me on the Huey) put me on a gunship (I think. A Huey, anyway) and flew me to the Casualty Clearing point [C Med] near the airstrip.

"An hour or so later someone from the TOC came in to find me writing citations for Voorhees and Crone. He said, 'You are nothing but Hard Core,' and took my citations and the 4 syrettes of morphine I had left back to the TOC. Maybe an hour later word sorta drifted around about a heavy contact on Hill 471 with several wounded Americans, as well as at least 1 KIA. There was no clear info., only rumors. A bit later they brought in a couple more stretchers, presumably with Grenville [Sutcliffe] and someone else on them. They were in no condition to talk, and trying to learn anything from the Marines was an exercise in futility. Shortly after that a C-130 drove up, we were loaded on, and flown to the 3dMarDiv hospital at Phu Bai."

[The following was written by Harlan "Rip" Van Winkle, and continues the story of what happened subsequently as another FOB-3 team attempted to retrieve Crone and Mahoney]:

"About 1000 hrs on 29 January, a helicopter picked up a wounded American in a field about 1200 meters from the combat base. He had been shot through both knees and was in a bad way. As it turned out he was the team leader of the recon team that had inserted with us on 26 January. He stated his team had been ambushed while moving through a saddle on the east side of Hill 471 which was only about 2500 meters from the FOB, that one American had been killed and one captured and to the best of his knowledge he was the only member of the team to escape. I was not present when he was questioned but he evidently said he thought they had been hit by a reinforced squad of enemy soldiers. It was decided that an attempt would be made to recover the bodies and if possible, to locate and/or rescue the missing American. HF DENVER was selected for this mission. The fact that I was unable to speak directly to the wounded team leader prior to his medical evacuation left a large gap in pertinent, first hand information. This lack of information proved very critical in all of the decisions leading up to our departure on the mission. I knew there was the possibility, even probability, of trouble, but the way the enemy situation was explained to me, it sounded as though the recon team had walked into a hasty ambush and the chances were good the enemy had already vacated the area. Based on the available air assets the decision was made to go in with eight Americans and sixteen Bru. Names are important at this point to pay tribute and to clarify who was on the mission:

CPT H.E. "Rip" Van Winkle	XO, A-221
1LT Grenville Sutcliffe	FOB-3 S-3A, being groomed to replace Cpt Van Winkle
SFC Robert Scully	Senior Medic, FOB3
SFC Charles N. Tredinnick	Senior Combat Engineer of A-221
SGT Dennis C. Lansing	Junior Communications NCO, A-221
SGT Donald R. Rumph	Junior Medic, A-221
SP5 John L. Frescura	Junior Combat Engi neer, A-221
PFC James Taylor	USMC, Member of CAC OSCAR

"Following the evacuation from Khe Sanh the Marine Combined Action Company OSCAR moved onto the FOB and took up positions near the northwest corner. PFC Taylor happened to be in the area where we were preparing for the mission, stated he was familiar with the area where the ambush occurred and volunteered his services. I was never one to question why someone volunteers to perform a dirty job, all I asked was could he operate a radio? He said he could and that was all I needed to hear. In retrospect he probably got a lot more than he bargained for, I got more than I expected and am sure glad he decided to go along for the ride. We lifted off at 1135 for a short ride and insert onto the southeastern most point of the ridge line that makes up Hill 471.

"The insertion went off without problems. Cover on the ridge line was non-existent and concealment was limited to a stand of elephant grass that averaged less than three feet in height and a few scraggly bushes. We could look to the north and see people moving at the FOB. There was certainly nothing to indicate imminent trouble. We set up a hasty defensive perimeter with SFC Tredinnick, SP5 Frescura and four Bru focusing basically east. SGT Lansing, SGT Rumph, and four Bru were covering to the north; 1Lt Sutcliffe, SFC Scully, and four Bru covered west, while PFC Taylor and I with the reamining four Bru covered to the south. The saddle where the bodies were supposedly located was directly to the front of Tredinnick and Frescura.

"Tredinnick took three Bru and moved forward, all the way down into the saddle and up to the top of the small peak on the other side of the saddle, a distance of perhaps 150-175 meters. At no point was he ever out of my sight. They did not locate the bodies or make any enemy contact. However, Tredinnick did relay to me that he had spotted a large force of enemy ground troops attempting to encircle us from the east. I instructed him to return to the ridge line and reestablish the perimeter. This move was made much quicker than the move over but again there was no evidence of any bodies.

"Upon his return he moved to my position and we were discussing our next move when we both heard and spotted movement in a small bush directly to our front, probably less than six feet away. Tredinnick had just enough time to ask 'What was that?' before we were fired upon by an enemy rifleman from a well concealed fighting position. I had the distinct impression the rounds passed between us and how they missed hitting at least one of us I'll never know. We both returned fire and I dropped a M-26 fragmentation grenade into the hole. To my recollection that action initiated the fight. I have been told since that our entire perimeter had been receiving sporadic small arms fire for several minutes prior to mine and Tredinnick's up-close and personal encounter.

"It was only a few minutes later when 1Lt Sutcliffe received a wound in the throat. Tredinnick and I both went to him. He was such a mess that I sensed it was a mortal wound. [Sutcliffe recently wrote: "I'd just been promoted to company commander and that fool shot me through the throat and shoulder. Obviously he didn't realize it was Grenville Sutcliffe."] SFC Scully was already working on him and Tredinnick started back to his position in the perimeter and I turned my attention to getting us some type of fire support. We began receiving fire from every point of the perimeter except the north, with the heaviest coming from the west and southeast. What occurred next could only be called a thunderstorm of enemy hand grenades being thrown into our position. Some later After Action Reports stated the sky literally turned 'black' with grenades. PFC Taylor shouted the warning and in his words 'gave me a friendly shove.' I recall thinking that for as many as had been thrown, there seemed to be a lot of 'duds' and several that did not explode with near the force characteristic of US grenades. Thankfully it was one of the weaker ones that went off between my legs and all I received was a dozen or so very painful, but not disabling, fragmentation wounds. It was at that point when I heard the distinctive sound of a bullet strike someone behind me. I turned and saw Tredinnick lying still on the ground. SGT Rumph, PFC Taylor and I converged on Tredinnick. He had been wounded low down on the left side of his chest. The entrance wound was very small but the exit wound was massive. [Donald Rumph wrote in his report of this action: "SFC Tredinnick was unconscious at this time and breathing very irregularly. I cut off his web gear and shirt and finished applying the dressing., His pulse was very weak, and 4 or 5 times stopped breathing."] His last words to me were 'It hurts real bad, Sir.' Rumph and Taylor were performing immediate first aid and I put all of my effort to moving us some place reasonably safe to call for a medevac.

"It would be safe to say the crescendo of enemy fire was such that I felt we were in danger of being overrun at any point. What little fire support we had received was limited to our helicopter gunships and they were unable to do much because of the close proximity of the two fighting forces. During one of the gunship runs, the door gunner, firing a M-60 MG, missed Taylor and I by less than six inches and shot Lao, the Bru platoon leader, in both legs, shattering both of them. I don't fault the gunner. He was doing his best to provide needed support under very trying circumstances.

"We had not received any fire from the north and SGT Rumph, SFC Scully, and PFC Taylor were already hauling wounded down the steep north slope of the hill. SGT Lansing had turned his attention and that of his men to the threat we faced from the south and west, focusing on a small gully that led from the south slope directly into our position. While positioning his Bru machinegunner, Pa Lang, to cover this approach, Pa Lang was shot dead and the entire element was pinned down. By then, the only Americans still on the hill and carrying on the fight were SGT Lansing, SP5 Frescura and myself, the others were either wounded or assisting with the wounded. We also had perhaps ten or eleven of the Bru. I managed to get everyone focused on the south and west and started to ease back from the south slope trying to put a little distance between us and the enemy. The width of the ridge line where we were was less than sixty meters and the enemy owned at least a third of that. By finally getting my force down below the crest on the north side, I was finally able to call in some air strikes.

"B y now we had been on the ground over an hour and the fight itself was about 45 minutes old. The Forward Air Controller (FAC) that had been on hand when we inserted had to leave us to refuel. He was replaced by a USMC FAC with the callsign of 'AMERICAN BEAUTY DELTA.' "This gentleman deserves a lot of credit for getting the rest of us off the hill with little further damage though it took awhile. The manner in which he was able to coordinate (that's a fancy word for juggle) all of the various air support into that one small area without doing us anymore damage was nothing short of phenomenal. Not only did he have to worry about our immediate situation, he was also having to deal with two battalion size enemy units that were trying to get between us and the FOB. These were enemy troops spotted moving in the open within 400-500 meters from Hill 471 where we were holding forth.

"We were finally able to gain some fire superiority with the help of US Army and USMC gunships and some pinpoint bombing from whatever USAF 'fastmovers' were in the area. There was at least one instance when a USAF pilot stated his ordnance consisted of napalm and cluster bomb units (CBUs) and that we were much too close to the impact area for him to consider dropping it. I recall telling AMERICAN BEAUTY DELTA not to concern himself with us, that without the support, we were subject to have severe problems with the 'bad guys.' The airstrikes came in on target. I couldn't begin to estimate the amount of ordnance expended in our behalf that afternoon. I just know it was all considered 'Danger, Close!' and that even with all the helicopter gunship rocket runs, numerous 250 pound bombs all followed with CBUs, the enemy pressure was still very intense. Not until I practically begged them to drop the napalm did the close-in enemy fire disappear.

"Somewhere during all of this time we were finally able to get two medevac helicopters on the ground. Actually one was a US Army medevac and the other was one of MACVSOG's King Bees (H-34), one of the helicopters on which we had inserted earlier. SSG Sweezy, the Senior Medic on A-221, had offered his assistance and came in with the US Army medevac ship. He stated later that he couldn't understand why we were having such difficulty loading the wounded. When the medevac ship in which he was riding had to crash-land at the FOB it had over 200 bullet holes in it. Sweezy was oblivious to it all.

"I'm not sure where the enemy strength estimate originated but without doubt it far exceeded a reinforced rifle squad. I would estimate the unit which initiated fire on our perimeter at the outset was at least a reinforced platoon and as stated earlier there were much larger units seen during the right in the near vicinity. SFC Tredinnick was mortally wounded about 20 minutes after contact was made. He was awarded the Silver Star for his actions that day. We lost one Bru KIA and had two Americans WIA and six Bru WIA. Following the final medevac and seeing all survivors were off the hill we finally moved by foot back to the FOB. We were met about 600 meters from the gate by a rescue unit led by SFC Robert Cavanaugh. He gave me the word that Tredinnick had died. All of that and we did not accomplish what we set out to do. SGT Gary Crone was the American radio operator on the recon team ambushed earlier in the day. He was listed as KIA and his remains and that of one of the montagnards on his patrol were located and identiried in April, 1968. They were located on the north side of the saddle, within sight of the FOB. I can't believe they were there all of the time as we would have been stumbling all over them while trying to disengage from our predicament. I can only assume they were moved later, perhaps for sanitary purposes. SP5 Robert T. Mahoney and the remaining montagnards of the patrol were all listed as MIA. The initial story was that Mahoney had been captured and later executed. I did not see nor have I any later evidence to confirm or deny what happened to him.

"Looking back, I'm sure we were victims of a classic NVA ambush designed to take advantage of our desire to recover the bodies of Americans killed in action. I think perhaps, we surprised them with the speed and the manner in which we reacted. Maybe they expected us to walk out from the FOB rather than insert on the hill by helicopter. I don't really know even now. The only question remaining in my mind that leads me to believe we didn't react in the way they had anticipated is why did they wait until we were on the ground and set up before springing the ambush? The most logical time would have been as we were getting off the helicopters. With the fire power that they had they could have easily destroyed at least two of the insert ships and mopped up the survivors without much problem. I look back at all of the very close calls that I had and one has to believe in Divine intervention."

[Epilogue]

Hammond Saley and a FOB-3 Medic named Denis Chericone later retrieved the remains of Gary Crone. Salley writes:

"I arrived at Khe Sanh and FOB-3 on/about 6 March 1968 from USARV to work for Major Quamo in Special Projects. However, as the Siege was continuing, Major 'Bulldog' Smith, the FOB Commander at the time, decided to use me as his S-2 instead. I learned about the ambush on Hill 471 from FOB-3 colleagues and reports on file in the S-2 section. On 1 April 1968, Operation PEGASUS commenced with the siege being lifted several days later. The morning of April 1st, [Battalion 1/9] passed through the FOB-3 wire to attack the NVA to our front and on Hill 471. Shortly after Hill 471 was taken the FOB received notification that several bodies believed to be FOB-3 members were found on Hill 471. As I recall, LTC Roy Bahr, our new commander, asked me to retrieve the bodies.

"Accordingly, one of our Medics, Denis Chericone, and I departed on a Huey from the airstrip for Hill 471 with several body bags. We arrived on Hill 471 and were greeted by the Marines now occupying the hill. One of them escorted us about 30-40 meters down the FOB side of the hill where we were shown two bodies: one American and one Bru Montagnard. The bodies were intact with equipment, less weapons and ammunition, still with them. A radio with several bullet holes in it was still on the American's back. There was also a sheath knife on the American which Denis regonized as belonging to a Sgt. Crone whom he knew. There was no appearance of any type of molestation to the bodies. However, the stench was awful as both bodies had been out in the elements for over two months."

Denis Chericone recalls: "About five or six Marines greeted us. They brought us over to the bodies and then wouldn't come near the bodies with us. So we walked over and we turned one guy over. And I remember turning him over, and he was a friend of mine. And the flies all flew in my face, and the smell got on me, and I peuked really quick."

Hammond Salley: "When we picked up the American, his body was so deteriorated that his head fell off. I retrieved it and placed it in the bag with his body. We brought the bodies and the radio back up the hill and put them inside the helicopter. We returned to the Khe Sanh airstrip, placed the bodies on our jeep and took them to the CHARLIE Med. The attendant would only take the American. He checked the pockets and found an ID card in the left breast pocket. I believe the identification was for Sgt. Crone. We then took the Bru body back to FOB-3 to turn over to the Montagnards for burial. I gave the radio to our communications section in the TOC. Both Denis and I smelled terrible. We were asked to take showers before going back into the TOC."

Denis: "When we got back, I burned my uniform right after I got off the helicopter. I just took everything off and threw it in the trash-burner, becaused it had that smell on it. Then I went down in the medical bunker and drank. I remember! I drank a half a bottle of whisky straight down, Bourbon straight down. It didn't even touch me. It didn't even touch me. Stone-sober. I remember one of the Sergeants standing there and going, Wow, kid, what happened to you? And I told him about the thing. He was amazed a 21 year-old kid poured this bottle of liquor straight down."

MISSION IMPOSSIBLE

Capt James H. Knox, one of the pilots involved in the Co Roc operation, recalls a briefing for a mission in the spired karst cave area just west of the DMZ where the NVA Headquarters controlling the Khe Sanh Siege battle was located:

"We were engaged in an absolutely insane mission that was fortunately finally aborted. We were going to try to kidnap General Giap! It led to a really ugly scene during the briefing. The guys from the CIA or wherever were there in their short-sleeved white shirts looking like IBM execs, and they had the briefing. An Army Special Forces LtCol was there. We were going to put a team up in that very severe geological karst formation. There was a discussion on how big the team would be—I can't remember all the details, but I think it was a fairly good-sized team. A decision was made—not by us, but basically by the Army—that we would not try to extract them at night: due to the terrain there would be no possible way but to make a bad situation worse if we tried to go in there with a bunch of helicopters at night and get this team out. The team wasn't hot about going anyway. At that point, an Army Lieutenant, who was going on the team, said, 'You mean, if I'm in there at night, nobody's going to come and get me?' And we said, 'Look, we'll do whatever we're told to do; we'll try to get you'—and the Colonel is saying, 'Don't do it.' And I said, 'We'll come up there if you want and try and get an airstrike' and that kind of thing. And around and around we went. Finally, this Lieutenant told the Colonel he wasn't going, whereupon the Colonel arrested him on the spot, put him on a helicopter, and said that he was going to be court-martialed! Right on the spot! Right in front of me!"

Deep in the bowels of the specially reinforced command bunker of FOB-3 (the TOC), in the communications area, four North Vietnamese Chieu Hois were monitoring radios, and they picked up information of a high-level conference that was to include what seemed to be Vo Nguyen Giap.

This target was subsequently saturated with several B-52 strikes which some staff at Khe Sanh initially felt—hoped—may have killed Giap. It didn't, of course, but it probably caught many other headquarters types. This particular B-52 strike did not escape White House scrutiny. In a memo by Walt W. Rostow to the President of 7:50am, 30 Jan 1968, he reports: "Herewith Westy reports an extremely successful use of intelligence to identify and attack with B-52s the new, recently established senior headquarters west of the DMZ. (Some of our best analysts suspect Gen. Giap may have taken personal command at this installation). Westy believes the attack may 'at least delay' the major offensive in Northern I Corps."

The strike, however, went unknown to the American public. Gen. Westmoreland sent the following to General Wheeler (CJCS) on 01 Feb: "Any public statement about successful B-52 attack on the major enemy headquarters would certainly compromise the source of the information, enemy corrective action could diminish our intelligence effort country-wide. No valid cover story can be developed. We have no ground reconnaissance resources which could be admitted to be in that area. While photographic interpretation could confirm a possible logistic complex, it could not support identification of a major headquarters.. It should also be pointed out that any such statement would be an admission of our [here two lines are not declassified]. Additionally, approval for the strike was granted by American Ambassador, Vientiane upon condition that no publicity would be given to the strike."

During an interview with BGen George J. Keegan, Jr., Director of Intelligence, 7th Air Force, on 14 Jul 68, the General noted: "On 21 Jan 1968, MACV had become so overextended in the ground war, that General Westmoreland assigned General Momyer [Commander, 7th Air Force] a principal role in the defense of Khe Sanh... The Air Force thoroughly reconnoitered I Corps using special sensors plus ARDF [Aerial Radio Direction Finders, in EC-47 aircraft].. The reconnaissance effort produced 2000 targets around Khe Sanh."

A USAF report later noted: "On 30 January, the largest B-52 strike of the war to that date was flown against a command and control center in Eastern Laos, 36 sorties in the morning and 9 at night. There were 85 secondary explosions and numerous cave-ins. These attacks greatly disrupted the enemy's plans."

However, General Giap was not killed and, Gen Westmoreland reported "..some elements of the headquarters is back in communication with Hanoi after 38 hours of silence."

Charles Berg of FOB-3 was scheduled to launch into this area following the B-52 strike (probably for a BDA—Bomb Damage Assessment), and had done a VR, got back with SgtMaj Pegram, and exclaimed, "Whew! That's a bummer!" He had been scheduled to launch the day before, but had insisted on his VR 24 hours before an insert, and the VR was approved. He recalls:

"We were just north of ELEPHANT, and I'm in an O-2 with an Air Force guy. I turned over and looked, and right in front of me, 300 yards away, was a 4-prop wing transport aircraft, brown color. I looked at him [the pilot] and I punched him and said, 'Look!' He banked and looked at it. It was a Russian plane! And I said, 'Go in on him!' I had a CAR-15. I had a bunch of rounds. I said, 'Go on top of him; I can shoot him down.' The guy went, 'No!' He flipped the bird on the other side and he started talking. He forgot he had his intercom on. He's talking to one of the C&C [Command and Control] ships up there [Note: the USAF C-130 ABCCC, Callsign "HILLSBORO"]. He started making a SITREP, and he said, 'Yes, again in the same area,' and I said, 'What?' He said, 'O shit!' and got me off the comm.

"When we got back, I said, 'Why didn't you come up on top of him? I could of shot him down! I could of dropped that airplane.' And he said, 'Well, it really wasn't what you thought it was.' I said, 'Yes it was! It was a Russian transport plane. I think I even know the kind if I see the images again.' And he said, 'Well, we see them quite a few times up here. We just report them.' So when I came back and I was supposed to insert the next day, they gave a delay on it, and that day is when they put the B-52 strike in. I went back down and got the folder—the area studies folder, and that was the Headquarters area. And I asked, 'You're going to put me in there—in the Headquarters area!' And they said, 'Well, we'll get you in and get you out.' I said, 'Yeah!' You gotta realize: those people up there are not the home guard or the 'fourth line;' they're the real crack troops, like the same people that are running around with Westmoreland."

On 28 March, SOG team ASP was inserted just south of this Front Headquarters on a wire-tap mission, came under fire, requested extraction from XD434574. A H-3 helicopter attempted a ladder extraction,but it broke, and the three Americans of the team are still listed as MIA (SFC Alan L. Boyer, SGM George R. Brown, and SFC Charles G. Huston).

LANG VEI

[The following discussion focuses on the rescue of the brave defenders of Lang Vei. Much has already been written concerning the actions of those at Lang Vei, including a book by William R. Phillips, Night of the Silver Stars, The Battle of Lang Vei, published November, 1997, by US Naval Institute Press].

BACKGROUND

Support (or lack of support) of Lang Vei when it was attacked by the Marines has been a vexing contention that has plagued both Marines and Special Forces as much as the entire Vietnam War's complexities continue to perplex all. Because of the fall of Lang Vei, many Marines have expressed guilt for not having rescued them, not an uncommon sequential condition of almost all Vietnam veterans who experience guilt over "not having done more" even after they gave all in a war lost by the politicians in Washington, DC, several years after all major battles had been won militarily. Many Special Forces soldiers feel anger and betrayal at having been abandoned. How could they not? Perhaps an understanding of the facts and the conditions of the situation (which are rarely, if ever, indicated) may serve to ameliorate such pain and help heal wounds of the soul.

Lang Vei (XD 795361), a Vietnamese military outpost with American Advisors of Team A-101, had been overrun during the Battle of the Hills on 04 May 1967. NVA posing as PF recruits had killed several sentries in the camp and then guided in the outside force which subsequently killed both the CO and XO. From that time, a new camp site was developed (at XD 78443573) in which no indigenous troops would be in the inner perimeter of the American advisors (other than Vietnamese Special Forces, LLDB), to preclude that from being repeated.

A detail from Naval Mobile Construction Battalion (NMCB) ELEVEN arrived in early July to begin the work on the new site. Work progressed rapidly. By 25 July 1967, ground clearing for the new site was 75% compolete and two of three unmarked old French mine fields wre cleared. By 25 August 1967, foundations for nine primary and secondary bunkers had been poured and the foundations and walls for the TOC [Tactical Operations Center, "same same" COC in Marine language] were completecd. The new camp was occupied 21 Sep 1967 with minor construction work still in progress. Captain Frank Willoughby, the CO (and former Marine Sergeant), was showing the progress of the construction to the author and remarked that "it could take a regiment."

On 20 Jan 68, the SOG teams that had been on Co Roc reported their findings to Lang Vei, and on the same day, GySgt Max Friedlander (of 17th ITT) flew from KSCB to Lang Vei to brief them on what Lt Tonc, the NVA rallier, had disclosed. The BV-33 position, nearby in Laos, had fallen to NVA tanks on 25 Jan, and refugees from that position flocked to occupy the former Lang Vei campsite, assuredly disclosing what had happened to them. Lt Miles Wilkens, XO of A-101, notes, "They would hardly set up their own perimeter. They seemed to have less interest in their own welfare than we did. They weren't even setting up the tents."

In mid-January, Max Cottrell (Asst S-3 of Co C, CCN, in DaNang, of which Col Schungel was Commander and Maj Edwards was S-3) flew to Lang Vei to inform them of the tank threat. "We sent a [SOG] team over there and actually took some pictures of the tanks—there were several of them." The response was: "No, we have good intelligence too; there aren't any tanks!" They added, "These pictures are doctored up to make it look like there were tanks there."

Col Jonalthan Ladd (Commander, 5th Special Forces Group) had visited the Lang Vei camp on 6 Feb (along with Col Dan Baldwin and LTC Schungel) in connection with attempts to obtain anti-tank mines for them. Sounds from moving tanks could even be heard while he was visiting them! He then departed, leaving LTC Schungel ("CROSSBOW") to remain there. His efforts had been most frustrating: "I went to DaNang to see the Marine General, General Cushmen. He was all for helping me but the people down in Saigon wouldn't believe that there were tanks up there; they said we didn't need them [the mines]. Besides, they couldn't gtive them to the Special Forces. They went through all kinds of reasons why we couldn't have them... I was furious that they wouldn't give us any damn antitank mines. The Marines were perfectly willing to give them to us."

CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

05 Feb - Co E/2/26 on Hill 861-Alfa received a very heavy NVA ground attack which temporarily penetrates part of the defensive position before the Marines regain control. Results: 7 USMC KIA; 109 NVA KIA.

06 Feb 68:

2255 - Light ground attack on E/2/26 on 861-A, evaluated as a diversion (which it turned out to be). KSCB receives incoming 82mm mortars and 122mm rockets and a light ground probe against ARVN lines. Lang Vei receives incoming (type and number of rounds unknown). ARVN at Lang Vei report "many, many VC in the area, NVA also."

2325 - Attack on E/2/26 ceases; KSCB still receiving ground probe.

2355 - FSCC of 3dMarDiv reports 175mm batteries at Camp Carroll and Rock Pile are firing one gun, 4 rounds, every 4 minutes in support of Khe Sanh. [Note: The 175s at Camp Carroll, with a range of 32,800 meters, reached just short of Lang Vei, and those of Camp Rock Pile just short of the Laotian border. 90mm tanks could fire 11 miles, and therefore all the way to Co Roc. Range probable error for 175mm guns average range of 20,000 meters is 65 meters and deflection probable error is 10 meters. Assuming four probable errors in relation to point of impact, the projectile could land 260 meters over or 260 meters short of computed point of impact and 40 meters right or left of the gun target line.]

07 Feb 68:

0045 - Weather report for Khe Sanh: From 1200-2000 on 06Feb, the weather presented generally good flying conditions with ceilings of 2500-4000 ft. and good visibility. From 2000, 06 Feb to 0100, 07 Feb, it was marginal with clouds at 1000 ft. Flying conditions became poor at 0100 and continued through 1200 with visibility one and one-half miles or less. The forecast was for marginal to poor conditions in the afternoon of 07 Feb with ceilings at 1500 ft. [Note: this is the height of Khe Sanh!] and visibility for one to five miles in light rain and fog. Flying conditions were predicted to become poor to 1800, 08 Feb.

0045 - Lang Vei received heavy ground attack, some enemy are inside wire, and enemy supported by tanks. KSCB at this point is firing all available supporting fires in support of Lang Vei, all batteries of 1st Battalion, 13th Marines.

KSCB is receiving heavy incoming.

0054 - S-2, 26th Marines, reports interception of NVA radio transmission that indicated NVA artillery would increase shelling of KSCB. (Throughout the attack, this proved to be true).

0105 - III MAF reports 7 tanks in wire at Lang Vei. 26th Marines receiving SPOOKY to support Lang Vei. Heavy incoming at KSCB.

G-2, 3dMarDiv, reports that a Command and Control element, presumably controlling the attack on Lang Vei was located fairly precisely and passed this information to 26th Marines who immediately targetted the installation.

0121 - CO, 26Mar sets RED ALERT

0130 - SPUNKY HANSON [Lang Vei] requests VICTOR TANGO [VT fuse arty] at XD785359.

0135 - KSCB is averaging 6 rounds incoming per minute. Ground troops are approaching wire at Lang Vei: Col Schungel radios: Tanks are on hill; they were hit from two sides. They need air right away or there will be nothing left. Tanks not accompanied by substantial size infantry. [Note: While those at Lang Vei requested air, the Marines at Khe Sanh were anxious to fire artillery according to Col Kent O.W. Steen, Fire Support Coordinator in the Khe Sanh FSCC. Due to SAV-A-PLANE doctrine, no artillery could be fired from the time of launch of aircraft. This left Lang Vei without any supporting fire].

SPUNKY HANSON reports the VICTOR TANGO arty fire is impacting in his position.

0140 - III MAF reports 9 tanks in wire at Lang Vei (1 tank knocked out; 7 inside position on hill, 2 in wire).

0148 - SPUNKY HANSON requests VICTOR TANGO fire and flares all over his area.

0150 - MGen Tompkins directs CO, 26Mar, to use COFRAM against enemy tanks at Lang Vei. [COFRAM was a TOP SECRET class of munitions—Col Lownds had to receive a special clearance for this—which had been kept in reserve as a way of stopping large masses of troops, "the great hordes." Also referred to as M444, or "Improved Conventional Munitions," or "Firecracker," this munition (if delivered in aerial bombs or artillery) exploded by sending out numerous ping-pong ball sized mini-grenades whose inner surface was pressed in such a way to cause the surface to break into many thousands of tiny bits of metal. Clearance for bringing COFRAM into Vietnam was requested by Gen Westmoreland on 12 Jan to the JCS for use in unpopulated areas of I Corps, and was controlled on the highest levels—CINCPAC. Once used it lost its security classification, and there was some discussion whether or not Tompkins had the authority to direct its use; he undoubtedly wanted to give the best he could to support Lang Vei in this unusual and desperate situation, whether he had the authority to do so or not].

MGen Tompkins asks 3dMarDiv DASC if any air is over Lang Vei. It is determined a flareship, SPOOKY1, and fixed wing are now working targets in and near Lang Vei. [Note: SPOOKY "wasn't satisfied with the weather, targets or conditions (he had all sorts of reasons why he couldn't) and so he did not fire—however, he did drop flares for the camp." The OinC of the Khe Sanh DASC relates, "I got the impression that SPUNKY HANSON did not or was not able to really adjust the air strikes very effectively. The COVEY spent much of his time trying to determine location of friendlies."

0154 - SPUNKY HANSON requests a Check Fire on VICTOR TANGO.

0200 - III MAF Air Officer asks how much air is on station. 26MAR reports 2 flights there now running TPQ-10 attacks every 15 minutes.

0210 - The amount of air increases to 4 flights, directed by COVEY.

0215 - 5thSF reports 5 tanks knocked.

0220 - SPUNKY HANSON reports troops hitting both ends of his compound.

0225 - AO over Lang Vei requests flights armed with ZUNI rockets [more effective on tanks]; present flights are out of rocket ordnance. Flights will be scrambled in DaNang.

0240 - 26MAR reports troops inside wire at Lang Vei. At the request of CO, Lang Vei, firecrackers are not used because "he wants to use air on them" and if Firecrackers are used, air will be called off [due to SAV-A-PLANE doctrine].

0243 - 26MAR expects KSCB will be attacked at any minute with these circumstances occuring so close. MGEN Tompkins is concerned Firecrackers are not being used, and speaks with Capt Mirza Baig, 26MAR Target Officer, asking him to pass the message: "suggest CO Lang Vei check air bring in Firecracker then air be brought in again." Shortly after this, and before any decision on what was to be done about Firecrackers, at 0245, Tompkins receives word from III MAF that everything above ground at Lang Vei is enemy. So, with this news, Gen Tompkins says, "Let's use Firecrackers, then HE, then air."

0250 - 5 tanks reported destroyed.

0255 - Two large secondary explosions at XD770418 [6 clicks due north of Lang Vei, 7.5 clicks due west of KSCB] and 2 additional large secondary explosions at XD753412 [approx. 6 clicks NW of Lang Vei].

0257 - 13th Marines fired 28 rounds of Firecracker ordnance at XD786357. [THIS IS THE FIRST USE OF FIRECRACKER IN BATTLE]. The cycle of fire in support of Lang Vei is: 5 minutes of Firecracker, 5 minutes of mixed HE and VT, followed by 10 minutes air strikes on the perimeter.

0300 - KSCB still received heavy incoming mortarsw and rockets, mostly rockets.

0310 - 26MAR reports loss of comm with Lang Vei.

0320 - Gen Tompkins asks Lang Vei via III MAF relay "if they at Lang Vei have gas masks, do they want CS on position?" Response: "Do not want CS on position." No explanation is given.

0325 - III MAF reports tank on top of comm bunker. Special Forces have deliberately destroyed primary means of communication and are using secondary freq.

Air strikes resume.

0343 - S3, 26MAR, reports incoming C-130 with approx. 100 men aboard.

0345 - CO, 26MAR, calls Tompkins expressing concern over condition of runway—that it is probably pitted and cratered, that there are tanks running around between KSCB and Lang Vei, that enemy infantry abounds in the area. Gen Tompkins calls Col Smith [G-3, III MAF] and registers a complaint about the proposed empoloyment of troops moving into the area since it would inhibit use of supporting arms. Further, Gen Tompkins inquired how the forces thus introduced would make their way to Lang Vei. Gen Tompkins also registered a complaint with Gen Cushman [CG, III MAF] who said he knew nothing about the C-130, but would check.

0350 - AO spots flame throwers. USSF has no flame throwers.

0400 - Conference with Col Smith [G-3, III MAF] and Capt Edwards and Maj Salmon of USSF. USSF requests relief force be sent to Lang Vei at first light.

0400 - KSCB taking heavy rockets and mortars.

0405 - CG, III MAF, radios that C-130 will not proceed to KSCB. Tompkins tells Cushman that his G-3 is requesting a ground relief column to go to Lang Vei at first light. "I told CG that we had no troops to send to Lang Vei and he agreed that no troops should go, and said to tell G-3 that he said no. I said I had no intention of sending troops unless he (Gen. Cushman) so ordered me." Gen Tompkins felt that this was precisely what the enemy was expecting us to do and that they would ambush the route from KSCB to Lang Vei, convinced that we would dispatch a relief column down there. [Note: This was a typical NVA tactic used on small and large scale: wound a man and kill off all those that come to rescue him; disable a recon team and ambush all infantry coming to rescue them; fix an outpost and lay in ambush to engage all who would rescue. In the attack on Khe Sanh village, one battalion attacked the District Headquarters, but two regiments were in ambush positions to destroy those who would come to rescue or reinforce them]. Gen Tompkins had planned a "set piece defense," not venturing out too far and falling into traps that the enemy may have set in the area, but rather force the enemy to come to us. Gen. Cushmen concurred that such a move to Lang Vei would be exceedingly unwise; in fact, it would be stupid.

Col Jonathan Ladd, meanwhile, asked Col Lownds to execute the contingency plan to get his people out, and reported that Col Lownds responded, "No, it would be a suicide mission." Ladd, however, who had just visited Lang Vei the day before, felt that because he had been there, it would not be a suicide mission. [Note: the general impression seems to be that those at Lang Vei were somewhat oblivious to the threat even after Khe Sanh village fell and KSCB was being attacked. They continued patrolling the area, for example]. Ladd: "apparently nobody in any strength was around there." Col Ladd flew from KSCB to DaNang and contacted GEN Westmoreland who was there in connection with a Marine Civic Action matter. Col Ladd's frustration is reflected in his memoir of that meeting (which occurred shortly after noon and was attended by Gen Chaisson [Chief COC, MACV], Gen Cushman, Gen Tompkins, Gen Anderson [CG, I MAW], and several other officers, including LGTC Hassinger [DCO, Special Ops], and Col Baldwin. "When I finally got his attention long enough, I told him, 'We have to do one of three things. We either stay there and just hold Lang Vei; we "DD" out and abandon the place; or the Marines execute their contingency plan. We can hold for probably another 3 or 4 days." [The Official AAR for the Battle of Lang Vei notes: "There was considerable argument against implementing the plan because of the possibility of loosing more men as well as the helicopters."] Col Ladd recounts: "Well, he couldn't make up his mind. Meanwhile I kept getting these radio calls from out there, telling me 'the Goddamn people are dropping charges down our air holes.' So I called Gen. Abrams on the phone and told him what was happening and I said, 'I just can't get Westmoreland's attention long enough to do anything. He is putting it off.' So, he called a General Anderson.. and told him that he was telling me to go ahead and evacuate the camp at the earliest opportunity and for the Marines to help us, which they did. Now in Westmoreland's book, he said that he did all that, but he didn't. Abrams did it, because he, Westmoreland, kept going back to those civic action meetings. Anderson was a great help; they dropped these CBUs all over the top of the camp and the people got out."

[Note: The Contingency Plan, "Relief of Lang Vei Special Forces Camp," OpOrder 5-67 of 18 Sep 67, called for a reinforced rifle company from 1/26 against an estimated enemy attack by a NVA force of a battalion of troops. On 14 Jan, MACV had requested this plan be carefully reviewed. On 16 Jan, CG, 3dMarDiv reported, "Plans written Sep 1967 remain valid." Given the scenario (attack only on Lang Vei, attack by a NVA battalion of troops) this seems plausible. But the situation had rapidly become significantly worse: there were tanks, the entire area contained two divisions of NVA, and it was an all-out attack. A patrol from A-101 moving east toward Khe Sanh village was ambushed on 31 Jan and Sgt John A. Young was captured.

No company size USMC infantry units were available for deployment due to what had unfolded since mid-January. (Apparently LtCol Mitchell, CO, 1/9, was willing to commit a company from his defensive position, but this may have been based on information he did not possess and would have become wreckless in view of the attack on 09 Feb on the Hill 64 position. It is tantalizing to speculate that the NVA may have assumed 1/9 would commit a company to relieve Lang Vei, weakening the 1/9 position, the NVA could attack the outpost and it would fall, they would push through 1/9 and through FOB-3—would the Marines fire into the American/indigenous base, and then push into the Combat Base.

Overland movement to reinforce Lang Vei was impossible. In November, 1967, Col Lownds directed 1/26 to determine an overland route between KSCB and Lang Vei with the time/space factor for moving a rifle company on a tactical mission. Capt John W. Raymond (A/1/26—an experienced officer who later formed E Co, 3d Recon) "determined that a rifle company, avoiding well-used trails to preclude ambush, could move by foot from KSCB to Lang Vei in approximately 19 hours."

Maj Matthew P. Caulfield [S-3, 3/26, and later Commandant of the Marine Corps] noted that MIKE Company, 3/26, was regimental reserve when it arrived in mid-Dec 67, and that he, together with the Battalion Commander, conducted a reconnaissance down the road (Route 9) to determine an approach route to the camp, and determined that the only way it could be reinforced was by air since the road presented numerous ambush sites.

Helicopter Landing Zones had tanks in them, according to Col Lownds KSCB was taking very heavy incoming, making assembly of troops to embark helicopters impossible.

Aerial photo imagery disclosed numerous NVA bunkers, foxholes, supply areas, fortifications, between KSCB and Lang Vei, including places along Route 9 that had been "piano-cut".

Col John J. Padley, who departed as CO, 26Mar in July '67 in his Debrief of 17 Aug 67 stated: "..if we were to reinforce Lang Vei, naturally we'd reinforce it with troops. But we have to be very leery because the enemy know we're going to defend that place and if they attack, their attack may be for us to come down the road so they can amb ush us.. In fact, when they attacked that one lnight [04 May 67] we did shoot artillery and there was no problem stopping it with artillery. The next day the word came through the grapevine: where were the Marines? Why didn't they reinforce? Most likely they wanted us to come down that route to ambush us. Maybe that's why they attacked Lang Vei, to try to have us come down that road."

0410 - KSCB has gone for 45 minutes without incoming.

0412 - Gen Tompkins orders Firecrackers to be fired ASAP on Lang Vei and kept up.

0415 - Gen Tompkins instructs S3, 26Mar, to fire two more 28-round Firecracker packages as fast as possible. One package of 36 rounds was shot out at 0421. Tompkins orders a schedule of: 5 min. Firecrackers, 5 min. HE/VT mixed, then direct air support from 2 aircraft, then repeat the cycle.

0421 - Shot out second package.

0423 - Lang Vei is apparently impressed with the effect of Firecrackers and radios: "Firecrackers right on target. Keep it coming."

0428 - COC, 3dMarDiv, obtains secondary freqs of Lang Vei and passes them to 26Mar so they can communicate directly with Lang Vei and not depend on relaying through III MAF to 3dMarDiv to 26Mar.

0432 - Air on station: 2 F8, 2 F4, 2 A4

0440 - Incoming rockets at Khe Sanh CP. 26Mar told to keep continous packages on Lang Vei. When low on Firecrackers switch to VT. Save some Firecrackers for our own hill positions. Report received of intense activity north of Hill 881-South, 861, and 950 [probably by electronic sensors].

0443 - KSCB begins taking rockets again.

0449 - S3, 26Mar reports that extra air strikes are being run on Lang Vei. Tanks are off Lang Vei and have moved to a position east of Lang Vei moving towards Khe Sanh. AO to determine enemy tank strength and disposition.

0500 - 1/26: KSCB reports receiving 38 rounds of rocket.

0520 - Aircraft attacking tanks remaining in Lang Vei camp.

0533 - 26Mar reports 1 tank burning on road, 1 vehicle burning in Lang Vei compound, tanks no longer in sight of road.

0540 - S3, 26Mar, reports aircraft are striking tanks. Marine aircraft have hard ordnance—500-pound and larger bombs. One flight every 20 minutes. USAF B-57s [YELLOWBIRD], armed with napalm and snake-eyes, are striking camp. 26Mar have been asking for half and half: half napalm and snakes, half delay and quick fuse 500-lb bombs and larger. AO feels that BV-33 (at XD794357, lear old Lang Vei camp) are apparently the target of approaching enemy infantry.

0600 - Gen Cushman asks if the artillery is still working on Lang Vei. 26Mar reports that they are presently running air on Lang Vei, to be followed by artillery. KSCB is still taking heavy incoming.

0630 - 15A reports that all above ground at Lang Vei is totally destroyed.

0700 - KSCB continues to support Lang Vei with air and arty.

0740 - 15A is in contact with Lang Vei TOC and reports about 15 Americans still in compound alive. He intends to move to rescue them using SPOOKY for cover.

0835 - 15A still has comm with Lang Vei.

0900 - 15A trying to get closer. SITREP at KSCB: runway is expecteed to be closed to fixed wing until 1030. AO on station reports 2 stationary tanks 500 meters south of Lang Vei.

0930 - KSCB still receiving incoming. Incoming was the heaviest NVA bombardment of the Vietnam War up to this time. Between 0045 and 0800, KSCB received 100 rounds of rocket fire and approximately 450 rounds mortar fire. The majority of the incoming impacted in the 1/26 area (at XD849417) and 3/26 (at XD837417), perhaps to preclude assembly for possible reinforcement.

1000 - (about). 15A radios PIEDMONT [FOB-3] that he was with some 200-300 Lao soldiers 2-3 miles east of the overrun camp and was attempting to come to the aid of the Americans trapped there.

Maj Goddard [DASC] recalls that during the morning, PIEDMONT had requested an emergency medevac from ELEPHANT. 2 gunships and 2 46s attempted to insert in ELEPHANT's position "but the ground fire was too intense and the helos couldn't get in."

Maj George Quamo went to 26Mar

COC and, in a conversation that lasted about four minutes, is told by a Major there, "We won't lose an American for those people." Quamo had been up all night, listening to the radio traffic, talking with Skip Minnicks, and had talked to Maj Campbell, the CO of FOB-3, who told him "Don't get involved." Maj Quamo told the Marine Major, "I need to talk to Col Lownds," and the Major said, "He's not available; what can I do for you?" Quamo said: It's your responsibility to go in there and get these guys and we want to know what you're going to do." The response from the Major was, "We're not going to do it; we're not going to risk one life for those guys."

Quamo became livid. Returning to FOB-3, he was yelling, "We're going to do something. We're going to get something done! Whether this guy likes it or not, we're going to do something!" He said that he was going to tell the pilots to get ready to fly "on the order of Col Lownds." Soon thereafter, the helicopters appeared at FOB-3, and Quamo's driver, Harve Saal, believes "George had just simply 'scalliwaged' those guys and told them: You have to do it because your boss said so."

[Note: While a large force of a company of Marines might not be available or optimal, perhaps a small, highly-trained force accustomed to this kind of operation, would be better able to accomplish the mission]

Skip Minnicks recalls: "Maj Quamo came back, asked me if I'd go in. I said 'Sure.' He said, 'You know we probably won't come out of there.' I said, 'Yeah, I'm aware of that.' He said, 'Ask for volunteers.' I asked for volunteers. The Sergeant-Major [Pegram] volunteered. At the time I was a Master Sergeant. I said, 'Look, Sergeant-Major, by your very presence, you would be in charge. 'Hey, Skip, I'll go as a rifleman. I'm going with you. You're running this operation. All I am is one of your grunts.' And we went in and got those people out. Honest to God, I thought that Quamo should of got a Medal of Honor for what he did at Lang Vei. He coordinated all of it."

1100 - (about) Maj C.D. Goddard [DASC] is informed by a Col Palmer "that a Mission 87 was being prepared which would involve 4 Hueys and 4 46s along with a 'HATCHETT' force of 50 to rescue the people rlemaining in the Lang Vei TOC bunker." Maj Goddard passed this to the FSCC, but they were unaware of it. Maj Goddard then went to INTRIGUE-14 [26Mar Air Officer] who was in the process of briefing the pilots of the resupply to the hill outposts and asked him if he were aware of "Mission 87." He replied that until he received further word, he would proceed with the resupply mission. Further discussion with the FSCC indicated that Gen Tompkins had said that no force could depart the Khe Sanh perimeter for any reason. Col Palmer gave Maj Goddard the final details of Mission 87. Col. Daniel L. Baldwin was arriving in a U-21 to lead the rescue operation and give the rescue brief. In addition to the 8 choppers already committed, there was to be a flight of A-4s armed with DELTA-9s [MARK-77 500-lb. napalm bomb] to hit the old Lang Vei camp immediately prior to the assault. Maj Goddard found INTRIGUE-14 and convinced him Mission 87 was a "go" and he agreed to suspend resupply at 1530 and assemble the pilots for a mission brief by Col Baldwin.

1200 - SITREP at KSCB of friendly casualties from the shelling: 2 KIA, 11 WIA (evac) and 6 WIA (minor). Evaluation by 3dMarDiv (to III MAF): possibility exists that enemy may now be ready to follow through with significant attack on the Khe Sanh complex Present poor weather conditions favor enemy operations and hamper friendly air support. Information from various sources [namely, signal intercepts] indicate hill outposts west and northeast of Khe Sanh may be initial objectives in attack, followed by main attack on KSCB proper. If enemy recon is complete and his forces have had opportunity to prepare and occupy satisfactory attack positions, he may launch attack at any time."

2476 rounds of arty fire had been fired in support of Lang Vei. USMC aircraft fixed wing flew 67 sorties in support of Lang Vei.

1300 - An over-flight by Lt Davis: There are 4 other Americans with 15A [Ashley] along with 100 unknown friendly; there are people inside the TOC; 1 tank is on top of TOC and 2 on road south of camp are disabled; there is still fighting inside the camp.

1430 - KSCB receiving sporadic incoming mortars. KSCB has 1000 refugees outside west end of perimeter. (This increased throughout the day to approx. 6,000. They moved to XD825422 for the night. Refugees included BV33, CIDG, PF and their dependents. CG, 3dMarDiv requests instructions from CG, III MAF, on handling of refugees. CO, 26Mar decided not to integrate refugees into perimeter defense.

1505 - KSCB receives 122mm rockets.

1530 - 15A reports that survivors from the TOC had broken out and linked up with 15A. The COVEY laid a couple of napes right on them before someone in the group identified themselves as friendlies.

1600 - KSCB still receiving rockiets. TPQs are being run in Lang Vei area with numerous secondary explosions.

1600 - The following are located at Lang Vei: 3 companies of CIDG (324); 1 company MIKE Force (130); Regional Forces (17); Vietnamese Special Forces (12); US Special Forces (20).

1600 - A monitored NVA radio message stated that a field grade Special Forces officer was CIA [Captured in Action] and LTC Schungel was the only field grade officer known to be in the area. (He was in Lang Vei since there was a Lao field grade officer, LTC Soulang, present). This created quite a turmoil back at the C Co in DaNang since LTC Schungel had a SI clearance and was not supposed to be in a situation where he could be captured. Max Cottrell, Assistant S3 of Co C, recalls "we got a message from III MAF early in the morning and I had to take our S2, which was Capt Stevenson (if I remember right) over to III MAF because he was the only other person in the unit that had a SI clearance." [Actually Schungel had not been captured. LTC Schungel had abandoned Lt Miles Wilkins, the XO of the Camp (who had a piece of shrapnel in his hip when he was shot by a tank): "..he twice left me for dead, and he was awarded a bunch of medals, but he just walked off and left me behind. I got out of there on my own—on two occasions actually. I was with him when we got shot by the tank, and he was about to leave me. Then the two of us spent the night on the floor of our medical building while the NVA were walking around above us. In the morning we headed for the old camp, and he just walked off and left me. Then we got strafed by our own aircraft. Then somebody came out and got me. He got back to the camp and—one of the guys later told me—said that I was dead."

1625 - An A-6 made 5 or 6 passes, using his rockets since the ceiling was too low to use his DELTA-2s [Note: MK-82 500-lb. General Purpose bombs]. As soon as the A-6 completed delivery of its ordnance, the transport choppers arrived.

1630 - A 50-man C&C Det (14 Americans, rest Bru) launched rescue operation on Lang Vei. The intent was to join with and rally BV-33 into attack. WIA were to be medevaced by the C&C Det; remaining personnel to move to old Lang Vei (XD794361). First Marine Air Wing fired suppressive fire on the TOC of the camp in preparation of the raid. Under cover of this fire, the friendly soldiers on site took escape and evasion action. The relief force put down near the old Lang Vei, at XD 794357, and moved to the new Lang Vei site, XD 786356. Enroute, the relief force encountered 13 of the 20 US personnel who were in the camp at the time of the initial attack. One additional man was subsequently recovered, making a total of 14. 6 remained unaccounted. Also, 80 CIDG and MIKE force were evacuated out of 500 indigenous personnel. A Vietnamese Special Forces officer captured who later escaped stated most of the indigenous troops who made it out of the camp were captured.

The C&C Det determined that SFC Ashley led 4 assaults on enemy dug in and around the Lang Vei TOC and was KIA on his 5th attempt. (He was subsequently posthumously decorated with the Medal of Honor, the only one to receive this award during the Siege battle).

One UH-1E and 2 CH-46s received fire in extraction resulting in one co-pilot and 2 crewmembers WIA. (The Co-pilot, 1/Lt G. E. Rosental is presently 100% disabled from wounds received during this rescue operation; other pilots participating include the following Marines: Tyler Alexander, Ed Kufeldt, J.J. Hanley).

1645 - A4s arrived on station.

1730 - A station came up on the FOX MIKE which identified himself as 'ELEPHANT' and requested extraction helicopters. He said he had 15 men with him. COVEY, overhead, spotted about 50 people gathering at the old campsite. Maj Goddard expressed reservations, feeling that there were Lao who had abandoned their own wounded but, having seen the successful extraction, were now trying to get out themselves. However, 2 46s and the sole remaining Huey launched and extracted about a hundred in 2 loads apiece. As the 46s returned, it was apparent that one American was still at the helo strip. The Huey made several passes in an attempt to retrieve him while COVEY ran some ADs [slow movers] with napalm on either side of the airstrip. However, the ground fire was so intense that the Huey took several hits and was barely able to return to Khe Sanh.

The helo pilots told Maj Goddard "that the last extraction was a mob scene in which the Laotians tried to mob the choppers in an effort to get aboard. He also said the majority of their hits were from the Laotians who realized that they were being left behind. He also said that the only reason the choppers had launched was that they were given the word that fifteen Amerficans were left at the strip."

Ed Kufeldt, piloting the Huey gunship, notes the pandemonium: "The 46s landed at the far end of the landing strip because they knew they were going to be rushed with the people, and they, in fact, were: people were trying to get on the airplane, falling off of the airplane as it was taking off because the airplane was obviously overloaded and couldn't take any more—people hanging on wheels, falling off."

Skip Minnicks recalls that the Lao officers were evacuated, as were the Lao NCOs. The others had thrown down their weapons. "They had quit. They had surrendered, but the North Vietnamese had not come into the camp. So we got everyone out except the Laotian enlisted. The chopper came in and asked, 'Is the LZ cleared?' And I said, 'Yeah," and he told me later that his idea of a cleared LZ and my idea were different when the first round went through his windshield!"

"When we got to Khe Sanh, the Colonel from the 33d ran up—actually, he was crying, hugging, and kissing us, telling us we saved his life. Then later, a message camedown [from the Ambassador]. The message said [long pause]: 'No American officer would be embarassed over this action.' We didn't know what the hell they were talking about. It wasn't long after that that Major Quamo got killed."

1850 - KSCB continues to receive sporadic incoming; BV33 survivors made it to KSCB by foot.

2130 - Gen Tompkins, following much discussion regarding NVA use of the 6,000 refugees as a possible human shield, pushed in front of their human wave attack on KSCB, sent his direction in the event this happened, to be executed in three steps: (1) Fire CS; (2) Fire over their heads if they kept advancing after the CS; (3) fire on the crowd.

COL Baldwin was given the order to evacuate the Lao to DaNang, and "to move them out without anybody seeing them." [This was at Khe Sanh at a time when there were literally many dozen reporters and photojournalists present!] "I laughed and said, 'General, what do you think I am? a magician? In the first place, the Marines won't even let them in! How do you evacuate 500 soldiers and their families without anybody knowing about it?" But it was done and the Lao of BV-33, after flying to DaNang, then were flown to Savannakhet.

[Note: Det A-101 relocated and officially opened a new camp at Mai Loc (YD 089512) on 24 Jun 68].

08 Feb:

0520 - A/1/9, at XD 831419, started to receive RPG and 60mm mortar fire followed by a ground attack (which continued to 0645). Enemy troops penetrated wire but were repulsed by the defenders of the platoon from

A/1/9 manning the hill. Enemy broke contact by 0730, and at 0900, a USMC element moved into position of the outpost.

LIFE AT FOB-3

When the FOB-3 camp was occupied adjacent KSCB, that portion of the KSCB perimeter next to the FOB-3 compound did not disappear. Much to the vexation of American soldiers and Marines inside FOB-3, who daily saw Marine bunker positions, machineguns, and even tanks pointed into the FOB-3 camp, this common, shared portion of both perimeters reminded one of Frost's poem that there is something that doesn't like a wall. Originally the Marines even had claymore mines pointed into FOB-3, but the FOB-3 Sergeant-Major, Richard E. Pegram, told the Marines, "This is not acceptable! We don't care what you say that you're concerned about, claymore mines is not acceptable!" They were removed.

From the Marines' standpoint, the memory of what had happened not only at Lang Vei on 4 May 67 (when NVA, posing as PF recruits, had killed perimeter guards and led sapper squads inside who killed both the CO and XO as well as wreaking general havoc), but countless other experiences of Special Forces units where indigenous troops had so many turn-coats and spies that turned on the Americans in the middle of a battle, dictated extreme caution, if not a barbed wire barrier!

Lt. Thomas Simcox, S2 of FOB-3 "talked to Col Lownds about it a couple of times, and after he explained, I could understand their reasoning. To be really honest, I don't think we really knew what we had either." [i.e., if NVA were amongst them].

To those American soldiers of FOB-3 and Marines of CAC OSCAR (who were placed in the FOB-3 camp for several good reasons: the FOB-3 needed the additional manpower to man their large perimeter; the Bru could remain with their American counterparts since no indig could be inside KSCB for security reasons; there was little turf remaining that could accommodate them) such action was regarded as nonsense, folly, and abandonment and rejection. After all, they reasoned, these indigenous troops have fought valiantly by our side, and in numerous instances, saved our butts, or the lives of our buddies, sometimes at the loss of their own. Furthermore, how does this square with "winning hearts and minds of local people, and aren't we here to protect them?" On an even deeper level, there was a deep love for these simple people who were so honest, loyal, trustworthy, playful, innocent, and brave.

But the barrier remained, and while it may have been easier—and certainly less dangerous because of the incoming—to have had an opening in the fence to permit water trucks from FOB-3 to get water at the waterpoint, and to permit officers attending briefings, access through the Ponderosa area of KSCB instead of moving the extra half mile around the perimeter, the fence remained—with no openings.

A need for additional manpower to man the FOB-3 perimeter resulted in 22 extra American soldiers brought in from 5th Special Forces, Nha Trang. Most of these were "candy stripes." [This refers to the yellow cloth bar on their green beret to indicate that although they were attached to a Special Froces unit, they had not received Special Forces training. These were mainly cooks, clerks, supply, riggers, crypto techs, etc., which were required by the units].

James W. Moore (Operations section of FOB-3) recalls a clerk who typed reports deep inside of one of the large FOB-3 bunkers: "His name was [SP5 Daniel F.] Sandoval. He asked me if he could go out to the line and see his buddies [SP5 Charles M.] Corry and [Sgt Dennis Ray] Thorpe. [It was 15 April 1968 when this incident occurred]. So I said, 'Nah.' I was 45 then and already had three tours in Korea, during the War. So I said, 'Son, I'm going to tell you right now, you'd better stay here in this bunker where you got 12x12s between you and the rounds coming in.' 'O, I wanna go see my buddies!' I said, 'OK. If you get out of the trenchline, if you don't have on your helmet, or if you take off your flak jacket, I'm going to fine you a hundred dollars if I catch you.' So anyway I let him go out there, and a round came in. The three of them had jumped up on the side of the trenchline, and were sitting side-by-side, with Sandoval in the middle. It blew out a 20-ft. chunk of our trenchline. We had smoking legs and boots, pieces of torso, and hamburger meat. All three of them were just annihilated. They're listed as being from FOB-3, but they really weren't. They were highly-misplaced people stuck into a position that they shouldn't of been allowed to be in. I look back on it now and I wish that we'd never asked for them; we could of handled it with our combat troops."

As of mid-March, 1968, FOB-3 was manned with 20 Army officers and 105 Army enlisted, one Marine officer and two Marine enlisted, three Navy enlisted [the three Navy corpsmen from the 3 CAPs of CAC OSCAR], no USAF, and 2 ARVN officers and 455 ARVN enlisted. [Actually, the "ARVN" consisted of a variety of indig.] ["Doc" John Roberts, the corpman of CAP O-2, recalls, "I served with the Army Special Forces there that whole time during the Siege after we got out of Khe Sanh village"]. In addition, also inside FOB-3 was CAC OSCAR with one USMC officer, 31 USMC enlisted, and no Navy [the 3 corpsmen having been transferred to FOB-3]. CAC manned the portion of the perimeter facing the access road.

Maj David C. "Bulldog" Smith relieved Maj Lucius Campbell as CO, FOB-3, in early February. "Bulldog" was a mustang, having enlisted in 1949 and served in a Ranger company during the Korean conflict. He was named "Trooper of the Year" for the 82nd Airborne and made Master Sergeant "when you couldn't make it," and then was commissioned a Second Lieutenant after attending OCS at Ft. Benning.

"Bulldog" had been in Saigon during Christmas of '67 with George Quamo in the SOG war room preparing for a mission in which the two of them would disappear in Laos, be declared MIA, and run a guerrilla force for a year or more. They were plotting Landing Zones, Drop Zones, and other logistics, when Col Dan Baldwin came by with a fifth of Red Johnny Walker. It was ten o'clock in the morning, and he was wishing them a Merry Christmas. "Well, before we finished, he said, 'Have you wished General Westmoreland Merry Christmas yet?' And of course, here we are, dumb Privates really. We said, 'No.' 'Come on!' cajoled Baldwin. We got in the SOG Commander's car (he was on leave), go clear across Saigon to General Westmoreland's headquarters, went into the secret entrance (or the General officer's opening, or whatever it was), the MPs all watching us and everything because we're in field gear. George and I had pistols. We had harnasses on, and we looked kinda grubby anyway. And we walked right up to the General's secretary.

"Dan said, 'We want to see Gen. Westmoreland! We're from SOG!' Just like that. Said, 'OK,' and we went in there and we started to sing, 'We wish you a Merry Christmas.' Well, the General listened to us. He was very nice. He said, 'Thank you very much' and shook our hands. We walked out. We got back in our car and went back to where we were supposed to be, and by the time we arrived, the word was, 'Get those three hoodlums out of Saigon—before another sunset!'

"George and the Colonel were going to DaNang and got right out, but I was going to Kontum and nobody was going there. So I called over there and said, 'Col. Johnson, I can't get out of here, so I'm going back to the Rex Hotel—or whatever the name of the hotel was. He said, 'Wait a minute. Don't you move! I'll call you right back. What's the telephone number?' He called back in about five minutes and said, 'A C-130's on the way!' They diverted a C-130 from Hue, down to Saigon to pick me up, drop me off at Kontum, and then let them land in Hue. They wanted me out by sundown!"

"Bulldog" was XO at FOB-2 at Kontum and came to FOB-3 as CO after Lang Vei fell. Shortly thereafter, Gen Rosson, the Army Commander, came up to KSCB with Gen Tompkins, and was being briefed by Col Lownds. Col Lownds put in a request for bunkering materials, fresh fruit for the troops, etc., and Rosson's Aide, a buddy of "Bulldog" later introduced him to the General. "The General turned around and I saluted him. He said, 'What do you do up here?' I said, 'Well, I'm from SOG, but I'm part of the line now.' He said, 'I didn't even know any Army was up here.' Just like that. He said, 'What do you need?' I couldn't think of a thing, and all I said was, 'Dog tag chains, sir.' Two days later, here comes a little plane over and they threw out a thing full of dog-tag chains!"

"The General said, next time—he didn't have the time just now—he wants to see what we're doing. All of a sudden—one day out of the blue—I got a call that General Rosson was there and he wanted to see my operation. I went over myself [to pick him up]. I had the jeep. I had Rosson, Lownds, Tompkins, and Johnson, the Aide, on the back tire, and brought them over to my compound. I made the General put on a steel helmet and flak jacket; he came up without one. One of my indig stood up, saluted, and yelled, 'Airborne!' as we came through the gate, and the General turned to Tompkins and said, 'Ah, we're in Army territory now!'

"As we were going into the bunker, the General's Aide, who was a friend of mine, said, 'Hey, Bulldog, do you have a C-ration or anything? The General hasn't eaten this morning.' I said, 'O, we'll get something.' I looked at Sergeant-Major Pegram, gave him a nod, and he gave me a nod back. So we went down into the bunker and proceeded to brief the General. Two Sergeants, dressed in whites, appeared. We had home-baked bread, turkey with mayonaise and asked the General if he wanted a sandwich, so of course, he took one—and then Tompkns and Lownds. Then they came in with some milk, and it was cold. So they asked the General if he'd like some milk. 'Yes!' And he asked Tompkins, and Tompkins said, 'Damn milk's for babies!' Just like that. General Rosson turned around, grabbed his milk and said, 'Well, I'm the biggest baby in this outfit!' And then he went out and looked at some of the lines."

Such moments of levity made the insanity of the horrors of the battle from making one insane—taking into one's self what was outside. The S-4 of FOB-3, Lt Terry Garrett, was summoned to report to Bulldog one day. Bulldog chewed him out for being out of uniform—he was wearing LTs bars, and then proceded to pin on his Captain's bars. A few seconds after departing the bunker, an incoming round struck him, very severely wounding him. The round had ripped off his helmet and bore into his skull, causing him to be subsequently confined to a wheelchair.

About a month after becoming CO, Gen Irby, ADC of 1st Cav, was visiting the FOB-3 camp. As he departed in his chopper, the General said, "OK, you can put your little Girl Scout hat on." (Bulldog and the General knew each other from many years before— "he used to call me 'blind,' but I had the best eyes in the world!") I said "OK" and took off the steel pot and put on the beret. An incoming round struck just as the helicopter lifted off, putting a piece of shrapnel into his scalp, and he was medevaced.

LTC Roy W. Bahr became CO of FOB-3 effective 25 March 1968, and used to joke around with his Adjutant: "Hey, Almy, OK, look over here: I think I want the 9-hole golf course there." Almy replied, "No, Sir, we can't do that over there." "Why not?" "Well, Sir, that's where the tennis courts and swimming pool are going."

Soon after becoming CO, Gen Westmoreland landed in the FOB-3 compound—perhaps it was safer than landing on KSCB proper, and Almy drove him to see Col Lownds in perhaps one of the very few jeeps that hadn't become a combat loss. Bahr told Almy, "You tell Westmoreland I want to talk with him when he gets back." It was a joke—he thought, until the General returned, steps out of the jeep, and says, "What did you want to see me about, Bahr?" "I almost died; A Lieutenant Colonel doesn't tell a four-star General, 'I want to see you.'"

Standing next to Bahr was Maj Quamo, and it was apparent to Bahr that there was an intensity on the part of the General at the sight of Quamo, but he didn't know why.

George Quamo was Bahr's XO at this time, and Bahr thought the world of Quamo: "I only knew him less than a month, but that man impressed me! He was only about 25 years old. I was 37, going to be 38, and I see George Quamo: he's a Major and he's 25 years old. And this guy is sharp! I mean he was outstanding. I walked around—I'm the new boss, and this guy, he's almost God to these people, because he was such a good man. He had gone into Laos and brought out a whole bunch of Bru just as the Siege began. He had such empathy with all the Montagnards, particularly with the Bru people. I was the last person to see him alive. I drove him over and put him on back of the aircraft, and handed him a very Top Secret report—so Top Secret that I had my S-2, Hammond Salley, personally type it. You don't ask Captains to type, normally. And I gave George my dirty laundry to take to DaNang." The text of this historic document follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
FOB3 HHC (C&C) 5th SF Gp (Abn) 1st SF
APO US Forces #96337

13 April 1968

SUBJECT: Study of Khe-Sanh Situation

To: Commanding Officer
Command and Control Detachment
5th Special Forces Gp (Abn) 1st SF
APO US Forces 96337

1. Lack of significant enemy contact; discovery of cache sites with abundant weapons and ammunition; failure of enemy to employ AA against friendly forces; non-identification of "hard-core" troops; continued enemy rocket and artillery capability; and continued high utilization of FM radio communications; all tend to indicate that the enemy has been merely "pushed-out" of the AO or has faded into unoccupied areas in small groups which can be reformed into fighting forces within a short period of time.

2. It is believed that once the enemy becomes aware of the evacuation of the Khe-Sanh area by the 1st Air Cav Div, the enemy will, once again, close on the Khe-Sanh Combat Base with the intentions and capability of denying the use of the airfield and attempting to defeat friendly forces found here. This belief is based upon the indications stated in paragraph 1 above.

3. There are numerous advantages which could accrue to the enemy if he were to once again concentrate and attack Khe-Sanh. These are as follows:

a. The enemy could "prove" that Operation Pegasus did not really hurt him.

b. The enemy would have an opportunity to destroy the force which prevented earlier victory (i.e., the 26th Marines and FOB #3). This would "save face."

c. The enemy realizes that the name of Khe-Sanh still holds considerable world attention which gives it a psychological and political value, even though its military value is negligible.

d. An attack on Khe-Sanh could relieve military pressure on other forces presently engaged in other AO's or planned for in future offensive operations.

e. The Provincial area in which Khe-Sanh is located can serve as a future guerrilla base area south of the 17th Parallel.

f. Khe-Sanh Combat Base will provide him with equipment, spare parts, demolitions (explosives) material and other "raw" materials which can be effectively utilized in future operations.

g. The realization that maintaining sizeable forces at Khe Sanh are extremely costly for allied forces due to dependence on air resupply.

4. These advantages could prove to be of significant value to be worth an inexpensive gamble which would be of high overall value if successful.

5. The area occupied by FOB 3 is considered untenable unless: (a) Friendly forces occupy flank positions and (b) sufficient artillery fire support is readily available and responsive. Minimum forces required are judged as: (a) One reinforced regiment and (b) one artillery battalion consisting of two (2) 105MM batteries and one (1) 155 battery. In addition, engineer, quartermaster and medical units would be required to support the troops in Khe-Sanh Combat Base.

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE

George Quamo flew off and was never again seen. Most people (such as Jerry Hudson, S2 of 26Mar) who knew of his activities and his personality thought he had gone into deep cover and would reappear some ten years later having organized and led a clandestine army in some remote place on the earth. Bulldog Smith became angry, thinking that George had independently executed the planned operation in which the two of them would go into Laos, disappear, he declared MIA, and organize a friendly guerrilla force in Laos, not taking Bulldog along. Spooky people (CIA?) in civilian clothes arrived at FOB-3 to go through all of George's effects and said he may have "gone north," a story with no basis whatsoever that infuriated Skip Minnicks and all who knew George and admired him so much.

Lee Dunlap recalls that around the first of February, a strange-looking cylinder was found in the FOB. Quamo looked at it, "What do you think that is?" Dunlap, noticing the Chinese markings, said, "I have no idea." Quamo: "Do you think it might explode?" So they put a rope around it, backed off, jerked it around a little. It didn't look explosive; it was a strange object. Quamo said, "I'm going to have this assessed immediately, and took it with him on his flight to DaNang. Dunlap assumed that was the reason he flew to DaNang. (It is tempting to speculate that it may have exploded as they neared DaNang, and be the cause of the crash).

Thomas Simcox, S2, recalls that Quamo communicated with DaNang by the radio teletype, and "they just wanted to talk to him, so they called him back," concerning something about Lang Vei. James W. Moore (Ops section) recalls that he was summoned to DaNang because of what happened with BV33. The Laotians had blamed him specifically for evacuating across the border to Lang Vei and for not choppering all the Lao troops to safety from Lang Vei. (Apparently the complaint had been made to the American Ambassador personally).

Why Maj George Quamo was travelling to DaNang has many answers: to deliver the Bahr report, to deliver a strange cylinder with Chinese markings, to be admonished or simply asked to explain. Then he just disappeared. It was 14 April 1968. The plane was a U-17, a fixed-wing aircraft with a wing so large it could fly at about 5 miles an hour, an aircraft that belonged to the Agency. Contact with the aircraft was lost at 1645, and it was initially assumed the aircraft had been lost at sea off the coast of DaNang as it circled for a landing.

In June, 1974, some Vietnamese woodcutters discovered the plane wreckage at AT968927, and the remains of the two Chinese pilots and one American who was subsequently identified as George Quamo.

37th RANGERS

[The insignia of the ARVN Rangers—a snarling panther with whiskers partly obscuring the five-pointed star of the nationalist government of South Vietnam].

Cpt. Walter A. Gunn, Jr., was Senior Advisor to the 37th ARVN Ranger Bn. How he arrived is told in his own words:

"I arrived in Vietnam in the last week of December 1967 at Saigon, and had no idea that I would ever end up assigned to the Vietnamese Rangers or would ever be attached to the 26 Marines at Khe Sanh. I had trained at Ft. Bragg, NC, to be an Advisor to a Regional or Popular Force unit. I knew these type units would stay pretty well around their home village. After 3 days in Saigon I received my orders that I was being assigned to I Corps. I arrived in DaNang on 1 January 1968. I recall reporting to Corps Headquarters G-1, and being asked if I would like to be assigned to a Vietnamese Ranger unit. I remember telling the Colonel that was asking me this question that I thought I was trained to work with RF or PF units. He told me to think about it over night and give him my answer the following day.

"I remember the following morning being awakened by the detachment 1st Sgt and being told that I had to get my gear together and board a helicopter for transport to Quang Tri Province to join the 1st Ranger Group. I asked the 1st Sgt about what the Col had said; I thought I had a choice. He told me that I was the only Ranger-qualified Officer replacement for an officer killed in the past few days. After a week or two in Quang Tri Province, the Ranger Group returned to DaNang to recuperate and conduct small unit operations around their base camp. I was then assigned to the position of Senior Advisor to the 37th Ranger Bn.

"On or about the 25th of January 1968, I was informed that I and the 37th Bn Commander were to take a trip to the Marine Combat Base at Khe Sanh and make coordination for our move to the base. Grabbing a map of the area of Khe Sanh and locating where it was lcoated made me aware for the first time of its isolated position in Vietnam. I recall my helicopter flight to the base and talking to my Counterpart in route about the area. He was not excited about the place nor about deploying there, which in turn gave me thoughts to think about concerning the place we were going. I remember upon the approach to Khe Sanh the pilot told us that the base was receiving incoming artillery and rockets and, as soon as he touched down, that we were to get off quickly or we would be returning immediately back with him to Dong Ha. After 3 to 4 hour reconnoiter of the Combat Base, and coordination with members of HQ 26th Marines concerning the move there, and the location of the perimeter we were to occupy, I thought then: 'what in the hell was I getting into.'

"Upon returning to DaNang, I guess I did not show a great deal of enthusiasm toward the move. I had never worked with or been attached to another unit outside of the Army. I was not sure about how this operation was going to be, being attached to a Marine command. I guess at that time I was not really sure of myself, being an advisor to an ARVN unit, and working under the command of the Marine Corps, and not knowing what I would carry away from Khe Sanh after the Siege.

"When I left the base in April, 1968, I only had the deepest respect for the Marines, especially the 26th. I had the pleasure of knowing the 26th Commander, Col Lownds, and his staff. Col Wilkinson, Ken Pipes, and Hank Norman, who was with us a brief while as Arty. F.O. until he was pulled to go with Bravo Company on an operation in which he was killed. Hank was a fine officer, a fine Marine, a fine person. I am proud to have known him. And to all other Marines in the trenches that I met on a day to day contact, names and faces I can't recall. I gained a lot experience and knowledge from my tour in Vietnam, the respect towards other combat units, and I put to rest the things I had heard about the ARVN units. I found myself proud of the ARVN Ranger units, their history, and their ability to do their job. These Vietnamese units were a proud lot, and a source that I could learn from. I am to this day proud that I was picked to be a Ranger Advisor, and proud that I had a chance to work with the Marines, and to be part of the Battle for Khe Sanh."

The NVA officer who had surrendered on 20 Jan, Lt La Thanh Tonc, revealed that the NVA plan was to seize Hills 861 and 881S as fire support bases from which troops would push against the northern and western sections of the KSCB perimeter as a diversion. The main assault was to be a regimental-size thrust against the eastern sector, and thus collapse the entire defense.

Col Lownds was therefore especially concerned about that sector, especially since it did not enclose the eastern end of the runway and had planned for positions to be manned 200 yards further out from the existing KSCB lines. It was here the 318 men of the 37th would be placed. (The 37th was some 100-150 men short of full strength).

The 37th arrived by C-130s 1400-1530 on 27 Jan and began preparing defensive positions in front of the KSCB perimeter manned by B/1/26. The next day two rockets landed in the Bn area resulting in one ARVN WIA and evacuated. Another was evacuated the next day from a mortar. As soldiers were evacuated, no new replacements arrived until 6 March, thus gradually depleating their strength.

Lt Hank Norman and PFC Peters were permanently assigned from 1/13 as arty FOs on 30 Jan. On 31 Jan a Ranger was bitten by a snake and evacuated to Phu Bai. By 3 Feb, tactical wire was completed. The positions received 17 rounds of mortar and artillery but there were no casualties and no damage.

Ted Golab (center, back) with group of 37th ARVN Rangers

Di Uy Pho, the Commander of the 37th, was beginning to exhibit indications that he should be relieved. There was a machinegun atop the CP bunker, and when Pho attempted to ring up the Commander of First Company on the LIMA-LIMA and he didn't answer the phone—nor the radio either—Pho, attempting to get their attention, went to the machinegun and fired a burst towards the First Company bunker. It just so happened the Company Commander was in the door. He was killed by the burst. As early as 4 Feb, Capt Gunn discussed moving the Bn CP bunker out of the front lines, but Pho didn't concur. Capt Gunn also discovered the tactical wire in 3d Company area was too close to their trenchline, but Pho was unconcerned.

Eventually, he would not accept Col. Lownds being his commander and said he would only take orders from the Vietnamese chain of command, and then it got to the point where he refused orders from them, and he was recalled, and the Bn XO, LOt. Troung, was in charge of the 37th for most of the Siege.

When the ARVN lines were completed, the lines manned by B/1/26 had not altered. Specifically, there were still Claymore mines: "I'd get up every morning and I'd look at all those two, three hundred claymores looking at me! So I mentioned it right at the beginning. I said, 'Hey, I can't live like that! I went to Ken Pipes and he talked to the Colonel and they agreed to pull them. And Ken Pipes is the one that got that worked out for me and also built a little trench so myself and the other Americans could get out along with the two from the Marines there that were FOs."

Another ARVN Bn, their sister unit, the 21st Rangers, were due to arrive at Khe Sanh also,but the Battle of Hue City diverted them.

After receiving 700 incoming rounds on 7 Feb 68 (the day Lang Vei fell) and 400 incoming rounds on 8 Feb (the day A/1/9's Hill 64 outpost was assaulted), one of the ARVN soldiers was evacuated with a heart attack, making a total of six now evacuated.

On 12 Feb, the 37th lines received fire from two recoilless rifles. The next day the Rangers dispatched a six-man patrol to the NVA position (XD859410) and Capt Gunn awaited anxiously:

"Approx 1000 hours, we heard a great deal of firing, and there was a lot of fog. We couldn't see what was going on at the time. Around 1030 hours the fog lifted. We saw our patrol. They had caught a two-man recoilless rifle team and captured the 82 recoilless rifle. At first they thought it was a 57 recoilless, but when we got it back here we found out it was a Russian-built 82mm. They're real proud because as far as I know this is the first one captured in Vietnam."

A young ARVN Lieutenant, seriously wounded during this action, killed himself to prevent further casualties to his troops as they attempted to rescue him and were picked-off by NVA snipers, one by one. Later in the day, Gunn requested an indirect weapon from Regiment, and was issued a 106 recoilless rifle.

On 16 Feb, a patrol by the 37th Rangers engaged a company-size NVA unit at XD849409. During the skirmish, a well-developed and elaborate bunker complex capable of supporting a regiment was discovered, orgtanized according to the terrain and not readily visible from the KSCB perimeter. Capt Gunn suggested that the only ordnance effective against this bunker complex would be D-2B (M-117, 750-lb. bomb), D-9 (Mk-77, 500-lb. napalm bomb), D-10 (?), or D-26 (M-117, 750-lb. bomb with a 1-second delay enabling 16-ft. penetration before detonation).

On 21 Feb, the 37th Rangers spotted a hundred or so NVA moving toward them. The enemy force was probably battalion size since the ARVNs monitoring the NVA radio net heard them talking over four or five diffrerent radios. KSCB received 250 rounds of mortar, 50 rounds of artillery, and 70 rounds of rockets in connection with this attack. At one point, there were 75 incoming rounds in one five-minute period.

The Rangers halted the advance some 50 meters from their lines, and an aircraft was called to deliver bombs. The TPQ-10 strike came in on the wrong heading and dropped the bombs between the ARVN and B/1/26 lines, collapsing the Ranger CP bunker and making a 40-ft. crater. Huge clumps of mud began to fall from the sky, one of which broke the arm of a Marine of B/1/26 who huddled in the trench for protection.

Cpl Ted Golab, a Marine enlisted FO detailed to the Rangers from 1/13 had been on top of a bunker—to adjust fires on the approaching NVA when the incoming barrage struck. Fortunately, none of the Rangers were seriously injured. One had been thrown up against a wall and broke his wrist. Another came running to Golab crying like a baby. Golab assured him he was OK, put a battle dressing on his bleeding head, and gave the Ranger his own steel helmet (—which, in that situation, was a gift of life—an ordinary act of heroism exposing himself to injury). In the days that followed, that Ranger never removed Golab's helmet. Golab received a Ranger beret, a shirt with the Ranger patch [pictured on p. 37 of this magazine], and a purple scarf, and wherever he went, a Ranger rifleman now always accompanied him. "Them guys," he says, "were great. They'd be eating our food and I'd be eating their food."

Capt Ken Pipes (CO, B/1/26), interviewed while still at KSCB, noted a high regard and deep respect for the Rangers: "We shared ammunition, food, and many difficult experiences. They were professionally and ably led. Their junior officers and NCOs were of the highest caliber. The individual men were brave, dedicated, and fearless combat soldiers.. The Tet Offensive was centered around towns, villages and hamlets from which most of the Rangers were recruited. They did not know the effect that the NVA Tet Offensive had on their families and loved ones. Could we have done as well under those circumstances? Marines and corpsmen would voluntarily make almost nightly trips to the ARVN lines to carry wounded rangers to the Regimental Aid Station.."

Ray Strischek [a communications man with First Marine Air Wing detailed to KSCB] once recalled his meeting with an ARVN Ranger:

"Food got scarce and for three to five days (I can't really remember) we went to one C-rat per day. Well, I with my telephone and pliers and a Vietnamese Ranger with his carbine and floppy shower shoes aspied some fool dumping what looked like hundreds of cans of C-rats into a barrel. Me and the Viet Ranger eyed each other, eyed the barrel and ran for it. We were running along, elbowing each other and laughing. (We didn't know each other). Apparently neither of us could really believe someone would throw food away. When we got to the barrel, it was full of C-rat cans alright. The Viet Ranger picked up a can, I picked up a can. All the cans were the same. All Ham and Lima Beans. The Ranger grunted, cursed and spat, and said 'Chit numba Ten Thou.' (Word gets around, you know!) We walked away from Ham and Lima Beans. He pulled out some Viet rations: a clear plastic bag, I guess of fried fish eyes and minnow like parts. I had a can of fruit cocktail. We shared. Couldn't understand a word he said and vice versa. Whatever it was tasted pretty good. We parted friends."

During the night of 29Feb/01Mar (it was Leap Year this year, thus 29 Feb), a regimental-size (or greater) assault was made by the NVA against the eastern perimeter, just as Lt Tonc had indicated, although not timed to correspond to the assault on Hill 861 (the assault on 881-S was probably preempted by the movement of I/3/26 to 881-N on 20 Jan). Maj Mirza M. Baig, the amazing Pakistani-born genius serving as TIO, later noted that this attack reflected the NVA's rigidity and inflexibility of mind, not altering his plan or tactics from the original plans, and might indicate that the huge B-52 strike on the NVA Front HQ, while not killing Gen. Giap, did manage to catch senior commanders and their staffs "..for if anyone could have changed the attack master plan, these officers could. Since the plan was never changed, perhaps they died in the bombing."

The brunt of the attack was directed against the 37th Ranger lines. It was to be the deciding engagement of the Siege battle of Khe Sanh, spelling the NVA defeat at Khe Sanh. Many of the defenders at KSCB never fired a shot, and the main NVA assault "passed with a whimper instead of a roar." [Moyers Shore, Battle for Khe Sanh, p. 125].

FOB-3 possessed a captured NVA codebook containing all their operational codes, cyphers, and frequencies for the entire Siege. Since most of the artillery was fired by command over radio nets, those in the FOB usually had advance warning. Harve Saal recalls that a NVA message intercepted and decrypted described the large ground attack and indicated the use of hand-held pyrotechnics as signalling for it, including "cease fire" and "retreat." [Note: on 28 May 68, during a very ferocious attack on F/2/3, the acting Co CO, 1Lt James L. Jones, Jr., later Major General, together with his company Gunny decided to shoot some green pencil flares, the signal that had launched the attack against them, and the NVA temporarily retreated] During this night, when the major attack was mounting, he fired the appropriate signal for "cease fire/retreat," and suddenly, in the darkness of the sky, numerous other flares suddenly exploded—flares fired by other SF in the FOB-3 also! Undoubtedly the confusion in the NVA ranks was an additional factor against them.

Strings of electronic sensors announced the assembly and assault as NVA troops moved towards KSCB from Route 9, and the mass was decimated by Firecracker munitions, 175s, TPQ-10s, and two diverted Arc Lights which dropped their ordnance only 750 yards from the ARVN positions. The official record of this attack describes the gristly scene of the battlefield when a patrol from the ARVN rangers examined it soon after sunrise:

"A physical reconnaissance of the area later that same morning revealed 78 NVA KIA with numerous bangalores [bamboo filled with explosives that are shoved under the barbed wire and detonated to make an opening] and satchel charges, indicating a major effort to breach the wire had been planned. The dead were still huddled in trenches, many in the kneeling position, in three successive lines, as if they had been caught in the assault position. The devastating effect of the 'FIRECRACKER' round was apparent."

Maj Mark A. Swearengen, the Liaison Officer from 2d Bn, 94th Artillery, at KSCB to coordinate 175mm gun fire from Camp Carroll and the Rockpile, made the interesting observation that the attack occurred about 40 days after the first ground attack. This is the length of time feudal armies usually besieged, and the soldiers then were only paid for a 40-day commitment. Failure to fell a fortress within 40 days, the attacking forces simply departed the siege.

The Rangers were to expeience additional probes on 18 and 29 March as well as a loud speaker propaganda effort calling them to surrender, but the main NVA effort had been made and had been defeated.

Capt Gunn had arrived with 425 men, and 65 more arrived on 6 March, for a total of 490 brought to Khe Sanh. When the 37th departed during Operation PEGASUS, they had sustained 12 KIA and 61 WIA.

MACV ADVISORY TEAM #4

The accidental bombing of Lang Vei (02 Mar 1967) became the occasion to establish the MACV Advisory Team in Khe Sanh Village. Capt James Whitenack had already learned of Khe Sanh since his OCS classmate, James Thompson, had been captured and, while in the career course at Ft. Benning the summer of '64, word was received that Thompson had been killed at Khe Sanh. Whitenack abruptly departed his duty station in Germany and reported right after Christmas '66.

When the two USAF F-4s bombed Lang Vei, LtGen Walt said he wanted an advisory team at Khe Sanh. Prior to this, the CO of the Special Forces "A" Camp at Khe Sanh, the tall, dark-haired Duffy, also served as District Advisor. Whitenack, together with Sgt Humphrey (Ops Sgt), was given 2 carbines, a radio, a case of C-rations, and arrived at Khe Sanh on an Air America helicopter about 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

"We opened the Sub-Sector with basically the clothes that we carried, 2 carbines, 60 rounds of ammunition apiece, a radio, a case of C-rations. It took about 2 months to make up the complete team. I had an Australian Warrant Officer initially as my assistant. Then 1Lt Bruce B.G. Clarke came in, and we had a full team."

A message came out from 3d MAF about not supplying/supporting anybody or any forces outside the perimeter, probably meant for Vietnamese, but the CO at the KSCB suddenly stopped supply of water, food and other supplies. "I got on the radio and I called my people in Quang Tri and said, 'Friday, when the Air America chopper comes in, I'm loading my people up and pulling out.' They said, 'You can't do that!' I said, 'O yes, I can!" They said 'Why?' I said, 'We've been cut off.' That lasted about two days, and all of a sudden the order got lifted real quick like."

SFC James Perry, the Medic of the Team, conducted frequent medcaps in the local villages with supplies that he basically had to steal, assisted by a nurse, Coh Dung, and her three assistants, Coh Ninh, Coh Chew, and Coh Liol. Perry recalls that each member of the Team had varying prices on his head: Maj Whitenack—150,000 Piastres; SFC (E-7) Humphrey, the communications specialist—50,000 Piastres; SFC (E-7) King, the village and hamlet security advisor—75,000 Piastres; Capt Clarke—100,000 Piastres. No one ever collected, of course.

After Maj Whitenack departed, Capt Bruce B.G. Clarke became the District Advisor, Huong Hoa Sub-Sector, and was in charge of the District when it was attacked 21 Jan. [The story of that heroic stand, the participation by Marines of CAC OSCAR, the daring stand and dash to safety by Marines of CAP O-2 (isolated at the western edge of the village when the attack erupted), the attempted reinforcement by the senior CIA officer in the region with disastrous results when they landed on the Old French Fort position, the departure from Khe Sanh and subsequent moving of the Seat of Government to the FOB-3 camp, all requires extensive coverage and should be the subject of another special edition of this magazine. Suffice it to say that the estimated NVA KIA from this brave stand numbered 200 - 300].

37th SIGNAL BATTALION

Operating a TRACK-129 mobile tropospheric scatter terminal for radio link between KSCB and Phu Bai as well as a teletype circuit to NKP, Thailand (for a link to Task Force ALFA, the electronic sensor headquarters), the 544th Signal Detachment from the 37th Signal Battalion, arrived at KSCB in mid-January. Being unannounced and unexpected, the TROPO van was set up without bunkering on top of the grounhd. The antennae wer prominent and made it a good target.

The Officer in Charge was 1Lt Rodney Arthur Alfano, from Boston, married. Marines of Co D/1/26 enjoyed a special relationship with these Army signal types, and Lt Alfano readioly shared what special foods he had with them. He even prepared a special meal of shrimp and a home-made cocktail sauce for the officers of Co D.

A few minutes before the barrage that was to be so deadly struck, SP-4 William Hawkinson of this unit had drifted away from the others, and when the rockets exploded, dove into a Marine bunker. A few seconds later, another Marine dove into the bunker; he had seen something terrible, "The whole Army bunker got wiped out, what a mess!" A 122mm rocket had entered an opening in the bunker and detonated inside.

Hawkinson immediately rushed outside to see to his friends—friends who were no more, but was restrained by the Marines who began to console him as only in brothers in battle can.

Two Marines of Co B/1/26, Johnny Belina and Dick Cruz, were in their trench during the incoming, about 30 ft. from the Army van. Johnny Belina recounts:

"It was coming in hot and heavy and I guess I got rescue stuff in my blood, but I ran up there and their bunker had caved-in, and I was digging them out during that incoming and dug one of them up—got his head out, started to give him mouth to mouth. And then found another man. Then when it slacked up, others came to help. One of them was definitely dead. I'll never forget: I saw his hand sticking out of that red dirt and he had a wedding ring on. I will never forget that.

One of the Marine officers desperately fought to keep back his tears; he knew the Army officer as a friend. "I will write his wife," he muttered.

The three Army signalmen in the struck bunker all subsequently died from their wounds. There were 4 KIA, 1 WIA. Specialist Hawkinson, together with the assistance of two Marines, kept the system on line for 40 hours until replacements arrived.

ARTILLERY UNITS

DUSTERS AND "WHISPERING DEATH"

Navy weapons manned by Army soldiers on a Marine combat base: these were the "Dusters" and the "quad 50s." First arriving in connection with the re-opening of Route 9 on 27 March 1967 to KSCB (since they were ideal for escorting convoys), the units at Khe Sanh during the Siege battle occupied positions on the northern ("Blue") sector, facing the mountain range containing the radio relay outpost on Hill 950, the inverted coffee-cup hill called 1015 (some others referred to it as the "witch's tit"), and infested with numerous NVA FOs.

The twin 40s, old WW II cannons mounted on ships as anti-aircraft weapons, were mounted on a light track chassis which could travel up to 55 MPH, and designated M-42A1, or "Duster." The Duster was capable of firing 240-300 40mm rounds per minute. When Hill 950 was almost completely overrun on 6 June 1967, in the dense fog that shrouded the hill, Sgt Richard W. Baskin, one of the defenders on that hill, remarked that the rounds of the Dusters, "..were like eyes coming out of the fog. You could see them, and they were all over the place. It felt good to have this artillery. I felt as though it wouldn't hurt us, because, you know, we were on the same side."

The four .50 caliber machineguns mounted on a 2-1/2 ton Army truck ("Quad 50" or M55) could fire 2,700 rounds per minute either manually or electrically. The weapon earned the title "Whispering Death" from the Chinese Communists during the Korean War. Should a mortar or sniper position be spotted, it would not take long to silence it with this weapon!

During the Siege battle at Khe Sanh, the Quad 50 unit was a squad from "G" Battery of the 65th Artillery Group, and the Dusters were a Light Section, designated ADA (Air Defense Artillery), AW(SP) (Automatic Weapon, Self-Propelled) from "A" Battery, 1st Bn, 44th Artillery. "C" Battery arrived during Operation Pegasus and remained on KSCB through the final destruction of the base in early July. There was also a section from "B" Battery, 29th Searchlight Group, 1st of the 44th.

COUNTER-MORTAR

Following a strong suggestion from the 175 LnO, Capt Mark Swearengen, a det, 238th Field Artillery (Radar), 1st Bn, 40th Artillery, arrived on 22 Jan and began operations with their AN/MPG-4, counter-mortar radar. This radar could pick up and track an incoming round and compute the location from which it had been fired. It could also track our own rounds, such as those of the 175s to determine exactly where they "splashed" so that "fine tuning" corrections could be made to firing data to increase the accuracy of our own fire.

175s

The artillery assets at KSCB at the beginning of the Siege battle consisted of 46 artillery pieces. 1/13, in direct support, comprised 3 105mm howitzer batteries (A, B, C, of 1/13) for a total of 18 tubes (range: 11,000 meters), one 4.2-inch mortar battery (W/1/13) of 6 tubes (range 6,000 meters), and one Provisional Battery (P Btry) of 6 tubes of 155mm (range 15,000 meters). In indirect support were 5 90mm tanks, 2 ONTOS Platoons (10 vehicles) and with single 106s, a total of 92 106mm recoilless rifles.

In addition, KSCB received the significant support 16 175s of the US Army's 2nd Bn, 94th Artillery (12 at Camp Carroll, 4 at Thon Son Lam or "Camp Rockpile"), with a range of 32,800 meters (almost 33 clicks or grid squares!).

Capt Mark A. Swearengen was the 175 Liaison Officer who, along with his enlisted assistant, SP-4 Winnen and later, Dennis Berg, brought the 175s to bear on targets during the Siege. 1Lt Doug Meredith replaced Capt Swearengen in late February as the 175 LnO.

Perhaps the most frustrating aspect was the inability to bring the strength we had, to bear on specific targets. This was one of the great frustrations of the Vietnam War in general: various Rules of Engagement (ROE), political considerations (international boundaries), lack of unified support in the States before committing troops overseas, lack of a clearly defined mission, all made the Vietnam conflict similar to a well-trained boxer boxing according to the rules of Western boxing with one arm and glove tied behind his back, not wearing a protective cup, and wearing headgear that obstructed part of his vision in the ring, boxing with an Oriental kick-boxer opponent!

Swearengen kept thinking: we're Americans, we have all this power and force, and we can't use it! The specific cause was the doctrine of SAV-A-PLANE, where artillery can't be fired if there is aircraft in the area—or even if the aircraft has not yet arrived but has been launched, especially high-performance ("fast-movers," jets). At the time, there was a lack of a DASC to coordinate both: "We were the United States! All this fire-power is available to us! We had the capability to do mean things—to really do things! And we couldn't get it coordinated so that it would all be dumped and applied at one time. We had to shut-off the artillery for the high-performance aircraft, stacked-up in the air ready to come in and drop bombs."

This was specifically the tragic case of Lang Vei: "My battalion could of dropped in a lot of 175 rounds on Lang Vei easily. The battery at the Rock Pile could of hit Lang Vei, and they were ready to go, ready to fire. I kept saying, 'Listen, we can do it. We can do it.' And we were never allowed to shoot because of the aircraft they wanted to bring in the area." 175s are an area-type weapon, designed to put down a heavy fire of steel on an area, and it does this very well. It would have, therefore, been ideal in the initial moments of the tank assault on Lang Vei.

Swearengen worked in the FSCC with the amazing "Harry" Mirza Baig: "If you ever met him, you'd never forget him. He was hard to describe. He was very enthusiastic about unfortunate situations. He'd talk about being surrounded by thousands of enemy troops and this and that, and he'd just bubble with enthusiasm! It would scare the daylights out of most people, but he sounded enthused about it!"

Those in the FSCC naturally listened with focused concern to the radio traffic of the ground controller (Bill McEwen) guiding the TPQ-10 aircraft to their targets at night, telling them when to release the bombs. There were normally two or more F4 or A6 aircraft flying at a fairly high altitude guided by the TPQ-10 radar. Swearengen suggested to Kent O.W. Steen (Assistant Fire Support Coordinator) and Jack Hennelly (CO, 1/13, Fire Support Coordinator) that an even greater effect would result if all the artillery could be massed on the same targets the planes were hitting, and that with fairly simple coordination, the artillery would be TOT ("Timed on Target") simultaneously as the bombs exploded. Steen did the computations and worked out the details of Swearengen's suggestion, and thus was born the "Mini-Arc Light," saturating an area 500x1000 meters, and the effect was devastation to the NVA.

Doug Meredith had a platoon of 175s which he took to Camp Rockpile so the range of support by 175s could be extended to the Lao border. He arrived at KSCB via CH-53: "I remember looking down on the base. It looked like a moonscape with puffs of smoke where incoming was landing. What was I getting into? The landing was quick. They said to get the hell off and get in a hole."

He recalls his impression of the 26Mar staff in the COC and the 13Mar staff in the FSCC: "Everyone talked and listened. No one ever laughed at or belittled a suggestion. When we asked 'Why?' many times history was made.

We asked why the firepower of artillery and bombs couldn't be combined, and came up with the 'mini-arc light.' We asked why the B-52s had to have such a long lead time in planning, and found they were able to plan a mission almost overhead. We asked why napalm could only be dropped in the day, and saw it dropped at night. When we asked why the B-52s had to drop their load so far from the perimeter, they moved in closer. I only wish there had been a way to get a battalion of 175s into Khe Sanh. We could have closed down some of those long shooters in Laos."

NOTICE

THE NEXT ISSUE OF RED CLAY WILL BE A SPECIAL ISSUE COMMEMORATING THE 30th ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIEGE BATTLE.

IN ORDER TO MAKE THIS SPECIAL, YOU, WHO WERE THERE, ARE ASKED TO CONTRIBUTE A SHORT POEM OR A COUPLE OF SENTENCES WHICH MAY BE USED IN THE ISSUE CONCERNING KHE SANH: WHAT OUGHT TO BE REMEMBERED BY FUTURE GENERATIONS, WHAT YOU REMEMBER THAT IS SO IMPORTANT, A PARTICULAR INCIDENT, A SPECIAL PERSON, A "THANK YOU," SOMETHING THAT COMES FROM THE HEART AND IS IMPORTANT TO YOU. REMEMBER TO KEEP IT SHORT. HOPEFULLY, WE'LL GET MANY CONTRIBUTIONS, AND THEN WILL HAVE LIMITED SPACE.

A PERSONAL NOTE
From your Temporary Editor

This magazine is perhaps the backbone of our organization: the means of keeping us in contact with each other; the vehicle for expressing our feelings, thoughts, hopes and hurts; the forum for exchanging information that may promote healing and resolution of concerns by providing some of the "missing pieces" in our experience since we all have the pieces of the whole that, together, will make us whole; the opportunity to make a permanent, historical statement for future generations; the unexpected gift of finding a long, lost buddy, and renewing some of the nourishment to our spirit that comes from a connectedness that affirms each other's basic humanity.

Various Editors have contributed their "labor of love" to make this magazine the much appreciated gift it is to so many. Their efforts are, indeed, works of love—love, not as an emotion, but as an action, an action which gives life to another without expecting any reward or recognition on the part of the giver. (What great lovers so many we've known at Khe Sanh were!). Ernie Husted, Jr., first started to add articles, print requests, poems, memoirs, and emphasized the fun, joy, things that would bring a smile. Ed Evans sought to make it more readable and include the "heart and soul" of those who were at Khe Sanh. Ernie Spencer made it a first-class, professional magazine, and created a forum for exchange of communications, a dialogue, not unlike the campfire groups of warriors who would recount their experiences and feelings. He strove to make it a healing vehicle by being honest with our feelings and hurts which once recognized, can be dealt with. Ernie knew that the emotional and spiritual scars of war are best dealt with by means of artistic expression—such as poetry. I have emphasized the things that hopefully will make us proud to have been at Khe Sanh as well as recognizing the lesser known people and units so that we will all appreciate our common brotherhood. We have always avoided political or specifically religious statements. My own hand was simply a temporary one, and I had planned to step down as soon as another Editor could be found. At the last reunion, one of the Board members stated that my efforts reflected my own "agenda" and that this may have caused many of our brothers to drop from our membership. I sincerely hope not, but if I have offended anyone by how I have written the past five issues (No. 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41) I sincerely apologize to you.

Our new Editor, Ray Truelove, is a Khe Sanh vet, has served as the Editor of the 3d Marine Division's Caltrap magazine, is currently the Editor of the Florida state Vietnam Veterans of America newspaper (which received the VVA's 1997 National Award for the best VVA magazine/newspaper in the country). Ray will be doing all of his work as a donation to our organization! He is professionally competent. He knows in his heart what it means to be a veteran of Khe Sanh. And, he obviously has a great first name!

I will continue to maintain our Khe Sanh archives. We currently have approximately 100,000 pages of letters, diaries, memoirs of Khe Sanh vets, copies of official reports, etc. If you desire to contribute any of this, please consider doing so. This information is very helpful when calls are received wanting to know some detail about some action.

We deal best with the past by taking the energy we have from it—angers, depressions, intensity, and using that to motivate us into serving the living. The motto for our Milwaukee County War Memorial is apt: "Honor the dead by serving the living." It is then we are able to be pulled into the future instead of being pushed by the past. Robert Penn Warren's poem "When the Tooth Cracks—Zing!" has these lines which are so appropriate:

> "Must we totally forget a thing to know it?
> Perhaps redemption is nothing more than the way
> We learn to live with memories that are no longer remembered."

Khe Sanh will always live with us who were there to experience what happened there, but not only as a place of sheer terror or overwhelming beauty or desperate isolation or feeling abandoned; it is also and more so the place where we looked into our brother's eye and beheld the presence of God.

The Hebrew word "Adam" refers to red clay used to make pottery. Isaiah 64:8 may thus be translated: "We are red clay; you formed us. The work of Your hands all of us are." Red clay is, of course, the laterite soil of Khe Sanh formed by millenia of rains weathering the volcanic eruptions of the crater on which Khe Sanh sits, a place born in violence, with violence a lingering spirit of the place, a place of lush life because life feeds on life. This red clay penetrated our skin to such a degree that I recall that after departing from there, I would take showers and for several weeks, the white towel would have a brownish red that looked as though I had wiped another place of my anatomy. In some ways, I feel that the physical substance of this red clay carried a spiritual reality that penetrated into my very being, and the spirits of so many who lost their lives there are dwelling within me. (This is a sort of primitive understanding that touches very ancient religious concepts of "taboo" and "defilement" and "uncleanness" as well as more developed religious concepts of "sacramentalism". Perhaps it is more akin to what we actually feel than what the modern mind permits us to "see" as reality).

So I depart as your Editor, knowing that this magazine will be in very good, competent and caring hands, and that the contents will always be of great significance, for they will come from you, the readers, you, those who are veterans of the Khe Sanh experience: the gifts are in all the people, and just need to be drawn out.

The Brittish in India used the term "So long" as a farewell. It is an abbreviation of "Salaam" which is derived from "Shalom," a blessing of peace, strength, confidence, the opportunity to live and grow and flourish. SO LONG!

Purposes of the organization are: To promote renewed fellowship of all who lived and served in the area of Khe Sanh; To locate and account for all who so served; To promote preservation of an accurate historical account of such service; To preserve the memory of those who died there; To promote research and understanding and healing with a regard to those who served there; and To promote artistic expression of the Khe Sanh experience.

Explanation of the Logo: The 9-sided polygon sugbgests the multi-service, multi-year (1972-1973) service at Khe Sanh; the "V" suggests Veteran, Vietnam, Victory, and valor (like the "V" on a Bronze Star Medal); the sharp "KS" suggests the rugged and sharp, painful, Khe Sanh hills and twisted paths of the Khe Sanh experience then and since.

THE BULLETIN BOARD

LCPL Talmadge Thomas Hatcher, Jr., a M60 machinegunner with C/1/9, 1st Plt, was wounded 16 Apr 68 near Hill 689 with shrapnel to his face making him unable to see. His A-Gunner, Kilpatrick, was hit first and paralyzed. Tom remembers two men trying to help him out of the area and both were killed in the process. Finally someone came and told Tom to hold onto his boots and dragged him out of the area to a bomb crater. He would like to find out who helped him out of the area and saved his life and who lost theirs trying to save him. If someone has the missing information, please contact him at: 4025 NE 28th Terrace, Ocala FL 34479.

Raymond C. Nicol (B/1/13) was recently operated for a brain tumor which was malignant. He has known two other Vietnam vets who have died from brain tumors. "The information I am seeking from our brotherhood is how many more of us are dealing with the same disease and how many already died from it. I am convinced this condition was brought on by Agent Orange exposure. I would appreciate any documentation from any vets who have suffered with this disease. I intend to take it to the VA for a disability hearing."

UPI/CORBIS-BETTMANN

The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the PRESIDENTIAL UNIT CITATION to the TWENTY-SIXTH MARINES (REINFORCED, THIRD MARINE DIVISION (REINFORCED) for service as set forth in the following CITATION: For extraordinary heroism in action against North Vietnamese Army forces during the battle for Khe Sanh in the Republic of Vietnam from 20 January to 1 April 1968. ...the 26th Marines was opposed by numerically superior forces...The enemy...was determined to destroy the Khe Sanh Combat Base...The 26th Marines, occupying a small but critical area, was daily subjected to hundreds of rounds of intensive artillery, mortar and rocket fire. In addition, fierce ground attacks were conducted by the enemy in an effort to penetrate the friendly positions. Despite overwhelming odds, the 26th Marines remained resolute and determined, maintaining the integrity of its positions.... inflicting heavy losses on the enemy. .....the men of the 26th Marines stood defiantly firm.....Through their indomitable will, staunch endurance, and resolute courage, the 26th Marines contributed substantially to the failure of the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese Army winter/spring offensive. The enemy forces were denied the military and psychological victory they so desperately sought. By their gallant fighting spirit and their countless individual acts of heroism, the men of the 26th Marines (Reinforced) established a record of illustrious courage and determination in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service

RED CLAY

Issue NO. 42 (Summer, 1998) Red Clay is a publication of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

The Word for This Edition: Make thy ball to lie in green pastures, not in still waters.

Arnie -3: par 72

Welcome Home G.I.!

The past four and one-half years I have labored with great pride as Editor of the Florida Recon Report, a publication of the State Council of Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc. Last year I was rewarded by being chosen as Editor of the Year - the Recon as magazine of the year, the best in the country.

Winning awards is great fun, but continuing that pace, and living up to the standards required to achieve that status is, at best, a monumental task. And following in the steps of a truly dedicated legend such as Ray Stubbe will also be a monumental task.

Ray has set a standard for your publication that any veterans' organization would be proud to have. A great writer with extreme sensitivity to the needs of the membership, a historian in the truest sense of the word.

I have personally always thought the true measure of a man is in what he gives to an organization, not in what he takes, and in Ray's case, what he has given is immeasurable. I cannot even begin to tell Ray Stubbe thank you enough.

For myself, as your new Editor, I will tell you I will give the position the respect it is due, and I will work as hard as necessary to insure it remains a valuable asset to our organization.

By no means am I a historian. The history of Khe Sanh is in the hearts and minds of our membership, and it is they that will tell the stories. I am but the medium by which those stories will pass through so everyone will be able to share in them.

In my heart I am still a Marine, and in my mind I still remember that nasty little road from Dong Ha, J.J. Caroll, and Cam Lo leading up to Khe Sanh. Highway 9 as I recall. Share your stories, your photos, that's what will keep Red Clay a great publication. Send 'em in.

My tour as your editor is dedicated to SSgt George Walbridge, KIA Khe Sanh, my best friend, and my cousin, Jerry Truelove, KIA, Vietnam, my uncle Jim Brown, WWII, USMC BARman, POW 3 1/2 years, my son Rick Truelove, WO1, USMC active duty 14 years. Semper Fi!

President's Message

Gen. Al Gray to be Speaker at Reunion

Thanks for your trust and confidence by electing me your President! I accepted the job when I knew who the Board of Directors were: Vice President Dave "Bulldog" Smith, Secretary Dave Doehrman, Treasurer Vince Griffith, Chaplain Jim Epps, Sgt at Arms Tom Eichler, Members at Large; Larry McCartney, Russ Turner, and Michael Worth.

Larry is hard at work revising our bylaws and should have a copy on the table by reunion time. Russ Turner is doing a fine job putting our Reunion together along with Michael Worth. Bernice Penn is putting together a package to include; name tags, a commemorative pin, wreath for "The Wall", etc. Our good friend and hard worker (DC Liaison) Bill Jayne has gotten our permits for "The Wall", Arlington National Cemetery, reservations for the "Sunset Parade" and is having our Khe Sanh Vet's Plaque cleaned and replaced.

Ray Truelove, a highly qualified individual is our new Editor. You will be pleased with his work. Ray Stubbe will remain our Asst. Editor and Archivist and our forever Chaplain.

We are extremely privileged to have as our Guest Speaker for our Reunion, the 29th Commandant of the Marine Corps (The War Fighter) General Alfred E. Gray, the Marine that innovated the Marine Expeditionary Unit-Special Operations Capable MEU (SOC), and made the Marine Corps the most formidable and capable force of warriors in the world.

As you know, this is our 30th Anniversary of Khe Sanh, the Hill Fights, and all the Special Operations (CAC-FOB) etc., surrounding Khe Sanh. DC is the appropriate place to properly commemorate and pay due respect to those who didn't make it back - and those that did. They will never be lost, that are remembered.

Registration forms are included in this issue of Red Clay -- July 1-6 is the time frame (the 6th being check-out day), the 4th will be Banquet night.

Our organization is comprised of Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Force, Civilians and Family members. I was extremely pleased to note at our reunion at St. Louis that there were no "Cliques" of units, but a general integration of all Khe Sanh Vet's -- And that's the way it should be! See you all in DC.

Editor's Ramblings

I am extremely pleased to tell you that I received an abundance of mail from throughout the membership in response to Ray Stubbe's request in the last edition of Red Clay.

It is always nice to have more than enough material for publishing. Unfortunately, as with most veteran publications it is not always possible to print everything due to a lack of space, cost of printing, etc., but I will do my best. Please don't feel left out if something you submit is not printed., it is not a personal matter, just business.

I realize many of you do not have typewriters, computers and so on, but if at all possible please try to submit your copy in something other than handwritten form. It will help me by making it much less difficult to read, decipher, typeset, etc. Most of all, typewritten copy helps eliminate errors in names, places, and so on. So, when possible, please submit your copy in typewritten form - if not possible, then just do what you have to do and I'll do the best I can.

Photos are always welcome with your copy (try to remember to ID people in pictures when you can) - your photos are important to you, so when submitting them it might be a good idea to be sure you have the negative on file or make a copy of the photo before sending it in just in case this Editor accidently loses it. I haven't misplaced anyone's personal photos for about the last four or five years, but that doesn't mean I won't misplace yours, so protect yourselves from me!

I am always open to suggestions, ideas and constructive criticism about what a publication should be, what should be in it, and generally, try to listen so the membership receives something worthwhile. However, I am aware after many years of doing the job of Editor that it is NOT possible for me to please everyone all the time. So, if I please most of you all the time and only half of you are upset part of the time, then I guess we'll be at least reasonably successful...

I very much enjoy doing military publications and was trained as a photo journalist, Editor in the Marine Corps, though it took me many years beyond my time in the Corps to reach the level I am currently at.

My only goal is to serve the needs of your organization. Listening to you and working together virtually as a team will result in a highly successful publication, one that I will be proud to tell everyone I am the Editor of, and one you will be proud to show everyone.

Together then, together again.

Semper Fi! and Welcome Home!

Three AM in the morning
I sit in my back yard & stare up at a silent moon
There's cold beer in the refrigerator
& I think about getting one
I think about the warm bed and clean sheets vainly waiting for me
I think about the beautiful daughter I'll soon wake up for school
I think about old comrades that'll never have any of these things
'Cause they lost it all one dark night
somewhere in South Vietnam
That wasn't even on the Days pass so slowly when you're up all night

But after all, night is just the dark part of the day
The part when its hardest to see
It was the longest year of my life that first sleepless year
Soon, I hope, the big sleep will come
I am so tired...

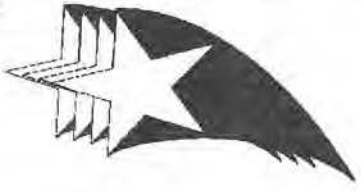
Christmas 1967

By William O'Connor
Former CO, C-1-13 (Reinf)

On this thirtieth anniversary of a momentous battle in the Vietnam war, I feel it appropriate to recount my story of Christmas amid Combat.

During Christmas 1967 I was a U.S. Marine Corps Captain stationed in South Vietnam as Battery Commander of "C" Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marine Regiment. Our combat base was an isolated, desolate one known as Khe Sanh. The prior period was fairly calm but we were aware that enemy activity was beginning to escalate.



A truce was declared for Christmas Eve,' but, as usual, the enemy did not honor the truce and we were forced to return fire with our 105mm howitzers that evening. Christmas day was uneventful, and exceptional given that there was nothing to put us into the Christmas spirit. There definitely weren't any USO shows.

One of the few comforts I had reminded me of Christmas back home in Indiana. It was a small Christmas tree my wife sent to me, complete with multi-colored lights. The tree occupied a special place in my bunker and brought to me the only Christmas spirit I could have in Khe Sanh. I also remember that our Christmas dinner was outstanding solely for its mediocrity. My troops were equally disappointed with the meal and I couldn't blame them. It certainly wasn't like mom used to make.

Christmas was a very depressing time for us since we were half a globe away and an entire world away from our loved ones. This was not the first time I had been away from home for Christmas. As a young Second Lieutenant, I had spent my first Christmas abroad in Hong Kong. However, on that accasion, I was in a decidedly less perilous situation.

Soon after the New Year in mid-January, we were attacked by a force of North Vietnamese soldiers. Although we fought with everything we had, they greatly outnumbered us and nearly overran our safe perimeter. When the smoke cleared we were alarmed to be surrounded by a hostile force of over 5,500 from the Communist North. Our supplies were depleted, ammunition was nearly spent, and a supply shipment was nowhere in sight.

During the course of the battle, we not only lost our aiming posts but the lights which provided the ability to target our guns amidst the smoke and darkness. Our instincts, ingenuity, and Christmas spirit revisited us when we dismantled my Christmas tree, using its lights to illuminate our aiming posts. In the middle of warfare's destruction, we looked to the reds and greens of the Christmas lights to revitalize our holiday. Our sentiments were kept alive alongside our mission and struggle for survival.

Every Christmas I am reminded of those terrible moments in Vietnam. But the Holidays also bring to me a deep warmth and respect for the brave Marines who served with me in the terrible siege of Khe Sanh.

Red rust to dust
Who can we possibly trust?
L.B.J.....Dean Rusk?
How long must we lay buried alive?
C-rats and separate black cats
My God! How large are these rats?
4,000 V.C. I am told
Dr. Spock, how dare you scold
40,000 N.V.A. enfold
My clothes all have mold
Christ! We all have colds
Uncle Sam, I am not sold
Must we remain entrenched?
Death has such a stench
Why dig another trench?
I still smell the French
Mario's just lost his wits and Westmoreland's throwing fits
Please, lets call it quits!

Khe Sanh Remembered...

The following article is a report, once classified Secret, written by the Vice Director of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. I found it interesting...and hope you will also....Editor

1. The attached Fact Sheet was developed pursuant to your oral request of 5 April 1968 and is provided as a source document for possible press releases.

2. The Fact Sheet makes these two significant points:

a. The US/GVN forces holding Khe Sanh tied down approximately two divisions of NVA troops during the crucial period of the TET Offensive. These well equipped and trained enemy forces would otherwise have been available to join the attack on the cities; and their intervention could have altered seriously and detrimentally the course of battle.

b. The NVA forces in the vicinity of Khe Sanh suffered a severe defeat. They failed to accomplish their military, psychological and propaganda objectives and it is estimated that they lost approximately one half of their committed fighting troops. The extent of their defeat becomes more apparent as our forces, now conducting operations in the Khe Sanh area, gather mounting evidence in the form of ammunition and equipment caches, enemy bodies in mass graves, and battered fortifications.

John B. McPherson, Vice Dir. JCS

FACT SHEET

1. The following facts are in answer to the question "Why Khe Sanh?"

a. Friendly Strategy

General Westmoreland's purpose in establishing forces at Khe Sanh was to place his power astride the Route 9 - Route 911-92 intersection to support interdiction of enemy logistic activity on the Ho Chi Minh Trail, to impede enemy west-east movement on Route 9 and into the Ba Long Valley, and to secure a key route which he might later wish to use in a major thrust into Laos. In his evaluation, General Westmoreland considered Khe Sanh to be of significance; strategically, tactically, and most importantly, psychologically.

b. Enemy Strategy

In the DMZ area, particularly at Khe Sanh, the enemy's strategy was to build up powerful forces around our fixed strong point installations, while concurrently exerting strong pressure on U.S. and Free World forces throughout the length of Vietnam, attacking the Revolutionary Development program and invading the urban areas in order to destroy the Vietnamese governmental structure. There is no certainty, from intelligence presently available, as to which of these endeavors the enemy regarded as his main strategic effort. It is quite possible that he did not actually establish a main effort, but rather was prepared to exploit any one of his thrusts which promised great success.

c. Strategic and Tactical Geography

1. Khe Sanh is at a strategic crossroads, standing in the way of enemy movement into the Quang Tri littoral and looking down on the north-south routes into the Laos panhandle. Khe Sanh is 30 miles from the ocean, 23 miles from the logistic base at Dong Ha, 10 miles from a fire support base at Camp Carroll, seven miles from the fire support base at Thon Son Lam. Route 9 was physically interrupted for a space of about seven miles, but, in April 1968 was put into useful condition in a relatively brief time.

2. Khe Sanh is dominated on the north, and, to a lesser degree, on the west and south, by mountains which rise 800 meters above the valley floor. The base area itself, excluding the outposts, is about three kilometers long and one kilometer in width. A stream runs along the north edge of the occupied area, providing adequate water, but in a relatively vulnerable location.

The following facts form a recapitulation of the combat activity at Khe Sanh from 1 November 1967 to 1 April 1968:

Resources

1. In the immediate Khe Sanh area there were as many as 20,000 to 25,000 North Vietnamese in some 21 battalions, plus supporting forces. This represents more than two divisions and about 50 percent of the NVA forces in I CTZ. Readily available in the overall DMZ/Laos panhandle area there were another 24,000. They were reasonably well trained, reasonably well motivated and very well armed with weapons up to and including 152 mm artillery, as well as some tanks, assault guns, 122 mm and 140 mm medium range rockets, and anti-aircraft guns up to 57 mm. They were well supplied with ammunition and the essentials.

2. Friendly forces in the Khe Sanh combat base itself numbered 5,700 Marines and about 500 Vietnamese. This represented about three percent of the total friendly forces in I CTZ. They were armed with 18 105's, five 155's, 10 Ontos with six 106 mm recoilless rifles each, 32 individual 106 mm recoilless rifles, five tanks, and 98 mortars. Within a radius of 10 miles of Khe Sanh there were 3,800 more Marines and 500 Army. And, within 40 miles of Khe Sanh, there were at least 37,000 more friendly troops. The U.S. forces were uniformly of high quality. The Vietnamese exhibited their trustworthiness. Logistics support was satisfactory throughout the battle. The garrison wanted for very little. It's supply levels were adequate.

3. Fire support capabilities in the DMZ area were impressive. In addition to the artillery, mortars and recoilless weapons in the Khe Sanh base, there were 16 175 mm guns and six 155 mm howitzers at Camp Carroll and at Thon Son Lam which supported the battle. There were at least 45 B-52 sorties available per day. It was not uncommon, in a single day, to drop as much as 1,800 tons of bombs in the Khe Sanh area, and this figure could have been exceeded if surge requirements demanded. Then there was the matter of ammunition variety and lethality - - gun ammunition, mines, delayed action influence bombs, and napalm - - all contributed to the fire support array. And finally, the radar bombing capability, either ground directed or conducted with organic aircraft radar extended the fire support system into night and foul weather. CONT'D NEXT PG

4. Our air transport capability, built around a comprehensive in country system of C-130, C-123, Caribou, and helicopters, met the daily requirement of the Khe Sanh garrison (175 tons), and built up a reserve of about 20 days of supplies at combat active rates, across the board. The helicopter round trip to Dong Ha is about 45 miles. The fixed wing round trip varies between 45 miles (Dong Ha), 55 miles (Quang Tri), 100 miles (Phu Bai), 180 miles (DaNang), and, while bad weather had some adverse effect on aerial delivery, it did not stop it, because of the GCA capability at Khe Sanh.

5. During the siege, an average of 194 short tons per day of suplies and 70 troops per day were air delivered to Khe Sanh. This represents a total of 14,356 short tons of supplies and 5,180 troops. The total resupply airlift involved an average of 15 fixed wing and 20 helicopter sorties per day. Of the fixed wing support sorties, 12 made air drops, one delivered by extraction, and two landed. The total number of helicopter sorties reached 7,870, which, in addition to cargo, carried in 17,254 passengers. No figures are available on the total number of passengers extracted from the compound; however, it is approximately the same as the number of passengers delivered since the total number of personnel in the Khe Sanh area stabilized at about 6,200.

b. Intensity of Conflict

1. The Khe Sanh compound came under fire and ground attack during the week of 18-24 January 1968. Between then and 1 April 1968 the area received a total of 11,114 incoming artillery, mortar, and rocket rounds. This is an average of 150 incoming rounds per day, which was the average for all of I CTZ in 1967. The peak bombardment on 23 February 1968 reached about 1400 rounds. Understandably, it was difficult to ascertain, in all cases, the type of fire being received; however, the data in the reports show totals of 1,284 rounds of artillery, 3,184 rounds of mortars, 742 rounds of rocket, and 5,904 rounds of mixed or undetermined fire.

2. In support of Khe Sanh, U.S. forces fired a total of 117,643 rounds of artillery. Only 14,786 rounds were fired prior to 20 January 1968. Most of the total was 105 mm and 155 mm howitzer fire; however, 12, 441 rounds were from 175 mm artillery pieces.

3. In addition, B-52 forces flew 2,602 sorties and delivered 75,631 tons of ordnance. For the 74 days this averaged 35 sorties and 1,022 tons per day. This was approximately 85 percent more sorties and 82 percent more ordnance delivered than the daily average over all of SVN and the DMZ area for the past 12 months. The bombed area extended part way into Laos; however, the majority of the sorties delivered ordnance in SVN. In fact, 533 sorties delivered ordnance within three kilometers of friendly ground forces in the perimeter areas around Khe Sanh.

4. From 7 January to 1 April 1968, tactical air fire power supported the Khe Sanh forces with a total of 15, 266 attack sorties. Only 49 of these were flown prior to 20 January. The daily rate of 184 sorties in support of Khe Sanh was equivalent to the daily rate furnished in support of all of the I CTZ during the past year. Records on associated air delivered ordnance for this area are not readily available.

c. Results

1. U.S. forces had 204 personnel killed in action, five prior to 20 January. They suffered 1,622 troops wounded in action with only 22 of these prior to 20 January. Of the total WIAs, 845 were serious enough for medical evacuation. The current most reasonable estimates for VC/NVA casualties in the Khe Sanh area during this period are in excess of 10,000 KIA. There were also 41 detainees and nine NVA prisoners of war. Compared to U.S. KIAs, this is a 50 to one kill ratio. Since 1 April 1968, the number of additional grave sites which have been found indicate that the kill ratio will be considerably higher. The overall kill ratio in SVN prior to Khe Sanh had climbed to between five to one and six to one.

2 U.S. forces captured at least 178 weapons and, by best estimates, the USMC had two 155 mm howitzers damaged.

3. U.S. aircraft losses in support of Khe Sanh, during the period 1 November 1967 to 1 April 1968 totaled eight fixed wing and 13 helicopters. Of the fixed wing types, four were attack aircraft, one was an observation type, and four were transports.

Conclusions

3. The following conclusions are drawn by logically relating the opposing strategies at Khe Sanh with the documented action which occurred:

a. The purpose of Khe Sanh was to impede expansion of enemy influence.

b. The enemy's strategic purpose was targeted not just upon U.S. forces or ARVN forces but upon the country at large, the military power in general and, most of all, upon the governmental structure.

c. Khe Sanh is strategically located and was accessible to help, not only in the form of logistics, but in the form of counterattack forces.

d. The external fire support and counterattack capability coupled with efficient and flexible logistical support tended to reduce the overall risk of the Khe Sanh operation.

e. The U.S. and ARVN forces numbered some 6,200 in the combat base plus 4,300 within a ten miles radius of Khe Sanh for a total of 10,500 troops opposed by an estimated 20,000 to 25,000 NVA. This is a ratio of approximately two to one in the enemy's favor against the Khe Sanh complex.

f. At Khe Sanh, the simplest way to put it is that the enemy was trying to do again most of the things he did to the French at Dienbienphu; - - the hardening of his weapons positions, the slow closing in of the infantry, the probes and interdictions; - - all of these were evident. His fire on the airfield was not successful, even at a level of over 1,000 rounds of high explosive in a day, largely because of the AM-2 matting could be easily replaced. In this connection, our emplacements stood up better under heavy rocket and artillery (up to 152 mm fire) than did the French at Dienbienphu.

Khe Sanh Remembered...

g. There was no significant difference in the enemy's tactics between Dienbienphu and Khe Sanh.

h. Though the enemy was much better equipped, trained, and supported than the Viet Minh in 1954, the U.S. and ARVN forces were much better equipped, trained, and supported than the French of that period. By comparison Khe Sanh became a Dienbienphu in reverse.

Significant Observations

4. The enemy had the choice of two courses of action relative to Khe Sanh -- they could have attacked or bypassed the position. A victory by them would have opened the western approaches to the northern provinces of SVN. Since the objective was a strong US/GVN position, it also would have given the enemy an extensive psychological and propaganda advantage. Accordingly, they concentrated approximately two well organized and fully equipped divisions against half a division of friendly troops who were relatively immobile. Also, the enemy underestimated the logistic and fire power support capability of U.S. forces. This resulted in 20,000 to 25,000 NVA troops engaging in a lengthy and unsuccessful siege.

5. The US/GVN forces holding Khe Sanh tied down approximately two divisions of NVA troops during the crucial period of TET Offensive. These well equipped and trained enemy forces would otherwise have been available to join the attack on the cities; and their intervention could have altered seriously and detrimentally the course of battle.

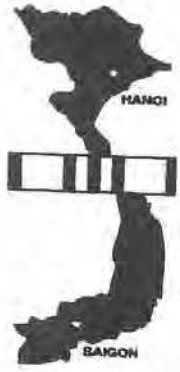
6. The NVA forces in the vicinity of Khe Sanh suffered a severe defeat. They failed to accomplish their military, psychological and propaganda objectives and it is estimated that they lost approximately one half of their committed fighting troops. The extent of their defeat becomes more apparent as our forces, now conducting operations in the Khe Sanh area, gather mounting evidence in the form of ammunition and equipment caches, enemy bodies in mass graves, and battered fortifications.

This report prepared by: Cdr J.H. Cullen, USN, LtCol J. McG. Bohen, USA, Maj R.C. Lyons, USAF, Combat Analysis Group J-3. (17 April 1968)

The following is an account of a church service I conducted during the siege at Khe Sanh on a Sunday in March 1968.
By Chaplain Wm. R. Hampton
3/26, 3d MarDiv.

"They descended the dirt stairway quietly and cautiously, taking great care not to be noticed. They were not an impressive group by typical standards. Their appearance was that of a group of laborers coming in after a hard day's work, with dirty clothes and dirty bodies. One thing did stand out however, and that was their youthfulness.

Only about a dozen could gather at one time in the underground cave-like chapel. Their surroundings were starkly simple and earthy--a makeshift table, a plate of bread, a cup of wine, worshipers and a leader. The atmosphere couldn't help but remind one of the stable--cave in which the Son of God became human flesh. And now in this small, underground assembly, he promised to be present again with his glorified humanity, under the forms of bread and wine.



A young man was called out of the group and presented himself before the table. On his forehead the leader signed a cross, the symbol of his new loyalty. Using the phrases of the Creed of the Apostles, the leader asked him questions about his faith. The young man answered with a serious, 'I believe!' When asked if he promised to remain true to this faith, he answered, 'I do, by the help of God!' The signs of emotion were obvious. The young man then knelt, and while the leader applied water and spoke the baptismal words, the concussion of a great explosion above ground shook loose some of the dirt wall. The worship continued with the Prayer of Thanksgiving and the newest member of the Sacred Body of Christ joined the others as they came to the table to receive the Holy Sacrament. The leader gave the final blessing and the worshipers began to file out one at a time, with a deliberate time interval between each person's leaving.

And another celebration of the Holy Eucharist had brought the peace, joy and strength of the forgiving love of God into the lives of that community. For not knowing what lay in the future, they were now prepared to face another period of days."

Although this could almost be the story of a group of Christians worshiping in the catacombs so long ago, it is the story of a group of Marines meeting to celebrate the Eucharist. It is hard, if not impossible, for Christians living in the United States in 1968 to grasp what it must have been like for the early Christians who dared worship only in secret and at great risk. But for many of the United States Marines at the enemy surrounded outpost of Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam, there is strong feeling for those early brothers in the faith.

I Wonder

(But really don't want to know)

I see them still, those drawn, gaunt faces
Of men and boys from many races.
They keep appearing in the damndest places.

So many names etched upon the wall
Of those who came and gave their all.
For freedom's future they had to fall.

It's a vital link, they used to say
Of that far off patch of blood red clay
Before we blew it up and walked away.

Now I have to wonder why
So many had to bleed and die
When we gave it up and still get by.

Tribute and Tribulation

To the men who scaled their mountains
and seized that far flung plateau,
To the men that held the arena
Against the best the enemy could throw.

Who walked the jungle covered valleys
And waded the leach laden streams;
Who moved through the green shrouded alleys,
Till their muscles cramped and screamed.

To those who fell wounded and bleeding,
Yet arose to fight on 'til the end.
To those who fell wounded and bleeding,
Never to rise up again.

To our comrades who carried the rifle;
Who fired both cannon and gun.
To those that supplied and fought with us
We knew that they'd never run.

To the pilots who flew the fast movers,
And herded choppers all over the sky.
Who calmly watched the green tracers
As they went arching and howling by.

To Gentleman Jim, our commander,
And Jacques, Claire, Morris and Chief.
To Snake, Mike, Chaves and Spencer,
And other heroes we respect and keep.

To Stubbs, our brave Navy Chaplain,
Who interceded for us as our link.
And to DeMaggd, our battalion surgeon,
Whose skilled hand drew us back from the brink.

To Blanchfield, and our Navy Corpsmen,
The finest and most courageous of all;
Who daily and nightly fought to reach us,
Refusing to succumb to the law.

So now as we move far from the valley,
And the years march away to the fore.
We and our families remember,
All those who made it happen; and more.

Capt. Ken Pipes, B Co. 26th Marines

Things Remembered

The laughter, the mud, the rats and the bugs, the FNGs that soon became brothers.
The rain, the heat, and the hunger not so great,
as to tempt the ham and mothers.
A trip to Dong Ha, ID the remains, a buddy,
a letter, someone's son.
A friendship still strong that grew in a bomb crater hooch on the finger of 881.

The lines on the south side by the gate, being given command and told to hold on.
We'll get help before long, office pogs, snipers, cooks and recon.
The listening, the thumping, for cover we'd go running.
Could there be anyone who'd ever forget the incoming?

The new lieutenant who came, the respect he did earn.
He said I'd get a medal.
Forgotten or lost its all part of the cost, what I got was a leg full of metal.
Inquire I've been told, but now its so old, and I have to admit to my shame.
Like some of the others, I've forgotten his name.

The rockets and shells, the smells and the sound.
The dump when it blew, remember the view, flechettes, they covered the ground.
A fear above all, to sit in the open,
at times due to natures call.
A worse way to go we wouldn't know, just pray Charlie's rockets won't fall.

The assault on 950 with 3/26, sniper sergeants on point!
We didn't resist.
Didn't look like the others, all clean and green, just ragged and red and really lean.
Just stayed way out front, to far to get crap.
A young Marine on his second day, lost to his own booby trap.

The last day of a tour twice extended
I'll get out of here if they get that damned runway mended.
Shrapnel trails in the dust. I never heard the bang.
The docs gentle voice, another trip in pain to NAS, Danang.

Then as a pilot some years later, flying for the LAO in secret gave chance.
A look down at deserted clay, red stained now fading.
Where so gallant many gave their best, too many of

I'm Proud to be a Khe Sanh Veteran

By Neil Mc Crossen

Back a few issues in Red Clay, someone asked if anyone received or knew of the Playboy magazines he shipped to KSCB. I can only testify to the fate of one months' issue, and I don't recall which month it was. I'll get back to this later.

I arrived on 16 January 68 from Phu Bai with Foxtrot 2/26. As soon as I deplaned I knew the party was over for me. I'd "skated" into a world of shit. My MOS was 0141 (clerk) and that was just fine by me. I'd been stationed at Marine Barracks, Boston and gone on many funeral details, seeing many heartbroken relatives and friends of Marines KIA. At one of those funerals the mom broke away from the people trying to console her and rushed by me to embrace her dead son in his coffin. That memory remains strong in my mind and will always probably.

Anyway, by the time I arrived "in country," and was sent to Phu Bai, I had no thoughts of volunteering for the "grunts," as I'd done back at Camp Geiger after being assigned to Boston as an 0141. Hardbacks and no "incoming" suited me just fine. But, then, the Marine Corps doesn't ask if it's a suitable assignment does it? So, after two months of comparatively easy duty, I, along with the grunts were told to "saddle up" and be ready to move out to a place which nobody seemed to know the name of. Even if the name was know, it probably wouldn't have meant anything to most of us. The name of that place means a great deal to all of us today, doesn't it?

We boarded transport and landed after an uneventful flight of an hour or two. I really don't remember much about the flight, but I'll never forget the feeling I got when I stepped off the plane and into a nightmare. We marched outside the KSCB perimeter and "dug in" right away. Shrapnel from previous fighting was all around, and the fog was pretty heavy. After a while the grunts set out for the hills around the base and the rear echelon moved back to KSCB presumably to set up our rear area. Things were a bit uncertain it seemed at the time, but one thing was certain, "this was for real."

That night I slept near the tank (I think) and we received no incoming. As a matter of fact, that night I had, for some reason, good dreams, and slept through the night uninterrupted.

We set up our tents and dug holes on each end, although we had nothing to cover the holes with. I'm not writing to complain or point fingers at anyone, but there should have been material to roof our holes with. Whether the timber was prioritized to build the McNamara "Barrier" on the DMZ, or sitting on a runway in Danang doesn't matter now. I've read the books on Khe Sanh and I know I wasn't mistaken. Somebody could have made the timber a priority for KSCB and a lot of lives would have been saved. Cringing in an open hole for hours during incoming was the closest I came to breaking and it could have been prevented.

My first taste of incoming was the night of 21 January 68 when the NVA rocket attack destroyed our main ammunition dump. I didn't like it and with no sleep added to the fear, I was starting to lose it. Next night on perimeter I kept hearing things during my watch. I woke the man with me once too often, and he questioned my courage. He was on his last month and was waiting for a plane to Danang, but wasn't thinking that far ahead. Instead, he told me that he hoped the NVA did try to penetrate us so he could kill some more before he left, and that I'd better be thinking the same way as him!

At the time I didn't want to hear it, but I had a long talk with myself later and calmed down a bit. When I accepted the probability that I would die here and vowed to hang tough and do whatever I had to but wouldn't shirk my duties - and do everything I could to stay alive. The Marine who questioned my courage in the hold that night probably saved my life. In no way could I have continued running scared without something bad happening to myself, and, or the Marines with me. I have to idea what the guys name was, but I think he was from Oregon or Washington state. If read and remember this brother, thanks for the ass chewing 'cause I needed it.

My first mission to improve mine and our rear position was to scout around for some timber for bunkers. I took a "mule" and went on a search. When I rode by the airstrip, I came across a pallet of timbers along the side of the road. I couldn't believe it! There was enough wood for myself and the others back in the company office. I loaded as many pieces as the mule would hold and took off toward home. Me and my mule got about 3 or 4 feet when someone yelled "Halt! Halt! You xxxxxx" The voice commanded respect and right away I knew that when it seems too good to be true -- it usually is. I braked the vehicle and turned around to see a group of 4 or 5 men coming toward me with fire in their eyes, and an officer ranking on their collars. The lead officer was especially pissed and ordered me to attention right there by the airstrip and proceeded to ask me if I knew that the wood I was trying to take was to be used for the underground hospital to treat my wounded brother Marines.

The officer chewing on me was, I believe was General Tompkins, who had been discussing (I surmised) plans for the underground "C" Med with the other officers when he spotted me.

My reply to the General's question went something like this: "With all due respect, sir, I had no idea what this wood was intended for. All I know is there is nothing to build bunkers with, and I don't want to be one of the Marines being treated underground." The General seemed to mellow a bit but still ordered me to put the timber back on the pallet. I turned and began unloading when I heard the same voice say "Marine". I straightened and turned back around. The General said, "You may take one piece of timber." I replied, "Yes Sir, Thank you Sir!."

I wouldn't have traded that one pieces of wood for anything. It was my main roof support for my bunker. I'm just glad its strength never had to be tested with a direct hit!

Now, getting back to the Playboy magazine story...

Part of my vow to try to stay alive was never to get lax when I even thought I heard incoming. I learned to do the Khe Sanh shuffle very quick and in a big hurry. Toward the end of the siege, one sunny morning, I sat at a field desk in our company tent and started writing a letter. It was the first and only time I let my guard down. I'd never exposed myself to incoming unnecessarily. Carrying the wounded, work detail at the ammo dump while still popping, perimeter duty at night, digging the big hole for the company office all left me exposed but that was duty calling. I had written a few lines when I heard the first incoming of the day and I ran out of the tent and into one of the holes. I waited a while and went back up to continue my letter. I also noticed a Playboy magazine on the drawer side of the desk. I heard another incoming and ran to the hole again. I waited a short time, then it was back to trying to finish my letter and check out the new magazine. I almost finished writing the letter before the next incoming. There it was again! This time I broke my vow and said screw it and kept on writing. I heard the rocket whistle overhead and hit far from me. However, I soon heard a "thut" sound coming quickly through the air when suddenly the sound came through the tent canvas. The Playboy magazine went flying across the tent and a lone piece of shrapnel hit one of the tent poles and fell to the ground. Only ten to twenty inches to the left and I would have been hit chest high.

Another member of my company had gotten complacent at the same time, and we bumped into one another going opposite ways for cover after we saw how close it round had come and how foolish we'd been. We tried to laugh it off but when we saw what the Playboy looked like we stopped laughing. The shrapnel had ripped through it's entire thickness and about 3/4 of the way from top to bottom. I tried to salvage it but the girls were too far gone.

Anyway, I'd like to thank whoever sent it. Thank you for thinking of us. From time to time I have thought of the magazine and wondered where it came from. Now I know.

I'm proud to be a Khe Sanh veteran and I'm grateful to be a part of this organization.

Big Boost For Scholarship Fund... LtCol. Andy DeBona USMC (Ret) (M-3-26) our third battalion 26th Marines Khe Sanh Veterans Memorial Scholarship Coordinator through his tireless efforts has managed to amass a most welcome amount of $4,250 from various activities and miscellaneous donations. The check was forwarded to 1stSgt Dick Peloquin USMC (Ret) (I-3-26), Massachusetts Coordinator for the Khe Sanh Vets, which was presented on 24 April, 1997 to Dr. Harry Coumiotes, Vice President for Development at American International College, Springfield, MA. Dr. Coumiotes informed Andy that since it's inception the 3/26 Scholarship has been awarded to a Marine or the son/daughter of a Marine. Andy has forwarded to A/C, two books, Ambush Valley by Eric Hammel and Lima Six by Dick Camp. Future generations will understand the sacrifices that Marines of 3/26 made. When we eventually join those who have fallen, the scholarship which is our legacy will continue to remind the students of today what Marines of another era have done in the name of God, Country and Corps!

Assisting with the presentation was Capt. Nick Peters OIC of the Chicopee, MA Officer Selection Office and 2ndLt. John Salvatore.

Facts Concerning the 1968 Battle To Defeat the Enemy's Tet Offensive

A report compiled by Richard P. Fulton

31 January - 30 June 1968

Historians will remember the key battle of the Vietnam War as the fight to repulse the enemy's Tet Offensive, a fight which primarily took place during the first six months of 1968. Forces under North Vietnam's control throughout the operating theater sustained combat losses of approximately 100,000 (the equivalent number of 10 entire divisions). During the same period of time, the allied force's military losses were fewer than 20,000.

The primary assault was made by the communists during the closing days of January and the month of February. Another series of attacks was made in early May, but, like the first attack, the attempt was a dismal failure for the enemy. Many surrenders of communist troops were recorded, especially in the summer of 1968. The enemy planned a renewal of fighting in August but this planned strike never got off the ground, and the 1968 campaign ground to an end as an unmitigated military disaster for political leader Ho Chi Minh, military leader General Nguyen Giap and the communists.

From a military point of view there was no doubt about which side achieved victory; yet, politically, there were mixed results. The battle called the Tet Offensive was the most disastrous defeat of arms North Vietnam suffered in the long war but, paradoxically, it was also the most important political victory in the portion of the war fought against the Americans.

Beginning on 31 January 1968, the large battles were mostly over by the end of February. Of the 85,000 troops that had been committed to the fight's opening offensive, it is estimated that more than half were dead, many thousands were injured, other thousands were captured, and the hoped for general uprising by the people of the south against the government in Saigon did not happen.

On the credit side for the enemy, the bombing of the north had been curtailed. The political scene in the US had been thoroughly jumbled. The pacification program in the Republic of Vietnam had reduced emphasis and negotiations to end the war were being planned. There were many thousands of refugees created and the economic situation of RVN was critically impacted, and physical damage within metropolitan areas and down through the hamlet level was unusually severe.

On the debit side for the enemy, the offensive had united South Vietnam in solid opposition to the north, and had galvanized and drawn commitment from the urban residents, in particular, against the insurgents. The people blamed the communists for the widespread killing. General mobilization became possible for the Republic of Vietnam after Tet. The military forces of the RVN gained a well deserved sense of respect and confidence and pride in the way they had reacted to the attacks and in the counter attacks they had made. Mass murder carried out by the enemy did much to destroy the credibility of communist claims to be of and for the people. Never again would the Viet Cong be able to recruit in the south, without force.

Tet was a benchmark for both sides. For the communists, it was a severe military defeat on the battlegrounds themselves. But it was also a psychological victory for them, particularly in the United States. Yet, even as many Americans were becoming convinced that a major military defeat had taken place, the people of the Republic of Vietnam saw what had happened in quite a different light. Indeed, much more was lost for Hanoi than gained, politically, within the Republic of Vietnam, as a result of the battle. The reason for the crushing military defeat of the enemy involves the principle of mass. Strategically, by attacking everywhere, the communists had superior strength nowhere - and that is why they lost.

Some Other Major American Military Battles (in comparison to Tet):

Gettysburg:

This crucial battle of the Americal Civil War involved a Confederate invasion of the north. The battle took place 1-3 July 1863. Casualties were approximately 23,000 Federal soldiers and 28,000 Confederate soldiers. The Gettysburg Battle was not decisive and Lee was able to retreat with his force mostly intact back into Virginia. Had Gettysburg ended with as severe a defeat of the Confederacy as the allied military victory represented in the Tet Offensive over the communist Viet Cong forces of South Vietnam, the American Civil War would have probably ended in 1863. After Tet, the fighting in Vietnam became primarily against regular North Vietnamese forces, rather than against guerrilla insurgent forces.

Guadalcanal:

This battle was the first major allied land victory over the Japanese in World War II. Japan lost 25,000 men; American losses were 1,500 dead and 4,800 wounded. The number of Americans killed in action during the 1968 Battle of Tet was about the same number of countrymen our nation lost on Guadalcanal; however, in Vietnam, there were many more Americans (over 7,000 in fact) who were wounded in action than in what was the pivotal WWII battle in the Pacific.

Specifics about the Enemy's 1968 Tet Offensive:

Tet is the Vietnamese holiday celebrating the arrival of the Chinese lunar new year (like Christmas, Easter and New Years in the west, all rolled into one). A seven day truce had been announced by the communists for Tet, to run from 27 January until 3 February. The bait of the potential of a permanent armistice was offered. In previous Tet cease-fires, there had been minor activity but no major military maneuvers. Saigon announced its own plans for Tet, a 36 hour pause to include the time from 6 p.m. on 29 January on through 31 January, with an exception for the area around Khe Sanh.

Contrary to general belief in the United States, the battle of Tet was much more than just the few small unit actions poorly covered by network television crews (including the small and very unsuccessful platoon-sized attack against the American Embassy in Saigon), and more than just the killing by a South Vietnamese police official, General Loan, of a VC officer who had been captured wearing civilian clothing and who had ordered his men to use neighborhood residents as human shields.

In full scale assaults on the first day of Tet (30 January) the enemy made a series of hit and run raids in five provinces in the center of South Vietnam (Kontum, Pleiku, Binh Dinh, Darlac, Khanh Hoa) and also in Quang Nam, on further to the north. The next night, they hit Saigon and seven more provinces with attacks by large units. The next day, eight more provinces experienced attacks. The province to be hit last was Bac Lieu - some twelve days after the opening engagements.

In all, there was fighting in 36 of 44 provincial capitals, five of six autonomous cities, 64 of 242 district capitals, and in 50 hamlets. Every airfield was hit as were many different kinds of military installations, ranging from small US Special Forces A Team camps along the borders and in the highlands (including one near Khe Sanh that was overrun by Soviet-designed PT-76 light tanks), to very large cantonments and garrisons hosting large joint and combined organizations, including the MACV headquarters complex itself. The initial raid involved about 70,000 communist soldiers, mostly members of Viet Cong units.

The enemy plan had been to have a series of battles in the fall of 1967 to draw combat power away from populated areas, then to hit and inflict serious damage to the RVN governmental structure to encourage a popular uprising of the Vietnamese people against the national structure centered in Saigon, and to draw the conventional military forces into a set-piece kind of battle similar to that which the Viet Minh had won against the French at Dienbienphu. It was felt such a battle would destroy or seriously harm large American forces involved in the war, and the many casualties would thus force the American people to sue for peace. (Cont'd next pg.)

The Viet Cong expected to be heralded as liberators and they also expected that the military forces of the Republic of Vietnam would not fight. They were very wrong on both counts. It is true that the people of RVN rose up, but they did so in major resistance to the invaders. The ARVN forces, in particular, fought extremely well, and one of their most important battle actions was major contribution to the successful defense of Tan Son Nhut Air Base in Saigon, site of the MACV general headquarters.

The enemy lost more than 40,000 out of 84,000 initially committed to the action; mostly members of Viet Cong insurgent units. During the most active phase of the battle, the South Vietnamese lost about 8,000 wounded and had more than 3,000 killed, and US losses were about 1,500 killed or missing and 7,764 wounded. About 800,000 people became refugees, at least for a time, as a result of the fighting, and the communists are thought to have murdered about 6,000 civilians.

The 77 day siege of the 6,000 US Marine sat the combat base at Khe Sanh and of USMC hilltop defense points in the immediate area of the base may have really been intended as a feint by the communists, with their true objective being the capture of Hue in order to cut off the two northern provinces of the Republic of Vietnam. Though the official number of American dead was set at 205, it is believed by most who were there that at least 475 US Marines, alone, who died at Khe Sanh during January, February and March.

There were also many US Special Forces, as well as numerous conventional Army, Air Force and Navy losses in that same area. At least 5,000 of the native Bru people of the region also died. It is believed that the North Vietnamese surrounded the Americans and ARVN troops inside the base with at least 20,000 soldiers, and lost more than 10,000 of them in the fighting. The ground siege was officially lifted when elements of the Army's 1st Air Cavalry Division, participating in Operation Pegasus, broke through enemy lines and linked up with Marine units in April.

The attack the communists made against the ancient imperial walled capital city of Hue began on 31 January and the enemy held entrenched areas of the old city for 26 days before being thrown out of the area. It is estimated that 142 Marines were killed in the fighting and 857 were wounded. The American Army lost 74 soldiers KIA and had 507 members wounded. Military forces of South Vietnam lost 384 personnel killed and had 1,830 wounded.

In the Hue fighting, the enemy is believed to have lost over 5,000 personnel killed. There were 89 prisoners taken. More than 50 percent of the city was destroyed and more than 116,000 people were made homeless. Another 5,800 were dead or missing, including some 3,000 killed by the communists as "enemies of the revolution." The "crime" of some of these had been that they spoke a few words of the English language.

While soldiers, Marines and US Navy personnel, regardless of daily duty assignments ranging from truck driver to finance clerk, were armed with rifles and machine guns and played an active role in repulsing ground assaults of the enemy forces, enlisted airmen of the United States Air Force at Tan Son Nhut, Bien Hoa and other air bases throughout the Republic of Vietnam did not have an ability to defend themselves, other than for a few illegal personal firearms, because the USAF leadership refused to issue weapons.

Airmen, like soldiers, were trained in their basic military orientation how to take orders and how to fire M-16 rifles. However, when it was learned the enemy probably would launch a strong ground attack, senior Air Force leadership decided that the only personnel on the air bases threatened which would be armed were those assigned to security police units. This reflected both their mistrust of their enlisted personnel's basic military capabilities, and also a continuing pattern of the Air Force officer corps taking operational actions supporting selfish career protection rather than a selfless concept of providing proper military leadership.

The result was the fielding of a very thin line of airmen assigned police duties who were more used to security or law enforcement requirements than to the dictates of infantry-style combat. Hundreds of others in housing and work areas on the base itself armed themselves with clubs and knives and watched with dismay as red flares and arcing tracers out on the perimeter marked a determined enemy assault.

Had the several hundred enemy Viet Cong soldiers attacking Tan Son Nhut not been flanked by a US Army Cavalry unit, and also had their probe not been blunted by steadfast members of the Republic of Vietnam armed forces, they would have stood an excellent chance of military success. Had they cracked through what was, in reality, a very weak and think defense line, they could have easily overrun undefended work and housing areas, and there would have been major American loss of life because clubs, empty bottles and knives simply cannot stand up against AK-47 assault rifles and SKS carbines.

As shown by events in the Middle East, the Air Force's continuing philosophy of being unwilling to be fully responsible for its own ground defense continues on into the late 1990s. In the overall ground environment, this unwillingness by the Air Force to trust its people's military skills and to assume proper responsibility for installation ground defense (to a degree, out past the perimeter) seemingly remains as a major tactical problem for joint and combined situations, and impacts operations and planning, availability of resources, and force morale.

To the Air Force's credit during the Tet campaign was an ability to effectively use air weapons in finely tuned coordinated manner with the other services under a unified structure of command and control against large ground formations of an entrenched enemy. Air Force pilots and crews usually performed the mission with relative precision.
