Another important USAF contribution was aerial resupply of Khe Sanh, using the LAPES method. LAPES stands for "Low Altitude Parachute Extraction of Supplies." C-130 aircraft were flown in touch and go configuration along the combat base air strip. Heavy cargo pallets moving on rollers in the aircraft floor were jerked out the back of the plane by parachute and usually came to rest in a haze of red dust at the end of the strip. This aerial activity was usually accompanied by heavy enemy artillery, mortar and rocket fire.

A little known civil affairs contribution the Air Force made during the campaign was support of a Vietnamese Air Force program established by the 41st VNAF Wing at Danang Air Base which involved delivery of food and medicine by USAF C-7 Caribou aircraft to the refugee camps of Hue. The flights were made at a time when the central government mechanism in Saigon was stoutly in opposition to such an effort, fearing the supplies would fall into the hands of the communists. The first flight, launched from Danang, carried rice and American medical personnel. A public affairs photo team was aboard to document the event. This aircraft landed in Hue when the sound of hostile small arms fire was still a routine fact of life in that city. In fact, it was the first fixed wing aircraft to land at Hue City Strip, after the attack.

A noteworthy senior US Army General is Louis C. Menetrey, a leader who by his cool and competent military professionalism made significant contribution to sustaining peace in the Pacific, stability in Northeast Asia, and the continuation of freedom for the people of the Republic of Korea during the turbulence of the 1970s and 1980s. As a lieutenant colonel during the Vietnam War, Menetrey commanded the 2/28 infantry battalion (Black Lions) of the 1st Infantry Division. Right before Tet, Menetrey's unit was deployed northeast of Lai Khe which was just to the north of Saigon, and was facing mostly North Vietnamese Regulars who has been attacking fire bases.

In the course of the action, the Black Lions uncovered rather large caches of supplies and it was later learned the area was one of the main infiltration routes into the Saigon area. When the Tet Offensive started, Menetrey's instinct was that, sitting on top of an enemy supply line, his unit should stay in place so as to intercept the communists when they retreated north after what he was (so correctly) sure would be their inevitable defeat. However, as the battle developed, the battalion was ordered further south.

General Menetrey has a typical battalion commander's view of the unfolding event but, from his perspective, the issue was never really in doubt. That same viewpoint was common among many other superb field grade level leaders of the period, many of whom took part in the battle, and who were the officers who would later provide the leadership in the rebuilding of the US Army after the Vietnam War ended. With the offensive, the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese had done just what these officers had hoped they would do, and that is they came out into the open to do battle in places where allied firepower could be used against them, and with optimum advantage. The result was sound and unquestionable military defeat.

In particular, the Viet Cong -- whom General Menetrey believes was by far the most effective element the enemy fielded during the war -- was decimated.

Now, almost thirty years later, many thousands of veterans of the campaign question why the American people at large don't understand don't believe that the fights which repulsed the enemy offensive cumulatively represented a major military victory in the Vietnam War.

The questions about why victory became defeat are many:

How did every this happen? Did the leadership of the allied side in country as well as in Washington simply err in calling for more forces than were truly necessary? Or was the problem much more insidious, involving manipulation of national understanding of the war?

Did the Department of Defense and MACV Public Affairs mechanism make major mistakes in dealing with the media? If so, what were they?

How did these mistakes contribute to the on-scene press reporting of the battle?

To what extent did the media err in its choice of words and images in presenting the battle?

Was advocacy journalism simply a tool of deliberate propaganda for the enemy or for the movement to end the war?

How objective were the reporters who were on the scene? Were they truly on the scene or did they simply represent themselves that way when, in reality, their reporting was of isolated or fringe events?

Should the military have done more to place the reporters into the center of the fight? If not, why not?

An allegation has been made by some historians that the initial Tet fighting began just as national television networks were starting their evening news broadcasts, and that resulting national misunderstanding was simply an accident of timing. To them, this explains why the first reporting of Tet by major network figures was quite negative in tone and stressed that the enemy had achieved successful surprise.

Rather than admit their initial account was incorrect, did major media figures decide within 48 hours to continue charging ahead with their initial assessment, regardless of information later received?

If so, the question then is, again, why? The fact is that the enemy gained a tremendous psychological advantage the first couple days of the event as homefront morale plummeted as a result of the faulty press reporting.

Was this a planned propaganda action?

If, as some believe, there was an attempt by a small senior management group to manipulate public opinion by deliberate circumvention of the truth, why then was there no formal investigation by the government to determine if our national laws had been violated?

With Americans dying on the battlefield, and then continuing to die for several years thereafter as misunderstanding piled on top of misunderstanding, and with the side of freedom then ultimately losing the war, there remains a strong and pungent whiff of ignorance, misbehavior or both.

In particular, there are many questions which veterans have about the role of those in the news media/press community above the actual on-scene reporting level. This focus is on those who molded national opinion via development of overall editorial content and who then ensured distribution of their viewpoint by strongly managed control of communication channels.

Bottom line, there is much about the fighting during the 1968 Tet period which remains unfinished business:

Some military lessons still to be learned, particularly in the area of application of basic military skills by the Air Force;

Overdue honors rendered all Americans who participated in achieving the victory;

And a judicial examination to determine if there was any deliberate wrongdoing at home with regard to the information linkage between the government and the public.

Though thirty years too late, our nation character demands it is time for America to finally do the right thing in properly remembering the 1968 battle of repulsing the Tet Offensive, and to do so truthfully, honorably and with a full accounting of legal, moral and civic responsibility. No other standard is acceptable.

VA Pushed One Step Forward; Takes Two Steps Back

CUE PASSES

On Nov. 21, President Clinton signed into law a new opportunity for vets whose cases had been denied by the Board of Veterans' appeals to challenge the denials. Pub. L. No. 105-11.

Over the opposition of the VA, the new measure elevates the VA rule on clear and unmistakable error, 38 C.F.R. 3.105, to a law-preventing the VA from simply changing the rule, 38 U.S.C. 5109A.

The measure also overturns court cases that had barred vets from using CUE to challenge VA decisions that had been considered by the BVA. Now, challenges based on CUE must be filed directly at the BVA and then can be appealed to the Court of Veterans Appeals regardless of the Notice of Disagreement date. Sec. 7111.

The BVA is drafting rules to implement the law and will not act on cases until the rules are in place.

ATTACKS COURT

On Dec. 9, 1997, the BVA proposed rules that fundamentally challenge vets' opportunity for judicial review. The BVA wants to stop its current program of withholding a portion of vets' past-due benefits to pay the attorneys who helped the vets win. The BVA says this will not affect the availability of attorneys.

In a year when the BVA churned out 5,000 more denials than in 1996, and the rate of vets who could not find an attorney to help them file their appeal at the court reached 73%, more attorney involvement is called for -- not BVA actions that will lessen the chance to find help with appeals.

It remains to be seen whether the BVA's rule will go into effect.

Eligibility Verification Reports

VA Central Office has informed veterans organizations that VA will no longer require recipients of Section 306 and Old Law non-service connected pension to submit Eligibility Verification Reports (EVR). This will affect about 50,000 veterans and dependents. VA's reason for this is that very few of these recipients have had any significant income changes over recent years, and the EVR is burdensome for them to fill out and for VA to process. Recipients must still notify VA of income changes which affect their eligibility.

Discharge Exam Made Claim Well Grounded

The Court of Veterans Appeals agreed with a veteran that his claim for service connection for knee disability was well-grounded and reversed and remanded it to the BVA (Hampton V Gober).

For such a claim to be well-grounded generally requires medical evidence of an in-service injury, medical evidence of a current disability and medical opinion linking the injury with the current disability. The BVA rejected the vet's claim because it claimed he did not produce medical evidence of the link between the service injury and current disability.

The Court reversed the BVA and held that since the vet's March 1993 separation exam diagnosed a knee condition, and the vet had applied for VA benefits for that one month later, then the separation exam "provides evidence of both a current left knee condition and a relationship to service."

The Court ruled the claim was well-grounded and sent it back for the VA to comply with its duty to assist by getting an exam report that "specifically opines as to whether the appellant currently suffers from a left knee disorder and, if so, the probability that such condition is related to service."

Survivor Could Not Prove VA Did Not Send Application

The Court of Veterans' Appeals denied a survivor's claim for an earlier effective date for Dependency and Indemnity Compensation because it presumed the VA really had sent her an application for benefits when it said it did -- even though the survivor said she didn't get it. The survivor was represented by Sean Kendall of Boulder, Colorado.

The survivor was granted DIC as of June 1991 based on receiving her May 1991 application. She argued that her application for burial benefits in 1989 should have been considered an informal claim for DIC. After filing a Notice of disagreement with the VARO, she received a statement of the case that said she had been sent application for DIC in February 1989 and August 1990. During her appeal, the VARO gave her an effective date to August 1990 "based upon her claim for service connected death benefits through Loan Guaranty benefits claim filed on 7-25-90."

The BVA remanded her case in 1995 to determine whether she really had been sent an application for DIC in February 1989. The VARO insisted it had sent the form as "evidenced by a computer half sheet dated the same date and filed in the veteran's claim folder."

To win her claim, the survivor had to show clear evidence to rebut the presumption of regularity, i.e., the presumption that the VA did what it said it did. Here, even though there was no cover letter in the file that normally accompanies a DIC application, and even though the court acknowledged that computers, like the people who ooperate them, are not perfect and can fail to produce the work that is required of them, "that was not enough to count as clear evidence" that she did not get the Feb. 1989 DIC application.

ASIAN NEWS BRIEFS

Hanoi Hannah' Has No Regrets Over War Role

By David Lamb
Los Angeles Times Service

HO CHI MINH CITY - Her voice was as smooth as silk, her English impeccable and, as Hanoi's most prominent propagandist during the Vietnam War, "Hanoi Hannah" tried to convince U.S. soldiers they were fighting an immoral war that America had turned against.

For eight years, soldiers tuned in to her daily radio broadcasts in godforsaken outposts with names such as the Rockpile, Ben Het and Con Thien. Although virtually no one took her seriously, they did wonder if she was as lovely in person as she sounded, and many considered her Vietnam's most prominent Communist after Ho Chi Minh.

Hearing this, the now 67-year old Hanoi Hannah - whose real name is Trinh Thi Ngo - giggled, feigning surprise. "Oh my," she said, "I wasn't a celebrity. I did love that time in Hanoi, but I was just an ordinary citizen trying to contribute to my country."

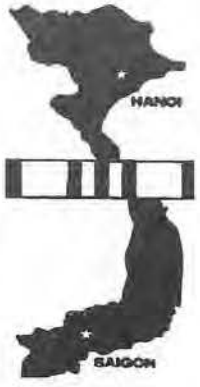
Petite and lovely, Mrs. Ngo did the last of her 30-minute broadcasts in 1973, when the bulk of the U.S. military withdrew. She moved to Ho Chi Minh City (formerly Saigon) in 1975 with her husband, an engineer who is now retired. They live in a modest three-bedroom apartment near the former Presidential Palace that she used to call the "den of puppets" and listen faithfully to newscasts on the Voice of America.

Although she earned a First-Class Resistance Medal for her work and still does occasional translation and voice-overs for the Voice of Vietnam, Mrs. Ngo has slipped quietly into anonymity, surrounded by young Vietnamese who have never heard of the Rockpile, much less of Hanoi Hannah.

"This is Thu Huong calling American servicemen in South Vietnam," her daily broadcast would begin, using an alias that translates as Autumn Fragrance. Then she would play a melancholy song ("Where Have All the Flowers Gone" was a favorite), read news of anti-war protests back in America and, on Fridays, read names of Americans killed in action from the U.S. military newspaper Stars and Stripes.

"My goal was to tell GIs they shouldn't participate in a war that wasn't theirs," she says now. "I tried to be friendly and convincing. I didn't want to be shrill or aggressive. For instance, I referred to the Americans as the adversary. I never called them the enemy."

Her scripts were written by propagandists in the North Vietnamese army who lifted their material from articles in magazines such as Time and Newsweek and newspapers such as The New York Times that North Vietnamese diplomats stationed abroad had sent home. Sometimes members of the U.S. based anti-war movement brought the articles to Hanoi.



Mrs. Ngo smiled as she recalled the activists she had befriended, among them the one-time student radical Tom Hayden and the actress Jane Fonda, who was married to Mr. Hayden for a time.

"They were very helpful,." she said, "in helping us explain to the GIs why the war should be solved by the Vietnamese themselves, not Americans."

She paused, perplexed. "You know," she said, "Jane Fonda never came back at all after the war. I wonder why? She'd made a tape I played that was very good. I heard that some years ago she made an apology in the United States for coming to Hanoi during the war. Is that true?"

Ten years ago, Ms. Fonda made a televised apology to Vietnam veterans and their families for her 1972 visit, during which she was infamously photographed at a North Vietnamese gun emplacement.

In many ways Mrs. Ngo seemed an unlikely candidate to become the voice of communism. She grew up in Hanoi under French colonialism, the daughter of a prosperous glass-factory owner. She took private English lessons and perfected her command of the language watching French-subtitled Hollywood movies including "Gone With the Wind."

After working as a volunteer at the Voice of Vietnam, she was chosen in 1965, largely because of her unaccented English, to begin broadcasting to U.S. troops as Thu Huong.

"Yes," she recalled, "I wanted to make them a little bit homesick."

It wasn't until several years later that she learned that American GIs nicknamed her Hanoi Hannah.

The trouble for Hanoi Hannah - as for other wartime propagandists such as Tokyo Rose, Seoul City Sue and Baghdad Betty - was that her broadcasts weren't very credible. The reports were also wildly exaggerated, announcing annihilations of entire U.S. divisions and losses of hundreds of U.S. planes in a single engagement.

Even the North Vietnamese themselves did not trust the news they heard on the Voice of Vietnam. If they spoke English, they tuned to the Voice of America, the BBC or Armed Forces Radio, a network run by the U.S. military, for their news of the war.

Now, with her broadcasting career winding down and herself having recovered from a motor-scooter accident that had left her laid up for two weeks, Mrs. Ngo says she hopes one day soon to visit the country she spent eight years talking about.

"San Francisco has always been a dream," she says. If she could make one more broadcast what would she say to the GIs of Vienam? "That's easy. I'd tell them let's let bygones be bygones. Let's move on and be friends," she said.

San Antonio Reunion After Action Report

By Dave Rogers

Veterans of Mike Company, Third Battalion, Third Marine Regiment sponsored a reunion May 2-3, 1997 in San Antonio to commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of the battle of Hill 881 South. During the battle, which took place on April 30, 1997, Mike Company was the lead rifle company and suffered 26 killed in action and 51 wounded. Kilo Company, Third Battalion, Ninth Marine Regiment was also actively involved in the intense fighting and suffered 17 killed in action and 35 wounded. Other units provided support, either directly or indirectly.

The reunion was organized by Joe Cialone, former executive officer of Mike Company during the battle, and now a corporate attorney with Baker and Botts in Houston, TX. The Sheraton Four points (formerly Holiday Inn Riverwalk North) was selected as base camp due to its close proximity to Veterans Memorial Plaza, site of the bronze statue titled "Hill 881 South." The Governors Suite at the top of the Sheraton served as the command post and hospitality room where attendees mustered to meet old friends with whom they had served, share poignant memories, and meet the families of fellow veterans.

FRIDAY

Friday evening was spent socializing, having dinner together on the San Antonio Riverwalk and gathering around the statue based on an eyewitness event during the battle by sculptor, painter and writer Austin Deuel. The statue depicts radioman Donald Hossack looking skyward for an evacuation helicopter while rendering aid to fellow Marine PFC James Arthur Randall, who later died of inflicted wounds. Approximately ten feet tall at its highest point, 23 feet long and 12 feet wide, it is the largest of its kind in the country, weighing in at more than ten tons. It was dedicated on November 9, 1986 with General William Westmoreland serving as the keynote speaker.

Several veterans had old photographs, letters, notebooks used in the field, newspaper clippings, etc., that brought back old memories. Joe Cialone brought along topographic maps depicting the locations where Mike Company had been located during its days in Vietnam.

SATURDAY

On Saturday a memorial service was conducted at Veterans Memorial Plaza, located only a short distance from the Sheraton, to honor those who made the ultimate sacrifice during the battle, and recognize those who had participated in it. Over 100 people attended the 30th anniversary service, which was covered by local news media, including three TV stations and the San Antonio Express-News. A Marine Color Guard from the Fourth Reconnaissance Battalion in San Antonio marched to an area behind the speaker podium before the service began. Joe Cialone, who presided over the service, welcomed participants and guests, and then introduced speakers.

The first person introduced was Chaplain LCDR Paul Worley who started the memorial service with a prayer. Chaplain Worley prayed that all of those who had lost their lives in Vietnam be remembered as "true Americans." Near the end he prayed that God "bless our gathering as we celebrate camaraderie that is found only in the fighting force that has been tested and found worthy. We celebrate the spirit of the man, even in the worst times."

The next speaker was Lt. Col. Michael Kachilla, Commanding Officer of the Fourth Reconnaissance Battalion. Lt. Col. Kachilla spoke of today's Marines and their connection with Marines of the past, asking the question, "Is one era of Marines better than another era?" After having met and talking to many Marine combat veterans through the years, he concluded by saying, "And what I want to tell you today is that the Marines of today understand the traditions we are building on of our past Marines. And what the Marines did in Guadalcanal, World War II, Korea and Vietnam, Hill 881, the Marines understand that and they're living up to that tradition. They are ready when called on to do their duty."

Joe Cialone recognized "an old friend of mine, Luis de la Garza, a classmate of mine in Basic School and in college who flew Phantom's, F-4's, in Vietnam. He has been so helpful to us. He is now a lawyer with Valero Energy. He's been so helpful to us in putting this program together. Thanks, Luis."

The person whom most people would agree was responsible for the monument being located in San Antonio, John Baines of San Antonio, was then introduced. John stated that, "approximately fifteen years ago, a very good friend of mine, Bill Stencil, who is here today, and I conceived an idea. And even though I get a lot of credit for this plaza, the idea that the memorial is here, I have to share that will Bill because he was with me when we conceived the idea and was with me throughout the process. And we developed a long-standing good friendship with Austin Deuel, the gentleman who created the memorial that we have here today, "Hill 881 South."

Austin Deuel, former Marine Combat Artist, then came forth and added, "As John was saying, there are a lot of good friends here, and we go way back to the beginning of this thing. And Major Bill, good friend and good Marine, was contacted by actually an Army Captain, who happened to see this small piece that I did for a show I did, called "Vietnam Experiences," in 1981 in Minneapolis. He and John Baines took it to heart and went to work. You can see the final results. I want to tell you that the survivors of this battle have lived with it every day and I'm proud to be with them. It was as horrific of a battle as any Marine company ever fought. And it will live with us until the day we die. I'm glad to be here. Thank you."

Joe Cialone then introduced out of town guests, including veterans of the battle, Ray Calhoun from San Diego, Don Hossack from Montana, and John Colvis from Colorado. Laurie Mitchell came from North Carolina while her mother Paulette Mitchell Freeman traveled from Alabama. Paulette was the wife of 2nd Lt. Joseph Robert "Bussey" Mitchell, Jr., and Laurie was their ten month old daughter at the time of his death on Hill 881 South.

Doug Campbell of a local Vietnam Veterans organization said the following as his concluding remarks, "I cannot speak for Brother Randall or Private Kotik or the rest of the soldiers who didn't come home. But I think if they could, they would say to you, the ones who made it home, thanks and welcome home brothers."

John Colvis and Dave Rogers were then asked to read their poems titled "The Hill Fights," and "Death at My Door" respectively. Both of these poems were published in the Spring 1997 edition of the Khe Sanh Veterans Newsletter, which was dedicated to veterans of "The 1967 Hill Battles."

Joe Cialone announced that the names of persons on the Honor Roll would be read. Dave rogers and Ray Calhoun were selected to read the names of those from M/3/3 and K/3/9 respectively. During the reading of the Honor Roll, Don Hossack and John Colvis transported the wreath from the podium area and placed it in front of the statue title "Hill 881 South." Joe Cialone then asked Chaplain LCDR Paul Worley to close the memorial service with a prayer. After the prayer, a bugler from nearby Fort Sam Houston Army base played taps.

Joe Cialone once again thanked all of those who had attended and helped to make the memorial service a success. Everybody was then invited to attend a reception back at the command post. Several people remained in the area to take pictures, reminisce and talk to others, including news reporters. Later on local veterans and others visited with former members of M/3/3 at the Sheraton. In mid-afternoon, a call was received from MajGen John Admire, USMC, located at Camp Pendleton, CA. The speaker phone was turned on and everybody in the room was able to talk to the General. He had been a former platoon commander and executive officer of Mike Company in 1966 before joining the 3/3 battalion staff in December 1966.

The day was capped by dinner on San Antonio's famous Riverwalk, and one last gathering in the Governor's Suite. It goes without saying that everybody had a wonderful time and is now looking forward to the 40th anniversary!

VA HEALTHCARE ENROLLMENT

Reprinted with permission from the Florida Recon Report Magazine

WHAT IS VA HEALTHCARE ENROLLMENT?

The new VA healthcare enrollment system will provide access for veterans to a comprehensive package of healthcare services tailored to individual needs. Enrollment is the new annual process of accepting veterans for one year of care in the VA healthcare system. Veterans applying for enrollment (see details below), will be assigned by VA to one of the newly established priority groups. VA will send a letter confirming each veteran's enrollment for healthcare according to their assigned priority group.

VA will extend enrollment to every group for which resources are available. The enrollment process began in October 1997 and will be repeated every year.

AM I REQUIRED TO BE ENROLLED?

You must be enrolled to receive healthcare after October 1998 unless you are in one of the following categories:

* You are rated by VA as having a service-connected disability of 50 percent or more
* It has been less than one year since you were discharged from military service for a military determined and rated compensable disability that was incurred or aggravated in the line of duty, and which has not yet been rated by VA
* You are seeking care from VA only for a service-connected disability. VA encourages veterans in the above categories to also apply for enrollment so we can better plan for your healthcare needs.

HOW DO I APPLY FOR ENROLLMENT?

If you have received VA healthcare services after January 1, 1996 you do not need to apply. In this case VA will process an application on your behalf. When your enrollment is confirmed, VA will notify you in writing. Starting in October 1997, all other veterans may apply by contacting the nearest VA healthcare facility. You can apply for enrollment anytime during the year.

HOW LONG WILL I REMAIN ENROLLED?

You will remain enrolled for one year. Your enrollment will be reviewed and renewed each following year depending upon your priority group and available resources. If VA cannot renew your enrollment for another year you will be notified in writing 60 days before your enrollment expires.

The Marine Prayer

Almighty Father, whose command is over all and whose love never fails, make me aware of Thy presence and obedient to Thy will. Keep me true to my best self, guarding me against dishonesty in purpose and deed and helping me to live so that I can face my fellow Marines, my loved ones, and Thee without shame or fear. Protect my family. Give me the will to do the work of a Marine and to accept my share of responsibilities with vigor and enthusiasm. Grant me the courage to be proficient in my daily performance. Keep me loyal and faithful to my superiors and to the duties my Country and the Marine Corps have entrusted to me. Make me considerate of those committed to my leadership. Help me to wear my uniform with dignity and let it remind me daily of the traditions which I must uphold. If I am inclined to doubt, steady my faith; if I am tempted, make me strong to resist; if I should miss the mark, give me the courage to try again. Guide me with the light of truth and grant me the wisdom by which I may understand the answer to my prayer. Amen.

A Message From Your President...

Our 1998 30th Anniversary Reunion at the Crowne Plaza Hotel at 14th & "K" Streets in Washington, D.C. was a well paid tribute to our fallen comrades of all of our armed force veterans of the Khe Sanh Experience, to include the vicious hill fights, the sea and air battles, the courageous "Chopper" pilots and crews, the defenders of the Khe Sanh Combat Base who were constantly striving to avoid the "incoming" while keeping "charlie" from getting through the wire.

Our visit to "The Wall" was as always a somber remembrance of those that were not physically with us. I watched as many reached out their hand to touch the name of a long lost, but obviously not forgotten warrior friend, a reuniting of a soul. All with sorrow, some with unashamed tears, all with dignity and respect. A reflection of togetherness once again for a brief time. Bernice Penn took the initiative to make an appropriate plaque which was laid at "The Wall" in remembrance for those never to be forgotten. A healing session followed; personal remembrances and releasing of pent up emotions. A good healing session.

Bill Jayne took the responsibility of obtaining a permit and a wreath for an appropriate ceremony at the "Tomb of the Unknown Soldier", a tribute to all of those warriors of all wars and conflicts of the past.

Immediately following was a presentation (posthumously) of the Bronze Star Medal to the mother: Mrs. Anna Roble of Lance Corporal Joseph E. Roble, USMC. LCPL Roble was a KIA in Quang-Tri province, Vietnam, while acting as point man as a member of E/2/26. Earl Breeding acted as Master of Ceremonies with the assistance of Vince Griffith. Tom Eichler, Larry McCartney and Mike Worth. Appropriate remarks were made by MajGen Patrick G. Howard, USMC. A full Marine color guard rendered a proper salute. This finely coordinated presentation was primarily due to the dedicated hard working efforts of our fine lady committee member, Lucille Biscaglia.

Our smooth and efficient reunion was due to the arduous hours and efforts of our reunion chairman, Russ Turner, his hard working assistants; Cathy Turner, Mike Worth, our Sgt-at-Arms (Hey you-all over the place guy--Tom Eichler,) our fantastic DC coordinator (permits, schedules, getting our plaque cleaned and replaced, etc) Bill Jayne -- and not to be forgotten, our two fine perpetual motion ladies, Lucille Biscaglia and Bernice "Gunny" Penn. The "BOD" and General Membership give each of you a Standing "O"!!!

Cal Bright was voted in as our new Secretary, Tom Eichler as our Membership Committee Chairman and Bob Reed as a new Member at Large.

Gen. Al Gray (he prefers Al) was our outstanding Guest Speaker. He paid high tribute to the Warriors of the Khe Sanh experience and how those actions would have Marine Corps influence on doctrines and philosophies of the future. He also spoke of current and future threats of terrorism regarding the possible use of chemical and biological warfare here within the United States. Al Gray is truly a "Warfighter", leader and a Marine that remembers.

Russ Turner, our Reunion Chairman for 1999 and his same outstanding committee are way ahead of the game. The General Membership unanimously voted to return to St. Louis (same hotel) next year. Russ already had the contract and had negotiated for the same price plus other "bennies". I signed it before we left DC, so we are on the way.

Vice President Dave "Bulldog" Smith in conjunction with Mike O'Hare and Bill Jayne are working on a plaque for placement at the Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery at St. Louis. If all goes well it will be in place on time.

John Kaheany has volunteered to be Reunion Chairman for the year 2000 - San Diego will be the place!

I would like to particularly thank our Board of Directors and Committee people for all their hard work and successful accomplishments for this past year and for their dignified maturity in getting a job "well done". I would like to thank all of our General Membership for sharing this camaraderie with all of our members regardless of branch of service or units, and too for the proper decorum of all of our members. A proper reflection of dignity for an outfit named "The Khe Sanh Vets".

As an ending note: our thanks to our new Editor, Ray Truelove, a dedicated professional hard worker who is giving us a class "A" publication. Ray Stubbe's Dad has shown considerable improvement - send Ray a note. Semper Fi! Dick Peloquin, President

Reunion Keynote Address of General Alfred M. Gray

EDITOR'S NOTE: Thanks to Ray Stubbe for his transcription of the Generals' banquet night speech. I misplaced my audio copy of the remarks, but with the help of a video - transcribed to audio and then typeset, Ray "saved the day". Thanks! Editor. Places in the copy with (?) indicate the audio could not be made clear as to what was said.

"Thank you for that very kind introduction. It is a distinct honor and privilege to visit you this evening and to have an opportunity to spend some time and chat with some soldiers, sailors, airmen, Marines, who have banded together under the banner of the great Battle of Khe Sanh. But it goes above and beyond that -- a lot of great spirit, and the reason you're here says a great deal that we're still the greatest nation on this planet. (Mentioned a few things concerning the introductory comments).

"What you accomplished during the Battle of Khe Sanh needs to be said one more time. There's some who perhaps are still not healed from their time in Vietnam, and we've heard a little bit about that already this evening: the idea that some of our veterans were not treated as they should have been. But you need to know that all of you, and those who served with you in Vietnam, regardless of service, regardless of what Corps area: American warriors fought with dignity, they fought with honor, they fought with a great deal of courage in a faraway land, they did so much for all of us to be very proud of. They never did loose a skirmish during the war in Vietnam. We came out of there with our head high, as well we should. The war was lost in a geopolitical context. It was, in my judgement, fought in the wrong place. It was not just a 'civil war' as some believe; it was an invasion of the North Vietnamese Army. You and you alone really fully understand how well the North Vietnamese can fight, because that's what was around Khe Sanh when you were there. It wasn't one division, or two divisions, or three regiments' it was four-plus divisions. I know.

"You see, there was another battle of Khe Sanh, in 1967, not as big as the one you participated in, but big enough. And when we did an analysis of that battle, when we looked at the patterns that emerged -- it took three of our months, mainly at night because during the day I got to operate. And when we saw what was beginning to happen in the fall of 1967, a small group of Marines said that there was going to be a real fight at Khe Sanh -- soon. This was interesting because the Third Marine Division said No; General Westmoreland and his J-2, Lieutenant General Phil Davidson, said No; the Central Intelligence Agency said No; the Defense Intelligence Agency said No; the National Security Agency -- the people that monitor communications -- said No. They all said it was going to be at Camp Carroll. We already had two-plus North Vietnamese divisions in and around the Khe Sanh area, between Lang Vei, the Sai Mui Lang (? Spelling) Complex, Dong Voi Mep, or Tiger Tooth Mountain, Hill 1701. And they had used the Northwest Frontier or corridor for infiltration and came down north and south of Co Roc from Techepone. And they had been active there for many years.

"In 1964, when we stumbled in a North Vietnamese Command Post, we were fortunate enough to kill their Commander, and he had the plans on him for that whole region. They had already taken over 44 villages in that northwest corner. And that was in 1964. And the orders said: build so-many punji stakes, do-this, do-that, etcetera. So it was a mix of Viet Cong and North Vietnamese influence.

"So when these two divisions-plus were located within ten to twenty clicks of Khe Sanh, we believed that was serious. And then on Thanksgiving Day of 1967, one of our intercept units picked up a message from a AKA Major (an acronym for the intelligence business) who was the reconnaissance commander of the reconnaissance company with the 29th NVA Regiment -- yet another unit entering the area. And he said -- with his coordinates and the like -- we're down by the river and we have linked-up with the 304th. So we had about four (Divisions). As I mentioned, everyone's still believing that the battle is going to be at Camp Carroll.

"So General Westmoreland sent everybody who was anybody, regardless of rank or anything -- Sergeants, Lieutenants, whatever -- anybody from any service who knew anything about intelligence, and particularly the Ho Chi Minh complex, and they all went to Phu Bai. They argued all day long. And about ten minutes to five on the 27th (of November, 1967) this little group of Marines won the argument. And Colonel Houghton, who was the G-2, the Intelligence Chief of III Marine Amphibious Force at the time, went back to DaNang, went in and saw General Cushman at about ten o'clock in the evening, and that's when he made the decision, really, to reinforce Khe Sanh with four battalions. The argument, though, continued, and there were many thoughts that)?). You had to be very careful not to put too many people out there. (?).

"But we had, at the same time, a large amount of information from Special Operations, from Special Intelligence, from Counter-Intelligence, from Chieu Hoi (North Vietnamese that had returned) and the like. And you may not know this -- I don't think we've every mentioned this -- is this thing being taped? (pause) Well, I'd better slow down a bit. At any rate, we had sources of information from Western Quang Nam that was most believable. And I won't tell you how we did that, but the point being that we knew all about Tet except for the hour. We knew where the (?) where they were going to hit; we knew the whole plan.

"I left on the 8th of January, 1968, when my father passed away suddenly and I went on back to take care of things. I was stunned when I read in the paper that they had any success at all in the Tet Offensive. I understood how they came into the Citadel at Hue; I knew that area very well. But I couldn't believe elsewhere in Vietnam (?). It was, as you know as warriors, a resounding defeat for the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong. More North Vietnamese and Viet Cong leaders alone were killed in I Corps, in the five northern provinces. It was all over. It broke their back. There was no more leadership. And yet we, in our infinite wisdom, turned this tremendous victory into a psychological defeat (?), and as you recall that's about the time when it really turned in the United States and turned the public opinion. So the rest is history. But through all of that, those who were exposed in Khe Sanh -- you and the warriors that you honor this week, your fallen comrades, again, fought with great dignity, with courage, with selfless courage. No war in the long history of our proud country since the Revolution or even before, in the Colonial Wars, no warrior in American history fought with greater courage than you did at Khe Sanh. And I wanted to come here tonight simply to tell you that. (Applause)

"(?) the Corps of Marines and the other services tonight. (?) a little bit more about the future. Your legacy will live on. And the future is very complicated, very uncertain. We as a nation don't deal with uncertainty very well. Our military grew up with a very defined threat called the former Soviet Union, when they could count things; count tanks, count planes, count ships, count battalions; they could quantify the threat. The scientists and the elite Harvard-types like that. Now, you see, we're dealing with uncertainty. Now, for example, you'd be a lot better off if you spent some time on 881-South, or 861, or 950--or like I did, 1701, the one that's not on your map. There was a lot of uncertainty out there then. So, today it's different. Yet our great nation has a huge challenge throughout the world. We don't need to be the world's police officer, but we lead, whether anybody likes it or not; there's no alternative. It has nothing to do with Administrations or anything like that. Every President since the founding of the Republic has committed warriors to different kinds of tasks. That will continue. If you recall the last four years before the Soviet Union went away -- you know as well as anyone (?) to blow up the world, economics, and all that. But even more important, there's many people in this great world of ours, and most of them are like you, they're very good. There's a few that aren't here and there, but most of them are pretty good, and believe it or not, regardless of what the media may portray or not, most of them look up to our great country, and they look up to people like you. Maybe a little like history where they talk about the 'beacon on the hill'. They know what we stand form, and they know in their hearts that we'll help when we can.

"We did a study last summer on the Defense (?) Board. General Krulak -- thinks I'm on active duty, and he's given me all this stuff to do, and one of them is the Defense (?) Board, another's the National Security (?) Board, and a third is the National Reconnaissance (?) -- I could go on and on. But at any rate, last December we did the (?) Threat Study. But we really do have some unique challenges in this uncertain future as we get ready to steam into the next Century. For the first time, Home Land Defense is beginning to be discussed in strategic circles in the Pentagon and elsewhere. We've got a lot of scenarios already, and some of them are pretty gruesome. If you take the most probable threats -- still the high-explosive threat -- what you saw in the World Trade Center and the like -- but if you tie it together in a campaign plan. (?) If you take high explosives and you introduce some chemical threats, and you follow it up by some biological agents -- and they're different: they don't do the same things. At Atlanta, for example, when they found that bomb, they did the right thing: they scattered everybody. That's just the wrong thing to do if it's a delayed biological agent. So we have these challenges. And we have scenarios where they're going to kill half a million people very quickly, make Pearl Harbor look not so bad. How do you educate American people how to (?) with that: that's one of the challenges. We have veterans and we have concerned leaders needing to understand more about these challenges. Your Marines are again in the forefront with the chemical/biological response force which our Commandant, General Krulak, has established. They've already been in many cities around the country, training persons, working with fire departments, working with hospitals, working with the police, providing equipment, etcetera. We also have some (?). There's a lot of activity. Our own Special Operations Command is very deeply involved in a whole host of selective training efforts to help prepare for these kinds of contingencies. And so I predict in the next several years, you're going to see a different civil/military relationship evolve again with much more team work (?) the states, the local and county and other authorities in a different kind of relationship. These are truly challenging times for our leadership because the commitments don't go away, as you know. The (?) doesn't stop at Kosovo or all of that, but all the commitments. Today the American forces are deployed approximately 34%; 25% is the goal in the Navy and Marine Corps, and you're beyond that. And you read about people being stretched thin, and you keep cutting force-structure, which is stupid, because people think technology is going to replace warriors. They're wrong! They got to 'bottom' that thing out! People are more important than ever. And by the way, 'operations other than war,' as they label these type of operations, are manpower-intensive. That's like when one reporter said to me one time: Why worry? Most of this stuff is 'low-intensity conflict'. I said: 'I've never been around 'low-intensity ' violence!' (laughs).

"So the challenges remain, the needs are great. The most important source that we are privileged to have in this great country is that young soldier, airman, sailor, or Marine. And I want to report to you today my own view of just how good they are. Yes, they're over-deployed; yes, they're overtaxed, and yes, they're stretched-thin. But in my view, they have the potential to be as great as any we've ever had, if not greater. They're smart, they're quick, and they get it done. Back at Camp Pendleton about a year ago at one of General Krulak's advanced war fighting experiments called (?), they introduced NT-95. It took the officers about a week; it took the Corporals a morning -- to handle that software. (chuckles). In Quantico, today, you'll find sergeants who are being specially trained and educated on critical thinking. We got Sergeants down there doing things that we wouldn't allow Majors to think about in my time. Great stuff! They got a Ph.D. in psychology who leads this effort, along with General (?-steel) retired and some good, young Captains. This Ph.D. didn't want to deal with Sergeants at first because of the academic; now you can't get him away from them. (?) (Applause) You didn't tell the real story how I made Second Lieutenant, did you? In those day, you recall we had to take two tests to make Staff Sergeant -- a technical test and an operational test. I was in Recon on the Submarine Perch. I passed the operational test, but I failed the technical test miserably, so they made me a Second Lieutenant (laughs and applause). I'm real proud of the young men and women that I see in our Armed Forces in our country and overseas. We need to continue to provide whatever support is necessary to see to it that they're taken care of. They face (?) challenges, but I think when 'push comes to shove' they'll do what has to be done.

"And so, for all of you at this great reunion, thanks again for allowing Jan and I to be privileged to see you and to have the conversations and the like. And for those who are not here -- when you see them from time to time or communicate with them - tell them that Al Gray says they're to hold their head high. Everything that's good about our Armed Forces today is a little bit better because of what all of you and your 2400 colleagues who are not here this evening. And it doesn't do any harm to tell them that one more time. Your fingerprints are all over -- for example, 18th Airborne Corps. They're all over in Amphibious Ready Group VI, that are (?) around the world. They're all over (?). They're certainly all over the basic Corps of Marines.

"We even made an impression on the Air Force. Don't ever sell them short. They did a helluva job in the first battle of Khe Sanh. (Applause). In the first battle, for example, I had just been replaced at Gio Linh, and I was supposed to go back to Third Marine Division Headquarters, and I was supposed to take command of an infantry battalion. And they had me back there for a ceremony. Anyhow, to make a long story short, the Commanding General said, No, you're not going to an infantry battalion. I'm sorry, General Cushman wants you back in DaNang for other kinds of things. So I said, well with that I'll go on R&R. And I went back up to Dong Ha where the 12th Regiment was located, and told them I was going on R&R, and they said, Not yet. We need you to do some AO work again. So we got to fly a number of missions in support of that first battle of Khe Sanh. The Air Force had five layers of tactical aircraft stacked up out there, just waiting to shoot on call. That's the kind of support we got. Then I'm well aware of what they did for the tough fight during your time.

"I don't know how many of you've been back. I know a number of you've been back to Vietnam since, but I think that you can see some good there too. We may not have won the "strategic battle," if you will, but I believe that over time what you tried to do over there will come home in spades. Someday, indeed, they will be free. (Applause). Sorta like Korea in a way. Remember when we came home from Korea, and they said, well, we really didn't win that; you go visit there today and you see the victory there. I believe they will be free. And I'm glad that it was mentioned already a little bit about our South Vietnamese allies and friends. We Marines in particular had great relationship with our South Vietnamese Army colleagues to include the Vietnamese Marines, to include the South Vietnamese Airborne organization which (?) in I Corps many times, to include the Regional Forces and Popular Forces -- those little PFs -- who stood their guard on bridges, trying to protect a hamlet. We shared great days with those warriors, and we shared tough days with those warriors. Some people believe they don't know how to fight. I know better! I was privileged to fight with them. I was privileged to have a Vietnamese regiment under me. One of the toughest warriors I ever saw anywhere in the world was Captain Nhi, the District Chief of Khe Sanh in 1964, who later commanded a regiment, who later commanded a Division during the Dong Ha Offensive of 1972. I am here today because of the courage of three Vietnamese soldiers: one a Lieutenant, graduate of the French military school in Saigon; one a Second Lieutenant Combat Engineer, and one old-timer who in 1962 was a machinegun company commander in the North Vietnamese Army, and he saw through Communism and threw his weapons over to the other side. All three of those warriors are gone now, but I like to remember them in occasions like this. And for me, I can't come to grips with the idea of all this trade, all this, all that, until we do something about our South Vietnamese comrades-in-arms, to see to it that they're getting the kind of treatment-. (Applause).

"Independence Day tends to remind us of something, and you all remind me -- that are here this evening -- that old saying, that as long as we are the country of the brave, we indeed will be the land of the free. So take care of yourselves, take care of each other. God bless all of you." (Applause).

Your 1999 Runion Committee is already hard at work, planning for another great reunion. We're putting together a reunion plan that has all the elements of a successful event and we're hoping for the largest turnout ever. The St. Louis location is great as the area has a little something for everyone. There's everything from breweries (offering samples) & casinos to the milder sports of sightseeing from the "arch", shopping or antiquing and Six Flags theme park and Grant's Farm for the whole family.

The Best Wester, Westport Park has offered us a reasonable nightly rate, and a facility with the best of amenities such as an indoor swimming pool in a beautiful domed atrium, Joe Hanon's (fantastic) Restaurant & Bar with entertainment, and a friendly, accommodating staff to name a few.

The schedule has plenty of free time built in so members will have ample time to spend reuniting and it is an important reunion for a number of reasons. First, Khe Sanh Veteran's will be remembered forever in St. Louis with the dedication of a monument at Jefferson Barracks that is an exact replica of the one in Washington, D.C. "Bulldog" Smith, Bill Jayne & Mike O'Hara have done and impressive job of coordinating this project which is soon to be literally set in stone. And voting members will decide the location for the 2001 reunion, as well as choosing the organizational leaders that will serve into the next century.

With the dedication of this monument, we "REMEMBER" that all who served at Khe Sanh formed a bond that is eternal, while we honor heroes, the families of all Khe Sanh Veterans, as well as the founders of this organization. May this reunion memind us that this is an annual opportunity to renew that bond with our brothers, the families of fallen comrades and say a special thank-you to those who in 1988 re-opened the door. Be there and bring someone with you!

Notes, Poems, Letters to the Editor

Dear Ray:

I wrote the first draft of this poem long ago, in 1972, I think. Obsiously, it's about PTSD, which did not have a name when I first tried to capture this memory.

As I told you on the phone, I was a rifleman with "B" Co., 1/26 and never saw Con Thien. After Vietnam, I was stationed at the MCAS Beaufort, SC base, in MABS 31. my unit was a security detachment comprising, mainly, former grunts just back from Nam with less than a year of service left. A buddy of mine at Beaufort was the model for "Lance Corporal Martin."

Lance Corporal Martin

Bravo Company, One-nine,
4th of July '67,
By signless Con Thien, ground confouded red.

The air cracked and burned,
The road broached sick for breath.
Martin returned to walk the empty trench, to stare.
A hundred lay startled by eternity.

Solitary, the Parris Island EM Club,
A year -- after Tet, after Khe Sanh and Hue City,
Martin poured beer on some sloppy PFC
Fists and curses, fighting to stand before Iron Mike
in the sticky sweetness of a Carolina night,
Mouth brimming blood, Martin howled.

His skin surged in ripples
For the desire to murder the sea.

OWED TO A LANCE CORPORAL

In Loving Memory of
Lance Corporal James W. Heagy, USMC

You, the proverbial tall, dark, and handsome at age 17. Me, the acne faced, chubby romantic at age 15. We were the perfect complement to each other. (We both loved you) I memorized you, your face, your walk, your smile, your voice. Your first effect on me was incredible. You must have wondered how I always happened to be where you were. Radar. (My heart was on your frequency.)

I responded to your voice with utter joy. Moments of bliss when you would say my name. Heart-rush when you would casually call me "Babe." (You called everyone Babe, but my radar tuned that out.)

Baby-face, how I loved to look at that face. No work of art compared to its exquisite form. Not yet spoiled by even a hint of a beard, it was perfect. Love reflected beauty and I was your willing looking glass. (Did you ever catch me staring?)

You had a distinctive swagger-and an attitude to match. It was part of your teenage charm. You were tough-tender and sarcastic-sweet. I never knew which side of you I would meet on the street. (You brought the poet out in me.)

Brown eyes-they were so deep. I think I fell in a couple of times. I managed to read their fluid depths and survive. Barely. They caught me and held me under until I had to catch my breath. (no life preserver needed, thank you.)

Did you touch me hand or did I take a short ride to the stars and back in the space of a moment? You created me with a touch and formed me with your smile. Slow motion, stop action, instant replay. (Personal fantasy now playing...)

King of my dreams, you starred in every one. Directed by me, produced by me, co-starring me. You entered stage right to thrill my soul. Cut. Print. Award winning. You always got the girl. The reviews were superb. (I was the consumate critic)

A nineteen-year-old soldier, you never returned from that long, and sad war and you didn't say goodbye. I cried. Because my prayers couldn't keep you safe and they couldn't bring you back. There was no comfort but a stack of letters in my drawer. (They live there still).

First love, your memory is my delight. I call it to my heart for a gentle dose of youthful longing. To remember the sweetness of its mystery, the innocence of its desire. (I leave out the painful parts)

Sometimes a song, sometimes a place. Your ageless spirit appears in curious response. It warms me when my thoughts are cold. What-might-have-beens arrange themselves in patterns in my mind. A puzzle never solved. (Who held the missing pieces?)

When I see myself reflected in the granite wall behind the etching of your name, I think about how you are now the mirror. Reflecting a woman who remembers her first love.

RoseAnn Opferman

Lieutenant Dick Dworsky could not make it to the reunion in Washington, D.C. Dick received a Bronze Star in January for his Khe Sanh participation (only 30 years late).*

Dick says that everyone who was there deserves this medal.

Dick is in alaska. His fax is 907-349-0965, and phone 907-344-7870. He planned to make this reunion, but at the last minute couldn't. He sends his best to all of you heroes.

Dear Ray:

I recently joined the Khe Sanh veterans (organization) thanks to Ray Stubbe, who not only sent me an application, but also a copy of Red Clay that features the 30th anniversary of the siege.

I served with "G" 2/4 from Oct '68 to March '69. I was WIA March 6, 1969 about 4 clicks south of the Rockpile and med-evaced to Guam Naval Hospital.

The only time I can remember being at and near Khe Sanh was on Hill 471. I remember a company from 1/9 and a company from the Army 1st CAV. We made a lot of contact with NVA in the outlying areas around Hill 471. I can't remember the exact month that we were working around Khe Sanh but it seems like it was December '68 or January 69. Maybe you know more about our unit's involvement around Khe Sanh.

I've enclosed copies of pictures that I thought would interest you and possibly some of our members. Would you please send me Ray Stubbe's address so I can thank him for sending me the application and magazine? I must have thrown away the mailer he sent those items in which had his return address on it.

If you have any spare time in you busy schedule, please drop me a line.

Dear Editor:

Please find enclosed a letter that I would like to have published in "Red Clay".

LETTER:

I I served in 3rd Recon in Vietnam in 1966 and 1967 from DaNang to Khe Sanh. I have been a member of this organization for several years. Through the newsletter, I have been able to locate some of those that I served with. After 30 years I was finally able to go to Minnesota to visit one of my friends, Ed Warmka, who was our Radio Man. I also located another friend, Pete Amancio, in San Diego.

The purpose of my letter is an attempt to locate Earl Cannon, who was wounded in Phu Bai, while on patrol in 1967. He was our Point Man at that time. If there is anyone out there that knows of him or where he can be located, please let me know.

Also, in the Red Clay issue Number 40 (fall 1997), there was a letter from Craig Swanson, and he wrote about a fellow Reconer, Timothy Barmer. I served with Timothy Barmer at Khe Sanh in 1967. We became very good friends at that time. I remember well when I left, he carried my bags to the chopper pad when I was leaving as I had done with my friend Ed Warmka when he left. At that time, he told me it was time for me to go home and I made it, I gave him a big hug and it never crossed my mind that I would never see or hear from him again. I found out about his death, through another Reconer that served in Khe Sanh, Richard Valentine. He told me what happened to Barmer.

I was at work when I read the letter. The letter from Craig Swanson about how Barmer died took me by surprise. I came home and told my family about it. I located Craig and was able to speak to him on the phone and told him that I knew Barmer.

The last time I saw "Timmy" was at the chopper pad and as we lifted out, I remember seeing Khe Sanh fade into the clouds because it was during the monsoon season. I had this feeling that something bad was going to happen there and it did. The letter brought back that memory of the clouds and the feeling that I experienced.

I hope that whoever reads this letter may give me some insight on how to reach Barmer's family. It would be greatly appreciated. I have attempted to call directory assistance in the Conneticut area and there are Barmer's there, but it is possible that the phone number that I may have needed was unlisted.

Dear Mr. Truelove:

My name is Ron Ruther and I served in Alpha Co., during 1967 - 68. I was reading Issue No. 41 (Spring 1998) of Red Clay and took notice in the "In Memory" section of the name of Edward Towslee remembered by Terry Tillery. I was a friend of Ed's and was there the day that he was killed during our assault of Hill 471. I have a picture of Ed and myself taken at Camp Evans by Walter Ostopchek, another good friend who was severely wounded the same day Ed died, and died the next day.

Terry is more than welcome to a copy of this picture of us. She can contact me at 239 Fifth Ave., Greenport, NY 11971 or 1-516-477-0187.

More Mailbag Items

The letter below was originally sent to Dick Peloquin by Ray Stubbe and eventually forwarded to me for publication. Editor.

Dear Dick:

One of our Khe Sanh Vet members, Bill Fry, who has been with us for the past several reunions, traveling all the way from Tahiti, should probably be recognized sometime -- during the dinner, at the annual meeting, or some special place, for his dedicated presence at our reunions, traveling so far, at such an expense. He was present during the Board of Directors meeting in St Louis, he brings much happiness and comradeship.

The special recognition, however, should be for his gift of 500 France ($100.00) as a gift on behalf of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., to a French Colonel, Jack Bonfils, who is a POW from the French Indo-China War of 1952-54, and who is soliciting contributions to rebuild a Catholic Church in North Vietnam at Phu-Oc, that was destroyed in 1968 by the US Air Force. His letter to Col. Bonfils is quoted, in part: "In behalf of the veterans of KHE SANH, I am sending you a cheque of 500FF for the reconstruction of the cathedral of PHU-OC that was destroyed in 1968 by the US Air Force...Our area of operations was principally situated along the 17th parallel which was named "the graveyard"... In July we celebrate the 30th anniversary of the siege of KHE SANH that Giap wanted to make a Dien Bien Phu, he made a mistake. Battalions of Marines under the aggressive leadership of comminding officers Earl Breeding and David Lownds destroyed completely divisions of the North Vietnamese Army in 77 days of siege. We remember KHE SANH as a big victory of the free world against the Stalinist Communists."

Bill took the initiative to do something very positive on behalf of our organization.

He also brought some Khe Sanh T-shirts to one of the three French coffee planters in the Khe Sanh village area, a Monsieur Raymond Simard, whose plantation was on the western edge of Khe Sanh village, opposite the road from the small CAP OSCAR-2 position. Simard had settled there following the first French Indo-China War, and fled the day the base was hit, along with the Poilane family, one of the other planters, whose plantation included the coffee trees on the western part of Khe Sanh Combat Base. Simard resettled in French Polynesia and is a bee-keeper and maker of honey. Anyway, Bill Fry presented Monsieur Simard with our Khe Sanh T-shirts. In a letter he writes, "...this morning we met in Noumea. He had tears in his eyes when he saw the Khe Sanh T-shirt. It really gave him a lot of joy."

Thought you might want to say a few words to thank Bill sometime during the reunion. He is certainly deserving of special recognition.

Dear Editor Truelove:

I am trying to place THEORDORE FOLKERTH, USN at Khe Sanh at the time of the incident (Tet).

At that time the DMZ was about 500 yards north of my position.

The only thing that is sure is that he was USN, possibly a Corpsman or Battalion Surgeon.

Theodore Folkerth is now a Doctor, - a Heart Surgeon here in the San Diego area.

Dr. Folkerth did an excellent 'job' R&R my heart valve. Money will not satisfy my indebtedness to this man.

My only hope is that some of those that he cared for at KHE SANH might want to establish contact with him.

GREETINGS to the heroes of Khe Sanh. I am a former Lt. in the US Marine Corps (1977-81) and I am the nephew of Chaplain Brett who died in the line of duty on Feb. 22, 1968 while serving with 2/26. On September 11, 1998 Chaplain Brett was reinterned in Arlington Cemetery with full military honors. The Navy and Marine Corps also announced that the Chaplain's School in Newport Rhode Island will be named in his honor. A dedication ceremony is scheduled for the summer of 1999. I would like those Marines who knew him to attend. Please contact me (next column).

PLAYBOY FOUND!

Dear Ray:

My sincere thanks go to Neil McCrossen for his story "I'm Proud To Be A Khe Sanh Veteran", and his acknowledgement that he had read one of my "Vintage" Playboy magazines. See Pg 12, Issue #42, Red Clay.

To refresh your readers memory, I was the former War Correspondent (1965-66) that returned home and became emotionally drawn into Khe Sanh siege and your struggle for survival while viewing it on TV.

Each night I would sit there watching TV, feeling so helpless - then one evening I decided, well, maybe I could bring you some reading and viewing pleasure from home.

I had collected and saved twenty of my favorite Playboy magazines from their earliest day of publication when I was younger, and one evening I boxed them all up and sent them off to you - all 20 of them!

Its probably silly, but through the years I have often thought about you guys, those magazines and wondered if you'd ever received them....or even had the opportunity to enjoy them. And then, along came Neil Mc Crossen's story. Thanks Neil! I really needed that, and thanks guys for Khe Sanh.

Khe Sanh Memories

By Anthony C. Borja, Jr.
(Cpl. UMSC # 2312219)

Khe Sanh Memories was originally written to aid my daughter, Elizabeth, in preparing her IB Extended Essay for her senior year classes. Her essay dealt with the comparisons and differences of the siege of Dien Bien Bien Phu (1954) and Khe Sanh (1968)

I joined the Marine Corps in June, 1966 prior to graduating from high school. I did my basic training at MCRD Parris Island, S.C. (August to September 1966). After ITR (Infantry Training), I attended Basic Radio School at Norfolk, Va. and following radio school, I was then assigned to the 1st LAAMB (light Antiaircraft Missile Battalion) at MCAS, Yuma, Arizona. It was there at Yuma, in October of 1967 when I volunteered for duty in Vietnam.

I was assigned to the 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment, 3rd Marine Division (1/9) as a headquarters radio operator with H&S Company, Radio Platoon after arriving in Vietnam on 12/07/67. 1/9 was then on a rest break at Camp Evans about 20 miles west of Hue/Phu Bai on the infamous Route 1 corridor, known as the "Street of No Joy", made famous by Bernard Fall, who was killed in 1966 with 1/9 in that same area.

1/9 was a well known Marine unit with the nickname "The Walking Dead", with a reputation and history of hard fighting with heavy casualties. About three months before my arrival, Bravo (B) Company had been decimated by a NVA regiment while on operation Buffalo, just west of the Con Thien combat base. 1/9 suffered 25-40% casualty rate with "B" Company being almost wiped out.

This set the stage - a hard fighting unit and me - a FNG. Although being a FNG, I was assigned to Bravo Co - the real hard-luck outfit - for my combat seasoning as a company battalion radio operator.

In mid-January 1968, I volunteered to act as the battalion radio operator for a platoon sized patrol that was to recon some 10 clicks (kilometers) west of the base for signs of NVA movement. There were bucoo (much) signs of small sized units moving east towards Hue. We took a number under long range artillery fire with unknown results.

It was also on this patrol that I had my first brush with death and saw my first casualties. I was almost killed by none other than another Marine's stupidity. This Marine chose to ignore the warning of a Kit Carson Scout, a former VC/NVA, who advised that we should climb over a large thorn tree that blocked a trail. This Marine chose to follow the new path around the thorny obstacle and stepped on a 105mm artillery round booby trap. By doing so, he blew himself to pieces and one other Marine behind him. I was merely blown back a dozen feet and splattered with their blood and gore. WELCOME TO NAM!!

After the dead were evacuated by helicopter, we got an urgent radio dispatch to abort the remainder of the patrol and to quickly proceed to the highway at a specific location for immediate truck transport back to Camp Evans. The dead flew; the living humped and trucked out.

When the platoon arrived at Evans, the battalion area was in utter chaos with men rushing about, loading and unloading gear. The battalion was "mounting out" to some unknown place where there was big trouble.

Bib CH-53's (long range heavy transport helicopter) were flying into Evans empty, and then flying out platoon sized (40-50) Marines. I just had enough time to grab what gear I had left in the tent area and hook up with the Bravo command group, which was boarding a chopper. I had no idea where we were bound for and there was too much noise to talk to anyone to find out - if they even knew. The company command group boarded the bird and when it took off, it headed west. What seemed like hours but turned out to be only an hour and half, the chopper began to orbit a rather large combat base perimeter with long green metal plated airstrip. The place looked like it had been pounded to pieces.

I still didn't know where we were. There were air strikes going on all around the base and our arty was firing outgoing. Through all this activity, 53's were dropping off loads of 1/9 Marines.

It was close to dusk around 1800-1900 hours when we unloaded from the chopper. As we did so, the skipper said, "Welcome to Khe Sanh, men!!!" our first inkling of our location, which was followed by our humping by a sign saying "Khe Sanh -- Home of the 26th Marines".

I had heard of Khe Sanh while in book camp--The Hill Fights for 881 and 861 and the infamous "M-16 Rifle Fiasco".

1/9 headed down the main road past the 26th Marines CP to what appeared to be an ammo dump, which had been hit and blown up the previous day. I do not recall the exact date, either January 21st or 22nd, 1968 -- the books indicate 1/9 landed on the 22nd. That night, I fell asleep to the sounds of air strikes and out-going artillery fire, using a dud 105mm round as a pillow.

Our first morning at Khe Sanh was chilly and foggy. Around 0600 hours we awoke to the sounds of silence -- no air or artillery. The battalion began to form up and proceeded back up the road towards the northwest -- heading for a gray colored hill, which stood out from the soon to be famous or infamous "red Khe Sanh mud", our new home known to us and the world as "The Rick Quarry".

Marines gathered off to the sides of the road looked at us like we were men from Mars and would ask our unit/s number. With pride, the reply would be "f...g 1/9" to which we'd hear "The Walking Dead" or some would add, "Just what we need!! 1/9!!!".

Our long column came to a barbed wire gate. Once out of the gate, there was just the road which went straight toward a grove of trees and a section of road which bore down a grade and up a hill that appeared flat on top with two excavation areas cut into the east side of the hill.

"A" Co. proceeded toward the grove of trees -- "D" and "B" Co's began to head toward the hill. Delta peeled off to the right side of the hill and Bravo to the left. The battalion command group and H&S Co headed for the top level cut off and myself and the Bravo command group to the lower cutoff -- a very intricate military ballet.

By the time the fog lifted, each company had hooked up and 1/9's first day of the "Siege of Khe Sanh" had begun -- an understrength rifle battalion minus one rifle company, Charilie Co. Our perimeter had to be built from scratch on virgin ground and under enemy observation and fire. We never even hooked up with the main base perimeter or the 26th Marines.

My first foxhole home at Khe Sanh was dug into the side of the lower excavation cut and was just like a cubbyhole with no overhead cover. My area was just about ten meters from the company CP and near the soon-to-be battalion aid station.

The first day was to be uneventful and for some reason, the NVA left us alone and did not bring our rudimentary perimeter under any artillery or mortar fire.

This all changed on the second or third day. I was assigned a work detail at the first level cut off, which was being used as a staging/supply area and the battalion CP was being dug into the hillside. This area was shielded from NVA observation positions located to the west at Co Roc Mountain in Laos (a black colored massive with numerous NVA artillery positions in caves) and from "Rocket Valley" located northwest of Hills 861 and 881 (an area full of 122 & 152mm artillery and 120 & 140mm rocket positions).

There were twenty six of us from various units within the battalion assigned to move boxes of ammo and food around. We were into our first hour of work in the heat (80's). Without warning, our morning became deadly, for a 82mm mortar round (mortars have a high trajectory and could easily reach us) landed in our midst. I heard the explosion and then lost consciousness. When I came to, my eyes came upon a ghastly sight -- Marines all over the area lying in pools of blood or worse. With my head aching and ears still ringing from the concussion, I yelled for a corpsman and rushed to the nearest wounded Marine.

Within minutes all the dead and wounded were being attended and it was time to get back to the boring job of moving boxes -- myself and three others were left to complete the task. The others were either KIA or WIA. WELCOME TO KHE SANH, MAC!!!

There was a small position designated "Alpha Outpost", a platoon-sized outpost about 300 meters northwest of 1/9's perimeter. About ten days after our arrival, a NVA battalion attacked this position around 0400 hours. Half of the outpost was overrun almost immediately. Those remaining Marines began to fight back and continued to hold.

Usually the fog would burn off around 1000 to 1100 hours. On this particular morning the Lord was with the Corps. The fog burned away early, around 0800 to 0830 hours. The NVA were now fully exposed to our perimeter's direct fire, tank, recoilless rifle and small arms fire. Artillery fire could now be directly called in for the attacking NVA could be seen.

We could see without the use of binoculars the actual fighting which now was mostly a grenade battle. Due to baseball experience and more effective grenades, the Marines were more accurate and were able to hold their own, despite being outnumbered.

The NVA were now hemmed in for A-4 Skyhawks began to saturate their staging areas with napalm and other bombs, and their escape routes were under direct fire from artillery. The NVA began to withdraw into a large ravine which could only be hit by mortar fires' high trajectories. The jets were too fast for accurate bombing, so ARVN A-1 Spads, prop-driven WWII fighter bombers, were called in. These South Vietnamese pilots were great with 90% of their ordnance dropping in on the ravine.

Using this support, A and C Companies struck the NVA still on the hill, driving them off and relieving the outpost.

I ate my c-rat breakfast and watched the "war movie" in real life. 300 to 400 NVA were killed - 20+ Marines were killed and 30+ wounded, most of the casualties suffered by the outpost's platoon. The A company 14 (TAC) man won the Medal of Honor for bravery in this action. After the siege, I was made the NCOIC of TAC Party, serving with "Dying Delta" company from late March to mid December 1968 as 14 Delta (my radio call sign).

By this time, the NVA knew that 1/9 now occupied the "Quarry" and began to direct various forms of fire, artillery, rocket, mortar and recoilless rifle on our perimeter. 1/9 would also catch the numerous "short" rounds that were meant for the main base.

On February 13th, in the early afternoon, I was on radio watch at the Bravo CP when I heard the roar of a 140mm rocket (we had been at Khe Sanh long enough to be able to tell the caliber of rounds by their sound). All of a sudden, the rocket struck the dirt wall near me. I saw and heard the explosion. Instinctively, I ducked and was knocked out. After gaining me senses back, the company radio frequency was going crazy with the platoons checking in. From the rest of the company area, it appeared that the CP had taken a direct hit. I assured all that the CP was secure. The company commander came running up for he had been out checking the lines. He looked at me and then said, "You've been hit and it looks bad." I then felt a stream of blood roll into my eyes and then nothing.

When I awoke, I found myself in the battalion aid station, with a corpsman looking down at me holding bloody bandages in his hands. I received a number of stitches to an 8" inch laceration across the very top and middle of my skull. My right hand, which had been on the parapet, was covered with cuts as a result of shrapnel, rocks and dirt. After the corpsman finished, I had a reverse Mohawk -- a bald strip with bandaids covering the wound. My right hand was bandaged up with my middle and trigger fingers exposed, thus enabling me to use a radio mike and my rifle. Due to my injuries, I was transferred back to H&S company, radio platoon where I began to work at the battalion command post.

Three days later, Khe Sanh was hit by close to 1400 rounds over a 24 hour period -- most of these rounds struck the base and the Quarry in a two hour period in the early afternoon. I was at the time on a work detail digging trenches with a black Marine from Washington, D.C., whom I called "DC" and he called me, "MD". We communed with the ants as the rounds pounded our perimeter area for 10 to 15 minutes and then switched to the main base. We had front row seats and watched the NVA artillery at Co Roc Mountain and from "Rocket Valley" pound the main base. (DC, I never knew his real name, was killed a week or two later by a direct hit from a mortar round while he sat on watch in the Bravo Company trench lines.)

Now for a few details of my daily life at Khe Sanh. My days consisted of four hours on radio watch with eight hours off. My duty hours were mid-watch, 1000-0400 and mid-day, 1200-1600. The alleged off-time was usually spent on work detail - digging an interior trench system for what I called "Our Last Stand", digging the tunnel system for the battalion command post or filling in countless thousands of sandbags for bunkers and when those details were done, what time left over was mine and I usually napped, wrote home and read.

My new home was in the middle of the Last Stand area and consisted of a 6-foot long and deep ditch about 4 feet wide, covered with a 4-layer sandbag roof and then a couple feet of dirt over the sandbags with a piece of nylon parachute for a door. There was a small circular porch area that was 3 feet deep rimmed with sandbags for sitting and resting stuff. This was my living/dining/rec room where I would write and read letters and any other fun stuff.

Some of the other Marines dug complex multi-leveled bunkers and tunnels. Some went down 20 feet. One friend died in his multi-level hole for an NVA round landed in the first level and buried him. He was dead long before we could reach him.

Fun consisted of shooting the breeze with the guys in the next bunker that had a large blast wall facing Rocket Valley, affectionately known as "The Whiskey A-Go-Go". Behind this six foot high rickety wall, we would heat up our c-rats, which varied from very lousy to poor. We'd listen to AFVN Radio -- Chris Noel, a gorgeous blonde -- and listen to the latest tunes from the "World" or to Radio Hanoi (Hanoi Hannah). She would regularly advise us of our "deaths". She had 1/9 wiped out at least twice during the siege. We'd get a good laugh or two. Most of the time, we'd talk about girls, food, girls, real food and home and how we would love to be back in the World.

As the siege grew longer and as time slowly passed, we began to get annoyed and frustrated about being "surrounded" and being pounded with no real opportunity to hit back. We began to discuss what would happen if and when the NVA would try to take our perimeter. Our Marine "esprit de corps" then kicked into full blast.

Though we complained and griped about the Corps, the Crotch, we were basically volunteers, either forced to join to avoid the draft or jail or joined freely -- like I had. We were Marines, members of the "Green Machine". We'd definitely kick some NVA ass before they got us. Our DI's would have been proud of us.

We grew sick of the newspaper articles and what our families feared that Khe Sanh was about to fall to hordes of NVA. We would have loved to have seen one of those hordes so a 5.56mm round could be placed between their running lights. It was also implied that our morale was low as were our spirits. I can't speak for the 26th, but the men of 1/9 were mad and ready for a good knock down fight.

It was also rumored in the press that we feared our South Vietnamese unit at the FOB (Forward Operating Base -- CIA, SOG area), the 37th ARVN Rangers, more than the enemy. True, this unit was of an unknown quality but after the NVA attacked their section of the perimeter and their butts handed to them, the 37th became accepted.

The newspapers were full of articles comparing our position with the French at Dien Bien Phu of 1954. I was the only one who had read anything about the French debacle. True, as at Dien Bien Phu, Khe Sanh was at the outermost region, deep in the mountains; we were never left unsupplied or unsupported. Supply choppers, C-130's and the like came in regularly either dropping supplies via parachute or LAPES at the airstrip. We never went hungry or thirsty and mail came in regularly. We all were much appreciative of the efforts and sacrifice of those guys and pilots of the supply units.

At Dien Bien Phu, the French artillery was nullified and eliminated by that of the Viet Minh. The 13th Marines of the 5th Marine Division were excellent. No matter how heavy the NVA fire, 1/13 and its tubes put out rounds day in and day out.

The biggest and main difference supportwise for us, that comforted us was our overwhelming abundance and availability of tactical and strategic air support from Marine, Navy and Air Force commands. The French never had the quantity or quality of air support that we Marines had. While on radio watch, I would listen to the 14 freq and the Marines would have almost an instantaneous response. A flight of one to four aircraft from A-1's, A-4's, F-105's, F-4's to B-52's would roll in and pound the NVA.

I can recall that on several occasions the ground rolling and shaking from and "Arc Lite" (B-52 strike) within 3 to 4000 meters of our positions - normally the B-52's would have a danger limit of 10,000 to 12,000 meters. I recall watching a perfect Arc Lite go up and down the Hill 689 ridgeline.

Our air support, both tactical and supply, paid a price. I observed a F-4 shot out of the skies as it made runs on a NVA position southeast of the airstrip below Hill 1015. It made a number of passes parallel to our perimeter; it had that deep throaty roar unique to the F-4. As it made its last pass, its' engines began to sound like that of an overloaded washing machine, full of metal. The pilot did two great things then. He headed the aircraft away from our positions and when he ejected, he did so that he landed just 100 meters short of the northern perimeter wire. His disabled aircraft crashed and exploded on top of the NVA position. CONT'D NEXT PAGE

A C-130 provided us with one of the biggest scares in March, 1968, comparable to the Lang Vei tanks in the wire incident. A C-130 was dropping pallets of supplies at the drop zone. Nothing unusual until puffs of exploding shells began to follow it, - antiaircraft fire. We could hear the AA gun, a 37mm, and we could observe the plumes of the concealed battery, firing some 2000 meters away to the south-southwest, from out western lines. The 14 and 24 (artillery) knocked it out within minutes. We were shocked and in awe over the NVA's ability to place and conceal such a weapon so close to our lines. Another sign that our enemy were hard-core, tenacious soldiers that we could hate for their predilection to disfigure our dead, and yet respect for their bravery and other soldierly abilities.

Another aspect used to compare Dien Bien Phu to Khe Sanh was that the military units deployed were elite troops -- the French employed elite airborne units, French, Foreign Legion and Vietnamese -- Khe Sanh, the United States Marines and the 37th ARVN Rangers. Yes; a similarity did exist but not really. At Dien Bien Phu, those elite units only made up to 30-40% of the total force. Intermingled with these units were French Colonial troops, Algerians, Thais, Moroccan, Somalian and Sengalese. All of these "native" troops came from French colonies, many of which were demanding their independence or already in open revolt. The Viet Minh used this to their advantage from a propaganda standpoint. As the siege grew in length and the Viet Minh artillery began to lay waste to their positions, whole units of native troops, companies to whole battalions, would desert, leaving gaps in the French lines that purely French units would have to fill.

At Khe Sanh, our "native" troops were small, specialized units of the U.S. Army, Navy and Air Force -- fellow Americans. The 6,000 man force, other than the 600 man ARVN 37th Rangers, were one homogenous unit and nationality -- American, but most importantly, United States Marines with the history, tradition, and I must admit one hell of an ego, to boot.

We were of a one mind set -- MARINE!!! We were the first to fight, and during the Vietnam War, we did the "mostest with the leastest". Our supply system was inadequate and our equipment antiquated; our helicopter support was inadequate, but the best. Some of our leaders were still waging World War II.

Despite all of that, Marines were assigned the roughest area in Vietnam to handle -- Corps -- the DMZ to Chu Lai, Leatherneck Square to Da Nang -- 86,000 Marines covering all of the northernmost provinces of South Vietnam, facing the nonexistent NVA, VC Main Force units and your part time VC guerillas.

The Corps had done the job well, although outnumbered by enemy forces. It takes 5 men to support 1 infantryman, therefore only 18,000 Marine Grunts faced the enemy and handled the manning of many combat bases, the sweeps, the patrols and the daily combat.

Marines are trained to be aggressive assault troop, s and to be stuck, tied down to a defensive position under orders to remain tight to the perimeter was against our grain -- not of the Marine spirit. We were eager for a knock down brawl with out tormentors -- a chance to strike back.

Working in the battalion command center, known as the COC had it distinct advantages. There, one was able to hear and see firsthand what was going on all around the area, thus gaining a look at the larger picture. When Hills 861 and 881 were heavily assaulted, I was on watch and remained at same, so the CO could be kept up to date without any hassles. 1/26 did one hell of a job that day and night -- one could step outside the COC, the "Cave", and watch the battle flashes through the clouds and fog.

Earlier in my narrative, I mentioned that 1/9 had to construct its perimeter from scratch. Just before 1/9's part in Operation Pegasus, I was privileged to see photos of the Rock Quarry before and then the present. The battalion had built and dug miles of trenches, numerous bunkers, and had encircled our perimeter with miles of barbed / concertina wire. I don't recall if these aerial photographs have ever been published. They are probably still in the USMC Archives. I also had the opportunity to observe and plot the ever encroaching NVA trench system -- again, a tactic straight out of General Giap's Dien Bien Phu strategy book -- some within 300 meters from Delta Company's western lines. "Dying Delta" lost its respected and dynamic commander on a trench raid that he led. Once or twice a week we'd hit the most advanced trenches, kill all the NVA and fill in the trench. They would be back that night digging.

In reference to the question of relief versus withdrawal, I never heard of any active plans for a "Chosin Reservoir" style of withdrawal. We did not hear much about relief plans until the middle of March, when 1/9 was advised of Operation Pegasus.

The 1/9's role in the relief plan called for 1/9 to assault Hill 471, which overlooked Khe Sanh village and the Lang Vei Special Forces Camp. The Corps, in its infinite wisdom decided to relieve our battalion commander just before the assault. LtCol "Blackjack" Cahill, a Korean War Navy Cross winner, took over and two days later, 1/9 began its phase of the operation.

Prior to jumping off, I gave my Yashica 35mm camera, along with over a dozen rolls of exposed film (pictures taken from day one) to a friend, who was a "Remington Raider" -- Cont'd NxtPg a rear area clerk typist who had brought up some papers/files for the CO's signature. He was going back to the safety of the battalion rear, now at Dong Ha. I had just discovered that I had been assigned to be LtCol Cahill's radioman; the Colonel had talked to me saying we'd be in the thick of things and that I would be expected to stick to him like glue. He said when he stuck his right hand out, the radio mike should be there. Anticipating some heavy fighting, I gave my friend the camera with the many rolls of film. The photos would have been fantastic -- B-52 raids, the F-4 incident, views of the main base being shelled, my home and my friends. Unfortunately, I forgot he was at Khe Sanh. I found out much later that he was killed by a direct hit while at the airstrip waiting for a flight out. So much for my ideas of safety and security.

On April 4, 1968, at 0500 hours, 1/9 with Bravo Co. left to hold the Quarry went on the offensive on a cold, foggy morning. In the dark, we quietly slipped out and headed toward Hill 471 using the fog and dark to shield our advance.

The landscape was unreal--Khe Sanh, being up in the mountains, got quite cold in the winter monsoon season. The temperatures dropped down to the 40's and 50's at night. The fog would roll in in the early AM and with the moon backlighting the fog, an unearthly scene was developed. Add to this the area was carpeted with bomb craters that a small home could sink into for added flavor, add the sickly smell of death -- bodies of NVA dead exposed or buried.

When we reached the first ridgeline a few hours later, the fog lifted. We were now fully exposed to NVA observers. Within minutes of the fog lifting we came under fire from two sides. We were receiving artillery and rocket fire and could actually see the plumes of smoke from a battery of 122mm mortars as NVA gunners began to drop round after round into their tubes. The gunners walked the rounds down the saddle, then up our side of the ridge and then all over the CP group.

I watched the explosions as they crept up the saddle and up towards us. Since we did not have time to dig in, we had no place to hide. The next think I knew was hearing an explosion and then I was airborne, then I crashed to the ground. I had flown some 20 fee down the hillside. There was the smell of cordite, smoke and dirt in the air, plus the sounds of more impacting rounds, a regular Dante's Inferno.

The Colonel was nearby bleeding from a wound to his right hand. I placed a field wrapping on his hand. He said he was okay and told me to get the PRC-25 (radio), which was not on my back. I returned to the radio and found that the 14 ALO (Air Liaison Officer) was dead and his radioman wounded -- both the 24 (arty) the FO (Forward Observer) and his radioman were also wounded.

The 24 radioman was a friend, for we had spent many hours in the COC on radio watch together. His name was "Chico" Gonzalez and he was a "short-timer" and he wore a raggedy flak jacket with a drawing of Snoopy on the back which he used as a calendar, coloring in portions as his time in country grew shorter -- Snoopy was almost fully colored.

Chico was on his back, gasping for air and crying out in Spanish for his mom. I went to his left side and began to check for injuries, none were visible. I rested his head on my lap and as I did, he gave me a look that I can't describe and mumbled something in Spanish. His body convulsed and shuddered. He then died as I held him. I remember feeling so helpless and afraid; I had never been so close to death. I put his head down on his radio and pack. A corpsman ran up and I shook my head. I then grabbed my weapon, helmet and radio pack and went back to work.

All during this time, the 122mm mortar battery was still throwing round after round down their tubes, still walking the rounds up and down the saddle and all over us. I then heard and saw two explosions go off over the enemy position which was then followed by the sounds of numerous smaller detonations, similar to that of a string of firecrackers. I had just observed one of the first uses of a new artillery round aptly called "firecracker". The rounds were designed to explode 20-30 feet above the ground, thus releasing a large number of bomblets, which hit the ground, bounced 6 feet high and then explode. The 122mm mortars position was destroyed by two firecracker rounds.

After the 122's were eliminated, Alpha Co. conducted a two platoon frontal assault up the east side of Hill 471. Fifteen minutes later, Hill 471 was in Marine hands.

It was later determined that the battalion had been hit by some 400 rounds but somehow our casualties, despite our lack of cover, were extremely light - 5 dead and 20 wounded. Alpha's losses in the assault were light as well.

I was not feeling too well; my ears were still ringing and my head felt like it was going to explode. The Colonel decided to go over to 471 and another radio operator accompanied him. After digging a two-man foxhole, the corpsman gave me two Darvon and told me to get some sleep. I still had to finish my radio watch and had the sad duty of notifying Regiment of Alpha's discovery of an American body, one of the Special Forces troopers that had tried to escape and evade from the Lang Vei Special Forces camp when it fell to the NVA, using tanks.

Around 0200-0300 hours, I was awakened by the sounds of mortar, artillery and small arms fire. The NVA wanted 471 back and hit the Marines there with a battalion. Alpha Co. held, killing almost 200 NVA in the process with the aid of our organic mortars and the 13th Marines. Alpha lost 1 KIA and had only a couple wounded.

We remained on site for a couple of days. During this time, the only helicopters observed were 1st Air Cav birds. On April 7th, a battalion from the 1st Air Cav relieved 1/9.

The differences in supply, gear and equipment were quite evident. The number of Huey and Chinook (CH-47) choppers and gunships used in the US Army's movement were unbelievable. The soldiers looked fresh, clean and healthy. Compared to them, we looked old and filthy -- pure raggedy assed Marines. Despite their obviously better situation, all they did was complain.

1/9's battalion command group was one of the last Marine units to be relieved. A young Army trooper, carrying a new PRC-25 with a speaker, fresh and clean, walked up to me and said that the Army sucked. When I asked him why, he complained that their unit had not been supplied with "hot chow" for a couple of days. I was amazed and asked what he meant by " hot chow" -- he said regular food from a mess hall. He looked at me in amazement when I told him that our unit had not had regular food for four months. We Marines had been on c-rats for the entire siege.

Still bewildered, he then asked if our birds were enroute to lift us to our next objective. I told him no, we were going to hump to Hill 689 and I then pointed to the cloud-covered ridge some six klicks away. Once again he was shocked to hear that plus were expected to be there in the next few hours. I told him he had it too easy. Minutes later, I waved goodbye and three hours later, the command group was on Hill 689 with the rest of the battalion.

There was a large bomb crater; the 14 radio operator, an American Indian nicknamed "Chief", another radio operator and I used as a ready-made foxhole. We were lounging and enjoying the break when I suddenly got that "itch" , an urge to move -- something bad was going to happen.

I obeyed that kind of feeling, so I climbed up the side of the crater and sat down along its rim. The two down below said I was crazy and remained in the crater.

As I yelled down, the whooshing sounds of two 82mm mortars could be heard from the west. I flattened myself and then heard the sounds of incoming rounds. There was silence followed by the sounds of exploding rounds. The bomb crater was filled with smoke and a cloud of dust.

As the dust and smoke cleared, I slid back down into the crater to discover that an 82 round had hit almost directly in the center of the crater. The shrapnel flew up at such an angle as to catch both Chief and the other radio operator in the head area. The other radioman was headless and at first glance, Chief appeared to be unhurt-but he was not.

As I crawled over to him, I could see him gasping for air and then I noticed that the right side of his head was bloody with the brain fully exposed. I immediately slapped on his field dressing and yelled out for a corpsman. I recall hearing similar calls going out all around the area.

Chief then grabbed my hand and asked if he was going to die - his last coherent words. His grip was unbelievably strong, like that of a vise. He then began to mumble in Spanish.

It seemed like hours later when a corpsman slid down into the crater. He took one look and shook his head. He then began to leave, but I yelled at him. He told me my buddy was dying. I said I did care but that he was going to help my buddy or die. I prefaced that with my M-16 pointed at his head. The corpsman knew I meant business. He gave me some dressings and a shot of morphine for my buddy. He then patted me on the back and told me to stay with him saying that he would be back later with more help.

For the next forty five minutes, I sat by him as he talked nonsense, crying and mumbling. I placed dressing after dressing on his wound as the brains began to slowly ooze out.

During this time, the tubes continued to keep up a steady one to two round cadence. Our artillery whooshed over our heads, seeking the elusive tubes to no avail for they continued.

Chief, despite his horrendous injury, was still alive, holding my hand and mumbling. I soon ran out of dressings, but after what seemed like hours, the corpsman showed up as did some other Marines.

Using ponchos, they loaded up the one dead Marine, then we loaded up Chief and manhandled him up the steep side of the crater. We carried the two for about 100 meters to an awaiting CH-46.

Chief was still hanging in there. The corpsman had to pry his hand from mine -- I neither had the strength to do it, nor the heart. He looked up at me and I at him; he was then loaded up with the other wounded and dead.

As the chopper flew off, I just stood there, looking at the bird fly off towards the base. The corpsman shook me and helped me back to my gear.

SSgt Mac, the radio platoon Sergeant, a person I couldn't stand because of his use of favoritism, ran up to me and told me to snap out of it and get back to work. He then asked me if Chief would make it - to which I replied no. He slapped me on the back and said the only kind words he ever said to me - "Tony, don't let it get you down. Get back to your job--communicate!!!!!". To which I replied in true Marine fashion, "Aye Aye, Sir!!!!" I then got my radio pack and followed him. The remainder of the day was a blur. I do not recall when the mortars stopped or whatever occurred after that chopper leaving.

We later got the word that Chief died on arrival at Charlie Med at Khe Sanh combat base. It is unbelievably what damage the human body can endure and suffer. I have seen Marines and NVA still alive despite horrible and horrendous injuries. Yet, I have seen others with minor wounds die. It is only one's desire and spirit to survive that really counts.

Remember back near the beginning, I mentioned the "Whiskey A-Go-Go" bunker with its six foot high, two layered sandbag blast wall. My first "itching" incident occurred there sometime in early March, 1968.

I was enjoying some off time during the day by "airing out" my feet, cleaning my rifle and writing some letters on a warm afternoon on my foxhole's veranda.

While sitting on the parapet with my back to Rocket Valley, I began to fidget and felt a terrible urge to move -- an itching feeling. Although I hated being behind that rickety blast wall, I specifically moved to that location, carrying my boots and writing materials with me.

No sooner after sitting down, I heard the screaming sound of an incoming mortar round and then the sound of an explosion. The next thing that occurred was the damn blast wall tumbled down on top of me.

After hearing the explosion, my friends rushed out of their bunker's safe confines and ran over to my hole -- all they saw was a smoking, dust-covered hole where my veranda was. They knew I had been outside on the veranda, so they thought I had been blown to pieces. I heard them, so I began yelling and cursing for I was being crushed by the weight of the sandbags. They got me out and were shocked to find me alive and especially when I told them why I had moved.

A mortar round had landed directly in the middle of my veranda. I lost everything I had left out to include my M-16 rifle. Since my "authorized" weapon was a .45cal pistol, not a rifle, I had picked up my weapon from a KIA. I had to do the same to replace the destroyed one.

Based on these two incidents and others during my tour of duty, I follow my instincts, and when I get the ominous itch, I go with the flow, even today, as I work the streets of Montgomery County as a police officer.

The battalion remained on the 689 ridgeline and began running company-sized sweeps in all directions. Alpha company began a sweep to a ridgeline west of our positions. It walked right into a "U" shaped bunker system. The NVA had turned the area into a meat-grinder with Marines as the meat.

The Colonel took two more companies in a vain attempt to retrieve our dead and wounded from the fire swept ground. they ran into another mutually supported bunker system. The fight went on for hours. The Colonel was almost relieved from command for he refused to leave our dead and wounded -- a Marine tradition.

We were forced to leave our people behind. All through the night, we were forced to listen to our wounded asking for help.

The next evening an Army hunter-killer chopper team consisting of Hueys and Cobra gunships came up on our 14 frequency and said they would like to try and pick up any survivors. Their teamwork, dedication and guts resulted in the rescue and safe pickup of one Marine left in the kill zone.

Like hawks, these choppers would swoop down and blast the area with machinegun, 40mm grenades and rockets and make an attempt at landing near one of the few living wounded exposed in the killing zone. This went on for a few minutes as the choppers came in from various directions. Suddenly one Huey landed with a crewman jumping out and picking up a wounded Marine. This lucky Marine was the only survivor of thirty three men left behind.

It was about this time that the battalion received the word that the 26th Marines were being relieved by the 1st Marines. There was no word of 1/9 being relieved. We were stuck on the 689 ridgeline just a click away from our "shame" -- our dead.

Most importantly, we heard through the grapevine that the Khe Sanh combat base was going to be abandoned. This came as an utter shock to me and my comrades. I felt as if MACV had kicked me in the teeth. We all said inwardly and outwardly, "Why?" Why had we gone through all this anguish, pain and torment just to have the "BRASS" kiss it all off, especially since the official word came down a few days later after the Alpha company debacle -- an extremely costly sacrifice -- all for naught.

1/9 remained on the 689 ridgeline for three weeks after the 26th Marines were evacuated. We of 1/9 felt like a bastard child, lost and forgotten by headquarters. Our morale was very low. Our ambush MIA's were retrieved by 3/1, after we were gone -- a month after we left.

During this time, I was assigned as the radioman for the battalion Executive Officer. The major was an older, morose Marine, who had been passed over for Lieutenant Colonel. His attitude stunk and all around him felt his ire -- especially me. He was never satisfied. I hated him and he knew and made me pay.

Finally, in early May, we got the word, we were being relieved. We were airlifted by choppers to Leatherneck Square, C-5 and C-3 fire bases, south of Con Thien. It was there I was promoted to Corporal and made the NCOIC of TAC Party.

This brings my tale of Khe Sanh to an end. There are other incidents that happened, but this is enough for now. Some of my story proved to be very easy to write; other incidents proved to be very painful to "re-live" as I wrote about them even after twenty seven years. All I have written about I can still see clearly and vividly in my mind -- the smells, sounds and feelings.

Semper Fidelis!

TOP SECRET UMBRA
TOP SECRET TRINE
TOP SECRET SAVIN
TOP SECRET SPOKE

There are documents that bear security classifications far above "Top Secret." (In the past, these have always been blacked-out by declassifiers). Recently a batch of documents were declassified by the National Security Agency bearing these original classifications dealing with Khe Sanh and Tet. They reinforce comments made at the last reunion by General Alfred M. Gray concerning the crucial importance of SIGINT (signal intelligence) at Khe Sanh. We probably would not be alive today were it not for the work of these men intercepting NVA radio broadcasts and analysing them! As a result, Khe Sanh was reinforced. One can only wonder what would have happened to those at Khe Sanh had not more reinforcements arrived!

The Generals, knowing by November, 1967, that the NVA were about to wage a major offensive around the end of January, 1968, has assumed Camp Carroll to be the target. At a gathering of Generals and intelligence staffs and technicians, the technicians from SIGINT convinced the Generals that the main target would be Khe Sanh.

General Starbird (Head of DCPG, Defense Communications Planning Group, a CIA-funded component of the Department of Defense formed to develop electronic sensors as part of the "McNamara Line") visited Hill 881-South on 9 November 1967. By this time a small detachment from the III MAF 1st Radio Co. had erected a small tent near the western edge of the LZ, and inside was a lone Marine with the loop RDF [radio direction finder], yelling—but not heard above the noise of the choppers on the LZ—"you're really not supposed to be here, Sir!" The General and Captain Bruce Greene, CO of B/1/26, walked to the northern edge of the LZ and the General pointed omniously to the north. The next day, Marine Corps Birthday, Colonel Lownds addressed the Marines on that hill with the even more ominous words, "You all will soon be in the American history books."

On 13 Dec 1967, reinforcement of Khe Sanh began with the arrival of 3/26. Reinforcement could not progress too quickly lest the NVA be aware we knew their intentions. Accordingly, 2/26 didn't arrive until 17 January.

In the meantime, knowing Khe Sanh would be hit, the first phase of Operation NIAGARA was launched on 5 January. (Operation NIAGARA was to be a saturation by B-52s of the area around Khe Sanh set to commence, interestingly, on 21 January, and Phase I, beginning 5 Jan, was for target-selection). The Operation was approved by the American Ambassador to Laos (Sullivan) on 16 Jan and by CINCPAC on 17 Jan. On 10 Jan 68, CIA concluded Khe Sanh was to be the target of a major NVA attack. On 12 Jan, Gen Westmoreland requested JCS declassify COFRAM munitions [Controlled Fragmentation, also known as "Firecracker"] for use in non-populated areas of I Corps (i.e., Khe Sanh). On 13 Jan, a portion of the ammunition dump was relocated. On 14 Jan, III MAF was directed to review the plans for support of Lang Vei should be be attacked. On 16 Jan, ASRAT BRAVO arrived at Khe Sanh. On 18 Jan, Gen Westmoreland diverted electronic sensors to the Khe Sanh area (from their intended Ho Chi Minh Trail targets); they were seeded at Khe Sanh on 20 Jan. On 21 Jan, the base was hit—as all of us who were there will never forget!

The documents recently released by NSA bring the following to light:

A SECRET SPOKE document states: "Preparations for the Tet Offensive of 1968 got underway in some areas of South Vietnam during October 1967, about the time that the Communists were preparing for more pointed activity in three widely separated areas of the country—Khe Sanh..Dak To..and areas of Military Region 10.

In a SECRET SAVIN report of 25 Jan 68, NSA reported: "During the past week, SIGINT has provided evidence of a coordinated attack to occur in the near future in several areas of South Vietnam...Many of these messages have referred to an impending 'N-Day' (the Vietnamese equivalent of 'D-Day')...SIGINT has revealed a major buildup of PAVN forces in the vicinity of Khe Sanh...Since October, an influx and massing of PAVN units in the Khe Sanh-Laos border area has been evidenced."

The following are from Daily Tactical SIGINT Summaries from the NSA (National Security Agency), All TOP SECRET TRINE. A developing and impending threat to Khe Sanh is reflected by introduction of new infantry units ("terminals"), by splitting of divisions, by "resubordination" of divisions and regimentsw under a new Khe Sanh Front Headquarters to coordinate units of the 304 and 325C Divisions, radio silence during movement, units were alerted to adhere strictly to established communications regulations, etc.

"The first indications of the deployment by the ..NVA Div was in late Oct67. This was evidenced by the loss in comms of the possible..Bn on 30 Oct 67 and two terminals of regimental echelon on 31 Oct and 10 Nov..At this time the use of a broadcast suggested that the..Div was deploying in radio silence. Facility HQS located 12 Dec at XD6992 maintains light communications with the following five subordinates...During Oct a split occured in the Div HQS, which in communications appeared as a new terminal simply replacing the 'old' Div HQS terminal...Since 10 Dec 67 eight separate radio terminals have been located by ARDF [Aerial Radio Direction Finding] in a rectangle bordered by the fol coordinates: XD4060, XD7060, XD4020, and XD7020...In summary the present known immediate threat to the Khe Sanh Combat Base consists of the regt loc vic XD6325 on 28 Oct 67, the regt loc within meters of XD657288 on 10 Dec 67, two U/I poss regt sized units subord to .. Div loc within 1500 meters XD 419468 and within 2500 meters of XD425467 on 11 Dec 67 and one U/I poss regt size unit of unk subordination within 4500 meters XD540495 on 13 Dec 67."

"During the past week, SIGINT has revealed a concentration of PAVN radio terminals immediately west of Khe Sanh—in the vicinity of the Laotian-Qujang Tri Province border."

"DRV communications DMZ area: the Major PAVN Headquarters in Laos, just northwest of Khe Sanh, has been identified as a Front Headquarters.

"Traffic-passing communications serving the new major PAVN Headquarters northwest of Khe Sanh have been isolated in SIGINT. Since at least 18 January, this headquarters—last located on 27 January at XD 498674—has been noted in traffic passing communications with three unidentified subordinagtes. One of the subordinates, located at XD 714422 on 28 January, also communicates with the DMZ Front. The two other subordinates were located at XD 631276 on 28 January and XD 638490 on 26 January. In addition, since at least 25 December 1967, communications have been noted between this new major PAVN headquarters and the PAVN..Division and the DMZ Front were last observed on 31 December thus reflecting the resubordination of the divison to the new major PAVN headquarters."

"Identification of the major PAVN headquarters northwest of Khe Sanh as a Front Headquarters—arbitrarily designated the Khe Sanh Area Front—highlighted SIGINT in the DMZ area during the past week."

During 16-23 March, 1968, the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board sent investigators to Vietnam to determine the causes of an "intelligence failure" which allegedly occurred. A TOP SECRET TRINE report notes: "As early as 10 January, General Westmoreland had canceled certain planned operations in northern III CTZ in order to reposition US forces nearer to Saigon. In subsequent days he issued a series of warnings to his commanders, and to the US Mission, that the enemy was preparing to attack...The urgency felt in Saigon was not, however, fully felt in Washington in the immediate pre-attack period. As a result, finished intelligence disseminated in Washington did not contain the atmosphere or crisis present in Saigon...atmosphere is not readily passed over a teletype circuit. Although senior officials in Washington received warnings in the period 25-30 January, they did not receive the full sense of immediacy and intensity which was present in Saigon...General Cushman stated that he expected to be attacked during Tet, and enemy activities in northern I CTZ had prompted higher authority to cancel the Tet truce in I CTZ."

A TOP SECRET UMBRA interview: "In March 1968..when the President's Board came over to Saigon to investigate and look into the Tet Offensive, they asked him what were the shortcomings in intelligence just prior to and during the TET Offensive. General WEYAND told them that he didn't really know what they were referring to as a shortcoming or shortage of intelligence...LTG Weyand did use SIGINT and was a terrific tactician. Needless to say, today he is a four-star General and now COMUSMACV."

SIGINT is as old as World War I. Interception of Russian messages containing the tactical plans of their field forces contributed to the German victory at the Battle of Tannenberg in 1914. On another occasion during World War I, the Brittish sent decoy messages causing a German zeppelin enroute to Africa to return to Germany.

During World War II, the Germans used both airborne and ground radio direction finding equipment to track down partisan forces in occupied areas such as Norway. The French apparently used some form of this technique during their struggle in Vietnam. A captured VC document called for radio discipline to counter detection techniques such as the French had used against them. In 1961, the Army experimented with Aerial Radio Direction Finding in Vietnam and by 1 Jan 66 had 15 aircraft to satisfy a weekly requirement of 240 hours of coverage of enemy operations, using on the "aural null" technique: when an enemy signal is detected, the pilot maneuvers his aircraft until he obtains an aural null (he hears nothing on that aircraft heading). The aural null means that the aircraft is heading directly toward or away from the enemy transmitter. The aircraft's heading can be plotted as a line of position (LOP). The crew repeats this aural null procedure until several widely spread LOPs are obtained. The LOPs cross at a common point, or fix, which is the location of the enemy transmitter.

An improved equipment later introduced, the AN/ALR-34, obtained the Phase Angle Discrimination (PAD), angle measurements on an incoming radio signal, in one second. This equipment established the direction of the enemy signal and, as a result of computing through a complex process, the time of arrival of the target signal at the three antennas on the aircraft wings and nose. By late 1966, the C-47 was equipped with ARDF with side angle calibration, which made it possible to fix enemy transmitters in any direction without turning the aircraft, reducing the possibility of compromise and enabling a fix in only short bursts. The AN/ALR-34 locks on the target, and then the Doppler data on the position of the aircraft and the C-12 compass (giving an instant readout of aircraft heading within a tenth of a degree), are integrated and displayed on paper tape—all in a process taking less than one second after a lock-on.

So significant was the work of EC-47s and their ARDF during the Siege battle at Khe Sanh that 90% of the total B-52 strikes were targetted through ARDF data.

Brigadier General George J. Keegan, Jr., Director of Intelligence of 7th Air Force (and later Director of the Defense Intelligence Agency), wrote: "On 21 January 1968, MACV had become so overextended in the ground war, that Gen Westmoreland assigned General Momyer a principal role in the defense of Khe Sanh...To meet this problem, General Keegan interrupted all his normal functions at 7AF to mobilize an intelligence exploitation effort....The Air Force thoroughly reconnoitered I Corps using special sensors plus ARDF data supplied by Army analysts. The reconniassance effort produced 2000 targets around Khe Sanh...The result of all this was that the Air Force showed it could do 'in two weeks what had not been done in two years.'...The experience at Khe Sanh, where 7AF integragted all sources of intelligence with a massive targetting program, showed how much more influence the Air Force could have on the conduct of the ground operations."

By 29 January, the I Corps TOC [Tactical Operations Center] sent URS ["Usually Reliable Sources", i.e., SIGINT] in their SPARS Reports listing 32 FRED locations, two FRED locations changed to Regimental CPs, and four FRED locations to read FRANK. (Although "FRED" and "FRANK" are not otherwise interpreted, it is easy to assume "FRED" stands for "Foreign Radio Emission Detected" and "FRANK" "Foreign Radio Analysis Not Known" since FREDs are changed to FRANKS, not vice versa, and also changed to read REGT CP or BN CP or DIV CP].

The 8th Radio Research Field Station at Phu Bai (USM-808), the largest intercept site in Southeast Asia, controlled 30 mobile units known as Direct Support Units (DSU), was a detachment of Marines from 1st Radio Battalion, located on the Combat Base and, at least before the Siege, in a small tent just off the LZ on Hill 881-South.

Of course, it's always possible to set up transmitters in remote hills someplace and transmit, making it appear as though the lone transmitter is actually a headquarters. In a memo of 27 Feb 68, David Y. McMahis, White House Liaison Officer of the National Security Agency, prepared a report for Mr. Bromily Smith who, in turn, sent it to Mr. Walt Rostow with the note: "Here is the evidence on which NSA bases its conclusion that the North Vietnamese are not 'spoofing' us with their communications."

Vietnamese deep inside the massive bunkers of FOB-3 translated NVA radio traffic. In some cases, this provided instant targetting, as, for example, when one excited voice said, "Our headquarters is being hit by rockets from a helicopter!" All that was required was to determine where the helicopter was then firing to determine the location of the headquarters!

In another instance, it was determined that General Giap himself might be present at the Khe Sanh Front Headquarters, and that location was immediately targetted with numerous B-52 strikes. Since the area consists of numerous caves set inside spires of stone, NVA radio broadcasts resumed after only a few hours; the headquarters had not been destroyed.

It is to these Marines—and to the Air Force and Army personnel involved in the SIGINT business of listening in on NVA broadcasts, transcribing them and translating them, fixing their locations, determining the chain of command by determining who reports to whom ("pattern analysis")—it is to these that all of us owe a very big THANK YOU! I doubt we'd be here were it not for your efforts!

NUCLEAR WEAPONS AT KHE SANH

The following is an excerpt from The History of the Joint Chiefs of Staff: The Joint Chiefs of Staff and the War in Vietnam, 1960-1968 (Part III, 1967-1968), pages 48-25 and 48-26:

"The possibility of using nuclear weapons at Khe Sanh, to retrieve the situation if it should become desperate, had already been considered. On 1 February 1968 General Wheeler asked the advice of COMUSMACV and CINCPAC about the advisability of doing so, though he considered it unlikely that the necessity would arise. Two days later he informed General Westmoreland that the President had made it clear that he did not wish to be placed in a position in which he would have to decide whether to use nuclear weapons.

Gen Westmoreland thought it unlikely that such weapons would be needed, but that if the situation in the DMZ area should change 'dramatically,' the United States should be prepared to introduce 'weapons of greater effectiveness against massed forces'—either tactical nuclear weapons or chemical agents. Admiral Sharp reported that contingency plans for using nuclear devices were being prepared at Okinawa, though he did not expect them to be required. General Wheeler directed that these plans not be forwarded to Washington until the Joint Chiefs of Staff asked for them or until a critical situation should make it necessary (in CINCPAC's opinion) that they be considered by the Joint Chiefs.

When the President heard that these plans were in preparation, he ordered them discontinued. Already there had been speculation on the subject in the news media, and he wished to make certain that allegations by the opposition would have no foundation. Accordingly, by direction of CINCPAC, this planning program (FRACTURE JAW) was at once terminated."

The late LtGen Phillip B. Davidson, General Westmoreland's J-2 (Intelligence Officer) during 1968, wrote in his book that President Johnson leaked news of the possibility of use of nuclear weapons at Khe Sanh to the press on 9 Feb. The furor this raised forced the president to instruct Gen Wheeler to tell Gen Westmoreland to suspend all planning immediately. Mention of the possibility of nuclear weapons must have aroused in General Giap a great fear since the Americans were proposing use of atomic bombs in 1954 to break his encirclement of Dien Bien Phu. [See 1954 JCS Study by ADM Radford in the Pentagon Papers]. Davidson feels that Giap's fears may have been accurate since the loss of Khe Sanh "..would have sparked within the United States a political and psychological explosion of massive proportions. President Johnson knew this, and for this reason in early 1968 the fate of Khe Sanh became and remained his primary concern." The situation at Khe Sanh was ideal for employment of nuclear weapons—remote and free of noncombatants with pinpointed enemy targets. To add to fears, if the United States used nuclear weapons at Khe Sanh, the door would be opened to use them at choke points along the Ho Chi Minh Trail as well as dikes along the Red River. The date of 9 February is significant, Davidson argues, because during 10-12 February, he decided not to overrun Khe Sanh and dispatched a regiment from Khe Sanh to reinforce Hue while, simultaneously introducing a new artillery unit in the Co Roc area to harass the Marines with large caliber artillery.

THE ONE-TIME PAD

Lawrence T. Cooper arrived in Vietnam in March, 1967, contracted malaria, and was released from the hospital in November, 67. His roommate was SP5 William McMurray. When a new radio operator was needed for the new Lang Vei camp, McMurray volunteered, having been at Lang Vei twice previously. Cooper was on watch when Lang Vei was attacked by tanks. "Their callsign was 'SPUNKY HANSON' and their Morse Code callsign was '5NNP.' We were 'INDIA CHARLIE ZERO CHARLIE,' 'BOLO BOB CAT'." The next afternoon, Cooper boarded a helicopter with SgtMaj Harvin D. Hodge as a reaction force of several helicopters to rescue those still in Lang Vei.

"Sergeant-Major Hodge and my Team Sergeant, Leland M. Harris, had both served with the 187th Airborne in Korea. Colonel Schungel had been an enlistedman in the Philippines; he was highly decorated. When we got back to Fort Bragg a year later, he had a big party at his house for all the guys of Company "C" and Lang Vei, and I remember going to his house and Sergeant-Major Hodge yelling at me, telling me to get a haircut! Hodge—he was the most unbelievable soldier in the world. He and my Team Sergeant had both received a Silver Star because they had made the night jump in the Pusan Perimeter to relieve the 1st Cavalry Division that had been surrounded by the Chinese. The Division was overrun and they were bayonetted and left for dead, and had crawled to an aid station, got in an ambulance, and as the ambulance was taking them to the rear, the Chinese overran their position again, and they were shooting Chinese and North Koreans out of the back door of the ambulance—with IVs in their arms! These people were unbelievable."

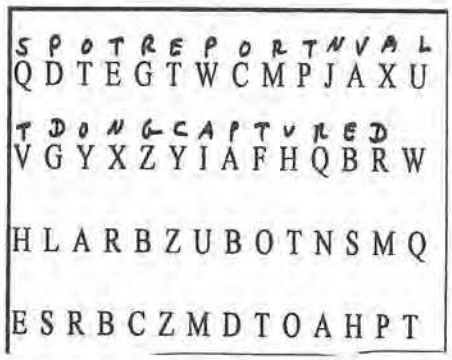
By the time they arrived, Maj Quamo's reaction force had already rescued the Lang Vei survivors, and Cooper landed at the FOB-3 compound. In his rucksack were a large quantity of "One-Time Pads." Cooper remained at FOB-3 for a few days to augment the lines. He had no flak vest and, on 12 Feb, received multiple shrapnel wounds in his back. "What really protected me was a PRC-25 on my back. It totally destroyed the radio, and of course it blew my pants off—literally—it must of been from a rocket. The flash of it blew my pants off—the back of my legs, the backs of my arms, blew the helmet down over my face, and burned all the hair off the back of my neck, and all the hair off my butt too. All that was left was the shreds of material to my pants in the front of my pants! I was a helluva-looking mess!" [Very fortunately, he was not facing the blast!]

Upon evacuation he soon discovered his wounds were to be the least of his problems! "The Lieutenant Communications Officer there at DaNang came over to see me after I got off the USS REPOSE and there was some big damn investigation on what happened to those one-time pads. "I said: I was at Khe Sanh. They cared less about the fact that I was wounded—it was those one-time pads! I thought they were going to court-martial me. I had stitches in my back and everything and they're worried about those damn one-time pads!"

The one-time pad, first used by the German diplomatic service in the early 1920's, is the only code that is unbreakable. There are two—and only two—identical pads of pages of letters on easily-destroyed paper. Each page contains random letters, for example:

Q D T E G T W C M P J A X U

Above these letters, one writes a message, for example:



Using a "trigraph", the communicator looks at S + Q to arrive at the code letter, ""R". Likewise, "P" + "D" = "H". The communicator receiving the coded message then takes his one-time pad, and combines the first coded letter, "R" with "Q" to arrive at "S", and thus reverses the process. (The "trigraph" is to the right).

Amazingly, most Special Forces communicators didn't need to consult such a "trigraph," but had memorized all the possible combinations of letters. This may not be as difficult as it might seem; all one need do is memorize a list of 126 three-letter combinations (see below):

MEMORIZE THESE

Five minutes daily spent studying these combinations will pay dividends in the time saved in encoding and decoding.

The foregoing account on "one-time pads" not only reflects the outstanding mental capabilities of communicators who would, as a matter of course, write the plain-text message on the pad and then, without consulting anything, send a coded message in Morse Code using the above system, but also presents an interesting possibility for those who wish to toy with such encoding today. While not really secure, if the sender and receiver have the same edition of a book, using every third or fourth letter could serve as a "one-time pad."

THE BUNKER

Editor's Note:

The heart of this magazine is "The Bunker," a section for sharing—as we once did in the bunker at night or during incoming. This is the place to share stories, poems, letters, memories, and react to what has been sent in by others to this section. Red Clay is only as good as your inputs to this section.

Please remember that this magazine is read by dependents, that it is sent to schools, and therefore the "dialect" known as "salty" (or any offensive expressions that put-down others, other services, other nationalities, races, national origins, religions, and purely political statements), are not appropriate, and will be expunged.

While the opinions of those who make written contributions to our magazine are those of the writer and not those of Khe Sanh Vets, Inc., it is suggested in the very strongest of terms that great care be taken to avoid any criticism of any individual by name or reference by which he could be identified. We have all suffered enough! Sure, some mistakes may have been made, and sure, we may still carry bitter memories caused by one person or another. Maybe someone was a big hunk of gluteus maximus! We may never know why they acted as they did—perhaps they knew more or something different, perhaps they "didn't know", perhaps they "snapped" due to overwhelming problems they were unable to make sense of or deal with, perhaps we just "read" them all wrong. We are getting much older now, and we only have a few more years left of life in which we still have the opportunity to say "Thank You," or express our gratitude, our caring, our appreciation, our enjoyment of another brother—or family member or other friend, for that matter.

Recently, one of our Khe Sanh vets wrote to take issue with another vet's criticism of two other Khe Sanh vets, writing how admired they really were. In one case, a SSgt Mac was a dedicated and competent career Marine who was later seriously wounded at Camp Carroll, losing a leg and his career. The other person mentioned, a battalion Executive Officer, was a dedicated Marine who was respected by both his peers and subordinates. In the future, if something is submitted that contains words critical of another Khe Sanh vet that can be identified, this will simply be deleted by the editor and will not be printed in our magazine.

Our magazine is an opportunity to relate stories of what happened so that people and what we lived through is not forgotten, and perhaps what we write will also help someone else make contact with their feelings, promote healing, as well as put things in a larger context, and heal unresolved memories. The Native Americans used sand-painting, the Norsemen used sagas, other warriors told stories around a camp fire: in other words, the best way to deal with hurt, pain, and especially memories of combat, is through artistic expression—telling stories, writing poems, songs, painting, perhaps even dance.

Such sharing can have profound consequences: one suddenly locates the one who literally saved him! One discovers so-and-so really didn't die! One hears that someone else also knew our buddy and friend.

Another starts to make contact with a memory long forgotten but which has controlled life and emotional outbursts. One of our Khe Sanh vets tells of his return from Vietnam. He was home, in a family gathering, and told of how he lived in the large trench that those in recon made. (Recon took over 80% casualties during the siege, sandwiched between the airstrip and the regimental CP, prime targets for incoming, and therefore built a very large trench, even containing what the French call a "pissoire." During shelling, a Marine jumped into this trench and just at the last minute saw the buried 55-gallon drum used as the "pissoire" and fortunately was able to spread his legs!). He was telling of "life in the trench under shelling." All at once his old uncle, who was a veteran of World War I and had never talked about his experiences, suddenly started to talk of World War I trench warfare experiences he had. Telling our stories have that effect: they open the frozen sea of ice within us so that flowing waters emerge to satisfy the thirst of others.

We all express our deep appreciation to Mr. Ray Truelove for his very competent and dedicated work as our Editor for the last two issues of our magazine. After the last reunion, he suffered a death in his immediate family, was informed he possibly had cancer, and was struck by lightning destroying his computer files. He had just received an award for the best newspaper in the Vietnam Veterans of America organization, and felt he was unable to continue as our Editor. He gave all his work to our organization gratis, free. We wish him our best and thank him for his work on our behalf.

I have temporarily inherited the work of editing this magazine as a result of an anxious phonecall from our President to get out a magazine before our next reunion. As all of you know, even-though I am the Founder of this organization, it has been my continual desire and action to avoid positions of influence and leadership, and so I view this as only a temporary position on my part. We have received an indication from one of our members who is an expert on type-setting and layout that he, following some major surgery he will receive, will pick up the job as Editor.

Unless otherwise noted, all writings in this magazine are by Ray W. Stubbe and are his personal opinions.—Ray W. Stubbe, Temporary Ed.

KHE SANH REUNION

By Steve Riddle
(H&S Co., 1/26, Scouts/Snipers)

Memories evoked from so long ago are Mirrored in the knowing eyes and crows feet of fellow Marines who survived.
We laugh at recalled wacko situations
And tease one another with understood
Love and affection.
Invariably, a name will be attached
To an event.
A Marine, friend, son, husband, went down
His buddy was with him when he died.
We listen and nod and shiver then tears flow.
God, there just wasn't time back then,
For such moments.
Recalled pain and fear and sorrow diminishes me.
It's a blade thrust into my soul
Instead of flowing blood
It is bright red anguish...
It was never forgotten.
It was simply locked away.

DESCENT INTO THE CATACOMBS

By Chaplain William R. Hampton
(Chaplain of 3/26 during the Siege)

They descended the dirt stairway quietly and cautiously, taking great care not to be noticed. They were not an impressive group by typical standards. Their appearance was that of a group of laborers coming in after a hard day's work, with dirty clothes and dirty bodies. One thing did stand out however, and that was their youthfulness.

Only about a dozen could gather at one time in the underground cave-like chapel. Their surroundings were starkly simple and earthy—a makeshift table, a plate of bread, a cup of wine, worshippers and a leader. The atmosphere couldn't help but remind one of the stable-cave in which the Son of God became human flesh. And now in this small, underground assembly, he promised to be present again with his glorified humanity, under the forms of bread and wine.

A young man was called out of the group and presented himself before the table. On his forehead the leader signed a cross, the symbol of his new loyalty. Using the phrases of the Creed of the Apostles, the leader asked him questions about his faith. The young man answered with a serious "I believe!" The signs of emotion were obvious. The young man knelt, and while the leader applied water and spoke the baptismal words, the concussion of a great explosion above ground shook loose some of the dirt wall. The worship continued with the Prayer of Thanksgiving and the newest member of the sacred body of Christ joined the others as they came to the table to receive the Holy Sacrament. The leader gave the final blessing and the worshippers began to file out one at a time, with a deliberate time interval between each person's leaving.

Another celebration of the Holy Eucharist had brought the peace, joy and strength of the forgiving love of God into the lives of that community. For not knowing what lay in the future, they were now prepared to face another period of days.

Although this could almost be the story of a group of Christians worshipping in the catacombs so long ago, it is the story of a group of Marines meeting to celebrate the Eucharist at Khe Sanh.

THANK YOU

A 'ThankYou' for the Khe Sanh 'experience'; when I need to reflect back to help keep my life's priorities and values in order.

AMERICAN BEAUTY DELTA

This letter is really intended for a CPT Harlan E. "Rip" Van Winkle, who wrote the continuation to the piece entitled "Hill 471" on pp. 22-25 of your Spring [1998, No. 41] issue.

On page 24, CPT Van Winkle describes the battle in vivid terms, and the work of a USMC FAC, callsign: AMERICAN BEAUTY DELTA, who helped sort out the good guys from the bad, and lend a little fire support in the process.

Well, CPT Van Winkle, this is AMERICAN BEAUTY DELTA checking in loud and clear!! After 30 years I never expected to hear those words again (God, how I hated that callsign!), but I looked in my flight log for that incident, and there it was.

Like all of the Marine FACs, I was equipped with two VHF and one UHF radio to be able to simultaneously work artillery, naval gunfire, and tactical aircraft. This happened frequently over on the coast where we had a lot of ships at our disposal.

A little history: I had just returned from Thailand, where I had been flying with the HILLSBORO crews on another assignment. Immediately upon my return, I was sent to Khe Sanh, to augment LtCol Hennelly's FSCC. Since I had been working in the Dong Ha FSCC, and flying every day, the assignment fit nicely.

At Khe Sanh, I arranged for my Dong Ha pilots to come out on a rotational basis, and we tried to fly about 8 hours a day. I had the luxury of working as an FSCO with Harry Baig, Jerry Hudson, and Kent Steen at night, then seeking out our targets and hitting them with the Khe Sanh artillery and air strikes during the day.

On Hill 471 that day from my position, it looked like the NVA were nose to nose with the Army folks, and I had little to discriminate except the color of the uniforms, but once I got someone to throw some smoke at the NVA, or pop a panel, I could sort things out a little better. I now have a better understanding how close they were to each other. We were always reluctant to use napalm in Danger Close missions, but obviously you talked me into it.

I do not recall, nor does my logbook support my working any Air Force planes, but since I usually called the Dong Ha and Khe Sanh DASC for help, they sent me anybody who was loitering within their area of control, which could have been USMC and/or USAF aircraft.

This I remember vividly: I was so concerned with the fate of the engaged Americans, that I went over to the FOB/SOG bunker and inquired about them as soon as I landed. My old memory is hazy, but I think I either talked to one of the men from the patrol or some other officer. I wrote up my pilot, 1/Lt Pete Kreuger, for bravery that day, but never knew what happened to it.

Thank you for bringing back the memories. I mourn the good men you lost, but I am glad you made it.

[NOTE: Since the time of writing of this letter, we have lost track of the whereabouts of Col Jim Stanton. It would mean very much to Rip Van Winkle, Lee Dunlap, and the entire patrol involved in that Hill 471 patrol if they could locate him, to express their gratitude and also welcome him into their renewed fellowship. Does anybody know the current whereabouts of COL Jim Stanton?]

I have seen very little published regarding ASRT "Bravo" and its accomplishments at Khe Sanh. As a former Marine officer, I have never taken the opportunity to write and to share the ASRT's contribution in protecting that beleaguered base during the siege of 1968. Perhaps the following brief synopsis would be of interest to some of your readers.

Lieutenants Tim Allen (OIC), Howie Thompson, and myself were assigned to oversee the deployment of our ASRT from Chu Lai to Khe Sanh on or about January 15, 1968. In addition to the three above mentioned officers, our team was composed of approximately sixteen enlisted Marines. Without the competence, loyalty, courage, and dedication of these Marines, our ASRT could have never accomplished its mission. That mission, simply stated, was to provide high altitude, radar controlled, voice vectored air support to all units around Khe Sanh, specifically the 26th Marines and other 3rd Marine Division units. Except for close coordination (sharing of targets, enemy troop movements, etc.), we were not involved with the B-52 strikes (arclights) and other low altitude close air support.

"Bravo" was physically located on the western edge of the perimeter adjacent to the four deuce mortar battery and just north of the original ammo dump. Our system was operational at Khe Sanh on January 21. From that day until I departed around March 15..the system was operational almost continually on a twenty-four hour basis. That is a miracle in itself considering the almost constant enemy rocket, mortar, and artillery bombardment. (Especially after the ammo dump was hit!).

After looking back in my original controller's log, I found some interesting figures. I'm sure that both Lt. Allen and Lt. Thompson's logs would reveal similar notations. From January 21 to March 15, I dropped over 3500 tons of ordinance and controlled over 1,300 voice vectored bombing missions. On the average, we were completing a sortie every 10-15 minutes. (A sortie being positive radar lock on the aircraft, initial attack heading, time over target, all ordinance expended, etc.) In one eight-hour stretch on February 18, I directed 38 sorties and expended 166 tons of ordinance. (Note: This was eleven days after Lang Vei had been overrun). When one considers that these missions were done on a twenty-four hour basis, that translates to tremendous fire power. In addition and after the air strip was destroyed, we did several low altitude radar controlled parachute re-supply missions for the base.

Our busiest twenty-four hour period was 450 tons expended with 100 sorties run. Due to the critical and precise nature of our missions, it was not unusual for us to drop within 300-500 yards of friendly forces. We got regular feedback from aircraft, reconnaissance units, etc., as to the accuracy and effectiveness of our bombing. During the month of February alone, we had 2500 confirmed NVA kills, not to mention the ammo dumps we hit and convoys we destroyed.

In conclusion and during the time frame between January 21 and March 15, ASRT "Bravo" was responsible for over 4200 sorties and 20 million pounds of ordinance dropped. After the initial team members rotated back to DaNang, "Bravo" continued to play a vital role in the defense of Khe Sanh.

Finally, I had the distinct privilege of serving with some of the very best people who gave everything of themselves. We must never forget the lessons which we learned in VietNam nor must we ever forget those men and women who sacrificed everything by giving their lives.

—William E. McEwen II

[Maj Matthew P. Caulfield commented: "It was so professional, so fantastic. They were really good—all day long and many times in bad weather. That ASRAT was a superb one."

On 23 Jan, ASRT BRAVO set a new MASS-3 squadron record by controlling the delivery of 210.75 tons of bombs. The record was again broken by ASRT BRAVO on 27 Jan with 247.37 tons. On 18 Feb, in a 24-hour period, ASRAT BRAVO controlled 99 missions involving over 275 aircraft. 486 tons of ordnance was delivered on 105 targets, establishing a new squadron record. By this time ASRAT BRAVO was directing TPQ-10 strikes within 500 meters of the perimeter. According to the 26Mar Command Chronology for Feb, the ASRAT team controlled 1,959 flights of fixed wing using TPQ-10 radar. Total fixed wing ordnance dropped visually and by TPQ-10 was 16,584,350 pounds.

At his debrief, Col Lownds said, concerning the ASRAT BRAVO team at Khe Sanh: "..anything but the highest priase would not be enough. The accuracy of those things was phenomenal. I know at one point—every once and awhile they rotate people and when they'd rotate these people then we'd run a strike on a hilltop somewhere near us to find out how these new people and how accurate they were. And I remember it now, the first time we ran an accuracy check I think they were 40 meters off. And a couple of times after that the error was practically negligable...I called in the Air Force Liaison Officer..and said, 'Hey, Major, how close would you let ASRATs bring in strikes to your front lines?' And his comment to me was, 'I'll be honest with you; if I were in a hole and were in a spot,' he said, 'with this particular ASRAT, not with any ASRAT, but with this particular ASRAT, I wouldn't hesitate to come within 30 meters."]

NOTES FROM INTERVIEW OF BILL McEWEN, 06 June 1994:

Question: How would the thing work?
McEwen: The Navy, the Marine Corps, the Air Force—they were throwing so much Air up there—they would get on our frequency and say, "We're CHAIN TWO FOUR ZERO," or whatever, and say what ordnance they had. And we'd say, OK, we'll take you, and here's what we do. We'd have all kinds of targets. We'd tell them we want them to fly at 15,000 feet, and we'd give them a TAC heading. We'd "lock on" the aircraft and then we knew exactly—once we got a lock-on the aircraft, we knew exactly where he was, we knew exactly how fast he was flying, we knew exactly his altitude and everything.
Question: The computer—
McEwen: We had what's outdated now; we had the analog computers. We'd give him a vector toward the target, and then we'd get him down to within 8,000 meters and if he was flying—we had a needle that was tracking him, and if that needle were running true and he was within a degree, port or starboard, of the target, we would drop. If we were going to drop all ordnance, a salvo, we'd say, "Armstrong all ordnance." If we were going to make two or three runs—if we had the liberty of the time to do that—we'd tell him to arm, like, two 500-pounders. Or, I can remember many times where we set it up to be a "ripple," where we would just start out and ripple them over 500 meters. Once I did this to within 400 meters of where I was sitting: An A-6 came in while the 37th Rangers were being attacked, and I had him do a 500-meter ripple. I think he had 26 250-pounders.
Question: Do you release the bombs or does the pilot?
McEwen: He releases them on our command. I would say, "CHAIN FOUR FIVE, this is CARSTAIRS BRAVO, ARMSTRONG all ordnance." He'd say, "Roger, Armstrong," and then he would get down to about 2,000 meters. I would say, "CHAIN 24, standby, standby. Mark, Mark." When I'd say "Mark, Mark," he'd turn them loose.
Question: What does Armstrong mean?
McEwen: It means all the ordnance on the aircraft is armed. He'd flip the little switch that arms the bombs, and I would not give him that until he was about 8,000 meters to go. Or, I might say, "YELLOWCAT 25, Armstrong two DELTA-5s" or whatever type of ordnance he was carrying. When he would come up, he would say, "CARSTAIRS BRAVO, this is...and I've got 15 DELTA-2s on board tonight." I would look in my ballistics chart and I would dial al this into the computer to get the amount of trail and the time to splash-down because every bomb was different."

TPQ-10 TOO CLOSE

Intense incoming on 21 February was the result of the second (and final) daytime attempt by the NVA to assault our base perimeter. This time it was an estimated NVA battalion attacking the lines occupied by the 37th ARVN Rangers.

The 37th ARVN Rangers, spotting the NVA moving towards them, estimated the force at battalion strength since the ARVNs monitoring the NVA radio net heard them talking over five different radios.

The Rangers immediately engaged the enemy force, halting their advance. Meanwhile, the KSCB received 250 rounds of mortar, 50 rounds of artillery, and 70 rounds of rockets. At one point, there were about 75 incoming rounds within one 5-minute period.

A TPQ-10 strike accidently pickled its bombs about 40 meters inside the base perimeter, making a 40-ft. hole and throwing dirt all over the hootches. The bomb exploded between the B/1/26 positions and the ARVN lines.

Gilbert Wall recalls the moment: "We all laid up in the trenchlines and my radioman hit the deck. It sent mud hundreds of feet up into the air and then my radioman was laying flat in the trench and this big piece of mud came [down] and gave him a compound fracture. They took him to the Aid Station. They sent him down that night. They said that anybody that can walk had to go back."

The radioman, Peter Manovich, a German national, tall and muscular, had attended Northwestern University and joined the Marine Corps as "training" and planned to return to Germany and become an officer in their armed forces.

Gilbert Wall and the radioman were friends: "We used to sit there and talk. There was a German in Delta Company 81s, and they used to talk German to each other. I liked old Peter. We used to sing 'Snoopy versus the Red Baron' and he got mad and said, 'How would you guys like it if I put down Babe Ruth?' That was the last thing he should have said because those Marines never let up on him."

For all the NVA incoming, there were no friendly fatalities. Cpl Ted Golab, a Marine FO sent to assist the 37th Rangers, had been sitting on top a bunker when the incoming started. The ARVNs rarely wore helmets, and following the initial blast, many were laying about the area. No one was really badly injured. One Ranger had been thrown up against a wall and broke his wrist. Another came to Golab crying like a baby. Golab assured him he was OK, put a battle dressing on his head and gave him his own helmet. In the days and weeks that followed, that Ranger never removed Golab's helmet. Golab was given a Ranger beret, a shirt with the Ranger patch and a purple scarf, and wherever he went, a Ranger rifleman now always accompanied him. "Them guys were great. They'd be eating our food and I'd be eating their food."

The attack was repulsed, leaving some 20-25 NVA killed.

Another friendly wounded, Joe Lola, went to C Med with shrapnel in his leg and was evacuated on a CH-46. The chopper, however, took fire, wounding Lola again, again in his leg. He yelled, "I'm hit!" But no one could hear him above the noise. Everyone returned to C Med, and Lola told the corpsman there, "I'm hit!"

"I know you're hit."

Lola took down his blanket—he was nude except for the blanket—to show the corpsman his second wound, and there was blood from his belly button on down.

"O my God!" shouted the corpsman.

Lola was given some morphine and told, "You're going out on the next chopper!"

"No! I don't want to get into another chopper! I want to stay here!"

"You can't!"

A MEMORY REVISITED

Dear Dr. DeMaagd

I am at a loss as to how to begin this, so I guess I'll just get to the point.

I was with 3rd Recon at Khe Sanh during the "siege." As you probably remember, recon was pretty much shut down as far as patrolling after 21 January. Because of that we were sent on various work parties around the KSCB. One of the jobs I seemed to get quite often was the aircraft loading area and Charlie Med carrying stretchers.

You may not be the doctor I remember from 8 Feb 1968. (I just learned the exact date in July '96) or you may not remember the particular incident or Marine involved, but if any of this should ring a bell I just wanted to let you know how things turned out.

On 8 Feb 1968, I and others were carrying wounded to and from Charlie Med and the helipad. Sometime during this (I don't remember the time of day) a Marine was brought in from one of the arty batteries. Their gun pit had taken a direct 122 rocket hit and this kid was quite literally blown up as I remember so many being.

I helped get him down into the Charlie Med bunker and started to turn to go get another stretcher when the doctor on duty asked me to give him a hand as there were no corpsmen left. It was a very busy day. This kid's left leg was practically gone, right leg not much better and among the many other holes he had in him, one could see his heart beating through the gaping hole in his chest. There was only one other time that I checked the name on dog tags during my entire tour and I remember both names to this day. This fellow's name was Robert Flaherty. His name and that vision have stayed with me for almost thirty years.

Last July I spent some time in the VAMC Roseburg, Oregon, and through a quirk of extreme chance (or a higher authority) I met Mr. Flaherty. Although obviously scarred and beat up, he was doing very well. Although he left the hospital just shortly after I met him, we have stayed in touch.

If you are not the doctor I remember from that day, I apologize for possibly dredging up bad memories. If you are he, I thought you might like to know."

—Hal C. Johnson

Dear Mr. Johnson:

Thank you for your letter of..in which you shared your amazing experience during the Khe Sanh siege. It is a great story, one that is eloquently expressed. I have reread your letter, awesomely, now at least five times!

Unfortunately, I was not the doctor that shared this impressive event with you. I was in Khe Sanh during the siege attached to 1/26 Marines. Our battalion aid station was located in the above ground bunker across the road from the artillery battery near the turn-around end of the airstrip. My daily excursions took me by Charlie Med, but I never worked there doing patient care.

I have many valued memories of those years spent serving in Vietnam! I am extremely proud of the performance of my Corpsmen and the Marines there. If only I could relate the events of those times with the clarity of recall and the expressive skill you possess!

Thank you again for your letter. — Harvey De Maagd

A TRIBUTE

In memory of Reuben Carl McMackins, Jr. L/3/26, KIA during the fight to retake Hill 881N at the Battle of Khe Sanh, 14 April 1968:

Mac, you knew you weren't coming home. I didn't believe it when you told me.
Maybe death in war was meant for some, but not for you, Mac, not for you.
Why didn't someone prepare me for death? Who prepared you Mac, God?
Maybe He's using your death to prepare me. Thanks Mac. I miss you.

A CHRISTMAS LETTER

"1998 was a year of blessings—as I survived lung cancer!! Discovered in February by the Fargo North Dakota Veterans Medical Center. We were told that I had at the very most, a year, but more likely four to six months. We decided to forego the Veterans Hospital and opt to utilize local medical services and our family doctor, who dealt with this as a well trained combat unit commander! First, I was in the Park Rapids hospital, getting my lung drained of fluid, and repaired so no more fluids would develop. They also took samples of the four masses/tumors. I spent eight days in the hospital, six of these days in the ICU, where I was given the nickname of 'Mr. Independent' by one of the ICU nurses. After the surgery, it wasn't much time before I started the four Chemo treatments, followed by a total of 33 radiation treatments. This resulted in the unexpected. I am and have been since July, 'Cancer free.' We worked with two cancer doctors, neither one of them giving me much hope. In fact, none. I have always been aware and never forgot how lucky I was to survive the war 30 years ago. This allowed me to except my death sentence, knowing that I got a thirty-year bonus, with a wonderful wife of 26 years and great kids. Plus I had many outdoor adventures during those 30 years, the type that most people dreamed of. Our family doctor, the two cancer doctors, and the surgeon, all agreed it was my positive attitude that brought me to my present stage, but it was the prayers of all of you—my chaplain from the war and his congregation prayed every Sunday, along with many local churches..It was amazing the support we received during this. It will never be forgotten."

—Wally Schaffenberger

CLOSENESS

It doesn't seem possible that it's been thirty years since we left Khe Sanh. I know that life must go on—but there will always be a place in my heart for the men in 1st Bn. 26th Marines. Having retired 24 years ago, I have yet to find in civilian life the closeness that I had while in the Corps.

—Jerry Honn

CONGRATULATIONS

THE 'TOP' GIVES THE WORD

To all my Marines and Corpsmen whom served in K/3/26 since 1966-67-68: I as your Company First Sergeant thank you for your loyalty, dedication, extreme hardship and pride. Forever grateful. Ben Goddard, 1stSgt K/3/26.

[Ed. Note: During the early morning attack on Hill 861 on 21 Jan 68 in which the Company CO was severely wounded, the Co Gunny (Rimel) was KIA, Ben Goddard was wounded in his neck, and pressed his finger against the bleeder all night until evacuated in the morning so he wouldn't bleed to death].

THE 109th QM

The 109th QM AES (Air Equipment Supply) lost one member, Charles Lynn Baney, killed in a C-130 crash during the unit's re-supply of Khe Sanh on 15 October 1967.

I was one of several members of our unit who went to Khe Sanh. The unit's efforts successfully air-dropped over 8,000,000 pounds of supplies, maintaining a unit capability of 250 tons per day.

—Roger Mountain

[Ed Note: SP4 Baney was remembered in a Memorial Service 18 Oct 67 at Cam Ranh Bay.

He was born 12 Nov 1946 in Warsaw, Indiana and entered the Army 7 June 1965. During August-October 1967, the 109th was delivering AM-2 matting for the reconstruction of the airstrip as well as bunkering materials to construct the new Lang Vei camp and FOB-3. During this period they accomplished a LAPES [Low Altitude Parachute Extraction System] which was then still in experimental stages, and delivered 567.41 tons of construction materials. This technique was to be a life-saver during the Siege. By the end of Oct 67, the 109th had delivered 2,883.95 tons of supplies to Khe Sanh.

BLOOD

An emergency request from III MAF to First Marine Air Wing was made the evening after Khe Sanh was attacked to helo-lift 8500 pounds of whole blood at Khe Sanh. At 2200 the evening of 21 Jan, Capt Frank James Kennedy and his co-pilot, 1/Lt Paul H. Ellis, departed Marble Mt. DaNang on mission LUMINOUS 51, to transport whole blood, morphine, and other medically essential items to Khe Sanh.

Due to existing weather at Khe Sanh (1/4-mi visibility and fog), the aircraft loaded with medical supplies returned to DaNang and the one carrying the whole blood was diverted to Quang Tri to wait a break in weather. Upon touchdown at Quang Tri, they discovered no facilities were on hand to store the precious cargo of whole blood, and because it was imperative that the cargo reach its destination unspoiled they departed Quang Tri rather than wait for weather to break.

They were unable to receive navigational information: a positive lock-on with the TACAN, and were forced to navigate by dead reckoning above a thick cloud layer over the hazardous terrain below them.

When they arrived, they were informed that due to the attack during the day, the medical supplies were not expected until the following day.

The GCA controller vectored an initial approach fix, but at GCA minimums, Capt Kennedy still didn't have the field in sight, so he requested and was cleared for an extended low approach down the runway in an effort to break out of the cloud cover. This proved futile, and Capt Kennedy executed a missed approach and climbed to VFR on top.

Realizing that low fuel would permit only one more approach, Capt Kennedy conferred with the Khe Sanh tower and GCA operators and established a system where the tower operator notified the GCA when a break in clouds was approaching. The GCA controller gave the CH-53 step-down altitudes and set them up for the approach.

There was no break over the field, but there appeared to be a clear area off their starboard side. Capt Kennedy flew to the area, identified their position, and advised the tower to standby with an Aldis Lamp to orient them over the field. Using an autorotative approach with a 270° spiral, they descended beneath the cloud layer and broke out over the perimeter of the base, landing at approx. 0130. The green signal flashed from the Aldis Lamp was the plane's only ground reference.

The cargo was off-loaded, and as they taxied to the runway to take-off, there was a bright flash in front of the plane. "It looked like they were walking rockets right into our cockpit. They hit all around us. We got out safety, to return to Marble Mountain."

A REAL "CUT UP"

A recon team leader at Khe Sanh was briefing his team, concluding with the requirement to synchronize their watches. He said, "Gentlemen, circumcize your watches!"

We Can't Forget - A Sister's Prayer

[Written by the sister of Cpl David L. Rodell, W/1/13, died 9 May 1997 of respiratory failure.]

Lord, we can't forget how we used to play as children,
Building go carts, walking on stilts, going to the beach, building snow mountains in the yard;

And Lord, we can't forget how he always included us,
He never ditched us, like some brothers would.
He treated us with so much kindness.
He protected us, He watched out for us.

We can't forget, Lord, how he made us laugh;
He was so funny, always telling us jokes,
and acting so silly.
Once we got laughing we would laugh so hard,
we thought we would never stop.

We can't forget, Lord, how our girlfriends used to come over and ask, "Where's your brother—is he home?"
And all those phone calls from admiring girls at school.

And Lord, we can't forget when he went to Vietnam.;
He always wrote us letters and we would write him back.
He saved every one of those letters.
We were so proud of him!

We can't forget, Lord, the day he came home, and how thankful and excited we were to run and greet him at the airport.
We were also a little confused by the look in his eyes, as though a part of him had been lost forever.

We can't forget, Lord, when he moved to Arizona,
How strange it seemed that we would not be near each other any more.
He always tried to make it home for Christmas and we always kept in touch through letters and telephone calls.

But most of all, Lord, we can't forget that smile, those bright blue eyes, his wavy hair,
the sound of his laughter,
his kindness, his sweetness,
his childlike ways.

O Lord, Thank You! Thank you that we can't forget these memories and so many more. Our hearts will be forever grateful that we had the time we did with this wonderful, kind, loving person - our brother!

[A poem by his mother, Florrie Mitchell:

Where are you now
Soldier Boy of mine
you with the Pied Piper laugh that even the smallest child would try and follow in your footsteps.
Where are you now
Soldier Boy of mine;
whose life was made known by your courage and your dreams of the unbelievable made known by the believable.
Wipe the tears from my eyes,
Soldier Boy of mine;
so they will not blur the vision of you drenched in God's glory.

[A poem by his widow, Paulette Mitchell Freeman:

My Only Love
His laughter filled my empty heart,
His love bound my heart to his—
He walked in life so straight and tall
Not one phase of life did he miss.

He loved his friends and family
His first-born—small and fair,
He loved his flag and country,
For all these he took the dare.

He fought for all he felt for,
His valor exceeded all,
He fought for faith and freedom,
Until his last fatal fall.

So rest now—my weary soldier—
I'll love you till I die,
You meant all the world to me—
And will—till by your side I lie.

RETURN - I

I got out of Vietnam 31 years ago without the slightest desire to return. Yet there I was, stepping off the plane in the stifling heat and humidity of May at the Ton Son Nhut Airport in Ho Chi Minh City. The city is still referred to as Saigon by virtually everyone except the tour guides and the government.

Although my experience as a Vietnam War-era Marine occurred in the former demilitarized zone area, far north of Saigon, the mystique of the city drew me. After all, the U.S. Embassy in Saigon was bombed, badly wounding my travel companion, retired Ambassador Jim Rosenthal. South Vietnamese President Ngo Dinh Diem was overthrown and murdered here in 1963. And several Buddhist monks self-immolated here in protest of government policies.

And to those of us who fought the war in filthy clothes and subsisted on C-rations at ill-defined front lines, the Saigon-Gomorrah lifestyle of the starched and polished headquarters pukes has been burned into my memory with disgust, although I know many resented such rear-area duty assignments.

I still shudder to think that the majority of these men received combat awards for their tours, which included cold drinks in the evening, wine with meals and bounty for the prostitutes who provided fodder for news photographers to capture on film the great moral damage America was causing in Vietnam.

Ultimately, it was the vision of a North Vietnamese tank bursting through the gates of the presidential palace, followed closely by the helicopter evacuation of the American Embassy, that best depicted American involvement gone bad.

In Saigon, I saw the Museum of American War Atrocities, the unclaimed property that was once the American Embassy, the presidential palace of the 'deposed puppet government'—all in a sprawling city with people seemingly living in every square foot, a smell that is unmistakably Vietnam and graphic evidence that communism doesn't work.

Yes, I wanted to see Saigon. I did, and I'm not impressed.

My real purpose for making this trip, though, was to visit the areas where my fellow Marines and I fought, and fought well. Such places as Dong Ha, Hue, Khe Sanh and the Leatherneck Square area of the former DMZ are embedded in the history of this war.

To me and others who were there, they formed the arena where dramas unfolded—dramas that had a monumental impact on our lives. I wanted to see them as they look now. To stand on the ground again. I wanted to see Vietnam as a country rather than a war.

Let me first make something clear, though. I am not one of those people who carries a heavy emotional load as a result of my experiences in the Vietnam War. I am eternally grateful for the opportunity to have served with exceptional Americans. But I, like most of my peers, am one of the Vietnam vets who, according to the department of Labor and Veterans Affairs statistics, are 'better educated, more emotionally adjusted, enjoy a more stable family life and a higher income' than those of our age group who didn't go to Vietnam.

We're all over the place, but don't tell Oliver Stone.

It was in the DMZ area that I saw what I came to see. Another member of our small group and I both had an inexplicable, almost surrealistic feeling as we wandered the ground, now quiet, where so much chaos once reigned.

I had been the officer in charge of a Marine force recon detachment. My small band of reconnaissance Marines operated out of Khe Sanh Combat Base before its historic siege. Indeed, we verified the intent of the North Vietnamese Army to attack the base in strength, so we knew the terrain well.

I stood on the stunted growth that outlined the site of the mile-long airfield at Khe Sanh. Hills 881 and 861, where the Marines and the North Vietnamese Army had fought furious battles, were clearly visible, as were the sunken depressions that represented the trenches where the Marines of the 26th Marine Regiment seemed to spend half of their time—either waiting for or experiencing an enemy attack.

I gathered a few samples of the fine red dirt that dominates the area to send to some of my former Marines. This soil, as fine as cosmetic powder, seeped into the clothing, eyes and mouth of every Marine at Khe Sanh. During the rainy season, it turned into a gooey bog, exacerbating the misery and discomfort of Khe Sanh. Understandably, the Khe Sanh Veterans' publication is titled 'Red Clay.'

Some decision-makers far from the red dirt battlefield intentionally placed Marines in this war, in this place, in a doctrinaly unsound position, and I will never forgive their stupidity. The decision to isolate a proud regiment of Marines at Khe Sanh is one of a long series of poor decisions made by our government in waging the Vietnam War.

A quote from Sir William Francis Butler comes to mind: 'The nation that will insist on drawing a broad line of demarcation between the fighting man and the thinking man is liable to find its fighting done by fools and its thinking done by cowards.'"

RETURN - II

Michael J. Madden (I/3/12) visited Khe Sanh 12-31 May 1998 and observed things that weren't there previously—something very new, that will be of interest to all our members.

There is now a museum and a series of monuments at Khe Sanh. One monument is of a C-130 propeller mounted on a concrete base, and another is a howitzer mounted on a base. There is also a professionally-done monument with Vietnamese on one side and English on the other (to replace the rather shabby and greatly exaggerated propaganda statement of a monument that had been there previously). The English side reads as follows (Note: Vietnam refers to the airstrip at Ta Con):

TA CON IS AN IMPORTANT MILITARY INSTALLATION AMONG KHE SANH MILITARY BASES ESTABLISHED BY THE AMERICAN AND SOUTHERN VIETNAMESE TROOPS IN EARLY 1966 TO WATCH THE STRATEGIC CORRIDOR OF ROAD NO 9 AND CONTROL HO CHI MINH TRAIL.

WITH A LARGE MILITARY AIRPORT AND MANY SOLIDLY BUILT SURROUNDING INSTALLATIONS TA CON WAS GUARDED BY THE AMERICAN 26TH REGIMENT OF MARINES, A BATTALION OF HEAVY ARTILLERY, A COMPANY OF TANKS AND EIGHT COMPANIES OF SOUTHERN VIETNAMESE SECURITY TROOPS.

FROM FEBRUARY 8 TO JULY 9, 1968, THE REGULAR TROOPS OF THE DIVISIONS NUMBERED 304, 308, 302, 325 ETC. TOGETHER WITH THE PEOPLE AND ARMED FORCES OF HUONG HOA, BRAVELY AND DAUNTLESSLY ATTACKED AND LAID SIEGE TO THE REINFORCEMENT AND RETREAT TROOPS TURNJING THIS INSTALLATION INTO A HELL ON EARTH AND A TERRIBLE OBSESSION FOR THE AMERICAN TROOPS IN THE VIETNAM WAR AND FORCING THE AMERICAN FORCES TO RETREAT FROM KHE SANH AND COMPLETELY LIBERATING HUONG HOA DISTRICT WITH 10,000 PEOPLE.

There is also a large, new monument at Lang Vei consisting of a tank (with number "268" in white letters on its turret), sitting upon an immense reddish concrete base surrounded by two concentric concrete rings.

There is also a museum at Khe Sanh with rifles, wall photos, pilot's helmet, LAW, claymore, PRC-25, and various other items.

RETURN - III

Glenn Prentice (C/1/13) writes of his return:

Close to 30 years now visions of people, places, road and jungle trails have been permanently etched in my mind, not knowing if it was real or simply a dream. I shut my eyes and see Captain Dabney in Phu Bai, in Khe Sanh, and of course, 881-S, along with Lt Snyder, Smitty, Fred Fine, Sgt Whitenight, Steinberg, Parker, Captain O'Connor to name a few good men, along with all the rest of INDIA Company 3/26 and CHARLIE Battery 1/13. I can see all the places and trails we humped. I know the memories came from Lt Snyder and Smitty constantly showing me where we were! And the fear I might be called upon to take the place of the Lt or Smitty if they were KIA or wounded to call in arty. But who really knows? I do know the damn radio was heavy!

After I came home, I worked near Camp Pendleton for a Water District in 1975. I volunteered to work on the Vietnamese resettlement program just after Saigon fell. When I was on the base, I sought out Marines that were at Khe Sanh with no luck. In 1982 I became the Public Works Director for the City of Oceanside adjacent to Camp Pendleton. Every time I had a business meeting with the Marines I asked if anyone was at Khe Sanh—still no luck. I needed to talk with someone to confirm if my experience was a dream or in fact true. I felt somewhat disconnected, and had very different views of life compared with the rest of my family and friends! Pride kept me from seeking any help from the VA, and still does.

The next day we are on the road to Khe Sanh. We make it to Dong Ha turn left onto Highway Nine. I point out the road to Camp Carroll and the "Rock Pile." We stop and take some flicks. We start to see the Bru people walking along the road. We pass the biggest army base in that part of the country.

Just below Khe Sanh we stop at the bridge leading to the Ashau Valley (or the Ah-Shit Valley). It hits me. All of a sudden I become overwhelmed with emotion, memories start to flood my brain. I breath deeply and continue the journey. Driving up we run into more Bru. This time they're carrying M-16. My guide tells me they hunt with them and the military seldom comes this way. We turn on the road to the base. There is no mistake I am back! The red Clay, the mud, the smell. I see [Hill] 1015, or the Witches...t.

We park the car a 100 meters from the base and start to walk in. The locals mob you and try to sell live shells, dog tags, boots and other "stuff" to you. I found out that the average incoming in Vietnam is about $30. a month. In Khe Sanh it's less because of the government dislike of the Bru.

The locals dig up rounds from what's left frfom the old ASP-1. Remember, we buried remains of the dump before we left. The locals open the rounds with hacksaw and scrape out the explosive material and sell the metal for scrap. Needless to say it's not good when they cut into a WP round! Through my guide I spent some time with them how to identify the different kinds of rounds.

After a few hours I'm drawn to the Hills. I ask my guide if we have time to climb 881S. He nods, but says, I never been there. I said, no matter; I remember how to get to the hill. (about 8 clicks to the Hill). We hop in the car—hit the road, make a right turn, drive down about a mile and I look to the west and recognize a group of huts! We get out and talk to an old woman. We ask her if there are any land mines in the area. She said you should be safe if you stay on the cattle trail. She confirms that some American used this trail on the way to the hills. I ask her if any other Americans have been up this way. She replies no, not since the war!

I start to change into my jungles—only to have about 20 villagers staring at me. I put on my jungle greens, jungle boots—some old 782 gear with canteens, rain gear, compass, camera, ass pack, flash light and some dried food. My guide starts out with us but I send him packing when he only had street shoes on. As I was tying my boots a tremendous lightning and thunder ring out. What did it mean? We start the ascent on the route I remembered from Capt Dabney's old patrol route down through some huts, along the foot hills. I find a new road built by a lumber company. I notice most of the jungle area we knew is gone. We link up to the ridge line where we run into a cobra (just a small one), a few leeches on the way.

Suddenly, I hear the rain coming from Co Roc. I turn to Lynell and say: You will soon experience the stinging rain! It hits. We keep on going, like a mad man on a mission. I think to myself and say out loud to Lynell: "I can't believe how easy this is without my pack and that damn radio!!!!" Lynell hangs back. A few leeches appear. Another cobra comes out of the tall elephant grass. Daylight is running out. I push Lynell harder.

Finally we reach the top of 881S just over head a strike of lightning and deafening thunder! It seemed to welcome us! A torrent of rain comes down, taking flicks becomes impossible. I scout around and find some barb wire, half-filled-in trench lines, old shell casing. I spot where the old Charlie Battery gun emplacement, the old CP. It's covered with jungle now. It's time to go down. Sundown in a few hours. I look up and see 881-North (The Evil Place). A flood of memories abounds.

The time just before the Siege, on patrol when Lt. Ski (Weapons, India 3/26) broke out some pudding from home, he offered a bite to me. I in turn offered to Smitty (Arty FO Scout), Smitty in turn offered some to Senior Doc (Wickliffe). We eat it all. Lt Ski was pissed!!!

The fire fight of 17 Jan 68, the patrols into leech valley, the bad times on the hill, I could almost recall every day and relate to Lynell. I did tell her about Doc Wickliffe and how he died loading WIAs on a CH-46 when rounds came in. How just before the push onto 881N in April 68, I was getting my gear together to go back up the hill with Kilo Company, how LCPL wanted to take my place (I let him) only to be KIA the next day on 881N, and much more.

I point in the general direction of Lang Vei and on the 7th of February early in morning I was on radio watch taking a fire mission from Spunky Hanson-6 hearing the fighting in the background, learning of the tanks in the wire. Every time Charlie Battery fired the NVA gunner hit our guns, but the guns kept up the fire to support Lang Vei. Most of all we felt shame in not attempting to rescue Spunky Hanson.

The rain eased a bit on the ridge line on the way down. We pick up the pace to make back to the car before sunset. Just as the sun set we hit the small ville and made to the car. We drove back to Dong Ha, ate dinner at a local restaurant with our driver and guide. That night we stayed in large Russian-built hotel that looked 30 years old but only built in 1990. The cost was only $25. a night, we were one of the only guests in this large hotel (this was a government run hotel I recommend that you stay away from anything owned or run by the government; they are not very friendly).

The next day we departed Hue and drove down Highway One.....

The trip was well worth it to me. It helped me deal with the past better. The question is where do we go from here, what obligations do we have to ourselves and others. In my view we need to help one another improve the quality of life by dealing wiht the past and moving on. I am not saying forgetting the past, but to take action, like "Bulldog" helping Khe Sanh Village; help one another with jobs, PTSD issues, or just talking with each other to help with every day problems. My goal is not just talk about what we went through, but to accomplish something, to make a mark in this world, to make a difference. I went back partially to find forgiveness from somebody. I found it within myself. I also found help from members of this organization. One thing that I learned when I was at Khe Sanh (67-68) is: life is too short, make every day count, do the right thing and have fun with life no matter what is dealt.

...travel light. Use no suit cases, only back packs. You'll have a better time. You'll need a car or guide. I needed them to go where tours won't go and talk to the people. If you want any information you can call me at home 619-484-1974 or at work 909-279-3590 or write 8988 Ellingham St., San Diego CA 92129.

RETURN IV

Bob Donoghue and "Bulldog" David Smith (formerly of FOB-3) made a return trip to Khe Sanh 5-30 November 1998. It was Bob's Trip No. 7.

Starting with a return trip in 1992 on a visitor's visa, Bob Donoghue had brought life to the Bru via digging of wells, construction of a dispensary and stocking it with supplies he carried, and was convinced that even very small efforts could reap significantly large results. Focus on things like mosquitto netting, soap and elementary hygiene, teaching first aid, were some of the things Bob accomplished.

Finally, after his 6th trip to Khe Sanh in May, 1997, the Vietnamese government no longer permitted Bob to return unless he was granted a NGO [Non-Governmental Organization] status. It was also at this time that Bob, while engaging in National Guard training, sustained a major parachute crash that left him physically disabled.

In the meantime, Cedar Point Foundation was established as a non-profit to provide medical, educational and other humanitarian assistance to the Bru to improve their quality of life. This will enable medical assistance, clean drinking water, agricultural aid and increased educational opportunities. All money raised by Cedar Point Foundation is for exclusive expenditure in Vietnam and will continue to be used for medicine, doctors, construction of wells, purchase of live stock and hybrid seeds for farming.

Mr. David Smith and Bob Donoghue met with the American Ambassador to Vietnam and other officials, and, after a very long and tedious process, obtained the necessary permission to provide assistance to the Bru officially.

Bob's report of the area includes the following:

"From the coastal town of Dong Ha to the Laotian border and across the Mekong River runs Highway 9. From the time that Bob first traveled it in the 1960s, to the present, this road has always been a narrow dangerous road. The road surface is mainly gravel with some parts only dirt. The area from Dong Ha to Cam Lo is paved. There are numerous bridges to cross. Some are narrow crumbling concrete structures while others are made from remnants of the Bailey type bridge left over from the war. During the rainy season the mountain streams wash out parts of the road while sections of the steep hillsides break off blocking traffic.

"Several years ago negotiations were held between Thailand, Vietnam and Laos regarding the highway. Laos is land-locked and has no seaport. The closest port is located in Dong Ha via Highway 9. Additionally, if one wanted to drive from Thailand to Vietnam, Highway 9 is the only route. An agreement was reached where Highway 9 would eventually become a major land route, the Trans-Asian Highway. The Asian Bank provided loans for improving the highway, which will eventually become a four-lane high-speed road.

"Last year, the first part of the project was completed within the city limits of Dong Ha. Buildings along the highway were moved back away from the road, which was widened to about six lanes. West of Highway 1, the major north/south coastal route, a bridge is being constructed to allow Highway 9 to cross over the railroad tracks that run parallel to Highway 1. Presently, barriers are wheeled across the road whenever a train travels through the area; traffic comes to a halt until the train clears the area, disrupting the traffic flow. From Dong Ha to Cam Lo the highway is now four lanes wide. All the bridges and culverts are being widened and dump trucks continuously deposit fill on both sides of the road to facilitate the construction.

"The old route from Cam Lo to Khe Sanh is also getting major attention. The winding road through the hills and mountain passes is being straightened out. Hills are being blasted away and new larger bridges will allow for higher speed, shortening the drive time.

"In the town of Khe Sanh buildings have been moved back to allow the road to be widened and a new market place was built, however not everyone is using it yet. The highway from Khe Sanh to Lao Bao (at the Laotian border) has yet to be upgraded.....

"The local government's priority was to construct roads into the Bru communities of Thon Pa Nho and Thon Cheng. The Bru, however, need more cattle and coffee trees, health care is also important, much more so than roads. It was clear that the Vietnamese government's idea of what the Bru needed was much different than what the Bru themselves felt they needed. We told the district government that all projects depended on available funds. The district also requested that we fund a school for the village of Thon Pa Nho.

Ms. TRAN THI MAI

"In 1968, during the 'Siege of Khe Sanh,' a young girl was inside her home when there was a loud explosion. The young girl looked down to see that both her legs were gone. Today she owns a small shop in Khe Sanh and sells general merchandise.

"Mr. Charles Berg, who himself lost a leg at Khe Sanh, first met Ms. Tran Thi Mai in 1996. During his visit she was intrigued with his lightweight wheelchair. Charles told her that when he completed his trip to Vietnam he would send her the chair. Due to a shipping problem, she never received the wheelchair. When we visited Khe Sanh in 1997 Mai asked us to check with Charles on the status of the chair.

"In September, David Smith had located the $2,000. chair in Nha Trang still waiting to be shipped...A carpenter was contracted for $13. to build a crate for shipping. It took several attempts with different box configurations before the post office would accept the chair. Finally the $12. shipping fee was paid and it was on its way. Ms. Tran Thi Mai should receive her wheelchair about a week after it was shipped."

Another Cedar Point Foundation project is to fund the purchase of stethoscopes and blood pressure cuffs for 21 mobile medical teams that will regularly visit each Bru community, working out of the Khe Sanh hospital. They will also fund the purchase of five microscopes for the hospital. With them, on this visit, they brought several donated digital thermometers, 40 pair of reading glasses and several cases of acetaminophen.

Eight cows (at $280. each) were purchased during the visit for the Bru community of Thon Pa Nho...

"Coffee is the Bru's cash crop. It is important for their survival that they incr3ease their yield as much as possible. The average Bru family in Thon Cheng makes about $100-#150 US dollars a year growing coffee...The community's goal is to plant a total of ten hectares of coffee (25 acres)...The Cedar Point Foundation contracted to buy 13,500 coffee seedlings and plant 7.5 acres of land for $1000.

If anyone wishes to make a donation to Cedar Point Foundation to help bring life to the Bru people that we had pledged to protect and then left them, donations may be sent to:

"We believe that our future trips to provide humanitarian aid will proceed smoothly and allow us to continue with our past projects. Fund raising will have to increase significantly if we are to fund projects requested by the Huong Hoa District People's Committee and continue with those already started. It is imperative that everyone who has an interest in the Bru tribe assists us in obtaining additional funds and contributors."

The Athenian Oath

[Said by the young men of Athens some 2300 years ago]

We will never bring disgrace to this, our city, by any act of dishonesty or cowardice; nor ever desert our suffering comrades in the ranks.

We will fight for the ideals and sacred things of the city, both alone and with many. We will revere and obey the city's laws and do our best to incite a like respect and reverence in those above us who are prone to annul or to set them at naught; we will strive unceasingly to quicken the public's sense of duty.

Thus, in all these ways, we will transmit this city greater, better and more beautiful than it was transmitted to us.

A LETTER HOME

Enclosed last letter my precious, Heroic Son, L/Cpl Robert D. Cicio wrote to his brother. He gave his life Easter Monday after being sent on a search & destroy mission, the day he & his company were due to leave Khe Sanh, April 16, 1968.

His grieving mother,
Nellie Cicio

Dear Victor,

I'm writing this letter, brother, to tell you about the fighting force of the Marine Corps (in reference to you saying the Army saved our day).

On January 22nd 1968 our Bn (1/9) received orders that we were to be a buffer against a massive ground attack by the Army of North Vietnam. We took helicopters into Khe Sanh and worked outside of the lines. There amidst attacks by arty, mortars and rockets and losing men all around us we built our defenses while being probed by NVA troops during the night. Once we started building our defenses we wee told that we were going to get hit by a huge ground force. The battle would last for 3 to 4 days, and 3/4's of us would be killed. To tell you, I was scared would be the half of it. The gooks has 152mms, 120mm mortars, 82 mortars, 60 mortars, R.P.G's, 120mm rockets, 50 cal's, 37mm anti-aircraft guns, S.A.M.'s, Russian tanks with flame and 120mm gun on its turret, trucks and tracked vehicles. We had 2 tanks and a couple of batteries (6 guns in a battery), the gooks had 36.

We lost alot of men including 2 of my best friends here. But we didn't stay cooped up in our trenches all day. We had ambushes, patrols, L.P.'s, O.P.'s. Once a nighttime L.P. spotted 6 gooks on a hill right in front of our lines. We sent 2 squads to get them. They went on line to assault the hill. They were met by more troops and hit by R.P.G.'s (a sort of rocket like our 3.5), Chinese grenades (called gycomes). They lost alot but kept advancing because retreat would mean sure death. They took the hill and the NVA troops fled away.

On Feb 10, 1968, elements of "A" Co. were hit [ed. note: this should be 8 Feb] by a Bn of suicide gooks. They were hit by everything imaginable. But they held the hill although gooks wee in the bunkers with them. On April 1st our Bn was down to half strength. There's hardly anybody here that doesn't have a [Purple] Heart. My helmet has holes through it and I had alot of close calls. (I'll tell you about them when I get back). Then we were told that we were to go on the offense and take Hill 471. All of us were beat we've been in the field since Jan 6th and had hardly any sleep or good chow. On April 3d we moved out with all our gear and trugged up and down these torn hills. In the afternoon we assaulted up the hill. The hill had machine guns, 4 120 mortar tubes and a gook arty officer who called the stuff on Khe Sanh.

If you can imagine the picture "Pork Chop Hill," well this was worse but we hit the top and wiped an entire gook Bn off the face of the map. We also had 30 prisoners. That night our squad saved the hill by repulsing an attack by a Bn trying to retake the hill. We killed over 170 N.V.A. The next day we laid wire and policed up the area so we could make a good impression on the 1st Air Cav. They came in on choppers and we walked off. I had no trousers left and I was so hungry and tired but felt good inside to know I was still alive. We then took Hill 552, secured it and then took Hill 689 which I'm now on. We found (yesterday, Easter Sunday) on a patrol over 100 82 rounds and 120mm rockets and captured a W.O. arty F.O. Today the 26th Marine Regiment and A.R.V.N. and Army are leaving we will be the last to leave to guard the rest. Our Bn 1/9 has hardly anybody left. D Co has 1 plt left out of their Co. Our company C has 126 left out of our 300 when we first came. "A" Co. is almost completely gone and "B" is about in the same shape as us. But us and B has about 80% casualties we've been lucky by the grace of somebody that the hits haven't been more direct. Well I only get 1 meal a day. We could get more but we have too much pride to take from the Army and we are walking out in 5 days. I feally feel I helped to defend Khe Sanh which will end the war sooner. Love Bob.

WELCOME TO KSCB

A Few issues back someone asked if anyone received or knew of the Playboy magazines he shipped to KSCB. I can only testify to the fate of one month and I don't recall which month it was—but I'll get back to that later.

I arrived on 16 Jan 68 from Phu Bai with Foxtrot 2/26. As soon as I deplaned I knew the party was over for me. I has 'skated' into a world of shit. My MOS was 0141 (Clerk) and thqat was alright with me. I had been stationed at Marine Barracks, Boston, and had been on many funeral details and saw many heartbroken relatives and friends of Marine KIA. At one of these funerals the mom broke away from the people trying to console her and rushed by me to embrace her dead son in his coffin. That memory remains strong and probably always will.

Anyway, by the time I arrived 'in country' and sent to Phu Bai I had no thoughts of volunteering for the 'grunts' as I had back at Camp Geiger after being assigned to Boston as an 0141. Hardbacks and no 'incoming' suited me by then. But then, the Corps doesn't ask if it's a suitable assignment, does it? So after two months of comparatively easy duty, I, along with the grunts, was told to 'saddle up' and be ready to move out to a place which nobody seemed to know the name of. Even if the name was known it probably wouldn't have meant anything to most of us. The name of that place means a great deal to us all now, doesn't it?

We boarded transport and landed after an uneventful flight of an hour or two. I really don't remember much about the flight but I'll never forget the feeling I got when I stepped off the plane and into a nightmare. We marched outside the KSCB perimeter and 'dug in' right away. Shrapnel from previous fighting was all around and the fog was pretty heavy. After awhile the grunts set out for the hills around the base and the rear echelon moved back to KSCB presumably to set up our rear area. Things were a bit uncertain it seemed at the time but one thing was certain: 'this is for real!'

That night I slept near the tank (I think) and we received no incoming. As a matter of fact that night I had, for some reason, good dreams and slept through the night.

We set up our tents and dug holes on each end although we had nothing to cover the hole. I'm not writing to complain or point fingers at anyone but there should have been material to roof our holes with. Weather the timber was prioritized to build the McNamara 'Barrier' on the DMZ or sitting on a runway in DaNang doesn't matter now. I've read the books on Khe Sanh and I know I wasn't mistaken. Somebody could have made the timber a priority for KSCB and a lot of lives would have been saved. Cringing in an open hole for hours during incoming was the closest I came to breaking and it could have been prevented.

My first taste of incoming was the night of 21 Jan 68 when the NVA rocket attack destroyed our main ammunition dump. I didn't like it and with no sleep added to the fear I was starting to lose it. Next night on perimeter I kept hearing things during my watch. I woke the man with me once too often and he questioned my courage. He was on his last minth and was waiting for a plane to DaNang but wasn't thinking that far ahead. Instead he told me that he hoped the NVA did try to penetrate us so he could kill some more before he left and that I better be thinking the same as he was. At the time I didn't want to hear it but I had a long talk with myself later and calmed down a bit. When I accepted the probability that I would die here and vowed to hang tough but do whatever I had to or could do to stay alive without shirking. The Marine who questioned my courage in the hole the night before probably saved my life. No way I could have continued running scared without something going bad to myself and/or the Marines with me. I have no idea what his name was but I think he was from Oregon or Washington State. If you read this, brother, thanks for the ass-chewing cause I needed it.

My first mission to improve my and our rear position was to scout around for some timber for bunkers. I took a 'Mule' on my search and when I rode by the airstrip I came across a pallet of timbers along the side of the road. I couldn't believe it. There was enough wood for myself and the others back in the company office. I loaded as many pieces as the 'Mule' could hold and took off toward home. Me and my wood got about 3 or 4 feet when someone yelled, 'Halt! Halt you @#$%&*. The voice commanded respect and right away I knew that when it seems too good to be true, it usually is. I braked the vehicle and turned around to see a group of 4 or 5 men coming toward me with fire in their eyes and officer rank on their collars. The lead man was especially pissed and ordered me to attention right there by the airstrip and proceeded to ask me if I knew that the wood I was trying to take was to be used for the underground hospital to treat my wounded brother Marines. The Marine doing the ass-chewing I believe was General Tompkins who had been discussing (I surmised) plans for the underground 'C' Med with the other officers when he spotted me.

My reply to the General's question went something like this: 'With all due respect, Sir, I had no idea what this wood is intended for. All I know is there is nothing to build bunkers with and I don't want to be one of the Marines being treated underground.' The General seemed to mellow a bit but still ordered me to put the timber back on the pallet. I turned and began unloading the 'mule' when I heard the same voice say, 'Marine.' I straightened and turned around. The General said, 'You may take one piece of timber.' 'Yes, Sir, Thank you, Sir.'

I wouldn't have traded that one piece of wood for anything. It was my main roof support for my bunker. I'm just glad its strength never had to take the 'direct hit' test.

To get back to the 'playboy' magazine story: Part of my vow to try to stay alive was never to get lax when I even thought I heard 'incoming.' I learned to do the Khe Sanh shuffle very quick and in a hurry. Toward the end of the 'sieve' one sunny morning I sat at a field desk in our company tent and started writing a letter. It was the first and only time that I left my guard down. I had never exposed myself to 'incoming' unnessarily. Carrying the wounded, work detail at the ammo dump while still popping, perimeter duty at night, digging the big hole for the company office all left me exposed but that was duty calling. I had written a few lines when I heard the first incoming of the day and I ran out of the tent and into one of the holes. I waited awhile and went back up to continue my letter. I also noticed a 'Playboy' on the drawer side of the desk. I heard another 'incoming' and ran to the hole again. I waited again then back up to finish my letter and check out the new magazine. Almost finished writing when I heard 'the sound' again. Only this time I broke my vow and said 'Screw it' and kept on writing. I heard the rocket whistle overhead and hit far from me. However, I soon heard a 'thud' sound coming quickly through the air when suddenly the sound came through the tent canvas.

The 'Playboy' went flying across the tent and the lone piece of shrapnel hit one of the tent poles and landed. Only 10-20 inches to the left and I would have been hit chest high. Another member of my company had gotten complacent also and we bumped into each other going opposite ways for cover after we saw how close it was and how foolish we had been. We tried to laugh it off but when we saw what the 'Playboy' looked like we stopped laughing. The shrapnel had ripped through its entire thickness and about 3/4 from the top towards the bottom. I tried to salvage it but the girls were too far gone. Anyway, I'd like to thank you for thinking of us. From time to time I have thought of the 'Playboy' magazine and wondered where it came from. Now I know.

Phil: Lt Reeves and I were in a mule we had comandeered from the Air Force contingent up there and went over to check the perimeter on the Hill 950 side [the Blue Sector, manned by C/1/26]. A mortar hit and the jeep went almost over on its side and blew the Lieutenant out. When it landed back on its wheels, I bounced out, and the trenchline was maybe 20 yards away. I just dove into the trench. And I saw—there was another mortar that splashed off to the side and I curled into the trench, and that's when it happened. Shrapnel went through the outer steel pot and hit the inner fiberglass liner. The concussion was hellacious, but it was a good thing that I was curling into the trench at the time. But my little story is nothing compared to what happened to so many. I had written on the helmet a quote from Dylan, "When you ain't got nothing, you ain't got nothing to loose."...

Mike: One day Phil and I were near C Med, making an inventory of the ammo pallets—we had to determine how much ammo came in, what made it in, how much we were receiving—when a barage of incoming hit and I dove into a nearby culvert half full of mud along with Fred McEwan, the Regimental S-4.

Phil: I dove under a nearby jeep with a guy named Bob Weber. He made a remark about "what a way to die." I started to laugh—hysterical laughter, during the incoming. I said, "What are you worried about? They aren't going to find our dog tags!" Because he and I were hiding behind—there had to be 30 pallets of '55' and '05' sitting there that we're hiding behind, under the jeep!

Mike: And, when it was over, Phil gets up out of the culvert. He had been laying on his side, in the mud, so he was half red and half green, head to boot, like a clown! I was yelling for him when he same out, and he said, 'Here!' And I turned around—and—you had to laugh! Like Bozo!...

Phil: My friend, Howie Jones, ended up dying. If he would of stayed in the culvert, he would of been fine. Here's the kid that had probably one of the most dangerous jobs up there because all of those pallets that came in full of ammo—he was the one that had to take them off the helo pad or wherever they landed. He drove a fork-lift. And you couldn't imagine a more dangerous job—he was just riding out there with a helmet and flak jacket on a forklift bringing these pallets back to where they gotta go. And he took it on the 24th of February. His nerves had to be shot. He's perfectly safe laying in that little culvert up there by the POL dump, but he just couldn't take it anymore, and he broke and ran, trying to run to a bunker, and that's when a big piece of shrapnel ripped his neck out...

MY COMRADE

[The following was sent in by Ken Lord (C/1/13)]:

My Comrade was born June 14, 1777. He lived a hard and tattered life. My Comrade was at Ft. McHenry on April 14, 1814. We still sing his praises, because he showed us that no matter how dim the chance of success, there is always hope.

My Comrade was a fighter who didn't know the meaning of the word surrender, because he knows how much his comrades looked up to him.

He was with General Washington on the cold waters of the Potomac.

He was there in World War I, when the cannons glowed red, and good men died in muddy trenches.

Then, when he heard man had finally learned that war was not the answer, he had to leave for the South Pacific, Italy and eventually all of Europe. He didn't say I don't want to go, or I'm too tired, OH NO—He went!

My Comrade was in Korea. He was at Chosin Reservoir and at the Inchon Landing (the day that good men on both sides died, the same day that God cried).

And just when he thought that he could come home with honor, he had to go to a far away place called Vietnam. He thought after all this time he had seen it all, but what he saw was pure hell. He was there at Marble Mountain. My Comrade stood tall at Khe Sanh, but the tears and blood stained him and all those around him.

He came home, even more tattered and worn, but his spirits weren't broken. For he had gone to do a job that his Commander in Chief had him to do.

He was spit on, cursed, tramped on and yes even set on fire. But he shrugged it off because he knew his tour of duty was not over.

My Comrade was the first one called to go to the hot sands of Kuwait. He stood tall in the smoke of burning oil, and he went side by side with his comrades as they beat back the advancing enemy.

And now, some want to persecute my Comrade. Why? He never ran. He fell at Iwo Jima, but his comrades came to his aid, they risked their lives to see him stand tall again.

Well, now my tour of duty is over, but my Comrade is by my side. For you see, my Comrade is my Flag. Now he warms my body, and he drapes my heart. But please don't cry for me. It's not my death, it's just our start.

HONORING THE FLAG

[The following was sent in by Jim Turner (JTAD at Khe Sanh), condensed from a speech by Leo IKl. Thorsness, recipient of the Congressional Medal of Honor]:

You've probably seen the bumper sticker somewhere along the road. It depicts an American Flag, accompanied by the words "These colors don't run." I'm always glad to see this, because it reminds me of an incident from my confinement in North Vietnam at the Hao Lo POW Camp, or the "Hanoi Hilton," as it became known. Then a Major in the US Air Force, I had been captured and imprisoned from 1967 to 1973. Our treatment had been frequently brutal. After three years, however, the beatings and torture became less frequent.

During the last year, we were allowed outside most days for a couple of minutes to bathe. We showered by drawing water from a concrete tank with a homemade bucket. One day as we all stood by the tank, stripped of our clothes, a young Naval pilot named Mike Christian found the remnants of a handkerchief in a gutter that ran under the prison wall. Mike managed to sneak the grimy rag into our cell and began fashioning it into a flag.

Over time we all loaned him a little soap, and he spent days cleaning the material. We helped by scrounging and stealing bits and pieces of anything he could use. At night, under his mosquito net, Mike worked on the flag. He made red and blue from ground-up roof tiles and tiny amounts of ink and painted the colors onto the cloth with watery rice glue. Using thread from his own blanket and a homemade bamboo needle, he sewed on stars.

Early in the morning a few days later, when the guards were not alert, he whispered loudly from the back of our cell, "Hey gang, look here." He proudly held up this tattered piece of cloth, waving it as if in a breeze. If you used your imagination, you could tell it was supposed to be an American flag. When he raised that smudgy fabric, we automatically stood straight and saluted, our chests puffing out, and more than a few eyes had tears.

About once a week the guards would strip us, run us outside and go through our clothing. During one of those shakedowns, they found Mike's flag. We all knew what would happen. That night they came for him.

Night interrogations were always the worst. They opened the cell door and pulled Mike out. We could hear the beginning of the torture before they even had him in the torture cell. They beat him most of the night.

About daylight they pushed what was left of him back through the cell door. He was badly broken; even his voice was gone. Within two weeks, despite the danger, Mike scrounged another piece of cloth and began another flag. The Stars and Stripes, our national symbol, was worth the sacrifice to him. Now whenever I see the flag, I think of Mike and the morning he first waved that tattered emblem of a nation. It was then, thousands of miles from home in a lonely prison cell, that he showed us what it is to be truly free.

BILLY & JOE

For those who don't know me, my name is Billy Roble and my brother Joe (E/2/26) endured the entire siege on Khe Sanh, but, died on September 16, 1968, in a hellpit called LZ MARGO. I was four years old at the time. For years I tried to learn more about my brother, but, was restricted to Vietnam era correspondence and news clippings, all of which praised my brother. Around approximately 1990, Michael Worth and his dear friend, Lucille Biscaglio, contacted my family. Knowing my mother was not the type to correspond immediately, I seized the opportunity to learn more about my brother and wny everyone thought so highly of him.

Corresponding with Mike was easy, but I had no idea what I might say if we were to speak on the phone or in person. Then one day Mike called me. I was dumbstruck, but fortunately Mike wasn't, and we slowly eased into a pleasant conversation.

Mike spoke highly of my brother and my regret at never having the opportunity to know my brother increased. Shortly after this conversation I planned a trip to Pennsylvania to visit my family. Coincidentally, my flight stopped in St. Louis to change planes, but I was unable to obtain a layover without paying a substantial fee as I made my reservations before knowing of the reunion. With the help of Lucille Biscaglio's persistence and the kindness of Kelly Wyvell at TWA I was afforded a free ticket and was able to attend the reunion.

Prior to the reunion, I spent three and half weeks speaking with my family to gather information for a book I plan to write about my brother Joe. During this time I cried the first tears I ever cried as a result of Joe's death while holding my sister Ann's hand. She was a year older than Joe and as well as being siblings, they were best friends. His death was a crushing blow to what was once a person billowing with happiness. As we cried together, she said in regards to Joe's death, "No matter how difficult life's problems may be, they become insignificant in comparison."

This way of thinkng my mother instilled in all of us as children. Though she may never have said it the message was clear in her eyes; pick up the pieces and go on. And amid the tears of loved ones, I went on to St. Louis to meet the men who would adopt me as an honorary member of ECHO 2/26.

While there, Joe's friends couldn't emphasize enough what a great man my brother was and I could not have been treated better if I were a king. I had the time of my life and was sad that we could not spend more time together. Before I knew it, I was on my way back to California with a treasure of memories more valuable than gold. Upon my return I tried several times to write my reflections of the time I had passed in Pennsylvania and St. Louis to no avail. Suddenly, it all came to me and the result is the letter you are now reading. And now I will reflect what I truly feel and have always felt in my heart.

I grew up thinking war was a glorious event and that I would have a chance to demonstrate the valor that my brother and so many like him demonstrated. My tour as a Marine was very different from my brother's and at some point I came to a realization which I feel was similar to my brother's: to keep those around me in high spirits and just get through with my duty. Seeing my siblings, my mother, and the different people I encountered at the reunion and the many tears shed, I realized war is something I hope future generations will not have to endure.

I salute all Vietnam veterans, my brother and all those who lost loved ones to war. All of them fought for a freedom they believed in. As one who lost a loved one, I believe that instead of rehashing our losses we would do those we lost greater honor by educating future generations of the cruelty of war. We all need to say our piece and et the world know what we have been and are going through.

I have enclosed two pages from a letter my brother wrote home from Vietnam to try and help those who may be a bit confused as to what their mission was in Vietnam. Fighting for a peoples freedom is always a worthy cause and every American in Vietnam fought that mission. Every Vietnam vet has the right to hold their head high in regard to that mission.

After I left the Marines there were two words I thought I would never say again until I attended the reunion: Semper Fidelis. Those words have much more meaning to me since the reunion. I remembered what my mission was in this life and will do my utmost to bring peace and happiness to those I encounter. I have said my words for now and encourage all those affected by their wartime experiences to say theirs and let the world know your story.

—William A. Roble.

[The following, on letterhead "Hospital U.S. Naval Support Activity, Danang, Vietnam, are the two pages of the letter from Joe Roble]:

When I came over here in November, it was because I wanted to play John Wayne for awhile and also to get some first hand knowledge of how the war was going for us. That seems like a long time ago; I have grown up quite a bit since then. I kept wondering if we were doing any good by being here and are we the ones that should be doing this job. I say yes to both questions.

Why shouldn't we do the job? We're the best equipped to do it. And it is a job that has to be done. If we quit now, the only ones who will gain anything are the Communists.

About two weeks ago, I picked up a personal reason for fighting. I was on a convoy going back to my outfit and I saw this little boy standing alongside the road. For some reason he reminded me a lot of Billy. For awhile, I just thought and stared. Then I said to myself, why shouldn't he have the same rights and privileges that Billy has? I am prepared to give my life trying to get him these rights.

If anything happens to me over here, I don't want a lot of crying and blaming someone for my being here. I want to be here! I would much raqther yiou be proud that I died for a worthwhile cause that I understood and finally believed in...

Till later, Reb.

PRIDE

I've been a member of the Khe Sanh Vets since its inception...Like everyone who was at or around Khe Sanh, I still retain vivid memories over the past 30 years.

I arrived in Nam Dec 8, 67. Assigned to "C" Co., 2nd platoon of 1/9. I was seventeen when I enlisted, turned 18 on the day before I graduated Parris Island. To put it mildly, I was not exactly the second coming of Chesty Puller. I barely made it through Boot Camp. I was one unmotivated young Marine!

From the time I entered boot camp, through infantry training at LeJeune, jungle trainint at Camp Pendleton, even while our unit was at Camp Evans through December and January I never felt any Esprit de Corps.

I believe the day it all changed was the 21st of January '68. Our platoon was on a daylight patrol off hill 64 (outside Camp Evans) when we were suddenly called back. My squad leader, Jim Murray, called a meeting and told us to pack our gear, clean our rifles and be ready to move up to a place called Khe Sanh the following morning.

The next day, our entire battalion formed up on the LZ at Camp Evans and, after what seemed like an eternity, our squad was loaded onto a CH-46. A short while afrter take-off, I remember looking out the window of our chopper and all I could see was a sky full of CH-46s. I had never seen so many choppers in all my life! I sat there, thinking of when I was a little boy. My father would tell us about the invasion of Normandy in 1944. He told us of the awesome sight of all of the American and Brittish ships filling the horizon.

I never really appreciated fully what my father was trying to describe until that 21st day of January 1968. I can honestly say it was the first time in the seven short months I had been in the Marine Corps that I was proud to be a Marine. I was so darn proud!

After landing on the strip, our battalion quickly formed in a column of two, and headed out on the long trek out to the Rock Quarry.

I was wounded March 13th. My life was saved by three Navy Corpsmen (all of whom were killed on April 16th), and a tremendous triage team down at Charlie Med.

I spent another two years in the Corps, including a second tour in Nam, a "Med Cruise" and various stateside assignments. In addition, I've been a Police Officer for the past 26 years. You know, I have never, ever felt that sense of pride—in myself, my comrades or my country—as I did on that 21st day of January 1968.

—William Biolsi

AN EARLY VISITOR

In your recent issue #42, Red Clay, "The Siege," brought back memories of my tour in the I Corps area.

Arriving in country Nov, 1965, orientation, shots, to supply room and a plane trip to Phu Bai and to Hue, eventually to Quang Tri. Assigned to MACV Advisory Team #3, later to Adv Tm #4, I helped keep radio operators at Gio Linh, Cam Lo, Hue, Quang Tri, Lang Vei, several check-points along Rt. 9. I trudged quite a bit in I Corps area to deliver SOI & SSI to our units in the field, this included river patrol and Khe Sanh.

In July 1966, the 1st ARVN Div, with MACV personnel along with heavy support from the Marines started an operation at Cam Lo. Army called it LAM SOM 289, the Marines called it HASTINGS. I think these joint operations eventually moved CPs to Dong Ha and under Gen Walt's command, the Marines took full charge.

The First ARVN Inf. Div. was not capable to handling the hard core NVN divisions they met, 808, 806, I think, there were more, but age has dimmed my mind. I do know when I left Dong Ha in Nov 1966, things were not looking so good for either side...

YET ANOTHER MEMORY FROM TET 68

They filled the skies with smoke and a high pitched sound upon impact they shook the ground.
If you were in your bunker just trying to get some rest, their on the hour incoming test would have you at your best to keep from dying.
Still no one to shoot at!
Even the hardened rats would scatter, they'd run over you just as brave as a two year vet.
Some of us would smoke to forget the day before when we saw a friend end his tour.
R&R was somewhat of a relief, so I've been told, I thought it best, I'd stay, didn't want to leave my Ontos in others' hands. I took pride in how I kept it up and running.
The fog in the mornings were most refreshing, after a night of incoming their favorite time to harass. Oh, don't try to take a shower. I did, embarrassing to me I tell ya!
The hard hat and flak jacket slowed me down, not a lot of room in the "Pig" so as long as I could get away with it
I wore a cover (green cover) and black T-shirt or field jacket with my grease gun (.45 cal.) close by, sighting-in the 106s was a must every morning. Cleaning and maintaining the 4-50 cal. spotting rifles too. Then I'd dust off the 60 cal. We each had our own .45 cal. pistol also. You can see even though the Ontos was on its way out, we had great fire power and could hold our own in a fire fight and gave support to the grunts, when called to the line or the end of the air strip to fire on a suspected enemy trench or position, I'd be among the first to be at their beckon call. Anything to help the time pass faster and stay away from the CP and air strip their favorite place to shell. Then learning of the hill fights and other areas of KSCB that enemy fire and we were kept on the alert.
The red dirt got into all my stuff even letters sent home. I believe I felt it even to the bone. All my hopes for you who survived, to be in a much better place than I. Enjoy the moment and remember that there's a song for every mother's son.
Semper Fi, my brothers and sisters.

CANNONCOCKERS

I am writing to add my two cents worth to the comments submitted by our CO, Bill O'Connor, and printed in the Fall '96 issue of Khe Sanh Veteran.

I was new in-country when assigned to "Charlie" Battery, 1/13. I landed at Khe Sanh during a mortar barrage on what I believe was the first helicopter bringing replacements that made it into the base. I had been assigned "temporary additional duty" at the Defense Language Institute for three months in Monterey, California. Just prior to flying to the 'nam, we used to watch the news on T.V. and wonder about the fate of the 5,000 "beleaguered Marines" at the cut-off Khe Sanh base.

At any rate, I will testify to the veracity of Captain O'Conner's remarks about the "gun grunts." During the "Siege" and for months after Captain O'Connor left, I observed the gun grunts setting fuses, loading charges, and returning fire during intense incoming. I did not see one man falter or hestitate to carry out his duty.

I was in the FDC section and helped "work up" the mission. Many times, after the missions wee "worked up" and the "poop" relayed to the guns, we ran out of the bunker and set fuses, loaded charges and passed ammo to the gunners.

At Khe Sanh, I remember the sound of enemy rounds going off in the air; the sound of thousands of "darts" hitting the canvass sand bags outside, and the "CS" gas lingering in the air at dusk just over the heads of the gunners as they returned fire...The job was "Well Done."

IN MEMORY OF TWO FALLEN FRIENDS

The years others knew as youth, I spent learning the meaning of death. The times others spent learning to live, I passed hoping to live through endless nights. The moments others remember as laughs in the classroom, I remember terror in the jungle. The instants of pleasure taken for granted by others, I remember as forgotten hopes:

Long ago, crushed by the reality of war,
The unfulfilled dreams of others are yet to be thought by me.
Since I am in search of my elusive youth,
Looking for years lost in combat,
Which are no more—and will never be—
Why do I walk with the shadows of my past?
Because of my fellow veterans, still fighting the war for inner peace.
I also have experienced that war
You can never be closer to a man
Than when you struggle with him—
Either to kill him, or help him overcome death.

THE BAIG LETTER

[Mirza M. "Harry" Baig was the Target Intelligence Officer (TIO), born 13 Jan 1932 in Panchgani, India, and educated in England, he will always be remembered for his distinctive accent and his unusual sense of humor by those who remember seeing this strange man in the COC with his Boy Scout pack. He is one of the main players in the Khe Sanh siege battle, but little known. It was his great intelligence and, even more so, his creativity, which contributed so much. Devising artillery strikes to be "timed on target" during air-strikes (the "mini" and "micro" arc-lights), creating pre-arranged artillery strikes so infantry on patrol would only have to call "Grapes," or "Apples," to obtain a pre-arranged set of targets struck, first interpreting the confusing signals given by the newly-seeded electronic sensors (MUSCLE SHOALS "Spot Light Reports") so they made sense, his genius ensured that the NVA never were able to "mass" into a sufficient force to overrun any of our positions.

Following his participation in the Siege, he briefed Mr. George Allen of the CIA who recalls the hair-raising account of the siege battle that he related.

He was then sent to Bangkok, Thailand, for duty with the MAG. Along with his wife, Diane, and daughter, Cecil, he was assassinated on 20 April 1971 while in the fourth floor of the Imperial Hotel where a fire was caused by a grill unnoticed by a dozing cook. Some knew that the fire exits had been locked from the outside making escape impossible.

The following are some excerpts from a letter he wrote to the Historical Branch, USMC].

My duties, in detail, were as follows:

a. Target Intelligence and Information: Plotting and recording all known enemy positions—automatic weapons, mortars, AA weapons, artillery, bunkers, fortified areas and trenches, logistic dumps (by type), camp and assembly areas, truck and track vehicle parks, and rocket sites and launch areas...There were over 3,000 separate targets within a 15 kilometer radius of Khe Sanh—that I knew of.

b. Muscle Shoals: Plotting the sensor strings, receiving, recording and responding to an average of 40 spot light reports a night, determining the types of fire to use against these targets, analysing the reports and determining their meaning in light of other intelligence, taking the proper action (in a community which knew nothing of sensors, this caused some near violent discussions).

c. Arclights: Targeting and initiating strike requests for 95% of all B-52 missions in the Scotland AO at the rate of 8 per 24 hour period; deciding when to recommend a diversion to an emergency target; convincing the Division Air Officer of the same.

d. Fire Planning: Preparing the nightly fire plans which included the attack capabilities of everything in the air or on the ground larger than an 81mm mortar; planning and targetting all TPQ-10 radar controlled air strikes in the Scotland AO; preparing the schedule for Mini and Micro Arclights, CBU misions, and "time on target" artillery fires; planning the fires of each artillery battery (and sometimes each piece)....I read the writings of General Giap and I am a student of 18th century siege warfare and First World War artillery tactics and techniques....

INTRODUCTION

... a 3d Marine Division G-2 augmentation team was flown to the Combat Base for the purpose of assisting in the development of intelligence and target information. It consisted of myself and Major Robert B. Coolidge. A third member, Major Jerry E. Hudson, had arrived earlier and had been appointed S-2 of the Regiment. Major Coolidge became the Division G-2 Representative and Special Intelligence Officer (SSO) and I became the Regimental Target Intelligence and Informatgion Officer (TIO). Together, we developed the intelligence and target information, which helped deny the ambitions of General Giap and destroy the best part of the two enemy divisions....

ASSUMPTIONS

I went to Khe Sanh with four assumptions in mind:

a. That the enemy would conduct the investment of the base in accordance with a master plan, prepared and promulgated by a headquarters other than that of the Field Force conduclting the siege.

b. That, because of this, the PAVN commander in the field could not and would not alter the battle plan to any significant degree, irrespective of the facts bearing on the subsequent situation on account of doctrinal requirements—other than to retire from field.

c. That the modus operandi was predictable and the general concept determinable once the opening moves had occurred (or revealed—as in fact it happened).

d. That the plan encompassed classic, siege tactics as practised and studied by General Giap during and after the siege of Dien Bien Phu and as modified by experience gained at Con Thien in September 1967.

INITIAL REMARKS

The actual battle plan for the reduction of KSCB and its surrounding outposts was revealed by Lieutenant La Thanh Tonc, PAVN, on 20 January 1968. The enemy never deviated from that plan. Tonc's revelation of the concept of operations, prior and detailed knowledge of NVA methodology, the requirements of siege warfare, and the lessons of Dien Bien Phu and Con Thien, gave the intelligence and targets team all the information we needed to plan the nature of the supporting arms countermeasures. ... events tended to prove that we were correct. The manner in which Colonel Lownds assimilated his intelligence and welded together his fighting assets, from private to pilot, speaks volumes of how effective was the Marine response to General Giap. In a sentence, Colonel Lownds employed traditional Marine tactics and doctrine of the 20th Century against an enemy who chose to put his faith and fortune in the usages of the 18th....

DETAILED DISCUSSION

The battle plan for Khe Sanh, as revealed by Lieutenant Tonc, had a complementary plan, which was to have taken effect in the Eastern DMZ..at the same time and on the same night as the commencement of the overture to Hills 881S and 861. Until that time, I was the Division G-2 clandestine, intelligence coordinator for military intelligence agencies in the Division TAOR. The 15th Marine Counterintelligence Team and U.S. Army intelligence units had established collection nets far across the Ben Hai River. These nets had penetrated several NVA headquarters and other organizations. One of the tasks of the nets was to report the movements of the 4th Battalion, Van An Rocket Artillery Regiment, and of the Vinh Linh Rocket Battery, together with those of their escorting infantry. These units had caused much damage to the Dong Ha and Cua Viet bases earlier during the summer and autumn of 1967. Close surveillance by a process too complicated to explain herein and rapid counterfires by artillery and naval gunfire had subsequently prevented them from reaching their firing positions during the late fall and early winter of that year. On the night of the 19th-20th January 1968, the rocket units moved south once more. Reported and traced along their route by the agents of the 15th Counterintelligence Team, the batteries and their escort were caught and trapped against a bend in the Cua Viet River. Prisoners taken reported that their mission was to rocket the airstrips at Dong Ha and Quang Tri on the early morning of the 21st to prevent helcopters from flying in support of Hills 881S and 861. So this part of the enemy's plan also failed. (On the 23d of January, I went to Khe Sanh)...

ARCLIGHTS

Our entire defense philosophy was to allow the enemy to surround us closely, to mass about us, to reveal his troop and logistic routes, to establish his dumps and assembly areas, his truck parks and artillery positions, and to prepare his siege works as energetically as he desired. The result was an enormous quantity of targets, located in dispersed but common areas. Such complexes wee ideal for heavy bombers...Once the enemy had firmly embraced us, we had him fixed. His siege doctrine and battle plan (prepared at a headquarters other than Khe Sanh) forced him to stay; and the facts of military circumstances and logic bound him to perform foreseeable and determinable functions. He had to do certain things and to be in certain places because, given the situation, there was little choice open to him. Arclights were dropped on all the places where the enemy was known or estimated to be. Bombs were not cast into the jungle just for sake of doing so. The vast number of secondary explosions and the considerable quantity of casualties, reported by the Bru, which friendly forces discovered later, clearly indicated that our concepts were correct and the targeting accurate. The point ot emphasize here is that the principles applied were those of normal Marine supporting arms doctrine, which has guided us for three wars. 95% of all Arclight strikes were targeted and requested from Khe Sanh—NOT Saigon as certain authorities would have us believe. Without the Arclights we would have been hard pressed; and, to my mind, no praise is high enough for the men who flew those missions.

ARTILLERY

..Our motto was, "Be generous." The artillery initiative was ours; and we held it throughout the siege, despite the worst croaking of sundry, inexperienced correspondents...Later, as we learned finesse, air was given the targets south of the base and west of the maximum range of the 175mm guns; 1/13 was given any target, whose range required a maximum ordinate of less than 14,000 feet (altitude of TPQ run); and the 175mm guns were assigned targets to the north, northwest and east of the base. Such were the pre-planned fires....Newspaper correspondents never knew of the total weight and effectiveness of our artillery. Inexperienced as they were, they magnified the volume of the enemy incoming rounds and disregarded the relative ineffectiveness of the enemy artillery. Had the NVA been capable of our artillery techniques, they could and would have blown us out of Khe Sanh. The siege clearly established not only the bankruptcy of the NVA master plan, but also the ineptitude of their vaunted artillery. And the Press never saw this clearly.

INTELLIGENCE

...Intelligence conceived that the NVA would conduct a formal siege in the best traditions of the 18th Century. They had learned these tactics at Dien Bien Phu. At Con Thien, they had learned something else; namely, that we never conducted B-52 strikes at ranges less than 3,000 meters, rarely made TPQ runs at less than 2,000 meters, and hardly ever fired unobserved, unadjusted artillery missions less than 1,000 meters from friendly positions. We knew these things, too. It was obvious, therefore, that General Giap would attempt to tuck himself as closely about us as possible for safety's sakd (and to facilitate his construction program). A siege campaign involves three distinct phases: arrival on the scene and investment of the fortress; construction of siege works and preparation of supporting facilities; "T-ing" the sapheads and the final assault.

The S-2 Section, through intelligence channels, used every discovery system to develop a picture of enemy activities...When compared against the target map and reasoned against known enemy doctrine in like cases, the Khe Sanh intelligence community was able to estimate to a high degree of accuracy the intentions of the enemy on a day to day basis. Colonel Lownds' intimate knowledge of the terrain around Khe Sanh put a final filip to the dish that was served to him daily. Except for the attack on Hill 861A, the enemy never surprised us—and he should not have done so then....

In late February, Majors Coolidge and Hudson discovered the exact locations (6 figure grid) of twelve artillery positions and two major ammunition dumps.. These were concentrated in two general areas to the south. Two arclight strikes, already airborne, were diverted to these two target areas. After the bombers had departed, the ground erupted for some forty minutes on account of the secondary explosions, observable from KSCB. Two weeks later these officers repeated their performance in another area...

SUMMARY CONCLUSIONS

There is no question that to Col Lownds goes the credit for the successful defense of Khe Sanh and for the destruction of two NVA divisions. To my mind, his greatest gift lay in his ability to use his staff. Recognizing that his offensive capability lay with his supporting arms, Col Lownds called upon the FSCC for more and greater efforts. Given enough supplies, he could have held indefinitely.

But, some of the credit must go to General Giap and the NVA. They have us a good fight; and in the process they destroyed themselves. A man and a force, both known as past-masters of guerrilla warfare, infiltration techniques and siege tactics, were finally revealed as stolid, rigid, inflexible and unbelievably foolish opponents. Our experience, during those 77 days, legitimately raises the question, "Who besieged whom?" For a man, who in civil life was alleged to have been a teacher of mathematics, General Giap had not studied his "Vauban" very closely. Had he profited from the teachings of that 18th Century French master of siegecraft, Giap could have caught us in the 'toils of Euclid'—to our possible discomfort.

REVIEW OF TV PROGRAM: " Vietnam: A Soldiers' Story" (Khe Sanh segment)

Finally, someone focused on what is the true story of Vietnam, and Khe Sanh in particular: the individual person on the ground and how life was in those times and places, rather than on the tactics, strategies, and questions which are attempts to make sense of what is essentially human (which is far greater than the mind can grasp) and what is essentially irrational. Debates will continue for centuries, as they do regarding the Civil War, as to interpretations. But the conditions of life for the average trooper tells the real story—at least "real" for those of us who were "there!" In this sense the existentialist philosophers have it right: "existence is prior to essence," or, better, "what we experience in life is always so much greater than anything we can say about it or any attempt to understand it."

This program got that part of the story right. It tied for viewership with a previous TLC release on sexuality, and undoubtedly many now have a better appreciation of what "Khe Sanh" means for those of us who were there.

As with anyone doing something on Khe Sanh who wasn't there—even the "technical advisors" to the program who reviewed it—there were several criticisms marr an otherwise excellent presentation that will do much to promote a better understanding of how things really were. The following corrections must be noted in a program that is 99% excellent.

(1) Commencement of Operation Niagara. The program states that this B-52 campaign began in early Feb as a result of the NVA's attack. Actually, it began 6 Jan with the commencement of the target acquisition phase. It was approved 16 Jan by the American ambassador to Laos, and was scheduled to be implemented 21 Jan.

(2) The program stated that a "Marine" reconnaissance team went out during the Siege. This never happened, although there were several teams out when the Siege began. (NURSE was boxed-in with arty and extracted 21 Jan; team PISTON ROD managed to evade, was protectively "housed" by Bru, and returned 23 Jan). The only recon teams that were dispatched were Army soldiers from FOB-3, ARVN Rangers of the 37th Bn, and a few CAC OSCAR patrols into nearby Ta Cong ville in the opening days of the Siege.

(3) The program states the official American KIA count as 195. The 26th Marines Command Chronology indicates 204, a figure also reported to Congress during testimony on sensors. However, if one consults the various unit Command Chronologies and After Action Reports, one obtains the following: 1/26 (Jan: 5, Feb: 44, Mar: 47); 2/26 (Jan:1, Feb: 25, Mar: 16); 3/26 (Jan-Mar: 46); 1/9 (Jan-Mar: 72); 1/13 (Jan-Mar: 18), for a total of 274. It would appear that if 1/9's total (72) is subtracted from the total (274), one arrives at 202, very close to the 26Mar total (204); perhaps 1/9 was not included since 1/9, while OPCON (under operational control) of 26th Marines, was not ADCOM (under administrative control). Of course, these totals do not include the various support units (recon, engineers, shore party, Seabees, etc.), nor the Army or Air Force (Lang Vei, FOB3, 37th Signal Bn, etc.). We have an accounting with names, units and dates of 388 KIA (20 Jan - 31 Mar), plus 151 KIA (01-15 Apr) and 43 (16 Apr) for those units that were at Khe Sanh. Isn't it time that these casualty figures were finally resolved?

(4) Gen Westmoreland seems to have an inappropriately large credit for "calling the shots" (literally) at Khe Sanh, and Gen Tompkins, Col. Lownds and his staff aren't even mentioned who, in fact, controlled most of the air, arty, even B52s, as well as the tactics (limiting patrolling, etc.)

(5) There is a complete lack of any mention of Army forces or the attacks or life on the various outposts. Of course, in only 60 minutes, it is difficult to cover such a complex battle. But there surely is an injustice to those very brave men who fought at the battle of Khe Sanh Ville (21 Jan), the battle of Hill 861 (21 Jan), the Battle of Hill 861-A (5 Feb), the battle of Lang Vei (7 Feb), the battle Hill 64 (8 Feb), and the ARVN engagements.

(6) The statement that the 175s at Camp Carroll were ineffective due to their distance, aside from being inaccurate, is a slam against those dedicated artillerymen who gave such needed support as during the Battle of Hill 861-A and general target coverage around the base. While we did have artillery batteries at either end of the base to support the other end should it receive a human wave attack, we would need to depend on the 175s.

(7) There is a statement that the anticipated asssault never occurred when, in fact, during the night of 29Feb/01Mar, a regimental-size force of NVA approached the 37th ARVN lines. They were detected by the electronic sensors and decimated by COFRAM munitions, but a recon of the area later showed wave after wave of NVA, poised to attack. The assault did occur, but never penetrated.

(8) Photo coverage of bunkers gives the impression that all of us lived like those who were fortunate enough to have specially-made bunkers lived. It fails to reflect the abysmal living condition that we really endured.

Overall, however, the video is a major accomplishment, and by imagination, one can easily transfer what happened on the Combat Base proper to some of the outposts. Life there, however, was even more extreme—like Hill 950 being out of water 7 days!

BOOK REVIEW

Ghosts and Shadows by Phil Ball, 216pp., published by McFarland & Co., $24.95 (plus $4.00 shipping/handling). Orders: 1-800-253-2187.

Ever wonder what happened after the Siege battles in early '68 at Khe Sanh? Actually, quite a lot happened! In fact, there were more American casualties at Khe Sanh during April-July than January-March. There was a tank ambush, there was another attempt to overrun the combat base itself, there were ferocious fire-fights, there were stories of battlefield heroism that continue to inspire, and there was the same tragedy of war that we all know who were there in it.

Phil Ball has written a complete account of his Vietnam tour, starting with bootcamp experiences, going through his entire Vietnam tour, and concluding with the aftermath: what the war did to him, his life now. This is a "Must Read" book. The language, feelings, and facts are all here, along with well-illustrated diagrams, photos, index, in a book that is captivating, evocative, and for those who were there, so very, very real.

Of particular significance is Phil Ball's treatment of the Battle Foxtrot Ridge on 28 May 1968, just east of Khe Sanh Combat Base, on Route 9. Like all of us who were "there" in a particularly horrific combat event, in which we want to account for all the men who were there, all the things they did, all the details to get the whole story, Phil has re-examined this nightmare battle in which Fox Co., 2/3, was almost annihilated atop a hill outpost, was supported by napalm strikes that were too close and almost wiped out the defenders, where it was "touch and go" all night long. It is the kind of account that someone who was on the Jacques Patrol (25 Feb), on Hill 64 (8 Feb), at Lang Vei (7 Feb), on Hill 861-A (5 Feb), on Hill 861 (21 Jan), in Khe Sanh Ville (21 Jan), on the "Revenge Patrol" (30 Mar), and so many others, might very well identify with. Phil Ball has compiled an outstanding account, detailed and factual, full of the fury of the battle and the feelings of the men. It is not just a "war story" but a human story of desperation, courage, sacrifice, and everything else that reflects the "true" story of what happened.

Phil Ball's book is a great tribute to the many brave individual Marinjes who gave so much, not just in heroic moments, but in just managing to live through days in the Nam. His book will be a lasting historical record of great significance to those in the future who want to know "what it was really like," not just the distorted images from movies or books mainly from non-Nam-vet sources. Hopefully, his very well-written, captivating book will encourage others to write down their memoirs also.

Phil Ball has been a member of our Khe Sanh Vets organization for several years and is currently struggling with a major physical illness.

BOOK REVIEW

Night of the Silver Stars, The Battle of Lang Vei by William R. Phillips, 208pp., published by Naval Institute Press, $29.95, order: 1-800-224-2406. Also available through the Military Book Club.

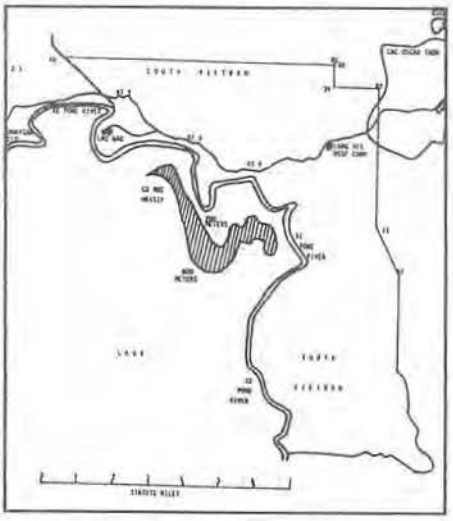
Mr. William R. Phillips, who served nine years active service in the US Marine Corps, has written the definitive account of this very significant battle in which the NVA first introduced tanks to their war in South Vietnam, a battle that continues to evoke strong passions among soldiers and Marines, and a battle in which so much heroic action was displayed. The first of four Medals of Honor for those in the Khe Sanh area was awarded here.

Mr. Phillips relates the story in crisp, chilling detail. His account is comprehensive and a great, great tribute to those very brave defenders who miraculously survived the ordeal they experienced. Mr. Phillips also provides very useful background information on participants and events that sculpts a living, human situation.

This is a "Must Have" book for anyone interested in Lang Vei—about which much has been written, generally in articles, interested in Khe Sanh, or interested in Special Forces, or just wants to read an inspiring book about heroes—of which, contrary to the belief of many civilians, there were actually many in Vietnam.

There are a few errors, but they do not detract in any way from this excellent presentation.

On p. 14, the limits of the TAOR for Lang Vei are said to limit patrolling. Actually, the TAOR was some 7 miles wide from the border, and eleven miles long:



The note on p. 16 concerning the convoy of 175s coming to Khe Sanh on 21 July 1967, that the enemy knew we were bringing the convoy, is probably not reflected by the examination of the NVA positions following the engagement with patrols—not only from 1/26 (as indicated), but also from 3/26. Examination of the NVA positions reflected they were preparing to be emplaced for some time, and that their plan was most probably to sever Rt. 9 during the up-coming monoon season, perhaps in conjunction with the major attack on the combat base.

The animosity by Marines over timbers seen arriving to Lang Vei is perhaps a bit exaggerated since most timbers came via convoy on Rt. 9. The Marines, other than the company manning the "Bridge Site" just east of the Combat Base, would not have noticed these. The air-drops are made at sufficient altitude, especially given the surrounding terrain, that those on the Combat Base would not have seen them. Of course, timbers for the construction of FOB-3 did arrive on the airstrip.

On p. 61, the city of Tchepone is mentioned when it should be Ban Houei Sane. Tchepone (XD3244) is considerably west, some ten miles, whereas Ban Houei Sane (XD625379) is the location that fits the description. Tchepone fell in May, 1961. Also, BV-33 fell on 25 Jan following an attack by tanks, not 22 Jan, as indicated.

The delay of artillery support for Lang Vei (p. 79) is due to the SAV-A-PLANE doctrine which prohibited artillery fire from the moment air was requested (so rounds don't hit the aircraft). This is usually coordinated by a DASC, but the DASC at Khe Sanh was not yet operational.

Concerning the patrol to Lang Vei before the Siege (p. 114), Capt Raymond made the patrol. Col Lownds may have recalled a sweep by 1/26 the last week of December, 1967 and the first week of Jan, 1968. It could not have been a battalion-sized operation in November since there was only one battalion at Khe Sanh at that time (1/26), manning the hill outposts and the base perimeter. 3/26 didn't arrive until 13 December.

The above are very small details that have little to do with the overall excellence of this significant book, well-written, well-documented, well worth the time to read.

Recommended highly.

Lead, Follow, or get the Hell out of the Way! by Ron Yerman, 156 pages, published by Vangtage Press, $16.95, 516 West 34th St., New York NY 10001.

Third Force Reconnaissance Company was formed at Camp LeJeune on 4 Oct 1965 as part of various reinforcing units destined to serve in Vietnam. Formed mainly from personnel of 2nd Force Recon, the unit subsequently underwent a long and thorough training, making it one of the most highly-qualified units at the time.

Unfortunately, the unit was sent to Vietnam piece-meal, and part reached Khe Sanh in January, 1967, to replace the long-range recon asset that had been operating there, Project DELTA. Senior Officer Present, Khe Sanh (Col Horne) had been disappointed that DELTA was unable to field an optimum number of patrols adequately to cover the area, and had requested teams from the force recon company. While at Khe Sanh, 3d Force Recon Detachment soon found itself entangled in some ferocious firefights, sustaining the first Marine KIA at Khe Sanh.

One of the legendary characters of 3d Force was Jimmy Capers, a black Marine who had been part of 1st Force Recon Company, now a part of 3d Force, and eventually retired as a Major and XO of 2d Force Recon Company, perhaps the only Marine to have been a member of all three active duty Force Recon Companies.

Jimmy Capers has never received appropriate recognition commensurate with the admiration of the men he served with. This book makes a partial contribution towards that end.

Basically a memoir of Ron Yerman's experiences and impressions, the book is easy to read and provides an insight into how one force recon Marine experienced his tour as well as an insight into just who force recon Marines are.

Those in the business of first forming First Force Recon Co., while putting all applicants through a Herculean application test, demanding the utmost of physical conditioning, always emphasized that it was not the physical prowess that really mattered; it was really a matter of mental strength—which caused the determination to get them through the demanding physical "entrance test." It is the mind that wins battles. Thus, many of these exhibited an inventiveness that is uncanny. An example is indicated on p. 44 with authenticating a radio transmission.

Unfortunately, there are numerous misspellings throughout the book. There is "Way Phu Bai" which gives the correct pronunciation, but should, of course, be "Hue Phu Bai," and there is "Kasan," which should be "Khe Sanh." People's names: "Fey" should be "Feyh;" "Ernest" should be "Ernst," "Wilson" should be "Willson," and there is an officer "Sordan."

Yerman writes of a patrol to rescue POWs. Appearing towards the end of the book, it would seem to have occurred in 1967. Actually, Operation DOUBLETALK (as the patrol was known) inserted 1705, 14 Jan 67 (into YC883795) and made contact with a Montagnard VC. They were able to locate the camp, now deserted and no longer being used, and were able to operate under the nose of the VC, in some cases at 15 meters or less, while remaining undetected up until the time they had actually found the camp and were in the process of searching it.

Yerman is generous with his opinions of others in this book, at times critical. It is a book that provides an insight into the perspective a trooper might have viewed what was happening, and thus gives insight into what happened that will never appear in official histories.

THE STORY OF "LITTLE ONE"

[In late July, 1984, James E. Schemelia made a series of tapes of his experiences, mainly on Hill 881-South during the Siege. The following are excerpts from those tapes].

Both my twin brother, George, and I joined the Marine Corps on 19 June 1967, both graduated from Parris Island where both of us were housemouses. We enlisted on the buddy plan and went to Vietnam together, reaching Vietnam November, 1967. From DaNang we were trucked up to Camp Evans. A few of the sick bodies had come out with wet feet. George and I had spoken to a few of them, and they said the company was up at Con Thien and that they were suffering heavy casualties. So at that time, George and I, didn't feel it was a good idea for both of us to stay in India Company. So we went over to the S-1 and had a talk with him and decided it would be best if one of us left India Company, and my brother George agreed he should go back.

Several days later the company came back out of the field and they were about 50% strength. We didn't like the looks of the Company when it came back out of the field—tired, ragged, some were wounded. It didn't even look like a Company; it looked more like a couple of platoons. It was about that point I got a little bit worried and that's when I started talking to George about the possibility of one of us going back.

The next day George got on a convoy and headed back towards DaNang. I recall going down to the ammo bunker and getting him some fresh ammo for his rifle, some dry ammo and about half a dozen hand grenades and I tossed them up to the truck and the truck pulled out, the company pulled out, and that's the last I saw him. I was assigned to India Company, 2nd Platoon, and I was pretty much relieved when I saw him pull out, although I hated to see him leave.

After the company had regrouped we saw a few patrols out of Camp Evans...

From Camp Evans, we were helilifted up to Khe Sanh and of course none of us knew where it was. When we got there it looked pretty well established. There was bunkers, an airstrip. Of course it was raining; the mud was dark red-orange, very thick. We took five steps and you had to take a knife out and scrape it off your boots so you could walk again.

The way I'd describe Khe Sanh at the time: it was very peaceful. We did run some short patrols out of Khe Sanh. We didn't make any enemy contact. We'd return, eat chow. India Co didn't have any manned bunkers. We just set up our ponchos. We stayed inside the ponchos, out of the sun, in the daytime. At night time we took up two-man fighting positions. Our fighting positions were somewhere in the RED Sector, in the northern part of the combat base.

We were heli-lifted to 881-South at night time or in the very early hours of the morning and I can recall my first glimpse of 881. Choppers touched down on top of the LZ and we had all gotten out of the helicopters and were just standing around the bunkers. At that time I can recall alot of the bunkers had lights on and there wasn't any real sense of feeling that the enemy was anywhere in the area because of the way the Marines who occupied the hill before us were behaving.

As soon as all the helicopters had dropped the entire company off, we single-filed off the side of the hill and we went several days—we headed out towards Laos, to Hill 918. We found some old NVA fighting positions. We sat on the ridgelines at night and sent out ambushes. We made no contact. Then we returned to the hill and helicopters picked us up and took us back to the base.

I look back now and reflect how crazy it was for just a company to be haded that far out of Khe Sanh and knowing later that there was just thousands of North Vietnamese just hiding there, just waiting, not wanting to make contact with us. It's amazing that any of us came back off any of those patrols.

...On Christmas Day at Khe Sanh it was sort of special for all of us. Marine Corps takes care of its servicemen, its Marines, on its holidays—Christmas Day, Marine Corps Birthday, that sort of thing, and they had everything from soup to nuts up there for Christmas dinner—hot turkey, cranberry cause, mashed potatoes, gthree or four other kinds of vegetables, fruits and nuts and cakes, cookies, and there was more than enough to eat for everybody. We got a beer ration. Of course the beer was warm, pretty hot—there wasn't any ice. We all sat around drinking a warm can of beer. Then we all got the word that there was a C-130 coming in from Japan carrying ice-cream. I thought it was strange how a plane could land in a place like that, as hot as it was, and distribute ice-cream to 5,000 Marines.

At night time, Christmas night, that's the first time I really got a good feeling that I was part of India Company. I didn't feel like a stranger anymore. We sat around a camp fire at night time which even that was kind of unreal—there were alot of camp fires around Khe Sanh that night. I hadn't received any Christmas packages from anyone and alot of the other guys, they had, and we sat around the camp fire with Lt Thomas and he'd gotten a package from home and he had all sorts of things in his package and he just passed it around the camp fire and everybody else had gotten packages—some had gotten cookies, fruit and Christmas cards, and everybody was sharing whatever they had with everybody else. That really made my Christmas. That was really important to me and I don't ever think I'll forget that.

Many a night standing bunker watch on Hill 881 during the siege, I would look down at Khe Sanh, see the fires burning—of course, they were different fires then—they were fires from bunkers that were being hit, ammo dumps and things being blown up. It was hard to believe that Christmas I had been up there sitting around a camp fire singing Christmas carols with a bunch of my buddies, and how it all changed.

On December 26th, in the very dark hours of the morning, the entire Company saddled up and single-file headed out the north gate of Khe Sanh, down the road, through the trees, down through a stream and not even knowing where we were going. Our final destination was Hill 881-South. We left—it was, I think, four or five in the morning, and we didn't reach Hill 881-South till sometime late that evening. It was a very long march. We were weighted down with alot of equipment. We carried approximately 75 to 100 pounds of equipment. It was long, hot, treacherous. The terrain from Khe Sanh to Hill 881 is dense. I walked up through some streams, through some dense underbruch, through the jungle, then through the valley part. We followed alot of streams. The hills would be way above up and the thick growth, banana trees, brush, leeches, mosquittos. It was a very hot, tiresome march.

We were pretty relieved when we got to Hill 881-South because there was another company up there, and as soon as we got there we knew what our role was: we were there to replace another company. For the first time for our company we were going to get a fixed position and I think we were relieved about that. We were tired of running out on patrols, ambushes, and never being in one spot for long. At that time we kind of had a feeling we were going to be there awhile, so I think we were kinda relieved about that....

Our duty at that time was to occupy this hill and run patrols off 881. We ran several, sometimes two platoons at a time, sometimes only one platoon. We didn't realize how dangerous it was at the time, but when we'd go out on a platoon-sized patrol, sometimes we'd even break up into squads. One squad would take a small hill and one squad went over and checked out another hill.

The bunkers at the time were about 10 feet down from the LZ, all around the hill, and they were fairly large. They held anywhere's from 5 to 7 men to a bunker. They were plainly visible from the ridge-lines. One of the ridgelines that ran parallel to 881—I can recall being over on that ridgeline and looking back at Hill 881 and plainly seeing the bunkers and a few personnel walking from bunker to bunker. On top of the LZ itself we had three 105 howitzers looking toward Hill 881-North. That's where we had our supply tent and that's where all our supplies were stored and it was a very large tent, and our C-rats were stacked up to the ceiling in our supply tent.

We had another tent which was on the south end of the hill used as a sort of warming tent because it had a pot-bellied stove in it. The recon teams would come up from Khe Sanh and they would sleep in the warming tent overnight and they would leave from the warming tent in the morning.

From where Captain Dabney's command bunker was, right near "Washington Square" or the saddle, First Platoon extended from the position all the way around the hill on the north side, about 2/3rds of the way, and Third Platoon picked up from there, and came all the way around towards the south side, and on the south side, looking towards Khe Sanh, Second Platoon, my platoon, took up those positions from the south side which swung all the way around the hill to Captain Dabney's bunker.

At the time mail had caught up to us and I started receiving letters from home. My mother, instead of writing a letter and putting it in a white envelope, would put it in a large brown envelope and along with the letter would put kool-aid, slim-jims and something you couldn't get in C-rats: tea bags. So what I would do, I'd take my canteen cup, and I'd get up very early in the morning, I'd walk over to the warming tent, put my canteen cup on the stove and put the tea bad in it and wait for the water to boil and talk to the recon team that was getting ready to go out on patrol. No one else was up. It was very early in the morning, and I figured if I got up very early I could get my tea made on the stove because it got crowded a little bit later on. Everybody else would bring their C-rats over and try to cook it on the stoves. It got kinda congested. I didn't realize it at the time, but when I spoke to those men, I would be the last one to ever speak to them again, because it was two days later, the third platoon went out to the ambush site and they ran into some heavy fire—about 25 North Vietnamese troops, it was learned, and they returned fire. They broke off and came right back to the hill. It was the next morning, January 20th, the entire company saddled up and we returned back to that area, and we started up Hill 881-North and the order of march that day was First Platoon up front, Third Platoon in the middle, and Second Platoon brought up the rear.

By the time that I had reached the base of Hill 881-North and we started up the hill, a few trees, that's when the North Vietnamese opened up on us. They opened up on the First Platoon first. They had already gotten up 2/3rds the hill and all hell broke loose.

What I do recall is hitting the ground and there were bullets flying around overhead. That struck me peculiar at the time. When you hear a rifle go off, of course you hear the rifle itself, but being on the other end, you don't hear the rifle. You hear just like as though you were taking a leather belt and snapping it, snapping two parts of the leather belt gether and you get this snapping sound and that's all you hear, just hundreds—literally hundreds of these snapping sounds over your head and alot of screaming.

Seconds later, most of First Platoon came literally crawling down the hill. I didn't see any of them come down walking. They were all crawling. Many of them were soaked in blood. There was a bomb crater just near me, and the corpsman was just pulling them into the bomb crater, and trying to do the best they can to bandage them up and try to keep them calm. One helicopter came in, a CH-46, and there was no place to land to try to evacuate any of the wounded, so what the pilot did was taxi up the hill, and while in flight, just drop his ramp. I was nearest the helicopter and so without hesitation I just grabbed the first wounded Marine that was in the bomb crater, put his arm over my shoulder.

He had been shot in the leg. He took some shrapnel in the face, and I took him over to the ramp of the helicopter and walked him all the way into the front of the helicopter. I'd assumed that by the time I'd gotten him all the way to the front of the helicopter—I looked back and there wasn't even another casualty ready to be brought on the helicopter because they couldn't reach the helicopter. No sooner did I get to the front of the helicopter when machinegun rounds came just ripping through the walls of the helicopter and severing the electrical wires and hitting one of the fuel lines and aviation fuel just came just pumping out of the line and burst into flames, splashed onto the crew chief and he ripped off his flak jacket and threw it out of the helicopter. At that time the helicopter was waving uncontrollably, trying to hold its position, and it couldn't, and it was then I realized we were headed down, down into the valley.

I looked over to the Marine that I had taken and I said, "Come on, we're getting out of here." I picked him back up and it was like trying to climb back up a mountain because the helicopter was headed down into the valley and it was hard trying to walk to the rear of the helicopter. The ramp was still down. I looked out. We were about 30 feet from the side of the hill and I just pushed him out. By the time that I had jumped, it was alot further down the hill and when I jumped out I landed into some brush which broke my fall, and I climbed back up the hill about another fifty feet from where the Marine was, and I picked him up. I took him back up and put him back in the bomb crater. There was nothing else that could be done.

The helicopter—I looked back—it just went down into the valley and it crashed into flames. The Marine that I had picked up and put on the helicopter was Richard Darling.

I'd gotten together with "Gums," Charles Reed, and another Marine by the name of John Bryce from Long Beach, California. The three of us, without hesitation, just went down the hill, down to where the helicopter had crashed into the valley and while I stood watch and put out suppressive fire, all around the helicopter, Gums and Bryce got the pilot and co-pilot out of the helicopter and they were both wounded—broken legs, broken ankles. And we got them out of the helicopter and we started back up the hill. We used Reed's rifle and Bryce's rifle as a chair and we carried them up that was, up into the bomb crater where all the casualties were being placed. I was the last one back up. I looked back and saw a H-34 very slow-moving, and saw him moving, drop a sling in the vicinity of the helicopter and he picked usp the crew chief and he didn't even get him inside the helicopter, just grabbed on to the sling and picked him and up and flew away with him hanging in the air.

Second Platoon then moved around to the right side of Hill 881-North where another H-34 landed to pick up some casualties. It was at that time I learned that Lt Thomas had been killed and the way I felt about that at the time was: Here I was, a young 19-year-old Marine, just got to Viet-Nam and here I'm alive and my platoon commander, my Second Lieutenant, he was dead.

The Second Platoon moved up into a treeline where we could get a good view of Hill 881-North. We were on a ridge line that was kind of a crooked ridge line and we could get a good view of the hill, and we just opened up with everything that we could. We were running out of water. Our ammunition was low. I thought at the time how long we were gonna be there, whether we were going to break off the fight or dig in and stay the night and perhaps fight again in the morning.

It didn't turn out that way. Captain Dabney was ordered to withdraw. As we withdrew, we came back down the pathway and I was picking up every rifle that was in sight and putting it on my shoulder and when I got back down off Hill 881-North, I had about eight rifles and about half a dozen LAWs. I carried those all the way back over to the hill.

It was pretty late in the evening by the time we'd gotten back to Hill 881-South and there was alot of people back up there that wasn't there when we left. They'd brought in some 106 recoilless rifles from Khe Sanh and there was some other artillery units up there and they were pounding the hell out of Hill 881-North and we just came up onto the hill and just lined up, everybody that was left in the company, and looked on like it was a movie or something. It was very strange. Jets flew in..over Hill 881-North, dropping bombs and rockets and napalm just all over the hill, just saturating the hill. It was a real spectacular sight to see...

Later we went to our bunkers and learned about the casualties that we had suffered and of course, Lt Thomas, and our senior corpsman, he was killed—they were the only two casualties in Second Platoon. Third Platoon was fairly well chewed up and First Platoon—they really got hit very bad, very bad.

Sort of a silence came over the hill and it lasted several days. It was very difficult to explain the mood. The men were very quiet, sort of in mourning for the buddies that didn't come back that day....

The mood coming back: the men were mad, angry that the fight had been cut short. I think in spite of our casualties, we'd rather stay there and fight. But we were ordered back and kinda mad about that. The trip back, all up and down the column, what was left of India Company, guys were moaning and groaning, yelling obsenities. When we finally did get up on top the hill, which was very hard and a tiresome climb—you probably recall as you're going up that side, you just can't walk up on your own two feet, you have to grab ahold of trees and pull yourself up one tree and grab ahold of another one and pull yourself up further...

At that time we had no fighting positions on the hill. We just had our sleeping bunkers. The bunkers were located higher up, around the high part of the hill, just below the LZ. The order was given that we were to abandon these bunkers and move down to where the trenchline was, which was only about 2-feet deep. This trenchline wasn't dug by us or the previous Marine unit that occupied the hill before us. This was the existing trenchline the North Vietnamese used as fighting positions during the previous battle. [Ed Note: this was the original trench built by Marines upon capturing the hill who were ordered to occupy positions closer to the top of the hill by a visiting General]. We dug the trenchline 5 and sometimes 6 feet deep and placed and filled alot of sandbags and placed four layers of sandbags on each side of the trenchline on top. We paired off in two's and dug into the side of the trenchline. They were to be our sleeping quarters for the remainder of the siege. After we had dug into the hill, the roof of our sleeping bunkers consisted of running laterally, 7 or 8 engineer stakes. We placed 8 layers of sandbags on top of the stakes and then we placed the wooden boxes of the 105 artillery full of rocks and stones on top, and then we placed gravel on top of that to conceal the boxes....

The inside of the bunker was very small. Most of them wasn't even high enough to stand up. If I sat down inside the bunker and put my helmet on, it would just barely scrape the top of the bunker. John Bryce couldn't sit up inside the bunker that we had built, so on his side, where he slept, he just took an E-tool and shoveled out some more dirt on the floor so he would be able to sit up inside the bunker...Fighting holes were dug into the outside of the hill and they had step-ups to them—sandbags and we had taken some of the 105 arillery shell boxes and dug the dirt out of the wall of the trenchline and placed the boxes in the cut-out that we had made. We filled the boxes—some with handgrenades. Other boxes contained LAWs. We had trigger mechanisms inside some of the boxes and the wires went outside the trenchline, up over the sandbags, and down over around the hill, and these were the trigger mechanisms for the claymores that we had placed outside the perimeter....Of course we had heard the enemy took claymores and turned them around. What we did, before we put our claymore mines down, we dug a small hole and placed one of the large C-rat fruit cans in the hole and pulled a pin on a hand grenade and took in a piece of wire and connected that to the claymore so when they picked the claymore up to turn it around, they pulled the hand-grenade out of the C-rat can.

[While water wasn't a problem at first, the water buffalo soon was filled with numerous holes. Then water was delivered in dairy cans, but these would spill and rarely was a full can received; usually they were empty]. Someone at Khe Sanh came up with a very ingeneous idea. They brought us canisters , large cylinders to hold tank rounds. When I opened one up there was a plastic bag in it that had a sort of long plastic nipple—it was the same type of bag they put in the machines in the messhall that held milk, only these bags were full of water. And this made it very easy and practical to bring water.

January 23d was the date that 1/Lt Allen S. Matthews was brought up from Khe Sanh to replace Lt Thomas. I recall standing up on the trenchline filling sandbags when he came walking down a trenchline. We or course hand't had a bath since mid-December and at that time we were all scraggly and dirty and smelly and he apparently had a bath just down at Khe Sanh and looked clean and fresh and his utilities were very clean and the cuffs were squarred away. He looked at us kinda strange but didn't say anything. Little did he know that he would look just as bad, if not worse, than us in the months to come...

I believe I mentioned about the scarcity of water. We did not use any water for bathing whatsoever...

Gums and I came up with an idea. We took some of the clear plastic that the 105 artillery rounds came in and in the evening, when the sun went down, the fog rolled in very thick. We stretched out the plastic, put a hole in the center, and put a clean stone inside. We'd check on it every 3 or 4 hours and get us a small portion of water that way. It wasn't very much, but it was better than not having any, and there were times when we didn't have any water at all....

Harmonizing in the trenchline. Gary W. Saddness and myself would pass the time in the trenchline filling sandbags—and we filled plenty of them. He had a portable radio—a small transistor radio. But the battery had gone dead, so we'd taken one of the PRC-25 batteries which is a very big battery, a powerful battery. But when they become too weak to transmit, they become of no use and are discarded. So we got one of the batteries and were going to hook it up to the radio. I told Gary, This is too much power; it will probably blow the transistors in the radio. So we took a K-bar and sliced the battery in half, very carefully, so as not to damage the wires inside the battery, and when we'd cut the battery in half and exposed the black and red wire, we connected this to the radio and then sealed off the top part of the battery. It was a dry cell battery. Then we taped the entire transistor radio and just wrapped black tape around it and carried this brick-shaped object around with us and we had a workable radio. We used it in the trenchline and listened to alot of music. Alot of the songs we would listen to and harmonize with were mainly Diana Horwick songs and that helped us pass the time alot we enjoyed it and were glad to have that. It made things alot easier. The radio was one of the only means of entertainment we had.

We'd be standing in the trenchling filling sandbags and the radio played the song "There is a House in New Orleans they call the House of the Rising Sun," and we'd get about halfway through that. A few mortar rounds would come in, hit pretty close. We'd hit the deck, and just get back up, like nothing happened and start singing all over again, as though it didn't even bother us. Alot of times we didn't even pay attention to the mortar fire. You had to get your mind off it, and this helped.

Many of us literally flirted with death. We got tired of being shelled, mortared, artilleries. We would just defy it all. Sometimes we would just forget. Either we just forgot or either we just didn't care anymore. We'd just sometimes totally defy the shelling. Rather than just safely walk around the trenchline, you'd say, The Hell with it. Got up out of the trenchline and walked straight across the hill. If one went off nearby, you just ducked or hit the deck and then got right up and walked to the other side of the hill. That's just the way it was for many of us. I did it many times, and Gary did the same thing. Reed did the same thing. Brice did the same thing. I watched many Marines just do the same thing. We just got tired of it. It just became part of our daily life. If it was your turn to get it, it was your turn. Of course, many of them did get it and you look back on it today and it's really hard to believe you lived that way....

Many times you just didn't pay any attention to the artillery and the incoming coming in and the sniper fire. Some of the rounds hit very close and then there was the sniper down at the treeline: he'd be zinging at you. One of his rounds would hit real close and you'd yell some obscenity at him or call him some dirty name and, you know, you can't hit anything, and just go about your business.

"Going to the John:" We had these out-house contruction-type Johns, which had a flat door in the back, and a half of a 55-gallon drum slid inside, and a corpsman would drag these out and burn it off with a mixgture of gasoline and MOGAS. Of course, this became sort of an aiming stake for the mortars. I recall going to the John one day. I'm sitting inside with the door closed and it was like sitting in a square piece of cheese. I picked the shrapnel right out of the wood and it was very shiny metal, and there was plenty of it. I couldn't wait to get out of there. It was the last time I decided to go up there and use the John. It was just outside the trenchline, up on top of the hill, half-way between the LZ and the trenchline, so the Gunny came up with a very good idea. The cannisters. The gunny took these and placed them inside the trenchline. The earth was very hard and crusty and you could dig a nice round hole on an angle into the trenchline, and this is what was used for the John. When they became full, you screwed the cap back on, the star-type cap, and you just picked it up, yelled a few obscenities at the North Vietnamese, and tossed it down the hill at them....

Our supply tent became an aiming stake for the North Vietnamese, and we tore that down shortly after Cpl Johnson was killed. He was in charge of supplies. When we were issued our chow, in the beginning we would get two boxes of C-rations per day—one in the morning and one in the evening. Later on, through March and mid-April, we'd get one box per day. As the food went down, so did the protection around Captain Dabney's bunker. It was very common to get a box of C-rats, and if you were fortunate enough to get the A-1s that had the fruit in, you'd open it up and find it all dried out. There was shrapnel in the C-rats and if it was a fresh artillery round that struck it, it was still wet, of course, you ate the food, and you picked the shrapnel out....

The top of the hill started to look like a graveyard for helicopters. It was impossible to land anymore. The supply runs were made at night. There were some attempts during the daytime, but choppers did not land, they just flew over the hill, very close. Everybody got inside their and they released the cargo nets and the supplies just dropped all over the hill. That was food, water, ammunition, building materials, timbers...

Many times in the dark, the helicopters missed their target and some of the vital supplies that we needed went off the side of the hill. We had to get working parties together, go down at night and scavage for it. We looked in the trees, everywhere we possibly could, to find where the supplies had dropped [and] try to get back as much of it as we could.

In India Company, I'm not known as Lance Corporal Schemelia. John Emroe down at Khe Sanh—all during the siege—he called me "Little One," and I was known throughout India Company as "little one," and of course, Charles Reed, he was known as "Gums." Together we made a pretty good pair. I had a hard life growing up and so did Gums. Together, we were scavengers. We tried not to let the mortar rounds and artillery get us down and we would go out together during the bombardment and some of the heaviest bombardment, and we would scavanage. We would go up to some of the old bunkers—abandoned bunkers that were occupied before the attack on January 20th and we would dig for food...

"Maggie's Drawers." Every morning we'd come out of our bunkers. Some of us were taller than others, and of course our heads could be seen over the trenchlines. That idiot down there in the trees—he would spot one of us and would snipe. Sometimes we would get right up outside of the trenchline and just hold our hands out and say, "Here I am; take a shot," and he would. And he'd miss you a mile. So me and Reed said, "We'll fix 'em!" We went over to where one of the old tents had been torn down and came back with a section of tent pole. I had my little water-proof duffle bag which I kept some personal things in and I was looking for something to tie on to the top of the pole and the only thing that I could find—and I thought it was very appropriate because of the color, was a pair of 3d Marine Division swim trunks which was issued down at Khe Sanh when we first got down there. So we'd taken a few nails out of the 105 artillery boxes and nailed my trunks to the top of the pole and every morning, the same thing would happen. We'd get up out of the trenchline. They'd take a pot-shot at you. He'd miss, so we'd jump back down in the trenchline, only this time we'd give him the "Maggie's Drawers." He'd fire a few more shots. We'd look up, pull the flag down and see if there were any holes in it, and we'd lean up against the trenchline and start all over again the next day...

Candles were very scarce on the hill. The only candles that I can recall were in Captain Dabney's bunker. As far as lighting for our own bunkers—our main source of light, we used the plastic spoons that came with the C-rats, and we would burn these like candles. Of course, the spoon, as they burn, put off a black residue and the interiors of the bunkers became quite black. We also used peanut butter. I can recall the best edible peanugt butter out of the C-rats was called Cinderella peanut butter. This was, of course, not the peanut butter that we were interested in. In the early C-rats, dated 1956, '57, '58, I don't recall the name, but when we opened up the peanut butter, the peanut butter itself was all dired out and cakey and the oil from the peanut butter was floating on top. And we would take the peanut butter oil and collect it in a can. We would take a larger can and poke a hole in the bottom of it and take a piece of cloth, twist it up tight, make a wick out of it, and when the cloth became saturated, we would light it, and this provided the light, and to my surprise, it burned very well. The interior of the bunkers became quite pitched, and once in awhile Brice and myself would clean house and we would take our knives and our E-tools and scrape the walls of the bunker until new, fresh dirt appeared and this gave the bunker a more cleaner look....

We raised the Colors on Hill 881 every morning. We tried to do this as expediently as we could. Before the North Vietnamese caught wind of it, possibly they heard it, we would get it over as quickly as possible before the artillery came in and dive for the trenchline and get back to our bunkers as quickly as we possibly could. Our bugler was our very own First Lieutenant Matthews. Of course, when we did this we just annoyed the enemy that much more, and they hit us with a little extra artillery.

One afternoon I was lying in my bunker half asleep and heard a strange engine. I couldn't quite make it out. So I got up out of the bunker, went out into the trenchline and there was this Bird Dog flying about. He'd tip his wings. He was an Air Force light observation plane, and I was the only one out in the trenchline. He saw me, and when I acknowledged to him by waving my hand. I thought he'd just flown by to observe the hill. And I saw his arm come out of the aircraft. There were two in the aircraft, and he dropped a bundle. The bundle came down and hit about 30 or 40 feet in front of me. I raced for it and grabbed it. It was wrapped up in brown paper and tied with string. I ran back into the trenchline. A few mortar rounds hit in the vicinity of where I'd picked the parcel up. There was nothing on the package. I ripped it open, and it was two cartons of cigarettes. I ran back outside the bunker, and the aircraft was still circling. I held them up to him. He again acknowledged by tipping his wings, and flew off.

I didn't smoke; Brice did, so he kept a few packs, and I took the rest of them up to Lt Matthews and gave them to him so he could distribute them to the rest of the men in the platoon. Receiving these cigarettes certainly did make everyone's day...

Most of the activity on the hill took place at night time. We had alot of working parties. Choppers would come in, drop off the supplies, and the hill would suddenly become alive with men hustling and bustling through trenchlines taking the supplies up to the command post, carrying timbers, barbed wire, ammunition, water, food, medical supplies. It was one of the very few times we got to see one another—other men from other platoons, from the other side of the hill...Of course during the daytime, other than the shelling, it was total silence. It was very hot. The men in the company were totally exhausted. The order of the day was: sleep, get plenty of rest, and hope that more supplies would be dropped at night time, and it would begin all over again.

One morning I became very restless. I couldn't sleep, so I got out into the trenchline and decided to take a walk around the other side of the hill and get a glimpse of Hill 881-North. I walked around the hill and I just stood there in the trenchline, gazing over the sandbags, looking at the hill.

Everyone was asleep in their bunkers, and I heard some voices coming from the direction of the CP, and I saw two men carrying something. They were moaning and groaning, sounded like complaining or even arguing. As they came closer, it became evident as to what they were carrying and were having a difficult time. As they came down the trenchline, they passed by me, and they were carrying a body. Apparently, one of the men in Mike Company on the knoll had been hit and they were carrying his body around to the body bunker.

At that moment, when they passed by me I never felt so alone, being there, all by myself. At that moment, it struck me that I didn't want to be there, all by myself. I didn't want to get hit and be away from my platoon. I don't know if anyone else had the feeling, but ever since that day I wanted to stay around on my platoon side. And I believe alot of the other Marines did the same: they didn't wander out of their section of the trenchline. I think it was probably because of this reason: they were going to get hit, I suppose they would want it to happen in their platoon area with the buddies that they knew and associated with. It was a very frightening feeling at the time, and I got back to that platoon area as fast as I could. It was something that really to this day has really stuck in my mind.

"The Body Bunker." This was located between two machinegun positions over on our sector of the hill, the Second Platoon sector. It was a bunker that was located between two machinegun bunkers and had been abandoned because of the poor construction. It was narrow, and it was too high. The peripet of this bunker just wasn't made properly to house a machinegun. The peripet was located too close to the roof of the bunker, and for this reason, it was abandoned and not used for a machinegun bunker. We had no other facilities, or no other bunkers, in the trenchline in which to put our dead. And this is what became known to us on the hill as the body bunker. We would stack them up, in some cases—later on, apparently, it did become full. When the chopper would come in, at the time that they would land, we would try to get one or two out at a time, and this often wasn't the case. We couldn't get any out at all, so we stored them in the body bunker.

Later, when the body bunker became full, we started stacking them in the area where the water buffalo was, behind the warming tent. And this was a small, flat area of ground they had placed a cargo net in this area, and we would stack them in the cargo net sort of in the fashion that you would stack logs for building a log cabin. We would run three or four bodies in one direction, and three or four or five in the opposite direction, and a helicopter would come in. They would hook up the hook on the rings of the net to the bottom of the helicopter and the bodies were taken down to Khe Sanh that way....We'd of course hadn't had a bath in quite a long time and men were beginning to have problems with lesions and certainly didn't want to have any remains in a close contact with the men in the company.

The body bunker had become full and what we had done was fashioned a door and this was nailed across the opening of the bunker, and it was totally sealed. It wasn't opened, and the bodies were taken out—it must of been more than 35, 40, and 50 days later. No one was ordered to help clean out the body bunker. It was strictly volunteer. Gums and myself, along with John Brice volunteered to clean out the body bunker. The three of us all during the siege, we'd always come forth and go get the bodies, and take them to the body bunker and I guess we felt it was our duty, a moral obligation, to take the bodies out of the body bunker and see that they were taken care of.....

Our hair and our beards became quite long, and I'd borrowed a pair of scissors from a corpsman and I cut John Brice's hair and then he cut mine, but we left our beards alone. That was a rare opportunity to grow a beard and I guess we got a kick out of it. Everybody else had a beard so I guess nobody else wanted to cut theirs....

We ran out of heat tabs to cook our chow with, so I'd gotten ahold of an empty machinegun box and took the lid off and laid the machinegun can on its side and I poked alot of holes in the top and a few in the sides with my knife, and then I would splinter some dry wood from the ammo boxes and make a small wood fire inside and in the morning—at that time we were only getting one box of C-rats a day, and Brice and I would cook our food on this little stove in the trenchline. We'd try not to make any smoke. Before you know it, Sgt Mosley, John Emroe, and Reed, and a few others came down the trenchline in the morning and everyone would be fighting for space on top of the ammo can. Why they didn't make one of their own, I'll never know, but I guess it was for the conversation. You know, get a few people together in the morning and cook our food over the fire....

Getting out the mail. Most of us had paper, a pen. If we didn't have paper, we wrote on the cardboard from the C-rats and just made a little square on the top and put the word "Free" on it and wrote on that. The problem was getting it off the hill. The choppers wouldn't land anymore. They just flew over and dropped supplies. Nothing was returned anymore. It just wasn't worth landing a helicopter and getting it chopped up on the hill, so the hill became pretty cluttered. It still left the problem: how to get the mail out When the bodies, at the water buffalo area in the nets were enough to warrant a helicopter to come in and take them out, we'd go up to the net and place the mail inside the shirt of one of the bodies. We knew that they would be searched when they got down to Khe Sanh and the mail would be discovered and forwarded.

The weather during the daytime was extremely hot. It cooled down some in the evening, and toward midnight and on through the morning hours it became bitterly cold. The fog rolled in. It was very thick, very damp, and it was extremely cold. It had nothing other than our green shirt, our flak jacket. Some of us had poncho liners and we would stand our trench watch with a poncho liner around us....

It only rained once during our stay on the hill. One afternoon to our surpirse we got a down-pour. One thing we didn't anticipate during the construction of our trenchline was rain, and we failed to make any sort of outlet in case it rained. It had only rained 10 or 15 minutes, but the rain water would wash off the top of the hill down into the trenchline and didn't take very long before we had about 3 feet of water in the trenchline. This, of course, flooded our bunkers. During the rain—it would let up for a few minutes, and then we would get large hail stones about the size of golf balls, and it was definitely necessary to put our helmets on! After the rain ceased, we put some holes in the trenchline to the outer wall and allowed the water to drain. Brice and I got a few canisters and filled them up with the rain water which, of course, was very muddy and we planned to use this for drinking water. We couldn't find the lids to the canisters, so we left the canisters in one of our fighting holes. We came out the next day—and of course we had an ample supply of Halizone for water purification—and our intention was to allow the water to sit over night so the mud would settle to the bottom. But we had a big infestation of rats on the hill and they must of had a field day during the night because the canisters that we had filled had several drowned rats in each one of them, and we decided not to use this for drinking water...

Of course we had no soap..At that stage we had—our skin was very dry, very tough, and sort of scaly and patchy with black patches on our skin for lack of a bath. Many of us had festered sores. What I did—our corpsman didn't have any medication for our skin or for sores; he had ran out of cremes and ointments. I took the Halizone tablets, put a few of them in a spoon and crushed them up and then poured them into a small C-rat can, and added a few drops of water and made a paste. To some degree this paste did some good. I don't really know what the composition of Halizone is, but while mixing the paste it did smell "mediciney."...

Adjacent to our hill there was a ridgeline that ran parallel with Hill 881. A Navy jet came in, low level, and dropped several large white canisters. Before they reached the ground they burst open, and out of the canisters were literally thousands of these little silvery projectiles, and they scattered all across the ridgeline. Some of them, immediately as they hit, exploded, about the same impact as a hand grenade. Then after the initial explosion, minutes later, others started going off. I suppose each of these had their own fuse, and for the next several hours, this entire ridgeline became sort of a death trap. Explosions took place for a period of several hours....

[Ed.Note: The foregoing is about half of what Jim Schemelia related in his tapes, but what we have here quoted gives a flavor about life on the hill outposts that has really never been expressed before or as well.

"Gums" got his name when his dentures fell out of his mouth upon landing on 881, were crushed, and he went the entire Siege on 881 without teeth. He later retired as a First Sergeant.

Does this account of life on 881-S during the Siege prompt you, the reader, to do the same? If so, please send you story to the Editor!]

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

We are well into the "Approach March" toward our objective—Reunion at St. Louis. Several members have already sent their registratioin forms. Russ Turner, our Reunion Chairman, has the situation well in hand. Dave "Bulldog" Smith, Mike O'Hara, Bill Jayne and Russ have all worked together to procure and arrange for the placement of our Khe Sanh plaque at JeffersonBarracks National Cemetery. Details are still being worked on for speakers to dedicate them.

The guest speaker for our banquet night will soon be determined.

Ray Truelove, our Editor, has reluctantly had to resign due to poor health, an ailing father and an overloaded work schedule. We will miss him. Ray Stubbe will carry on temporarily until we can find a new Editor.

Our "Memorabilia Sales Committee:" Russ Turner, Mike Worth, Lucille Biscaglio, and Bernice "Gunny" Penn, are busy putting together a registration package. There will be surprises for an auction and raffle. If you have an item of significance that you would care to donate, please call Russ at (314) 282-2263.

GARY PLACE

There is a growing effort in New Hampshire to petition the Executive Council and Governor to grant a hearing for a conditional pardon on behalf of Khe Sanh veteran, Gary Place. Mr. Place is currently serving a life sentence without the possibility of parole in New Hampshire for the 1983 death of his then girlfriend, who was killed in the heat of an argument over their pending separation.

Mr. Place served in A Company, 1st Platoon, 3d Shore Party Bn in Khe Sanh. He was honorably discharged from the Marine Corps on June 10, 1970, as a Sergeant, E-5.

Gary's prison record and commitment to personal growth and rehabilitation has been exemplary and a model for all inmates to follow. He has also taken extraordinary efforts to share his experience and the knowledge he has gained with others. He has co-founded and implemented various self-help groups within the prison to expand inmates' self awareness, their insight, and to hopefully facilitate them on their own path to rehabilitation.

Due to Gary's impressive record and progress, and willingness to help others, he became involved in counseling and lecturing adolescents on the verge of incarceration to change their self-destructive behavior patterns. He was selected by the prison to speak with law students, Chambers of Commerce, the NH Clerks of Courts, and Shock Incarceration graduates due to his credibility and honesty.

It is also important to recognize Gary's service to our country as a Marine Corps veteran and a survivor of the battle of Khe Sanh in Vietnam. His efforts to address the problems of fellow inmates was equaled by his efforts to help fellow Vietnam veterans. He was a co-founder of Chapter 161 of the Vietnam Veterans of America and an originator of the Post-Traumatic Stress Rap Group in prison. There is no one who has dedicated himself more wholeheartedly to rehabilitating and demonstrating worthiness for consideration of a conditional pardon than Gary. His efforts continue today.

Place is hoping for the support of the Khe Sanh Veterans association. In this regard, President Peloquin has traveled to New Hampshire to meet with Gary to see for himself Gary's sincerity, genuiness and dramatic transformation. Gary is reaching out to fellow Khe Sanh veterans for support for his struggle. It cannot be understated how significant a letter from fellow Vietnam veterans on his behalf would be for Gary. His supporters have been told time and time again that the Executive Council and Governor of New Hampshire are more persuaded by the support of those who have come to know Gary from various walks of life than by almost anything else. Written support for Gary from fellow Khe Sanh veterans will go a long way in convincing the Council and Governor to hold a hearing on his behalf.

Gary would like to hear from any of you who would be interested in communicating with him. You can address correspondence to Gary Place c/o Phyllis Rockwell, 23 Ashland Street, Nashua NH 03060.

If you would like more information about Gary Place, please feel free to contact Phyllis Rockwell at the above address or (603) 595-1383, or Mr. Place's attorney, Paul A. Maggiotto at 58 Pleasant St., Concord NH 03301 or (603) 225-5152.

Gary has the support of people throughout New England who have come to know him from various walks of life. He has the support of politicians, current and former prison guards, former counselors, and most importantly, the support of the victim's family who have written letters on his behalf and have offered to testify at a conditional pardon hearing for him.

If you would like to forward a letter on behalf of Gary, please address it to Governor Jeanne Shaheen and/or to the members of the New Hampshire Executive Council. The letter can be forwarded directly to Mr. Place's attorney at the address given above.

Gary has already served sixteen years for his crime. If released from prison, Gary hopes to continue his efforts incounseling youth and others to avoid the mistakes he has made. Incarcerating him for the remainder of his life, despite his remarkable efforts at rehabilitation would simply be to waste the success of his efforts and the good he can perform for others outside the prison walls. There are prisoners throughout this country who have committed far more egregious crimes and have served less time, or are at least eligible at some time for parole. It is clear that Mr. Place will never be released from prison unless he is granted a conditional pardon (similar to what is commonly known as parole). Your support, in any fashion, would be greatly appreciated.

A Message from the Editor

We are trying a theme approach in this one. At our reunion in St. Louis it was announced that the theme for the next two issues would be REUNION. You will see that we have some really good stuff here. We will repeat the theme REUNION in our next issue, due out February/March of 2000. Your story or tidbit need not match the theme exactly. Even oblique reference to the theme is fine. If a memory or thought is triggered, go for it. You do not have to write about Vietnam or Khe Sanh. We want stories from your entire life. What happened before and after Vietnam is just as important and interesting. Try keeping your theme piece as short as possible so that we can accommodate as many members as possible. I will let the writer have their full say, but I also bear a responsibility to the readers. If I edit it is because I am trying to help you get to your essential points in an understandable manner. We will run by you any significant deletions or changes. If you have submitted something that was not published, please resend it to Paul Knight and it will go into the hopper for consideration. Our plan is to acknowledge and confirm before publication when your work is scheduled for print. Please give us an issue to get up to speed. There have been so many editor changes that your work might have gotten lost or set aside. Our goal is to publish as much of our members' writings as we can. Our only constraint is a limited budget and what we can publish. We are specifically a non-sectarian, non-political organization. Please do not waste your time and effort in submitting anything that advocates or rags about politics or religion. If your religion or politics is part of your life story, then, of course, it has relevant historical value. None of us would dream of trying to tell Ray Stubbe to stop being who he is, or Max Cleland to stop being himself. What we won't do is publish their personal religious and political beliefs.

There are many volunteers involved in putting out this magazine. Tom Eichler is the chairman of the publications committee. He gets the complaints. The praise goes to our wonderful writers and poets. Paul Knight is the managing editor. He gets all submissions except poetry. Chuck Patterson gets the poetry. Poetry submissions have been greater than we are able to publish. This is a problem some of us hope to rectify by publishing a book of poetry by Khe Sanh members. We prefer that all submissions be sent via email. This saves Paul Knight the input time. Trust me, even with a scanner, input is a real chore. If you cannot manage email we will take your submissions in whatever form. I will even take audio tapes but, please, no drunken babbling ones.

Gentlemen: Further to the recommendation I made at the Board meeting in St. Louis, I have taken the liberty of ordering a Khe Sanh Veterans wreath to be placed during the annual Veterans Day ceremony at "The Wall" in DC. A number of Khe Sanh Vets from the Dusters and Quad 50's, and any other KS Vets planning to be in DC are welcome to participate in the wreath laying. This has been a very rewarding experience for all who have participated in the past.

Chicago will be the reunion site for 2001. This will be the location for a special tribute to Ray Stubbe. Dates and hotel not firm as yet.

Parts of our By-Laws were found to be in need of legal re-writing. The Board voted to go with the By-Laws as is until our attorneys Padway and Padway can confirm the new wording. New By-Laws will be ready for the 2000 reunion.

A special thank you to Russ Turner for all his effort in putting together our St. Louis reunion. The trip to Jefferson Barracks went with military precision.

Thanks to Dick Peloquin Jr. for recording all of the minutes and the countless hours doing other video camera work for the organization.

Respectfully,
Cal Bright
Recording Secretary

The Chapel of Four Chaplains

Dear Rev. Stubbe:

We are pleased to inform you that you have been nominated by Messrs. David C. Smith and Robert M. Reed, Sr. to receive The Chapel of Four Chaplains Legion of Honor Award.

Shortly after the Chapel's dedication in 1951 by President Harry S. Truman, the founders established the Legion of Honor Program to publicly recognize persons who have rendered selfless service to humanity without regard to race, religion, or creed. We believe the service you have rendered to others is worthy of recognition, and are pleased to invite you to become a member of the Chapel's Legion of Honor. You will receive an Award Certificate which depicts, in symbolic form, our interfaith credo.

This award will be presented to you on Saturday, July 17, 1999, at the Best Western West Port Park Hotel, 2434 Old Dorcest Road, Maryland Heights, MO. Once again, congratulations on your nomination.

Sincerely,
Kimberly T. Pierce Executive Director

History of the Khe Sanh Monument

Ken Penn established the concept for a monument and tree to be placed in Arlington National Cemetery in 1993, to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the siege of Khe Sanh.

Ray Stubbe was instrumental in selecting an appropriate tree. The ginko tree is a symbol of eternal perseverance despite adversity. It has endured the past, is withstanding the present and will survive the future.

Ken and Bernice Penn did fundraising in the Chicago area, with an event called TET REMEMBERED. Some of the local Khe Sanh veterans assisted in this fundraiser. No funds from the Khe Sanh organization were used. 95% of the monies raised for the purchase of the monument and ginko tree came from outside of the organization. The first and original monument was dedicated on 2 July 1993, in Arlington National Cemetery. Bernice Penn designed the memorial. The design includes much symbolism pertaining to REMEMBER as a command. All those who were at Khe Sanh were commanded to hold the base and hills at whatever cost The cost was great, many were lost, and those who survived still recall the horror of it all. REMEMBER is a forceful statement for civilians. It is for those who happen to cast their eyes upon this monument. Maybe they'll get a book, find an article and discover what our brave and courageous warriors had accomplished and the extent of the cost. They held the hills, the base, they won.

The diamond shape dividing the words "Served-Sacrificed" represents the symbol on the Vietnam Veterans Wall for those who made the ultimate sacrifice.

The curving words "KHE SANH—WE ARE ETERNALLY BONDED" represents the hills, the rising sun, (which was used on several issues of the KSV magazine) and the leaf of the Ginko tree.

William Griffith was the originator of the phrase "Eternally Bonded. Hill Fights 1967, Siege 1968, the renowned battles in the Khe Sanh area." As Khe Sanh was a Marine Corps combat base, the Marine Corps emblem is predominant. It is strategic on the monument, as was the area of Khe Sanh a strategic position for the NVA to try and capture.

The Army, Navy and Air Force emblems depict the base itself and extend to those military services that were also at Khe Sanh. The unity of the four military branches is of utmost importance as they were there together, fought together shared together the horrors of war and brotherhood.

Semper Fidelis, "Always Faithful," applies to all those who were at Khe Sanh, Remember all those who served at Khe Sanh are Eternally Bonded.

The survivors of Khe Sanh, have much work to do. They have stories to tell, books to write, and lives to live; they can affect the world once again.

This can only be accomplished by one thing. They must start taking better care of themselves. Go to the doctor, get a complete check up (physical) and follow the doctors' advice. It really is not that hard. It might save your life. Ken is in critical condition in I.C.U., as I write this. He had a stroke only one and a half years ago. He failed to take proper care of himself.

Bernice Penn

Dear Ernie,

I am writing to clarify some of the actions of Delta 1/26. I also seek more on the history of Hill 950. It is my understanding that after the June 6, 1967 attack of the small relay site, two platoons of D 1/26 outposted the hill to develop stronger defensive positions. After Delta developed the site, 1/26 would rotate a single platoon to 950 on approximately a 30-day rotation. So far I have pinned down the following on Hill 950: Lt. Long, Bravo 1 1/26 10/67 Delta 3, 1/26 11/67-12/67 Lt. Wells, Charlie 3 1/26

10/12/67-25/12/67 Lt. Williams, Alpha 3 1/26 25/12/67-07/04/67 Co ?, 5/7 Cav 4/68 Plt H&S, 1/1 Apr to June Plt, E/2/4 Aug 68

Army Sgt. Cavaiani earned the Medal of Honor up on 950 in 1971. In June '67 John Burke (original member of 1/26 formed at Camp Pendleton in April '66) earned the Navy Cross. Both Skip Wells and Maxie Williams earned their first Purple Hearts on 950.

Who was Delta 3 Platoon Commander during Nov - Dec '67? Was it Walt Chapman? (Ed. yes)

I came to the 26th Marines from a Med Cruise with A/1/6. It appears that a disproportionately large number of both 5-67 TBS (The Basic School) officers and A/1/6 enlisted, ended up at Khe Sanh. In Delta 1/26, Lt. Dan McGravey was from TBS 5-67 and both Lance Cpl. Bill Purdy and Lance Cpl. Carl Goff were from A/1/6. Goff was wounded in the action where Bill Purdy snatched the SKS away from an NVA and clubbed him with it in a late December '67 operation into the valley north of 950. Any further recollections on 950 or about Purdy and Goff or awards given? (Ed: What I remember is that night after things settled down, puking my guts out. Is that an award? For more on 950 see the piece on Buffalo Belt.) After Maxie Williams' death on 10 April, the next Alpha officer to fall was Lt. Paul McGrath who joined Alpha as weapons platoon commander on 6 May '68. Before that, from Dec '67 to May '68, he served as the 106RR Platoon Commander. He fell on 7 June '68 along with his TBS 6-67 classmate Sam Hannah, Delta 3, 1/26. Both at Christmas Tree Hill/ My Loc.

Re: Red Clay Issue #44 (Summer '99)

Thirty-seven years ago while I was a Desk Sgt. with Shore Patrol Headquarters, Santa Ana (El Toro) California, I reported for duty and found a small box of clothing and a swagger stick.

The owner never claimed the items. I still have the swagger stick. The name on the stick is "J.L. Stanton. Page 11 of the aforementioned Red Clay has an article written by a Jim Stanton. There is also an inquiry by the editor, wanting to know the whereabouts of Colonel Jim Stanton. I am sorry I don't know his whereabouts either as I would like to return the swagger stick to him if it is his. The stick however is an enlisted stick, having brass tips. If I can get this to the rightful owner I would be glad to do so.

Death of a Cannoncocker

He did not hear them coming,
With the shrieks of death they made,
He was busy on the gun.
Sending out his own fusillade.

The last thing he remembered
Was sailing high up off the ground,
Landing face up with eyes wide open,
He couldn't hear or make a sound.

As he lay there bleeding,
He wanted very much to say
"Please Lord, I'm too young to die this way."
He passed on, Bled his Life out,
ON KHE SANH'S BLOOD RED CLAY.

Reunion

One cannot attend one of our reunions without being aware of being with very special people. I have told anyone who would listen that as a group, I have never been with men who exhibited greater humanity, greater caring for others, greater dedication, greater moral fiber, than those I knew at Khe Sanh.

Share your stories. Share your life. Write down your experiences. Get it out of your system. Your children and others will be happy you did so. This will also help to provide a more accurate historical accounting about what it was really like there. Like the controversial Civil War, Vietnam will be studied for centuries. Help future historians understand what our experience really was by writing down your story or stories. We can never forget our past — we are unable to do so. actually. The well wishers, those who tell us to, just don't understand. How could they?

Names Remembered

I want to tell you about the wonderful Marines who kept the faith with my son. I now know them after wondering for 30 years if they had all been killed. They love him still in their precious memories.

On Easter Sunday, a soft southern voice on my phone asked if my name was Bugger. I hesitatingly answered "yes" and he continued, "Did you have a son named Curtis?" I wonderingly said, "Yes, he was killed in Viet Nam 30 years ago." This soft southern voice began to cry and chokingly said, "I was in his Battery when he died and so were some others. My name is Willie Roe Yates." My heart stood still. He was crying and trying to tell me about a reunion in July and would it be all right if he sent some papers about it and also an article from a newspaper. He kept saying that he hoped that he had not upset me but that it was very important to him that he had found me. I told him that I would be very pleased to read about the reunion, as I didn't know that there even was one. I also told him that I really didn't know if I could come or not as I had recently remodeled my home and used up most of my money doing so. I was also wondering why it took so long to find someone. I was getting emotional. He apologized again and he assured me that I would hear from him again. We said goodbye.

After we hung up I cried so hard my 92-year-old Mother was concerned that someone in the family had died. Eventually I reassured her and told her of the strange phone call. From then on I was beginning to live in a world of hope. I had not heard from anyone since Curtis died when 3 people wrote scarce details immediately after his death. Their names were Gabrys, Kendall and Hulbert. I think I was so traumatized that I could not think of anything or anyone. Just that I could not let that happen to any of my other children. And so the years passed.

Within a very few days of Willie's call I had a letter and the papers from him. I really couldn't consider going to the reunion. I knew that I had spent most of my savings and knew that I could not get that many funds in such a short time to make the trip. I wrote Willie Roe back declining the invitation and sent some pictures of my family and a little family information. I heard from Willie Roe again and also from Ray Moffatt who was with Curtis when he died. I talked to both of them declining the offer. Then I heard from Billie Joe Hill. He too was crying and so happy to talk to me and he said, "There is no excuse good enough. You will be coming. I will send your flight tickets and your room will be paid for and waiting." I couldn't believe there was such kindness and love in the world. I have always been loved by my family and church but for total strangers to do this for me after 30 years was more than I could have imagined.

My daughter was anxious to come also and when we arrived four big Marines were there waiting at the airport. I gained four sons right there in five minutes and as the reunion proceeded I gained at least four more sons and many beautiful faithful friends that will make my heart sing forever. I would like to pay tribute to these good and faithful men and their wives who once more served beyond the call of duty. Their names are: Willie Roe Yates, Billie Ray Moffatt, Billie Joe Hill, Ken Penn, John Wright, Howard Whitaker, Virgil Porter, Bob Bates.

I can assure you that I will never be lost again. I congratulate you on a very successful reunion. And to all those that were there, I thank you for your love and friendship. You are my Pride and Joy forever. God bless you all.

NVA In U.S. Hospital

Last year I was assessing a new patient for a vascular problem. The patient was male, early 70's and of Oriental persuasion. I'll call him Nguyen X. In listening to his account and by the spelling of his name it became obvious that he was Vietnamese. During the exam, he cautiously raised the right sleeve of my scrub top, just enough to expose the USMC tattoo. I raised the sleeve up further to sate his curiosity and allowed him to see the Bulldog with the WWI style helmet. He stated "Marines, huh?"

"Yes sir, a long time ago."

"Did you have to be sent to Vietnam?" I replied in the affirmative and told him when and where I had served or seen action. He smiled up at me and said, "Very strange that we meet like this. I was a Medical Officer in the North Vietnam Army" He went on to tell me his outfit and how he ended up here. He made a point about how "bothered" the NVA soldiers he knew would get when they had to move out against Marines. "We were told many things about you Marines and about your history and especially how stubborn you would fight. We weren't so worried about the Army soldiers, but we were very respectful of you Marines."

"We knew we could win our war against America by just wearing the soldiers down, but we sometimes made jokes about maybe not being able to hold out too long if all Marines were in Vietnam. This was a very unhappy thing to think of. We did not like to have to fight Marines. Marines don't run, America is very honored to have Marines."

I thanked him and continued with his assessment. He shook my hand and said, "I'm very sorry Marines had to die for Vietnam. All Marines are good and honorable. All Marines are heroes. Marines made my job very difficult."

Buffalo Belt

You asked me to write about the belt I sent to David Buffalo and the incident leading up to it. As I remember, David Buffalo joined the 26th Marines when they were reactivated in April of 1966. I did not meet David until we were in country in October. When we relieved the 9th Marines on Hill 55, they left us with very few defensive positions or anything else. I had Staff Duty and was checking the lines, such as they were. I was stumbling around when this Marine came out of his defensive position with his weapon at the ready and pointed at me. I pulled my .45 and announced who I was. We exchanged a few words and went our separate ways. That was my first and last meeting with David until he was on a medevac helicopter out after he was shot and bayoneted on Hill 950.

After we evacuated our wounded, they brought the dead and wounded NVA down to the aid station. One of the dead NVA had a nice belt on. For some reason I took it off of him. Why, I have no idea.

Thirty years later, I signed a guest book from a guy who was looking for Plank holders from the 26th Marines. Somehow, I got the address of one of the mailmen from 1/26. I wrote him and asked him about David Buffalo. He wrote back and informed me that, in fact, Buffalo was his name and gave me his home address and phone number.

I called David and we had a long conversation. We emailed back and forth and I am glad he is still alive, even if he did almost shoot me. We laughed about that. He told me about his three years of convalescing. I was setting up my Marine Room when I found the belt I had taken from the dead NVA soldier and realized why I had taken it. I called David and told him that I had it and that it was his if he wanted it. He said he would like it very much. I mailed it the next day.

Deja Whatever

My current dilemma is caused by a long turbulent past and hard knocks taken dead on. You play. You pay. I am becoming increasingly nostalgic in my waning years. My always restless, wandering mind repeatedly lobs me back to our Officer Club at Khe Sanh. Jim our CO, Ken with Bravo, Mike our Communications Officer and I. We stand close to one another in a gentleman's semi-circle just outside the club's entrance. The sun is going down over Laos. A radiant-red sky lights the dusty, red dirt beneath our nylon sided boots. We are laughing and downing the latest Marine Corps-issued grog.

It was so easy and natural being macho, then. Those days of October and November 1967. Before the Furies came. Unquestionably, they were the most memorable and exciting times of my life. I was confident and comfortable in my job. I worshiped my company and loved my battalion. My childhood dream had come true. I was twenty-four.

You bet your sweet petunia I exceeded the daily allotment of two beers, on occasion. I justified my behavior by averaging. I never drank out on the hills or in the bush. Delta spent most of its time outside the base. So...whenever I'd get stuck at the base overnight, with my company out on one of the hills, I'd let my hair down a notch. Ken, Mike or some other brother 1/26 officer would always prevent me from making a complete fool of myself and embarrassing the regiment.

That old tape played again during our last reunion in St. Louis. I'm going up the stairs just off the main lobby. Backwards. Hal's got me in a headlock. Ken's got me under an arm. My feet are bouncing off the steps. I'm going: "Whud I do, huh? Just tell me, whud I say?"

"Shut-up," Ken says matter of factly. "You're going to bed. Right now." My problem is I've got a 24-year-old spirit in a 56-year-old, long ago burned-out, gunfighter's body.

VO-67 REUNION

With anxiety and reserved feelings, I went to the first ever reunion for the unit I served with in Vietnam. VO-67. I wasn't sure what to expect and didn't understand what might happen. It had been 31 years since most of us had seen or talked, due to the secrecy of our unit.

Upon seeing some of the members of my squadron, there were smiles and tears of joy. We realized that only time had passed. As members of the families of shipmates that had been KIA or MIA started showing up, feelings of sadness began to engulf me. It brought back many memories of camaraderie, good times, and sad times. This was one of the fears that I had. That I wouldn't know how to cope with these feelings. But I think that between all of us, we managed to find some sort of closure and understanding.

At the dinner banquet I was afforded a very great honor. I was asked to give the invocation. I had asked Chaplain Ray Stubbe to write one specifically for us since he had extensive knowledge of who and what VO-67 is. He did so graciously. I was very nervous, being an E5 enlisted man, to stand before everyone and give the invocation. As I started to speak, I felt a hand on my shoulder. I looked over and no one was there. I knew that the Good Lord was telling me that everything was alright. Later in the dinner I was called up to the podium. This time I was to receive an Air Medal for the combat missions I had flown, dropping sensors to help track NVA movements around Khe Sanh in Nov 1967-June 1968. This medal should have been awarded 31 years ago but I felt very proud to receive it now. We also had a bell tolling ceremony to honor our KIA and WIA crew members. We lost 20 crew members, 25% of our combat air crews.

I am proud to be a life member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. I have become very good friends with Ted Szczesniak who served with COMM 1/13. I am looking forward to going to the Khe Sanh Veterans reunion in the year 2000.

An ESP Experience

Sgt. George William Storz, 1st Bat. 9th Marines, H&S Co., Platoon 106 arrived in Vietnam about November 22, 1967 at Camp Evans where he was stationed on Hill 51 until 1/9 was sent to Khe Sanh in late January, 1968. There, he was stationed at an outpost on the Rock Quarry, one-half mile northwest of Khe Sanh base. A conscientious Marine, George had written in a letter to his family, "My main job now is to save my men's lives no matter how much they dislike it." He was cautious, also, writing, "I take good care of myself, always in my hole and I'm armed to the teeth, knives, pistol, rifle, grenades, everything." One day, the top bed, made of 300 pounds of dirt weakened by tunneling ants, fell down on him as he lay on the bottom bunk. He wasn't hurt because he was wearing his armored vest and helmet. He wrote, "So there I was on the floor with big chunks of dirt pinning me down and about a million ants crawling all over me. All we could do was laugh."

George and Jim, a corporal in his unit, were bunker mates and shared many night watches, talking through the hours. They talked about new recipes for c-rats, cars, and family. George had his eye on a new Bonneville when he got home. He was excited about the new baby expected in May and couldn't make up his mind if he wanted a boy or girl. "I'd like a boy," he said, "to carry on the family name. But, if it's a girl, she'd be beautiful and she'd never have to go to war." Scheduled to be discharged from the Marine Corps on May 15, he was to leave Khe Sanh for the rear on March 8. On that Friday morning, Jim took him around in the supply vehicle to say goodbye to his men at their positions and then down to the helicopter at C-Med.

Able-bodied men served as stretcher bearers to load wounded onto the aircraft, so George and Jim were pressed into service. At about 10:30 a.m., as they were carrying a stretcher, the airstrip came under heavy mixed artillery, rocket, mortar and machinegun fire. George was hit, suffering penetrating wounds to his head and left arm. He died without regaining consciousness, although Jim said George knew he was there. I am thankful to Jim for having been with him and to the corpsmen who tried to save his life. The helicopter received 50 shrapnel holes, causing minor injuries to two crew members and substantial damage to the aircraft although it was able to take off later.

His body arrived in the U.S. on March 25 and he was buried at Tamalpais Cemetery in San Rafael, California on March 29, 1968. He is survived by his wife, Kitty (Carla); children George Brian, Ursula, and John, born seven weeks after his death; parents George and Betty; brother John; and sister Ellen.

George had written about the time at Khe Sanh when a buddy had shared his bottle of wine with him. He wanted so badly to reciprocate, asking at the end of every letter, "Where's my wine?" His wife was afraid to send it for fear he would get tipsy and get hurt, and I knew it was illegal to send anything alcoholic through the mail. Finally, she bought the wine (Paul Masson Burgundy, I remember) and gave it to me to mail. It was very late at night when I popped some popcorn to cushion the bottle, so I went to bed intending to finish the package in the morning. That night I woke up about 12:30 and tossed and turned the rest of the night. I felt terrible in the morning, put some cheese and crackers in with the wine and took the unsealed package with me when I left to go to my teaching job. As I was driving to work, I listened to the radio as the announcer told about the fierce shelling that had gone on at Khe Sanh during the night. I was overcome with emotion and, crying, pulled over and waited until I could continue.

When I got to the classroom, I put the package on my desk and left the room for a minute. I returned to find that kids had gotten into the popcorn. I rescued the package and hid it until after school, when I sealed it and mailed it on the way home. Not wanting the package traced to me, I did not include a return address. The next day, I wrote to George telling him I had sent the wine on March 8. On the 26th, we got the word that George had been killed on March 8 at about 10:30 A.M. Vietnam time, 12:30 California time.

Mission

- Some chose.

  They knew by instinct, had known always,

  that they would, no, must accept the mission.
- Some were chosen.

  They learned by lesson, by example to accept, try to survive the mission.

- Some chose

  First forward, "Hey, I'll go. See you guys."

  "No problemo." "Piece of cake!"
- Some weren't chosen.

  We need four more. "I'll go next time."

  "Man, I'm tired. Let me sleep."
- They were ambushed!

  Should have been there, could have helped them.

  God, why those guys? Why not me ??
- Some chose

  and some were chosen. What's the mission?

  "I'll go right now! Please, choose me !"
- Some were chosen to survive it, to return and wonder why and what's their mission.

- Tell the story.

  Some will choose. Choose not to listen.

  Some will choose. They'll choose to hear.

Fox 2/3's Foxtrot Ridge

28 May 1968
by Phillip Ball
printed with permission

After three days of inactivity, we were beginning to think the report of a large NVA unit headed in our direction was just another false alarm. We had a lot of those in the bush — "hurry up and wait" was often times the order of the day. It was extremely rare for a Marine rifle company to stay in one position as long as this, but the Battalion Commander was calling the shots from LZ Hawk, and he felt strongly about the information he had. Rumor was, if nothing happens tonight, we move out in the morning.

We were 3000 meters southeast of the Khe Sanh Combat Base and 1200 meters south of Rt.#9. Our ridge line position seemed to be a good one. With LZ Hawk and its artillery battery only 2000 meters to our northeast, fire support would be swift and accurate. With vertical slopes on all sides, surrounded by thick jungle and very heavy underbrush, some of us felt the enemy would lose far too many men to risk a ground attack so each day there, we simply dug our holes deeper and reinforced our positions. My squad-leader woke me up shortly after midnight, by whispering the one alarming word that immediately shocks the most sleepy-eyed grunt into action, "MOVEMENT!" One of our LP's (4-man listening post outside the perimeter) using a star light scope, spotted a few NVA on the southern-slope of the smaller piece of high ground, east of our ridge line positions. Because of its higher elevation and its excellent vantage points, we called this 13-man outpost the Crow's Nest. Manned by a squad of grunts, an M60 machine-gun team, and our artillery FO (Forward Observer) team, the small outpost had to be defended at all cost. Should the enemy ever gain control of the high ground in battle, they would gain a distinct advantage.

Our 60mm mortars began firing on the NVA, who immediately began to attack the Crow's Nest. Artillery from LZ Hawk began pounding the key areas that had been previously registered as likely avenues of approach. Utilizing heavy small-arms fire, grenades and satchel-charges (blocks of TNT, wrapped with detonating cord and stuffed into a satchel of some kind), a platoon-size NVA unit attacked from the tree line. Bloody, close-in fighting took place for nearly 30 minutes, but the marines proved to be too much for the NVA. After losing the majority of their platoon, the enemy pulled out and dispersed back into the trees. Once again the countryside was graced with silence. The smell of smoke and burned gun powder lay heavy in the night air, and I heard the moans and cries of wounded NVA at the bottom of the hill. Waiting and wondering was the hardest part, we had no idea how many more gooks were out there, nor did we know how willing they would be to die. They had come a very long way on foot, through some of the most hostile terrain in the world, with a single purpose in mind. I doubt that they had had much time to rest before the attack, and perhaps that is the reason they were permitted to smoke marijuana and opium. We smelled the stuff early on. It was as if they were burning it on a fire for our benefit, trying to get us stoned so we wouldn't fight.

It wasn't until 0245H before they were once again ready to fight. This time they came up the opposite end of the ridge — the western slope was a more gradual incline than any other side. Like a giant finger, it rose from the heavy jungle, approximately 100 meters before leveling-off to an open summit, covered with chest-high elephant grass. We smelled the drugs they were smoking, but we also smelled their rotten body-odor. They stunk up the whole place with their lack of hygiene. We were all reporting sounds of enemy movement, but nobody had actually seen a target until the 4-man LP, 20 meters down the finger, called in and said, "We got bookoo gooks comin' straight up the trail at us."

I was a PFC with just one month in-country. I didn't know too many guys outside my own squad yet, but the excited whispers of the grunt from the LP were very familiar. It was my best buddy Private Donald P. Schuck, a tough country boy from Indiana who I had first met back in boot camp. Don was as tough as nails, thus the nickname Nails suited him well. Immediately after reporting that NVA were approaching his position, Don requested permission to bring the 4-man LP back inside the perimeter, where he could find cover in his hole in 1st platoon's sector. I was shocked and angered when I heard someone tell him, "Just sit tight; do not move until I get down there for a closer look-see." Out there without a fighting hole for cover, the LP did not stand a chance if they were spotted by the enemy, and I hoped Don disobeyed the ridiculous order to sit-tight and was headed back in. Neither of us any longer wanted to be heroes, we only wanted to survive. We talked about it often, if given an order that might get us killed, we would not hesitate to do what we thought was right. We felt that too many officers were in it for the glory, and they did not care how many grunts had to die to get them the recognition they wanted. Of course all officers weren't bad, but you always have that 10 percent.

I began passing the word myself "Watch out for the LP coming in. Don't shoot, 4 man LP comin' in." With my head sticking above the rim of the hole, I whispered loudly to the position 10 meters to my right. It was in mid-sentence that I was stunned by three, practically simultaneous explosions that rocked the entire west end of the ridge. The blasts occurred right where I believed Schuck's LP was supposed to be. I had no idea what happened at the time, only later did I find out that 3 NVA with satchel charges, leaped into the 4-man LP position, killing themselves and 3 of the 4 marines. Private "Nails" Schuck miraculously survived the initial attack. Disoriented and possibly in shock, he struggled to get back to 1st platoon's lines.

The blasts triggered an all out attack on the western finger, and again up the eastern slope on the Crow's Nest. The Crow's Nest machine-gun team of L/Cpl. Bob "Hillbilly" Croft and his A-Gunner PFC Julio "Mouse" Espejio, had expended a huge portion of their belted ammo during the first attack and were in desperate need of an emergency resupply. Hillbilly asked that someone bring him all the ammo we could afford. This request immediately became top priority.

PFC Avan Lampkins, from Alabama, was the third man in my hole. He was a big, strong black marine who was openly prejudiced against all whites. 3-Alpha squad-leader L/Cpl.Fred "Chico" Rodriquez recently made Avan his assistant, because there was no other place to put him. He refused to get along with the whites in the squad, and the one fire team that was all black didn't want him either. Avan was not a team player, he did not take orders well, but only through Chico's keen sense of fairness and diplomacy did Avan become a valuable asset to the squad. He was like a one-man-army, in the tremendous loads he could carry. He humped more weapons and ammo than any two grunts in the field. Only because I was 3-Alpha's radioman and he was forced to share a hole with me, was I tolerated; grudgingly perhaps, but just the same, we were a team, 3-Alpha CP Group. Avan Lampkins never volunteered for anything in his entire, selfish life. That's why Chico and I were both so surprised when he stepped up and volunteered when Sgt. Pressller called over the hill without using the radio, "We need one, warm body up here, Chico. On the double."

My biggest fear at that point was that someone would tell me I had to get out of my hole for some reason, but Avan jumped up right away and scrambled to the Company CP as if he had no fear in him whatsoever. I admit, I was scared to death but because I was a Marine, I was not afraid to die. Actually, I planned on it. I just did not want to suffer. I did not want my body to be so torn up no one would recognize me at the funeral. I especially did not want to be burned.

With the NVA ground attack in full swing, came a relentless barrage of RPG's that pounded the entire length of our position. The somewhat crude 40mm Rocket Propelled Grenades were fired from various hills adjacent to us, making a blood-curdling, scream-like whistle as each one approached. It was only a split second warning, but by listening to the intensity of the whistles, we could sometimes judge approximately where they were going to hit. Our own artillery pounded at targets all around the ridge line, but nothing seemed to stop the human wave of NVA, especially up the western finger, where Schuck was still trying to get back to the perimeter, and where 1st platoon's lines were beginning to crumble under the pressure. After 1st platoon's machine-gun was knocked out by an RPG direct hit, killing both the gunner and a-gunner, things really went downhill fast. The mortar-pit, next to the gun-hole was next, when a chi-com grenade bounced into their position. The four mortar-men leaped out at the last instant.

Several NVA breached 1st platoon's perimeter and attempted to find Lt. Jones and the Company CP. PFC Allen "Chief" Walker, while fleeing the mortar pit, ran headlong into 2 of those NVA. He shot one in the head with his .45 automatic, while he struggled with the second. More and more Marines were being forced from their holes in 1st platoon's sector as some 60 to 80 NVA rushed up the finger, eager to occupy the abandoned positions. It was one of the Marines who spotted Chief fighting the hard-core gook, and he immediately rushed over to help.

Lt. Jones ordered 1st platoon to pull back, twenty meters inside the perimeter and to stretch out across the ridge, tying in with 2nd platoon on the north and 3rd platoon on the south. He ordered them to bring all the wounded and the dead out with them. 1st platoon suffered approximately 6 to 9 KIA's and 20 or so WIA's, in the first 5 to 10 minutes. That only left about a half dozen grunts that weren't killed or wounded, but not all WIA's were totally disabled and many continued to fight.

One was PFC David Kinsella, who was the last man out of the mortar pit before the enemy grenade exploded. The blast caught him in the soles of the feet and shrapnel penetrated his boots. He made several trips back and forth from the newly formed secondary line of defense, to within five meters of where the NVA were setting up their lines, and managed to help the WIA's back to a more secure area.

The NVA looked to have the strength and the momentum to overrun our entire company position. They had just gone through 1st platoon in 10 minutes, like a hot knife through butter. There seemed to be no letting up on their part. We had no chance of receiving reinforcements before sun up.

The enemy was using pop-up flares to coordinate their attack. I saw a couple of their green pencil flares soar into the night sky, but I didn't know what they were for. Lt. Jones and Gunnery Sergeant Larsen knew exactly what they were, and just to see what would happen, they fired a few of their own. What unfolded next was perhaps the very last thing anyone might expect. The enemy troops misunderstood our flares to be their own, they immediately stopped fighting, and started celebrating. They thought we left the hill, forfeiting a victory to them. They were really whooping it up, shooting into the air and yelling praises to themselves. They went through 1st platoon's abandoned packs and equipment, scavenging American cigarettes and C-Rations. It was this brief pause in the action that gave us the time we needed to regroup, and with all of 1st platoon's people pulled back a safe distance, our artillery was called in on the western finger. Swift, accurate and very deadly, the big guns at LZ Hawk fired a mission that fell as close as 35 meters at times from our own people. We all understood it had to be close to be effective, so we buried ourselves in our holes and toughed it out. The concussions were bone jarring, and I thought for sure one of those 105 rounds was going to land right in my hole, but it didn't, and we made it okay.

The NVA on the other hand, lost a hell of a lot of men, but they still didn't quit. They simply moved around the ridge and continued to attack wherever the artillery was not hitting. Using the same, familiar human-wave type tactics, they charged up at various places hoping to find a weak spot where they could breach our perimeter again. We all had our chance; they tested everyone, but we all held our ground, repulsing one attack after another. The ground attack was bad enough, but the unprecedented number of Rocket Propelled Grenades this reinforced NVA Battalion brought to bear was devastating us. It was estimated that more than 500 RPG's exploded on our small position between 0415H and 0600H. That comes out to one every fifteen seconds. It was during those two hours that the fighting was obviously the heaviest; and for me it seems like one big blur. Chico and I took turns sticking our heads up, a very dangerous proposition in itself. We had to quickly locate any immediate threat, and then attempt to dispose of it. Thanks to Avan's generosity, or rather inadvertent mistake, he had left a sack of a dozen or more of his grenades behind, and it was with those grenades that we were able to defend our position without the enemy locating us. We waited until we absolutely had no other choice before either of us fired a single round from our M16s. A muzzle flash at night was a road map to your position. We also used the three Claymore mines we set up in our field of fire. One extremely effective, catching about 5 NVA in-line.

At some point, radio silence had to be ordered, because the enemy got their hands on one of our radios. It wasn't that we were afraid they would listen and learn of our strategy, they were playing with the damn thing like school kids on a telephone. I heard them laughing and cutting up; they kept us from transmitting messages because they kept the microphone keyed. Radio silence added another dimension of fear and confusion; not knowing what was going on was troublesome. After a while, Chico decided that Avan had been gone too long plus we were hungry for information concerning the status of the rest of the company. Hell, we didn't know how many of us were still alive. Was a plan to retreat an option? It was shortly after O6OOH, that the RPG bombardment let up a bit. Chico scrambled out of the hole to go to the CP for info. I wasn't a bit happy about being left alone, but I knew my squad-leader would be within hearing distance if I needed him. All I had to do was holler. I remember sticking my head up and seeing a half-dozen NVA running up the hill toward me. One of them appeared to be waving a handgun as if to lead the charge. I had been waiting anxiously for just this scenario, so I could fire the claymore I had so meticulously tied up in the one tree between me and the tree line. The squad of NVA were literally cut to ribbons by the claymore. As I stood up to fire my M16,I felt something hit me squarely in the right side of my head. I thought Avan had clumsily kicked me, returning from his mission, but in fact it was a satchel charge, blocks of TNT they used so frequently that night as concussion-grenades.

The blast blew off my helmet and slammed me hard against the far side of the hole. I ended up at the bottom, twisted like a pretzel, lying on my back. Both my arms were bent around underneath me and my shoulders were tightly wedged between the front and backsides of the hole. I couldn't move anything but my legs, so I started kicking and digging my heels into the clay, desperately trying to free myself. It took several, long seconds to regain my senses. At first I could not figure out where I was, or why I was there. My mind flashed back to a childhood memory of my mother and me, during more carefree times. I oh-so-yearned for those times again, when my mother's touch could solve any problem and sooth any pains. It was only because of my youth and my excellent physical condition that I was able to recover from such a devastating blow to the head as quickly as I did. I feared the enemy would jump into my hole at any second, and the only thing that mattered at all was that I get to my feet. There was no need to consider anything else at this point. If chewing off my arm would have freed me, I think I would have tried it. I arched my back and twisted around and I got my left arm free. I reached across my chest to remove a sharp object that had been sticking me in the side, and found it was my M16. I immediately raised the barrel to aim it straight up at the smoke filled sky. Suddenly the sweaty, distorted face of a young North Vietnamese teenager was looking down at me. I guess he couldn't see me in the dark, and he was reluctant to jump into the deep hole, because he just froze in that position for a split second. Time enough for me to positively identify my target, and pull the trigger with my left, index finger. A long burst of automatic fire erupted from the MI6 muzzle, illuminating the surprised expression on the unsuspecting youth's face. Several rounds hit him in the chest, then, more walked up and splattered his face. It all happened so fast, it was over before I realized it had actually happened. When it did sink in that I had just killed a gook, a very strange feeling came over me. I felt the victim's buddies would come after me in retaliation. It became real personal at that point. Using the M16 as a crutch, I grabbed hold of the warm barrel with my left hand and I raised my upper-body enough to free my right arm, twisted behind my back. I then struggled to my knees and began to stand up. Still a little woozy, I reloaded my weapon.

Just as I was throwing the M16 muzzle over the rim of my hole to fire, I was blind-sided from behind POW. Something very heavy came crashing in on top of me. I felt a sharp blow to the head, just behind my right ear. I collapsed to the bottom of the hole out cold. I don't know how long I was out, but when I started coming around there was someone or something stepping on me. It was Avan and Chico, they both came running back to the hole when they heard me shooting the gook. The first words I remember hearing were, "You alright ? Damn Butterball, we thought you wuz dead, man."

Avan tried to take credit for my "kill, saying that he had saved my life in the nick of time. I remember arguing with the big, soul brother about it. "You might have shot him after he was already dead," I said."But I got him square in the face first."

Not long after that the sun came up behind the mountain. Hueys (helicopter gun-ships) began arriving. A half dozen machine gun shooting, rocket firing choppers circled the ridge line, picking off the now fleeing NVA. Those Huey door-gunners are a breed to themselves. They say you have to be half crazy to do what they do, and ice water in your veins. Tree top level at 120 mph, tethered only by a thin, leather strap, these courageous gunners hung outside the aircraft and fired down at the horrified enemy, who in turn were shooting back at the Hueys. The Hueys gained altitude and moved away to the north, giving plenty of space to the 500 mph jet Phantoms. F4s could carry 5000 pounds of high explosive, dumb bombs. Aimed entirely by gravity, and the direction of the aircraft, it was exciting to watch our Marine Corps pilots at work. Us grunts on the ground cheered loudly when our pilots risked their own lives to dive dangerously low in order to hit enemy targets for us. These jets dropped 92,000 pounds of ordinance that morning, rearranging the surrounding landscape in a big way, and saved our asses once again.

It was going on 1100H and there was still a handful of determined NVA holed-up in a large bomb crater on the western end of the ridge. Echo Company had arrived and was pursuing the fleeing enemy troops to the south and southeast. We had hoped they would come up the hill and flush-out these gooks who virtually had our whole company pinned down, but it was not going to happen. Instead of mounting an assault and possibly losing many more of our men, it was decided to drop napalm bombs on the NVA in the crater. We had approximately 40 WIA's on the ridge, who unless they were lifted out very quickly, were going to be KIA's. We had to get them choppers in ASAP.

We were all told to stay in our holes and cover up with whatever we could find, "It might get a little hot," a voice on the radio stated. Mine must have been one of the only working radios on the southwestern portion of the perimeter, because I was instructed to switch over to another frequency and assist the pilot in any way I could. By the time I found the right radio frequency, someone from above was already talking to me."3-Alpha what is your location?-Over. Come in 3-Alpha." The voice was so cool and calm, not at all what I'd been hearing all night. I missed his call-sign, so I simply called him Phantom.

"Phantom this is 3-Alpha. Be advised we are on the south side of the ridge,20 meters above the, about 35 meters east of the big bomb crater. Do you want me to pop smoke?-Over." Just as I finished my transmission, the high-speed Fast Mover streaked past at eye level, dipping into the valley and then pulling up hard at the last second.

"Negative on the smoke, 3-Alpha. I think I've got a visual. Is that you in front of that clump of brush?-Over?" Again his tone of voice was so relaxed I felt like I was talking to a commercial airliner back home. I turned around and saw a big bush I never even knew was there, then I confirmed his visual, "That's us. Over."

The Phantom pilot went on to say something to the effect that by the looks of things on the ground, we must have had "one hell of a party last night." He also apologized for taking so long to arrive. He told me he could see "a dozen or more bad-guys in the crater, and several more moving up and down the west finger."

One Phantom F4 circled high above, while another came in from the north. It really looked as if he was using me as an aiming stake, the crater target lined up between him and me. The big jet came screaming in over the top of us with a thunderous, bladder-emptying roar. I didn't think he dropped his bombs, but the records indicate he did. They exploded further down the hillside so I couldn't see them from my position. I did see the NVA's green tracer rounds erupt from the crater as the jet passed over, spraying the belly of the brightly polished aircraft, but doing no damage. The noise alone was enough to make me feel like the world was coming to an end, my body felt like it was going to explode from the high pressure, vibrating and tingling from the inside out. An awesome, terrifying experience indeed.The second jet immediately followed the same flight path as the first, diving at the ridge from a Khe Sanh approach. Everyone around me was yelling and screaming, "Get down. Everybody get down." Something was drawing me to watch the whole thing, I didn't freeze up. It was more like being mesmerized by the sheer power of it all. The Phantom came in just slightly over my shoulder. I saw two bombs released, one from under each wing. The one underneath the starboard (right) wing, must have hung up in the release mechanism for a split second, because while the first bomb fell directly into the crater, the second one soared past it altogether. The long cylindrical napalm canisters tumbled end over end, just once or twice before slamming to the ground. Reddish-orange flames nearly 100 feet tall enveloped everything. Black smoke as thick as paint rolled from the fire and blocked out the late mourning sun. Directly on target, the first bomb killed nearly all the NVA still on the ridge. I watched that second, slightly delayed canister sour past the target and disappear over the side of the hill right in front of my position. It must have exploded down near the tree line, about 20 meters away, because the flames rose so high as to come back down on top of us. The heat was immediately unbearable and it forced us to abandoned those positions that had served us so well to this point.

The NVA were on the run, but were still fighting as they fled. We didn't realize it at the time, but the majority of the gunfire and explosives that suddenly increased significantly after the napalm was dropped, was dud and unused ammo and ordinance on the ground that cooked off in the napalm. It wouldn't have made any difference to us if we had known, because this stuff will kill you just as fast as anything else will. Spinning and twirling in all kinds of haphazard directions, small arms rounds, grenades, mortars, RPG's, the whole" 9 yards" seemed to be happening all over again. In fact, we thought the NVA was coming back for another fight.

It probably wouldn't have been half as bad if the winds from the south hadn't all of a sudden started blowing and pushing the flames across the ridge in our direction. The tall elephant grass and heavy underbrush caught fire and quickly raged out of control. We tried to put it out, but at no avail. There was nothing left to do but jump ship. I grabbed my radio, which was still inside my pack, my M16,and a bandolier of magazines. I followed Chico and Avan up and over the ridge line, but I lost track of them in the smoky confusion on top. I was running so hard anyway, my momentum carried me down the steep, North Slope, past 2nd platoon's perimeter line. I couldn't get enough traction to stop myself in the loose, barren soil, until I grabbed a hold of something sticking out of the ground and I hung on for dear life.

2nd platoon was shooting at gooks in the deep gorge below, and the gooks were returning fire at 2nd platoon. I was out there in the middle, with absolutely no cover whatsoever. After being cramped up in the fox hole all night long, my legs felt weak and stiff. I tried with all my strength to climb back up that near-vertical cliff, but for every step up I took I would slide back down two. When enemy bullets began whizzing past my ears, and the high-powered rounds of AK47's started cracking all around me, the situation quickly escalated into sheer panic. I did not want to be the last Marine killed in a battle I believed would go down in history as one of the most significant, company size firefights in the Vietnam War, especially not after all I'd already been through. I wanted to live to tell my kids about it someday.

I said a quick prayer and asked God for the strength to get me out of this mess. I think I might have promised to turn my life over to serving him, perhaps become a minister. My prayer was answered immediately, and certainly none too soon. I couldn't even feel my legs as they catapulted me up the hill, back through the fire, and into the foxhole I wished I had never left in the first place. The flames were not as high as they were earlier, but I'm sure they came up to my chest or more. I did get a pretty good sunburn out of it, but no serious burns at all. Indeed another miracle. I saw small groups, 10 to 20 NVA running over the ridge south of ours. It also was covered with elephant grass on top, and we could clearly see them as they ran over the crest. A couple of Hueys were pursuing them all with fire, but I felt the need to keep shooting too, as long as I could still see them. At 500 meters, they were pretty much out of range for an MI6, but I tried to compensate by elevating the muzzle and leading each target a little bit. When Chico and Avan returned to our position, they too joined in on what was basically just target practice. That's when my hearing was first, permanently damaged. All night long my ears had suffered some pretty severe stuff, they were both ringing pretty badly, but now with Chico on my left, firing right-handed, and Avan on my right firing left handed, both their chambers were only inches from my ears. I knew damn well that my hearing was being damaged, from the painful, static that accompanied each discharge, yet my eagerness to kill one last gook prevented me from moving away. It got to the point where all I could hear was muffled sounds that cracked like a speaker with a loose wire. The static got worse with every shot, until the speaker itself broke all together. Like a sharp, ice pick piercing my eardrum, the pain was deep, and quite severe. It was only then that I decided to scramble out of the hole to lie down beside it, continuing my long range target practice.

All fighting on the ridge finally stopped around noon. We could still hear sporadic small-arms fire in the distance from Echo Company. The LZ was finally secured and the medevac choppers began arriving. 44 Fox Company casualties were taken out first. An emergency resupply of ammo and drinking water was brought in. As soon as I could slip away from my position, I walked down to the western, 1st platoon machine gun position and the 60mm mortar pit felt like "ground zero." The destruction and devastation perpetrated on the finger was unbelievable. It looked like a bull dozer had come through and scraped the once fertile ground bare, pushing the trees and brush down the hill against the tree line, An impenetrable wall of twisted, broken debris, fifteen feet high, was piled up where Don's LP was once sitting. Dozens upon dozens of dead gooks were strewn all over in every conceivable position of human distortion. I started looking at their faces for signs of life, but there were none. Some grunts were going through pockets and packs, searching for valuable souvenirs. Angrier Marines shoved bayonets deep into soft bellies, apparently feeling the need to kill the enemy more than once. I saw one grunt who was digging out gold teeth with his large, Bowie knife. A small crowd was beginning to gather. When I went over to investigate further, I saw that he had cut the ears off several dead NVA and was displaying them on his belt. I thought they looked too much like old, onion rings that had been smeared with a little catsup. I didn't feel well and I thought I might pass out. I got real dizzy and threw up. My head was pounding from a severe headache and both my ears were ringing loudly. I sat down next to a few Marines who were very quietly staring at the ground, but there was nothing there that I could see. I asked if anyone knew Private Don Schuck. When they all replied negatively with a subtle shaking of the head, I asked if anyone knew what happen to the 4-man LP that had been left out in this very position the night before. Again they all answered "no" in silent ways. None of them wanted to talk, understandably shaken from the night's events, but I was persistent, having recognized one of the mortars guy from the night before.

When Don had led the 4-man LP down the trail, shortly after dark the night before, I watched him leave, and before heading back to my own hole I stopped to warn the marines in the mortar pit to be careful. "We've got a 4-man LP out there right in front of you guys," I said. "Be careful not to blow them away if they come running back in, in the middle of the night."

When I started feeling a little better, I stood up on top the pile of dirt in front of the mortar pit and looked back down the finger again. The dead NVA were dressed in green, or khaki uniforms. The green uniforms were not that much different from our own (camouflage was not issued to grunts until later that summer 1968). I thought Don could be anyone of those dead gooks so I started looking at faces again. There was one body right at my feet that I looked at several times and assumed it was a gook. Something about that long, clump of coal-black hair made me examine it closer. I couldn't believe my eyes, nor would my brain register the fact it was my buddy lying there. I wanted so badly for it to be a dead gook and not Don. I nearly turned and walked away. But I looked over at the mortar man I recognized from the night before and saw he was looking up at me with the sorriest pair of eyes I'd ever seen. I thought I saw him nod at me, and then at the corpse, but no words were spoken at all.

The body was lying face down and I could see the huge opening in the back of the skull, obviously the fatal wound. I knelt down and saw the inside of the head was completely empty of brain matter or blood. I believed then that I was staring at the inside of Nail's face, yet it still was not fully registering in my mind. How could it be? All that young life, full of energy and hope only a few hours earlier, was gone. I had a very hard time dealing with the loss of my friend, especially so early in my tour. I still had 12 more months to serve. I was left with a lonely feeling of vulnerability. If Don could be killed so quickly, then I didn't stand a chance.

I never learned how Schuck was killed until my very last day in the bush almost a year later. I was waiting for the chopper to pluck me off the top of a mountain somewhere near the Laotian Border and take me back to the rear in Dong Ha where I was to prepare to go home. It was one of the happiest days of my young life, until that mortar man from Foxtrot Ridge approached me with tears in his eyes and told me there was something he had to get off his chest before I left and we would never see each other again. By this time we had become friends, but we rarely had the chance to spend time together. He told me that he had been sitting quietly the past 12 months, agonizing over Schuck's death every time I mentioned his name. I didn't realize that I had been talking about my lost buddy as much as he said I had. He told me I would probably hate him after he told me what he needed to say, and the reason he waited until now to tell me was that he expected me to, at the very least, hold a grudge against him.

I still wasn't sure what he was going to tell me that could possibly be that terrible, but judging by his obvious state of high emotion, I could tell it meant an awful lot to him. He said it was him and another marine in the mortar pit who accidentally shot and killed Schuck. He began apologizing and he was very upset, but he forced himself to tell me more. He said the NVA were coming so fast and furious, all they could do was keep shooting as fast as they could. "Schuck came running up right behind a bunch of gooks, and we thought he was one of them." He told me Dan fell right outside their hole and that's when he knew they had made a very big mistake. "He wasn't wearing a helmet and that long, straight hair made him look like a gook." He said he heard him yelling something when he was running toward them but could not tell what. "Now I realize he was probably saying "LP in. LP in." The sobbing mortar man told me he saw the outline of the weapon Don was carrying and it did not look like one of ours. The hand guard/heat shield around the barrel was blown off during the battle. It was an awkward moment for both of us. I think he was waiting for me to get mad at him, but I was in shock. This devastating news came out of nowhere and I really didn't know how I felt. My own emotional state was not really all that stable either, having been in the bush so long, but still the most important thing to me was to go home at this point and I did not want to deal with anything else. I boarded the chopper when it arrived and didn't see that mortar man for 25 years.

I was diagnosed with PTSD in 1991, the year after I stopped drinking and drugging. I discovered I had some "baggage" that needed to be dealt with, and my combat experiences had to be recalled in order to distinguish between my re-occurring nightmares and what really happened in Vietnam. At first it was a very painful process, but the more I learned the better I felt. My perspective began to change, from not being able to talk about Vietnam without crying, to not being able to shut up about it. Armed with the proper information and maps, I was literally able to trace my footsteps through nearly every single day I spent overseas. It was a very eye opening experience for me, and it helped greatly to deal with some of those PTSD issues I'd been avoiding the past 20 plus years.

(Author's note: This story is based on an actual event. Names and minor details have been changed to protect the innocent from any of my errors.)

I functioned on adrenaline around the clock at Khe Sanh. I was happy to help old Sergeant Mantrell with his bottle of bootleg vodka at night. The constant incoming bombardment, combined with the huge rats in the bunkers, made sleep impossible. I knew I would never come out of that place alive, for every minute was pregnant with explosions of incoming rounds delivering death all around. I didn't even try to count the wounded or dead Marines passing before my eyes. Daily. I kept my eyes peeled for every possible barricade behind which I could dive, my ears attuned to the tone and volume of the incoming rounds, my nose twitching away at the smells — burnt gunpowder, fuels, decaying flesh. I was earnestly trying to team with the three men I went there with on how to handle the intensity and fury of battle. I wanted to survive this mission. I knew too well that I had more than eleven months remaining in this war, and this experience following my previous training told me I would see much more combat. Yet in all that deathly seriousness, a very humorous moment emerged. An incident so funny that it

To Stare. A hundred lay startled by Eternity.

Solitary, the Paris Island EM Club,
A year after Tet, after Khe Sanh and Hue City,
Martin poured beer on some sloppy PFC.
Fists and curses, fighting to stand before Iron Mike
In the sticky sweetness of a Carolina night
Mouth brimming blood, Martin howled.

His skin surged in ripples, mad
For the desire to murder the sea.

Bill Jayne - October 1998

dangerously diverted my attention completely away from the constant explosions all around.

During the siege of Khe Sanh, we Combat Controllers, aka "Tailpipe Mike" stayed very busy. We were operating flights, keeping the American commanders abreast, via radio, of which aircraft succeeded and which ones failed to arrive, deliver goods and troops, and depart from Khe Sanh. Controlling the drop zone was a vital role in the re-supply effort. The runway was so hot with incoming artillery, mortars, and rockets around the clock, that the aircraft landing there couldn't deliver men and supplies fast enough.

Aircraft that did land had to taxi in, off-load, upload and takeoff, all in about sixty seconds— the approximate fatal time for an aircraft to be on the ground. It was fatal because the incoming artillery, rockets and mortars were so thick and intense that the average time it took one of those rounds to hit an aircraft while it was on the ground was about sixty seconds. The price for a ticket out of Khe Sanh on one of these aircraft, when you were properly relieved from duty, was that you had to drag a stretcher with a filled body bag onto the aircraft with you. No one ever objected. We took pride in helping those pilots land, off-load, upload, and depart as rapidly as possible. We only lost one C- 123 and crew during the ten days I was there; and they got hit with Automatic Anti-Aircraft fire by that famous "Luke the Gook" after takeoff. We knew where Luke was dug in, a quarter of a mile from the approach end of the runway. We knew this because we had taken fire from him on our arrival, and also because he saw every aircraft we had come in as a target of opportunity and shot at it for all he was worth. We put air strikes on him daily, only to watch the tracers from his weapon fly back up at the Phantoms, Thunderbirds, and the other Fastmovers. He just kept shooting back, and no matter how many times we thought we had finally put him out of business, he proved us wrong. We had another motive for keeping our aircraft moving while an aircraft was on the ground, the barrage of incoming fire was most intense.

The drop zone also had a pair of fatal points for us controllers. First we had to get the mine sweeper, a Marine whose name we didn't know and whom we dubbed 'Peter Sparks,' to sweep the road out to the drop zone's impact point. This was necessary to avoid getting ourselves killed by stepping on or driving across a mine before we arrived at the impact point. I imagine we gave him that name for two distinct reasons: the shape of his tool and our fear of the way he used it. The minesweeper he used vaguely resembled a long penis with a fat head, extending from his waist out to the ground in front of him. He dutifully waved it back and forth as he swept along, reminding us of the little boys we once were, discovering that we could draw pictures on the ground by spraying urine around in patterns. We also feared that the rapid pace at which he moved was sure to result in the accidental hitting of a mine before it was detected. 'Sparks' was our name for this fear. The second most threatening area on the drop zone was the impact point, the point from which we controlled the drops, and the ideal arrival point for each drop. We had to rapidly dig out and crawl into a spider hole from which to work relatively protected from the Vietnamese who were shooting at us constantly — snipers, mortars, artillery, rockets. We were proud of the speed with which we could dig these little holes out of that clay with our military-issue entrenching tools. Those entrenching tools hanging from our web belts were unique for Air Force personnel; a symbol of our superior combat status among Air Force peers who rarely heard the crack of a rifle off a training range. But we were also somewhat put to shame by the Marines recovering those loads we parachuted into the drop zone. Those Marines were never allowed to stop moving long enough to dig their own spider holes.

One morning Dave McGuire and I took the radio jeep, leaving Sergeants Tom Mantrell and Rusty Forte at the airstrip, and headed out for the drop zone. It was still very foggy, but we knew the weather pattern fairly well, and anticipated the fog would lift within an hour or so. I liked that fog. It prevented the Vietnamese from seeing into our camp and improving the precision of the artillery they were shooting at us. But the fog also made parachuting supplies into the base impossible. We couldn't keep eating or drinking water if the fog didn't lift. Surviving on a pint of water a day already, I found the fog as much a threat as a cover. We (actually the Marines and the Vietnamese allies and their Special Forces advisors) also couldn't keep shooting back at the North Vietnamese without the air-dropped re-supplies of munitions. Dave and I drove over to Peter's foxhole, as was the routine, to get him to sweep the road for mines. As was his custom, Peter had his poncho covering his foxhole. Dave called out to him, "Hey Sparks, how about sweeping the road so we can open the drop zone?" We both noticed a slight hesitation in the answer but soon enough the response came back. The somewhat breathless voice was nevertheless clear.

"Fuck your goddamned drop zone road." I was perplexed by that answer, and the near-breathlessness was downright weird. This was the first time I had encountered full-fledged insubordination in the military. It was also the first time I had noticed someone who was breathless in a foxhole that wasn't hit with live fire. But almost everything at Khe Sanh perplexed me, so I looked up to Dave for the explanations. Dave had a wild-eyed, wide and devious grin on his face. That grin was hardly influenced by the endless stream of incoming mortars and artillery popping into the camp all around us. Khe Sanh taught me to distinguish between types of incoming as well as the likely fatal zones of each type. Dave, having already spent three months in this war, and much of that time in combat, was very keen on these things. I knew there was a laugh in the works, but Dave wasn't saying anything so I didn't know where the laugh was. I even feared it might be on me. I felt unsure of whether to smile as if I understood or just try to remain poker faced, so I opted for the latter, implicitly denying that I saw something curiously strange here.

Dave drove our radio jeep over to a nearby bunker and yelled inside, "Hey, lieutenant, we need your help getting the road out to the drop zone swept for mines." That statement was obviously true enough. But it wasn't enough of an explanation for that wild-eyed, toothy, frolicsome expression still on Dave's face. Nevertheless, Dave still wasn't saying anything more. I began to get somewhat self-conscious as a curious sensation came over me, the feeling that I was merely an appendage to Dave who was in the middle of the action. How could he know so much and me so little? How could he carry that huge, lighthearted smile while the artillery was screaming in on us non-stop? I had spent days and nights within arm's reach of him, yet at that moment I felt as different from him as a finger is from a whole body. I kept an eye on him.

Peter's platoon commander came out. It was the first time I had seen this guy, but that wasn't unusual since second lieutenants are about the most expendable commodity above the rank of corporal in the Marines anyway. The lieutenant, with a cleanly shaven, boyish face like my own and a clean but wrinkled uniform and shiny boots, unlike my own, leads us back to Peter's poncho-covered foxhole and yells down at him "Marine, get your ass in gear sweeping that drop zone road." I said to myself, "God, that oughta get him moving." I also found myself feeling contempt for those shiny boots.

How could shiny boots be a priority when you are getting shot at around the clock? I could only speculate — he obviously was either stupid or had a bunker deep enough under ground to protect him from the artillery. I knew that artillery could penetrate through eight feet of Khe Sanh's clay, because our sleeping bunker had taken a direct hit two nights before, startling the rats as well as the rest of us. One of those rats the size of a small cat landed on my chest and ran up across my face. I was so terrified by that rat that it took me a few minutes to recover enough to realize it wasn't a piece of shrapnel from the artillery that hit our bunker. I slowly began to notice the stars shining through the dust and the eight feet of clay that until a few minutes before had been a roof held up with railroad ties. Then I slowly began to hear again the cursing voices of men exclaiming relief at living through it. The first voice I made out was old Mantrell calling out our names in the dark, taking a roll call to see who was still alive. In that environment, who had time to waste shining boots?

I also knew that shine off those boots would reflect sunlight across the mountains to wherever the North Vietnamese spotters and snipers were, viewing our camp, making adjustments on their sights. It all of a sudden struck me that the reason second lieutenants were called 'mortar magnets' was so obvious this one deserved the worst of fates. I resented the lieutenant for that shine on his boots, and briefly hoped he would get his comeuppance right there in front of me. But the poncho-covered foxhole with the mysterious character inside was more commanding than that resentment. As with many other feelings, rather than resolve it, I stuffed it.

Following the lieutenant's command, there was the same hesitation, and the near breathless, yet clear response, "Fuck you and your goddamned drop zone road." The mirthful expression on Dave's face got wilder, his eyes sparkled wider, and now he was visibly having difficulty holding down a full-bellied guffaw. I was at a loss. What the heck is going on here? And what is going on here that is so obvious to Dave yet so unimaginable for me? All I could do was follow Dave's lead. I smiled as if I understood, but I suspect that by this time Dave knew I was hardly cognizant of what seemed obvious to him. Dave looked over at the lieutenant who was clearly unsatisfied with his unruly charge. Dave then looked back at me, leaned his head over and said softly into my ear, "Just keep quiet and watch." Well that is exactly what I was doing, so it was pretty easy to keep on doing it. But I admit the suspense was eating me up so that I was almost oblivious to the steady stream of incoming artillery. Almost, but not quite. I was also getting antsy about sitting above ground in a radio jeep parked next to a pair of sparkling boots that seemed to beg for pot shots. We made an obvious target of opportunity. This moment was simultaneously more fascinating and fearful than anything else I had thus far experienced at the carnage factory called Khe Sanh. And the audience was growing. A squad of twelve Marines approached us, the squad leader speaking to the lieutenant. "Sir, we are assigned to drop zone recovery detail today. Are you the Drop Zone Controller?"

"They are." The lieutenant speaks distractedly, keeping his eyes on the poncho, jerking his thumb toward the two of us. We are still sitting in our radio jeep, the engine idling, "white noise" coming from three of the four radios filling the back of the jeep.

Turning toward me, the squad leader says, "Sir, the recovery detail is prepared to move out to the drop zone." Perhaps he took my slick sleeve as sufficient evidence that I was an officer, and therefore Dave, with his three stripes, was my driver. My sleeve was slick because I had not yet had enough time at Tan Son Nhut to put on the double stripes of my actual rank, Airman Second Class. This was my third mission and I had been in Vietnam for just over two weeks. I was amused at the thought of being taken for an officer, but Dave didn't let me remain amused for long.

"Just hang on until we get the road swept for mines." Dave had an unnerving capacity for being as casual as a teenager parading his cool during high school recess, even in the midst of the unimaginably terrifying constant eruptions of the earth in every direction around us. The Squad leader responded to this with a jerk of his head and a puzzled look, as if to say, "Don't bullshit me, flyboy." But he quickly recovered his wits and before turning to his men, responded, acting convincingly like he meant it, "Yes, Sir."

He then commanded his squad "at ease," supposing such a thing possible here. Their eyes turned to the poncho-covered foxhole as if every one of them immediately sensed a drama unfolding. A few of the Marines lit cigarettes, but they all remained silent and poker-faced. Every one of them was covered red-brown with the thick clay dust, which, mingled with their sweat, formed a moist, featureless cast upon the molds of their angular bodies and made their eyes all look particularly bright against the remainder of their bodies which looked pathetically dull.

The lieutenant strutted off quickly, contempt dominating his face, and returned almost immediately with his gunnery sergeant. The Gunny was a small, wiry, crusty-looking character. He might have been twenty years old, had enough fire in his eyes to burn off the fog that day, a face so dust-covered it revealed a dozen or so new, deep wrinkles reaching out from each of those black-ringed eyes, and two parallel, deep creases parting his brow. Those eyes were focused with such intensity that I was afraid he might look at me and pierce holes right through my flesh. I was relieved that he kept them aimed at that foxhole. He said nothing at first. He walked directly over, grabbed the head-cover, jerked the poncho, stakes and all, off Peter's foxhole and threw it into a heap at his feet. There before all our eyes was the full explanation for all the exuberant expression on Dave's face for the last fifteen minutes, for Peter's breathless insubordination, and for the rest of the curious confusion in this little scenario.

The foxhole was typically rectangular, about three feet wide and six feet long and maybe four feet deep. The walls are completely covered with Playboy centerfolds. Each one held into the clay bank with grenade pins. The olive drab, wooden framed cot in the bottom has a sleeping bag on it. On top of the bag is a completely naked, except for the dog tags on his neck, Peter Sparks. The sweat cuts squiggling trails down across the dusty paste covering his muscular back, which is partially turned toward us. His eyes are tightly closed, teeth gritting, a well-toned body curling in near convulsion, his right hand pumping madly on his full erection.

We had plenty of time to observe this scene as Peter was so devoted to the task in hand that he didn't seem to notice either the disappearing poncho or the audience. Dave turns his head as if to hide the visible mirth if not the sounds erupting from his throat. I am so stunned I can hardly turn my head away. I cannot imagine the courage to commit such an act so close to constant battle and so near to visible exposure. The lieutenant seemed at a loss for figuring what article of the Uniform Code of Military Justice of 1947 this act, in addition to the insubordination, might be violating. Several of the Marines burst into loud jeers, mockingly, cheering Peter on. Only the Gunny was unmoved. He immediately roared, with a cyclopean voice that drowns out all the other noise, including the exploding artillery, "GET YOUR PECKER OUT OF YOUR HAND AND YOUR MINE-SWEEPER IN GEAR, MARINE, NOW! MOVE IT!!"

Without waiting for a response, the Gunny turns on his heels and moves out. This, it seemed, was the only language to which Peter could, at that particular moment, effectively respond. He immediately jumped up from the sleeping bag, simultaneously pulling on his fatigues and lifting up the minesweeper. He jumped, sockless, into his boots, which he didn't bother to lace closed, and was out of the foxhole in an instant, his helmet landing on his head as he leapt up to where we were. He moved directly down that road, quick time, sweeping rapidly but carefully, as if nothing unusual had happened. I can still see the laces of his boots leaving tiny trails in the dust alongside his footprints. My eyes were glued to that road because the minesweeper was moving so rapidly I simply couldn't trust it to do its job. Dave and I followed him in total silence as he swept the road out to the Impact Point of the drop zone. The Marines assigned to the recovery detail followed along behind our radio jeep. We scraped out our spider holes, and controlled the Container Delivery System parachute drops for the day. We recalled the story for Rusty and Mantrell that night, the latter man rewarding us with slugs from his vodka while we sat in the bunker and watched the B-52 bombers deliver their arc-light strikes across the hills within a kilometer of our bunker.

Dave insists to this day to tell that he instantly knew what was going on in that foxhole. I cannot forget how astounded I was by it all. For the remainder of the time I spent in combat, every time I felt tempted to fondle myself, the image of that hardy young Gunny snatching the poncho cover from that foxhole would pop into my head, and the urge wilted.

Thousand Yard Stare (The Siege of Khe Sanh)

Iron falls like rain, day after day of earth slamming, bone ripping indifference as I watch one boy after another being smashed into hash by jagged chunks of death; waiting my turn — it's been falling for weeks.

Mirror images: red shadows, filthy, intimate with rats, hollow eyes, thousand-yard-stare. Gaunt, beyond terror, no black, white or brown, just sick down to the marrow. Heroes are for myths.

Rockets slam as I run zigzag playing tag with death trying to escape the unending barrage of hatred that leaves meat parts strewn over the landscape without even a "by your leave."

Six Marines huddled close for safety in their own coffin dug in red earth. I scramble to get in but come up short; one hundred-and fifty-two-millimeters of revenge with a debt to pay slams home-all died but me; all died but me.

I am running, running, running looking for cover, any womb, any hole big enough for an empty shell to escape from insanity or into insanity of dying, dying, dying boys. I've finally come home.

A Message From The Editor:

Our theme approach seems to be working. Note the many articles which deal with REUNION. The theme for our next issue will be: "RATS/RED CLAY." The submission deadline is July 31, 2000. We received over $3600.00 in donations for the REMEMBERANCES section. Outstanding! We invite those who took the time to remember someone, to write about that person. Let us all know why that person is special to you. It is also our intention to memorialize as many of our KIA's as possible. If you have a picture of someone who was a KIA who served at Khe Sanh, please send it in for consideration and possible use.

Future themes will be: Winter 2001 "DANGER CLOSE" and Spring 2001 "HONOR."

Dear Member of Khe Sanh Veterans:

At the request of many members, we are going to publish a Directory of Members of the Khe Sanh Veterans. The last directory was published in 1996 and is very inaccurate. In order to provide a Directory completely up to date, we are going to need the help of the membership. I have just recently completed a new Computerized Data Base, which still needs work.

Regardless if you pay your dues or not, you will always be carried on the Khe Sanh Veterans Roster and included in the new directory. This is why it is so important to have complete, accurate information. This Data Base is kept solely by the Khe Sanh Veterans and is only available to three persons. No information will be released to any outside organization for any reason. If your telephone number is unlisted it will be confidential. Put down as much information as possible. When the category calls for Unit, be complete, not 2e Marines or 1/9. List the whole unit such as B Co. 1/9, or HAW-262 not just Helos.

We want to keep our organization going for a long time and want to keep in contact with the members. If the yearly dues are not paid, you will only receive one Khe Sanh Veteran Magazine a year instead of the three we mail out. We must do this whether we want to or not. We do not advertise or send our magazine to anyone but members. We have a strict budget and the cost of printing and mailing is very expensive. We can only provide this service through the generosity of our membership.

Note From Mike Worth Chairman, 2001 Reunion:

Just a few words regarding the 2001 Reunion, honoring founder Ray Stubbe, which will be held in Chicago. The committee has been working on the sight selection and has it narrowed down to a few hotels with which we are negotiating. The best room rates are coming up in midsummer. The hotel chosen will be the one offering us the most reunion-friendly services and amenities, at the best price.

Please consider this a call for volunteer Reunion Committee members. Anyone who wants to get involved, especially, but not limited to those in the area, please contact me. I would also like to hear from the Membership during this planning stage with questions, comments and suggestions. We have some ideas and a few things in the works, but your input and ideas are most important.

Why Are We Here — Reunion '99

Why did we come and why are we here?
It is a question that we all may hear.

We came by train, plane and car
What causes us to travel so far?

It's not just to meet and remember when
But more to reflect on how it was then.

We look at the pictures - and stories we tell
And we all remember our time in hell.

We look at each other as we grow old and reminisce about how we were so bold.

Just to live in that dirt, grit and grime
How did we do it all the time?

So long ago, but the memories vividly clear
It seems that I will never forget the fear

The shells a flyin' with no place to hide.
One reason we are here is the pride

Many were wounded and their brave blood spilt,
We are here now with a monument built.

I'll tell you why we come back each year
It's to honor those brave souls no longer here.

So pause and reflect and let out a sigh -
REMEMBER them ..... Semper Fi

Handicapped Handball

By Joseph Olszewski
Alamo, California

In late February 1968 I stepped on a mine on Hill 558 near Khe Sanh. That evening my left foot was amputated on the USS Repose. The doctor who performed the surgery said he could have saved my foot, but I would probably walk better and be more active with a prosthesis as every bone in my foot was shattered. I was twenty-four years old at that time.

That year I was also married in Arlington, Virginia and my wife and I flew to Northern California that same evening to begin our married life.

After all the Physical Training (PT) in the service and all those long patrols in 'Nam, I did absolutely nothing exercise wise between the ages of twenty-five and thirty. During this time period, I concentrated on my family, my career and my sixteen-year-old house.

By the time I reached thirty, however, I began to feel the physical effects of non-exercise. I was gaining weight, I was frequently tired, my career was growing and so was the pressure. At the time, I remembered how good I felt after running those three-mile treks through the woods at Quantico, Virginia during my OSC/Basic School training days. So I began to jog down Danville Boulevard in Alamo, California. At first, not very far. Just a block or two every other day or so. Then I began to count the telephone poles that I passed. Today ten poles passed, tomorrow fifteen, next week twenty. Pretty soon I was driving the distances I jogged so I could track the mileage I was covering. From Arbor Lane (where my now forty six-year-old house is located) to Rudger Road is exactly one mile. From Arbor Lane to Entrada Verde is exactly a half-a-mile. Thus, this loop from Arbor Lane to Rudger Road to Entrada Verde was a three-mile jog.

I ran this route for a good ten years. Then I started to get cocky. First, I started timing these runs always trying to cut a few more seconds. Then I started training for and running in the various 10K races that became so popular throughout the country in the 80's. At first, I didn't want other runners to know that I was an amputee, so I always ran in sweat pants or jogging suits. Soon I didn't care what I looked like or what other runners were thinking and I would run in shorts, a knee wrap to hold my prosthesis tighter and long knee-length socks. By the time I reached my early forties, running in 10Ks just wasn't challenging enough. I thought about marathons, as that was becoming popular. I watched a few and even began training for one, but I knew I didn't have the time to devote to it and my body started telling me something once again. In short, it was telling me if I trained for a marathon either my knees or hips were going to pay a big price.

At that time, I belonged to the Big C Health Club in Concord, California. It's a great club with great guys. "Boots" Erb was one of the managers. Both he and his father were starting quarterbacks for the University of California at Berkeley. The owner was Ken Hoffman who was a homebuilder and at one time was co-owner of the Seattle Seahawks. Both "Boots" and Ken were avid handball players. I watched a little, but at first it didn't interest me since you have to be ambidextrous. Until you get your off-hand as coordinated as your right hand, you're dead meat on a handball court. Thus, my workouts consisted of lifting weights, doing sit-ups and light running on treadmills.

One day I was sitting in the steam room with my wrapped leg (water does tremendous damage to prostheses, so I always sat in steam rooms with my knee-length sock and a knee wrap on my left leg) when one of the premier handball players in the club asked me what was wrong with my knee. I said my knee was fine, but my left foot refused to grow back. He laughed. I laughed. The next evening I was learning handball. This great handball player, Kit Davilia, who I met in the steam room, was a former Army airborne trooper. On one jump he broke his right foot and had to have some of the bones fused. He could identify with me and we became immediate friends.

He talked me into trying handball. It's hard. It's real hard. You have to be able to use both hands as effectively as your strong hand. This alone takes about a year. Then, there's great pain in your hands as the ball is hard and it takes forever to toughen your hands to develop calluses to absorb the punishment. When you're a new player, nobody wants to play against you. You get good at handball by playing against players who are better than you. That's how you improve. So, everybody looks for somebody better to play with. I could only get games with "Kit" and the sixty-year-olds who didn't care who they played against. Little by little, I improved and started getting games with some of the better players.

Clubs like The Big "C" sponsor both racket ball and handball tournaments. After two years of being a novice player, I decided to try playing in tournaments. In tournaments you play at your level. The lowest is "C" level, the next is "B" for the better-than-average players and finally "A" level where the real men live. I played in "C" level tournaments for years. I actually won one or two games, but never could improve enough to be the best "C" level player. One problem I had is that with the prosthesis I never had that quick last-minute adjustment to the ball. When handball players are good they can hit the ball with a little flick of the wrist, which causes the ball to hop to the left or the right when it hits the floor. That little hop is hard to adjust to when you don't have one ankle.

with the event. There's t-shirts, free beer served after an evening's rounds and at the end of the tournament there's an awards party. That's when they hand out the trophies to the winners of each level. For about five years I played in a lot of tournaments, but only for the camaraderie. The guys I played with regularly were big party types and always encouraged me to play in tournaments even though I could never improve. I played, got my T-shirt, got beat and went to the post-tournament party. This went on for a good eight years.

After one tournament the great guys I played with felt sorry for me. They always admired my devotion and would kid me about my prosthesis. If I missed a shot, for example, they would shout: "Hey, Joe, you were a foot short on that shot." I remember one tournament game that I won. They gave the loser a T-shirt with wording on the front that read: "I lost to a one-footed handball player." It was great fun and the camaraderie was similar to what I remembered in the Corps. After this one tournament, however, they had a little surprise for me. They made a special presentation to me at the awards party. They waited until all the "A," "B" and "C" players received their awards and then they called me to the podium. "Kit" gave a little speech about how I always kept playing, but never won anything. Therefore, he and "the guys" thought that it was about time I received something to recognize my devotion. It was small, wrapped in a nice package and somewhat heavy as it was in a silver frame. When I opened it and read it, I laughed. Everybody laughed. It was a cartoon and the message they were trying to tell me was: "Keep trying, at least you're good entertainment." I loved it. I've always kept it in my office.

Recently, my company moved its headquarters from San Francisco to Pleasanton, California where most of us drive to work. Since I have handicapped license plates, I'm one of the few employees who use the handicapped parking slots. Whenever one of my fellow employees asks why I'm parked in the handicapped slots, I just show them this cartoon. Some laugh, some just walk away and a few need a little "hands on" feel-up to be convinced. It's great. I love it.

Today, at the age of fifty-six I no longer play handball. It punishes your wrists and forearms and after time it's simply too painful. I also never found that quick step. I still jog, but only on a treadmill.

What do I do now for entertainment and challenge? Well, I write articles for Red Clay. This is one sport that you get better at with age and nobody cares if you're an amputee.

No more T-shirts,
No more beer,
All I want is a Red Clay cheer.

Agent Orange Update: Prostate Cancer

There are several medical conditions determined to be related to Agent Orange exposure. Congress has declared that any service member who served in Vietnam during the war time era (February 28, 1961 through May 7, 1975) was exposed to Agent Orange, and such exposure may have caused several types of cancer. Diagnosis of any of these conditions will be considered "service connected" by the VA.

Veterans and survivors may be entitled to compensation for such diseases as lung cancer, multiple myeloma, Hodgkin's disease, lymphoma, and as of November, 1996 prostrate cancer. If a Vietnam veteran is ever diagnosed with prostrate cancer, even if it is many years after service, it will be considered a service connected disability and compensation may be paid. Compensation can range from $0 (non-disabling) to around $2,000 (totally disabling). The degree of disability is determined by such factors as urinary frequency, leakage, and impotence. For example, daytime voiding interval of less than one hour or awakening to void five or more times per night will result in a rating of 40%. Awakening to void twice per night is rated 10%. Continual urinary leakage or incontinence requiring the wearing of absorbent materials, which must be changed more than four times per day will result in a 60% rating. If the pad must be changed less than twice a day, the rating is 20%. A small special monthly compensation is paid for impotence. The symptoms must be medically documented — usually by a physical examination at a VA medical facility. The veteran files a claim on VA Form 21-526 (Claim For Compensation Or Pension). It must be accompanied by DD Form 214 showing Vietnam service and any medical evidence establishing the diagnosis of prostate cancer.

If the veteran has already completed that form in the past, it is not necessary to do so again. A brief letter requesting reopening the claim will suffice. Here is a suggested format for that letter: "This is to amend my original disability compensation claim to include prostrate cancer as per new Agent Orange regulations. Medical records showing the diagnosis are attached." The claim should be submitted to the VA Regional Office serving the area where the veteran resides. To obtain a claim form or to get the address of the VA, call 1-800-827-1000. Help in completing the form is available from many veterans' service organizations or from the VA. Other veterans' benefits may accrue as a result of a finding of service connection. They include insurance, medical treatment, and vocational rehabilitation. Survivors of Vietnam veterans who died of prostate cancer may also be entitle to benefits from the VA. An un-remarried surviving spouse may be entitled to a monthly payment of Dependency and Indemnity Compensation (DIC). The current rate is $861. Dependent Educational Assistance may also be available for college attendance. The rate for full time attendance is $485 per month.

VA Response to November 24, 1999, "20/20" Segment on PTSD Ratings:

On Wednesday, November 24, ABC's newsmagazine 20/20 broadcast a story whose premise was that veterans lie in order to receive benefits for post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). VA Undersecretary for Benefits Joe Thompson and Dr. Laurent Lehman, the associate chief of psychiatry and PTSD programs, were interviewed for the story.

The story had a definite slant, and the interviewer, Jay Schadler, had a definite point of view. During an interview of more than an hour — taped in March in Mr. Thompson's office — Schadler asked over and over about the appearance that veterans are on a VA "gravy train." The implication is that a number of veterans have discovered ways to cheat the system and fraudulently receive benefits for PTSD, "up to 3,000 per month tax free" (his words).

To be fair, 20/20 acknowledged that PTSD is real, and that thousands of veterans are receiving benefits legitimately. But Schadler insisted on what he called the "common sense" approach that far too many veterans are receiving benefits in error. He even went on to question why Vietnam veterans are still coming to VA for PTSD claims 25 years after the war.

Throughout the interview, Mr. Thompson and Dr. Lehmann tried to educate Schadler about the claims process, and about how PTSD affects veterans, but Schadler stuck to his premise that this was an enormous rip-off. He even interviewed a VA claims representative who indicated that he had personal knowledge of hundreds of claims that had been allowed improperly.

PTSD is a medical condition. We know that Dr. Lehmann was interviewed, and we know he gave compelling information about the nature of PTSD and other mental health issues VA deals with. Nothing he said made it to broadcast.

VA's Position:

20/20 managed in this shoddy piece to undo years of hard work by VA and by veterans' advocates to recognize PTSD and to encourage veterans to come to the VA for help. With this one story, ABC may have re-stigmatized veterans and scared them away from the help they need. That is tragic, and the network's news division should be ashamed. Dr. Lehmann patiently explained the diagnosis and treatment of these veterans to the interviewer, but to no avail.

Mr. Thompson explained that the process of reviewing claims for service-connected disability does not encourage a situation in which lying is rewarded. He was ignored.

Near the end of the interview, Mr. Thompson summed up his concern. He said that as a Vietnam veteran he had seen a number of negative labels unfairly assigned to Vietnam veterans. "Please don't add 'charlatan' and 'fraud' to the list" he said. Unfortunately, that plea never made it on the air.

The resulting story showed what can happen when a producer and a reporter are closed-minded and care only about how a broadcast can be made to fit their pre-conceived notions.

The VA assures all veterans, their families and their advocates that its commitment to the treatment and compensation for PTSD is ongoing. We encourage all veterans who need help to come to the VA. We will continue to process all claims for disability in accordance with the law, while showing the measure of concern and compassion the American people expect to be afforded the country's defenders.

CANTICLES FROM KHE SANH

In addition to the poetry that will be published in each issue of Red Clay, I will bring you, in a little more depth, the poetry of one or more members. In this issue we will be looking at poems by Kellan Kyllo and Talis Kaminskis.

Kellan was a crew chief and gunner on a CH 46 heli - copter with HMM 262. During the siege he flew resupply missions to companies on the hills and medevacs back to the base or to Dong Ha. He had never written poetry before the war. Upon return to the world, he got a degree in Animal Sciences from the University of Minnesota and worked a dairy farm for ten years until he was forced to deal with PTSD. It was at the VA hospital that he first started writing. Those poems resulted in a book of poetry, "Where Light is Darkness" which was published by the New Sweden Press in 1991. Poetry was his catharsis, a way, as he says, to "get out the feelings."

His poetry is characterized by deep emotion and an ability to write a short, direct strike to the truth. In "Morning Chow" and "The Vietnam Obstacle Course," he brings us right back to those sudden moments of terror and the ironies of the deaths of friends.

Morning Chow
A sniper bullet came through the mess tent.
Someone from Indiana was hit in the temple and died.

The Vietnam Obstacle Course
The first week
Some guys got killed.
Others waited Until
They were ready to go home.

In a later poem, "They Watched Television Together," Kellan gives the reader some idea of PTSD. All of us have had a friend like this.

They Watched Television Together
Late at night
The house was still and quiet.
His best friend,
Killed
In Vietnam
Sat on the sofa with him
And shared
Only a glance and a few words.

My favorite poem by Kellan is "Retirement." In the poem he manages to truthfully and powerfully express his coming to terms with the war and his life today. He is one of the lucky ones: married for twenty-nine years with four children.

Retirement
by Kellan Kyllo
When the emotions of war finally started to slow down inside him he sold his guns, and then soon after that he began to forgive
all the people who had ever done him wrong, and he prayed for each of them daily.
The next Spring
be went into his backyard for the first time in twenty-five years and
planted a garden.
He grew tomatoes and gave them away to everyone.

Combat Buddy

A "Combat Buddy" is what you are
Our Friendship was Forged during War
I watched your back and you watched mine
In battle each day with our lives on the line
A Trust developed that only we know
You're my Combat Buddy from a long time ago
Someday soon, we'll meet again
My Combat Buddy, My Faithful Friend

Lloyd P. "Snake" Arender and dedicated to the Marines and Corpsman of Kilo Company 3rd Battalion 26th Marine Regiment

Talis Kaminskis started writing prose and poetry the day he got out of the Marine Corps. He had been wound - ed in Vietnam and spent time with his wounds and PTSD in a VA hospital. He got his college degree at Goshen College after his hospital stay. After Vietnam, he met his wife and they have been married twenty-six years and have two boys. He was with CAC Oscar 3 when he was at Khe Sanh.

Ski's poetry is not as direct as Kellan's. It is more subtle in its approach and is characterized by visual, as well as poetic, effects. It has a power all its own which is wrapped in a dreamlike gentleness. This first poem expresses that.

Gentle person thy concert is there
Who took your brothers life

Music was made by men who know

How best to write the notes
A shot, a shell
a burst and sound
Whistle the song of death
The Chorus is sung by men who never Could carry a tune before Conductors appear to lead the parade
But only from afar
Lest they be touched with the notes of the song
That they themselves have wrote

In the next poem we can see a picture of Ski's vision of PTSD.

Desperately seeking, my eyes are searching waiting for a war without end
to end

Nights lay waking, heart is trembling waiting for a war without end
to end

In darkness are fought, battles of hope waiting for a war without end
to end

Daylights fleeting, hopes and dreams are seeking waiting for a war without end
to end

On time worn faces, familiar tears leave traces waiting for a war without end
to end

Arms held empty, rock their loads gently waiting for a war without end
to end

Alone I do last, living a long past waiting for a war without end
to end

I'm waiting, I'm waiting, Still I am waiting waiting for a war without end
to end

For a war without end to end

And finally, we can see his version of the resolution of the war and his life.

Listen Listen close there is a voice for each and every name a silent picture for a distant friend a memory shared with subdued words timeless conversations easing the pain of loss left behind

yet carried where weary feet drag through the passage of time
And its sudden stopping imparting a message to the stunned the living those stumbling for meaning crying in their relief mourning the loss Avoiding the answer of when of who

of why
Tomorrow or today
Tomorrow or today
for some even yesterday
And then there is the future

the utterance of all

Of companionship

And Love

Both Kellan and Ski have found writing a way to dispel the inner demons. In talking with them I was struck by how gentle each of them is and how much they find of value in their lives today. Ski loves to watch the wild birds that come to his fields and Kellan loves to walk the out - doors. Two fine poets among our brothers.

PFC Spicer

By Earl Clark

I am writing now while my thoughts are fresh. I will try and remember, to the best of my ability, the events of that morning, in which Pfc Spicer reported for duty with Bravo Company1/26.

Companies Alpha and Bravo happened to share command posts in the same tent prior to the attack on Khe Sanh. I was present on the Alpha Co. half of the tent the day Pfc Spicer reported in. It was either the day he reported in or it was the first day he was able to speak to Capt. Pipes. Pfc Spicer was accompanied by another Marine, most probably the Gunny. There were a handful of Marines in the Bravo Co. section, as well as a few on the Alpha side.

There was normal conversation at first, business as usual. After a few moments, however, we heard a raised voice or two. If my memory serves me well, it was Capt. Pipes that was speaking at the time our attentions were drawn to their area of the tent. He was not yelling at Pfc Spicer, as such. I think his voiced raised out of frustration more than anything. He asked Pfc Spicer how in the world he managed to get into a combat infantry unit if he was a bonafide Conscientious Objector. Pfc Spicer explained to him his various stops along the way, mentioning that all had been documented in his service record. I remember Capt. Pipes looking repeatedly at the record book and looking up now and then, asking a question from time to time. I think the longer Capt. Pipes read the contents, the more frustrated he became. He was well aware of how the military bureaucracy worked at times. We are talking passing the buck here. Let someone else take care of this sticky problem. If there is accountability to be held in this situation, it is the manner in which Pfc Spicer, and his beliefs, were handled by commanders down the line. In my opinion, Capt. Pipes handled the situation admirably and honorably, to the best of his ability.

It seemed to us, on the other side of the tent, that for each question Capt. Pipes had for Pfc Spicer, the Marine had a reasonable and honest answer for it. Pfc Spicer kept his composure at all times. Things were pretty quiet in between questions and answers. You could cut the air with a knife, it was so heavy. We all became very still on our side, as not to interfere. If I were able to read Capt. Pipe's mind I would say that he waffled between anger and frustration at the events that brought these two together.

After a few minutes, Pfc Spicer was dismissed; along with other Marines that were in attendance, without knowing what disposition would be taken in the matter. I cannot recall what happened immediately after these events.

I too believe in my heart that Pfc Spicer was a CO. When he was explaining to Capt. Pipes his predicament, his expressions were those of sincerity and honesty. To this day, I believe Pfc Spicer's statements were valid and spoken with the utmost integrity.

A few days into the siege, we heard that Pfc Spicer was assisting with Charlie Med. The scuttlebutt was that Spicer was performing heroically, extracting the wounded from the area, giving cover to Marines as they were being carried to Charlie Med. Eventually, we heard that he was wounded severely and had been Medivaced out. We also heard that he had been put in for the Navy Cross.

I did not know, until a few months ago, that Pfc Spicer had contracted an infection while in Japan and died. My heart sank when told this. I was deeply saddened and hurt. I feel this way even as I write this.

I anguish over Pfc Spicer's death. I try not to question God's plan, but sometimes I wonder at the price that is paid. I do know that Pfc Spicer was so special that the Good Lord needed him for something very important.

Many times through the years I have wished that I had known Pfc Spicer personally. I believe we would have gotten along quite well.

In my life I have had two role models, one is my Father and the other, my Brother. I have also had heroes. In fact, I have 58,000 of them. They are on a wall in Washington D. C. He, Spicer, is at the top of that list. Not only is he a genuine hero, but also a hero in the sense that he stood up for his convictions and would not compromise his beliefs. His parents must be so proud of him.

The following was submitted by John Kaheny:
Chaplain Roland Gittlesohn
14 March 1945

This is perhaps the grimmest and surely the holiest task we have faced since D-Day. Before us lie the bodies of comrades and fiends, men who until yesterday or last week laughed with us, trained with us, men who were on the same ships with us, went over the sides with us as we prepared to hit the beaches on this island, men who fought with us and feared with us.

Somewhere in the plot of ground there may lay the man who could have discovered the cure for cancer. Under these Christian crosses or beneath a Jewish Star of David, there may rest a man who was destined to be a great prophet — to find the way, perhaps, for all to live in plenty. Now they lie here silently in this sacred soil, and we gather to consecrate this earth in their memory.

To speak in memory of such men as these is not easy. Of them, too, can it be said with utter truth: "The world will little note nor long remember what we say here. It can never forget what they did here."

These men have done their job well. They have paid the ghastly price of freedom. If that freedom be once again lost, as it was after the last war, the unforgivable blame will be ours not theirs. So it is we, "the living," who are here to be dedicated and consecrated.

We declare ourselves, first, to live together in peace the way they fought and are buried in the war. Here lie men who loved America because their ancestor's generations ago helped in her founding. And other men who loved her with equal passion. Because they themselves and their own fathers escaped from oppression to her blessed shores. Here lie officers and men; Negroes and Whites; Protestants, Catholics and Jews, together. Here no man prefers another because of his faith or despises him because of his color.

Any man among us; "the living," who fails to understand that, will thereby betray those who lie here dead. To this, then, as our solemn duty, do we, the living, now dedicate ourselves: to the right of Protestants, Catholics and Jews, of White men and Negroes alike, to enjoy the democracy for which all of them have here paid the price.

To one thing more do we consecrate ourselves in memory of those who sleep beneath these crosses and stars. This war, with all its frightful heartache and suffering, is but the beginning of our generation's struggle for democracy. When the last battles have been won, there will still be those at home, as there were last time, who will want us to turn our backs in selfish isolation on the rest of organized humanity and thus to sabotage the very peace for which we fight. We promise you who lie here: We will not do that!

When the last shot has been fired, there will still be those whose eyes are turned backward, not forward, who will be satisfied with those wide extremes of poverty and wealth in which the seed of another war can be sown. We promise you, our departed comrades: this, too, we will not permit. This war has been fought by the common man! We promise, by all that is sacred and holy, that your sons; the sons of miners and millers, the sons of farmers and workers; will inherit from your death the right to a living that is decent and secure.

When the final cross has been placed in the last cemetery, once again there will be those to whom profit is more important than peace. Those who will insist with the voice of sweet reasonableness and appeasement that it is better to trade with the enemies of mankind than by crushing them or lose their profit. To you who sleep here silently we give our promise:

We will not listen! We will not forget that some of you were burnt with oil that came from American wells, that many of you were killed by shells fashioned from American steel. We promise that when once again men seek profit at your expense, we shall remember how you looked when we placed you reverently in the ground.

Thus do we memorialize those who have ceased living with us. Thus do we consecrate ourselves; the living, to carry on the struggle they began. Too much blood has gone into this soil for us to let it lie barren. Too much pain and heartache have fertilized the earth on which we stand. We here solemnly swear: this shall not be in vain! Out of this, and from the suffering and sorrow of those who mourn, this will come, we promise, the birth of a new freedom for the sons of men everywhere. AMEN

Ray Stubbe notes:

Those on the lines who looked out at the great unknown, especially at night, and wondered, "when are the NVA going to rush us with those 40,000 soldiers?" never knew. Actually, we had a brand-new set of "eyes" (or, in this case "ears") in the form of electronic sensors that illuminated the battlefield. In fact, these sensors saved those on Hill 881-South from being assaulted by a regimental-size force in early February, and those manning the eastern perimeter of the Combat Base itself (37th ARVN Rangers and those from B/1/26) from another 28/29 February. In both cases, these large forces were detected by the electronic sensors, and annihilated by our supporting arms. These sensors were diverted from Laos to support us, at Khe Sanh, on an emergency basis as the Siege started, and one of the main units to deliver and "seed" them in the areas around Khe Sanh was a newly-arrived Navy unit, VO-67, operating out of NKP, Thailand. Two full crews were shot down and became MIA during this effort.

Remembering Jim Epps

Jim Epps, chaplain of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association from 1996 to 1999, died on January 18, 2000. He was a thoughtful, supportive member of the association. Over the years, he attended many of our reunions and his kind words touched many members of our association. He will be sorely missed.

Following Jim's death, Mike Worth, a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Board of Directors, noted that Jim had often expressed the wish that his legacy could be a perpetual care fund for the memorials we have established at Arlington National Cemetery and Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery, as well as any memorials the association may establish in the future. The Khe Sanh Veterans Board of Directors is investigating the establishment of such a fund. "Jim, all of us wish you Godspeed."

The Stoddard Bunch

By Jack Stoddard

In January of 1985 I retired from the Army at Fort Hood, Texas at the age of thirty eight, being separated from my first wife and with nothing holding me back, I accepted my first civilian job in the Windy City, better known as Chicago. I was going to manage a large fleet of limousines and within three months after my arrival I had accomplished two major events. One was that I had successfully implemented a military style maintenance program thereby putting all eighteen vehicles on the road at any given time. The second and most important event was the fact that I had fallen in love with a young girl who worked in the dispatch office. Her name was Sue, she was the boss's sister, and she was also only twenty-three years old. I know what your thinking! And yes the words "robbing the cradle" were spoken amongst the in-laws more than once. But for Sue and I, love had no age. The sixteen years that separated us didn't seem to matter at all and we were married a year later.

Sue had already signed up to join the Air Force and was waiting to be called when we met. One week after we were married, Sue departed for boot camp and I became a camp follower for the next few months until we ended up at our first permanent duty station, Nellis Air Force Base in Las Vegas, Nevada. We had our first child, Christopher, in 1990. Billy arrived thirteen months later. Needless to say, Chris and Billy were our pride and joy and, of course, our world revolved around their every need.

While Sue was pregnant with Billy, we were getting concerned that Chris had a problem. Something was just not right. He was not meeting his milestones on time and was still having problems holding his head up. The base doctors kept telling us that he was just a little slow and that he would catch up. Finally Sue had enough and said, "no he's NOT just slow" and she demanded an evaluation. After being referred to Early Intervention (EI) services it was determined that Chris was slow. The therapists at EI suggested we see a neurologist to see if we could find out what was wrong. That's when all the blood tests and an MRI came. Our Chris had low CO2, elevated alanine, lactic and pyruvic acid levels as well as lesions (brain damage) in the Thalamus. What all that means is there was something going on inside Chris' body that prevented him from metabolizing or using his food properly and giving him the energy he (and his brain) needed to run at peak efficiency. It's kind of like an 8 cylinder engine running on only 5. Of course at the time we didn't know all that. Chris was given a label of Cerebral Palsy (CP) and the possibility of a metabolic disorder was discussed. Because there was no specialist here in town no further testing was done and Chris went on with his therapies and did fine.

When Billy was born he seemed just fine. He did everything a baby is supposed to do on time and was growing like a weed. That's when he was given the name Billy Goat because he literally ate all the time! By 10 months old he weighed near 30 pounds! At that time Sue had orders for Iceland so I brought in a nanny for the long year that she would be gone. Everything went well for the first six months. Chris could not talk or walk on his own, but he was the fastest crawler on the block. But then I noticed that Billy who had been walking and talking was starting to slow down. By the time Sue got back from Iceland, Billy was a mirror image of his brother Chris. He was having trouble walking and talking. Even worse then that was the fact that he could hardly crawl. He just seemed to lose all his energy. I was scared, to say the least. Here I had the two best kids in the world and all I could do was watch as they both just kept getting weaker and weaker.

We made an appointment with the neurologist again and ran all the same tests as with Chris. The results were exactly the same! Now I knew this wasn't just Cerebral Palsy. This was the day that our war began! I couldn't believe what I was hearing. I had always thought that at least Billy would be able to protect his big brother Chris at school. Now that wasn't going to be.

We were referred to a geneticist and it was she who came up with the suspected disorder of Pyruvate Dehydrogenase Deficiency (PDH). Sue read every medical book she could get her hands on doing research. This disease was an awful one and we were just hoping maybe the geneticist was wrong.

We were then referred to one of the best metabolic doctors in the country and had every blood test known to man taken. It took us six hours to drive from Las Vegas to Children's Hospital in San Diego. The doctor took less then thirty minutes to confirm our worst fears...our two precious boys had a 99% chance of having Leigh's Disease, a degenerative (fatal) mitochondrial disorder (PDH can fall under the Leigh's Disease umbrella of disorders). Thank you, good-bye! Well, it wasn't THAT bad, but at the time it sure seemed like it! I don't even remember the drive home; Sue and I were in shock. I hadn't been able cry since I left Vietnam, but we both did the whole way home. Our boys were going to die and there was nothing we could do about it!

We tried denial, but that did no good. Sue blamed herself while I blamed Vietnam and Agent Orange, but that also did no good. Sue was fighting in her way, while I was fighting in mine. I just couldn't come to terms with this. I'm the Dad. I'm the protector. If this war was like Vietnam then the answer would be easy...just kill the enemy or fall on a grenade. What ever it took to protect my kids I'd do.

After a while everything sunk in and we vowed to treat the kids as normal as possible. Sue continued to research metabolic disorders and within a few months she knew as much as any doctor. She sounded like one too! We stopped all testing since what we had so far had turned up nothing concrete. It didn't matter what the exact name of the disease was, the outcome was the same. Why put the kids though all that. Our thoughts were just let them have a happy life, however long it lasted.

Eventually Sue was more or less forced out of the Air Force after 9 years of service because it was too hard to juggle TDYs and the kids' needs. Instead of working on airplanes, she works with handicapped kids in the school district. She is a substitute teacher right now, but is pursuing her teaching degree in special education. She also does respite care for other parents with handicapped kids. Respite care is another name for babysitting, sort of. I mean parents of medically involved kids just can't leave them with any teenage babysitter. She also helps other families negotiate the medical, social services and school mazes. Those can be quite daunting! Me? Well, I help as best I can.

That trip to San Diego seems like such a long time ago, but we've learned a lot in the past few years. One thing is to take it one day at a time. Remember that's how we did it in the 'Nam? We try to make each day a special one. Both of the boys have a great sense of humor and there's a lot of joking going on around the Stoddard house. While Sue is off doing her teaching, I'm the guy who stays at home and watches for the school bus.

In general, Chris and Billy Goat are doing fine. Billy is fed through a tube surgically placed in his stomach, and as I'm writing this, Chris is getting operated on for the same thing (they cannot eat with their mouths anymore). It's no party, but this operation will help them live a lot longer.

The boys go to their regular school and are in the regular 3rd (Billy) and 4th (Chris) grades. Their minds are pretty normal. They each have an aide to help them with schoolwork and Billy has a nurse available to take care of his tracheotomy (a hole in his throat so he can breathe) needs. Both boys are in wheelchairs with Chris' being a power one. He loves to fly down the school hallways. They each have their own computer, but Billy needs help with his as he can't move his arms around much. We go everywhere as a family and try to take at least one vacation a year. Even our yearly trip to San Diego is packed with Sea World or Lego Land or even Disneyland! The winter months are still the worst for us. With Billy's respiratory problems we usually plan on at least one hospital stay for him.

I'll be honest with you, taking care of the kids and their needs is a LOT of work and takes a LOT of time. It gets tiring looking at people (especially adults) rudely staring at you. It gets tiring fighting with the insurance company for basic medical supplies and needs. It gets tiring getting up 3 and 4 times a night, every night (Sue does) rearranging the kids or making sure the machine Billy uses to help him breathe isn't blocked or disconnected. It gets tiring fighting with the school district to get what normal kids get automatically. It gets tiring not having anyone to give you a break so you can see a movie with big people in it instead of the Rugrats. But you know something? We love our kids just the way they are! They're perfect to us and we wouldn't trade them for the world. When I hear people complain because their kid ripped his pants running and sliding on the grass, I want to yell at them to appreciate that they CAN run and slide on the grass! We're not jealous of non-disabled kids or anything like that. Hell, there are many advantages to having handicapped kids. One is we don't have to wait in the long lines at Disneyland!! Teachers love Billy because he doesn't sass back (he doesn't make any sounds with the trach) or get out of his seat. (Yes, we have a strange sense of humor!!) It's just that parents don't always understand what they have and they need to appreciate it more. It's the little things that are important. Like when you've had to sleep over at the hospital and you look like hell the next morning, but when you ask your child do you look beautiful he smiles and say yes. It's those smiles that make everyday special. It's worth all the hard work. The Stoddard Bunch plans to be together for a long time.

Primary Selection — February 2000 Doubleday Military Book Club

"Unheralded Victory" is an important book dealing with one of the most difficult and controversial periods in American history. It is a perspective on the Vietnam War that has almost been totally eclipsed in the cacophony of "instant history" presented on television. In Unheralded

Victory, American-born Australian author, Mark Woodruff presents a clear and compelling case detailing the overall tactical victory of the allied military over the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese Army throughout the war. Far from the commonly seen portrait of allied forces as dispirited, drug-ridden, and self-defeated, the author points to victory after victory by the allies. He shows the allied forces as well trained, well equipped, and generally well led.

From small engagements to main force battles, the author paints a picture of consistent allied victory over the forces of the North. The author acknowledges that these victories were costly and bloody for the allies, but he emphasizes they were even worse for the North Vietnamese and their allies. He also investigates the myths and popular stories that over time have grown into unchallenged fact, and finds that much of the commonly accepted folklore of the war and its aftermath has little or no basis in reality. Unheralded Victory does not seek to rewrite history - the allied forces did leave, senior American political leadership did make mistakes, South Vietnam did collapse under the onslaught of the North Vietnamese forces after the Americans were withdrawn — but the author challenges the popular concept that the conduct and performance of the allied troops on the ground was substandard. Well written and complete with maps, diagrams, and illustrations, Unheralded Victory is a book not to be missed by the thoughtful and serious reader.

About the author:

I NEED IT BY FRIDAY (This is Wednesday)

Hello Sir. My name is Jeff Hancock and I am in 9th grade and I want to know youre opinion on Vietnam. And if you could find the time i really need this info...thank you for your time!

Jeff Hancock
P.S. i need it by fri

Jeff,

I'm really not sure what you are asking for. If you could be a little more explicit, I will try and help you out. In other words "my opinion of Vietnam" is too general in nature. Many large books have been written trying to answer this question, without much success. Try narrowing the focus of your inquiry to a more specific aspect of the war.

Thanks for your interest,
Paul Knight

Sir,

Well i just wanted to know what it was like and how you were treated when you returned...i mean, were u respected, were u able to get a job....what?

ED NOTE: I was unable to get an answer off to young Jeff as his deadline had expired....

The Fight for 881 North

We left Khe Sanh for the first time in a long time. We had just given our fighting position over to the Army. I was amazed when the soldier made a statement to his team "Hey this is just a little hole in the ground." I was also amazed at seeing so many staff sergeants and sergeants in an Army platoon. My squad leader was a Corporal as were most of the others. The only sergeants we had were Staff Sergeant James, the platoon sergeant and the platoon guide I believe it was Sergeant Whitman and Sergeant Ernest a squad leader. All of these sergeants were tough, kind and knew the job. Our platoon commander, as we called all platoon leaders, was Lt. Madison a fine officer. As we were leaving to go fight in the hills an Army Huey came down and dropped off one case of C-rations and left. Here we were ready to go fight and couldn't get a chopper. But a Huey (we thought all Huey's were gun ships) was hauling chow. At this point some obnoxious Army second Lt. came up to our platoon group, and we heard him say where is the "O" club? This I am sure was supposed to be some type of humor. We did not think it was funny.

The choppers came and whisked us away to hill 881 south. From this point a guy directed us to fighting positions on the opposite crest of 881 North. We were looking down a steep draw and the guide from Mike Company told us that earlier a group of Rock Apes had settled in and that they had been very active. At one point people thought that an NVA probe was coming up at them. The 81mm FO, a staff sergeant, came by because we heard movement. The FO let Chief Rodriguez, Barry Miller and I call in the 81's. He made it seem easy. He probably had to make many corrections but he kept telling us that we did a good job. We would meet this FO again and thank God for that. We sat in for the night and split the watch. We were up before dawn and were moving our company. Lima company was going down the slope around the base to our staging area for the attack. While we were waiting to move out I saw our company command group and was impressed that the CO and the company Gunny were carrying M60 ammo. I did think it strange that they were not carrying any rifles but what does a Marine PFC machine gunner know. The commander opened the ammo can. He had dirty laundry in it. All of us had been wearing the same stinkin' rotten clothes and that bothered me.

Barry was my ammo bearer. I was the gunner and Chief Rodriguez was the team leader; the other teams were in the same shape with people being medivaced. While we were in the staging area reports started coming back that the enemy was dug in and was going after machine gun crews. I am sure rumors were saying the same about everyone else but at a time like this you just zone in on your team. Barry and Chief, who did not smoke, and I smoked a pack of cigarettes in about ten minutes. Shortly after this we formed an online company abreast, High Diddle Diddle, right up the middle. The company fixed bayonets. Some of us "Not so bright guys" dropped off our packs. The red smoke blew and away we went. We screamed obscenities at the NVA. I guess we were just tired of being pounded, pounded all of the time; just sitting.

I came upon a huge log hut above ground. I ran in shooting and screaming and ran out the same way. I have no idea if I hit someone or something. I do know that I have never liked or trusted someone from the Air Force reconnaissance imagery since they had told our commanders that there were no built-up bunkers. We went up two ridgelines and over the crest when we were ordered to halt. The CO selected 3rd platoon to go up the last knoll and secure it. This was an honor. The other platoons were more than happy not to have that honor. The CO was up front with the platoon leader. The Platoon was formed in an online assault and they charged. It was on this knoll the NVA had decided to stand and hold. The enemy just rolled down ChiComms, the ridge was so steep. The Commander we thought went down, the Platoon sergeant and most of the leadership as well. A Private took charge and rallied the platoon, Lt. Abrams and Lt. Madison led the first and second platoons, to the aid of the third platoon. The Corpsmen were just magnificent going from wounded to wounded even as the NVA were shooting at them and the wounded. One corpsman had a rifle shot out of his hand twice but not the third time.

The 81mm FO was calling in fire that was devastating and effective. We charged up the slope and joined the remainder of the platoon. On the ridgeline crest, Lts. Abrams and Madison prepared us for our counter attack. Lt. Madison had me lay suppressive fire at a position at another hill across the gully. During this time we consolidated the positions, passed ammo and cared for the wounded. The platoon leader of the third platoon came up from the last crest and said no one but third platoon was to get survivors. At that time, I did understand why he said it. He stabbed a very dead NVA who I was using as a shield. The NVA soldier had been killed by a very well placed M79 or mortar that took off the crown of his head. The next thing I see is the Battalion Commander Lt. Col. Studt, who had been in the middle of the heaviest fighting and had seen the actions of all of Lima company. Lt. Col. Studt made a believer out of me that day. He said something to the CO and the third platoon leader and they left with him. I don't recall ever seeing them again. Lt. Abrams and Madison got with the NCO's including our squad leader Nick Dunbar, a very good marine.

We sent people to get the packs we left at the beginning. Well, God bless the NVA they stole our packs. The joke is that all we had was mostly C-rations in the packs. They probably had more personal effects than we did. The FO had just finished the medivac when he flopped down in exhaustion on a blown up bamboo stick and it went right up you know where. He then called in his last medivac of the day and swore above the roar of the chopper that he would be back. We were then ordered to saddle up and hump back to 881 North for the night.

I write this as best my memory can recall after all these years. As I look back over the years there will be more Fire Fights and God knows many more operations and bad times that I will remember. I was with the finest that day; to all my old friends, Col. Radcliff, V.D. Itchy brother, Price, Dan, Bill, Hughes, Al and all the rest.

Respectfully submitted,

Dear Editor;

RE: Red Clay #44, Radio Call Signs at Khe Sanh

I was one of the Air Force Combat Control Team members at Khe Sanh in February and March of '68. We were using the call sign "Tailpipe Mike."

The Combat Control Teams traveled all over Vietnam, and some of us pulled duty in Laos and other places. I spent six months in Laos. Needless to say, we never did control any combat. Like many other military unit names, ours came from on high and God only knows why we had it.

What we did at Khe Sanh, was provide Air Force aircraft with control and guidance into and out of sticky tactical situations. We operated the Drop Zone at Khe Sanh. We kept a station operating beside the runway, sandbagged in front of the Charlie Med tent, to provide air traffic control when a Marine unit was in operation, to provide flight following and other info as required by our control center in Tan Son Nhut. When we couldn't secure a FAC, we called air strikes.

"Tailpipe Mike7' remained at Khe Sanh until early May, and then the call sign was retired for a while. The call sign stayed there even though the team members rotated in and out from time to time.

Thanks for putting out a fine journal, I hope you can add our name to your list of call signs.

Dear Editor,

I wanted to write and tell you very how much I enjoyed reading and appreciated receiving the Summer, 1999 issue of Red Clay.

I thought THE BAIG LETTER, Page 29 was just extraordinary!

For Years, General Giap has been made a legendary military strategist, war hero and the darling of the liberal/leftist American media. The Baig Letter reverses that myth and our Khe Sanh boys and the other American support services can take credit for sending Giap into early retirement. What a revelation! Great stuff Ray!

I know you won't publish the following opinion unless insisted upon, but this issue, its glossy paper stock, content of articles etc. was very professionally done and I want to personally thank you for the time and effort that went into it. Great job and thanks Ray.

I look forward to receiving every issue of Red Clay.

Sincerely,
Viet Nam War Correspondent, 1965-66 and provider of the Khe Sanh Siege Playboy Magazines Malibu, California

Dear Ernie,

I enjoyed your piece about having a beer in the "Officers" Club! I wish I had a copy of Buck Owens and his Bakersfield Boys music, which I first heard in our so-called club!

You could have gone to that reunion but put it off. I've done the same thing, sat at home, and wondered what it was like. I knew there was probably a group of Vietnam veterans getting together for perhaps the last eight years. I had seen a couple of things here and there in the past years, but never went. I knew of a reunion in 1998, but didn't go. I made excuses up for myself on why I didn't need to go.

I joined the Marine Corps in July 1967 and by January 1968 I was in country. My time in 1/9 started at Camp Evans where I arrived about January 15, 1968. I spent the next week getting accustomed to the heat and the equipment and meeting all the guys in 81 mortars, my MOS. Everything was pretty quiet until about noon on January 21st, when the word went out to get ready to move out. We were headed to Khe Sanh.

The helicopters dropped 1/9 off on the runway and the next morning we marched out to the Rock Quarry. The next 2-1/2 months would be filled with work details, fortifying our position, watching the jets and artillery work, all the while constantly looking out for incoming. There were nights assigned to perimeter duty.

Around the middle of March, I volunteered to go with the 81 Forward Observer team that was with Alpha Company. I was introduced to the Sergeant and his radioman Charles Miller and we hit it off right from the start. I spent the next few weeks learning how to read a map and call in supporting fires from the 81 mortars. The team went out with Alpha Company a couple of times in March and each time ran into stiff resistance from entrenched NVA.

Operation Pegasus geared up in late March. 1/9 was assigned the job of taking hill 471 about two clicks south west of the quarry. By late in the afternoon Alpha Company had maneuvered to the base of the hill and was ready to attack up the slopes of the hill. Hill 471 had a main hill and an adjoining knoll with a saddle in between. On the top of this knoll were two large bomb craters. Almost all the forward observers and radiomen were in the left bomb crater (facing hill 471) knoll calling in supporting fires and firing our rifles at the NVA on the hill. As Alpha Company attacked, the NVA starting pouring on their own supporting fire. They blasted us with 122mm rockets and a mixture of 82mm and 60mm mortar fire. A radioman and myself had moved to the right crater leaving the rest of the group of 5-6 Marines in the left bomb crater. As the incoming landed, shrapnel flew everywhere. You could hear it hitting the dirt everywhere. Then one round hit really close. Although we were hit with hot pieces of metal, the radioman and I were unscathed I flew over the rim of the bomb crater to check on the other group. What I saw I still remember vividly today. There was a cloud of dust hanging in the bomb crater. Everyone was hit. I could see the Sergeant and everyone else and called out for the corpsman. I ran to Miller, the FO radioman, and grabbed him to check his wounds. He was still kneeling on both knees like I had left him a few minutes ago, but slightly bent over. The radio that he had fastened to his pack on his back was now gone. As I looked down it was apparent that the round had hit just behind him, the impact crater was visible on the ground. As I pulled him back, I yelled his named and realized he was dead. The shrapnel had cooked off the bandolier of ammo he carried across his chest. I let him go and went to help the others. The Captain had a neck wound and everyone helped to cut off the flow of blood. The Sergeant just lay there moaning, he was in a great deal of pain. His flak jacket was nowhere in sight and shrapnel had hit him quite severely all over his back. I tried to talk to him and comfort him, but he was in shock, and moaning. It's a horrible feeling seeing your buddy's hurt'n real bad and you just can't do much about it. The corpsman eventually got an IV started and we got everyone on stretchers to carry them out. On the way out, the Sergeant's IV came out and I tried to reinsert it. I remember I thought I was hurting him because of all the moaning he was doing. Within minutes all of our fallen comrades were taken off the hill. The wounded were taken to Charlie Med at Khe Sanh. One rocket had wiped out almost the entire command group. The last I remember of that Sergeant was the sight of him being carried off to a waiting helicopter. I never saw him again. Of all the things I experienced in Vietnam, that day is probably the most intense in my memories.

I continued as the Forward Observer for Alpha through the rest of my tour. In February 1969, after 13 months in Vietnam, I rotated back to the world and was honorably discharged from the Marine Corps. I returned home, went to work, raised a family, and let the war fade into a memory. Over the years I kept in touch with a couple of guys from the FO team, but I always wondered about the Sergeant who was wounded on Hill 471. I thought of him often, wondering where he was, even what his name was, I had put everything so far back in my mind that I had forgotten even his name.

In the early Eighties I watched the television series "Vietnam, the 10,000 day War." The memories that I had buried for so long seemed to rise. I had a new urge to read all I could about the Vietnam War. By the late Eighties I was into reading every book on Vietnam I could get my hands on. All this time I continued to think of that Sergeant, if he had made it and if so where he was today.

By the mid-nineties I had a computer and earnestly tried to find guys from my unit, but to no avail. I searched lists and even e-mailed a few guys, but I couldn't find anyone I served with. I had over the years kept in touch with my assistant and radioman, but I was on a quest to find that Sergeant or his fate.

In late 1998, I heard about a 1/9 "Mini Reunion" in April 1999, at Parris Island. I wasn't really sure I wanted to go, never having been to one before. I didn't know what to expect and thought my wife (Susan) would be bored stiff.

On March 20th I called and made my reservations for the reunion and on April 15th, my wife and I left for Parris Island. I told her that if things didn't go well, we'd just leave and go onto our final destination Hilton Head Island our planned vacation site.

We arrived at PI about 5:30 p.m. and went to the Osprey Inn to check in. Well it wasn't three minutes before a couple of guys came back from a golf outing for 1/9. I asked where everyone was at and they told me the Frogmore Inn, so Susan and I proceeded to the Frogmore to see what was happening.

Arriving at the Frogmore the ice was broken very quickly when Roger Liggon grabbed and hugged both my wife, and myself. Right away we felt at home. In fact everyone there was welcoming us like we were lost relatives or something. The night went very quickly and we met everybody at the Frogmore and had a few beers. We got back to the Osprey and crashed onto our beds. Things seemed to going pretty good and Susan said that all the ladies were real nice. She had made more friends than I had. I thought to myself, well it's ok, but I didn't really see anyone I had served with. I still had reservations about staying for two more days.

Friday April 16th there was a full schedule of events starting with breakfast, morning colors, a graduation, a tour of Parris Island, and finally a dinner.

Friday morning reveille was at 5:00 a.m., with breakfast scheduled for 6:30 a.m. at the Weapons Battalion Mess Hall. A bus arrived to pick us up and off we went to eat breakfast. I thought I was at a Perkins or Bob Evans, the food was that good. As we left to get back on the bus, my wife started to talk with Charles Evans (Doc) and his wife Sue. Well, in about a minute my wife is calling me over and saying, "You won't believe this, this is Bill Pearson's sister." You see I had worked with Sue's brother Bill in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania about 20 years ago. A small world indeed. I couldn't believe we had met Bill's sister, here of all places. We continued to talk as we boarded the bus to morning colors ceremony.

Morning colors was really a show. The Marine Corps Band played and Mike the mascot was in his finest dress blues. The colors were raised and then there was an introduction and short story of both the Monfort Point Marines and First Battalion Ninth Marines and then we all had our pictures taken together. Then it was off to Peatross Parade deck, "The Grinder," to see 2nd Battalion F Company and 4th Battalion P Company (WM) graduate. The graduation was impressive, with the playing of the band, the entrance of over 400 new Marines, and the ceremony itself.

After the graduation it was off for a little sight seeing around the base. Sights included Elliott's Beach, the Rifle Range, and a movie and tour of The Crucible complex. The Crucible is a 54-hour training mission the recruits go on during the 11th week. After this grueling test of endurance and problem solving the recruits receive the globe and anchor. They are pinned with the globe and anchor at the Iwo Jima memorial at Peat Ross parade deck. Well after another tremendous lunch it was off for more sights and then a couple of hours at the Museum or shopping.

Friday night the entire group mustered at the Officer's Club for dinner. Naturally everyone bellied up to the bar and got to talking over old times. Col. Radcliffe gave the invocation and opening speech and then everyone feasted. After dinner it was more old stories and even some news movies about Delta from May of 1967. It was a grand night and slowly the old soldiers drifted off by ones and twos to rest up for the next day's maneuvers.

Before dinner my wife and I chatted off and on with different guys that happened along, but nary a soul I had known in the Vietnam. We had sat there maybe 20 minutes when this guy comes down the bar looking for a spot to sit. My wife tells him to take the chair next to mine. Naturally I introduce my wife and myself and start to ask questions on when and where he was in Vietnam. In reply to asking him when he was in Vietnam, he said, "1968" and I said, " me too." I said I was with 81's, and he said same here. I said I was the FO for Alpha Company and he responded that he was also. At that point I just looked at him, and said, "It's me Carl, Dan." I told him the story of Hill 471 and what happened after the incoming. I could not believe it. Standing before me was the man who I'd been wondering about for 31 years, Carl Oksnee. We hugged each other and began to reminisce; it had been a long time. We sat there and talked for the next four hours.

Saturday morning was a free day until the barbecue at 2 o'clock. Some of us decided to attend the Crucible graduation at 7:30 am, so it was up early again and off to Peatross parade deck. At about 7:30, 400 or so tired recruits marched onto the parade deck, dropped their gear and formed up around the Iwo Jima memorial. After morning colors and a stirring speech, these recruits were pinned with the Globe and Anchor and were Marines. It was a really stirring ceremony to say the least. The rest of the morning was spent just hanging out, or shopping at the PX for those essential Marine Corps souvenirs.

The barbecue was great, there was plenty to eat and drink, and everyone took a turn at burning a couple of dogs and burgers. Carl and I got together again and tried to reminisce, but it was hard. We had only been together for about one month before he got hit, and after 31 years memories fade away. Later a fellow named Larry Kumm came up to me and said I was his FO for 81 mortars. I was in amazement, I just found Carl, and now another Marine is standing in front of me saying he served with me. Well needless to say, I took him over to Carl and all three of us talked for a few hours. At the end of the barbecue I said my good-byes to Carl and we promised each other that it wouldn't be 31 years before we talked again. We had a lot of ground to cover, to get to know each other again. Sadly, we remembered very little of our experience together except for that fateful day in April on Hill 471. It was sad to see this reunion come to a close, as it had been a wonderful three days. But alas it was the end of the barbecue and the start of the final party at the Donnelly's.

Col. Donnelly and his wife Cathy had invited everyone over to their house for shrimp and a little beer. They were excellent hosts. They had two huge boats of shrimp set up on a table and more food. Everyone gathered in the back yard for more story telling and a final wind down to the festivities. There was even an impromptu dance by all the wives present. No telling how many dollars were thrown their way, but if they had kept dancing, people would have been looking for the ATM machines.

Well all things, must come to an end. Groups gathered for those final photos and those final good-byes, and slowly we all went our separate ways. We had come literally by car, plane and train, enjoyed great camaraderie, shared some old stories, cried on each other's shoulders and now it was time to part. I hope it's not a long time before I can see my friends again. Some old, some new. All great. This had been my first reunion and it really renewed me and gave me strength to face the future. It also gave me resolve to try and find more of our old friends. If you read this and haven't been to a reunion or rally, go, it is a good time, believe me...31 years is a long time not to see your friends.

That reunion was in April 1999, since then Carl and I met again at the Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in July 1999. We are still trying to piece things together and remember what time has made us forget. Our time together was short, about three weeks and it's hard to remember the short period we shared so many years ago. Now we have made a pact to correspond and help one another to heal those wounds of so long ago.

Welcome Home Brother!

Till next time old friends

A Golf Reunion

Joseph Olszewski
Third Platoon Commander, Golf 2/26, '67/'68
Alamo, California

During the past thirty-one years, all I remembered about Golf, 2nd Battalion 26th Marine Regiment was in the form of names, pictures and dates. For more than three decades, copies of the names of the KIAs resided in one of those plastic picture cubes, that I have always kept on my desk at work. It's real easy to find amongst the desk-top clutter, as it's covered with those "Buddy Poppies" handicapped veterans sell on the streets of San Francisco on Veterans' Day. The pictures have always been either in my head or the few that I took with my cheap instamatic are in binders and fading by the year. The dates are repeated every Sunday at Mass when the prayers for the dead are offered.

For thirty-one years, military magazines and telephone books were my required reading. There was The Retired Officers Association Magazine, the Semper Fi newsletter for retired Marines, and throughout the 70's and 80's, the active duty magazines, that I routinely "borrowed" from California PX barber shops, always looking for articles or references to Khe Sanh or Marines who I once knew. I even studied the San Francisco Marines Memorial Club Membership lists for any Veterans names that I could recognize.

Whenever I traveled across the country to some awful locations and spent countless nights in dull motels, and even in 1989 when my son, Chris, started visiting colleges, I would open the local phone books and look for names. All of these paper patrols netted the same results: Nothing learned, nobody found.

Then in November 1998 I read a short article that appeared in The Retired Officers Association magazine about a new web site called The Virtual Wall. I was new to the Internet and this site absolutely riveted my attention. Once I learned my way around it, I discovered that, just as you can leave physical "remembrances" at The Wall in D.C., you could leave written or pictorial "remembrances" for any of the more than 58,000 names listed in http://TheVirtualWall.org web site. I immediately opened the files on The Virtual Wall of all the KIAs that I knew. In my plastic picture cube, I have the seven names of Golf Marines from my platoon who were KIA on April 6 and 7, 1968; as well as, the names of many Marines and Navy personnel I knew either from my training days at OCS/Basic School at Quantico, Virginia in 1967 or from my short 'Nam tour.

One by one, I opened each of their files on The Virtual Wall and found that there was not a single remembrance for any of these heroes. So I began loading anything I could remember from the pictures I have in my mind about each of them. One was Father Robert Brett, who was the 2/26 Battalion Chaplain, who was KIA on February 22, 1968. Father Brett tried to arrange a wedding in Hawaii for one of my Marines who left his girl friend with a "bun in the oven" before he left for 'Nam. I left that story.

After leaving all these remembrances, I began reading the "guest book" for any names or events I could recall. Again, I found nothing.

Then on March 8, 1999, I received an e-mail message from Mike Worth, former Echo, 2/26 Khe Sanh Veteran, and he had read my remembrance for Father Brett. Mike knew Father Brett at Khe Sanh and his brother, Father Frank Brett, was one of Mike's high school teachers. Mike subsequently informed his friend Lucille Biscaglio, that he found another 2/26 KSV, and she called me to make a "recruiting" call for the KSV organization and at the same time told me about the KSV web site. I began checking KSV Guestbook, as well, and found Ed Rouse (Father Brett's nephew), Eric Smith (G 2/26 & 81s) and James Everley's (G, 2/26) message center comments. One by one, I started contacting them. Through them I learned phone numbers or addresses for Pete Post, Golf's Executive Officer at Khe Sanh, Lee Overstreet, Golf's Company Commander, and Reverend Ray Stubbe. I've since had phone conversations or exchanged letters with all of them. Then, I began receiving e-mails from Marines or relatives of Marines that I knew or didn't know — such as, "Doc" Dan Manley, Ed Matta, Bill Wentworth and Abe Moore — all Golf, 2/26 veterans. I even received an e-mail from Julie Boroff, who is the daughter of Jim Alexander, WIA on April 6, 1968 while attached to Golf, 2/26. Julie's on a mission to find the corpsman who saved her father's life.

One day, on one of those never-ending streams of e-mail jokes, I noticed that James Everley's distribution list had a name of "Jacob Krygoski." I knew that I had a Marine name Krygoski in my Platoon, but I never knew his first name. I sent him an e-mail on May 9, 1999 asking if he was in the Third Platoon, Golf, 2/26. He replied: "I can't remember what I was doing yesterday let alone who my Platoon Leader was 30 Years ago. I'm not even sure which Platoon I was in." I replied, "I thought you were in my platoon, in the third squad and your Squad Leader was Rick Lammers." Instantly, there was an avalanche of names we each knew and two e-mails later we had figured out we knew each other for six months between Phu Bai and Khe Sanh. After that, we started exchanging the entire inventory of 'Nam pictures we both had. I mailed him mine and he scanned all of his and sent them to me. Once he received mine, he scanned all of those and sent them to all the other Marines that he knew. At one point about a year ago, I typed all the letters I had written to my fiancée during my tour in my WORD processor. If you print it on a laser printer, it totals sixty-six pages! I sent Jacob aka "Ski" the entire file. Between our pictures and my letters, it was like being stranded on an island for thirty-one years and suddenly finding a five-gallon bottle floating in the surf with an encyclopedia about 'Nam inside.

"Ski" lives in Palmdale, California, and one day he asked if I ever traveled to Southern California. I replied that I passed through on my way to Phoenix, Arizona to visit with my mother and my dreaded In-laws. He asked if I could stop by on my next trip for a quick visit. Since my wife would be away on a business trip in October, I was planning an Arizona visit and asked "Ski" if that would be a good time. Again, an instant avalanche of information, ideas and common knowledge flooded the e-mail circuits.

"Ski" said that Richard Ross, who was Golf's Company radioman at Khe Sanh and who lives in Venice Beach, California, had visited him once, and would try to contact him to see if he was interested in joining us. I mentioned that James Everley, radioman for the Golf's First Platoon, was interested in traveling from Wichita, Kansas to Lake Tahoe for a gambling vacation and he and I had discussed meeting in San Francisco.

Before long it was arranged — it had taken Thirty-One Years — that on October 9th and 10th of 1999, four members of Golf, 2/26 Marines would meet for a mini-reunion in Palmdale, California.

James, Richard and I all arrived at "Ski's" home in Palmdale at different times on Saturday. I arrived first at around 10:00 AM. I guess, being a former officer, I had to set the example. I had a little trouble finding the right street, but once I turned the corner there was no doubt in my mind which house belonged to Jacob Krygoski and his wife, Leslie. You see it's more than just their home, but it is also the best Marine Corps museum you ever set eyes on.

"Ski" had decorated his home for our reunion. On the outside he had huge USMC and POW flags. On the lawn he had a big white sign on a stake which read "Golf Co. CP." And, are you ready for this? He even had a minefield outlined in the front lawn with little signs on stakes which read "mines." This latter home improvement warrants further explanation. On February 24, 1968, I stepped on a mine on Hill 558 while checking a map of the field that I had previously submitted to the Battalion CP. Between the time the minefield was established and when I checked it, several barbered wire fences were installed around it. Once I entered the minefield on that eventful day, I had gotten confused about the location of the mines in relation to the fences. To make a long story short, one of the fences obscured where the minefield began and instead of walking toward a safe position within the field, I actually headed for the first cluster of mines and I hit the first one in the pattern. This event had been the previous subject of many humorous e-mails and phone conversations between me and my new KSV core group, who have labeled me "directionally challenged." I've never been bitter about my left-foot amputation and, to be honest, it probably saved my life or my sanity as Golf Company suffered heavy casualties in a bunker ambush on April 6th and 7th of 1968.

By the time I rang the doorbell, I was bent over from laughing about the mines in the front lawn. "Ski" answered the door and it became immediately apparent the neither of us recognized each other.

By noon James and Richard had arrived. Richard remembers both my name and my face, but I only have a vague recollection of him. Richard and James knew each other well as at one time both of them were in the first platoon and they even had pictures of the two of them together in '68. "Ski" and Richard knew each other at Khe Sanh and they both "rotated" home around the same day in late March 1968. We shared stories about Phu Bai and Khe Sanh that only the storyteller could remember. We looked at pictures "Ski" had scanned on his PC and couldn't believe how young we looked way back then.

Richard, James and I were amazed at the computer room that "Ski" had built. It was full of USMC memorabilia. He had large caliber ammo, a full-scale picture of him crossing a bridge at Phu Bai in his 782 gear, all his battle ribbons enclosed in a glass case, every book and magazine on Khe Sanh and, you'll love this, when he "boots up" his PC it plays the Marines Hymn.

On Sunday, the four of us met for breakfast at an International House of Pancakes in Palmdale. It was crowded and we sat in a tight booth. James and Richard were interested in exactly how I screwed up in that minefield. Therefore, being the resourceful Marines we were trained to be, we used what was available. Using salt & peppershakers, forks, spoons, knives and a few napkins, I outlined how the minefield looked and how I misread it. Between setting all this up and the crowdedness of the IHOP, patrons near us were curious and were watching me with great interest. I'm certain some of them overheard my description, as they watched with mouths and ears agape. It was my finest hour.

James had to leave after breakfast, but Richard and I returned with "Ski" to his home where had several conversations about KSV and our combat experiences. We ate steaks that Leslie BBQ'd for us, drank beer and finished the day watching the great Marine recruiting film "DI" that Jack Webb starred in during the mid-fifties. By five PM our mini-reunion was over and we vowed to meet again in San Diego in September for the KSV Reunion (James has attended past reunions, but "Ski", Richard and I will be reunion rookies in September).

As I began to drive off, "Ski" stopped me as he had a gift for me. Since I was in my car and it was wrapped, I didn't want to open it in front of him. When I stopped that night at a motel on my way to Arizona, I opened it. It was a heavy cardboard box, which read:

MEAL, COMBAT, INDIVIDUAL
Beans W/Meat Balls
In Tomato Sauce
B-2 Unit

Once again, I was doubled over with laughter. Here's a quiet Marine we called "Ski" in '68 who could complement a reunion thirty-one years later for three of his combat brothers with flags, signs, a minefield and gifts of C-rations!

What did we learn from our Reunion? We learned that we all had a tremendous strength of loyalty that DIs worked so hard to instill in us, even though we never appreciated or knew it. We learned that we over-identify with our past adventurous youth. We learned that movies produced in the 50's and early 60's had a great deal to do with our combat performance and our identity as Marines in the late 60's. We learned that we all carry names, pictures and dates in our minds. Most importantly, we learned that we are all hungry as Hell for any piece of information or common Vietnam experience that we cannot wait to share with each other.

I suppose these learning points are common in some form or manner amongst all Vietnam veterans. But, somehow they seem even more important to those of us who lived in the Red Clay. See you in San Diego — trust me — but if we meet don't call me "Ski." That name is reserved for a special KSV who created new pictures and dates for my mind to remember.

Khe Sanh Brothers

"I now know why men who have been to war yearn to reunite. Not to tell stories or look at old pictures. Not to laugh or weep. Comrades gather because they long to be with the men who once acted their best, men who suffered and sacrificed, who were stripped raw, right down to their humanity. I did not pick these men. They were delivered by fate and the U.S. Marine Corps. But I know them in a way I know no other men. I have never given anyone such trust. They were willing to guard something more precious than my life. They would have carried my reputation, the memory of me. It was part of the bargain we all made, the reason we were so willing to die for one another.

"I cannot say where we are headed. Ours are not perfect friendships; those are the province of legend and myth. A few of my comrades drift far from me now, sending back only occasional word. I know that one-day even these could fall to silence. Some of the men will stay close, a couple, perhaps, always at hand.

"As long as I have memory, I will think of them all, every day. I am sure that when I leave this world, my last thought will be of my family and my comrades...such good men."

Reunions

By Tom Ford
72 N. Jefferson Ave.
Lindenhurst, NY 11757

My name is Tom Ford and I was a member of Foxtrot 2/26 Hill 558.

In 1985 I came across an announcement for a veteran's parade that was to be held in New York City. It was a Welcome Home parade for Viet Nam Veterans sponsored by the City of New York and the Honorable Mayor Edward I Koch. For quite some time I lived with the inner turmoil of should I or shouldn't I go? This went on for sometime until a local social event brought me into contact with a lifelong friend, Dan Gardner. Dan served with the Dusters in Viet Nam and had been attached to the Marines somewhere up around Cua Viet, after Khe Sanh. It was Dan who turned the tide within me, by agreeing to go with me to the parade.

We took a train from our hometown, Lindenhurst, Long Island, and after an hour ride we were in the Big Apple, Penn Station, New York. It had been a quiet ride in, with only some casual conversation about Viet Nam, being in the service. What the heck was this parade going to be like? Will we be the only one's dressed like this (camo/green utilities)? Could we ever find anyone from our old units? From Penn Station we hopped a subway for a quick ride downtown. It was then that we realized that we weren't alone. As we looked around the subway car, and later the subway stops, there were more and more people in and around us who were wearing some sort of unofficial uniform to show that they were Viet Nam Veterans. It was the first time since coming home, 2/69 that I ever recalled feeling so proud. The further the subway went the more Vets got on. Eventually everywhere you looked on the train there were Veterans. They were all greeting each other as if they had known each other for a lifetime. What a great feeling, beginning a day that would have a resounding effect on the rest of my life.

This subway ride to the staging area was 20 minutes. We had a choice of stops to get off because the staging area was so large. Not knowing exactly where to go we randomly selected a stop and got off. I still can't believe what happened. As we came up out of the subway we crossed the street, which by now was nothing short of a sea of green utilities from all branches of the service, and we continued on for about a half a block when I spotted a large mass of people who were assembled inside a city park with a very large banner flying overhead and I couldn't believe my eyes. It was a white banner with green lettering and it read "KHE SANH VETERANS." I remember approaching cautiously and I walked around the whole perimeter of these guys with Dan studying them and trying to figure this out. I eventually went inside the park and wound up talking to some of them, but unfortunately I don't recall who, and after a few conversations I remember the Hueys flying overhead. The parade was starting and I asked Dan if it was ok to march with this group. He said "sure." This was the beginning of my first reunion.

The parade kicked off and we all marched as a group. I will always remember the feelings of closeness and togetherness that I felt that day as we marched down the "Canyon of Heroes" as it is referred to in New York. Just think, famous movie stars, baseball players, astronauts, presidents and now me, with the Khe Sanh Vets. It was an awesome parade from start to finish. The spectators were lined up along the whole route and they were stacked from the curb straight on back to the buildings and they were screaming "Welcome Home" all the way. We marched past bands too that were all playing military songs and there was also a reviewing stand with a lot of dignitaries, including General William Westmorland, who I believe was the guest of honor or Marshall. Dan loved it too. The emotions were flowing.

Along with the parade there was a party on the deck of the Intrepid, which I was told was a WWII aircraft carrier docked on the West side. Dan and I discussed this and I decided to stay in the city while he departed for a prior family commitment back home. After he left I just milled around at the end of the parade route just savoring the good feelings that had come over my entire body. It was awesome, green utilities, jungle hats, combat boots, full dress uniforms, flags, music, singing. Parade. My parade. I am Home!

Being a loyal Marine, I went from bar to bar, which were all overflowing with Vets. In hope of finding someone I knew from Khe Sanh I had to consume a untold quantity of Lager. Wherever I went someone was handing me a beer. After realizing what a short day it would be if I continued with this search method, I walked around outside just taking in all the people. Then I saw a guy with a sign that read 2/26. I met none other than Ed Diaz, in the middle of millions of people. While we hadn't known each other in Viet Nam, we had a good conversation, which lasted sometime. I remember how great it was that I had met someone. Poor Dan.

Ed and I parted company and I proceeded to the Intrepid, which was another great time. They had several bands playing all the tunes that were popular back in the sixties. It brought back a lot of memories, and tears. At one point I found myself just standing at a solitary location on the flight deck, facing South, just listening to the music and crying my eyes out. It just happened. But, it ended, as did the party and I happily walked around New York for awhile just taking in the whole day and trying to decide if I should extend my stay. I learned that there was a "gathering" going on at the Penta Hotel for Khe Sanh Vets.

Inside the Penta Hotel I immediately found what would later become known to me as the hospitality/PX room. It was an awesome display of memorabilia. I scouted the perimeter just taking it all in and trying to figure it out. After purchasing a few items I then noticed a message board, which had a message inviting all to a slide show of Khe Sanh that was being held in a suite that belonged to one of the Khe Sanh Vets. I overcame my reluctance, mustered up all my courage and went up to this room full of strangers. I met Ray Stubbe and a former Marine Ernie Husted who was putting on a slide show of all the photos he took while at Khe Sanh Combat Base. I will never forget it. I was welcomed like a long lost relative, invited to drink as much as I wanted. I sat down in awe of these guys and what they were doing, watched a great slide show and found myself listening and laughing, all the while fighting back long lost emotions. The slide show was great. I finally witnessed the magnitude of what had been going on back at the combat base during the siege. The hospitality and slide presentation was great. Perhaps too great. To this day I have always wondered if I had overstayed my welcome because I found myself getting onto a train back to Long Island at 0310hrs. It had been a long day, and night...my first reunion.

I apparently put my name down on a roster while I was in the Penta Hotel, the following February I received an envelope in the mail with a return address that read The Khe Sanh Vet Newsletter. It was, I believe, to be the First Issue of the magazine that we now read today. It was five pages, printed on both sides with the first two dedicated to articles and the last three a listing of all the Khe Sanh Vets that had been located, 350. That's a lot of people, I thought, and I read my own name on that list. What a proud feeling. The phrase "WELCOME HOME" took on a new meaning.

The publications continued and the Chicago parade was promoted, scheduled for 1986. I was unable to attend, but sent in a donation to KSV just to keep the newsletters coming and eventually I started reading about the reunions that were taking place in California, Florida, Tennessee. Great articles about all the guys getting together. I really wanted to go to one, but, I was unable to work it in at the time, or was afraid. I don't know.

All that changed in 1996. The reunion was scheduled for Philly and all my internal excuses of "too far away, I live on Long Island, NY" were not holding up. They fell apart the day I got a telephone call, about 1 week prior to the reunion, from Ed (Zimmo) Zimmerman (Fox 2/26) who was a guy I served with at Khe Sanh. The last time I saw him was on the evening of April 7, 1968, when he put me on the last medivac chopper off of "hill 700." He was calling from his home in Pa. Also on the line was Ed Sanchez (Fox 2/26) a guy I bunkered with on hill 558 who was visiting Zimmo for a camping vacation prior to attending the reunion. I don't have to tell you what a great phone call it was. I put plans in motion immediately to go to Philly and in a matter of two hours I was a go.

I drove down to Philly and had no trouble finding the hotel, all the USMC flags flying from the balcony railings. I remember going in and registering too. It was a very strange feeling not knowing anyone at the time. I kept walking around from room to room, hospitality to the PX to the bar to the pool back to my room (bunker), all the while fighting the urge to flee. Get the hell out of here I thought. Glad I didn't cause then it happened...Sanchez, Soto, Zimmerman, Collins, McCrossen, Diaz, Brohy. "Fox Company present Sir!" I'm home.

Twenty-Eight years after the fact I found myself in the company of those that I had served with in Viet Nam, at Khe Sanh. What a comfortable feeling. We had a great time together and I also met a lot of other wonderful caring people; odd description of former Marines who still had a place in their heart for each other. Looking back, these reunions can be somewhat of a scary ordeal the first time around. But, it doesn't take long before you settle in and start to feel comfortable and have a good time until it's time to go home. Then you can't wait for the next one.

The '97 reunion at St Louis, which was too far too soon. I didn't make it. Then it was Washington in '98 and although I could only go for the first three days it was a very touching reunion what with "The Wall" being right down the block. Then there was St Louis last year, gave it a lot of thought and then just picked up and went, even though I didn't know anyone else who was attending. Here we go again, I thought. Boy was I surprised. I met a whole bunch of new people from other aspects, areas, functions and branches of the service. There was the guy from Golf Co who was on the other side of the hill on 4-7-68 when we got into the shit, a C-130 pilot, SOG guy, Air Force FAC, Marines who were there before Khe Sanh became famous (pre-siege) and a Seabee. Talk about seeing the war from a different perspective, it was there, and I hope to always be there.

SEE YOU IN SAN DIEGO IN 2000.

Corporal Manuel Pina Babbitt – May 5, 1999

by Charles Patterson

He suffered their cage
With the dignity of vigil,
And graced them with his forgiveness
In the dying language
That they will never speak.
And in return,
They strapped him down,
The only living thing within Their warm green room.
A green untinted by sunlight.
As fecund as the fifteen greens
Of Vietnam.

While he listened
For that last beat
Of his heart,
Justice scurried off
Leaving behind
A broken scale and bloody sword.
Then death crept in the opened door,
And took him
With the gentleness
Of a pickpocket's caress.

For those in the hushed semicircle
It was not what they thought
It would be. No one saw justice,
No one found satisfaction;
No sanctuary; no salvation.
Just a good man dead,
A long drive home,
And a cold, wet night outside.

The Threshold of Hell

They climbed to fight their way to fame
Upon a hill that bore no name,
And won the tough and deadly game,
Though many had died to stake the claim.

Old Lucifer himself was there
Amidst the death and much despair
To fan the smoke and caustic air.
This place to hell would compare.

Evacuation choppers soared
Above the guns that loudly roared
So close to steel and lead that poured
From weapons of that VC horde.

The tired Marines dug in and stayed
To hold that hill against the raid,
Heroic roles they often played.
The price in lives was highly paid.

The Devil grinned because he knew
His share for hell would be a few.
He waited as the battle grew
Then watched it die and start anew.

A Chaplain came upon the scene
And knelt beside a still Marine
Who looked no more than seventeen?
The youngest one he'd ever seen.

The Padre saw the bitter light,
Blessed countless souls and gave last rites
He followed those who scaled the heights,
Barring Satan from the tragic sites.

Some say Marines serve time in hell
While still on earth, their legends tell.
And the Devil knew it all too well
So he tried recruiting when they fell.

But the fearless Padre held his ground
And whipped the Devil round for round
Atop that shell-pocked bloody mound,
And salvaged every soul he found.

When tales are told within the Corps they'll talk about the Padre's chore,
And how the Devil ran on before
Through the threshold of Hell
...and closed the door.

Black and Yellow Dog

My ass is cold and wet the rest of me I warm as I sit on the just thawed mud bank of the Potomac, just south of Great Falls, just north of Chain Bridge, after a mid-winter heat wave, watching billions of gallons of dirt brown water flowing over, under and through at the Chesapeake then on to the Atlantic unstoppable.

Garbage and debris, a sea of shit, floats by cradled as if it belonged, not wrenched from the surrounding forest, not dragged unwillingly from some farmer's field or barn, or swept from a country road built on the flood plain: an uprooted sycamore tree, a section of a wooden fence painted green, a -bloated black and yellow dog. Is it still a dog?

I sit and watch intensely, mentally noting everything that passes, without grasping, only wondering what action to take if a human body floats by out of reach, beyond saving, beyond redemption, cradled, as if it belonged, belly down and bloated like the black and yellow dog. Is it still a human? Should I interfere with the river?

Up and down the Missouri, the Arkansas and the Des Moines and every tributary in between, all draining into the Mississippi, I've roamed making maps of wetlands, sucked dry by stupidity, and-not once have I ever seen a river that had the same color, the same level, the same temperature, the same smell the same taste from moment to the next.

All bodies flow like rivers; none are the same from moment to moment. The perception of permanence is an illusion empty. A sucking chest wound on a dying nineteen year old gurgles like Goose Creek after a spring rain before his last breath is taken through the wrong fucking hole. All illusions of permanence vanish when the, last red bubble, sopped in blood, pops.

The river gives birth to all things and the river takes them away, an eternal cycle of creation and destruction. In a season of consonance my son was conceived on the banks of the Atchafalaya River wetland pregnant with life. In a season of chaos I hunted down and terminated life on the banks of the Rao Quan.

I dumped their bodies into the river that drains the eastern slopes of the Annamites just shy of 17 degrees north latitude, light years from home, flows south then east to the Mien Giang, which turns slightly north of east just before depositing my sins into the South China Sea at Cua Viet. Waters from the South China Sea and the Atlantic must mix somewhere.

I trust the river to do its job as it's done since before my birth, without interference, without consulting me-ignoring my dreams of glory and my fears of suffering which are swept away in the current with the bloated black and yellow dog and merge somewhere with the blood red waters of the Rao Quan washed clean now by thirty summers of torrential rain.

Sadness

By Talis Kaminskis

Allow yourself the sadness. Reach down farther into the dark of emotions than ever before. BE YOURSELF! The creature of anger and rage that your life has lived. The young Marine's soul heard and cried. And cowered once again at the reality of having to confront himself. Repeatedly, it was built on all he had ever dreamed for. As a child, it brought a parent's warm arms. Growing into the teen years, the attention of young ladies. Now, in a land that held all that he knew, it portended to bring despair. He strove to avoid the forlorn emotion, but with beastly independence, it rose and rose, and it breached his private little world. From eyes that had learned to have only one look, rolled forth the merciful plea for tears. Pressure releasing, sin washing, guilt ridding tears. Strong, descriptive, communicating fears. Lied, cried and begged for them; Oh how he cried for their need. His mouth open, gasping for the breath needed to replenish the tremendous energy now pouring out of his soul. How grating were the screams resonating with his plea. His arms heralded the trembling and shaking that was to come, and with unintended actions, dropped from his grasp the constant weapon. Not laying it down with the care and importance it deserved, but casting it from his grip, in direct denial demanded by his experience. An act of defiance, letting it fall, into the dirt, into an area beyond reach. Quickly his arms wrapped tightly around his chest. Gripping, squeezing, giving the illusion of companionship. He needed to be held, to feel the touch, to acknowledge the truth governing the momentum beyond his control. Desperation was the master of the moment and, in his mind he cried. Cried to overcome. Cried to hold himself. Cried to let himself go. The visions of blood and pain flitted through his mind. His heart pained as he visualized the still bodies. Past their violence he walked, kept walking, until now. The river washing his being stopped flowing. Its current parted and, lying on the revealing shore, laid one who had been his friend. So close had been their bond that sharing had become a commitment. Sealed with an unspoken pact that each could depend on the other. Such frailties of men did not take into account the power of time and circumstance. His friend died. Whatever they possessed lay fallen with him. "I WILL NOT FEEL" echoed through the young Marine. Had risen from the ashes and proclaimed his escape from beyond the power. Clutching at the reality of the situation, the young Marine drove deep the bonds that could cause such pain. Shoulders and chest tightened; a prelude to the clenching of the jaw. Who now had the power to be a part of him? Were there any worthy of his love? Could there be one who could walk his path and not be weak enough to fall victim to war's tribulations? What made him think that he was so mighty? That he could challenge death on its own terms and come out the victor? Who in the hell did he think he was to be such a self-appointed judge, jury, and executioner? And it came. The one word came.

Why? Why? why? WHY??????? The word that let himself feel. A word that brought pain. Yes, there was pain in his world. AND HE FELT IT. LET HIMSELF FEEL IT.PAIN THAT WAS A PART OF HIM. If he had any inkling of what the tears would bring, surely he would not let himself be subjected to this. But he had too. He had to let himself be. An island he had become, and an island he could not remain. No matter how enticingly it appealed to him. His body existed in a physical world. One where somewhere there was life. Where a hand was still held out and a body caressed in love. Where a smile was not cynical and a face possessed a name. He cried for himself and he cried for them all. Rising above the punishing shame. Surging past its restraints. His oath was again silent. But it was strong. A vessel for more tears. An endless supply. Rolling down a mountain that no one had climbed in a long time. He collapsed to his knees, trembling and sagging. A body tired and drained from feeling confronted. Stretched to physical limits not meant to be tested. Nothing could have prepared him for this. It had to be his. Unbidden. Unplanned. Unasked. Revelation was a master not to be trifled with. It scoured the essence of those whose needs drove them to enter its realm. And yet it accomplished nothing more than to act as a mirror to its invader. Existence was a harsh teacher and, the tears drove the lesson deep. Ahead still lay more of the reasons for there being Footprints would disappear, but they could not be erased. His path would test again and again.

Passing Time

Memories of the D.C. Reunion July 1-5, 1998
By Ernie Spencer

The precise symmetry of chalk white stone captures my gaze as I travel from a pleasant morning visit at Arlington. My eyes stare out a tinted picture window at row upon row of white gravestones. I reflect upon this final place through which I wind. These fellow warriors. All their lives. All their stories. I feel at one with them. To see them I need only look in a mirror, or, glance across the aisle of our air-conditioned bus at a somber, Khe Sanh brother. He gazes outward, engrossed in his own personal world of lonely-contemplation. "Cogitate'n," Pipes calls it. Memories, I prefer. I had witnessed a beautiful, touching, ceremony beside the flagpole adjacent to the Tomb Of The Unknown Soldier. Large trees and fortunate location hid the ceremony from the bright rays of cloudless sun. The guys from Echo Company, Second Battalion, Twenty Sixth Marine Regiment, got the United States Marine Corps Awards Branch to reluctantly give up a Bronze Star. Heroic actions thirty years ago are fondly remembered during their chanted, often choking-back-tears recollections by Echo company brothers. One after another they step forward. Middle aged men in suits and ties speak of a time from their teens when they knew this man. They recall a brave, funny, good-hearted buddy who was killed in-action, one day and another firefight after the award date. His beautifully aged mother and middle-aged siblings stand in awe by all which goes on around and for them. There is a magic at such times. An enveloping air which binds together the participants. The ceremony breathes through and for those present.

We go out for pizza at one the next morning. We run the one block gauntlet of hookers, pimps, and late-night panhandlers along L Street. The pizza joint is the only thing open. Cheap pizza, sandwiches, and, beer by the pitcher. From 10 am until 4 in the morning. Seven days a week. The stink of nicotine and yeast of beer and pizza hits me going through the glass front door. Some real old, stooped, wrinkled, withered guy with a cigarette hanging out one side of a pouting mouth sets down a couple of pizzas within twenty minutes after we order. "We were here yesterday," Paul says. "That guy," he nods towards the old dude as he shuffles off, "that guy works the whole time. Ten in the morning till four the next. No breaks." Better him than me, I think.

Met a classmate (same platoon) from Officers Basic School 1965 at the reunion. Served with this guy in the same battalion at Khe Sanh in 1967 and a little of '68. This guy is now some businessman. Owns his own company and does not remember me. He says he's just fine.

Finally got to meet Ernest Jones after thirty years. Ernest was platoon sergeant for Delta weapons. I had a four-thirty wake up so I didn't hang out after the banquet on the Fourth. From my bed I watch the televised World Cup Soccer match between Holland and Brazil. Fireworks a few miles away send booming shock waves right through the walls and closed windows of my corner room. I look out the large windows that rattle and creak. White, red, green and other radiant colors spray outward in blooms come alive. My stomach is calm. The sounds do not send me off on another trip down memory lane. I pass unaware into sleep.

There are persons whose voices are distinct if not unique. Some say mine is one. But there is, and can only be, one Fish. The ringing phone wakes me. The clock says well after 11 pm. "Eh Skippah, Jooones is fanahly heah." Fish says "Jones" like he's chewing—on a large piece of sausage and onion pizza. My meeting Ernest after thirty years is electrifying. I see his back as I enter the hospitality suite.

There is a good crowd both standing and seated. Beer flows in the corner Delta occupies. Jones has a Delta company red ballcap, unadjusted for size, precariously perched on his George Foreman-styled head. I walk up behind him. He's tripping, shouting and bouncing, recounting Delta memories. "Sergeant Jones," I say, matter-of-factly, like I used to when we ran together. He spins around. Starts shaking. "Ohhh... Man... Skipper," he goes, then leaps and grabs me. Jones still works out. I don't. He's not just hugging. This guy squeezes me so hard I feel my lower colon start to emerge. He lifts me off the ground despite being considerably shorter than me. I believe he is going to crush me to death. Damn, I think. I survive Khe Sanh and Vietnam only to die at the hands of one of my own guys. After extricating myself from his death grip, I hold him at arms length while trying to recover my wind. "It's good to see you again, Ernest," I say in a noticeably higher octave, breathless voice. He moves again to embrace me, but my arms remain locked at the shoulders, elbows and wrists. Grinning panic on my face. We Khe Sanh vets are if nothing else, survivors.

My calm demeanor at the reunion is due to my own family situation. Since April I have been flying continuously to Hawaii while tending to dad's cancer surgery, moms stroke, Dads heart attack and another stroke for mom. I felt like I was in a ring, on the ropes, while the Furies pounded me. I did what I always do during such times. Click it down a few notches. Shut it down until the incoming quiets. I keep reminding myself that it is my mom and dad doing the dance with death, but I still have to watch and listen. In the space of several months I see mom and dad go from being loving parents, to very unhappy children. Five days after the reunion my parents leave Hawaii for probably the last time.

I put mom in a nursing home and dad in an assisted living center. Alameda where they reside is forty-five minutes from me, each way, in light traffic. Perhaps in time I will relocate them closer, but for now, I want the best nursing home in the Bay Area and it is supposedly the one at Alameda where mom resides.

On the fifteenth of July I leave for what I hope is a final trip to Hawaii. Until this savage bout of illness in my family I had harbored a dream of someday returning to my childhood home. But, now, I am physically sickened by the site of Oahu. The plane descends on its final approach. I look out the left window at the subdivision where my folks' home is up for sale. Check. Check. Check. Dad wanted me to do a final check. That's how dad is. I feel sad as I walk the empty Ewa Beach home my folks had custom built. Throughout their sixty years of marriage they have accumulated a fair net worth by investing exclusively in real estate. My parents have owned and lived in over forty homes. This empty one I walk, the last. I stop at Punchbowl National Cemetery Of The Pacific for the first time since Vietnam. Frenchy Deschaine and Jim Littler are just four graves apart. Punchbowl is an ancient volcano that overlooks Honolulu and Waikiki. It was more than rude, I knew, them being there since 1968 and me never paying my respects. I'm a Khe Sanh guy. We do some things only when we're ready. Frenchy was a Delta company squad leader. Died like a Delta guy of the times. Gunshot. Saw his obituary in the Honolulu paper. I'd only been home from Vietnam a couple of days. I needed to get a job. I didn't have the time for it and all "it" involved, then. Jim Littler and I were two of the original six, PLCs (Platoon Leaders Class) from Hawaii in 1963. The other four DORed (Dropped On Request). Becoming a Marine officer is all about playing macho. I often wonder about those other four guys. How their quitting affected them. If you dropped out of the Marine PLC program, you were not subject to the draft. Jim and I were commissioned at graduation in 1965. Jim was older. He'd done a tour as a Mormon missionary before college. Jim went to the Mormon, Church College at Laie. I went to the Catholic, Chaminade College domiciled on a hillside with a seaward view of Diamond Head, Waikiki and Punchbowl. Jim made the mistake of trying to convert me to his religion during a lay-over at Treasure Island, San Francisco. We had just successfully completed the first of two, summer boot camps at Quantico. It was the summer of 1963. I cannot recall my exact words, but I remember that Jim did not take kindly to my extemporaneous tirade on organized religion. He had been talking religion and his faith non stop since we left Hawaii over a month and a half earlier. I felt that I had to stop him. He was driving me nuts. What really did it was when he arrogantly asked me if I ever "truly" had a religious experience. One where I felt the "spirit." I was laying on my bunk with my hands behind my head. Jim sat on a bunk across from me. "Yes," I yelled and sat straight up. "I often do while I'm doing it in the back seat of a car or on a blanket at the beach with some sweet thing." I recall that sarcastic line of mine as I stand beside him. His cement grave stone seems much older than its thirty years. The cement is pocked and seems unvisited, like Frenchy's. The stones of Punchbowl do not stand like those at Arlington. They lie flat upon the ground. Jim was a CH-46 helicopter pilot and went down with his entire crew. "I'm sorry guys. Please forgive me," I say, glancing between them. Tearing, I turn and walk the short incline on the southeast side. I look down into the crater that helped build Oahu. Now, dull white stones on rich green lawns have claimed its interior. A circular road wanders the lower portion like a casually tossed, black lei. Punchbowl is full. Only cremations now allowed. Who will remember any of this a hundred years from now? I turn, and gaze outward at Waikiki. My old college and Kaimuki lay hidden behind towering concrete structures, thrust up, like surreal, tombstones. I hear laughter from the gods on the breeze that sweeps by my face and ear. Playful, songful laughter. I turn, and look down into the crater at Frenchy and Jim. There is no past or future. Only this moment. Mamma died three months after the reunion. We'll place her ashes at Punchbowl to wait for dad. Dad was Army. I'm toying with the idea of going there myself, when the time comes.

Going to See Chris

By Jack Stoddard

I'm writing this story in memory of my friend Chris Cordova and for all of us who were privileged to have known him during his short life. It's three o'clock in the morning, Friday July 3, 1998. I just opened the garage door of my home in Las Vegas and I'm on my way back into the house to get my coffee. I can hear the deep mellow sound of the dual exhaust on my restored classic, a 1960 Chevy El Camino, echoing off the garage walls. I'm going to visit the final resting place of Chris Cordova with whom I served some twenty-eight years ago in Vietnam.

After many hours of research with the help of my wife, Sue, we were able to locate Chris's hometown and with Sue's magic fingers on the keyboard of the computer, we even had a phone number for Robert Cordova who turned out to be the younger brother of Chris! After talking with Robert and finding out exactly were Mosquero, New Mexico, was, I decided that I needed to go and say a final goodbye to my young friend. I needed to close that door as I opened some new ones. Some 750 miles and fourteen hours from now, I'll finally be with my friend again.

The traffic was light as I drove over Hoover Dam, navigated the steep canyon, and headed for Kingman, Arizona. The trip was nice and it stayed cool all the way to Flagstaff before I rolled down the windows to pick up a breeze. I love driving across I-40. Being a classic car buff, I really enjoy going seventy-miles-per-hour and looking into the backyards along the way to see what kind of old cars were parked there. On this trip, I didn't hear the normal, "stop looking around and keep your eyes on the road," that Sue would constantly be telling me. This journey was on my own. This was my quest, something I had wanted to do for a long time.

Around three o'clock that afternoon, I pulled into Tucumcari, New Mexico, and started on Route 54 toward the town of Logan. It was nice to get off the interstate and travel on the back roads again. The weather was great! Hot, but still very nice with white clouds cutting off the heat of the sun every so often. When I arrived in Logan, I followed the old Main Street through the city. You could see that at one time it must have been a busy place, but now a lot of the stores were closed and boarded, just as in many small towns across the country.

As I kept going north, the road seemed to be getting smaller and smaller until I finally turned on Route 39 and headed into the tiny town of Mosquero, my final destination. Now the road was a narrow, two-lane highway that seemed to be darting out into nowhere. There were nothing but green-rolling hills all around with only a few ranch houses scattered about to interrupt this gorgeous land.

By now, I was starting to get really nervous. I kept thinking about all the things that I wanted to say to Chris. And I was also nervous about meeting the Cordova family. Did they want to meet me? Had they put everything in the past or would they want me to tell them everything I remembered from all those years ago? I guess I really didn't know what to expect.

After going about twenty miles, I approached the base of a beautiful mesa. I was sure it would drop off toward the right side and go into a valley where Mosquero would be found but instead, as I reached a fork in the road, I started to climb right up the side. It was very steep and I was just hoping my old car would make it up through the steep sharp curves.

As I slowly maneuvered my way through this wonderful mesa, I came upon a huge wall of rock and saw it was covered from top to bottom with names and dates. I wondered if Chris had put his name there when he was a boy. Finally reaching the top, I saw nothing but hills covered with juniper trees about as far as you could see. It was nothing like I had expected the top of a mesa to be. I thought it would be flat and rocky. I was hoping there would be a gas station in Mosquero as I was down to a quarter of a tank and still had to travel the thirty miles back to Logan later in the day.

I soon approached the town of Mosquero and luckily saw a gas pump on the right side of town with a big sign reading, "Open" leaning against it. As I pulled toward the old-fashioned gas pump, I couldn't help but think, why would anybody want to live in this little spot in the road? I stopped my car. As I started to get out, an older man approached and asked how I was doing. I returned the greeting as he was removing the front cover on the pump so he could reset the meter by hand (he told me the old pump had broken three years earlier). I asked him if he could answer a couple of questions for me.

First I asked him where the cemetery was located and then I asked if he knew where Robert Cordova lived. "Oh sure, that's easy," he replied and offered to call Chris Cordova (Robert's son who had been named after my friend). Chris Cordova was the local marshal and was usually around.

As he was filling my tank, I was looking over the town. I could see a volunteer fire department building with a "Closed" sign in the window and next to it was a small market with an even smaller bar attached to the side of it and the town's post office. That was downtown Mosquero, New Mexico.

A few minutes later, a pickup truck pulled into the station and a young man walked up to me. I assumed it was Chris and put my hand out to introduce myself, "Hi, I'm Jack. You must be Chris."

"Yes, and I would be happy to take you to the cemetery as soon as you get your gas, sir."

A few minutes later, I was following him down the dusty road to the cemetery. We had only gone a short way before we turned off on a gravel road. Soon my car was covered in a great cloud of white dust. I remember being upset about this and at the same time feeling a little ashamed of myself. Here I was about to see my friend, Chris, and I was worried about a little dust. That was really stupid.

It wasn't long before we were pulling into the small cemetery. It was on about a quarter-acre of land with a fence around it. I guessed there were about thirty graves altogether. I was really nervous now. There were so many things I had wanted to tell Chris.

As we approached the first grave, I could see a headstone engraved: "PFC Jose Cordova Died In Germany World War II." That was the grave of Chris's father who had been killed in action in 1945. I got a lump in my throat. All of the sudden, I thought, "His dad was also here and taking care of him." That meant Chris would be all right.

Then came the real hard part. I walked up to Chris's grave. There was a small stone just like his dad's. It had his name, rank, and where and when he died. There was a small American flag made of flowers in front of the headstone, but the flowers had long since wilted. But you could tell Chris was remembered and not forgotten. His nephew put his hand down and moved the wreath so I could see the complete marker.

As I knelt down, something very strange happened. It was as if Chris had heard all my thoughts about him during the last decade and I really didn't have to say anything because he already knew. With tears in my eyes, all I could say was, "It's good to see you again, old buddy."

I sat there touching the headstone for about five minutes as Chris's nephew backed away to give me some privacy. Finally, I said one more time, "It's good to see you, Chris," and I stood up and walked a few steps backward still looking at the grave. I really felt a sense of peace as I turned and walked back to my car, wiping the tears from my eyes. I didn't want to break down and cry since I still had to meet the rest of his family in a few minutes. The tears would come later when I was alone driving out of Mosquero.

Shortly we were pulling into the Robert Cordova's front yard. His was a large wooden house with new and old cars scattered through the yard. Robert walked out to meet us. For just a moment, I thought it was Chris, they looked so much alike. We shook hands and I could tell this was as awkward for him as it was for me. He introduced me to his sister and then his wife, Francis, and their oldest son, Floyd. I was then invited into their home and offered a beer that I gladly accepted. I'm not really much of a beer drinker any more, but it was really appreciated!

We all sat around in the living room making small talk and I was trying to figure out how to give them a copy of the story I had written about Chris. I decided to pull it out of my pocket and handed it to Robert. I watched as he took the two-page story out of the white envelope. I was scared at that moment. I took another large gulp of beer while wondering if they would like my story or not. How would they act? Did I do the right thing? I just waited.

The story was passed from one member of the family to the next with only a few nods of their heads as any sign of what they read. I could see Robert's eyes were a little red but other than that, not a word was spoken.

I was offered another beer and after some prodding, accepted a plate of homemade enchiladas. While we were all sitting around the table, Robert's daughter-in-law entered the kitchen. "That was a really nice story you wrote about Chris," she said. "We all liked it very much." That was all that was ever said about it, but it did make me feel much better and a little more at ease.

After I had eaten a few more bites of dinner, out came the photo albums. There were lots of pictures in various sizes already in the living room with a separate special area for each one of the sons and cousins who had served in the military. Chris had his spot with his medals hanging next to his basic training picture and next to him was Robert's son, Floyd. Floyd had served in the Persian Gulf, but was now on disability from a back injury.

After a couple of beers, things started to get better. The family shared stories about the two brothers, Chris and Robert, as we sat in this small room on the top of this beautiful mesa in New Mexico. Robert told me about a doctor who also had lost a son in Vietnam and who had built a memorial and chapel in the little town of Angel Fire, eighty miles northwest of Mosquero. All the boys from the surrounding four counties who had died in Vietnam had their pictures and some personal effects placed in the memorial building. Chris's pictures, along with his dog tags, were there. Every week a different picture was placed in the chapel and that family was notified. Robert called this place "holy ground." A lot of the conversation was centered on the brothers and how their Uncle Joe had taught them to swim in the local swimming hole, to hunt, and to fish.

Soon, with a third beer in our hands, Robert, Floyd, and I headed out the door and on our way "cruzin," as Robert put it. I was no longer a stranger. I had been accepted as a friend. There couldn't have been more than thirty houses in this small town. Many of them had been boarded up as the people who had lived there were now long gone. I was told that when Chris was a boy, there were probably 300 people living in town, but the population had now dwindled to around a hundred. Three of the largest ranchers in the area had bought out most of the small ranches.

As we left the house, we went about a half block away and saw the small, white buildings that were the elementary and high schools. Robert told me a picture honoring Chris was in the main hallway of the high school. We then drove by a church and the little hospital that had closed over ten years ago and was now the school superintendent's house.

Every time we drove past a house, everybody would wave and I would wave back. I could imagine what they must have thought at the site of this strange gringo riding around in Robert's green pickup truck! Everybody knew everyone else in this town. It was like one huge family. You just couldn't help but fall in love with Mosquero.

Robert drove us down Bell Ranch Road for about forty miles. As we drove, more stories came out about Chris's funeral and how Robert was on his senior class field trip to the Lake of the Ozarks when he was notified of his brother's death. The class, all five of them, cut the trip short and returned home. He said the whole town turned out for Chris's funeral, as well as the honor guard from the Air Force National Guard in Clovis.

Robert told me about the wild elk that roamed the area and Floyd directed my attention to the local sights such as the Indian caves. When we got to the end of the mesa, they pointed to an area across the valley where dinosaur footprints had been discovered. We had a really nice talk as we returned to their home and I felt I now knew more about Chris than I had known during that whole year we served together.

Robert wanted me to spend the night and kept asking me over and over again, but I didn't feel right about staying. I didn't want to ruin their Fourth of July weekend. Deep inside, I really liked these new-found friends and could easily have stayed longer, but I knew I had to get home to my own little family. It took me nearly thirty years, but I finally was able to close the door on Chris. But, I also knew it could be opened again and his family and friends would welcome me.

I departed at dark and as I was driving out of town, the full impact of what had happened hit me. I had to wipe the tears away as I drove off the mesa and headed for the busy world below. I couldn't help but think of the past and how my wife encouraged me to write this book about the way Vietnam really was. About good men doing an impossible job as best they could. Not killers, but boys who became men long before their time — some who came home and some, like Chris, who didn't.

When I wanted and needed to go see Chris, my wife told me, "Go do what you have to do." Sometimes, I think she must understand me better than I understand myself. Thank you, Sue, for helping me close those doors.

Return to Khe Sanh

By Col. Bruce F. Meyers USMC (Retired)

I have now had the chance to return to Khe Sanh twice. In March 1998, I took my wife Jo and we accompanied some forty plus former and active duty Marines plus Army Special Forces Rangers. The March 1998 trip was thirty years almost to the month from when we of the 26th Marines left Khe Sanh. I have just now returned from my 2nd "Returned," this time taking my son age forty-three, who was previously a Marine. Too young at the time for either the service or Vietnam. Both trips were great.

Vietnamese security persons were always with us in the background, never intrusive, but we always knew they were they're observing our return. For whatever reason, general Mundy and myself seemed to be followed more than others. I had brought several St. Christopher and St. Michael medals (patron saints of "Grunt" Marines) with me to bury as a private memorial for lost friends at Khe Sanh. It had to appear that I was going over to relieve myself next to a coffee tree. Only then did the NVA security people turn away. I slipped my metal down my leg and had to bury them with my boot, so as not to call attention to the security or the many small Vietnamese or Bru children who followed us everywhere.

Only when we walked out to where our perimeter (1/26 as I remember) was located on the north side of the airstrip could you find foxholes and individual emplacements. I found scraps of the green plastic sandbags and pieces of barbwire that brought memories flooding back. One of our MHT tour directors retired Sgt. Major Len Koontz (Navy Cross as Lance Cpl. At Khe Sanh) had wire cutters which we used to recover small two inch sections of the barbed wire to bring home. I later made up small plaques with a piece of barbed wire, a scrap of sandbag and a small bottle of the red soil of Khe Sanh.

In March 1999 I went back to Khe Sanh again for a more in-depth look. Five of us stayed overnight in Khe Sanh village. I was the only one that had been in on the 800 series hills in 1968. I recommended long trousers and light shirts with sun hats and light packs and plenty of drinking water. We hired a Bru woman accompanied by her teenage children, to guide us up to 881. Wading through four streams up to our waist, none of us had any problems with leeches. Climbing up through the elephant grass was tiring in the 107-degree heat and 100% humidity. We took our time and by late mid-morning we had reached the spur just east of hill 881S. We confirmed our position with GPS and taking compass bearings on surrounding hills. There is still considerable live ordinance throughout this area. Use extreme caution. Coming down the trail that we were ascending, bumping rocks along the way, were two Bru's with a water buffalo hauling a two hundred and fifty pound bomb casing and a 155 mm shell! We about dove off the trail. Later we determined that they had been defused and we were glad.

My memories of April '68 came flooding out. One of my battalions (3/26) under Lt. Col. John Studt, with Maj. Matt Caulfield, and Capts. Harry Jenkins and Bill Dabney and 1st Lt. Tom Esslinger, among many others, participated in the retaking of hill 881N. I spotted the place where Bill Dabney and I urinated on the 106 tubes, to cool them from cherry hot. They were firing overhead direct fire as the attack elements of 3/26 retook 881N. I had flown up from the Combat Base with my air and artillery officers and we spent that day with 3/26 during the attack. Later that day I flew a wounded NVA officer and enlisted man back on my helo for medical care and interrogation. Intervening years stripped away and I could almost smell the cordite and winced at incoming. It was total recall. It lasted but a short time, but some how made me feel better that we had made this effort to come back. Some how it put much of Vietnam behind me. My son and the others could tell how much it meant to me to get back up there. Running out of time, we beat a hasty trip down the hill, back through the streams to our bus, for the nearly two hundred-mile drive south to Da Nang.

The country is friendly. More than 85% there have been have been born since the US left VN. The scenery is beautiful. It will become a destination resort in a few years. If you get the chance go. It is a decision I know that those who have done it have no regrets and only positive memories.

Crash of a Pilot

Now they are reconstructing it,
Putting the fine sticks of fate together
As if they were tinker toys.
Man has never come to terms
With accident, his own birth;
Or its antithesis.
Surprised at miracles, he lives,
Thinking that Order,
Explains everything;
And that Reason is why
Men fly into the trees,
Or sink at sea, or die of disease.
It is difficult to think Nothing.
We grow up thinking our ways
Out of jungles, and often survive
To reinforce thinking Something.

And so, while the crews work
Cleaning the site, I fly
Among fog-caressed valleys,
Forging the wild rivers of faith;
Knowing the chances are Reasonably on my side.

If I should die in flight today
By some malfunctioning of skies
Will there be peace before I cease to be?
Or shall I terror stricken, cling to fear
And wail until this tumbling craft
Defines my destiny?

I can but contemplate how I'll respond
And I'll define that now,
Because I've treated death before:

In truth I do believe that in a tumbling craft,
I'd try to analyze its path
And chart its twisting course.

When fury waned
I'd soar as Angels have for centuries past,
Then seek a lofty plain and cling to it
Until I'd journeyed Home.

Section Eight: The Babbling of Bug-Out Billy

I used to deem and dream myself
A beam-lean moustached warrior,
Shining in the armor of godsped glory,
Wielding the flamethrower of the just cause,
Screaming Geronimo and parachuting:
A pragmatic Prometheus bringing Frightful firepower to a shrinking
Enemy, serenaded by a blatant brass band.
Then I woke to the haunting hounding human sea,
The raddled rattle of trumpet going to battle
Infinitesimal cotton-padded infiltration,
Moans of men mourning their mutilation,
Frostbitten feet in a festering foxhole.
I could not beat or bring myself to live like that.

A Message From The Editor:

We failed to get permission or credit the cover photo in our last issue. The photo was taken by David Douglas Duncan, a photo journalist, who went through the Siege with some of us. I first saw the photo at Jim Wilkinson's home in Memphis in 1987. I was meeting him for the first time since Khe Sanh. I thought it was his personal photo. I asked if I could use the photo for our cover and he obliged. After we had gone to print, he mentioned it was a Duncan photo. Jim said he didn't think Duncan would mind. Little did I know it was used by David on a cover of one of his books. Tommy got quite a scare when David called him from France and pretended he was upset at his photo being used without his permission. He then laughed it off and said he thought it was a great cover. His photo on last issue's cover is a segue between what Jim and Walt are looking off towards, and the NVA on this issue's cover. Paul mentioned that the wearing of the green pith helmet is akin to the brothers in America wearing their "colors." While it is common in the North, it is looked down upon in the South. Paul caught the guy's look using a telephoto lens. He was not posing.

We bombed with the Rats/Red Clay theme for this issue. One submission. You guys cannot tell me you did Khe Sanh and don't have any stories of rats or red clay. There's a big difference between mind stories and writing, huh? The submission deadline for our next issue is November 31.

BOD Messages

As the chairman of the publishing committee I want to personally thank every member of the organization who responded to my request for articles for our magazine. Your response is going to make this issue one of the most diverse and interesting we have ever published. Along with this issue you will also receive a copy of the 2000 Directory. Please check your personal information and correct any errors on the form provided in the newsletter and return to me ASAP. I will be making corrections and additions, which will be mailed to you in each forthcoming edition of the KSV magazine. The directory has a binding that can be removed with a little practice and you can replace the pages with the corrected ones. I am debating whether to change the front and back cover, once a year. I would like to hear from the membership on this idea. James Wodecki (Jimbo) has done a magnificent job of recruiting new members and designed the covers for the 2000 edition.

I have one more request to help us keep our magazine one of the best published of any organization. We know and understand not everyone owns or has access to a computer. Paul Knight, along with Ernie Spencer and the rest of their staff, spend endless hours retyping and editing submitted material. They would be able to accomplish much more if we could have the materials submitted to Paul Knight, electronically. If at all possible, once you have written your story and do not have access to a computer, maybe you could have it done at your local library, or have a friend who has a computer, help redo the material. I do not wish to, in any way, discourage any one from writing, especially after making a plea for more articles. It is just a suggestion that will help the editors and save a lot of time and work. All materials for the newsletters should still be sent directly to Paul Knight. I again welcome any suggestions or criticisms. This is the only way I can judge our progress with the magazine, which will continue to grow with your help. Keep those articles coming.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It has been my pleasure to serve you, as your President of the Khe Sanh Veterans, for the past year. Since I spoke to you last, I have made two trips to Vietnam and have been in the village of Khe Sanh. I have worked with the Bru and the local Vietnamese. They appear to be, outwardly, pleased to make contact once again with Americans. There is no animosity among the people of Vietnam towards the Americans. On one of my trips I was able to find some of the Strikers that had served with us at Khe Sanh Fire Base and Khe Sanh Village. I just wish you could have felt the joy that radiated when we were together. The Mountain People are still as poor as sin, yet are eager to share with their visitors anything they have. English appears to be their second language now. When you walk through the streets of Khe Sanh young people and children all want to practice their English.

I hope we have a tremendous Reunion at San Diego in September and I want to talk with everyone of you. I know you did your job in a far superior way than we can ever give you credit for.

Your Faithful Servant,
David "BullDog" Smith,
President Khe Sanh Veterans

These are indeed times that become increasingly difficult. I had always assumed, when much younger, that the transitions and the issues that would be faced as one got older became less and less burdensome and difficult—that all the major ones (like a life's work, partner, etc.) were all done early in life. I'm finding that the issues, however, have a sort of accumulative force to them. Issues of grief, of loss, of death, etc., are especially in this category—they seem to grow by adding what has been, with what is, and even anticipation of what will be!

Thus, I heard recently of the loss of Tommy Eichler's mom.

In my own case, my dad's condition has remarkably deteriorated so quick. He was placed on Home Hospice Care about a week ago—meaning that his condition is regarded as terminal within 6 months. He doesn't sleep well—and I'm up with him most of the night, and now he doesn't eat either. He's mostly in a wheelchair so that I can move him to the bathroom in a hurry to assist him while he sits on the pot-clean him up afterwards, etc. Getting him dressed in the morning, taking care of the urine bag (he has a permanent catheter now), and so on have made me appreciate in much greater degree those who have done this sort of thing in the past for others.

I received another letter from Ines S. Kerch. (I think I sent you a letter from her before concerning the advisability of autopsies so that surviving next-of-kin might get compensations from the VA.) She writes in her recent letter something that you might consider putting in the next issue of our magazine: "I wonder if other veterans may have revealed a problem with 'bumps' forming on the body? Apparently, it is accompanied by some itching and, when scratched, there is flaking of the skin. One Vietnam member at our VFW Post served in the Army and has such a problem. According to the veteran, it affects his back, legs, and arms. He stated no doctor has been able to identify what it is, nor the cause. Has anyone revealed such a problem to you? I would appreciate your response." (Mrs. Ines S. Kerch, 1918 Storm Drive, Falls Church VA 22043-1413, widow of Richard Kerch, Khe Sanh vet.)

Hi. My name is Diane and I found a copy of The Khe Sanh Veterans' Red Clay at the Vet Center in St. Petersburg, FL. I know it is last year's issue, but I found it to be the most fascinating reading I have found in a long time. I was married (many, many years ago) to a career Marine (Air Wing) and have always had a lifelong interest in the military and battle strategies. Living on Okinawa for close to three years let me study the battle up close and personal. Otherwise, I have had to keep it to Civil War sites, like Gettysburg, Chattanooga and New Market. I had great success with Dien Bien Phu when I found a survivor from the French Foreign Legion who was willing to talk to me. Language was a bit of a problem but we managed fairly well.

Khe Sanh seems a bit overwhelming at the moment, but I thought you might be able to point me in the right direction. Is there perhaps a book that you find to be an accurate account? Or do you know of someone who would be willing to email me about it? I would sincerely appreciate any help you could give me. And feel free to forward my email to anyone who could help me with this. I know this is many years too late, but no less sincere. Thank you and WELCOME HOME.

ED NOTE: "VALLEY OF DECISION" by John Prados/Ray Stubbe is an excellent choice.

By Command Sargent Major Ballogg – JTF 6

There are less than 2000 active duty military with RVN service in uniform today. All of us are senior enlisted/officers. On the eve of the fall of Saigon, I feel compelled to talk about the soldiers who served during that conflict. The barrage of misinformation about the war and who fought it is a national disgrace. For example, the B.S movies—"Rambo," "Apocalypse Now," "Deer Hunter" and "Platoon," Oliver Stone's rendition of guys in the same unit killing each other, smoking dope on patrol. The sad thing is, Oliver knew better but wants to be one of the Hollywood insiders. Some of the things portrayed in these movies did happen, as they happen in all wars, but they are portrayed as everyday occurrences in Viet Nam, as every man's experience. Why? My guess is that those in Hollywood and the media who avoided service have this need to reinforce their decision not to serve by vilifying those who did. This continued effort to disgrace those who went saddens me and makes me furious.

I am going to compare two conflicts: "The Greatest Generation" and Vietnam as a vehicle to define the RVN combat soldier. My intent is not to denigrate any other veteran but to shed some light. WWII was "The Good War," there was an evil foe bent on conquest and the destruction of the world as we knew it. Our whole society was galvanized behind the war effort. Every organization supported the war and total victory. There was every reason to fight and no excuse not to. The 60s generation and Viet Nam was the not-so-good war. The American public initially supported the war, but it was a side bar. The Reserves and National Guard were not mobilized. There was no societal effort. The goals were ambiguous and the threat undefined. The only reason to fight was a sense of service to the Nation. And yet during WWII, only 33% enlisted, 67% were drafted. Initially, only 21- to 35-year-olds were to be taken but not enough volunteers came forward, so the draft was lowered to 18.

Compare RVN 65-73: 67% enlisted and 33% were drafted. Of the draftees 10% volunteered for the draft.

In WWII during a 4 year period, there were 350,000 draft evaders. In RVN during an 8 year period there were 500,000 draft evaders. Developed to a fine art by some we know well.

WWII desertion "in the zone" Europe and Pacific theaters: 20,000 convicted prior to D-DAY. The British jails were full of US deserters who were brought to dockside in handcuffs. RVN desertion in country—250. WWII units surrendered to the enemy from Bataan to Europe. Many units with the ability to fight surrendered without one. Platoons, companies and in the case of the Battle of the Bulge, regiments with the ability to fight chose not to. RVN: not one platoon in 9 years of fighting surrendered. Some were overrun, but chose to fight to the death. LTG H. G. Moore, when revisiting his battlefield 20 some odd years later, was told by the North Vietnamese officers that they were astonished at the American soldiers "fanaticism" to fight to the end.

My unit was the 3rd squad C Company 2nd Bn 14th Infantry of the 25th Inf. Division (Tropic Lightning) or the "Electric Strawberry" as we called it, with pride. The Division fought in RVN from early 66 to late 71(?).

The Division had a little less than 17,000 assigned. During its tour the 25th had over 5,000 killed in action and just under 25,000 wounded in action. That's about twice the Divisions rolls. The 25th never lost a position to the enemy. Never had a unit overrun. Never had a soldier surrender under fire.

I am proud to have served as a grunt in RVN and have never served with finer men.

ED NOTE: Too bad Tom Brokaw doesn't read our magazine.

Dear Editor,

I've been a member since around 1991 (my name is included in the Membership Directories of 1994 and 1996). Ray Stubbe and I have corresponded for quite a number of years, and I've also exchanged correspondence with Talis Kaminskis, whose written work I greatly admire.

What initially led me to become interested in the Vietnam War itself was the POW issue. I think it was during 1989 that British television aired a documentary on the POW/MIA issue, which made an enormous impact on me, the sort of impact where you lie awake at night and can't get it out of your mind. Then about 9 months later another TV channel aired a documentary called "We Can Keep You Forever," and the evidence they put forward was so overwhelming (set against the skeptics, who also had a fair hearing in the program) that it compelled me to go out and start reading up on the issue. From then on I got swept away and read just about everything I could lay my hands on. Books on the war aren't easy to come by in the UK, but over the years I've collected around 70 books on the subject, some of which I've had imported from the US. It was this accumulated knowledge that made me want to visit Vietnam, which I did in the early 90s and since then I've been working on a writing project (a novel) set during the war.

My first ever contact with the KSV Organization was when an enquiry letter I'd sent to another vet's organization for some information was redirected to Ernie Spencer. He then responded to that letter. By pure coincidence, I had literally just finished reading Ernie's book (WELCOME TO VIETNAM MACHO MAN) which I'd picked up in a book store over here. We just struck up a regular correspondence for quite a number of years after that. At that time I was preparing to visit Vietnam, including Khe Sanh as a result of his book. Ernie asked me to write a piece on my travels for inclusion in the newsletter which I did, and, which he published (article title: "Stop the Plane I Want to Get Off"). During the early 90s Ernie was working flat out on preparing the newsletters all by himself. There was no team of editors helping to sift through and type all the submissions and prepare them for printing, etc. One day I volunteered my assistance, which fortunately for me he eventually accepted, and I think I helped him on about 3 or 4 of the newsletters. Ernie would send me a package with all the letters/articles/poems in their original format (often handwritten) and I typed them all up, sectionalized the various items, put it all onto a disk and mailed everything back to him in time for his deadline. Ernie then took over through to the final process of it going to press. When Ray took over Editorship of the newsletter, he printed an article I wrote on the Wall in issue no. 38 (Spring '97).

Ernie sounds like he's having a busy time of it at the moment—give him my regards when you next see him. Also, I hope you have a memorable visit back to Vietnam next month. It is, without doubt, the most amazing country I've ever visited and I would really love to go back some time. The poverty we saw in the south was truly humbling, both inside and outside the cities, but the southerners' friendliness was one of the major high points of the visit for me, and, alongside my visit to Khe Sanh, it's something that I'll never forget.

Sandra Hill

ED NOTE: Please see Sandra's poem about homeless Vets on page 43.

Dear Editor,

My name is Charles Kelley and I was with the 2/94th Arty on Carroll from Sep 67 to Sep 68. After looking for over a year for something on the 94th or Carroll on the Internet I finally signed in on the Khe Sanh web site asking if any one knew of Carroll or the 2/94th. I never expected the response I got from the Marines that were in the hill battles, Khe Sanh, Con Thien, Gio Linh etc.. Long story short, we now have a 94th sign-in sheet at http://www.willpete.com/2nd_battalion_94th_artillery.htm.

I have written the history of the 94th in Vietnam for 6 years. I tried to write it as a history, but also with the personal accounts of the Marines and Army personnel. The 2/94th supported from Carroll and other places along the DMZ. History is under my name on the sign-in sheet along with the 94th MIA, KIA, WIA. Not really a web site yet but we have added a few pictures.

The 94th was assigned to the 3rd MAG from Oct of 66 to 1968 when the unit fell under the newly formed 108th Arty Group. All fire missions went through the 3rd Division. After the 3rd was stood down, the 108th went under the XXIV Corps arty. The 94th did not leave until 1972.

The 94th supported most of the hill battles for 861, 861a, 881s and the KCB perimeter itself. When the KCB was being hit by NVA Arty from Laos, the 2/94th moved a couple of guns at night out to LZ Stud to shoot over into Laos, which was not in vogue at that time. The enemy was allowed a safe area. The NVA Arty was knocked out and the guns withdrew to Carroll. The 94th also tried to send four guns to Khe Sanh but the 9th Marine convoy was turned back. The higher ups had waited too long.

The Service battery at Dong Ha delivered to C/1/12th Marine Arty ammo and powder during the arty duels at Gio Linh in 67 when their supply was hit. The convoy was ambushed just out side of Gio Linh. Also the Service Battery delivered much needed supplies to Khe Sanh in the Pegasus operation, while their guns fired a corridor for the lead elements of the Marine break out as they left Ca Lu towards Khe Sanh.

I know the 25 guys that have signed in on our 94th site are very appreciative of the Marine comments in the history. Made their trip over worthwhile finally after 34 years.

The 94th was awarded a PUC by the Navy for its support of the Marines.

A Battery in 66 was sent down to Chu Li to support the 1st Marines down there.

See you in September. A couple of us are going to try and make the reunion.

I lost my youth at Khe Sanh along with so many other young marines. We were so wide-eyed and proud, and we had every right to be; we are the nation's best, as all our brothers who joined us in that battle from all services were. We left damaged, but not defeated. We left proud, yet lost in our own anonymity. We are the defenders of our country and the conscience of the future. Let all who fell there know we hold those truths and their story will be told.

Dear Editor,

Just to let you know that I received the new Red Clay today and read some of it, and so far not only so good, but so Great!

One thing of note, re: "Why Are We Here—Reunion 99" is shown as "Author Unknown." I'm the one who sent it to you. It was written by Cmdr. John "Doc" Lancaster, USN Ret. (Corpsman with E 2/26) John wrote it in honor of and read it at the Jefferson Barracks KSV Plaque Dedication Ceremony. He is a very self-effacing man, but I respectfully request that you assure he gets due credit in the next issue as well as any other use of the poem.

I understand the Ernie Spencer is on and off line. Please convey my special thanks to him for his beautiful words regarding the Echo ceremony for Joe Roble at ANC in 1998. His words and heart's recollection of this event brought it back again for me. As did the ceremony, Ernie's telling brought a lump to my throat and tears to my eyes. Since I love all these guys and this special family, for me, it was a reunion of a different sort.

Bless you all for the good stuff you do.

Dear Editor,

I was stationed in Khe Sanh in August and September in 1968. My bunker was right on highway 9. I caught malaria up there and then they pulled us out of there and sent us down south near Da Nang to guard some NVA prison camp and patrol the area. We ran into an ambush and I was shot and blown up by a land mine.

I never found out what happened to anyone after that. But maybe I might find someone who was with Gold Company, 2nd platoon in the newsletter.

Thank you,
Roger D. Hildreth

ED NOTE: What unit are you talking about? Gold Company? Boy, that's a new one on me.

Dear Editor,

My husband Richard (Dick) was diagnosed with cancer resulting from exposure to Agent Orange. Had it not been for his colleague who persuaded me to permit an autopsy, it would have been impossible to prove since Richard also suffered from another type of cancer. The cancer in his spine, which caused his hospitalization, radical treatment, and subsequent death, had settled there from an unknown origin. The results of the autopsy permitted his colleague to submit a successful claim in my behalf for DIC.

Richard was an employee of the Military Order of the Purple Heart and he was its appointed representative to the Board of Veterans' Appeals (BVA). His colleague and dear friend, Robert Rhodes was, and continues to serve, as the MOPH appointed representative to the Court of Veterans' Appeals.

I hope that this will be persuasive in convincing other wives of veterans of the benefits from having an autopsy performed, where there is reason to believe death resulted from a service connected illness.

By the way, both my husband and I come from Fond du Lac, WI, where most of our family members continue to reside.

Sincerely,
Ines S. Kerch

From mid-January through early April of 1968, I was the commanding officer of a surgical team in Khe Sanh. We were known as Charlie Med and occupied a small piece of red clay in the middle of the base just next to the airstrip. Over the years, very little has been written about Charlie Med. There were three other physicians with me, Ed Feldman, Joe Wolfe, and Donald J. Magilligan, Jr., who amazingly was listed on page five of your Spring issue in the Remembrances section. Unfortunately, the individual who submitted his name preferred to remain anonymous. There were also twenty-six corpsmen assigned to Charlie Med. During the siege, we all lived under nearly constant incoming barrages of artillery and mortar fire. One of the most difficult aspects of providing care for the Marine casualties during that siege was the need to move the wounded, after they had been stabilized and treated from the Charlie Med bunkers out to the helipad where they could be medivaced. The helicopters were always magnets for additional incoming and many of the corpsman and physicians who were wounded at Charlie Med sustained their wounds while loading and unloading choppers.

On page twelve of your Spring issue, there is a remarkable (to me) article about PFC Spicer written by Earl Clark. Jonathon Spicer was indeed a conscientious objector and was indeed assigned to me at Charlie Med. He was a very brave young man and as Earl Clark points out, he was severely wounded while moving wounded Marines to a helicopter. The corpsmen brought him back into our bunker and Don Magilligan (the same Donald J. Magilligan, Jr. mentioned on page five of your Spring issue) and I operated on Private Jonathon Spicer, repaired the hole in his heart, stabilized him and put him on the next available helicopter out of Khe Sanh. I never knew what happened to him until I saw his name on the Vietnam wall a few years ago. I was fascinated to learn from Earl Clark's article that he apparently made it to Japan but died of an infection. I do not have any verification of this but like Earl Clark, I am deeply saddened to learn that information.

PFC Jonathon Spicer was very special to all of us at Charlie Med. Even though he refused to bear arms, he was nonetheless a true hero. He constantly ran out under enemy fire to move Marine casualties with no regard whatsoever for his own personal safety. When he took a piece of shrapnel in the heart, it seemed for a little while as though all of us had been wounded. Don Magilligan and I were overjoyed when we were able to repair that heart wound and send him on his way and prayed fervently that he would survive. It was not to be.

After leaving Vietnam in September of 1968, I spent approximately thirty "quiet" years practicing surgery in the greater Philadelphia area. Aside from a close personal friendship with Ed Feldman, it seemed that there was very little other discussion about Vietnam or Khe Sanh in particular. About a year ago, things began to change. I discovered that LaSalle University here in Philadelphia has a very special Vietnam collection, which contains many volumes of poetry, books, movies, scripts and artwork all describing personal recollections of Vietnam. It is a fascinating collection, which I recommend to anyone who can get to see it.

I also became aware of the fact that there were three or four men in my age group who work in my health system who were all Vietnam vets and we now get together three or four times a year to have a beer and reminisce.

LaSalle University actually has a senior honors course devoted to discussions of Vietnam and I have been privileged to sit in on a small portion of that. It amazes me how senior college students who average about twenty-one years of age are so vitally interested in what happened in that tiny country thirty years ago. I believe that the process of vindication for all of our Vietnam veterans is happening as we speak.

The appearance of the remembrance of Don Magilligan and the article by Earl Clark on PFC Jonathon Spicer in the same issue of the Khe Sanh Veterans' Red Clay has evoked an energy that I think has been dormant for many, many years. I have started writing the history of Charlie Med in Khe Sanh. I know nothing of military strategy and less about combat statistics. I do know that the physicians and surgeons of Charlie Med cared for nearly three thousand casualties during that siege. I think it is time that their story is told.

Dear Editor,

In June 2000, Sons and Daughters In Touch celebrated its 10th anniversary as the nation's first organization formed to locate, unite and assist the children of fallen American servicemen. In the 1960s and 70s, an estimated 20,000 children lost their fathers in the Vietnam War. Today, SDIT has grown to have active members in every state, it reaches new members every day, it has an all-volunteer staff, and it has forged a lasting emotional bond with America's Veterans.

In 1990, SDIT was formed by the grown-children of two American servicemen lost in the war in Southeast Asia. In uniting these sons and daughters, SDIT was committed to honoring the legacies of their fathers; teaching the public about the true cost of war and providing educational assistance to its members. SDIT has given the United States a shining example of the resilience that this generation of young Americans offers.

SDIT celebrated its 10th anniversary by holding a four-day National Father's Day convention in Washington, DC. More than 1000 sons and daughters attended, along with an equal number of supportive military veterans. Throughout the weekend, themes of honor, respect, education and optimism were spread among attendees. In keeping with tradition, the convention culminated with the highly visible SDIT Father's Day ceremony at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial on the Capitol Mall. Should you have questions please me at 858-271-6312. Your time, attention and consideration are greatly appreciated.

From Charles Kelley

I was contacted by Paul Knight a few months ago before he made his return trip with fellow Marines to Khe Sanh. I finally met him and the others at their hotel lobby in Ho Chi Minh City (formerly Saigon) during July. Paul asked me if I could write up a short introduction about what I've been doing over here.

Like some of you, I started having a strong desire to return to Vietnam and stand on the same ground where the war existed many years ago (I was a Seabee). I came back over two years ago and after I updated some of my personal memories and sorted things out as best I could, I decided I wanted to do something for the kids in need over here. After a lot of thinking, planning, and effort SEACAP (S.E. Asian Children's Assistance Project) was born. SEACAP was registered in the State of Washington as a non-profit corporation in April, 1999. We are also an IRS, tax-exempt 501 (c)(3) organization. If any of you have access to the Internet you can view our website at www.seacap.org

I spend most of my time here in Vietnam with a few folks holding down the fort back in Ellensburg, WA. We have several Vietnamese volunteers helping out here; I couldn't do it without their big-hearted assistance.

Our main project is near Can Gio, just across the bay, to the west from Vung Tau. We are taking care of all the basic needs of over 65 poor kids there, over 20 are orphans. These kids come from very poor and isolated homes out in the mangrove swamps in this tidal marsh area. The kids spend weeks at a time at the shelter because it is too difficult and time consuming to get them home on a regular basis. We've been helping these kids since September, 1999. They are very respectful and actually bow to older visitors (you would be hard-pressed to find that in the U.S.). They're good kids and we are doing our best to give them a helping hand to succeed in life.

They all work together like a big family, several are brothers and sisters from the same family. Because they spend so much time together-even if they are not related—they tend to teach and help the younger ones whenever there's a need.

We have several other projects going. If any of you would like to help us out financially or if you are coming back to Vietnam for your first time, here is the contact information:

SEACAP News and Updates

Sometimes we can make a very big difference in someone's life for a small amount of money. Here's Oanh's report:

Thanh (our volunteer SEACAP Project Manager) and her group of volunteer university students have started a new project to assist older children, 14 years and above, with vocational training and other supplemental needs. The volunteers (some with a solid background of social work) will approach street children in the evenings with advice and assistance. These young people will be given directions to first-aid stations, free hospital care, contacts for safe shelter and protection when needed and many other basic needs. The primary goal is to find young people who are genuinely striving for a better life and are stuck in a cycle of poverty and sometimes a dangerous life on the street.

After years of social work and teaching experience, Ms.Thanh is very good at interviewing these young people to determine their most important and pressing needs, and their particular circumstances (how they came to be in a difficult situation). Thanh is also skilled at understanding the attitude and intent of the young person in need and their determination to work for a better life, and follows up on their progress.

Here is an example of how this program works. Two sisters, aged 14 and 17 were struggling to go to school and also work part-time. They had virtually nothing. They were selling lottery tickets on the streets (a very common practice here to make a little money, it is considered respectable compared to some alternatives). They had no transportation in this city of millions. One of the girls said "she did not even dare to dream of a bicycle." When Thanh was able to present them with a new bicycle she must have looked like an angel as she handed the "miracle gift" to them. The poor girls were shaken by emotion when they first touched the bicycle. And you know how much it cost SEACAP? About US$22.

We will keep track of their school records and as they make progress we will be helping them more, especially for this coming school year-starting in September. SEACAP will not cover full expenses, they will have to work to earn their way—but we will cover what they cannot afford. It is our policy to help the young people to achieve independence without them knowing too much about our "safety net" in the background.

Others are being helped by this new project; the two sisters are only the beginning. Ms. Thanh has also assisted a young lady in a similar situation with a good, used sewing machine that allows the girl to earn extra money by doing part-time sewing and tailoring work. Additionally, Ms. Thanh has found a very inexpensive room for five young men (older boys) all about 17 years old (the older kids about 14 years old and up tend to "fall through the cracks" of the charitable support systems, because they are no longer cute little kids and are transitioning into adulthood.) These five teenagers are working hard with their studies and vocational training. They are close to making it on their own, but they had need of a safe place to live. The room costs 300,000 VN Dong, about US$22 per month. They sleep on mats on the floor, cook in their room, and share bathroom facilities with a few other families. But they are safe and are progressing toward living independently and becoming contributors to their society. More about them later.

EDITOR'S NOTE: In the last week or two the older sister (of the two who received the bicycle) applied for and was interviewed for a job at a well known local hotel. She was accepted for the position. This was a major step forward—we were all very pleased to hear about her successful transition to a "regular" job. It is exciting to have such a positive impact on the lives of these young people—for so little money. Thanks for this report, Oanh.

Update on Thao's Progress:

Many of you are aware of little Thao's story. During October of last year, about ten months ago, he was found near Can Gio close to death and had lost both his parents. Ms.Thanh and Ms.Oanh intervened and brought him up to a hospital in Ho Chi Minh City. Since that time he had had several ups and downs in his short life. He was placed in a government boarding school and had recurring severe health problems. I will only say that it was extremely difficult for him and many days he would have preferred not to live any longer.

I am happy to report that he has been out of that "school" thanks to the diligent efforts of Ms. Thanh and others. He is living with his new foster family, Mr. Xe and Mrs. Nam. They have one child of their own, a daughter, and are proving to be just what Thao needed. They love him, have nursed him back to health and Mrs. Nam's renowned cooking is putting some weight on his young bones. I saw him a few days ago at their little home. You can see life in his face now, a little sparkle in his eyes, and a shy smile. In the recent past—during his severe ordeal of losing both parents, and nearly dying on more than one occasion—he had a "thousand-mile stare." He had a blank, hopeless, and lifeless look, as if he were just waiting to die and be released from the emotional and physical pain of life. NOW he is alive and thriving! What a change! His hair is even beginning to grow out and his skin disease is nearly cleared up. He is making excellent progress with the love and care of his new family. A BIG THANKS to all of you who have shown an interest in this boy's life and progress.

Handicapped Swimming

by Joseph Olszewski,
Golf, 2/26 Third Platoon Commander

Being a below-the-knee amputee is generally not a serious mobility problem. I've written previous articles about playing handball, running 10Ks and going on hikes. However, there's one sport where being a leg amputee is a problem, swimming. While you can have a prosthesis with a fin attachment made for swimming, they are expensive (typical below-the-knee prosthesis will cost between $2,500 to $5,000) and I don't believe Uncle Sam will pay for one for veterans. When you swim without a prosthesis and with just your stump, it's similar to rowing a boat with one oar and not switching the oar to either side of the boat. In other words, you start to drift to the side of the amputation. In my case, me left foot was amputated and, therefore, as I swim I start drifting to my left. In open water this is not a major problem. Where it is a problem is in swimming pools, particularly those you find in health clubs with those floating lane dividers. When I swim in one of those I can never make it from one end of the pool to the other without hitting one of those dividers or turning over and swimming on my back to compensate for the drift. It's a great sight for bystanders to see me flipping from my stomach to my back and zigzagging my way through a swimming lane. Once in Hawaii, I swam the Maui surf late at night so nobody would see me taking off my prosthesis and jumping into the surf. The problem with swimming in Hawaii is that the surf and undercurrents are so strong that it's difficult to stay in open water. The surf just tosses you back on the beach and, in my case, it's hard to stand up on one leg and get out of the water. The few times I've tried this I had my wife holding my prosthesis and running up and down the beach to meet me when I run out of water to swim in. This is another great scene to watch and I'm telling you only a great wife like mine would put up with this.

Cedar Point Foundation

The Cedar Point Foundation was established for the funding and provision of medical, educational and other humanitarian assistance to the Bru Montagnard tribesmen of Vietnam.

Our objectives are to provide medical assistance, agricultural aid and improvements on educational facilities and opportunities to improve their quality of life.

The Cedar Point Foundation raises funds by various means including grants, foundation and individual support and periodic fund-raising activities.

The Cedar Point Foundation continues to provide the Bru with assistance as we have in the past; improving water production, increasing farming efficiency, expanding educational programs and continuing to work with the Huong Hoa Health Center.

In January, I contacted by email a Vietnamese man named Doan Quang Hien, who lived in Saigon and had contacts with the security police. It was at this time that he suggested that we send him and his friend, Nguyen Van Hoai, whose father was connected with the Quang Tri Province government, up to Dong Ha during the Tet holiday to present some gifts and make clear our plans for our upcoming trip. Hien emailed me an itinerary which we approved and he was given the go ahead to begin negotiations on our plans.

Within a month I had received my visa approval number and a tentative okay to prepare to make the trip. Reservations were made on Korean Airlines and letters were sent out to members on our mailing list requesting donations. One week before we departed, Cedar Point sent me a check for $6,000 USD. This was the usable amount that we had collected since trip number 8 in 1999.

David "Bulldog" Smith and I departed JFK International Airport, New York, New York on 14 March 2000 aboard Korean Airlines to Seoul, Korea. The Boeing 747-400 was only half full so we had 3 seats each to stretch out on for the long 16-hour flight. In Seoul there was a 2-hour layover before our flight to Ho Chi Minh City (Saigon), Vietnam. This leg of the journey was on an Airbus A320, which took a little over 5 hours.

We arrived at Saigon's Tan San Nhut Airport at 11:45 PM. Over the past few years the Vietnamese have been continuing to improve this airport. On this trip the big change was that there are now jetways to serve the international flights. Gone are the days of deplaning the aircraft, getting on buses and then getting off the bus after a one minute trip. The terminal building is now air-conditioned and there is a new security checkpoint that will be opening shortly. Our friend Nguyen Van Loi met us outside the terminal building and we were soon on our way to Mogambo's, a mini hotel operated by Lani and Mike Ahlmark, at 20 Thi Sach, in District On the 20th of March David "Bulldog" Smith and I flew on Vietnam Airlines from Saigon to the Hue/Phu Bai airport. Our Fokker 70 was one of two owned and operated by the airlines. The twin-engine jet aircraft was full for the flight, which lasted one hour and twenty minutes. We were met at the terminal entrance by Doan Kim Cuong, who was to be our driver for the next six days. In Saigon we had called Hue and contracted to rent a van from the same company that we used last year, ATC. From the airport at Phu Bai we drove past the old FOB-1 compound and drove to Dong Ha in Quang Tri Province. The trip took two and a half hours traveling up Highway One. We departed Dong Ha early in the morning and headed west on Highway 9. Construction on the new and improved road is completed on the Eastern part of the road. From Dong Ha to Cam Lo the road is almost 4 lanes wide. From Cam Lo to Khe Sanh the road narrows to 2 lanes. Shoulder work is still being improved however all the bridges and curve straightening has been completed. The stretch from Khe Sanh to Lang Vei has not been worked on lately. The rest of the road from Lang Vei to the border post of Lao Bao was unobserved, as the area is closed to foreigners.

We arrived in Khe Sanh approximately 12 noon on Tuesday, March 21, 2000 from Dong Ha. A construction boom was continuing with new buildings going up throughout the town. A very large cultural building had just been completed and a new district headquarters building was in the middle of being constructed. Most if not all of the work were government buildings.

There is only one place to stay over night in Khe Sanh now and that is the government guesthouse that has been there since our earliest trip in 1992. There are nine rooms that have ceiling fans. The rooms are small but adequate. After checking in, Hien called the People's Committee for Huong Hoa District to set up a meeting for us. We were asked to come over to the office where we met with Secretary Thanh of the People's Committee for Huong Hoa District (Khe Sanh). We outlined our proposal after which he agreed to set up a meeting on Wednesday with the People's Committee of Huong Hoa's Vice Chairman, Nguyen Thi Ninh.

Wednesday's 9 AM meeting was attended by Nguyen Thi Ninh, Vice Chairman of the People's Committee of Huong Hoa; Vo Thanh, Deputy Chief of Office of the People's Committee; Phan Trong Dai, Vice Chairman of the People's Committee for Tan Lien village; Ho Vi, Assistant Leader for the Bru community of Thon Cheng. In addition, Doan Quang Hien, Coordinator for this trip, Nguyen Van Hoai, son of influential government official in Quang Tri Province; Nguyen Van Loi, volunteer assistant; David "Bulldog" Smith and Bob Donoghue.

Presented during this meeting was our proposal to provide the following financial assistance to the Bru community of Thon Cheng and the Huong Hoa Health Center: $1,000 USD for coffee tree seedlings; $1,000 USD for hospital equipment (10 blood pressure cuffs, stethoscopes, and a microscope); $3,000 USD for house repairs Thon Cheng; $350 USD for school equipment; $60 USD for volleyball equipment and 10 uniforms; $25 USD for school supplies (paper, pens).

Madam Chairman Ninh accepted our assistance. We also presented two sets of blood pressure cuffs designed especially for children along with a stethoscope with each kit. We discussed getting approval and how best to carry out these trips.

During our discussion for continuing our assistance to the Bru, Madam Chairman Ninh stated that there were 14 Bru communities within Huong Hoa District and that they all were in need of various types of assistance. She also felt that if only we assisted Thon Cheng there would develop bad feelings within the different communities, as their standard of living would rise while others stayed stagnant. We agreed with her and pointed out that we were trying hard to increase our fund raising efforts and that with the Committee's guidance we would gladly help any community that need our help. We also pointed out that if the district gives us a "Request for Assistance" that it would help with obtaining visas and getting supplies and equipment through customs. She agreed to work with the province in trying to obtain that document for us.

Xa Lun

In the Bru community of Thon Cheng lives Ho Xa Lun. She is the 16-year-old daughter of Ho Tu, who was my interpreter/squad leader at Khe Sanh in 1968. It was during our 1996 trip that it was brought to our attention that she was having medical problems. She was complaining of dizziness, headaches, and ear problems. Robert Shippen and Bruce Johnston, both ex-Special Forces medics, examined her in '96 but without proper equipment they could not make a proper diagnosis. Now, four years later she is still having the same problems. Last year after only a few months of being married her husband returned her to her family because he didn't want a sick wife on his hands. This brought dishonor to their family. To have her properly examined she needs to travel to Hue where there is a large hospital with all the necessary equipment to examine her. The cost for her and her father to travel by bus to Hue stay in Hue for a week, and the week long stay at the hospital while they conduct all the tests is expected to cost up to $1,000 USD. It has been decided to fund this with leftover money from trip number 8 and hope that we can put some closure to the episode.

During a lull in our meetings with the government officials we decided to visit the old site of the Special Forces camp at Lang Vei (A-101). On the South side of Highway 9, about 5 kilometers from Khe Sanh, The Vietnamese have recently added a small monument there that has a PT-76 tank located on the top. Most of the site is now covered with banana trees. While taking pictures of the tank, three Bru children approached us on their bicycles. They told us that they lived in the Bru community of Lang Vei and that their families were living there in 1968, relocated to Cua valley (Mai Loc) by Special Forces during the siege, and then resettled back to Lang Vei after the war. This is one of the 14 communities that we have been asked to help.

The old Khe Sanh Combat Base has had a few changes since we last visited there. A new monument has replaced the frequently vandalized old one. A small building now houses a little museum, which has pictures on the walls and two small piles of weapons on the floor. Outside there are several beat up pieces of military equipment. An M-48 tank, 155 MM howitzer and the propeller from a C-130.

Cedar Point Foundation was contacted by Command Sergeant Major (CSM) Dennis Thompson, (1968 Lang Vei) POW 61 months, to see if we would be able to assist him in his desire to return to Lang Vei and visit the POW sites where he was held.. Charles Berg contacted Jim Hetrick (MSG-SOG OP 35 & 34) (1966 to 1972) for his return visit to Khe Sanh also.

CSM Thompson was returned to US Army control with the other POWs and after the necessary medical processing set about to restart his military career. He attended college to get his degree and then went back into the military school system to "catch up" and after all the standard schools, attended US Army Ranger School and was the first former POW to attend and complete the school. After his completion and attendance at the Sergeant Majors Academy he was assigned to 2nd BN, 75th Ranger Regiment and became 1st SGT HHC, then, CSM before retiring. Dennis spent many long nights on the email discussing his return trip with both Charles Berg and Jim Hetrick.

The trip started in Saigon and went to Hanoi and visited the "Hanoi Hilton" and the "Plantation" and a full day trip to locate the camp at Dao Tru (Farnsworth) (D-'1). The lodging arrangements were made via a friend in California and they stayed at the Hanoi Towers ($350.00 per night) and it was like a bit of America. Incidentally, the luxury facilities are located on the old grounds of the "Hanoi Hilton" and a bit of the old POW compound remains as a museum. Dennis Thompson and Jim Hetrick were clearly grateful, for the assistance of Cedar Point Foundation for the logistical coordination.

Everyone returned to the village of Khe Sanh and Lang Vei for the emotional returning to the site of his point of capture by CSM Thompson. Jim Hetrick's last trip to Khe Sanh was in 1968 and everyone was amazed at the physical, social and cultural changes in the area. Charles Berg reported that the return trip was as fulfilling as the initial trip with Cedar Point Foundation, and felt that this was a unique opportunity for CPF to provide assistance to a fellow warrior that experienced the trauma of Khe Sanh and Lang Vie.

We rose early on Friday and packed our bags and loaded the van in preparation for our departure from Khe Sanh. In the Guest House office we paid our lodging bill and our passports were returned to us. At 08:00AM we arrived at the People's Committee building to inform them that we were leaving and to leave word with Madam Chairman Ninh that we would call her from Saigon referencing our contract paperwork. Our last stop before heading down Highway 9 was to say goodbye to Miss Mai, the lady that had lost her legs in 1968. We gave her $100 and told her to continue to help the Bru who stop at her shop but might be a little short of cash. She promised to provide assistance this she can and to write Loi in Saigon regularly to keep him informed. With that task done we all got in the van and headed east, to Dong Ha. We arrived in Dong Ha about an hour and a half after leaving Khe Sanh. After we dropped Hoai off at his parent's house, the driver gassed up the van for our 2-hour plus drive to the Imperial City of Hue.

Immediately upon returning to Saigon we set up a meeting with PACCOM and also contacted the US Embassy to inform them of our progress. Charles Ray, the Consul General in Saigon was out of the country so we emailed a report to Hanoi and agreed to send copies of the trip report to those whom we are in contact with.

On Monday afternoon we had a meeting with the People's Aid Coordinating Committee (PACCOM). Their Project Coordinator at the Saigon office is Mai Phuc Tien. Tien had accompanied us on our 1998 trip to Khe Sanh to inspect our projects and assist in obtaining NGO status.

The next day we meet with Hien again to outline our goals for the next trip and to try and clear up some of the barriers that we kept running into with the security police. In addition we had a critique of the trip and reviewed every detail to see where we could improve our performance for later trips.

The final task that had to be done before leaving Vietnam was to deliver a package to a family in Nha Trang, whose son lives in Springfield, Massachusetts. In addition, since Dennis Thompson, Jim Hetrick and Charles Berg would be returning to Nha Trang from their trip to Kontum, we all decided to meet again. Loi and I took Vietnam Airlines, on the afternoon of Thursday, March 30th. The ATR 72 turboprop was one of 6 owned by the airline. The flight from Saigon to Nha Trang took about an hour. After landing and collecting our bags we headed over to the Sailing Club at 72-74 Tran Phu where we met with Charles and the others.

On Sunday afternoon, David "Bulldog" Smith, Charles Berg, and I decided that we would spend the afternoon in Charles' hotel room at the Saigon Hotel working on part of this trip report. During this work period there was a knock on the door, which Charles answered. It was the maid that was assigned to Charley's room. She was frantic as she tried to explain in broken English and Vietnamese that she had lost some of Charley's laundry. She explained that she had searched the entire floor of the hotel and the laundry room looking for the lost clothing items. She continued to explain that she had lost or misplaced one of Charley's socks. It was at this time that Charles explained that since he only has one leg that he would only have one sock. The maid looked down at Charley's leg and then a sign of relief swept across her face. David and I were laughing so hard we had to sit down.

This trip was a lot more rewarding than last year's. For one, the Vietnamese government, especially in Khe Sanh, seemed a lot more appreciative of our assistance. That made it easier to sit through numerous meetings and lengthy negotiations. Being able to assist Dennis Thompson and Jim Hetrick return to Vietnam for the first time since the war and to share their adventurous experience with them was priceless.

Cedar Point's Vietnamese contacts are continuing to work with the People's Committee of Huong Hoa District and Quang Tri Province to get a 3 year contract signed that would allow us easier access into the 14 Bru communities and government approval to continue with our projects. Fund rasing for this phase has already begun. In addition, Cedar Point has put into place a plan to obtain a large shipping container that will be filled with medical equipment and supplies in Detroit and shipped from the West Coast to Da Nang harbor in Vietnam. The ocean-going transportation is being paid for by an NGO in Hanoi called Counterparts.

A letter from Talis to Ray Stubbe written in 1993

Dear Ray,

A short letter to cover the enclosed writing I am sending you. For a long, long time, it has been within me, unable to put down in words the images that are its background. I have talked to "Charlie" quite a bit over the years. Some of it I know comes from a guilt trip but part of it, too, I feel comes from what it all represents. It was the end of an era for me, and the beginning of another age. One in which I would struggle just as hard to sort out all the confusion and questions. It is awfully easy to say I saw death, or, I experienced the violence of it. To proclaim that one is a veteran of war. To be knowledgeable of the whims of battle. But, too often many of us let it end there. We hide behind the pain and anger of it. Not willing to take that one anguish filled giant step that will begin the very slow ascent into not just being veterans of it, but being veterans of what it means to us; our comrades; our whole way of life. We are scared, and deservedly so, of the process of transfusion from that old to our new selves. Unresolved conflicts, personal in nature, litter the domain of our inner beings. To reach them, we must sort through so much "clutter"—much of it that we wish better left undisturbed. Disturbing them disturbs us. Causing much mental turmoil in the process. We are forced to relive much that we thought we had left behind. Unfortunately, many times it is the down side and not the upside that is remembered.

The overwhelming nature of war is thus. Even the happy times with a lost comrade, are translated into sadness. His passing seems to have cast a pall of gray over all that is related to him. And yet, it should not be so. This is the clutter, the mayhem, the relegated trash that must be sorted through. The good times were good. The happy times were happy. The laughter genuine and real. A treasure of sharing and bonding. We must not let the loss offset or overburden that. We cannot surrender to war's circumstances the true memories and experiences of it. They are buried; buried deep and buried strong. We have a fear that somehow if we consider what happens good, then we are letting those who did not come back, down. But those of us who came back, we must force ourselves to suffer a little more. Overcome the hurdle, take the initiative to start a new push. Learn and grow from the tears of the heart. No greater pain is there, than the pain of the soul. No greater love is there, than the love from that pain. The bonds of war are like a marriage—"till death do us part." And many times that is the way of those who do battle. But parting should not mean separation. Physically the loss is there, but in the mind, there is so much new source of inspiration, that separation need never occur. Most of those who I saw in their final stillness, I never knew, nor ever will I. Most were not combatants, but civilians whose presence in a war zone was the only reason that that was their home. Age, sex, religion, meant very little. The NVA and Viet Cong occupy the same niche in my being that Marines do. War's effects bring great equality to all those that suffer. This past weekend I watched a special on the Beirut bombing that caused a cynical smile to cross my being. The act of driving a truck loaded with 8 tons of TNT into the Marine Barracks was continually referred to as a terrorist act. My mind went back to the continual bombing from high altitudes by B-52's in and around Khe Sanh. Perception and so-called patriotism, provide how you perceive each action. To me there is no difference. Whether 241 Marines died, or 8000 Bru, they died needlessly. Victims of indifference on the part of those who could make a difference. And that is a role I see for a lot of us who have survived war. If we look to the real meaning war has left within us, are willing to endure the pain to let others know, then all of us can make some minute difference. Over the course of generations, the minuteness might grow, so that one day it will overwhelm those who have not learned, and refuse to learn, and the world will live in peace.

I should have known better when I sat down just to add a few personal notes to the enclosed writings. The mind is unpredictable, and sometimes just doesn't know when to stop. Thanks for letting me unload on you. I do not mean to cause you any pain by it. The world of thought can be a very lonely world at times, and it helps when there is someone who it can be shared with. Makes the endurance a mite easier.

First Cavalry Troopers Steal Flag from Khe Sanh

I remember the first time I landed at Khe Sanh during the siege. I contacted the Tower (actually a man with a radio in a hole in the ground) and received clearance to land and refuel. As we started to refuel the enemy started walking mortars towards us. I started to depart, calling the tower and got the reply, "YES, EVERYTIME ONE OF YOU ASS-HOLES FLIES IN HERE, THEY START SHELLING US."

I replied, "You could've said something else, THIS IS MY FIRST TIME HERE."

B Company of the 229th AHB 1st CAV Division (Killer Spade) had been tasked to supply helicopter support to Special Forces (actually SOG) at Khe Sanh. The mission required two lift ships, one to do the mission and the second to rescue the first. Two gun ships would supply close gun cover during the missions. These were usually from D Company/ 229th (Smiling Tigers) but were sometimes from other units. The missions were usually to insert and/or extract six man teams into and out of Laos.

Shortly after the Khe Sanh Combat Base had been vacated, I arrived at the relocated Special Forces camp for a SOG Mission. A Special Forces captain informed me that the scheduled mission was canceled but that the NVA were flying their flag off the main flag pole at the former Khe Sanh Combat Base and then added. "What do you think of that?" Naturally, we would task ourselves with a new, self-appointed mission to "capture the flag." I was happy to be flying this day with a good pilot, Mike LaPierre. He was a new pilot and as he was flying enroute I would roll up the chart and hit him about the head to simulate stress. In the chase ship was another new pilot, Bob Hicks, who later became the unit safety officer. For some reason, we seemed to always have a high turnover rate for these missions.

Our gun team was Two Cobra AII-1G attack helicopters from the Smiling Tigers. As we approached Khe Sanh we could see the NVA flag. The gun ships started firing rockets, then 40 mm grenades hoping to destroy or detonate any booby traps. Unexploded ordnance could be seen lying on the ground. As we came closer, we started to orbit around the flag with our door gunners spraying the area with M-60 and the Cobras spraying miniguns. Just as I was about to nuke my move for the flag, My wing man broke the orbit first and hovered next to the flag. One of his door gunners reached out and wrapping the flag around his arm, pulled the flag from the pole with a sharp tug. I immediately thought of "trip wire." I pulled in full power trying to put some distance between us and the upcoming explosion. No explosion came and we made it back to the Special Forces Camp with our Prize.

I am very proud to have flown into and out of Khe Sanh during the siege and to have helped in some way the many brave individuals who gave so much in the service of our country.

South Vietnam

Enemy contacts in the Khe Sanh area, 58 miles west of Hue, have increased and the intensity of the fighting appears to be increasing. US Marines engaged an enemy force near Hill 881, seven miles northwest of Khe Sanh and Marine reaction forces; moving toward the area of contact, engaged another enemy force. There was intermittent fighting for about four hours. The Marines killed 103 of the enemy while losing one Marine killed and 22 wounded.

In another sector of Khe Sanh, a US Army Special Forces patrol observed 30 to 35 enemy in a stream and called for artillery fire which resulted, in 10 enemy killed.

Yesterday a Popular Force platoon made contact with an estimated 200 enemy employing small arms and automatic weapons fire about 40 miles north-northwest of Hue. The Popular Forces were reinforced by an ARVN battalion and US Marines in amphibious tractors. Friendly casualties were five killed (2 Marines and 3 ARVN) and 28 wounded (17 Marines and 11 ARVN). The enemy lost 123 killed.

In Operation Saratoga, 18 miles north-northwest of Saigon, a US Army battalion received small arms, automatic rifle and rocket fire from an enemy force. Artillery and armed helicopters supported the friendly force and the enemy broke contact. Eight US were killed and 15 wounded. Enemy losses are unknown.

In Operation Mac Arthur, nine miles west of Dak To, two US Army companies made contact with an enemy force using recoilless rifle and mortar fire. Friendly forces were supported by artillery and tactical air strikes. Twenty-one of the enemy were killed and 26 US Army personnel were wounded.

North Vietnam

US Tactical aircraft flew 123 sorties over North Vietnam yesterday. Due to poor weather in the target areas, the strikes of special interest scheduled for last night were cancelled:

One US Air Force F-4C on an armed reconnaissance mission was downed by suspected ground fire approximately 15 miles north-northwest of Dong Ho. No chutes were sighted but search and rescue is in progress.

A US Marine A4E aircraft was downed by ground fire near Khe Sanh while flying close air support. The pilot has been picked up and is reported in good condition.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

Monday, January 22, 1968
6:30 AM

South Vietnam

Sharp fighting broke out near both ends of the DMZ over the weekend, with the heaviest action taking place around Khe Sanh.

On Saturday a US Marine rifle company in a defensive position on Hill 861 near Khe Sanh came under attack by an estimated 300-man enemy force. The enemy attack was repulsed, but sporadic enemy fire continued for about 12 hours. Fourteen enemy were killed during this action.

At about the same time the Khe Sanh combat base received a mortar attack. Enemy mortar fire continued for about seven hours. The ammunition dump was hit, but the extent of damage is presently not known. The airstrip was also cratered and one helicopter was destroyed and five others received damage. Repair of the airstrip is underway and at least 2000 feet is serviceable.

Then early yesterday morning the enemy began probing the perimeter wire defenses to the south and west of the Khe Sanh airstrip. A Marine rifle company in a defensive position in the area repulsed the attack, killing 14 of the enemy. Marine losses for these actions were 14 killed and 43 wounded.

US Marine aircraft flew 211 sorties in support of the base, accounting for 104 enemy killed.

We have just received a cable from Gen. Westmoreland giving his assessment of the situation at Khe Sanh and the actions he is taking to meet the enemy threat—cable attached.

On Saturday morning, a South Vietnamese sub sector headquarters seven miles southwest of Khe Sanh came under an enemy ground attack. During the attack 12 ARVN were killed and 25 wounded. The enemy lost 92 killed in this battle.

North Vietnam

US pilots flew 175 sorties over North Vietnam yesterday but poor weather hampered operations. No major targets were struck nor were any aircraft lost.

Civilians are being evacuated from the village of Khe Sanh: 412 have been air-lifted to Da Nang; 300 to the refugee center at Camp Evans, 16 miles west-northwest of Hue; and 400 to Quang Tri City.

A US Marine battalion near Con Thien received 100 rounds of mortar fire and at the same time one-mile north two Marine companies made contact with the enemy. After a brief fight the enemy withdrew leaving 3 killed. Marine casualties were 4 killed and 32 wounded.

A US Army company made contact with an enemy force 25 miles northwest of Saigon. After one hour of fighting the enemy withdrew leaving 12 dead. Two US Soldiers were wounded.

An observation post 10 miles west-northwest of Can Tho was attacked by the enemy using small arms and 82mm mortar fire. At the same time the district town of Phong Phu received 20 rounds of 82mm mortar fire. One ARVN was kille: and nine were wounded.

A US Marine F-4B aircraft was shot down by ground fire near Khe Sanh. Both crew members were recovered in good condition. Also an A-4E was hit by ground fire in the same area and the pilot landed inside the defense perimeter.

North Vietnam

Air activity over North Vietnam yesterday was limited to 148 sorties due to adverse weather. All Rolling Thunder strikes scheduled for last night were cancelled due to poor weather in the target area.

The Rats of Khe Sanh

by Bob Donoghue, FOB-3

As 1968 began to unfold, SOG's Forward Operating Base #3 (FOB-3) located on the Southeastern perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, began to switch from offensive to defensive operations. As the enemy intensified their indirect fire into the base, more and more time and effort was spent digging and building extensive trench and bunker complexes. Constructed of sandbags, lumber, and aluminum pallets these semi-subterranean complexes soon became home to two kinds of rats. Two-legged fatigue-wearing men known as bunker rats and the four-legged hairy rodents known as "The Rats of Khe Sanh."

Khe Sanh's rats lived in the sandbagged bunker structures feeding off the remains of food found inside discarded C ration cans. As nighttime approached they would emerge from their nests to scurry about the area. Anyone trying to get some sleep at one time or another, had one of these critters run across their body. During this time period several people were bitten and had to undergo an extremely painful series of rabies shots.

The tide slowly turned against these rats due to the deteriorating weather conditions and the North Vietnamese Army. The only way to supply the troops with food and ammunition was by parachute drops. After several days of heavy enemy fire and lousy flying weather, the resupply drops tapered off creating a shortage of rations.

Our indigenous troops, the Bru montagnards, soon devised a plan to supplement their meager rations. First, they would take a small individual equipment net and stretch it across the bottom half of a trench. They would then have two other men start beating on the bunker sandbags with pieces of 2x4's. The rats, being startled by the banging, would scurry out of the bunker and down the trench line only to be entangled within the net. A short time later the Bru would be heating up the water in a #10 can with pieces of C-4 explosive and throwing the captured rats into the can to cook them. These Khe Sanh rodents provided fine dining at a time when rations were limited. As the siege progressed it became harder and harder for the Bru to find these fine tasting rodents.

Dave "Doc" Steinberg
3rd Plt. India 3/26
Hill 881S Jan-May 1968

I enlisted in my junior year of college and joined the U.S. Navy, as my father did in WWII. I was named after his brother 1st Lt. David Steinberg USMCR, assigned to 1/13 as a spotter pilot and based off the USS Saratoga. He was high in the sky spotting for his troops all through Days 1 & 2 of the Invasion of Iwo Jima.

At the end of Day 2 he was to land on the carrier Saratoga but could not land due to a Kamikaze hit on the deck of the grand ole' lady. Instead he safely landed on the smaller carrier the USS Bismark Sea. The planes were quickly taken below still fueled and armed, to make way for additional craft off the burning Saratoga.

My Uncle David Steinberg was lost that day as the Bismark Sea took a direct Kamikaze hit mid-ship and sunk with many souls aboard. His remains lost at sea. His name-sake joined the Navy and ended-up on another Hill, this one called 881S. I survived the entire siege with him looking down from the heavens, which it seemed sometime those of us on that 3,000 foot high hill could just reach out and touch.

And by the way, the brave weapons platoon assigned to 3/26 on Hill 881S, manning the 3 105's and the mortars, were from 1/13, the same unit my Uncle Dave served with so many years before.

2nd Bn 94th Arty

The 2nd Battalion 94th Artillery arrived in Vietnam on 18 October 1966 and was under operational control of the Third Marine Amphibious Group. The 2/94th provided artillery support for the Third Marine Operations from Laos to the South China Sea.

Article from USARV-IO: Camp J.J. Carroll, U.S. Marines are fighting three North Vietnamese Army (NVA) divisions in Quang Tri Province with the aid of the Army's 175mm guns.

This camp, just six miles from the demilitarized zone (DMZ), is the base for the big guns of the 2nd Battalion 94th Artillery. Since the battalion fired the first rounds on Oct. 21, 1966, over 70,000 projectiles have been fired.

The artillery unit is the only Army unit of its type supporting the Marines. All fire missions in the area go through the 3rd Marine Division.

The battalion including Operations Hastings and Prairie and the recent fighting in the DMZ has supported ten Marine operations.

The 175's move around the province so that their 22 mile range can support the Marines, Special Forces, or the Army of the Republic of Vietnam (ARVN) as they are needed.

Batteries have gone to Con Thien and Gio Linh to fire deeper into North Vietnam.

The big guns have fired across the DMZ since February 22. The targets are given by forward observers in Bird Dog spotter planes flown by Army, Marine, or Air Force pilots and by ground combat forward air controllers assigned to the line companies. Targets have been SAM missile sites, anti-aircraft emplacements, staging and assembly areas of troops, and convoys.

Information Office, US Army Vietnam: "U.S. Army Units in Vietnam Back the Marines with Action. The artillery men of these units along the DMZ don't talk much about how they live in mud-filled bunkers and brave the incoming rocket and artillery rounds. They are too busy keeping the enemy busy ducking the shells and small arms fire they throw at him day after day." Actual accounts from Marines on 861A report that an undersized company of the 26th Marines (E/3/26) had not been set up long enough to have their defenses the way they wanted them to be. Early in February 1968, about 3:30 AM, two battalions of NVA regulars contested the Marines for the hill. 175mm supporting fire was called in immediately and continued until 7:00 AM. The 175mm fire support broke up the attacking Battalion and in the words of one of the Marines describing the action stated, "A bunch of pissed off young Marines took care of the rest." In addition to the attacking battalion the Marine FO then turned the fire to the reserve battalion of NVA and all but destroyed them. This combination of devastating 175mm fire support and bravery of the young Marines on 861A preserved the integrity of the hill so important to the defense of Hill 881N and Hill 881S and the Khe Sanh Combat Base. If 861 and 861A had fallen this would have left both 881 hills totally isolated.

A Marine FO from Kilo/3/26: Actual account about 861 and the 175's from Carroll is as follows: On 18 or 19 January 1968 (a day or two before the siege started) my Commanding Officer asked/ordered me to register targets in the ravines and likely approaches around 861. I registered and got target numbers from the 105's, 155's and the 8 inch guns at the base. In addition, I registered some targets on the northern slope of 861 using the 175's at Carroll. To this day, I still remember their call sign Colorado 1/9 and I never did speak directly to them because of the distance 18+ miles. My words and theirs were relayed from the base.

We got all friendlies out of the northern end of the trench line and then I registered the targets. Must have been three or four targets in all. In each case, the final rounds hit less than 50 meters outside our last strand of wire and that's when I cease fired and asked for Target Numbers. Man, those bad boys certainly crunched into the hillside less than 75 yards from my position! I knew the rounds were on the way from the "shot" and "splash" calls, but they still made my teeth rattle.

They fired in support of us again on the night of 20 or 21 January 1968 and I remember 861A using the 2/94th in that early February NVA attack. One night in mid to late March, the NVA launched rocket after rocket into the base. These 122's were fired from behind 881N and they had to travel almost directly over 861 on their way to the base. I called Colorado 1/9 (through the relay) and gave them the grid squares of the two launch sites behind 881N. My request was that they saturate both grid squares in order to stop this huge, on-going barrage. These grid squares were 1000's of meters from us and would have been max range for the 175's but I felt that just reaching out there would cause the NVA to stop.

Less than three minutes later I was told that the first rounds were on the way. Within seconds, WHAM! WHAM! WHAM! Three or four rounds impacted less than 50 yards outside our wire! Scared the living hell out of all of us in the bunkers and the trench line. We even had a Listening Post right outside the last strands of wire, and those three guys must have shit their pants. Immediate "Check fire" on my part...one more round hit...then all was quiet.

Somehow, the 175mm people thought I had called for my target numbers to be fired, and they responded. Imagine, two and a half months after they were registered, and with no adjustments, and with cold tubes, and from over 18 miles. Those shells hit right outside our wire! A phenomenal display of shooting that I have never, ever forgotten even 32 years later. We got the Check Fire, corrected by a half a dozen grid squares, and they resumed firing. That's my memory of the big guns at Camp Carroll. I just realized that it was 32 years ago today or tomorrow that I registered those guns.

Actual accounts from Marines posted on the East Perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base document a heavy ground attack that was turned with 6 rounds from the 175's on Carroll and Rockpile. Unconfirmed body count was 76. The Marines that were under the attack report smiles on their faces when they saw the 175's heavy destruction of the NVA Regulars that were trying to over run their positions.

Army perimeter defense units at Khe Sanh also report the importance of the 175mm perimeter support when needed expeditiously and were relied on heavily. "We relied heavily on the big 175mm guns at Camp Carroll and the Rockpile to lay in their fire missions at predetermined coordinates and suspected NVA positions."

Actual account of a C Battery 2/94th gunner: "We were always in a rush when we had a fire mission for Khe Sanh. We knew that they were in a very bad spot when they called for us to help them out. That was our job, and we knew that if we were in their place that we would want the most help possible as quick as we could get it, so we always pushed ourselves to see just how fast we could get the rounds out and on the way."

Actual account of a Marine that was around Carroll and Hill 881: "I was an 0311 with 'F' 2/3 from 11/66 to 10/67. I was at Carroll from 11/66 to 3/67. My company would rotate between Carroll and the Bridge down on Highway 9, I don't know if you remember the Bridge? On Feb 28,1967, we were involved in a battle at Cam-Lo. My squad became surrounded and we had to call for fire support from Carroll. I don't know if you were there then or you may have heard that we had to call the 175 rounds on our own position. The guys up at Carroll laid those four rounds right between us and the NVA, which was only a matter of 20 feet or so. Laying on the ground and hearing Carroll launch those 175's knowing they were coming right at us makes me numb to this day. Having those shells rip through the trees and impact right in front of us was the most amazing, scary, bone chilling experience you could imagine. I guess the NVA figured we were crazy because they broke off from us. There is no doubt in my mind that without those well placed rounds my name would be on the Wall. We depended on you guys at Carroll many times to get our butts out of a jam and you were always there."

Excerpt from the S&S Vietnam Bureau: A Marine convoy carrying supplies from Carroll to Khe Sanh was hit three miles from the Rockpile by 200 to 300 NVA Regulars. Many of the 109 communists that were killed were hit by air strikes and 175mm artillery fire.

By reports from supported troops, the NVA hated the big guns at Carroll, Rockpile, Gio Linh, Con Thien and any other places the big guns were assigned in the I Corps area. The big guns could target anti-aircraft firing on U.S. planes, fortifications, and infiltration routes in North Vietnam.

Account from a Marine that was part of the Marine contingent on Carroll during TET: "You may recall a situation where a Marine recon patrol ran into big trouble one late afternoon (March 5, I think). E/2/9 was pulled off the front of Carroll's line to go fetch the dead officer who had been left behind when the patrol was extracted out. But darkness fell before we could lift off the LZ. You guys fired all night to keep Uncle Ho's Finest away until morning. You guys on the guns were always Johnny-on-the-spot when it came to fire support. Thank you very much."

I recall a day when my squad escorted a FAO out northwest of Cam Lo. He called in an air strike up in the DMZ and then we just cooled our heels awhile. His radioman carried 2 PRC-25s (wow!) so he could hear both sides of a conversation. Somebody who was awfully excited called in a fire mission. He really rattled it off fast. The FAO said his call sign put him in Khe Sanh. He had to say it all over again because he spoke too fast to get it all. He was asked what his target was and he said, "I got a battalion o' gooks in the open and running." When asked how far away they were, he said, "Fifty meters and closing!" It seemed like only a second before we heard guns open up and the FDC announced, "They're on their way!" Now that's service.

There was one night, though, that y'all really annoyed me. We got the word that Carroll was going to be overrun. So we were pulled back from our front line and placed in a tight perimeter along a dirt "road" directly in front of the 175s. I mean directly in front of the muzzles, about 20 feet!

Every time a gun captain would yell "Stand by!," I'd cover both ears, open my mouth wide, and lay flat on the hard-packed adobe. Then the damned thing would explode, scooting me back 6-8 inches, knocking all the wind out of me. And of course the first gasp only sucked in burnt cordite. Gag a maggot! Even my helmet, set alongside me, would tumble a foot or so. The ground was so hard it broke our E-tools trying to scratch its surface. No joy there. I must have dozed and missed a warning order because one cannon went off without my preparations. I think it popped my eardrum, 'cause I got a little blood from it. At that, I just picked up my gear, sat behind the gun, and the NVA and USMC be damned! Of course, nothing happened that night. All plans and intelligence must first be cleared through Hanoi!

The Original KA-BAR®

United States Marine Corps
World War II Fighting Knife
"An American Legend"

The U.S.M.C. Fighting Knife is famous in its own right, and has an historical background behind it that is an exciting adventure story and is now an American Legend!

Ask some World War II Marines what kind of knife they depended on during the war and you will get only one answer: a KA-BAR! Back in 1941, after the start of World War II, KA-BAR submitted a Fighting-Utility knife to the United States Marine Corp that was accepted as the standard issue for the Corps.

KA-BAR started supplying these knives and they soon became the prized possession of every fighting Marine. They depended on it for a combat weapon and for such every day tasks as pounding tent stakes, driving nails, opening ration cans or digging foxholes their KA-BAR was constantly at their side.

During World War II, the KA-BAR Fighting Knife earned the greatest respect, not only of the Marines, but also of those who served in the Army, Navy, Coast Guard and Underwater Demolition Teams, who were eventually issued the U.S.M.C./KA-BARS.

Years later, during the Korean, Vietnam and Desert Storm conflicts, many KA-BARS were reactivated into military service, as World War II veterans, remembered how well the knife served them passed their personal KABARS along to their sons.

The dependability and quality of the wartime KA-BARS weren't the result of just a casual approach to the production of these knives. In addition to the constant quality control procedures of the U.S.M.C. Marine Corps and Navy Supply Depot inspectors, Dan Brown, then President of KA-BAR, and the entire KABAR Company was dedicated to making this knife their contribution to the war effort. As a result of this personal involvement, quality went into the knife that assured its meeting all types of tests without failing. Even tough Marine Corps and Navy tests were supplemented by additional trials, such as driving the knife deep into a 6" x 6" timber and straining the blade back and forth at extreme angles, constantly testing edge retention in cutting through all types of materials and submitting the leather handles to severe atmospheric and corrosion tests to be sure they would hold up under all conditions of cold, heat or jungle rot without loosening or decomposing. As a result, the many thousands of KA-BARS produced during World War II performed so well that the people at KA-BAR were very proud of the reports that came back from all areas of operations and the excellent reputation they had earned. World War II ended and KA-BAR Fighting Knives went out of production until 32 years later when the original KABAR factory in Olean, New York and some of the craftsmen who worked on the original knife began production again to commemorate the 200th Anniversary of the United States Marine Corps. KA-BAR wanted to recognize this great milestone in U.S.M.C. history by issuing a "full dress model" of the original KA-BAR—a limited edition that would be most meaningful to the Marines.

Throughout the production of the Commemorative a few KA-BAR senior employees proudly performed the same tasks they worked on during the years 1942 to 1945 when KA-BAR was making its contribution to the war effort. As a result the completed knives were a true "work of art," but retained the look, feel and performance of a battle ready combat knife. KA-BAR was proud to present Serial No. 1 to the Commandant of the Corps destined to be displayed in the U.S.M.C. Museum at Quantico.

The U.S.M.C. Commemorative was so enthusiastically received that it became obvious that the old KA-BAR Fighting/Utility Knife had retained its notoriety throughout the years. The limited production Commemorative was very quickly taken up by Marines, knife enthusiasts and collectors and KA-BAR knew that it should now be returned to production, in its standard issue form, with all of the original specifications. Fortunately, they were available because the original blueprints were found in the company archives. So the "fighting KA-BAR" got back into its original gear and today it continues to be a favorite among Marines who adopt them as their own personal option knife and carry them into active service. But it's also a favorite of adventurers, survivalists, outdoor sportsmen and, of course, knife collectors who know that this knife—this "American Legend"—above all, deserves a place in their collection. And so it is, not only in America, but throughout the world.

When the name goes on the blade, it's not just called a "kabar", it is a KA-BAR.

Dear Editor:

My wife and I will not be able to attend, due to how close it is to my recent back surgery, but I want to wish all the best to those who do. Maybe we can catch you at the next one. I would appreciate you sharing some of my thoughts to all the guys who do get to go.

I'm still not allowed to ride in a car or an airplane at all, so travel is out for me right now. I am looking forward to meeting some of those whom we had to evacuate out of Khe Sanh Combat Base. I will be particularly interested in what they've done with their lives since.

You know, when we Air Evac'ed someone, most of the time we only had a very brief contact with them. I usually don't remember anyone's name or face, but I can remember their wounds, and what I did to treat them. I remember calling in the C-123's and C-130's that it took to get them out, and I remember setting up a system that was unique to Khe Sanh. While I was there, our aircraft could still land, but due to enemy artillery fire, they had to keep taxiing very slowly while they off-loaded supplies. We had pre-positioned an Aero Med Evac Crew on the aircraft, and as soon as the cargo pallets were off-loaded, this crew would swing down the litter stantions, and stantion straps to be ready to receive the incoming patients. What we would do then is place up to 18 patients on the ground at about the position where the airplane's wing tip would pass over us as he taxied by. Since there were only 4 of us Air Force Medics there, we had to find volunteer Marines to help load the patients. The correct litter carry was to use 4 men, one on each handle. Then they would all start off in step, but for Khe Sanh we had to use only two men per litter because we had to run with them in a dead run. Our timing had to be close to perfect. When the wing tip passed over us, each litter team had to pick their patient up and run directly at the airplane fuselage. By the time we intersected with the path of the airplane, the back end was just passing us. Then we had to make a banking left turn with our litter and jump up on to the tail ramp, as it was still moving. The guy on the front of the litter had the advantage in that he could see the ramp as he jumped up the nearly 18" to get on the ramp. He knew if he missed the step, the guy in back was going to ram that litter right up on him. But the guy in back had the tougher job, because he had to give that litter a real hard shove to help the guy in front get up on the ramp and less than a second later he had to jump up on the ramp himself. If the guy in front made a mistake, and missed the ramp, he would crash down on the ramp and the litter would be driven right up his back. Although we wore flack vests, I still have scars on the back of my neck where the bar underneath the litter hit me in the back of the head. I also have scars on both of my shins where I missed the step up onto the ramp and hit it. That was in our learning stage, but we finally got to where we could hit the ramp at full gallop and run our patient all the way to the front litter tier. We would set him down in the stanchions, while the on-board medics would snap them in place. Then we would make a U-turn and run back out and jump back off onto the ground, before the airplane made the turn at the far end of the ramp. When he made that turn, the loadmaster was closing the door, and as he entered the active runway, he was picking up speed for the takeoff. I am sure that this system of getting patients loaded onto a moving airplane has never been done before or since.

We could usually get about 18 wounded on the aircraft if our timing went well, and we were able to keep up with the pace of the number of wounded we had to move. We weren't too picky though, if an Army or Marine helicopter had room on it, we would send as many patients as possible out on it. The C-123's and C-130's were able to carry so much more that we welcomed them and the opportunity to move the bulk of our patient load. At one point while I was there, our bunker took a direct hit, but as I recall we didn't loose anyone. It just scared the hell out of us. But the entire bunker had to be rebuilt. It seemed like we spent as much time refilling sand bags as we did taking care of patients.

By the way, I met Chaplain Stubbe several times when he came over to our bunker and visited our wounded. I have a picture that I think is of him riding on a captured motorcycle. If you see him there, I'd like to know if that was him. The picture is just from the back, but I think I was taking it of him.

Hope you all have a great reunion, and that you'll remember all the ones we didn't get to save. They and their families are the ones that I have the most feelings for, because we didn't have a chance to bring them home. Although most of us didn't get decorated for just doing our job, I believe that every man there was a hero. Even though at the time, nobody wanted to be called one, and maybe most of us still don't, but we did our jobs under very difficult circumstances. We few are a precious band of brothers. I know one thing from all this, my experiences at places like Khe Sanh changed the way I look at life. I treasure every minute of it now. I love being with my two sons and their wives, and especially my grandkids. I love most of all being with my sweet wife, who stood by me all those 13 years I was flying patients around the world. A lot of the guys weren't so lucky. Our divorce rate was astronomical. Most wives couldn't take all the absences. So I'm glad I married an Air Force Nurse, who at least understood what I was doing while I was away. I lost my right lung, and it knocked me off flying status, or I guess I would have still been in AeroMed Evac Units until I retired. Sometimes God just has different plans for you than you do for yourself. Now, I try to go with His flow, and not mine. May God richly bless each and every one of you who attends this reunion.

No Small Things

by Mike Worth

Each year around Mother's Day, I try to visit my Mom in Asheville, North Carolina. Mom, the one who worried as she watched the nightly news, while I was in Vietnam. Wrote faithfully, sent "care" packages, and prayed for my safe return. As she counted the days, she also wrote condolence letters to other parents; those of my boyhood friends and those of too many Echo Company brothers. She said it was just a small thing and the least she could do.

This year I arranged to take a little side trip to Simpsonville, South Carolina to visit with one of my personal heroes, John "Doc" Lancaster, Echo 2/26. Some may remember Commander John Lancaster, USN (Retd) from the dedication at Jefferson Barracks last year—but he is always " Doc" to me. "My" Doc, who when I was wounded on 27 October 1968, ran through a hail of bullets to get to me and patched me up. We spent a day at Laurens High School where Doc Lancaster is now the director of the JROTC program. In his classes, Vietnam became the lesson of the day. The scars from where the bullet went through my arm (having fortunately missed my head) and Doc's fancy patchwork became the "show and tell" for these interested, pulled together and well mannered young people.

June-July 1968, Con Thien area near the DMZ

Part of our plan was to also visit the parents and the grave of another Khe Sanh Veteran, Stan Pettit, E 2/26, who survived Khe Sanh, but was Killed in Action later at LZ Margo. Stan was our friend and brother then, remembered still—and John is the Doc who tended to Stan when he was killed by machine gun fire as he walked point on 15 September 1968.

And so, we traveled along Liberty Highway to a sleepy rural area between Easton and Liberty, South Carolina to visit Stan's parents, Paul and Colleen Pettit. Stan's brothers, Ray and Eddie and sisters, Paula and Kathy, were at a family wedding rehearsal this day, so maybe next time.

Mrs. Pettit is ill and confined to her bed, but we hoped the flowers brought a touch of cheer and a splash of brightness to her day. Sadly, Mr. Pettit tells us that Mrs. Pettit has never quite gotten over the loss of Stan, their oldest boy.

In a devastating set of circumstances, the Marine Corps failed to inform the Pettits in a timely manner of the death of their son. The Pettit family first learned of Stan's death when they received a letter of condolence from a Marine in Stan's squad. Hoping it was a mistake, it was only after Mr. Pettit asked his Congressman to investigate that they finally received the heartbreaking confirmation.

Mr. Pettit, a WWII Marine, who worked in Naval Intelligence and took jungle training in Panama, Central America, is a very warm and most engaging guy, with strong political views and an acute and accurate memory. Paul Pettit is also a loving father whose son fought and died for this country. This father's deep love is evident in the accompanying poem, inspired by a photo of Stan that was sent to the family by a buddy, and was written two days after he buried his eldest son, Stanley.

When we visited Stan's grave, which is in the very center of a small church cemetery near the Pettit home, the roots of the patriotism and sense of duty that was so obvious in Stan, were movingly clear. Rising to nearly 15 feet above the grave with the simple bronze headstone reading Cpl. Stanley R. Pettit, E Co 26th Marines, is a flagpole bearing an American Flag. This powerful symbol of freedom and sacrifice, standing vigil in remembrance of one brave Marine, has flown there for 32 years. For 32 years, Paul Pettit has maintained the grave, reinforced the flagpole, and replaced each fading or tattered flag with a new one. For 32 years, Stan's father has ensured that anyone who visits or drives by this humble churchyard will see this flag—and know that it proudly waves over the resting place of one who gave his life for his country. He says it is just a small thing and the least he can do.

For 32 years this flag tells of duty, honor and sacrifice. May it always fly. May Stanley R. Pettit and so many other brave hearts always be remembered. It is just a small thing and the least we can do.

Author's Note: The Pettit Family would like to hear from anyone who knew Stan or even has memories of those times to share. Stan's youngest sister, Kathy Pettit Finley, will be the Pettit family point of contact and will distribute to all. PH: 864/843-6556, email: TREBKathy2@aol.com Poem used by permission.

Armed and Ready

I stepped on a mine in late February 1968 on Hill 558. My medivac route was from Hill 558 to Dong Ha to DaNang. Each stop included various medical procedures to ensure that I wasn't in pain, the bleeding was controlled and fresh bandages were applied to prevent infection. At Dong Ha, they took off my uniform as added protection from infection.

At DaNang I remember being placed on a stretcher, carried into a building and being set down on a table. I don't remember why. Shortly a rocket attack hit DaNang and they took all the wounded and placed us on the floor. I remember the corpsmen saying that we were probably more used to "incoming" than they were. At DaNang the doctor who examined me took one look at my shattered foot and said, "this one goes afloat." This meant I was headed for the USS Repose, where my foot would be amputated.

For some reason the chopper flight to the Repose didn't take place until nightfall. It was very dark and the flight was crammed with wounded troops. I was placed on the floor and I remember feeling the cold of the steel beneath me, as all I was wearing was a blanket and a huge bandage on my foot. The flight seemed to take forever and once we were over the Gulf of Tonkin, the cold air also entered the cargo (or I should say the meat locker) area. It was so cold I was shivering.

We landed on the Repose on the stern where a landing pad had been built. It took some time to unload the wounded and in my case, since I was targeted for surgery, I was sent immediately to the "pre-op" (pre-surgery) room. Again all I had on was that blanket. One corpsman took off my bandages and after receiving my approval took pictures of my foot, I guess, for medical textbook purposes. After he was gone I was alone for a while and began to warm up, as I was finally indoors and out of the cold air.

After several minutes a Navy nurse came to see me to prepare me for surgery. She was the first Caucasian woman I had seen in five months and beautiful. I was at least on morphine and probably something stronger by then, but my male senses said this was a gorgeous creature that was about to examine and prepare me for surgery.

In a quick movement she undid the blanket I was wearing and there I was—ARMED AND READY. She took one look at me and said with a smile: "Well, there's definitely nothing wrong with your reactions." I don't remember my response, but I'm sure it was something cute. That night I had the surgery and spent three more days on the Repose recovering before being flown to Japan for additional rest. During those three days on the Repose, I never saw that nurse again as the Navy obviously had separate personnel for separate duties and the nurses who worked pre-op and surgery did not work the recovery wards.

I do remember being out of bed for the first time in a wheel chair and having dinner. After eating I was playing chess or checkers with a "candy striper" who were young teenage girls that were there for comfort purposes. I guess I was too weak to be up so soon, as after about a half-hour I promptly threw-up in the candy striper's lap. But, that's another story for another time.

Sure wish I could find that nurse today in my old age. I still have my reactions.

ED NOTE: Joey, Joey, Joey. Be careful about what you brag on in front of these strange fellows. Some of 'em are liable to call you on it.

Lying on the ground Motionless
Searching into the night
Listening to the darkness
Its raining again
Soaked to the bone
Hours have come and gone
It seems like centuries
God, just to close my eyes for a moment
Fighting to stay awake is agony
If I fall asleep
I might not wake up
I don't feel the insects biting anymore just their buzzing in my ears and nose as they suck my blood
I slide my tongue slowly over my swollen lips
Having to be so still for so long
Amid such intense misery and torment
Leaves me numb

I am Mike Castle, 2/4 Gulf Company May 68 to June 69. From Dia Do to Khe Sanh Hills. To all of you I wish you well. I will never forget where we dug it! I carried a Hog and a Few Wraps (M-60) up and up and down the hills most of my tour. I am in touch with the 2/4 site and a member. Wounded a few times still kicking. I hold Vietnam close to my heart the rest in my mind. This site is awesome; it is about time I found it. I have many of our brothers to send it too. I hope we are welcome.

Had a can of c-rat ham slices and someone had a can of c-rat grape juice and shared it. Just like home—ham and a glass of make believe wine. But it was Easter Sunday, and it was special.

There is not a date or a place that has as much meaning in my memory as that of tomorrow when the first Battle of the Hills began at Khe Sanh in 1967. The epic struggle over 881N/S and 861 rank among the most significant in all of Vietnam's actions, but for me, it was a personal and deadly struggle just to do my duty and stay alive. It was nearly a disaster for those manning the base then, and a prelude to the more notable siege in 1968. But for those of us who fought that first battle, it was time never to be forgotten. May God bless all who served and stood their ground during this desperate time—and bring them peace in all things. Kimo Andrews

Five long years ago today this nation watched in horror at the tragedy in Oklahoma City when the federal building was bombed killing so many innocent people, including a couple of Good Marines. But my eyes were fixed elsewhere that day farther west. While most folks were glued to the TV sets watching one tragedy unfold, I was on and off the phone throughout the day with my dear and precious friend Quiles Ray Jacobs and his beautiful wife Naomi. Those of you who had the privilege of knowing him he was simply "Jake the Snake." Jake was a Warrior in the truest sense of the word. First as a young Marine, who led our squad through much tragedy and triumph throughout his tour of duty, he earned two Purple Hearts, one Navy Commendation, one Bronze Star, and one Silver Star for his valor on the field of battle. Jake was a good Christian man and for sure one of the finest human beings I ever had the honor of knowing. He cared a great deal about his family and his friends and this organization as well. Jake had quietly been battling Agent Orange related cancer for over three years and had very nearly concealed it from me up until his last year. It was a Thursday, I believe, 19 April 1995 when I had my last conversation with him. True to form he just laughed at death as he had done so many times in the past, assured me he knew exactly where he was going to be when the sun went down and promised he'd prepare the way and wait for us all at a time somewhere in the future. Yes it was true. The mighty man I loved so much for so many years had fallen at last. I just know the ground rumbled and roared that afternoon in Southern California. Jake was a giant of a man and he had to make the earth shake. I thank you my good friend for all that you gave me. I still miss you dearly, as if you were my own flesh and blood. Each year when I see the magnolia blooms I think of the good times we had. They were so beautiful here in Indiana when we last spoke. I guess that was God's way of telling me you were OK now. 19 April 1995.

Godspeed and Semper Fi Jake.

The sniper and his 50 cal. kept me and the other trench troops hopping throughout our 77 days and nights (we owned the nights since the clouds settled below our 3,000 ft elevation). We would egg the poor bastard on by waving MAGGIE's Drawers whenever he missed one of us running through the shallow in the trench line. That sniper did get more than a few of my HST buddies and, of course, your choppers. He also caused us to look at that big damn box you guys dropped on top of Hill 881S. By the time night fell and we could check it out we found the ice cream! Damn, I medivaced 95% of our troops on the Hill, lost 60 pounds as we were down to one c-rat meal per day between 3 of us and you deliver ice cream that baked in the sun until nightfall when it was safe to retrieve.

YES! We loved the melted goo and we all had the shits for days and days, not having had dairy products since January 21, 1968. We had a great time despite the SHITS and we thank you for improving the morale, even though you upset our stomachs. We will always remember the ice cream in the big box on top of the Hill. Dave reply: Hi Doc Gary here.

Don't remember much of the ice cream, but I do remember the sniper. I remember wondering what to worry about more, the sniper or the incoming rounds that always followed the choppers in. I believe we had only about two minutes to get things done before they came in. Now the sniper never had to wait, he just did his thing and you couldn't figure out if it was the dirt and rocks flying around you while under the birds or the snipers rounds. I do remember one of the 26th guys getting his finger blown off while waiting to get on a 46. I believe you picked up the finger and put in a wet rag and put him and the finger on the bird. Now could that sniper have been that good?

I also remember spending many an hour on the side of the hill putting a lot of fire power on his position. We even called in "Scarface" (gunship) to work over the site. Be good doc. See you this summer...Gary (Shore Party Gary Parker)

I was with 2/94th arty. We made a night convoy to your humble abodes and as usual were greeted with fireworks. From all the guys that made that trip I want to thank you for keeping us, our trucks and ammo safe until we left. You guys did one hellava job up there with very little thanks.

So on behalf of the 2/94 at JJ Carroll and Dong Ha thanks and Welcome Home.

At 1:30 P.M. on Saturday, 3 June 2000, a park atop a hill in Closter, New Jersey, will be re-dedicated. Schauble Park was named to honor the memory and the sacrifice of one of our own, Corporal Kenneth W. Schauble. Ken was a Squad Leader with the 2nd Platoon, "Echo" Company, 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines. He served at Khe Sanh on Hill 861-A during the 1968 Tet Offensive, and he was later Killed in Action on 6 June, 1968 during an intense battle in "Leatherneck Square" near Con Thien. The date of the ceremony closely coincides with the 32nd anniversary of the day he and 13 other Marines died. On the day of his death, the 2nd Platoon of "Echo" Company was on a security patrol when they engaged a large North Vietnamese Army force concealed in a bunker complex. After a pitched battle which lasted several hours and resulted in numerous casualties on both sides, the 2nd Platoon was cut off, nearly out of ammunition, and had only sporadic communication with one remaining radio. Realizing the only hope was to break out, Ken gave the order to "fix bayonets" and he led 2nd squad "over the top," on line, into the enemy bunker complex. While Ken was killed instantly when struck by a machine gun bullet, the 2nd squad pressed the attack suffering near total casualties while pressing the attack into the enemy bunker complex, killing numerous NVA. Jim Kaylor, the only survivor from 2nd Squad, said "Ken was one of the many brave hearts who died that day; 14 Marines were killed and 11 wounded. He was always one of my heroes because he was a bright and very brave man. Ken Schauble was a strong leader, tough as hell and he loved the Marine Corps!"

The Closter, New Jersey Parks Service Director, Jim Oettinger, and his staff are committed to assuring that the proper respect be made in Ken Schauble's memory, and have gone to great efforts to make sure the citizens of Closter are aware of Ken's sacrifice. Mr. Oettinger and his staff are determined that Ken, and the heroism he displayed, will not be forgotten.

All of Ken Schauble's surviving family is expected to attend the rededication. We are hoping that many Khe Sanh Veterans and Ken's other combat brothers will attend as well. He's not just a home town hero .. he is a true American hero.

The details are as follows:

I came across your site last week while I was searching for resources with which to teach my 11th graders the Vietnam War. Since then, and especially as today approached, you have been on my mind. I want to take this opportunity to tell you who made it home, and those who did not, "Thank You!" Thank you for myself, and thank you for my children. We will reserve a special place for you in our hearts and prayers.

We love you.

To all, Thanks to Dean Caton, formerly of Golf/2/3 Marines, I am finally able to put a name on the Marine casualty in the famous picture taken by Catherine LeRoy of Corpsman Vernon Wike on Hill 881, taken on April 30, 1967. The Marine was LCPL William Junior Roldan, of Philadelphia, PA. Dean related that he knew LCPL Roldan when they were stationed in Okinawa with the bulk of the 3rd Marines, prior to deploying to Khe Sanh. Roldan was killed by machine-gunfire directly in front of the Platoon Commander 1LT Peter Hesser during the assault on Hill 881. His name is found at Panel 18E 128 on the Wall.

It was 32 years ago today that pilot, Captain Luke Sharp and copilot, 1st Lt. Mike Helmstetler (HMM 161) lifted off of LZ Robin with a load of Marines and a Corpsman from Kilo 3/9/3 for a troop delivery to Khe Sanh. Not more than 20 minutes later they would be dead and the lives of the passengers and crew would be forever changed. They will not be forgotten.

Ray (Doc) Felle

On the morning of June 7, 1967 Hill 950 was attacked and overrun at the same time the KSCB was under rocket attack. As memory serves there were 18 to 22 Marines on the hill. Of that number 5-8 were KIA and 6 were WIA. The next morning those Marines who managed to evade the NVA retook the hill. Reinforcements arrived from the base by chopper under a huge fog. I was the Pinefold radio operator who called for an arty strike on top of the hill. Thanks God it wasn't done.

I want to say to the Marines who were on the hill that night it's been 33 years since that encounter I haven't forgotten you! We have lost a few since then for different reasons but all of you are always in my prayers.

Thank you to the 'Nam vets who have come forward with information regarding mass or individual burials of NVA soldiers. I promise that this information will be utilized towards a full-accounting for all our POW/MIA's. All reports will remain confidential as promised (except for vitals such as incident date, location, etc.) and I will share any progress made on this message center. I will be leaving for my second trip to Vietnam on July 5th. For those of you who don't know me, I search for my brother, Army SSGT Jerry W Elliott. Details to be published in the next issue of Red Clay. Thank you, my other brothers!

I was with I company 3BN 26th Marines in 66 &67 got to Nam in Spring of 67 just in time for monsoon, serve with a lot of brave guys. Wish I could talk to all of them again, and personally thank every one of them for a job well done, and thank the ones that paid the big price to help keep us free. Was up at Khe Sanh for the hill battles and saw a lot of buddies fall to enemy fire and some of our own from short rounds. Would like to hear from anyone that was there.

"A" Co. 1/26 finally! I have found the Mother-Of-All-Sites!! (Opinion of a MARINE who happened to be at KHE SANH—Before, DURING, and After the "SIEGE"). Although I know we have tried to convey to others: Marines and civilians alike, what the experience of Khe Sanh was all about ONLY those of USMC who was there can re-live its terrifying, surreal, adrenaline pumping, heart-racing, sweat-flowing, finger-shaking, eye-popin, income-hating, arclight-loving, NVA spotting, NVA removing, red clay-hugging, non-bathing, cussing, preteen, living in a hole Leatherneck-Experience and More. I believe that this site and the "Khe Sanh Veterans Org." that exists, is paying tribute to ALL of us who are part of Marine Corps history via the experiences of the Khe Sanh combat base saga. I joined "Alpha" 1/26 in November, 1967 (Company HQ). Stayed with A 1/26 for the duration, until rotating back to "The World" in December of 1968. Chances are, if you reported for duty with "A" either at Danang, Phu Bai, Quanq Tri (White Beach) or at the place (Khe Sanh). I signed you on and escorted you (all) to your platoon commander. So if you are all reading this, you are OK. SEMPER FI!

To all of you guys that fought along side of me at Khe Sanh I think of you ever day and I hope your life is good. I wish I could find you guys and talk to all the parents, wives and other relatives of the ones who died at Khe Sanh I wish you peace and love. And to the ones that died on April 24,1967 on hill 861 our blood is on that hill we own it god I wish I had you guys back. I miss you all so very much I love you.

Looking for anyone who served with Bravo Battery 1st Battalion 13th Marines. I was wounded on Mar 11, 68 while unloading my truck full of ammo. Those that I have talked to said it was reported that I was dead. I am very much alive and living in Pennsylvania. Would like to hear from anyone who served with B-1-13 from June 67 until Mar 68 in Khe Sanh. Would especially like to hear from Cpl. Dave Cook from California. He was wounded just before I was. I have a lot of pictures from Phu Bai to Khe Sanh. I plan on coming to the reunion and I will bring them with me. I have some good pictures of some incoming. I am trying to get them all put on a CD so I will be able to e-mail them.

Clifford Treese Jr.

Would like to hear from anyone who knew Richard E. Williams, who was killed on April 5 (4?), 1968 on one of the Khe Sanh hills 861, I believe. Mortar round I think. Rich and I were homies, boot camp buddies, and as close as brothers. I went to Golf 2/4 the Magnificent Bastards (Dai Do); choppered to Khe Sanh on June 1, 1968, and then to 861. Thank you, and Semper Fi.

My brother, Thomas J. Sweeney was killed in Feb.1968. I was born in Dec. of that same year. Tom was in Unit C 1/26, 5th Marine division. I do not know much about him, only what I have seen in photographs and what friends may had said about him. Twice a year the Boys and Girls club in Mckeesport. PA. have a memorial for the fallen members. My brother is one of those. I go there for all the ceremonies on behalf of my family. The services that are held there are very touching, and it is there that I get to meet some of my brothers friends and discuss the kinds of things that Tom liked. I am looking for anybody that may have served with him or new of him while in the marines. I would love to hear his courageous story. I would also like to share this information with the veterans that attend the ceremonies each year at the Boys and Girls Club.

Thank you, your help is greatly appreciated

Would like to hear from anyone who was stuck with D company 1/9 at op-1 in Khe Sanh. We were the lucky ones that got to do all of the retrieving of goods dropped by parachute after the airstrip was blow up. I was there for the entire Tet offense and managed to get wounded two times by incoming. I've got a ton of slides from there and a whole lot of shots of buddies that never made it back. This is the first time I've tried to make any kind of contact in over 33 years and am still a little skeptical about talking about it.

Ron Garner from Gary, IN

Looking for anyone that served with me in Golf Co, 2nd Bn, 26th Marines, 3rd platoon on hill 558 in Khe Sanh in March of 1968. Especially anyone who participated in the last battle on one of the ridges that led to hill 861 south on April 6th & 7th. It's been a long time and a hard shell to crack but this site has helped allot. I believe 2nd Lt. Combs was out platoon Comdr. at the time. I remember LCPL. Ray Burrell, LPL. Pete Yovine, Cpl. Ski, Cpl. Wormy. It's funny, the faces are so fresh but a lot of the names are so distant!!

Joe Mannone

My name is Teo. I'm looking for the U.S.Marine Corp 1st Bn, 9th Marines, 3rd Marine division. My first husband was one of them. He passed away Jan.11,1984 at the young age of 34. We had 3 small children at the time. He was 80% disabled. Not until my youngest child was entering college, and we tried to apply for some help through the VA did we discover that his death was indeed service connected. I'm now 49 yr. old, remarried and my children are grown.

"Look Homeward"

Look homeward my beloved son
Across the misty sea
Out past the blue horizon
Beyond this galaxy;
Out past the fading sunset
Beyond the moon of gold
Look homeward my beloved son
No one your dreams can hold.

Look homeward my beloved son
Up, o'er the rolling swells
On, past the muddy rivers
High, o'er the jungle hells;
Up, o'er the raging monsoons
Beyond the rattle of the gun
Forget hunger, thirst and misery
Sweet victory you've won.

Look homeward my beloved son
Hark! A gentle Voice is speaking
Yes, the Master calls for thee
"Come out My blessed loved one,
depart earth's dismal scenes;
Come quickly, I have need of thee
in My 26th Marines."

Returning to Vietnam with my Dad

by Tara Ford

As a young girl growing up, I used to thank God in my prayers for making me a girl. As a child, my perception of reality was that all boys went to war when they grew up. Both of my grandfathers had fought in WWII and my father was a Marine in Vietnam. Although no stories of the wars have been passed down, I instinctively knew that war was Hell. When my grandfather, Gerard "Rocky" Ford, suddenly passed away in 1995 I realized that I didn't know much about him. I didn't know much about the WWII Marine whose picture was on the cover of the NY Times in 1943. I didn't know much about his life experiences, which undoubtedly shaped the man he became. And when he passed, I realized that I didn't know much about my own father's history. My quest to unfurl my father's past began at that moment. My father never spoke about Vietnam. I only knew that he had enlisted in the Marines, received 2 Purple Heart Awards and that a bullet still remained lodged in his leg. I also had no idea the depths of which Vietnam still haunted our society. I didn't know about Agent Orange, B-52s, Napalm, Ho Chi Minh, POWs, My Lai, TET Offensive, Khe Sanh or even which side the Americans were fighting for. All I knew was that Americans didn't like to talk about the Vietnam War, nor did they like to teach it in school. Unfortunately, all I learned was that Vietnam was something you didn't talk about.

In 1998, I accepted a teaching position in Japan which brought me closer to Vietnam. Vietnam was now my neighbor and not some evil secret. I wanted to visit Vietnam but I couldn't imagine going with friends. I wanted to see my father's Vietnam. I knew I had to go with my father. Asking my father to return took a lot of courage. I was nervous about how he would react. But I was encouraged by the strides he was taking on his own in rediscovering his past. He had begun attending Khe Sanh Reunions, which enable Veterans to rekindle ties with the brothers they fought so valiantly to protect. It was at a reunion in 1996 that he met Ed Zimmerman. "Zimmo" was awarded a Bronze Star for his bravery in saving my father's life the night he was shot. That was the first time the two had met since April 7th 1968, the day he was shot.

During a conversation with my father while I was in Japan, I asked him if he'd ever want to return to Vietnam. It was then that he told me about his desire to return to Vietnam and more specifically Khe Sanh during peacetime. I was elated to hear this response and then asked him to accompany me. We were both overwhelmed at the possibility and the uncertainty of planning such a trip. For Father's Day last year, I sent him a Vietnam travel book. We began planning for our trip the very next day.

We arrived in Vietnam on March 18th, 2000. In the following two weeks, we traveled from Ho Chi Minh City (formerly Saigon) up North to Hanoi. Along the way we met many curious and friendly Vietnamese people. Some took us into their homes and others shared their life stories with us. All of them had stories about the "American" war. All of them continue their struggle to survive in a country marred by poverty and corruption. All of them touched our hearts in a way that will never be forgotten.

During those two weeks we visited Saigon, Danang, Hue, Dong Ha, Khe Sanh, Lang Vei and Hanoi. After spending three emotionally and physically challenging days in Saigon, we escaped from the city and arrived at the beautiful beaches of Danang. My father didn't realize we were staying on China Beach until he looked out of our hotel window and instantly recognized Monkey Mountain to the North, where he had done many patrols. It was hard to believe that 30 years earlier, this same beach was littered with armored tanks and overflowing with American soldiers. The pristine coastline is now littered with hand-woven, circular fishing boats, although my father did find a rifle butt lying in the sand.

While sitting on China Beach, I was approached by an amiable looking, broad-grinned Vietnamese man. He politely inquired about our travel plans and offered his services in helping me accomplish them. His knowledge of the area was impressive and his sincerity was refreshing. He thought we were traveling alone. When he met my father he was impressed that we had traveled to his country together and that my father was sharing his past with me. After spending one day with Van, we hired him to drive us all the way to Khe Sanh. We were together for the next 6 days.

During those days I learned more about Vietnam than I had ever hoped. Van is an honest, hard working, intelligent man who was prohibited from attaining a salaried position because his father was an officer in the South Vietnamese Army. Both he and his father had been imprisoned in "Re-education camps." Van was imprisoned for 3 years because he tried to flee Vietnam by boat at the age of 16. Van's presence was a blessing and our friendship continues through letters since leaving Vietnam.

The same night that we met Van, we met three other American Veterans who had just come from Khe Sanh. Charles Berg, Jim Hettrick and Dennis Thompson were all friends from their days in the US Army Special Forces. Charles Berg was a Sergeant in FOB-3 at Khe Sanh and has been returning to Vietnam for years. He helps the Bru tribe, a minority tribe located near Khe Sanh and the Laos border, in digging wells and education. My father had already met him at a Khe Sanh reunion and I remembered reading about his efforts in a magazine. I was shocked though, when I realized that he was missing a leg. Jim Hettrick is a retired Army Master Sergeant and Dennis Thompson is a retired Sergeant Major in the Army. Dennis Thompson was captured in the battle for Lang Vei and was a POW for 61 months. He had been captured 4 times yet managed to elude his captors for 8 days, living without food and suffering from septic wounds while trying to make it back to the Khe Sanh base. Coming across Veterans on the same mission as us was a shock, in and of itself. But after hearing their stories, I realized that I was in the presence of true American HEROES. For the first time, I was able to see my father as a soldier. I looked at these great men before me and I was overcome with a feeling of pride. A pride so thick, causing a lump in my throat and tears in my eyes. I watched these men as they embraced like long lost brothers with the moonlight dancing in the tears in their eyes.

At that moment I wanted to reach in and wipe away their memories of the war. I wanted to take away their anger, guilt and pain. For in those brief moments, I was able to see the young, frightened soldiers they once were and the hardened, mature men they have grown to be. Through the tears and the pain, I still felt their PRIDE. You saw it in their eyes and you saw it on their faces. They believed wholeheartedly in fighting for their country. The character amongst them was powerful and it was a moment that I will never forget. After meeting these men our spirits were boosted. And the goal of reuniting my father with Khe Sanh was in sight. On March 28, we finally arrived. It was hard to imagine that 32 years earlier my father was living in the hills that now looked so beautiful and peaceful. Nothing is left of the combat base except for a small building which serves as propaganda-filled museum. The information depicted was so disturbing that I was moved to tears. For my father's blood was spilt on this land and everything written in the museum was nothing more than Communist lies. We left the museum quickly and my father pointed out the remains of the airstrip, which was vital for the soldiers survival in 1968. On January 21, 1968, a week before the TET Offensive began, the siege on Khe Sanh started. My father arrived about a week after the siege had begun. Khe Sanh was in such a precarious situation that convoys weren't able to re-supply the men with food or ammunition. Their only means of survival was from the sky. Cargo planes carrying men, food and weapons often came under fire and airdrops were sometimes all that could be done. The Marines had no choice but to "dig in." Unknown to my father at the time was how dangerous a predicament he was placed in. President Johnson followed the developments at Khe Sanh closely and vowed never to lose the combat base. At one particular time it is estimated that more than 30,000 North Vietnamese Army Regulars had surrounded the American base of only 6,000 Marines. In order to defend Khe Sanh, the US mounted the most intense bombing in the history of the war. The equivalent of 5 Hiroshima-sized bombs were dropped within a mile radius of Khe Sanh. General William Westmoreland even considered the use of tactical nuclear weapons. The siege lasted 77 days and in the end, the combat base was still under American control. It was near the end of the siege that my father was shot while trying to rescue a corpsman that lay wounded in the enemy's lines. After 6 weeks of operations and physical therapy in Japan, he was back on the front line where he remained for the rest of his 13-month tour. Thirty-two years later, I stood on the hard red clay earth with my father trying to imagine the chaos that once enveloped the area. None of the stories my father had been telling me before our arrival seemed plausible for the mountainous area is serene and peaceful now.

Moments after leaving the museum, my father pulled out an old map of Khe Sanh and with his compass we headed into the coffee plantations that now surround the area. When we emerged from the plantations we followed a dirt road that split the mountain range. We followed this road, which didn't exist 32 years ago, as my father pointed out the different hills that he remembered and the numbers that were used to identify each hill; 950, 1015, 558, 861, 861a, 881 and hill 700. We also passed a schoolyard and met up with a group of 15 middle school students who were walking home for the day. Our methods of communicating were restricted to sign language and gestures. It was quite easy for them to understand that my father was a GI. We walked for over an hour with the students following our every move. When my father stopped to tell me stories about the different hills or to take pictures, the children would stop and giggle. It was quite a moment when my father pointed out hill 700, that was the hill that he was shot on. It was mid-afternoon and the sun was glaring down on us. The heat was oppressive and the air was stagnant. As he recounted the story, I closed my eyes and tried to imagine the horrifying scenario. The way the hills bled into one another enabled me to picture the constant danger that lay beneath the thick brush. But I couldn't imagine the sheer horror and terror felt by all that were there. Neither one of us could believe we were there. Nor could we comprehend the entourage that now followed us. The children's nervous laughter was infectious and their curiosity was becoming. Their presence was comforting to me as it was a constant reminder that life in the barren area did go on.

We stopped our trek once we reached their village. The children were part of the Bru tribe, the people that Charles Berg helps. Their tiny houses are made from bamboo. There was no electricity nor was their running water. We stood in the ville and received curious smiles from small children and older folks alike. My father paused and stared off into the hills. I knew that he was tempted to run back into the hills to reclaim apart of his youth that he had tried hard to forget. As I stood there watching him a wave of emotions came over me. I was so proud of my father for returning to the land that took the lives of many of his comrades and nearly his own. I also felt extremely lucky to have a father so willing to share such a painful part of his life with me. We stood there for a few minutes then wiped away the tears, said goodbye to the children and headed back to the base.

From Khe Sanh we drove out to Lang Vei where Dennis Thompson was captured. Bomb craters pockmark the earth and banana trees thrive next to crumbled bunkers. My father told me the story behind Lang Vei and again I was moved to tears. In the final days of our trip, we visited the infamous Hanoi Hilton where Dennis Thompson was imprisoned as well as Sen. John McCain. We also visited Ho Chi Minh's Mausoleum. It is here that the embalmed former Prime Minister of VN has rested since his death in 1969. Hordes of Vietnamese people flock to his tomb on a daily basis. It was strange walking by the man who was once at the center of the Vietnam conflict, but died before witnessing his dream come true of Vietnam as one country. I couldn't help but wonder if the dire straits many Vietnamese live in now is what he wanted for his country.

Vietnam is a beautiful country with a fascinating ancient history. Although extreme poverty and corruption hinders its beauty. There is no animosity held towards American tourists or returning American Veterans. POW Dennis Thompson remarked, "Everyone and everything in Vietnam has moved on, but us. They have gotten over it, so why can't we?" This statement struck a chord in my heart and made me wonder- why we (Americans) can't get past the Vietnam War.

From my travels and research, I feel I can understand the fear that communism created in the 1960s and the political reasons why we entered the war. I can also understand why many Americans protested against the war. But I cannot, nor will I ever, understand why America's bravest were spit on, defamed and deemed morally bankrupt by their peers upon returning to their country. For there is nothing immoral about standing up to serve for one's country. Three million brave men and women returned from Vietnam to have their character questioned and their voices silenced. Thirty-two years later, my father is finding his voice, as many other veterans are too. Vietnam Veteran Association memberships are rising. Enabling veterans from all over the country to come together to find long lost comrades; to laugh, to cry and most importantly, to remember.

On behalf of my generation, I would like to support Veterans in sharing their stories and experiences with others. America needs to hear about the individual sacrifices that each soldier made in his life. The heroic stories about young men and women risking their lives to save others are inspirational.

Vietnam will always remain an integral part of my life as well as the lives of many other Veteran's children. However, many of "us" haven't learned about Vietnam. We are curious about our fathers' experiences and their lives, but we don't know enough to ask. I urge educators to find the importance of teaching this chapter of American history. I am lucky that my father has broken his silence. I am inspired by his life and by the lives of other Veterans we I have met. For I have learned the value in teamwork, perseverance and strength. For standing fast in the face of adversity, fear and pain. And for knowing that 1 need not be ashamed of fighting for what I believe in. That is what I've learned from my father, a Vietnam Veteran. For better or worse, his experiences in Vietnam have influenced my own life. Rediscovering his past together has helped me discover my own future. Those are the lessons we've learned from Vietnam.

Thanks Dad and WELCOME HOME.

Of Madness and Meaning

Jim Carmichael
60 mortars Echo, 2/26- 861 Alpha

It is rarely comforting to recognize that the dubious distinction of participating in the entire siege fell to our lot. Those were the most desperate days of my short life, up to that point. Presently, I feel ancient. I have become a pastor by trade in the ensuing years. I am currently unemployed because the war has invaded me to the point of ministerial distraction and dysfunction. Thus, this sabbatical "year" has left me with time to ponder, to muse over the concept of meaning and the war for me personally.

Much of the human philosophy that is penned in the pages of the Red Clay magazine leaves me cold or puzzled and especially saddened. I move away from too many of the articles and poems more hurt than before I mentally entered them. Many of us are left to the questions of what do I make of those days, now? What did they really mean? Was the death and destruction really worth the effort expended in the larger scheme of things? Why is my life coming unglued after so many years? I'm sure none of us would have retreated an inch looking at the small picture we were given of things then. On my own, I come to confused reasoning; muddled thinking or no "comment." I feel incapable of discovering "true, truth" as Francis Schaeffer called it. My unexpected and unscheduled sabbatical has shown me who I really am, as a person. I do not like what I see. I am left staring at the effects of my falleness[?] and Khe Sanh upon me. Nothing outside of Scripture that I read satisfies my soul, and I read voraciously as I am able. My studies in Seminary and out have proved vastly "thin." So I am left to find meaning for that year of unorganized chaos as I can.

I am trying not to speak as a professional clergyman. I am speaking as a human being, hurt deeply as a former Marine. I desperately need answers; real "meat" for thought that feeds and fuels my inner man. "Textbook" answers leave me flat because textbook writers seldom "lived" as we did. None of my school mates, almost all younger than I, or my fellow pastors know anything of how to respond to my desperation. And my fellow Marines are often as confused as I am in these weighty matters. In other words, shut up. Eat, drink and be merry because there are no real satisfying answers out there. There is no unguarded truth to be had except as you make it yourself. Please don't bring your dead Marine buddies in here." I recoil at that. I found it waiting for me in the church as well as grad school as well as at work.

Now, so no one will wonder if my search is purely existential and vastly unintelligible, I believe there is an answer for "those days." A meaning, if you will; true truth. I stumbled across it in conversation but left it alone to stew on its own, in its own juices. But I keep returning to it. "If I make my bed in Hell, You are there." David, Israel's warrior King, penned those words. Having studied the subject for years, I am convinced that Biblical Scripture is inerrant truth. So I can trust its words. Not everyone is so inclined. I would ask you to hear me as a man who is hurting, in need of a healing salve. This is what I believe I have found.

I return to those words because they tell me that my God, Jesus Christ, went before me to the hell of my war. Let's settle there for a moment. I did not realize that for some 30 years, I believed that God was absent from the Vietnam I knew and was avoiding. He wasn't there. Why would He want to be in Hell? All those years I thought I was alone with 5500 Marines. Where did I think God was? I thought He was at least on R & R. Hell is no place for Deity. That's only logical but it's not good theology. God, the True God, says He was there on all those rainy ambushes; all those days of incoming; all those days of hunger and sleeplessness and so much more. We made our beds in Hell and He was there or He's a liar. So, if God was there, Jesus Christ, by reason of His Personal Presence, was there.The place has meaning because God has meaning or He isn't God. I have to deal with that. Vietnam had meaning, not because of who died, but because of who was there. Logic? Biblically so. That means I find truth where I didn't look. I kept looking at the pain and death for meaning. Not in a Personal Person.

Now, just set all the terrible things that we experienced aside for a moment. Someone in time-space-history said that God was where I was convinced He wasn't; didn't want to be; had no place being. Is that possibly true? Was He there in Vietnam? With me? I'm not asking you the question. I'm asking myself the question. I desperately need to know. Was I left hanging; all alone? Or was there some reason why I got out, alive? The questions won't go away. I can't defer to why someone else didn't make it, but was God possibly there so that He is the Personal reason I made it? I am perplexed. Either I have to alter my preconceived ideas about God and Vietnam or remain rigid and my existence sadly meaningless.

If God was actually there on the battlefield, then the killing ground, the place of unspeakable terror and horror, was of necessity, holy because God is Holy. It was a place set apart, conquered, if you will, by the very presence of God. Christ sanctified or set apart Vietnam for me to redeem me from it via His Personal incarnation there. What a mouthful. I have trouble with a place of death being holy; holy to anyone, much less God. But I still have to deal with the implications of the statement, "If I make my bed in Hell, You are there." That is to say, without Vietnam, I would not have come to put my trust in Him as the personal God of the battlefield as I did in 1972. Now, that is not a leap. Such truth doesn't make God a monster, it simply gives the place of madness real, true meaning. Doesn't it?

Do I still hurt? Yes. Do I still have bad days? You bet. Too many of them. Is life still a kind of hell? Well, I went to 4 years of college, 4 years of Seminary, 8 years of pastoral ministry and 3 years of Campus Crusade for Christ. Now I'm sitting on the bench. I've been in the hospital 3 times, all PTSD related. You tell me if life is still a kind of hell? My wife wants to do me in some days the way I act. And yet, it has meaning. God is still the God who is with me when I make my place in hell. Semper Fi.

My Buddy Kenny

Kenny Orton and I had lived in the small summer resort town of Guerneville, California. Guerneville is located on the Russian River seventy miles north of San Francisco. We weren't real close friends like my buddy George and I were, but we always seemed to be hanging around with the same crowd of kids. Kenny had been raised around Guerneville all his life, but I'd only lived there during seventh, eighth and ninth grades. We had moved there shortly before my Dad retired from the Army. He had been stationed at Fort Mason in San Francisco.

Kenny, George, Jessy, Steve and I were the local terrors of the seventh grade. We all hung out together, and would for the next few years. One good thing about living in a place like Guerneville was there was always something to do and ways to get into trouble! The bad thing though was everybody always found out when you did something wrong. You couldn't get away with anything in that small summer resort town!

Kenny was a short skinny kid who was pretty much a follower. If a group of kids were hanging around Kenny would always be there, but he'd be standing back just a little. He was never the kid in charge. Kenny's father owned Johnson's Beach. It was a small section of sandy beach located on the Russian River and was directly across the street from my house. That's where I met Kenny in the summer of 1961. I knew some local girls who worked in the snack shack at Johnson's Beach and I'd spend a lot of my time there trying to act cool. Kenny was always running up and down the beach yelling and complaining about having to load little kids into paddle boats his father rented or about having to unload supplies at the snack bar. He just wanted to hang around the girls visiting his father's beach. Work was the last thing on his mind!

It was a known fact that Kenny was always about one step away from getting into trouble. I was usually only one step behind that! While in the eighth grade, Kenny, Steve and myself got caught borrowing our elementary school's pick up truck. They always left the keys in it so we would take it out for a joy ride on the many back roads around town. We got away with this for many a Friday night until one time we forgot to turn off the headlights. By Monday morning the battery was dead! To this day I don't know how we got caught, but by ten in the morning we were all standing in front of the principal. Punishment was swift in those days. Within the hour we were all bending over holding our ankles as the giant wooden paddle with the holes in it rang out in the name of justice!

Freshman year found us at Analy High School in Sebastopol, twenty-seven miles from Guerneville. Kenny would always show up at my door looking for a ride to school. It wasn't cool to ride the bus. Kenny never had his own car, but could always be found sitting in the back seat of someone else's. Every morning it would always be the same. Kenny would start with, "Where are we going today?" Not, "lets go to school," or "hurry up, we'll be late!" It was true, most of the time and for sure on Fridays, my old blue 1951 Ford (it had "Mr. Blue" written on each front fender) just couldn't seem to head in the direction of Analy High. Instead it headed toward the ocean, fifty-miles in the other direction, stopping in Guerneville only long enough to pick up more kids. That was the Kenny Orton that I knew!

I left high school in 1963 during my junior year. I was so excited about joining the Army, I don't even think I said good-bye to Kenny. Joining the Army was something I had always dreamed of doing that I didn't even think of my school or childhood friends.

The next time I saw Kenny was six-years later in the summer of 1969. I was standing in the motor pool in a place called Xuan Loc in a strange country called Vietnam. I was watching my crew changing a worn out road wheel on our tank when I heard, "Jack? Jack Stoddard, is that you?"

I turned around to see a young skinny soldier who was about three inches taller than me just smiling. I knew that smile! My mind searched all the faces from my past. Then it clicked! "Kenny, you old son of a bitch! What are you doing here?" It was great to see him. I couldn't even remember the last time that I had run into anybody from home. And to find an old friend in Vietnam was twice as nice.

After work we spent most of the night drinking beer and talking about the good old days on the Russian River. Kenny updated me on the happenings of all our friends. It seemed like most of them were in college trying to avoid the draft. That kind of upset me, but at least my friend Kenny was in the Army. It felt great that he was here with me. We spent a lot of time together and soon became even closer then we had been back in the world. I think the 'Nam had a way of doing that.

We were in different units, me as a tanker, and Kenny working in the Chemical Corps. His job was to help purify the drinking water for our whole base camp. Kenny wanted to be a combat soldier like me, but I told him his job was even more important then mine. A lot of men counted on that water and without it we couldn't do our jobs. I joined the ARPs about three months later. Kenny also tried, but his commander wouldn't let him go from his unit. It really upset Kenny as he wanted nothing less than to get into the action. He still wanted to become a combat soldier! He wanted that first fire fight.

We still remained good friends and would get together about once a month. I was now stationed out of Bien Hoa and Kenny was still at Xuan Loc. Six months later I would leave Vietnam and once again I didn't get to say good-bye to my old friend. It was December 1969. Merry Christmas, Kenny. A soldier like me didn't last long back in the world and by March 1970 I was once again riding a tank through the rice fields of Vietnam. This time I was way up north in a place called Quang-Tri.

About halfway into my second tour our unit was working around Khe Sanh. Just holding onto this piece of land had a reputation of being hard and dangerous work. Myself and my crew were just about worn out from the long hours, lack of sleep and constant off and on contact with the enemy. It had been a really long two weeks and we had just pulled back into the base camp and parked the Double Deuce next to the shower point. I was in the process of getting my shaving kit from the bussel rack of the tank when I heard, "Jack? Jack Stoddard, is that you?"

Right away I recognized the voice and turned around expecting to see the same old friend I had left in Xuan Loc nine months earlier. What I saw sort of looked liked Kenny only much older, tired and scared looking! I was taken aback by my friend's appearance, but I still managed to jump off of my tank and give this stranger a big and long hug. My awaiting hot shower no longer seemed important to me. I yelled up to Jim, my gunner, to throw us down two cold beers from our Mermite can.

Kenny and I sat on a large boulder and sipped our beers in silence for what seemed like an eternity. Then Kenny started to speak. He explained that he had finally become a combat soldier. He also had extended in Vietnam and had volunteered for sniper school. You could hear the excitement in his voice as he slowly started to sound like the Kenny I had always known. He told me all about the special weapons he so proudly carried and the training they had to go through. Then he started to shake and turn away from me as he started to tell me his terrible story.

My dear friend Kenny had just returned from the worst mission in his life. I really don't want to tell you his story. I can't, not even today. But what I can tell you is that four snipers had left Khe Sanh the night before and early this morning only Kenny had walked back in. He was now crying and asking for my advice on what he should do next. Should he quit or go back out? I took a long drink from my now warm beer. I told him if it was me I'd have to go back out at least one more time. Kenny just sat there nodding his head, yes, as if in agreement. We talked for a while longer, but I could see that my friend was far away in a different place and time. Soon Kenny, without saying a word, stood up gave me a long hug and walked away. I never saw or heard from him again.

In 1998 while doing research for my book, I found the phone number of my friend George and decided to call. After a while the conversation turned to Kenny. George said that Kenny had called him the year before around Christmas time. Kenny had made it home from Vietnam and graduated from college four years later. He became a successful design engineer. George said everything was going well for Kenny until he started getting flash backs of Vietnam, then everything fell apart. He had become an alcoholic and lost his job, home and money. George thinks Kenny lives with his parents somewhere in California. He wouldn't leave his address or phone number with George.

I miss that skinny kid, even if he did manage to keep me in constant trouble! I'd give anything if it could be the way it used to be. Kenny and I skipping school, laughing and telling jokes as old Mr. Blue carried us off to the ocean.

The Bond

by Talis Kaminskis

On a night quite dark, I sat and waited your coming. Who you were, I didn't know then, and I don't know to this day. Although since our meeting that night, you have been quite a part of my life. Many a time I have sat and talked to you; invited you into my home; shared the tales from that long ago past. I had you at quite a disadvantage that night. Waiting for you wasn't an accident, or a chance occurrence. You had done everything but issue me a written invitation, complete with road map. Broadcasting your coming appearance, we were well prepared to take you up on your offer. As I sat and waited, I gave very little thought to you at the time. Part of my thoughts drifted to my far off home. A home alien to the lifestyle I now led. Changing to memories of childhood friends whose antics seemed more like fairy tales. All the while though, a part of me kept attune to the serenade of, the night all around me. Taking nothing for granted, experience had given insight as to what belonged and what didn't. What didn't; did not necessarily mean danger, but it did bring instantly a return to complete alertness. Erasure of all non-vital senses. Quickly the mind went to work evaluating the intruding clues. What is was; how far away; the duration of it; the direction; the possible relationship of what I was doing out there. Without words everything was gathered, sifted, and rated. Wordlessly shared with the companion by my side. Thus it was the barking of dogs let us know you were on the move long before your arrival. Very soon, I knew with a certainty that my wait wound not be in vain. What little alterations needed to be made to my position, I made, and then settled down for the final wait. No more letting the mind drift; no more movement. My comrade and I were as still as the night had become around us. In the darkness not ten feet away, I watched the first of your party pass silently by. Armed and dangerous, we were not concerned with him. We had come here for you, and patience gained from many other nights like this, kept our growing highs in check. And then—then it was your turn. Very close, carrying rice, you and your remaining comrades, made your last fateful steps. They brought in range of two M-16's. Lightweight, deadly, you had no inkling they were there. Both sighted, so that their paths of human destruction would cross just where you happened to be. I imagine that a few of the people with you were also your friends, but that, like so much of your life, is only conjecture on my part. Your small party crossed into our established killing zone. I knew I had you. No doubts, no qualms, no misgivings. It wasn't hard at all. The squeeze of the triggers made no sound, and by the time any reaction on your part was possible, the first magazine was empty and the second finishing the task. The joint effect of our actions was devastating. I was entranced by consequences of what was happening. The bullets swept your group like a tractor at harvest. Only you were caught in the criss-cross of our two weapons. Like a puppet on a string, your body jerked and danced. A slow motion performance, the bullets keeping you up. Unable to fall, my fascination grew. Never had I been privy to such a private and intimate occurrence. The rice you had carried, pitched and flew to fall; again and again. A pseudo snowlike vision to blanket your diminishing stage. I saw and remember quite literally everything that night. Everything but your face. Everything but who you were. But then again, maybe I did not want to see it. I didn't hate you. I didn't even know you. Up until that time, you were a nobody to me. I had no regard for your emotions, your feeling. No respect for the same fear that you and I probably shared. Never thought about your home and family; the love that ended for them that night. No, to me you were only a job that had to be done, a stranger who had come a calling. And I had answered in a very deadly way. Much more deadlier than I had planned. Somehow with the passing of your life, I realized the futility of mine. A year and a half of my young life, I had spent seeking to end the lives of others. I had seen blood run like water from a spring. Listened to the sounds of the maimed and the scared. Walked many a step hoping each would not be the last. And now, this night, with the chance meeting with you, it all reached my own private crescendo. I knew inside that my usefulness in this game was over. Just as it was for you, it now was for me. In that instant I lost the edge that had protected me for so long. My mind, my body were tired. Slowly I stood, holding my empty weapon in one hand, a full magazine that would never be loaded in the other. With a resigned relief I faced in the direction of your point man. Already I could see the evidence of the gun he carried. The tracer rounds gave his position away, but I no longer cared. Closer and closer, the points of light came. There was no fear, no anger, no pleading to keep on living. Just a waiting release from all the pain and anguish. A rest from the strain that had so long been kept in check. But alas my dear friend, your destiny was not to be directly mine. The bullet I sought, came and went. And I still stood. Stood shocked that I lived, stood shocked at my wait. A hammer blow had hit me, and brought me back to the living. The suddenness and force of the blow, a message to run and live. And so I ran, a fist sized hole in my back. A permanent reminder to carry, to remember you by. Ran with the vision of our meeting, with the thoughts of my deed, ran with my blood watering the ground. Seeing you now, as I saw you that night, you have not aged, neither have you changed. We have become good friends discussing so much. Many a night we have shared without light. So come in and enter, any time that you wish, my house is yours, and the bond between us means so much.

Vagabond

by Sandra Hill
Sandra_hill@gellert.freeserve.co.uk

His crumpled form was huddled seeking shelter from the cold, with heavy heart and soulful eyes he watched the night unfold.

The city folk just passed him by, oblivious of his plight, and as the rain began to fall he settled for the night.

He wondered how things got so bad and where it all would end, his past just full of broken dreams, the future not his friend.

A vagabond they called him, a rogue, a rolling stone, unfettered by convention with no place to call his own.

He dreamed of places far away, strains of a lullaby, precious moments long since gone just made him want to cry.

Reality was far too stark, its price too high to pay, he yearned for a release from life, with no desire to stay.

"You're a derelict! A down and out!", they shouted in his dream, recollections of a time when he was warm, secure and clean.

To when his body didn't ache, before he got this old,

to cherished aspirations of a life yet to unfold.

Sometimes dreams collapse, fate intervenes and plays its hidden hand, the sudden spiral downwards can be hard to understand.

Just a fugitive from life itself, in search of peace of mind, tethered to a pipe dream which long since he'd left behind.

A vagabond they called him, a rogue, a rolling stone,

he finally surrendered, took the hand which led him home.

As the stars receded heavenwards he did not greet the dawn, just a solitary silhouette, a soul forever gone.

The Siege——What is it? What was it? How, O Lord can I comprehend?

I wasn't there, but I was literally dying, six month old, at the beginning; desperate, cold and hungry just the same! But, why 0 Lord can't I comprehend?

I have listened and I have read; I have seen the "thousand yard stare!" Why can't I comprehend? I wish I knew, but I don't, in a way you Khe Sanh Veterans couldn't comprehend! Why? Because I wasn't there and neither were you all here; here in my shoes and my shoes are heavy! Heavy with the burden of trying to understand!

Oh, why can't I comprehend? I wish I could——maybe it wasn't meant for my eyes and my heart——But, why can't I comprehend; I wish I could!

Lord, I was lying near lifeless while you had my Dad at the land of Khe Sanh——

But, I don't understand why my Dad was in a lifeless land!

What you all went through I pray I never can comprehend; but please, O Lord, help me understand!

I was so blessed to find you
The person I was born to love
The special kind of love we shared
If only for a short time

You changed my life with just one kiss
You surpassed my everything
You gave your all in life and love
If only for a short time

You were all I ever wanted
You are all I'll ever need
I wish everyone could know this kind of love
If only for a short time

Life is not forever
Love is Your wife

Notes from the Editor

A legitimate question asked is why expletives are allowed in our publication. Our publication is now going beyond just our members.

Family members are now active readers. Some find the use of that one "word" offensive. We agree. It is.

It is for that reason that we carefully judge each time that that "word" is submitted for publication. We do not allow the gratuitous use of that "word." If it has an historical relevance, it goes. We allowed Dick Peloquin to use "it" in his article because it was a direct quote of what he said to another First Sergeant at Khe Sanh. The same with allowing Nick Romanentz's picture of him holding a flag, at Khe Sanh with that "word" used as a verb in regards to our enemy. In this issue and subsequent issues you will see that "word" and others even more offensive in the writings of Toby Rushforth. It took me sixteen years before I was ready to write my book. When I read parts of Toby's journal, I thought I was reading Macho Man in real time.

When visiting recently with a dear brother from Khe Sanh, he solved my dilemma by recounting an actual story from Vietnam. It was after Khe Sanh and he had just made a beer run with a jeep and trailer and returned to Vandergrift. There was a steep dirt road to the O club that the jeep could not climb. Ed was carrying two cases of beer up a wet, slippery, red clay road, when; heading down hill, a Marine in helmet, flack jacket, rifle slung, barrel down, head down, reading a letter close to his face, totally engrossed, stumbled by. As he passed he blurted out: "That f---king f---k, f ---ked me!"

That Marine summarized his feelings in five words, using "that" word as an adjective, noun and verb. We do this magazine for our members and hope our members understand that sometimes nothing can say it better than the actual words. We are an historical society. We talked that way back then. I know my momma wanted to know the whole truth about what happened to me. She was not offended by my writing the truth.

Message From The President

I am both proud and happy to inform the membership that on 04 Apr 2001 in a service held at Fort Bragg, NC, members of SOG, many belonging to the KSV, including myself, were presented the Presidential Unit Citation for service in the Republic of Vietnam. Due to the very nature of their classified operations, the very existence of SOG was denied for these many years, thus the reason for the long delay. Operating deep behind enemy lines in Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, the unit called in B-52 strikes, conducted search and rescue of downed pilots in the jungle and destroyed and recovered sensitive equipment. Their operations were credited with tying down thousands of NVA, searching for unit members.

SOG members received more than 2,000 individual awards for heroism, including 10 Medals of Honor. Unit members also received 23 Distinguished Service Crosses, the military's second highest award for valor. Their service was not without cost. SOG had a very high casualty rate, having more people killed than it had positions. Ten teams were lost. Fourteen teams were overrun or destroyed. Fifty members of SOG are still considered MIAs. In addition to the PUC, all members were presented with a special commemorative coin minted just for this occasion.

Notes from the Publisher/Membership Chairman

I want to thank the entire membership for their response to my request for an early payment of dues. Not only did you respond to my request for dues, many of you were very generous with cash gifts to support the organization and their fellow Khe Sanh brothers who had fallen on rough times. Just as you looked out for each other in Khe Sanh, you continue to do so with this organization. We have straightened out the problem and from now on, dues will be paid prior to 31 Dec of each year. Dues will only be sent to the Membership Chairman, who will in turn send them to our Treasurer. This is to avoid sending payment to two different persons which caused the recent mix-up. I apologize for any inconvenience this might have caused you.

I am also publishing a list of our members who have given additional funds to support our organization. I cannot possibly print them all in this issue, which will be at press prior to all dues being paid, but they will all be printed. The second list will appear in the next issue.

The 2001 Reunion is right around the corner. You will find here reunion details, a schedule of events for your planning purposes and another registration form. It is called "Chicagoland." If you enjoy food and fun, the arts, music, museums, sights to see and places to be seen, Chicago is your kind of town. You will have the opportunity to say "thanks" to Ray W Stubbe, Khe Sanh Veterans' Founder and President Emeritus, who we honor at this year's event. There is also important business to discuss at the annual BOD meeting. We will be voting on the new by-laws, electing new Board Members, and planning for the 2002 & 2003 reunions.

There is a particular need for someone with an accounting background to fill the office of Treasurer, as our current treasurer will step down at the end of this term.

Operation Gold Star

I've often dreamed of seeing where my Billy died. If I could only feel that close to him one more time before I pass on... I've long felt the need to visit where Franklin was killed and to feel his spirit. Maybe then I'd be able to feel at rest... I've often wondered what my Arthur saw and where it was that we lost him. Maybe, if I could be there, I would be able to release him and free this pain from my heart... Mother is always saying that if she could only be there and see that place she might be able to let go of Danny... Mom has told all of us that before she died she felt a deep need to be where Antonio was KIA.

We have heard many such statements from the mothers and families of the soldiers that we, and our country, lost in Vietnam. We have heard them at "The Wall" in D.C. and at various gatherings around the country. We, individually and in groups, have wondered and struggled with "what could be done." At times we felt inadequate and at a loss as to "how to do this" or "who could do this." We knew that it should be done! Therefore Operation Gold Star was born.

The men of the Dusters, Quads and Searchlights have answered the call of those Gold Star Mothers and families. As they did in Vietnam, they came to the aid of others. Providing support and protecting the safety of others. Therefore, The National Dusters, Quads and Searchlights Association (DQS), a non-profit organization comprised of US ARMY ADA – Air Defense Artillery - Veterans with service in Vietnam, in cooperation with American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. (GSM) is honored to announce the following undertaking.

Under OGS, DQS members will raise the necessary funds and make the necessary arrangements to allow the Gold Star Mothers that wish to travel to Vietnam to fulfill their dreams and desires. DQS members (at their own expense) will escort these Gold Star Mothers to Vietnam and to the Area of Operations in which their sons served and where their sons died. Gold Star Mothers have told us how they have longed to travel to Vietnam to see and experience the land that their sons knew and to visit the areas where their sons walked their last steps and took their last breath. They yearn for the peace of mind and closure that has eluded them all these many years.

Khe Sanh Members are invited to join DQS in this worthy effort. Your contributions are needed! DQS cannot do this alone. We have faith in you and your generosity. The Gold Star Mothers are counting on you. Your $$ will go directly to fulfilling the Gold Star Mothers' dreams. DQS & DQS members are covering the administrative cost of OGS.

Theses ladies have heard many stories, read many books and articles and viewed many pictures; yet none of these have fulfilled their longings and dreams or answered their prayers and needs. They feel the need to see, hear and smell, that which is Vietnam; that which their sons experienced and took with them when they left this world. Your Contribution can help fill these voids. Send it now!

You may make a direct contribution to the account that has been set solely for the support of OPERATION GOLD STAR. A receipt will be issued for income tax purposes upon request.

Send a check or money order made payable to Operation Gold Star, and send it to:

The first Mother is the National president of American Gold Star Mothers (AGSM), Inc 1999-2000. She is Mrs Mary E Wheeler from Utica, N.Y. Her son, Marine PFC Joseph Keith Wheeler, was killed in March 1968 at Khe Sanh while fighting with 2/9 Marine 3RD Marine Division. In her letter dated 04 Dec 1999 Mom wheeler wrote about traveling to Vietnam with DQS: "I am just so excited that at times I cannot believe it could happen to me. I wanted to so often be able to go to Khe Sanh and see where he spent his last full days on earth."

The second mom, Mrs. Valerie May from Midland, MI is Past National president (AGSM), Inc. Her son, CPL Rollie M. Northouse, was with the "Black Knights" of C Troop 3/5 Cav.9TH Inf. Div. Rollie died on 30 April 1968 in the Khe Sanh Area of Operation.

Mrs. May wrote to us: "I have had the dream of going to Vietnam, but I guess that is just what it is, a dream. Social security does not go far enough to cover this, and my little savings had better stay where it is for emergencies!" Then talking about Gold Star Mothers traveling to Vietnam with DQS, Mrs. May wrote, "As we are not getting any younger and age of course brings on health problems, the sooner this could be arranged the better."

The third wonderful woman, Mrs. Theresa O. Davis of Holbrook, MA is also a Past National President of American Gold Star Mothers, Inc (1997-98). (AGSM) Her son, SP4 Richard Shirley Davis Jr., was with the Army's Special Forces in Vietnam. He died near the Cambodian Border outside Moc Hoa and earned the Silver Star for his heroic actions in June 1968.

Our Fourth mother Mrs. Irene Tschan is living in Temple Terrace,.Fl. Her son, Marine PFC Ryland W. Drawdy, served with Company E, 2/4 and died near Chu Lai on 18 August,1965 when a mortar exploded, fatally wounding him in the head and chest.

Mrs. Tschan has turned her son's death in Vietnam into a blessing for many of America's Veterans. She volunteers four hours a week as a greeter near the emergency room at the James A Haley VA Hospital in Tampa, Florida. Mrs. Tschan is also the American Gold Star Mothers, Inc. National Hospital Chairwomen. She is their Veterans Affairs Volunteer Services (VAVS) Representative and the National Certifying Official for Volunteers.

Ladies of Gold

They are stars that shine so bright
But they don't shine just at night
For they are mothers — from near and far
Who have lost a son, in a war

They shine as does a loving smile
And as does the glint of a tear
For they gave the gift
Of one they held so dear

Their dearest treasure was snatched away
So that, in liberty, others might live today
The pain in their hearts; it does ache
They are proud of the stand, their sons did take

To fight for freedom
And to dash tyranny
They did this for you
They did this for me

I, for one, stand ready to do my part
And take each mother into my heart
And let her know, that it is a lie
For not in vain, did her son die

And these ladies
Be they young or old
Are truly worth
Their weight in gold

I'll take them in my arms, their tears on my chest
I'll tell them, he was America's best
My hope, if I may be so bold
Is for the light from their eyes, to shine like gold

A Gold Star Mother
They'll always be
We owe them plenty
Everyone... you, you and me

God, How Could You Let That Happen?

Our battalion is extremely fortunate to have an outstanding Chaplain to minister to our spiritual needs. Each infantry battalion in Vietnam has an assigned Chaplain to provide religious service to the men. The assignments are not done by religious denomination, rather on who is available at the time of a billet opening. Therefore, a unit could have a Methodist, Baptist or Presbyterian minister, a Jewish Rabbi, or Catholic Priest- whoever is due for assignment. They are a special type of religious leader- usually very down to earth, realistic and straightforward men, as they would have to be to reach men in wartime circumstances, yet, still very spiritual.

We happen to have a very personable Catholic priest, Father Robert Brett. He identifies with all the men and ministers to them constantly. On Sundays he holds mass on a makeshift altar and attendance is quite good. We obviously have to hold several services so we do not weaken our overall defenses. The large attendance doesn't surprise me, since every man feels threatened and seeks divine guidance and favor. My constant prayer, since even before I arrive in Vietnam, asks the Lord to grant safe return to my family. I ask that he give me a future with my $1\frac{1}{2}$-year-old son. It will be tragic if he grows up without a father and I have missed some of his early years. I happen to be Catholic so I attend all of Father's service whenever possible.

Father Bob is totally dedicated to his job and truly wants to be there to watch after his community of men. He walks around our positions on Hill 558 with a small placard on the side of his helmet that says, "Some men wait to the 11th hour to believe, but they die at 10:30!"

On 5 Feb, he demonstrates just how far and at what risk he will go to perform his duties. Echo company on Hill 861A is heavily attacked at 3am, suffering numerous casualties. After both of the NVA assaults are repulsed, we know we have to send replacements via choppers to Captain Breeding. At around 7am, a couple of choppers arrive at 558 to pick up the replacements. One of the people already aboard one of the choppers is David Duncan, a civilian combat photographer, who is the only journalist to ever visit our forward positions at Khe Sanh. His photographs become famous. Just as the last replacements board, Father Brett runs up to a chopper and tells the pilot he will be accompanying the replacements. He never bothers to ask permission or seek approval; he just feels he is needed on Hill 861A after their ordeal.

When he arrives on the hill, Captain Breeding spots him and blurts out, "Who's that SOB walking around without his weapon?" When told it was the 2/26 Chaplain, he adds, "That's great, I don't need to baby-sit any more people on this hill." That doesn't faze Father Bob; he just continues to talk to as many men as possible. The men are deeply impressed and appreciative of his commitment and presence.

He spots the Marine positions on Hill 861, K Co 3/26 and tells one of the senior NCOs that he wants to visit those men too! He is told that it is impossible, as there is a minefield between the two positions 300 yards apart. The good padre is very serious and insists, so they walk over to Hill 861 trying to avoid the mines. After a brief visit, he returns to 861A and then back to 558 by mid-day. I would not have let him go if he had bothered to tell me of his intentions. In his mind, his desire to be of service and to administer to those men superseded any need to seek permission. Who can argue?

A few days later, he approaches me as I am traversing the perimeter to inform me that he is short of religious supplies. He requests permission to chopper back to Khe Sanh Combat Base for one day and then return the next with his supplies. He also wishes to touch base with a friend and counterpart at Regiment. I tell him that it is too dangerous to chance the trip and besides he had tempted fate once already. I ask him to do the best he can with what supplies he has left.

Within a week Father returns with another request for a chopper trip back to the base. He tells me he has a job to do, just as I do, and he can't do it properly without the requisite supplies. What is your call? Should you let him go back to serious danger? His sincerity and impassioned plea are too much for me, I call for the helicopter.

He departs our position with no interruption and arrives quickly at the base. I make further arrangements for his return the next day. My gut feeling is that a man of the cloth surely would be granted special protection.

The next day a chopper arrives at the combat base runway to pick up Father Brett, his enlisted assistant,

Corporal Alexander Chin, and a few other individuals. As they approach the chopper, the NVA begins shelling the base with 122mm rockets. Father Brett tells another Marine to take his place aboard the aircraft, and he and Chin run back to a trench alongside the airfield. The helicopter takes off and heads for our position. The shelling continues and one rocket round finds the trench immediately killing several Marines. Among the dead are Father Brett and Corporal Chin. The Corporal, an African/Chinese-American, already possesses two purple hearts for wounds previously sustained. He also had been one of my S-3 jeep drivers during our operations in the Hue/Phu Bai TAOR.

I cannot express adequately my shock and regret when I receive the message informing me that Father Brett and Corporal Chin had been killed in the rocket attack, just moments ago. At this point I'm not sure about your total reaction, but let me assure you it immediately changes my attitude and belief in divine intervention and/or involvement. How can a merciful God allow this kind of tragedy to a man of the cloth, a good man, a dedicated minister to his people? How could you deal with such an obvious inconsistency? It took me awhile following this event to return to a religious posture, and I still can't purge it from my mind. I also deal with the guilt that if I had allowed him to go the day of his first request or not at all, he would not have been at that locale on the first day he was killed. The total shock extends to every Marine who knew him.

Man's nature is to search for reason, yet he is incapable of answering the big questions and must rely on fate, not understanding. When we become too self important and think we should know all the answers, all we need to do is sit in the field and gaze at the multitude of stars and planets in the night sky in just this galaxy alone. We then realize how small we are in the grand scheme. Without faith, we become even more insignificant.

Shortly after this tragic loss, I prepare an award recommendation for the Legion of Merit. Lt. Col Heath signs the recommendation and it is forwarded to 3rd Mar Div and approved. Father Brett is posthumously awarded that medal. Small compensation, but extremely well deserved. If anyone deserves burial at Arlington Cemetery, it is Father Brett.

PUBLISHERS NOTE: Father Brett was later buried at Arlington National Cemetery, in the Chaplains Section. His assistant Corporal Chin, in an unprecedented move, was also allowed to be buried in the Chaplains Section with Father Brett. A building at the Chaplains school in Newport, R.I was recently dedicated to Father Brett in August of 2000.
I was also on Hill 861A, when Father Brett and David Duncan visited after we had been over run on 5 February 68. Their presence did have meaning to all of us who participated in that battle. A little belated "Thank You" is in order.

A Tear on Veteran's Day

Veteran's Day, 11 November 2000, dawned bright and clear. The mountains to the east were framed in the deep orange of a spectacular sunrise. The early morning air was cool and crisp, but the warmth of the sun's rays hinted at another perfect day along the coast of Southern California. There was nothing to indicate that this Veteran's Day would be special. It would be no different than any of the thirty-three I had observed since my return from a war in a far off land called Vietnam.

In the years immediately following my return, there was a lot of hostility shown toward me and my fellow veterans. Some veteran's organizations even made us feel unwelcome. The men that went to Vietnam were not what the news media portrayed them to be. As a rifle platoon leader, I watched these young men grow old in the crucible of war.

In keeping with my normal routine for this holiday, I put on a t-shirt depicting four combat men carrying a fifth man on a stretcher. The words are, "ALL GAVE SOME ... SOME GAVE ALL!" My holiday attire always includes a cap with a Marine emblem.

Having dressed for my quiet and personal observance on this very special day, I drove to a nearby cemetery. I always enjoy watching the small flags as they flutter on a gentle breeze. I spent a few quiet moments remembering friends who are gone. Friends with whom I shared a common love—the Marine Corps. I thought of the young men who had died before I knew their names. I thought of the young men who had died displaying bravery beyond their years, of young corpsman who risked their lives to save a wounded Marine. I remembered the men of my platoon. Yes. They had human weaknesses, but they were giants when compared to the protesters and draft-dodgers of their generation. I loved them in a way that only those who have shared combat can love one another. Strangely enough, the most vivid memories were the humorous things that happen when men share danger. I said a short prayer, rendered a snappy salute, and I was off to my favorite place to socialize.

I knew several of my fellow veterans would be there, and we could reminisce. It was a daily meeting place, where we solved the world's problems without the help of lawyers or any other government agency. Our solutions were often impractical, but that didn't matter. They were our solutions, our answers. We had solved the election mess two days ago. As I entered the donut shop, I acknowledged several friends and proceeded to the counter. I noticed a young family at one of the tables, but I didn't know them. I stood at the counter while my coffee was poured. From the conversation behind me, I heard a soft voice say, "I'm sure that man is a veteran." I became aware of a young girl standing next to me. Smiling, I turned toward her. She looked up at me and asked, "Excuse me, sir, but are you a veteran?" I replied that I was, and she said, "Thank you for doing that for our country!" I stood there, tears welling up in my eyes and managed to tell her that she was very welcome. By this time, the tears were freely running down my cheeks. I have never felt more appreciated and after recovering a little composure, I walked over to the table where the young family was sitting. I thanked them for teaching their daughter the meaning of Veterans Day. They told me that her teacher had explained why we celebrate Veteran's Day and that they should thank the veterans that they know or meet, that their grandparents and even some of their parents could very well be veterans. To all the teachers and parents who take the time to explain why we observe Veteran's Day. I would like to extend a very warm, heartfelt "Thank You!"

I've shared this story with many people—veterans and non-veterans—and the reaction is always the same. They get choked up and tears can be seen in a few eyes. For a brief moment, all veterans are honored by a genuine show of emotion from a fellow American. The memory of this young girl's "thank you" will always be a part of my private remembrance on Veteran's Day.

LZ Margo?

It is late at night and I have just finished reading the Fall 2000 edition of Red Clay, the Khe Sanh Veterans' newsletter. I have been a subscriber since the late 1980s. When I receive my newsletter, I cannot put it down until I have thoroughly read it cover to cover. It always seems to pick up my spirits but then again, I am always brought back down when some of the articles hit home. It is like a double-edged sword. This time last year, I was enrolled in the PTSD stress unit at Montros N.Y. V.A.

This is the first time I have written to the Red Clay magazine. Many times I have wanted to write but could not gear myself up to do it. Please be advised, I am not very good at writing down my thoughts, but here goes. Before I begin I have a question. What is the significance of the guy wearing the NVA helmet on the cover? There was not an accompanying article with an explanation. It actually gave me the creeps. A lot of the guys at the VA Center wanted to Xerox it and make a dartboard. My personal thought was that he had done his duty, as we had, serving his country, and we should not feel that much bitterness. There were just as many people back in the World who were worse enemies.

But what really garnered my attention was the article written by Michael Worth (Short Rounds: No Small Things) when he spoke of his buddy Stan Pettit, who was KIA at LZ Margo. Although I did not know Stan Pettit personally, I lost a lot of good friends there as well. When the action incurred, I was on R&R. I did hear it was real bad for the troops.

Over the years, I have attempted to learn the facts of that action. These attempts met with failure. Although I am not yet computer literate, I did obtain a copy of the official Marine Corps action in Vietnam from Headquarters, Washington D.C. There was no mention of the action that occurred at LZ Margo in that report. There is something not right here. If any one of our brothers can share their memories regarding LZ Margo, it would be much appreciated.

I also have something of interest to the family of Stan Pettit. When I returned from R&R, there was a small ceremony held on the USS Princeton for the 46 Marines and Navy Corpsman who gave their lives in defense of LZ Margo. I am enclosing a copy. Please see to it that it gets to the Pettit family. It isn't much but it shows there was a service held for these brave Marines and Navy Corpsman. Most of the time this was not the case. God Bless them all.

PUBLISHERS COMMENT: The picture of the cover was taken by our managing editor Paul Knight, during a trip back to Vietnam. It is of an old NVA soldier wearing what we refer to as "our colors." He did not pose for it; Paul captured him in that pose with a long-range lens. The copy of the memorial service, which included Stan Pettit, has been mailed to his Father as you requested.

Ambushed

We flew to the Khe Sanh Combat Base and started humping as soon as our feet hit the pierced steel plank runway. We followed the narrow foot path to the hills heading west, passing many other units along the way. We were to check out the hill in front of us to see if the enemy still occupied it. With Hill 881S to our backs, we headed toward Hill 861. I was radio man for Lt. Kresty 2nd Platoon. As we came to the crest of the burnt, blasted hill, we all felt the tenseness in the air. As I stepped over the bloated body of a three-days-dead Marine, I was thinking, there is something seriously wrong with this picture.

The initial burst of automatic weapons fire hit L/Cpl Chapen (in front of the Lt. and me). The man in back of me had his left arm shattered by the same burst. The lead elements of our unit were out of sight in a deep, steep ravine dividing the two hills. SSgt Livingstone had organized an assault. They all had pulled pins on their grenades. VanDerhoof fired his 3.5" rocket until he was out of ammo, then yelled to Chapen, "I'm coming to get you out of there." Chapen was fully exposed to the well-concealed bunkers facing us across the draw but had remained motionless so as not to draw additional fire. We all provided covering fire with our rifles and all three of our machine gunners stood shoulder to shoulder blasting away with smoke and brass flying, as VanDerhoof came back with Chapen in his arms. This is the most beautiful sight anyone could ever hope to have etched in his memory. After he got Chapen to a Corpsman, VanDerhoof yelled at one of the machine gunners, accusing him of almost shooting him. The machine gunner explained that he was shooting the NVA soldiers about to overtake VanDerhoof as he carried Chapen.

I was still pinned down, talking on the radio behind a "log" about 8 inches in diameter. Woodie piled in on top of me wanting to get into one more good fight before he left for home in two weeks. I described to him what he would see when he looked up and that the most accurate fire was from the bunker just to the right of the one small tree across from us. Not realizing that the gunner was still trying to take me out (since I had the radio) and that he was sighted in on my radio antenna that stuck up from my position, Woodie raised his head to have a look. Three shots from that automatic weapon hit him in the forehead about an inch below the front rim of his helmet.He fell lifeless onto me. Woodie saved my life with that move. I was just through talking on the radio and was getting ready to do exactly what he had just done. It cost him his life. I had filled out a lot of WIA and KIA reports and sent them, but something just took the heart out of me right then. I couldn't write up Woodie's report. Such a full-of-life, enthusiastic man dead, two weeks before he was scheduled to leave VietNam. I didn't know him well, but I wish I could tell his family that he was a brave and good Marine.

I hope that they have peace with him gone. It has to be a big hole in their hearts. I talked to VanDerhoof in 1999. He's doing fine. Talked to Lt. Kresty too. Can't find Chapen's name on the wall, but it doesn't make sense that he lived. Woodie's name is there. I wish that it wasn't. I've found 18 men from Mike Company, Good men all. God Bless you, Woodie, Semper Fi. (Woodie was Cpl Wayne H. Woodard from Philadelphia, age 20)

Fond Memories

Lt. Col. John "Jack" Roberts, USAF, passed away a few weeks ago in March of 2001 from a stroke. Jack was 81 years old and served in the USAF for 32 years. His career started during WWII where he flew a B-24 Bomber. He continued his service, fighting in Korea and Vietnam. In Vietnam, Jack flew many Puff missions and piloted Birddogs. At Khe Sanh, Jack served with " 20th TASS TIGERHOUNDS," his call sign was "cubby 50."

Last time I saw Jack was at the Las Vegas reunion in 1995. He was there with another Birddog pilot, Lou Armbruster, who also served at Khe Sanh. Both Jack and Lou are Life Members of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. Jack was a real gentleman who could tell interesting stories of his service in Vietnam and WWII.

In Vietnam, Jack saved many lives, even having to resort to disobeying orders when told to leave children behind or refusing to bomb a village which he knew to be friendly. Jack's commanding officer did not appreciate bad landings by his pilots. On one occasion, Jack did in fact make a bad landing, damaging his aircraft. Not wishing to face the wrath of the C/O, Jack asked his mechanic for a screwdriver. The mechanic asked, "What size?" Jack replied "about the size of your pinky finger." Jack then proceeded to punch holes in his plane as if hit by small arms fire. Years later, Jack confessed to his C/O, and they both had a good laugh.

It is strange. I was going through some old photos of reunions past and Jack's picture fell to the floor. I picked it up and memories of him compelled me to call him. I got his answering machine and left a message to return my call. Lou Armbruster called instead informing me of Jack's death. I felt sad but I remembered him and his stories and decided to share them with others. Which brings me to a point—this is why we should attend as many reunions as we can. Experiencing the joy of meeting old friends, looking at pictures, listening to stories past. Sharing experiences with our brothers from other branches of service—it can do nothing but change your life for the better. I hope I meet more "Jacks" and "Lous" at future reunions.

His wife and 3 sons survive Jack. It would be appropriate to send a card or a letter, if you knew him. His family would most appreciate the remembrance of him by his fellow brothers from Khe Sanh.

Norm Mahalich, my good friend and fellow member of the First Marine Division Association, Northern California Chapter, and fellow member of the MCL, Lt. Frank Reasoner Detachment, Hayward California and member of the USMC/Vietnam Helicopter Pilots Association, were the principle organizers of the pilots' August "ReUnion 2000" at the Town & Country Convention Center in San Diego.

Norm got the brilliant idea that I should attend his pilots' reunion as his guest and possibly as a speaker. There was also the hope I might find the helicopter crew that rescued me after I was severely injured, losing three limbs to an enemy mine. I liked the idea, and agreed to attend, also hoping to locate the actual helicopter I was rescued by. My son, who is a helicopter pilot stationed at the Marine Corps Air Station, New River, NC, informed me that most of the "CH-46's" (like the one that rescued me) are stored there. And as a long shot, I hoped to find Rich Bianchino, my wardmate at the Oaknoll Naval Hospital in Oakland, CA while recovering from my wounds in the spring of 1969.

Well, two out of three isn't bad. I did find Rich Bianchino and Ned Dautriel, the crew chief of the helicopter that rescued me. What a reunion it was! I was so extremely happy to see them both alive. The last time I saw Rich, he was in traction covered from the neck down in gauze bandages from burns he sustained when his helicopter crashed and burned. Ned Dautriel also surprised me by remembering the extent of my wounds and quoted statements I had made while en route to the hospital at Marble Mountain. Sadly, he informed me that the helicopter I was looking for was shot down and burned. I laughed and cried at the same time.

Nevertheless, I was grateful for the opportunity to convey my gratitude to the fine Marines who saved countless lives, that without their help, would have certainly perished. I know I can only speak for myself, but this was a catharsis long overdue. Everyone who has seen combat should experience it.

Subject: Operation DEWEY CANYON

1. One month ago today we completed OPERATION DEWEY CANYON. This was a bold operation into an NVA sanctuary heavily defended by anti-air-craft weapons, far from our support base at Vandergrift, and undertaken during the worst part of the monsoon. We were the first US troops ever to enter this area. We were also the first troops ever to pursue the enemy into Laos. The fire support base we constructed and defended at Cunningham, was the biggest ever established by the 3RD Marine Division. We captured for the first time in this war, Russian-made 122mm field guns with a range of over 13 miles.

2. This operation was originally planned to last only 3 weeks. We were delayed many times due to bad weather, once for a period of 9 days. During these cold, wet periods of limited supply and short rations, your spirits never failed and you continued to aggressively accomplish your mission despite the trials of weather and a fanatic enemy.

3. Enemy losses during this period were staggering. Over 500 tons of enemy ordinance transported down the Ho Chi Minh Trail was seized before the enemy had an opportunity to use it against us, or against Quang Tri, Hue or Danang. This was the largest arms capture so far in this war! In addition, the enemy lost over 1500 troops making this operation the largest and most important undertaken by the regiment during the past year. NVA Route 548 was occupied and cut, thus denying the enemy his main supply route into the Ashau Valley. His radio and telephone communications were tapped and exploited to an extent that greatly damaged his ability to hit us.

4. Our success on DEWEY CANYON was not at all a small cost to us. Our Battalion had 48 men who paid the supreme sacrifice. We will always honor their deeds and cherish their memory. Also over 240 Marines and Corpsman from 3RD Battalion, 9TH Marines, were wounded in action; some for the second or third time. We wish them a speedy recovery.

5. Your outstanding results have not gone unnoticed. The corps Commander, Lieutenant General STILLWELL, has recommended the regiment for the Army Presidential Unit Citation for this action. Recently, Major General Davis received for the 3RD Marine Division, the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry with Palm (a unit citation) that covers the period of DEWEY CANYON.

6. I wish to commend each member of the Battalion for this unselfish devotion to duty and his untiring efforts. Congratulations on a job well done, best wishes for success in the future!

Going Home

I feel that one of the most profound feelings was the thought of going home and the mystery about it. There were two things that weren't talked too much about in a boasting way: when you were leaving, (short timer), and premonitions about dying. I have seen it come true for a few and even made it more mysterious. Many would say, "I will believe it that I'm home when I'm sitting in my living room." The flight home I feel was really emotional, looking out the plane windows and watching Vietnam disappear behind you, the anticipation of what to expect arriving in the states. I got out in August 1970 in Philly Naval Base, where Tun's Tavern is located. I felt at the time it was a neat place to be released.

I read with interest the letter from Gary Foster in which he points out that folks are having trouble finding the USMC airstrip. I was at Khe Sanh in early February 1968 until I was wounded, at which time I was sent to Hill 881 South with three 105 Howitzers to help defend Khe Sanh. When it was time to evacuate the Hill, they took us off under fire and as we went over Khe Sanh, we circled, as we had all come from there. I took the attached photo of the base. The second is me at Hill 881South and the third is a map of the base at the time the Russian tanks were after us.

I was a Cpl. with Charlie 1/13 at Khe Sanh and at Hill 881South in 1968 during Tet

Batcats at Work

By Bill Person

Excerpt from BATCATS: Sensors Go to War

The Air Force had purchased 60 converted Navy Willie Victors to use in a MacNamara Priority One Project called a lot of names. Many are not listed here, and rightfully so. In early 1967, nine college professors were invited to a Pentagon-funded think tank. Their objective was to devise a plan to "impede the flow of men and materials down the Ho Chi Minh Trail." America, regardless of Robert Strange McNamara's insistence to President Johnson, was not winning the minds and hearts of the Vietnamese people in the south.

The supreme Perfumed Prince, General William C. Westmoreland, was not "being all you can be" Army's idea in the Vietnam War. Operation Rolling Thunder, originally intended to last only a few weeks, was still in progress. The Rules of Engagement that prohibited actually inflicting injury to North Vietnam, served to stir the people against us, not dishearten them as Secretary of Defense RSM claimed.

The nine professors did propose a cheap method (a relative term for merely a billion tax dollars) of "impeding" Hanoi's waging a war against South Vietnam. They recommended using Navy C-121 Super Constellations as an airborne platform to detect movement with sensors that were seeded along the trail in the Laotian panhandle by modifying radio receivers, ARR-52s, with also modified submarine sonobuoys as sensors, all in-house available items.

This was then renamed "Practice Nine" and ordered into R&D. Apparently, the Pentagon knew that LBJ was not going to employ their plan to bomb 94 strategic targets within three weeks of the real Rolling Thunder. McNamara convinced LBJ not to focus on an outright total devastation-type bombing of North Vietnam but rather hit more inoffensive obscure targets with the intent of demonstrating our capability. It failed, of course, and the Pentagon did not bother to use "halt" because that was not a possibility—"impede" was.

By June 1967, the Defense Communications Planning Group (DCPG), an offshoot of the Navy at Washington, took charge and initiated testing and developing the now dubbed "Muscle Shoals" and "Dune Moon." Forty-one crews were amassed and processed, and training commenced along with testing.

A huge Air Defense-type blockhouse was constructed at Nakhon Phanom along with four massive rotating framework-type dish antennas on derrick mounts. The 553rd Reconnaissance Wing with its two Squadrons, the 553rd and 554th deployed to Korat (Nakhon Ratchasima) Royal Thai Air Base, Thailand before the end of the year. A crew consisted of 19 members, an aircraft commander, a co-pilot, two navigators, an electronics warfare officer, EWO, two flight engineers, a radio operator, a Combat Information Control Officer, eight Combat Information Monitors and two electronics technicians. A plexiglass plotting board was positioned across the aisle from the CICO's position in the back.

As the CIMs called in "hits" on their radios, indicating activity down on the ground, this movement was plotted on the board. The CICO had an encrypted radio, an ARC-109 with a KY paddle set scrambler to communicate with other Batcat aircraft and Task Force Alpha at Nakhon Phanom. The CICO panel also had other UHF, VHF and HF radio capabilities. The plane employed, in addition to the CIMs who were considered as merely backup, an "X" band transmitter to relay all the sensor beeps on to NKP. At TFA's blockhouse, giant computers processed the signals and plotted them on a printer.

Once a truck convoy was determined, as programmed by the computer, a report was generated. TFA was staffed by civilians, highly overpaid, tax-deferred who sent off a "Spotlight Report." TFA members had gone to 7th AF and most of the bases, 7/13th AF at Udorn to sell the importance of these reports. The Airborne Communications and Combat Control ship, ABCCC maintained two orbits in the Laos panhandle around the clock. "Hillsboro" day and "Moonbeam" night flew "Barrel Roll" and "Cricket" day and "Alley cat" night in the south part. Forward Air Controllers (FACs) were assigned a sector and when they had targets, ABCCC sent them fighters to strike them. The computer at NKP (Naked Fanny) was programmed to detect movement of trucks going past four sensors placed along a road on the Ho Chi Minh Trail. TFA erroneously thought truck convoys formed up at Hanoi and drove down close to Saigon. In fact, it was a shuttle/relay type of supply system designed to dodge our bomb-laden jets.

Sold on the importance of "Spotlights," ABCCCs sent FACs to check on the high priority targets. But, as it turned out, the trucks never responded as TFA's computers thought. When the FAC got to the predicted location indicated in the "Spotlight," nothing was there. The trucks had pulled-up and stopped or else turned off the road but did not get to the place predicted by TFA. After a while, ABCCCs and FACs stopped responding to the urgent "Spotlight" messages. Again, TFA would make the rounds selling the importance of their highly prized "Spotlights."

I knew about this and back during the last of January 1968, I punched in the illuminated on/off button to listen in on one of our Accubuoy sensors. I heard the unmistakable squeaking sounds of a tracked vehicle moving down the road. Curious, I began to punch buttons to hear several more of these tracked vehicles. I consulted my detailed map of the area to see that a lot of bomb craters were blown in that section of Route 9 of the trail. These vehicles were going around them and proceeding on down the trail. This old Texas boy knew the sounds of a bulldozer from growing up in the oil patch and also in ranch and farm country. The powerful diesel engine is left at a high rev while the gears are changed to move back and forth while working the blade to do the dirt moving work. This was not the case here, and I heard more and more of the tracked vehicles move down the trail in a widely spread spacing. I kept notes and when I got back to Korat, I insisted our Operations Center fire off a message reporting tanks moving down the trail towards South Vietnam.

I will never forget the enthusiasm I generated at the newly constructed 553rd RCW Ops Center when we sent out that message and waited for an answer. In fact, I had served in the additional duty special project as Wing Beautification Officer. I had driven a pick-up truck into Korat and instructed some airmen with me to dig up banana plants and a bunch of other flora to plant around the new headquarters buildings. I was kind of thought of as something special by my fellow Batcats. When the message came in from 7th AF at Ton Son Nhut, it stated that Air Force estimates did not assess NVA with possessing tanks. It went on to suggest what I had heard might have been bulldozers doing repair work on bomb craters on the trail. I fumed and exclaimed that this Texas boy sure as hell knew what a bulldozer sounded like, and these were tanks.

A little more than a week later, on February 7, 1968, the Special Forces camp at Lang Vei reported tanks. As a matter of fact, it was at 0035 hours, Sergeant Nikolas Fragos in the Tactical Observations Center tower reported, "They've got tanks!" He went on to say, "I don't know how many, but they have tanks out there!" Captain Frank C. Willoughby asked, "Where the hell are they?" "We have two tanks in our wire!" Fragos shouted. An unknown station then added, "We've got five tanks on line right at our wire!" Then the same voice said, "We've got tanks inside our wire! I said inside our wire!"

When our headquarters did acknowledge this fact, they said that these were 11 Soviet-built PT76 amphibious type armored vehicles, not tanks. Whatever they were, they sure as hell kicked the hell out of our Army Special Forces at Lang Vei and the Marines at Khe Sanh. That was the start of the infamous Tet Offensive and the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh. My brother-in-law, Marine 1st Lt Marion Henry (Hank) Norman was killed there on March 29th. Because of the technicality, headquarters never admitted to my correct assessment about tanks, not bulldozers.

Some time later, I was watching the lights go on and off on the CICO panel display and checking the activity on the plotting board against my map. I noticed that a truck with a rather loud exhaust would go past some of the sensors but never get to the fourth one in a string of four. Then, a bit later, it went back north again. This was just south of the Ben Hai River on our Blue Orbit, which was up near the DMZ and above the Rock Pile and Con Thien, all just south of the river.

I began to observe a repeating event of the truck and I just employed my old Security Service creative thinking process. It occurred to me that this was where the NVA brought supplies and ammo down Route 1 to the DMZ, then west to a point where their sampans ferried the stuff across the Ben Hai River. I managed to imagine that there were storage parks on both sides of the river. Running south a short way, the road had a spur back to the west and I imagined that there under a grove of trees, was another ammo dump. I got the timing down for the repeating trips of the truck and then called Alley cat. The ABCCC answered, and I asked him if he could go secure voice with me. He said he could and we made contact via scrambler on a different frequency from TFA. I didn't want them to hear me. I told Alley cat about my suspicions and that I had heard the jet jocks screaming for targets, not wanting to drop their ordnance on a harmless disposal area. They were running low of fuel and wanted the mission to count for something. I gave Alley cat the coordinates, and he sent Covey in to check it out. I had timed it so the truck would be back at the river taking on another load.

Covey, a FAC, spotted what he thought might be something under some trees. He marked it with a Mighty Mite smoke rocket and two F-100s were cleared in hot. Luckily, they were spread and two barely veered off because Lead's bombs set the entire grove off in a tremendous series of explosions. I could hear him on the other clear frequency. "My god, watch it, Two! Looks like the whole world blew up!" Lead shouted.

Two broke it off and barely missed the billowing fireball. Alley cat got a bomb damage assessment (BDA) of an estimated 270 secondary explosions from that ammo dump. Alley cat relayed, as I heard also, a call for another target like that one. I gave him the spot I was sure was the place where the truck might be loading up again. This time, Covey marked it and F-100 Two, the wingman delivered his load. "BOOM!" Another estimated 270 secondaries. And probably a truck too.

From the illumination of the explosions, the FAC could see activity across the river. This was called Tally Ho. When Covey swooped over to mark it with another Mighty Mite white phosphorus smoke rocket, he accidentally ignited that ammo supply dump, too.

Needless to say, Alley cat and a bunch of jet jocks got all enthused about the Batcats from Korat. However, like all good wars, fun is the first casualty. TFA also learned of this inter-unit unauthorized communication and all future such direct contact with ABCCCs were prohibited. I tried it directly with FACs and jet jocks too but that, too, was banned. So, it was back to ignoring Spotlight reports, gaining a term for a Lamar Cranston, or the Shadow Reports.

I did get a chance to officially pose the question, "since the TFA complex was just across the Me Kong from Takhet, Laos, a known VC town, and in range for a mortar barrage, who would serve as back-up to TFA?" TFA proudly announced a planned solution. They were simply going to build another complex down south of there on the Me Kong.

They say, "Never stand too close behind a high-ranking civilian. You might get beat to death when he pats himself on the back."

Searching for Information

Hi, My name is Georgia Watson, daughter of William Allen Thomas. I am searching for other Marines who were his friends, fought with him, etc. I am desperately searching for information in order to get to understand the experiences he went through and maybe find his buddies. He was killed in Jan 1970 after returning home from Vietnam. He was killed in an auto/train accident, I was 6-months-old at the time, and my mother was 19-years-old. Allen was 23. He spoke very little of his times in Vietnam, so I am unable to get any info from my mother.

He was in the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, "L" company from 12/1966 to 11/1967, as a 0311 Rifleman.

He arrived in Vietnam in Dec 1966 via USS Lenawee into Dong Ha. He participated in Operation Prairie in Quang Tri as his first combat. He remained with the 3/26, L Company through Sept 1967. He suffered two sniper wounds and was taken to Okinawa out of Danang via Govt Air. He was wounded a total of three times, and awarded three Purple Hearts. At the end of his service, he was in H&S Bn, 8151 Brig Guard, in Camp Lejeune, NC. He came home in Jan of 1968. Two years later, he was killed.

My greatest wish is to find men who knew him well, and could teach me of the times in Vietnam. If you knew him, please respond. I would love the opportunity to speak with you. I have his service number and Social Security number, so if you know of a way I can locate men who served with him, please let me know... God bless you and all you have endured.

Thanks so much,
Georgia Watson (813) 994-6245

I participated in operations at Khe Sanh & Hill 881 when the shit hit the fan. My part was a very small one, and my memory of the specifics related to that and other battles is even less impressive. I served as a helicopter door gunner with Medium Marine Helicopter squadron 163 (HMM-163). We were the guys that had very large "evil eyes" painted on the nose of our choppers. During the battle of Hill 881, we were involved in missions such as insertions, extractions, medevacs, and re-supply. It has definitely been a long time.

I was assigned to the Army's MACV-SOG operations in 1968, and I flew to Khe Sanh on the day the base was to be closed out by the 26th Marines. It was a simple admin mission for me to go to the SOG Camp at Khe Sanh. The Army helicopter pilot carrying me (I did not know his aviation unit) received an emergency medical dust off mission for a wounded Marine and deposited me (he ordered me off for good reason) on the nearest "safe" place on Hill 861. I spent what seemed like several hours there waiting for him to come back. I was never certain of where I was deposited until I read your description of those Hills (Jim Wodecki's). God bless the Corps! When I saw those young, brave and drawn faces on Hill 861, I knew why God made Marines.

I had the privilege of serving at Khe Sanh, TDY to the 903rd Aero Medical Evacuation, Casualty Staging Unit from the 23rd of November 1967 to early on the morning of 29 January 1968 when I flew a load of patients out to Danang with a stop at Hue-Phu Bai. We moved all the patients out of Khe Sanh that got moved. At the time, there were some 5,000 Marines there and us 4 Air Force people. I still have a lot of pictures I took there. I guess we were too small a unit to ever get mentioned when it comes to Marine history. And since we were Air Force, I guess we didn't count, but I know in my heart that if it hadn't been for us, many Marines might have died or suffered unnecessarily. We did a good job, and I'm proud of my service there. May God bless all the men who served there, and long may Old Glory wave.

ED NOTE: You just made "our" history. And, thanks.

I was with Alpha Company, 3rd Recon BN in the spring of 1967 at Khe Sanh. I recently was amazed to read a fairly accurate description on this Website of a Recon Insertion on 27Apr 67 in which I was WIA and our CH-46 crashed and burned after being hit by small arms fire. I was a member of Team BREAKER along with Cpl. Bob Guerra, "Doc" Miller and others. "Doc" was KIA just a couple weeks later when team BREAKER was ambushed on a Recon patrol near KSCB by a company of NVA. Also KIA during that action was L/CPL Sam Sharp from San Jose, CA. Sam and I shared the same hooch at Phu Bai and his loss, as well as that of the other members of that patrol, are detailed in a book entitled Never Without Heroes—A History of the Third Reconnaissance Battalion in Vietnam by Lawrence Vetter. I first went in-country with India Company, Third Battalion, 26th Marines. I haven't had contact with anyone from that unit in over 32 years. I also lost good friends from my platoon from I/3/26 at Khe Sanh including Big Tony DeCesare, Alexendar Scottie Chisholm and others. Not many knew this but "Scottie" was actually a citizen of Scotland who became subject to the draft when he entered this country in the mid '60s. I recall him telling me aboard the APA USS Lennewee on our way over that there were always two places he wanted to travel to from Scotland—the U.S. and Australia. He never made it to Australia and was drafted into the Marines in 1966. God Bless all these guys! If anyone wants to visit, I would be glad to hear from any old Mud Marines or Reconners.

Hello my fellow brothers! I spent time on 881 and 861 and then came down to KSCB later on. I was with B/1/26 and was ambushed and wounded 25 Feb 68 and medevaced out. Spent almost a full year in the hospital (age 18). Fun stuff! I don't remember too much, only the many patrols off the hills and many night ambush set-ups (so dark, couldn't see your hand in front of your face). It's a miracle we didn't get our clock cleaned sooner. We were out so far and with such small teams. You get so close to your buddies, just to have them either get wounded or die, and then never hear or see them again. I guess that's why I don't remember too much. Oh well, that's war and thank God its over! I really love the Corps and would not have missed it for the world, really believed in what we were all doing and that makes it right (we all did). Hope this message finds all you guys doing well. Take care.

Yes Ernie, that was I, Basic School Class 1-66. Got a new nickname in Vietnam at the start of Tet, "Crazy Joe." Started flight school in Pensacola Feb '66 and became an H-34 pilot. Flew with HMM-363 in-country Oct 67-68. Got "dinged" twice for my efforts but nothing serious, thank God. I just joined the Khe Sanh Veterans. I'm guessing that's where you got my E-MAIL address from since I just looked through the directory that arrived today and found your name, Sacramento, CA. How have you been doing? I hope that you made it through Nam without getting beat up, that you have a nice family, and the years have been kind. When were you at Khe Sanh? I flew there for the 1st time in late '67—even got to the outer hills a few times—and into early '68 when the siege was lifted. HMM-363 flew H-34's with a Red Lion in a white four-leaf clover. Maybe you remember seeing some of our "birds." Do you remember our Platoon Commander, then 1st Lt. John D. Carr of Maine? Believe it or not, I talked with him on a field phone at Dong Ha in 1968. I was in a bunker and heard a Major refer to a Major Carr at Cam Lo. I asked if that was John D. Carr and got an affirmative. Got him on line for me and we talked for few minutes. He remembered me for some reason. I just retired from DOD on Dec. 31, 2000. Counting my USMC time I did 33 years in DOD. If you ever get to the East Coast, be sure to give me a call or e-mail. I'm sure I can find a few cold beers somewhere!! Severna Park, MD is about 8 miles from Annapolis. Have you tried the USMC Vietnam Helicopter Assn website?

If you want to see a picture of old "dirty Joe" in-country a little thinner than I am now and with more hair, click on Combat Photos, than scroll away down near the bottom to 2 Red Lion Pilots, click and there I am with our squadron OpsO, Major Salter. I'm sure you remember Tony Scenna from the Bronx, NY. He was in the next BOQ room from me; he flew a tour in Nam as a Bombardier Navigator in A-6's and then went to flight school and became a C-130 pilot. Great hearing from you!! Keep in touch from time to time.

"Crazy, Dirty Joe"

I was in the ABCCC, the Air Force Airborne command post, Hillsboro, which coordinated air support in the free fire box drawn around Khe Sanh from 0600 to 1800 each day. ("Moonbeam" worked the night shift.) I have never thought that I was really at Khe Sanh since we flew from Udorn, but have always had the greatest respect for those who were. We simply drew circles in the sky in our C-130 and talked to all the Tac Air that came to that neighborhood trying to hook them up with Forward Air Controllers who claimed to have targets. Our radio contact on the ground at Khe Sanh was "Jazzy." Anyone know anything about who did that job???

Thanks to all for what you did.

Thank you for making this information available. It's nice after 32 years to confirm some memories and fill in some blanks for others that aren't so clear. I was in Mike 3/9 and engaged in fighting on 881S, 861, as well as occupying 881 for 40 days following our taking the hill and patrolling that area. I remember B-52 raids—they were so high that we never did see or hear them, but we watched as they accurately worked over the next ridgeline. I remember watching air strikes to the north so intense that it created a huge cloud that covered the horizon. I remember carrying the dead and wounded and intense small arms fire, etc. etc. I still have souvenirs from 881, a cartridge belt with the communist star on the buckle and a two-grenade pouch as well as an NVA entrenching tool. I took them from the bunker in the center of the top of the hill where the round trench was dug around a small tree that had been cut down and notched to accept their machine gun that they fired at our fighters coming in. I found the body of Cpl Robert Schley of Mike 3/3 up there. He was from Oregon, Wisconsin. I was in boot camp with him Plt. 360, San Diego, March of '66. I was beside Woody of Mike 3/9 when he was shot in the forehead on 861. I carried the radio for Lt. Kresty of 2nd Plt. I would like to hear from you if any of this is familiar.

The Power of Prayer

A Mother sits quietly in her chair
As the evening sun goes down
Casting its lengthy shadows
Like ghost upon the ground.

Though her thoughts are not of the sunset
Nor the twilight calm
But oh, so many miles away
To her son in Vietnam.

Over there its monsoon season
On the ground the mud so deep
As she lifts her eyes toward heaven
She prays to God her son to keep

In her lap, worn hands lay folded
As she rocks there to and fro
A tear slips slowly down her cheek
While on her face there is a glow.

Outside, the shadows deepen
As the twilight turns to night
And as she prays, God seems so near
She knows her son's alright.

This Marine's prayers are of his loved ones
The girl who wears his ring
And the little son or daughter
They're expecting, come spring.

Then his thoughts turn to his Mother
Sitting quietly in her chair
As her eyes lift up to Heaven
While on her lips, there is a prayer.

As he thinks of all his loved ones
The sun comes shining through Suddenly the mud isn't quite so deep
Nor was ever the sky so blue.

For he knows his mother's praying
As he stands guard tonight
He feels God's presence with him
And knows he'll be alright.

The enemy, with all their guns and missiles,
All the planes that fill the air,
Have not the power to win a war
As a Marine's faith in God and Prayer

Mother of Billy Hill, W/BTRY 1/13, while his youngest son was on his way.

From November of 1965 thru November of 1966, I was with MACV-Advisory Teams 3&4, stationed at Quang-Tri. I was a SSG E-6, in charge of radio communications from the DMZ to Danang. The unit operated 19 radio sites and had 51 radio operators. Those sites included Gio-Lind, Cam-lo, Con Thien, Dong-Ha and Khe Sanh. My assignment required that I visit all of these sites. Like many soldiers did, I took along my trusty camera. I took many pictures, including several outstanding pictures of the layout of the KSCB. Unfortunately, on April 19, 1966, a flood destroyed 14 rolls of film and many notebooks, which contained a daily diary of my tour. I also lost personal items including my military medals, which I have since replaced. I did rescue some pictures and am reasonably sure that they are from the KSCB in May or June of 1966. I hope they can be printed in the next edition of Red Clay.

In August or September of 1966, the 1st ARVN Infantry Division mounted an operation, from Dong-Ha, Con-Thien, Gio- Linh, Cam-Lo, Long-Vei and Khe Sanh. It was intended to clear the area where Laos, Vietnam and the Ho-Chi-Mein trail joined. For awhile, the ARVN held their own. The G-2 section saw a different trend developing. Several weeks into the operation, a meeting was held between General Westmoreland and General Walt. They decided the ARVN forces had taken on way more then they were capable of handling on their own.

Two crack units of regular NVA soldiers, the 802 and 806 Division, were decimating the ARVN troops. General Walt committed 10,000 Marines in less than 72 hours. This was the start of the operations at Khe Sanh that lasted well into the siege. We are all aware of what occurred after the Marines were committed.

One of the pictures shows the many weapons the Marines had seized during operations around Cam-Lo. I sure hope you can use the few pictures I managed to salvage; I wish I had more to share. After being replaced in October of 1966, I returned to the States and served 14 years, 9 Months and 27 days. One of these days I have to make a reunion.

We Cared

It is really difficult to express how much we, in aircrew, cared about the grunts that we put in and carried out. We were all to well aware that often we were the only ones that stood between them and death. It was a very individualistic feeling, that if my aircraft isn't ready, and I'm not there, the grunts die. I never felt, "Screw it, if I don't do it, somebody else will." There was never someone else, only little old me. Quite a load of responsibility for a 19-year-old to carry. It certainly explains the mania for perfection and intolerance over simple human mistakes and foibles that PTSD victims show to their families, friends and at the job.

Looking for Friends

While at Khe Sanh in 1968, serving with Golf Company 1/26, I contacted malaria. When we were finally relieved, I was sent to Danang and assigned to an NVA prisoner camp. While running a patrol out of that immediate area, we were ambushed and I was wounded. I never knew what happened to the rest of the patrol and would love to have anyone who was there contact me.

While serving with H&S Company 1/26 at Khe Sanh in March or April of 1968, Cpl. Carl Bogley and myself were heading to Charlie Med to see what sort of goodies we could scrounge up. New 782 gear, food, water—whatever we could find. While approaching the last bunker leading to Charlie Med, we were approached by a new 1st lieutenant. This was not a guess, he was wearing brand new utilities, flak jacket and 782 gear. It was obvious he had just gotten off the C-123 that had landed.

The lieutenant began to question our military bearing. We were about to inform him that this was not the time or place to discuss anything after a plane had just landed. We usually took incoming mortar fire. Bogey and I ran to the closest bunker. As I turned in the doorway to tell the lieutenant to do the same thing, I saw him get hit by incoming mortar fire.

Both Bogey and I ran to him and saw he had numerous wounds to his upper body. We began to apply pressure to his wounds to stop the bleeding as best we could. The wounded lieutenant kept yelling "I'm dying," Over and over. We told him that he would be okay that his wounds were mostly from concussion. We kept talking to him to help prevent shock and put a helmet under his head. While applying pressure to his wounds, his head slipped off the helmet and hit hard against the ground. This really made me feel bad. It caused him additional pain. His bleeding began to slow and we knew he was going into shock. Fortunately, a corpsman arrived and began giving the lieutenant medical attention.

I did not know what unit the lieutenant was going to be assigned to, or, if he even survived his wounds. He had previously inquired as to the location of battalion supply, if that is a helpful clue.

Lieutenant, if you are alive and read this article, please contact me. If anyone else knows of his fate, please contact me. It has been haunting me since 1968 and I need some closure.

I, too, was a part of the "Hill Fights" of April 1967. I flew a "huey" gunship (Klondike) of VMO-6 and was the flight leader mentioned on 27 April 1967 who tried to cover the insertion of two CH-46's with recon teams west of Hill 881N. I have been haunted for 32 years by the memory of that flight leader getting hit from only 10 meters away by a 12.7 mm bunkered gun in the tree line, causing it to crash. I have since talked to the pilot of the second CH-46 and his kinds words have been a closure for me. There is nothing in my life that has meant more, nor will there ever be, than the bond of brotherhood forged in the fires of my tour in 1967, especially at Khe Sanh. I have wanted to someday simply stand at the site of the former base, and just listen to the quiet, without fear of dying. Maybe some day I will. Semper Fi from one who knows each one of you, my brothers, was worth giving my life for. May God give you peace and rest?

Cam Lo Battle Won Despite Odds

It should have been an impossible battle, an understrength Marine rifle platoon against a reinforced North Vietnamese Army battalion. But the Leathernecks won.

They not only bettered the enemy at Cam Lo, but also severely mauled the battalion while killing 111 NVA regulars and capturing 31. The NVA abandoned more than 100 weapons on the battlefield and also left quantities of explosives and other equipment.

The fighting erupted at 0215 hours on 2 February 1968 with an NVA mortar and recoilless rifle assault on the Cam Lo district headquarters. One day earlier, two squads of the Fourth Marine Regiment had taken over the defenses of the small outpost.

Intelligence reports indicated an enemy unit of unknown strength might attack the headquarters during the TET holidays. "We took about 100 to 120 rounds of 82mm mortars right off," said Capt. Raymond E. McMaken, of Macon, Ga., the deputy senior U.S. Army advisor in the Cam Lo District. "Then the communications bunker took a direct hit." The round that pierced the communications bunker killed the senior Army advisor. McMaken made his way to the bunker to adjust the artillery fires around the compound. "I worked the arty right up to our wires," said McKaken. "We ringed the compound completely with fire. "Between those tremendous Marines and the artillery, the compound was saved," he said.

Two Army quad-50 caliber machine guns on the southern perimeter were destroyed in the initial outburst of NVA fire. Then the Marine lines to the northwest were hit hard by rockets, recoilless rifle fire, heavy machine guns, and small arms, then by NVA human wave-type assaults. "The Marines just stacked them up on the wires," said McMaken. "They were magnificent, they held the line and stacked the NVA in piles." When one sector of the compound seemed certain of being overrun, five Marines rushed across the compound and took over a machine gun bunker. They got a .30 caliber gun into action and killed 15 NVA on the wires in front of them. An enemy round struck their bunker, wounding all five, but they held their positions.

A Marine in the observation tower on the northwestern perimeter was firing into the massed NVA when an enemy bullet hit the barrel of his weapon. Another bullet pierced his flak jacket, but failed to harm him. Lance Cpl. Lawrence M. Eades, of Portland Ore., a company clerk with Combined Action Company Papa, at Cam Lo, demonstrated he was an excellent machine gunner as well.

When the headquarters was attacked, Eades stacked 24 NVA on the wires in front of his gun position before the battle was over. "When we were hit, I grabbed my M-16 and an M-60 machine gun and ran to my position on the northwest side of the perimeter," said Eades, "You could see NVA all over the place, running back and forth along our defensive wires. Many were carrying crude Bangalore torpedoes or satchel charges. I sat down the machine gun and began firing."

The enemy managed a 20-foot path through the wire. They were within 15 meters of the Marine lines, and threatening to overrun the perimeter. According to Capt. Peter D. Haines, of Columbus, Ohio, the CAP company commander, Eades jumped upon the parapet and began firing into the enemy who had crept up to the Marine lines. "I thought sure he'd be hit," said Haines. "He was silhouetted against a burning building. He stood right out there in the open and stacked the enemy on the wires."

Eades was wounded by enemy grenades but stayed on the machine gun until a relief force arrived the next morning. Before dawn he had fired nearly 3,500 rounds of ammunition. During lulls in the fighting, he carried bandages and ammunition to other Marines. According to Eades, the enemy had crept so close that he couldn't depress his gun sights enough to hit them. They had crept into a small hollow a few yards in front of him. The only way he could shoot them was to climb up above them and shoot down into the NVA.

Lance Cpl. Richard C. Wall of Pleasant Grove, Utah was another stalwart in the Cam Lo defense. He ran among his men, exposed to enemy fire, shouting orders to the fire team while firing into a hedgerow to his front and pitching grenades at the enemy. When the firing slackened near daylight, the Marines redistributed their ammunition and patched up their wounds. Then, a reaction force arrived, supported with tanks to begin mopping up the battlefield.

Outside of a few Army advisors, some Marine engineers and the headquarters personnel of CAC-Papa, the platoon had been the only defense for the district headquarters. The Cam Lo defenders had practically annihilated a company of North Vietnamese regulars. According to Haines, the North Vietnamese had plans for a big celebration following their ill-fated assault. "We captured an enemy flag with all the unit officers' names penned on it," he said, "We also found a bugle on the battlefield."

Captured equipment included ten machine guns, two recoilless rifles, nearly a hundred individual weapons, several hundred pounds of explosives, hundreds of Chi-com grenades and numerous intelligence documents.

I just wanted to write and say thanks for sharing your photos of Khe Sanh Valley. I enjoyed reading your story about Khe Sanh. The photo titled "Khe Sanh from Dong Ha" shows the road I was traveling when the VC ambushed us, and I was critically wounded on March 25, 1967. I was a Marine Sniper headquartered out of 3/3 stationed at Camp J.J. Carroll. At the time of the ambush, my partner and I were attached to the 11th Engineers who were building bridges back that the French had blown up when they pulled out of Vietnam. We thought we had it pretty good with the Engineers. Two hot meals a day and camping along the river where we could bathe every evening. Since we were both short timers, we wanted to stay attached to the Engineers until our time to rotate. Our only duty was to go up in the hills above the engineers while they worked, and observe the area for any VC activity. Everything was pretty quite until the morning of the 25th. We were riding out to the worksite on a twin forty who was doing a mine search of the road before the Engineers came out with their equipment. After just a few miles out, we were ambushed by a large number of VC. I think the 3 crew members on the twin 40 were killed, my partner was shot one time through the stomach, and, when I attempted to go to his aid, I was hit seven times by rifle fire and received some wounds from grenades. I was in critical condition on the USS Sanctuary for over nine weeks.

The bridges they were building back were just outside of Khe Sanh a few miles. I was on a convoy two or three times that came into Khe Sanh. It was pretty rough traveling, the best I can remember, without the bridges being completed. I heard from some of my buddies several months later and was told that the ambush was the beginning of all the fighting that took place the last of April and May 1967. I thought I would never see that place again until I found your pictures. I showed them to my son and family and they, too, saw approximately where I was wounded. Thanks again for sharing them with me and glad you made it home.

I was a Navigator on the Marine C-130's coming into Khe Sanh in '67 and '68. First landing was May 8, 1967. We took a body bag out from a shed at the end of the runway. Seems no plane before us wanted to carry the body out, but my Navy instructor at the time was a Master Sgt from WWII and many island invasions. He wouldn't let our Plane Captain refuse to carry the body out. I wasn't on another Khe Sanh trip until Dec 67. We had lots of landings, most of them hot, medevacs, and lots of incoming. January was the same. It seemed we were constantly going into Khe Sanh. We took two 155 Howitzers out and thought we would never get off the ground. We had an after-dark landing to bring in gas masks late in January. Did it all with no lights. Feb 10, 1968 was when 813 was shot down. We lost most of the crew, four passengers and didn't go back in after that. The radio operator was my roommate. We should never have stayed after the Tet of 1968. I always say there were three wars. 1959-1965, 1966-1968 and 1969-1973. I have some pictures somewhere of coming into Khe Sanh from the air.

Russ Tucker

I served as a Medic with the Army 1st Bn., 61st Bde. 5th Mech. Inf. Div. in Khe Sanh just shortly after Tet in 1968 and throughout 1969. I fondly remember the tall elephant grass, the sign someone left behind which I believe stated "Chicago 9,000 Miles." A waterfall, I believe, just entering the Khe Sanh area. The concrete bunker was still there as late as August 1969.

On February 27, 1969, I remember being in a B-52 AF customized "foxhole" with 38 casualties half of them burned by sapper squads which had overrun our eastern flank, and if it had not been for Snoopy and its awesome firepower, I and those 38 casualties would certainly have been listed along with those brave heroes on the Vietnam Memorial. We were planted on Hill 881, and I remember how scared I felt when we left the last village. Vandergrift and we took that long winding road up the Mountain, into Khe Sanh. The mountains were black with death, and we had orders to shoot anything that moved. I remember the road up the mountain was also strung with destroyed military vehicles everywhere one looked.

The night of February 27, after 6 hours of battle, we suffered 6 KIA's and the enemy 247. The next morning there were bodies everywhere, and we just gathered those closest to the base camp, and piled them into a PC. I was so exhausted that I went to sleep face down in the red dirt, and was awoken just as we were about to depart the area. We had captured what appeared to be three giant mounds of enemy weapons. As we traveled out of the area each mound was ignited into a huge fireball that was observed several miles down the road. That was not the first nor the last of the NVA that we were to experience, but it was the closest to hand-to-hand combat I have ever come to, and I can tell you truthfully that the infantry training I received in basic training would not have meant a hell of a lot! I am probably the luckiest Medic you will ever know. I can count 18 times that I know of where a projectile of some variable type either was within a second or a fraction of an inch from killing me. My other best friends, John E. Lutze, Flint, MI, and Michael H.Flood, Toledo, IL, both Army Medics are listed on the wall. I congratulate all of you on your return home. I am most grateful to God that we made it home safely. Thank you.

I was in the 1st MOB outfit that installed the TACAN and Beacon. My home base was in the Philippines, but we spent all our time in the field. I remember when the First Marines came in to start taking over from the Green Beret A Team in September 1966. We Air Force guys stole a case of steaks that the Marine Corps used to send to you guys in the field. Nine of us ate 48 steaks. This is the first time I can thank some Marine for that great meal. While we were pigging out right next to the perimeter, some poor grunt was marching his post, Just outside the wire bitching about the good food we flyboys get. I felt like a bastard then and worse now. If we had owned up to it then, we would have been fragged.

Our 20-man tent was right next to the wire on the side opposite the runway. The really ironic part was we flyboys were in a tent while the Marine air controllers lived in a hooch built by the Seabees right next door. They had a great dog who used to keep the rats out of their hooch but chased them next door to you know who. I guess that was fair justice for the steaks. We tried everything to kill those huge bastards. Nothing worked until I got a care package from Grandma with homemade Pepperoni. The skins would be so taut the rats would fight like hell to get it out of the traps. We would line the dead bodies up for the Marines to inspect the next morning. One night, I heard a scraping noise next to my cot and put the light on a huge rat dragging a C-rats carton across the wood floor. Just like he was going to take it to his house and sit down to a great meal. I bet the bastard had a can opener waiting.

Michael Losquadro

ED NOTE: Mike If you got steaks from Marines, it wasn't theirs to begin with.

Ontos

I was in Khe Sanh from May 1967 until the end of November 1967. I was an Ontos crewman. My unit was 2nd Platoon, "A" Company, 3rd Antitank Battalion, 3rd Marine Division. I came into country October 28, 1966. I was assigned to Charlie Company, which was stationed on "Finger 5" next to Hill 55, in the Danang area. I was assigned to 2nd Platoon which was at An Hoa, where there was a small airstrip that could handle planes up to the size of C-123's. Monsoon season made the roads a mire of deep mud that only Amtrak's could easily traverse.

For those who don't know what an Ontos is (or should I say was, as they are no longer in service), it's a nine-and-a-half-ton tracked vehicle armed with six 106mm recoilless rifles, four .50 caliber spotter rifles, and a .30 cal (Browning) machine gun. Ideally, a crew of three manned each vehicle; some vehicles only had two crewman. The Ontos has half inch thick armor, that will stop .30 cal. and below. The Ontos has a top (governed) speed of 25 mph. It was highly maneuverable. It was originally designed as a tank killer.

In 'Nam, we use HEPT (High Explosive Plastic Tracer) rounds mostly, and some HEAT (High Explosive Antitank) rounds. When we got the Beehive rounds, they were very effective for clearing out tree lines of enemy snipers. The 106mm Beehive round contained 9500 flechettes. There was a variable fuse on the nose of the round that let you set the detonation from "M.A." (Muzzle Activating), where the fired round would go out 75 meters and then detonate, or the fuse could be set to detonate the round at different distances up to 3300 meters. The M.A. setting was reliable. The other settings were not always as reliable.

We had trouble getting parts for our vehicles, especially the hard, rubber-tired steel "road wheels" that rode on the tracks. Chunks of rubber would break off these road wheels. In monsoon season, we would take 30-weight oil and paint it all over the 106's, .50's, and the .30 cal. to keep them from rusting.

At Delmar in Camp Pendleton, we went through Ontos Crewman School. They told us that the word ONTOS is Greek for "Thing." After humping hills at San Onofre at Pendleton in ITR, (Infantry Training Regiment), I was glad when they pulled a group of us out after the third week of ITR and put us in the Ontos school. It sure beat walking, and you could carry more personal items with you in 'Nam.

The one big drawback is that we tended to draw heavy fire. Fifty-calibers would go through the Ontos easily, and several Ontos were taken out with RPG's. (We lost one Ontos with two crewman in late 1966 [November] to a "wooden shoebox" mine in an area that had been already swept for mines by the daily morning mine sweep. I believe this was Highway 1, "Freedom Road." It's been a long time since I talked about this, so excuse the lapses in memory.) There were five Ontos in a platoon, a platoon commander, a platoon sergeant, a mechanic, and the crewman on the Ontos.

We went to the Bob Hope Christmas Show in Danang in December 1966. In January 1967, we went on a BLT (Battalion Landing Team) with 3/9 (Third Battalion/Ninth Marines) to Camp Hansen in Okinawa via ship. We left Danang Harbor at 2:30am when the Marines on board were sleeping. The next morning, out to sea, 90% of the Marines were seasick. Most had never been on a ship before. The "green" Marines were using the heads, sinks, showers, and any other available receptacles. The sailors were not very happy about this. I'll never forget that first morning breakfast on that ship—"creamed eggs!" (I declined.) To this day, I have never heard of "creamed eggs."

We refurbished our vehicles and equipment in Okinawa and after five weeks, we headed back to Vietnam on another ship. (I believe the first ship was the AKA-106, [Attack Cargo Transport?]) maybe named the USS Cabildo? The ship we took back to 'Nam was an LSD (Landing Ship Dock)? The 3rd Mar. Div. had moved up north to the DMZ area, and the 1st Mar. Div. moved up to the Danang area. Our platoon was then attached to "A" Company, 3rd Antitank Battalion. We were in Camp Carroll for a short time. One vehicle and crew went to another unit, supposedly temporarily, but we never saw them again. Two vehicles and crew went to Gio Linh, and two vehicles and crew, with the platoon commander and platoon sergeant, went to Khe Sanh. I was in Gio Linh.

Gio Linh was 2100 meters from the DMZ. Con Thien was seven miles east of us. At Gio Linh, everything was dug down in holes and bunkers as every night between 11:00am and 1:00am, the VC would drop mortars on our small firebase—average 20-30 a night. They were close enough that you could hear them dropping them in the tubes with the "cadunk" sound, then the whistling as the round came in, and then the explosion of detonation.

One afternoon, we mounted up, and a large entourage of grunts, two tanks, two Dusters with their twin 40mm's, and our two Ontos, left the perimeter of Gio Linh and went out to the fire break to await large helicopters bringing in large wooden towers. The firebreak at this time was 200 meters wide and was bare dirt. (Many years later I found out how this was cleared—Agent Orange.) The firebreak was ultimately supposed to be 800 meters wide, going from Gio Linh to Con Thien, and was to have a series of manned wooden towers along its border. The idea was to keep the NVA from filtering down from the North through this area. I believe they gave up on that project. That day, when we were all on line sitting in the scorching sun on the bare dirt of the fire break waiting for the choppers with the wooden towers, we were told it was 140 degrees.

We started taking mortar fire from the north. After numerous close rounds to our troops and vehicles, the enemy ceased firing after artillery from Gio Linh fired on their positions. Finally, a large chopper brought in a wooden tower and placed it on the fire-break. At Gio Linh, the Army had four 175mm artillery pieces. They had very long barrels, and were on tracks. These were on the north perimeter. The Marines had five 105mm towed units, set up in the usual large circle-shaped battery position.

One day, we took a couple of incoming enemy rockets. That was odd, as we were only used to the nightly mortar attacks. And then one evening around 6:30pm when I was going to late chow after my two fellow Ontos crewman (Sgt. Mac from Chicago and L/Cpl Reavis from Indiana) returned from chow to relieve me from our position on the south perimeter, I was in the large GP (General Purpose) tent that was dug down into a large three foot deep hole. I was in the process of declining the slop that was being served, figuring I'd go back and eat some "C Rats," when what sounded like a screaming Phantom jet with its afterburners on, went over my head, and exploded out in the minefield and wire on our perimeter. Another Phantom jet went screaming over my head and exploded. I then realized it wasn't a Phantom—it was enemy artillery. I expected them to drop several rounds on us and then stop, but it just kept coming and coming. I had been shot at with small arms, mortared, and been in rocket attacks, but this was the worst. The incoming scream of those rounds was terrifying and something I shall never forget, because you know they are either going to get you, or they are not, and there isn't much you can do to prevent it except pray.

During one lull in between rounds, there were about four of us hunkered down in a corner of that big, wide hole of the mess tent—we heard a Marine calling for help. We looked up, and saw a Marine that was not hit, but obviously suffering from shell concussion. He was in a daze. We told him to get down in the hole with us, but he either couldn't hear us or was just too dazed to understand. We grabbed his hands, and just as we pulled him down into the hole, a round came in, and exploded behind us about fifty feet away, fortunately above ground, and not in the big wide hole we were in. The concussion slammed us down into the corner of the hole and temporarily deafened us for a few minutes. It was like two giant hands coming together on your ears. When rounds hit close, the shrapnel sounded like it was ripping the air. The shelling stopped for a short time. I ran back to my vehicle and fellow crewman. There were craters and shell diameter-sized entry holes in the ground all over. My small bunker and two crewman and Ontos were okay. The only damage suffered to our Ontos was shrapnel cut off the two metal radio antennas, and the ammo can and its belted .30 cal ammo on the machine gun was pierced by a large piece of shrapnel.

I sat on the front of the Ontos that was sitting in a hole dug out by a bulldozer, with the loose dirt pushed up behind. I had the dry heaves as I tried to regain my composure. As a grunt Lt. and Sgt. were checking the lines, the heavy shelling started again. Instead of taking cover in my bunker that was about forty feet away, I opted to take cover underneath my Ontos. I don't know how I got under there wearing my helmet and flak jacket, but I did. (I was a lot slimmer back then.) The grunt Lt. and Sgt. took cover on the ground in the hole at the rear of the Ontos. And the artillery shells kept coming and coming. After awhile, you could just about tell where they were going to land, if they were going to be short or long. They say you never hear the one that gets you. Well, I don't know if you hear it explode, but I heard this one coming. I think my heart stopped for a second, as I stiffened up waiting for the impact, as this round sounded like it was going to be a direct hit on us. It came in screaming, and then their was a "wump" sound, and the ground shook. I held my breath, waiting for the explosion. It didn't explode. The grunt Lt. asked the grunt Sgt. where that round hit. The Sgt told him, "Don't move, I must be sitting on it!"

After another long duration of incoming artillery rounds, it stopped for a few minutes at which time I ran to my bunker, and the two grunt NCOs went back to their positions. We saw that that one incoming round landed in the soft bulldozed-up dirt on our side of the slope, less than ten feet from where we had taken cover. There was a nice round neat hole where it had cut a path downwards into the loose pile of dirt. If that round had gone off, we probably would have been scattered over the countryside. We later learned that there was an NVA artillery battery (or two) which dropped approximately 2000 rounds on our small firebase in a 10-hour attack. They were dropping point-detonating and delayed fuse shells on us. The first rounds made direct hits on three of the Army's 175mm guns, and the fourth 175mm's powder pit was on fire, taking it out also.

Those extremely brave Marines in that 105mm artillery battery kept firing and were basically out in the open in the waist-high sandbag wall of the large circle containing their guns. One by one, the NVA artillery took them and their guns out. When everybody else was hunkered down, these guys were standing at their guns firing back as fast as they could. Those were some brave guys.

Both of our ammo dumps had been hit and were on fire, with our own ordnance detonating. It was pure hell that night. All our artillery was gone. We had two Ontos, two tanks, two twin 40 dusters, and on 81mm mortar. That was the extent of our heavy weapons. Our wire and large minefield on our perimeter was pretty chewed up with some of the rounds landing there, and detonating out mines. We expected a ground attack during the darkness. All the other firebases were getting hit at the same time, so they could not support us with any artillery fire.

A couple hours after it started, we got a couple of Bird Dog spotter planes coming in from the south but when they got close to us, the NVA were shooting air bursts at them and coming close. After midnight, we got two Phantoms in that dropped their ordnance but when they came into the area, the NVA stopped shooting. When the Phantoms left to rearm, the NVA started on us again. The Phantoms were never able to locate the exact position of the NVA artillery. We had heavy casualties. We did get a medevac chopper in for some of the wounded. Heat tabs that burn with a very low blue flame, were arranged in a large circle to mark the LZ (Landing Zone). Just after the medevac took off, and cleared the LZ with the wounded, the NVA zoned in on the LZ and dropped several rounds on it, but didn't get the medevac.

All night, the artillery continued. It was constant. My Ontos Commander, Sgt. Mac, who was on his second tour, was a tough, lean, black Marine. He told me he had been raised Catholic but wasn't very religious. Sgt. Mac was even praying that night! Just before daylight, the shelling stopped. We came out of our holes. It seemed like almost every square yard of the ground was covered by jagged pieces of metal shrapnel, like leaves on the ground in the fall. Everything was blown up. I was so happy just to be alive. We were at Gio Linh for two months. That morning we left, and went to Camp Carroll.

A short time later, we were informed that our Platoon Commander was killed on Hill 861 while he was in a five man recon team. This was the precursor to the "Hill Battles." Our Platoon Commander was 1st Lt. Phillip Sauer. When I first came into the unit, he was a 2nd Lt. He was a gung ho Marine. He always wanted to personally get into the action. I was told that when he was going to go up Hill 861 to see if he could get the "pigs" (Ontos) up there, they tried to talk him into taking an M-14 or one of our "grease guns'" (.45 cal. submachine gun). He declined and took his beloved Colt .45 auto that he had the armorer tighten up in Okinawa. You know the rest of the story—he covered the escape of the Marines left alive in the five-man team with his .45. I was told that he was cut in half by a .50 or .51 caliber NVA machine gun, and that they recovered half his body eight days later. He was put up for a Navy Cross. His family was from the East Coast.

Anyway, I ended up at Lejeune for a couple of months after getting back to the world, and then got orders for HMX-1, Marine Helicopter Squadron One (Presidential Helicopter) as a Marine Security Guard. I flew with the Vice President (Spiro Agnew) twice. After 17 months in HMX-1 at Quantico and the subunit at Anacostia (U.S Naval station Washington D.C.), I got orders for NSA (National Security Agency) at Marine Barracks, Fort Meade, Marylan where I finished my four years in the USMC, April 28, 1970. The names of some of the guys in my 2nd Platoon, 3rd A.T.'s: Cpl Yates, Snead, Reavis, Sgt. Mac, Bosman (or Bozeman) (Saul Bozeman and another), our mechanic Chapin, Cpl Wright, Peterson, Rupert from California, Pucci from New York, and Ray Updyke from Pennsylvania.

I was one of the first dozen or so to arrive at Las Pulgas that day and be notified that we were forming a new unit to be designated 1/26, 5th Mar Div—the old Iwo Jima Regiment. Gee, I thought we were going to form the 3rd MP Battalion! You mean we're going to be grunts? The humping never stopped. BLT 1/26 on the Iwo Jima, Thomason and Vancover. Jungle training in the Philippines.

No one who was there will ever forget that morning. A "now hear this" called us on deck in full 782 gear. We stood silently at attention as our BLT steamed slowly by on a sea flat as glass. Only the sound of utilities and colors rustling in the light breeze. Towering over us was Mount Suribachi, Iwo Jima. Everyone understood.

And life would never be the same again.

Here's to my brothers from D 1/26 and to 3rd squad third platoon. For Dexter, Bell, Anderson, West, Backburg, Miller KIA. To Stoddard's and Lenor 3/5 KIA. To Sgt Smith, Sgt Hall, Cpl Gunzell, Doc Curtis, Lawson, Chance, Starnes, Ebson, Ponce, Lynn, Taylor, Wyatt, Godfrey, Bell, Baxter, Bieleski, "Lurch" Hill, Doc Donady, Doc Evans. And to my friend Cpl Harold V. Armour C 1/26, we left that old high school and our friends to finish growing up in Vietnam. I love you all.

I took part in Lam Son 719 as a loadmaster on C-130's. Not a pretty sight. Many of the Viet regulars wanted to be run over by vehicles to avoid being ferried by Hueys into the battle to cut the trail. We worked long and hard to get the units in place. I think we lost 78 hueys on the first day. Kinda made me glad I was in the Air Force. We saw action all over the country but it was pretty tense in the north and in Cambodia. Thanks for the opportunity to say something.

Valentine's Ridge

By Ray (DOC) Felle

This is my account of the battle on Valentine's Ridge, which started on 14Feb68 and continued to 15Feb68. In this report there has been input from the Battalion Surgeon, first platoon commander, first and second platoon members, S-3 reports and family of the KIA.

We left Ca Lu on 13Feb68 for what was soon to be known as Valentine's Ridge. This is a small 200-meter hill approximately one mile west of Ca Lu combat base and 8 miles east of Khe Sanh combat base. The coordinate is XD990445 to XD978455 running North and South terminating at the Quang Tri River. At 1600 on 14Feb68 all three platoons and the command group started up the side of this hill with first platoon on the southern flank (nearest the river). Shortly after leaving a groomed trail second and third platoon received 50 cal. machine gun, automatic weapons and mortar fire. We received rocket, mortar and small arms fire, wounding several men. This was an NVA blocking force set in place to prevent tanks and supplies traveling up Rt. 9 to the besieged Khe Sanh. At this time we were isolated from part of our platoon (first) and could not see second or third. Our actions involved calling in fighter jets, destroying a rocket launching position, caring for the wounded, and securing our area. Contact was lost with the command group early in the battle. They had taken a direct hit killing or mortally wounding our CO, XO and Chief Corpsman, Capt. Ward, Lt. Reese and HM2 Goss. Under the leadership of our platoon commander, Lt. John Holladay, we moved off the hill and to a secure location on Rt. 9, waiting for reinforcements and tending to the wounded. At 0200 on 15Feb68, first platoon moved down Rt. 9 towards Ca Lu collecting men separated from second and third platoons and meeting up with India company. What was left of first platoon made it back to Ca Lu at 0300 hours. At daybreak, I took 8mm pictures of fighter jets dropping high explosives and napalm on Valentine's Ridge.

India and Kilo companies moved off the ridge by the end of that day with a loss of 11 Marines and many wounded. This is part of the story about that day and each has his own. I wanted to tie together all that lost their life and to say that I'm sorry for them and their families. The names below are the ones that I have researched and believe to be correct.

A Payment at The Wall for the Debt Owed

Frequently through the tears and always through a veil of tears, I've thought of those brave men who set aside their life so that others might have an opportunity to know freedom and peace. In seeing my own children being born grow and now having my grandchildren, I often think of the children who never came to be because so many young men bled out their lives before their time. Their children would be the same ages as my children, but they are not present. I see kids in a classroom or in a children's choir or playing soccer or going to the prom, and I can see the ones who are not there, as if they too shared the desks and the uniforms and laughter and joy of life. I thought of them again when my sons took wives for themselves and there, too "they" were among the missing in the rehearsal dinners and the beautiful wedding parties.

Then came the grandchildren (and I thought children were a blessing). To see youth again, what a joy. My wife's eyes are warm and tender and encouraging. Is she trying to see in there, into that secret place that even I don't know? Dear God, how many wonderful ladies waited and had no one to come home to them and take up where they left off? Do they now sit at tables alone and imagine what it would be like to share with their lover the excitement of the kids and birthdays, the new house, and anniversaries and...? How big a hole can an empty heart support, anyhow?

Of course, there are Moms and Dads whose "kids" lie in graves marked with military information—all too neat and all too uniform and all too final and all too early. Over the years, my tears have fallen freely but only on the inside. For two years now (after 31 years had passed), I have started to find enough courage to allow those tears to flow on the outside where they can be seen. I even have been brave enough to look at my official documents and records and, for the first time, allow others to see that I was awarded the Bronze Star for valor.

I never have felt like a hero, then or now. Why is this courage so needed? It's not because I still think I'm bulletproof; my Purple Heart and my limp testify that I'm not. I think maybe it's because we were one, even though we were in different branches, doing different jobs, in different parts of the land and in different years, and yet we were one. The pain comes from having such a huge piece of our innocence ripped away, and the intense pride is from the same wound, causing us to stand tall enough to easily see over the tallest trees and look deep into our collective soul.

My wife surprised me last Christmas with a set of U.S. Marine Corps Dress Blues. I sat on the floor and cried quietly, not wanting to spoil the festive time for all the family. This is the first set of "Blues" I have ever had. I'm sure she cannot comprehend how great a treasure she placed in my hands that day. I've had them tailored, and the bright, colored chevrons put on, and purchased my medals, and tried it on a piece at a time. What an honor to have the right to wear this uniform. I feel unworthy, it mystically transports me to 1775, Tun Tavern, PA, when the Marine Corps was born. It joins me with the newly graduated recruit who woke up this morning to hear his drill instructor address him for the very first time as "Marine."

The entire uniform is striking and carries a great dignity. But, it's that long, blood-red stripe on the trousers that starts at the waistline and runs all the way down that grabs my heart and makes me feel like it has been jerked out all the way down to my socks. This too, is a unique honor, knowing that this represents your blood and mine mingled together with every Marine's blood-shed in violence while searching for peace.

Today, I arrived at The Wall. Alone. My first visit. I think it was good to come alone this time. My wife really wanted to come along but couldn't, and, my oldest son and youngest also couldn't come. I think this was in a much greater plan than ours. This is a day filled with simultaneous joy and pain, pride and grief. I can only think of 10 of the names I want to look up. I forgot my list and left it lying at home, perhaps because I was a little too anxious about coming here. There are clear images of friends who are gone (since 1966 and 67) as well as merciful brain fog that allows me not to have to think. Much of my time has been spent biting my lip and hoping that I wouldn't completely dissolve with my tears and painful labored breathing.

I'm thankful for the goodhearted volunteers who try to help where there is no help, making the hurt a little less painful with a touch or a smile or a kind word, or, sometimes a tear of their own. Perhaps, they have their own ghost to deal with. How brave of them and kind. I've gone away and came back four times today. Spoken with other "blood brothers" and was doing pretty well until I saw a pretty white vase stuffed full of beautiful American flags and colorful roses with neat writing on the side that said, "Robert F. Coady, Grandpa, from Scotty, 9 years, and Alex 7 years." I never new him, but I found his name on panel 34W Line 31. Wow! Is this going to start all over again, seeing those kids with no grandfather to know or touch or laugh with or be proud of them? How extraordinarily close we all came to occupying an assigned place on the wall with them. Knowing this makes each simple joy in life even more sweet and a greater treasure.

The terrible truth is, it will never end. It is part of the price. Each time a person in uniform gives up his or her life, it's like a huge down payment with regular installments to be paid from now on in missed memories at holidays, birthdays and special occasions and, just regular days when it would have been fun to have them present to enjoy living with. Payments are made by those who knew them and loved them and by those who should have had the opportunity to.

With a heart full of gratitude and thankfulness for giving up your lives, I salute you, all my fallen brothers and sisters. You could never know how desperately we miss you and how much we long to just spend another hour with you, to touch you again at least for a moment, except we would never want to let go. Thank you for the huge down payment you made. I just stopped today to make another installment payment because I want to, even though it is costly. I'll come back when I get another payment together. Oh yes, our men and women in uniform are doing a great job. I've been to see them, you'd be proud. God bless you, weary warriors: at ease, rest in peace. WE REMEMBER!

I have many memories of fear, confusion, and the bravery of young, dedicated friends...

Crouched in a ditch by the revetments, briefing a medevac mission, watching our '46 take holes from small arms; wondering if it will be safe to fly... Running like hell towards the command bunker entrance... dodging rounds from snipers... Getting grateful looks and thumbs-up from troops "in the back" after a rescue or a re-supply... Watching our crew help to load body bags with dead Marines "in the back"... waiting for the mortars to hit the matting, praying...a lot. Crying often and without embarrassment...

ED NOTE: There it is.

I wanted to comment on a letter you printed from Robin Morgan about the KC-130 that crashed at Khe Sanh on Feb 10, 1968. He had a few small errors in his memory of the incident. I am a member of your Association and was assigned to VMGR 152 in 1968 as an aerial navigator and was at Danang when the news came in that our plane had been shot down at Khe Sanh. From my archives I have recovered the following information: The plane tail number was BH813, not QV897. As a matter of fact, I flew on 897 a year later at Cherry Point after I returned. The pilot, CWO Henry Wildfang, the co-pilot, and navigator survived. The co-pilot was Major B. White, and the navigator was Cpl. Stan Rank. I saw Stan with his ears burned off towards the end of 1968 in Okinawa when he returned on a flight from El Toro. The radio operator, LCpl. David Devik, was killed in the crash. Also the first mechanic, LCpl. Jerry Ferren, was killed. There were also several passengers that did not make it, but I failed to record their names.

Henry Wildfang is living in Oklahoma now and very active with the Marine Corps Air Transport Association of which I am also a member. He is one hell of a guy. My first flight ever on a C-130 was with him as the plane commander. I flew with him often, both before the shootdown and after. A side note: 813 was one of 3 C-130's we lost in Vietnam. The first was lost on Feb. 1, 1966—it disappeared and was believed shot down over Hainan Island, then 813, and then 814 was lost in a mid-air collision near Phu Bai on May 18, 1969 when it went down with 3 F-4's during a mid-air refueling mission. I lost several friends on that one too. From a book called The End of the Line by Robert Prisor in 1982,

I found that General Westmoreland banned C-130's from landing at Khe Sanh on Feb. 13, 1968. On February 17 and 18 in poor weather, eighteen C-130's parachuted 279 tons of supplies into the base. NVA artillery knocked out the ground control radar system on Feb. 19 and thus no deliveries were made that day.

Amazingly, I vividly recalled making an attempt to land at Khe Sanh in rotten weather sometime in February after 813 was shot down. We were all scared shitless because no C-130 had gone in since that day. We were ordered to make an attempted landing on the base, and were told that the radar had been knocked out. We got to the base, made two approaches with instruments in thick fog and got to 1/4 mile and still had zero visibility, so we had to turn back. The date was Feb. 19th. No other C-130 landing was ever attempted at Khe Sanh by the Marine Corps. To this day, I cannot remember what it was that we were carrying into the base that was so important that they would have risked it under those conditions. They could have landed a C-130 the day before when the radar was working had they wanted to, but they didn't. I have a sense that we were carrying bladders of AVGAS, but I am not certain. My pilots on that flight were Major Aschenbeck and Major Clayson, and it was the last flight of the day as we had made 10 take-offs and landings that day from Da Nang. Two to Dong Ha, two to Phu Bai and one to Chu Lai. It was getting dark by the time we got to Khe Sanh.

By the way, if that is a Marine C-130 propeller they have exhibited at Khe Sanh, it will have 4 blades and be silver with white and red wing tips.

Don Diamond

Closure After 33 Years

Many of us may believe that we are put on this earth by our Creator for a purpose. ALL of us are aware of the impact Ray Stubbe has had on our lives because of his spiritual guidance at Khe Sanh and in establishing The Khe Sanh Veterans Association. The Creator has given us a special human being in Ray. Because of his efforts and the dedication of those who have toiled to make our association what it is; because of the current technology that allows us to communicate via The Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page (a labor of love and a first class operation), we are able to bring understanding, fellowship, and closure to each other as needed. But greater yet, we are able to help the friends and relatives of our brothers better understand our Khe Sanh experience and, when appropriate, bring understanding and closure to their lives as well. I recently had the opportunity to communicate, via the internet and our home page, with relatives of a Marine KIA at Khe Sanh 33 years ago.

While checking the home page message board, I found the following posting dated 10 Jan 01:

> "I would be interested in finding more about 'the ghost patrol.' My father was very close to his cousin, Randy Stuck, who was KIA on February 25, 1968. Our family would appreciate any information.
> Thank you and God Bless, Rose."

As you can imagine, several responses were sent to Rose by the likes of Dan Burton, Sandra Hill, John Kaheny, Tom Laderoute, Larry McCartney and myself. Most encouraged her to find a copy of The Final Formation in that it may have some information. As it turned out, I was the only one that had the "real story."

My response dated 16 Jan 01:

> "Rose– I was Randy's platoon commander at the time of his death. The circumstances surrounding his death are as stated by others. During the sometimes sporadic and sometimes intense incoming artillery, you never knew for sure where the rounds would land. As I recall, this was such a day when we got barrages of incoming, and then nothing for a while. As Randy was walking in the trench line with his helmet and flack jacket on, a round landed quite close to him. Since our trenches were not too deep at the time, he was hit about chest high and probably killed instantly. I'm sure he never heard the round until it was too late. Had he lay down in the trench, he would have survived but as I said, the rounds often came out of nowhere and this was the case. I last saw him moments before his death. Although I did not witness the removal of his body, I do recall he was serving 'bad time' and was talking to Rev. Ray Stubbe about it. His infraction causing the bad time happened before I took over the platoon and I never knew what the cause was. I do remember his being upset about having to stay in RVN longer and that, at least, he could be sent to the rear to finish his time. He was real upset about that. However, he was liked by the other men and got along well with them. He was also a good Marine and not afraid of combat. There isn't much more to say. If interested, I have a photo of Randy and some of his friends taken in January 1968. Would be happy to have a print made and send it to you. We lost too many young men. My condolences albeit 33 years later."

In a response dated 17 Jan 01, Rose emails:

"I cannot express how grateful I am for your reply. I am very interested in the picture you have of Randy. I would be more than happy to pay for any of the expense for this too. Thank you for clearing up our assumption that Randy was KIA on the ghost patrol. Since I began to investigate the circumstances concerning his death, we were starting to draw the conclusion that the ghost patrol was a different incident. I never met my cousin Randy—he died about 6 months before I was born. But he was close to my dad and so Randy is special to me. My Dad has often wanted to try and contact Rev. Ray Stubbe, but I think he has been reluctant to have someone go back to those memories in Vietnam. This is why I am so grateful to you for sharing your information. Thank you again. I look forward to hearing from you. Sincerely, Margie Rose."

In a related email dated 17 Jan 01, Randy's cousin and Margie Rose's father sends:

"I am writing after reading your reply to 'Rose' on the Khe Sanh message board. Rose is my daughter, Margie, who through her caring about her Dad, began an inquiry about Randy Stuck's death in Vietnam. Margie was born the year Randy was killed, and she only has the stories of the family to know about him and some of the tears of her Dad who loved Randy as a brother, but we were really first cousins. Randy and I were both simple country kids raised in a small town of 1,000 people in Southern Indiana. The town is named Farmersburg. Randy's people still live there, although his mother and now father have passed away.

"I deeply appreciate, and in no small way, your response to Rose's inquiry in this matter. I am sure it is not and has not been an easy thing to respond to such inquiries. God Bless you.

"In March of 1968, approximately two weeks after Randy's death, our family related details of his death, which would have indicated that he was the point man for what we now know is B Company. It was not known that he was at the north perimeter. I have been under the impression that his company had been on patrol under Lt. Don Jacques.

"A major had delivered the news to my family and may have either received some erroneous information or either the family, due to shock, may have assumed a difference. At this time a news story had played on the news and it was of the account of what we now know was Don Jacques 'Ghost Patrol.' Regardless, your account does make a difference. A heartfelt thank you."

(The next section of the email explained Randy's bad time. I do not feel it necessary to share the details in this writing.) Randy had two scholarships awaiting him when he got out of the service (basketball).

"You have given me peace of mind, that he was a good Marine and did his duty in combat. I can tell you Randy was not a coward and as a 'kid' would stand up to face any bully. I appreciate your offer to send photos of Randy and his friends to my daughter. When they arrive we are going to forward them to Randy's sister who lives in Farmersburg. She and her brothers will be touched, especially coming from you, Nick."

"On a final note, I would like to tell you that Randy's Marine escort and honor guard detail were beautiful and something that simple people from a small town will never forget. I recall the day as a young beat policeman in Indiana. The sun was shining as the whole town walked to the cemetery, and those Marines in green stood tall as Private Ransom Lee Stuck was laid to rest. God Bless you. Terry Stuck, Ocala, FL."

In an email dated 21 Jan 01 and posted on the KSV Home page:

"Thank you again to all the kind folks that have helped our search. Our family now knows that my cousin, Randy Stuck, was not a part of the ghost patrol. This is what we were told 33 years ago and have always believed. The posting by Nick Romanetz is what really put all the pieces together for us. Thank you Nick. I have been able to locate two books, The Final Formation and another book by Eric Hammel which my Dad was unaware of. This Friday, the 26th, marks the 33rd anniversary of Randy's passing. That day will be a final conclusion to our search. We can now put this to rest. Thank you and God Bless. Margie Rose"

The following are excerpts from an email sent to my home by Randy's cousin Terry Stuck. The posting is dated 25 Jan 01:

"Glad to hear from you. Thanks for the response to my daughter and myself. I have called Randy's sister in Indiana and told her of the response you made. She was really deeply touched Nick. She is now 50 and married to a minister. She is just recuperating from a suspect lung surgery. This news came just at the right time to lift her spirits.

"Randy was given an open casket funeral. He was reconstructed by an absolute artist. Marines presented him in dress blues which was very touching. I know of the injuries he sustained. However, as I would say again he was reconstructed and presented almost as if he was merely asleep. Amazing.

"Hard for me to now believe that he would be almost 54. I noted that your birthday had just occurred and when this was all going on you were only 23 as a 1st Lt. Now at 56, and a lifetime on the police force, which I retired from after 32 years, I realize what a terrible responsibility both he and you had, for being such kids. I guess it took my retirement to help me get some of the answers I wanted, and of course a loving daughter. If there is anything I can ever do for you, please do not hesitate to contact me. You're a special person to my family and me. God Bless You."

Terry Stuck and his daughter, Margie, received pictures of Randy and other members of 2nd Plt C CO 1/26 on February 5th. A copy of that photo and identification of the men are included with this article. The photo was taken in our old sector behind the ARVN lines, near the ammo dump. We were staging to move to our new position north of the runway in the Blue Sector. On about 14 February, I received a card from Margie Rose

"Thank you for the picture, your time and your memories. Your kindness has been a true blessing to my family. I know that Randy's sister and brothers are grateful, as well. As I had mentioned earlier, Randy and my dad were like brothers. I believe now that there is peace now for my dad concerning cousin Randy."

As a postscript to this story, I received an email at home from Margie, Posted 15 Feb 01. It brought to closure a story within a story. Margie stated that her dad was in Vietnam with the Air Force as an MP about four years prior to Randy's service. Margie writes: "My dad was a person who can express his feelings, but he has chosen not to discuss Vietnam with me... Our search about Randy and hearing from you and receiving the picture has been a positive ground to speak about Randy and Vietnam between my dad and I."

My closing thoughts on this event go back to Ray, our association and web page. Where would the Stuck family and other people be without what Ray and many of you are responsible for? I felt honored to share information with Randy's family. Fortunately, after 33 years we had an opportunity to share the truth and bring closure for family members because of the tireless work and dedication of a few. To all of you, this is what we are about. Semper Fi...

The US Army Quartermaster Air Delivery Units and the Defense of Khe Sanh

Copyright © 2001 By Ray Anderson and Peter Brush

In 1993 a monument was dedicated in Arlington National Cemetery to the Marines who fought at Khe Sanh, arguably the longest and most bitterly contested battle of the Vietnam War. This formally acknowledged the enduring relationship between Khe Sanh and the Marine Corps. However, it was not only Marines who faced the North Vietnamese Army. The defense of Khe Sanh was very much both a joint and combined effort by various American and South Vietnamese forces.

The combination of air support and firepower provided the key to the defense of Khe Sanh. Before the siege was over, aircraft of the U.S. Air Force, Navy, and Marines, as well as planes of the South Vietnamese Air Force dropped over 100,000 tons of bombs. To the forces on the ground, however, air support meant more than the massive numbers of B-52 and tactical bomber sorties. Aerial supply was crucial to the defense of Khe Sanh. This article describes how U.S. Army Quartermaster Air Delivery (AD) units played a vital role in the defense of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

The mission of the AD units was to provide parachute packing, storage, and rigging of supplies for drop by aircraft of all services as well as assisting in loading and ejecting of these supplies. In 1955 personnel of the 109th QM participated in the development of a new air delivery technique. This low-altitude parachute extraction system (LAPES) required cargo planes to fly a few feet above ground level. A parachute was released, pulling the palletized cargo out of the aircraft and onto the drop zone. A related system was the ground proximity extraction system (GPES) in which the cargo was yanked from the aircraft by a hook, which snagged a cable traversing the runway.

In 1965 General William C. Westmoreland, the commander of U.S. forces in Vietnam requested the deployment of an air delivery unit. In May 1965, 64 men were assigned from the 109th QM (Air Delivery) at Ft. Lee Virginia to form the 383rd QM Detachment. The 383rd was sent to South Vietnam and the 109th QM was sent to Fort Campbell, Kentucky, under the operational control of the 101st Airborne Division. LAPES/GPES training continued.

In June 1966 the 109th QM received overseas movement orders. On July 23, the unit embarked onboard the USNS General John N. Pope at Tacoma, Washington. The main body arrived at Cam Ranh Bay, South Vietnam, on August 12 1966. By November 7 the 383rd moved from Saigon to Cam Ranh Bay and was attached to the 109th. The 623rd QM Company with resources to repair air delivery items also shared the 109th QM Company facilities. The establishment of the 109th's operational area was complete; General Westmoreland now had the air delivery assets in place that he requested the previous year.

The summer and fall of 1966 saw the buildup of large North Vietnamese Army (NVA) units in the area along the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ). In response, General Westmoreland ordered Marine units northward to meet this threat. Positions were established just south of the DMZ to act as blocking forces to impede NVA infiltration. Khe Sanh was the western anchor of this defensive line.

General Westmoreland stated, "There is no more important airfield in Vietnam from a tactical standpoint than Khe Sanh." Navy Seabees were ordered to undertake a crash program to upgrade the base's airstrip. Still, Khe Sanh was proving difficult to resupply. During December and January there were only six days when the weather was good enough for aerial re-supply. Rations and fuel occasionally were reduced to less than one day's needs. Rain made road travel almost impossible. April 1967 saw bitter fighting around Khe Sanh between the Marines and NVA forces, illustrating the seriousness with which both sides viewed the area.

In the second half of 1967, American Intelligence learned that large numbers of NVA were deploying into the A Shau Valley and the area around Khe Sanh. To help meet this threat, a heavy drop platoon composed of men from both the 109th and 383rd AD units stationed in Danang men undertook airdrops to supply the Navy Seabees at Khe Sanh with materials to rebuild the airstrip.

To meet the threat in the A Shau area an offensive into the valley was planned for early 1968. The plan called for the 1st Calvary division to be supplied by airdrops for the first three days of the offensive. This operation would require seven hundred short tons a day of air delivered supplies. To accomplish this more riggers were needed. In December 1967 the 1st Logistical Command ordered the 383rd QM Detachment to Bien Hoa to establish another separate Air Delivery Unit.

Since the 383rd was but a single platoon, it was augmented with a platoon of riggers from the 549th QM Company (Air Supply) in Japan, a platoon of riggers from the 173rd Airborne, and another platoon from the 101st Airborne. An additional platoon of 101st airborne riggers joined the 109th to replace the 383rd platoon of men lost during their move to Bien Hoa.

General Westmoreland estimated the forces size around Khe Sanh at between fifteen and twenty thousand men. This buildup caused the U.S. command to conclude that reinforcing Khe Sanh was the only feasible alternative to abandoning it. Westmoreland ruled out abandonment because a presence at Khe Sanh blocked the ability of the North Vietnamese to circumvent the DMZ barrier and bring the war into the populated coastal plain.

In fact, General Westmoreland wanted to fight the North Vietnamese. The area around Khe Sanh was relatively unpopulated by civilians. This would allow unrestricted use of U.S. firepower and further the U.S. strategy of attrition by killing large numbers of enemy soldiers. By January the allied force at Khe Sanh totaled about 6,000 men.

Before the offensive into A Shau Valley could be implemented, the siege of Khe Sanh and the 1968 Tet Offensive began. The large number of riggers accumulated for the A Shau offensive soon became fully engaged supplying Khe Sanh and other isolated outposts. Consequently, the offensive into the A Shau Valley had to be delayed until April of 1968, after the end of the siege at Khe Sanh.

On January 21 1968, the NVA began their attack of Khe Sanh. At approximately 0530 hours that morning Communist gunners scored a hit on the main ammunition dump. Ninety-eight percent of the dump's mentions (1,500 tons) were destroyed in the ensuing explosions. This caused an immediate request for emergency air supply. Available U.S. aircraft included C-130's plus smaller C-123's and C-7A's. The C-130's were the logical choice to quickly replenish ammunition stocks. However, the fact that shrapnel from the ammunition dump explosion covered half the runway precluded their use. C-123's delivered 130 tons of supplies in the next 36 hours, even flying and unloading at night by the light of Marine artillery flares. By January 23 the runway was cleared of debris, permitting the return of the C-130's.

Through February 10, gunfire or shrapnel hit seven Air Force C-130's. Air Force commanders felt these airplanes, at $2.5 million each, were too valuable to risk unnecessarily. C-123's and C-7A's were used instead, but proved unable to deliver a sufficient volume of supplies. Enemy gunners and bad weather simply would not permit a sufficient number of landings of these aircraft. In order to survive, the Marines would have to be supplied in the same manner as the French at Dien Bien Phu by parachute. Initially, bulk cargo such as ammunition, rations, and fuel was delivered using the container delivery system. A C-130 could transport 14 to 16 of these loads. At a height of 600 feet over the drop zone the restraints holding the loads were cut. The pilot raised the nose of the plane and applied power to the engines. The cargo moved rearward on floor rollers and then out of the plane. A large cargo parachute carried the one-ton bundle to the ground. Riggers often flew with the cargo planes to ensure proper delivery. Several 109th personnel landed at Khe Sanh in order to retrieve parachutes for future use.

The 109th was rigging supplies at Danang and Cam Ranh Bay. The 383rd and its attached platoons were rigging supplies at Bien Hoa. Cam Ranch Bay was the safest of these locations, as Danang and Bien Hoa were frequently under rocket or mortar attacks. Riggers often worked during the night, using floodlights in order to rig loads for aerial delivery. The 383rd rigged CDS (Container Delivery System) while the 109th rigged both CDS and extraction systems (LAPES and GPES). The riggers of the 109th QM geared up to meet the challenge posed by events at Khe Sanh. Initially, riggers at Cam Ranh Bay worked three days and two nights continuously without rest. This was followed by shifts consisting of 24 hours on duty followed by a six hours rest break. Similar schedules were followed by the 383rd.

These loads were not dropped within the main base perimeter. To do so would necessitate the complete closing of the airstrip during drops. The area chosen for the drop zone (DZ) was a small area beyond the end of the runway. Supplies were parachuted into this DZ with good accuracy. Still, some drops missed the DZ and drifted into enemy territory. These loads were destroyed by air strikes or Marine artillery to prevent their utilization by the enemy.

The constant enemy shelling forced the Marines to dig underground for protection. To further this move, the Marines requested an emergency supply of large timbers for bunker construction. Because of the size and handling difficulties involved, low level extraction was chosen over airland or container delivery.

On February 16 a C-130 loaded with timbers flew down the long axis of the Khe Sanh runway. The pilot maintained airspeed of 130 knots at an altitude of five feet. A parachute, constrained to a 48" diameter, was attached to the load and projected out the rear of the cargo door. Upon reaching a precisely calculated point, a crewmember fired a device that allowed the parachute to open to a diameter of 28 feet. This sudden force broke the restraints attaching the timber load to the floor of the aircraft. The plane continued, essentially flying out from underneath the palletized timbers, which coasted to a stop close to the proposed bunker construction sites. This was the first of 52 LAPES missions as perfected by the 109th QM. Larger scale use of LAPES was not possible due to the lack of sufficient LAPES components as well as concern over damage to the runway by the heavy LAPES pallets. Logistics specialists then turned to the ground proximity extraction system.

On March 30 a C-130 began rolling down the runway at Khe Sanh. Attached to the cargo pallet was a boom with a hook at the free end. The rear cargo door was open. The airplane rolled across the arresting cable, which traversed the runway and was moored to the ground at each end. The cable rose, engaged the hook, and yanked the cargo out of the plane. The pilot applied power and took off. In all, 15 loads of cargo, mostly construction materials, were delivered to Khe Sanh using the GPES.

American logistics personnel showed impressive ingenuity and versatility in accomplishing the airlift to Khe Sanh. The combination of airland, container drop, parachute and ground extraction delivery techniques meant the garrison could hold out indefinitely. Large-scale Communist infantry movements were constantly disrupted by allied air and artillery firepower.

During the period from January 21 until April 8, 1968, Air Force C-130's made 273 landings at Khe Sanh, 496 container drops, 52 LAPES and 15 GPES deliveries. These accounted for over 90 percent of the 12,430 tons of supplies delivered by the Air Force. Over 8,000 tons of the total amount were delivered by parachuting, as early as March 15 the number of supply drops into Khe Sanh exceeded the total for all of Vietnam up to that time.

On April 1, Army airmobile units working in concert with Marine infantry and engineers began Operation PEGASUS to reestablish the overland supply link to Khe Sanh. This force linked up with the base on April 6. The Marine logistics support area was allowed to deteriorate. By July 1968 the base has dismantled and abandoned.

Army riggers continued supporting U.S. military operations in Vietnam. The 109th supplied the Cambodia invasion and also rigged the extraction of captured enemy supplies and weapons. The 109th QM rigged 350 tons of fuel, rations, and ammunition for the 1971 invasion of Laos. The 549th Quartermaster Company, by now in Okinawa, sent 76 men TDY (Temporary Duty) to Vietnam to aid in dropping 4,853 tons of supplies in 369 sorties into An Loc during the 1972 Easter Offensive. Like Khe Sanh before it, the defenders at An Loc held their ground. The US Army riggers pioneered the use of fuel air explosives by rigging 55 gallons drums of aviation fuel onto skids of which were then loaded onto C-130's. Each of the 16 skids consisted of two barrels of aviation gasoline (AVGAS) and two barrels of jet fuel (JP4) The skids would free fall with smoke grenades attached to assured they would ignite upon ground impacted. In terms of destructive power, these drops compared to napalm drops but at one-tenth the expense. The 109th and 383rd both rigged the famous 15,000-pound "Daisy Cutter" bomb used to clear helicopter landing zones.

In general, the Army favored delivery by helicopter over delivery by parachute. But Khe Sanh was a special case. The advent of cheap surface-to-air missiles meant the situation would not repeat itself. Before 1968 the Communists had never concentrated their forces to the degree they did at Khe Sanh. The base garrisoned a large number of U.S. personnel. The siege lasted eleven weeks. It would have been impossible to re-supply the base solely by using slow-moving helicopters. Once encircled by the North Vietnamese, there was nothing the Marines could do except dig in and fight. Certainly there was no quick way out: the overland supply route was cut again in mid-1967.

Supply levels at Khe Sanh are better described as adequate for survival rather than abundant. The Marines sometimes went weeks without hot meals. Rations were frequently limited to two meals per man per day; some Marines ate one meal per day for several days at a time. Artillery firing patterns were also affected. Initially, the Marines tried to prevent NVA forces from getting too close to the base. Overwhelming volumes of artillery could have blocked them. It was not possible to air deliver this volume of artillery shells. Consequently, the enemy was allowed to move in close to the base in order to provide more concentrated targets for the shells available to Marine artillerymen.

It would not have been possible to evacuate the American garrison overland. According to General Philip B. Davidson, Jr., Westmoreland's intelligence chief, a single reinforced Marine regiment cannot fight its way on foot through two or three NVA divisions when the latter have the initiative, superior numbers, and every terrain advantage. Emergency evacuation by air would have resulted in a sacrifice of half the garrison. It was the flexibility, technical expertise, and untiring efforts of aircrews and logistics personnel such as the Army air delivery units that enabled the Marines to successfully resist the Communists' best efforts: the ongoing attacks against the Khe Sanh Combat Base during the Tet Offensive of 1968.

As the defense of Khe Sanh was a joint effort, so too is the writing of this article. Ray Anderson, who served with the 109th Quartermaster Company in Vietnam, provided much of the research upon which this article is based. Peter Brush was with a Marine heavy mortar battery on the ground at Khe Sanh during the siege. Versions of this article previously appeared in Army and Vietnam magazines.

By Toby Rushforth

30 October 1967, at 2145:

Took off at 1215. John Egger was lead (and I was no. 2 in the flight.) We started NW of Con Thien (just south of the DMZ.) I had a photographer with me. We were looking for NVA field artillery (FA) pieces that have been firing at the Marines at Con Thien, Gio Linh and Dong Ha. Weather was from 200′ to 2000′ ceiling. Just as we arrived in the area where the NVA FA seemed to have been shooting from... Bam! Bam! "F--k me!" Not again, and really close on the first volley? (Anti-aircraft guns, AAA, firing at John and me.) We got out of there. The weather was too bad. We couldn't have worked fighters or artillery in that weather anyway.

We went over to Mui Lai Point on the NVN Coast;—about 12 miles North of the DMZ where the weather was better and put in two flights of fighters on NVN field artillery positions, no AAA. Ahh, there's another good "spot" (target) that looks like an FA position. Chain 149, a flight of A-4s, was on station, John marked with smoke rockets... "perfect hit 'one' "(first A-4). "Two is in" (second A-4 beginning his attack) "Here it comes." (37mm AAA tracers and airbursts fired at John, the A-4s and I.) So many rounds were fired that it looked like sheets of red rain coming up at us. Airbursts formed an extensive white cloud well above us. "Shit, there they are in the tree line, take 100 (meters) right #2." Bluey! Just a tad right, man are they hosing us down! The tree lines are clouded from the smoke of the many 37mms firing at us. None of us hit! A-4s or us. A-4s made two more passes and got a bunch of them, great work. Coveys 64 and 67 took over for us. We're out of gas and have to head back to Danang.

John Egger was shot down this afternoon off Mui Lai Point. The plane exploded on impact with the water. He never had a chance. Lt. Col. Hall was up with him and saw it all. John was on a rocket-marking run on an AAA site. He received heavy automatic weapons fire from a village we've been avoiding (trying to avoid killing innocent civilians.) Lt. Col. Hall shouted three times, "63 you're on fire pull off!" John finally answered, "No I'm not, I can't see it." The radios were then quiet for a short time as John turned his aircraft to head out to sea and survey whatever damage Lt. Col. Hall was talking about. Lt. Col. Hall explained that at that time, John was trailing smoke and flames from his right boom. After John got out over the water, maybe a half mile, he seemed to lose control of the aircraft (flight controls probably destroyed), as it entered a nose low spin and crashed into the water, seeming to explode upon impact. It sank immediately. In a very short time, there was little sign it ever happened except a small "oil slick" that was visible for about 15 minutes then "no sign of anything at all."

Paul Martel and I relieved Lt. Col Ward on station, looking for signs of life, anything, it all looked the same as yesterday, except for that weird and dread knowledge that John and his twisted aircraft lay on the bottom of the rolling green sea, right there under my left wing.

Sorrow, tears, hate, so many things churn inside you at a time like this. "Those innocent villagers!" We put 5 flights of fighters on the village—bombs—cluster bombs rockets—20mm strafe. Jerry Sellers (killed 25 Dec. '67) and Cooper continued with 5 more flights on it and another nearby "village." They no longer exist. I have no remorse about that. I hope we killed everyone in the place. They had to be military. That's where the shooting came from. No one else would be living on that terrain. War rears its ugliest face in front of me. This is the beginning. Play fair? Be nice? Bull Shit! We'll either kill them or break their spirit.

At 1515, took off with Lt. Col. Hall (Covey 75) and went up the coast to Mui Lai Point again. Signs of lots of activity. Got some F-4s with cluster bombs to go after NVN in general area where John was fired at and hit on the 3rd. All of a sudden about 18 37mm AAA guns opened up on the fighters and us. Got six more flights to go after them. "Misty 31" was a great help. Man! Were they shooting! There were about 100 tracer rounds, then air bursts on just one fighter's pass. Then 75 said "watch it 65, they're coming after you." The tracers were sweeping back and forth in front of my windscreen. I jammed the nose down hard to begin evasion from that one volley, then pulled into a hard diving turn, everything in the airplane flew all over the place (camera equipment, rifle, 200 rounds of ammo, grenades (smoke/frag), etc. What a mess! They missed! I was badly shaken, then angry! Two 750 lb. bombs obliterated that one site of 4 guns. What a hit! I figure we got about 10 sites, killed 30-50 of the bad guys. Don't know how they missed, but neither of us FAC aircraft nor any of the fighters got a scratch. As the sun went down through the clouds in the west, we disengaged, things got quiet again. All of the cloud layers which had formed above us, were probably made in the USSR. The number of 37mm and probably some other AAA we couldn't see so prominently were truly awesome.

The flight back to Danang was not a time to relax, bad via enroute, and back at the field had to fight vertigo radar vectors lost briefly, then broke into the clear for visual landings, strange elation at the club that night. Felt exuberant to the point that I had an impulse to break something, things, anything. Nervous energy. I must've had a year's worth of adrenaline to burn off and here I was at the Danang club bar having a couple of drinks.

I carried a Nikon with telephoto on most missions. Most hot missions, I didn't dare pick it up for fear I'd be preoccupied whilst someone, like a fighter or me, got their butt shot off. It was 7 Feb 68, the night and morning that the Special Forces Camp at Lang Vei (on the Laos Border west of Khe Sanh) was overrun. It is quite a long story and a number of books have featured the battle (latest I read was Night of the Silver Stars.)

About the "photo " part of the story:

Covey 688, from Ubon I think, was running A-1s under the low overcast to blow the NVA off the Tac Ops Center containing about 11 Special Forces survivors. What a sight. I circled overhead getting up to speed, because 688 was low on gas and would have to leave soon). A number of PT-76 tanks (first time use in Vietnam) had been used in the attack and air and defenders killed some. As the clouds broke open to reveal the smoldering Camp—the TOC containing the survivors and the dead tanks—I shot a roll of film from about 2000 ft. (just above 688's and A-1's maneuvering space.) I did take over when 688 left and worked the situation for a couple of hours, as did some other FACs. In the end and not without some acrimonious events, the TOC survivors were rescued (though some others were not). As I just read recently, the 24 Special Forces (with some CIDG) troops on the ground were awarded a total of 1 Medal of Honor, one Distinguished Service Cross, 19 Silver Stars and three Bronze Stars with Combat V. Members of the rescue force received one DSC, two SSM, seven BSM w/V device. But I digress.

I flew back to Danang and called in my report to 7AF operations. I reported that the tanks we had been reporting for over a week (they were used to overrun a Laotian outpost as well on 25 Jan) had indeed been key factors in the fall of Lang Vei. The Colonel on the other end of the line said incredulously, "Tanks! They don't have tanks out there!" He was acting as though he, or I, had just landed from Mars? I tried the logic about the tracked vehicles with the turret on top with the long tube sticking out of it. He refused to believe me? And now to the point: When I, with great satisfaction, told that @!! %& that I had photos to prove the point, he said: "You've got pictures? Get them over to the photo lab right away! We'll have a T-39 diverted in to pick them up within the hour!" And there you have it. I did, and he did. The T-39 was there just as the pictures were done and away they went (but not before I got copies, heh, heh)! They probably had the pictures at 7AF Ops at about the time the rescue operation was kicking off.

Post log—Think any of us FACs ever saw or heard about those pictures again? Not to my knowledge. We supposed that they made some staffer's day, the one that got to show them to some real important folks.

Post-post log—I got to share the pictures and some of my diary info with one of the survivors from the Camp recently (who had spent 6 years in the Hanoi Hilton.) It was a special time and special thing to do.

Cheers,

The Pat Brady Story

I served honorably in the US Marine Corps (1967~1970) when placed on the Temporary Disability Retired List. The story begins when I was blown off a mechanical mule by incoming enemy artillery shelling near Da Nang. The force of the blast threw my body against a tree. I was evacuated to the Da Nang site hospital where a series of diagnostic exams were performed. Sometime during my stay I lost consciousness and awoke to the sound of the hospital being bombed. Next stop, the orthopedic ward in Guam.

The stay in Guam is a bit hazy, with actions attributed to me that to this day I do not recall. I somewhat recall speaking to a psychiatrist and being accused of striking someone and the words court martial and options. The end result being that it would be in my best interest to let the psychiatrist handle it and being diagnosed as having a conversion reaction. It was later that I learned that this diagnosis had two different meanings (one within the military and something completely different in the civilian world). Needless to say, what began as an orthopedic related injury turned into one with psychiatric connotations.

I remember calling my folks to let them know I would be at the Oak Knoll Naval Hospital, but experienced what they called a "black out" and came to the psychiatric ward of the Long Beach Naval Hospital in leather restraints. I don't know how I got there or what happened that caused me to be there, I only remembered fighting the war.

I was placed in group therapy sessions and after being there for a month I was transferred to the Oak Knoll facility, awaiting discharge. Seven months later I was placed on the Temporary Disability Retired List and was prescribed daily medication (a mild tranquilizer).

My introduction to the VA began with a trip to the Wadsworth VA Hospital. I remember that Friday night well. We had been dropped off at the emergency room waiting area and after waiting over two hours, the twelve of us were moved to a lockdown ward where we were forced to take medication, supposedly prescribed by the resident/intern on-call in the ER. Later that night, two of the men went into convulsions. When we tried to assist them, leather restraints were used to secure us to our beds where we stayed until morning. Medication was again dispensed. When we asked to speak to the doctor, we were told we were being unreasonable and that if we wanted to eat we would have to take the medication. When we again insisted on seeing the doctor, we were told he was on vacation and would not return for a week and a half.

As time went on, I became adjusted to the routine. I was later transferred to Long Beach VA, as an outpatient. I soon took advantage of being out, returning to the less medicated days and just trying to get normal again, with a night or two of getting drunk, having fun and going out dancing. This behavior was discouraged when I began living at home.

I took a civil service job with the government and worked as a driver for the next ten years. The reviews came and went, and I was eventually dropped from the Temporary Disability Retired List and given 10% service connected disability for anxiety disorder which is where it is today.

I got married in the 70s. The marriage lasted two years, my wife couldn't take the nightmares. I transferred to El Toro Marine Air Station after completing a voluntary paramedic training program. I remarried in 1981, had two children and had the opportunity to start a business. We bought a house in Mara Loma, and it turned out our next door neighbor as the President of the local chapter of the Vietnam Veterans of America. I soon became a member and was encouraged to participate in the Agent Orange registry which required a physical at the local VA hospital in Loma Linda.

This physical was to later prove important. I was diagnosed with a back problem by the administering orthopedic specialist. These results were concurred by an examination with my private physician.

During the Christmas holiday season, I spilled my medication, losing most of them. I was experiencing a lot of pain and muscle spasms, and so I tried to get an appointment with the VA. I was informed by the service officer for the VVA that my doctor was on vacation and I should try the emergency room after hours. I was abused during this examination when two VA residents decided to have some "fun." While examining me, they grabbed my legs and swung my upper torso around till I fell unsupported from the table. With my head inches from the floor, my back snapped with a loud pop. I was in severe pain. The residents taunted me stating, "Come on, Marine, that doesn't hurt!" Hearing my cries for help, my wife entered and put a stop to it.

My wife hurried me from the emergency room although I was only half dressed. As I limped out wearing only one boot, I was in agony from the pain in my back. In the following days, my doctor had my medication refilled. I filed a complaint over my treatment the very next day. I later learned that one of the tormenting residents had been reprimanded. I was not impressed, I was still in pain from the abuse. As the holidays ended, I had to go to the Long Beach VA for an examination. I was admitted due to an inability to urinate and ended up having emergency surgery on my spine that February.

In August, a second surgery was performed which resulted in an extended recovery period through April with a diagnosis of paraplegia etiology uncertain. This began my dependency on a wheelchair. I was paralyzed from the waist down. The condition could not be explained, and this was one of the best civilian hospitals in the area. After consulting with the Chief of Neurology at the Long Beach VA, the final diagnosis was paraplegia post-traumatic. However, my benefit level did not increase. I continued receiving treatment at the Long Beach facility and was later transferred to the spinal cord injury service soon after my discharge from neurology. But when I appeared to receive treatment, the outpatient physician informed me that I was not a spinal cord patient and refused to treat me. This began the runaround between the two units, which resulted in no alleviation from pain and a bad bladder infection.

Through intervention from Senator Alan Cranston, an ambulance was sent to my house to return me to the Long Beach VA facility, for further evaluation and admission. The Chief of the Spinal Cord Service stated that there was enough pathology to warrant future treatment from the spinal cord service. Upon discharge, I was set up with a prescription allowing me to use that facility's personal care clinic on a regular basis.

I continued as an outpatient managing only periodic visits to the VA until 1991, when I was hospitalized for the evaluation of problem occurring while transferring from my wheelchair. I was having trouble lifting my body due to the onset of arthritis in my neck. I left the facility with a lift to get me to the wheelchair, and a new wheelchair with a tilt-back system. In April, I experienced an accident after leaving a personal care appointment in the facility parking lot. The back of the wheelchair broke, and I was secured to its back as it bounced, a spreader bar striking my neck every time it hit the ground. I never made it to my van, I became paralyzed from the neck down (quadriplegia).

The VA has their own version of malpractice—"1151 Claims." I filed two 1151 claims. The first against the residents who abused me—this was denied because I left the emergency room walking "in a normal gait." No acknowledgment was made that the resident had been reprimanded or that my wife stopped the abuse and my state of "undress" as I exited. The second claim was for the accident in the parking lot with the wheelchair.

I went through a magnetic resolution imaging (MRI) exam that concluded that the herniation had increased in size and was now moderate to severe, establishing that I had received further damage to my neck. Now a quadriplegia, they issued me a wheelchair that cost more than my van with all of its handicapped equipment. They wrote in my discharge summary that...at the time of discharge I refused to move my upper body. I still do not know how after all the medical exams, procedures, hospitalizations, etc., that the VA could still refuse the claim by stating that it didn't happen on VA grounds.

Today, I am a quadriplegic requiring 24-hour care, trying to live on the VA's version of welfare. My wife left, taking the children, unable to deal with the VA. I await an appeal by the Board of Veterans Appeals—the outcome will determine my future quality of life. I am still only 10% service-connected, and the VA had only seen fit to grant me their version of welfare 100% non-service connection.

I just wish there was someone out there who could help.

PTSD From England

I am a British combat veteran of the Falklands War and have suffered with chronic PTSD for the last 18 years. My Government will not recognize that this condition exists and treats its veterans with this illness like traitors. As a demonstration of my contempt for this left wing Government, I became the first British soldier to return his Decorations. I did this for all my brothers who are dead and dying and rotting in the prison system. I have found many friends in the US who were in Vietnam and suffer the same as my brothers and I. Even though I am not American I do feel the bond between Combat veterans, and my American brothers have helped me out when I have been going through some black times through my PC and the PTSD 101 site. Knowing you people are here for me means a great deal to me. My country looks me at as some sort of outcast.

I salute you all,

Mack

Glimmer of Hope in the Heart of Darkness

How ministry to children is making a difference in Asia

by Richard Botkin

Phnom Penh, Cambodia—I do not know why but when I think of Steve and Jill Fisk, I think of the Willie Nelson song, "My Heroes Have Always Been Cowboys." Except my heroes—pretty much until I met the Fisks—were men like George Patton, Bull Halsey, Chesty Puller, James Webb, and the everyday Marine I knew in my own life—the regular guy who did his duty and served honorably whether it was at Iwo Jima, the Chosin Reservoir, Khe Sanh, or during peacetime, simply making the world a better place by that service.

My own Marine Corps service included active duty as an infantry officer with 2nd Battalion, 7th Marines and 1st Reconnaissance Battalion in the 1980-83 time frame. I continued in the Reserves for another 11 years, serving in Force Recon and Combat Service Support units. I left the Reserves, as my duties there took me away from leading Marines and into staff work, which I hated. As my family and professional responsibilities increased, being in the rear with the gear no longer was enough to keep me involved. These annual trips to Cambodia as part of a dental mission have brought back the same zeal for serving that I felt as a young infantry lieutenant. Our dental team first met the Fisks briefly one November Sunday between church services in Phnom Penh in 1998. We chatted with them for a few minutes and were off—our group to pull teeth for indigent people and the Fisks back to the new orphanage they had begun in town. We were all moved by their faith and their pluck.

They had recently come over from Colorado with three children in tow, their oldest being son Elijah, who was barely three with a nascent vision now called "Asian Hope."

Cambodia literally became the Heart of Darkness in the last quarter of the 20th century. Between 1975 and 1979, the communist Khmer Rouge murdered an estimated 2 million of the country's 7 million people. That period was followed by a short war with, and a long occupation by, Vietnam, and finally capped off with the United Nations stationing troops there in the early 1990s. Stability was marginally restored, and the wholesale genocide by the Khmer Rouge ended but other problems surfaced. The placement of international troops brought with it the introduction of AIDS. Cambodia has now become the AIDS epicenter of Asia.

Perhaps the biggest societal casualty in Cambodia has been the traditional family unit. In a culture that generally has accepted a man's dalliances outside of marriage (various sources estimate that between 70 percent and 90 percent of all Cambodian men frequent prostitutes, and 60 percent of Cambodian prostitutes are HIV-positive), the widespread presence of AIDS is effecting deadly consequences that will be felt for many years to come. It is not at all uncommon for a man to father children with several women and demonstrate no involvement or responsibility. What is also becoming more common is the outright abandonment of children by their mothers or the attempted sale of those children by relatives. Add to that the deaths of parents caused by AIDS, crime, land mines, etc., and the picture becomes grimmer.

The number of homeless and abandoned children in Cambodia cannot be counted with any accuracy. Into this horror and deprivation step intrepid men and women of boundless faith and hearts as big as Texas—like Steve and Jill Fisk. What sane man would leave the relative comfort and safety of Westminster, Colorado and a successful landscaping business to live in Cambodia? Why would a man risk not only his own life, but also that of his wife and three children? A chance meeting at church with a Cambodian Christian piqued Steve's interest in opportunities to serve. Making two quick reconnaissance trips in early 1998, Steve convinced his bride that Cambodia was where God wanted them. The rest, you might say, is almost history. Asian Hope began life on Oct. 3, 1998.

Discovering that Cambodia's adoption laws were, at best, onerous, burdensome and bureaucratic, the Fisks shaped their vision for taking in whatever children they could and simply raising them as their own. One particularly reassuring aspect of Asian Hope is reuniting brothers and sisters and keeping family units intact—something not always practical or possible in this very poor country. Jill Fisk is the passionate young matriarch whose faith and love for these children knows no bounds. "We want to raise these children as our own," she states with a radiant energy evident in her eyes and body language. They have started their own school in town and are exposing the children to a classical education as well as to the Bible. The children learn not only in Khmer, the local language, but also in English. "Our hope is that we will build strong Christian soldiers, able to provide leadership for their own families and for Cambodia."

Their ranging home on Rue 592 in downtown Phnom Penh, large by Cambodian standards, sleeps 36 snugly, which includes the Fisk family, a three-person staff and 28 once-orphaned kids. The entire operation—housing, clothing, feeding, educating, and loving the kids--runs about $4,000 a month. Who are these children and what are their stories? My own favorites include brothers Tuen and Tia, 13 and 11, respectively, as they reminded me so much of my own sons at home in California. All of the children are in one way or another victims of the endless string of horror still prevalent in Cambodia today. Fathers shot and killed in desperate acts of crime and passion, mothers dead of AIDS or malaria, children abandoned or severely abused by dysfunctional parents or family members—the stories are legion. Nah Vee is a pretty 12-year-old girl. By American standards, she looks more like an 8-year-old. Her father was murdered when she was 3, and her mother, a young illiterate girl, quickly remarried. At age 8, Nah Vee was sold for the first time to an old Khmer man for $100. She managed to run away, but her mother found her. Bringing her home, she systematically starved Nah Vee until she sold her again at age 10. Nah Vee ran away once more, this time to her grandmother's home. After awhile, the grandmother was unable to continue caring for her, and NahVee found her way to Asian Hope.

During our own two-week stay in-country this year, our mobile dental team traveled extensively around southern and central Cambodia working in concert with local Christian missionaries performing basic tooth extractions for hundreds of people, many of whom had never seen a real doctor or dentist. They were the poorest of the poor. All over we worked with children and adults, most of them underfed, undernourished and under-stimulated. Even through the use of interpreters, it was difficult to find common ground with those we served. They appeared sullen, fearful, and reluctant to speak, almost shell-shocked. Then there was our day working with the children of Asian Hope. These kids WERE different. An oral surgeon with the group, Steve Brown of Sacramento, CA, observed, "The Fisk kids seemed like my own. They were animated, excited, and happy. You could see the light in their eyes." Kelly Crider, a Folsom, CA dentist, echoed in agreement, "There was something different about these children compared to almost all of the others we worked with. These kids seemed full of joy." Indeed. Asian Hope is where the rubber meets the road in practical Christianity. The life stories of 28 boys and girls that would certainly have ended in chapters one or two, now hold so much promise and opportunity. Taking to heart the call to disciple the nations, the Fisks have transferred from God's army to His Marines. Assaulting deeply into unknown, unfriendly territory and securing a sizable beachhead, the ground has been made ready for follow-on troops to occupy and expand. Every day, they fight the good fight, gaining victory, at heavy cost, one little boy and one little girl at a time. I am reminded one last time of remarks made by Marine Col. David Shoup, who commanded the 2nd Marine Regiment as it invaded Tarawa in November 1943 when he radioed his situation report at the peak of the battle to his division commander aboard ship: "Casualties many; percentage dead not known; combat efficiency: We are winning."

Psychiatric Casualties
(Contributing Factors)

During the Siege battle of Khe Sanh, there were approximately 6,000 Americans on the small base

(which was about a half-mile wide and a mile-and-a-half long) and on several nearby outpost hills and positions. We were surrounded by at least two North Vietnamese Divisions (numbering some 20,000) reinforced with various other units (artillery, antiaircraft, support units, etc.) We were shelled with up to 1200 rockets and artillery rounds in one day, but usually averaged about 400 a day. Everything above ground was rendered a shambles after the first two or three days. Casualties were common. It is estimated by the doctors at Khe Sanh that there were over 2500 evacuated wounded, and I have a listing by name, unit, and date of 475 Americans killed. Death was a given. Most men (including myself) were unable to take a shower or wash during those days and our clothes rotted off while other portions of the cloth became stuck to the skin. There were times in which the water point was pierced by shrapnel from exploding incoming rockets, artillery, and mortars, leaving us without water for three days at a time. Most men were down to one C-ration a day. Very little mail was delivered or distributed during this time. The days were spent running constantly for cover in a road culvert, a nearby trench, or bunker. Everyone was constantly aware—and continuously voiced this to me in my constant moving about the base at this time—that it was only a matter of "when" not "if" the North Vietnamese would mount a "human-wave attack" in which thousands would close in on us.

This was especially a concern after the nearby Lang Vei Special Forces camp was overrun with tanks—the first time these were used by the North Vietnamese Army in the war in Vietnam, showing how determined they were. Furthermore, they unrelentingly constructed a maze of trenches and saps approaching the base perimeter, following the same pattern used in their assault at Dien Bien Phu. We were unable to patrol outside the lines to locate enemy snipers or supply points by orders. (The plan by our General was to have the North Vietnamese close in on us—we were a sort of bulls-eye or target—and then be destroyed by our bombs such as those from the B-52s.) The weather was mainly fog in the morning during which our aerial observers were unable to detect any enemy movement, and we were unable to re-supply or evacuate casualties since helicopters required visibility to land and could not land by instrument. About noon, the fog burned off and re-supply could resume, but also incoming rockets, artillery, and mortars were common.

The emotional dimension of all of this involved a constant awareness of imminent personal danger and death, an awareness of abandonment felt by many, a deep awareness of vulnerability, an inability to do anything and the frustration of helplessness, continually seeing buddies injured and killed (mainly grotesquely—a very common occurrence was decapitation.) Emotional numbing (inability to cry, express anger, etc.) was common after the first day of the shelling. There was a very common bravery in which men would be seen—it was a common occurrence—dashing out during incoming to rescue someone wounded, in which it was very possible that they themselves might be killed. It is my personal belief that this is the result of having concluded one is going to die anyway, and one might as well do something caring for another. Some hugged each other during the shelling. Most shared the little bit of water or food they had with others.

In Lt Col Dave Grossman's book, Killing (Boston: Little, Brown & Co.,1995,1996), where on pp. 43-44 he writes: "Swank and Marchand's much cited World War II study determined that after 60 days of continuous combat, 98 percent of all surviving soldiers will have become psychiatric casualties of one kind or another. Swank & Marchand also found a common trait among the 2 percent who are able to endure sustained combat: a predisposition toward "aggressive psychopathic personalities." Please feel at ease, feel free to contact me should you desire further amplification on anything I have said.

Down to the first row—On the far left is a marine ambulance driver (unknown name). Dan Sullivan (ambulance driver) is next followed by Commander Brown. The remainder of the people not identified in the picture are all corpsman. Sorry, best I can do with the names.

Dan Sullivan
USMC, C- Med, ambulance driver

The C-Med drawing was done in early February 1968. The original was drawn with a ball point pen on three sheets of paper and was three feet long hanging in the main triage bunker until we left in early April 1968.

I came across the drawing this year and noticed that it was showing signs of age. Time had done a number on the original so I decided to clean it up.

To explain some of the notes on the drawing: Peanut Butter was the call sign for Charlie Med to get Medivac wounded out. Nat Spicer had his girlfriend's name Carla on his helmet. Ted Hampton was the guy on the toilet. To the left of Ted was Carl Ebert smiling. The Boss was Commander Brown. Dr. Wolf is in the top row on the immediate right.

Time has done a number on my memory, so I'm sorry if I can't remember all the faces in the drawing. But what I will never forget is the dedication of these doctors and corpsman.

I hope we all have recovered from the reunion. I have just started working on the new KSV membership directory for 2001. I originally thought the 2000 edition would suffice for at least three years. As it is, we have signed up almost 600 new members since the last reunion in San Diego and have almost 500 personnel changes for members. I have the membership cards almost ready, and they should go out with this issue or shortly thereafter. I, Ernie Spencer and Jim Wodecki (our new secretary) are looking at plans for the issuance of past KSV newsletters in a series of ten to be issued in five volumes. With the printing cost of setting up 50 issues we would have to meet a certain quota to make it feasible. So we need input from the membership if there is any interest. Please drop a note, email, phone call, etc., to any one of us.

As I promised in the last edition, I am publishing the names of those members who have contributed additional funds to the organization:

About the Cover

Dear Ernie:

Read your most sobering book on Khe Sanh. All of the men who served there, both alive and dead, are truly American heroes. I cannot thank you enough for your honest description of Rod's character in your book. At the Providence College Vietnam War Memorial Dedication, they honored three men from his class of 1966 who were killed in Vietnam. Father Cullinane, Rector of Raymond Hall, described Rod as a very gentle person and one of the best-liked students who ever attended Providence College.

I did hear from two persons after Rod's death, regarding his service at Khe Sanh. The first was Lt. Dan McGravey's father. He sent me a picture of five Marines in front of a bunker with his son in the center. I never heard from Lt. McGravey himself. The second was from the wife of Rod's commanding officer, Sue Crawford; I was always puzzled why he never wrote himself.

I have the Khe Sanh pictures of Rod with Larry Brogdan; I will mail that picture along with others which I received from Rod's mother. Rod is depicted in various stages of his life, including his wedding picture and those of him in his uniform. His wife remarried an Air Force Pilot a year after his death. I am happy that you are honoring him in the Khe Sanh Newsletter, sharing his short life and heroic death. He was an outstanding young man, and a very good athlete, playing baseball in many different leagues until the age of sixteen.

Ernie:

I have finally made contact with Rocco Alfano. He has sent me the three letters that my dad wrote him when his son, Lt. Rod Alfano, was killed in action. As I now recall, I did mention Rod in my letters home to my father, and sent him the photo of Rod and the other four Marines in front of the bunker. My dad took it upon himself to search out the family and share their grief along with his picture. The following letters speak to that subject. Mr. Alfano is in failing health suffering from colon cancer but did remark that the letters and photos from my dad gave him much comfort during his time of grief.

Feb 24 1968

Dear Rocco:

My Wife and I wish to offer our sincerest sympathy to you and your daughter-in-law for the deep loss you suffered on Feb 02, halfway around the world. I am writing this letter because my son, Lt. Daniel L. McGravey of the USMC, is serving at Khe Sanh and had previously wrote to us of his meeting with your son.

Danny told us of talking to Rod about things at home in Massachusetts. They were together about an hour before a 122 MM rocket made a direct hit on the bunker where Rod and five other Marines were huddled. My son says he was impressed with your boy, whom he described as a real nice guy. He recited a Rosary for him and is as sure as we are "that he has it made where he is now." My purpose in trying to contact you is to put you in communication with my son, if you would like to meet him, when he returns from Vietnam. That is a day all our family is praying for and hope to see very soon. I am also appealing to you to join us in praying that we may be spared the great grief you have suffered.

My son has about eight months to serve before his tour in Nam is over. You can write to him but please understand if he is not able to find time to answer your letter. You can call us by phone here in Lawrence almost any night around supper time if we can tell you anything that may help you know how Rod was and what he most talked about, before he left us forever. Please accept our condolences and believe that your boy will be remembered in our prayers, as we hope you will remember our son when you pray for all the sons and Fathers who are fighting in that far off hellhole of Khe Sanh.

Sincere Sorrow, I am
John P. McGravey

Feb 26, 1968

Dear Mr. Alfano,

I am sorry as heck, there was a slight delay in sending this, but here it is. Danny's mother said she would like to get the negative back on one of the prints if you get some developed. I am sure the photo can be blown up to a much larger size. Since my Danny is in the center of the group of five, it will be easy for you to remember. That will do until you meet him, which I am sure will be arranged before long. Again, my deepest sympathy to you and all Rod's friends and relatives. Hope this will give you some small measure of comfort.

Sincerely,
John P McGravey

March 1, 1968

Dear Sir,

My wife and family wish to emphasize how deeply we feel for you and every member of Lt Alfano's family. As I told you in our phone conversation, I feel we are only doing what I would wish would be done for us if our positions were reversed.

Before attempting to contact you, I asked myself if my intentions would be understood and now that I have spoken with you, I am convinced I did the right thing. I am very sincere when I say we, as a family, feel very close to you, as we have such a great common interest in our sons who went halfway across the world to meet, enjoy each other's acquaintance even for a short time, and then be so tragically separated. I read the letter from Danny to you on the phone, but please understand that we want to keep it with all our memories of him. God willing, some day you will be able to talk to our son, and he will recall to you his hours with Rod that terrible day.

Sincerely,
John P. McGravey

Dear Dan,

Thank you very much for the Red Clay magazines and the history of Delta Company. I know the wonderful feelings one gets when attending these reunions. In WW2, I served on a Signal Center Team which consisted of three officers and 18 enlisted men. We have had reunions since 1946. Our ranks are dwindling rapidly, but we will have this year's reunion in Saratoga, NY. I will mail in my application for the magazine this week. Again, many thanks.

Rocky

PUBLISHER NOTE: I think this article says it all, and goes to the very heart of why the Khe Sanh Association was founded.

From the Office of the Secretary

Reunion July 3-7, 2002 — Irving Texas

Saddle up partners — its time for a Texas-style hoedown! We do things a little different down yonder. So dust off that cowboy hat, shine up them spurs and break out the cowboy boots. Wranglers and casual clothes are in order. We're going to be boot-scootin' at the Circle R Ranch (http://www.circlerranch.org) for a night of Western Fun: hay rides, horseshoe pitching, calf ropin', quick draw, (horse trail riding extra upon request) Texas-style Bobby-Q and vittles, then some down home Country and Western band music to Texas 2-step to, and even do some line dancing. If you don't know how to line dance, we will have an afternoon of practice by a beautiful cowgirl. Yippie-Ki-O-Ki-A. I may even give some bull whip lessons for the real men and ladies who attend. So bring them youngins with you 'cuz we got swimming and swings and plenty of fun and grub for all. We're also just a few miles from Six Flags over Texas and Water World for the children and grandkids.

Next year's reunion theme will be honoring Corpsman, Medics, Doctors and Aero Medical Evacuation Technicians. If anyone knows of any who served there, please email me their names. Jim_pj_texas@mindspring.com. There will be a special ceremony thanking them.

There are trips planned to the City of Dallas highlighting Texas Stadium and the Mustangs of Las Colinas. At the sixth floor museum, learn of the life and death of President JFK. Enjoy lunch on your own at the West End Historic District for whomever would like to attend.

There will be a Ladies' Breakfast at the hotel and a trip to a Ladies' Spa for those who wish to attend. There will be free trips to the Grapevine Mills Mall, which is the largest in the world, and for the men a free trip to the "Outdoor World Pro Bass Shop." Included in next year's raffle will be a $100.00 gift certificate to the ProBass Shop. The Texas State Flag will be flown on Veterans Day 2001 over the capitol in Austin, Texas and presented as a prize at our raffle. There will be some other great surprises this year in our raffle. We will be sending out a complete list of prizes and tickets ("you need not be present to win") but who would want to miss all this Texas fun? So Giddy Up and Get Away to Texas for the West of the story.

From the Secretary and Membership Committee:

It seems that only a few people in the Association can find hundreds of new members. In fact, there were 600 new members last year. If everyone could find just one new member we could double our roster to 6,000 — amazing isn't it? So look around at your VFWs, American Legions, Veterans' Centers and of course, the neighborhood bars, and let's get these brothers to bond with us. Ask them for their name, address, telephone number, unit, and time served there. We will send them one of our Red Clay magazines with an application in it. Have them call Tom Eichler at 773-625-2102 or Jimbo at 972-727-2997, and we will fix them up. We need to find more of our Marine, Army, Navy, and Air Force brothers, as they're out there just waiting for us. So get with it and help us find our lost brothers.

Now to all you members who moved, please let us know where you are at, so we can send the magazine to the right place. If you have a new address, send it to us so the magazine isn't returned. We will be getting out the Khe Sanh bumper stickers real soon to put on our cars again. It is a great way to find new members.

Jim "Jimbo" Wodecki

Visions
Of loved ones,
Emerald lawns and a cracked white table.

Images
Suspended within the flow of time live again behind my half closed eyes.

Grandmother
And the aunts spreading their fare beneath bowing trees. Once more scolding, laughing, offering acceptance.

Country
Quiet shattered by delighted cousins scattered by laughing old Uncles.

Childhood
Framed by the fragrance
Of untethered freedom.

Memories
Called back from my dimming youth.
Glimpsed again through iced tea in a Mason Jar.

Reunion Committee:

Thought I would take this opportunity while continuing to unwind from a very successful reunion to comment on a job well done. Yes, I am a "cherry." The reunion might have been my first but will not be my last. Jack and I were extremely impressed with the professional way in which the program of events had been put together. As a matter of fact, the content and sequence of events at the Khe Sanh 2001 reunion were nothing less than poignant, touching, and stirring at times. Personally, it was unquestionably emotional and moving for me.

The committee had done a tremendous job in orchestrating such a monumental program. The wives, girlfriends, companions, friends, volunteers, and supporters alike who assisted were just as valuable in making the event a memorable occasion. I met old friends, in particular "John Kenny" whom I served with on both Hill 55 and Khe Sanh. I made new friends as well, and shared some unbelievable reflections of our Vietnam experiences. Thank all of you for making my attendance, along with all who attended, a memorable and inclusive one. It was an experience I shall never forget.

The added presentation, which recognized Marine Captain Alex Bodenweiser and Marine Corporal Ronald Hickenbottom for heroism against the NVA for which they received the Silver Star Medal, is a reflection of the professional caliber of men who are members of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association — an association that anyone would be honored and proud to be associated with. In reference to a stirring moment during the banquet...I would be remiss not to mention and acknowledge the children of Khe Sanh Veterans KIA, MIA, WIA, POW, etc., who so eloquently, with pride I might add, casually moved through the audience, gifts in hand, thanking the Khe Sanh Veterans for their Courage and Sacrifice. This unusual task was emotional and certainly remarkable. If you get the opportunity during your busy schedule, please share my thoughts and remarks to your committee members. Again, thanks to all of you for an unbelievable and exciting time.

First, let me say thank you to all who volunteered and worked long hours to make it all possible. From the folks manning the registration table, to the young men and women who laboriously filled all the sandbags that were strategically located (two steps away in case of incoming) throughout the hotel, and to folks who made sure provisions were never depleted.

Thanks to all the brave men who "volunteered" and stood "fire watch" all night and made sure there were no surprise attacks on the beer coolers, while the rest slept peacefully in their individual bunkers. Many thanks to Tom "Ike" Eichler and his fellow Chicago Police Officers for putting together the BBQ by the pool (even though "Ike" was a bit slow flipping them sausages, ribs, and skirt steaks.) Thanks too, Ike, for the luncheon that you and your fellow Chicago Police Officers put together at the Chicago FOP Hall, to honor Delta Co 1/26 and my friend and Brother, Sgt. Richard Grenat, who passed away Feb 26, 1999. The luncheon was a big surprise to the entire family of Dick Grenat.

Present at the luncheon were 35 members of Delta Co. along with Delta 1/26 officers and Battalion Commander Col. Jim Wilkinson. Col. Wilkinson made this special trip to honor Delta Co and Sgt. Richard Grenat. There were many other representatives from Army, Navy, and Air Force Units. Thanks to the Gold Star Mothers for being there. It was a pleasure to meet those beautiful ladies. Thanks to all the other beautiful ladies who made the reunion more pleasurable to attend. It made looking at all them old Khe Sanh vets' "mugs" bearable; our eyeballs were clicking every minute.

Thanks to Ms. Sharon Pelon-Babby and the beautiful children of the Khe Sanh Vets who passed out gifts to all the vets at the banquet. A Thank You to the Marines who put up the static display of the world's finest crew-served weapons, from the M-16 to 81MM Mortars and every weapon in between; it made all the grunts salivate.

It was a pleasure to meet all the individuals who regularly post messages on the message board, who for the first time made a reunion. Guys like Joe Amodeo, Wayne "Shu" Shumaker and his lady who made the trip on their bikes all the way from Pennsylvania. But best of all was meeting old friends from Delta Co. who I have not seen since Khe Sanh.

Delta Company was well represented with over 35 members in attendance, by far outnumbering any other group. So to Charlie Fox, the bet still stands for next year's reunion, better get on the phone now and "bribe" your Charlie Co. brothers to show up.

To all who made it possible,

Wow! It's over, can you believe it? Had a wonderful time and met a lot of "new" guys and gals. Thanks to all who contributed, it was a great time. It was such a great time I could not leave, so I stayed on for Sunday and went down to "Taste of Chicago" fair that was in progress. Tom Eichler was right — we did not belong there in a large group, and it was a madhouse with wall-to-wall people. We (my wife and daughter) fought our way through the crowds and had a wonderful time, only to return to a hotel full of kids. There was some sort of dance contest, and they were all over the place. I was lost. The hospitality room was locked and the ballroom foyer was empty and devoid of any life. It was an eerie kind of quiet! However, there was still life in the bar. Don Lacey, "Casper" and "Turtle" were there when I arrived. So, I settled down to have a nightcap at 2015 hours. But then others began arriving, Frank Ceniseros, Ken Pipes and Joey "O" along with Jim Hebron. Counting the ladies, we now had a reinforced squad, counting the barmaid Linda. We dubbed our little group "Chapter #1 of the Khe Sanh Vets." Had my last nightcap at 0315, what a wonderful time! Again, thanks to all who contributed.

I would be remiss if I did not comment on the wonderful time my wife and daughter had. They both commented, separately, on what a kind, polite, friendly and caring group of men were present. My answer to them, "They are Khe Sanh Vets." The next scheduled meeting of Chapter #1 will be July 08 2002 — be there or be square.

I am new to this fine organization and want to thank all those responsible for its creation. My military nickname while in Vietnam was Spanky. I was the platoon radio operator. Anyone out there from Hotel 2/1 67/68. To "Ski" Sucharski, I think from the Chicago area, where are you!? I have been searching for you for 20 years. Your name is not on the wall, so I know you are out there somewhere. Please contact me.

Tom,

Just a quick note to say hello and to tell you that we, the members of Delta Company Association, 1ST Battalion 26TH Marines, enjoyed the Chicago Khe Sanh reunion very much. We look forward to attending many more Khe Sanh Veterans Association reunions in the years to come. We would like to thank you for inviting us to participate in your reunion functions. We thought the Friday afternoon lunch at the Chicago Fraternal Order of Police Lodge was very nice. Please extend our thanks to all the members of your lodge who made this luncheon possible for us. I especially enjoyed visiting with the members of your lodge who assisted with the lunch.

On a personal note I would like to compliment the Chicago Police Department on their professionalism and helpfulness. When attending the Taste of Chicago event on 05 July, we were terribly lost and disoriented when trying to motor out of the Loop. We asked a police officer for directions and he said, "Follow me, I'll get you on the freeway." We were very appreciative of this officer's assistance.

I served with Alpha Company, 2ND Platoon, 3RD Anti-Tank Battalion, (Ontos). I was at Khe Sanh from May to Nov 1967. My wife and I attended our first Khe Sanh Veterans reunion in Chicago, July 6-8, 2001. We had a great time. It was a very moving experience, and we met some very fine people. There was seven other Ontos crewman at the reunion. Congratulations to those who worked on the reunion. I cannot think of anything that would have made it better. I wish I had started attending these reunions years ago. I will not miss another one.

Reunion Reflections

By Rev Ray W. Stubbe, Founder KSV

Every little detail was perfect, especially the colored ribbons on the posts in the registration room, and the hundreds of filled sandbags; many commented very favorably on them. The little slotted boxes to hold the plastic name tags, the set-ups for the Awards ceremony, Church outside, the barbecue, the little cherry on the name tags, the grand piano being there for Denis Chericone to play (perhaps that was just accidental, but it was wonderful), the spread-out nature of the rooms, the active duty Marines and their weapons, Sharon's displays and work, the superior Great Lakes band and everything connected with the banquet was great.

The day I arrived, a fruit basket was brought to me in my room! I thoroughly enjoyed the fruit over all the days I was there, but even more impressive was its special consideration and thoughtfulness. Everything the hotel did was superior.

There were a couple of very humorous incidents that members did not hear about. I think it was Friday night about 10, and Denny Chericone was playing the baby grand piano in our hospitality room. There were about 20 others nearby. As always, his playing is so very, very good, accomplished, and refreshing to hear. I was in the process of raising the large wooden lid of the piano to set the upright spoke to hold up the top, when all of a sudden the entire top of the piano slid off onto the floor with a loud crash! Denny was still playing! No one said anything, but I turned to the people and said, "Now isn't this a great, duet?" (The hinges of the top were not screwed in).

Then, on Friday morning, I was sitting in the restaurant eating breakfast and overheard (one couldn't help but overhear!) some loud voice telling stories about Khe Sanh. I looked and saw a table of four of our people. After eating my breakfast, I pulled up a chair and joined them. The one who had been talking very loudly walked away, after ten or fifteen minutes, and one of the others said to me: "He came down here earlier with no shoes or socks. In fact, all he had on was a T-shirt and some very abbreviated bikini shorts. When he walked up to the hostess and asked, 'Is this open?' She said yes, and he said, 'Well, I'll go up and get dressed.'"

I was very impressed with Sharon Pelon-Babby, her care of the children, and the variety of important information she shared with so many. She shared the appropriate spice or herb in menus to add just the right seasoning, and provided little ginko pins for the children and helpers. There were sample "care package" lists and even a static display of the items for those currently on active duty. There were packages for those who want to help our children become more patriotic, letters of appreciation from her students to veterans, and interesting displays. She kept children occupied, interested and hadn't left her area even to eat at times, or go outside, because she felt she was needed there.

The active duty Marines and their various weapons impressed me. Many questions were asked of them. While many of us relived memories (in a good sense) of our time in Vietnam, the active duty Marines, on the other hand, were interested in what our veterans might tell them about Khe Sanh and experiences there. It was a mutually beneficial presence.

I was so impressed by the Color Guard, especially the small but very proficient contingent of the Navy Band from NTC Great Lakes. The quality and depth of the prayers and comments of Bill Jayne at the Awards Ceremony and Banquet, in addition to those of Dick Peloquin and the two chaplains present, greatly moved me. Words from Chaplain Tiernan Cash expressing how I was respected in the Chaplain Corps were most healing to me. I always suspected an adversarial view of my time in Vietnam. I had gotten so close to the men that it may have seemed to them, at times, to be to the degree of loss of dignity as a chaplain!

Chaplain Cash even had the Church Pennant that I flew from my bunker in Charlie Med. I had sent it to the Chaplain School in 1969, and was the only item I brought back with me (or sent home) from Khe Sanh which I let go of, feeling it might be an inspiration to those at Chaplain School. There was some initial publicity about the Pennant but never any mention of the chaplains at Khe Sanh. I suspected they had put it in a closet or that it might have even been discarded. When they rededicated the Chaplains' School last summer, I spoke with a junior chaplain at the School whom I asked about the Pennant. He had no information. To see it once again, relive its many memories, and then to hear of its prominent placement were reconciling to me.

When I saw what was happening at our reunion, I became intensely happy that something moved me to originate it. It took our coming together of everyone to have found the great value in reconnecting with those we knew or to meet other comrades who served there. This momentum of mutual interest is what is really responsible for our organization. I began with less than 20 people, yet how grand our organization has become.

I was proud to have passed control of leadership to Earle Breeding, Ken Penn, John Kaheny, and Dick Peloquin, with the magazine to Ernie Husted, Ernie Spencer, Ed Evans, Ray Truelove, and Ernie Spencer again. Withstanding some brief periods when I assisted to ensure continuity, I realized that if an organization was to be strong, I needed to pass it on and let others develop the necessary leadership. We affirm and bring out the gifts in others by needing them. Visiting the active participating board meeting of meaningful discussion and decision-making fills me with privileged pride.

A climate of positive, pleased, and happy people prevailed. I met several people I had not seen since Khe Sanh (Ed Feldman, Paul Lojkovic, Bill Gay, and Hal Johnson, for example), several others who had not been to our reunions for some time (Skip Wells), and many that I had only known through telephone calls and letters (Donna Elliott, Jim Carmichael). I saw Joe Lola again, and felt what a miracle to see him doing well again. I was very happy to see Carl and Jan Oksnee, with their feeling of reconciliation. My interviews with two TV producers were stressfully moving to the point of tears, yet a service to have shared informative knowledge. One of the interviews was to be used for a video to be shown in schools for students to appreciate what we did in Vietnam. Several of our vets were there listening during the interviewing, and also had comments.

There were some very special and significant events that I personally was aware of. (I'm sure there were many others, yet I'd like to mention these in case you hadn't heard about them.) One involved Bob Shippen and Donna Elliott who have been in contact with me for a long time. I knew that Donna (who had been on active duty in the Army in Public Affairs and has had an article published in our Red Clay) lost her brother at Khe Sanh and had returned there twice to see if she could pick up any leads among local people and to see for herself the area in which her brother was lost. I know that Bob Shippen had a photo of a dead American that he photographed in early April, as units began to leave the base to scour the surrounding area. I had seen it at a previous reunion. It is grotesque in some ways, showing teeth and missing torso. But there is also a sense of serenity, of the man sort of "melting into" the earth in peace. His face has been sort of mummified. A few weeks ago, Bob called me to say that he suspected that this might be her missing brother! However, he was ambivalent about sharing that information or showing Donna the photo — it might not be her brother, she might get very disturbed by it, and so on.

At the barbecue, Donna came up to me to say hello, and I took her right over to Bob Shippen who was sitting with some others from FOB-3. After they left, I had an uneasy feeling, but then felt that all would be well. In fact, all was well, very well. Donna wasn't disturbed, Bob was greatly relieved, and one of our vets with ties to the local Police Forensics Lab immediately forwarded Bob's photo and that of Donna's (she had brought one of her brother, evidently) to the lab for analysis.

Another incident involved Cal Bright and Ken Penn visiting the Chicago Vietnam art museum. As they were departing, Cal said, "That's my picture!" The director of the museum said that it was taken by Bob Ellison (as part of that Newsweek spread in one of their March 1968 issues.) Ken said, "We have a mother at our reunion who is looking for anyone with photos of her son." The director said he, in fact, had some of Bob Ellison's photos and almost immediately located them in his piles of paper. So Miriam Eaton now has photos of her son in Vietnam.

Our worship service went so well on Sunday. The two chaplains who sat on either side of me at the banquet, Chaplain Tierian Cash (in the Marine uniform from Washington, DC) and George Cooper (in the Navy uniform from Great Lakes) along with Chaplain Lasello, who had said Mass for Roman Catholics, assisted me in the service by each reading one of the Bible readings. We had about a hundred attending I think, and the service took about 35 minutes and was very spirited in terms of singing of the hymns and the reciting of the responses. Two of the three Gold Star Mothers (May Littlefield and Lucille Payne) who were there and one of my good friends Bill Messner were in tears at the end and told me that he had bottled up all those tears ever since Vietnam. He had not even done so at the funeral of his good friend, Al Lumpkin, late of last year.

The reunion afforded me the opportunity to spend significant time with Ernie Spencer, Earle Breeding and his wife, Pat (whose marriage service I performed in DC), and many dozens of others. The mother and father of one of our men who died at Khe Sanh drove in from Ohio to be at our banquet (Mr. and Mrs. Healy) at the prompting of Rick Noyes, my very good friend. I mentioned him in the banquet remarks as the man who dabbed blood off his head in my bunker one night.

At the Awards Ceremony, Miriam Eaton was asked to come up in connection with the unveiling of the plaque for O'Hare Airport. I had spoken with her on several occasions but had not previously met her. Following the ceremony, I went to her, giving each other a big hug, bringing tears. We are in the same metro area and hadn't met each other until the reunion in Chicago!

I had a wonderful time and want to personally thank all of the wonderful people for everything, and for the Lighthouse built by Frank Taggert, the plaques, the Praying Hands and all the other beautiful gifts. I will cherish them and will find a suitable place of honor in my home for each of them. God bless you all.

Dear Khe Sanh Veterans,

The children and I thank you for welcoming us as part of the 2001 reunion. The children and grandchildren of Khe Sanh Veterans who were at the reunion were honored and happy to be able to participate in activities, and give a gift to you to show their appreciation. The children of Lincoln Avenue School Kids Care in Milwaukee will be so pleased that you liked your gift they made. I will certainly share your messages of thank you with them.

Thank you to those who signed up to receive our exhibit, and to those who signed up to receive our letters during this coming school year. I think it is so important for our youth to learn about the work and sacrifices that have been made by veterans, such as all of you. That is what "We honor through learning, We honor through sharing" is all about. Sending good wishes and heartfelt gratitude to you.

I served at Camp Carroll with the 2/94TH & 8/4 Artillery during the siege. Both units consisted of the 175mm Guns and directly supported Khe Sanh. I also visited the 8/4 Artillery Website and found it very interesting. They have a lot of great photographs which will bring back a lot of memories to all who served there. One of our members recently visited Vietnam during Memorial Day, and I would like to make the next trip.

I take my hat off to all who served at Khe Sanh. I served with 3/4 along the DMZ from Nov of 67 till Spring of 68. Places like Gio-Linh, Cam-Lo, Dong-ha, and Camp Carroll etc. When the C-130 crashed on the runway rendering it inoperable, we resupplyed Khe Sanh by convoy. As bad as the shelling was, I think my worst fear was of the rats that were as big as a cat. To all those that endured, my heart goes out to you.

Imagine my surprise, while surfing the Internet seeking information on what role the 315th Air Division played in the Vietnam War, I came upon a photograph taken by my father at Khe Sanh. It was on the C-130's web site. It depicted a C-130 taking off, shielded by a defensive smoke barrage. I sure wish my dad were alive to see it — he would have been real proud. He passed away New Year's Eve 1999. As a writer and photojournalist, I am currently putting together an album based on his time in Vietnam. His name was Marion Lee Ray IV. If anyone has additional information, please contact me.

I served with I Co 3/26 3RD Platoon as a Squad Leader. In December of 1967, I went to Danang to attend Interpreter School. Upon completing the course, I returned to my old company. Just three days later, we made contact with a large NVA unit on our way to Hill 881N. During the fierce action, my Platoon Leader and Platoon Sergeant were KIA. As a Squad Leader, I had to take command of the Platoon until they were replaced. I was a member of the 515TH Transportation Company, 36TH Battalion, under command of the 3RD Marine Division. We were charged with supplying all outpost and firebases located in the DMZ, Khe Sanh and other Northern Provinces. We lost many of our trucks and men to NVA ambushes. Our main base camps were located at Dong Ha and Quang Tri. Anyone from the 515TH can feel free to contact me. I was there from March 22, 1967 to March 15, 1968.

Jim Reeves

Thanks to Jim Reeves for telling me about this site. The 515TH Transportation returned to Khe Sanh during operation Lam Son 719. Our APC "The Cracker Box." I, Pete, Joe and Mike, our driver, were the last to leave Khe Sanh. We could feel the earth move as the Air Force began massive bomb runs to destroy what was left behind. Our brother Kenneth Jones lost his life on the road between Vandergrift and Khe Sanh, may he rest in peace. Let us never forget our fallen brothers.

Mike Boatwright

Like Mike and Jim, I served with the 515TH Transportation Company. We were the first Army Unit to be attached to and under the command of the 3RD Marine Division. I drove an ammunition truck and supplied all outposts along the DMZ. My prayers go out to all those fallen Heroes and their loved ones. I will never forget the loss of our brothers and sisters to a war that never really ended.

Tom Kaecher

When I arrived in Khe Sanh in March of 1967, I was assigned as a radio operator to the village of Khe Sanh, Lang Vei and the Rock Quarry. In April of 67, I was reassigned to the Combined Operations Center. The center was located in an old French underground bunker. I and Cpl. Kipp Melchoir Webb each worked a 12-hour shift, plotting troop movements, H&I hits by C Company Artillery, and Air Strikes for CAP units and other bases. I also served as an interpreter for the COC. Our senior officer was Lt. Col. Reider, Operations Officer Major Fogo, and NCO was Gysgt. Buchanan.

I served in this capacity during the Battle for Hills 861 and 881 with the 3RD Marines, B Co 1/9, and with the 26TH Marines during the Siege. I participated in closing out the 3RD Mar Div Headquarters, Sub Unit #5 and relocated to Dong-Ha as the Radio Chief for TSC-15. Cpl. Melchoir and I were assigned to several other locations, and each time we came under attack. We did not realize that it was the Tet Offensive and everyone was under fire. When I attempted to return to Khe Sanh, the incoming enemy fire was so heavy we had to turn back to Phu-Bai. I returned to Dong-Ha until the end of my tour in April 1968.

I was on Hill 881S during the Siege of Khe Sanh. I was a Radio Operator for M Co 3/26, 2ND Platoon. I was wondering if anyone had any photographs of Hill 881S during that time. Unfortunately, my friend Moose and I left our camera at Khe Sanh when we were sparrow-hawked out. I never saw our equipment again.

Served as a corpsman with L Btry 4/12. We arrived at Khe Sanh at the end of the Siege and closed some of the enemy gun caves in the Co Rock Mountains with our 155s. Still remember those early morning "rocket" wake up calls.

Bob "Doc" Eddy

Tom,

I have wanted to write for a long time. I served as a corpsman with 3RD Platoon of B Co 1/26. My tour started in an area around Hill 55 shortly before we were ordered to Khe Sanh, just in time for the Hill Fights. With all the fighting that took place, there was still time for a little humor. While on Hill 881N, we received a bunch of replacements. One of them inquired where he could relieve himself. I pointed to an empty 105 or 155 canister sticking out of the ground. He proceeded to utilize the same, which for him was not a good start since it was the vent for the Lieutenant's bunker. Lieutenant Pete Guy was a great guy who later transferred to 3RD Recon. I would like to know if he made it home.

I remember Hill 821 where the 2ND Platoon ran into an enemy ambush. We ran off 881 to help them and the company lost many good men that day. One of them was Bob Enderby, one of my best friends who was going to spend time with me when we got back to the world. Gerry Ensign and I were assigned to the 3RD Herd for a considerable time. We took care of each other, splitting time on ambushes or listening post. He would always have a hot cup of coffee or bit of food waiting for me whenever I returned from a mission. I say, Thanks, old Buddy.

I remained with the third platoon even after my time had expired, not wanting to leave my buddies. Finally, I was ordered off the Hill, back to KSCB, which was under rocket attack every day. The Hill was a much safer place to be. Shortly thereafter, the remainder of B Co left the Hill. Finally, I would like to apologize to whomever owned the case of San Miguel beer I stole out of the hooch next to Headquarters.

Intrusive Thoughts

The headlines in Stars and Stripes would read, "TWO KHE SANH MARINES KILLED BY FRIENDLY FIRE. ONE MARINE CHARGED." I had had several hours to create, ponder and embellish my predicament. I was now in full-fledged dread of what lay ahead for the coming night. I was going to kill our own people, and I couldn't see any way around the inevitability.

My predicament came from the top of the chain-of-command structure to the low man on the food menu. The Captain told the platoon sergeant. The platoon sergeant told the section leader. The section leader told the squad leader. And the squad leader told me. It was my night to fire H & I's. And now this burden had been placed squarely upon my scrawny shoulders. I had rediscovered a formerly forgotten simplistic youthfulness that lay willingly buried within me. I was too young to be here, to live like this, to be doing these kinds of things. Being responsible was and wasn't my thing. I was responsible when things went wrong. I was not mature enough to be responsible to make things go right.

The sun was busy lowering itself behind the surrounding hills farther to the west of the Khe Sanh region. I was busy becoming more anxious. My mind was in frenzied disarray at creating a carefully worded "excuse." I mentally rehearsed how I would have to tell my immaculately dressed, court appointed accusers that I had tried my best to ensure such a terrible event as this short round I had fired on that ill-fated night, had come to be. I would be forced to relive the grotesque horror of the mortally mangled bodies I had killed with my mortar tube. I would have to look square eyed into the faces of the parents whose sons I had placed into body bags. Life was droning to a morbid, simplistic conclusion. I was a murderer, albeit an unintentional one.

The shadows that the sun was creating were long, bony fingers pointed in mock accusation at me. In the back edges of my head, my trial had begun in earnest. The Judge was at his workbench. His gavel had come down hard with a solid slap on the hardwood in front of him. "Guilty," read the head juror. I was taken away, led by two, armed Military Policemen. I could hear, even from this distance, the terrible clang of the Iron Gate of my 8' x 5' jail cell shutting hard and sure behind me, sealing my eternal fate.

The smell of sandbags surrounding me brought me back to the present. They smelled of an earthy mustiness. The steel runway matting above my head reassured me that there still might be some form of reprieve from my prison residence in Portsmouth. I had wondered since the first time I heard that name, where specifically in the States Portsmouth was. If it wasn't in Texas, it might as well have been in Antarctica. Anyway, I could get used to making "little ones out of big ones." The sergeants always hung that one maxim over our heads when we even made the appearance that we were going astray. Hard labor could be got at if I kept at it. And I could live in solitary confinement, couldn't I? But alas, I would be as morose a prisoner as I was an inept mortar man.

These lurid thoughts ricocheted off the sides of my mind like pool balls off the side rails of a billiard table. Were all my hidden sins coming home to roost? Here was a thought with needles. I didn't want to kill anybody. Just put me on working parties. Let me fill sandbags all day. But don't give me high explosive responsibilities. See where it had gotten me? I had killed the wrong people. I was the worst of the worst.

The sun was becoming my enemy with every passing minute. It had presently cleared the point of no return. I could not bring it back. I could not force the earth to move backward and retrieve the irretrievable. Blast! I was doomed. I hated my life. Wasn't it all funny? I hadn't lived enough yet.

The darkness crept further upon me like some skulking thief. It was stealing what little life I had left. My thoughts were transfixed upon my one AM appointment with destiny. That's when it would happen. That's when I would kill them both. I had not met these two men I would kill. Already I did not like them. They should have been poor excuses for Marines as I was. They should have been out of position or visiting their buddies. They were becoming objects of my derision. I was beginning to hate them, these men I had not known whom I would soon enough blow apart, concluding so abruptly their disgusting lives.

I wore the darkness like one wears a coat. It wrapped itself fully around me and made me terribly aware of my vulnerability. Vulnerable. I was actually vulnerable. The word had an unzipping effect. Up to this very moment in time I had possibly conceived of, or perhaps deceived myself, into believing that I was in some way or manner in control of my life. And now the world was spinning outward and off balance.

As the evening wore on, my conversations were of a more strained nature. The men in the mortar squad appeared zombie-like. Their motions were exaggerated. Their words were inaudible or unintelligible. They moved as shadows move, following but removed from my perplexity. Their banter was not playful tonight. It was all so wearying. Their comfort was heavy. Exhaustion was thick, and it hung about me like a pall.

Eight-thirty. There was no light in my bunker by which I might read to alleviate the pressure smothering my mind. I would lie down. I would try and sleep. No, I would go out to the gun pit and begin the process of gun drill in the darkness. There was no moon by which I could see the range card. How would I discover what information to put on the gun sight? How did Jimmy do this? I was trained on the

.81 mm mortar. Why did they put me in .60s? I knew the .81. This little sight was worthless. There was no light to see, to make choices.

I eased into Jimmy's bunker. His Spartan living accommodations were replete with radio and lantern. I gave no hint at my internalized agony to the men chatting and smoking before me. I would not give these men the satisfaction of seeing me terrified, of knowing that my future would be prison. I would go about my business, this deadly business of keeping Charlie at bay. I looked at the yellow range card with the neat black printing as if it had been an old friend. I found what I was looking for. Here was the elevation and the deflection that would have to be registered on the sight. I already knew I would have to remove all the increments. In my mind I also knew the gun would be pointing nearly vertical. The trajectory too, would be almost vertical. I would kill those men, and they would not know who had snuffed out their lives. They would be dead. What would they care? Dead is still dead no matter how one arrives at it. How much was my life really worth now?

Nine o'clock. I sat in the gun pit to see if my eyes would adjust to the blinding darkness. Time. I had hours, days, months, and years until I would slip that five-pound rocket-shaped projectile, fin first, up to the lip of the mortar tube and purposefully release it. And I would hear it slide, metal scraping against metal, down and down and down until it exploded angrily within the base of the tube forcing it skyward in an instant. Up and up and up it would go until its inertia had peaked and then it would begin its descent. It would sound like an object way up in the night sky hissing and the sound would grow full until it reached a crescendo, and then it would kill those two men.

I had to stop this. I had to quit thinking negatively. I had to make certain I didn't kill those guys. But how could I? I would go over this entire procedure as I had practiced it so many times before. I would make myself see the numbers on the sight. I would will it so. I would adjust to the circumstances. I would not kill them. I was not going to jail. If anyone were going to die tonight it would be the enemy.

I squinted, straining at the diminuitive sight upon which my fingers were fumbling. Jimmy pulled back the flap on his bunker. He said something and extended his hand. In it was a round and long hard object. It was a flashlight! My salvation had come from behind door number two. I eagerly snatched it from Jimmy's grasp and very carefully clicked it on with one specific purpose in mind. I wanted to know that the dope on the gun was correct. I looked again at the range card. I looked at the numbers on the sight, then back at the range card. It was right. Even in the dark I had been correct. That cold tubular flashlight made my heart leap. I would not kill those men after all.

Ten o'clock. I could hear the faint sounds of music coming from the transistor radio inside Jimmy's bunker or someone's. How long had it been playing? The song was "Green Tambourine." I hated that song. It was so full of everything that reeked of ignorant America. It was so stupid. Could you imagine a grunt with a green tambourine instead of his M-16?

Then it was The Temptations turn. My whole body began to move with the beat. The time was passing now. More music paraded before my ears and with the music came the memories of dating and drinking and football and... The Beach Boys did their thing. The Beatles performed just for me. And then silence flooded the crest of the hill once more.

Eleven o'clock. Jimmy and the other guys must be going to sleep before it's time for their watches.

Now I was terribly alone with myself. There was no one with which to check about this H & I. Waking someone out of my abject fear was now beyond thinkable. Exposure was not an option. My relief would come after I fired my H & I. I reached for the mortar round. It was encased within a black, tubular, thick cardboard cylinder approximately 3" in diameter and about 9" long. Two thirds of the way up the canister, black tape was wrapped several times around the neck of the cylinder separating the top from the bottom. I pulled the tape circling the canister until it was lying limp in my hand. Casting it aside, I separated the top part and set it on the sandbag-lined parapet surrounding the lip of the mortar pit. The four slender fins of the round were now exposed along with the compressed ballasite packets, held by a wire between each fin. These four packets were designed to propel the deadly device for a certain, measurable distance. The range card identified the distance with the specific number of packets. If one packet were removed the round would travel less far. Remove a second and the results would become more visible because there would be less distance the round could travel, and so forth.

I would be firing this round with all four of the packets removed. My fears began to play upon my mind once again. I was back to reading those awful headlines. I slipped the round completely out of its canister and held it in my hand. My hand examined its features closely. It was heavy. It was barrel chested and narrowed at the top and bottom. As I could not see it clearly, the touch of my hands and fingers became my eyes. With my left hand, I held the small rocket shape snugly. With my right hand, I placed my trigger finger gently on the flat tip of the fuse. I found the curved safety wire firmly imbedded in its place. I tugged on it slightly. The wire moved grudgingly. I eased my pull. The spring-loaded screw, the second safety measure, was also where and as it should be. Since the round was painted olive drab, I could not see its contour well. The slightly visible yellow markings informed me that I was holding a high explosive round. The bursting radius was five meters. That meant that when it landed and detonated, anything living within that five-meter radius would probably be killed or maimed for life.

Facts. So many facts buzzed around my wide-awake mind. Mortar school flashed before me. The daily gun drill became a grind. Setting the aiming stakes in their proper alignment was critical to the success of every fire mission. How many times I misaligned them in school I can't remember. Stop thinking so much. I suppose any memory that took me home and away from this place was good time.

All of a sudden I could smell myself. I smelled awful. It might be because I hadn't taken a bath in over a month. I had not removed my boots in a week. When had I brushed my teeth last? The gods of war knew. I was fully cognizant about how dirty I was. I could feel the grime. My tongue tasted the salty, food crusted corners of my mouth. I breathed into my cupped hands and inhaled. My breath could melt steel. I was rancid from top to bottom, inside out. I had forgotten what toothpaste tasted like. Why was I thinking of personal hygiene now? None of the last few moments mattered because tomorrow there wouldn't be any more water to drink than there was today, and none with which to bathe.

Twelve o'clock. I was starting to feel stiff, sitting there exposed to the hilltop elements. The dew was settling on everything. I re-holstered the mortar round in its canister, placed the top back over the fins and just sat there. One more hour and my life would be justified. There was no motion in any direction. The clouds were intermittent.

The moon must have been clinging to the horizon, but I could see only a slight spectral light between the clouds. The tall grass swayed and brushed against itself in the gentle wind. And there I sat. I had never been this alone in my life. All the hubbub of high school did not make sense here. All the commotion of my entire life seemed senseless here.

I was suddenly hungry. But could I sneak back into my bunker without waking up both Mikes? My hunger overrode any reticence I displayed. I knew where my few remaining crackers were. I saved them at my evening meal for this specific time. Yet crackers without something with which to wash them down made for a mouth full of dry crumble. Swallowing was interesting, if not difficult. Now I was thirsty, very much so. Knowing my growing girth as I did, I was not really amazed that my stomach's needs were powerful enough to override my fearful thoughts of court-martial.

Twelve fifty. In the faint half-light given off by the shy moon, the mortar tube looked vertical, absolutely perpendicular to the ground. The ink of the headlines was almost dried as it rolled off the presses. It was hard to breathe. Thoughts of murder, unintentional as it would be, were once more fresh. Five minutes to go. I switched on the flashlight very carefully. Any sudden light at night made one a specific target. The sight had not changed. The bubbles were level. I could fire at any time now. My hesitancy was overwhelming. I had wanted to go to Vietnam and fight. Now my genuine cowardice was appalling. Firing H & I's was fighting, sort of, wasn't it?

The top of the canister was wrung off and laid aside once again. I slid the round slowly out of the dark cylinder, cradling it firmly in my right hand. I removed the packets one by one until they were lying in the canister and out of the way. I pulled the safety wire completely out of its position, laying it, too, aside. Now, this "thing" was armed and dangerous.

One o'clock. I suddenly noticed that the end of my tongue was sticking out of my mouth. I was using all the body English I could muster to complete this unwanted task. Get it over with I thought. If I kill them, I kill them. Just put an end to it.

With the care a mother lavishes upon her newborn child, I placed the fins over the lip of the tube and dropped the round. It didn't go as I had planned. It didn't fall down and down and down. In an instant it hit the firing pin at the bottom of the barrel and exploded right back out of the muzzle. I could not stop it now and up it went. I could hear it straining for the sky. I heard it reach its peak and arc over. And I heard it begin its descent. Now it was falling down and down and down. It sounded like it was coming right back into the gun pit. Oh Lord, help me. I'm going to kill myself!

The explosion was terrifying. I pursed my lips. The next sound I would hear would be "Corpsman up!" I had done it. I had killed those Marines after all. I knew I would. I was a murderer. Still silence. Nothing. No movement. No scurrying about.

Had I done it right? No one was more relieved than I, when after a few intensely emotional moments were passed, everything remained as it was prior to my tiniest of artillery experiences. I just sat there, amazed. I had actually fired my first live high explosive round in a combat area and not killed anyone on our side.

The world moved off of my shoulders and thudded deftly upon the ground. Still, there was no movement, no screaming, and no sound of any kind except that of the rustling grasses swaying in the breeze. It was funny in a warped sort of way how no one knew the past hours of imagined terror I had been living. The war had gone on. Men were still doing what they do in the night watches. The world was still in its orbit. The world's tides were moving into shore in the great oceans. The wind was blowing and the grasses still rustled in protest.

I quietly opened the flap on Jimmy's bunker and laid the flashlight near where he was sleeping. Quiet snoring could be heard farther in. I walked through the open trench line to the entrance of our pitch-black bunker and wearily climbed in. Stumbling a bit, I awakened Mike for his watch. I could now lie my exhausted body down and go to sleep for a few short hours until this whole nightmare started all over again when the sun announced its routine appearance. For a few hours, I could forget why I was here.

Once a Marine, Always a Marine
(Oklahoma City, April 1995)

Two United States Marines were among the 168 people killed by the terrorist bomb that destroyed the Alfred P Murrah Federal Building. The Federal Emergency Management Agency deployed teams of firemen and police officers from New York City to help search the rubble for survivors and recover the dead. Several of these volunteers were Marine reservists or former Marines. Police officer Michael Curtin, a Marine First Sergeant in the reserves, discovered a body pinned in the wreckage, wearing the blue trousers with the distinctive "blood stripe" of a Marine. He knew he had found the missing remains of Captain Randolph Guzman, executive officer of the recruiting station.

Curtin asked permission to retrieve Captain Guzman's body — dangerous laborious work. He found three former Marines to lend a hand. Manny Hernandez, another police officer, said, "It was something I had to do. I had a squad in Nam, and whenever we lost a Marine, he was never left behind. We take care of our own." The Marines' worked five hours with electric jackhammers to free the Captain's remains. Someone provided a body bag. Hernandez knelt and closed the dead Marine's eyes, "For the Glory of God," he said, "and the Glory of the Corps." The word somehow passed around the site that the Marines were bringing out one of their own.

An Air Force officer provided an American flag. Officer Curtin draped it over the body, and the men worked their way clear of the building with their burden. Curtin was stunned at what he saw outside. "It was completely quiet, cranes stopped, rescuers stopped, people lined the street. Everyone was watching in silence as we brought our Marine out." The workers formed a corridor, removed their hard hats, bowed their heads. The veterans in the crowd saluted, tears in their eyes. Said Officer Hernandez, swept with emotion, "We are a band of brothers." Captain Guzman was in good, ever faithful hands. Semper Fidelis.

No matter what you do, you will always be a Marine. Watch out for each other and always remember who you are and what you have become...a Marine for the rest of your life.

Dear Ernie:

I recently received your Spring 2001 Red Clay Magazine. I had sent in money and a "Remembrance Memorial" for 2ND LT Michael Thomas, my dear friend in OCS, Quantico 1967, who was KIA Jan 20, 1968 (Navy Cross Recipient). Thomas Esslinger, I & M Co 3/26, also remembered him. I am writing to see if you can find an address for Tom, and send it to me. I have located Michael Thomas's brother Steve, who would like to hear from those who knew Michael.

Dear Ernie,

Just received the latest issue of Red Clay, thanks. You guys do a great job, please stick with it. I ~~am~~ writing in reference to the Editor's note on page four. The Editor takes exception to the spelling of "Khe Sahn" as shown in the photograph taken at MCRD. Well, personally I think they are the ones who actually have it spelled right. Until about 10 years ago that is how I always thought it was spelled. The current "Khe Sanh" spelling, I think is the Americanization of the proper spelling, so I also just went along with it. I even had California License Plates made up with the Khe Sanh spelling.

None of the above is to say who is right or wrong, just thought it was interesting. I seem to recall maps from our time during the Siege that showed it spelled "Khe Sahn." Keep up the good work.

Everything I Need to Know, I Learned in Bootcamp

By Robert A Hall

Robert Fulghum's inspirational essay, "Everything I need to Know, I learned from Kindergarten," is one of the most read and reprinted articles of our time. Though I admire Fulghum's insights, I must have been a late bloomer. Everything I needed to know, I learned at Parris Island from three leather tough Marine drill instructors. The lessons taught by Sergeants William Harris, Michael Martin and Ezekiel Owens while training platoon 273 in the summer of 1964 have carried me through rough times, and led to what success I can claim in life. In college, in my earlier political career, and in my current job as an association manager, my DIs were always with me, guiding me, helping me, urging me on and kicking my tail when I need it. I may not think about them daily but for over 35 years, their training and spirit has been an inseparable part of my life. Schools, colleges, and even the other services educate the brain. Marine training burns deep in the heart and the bone.

I would like to share some of the lessons they gave me:

- Challenge yourself, as you can always do more than you think you can.
- Balance physical and mental activity. You need both to succeed.
- Individual effort is important, but teamwork wins battles.
- Courage isn't the absence of fear; courage is being afraid and still doing what needs to be done.
- It's what you do when you just can't do anymore that determines the outcome.
- The great creations of the human race aren't buildings or machines, but the concepts of duty, honor, loyalty, teamwork, and freedom.
- Learn to laugh at discomfort and trouble, it makes misfortune lighter, and annoys your enemies.
- Without pride, you don't have anything.
- Honor those who went before and set a standard for you.
- Always give more than you expect to get.
- Real discipline comes from within.
- When you let the team down, you let yourself down.
- Make your mom proud.
- The people around you are entitled to your best; so are you.
- Properly motivated, even the weakest will make a contribution.
- When you go out in the world, it's good to have Marines at your side.
- Respect has to be earned.
- A vigorous attack is usually more effective and safer than a plodding approach.

Space will not allow all the lessons learned by Robert Hall; the above is an excerpt of many more.

Cedar Point Information and Status Report

By Bill Donoghue

There continues to be sporadic uprisings by minorities in Vietnam due to their treatment by the government. As a result, internal security police severely restrict movement of foreign visitors to many areas that need our assistance. Our efforts continue to be a protracted battle convincing officials that the Cedar Point Foundation has no political or religious goals.

The Cedar Point Foundation's continued persistence does pay off. Government officials do remember us. Most non-government organizations come into an area, throw around a great deal of money for projects and then leave, never to return. Quite often these projects have no real impact on the minority people, but merely serve to line the pockets of officials, leaving behind nothing more than an empty shell of a building for some program (i.e., AIDS education) with no funding to actually run the program. And so it sits, an empty reminder of yet another unfulfilled promise.

We continue to listen to the village elders' concerns and needs. We continue to chip away, year after year at these problems; water wells, medical aid, education opportunities for the children and now the latest problem, repairs to homes. In an effort to stop slash and burn destruction of the tropical forest, the Vietnamese government has prohibited cutting down trees. Unfortunately, typhoons in recent years have severely damaged most Bru homes. These homes are constructed of indigenous materials, thatched roofs, log support columns and wood floors and walls. It's illegal to cut trees to repair the damage. The Bru now have to use concrete support columns and fiber or cement tile roofs. The problem is that the average Bru makes only a few hundred dollars per year; barely enough to feed their family, there is simply no money (government or otherwise) to repair homes. Housing continues to be a problem that needs to be addressed. As the materials necessary to construct or repair their houses becomes sparser and scarcer, the Bru must turn away from traditional materials. The large logs that support their stilted houses need to be replaced with cement columns. The thatch roofs, which need to be repaired often, need to be replaced with sheets of tin or fibro cement panels.

The cost to do this does not come cheap, especially if your yearly income is just a few hundred dollars. The 12 concrete columns needed for a home cost about $35 each for a total of almost $500 when everything is figured in (transportation of materials, etc.) Another $500 is needed for the fibro cement roofing panels and a final $500 for lumber to construct the floor and walls.

The village elders are concerned that if just a few houses are upgraded at a time, that jealousies could develop that will divide the community. A typical Bru community consists of 20 to 30 families. With one home costing $1,500 USD, then $30,000 to $45,000 will be needed to rebuild each community. If we can find the money, we will be able to provide a low maintenance house that does not require the continual destruction of the rain forest. Bru time is now spent searching for scarce materials to cut down, and could now be redirected towards cash crop production. Use of non-indigenous materials to repair homes would just about eliminate slash and burn activity in the area.

This trip was one of the most successful, even though we were not allowed into Thon Cheng. We were allowed into a new community (Lang Vay) and in front of village elders, were allowed to outline our plan for present and future assistance. It was quite apparent that money speaks and that a prime reason for success was the amount of this trip's assistance. Cedar Point must continue to search out new sources of funding and funding in greater amounts. It is extremely important that anyone with a vested interest in helping the Bru explores his or her personal contacts and determines if there is someone who is affluent and willing to assist us. Possibly, there is a silent donor out there who would provide substantial funding for each trip, which could make a difference.

Our Khe Sanh Brothers Are Still Seving Their Country

Hi Jim,

Sorry I haven't been keeping up with my e-mail. I took a new job since we last corresponded. I am now the only Aero Medical Evacuation Consultant to the USAF. I work down in San Antonio at Brooks AFB. I am trying to build a new system for the Air Force. Since I left Aero Medevac about 25 years ago, it has gone down the tube. We are in really bad shape when it comes to moving our wounded. I'm sure you will recall when the U.S.S. Cole was hit last November. Well, the USAF is so low on cargo/AE airplanes that we couldn't get to those guys in time, so we had to ask the French Air Force to fly their airplane over from Djibouti, Africa, and pick our sailors up. I'm doing my best to fix this as fast as I can.

During the last administration, the USAF budget was cut by a total of 47%. Our AF generals did the best they could, but they had to maintain what we call the "Tooth to Tail Ratio." Tooth being our fighters, bombers, and tankers. Tail being our cargo or airlift aircraft. So they cut the tail off. They did not fund the repair and replacement of any of our cargo aircraft for 8 years. It almost makes me cry to think that the United States cannot even move our own wounded people. We are currently moving over 10,800 patients a year out of the Pacific Area.

We are rapidly coming to the place where we will have to use an even older airplane that has been maintained for airevac. We will start using the KC-135 soon. It is a tanker but has room on its upper deck for patients, if we do it right. The KC-135 is one of the oldest airplanes in the USAF inventory. You may recall it's civilian version, the Boeing 707, the first U.S. jet Airliner. It was maintained because it's part of the "tooth."

Still we are not allowed to modify this aircraft in any way, so I am trying to build a system that will not require any aircraft modifications. I'm calling it Roll-on/Roll-off. I'm using the 463L Cargo Pallets to haul our patients on. To do this, we have to have the pallets re-built so they will hold two litter stanchions and three seats. I've got those being built right now. I also am trying to build a system so I can roll-on our medical oxygen system with the patients, since these airplanes have no oxygen for the patients in the back. They also do not have any electricity in the back, so I am trying to buy fuel cells to generate all the electricity we need. I am buying several other items, so I haven't let my shirttail hit my back since I took this job.

I hope that I can get some sort of a system cobbled together before we have another war because if I don't, we will have a disaster on our hands. As you know, I live in Austin, and Brooks AFB is in San Antonio, some 87 miles away. So I am commuting back and forth every day and it doesn't leave me much time to eat and sleep, much less to answer my e-mail. So please forgive me for not writing more often. By the way, I quit a job that was paying me nearly twice what this one pays, because of the real need to fix the Aero Medical Evacuation System. I could not live with myself if our young troops had to die overseas because we couldn't get them moved back home. I could use a prayer or two if you have time.

A Battery Commander Remembers

When I first arrived in Vietnam in 1967, I was assigned to HQ 3RD Marine Division. I was the Combat Operations Center G-3 Watch Officer on the midnight to 8 AM shift, and also briefed the CG at his Staff meeting every morning. My supervisor was a Lt. Col (don't remember his name but he was a cool guy) who told me that when he was out in the field commanding a battalion, he used to cut the tops off the C-rations packages and send them home as postcards. I did that at Khe Sanh with the notation, "Greetings from the underground paradise of the Far East."

When I arrived at Khe Sanh, it was late November 1967, and everything was pretty quiet. The first task at hand was an inspection of the Battery area. First Sgt. Keith had the troops dig bunkers for housing instead of living above ground, so they were ready for any attack. The Battery was split up with 3 105s at the Combat Base, and the other 3 guns on Hill 881 under the command of 1ST Lt. Biondo. We also had 155 howitzers, 4.2, mortars and a search light platoon in the Battery area. The area was surrounded by barbed wire to keep the locals out. That proved to be a great idea as during the siege we never took a direct hit on the guns because the locals never could survey our locations.

Shortly after taking command of the Battery, I held an inspection of the Battery and found that the living conditions in the bunkers was deplorable. I found we had a dog as a Battery mascot that had mange. We also had two ducks in an outdoor pen. The troops did clean up the dog and their area. Later, during the first night of the Siege, I found myself in a bunker with the dog. When the tear gas in the ammo dump blew, I found myself sharing my gas mask with the dog. Later, one of the troops rotating to the states took the dog home with him. The ducks took a direct hit that first night and that was the end of them. The inspection was timely because a short time later, Lt Col Hennelly took command of the Battalion and held a full-scale inspection of the Battery area.

Christmas was not a very cheery time. The NVA broke the truce on Christmas Eve, and the traditional Christmas meal at the mess hall was typical of their terrible meals. I've had bad food before, but never any as bad as the food served in the mess hall at Khe Sanh. I want to point out that the mess hall was run by the grunts and not by the artillery. During the first morning of the Siege when the NVA was throwing everything they had at the Battery position, I heard a loud cheer go up from the troops. I looked over to see the mess hall burning down to the ground.

Later in the Siege, the 13TH Marine Battalion Mess Sergeant cooked up some sort of hot chicken stew type meal for the Battery. I sent someone to the Battalion HQ to pick up this culinary delight. We had the troops straggle up to a central location to get some of this hot chow. Due to snipers from the hills and incoming hitting at a moment's notice, I wouldn't allow large groups to gather in the open except when we were returning fire. The first guy on the scene for this special meal looked at me and asked how it tasted. I replied that Officers always ate after all the troops were fed. His reply was "You eat it first. If you aren't poisoned, then we'll try it." It was terrible. From then on we ate C-rations and loved them. One of the troops gave me an egg one night. They said they traded with the Air Force for the eggs. They probably stole them. First Sergeant Keith came upon the scene as I was cooking that egg, so I ended up with only half the egg.

I thought I would go back and read the letters I sent my wife while in Vietnam to refresh my memory about the events leading up to the Siege. During the Siege, we received orders to burn all personal items, letters, etc., because they expected us to get overrun and they had evidence that the NVA was sending items like personal letters to the American Peace Movement through Jane Fonda. They would then harass the families back in the States. Whenever I visit a VFW post, they usually have the urinal target with Jane Fonda's face on it. Now that's a great way to take a leak. I noticed that the last time I started reading those letters was about ten years ago, and I had stopped with a letter written on 18 January 1968. Well, I didn't get much further today.

Before the infamous attack on the Combat Base on 21 January, I thought it curious that continual requests from the grunts for artillery fire on NVA in the open were denied clearance. I became convinced that we were being set up as bait. I repeatedly requested that Regiment relocate the Ammo Dump, or at least split it up into various locations. The Ammo Dump was located between C/ 1/ 13 and the airstrip.

Battalion sent Mark Swearengen, Liaison Officer from 2ND Battalion 94TH Artillery USA to my battery position. They didn't have any living quarters for him, so I had him bunk in with me. When the shit hit the fan, he headed to his post in the FSCC, and I didn't see him again until 25 years later at our reunion in Washington, DC. We started returning fire, but then they hit the Ammo Dump and the whole world was blowing up around us. We lost our wire lines, so we reverted to radio contact with Battalion and used runners to send commands to the guns. Some of the runners were wounded, so I went to each gun and told them to fire their final protective fires, and when they ran out of ammo to hit their spider holes. We had them dig those spider holes to protect against a direct hit on the gun. Unfortunately we lost L/Cpl Jerry O. Stenberg that first morning. He jumped into a spider hole and landed on top of another Marine and took a piece of shrapnel in the head which killed him immediately. The other Marine, whose name I don't remember, never got over that. Later, we sent him on R&R to China Beach where he was wounded and medevaced to the States. Great R&R that was.

One thing that always sticks in my mind was the picture of two grunts walking to Graves Registration the next morning with the body of their buddy wrapped in a poncho. The dead Marine's arm was hanging out of the poncho and dragging on the ground. I stopped them and realized they were both in shock, so I just put his arm back in the poncho and let them continue on their way.

Once the smoke cleared that morning, I was called to Battalion HQ for a meeting. The first thing the Bn C/O wanted was a casualty report and an ammo count. I remember we were fortunate enough to have only one KIA, but I don't remember the actual wounded count. As far as the ammo was concerned, we had only one green smoke round left. When I told the guns to fire until they were out of ammo, they really took me seriously. We probably really confused the gooks by throwing smoke and illumination at them. The Bn C/O briefed us on the situation with the news that 50,000 pissed off NVA surrounded us and there were only 5,000 of us. The airfield was no longer operational and we were out of food, water and ammo. I replied by asking that now that we had them where we wanted them, what the &%%# were we going to do with them?

The decision was made to form a complete 155 Battery and 4.2 Mortar Battery, so that they were moved out of C Battery area. My three guns were then moved into A Battery area to allow EOD time to remove all of the unexploded ammo that had fallen on us when the ammo dump blew up. I left Glenn Prentice and a few other guys behind with a 50 cal. Machine gun and a radio to guard the area. He is still pissed to this day that I left them behind, but they must have been quite effective because the gooks never tried to break through the lines. EOD never did show up to clear our area, so we moved back and did the clean up ourselves. Fortunately, none of us were injured due to exploding grade 3 ammo. Shortly after moving back to our area, they sent B Battery in to reinforce us, and we became a 9-gun Battery which I renamed C Battery 1ST BN 13th Marines Reinforced.

Battalion had a supply of green smoke sent to us for our St. Patrick's Day celebration. The only problem was that the order to fire the green smoke came down early the morning of March 17, and we were still surrounded by dense fog. We fired the green smoke but never got to see it. Some years later I ran into some of the grunts who said they saw it and really enjoyed our St. Pat's Day celebration. I still held on to my one last green smoke round and later that afternoon, I fired it north of Hill 881.

We were under orders not to fire small arms over the heads of friendly troops and not to return fire without clearance. I remember seeing large-caliber machine guns firing from the hills to the north of the runway at C-130s trying to land at KSCB. We kept reporting it, but no action that I knew of was ever taken. One morning one of the gun crews called into the Exec Pit to report an NVA mortar team setting up just outside the wire. I was sure that the grunts would take them under fire but nothing happened. I called in a fire mission from Battery A, then I was going to adjust them onto the target. I waited for what seemed like an eternity for the first round. Well, the first round arrived but it wasn't from A Battery — it was from the NVA mortar, and it landed in the Battery position. I remember yelling over the wire line "What the hell was that?" and the answer came back from one of the troops, "That's your asshole NVA buddies dropping a round on the battery position." I called Battalion only to find that they were still waiting for clearance. I went out to the gun position, and we rolled the 105 out of the gun pit and down to the wire and blew them away with a direct fire round. That was just the first of many occasions when we took targets under direct fire with a 105 howitzer and also the first of many an ass-chewing from Lt Col Hennelly for opening fire without waiting for clearance. I told him that when we started to receive incoming fire, my guys were always on their guns firing their missions. Unlike A Battery whose wire lines always seemed to go down when incoming was hitting. My theory was that we were surrounded by unfriendly not friendly and that anyone who was shooting at my troops deserved to die quickly.

I never could get Regiment to move the ammo dump from the crazy position it was in, right between the airstrip and my battery. On a clear and sunny day, I watched some Army troops throwing ammo from the back of a truck when one of the rounds went off wounding the two of them. I went in there with my two corpsmen to pull these guys out when the whole ammo dump blew up for the third time. I thought for sure that I was dead. My corpsmen got those guys out and made it back unhurt.

Well, my tour finally came to an end. I left the Battery before they were to drive east out of Khe Sanh. I jumped on a helicopter and headed to Dong Ha. Unfortunately, I had to then take a convoy to Camp Carroll to report into 1ST BN 12TH Marines because the battalion had administrative control of C Battery. I finally got through that chicken shit meeting and headed back to Quang Tri to say goodbye to the Battery. On the morning I was leaving for Danang and my journey to CONUS, the NVA hit us again with rockets. I had the Battery open fire on the position which we could see, and we were able to knock it out. They tried to get us to cease fire; why, I'll never understand.

I still have the plaque that the Battery personnel presented me at Khe Sanh. It reads "Capt. William J. O'Connor, the Best Battery Commander in Vietnam, from the men in Charlie Battery 1/13." That's something I will always treasure.

Always remember in your prayers, our departed Marines: From C/1/13, Phillip F. Sheridan, Delbert L. Leasure, and Jerry O Stenberg, from B /1/13, Allan H. Jordan, Louis C. Goi, and Ronald L. Dempsey.

The Economic Development of Quang Tri Province — The Khe Sanh Plateau:

The Combined Role of The Economic Free Zone and National Highway No.9

By Gary W. Foster

Located in the narrowest part of Vietnam, Quang Tri Province sits astride north/south and east/west national economic trade and development and will play an important role to the overall future development of the Republic of Vietnam. Primarily an agrarian based economy, western Quang Tri Province has been designated as an economic free trade and development zone. From Lao Bao in the west to Hoang Hoa 25 kilometers farther east, the region is developing into a commercial, industrial, and agricultural economic area.

National Highway 9 will be the springboard for this development, because it will improve access to and from Laos, Da Nang, and the Cua Viet Port. Hotly contested during the Vietnam War, the highway today is uncongested and quiet and continues to serve as the only corridor in an area once referred to as "Eye Corp."

At present, as was the case in the late 60s and early 70s, National Highway 9 is a two-lane road crossing about 45 streams and rivers over reconstructed bridges of varying configurations. The alignment of the road today exists as it was then. The road is dangerous in places due to narrowness, blind curves (as at the Rao Quan river crossing), near proximity of villages, and diverse types of vehicles. Although the road is not as heavily traveled as Highway 1, which Highway 9 intersects at Dong Ha, it is nevertheless of major importance, especially to cross-border trade with Laos and Thailand. Its rehabilitation and upgrade will clearly reduce travel time, enhance road safety, and provide a strong foundation for the economic development that is planned in Quang Tri Province. Furthermore, it will provide improved travel times to Hue and Danang for commerce originating in Laos, thereby providing an efficient opening to new market opportunities.

Spending any time in western Quang Tri Province, it is inescapable for one not to note that the major item of trade on a continuous basis is lumber, through the harvest of large trees, which originate in Laos, and, some say, are illegally transported across the border into Vietnam . The harvested lumber is transported across the border at Lao Bao to the Cua Viet Port where the timber is loaded on to large barges for further transport to future end-users. Another product of the area includes coffee, which has a pronounced history in the region since before the war and which continues to this day. Though rice is grown in the narrow valleys, rice from this part of Vietnam contributes little to the economy of the country. Other products include fruit and vegetables, but again like rice, these are of little economic consequence outside the immediate region.

Khe Sanh village or Hoang Hoa hasn't changed much in physical presence. It is a narrow village which straddles Highway 9 and has grown in length along the corridor. The village has undergone some upgrades with a slight increase in population in the last year as economic activity has increased incrementally. This activity has occurred, more importantly, because it has become clear that western Quang Tri Province will realize an economic boom within the next year; and more so over the next three years when the upgrade and re-construction of Highway 9 will be completed.

As many USMC vets who have returned to Quang Tri Province have observed, Khe Sanh today is a serene town that contains small roadside restaurants, a few hotels, and small shops. There is no major industry. Although there is hardly a sidewalk, one can walk the length of the town in less than 30 minutes. Once off the highway to either side, there is no real physical depth to the town. Obviously, maintaining a close proximity to Highway 9 is the key to the sustained livelihood of Khe Sanh's inhabitants and represents the thread supporting the small town's tenuous economy. One would also note that the townsfolk are receptively welcoming and friendly. One is never hounded in the town, but clearly any westerner, ostensibly assumed to be American, is a curiosity.

Cottage type industries are beginning to be introduced to Khe Sanh, and these are typical of those found in more accessible Vietnamese villages, especially along Highway 1. However, there is little to export from them. The scrap metal trade, once reported to have thrived after the evacuation of Khe Sanh towards the end of the war, no longer exists. In fact, unless one knows what to look for, there are hardly any noticeable remnants of the conflict that ensued there 30 years ago.

Small villages and localized micro population centers have sprung up in the valleys around Hill 861 and elsewhere. The villages are served today by the narrow road that accesses the old Khe Sanh combat base from Highway 9. The road leading to the combat base and to the hills beyond is now under construction at certain points. Plans are being developed for this road's future upgrade to a national standard that will require minimum maintenance. This improved road will provide access to an area beyond the surrounding hills heretofore inaccessible. Agriculture will be the primary focus in this rural area.

Further east of Khe Sanh and to the right of the highway is a large development that has taken place only within the last year. This development serves as a reinforcement of the serious commitment that the Vietnamese government has made towards the development of the region through the use of an economic free zone and improved highway. The development includes all the elements of a large scale commercial or industrial park found throughout the United States today. Large flat concreted areas, tilt-up type construction for warehouses and manufacturing plants, and sophisticated grading and drainage and lighting are characteristics of the development. The development sits in stark contrast to the surrounding area, rendering other business establishments archaic and seemingly redundant. The current and future development will induce people from Dong Ha and beyond to move to the Khe Sanh Plateau because of newly created employment opportunities.

There appear to be no plans for the development of the Khe Sanh combat base at this point in time. It is apparently considered a "vestige" (historical site) by the Vietnamese government and this may preclude any development. However, on the Khe Sanh plateau in general, agriculture is prolific. The area is covered with coffee plants, all being tended to by local farmers. The eastern end, and parts of the western end of the combat base, true to the surrounding area, are planted in coffee plants. Otherwise, the area of the base itself, excluding the exposed laterite area around the museum building is overgrown by trees and elephant grass.

The Khe Sanh plateau itself represents important potential for economic development much like the lower part of the plateau east of Khe Sanh village, which is now under major development. There is plenty of room on the overall plateau for development. This continued development would induce further residential growth and migration of people from the outlying villages and from the larger commercial areas of the region.

Highway 9, once reconstructed, will provide reliable service to nearby Laos and distant Dong Ha in the opposite direction, and to Hue and Da Nang further south, and will provide the residents of the Khe Sanh plateau with new access to commercial trade and destinations. Sleepy Khe Sanh village, once the intense focus of two opposing armies with diametrically opposed agendas, is about to awake to a new type of turmoil, a turmoil that promises economic prosperity for the region. While few inhabitants of Khe Sanh have funds sufficient enough to travel even to Dong Ha, in time, with the combination of the enhanced commercialization of the economic free zone and improved road transportation, all of Vietnam will be open to the residents of the Khe Sanh Plateau.

The following are the facts surrounding an engagement that occurred between U.S. Marines and Army of North Vietnamese forces in the former Republic of Vietnam, near Con Thien, on June 6, 1968.

By James Kaylor

On June 3, 2000, the City of Closter, New Jersey, will rededicate a park named for a fallen Marine who was killed in action in the former Republic of Vietnam. Corporal Kenneth Schauble was the squad leader of Second Squad, Second Platoon, Company E, Second Battalion, Twenty Sixth Marines, Third Marine Division. I was a Private First Class assigned as a grenadier with Second Squad, Second Platoon. The Second Platoon was assigned to perform a security sweep to the southeast of Con Thien. These sweeps were done daily by each rifle company assigned to the base to preclude North Vietnamese forces from encroaching on our position.

On June 6, 1968, the platoon leader was Staff Sergeant Allen J. Baker. Company E had a shortage of officers at the time, requiring enlisted men to perform their duties. On this day, we moved out southeast along a dirt road that intersected the main road to Con Thien. This road was about one kilometer south of the main base. The area was relatively flat and open. It was formerly rice paddies, as it appeared hedgerowed into about one-acre block parcels. There were three old, bombed-out, Catholic church structures along a dirt road that were significant landmarks. We proceeded southeast with first and third squad on line. Second squad was in a staggered column, following behind, where first and third squad intersected. Our crew-served weapons (machine guns & mortar) were with the second squad.

At about 1100 hours, we were east of the third church by about 500 meters when our right flank erupted in a heavy volume of enemy automatic weapons fire, interspersed with rocket-propelled grenade fire. Our entire right flank from our lead element to our rear element was under heavy fire. The squad that had been on line on our right flank was in the midst of a hidden enemy bunker complex. Second squad returned the enemy's fire as we moved to our left flank. We found cover in a sunken trail that extended parallel to the enemy's positions. First squad, which was on our left flank, now moved into the sunken trail and engaged the North Vietnamese with us.

The exchange of fire was very intense and somewhat confusing, especially for some of our newer Marines. I remember having to tell a couple to fire at the enemy. We, in the sunken trail, were unaware of the plight of our right flank. We were unable to contact them via radio, and the enemy fire was too heavy to move near them. We continued to engage the enemy positions that were south, east and west of us. Our 60mm mortar was deployed and supporting our effort along with our 3.5 inch rocket launcher. Leldon D. Barnett detached the mortar from its bipod. He then utilized the weapon in the "lever fire" mode while aiming the tube with his hands. Members of the mortar crew later told me that L/Cpl. Barnett struck a fleeing enemy soldier directly in the back with a 60mm high explosive mortar round at a distance of less than 50 meters. L/Cpl. Barnett fired the mortar in much the same manner I was firing my M-79 grenade launcher until he exhausted his supply of mortar rounds.

The engagement continued in various states of intensity. We learned that our platoon leader, Staff Sergeant Baker had been killed when the action began. Whoever the platoon sergeant was now, we were unaware, so we were without leadership. Second squad leader, Corporal Kenneth Schauble, assumed command of second platoon. He tried to call in artillery and gunship support. Our artillery forward observer Lance Cpl. Steve McDonell indicated that we were too close to the enemy for support. Cpl. Schauble and I discussed firing artillery to the enemy's rear to preclude their withdrawal; I believe L/Cpl. McDonell, who was with artillery, did this. The battle then stalemated, as the enemy did not advance or attempt to disengage. We were unable to receive helicopter support, as they were all engaged elsewhere.

Cpl. Schauble sent a fire team north to locate an avenue for a flanking movement. This team was immediately taken under small arms fire and forced to return to the sunken trail. We knew we were completely surrounded! The sunken trail we were defending was approximately two- to three-feet deep and six- to eight-feet across. The vegetation produced sparse shade, as the day was very hot and humid. We had many near heat casualties, as the midday sun went overhead.

At one point, we had one of the last M-72 LAWS, which we wanted to use on an enemy position located in a large clump of bamboo about 50 feet to our front. We were all reluctant to fire the launcher, as its use required too much exposure to enemy fire. After a brief discussion with the Marines around me, I came up with a plan. I extended the LAW and removed the safety clip while pointing the launcher in the general direction of the target. I squatted on my haunches and told the other Marines to give me suppressive fire, which they did. I sprang to my feet, a la "Jack-in-the Box," discharged the rocket launcher and then fell on my back. I remember hearing the enemy rifle bullets cracking where I had just stood to fire the rocket. We all kind of laughed as the rocket hit the center of the base of the bamboo clump.

As the hours wore on, Cpl. Schauble was concerned with the fate of the rest of the platoon on the right flank. He was concerned that we were low on ammunition and water, as well as the breakdown of communications equipment. The North Vietnamese engaged us with ferocity, determination, and duration, all in daylight; that was unusual for them. After four hours, we were still locked in a stalemated action with regular North Vietnamese army troops. They were in no hurry to disengage or conclude combat with us. Another concern was the lack of reinforcements from Con Thien itself, considering our close proximity to that base. We did not know the size of the force we engaged, other than it was larger than our platoon. Cpl. Schauble was worried that any rescue force from Con Thien may have also been ambushed.

We continued to exchange sporadic fire with the enemy until late afternoon. We had nearly exhausted our small arms ammunition and much of our water. Our mortar, rocket, and machine gun ammunition, had long been expended. Because we had not been rescued and did not know if help was responding, Cpl. Schauble decided that time had come to aggressively challenge the enemy and consolidate with our right flank. At this point, we were unaware of their circumstances. Echo Company Marines prided themselves on never leaving anyone living or dead, ever. We were not about to leave anyone on this battlefield.

Cpl. Schauble deployed first squad to our right flank to provide cover for second squad, which would press the attack in a skirmish formation. First squad successfully moved into position supporting us with grazing rifle fire. Schauble positioned most of the remaining Marines with second squad for the assault. We were all positioned and looking at Schauble who was in the middle of the skirmish line. I was to the right side of the line. Directly to my left was PFC Richard Eemisse; we were all waiting anxiously for the command to attack. Schauble raised his right hand motioning forward and verbally gave the command to attack. The entire line leaped to its feet as one, yelling and firing their weapons as we ran forward. I had the platoon's remaining five or six M-79 rounds in my possession and fired sparingly as we ran forward. While attacking, my M-79 became inoperable. Our first objective was a hedgerow about twenty meters to our front. This hedgerow concealed many enemy positions, and we easily took it with only two or three casualties.

First squad maintained a steady flow of grazing fire from our right flank in their effort to suppress enemy fire. The momentum of the attack carried us through the first hedgerow into another field that was approximately fifty meters across, bordered by another hedgerow. At this point, the man to my left, PFC Eemisse was throwing a hand grenade when he was struck by enemy gunfire. The grenade he was throwing squibbed about ten feet directly in front of me and exploded. It surprised me that I was not wounded.

We continued about half way across the second field approaching Cpl. Callaway's position, when my attention was drawn to my left front along the forward edge of a very large bomb crater. I saw a very extensive defensive position that was not well concealed. The North Vietnamese had dug trench lines connecting their positions. I could see several enemy troops moving from position to position. There was an extensive amount of fire coming from these positions. Two enemy soldiers were operating a light machine gun (RPD type), and several more were firing AK47's. They were firing at the Marines to my left without let up.

Private First Class William A. Hayes was to my right a few feet away. We looked at each other without saying a word; the expression on his face told me that he was thinking the same thing. If we're caught in the open, we are dead! If we tried running back to the hedgerow we would be shot in the back, as it was at least 20 meters. Dropping to the prone would have left us in the open field, in plain view and exposed to their fire. In the split second it took for PFC Hayes and me to look at each other, we had the same idea. Knowing we were going to die, we both changed directions and sprinted directly toward the light machine gun. PFC Hayes was helmetless and bare chested, he held a hand grenade in each hand as he sprinted toward the enemy. The North Vietnamese manning the bunkers must have been concentrating on their front as they only began moving to fire at us when we were about twenty- to twenty-five feet from them. The enemy RPD began firing on PFC Hayes, as he was the closest. I was firing my .45 pistol while at a dead run directly at the enemy. Our close proximity and being at a dead run, put us on top of the enemy in short order.

PFC Hayes tossed the grenade in his left hand, underhanded, toward the machine gun. The grenade he had in his right hand, he raised over his head to throw straight down into the enemy position. He was killed by the machine gun, which he was attacking. At that instant, PFC Hayes' second grenade sailed over the bunker. They both exploded within moments of each other. The North Vietnamese in the bunker appeared frantic. PFC Haye's body fell headlong into their position. The enemy soldiers pushed Hayes' body to their left, as the gunner tried to bring the machine gun to bear on me. I remember looking down at four enemy faces as I fired my pistol. The enemy gunner continued firing the machine gun, but could not quite turn the gun on me quick enough. His bullets were all fired to my right. I quickly adjusted to my left, dropping to my right knee to avoid being shot. I was muzzle-to-muzzle with the RPD.

I remember at this point thinking, "This is it!" I could not tell what affect my pistol had on the enemy soldiers. As I fired, the muzzle of the machine gun was blasting near my face. I turned my head to the left in a grimace as the air turbulence and muzzle blast of a bullet slapped me on the right side of my head. When I did not die, I looked back forward and saw the muzzle of the machine gun point straight up in the air, still firing. It and the four North Vietnamese faces disappeared below the forward edge of their bunker, and their firing ceased. I determined that to continue the attack into the enemy position with three rounds left was not practical. This action all took place in the duration of the time it took Bill Hayes' last grenade to detonate. Approximately 4 to 5 seconds.

I threw a grenade at the enemy bunker. For the next few moments, there was no activity on either side. I did not know how many casualties the enemy sustained, if any, and visually surveyed my surroundings. I was unable to detect any signs of life anywhere on the immediate battlefield. I yelled out several of my fellow squad member's names. There were no response of any kind. Looking to my left, I saw the bodies of at least two dead Marines. I yelled a few more times, trying to find any live souls. I thought this would be my last day to live. I then heard a voice way behind me; it was PFC James M. Terry. He and Private Brien A. Hayes, were pinned down approximately 30 meters to my rear. They were the only other two Marines that were uninjured in the charge, other than myself.

I told them to throw me some grenades so I could continue the attack on the enemy positions. PFC Terry responded that he and PVT Hayes were out of grenades. I instructed them to move around and retrieve the ammunition and grenades from our casualties. PFC Terry threw about four hand grenades toward me, but they did not land in my crater. They landed to the right and left and somewhat to the rear of my crater. I was angry and frustrated at not having the grenades in my possession. To try and get them would have been fatal, as I would have been exposed to the enemy.

I had them throw me a smoke grenade, which I used to blind the enemy. When I thought no enemy soldier could see me through the smoke, I jumped from my crater running, picking up the fragmentation grenades that Terry and Hayes previously had thrown to me. The last grenade I tossed, took one bounce and went right into the enemy bunker. When it exploded I remember seeing items of enemy uniforms and equipment blown skyward. I was once again out of grenades and had only my pistol left to defend myself. I was aware of PFC Hayes' body lying in front of the enemy position. PFC Terry and PVT Hayes continued to locate our casualties and strip them of their armament. They were able to locate and throw me a couple of more grenades, which I threw into the enemy position. I asked them to find me another smoke grenade, which they did. Again, I used it to blind the enemy's position. I then ran back to Terry and Hayes' location and learned that we were the only ones left from the charge who were not wounded or killed.

We discussed what to do next as we had no leader. I decided not to give up what we had gained, so I told Terry and Hayes to remain where they were, while I obtained more ammunition. I took an empty claymore mine bag and ran the distance back to our original starting point in the sunken trail. I prayed with all my being that an enemy sniper would not kill me as I ran. When I arrived back at the sunken trail, I was met by our forward observer, L/Cpl. Steve McDonell, who asked what was happening and where everyone else was. I told him, they're all dead except for three of us! I could see the look of desperation and a sense of very real concern on his face. McDonell said that he had the only operable radio of the six we started with. I told him the enemy was stronger than we anticipated, and a secondary defense line decimated us. Cpl. Callaway was the only member of our right flank that I saw, and he was pinned down among the enemy's positions. I did not know if he was still alive. We still did not know the fate of the rest of our right flank. I distributed the ammunition evenly, giving each of us about three magazines apiece. With our rifles charged, we walked on line, directing slow deliberate fire at the enemy's positions. PFC Campbell's rifle jammed. I removed the magazine and discarded the useless rifle. I immediately located another dead Marine's rifle, loaded it with my magazine and continued in the advance. When we were about twenty feet from the enemy bunker line by the crater I used earlier, we stopped in our tracks! During this final assault, we had not received any enemy fire from the bunkers. Directly beyond the bunkers at about two- to three-hundred meters, we could see at least fifty or more men approaching us being lead by a man waving a pistol.

PFC Terry and I looked at each other — we each knew we were in serious trouble. We thought that this was an enemy counter-attack, as this force was coming from the southeast. Terry took a prone position and said he was going to shoot the leader. I was curious as to why we were not being fired upon in our exposed position as we watched them advance. At this point I was demoralized and made no effort to hide from their view. I was waiting for us to be cut down in a hail of gun fire as we watched them approach. Terry was aiming his rifle when I pushed his rifle barrel down. Terry then recognized, as I had, that the advancing troops were Americans. A great sense of relief came over us as we waited for them. They entered the enemy bunker complex from the rear. This was done without incident. The fighting was over for this day.

The leader of our rescuers was Lt. Rudd, an officer of Hotel Company, 2/26. His troops performed the task of cleaning up after the fight. I went along our line of attack and found many of our casualties. I heard groaning near where I emerged from the first hedgerow when second squad attacked. I found my friend, PFC Rick Ernissee, gravely wounded. I could not see his wound, but when I tried to roll him over, my fingers went into his head. A bullet entered the top of his helmet, striking him at the forward scalp line. The bullet split his cranium all the way to the back of his head. The wound was about two inches wide and brain matter exposed. He was evacuated immediately. We found Lance Cpl. Ronald Kalblienn, at the extreme left flank of second squad's attack. He had been driven to cover at the first hedgerow and was forced to remain there until the battle was over. We found Cpl. Schauble's body near the first hedgerow. A bullet entered his open mouth, exiting near the back of hishead. I found the bodies of PFC Dennis Lobbezoo and PFC Walter Seawright lying in the field in front of the enemy bunker complex. They were killed during the attack on the bunkers by the second squad.

We then discovered the grim reality of the right flank's fate. Most of them were killed in, and among, the enemy's hidden positions. Our Platoon leader, S/Sgt Baker was also found among this group with his radio operator, L/Cpl Daniel L. Prock. After the dead and debris of battle was cleared away, the numbers I recall in this action were about fourteen Marines killed in action and a lesser number, about eleven or twelve, wounded in action from small arms and were taken to hospitals for treatment. I do not remember the exact numbers, but the number of North Vietnamese dead we recovered was the same as the number of Marines killed.

Philadelphia Naval Hospital

By Joseph Olszewski, Alamo, California

On Saturday, June 9, 2001, I heard on the radio that the Philadelphia Naval Hospital was destroyed to make room for a sports complex parking lot. I believe the hospital had been closed for years, as it was first opened during World War II and was already past its prime in the late 60s.

On March 6, 1968, I was admitted to the Philadelphia Naval Hospital as a foot amputee. I stepped on a mine on Hill 558 in late February 1968, was medevac'd to the USS Repose where my foot was amputated and was later transported to a naval hospital in Japan for several days of rest. In the Navy and the Marine Corps if you became an amputee in the 60s you were sent either to the Oakland, California Naval Hospital (called "Oak Knoll" at the time) or the Philadelphia Naval Hospital, depending on your home town. Since I was born and raised in Chicago, I was sent to Philadelphia.

My first day at the hospital was a shock, as the first patient to visit me was Lieutenant Paul Barentz who had lost both legs at the hip. I knew him in USMC Basic School, and we were both Platoon Commanders for 2/26 at Phu Bai. One night in November 1967 he got turned around on an ambush and one of his troops shot him in both legs. I was discharged from the hospital in September 1968, and Paul was still a patient.

I spent seven months at the hospital, as I needed additional surgery. When you have an amputation, the blood vessels on the end of your stump shrink, and it takes time for your blood circulation to improve. Until that circulation improves, doctors will not perform additional surgery, even though in my case it was strictly for cosmetic purposes. The end of my stump had too much side flesh and the doctors wanted to hone it down so it would fit better in the prosthesis, which would give me more mobility. I believe that surgery took place in July, and it took me a few months to get through the therapy and to begin walking with the aid of the prosthesis.

Throughout the seven months of my stay, I experienced both joy and pain. The pain was seeing all the casualties from the Tet Offensive streaming into the hospital, including those who were already experiencing psychological problems. I remember going to the dining room once on crutches and seeing all the patients from the mental ward being lined up in the hallway with corpsmen stationed every ten yards or so to control them. I met one of those patients once at the Naval Base Officers Club bar, and I was shocked to learn that he was a Navy brain surgeon who just performed too many surgeries for his nervous system and "lost it." Other painful experiences were talking to patients who were so badly mutilated that they were dead set on committing suicide once they were released from the hospital and no longer under the care of the staff. I remember one sad experience when Veterans Administration officials had to tell patients suffering from schizophrenia that they were unfit for active duty and had to leave the Marine Corps.

But there were also great times. Since we were all on one ward on the twelfth floor, all of us officers used to party big-time at the Naval Yard Officers Club (the hospital was next door to the Philadelphia Navy Yard where the battleship USS New Jersey was retrofitted and eventually sent to 'Nam for sea duty.) The nurses who cared for us during the day would show up at night at the officers club, and we would party until they closed the place. I remember one nurse who taught me how to dance on crutches before I began wearing a prosthesis. Considering that we were both "polluted," it was one great show. On other occasions, all of us would pile into cabs and head for New Jersey, as that's where all the good restaurants were located. Once I remember we had about six nurses with us, and most of the officers were either amputees like me or had other serious conditions that were obvious. We all entered one restaurant and promptly announced that only those who were drunk or crippled were allowed to eat here. Since no other customers left, I guess we plain scared the death out of them.

Every Tuesday morning, there were exercise sessions for the amputees in the hospital, which included stretching and strengthening your weak limb. Being smart-ass Marines, we amputees called these exercise sessions "Stump Rounds." It caught on and even the hospital staff used that phrase. If you had a prosthesis, there were also lessons on how to use and care for it and how to walk properly, as some of us hadn't walked for a long time.

There were also lessons on how to handle crutches. I still have the pair they gave me at the hospital. I once bruised the bone of my stump so badly in the 80s that I was back on crutches for a week. I remember the personnel manager of the company I work for saw me in the elevator one day with these old wooden crutches that had heavy bandages wrapped around the handles for cushioning so I wouldn't bruise my hands (something we learned in "Stump Rounds.") He took one look at those old crutches and called them my "Gouaches."

In between meals, exercise sessions, and doctor appointments, however, there was a lot of downtime, which was boring. Knowing that I was going to be medically retired and married soon, I began working on my résumé and starting sending out letters to corporations in California (my fiancé and I had already decided that California was to be our future home.) That took up time for a while, but soon there wasn't much to do except play cards, watch TV, and continuously check the time to see how much longer it was until breakfast, lunch, or dinner. Of course, there were always new patients to welcome; I also had the honor of assisting the liaison officer with awarding Purple Hearts.

Some of the patients who arrived during my stay were those I had known from either USMC Basic School or from my unit in 'Nam. Lieutenant Clebe McClary was one of the fellow officers I knew in Basic School who had since lost an arm and an eye to a "Bouncing Betty" booby trap on a recon patrol. In the 70s, I read a book about Third Recon, and there was a chapter about Clebe and how he gave motivational speeches for a living in places like state prisons. At the KSV San Diego Reunion last September, I met an Air Force Chaplain who also hires Clebe for his speaking ability. Ron Vivona was another new patient who was one of the Marines from my platoon. He lost both legs on April 6, 1968 in a bunker ambush on Hill 700 near Khe Sanh. One of my roommates on the officers' ward was a Navy Pilot named Terry Gomer. He was in jet training at Corpus Christi, Texas, when the controls of the plane he was flying jammed, and he ejected. The problem was he was already going so fast that the wind broke his thighs across the seat when he bailed-out. He said he was awake as he parachuted down until he saw the plane crash. That's when he blacked out and the next thing he remembered was a farmer trying to help him in the field where he landed on two broken legs. The doctors inserted metal rods into his thighs to help heal the broken bones. At that time, he was my roommate for about four months. Terry later married one of the nurses we partied with, and he later became the best man for my wedding in October. Last that I heard he was still married to that nurse and living in Atlanta.

During my seven months being hospitalized, either my fiancé would come to Philadelphia to visit me, or I would take the train from Philadelphia to Washington, DC to be with her on weekends once I became proficient with crutches and later, walking with a prosthesis. My 60-year-old mother flew out once in March to visit me. It was the first time she had ever traveled on a plane. This was during the beginning of my stay when I wasn't even strong enough to have meals in the dining room. When my mother saw the food I was served in my room, she asked me if there was something else I wanted to eat that she could bring to me the next day. I said "a pizza and a chocolate shake," and sure enough, she brought that meal for me. The next day my in-laws-to-be also came to visit me. It was the first time I had met my father-in-law, and I remember not liking him. Today I'm 58 and he's 90 — I still don't like him.

After I married and relocated to California, I had some hospital appointments at the Oakland Naval Hospital and at the Martinez Veterans Hospital. I had new prostheses made at Dan Muth & Company located in San Francisco (which had a VA contract to make prostheses for veterans which lasted twenty years.) None of those facilities came close to the camaraderie and experiences I had at the Philadelphia Naval Hospital. Still, it was a historic place, and I was sad to learn that the building no longer exists.

Type II Diabetes Covered

About 200,000 Vietnam Veterans nationwide now qualify for Veterans Affairs disability benefits since Type II diabetes has become a covered condition. The anticipated rush of applications comes at a time when the Veterans Affairs Department is coping with a backlog of claims. More than 500,000 claims are awaiting decision across the country.

"We're already making plans to deal with the increased work load," said Dean Tayloe, director of public affairs for the Denver regional office. To qualify for diabetes benefits, veterans must have served in Vietnam between Jan 9, 1962, and May 7, 1975, and must have been honorably discharged from military service. The VA will review medical records of those who apply and when appropiate, approve the claim without requiring a separate medical exam," Tayloe said.

"Applicants can expect to wait three to six months for a decision," he also said. Veterans whose claims are approved will receive $101 to $2,100 in monthy disability benefits, depending on the severity of their illness. The VA estimates 9 percent of the nation's 2.3 million Vietnam veterans have Type II diabetes. About 16 percent of veterans receiving care from VA medical facilities have this type of diabetes.

The disease, believed to be connected to Vietnam veterans' exposure to the herbicide Agent Orange, derails the body's ability to process hormonal insulin, resulting in high blood sugar levels. Vietnam veterans with questions about Type II diabetes benefits can call the VA at 800-749-8387.

Khe Sanh

Purple mountains ringed the forlorn outpost. Mud, red, stinking, and sucking at ya boots clinging to every niche of man and machine. 20 January, monsoon comes with a hot breath of brim-stoned war. Southward it slammed careening headlong pounding the Khe Sanh with one five twos. They howled from dawn till dusk and past the divide from night to day. Their incoming lethal whine cut a wide swath through our Marine ranks.

It was the beginning of the saddest of days when the sun broke over those eastern peaks dragging with it the swelter of Nam. For the fallen warriors could only hear the song of Valkyrie, calling them to the great hall of Odin. For those fallen warriors, who were not Marine, Odin awaits. However, combat Marine dead are ushered through the gates of heaven in a column of files, to stand their eternal guard. For all who know the hymn, know that if you ever look towards heaven's gates you will see that the streets are guarded by United States Marines. For only the few and proud rate.

A 'Bama spring will not pass my way again. Ahhhh, to see the Crimson Tide, and the War Eagle, tuck and roll and make for a goal, now that, I'll miss. Memories of my childhood are fading as if vapors in the wind. A passing shower reminds me of ole Dixie. Now I lay here, in this bag o' rot my corpse stacked at the tarmac edge, I'm registered and awaiting transport to my home. An H-34 blades yet turning now lay crumpled burning. I heard my mother's gentle payers comfort me and caress my now vanquished brain, For Jehovah has just called roll. Saying arise Marine thou hath thy duty unto me. I call back with. "Ay Ay sir!" and I looked about and to see our solemn ranks, then the order was given "Report!" And I being of rank I called back once more, "All present and or accounted for, sir!"

How odd, an azure sky, with monsoon in full flight. My fellow brothers yet grieve for me and others like me. 'Tis a useless endeavor, for God has interviewed me, and has fetched me up, from ol' beelzebub. Now lain delivered from that fiery hearth. For my fitness reports are now, of worth.

Hell, I sure picked a fine time to die. I was just gettin my groove on. For just two days ago the T-shirt said I was selected even with my dearth. Damn, ole Gunny was right. "Any day above ground is a good day." But he also said "Stop ya bitchin worms gotta eat same as you n me, and besides you wanna live forever?" I wonder how that sanctimonious old bastard likes them worms chewin on his ass.

This red plateau is worse than ten hells I know, but take heart
My brothers your respite is not far off. So it seems that human folly stalks its prey and in its short memory, parts its prey from a families May Day parade.

Ferocious dragon, bearing south from north commanded a Begrudged report. The N.V.A pounded the Khe Sanh without requital despite a pounding arclight that rendered the ring of purple peaks a terrific clout.

Such a thing a siege, Genghis Khan, purveyor of wholesale death.
A siege artist was he, how proud he would be of the N.V.A. Embolden by 20,000 yet to peak until 43,000 but held in check by 6,000 of the 260 and S.A.C. 77 days was the count, no more, no less, yet there is no rest. For it 'was onward, to ambush valley, Mr. Charlie had hell to pay, and well let's just say the 26th, made him pay. For it could be said of the character of Marine. "Ye though I walk through the shadow of the valley of death, I shall fear no evil for I am the baddest motherf---er in the valley. Such was their disposition."

The enemy, poor bastard that he was, it seemed as though he was damned if he did and damned if he didn't. Like scythed at harvest time, he fell grievously in that battle. Bold he may be, but foolish is more like it. Folly swarmed into his ranks as if he dashed his own brains out upon our hearty breastworks, built so stout to stand even a demon war god should one issue forth from the gates of hell.

My regret is, the sorrow my demise will visit upon my mother's brow. For my father, did take his leave of us during the last conflagration. The silence, which befalls the dead, will betide my lineage. I'm the last who will bear this moniker. There will not be another son to spring forth from these deposed loins. For this warrior stock is done with L.B.J's and McNamara's fun. For I have done what warriors do, as is their wont, and that is die. I have, in place of a Vietnamese son. Well, there you go, so much for not sending U.S. troops to fight and die in this lost war of reason, known only to L.B.J and R.S.M alone. For it pulled him to his grave as surely the one-two-two rocket blasted me to mine. For me getting dead was just a mere happenstance of some bad damned luck. But his, well his, was preordained by the natural law of what goes around comes around. May that son of a bitch rot in hell and that "Boy Genius" not yet gone. Well, I have had my say and to all my brothers here at this red veldt in hell, Semper Fi, "do or die," "all the way, and then some." Dedicated to those who served and those yet serving and whose lives are scattered like splinters.

John R. Dade
former Sergeant of Marines, Dec '81 -Jan '94

He taught me how to climb a tree, and he'd never refuse to play catch with me. Guess I, was always pestering him. He was older,
but he was my friend.

He was a quick and strong tight end, and I was so very proud of him. I'd never miss a single game, and would cheer, when they called his name.

He looked like a giant, when he came home, standing in the airport, tall and alone. He had all those ribbons on his chest, Said he was merely doing his best.

We talked a lot that first night. Said he believed that the cause was right. Said it was tough to serve in the Corps, and he understood what we were fighting for.

I was too young to understand, but could see he was now A different man. Asked about those ribbons they pinned on Him, he lowered his head, then quietly said, one was for Saving a friend.

He was so much different than before, Guess you could say, he'd been to war. He said that the war was damn near won, and he was going back to help get the job done.

We'll go to see him this afternoon. The flowers should still be in bloom. A thousand times we've said good-bye, yet every time, my dad still cries.

At last I can see your job was well done. Johnny, you're the price our family paid for freedom. Johnny was two years shy of twenty-one. Johnny is my father's son.

May 28, 2001

Written on Memorial Day, May 28, 2001. I had read a Parade magazine article written by James Webb about a father, Troy Liverman, who tended the grave of his son, John C. Liverman, a Marine who received four purple hearts in Vietnam in '68. John Liverman was assigned to 1/9 in January of '68, which meant that he was most likely at the north lines of the Khe Sanh Base during the 77-day siege. He would have been about a block away from my position, although I'm sure we never saw each other, as it was extremely risky to show yourself in the open. 1/9 saw a lot of action during the Siege and was given the nickname "The Dying Nine." John Liverman went back to Vietnam after his first two purple hearts and was assigned to 2/4. This was a legendary battalion, even by Marine Corps standards. A book was written about them and was titled The Magnificent Bastards. After reading the article a second time, it dawned on me that John Liverman and I had served three months together during the siege. Then the article grabbed me, and I began to hear the verses, "He was not yet 21, he was my father's son, he believed in getting the job done." Soon a poem began to flow.

Publisher's Comments

I hope we all have recovered from the reunion. I have just started working on the new KSV membership directory for 2001. I originally thought the 2000 edition would suffice for at least three years. As it is, we have signed up almost 600 new members since the last reunion in San Diego and have almost 500 personnel changes for members. I have the membership cards almost ready, and they should go out with this issue or shortly thereafter. I, Ernie Spencer and Jim Wodecki (our new secretary) are looking at plans for the issuance of past KSV newsletters in a series of ten to be issued in five volumes. With the printing cost of setting up 50 issues we would have to meet a certain quota to make it feasible. So we need input from the membership if there is any interest. Please drop a note, email, phone call, etc., to any one of us.

As I promised in the last edition, I am publishing the names of those members who have contributed additional funds to the organization:

I am the flag of the United States of America. I fly atop the world's tallest buildings. I stand watching America's halls of justice. I fly majestically over institutions of learning. I stand guard with power in the world. Look up at me and see me. I stand for peace, honor, truth and justice. I stand for freedom. I am confident. I am arrogant. I am proud. When I am flown with my fellow banners, my head is a little higher, My colors a little truer. I bow to no one! I am recognized all over the world. I am worshipped – I am saluted. I am loved, I am revered. I am respected, and I am feared. I have fought in every battle of every war for more than 200 years. I was flown at Valley Forge, Gettysburg, Shiloh and Appomattox. I was there at San Juan Hill, the trenches of France, in the Argonne forest, Anzio, Rome and the beaches of Normandy. Guam, Okinawa, Korea and Khe Sanh, Saigon, Vietnam know me, I was there. I led my troops, I was dirty, battle worn and tired, but my soldiers cheered me and I was proud. I have been burned, torn and trampled on the streets on countries I have helped set free. It does not hurt, for I am invincible. I have been burned, torn and trampled on the streets of my country. And when it's by those who I have served in battle, it hurts. But I shall overcome, for I am strong. I have slipped the bonds of Earth and stood watch over the uncharted frontiers of space from my vantage point on the moon. I have borne silent witness to all of America's finest hours.

Old Soldiers

On September 13th, two days after the plane attacks into the World Trade Center and Pentagon, an email appeared on our web site. A young man named Steven asked an age-old question of all of us who served at Khe Sanh... Would we serve again?

PUBLISHERS NOTE: We have no way of knowing if Steven is what he says he is, and is seriously considering military service, or is a college student writing his term paper. The answers he has provoked from our members are from the heart and express the feelings of many of our members. I feel they are worth sharing with our entire membership, and hope Steven is what he says he is and was honest and truthful in his response to their answers.

Hello, name is Steven:

My question I would like to ask to those of you who have served in the military and have engaged in combat is, "Would you do it over again?" Would you go through all that you did, or if you had the chance again if you knew what you were getting into, would you have done something differently in life so that you wouldn't have had to go through hell? I keep thinking about the men who are laying in the VA hospitals every day of their lives, who only hold memories of their past lives. I wonder if they have any regrets of serving. People are Gung-ho, but then reality sets in, life is short.

I know most of you will say that Freedom is always worth it, and it means a lot to those who cherish it but for others, it is something they see as a duty left to others to fulfill. Does it really make a difference? Do you feel of your sacrifices for your country that it made a difference? If there was a war today, right now, this minute, would you give up everything, leave your wife, your family, your home, everything that you have built over the years and place yourself in a war once more and risk losing your life? Would you volunteer for it, or would you only go if there were a draft in place?

I welcome your thoughts and opinions. I am no way trying to offend anyone of your service. Given the events that have transpired in New York, it is just some thoughts that I am having as a young person of whether this country declares war, if I should volunteer for it. People see TV that glorifies war, but I see the reality of the hurt, pain, problems, tears, and fears that remain for years. I need to know if it is worth it. I just need to know how all of you feel. This has been my thought today.

Here is an edited version of the original answers to the question asked and responses.

"War is an ugly thing, but not the ugliest of things. The decayed and degraded state of moral and patriotic feeling which thinks that nothing is worth war is much worse."

"Simply, we made a decision to volunteer based upon the events, circumstances and my patriotic beliefs back then. We can't turn back time and remake those decisions. We must live with those decisions the rest of our lives with the outcome of those decisions."

Nick Romanetz

"Yes, after more then 33 years of very deep lost feelings and pain of what we went through, I would still have to go back. Freedom is something we all need to fight for. Even if it's at the gates of hell."

Hank Melanson

❋

"Like all the others, I think that I would go, remember the very essence of America is at stake here. In Vietnam we were helping those of another country, as there was no direct threat to the US. So it was a much different situation. We did not have the support of our own people then."

Gene Weresow

"Steven, To answer your questions more specifically, I'd serve today, not out of duty to my country (we don't have our backs to the wall as we did at the beginning of World War II), but out of respect for my family and friends. Good luck to you in your life. I don't have any idea where this conflict is headed, but it's going to need competent, dedicated Americans — like you"

❋

"The people whose very freedoms are being attacked here at home. Yes, I would join today if it meant I could keep the enemy away from my family's front door."

Ray "Big D" Addington

"My son is 21 years old and the thought of him going to war is more than I can bear. While I prepared to sacrifice myself, sending him off is worse than death to me. I think that most of the Marines that read this board will somewhat agree with me that they would gladly give of themselves but not their children."

Don Meyer

"Yes, I would absolutely do it again! So follow your heart and do what you think is best. Semper Fi"

Wayne "Shu" Shumaker

"I was not a draftee. I watched the news. I can think of no greater moment in my life than leading a squad of Marines in battle. The only thing I would want to change is the good men I lost. Not only would I go, if I could, but I would hope my children would go."

Charlie Fox

"I was ready for combat before the WAR...I was a MARINE before birth...YES, I WOULD DO IT AGAIN...Semper Fi!"

Joe Amodeo

"If they could find boots big enough to fit these ugly feet of mine, I'd be marching on Mecca right now. Why do we always see photos of terrorists shooting up into the air, are they afraid something is overhead? You better believe there is, the Eagle, Anchor and Globe. When the Eagle ####s he really ####s! Hell, forget the boots, I'll wear my shower-shoes."

Bruce Lewey

"When it's in your heart, you just go as most of us went — to fight for Our Country and to stop communism, we went with pride and most of us would go again (especially if we could all be 18 again)."

James "Jimbo" Wodecki

"Steven, you have asked for advice and opinions from the gray-haired veterans of the battle of Khe Sanh. In considering a decision on whether or not to enlist you want to know, would we do it over again? It is a good question and an old one. Listen to the Bard of Avon. "To be or not to be. That is the question. Whether it is nobler in the mind to suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, or by taking up arms, end them." That was a question asked by Shakespeare in the fifteenth century, and you have enough doubts about your country today to wonder if it knows the right answer. My son, I have doubts too.

The voices that the nation listens to have declared that we are unified in our resolve. I fear that the resolve will be short lived. The country is united by a fever of patriotism but cooler heads will soon prevail. It has become the nature of things in our confused culture to question our national values. Soon we will be asked to look at ourselves and the terrorists as victims of a common evil. That will be the first healing step in the stumbling plod back to the politically correct attitude of self-recrimination. We are conditioned to believe it. We love to be victims. We cry war, but half the nation is waiting for more rational minds to direct us. An eager element of our society is prepared to declare that we brought this upon ourselves. They will remind us that "it takes a village" and in the interests of our world community we must negotiate with understanding and an appreciation for other cultures. Our economy and world peace depend on it.

It doesn't matter that the terrorists have slapped America. Our national conscience, which resides in Berkley, California, will tell us that we have made the world hate us because we unilaterally support oppression of ethnic peoples. If we resist change, we deserve more of the same. That irrational logic is not new. Neville Chamberlain believed he had negotiated peace with Hitler. In our time we have seen a revival of sympathy for the devil. Ho Chi Minh City is named after the most odious terrorist of the last half of this century. Will Kabul be renamed Bin Laden? So what will become of our national resolve? It will be guided by television, the same as it was before. The media will fuel the current fever only until the time when it becomes more lucrative, more newsworthy, to oppose it. This will happen when the military denies correspondents access to mission critical information, ergo no news. As before, the talking heads will have to create attention to keep their ratings up, something with shock value. They will focus their cameras on the fluttering white tags tied to the body bags of Americans. When they think it is profitable, they will fawn on the enemy. Who the enemy is will become blurred and then they will release the politically correct winds and the winds will blow anti-American. They will write books about their unbiased coverage of the war to prove that they were right. Past is prologue.

My son, can you handle the truth?

We were the sons of the greatest generation, and we walked a path that we couldn't follow, and we were handed a torch that we couldn't carry. Our frustrations made us bitter and truculent. I call my generation, Oedipus Americanus. I leave that obscure reference to you to think about on your own time. It is appropriate if you enlist you are an American Fighting Man. No hyphens, nothing comes before American, American comes first, as in American eagle. If you enlist in the Army, Navy, or Air Force you will find that those who would not serve have defiled them. They are now a kinder, gentler military that does not threaten Oedipus Americanus. There is however one dinosaur lurking in the arsenal, with vengeful eyes.

I know those eyes. Those were my eyes when I was a Marine. Those are the eyes of my brothers who still return to help the villagers in Vietnam. We were men who were deployed in twelve-man units to rid our territories of communists and to protect and hold our villages. We stayed there until we were told to leave by the more enlightened. The enlightened that had the courage to stay home. All we dumb grunts knew was the meaning of — it takes a village. It is a Marine rifle squad. To answer your question, would I go again? Absolutely, I would go now if they would have me. Through the last thirty years I have never forsaken honor, and I have never bowed my head. Never. I say my prayers with my eyes wide open, looking straight at our God. Buddhist, Hindu, Muslim, Protestant, Animist, Catholic, Jewish. I am my brother's keeper. Now my son, you have to answer your own questions. You have no choice in who your contemporaries are, but who do you want your peers to be?

Best of Luck,
Lacey Lahren

Edited version of Steven's reply to the responses from our Khe Sanh Veterans.

I am the only member of my family that has not served my country. There is huge guilt on my behalf — a guilt that I haven't earned the right to live here, despite the sacrifices given before. The way I see it is that my previous family members earned their right to this country, but I haven't. My father earned his right by serving as a Marine in Vietnam. I also sought his experience and thoughts as I asked for yours as well.

When I told my father of what I wanted to do, I was discouraged in all aspects. He said to me, "You will get yourself killed." He told me he was lucky to have not got killed. In his voice, I could tell he was upset with me. He spent his time discouraging me during my entire conversation. He said for me to go down to the VA hospital and talk to the guys with their legs and arms blown off, that can't get out of bed, who missed their children growing up, and growing old together with their wife. He told me to look at his life, the years of alcoholism trying to forget, and his condition of being contaminated with Agent Orange. I told him that I have something to prove and to do. He said, "What is that? To prove to me you know how to get killed? That you can have a flag over your casket and be buried six feet under?" That left me with a lot to think about. I then told my girlfriend who I plan to marry next year of what I wanted to do, and she also said, "You will get killed," and left her crying for a week. She saw all of her dreams with me gone. I was torn. That is why I asked many of you if you were willing to give up your life, to give your wife, your children, everything, to go serve your country, and all of your dreams. I asked, "Is it worth it?"

The weekend passed, and I called and talked to my father again. He is my best friend in all ways, and we needed to talk. I approached him again about it. He said he wanted to talk as well, and we did. He said, "I discouraged you that day, because I wanted you to think." He has always wanted me to think before doing something, rather than acting on impulse. He then answered my question that I asked of so many of you. Would he do it again? He said yes, he would go back. But like one person posted, he would go back as well but brings tears and pain to think of sending his children. He said to me that he would go back before I would ever go. Although I know the government wouldn't allow that, it is in his mind that he will. I can understand where he is coming from as a father. Ever since I was young, he always told me he would go and die for me, so that I wouldn't have to experience what he went through. It was something he never wanted me to know. It is only natural for him as a parent and loving father to feel this way, and for that, he has my admiration and respect.

So at this time, I will continue with life, but I told them both, if I was needed, if I was called, if the Country asks one day, then I was to go, as it is my duty. I will answer as previous members of my family did. The responses that all provided confirmed that at least if I am needed, then I need to answer that, as you have done. Again, thank you for so much input and thought. I hope that none of you think less of me of this decision but at this time, it is the best one till another one must be made.

Thank you, Steven

I was M/T Chief for H&S CO, 2nd BN 26th Marines, from January 1968 to January1969. I was wounded at Khe Sanh, Feb 23rd, 1968. I have "Good and Bad memories" of Khe Sanh. However, there will never be a "Better group of Marines" in my life than those Corpsman, Chaplains, and Marines that stood "Side by Side" at Khe Sanh in 1968.

Welcome Home Brothers, great Website. I was with C Company, 1/11 Inf. 5th. Inf. Div. out of Quang-Tri. Pick a spot in I Corps and we were there. I have just started making contact with my Brothers in the last year, and it feels great. Thank you for all you have done. I am the National Sgt. At Arms for Combat Veterans International. You can check out our web site at: combatveterans.com.

Take care, My Brothers...
Brian "Bent" Bentley,

I would like you to add some of our KIA to your list. Lost a few good ones from the 1st Platoon of C CO, 1/11 at XD696394, north of QL-9, at the Laotian border on 8 Feb 71: SSGT Gerald J. Tworek, SGT Donald R. Coleman, and PFC Michael B. First. We were OPCON to Sheldon Burnett's 1/1 Cav at the time. Lost Jerry L. Danay from 3rd Platoon of Charlie Company 1/11 on 12 Mar 71, at XD750489, near FSB Alpine, N/W of Khe Sanh. I see you already have Burnett and Randy Ard as MIA's in Laos. We left Khe Sanh for the Laotian border in early February with several reporters. If I remember correctly, Burrows, Huet, Potter and Shimamato were with us. Last I saw of them then was on QL-9 west of Lang Vei. I remember when they went down in Laos a little more than a week later. I would like to hear from the grunts in Charlie Company.

I served as senior corpsman for I Co 3/4, 1968-69. We were in and out of Khe Sanh and many of the surrounding hill battles — 689, 552, 600, Phoui Noui, and Fox-Trot Ridge — right after the Siege in 1968. A Shau Valley, Con Thien, C-2, Cam Lo, Gio Lin, and Alfa 3. I sure would like to hear from some of the old unit. Some of the names that I do remember, Capt. Sexton, Gysgt. Basham, Cpl. Hopkins, Cpl. Bryson, Cpl. Golden, Doc Lea, Doc Fair, Sgt. Jarworski, SSgt. Holley, preacher, and Dirty Frank. Welcome home to all of you. I served with the best of the best.

Bill Wilke "Doc"

Looking for anybody from M CO 3/9, 1966-1967. Welcome home to all my Brothers and Sisters, who served our country. Keep looking up; someone up there does care for us. God Bless everyone one of you.

Ray P. Holden: RPHOLDEN@AOL.COM

I served in Vietnam with Kilo Company 3rd Battalion 26th Marine Regiment as an 0311 infantryman, from January 1967 to January 1968. While in Vietnam I served at several places, such as Khe Sanh on Hill 861 and Con Thien. We stayed a while at Dong Ha and visited Hill 56, Phu Bai, Da Nang and the hills close to Laos. I would like to hear from anyone that might have been there during this time.

Gentlemen, I just recently received word from a Khe Sanh veteran of D CO I/26 that my cousin, 2Lt. Samuel J. Hannah served at Khe Sanh. Lt. Hannah was KIA June 7, 1968 at My Loc (2). I am very pleased to see such a fine website dedicated to the veterans of the terrible Siege at Khe Sanh. May we never forget? Thank you for your service to our country.

I served with D Co 1/26 3rd Platoon and was in country from 11/67 to 12/68. I was at Khe Sanh during the Siege. Not many made it without being wounded. I was luckier than most. God bless America.

What Other People Say

On August 31, 2001, a large granite memorial with bronze emblem was placed at Ft. Snelling National Cemetery, Minneapolis-St. Paul, to commemorate the 5th Marine Division and honor all the Marines and Navy Corpsmen that stood in its ranks. This stone was the final in a series honoring all 6 Marine Divisions. Many attended this dedication including former Marines from numerous veterans' groups, the local Marine I&I staff, a nearby reunion of Marine tankers and the VFW cemetery honor guard. A Marine officer read aloud the battle history of the 5th Marine Division from the famous assault and flag raising on Iwo Jima to the deployment and actions of the 13th, 26th and 27th Marines throughout I Corps, Vietnam. He described at length the 26th Marines' successful defense of Khe Sanh and it was good to see many in the crowd, veterans of other wars, other campaigns, nod in approval. All in all, a fine ceremony. Several sections away, in a far corner of Ft. Snelling rests my good friend Jim Theis, also a veteran of the 26th Marines. I do believe that his spirit and others unnamed stood tall that day as honors were rendered to the 5th Marine Division.

British Vet, Vietnam Vet, WTC Vet (Hero)

After a lifetime in which he cheated it many times, death caught up with Rick Rescorla halfway up the south tower of the World Trade Center. But like a good soldier, he didn't sell his life cheaply. Death took him only after he had cheated it again, helping to save 2,700 lives by relying on the instincts and the preparation that had served him well in battles on two continents. Rescorla was a retired Army Reserve colonel and the head of security for Morgan Stanley's Individual Investor Group at the World Trade Center. But many readers will be more familiar with him as Lt. Rick "Hard Core" Rescorla, one of the heroes of the 1965 battle of the Ia Drang Valley in Vietnam. "Rick was the best combat leader I ever saw in Vietnam," said Pat Payne, the 2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry Regiment's reconnaissance platoon leader in Ia Drang.

Rescorla's role in that battle is recounted in detail in the book "We Were Soldiers Once...And Young," a searing account of the action by retired Lt.Gen. Harold "Hal" Moore and Joe Galloway. In 1965, Moore was a battalion commander in the center of the battle, and Galloway was a UPI reporter who covered the entire engagement. Even those only vaguely familiar with the book have seen Rescorla's image (he is the gaunt soldier on the cover with the 2-day old beard and the bayonet fixed to his M16.)

When Rescorla showed up for Basic Training at Benning in 1963, he'd already seen more adventure than most soldiers do in a lifetime. Born in Cornwall, England, he joined the British army's Paratroop Regiment as a teenager, then became a military intelligence warrant officer. He served in that position in Cyprus during the violence that racked that island in the 1950s; then, left the British Army for a London police job in Scotland Yard's famous "Flying Squad" of detectives.

He left England for another military job, this time as a commando in the Rhodesian Colonial security force in Africa. From there he came to seek his fortune in the United States. After breezing through basic training, Rescorla was picked up for Officer Candidate School. Last year, he was inducted into the OCS Hall of Fame. He graduated as a second lieutenant in 1965, just in time to ship out to Vietnam with the 1st Air Cavalry Division. In November of that year, still a British citizen, he would draw on all his youthful experience in the battle of the Ia Drang. Heading the "Hard Corps," Ia Drang was the Army's first major battle in Vietnam, and one of its bloodiest. The battle claimed 305 American lives, soldiers who died in fierce combat with a North Vietnamese regiment that also took heavy losses. Rescorla commanded 1st Platoon, B Company, 2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry Regiment, and was almost worshipped by his soldiers, who called themselves the "Hard Corps" after his nickname. But his courage and infectious optimism resonated beyond those under his immediate command. Payne remembers Rescorla "leaping off [a] chopper and strutting into our small, very beat-up group of survivors" during the night. After placing his men to fill the gaps in Payne's line and pausing to speak quietly to each soldier, he walked toward Payne. "I was so amazed to see him walking around because we had all been crawling on our stomachs for eight hours," Payne said. Speaking in a low, confident voice, Rescorla complimented Payne on establishing good fields of fire. "Then he looked me in the eye and said, 'When the sun comes up we are going to kick some ass!'"

I will never forget his words or the look in his eye. He said it in a confident, matter-of-fact way. He was not boasting — it was resolve. Rescorla earned a Silver Star for his actions at Ia Drang and, in Moore's words, "went on to establish himself as a living legend in the 7th Cav in Vietnam." But behind the swagger and the self-confidence, Rescorla hid a keen intellect, according to Dan Hill, a former captain who met Rescorla at basic and remained his best friend. This fine mind served Rescorla well when he left the Army in the late 1960s and put himself through college and law school, before going on to establish himself as a specialist in security for financial firms. His will to live came to the fore again three years ago, when he was diagnosed with inoperable cancer and given six months to live. Against the odds, he beat the disease into remission. As Morgan Stanley's security chief, Rescorla brought his belief in the "seven Ps" to bear — proper prior planning and preparation prevents poor performance — to the immense good fortune of his co-workers. Morgan Stanley was the largest tenant in the south tower, with about 2,700 employees in 20 floors. But incredibly, only six, including Rescorla and two security folks who worked for him, are still missing. Everyone else made it out alive.

Obsessed with preparation, those survivors owe their lives in no small part to Rescorla's quick thinking at a time of crisis, and his obsession with being prepared for every eventuality. "He'd take every possible contingency that could happen, and he'd come up with a plan for it," Hill said. When the first plane hit the north tower, the Port Authority told workers in the south tower to stay put. But Rescorla disagreed and immediately executed an evacuation plan he had made the employees rehearse twice a year. The plan worked, and when the second plane hit the south tower, almost all Morgan Stanley employees were on their way to safety. So was Rescorla, who made it to the ground floor singing "God Bless America" to calm the nerves of the evacuees. But he insisted on going back upstairs to check for anyone left behind. He was probably still climbing when the building collapsed. His wife Susan and his two children likely will remember Rick Rescorla for his generosity of spirit and his dry English wit. But middle-aged veterans of a hellish battle long ago in the sun and the elephant grass are more likely to remember Rick Rescorla as Bill Lund, another second lieutenant in that battle, does: "This was the bravest man I ever knew."

There was a Wild Colonial Boy
Rescorla was his name
He was born and raised in Hayle, Cornwall
Just east of ol' Land's End
He joined the British Army when
A lad of just 16
Became a brave, young soldier then
As good as ever seen
He joined the U.S. Cavalry
To fight in Vietnam
And he killed the Cong at the Ia Drang
With bayonet and gun
He saved three thousand people when
The terrorists struck home
But lost his life when he went back
To rescue seven more
So lift a cup to our dear friend
Remember him with joy
How dearly do his brethren love
That Wild Colonial Boy

Above and Beyond the Call

A Story of Caring

PUBLISHER'S NOTE:

When Chaplain Ray Stubbe founded the Khe Sanh Veterans, he had several goals in mind. One of the goals of the organization was reaching out to the loved ones of those who died, so that they may better understand the nature of service and sacrifice at Khe Sanh. The following story told through a series of emails between men of D CO 1/26 exemplifies their caring and personal sacrifice in bringing closure to the family of one of their own, in keeping with the goals of this organization.

At the reunion in Chicago in July of this year, George Myrick, Dan McGravey, and Jack Daniels, former members of D CO 1/26 had a conversation regarding the death of Lt. Sam Hannah, also a member of Delta CO 1/26. George Myrick had made a promise 33 years ago that he would visit the family of Sam Hannah and at the reunion, he made the decision to fulfill that promise made long ago. While driving back home from the reunion, he made arrangements to visit with Sam's family.

George finally met the whole family and thought the meeting went well and felt great about fulfilling his 33-year-old promise. He sent the following email to Dan McGravey regarding his visit:

> Dan, I made contact with Sam Hannah's family on the 20th of August, and Joann and I visited them. Sam's Father and Mother live in Lincoln, Arkansas. Sam's little sister lives across the road from his parents, and she made a wonderful dinner that evening. The people present were: Mary, Sam's sister, and her husband Bryan, and two grandchildren; Alan, Sam's brother, his wife Lisa, and baby, Sam Hannah; Sam's son and wife and Sam's two grandchildren. They all had lots of questions that night and I tried to answer them the best I could. It was quite a night for them and me, and it only took 33 years to do it. Sam's wife is remarried and lives in Indiana. She still keeps in contact with Sam's family. Sam also has two other sisters, one in Tennessee and one in Georgia.
> Jack Daniels is going to fly into Tulsa, Oklahoma around the 14th of October, and I am going to pick him up and take him to see Sam's family. I think the whole family will be there. It would be nice to also have you along. I could have used your help last time I was there. The family knows nothing except Sam is dead. They think he was killed at Khe Sanh; I had to do a lot of remembering that night. If you want to see the Hannah family, I will take you. In fact, anytime you and Sherry want to head west, you have a place to light here as long as you want. Dan, we went through a lot of shit together, and you are one hell of a man.

> George Myrick

Dan McGravey then receives an email from Ed Esslinger, a cousin of Sam Hannah and KSV. He also sought the true circumstances on the death of Sam, since George Myrick, during his visit, had related information which differed from that given the family by the USMC. When George hears that Sam Hannah's family is disturbed by the differing versions, he is upset and sends the following email to Dan McGravey:

> Dan,
> I'm sorry to hear that Sam's family is disturbed. I did not go there to upset them. I guess my biggest mistake was, I did not know what they had been told, and they never said anything about me saying anything different than what they knew, and I never asked. His sister Mary Freeman did give me the impression that the family thought Sam was KIA at Khe Sanh. I told them that Sam and I were at Khe Sanh in the beginning and were Sparrow Hawked to Hill 861 where we stayed till the Siege was over. At that time, we left the firebase for Wonder Beach, where we patrolled one hot spot after the other. We were in the area of Hill 55, southwest of Danang, near the village of My Loc. I had 1st platoon, you the 2nd and Sam the 3rd. I started moving into the village and two Army gun ships started making strafing runs at my platoon. They made two runs before they were called off. We moved into the village. Sam was on a ridge to my left flank and you were on Sam's left flank. The NVA started for the village that I was in, and Jack Daniels fired the 60s over my head — the first round was a short round landing in the center of a squad from B Co. that had come to reinforce my platoon, wounding all of them.

That evening I was pulled up on the ridge with 2nd & 3rd platoons. That was when I was told that Sam and a Corpsman were killed. I never told them about the gunship or the 60s — that is to refresh your memory. I was asked several times if I was there when Sam was killed, and I said no, I was down in the village and Sam was gone when I got to the ridge, he had been Med Evaced. Mary asked me two or three times why was only Sam killed. I told her that when Sam was hit, the others got down. She said with all those people there, why was Sam the only one to get killed. I told her that the others were spread out and not in a bunch. The men from 3rd platoon knew that Sam and I were friends. Just as soon as I got to the ridge, they told me Sam was dead and showed me where he was killed. They said he was hit in the head. Sam's Dad said he opened the casket and Sam was hit in the head and kidneys. I told him that the head wound was all I knew about. The men at 3rd platoon also said that Sam died quick. Now that I think about it, while I was standing looking down at the pool of blood, Jack Daniels came up to me and we talked. If I am not mistaken, Jack said Sam died instantly. Dan, I need your help. This is the way I remember that day. Am I wrong? I need to know. Sam's family said the officers who notified them, Jack Daniels' letter, and myself were the only contacts they have had regarding the death of Sam. They made several comments about some books they have, one of which concerns Khe Sanh. Sam's Dad said he still has Jack's letter, but he never offered to let me read it, and I never asked. I wished they had told me that my recollection was different than what they had been told. Yes, Jack Daniels will get into Tulsa, Oklahoma on Oct. 14 at 1800 and was to fly out at 1200 on the 15th. I ask him to try to stay longer. He was going to try to change his departure to 1200 on the 16th. I have not heard if he got it changed or not. Dan, think about that day and let me know back as soon as you can. Am I wrong? Got to know!

George Myrick

Dan McGravey, knowing how badly he feels, sends him the following email:

George,

First thing is in no way what you did or say was wrong. The fact that you cared enough and completed a promise made years ago was an act of love and caring bestowed upon Sam's family. Of course, the family cannot put this to rest because of their suspicions. They are confused because of what the Marine Corps told them at the time. I cannot understand, if Jack Daniels wrote Sam's father a letter (which he told me he did) and Sam's father remembers the letter, why would they believe Sam was KIA in Khe Sanh? Also, a letter as life changing as that should be in Hannah's Family possessions, right? Their suspicion and confusion is justified because everything I have read about death, people want to know, "How did they die?" If it doesn't coincide with that "official information" from the government, flags go up! As for my part in this, I am going to search my brain as well as letters I wrote home to my family for information, I spent a lot of time writing, so I kind of have a semi-journal, but it's in New England with my parents. I'll get them sent. Secondly, I think I can get on the internet with Fish because he has unbelievable information that may help. If we could ever find and contact Sam's radio operator or Squad leader, it would open up the sequence of events as they unfolded.

Looks like we now have a mission to unburden this grieving family from any confusion. My recollections are limited, but I do remember all the events you relayed to me and they are accurate. I even remember the position we took that evening, and moving out the next AM, and making new contact after only a few hundred meters. Things were happening so rapidly and the events of that day kind of melted into weeks and months of just total blur and haze. You know a day doesn't go by without my thoughts going back to my other warrior life, and I know you are in the same boat. We need to live in the moment and be comfortable with ourselves that what you did for his family was good, right and an act of kindness, after all you told me you lived with not making contact with the Hannah's for over 30 years...That speaks loudly to your character and human qualities.

The Hannahs have a difficult situation, and quite honestly I don't know if even an eyewitness to the tragedy can change what they perceive really happened! I'm not yet in a position to see whether I can make it out in Oct. or if I'm really needed, I will have to think on it. Thanks for the update on the story. I will contact Sam's sister this week.

Semper Fi
Dan McGravey

Mary Freeman, Sam Hannah's sister, then emails the first of two letters to Dan McGravey:

Mr. McGravey,

I am Sam Hannah's sister. Edward forwarded your response to his letter to my parents, Sam and Nell Hannah. Yes, George Myrick contacted our family and took time to come and visit with us. It was a very considerate thing to do. We were all very surprised and a little confused. It was very disturbing to us to hear that his account of Sam's death was not the same as we had been led to believe. I was wondering what your remembrance might be. I know it is not a pleasant subject, but it might be of benefit to my parents, especially my dad. He is retired Air Force, and it disturbs him that the stories are apparently very different. He's 80 this year and to be honest we do not talk about these things much. It may be some parent's way of dealing with grief but not theirs. So, if they want to talk about it now — well, it better get talked out because there isn't that much time left.

Thank You.

Mary Hannah Freeman

Dan Then replies to Mary Freeman with the following email:

Received your email today. This issue surrounding Sam's passing bothers me too — absolutely Sam was not killed at Khe Sanh. I was with Sam for a long period of time after Khe Sanh fighting down south (Danang Area). After 33 years or so, the details get fuzzy but not a day goes by that I do not think of my time in Vietnam. I received a note from George Myrick concerning his recollection of the events that transpired that day. I told George I would start searching my sources to get more detail that I can share with your family. I kept somewhat of a journal (letters sent home to my family.) I have called my mom to have them sent to me. From those, I may be able to refresh my memory. Those days in that area were pretty hellish. I do know my 2nd platoon was to the left of Sam about 400 meters away. All of us were under heavy fire. As you can imagine, chaos prevailed.

We have a tremendous amount of information that men from Delta Co have maintained and preserved — now we need to find out the details. Today I sent emails to key people that will join me in the search. Sam was one of us and if you and your family are not at peace, then we all need to help you get there.

We hear so much about "closure" with regards to death but let me tell you, I have no closure with any of the Marines lost with me in my time there. I can still see Sam's face as I type this email to you. I put Vietnam behind me for 20 plus years until I was contacted via internet by the Khe Sanh Veterans group. They have helped in my healing, and now I hope we can give you the details that your father and mother especially need. I will try my best to help. Talk to you soon. Is it possible for you to share with us the exact correspondence (Marine Corps or Dept. of Defense) sent your family? Also if Sam's dad has any names of Marines that Sam may have written home about, we can see who was with Sam that day. Marine records are probably unavailable. Thanks.

Dan MGravey

Mary Freeman's response:

I have spoken to Dad about the description of how Sammy died. He doesn't know exactly where he got some of his information. (This has been buried for 33 years.) However, he thought 8 men were killed at the same time as Sam. But George said Sam was the only one killed besides the medic. I know this isn't much of a discrepancy, but it bothered Dad. He also didn't really understand why Sam would have gotten the Silver Star from the description of the circumstances surrounding the way Sam died. He, being a military man, would understand that better than I. So, it isn't really a huge difference because a lot of what George told us, we just hadn't heard at all. It's old wounds opened after 33 years and with that comes questions. Thank you for your time and efforts. I apologize for not answering you right away. I have to approach Mom and Dad gently, and I really just got the nerve up to tell them that I had contacted you. They are old and very active for their age, but fragile in many ways. I sometimes think there is a reason for this to be opened up after all these years, but I also just want to protect them from the pain. I will keep in contact with you and let you know when I receive your information. Sam's widow, Ruby, will be in from Indiana this week. I will ask her if she can tell us what she remembers about the incidents around Sam's death. Also, Major Daniels (ret) and George will be here on the 15th. Again, I thank you and appreciate your time and effort in helping us with this.

Always,
Mary Hannah Freeman

Dan McGravey then seeks the help of Jack Daniels, the former Commanding Officer of D CO 1/26, and sends the following email to bring him up to speed on their quest for the true story of the death of Sam Hannah.

Hi Jack, It was great to see you in Chicago for our reunion. I know you mentioned that you were planning a visit to Sam's parents and family some time soon. This email has to do with that visit. Some background first, I received an unsolicited email from Sam's cousin Ed Essingler about two weeks ago. He had heard that I had served with Sam up until the time of his passing. He probably got my name from George Myrick during his visit last month with Sam's Father, Mother and other family members. He wanted to know more about the men who served with Sam and the circumstances surrounding his passing. I emailed him back and said I would be happy to help. I sent him to the appropriate web sites (Khe Sanh Vets, Delta Company etc.) and said I would do whatever I could to give any information I had. Approximately a week later I receive a new email from a Mary Freeman that identified herself as Sam's sister. I will forward her letter on to you for more background. She clearly is suspicious and confused because of conflicting information received from probably the Marine Corps, maybe a letter that you may have sent, and George Myricks visit.

Sam's father and mother are obviously pushing for the truth. I never thought that we were dealing with anything but truth. Something has gotten into their heads about his passing that has raised concerns. I want to also send you Myrick's letter to me and my response to him. George has, from his letter to me, expressed a real hurt. He feels badly and feels he has done something wrong. I wrote back to him and tried to affirm what he did was correct. All this background stuff is meant to prepare you for what you may run into at your visit. I told Mary Freeman I would get onto the internet to see if we can find more eyewitness accounts of what happened that day over 30 years ago. Obviously, the driving force behind this is Sam's mom and dad wanting to hear what happened. Please let me know what your assessment of the situation is. I would consider joining you if my business plans and your scheduled visit can come together; that is, of course, if you feel I could be of any comfort and support for the family. I hope we are not overreacting to this issue but in reading her correspondence, she clearly has doubts. I have no doubts of what happened in this tragic day over 30 years ago, but I am not in the Hannah family shoes. Please give me you feelings and comments.

Jack Daniels responds to Dan McGravey:

Dan, thanks for all the information. I will try to clear this all up, so that we can all have the same information to share. You are certainly welcome to travel with George and I, if you can. We will help their family come to grips with the absolute truth and clear up any mysteries that may have been incorrectly communicated many years ago.

Sam was killed southwest of Hill 55 on a ridgeline that we had moved down a few days earlier without any contact. We were on search and destroy missions, searching for elements of two NVA divisions who had come out of the triple canopy and planned to hit the Danang Airfield. 1/26 minus Bravo Company, was sweeping terrain between Hill 55 and An Hoa. This was a few days after Clarence Toltino had been hit, and George Myrick had 1st Platoon. We stopped the night before and received helo resupply and I ordered the same formations to move over the same ground that we had been across a few days earlier. Therefore 3d Platoon was on the point of a wedge formation moving up a ridge, with second platoon on the left and first platoon on the right. The company Command Post was behind 3d Platoon, and all units were physically tied together. We were moving up the ridgeline about a mile from our overnight position, when the point came under heavy fire. Sam's lead squad had gotten inside an enemy position before the enemy realized they were there. Sam and his radio operator were right behind the lead squad and when the NVA began firing from their holes, Sam and his radio operator were the first casualties, both KIA by a full automatic weapon. I put our weapons into action but when our 60 mortars fired a short round, I pulled them out of the fight and we suffered no friendly fire casualties.

We soon had artillery and air support on target. I requested that Alpha Company move through Charlie Company to seal off the NVA who were fleeing the position. Jeff Stack got hit and Alpha had no officers in the field for a short period that day, as Ray Snyder was on R&R. We had Charlie Co on our immediate right, Alpha on their right on the high ground, and the enemy trapped between us. 2nd Platoon assaulted through the tree line and relieved the pressure on 3d Platoon. The rest of the day we called in artillery and air strikes. We had suffered several casualties, I remember specifically. Other than Sam, Cpl. Harold Deschaine, and HN Rockefeller were KIA. Another radio operator, L/Cpl Scott was hit and Med Evaced. Later, after I became the S-3, Dan took over Delta Co, and Freddie Mac and I were heloed to Hill 55, where the 7th Marines had more than 30 weapons, including .50 cal machine guns and RPG captured by Delta and Alpha companies on that day.

Sam received a Silver Star posthumously, and Dan, I recommended you for a Silver Star that I believe was awarded as a Bronze Star, for your actions in relieving the pressure on 3d Platoon that day. If you didn't receive it, let me know, and I will reinitiate the paper work, because you did a very gutsy thing in assaulting through the area where 3d platoon was in deep distress with a number of casualties down. You called me on the radio, and asked permission to make the assault, and while I was talking to battalion on the other net, you decided that there wasn't time to wait for coordination and you moved out on your own. I had to shut down an 81mm mortar mission to the left of 3rd Platoon, as you moved right through that area to get into position in front of 3rd Platoon so that we could get to our casualties. You saw the need for action, and you took it. What guts, I am still proud of you and remember the moment 33 years later! I remember writing sitreps and thinking that Delta had inflicted great harm against the enemy, but what a terrible price we paid in the loss of our brother Marines and Corpsmen. Sam's family should know that the NVA unit he attacked was totally defeated in their efforts to move heavy weapons into the flight path of Danang and that his bravery saved many lives by not allowing the enemy to reach a place where they could wreak havoc on other US units. He did not die in vain. Just as the firemen and police of New York City who died recently, he gave his life for the good of others, when none of us can know why some must die and others in the same situation are spared. I hope this info will help us to allow Sam's family to gain closure. Both of you guys, Dan and George, are caring and compassionate people who still care for a guy who made us better for having known him and served with him in a place that was hell on earth. I believe this to be truthful and if I have any details out of sync don't hesitate to let me know. I remember these events very well, because you guys were willing to give your lives, and we were a team that worked together and I remember, because you did as I asked of you.

Dan McGravey's final letter to Ernie Spencer regarding the visit with the family of Sam Hannah by Jack Daniels and George Myrick.

This family meeting was held this past Monday in Lincoln, Arkansas with George driving in from Oklahoma and Jack flying in from his home in Williamsburg, Virginia. This expression of caring is "above and beyond the call" in my opinion. I talked to George last night to see how it went and thanks be to God, it was great. I've asked George to write the Khe Sanh Veterans about those present and the discussion, so you can get a sense of how healing this meeting must have been. I think you may also want to contact Jack Daniels for other details. These two guys are Marine Class in my opinion. The emails that I'm sending along to you can be shared at your discretion...both George and I have no restrictions.

In a final email to the Khe Sanh Veterans concerning the visit of Jack Daniels and George Myrick to the Hannah family, Jack Daniels writes:

Dan, thanks for the note. George and I had a day that was important to the two of us as well as the family for a number of reasons. First, we met a family that was just outstanding. No wonder Sam Hannah was a good Marine — he came from a great background. Secondly, they received a lot of information that helped them understand what happened and what we were trying to accomplish. Thirdly, they were warm and receptive to George and me. I learned that based upon official communications, information received by the family is often sketchy and they naturally conjure up different scenarios that may be far from the truth. George had a 1:250,000 map, and we were able to trace the locations of the battalion during the 7 months that Sam was in country. We also told them of the search and destroy mission we had, and the weapons and commanders notebook that we captured that indicated the NVA we met on 7 June were headed to the Danang Airfield. So we were able to explain to them that Sam's platoon was inside the NVA position and that he was heroic in leading his platoon in close hand-to-hand fighting.

The day was important to us, because we could pay tribute to a fallen comrade these many years later. My wife met a young woman at a meeting while George and I were at the Hannah's, whose father in 1st MAR DIV had been killed about the same time, and she remarked how little information her family had, so that underscored the importance of our being able to share with the Hannah family. No problem sharing this with Ernie Spencer. Hope to see you in Dallas next summer, thanks for your help and communication on the Hannah visit.

A Birthday Message from the Commandant of the Marine Corps

As we commemorate the 226th anniversary of the founding of our Corps, Marines everywhere can take pride in their contributions to our great nation. We are a Corps born of an act of Congress, consecrated in sacrifice, steeped in tradition, and tested in battle. Our earned legacy is filled with the names of many great Marines — Lejeune, Vandegrift, Puller...Butler, Bestwick, Daly — who fill the annals of our lineage with their inspired acts of vision and gallantry. Heroic actions on the battlefield are a hallmark of our legacy. Equally compelling are the countless heroic deeds of many other Marines who exemplify the virtue of placing the needs of others above their own. Whether it be a Marine saving an Okinawan child from drowning, or pulling people from a burning wreck, or a family extending itself to provide a safe, nurturing home for disadvantaged children, our lives are indeed full of heroism. Today, we celebrate these deeds, not as exploits, but as contributions to the greater good — circumstances where Marines take care of not just their own, but reach out to care for others.

A lone Marine standing vigil on a dark night in Kosovo; a Marine Reservist serving as a firefighter or police officer who responds to an emergency in his community; a civilian Marine working alongside his counterparts in uniform who shares the perils and realities of a terrorist attack; and a committed spouse who finds the time to serve as an advocate for family programs in addition to making a home and supporting the family — all are among the heroes of all generations. We are indebted to them for their example of strength and their presence of character. They embrace our core values and live them to the fullest. They inspire us to do the same. We admire and appreciate their example as we celebrate the birth of our Corps and our rich heritage. As our motto enjoins us, let us always be faithful, to our God, our country, our Corps and to our families. Let us also resolve to be always faithful to those Marines who have bestowed upon us our proud legacy of sacrifice, courage, and victory against any foe. To all Marines, past and present, who uphold the finest traditions of our Eagle, Globe, and Anchor, Happy Birthday and... Semper Fidelis,

J. L. JONES

The Debacle at LZ Margo

On the afternoon of 16 September 1968 the carnage known as LZ Margo began. While several fine United States Marines gave their lives in the service of their country during Operation Lancaster II – Trousdale North prior to 16 September, that day is the anniversary of the real toll in terms of lives and dreams, lost or forever shattered. More than a few of those who gave their lives that day were Khe Sanh veterans. The toll on Echo Company was particularly heavy — L/Cpl Gary R. Daffin, L/Cpl Joseph E. Roble, L/Cpl Clifton Spiller, and PFC James C. "Bull" Durham Jr., were all veterans of the epic battle for Hill 861-Alpha that occurred on the morning of 5 February 1968. In addition, SSgt Juan O. Sanchez and Sgt Billy G. Strickland, also veterans of that battle, would lose their lives on 17 September 1968. L/Cpl Stanley R. Pettit, yet another such veteran, gave his life the day before the bloodbath began, and another fifty to one hundred of us were wounded.

Many other companies of the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment also lost veterans who had served at Khe Sanh. It is only within the last few years — after nearly three decades of intense soul searching — that I have finally come to realize that our leaders betrayed us. I have been researching the record of what I considered a disastrous event long forgotten by many, except by those who experienced the horror. I am nearing the end of that journey, a journey one of our former "leaders" referred to as "just opening old wounds." Little does he realize that many of the wounds his Marines sustained have not and probably never will heal. Mistakes happen in war, hiding those mistakes is evading responsibility. We who believed, trusted and willingly obeyed, only to be taken advantage of by those who evaded responsibility for their actions (or lack thereof) is an insult to those who survived LZ Margo. When my research is complete, I will make it available to all those who seek the truth of the Debacle at LZ Margo.

Fortunately, some good did come from LZ Margo. The unrecognized heroism of TRUE LEADERS, such as L/Cpl Gary Daffin and L/Cpl Cliff Spiller who gave their lives rescuing fellow Marines, is forever etched in my mind. The lessons I learned and the bravery I witnessed, I have passed on to others. These men and women have gone on to accomplish much, passing on the lessons of LZ Margo, so the story lives on. As we stand on the edge of yet another struggle for the survival of the American way of life, let us not forget the true heroes and the legacy they left us, who blazed the trail that we follow. May God bless and keep you always my brothers.

A Special Flag

Sharing (with permission) this beautiful little well written and meaningful story, which was sent by one of our own. Former Marine Billy Roble is the youngest brother of Marine Khe Sanh Vet Joseph E. Roble, E 2-/26. In 1998 at the Khe Sanh Veterans' Reunion, Joe was awarded the Bronze Star Medal W/V Device posthumously for heroic action on 15 September 1968. Joe was KIA 16 September 1968 at LZ Margo.

I'm not sure if you know that I am living at my old place again and the family that I rent a room from is of Spanish decent. In some regards they are like my own family. With the whole country being so patriotic, their father, now a proud citizen, rushed out to buy a flag for the house. All he could manage to find were some little flags and one slightly larger, plastic flag.

Before he did that, I thought of hanging a flag that my mother gave to me. It was one of the two flags she received at Arlington in July 1998. I had read somewhere that once a flag is folded for a fallen soldier, it should remain that way, but when he could find no suitable flags to show his patriotism, I felt obligated to help. To me, he is a true symbol of what this country stands for — life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. He came from a poor background and was not even able to go to high school. Earlier this week, we admired his last son's diploma, and I could almost see tears in his eyes.

I immediately called my mother and asked if it would be appropriate and she said that the flag represents the sacrifice of many and the symbol of freedom worldwide. That being said, I carefully unfolded the flag and marveled at its beauty. The colors contrasted so beautifully with one another and just holding it in my hands gave me such a sheer feeling of joy that was indescribable.

I've seen many flags, but under the present circumstances, this particular flag seemed to emanate power. I walked into the house and the whole family was surprised that I managed to find a flag. I quickly told them where and why I received it and they understood the meaning by which this flag would now be flown.

Their eldest son, my friend of 14 years, helped me place the flag in front of their garage. As many times as his family have and myself have probably seen the American flag, on this occasion, we all stood back admiring it. It has conveyed a feeling to the world in these recent days and knowing today is the anniversary of my brother's death in Vietnam, I'm sure he would be proud to see that flag fly.

Semper Fidelis
Billy Roble

Recently, I was asked to look at the recent events through the lens of military history. I have joined the cast of thousands who have written an "open letter to Americans."

Dear friends and fellow Americans,

Like everyone else in this great country, I am reeling from last week's attack on our sovereignty. But unlike some, I am not reeling from surprise. As a career soldier and a student and teacher of military history, I have a different perspective and I think you should hear it. This war will be won or lost by the American citizens, not diplomats, politicians or soldiers. Let me briefly explain. In spite of what the media, and even our own government are telling us, this act was not committed by a group of mentally deranged fanatics. To dismiss them as such would be among the gravest of mistakes. A ferocious, intelligent and dedicated adversary committed this attack. Don't take this the wrong way. I don't admire these men and I deplore their tactics, but I respect their capabilities. The many parallels that have been made with the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor are apropos. Not only was it a brilliant sneak attack against a complacent America, we may well be pulling our new adversaries out of caves 30 years after we think this war is over, just like my father's generation had to do with the formidable Japanese in the years following WWII.

These men hate the United States with all of their being, and we must not underestimate the power of their moral commitment. Napoleon, perhaps the world's greatest combination of soldier and statesman, stated, "the moral is to the physical as three is to one." Patton thought the Frenchman underestimated its importance and said moral conviction was five times more important in battle than physical strength. Our enemies are willing — better said, anxious — to give their lives for their cause. How committed are we, America? And for how long? In addition to demonstrating great moral conviction, the recent attack demonstrated a mastery of some of the basic fundamentals of warfare taught to most military officers worldwide; namely, simplicity, security and surprise. When I first heard rumors that some of these men may have been trained at our own Air War College, it made perfect sense to me. This was not a random act of violence, and we can expect the same sort of military competence to be displayed in the battle to come.

This war will escalate, with a good portion of it happening right here in the good ol' USA. These men will not go easily into the night. They do not fear us. We must not fear them. In spite of our overwhelming conventional strength as the world's only "superpower" (a truly silly term), we are the underdog in this fight. As you listen to the carefully scripted rhetoric designed to prepare us for the march for war, please realize that America is not equipped or seriously trained for the battle ahead. To be certain, our soldiers are much better than the enemy, and we have some excellent "counter-terrorist" organizations, but they are mostly trained for hostage rescues, airfield seizures, or the occasional "body snatch," (which may come in handy). We will be fighting a war of annihilation, because if their early efforts are any indication, our enemy is ready and willing to die to the last man. Eradicating the enemy will be costly and time consuming. They have already deployed their forces in as many as 20 countries, and are likely living the lives of everyday citizens. Simply put, our soldiers will be tasked with a search and destroy mission on multiple foreign landscapes, and the public must be patient and supportive until the strategy and tactics can be worked out. For the most part, our military is still in the process of redefining itself and is presided over by men and women who grew up with and were promoted because they excelled in Cold War doctrine, strategy and tactics.

This will not be linear warfare; there will be no clear "centers of gravity" to strike with high technology weapons. Our vast technological edge will certainly be helpful, but it will not be decisive. Perhaps the perfect metaphor for the coming battle was introduced by the terrorists themselves aboard the hijacked aircraft — this will be a knife fight, and it will be won or lost by the ingenuity and will of citizens and soldiers, not by software or smart bombs.

We must also be patient with our military leaders. Unlike Americans who are eager to put this messy time behind us, our adversaries have time on their side, and they will use it. They plan to fight a battle of attrition, hoping to drag the battle out until the American public loses its will to fight. This might be difficult to believe in this euphoric time of flag waving and patriotism, but it is generally acknowledged that America lacks the stomach for a long fight. We need only look as far back as Vietnam, when North Vietnamese General Vo Nguyen Giap (also a military history teacher) defeated the United States of America without ever winning a major tactical battle.

American soldiers who marched to war cheered on by flag waving Americans in 1965 were reviled and spat upon less than three years later when they returned. Although we hope that Osama Bin Laden is no Giap, he is certain to understand and employ the concept. We can expect not only large doses of pain like the recent attacks but also less audacious "sand in the gears" tactics, ranging from livestock infestations to attacks at water supplies and power distribution facilities. These attacks are designed to hit us in our "comfort zone," forcing the average American to "pay more and play less," eventually eroding our resolve. But it can only work if we let it.

It is clear to me that the will of the American citizenry — you and I — is the center of gravity the enemy has targeted. It will be the fulcrum upon which victory or defeat will turn. He believes us to be soft, impatient, and self-centered. He may be right, but if so, we must change. The Prussian general Carl von Clausewitz, the most often quoted and least read military theorist in history, says that there is a "remarkable trinity of war" that is composed of (1) the will of the people, (2) the political leadership of the government, and (3) the chance and probability that plays out on the field of battle, in that order.

Every American citizen was in the crosshairs of last Tuesday's attack, not just those that were unfortunate enough to be in the World Trade Center or Pentagon. The will of the American people will decide this war. If we are to win, it will be because we have what it takes to persevere through a few more hits, learn from our mistakes, improvise, and adapt. If we can do that, we will eventually prevail. Everyone I've talked to in the past few days has shared a common frustration, saying in one form or another, "I just wish I could do something!" You are already doing it. Just keep faith in America, and continue to support your President and military, and the outcome is certain. If we fail to do so, the outcome is equally certain.

New York City Visit: WTC

On 11 September 2001, I sat in horror and watched the Attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. It was beyond belief! When the entire nation learned the responsible parties were from the Middle East, I like many others wanted immediate retaliation. I have been a police officer for 33 years and work in an area where many of the businesses are owned by Arab Americans. I wanted to forget the oath I had taken when I became a police officer and seek revenge in any non-violent way I could.

However, as I did in Vietnam, I forgot my personal feelings and protected all those I had taken an oath to protect, regardless of personal feelings. I could not get it out of my mind that over almost 400 hundred of my fellow Police Officers and Firemen were still buried in that burning wreckage that used to be the WTC. I and hundreds of other police officers wanted to go there and help dig them out. I could not leave the TV — as they broadcast the rescue efforts, we relayed information over our police radios when a police officer or firemen was rescued. Unfortunately, this good news was short lived.

I had to go there. To be close to them. To help in any way we could. So with 20 other Police Officers, we packed up and drove to New York. Upon arrival at the volunteer center, NY Police and Firemen, and civilian volunteers greeted us with open arms. Although we were not needed at the sight of the WTC Disaster (known as Ground Zero), there were plenty of other things we could do to give the over-worked NY Police Department Members a little break. Most of them had worked without days off, since the day of the bombing. At first, it was strange walking a beat in Greenwich Village and Times Square in the uniform of a Chicago Police Officer. After a few days, it became commonplace to see Police officers in the uniforms of dozens of Law Enforcement Departments, patrolling along with us.

The citizens of New York, who some say are not the friendliest people in the world, would stop you on the street, shake your hand and say, "Thanks for coming." Just the thought that hundreds of Police and Fire Agencies had volunteered to come to New York to help, buoyed the morale of the NY Police Officers.

Then it was off to "Ground Zero." As everyone who has been there has said, you have to see it in person to actually understand the total devastation. Just imagine 110-story buildings being reduced to a pile of ruble 85 feet high. We spent the time at the WTC escorting victims' families around the site, and escorting people who had been displaced from their homes and offices while they retrieved a few personal items from places many will never return to.

I would personally describe the site as looking at a city after a nuclear explosion struck it. They have over a mile square area cordoned off, and all the buildings were deserted. There were over 6,000 abandoned vehicles parked on the street and in garages. Every street, building, office, and apartment we saw was covered by that gray, filthy, acrid matter created from paper, building walls, plaster, etc. when the buildings collapsed. Although I sought closure from my visit, it still haunts me. Even though I know there is nothing else I could do, I want to go back.

Looking Back Forty Years

I attended my high school 40th reunion this past October in Manhattan Beach, California. My school at the time was inland from there; fifteen minutes by freeway. Mount Carmel opened in 1934 and closed in 1976. Demographics did it in. A casual friend from those high school days, took me there in a new, black Jaguar. He had done well for himself. After graduating from USC with a degree in accounting, he moved right up the business ladder. He did not serve in the armed forces. He retired a couple of years ago. Avis bought out the franchise that he owned a part of. Also in the car were another classmate and his wife. He went to Annapolis and got into nuclear subs, did his five, got out and went to Stanford. Got a Ph.D. and is now a big boy with GE.

We walked our old school grounds. The buildings and the gym are gone. The one city block that was once Mount Carmel is now a playground and youth center. Black and Hispanic kids were playing soccer when we arrived. Some of the concrete and asphalt that was our commons remains. Several other car-loads of classmates met us there. We stood out now. The kids and their parents ignored us for the most part. Half of our class of 129 made it to the banquet that night. Fifty-two filled out bios that I read later after I got home. I felt nothing at that reunion. It was nothing compared to what I feel at a Khe Sanh reunion. I did three years at that school and hated it. I was reluctantly dragged from my home in Hawaii in 1958 and went there so my older sister and brother could go to universities on the mainland.

Mount Carmel was a Catholic boy's school with only 600 students. It was famous for its football team. Several grads went on to play pro ball. I was on the swimming team but was remembered more as a fighter. That's what many of those in attendance remembered me as — a quiet guy who could box. We were a mixed middle-class school. Mostly white, but all races. Our fathers were WW2 guys with skilled trade jobs, or merchants and small businessmen. It was an Italian guy with a Fonzi hairdo who made me famous. He played up his rep as a mob guy's kid and was a bully. He played with the wrong guy one day during lunch out on the commons.

I did get to meet the three guys I hung out with. One's a rich dentist in Bel Air. Another, an Irish immigrant, jokester, is a Private Investigator. The third; the genius of our class, a real math whiz, is still a fat guy but bald now. He lives in the same house with his mom. Carmel was a school of small cliques. Tom the Dentist always wanted to be a dentist. Jim the guy who still lives at home had access to beer his dad brewed which Mike the PI and I drank. Tom missed getting drafted. Jim the fat guy got 4F because of his fat. Mike got drafted and served with the Americal Division as an RTO. Tom looks real good and prosperous. Jim is fat, bald and still lethargic. Mike has hard lines on his face like some of the arroyos at Pendelton.

I drove from that dull event down to Fallbrook to hang out for a couple of days with my Khe Sanh bro. I always feel at home with him and Sharon. How different, I thought. I come from seeing guys I spent three years with and couldn't wait to get away from. I went to that school to get an education. But the real education I got was in Vietnam. I noticed when I read the 52 bios that 15 served stateside. Eight went to Vietnam. Only three were combat guys. I wonder if that has anything to do with my feelings?

This Is What The Corps Is All About

John-Boy,

Good to hear from you. Imagine current events are a hot topic in your classroom. As you can imagine, your brother Marines at Camp Lejeune are biting at the bit to receive a mission in the first war of the 21st Century. It will come but not until around Thanksgiving/Christmas time from the tea leaves I'm reading. It will kill me to see them go, leaving me back to guard my driveway! Went to New York City on Friday, 26 September for a Memorial Service for my college roommate (Joe Zucalla) who was lost in the WTC. You should remember Joe coming to the house with Sal Lentene to pick me up for the drive to the University of Dayton. An extremely moving and profound day.

Denny and I walked from Penn Station up 5th Avenue to 50th Street to get to St. Patrick's Cathedral. From the "Missing Posters" everywhere to the letters from school children all over these Unites States, it was the most emotional "hump" I was ever fortunate enough to participate in. The change in the people in the "Big Apple" is simply amazing. Red, White, and Blue everywhere with everyone being courteous and polite, not knocking anyone down as they walk the Manhattan sidewalks. I had to keep looking around to assure myself I had not been transported to Dublin or Madrid! The cathedral was packed with fraternity brothers, the gathered 'Familia de Zucalla', friends of Joe from all over the city and Long Island, and just good Americans who did not know Joe but wanted to show one of the many aggrieved families that they care.

After the funeral mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral, about 20 of the fraternity brothers went to "Callahan's Irish Pub and Grill" for a DGO wake. After two hours of liquid courage and intelligence, Denny, 4 other fraternity brothers and I went down to pay our respects at Ground Zero. One of my frat bros, Jerry Sampson, is a retired Nassau County Police Officer. He tried to use his badge to get us through the barriers but no joy. I then decided to use my only trump card. Broke out my retired military ID and went up to the cop and said, "I'm Colonel Williams of the USMC, and my old friend who was a soldier died in there. I'd like to go in to pay my respects!" The cop read the ID Card and then snapped to attention, saying, "Semper Fi, Sir!" Turns out he was in 1st Marines. The cop next to him turns and says, "Joe, I didn't know you were a Marine. I was a Marine too, in 2nd Tanks. Semper Fi!"

Joe then takes me over to his Watch Sergeant and tells him who I am while handing over the ID Card. The Watch Sergeant reads the card, looks at me and says, "Semper Fi, Sir." After shaking hands and finding out he was in 9th Marines in Vietnam, he hollers over to a young cadet, "Hey rookie, get over here. Take the Colonel and his men anywhere they want to go." After clearing the barricades and acknowledging the salutes of the National Guardsmen who have now figured out who/what is going down, the rookie looks at my US/USMC Flag lapel pin and asks me if I was a Marine. When I answer in the affirmative, he says, "Semper Fi, Sir." Turns out he was in 6th Comm Bn up until a year ago. As you can imagine, my normally over-inflated Marine ego was even more inflated given this most recent affirmation of the power of the Marine Corps Mafia and a simple phrase that means so much to a very special band of brothers.

To sum up this event, being at the WTC with the smoke, acrid smell, and total devastation, and looking in the thousand yard stares of the rescue workers who refuse to give up — all of this imparts a entirely new appreciation for humankind and a total revulsion for the damage that was done to our fellow citizens and country in the name of God. It also fills your eyes with tears and your heart with pride to see how the New Yorkers and so many other volunteers from all around the nation have joined together and refuse to be beaten. Finally, it makes you appreciate even more the true meaning of our beloved Corps. It is a family, and the words "Once a Marine, Always a Marine" are as valid today as they were when first spoken. My best to Kerry and the kids. Rest easy tonight John, your brother Marines are on the watch and ready as always to serve.

Love and "Semper Fidelis,"
Mike

How I Avoided the Draft

On the day after my 18th birthday, a couple of my friends and I drove the 12 miles to Carthage, Missouri where our county Selective Service office was located and signed up for the draft. Pauline, who had been the secretary of the board since at least World War I, took us through the process and thanked us for being so prompt.

Six months later, I enlisted in the Marine Corps Reserve. Notice was sent to the Selective Service and I should have been reclassified 1D. At the same time, I received a scholarship to college. The Marine Corps agreed that we could delay active duty and if I was doing OK in school, I could enter the PLC program and get a commission. The university sent a notice to the draft board that I was enrolled. I got a draft card that said I was 2S (Student deferment) not 1D (member of the Armed Forces) Of course, being 18, I didn't know the difference.

I went to my first summer of PLC in 1962 and returned for the second six weeks in the summer of 1963. About three weeks into the cycle, my folks sent me a draft notice from Pauline and the Selective Service Board informing me to report for induction. Of course, I did the worst thing possible. I went to see my DI for his advice. It was succinct and to the point. "Get the %$% out of my office, maggot! I have pissed on ants who had more brains than you do. You %$%$ this up. Now, un%$%$ it!"

Fortunately, the platoon commander heard about the problem, called me into his office and told me that the Corps would advise the draft board that I was in the Marines and stood a 1% chance of becoming an officer. I thought that all sounded pretty good and I forgot about it.

At the end of that summer, I entered law school on another scholarship and they sent a notice to my draft board. I got another draft card with a 2S deferment. I didn't question it. In my last semester of law school, I received another induction notice. This one ordered me to report for a pre-induction physical in Detroit. I sent a copy of my ID showing that I was a 1st Lieutenant in the USMC to the draft board but got no response. I tried calling but didn't get through. I went to Detroit and gave my ID to one of the Army NCOs who were running batches of draftees through the physical exam process. He was not impressed. About an hour later while I was turning my head to cough while some doctor was probing my privates, an Army officer appeared. He allowed as how there had been a mistake, gave me back my ID and told me I could get dressed and go back to school. He said they would correct my records with the Selective Service.

Two years later, during the Tet offensive in 1968, the gunny came in with the mail and said "Skipper, it looks like you've been drafted." He handed me another notice from my draft board which my folks had forwarded. This time I wrote a letter to Pauline the secretary, enclosed a photo of me in the Nam, a picture of my ID card, and told them that if they wanted to order me to return to The World for induction, let me know and I'd be on the next plane.

A month later I got another letter from Pauline. She apologized for herself and all the Selective Service Board in Carthage, Missouri. It seems, she said, that there was another Charles E. Patterson, born the same day in our little county of about 10,000 souls. The other Charles E. had been living on my 1D deferment for the past 9 years, and they thought I was the one who had stayed in school and then out of reach to avoid the draft. She said they were going to see to it that he became a member of the active duty Armed Forces.

I never knew what happened to the other Charles E., but his name is not on the wall, so maybe he made it. But given his luck, I'd guess he probably skated.

The Sanctuary for Unloved Heroes

I see by your gravestone that you were only 19
When you joined the dead heroes

Well I hope you died quick and I hope you died clean

The Morphine Dream

For some, it was the time of their life; and for some, the time of their death. There were a hundred ways to kill in that place, and killing begets killing, so you could end up on either end of that deal. The time of their life was a year and a month and in that short but interminable period, young men died or grew old. We who grew old remember our dead.

The dead waited with infinite patience, while we wounded and not yet dead flew away in a morphine dream. It was triage at the Khe Sanh airstrip. It was January 1968.

He didn't know he was between deaths. He squinted in the harsh light that burned through the ribbed glass diffuser of a surgeon's overhead lamp. The glare contracted the surgeon's pupils and made them look like the tips on a dentist's drill. They bore down on the boy, penetrating the morphine fog. He said, "Hey Doc, will you save the bullet for me? I lost the other one that they took out of my leg this morning." Above the gauze mask the doctor's eyes crinkled at the corners. The boy had made this very busy man smile, and it was a kindly voice that answered, "We'll do our best son. Now try to relax. We are going to put this rubber mask over your face. Breathe deeply and count backwards from ten."

He wanted to watch, so he fooled them. He counted forwards. He made it to about four and he thought that was pretty funny. They were murmuring and clinking steel tools in kidney-shaped pans, and they didn't know that the boy could hear them. It didn't hurt when they cut him, but he could feel it and he could hear the scalpel slicing the flesh on his shoulder. It was the sensation you would feel if your lip was numb and you slit it with a razor blade. He frowned under the ether mask and then...he was sucked down into darkness. All in a dream. He was back home on the prairies, and he had fallen into a creek full of chocolate pudding, his favorite. He was on his back, pinned down like a butterfly, his wings stuck to the tacky dessert. Along the bank of the chocolate stream he heard groans.

The boy opened his eyes and looked down a row of lumpy cots, barely visible in the greenish gloom of a Quonset hut. There were four lines of occupied bunks in the deep room. Stainless steel rods with curved necks holding intravenous bags hovered by each bed like glimmering skeletons on wheels. The head of his bunk was against the wall, his covered feet facing a pathway between the rows. Shadows patrolled the aisles and periodically shined flashlights on the metal cots and read charts on clipboards. Light, dark, light, dark. Cannon were booming in the distance.

His drugged mind kaleidoscoped in the half-light, mixing cause and effect and past and present. Had it been hours or days since the firefight? It was a good fight and a good day to die. He didn't because Lt. Grenville Sutcliffe used an M79 grenade launcher to blow away the gunman that was throwing down on Sgt. John Frescura. The Green Beret Sergeant was making the machine gun charge that gave the boy the cover he needed to get away from the next bullet. He was expecting that third bullet, that third one with his name on it. And three is a charm. Every grunt knows that.

From Khe Sanh to this murky room with his two lucky wounds. He lay there unable to move, inhaling the pukey odor of ether mixed with whiffs of aromatic antiseptics. In the temporal confusion, he thought, Man I got it made. I got in under the wire and I beat the odds. John Wayne wounds, groovy. I'm OK here, this is a safe place, a safe place to sleep. He wanted a safe place to sleep more than anything. A spidery trickle of blood leaked of his bandages and ran along his arm. A second later another dribble scurried down to his elbow and added itself to the growing puddle. He was afloat in the stuff and he was cold. He could see the Corpsmen walking by the foot of his bed. He strained to call out but the sound wouldn't go past his throat. Not even a whisper. It was like trying to shout away a nightmare to wake up. It never works.

Then he realized that he was the only one that knew. This was the way he was going to die. He was going to quietly bleed to death. Dark figures wandered back and forth, oblivious to him as though he were already a corpse, while his soul ran screaming around his body and the devil sat on his chest. He thought, if I go to sleep I'd die. If I die, they will think I'm just sleeping. It's the same thing. Sleeping isn't what kills you, so I should be able to sleep just a little. That seemed to make sense. The devil nodded and grinned. A Corpsman shined a light on his face and asked, How ya doing guy? The boy didn't answer. The Corpsman pulled the sodden blanket back and then looked at the wet sheen on his fingers. He clamped a hand on the shoulder and said, What's your name? The boy could feel the answer lurking in his mind but it wouldn't come out. He thought, I'll tell him tomorrow. The voice said, where are you from? He knew that one. He said, South Dakota...in his head. The bed started to drift down the long room and came to rest under the surgeon's lamp again. Then...the darkness again.

The Sanctuary

The next morning I woke up outdoors to a sunny day and a pleasant temperature. I could hear the sounds of Danang in the background. Buses, trucks, children, boat traffic, and jet afterburners kicking in— the usual stuff. I was alive and the first thing I tried was my voice. I said, Damn it. I liked Danang. I had been AWOL here a few times, checking out the skivy houses and getting a hot meal, even steaks and ice cream from navy people at this same Naval Support Activity Base. Hell, just yesterday I had been able to walk into this place looking forward to walking out again. I was sort of shot up and limping a little, but I was full of youthful enthusiasm and a few jabs of morphine. Now I was strapped to a stretcher and two Corpsmen were carrying me to a helicopter. I said, Where are we going? They told me I was going to the USS Sanctuary for recovery. As we bounced along, I was reminded of the wagon rides my mother used to give me when I was a kid. I could lay back and watch the clouds floating by and feel the gentle vibration as the little wheels bumped over the dirt road. Vibrating helicopter, Navy Corpsman holding I.V. bags, horizontal bodies on stretchers, the smell of hydraulic fluid and chopper fuel, whop whop whop, and a gentle thump as we landed. The South China Sea was the bluest blue, and the USS Sanctuary was sparkling white. They pulled my stretcher off the helicopter and set me on the deck. I felt like a speck of dirt on a wedding cake.

On a gurney and into an elevator, long and narrow, built to hold stretchers. Nearly dark after the morning sun, a light bulb on the ceiling had wire mesh over it. The elevator driver turned a wheel on a panel and then turned to look at me. He said, We are going down to x-ray, and he smiled. Later I sat on a stool and Lt. Cmdr. Hartzog pulled stained gauze out of my shoulder. Dried blood was caked and flaky down to my elbow. It seemed like he pulled yards of salve and antiseptic saturated cloth from the wound. I looked at the open gash, shaped like the number seven, and saw the layers of my own body. Pale epidermis, a yellowish layer of fatty tissue, lightly marbled raw meat and a small ooze of blood. I said, using a few expletives, Did you mess up my leg like this too? He reminded me that I was no longer in the field, that I was an enlisted man on his ship, and that I would watch my language. I said, Aye, aye sir, with as much humility as a Marine is allowed to show to the Navy. I asked, Did they save the bullet? He showed me the X-rays. The bullet was still in my shoulder, in two pieces. He told me to take a shower and to run hot water into the wounds for as long as I could stand it — and then a little longer. Afterwards, he repacked the wounds. We did this for a couple days and then he left the gashes exposed to the air to cure like beef.

After the first session a Hospital Corpsman took me to a bunk in a recovery ward. I had a sling on my arm and a bandage around my thigh. He told me to take a top bunk. Bullshit. I was a Marine, wounded in combat, in pain, and this non-combatant was telling me to climb a ladder. A guy in a bunk against the bulkhead said, Hey doc, cut that Marine some slack. He's been hit in the leg and arm. he shouldn't have to climb a ladder. Get him a lower bunk. I thought, Damm right, and looked over to see who was talking. He was a good-looking kid. My age. Blond curly hair. Blue eyes. He was lying spread-eagled on his bunk. Both of his legs were slit open to the bone from the inside of the knees to the groin. His testicles had been blown away and a plastic tube was draining his urine. He nodded at me and smiled.

Indescribable embarrassment and shame hit me like a chill, and I wanted to hide my face. I sat on the floor and cried. The Corpsman said, What's the matter with you. Are you hurt? I didn't care. I didn't care what anybody said about me. They couldn't have thought less of me than I did anyway. They put me in a bottom bunk next to a guy that had plastic tubes plugged into his chest. The tubes went to an electric pump on the floor. The transparent tubes had little clots of stringy blood trapped in the loops and whenever he breathed the pump would whirl and the clots would wave like seaweed. He had seven entry wounds and I asked him what had happened. He wheezed out the story. He was a Corpsman and had been trying to save a Marine. He and the Marine had been pinned down on an open paddy and he said that every time he moved, a sniper would shoot him again. He said he had to stop moving for a half a day before they could come to get him.

The guy in the bunk on the other side of me was a Korean Marine. His right leg was wrapped up like a mummy down to the knee where it ended. He would look at the stump and bang it against the side rail and swear under his breath. His life had been in the ROK Marines and that had ended when they threw away his leg. He was mad as hell, and everybody was afraid of him. They said he was suicidal. There were row upon row of stories like that, and they came and they went over the twelve days that I was there. Thankfully, I can't remember most of them. I remember the nurse. I bet we all do.

My therapy routine changed on about the third or fourth day. They numbed the wounds and sowed them shut with piano wire. The wire poked through my clothes and hung up whenever I moved. I moved around quite a bit after a few days. I stood on the fantail and watched Vietnam go by as we sailed toward Chu Lai and back again. I walked the main deck and took the elevator to the decks that I was allowed on. Mainly, I went to the ice cream machine and filled a Dixie cup with the swirl stuff and went outside and ate it with a little wooden spoon. I met a Marine there with the hair shaved off the top of his stitched head. He was carrying a helmet that had a bullet hole dead center in the forehead. He said the round had punched through, hit him in the forehead, traveled under his scalp and lodged in the back of his neck. He said he had been knocked unconscious but had kept hold of the helmet and was never going to let it go because it was a sign from God. He said there was no way he was going back ashore either and that was also a message from God.

I met two Marines with drawn .45s on the elevator. They had a guy with them that had a block of C4 and a detonator. I didn't have time to get off the elevator, so I asked the guy what was going on as we went up. He said they had sent him out here to see the shrink, and he had brought the C4 with him. What's the big deal? They walked him to the fantail and he threw it overboard. He asked me if I would come to see him once in awhile down in the cage. He said it was pretty groovy, but everybody down there was nuts and he didn't have anybody to talk to. I went down there a few times, the guy with the helmet and I, and we watched these guys wander around in the cage. It was scary as hell and it is as close as I ever want to get to true madness. I never did see the C4 guy again. When the sling came off my arm, I was assigned to operate the elevator. The Navy works in four-hour increments and working to a routine was a comfort. Every day I heard, Now hear this. Sweepers, sweepers, man your brooms. Give the ship a clean sweep-down, fore and aft. Now sweepers, sweepers. The announcement was preceded and followed by a funny little whistle.

On the elevator, you see the casualties as they first arrive. Tet was a very busy time, and they started coming in directly from the field. No intermediate stops at Danang. A guy shot in the chest was rolled in and his blood splattered Corpsman ran beside the gurney with his hand over the wound. His young eyes were scared as he fought to breathe, and I put my hand on his shoulder and said, We're going down to X-ray and it will be all right now. He died looking at my sorry face. I wept again. A sailor swabbed the blood from the elevator floor. The Corpsmen and doctors and nurses lived with this horror day after day, every day.

Lt. Commander Hartzog cut the wire stitches with a stainless steel snipper and then pulled them out with a pair of pliers. He swabbed away the beads of blood and said it looked pretty good. He said he could keep me on board the ship for another week, maybe two, at the most. He stood up to go and I said, No, Sir. I want to leave as soon as possible.

He sat back and shook his head. Why Son? Why do you boys do that? We talked for a while and I explained that my buddies were back there, and they might need me. He signed my release and told me to take care of my wounds and wished me good luck. I hope he knows I made it.

They go unsung, those good people of the Sanctuary, those people who cared when the rest of the world wanted to forget us.

We were their special children, and they loved us all. We torn and mangled boys from the War Without Heroes.[2]

The following is the first part of a two-part series of the memoirs of Madame Poilane, who with her family ran the Coffee plantation at Khe Sanh.

Memories of Vietnam, 1957-1968

Khe Sanh village came about as a result of the arrival of the planters. Before, there were only the Montagnards of the "Bru" tribe who were dispersed in the villages that were accessible only by the back roads. There was a French woman living, I believe, with a Vietnamese man. Since the development of the plantations, the Vietnamese population came about slowly and one could be able to figure between 1,500 and 2,000 inhabitants in 1968.

The planters were five in number:

- Monsieur Eugene Poilane, remarried to a Vietnamese woman who managed the plantation from 1964 until the death of her husband. She also possessed a plantation bought for Monsieur Poilane's sister (former Lecas plantation). Madame Lecas died of cholera, and she is buried on the plantation at Khe Sanh.
- Monsieur Felix Poilane, my husband and manager of his mother's (Madame Bourdeauducq) plantation since December 21, 1957, the date on which I arrived with him to Vietnam. We stayed there until January 22, 1968 — the evacuation before the Viet Cong offensive.
- Monsieur Simard (former Laval plantation) owned a plantation starting from Khe Sanh and continuing on the road to Lao Bao. Another part was found at another section. Monsieur Simard was married to a Eurasian.
- Monsieur Rome (deceased) rented the plantation to Monsieur Llinares, married to a Vietnamese woman.
- And finally, the plantation of the Benedictine Fathers whose monastery was at Hue. When my mother-in-law, Madame Bourdeauducq, had to leave Khe Sanh and Vietnam, she gave them our plantation. But the Fathers, in addition, had asked for more land. She gave them 9 Hectares (equivalent to 22,239 acres.) of land planted with productive coffee trees and the possibility of expanding, which they did.

Upon our return in 1957, the Fathers, having been notified, constructed a building for themselves and gave us back the plantation as agreed. One French Father (Father Corentin who since died in France) and some Vietnamese brothers stayed to help with the plantation work. When I arrived on December 21, 1957 in the middle of the monsoon season, I was a little afraid to see the state in which the plantation was — especially the big 16-room mansion which was uninhabitable. The Fathers had to cultivate and harvest the plantation, and that's all — no reparations, since we did not know what would become of Vietnam. Father Roman, another French Benedictine who accompanied us, did me the honor of showing me the plantation. He told me, "You will be a queen here." I held back my tears, for all I was seeing there were holes in the ceilings and in the floors.

There were no more doors or windows. The wind could easily come in. In the first floor room, which was our bedroom, the ceiling was held up with branches from the coffee trees. As there was no bed, my father-in-law gave us two iron beds, and we set up mats on them. The main part of our luggage had not arrived yet from Saigon, and we only had a few things with us.

Our first meal consisted of bread with salted "bridel" butter and bananas. There were only two bowls and very few plates and dishes, some canned food that was barely edible, especially the peas. In view of this lack of supplies, we went to have our first meal at my father-in-law's at Khe Sanh. The chauffeur came to pick us up with an old winded T23 Citroen automobile. Encountering the little comfort that existed at my father-in-law's home, we had our meals at our own home with the arrival of our thi ba named Ninh. Father Corentin had hired her for us. She was clean and honest which was good for us.

Our first Christmas was very simple and rather sad for us who just made the trip from France to Vietnam on the boat Le Laos and then stayed at the Hotel Majestic in Saigon. This was too much of a change for us. Thus, we found again the poverty of those who were around us.

It was necessary to go down to the Province of Quang-Tri, 77 kilometers (almost 48 miles) from Khe Sanh to shop and to buy the minimum to live in a more decent manner. My husband did not dare to venture out too much; he managed the plantation alone for the first time. It was necessary to work for a year to see how it would turn out. We were to show Vietnamese identification papers in order to go about. From Dong Ha to Khe Sanh there were no less than 14 barriers to cross, showing these papers. Most of the time, soldiers would look very seriously at the reverse side of these papers. They did not want to show that they did not know how to read. We said nothing and tried only to stay calm. Later on, the name Poilane served as our passport.

Before going any farther I would like to say that Khe Sanh is connected to town — that is to say Dong Ha — by Route 9 which was constructed by the French Military Corps of Engineers. The road went as far as Lao Bao, but before the events of the Viet Cong and the Japanese, it went as far as Laos. When it was impossible to come down toward Dong Ha, the coffee was sold at Savannacket in Laos. When my father-in-law arrived for the first time, he was able to come as far as 41 kilometers (about 25 miles) by the river, then on foot along the path that existed then, having been cut out by the Montagnards who went to visit each other from village to village.

I am going to continue to enumerate the important people who were with us: the Vietnamese Protestant minister who was there before 1955 without having any followers. He came back in 1958 and wound up having a beautiful house for prayers and meetings with the Montagnards. No Vietnamese joined him again. Then the American Protestant linguists arrived around 1960 or 1961. They did a tremendous job and began to transcribe the "Bru" language that was never written down. With the Bru, they began to make little elementary books for teaching the Montagnards to read and write their language. Then they started translating the books. Our relationship excelled with this young American couple (the Millers) who lived in a straw hut constructed in a village. They had much courage since this was just about complete destitution for them. The Fathers of Foreign Missions of Paris arrived March 3, 1964. First was Father Poncet who was named parish priest (he was later killed February 13, 1968 at Hue during the Tet Offensive in the middle of a road by the Viet Cong.) Next was Father Mauvais who came to replace him, and in May of 1967 the nuns of Saint Paul of Chartres moved in near the priests. They, too, came to take care of the Montagnards.

For us, rather for me, I was beginning a completely new life. My husband, Felix, who was born in Khe Sanh and had always lived there, was happy to meet his father again and also to see his plantation and country once more. The Montagnards had been informed of the return of the "boss" and for those who knew him, it was a great joy because with his return, there was also the promise of steady jobs. Visits were numerous. One often came to see the wife of the cau, a Vietnamese word meaning "young man of good family." Numerous gifts, in the form of new rice, were offered to us. I remember a nice gesture: upon my arrival at the plantation house (named Petite Fleur), I found a pretty bouquet of flowers. The young boy in charge of watching the house knew that the wife of the master was arriving. In my distress, this gesture moved me very much.

I had a lot of trouble getting used to this new life in the middle of the underbrush. Above all, it was the lack of even the slightest comforts that left me unable to adapt. In this large house full of holes, one could not consider anything to do in such conditions. And furthermore, there was the food to which I had trouble adapting. We had a very clean cook who did her best, but I simply could not stand eating rice at every meal. She tried to prepare rice for me in the form of bread, but nonetheless, it was still always rice! Each night I would cry and ask my husband to leave again; I said that I would not become accustomed to this life. Felix used to say to me then that it was necessary to make a harvest, and then we'd see about it. The trip would be expensive; it would be necessary to make the harvest and then sell it. We would see then if we would return. He knew very well what he was doing. He knew well what the country did to each person. In such a paradise, because that is what this land was, he knew that I would let myself be taken by the enchantment and would stay. It was true.

The first harvest of coffee was a little Arabica and weighed 800 kilos (about 363 lbs) then came several tons of the Robusta. And around April 15, good weather had arrived and the harvest of the Chari was going to begin. Before explaining how the harvest of the coffee went, I would like to describe it. The Arabica is a real little shrub, not more than two meters in height. It is very fragile and was destroyed by a disease called leaf blight. This disease showed itself by the appearance of tiny mushrooms under the leaves. When this was discovered, the damage was done since we did not have the products to take care of this disease. The plantation produced, before the onset of the disease, 25 tons a year. This coffee was harvested during the monsoon and thus did not have the sun to dry it. It was prepared by the "wet" method. It was placed in large cement basins full of water and left to swell with water and to ferment. Then, it was shelled and the beans could dry in a room known as the "hot room." The heat did the rest in thoroughly drying it. The coffee could then be put in bags before preparing it to be sold, removing the outer skin and sorting it so that there were only perfect beans being sold.

The Robusta was just as the name indicates, a more robust coffee. It was bigger, as it was already a small tree and the harvest took place at the beginning of the month of January. It was not prepared, however, by the wet method. Instead, we dry it by leaving it first to ferment, then putting it in the hot room to dry it. Once dry, it is placed sideways until the time comes to prepare it to be sold. We produced 2-3 tons of this a year. The hot room is a large room with trays on which the coffee is placed for drying with long dug-out galleries which are covered with sheet-irons to conduct the heat. A large furnace in which wood is burned produces this heat. The furnace runs day and night. The coffee is turned at least twice a day so when the upper layer dries, we can continue to dry the rest.

Next is the Chari. It was my father-in-law who brought back nine beans of this coffee from Tonkin, and with those nine beans, started this plantation. As its name indicates, this coffee originates in Africa in Oubangui Chari. It is a tree with a rather fat trunk and long branches with large leaves of a beautiful dark green. It can reach three to four meters in height. It is a very robust coffee and it adapts well to the red earth of Khe Sanh. Generally, the coffee tree grows in red earth.

The harvest of Chari is done from the 15th of April to the end of September. It is our largest output as we produce about 20 tons a year. The harvest is done on the spot by the Montagnards — those here leave in the morning and return in the afternoon. Starting at about 3:30 in the afternoon, I begin to measure the harvest of each coffee. A starting price is set: $10 a touque (a Vietnamese measurement). A touque of petroleum is 20 liters. The coffee bean has the form of a red cherry, which is picked bean by bean as to try not to scratch any little pieces of wood from the coffee tree, because the tree would then suffer. It is an art to pick the ripe coffee. It takes a lot of time to gather each bean but the Bru are very gifted for this type of work. I watch only to make sure they don't pick any green beans. They must mature, and then they will be gathered later. In the middle of the harvest, we have 120 to 150 workers and this gives an enormous amount of work, not just in measuring, but in the payment and sale of rice and other products: salt, dried fish, and a shrimp paste called jourc which smells rather bad. It is necessary to get used to the smell in order to eat this product, but it is otherwise very good. However, it exists in different levels of quality.

After the payment for the daily harvest, I begin to nurse Montagnards who have numerous sores on their legs. Much conjunctivitis occurs at the time of the sale in Laos, the io nam. The dust is responsible in most cases, and it is easily cured with eyewash. There is also a lot of dysentery for which sulfamides and other medications are given, depending on the severity of the case. I am anticipating a little; I want to speak again about the coffee, which is our principal activity, not counting all the fruit of the country that we were introduced to by Monsieur Eugene Poilane.

The coffee, once picked, is left on a cement surface. It remains in a heap for the fermentation of the beans, which resemble a fat cherry in which the pulp is very thick. When the mildew forms very lightly, it is time to put the coffee on the surface and, several times a day, our Vietnamese workers rake through the coffee, using rakes and their bare feet, to aerate the coffee, which will begin to dry, becoming black. Each night, it will be put back into piles based on its degree of dryness and covered with corrugated iron to protect it in case of a sudden storm. When it is dry, it will then be grayish in color. The coffee will be placed in bags in a room, waiting for the time to be prepared to be sold.

One cannot imagine the work that is required to prepare the coffee before it is poured in a cup to enjoy! The harvesting of Chari is the highpoint of the year on the plantation, because it is then that we have the most workers. These Vietnamese workers coming from the plains, generally from Dong Ha and the area surrounding the plantation and who live on the premises with us, did all of the work drying the coffee and taking care of the plantation. Actually, the coffee trees require having their highest and dead branches removed, as well as little branches called "gourmands" which exhaust the tree. Each day the workers would be on the plantation with Felix to see what had to be done on such and such a section planted with coffee trees. The plantation was divided into planted hectares, separated one from the other by wide alleys for easier access by car and foot.

They would look to see if there were any trees that were too old or unproductive that had to be replaced. For that, we would have a nursery for young plants and each year in May the young plants would be put into prepared holes at least one month in advance to allow the soil to be aerated. The planting of young coffee trees required a lot of work and care, and it was necessary to survey their progress. In general, everything grew well in the rich soil of our plantation, but it was just as possible that a more robust tree would replace a vegetating plant.

Two times a year, the Montagnards would weed the whole plantation. This work would be done bit by bit, and then the price would be discussed according to the number of trees to be cleaned and the height of the plants. It is necessary for me to say that in periods of monsoons one saw vegetation grow right before one's eyes and I experimented with banana trees. We had many fruit trees: orange and mandrian trees of many species and banana trees with many different types of bananas. There were avocado trees, mango trees, persimmon trees of many species; one of which, a royal persimmon tree, had a little stem of green leaves. The jacquiers could be eaten as vegetables. There were jacquiers with wet fruit and jacquiers with dry fruit. I liked this fruit enormously and the Montagnards, knowing this, asked me if they could pick these fruits. They would come and together we would enjoy this delicious fruit. There were papaya trees, lychee trees of very different kinds; also juicy limes and durians, fruits well liked by the Chinese. This fruit smells very bad, and it is necessary to hold one's nose before eating it. I never succeeded in being able to endure that odor and because of this, I deprived myself of a very delicious fruit. If you have a durian or ducian (the two words are interchangeable) in the house, it is impossible to sleep because the smell takes your breath away. The Chinese buy these fruits at the price of gold. There were longanes, kola nuts very prized by the Sengalese, and areca-nuts, which are used to prepare betel with the coca leaves we also had. We had superb mango trees, but alas, they did not bear any fruit.

Felix succeeded in growing a pepper plant. This little plant is a type of parasite since it needs support for life and bearing of its fruit. The pepper is gathered in red grains and comes in two forms, white pepper and black pepper, the better of the two being white. The majority of tea plants served our own purposes; we sold very little of it. My father-in-law had succeeded in acclimating prune trees. The fruits were sold green because the Vietnamese would like to eat them in this fashion with salt and nuoc-mam (briny fish). We used to sell mandrian and oranges by the piece and there were an enormous amount, but one of every two years of harvest was even more abundant. While descending towards the streams where we used to get our water, there were superb mandrian trees. Our children, accompanied by the Montagnard children, would amuse themselves the moment harvest came by picking the green fruits to include oranges. Seven per cent of these fruits were truly delicious and gave a lot of juice. We also had large fruit trees called "abrasins" which bore nuts that were sold to make oil. We did not sell these nuts often because the people were not interested in these fruits. This was very unfortunate for us.

In thinking about this tour of the fruit trees, I forget undoubtedly about how the red soil was so rich that everything could grow. The French and Japanese species of plants and trees, introduced into the country by my father-in-law, were observed in his experimental garden at Land Tram. The President of the Republic, Ngo Dinh Diem, came to visit this garden in July 1959. That day, I had in my hand a notebook containing all the species and the observations made by my father-in-law. This manuscript was sent to the Museum of Natural History of Paris.

Our copy was lost at Khe Sanh at the time of the offensive in 1968. I regret this because in it were numerous species of trees listed along with useful observations. The museum did not want to entrust me with a copy with which I could make another copy. It's a shame that the manual could not have been printed or published!

During my pregnancy, I saw a gynecologist twice since I spent nearly all of my time at the plantation. I gave myself urine analysis, and everything went as well as could be. I continued to work on the crop harvest without further problems. The plantation and the harvest continued at its rhythm; the maintenance was taken care of as usual. I had begun to look after the Montagnards and to manage things well. In addition to that, I had also begun to learn from their children, using hand signs, how to speak their language. I wrote, as I understood them.

But in July, I was expecting once again a second child, which was very comforting. That year, on September 16, 1962 we had a very violent typhoon. This date is carved in my memory because I had never before seen such a destructive typhoon. Our house survived the storm, but all the roads to the plantation were cut off as the trees lay across them. We had to disentangle them, all which was an enormous job. In Khe Sanh, my father-in-law's house no longer had a roof and the rain and wind came in everywhere. But in these tropical regions, one is used to such violence in nature and quickly restores whatever is damaged or destroyed. That is what happened and life went on.

However, it was decided for my safety that I should wait to give birth in my stepfather's house at Hue. The workers came to arrange things. The gynecologist gave me shots to take every day during the first five months. Then it was blood tests every month because Felix and I had different RH factors. We had discovered an abnormality only thirteen days before the birth of Francoise. One took blood samples from me just for precaution.

This worried us a little because doctors in Vietnam were not properly equipped. Since we were so concerned, they gave me four tests instead of three to reassure us at the blood bank in Hue. Felix then started to come each weekend, generally from Saturday afternoon at noon to Monday morning. Thus, in this way, he spent the weekend with us. I had with me the wife of our cook and my little sister-in-law, Pierrette, to keep me company. Without any abnormality, we were overjoyed to have a very big boy weighing 5 kilos (11 lbs), Jean-Marie. I quickly returned from the clinic to stay a few days at Hue and to prepare for our return to the plantation. I nursed my two children for only a few weeks as I did have milk, but it was not substantial, so they had to have their bottles.

It was at this time that the attack (supposedly by the Vietnamese) against the Buddhists took place following false rumors that they shot into a crowd gathered to celebrate the feast of Buddha. This caused a big commotion in Hue and in other cities. In Saigon, there were a few Buddhist monks who burned themselves in the public squares to show that the Catholics (represented by the President of the Republic and by his brothers) persecuted them. One of the brothers of President Diem was Archbishop of Hue. Someone spread a rumor that he had buried Buddhists alive in his garden. People were actually gullible enough to believe these tales and went there to see if it was true. This, for a very long time, made life in Vietnam very disturbing and annoying.

Afterwards, they discovered that among the Buddhist monks, there were parties of Viet Cong hidden under the orange tunic. In this way, they could be informed of everything that happened in the southern part of the country. We had returned quickly to the plantation to flee from these fanatics who became dangerous. Public opinion quickly becomes crazy with such storytellers. Once at our land at Cu-Bach (such was the name of the plantation), we were very peaceful and far from this turmoil. The harvest of the Chari had begun, and there was plenty of work to be done. Pierrette came to the house to help me, since I was still tired after giving birth to a big baby.

We took in a young girl who helped us as well to replace our cook's wife who felt too old. Life returned to normal at the plantation. Many friends came to visit and experience a little coolness, especially during school vacation. We also had friends who came up to hunt deer, tigers, and also the wild boar, which had caused a lot of havoc when it had gone into a section of coffee trees. It was worse than a tractor. There was also hunting for wild rooster and pheasant usually toward the end of the day. I would drive and my husband would be next to me, ready to shoot if he saw a rooster or a pheasant. In order to hunt at night, it was necessary to trace the animal's tracks before setting out on an expedition. A person would hold a light out at front and others would follow quietly behind the one who held the rifle. I went hunting at night once when Felix killed a civet cat. It made me so sick to my stomach to see it in its last throes of life.

But for us, however, hunting deer was a necessity if we wanted to have fresh meat. Furthermore, the deer spoiled the coffee trees. When scratched between the deer's two horns, the tree could decay and it was necessary to remedy this. It also gave Felix pleasure, as he loved hunting although he never abused it. If he killed one animal, he returned, as that was sufficient. The workers who went with him were happy, since for them there was also meat to garnish their meal consisting of rice, herbs, local vegetables, pimento, shrimp paste, and nuoc-mam, if they could get it. One must not forget while they were alone on the plantation that they had a family to feed in the plain.

I felt that I was rewarded, since if I liked these native people they would welcome me. This contributed a lot to my adapting. There was so much to do for these Montagnards who were so poor and lived in such backwards conditions, they didn't even realize it.

I spoke a lot with the women when it was possible for me to maintain a conversation. They were very natural with me and I with them. They spoke to me freely about their problems. I knew about their life and that became even truer gradually through the time I lived on the plantation. The principal problem of the women was to not have too many children and also how to take care of them. This was easy for me to explain to them after the birth of my daughter, Francolse. From the time of her birth, the women made a habit of saying "before Francoise or after Francoise." I wound up knowing the ages of the children from Ta-Con, the oldest and closest village to our plantation.

I continued my learning of the language. I also had a Montagnard named "Counta" who spoke French. He once jumped on a mine at Lao Bao during the time the French were there and had his leg cut off. My mother-in-law always took care of him at the hospital, and he was always grateful to us. He walked on crutches that we had made for him at Hue. He came in each day to help me write and speak "Bur." which was very helpful to me and in this way I progressed faster. I must admit that I was very attracted to these primitive people who were so very close to us. This influenced my desire to stay at the plantation. I felt that we could help them so much in every way.

In 1961, we returned to France. Francoise wasn't two years old yet. The plantation was once again put in the hands of Father Corentin and also of our overseer Anh Thu, who was very informed. With the help of Father, we were able to take two months vacation in France near the family. We planned on staying until Christmas, but we were called because Father had to go to the monastery at Hue to meet with Father Superior of the Benedictines. When we left, saying good-bye was painful for all of us.

Upon our return, we had found everything in perfect condition. It is true that we had as well a Vietnamese cook who spoke French and knew how to do French cooking. We also took in his wife as a thi ba for Francoise. With the work on the plantation, harvesting and the counting, etc., I found myself pretty busy and it was necessary to have someone to look after Francoise when the two of us were occupied.

At the beginning of 1962, I had a miscarriage, and not knowing what had caused it, I became very depressed. I returned to the plantation somewhat distressed and had trouble recovering. End of 1961. I omitted telling of one of Felix's successful hunting expeditions. The Montagnards of Ta-Con had had a young buffalo that a tiger had gotten. They came to ask Felix to help them to attract the tiger towards the spot where he was going to set the trap. It was an accessible place (and tigers like clean places) where he set up the infamous trap.

All this was an art. It was necessary to dig a hole and cover it with bush as nothing was there, since the tiger is a mistrustful animal. Near the trap, meat was half hidden. The night went by and then very early in the morning the workers told us that they had heard a roaring, the tiger must have gotten caught. Felix, accompanied by the workers, left with his rifle and indeed, the beast was there, her paw caught in the trap. She was struggling to try to free herself as it hurt her so. That is when one must have courage and know how to shoot at the right moment. There's no question of misfiring and that would be rather unfortunate. But Felix was a fine marksman, and he killed the tiger. Then, he sent the workers to find me so that I could bring the camera and take pictures right there on the spot in the middle of the bush. Then, it was the triumphant return with a very beautiful animal. He left the trap there, however, well camouflaged. Once again, two days later, a second animal was caught. That occurred between December 19th and December 21st, 1961. Felix was very happy with this ending as two beautiful animals were captured. We were going to eat them, of course! It's not bad at all when it's well prepared.

Now I'm going to speak a little about the events on the outside of the plantation — actually, the war that was there. At the former French fort, there were at first seven American advisors who settled in there, without any well-defined mission except to observe what was happening in the region, which had been so calm. They put the fort back in shape after it had been abandoned for so long, so they would be able to live a little better rather than in tents. It was in February 1964 that an event occurred on Route 9. A French pharmacist from Dong Ha, a Mr. Wolff, was coming to visit Mr. Llinares who had been ill. Going down with his car, he was killed. One had taken him for an American, we thought. There also had previously been the discovery of a network of Viet Cong in the village situated near Mr. Llinares's fields (at the edge of the river Rao-Quan in a sort of deep ravine). Following this discovery, the Vietnamese authorities decided to regroup Montagnard villages that were inaccessible to the road into places where the jeeps could have access. At that time, a lot of Bru went over to the VC, several thousand, no doubt.

However, we weren't worried despite the death of our friend Mr. Wolff. A little while later, I went down with Father Poncet to have our car repaired. Everything went well, and we came back on Friday. Felix had to go down as far as Quang-Tri and returned without being worried. But on Monday, April 20, 1964, while we were going to the market as we did each day, we stopped at my father-in-law's at noon. His wife told us that he had left for Quang-Tri that very morning. She was worried following the death of the pharmacist. Felix reassured her by telling her that we just came down and went back up, first him and then me. He hadn't even finished his sentence when a Vietnamese soldier we knew well, rushed in and told us screaming. In Vietnamese, "Mr. Poilane is dead. He had been killed by the VC in his car." We were stunned and very strained by this news.

My husband brought me back to the plantation and asked Father Poncet to accompany him. He also asked for the presence of the Americans who were at the fort. They accepted and thus left under safe escort. I had said to Father Poncet, "Come to get me if my father-in-law is disfigured." We didn't know what we were going to find, alas.

While waiting, I took the hundred steps on the trail, and the Montagnards, seeing my sorrowful demeanor, asked me what was wrong. I explained, then, without having a lot of details. I waited more than two hours before Father Poncet came back to get me. Then, he told me, "You can come. He had been killed in his car by three deadly bullets close to his heart." The Viet Cong had thrown a grenade in the motor of the car. The body had thus been brought under good escort, one never knew. The car stayed in place, one serviced the hauling later.

It was then a Monday, the day of departure to the province of Quang-Tri's chief administrative office of Khe Sanh, and it's the first car that had been pulled, the soldiers in ambush didn't know who was going to come (ED. I believe that Madame Poilane is trying to say that the VC were waiting to ambush Quang-Tri's administrative chief but her father-in-law rode into the ambush site and was killed instead.)

I was going then to my father-in-law's house there in Khe Sanh accompanied by Father Poncet. I was helping my husband to groom his father. We put him in the kitchen and began. The coffin was ordered, a big one made of good, exotic wood not at all eaten by termites. We then decided to bury him close to his sister on the plantation and close to the house. The children at Hue were expectedly angry and were arriving just at the moment of burial. He was buried with Buddhist rights. We hadn't kept the body two days and already there were little lines in the wounds from the gunshots — it was completely hot already! We got together with the Fathers at our plantation — Father Lefas, Father Petijean, Father Neyroud and Father Vincent, not to forget Father Corentin and Father Poncet.

Papa was 76 years old and he had to go get himself killed on the road just as he had regained his health, and his coronary thrombosis was cured. This experience we did not understand. Why would he be killed when he was known and liked by all? This ambush wasn't for him, but it is he who had been a victim unfortunately. The Fathers left for Hue, and life renewed at our home. The harvest didn't leave us any leisure, which was good.

After this discovery of the network of Viet Cong, the Americans did not stay at the fort. They asked us if they could occupy a small piece of land used by the French for aviation. This land was found at the end of the track at the boundary of our plantation and Papa's. We accepted, of course, and an air base was built starting there. Then, this land was expanded to about 30 hectares. The situation began deteriorating. The bridges on Route 9 began to get destroyed, and we could not travel this way anymore. It was a hard blow to the planters. How to sell the coffee and supply ourselves with rice and other products necessary to life in the bush. The Americans were equipped during this time and began to construct a lot on this base, which was a strategic point for them not far from the Ho Chi Minh Trail. This was hardly reassuring to us; we were thinking that with this installation we would have an inevitable less calm life at Khe Sanh and at the plantation.

One time Felix descended to Hue, and during this time I felt cold and I realized I had a strong ear infection. Impossible to find a Vietnamese nurse, Father Poncet was staying at the house doing everything possible to find who could take care of me. It was about 4pm when he succeeded at finding the American nurse. The latter spoke French and that made it easier. He gave me an injection of a sedative so that I would not suffer and gave me medicine for the ear infection. At the same time, Jean Marie was also sick with diarrhea. Felix returned in the evening and immediately left to ask if a helicopter could take us to Hue. The captain accepted, and at 8pm that evening we landed in Hue. I liked the helicopter as our means of transportation; it was very nice and practical.

In Hue, I saw the doctor and found out that the eardrum of my left ear had ruptured and that I would remain deaf for many months. As for Jean Marie, we tried many X-rays and types of examinations, but we didn't find out what he had. I still felt his burning forehead against mine. It all finally ended when we found out he had tonsillitis and his health improved. He was 16-months-old, and he started to walk. That set him back a bit.

We stayed in Hue to recover ourselves and then returned to the plantation. The weather was very bad since a typhoon had come from the Philippines. A little eight-seat plane took us in its care. There was an American on board who took us back to the base along with our little dog Thai Dong. I had never been so afraid in my life. The plane dropped in air pockets. It was frightening and all of us were vomiting tripe. Felix and Jean Marie were stoic. The pilot shocked us when he told us he had plugged up the plane with rags; we were hysterical! But the most upsetting thing was that the plane could not cross the mountain despite several tries, and it turned back. We found ourselves again in Hue in a very sorry state. The Vietnamese soldiers seeing us like this took a jeep and brought us back to the Joan of Arc School. There, with a cup of boiling tea, my spirits lifted and I fell asleep.

It became important, however, to think of returning. The next day, Father Neyroud accompanied by Father Suval, took us by car. The weather didn't permit us to think once again of a plane. The route for going to Quang Tri and Dong Ha didn't present any difficulties. It was on Route 9 that a bridge had collapsed. We knew that it was not possible to pass and on the other side there waited a 1,400 kilo Renault that would take us to Khe Sanh. Having arrived at the spot of a blown up bridge we were terrified. It was necessary to descend into the deep ravine (there was water) and remount on the other side. Oh, with the children and baggage it was expected that we would make a lot of trips and in what conditions! With the help of the two priests, we crossed all the same and found a truck awaiting us. It was already quite full, but we got inside and fit rather well. My knees were folded because there were bags of rice on the floor.

We started moving, and I noticed a lady who remained on the stepladder. It was, in my opinion, a sign of gratitude for the V.C. for they were at least letting civilians pass with supplies. One had to make concessions. At KM 51, everyone got in the trailer as the danger zone had passed. It is necessary to explain that on Route 9 the places were distinguished by the number of KM, thus the plantation was at KM 51.

These are little details, but they had their importance in the mountains where it was easy to be attacked at will.

The return was not a burden — a bit tiring, but we were lucky and happy to be back at the plantation, and all was quickly forgotten. Father Petitjean was waiting for us, and this was a great surprise. He had come before the typhoon and, with luck, had made it. He had gone to spend a few weeks in the cool weather, and it was always a pleasure to find our friends again in the bush. If one does not know, he can imagine how lonely it is to live alone in the wilderness. The Marines who had known the base and also our plantation were happy to see a house of blond-haired children. It reminded them of their home far away in the USA. How many visitors we would have from the Marines, from soldiers to the Captains and Colonels.

One day, we had a visit from a four star general, who I believe came directly from the U.S. He stopped at our house simply to get the news. We had, at that time, problems with the leaves falling from the trees, caused by the wind sent from Laos. None of our durian trees that were more than twenty-five years old produced any longer, having lost all their leaves and their fruit. That made so much damage on the plantation that the trees looked funny. Upon leaving, he said goodbye to us and tapping on Felix's shoulder, said to his men, "Attention, when you go to Laos, be careful of the wind when you throw defoliation products." That is a true story!

Following this defoliation, we filed a damage claim at Quang Tri Province. We never received anything in return. We found out that the Americans had given aid, but the Vietnamese had to keep these subsidies for their side. These products had to be pretty toxic to have been able to kill trees like the durians, which are very strong. We surveyed the rest of the plantation because there were some coffee trees coming up. They were able to resist, or else we'd have replaced them, so the native population remained untouched by the consequences of this defoliation. Often, we used to see the planes go by that were going toward Laos. They were, of course, to defoliate the places that were too dense and also to always survey the territory of this cursed war.

For us, life continued to be pretty calm, but we were at present cut off from everything. The bridges on Route 9 had tumbled. That was, for us, a big handicap because it was necessary to live on the plantation. The Marine Base expanded itself, and the planes were landing on the runway that was lengthened for the circumstances. Felix spoke English well and continued to perfect it. It was necessary for our subsequent relationship with the Marines. They occupied our land and were kind enough to assure us of their help for all that we would need. And we were going to need their assistance to sell the coffee that formerly would have been sold on the premises and bought by merchants, who would come up with their trucks. The Marines then put themselves at our disposal when it was an absolute necessity for us to have planes to carry several tons of coffee to Dong Ha, Hue, or even Danang. In return, we were able to bring up rice and as many provisions as they needed. With our planter friends, we grouped ourselves together to avoid too many requests of our neighbors. A plane just for us, that was already too kind. In order to go down to Hue, it was the same thing — planes or helicopters took us in their charge. From that time, I didn't have to go down to Hue more than once a year. It was a little hard for us all. However, our friends were able to come up to see us and to say thanks to the kindness of the Americans and their planes. They never refused to be of service to us which was vital for us all at Khe Sanh.

The time passed despite the impossibility of going by our own means to Hue or elsewhere. The harvest was done as in the past and the coffee sold well. It was necessary only to leave with the plane to accompany the coffee and sell it oneself on the spot. The same for the supplies — there was an airplane for us alone and for our planter friends. It was necessary to ask, but we did not suffer too much. Everyone had to leave their coffee in the same way and bring back the provisions for everyone. Even Father Poncet acted in the same manner and brought back provisions as well for everybody. In the meantime, Father Mauvais had come to join him to help him in the apostleship. The coming of the nuns in the beginning of the year 1967 was not delayed for that, as one didn't know how long one could last and each got accustomed to it. The Vietnamese saw there a free means of bringing up the merchandise to Khe Sanh, and this side of things would please them well enough.

Our friends continued to come to spend their vacations and to visit us. I omitted to speak of the visit of a French friend who came to spend two months with us on the plantation. This was a friend from the region of Tours where I am from. She was a nurse who brought back from each trip a very profound and lasting memory. We write each other still to this day when I'm writing these lines.

I resume then with the nuns of St. Paul of Chartres moving in. There were four. The mother superior was a French woman whom we liked a lot, and Sister Paul Xavier had already been in Vietnam for a very long time. She lived very close to the house that the Fathers had constructed facing the village of Cu-Bach. We had given them some land on the plantation, one hectare or more. The house was strong, that is to say concrete blocks and a roof of corrugated iron. There were two bedrooms, a little shower — very rudimentary — fed through a big pond, and a little kitchen.

For the nuns, it was a house on piles that was constructed with wooden walls and an iron roof. Four big rooms, one for cooking and another that would serve as the chapel and the oratory. The Fathers said the mass every week in the little oratory and on Sunday in Khe Sanh for the Catholic population. The work of the Fathers and the nuns was to take care of the Montagnards. It was necessary to explain to the latter why the nuns were dressed with their habit and the veil, and finally their kind way of life. The Montagnards were dumbfounded while listening to us.

The nuns after having settled in already began to take care of them. There was much to do on this side. When they went into the village, I used to go up with them, as there was the language to learn. During this time, our two fathers did not remain inactive. They laid out the land of the plantation — the old abandoned pastures, a big school with a residence for the girls and boys of surrounding villages, a big kitchen and other necessary buildings, if one seriously wanted to take care of these people and to try to do a good, apostolic job.

Before the nuns arrived, Felix had built a large hut in front of our house so that I could have class with the children, and also with the Montagnard children who wanted to attend. I taught them "Bru" and also French. We had with us for about a year a little "Bru" girl named Tiou who lived totally with us. We treated her like our two children. She was five or six years old. A boy, named Plengue, was also with us. He was around twelve. He didn't want to have his meals with us but instead, he ate with the staff in the kitchen. He helped me by watching the children while I measured the coffee. I taught him how to clean house well, how to clean the bricks, how to wipe the furniture, and I might say that he turned out to be very skillful. Several times we took him to Hue. His eyes opened wide, he who left the bushes of his village!

To lay out my school, the Marines brought ammunition boxes to us that our workers had quickly transformed into benches and tables to furnish the school. We also found a dark green blackboard and a large desk for me made out of the same materials. To complete the furnishings there were notebooks, pencils,and chalk. Thus equipped, I was able to have class every morning. I had a correspondence course from Paris for Francoise. She would study seriously, and the other students profited from this teaching in addition to their "Bru." This gave me a chance to learn new words with the correct pronunciation. I taught them the rudiments of catechism in order to prepare them for the nuns and priests who would soon take over.

Next issue the Marines arrive, and the Hill Battles soon commence.

Out of the womb of the Pentagon — WE NEVER QUIT. NOT THEN. NOT NOW.

Honoring Our Beloved Corpsmen, Medics, Doctors, and A.E.T.'s

"The noblest fate that a man can endure is to place his own mortal body between his loved home and the war's desolation." — Khe Sanh Vet

Our Corpsman

Our corpsman is going home today, He came through our aid station. We carried him slow, our heads bowed low, For ours is a lost sensation.

The burial bag he is wrapped in, it's dark, it's damp, it's cold. He's not a hero, just a Doc, but his story must be told.

He came to this land months ago, His determination strong, to treat the wounded Leathernecks that fight the Vietcong.

His only job was to treat the wounds. His mission to save a life. His tools weren't the tools of death, the bomb, the gun, or knife.

A mission of mercy they called it, this sailor in camouflaged greens. No hospital ship or dispensary, just sharing a hell with Marines.

Some complained of climbing mountains, they're commonly seen in this land. Where the life or death of a comrade Is the fate often held in his hands.

But fate is not always there with them, this corpsman, his future denied. Over a wounded Marine he was treating, on the soil of Vietnam he died.

Yes, he came to our place today, Tonight he's crossing the foam. Beyond the call, he gave his all, Our corpsman is going home.

Closure

Dale E. Crick
Killed in Action February 11,1969

Saw your name on TV awhile ago
what a surprise don't you know.

You were young and so was I the night you fell with a sigh.

Twenty-eight years of nightly dreams and silent screams.

Now your name on TV has helped to end my insanity.

One less nightly dream
One less silent scream.

Just peace in mind and soul that can come from closure to a tragedy that happened so very long ago.

By this time, every one should have received their new membership cards. Life members should have also received a new certificate. If any one did not receive their card or I have made an error, let me know and I will make corrections. The new Membership Directories should have been received by those who paid in advance. Again, if I missed you, let me know. The Directories for the rest of the Membership will soon be ready. I print and put them together myself; thus, it is not a fast process and should take me approximately one month. Your Newsletter also contains Raffle Tickets and Registration forms for the Reunion. Please submit them ASAP, so "Jimbo" can get an estimate of the turnout. Also included are color brochures for Khe Sanh Items, such as Jewelry, Belt Buckles, Pins, Hats, Patches etc., designed by one of our members for all the service branches. He is donating a portion of the profits to the KSV. There has also been an interest in a KSV Ring and Membership Pin, in addition to an official patch — we also need your ideas on this.

Book Reviews

We must support all the Brothers that put pen in hand, that pour their very soul into memorializing those with whom we served, that leave a part of themselves on each written page and, in the final analysis, become "SPEAKERS FOR OUR DEAD!"

1. "PETRIFIED HEART"
by Charles "Chuck" Patterson

John Kaheny wrote: "Charles Patterson, an LA attorney and member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, has published a book of poems based on his Vietnam experience. It is available on Amazon.com. The title is ' PETRIFIED HEART.' I recommend it highly, especially to those who know and love Marines." S/F John Kaheny

Kenny Pipes Wrote: "'PETRIFIED HEART' is the title of a just published book that I strongly recommend be added to your Khe Sanh collection! It is Vietnam poetry at its absolute best! As an added bonus, it is written by one of our own, Chuck Patterson. It is not exclusively about Khe Sanh. It covers a variety of people, places and subjects and tells a powerful poet's story of experiences that will be familiar and deeply moving to all of our members and to the public at large!

"This is a powerful book that drives to your heart. It ranks up there with Ernie's book, 'Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man' and the other classics that have been penned in honor of those that served with us."

"PETRIFIED HEART" can be ordered from the Amazon website by special order, from all major book stores, or directly from: Signal Tree Publications, PO Box 551, Livermore Maine, 04253. Buy it, and read it in a quiet place, and remember! It is an absolute bargain at $15.00.

2. "GOD IN THE TRENCHES"
by Lakin Spivey

In "GOD IN THE TRENCHES," Spivey shows when the nation's survival seemed uncertain — even doubtful — Fate seemed to turn America's way, giving way to mysterious, if not miraculous, events. These events altered the course of history, leading to victory for the American Military and enduring freedom for America's citizens. In his book, Spivey leaves no doubt that the History of the United States was swayed many times by a hidden hand. Will the hand of providence help America once again?

"GOD IN THE TRENCHES" can be ordered from Allegiance Press or from blspivey@aol.com.

The Other Side

The people enter the walkway
It doesn't seem like much at the beginning
Small panels, a few names.

They continue to walk past even larger Panels more names, then past the "V"
More names, too many names...

Some stop to make a rubbing of a father a Husband, a Son, a Brother, a Sister, a friend, or a comrade, all who made the Ultimate Sacrifice.

Then they move on up the hill and
out the other side.

Some stop, they cry, they wonder why then they too move on up the hill and
out the other side.

Some stop, touch a name, feel the cold
Granite; then they too move on up the hill and out the other side.

As they reach the top of the hill they turn and gaze back at the "Wall" they are amazed at the courage of, and the ultimate sacrifice made by so many "Heroes."

As they turn and move out the other side they are saddened because they know these brave souls will never move on up the hill and out the other side.

Does anyone know my dad?
USMC GySgt. Fabyunkey retired.

I am Linda Fabyunkey Gubbels. My father and my hero served in Khe Sanh. I don't know any definitive information about anyone he served with. I do know that Daddy did two tours in Vietnam. His first tour was around 1965 & his 2nd tour was around 1968. Daddy passed five years ago and I am finding myself needing to understand a part of his life that he chose not to share with us. He just wouldn't talk about war.

Thank you for any information you may have.

Hi guys,

I have some information on my Dad's service in Vietnam. He (on his first tour) was with G Co, 2nd BN, 3rd Marines. Then on his 2nd tour, in which he was at Khe Sanh, all I know is that he was with the 26th Marines. I am trying to get hold of my mom to find out anything else but as of right now...this is all I have.

Thank you for your time.

Linda Fabyunkey Gubbels

Don't forget the former Echo Company Commander who took over for Captain Breeding; 1/Lt. Joe Meeks. 1/Lt Meeks was a Staff NCO when he was commissioned during the war. Prior to taking command of Echo Company, he was the 81MM Mortars Platoon Commander. Mr. Meeks is now retired and living in Wisconsin. He's in the Address Book. Since he was a Staff NCO and came to Echo Company in March from 81s, there is an excellent chance that he knew Gunny Fab.

(Reply by Linda)

I want you guys to know that I am prouder than ever to be the daughter of a Marine. The bond that you all have is based on a brotherhood, an indescribable degree of integrity. I am really blessed to have been raised by a person that was part of this.

Linda

P.S. Eric, that is funny that you remember Dad's moustache the most. People always commented on that moustache of his.

From one Marine brat to another

Hi Linda,

If you can attend this coming year's KSV reunion, you'll learn more and feel more than ever before. Over the last four years (three reunions 'cause I missed San Diego) I have had the honor of meeting the HIGHEST quality of Americans. These men, who routinely defer their own importance to their fallen brethren, are in fact the ones who fought, conquered, struggled and most of all, remembered. It is up to us and the children of this organization to perpetuate the remembrance. Hope to see you in Las Colinas.

Truro, MA Khe Sanh vet

Looking for Khe Sanh vet who lives in Truro, MA who I met at St. Louis or DC Reunion. He was in artillery attached to HQTS. I live in Truro now and would like to find him and say hello.

J Delaire

Mike,

I am forwarding this message to the vet you met at the Reunion. He has limited access to the net through a friend, and he wanted me to post this message to find you. He lives in Truro.

J Delaire

Truro, that can't be a real name of a town. I know there is a Soddy Daisy in Tennessee, but come on, Truro? How do you pronounce the name?

Bigfoot Marine

Hey Bigfoot,

How in the world do you know about Soddy Daisy? I was in boot camp with a guy from there in Jan 67. Can't remember his name, but what a character. He got chewed out for looking at the sea gulls while in formation, and he told the DI that he thought they were some kind of white ducks. Said he never wore fancy boots like these in his whole life. Don't know what ever happened to him, hope he made it through the war and returned to his beloved mountain home.

Wayne Shumaker

Hi Tom,

I am looking to hear from anyone who was at the Khe Sanh combat base on February 23rd, when we received the most incoming rounds for a single day. I believe they also hit one of our ammo dumps. My name is John Laibinis. When the incoming started, I jumped feet first into a nearby bunker near our C.P. area. That would have been Hotel Co. 2/26. I ripped my left knee on the steel mat that was the roof of the bunker covered with sandbags. I caught my knee on one of the interlocking hooks. If anyone remembers it, I would appreciate your contacting me. There were about 10 or 12 of us in the bunker. A 2nd Lt. came crawling in between 1700 and 1800 hrs to ask for volunteers to go out on the lines that night. He wound up volunteering about 6 men. They had to crawl when there were no community trenches because of all the incoming artillery and our own dump going off. My name, address, and e-mail are in the last directory. Thanks to anyone who can help. Semper Fi!

John A. Laibinis, Sr.

Day is done,
Gone the sun,
From the lakes,
From the hills,
From the sky,
All is well,
Safely rest,
God is nigh.

Fading light,
Dims the sight,
And a star gems the sky,
From afar,
Drawing near,
Falls the night.

Thanks and praise,
For our days,
'Neath the sun,
'Neath the stars,
'Neath the sky,
As we go,
This we know,
God is nigh

MAY YOU REST IN PERFECT PEACE AND HONOR

Veteran?

Some veterans bear visible signs of their service: a missing limb, a jagged scar, a certain look in the eye. Others may carry the evidence inside them, a pin holding a bone together or a piece of shrapnel in the leg.

Or perhaps another sort of inner steel: the soul's ally forged in the refinery of adversity. Except in parades, however, the men and women who have kept America safe wear no badge or emblem. You can't tell a vet just by looking.

What is a vet?

He is the cop on the beat who spent six months in Saudi Arabia sweating two gallons a day making sure the armored personnel carriers didn't run out of fuel. He is the barroom loudmouth, dumber than five wooden planks, whose overgrown frat-boy behavior is outweighed a hundred times in the cosmic scales by four hours of exquisite bravery near the 38th parallel.

She is the nurse who fought against futility and went to sleep sobbing every night for two solid years in Da Nang.

He is the POW who went away one person, and came back another — or didn't come back AT ALL.

He is the Quantico drill instructor that has never seen combat but has saved countless lives by turning slouchy, no-account rednecks and gang members into Marines, and teaching them to watch each other's backs.

He is the parade-riding Legionnaire who pins on his ribbons and medals with a prosthetic hand.

He is the career quartermaster who watches the ribbons and medals pass him by.

He is the three, anonymous heroes in The Tomb Of The Unknowns whose presence at the Arlington National Cemetery must forever preserve the memory of all the anonymous heroes whose valor dies with them, unrecognized, on the battlefield or in the ocean's sunless deep.

He is the old guy bagging groceries at the supermarket, palsied now and aggravatingly slow, who helped liberate a Nazi death camp and who wishes all day long that his wife were still alive to hold him when the nightmares come.

He is an ordinary and yet an extraordinary human being. A person who offered some of his life's most vital years in the service of his country, and who sacrificed his ambitions so others would not have to sacrifice theirs.

So remember, each time you see someone who has served our country, just lean over and say, "Thank You." That's all most people need and in most cases, it will mean more than any medals they could have been awarded or were awarded.

Two little words that mean a lot, "THANK YOU."

A Presidential Unit Ctation is Awarded to:

Third Battalion, Ninth Marine Regiment, Third Marine Division

For Service set forth in the following:

For meritorious service in connection with operations against North Vietnamese Armed Forces from 17 June 1968 to 6 July 1968 in the Republic of Vietnam. On 17 June 1968 the Third Battalion, Ninth Marines, commenced Operation Charlie. The assigned mission for the Third Battalion was to provide a workforce for the destruction of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, serve as the First Marines Regimental Reserve, and provide a reactionary force during the hours of darkness (one company on 30-minute standby and one company on one-hour alert). The task of dismantling the Khe Sanh Combat Base was arduous, and although a difficult and strange assignment for an infantry battalion trained for offensive combat, the Third Battalion undertook the mission with aggressiveness, zeal, and enthusiasm. The destruction work was extremely difficult and much of it had to be accomplished by manual labor. Bunkers were dismantled and destroyed; concertina and barbed wire collected and buried; and defensive positions destroyed. Salvaged materials were gathered, staged, and transported to Vandergrift Combat Base where items such as landing mats, steel posts, engineering stakes, and barbed wire were to be utilized to improve existing defensive positions. The heat and dust were extremely adverse, and constant mortar and artillery attacks by the enemy while the men of the Third Battalion were operating and working with bulldozers and trucks in the area made the assigned mission especially dangerous and hazardous. Large numbers of bunkers and materials were destroyed. The remains of numerous vehicles and airplanes were buried, and a ground police of the entire area was conducted. When completed, the Khe Sanh Combat Base resembled a natural and undisturbed piece of terrain. Through their indomitable spirit, intrepidity, and professionalism, the officers and men of the Third Battalion accomplished their mission in record time and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

For the Secretary of the Navy:

Commandant of the Marine Corps

Tom:

During the Siege at Khe Sanh, L/Cpl Clyde Phillips and another Marine whose name I do not recall and I were setting in mines near the Gray Sector. This area was the responsibility of B Co 1/26 and the 37Th ARVN Rangers, located near the garbage dump. The NVA opened up on us with a recoilless rifle. There was a tank sitting near where we were working. I began pointing towards a big tree where there was smoke emitting. The men in the tank understood what I was trying to tell them. They fired one round at the tree where I had pointed.

A patrol of ARVN Rangers went out and checked the immediate area and returned with a recoiless rifle. They later reported that there were also two dead NVA near the base of the tree.

I would really like to know the names of that tank crew who saved our lives that day. My parents were attending a function at a Police Recreation Center named Tankersville when they met a former Marine tanker who also related the same story. I would really like to meet him, so maybe you could print this in the next issue of Red Clay.

COMMENT: You got it, John. Good Luck.

Publishers Comments: Kenny Pipes, former C/O B Co 1/26, became aware within the last year, that members of VO-67 had been honored for their service in Vietnam. As had SOG, they had been sworn to secrecy and their missions had been classified SECRET. After reading the following published article in which their service at Khe Sanh was recognized, Kenny Pipes contacted members of VO-67 and thanked them for their efforts on our behalf. I have listed those exchanges of e-mails and published the article which appeared in the newspaper November 09, 2001. It is important to keep our organization and its goals alive, so that everyone is made aware of the sacrifices made at Khe Sanh.

No Longer a Ghost Squadron

The Untold Story of VO-67

by Mark Sauer, Staff Writer
San Diego Union Tribune
Printed November 9, 2001

Jim Koci tried to explain a Navy tradition known as tolling the bell, but his words foundered on the shoals of emotion. For a long, silent moment, the retired commander struggled to contain his tears.

Three decades and a half a world removed from Vietnam, Koci and most fliers from his Navy squadron still teeter between powerful feelings of pride and sorrow when they reflect on a mission once characterized by the words "top secret" and "suicidal." Another word, "closure," is often distained by stoic, aging warriors who have smelled the smoke and blood of combat. But closure is what members of Observation Squadron 67 will seek in a ceremony this month.

The crew of the San Diego-based destroyer Milius will present them with a bell engraved with the names of the 20 men from their squadron who died when their planes went down over Laos in 1968. Among those names will be the destroyer's namesake, Captain Paul Milius of Waterloo, Iowa, whose heroic efforts to keep his doomed plane airborne allowed seven of his men to parachute to a jungle rescue.

"We were a very close group. Because of the secrecy, it was like us against the world," said Koci, a pilot for one of the 12 crews of VO-67, a Ghost Squadron that officially did not exist. "I didn't think about what we did over there for 30 years. When the mission ended abruptly in 1968, we were scattered across the face of the earth and were told to never talk about it, not even to wives and family, and I didn't. But we were pretty successful. They said a lot of lives were saved because of us. It's time to talk about it."

They were submarine chasers, trained to fly low over the water's surface and drop sonar devices for tracking enemy submarines. They flew lumbering, old Lockheed Neptune P2Vs whose 76-foot long fuselage was fitted with thick steel and special target sights for this new secret mission. The men of what became Squadron VO-67 (the V stands for heavier than air and the O for observation) were abruptly ordered to North Island in 1967 at the height of the Vietnam War. They couldn't fathom their new mission. What's the Navy doing, the joke went, chasing Viet Cong subs in the Mekong River?

After a few months of training, they headed to a makeshift air base in Thailand. VO-67 would fly missions over the Ho Chi Minh Trail, that infamous jungle supply route that snaked through neutral Laos and on toward Saigon in the south. But the United States' official position was that no fighting was taking place in Laos. Because of the Pentagon's secret war there, VO-67 would remain a phantom. From December 1967 to July 1968, VO-67 crews drove their Neptunes down from a safe altitude toward the thick jungle canopy and "inserted" thousands of listening devices along the trail with remarkable accuracy.

One type of sensor burrowed into the moist ground, its antenna popped up and blended into the foliage; the other, resembling a spike, was designed to hang up and dangle in the trees, like a microphone on a boom. American planes circled high above the Ho Chi Minh Trail and listened. The sensors were sophisticated enough to pick up conversations and even footfalls. When enemy troops, trucks and convoys were detected, air strikes were called in. The idea, conceived by the Defense Secretary Robert McNamara, was to create an electronic barrier to the north-south flow of troops and war material. It was dubbed the McNamara Line.

But the Neptunes and their nine-man crews were sitting ducks for enemy anti-aircraft gunners. The fiercely defended trail was nicknamed Steel Tiger. The arriving Navy pilots told veteran Air Force pilots of small spotter planes that VO-67 expected to take losses as high as 60 to 75 percent. "We found it difficult to believe that anyone entering the war was pessimistic enough to expect losses of that magnitude," one Air Force pilot wrote in a recent memoir. "However, they told us their mission required them to fly their Neptunes over the most heavily defended targets at altitudes of less than 500 feet above the road. We then wondered why anyone was optimistic enough to expect that 25 to 40 percent of the Neptunes would survive."

For ten nerve-racking minutes at a time, the Neptunes (top speed 220 mph) cruised above the treetops in a straight line, "inserting sensors into the jungle. Then we'd open all four engines and go to the wall, zigzagging up and out of there," said Koci, 71, who spent 21 years in the Navy. It wasn't a pleasant ride for the guys in the back. The enemy fired round after round of .57mm and .37mm and anti-aircraft fire at the Neptunes. On January 11, 1967, a month after VO-67 began dropping sensors, one of the squadron's 12 planes went down; all nine aboard were killed. On Feb 17, it happened again and nine more airmen perished. Ten days later, Milius's plane sustained a devastating hit as it dropped sensors from an altitude of 5,000 feet. One crewman, John F. Hartzheim, died instantly. But Milius was able to keep the stricken aircraft aloft long enough for the remaining seven crewmembers to bail out. They were rescued: Hartzheim and Milius were declared missing and, a decade later, presumed killed in action.

Rescue teams in recent years have returned to Laos. In 1999, Hartzheim's remains were recovered and returned to his family. Last spring, rescue teams recovered human remains that DNA tests may show are crewmembers from the first VO-67 plane that crashed. No trace of Paul Milius has been discovered.

When the North Vietnamese launched the Tet Offensive and Siege of the U.S. Marine base at Khe Sanh, VO-67 was called into action. Several enemy divisions encircled thousands of Marines. Sensors dropped in the jungle around the Marine base identified enemy strongholds for air strikes and artillery. When the siege ended, the Khe Sanh base commander said without the sensors, his casualties would have doubled.

VO-67 was a stop-gap mission, however. Once fast and modern Air Force F-4D jets were refitted and ready to take over, they replaced the old Neptunes and the squadron was quickly disbanded. Along with new orders and redeployment came the stern warning to never talk about what went on in the skies over Laos. VO-67 had lost 25 percent of its aircraft and about 15 percent of the aircrew in the squadron.

Nobody seems to know why it took 30 years to declassify VO-67's mission. But an article in a magazine for Navy veterans several years ago cited rumors of its existence. Then an ad in a Veteran of Foreign Wars publication in 1998 searching for crew members garnered several responses. The mission had been declassified; the men were free to talk. "I answered that ad out of curiosity," said Gilbert N. Castenada of Chula Vista. Like the handful of other VO-67 crewmembers who settled in the San Diego area, Castenda said he followed orders and never spoke of the eavesdropping mission over Laos. He said it's helped him enormously to reconnect with his war buddies and attend two VO-67 reunions, the most recent in Reno.

"I didn't know where anybody was all of those years. I was completely on my own," Castenada said. "Bothered me we had to sneak back into the country and never tell family or friends what we did. For so many years, we had to keep this to ourselves. But you need to vent, you need to let it out."

The reunions have been cathartic for the 200 or so VO-67 members who attended. But nearly 60 squadron members have not been located, and the government hasn't been much help, said retired Navy Commander A.G. Alexander of Whitefish, Montana. Bureaucrats cite the Privacy Act, said Alexander, whose efforts were a key to reuniting VO-67. "I think that's just an excuse for them to sit on their rears. The basic problem is the government is so screwed up that nothing much works. Thank God for the Internet, or we'd never have found most of these guys." Alexander has made hundreds of phone calls and written scores of E-Mails and letters trying to track down VO-67 crewman. He said the squadron website www.vo-67.org, has been invaluable.

But reliving the war is not for everyone. Thomas Clark of Bonita hasn't made it to either VO-67 reunion. "I buried Vietnam after I got out of the service. I did that deliberately. But this effort to unite the squadron has brought a lot of it back," Clark said. Unlike many of his fellow fliers, Clark said the classified nature of the mission "kind of helped me. Vietnam was too painful. I lost some people I was close to. I tried hard not to get close to people over there because I knew if you lost that person, it would really hurt," said Clark, a gunner on Crew 6 who at age 34 in 1968 was among the oldest enlisted men in VO-67. "But you get close under those circumstances. You can't help it. Commander Alexander called me up one day, and we ended up crying."

Jim Koci said a few others they know of did not fare so well over the years, and they think it was due to their missions in Laos and the secrets they had to keep all these years. The old fliers of VO-67 have a bit of advice for Navy, Marine and Army commandos already deployed on secret missions in America's new war on terrorism. "I'd tell these guys that when they come back, when it's over, if they need to talk to somebody, do," Clark said. "But make sure it's somebody who truly understands what you've been through. Talk to someone who's been in combat. It took me a long time to realize how well I'd buried the whole thing."

PUBLISHERS NOTE: Clark, just make one reunion, believe me you will walk away a new man, with a whole different attitude.

Kenny, Thank You For Your Kind Words

A very good friend of mine was at Khe Sanh. His name is Louis DeMarco. He is in pretty bad shape right now due to seizures from a head injury he received there. He just moved from D.C. to Tennessee and is not back online yet. I will give him your address if you want. My son is an active duty Marine also stationed at MCAS Beaufort. He is towards the end of his second hitch. Used to be a weapons instructor at the Island for a couple years before Beaufort. Hasn't decided yet whether to stay in or not.

Ken & Group:

This is Dave Steffy — the VO-67 troop. I passed along your last messages to the rest of the squadron and a least one of them would like more info about your reunion in Texas. He will attend, if possible. We still can't get to the websites you mentioned. If one of you can send me the information on the reunion, I will pass it along to him.

Thanks,
Dave

It worked this time, great site. Did not have time to look at all of it right now but will later tonight. Las Colinas is not that far from Plano and is in the Dallas Metroplex area. If you guys want some of the guys from VO-67 to attend your reunion, I'm sure there would be several that would come. I know I would be honored to come and as it stands now, I could make it. Let me know what to do. By the way the VO-67 website is http://www.vo-67.org — there are other links to related sights such as the recovery of our crew 2, which is ongoing as we speak. Well, got to go as wife is calling, talk to you later.

Ken,

I spent a couple of hours yesterday at the Khe Sanh web site. I was moved. I was an air crewman in VO-67 and flew several missions over Khe Sanh. From the air, it looked more like the moon with all the bomb craters everywhere. Let me tell you that I have the utmost respect for those of you who were there. At least we got to go back to a safe base every night. As I said, I read a lot about the history of Khe Sanh and am especially moved by the heroism described in the taking and holding the various hills around the base. My hat's off to you!

Ken:

My name is George Hilkens. I served in VO-67. I used to work with a guy who was also at Khe Sanh during that time, named Mike Helvie. Do you remember him? Also, another member of our squadron (Dave Thompson) retired from the Chicago police force, I believe. Small world.

Ken:

I was the plane commander of Crew Six of VO-67. I will never forget, and neither will my crew, in my one and only flight over Khe Sanh. I left the squadron to go to Balboa for back surgery and ended up as having had a "silent" heart attack some time within the year. (The flight had nothing to do with it.) We came in from the west over the mountains, down into a valley north of Khe Sanh, made our run, went to full power, and followed the valley to the east. We couldn't climb over the mountains, turned south at the end, and like water shooting out of rain pipe, we were right on top of Khe Sanh. There was a group of Marines standing there, and I remember seeing one Marine in particular, standing by himself waving to us. I can see that just like it was yesterday. I have always wondered if anyone remembers that? Kerry Bignall was my 2nd. Mech. He is a member of your Association.

Ken and Thor,

Thank you for the info and kind words regarding VO-67. All of you on the ground at Khe Sanh were very special to us, and I can't begin to tell you of the satisfaction I felt upon reading your emails. The Marine Corps at Cherry Point, where I was a corpsman in '55-56, got me into Naval Cadets. I sincerely hope I was able to repay some of that debt at Khe Sanh. I was the plane commander/pilot of Crew 1, and still recall those Khe Sanh missions. I am confident that history will show how much we all owe to you Marines (and I hope you had some Navy Corpsman along) at Khe Sanh... A truly great job.

Ken,

My name is Lowell Shaw and I am a member of VO-67. I flew some (since I had aircrew wings), but was not assigned to an aircrew. I was what you guy would call a ground pounder with wings.

I tried your website, but it came back as not a good address. Could you update me on that? I live in Plano, Texas, a city just north of Dallas and I would consider it an honor to attend your reunion representing VO-67. I only have one problem. If it is outside of the Dallas/Fort Worth area, I would not be able to travel. I was laid off in August and still out of a job, so I could not afford to travel. But if the reunion is in the Dallas area, as I said, I would be honored to attend. By the way, I am a retired Chief Petty Officer (hope you don't hold that against me — just joking). I was a First Class Petty Officer when in VO-67 and worked on the aircraft electronic and electrical systems (as I said, flew sometimes but not as an aircrew member). I spent three tours in Vietnam, two with other Navy commands) and thanked the Lord that I got out all three times, uncut and unhurt. I have the Highest respect for any service person that went to Vietnam — especially the Marines. You guys did a hell of a job and didn't get half the credit you deserve. Kind of like VO-67.

Please let me know where the reunion is, because there are a few more Texans around in other cities that might be able to go.

Hope to hear from you,

A few years back, Dave Powell, a UPI photographer, sent me some pictures from his private collection. He was at the base and especially at Hill 881, where he took pictures of the guys and events that spent over 30 years in his closet. When the History Channel contacted me about doing a series on Khe Sanh, I thought of Dave's pictures and had Tracy, the History Channel editor, call him. He had a picture of Dabney, the one we used on the cover in our last magazine. Tracy contacted Bill Dabney, and he said he had the same picture. But when Tracy sent it to Bill, his eyes lit up, for he had never before seen this picture and didn't know it existed. I asked Dave Powell to write a little something for our magazine. Since then, he has been in contact with others who were at 881, and they listed him on their website along with others who served there at that time. Here is his response and follow up from others to his magnificent photos now out of the closet.

Jimbo,

I must say I am truly honored. I really think there must be some mistake. How does some adventurer with a camera rate being in the company of heroes? Most of whom fought and died for their country. But I am still going to have this framed and hung on a wall that Joelle will let me hang it on. Thanks very much to the officers and men of India Company.

Hi Frank,

Well, I don't have Major Chancey's address, so maybe you could forward this to him. I have been thinking a lot about what he said, and I want to thank him for what he said about the photos and about me. I did not know that it was the Purple Foxes that lifted me off the hill. But it has to have been. When I took all those photos of the Super gaggle, it was when I was leaving. To the best of my ability as I remember, is the airlifting of Dave Powell off Hill 881, which was in fact only a tiny part of the huge effort made that day by the Purple Foxes. I had never seen a Super gaggle before — at least not from the ground. I got on the hill much the same way that I got off, with a bunch of choppers coming in like some huge Ferris wheel dropping men and supplies onto the hill. To watch it from the hill, was a whole new experience.

The first thing I saw (I had absolutely no idea of what it was that I was looking at) was this huge trail of what looked to me like white phosphorus, exploding across the sky in a long tight plume. The plume started to descend like a curtain, with chunks of it falling faster than the rest of it. I never saw the jet that created this high atmospheric effect. It seemed like it appeared out of nowhere. Then to my complete surprise, I saw and heard once again, Huey gun ships whipping around the hill, shooting the place up. I remember clearly thinking it was not a good idea for those gunships to be flying that low. Especially over such hostile terrain.

After all the time I spent on 881, the only aircraft I had seen were jets during the CAS missions. Well, I am taking photos like mad amidst all of this sound and fury. Here comes this flight of green choppers diving in and roaring away just as fast as they can. Someone is telling me to get into the trench that was on the LZ. It was probably that incredibly brave Marine who stood totally upright with both his arms in the air guiding the choppers in. I took his picture. It was like he was saying, "Here I am you little bastards, do your worst."

The so-called trench was about six inches deep. It was so shallow the three cameras around my neck made my back stick out like a camel. I distinctly remember rotating the cameras off to one side so I could get down lower in the trench. I kept thinking, who the hell dug this puny little excuse for cover. As a matter of fact it wasn't really cover. The best that could be said, it was concealment. As always, in situations like that, time slows down to a crawl. There were a few other Marines in the trench as well. As a matter of fact, I was laying head to head with a Marine. What really freaked me out, was that he looked so damn calm. I know it sounds kind of stupid, but I actually asked him, "Do I look scared, because you don't?" He said no, I didn't look scared. I was relieved for some strange macho ass reason. Finally, the bird that I am supposed to get on lands. I waited for what seemed an eternity for the ramp to come down. When it does, someone yells GO! GO! GO! I got up and I mentally charted the shortest distance between two points, and set a course for that ramp. I got up, and just like that movie "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid" when they jumped off the cliff, I said to myself, "OOOH SSHHIIII-IT!!!" and took off running as fast as I could.

As I am racing toward the helicopter, this big Marine comes charging down the ramp. He decides the way I am coming to the chopper is also the way he is going to the trench. Neither one of us changed course, and we smashed into each other like two billiard balls. We bounced off each other falling backwards, and to our respective right sides. There we are, standing out in the open still looking at each other. I am pissed and he is smiling at me as if to say you didn't actually think you could come through me, did you, you puny little twerp? Hey, I was six feet, two hundred pounds. The guy must have been a football player or something.

Anyway, I took off again and as soon as I hit that ramp, I took a flying leap into the back of that helicopter. When I hit the deck, I started sliding like I was on ice. I slid all the way forward and came to rest face down between the legs of the Marine who is manning the M60 at the forward window on the right side. He was standing with his legs wide apart aiming the M60. I turned over and looked up to see this Marine with this deadly serious look on his face, staring down at me. I scrambled forward and sat up against the bulkhead of the flight deck of the chopper and tried to make myself into the smallest target as possible. It was then that I realized why I had slid so far forward so fast.

The deck of the chopper was covered with expended shell casings. It was like the whole deck was covered with marbles or ball bearings. I was staring aft at the open ramp as it slowly started to close. I was waiting for the sight and sound of holes being ripped through the chopper. I am saying, come on baby, let's get the hell out of here, please. The ramp closes and the engine starts whining. There is that brief moment when the chopper is not off the ground but seems like it is in the air at the same time, and then we are climbing with the engines roaring, and the bird is straining for altitude. The M60 is banging away, and shell casings are showering down on the deck, bouncing all over the place, until finally I can feel we are moving more horizontally then upward. It's getting quieter, and an overwhelming sense of relief comes over me. I said to the M60 Marine, "Well, I guess we made it." He didn't say anything but had a slight smile came to his lips. I took that as a good sign. I want to thank you, Major Chancey, and everyone with the Purple Foxes, because what I just described was only one day for me. But I realize for you it was a way of life. Frankly, I just don't know how you did it! What magnificent courage!! I will never forget. God Bless you all.

Dave Powell

Dave,

Your narrative of your departure from 881S is superb not only as a realistic description of the event, but also as a tribute to the Purple Foxes. More broadly, your recollections and awesome photographs are indispensable to the overall history precisely because they come from a disinterested third party who had seen enough action in Vietnam to make valid comparisons. We grunts and zombies who did those things repeatedly assumed that the conditions came with the territory, since we had nothing else to compare them to. More to the point, your contributions add a spice to the history that makes it what Frank and I hoped it would be when we began — a fitting tribute to those magnificent young men who endured and triumphed in those awful conditions. They now have a record, in writings and images, for their progeny and friends. They — and I — are both admiring of you for your courage in coming to the hill, and grateful for the record you preserved and have shared so magnanimously. On their behalf, thank you.

Regarding the photographs, I hesitate to impose on your already great generosity, but hope that I may have an 8x10 of whatever two photographs of me you think my bride would want, and 5x8 prints of those others in which I am a subject, however unflattering they may be. She was much taken by that last one in the CAS series. If you could also send a couple of your selection of Bob Arrotta, I will get them to him. We've been in touch over the years, but he is too modest and self-effacing to ask for them himself — again, at your convenience and only as is easy for you. After all these years, any image is a treasure. Regards and Godspeed.

Gratefully,
Bill Dabney

Reflections on Volunteering

by Michael Loehrer

When I arrived in Viet Nam in November 1967, I was assigned to a 105mm howitzer field artillery unit — Bravo Battery, First Battalion, Thirteenth Marines. Many of the outfit were getting "short" and were glad for someone to take over the "FNG" details. When they needed a volunteer to go TAD to Gio Linh (a real hell hole), I was ready for something different and volunteered. I remember the beautiful convoy ride up Highway One, which ran through Hue, Dong Ha, and over the Cua Viet River, all the way to Gio Linh. What a magnificent country side! As we approached Gio Linh, the road became too muddy to proceed all the way into the base. We speculated whether Major General Tompkins, who was riding with us, would trek through the knee deep mud to the command post. Those who knew him, said he would, because he was "Old Corps", and he was a grunt's marine. Those who didn't know him, said no general officer would wade through that mud. It was deep, and it was nasty. So when the convoy bogged down, we all watched with admiration as he instantly hopped out and slogged up the hill to the CP. We immediately followed, filled with pride to literally follow in his footsteps.

We took a little incoming while I was there, but nothing like the stories I had heard. There were a few patrols — I remember one in particular. The patrol ventured west toward Con Thien. It had not gone very far before it was ambushed. I remember it was Mike Company, but I am uncertain whether they were from the 26th or 9th Marines. They responded well, but casualties were heavy, with several KIA. I'll never forget the expressions on their faces as they carried their comrades back in makeshift poncho stretchers. Gio Linh was a pitiful place, but nothing compared to what we would experience at Khe Sanh.

The Unit to which I was assigned left Phu Bai and staged at Dong Ha in the afternoon of January 20, 1968. I was ordered to join them ASAP. As it turned out, half of our unit left that day — the rest of us, the following morning. No one knew where we were headed, helicopters were everywhere. We hopped on one and headed west as the sun set. We traveled a long way and everyone had a different opinion where we were headed. I had been studying the maps of the area, and offered, my opinion, "The only place I know about over this far is Khe Sanh." It didn't mean much to us then, Con Thien and Gio Linh were more well known.

Because it was late in the day, we ate cold C-rations and had no place to take cover. We were told to dig a good foxhole and expect incoming fire. The red clay soil was rock hard, and we didn't dig very deep before the sun went down. I remember trying to sleep that night in a shallow rut in the ground, my helmet tilted back cradling my head, watching the sky. I could see glowing objects coursing through the sky toward the southeast end of the base. I assumed they were incoming rockets. The other end of the base was taking a pretty good shelling, though nothing came near us.

We learned the next morning that the ammo dump had been hit. Sgt. Hewitt asked for volunteers to help clear the ammo dump of unexploded ordinance. I volunteered but found out the really dangerous part was already over. Weeks later, Sgt. Whitenight informed me that he and a Marine we only knew as "Smitty," moved a lot of ordnance that was still exploding. I think they got medals for it. I and the other volunteers helped other Marines who had previously volunteered.

I was volunteered for many other things, in true Marine Corps style. It was well into the Siege and a lot of people were getting tired of the stinking portable toilets. It seemed like I was the lowest in grade in our outfit for the longest time. I'm sure it wasn't true, but it seemed like it. However, I do remember getting volunteered to burn the drums filled with urine and excrement. A lot of people had been using ammo canisters, and sometimes their own helmets, for a toilet. We only used the above ground portable toilets whenever it was foggy or dark.

Under cover of fog one morning, me and few other unfortunate souls began the nasty job. You know the routine: drag the 55 gallon drums (cut in half) out of the back of the portable toilets, drain the urine, pour in the diesel fuel, light and stir occasionally with an engineering stake till all becomes ashes. We were only part way done when the fog lifted; sure enough, we started taking incoming. The person in charge said screw it, and we all fled for our bunkers. We were never ordered to finish, and believe me I didn't volunteer.

We were soon in short supply of communications people. Radio operators were normally good targets when on patrol. Fortunately, there wasn't much patrolling going on during the siege; some, but not much. However, we lost some of our radiomen because they were also wiremen. There were wires running from every howitzer to the fire direction control center. When we took incoming, these wires were often hit, and constantly needed to be repaired.

We had a standing policy — whether it was official or not, I don't know. Whenever we took incoming, we always returned fire. Since we were surrounded, I think we could just fire freely, and we wanted Charlie to know we could return whatever he threw our way. We usually fired the previous night's harassment and interdiction coordinates, if nothing else was in the works. Whatever the case, the guns needed communication lines, and the wires often required re-splicing during the middle of a barrage. A lot radiomen/wiremen were wounded while performing this mission.

Word came down that we needed communications volunteers. So, I learned how to splice wires from a corporal named Wray. He was Polish, and that was his last name. That was the only portion of his name we cared to pronounce and, really, all I remember. He trained me and didn't seem to care that I was new and only a PFC. After showing me how to splice, he said, "That's all there is to it!" Being curious, I asked, "How do you locate the break in the wire?" With a grin, he said, "You just grab the wire and run."

What a trip! The next time we took incoming, it was very dark, he looked at me and said, "You're on your way." I grabbed the wire and started running. I couldn't see a thing. By this time during the siege, we all had a general idea of where things were. The only light there was came from explosions of incoming artillery. I remained in a crouched position long enough to find the break and fix it. I would find the closest hole, where I hid until the barrage was over. Ten minutes of sheer panic. Talk about extreme sports!

The next time I actually volunteered was April 4, 1968. The Army was starting to sweep up the valley and Marines were preparing to move out from the base. We had topographic maps of the area, but they were out in a little trailer fully exposed to view, and it was broad daylight when someone demanded those maps. Sgt. Hewitt asked for a volunteer, because every time anyone appeared in broad daylight, we received incoming. Sure enough, I had not been up in the trailer more than a minute or two, when a couple of rockets came in. One landed very close.

I don't remember hearing the explosion at all, but I do remember being showered with red clay, and fighting for air through the dust. A piece of shrapnel went through the biceps of my left arm, and a small piece entered my side. I was medevaced out and taken to Dong Ha, where I was patched up. They cleaned up my arm where the shrapnel tore a nasty hole, but could not locate the piece that entered through the arm-hole area of my flak jacket. What really freaked me out was the large tear in my flak jacket right over my heart. Thank God for whoever invented it — saved my life.

The doctors were either concerned about the way my arm was torn up, or the missing piece of shrapnel in my side, and transferred me to Phu Bai, then Da Nang, then Thon Son Nut. Before I left Dong Ha, Major General Tompkins pinned on my purple heart. The same person who slogged through the mud up to the Gio Linh, four months earlier. He remains to this day one of the most inspiring people I ever met.

Three weeks later, I was released. I would still need three more weeks for a full recovery. Which basically meant an assignment of filling sandbags somewhere. I asked if I could return to my unit instead. They couldn't believe I would want to return to full duty and asked where my outfit was. I told them Khe Sanh — they thought I was a head case. They could not fathom the camaraderie we shared. After much pleading, they released me to return to my outfit, and issued me a light duty certificate.

When I got back, the appearance of everything was shocking. After being in a clean environment the previous three weeks, the smell and filth were incredible. From January to April, we were living in holes in the ground with no showers and no way to clean clothes. While I was in the hospital, I bought a camera. When I got back to Khe Sanh, I took some pictures, which I forgot about until I moved recently and stumbled across them.

Khe Sanh and The Mongol Prince

by Chaplain Ray William Stubbe

The battle of the Siege of Khe Sanh of early 1968 was far more ominous, dangerous, and significant than had been previously thought. It is miraculous, in fact, that any made it out alive from that battlefield. The key to survival and success in that battle may be attributed to the professionalism, dedication, creativity, and humanity of individuals who were there, most of whom remain to this day, shrouded in obscurity in what has been written of that battle. There were many. One of these is Mirza Munir Baig, known as "Harry." This essay contributes much new information concerning the remarkable Harry, as well as newly acquired information derived from official Hanoi military history books, declassification of highly classified documents from the National Security Agency, memoirs of Khe Sanh participants, new descriptions of intelligence gathering and processing during the Siege, recollections from CIA debriefs of Harry, documents pertaining to use of electronic sensors at Khe Sanh, and numerous other, miscellaneous information.

A Desperate Place: How Did We Ever Make It Out Alive?

The battlefield of Khe Sanh, occupied 25% of all Vietnam film reports on TV evening shows during February-March, 1968. Shocking images of horror appeared in numerous popular print media, e.g., "The Agony of Khe Sanh" cover of Newsweek, March 18, 1968; its photo essay portrayed desperate young men carrying the bloodied corpse of their Company Commander (Don Jacques), and shocked faces and crumpled bodies in deeply-dug trenches. Haunting faces and desperate conditions captured by David Douglas Duncan and the legendary "thousand-yard stare" on the faces of those at Khe Sanh appearing in newspapers reflected the desperate reality that was Khe Sanh.

Possible reenactment of a Dien Bien Phu scenario became an idee fixe for many who feared Khe Sanh's isolation and tenuous defensibility. Overland re-supply via road (QL-9) had become impossible because 9 of the 26 bridges between Ca Lu and Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) were impassible or destroyed. The KSCB airstrip was closed to air-landed re-supply 12-25 February due to untenably hazardous conditions. The Drop Zone was extremely small and unprotected. Lingering morning fogs precluded aerial reconnaissance and re-supply. Surrounding Khe Sanh, like clutching, choking fingers on a throat, were tens of thousands of encircling enemy troops plus tanks, marking the first use of tanks by the PAVN in the war. President Johnson demanded the Joint Chiefs of Staff declare in writing that Khe Sanh would be held. American defenders received up to 1600 incoming rounds a day — mostly devastating rockets and artillery on a base 0.9 mi. long and 0.4 mi. wide occupied by approximately 2725 men. Nuclear weapons were being considered for Khe Sanh.

The considerable enemy presence was alarming. Signals Intelligence (SIGINT) intercepts and analysis reported through TOP SECRET TRINE Daily Tactical SIGINT Summaries disclosed a massive movement of enemy infantry units from North Vietnam positioned in Laos just west of Khe Sanh. Formation of a Khe Sanh Front Headquarters to coordinate units of the 304 and 325C Divisions and support units, located directly west of the DMZ, designated B5-T8, had been established 6 December 1967, commanded by Major General Tran Quy Hai, Assistant Chief of Staff, PAVN General Staff, and Political Commissar Comrade Le Quang Dao, Deputy Director of the General Political Directorate for the PAVN.

The considerable PAVN commitment to the Khe Sanh battle, in addition to the formation of a Front Headquarters and investment in the area of two divisions of infantry (one of which, the 304th, had participated in the Dien Bien Phu battle), is reflected in the PAVN Secret [Mat] classified history of the Ho Chi Minh Trail which reports the total of supplies delivered to B5-T8: double the amount delivered to Tri-Thien, 2.5 times the amount delivered to Region V, and 24.5 times the amount delivered to Nam Bo (an important region that included Saigon and the Delta). Col. Tran Tho, Deputy Operational Commander, responsible for logistics during the Khe Sanh battle, had his hands full! More tonnage of bombs were dropped in this small battlefield area than in all of the Pacific in 1942 and 1943; in an area of 564 square kilometers, friendly fire delivered some 99,600 tons of ordnance.

Life for those on the hill outposts of Khe Sanh was even more tenuous and austere due to inability of helicopters (their only means of re-supply and medevac support) to penetrate lingering, shrouding fog (known in the area as Crachin, a French word for "spit.") Hill 950, without water for seven days, held a badly wounded man who nearly died; one man on Hill 881-South did die after three days of shrouding fog precluded his medevac, and some corpses decayed for days in a temporary "body bunker." The Company Commander on Hill 881-South, Captain (later Colonel) William H. Dabney, comments: "Ever watch rats crawling in and out of ponchos holding what's left of [men] hit by a 152[mm. artillery round]? The troops did! They were up there five days. Weather socked in. Ripe. We were told we couldn't bury them. We did anyway. Had to."

When Co E, 2/26 occupied Hill 861-A on 22 January 1968, the defenders were rationed to a C-ration meal and half a canteen cup of water a day. On Hill 861, cases of C-rations were stored in an old bomb crater, atop which a guard sat all night to prevent theft. Cpl. Dennis Mannion, a Forward Observer with KILO Co., 3/26, on Hill 861, recalls, "Imagine! A hill armed to the hilt, facing death and destruction daily, and we still had to supply an armed guard to prevent internal theft!" Tragically, one night, an incoming mortar blew off the arm and a leg of the C-ration guard.

Khe Sanh, a place of scintillating beauty — almost a Garden of Eden — shrouded horror and death within its beauty. David Leitch, a correspondent for the London Sunday Times, still haunted by memories of the wonderful young men he came to know at Khe Sanh during the Siege battle, captured the life situation: "It was beyond human endurance. I mean, I've been to very many wars, and I'd never experienced being on that level of incoming and that kind of impotence everyone felt. I thought 'the NVA are coming,' you see. I was quite convinced that Giap was going to come over the wire with two NVA divisions. It was just a question of 'when.' It was like being in one of those medieval sieges where you knew you actually had to lose because you didn't have water, or whatever it was, and they were going to get you and cut your throat. Meanwhile, you had a day or two to live, and you had to live like a man. It's a very difficult thing to do. Someone, a Native American Marine, said to me, 'It's a beautiful day to die.'"

The famous photographer, David Douglas Duncan, a Marine officer who served in World War II and photographed Korea, passionately protested what he beheld at Khe Sanh, what the defenders there were forced to endure. He added to the title on the cover of his collection of photographs "I Protest!" the words, "In behalf of the men who will never get out, for whom help came too late."

The severity of life at Khe Sanh is reflected in the hell it became for everyone who was there. Clothes rotted off the bodies of those at Khe Sanh who could not take showers for three months. C-rations were frequently limited to one per day. Water was frequently restricted to one canteen cup per day, and there were many days when there was no water. Col. Lownds reflected before a U.S. Senate Committee:

> "The battlefield is a dirty and ugly place. All the sophisticated instruments of destruction we can devise won't change it, nor will they change the supreme demands of courage, sacrifice, professional skill and dedication which Marines of each and every generation have met on the field of battle."

Soldiers of the North Vietnamese Army units fared even worse. One soldier, Hoai Phong of 9th Regt., 304 Div, wrote in his diary: "Here, the war is fiercer than in all other places. It is even fiercer than in Co Roong and Dien Bien Phu. All of us stay in underground trenches except the units that engage in combat. We are in the sixtieth day, and B-52s continue to pour bombs onto this area. If visitors come here, they will say that this is an area where it rains bombs. Vegetation and animals, even those who live in deep caves or underground, have been destroyed. One sees nothing but the red dirt."

The intensity of the battle at Khe Sanh is reflected in 11,114 incoming artillery, mortar, and rocket rounds between 18 January-1 April 1968, an average of 150 per day (which was the average for all of I Corps in 1967). U. S. forces fired 117,643 rounds of artillery (including 12,441 rounds of 175mm) and flew 2,602 sorties of B-52s delivering 75,631 tons of ordnance (an average of 35 sorties and 1,022 tons a day, 85% more sorties and 82% more ordnance than the daily average for all of South Vietnam and the DMZ for the prior 12 months). 533 sorties were delivered within 3 kilometers of friendly ground forces at KSCB. In addition, 15,217 sorties were flown by tactical air, a daily average of 184.

Officially, 205 Americans died at Khe Sanh during the battle (20 Jan-31 Mar 1968). That this figure is erroneous is manifest even from official counts of Marine battalions at Khe Sanh, which total 274 American KIA. KIA from other units serving at Khe Sanh adds another 70 for a total of 344. This does not include the casualties of Lang Vei, or an unknown number of defenders lost at the Khe Sanh District Headquarters on 21 January and those from the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion for which no figures are available. For veterans of the battle at Khe Sanh, "Khe Sanh" means the time they were there. Thus, the KIA from Operation PEGASUS (1-14 April) and those from 15-16 April (the date 1/9 left) add 252 more, for a total of 573 Americans lost during the period 20 January-16 April, the period of time the defenders of Khe Sanh were there.

Commander (Doctor) Robert A. Brown, Commanding Officer of 3d Medical Battalion, whose 2d Platoon of Company C served at Khe Sanh as "C-Med," records 2,541 patients seen and treated. Of these 2,037 were wounded in action and 490 were non-battle casualties. 2,249 patients were evacuated of which 292 were returned to duty. Losses by the North Vietnamese Army forces are estimated at well over 10,000 killed. Perhaps the same number of the local, indigenous Bru tribesmen (which were prohibited from being evacuated) was also killed, when census before the battle is compared with census of refugees at resettlements.

Perhaps the greatest battle of the Vietnam War in terms of casualties, publicity, degree of commitment, and prolonged agony — surprisingly by the early 1970s, it was my perceived experience while serving on active duty that military leadership made concerted efforts to de-emphasize Khe Sanh. For example, when the first LHA was launched, news releases announced that LHA-5 would be named USS KHE SANH; the announcement then changed it to USS DA NANG, and when LHA-5 was commissioned 3 May 1980, it was USS PELELIU. Academic discussion of Khe Sanh centered on strategic conundrums ("Who managed to force the other into the battle?" "Who was actually besieged?" "Who won?" "Was Khe Sanh simply a publicity affair by both sides with little reality?") I personally overheard professional military historians at the Marine Corps Historical Center question whether "there really were all those enemy at Khe Sanh," whether the North Vietnamese really intended to make a major effort there as at Dien Bien Phu. Where was the anticipated "big, human wave assault?"

Attempting to discern motives (or plans and strategy) from what happened betrays a post hoc ergo proper hoc thinking. At Khe Sanh, absence or presence of results had little to do with a lack of PAVN resolve or action. That Captain Frank James Kennedy was able to deliver several thousand pints of whole blood the evening of 21 January despite a quarter-mile visibility and fog; despite navigating by dead reckoning above a thick cloud layer that obscured hazardous terrain features; despite not having the field in sight; despite having to land his CH-53 by auto-rotation and guidance by only a hand-held green signal from an Aldis lamp as his only ground reference; despite incoming rockets while landing, does not reflect what the enemy did. It reflects what Americans did! Likewise, Khe Sanh generally reflects victory by determination, resolve, common courage by numerous individuals despite almost overwhelming, countervailing forces. Defenders of Khe Sanh were subsequently awarded the rare Presidential Unit Citation, which is granted to units for extraordinary heroism to the same degree as that which would be required for the award of the Navy Cross to an individual, one award under the Medal of Honor.

During intense shelling, gun crews remained in the open to fire 105mm howitzers, wire men ran out amid the explosions to splice severed land lines to resume vital communications, men commonly dashed to pull an injured man to safety. Dr. Edward Feldman removed a live mortar round embedded in a living man's abdomen. Forklift operators, deafened by sounds of their equipment to warning noises made by rockets or mortars that were being fired, continued to move their pallets. Those on the Drop Zone (where there was no bunker or trench or hole to run for cover) retrieved supplies while those on the airstrip cleared it of shrapnel so planes could land. Officers and NCOs were continually seen moving among their troops to cheer and check. Stretcher-bearers moved casualties to waiting helicopters even as mortars exploded near them. Everyone could not help but see craters in which they could stand and still be below ground level. There was no secure place at Khe Sanh. Yet, everyday courage and determination formed the modus vivendi of those at Khe Sanh. Thousands of Bronze Stars ought to have been awarded, but subsequent acknowledgment was mostly not forthcoming for the valiant defenders of Khe Sanh. The many hundreds at Khe Sanh are now mostly forgotten, consigned to mists of oblivion.

Even the Commander, Colonel David E. Lownds, who with his staff targeted and initiated strike requests for 95% of all local B-52 Arc Light strikes and generally conducted the entire course of the battle, is an obscure person to history. During an ordinary day, his intelligence staff generated targets for 100 TPQ-10 missions, 16 Arc Lights, 100 flights of fixed wing aircraft and up to 500 artillery missions. Yet, when books and articles on the Battle of Khe Sanh are consulted, one does not find an extensive biography of Colonel Lownds or his staff or subordinate commanders. Instead, one usually encounters the names of Generals Giap, Westmoreland, and a few others who may have dictated general policy, but who had little to do with detailed day-to-day operations and tactics. Those who did are mostly "little noted, nor long remembered."

Some may have understandably crumbled emotionally or failed to repulse the repeated assaults. Fierce battles were continually won by the young defenders who successfully repulsed determined attacks by large NVA units: the attack on Khe Sanh village and Hill 861, the attack on Hills 861A and 64, and three assaults against the eastern perimeter, one by a regimental-size force. Some of these involved hand-to-hand combat in darkness. Most left hundreds of dead enemy.

Thus, "Khe Sanh" is not tactics and strategy — it is not even a place to be analyzed or debated. "Khe Sanh" is the people who were there. The wonder of Khe Sanh is not its prior beauty and subsequent horror, not amazement that we all weren't killed there, not the degree of commitment on all levels. The real wonder of Khe Sanh is that so many of such exemplary character were gathered in one place, certainly not as a result of the insight of Generals or their G-1 staff. Reflecting Napoleon's maxim, "In a war it is not men but the man who counts," Colonel Bruce F. Meyers, writing the After Action Report of the battle, noted: "The ultimate success in battle will always hinge on the performance of the individual. In the final analysis, Khe Sanh was no exception. The ability of all those who were at Khe Sanh to perform their assignments in spite of the intensive enemy barrages impacting into their restricted base area while at the same time maintaining a high degree of esprit and elan, were a major factor in the successful defense of Khe Sanh."

Mirza Munir Baig - "Harry"

A Major Reason We Made It Out Alive!

Mirza Munir Baig, "Harry," was born 13 Jan 1932 in Panchgani, India. His name "Munir" means refulgent in classical Arabic, and the name "Baig" is actually a title, not a name, for achievement in the service of the emperor. His mother, Juliette, had been educated at the American University in Beirut, Lebanon (where all her family had been educated from its opening around 1900) and after receiving a scholarship from King Fuad of Egypt, at Clifton College of Cambridge University, where she met her future husband, Osman.

In 1946, Osman was appointed to the British Embassy in Washington, D.C., where the following year Munir and Taimur visited their parents. Among Juliette's new and very good friends were Felix de Weldon, the artist who sculpted the Marine Corps War Memorial (known among Marines as the "Iwo Jima Monument") in Washington, D.C., and his wife, Margot. Juliette took her sons to visit them. "Munir was enchanted with the model," recalls Juliette. It was also in August of 1947 that India and Pakistan became independent of Britain. Osman, being Moslem, became a Pakistani citizen, as did his son Taimur, who recalls: "I was at school when the Partition (India/Pakistan) came through. I went to bed an Indian and literally woke up a Pakistani."

Clifton College prepares boys to enter Sand Hurst, the British school for officer training. Munir was not destined to become a British officer, however. When the time came for him to enroll in Sand Hurst, the turmoil of establishing the new nation of Pakistan resulted in a policy voiding the "father-to-son" tradition of military leadership. By the time the military reasserted its influence in the Pakistan government, it was too late. The British commission their officers at age 19. His father wrote him, "If you want to pursue a military career, the only real military organization left in the world is the United States Marine Corps. Munir was not happy in the world of business. His brother Taimur recalls, "He's always wanted to be a soldier, I guess because of dad." Taimur recalls a time when the family was at Panchgani. He and his brother played "Cowboys and Indians" while his grandmother's friend, Gandhi, sat quietly on the veranda in white robes with legs crossed.

One might reasonably speculate that the effects of war, political turmoil in his homeland, the family saga, life in England, France, Canada, and America — all conspired to create a sense of "rootlessness" and questions of identity. Who am I? Mongol? Indian? Pakistani? British? American? His brother notes that at times he'd style himself an English country gentleman and dress in jodhpurs and wear a cravat, much to the dismay of his American friends. Munir visited "uncle" Felix de Weldon asking for help to get into the U.S. Marine Corps. Felix took him directly to the Commandant, and he was accepted. Despite all his education and his overwhelmingly prestigious family background, he enlisted 10 Feb 1957 at the Recruiting Station, Washington, D.C., kissed his mother goodbye saying, "Don't fret, mama, I shall make you proud of me," and shipped off to Marine Corps Boot Camp at Parris Island, SC, as a private.

During his first enlistment (10 Feb 56-09 Nov 58), Munir made Sergeant in two years and was awarded a Meritorious Mast for superior performance as a Legal Clerk at Marine Barracks, Brooklyn, NY. Discharged to re-enlist, he re-enlisted on Marine Corps Birthday 1958, and served in the Marine guard detachment aboard the USS INDEPENDENCE. His father, Osman Baig, now Secretary General of the Central Treaty Organization requested Munir be flown off the INDEPENDENCE to be his aide for a week. During this time, he became a naturalized US citizen and was awarded the Coronation Ribbon by the Queen of England (but not permitted to wear it on his Marine Corps uniform) and a Good Conduct Medal.

On 27 May 1960, he was discharged to accept a commission as an officer in the United States Marine Corps. Prior to reporting for training, he married Diane, daughter of Count Nicholas de Rocheford, on 4 June 1960 in St. Matthew's Cathedral, Washington, D.C., surrounded by his Marine buddies. He reported for 26 weeks of training at TBS (The Basic School) where two of his fellow candidates, Gene Hitchcock and Charlie Kappelman (both later served in various intelligence duties in the Marine Corps) first started calling him "Harry" as they hauled him up and down the trails to get him through OCS.

Harry's initial military assignment was artillery. Following training at the Army Artillery and Missile School at Ft. Sill, OK in 1962, he was assigned to 2d 155mm Gun Battery (Self-Propelled) and volunteered for operations off Cuba. Following this experience, he attended Intelligence Research Officer Course, Ft. Holabird, MD and was assigned to 3d Counter-Intelligence Team (CIT), 3d Marine Division, where he became Team Leader for ten months and served outside CONUS (12 Sep 63-4 Nov 64). He was awarded the Armed Forces Expeditionary Medal on 11 Feb 1964 for operations with 9th MEB (Marine Expeditionary Brigade) in Vietnam (6 Aug 64-8 Oct 64). During this time, Harry and a jeep driver drove all the way from Chu Lai, through the Hai Van Pass, to the DMZ, with Harry making copious and detailed notes of his observations.

Harry was promoted to Captain (1 April 1965) and participated in Operation HASTINGS (in Vietnam along the DMZ) in July 1966. After completion of AWS, he was assigned to 1st 155 Gun Battery (SP), 3d Marine Division as Executive Officer and as Commanding Officer (5 months). He again departed CONUS 20 April 1967, returning 12 May 1968. During this time, he participated in Operations CUMBERLAND, RUSH, and LIBERTY and subsequently served from 17 September 1967 in G-2, in 3d Marine Division.

During this time, he urged Bob Coolidge to arrange a meeting with the CG, 3d Marine Division, Brigadier General Metzger. Drawing on Marine Corps history, he proposed a mobile guerrilla force composed of NCOs that would live off the land as it roved up and down the Ho Chi Minh Trail destroying re-supply convoys of NVA. Standing aplomb with the large, curved, wide blade of an Indian kukri knife at his side, and stomping his boots like a British officer, he presented the briefing in meticulous detail. After he departed, the General looked to Bob Coolidge and remarked, "Is he for real?"

While serving at Division, his focus was not at all speculative; he was patently practical, and later wrote: "I was the Division G-2 clandestine, intelligence coordinator for military intelligence agencies in the Division TAOR. The 15th Marine Counterintelligence Team and U.S. Army intelligence units had established collection nets far across the Ben Hai River. These nets had penetrated several NVA headquarters and other organizations. One of the tasks of the nets was to report the movements of the 4th Battalion, Van An Rocket Artillery Regiment, and of the Vinh Linh Rocket Battery together with those of their escorting infantry. These units had caused much damage to the Dong Ha and Cua Viet bases earlier during the summer and autumn of 1967. Close surveillance (by a process too complicated to explain herein) and rapid counter fires by artillery and naval gunfire had subsequently prevented them from reaching their firing positions during the late fall and early winter of that year."

The significance of this for Khe Sanh soon became evident. Harry writes: "On the night of 19/20 January 1968, the rocket units moved south once more. Reported and traced along their route by the agents of the 15th Counterintelligence Team, the batteries and their escort were caught and trapped against a bend in the Cua Viet River. Prisoners taken reported that their mission was to rocket the airstrips at Dong Ha and Quang Tri on the early morning of the 21st to prevent helicopters from flying in support of Hills 881S and 861. This part of the enemy's plan failed." On the 23d of January 1968, Harry reported to Khe Sanh as Target Intelligence Officer (TIO), part of a 3d Marine Division G-2 augmentation team that also included Major Jerry Hudson (who had reported earlier to replace Harper Bohr as S-2) and Major Robert E. Coolidge (Special Intelligence Officer). The 26th Marine Regiment staff at the start of the Siege battle was at half strength. Being a unit of 9th MAB, not III MAF, half of its staff was on Okinawa. For example, Colonel Lownds never had a Sergeant Major.

The ring Harry wore bore the incused family crest: two crossed swords at the entrance to the Bijapur Fort. His mother recalls, "The position was hereditary in the family, and Munir assumed it was still his but for the British invasion!" Thus, with his great-grandfather fighting to keep the fort at Bijapur in mind, Harry was not about to permit besieging forces to overtake this fort! Similarities of the two situations must have been on his mind, for he reportedly spoke to Marines at Khe Sanh about "his" fort in India, how he someday would return and reclaim it! His father, Osman Baig, was a firm believer in being able to talk to spirits of ancestors, and one can only speculate whether Harry may have attended such meditation.

Many recall Harry's arrival, bedecked in unconventional gear. When he first arrived in Vietnam he wore the M-1941 pack and belt harness but was unsatisfied with it. Lt. Bill Smith, an artillery officer of 1/13 who later worked closely with Harry recalls, "The guy had a Boy Scouts back pack and I kept wondering to myself, what am I going to do?" Bob Coolidge explains that Harry bought his pack from Sears, perhaps motivated by his earlier connection with his uncle Selim and his employment there.

Mark Swearengen, the Army Liaison Officer for 175mm batteries at Camp Carroll and the Rockpile, had arrived at Khe Sanh on 18 January. His immediate reaction was one of dismay. He felt a deep concern at what he perceived to be a lack of enthusiasm and recognition for the magnitude of the threat at Khe Sanh. "Then Harry shows up. Captain Steen brought him in. I was at the entrance of the command bunker and thought, 'This guy is different!' He had this British accent and had a kukri knife at his side and spoke as though he were there to single-handedly save Khe Sanh. I thought, 'Is this guy crazy?' And then I realized that this is exactly the enthusiasm that we need right now! It didn't take long to realize he was one heck of a team player, not really out to accomplish everything by himself. He'd ask the advice and opinions of others."

He soon became well known for his humor. Harry had a prodigious appetite, and when low on food at Khe Sanh, ate things nobody else sought, such as "sausage patties with grease." "We were getting shelled, rocketed, and one of the radio operators said, 'Captain Baig, I thought Moslems couldn't eat pork,'" recalls Bob Coolidge.

"Well, when we kill the infidel, Allah will give us dispensations," he replied as everyone laughed.

Another radio operator observing the banter remarked, "I don't know what we're laughing about. To Captain Baig we're all infidels!" He frequently referred to someone as, for example, "Wayne Mason, you Christian pig!" or the NVA as "infidels!" Jerry Hudson, S-2 of Regiment, paints a typical scene. "Some of us would tease him from time to time. 'How come you're eating pork and beans?' He'd reply, 'I have to kill some infidels!' Someone would say, 'Give him another can of pork!'"

Mark A. Swearengen, the Army Liaison Officer for 175s in the Khe Sanh command bunker during the Siege, recalls Harry: "If you ever met him and had any discussion with him, you'd never forget him. He was, he could be very enthusiastic about unfortunate situations! He'd talk about being surrounded by thousands of enemy troops, and he'd just bubble with enthusiasm! It would scare the daylights out of most people, but he was enthused about it!" 1Lt. Douglas Meredith, who replaced Capt. Mark Swearengen as the 175 LNO in late February 1968, spoke of Harry as "a superb person, just a tremendously intelligent officer. Anybody would give anything to be with him."

Harry was "bubbly." Navy Lt. (jg) Bernard D. Cole, the Naval Gunfire Liaison Officer in the regimental bunker recalls, "New ideas, jokes, gibes, prognostications, criticisms/praise of the C-ration meal he had just opened ('Aha! I have biscuits!' the British term for cookies), interplay with others in the bunker, both enlisted and officer — he seemed always to be in motion physically and active mentally."

Harry was also intolerant of incompetence. The regimental S-2, Jerry Hudson, recalls: "Harry was very, very professional, very intense. Somebody around him who was anything less than that, he'd drive them nuts. He'd jump up and down like an old 'stick-in-the-face,' and yell, 'Incompetence! I cannot stand incompetence!' That's the way he was. He had very, very high standards for himself, and he expected all those that worked with him to be the same." Lt. Cole recalls that Harry "always spoke his mind, no matter what the rank of the person he was addressing. I saw/heard him, more than once, screaming at some senior officer in Saigon (on the phone) when there was a difference of opinion about targeting B-52 strikes." Yet, he never became a victim of anger; he was always in control of himself.

When Harry Baig arrived at Khe Sanh, the Siege battle was two days old. The combat base was a shambles, and the sudden appearance of several tens of thousands of encircling North Vietnamese Army troops who had slipped in from nearby Laos was self-evident in screeches of rockets and whomps of mortars and in the numbed, shock-state reflected in faces with the "thousand-yard stare" and in the "Khe Sanh shuffle" of all there.

Harry had arrived to assist the newly arrived S-2 of 26th Marine Regiment, Jerry Hudson, personally requested by Colonel Lownds upon the normal rotation of the S-2, Capt. Harper L. Bohr, Jr. (who became XO of 3d Recon Bn). When Jerry had graduated from boot camp, the officer he reported to for his first duty was Captain David E. Lownds, recently reactivated from the Marine Corps Reserve.

Originally, Khe Sanh had a mission as a launch site for SOG teams, TIGERHOUND Bird Dog aircraft, CIA-sponsored agents, deep penetration by individuals of the JTAD, and a host of various other activities to collect information, primarily on traffic on the Ho Chi Minh Trail or infiltration into South Vietnam. By now, Khe Sanh had developed into a playground for these units and individuals, all reporting their findings to distant headquarters, while the base itself was in peril and uninformed except for digested, analyzed, and old intelligence from those distant headquarters.

In addition to close-in reconnaissance by patrols from local infantry companies and teams from Company "B," 3d Recon BN, as well as from CAC OSCAR, there were, starting in October 1967, alarming reports from "people-sniffer" helicopters making hundreds of detections close to the base in "uninhabited" jungle! Colonel Lownds had thoroughly familiarized himself with the local terrain by walking it many times alone. There were reports from CIA operatives like the wiry, young Bob Handy, a civilian who suddenly and mysteriously appeared next to Ed Crawford, acting Platoon Commander of G/2/3, as it moved to assault positions during the 1967 Hill Fights at Khe Sanh. There were agent reports from the JTAD at Khe Sanh, the CI Team, the National Police agent net, reports from the Special Forces at Lang Vei, and from the Special Projects team led by George Quamo, who led a large patrol to the Co Roc area in mid-January 1968.

Reports from Signals Intelligence, intercepts of NVA radio transmissions and analysis of who reported to whom and how often in order to determine chain of command and location of headquarters, proved especially useful. By 1 Jan 1968, EC-47 aircraft were consistently flying more than 900 sorties a month. EC-47s of 460th Tactical Reconnaissance Wing that covered Khe Sanh flew unmolested due to their "cover" of similarity to AC-47 SPOOKY gunship, dropping psychological warfare leaflets when available. So significant was the contribution by EC-47's ARDF that 90% of all B-52 strikes at Khe Sanh during the siege battle were targeted through ARDF data. Brigadier General George J. Keegan noted,

"The Air Force thoroughly reconnoitered I Corps using special sensors plus ARDF."

As the Siege opened, Major George Quamo at the Top Secret FOB-3 camp appended to KSCB, personally ensured a LIMA was strung from the bowels of his deep bunker to the "2" shop of the 26th Marines bunker. Thus, Quamo could ensure that intercepted NVA radio transmissions, translated by a Vietnamese in his bunker, could be shared in "real time." In addition, a plethora of information from a wide variety of sources poured into the "2" shop. These included photo recon missions, including GIANT DRAGON (U-2 aircraft) reports from NPIC. There were RED HAZE reports, SLAR, reports from Bru Montagnards, and the newly developed and seeded electronic sensors, diverted from being seeded in Laos.

Soon information was received as fast as the numbers of encircling NVA soldiers were swelling. Jerry Hudson's arrival was a matter of total immersion. He was thrown into the midst of the tumultuous prelude of the ominous first act now unfolding. "They sent me up there to try to get in the middle [of all these intelligence activities] and direct traffic," recalls Hudson. "At Khe Sanh, there was a whole collection of intelligence agencies gathering information under a lot of authorities, and information was all going back to Saigon and other places, and it wasn't being circulated at Khe Sanh, and we wanted to see if we could get a better handle on the situation."

According to Capt, Jerry Hudson, S-2 of 26th Marines, the abbreviated regimental staff at Khe Sanh was suddenly supported by "...what, at that time, was probably the biggest intelligence operation as part of a regimental operation that I was aware of, and I was pretty much attuned to what was going on. We were mighty close to receiving more information than we could assimilate. It was about that time that Harry Baig and Bob Coolidge arrived, and we began to put some direction and order to this mass of information and tried to keep Colonel Lownds advised so he could make timely decisions and prioritize his decision-making process."

Harry Baig established a section that is not normal to an infantry regiment. Colonel Lownds, in his FMFPAC Debrief, commented that a regiment does not have assets for Target Intelligence, but "General Tompkins automatically started funneling people in to me, and I built a TIO section — Target Information Section. They were needed. I couldn't have done the job properly with the people I had unless I had this TIO section."

Soon both Jerry Hudson and Harry Baig were feverishly collating and evaluating thousands of bits of information on a daily, and nightly, basis. The Naval Gunfire Liaison Officer who worked with him, Lt.(jg) Bernard D. Cole, recalls that Harry "worked tirelessly, nominally a 12-hour watch, but in reality he was there at least 18 hours a day." Cole, who styled himself "Commander, Naval Forces, Khe Sanh" was, in Harry's description, "the naval gunfire officer, without ships," and "an excellent Assistant TIO."

The Fire Support Coordination Center (FSCC), located adjacent the S-3 shop in the 26th Marines COC (Command Operations Center) bunker, assembled some unusually remarkable men — few in numbers, but with a creative ability to devise entirely new and effective tactics. In addition to Commanding Officer of 1/13 Lt. Col. John A. Hennelly, Captain Baig and Lt.(jg) Cole of the U.S. Navy, there was: the 24-year-old artilleryman Capt. Kent Steen; Marine aviator, Capt. Richard Donaghy; and U.S. Army Liaison Officer for the 175mm guns, Capt. Mark Swearengen, then 1/Lt. Douglas Meredith. Such a staff, composed of intelligence, infantry, artillery, and air, and from three different military services — while providing a variety of differing perspectives — could easily have fragmented. Yet, Colonel Hennelly's calm, yet firm manner developed them into a harmonious team in which he encouraged free venting of new ideas. Capt. Meredith recalls: "We tried anything. No one ever laughed at a dumb idea. Everything was considered and all were treated with respect. I recall one day asking the aviator why napalm was never dropped at night. It was brainstorming at its best."

Kent Steen recalls this particular discussion and decision: "Napalm, by rule, is only dropped at low level and during daylight. The casings are flimsy and with almost unpredictable aerodynamics. During one of our brainstorms, we determined that the NVA script did not call for napalm to rain on them at night and in the fog and from an altitude. We then set about creating a scheme for doing it. We determined that if we brought the aircraft in at much lower altitudes, say 3500 or 5000 feet, we could get the canisters to hold together and make a reasonably predictable trajectory... The hard part was goading our aviator counterparts into trying it. They ultimately did — and with spectacular effect. Through radio intercepts, we found that we had great success."

Harry Baig, being especially adept at target acquisition information for artillery fires, picked up on the avalanche of target information and meticulously recorded them on 5 x 8 cards, one card for each 1,000 meter grid square. Harry's job was to organize targets, prepare them for destruction, and evaluate results. These included automatic weapons positions, mortar positions, anti-aircraft weapon positions, artillery, bunkers, fortified areas and trenches, logistic dumps (by type), camp and assembly areas, truck and track vehicle parks, rocket sites, and launch areas. In a letter to the Historical Division, HQMC, Baig reported: "There were over 3,000 separate targets within a 15 kilometer radius of Khe Sanh." Hudson notes that "Harry had a head like a computer."

Pfc. Michael Archer, a 19-year-old Marine who spent the Siege in the COC bunker of 26th Marines as a night shift radio operator on the Tactical Air Control Party (TACP) radio net in the FSCC (Fire Support Coordination Center), recalled the arrival of Harry Baig, and it didn't take long for him to develop deep admiration for this remarkable Marine. "The first time I saw Captain Baig was outside the COC on his first day at Khe Sanh [23 Jan 68]. A recoilless rifle round had whizzed in and exploded, leaving a small crater. I watched as Baig strolled out and took a tape measure out of his pocket. He measured the length, width and depth of the little hole. He walked around the immediate area until he found a thumb-size piece of shrapnel, still so hot he had to bounce it in his palm in order to hold it. He examined the little piece of metal for a moment and then went back into the COC. There he looked at his map for a few minutes and then ordered an artillery mission onto a particular coordinate south of the base where he reckoned the gun was. I was amused at the time by this odd little man, and thought he was quite eccentric. After I saw the results of his later work, I have no doubt that he knocked out a NVA recoilless rifle team that day."

Just four days after Baig's arrival, he identified a NVA artillery headquarters between Khe Sanh village and the base. The air strike he ordered resulted in over 30 secondary explosions. "Two weeks later, Baig, while reviewing an aerial reconnaissance photograph, thought he recognized truck tire tracks converging on a certain location just south-east of Hill 471. I was looking over his shoulder at the photo and couldn't see anything. But I had, by now, become a believer in Baig's power of 'intuition.' As the bomber approached the target that night, I went outside to watch. It was less than two miles away. The little hill erupted in secondary explosions and burned and exploded for the rest of the night. Harry had found a major enemy ammunition dump in less than three weeks. It had probably taken the NVA years to stock it.

"I believe it was these early, crippling strikes against the enemy supply and command centers that disrupted the NVA plan for a major assault on the base. I think they would have had greater success had they attacked before February. Captain Baig's 'guesses' saved hundreds, maybe thousands of Marine lives."

Harry's area of the command bunker remarkably was known for generating calmness in visitors. Chaplain Walt Driscoll, the Roman Catholic chaplain on the base at Khe Sanh during the Siege, once remarked how reassured and calm he felt following a visit to Harry's area of the command bunker. "Everything seemed so rational, so under control, despite all the turmoil and chaos." Upon visiting him, Father Driscoll rendered him "a crashing British salute." Harry had become impressed with Navy chaplains serving Marine Corps units. His brother recalls, "My brother frequently talked about the amazing bravery of chaplains on the battlefield."

So impressed was Harry by Chaplain Driscoll's bravery as he moved about the base to minister to the men that Harry's mother later wrote: "He became a Roman Catholic only 5 months before he died. This was because in the heat of battle, he watched the R.C. priest join in to succor the wounded and give Last Rites. The priest became a real friend."

1Lt. Douglas Meredith recalls Baig, normally working there all by himself or with his assistant SSgt. Bolsey planning fires. Meredith frequently came "to work at the COC early just to listen to his analysis of the daily activity and the plans for the night as he rifled through his target cards. There was entirely too much work to be done. Under other circumstances, I would have listened to him for hours."

Meredith also recalls, "Quite often we'd jump up on the bunker at night and watch some of our fires that we'd planned for the night and see the secondary explosions. Kent Steen recalls Harry's bravery. "One night after arranging one of our artillery raids, Harry had run to the top of the bunker to witness our handiwork. A 'short' 4.2-inch mortar from our own battery flopped in between his legs. It had gone far enough to be armed but miraculously did not explode. I asked him if he had been frightened. He answered, 'No, it is not my time.'"

Perhaps, it was this self-confident elan and lack of fear that inspired confidence to those near him. "Harry was fearless," writes Bernie Cole. Captain Baig went to Khe Sanh with four assumptions: (1) that the enemy would follow a master plan which had been promulgated from a headquarters, not on the field; (2) that the PAVN commander in the field at Khe Sanh could not and would not alter the battle plan to any significant degree, even if new conditions arose; (3) that the modus operandi was predictable and the general concept determinable once the opening moves were known; and (4) "that the plan encompassed classic siege tactics as practiced and studied by General Giap during and after the siege of Dien Bien Phu and as modified by experience gained at Con Thien in September 1967."

Encircling enemy troops unrelentingly persisted in rebuilding and advancing their trench and sap network approach to KSCB despite continuous, close-in air strikes of HE (High Explosive) and napalm, artillery — even close-in B-52 strikes. Baig noted that three or four days later the whole area would be swarming again with NVA soldiers digging their Juggernaut: "The ant-like mentality of the enemy apparently made them continue rebuilding. What we were concerned with primarily was an enemy rush on the wire. We never thought the enemy would fight in quite the inept way he did. We really thought we could expect mass, human-sea attacks." For those who had the most data, who continuously poured over the various reports, the situation at Khe Sanh was indeed ominous. Kent Steen later noted, "We were all very concerned. The NVA made some big mistakes. They underestimated us. I don't think people realize just how close it was."

George Allen, the CIA's Deputy SAVA, was well conversant with the parallels with Dien Bien Phu, having been the U.S. Army's principal analyst during that battle. "I was able to make a connection between what happened at Dien Bien Phu and what happened at Khe Sanh and to understand the difference. That's one of the things that leads to my judgment about Khe Sanh having been 'the real thing.'" Was the situation really so tenuous, so desperate in fact as well as in perception, by those on the ground and in the news media? Was it necessary for President Johnson to require each of the Joint Chiefs to pledge in writing that Khe Sanh would not fall?

In the decades following the Siege battle at Khe Sanh, some historians have questioned the reality of the size of the enemy threat at Khe Sanh. They dismiss any parallel to Dien Bien Phu as mere sensationalism. Those of us who were there know better. It may well be that any comparison with Dien Bien Phu (DBP) is faulty for not considering our logistic capability and commitment, as well as our tactical, aerial, and intelligence support. That, however, does not dismiss the unrelenting pursuit of a tactical reenactment of DPB on the Khe Sanh Battlefield by the PAVN! This was made evident in assaults on outposts (Khe Sanh Village and 861 on 21 Jan, 861A on 4-5 Feb, LangVei on 7 Feb, Hill 64 on 8 Feb) and from the construction of trenches, bunker complexes, parallels, saps and connectors and other "siege works" despite savage napalm and very close-in TPQ-10 and B-52 strikes.

Harry's effectiveness, both from his superior intellectual ability and education as well as his obvious possession of an intuitive "sixth sense," were not always beyond criticism. Did he go too far? Michael Archer, sitting at his radio in the regimental bunker, recalls an emotional encounter. "On February 27, as the enemy massed their troops and tanks to make the last big attempt to take the base, Baig erased the grease pencil circle on his map with a small piece of cheesecloth and ordered a B-52 strike on [Khe Sanh] Village. The area was completely obliterated. I was sitting right there when the Colonel stormed into the FSCC room that evening. I had never seen him so angry. He shouted, 'Harry, I understand that you just bombed the ville!' Baig courteously replied, 'Yes, Sir.' Lownds reminded him that he had strictly forbidden it. Baig calmly explained the necessity of having to do it — tanks, assault troops [a regimental assault force was massing], and anti-aircraft guns. I will never forget the look on the Colonel's face. It was part anger at the insubordination and part resignation to the fact that it was done, and there was nothing he could do about it now. He looked at Baig for several moments and then said, quite seriously, 'Harry, I wouldn't want to be you when the war crime trials start.' The Colonel turned and left the room. The whole episode again made me suspect that Captain Baig was accountable to a superior officer higher up the chain of command than Colonel Lownds, and I think Lownds knew it, too."

As significant as the new gadgets of war were — sensors, new SIGINT devices and procedures — far greater was the mental grasp and creative response of Harry Baig. As the ancient Biblical writer of Ecclesiastes noted: "Wisdom [in the sense of practical knowledge] is more useful than weapons of war." What Harry "saw" was not so much individual targets but the fluid process; for the NVA were intensely mobile, occupying a mortar or anti-aircraft or headquarters position for a short time, moving from one to another, and perhaps reoccupying the original position. The focus became not on where the enemy is but where they are moving through and to, where they could be projected to be, where their supporting reserve forces or retreat routes might be, given terrain conditions and extensive knowledge of NVA tactics. It involved thinking like a NVA, a feat at which Harry was particularly adept — with deadly consequence for them and saving consequence for all the American defenders! The NVA the battlefield was dynamic, not static.

Interpretation and evaluation of the information together with familiarization and grasp of NVA tactics and analysis of terrain features enabled Harry to discern the dynamic battlefield and target it appropriately. The "total picture" or pattern that emerged involved locations of reserve forces, supply dumps, routes of reinforcement or withdrawal: these were targets as significant as detection of actual units or vehicles. An example to illustrate this may be seen in the NVA "siege works" of trenches to the southeast of the combat base, well known to all. "We knew full well the NVA were seeking to snuggle up to the Khe Sanh base within the 3-kilometer sanctuary that they thought they had from B-52 strikes," he said. Harry's interpretation of the sensor data proved especially significant to the defenders of Khe Sanh on Hill 861-A (Co E/2/26) the night of 4/5 February.

The NVA plan on 21 January, as revealed by Lt. La Than Tonc, indicated attacks on Hills 861 and 881S prior to the main assault on the combat base. During the nights of 3/4 and 4/5 February, sensors reported considerable heavy movement from the northwest of Hill 881S on a ridge to the west and southwest of the hill. The "Z" shaped ridge approaches the hill to a point about 3000 meters away and then runs south for some 4000 meters and then abruptly turns east, ending about 3000 meters due south of the hill. "During that phase of the siege, the S2 and FSCC personnel knew little of sensor accuracy and reliability, and I knew even less. And so, I embraced the theory that it would be folly to become erudite in one's ignorance. Therefore, believe that which the sensors purport to say. Thus, from the evidence of that night, I concluded that at least two battalions of infantry had reached a point 3000 meters to the northwest of Hill 881S; and that they had come from the direction of the known location of the 325C Division."

The total count of enemy troops reported by the sensors was estimated to be between 1,500 and 2,000 men. At first, Harry evaluated them to be resupply convoys and the FSCC reacted by attacking each sensor target as it appeared. However, the second night Harry's thinking veered to envision an enemy regiment and a possible attack against Hill 881S. Majors Coolidge and Hudson concurred that an attack in the thick mist was imminent. Harry knew that NVA tactical doctrine called for an attacking force to move to its assault position in echelons, make a last minute reconnaissance, and to attack in waves. If this were a regiment, then the force would be dispersed in regimental column, battalions on line (one behind the other). A target box of 1,000 x 300 meters square was drawn to the south of Hill 881S around a point where a large force, moving at two kilometers an hour (the NVA rate of march in darkness and mist), would have reached in the time interval since the activation of the last sensor. At each end of this block, a gently curving 1,000 meter line was drawn, extending towards and about the southwestern and southeastern slopes of Hill 881S. "For about 30 minutes, commencing at approximately 0300, 5 February, the five batteries within KSCB of 1/13 and the 4 batteries of 175mm guns poured continuous fire into various places of the block and along the two circumscribing lines at each end." At the end of the Siege, Harry briefed the staff at the ISC in NKP where Lt. Col. Peese, USAF, told Harry that the acoustic sensors in the area to the south and southwest of Hill 881S had recorded the voices of hundreds of men running in panic through the darkness and heavy fog in a southerly direction. Defenders on Hill 881-S were oblivious to the nightmare and loss of life they were spared by Harry.

Hill 881S was spared a regimental-sized assault by NVA infantry that night. Unfortunately, two NVA battalions managed to creep to the northeast of Hill 861-A. There were no sensors near Hills 861 and 861-A, yet Harry readily took responsibility for his error in not recalling the NVA battle plan for simultaneous assaults on 881S and 861. "When the latter was attacked two hours later, I, the Target Officer and alleged expert on NVA doctrine, was caught flat-footed," he wrote.

In another letter, he wrote: "Once more, Marine NCOs and other ranks made up for the mistakes of the alleged brains of and on the staff, as they have done throughout our history." As it was, one battalion managed to close on 861-A. The second battalion "met a revolting fate. Attended to by one hour of shelling and air strikes which landed on all the possible assemble/reserve areas at the base of the hill."

That didn't infer that Harry did nothing! His immediate response effectively annihilated the second battalion from also attacking E/2/26 on Hill 861-A. Artillery and air support for Hill 861-A involved three simultaneous phases. 1/13 loosed protective fires on the slopes of the hill with three batteries, while a fourth battery concentrated on the area where the enemy movement was the thickest and then rolled down the slope to prevent the enemy from retiring or being reinforced. Secondly, Mark Swearengen, the 175mm Liaison Officer, went to Colonel Hennelly, Kent Steen, and Harry Baig and said, "Let me give you a 'wall of steel,'" and proceeded to direct his four batteries of 175s at Camp Carroll and the Rockpile to fire the "wall of steel" which embraced the base of the hill from the northeast. The objective was to saturate the area where the enemy reserve battalion was estimated to be. The "wall of steel" was moved slowly up the slopes until it reached a point 200 meters from the wire. "Within this space the battery from KSCB rolled to and fro, covering the area from where the attackers had come and into which Captain Breeding was energetically heaving them." Remaining batteries continued their protective missions, adjusted according to the defender's desires. The third phase of air strikes from the rapidly assembling aircraft involved TPQ-10 directed air strikes in the form of 200- and 300-meter ripples dropped outboard of and parallel to the "wall of steel" to avoid check fires. "Bombs fell on known mortar clusters, possible assembly areas, and throughout the area to the far rear of the assault battalion. Enemy doctrine frequently positions the reserve battalion directly behind the assault unit. At all costs, the FSCC was determined to prevent their juncture. The reserve battalion never materialized."

Harry was primarily an artilleryman and his contributions to this aspect of the defense of Khe Sanh were significant. Harry wrote: "The artillery initiative was ours, and we held it throughout the siege, despite the worst croaking of sundry, inexperienced correspondents. Our motto was 'Be generous.' Had the NVA been capable of our artillery techniques, they could and would have blown us out of Khe Sanh. The siege clearly established not only the bankruptcy of the NVA master plan, but also the ineptitude of their vaunted artillery. The press never saw this clearly." Thus, more and more targets became apparent to Baig as the siege progressed. The NVA's rigid adherence to its doctrine and plan made it possible to determine remaining and undiscovered portions of a complex once part of it was located.

"Consequently," notes Baig, "we had far more known and confirmed targets than we could possibly use. Eventually, we began to attack them en masse instead of individually... Mortar and artillery positions, of which the former were not worth counting and the latter exceeded 160 separate sites, were bombed and shelled nightly in patterns of fire corresponding to NVA doctrinal position area engineering to destroy the unseen battery ammunition dumps."

An average night's pre-planned artillery fire might include 4-6 TOTs from 9 batteries, 4-6 Army and 10-15 Marine separate battalion TOTs, 40-50 battery multiple volley individual missions, 20-30 battery H&Is. Sensors accounted for at least 20 battery missions a night. Frequently, TOTs were fired into a recent Arc light area 10-15 minutes after the bombers had passed. A further issue of Arc lights were executed on most nights to catch the survivors.

Harry Baig's application of artillery tactics mostly suggested and devised by the creative men of the Khe Sanh FSCC defeated the enemy. According to the Regimental S-3, Lt. Col. Edward J. A. Castagna, they "turned the tide by hammering these people prior to their jump-off points. Several times we knew, or we figured we knew that these people were in assembly areas and actually were preparing for the attack. This was given to us through these sensor devices."

Young artillery officers such as Lt. William Smith stood in awe of Harry Baig. "I learned a lot from him about sitting down, and while everybody's racing around with a remarkable grasp of the obvious, you should be sitting down and looking back and trying to figure out what's really happening here, what would I be doing if I were over there? He taught me an awful lot. As a graduate of Ft. Sill, I had learned some of it in a theoretical sense, but I had never been able to use it on such a grand scale. Later, when I went to Camp Pendleton and ran operations with reserve units in the summer time as a regular, we never went anywhere without a Harry-type fire plan." Smith recalls, "Harry Baig used to call himself the composer and I said, 'Well, then, I'm the maestro!' I'd go to Harry and say, 'Could you write in a little bass? How about some 175s?'"

For his contributions during the Khe Sanh siege battle, Harry Baig was awarded a Legion of Merit, an unusual award for a junior officer to receive. The Citation reads in part: "Captain Baig exhibited exceptional professionalism and imagination in planning a highly effective defense fire plan for the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Displaying keen analytic and organizational ability, he skillfully compared all such data received with other current intelligence information, compiling an overall estimate of the enemy's disposition that, when utilized for target designation, yielded a most effective tool for the assignment of targets for supporting arms."

Following a 24-day leave to the United States, Harry returned on 15 June 1968. His next duty assignment was US Military Advisory Command Thailand, although his official record of service indicates he was assigned to the U.S. State Department for this duty. His mother recalls his happiness. He was finally able to be with his wife and daughter, and he wrote, "At last, I can have my family with me in lovely Bangkok, and my office is next to the Prime Minister."

"Officially, he was training an Intelligence Corps for the Thai Army but as he spoke French, he could slip into Laos in camouflage on secret trips," notes his mother.

His friend, Robert E. Coolidge recalls, "He was specifically recruited for that job, to do that [assignment] in Laos." During this time, he was promoted to Major (on 01 Dec 1968), and for his work he was awarded a second Legion of Merit, which noted: "His contributions...were of extraordinary benefit to the Royal Thai Government and to the overall furtherance of United States intelligence efforts in Thailand. These contributions were in fact of such a nature as to prompt the Prime Minister of Thailand to officially request Major Baig's normal tour of duty extended."

On his birthday, 13 January 1971, his mother had a nightmare of his tragic death exactly as it was to happen. The 39-year-old Harry, his 30-year-old wife Diane and his 10-year-old daughter Cecile were apparently asleep in their rooms on the fourth floor of the Imperial Hotel, Bangkok, Thailand, on 20 April 1971 when a fire broke out from an overheared grill unnoticed by a dozing cook, which in turn ignited grease and bottled cooking gas. Flames quickly entered the ventilation/air conditioning system. Mysteriously, the fire escape doors at each end of the corridor had been bolted shut from the outside, and speculation soon arose that this had been an assassination. Harry's mother notes: "When Munir's death was announced, some thought he must have been assassinated because of his work in Laos."

He, his wife, and daughter were all buried in a single grave in Arlington National Cemetery not far from President Kennedy's grave on Tuesday morning, 4 May 1971, following a service at Ft. Myer Chapel. To the amazement of his father, mother, and brother, several Generals (including Generals Cushman and Tompkins) were present. During a luncheon in the officers' mess, the family first heard of Harry's Laotian exploits. His father remembered, "The information slipped out at a luncheon in the military club given us by a Marine Major who mentioned what an authentic Laotian Munir looked once made-up and dressed in special clothes with his French accent. On asking what for, he answered those were special missions permitted by the President through Kissinger. As a life-long diplomat, I shut up! At that luncheon, I was also told that Munir was due to return to work with General Tompkins, who wept on receiving the news of his death." The family was invited to eat at the Commandant's residence at 8th & I during which

General Chapman said, "Mrs. Baig, you have lost a son, but we have lost a special Marine." Kent Steen writes, "With the perspective of age, I realize the Marine Corps attracts strongly put together people, but Harry was clearly of another genius... I was more aware than most how near [i.e., tenuous] a thing our survival was...he couldn't get enough credit. The rest of us were probably interchangeable — Harry was one of a kind."

Harry's early death and highly classified work while at Khe Sanh has undoubtedly relegated him to an undeserved obscurity among veterans of the Khe Sanh Siege. As is apparent, however, many of us who survived that battle, perhaps all of us, owe our lives to this man. His great-grandfather may not have been able to save the fort at Bijapur, but Harry ensured that our fort at Khe Sanh would not fall. All of us who are Khe Sanh veterans owe this "prince from the Far East" our deepest gratitude!

One of those obscure and forgotten Marines, to whom all who survived Khe Sanh owe their very lives, was a Mongol prince re-clothed in the uniform of a U.S. Marine Captain — Mirza Munir Baig, known to everyone who knew him as "Harry."

One other note. I was directly involved in the battle on Hill 861A on Feb 05 1968. I can attest that the constant and accurate artillery fire directed by Harry Baig saved us from being overrun that night. And I will, at this time, for the men of E Co, 2/26, say "Thanks Harry," may God be with you.

Remembering a Friend

by James "Jimbo" Wodecki

Corporal Jay Books and I were born in Pennsylvania. He and I graduated from high school in June of 1964. We both were in the FFA and joined the Marine Corps together. He went to Vietnam the same month I went in — February 66. He was stationed with Supply Company FLSG-A, FLC; I was with H&S Company FLSG-A, FLC. We both were transferred to DPP#10 in June of 1966 at Da Nang Airbase. We became friends and enjoyed talking about home and our girlfriends. His was named Diane; I forgot the name of mine. I remembered his girlfriend's name because she and Jay were going to get married when he returned to the States. Both of our fathers were carpenters, and we both worked for them. The similarities were uncanny.

We put our names in for the CAC unit they were forming when we moved our base to a place called Red Beach, located just north of Da Nang. However, he felt that serving with a logistics unit wasn't his style. Jay thought he could contribute some of his carpentry skills to assist the Vietnamese people if he could transfer to a Marine pacification team. I just wanted some action. Jay was accepted and went to a Combined Action Committee (CAC) Hotel-1 at Red Beach, becoming one of the eight original members of that unit. I volunteered to go to Khe Sanh.

Jay's CAP platoon worked long hours helping build schools and hospitals in Quang Nam province. In a letter home, Jay wrote, "We go on sweeps and patrols just like the infantry. We work with the Vietnamese people, administer medical aid, and build dwellings." In another letter to a family friend, he wrote, "I know God has a plan for each of our lives. I have a lot to live for, and there's a lot I miss and would like to do. But I try not to think of home. My mind is always on thoughts of getting wounded or killed."

Between patrols and working in the local villages, Jay was assigned to build an observation tower that dominated the skyline of the Force Logistics Command base camp at Red Beach. At approximately 0200 hours on the morning of 16 Nov 1966, the Viet Cong launched a surprise attack at Red Beach. Jay was killed in action during that attack. He was blown out of an observation tower by an exploding rocket and was thought to have died by concussion, or by the impact of the fall.

The tragic irony of his death was that his body was found at the bottom of the tower he had built. Red Beach was later renamed Camp Books in his honor. I always remember Jay on the 16th of November and say a prayer for him, as I returned but Jay didn't. Jay is buried at the Brethren in Christ Church in Cleona, Pennsylvania. The cemetery is located above the church on a hill overlooking his hometown. In the church is a stand where the guest book is placed. Over the stand is a special plaque honoring Jay's memory. Jay was straightforward, dedicated, and mature beyond his years for a nineteen-year-old. He took great pride in being a United States Marine and serving his country.

Echo 2/26

On one of those heavily burdened but portentous mornings in early March 1968, one of the day's resupply choppers arrived with its usual gusty flap. Accompanying its approach was the chronically intense flurry of chaos; incoming enemy mortar rounds whose sudden, fracturing blasts created small, jaggedly gouged craters, men yelling excitedly, and the scent of fear hanging like a pall over the hill. Business as usual.

Mail call was subsequently sounded throughout Echo Company. We were scattered evenly around and on top of the hill known on some headquarters map as 861 Alpha. As such, it seemed to me quite a sanitary, if not indifferent, designation. For us, this place of desperation and misery was, by now, our home.

I, among others, had received one of the coveted prizes: a letter from home. Along with mom's usual well-written reminder of better places and times were several snapshots. This was a delightful treat. There was so much news to be eagerly digested from the home front. Yet as I read, it seems to me now that the words my mom penned then were cautious and well chosen. She meticulously crafted her sentences as if these incredible events at Khe Sanh, of which I was taking part, were happening at the intersection of other time and other place. To her apparently, it was all playing itself out grotesquely upon dissimilar life forms, surely dissimilar from her son. But for a small token of home such as this letter, I was becoming daily more thankful, regardless of what was so scrupulously left unsaid.

Only years later did certain of these compositions with their pictorial contents bring into relief the actual significance of that moment in my short lived history. I'm certain my psychological maturation made me amblyopic or downright blind to more hidden realities. Survival preoccupied me cognitively so that I could not see that one set of distant occurrences in the world was pitting itself against the feverish ones happening all around me. We, parent and child, were shifting toward differing planets. This was not necessarily a first for our family relationships. There was, however, quite unlike the formative years I spent in their home, even then a veil, a curtain if you will, slipping trenchantly between our separating lives.

One of mom's attending, albeit significant, photos threw a particularly impertinent gibe at me. It was a picture of my best buddy, sitting at my place at the dinner table, eating corn on the cob in my home, grinning ear to ear, so to speak. This struck me deep in a manner and place I had not been jabbed prior to that time. I did laugh outwardly at it though. As far as he and I were concerned, hearth and home were always apportioned equally and with regularity when I was there. We were best buddies, lifelong schoolmates busy with the male bonding mode. But that was then and I was currently absent, my presence missed there. Now I was here, ten thousand miles from there and then. Ten thousand lifetimes separated us. And here, upon this captured fragment of a Kodak moment his smile glared up at me. That was not its intent, but that's what it did nonetheless. His posture did not possess calculation or the hint of a mean spirit. It was full of warmth. It was fraught with "I wish you were here so we could goof off together one more time." It was brimming with playful banter. By his aggregate appearance I could tell he was clueless. Naiveté dripped innocently from the glossy image onto the red dirt of the hill where men were hugging the womb of survival and dying daily all the same. But the misguided energy it required to take that picture and send it was misspent with equanimity for the effect it elicited.

His context and mine stood right there and right then, counter to each other. His atmosphere was soaked with the aromatic smells of home and safety. Mine hung almost fluid with the stench of sweat, sand bags and death. A thick, impenetrable curtain was curiously separating us. Some important and significant event was happening which did not reach me where it counted. Yet, all the same, the form in which the grinding, deadly, ordered routine that my life had now taken glared back into his world, questioning. His savory corn entrée stood juxtaposed to the leathery edibles to which I had become, albeit unwillingly, accustomed. I did not wish it so. I wished for any place, any time, any meal but this.

This war was more absorbed in culling us, her servile inmates, for brutish and destructive purposes than for tickling our American palates. Her meals were tedium served with heaping portions of terror. Her sauces were exhaustion, wounds and disease. Her desserts were psychosis and depletion by death. Corn on the cob and all it represented was completely out of character for this voracious avocation.

Quite unlike my best buddy back in the world, I, like you, would dine on the usual B-something unit, heated on a make-shift stove by one of those foul yet necessary heat tabs. In my bunker, this source of solid rocket fuel was noxious at best. At worst, it was notorious for fouling the air and burning my eyes so that they would tear. Food preparation required grimy hands and a gas mask. The meal itself was nefarious for its after-effects, that being heartburn. We all skulkingly dined in our bunkers. To eat outside in the open meant possible death. You remember. My best buddy did not know this. This picture proved that. The drapes were thick to my untrained senses and opaque to my inner eyes.

Permit me to press the fast forward button. It is now the month of March in the year of our Lord, 2001. My wife and I are trying to find the correct access road to the recently erected Target store looming ahead of us. This is a moving, self-absorbed section of St. Louis with which we are both unfamiliar. She is giving me her most hopeful conjecture as the designated trip navigator. An added dimension to a more full appreciation of this scenario is her chatter on her cell phone to our daughter. (She can walk and chew bubble gum at the same time.) Catherine's directions to me are expectedly uncertain but equally and unfortunately divided in their affections. Neither of us knows exactly what street to take nor the turn lane from which to take it.

In a few desperate moments my manufactured inner calm has become very confused, internally enlivened and all but debilitating. The mass of chaotically moving vehicles in specific directions toward their own agendas vexes me, because each is completely indifferent to my pathetic situation. They are all eating corn on the cob in their homes, and I am dining on C rations in my bunker. Has anything really changed? Here and now, the world is as unaware and unfeeling of my present dilemma as it was then and there of that situation. That, too, is a source of frustration. They are selfishly absorbed in their own subsistence. But what did I expect? Again, life seems at variance with itself and with me. I know the curtain is falling. After 30 plus years, I now know its color, its aromatic lure, its size and texture. It will embrace me, and I it, as it falls onerous and suffocating. I have been here many times. I am being wizened by its vulgar regularity. I feel leaden inside, weighted physically by my own angst.

I slow the car quickly, dodging traffic, moving to the first left turn lane I see. Having arrived at the turn, I discover in one maddening instant that I should have continued straight ahead. It is the next left I am to take, not the current one in which I now find us both. I am becoming unable to deal appropriately with Catherine's inability to recognize that I need her full attention, not the lesser half of it. This is becoming secretly serious. I am certain she does not know that I feel targeted and trapped, that the war is here and now. The moment is, if anything, obtuse to all outsiders. I sense death is imminent. Survival is all that remains. Incoming!

Two-thousand-one is nineteen-sixty-eight cloaked. Catherine is chattering tediously one second and then laughing uncontrollably into the phone the next. Nothing has changed from that letter in March 1968 or that naïve photo. I inwardly withdraw to the safety of the world that I have erected, brick by brick, to survive. I have "curtained." I am now alone in a car shared with my wife in the midst of several hundred moving blurs of steel and glass and rubber. Everyone is clueless. No one cares. The ubiquitous then and there has once more traversed over into the here and now. I will "participate" in the Target store when I find it, but I will be detached. I cannot care. I will once more strain all my emotional reserves to conceal my deepening, ungainly depression.

In conjunction with my seceding inner seclusion, my fuse is now lit, ready to explode. My 3 compatriots — withdrawal, anger and depression — have taken up their usual state of residency. I am unable to share them or this with anyone, not even my wife although she senses it all. She doesn't need this, but here it is. This is as infuriating as it is physically draining. This is dangerous. I want to be in a bunker, sitting alone. This is life behind the curtain.

The lawnmower has sounded for me a generous note to the lineup for the day's coming tasks. It sputters momentarily and then roars to life after a few

Bro's

Names appear out of the past,
For hours my heart beats fast.
First comes the joy I've found,
someone who was once lost!
Then memories flood my mind,
again I see the flash and feel the blast.

Depression and pain I feel,
an emptiness in my chest.
What happened to the rest?
Where is Frenchy, Coffey, Crow, and Cann?
Marines from Recon and 1-26 move
through my mind, double time.

Rockets, mortars, artillery blast,
sand bags seep red, blood mixed with red clay. Holes in the runway, must replace,
sections ripped to shreds.

I'm caught in the past,
nowhere to run, can't hide.
See the flash?
Feel the blast?

Who's in that bag, zipped foot to head?
Is it me, or one of my Bro?

My dream is over, my eyes were never shut.
It's over, it's done,
I'm home at last!

sturdy yanks with the cord. And thus, I go determined and expectant on my way, back and forth, forth and back. One section of the yard has now been shorn. The mowing is easy. Onward to the next province of the yard, I say to myself. And there is currently no hint that my morning will come to a jarring interruption from which I will not recover quickly.

The whack, bang of spinning metal mower blades slicing firmly into a grass-hidden, mostly buried steel beam brings my day's schedule to a malicious and violent stop. The sudden quiet vibrates thickly, my ears and hands suddenly tingling. I have stupidly run over a hidden, immovable object. The mower's crankshaft has succumbed. It is bent within the innards of the smoking machine, now gone silent. It is dead. Killed unexpectedly in the line of duty because of my lack of attention, exposed is my inability to detect what I could not control and somehow should have observed.

The first object I find to reflect my kindling rage is a large, split log from our stack of firewood nearby. I throw it into the neighbor's yard. Silence engulfs me for, I cannot hear. Stillness. My spleen once more vents its displeasure. I am swept insensibly headlong by audacious, turbulent waves of emotion. I pick up Duke's half-chewed softball and heave it wildly somewhere into the wood lined creek. Catherine is saying something about my trying to fix it. Fix it? I know running lawn mowers with contorted crankshafts is oxymoronic. Life as I know it has taken pause.

The entourage of those few insane moments has put me on display, and my unfettered energy seems to have run its full heedless course into unabridged lethargy. I sit motionless in the grass. I long for solitude. I wish for sleep, the type from which one never awakens. My jaws and teeth are fixed, immovable. A tightness seeps into my chest. Some unwelcomed, foreign tonnage pulls heavily upon my abdomen. And yet I am completely hollow inside. My body futilely repels my wife's desperate need for verbal intrusion into my space. Once more I stare disconsolately into and through the curtain, into the time gone by of Khe Sanh. That yesterday has thoroughly manhandled me once more. I have broken the mower. There is no room on 861 Alpha, then or now, for anything broken. Ruined means useless, and useless means death is imminent. All meaning has hushed in the quiet air.

Catherine is once more suggesting that I do something, go get another mower; go down to Sears Hardware. Her suggestions nettle me. I continue my motionless and absent stare. But it can all be set right, she protests. I remain fixed in past time and space. The lawn has to be mowed in the present. It will all be OK, she repeats, if only to reassure herself. Yet the curtain has already come down, firmly. We are now in two different worlds. I am in Vietnam, fighting for my existence. She is in O'Fallon, Missouri fighting for and against two concepts. She is skirmishing franticly to have her lawn manicured on the one hand. And on the other, she is trying with equal inner ferocity not to trot over and retrieve the log I just threw in order not to bludgeon me to death with it. Two tragic events and thirty-three years of distance have undertaken the vanity of fusion. Transfixed physically within a six-foot radius, Catherine and I could not be more distant from each other in mind and body.

In combat, one does not break or discard his gear intentionally or otherwise without that singular action producing dire circumstances. You do not break the sight for the mortar tube and then actuate a fire mission. You do not allow rust in the chamber of your rifle and expect to fire your weapon when someone trips an ambush. You do not let the battery on your radio go dead and trust that you will maintain contact with your air and artillery support by your good looks, if the soup really hits the fan.

Yet, each of these acute possibilities is internalized and perpetuated all the same, trial upon trial, decade upon decade, long after the smoke and din of battle has died away. Bent crankshafts cannot be separated handily from broken mortar sights. They have mysteriously become mentally indistinguishable in the main. The delirium tremens of the past is separated from the life of the present by no greater distance than the thickness of psychological draperies. The past and present cling tenaciously, intertwined between the weavings of our own mental and material makeup.

Inner rage at uncontrollable, outward circumstances draws the curtain taut on a weekly basis for me. And life brings it down with irresistible regularity probably for you, as well. I have read several books on the subject of making peace with the traumas of the past. I am supposed to, it is suggested, bring all that anger to roost in other places by time honored and workable means. I am sure the authors mean well. But I remain dubious. How can one truly come to a living armistice with one's own hellish war? Certainly, I cannot sue for peace in the sense in which they mean. The anger remains because the war remains fully intact and alive. It does not persist motionlessly, as if out of breath, used up or rusted shut. The events of the past are the living paraphernalia of the mind. They know not surrender, nor can they recognize the need to capitulate to my psychological insolvency. Vietnam remains the long, diffuse shadow on the wall of my soul.

The three, aforementioned historical markers are the regular makeup of my life, past and ever present. I can assume that the future will present, for my perusal, much of the same. Each is not threadbare for they individually shoulder the undeniable inbreeding of similarity. The searching and struggling for peace with an enemy that does not have peace on its docket, has, as of this writing, not been overcome by any recent and personal battles or formulas.

To me, it is noteworthy that the enemy lies within psychologically and at the gates of time and circumstances simultaneously. He is the black pajama-clad warrior of the night fenced outside, yet always alert for any weaknesses that may afford him entrance into my world. He eludes detection one minute and openly pronounces his arrival at his discretion the next.

I have discovered no ready made 12-step formulas, Biblical or otherwise, to deter his aggravating intentions of disruption and depression. Although he is parasitic in nature, his residence is my emotional bloodstream. These light and dark cells must coexist as long as I remain alive. Not a comforting thought. But I find solace in the lives of others who have trod the perplexing and painful road of life before me and thus proceed by sure steps alongside my less certain ploddings. The Apostle Peter writes this about our PTSD, "Therefore, let those who suffer according to the will of God commit their souls to Him in doing good, as to a faithful Creator."

In our last issue, we learned the history of the Poilane Family from the memoirs of Madame Poilane, whose family ran the Coffee Plantation at Khe Sanh. In this issue, the Marines have arrived at Khe Sanh and the Hill Battles of 1967 are about to begin.

Chapter Two

The Marines who arrived knew our school very well. And when passing by, they would stop and give treats to the children. They also brought food for the Montagnard children so they could have a balanced diet for their noon meal. They were content when the Marines left. We had a little "Bambi." We bought him from the Montagnards for 500 Piastres. He was found in the brush, his mother most likely had been killed. The commanding colonel at the Marine base was our friend. He often brought us powered milk. Bambi ate at least four times a day. There were a lot of photographs taken of the Marines on their many visits passing through the plantation.

The arrival of the nuns was a very good thing for me. I found myself less alone, especially with the Mother Superior who was French. I knew her very well. My health was not good after the death of my father-in-law. Being cut off from the town was difficult. We liked to get together with our friends from time to time, after experiencing the austere life that we had on the plantation. There were only Frenchmen at Khe Sanh, with the priest and our planter friends. We would gather every Sunday at the house to have our noon meal and evening with the priest and M. Llinares. After dinner, we would play tarot card games until midnight.

It was really our only distraction, since the work did not allow much during the coffee harvest. During the monsoon, there was no question of working. The rain never stopped. You must know tropical rains to really understand a monsoon. Then, there was the humidity, the drizzle and constant fog in February and March before ever seeing the sun in April.

It was then that an attack of the Viet Cong occurred on three hills, North 881, 861 & 881, which were all visible from our house. The culminating point was the Tooth of the Tiger, at about 1700 meters, on a mountain located very close to us facing the Marine base. I think these three hills could be the natural boundary between the North and South, since we were said to be twenty kilometers from the border. That was difficult enough to evaluate. This attack lasted for three weeks. If my memory is good, it happened suddenly, with no one expecting it. Everything was calm, too calm. The Marines started bombing these three hills, trying to force the VC out. It was all in vain as the Viet Cong were at the bottom, well into the shelter of the mountain dugouts. They were able to prepare their food without anyone seeing the smoke. They had plenty of water and were content with what little they had to live on. They were, therefore, very strong while hearing the planes coming to bomb them.

From our house we could see the bombs leaving the planes. The bombing went on day and night. Other times, the Marines flew in reinforcements. When the Marines evacuated their wounded, the VC responded with machine guns, which they had camouflaged in the forest. We did not take it seriously and continued to harvest the coffee. The Marine visits became rare; we understood why. The Montagnards did not seem affected by what was going on around them. As for us, we became disturbed by the incessant rotations of the C-123 and C-130 airplanes. The noise stopped us from sleeping most nights. Our friend, the Colonel, took the time to give us any news. I think if there was any immediate danger, he would have been the first to tell us to leave the plantation.

As soon as there was a lull, the Marines came to our house to reassure us and to exchange a few ideas. The Colonel gave us his laundry (at our request.) That certainly freed him from an unpleasant job. His wife sent him packages from the United States, and he never failed to bring treats for the children and us.

The attack finally ended and everyone breathed a little easier. Each Monday morning the Colonel brought us his laundry. When he came to pick it up in the afternoon, he was all wet. The rescue of the three hills had cost a lot in human lives. He had however, saved Khe Sanh from an attack. One cannot forget that the Ho Chi Minh Trail was there, very near, and we all knew it.

One can ask how a surprise attack was possible. One must not forget that numerous Montagnards worked at the base and were able to observe the movements of planes, the locations of trenches, and where the machine guns were located. It is very possible that there were VC among the Montagnards. I am now able to say that the chief of the VC among the Montagnards was a woman, a young girl whom had taught me to speak "Bru." I earned her confidence, and she had confided in me. She came to the market at Khe Sanh, dressed as a simple Montagnard gathering information. It was difficult for me to betray the confidence she had entrusted in me.

The increase of men and materials at the base left us less calm than as we had been prior to the attacks on the three hills. The VC retreated but were regrouping and preparing for another offensive. Although we feared they would attack again, we remained at the plantation. The harvest was not finished; it was May or June of 1967. It was necessary to earn a living and eat. At that time of the year, the rains began, and the Montagnards' provisions were diminishing. They survived eating sweet potatoes, manioc, bamboo shoots, and whatever vegetables they could find in the brush.

During the next six months, it was calm. Nothing abnormal happened as the year came to an end. The Christmas celebrations continued as usual. I attended Françoise's eighth birthday party in October 1967. We made a nice cake, and the Marines brought an even bigger one. It took several Marines to carry it. I forgot to point out that Felix had killed a spotted panther the same day. The panther had killed a pig in a nearby village. He placed the trap the night before and his lure worked perfectly. Once it had been trapped, he shot it. The news quickly spread and everyone wanted to take a picture with the dead panther. Each person posed with it in a different manner. We had the skin sent home and tanned. I still have it along with two other skins from tigers which Felix also killed. They are all still in excellent condition.

January 1968 arrived, and the feast of Tet began early in February. Our workers left the plantation to celebrate. That was the only vacation time they were allowed during the year. When we were short of help, I took a Montagnard woman to do the cooking. She was very clean and cooked very well. Her name was M'Pi Ania. She had previously worked at the plantation during the time my mother-in-law ran operations.

The attack on Khe Sanh began at night on January 19th and 20th, 1968. We were surprised to hear the noise from the B-52s, which flew very high. The VC were in the village and had attacked the guard post, offices and the residence of the Chief of the District. We wanted to go to Mass but decided against it to keep the children out of danger. Father Mauvais had tried and was pushed back to the bridge of Khe Sanh, which crosses the Ta-Con River. The battle was becoming ferocious. No one left the Montagnard villages. The silence was unusual. Helicopters began bombing and firing at everything that moved. Disregarding the danger, late in the afternoon, we went to the home of Father Mauvais. Father Poncet was still in Hue City. Stray bullets from the helicopters struck the entrance to the home of the nuns, so we quickly returned to the plantation.

Felix called all of our workers to protect our house. They gathered things from the basement and slept on cots. The B-52s continued bombing and the noise was unbearable. Helicopters dropped off wounded South Vietnamese soldiers at the Old French Fort. Two of them managed to get to our house. I left the veranda and met another wounded soldier who told me his friend was seriously wounded and was hiding where we stored coffee. I called my husband Felix, who scolded me for leaving the house. Felix located the wounded soldier who was suffering from a broken shoulder. His bleeding had stopped and Felix decided not to change the soiled dressing, to prevent the bleeding from starting again. He gave him a shot of Penicillin and water, which seemed to revive him. Felix told both soldiers to remain where they were until the B-52s ceased bombing.

I omitted telling you that on Saturday, Mr. Miller, the American linguist, had came by the house to warn us that things were getting worse. My husband was not home at the time and when I later told him of the visit of Mr. Miller, he could see the fright on my face.

On Monday, there was still fighting in the village of Khe Sanh. It was rumored that the American forces were no longer giving ammunition to the Vietnamese Army. The nuns continued coming by the house as there was no question of their leaving. The Montagnards did not leave either. Towards the end of the afternoon, Mr. Llinares was able to join us. His son Emmanuel, remained at their house with the rest of the coolie workers.

On Tuesday, the Vietnamese from the villages of Khe Sanh and Cu Bach filed past the plantation carrying backpacks, heading towards the Marine base. Prior to the attack on the three hills, everything had been very peaceful. The sudden attack on the village of Khe Sanh had led to widespread panic. My husband Felix used his car to take the wounded Vietnamese soldiers to the Marine base. He was asked to drive the old and sick villagers to the Marine base. He made many trips in our old 2CV but had to stop, so the vehicle would be ready when it was our turn to leave. Some villagers offered Felix 500 Piastas for a ride, but he could not help them — we really needed the car. Felix instructed us to pack some necessary things and be ready to leave the plantation at any moment. The children were very scared and screamed every time the B-52s conducted a bombing raid. We just took with us the money we had received from the coffee crop we had sold, and a few trinkets and toiletries.

We were the last to leave the plantation. We released our dogs and little "Bambi," then locked the door and left for the Marine base in our old 2CV. When we arrived at the base there was total confusion. The planes that were to arrive to evacuate the villagers never arrived. The Marines did not know what to do. Father Mauvais, who did not want to leave, finally changed his mind and worked his way to the base. Felix spoke to the colonel in charge of Lang Vei, a village on the Lao Bao route. We told him we did not want to leave the area, and he suggested we go with him to Lang Vei. At that time, the North Vietnamese began firing rockets at the base and the children and I took refuge behind some metal barrels that contained pine tar, which got all over me. The children and I were an awful sight and scared to death. At that moment a civilian journalist began basking questions of us. What we were doing there, where we had come from, etc. I am sure she wasn't concerned that we were suffering and had left everything we loved behind; her concern was more of a journalistic nature. She took a picture of us that later appeared in the newspaper in France. Although the photo's appearance assured our families that we were okay, it just was not the proper time to take it.

Finally, the first C-123 arrived at the base. There was a great rush to get on the first plane. We waited, not wanting to be crushed or separated. We were ordered to join the crowd and get aboard. Felix refused, telling the Marines that they had to organize the villagers into groups to allow an orderly withdrawal. The Marines complied and when other planes arrived, it was done in an orderly manner. The planes were either going to Dong-Ha or Da Nang — we would have preferred Hue.

We left with a heavy heart, leaving everything we loved behind. When we arrived at Da Nang, we met the Miller family, which was a very pleasant surprise. Somehow they had been made aware that we would be arriving. We asked to be taken to the house where the nuns lived. It was January 22, 1968 and nothing else had happened at Da Nang. I cleaned some of the sticky tar, which was very difficult to remove, off of my legs and skirt. Two days later we left for Hue City and the School of Joan of Arc. We had many attachments there and Tet was quickly approaching. This meant everyone would be leaving to join his or her families to celebrate together. We did not know if we would ever be able to return to Khe Sanh. We settled in, having only the bare essentials we had taken with us when we left the plantation. We would have to buy whatever things we would need.

On the night of 31 January 1968, the Tet offensive began all over South Vietnam. We were awakened by gunfire and immediately covered the windows with an armoire. We put our mattresses under the beds to stretch out on. When night came, we left, taking what little we had with us. We worked our way through the streets to the main central building of the school. We saw the first Viet Cong enter the city from the big main gate. We put mattresses over the windows and sealed the building the best we could. Sister Henri was very scared and hid under the covers most of the time.

The central building was located across the street from Saint Francois-Xavier Church, and the VC had taken up a position in the steeple. When shots were exchanged between them and the American forces, bullets would strike the bell in the steeple, it sounded like the song of a bird. Finally, the bell fell to the ground as if it finally gave up its spirit.

We took our meals when the situation allowed it. Mostly, we stayed under the mattresses. The Rossignols, instructors who lived next door to the church, joined us. Soon after, about fifty other people — nuns and others preparing to be nuns — moved into our building. Fierce fighting broke out and at one point, the American soldiers almost attacked our building. We managed to warn them that we were all civilians, and it became necessary to evacuate the building. When we tried to make our way to the chapel there was street fighting everywhere! Civilians as well as the VC and American soldiers were running everywhere. We saw my Vietnamese mother-in-law with Jean-Vincent, Cosette and Nanou. They joined us and the American soldiers helped us get behind the chapel. We thought our last moments had arrived.

The Rossignols attempted to take refuge at the Faculty of Sciences building where everyone was being directed and which was now empty. We encountered a guard who refused to let anyone in. After a discussion, he allowed us entry but we were only given access to a room which was approximately 4 meters square. There wasn't food for anyone but at least we were not homeless. We stood back to back to use the least amount of space as possible. Little Jean-Marie, who was only four years old, cried that he wanted to go back to Joan of Arc. I did the best I could to calm him, although the sounds of the all night battle kept us awake all night.

The next morning the rest of the refugees arrived, those who knew the nuns cooked some rice. We each had a small bowl. It wasn't much but a comfort to our empty stomachs. Felix and two of the nuns went back to Joan of Arc and retrieved some blankets and small survival kits. Sister Paul Xavier brought back her black habit and some consecrated host. She gave communion to all the Christians at the shelter, which was a particularly moving moment. Jean-Marie watched very closely, his eyes speaking for him. For the first time, we knew he understood the significance of communion.

As more and more refugees arrived, the guards opened bigger rooms, which was a great improvement. We were finally able to stretch out. We did not know how long we would be at the shelter, so the extra room really helped. Felix began to organize the refugees, so we could all have at least two meals a day. The Americans gave Felix some raisins, cokes, and sugar. We had to guard them very closely, so that Françoise and Jean-Marie could eat a little better.

The only place to do laundry was in the Perfume River. It was not safe to go there by yourself, so the Americans took us by bus. A group of journalists arrived and informed us through their intermediary that they had requested our evacuation through the American Consulate. On Feb. 11, 1968, all the nuns, the Rossignols, my mother-in-law and her children, and the Philippino family, and the doctor married to a French woman were able to get on a boat. The priests, including Fathers Poncet, Petit-Jean and Neyroud, stayed at the Providence School. The Viet Cong put Father Lefas and another Frenchman up against a wall. The VC thought they had a grenade in their pocket. They were saved when they discovered it was just a battery. We had to stay on the boat at Hue until February 12, because it was not safe to move. A helicopter arrived and escorted us to Da Nang.

When we arrived at the Da Nang American Consulate, Mary Ange and the Mother Superior of the Sacred Heart School greeted us. I had become sick on the boat and arrived wrapped in a blanket. We arrived at the school where we ate a good meal of meat and rice soup — what a luxury! It was the first hot meal we had had in 12 days. For the first time, we enjoyed a little tranquility. It felt good to sleep in a warm bed. One could not describe the difference in accommodations, it was wonderful.

The city of Hue was still under attack and suffered enormous damage. The Joan of Arc School was destroyed, and the coffee we had stored there was stolen and sold by the VC. The VC looted many buildings, and some personally profited from their attack by selling our coffee crop for a good price. The main bridge, which spanned the Perfume River, was cut in half by the VC and the ferry remained the only way to get to Hue.

We were now refugees in Da Nang. Two days after our arrival, we learned that the VC somewhere near the Hue Canal had beaten Father Poncet and Father Cressonnier. Felix was devastated by the news and could not bring himself to tell me. Sister Xavier was the one who finally broke that news to me. When two of the Fathers learned that a nun had been seriously wounded in Hue at a location still under control of the VC, they returned to help her. Mr. Llinaires accompanied the Fathers. The VC executed both of the Fathers. No one ever learned why. Mr. Llinaires was wounded in the wrist and barely escaped by hiding in a trench.

After 14 days, Father Cressonier's Thi-Ba, the woman who was responsible for the priest home, was finally able to enter the liberated zone. Unbelievably, the bodies of the two Fathers were still where they had fallen. Her and another women placed the bodies in sacks and brought them back to the home of the priest where they were temporarily buried in the back yard. In time, they would be interred at the Priest Cemetery in the District of the Citadel. The cruelty of the VC was incredible — how many other priests died, attempting to save a child, or say Mass is unknown.

The VC committed many atrocities. There was a group of German doctors who served at the Mission of the Order of Malte. They worked at the hospital at Hue, serving the entire population. One was a pediatrician and the others were general practitioners. One of their wives was pregnant and expecting her third baby. The VC kidnapped them and for a time, it was rumored that they had been taken to treat the wounded VC. Unfortunately, that proved to be untrue when they were found executed. One female German doctor who escaped execution, later returned to Germany with her three children.

Most of the massacres took place outside of Hue City on the plain going towards the Benedictine Monastery of Thien-An. Two French Fathers were among those massacred. Father Urbain and Father Guy had made a wrong turn and were captured by the VC. They, like the others, were made to dig their own graves. When the city was finally liberated, many corpses were found, some only half buried. It was hard to believe human beings could be responsible for such an abomination.

After the city of Hue was completely liberated, Felix and a group of nuns went to see the devastation. Felix took notes and recorded the widespread devastation. The Joan of Arc School suffered extensive damage. Felix, Fathers Lefas, Duval, Neyroud, along with Monsignor Urrutia, Jean-Vincent Poilane, and a Frenchmen who lived with the Fathers began salvage work at the school. I stayed in Hue with the children while they rotated back and forth from Da Nang to Hue as limited space on airplanes allowed.

We continued living at Sacred Heart, and had a very large room on the first floor. Most of our friends were leaving Viet Nam and returning to France. The Americans provided abundant food for the orphans who lived at the school. We ate at the sisters' guest table and were able to pay for our meals with the money we had received from the six tons of coffee we had sold from the plantation at Khe Sanh. We made our own clothes from the American surplus, some of the dresses looked very nice. My mother-in-law and friends would also send us clothes — clothes for Felix and the children that could not be found at the school. Time passed slowly, Khe Sanh was still under siege. Hopes of ever returning were starting to fade. The Montagnards were allowed to evacuate their villages. Most of them traveled by foot to Cam-Lo. They could not stay in their villages as they were completely out of food.

On April 9, 1968, Khe Sanh was finally liberated. Felix was ecstatic and immediately began contacting American authorities through a Philippine friend who spoke perfect English. Felix wanted to return to the plantation to see how much, if anything, remained. The Americans were reluctant, they said it was still very dangerous, the VC were still very close. Finally, they informed Felix he could return on April 12. Upon hearing the news, I hid his passport, as I did not want him to go back to Khe Sanh. He told me he was going, with or without a passport. Although I still did not want him to go, I returned it. On April 13, 1968, he departed by plane to Khe Sanh.

I did not hear from him on Easter Sunday, 14 April 1968, and immediately sensed something was wrong. A journalist informed Mother Angel of the tragic news. She kept it from me until Monday morning, fearing I would not sleep the night before. She sent for me on Monday, the pale look on her face told me something was indeed wrong. She informed me that something had happened at Khe Sanh, and that she was going to the American Consulate to learn the details. When I tried to go with her she refused, making me wait for her return.

She returned and informed me that Felix's plane had been shot down over Khe Sanh. Felix was the only civilian on board. He died in the crash, with five of the fourteen military passengers being injured. One later died. The same nun that went to the consulate located the hospital where Felix's body had been brought. She and the other nuns took care of everything for me. They made the notifications to his mother, took care of the administrative papers, and ordered a coffin. I informed her of my wish to have his body returned to France. The nuns tried to dissuade me. The priests wanted to bury him next to Father Poncet. If he could have spoken to me, maybe that would have been his desire. I did not know, he loved this country so much.

The Americans embalmed his body and returned it to us on April 17, 1968. He was laid out in a little room that served as an office for the chapel. He was dressed in his dark, navy blue suit. A little drop of water and blood came falling from his right ear from time to time. He appeared to have just gone to sleep and was at peace. A tri-colored ribbon and simple bouquet of flowers adorned his coffin. Françoise and Jean-Marie had grim faces. Jean-Marie was especially affected. He came, looked at his Father, left and went back again. At five years old, he could not understand what was happening. Father Petit-Jean remained close to me to get me through the ordeal. I hugged Felix for a long time, his face against mine.

On 18 April 1968, funeral services were held at the Cathedral of Da Nang. Nine priests co-celebrated the mass, which was said by the Vietnamese parish priest. They were all his friends. Father Lefas eulogized Felix in a very solemn way. He had felt particular pain, as Felix was his student at the College of Providence at Hue. Among the many mourners was the lieutenant who had authorized Felix's plane trip; he felt responsible.

After the ceremony, the Americans took the body to Saigon to await transportation to France. I returned to Hue City with the nuns to clear up affairs with the bank. I found the city destroyed. It was still a dangerous time to be in Hue and several times during the night we had to hide on the first floor. Due to the still continuing dangerous situation in Vietnam, there was a delay in our leaving. During this time I could not take the pressure and had to get treatment to allow me to sleep. On 22 June 1968, the children and I left for France after making sure Felix's body would be returned. My stepsisters, Cosette and Nanou, and two nuns came with us. Goodbye Vietnam, where I left so many memories. A part of my life and heart remain in that country where I knew both joy and suffering at the plantation. Life goes on and I still have the children. But Vietnam remains forever engraved in me. It is still hard to describe all these events, it was so brutal.

Felix was 37 years old when he died. He was born on April 30, 1930 at Khe Sanh, and had gone back to die at Khe Sanh.

At our upcoming reunion in Dallas Texas, the KSV will be honoring our Heroic Corpsmen and Medics who served with us. Their history and Heroic achievements do not need to be repeated. We will also be honoring the Doctors who saved so many lives. This is the story of one KSV Navy surgeon who is remembered in history for removing a live mortar round from a wounded Marine. What is not widely known are his Heroics while serving with an Army Unit at Hill 162 on 04 September 1968. Heroics that have gone unheralded. Here are the eye-witness accounts of those who were there and want his actions properly rewarded.

Prelude to Battle

by Kirk Ross

The pronouncement that they were being assigned to the 1st Battalion of the 61st Infantry Regiment (Mechanized), an outfit operating on the DMZ, was enough to test the nerve of even the best of Captain John W. Langston's young infantry replacements. Captain Langston, Bravo Company C/O, did his best to set the new men at ease and, in a fatherly tone, assured them that they were not going to die while serving under his command. The talk usually worked and with time and experience, the men began to mirror their commander, becoming almost as cocky and confident as him.

Like all the company commanders of the lst Battalion, 61st Infantry Regiment, Captain Langston wore the patch of the US Army's 1st Cavalry Division (Airmobile) on his right sleeve. In November 1965, he had fought with a 1st Cav Blue Team in the Ia Drang Valley in a pitched battle which marked the first engagement fought between North Vietnamese Army Main Force units and United States troops. The intensity of that action also served to set the tone for what was to come, as the conflict in the South escalated. In July 1968, Captain Langston and his fellow officers were serving in a new outfit, which had just deployed to Vietnam. On this tour, he and the others were all experienced veterans, eager to be going back into combat.

The 1st of the 61st was a part of the Colonel Richard J. Glikes' 1st Infantry Brigade, 5th Infantry Division (Mechanized), which had arrived in Vietnam in July. The Brigade's headquarters were established in Quang Tri while its three maneuver battalions were located at separate base camps outside Quang Tri base proper. Placed under the operational control of the 3rd Marine Division, Glikes' brigade became, for tactical purposes, an asset of the United States Marine Corps. However, with much of the Marine Corps' attention focused on the area around Khe Sanh and the western portion of the I Corps zone, the bulk of operational responsibility for patrolling the DMZ from Wonder Beach to the hills west of the Con Thien fire support base, fell to the 1st Brigade.

Colonel Glikes' brigade often operated jointly with elements of the 3rd, 4th, and 9th Marine Regiments. The foot-bound Marines, according to Lieutenant Colonel Bernard D. Wheeler, C/O of the 1st Battalion of the 61st, unlike his men, were not equipped with armored personnel carriers and seemed always in need of support from their relatively lavishly equipped Army cousins. When they encountered strong opposition, the Marines' lives sometimes relied on the firepower delivered by the highly mobile infantry companies of Wheeler's battalion coming quickly to their aid, a circumstance that Wheeler admitted, often required his men to "throw caution to the wind."

According to Captain Langston, the men of his battalion — in fact, those of the whole 1st Brigade — spent most of August shaking down equipment and familiarizing themselves with their area of operations. During that month, the 1st Battalion of the 77th Armored Regiment and the 1st Battalion of the 11th Infantry Regiment fought two separate engagements near the DMZ which resulted in 132 enemy killed. Despite the successes of its sister organizations, the 1st of the 61st still had fought no significant engagements with the enemy. However, with the Brigade's move on 26 August to a new area of operations west of Cam L6, which was about to be known as "Leatherneck Square," it was about to.

On the morning of 4 September 1968, A Company of the 1st Battalion was ordered to conduct a sweep mission with the purpose of effecting a linkup with a Mike Force of the 3rd Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment. Mike 3/9, having the radio call sign "7up Mike," had been in contact with the enemy all morning; however it was not enemy action, but rather increasingly poor weather conditions that compelled its immediate extraction. Soon after linking up with the Marines, A Company would come under the attack of a sizable NVA force. The battle that ensued would prove to be the 1st Battalion's first major contact with the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. The engagement would also see a young Navy surgeon, Lt. Edward M. Feldman, become an unwitting hero to the embattled Army troops.

Accompanied by a platoon of tanks from the 1st Battalion, 77th Armored, A Company, under the command of Capt. Charles E. Vernon, moved out on its mission at 0645 hours. The column of tracks, which was composed of some thirteen or more M-113 Armored Cavalry Assault Vehicles and two tracked recovery vehicles, moved west from the vicinity of Fire Support Base Charlie 2 near Cam Lo, following the course of the east-west grid line "65" for more than two-and-a-half hours until they reached a position approximately one kilometer east of the 160-meter high hill (henceforth referred to as Hill 160) that would be the focal point in the coming battle. Along the way, heavy mud forced the tanks to turn back. This same mud would prove to make the going arduous for A Company's tracks as well. At 0914 hours, Captain Vernon called 1st Battalion requesting to know if the helicopter that had begun circling a point north of his location a few minutes earlier, was in fact circling over 7up Mike. The reply from 1st Battalion confirmed Vernon's guess. This was apparently, the much-delayed re-supply helicopter the Marines had requested some two hours before. With the Marines' location approximately fixed, A Company dropped smoke to mark its position to the Mike Force. The smoke was soon spotted by the Marines, and to coordinate the extraction, 7up Mike then switched over to A Company's radio frequency.

7up Mike, which was at that time located on a minor prominence about two kilometers northwest of A Company, had been in contact with the enemy since well before daylight. During the nearly four hours preceding their initial contact with A Company, the Marines had coordinated several artillery fire missions on suspected enemy positions west and northwest of Hill 160. When their re-supply helicopter drew enemy automatic weapons fire from a position approximately two kilometers to its northwest, 7up Mike resumed its calls to the 1st Battalion of the 61st Infantry requesting two more fire missions. Still further calls for artillery were made at 1000 hours, at 1006 hours, and at 1007 hours. Eleven minutes later, 7up Mike called 1st Battalion to end the fire missions, which apparently resulted in "excellent coverage" of the target areas. Perhaps prompted by the increasing enemy activity, or perhaps because the visibility was decreasing due to worsening weather conditions, 1st Battalion's Operations Officer again contacted Capt. Vernon with instructions to link up with the Marines.

Capt. Vernon decided that, before he moved to link up with 7up Mike, he would first establish a perimeter atop Hill 160, and so led his men to this position. Along the way, Sgt. Stephen Zerfas' ACAV threw a track and had to stop to make repairs. Another vehicle broke down atop the hill, that of Sgt. Ronald E. Fujikawa. The 1st Platoon, commanded by 2Lt. Duane E. Hulett, was ordered to hold its position atop the hill so as to defend Sgt. Fujikawa's track until it regained mobility. Capt. Vernon, meanwhile, ordered the four tracks of the 2nd Platoon to sweep west and north and cross the Song Noan, a small stream, while Captain Vernon's command group, accompanied by the tracks of 2Lt. Douglas N. Mulford's Weapons Platoon, would sweep north in the direction of the Marines. This dividing of the force, although dangerous, was for Captain Vernon apparently necessary, as it seems he was unsure of the Mike Forces' exact location. The several elements presently moved out and, by 1037 hours, 2Lt. Hesti's platoon was approaching the Song Noan. Apparently, neither 2Lt. Hesli or anyone in A Company had been informed that they were heading into a hot area, one in which the Marines had only recently made several contacts with the enemy. This proximate danger would only be recognized too late.

The Facts

On 4 September 1968, at approximately 1700 hours, Lt. Edward M. Feldman, USNR, was preparing the triage at the main medical facility at Quang Tri for receiving casualties. An Army helicopter crewman came running in asking for a doctor to follow him to his helicopter. Lt. Feldman accompanied the airman and, upon reaching the helicopter, was motioned aboard. Lt. Feldman's first impression was that the aircrew had a wounded man aboard and did not know how to move him. However, when he discovered there were no wounded aboard, Lt. Feldman assumed that the aircrew wanted to lift him to a casualty a short distance away and, therefore, volunteered to go with them.

After flying at very low altitude for some fifteen to twenty minutes, buffeted by typhoon-strength winds, the pilot settled the helicopter into a hover. The helicopter immediately began taking fire from its left side and the pilot abruptly landed atop a knoll carpeted by swampy elephant grass. There below him, Lt. Feldman could see several armored personnel carriers (APC's) from A Company, 1st Battalion, 61st Infantry (Mechanized) under violent attack by a battalion-size NVA force.

Lt. Feldman jumped out of the helicopter and was met by a man who briefed him on the situation. Lt. Feldman was told that he was three kilometers south of the Demilitarized Zone near Charlie 2 Cam Lo combat base. At that moment, enemy automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades set on fire one of the APCs spaced at intervals along the column. When this happened, the weight of enemy fire seemed to shift toward this vehicle. Heedless of the enemy small arms fire being directed toward A Company, Lt. Feldman immediately moved to the head of the column of APCs. Finding no wounded, Lt. Feldman stopped long enough to put on a discarded flak vest and helmet and picked up a M-16 which had also been abandoned. Like everything, it was caked with sticky, red clay. After assuring himself that the weapon was functioning properly, Lt. Feldman, exposing himself to moderate but steady enemy fire, began making his way from track to track.

Behind each of the APC's were clutches of soldiers, huddled close together, returning fire. Lt. Feldman stopped at each vehicle, assisting the wounded and encouraging the men. After he had reached the last APC, Lt. Feldman, advancing as before, retraced his steps back up the column of dispersed APCs stopping again to assist the wounded. As he moved, he was constantly aware of the enemy automatic fire and rocket-propelled grenades coming from a line of small trees and brush off to the right flank, and that some of it was being directed at him. Lt. Feldman stopped to return fire himself many times.

At approximately 1852 hours, Lt. Feldman took charge of A Company 1/61 and personally began directing the men to move with their wounded to a new, more defensible position atop a hill just to the south from which the men could better direct their fire upon the enemy, and from which point medevacs could effectively evacuate the wounded. As the APCs began climbing the hill, they received what Lt. Feldman thought was heavy mortar fire, as well as RPG and automatic weapons fire. Once atop the hill, Lt. Feldman guided the men in forming a perimeter until all the APCs were in position.

Sometime after getting into position, a lieutenant from A Company 1/61 informed Lt. Feldman that only a small amount of concertina wire and about thirty-two claymore mines were available for night defenses. Feldman was further informed because of the poor weather, they would not be getting any close air or artillery support, and it was unlikely that there would be any evacuation of casualties. Undaunted, Lt. Feldman directed the men in establishing a defensive perimeter. With enemy activity in the area slackening somewhat with the fall of darkness, Lt. Feldman busied himself reevaluating the existing casualties and checking to make sure that any new casualties received medical attention.

Until Lt. Feldman arrived, A Company 1/61 had been taking care of its wounded as best it could. Once the company had been assembled by Lt. Feldman atop the hill, he ordered all nonambulatory men placed in a tight perimeter within the main defensive position where they would be protected from direct fire. This allowed him and one or two A Company men to provide better medical treatment. A dozen or more such wounded were administered to by Lt. Feldman. Many of these wounded men had gone into shock due to their loss of blood. Lt. Feldman separated those casualties that could be saved from those for which there was no hope. Lt. Feldman gave the mortally wounded morphine and made them as comfortable as possible.

At 1930 hours, C Company 1/61 arrived to reinforce A Company. However, Lt. Feldman retained command over the evacuation of the wounded. Lt. Feldman was not formally relieved of his responsibility for A Company's defenses until the next morning. Once the wounded were stabilized, Lt. Feldman placed a called for a CH-47 Chinook for the evacuation of the wounded. Lt. Feldman knew A Company's position on the hill was still being subjected to enemy fire. The wounded would stand a better chance if all were evacuated at one time, thus necessitating the Chinook. Lt. Feldman directed the men to establish a landing zone for the medevac. All the while, A Company 1/61 was still taking moderate small arms and mortar fires.

At 2245 hours, a US Army Chinook helicopter landed on the hill. While Lt. Feldman ordered all the wounded of A Company 1/61 to be placed on board, enemy small arms and automatic weapons fire intensified. The dead were also evacuated, their bodies placed on the floor of the Chinook. Lt. Feldman refused evacuation himself, choosing instead to stay with the men who had been placed in his care. He remained with A Company 1/61 until 6 September 1968 at which time he was flown to C2.

Lt. Feldman demonstrated aggressiveness in taking command and reorganizing the separated elements of A Company 1/61, placed the company in a strong position on high ground, one from which it would have a reasonable chance of withstanding a determined enemy assault if one had come. Moreover, Lt. Feldman's presence had a profound impact on the survival of A Company's wounded.

Eyewitness Accounts

Eyewitness Statement of Sgt. Ronald E. Fujikawa, USA, concerning the performance of Lt. Edward M. Feldman, USNR in combat at Hill 162 in Quang Tri Province, Republic of Vietnam, on 4 September 1968.

On the aftemoon of 4 September 1968, I was a track (ACAV) commander in 2Lt. Duane E. Hulett's 1st Platoon of A Company, 1/61. In the course of carrying out our objective — the link up with and extraction of a Marine Mike Force — my track became immobilized on top of the Hill 162 (location of the destroyed village of Lang Dong Bao Thu-o-ng).

To effect the link-up with the Mike Force, its exact location yet unknown, the Company Commander, Captain Charles E. Vernon, ordered the four tracks of the 2nd Platoon, commanded by 2Lt. Philip T. Hesli, Jr., to sweep west and north, and cross the Song Noan. Meanwhile, Captain Vernon's command group, accompanied by the tracks of 2Lt. Douglas N. Mulford's Weapons Platoon, would sweep north. The 1st Platoon was to hold its position atop the hill so as to defend my track until it regained mobility.

As the tracks of the 2nd Platoon approached the Song Noan, I saw them come under some light, harassing enemy fire. Nevertheless, 2Lt. Hesli's tracks continued across the small river and made their way into the brush on the far side. 2Lt. Hulett received a radio message from 2Lt. Hesli — one of his tracks had become bogged down on the far side of the river. Hesli had attempted to pull it free with another track, but to no avail. Adding to his difficulty, Helsi's only tow cable had been broken in the attempt. Leaving one track to watch over mine, 2Lt. Hulett struck out to assist 2Lt. Hesli's platoon.

After some considerable effort, the mired track was freed and all six tracks which had crossed the river now re-crossed the Song Noan and began making their way back toward the top of Hill 162, where my element waited. As Hesli's element made their way single-file up the incline at the base of the hill, what had formerly amounted to sporadic enemy sniping began to increase dramatically in pitch.

As the sounds of firing grew steadily, I yelled over to my friend in the other track fifty feet away, "Man, there's something wrong here."

"I don't like this," thirty-two-year-old SP4 Charles Robertson replied.

"Man, I don't like this either," I agreed.

From my position atop the hill, I could see clearly 2Lt. Hesli's tracks, about three to four hundred yards away, which were now under the concentrated attack of a sizable and determined NVA force. I immediately directed my men to open fire on the enemy with two of my track's M60 machine guns. I began firing on the attacking NVA with my .50 caliber machine gun. The NVA, which were attacking the right (west) flank of 2Lt. Hesli's element, had not yet closed with the tracks, but I gauged that the enemy were trying to become intermingled with the column so as to render ineffective the heavy firepower of the tracks' machine guns — the gunners would be disinclined to fire into their own column. Nevertheless, my position afforded me excellent observation of the enemy and the fires from my tracks, I felt, were assisting greatly in preventing the enemy from closing on 2Lt. Hesli's tracks.

It was then that I noticed that Sp4 Robertson's track had engaged NVA troops attempting to close on my own position from the south side of Hill 162. I ordered my track's remaining M60 to engage this new threat while I continued to fire on the enemy attacking 2Lt. Hesli's position. Alpha 1/61's Armored Cavalry Assault Vehicles (ACAV), basically heavily armed variants of the M-113 Armored Personnel Carriers, were each armed with three M60 7.62mm

Fog

Slowly the fog creeps in, at first it was hard to see. The drizzle hid the fog so well it was hard to my eyes to see the sly fog sneaking in.

As I slowly came to realize the fog's presence, I suddenly found myself on an airstrip covered with fog.

The airstrip was empty, no planes, choppers, no one in sight. It was so peaceful and quiet no sounds of engines, no outgoing or incoming. No voices to ruin the quiet.

Peace, the peace of the dead. That fog hid the base from preying eyes of the enemy.

As I stood there I prayed for the fog to both stay and leave. As long as it stayed, we were safe from incoming fire. But I prayed for the sun to burn the fog away so those dead, dying, and wounded could be flown to safety.

The fog is both friend and foe. It means both death and life. I feel selfish not wanting it to leave. I want to live, so I am "lost." I can't have it both ways. Sunshine for food and ammo; fog so Charlie doesn't see and can't shoot at me!

Fog, you remind me of Red Clay — a plateau of death and pain!

general purpose machine guns and a single M2-HB .50 caliber machine gun mounted in the commander's cupola. Along with ammunition for each man's personal weapons, each track carried 2,000-3,000 rounds of ammunition for the M60s and approximately 1,500 rounds for the .50 caliber machine gun. As well, each crew was provided with an M-79 grenade launcher with 50 to 100 rounds of ammunition. Although this may seem like an abundant supply, in a hot firefight, even this amount of ammunition was rapidly consumed by the sustained firing of automatic weapons. Moreover, such sustained firing quickly burned out the barrels of automatic weapons, and there were only so many barrels available. Pausing between every 200-300 rounds to let the overheated M60s cool down, my men fired on the enemy with their M-16s. Meanwhile, Robertson, with an M-79, fired at targets all across the south slope of the hill. So far, Robertson had prevented the enemy from advancing from that direction.

Atop the hill, my element had a terrific field of fire and were inflicting heavy losses on the enemy. To the NVA, however, we also presented an attractive target. I heard the throaty crumping of mortars firing in the distance. In fact, they were coming in by the dozen, I estimated four batteries. Then, one, perhaps as many as four shells, landed on top of my track. I, in the .50 caliber machine gun cupola, was wounded in the face by shrapnel and lost my helmet. I was nearly deafened by the blast. After the mortar fire ended, a direct assault on my position began.

From the amount of movement I had already observed, and from the weight of the enemy's fire, I estimated Alpha 1/61 was being hit by an NVA battalion-sized force of approximately 200 men. Now, from all sides, the enemy came on like madmen.The battle had been raging for thirty to forty-five minutes when the assault began, and I was down to my last .50 caliber barrel — I had already burned up four. As they came on, the enemy managed to close to within fifty meters, and many as near as twenty meters and closer.

The men of my element returned fire furiously, expending most of their machine gun ammunition as well as most of their 40mm grenades. When my .50 caliber began to overheat, I drew up my M-16 rifle, giving my machine gun time to cool down. Some enemy troops overran the top of the hill, placing themselves between my track and Robertson's, and forcing Alpha's machine gunners to use extreme caution when engaging targets. Nevertheless, the attack was beaten off with terrific casualties being inflicted upon the enemy. I estimated that the men of my element had probably killed at least forty or more of the enemy, and that I had, myself, accounted for ten to twelve of those killed by fire from my .50 caliber. In addition to myself, two other men in my track were wounded, one in the arm and one in the shoulder. I did not know if Robertson's squad had sustained any casualties.

I spotted Captain Vernon's element in the distance to the northeast, and I was aware that they too had been hit, but its attackers were too far away to engage effectively. 2Lt. Hesli's element, though having beaten back their attackers, was stalled as well. Alpha's communications had broken down. As I recalled, no one was in charge, it was chaotic. All I could do was sit tight, and try to keep the enemy at a distance. Meanwhile, as there were no medics present, the men applied tourniquets to the wounds of the casualties and otherwise made them as comfortable as possible.

Approximately ninety minutes later, medevacs began to arrive. One medevac, accompanied by two Huey gunships and one Cobra gunship, landed in the valley near Captain Vernon's element. Soon thereafter, a lone medevac landed fifty meters away on the hilltop between my element and 2Lt. Hesli's. One man, whom I learned was a Navy doctor, Lt. Edward R. Feldman, jumped off. With him he carried nothing and had neither a helmet, nor a flak vest. As I recalled, Lt. Feldman immediately started directing traffic.

As Lt. Feldman began moving down the line of tracks of Hesli's element, I looked on, amazed by his seemingly casual disregard for the enemy small arms fire still being directed toward Alpha Company. "Who's this, John Wayne or what?" I hollered over to Robertson. "This guy ain't gonna last twenty minutes."

"We wanted to see someone in charge," I recalled, "He (Feldman] took charge." Feldman picked up an M-16 rifle from one of the wounded, and put on a discarded helmet and flak vest. Although he was under "moderate but steady fire," he made his way "from track to track to track to take care of the wounded." After he had done this, Lt. Feldman then began directing the tracks of 2Lt. Hesli's clement, along with his wounded, to move to the top of Hill 162. Once there, Feldman guided the men in forming a perimeter. "Hey you, put this track over here," he commanded. "Hey you, put this track over there," until all the tracks were in position.

I did not remember seeing any of our own medics. Therefore, until Lt. Feldman arrived, Alpha had been taking care of its wounded as best they could. Once the company, less Captain Vernon's element, had been assembled by Lt. Feldman atop Hill 162, the Lieutenant ordered all non-ambulatory men placed in a tight perimeter within the main defensive position. This enabled Lt. Feldman, while being assisted by one or two Alpha men, a safe place they could be worked on. A dozen or more such wounded were administered to by Lt. Feldman. Many of the wounded men had gone into shock because of their loss of blood.

Once the wounded were stabilized, Lt. Feldman said, "We got to get these dead and wounded out of here," and got on the radio. In the discussion I overheard, Lt. Feldman told the receiver, "Don't send medevacs, send a Chinook." Feldman knew that, due to the fact Alpha's position on Hill 162 was still being subjected to enemy fire, the wounded would stand a better chance if all were evacuated at one time, thus necessitating the Chinook. Lt. Feldman then ordered the men to establish a landing zone (LZ) for the Chinook. Men set out immediately digging holes into which they dropped strobe lights; these would be visible from the air but could not be seen from the ground. All the while, Alpha was still taking sporadic small arms fire.

At 2245 hours, a US Army Chinook helicopter landed on the LZ on Hill 162. Lt. Feldman directed the evacuation of the wounded of Alpha 1/61. I was evacuated at this time. The dead were also evacuated, and their bodies were placed on the floor of the Chinook. There were no body bags for the dead. There were so many casualties that the wounded were forced to, in some cases, sit on top of the bodies of our dead comrades. Conspicuously not aboard was Lt. Feldman, who had chosen to stay on the ground. As the Chinook lifted into the black night, it was fired on by at least four enemy machine guns. Lines of tracers arched their way toward the helicopter but did not find their target. With the knowledge that our fellow Alpha men we had left behind were so critically short of ammunition, none of the wounded aboard the Chinook, including myself, could help but worry for the defenders of Hill 162 as we were flown to the field hospital.

Prior to my evacuation, I recalled how, as the evening progressed, everyone on the hill began to worry. We [Alpha] were "super low on ammunition," and had continued to get fire all through the night. Apparently, the NVA never knew how bad off we were. What is apparent, however, is that Lt. Feldman's demonstrated aggressiveness in taking command and reorganizing the separated elements of Alpha Company, placed the company in a strong position on high ground [Hill 162], one from which we would have a reasonable chance of withstanding a determined enemy assault if it came. Had the company remained in the valley, a determined enemy assault might have easily overrun our positions. Moreover, Lt. Feldman's presence had a profound impact on the survival of Alpha's wounded. Many of the wounded would have surely died had not Lt. Feldman been present to assist them.

Eyewitness Statement of 2Lt. Philip T. Hesli, USA, concerning the performance of Lt. Edward R. Feldman, USNR in combat at Hill 162 in Quang Tri Province, Republic of Vietnam, on. 4 September 1968.

On the afternoon of 4 September 1968, I was 2nd Platoon Commander in Captain Charles E. Vernon's A Company, 1/61. On that day, my company's objective was the link up with and extraction of Marine Mike Force.

At approximately 1037 hours, my platoon, mounted on four M-113 ACAVs, was located at coordinates (04.5-65.3) attempting to ford the Song Noan, a small stream with treacherous banks. While in the process of this complex maneuver, one of my tracks became mired in sucking mud. After repeated attempts to free the trapped vehicle on my own, my single tow cable snapped.

Due to the worsening weather conditions, visibility was down to only 500 meters. Neither I or the men under my command, were able to spot the large body of NVA regulars which had moved into ambush positions along our path. They were prepared to strike my element. The first rocket-propelled grenade impacted with such violence that it threw me off the top of my track and into the bottom of a shallow creek bed, which ran parallel to my stretched out column. I had been riding in the .50 caliber machine gun cupola. When I had recovered from my initial shock, I discovered I was covered with the brains of Sp4 Barry Walls who had been manning the M60 machine gun mounted on the right side of the track. Sp4 Walls was nearly decapitated by the exploding rocket. Blood was sticky on my face, and I soon realized that much of it was not Walls' but my own. Rocket shrapnel had blinded me in one eye.

NVA soldiers were all around me firing from positions a mere twenty meters away. Already drenched from the heavily falling rain, the barrage of small arms fire mowed down the elephant grass, showering me with debris as I lay in the ditch. This continued for some time but eventually, with my men directing heavy streams of automatic weapons fire into every suspected enemy position, the immediate area quieted somewhat. I began crawling back along the muddy stream bed toward a small thicket situated near the rear of my stalled column.

Sgt. Donald M. Gaines, the weapons platoon sergeant who, for some reason, had accompanied Hulett, was manning an M60 machine gun on the left side of his ACAV. The last track in the column sighted the mud-bathed figure of a man rise up from a small crop of scrub wood and begin to approach his ACAV. Preparing to open fire, Gaines swung his M60 toward me as I advanced. He's one of our guys," shouted another soldier, tipping Gaines' muzzle away from me.

"Let's get out of here," I ordered as I scrambled aboard Gaines' track. I ordered the track driver to move up parallel to my own stalled track. There, I sighted the form of Sgt. James A. Wright lying in the mud behind my track. I dismounted and moved quickly to Wright's assistance. Wright appeared to be dead.

I dropped the rear gate of my track and while being assisted by another soldier, staying as low to the ground as possible to avoid the intense enemy small arms and rocket fire, I attempted to roll Wright's body up the ramp and inside. Wright, who was a chunky guy, was wearing a pack when he was hit, and I found it terribly difficult to roll his body. After some time elapsed, enemy fire compelled the men still inside my track to close the gate. Realizing that I needed support if I was to get Sgt Wright on the track, I called for 2Lt. Hulett's track, located behind my own and to the left, to pull foreword. Hulett responded immediately, ordering his driver to advance. The driver, whose visibility was limited, pulled right over my legs, pressing me down into the mud. With the right track of Hulett's M-113 resting over the backs of my thighs, I cried out. 2Lt. Hulett, looking over the side, saw me squirming in the mud below, and told his driver to back up. Miraculously, my legs were uninjured. I then told Hulett to cover me by placing his track in a position to shield me while I loaded Sgt. Wright onto my track.

The radio in my track was not functioning. Using PRC-22, I was able to establish contact with Battalion. I informed Lt.Col. Wheeler, the Battalion Commander, that we were unsure of our exact location. We began to receive mortar fire as well as small arms. It was shortly after this time that a medevac helicopter arrived. I later learned that Lt. Edward R. Feldman, a Navy doctor came in on this helicopter.

I assisted in reorganizing my element and then in moving it up to the high ground where, that night, we established a defensive position. It rained all evening, so until I was evacuated with the other casualties, I remained inside one of the tracks. My leg was stiffening up, and my eye was swollen badly. In fact, I had two black eyes and both were swollen shut. About an hour after we moved to the high ground, Lt. Feldman came to check on me. With only the red light to see by, he cut my pants leg off and put medication on my wounds. Although our position was still being subjected to intermittent enemy fire, he left to attend other wounded. He separated the wounded and filled the dying with morphine. Sometime thereafter, C Company arrived to support us.

At 2246 hours, an Army CH-47 arrived to evacuate our wounded, and it was on this helicopter that I, too, was evacuated. With regard to the wounded of Alpha Company, it is my opinion that Lt. Feldman's presence definitely had a positive bearing on their fate. It is possible that some of our wounded would not have survived if it had not been for the care given them by Lt. Feldman.

Eyewitness Statement of John W. Langston, Lt.Col. (USA/RET), concerning the performance of Lt. Edward M. Feldman, USNR in Combat near Hill 162 in Quang tri Province, Republic of Vietnam, on 4 September 1968.

On 4 September 1968, I was in command of B Company, 1st Battalion of the 61st Infantry Regiment (Mechanized). My company had just completed a search and clear operation within the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) and had returned to Firebase C2, north of Cam Lo, Republic of Vietnam, for a stand down. At about 1600 hours that day, a runner arrived with orders from the Battalion Commander, Lt.Col. Bernard Wheeler, to monitor the Battalion Command and A Company frequencies. At that time, A Company was conducting search and clear operations near the DMZ.

When I turned on my radio, I heard Capt. Charles E. Vernon, A Company's Commander, reporting that his track had been hit by several rocket propelled grenades (RPGs) wounding him and several others. The North Vietnamese Army (NVA) were attempting to overrun his position. Capt. Vernon's driver turned his track around and began to withdraw when it was struck by another RPG which disabled the vehicle and killed or wounded all on board. Capt. Vernon, obviously in tears, was begging for help.

At that time, weather conditions did not permit the employment of close air support. Although artillery support was available, the forward observer accompanying Capt. Vernon had been killed by RPG fragments. Apparently, none of A Company's personnel were aware of their exact location and did not, or could not, call for artillery support. It soon became clear that A Company's several elements were widely dispersed and fighting separate engagements, against a numerically superior enemy force — several of A Company's platoon leaders had become casualties. Although A Company's men continued to battle determinedly, it was plain that the company's command structure had disintegrated.

As I continued to monitor the Battalion and A Company frequencies, I discovered a Navy doctor, whom I later learned was Lt. Edward M. Feldman, had arrived by helicopter in the battle area. He immediately undertook the task of caring for A Company's wounded. Apparently, Lt. Feldman determined with night closing in, the only way to successfully effect the evacuation of A Company's many casualties, was to reform the widely separated elements. He located a new defensive position atop a nearby prominence. Exercising an obvious innate leadership ability and assuming responsibility for what would have proved a difficult task for even an experienced infantry officer, Lt. Feldman took command of the situation and led the men of A Company in successfully completing this difficult maneuver. Later that night, while still monitoring the radios, I listened as Lt. Feldman called for a CH-47 helicopter to medevac A Company's remaining dead and wounded.

Lt. Feldman had chosen not to leave, but to stay on the ground with A Company, where his leadership and encouragement were needed most. It is my opinion, speaking as a combat experienced Company Commander and career Army officer, that if it were not for the skillful and courageous leadership of Lt. Feldman, many of A Company's wounded would have perished. Moreover, the several elements of the company would have been, had they remained separated, isolated and destroyed piecemeal by the enemy. Therefore, for his conspicuous acts of gallantry in coming to the aid of the men of A Company, 1st Battalion of the 61st Infantry Regiment (Mechanized), which were made at the risk of his own life, over and beyond the call of duty, I am recommending that Lt. Edward M. Feldman be awarded the Medal of Honor.

Reflections Reunion 2002

From the Vice President

On behalf of the Khe Sanh BOD, I want to thank our Secretary James "Jimbo" Wodecki, his lovely wife PJ, Ray Addington, members of their immediate families, as well as Ray's Young Marines (YM) for all the hard work and professionalism in putting together a most successful reunion. We heard nothing but accolades from our membership. Your hard work will become a model for all reunions to follow. The hotel was a class act, their staff went overboard to accommodate our every request (some times breaking their own rules). The facilities were first class all the way, and the buffet we were served was out of this world.

The award ceremony directed by Ray Addington was another professional presentation — from Megan, the beautiful young YM, who sang a beautiful rendition of our Nation's Anthem, to the many other Young Marines, who received a standing ovation. The first "DOC MEDAL," designed by James Wodecki, was presented by Retired Major General Mulberry to Don "Doc" Ballard, recipient of the MOH while serving as a corpsman in Vietnam and now a retired Lt. Col., USA. The "DOC" Medals were then presented to all the other Medical Personnel of the KSV.

John A. Alstad was presented his long overdue Purple Heart by Doc Ballard and Earle Breeding, former C/O E/2/26. In a surprise, the Colors of G Company 2/26 were returned to two of their members by Robert Schaefers. (See article "Welcome Home," by Tom Eichler for the complete story.)

Our day at the Dude Ranch was different and a lot of fun. Folks went on hayrides, pitched horseshoes, learned how to line dance, and do the Texas Two-Step. As for myself, being a Police Officer on the West Side of Chicago, I gave a lesson in roping to other members (see photos). Bruce Geiger attempted to compete but as you can see, his horse lost its legs — New York Cowboy. We were again treated to a fine feast at the barbeque, even though we had to ration a bit after Neil Kenny and Bob McLane finished. (James "The High Sheriff" Wodecki, maintained order.)

Back at the hotel, we relaxed and watched a fireworks display from the outdoor veranda, complete with another delicious barbeque buffet. Members chilled out for the rest of the evening, renewing old friendships and finding new ones.

Again, Thank You,
Tom Eichler, VP

BOD NEWS

At the 2002 Board meeting, the resignation of our Treasurer Vince Griffith was accepted. Vince served in that capacity for many years and did an outstanding job. He has in the past graciously stayed on until we could find a replacement. A nomination was made and accepted — Ray Addington was appointed to the position of Treasurer. Ray has outstanding credentials in the field of banking and is directly involved in the organization's functions.

Ray Addington

The BOD voted to have the entire membership vote on the site for the next reunion in 2003. Three locations were in the running for the 2003 reunion — Hawaii, South Carolina, and Washington D.C. A vote by the membership at the General Meeting resulted in Charleston S.C. being selected for the 2003 Reunion. Complete details will be provided in the next newsletter. We are providing basic information in this edition. The proposed By-Laws are included as a separate attachment. Please read them carefully. If you have comments or are in disagreement, kindly let the BOD know.

Notes from the Membership Committee

Since the last reunion, we have lost 20 members to death or moving without leaving a forwarding address. We gained 70 members for a net increase of 50. This brings our total membership to 3,050. With a list provided by Reverend Ray Stubbe, I have included in this issue the names of Khe Sanh Veterans who died after their service there — either KIA or non-combat-related Deaths. It is a hard job keeping track of our entire membership. If you learn of anyone now or in the future that we missed, please let us know.

Tom Eichler, Chairman

Notes from the Publishing Committee

Again, Ernie and I are out hustling for stories in order to make the newsletter work. We need input and stories from our members. God knows, at this year's reunion I heard a million of them. All we ask is that you write them down and send them to us. Do not worry about grammar or spelling. We will take care of it for you. I have just completed the last and final version of the Membership Directory. All the mistakes and omissions in the old version have been corrected. As soon as this issue of the newsletter gets out, I will begin mailing them. All those who pre-paid and received copies, will get new ones. When you receive the latest version and find a mistake, let me know, so I can include the corrections in the Winter Issue of the newsletter.

Tom Eichler, Chairman

Memorial Page

The following is a list, compiled by Reverend Ray W. Stubbe, of fellow members who died after service at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I have included all of the men who died at LZ Margo, since it is impossible to determine which of them were actually at Khe Sanh prior to the debacle at LZ Margo.

Memorials

In Memory of Jim Epps

My husband Bruce and I attended our first Khe Sanh reunion in Covington, Kentucky. I do not remember if that was the year we met Jim Epps. I do remember searching him out at each of the reunions after we had met. His warmth and friendliness made Bruce and me feel like his old friend. Jim and I connected because we were both victims of COPD, chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. Jim had severe emphysema and chronic bronchitis, and I have a hereditary deficiency, leaving me with 19% of my lung capacity. I am currently on the lung transplant list in Minnesota. We both struggled with each breath, something others take for granted. I am greatly improved with steroids, which I take before each reunion to enable me to travel.

Jim and I, both on oxygen, shared cabs and tables as our heartier friends walked to ceremonies, restaurants and historic sites in D.C., Philadelphia, or other reunion locales. His generosity was ever abundant, like when he chipped in a $20 bill to "cover" those less fortunate when a van took us to a function in Washington.

Each year I saw Jim struggle a little more. I wish I had connected with him at his home in California when he missed the last reunion. I wish I had known he would be hospitalized and we would never see him again. But I know his struggle is over, and a warm, wonderful, generous person is breathing easier in heaven.

Susan Saffel

In Memory of Robert Harrell

Shortly after the KSV reunion in Chicago, Bob Harrell passed away from liver cancer. We consider ourselves fortunate to have known Bob and to have seen him again last July. He displayed great courage and optimisim, despite the severity of his illness. According to Bruce, these are the same qualities he displayed during the Siege at Khe Sanh, while serving with 3rd Anti-Tanks. For those reasons, we consider him not only a good friend but a good Marine.

We think of him often and will miss him greatly. We find it ironic that the Vietnam War is still taking lives. Our sympathy and prayers go out to Bob's family and to his wife, Mary.

Fog

Slowly the fog creeps in, at first it was hard to see. The drizzle hid the fog so well it was hard for my eyes to see the sly fog sneaking in.

As I slowly came to realize the fog's presence, I suddenly found myself on an airstrip covered with fog.

The airstrip was empty, no planes, choppers, no one in sight. It was so peaceful and quiet no sounds of engines, no outgoing or incoming. No voices to ruin the quiet.

Peace, the peace of the dead. That fog hid the base from preying eyes of the enemy.

As I stood there I prayed for the fog to both stay and leave. As long as it stayed, we were safe from incoming fire. But I prayed for the sun to burn the fog away so those dead, dying, and wounded could be flown to safety.

The fog is both friend and foe. It means both death and life. I feel selfish not wanting it to leave. I want to live so I am "lost." I can't have it both ways. Sunshine for food and ammo; fog so Charlie doesn't see and can't shoot at me!

Fog, you remind me of Red Clay – a plateau of death and pain!

Jimbo,

When that medal was put around my neck, it felt like a huge burden was raised from my shoulders. You guys went above and beyond the call. It was absolutely the proudest, humblest, and most important event of my life...bar none.

Doc Jim Armbrust

Sometimes we become so involved with the fun and festivities at the reunion, we neglect to give credit to those who are so deserving. Many thanks to Tom, Jimbo, and all the others who worked so hard organizing and arranging the 2002 reunion. Thanks again for a job well done.

It happened on a hot Thursday night at the Los Colinas Marriott not long after the fireworks. A few of us diehards decided to move our party and the free beer out to the patio. Lloyd, AKA "Shortround," asked me if I would help him move the beer tub from the reception room to the party outside. "Hey, anything for you, Shortround." We both headed for the elevator. When we reached the second floor I said, "Stand back, Lloyd. I'll handle this!" I then bent over, took a hold on each of the handles on the tub of ice and beer, gave a good heave ho, and took a header directly into the ice cold water. This was about all Shortround could handle. In a fit of uncontrollable laughter, all the while rolling on the floor, he let me know in no uncertain terms that I had made his day. "That was the funniest thing I've ever seen," he said. Brothers, it just goes to show you that we'll do anything for one another.

Dear Khe Sanh Veterans, Families and Friends, I write to thank you for the warm welcome so many of you gave me at the 2002 reunion. Your interest in my POW/MIA exhibit and LASIA (Learning and Sharing in Appreciation) exhibit is appreciated. Thank you also to the veterans and others who signed up to receive our student (LASIA) letters. I hope your participation in this important endeavor will reap meaningful rewards for you. The students do gain from learning about you, writing to you, and reading the letters of those who choose to write back. I have noticed this gain, not only in their learning, but also in their outlook. I have heard it said that giving gratitude enriches the giver also. I have seen this in these young people. Again, please accept my appreciation and good wishes.

Anyone out there know anyone that was part of the detail that used to fetch the supplies that were parachuted into Khe Sanh? I have old footage that I just received.

I got to do that.

Quiet in the DZ, but you still had to drive the deuce and a half back into the base. That sucked. Couldn't hear the incoming. I was in "C" 3rd M/T. Sure put a chill up my butt!

I was in 2nd Platoon, Charlie 1/9 — we pulled drop zone security all the time. I remember our corpsman was trapped in his hole. A pallet stuck in it like a cork in a bottle. We got him out with little more than a bump on his head. I remember supplies overshooting the drop zone. If it was close enough, we went out and retrieved them. I have other stories about this, if you want to hear. I would like to see any film you have, it would bring back a lot of memories.

Don Meyer

ED NOTE: Don, let's hear the other stories. We'd love to print them.

❋

I was on the dropping end. I would have liked to see what actually happened to the stuff.

I was with B Co, 3rd Recon. We pulled security for one drop. One parachute did not fully deploy and a pallet of peaches was scattered everywhere. Picked up a few cans and ate so many, I got sick. Never ate too many Ham and Mofos though.

Lee Upshaw

I was with HQ Btry, 1/13. I remember one time when three guys jumped out of a C-130 to set up the DZ. Two of the chutes didn't open.

Jim

I was a radio operator with Hq Co Comm. 26th Marines. We provided communications at the drop zone. I remember the incident you referred to. It involved the second and third jumpers and was the direct result of the third one jumping too soon. He landed on the just opening chute of the second one, and they both became tangled and were unable to recover due to the low altitude jump.

I've got shots of the planes overhead, out come the crates, and the chutes open. Then, there's footage of some that missed the drop zone — crates and chutes in a rice paddy. One of the guys in the video has a big red/black tattoo on his right arm near the shoulder. There are a few black Marines helping him. The slate shown in the credits has the title, "Khe Sanh, re-supply." The dates vary...March 7, 1968, Feb. 26-27, 1968. The credits also give a "Rodriquez" credit for making the film. Anyone know who he is? I'll be looking at more of it tonight at work...will keep you posted.

David

No, I don't know anyone, if you do reach anyone, thank them for that parachute they let me "borrow" back on about 14 Dec 67. Kilo had the western end of the lines back then (facing out to the drop zone), and in our small tent we were snug and warm, thanks to the parachute draped over it! Hope I'm not in the footage on the "borrow mission!"

Dennis

Funny story about my first flight into Khe Sanh as part of a supply mission for Lam Son 719...I was the navigator on a C-130 using radar to get us through the valley to the base in thick clouds. We were in contact with an Army CCT on the ground. They advised us to watch out for "numerous helicopters in the area." Our AC told the co-pilot to call out locations of any helicopters when we broke out of the clouds. We broke out at probably below minimum landing conditions, and the co-pilot, a first lieutenant as I remember, blurted out... "THEY'RE EVERYWHERE!"

I speak for all C-130 guys when I say we can't thank you guys enough. Very sincerely, Bro. Can't really put anything else into words. Hope nobody got hurt.

Those types of re-supply started back in Sept. of 67. At that time, they almost never hit the drop zone. We had to go out and get the stuff. I remember one time they even dropped some beer. We all got a ration card for 2 beers. Those that did not drink made out as they were able to sell their portion for a nice sum. Recall a lot of the cans were damaged and when you opened it up you had to be quick as the beer would spray out. Ahhh, warm beer in Khe Sanh. What could be better!

I had my two warm ones and I recall getting a little buzz. From what I can remember that was the one and only time we got it.

Gene

❋

####! You have to love the AF. Never dropped any beer. Thousands of sand bags maybe, but no beer. Too much.

Ray Prittie

I salute all the vets with highest regards. I'm looking for anyone who was at Fire Base Henderson when it was overrun May 3, 4, or 6, 1970. My brother's name was Sgt. Michael Francis Brown. B Btry 2/11 Arty. 101st AB, Screaming Eagles. From what I have pieced together, in the spring of 1970, the 101st began a strong effort to prepare ARVN forces to take over operations of the 101st Airborne. At that time their base of operation was Firebase Henderson. The headquarters had three extra howitzers of B Battery 2/11, which would be taken from Firebase Bastogne. My brother was working one of those howitzers. The occupation of Henderson (a former Marine Corps firebase) was near Khe Sanh. Does anybody remember Sgt. Michael Francis Brown or the action that went on early morning of May 6, 1970? If so, just respond:

Sgt. Ronald Norman Bloom

I am in contact with the family of Sgt. Ronald Norman Bloom, KIA 8/2/68, the morning of the attack on Hill 950. His family is asking for anyone who can tell what his last days were like. They need to know. Ron was on his third tour and was in E Co 2/4, 3rd Plt. He was there from May 68. They have one account of the fight from a Jack Perritt, but would like to hear from others. Thanks, brothers!

I was in-country with Ron for the first two tours.

Safe S###ter

Just before the siege, Col. Lownds made every unit near the COC erect some type of decoy antenna to confuse the NVA gunners. In B Co 3rd Recon, we added a pole about 20 ft. tall with the bottom of a 55-gallon drum lid with holes poked in it to the nice 3-holer the Seabees built for us. Our entire company area was blown all to hell, but the s###ter withstood the whole time of the Siege except for a few shrapnel holes. Small wonders.

PS: The board did the censoring not me. I called it like it was.

Leland,

I am sure we crossed paths somewhere in your area! I was in Security Platoon and we lived right next to you on the right flank. I remember all the antennas but never knew some were decoys! I was in a group at VA with a RAY SAXTON from your outfit. You remember him? Take care, Amen, brother. We on 861 could only watch and wait. Along with 1/21, this day is one that I, too, will never forget. You guys did one hell of a job. I regret that we lost so many friends on 861 and 861A. Their memory still burns strong within. God bless them all.

It is hard to believe that 34 years have passed since that morning of 05 Feb 68 when the NVA attempted to take Hill 861A away from us. The NVA paid dearly for their efforts, but so did we. For all those brave young Marines who fought so gallantly and gave their lives, I want to say they will forever be remembered as long as the rest of us who fought alongside them remain on this earth. God Bless Them All.

David "Bulldog" Smith

I do not know how to contact David Smith. I thought someone on this board might be able to get this question to him. When I first arrived at Khe Sanh, one of my first encounters was with a crazy sergeant named David Smith. After leaving Khe Sanh I stepped on a land mine and ended up at a naval hospital in Corpus Christi, Texas. While there, I ran into Sgt. Smith again. Bulldog, are you the same guy?

❋

No, he is not. Bulldog, the President of the KSV, is a retired United States Army Colonel. He was a Major when at Khe Sanh. His picture is in a recent issue of the American Legion magazine.

Photos of Mike Co. 3/9

I need help finding photos for my uncle. His name is Kenny Kanengieter. He was with M CO 3/9 (67-68). I don't know which platoon. He was a L/Cpl. and is from Little Rock, Iowa. He was at Con Thien and on 881s at Khe Sanh. They were shipped to (Okinawa?) afterwards to re-man. He said a photographer did a story in LIFE magazine during Con Thien, but his photo was not used. Any help or info you can give would be greatly appreciated. God bless you all.

Kilo 3/9 went to Okinawa in Feb 67. Mike may have been there at the same time or later. Kilo was also at Hill 881 in April 67, at Con Thien in Spring/Summer 67, on operations in or around Khe Sanh June/early July 68 and at Con Thien for an operation on July 7,1968. Mike, Lima, Kilo, and India worked together while in VN so they would have been nearby Kilo. These are some general dates. Kilo, Mike, Lima, H&S, and some of India 3/9 and 2/12 will be having a reunion this summer in Orlando. Go to Gomer's web page for more info or to post info. http://www.blueridge.net/mpyle

FAC Picked Up Wounded Airmen While Being Mortared

To anyone out there. On or around January 68, my dad, a forward air controller, landed at Khe Sanh and picked up a wounded airman who had superficial wounds. He was mortared while taxiing in. After he parked the 02 aircraft, a mortar landed close to it and it drifted into a K loaded that was idling by the aircraft. It didn't do much damage and after Dad located the airman, he taxied out while being mortared the whole time until he got the hell out of there. Does anyone remember this incident? Please reply if you witnessed this event. Anything at all will be helpful as I'm in the final quest to get the DFC my father was promised for this incident. But due to the fog of war, he didn't get it. Please respond. Any bit of info will be helpful. Thanks.

Steve Smith SGT. USAF, 68-72
C/O Robert C. Smith, covey 150, Danang 67-68

I'm not sure if I was contacted by you before, I was evacuated on 26 Jan 68 before noon — probably not too long after fog lifted and we started getting sporadic mortar shells. The plane, a C-130, I think, was shot at coming in and out of Khe Sanh, not sure if any other wounded were on board. Seems we landed at Phu Bai or somewhere like that near the ocean. I was Army though. My wounds were not very serious, was returned to my unit a month later.

Larry

Larry,

Yes, I talked to you. It probably wasn't you he picked up, because he was flying an 02 aircraft. Thanks anyway for writing back and if you hear anything, let me know.

Steve Smith C/O covey 150.

Looking for George Lundstrum

George, I'm looking for anyone in ATC at Khe Sanh during January or February 1968, concerning a flight by a Forward Air Controller, who was called in to medevac a wounded airman or grunt. My father, covey 150, landed during a mortar attack and picked up and flew the wounded man to Phu Bai. Let me know if anyone in the Khe Sanh organization knows of this incident. Thank you, Steve Smith, C/O Covey 150, Fac 20th Tass.

Lam Son 719 Birddog Pilots

Seeking contact with any birddog pilots stationed at Khe Sanh during operation Lam Son 719. I am writing a novel incorporating experiences of same, seeking corroborative information, especially pertaining to my wingman, Paul Bates, M.I.A. Shot down near the Rock Pile. Also seeking links to Nam fixed-wing recon websites.

Robert,
Check out:

"11th Campaign of the 2/94th artillery during Dewey Canyon II and Lam Son 719"

One 8-inch battery and three 175mm gun batteries. Along with some of the info regarding some of the 8/4 arty involved. I have incorporated officers' daily logs, fire missions, battery displacements, battalion operational reports, LZ names and map coordinates. There are a few references also to air operations, call signs from the logs, etc.

C and D battery were the last to leave the border during the pullout. Infantry retreated around them, and they had no choice but to dig in and stay put for three days after the pullout. Infantry unit refused to go back and help them.

1/77th tanks finally broke through, three days later, to help them run the gauntlet called "Ambush Alley" back to Khe Sanh. I also would like to agree with the KSG. I think we can safely say that operation, with all the losses in men and equipment, was less than successful. The northern area was overrun in 1972 and 1975 by the NVA. One contributing factor is the operational reports that indicate that the ARVN's had no interest in the heavy artillery the 2/94th and other heavy artillery units tried to train them in and to turn over to them. They did not even want to be schooled in tactics.

If you notice in the History Channel accounts of the Spring offensive, they only had 105s against the heavy Russian artillery. Once the linchpin surrendered Camp Carroll, there was no overlapping artillery support for the rest of the bases. Carroll surrendered on Easter 1972 with the exception of a ARVN Marine 105 battery and they fought to the last man after the rest of the base had surrendered — some 1,800 strong. Just for your information, the guy that surrendered his troops now owns a hotel in Hue. I also have an operational report for Lam Son 719 put out by the Directorate of Operations Analysis dated 24 March 1971. Let me know what you are looking for and it may have some helpful info. Hope info will help.

Kelly:

You have it right. Several South Viet units disintegrated towards end of LS-719. Lots of reasons but primarily, they were way over their heads tactically. Few of those units had ever fought against regular NVA units before. They went into Laos thinking they would be handling VC in small groups as in the Delta, but found themselves up against NVA with good communication, heavy artillery, tanks, and sophisticated AA weapons. Too much for them. Officers lost their nerve, troops sensed it, and the whole house of cards came tumbling down. They lacked of any semblance of communication security. They talked in clear in Vietnamese on radios. NVA listened, and knew everything going on. The US conceived, planned LS-719, and asked much more of the South Vietnamese than they were capable of. They'd been fighting Charlie, were simply not capable of fighting Mr. Charles, then or later. Lot more to it, including political nature of South Vietnamese officer promotions, but the US knew all that, should not have asked something so complex and dangerous of the South Vietnamese as taking on the NVA in its own back yard.

I was at LS-719 as a Marine. Did FCA (A) duty over Laos but from an Army slick. I talked to bird dogs a lot but never met them. Not very nice over Laos, bunch of AA, generally had to stay above 1,500 ft. AGL. Supporting the South Vietnamese not easy because they were not allowed to take their American advisors into Laos for US political reasons. They had no one with them who knew much about CAS and no one who could speak good English. To top it off, they had not taken any WP ammo for their mortars or artillery, so they had no good way to mark targets for CAS birds or FAC (A). The result was that CAS was generally ineffective unless FAC could see the NVA. South Vietnamese were scattered all over hell on 11 fire support bases and did not have good communication links to each other, let alone US fire support agencies. Real mess. The whole operation was poorly planned. Vietnamese, without their US advisors on the ground with them, were simply not sophisticated enough to pull off an operation that complex. In my view, they should never have been asked to try.

They had four divisions and could have simply marched them en masse into Laos. They would have been too strong that way for the NVA to mess with and would have had the advantage of interior lines and physical contact among units, so communication failings would have been less critical. That would have made air support a lot easier for US, since we'd have been bombing around one huge blob instead of between and among 11 different positions that couldn't talk to each other, or to us. Those tactics subjected them to defeat by the NVA.

That's exactly what the NVA did. It surrounded FSBs one at a time, prevented re-supply with AA and picked them off. We did our best to evacuate South Vietnamese from FSBs they couldn't hold, but in many cases discipline broke down. As helicopters came in to pick them up, it became every man for himself. The Slicks were single-engine E models. They became overloaded, and crew chiefs had to kick Vietnamese soldiers off skids, many at high altitude, to make it airworthy. Many Vietnamese soldiers died that way. It was ugly.

The problem was expecting South Vietnamese, with limited experience in fire support coordination (which US advisors had always done for them before), limited communication, no experience in maneuvering large units, and severe language barrier with US support elements, to pull off an operation that complicated, in real Indian country, which Laos west of Khe Sanh surely was. What a catastrophe. Worse, thereafter, most South Vietnamese and the four best divisions that went into Laos had no confidence they could beat the NVA. The long-term result was disintegration of the South Vietnamese in the face of NVA assaults during the '72 Easter offensive and the '75 final assault.

Looking for a Marine

My brother, Joe Harrigan, B Co. 3rd Tanks, 3rd Marines, is a Khe Sanh vet. He's looking for a high school buddy who was also at Khe Sanh, Stephen M. Jenkins. His last known residence was in Louisiana. Any help will be greatly appreciated.

Suz,

Give my regards to Joe. Hope all is well. Sometime during the Siege, they moved a tank directly behind our position on the north perimeter. I was awoke the next morning by what I thought was the smell of fresh brewed coffee. I went to investigate (and scrounge) and found my high school buddy Joe behind the wheel. What a great feeling under the worst of circumstances. I think I've got a photo of Joe standing next to his tank. Please give me Joe's phone number, or ask him to call me in Arizona at (520) 399-2857 or (520) 370-3020. Thanks for tracking me down.

PFC Charles Cecil Davis

I posted a message in your guest book. I am trying to find information on my husband's best friend who was KIA on May 3, 1967. He was killed on Hill 881N. He belonged to Echo Co. 2/3 1st Platoon. He was very short, had dark brown hair and wore black glasses. He had a tattoo of his name (Cecil) on the top of his left forearm. He was from Bethany, MO. Al Lyon sent me a picture of Echo Company that was taken in Okinawa sometime in March or April, before the Company was sent back to the hill battles of Khe Sanh. If any of you have that picture; he was on the front row kneeling. He was 10th from the left or 4th from the right. He has on his glasses and is holding his cap on his knee. If any of you have any information, please get in touch with us. Thanks.

My Uncle Died on Hill 881

To all of you Hotel Company Hill 881 survivors: My uncle was a member of Hotel Company, and he died in the battle for Hill 881. I am very interested in getting in contact with anyone who knew him or remembers him. My uncle's name was Frank Roth from Philadelphia, PA. Anyone with info on him can contact me at pjpatvir@prodigy.net

Thank you,

I was a Marine Sgt. Squad Leader and saw action several times around the Khe Sanh area including Hill 881. You will have to be more specific on your uncle's name, month and year when he was there. I was in the Khe Sanh area from Jan thru June 67 with Bravo Company, 1st Battalion 9th Marines. We were known as the "Walking Dead." You name a hot spot in the Nam and we were there. Hope to hear from you.

Khe Sanh KIA List

Sandy Shull was KIA 16 Feb 1968 while serving as a radio operator with 1/9. He was assigned to an 81 Mortar FO team, and I do not know which line company. He was assigned from H&S Co. His serial # was 2327104. His company was near the rock quarry at Khe Sanh when he was killed. Can some one tell me how to get his name listed with other 1/9 Marines killed at Khe Sanh, and does anyone remember Sandy?

Hi Doc,
I don't know you personally because I was in C-130s. My deepest respects go out to all you Jarheads who went into harm's way big time and did the impossible in a way that people today can't even begin to comprehend, let alone appreciate. Like there was ever really any doubt? Only in the hearts and minds of the media, I guess. I flew into and over and around that god awful place so many times and thanked the powers that be so much, because I knew that if I got back to Danang, my day was over and I had a hot shower, hot chow, as much beer as I wanted to drink, and, a clean rack to sleep in. I am really in awe of you folks. You will forever live in my heart as the greatest heroes ever. In my mind. you even beat out the Trojans at the pass. Even though I had been flying in-country since Feb '66 and had already gotten messed up big time, the 1st battle of Khe Sanh and Dong Ha and the Siege marked a stark turning point in my life. I cannot believe it was that long ago.

There isn't a day that goes by that I don't think about B Company 1/26, and Third platoon. I was on in-country R&R seeing my brother when the ambush happened. I feel I should have been there. I knew a few from boot camp. I miss you guys so much. I went to the Traveling Wall and read your names. I laid my arm and my head upon your names and told you I was so sorry for not being there. And then, for an instance, I thought I heard you say do a chicken dance. You know what? I did do that chicken dance. I smiled but that was for an instant. I will always love you guys and you will always be part of me.

May God be with you.

Shortround and others,

I, too, was one of those who God took from harm's way when better men fell. On 21 Jan 68, I was married to my dear wife and companion of 34 years, Ann. On that day, a fellow Marine and hometown boy LCPL Kendel Randel Jones of Kilo 3/26 fell. Others that I knew — some well, some briefly, some as only a glance in passing — fell. I have no idea why the Lord, My God saw fit to spare this clown when better men fell. I will always remember them and tell of their sacrifice.

My apology on a mistype. Randal's first name was Clifton not Kendal. I do not know what name he was called by those that knew him as a Marine. This came to mind as I was thinking about him as I drove to town this morning. I remember that there was some discussion of him being called Clifton either in person or by a letter written by a Marine around the time of his funeral and an enquiry. I believe it was a member of the family asking if I had seen Randel while I was at Khe Sanh. To my knowledge, I did not see him while there. He was one of Ann's students the first year she taught school. She mentioned that he was a charmer and that almost every day when he came to class he would be chewing gum and she would ask him to deposit it in the trashcan. Fond, silly memories maybe. Randal's daddy or granddaddy, maybe both knew him as Clifton at home, thus Randel was called Randel there.

Looking For...

I feel very intrusive about my request, especially after reading Doc's last post re: "34 years ago..." However, my brother was there, he was in 1/3 and 1/9, and, as he told me once, any other platoon that needed him. He was strictly involved in the Hill battles. He was on 861, 881S and 881N. He was there from '67 to '68. I do not know what companies, nor do I know the exact months he was there. He finished his basic training at Parris Island in 1966, and then went to Camp Lejeune and shortly after to Vietnam. He was trained to be a machinist — AMTRACs? But he always referred to himself as a Grunt — with pride, I might say! He was called Bob or Bobby and I remember writing to one of his buddies called "The Greek!" Anyone remember him? He's not doing so well, he won't talk about his tour, nor will he give me much more info than this. Any connection to anyone who either knew him or was with his unit would be so helpful. I know this is a random search for the history of a living vet, but I want to know, for my own peace of mind, his story. Thanks in advance for any info or suggestions.

Sincerely,
Patty (his "Li'l Sis")

Patty, he is one of us. I, too, was there for some of the fighting during that time with 1/26. I have found it helpful to return to this page often and realize that I am not alone in my thoughts about that time. Gene,

Thank you. I took your advice and spent most of last night and into the wee hours of this morning reading "The Hill Battles 67." It took a box of Kleenex just to get through it, but I am very glad that I did. I feel so different now. I see why my brother doesn't want to "share" with me. I think I understand now...why would he want to re-live his worst living nightmare! He said he really doesn't want to see or talk to guys in his company. When I asked him why, he said," because I can't look at them without seeing my brother's that didn't make it." After reading last night, I can now understand. I've been so invasive in his personal life re: the war. I know now that I have no right. You know my intentions were good, but it's probably time to back off. I will find out his company and his rank, this I can do through records. The rest...is his.

Thanks so much for referring me to that site, and I recommend it to everyone who has unanswered questions about a loved one who served in Vietnam to read it! Gene, I thank God for finding this website...it really does give me peace of mind and comfort. Because all of you are my family...my "big brother" is here in you all!

Thank you, eternally...

Patty,

So glad I was able to help with your quest for information. I, too, re-live some of those moments on a daily basis. We truly are a band of brothers — only those who served together in combat can truly understand. Marines, I think, are especially bonded. Sometimes when we face our feelings head on, only then can we truly begin to live with it. I would not give up on him. Just continue to understand, it may be good for him to seek some help, so that he can come to grips with the horrors we all saw and experienced. If there is any way I can help, send an e-mail. Maybe if he talks to one of us, it will help. Who else would understand better? Thanks for your kind words, and I am truly happy I was able to help you get a better understanding. I, for one, will pray that he finds peace. I think that in understanding your brother's feelings you understand all Vietnam combat veterans. I thank you for that as well.

God Bless, Gene

ED NOTE: Gene, why not share some of your daily "moments" in an article for our "other" publication...i.e., this magazine.

A Weekend of Brotherhood

Hey Bro's,

Once again the feisty redhead and I were on the road. This time it was to attend the 10th annual Vietnam Vets Motorcycle Club's party and campout in Reed's Gap, PA. During the 3 days of the event, approximately 3,000 Nam Vets, their families and just plain old civilians lived in a state of brotherhood very similar to our reunions. I met many old Grunts and we were accepted as if I was a member of their organization, which I am not. I was made to feel right at home. One in particular was an old Lima/3/3 grunt named "Hatchet." Yeah, we all had those silly nicknames. We hit it off right away. He was in Khe Sanh during the hill fights and was there to take Hill 861, where I spent my time during the Tet offensive. So, we had something really in common. I turned him on to our "Club," and I'm hoping he will benefit from our brotherhood. He had one too many beers on Friday night and his brothers, most of them Airborne, said that he was done for the night as he sat sort of semi-conscious at the table. They bet me a beer that I couldn't get him up, which I promptly accepted. I moved over beside "Hatchet" and very softly began to sing the Marine Hymn in his ear. Well, by the time I made it to Tripoli, we were both standing at full attention and singing our guts out.

Needless to say, I won the beer and in the process made a very close friend, or I should say, friends. Kind of like old Joe Amodeo at the reunion. Anyway, it was a great time had by all. Met a bunch of good people and felt all warm and tingly inside — as well as perfectly safe inside their wire.

PTSD– Post Television Supreme Disappointment

by Joseph Olszewski

Having been introduced to the KSV in 1999, I still feel like a "rookie" in this organization. I attended the 2000 San Diego Reunion and a few days of the 2001 Chicago Reunion. Since 1999, I have also met several members of the organization via the Internet who I only had a brief relationship with in '67/'68. Some I remember vividly, while others remember me while I have no recollection of them whatsoever.

One common denominator, however, is Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). I saw it at both reunions, I read it between the lines in many e-mails and I read it on the KSV message board every day. What bothers me the most about it is that we were given no warning or training about it in our pre-Vietnam training programs. To be honest, I never heard of it until the 1980s.

During the 50s I remember seeing World War II veterans on Chicago streets selling newspapers while shaking like a tree in a windstorm. My father, who did not serve in WWII, would tell me it was "shell shock." I assumed from that description and various newspaper articles of the era that it meant a condition a veteran had due to being exposed to constant shelling or experiencing heavy casualties such as on D-Day. Most of my uncles served in WWII and they did not have shell shock, so I assumed it was restricted to those who suffered terrible combat experiences. I did have a next door neighbor in Chicago named Barney who was a WWI Dough Boy. He lived alone his whole life, had a dog as his only friend and drank every night. He worked hard every day, but I noticed that nobody ever visited him. The rest of the neighborhood had a casual relationship with him, even in an era before air conditioning when everybody sat outside after supper to escape the heat. I remember him telling stories about WWI and how he thought the military was good for a young man. I always liked Barney, but he hated me because I was always bouncing rubber balls off his roof or bouncing a basketball on my parent's backyard patio. His dog even hated me.

What I have a problem understanding is why is PTSD so common amongst three million or so Vietnam Veterans when most of us just humped patrols all day and sat on ambushes all night? Certainly, being thrust into a dark jungle after spending seventeen or eighteen years on the lighted streets of New York, Pittsburgh, Chicago and Los Angeles was a shock, but enough to cause PTSD? Certainly, being surrounded by snakes, tigers, tarantulas and water buffaloes after raising Skippy or Butkus for ten years was a shock, but enough to cause PTSD?

Lastly, the occasional VC and/or NVA certainly was more exciting than facing the Taylor Street Dukes or the Blackstone Rangers, but enough to cause PTSD? Certainly, thirteen months of service was nothing compared to three, four or five years that WWII veterans served without any understanding of when they were going home.

So why all this PTSD amongst us? In my opinion, the answer is TELEVISION. We were the first American generation to experience television when it was introduced in the early 50s. When TV first arrived, what was the biggest show? World War II. Every night it was either "Victory at Sea," "The Knights of The Hudson," "Annapolis," "The Long Gray Line," "12 O'Clock High" or "The Big Picture." By the late 50s all the WWII movies began to hit the tube. The John Wayne movies began to materialize and who can ever forget Little John, Frenchy and Sarge in the Friday night Combat TV series? All those shows had one common theme: War was glamorous and those who fought were heroes. As young ten-, eleven- and twelve-year-olds, we watched every show and swallowed it like it was lemonade.

Even grade school in the 50s had a lot to do with PTSD in the 70s, 80s and 90s. I vividly remember Catholic nuns telling us how good we were going to live compared to our parents, since the Depression and all the wars were behind us. Thus, our lives would be carefree and prosperous.

By the early 60s, the shocks started to hit us. First, it was the Kennedy assassination when everybody said "Hey, that's not suppose to happen here." Second, it was the overcrowding of high schools and colleges. We said "Hey, how come I'm not rich yet like Sister Anne promised?" Third, the mid-60s arrived, LBJ tapped us on the shoulder and said, "Son, I got a job for you in a filthy place full of disease, poverty like you've never seen, corruption and a whole bunch of folks who won't like you bad guys." Somewhere deep down inside all of us, something erupted. Even worse, once we arrived at that "filthy place" we were shocked to learn that the AK47 was superior to the M16. The VC/NVA walked around at night when we couldn't see our hands at arm's length. Sleep deprivation was the national pastime. And, nobody in any country liked us. We also saw what a dead body looked like for the first time and our response was: "John Wayne didn't look like that on TV." Then we came home, and I don't need to elaborate on that experience.

So there you have it...my theory...simply, an amateur opinion. Certainly, not required reading by VA shrinks. All I hope to accomplish is to introduce something new and hopefully 200, 300 years from now, the archivists of that era will find this article on a computer disk someplace. Hopefully, they'll say: "Hey, this is different and it fits the puzzle of what happened to three million Americans."

Many people will disagree with me, but my answer is why do so many Vietnam Veterans have this condition when so many of them never saw combat? It's simple. We were overly impressed by war via television and when the "real deal" materialized it was very, very different. I have a cousin who was an Army Private who did nothing at Long Binh for thirteen months except sort mail. He has PTSD so bad you could cut it with a chain saw. His wife died at the age of 40 from cancer. He drove a car through a neighbor's living room window and he's been in and out of drug and alcohol clinics. He never saw combat. I've often wondered how much combat Barney witnessed?

I am contacting you on the subject to bounce this off of you. The Marine Corps is currently having the Heritage Foundation raise $25 million to build a Marine Corps Museum at Quantico. The purpose is to preserve the history of the Corps through the museum. My idea, and you are the first to hear it along with Kaheny who gets a CC on this, is to have representatives from the KSV — possibly John Kaheny, myself, Larry McCartney — contact the Foundation and suggest that working through the KSV, we could provide items, pictures, etc. about Khe Sanh. The idea is somewhat self-serving in that we make sure we and Khe Sanh are well represented in the museum. Perhaps the museum directors would welcome input but not give us any more space than other outfits, campaigns, battles, etc. In contacting you, I thought that the newsletter would be a great place to communicate this information with the membership as well as providing an address if anyone wants to make a financial donation to the fundraising for the museum.

It would be appropriate for me to contact the officers of KSV to explain this proposal and seek permission to use the newsletter/website to solicit money and personal items for donation to the museum and to get involved on our behalf. Before I pursue this idea, I await input from yourself and Kaheny. By the way, the Director of the museum is retired Colonel John Ripley, author and key player in the book "The Bridge at Dong Ha." He is an RVN-era grunt and may see some merit in this endeavor. Since this project will take several years to complete, we have the luxury of time to contact the officers/membership and consider this proposal. I personally would donate my 1:50,000 laminated map with embedded red dust and thrust points on it. Also, the aerial photo of KSCB that was on the back page of one of the newsletters is at the Navy Museum. Ray sent it there, but Kaheny has a pretty good copy as does a retired Lt. Col. I know at Lejeune. I would appreciate it if you and John would provide input to this proposal so I can decide if I should move forward with it.

Bro's

Names appear out of the past,
For hours my heart beats fast.
First comes the joy I've found,
some one who was once lost!
Then memories flood my mind,
again I see the flash and feel the blast.

Depression and pain I feel,
an emptiness in my chest.
What happened to the rest?
Where is Frenchy, Coffey, Crow, and Cann?
Marines from Recon and 1-26 move
through my mind, double time.

Rockets, mortars, artillery blast,
sand bags seep red, blood mixed with red clay. Holes in the runway, must replace,
sections ripped to shreds.

I'm caught in the past,
nowhere to run, can't hide.
See the flash?
Feel the blast?

Who's in that bag, zipped foot to head?
Is it me, or one of my Bro?

My dream is over, my eyes were never shut.
It's over, it's done,
I'm home at last!

Marine Corps Heritage Foundation

"The mission of the Marine Corps Heritage Center is to create a place where all Marines — past, present and future — and especially the American people, can come to view the history of our great Nation through the eyes of Marines."

I share with my fellow Khe Sanh Veterans information about an exciting undertaking of the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation. In the opening sentence, I quote the mission statement concerning a new and exciting project. The foundation is in the process of raising $25 million to build a state-of-the-art Marine Corps Museum. Members of "The Board" include nearly every former Commandant and Sergeants Major of the Marine Corps as well as notable former Marines of every rank. Some of these men are successful businessmen, politicians, etc., but many are "regular guys" like many of us. Interestingly enough, several members are Khe Sanh vets. Also, a number of notable businessmen — not former Marines — have joined in the effort to build the museum.

The status of the project is as follows: Land has been secured where the museum will be built; a world-class architectural firm has been hired to design a museum that will rival the greatest museums of the world; an official design concept has already been approved by the Commandant of the Marine Corps and ground-breaking for the museum is tentatively scheduled for April 29, 2003.

An excerpt from a letter written by Charles C. Krulak, 31st Commandant of the United States Marine Corps and Co-Chairman, Heritage Center Group, states: "...we have selected...our exhibit designer, and we are working diligently with them to ensure that we will have three Main Exhibits — covering World War II, Korea, and Vietnam — displayed on opening day. Using the newest techniques to help museum visitors better understand the subject matter, each exhibit will include an immersion experience. The World War II exhibit will feature Iwo Jima...the Korean War exhibit will feature the Chosin Reservoir...and the Vietnam era exhibit will feature Khe Sanh."

I have been in touch with the foundation and am in the process of talking to a museum curator to discuss the need for memorabilia/artifacts for display in the Khe Sanh exhibit. Once information is available, you would have the opportunity to donate items to the museum that they may be interested in using. As of this writing, the curator is overseas for several weeks but I am told that he has an idea of the types of items he is interested in using in the display. My main concern is that if you send something and they do not use it, that it be returned to you. What a great opportunity to contribute to such a worthwhile endeavor! Since the completion of the museum is several years away, I plan to communicate with the membership through this newsletter, and possibly, the web site home page concerning my proposal.

Lastly, if you would like to make a tax-exempt donation towards the building of the museum, you may send your donation to: The Marine Corps Heritage Center, PO Box 998, Quantico, VA 22134-0998. Note that the contribution is for the museum. Large contributions such as $28,000 from the 9th Special Basic Class (donated at their 50th reunion) and $25,000 from Edson's Raiders Association, veterans of the First Marine Raider Battalion, have been received as well as countless individual contributions. I am personally excited about the Marine Corps' selection of Khe Sanh to be highlighted in the museum. I will keep the membership informed of the progress of this endeavor in future writings.

Khe Sanh Members, We Need Your Help

We need you help ASAP! A "thank you" book is being put together by people such as you who were either treated by a medical personnel or served as a medical personnel and want to share your experiences. Women and men such as Don"Doc" Ballard (MOH) and our corpsman in Vietnam deserve to be recognized in a book dedicated to them for their selflessness while doing their jobs. They made it possible for so many of us to return home to our families. Please read the following two-page brochure, make copies to pass it on to others. Send us your testimonies ASAP.

We thank you in advance for helping to make this appreciation book a reality!

Dear Veteran and American Citizen,

Are you here today because a military medical person took the time to treat you in your moment of need?

Millions of people were born and are alive today because the military medical corps took care of their parents, grandparents, and other relations. From the Revolutionary War of 1775 to the present time, there have been 1,541,452 men and women who were wounded in action (WIA). Those who were treated by the medical corps were able to return home to their families and friends. Some begat 4, 5, or even more children! If you consider that these children had children — there are most certainly 7 to 10 million offspring conceived by someone who was WIA. Without the noble work of the military medical corps, they would never have been born! They, too, owe their lives to the military medical corps.

Your chance to make a timeless tribute has arrived! We want you to share your story of survival by honoring the selfless deeds of medical personnel during wartime. Your account will be compiled in a Military Medical Appreciation Book. The profits from this book will be used to fund the National Medical Memorial and Youth Education Center, Inc. but as a contributor, you will receive your copy of this commendable hardback book free! As a student of William Jewell College, an intern for the memorial project, and the granddaughter of two veterans, I encourage YOU to share your appreciation without delay.

Today is your time to thank the medical personnel who saved your life and the lives of many others. Today you can contribute to the extraordinary appreciation book that will educate and inspire many generations to come. The brochure [not attached] will explain the details of the Military Medical Appreciation Book and the mission of the National Combat Medical Memorial and Youth Education Center. For more information regarding the Military Medial Appreciation Book log onto our website, www.medicalwarmemorial.org. Please do not hesitate to contact Christy Kleinbeck or the founder, Chuck Wright, at (816) 452-0606 with additional questions or comments. We need your help! Please send in your stories A.S.A.P.!

Confessions of a Tree Hugger

by Bob McLane

In front of me, a huge oak leaned over like a old woman pulling on a stubborn weed. I was happy to see that the huge tree was still healthy and strong. High among the sprawling limbs lay the ruins of an old tree house. The rotting boards nailed there years ago are warped and splintered, but they hold firm as I climb up into the remains of what once was a mighty fortress. From the lofty shelter of this natural hideout my young cousins and I had held off many a determined posse of fearless lawmen. We never surrendered. We never ran. We kept fighting until they were all dead, or it was time for supper.

The sight of a young man sitting up in an old tree house must have looked strange to the long distance truck drivers passing by, but I didn't care. This time the fight was for real. I had received orders from the United States Marine Corps to report to Camp Pendelton to begin the final training that I would get before leaving for Vietnam. I wanted to go on sitting in the big old tree forever, at least until the #### war was over. I decided that I wasn't going to come down until I had a plan that I was absolutely, one hundred per cent certain would bring me back alive.

I went over every lesson my cousins and I had learned from our many summers as desperadoes. Keep your head down. Listen up. I heard my cousins warn me once more to keep my eyes open for the subtle signs of another attack. No matter what, we all had to be brave. No one wanted to be remembered as a coward. I would rather not be remembered at all. The ones who were remembered were the ones who didn't come back. There were a lot of different ways to say someone had been killed. "He didn't make it" was the most common way Marines in Vietnam told each other about a new casualty. During the Civil War, Mama would tell her neighbors about the dreaded letter from the War Department by saying her son had "fallen." She tried to make it look like getting killed in a war was no worse than taking a header down a flight of stairs.

It made no difference to the undertaker. I had no interest in needing his services anytime soon. Most of my thoughts that morning were not making sense, but neither did a lot of lessons I learned in the Marines. They didn't have to make sense. They just had to work. Finally, I concluded that God really did like me and wanted to keep me around for a long time. With any luck I was going to be good. I was a member in good standing of one of the finest fighting outfits in the world, next to my cousins. I decided it was safe to come down. I picked up an acorn from underneath the big oak tree and slipped it into my pocket. I walked back to the white frame house my grandfather had built, filled with the confidence of my newfound faith. I felt good about the plan I had chosen.

I sat down to an old-fashioned country meal. My grandmother avoided looking at me as we started to eat. I could see the worry in her eyes. I told a joke to break the tension. No one laughed. "Don't worry, I'm coming back from this thing. I guarantee it. She put down a pitcher of tea and looked at me. "Of course you are," she said.

Gunner, I hope this letter finds you and your family in good health. As I look on top of my television set, there sits one single object — a copy of Red Clay. As I read the simple words, I remember days long gone. Some of those memories are etched deep in my soul, some make me think and some make me grin. It affects me every day, good and bad.

I still sleep with the lights on in my house. I still dream of those past moments and run from my bed to the living room, hands covering my head, waiting for the loud burst. There are some nights when I cannot remember the dream. Thanks for small favors. So many memories of men whose names I cannot recall, and most, just by their nicknames. I really try to remember, but do I really dare?

I am sitting here drinking a cup of coffee contemplating whether I should go to the reunion in Dallas, Texas, which is only four hours from my house. If I do, I may have to confront people and memories of the past. How will I feel?

I live by myself, but I am not alone. I wait until sunrise before I read Red Clay, so there will be no interference. I feel the magazine demands that of me. When I look at the magazine on the television, I wonder, "Why would a man I hardly remember send me such a wonderful gift?" It simply reads, "MERRY CHRISTMAS, Larry McCartney (MGYSGT)"

PS — I have a small pile of sand sitting in my backyard with a shovel standing in it. People ask. I just look. Those who know will understand.

Dear Tom,

Thank you for the "Life Member Certificate" and the membership card. Very impressive.

Khe Sanh was a defining time and place in my life. I spent over five months recovering from wounds sustained on 30 Mar 68 from incoming mortar rounds. I am grateful to be alive, very proud and humbled when the Marine Corps awarded me the Navy Cross.

I still have physical limitations but have learned to live with the pain. I have also learned to cope with PTSD in the last year. I am also grateful to have found God's grace, which has became more evident. I sadly had to watch my friend, Billy Lake, B Co 1/26, Weapons Platoon, succumb to cancer about four months ago. The friendships from Khe Sanh can be joyful, lasting, and painful. If you have a directory, I would love to have a copy to find old friends. I do not know much about the Khe Sanh Veterans association, so I would appreciate any help.

Hi Tom,

I served with SOG as a team leader of a spike team. The team consisted of six Montagnards (Bru), and Sgt. Ambrose, the staff radio operator. I just recently learned he suffered a fatal heart attack. I am also a former Marine, 1956-1957, who served in the artillery (105s) at 29 Palms California.

I do not like to repeat "Old War Stories," but I am still bothered by decisions made by a few of our former leaders at Khe Sanh. The vast majority of our leaders were outstanding individuals, but there were still mistakes made that I felt caused unnecessary casualities.

As early as April 1967, I trained my team on Hill 881N and 881S. Prior to my team operating in Laos, we had to verify the team's readiness. Prior to the arrival of the 26th Marines, I had a mission on 881N to locate enemy emplacements and strength. During four days of surveillance, numerous enemy emplacements were observed. They had heavy weapons in each of their concealed bunkers, and there was extremely heavy enemy troop movement. At one point, we were nearly trapped due to the large amount of ground troops.

A few days later, Captain Wiloughby, who later became a hero during the battle at Lang Vei, asked me to join him at a briefing with Marine intelligence officers. At the briefing, I informed the Marines of what we had encountered on Hill 881N. When I suggested that an attack on 881N should begin with large air strikes and a battalion-sized ground assault, they scoffed at my suggestion of the amount of troops required to take Hill 881N.

Captain Wiloughby, offended by their total lack of concern for the information we had provided, left the meeting. We returned to our little corner on the west side of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, located just outside of the Marines' wire. Over the next couple of weeks, we watched as the Marines took a horrible pounding attempting to take Hill 881N without total air support and sufficient manpower. What really hurt was that we could do nothing to help them.

We did lose a lot of our teams while operating in Laos and the areas around Khe Sanh village, but it was never because we failed to heed the advice of others who had been there before and who knew what lay ahead for us. Keep up the good work and may God bless and keep you.

Herb Marshall
MACV – SOG Khe Sanh

About 90 years before the Marines arrived at Khe Sanh, a French explorer went through the area while travelling from Laos to Cam Lo, along a route that was made into Route 9 around 1910. The following is a translation from French of a portion of a diary by Dr. Jules Harmand, who in 1877 travelled from Tchepone to Cam Lo, passing through what was Lao Bao and then through the Bru area. Some of his comments:

> "July 25th: I have taken a large dose of quinine because of the poisoned mountains, the 'red earth' as the natives term it.

"July 29th: After about a two hour march, we came to an immense ravine, where I discovered a torrential river, the Rao Quan. Evening: I have encountered a group of savages who were seized with terror upon seeing me, throwing down their arms and kneeling before me. Their charming little village is Mois. The poor souls, who speak a little Annamite, received me best they could. The ancient chief put his immense house at my disposal. They brought me dry fish and rice. They also roasted a squirrel I had killed along the way. After spending the evening with my host, I slept peacefully among them, on a dreadfully soiled mat.

"The next morning I went hunting in the ravines, which yielded a good harvest of plants. It is a beautiful country — if I had provisions, I might be tempted to remain a few days longer. The Rao Quan is a true river, hundreds of meters wide, with smoothly flowing waters. Unfortunately, we soon encountered numerous rapids. The natives regarded me curiously, kneeling around me in a circle. They were dressed in sleeveless vests, singular in that they were made from sheets of bark from the Antiaris Toxicaria tree. As soon as my baggage arrived, I distributed knives and mirrors among the Mois, who in turn gave me slips of paper with symbols to which they attributed magical properties."

Early August, Marine Corps Base, Camp Pendleton California

On August 9th at approximately 1300, a mini-1/26 reunion was held at the world famous San Onofre Beach. The site has been known as a gathering place and watering hole for Marines heading to, or recovering from, war tours in the Far and Near East; WW II, Korea, Vietnam, Desert Storm and most recently, Trash Canistan.

Sergeant Major Morris put out the call for the gathering in mid-July with orders to all hands to be present and accounted for. "You will have a good time!" he bellowed. When the Sergeant Major speaks, the troops comply. We subsequently disobeyed orders and had a great, not good time. There were a few moments of silence as names and past deeds of those who are no longer with us were mentioned with sadness, reverence and respect.

Colonel Snyder, on his first tour, spent a few short months in RVN before being wounded and evacuated to MCRD, San Diego for treatment and rehabilitation. He graduated from the Naval Academy in the early 60's. Ray joined 1/26 for his 2nd tour and assumed command of Alpha Company prior to the Siege — a command he held during and after that long dance was over.

Jim Morris joined 1/26 as the 81 MM Platoon Sergeant and later served as the 81's Platoon Commander. During the Siege, he was meritoriously promoted to Gunnery Sgt. and became the Battalion Operation Chief. He held that billet as his 13-month tour was completed. In the early 70s, Jim returned to Vietnam for his 2nd complete tour as an advisor with the RVN Marine Corps, initially at the battalion level and later, in the capacity as the senior Operation NCO advisor attached to an RVN Marine Brigade.

Former Captain Jeff Stack served at Khe Sanh in Alpha Company as a Platoon Commander and later as acting Company Commander. Jeff was wounded in action. He completed his 1/26 tour and extended for an additional 6 months as a Division Aerial Observer. Since his separation, he has owned and operated a growing and very successful land development company.

Ken Pipes retired from the Marine Corps in 1982. For the next 12 years, he worked for Southern California Edison in the Nuclear Security Field, retiring from that position in 1994.

Captain Steve Longo spent his last 6 months in RVN as the 1/26 Air Liaison officer. Steve had us in tears as he discussed the highlights of a Marine Corps Fighter Pilot. While assigned to 1/26, he got many a wounded Marine evacuated to field hospitals. Steve also controlled air strikes for the Battalion along Route One, Liberty Bridge, the Go Noi Islands, Hill 55, and in the An hoa Basin. He carried his weight and was one of us then, and now!

You all know John Kaheny, a past president of our organization. He was a Platoon Commander and acting Company Commander on a couple of separate occasions. He also served as the Operation watch officer, and later extended his combat tour with the unit. John is a two war Vet. His Marine Reserve Unit was activated for Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm. He has a way with the telling of a story — and had a bunch of them to tell.

With the concurrence of the Sgt. Major, there may be another call to gather at the same, well-known site for further discussions and to once again smell the cordite and gun smoke of those good — and not so good — experiences from so long ago.

The circle grows smaller but remains unbroken.

Postscript:

It should be noted that two additional members who received orders to attend, were absent; one authorized, and one unauthorized. The Sgt. Major excused former Captain Chuck Patterson after he submitted an "out of town on lawyer business" explanation. Chuck is a lawyer and published poet/author. On the other hand, our famous Medical Doctor, Ed "Fast Eddie" Feldman, was placed in an "unauthorized absence" status by the Sgt Major. His physical description was given to the Base Military Police, who immediately broadcast a BOL for the Doctor. No sightings have yet been reported. Request that Chicago Police Sergeant and our current VP, Tom Eichler, be immediately contacted if anyone in the Regiment observes Fast Eddie moving quickly through their area.

Welcome Home

A tattered but proud symbol comes home at last

by Tom Eichler

On a hot, foggy day at the Khe Sanh Combat Base in 1968, a large element of NVA attacked the position held by Golf Company 2/26. During the battle that followed, the position was threatened with being overrun. The Golf Company Unit Flag (Colors) were entrusted to a young, badly wounded Marine who was being evacuated. Members of Golf Company, during the fierce battle, defeated the enemy and drove them from their position. However, they assumed their colors would be lost forever.

At about the same time, the wounded Marine arrived in the United States and was transferred to a reserve unit. During his recuperation at the unit, a young surgeon helped the wounded Marine with a personal family problem. The Marine in turn, gave the doctor the flag he had carried with him, knowing the deep affection he (the doctor) held for the Marine Corps from his own service during the Korean War. The doctor did not have the slightest idea what to do with the flag. He did, however, know he would treasure it and keep it safe. He wrote down the name of the young Marine, but later lost it and all physical contact with him, and he did not recall his (the young Marine's) name.

After many years had passed, the doctor, Michael Healy, was packing his personal items for a move to a new residence. He told the story to a former Marine friend who had served in Vietnam with 1st Force Recon. That friend, Robert Schaefers, called a few more Khe Sanh Veterans and learned that they were having their reunion in Irving, Texas in early July 2002. Both Dr. Healy and Robert Schaefers, who reside in Texas, vowed they would return it to the rightful owners.

As the BOD convened their regular board meeting at the 2002 reunion, Robert Schaefers arrived with the tattered, old Colors of Golf Company. After relating the story of how he had come into its possession, the BOD voted to have Robert present the flag to surviving members of Golf Company 2/26 at the reunion awards ceremony.

Eric Smith, G/2/26; Robert Schaefers, 1st Force Recon; James Everley, G/2/26 with Golf Co.'s Colors.

In a very short but moving ceremony, Robert Schaefers presented the flag to Golf Company veterans Eric Smith and James Everley. After the ceremony, Robert stated that it was one of the proudest moments of his life to return the long lost symbol to its rightful owners.

PUBLISHERS NOTE: The members of the BOD voted to award Life Memberships to both Dr. Michael Healy and Robert Schaefers.

Hi Tom,

Hope all is well. Just a short update on our first reunion in 36 years —

The Northern I Corps Artillery Units had their first reunion in 36 years. Represented were the following units: 2/94th 175mm Guns, 1/82 175mm Guns, 5/4 155mm Howitzers, 6/33 and 1/40th 105mm Howitzers. Most of these units were attached to the 3rd Division at one time.

The reunion was held in Branson, Missouri on Memorial Day weekend. While the Marine Artillery was invited, no representatives showed. We did have some sign up to attend. They were missed. It was obvious from the amount of hearing aids in my battalion that the large 175s had done their damage to the line officers and gunners. Slides and videos along with some audiotapes were shown and played all weekend. Former C Battery Officer Roy Deloach, who is now a chaplain, remembered the 2/94th KIAs at our banquet dinner. Those that knew the fallen were asked to stand in remembrance.

The audiotapes were of a Marine Recon Patrol during a fire mission and a tape that the 12th Marines have been looking to find for years. Unfortunately, ours was the same one that others have, not the original. Audible, but Marine LTC Rice is not in his description of the massive attack on Gio Linh. We marveled at the counter-fire put out by C/1/12 against just overwhelming incoming. What a valorous episode in the Marine Corps history for those Marine artillerymen and their unit. Those fellows showed what the Corps is about. As I understand, they suffered 75% casualties and had one gun working when they were withdrawn and replaced by one of the other 12th Marine Batteries, believed to be W/2/12. Just an awesome performance by some brave artillerymen.

It was also discussed (as it was early in our struggle) that it may have been the only massed battery to massed battery scenario against the NVA enemy. After Gio Linh, the NVA realized they could not stand toe-to-toe and slug it out with American artillery. One of our former FO's brought about 600 slides of the first opening of QL9. He and his RTO were members of the first convoy out to Khe Sanh and the border.

Among the slides were pictures of the 11th Engineers rebuilding the bridges on the way out, some of the Ontos crews. Also, I thought I saw some 105mm being towed along. I would guess that would be a 12th Battery or Platoon. The 13th would not have been there at that time and the 11th was down south. This would have been late '66 or early '67.

Marine Officer Philip Saur was shown in several pictures as our 2/94th FO. Our RTO's became close friends with Phillip Saur. Phil was later killed on 861A. Phillip Saur would detail an Ontos crew to run the roads with the FO and the RTO. Our FO was wounded on April 9th 1967 while on Marine patrol and medevac'd.

Some of those pictures are available online at http://www.willpete.com/2nd_battalion_94th_artillery.htm Scroll down to number 87, Barry DeVita, and you can view those "First Road to Khe Sanh" pictures.

It was decided to try and have a reunion every two years with an effort put forth to find other members of the artillery units that served up north, along the DMZ.

2004 Reunion site has not been selected yet.

Hopefully, some of the Marine Artillerymen will join us in two years.

ED NOTE: Why not use the Khe Sanh reunions? It will accomplish two things. A bigger reunion gets better deals, and it saves you guys from the hassles of planning. The Delta Company Association has found this to be an effective way to save time, effort and money. Delta now has the largest attendance by any unit at the reunions.

Dinosaurs in the Air

by Ray Prittie

Thank you so much for the sentiments, bro. Really appreciate that. We really tried to make those bolts as secure as we could, but we were working with stuff that really needed a lot of help. It is the Marine Corps' way though, and why the Corps will be in business for a long time. The Air Force inhabited a totally different universe that we could not identify with at all. We stole one of their trucks from in front of the main PX near the main gate on the AF side at Danang, immediately painted it Marine Corps green and stenciled in some phony numbers. Hey, we really needed it. We figured they could get whatever they wanted. It was still serving our line shack when I left.

The first line aircraft I crewed was a basket case. (H&MS 11, MAG 11, 1st MAW. The squadron had not been in-country that long. Had only one plane that was now a basket case.) It had been involved in a midair with an ARNV C-47; both trying to occupy the same space at the same time going into Hue/Phu Bai. The ARVN plane became a dilapidated wreck east of the Phu Bai runway. It was still there when I left. Our guys made it back to Danang though, because they were lucky and also knew that Uncle Sam, even though he would probably give the ARVNs a whole bunch of planes, would probably not replace the 834 until the duration.

I had been in-country two days. My first day reporting in to the line shack at the SE corner of the field was a memorable one. We had one plane. When I first viewed it, it had no engines, was on blocks, covered with dust, and had only one wing. The most sorry sight I have ever seen. This was my first real duty station and I was supposed to be flying on that thing. They had just received a new wing in a large wooden crate off a C-130. Over the next couple of weeks we rebuilt that plane. Here I am, a 6725, doing the most bizarre of stuff to get this plane flying again.

The big day came in March 1966. It was like a ceremony around a new prototype taking to the skies for the first time. That plane, even though we were eventually built up with 3 others over time, became the work horse of the unit. It was that plane that brought us back through a dark and stormy night. C-117D (R4-D8) BuNo 50834. I loved that plane. I have beacoup pictures of it. Never was able to find out what happened to it. Its brother, the 835, which I also crewed, now stands in a place of honor on a pedestal at Mirimar. I have a great picture of me taken in July of 1966 with the 834, 835, and the 211 in the background behind me. Little did I know that within a few days the 211 and all the crew except me would be history.

In Loving Tribute

by Bill Person

They gave their youth and all they had,
To a war whose price has made us sad.
In a steamy land of fear and strife,
The Reaper stole a loved one's life.
Now we endure in solemn grace,
For no one can ever take his place.
How precious, this freedom, we all share
When we give tribute, we prove we care.
For those who risk it all, their mortal lives,
So we may know that our nation survives.
Please, Dear God, soothe these grieving pains,
Our resolve is tested, but our love remains.
Help us to live as Thy will be done,
And our spirits join, so we are one.
Through time, bereavements slowly dim,
And it comforts us that Your arms hold him.

Han Lee

by Ernie Spencer

I first met Han on 881 South. Delta was in its second or third rotation on that hill. It was October, maybe November. I honestly can't remember. I'd had Delta since Johnson split in mid-July sometime. I started with Delta on 861. The record says I got Delta August 1. Records had to match. Short timers often were given a huss off the line. Johnson had Delta for six months. That's long for a company commander. He spent his last weeks in the BOQ tent down at battalion.

Han Lee, an arty FO, came to see me right from the re-supply UH-34 that dropped him off. He was like me, one of the first Asian officers to serve in the Marine Corps in combat. His credentials impressed me. He had graduated with a degree in civil engineering from Texas. We were both reservists via the PLC program. Han, like me, wasn't a lifer. I do not mean to be disrespectful of career Marines. My five rifle battalion commanders were all great men (three with the Second Marines and two in Vietnam). I've known great Marine officers who I willingly followed because I admired and respected them. Men like Gentleman Jim and Freddy J. Staff officers like Charlie. Fellow junior officers like Pipes, Snyder, Feral, Fitzgerald and Brown. These guys showed me who they were in a time when Marines are really Marines. I got a belly full of lifers before I got to Vietnam.

We reserve officers hated the kiss-ass lifers. They made us sick. We were one-tour guys that were hanging it all out, one time, for whatever reason. After that, we just wanted to go home and get on with our lives. I'll tell one other truth about Marine junior infantry officers. As far as the Corps is concerned, the smart ones fly, shoot big shit, drive or build. The ones like me who can't count past ten without taking our shoes off go grunt. I joined the Corps because I could. I wanted to be a Marine from the time I was a child. Han wanted to serve his adopted country. Han was a first generation Chinese immigrant. He had the misfortune to be educated in Texas. He had a Texas accent with a Chinese-sounding drawl. "You know, I figured that if I'm going to serve our country, I must go with the best." That was Han's motivation for going Marine. He also knew his family would admire and respect him for his choice. Face is very important to Asians.

When I could, I would always request Han for my long-range company patrols. Delta did a 360 around Khe Sanh while I was with it, from the base of Tiger Tooth, to the river that divides at Laos. As far north, and south and west as the regiment would allow. We went out as far as our 155s could reach. This was a time when the regiment at Khe Sanh consisted of just one badly undermanned rifle battalion. At any time, one rifle company would have both sides of the airstrip. One would be on 861, another on 881 South. That left one company to do long range patrols.

I remember Jim telling me with that grin of concern before I'd go out. "Now Ernie, make sure you can handle whatever happens for at least a day." If we stepped into it, we'd have to be prepared to deal with it with only arty to back us. Weather was mostly socked in or pouring. Luckily, things were quiet around Khe Sanh at that time.

I believe Colonel Lownds foresaw what was coming and wanted continuing information about the surroundings. Delta would register artillery on the NVA harbor sites we found. The NVA used the network of trails that ran around and by Khe Sanh. The trails never grew over. There was constant enemy traffic during these quiet times. They followed a recurring pattern when selecting their harbor sites. They were always near water and on a reverse slope from Khe Sanh. Because of the thickness of the jungle we often found these places in, we had to register them with airbursts. Han would shoot the azimuths to the burst. He also did the more accurate type.

I remember Han working one of those surveying things on a three-legged transom when we were on 881 South. He relayed exact angles and stuff back to the battery. They were popping 105s high up on the Laos side from us. Han buddied up to me because we like the same type of staple. Rice. I had a connection through my Bru scouts, who got me the packets from their Bru bloods who worked with the SOG guys. Besides its great taste, the rice came in small, light, individual packets. Just add water. Five minutes if it's hot water, and thirty if cold. That's all I ate out on patrol. Ham fried and rice, with cookies, coffee, sugar and cigarettes rounding out the provisions. Fruit and fancy stuff weighed too much for me. We went out for five days without re-supply. "Take all you want to eat," I told my guys. "But you carry your full load of ammo, water and sleeping gear."

We didn't wear flacks and stopped using helmets. The guys went too far, and Jim made me knock it off. With the camo paint and wild head coverings some of them looked more like pirates than Marines. Their missing teeth added too subtle a touch for Jim's tastes, I guess. Some guys would hang stockings full of cans on the backs and sides of their packs. They looked like dread locks on a green head.

While on the subject of we Asians who served at Khe Sanh, I have to clear the record concerning the fine article that was done on a brother Asian genius, Harry Baig. Harry was a lot of great things, but he was no Mongol. I'm a Mongol. I trace my lineage back to the guys who rode through some of your ancestral homelands. It was my ancestors that burned those towns and rode off with the booty. At the '98 reunion in D.C., Ernest Jones, who was Delta's weapons platoon sergeant, told me what I did before we went out on a long-range patrol. Delta was getting a lot of new guys at the time. I lined the men up in front of me, then said, "Look at me, Marines." Then, pointing off to Laos say, "I'm not like them. I'm taller."

I did what I had to do to fulfill my dream, but I don't remember doing that. I'm at the point in my Khe Sanh journey where what I cannot remember is more important than what I can.

One Incoming Round

by James Carmichael

I remember intensely real fragments of raised voices rattling about in that moment of time, space and past history. Those memorable sounds have long since settled like the dust on the furniture, despite their momentary indelible imprinting and my own shifting fragility. Nothing and everything true penetrated in an instant. I attended to it as one gropes in the dark for the seam of a thick, translucent curtain. A disconnect at the words, "Corpsman! Corpsman up! Get a..." Meaning ebbed.

That enemy mortar round landed within the context of men coming stoically to grips with gnawing hunger. We ate one meal a day for ages. Re-supply, or the lack thereof, stayed on our minds hunting us, haunting us, digging with us, cleaning our weapons ...and dying with us. It waited in earnest for night, sleeping in all the hollow recesses of our stomachs, returning to the corners of our bunkers as morning roused our communal outpost. When we did eat, we did so with the emotional stagnation one possesses fueling his car with unleaded. We worked if only to keep the hunger gremlins at bay, which elicited more of the same. Somebody had to keep an eye on all that banal food we stored frugally on top of the CP bunker.

That "somebody" fell mostly to the mortars section. We stood watch, in shifts, all night. At that hour, the moonlight played wearily on the tops of the tufted clouds. Its brightness fanned out to enwrap and monitor the peaks of the surrounding hills as well as to our own. I could see and hear them in their one's and two's with less difficulty moving toward the treasure I guarded from those hungry men. A few elevated words and the tall elephant grasses growing out of the top of the hill blowing monotonously like unkempt hair reabsorbed them, still hungry. I feared the CO counting cases every morning for the mercy I would show those hungry young men. Occasionally, I turned away intentionally to watch a bombing run, or, to cover myself from the never still air.

Ten minutes. I moved or walked or sat filtering ten minutes worth of ruffled sky through my lungs before that round landed. Eleven minutes earlier, perhaps a few less bites of rice or moments of idle digestion among the NVA mortar crew out there beyond my view, when someone would be yelling "Corpsmen up!" for me. Instead, my early morning replacement sat where I sat and the round landed where he now sat, between his legs — severed and ripped, his limbs now disassembled from his body.

I stood not 60 feet from him when the sharp blur of the slicing object invaded our hilltop and slipped down onto him. I saw the white, instant light and then the smoke. The dirty, three-dimensional acrid smoke and red dirt turned to seedier bits of gray, screening him from me. The tiresome wind released the veneer of dense haze soon after posting it, and his life, now a limp existence, changed. Something erased the deafening explosion as it pressed into the parts of my mind where sound is stored and examined. For one more day, I saw this great event in the context of all the larger ripping and tearing and deprivation.

I stood and looked. I knew another round would soon follow, but I just stood. I could do nothing else, so I wallowed in my deafness. I saw the Corpsmen, with bags in hand, run to begin his terrible work. Other men rushed about yelling, moving through the whirling air made of paste. Perhaps I imagined sitting myself down to silhouette his body, covering him with my own, protecting him. All of this movement blurred with greater complexity around me and on the stage to my front. I stood where I stood almost as ripped and torn within as he without.

Everything else appeared a dead shade of gray — the grass, even the sky with its streaking bits of golden morning clouds. I propped my exhausted body upright and I bled incrementally during those brief moments. Inches ago, I assumed I was mostly bled out. I stood frozen in my mad fascination despite the danger of that next round landing somewhere, addressed "to whom it may concern." I refused to hear. To listen. To realign. Everything — men, grasses and clouds — meandered in melting acoustic waves. And despite my mental equilibrium now blasted off its kilter, this tantalizing scene moved naturally. Rhythmically. But I, I could not hear it in order to absorb it, so I became absorbed by the sum of the whole. I controlled nothing and all the lies lay shattered in the firm, red clay upon which I stood so uselessly.

The second round landed; in masterful alignment with the first but twelve odd feet short, harmlessly short. It maimed by intent only. In warped fragments of time. I moved as an old man who has seen his ancient self, years before he reaches that stage when it presses its spiny fingers into his mind, body and renders him another object to disassemble and bury. The next moments I lived in abject purposelessness. I could do nothing for him. Him the target. Someone resembling me moved to my bunker and became mired and then subsequently lost in cleaning his always dirty weapon. The now full day would continue to blow its calloused soul unopposed relentlessly across the brow of the hill, shifting and bending the watching grasses.

Vietnam: Fictions Distort America's Role

by Bing West

Last Christmas, I went back to a village where I had fought 35 years ago. It is 400 miles north of Saigon, which is now called Ho Chi Minh City. The North Vietnamese also have changed the name of the village to show who won the war. A solitary Marine squad had fought in that village, living among 6,000 Vietnamese. In 1966, 15 Americans walked in; 485 days later, eight walked out. More Americans died in the rice paddies around a forgotten place called Chu Lai than in all of Desert Storm. And, for what?

In the village, I visited our old fort — now a kindergarten — and prowled around the moss-covered stone foundations while kicking up old memories. When I walked back out to the paddy dike, I was surrounded by smiling villagers. An old farmer (my age) peered at me and said: "Welcome back, Dai Uy." A third of a century later, they remembered me, a young captain from decades earlier. They asked by name about the other Marines who had gone home those many years ago and led me through the trails to a palm tree overlooking a bright green paddy. There they showed me a rough marble marker — their memorial to the seven Marines who had lived in that village for a year-and-a-half and who had not walked out.

In the larger geopolitical scheme of things, does the fondness of those villagers for Americans known long ago mean anything? Possibly. It's fashionable now to say Vietnam was a bad war, where even children threw grenades. Forcing American soldiers to do terrible things. It was supposedly a country unworthy of our sacrifice. Those who avoided or protested service argued that it was better not to serve. While poll after poll shows that the Vietnam veterans are proud they served, their collective judgment has been ignored by a media that has labeled the war as unworthy.

Aesop's Fox

"The Greatest Generation" by Tom Brokaw of NBC News became a best-selling book by depicting how ordinary and famous Americans united to fight World War II. As the success of Brokaw's book attests, winning casts a long shadow; we justly praised ourselves for our efforts in the 1940s. Losing has the opposite effect. No such book will emerge about Vietnam. The Greatest Generation were the leaders who sent the next generation into Vietnam. Those same leaders eventually lost heart, abandoned the South Vietnamese people, and transferred to them the blame for failure. Aesop wrote about the fox who, failing to snatch the grapes from the vine, declared them sour. We acted the same way. As a nation, we declared we would help the South Vietnamese defend themselves against the communists directed from North Vietnam and aided by China and the Soviet Union. When the price became too high, many of the same leaders from the Greatest Generation declared the South Vietnamese no longer deserving of our sacrifices. Sometimes we're not the greatest.

Three Myths

Today, three myths distort the American role in the war in Vietnam:

The first myth is that we were defeated on the battlefield.

Actually, all American combat forces had withdrawn years before Saigon fell. After the U.S. withdrawal, North Vietnam invaded in 1972 and was driven back by South Vietnamese ground forces and U.S. air power. In recent movies such as "We Were Soldiers," North Vietnamese willpower is portrayed as implacable and unstoppable. This is rubbish. As the tragedy of World War I demonstrated, every nation has a breaking point. Three times we had the North Vietnamese on the ropes, and each time it was policy fickleness in Washington that persuaded them not to continue. In the second invasion after Americans left, in 1975, North Vietnam employed Chinese artillery pieces and Soviet-built tanks. We refused to bomb those targets and instead slashed our aid. At the end, some South Vietnamese soldiers were down to one grenade a day.

The second myth is that of moral equivalency — depicting war protesters defying American authorities as being as courageous as the American soldiers fighting the North Vietnamese.

After all, the protesters had Woodstock, where it was difficult singing and making love in the rain; the soldiers had the jungles, slogging through the heat and mud, losing more than 50,000 dead. Some who avoided fighting claimed they were protesting for the sake of those who were fighting. Yet those who fought are proud they did so and in the main saw the protesters as a reason why the North Vietnamese continued to fight. Thanks to the press, we remember the protesters more fondly than we do those who fought. As a nation, we ignored — and often scorned — our servicemen on their return from Vietnam.

Vietnam is depicted as more brutal than World War II. The actions of a few who killed civilians, such as former Sen. Bob Kerrey, have received front-page coverage, with the spin angle being that "the war made me do it." The war, it is argued, corrupted American values and decency. The opposite was actually the case. We inflicted less damage on the civilian population in Vietnam than we did in France and Germany. Our soldiers in Vietnam fought as valiantly and as humanely as did the Greatest Generation in World War II.

The third myth is that losing makes little difference.

But losing did affect our self-confidence, and to this day some countries are wrongly emboldened, believing we can be beaten on the battlefield. After the fall of Saigon in 1975, American foreign policy manifested serious dyspepsia. In supplicant fashion, we courted detente — "can't we all just get along?" — with a supposedly stronger Soviet Union, and we permitted a rabble to seize our embassy in Iran. Only gradually did we recover, electing President Reagan, rebuilding our military, challenging the Soviet Union, and abetting in its demise. The historian Stephen Ambrose has observed that of all the European nations, American GIs in World War II liked the Germans, against whom they had fought, best. Similarly, South Vietnamese widely welcome and genuinely like Americans, though they have nothing to thank us for. The septuagenarians in Hanoi control the economic, religious, social, travel, educational, professional, and personal freedoms of every Vietnamese. One of the few remaining Bolshevik communist regimes, the dictators in Hanoi memorialize long-ago battles, yet they cannot chart a course into the future.

A Tragedy

So Vietnam is mired in a bleak past, while America is the beacon for a shining future. We recovered our geopolitical self-confidence and our martial prowess; for millions of people in Southeast Asia, there was no recovery. That is a tragedy. The South Vietnamese have grace, culture, and ambition. Given the freedom to pursue their own opportunities, they would prosper. Someday the yoke will be lifted from the Vietnamese people. But we should have no illusions about the repressive nature of the current regime. Freedom did not flourish when the North Vietnamese took control. In 1953 when we were fighting a limited war in South Korea, that country was not a model of enlightened democracy. Today, South Korea is a thriving democracy, where we still have 25,000 American soldiers stationed to deter an impoverished, hostile North Korea. To our credit, we have stayed the course there. In contrast, we tired of the limited war in South Vietnam; the war simply went on too long. That we stopped fighting and withdrew most of our aid is understandable if not laudable. In Korea and in Vietnam, we chose two different courses. Today, South Korea's future is bright and South Vietnam's future is bleak. That cannot be changed. But we should not let myths turn us into Aesop's fox and blame the grapes. The day Saigon fell, the secretary of defense, James Schlesinger, sent a message to our armed forces.

It read in part: "Our involvement was intended to assist a small nation to preserve its independence. You have done all that was asked of you. You are entitled to the Nation's respect, admiration, and gratitude."

That is the proper, elliptical epitaph to the Vietnam War.

"Semper Fidelis" Saves a Life

Decades after his heroics in Vietnam, relatives and servicemen mobilize to help a dying Vet (a Khe Sanh Member)

WASHINGTON — John Ripley's worthless liver had left his skin a sickly yellow. Toxic fluids were collecting in his system, causing his lean frame to bloat: once 175 pounds, he now weighed 425. His kidneys were failing. An incision glared from his abdomen, closed with staples in case surgeons had to rip it open fast. Eighteen IV lines fed into his unconscious body. One of the Marine Corps' greatest living heroes was dying. In the intensive care unit at Georgetown University Medical Center, a son of the retired colonel, Tom Ripley, sat vigil.

It was 7am when the phone rang: A donor liver had been found. But his father might not live long enough to get it. That's when the Ripleys understood that the delivery of the liver, from a 16-year-old gunshot victim in Philadelphia to the dying veteran in Washington, would take too long if left in the hospital's hands. Their only thought: Call in the Marines. Over the next hours on that day last month, saving John Ripley's life became a military mission. It would involve the leader of the Marine Corps and helicopters from the President's fleet. Support teams would come from police in two cities, a platoon of current and former Marines, the president of Georgetown University and even a crew of construction workers.

"Sir, this is my dad's last chance," Tom Ripley said in a call to the Marine commandant's office. "I'm measuring my father's life in hours, not days." The extraordinary efforts to save the 63-year-old Ripley, recovering from transplant surgery at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, shows how far the Corps will go to protect one of its own. Marines will say they'd do this for any fallen comrade. But Ripley is no ordinary Marine. In a messy war with few widely recognized heroes, he is a legend. And at his moment of need, the Corps treated him like one. "Colonel Ripley's story is part of our folklore — everybody is moved by it," said Lt. Col. Ward Scott, who helped organize the organ delivery from his post at the Marine Corps Historical Center in Washington, which Ripley has directed for the past three years. "It mattered that it was Colonel Ripley who was in trouble."

A heroic effort

On Easter Sunday 1972, Col. John Walter Ripley — swinging arm over arm to attach explosives to the span while dangling beneath it — almost single-handedly destroyed a bridge near the South Vietnamese city of Dong Ha. The action, which took place under heavy fire over several hours as he ran back and forth to shore for materials, is thought to have thwarted the onslaught of 20,000 enemy troops. His tale is required reading for every Naval Academy plebe. In Memorial Hall, Ripley, a 1962 academy graduate, is the only Marine featured from the Vietnam War: A diorama shows him clinging to the grid work of the bridge at Dong Ha. Ripley received the Navy Cross, the second-highest award a Marine can receive for combat. That decoration is surpassed only by the Congressional Medal of Honor, which, many in the Marine Corps vigorously argue, Ripley deserves.

But on this July morning, three decades after surviving combat wounds, Ripley was facing death from a transportation problem. His doctors tried four civilian organ transportation agencies and could not immediately be guaranteed a helicopter by any of them. The Ripleys say they were told that a civilian helicopter would not be available for at least six hours. Driving to Philadelphia was not an option because doctors worried that any traffic delays would ruin the organ.

Helicopter mission

Tom Ripley saw only one solution. From his father's hospital room, he called the office of the Marine Corps commandant, James L. Jones, and secured the use of a CH-46 helicopter, which is part of the Presidential Marine One fleet.

The plan: The chopper would ferry the transplant team to the University of Pennsylvania hospital to remove the donor liver and then transport the doctors back to Washington. Marine lawyers instantly approved the use of military materiel for Ripley, including nearly three hours on a helicopter that costs up to $6,000 an hour to operate. The commandant considered this an official lifesaving mission for a retired Marine still valuable to the Corps as a living symbol of pride. Action was swift. The doctors rushed to Anacostia Naval Air Station, where the helicopter was waiting, rotors spinning. The chopper took off before the surgeons were even strapped in. By about 10 a.m., just three hours after learning that a new liver would be available in Philadelphia, the transplant team was swooping into that city. On the landing pad, an ambulance and a Philadelphia Highway Patrol car, both summoned by the Marines, were waiting.

The motorcade took off, sirens blaring. "When you're in a situation like this, and an organ becomes available, you use the fastest resource to get it," said Dr. Cal Matsumodo, a transplant surgeon from Walter Reed who flew on the helicopter to retrieve the new liver. "This turned out to be the swiftest and best-organized effort that I've ever seen."

Ripley's original liver had been ruined by a rare genetic disease as well as by a case of Hepatitis B that he believes he contracted in Vietnam. After a year-and-a-half of hospitalizations and infections, Ripley had received a new liver from a D.C. area donor July 22. But within hours of the surgery, that donor liver began to fail.

Medical professionals say the organ donation process is safeguarded to keep powerful people from skipping to the top of the waiting list. It was Ripley's critical condition — caused by the failure of the first donor liver, his doctors say — not his personal story, that put him first in line for another liver July 24. Still, most new organs are never granted military escorts. "It was clearly extraordinary, what they did," said Roger Brown, manager of the Organ Center at the United Network for Organ Sharing, a clearinghouse for organ procurement and allocation. Sometimes, Brown said, patients will die because available organs cannot be transported to them in time. "There's a lot of work that goes into matching a donor with a patient," he said. "If you can't find that one piece of the puzzle, it's just devastating."

In Ripley's mind, the mission that day reflects the strength of the Marine Corps fraternity. As he convalesces at Walter Reed, where he went after his operation and is listed in stable condition, he summons his booming voice long enough to insist that Marines would do the same for even an unknown grunt. "Does it surprise me that the Marine Corps would do this?" Ripley said from his hospital bed, his dog tags still hanging around his neck. "The answer is absolutely flat no! If any Marine is out there, no matter who he is, and he's in trouble, then the Marines will say, 'We've got to do what it takes to help him.'"

In Philadelphia, though, the Marine pilots knew exactly whom they were helping and they called it an honor. On the helipad, the flight crew stood ready as the transplant team rushed back with a box marked, "HUMAN ORGAN: FRAGILE."

Moments later, Tom Ripley, traveling with the doctors, got an update from his oldest brother, Stephen, at his father's bedside. Their dad's condition was worsening. The organ had to get to Washington — fast. Tom and Stephen, both former Marine captains, debated the quickest "RTB" — return to base, which in this case meant the Georgetown hospital. In pager messages fired off like battlefield dispatches, the chopper became "the bird" and the doctors the "pax," slang for passengers. As the day wore on, the brothers drew from their military roots, comforting each other with the Marine motto, Semper Fidelis.

Their father, meanwhile, lay still. His dog tags, fastened with the same tape he'd used to keep them from clanking on secret missions in Vietnam, had been removed. Twice, the family had summoned a Catholic priest to deliver last rites. Now, the Ripley's wondered whether a third might be needed. The hours ticked away, and the family learned that the Marine helicopter was too big to land on the Georgetown hospital helipad. But the doctors feared getting stuck in traffic on the drive from the Anacostia helipad to the hospital.

The delivery

A well-connected Marine buddy of Ripley's called the president of Georgetown University and got permission to land on the school's football field. A construction crew standing nearby was soon ripping down fencing to make room. But the Marines rejected that makeshift helipad after sending another helicopter to survey it. The area was deemed too crowded for a landing. At one point, the Ripley's suggested landing at the Marine Corps War Memorial, across the river from Georgetown, by the statue that depicts Marines raising the flag at Iwo Jima. But that fanciful notion went nowhere. The answer finally came in the form of a D.C. police helicopter pilot — Sgt. Thomas Hardy, a former Marine. A Corps official found him and asked whether he would take the team from Anacostia to Georgetown on his smaller chopper. "This was a Marine Corps mission," said Hardy, a Vietnam veteran who agreed to fly without hesitation. "Once a Marine," he explained, "always a Marine."

The organ delivered, the surgery could finally start. The next day, Ripley's recovery began. Slowly, he is gaining strength and returning to a normal weight. Despite the surgery's success, risks of infection or other problems remain. His family expects him to be in the hospital for up to three more weeks. Ripley rests quietly, unable to accept visitors. His wife of 37 years, Moline, sits with him amid pictures of their four children and their grandkids.

Repaying an old debt

The sons who orchestrated this rescue operation call it a culminating moment in their father's military life. John Ripley was shot in the side by a North Vietnamese soldier and during two tours of duty was pierced with so much shrapnel that doctors found metal fragments in his body as recently as last year. After Vietnam, Ripley continued to serve, losing most of the pigment in his face from severe sunburns while stationed above the Arctic Circle. The Marines, his family believes, repaid a longtime debt. "Dad gave 32 years of his life to the Marine Corps," said Stephen Ripley.

"When he really, really needed the Marine Corps, they were there for him." Even from the quiet of his hospital room, the Marine Corps still defines Ripley. His family has packed a cabinet by his bed with copies of a book that John Grider Miller wrote about Ripley's heroics; Ripley says he will give complimentary copies of "The Bridge at Dong Ha" to the medical staff. Not long ago, a military color guard held a bedside ceremony for him, placing in the room the Marine Corps colors that normally hang in Commandant Jones' office. Ripley was urged to keep the flags in his room until he leaves the hospital. On a recent afternoon, Ripley looked past his IV machine, past the uneaten hospital lunch, past the plastic cup of pills, to the flags. He was, at that moment, John Ripley, grateful warrior, awed by what his sons, and the Marines, had done."They reached over the side," he said, "and they pulled me back in the boat."

A Culture of Victory

Lessons of the Old Corps

by Richard Botkin

Camp Pendleton is not quite hallowed or sacred ground. No real battles have been waged there, no blood other than in training accidents has been shed for freedom within its confines. Home to the First Marine Division and supporting elements, its 200,000 or so acres of coastal real estate allows for most facets of training which have become Marine Corps hallmarks: amphibious assaults, helicopter-borne raids, and good old-fashioned infantry combat.

Constrained on its northern, eastern and southern boundaries by urban sprawl, the regular civilian driving Interstate 5 between San Clemente and Oceanside is treated to a view of what much of California's coastline must have looked like prior to the state's meteoric growth after World War II. For those Marines who have served there or processed through on the way to more serious destinations, Camp Pendleton will always conjure unique memories of training performed: forced marches in the coastal hills, rifle-range details on cool, fog-shrouded mornings, amphibious landings on those miles and miles of unspoiled beaches. More important than the real estate though, are the Marines who constitute the Division. This is the unit that gave America its first ground combat victory in the Pacific at Guadalcanal in late 1942, followed by similar heroics in equally brutal battles on islands like Peleliu and Okinawa.

In 1950, it was the First Marine Division that landed at Inchon, recaptured Seoul, chased the North Koreans all the way to the Yalu River and then — outnumbered at least six-to-one — defeated Chinese Red Army units in its masterful retrograde from the Chosin Reservoir. In Vietnam, the Division's three infantry regiments were engaged in almost every major battle fought by Marines and the thousands of other skirmishes without names. In Desert Storm and into Afghanistan, the men and women of the First Marine Division have played key roles in every success and victory. Old Corps, every Marine knows about the mythical Old Corps. In the Old Corps, things were just a little bit tougher, the drill instructors more demanding, and the Marines somehow a bit more magnificent. During World War II, Old Corps meant service with Chesty Puller chasing bandits in Nicaragua in the 1930s. To those new Leathernecks in June of 1950, Old Corps was service at Iwo Jima, Tarawa, Guam. In my time, the early 1980s, Old Corps were those guys who slugged it out with the NVA during the siege at Khe Sanh and those who retook the Citadel in the bloody street fighting in Hue in 1968. And on and on.

The lessons of the Old Corps

Osama bin Laden and his lieutenants, in their pre-9/11 planning, committed errors similar to those made by the Japanese militarists before their attack on Pearl Harbor. In both 2001 and 1941, the plotters incorrectly focused on the notion of an America flabby and effete, a culture interested only in the pursuit of pleasure and ease. Who can fault ObL for such an assessment today? During their pre-attack reconnaissance, the terrorists had only to turn on the television, visit the shopping malls and theaters, drive the freeways in major cities to observe the things we value. How can a culture that produces an abundance of dimwitted Hollywood heroes with celluloid spines fight the good fight? How can a nation so full of those content to experience life vicariously on the couch or behind a computer screen rise up and crush the beckoning evil? The raw physical beauty that is Camp Pendleton grows more contrasting each year as its borders become increasingly concreted and the bustle of California quickens. For those who revere the Corps, as most former Marines do, trips there are always rich with nostalgia, as comforting as sitting with aging parents and life-long friends.

Returning recently to visit a brother Marine just back from Afghanistan, it finally hit me. It was not the fondness of happy memories that was so reassuring — it was looking into the future and seeing its promise that was so invigorating. There before me on a very crisp and early Friday morning as I drove through the various regimental camps, the sky already abuzz with helicopters, I could feel the throbbing pulse of this future Old Corps. There they all were, these young Marines: lean, tough, smart, hungry for action, certain of their cause, grounded in a culture that has only delivered victory. These are the warriors ready to write the new chapters in the history of the Old Corps. Back at home and in my own life, away from things military, listening to news, reading the paper, I sometimes get discouraged and easily see why OBL and his ilk never learned the lesson of the Old Corps.

In World War II, Jimmy Stewart joined the Air Force, went to England, and bombed the Germans. This year we sent Woody Harrelson over to destroy British taxis. In World War II — and again in Korea — Ted Williams quit baseball to fly fighters. This year, a sissified Tom Cruise pines for living in the relative safety of Australia. In the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives are grown men and women whose commitment to victory is, at best, a distant second to their drive to gain personal power and advance their socialist agendas. Made safe and kept free by far better men, these actors and politicians intuitively know the lessons of the Old Corps. They just hope that we do not remember. So I say "Go ahead, Maverick — eject, eject, eject! Punch out!" We'll give you a call and let you know when it is safe to come back. It is with humble respect that I stretch and paraphrase the Bible in saying that the fools, the cynics, the voluptuaries ... they will always be with us. It bothers me, but I can live with it so long as I know there are just a bit more than a few young men who think they are tough enough to be Rangers, young men who think they are smart enough to drive nuclear submarines, young men whose testosterone bubbles at the notion of landing high-performance aircraft during dark nights on the heaving decks of aircraft carriers.

The spirit of the Old Corps and the essence of American manhood, as described by Teddy Roosevelt, courses through the vitals of these young warriors destined to pay the bittersweet price that comes with — and is demanded by — freedom. They are best honored by TR's own words, penned nearly a century ago but never more true than today: "There is little use for the being whose tepid soul knows nothing of the great and generous emotion, of the high pride, the stern belief, the lofty enthusiasm, of the men who quell the storm and ride the thunder..."

Light of His Life

Long-lost link to fallen comrades finds its way home

by Joe Hurley
The News-Times, 08/15/2002

"It was just a cigarette lighter. Just a lighter passed from hand to hand among soldiers who would die in the jungle. Just a lighter that brought tears to Jim Marden's eyes when he remembered those boys: their young faces and their feet sticking out of body bags. Just a lighter that disappeared from a Massachusetts washroom in 1968 and took with it Jim's last link to his platoon. Just a lighter that mysteriously turned up in New Jersey years later and sat forgotten in a drawer for decades. It was spotted by chance last week and four men worked to find the owner. Just a lighter that, after 34 years, was returned to Jim Marden this week. "I've got my boys back," Jim said Tuesday in the parlor of his New Milford home. He spoke carefully, trying to hold back his emotions, like a good Marine. It was a losing battle. His voice cracked. He halted for a moment. "At some point everybody in my company lit a cigarette off that lighter or touched it." That's the way it was when you were huddled in a foxhole. The lighter would be passed along from its owner to someone who needed it. Jim has a picture of the 47 men in his platoon when they arrived in Vietnam in 1967. And he has a picture of the ones who survived when his tour ended a year later. There were just five. The others were dead or wounded. When Jim holds the metal lighter it all comes back to him. "On how many night ambushes, on how many firefights was that lighter with us," he said, his voice trailing off as the memories returned. "Some people call them flashbacks. I call it a slide show. The faces come up. But they come up every night anyhow."

When Jim left Vietnam, the Marine Corps confiscated his souvenirs. They let him keep the lighter and an expensive watch. "They were the only things I had left," he said. Back home, he took a job as a mechanic at a Natick, Mass., gas station, where he lost the watch and lighter. His wife, Marsha, said Jim still talked about losing the lighter decades later. Just a few weeks ago, he was at a Marine reunion when someone pulled out a similar lighter. "I used to have a lighter like that," he said. "I miss my Zippo."

That's the way Marsha tells the story. She's the young nurse who waited patiently while Jim was overseas, even though they had dated just twice. She's seen him live with the demons of war memories and raise a family in Kent before they moved to New Milford two years ago. And she said he's earned everything he has. "He's the greatest guy going. He works very hard and he'd do anything for anybody. But he's very serious — everything has to be upright and honest," she said. Over the years, Jim worked day after day of overtime as an SNET cable splicer, partly as therapy to cope with the demons. "There's not a day that we don't talk about the war. It was an important part of his life," Marsha said. Their son James is a Marine and their daughter Heather lives just down the road. It was Marsha who prodded Jim to respond to a message on their answering machine Sunday. It said the caller had something from Vietnam that would interest Jim. Jim was hesitant. He feared unpleasant memories. And both of them wondered if it was a scam. Finally, Marsha said she would call if Jim didn't. He never expected to hear that someone found the lighter.

"I couldn't believe it. Holy cow! How do you thank someone for something like this. Four strangers cared enough to find me — God bless them." At the other end of the phone line, Terry Kucenski of Clayton, N.J., was telling Jim that he came across the lighter about 25 years ago when he was living with his parents in Bayonne. He doesn't remember how or where he found it, although it might have turned up in a bar, he said. The lighter had Jim's name, his company and the words Khe Sanh 861-881 on it above the motto: "You've never really lived until you've nearly died."

He put the lighter in a drawer, intending to find the owner, but forgot about it until he returned home last week. "I happened to be looking for a pencil, and bingo, there was the lighter," he said. He called his friend Mike Fahy, a Philadelphia police detective, who contacted Joe DeLocqua, a Marine Vietnam veteran. DeLocqua immediately knew Khe Sanh 861-881 meant the owner had been through one of the most important and bloodiest battles of the war. 861-881 were hills at Khe Sanh.

They contacted Doc Hoppy, a former medic in Vietnam who keeps track of veterans through the Internet. Hoppy located Jim Marden, whose picture was recently posted on the Web by a veteran searching for information about the platoon. The next day, Fahy called Kucenski. "He was ecstatic," Kucenski said. "We were all ecstatic that we were able to find the owner. "When Kucenski called, he found out just how much the lighter meant to Jim. He felt like it was a part of his life that was missing," Kucenski said. "I was just glad to be part of it. I haven't been that happy since my Little League team went undefeated."

"When the lighter arrived by courier Tuesday, Marsha couldn't contain her excitement. "I was overjoyed for Jimmy. I ran out of the house and hugged the driver. He must have thought I was a nut," she said. Jim was calmer on the outside. But his tears gave him away. "It was like getting an old friend back," Marsha said. Later, he bought some lighter fluid and tried the lighter. It worked on the first try.

But Jim doesn't plan on using it very often. It's on the mantle in their Old Stone Road home and it will be handed down to his son.

Our Flag

By Bill Person

Only those who paid the price seem to truly understand
The way we feel about the proud emblem of our great land
The brave lads who faced up to that grim and mortal fear,
And now view 'Old Glory' and shed a salty tear.
Remembering things beyond our paltry words to explain
While forgetting not the fallen by we who still remain.
How many lives were paid to make our banner free
And gave their blood for all of us, it stirs most deep in me.
Their ghostly souls are wending down life's dimming eternal hall
To venture on honorably past their final deathly fall.
How beautiful the colors soar, stripes and stars so bright,
That now means so very much to us who had to go and fight.
Wave on, oh symbol of freedom, fill the azure sky
And reach to heaven in our hearts, so proudly we see you fly,
We feel the phantom presence of those who've gone beyond
And watch with us, our flag, that we are so rightly fond.
"Oh, say can you see," in song our voices start to raise.
In joyful anthem to America's flag we reverely praise.
We know what awesome price men have dutifully paid.
Just view the countless crosses where they are quietly laid.
I fear for future times should no one wish to cry
For those of us who gladly fought in days now gone by.
Do not forget us, I strongly urge and pray
We did our part so all our lives can honorably be this way.
I feel no shame as tears run down my proud American cheek.

Do You Know Me?

(Bill Person)

Do you know me?
That I went to war for freedom's sake
And in a far off hostile place,
I served my Uncle Sam.
Lean down close on bended knees
So you can better hear,
While I whisper you my name
So you know who I am.

Do you know me?
When people in a far off land
Braved our enemy all alone.
We sought to give them freedom
From that awesome hostile threat.
But some at home refused to fight
In that frightful worthy strife,
These acts, we'll not condone.

Do you know me?
When American blood was shed,
And dying men lay all about
The horrors there to see.
Each one stood tall and did his part.
Some gave it all, the last full count,
Of that there is no doubt.

Do you know me?
The death angel has come and vanquished me.
Oh, I have felt his fatal sting
To send me where the living fear to go,
I could not tarry long
Yet, when the borrowed days do pass,
Those who survive us still,
To the fallens' presence, he shall surely bring.

Do you know me?
Although my scant numbered days are past,
Still I suffered deeply
And felt the wounded shame
When misguided ones in numbers,
Behaved so dishonorably,
They joined in lofty masses,
Our flag and draft cards burned
They betrayed all departed souls
In tarnished ways to lay the blame.

Do you know me?
I truly hope now you do
For this nation's greatest might
Is forged from spilled precious blood
And those who live must carry on,
To keep the power and bear the torch of right.

Do you know me?
That now I lie among the valiant fallen
Wherein countless graves we rest.
Like them, asked not the reason
Men my country gave the call
But went ever proudly onward
To bravely do my best.

Do you know me?
Tho' my shape is faint for you to see.
Can you feel the suffering,
My lot is to bear?
Do you know the deepest low
My soul it did endure?
Can you feel the anguish?
Or do you really care?

Do you know me?
Tho' I am gone from human eyes
My soul is close to thee
Would that I could
Mend that aching heart,
Take from you all emptiness
And fill that hollow part.

Do you know me?
That I suffered pain in monsoon rain,
The lifeline was sorely stretched Come you close and look here on,
This blackened, shiny wall
And read my name among the rest,
Where the fallen names are etched.

Happy 227th

Happy Birthday Marines!

Time has written our history in the lines that now appear on our faces. Our dreams reflect days that have faded from conscious thought and are peopled with men who fell on "fields of glory" long ago and those who have since passed on. The pride, the dedication, the commitment to Corps and Country has not diminished by one ounce. If you celebrate at a gala Marine Corps Birthday ball, at a small, informal gathering with other Marines, or at home with a toast from a single glass — you will be fulfilling that time-honored tradition of honoring the unbroken line of heroic soldiers of the sea, who have borne the legacy of the Corps in peacetime and in war for 227 years. God Bless each of you.

Long Live the United States, and Success to the Marines!

New Benefits For Purple Heart Recipients

I just received a letter from the California Dept. of Veteran Affairs stating that the new Public Law 106-117 allows veterans who have been awarded the Purple Heart to receive inpatient and outpatient medical services at no cost. It also provides for prescription medicine at very low cost. In order to obtain the benefits, the Purple Heart recipient must enroll at a local US Dept of Veteran Affairs (USDVA) facility and provide proof of the Purple Heart award. More information is available at http://www.va.gov or at 800- 827-1000. Please pass on this information to anyone who might find it helpful. Thanks.

Book Reviews

Steve Marceau wrote:

Ernie, There are two great books out now. They are especially important for Vietnam vets whom actually saw combat. The first is "A Better War" by Lewis Sorley. It is an accurate chronology of what really happened after Creighton Abrams took over from Westmoreland. The second is "Stolen Valor" by B.G. Burkett. This book destroys the myths that exist about Vietnam and the veterans. You might want to mention these in Red Clay.

Chuck Patterson,

I picked up "The Petrified Hearts" again the other day, and had this chilling sense that I'd never written to thank you for it, and to tell you how highly I thought of it. Many of these poems have stayed with me, such as "Near Cua Viet" and "As Stark and True as They Come," "Both Like One of Stephen Crane's Small Jewels." Also, "The Ending of A Little Knowledge," "Starlight," "Bootlaces," and "Caretaker." The one about the old man thatching his home, the one about killing the pig and, of course, the one about Manny Babbitt. All were also meaningful to me. These are fine poems, dark as heart's blood, which they are. Thank you for giving them to me, and thanks for writing them. I hope you've been pleased with your new gig in L.A. I have been directing the writing program here for the last couple of years and getting some, but not enough writing done. I'm taking a year's breather to finish a book and try my hand at being Italian; as we leave for Rome on Tuesday. My very best to you, and thanks again for these fine poems.

Yours as ever,

Kudos for the Staff

Dear Jimbo,

I received my Medal and its citation. During a time like this, I am speechless. (If you knew me that is rare.) I'm very, very honored that you have included me on your list. I have always been ready for action since Khe Sanh, and have spent most of my military career training as many young Docs to be ready to be by their Marine Brothers side in the future. I have always worn my awards not for myself but for the Docs who did far more than me, and gave the greatest sacrifice. In my dreams I can still see, hear, and smell the battlefield, and have great pride that I was with you and was able to help save lives. I never had brothers until I joined the Hospital Corps and will always see the Marine Corps as my true brothers. My wife and I attended the 60th Anniversary of the 3rd Mar Div Reunion in San Diego, Ca. I met about 15 Docs and enjoyed it very much. However, when I realized the Khe Sanh Veterans dedicated a reunion to the Docs, I was really sad that I did not know sooner so I could attend. I hope, God willing, I will be able to attend your reunion maybe next year. My therapy is going well, and I am much better. Trying to make friends with my Viet Nam ghosts. I hope to see you in person someday, and I truly thank ALL of your Marine members for this honor you have given me and is my most valued award I have ever worn. I will always wear it with great pride. I will have it on when I enter my last muster in paradise.

Semper Fi!! Your co-van,

Thanks: 2002 Reunion

This was our first Khe Sanh reunion. My wife Pam and I drove from Pennsylvania to spend some time with her sister and brother-in-law. It had been twelve years since she had been to Texas and thirty years for me. Pam and I both feel we were the fortunate ones to visit at the same time the 2002 Khe Sanh reunion was taking place. We knew Jim was big into planning for the reunion but we had no idea what was to take place. Jim and I spent a couple of days running around doing things to get ready for the arrival of his friends and fellow Marines. I do a lot of that sort of thing back home but once the reunion started, I realized how trivial my events are. The first day of the reunion was a sight to behold. Every time someone came in it was like they were greeting a long, lost family member.

Every thing from Charlie and Jim seeing who could floor each other's shorts first to lots of tears and smiles. As the reunion progressed, it became apparent that this really was one big family. I spent most of my time at the table selling t-shirts and other Khe Sanh memorabilia, As far as I was concerned, I had the best seat in the house. I got to see everyone that came in and met a lot of great people. Tom Eichler. Frank and Virginia. Short Round and his family. Ray Addington. Charlie Fox and his family. Louie and his wife. Neil Kenney. Sharon Pelon. Bulldog and many more. When we were sitting around on the outdoor patio in the evening, the conversations were at the very least extremely interesting. When the group would retire to the hotel complementary rooms, the conversations were altogether different. I found myself laughing when they laughed and crying when they cried. The stories had been told a thousand times but by the looks on everyone's face, it was like the first time they had heard them. Whether someone had heard the story once or a hundred times, somebody could always remember a little something they had forgoten. The friendship, laughter, crying and hugging was all part of every story told. You did not need to be a Khe Sanh vet to feel the emotion of the reunion.

All the planned events came off with out a hitch. The ranch turned out to be a lot of fun for us. We enjoyed watching Jim and P.J. doing the boot scoot. Tommy's spurs added just the right touch. The awards banquet was the highlight of the whole week. We feel we were very lucky to have been part of the reunion and are looking forward to South Carolina. To all the friends we made, have a good year and we will see you next year.

Tom,

I just received my issue of Red Clay yesterday. I just wanted to write and thank you and the whole staff on what a remarkable job you all do. I took my Red Clay down to work and showed a group of vets that I work with. Man, were they impressed.

None of their associations have publications as outstanding as ours. Again, I want to thank you for your time and effort. Semper Fi...

Dear Mr. Eichler,

You do so much work for the Khe Sanh Veterans! The latest issue of Red Clay is so interesting. I do thank you for publishing my letter, including several of the snapshots I sent, and putting Neil's photo on the back cover. Such an honor this is.

Thanks. Sending good wishes.

Publisher's Notes, Corrections

This email is in reference to a name listed on page 9 of the Fall 2002 magazine — the section pertaining to those who died after service in Khe Sanh. You listed the name Charles Everest, deceased 1993. This is actually Joseph Wrobleski, formerly of Mike 3/26. Joe was also a mess sergeant for a while. He was born and raised in Chicago, IL. For professional purposes, later in life he changed his name to Charles Everest. When Joe passed, I thought he was buried under the name in which he served. The VA told me that as a matter of policy, all Vets are buried under the name used during the actual time they had served. During a 3/26 reunion in San Diego, I visited Joe's grave located in the Riverside National Cemetery. He has been laid to rest as Joseph Wrobleski. Please confirm that "Ski's" name is listed correctly in all future references. No one except myself knows of a Charles Everest. However, many will remember Joe Wrobleski, known as Ski to those of us who knew him. Thank you for your time and effort. Please make this correction.

Respectfully submitted,
Michael J. Padula

I mailed out 150 DOC Medals to members of our organization. Two more were left at the Vietnam Memorial during the KSV wreath laying ceremony on Veterans Day. Bruce Geiger, Tom Ford, Bill Jayne, Sid Patricio, Larry McCartney, Joe Elardo, Bill Gilkey, Jack McCormack, Ed Ronan, and Jack Corbett did a nice job representing the KSV. Billy

Tom Ford, Bill Jayne, Bruce Geiger

Martin, Ray Addington and I attended the ceremony at the Texas Vietnam Memorial, where we left a DOC Medal and Citation. We thanked all the Docs whose names were on the memorial. I think they all heard us. Ray Addington was interviewed by Channel 8 news concerning the DOC Medal and Citation. We made the 5:00 News. I have received numerous thank you letters from our Corpsman, Medics, and Medical Personnel thanking us for the Medals and how proud they were that we so honored them. I sent them to Ray Stubbe to be placed in the KSV Archives.

Members will also be allowed to sell personal items through this website. For further detailed information, go direct to the website: http://www.stores.ebay.com/id=26342286.

I have been contacted by our Editor concerning the KSV website and what type of information is being posted. There have been complaints that the original intent of the message board (exchanging information and helping other members with pertinent information concerning Khe Sanh) has been negated.The board seems to have been turned into a place for jokes and personal exchanges between members, not related to the KSV organization. A lot of members agree with the criticism, others site our right to say what we want. There have been abuses of the website, but messages are only posted for 3 weeks, then are removed. The Webmaster, Dave Doerman, does edit messages. It is a full-time job and he has been doing his best to remove offensive messages without infringing on anyone's right to express his feelings. I did a study on the Constitution of the website and this is what I came up with. The Khe Sanh Veterans shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, write, or publish their sentiments. The freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable. Every Khe Sanh Vet has a right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this, is to destroy the freedom of the message center. But if he publishes improper, mischievous, or illegal matter, he shall have consequences of his own temerity. Please email me with your thoughts on limiting the use of the website. I will post the results of the survey.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE: In response, following are postings of several responses to the above issue raised by the Editor, and other comments concerning the KSV website.

Regarding some recent postings...

I believe the content and general nature of too many of the last year's postings on this message board are demeaning, petty, and lacking in good taste and general civility. I am not talking about remembrances, sharing/seeking information issues regarding VA benefits, PTSD claims, general military information etc. As in all public message boards, the messages are received as authored; what is sent is posted. With that in mind, I urge all legitimate Khe Sanh Veterans to stop using "coded-type" cursing, demeaning comments AKA "putdowns," and to raise the bar to a higher quality, more intelligible substance of communication in our future postings. Remember...the world can read our words. So let's represent ourselves as the honorable warriors that we ALL are — respected, conscionable members of Khe Sanh Veterans.

Bruce "T-Bone" Jones

T-Bone,

What you said was well said! And I think it was much needed at this time. I mean the dialectic can get stifled and boring, when there is no disagreement, especially between us Marines! But then there is a lot more to what you are saying, and I think I understand. Still, if I am one of those people you were talking about let me say this is my defense...I just say what I say, and no matter what I say, (for better or worse) I don't have any premeditated plans for "testing the envelope." Anyway, Bro, I will try to "elevate" my postings or at least I'll try to pay more attention to what I am saying before I post.

Eric

T-Bone,

While I generally agree with your sentiments and acknowledge that it is important to maintain civility as we are, on this forum, representatives of our organization to the rest of the world, I also think it's important to recognize that we are a very diverse group of brothers and sisters who were, by the "fortunes of war," bonded together for eternity. Just as we all may have family members who act in a manner we disapprove of, we must endure the idiosyncrasies of those who err with tolerance and in a spirit of good humor. Has anyone really said anything we didn't hear at KSCB? Your heart is in the right place, and what you said perhaps bears repeating from time to time. But until we have to walk in the other fellow's shoes, who can really say what's in the other brother's heart? Thanks for your thoughts.

Jim Dawdy

T-Bone,

I am a relatively new poster to this board, but I have been around the block once or twice. I was in the Marine Corps, not a seminary. I was taught how to go lock and load and shoot someone when I saw them. The whole idea of learning how to watch what I say at this stage of my life, with my life's experiences to date, is foreign to my nature. If your posting is about religion and you found it there, good on you. If it is about your sensitivities as to how a grunt Marine behaves with other grunt Marines, I suggest you quite possibly may be in the wrong place or I am. I do not wish to offend you or anyone else. But having earned that Globe and Anchor (and many, many people will tell you I did it the hard way), I speak my mind, and mind what I speak, but it doesn't get censored easily. By anyone! If my fellow Marines want me to leave because of that, I most certainly will. I have honor, integrity and wish no flame wars in this Brotherhood.

1/26 Corpsmen

Sure would like to hear from any corpsmen that I was stationed with at Khe Sanh during the siege. I was in the bush for 6 months with Delta Company. I then went to H&S Company, BAS, and RAS, sometime around the first of December 1967. Remember a couple of names, Crawford, Patterson, Dr. DeMaagd, "Ski," Goody, and Beatle. I was with D Company on Hills 881, 861, and 950 — we also manned the perimeter. I carried a cassette recorder and was always recording guys. I went by the name of "Scarface"... I've tried this a couple of times in the past 4 years but haven't heard from anyone.

Hi, from another "grunt" corpsman. I was with B 1/26 3rd Platoon — yes the "Ghost Patrol." I was the Doc that made it back that day from the ambush. Welcome home brother! You should try and make one of the reunions. There are always a few of us "good men" hanging around the local watering hole. After I left Nam and got out of the hospital, I was stationed with a "Delta" corpsman named Scot Swagger. I wonder if you remember him? I don't remember what platoon he was with, but we sure partied hard back in the states. Hey, look me up in Charleston and drop me a line anytime, great to know any other "Doc" that made it back! Rodney, Eventually you will bump into someone that will remember you. If not on this message board, just come to the next reunion in Charleston, S.C., 2003.

I'm going to try my best to make it to the reunion at S.C. I went to one several years ago when it was in Kentucky, just south of Cincinnati. Ran into one guy I knew from my outfit, Greg Fesenden, from Delta Company, 3rd Platoon. Might not have recognized some others. Maybe, there are still plenty of Khe Sanh veterans that don't know about this organization or are not online. And unfortunately, not around anymore. I still have these vivid images from back then, frozen in my memory. It seems like yesterday when I think about it.

Rodney — For starters, you ought to read the last two issues of Red Clay, the KSV Newsletter. We honored our heroic corpsmen and medical personnel in both issues. I will give you my address and phone number, write me and I will get you signed up with our organization.

Tom,

I'm already a member, just haven't had the money to spare to send in dues lately. Maybe later on I can send in for a lifetime membership.

Tom,

I'm going to send Rodney DeMoss's lifetime membership money via snailmail as soon as possible to you. I was also a 1/26 Corpsman and I would like to do this for my fellow Corpsman, so he can receive the Red Clay and enjoy it as I do each time. I also know you are working overtime on the Red Clay magazine, you have to be. Its certainly appreciated at this end...

I, too, would like to meet with the corpsmen that were at Khe Sanh. Especially the ones that were in the bomb crater doing triage on us Marines. I would especially like to meet the corpsman who stuck what looked like a 9" bic ball point pen in the hole in my side to see how deep the Chi Com grenade shrapnel had penetrated (liver and lung). No offense, doc, but that is one moment I will never forget no matter how many drugs I abuse.

1/26 Corpsmen Bomb Crater

I went out with Bravo Company when we went to recover bodies from the "Ghost Patrol." Dr. DeMaagd, myself and one other corpsman (I believe it was just one other) set up a triage in a bomb crater. I did not, and I repeat did not stick a 9" bic into anyone. Possibly Dr. DeMaagd, the Battalion Surgeon did. If that's the bomb crater you're talking about.

Rodney DeMoss

I don't know if there were any other bomb craters being used for triage on March 30th. So I would think this is it? Great! Are you in contact with the good doctor? I would love to find out the wielder of the Bic, just to reminisce about old times.

Doc Medal 2002 Reunion

Doc Felle,

I was with M 3/9 from Nov 67 until Dec 68. I was wounded twice and patched up by Doc Frank Clesantis. He helped me file a claim for a hearing loss and it was granted. I was wondering if you knew where Doc Rodney Robinson may be located. He was from Santa Barbara, CA when he was in RVN. Any ideas?

John Bosley

Just received my DOC medal today. Thanks very much, Jim. It is one of my most prized possessions. When I was with Delta 1/26, I took care of the guys and they certainly took care of me. It was a pleasure to serve with them. When I was at Khe Sanh combat base during the Siege, we all took care of each other. That's what I remember the most — the camaraderie (I think that's how you spell it). I definitely intend to be at reunion 2003. Looking forward to meeting the guys in this group. Hopefully, I'll run across some of the guys from my outfit that I know. Still would like to hear from some of the corpsmen that were with me at the RAS and BAS during the siege.

I, too, got mail from Mr. James Wodecki (Thanks Jim) but it had stickers all over it "do not open till December 25" so I had it x-rayed which showed that it was a medal presented to Khe Sanh Veterans that took an oath to take medical care of the men and women under their command regardless of race, creed or religion. To administer aid when necessary under even the most severe conditions and to make sure that they knew the difference between a rat bite and a P-38 Wound, and everyone treated their water, even if they disliked the iodine tablets.

Received the "DOC" Medal yesterday, and am extremely honored. Thank you all. To those we were able to help in whatever way possible, "Welcome Home" To all those we tried to help, but may have not been able to do enough, "May God Bless You." My time spent with K 3/4 during 1967-1968 will always be deep within my heart and it was great being at the 3/4 Reunion in D.C. this past year. Seeing people and being remembered, was impossible to describe. Looking forward to attending the reunion in 2003.

Old Friendship
by Bill Person

I think of you, dear, gentle friend,
With tidings glad, my thoughts to send.
Tho' passing years and far away,
My mind still hears your words to say,
How fine it was that we had met,
And never in life, would you forget.
Our friendship tested, tried and long,
Like sweet lyrics of a favorite song.
In time, this too will have its past,
For us the joy was all too fast.
Our seeds of kindness, cheerfully sown,
With care and trust, our friendship grown.
I wish these kindly thoughts of love
Could soar forever so near above,
Thence catch in minds for grace's sake,
For a better place this world to make

Part Two: 9-11

One year later we are still standing tall,
Never will we let our nation fall!
For we are free,
As America should be.
Sure we are sad about September 11, 2001,
But, should other nations try to spoil our everyday fun?
Some things I know the attackers won't regret,
But that doesn't mean that America should fret.
This year on September 11, 2002,
Take a moment of silence, the proper thing to do.
Remember the families that were sad that day,
Imagine that all you could have done was pray.
While the NYFD was trying to save innocent souls,
The ring of trust was beginning to create holes.
What if they should try this again?
What if 911 would a second time begin?
Just remember that on this day,
Every one will pray.
Not just because of the agony we were put through,
But because that day was actually true.
Put down in history books for young minds to know,
Maybe ask Dad for more, the knowledge will grow!
Like last year, many will cry,
But still, some eyes may be dry.
No tears, no care, no reason to fight,
I know to you this may not seem right.
Some may think that this is a man with no feelings,
But actually the story is written on the ceilings.
Invisible to the naked eye,
But deep down inside, the man is reading, beginning to cry.

"Greetings, My Warrior Brothers."

That greeting is from Captain Edward Ramon, one of our brothers from Nam who I met at our Reunion in Dallas. One Heck of a nice guy and a pretty good poet. If you have not read his book "Scars and Stripes Forever," you are missing out on a fine bit of literature. He really hits home with some of his poems and I am sure if you read them, you will note a message through their words. I just wanted to say THANKS to all who had a hand in the planning for one heck of a good time in Texas, and say that it will be a tough act to follow in Charleston next July. With what I have learned through all my Rebel life, you Yanks will be treated to a real dose of genuine Southern Hospitality. It will certainly be a different experience than you who visited "Parris Island" back in the late 60s.

At the time we did our Big Texas Party, I was working on a project for the community of Tobaccoville, North Carolina, along with several other veterans. Eight veterans (three Marine, four Army, and one Navy) were asked to create a monument to all Veterans. After about six months of hand wringing, headaches, and a couple of blown fuses by myself, we finally completed the project. While the inscription on the large stone may not be what we might have said back then, the inscription on the smaller stone placed at the base of the Flag is right on Khe Sanh Vietnam. I lobbied hard to get this stone placed there for all of us that left a little piece of ourselves, both physically and mentally over there. I hope that some of the guys we left on that mountain, are looking down and will say, "Thanks, you done good." That being said, Gentlemen, raise your glass, because this one is for you.

Small World

This last Memorial Day, my wife told me she was going to attend the Memorial Day Parade in Barrington, Illinois with Cody and her friend Karen. She asked me if I was also going, and if I was going to march. "Yes, I will meet you there," I replied and went and got my camera. Even though it was 80 degrees, I put on my jacket with the large Marine Corps emblem on the back, and the 26th Marine patch on the shoulder.

When I arrived, there was a lone person sitting on the steps of the bank reading a newspaper, waiting for the parade to start. I felt like an old-timer and almost turned around and went home. "Nice jacket," the guy on the steps said. "Thanks," I replied, "who were you with?" "Force Recon," he said. We introduced ourselves and the parade marshal approached and asked us if we were with the American Legion. When I turned around he had a look of surprise on his face. I had previously lectured him on my feelings regarding the manner in which the American Legion treated me when I returned from Vietnam.

I pulled my Khe Sanh Veterans membership card out of my wallet and stated, "This is the only group I will ever be a member of." The guy next to me begins laughing and pulls his Khe Sanh Veterans membership card from his wallet. That is how I met brother Mike Crowe. It turned out to be a wonderful Memorial Day.

A Kind and Heartfelt Gesture

Recently my Australian friend, former combat infantryman and Vietnam Vet, Garry Adams, made a trip to Khe Sanh. Garry is familiar with the base, the surrounding hills, and all of Vietnam for that matter. He conducts tours back to Vietnam a couple of times a year for veterans from all over the world, U.S. Marines included. While on his last visit, Garry laid an arrangement of red poppies at the site of the ambush of the Ghost Patrol and said a prayer for our fallen brothers. For him to take a moment during his tour and honor the warriors of Bravo 1/26 was a kind and thoughtful gesture. Garry is a good and decent man and I felt I should share this honorable act with all of my brothers. I think of him as one of us. A special thanks to John Kaheny for supplying me with the coordinates, which I relayed to Garry, in order for him to place the flowers on sacred ground. Peace.

Kenny,

In response to the many questions on the KSV website regarding the use of (Bee-Hive) Firecracker rounds, I can only add this insight:

I do not know who the first Marine Arty was to use the round. However, either A Battery or B Battery of the 1/40th early in 67, was the first to use that round in combat...maybe late February, early March. They fired on an NVA troop concentration from the City of Angels, Con Thien. It was a success!

I believe only the smaller caliber artillery units had that round. I know the 175 guns did not. I do not think the 155s had them at that time. I recall a huge battle in the Ia Drang in 1967, where the 105s fired right at a 155 unit that had been overrun, using those rounds. They found enemy soldiers pinned to each other, some were pinned into trees, etc.

As far as a ship firing them, I do not know if a ship could reach the perimeter that the fellow was talking about, unless he meant the Da Nang perimeter. Even off the coast of Dong Ha, the ship's 8-inch and 5-inch could only reach so far. The Khe Sanh perimeter would be a stretch. If he had firecracker rounds, they were probably from the Marine 105 Artillery or maybe even 1/40th Artillery. I think we were the only outside Artillery that could reach the perimeter and even some other parts, to be of better support. We had to rotate a battery out to the Rockpile, especially hitting into the Laotian ridges/border.

One thing the Marines may or may not know is that our A Battery came ashore in Oct of 66. The first thing done was to convert two 175s to 8-inch and send to two crews to Korea for nuke training. We did have 8-inch nuke-tipped rounds in Vietnam, stored in the Saigon area. I guess they wanted to be ready for all possibilities. In fact, I saw on the History Channel, that one of the uses of those actually being considered was for your guys in case it became real bad out there. They were already doing wind calculations, speeds and directions, etc. around the base area. I guess that gives you a warm and fuzzy feeling. Right???

I guess if it would have happened that we would have shot the rounds, we would have had to be closer than Carroll or the Rockpile, possibly from Ca Lu.

Anyway, that ought to make you sleep better knowing that you and the other fellows at least missed that event!

Siege

In Khe Sanh we don't live We exist
Along with many creatures
Rats and roaches head the top of the list.

By day artillery and mortar fire
At night the probing of our wire.

In bunkers and trenches we stay
Surrounded by fifty five thousand NVA.

Our position they could over run
We wait and wonder why they don't come.

When the 'mortar magnets' land on the strip
The NVA do their best to score a hit.

When incoming I hear
I dive for cover in total fear
Artillery and mortars hit the ground
One hits the ammo dump
It blow and makes a horrendous sound.

Seventy seven days we've been under the gun
And now the siege is done.

The orders are given "Destroy the base and move out."
As we leave I wonder what was it all about.

On Men and Duty

by J. Thomas Dilberger

Of course, as a Vietnam veteran and a man, I find myself looking back on those days when I was a young Marine rifleman. That is normal and for many years I was caught up in questioning the right or wrong of the war. However, I was looking for answers in the wrong places. I have finally found my answer and it has nothing to do with whether our fighting that war was "Right" or "Wrong." The answer is that we as soldiers did what men have done for centuries. We answered the call to arms of our nation. This doesn't mean that we were heroes, but it does mean that we did honor to our families by being true to our upbringing. We were raised from infancy to be honorable men and we did not let our families, church, school, or town down. We walked through the bush enduring intense heat, leeches, rain, heavy packs and combat. We were also pitted against a worthy foe, who was doing the same thing we were, but for his country. Make no mistake, our enemies helped mold us into the men we have become.

All these things give us a way of looking at life our peers who haven't had our experiences cannot hope to comprehend. The crucible that combat soldiers experience leaves on them an indelible benchmark. This gives a man a certain standing in society that men without his background can never attain. All this because as a young man he allowed himself to be tested by friend and foe alike and was not found wanting. I guess it takes the passage of Time for certain things to become clear.

War Resisters

If I am in a group of people and the subject of the war comes up, it is interesting to see men my age, after all this passage of time still justifying their reasons for not fighting, whereas veterans need only to say their units and that is the end of their explanation. I have an idea that all these years later, men who didn't serve their country in the 60s have had plenty of time to think over their actions and aren't too happy with what they did — or is it, didn't do? The thing about this whole affair is that it is like a door opening and shutting. Either you go through the door when it is open to you and prove your manhood, or, if you refuse, the door shuts on you and you have lost your opportunity forever. I think that is why some men today are super patriots. They think that somehow, by making a show of patriotism, they will make up for what they didn't do when their own names were called and they failed to respond.

The Price

Now that I have reached middle age, I am impressed by some things I have learned, such as how much I don't know, and that none of us are going to get out of this life alive. Another thing I have learned is that everything has a price and that price must be paid. There is no getting away with anything without paying the full tab. In the case of men who have done their duty by serving their country honestly, their bill is marked paid. For those men who didn't do their duty as men, the bill is still outstanding. Nobody has the ability to turn their backs on this debt and walk away as if nothing happened. The payment is variable and nobody knows how it will manifest itself. But the debt has been building interest since the time when these men first failed their country and themselves. Many times such men seem to be doing well in life and nobody can see that he is paying any price at all, and maybe he won't be aware of it himself. Maybe it won't even affect him but maybe a family member. Whatever the case, a man refuses to do his duty as a man at his own peril.

Vietnam Closure

By Terry Lacy

On October 23,1998 I finally got a little closure in my life. After thirty years of Vietnam and trying to ask God for forgiveness, it finally arrived. In May of 1968 on Hill 55, Vietnam. 2nd squad was getting ready to depart on a squad-size ambush. My friend John Wielebski, who was the squad leader, was standing around talking and smoking. I went to light a Salem when my lighter refused to light — it was out of fluid. John said take mine, I won't need it out there. Little did I know that it would be the last time I would see John. His squad was hit and John lost his leg — for his heroism he was awarded the Silver Star.

For thirty years, I have fought PTSD, which I really didn't think I had. Plus, I didn't think God would ever forgive me for the things I have done over that period of time. Thanks to a loving wife and two great kids I finally got some help. I would like to thank Danny Sissel and the Veterans organization for their help.

Closure comes to those who wait, I guess, and it comes in different ways. I had a heart attack last year on February 11. After four bypasses and a defibrillator inserted in my chest, I started on the road to recovery. With the help of Southern Ohio Medical Center and the fine program they have, it has really paid off. I would like to thank all the people who put me on their prayer list in the many churches out here in Mcdermott, Otway, Raden, and Portsmouth. With nothing to do, I started playing around on my son's computer. I looked up several military organizations and some home pages. I finally found what I was looking for — Khe Sanh Veterans. After signing many guest books and leaving many messages I started getting some feedback. I found a few guys I was in Vietnam with but did not really know. Then the break came about six months ago. I found John Wielebski but was afraid to call him.

For the last thirty years, I would get my dad's old three C footlocker out and go through all my junk. I always told my wife and kids that someday I would like to give John's lighter back to him. Well, I finally got up the courage to call him. He was as glad to hear from me as I was hearing from him. As we emailed each other over the months, he decided he would visit me October 25. I was surprised when I found out he had become a Catholic priest. It should not have been that much of a surprise, he was a really nice guy in Nam. When he called me and said he couldn't come, I got really depressed. About a half hour later, he called back and said he was coming. He arrived on Friday afternoon and I picked him up at the Ramada. We spent the whole afternoon together, and I showed him around our little town of Portsmouth. Then I gave him his lighter back and we took pictures, he said that a thousand lighters wasn't as good as renewing our friendship.

He engraved the lighter:

Vietnam Veteran Finds Nature Healing War's Wounds

Excerpts From a Story
By Mark Moser
Copyright © The Vail Trail, March 17, 2000

As the van carrying peace trees volunteers stopped, Don Shanley shot out the door and scrambled through the fog. He sprinted across remnants of the pock-marked, red clay airstrip, disappearing into the misty countryside. An eerie silence enveloped him along with the group. You could feel the ghost of the past. Without fanfare, the clouds lifted, unveiling the hill where Shanley and his men once fought. But this was different than he remembered. Coffee plants now thrive on what was once a bloody battlefield known as Khe Sanh. Nature had healed most of the earth's war wounds.

It had been 32 years since Shanley, assigned as a Marine lieutenant, had set foot on this scene where he and his men endured incessant mortars, as they struggled to survive by digging underground pits. "I remember trying to sleep fitfully in a hole filling with water," Shanley said. "Then I'd crawl out at daylight to munch on a dry cracker. We were in rain all day, being pounded by mortars for 20-30 days straight with no relief. It was hell on earth." Shanley, now 55, remembers patrolling this defoliated area where scarcely a blade of grass could survive. And he remembers the many men who needlessly lost their lives in a war that never seemed to make sense. "There was no reason to take the casualties we did," he said. "It turns one bitter."

But no remnants of that bitterness seemed to linger as Shanley returned to Vietnam. A California landscape designer, maybe it was traveling with Peace Trees Vietnam, a non-profit organization with a mission to reverse the legacy of war, that helped transform those once bitter memories. Shanley, who holds a bachelor's degree in history from Stanford and was headed for a master's from the University of California, Berkeley when he joined the Marines through Officers Candidate School, says he experienced a totally new reality seeing Vietnam today. It's definitely not the same war-torn hell he remembers from decades ago.

Shanley, who admits it will take some time to completely process all his thoughts and emotions, said he experienced something completely different than he imagined he would. Visiting a cemetery where 10,000 Vietnamese are buried stands out as the most powerful few hours of his trip. Reading the names and dates on grave markers drove home the magnitude of their loss. Nearly all those soldiers died before reaching 22 or 23 years of age. Many were only 16 or 17. More than 300,000 Vietnamese are still listed among those missing in action. "I gained a better understanding of the other side's perspective," he said. Their casualties were so extreme. That hit me. I have always had a need to honor all the Americans and Vietnamese who lost their lives during the war.

Minesweeping volunteer in the field.

"It was important for me to put to rest so many images I had brought back from the war in Vietnam," Shanley added. "It was awful and will never go away, but it's now in a more modern context. I've supplanted old images and [the trip] gave me new positive ones to deal with."

Steve Shanley of Edwards was only 8-years-old when his Uncle Don went off to serve in Vietnam. He remembers vividly sitting around the television each evening with his family as the horrors of the Vietnam War were beamed into their home. "This guy was more than an uncle to me; he was my idol, my hero, and a great role model," Steve said. "I've always had such a great respect for him. Even today, when I'm faced with a tough life situation, I think about how Don might handle that same situation."

Coffee plantations now thrive in Khe Sanh. Rubber trees line the road to the cemetery along the Ben Hai River, like sentinels guiding the way. The young people of Vietnam are moving on. And yet so many Americans seem to be stuck in Vietnam — the war.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE: Former Lieutenant Donald Shanley, E Co 2/26 Hill 861A, is actively involved in Peace Trees Vietnam (Reversing The Legacy Of War). Not only are they rebuilding Vietnam one tree at a time, they are also involved in removing the thousands of mines left behind from the war. I was also privileged to have fought alongside Don Shanley when our position on Hill 861A was attacked by a large NVA force on 05 Feb 1968. His heroic actions are the sole reason that so many of us were able to return home to our families. For that, and for his work in Vietnam now, I want to say "Thanks."

Uncommon Ground: The Marines and the US Army in I Corps

From Vietnam Magazine, October, 1999, pp. 22-28
©1998 by Peter Brush

American military commanders sought to present a united front, to speak with one voice, regarding the successes of U.S. military efforts during the Vietnam War. This unanimity, however, was more apparent than real. To the extent it was successful, moreover, it minimized the very fundamental differences that existed between the U.S. Army and Marine Corps as to the most effective method of waging war in Vietnam.

Over time these differences became acute. On January 22, 1968, the commander of American forces in Vietnam, General William Westmoreland, sent a TOP SECRET cable to General Earl Wheeler, Chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS). This cable noted that the professionalism of the Marine Corps in Vietnam had fallen "far short of the standards that should be demanded by our armed forces" and that Marine performance throughout their ranks required "improvement in the national interest." What caused this polarization? An examination of the differences between U.S. Army and Marine Corps military doctrine in Vietnam furnishes some clues.

Military doctrine may be defined as the distillation of collective wisdom that the institutional leadership uses to effect the ways in which the military executes and plans training and operations. U.S. Army doctrine in the 1960's was forged from its successes in the conventional wars of the Twentieth Century, and modified by the political realities of limited war as waged in Korea. The U.S. Army rode these successes into the battlefields of Vietnam. Limited war, by definition, places constraints on the use of military resources, constraints that are lacking in conventional wars. The superiority of U.S. firepower and technology in World Wars I and II were incorporated into the doctrine employed in the Korean conflict: massive firepower and the attrition of Communist forces. Although failure in war may incline an army to question the efficacy of its doctrine, the U.S. Army was not so inclined in Vietnam. It was not conceivable that an army capable of defeating both Japanese militarism and Nazi fascism would be inadequate to the task of defeating Vietnamese communism.

In June 1954, the U.S. received permission from France to participate in the training of the Vietnamese armed forces. When the French expeditionary force withdrew from Indochina in 1956, the U.S. Military Assistance Advisory Group saw its goal primarily as one of creating a conventional army of divisional and supporting units of the Vietnamese National Army (VNA, later ARVN). The divisional force structure of the ARVN was organized to deal with a Korea-style invasion from North Vietnam. U.S. Army Tables of Organization and Equipment were translated into Vietnamese and issued to the ARVN with no major variations. By 1959, the ARVN had seven standard divisions (plus armored cavalry) which closely paralleled U.S. Army units in World War II.

The administration of U.S. President Kennedy brought a change from the massive retaliation strategy favored by President Eisenhower to one of flexible response, which would meet aggression at any level of violence. Kennedy correctly saw that insurgencies were the preferred mechanism by which the Communists would attempt to spread their influence in future wars. Senior Army commanders, however, strongly resisted the Kennedy administration's emphasis on developing counter-insurgency capabilities. Traditional Army doctrine persisted even after U.S. ground forces began fighting in Vietnam. Counter-insurgency remained an added duty to the regular combat mission of Army divisions and brigades. Even the Special Forces, that Army contingency regarded as most capable of meeting the challenges of counter-insurgency, were configured to train and control guerrilla forces and to conduct guerrilla warfare in support of conventional operations. The problem facing the South Vietnamese government (GVN), however, was not one of waging guerrilla warfare; rather, it was one of defending against the Communist insurgency. By 1965, the Viet Cong (VC) were "annihilating ARVN battalions as a blast furnace consumes coke." In order to assure the survival of the GVN, in 1965 President Lyndon Johnson granted General Westmoreland's request that 200,000 U.S. troops be deployed to South Vietnam.

It was a different historical baggage train that carried the Marine Corps into Vietnam. The traditional Corps' mission of policing Navy yards and manning the rigging of Navy fighting ships in the nineteenth century evolved into that of a colonial light infantry expeditionary force in the early twentieth century.

Historically, the Marines had been "First to Fight" because of their ability to mount small infantry strike forces on short notice. Regular Army troops had larger logistical needs, which required more expense and delay. Further, there was the feeling within the U.S. government that intervention by Marines was less provocative than the dispatch of regular Army forces. In this view, the deployment of Marines abroad was not considered tantamount to an act of war, while deployment of Army troops was. As a result, in the period between World Wars I and II, the Marines acquired considerable experience in such aspects of counterinsurgency as pacification and the creation of native gendarmeries during operations in Haiti, the Dominican Republic, and especially Nicaragua.

During World War I, Marine commanders had resented attempts by the Army to use highly trained Marine forces in rear zones as support troops for the American Expeditionary Force. The Marines preferred the division of military resources employed in World War II, in which the Army concentrated its efforts in the European theater and the Marines assumed a leading role in fighting the Japanese, to that of Korea, where Marine ground and air forces were under operational control of the Army and Air Force and did not operate independently. In Vietnam, the Marines hoped to avoid the allocation of their resources in a manner subservient to other services.

In February 1965, the U.S. embarked upon a policy of sustained air strikes against North Vietnam (Operation ROLLING THUNDER). Senior Army commanders concluded that deployment of American ground forces to Vietnam was essential to provide base security for the air campaign. Upon being informed of this decision, Vietnamese commanders expressed concern about the reaction of the Vietnamese population to the presence of U.S. combat troops. Given the historical basis for the deployment of Marines abroad, it is ironic that in March, 1965, Assistant Secretary of Defense John T. McNaughton stated the desirability of deploying the Army's 173d Airborne Brigade rather than the 9th Marine Expeditionary Brigade (9th MEB): some planners felt the impact of light airborne infantry would constitute a "quieter arrival" than the formidable brigade of Marines with tanks, amphibious tractors, and other heavy weapons embarking from an sea-borne armada. General Westmoreland preferred the Marine force as being more self-sustaining. Executing a plan that had been in existence since 1959, the Marines came ashore by sea and air on March 8.

The Vietnam War was primarily a land war, and it was the U.S. Army that determined the operations, tactics, and most of the strategy employed in Vietnam. Army theory held that the insurgency in Vietnam would be conducted in three phases. In the first phase, the Communists would proselytize among the masses; in the second, guerrilla operations would commence; the third phase would see open warfare as the now-strong insurgents sought to topple the GVN. By 1965, according to General Westmoreland, North Vietnamese Minister of Defense General Vo Nguyen Giap had moved the fighting in Vietnam to the third phase, which would necessarily be a big-unit war. The U.S. Army committed its ground forces to counter this perceived threat. The emphasis was on conventional operations.

The initial mission for the Marine force was limited in scope. The JCS landing order directed that the Marines would not engage Viet Cong in combat. Marines would only defend the Da Nang airfield. The JCS favored an enclave strategy whereby the U.S. would increase its logistic capabilities to allow for the absorption of additional American combat forces. Westmoreland, still displaying concerns over the vulnerability of base areas to enemy action, suggested the deployment of additional Marine forces to guard the Army communications installation at Phu Bai, north of the enclave at Da Nang. This recommendation was supported by the JCS. Differences between the Marine Corps and the U.S. Army-led Military Assistance Command, Vietnam (MACV) date from this period.

Victor H. Krulak, Commanding General of the Fleet Marine Force, Pacific, and former Special Assistant for Counterinsurgency for the JCS, felt that Phu Bai was tactically indefensible. Krulak was cognizant of the numerical limitations of Marine forces in Vietnam and felt the Army facility should be moved to another place. This would allow Marine forces to remain concentrated in areas where they would be more productive. Army wishes prevailed, and in April 1965, two Marine battalions were deployed to establish an additional enclave at Phu Bai.

Leaders in Washington were convinced the situation in Vietnam had continued to deteriorate. Additional U.S. troops arrived in Vietnam, the Viet Cong achieved major victories in May and June, and the relatively low-risk enclave strategy was discarded. According to the Pentagon Papers, Westmoreland and the JCS articulated the strategy of search and destroy in keeping with sound military principles garnered by men accustomed to winning. The foundation of this strategy was to take the war to the enemy and deal him the heaviest possible blows. Combat restrictions placed on the Marine force were removed. The new mission included offensive operations to find and destroy the VC in the general Da Nang area. Although initial contacts with the VC were light, Department of Defense officials felt this situation was only the lull before the oncoming storm. In this view, large enemy units remained the major threat to South Vietnam. Marines established another base south of Da Nang at Chu Lai. The 9th MEB became the III Marine Amphibious Force(III MAF) with Major General Lewis Walt commanding.

Senior Marine commanders placed less emphasis on search and destroy operations than did Army commanders, because the Marines viewed large units of enemy forces as the secondary threat to the security of South Vietnam. General Walt, shortly after taking command, noted that 150,000 Vietnamese civilians were living within mortar range of the Da Nang airfield. Walt conveyed to the JCS his conviction that the real target in Vietnam should not be the Viet Cong or North Vietnamese Army (NVA) but the Vietnamese people. Only with the support of the civilian population could the enemy operate in sufficiently close proximity to Da Nang to cause damage to U.S. facilities. By winning over the allegiance of the Vietnamese to the GVN, base security would be accomplished. Large enemy formations posed no threat if they could not operate in populated areas.

Retired Marine general Edward H. Forney, then Public Safety Advisor with the U.S. Operations Mission in Saigon, felt the historical experiences of the Marine Corps in Haiti, the Dominican Republic, and Nicaragua had particular relevance to the insurgency in Vietnam. Forney said the Marines should link their pacification efforts with Vietnamese militia at the local village and hamlet level in order to provide the sort of operation around which the people of Vietnam would rally. According to Forney, lack of emphasis on this type of pacification was the major deficiency in operations then being conducted in Vietnam.

Westmoreland felt the Marines were wrong. In June 1965, MACV requested that a total of forty-four allied battalions be committed to Vietnam. If South Vietnam were to survive, the U.S. had to have a hard-hitting offensive capability on the ground. Westmoreland wanted to forget about enclaves and take the war to the enemy with allied troops that could be maneuvered freely. General Krulak observed that the Marines never felt the war stood to be won by grand maneuvers of large forces "in the Tannenberg or Chancellorsville image," but rather in the villages and hamlets. Army General Harry Kinnard, commander of the 1st Air Cavalry, felt the Marines did not know how to fight on land and were reluctant to do so. General William Deputy of the MACV staff felt the Marines "...came in and just sat down and didn't do anything." Different philosophies regarding the appropriate emphasis on pacification versus search and destroy operations would remain at the heart of the disagreements between the Army and the Marine Corps in Vietnam.

Krulak felt there was no virtue in seeking out large units of NVA in the mountains and jungles of Vietnam; as long as they stayed away from populated areas they posed no threat to anyone. By destroying the guerrilla fabric among the people, the U.S. would deny the enemy the logistic bases necessary for continued operations against the GVN. The U.S. should only fight large enemy units when they posed a particular threat to the populated areas. Westmoreland had a different perception. Intelligence reports in February 1966, indicated that two NVA divisions had infiltrated across the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) into the two northernmost provinces of South Vietnam. The MACV commander felt the intention of the NVA was to seize Quang Tri and Thua Thien provinces and the important city of Hue to use as bargaining points in future negotiations.

The Marines resisted every effort to extend their forces northward, preferring to concentrate efforts on pacification in the more densely populated south. In April 1966, at the insistence of General Westmoreland, the Marines began reconnaissance operations near Khe Sanh in the northwestern corner of Quang Tri province. Initial sightings of enemy troops caused the deployment of additional Marine reconnaissance elements in the DMZ area. By July 1966, heavy fighting occurred in the DMZ region between regular NVA and Marine units. Bases were established at Dong Ha, Cam Lo, and the Rockpile. Westmoreland became alarmed at the extent of the fighting in the north. Fearful that large NVA units would bypass the Marine defenses in the Dong Ha/Rockpile/Central DMZ area and enter South Vietnam from the northwest, Westmoreland suggested the Marines reinforce Khe Sanh.

The Marine command also resisted Westmoreland's suggestion regarding Khe Sanh. The assistant commander of the 3d Marine Division, General Lowell English, claimed that Khe Sanh had no tactical value; if it were lost, it would make no difference. In the Marine view, Khe Sanh was too isolated and would be too hard to support. Bowing to the inevitable, the Marines agreed to reinforce the base in order to retain the prestige of doing it on their own rather than being forced to do so. MACV was convinced the NVA were planning a massive advance into Quang Tri province. The 3d Marine Division was ordered north from Da Nang to meet this threat. Army troops moved to Da Nang to replace the departing Marines.

The expected enemy offensive along the DMZ did not materialize. Nevertheless, a sizeable Marine presence would remain in the north, seriously hampering the Marine pacification program in the southern sector of their Tactical Area of Responsibility (TAOR). General English summed up the Marines' frustration in Vietnam at the end of 1966 by noting the Corps had been assigned too much real estate and not enough troops. Generals Krulak and Walt thought the Communist leaders wanted to draw the Marines out of the populated I Corps coastal area into a campaign of attrition in the underpopulated areas of northern Quang Tri province. Since attrition was central to Westmoreland's strategy of search and destroy, the objectives of the Communists and MACV were such that continued fighting between the Marines and NVA along the DMZ was bound to occur.

By 1966, it became evident that Operation ROLLING THUNDER had proven ineffective in stopping the infiltration of men and supplies into South Vietnam from the north. In the search for a better way to stop this infiltration, the Department of Defense proposed the construction of a barrier across the DMZ and Laotian panhandle. In October 1966, Westmoreland ordered his subordinate commands to study the barrier concept as developed by the MACV staff. The Seventh Air Force developed an aerial barrier in Laos, while III MAF and MACV planned for a conventional barrier along the DMZ. III MAF commander General Walt ordered 3d Marine Division commander General Wood Kyle to design the Marine component of the barrier. Both Marine generals expressed strong reservations about the barrier concept, and Marine Corps opposition to it remained consistent. In their view, the barrier concept was fantastic, absolutely impractical, and would tie down additional troops that could be more effectively deployed in other ways. Neither Walt nor Kyle had any choice in the matter, and MACV ordered the Marines to construct the barrier.

In the fall of 1967, MACV received intelligence reports of massive NVA troop buildups in the vicinity of Khe Sanh. General Phillip Davidson, the MACV intelligence chief, felt General Giap intended to overwhelm the base in order to force an end to the war in Vietnam. General Westmoreland was convinced that the Marines under-appreciated the severity of the enemy threat to Khe Sanh. Feeling Marine assets were inadequate to the task, Westmoreland ordered U.S. Army troops into I Corps to reinforce the Marines. I Corps had been predominantly a Marine preserve since 1965. In the view of MACV, the Marines had lost the initiative against the NVA; Westmoreland began to consider putting the Army in charge of I Corps.

The Marines suffered heavy casualties in 1967 during heavy fighting with the NVA at Con Thien along the DMZ. During this battle, the Marines asked the Air Force for tactical support. After the fighting, the Marines were bitter in their assessment of the assistance provided by the Air Force. Marine General John Chaisson, chief of the MACV operations center, told Air Force General William Momyer he had no doubt in his mind that the Air Force had put insufficient emphasis and effort into assisting the Marines at Con Thien. Months later, while preparing for the defense of Khe Sanh, General Westmoreland asked III MAF commander General Cushman to release control of Marine tactical aircraft that were not actually supporting Marines in combat. Cushman, remembering Con Thien, bristled at the suggestion.

Marine forces were outfitted with fewer artillery pieces than Army units. In theory, Marines got gunfire support from Navy ships. When operating beyond the range of naval gunfire, Marines relied on the tactical air support of Marine pilots who had earlier trained as infantrymen. It was this special relationship between comrades that Cushman opposed severing. The disagreement over control of tactical air assets reached into the highest levels of the U.S. military establishment. III MAF seemed to be in virtual revolt over the matter. The Army felt the Marines had more available tactical support than they needed and should be willing to share it with Army forces. Westmoreland was unwilling to budge on this controversy — indeed, he felt so strongly about this that he claimed it was the one issue during his Vietnam service that prompted him to consider resigning. Eventually, the Marines were forced to accept Westmoreland's concept for a single air manager.

The war dragged on in the face of these disharmonies between the Army and Marine Corps. American civilian leaders remained concerned with managing the bombing campaign against North Vietnam. As long as MACV restricted military operations to South Vietnam, the Army continued to play the lead role in deciding the best way to wage war. General Westmoreland explicitly rejected the Marine policy of paying less attention to large units of enemy troops, while favoring small unit activities to accomplish pacification.

The Marines in I Corps fought two wars: one of counter-insurgency in the heavily populated southern portion of their TAOR, and a more conventional war, at MACV insistence, against large NVA formations in the north. By being forced to fight two wars, the Marines felt they had inadequate assets to properly wage either. MACV felt the Marines were too parochial in their outlook, that the threat of NVA forces entering Vietnam from various avenues within I Corps threatened the integrity of the entire nation of South Vietnam.

General Westmoreland remained convinced of the critical importance of Khe Sanh. The Marine combat base there remained garrisoned as long as Westmoreland was the MACV commander. In April 1968, the Army 1st Cavalry Division (Airmobile) was assigned the lead role in the operation to establish overland communications with the Marines at Khe Sanh. MACV felt Army high-mobility tactics would be more effective against NVA forces in northern I Corps than anything the Marines could offer. On 1 July 1968, General Creighton Abrams replaced Westmoreland as MACV commander. The Khe Sanh Combat Base was immediately shut down and abandoned.

Marine and Army tactics began to converge. General Abrams was willing to place more emphasis on pacification and lead Army operations away from their previous conventional orientation. The reversion by the enemy to a lower-level insurgency after the losses suffered during Tet, 1968, inclined the Americans to respond with smaller unit activities. MACV was coming to the realization that large-scale U.S. combat operations had brought little in the way of over-all security to the countryside of South Vietnam. The attrition of enemy forces remained the primary goal of American forces, however.

Tactics employed by the Marines also changed. In May 1968, Major General Raymond Davis assumed command of the 3d Marine Division. Davis ordered the division to forego its earlier reliance on fixed defensive positions. In the latter half of 1968, the Marines received additional helicopter assets with the arrival in large numbers of the CH-46 medium transport helicopters. Davis also secured the promise of Army helicopter support from Army General William Rosson, Provisional Corps commander, and from General Richard Stillwell, Rosson's successor at XXIV Corps. With this helicopter support, the Marines moved out of their positions south of the DMZ and began Army-style mobile operations in western Quang Tri province.

It was domestic political considerations and not successes on the battlefield, that offered impetus to the American decision to begin withdrawing its combat forces from Vietnam. General Abrams believed that an American military victory was impossible considering the restrictions under which they were compelled to operate. U.S. Defense Secretary Melvin Laird was determined to effect a major change in American policy toward the war in Vietnam. Despite the unanimous view of the major U.S. agencies involved in the war that the policy of Vietnamization would be unable to deal with the threat posed by the Vietnamese Communists, the new administration of President Nixon instructed MACV to develop plans for turning the war over to the Vietnamese armed force.

When it came time for the first pullout of U.S. forces in July 1969, General Abrams favored the departure of the 3d Marine Division. General Westmoreland, still convinced of the threat posed by NVA forces in the northern provinces, interceded to keep the Marines in I Corps. Abrams later agreed that the first U.S. troops removed from Vietnam would be a combination of 3d Marine Division and Army 9th Infantry Division units. Departing Marine units were not directly replaced. As the Marines pulled out of their positions in the north, the bases were offered to the Army. This offer was rejected.

Marine strength in I Corps at the beginning of 1969 was 81,000, with 50,000 Army troops under III MAF command. By the end of the year, Marine strength had fallen to 55,000 men as Army forces replaced the Marines. In 1970, III MAF relinquished control of I Corps to the Army XXIV Corps. Defense of the northernmost provinces was no longer the responsibility of the Marine Corps.

At the beginning of large U.S. troop deployments to Vietnam, the various services were eager to participate. The Army wanted to regain influence lost to the Air Force and Naval Air that had dominated the strategy of massive retaliation dominant in the early years of the Cold War. Matters of service prestige and career enhancement were at stake in Vietnam. During the advisory period, Marine commanders were concerned that the Corps was only moderately involved in the conflict, which was contrary to Marine Corps tradition. The Marines had no special counter-insurgency units such as Army Special Forces. The only solution to this problem was for the Marines to commit regular Fleet Marine Force units on a large scale.

The Marine command in I Corps would have preferred a free hand in waging war, free of Army supervision. Vietnam was the longest and, in many ways, the most difficult war for the Marines — Marine casualties in Vietnam exceeded those of World War II. By the time U.S. forces began redeployments in 1969, it was clear that Vietnam was more a place for the military services to lose prestige rather than gain it. The MACV initial plan to re-deploy the 3d Marine Division only included ground units. The Marines, still opposed to the breakup of the their air-ground team, favored the removal of both fixed-wing and rotary air assets along with the ground units of the 3rd Marine Division. Marine Commandant General Leonard Chapman noted that although these air assets were not organic to the Marine division, they were essential if the division was to be used as a strategic reserve in the Pacific. The Corps was looking beyond Vietnam, seeking the re-creation of its force deployment that existed prior to participating in this unsatisfactory war.

Army doctrine was a major contributor to the determination of Army tactics in Vietnam. General Westmoreland claimed to understand the historical rationale behind the employment of Marine Corps doctrine in Vietnam. He understood that the Marines were employed in Vietnam on operations contrary to their mission simply because they existed and were available in time of need. While allowing that Marine doctrine neither trained nor equipped them for sustained operations ashore, such was the manner in which they were deployed by MACV in Vietnam. Given the inability of the Army to operate in a manner contrary to their own historical experiences, it seems simplistic for Westmoreland to fault the Marine Corps for an over-rigid adherence to its own doctrine.

In 1975, South Vietnam succumbed to a conventional invasion of North Vietnamese army forces. This historical reality gives support to the Army belief that the threat posed by large enemy forces to the GVN was a critical threat. However, the rapid crumbling of the civil and military institutions of South Vietnam in the face of this invasion supports the Marine Corps view that winning over the allegiance of the people of South Vietnam to their government was also a matter of strategic importance. The insufficient achievements of pacification exemplify the failure of nation building by the United States in South Vietnam.

Slouching Towards Khe Sanh and Beyond

by Gary W. Foster

Following is a letter I wrote to Donna Elliot in response to her request to help find her brother Jerry who was MIA near Khe Sanh in 1968 (See Red Clay, Winter 2001. I was unable to provide much input or to assist her in her efforts, but the day I drove to Khe Sanh from Dong Ha proved interesting and I thought I would share the events with her. Others may be interested to read of the events, which have little to do with Khe Sanh in the late 60s but proved an interesting day for me nonetheless. I met Donna in Washington, DC in late spring 2002, and we had a long conversation about her brother, the day he went MIA and how she has struggled over the years to locate him. It is to her credit that she carries such a torch. She is persistent and tenacious. I continue to stay in touch with Donna. She is a source of inspiration for all. Now, my letter to Donna from Dong Ha, Vietnam.

March 31, 2002
Dong Ha

Dear Donna,

My day spent looking for information on your brother.

Slept very little the night before my trip to Khe Sanh and Lao Bao. Arrived at the guesthouse in Dong Ha around 7pm. No dinner, could not eat. Had some peanuts and a couple of Halida beers (warm). Bags carried to the room on the second floor by the driver. Not a very good driver. Too indecisive when he needs to pass, not a good trait when driving in Vietnam. People who pace other cars when passing only cause potential calamity. My driver did just that. Why he drives 30 miles per hour in fifth gear remains a mystery to me. Why he drives 30 mph at all is an even more mysterious question! "Hoang, we got to get rid of this guy. Makes me nervous..." Not that I'm not already a nervous wreck by the time we finish the drive south from Hanoi to Dong Ha on Highway 1.

Room 205: accommodations spacious with two adjoining rooms and a bathroom: high ceilings, street light outside always on and pointed unerringly straight into my room. I always get this room. Air conditioner straight out of wind tunnel testing, but it's at least very cool. Slippers at the door – too small, hmmm. Fridge contains water and beer and coke. I know to turn down the thermostat to its coldest level and I do so. That's the first thing I do at the Dong Ha Guesthouse, as I call it, having been here many times before. The second thing I do is to spray for mosquitoes. I hate mosquitoes and there are millions of them.

Knock at the door and then it opens.

"Mr. Gary, we need your passport for reception and registering."

"Here Hoang," as I toss it to him.

"You drink beer again?"

"Yes Hoang. Got any bourbon?"

"We eat dinner?"

"You go ahead, Hoang, I'm going to stay here and relax."

"You OK?"

"I'm OK, Hoang, just tired and need some silence; want to relax."

"You too old!'

"Get stuffed, you're too old too — you're more old than me and you're more ugly."

No one would ever understand the dialogue that ensues between Hoang and I. We have become good friends and I enjoy his sense of humor. We have developed a vocabulary unique to our conversation. The grammatical articles such as "the" or "a" or "an" are usually missing from otherwise intelligent conversation. I have traveled with Hoang throughout Vietnam. He is my constant companion and can pave the way for me. He finds me to be a real curiosity and he still thinks I am a spy, but to be honest, the thought has crossed my mind more than a few times that he is a spy too. His name is Hoang Tran Dung. Dung, now that's really his first name. I was introduced to him as Mr. Hoang, but Dung is to him what Gary is to me. Unfortunate name, but in Vietnamese a "D" is pronounced as a "Z." His first name is pronounced "Zung," or more phonetically in English, "Zoong." Sometimes I call him Zung but mostly I call him Hoang. Hoang was a captain in a communications regiment with the North Vietnamese Army. He is three years younger than I and he was in the army for 8 years. During the last few years of the Vietnam War, he walked from Hanoi to Pleiku in three months, and after the war he walked back. He never saw frontline action, being in communications, but he did witness a few B-52 strikes and many other events. He knows every American combat airplane and every American weapon. He asks me constantly what DMZ means. "For the umpteenth time Hoang, it means the De-Militarized Zone."

"But we never de-militarized it," he responds.

"Well, you should have," is my retort. "OK, Hoang, let's go eat." I already know the restaurant. The people there know me and that I like green onions, raw. "Bad for your breath but good for your heart," I always say. Anyway, I don't think Sharon Stone will be passing our restaurant in Dong Ha anytime soon.

Next day, woke up at four; not by sound of my alarm clock but by a friendly gecko lizard trying his best to talk to me and to tell me to get up. When he saw I was not responding, he raised his pesky voice. Peeked at me from the behind the air conditioner and then slithered back behind it. How come the air conditioner wasn't working? What's going on? Where's the remote? The remote?! Where's the light? No electricity in Dong Ha town. More totally undecipherable verbage from that damned lizard hiding behind the AC. Now wide-awake, I got up and stumbled to the fridge and grabbed a bottle of water — naw, it was a beer. Thank god, I had turned the temp in the small fridge way down the night before; the beer was delightfully cold, even at 4am. Only 3 hours until we hit the road again to Khe Sanh and then bump along to Lao Bao. Sat up in bed. The gecko, pleased with his work, continued to talk to me. Just like home, right? Power still off and no light. Well, at least the light just outside my window was out.

Starting to get warm...need water...cold water. Jump in shower in darkness. No water. Dummy! No electricity, no pump, no water — it's a simple concept.

Gray dawn. Clothes on, wallet and passport safe. Left Danh Ba Dien Thoai Nha khach Uy Ban Ttinh (Whew!) Guesthouse at 7:00am for a restaurant to down some pho (noodle soup). Drove past a military crane and two destroyed tanks, an M48 and a T54, barrels on both tanks in the fully depressed position, hatches open. Continued on into main part of Dong Ha. Motorbikes everywhere, dark skies, humid, everyone spitting and coughing. Parked the car outside the restaurant; immediately told we had parked in the wrong place and had to move it. This just after we had driven over a 300 feet extension cord and crushed it. The Dong Ha-ians were setting up a stage for the 30-year anniversary of the liberation of Dong Ha and found an electrical outlet in a building to power the sound stage. Ran the cord outside the building through the front door and over the road to the stage, 300 feet. Anyway, I didn't know Dong Ha was ever liberated: I thought it was just invaded and overwhelmed.

"OK, no, Mr. Gary, Dong Ha was liberated."

"OK, Hoang," I said. "Jesus!" We had to move the car and then went inside the restaurant first by walking down an incline and then ducking my head to enter. I was the center of attention. Found a table recently vacated by a family of four and sat down amid all the debris left on the floor: napkins, lemons, chopsticks — one broken, bottle tops, chicken bones, and chewed but discarded various other animal parts, etc. The day, my friend, has just started. Great. That's right! Big smile, big stretch, and wait for that great meal of bacon, eggs, and hash browns and the occasional beer.

In your dreams. I ordered my pho, as usual — I seldom eat anything else. I have lost my sense of culinary adventure. It arrived in a large bowl. Clean my chopsticks with a napkin the size of a postage stamp, throw it on the floor just like everyone else. Could spit too and be in vogue. Very hot stuff in a large bowl; needed to cool down. Ordered soy sauce, and sliced red chilies. I like my pho spicy. Drank tea. Already getting hotter outside. Made a big mess of the soup, hate the spoons they give me. Soup all over my chin and down my shirt. Dropped orange juice from a slice of orange on my brand new white Nordstrom shirt — bummer. Hey, I look great in white even if it is covered in orange and noodle stains and the dust already being stirred up by the traffic outside. The restaurant owner turned up the music. Screaming music. Finished up, paid the girl, let's roll. "Hoang, get in!"

I stole the keys from Hoang — he drives OK but too slow and stops only when he wants to stop. I was showing my new project manager the road between Dong Ha and Lao Bao and I didn't want to have to plead every time I wanted to show him a culvert or a bridge abutment. Into town center, then headed west now, first Cam Lo; traffic begins to thin, but still a few maniacs on the road, then Ca Lu, then the Rockpile. Lots of blasting going on. No traffic but was reminded to bam on the horn constantly. Hoang says, "Make sound of horn. You never know," he says.

"Never know what?" I ask. "What, the VC may come out of the jungle and get me?"

Then a small bridge, then parallel to the Rao Quan River. Had stopped at Cau Dau Mau to show new PM the bridge and the supposed new alignment. We looked to the right but the new road alignment is to the left. What the hell! People honking at us for no good reason and all saying, hello, goodbye and trying to act as if they meant it. Stopped at another bridge Cau Sa laman, big Bru area and thousands of kids about 3 or 4 descended upon us and we could not open the doors of the car. Finally managed to open the door and were met again with hello, goodbye, hello, goodbye...again!

Walked the length of the bridge, shirt now filthy and covered in stickers from a thorn bush below the bridge that I brushed up against. Traffic starting to flow, and slowing across the bridge at km 47. Old bridge, not looking good, needs to be replaced. Corn growing in the creek bed below. Naked kids playing in muddy water, water buffalos snorting and meandering like some people I see in the mall, old ladies smiling with blood red teeth from the betelnut, old men sitting, just like all over the world, kids on bicycles without tires, women carrying fruit to market, wherever that is, in baskets balanced on a pole across their shoulders. Everyone dirty, and by now even me. Everything just peachy keen here on Quoc Loang 9 in Quang Tri Province, Vietnam.

Reached Da Krong, stopped to see a wedding procession, took some photos. No film. Terrific. Was asked to attend but was hardly dressed for the occasion in my white, but turning red, Reeboks. Man falls off his bike. Another man asks me for a cigarette. Sweat pouring out now, shirt sticking and red clay dust in my mouth eyes, ears and elsewhere. Worried cheap hotel pen would bleed and gave it to passerby on a bike. Put it behind his ear and peddled on. Thanks, or at least I think that's what he said. Where's my Mont Blanc? I left it in the hotel room!

Drove on to Cau Rao Quan. Impressive sight but not as impressive as the cable-stayed bridge across the Rao Quan River (Highway No. 14) but new PM not pleased with architecture. What!

Road rises up to the plateau and we reach Khe Sanh finally and stop for 10 minutes then continue on to Lao Bao. Cigarette smugglers and money-changers everywhere. All look the same. The same — driver on a 110 Honda with a cute girly on the back holding bags of cigarettes bound for Dong Ha.

God, it's getting hot! On to Lao Bao, stop in Lang Vei and try to talk to military people who have a tent over the old US Green Beret camp. Whatchaguys doing? How goes it? Zappnin? You know, usual banter with complete strangers in a country where nobody speaks American. I mean this is Quang Tri Province, right? Good Copy? Man, what are you guys doing here? No response.

Back in the car, continue to Lao Bao. Road not good, bumpy. AC on full blast, shirtsleeves filthy from rubbing the sweat from my face. Hoang not happy about my driving: not blowing the horn enough. I blast it 20 times in an attempt to appease but still not good enough. Arrive at Lao Bao, look for old French fort, not there, of course, but people in Khe Sanh could not answer my question and Hoang was not interested to know either. You know, a little sightseeing never hurt anyone. But the Old French prison is over there. We go there. Totally destroyed by big-time bombs; craters so big you could put my T-bird in them. Yep, craters still evident after 35 years. See Laos border down in the valley with mountains of Laos just behind. Hoang worried that I may cross the border with his car. Are you nuts? I'm already in Vietnam, why sink deeper into Laos? Hang around for 20 minutes looking at drainage and roadway shoulders. Money launderers trying to make a quick kill. I pull out the big bucks – phony $1 million notes handed out by my bank back home as a promo and try to get some Dong. I mean, I have a dong, I just need more Dong — you know, money.

Drove back up the mountain back towards Khe Sanh past Lang Vei and a small reservoir to the left onto the Khe Sanh plateau, and boom, re-entered Khe Sanh. Saw a large bomb on the right side of the road. Stopped and took a look. Big goddamn bomb. Across the street was a junkyard filled with wreckage from the combat base. Owners each had 4 fingers missing from the same hand from trying to cut into a mortar shell. The surprising thing is they are still alive. They showed me where the accident took place and it was just in front of their home/house/shop on the side of the main road. So much for UXO. Lots of junk from the war. Strange business, strange people, produced strange feeling, Let's get the hell out of here.

Got back in car and drive to the base. New museum being built, the highway to the base is under construction, what a pain. No heavy equipment, just hands-on by thousands of Vietnamese and, I suppose, Bru. Glad to see the Vietnamese trying to spruce things up a bit there. Needs an American flag, I think; maybe just a small one. Doesn't look likely though.

Leave the base and drive back to Khe Sanh Ville. Accident between two trucks, didn't see it, but driver's seat on the highway. Did not see driver of either vehicle. Stop for a cold beer. Not cold but plenty of ice. Ice block being splintered into small fragments on bathroom floor. Oh, just great. How do you like your beer? With typhoid or with — oh, what's that other stupid water-borne disease? Cholera, that's it. Looking for Jerry Elliot, asked for the French fort, no one knows. I don't know whether they know but can't imagine why they don't know. Shirt sopping wet now, shirt tail out, hair — well, not much hair — a total wreck. Hot and no wind. But plenty more red dust from the highway as the trucks blowing their horns pass through town at the speed of light. Lady moves a floor fan near us, cord now does not reach outlet but she points the fan in our direction anyway, smiles and sits back down; fan blades motionless.

Hey, this international stuff just does not get any better than this: blaring trucks, red dust, a motionless fan, and typhoid beer! Paid for the beer, Dong back in my pocket; not that Dong, the money dong.

Back in the car, start motor and we are off to find a restaurant near the French fort. Found the restaurant OK, same as the morning: detritus and maybe a few human parts on the floor beneath the table. Old dog in the corner, too hot to move. Kids looking inside. Eat the usual white rice, rice paper, noodles, and greens. Pay up and blast off again.

This time to the Dong Ha bypass, not built yet, that's what we are going to do. Turn off the road towards Con Thien, run smack dab into the new Ho Chi Minh highway. Thousands of people working. More dust. Not a bad drive, decide to look for the Con Thien base. Completely miss it and never found it, turn back and find the road back to Highway 1 and follow it south to Dong Ha, over the bridge. Pigs strapped upside down onto the seat of motorbikes for market, man on bicycle taking red plastic buckets to market piled 10 feet high on bike, accident between motorbike and pedestrian, everyone honking, trucks blaring, and peasants walking in middle of highway. "Make sound of horn," Hoang tells me. Dodging more people, swerve through side street to market, kid runs in front of car, sound of brakes and tires on pavement, what was in the backseat now in the front seat, arrive at hotel and slug down another beer, this time without ice. Never found the French fort. Shirt completely red with dust and sweat. Hair, still not much hair, a disaster.

That was yesterday.

Not much help to you Donna. God bless you, Jerry.

Hello Sir:

My name is Patrick Hall and I see you are the site Secretary. I just wanted to tell you that my hero is Mort Freedman who was a USAF Combat Controller at Khe Sanh. He earned the Silver Star at Kham Douc when the C-123 pilot Joe Jackson, earned the Medal of Honor. I entered the USAF in 1980 and went to Clark AB, Philippines. I've heard many Vietnam Vets ask how I made it back. I always found this odd, as I was not there, yet I think I know the answer now. All my NCOs were Vietnam Vets, who trained and taught me all they had to offer. Because of it, I am alive today. Your generation is still giving so much to this day. Mort lives in Angeles City, Philippines, and was in the Marine Corps during the Korean War. Whenever Marines stopped at Clark during my tenure of 1982-1984, Mort would have them all for dinner, it never mattered how many showed up. He pounded into our heads the honor and the courage of the Marines at Khe Sanh. I went to Coronado Island for scuba school with men from Recon. With them was a Gunnery Sergeant whom I told how blown away I was by the respect and admiration his men had for him. At the time I was an E-4 Senior Airman. He spent an entire weekend explaining his responsibilities to his men, which he learned in Vietnam. The knowledge he learned in Vietnam, which he shared, shall last a lifetime. God Bless you Sir, and all the Marines, past present and future, Welcome Home.

Patrick Hall

An Act of Kindness

Dear Jim Wodecki,

Although you may not remember me, in Feb 2001 you helped my family and me search for information regarding the death of my brother, Noble Jackson. Noble was killed in action on 28 May 1967, during Operation Choctaw, in Thua Thien Province RVN, while serving with E Company 2/4, 2nd Platoon. You took time from your own life to help my mother and me research the archives of the 2nd Battalion, 4th Marines. Through your efforts we were able to locate former Marine, Robert Stefanellie. Robert resides in Brooklyn, NY, served with a 106 Recoilless Rifle Platoon, and was attached to E Company 2/4. We exchanged emails and learned we both resided on Staten Island, N.Y. We had lunch together, and he brought his 2/4 Marine book, along with his military records containing all the operations he and my brother went on together. I had also brought my brother's military records. We learned they were both very close. They left out of Kennedy Airport together right after Thanksgiving in 1966 and arrived in Vietnam together. While attached to E Co 2/4, Robert and Noble went on many operations together. Robert cried and told me what happened the day, during Operation Choctaw when Noble was KIA. My family and I now know the circumstances surrounding my brother's death. We owe it all to you for doing the original research. I do not now feel the pain and emptiness that was my companion for 35 years. I salute you and your family for helping my family finally bring closure to my brother's death. You finally brought peace to my mother's heart. Again, thanks, may you and your family enjoy the holidays and God Bless and keep you,

Sincerely yours,
Teddy Jackson and Family

Intelligence: Was It Too Complex?

by Bill Person

I have given some thought to the overall and complex intelligence effort back during the Vietnam War. There seemed to be no really good place to begin.

I was assigned to Eastern NORAD/CONAD Region at Stewart AFB, New York as the Special Security Officer, SSO and the inheritor of a real mess. It had little to do with security but was instead an SI intelligence complex.

When I arrived at Stewart AFB, New York in June 1965, a Major Dubrow was most anxious for me to relieve him. He had been there for a few years and had been completely ignored by the senior officers on his billet. That means personnel cleared to see Top Secret codeword material. The Director of Intelligence, an Army Lt. Col., had tried to get him to become one of the consumer intelligence types in his outer office, but he had become sort of a recluse inside his vault-like compound. He continued to receive materials and keep the facility open with two sergeants in the communications field. He also had a Japanese wife which is a no-no for holding a SI clearance. No foreign wives of most nations allowed. The exception was Canada, U.K., Australia and New Zealand where background checks could be conducted to determine if they were subversives.

In 1965, the Air Force Security Service relinquished its control of the Special Security offices to Defense Intelligence Agency. This was a system to present highly classified Special Intelligence information to the commanders and their staffs of the other commands, i.e., SAC, TAC, ADC, etc. I was greeted with a pale green covered book, DOD Directive 5200.17, which was the new authority and operating procedures for an SSO. NSA had apparently decided that USAFSS was a lesser entity as were the Army Security Agency and the Navy Security Group, so a new civilian agency was created with more prestige and one, moreover, to study and disseminate information they considered necessary to those commands in the conducting of their activities.

Once I assumed the office complex, I went to see M/General Gordon H. Austin and told him I was his new SSO. I informed him that Defense Intelligence Agency had just assumed control of this facility and that I planned to conduct weekly briefings in the SSO briefing room at 1000 each Friday. My briefings would consist of world events that, in my opinion, he and his staff needed to know. In the event of a war, the first indications would come from this source and if he did not make use of it, he would not know how to use such information if we ever do have a war. I told him that if he and those cleared on his staff chose not to attend, I planned to go to Washington where DIA was located in the Pentagon annex and close the facility, because it served no purpose being there if it was not used. From that day on, no one missed a meeting and most of them came in for special background information. My two NCOs operated the secure communications equipment and with the courier bringing material in weekly, I believe my briefings were the equal of any SSO anywhere. Because I was the one preparing and presenting them, I know what was presented to the commander and his cleared staff. My experience in the intelligence field gave me a sound background to be able to talk with ease about almost every subject since I had studied the materials since October 1962.

In early 1964 while I was at Wakkanai AS, Japan, my intercept technicians intercepted a special signal and after we determined its significance and I reported it, I was criticized for meddling in what was not my area of responsibility. Later, a thick, illustrated report was disseminated to the upper levels of certain commands to confirm what I had reported as fact. While I was Queen Bee Delta Project Officer, my back-end intercept crew began to monitor Navy Task Force 77 transmitting launch activities over hand-held radios. I knew that the Russians had ELINT/SIGINT/COMINT fishing trawlers operating nearby and that they would be intercepting vital intelligence about our strike force composition, ordnance and intended targets. I directed my 10-man intercept crew of linguists to record these transmissions and I sent seven reels of tapes to the Director of Intelligence to confirm my identification of a major breach of security.

CNO and other members of the Pentagon sent a scathing message back, through channels, to say that the only means of getting such information was Queen Bee Delta and that was not my tasked mission. It went on to state that I was neglecting my primary mission by wasting time recording these friendly transmissions. It also stated that Navy Task Force 77 was not violating any security transmissions. I responded that the tapes had been recorded while en route to Da Nang from Bangkok to pick up fighter escort prior to taking position at Yankee Station. I was directed not to do this anymore by the Pentagon. Gen. Blake, DIRNSA sent me an Eyes Only message to keep doing it and to send him the tapes via courier and not to tell anyone.

Actually, Blake, the Director of National Security was the boss over me and the Queen Bee Delta project and as such, should have been the one to make that call, not the Pentagon. As the war progressed and I was seeing MIGs practicing an intercept technique that I had seen back while at Wakkanai, I sent a special message suggesting top cover for fighter/bomber strike forces for both Air Force and Navy. I was told to let command decisions be made at the appropriate level and keep to my assigned mission which was intercept and report, leaving the planning to Washington. After we lost four F-105s to a single MIG that command said the North Vietnamese didn't have the capability to do, and the Navy lost four F4s to Chinese MIGs, that changed. This took place on the 3rd and 5th of April, 1965. I was concerned that aircraft commanders and Navy ship captains' were not cleared to know what the mission of those vessels were, which I considered vital to their decisions for their own safety. I doubt any of the aircraft commanders or their flight crews knew exactly what was taking place in their planes as they flew EC-118s, EC-47s, EC-130s, EC-135s. Perhaps the SAC crews knew a little more in their RB-47s and RB-57s but I know that neither captains Cmdr. Lloyd Bucher of the Pueblo nor Cmdr. William L. McGonagle of the Liberty knew the extent of their missions.

The intelligence community had a myriad of collection efforts all over SEA and this was fed back to Wheeler AFB, Hawaii in what must have been a river of intelligence. We knew that the world press published everything they could find out about the day-to-day activities of the war and this served as a very good intelligence source to Hanoi. Perhaps because of this, special intelligence and the information picked up by CIA was sent directly through their channels and denied to combat commanders at all levels. PAC Security Region had reams of vital intelligence at Wheeler that could have been shared with the Intelligence Directorate at Hickham, but this did not happen. The information went straight to NSA and the White House. President Johnson and Robert S. McNamara were the ones to review this intelligence and make the major combat decisions.

In January 1968, while flying as a Batcat on an EC-121R over the Laotian panhandle, I detected tanks moving down the Ho Chi Minh Trail on Route 9. I sent a message from Korat to report this, bypassing Task Force Alpha at Nakhon Phanom. The same intelligence office at Hickham where Larry Clum worked replied that Air Force intelligence estimates claimed that the Vietnamese had no such tanks. On February 8th, 11 Soviet-built amphibious PT-76 tanks and 400 NVA troops with supporting artillery attacked the Army Special Forces camp at Lang Vei, overrunning it. The term, "Tanks in the wire!" was used, routing U.S. forces from their base on Route 9. The Siege began with Tet 68 with the Rangers at Lang Vei reporting tanks in the wire, overrunning them. Later, it was reported that these were not tanks, merely amphibious PT-76s. I doubt the Rangers could truly appreciate the significant difference when this assault woke them by boring through the barbed wire.

I believe that President Johnson and McNamara did not want the Commanders in the area to have such intelligence for fear that it might leak out to the press. This in turn might, as the Intelligence Community always reasoned, deny us that intercept source in the future. Like the press always knew, to announce a source denies that and other such sources in the future, so you don't make them public. There was supposedly enough other source intelligence back then: photo-reconnaissance, trail watchers and direct reports from the forward areas. I can only imagine what the commanders from Hickham, Tan Son Nhut, and Udorn must have thought when they examined the intelligence information they did see and then to have directions from Washington to assign a specific target where they may not have any information at their levels.

During World War II, Churchill severely limited his ULTRA and MAGIC to but a few top people. In the Pentagon, an Army General threw a codeword document into his trash basket. He was removed from the access list. Churchill would have shot him. We have all seen a tiny part of that war and it is doubtful that all of the real story will ever be told. I was privileged to see more than most and I write about some of it, but I still have a lot of questions to ask if I could ever know who might be able to answer them.

I do not accept the term we lost that war, but rather we were not allowed to win it, and then were ordered out. The Queen Bee Delta intercepted tapes that we recorded and dropped off at Da Nang for transcription to be read in Washington, told us peons that we could have destroyed North Vietnamese ability to fight a war in South Vietnam if we had bombed the 92 targets recommended by the JCS in March and April 1965 before the enemy had a chance to prepare for a protracted war. I personally gave a briefing to LBJ in September 1968 to tell him about the sensor war. Until that time, I thought he was the good guy and he was being advised badly. I met the real enemy that day but it took me a while to realize it. 58,000 Americans did not need to die over there if we had a good military leader. Good generals do not make good presidents and good presidents do not make good generals. I stand corrected, we did have George Washington, didn't we, but they broke the mold after him.

Goodbye Doc

by Bob McLane

A soft rain was falling as twilight turned this Veteran's Day into night. Other Vets quickly walked past the slow moving man in the faded Corpsman's shirt. He leaned on a cane. With a little more light they might have noticed the Navy Cross among the ribbons on the faded shirt. Many were on their way to reunions that were going on all over town as thousands of Vietnam Veterans gathered to celebrate this tenth anniversary of the Vietnam wall. This was a national place of healing but even after ten years, many Vets were seeing the wall for the first time. The man in the Corpsman's shirt stopped walking and clutched the cane tightly.

"Are you alright, Doc?" I recognized him from a party the night before at the Sheraton where hundreds of former and active duty Marines had gathered to celebrate their 217th birthday. The old corpsman had helped cut the cake with a Marine Officer's sword. Any corpsman who ever had served with a Marine outfit in a combat zone was considered an honorary Marine by most leathernecks.

Jim Mayton was a dues paid member of that brotherhood. He had saved the lives of hundreds of Marines in Korea and Vietnam. The cane shook as he looked at me. "I'm out of gas," he said as he fought for another breath. Advanced emphysema and his refusal to quit smoking made even the shortest walk seem like an uphill march with a full pack. A park bench was a few feet away. "Have a seat, Doc. We'll figure something out."

A Green Beret walking by, saw what was going on and offered to help. We thought about carrying him to a taxi but his bad hip killed that idea. A park ranger came by, driving a electric cart. I explained the situation. "Do you know how to drive one of these things," she asked. "I'm a golfer," I smiled. She gave me the cart. I drove Jim back up to the street and hailed a cab. He waited while I returned the cart.

We took the cab back to the Sheraton. Settled in on a couch in the lobby, Jim ordered a gin & tonic and lit a cigarette. His eyes followed a pretty woman walking by. Other Marines entering the hotel saw Jim and stopped to say hello. Everyone from generals to former privates treated the old corpsman with respect and affection. He still wanted to see the wall.

After a BLT sandwich and another cigarette, we hailed another taxi. This time three Marines went with him. They borrowed a wheelchair from the hotel. There are over fifty-eight thousand names etched in gray letters on the black granite wall. That night Jim went to see just one, Edward Gaffney Creed. After picking up some wounded Marines, the young corpsman's helicopter had crashed, killing everyone on board. Among the wreaths of fresh-cut flowers, they find the name. His eyes filled with tears as he rubbed his fingers across the gray letters. "He was a ski bum," Jim told the Marines. "Once he kicked my butt." Quietly, Jim said the goodbye he never had the chance to say in Vietnam. At times like this, some say the wall weeps as raindrops slowly slide down the smooth black granite. James Mayton passed away in the summer of 1994. He was buried in Tennessee with full military honors. At his request, a small piece of black granite rock was added to the headstone.

"Go For Broke"

The Story of the 442nd Combat Team

by Richard Boykin

What a privilege and blessing it was to be a child and grow up in Hawaii in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Advertised and promoted as the "Paradise of the Pacific," the fond memories of those times for me remain undiminished and confirm the billing.

For almost a century, Hawaii had been America's most successful melting pot. My own family's experience was testament to that. My mother's maternal grandparents came from the Azores to Maui in the 1890s to work the cane fields. My mother's father, born in Izmir, Turkey, of Spanish and Sephardic Jewish descent, came to the islands as a teenager just in time to be drafted for World War I service with the U.S. Army.

As it is today, so it was back then. Hawaii has, since the mid-1800s, had a large Asian population. The Chinese came first, followed by the Japanese, Koreans and Filipinos. More recently, there are large minorities of newcomers from Southeast Asia. So pervasive, so complete was this integration from my childhood perspective that, on more than one occasion, I recall my own dear mother stating that "every fourth child born was Chinese." As a 5-year-old in Hawaii, ignorant of fractions, demographics or the birds and bees, it was my natural expectation that, since I was the third child in my family, if my mother were to get pregnant again my new brother or sister would, in fact, be Chinese. Long before it became un-kosher for little boys to play army with real toy guns, my childhood friends and I would while away the hours playing war throughout our neighborhoods. The popular kids, those with the neatest toy guns, got to be the Americans. The second string got to be the Germans or the Japanese. Oddly, it was most of my Japanese buddies who always showed up with the coolest stuff. Out of their fathers' closets or from old, musty footlockers came the real trappings of little boy wealth. Army mess kits and canteen cups stamped "U.S.," entrenching tools, cartridge belts, first-aid kits and even old, ill-fitting helmets. Real treasure.

By age 6 or 7, it was becoming apparent that my Japanese pals definitely had the edge in war loot. Then, I began to hear and slowly learn about a special army unit that so many of their dads had served with. Some outfit called the 100th Infantry Battalion and the 442nd Regimental Combat Team. Widely known in Hawaii, everyone simply referred to it as the "Four Four Two." I recall being a bit envious and disappointed that my own dad had not been a member.

Internment

Many reasonably informed and educated folks know the general circumstances surrounding the internment of Japanese-Americans living in the continental United States during World War II. (Japanese-Americans in Hawaii constituted roughly 160,000 of the islands' 400,000 residents. Fortunately for all, their internment was a logistical impossibility and thus they were spared.) While difficult to imagine from a 21st-century perspective, the deep-seated racial prejudices of the times, coupled with the real fear of invasion by Adm. Yamamoto's naval forces was sufficient threat to motivate President Roosevelt, a Democrat, to order the internment of American Japanese living on the West Coast. Quite possibly the most egregious abuse of justice committed by the U.S. government in the last century, the internment issue will forever be a dark stain on our nation's history.

Numerous books have been written by the men, women and children forced to experience the shame and deprivation of life inside the camps as citizens without the benefits of citizenship. As modern Americans are the undisputed world leaders in celebrating victimhood, they have been even more aggressively pusillanimous, until 9-11, in recognizing valor, bravery and sacrifice. While many are aware of the broader issues of the American-Japanese internment experience, and that odd, erudite man or woman might also be able to name a camp or two, an extremely low percentage, even among contemporary Japanese-Americans, are aware of the exploits of the most decorated unit in the history of the United States Army.

Humble beginnings

What would eventually evolve into the 442nd Regimental Combat Team had its genesis in the Hawaiian Territorial Guard. With distrust of Japanese running extremely high after the Pearl Harbor attack, the Nisei (second-generation Japanese-Americans) soldiers then serving were actually involuntarily discharged from the Guard. Unwilling to accept this flagrant slight to their patriotism and filled with the same desire to avenge Pearl Harbor as most other Americans, these eager young warriors were formed into a separate all-Nisei unit that ultimately became the 100th Infantry Battalion. The 100th Battalion was the first all-Nisei unit, although most of its officers were Caucasian. Initially staffed almost entirely of Hawaiian Japanese, the 100th would evolve into the 442nd RCT and would be fleshed out by young Nisei men from across the United States. The 442nd RCT would ultimately have three infantry battalions (the 100th, the 2nd, and the 3rd), a battalion of artillery (the 522nd Field Artillery Battalion), along with the usual supporting elements required for a regiment — medical, combat engineers, etc.

"Go For Broke"

The 442nd fought in seven major campaigns in the European Theater of Operations. It engaged in some of the heaviest fighting of the war and took horrendous casualties. The men of the 442nd were often pitted against Hitler's finest troops and never lost a battle. Their motto, "Go For Broke," was from a pidgin English expression in Hawaii which basically meant "shoot the works." Their record in combat showed that the 442nd lived by its motto. Suffering casualties enough for two or three army divisions, their skill and tenacity in combat placed them in great demand. Gen. Mark Clark said of the Nisei, "They are some of the best ---damn fighters in the U.S. Army. If you have more, send them over." While the RCT fought in places like Anzio and Monte Cassino, the battle for which the 442nd is arguably most famous and revered is their Pyrrhic victory in rescuing the First Battalion, 141st Regiment of the 36th Division, a unit comprised mostly of Texans. In a six-day period spanning Oct. 25-30, 1944, the now veteran soldiers of the 442nd would advance nine miles against a firmly entrenched enemy at a cost of 90 men per mile to reach and relieve what became known as the "Lost Battalion." By battle's end, the 442nd suffered 800 casualties to save their Texas brothers who numbered only 211 men. After the war, a grateful Gov. Connolly would pass legislation declaring all members of the 442nd "Honorary Texans."

By war's end, the 442nd had been awarded eight Presidential Unit Citations for their extraordinary combat exploits. The men of the 442nd earned more than 9,000 Purple Hearts, more than 5,000 Bronze Stars, and almost 600 Silver Star medals. A total of 680 young men paid the ultimate price in serving a country which did not yet fully value that sacrifice.

The "Go For Broke" culture of the RCT produced valor in super abundance. Ironically, through war's end only one member of the 442nd had been awarded the Medal of Honor, our nation's highest award for combat bravery. As with a high percentage of Medals of Honor, PFC Sadao Munemori died earning his. Prejudice, no doubt, had a role in minimizing the granting of appropriate valor awards to the Nisei. That said, 52 young members of the RCT were awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, our nation's second highest valor medal. Of this group, 23 earned the medal posthumously. No other unit in the United States Army would match this record of achievement, sacrifice and bravery.

Separating the 442nd further from distant rivals was the effort made in the 1990s to review many of the old valor awards for possible upgrade. In June of 2000, President Clinton awarded 21 new Medals of Honor to former members of the 442nd (an additional MOH was awarded to a Nisei soldier who served in the Pacific theater.) Of those awardees, nine had been killed in Europe and of the remaining 12, only seven were still alive to receive the recognition so well deserved. It should be noted that all but one of those receiving the MOH had earlier been DSC recipients. The story of this unusual unit and these intrepid and once young men, a unique subset of the Greatest Generation, remains largely unknown and untold. Two cultural issues inhibit the complete proliferation of information about the 442nd to the regular civilian. First is the easily explained reluctance common among most veterans of combat to discuss the horrors of wartime experiences. When all is held back, none of the greatness, the stories of special times or friendships and sacrifices shared get passed along either.

Add to this, in this group of the reddest-blooded Americans, the still admirable and prevalent aspects of Japanese culture which stresses humility and reticence and you are limiting history, at best, to only the very closest confidants or brother warriors. Were it not for the continued presence of Hawaii's senior U.S. Sen. Daniel Inouye, himself one of the seven living former DSC recipients upgraded to the Medal of Honor, there would be virtually no awareness of the 442nd outside of the Japanese-American community today.

In researching the facts for this story, I am grateful for the efforts of the late Chester Tanaka and his book "Go For Broke." Mr. Tanaka, a Nisei and combat veteran of the 442nd published his superb pictorial history in 1982. Thoroughly researched and filled with generous support from his brother soldiers, Tanaka still noted that universal tendency towards selflessness as many of the veterans, while giving critical input to his story, refused to accept attribution for their quotes.

This month marks the 58th anniversary of the savage battle to save the Lost Battalion, enough time for nearly three generations of Texans to be born and enjoy the blessings of liberty bought and paid for with Nisei blood. My sense is that few in Texas will stop to recall. Sadder, though, is that nearly as few in the modern Japanese-American community will even be aware of sacrifices made by fathers, grandfathers and great-grandfathers, or by the 680 Nisei soldiers who never had a chance at family life.

The story of the 442nd Regimental Combat Team, one of the greatest in U.S. military history, remains mired mostly in facts and figures. We know what they did and the prices they paid to do it. What we really do not know is who these young men were and why they did the incredible things they did. It is a story not just for 211 lucky Texans and the 5,000 or so Nisei soldiers, but one for all America to thoroughly celebrate. As these silent heroes approach their twilight years, we need to impose upon them one more time, to have them overcome their cultural reluctance to draw attention to themselves and tell their stories fully. With a bitter and long war before us, the legacy of this unique group of men is the perfect medicine to steel America for whatever challenges are ahead.

Memories of 1st Platoon Mike Company 3/26

June 1966 – October 1967

by Ron Swensson
December 15, 2002

In Vietnam, I didn't keep a diary or journal; it surely would have made writing this story easier. I apologize for not remembering everyone's name and exact dates. After years of purposefully blocking most of this stuff from my memory, it's difficult to recall. Contacts with friends and fellow Marines over the Internet and at reunions have helped in more ways than you can imagine.

What Am I Doing Here?

Some things a Marine never forgets. Like his ID number that appears on his ID card and dog tags (mine was 2226447). I saved a pair as a souvenir.

There are memories of boot camp that I'll also never forget. Especially the platoon's lead drill instructor's name (Sgt. Effinger) — and his nasty habit of kicking me in the shins whenever I messed up. The pain didn't go away for a long time. Little did I realize that boot camp was the Ritz Carlton compared to Vietnam.

I headed for MCRD in San Diego on February 1, 1966, after screwing up my freshman year at the University of Michigan. In my doldrums, I had read Leon Uris' book "Battle Cry," about the Marine Corps in World War II and that book just festered in my mind until I finally went down to the recruiting office. I had signed up for helicopter duty but discovered on the day I showed up for Pensacola, FL, that your 4-year obligation started when you completed OCS and flight training (2 years +/-), which meant your total commitment was more like 6 years. Instead, I opted for a 3-year enlistment as a 0311 infantry grunt. It just goes to show how stupid I was at the time.

After graduating as a Major in a ROTC-based high school where I was battalion commander my senior year, I discovered I lacked the self-discipline to do the things that would bring success at the college level. In other words, I turned into a true party animal.

My dad had pulled some strings to get me into the university in the first place. My original application was rejected, although I had a pretty good grade point average and my College Board scores were well above average. My dad had plenty of successful friends in Detroit that were U of M alumni, so I guess he went to work for me. Unfortunately, I just didn't have the heart for studying. After 2 semesters, I was politely asked not to return.

How could my life change in such a short time? I was king of the mountain my senior year in high school. Now I was a college flunkout. I assimilated the role I had earned and subsequently developed a huge chip on my shoulder. The next 3 years of my life in the Marines did little to dampen my attitude. If anything, it reinforced my belief that life is what you make of it.

Las Pulgas, Camp Pendleton

After ITR training and some personal leave after boot camp, I wound up at Camp Pendleton reporting for duty with the newly formed Mike Company 3rd Battalion 26th Marine Regiment. The history of the 3rd Battalion 26th Marines in World War II is something most Marines aren't aware of. I have an uncle who now lives in La Habra, CA, who was an artillery forward observer with M/3/26 when they raised the flag at Iwo Jima. That was the first combat they had ever seen! He never had a chance to return to the States during his 4-year tour of duty.

I was assigned to the 1st platoon in Mike Company, and our Platoon Leader was 2nd Lt. Mike Hester, a recent graduate from Annapolis and nephew of General Krulak, the Fleet Marine Force Pacific Commanding General! Mike was from a family of Marine Corps tradition, as he was the 2nd or 3rd generation Marine in his family. Many years after returning home from Vietnam, I called the alumni office at Annapolis to see if he was still alive and get his most current address. Sure enough, he had made it home, and was then the Commanding Officer of the Honor Company at Arlington, VA. After twenty-some years he was now a Lieutenant Colonel.

1st Platoon's First Sergeant was Sgt. Wade. He was so "Gung Ho," we called him John Wayne behind his back. What I learned from Sgt. Wade was that the ranking enlisted men really are the backbone of the Marine Corps rifle company. Sure, the officers give the orders and probably take the heat when things go wrong. But when it came time to get things done or when the shit really hit the fan, it was the ranking enlisted men that rose to the occasion. Sgt. Wade was old school Marine Corps. I'm sure he had time in Korea. He had excellent map and compass skills and didn't take crap from anyone. Plus his physical stature and personality were big, like John Wayne. I felt extremely lucky to have been in his platoon. He kept his cool under fire and kept us alive as a result of his stringent demands in the field. He had an uncanny skill in selecting the best men for walking point when we were on patrol.

Amazingly, when I called Mike Hester in 1987, Sgt. Wade was the highest-ranking enlisted man in the Marine Corps and was stationed with his own son and with Colonel Hester in Arlington! How's that for a family tree? A fellow Marine friend of mine from the Internet told me that Sgt. Wade had been wounded in action after kicking down a door to a "hooch" that had been trip wired to a grenade. It was good news to hear that he had survived as well. My original squad leader in 1st platoon was Sgt. Kaufman, who was the only guy in our platoon that had been to Vietnam once before. Cpl. Gill later became squad leader after Sgt. Kaufman was KIA in February 1967. Captain Richard Sasek was our company commander, and Lt. Lee Klein was our executive officer.

Captain Sasek was M/3/26's CO throughout our training at Pendleton, Hawaii, the Philippines, and Okinawa. He was relieved of duty after we were ashore at Dong Ha (if memory serves me), and was replaced by Captain Andy DeBona (whom we affectionately referred to as "Bone Head.") Turns out that DeBona was an enlisted man for 6 years before he became an officer. He was the most "Gung Ho" Marine Corp officer I ever knew and a true warrior. Some Marines question his tactics and demeanor while in Vietnam, but I think you have to remember that the NVA and Charlie were trying to kill us. So what's the big deal? It was either kill or be killed — which do you prefer?

But I digress. Las Pulgas was our new home for a while; an arrangement of dormitory style one-story buildings. Las Pulgas sat deep within the perimeter of Camp Pendleton. The place was kind of bleak, but what do you expect from a Marine Corps training facility? It was summer in Southern California. We could occasionally see the high school kids surfing off the coast of Pendleton whenever we were on maneuvers near the coast, which wasn't often enough for me. Morning overcast clouds and afternoon heat were typical for this time of year. To make training realistic, we conducted maneuvers in the high hills at Pendleton during the heat of the day. Guys would drop like flies from heat exhaustion or dehydration. Looking back at events as they unraveled over future months, the Marines in charge did everything they could to prepare us for life in Vietnam.

A couple of things I learned from our training in Camp Pendleton: First, the old school enlisted warriors from Korea or previous tours in VN were the real teachers and everyone else, including many of the new officers, were the students. Second Lt. Mike Hester was smart. He liked to travel light when in the field. Real light. Where everyone else humped a week's supply of C-rats, Hester would scrounge chow off the guys in his platoon. Most Marines were delighted to share their stuff with him. But I saw things differently. I couldn't stand ham and lima beans, and neither could he, but I'd carry them just so I could share them with him when he came calling. This twisted bit of sharing went on for the better part of a year.

Departure from Long Beach Harbor

On September 9, 1966 we departed from Long Beach harbor aboard the USS Washington. My friend Gene Weresow from 3rd Platoon Mike Company remembers this exact date because it coincides with his birthday. We have been reunited over the KSV website on the Internet. This ship was an old World War II aircraft carrier that had been retrofitted to become an LPH – Landing Platform for Helicopters. I'd never been on a carrier before, and it was kind of neat in design. It was a huge ship. Actually, a city on the water, completely self-contained.

From Long Beach we headed for Pearl Harbor where we went on some maneuvers and liberty for a week or so, then we were off to the Philippines — Subic Bay. It was in the Philippines and later in Okinawa where we became indoctrinated in jungle warfare. We slept in the field. Walked on patrols. Set up ambushes. Learned about punji sticks and trip wires. The only things missing were live ammo being shot at us, and seeing our buddies get killed or wounded. But that was coming soon enough.We spent some time on the island of Mindanao in the Philippines. Here we saw crocodiles while on patrol, and at night the rats would climb the trees and keep you awake all night with their gnawing away on coconuts. Little did I know that this was excellent sleep deprivation training, which would come in handy real soon.

Flick's Raiders

The 3rd platoon of M/3/26 was a swinging outfit. Their platoon leader was a warrant officer, Lt. Flick from my home state of Michigan. He was a good looking, lanky guy with several years' experience as an enlisted man. He was real cool with his platoon members. If I had known how to transfer to his platoon, I would have done it in a heartbeat. The guys in 3rd platoon were tight. Many of them were from New York and New Jersey. And man, did they know how to have a good time on liberty.

Back at Pendleton, about 9 or 10 of us (me, the only one not from 3rd platoon) would rent a couple taxis and go to Tijuana, Mexico, commonly referred to as TJ. When we arrived in town we would literally take over an entire bar or club down there. On occasion, we would return with one or two fewer Marines than when we started. Our comrades had been arrested for disturbing the peace or whatever. An officer would have to travel down to TJ and conduct the rescue mission. I'm sure there was a price to pay, but I was lucky and didn't get tossed into the slammer. Well, 3rd platoon's string of tradition on liberty followed it all the way to Subic Bay, PI. Where liberty was cut off at 12:00 midnight, 10 or 12 members of 3rd platoon would be out with their platoon leader after hours. Officers didn't have the same time restrictions that we enlisted men had. And me, thinking that if they can get away with it, so can I, was a serious mistake. I wasn't in their platoon, and I didn't have a Lt. Flick to stand up for me. One night after hours while out with 3rd platoon, who should come walking into the bar but my best buddy, Lt. Hester. I was busted. Hester gave me this funny smile, and next morning I was out in front of our Quonset huts digging a fighting hole (for punishment) while everyone else in 1st platoon was free to go on liberty. Sgt. Wade (I'm sure he was instructed to do so) was trying to make an example of me. So in the future I didn't stay out late after hours.

My Most Memorable Lesson

Once we left the Philippines for Okinawa, we knew we were getting close to going incountry. We just didn't know when. It was in Okinawa's Jungle Warfare School where we learned the most amazing concept about being ambushed in the jungle. And it saved our lives over and over many times. Our instructors told us that whenever we were caught in an ambush while on patrol, to turn towards the incoming fire and with our weapons on fully automatic walk directly towards the muzzle flashes and shoot like hell. They emphasized — DO NOT fall down on the ground — because there you will be picked off like ducks in a barrel. This concept was totally bizarre. We actually trained for days applying this routine using blank rounds. We practiced so many times that it became a natural instinct to respond in the manner they taught us. This one piece of training alone saved my life many times. Because as M/3/26 whenever we were ambushed, we all acted in unison, and I'm sure Charlie freaked out when they saw such discipline.

USS Iwo Jima

My memory becomes a little fuzzy about exact dates here, but sometime around October or November 1966 we went aboard the brand new LPH Iwo Jima, or so it seemed to be after being on board the USS Washington (World War II vintage). We were acting as the SLF — Special Landing Force — or "float boat" as I have heard it called. Along our journey somewhere (perhaps Okinawa itself), we turned in our M-14s for the newer, improved M-16s. We had them as our primary weapons when we were on the Iwo Jima.

One day we were ordered to saddle up. We were going incountry to set up a perimeter around a Marine Corps group that was in need of help. We flew ashore these big Chinook choppers, they looked like flying bananas with the huge twin overhead blades. They were big enough to put jeeps and such inside. This particular day there were about twenty of us well-equipped Marines inside and as we were landing; with the back ramp already down, we were taking incoming 50 caliber rounds right through the main fuselage of the aircraft. You could hear the rounds going through the sheet metal and everything in between. The Marine flight crew pushed us out that back door so fast my head was spinning. I think I landed on all fours just to keep from breaking a leg or something. Once on the ground we headed for this dike close by and I could hear the distinct "chug-chug" of a 50-caliber machine gun. We could even see the muzzle flash and smoke just ahead of us. It looked like it was elevated about 6 feet off the ground. And there was nothing but open ground (actually a rice paddy) between them and us. This is where the fun started!

We had been instructed to assemble our M-16 cleaning rods so that they were in one piece, and we taped them to the side of our barrels with electrician's tape. In case the rifle jammed, we were in a position to rip off the cleaning rod and insert it down the barrel to clear the spent cartridge that was preventing the weapon from loading another round. Guess what? I don't think I fired 5 or 6 rounds and Whamo! My weapon was jammed. I thanked the Lord I wasn't out in the middle of that rice paddy. We spent the rest of the day near this same location. The VC with the 50-cal. MG were either dying of laughter at the sight of our "continental Army" weaponry, or they had skipped down to the next province. I was so upset over using this stupid M-16 that I wrote home and asked my Dad to send me some kind of sidearm. Just in case.

We floated up and down the coast of Vietnam for a while. I prayed that they didn't send us into a real firefight situation with these stupid rifles. They did send us in a couple more times but just in small numbers, and usually to provide perimeter watch while a downed chopper was being fixed. It was at this point in time that our adventures took a little twist. We were fully expecting to go ashore somewhere in VN off the USS Iwo Jima, but that didn't happen. Instead they took us all the way back to Subic Bay, and the ship hurriedly turned around (now empty of Marines) to extract another battalion of Marines that were in some heavy battle back in Vietnam.

We wound up having Thanksgiving turkey at Subic Bay. Most everyone had dysentery by now, so the turkey just slid on through. The best part of our return to Subic Bay was that they gave us all brand new M-14s! Thank You, Lord. Christmas came early that year. There were times in the months ahead during the monsoon season where you would go a week or so without having the ability to clean your rifle in a dry spot. The rain never stopped so what was a good Marine to do? Usually, I would find a clear stream along a trail and just remove the magazine, lock the chamber open and swish the old baby in the running water of the stream. Presto magic. Worked every time. Lock and load and we're ready for action. Couldn't do that with an M-16, guaranteed.

Dong Ha

In typical Navy/Marine Corps fashion, they used "Mike" boats to take us off the Henrico and up the Perfume River to a staging area before trucking us to the firebase at Dong Ha. Welcome to Vietnam. We finally made it. One of my first memories in Dong Ha was standing in chowline with these Marines that obviously had been incountry for a long time. Their M-14's were silver, long ago the bluing had polished off. They hadn't seen a barber in months, and their uniforms were faded and "salty" looking. Plus, they had that thousand-yard "stare." I struck up a conversation with one Marine in front of me in the chowline, and wouldn't you know it, he was from my own hometown and we had even dated some of the same girls in high school. For three minutes, we escaped that place in time and I know he felt sorry for us new guys, but he didn't say so.

Our first assignment at Dong Ha was perimeter watch for a day or two. Really boring stuff. Getting acclimated, I guess. We manned these sandbagged bunkers around the airstrip there. The first morning I woke up all alone in this stupid bunker, my partner was gone to breakfast, and my rifle was gone! Deep shit, if you are a rifleman. Well, it didn't take me two seconds to figure this one out. My favorite Platoon Sgt. "John Wayne" Wade probably snuck up and stole it from me while my partner and I were sleeping. And since we had a longstanding twisted relationship already, whose rifle better to steal than mine? I remembered where his bunker was, and since everyone — and I mean everyone — was at breakfast, my rifle had to be in Wade's bunker. Sure enough, there it was propped up against the inside wall of his bunker. I knew there was a reason to memorize your rifle's serial number. One good turn deserves another. Well, I'll tell you this, I never let that stupid rifle out of my hands even when I slept, as long as we were out in the field. Being in a bunker was a little different. Wade never said a word about that incident. Out of sight, out of mind, I guess.

Christmas 1966

Just before Christmas '66 we started on this operation in Co Bi Than Tan Valley to establish what would later be known as Camp Evans, and later, Camp Eagle. We spent Christmas and New Year's on perimeter watch there. This is where I learned how to pull the pin from a hand grenade and let the spoon fly before you threw the damn thing. If you didn't, they'd come flying right back at you! If you counted 2 or 3 seconds before you threw the grenade you would get this "air burst" which was really cool. Charlie had no way to hide from those, and he couldn't throw them back at you either.

Sometime in early 1967, Captain Sasek, our CO, was relieved of duty from M/3/26 and reassigned to another company, and Captain Andy DeBona was brought on board as our new Commanding Officer. Whenever we were ready to go into the field he would say, "Let's go get some ears!" Kind of morbid when you think about it, but as we were soon to discover, once our comrades started to get wounded or killed — that's all we cared about — was getting revenge for our fallen Marine buddies. Months later I really didn't care whether I lived or died; I just wanted to kill some VC. That was about the time I acquired that thousand-yard stare.

Under DeBona's leadership, we definitely took our involvement as Marines to a new height. Our standard operating procedure for at least 4 months (before 80% of us were reassigned to 1st and 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, in April '67) was to carry a case of C-rations per man, as well as a couple hundred rounds of M-14 ammo, along with linked ammo for the M-60 machine guns, and, every man in the company carried at least one 81mm mortar round or two 60mm mortar rounds. These were illumination rounds mostly. Boy, did they make staying alive at night a lot easier. We were loaded for bear. And thanks to DeBona's planning and leadership, we were self-reliant if the shit hit the fan, which it often did.

Squad-Size Night Ambushes

One thing someone from weapons platoon will have to explain to me someday is why aren't there enough M-60s in a damn rifle company so each squad can have one at night? What we would do is completely saturate a metric grid on the map with our company. Each platoon would have its own area of responsibility, and from there we would break down into smaller size "squad-level" ambushes. We were always short one M-60 MG, so we took turns rotating being the one squad without. These were the nights when the sleep deprivation training helped immensely. As the AK-47 has a distinctive sound like no other, I'll take an M-60 anytime. When Charlie heard the M-60 start firing, he didn't tend to stick around for long. Being on a nighttime ambush at the DMZ was like ocean fishing. You never knew what you were going to catch until after you hooked on. And maybe you didn't really want what was on the other end of the line after all. Especially if it was a big, nasty shark.

I remember one night ambush when there were only about 10 or 12 of us. In customary fashion, we sent LPs down the trail in each direction to give us advance warning if anything came along. Both LPs had PRC-25 radios on this particular ambush. We didn't have an M-60, so we were dead meat if a

"shark" came along. It was just 10 or 12 of us and our fully automatic M-14s and maybe an M-79 or two in the group. Fortunately, there was no moon this night, and I think maybe it was overcast, because it was really hard to see even with the stars a-blazing. We had set up our ambush site along this hedgerow of tall grass, maybe 2 or 3 foot high. We were spaced about 6 feet apart, max. With 2 Marines at each LP, that left only 6 or 8 of us in the primary kill zone. So we covered a span of about 35 to 50 feet from one end of the kill zone to the other. I remember counting NVA regulars as they came stealthily down the trail. They had about 10 yards between each man, they knew what they were doing. If we had pulled the trigger on this ambush, we would have only killed for sure 2 or 3 in our first immediate burst of fire. All of us had enough sense about us to let this group pass our position. I had counted to 110 and stopped counting. They still kept coming. They would have decimated us if we had opened fire on them. The key to not giving away our position had more to do with the radio operators than anything else. In this situation, they had to hold down the "push to talk button" down and hold the handset so that the earpiece and receiver were up against their body. This was the only way to kill the squelch from announcing our presence. This was undoubtedly one of the scariest nights of my life. If we had had an M-60 MG I think we would have sprung that ambush. As a squad, we talked about not having an M-60 that night before we set up the ambush site. We were all on the same sheet of music when the NVA showed up. After they passed our position we called the CP and let the artillery boys do their thing.

Sgt. Kaufman — Our 1st KIA

On one of our nighttime excursions near the DMZ during the monsoon season of 1967, we actually set up a platoon-size ambush site right next to an NVA Regular battalion. It was raining hard when we set up our ambush site about 4 o'clock in the morning. It was about an hour before first light when we finally settled down. As daylight rose, so did the NVA. We could smell the fish sauce they used for their rice along with the smell of their tobacco, which smelled like marijuana to me. They were so close to our position that we could hear them talking incessantly. Vietnamese and Chinese sound very similar to me — short, choppy, one-syllable words strung together.

After about an hour of this nonsense (at this point we had no idea how many NVA there were) their point man started to move down the trail. There was do doubt about it, we were in the NVA's backyard, not ours. One piece of information they forgot to share with us in Jungle Warfare School back in Okinawa was that the point man for the NVA sometimes checked out a suspicious looking area along the trail by "reconning by fire" (as we came to call it). The NVA usually used an AK-47 for this task, so it became easy to know who was shooting at whom. For some reason the Marines never used this tactic that I ever saw, but it did the job it was intended to do. Once their point man shot off a few rounds all hell broke loose. In this instance, we hadn't taken the time to dig fighting holes, we were too wasted from trucking through the jungle all night. So we just flattened ourselves to the earth as close as we could. There were still rounds flying everywhere (mostly theirs) when Sgt. Kaufman, my squad leader, stood up to see where the NVA were. Unfortunately, he didn't have his helmet on, and he caught a solitary round right in the middle of his forehead. I was right next to him when this occurred.

It wasn't until the firing ceased that I realized what had happened. Sgt. Kaufman never let out so much as a peep of sound. The entry point of the wound looked like a minor cigarette burn. Sgt. Kaufman was the only Marine in our platoon that had been to Vietnam before, and he was everyone's inside source for asking about things to come. He also was our platoon's first KIA. It was a sad occasion for all of us. He was truly looked up to. I know he had a wife and child back in the States. I also remember the sad look on Sgt. Wade's face as we left the ambush site and started a sweep of the area for anything we could find.

An amazing thing happened just as the firefight was winding down, before we started our sweep of the area. Down the hill from above came our commanding officer Captain DeBona with Gunnery Sgt. Ortiz close behind. DeBona had his 45-caliber pistol drawn as he was trucking down the trail to find out firsthand what the hell was going on. This was a pretty gutsy move since there were still NVA in the area. Capt. DeBona called in an artillery shoot that included our entire battery of 105s. The NVA never knew what hit them. Gunny Ortiz stood on this ridgeline above us and was shouting orders at Frances McGuire and me to check out this little clump of bushes near our ambush site. Frances carried an M-79 grenade launcher, and thus was provided a .45 pistol as a sidearm. We poked around these bushes half-heartedly and walked on. Gunny Ortiz was infuriated! He yelled back at us to get on our hands and knees and crawl inside this clump of bushes. Well, I let Frances take point on this one, and sure enough, there was an NVA ammo humper hiding inside this clump of bushes. He had a half dozen Chicom grenades with strings coming out of what looked like a bamboo handle laid out in front of him. This NVA was so strung out on drugs he could hardly move. Frances emptied his .45 in this guy from less than 10 feet away and the guy still could crawl away from us. I was disappointed in the firepower of the .45. Together, we dragged this NVA up the hill to Gunny Ortiz who had an interpreter there to help question him. All in all, this was a sad day for 1st platoon M/3/26. We had lost one of our best men this morning. I became enraged. Somebody was going to pay for this.

Mail Call

It was time for Mike Company to get a little break time back at Camp Evans. A shower, some warm food and mail call were in order. On this particular day there were some surprises. My dad had come through. He sent me a Browning 9mm "Hi Power" pistol with extra magazines and ammo. It kind of looked like a .45 until you put it in a holster. The magazine was about twice as wide as the .45s. There were a few other unique safety features of this weapon that Colt Manufacturing could surely learn from.

The magazine held 14 rounds, plus one in the chamber — you could have your own mini-firefight with one magazine. The safety features were what impressed me the most about the Browning. Even if you had a round in the chamber (which is the only way to carry a weapon like this in the field) once you removed the magazine, you could not fire the weapon. I don't care how hard you tried; once the magazine was removed the weapon was safe. Most accidental discharges from 45s that I ever saw were from supposedly empty weapons.

Another feature I liked was the half-cock safety. Often times when sleeping in a fighting hole at night, or other strange places, I would sleep with the weapon loaded, a round in the chamber, the safety off, and in the half-cock position. This way the pistol was safe until you thumbed the hammer back all the way. Too bad it wasn't double-action. I was glad to have it handy many times. Now that we had our M-14s back, there wasn't really a need for it. In fact, I never actually fired it in combat; however, I slept with it like a sweetheart (when I wasn't sleeping with my M-14.) It may sound funny, but that's exactly what we did on nighttime ambushes.

You didn't want your weapon next to you. You wanted it in your hands pointed in the general direction of the kill zone while you slept. Locked, loaded, a round in the chamber and the safety on. That way when the shit hit the fan you were instantly ready for action — well, almost ready. During this same mail call, my friend Rick Szabo from 3rd platoon received a surprise package from his mom who happened to be a nurse. She had gotten some small medicinal bottles that held about 5 or 6 ounces each and had filled a whole shoebox full of them with Canadian Club whiskey. Hard liquor wasn't found real easy in Vietnam. We were told we were going to be at Camp Evans for a while (little did I think that it would only be for a few hours), so Rick popped open a couple of these small bottles for him and me. At the time, I weighed about 135 soaking wet. I had weighed closer to 155 when joining the Marines. The Canadian Club was definitely relaxing. Almost too relaxing. Next thing I knew we were saddling up to go back on patrol. We each grabbed our case of C-rations (12 meals for 6 days in the field), filled our canteens, grabbed as much ammo and grenades as we could possibly carry and off we went. As we left the perimeter, there was a pile of 81mm illumination mortar rounds waiting for us to grab one on the way out. 1st Platoon was point as we left the perimeter. After the company cleared the wire, we sat down alongside the trail and let the platoon behind us move forward to take point. 1st Platoon was going to be rear guard. Although I wasn't exactly smashed from drinking several ounces of that Canadian Club, when I sat down next to the trail I fell sound asleep. When I awoke, the entire column had gone by my position, and left me there all alone! Boy, did I panic for a few seconds. I scrambled down the trail as fast as I could without making too much noise.

Fortunately, the rear of the column was less than a hundred yards away. That was the first and last time I drank hard liquor in Vietnam.

Cigarettes and Leeches

There was a span of time when we were working out of Camp Evans that it rained 82 days straight! The only thing that wasn't completely soaked was the matches and cigarettes I stored on the top of my head inside my helmet. Prior to this time I never developed the habit of smoking, but here it became a challenge. Believe it or nor it was little things like this that helped you keep your sanity, or what was left of it. In the lowlands, where there were a lot of bamboo trees, leeches would be everywhere.

In fact, if you stood still on a trail and looked around you on the ground, your body was like a magnet. You could see dozens of leeches heading your way as if they had built-in radar. In spite of everything we did to keep them from getting inside our uniforms, there was always a way for them to find bare skin. We learned not to extract them by pulling them off our body, but by using a burning match or insect repellent (mostly alcohol) to get them to let go.

On one occasion a very large leech, about as big as my little finger, during the night had somehow gotten inside my trousers and had attached himself to my penis. I discovered him after first light that morning, and wasn't really thinking very clear. My natural instinct kicked in and I grabbed my insect repellent and douched the leech and me. Too late. The leech fell off, and it felt like my member was going to fall off as well. I hit the ground rolled up in a ball. I'm sure my buddies got a laugh out of it. It took about 45 minutes for the effect to wear off so I could at least stand up. Sgt. Wade wasn't too happy about my delaying our getting out of where we were at the time.

Post Script

In June 2002, the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines had its fifth biennial reunion in Ennis, Montana, the summer home of Andy DeBona, our host. I have only attended one other reunion, and that was the KSV reunion in San Diego in September 1999. So I don't have a lot of experience to draw from in these matters. However, the two reunions were quite different. My first with KSV, I went alone without my wife, Karen. Frankly, I wasn't sure if I could handle the emotional side of this affair and really didn't want to embarrass myself in front of my bride of 32 years. This KSV reunion was wonderful in every way. I should have brought Karen along; she would have enjoyed it. The worst part was having to leave on Sunday after four days of camaraderie. So many memories had been resurrected from the past that I didn't trust myself with facing my fellow Marines and saying good-bye. I snuck out the door like a dog when it came time to leave for the airport. What a schmuck I was.

Attending the KSV reunion was the culmination of over a year of contact with Marines over the Internet — like James Everley, Jacob Krygoski, Frank Taggart, Joe Cote, Tom Kilgore, Steve Sneed, Gene Weresow, and Joe Olszewski. Not all of them attended this KSV reunion (my first), but I know they wanted to be there if they weren't. To give you an example of the type of things that occur during these reunions, let me mention just one incident that took place on Saturday during the KSV reunion in September 1999. As part of the four-day program, we attended an MCRD graduation ceremony out on the main parade deck at San Diego boot camp. As we were walking from the buses towards the bleacher stands on base, I witnessed 3 or 4 members from "Charlie" Battery 1/13 who ran into each other for the first time since being at Khe Sanh during the Tet offensive in 1967. It turned out these 3 or 4 Marines had shared the same bunker for months and hadn't seen each other since they departed Vietnam. I had met one of these former artillery Marines the night before, and it turned out he lived a mile from my house back in Denver!

My second reunion was this past June 2002 in Ennis, Montana. I had planned on attending for the better part of a year, and this time Karen was going to go along. She wasn't sure what to expect but afterwards, was delighted that she came with me. There were plenty of other wives at both reunions. We were among friends. The next reunion for 3/26 will be in Reno, Nevada in June 2004. The next KSV reunion will be in Charleston, South Carolina next Fourth of July (2003). Both are on my calendar right now; wouldn't miss either one if it can be avoided.

Attendance counts at the 3/26 reunions for the first four had a high of 83 or so from what I heard. The attendance in Ennis was 243! The events subsequent to September 11th 2001, I am sure made an impact. Where for 32 years I refrained from even mentioning my association with the Marine Corps on a resume, now all of a sudden it was OK! The feeling being amongst close friends at the Ennis reunion was completely unique. I met guys I hadn't seen in 35 years. And one even thought he saw me mortally wounded on a medical evacuation helicopter. Seeing remembered faces and reliving old events helped me feel like I once again was part of the human race. From that perspective alone, the entire trip paid for itself. And, yes, there were some guys who snuck away without saying good-bye. But I know from firsthand experience what that was all about, so I don't hold it against anyone. Half the battle of life is just showing up.

The History

The history of mankind points out many examples of ordinary men performing extraordinary things under enormous external pressures. These next two articles represent a moment in time. Our Nation and our Corps were responding to the crisis developing in South Vietnam. Marines responded admirably. With the activation of elements of the 5th Marine Division in 1966, there was an enormous internal pressure to "grow' infantry — both officer and enlisted — to answer the call to arms in Southeast Asia. The first article provides a detailed look at one Basic School class that answered the call. The second provides a close look at the Marine Corps and one small corner of our Nation as the North Country in New York gave the best there was to give in protecting the freedom of all Americans and our allies overseas. The irony is that the number of names etched in granite on the Vietnam War Memorial in Washington, DC is almost the same for both groups. Heed once again the saying on this month's cover, and say a prayer of thanks for the brave men who gave everything they had to give to preserve liberty for you and me.

Basic School Class 6-67

The Tip of the Spear

Marine Officers Sixth Basic Class of 1967 (BC 6-67) convened on 7 June and graduated 498 second lieutenants on 1 November. BC 6-67 sent more lieutenants off to battle and suffered more officers killed or wounded than any Basic School class since the Korean War. The huge size of BC 6-67 was the result of the Joint Chiefs' request to the White House early in 1967 for an additional 200,000 men for the escalating war in Vietnam, plus the activation of the 5th Marine Division at Camp Pendleton in June 1966. In July 1967, President Lyndon B. Johnson reluctantly agreed to an increase of 50,000 men for the war effort. The Marine Corps had long been under pressure trying to deal with the acute shortage of officers caused by the number of Marine forces that had been committed to Vietnam. The number of Marines serving in Vietnam had increased a staggering 45 percent from July 1966 to July 1967.

The Marine Corps Commandant at that time, General Leonard Chapman, Jr., aptly described the manpower headaches that the Marine Corps was experiencing when he stated, "There are just three kinds of Marines: those in Vietnam, those who [have] just returned from Vietnam, and those who [are] getting ready to go to Vietnam!"

Most of the officers in BC 6-67 came from the huge 44th Officer Candidates Course (44th OCC) that started in March 1967 with 715 officer candidates, and graduated 585 new second lieutenants on 2 June 1967. In the 44th OCC class were 187 officer candidates from the newly expanded enlisted commissioning program that was used to fill the critical shortage of officers. Joining BC 6-67 were 67 officers that came from the Platoon Leaders Class, about a dozen "fallen angels" (lieutenants who had not completed flight school in Pensacola), and 20 other officers from various Naval Reserve Officers Training Program.

The Basic School in 1967 was commanded by Col. E.H. Haffey, and the class was made up of Companies N and O with 250 officers each. Major Russell Kramer commanded Company N, and Major Carter Swenson commanded Company O.

The Basic School in 1967 had been condensed to 21 weeks of instruction which meant that the workweek included half days on Saturdays with just a few exceptions. The course syllabus had been modified to double the number of hours allocated to land navigation based on feedback coming from the Western Pacific (Westpac) that new lieutenants needed greater proficiency in map reading.

The demand for infantry officers in Vietnam had mandated that fully 70 percent of the class had to be designated as basic infantry officers (0301). Retired Col. Swenson recalls not feeling comfortable in having to assign some of the officers to infantry military occupational specialty and more than several in the class did not want to be platoon leaders but had no choice. Unbeknownst to U.S. military leaders at the time, Communist leaders in Hanoi had made a decision early in July 1967 that would directly impact BC 6-67 and change the course of the war. This decision was to launch an all-out offensive in South Vietnam in January or February 1968.

Preoccupied with the long hours of classroom and field instruction, plus late nights on night patrols and compass marches, not many of us realized what we would face in 1968. We were confident of the firepower and technology that was on our side but could not imagine the stealth, deception, and surprise tactics that we would see in doing battle with the North Vietnamese Army (NVA). The NVA were particularly adept at constructing mutually supporting firing positions that were almost undetectable until too late.

After graduation from The Basic School on a crisp fall day on November 1967, approximately 300 new second lieutenants had West Pac orders, either after a short leave or after completion of a formal school such as field artillery or the combat engineers course. Ninety-four officers in the class went on to flight training, including 15 ordered to U.S. Air Force flight schools because of the backlog of officers waiting to start flight training at Pensacola. BC 6-67 officers setting foot in Vietnam in December 1967 and January 1968 were soon to enter a hellish maelstrom of fighting that was inconceivable during our final weeks at Quantico. In 1968 there were more Marines killed or wounded in Vietnam than during any other year of the war.

By mid-December some of the single or more eager lieutenants were arriving in Da Nang en route to either the 1st or 3d Marine Divisions. A short time later, names of our classmates started showing up on the casualty reports being sent out. On 18 December 1967, 2ndLt. Michael Ruane from Brooklyn, NY was the first to be killed after just 9 days as a platoon commander with Company M, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marines (M/3/7) in Quang Nam Province. Thirty days later, two more officers were killed in action, 2ndLt. Randell Yeary's reconnaissance patrol was ambushed on Hill 881 North and 2dLt. Thomas Hoare would posthumously be awarded the Silver Star medal for heroic action leading his L/3/4 platoon against an NVA company west of Gio Linh near the demilitarized zone.

A number of BC 6-67 officers found themselves in the 77-day siege at Khe Sanh and the deadly hill fights on Hills 861, 881 North, and 881 South. Marines at Khe Sanh Combat Base would be subjected to days during the siege when over 1,000 enemy artillery rounds would land inside the perimeter. Several of our classmates would also experience the terrifying nightmare of having their platoons or artillery batteries overrun by North Vietnamese sappers. In The Basic School an often heard refrain from the instructor staff was, "What do you do now, lieutenant?" On 16 February 1968, 2ndLt. Terrence Graves was brutally confronted with that phrase when he was seconds away from safety as he and his 3d Force Reconnaissance team boarded the UH-34 helicopter that was going to extract them away from over 200 pursuing NVA soldiers. When 2ndLt. Graves realized that one man was unaccounted for, he immediately jumped off the helicopter. Graves was joined by Cpl. Danny Slocum and PFC James Honeycutt who did not want to leave 2ndLt. Graves alone in the search for the missing team member, whom they found severely wounded. 2ndLt. Graves and his men were hopelessly outgunned in spite of calling in supporting arms from every source available. When a second rescue helicopter from VMO-6 came in to extract the four Marines, it was riddled with gunfire as it was lifting off the ground and crashed, killing all but Cpl. Slocum who managed to evade the NVA soldiers until he was rescued a day later.

In July of 2001 at The Basic School, Graves Hall, student officer housing, was rededicated in honor and memory of 2ndLt. Graves. Terry was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor for his actions on that fateful February day. At The Basic School, we received instruction on combat in a "built-up area," and all of us knew well the few cinder block two-story structures that made up "combat town."

Instead of the make-believe combat town at The Basic School, 2ndLt. Leo Myers from Alva, OK found himself in the ancient city of Hue, the third largest city in Vietnam with a population of 140,000 people. More than 5,000 NVA troops comprising 16 battalions had taken over the city on the second day of Tet — 31 January 1968. For 12 days, 2ndLt. Myers led his 1st Platoon, H/2/5 Marines in the bloody street-by-street fighting against an enemy that was so fanatical that some NVA soldiers were found chained to their heavy machine guns to ensure that they would not flee against the attacking Marines. 2dLt. Myers would be the second classmate to be awarded a Silver Star for his heroic actions on 11 February 1968.

BC 6-67 officers were now being killed at a rate of more than one per week through April 1968, and the second NVA offensive, labeled "Mini-Tet," was still to erupt in May. 2ndLt. Thomas Keppen was a platoon commander with B/1/3 that was operating with Battalion Landing Team 2/4 (BLT 2/4). The Marines of BLT 2/4 found themselves in one of the bloodiest battles of the war where they went up against two NVA battalions that were spread out along the Bo Dieu River northeast of the Marine Combat Base in Dong Ha. During this heavy fighting in what would be known as the "Battle of Dai Do," the Marines would suffer 81 killed and 300 wounded in the 3-day battle during 30 April to 2 May 1968. On the first day in this battle, 2ndLt. Keppen's company came under withering machine gun and rocket-propelled grenade fire while crossing the Bo Dieu River in an amphibious assault on top of an LVTP-5. Before that day ended, all of the officers in B/1/3 had been killed or wounded and six months after The Basic School, 2ndLt Keppen turned over command of his platoon to SSgt John Gavel, who at the young age of 22 assumed command of Bravo Company. 2ndLt. Keppen would live through this battle only to die from wounds received in a mortar attack early in July 1968.

From January to November 1968, BC 6-67 lieutenants would be awarded 17 Silver Star Medals, 2 Navy Cross Medals, and 1 Medal of Honor. Another nine officers would be medically retired from wounds suffered in Vietnam in 1968. By late summer of 1969, BC 6-67 officers who had gone on to the Navy flight school in Pensacola or Air Force flight training in Texas began to be assigned to Vietnam. Four of these aviators would be killed during the next 12 months, including lstLt. Bernard Plassmeyer, flying with VMA-311 when his A-4E went down near the A Shau Valley southwest of Hue. lstLt. Plassmeyer had been the honor graduate for the entire BC 6-67 class.

The last classmate to be killed, LtCol. William Higgins, had returned safely from two tours in Vietnam and in 1988 was serving with the United Nation peacekeeping mission in Beirut, Lebanon, when he was captured on 1 February and executed by terrorists while in captivity. In April 1999, the USS Higgins (DD 76) was commissioned and named in his honor. Any one of the rest of us in BC 6-67 could have ended up with our names on the Vietnam Memorial Wall along with the 44 fellow officers and friends that we lost. The men in BC 6-67 were long ago stirred by President John F. Kennedy's inaugural words: "We shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship...to assure the survival and success of liberty." Let us never forget our classmates who did not return home.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE: After reading this article, it brought back memories of the outstanding officers I had the privilege of serving with during my 8 years in the Marine Corps. In war and in peace, they performed their duties well beyond what was expected of them. While attending our KSV reunions, I was struck by the similarity between Marine Officers and Police Officers, which had never occurred to me in the past. Police Officers tend to stay together as a group because at every social function we attend, there is the person telling a story of an incident they had with a "cop" while receiving a traffic ticket. I haven't heard them bragging about the cop who saved their life, or returned a lost child. As it is at many reunions, I hear stories about officers' mistakes, but few (thankful) recall the heroic actions like those mentioned in the article above. I am sure we would have more of our officers attending in the future if we are more sensitive to their feelings, appreciative of the fine multitude of their contributions and in tune to recognizing their acts of heroism and leadership qualities as well.

The North Country Remembered

by Jack Glasgow
Reprinted from the November issue of The Marine Corps Gazette, with permission

The measure of men is often reflected in the standing they have in their communities. Lonely souls come and go and are oft tossed on the trash heap of humanity. In 1966 a community came together. Thirty-six years later the bond is still as strong, and the patriotic fire, once ever so bright, has not dimmed through the years. This is a story about "Hometown America" at its very best in Clinton County, NY.

Hometowns are identified by the three Ps — place, people, and personality. My narrow definition of the "North Country" is Clinton County, NY. The place, or location, is the northeastern most corner of New York State. The County Seat is Plattsburgh, the "jewel" of the North Country. Growing up there, we called it "God's Country." It still is. Bounded by Quebec on the north, Lake Champlain on the east, and the Adirondack Mountains on the west, it is paradise on earth.

People combine to make a place a hometown. There are many cities in America with sprawling suburbs of bedroom communities that become no more than transitional stop-offs in a nomadic lifestyle. That's not the case with the North Country. Generations feed upon generations. Roughly 80,000, from the last census, call Clinton County "home." Many thousands more of us long since removed, brag about our hometown of Plattsburgh — the roughly 25,000 citizens that have become the identifiable magnet drawing us back home over the years. Familiarity and trust are built over time. The small towns and villages witness the spirited growth of youth and fierce competition on athletic fields. As youth gives way to maturity, your fiercest opponent becomes your best friend. Families in one town link to families in others through marriage, work, and play. The network is strong, and the bond is unbreakable.

Personality is the defining characteristic of a hometown. North Country citizens are proud of their heritage. They are passionate, and they are patriotic. They don't whine, and they are not afraid to jump into a fray and help straighten things out. But I think the one thing that defines their personality more than anything else is the pervasive sense of community and the obligation one has to participate for the greater good of all. And in the patient mode of seeking the greater good — you may just see a swagger or two, a bit cocky, perhaps — but not arrogant.

The North Country Platoon

In the early 1960s, North Country boys would graduate from high school and go to college or enter the job market. Some were drafted into the Army. Others volunteered to go into the other services but after the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962, thoughts of patriotism and love of country were far from the minds of North Country youth. That all changed with the Marines landing in Chu Lai, Republic of Vietnam in 1965. The Marines ramped up recruiting and as forces increased in size in Southeast Asia, the need for Marine infantry kept escalating. The need would be greater the following year with the activation of elements of the 5th Marine Division.

I watched the escalation from a comfortable student perspective at Cornell University. My turn would come through Marine commissioning in the Summer of 1966 from the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps program. I knew deep down that the politicians and the State Department would have everything settled by the time I would finish college, Marine schooling, and enter into the Fleet Marine Force in the spring of 1967. Comfortable in my surroundings, I did not realize what was going on back home. Marine recruiters in Plattsburgh were hard at work answering the call. Patriotism was at an all time high in the North Country, and the efforts of GySgt. Bob Brady and SSgt. Charlie Appleton bore fruit. A number of volunteers were able to convince their buddies to join and by the end of January 1966, the local recruiters were able to ship a "North Country Platoon" of 25 young men, with 23 of them from Clinton County. The Plattsburgh Press-Republican ran a feature on the sendoff at the bus station on Wednesday, 2 February 1966.

These young men comprising the North Country Platoon were not all young boys coming out of high school. A good many of them had been to college or had been working. Cadyville's Mike Norcross had been with me in Ithaca for 3 years as a student at Ithaca College. All felt it was time to take stock of the situation, put aside education and careers, and answer the Nation's call. Many signed up for a 2-year enlistment program. Recruit training at Parris Island was arduous but something these young men could handle with ease. The North Country Marines were integrated into Platoon 338 and graduated on 31 March 1966. They were smiling and holding the sign donated by a local sign company in Plattsburgh and brought to Parris Island by a Plattsburgh area contingent of family and friends. The euphoria of enlisting and training together was somewhat dimmed by the sobering fact that fully 90 percent of Platoon 338 would be on orders to Vietnam.

Cold, Sobering Reality

Recruit training was followed by infantry training at Camp Lejeune. By June the initial skills training was complete and a number of the North Country Marines were home on leave, headed to Camp Pendleton and then overseas with their new units. I crossed paths with a number of them at a local bar 2 nights before I was commissioned into the Marine Corps. They were all in their Marine Summer Service "C" uniforms. Some I had played ball against in high school. Some had my mother as their high school English teacher. Some I had worked with as a teenager in the North Country. They were headed to Vietnam. I would join some of them 10 months later. The common denominator that evening was a collective euphoria, a group of the best our country had to offer volunteering to go over and fight for freedom. I'm sure we all thought we would be back drinking pitchers of beer together in another year. Regiments of the 5th Marine Division were forming up in California that summer and several of the North Country Marines wound up together in Company I, 3d Battalion, 26th Marines, known to the Marines as "India" 3/26. Three would make it to Vietnam along with a fourth, Steve Greene, who was born in Plattsburgh and moved away at an early age. He was made an honorary member of the North Country Platoon. The three musketeers were Mike Norcross and Tom Goddeau of Cadyville (my mother was their English teacher in high school), and Mike Conley of Plattsburgh. I had worked with Mike and his brother, Tom, at a local grocery store the year before. As they went through training at Camp Pendleton, none of the four could imagine what was in store for them in a few short months.

Support From Home

The personality of the North Country came to the fore in support of their Marines from the time the young men left on the bus on 2 February until they came home for good. It started with the publicity for the enterprise at the bus station on that first day. It continued at Parris Island with local WIRY radio personality, Tiny Hare, a former World War II Marine in his own right, visiting the North Country Platoon during recruit training. He made another visit to the Marines in Vietnam and brought back tapes of interview for local consumption.

The greatest effort at support and morale boosting came from the family networking back in Plattsburg and the surrounding communities. Bernice Conley, mother of one of the 3/26 stalwarts, organized the mothers back home. She started a newsletter and got a number of the other mothers involved. They painstakingly kluged together the addresses of all of the Marines in the North Country Platoon and solicited information about the Marines and what they were up to. She printed the monthly newsletters and distributed them to Marines overseas and to their families back home. Others helped her, and various volunteers helped her pay some of the postage. The networking newsletter was so popular that it spread way beyond the original intent maintaining contact with the North Country Platoon. Soon it encompassed all local service men serving in Vietnam and around the world. This networking kept us all informed in the combat zone and allowed many of those listed to link up while "incountry." In addition, it facilitated more letter writing to families and friends back home. Speaking as one on the receiving end of the newsletter, it had a huge impact on morale for the North Country boys in combat. At its peak in May, the list included 95 names. Sixty-one Marines, with 33 "in-country" — others were on orders to Vietnam. Some were still in boot camp. Others were in St. Albans Naval Hospital on Long Island recovering from combat wounds. In addition, there were 34 names of North Country boys in the other Services.

A Heavy Price

In Vietnam, as in most wars, the infantry is always the bill payer. Casualty rates in 1967 and 1968 were very high. The 3d and 5th Marine Division regiments and battalions were spread out all along the demilitarized zone with the 1st Marine Division elements near Marine Amphibious Force Headquarters in Da Nang. India 3/26 paid its dues at Khe Sanh and Con Thien among other places. So did the Marines of Echo 2/9 pay heavy dues around Con Thien in May and June of 1967. Fire-fights, ambushes, mortars, rockets, and hand-to-hand combat always take their toll. Some of the North Country Platoon members earned up to three Purple Hearts. The slightly wounded Marines always wanted to return to their units. In the end, Mike Conley and Tom Goddeau joined 44 others from the North Country in making the ultimate sacrifice to further the cause of freedom. MSgt. Charlie Jock, a North Country native and head of the Plattsburgh recruiting substation in the summer of 1966 after the Vietnam transfers of both GySgt. Brady and SSgt. Appleton was instrumental in working the casualty calls and providing assistance to the grieving families.

Support Continued

The networking back home never ceased. Grieving took place in its natural form. Letters of condolence and offers of support came flying back from all around the world. Gears were shifted. The cheerleaders and purveyors of care packages became Gold Star Mothers, joining the ranks of Clinton County mothers who lost sons in World War II and Korea. If you ever get to Plattsburgh, you have to check out Trinity Park. It is a beautiful, square memorial park downtown across Margaret Street from the county courthouse. In that park you can see the handiwork of the Gold Star Mothers. Clinton County gave 269 of its sons in World Wars I and II. It gave 19 in Korea and a heavy toll of 46 in Vietnam. The efforts of Bernice Conley, Gladys Goddeau, and many others witnessed the installation of the Vietnam plaque in 1969. These photos show the Gold Star Mothers at the memorial in February 1979, and the memorial plaque as it looks today. The support continues through today, fully 36+ years after the platoon headed to Parris Island. The North Country salutes its own fallen heroes each Memorial Day in May, as well as each Veterans Day on 11 November. And on the Marine Corps birthday, each year on 10 November, the surviving members of the North Country Platoon quietly raise a glass and toast the Corps, wherever they may be, in quiet recognition that when the call came, they answered it with pride, dignity, and honor.

A final manifestation of the continued local support was the establishment of the North Country Vietnam Veterans Association. Its motto is "Vets Helping Vets," and members have a strong collective voice in furthering veterans' benefits to its fellow members. In addition, the organization provides scholarships and performs charity work as well as participating in patriotic parades.

"Echo Taps"

If you are ever in Yorktown, VA on 19 October, known to the locals as Yorktown Day, go out to the huge monument overlooking the York River. Each Yorktown Day there is a ceremony at the monument. It ends with a lone bugler playing the Civil War melody "Taps." On the other side of a ravine about a hundred yards away, a second bugler, out of sight of the first, plays the same melody. A few notes from the first, followed by the same notes from the "echo," This continues until "Taps" is concluded. It is haunting and so apropos. It makes you concentrate on what's really important in this world. Whenever I hear "Echo Taps," I can't help but think of my friends who didn't come back. They might have been doctors, lawyers, maybe even priests. They would revel in the knowledge that Mike Norcross had a very successful career as a teacher and that Steve Greene retired as the Deputy Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration and is now working at the House of Representatives. They might even smile knowing that the English teacher's little boy became an editor. But they can't, and they never will. So we salute the North Country Platoon. We salute the 46 servicemen who left nothing on the field of battle. And we salute the Gold Star Mothers who work feverishly to keep the memory of their loved ones alive. May the day come when the olive branch becomes supreme. Until then, the North Country Platoons of the future will answer the call, and we will all be proud of them.

A special thanks to Mrs. Bernice Conley for her assistance in writing this article, as well as for her untiring efforts on behalf of her "boys." In addition, a special thanks to Mike Norcross, Steve Greene, and retired Marines MSgt. Charlie Jock, GySgt. Charlie Appleton, and LtCol. Dick Moore for information and photos included in the article, as well as the Marine Corps Recruiting Command and SSgt. Daniel Briehl for the photo of the Vietnam plaque.

Nicknames and Marines

Our Own Bruce "T-Bone" Jones

Excerpts from a Story by Col. James B. Wilkinson
Leatherneck Magazine, Nov. 2002

In years past, nicknames were common throughout the Marine Corp. Are nicknames, like lace-up leggings and the MI rifle, part of the "old Corps"? Are they a bit of nostalgia, out of touch in today's Marine Corps?

How do nicknames come about? Physical attributes are the most obvious way to acquire one. You don't think up a nickname for yourself then have everyone start using it. They are bestowed on Marines, and many last throughout one's lifetime. "Old Gimlet Eye," "Brute," "Manila John," "Howlin' Mad Smith," "The Big E," "Chesty," "Big Foot," and "Herman the German" come to mind when the subject of nicknames is reviewed. In the 1930s Marines were patrolling the jungles of Nicaragua searching for anti-government bandits. Wilbur Brown was a young officer leading a patrol when his boondockers (high-top shoes) fell apart. A message was sent requesting a pair of new boondockers. A single-engine Marine Corps plane appeared and dropped one replacement shoe, then flew away. The plane soon reappeared and dropped the second shoe. The pilot included a note explaining that because of the size of the shoes, the small aircraft could deliver only one shoe at a time. From that day on, young Wilbur Brown's nickname, Big Foot, stuck with him throughout his career.

All of these colorful nicknames belong to "Well-Known, Higher Ranking Marines." When Colonel Wilkinson wrote this article, he insisted that nicknames attributed to the everyday fighting Marine, be included. Thus, our member of the Khe Sanh Veterans is being honored with the recognition of our own "hero," Bruce "T-Bone" Jones.

Cpl. Bruce "T-Bone" Jones

Nicknames are bestowed more frequently in combat. Why? Probably because in combat Marines serve side by side, day in and day out. Keen observers pick up any idiosyncrasies or physical attributes quite easily when living, eating and fighting alongside each other for harrowing days on end. In 1967, Corporal Bruce E. Jones was a 21-year-old forward observer with an 81mm mortar platoon at Khe Sanh. Having served in Vietnam several months, he had lost weight. Once, when Jones was returning to Hill 881 after a patrol through the triple canopy jungles around the hill, a member of the 81mm mortar forward observer team looked at him and exclaimed, "Dude, if you lose any more weight, you'll look like a T-bone steak without any meat." The name stuck. Later on Cpl. Jones was seriously wounded and evacuated. He recovered and returned to his unit in time for the Battle of Khe Sanh in January-May 1968, where be was wounded a second time.Thirty-six years later, Bruce Jones retired from a career as an industrial engineer. He has embarked on a new project: building a Montana-style house for his family in La Crosse, Wis., where he is known by one and all as T-Bone.

Marine aviation squadrons have had nicknames for years. There are the Night-Hawks, Batman, Grey Ghosts and Vagabonds, to name a few. It is rare for infantry units to have nicknames. Perhaps the aviation Marines are a bit more free-spirited than their infantry counterparts. There are a few nicknames for infantry units. The Ninth Marine Regiment was known as The Striking Ninth.

In Vietnam, the 1st Bn, 9th Marines, 3rd Marine Division became widely known as The "Walking Dead." The unit served in combat for 48 months. There are more than 600 names of 1st Bn, 9th Marines etched on "The Wall" in Washington, DC, honoring those killed in action in Vietnam. The battalion fought with valor and courage in Operation Starlite, Leatherneck Square (Con Thien, Gio Linh, Dong Ha and Cam Lo), Mutter Ridge and other heavily contested areas of I Corps (the northernmost part of South Vietnam, just south of the demilitarized zone). Repeated contacts with the North Vietnamese, coupled with heavy casualties, explains why 1/9 Marines became known as The Walking Dead.

In the early morning of 21 Jan 1968, the North Vietnamese attacked Khe Sanh. The ammunition dump took several direct hits and then exploded. Several North Vietnamese divisions, well armed with everything, including 152mm artillery surrounded Khe Sanh. Just when it seemed that things couldn't be worse, 1/9 was flown into Khe Sanh. While welcoming the experienced and combat-tested battalion, some Marines had other feelings about 1/9 arriving. Lieutenant Ernie Spencer, "Delta" Company commander, 1st Bn, 26th Marines, commented that while things were already grim at Khe Sanh, the situation would get worse because, "The Walking Dead could step in fresh manure coming out of church."

Retired Col. Wesley Fox earned his Medal of Honor with "The Walking Dead."

Those with 1st Bn, 9th Marines fought with valor and distinction at Khe Sanh, making some of the strongest contributions and ensuring Khe Sanh did not become an American Dien Bien Phu. They also performed with distinction during operations in the A Shau Valley, specifically Operation Dewey Canyon. It was in A Shau Valley that Lt. Wesley Fox won the Medal of Honor while serving with 1/9. The nickname The Walking Dead has not only survived the past 35 years, it has flourished. First Bn, 9th Marines has its own website, which claims that The Walking Dead was the only unit in Vietnam to have its own North Vietnamese Army Regiment attached to it. The Ninth Marine Regiment was deactivated years ago. The regimental colors can be viewed in the Marine Museum at Camp Pendleton, CA. Time passes and things change, but heroism is not forgotten.

Nicknames frequently are bestowed on colorful Marines, who combine charisma with ability. In recent years, critics of the U.S. military frequently assert that management has replaced leadership. As a result, it has been said the military has become homogenized and Marine leaders who manage rather than lead are motivated by so-called "zero-tolerance." Make one mistake and your career is over. Risk-free management was not a trait of Chesty Puller, Major General Smedley D. "Old Gimlet Eye" Butler or Brigadier General Hiram I. "Hiking Hiram" Bearss. They led by example.

Based on the outstanding performance by Marines in recent conflicts, leadership is prospering throughout the corps. A visit to Parris Island S.C., or San Diego will reveal that drill instructors and series commanders are dedicated to providing topnotch Marines and Marine expeditionary units and aviation.

Memoirs

by Talis Kaminskis

The clouds had been present all day. The once young Marine had been watching them on and off. No sunshine this time. Only a lighter continuation from one night to the next. Shortly, darkness would descend upon the land and once again, as he had so often in the past thirty years, he would sit in a world of wishes and dreams. From off in the darkness came the memories. Presently, the angels would sing in the sky above, but there were never any words or music. Alone sitting, he listened to the chorus he was so familiar with. So many times he composed for them. So many times he practiced for them. And there were periods of time that he actually thought he directed them. But that was the softer part of each night. Inside himself, the apprehension grew. He could feel the stirring of the yearnings that soon would engulf his world. Very little changed from night to night but yet somehow, each night seemed to bring a rebirth. A retelling, a re-evaluation, a new hope. One more patrol, he begged. One more time to feel the fear of hunting and being hunted. The natural high of an adrenalin rush that had built over days. One more; one more; one more of what? Inside frustration built. So much seemed to have been left unfinished when he left. Only at the time it did not seem so. But with the passage of days, turning to weeks, to months, and then years. The euphoria of coming home disappeared, replaced by gnawing threads that soon began to weave together. He had found his thoughts returning more and more to the war he had so desperately tried to remove himself from.

Frustration. Small growing seeds of wanting to relive, and re-change; to alter that which cannot be altered. The habit of taking refuge in the darkness of the night just seemed to happen. Without intent, he found himself searching it. At times, he seemed to sense movement. At first, only brief blurs. Unadjustable focus. Illusionary images not sure to be believed. But the darkness came, and the darkness went. And each night seemed to refine, add another stroke to the canvas. Slowly came the realization. It was the night patrol. Never having lost their touch of smooth, deliberate motion. Quietly stepping, unhurriedly. The shape of figures slowly carrying out deliberate tasks. Young, stealthy, prime specimens of manhood, easily able to carry out their task. His being tensed, as every fiber of thought and emotion seemed to focus on only one thing. Joining them. Being a part of them. Doing the one thing in his life he Understood. But alas, his body mocked him. Even just sitting, there were aches and pain that never left. Discomforts that grew with each passing day. Yet his mind refused to let go so easily. In the distance, shadows hinted at the outline of the gone jungle. His feet felt damp within well-worn boots from the water of many rice paddies they had carried him through. Softly, caressingly, a well-known weight extended from his hand. Glancing up into the enveloping night, he realized he was lagging just a short distance from the group. Only a few quick steps, a slight hurry up, and he would be amidst them again. But his learned knowledge rebelled at the thought of hurrying at night. Desperately, he cast glances at the shapes moving back into the tree line. Haste brought risk, and risk endangered all. He was losing them. They would soon be gone.

Each time the same predicament, each night the distance so insurmountable. Intently he gazed at the distinct bodies, watching for them. Knowing their procedure, their style, and their goal. He wanted to say something but realized the faces; he could not discern the faces. He knew each and every one of them. But he could not see them. Something separated his ability. He knew them, but it was as though he couldn't. Frustrated, tantalized, tense, his body slumped. In a small sign of despair, he cradled his head in both hands as if in prayer. A deep silent breath seemed to help ease the load. A whisper floated from the distance, "I have to know." No need to seek whose voice was responsible. Mockingly, this night as before, there would be no reply. A slight shaking of the head, an imaginary pain, an excuse to shift his body again. Hands in his lap, one thumb rubbing the other, he let the sadness come. He knew the destination of some. Others had left a blank in all he knew of them. What was it like? What did they feel?

Had they really aged? Or were they as young now, as they were then? The rubbing of the thumbs caught his attention. The darkness could not hide everything. On the contrary, the darkness had become a cruel mistress. Tantalizing him, teasing him. He knew the real darkness. The cruel twist of fate darkness that rather than hid, revealed. It was that the darkness opened, lay bare the multiple paths, emoting back much more than what was offered it. Provided the weight to be carried when the sun ruled the heavens. Damn it, in his self pit, he missed the last glimpse of the receding shapes. Gone was his connection to the deeper feelings. In place another cause, another excuse, and more guilt to ponder. He stared into the darkness, well aware of where he was, and when it was. Thoughts came and went, time passed by without notice. Providing comfort only he could understand. So much, so much. He let his hands join together on his stomach. Tilting back the tired head. He listened to the angels as they sang in the sky above. And for another night, they sang without words or music.

Just Words on a Page

by John Watson

When I was in high school back in the 60's, I, like most of the guys my age — thought with our zippers, more than our brains. What the heck, we were young and had the world by the ass. It was the week before Thanksgiving 1964, everyone at school was thinking of only three things: The Thanksgiving Day football game against Conrad High, the "victory dance" that Friday night, and what time mom was going to have dinner on Thanksgiving. Wednesday, the day before Thanksgiving, I got suspended for horsing around in class. Now, all that was left was a long weekend with nothing to do.

January '65 rolls around, and I meet Linda. She was one of those girls that you dream of. She was 5'8" tall, and on the slim side. She had all the right stuff in all the right places. She was a strawberry blonde, had peaches and cream complexion, and the bluest eyes I'd ever seen. After a few dates I asked her to go steady, and she said yes. I thought I was king of the world! We saw each other each day, during and after school, and even on weekends. I couldn't get enough of her. One of our favorite pastimes was a long walk by ourselves in the woods. She'd fix lunch. I can still feel the chill of the fall or early winter winds. We would walk for a while, rest and just sit quietly, watching squirrels looking at us, wondering just what these two humans were doing out in their woods. We'd huddle together to keep warm; a kiss from her was all I really needed.

Our relationship was a good one. We were compatible. Our family backgrounds were similar. We both were from families with several kids. I'm the oldest of eight. She was the second of seven. Our goals at the time were the same. It was as if we were made or placed on the earth for each other. January was a bad month for me. I was again taken to the school office for getting into a fight with another student. The principal was in a foul mood, and the timing of my appearance in his office didn't help. I was summarily expelled. My father was a stern man possessing very little humor. When I informed him of what had happened, he told me I needed to find a job — soon. I worked at a job taking inventory for low pay, and got a lot of hassle from my parents. The worst part was the little time I had for Linda. I was sitting at home one night thinking that I didn't have a job, a trade, or education. It just dawned on me to go into the service to get the education, and maybe make it a career. Either way, I thought I'd be somebody and could support Linda and myself.

January 20, 1965, I put on my winter coat and boots with there being over 2 feet of snow on the ground. I kissed my mother and told her, "I am going to Wilmington to sign up for the service."

"Just be sure you're back by dinner," she said not looking up. What could I say except, bye mom. I get on the road, start thumbing, and a state trooper picks me up and takes me to the Customs House, where all the recruiters were located. I joined the Corps on the 25th of January 1965. During all of this, Linda was taking it all in, was very loving and supportive. We started to make long-range plans for our future after boot camp, when I learned where I was to be stationed. On becoming a proud Marine, it was off to Camp Lejeune to join D/l/2, weapons platoon. We had a Caribbean cruise and came back just before the holidays. When we returned to Camp Lejeune, the whole battalion received orders for West Pac.

I go home on holiday leave, telling Linda that I have orders for Nam. She gets real upset — I didn't know that she was pregnant at the time and that she had miscarried two days later. She became depressed for about 3 to 5 months. We became closer as time went on, looking forward to our getting married when I got back from Nam. While in Nam, we wrote every chance we could, she and my mother become close. I'm surviving just to return to her, and, our future together. It was in May of 1965, when I returned to my hometown, re-entering my world with the highest of dreams. Who was standing there? No parade. No crowd, just my mother, and a brother. No Linda.

We met that evening. She sat across from me. No small talk, no romantic smile, as she had in the past, which wasn't that long ago. She proceeded to tell me that she was getting married to someone else. All I could say was: " Why? What went wrong?" She had just "played me along" so I would have something, some reason to want to come home. She had been seeing a guy for 3 or 4 months and wanted to marry him, but not me? After setting off this bomb for me, she gets up, says good-bye, and walks out of my house and my life. I never see her again. My mind was travelling at the speed of light, yet I felt stuck, as if I were in a hardened cement. I couldn't get it straight in my mind what had just happened to me. I looked at my parents, they knew what was happening but couldn't, or wouldn't get involved. I was in such a mess and couldn't comprehend or sort out what had gone wrong or what I could do to correct it. It was a total and complete betrayal of all I was, believed in or hoped to be. I remained drunk my entire leave, with a mother of a hangover every day.

It is thirty-five years later, and I still think of that period of my life, and what has happened since. I am 55 now with my health not being anywhere as near as what it should be. I have had several bouts with pneumonia and a bout with testicular cancer that nearly killed me. I've been disabled and unable to work since 1983 and have been married four times, my being at fault for the first three. I have a daughter who wants nothing to do with me with a granddaughter I will probably never see. I have had more than 24 different, unrelated jobs. All I can say is, thank God for steering me to my present wife. She is the reason I got off my ass and finally went to the VA to receive help. I am blessed for being with my wife of nearly 21 years, who couldn't be replaced by a million Lindas. She is my rock, and whom I love with all of my heart.

Before & After

We are starting a new series of articles entitled: "Where Are They? BEFORE and AFTER." Articles written by members detailing their lives prior to, and after Vietnam. Joseph Olszewski has volunteered to help members who wish to publish their Life Experiences and has submitted the first in the series.

Joseph Olszewski – Before and After

I was born and raised in Chicago and hated every minute if it. Besides being an "only-child," unless you were into museums or the Cubs there was absolutely nothing to do on the North Side of Chicago. I went to college simply because none of my relatives had and they pressured me to pursue it. My father worked for 52 years for Brunswick Corporation and probably had the very same Manager of Shipping and Receiving job for 30 years. My mother worked as an invoice typist for Borris Smolers, which made women's clothing. Neither of my parents spent one day in a high school classroom.

James Olszewski in field in Vietnam.

My senior year at the University of Illinois was 1966. During the 60s, once you were certain to graduate from college every branch of the military began sending you literature to become an officer, pilot, language specialist, embassy liaison officer or about 1,000 high-tech jobs. I had heard that if you joined the Navy or Air Force as an officer that you would spend more time managing equipment than men (and a few good women, too.) Plus, the Army, Navy and Air Force all required four-year commitments, if you graduated from Officer Candidate School (OCS). The Marine Corps made it very clear that as an officer you would manage men and not equipment and their officer program only required a three-year commitment after OCS. Since the economy was strong in 1966, only spending three years in the military made sense to me and I thought that managing men would look better on my future resumes. Thus, I decided to join the USMC as an officer after graduation. I remember I toyed with a childhood dream of being a pilot but that required four years of active duty after you graduated from basic flight school. I further thought that with a degree in Accounting that the USMC would make me a supply officer or some sort of computer specialist. I remember thinking that combat officers were probably only former football players with degrees in physical education. During that fateful Spring, I took a written examination one day that was supervised by a sergeant. I remember the sergeant entered the room when time was up, but I hadn't fully finished the examination. He was a big, baldheaded guy, and I remember he said, "Take your time, son." My conclusion from that response was that the USMC was short on officers.

I graduated from the U of I in August 1966 and was originally scheduled to attend OCS at Quantico, Virginia in October 1966. But, within a month I received a letter from the USMC informing me that the class was full and that I was re-assigned to attend OCS in January 1967. I was elated as I was able to secure my first job as an Internal Auditor for Warwick Electronics in Niles, Illinois and, therefore, I would be able to save some money before I entered the USMC. That first professional job paid me $550 per month and I was excited because I was now making more than my father's $330 per month.

I left for OCS from O'Hare International Airport on January 16, 1967. I remember I met other guys at the airport who looked as lost as I did. Until that day, I had never flown and this was to be my first flight experience. All of us boarded the plane and compared notes about how much we had prepared for OCS. We had previously received guidelines about physical preparations; such as, being able to run three miles. I remember thinking that must be for OCS candidates who attended in the Spring or the Summer. Surely, they wouldn't make us run three miles in the Winter snows? I also remember that first flight was fantastic and if I had previously known flying was so great, I would have tried to be a pilot.

I remember sitting in a classroom around the second or third week and saying to myself "what in the world did I do?" The drill instructors, the constant mental and physical pressure, the few but always non-smiling officers, the pain, the cold, the crazy way we ate fast and the long three mile runs in the snow were nothing but disbelief to me. Every week they cut somebody from the program and if you flunked out of OCS you were headed for Parris Island as a PFC. During those tough three months, I remember thinking "I thought the USMC was short on officers?"

The best thing that every happened to me during OCS was liberty. The first weekend we had received liberty a few of us drove to Washington DC, checked into a hotel and promptly went to dinner at some restaurant to finally have food we could eat at a leisurely pace. I think there were five of us and at least two candidates were married.

After dinner we were returning to the hotel as we had a written test coming up at OCS on Monday and some of us wanted to study. As we approached the lobby of the hotel, three other USMC OCS candidates were coming out of the hotel. It was easy to spot us, as we all had the same haircuts and were wearing clothes that were too big for our suddenly leaner bodies. One of the three leaving the hotel stopped us and asked if anybody wanted to go on a dinner date for eight. They had pre-arranged a dinner date and there were four girls and three candidates. As I later learned, one candidate had broken his ribs the week before on the obstacle course and that's why these three were looking for another male replacement that evening. Since we had just had dinner and since two others in our party were married, none of us wanted to attend this dinner party. I remember turning to walk into the hotel lobby and saying "No, thank you." But, then I remembered how hard it was for me to get "dates" in college and I knew I would be stationed at Quantico for seven or eight months. Written tests in OCS were easy for me and I still had part of Sunday to study. So I changed my mind and said something like "OK, I'll go."

That dinner date was how I met my wife of 34 years now. Her name is Rosemary and she had more to do with me getting through OCS than two male drill instructors.

Rosemary and I dated every weekend I could get away from OCS and, later, Basic School. The Basic School tests were easy, the physical training was less strenuous than OCS and being an officer was suddenly a power trip. I also still had the thought that the USMC would assign me to a supply command or a computer operation. I never knew until later that Congress restricted the USMC to 400,000 men (and now a few good women, too) and when a Korea or Vietnam surfaced, EVERYBODY (excluding the really brilliant) were combat infantry, period. If I remember correctly, 70% of my Basic School class was classified 0302 – combat infantry officer. The other 30% went to artillery school, basic flight school, tank school and the really brilliant went to language school. To make a long story short and to keep within the biography theme of this article, I became a rifle platoon commander, could not believe the characters the USMC gave me to command, stepped on a mine in late February 1968 and spent seven months in the Philadelphia Naval Hospital.

During my seven months in the hospital, I had a lot of time on my hands. Thus, I studied the various upscale living locations across the country and related labor markets, while Rosemary planned the wedding. I had no desire to return to Chicago to watch the Cubs and Rosemary had enough of working for the government. I always loved the outdoors and I remembered those long, cold Chicago winters when one had to live indoors for five to six months straight.

One day I was reading a magazine and on the back cover there was a picture of people with their trailer tent camper in Yosemite National Park. I knew at that moment that California was for me. I told Rosemary that weekend and she was ecstatic. My parents were not happy, Rosemary's parents to this day do not understand how I made such a radical decision, and all our other relatives and friends were shocked.

We were married on October 19, 1968 in Arlington, Virginia. I had previously traveled to California for job interviews with Crown Zellerbach, which was a paper manufacturer, Kaiser Hospitals and some cement company. Crown had a beautiful green building right in the San Francisco financial district. I had one interview with several managers and when I returned to the hotel room there was a message waiting for me. It was their job offer as a Senior Accountant with a starting salary of $750 per month. That was $200 a month more than my first job as an Internal Auditor in Chicago and about $400 more than I had been making in the USMC. I thought I was instantly wealthy.

Rosemary and James Olszewski, 1968.

We had the wedding in the morning, a reception in the afternoon, boarded a flight for California at night and arrived at San Francisco International Airport at 3:00 AM, Sunday, October 20, 1968. There we were all alone. No family, no friends, no car. All we had was each other, our luggage and wedding gifts. We caught a cab ride to Oakland, where I had previously arranged for an apartment while I was interviewing.

After a week or so of honeymooning in San Francisco, I started working for Crown Zellerbach. Rosemary started looking for a job and eventually secured a job with Chevron Corporation as an Economist. I remember thinking the first week or so at Crown that everybody looked so old. We all sat at separate desks in a big room. This was in the days before computers and every accounting project was performed on huge twelve, fifteen and twenty column papers called "worksheets." After a few months, Crown believed in moving new hires around various Accounting Departments to give us more experience. Within three months I worked in the Tax Department, the Internal Audit Department, the Financial Statements Department and the General Ledger Department.

After about a year-and-a-half, I was bored stiff working for Crown Zellerbach. There were no promotions, men who had been with the company for twenty to thirty years held the top jobs and since I had worked in all of the Accounting departments already, there was nothing new for me to learn. Even worse, I had just left the USMC and was used to bossing around forty to fifty 18-year-olds, calling in artillery or air strikes, making life and death decisions and misreading minefields. In this job I was simply shuffling papers in a corporate office. I missed the responsibility level I had become accustomed to in the USMC, and nobody was calling me "Sir" anymore.

One night I was watching TV and there was a special on Stanford MBAs who were about to graduate. One MBA said that he was tying to secure a job with a small company, as small companies were not afraid to delegate responsibility. That made sense to me and shortly I had my resume on file with a job placement firm. Within a few weeks I was granted an interview with a small computer leasing company called Boothe Computer Corporation. The company wasn't even five years old and the entire staff was on one floor. The "one floor" was the 50th floor of the Bank of America building in downtown San Francisco. This was 1970 and there were no high rise buildings in San Francisco taller than the Bank of America, which was 52 stories tall. I interviewed with the Chief Accountant, the Controller and the Vice President of Finance. I was twenty-seven years old and all these men were in their early-to-mid 30s. I got the job and a $1,000 per month salary.

At first, I was in charge of the General Ledger which meant closing the books every month. Then at the end of the year, I was the liaison with the CPA firm that performed the year-end audit. I loved every minute of it, including the ten to eleven straight Saturdays I had to work to finalize the year-end close and audit. The 50th floor of the Bank of America was so tall that often it was above the perpetual fog that came in through the Golden Gate Bridge every afternoon. In later years when traffic helicopters began flying even they flew at altitudes below the 50th floor of the Bank of America. All of us also worked in small cubicles and the building had huge windows so we could see San Francisco Bay and the sparkling Blue Pacific. I remember one day I stood up and looked around to see the Bay, the Pacific Ocean, fog rolling in and traffic control helicopters flying below us and said to myself, "I made it." In other words, all the college work, OCS, Basic School, Phu Bai, Khe Sanh, Philadelphia Naval Hospital and Crown Zellerbach Corporation were behind me and I truly had become successful — in my small, Polish mind. But, that feeling of success didn't last long. Soon, I was promoted to the Consolidations Department, which was responsible for preparing all the financial statements for the parent company and all of the domestic subsidiary companies. It was hard work with monstrous overtime and ever-increasing pressure. Boothe, at that time, not only leased IBM 360 computers but also made display screens, dabbled in software production and started a separate venture capital company which bought smaller computer-related companies. My job was to train the accounting staffs in all of these subsidiaries to insure that their financial statements were accurate and received by me in a timely manner to perform the overall consolidations. Some nights I worked until 10:00 PM. I loved the responsibility but after three years of this, it began to get old. Also, IBM launched the 380 series of computers and suddenly nobody wanted to lease IBM 360s from Boothe Computer Corporation. Lastly, this was 1973, I turned thirty-years-old and there were no other jobs in the company that I was qualified to perform. Our son, Chris, was born in 1972, Rosemary was no longer working for Chevron, inflation was on the rise, the prime interest rate was 12% and I had a brand new mortgage – $550 a month. I thought I was headed for bankruptcy.

One day I was reading the "want ads" and saw an ad for a financial statements accounting manager for a small family-owned company that made vitamins. So far, I had worked for an electronics company, a paper manufacturer and a computer leasing operation. Here was a company making vitamins and expanding with subsidiaries in Canada and Europe. Vitamins!!! I had never heard of a company that made vitamins. This company was called Shaklee Products, as that was the name of the founder, Dr. Forrest Shaklee Sr.

I interviewed with the Controller. He was one of those hippie types with long hair as he had graduated from UC Berkeley with an MBA, but his head never left Berkeley. He reported to Forrest Shaklee Jr., who was so jealous about his brother that the two of them were not on speaking terms. Thus, I had my doubts about this company, as there were some very peculiar personalities around.

But, I remembered how bad Boothe Computer's balance sheet looked with all the debt they had incurred to buy all the IBM 360 equipment that they could no longer lease. Thus, during the second interview with Shaklee Products I remembered my Vietnam days about gathering as much intelligence as I could about the enemy, and I stole Shaklee's balance sheet from that hippie controller when he wasn't looking. I took one look at that balance sheet and couldn't believe my eyes. Not only didn't they have any debt; they had more liquid assets than product inventory. But, they were also a direct selling company (meaning they sold products door-to-door) and I had no experience with the direct selling industry. However, I had a neighbor who sold Amway, so I later checked with him to determine if he had heard of Shaklee. I remember his words: "Shaklee, yeah they're real competitive and a pain in the neck for me as they are into biodegradable products and customers eat that up." Vitamins, biodegradable products, a balance sheet that could choke a water buffalo? I called that hippie controller and told him I would take the job. He said how's $20,000 a year and all the vitamins you can eat sound? I said, "Great."

That was August 1973. I remember sitting in the personnel office the first day and feeling scared, as here I was thirty-years-old and I was about to begin my fourth professional job. As I mentioned, my father had worked for the same company, Brunswick, for 52 years. Even his father, my grandfather, worked for Brunswick for 30 years as a cabinetmaker. So far, Boothe was the longest I had worked for any company — three years. I thought I was the family black sheep.

In the beginning, Shaklee was a great company. They made vitamins, cosmetics, household and industrial cleaners and the money flowed in like a Vietnam monsoon rain. I was in charge of the financial statement consolidations once again, but these subsidiaries were in Ireland, France, England, Germany, Australia and Canada. All the employees, except the family members, were twenty and thirty years old.

We worked hard, partied harder and made money like there was no tomorrow. By the mid-70s, we doubled our revenues. By the late 70s both manufacturing plants were operating on three shifts of production. We were one of the first companies in the Bay Area to have profit-sharing for employees. There seemed no end to the company's continued success and growth.

By the mid-80s, business began to slow down. Inflation was low, something called high-tech companies began luring the younger employees and everybody wanted to push keyboards instead of doorbells. By 1986, the dreaded "L" word — layoffs — began to appear. At one point, 40% of the staff was fired. I remember saying "Well, they're not going to shoot me." In brief, all that humping around in the jungles and rice paddies of Vietnam was paying dividends. I was simply above the fear and anxiety of being laid-off. It never bothered me as I worked hard and remembered from my USMC training to develop rapport with management while the company was doing well in the 70s. Granted many of them were fired during the 80s, but somehow I survived along with those who trusted me. We basically watched each other's backs and stuck together — wonder where I picked up that habit?

When the 90s began, a whole new senior management team was in place. Once again, I had to build a rapport with them to survive. This was 1995 already, and I had worked for Shaklee for 22 years and held every accounting job from plant controller to assistant controller. We could hardly turn a profit, we couldn't recruit people to push doorbells for a living and I had lost hundreds of friends. Suddenly, everything I had enjoyed about the company was falling apart.

One day I had to give a speech at an employee picnic. I simply did a recap of all the five senior management teams I had worked with for 22 years and, as per my personality, I spiced it up pretty good. Some people couldn't believe how open and honest I was in describing the personalities of all these teams. Two employees who admired my openness were the senior lawyers in the company. They mentioned that they were looking for somebody for a new position in the legal department. They wanted somebody to write company policies and procedures and to reorganize many of the company departments that had become fragmented and uncooperative. Since I had no legal background, I was initially not interested. But, as I continued to become more disenchanted with the direction of the company and the now boring job of international financial consolidations, I once again changed my mind and said "OK, I'll go." That was 1995 and I continued in that position until December 28, 2001 when I officially retired from corporate life. I enjoyed that last position within the legal department so much that now I wish I had pursued law school after leaving the USMC.

That's the story of my life. I made radical decisions, I changed my mind a several times, I never regretted those decisions and I always learned to adapt to my environment. Wonder where and how I inherited those skills?

PS: If you would like to see your life's story written in this style, but are fearful of writing sentences and paragraphs, contact me via snail or email and I will do it for you. I'll simply send you a form to complete and once I receive it, I'll write a "draft" for your review and approval.

Christmas Treasures
by Bill Person

Old Cap'n Kidd, a pirate bold
He sailed the bounding sea,
And buried treasures of jewels and gold,
But his secret is known to me.

I sought them for my Christmas wish,
To send them all to you
The jewels are days of happiness,
The gold is dreams come true.

Each diamond is for purist love,
To fill one's soul with glee.
You'll see them when you look above,
In the stars that shine for thee.

A ruby is a memory, it makes the heart to sing.
Pearls are for wisdom's sake to do the best we can.
Each precious gem's for that little thing,
That lasts our whole life's span.

The silver is for a dearest friend,
We've kept through year on year.
Such trust and care, it has no end,
Their love we so endear.

Each of these treasures, I gladly share,
Their meaning now is told.
They are precious beyond compare
And worth more than merely gold.

Please take these gifts, I do implore
To share with our human race.
Tho' I wish it could be much more
To make the world a better place.

There's no treasure chest I could imbue
'Neath some desert island's sand
Can match these things I wish for you
On the Christmas star so grand.

Khe Sanh

Khe Sanh combat base everywhere red clay
The Marines were sent to hold this place many with there lives they did pay.
Death comes quickly in this place
Fifty five thousand NVA surround our base.

The Marines on the hills around the base
Every night the NVA they must face.

Artillery and mortar fire about them nothing can be done you just sit and hope to your hole the big one does not come.

Death is grotesque by artillery and mortar round
Most of the time all the pieces can't be found.

Many good men we've lost on and around this base
I see them in my dreams face after face.

We held Khe Sanh it did not fall
I know now it was not worth it all.

In my mind Khe Sanh will forever stay
This place of blood soaked red clay.

Treasures of the Mind
by Bill Person

As a youth, I wandered thru fields and in the wood.
I picture still those places where it made my heart feel good.
Each season was a favorite, they all had much to share,
It mattered not the time of year, to venture there, I'd dare.
I had no clue of treasures stored up for later life,
And give me such a comfort to salve my pain of strife.
The spring, it was a promise of a divine, eternal plan.
In summer time, the flowering, with fragrances all so grand.
Then came the turning, bright colored leaves did fall,
Of browns and gold and burning reds, crisp air-- I loved it all.
Oh winter was a wonder with white mantle on the ground.
It set one's heart a-racing like a coursing windy sound.
Yes, the times all were magic. I've locked them in my mind.
These mem'rys are my friends, so dear. I go back for peace to find.
These thoughts stir up mem'rys and often bring back tears.
But left behind are hardships, dimmed through passing years.
Still plainly in my mind, I see family and friends, I loved them so.
Fleeting days took them away to where someday, I too, will go.
In days, I lose their number, I've kept my mem'ry's golden glow.
I go inside when e're I can, to be with the dear ones I know.
My heart is warmed each time I think about the things I dearly love.
'Twill do me now, I know for sure, 'til I join them in heaven up above.
Such priceless dreams, they are but thoughts, yet they truly bless all mankind.
I know of no greater joy in life than these treasures of my mind.

Notes From The Secretary

Dear KSV Members,

Well here we are guys, already 2003 — hard to believe, isn't it? Next reunion is coming real soon. Everything is running pretty smooth. Brian Mahoney, our reunion chairman, has got it under control. I have contacted a few Bird Dog Pilots who stated they are going to attend. I am working on finding a few more. I hope most of you know we are going to South Carolina, not North Carolina, as shown on last reunion form. We have also added a trip to Fort Sumner, included a trip to the USS Yorktown.

Parris Island seems to be getting a lot of attention and a lot of husbands are taking their wives. There is a lunch and shopping trip for wives who do not want to go to boot camp. Looks like its going to be a big Reunion with many old members (no pun intended) and many first-timers coming. It should be a great time as usual.

Thanks to all who ordered items from the PX fundraiser and to all who put in a donation with their annual membership. There are some less fortunate who will receive a magazine because of you. You guys may not think you are the best, but you're the best I've ever seen.

The Pepperdogs is a must read for all of you who are interested in the modern way of war. Bing is a former Force Recon type and Assistant Secretary of Defense. Set in Kosovo, it gives one a good perspective of modern grunt capabilities and the problems associated with command and control in the "joint and multinational" arena. Lots of good stuff on the

West Dickens Avenue: A Khe Sanh Memoir

by John Corbett
Published By Ballentine Books, Jan 2002

from Publishers Weekly:

John Corbett's short, readable account of his days at Khe Sanh during the Siege while serving in a mortar platoon with the 26th Marine Regiment. Described in almost dispassionate prose and in great detail. His brief, staccato sentences effectively convey his last nine months in Vietnam, during which he saw plenty more combat. His brief description of his less than overwhelming homecoming reception rings true. The book's odd title comes from a discarded American street sign Corbett found while digging his personal foxhole.

Copyright 2002 Reed Business Information, Inc.

from Booklist:

Khe Sanh has slowly assumed its place as one of the most famous of American battles during the Vietnam War. General Giap himself masterminded the siege, thinking the time propitious for a wholesale American collapse on the order of Dien Bien Phu. Corbett's is an eyewitness account, but he has sifted through every history he could find so that readers will understand both the enemy's movements and the thinking of the Marines. While he is no Phillip Caputo, he develops suspense about whether he will make it through the battle unwounded and which of his buddies will die. They die on nearly every page. Of course, the Marines do survive, and their bravery lives on. Semper Fidelis: 36 years later, Corbett does them proud.

from The Men Who Served At Khe Sanh:
from A Khe Sanh survivor

"West Dickens Avenue: A Marine at Khe Sanh" is one of the best books about a Marine fighting for survival during the Siege of Khe Sanh that I have ever read. It was so realistic. While reading it, my mind returned to that God-awful place. His description of the living conditions and state of mind of those enduring all that he described, is simply terrific. Although I never met Jack, he will always be my brother. I am grateful that he brought our Khe Sanh experience to so many through this wonderfully written book.

Jack Pessoni, A Co 3rd Engineers

another Khe Sanh Survivor:

Jack Corbett, in his book "West Dickens Avenue," wrote a brilliant, accurate, and humorous account of his time at Khe Sanh. I truly enjoyed reading the book. It was so realistic. Finally, someone wrote a book from the private's view of combat at Khe Sanh. I would recommend this book to all who enjoy truism in combat. His adventures from the time of enlistment, serving in combat, and the return to an ungrateful nation, was superb. You have done the Khe Sanh Veterans a great favor — thank you brother.

Jack Corbett served in Vietnam with H&S Company 1/26, 81MM, during the Siege of Khe Sanh. He now lives in Key Largo Florida. West Dickens Avenue is his first book.

PUBLISHERS NOTE: "West Dickens Avenue" was named Military Book of The Month. There were several more letters praising Jack's book that were not published due to space constraints.
It is available in hardcover at Amazon.Com. It lists at $24.95, reduced to $17.47.

Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man

by Ernie Spencer
Published by Corps Productions (Ernie's new company)

I have read almost every book written about Vietnam and a place called Khe Sanh. Ernie Spencer's book "Welcome To Vietnam, Macho Man" (both versions) is the best, or among the best written. He brings a different perspective to the responsibilities endowed to a front line combat officer. Unlike most books about Vietnam, which deal with the horrors of combat, Ernie lets us experience other facets of life at Khe Sanh. Besides the horror of war, there is humor, honesty, and even anger. It is extremely difficult to explain to a civilian population the vast responsibilities of a front line combat officer commanding a group of young Marines whose lives are entrusted to him. Ernie Spencer does it with an honest, simple writing style, which destroys a lot of myths created in other novels written by those who have not served in combat. His research was done in the trenches and fighting holes with the young men he led in combat. It is one of those books you cannot put down. It makes you feel you are there with the young troops he is commanding. It should be a reference guide for all those training to be Marine Corps officers. This new release was done by our graphics guy Leo Wong. It has a stunning cover and pictures.

Those who want to publish their memoirs can contact Ernie for consideration in being published by his company.

"Macho Man" is an extraordinary, riveting account of Vietnam. Of the hundreds of books on Vietnam I have read — Spencer's work is the the funniest, the angriest, and the most honest. It is a riveting right of passage. It lights up truth like a tracer round.

The author is part Korean and all Catholic, and his blood and his beliefs are both put to the test. He saw it all — the big battles like Khe Sanh and the small daily conflicts that ate away at your soul and your guts. If you were there, you know this is the true stuff, the things we all felt or knew but seldom had the courage to say.

This book is about truth. By the time I finished I wanted to start all over. Spencer lets it rip. He is the kind of Marine you'd want at your back during battle and by your side with a brew after.

William Broyles, Jr., author (Brothers in Arms), screenwriter (Apollo 13, Castaway)

Ernie Spencer's "Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man" is a compelling, uncompromising, sensitive and relentlessly accurate diary of one Marine's experience during the worst year of the war in Vietnam.

Spencer, a well-regarded Marine Company Commander and a gifted writer, shows us the Vietnam War as no other writer has. He is faithful to his Marines, to the hard and gritty facts of combat, and to himself as he captures the language, attitudes and feelings of those Marines who endured the Siege of Khe Sanh.

If you truly want to feel the Vietnam War, I recommend a ride with the Macho Man through Vietnam and beyond.

Chuck Patterson, author (The Petrified Heart)

For those who recall only a handful of good books about Vietnam, here is another to add to the list. Spencer writes with a light style, a sense of humor and an honest simplicity. A joy to read.

Health News

Former Corpsman, William P. Miller, L Co 3/26, writes:

Dear Tom,

I received my Doc Medal and certificate. Thanks so much. Due to my health problems, I was not able to make the reunion in Irving, Texas. I did manage to attend the 3/26 reunion in Ennis, MT. For me, it was one of those special reunions. Many of the original members of the "Filthy Few," 2nd Platoon, Lima Co 3/26, were in attendance. For most of us, it was the first time we had seen each other in 33 years. There were a lot of hugs and tears. We also managed an awful lot of smiles. The stories began to unfold. Friendships that had been kept in everyone's heart were rekindled. It was a healing and holy experience. On the other hand, it was also the opening of "Pandora's Box."

Ever since I had been diagnosed with Porphyria Catonea Torda (PCT) in the mid 1980s, I wanted to satisfy my curiosity regarding the extent of the symptom among the brothers I served with. PCT is a liver dysfunction that occurs naturally in one in 30,000 people. It, along with diabetes, peripheral neuropathy, and other disorders has been directly related to herbicide exposure. Having all three conditions, I became suspicious. It did not take long for me to meet other veterans who also had the same condition. I am talking about Marines, Navy, Army, and Air Force veterans. The only thing we had in common was that we served in Vietnam in 1966 or 1967.

While at the reunion in Ennis, I discovered that ten former members of my platoon had some liver problems. One just died 12 February from liver failure, and two others are awaiting liver donors. I later learned two Marines also died while the reunion was in progress (they were not in attendance). I talked to ten Marines from our sister companies, they also had similar disorders. The PCT factor and liver disorders seemed to be in epidemic proportions. We all can relate to diabetes and peripheral neuropathy (numbness in arms & legs), but PCT is a whole different ballgame.

The symptoms of PCT are as follow: fatigue, lesions on the skin, sensitivity to light at extreme levels, and you may pass out or feel faint. Water blisters may appear on your hands or other areas of your body, usually in areas most exposed to sunlight. The skin on the hands will break open easily. The water blisters or scrapes leave a purple scar. Abdominal pains are also symptoms of PCT. If left untreated, this disease will eventually lead to liver failure or liver cancer.

I understand the VA is telling veterans effected with the symptoms that they have too many red blood cells (Polycythemia) and too much iron in their system. They are told to quit using metal pots to cook their foods. To me this is all bullcrap — something needs to be done, and quickly. PCT is a symptom of the liver, in that your liver fails to process iron, resulting in your body shedding iron through your urine. This in itself can cause liver failure. If anyone questions my accusations, then on your next trip to the VA primary care doctor, ask for a 24-hour urinalysis to check for porphyria (iron) in your urine.

If any of this makes sense to you veterans, please contact me at DOCL326@aol.com. This is a serious health problem and the VA is backing away from any type of diagnosis of it. For a disease that is supposed to affect 1 in 30,000 people, I have interviewed plenty of that alleged one, many times over.

Obituaries

Our Khe Sanh Brother Bob Mills has passed away. Bob was in 81mm mortars, H&S Company on the eastern perimeter of the base. We were in the same mortar squad, and stuck together after Khe Sanh and for all the stuff that happened to us down south afterwards. Bob and I always split the cost of a room at our annual reunions. Bob had a big heart, and anyone who could not afford accommodations at our annual reunions was always welcome to pick a spot on our hotel floor and bunk with us. May God Rest his soul. Semper Fi to Bob Mills.

Jack Corbett

Bob and Casper were fixtures at the bar. Every time you walked by, he was there and would talk to everyone. Jack, he was a good Marine and was unselfish to others. He will be missed at the reunions. Bob was at every reunion I attended. May he find peace on the other side of the River.

We would like to find out the identity of the "Gunny" who in Nov-Dec 1967 routinely came through our back perimeter and had a few beers with us. Also for the first time, I now know that we at FOB-3 were tied in with the 1St Battalion, Ninth Marines. Now we also realize why there were so many NVA present. 1/9 was famous for almost having a NVA Regiment attached to it.

Looking For a Friend

Dear Editor,

I am enclosing this poem written by Pamela Zorn-Anderson. She wrote it as a tribute to the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines who served on Hill 861 and 881. Her poem was picked up by the UPI, copied and sent to many soldiers by their parents. Pamela, who is now 54-years-old, disappeared in the Fort Lauderdale area. The veterans in Texas gave me the mission of locating her and the poem. Anyone with information, please call Rick Foley 856-234-5540.

Bugler, sound the "Colors" now... give greetings to the morning sun and hoist the flag with stripes unfurled to decorate Eight Eighty-One

She'll wave in gentle majesty, and let escape a mournful sigh,
for those whose blood has stained this hill and those who've Yet to die

Personified, she walks with God and longs for peace when all is done, but 'til then, lives will still be lost like those on Hill Eight Eighty-One.

As nightfall comes her vigil ends, she's folded with a loving hand, and sent with care across the sea to the family of a fighting man.
Tomorrow brings another flag to stand, like she, against the sun.
The queen of those who fought for us and died on Hill Eight Eighty-One.

A Father's Worry

Brothers,

It is 0254, the house is quiet, and I am wide awake. I sit here drawn to the computer to a place where I know my friends are. My friends whom I depended on so greatly 35 years ago. I am not in danger as we all were then, but now my son is in harm's way as perhaps some of your sons are. Mine is a crew chief on a 46 in the Persian Gulf with the 24th MEU.

While in Khe Sanh years ago, we knew what was going on around us. We saw the day to day horror of that place. I don't have any concept as to what he and his buddies will see in the upcoming weeks and months. Then, we had a certain degree of control over our lives. Prior to a recon insert, we would prepare, we would over fly the zone, we would check all of our equipment, we would practice immediate action drills. We got as ready as we could.

Now my only option is to check websites and CNN and try to get a glimpse of a man a half a world away. Somehow combat in Khe Sanh in 67 and 68 doesn't seem to be as hard as the anticipation I now feel. I now know what our parents went through 35 and 36 years ago. It wasn't easy for them nor is it going to be easy for us who sit and wait. I only hope that my son has the friendship of Marines to get him through as I did all those years ago and still have today.

Thanks guys for the opportunity to speak my mind about what is bothering me this early winter morning. Semper Fi!

Kevin,

I also feel that tight knot in the pit of my stomach. The contributions we all made to this Country, as our Fathers before us, and what our children are contributing now is what made us the great nation we are today. It sure doesn't make it any easier to watch our kids go off to war. My prayers will be with you. My 17-year-old son is named Kevin.

Kevin,

I, for one, will never forget sitting in a Washington, D. C. hotel in late April of 2001 listening to you relate your experiences with 3rd Recon at Khe Sanh. At the time, you mentioned that your son was a Crew Chief on a CH-46 that still had the bullet hole patches from Vietnam, and he researched the logs and found it had flown at Khe Sanh. Based on your previous comments, he is obviously on his second enlistment. Any man who would commit to serving his country in a 35 year old helo is obviously "one hell of a man." Like father, like son. At this point, all we can do is pray. You know where mine will be.

Hoss,

My thoughts and prayers are with your son. Remember he is with the best and as we did some 35 years ago, Marines take care of each other. We know that on a first-hand basis. I sincerely believe it. My son is a 1st Lt in the Army currently stationed in Italy. I, too, share some similar concern should his unit be deployed. A unified support of all true American patriots is what our troops need. I fly Old Glory on the front of my house every day.

Dave,

I felt your concerns some 4-5 years ago when my son was with the 13th MEU, HMM-166. Saddam made a fake run back down towards the border and we thought we were going back to war. I turned on CNN, and there they were on board his ship. My son was with a 46 as well, and they showed them flying off the deck towards Kuwait. My heart hit the deck. A few days after, a letter arrives and I felt better. My son told me that when they went on alert, the entire attitude on the ship made a 180 degree turn. Live ammo and the like. I suddenly realized what a outstanding well trained company he was with. Remember the company you and I had at Khe Sanh. These Marines, your son and mine, are better equipped and trained then we were. Each unit had an information phone number that you could call. There was a voice mail message that gave you daily up dates on the unit. They must still have that and it made me feel a lot closer to my son. My son returned home safely. On the way back they stopped in Hawaii. I met him there and sailed back to Camp Pendleton on his ship. It took 8 days, 8 days at sea with the USMC. The only thing they would not let us do was fly. Rest assured that your son and his fellow Marines know what they are doing. These Marines are absolutely fantastic as Marines and as men.

Kevin,

My sentiments and prayers are with you and your son. I remember coming home from Nam and walking into my house (October 68) and being stunned to see 2 small B/W TVs sitting atop our "large" console TV. I asked my mom what the TV's were all about. She said, "Oh, your father bought them both back in January so he could watch all three networks at the same time and not miss any of the news from Khe Sanh." (No cable TV and certainly no VCR's back then.) Up until that point, I had never given too much thought to what my folks went through while I was in-country. Those extra TVs were proof. I earnestly hope that armed conflict can be avoided. My thoughts are with you.

Convoy out of Khe Sanh

Is there anyone out there who has pictures of the first convoy out of Khe Sanh, or are there any drivers out there? I rode in the back with a 50 cal. mounted on the back of the cab and about a half dozen LAWs opened. That wasn't much company I had in the back of that 2 1/2 ton truck. I can only imagine that wonderful warm fuzzy feeling the driver had. I was getting a ride to Camp Carroll to rejoin Fox Co. What a lonely ride. Anyone out there on that ride? Fox and Echo 2/26 or from any other unit?

As a matter of fact, I do have some on VHS made by LT. Bruce Geiger along with hundreds of others from Khe Sanh to Dong Ha convoy, Cam LO, Phu Bai, Con Tien, Quang Tri and other places he was stationed with the Dusters. He has given me permission to sell repos of them to members as a fundraiser for KSV. Anyone interested there are 2 VHS for $10.00 each, Bruce even narrates and added music of the times. Email me to purchase. These are great to have. PJ and I view them every night when reruns are on.

It was fun to read these! Many different units made the "drive" to and from the base. They even had some runs at night, April/May 1968 to prove that 'we could drive the road when we wanted. I (as a junior Lt) believed the whole idea dumb and that anyone could stop us on that road, even if you flunked boot camp!! The road was like a small driveway with a hill immediately to one side and a drop off to the river on the other. The approach to the base off of Highway 9 just had some trees and an approach trench on each side! Third week in May 1968, had the sweep team ambushed and later that week a convoy on Highway 9 just prior to the artillery unit's position.

I recall one ride when a helo called me to ask if we were under fire (because of the dust we had tossed up). After checking all hands we said no and kept on trucking. We'd drive to Ca Lu and pick up supplies and return to Khe Sanh, not a bad drive, never any other traffic! Down south had problems with them cutting in to the convoy after one overloaded civilian vehicle hit a mine in front of my M-151 (near Hill 55). I allowed them to pass!! Actually, they were a nice mine sweeper, just couldn't let them brake down and block the road (push them off the road (quickly!!) and continue the drive.

Yes, a former Marine who lives around here has been denied PTSD since he was "just a driver" and never fired his rifle. He served Dec 67-May 68 and drove the "highways," including Khe Sanh. Sad.)

Well, thanks for the memories.

Terry Charbonneau LT, 1st M/T.BN.

Hello Terry, I was wondering if you were the Lt. in the Bn supply bunker when Lt. Kim Johnson was killed on 23 February 1968?

Terry Lacy

No, it wasn't me. I was still South in the Hue city area until April when we rode North to Ca Lu, and then Khe Sanh. In February 1968, it would have been someone from 9th Motor Transport Bn. I know that one of the M/T officers at Khe Sanh was hit and a replacement was sent from 9th M/T Bn during the second week of February 1968. I was "visiting" 9th M/T at the time and observed the replacement gathering his gear and leaving. Funny, three months later, I was living in the M/T bunker at Khe Sanh. One did get to see different areas of Vietnam while riding the roads.

One of the guys from Battalion supply and I dug this guy out. We had to find him first. He had a wire wrapped around his neck. I ran over to Alfa Co. supply tent and got my wire cutters and cut the wire from around his neck. I think all he had was a broken leg.

Complaints about the Message Board

The last issue of Red Clay mentioned that a few of the members were concerned about some of the posts on this message board. I, too, have been bothered by a few of the "off topic" posts, but over the years I have learned to ignore distractions and to focus on the things I care about. Some of the posts may not interest you, but I can't remember too many posts that didn't get some type of reply. Someone took the time to read and reply to just about all of the messages regardless of the topic. I check all the messages daily to make sure we don't have any personal attacks, ads for porn sites or any other flagrant violations of decent behavior, but I've only had to delete 5-6 messages since this board came online.

I think of this board like our bunker at Khe Sanh. We didn't sit there and talk all night about tactics and weapons, we would shoot the bull, talk about our cars and girlfriends, what we were looking forward to when we got home and what we planned to do on R&R. If conversations didn't interest me, I would tune them out and join back in when I heard something I could relate to. I ask all of you to do the same. I'm happy to see all the posts and don't want to see anyone drop out of sight because of a few off topic posts. I think the best policy is to ignore some of these posts and not encourage the practice by replying to these posts. If you guys have any ideas or suggestions, send me an e-mail or post your concerns here.

Agreed. I visit the site every chance I get. But, I don't always read all that is posted. I don't think there is anything wrong with some of the friendly, light joking around that I sometimes read. I spent a lot of time living in holes that were just that, a quick place to hide from the incoming. But even then we could find something else to talk about, jokingly or just sharing a dream about what we understood then. I think what I'm trying to say is, some things haven't changed much as you can see by the posts from the past and what many of us are still living. And I think some of us just want to remember some of good times no matter how bad things got. You have done a great job with the site. I have been able to find a number of old friends and information that I probably would not have found if not for this site and the involvement from others. It is a wonderful place to come to for all of us. Thanks.

❋

Well said, Dave. I concur. Keep up the good work. It is what makes message board life interesting. The clown, the lifer, the agitator, the father, the serious guy and, of course, the witty, uncomplaining, shy, handsome, debonair guy like me. It is very uncanny what jogs our memories of the past. Now guys go to the Red Clay PX and buy some stuff so we have enough money to put out another Red Clay magazine. http://www.stores.ebay.com/store=26342286

Dave, I do admit that sometimes the Message Board does get out of hand, but that is normal for us guys and what we all went through. Like you said, if you don't like what you are reading, move on. I read the Board every day and it is all interesting to me, half these guys were on the hills. During the Siege, I was on the Base and at the rock quarry with 1/9. So what I can learn from them means a lot to me about the hills.

Keep up the good work, See you at the reunion.

Mortar Magnet C-130s

I was a USAF loadmaster flying in and out of Khe Sanh in 1967-68. I lost a good friend who died when one of our birds crashed at Khe Sanh on October 14, 1967. Does anyone on this message board remember this crash incident? My hats off to all Khe Sanh vets. I'm proud that I was able to contribute by bringing in beans, bullets and band aids. Keep the spirit alive and your powder dry.

I was there that day, 10-15-67, and helped with the removal of bodies. Kristine Blanksma, Capt. Earle Bjorke' s daughter, who was only three months old at the time, has been a wonderful help to me. She truly deserves our praises for the website to her father's memory, and to the others who perished in the crash.

Wes,

See if this is the right crash...it was 10-15-67... www.geocities.com/erlebjorke

It lists the flight history of the crash. I would love to find out who your friend was...I have been in touch with a few family and friends. The men on the crash were Joe Hannah (survivor), Earle Bjorke, Hottenroth, John Snyder, Ed Mosley, Lawrence Berniski.

Kristine

Dear Kristine,

My friend was Air Force Sergeant Larry Berneski, the loadmaster on that flight. He was my mentor in Vietnam and I was supposed to be on that flight with him. When I awoke, he had already left for Khe Sanh and the word I got from ops was he said that I could sleep in and that he could handle the mission by himself. His act of kindness to me saved my life but left me with a lifelong guilt complex.

I remember what was left of the wreckage, mostly tail section. I was a C-130 navigator who flew out of Danang into Khe Sanh approx. 50 times in 1971, during Lam Son 719. There were several C-130 wreck sites we could see from the air, most in I corp. One was blown up and burned right in its parking spot on the ramp at Danang. It remained there for days. "Mortar magnet" is right!

On the evening of the 24th during heavy incoming, an artillery round landed directly in the doorway of one of the 3rd Recon bunkers. Three Marines and a Navy Corpsman died instantly, the fourth Marine died three days later. Others in the bunker were wounded and buried alive when the bunker collapsed. The survivors were dug out and the wounded taken to Charlie Med. You are not forgotten...

1st Air Delivery

As I am new to the Association (sent in my application for membership today) and old to Khe Sanh (I made so many drops out of C-130's to that hell hole I received a handful of Air Medals), I wish to add to something I read in last month's issue about some parachutists who died at Khe Sanh in November of 67. Earl Dale Jenkins (from Georgetown, IL) and Lewis Clayton Childress (from Urbana, IL), both rather new in country and both Cpls with the 1st Air Delivery Platoon, Headquarters Co., 1st Mar. Div., flying with VMRG-152 out of Da Nang. The accident involved the way Cpl. Jenkins exited the aircraft in a low level (800 feet) jump. As you who now remember, the drop zone was small and the nature of the winds that came up the valley made judging them unpredicable. It was a hurried jump, and Jenkins main chute became entangled with Childress's (who was the third man to jump). Jenkins tried to pop his reserve but that added to the entanglement and both men hit the ground at about 90 miles and hour. They were both 19 years old when they died that day. I was with Lt. Medez, our platoon C/O, when we went to Graves registration to pick up their effects. I write this as a pledge to my friends that I will never forget them, and now you all know who they were and their memory can be brighter and stronger. If and when you pray, send a little something to Earl and Lewis. Thanks for being there to all my brothers who did the terribly tough duty at Khe Sanh. I remain your comrade,

John, I remember that day well. What I saw was one man jump out of the plane, his chute opened but twisted around itself, the next man caught up with him and grabbed him and his chute wrapped around the other guys chute and they both came down together. The ambulance truck came by our area and I stopped it to find how they made out, and he told me they didn't make it. John, that will always stay in my mind.

Big John

John, I too, saw this terrible accident. C Co. just came off of 861 a few days before. We were base security/reaction force. I think we just walked through the drop zone, returning from a patrol. I watched the aircraft pass over the drop zone and saw both Marines fall to the earth. That incident was my first experience with death. I had only been in country and at KSCB for just over a month. We never had any contact. Nothing more to say.

Nick Romanetz

John, I was there November 16, 1967. We took a dump truck through the wire and were the first to reach Childress and Jenkins. The Corpsman worked on one with CPR but it was hopeless. I'll always remember how surreal it was to hold a man's hand as he died. He had an M-14 and the stock had broken at the handhold. We were asked to go west into the trees to help guide one parachutist, who had drifted out of sight into the trees, back to the base. We had just located him when an AK-47 fired several bursts and we all had to take cover. In 1997 I finally worked up enough courage and I called Childress's mother and expressed my condolences to her. I should have called her years before, but you know how it is. She had never been provided a convincing explanation by the US Government concerning her son's death, so I traveled to Las Vegas a few weeks later and met with her, a daughter, and a son whom they were visiting who lived in Las Vegas. It was a duty I felt I owed to Cpl. Lewis Clayton Childress, USMC, and a man I have never forgotten and will never forget. I think of him very often. When I am feeling real low his presence within me seems to provide some solace. Strange, don't you think?

John,

I, too, remember the incident well. I was in "A" 1/13 and we used to watch the drops all the time since they were not too far from our position. If my memory serves me correctly four jumpers came out of the C-130. Two landed safely and we could see the other two tangled up in their chutes. I still remember the ambulance passing our position carrying these fine young men.

Dear Tom,

Thank you for all of the hard work you and the others do for the Khe Sanh Vets. It is a lot of work. Enclosed please find a check for my dues. I am the Widow of Donald J. Magilligan, Jr. When my husband died in 1989, he was doing heart transplants at the University of California at San Francisco. He was the Chief of Cardio-Thoracic surgery there.

Despite all, he was able to accomplish, he always said that the most fulfilled professionally he ever felt was while he served in Vietnam, especially at the Khe Sanh Base. He was so proud to have been a Mud Marine. Our six children loved to hear him say that.

Don would tell everyone how much he admired those young warriors. He said, "They did not do what they had to do for love of their God, or for love of country, but for love of each other." Taking care of those young Marines he considered a God-given gift.

The Red Clay is enjoyed not only by myself, but also by my non-adult kids. It keeps us connected to something that was a big and fulfilling part of my husband's life. I enjoy it so!

Respectfully,
Danette Magilligan

Dr. Donald J.Magilligan

Mr. Ernie Spencer,

I would like to take this opportunity to tell you how much I have enjoyed reading the Winter 2002, Issue 54. As a Life Member I have enjoyed all of the previous issues and especially the article "Uncommon Ground: The Marines and the US Army in I Corps." Somehow I missed the original article. Mr. Brush's treatment of the military doctrine problems between the services is accurate, and it highlighted for me the misapplication of traditional Army conventional war doctrine to a unconventional type of war. Senior Marine strategists insisted that Khe Sanh had little tactical value, and that it was too difficult to support. Since General William Westmoreland was the Commander of American Forces in Vietnam, alternate strategies put forth by Marine Commanders fell on deaf ears.

To their credit the Marines defended Khe Sanh with great honor, while the Army moved troops to Chu lai and Da Nang to replace Marines supporting Khe Sanh. Today's military historians give Marine, Navy, and USAF fixed and rotary wing aviation full credit, for their role in holding off General Giap's North Vietnamese Divisions that were destroyed in the Siege of Khe Sanh.

My mission during the Siege was to conduct round the clock close air support and air to ground bombing and rocket support to the Khe Sanh area and Hills 861 and 881 north and 881 south held by Marines. I was CO VMFA 323 "Snakes" flying F4 Phantoms out of Chu Lai. For two and one/half months our daily flight frag focused on Khe Sanh along with all other Marine fixed wing air. On 22 Jan 1968, I was shot down leading a strike on a "suspected" anti-aircraft positon southwest of Khe Sanh. Fortunately, my back seater Pete Brandon and I were picked up by a LTH- I H Army Huey on a unrelated rescue mission, but that is another story.

On a related matter, I am on the Board of Directors of the Western Slope Vietnam War Memorial Park, and we are building a memorial dedicated to the men and women from the Western Slope and Colorado who served in the US Armed Forces during the War. From 1959-1975. All money donated by veterans of that war from anywhere in the U.S. are invited to participate. This memorial is being built by veterans for veterans. I am inclosing a pamphlet for your review. See our Web site www.gi.net/fieldofdreams for more info. The memorial will be dedicated on 4 July 2003.

I am forwarding a check to Tom Eichler for $100 for a Memorial and Remembrance Donation for all of the men that left their mark on the Red Clay of Khe Sanh.

First, please understand I am not a vet. I was not in the service and I was not at Khe Sanh in 67/68. I want to make that clear because I know there are a whole lotta "wannabes" out there and I have come across two of them. No names.

It is by shear coincidence that I travel to Vietnam as often as I do and that I always end up in Quang Tri Province. My company was awarded the construction management of Highway 9 from Dong Ha to Lao Bao and as it happens just before my first trip there, I had read "After Tet," in which I learned for the first time the actual location of Khe Sanh and its proximity to Highway 9. So that is how all this began for me. But now, I have read every book about the hill battles and the Siege and impending battle and how you guys fought like hell. I have met and visited with Ray Stubbe in his home in Wisconsin and exchanged hundreds of letters. I have met Tommy Eichler in Chicago. I have had running and lengthy e-mails with Dennis Mannion and took the time last spring to find his letter home inscribed on the Vietnam memorial in NYC near Wall Street. I met Dennis over an e-mail scrap we had about fake dog tags that I bought during my first visit to KSCB.

I am a civil engineer by education, so geography and elevations, compass bearings, etc. are easy for me. I have a good sense of direction, so I can spot most things and ascertain my location so I am not totally useless in the bush.

I have crawled all over the Combat Base by myself and located the ammo dump that blew. I have found grenades and shrapnel and unexploded 105 and 155 shells. I have walked the entire length of the runway and I have sat on the perimeter next to the Rao Quan River manned by C/1/26 (Blue Sector). I have been able to spot and identify most hills occupied by USMC but have not been able to spend enough time over several days to actually explore the ville, the hills, and the valleys. I never have that much time. I want to stay two or three days in KS Ville at the hotel and will do that before the project is over.

I have come to admire all of you and I listen with keen interest to the various tales told. I am a member of the KS Vet organization out of respect for all of you and have made contributions to the magazine. I find all this very fascinating — it is living history. I am pretty sure of my bearings once there, but I could be mistaken from time to time as to landmarks. I am very pleased to relate my incidents to all of you and I will do my best to answer your questions and try to orient you based on what I see. So please do not hesitate to call me or relate your stories. If I can find your old positions, or bring back photos of the various places each time I go there, I will try my best. It's the least I can do.

With sincere admiration for you and your comrades.

A Marine's Recon By Force

From nowhere come images of Khe Sanh,
Forcing silent curses to rape my mind.

Instantly, my emotions sink,
Forcing a breath extinguishing sigh.

My soul's hope sags in bitterness,
Forcing spasms of grief to paralyze me, calling me to death's dark door.

Daily I denied the thoughts,
Refused the emotions, quashed the grief.

Yet, once enemies, these friends
Forced me to explore eternity, finding rest in Jesus my Savior.

Being forgiven, I can offer forgiveness,
Canceling the bitterness, bringing end to the war.

Changing of the Heart

by Dave Macedonia

On a return visit to Vietnam in March 2002, I had an experience that changed my life forever. As a Vietnam Veteran who served with the 101st Airborne Division during Lam Son 719 along the DMZ, I have always wanted to go back to Vietnam and explore sites where I had served. However, the highlight of my trip did not happen in those areas. It happened after my DMZ Tour in a place called Hoa Binh, in what we knew as North Vietnam.

Ed Henry and Gary Jones had taken me along as they visited some old French battlefields northwest of Hanoi. They were exploring possible sites for future group tours for Military Historical Tours based out of Alexandria, Virginia. As we visited the Hoa Binh Dam and hydroelectric site, an older Vietnamese man approached me and seemed to be very upset. He was irritated and made arm movements to indicate he was disturbed about something. I asked my guide Hiep, why the gentleman was so upset. He explained the old fellow was distressed because he wanted to talk to me but he did not speak English. Hiep and I followed the gentleman under a structure that served as a café. Hiep entered a large group of Vietnamese and came back with the small-statured gentleman. He seemed nervous but wanted to ask me some questions. With Hiep serving as the interpreter, the old man began to ask me questions. Was I an American? Did I serve in the war? Who did I serve with?

When the man heard I served with 101st Airborne Division and the 75th Rangers, he became very excited and started saying "101 Ranger, 101 Ranger." He ran around to different tables and began pulling on other men and bringing them to me. Questions about when I served and in which specific areas followed. As only Fate would have it, the man, Tran Van Long, and the three other men who stood before me were former North Vietnamese Army soldiers. We had all served in the same area of operations near the Rockpile and Khe Sanh, during the exact same times. All seemed delighted at this unique meeting. I was amazed at the welcoming by these former enemy soldiers. There I stood hugging and holding hands with the enemy. There was no animosity, no anger, and no grudges. As a soldier, I watched and participated in the hunting of these soldiers. I saw them wounded, shot, ambushed, bombed, napalmed, and treated as animals. They were the individuals we wanted to kill, and visa versa. Here we stood, treating each other like long lost friends. The scene generated total respect.

As we attempted to leave the area to continue our tour, Trang addressed our group. He stated, "It was good that old warriors met here today. His only wish was that our countries could become friends as we have become friends." He also said "that we all did what our countries asked of us and most of the time, none of us liked it. But the war has been over a long time, and now we should live in peace."

I left Hoa Binh a better person that day. My war had come full circle. I had renewed my tremendous respect for these North Vietnamese Army soldiers. We Americans have no idea what they have endured in their lifetimes. They are truly special people.

New Marine Corps Museum

by Nick Romanetz

Nick Romanetz just received the following update on the proposed Marine Corps Museum from Kenneth Smith-Christmas, Curator of Material History USMC Museums Division who is our point of contact.

> Just back from Boston today from a meeting with our exhibits designers and read your information. Thank you so much for the offer to acquire items for this exhibit. The scene (Khe Sanh) was suggested by Colonel Joe Alexander and represents Captain Dabney's defense of Hill 881S. It basically consists of the visitor walking through the fuselage of a CH-46 and out the back ramp into a fire base setting, in which the artifacts and scenarios are necessarily compressed. We know that we will have an M101 105mm howitzer and a 106mm recoilless rifle in the scene. Any of the uniform items and 782 gear on the figures (and we have not yet determined how many and which positions they will be in), and associated equipment will be "consumables," as the methods used in constructing the figures will destroy the items as artifacts. We would never use donated artifacts with actual provenance for these open scenes. However, I am certain that we will need individual artifacts to support the story of Khe Sanh in the traditional cased exhibits.

If your colleagues would send us a listing of those items that they would consider donating, we could identify those items that would best support the storyline. I am furiously reading up on the subject now, as I need to know all of the detailed info to help me stage the scene. Again, thank you so much for the offer and your interest.

The recent publication of The Marine Corps Heritage Foundation newsletter Legacy published the following:

"EXHIBIT PLAN TAKES SHAPE, WILL PROVIDE ULTRA-REALISTIC VISITOR EXPERIENCE"

Exhibit designers are hard at work planning the exhibitory for the National Museum of the Marine Corps. The core objectives of the exhibit plan are to depict American history through the eyes of Marines, and to help the public understand what it means to be a Marine. The plan calls for the use of numerous, modern-day exhibitory techniques and will feature as its centerpiece three major "immersion" galleries. These galleries, which combine artifacts and display technology with controlled environmental conditions, will immerse visitors in ultra-realistic recreations in critical moments in Marine Corps history. The three immersion galleries will constitute the major exhibits of the National Museum on opening day, and focus on Marine Corps actions during World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnam War.

The exhibit master plan calls for several other major galleries in the years following the museum opening. After walking through the dramatic central atrium, visitors will view a short, introductory orientation film about the Corps and its history before they move into the main exhibit space. As they exit the orientation theatre, visitors will find themselves in a replica of a recruiting station, from which they will move aboard a bus, the windows of which are television screens that transmit oral histories of individual Marines who are recounting what they felt on the verge of their boot camp experience. As visitors step down from the bus, they find themselves standing astride the famed "yellow footprints," familiar to all who have been through boot camp. Suddenly, they will hear the dreaded roar of a drill instructor issuing the first of many instructions and commands to come! Other important aspects of the boot camp experience will also be recreated faithfully. Following this induction, visitors will be able to move freely in the exhibit area, which will be rich in educational experiences for young and old alike.

Those who have plenty of time can spend a full day or more, exploring the three immersion galleries, viewing numerous vignettes and tableaus, examining priceless artifacts and exploring the colorful stories of Marine lore. For those with limited time, the exhibit design concept also includes a concise, but authorative "fast track" experience that highlights essential elements of Marine Corps history. Visit http://www.usmcmuseum.org for up-to-the-minute information to include the latest technology in taking a virtual tour of the exterior and interior of the building design. If you think you have artifacts you would like to donate, contact Ken Smith-Christmas. I will keep the membership updated on this project as information becomes available.

Six Clicks in the Sticks

by David Powell

It was the hottest day I can remember in Vietnam. It started hot in another way when the first thing in the morning while standing around waiting to move out with three other guys, we heard the sound of rounds sizzling past our heads along with the cracking sound they sometimes made. It is remarkable how fast facial expressions can change. From a look of casual conversation to the look "someone is trying to kill me." Two radically different emotional states in a split second. When I think back on it now, we all took it rather casually. I say that because if that happened to me today I would probably have to go to bed for a week to recover. It was only a short burst and then nothing. Shortly thereafter, the word came down that two squads were to go on ahead to a bridge by a village and wait there for the rest of the company to catch up. I asked the platoon Sergeant how far the bridge was, he said about six clicks. He was a friend who was KIA a short time later. I asked if I could tag along, and he said yes.

Including me, we had about twelve guys. We were about halfway there and already soaking wet with perspiration and short of water. I looked straight up and the sun was so bright it was blinding with a brilliant ring of light encircling it. I had never seen that kind of atmospheric halo effect ever before. It seemed like the sky close to the sun was catching on fire. We were making pretty good time moving over rolling hills covered with trees or dense high brush with occasional open terrain. Moving in a staggered file we came upon a small abandoned temple. It was a good spot to take a break. I wandered into the temple. It had a small door and a couple of small windows. The temple was empty except for junk and debris scattered around the dirt floor. Two guys came through the door behind me and we picked out our spots and sat down. I leaned back against a pile of broken furniture and pots. It was quiet, dark, and cool. We were sucking it up. There was a tom-tom-like drum lying in the dirt near me and near it something that looked like a drumstick. I picked up the drum and the stick, put the drum between my legs, and starting beating out a cross between an Indian war dance beat and a belly dance kind of rhythm that you always heard in the movies.

The sound of the drum echoing around that space was weird. All of a sudden this great big kid with an M-60 resting over his right shoulder bursts through the door and started moving towards us twisting and gyrating and doing version of a belly dance to the drum beat. I started beating the drum faster and he was dancing with the machine gun ammo draped around his neck and shoulders, the sweat dripping down his big smiling face. We were all laughing. When he flopped down on the ground all four of us just sat there in silence. It seemed even quieter after the noise of the drum. Outside we heard someone say, "OK, we're moving out." Everyone got up without a word and moved towards the door that would take us back out into the bright hot reality of Vietnam.

A Khe Sanh Seabee's Pilgrimage
From Khe Sanh to Hachita, New Mexico
by Jim Dawdy

Dedicated to Christine Blanksma, in memory of her father, Captain Earle L. Bjorke, USAF, KIA, 15 October 1967, Khe Sanh, RVN.

At the 2002 Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in Dallas, an event my wife and I thoroughly enjoyed, I purchased a copy of Billy Roble's book "Just One." In the week after returning home, I read it cover to cover. It is a sad but enriching tale of a young man's quest to know about the brother he was too young to remember and of the men to which his brother will forever be "Eternally Bonded."

Having been to only one other veteran's reunion or convention, the Khe Sanh Veteran's 1993 Reunion in Washington, D.C., which I thought was rather intense, I found the 2002 reunion to be both refreshing and rejuvenating. It was great to meet so many old warriors and their families.

I have never considered my participation in the events at Khe Sanh to be heroic. I was just there to fix the runway. And while I had to pull many nights in a muddy foxhole on the Company "A" 3rd Anti-Tank Battalion section of the perimeter, I was not heroic. In the words spoken by Medal of Honor recipient Don "Doc" Ballard in his very eloquent address, I was on occasion "scared to death." During my time there, it was mostly quiet. In the minds of a Marine engineer and a Seabee together in a foxhole on a moonlit night, a clump of trees can become an enemy tank (to which I quite erroneously responded "The NVA ain't got no tanks this far south." A tree stump becomes an enemy sapper who has silently breached the wire. And further out the elephant grass moving in a breeze can become a company of NVA whose sole purpose in life is to kill the two of us, mainly me.

I read in Billy's book about the 30 years it took to honor his brother with the Bronze Star for Valor. I read in other publications of the gallantry of so many of those who attended this year's reunion, as well as accounts of other members who weren't fortunate enough to be able to attend. I came to this year's reunion with the words spoken by General Eisenhower after World War II ringing in my ears: "A measure of humility must be a part of any man who receives accolades earned at the cost of the blood and lives of others."

After reading Billy's book and attending the reunion, I found myself thinking about these things more than I ever had in the past. A small tornado of memories and thoughts swirled in my mind. It is as though we are engaged in a kind of "Quest" for the Holy Grail, much like that of which the legend of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table teaches us. My wife, a voracious reader, admonishes me that the real lesson of the tale lies not in the finding of the Grail, but in the "Quest" itself. Perhaps Billy Roble might agree.

And so it was with this background that on August 31, 2002 (our 34th wedding anniversary) I began a brief "pilgrimage" to the small, isolated, southwestern New Mexico village of Hachita. In 1901, my wife's great grandparents had homesteaded south of the village in what is known as the "Boot heel" of New Mexico and had taken refuge in the small cemetery at Hachita the day of the infamous raid by Pancho Villa's troops on Columbus, New Mexico in March 1916. Nineteen Americans were killed.

We had visited the cemetery in 1997 and in one of the family plots surrounded by an impressive wrought iron fence were three graves. One was of a Civil War Confederate veteran of the Georgia Cavalry who lived to the age of 80 years. Next to him was the grave of a Spanish-American War veteran who died at the age of 63. But it was the last of the three graves that had motivated my small pilgrimage, for I knew that upon the headstone of this 22-year-old soldier who was killed in July, 1918 — a few months before the end of World War I — were words that would provide something of an explanation to some of the questions that had been eating at my insides for over 30 years.

Why do I still suffer from the rage, despair and hatred I felt, and the darkness which at that moment filled my soul, for the Air Force Captain whose body I helped place in a body bag after he died so bravely when his plane crashed on the red clay of the Khe Sanh plateau?

Why, after so many years, am I alone burdened with the terrible and at times almost crushing weight of feeling an obligation to somehow give value to his sacrifice and meaning to his death?

Why do I struggle with the thought, as I touched his arm after the life force had flowed out of him, that some better part of him had become a permanent part of myself and that much of whatever good I may have accomplished in my life was in fact due in considerable measure to him?

The war has been over for almost 30 years. The bunkers and hooches, the spent 105 and 106 casings, the vehicles and planes have all been eroded by time and the elements, or salvaged by the Vietnamese. Yet, I suspect that within each man and each woman who served or had a loved one die or disabled in the war, a battle is still being fought and will continue to be fought all of their days.

Many questions have been generated by the war: Was it wise or unwise, moral or immoral, a noble sacrifice for America, or a squandering of youth and a loss of innocence? There seems to be no definitive consensus as to the answers to these questions. The only meaningful explanation, at least for myself, is written on the headstone of that WW I soldier interred at Hachita, New, Mexico. Words which are applicable in tens of thousands of homes in America and in hundreds of thousands of homes in Vietnam:

A LOVED ONE FROM US HAS GONE
A VOICE WE LOVE IS STILLED
A PLACE IS VACANT AT OUR TABLE WHICH NEVER CAN BE FILLED.

Marines at Khe Sanh 1970 Lam Son 719

by James"Jimbo" Wodecki

I never knew this but Marines participated in Operation Lam Son 719, and were also planning an attack on North Vietnam with 3/9 at Khe Sanh. Of all the Marine aviators who participated in Lam Son 719, the helicopter pilots and crews of HMH--463 and HML-367 came under the heaviest enemy fire and played the most indispensable role. Operation Lam Son 719 was founded on the U.S.-developed tactics of leap-frogging troops and artillery into a series of fire support bases. Marines established their own forward operating base at Landing Zone Kilo, two miles south of the Khe Sanh airfield. Marines from other truck companies and from the 1st Engineer Battalion, the 1st Shore Party Battalion, Force Logistic Command, the 1st Marine Division Headquarters Battalion, and the 1st MAW Marine communicators also operated at Khe Sanh and Vandegrift during Lam Son 719. The Radio/Supporting Arms Platoon, Communications Company, Headquarters Battalion, 1st Marine Division had the mission of keeping both the truck company and wing elements in contact with their parent headquarters in Da Nang.

North invasion plans 1971

From 5-10 February, a task group remained at sea near Da Nang preparing for its mission. By the 7th, the staffs of the 31st MAU and BLT 3/9 had completed plans for the diversion which was to be a helicopter-borne raid on the airfield at Vinh, about 150 miles north of the Demilitarized Zone. The Marines prepared a full operation plan for an attack by two companies of BLT 3/9. The companies were to go ashore by helicopter, seize and demolish the airfield, and withdraw to the ships within 24 hours. The operation order, prepared jointly by the Marine and Navy staffs, included all the usual annexes for air and naval gunfire support, communications, logistics, and intelligence and provided elaborate procedures for withdrawing the raiding companies by boat, if helicopters could not extract them.

After completing the plans, the MAU conducted a communications exercise in rehearsing the planned feint. It also landed 4,000 pounds of explosives and detonating equipment furnished by III MAF and arranged with the 1st MAW to furnish Cobra gunships to reinforce HMM-165 if necessary. The gunships were to remain on call at Da Nang, ready to fly on board the USS Iwo Jima (LPH 2) on short notice.

On 11 February 1971, Task Group 76.4 headed north from Da Nang into the Gulf of Tonkin. Few of the Marines on board knew the actual purpose of their mission. In HMM-165, for example, only the commanding officer and his executive and operations officers had been fully briefed on the plan, and even they were not told that it was a feint until long after sailing. Until then, the executive officer Lieutenant Colonel Jon R. Robson recalled, "we...firmly believed that we might have to go in and try and take Vinh with a battalion of Marines." Marines in both the squadron and the battalion realized that they were preparing for an amphibious raid of some sort and as the ships steamed steadily northward hour after hour, they realized the main objective would be somewhere in North Vietnam. Both air and ground Marines, therefore, readied themselves for their parts of the mission "with all the fears and anxieties...of actually going in and performing the mission as briefed, as little as that was.

On 3 February, Lieutenant General Sutherland, the XXIV Corps Commander, also proposed to MACV an elaborate diversion plan, again involving amphibious forces; this plan was set aside in favor of the Cinc Pac plan, which then was already being implemented. Sutherland message to Gen Abrams, dated 03 Feb 71, and Abrams message to Sutherland, dated 04 Feb 71. (copies in MCHC).

BLT 3/9 was made up of the entire 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines with the following units attached: Battery F, 2nd Battalion, 12th Marines; 1st Platoon, Company D, 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion; 2d Platoon, Company B, 1st AmTrac Battalion; 1st Platoon, Company A, 3rd Shore Party Battalion; 2d Platoon, Company A, 3rd Motor Transport Battalion; 2nd Platoon, Company B, 3rd Tank Battalion; 3rd Platoon, Company A, 3rd Engineer Battalion; 2nd Platoon, Company B, 3rd Medical Battalion; and detachments from the 3rd Service Battalion and 3rd Dental Company.

The vessels of the ARG were: USS Tulare (LKA 112), USS Iwo lima (LPH-2), USS Cleveland (LPD-7), and USS Westchester County (LST 1167).

First Day at C-2

by Bob McLane

I spent the afternoon on a working party filling sandbags. Later, the gunny made us put up a volleyball net. We had to dig holes in the rock hard ground with a pick. We took turns swinging the pick. After the first hole was finished, I tossed my flak jacket and my helmet on the ground, followed by my T-shirt. They were a lot more casual around here about stuff like saluting and dress codes than the idiots back at Dong Ha. I liked that. Suddenly, a huge explosion showered everyone with chunks of dirt and we were covered in a cloud of dust and smoke. I dove down beside some sandbags. I had heard about guys that had gotten hit and in the excitement they didn't realize it right away. Quickly I ran my hand up and down my arms and legs as I did a roll call of all my vital parts. Everything looked OK until I ran my right hand over my left arm. I was amazed to see my hand was covered in my blood. It came from a small hole about halfway between my elbow and shoulder. I never felt it. As I lay beside the sandbags I realized it was not much more than a scratch, the kind the Lone Ranger used to get every Saturday. I started laughing. Some of Ho Chi Minh's arty boys had just tried to kill me. Although that was my blood running down my arm, I wasn't really hurt that bad. I wasn't even upset. Strangely, I felt happy.

Unlike our American shells, there is no symmetry to the shape and size of the Russian hot steel that flew past my arm. I'll never know how big or small the piece of shrapnel was that nicked my arm. Luck in the DMZ was measured in inches. My celebration was short as I looked over and saw a young Marine lying on the ground near me. He was unconscious and bleeding from his nose and ears. I helped some of the other Marines carry him over to the LZ while the radio operator called Dong Ha for a dustoff. Two other Marines were also hit by the same shell. While we waited for the medevac, the corpsman administered morphine and stopped the bleeding on the wounded Marines. He bandaged their injuries. In about twenty minutes, a helicopter came to pick up the casualties. My arm had stopped bleeding. I went back to digging my hole. Now I had my flak jacket back on. Guys came around to see where I had gotten hit. They stared at my arm. I tried to be cool about it, but I was on cloud nine. I felt like Tom Sawyer showing off a new black eye. Rail saw the wound on my arm, "Well Bro, you ain't a new guy no more."

Major General Christopher Cortez Recruits Young Marine

by Jim Wodecki

On 06 March 2003, Ray Addington and I attended the local Metro/Plex Marines luncheon in Dallas, Texas. It was attended by active, reserve and old retreads from WWII, Korea, Vietnam, Desert Storm, and those Marines getting ready for war. The owner of Paul's Steak House, often frequented by Marines, hosts the banquet once a month. As our special guests, we invited Mr. Ray Morris and his son Tray Morris III, age 10, to accept a donation on behalf of the Khe Sanh Veterans. Major General Mulberry, who presented the first "DOC Medal" at our KSV reunion last summer, and Major General Christopher Cortez, C/O MC Recruiting, were our guest speakers.

The Khe Sanh Veterans Organization donated $500.00 this year to the Local Chapter of the Young Marines Big "D" Chapter of the Marine Corps League. Working with us was Lisa Osay, Development Director of the Young Marines in Dallas. These were the same Young Marines who helped us at the reunion of the Khe Sanh Veterans in Las Colinas, TX in July 2002. The Young Marines presented the Colors and participated in our Banquet Ceremonies and "Doc" Medal presentations. When we honored the Corpsmen, Medics and Doctors who served at Khe Sanh. Major General Christopher Cortez, C/O Marine Corps recruiting, delivered an uplifting speech informing the attendees that the USMC has reached its recruiting goal for the last 93 Months. A feat not matched by any other branch of service.

We presented the check to 10-year-old Tray Morris III, who accepted it on behalf of the Young Marines Organization. After taking photos, we were about to leave when Major General Cortez informed me that he wanted to meet young Tray. When I observed the General hand the young man his personal general's coin, I slipped the kid one of our Khe Sanh coins. He then handed it to the General, whose wide smile and hearty laugh let me know he was completely surprised. The looks of gratitude in their eyes was indescribeable. Tray's father was so proud of his young son.

Since young Tray had to be in school, they left the luncheon early but returned about ten minutes later. Mr. Morris explained he was so proud he just had to have a picture with his son and General Cortez. The General was most obliging and took several pictures with Tray and his father. Young Tray had a great story to tell his fellow Young Marines and I am sure one day soon he will be one of The Few, The Proud. I am sure of it. In fact, I think I saw General Cortez slip the kid some recruiting literature. The Young Marines have an outstanding organization. It keeps the young kids off the streets and gives them the discipline they need. I was proud to see the future, past and present Marines together for such a worthy cause.

So you guys should be proud you all made a little difference to a bunch of decent kids. This is just one of the projects the KSV help out with. It's those little PX items you buy and those generous donations that make this kindness possible. I salute all you guys for your generosity. We need to do more of this around the country. We need your ideas and funds to do other worthy projects.

The Promise

by Richard Oulton

Some people living in homeowners associations tend to have an unhealthy preoccupation with their neighbors and feel compelled to keep close tabs on them. Their justification for their officiousness and intrusion is to protect property values by ensuring conformity and uniformity. And so, having wrapped themselves in self-righteousness, they proceed to turn these artificially uniform enclaves into mini war zones.

One such battlefield is Wyndham, an upscale development in the Richmond, VA suburbs. The object currently in the Wyndham association crosshairs happens to be the flagpole from which the Oultons fly an American flag, a flag meant to honor the 604 men in Richard's battalion who were killed in action during the Vietnam war. And because of the high casualties they sustained in combat, the battalion earned the nickname of "The Walking Dead." The recipient of a Purple Heart and a Combat Action Ribbon, Richard was awarded a Congressional Veteran Commendation this past November for the honorable service he performed while a member of the Armed Forces. But alas, homeowners' associations are not known for their tolerance of patriots or flags, although the politically correct ones insist it is not the flag they object to, per se, and omit any specific language relating to the flag. Wyndham is no different.

As Richard tells it, being an attorney, he read all 250 pages of The Declaration of Covenants, Conditions & Restrictions prior to buying their house. Nothing he read caused him to rethink the purchase he was about to make. Nowhere in the "book of restrictions" were the words flag or flagpole to be found. "I took the CC&Rs at their word," he said.

However, as soon as he erected a flagpole the winds of war started blowing and the Wyndham Association took the Oultons to court. With no specific restrictions on flags or poles in the governing documents, Wyndham used a catch-all provision in the CC&Rs, and alleged the flag was a "visual nuisance." The judge agreed.

This outraged and upset many people, including members of the legislature who responded by unanimously voting in The Wyndham Flag Bill. This statute basically provides that no homeowners association can prohibit a homeowner from flying a flag, unless they disclose it at the time of sale. Despite the fact that the new law was enacted specifically for the Wyndham flag case and was called the Wyndham Flag Law, the judge ruled that the law did not apply to the Oultons' case. He ignored the law. He also dismissed the Oultons' arguments claiming their defenses "complicated the case". And, just for good measure, Judge Harris changed his mind at the last minute and denied them a trial by a jury of their peers. With no laws to protect them, no jury to decide the facts in their case and with none of the facts "complicating the case," the Oultons,' predictably, lost.

After their attempts to appeal to both the Virginia and United States Supreme courts failed, they found themselves back in Judge Harris' courtroom. With no higher authority left to turn to, the Oultons ultimately lost their battle. Judge Harris ordered them to remove their flagpole and the flag by March 1, 2003 or to be prepared to face the consequences.

Should the "consequences" include a stay in the county jail, as Richard suspects, they'll have to make arrangements for their two small children. With no family in the area, they face some pretty tough decisions. They also face the possibility of losing the 6-month infant they are in the process of adopting.

At the base of the flagpole is an inscribed bronze plaque that starts with a promise," I will always fly these flags, as "I owe it to my boys, to my 'Walking Dead Marines.'" Many of the men in Richard's battalion died in his arms and by taking down the flag, he believes he would be betraying his men and betraying the ultimate price they paid to protect our right to fly the flag.

While their fellow homeowners in Wyndham do not object to the flagpole or the flag and have signed petitions in support of the Oultons, once the board started beating the drums of war, and the attorneys got involved, the will of the members themselves seems to matter not a whit.

"The Hill" A Soliloquy

by Harry "Joe" O'Dell, K Co 3/9

Company Commanders in the field
Their rifle companies ready to wield
Death and destruction on the NVA
Unleash us, lets begin this day

Check equipment, fill canteens
Each Marine knows the routine

Extra ammo and bandoleers
Give me a 60 Mike-mike round
For surely this day were combat bound

Pointman leads off----------
"Keep your Interval" Lieutenants call
"One round will get you all"

Plodding along about mid-day
A familiar face coming my way
Must be Sunday, how can I tell
Corpsman approaches with outstretched hand and Malaria pill

Down the column He continues Kit over his shoulder
No Marine could be any bolder

"Chowtime" filters down the line
Ham and limas will do just fine
Washed down with hot halizoned water
Ahhh things couldn't be much better

At the base of the hill--------
The din of battle can be heard
Fire teams up becomes the word

The column forms into squads and teams
Mortar crews set up
While off their tubes the sunshine gleams

Word comes down,"assault the hill"
Though hot tired and thirsty
Each man still has the will
To defeat the enemy and take this hill

Battle over, hill re-taken
Is that Laos over there
Or am I mistaken

Pull off the hill----
Chopper back to bases
Will this day put a smile on their faces
Of far away policy makers
In air conditioned places
Yes----------I would guess

Battlefield tactics can't be made far away
It's the "grunts" in the field who know the way
To certain victory over the foe
Something those D.C. cronies seem to know

In that far away little green land
Our actions were gallant
We are U.S. Marines and we have the talent
But with one hand tied behind our back
Our fullest potential we surely lack

So let policy makers look back on our war
And say--------
Never again commit our forces this way

Sitting in my easy chair
With shawl and kitty on my lap
Happenings in my war I recall
As I begin my mid-day nap

We were young and invincible
And "Remembrances" past
After 37 years and still clearly last
In my mind and soul never to fade
Thank God and Chesty Puller
A Marine I was made

Vietnam...The Sequel

Introduction

Col. Warren Wiedhahn, USMC (ret), is a long-standing member of the 3rd Marine Division Association. For a few years now, he has been putting the word out on the tours to Vietnam that his company, Military Historical Tours, conducts. The first time I heard about it I thought, "Why would anyone want to go back there, followed by, "Why would I want to go back there?" I also dismissed it as being too expensive.

I'm not sure when the actual decision to look into it took place. It was more of a mental evolution from complete rejection of the idea to, who knows, it could be fun. It took two years to work up the nerve to send in the reservation and even up to a couple of weeks before leaving, I still wondered if I was doing the right thing.

A few, well-intentioned people I had mentioned the trip to gave me the old, "You need closure," accompanied by what they thought were very sincere looks of understanding and sympathy for the torment my soul has endured, for lo these many years.

I got closure right here! The term "closure" would indicate that there was some sort of gap in a certain train of events. There was no gap. A lot of my friends were killed. That's it! I got back in one piece. That's it, too! No gaps.

Initially, it was a matter of curiosity as much as anything. It's sort of like surviving a terrible car wreck and then going to the junkyard to look at the wreckage and marvel that you lived through it. A friend asked me, "How can you forgive those people for what they did?" "Those people" didn't do anything to me that I was not trying to do to them. I saw the Viet Cong as sneaky little back stabbers but where I was, there were very few of them. My opponent, the North Vietnamese Army, was a well-trained, well-equipped professional soldier trying not to die for his country by causing me to die for mine.

This is not to say that I condone, in any way, how the North Vietnamese treated US POWs. But if you research WWII in the Pacific, or Korea, or, in fact, inter-Asian wars through history, you will see that extreme cruelty towards prisoners seems to be a basic Asian trait. From what I have read, if I was a former POW, I imagine I would have some serious hatred for my captors, but that wasn't my experience, so I cannot relate to it. I hope the following is of some interest.

On 10 March 1998, I began the long journey that would take me back to Vietnam, a place I never expected to return to. I arrived at the Buffalo, NY, airport at about 3:30 PM. There began the odyssey of a lifetime. Processing at Buffalo and the commuter flight to JFK Airport in New York City went like clockwork.

I was beginning to anticipate something going very wrong because, so far, everything was going too smoothly. I must have picked just the right time to fly. After only about three minutes, the shuttle bus pulled up and I got on for a fifteen-minute ride to the other side of the airport. I got off at the Cathay Pacific terminal and got quickly checked in. When I got to the waiting area at the departure gate, there were very few people there, too. I saw a group with Military Historical Tours hats and/or name tags on, located and checked in with Ed Henry, our tour leader, and then hung out until the flight was called.

Our first destination was Vancouver, BC, which is five hours away...two hours there for refueling and then thirteen hours to Hong Kong. A documentary film crew, Peak Moore Enterprises, was also accompanying us. Warren Wiedhahn had said that they have been involved in previous Marine Corps-related film projects and come highly recommended. I understand they are doing this on a freelance basis and have no financial backing. Their plan is to produce a film on their own, then sell it to one of the cable channels like The Learning Channel or The History Channel.

There were a number of active duty officers from the Marine Corps University at Quantico. They were young, earnest, and very respectful. Some are students, but in name only, because they are all captains, majors and colonels. Those who were not students were instructors. Many of them appeared to be keeping journals and I suspect they may be required to do papers on their return.

Many of the young gentlemen from Quantico

(hereafter identified as the YG from Q) were reading the book "Siege of Khe Sanh" that we were sent by MHT. The book also includes the actions at Con Thien, Cam Lo, Hue City, and Lang Vei.

We landed in Hanoi on Vietnam Airlines at about 3:40 PM having lost a time zone on the way. Hanoi airport is strictly no-frills. Customs was brisk, efficient, and humorless. Virtually no attention was paid to the baggage. The weather was surprisingly pleasant. It was probably around 80 with low humidity. We were staying at the Thuy Thien Hotel, which reflects the erstwhile French influence. The hotel is on a side street just across from a police building and as soon as we stepped off the bus we were besieged by street hawkers selling post cards, T-shirts, pith helmets, embroidery and various trinkets.

Ho Chi Minh Mausoleum

At 9:00 AM we went to see the Ho Chi Minh mausoleum and museum. The mausoleum is quite imposing and, at the same time, rather stark. It faces what would normally be a very wide boulevard but it's blocked off to all but pedestrian traffic. Across the boulevard from the mausoleum is a twenty-acre park, which is sectioned off by sidewalks. Within each section is some kind of very thick, bushy grass, which is obviously not made to be walked upon.

The museum was very modern and clean, but quite sterile. One Vietnamese explained that a lot of the displays were more symbolic than realistic. In fact, most of them were not made up of artifacts at all, but were more stylized sculptures in tribute to this or that glorious people's cause. It seemed to me that the average Nguyen could care less about a lot of it. The almost god-like respect seemed a little forced. One thing I noticed, though, was that there were no undisciplined little brats swinging from the displays or racing from room to room. Kids stayed with mom and dad and behaved themselves.

After lunch we went to the People's Army Museum, which was shabby and tacky. Everything seemed to be overly dramatic and almost amateurishly done. Displays were very static, and, if they were lighted, half the lights were out. In the courtyard of the museum was a large pile of chunks of various US aircraft shot down in the Hanoi area. Some of the wreckage had signs describing how this very jet killed 430 little girls before being blasted out of the sky by one of the People's Heroes, or, that exact aircraft was flown by a notorious American criminal who met his miserable end at the hands of a courageous North Vietnamese air ace. There were also artillery pieces and various ordnance plus a NVA anti-aircraft gun just like Jane Fonda liked to work out on. I hit the sack about 10:00 and had no problem going to sleep.

After breakfast we loaded up to go back to Uncle Ho's mausoleum, this time to go in and view the body, which has been on display for several years. There was a long line of locals waiting to get in. We had been told that we would have to walk in single file with our hands at our sides. No hats. Nothing in our hands. No backpacks, cameras, or belt packs. No talking, no smiling, no laughing. If you had your hands in your pockets or did anything the guards thought inappropriate, they could order you out of the building.

I decided that I didn't want to play their game. Respect is one thing but in a communist society respect is not earned...it is forcibly required. He may be North Vietnam's Thomas Jefferson, but he was just a commie stiff to me. I stayed on the bus, and after everyone else got off the driver moved to a small side street.

The last time I saw our people they were in their own line away from, but in front of, the civilians. My immediate thought was that our group was being paraded for the locals. Guards were walking up and down near the civilians and talking to them. Maybe I'm a little paranoid, but I can just imagine that the civilians were being told that the American criminals had come back to show their new found respect for Uncle Ho and atone for their wartime atrocities. About 45 minutes later, some of the guys back from the mausoleum said they felt hostility. The guards pulled one of them out of line and made him empty his pockets. Then, they waved him on. No reason given, and you don't ask why.

The afternoon flight to Da Nang was uneventful until we landed. Let's just say it was about one fishtail away from a crash. Sometimes ignorance is bliss.

In Da Nang, it felt about twenty degrees hotter with high humidity. What appeared to be fog in the distance was not; that's how thick the air was. While getting our bags loaded into the buses, we just stood around and sweated.

Not far from Da Nang we stopped at Red Beach. This is a long stretch of beautiful white sand beach where the 9th Marines made their amphibious landing in 1965. They were the first complete, tactical ground force to touch Vietnam. Girls dressed in the national costume called the Ao Dai passed out leis and flowers to the Marines.

We checked in at the Houang Duong Hotel in Hue, which is very nice and very Asian. We toured Hue this morning and it was interesting. We went from point to point in chronological order as the battle for the city unfolded during the 1968 Tet offensive. Among the YG from Q are some TBS (The Basic School) instructors who have researched the battle thoroughly and came prepared to give a narrative as we moved around.

We then went to an area near the center of the city near the Perfume River that bisects Hue. Across the bridge that was about three blocks away was the ancient Citadel that became the focal point for the NVA attack. Just around the corner from where we were all standing was the old MACV (Military Assistance Command Vietnam) compound, which became the center of US activity and which is now a Vietnamese government building. We were told we could walk down and have a look at it and take pictures but to stay across the street from it. It probably would have been OK if there were only a few of us but with about sixty people pointing cameras, it only took about thirty seconds for an army guard to come charging out brandishing his AK-47 and give us the heave-ho. The level of paranoia concerning army or other government facilities is incredible. The idea that looking at, or taking pictures of a building is a threat of any kind is ludicrous. On the other hand, I think a lot of it is based on the concept of continuous intimidation. It seems very petty. I would imagine that the guard who chased us off probably got elevated to People's Hero after his courageous action against the running dogs of capitalism.

We stopped for lunch at a little hole-in-the-wall restaurant and somebody found two American women there. One, Judith Hansen, had spent a year in Da Nang as a "Donut Dolly" with the Red Cross in 1967-68. She said she worked mostly with Marines so we stood up and sang the Hymn for her. She got quite emotional. She was traveling with her sister. It was her first time back.

After lunch we toured the Citadel. Almost all the battle damage has been repaired. Nearly every large city in Vietnam has a citadel, which was the residence of the local king or warlord or whomever was in charge. The Citadel in Hue, however, was the old imperial capital of Vietnam and was built around 1810. Parts of the huge wall around it are now gone but it was originally almost 2000 yards on each side. The Citadel was bitterly defended by the NVA because it had become a symbol of the non-communist south and the presence of the North Vietnamese flag flying over it was believed by the NVA to destroy the Marines' and ARVNs' will to fight. It didn't work.

By pre-arrangement, it had been decided to let the ARVNs be the first troops to re-take the Citadel even though the Marines had taken tremendous casualties getting to it. It became clear though, that the only way the Citadel would be taken was by the Marines, so they went in. Again, by pre-arrangement, the RVN flag was supposed to replace the NVA flag flying over the Citadel, but when the Marines finally blasted their way to the flagpole, the US flag was "erroneously" run up. After a suitable amount of time went by, the "error" was noticed and the South Vietnamese flag replaced the Stars and Stripes.

Ed Henry had told General Mundy that I had, for personal reasons, brought my bagpipes to play at Khe Sanh. There was already a plan for a memorial service there during which a tape of the Marine's Hymn and Taps would be played. The General asked me if I would play Amazing Grace after that. I had not planned on playing in front of the group and told him, but I said I'd give it a try as long as he didn't expect too much. I think he thought I was some kind of ringer from Glasgow.

After breakfast, we bussed north through Quang Tri Province. Even though I had patrolled out of Quang Tri when I was in Echo Company, 3rd Recon Battalion, there was nothing left of the huge base that had been there. It had been swallowed by a string of shantytowns and markets, except for the airstrip which is still being used.

We piled our luggage in the lobby and immediately reloaded the busses for the trip to Khe Sanh. Its 60 Km of bad road but there is an effort being made to improve it. There is virtually no heavy equipment to be seen except a few beat up dump trucks. Everything is hand labor and much of it by women.

As we got closer to Khe Sanh, the mountains looked bigger than I remembered. Many of the lower mountaintops are being blasted away for rock and gravel to use on the road. There has also been massive slash and burn agriculture practiced here for at least twenty years. The jungle that used to cover these mountains is all but gone, replaced by scrub brush and small trees. There still is lots of elephant grass, though.

First, we went to Lang Vei where the Special Forces camp was overrun by NVA tanks that many in the upper echelons said didn't exist. Some of our recon teams had reported hearing noises that sounded like tanks near the Laotian border. "Harrumph," said the brass, "there are no roads that will support tanks there!" Well, the noises were coming from Laos where vehicles could be used with relative impunity. When it came time to attack Lang Vei, the NVA used the Russian T-76 amphibious tank to ford the river that makes that part of the Laos/Vietnam border, drove east on Route 9, and squashed Lang Vei.

There was a lot of controversy then about why the Marines at Khe Sanh didn't send help, but it was the right tactical decision. Khe Sanh supported Lang Vei during the attack with all the artillery and other resources it had while under artillery attack itself, but a ground force would have been annihilated. If we had come down Route 9, there were hundreds of places to ambush us. If we came cross-country, it would have been the same. Either way it would have taken many hours and it was night. A reaction force would have lost hundreds to save a few dozen.

We had bag lunches at Lang Vei. It was extremely hot and airless. After lunch, we headed back up

Route 9 to Khe Sanh. I knew that where the base had been is a coffee orchard now so I didn't expect to be able to see much. To my surprise, most of the trees were no taller than shrubs and they were in random patches. Not having trees overhead made it possible to "see up and out." It was the least altered of all the former bases we went to. Had it been allowed to grow over, it would have been covered with 30-foot trees and we would have seen nothing. This way, the lay of the land was clear and it was possible to get somewhat oriented.

Nothing is left but the general trace where the airstrip was. There is a badly deteriorated monument there that tells about the 10,000 Americans who were killed or captured by the glorious heroes of the People's Army. Everybody got a good laugh out of it. In the distance to the north was the ridgeline with Hills 950 and 1015. Hill 950 was the radio relay station called Rain belt Bravo. Because of the mountainous terrain in the Khe Sanh area, we rarely were able to communicate directly with the base.

There was a small detachment of Marine communications people there, and they often had to fend off attacks from the NVA who occupied the entire remainder of that ridgeline. It was the first thing I saw every morning as I came out of the Sergeant's hooch. Due to the humidity, it was very hazy but to the west I could just make out Hill 881 South. The other outpost hills were lost in the haze.

The base was abandoned shortly after the Marines made a Herculean effort to keep it during the Siege. It was bulldozed flat to keep the NVA from making use of it. By using a little dead reckoning, I think I got to within 100 feet of my old company area — Bravo Company, 3rd Recon Battalion. I collected a baggie of that unmistakable red dirt that predominates in the Khe Sanh area. After I got to where I thought I was closest, it really hit me as to where I was. Standing on that red dirt looking at the 1015 ridgeline, in that heat, and humidity, and stillness...it seemed like I had been there just last week.

The YG from Q were trying to be everywhere at once. They have studied — and know — this battle probably better than those of us who were here at the time. To have the opportunity to walk this ground and see the terrain features and landmarks was literally an opportunity of a lifetime for them. I turned twenty-one again while I was here. As I looked around the area, it was like playing a video in my head. I could see every building and tent and smell the diesel and aviation exhaust fumes.

Facing north and mentally scanning from left to right, over beyond the mess tent is the Charlie Med station just off the helicopter taxi pad. That's the last place I saw Garry Tallent. It was the day before my 21st birthday and his patrol, Primness, had just flown out on a pair of CH-46 helicopters. They inadvertently landed right on top of a NVA unit — what we refer to as a "Hot LZ" — which shot the chopper up and hit Tallent and the chopper door gunner. We were on the helo pad because we were waiting to be inserted into our patrol zone by the same helicopters. I thought the choppers were returning to pick my patrol up, but they were moving unusually fast. The lead chopper landed hard, and corpsmen from Charlie Med ran into it with stretchers. I was still thinking that maybe somebody had taken a bad fall or something but then they came out with Garry, blood all over, and I was hoping he was only unconscious.

The immediate reaction from my team was that one of them cursed and flung his rifle down on the helo pad. I barked at him to pick up his rifle and get a grip. We were just minutes away from possibly going into the same kind of situation, and I didn't need anyone who wasn't concentrating on the mission. Tallent had been my radioman on a number of patrols. Even when things got nasty, he was always smiling about something.

The helicopter his patrol had been on was shot up a bit so another one took us right out to our patrol zone. It wasn't until we came back almost a week later that we found out he had died. Because of the time delay involved, it didn't quite sink in. It was just that he wasn't around anymore.

Now, in my mind's eye, I'm looking at the regimental command post with its underground combat information center. Beside it is the watchtower that is manned at night, mainly to listen for the "poomp" of a mortar, or the deeper "boom" of artillery being fired at us from the hills. Rockets were harder to hear but if it was very still they made a sharp "Sssssh" when they were launched and sometimes at night you could see the flame of the afterburner. The sentry had a hand-cranked siren that was the incoming alarm that sent us scrambling for the bunkers. Rockets, especially, move very fast and the screaming noise they make is a real motivator to find a hole to crawl into.

Across the road and down to the right a bit, I see the tiny PX that never had much in it and next to the PX was the post office. Then comes our company office followed by the two rows of hooches and squad tents that house the company. The last hooch down in the row next to the road is where we sergeants lived. We have two-thirds of the hooch and company supply has the rest. The next area down is Engineers, I think. Back on this side of the road is the shower tent. A crude affair, but better than nothing.

Going to the shower tent during the monsoon was always an adventure. There were two ways to do it. One was to go more or less fully dressed in the filthy utilities you had worn for days on patrol. The problem was that after you got squeaky clean from your shower, you had to wear the same foul rags back to the hooch unless you brought a clean uniform with you. If you did, the rain hammered down so hard that your clean, dry utilities were soaked and mud splattered by the time you got back to the hooch. Raincoats were nonexistent and most ponchos were full of holes and offered only minimal protection.

The other way to go to the shower tent was the Marine way. Usually we just put a towel around our waist, stepped into our shower shoes, and strolled across the road. We would arrive drenched and shivering from the cold. Some, to keep their towel dry, just rolled it up under their arm and walked over in their birthday suit. There was absolutely no need for modesty. The best part was in returning to the hooch. Wet shower shoes are slippery and there was mud everywhere. Watching people exit the shower tent was almost a spectator sport because a large number of clean people wound up prone in the mud and rain when they slid out of their shower shoes. Of course, that meant another shower. Sometimes in the monsoon it rained so hard we just stepped out of the hooch and took a "natural" shower on a wooden pallet placed there for that purpose.

There was quite a bit more to the base than that, but it's about all I ever saw. We were off base on patrols so much that when we were here, the time was spent maintaining bunkers and equipment and preparing for the next patrol. I can see the bunkers between the tents and I can see the one where "Doc" Miller, Scribner, Rosa and Popowitz were killed. Khe Sanh was taking a lot of in-coming rockets that day in January of 1968, and most of my platoon was in that bunker. I had, only a few weeks before, been transferred to the newly formed Echo Company, 3rd Recon, that was going to be operating out of Quang Tri.

A Russian 122mm rocket is 4_ inches in diameter and about six feet long. Two thirds of it is rocket motor and the rest is high powered explosives. One of them came right through the door of the bunker and detonated inside. They weren't just killed...they were torn to pieces. One of the guys trying to dig the wounded Marines out of the bunker said later that all they found of Scribner was his helmet with part of his skull still inside. He said the rocket must have gone off in Scribner's lap. They knew it was him because he had written his name and blood type on the helmet cover. Besides those four killed, everyone else in the bunker was wounded, some of them horribly.

I didn't know about that until a couple months later when the Siege was over and what was left of Bravo Company was brought down to Quang Tri where the rest of the 3rd Division was. Those of us who had come from Bravo went to see them and it seemed as if there was hardly anyone left. I talked to one of the sergeants, Dennis Herb, for a while and he filled me in on who from my platoon had been killed or wounded and medevaced out. I think there were only seven or eight of my platoon left in the company.

We didn't stay as long as we had intended. It was too heartbreaking to stand among the tatters of the mighty Bravo Company, 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, USMC.

Most of the nearly 40% of casualties they took were not sustained facing the enemy. It was often due to the company's geographical position on the base. Any incoming that was fired at Charlie Med or the ammo dump that went wide either way, landed on Bravo. Any incoming fired at the regimental CP or the airstrip that went short or long, landed on Bravo. The company area became known as the V ring (as in the center of the target). After the Siege began, patrols outside the base were terminated, I don't think a Recon Marine ever fired a round at the enemy. But, that was when they took the majority of casualties. All they could do was dig their holes deeper.

Finding out that people I thought were alive had been killed three months before stunned me. Since I hadn't been there when it happened and hadn't seen them in quite a while, there was not the same sense of immediate loss. They were just gone and there was nothing to be done about it. I began realizing that maybe a part of the reason for making this trip was because I never got to mourn those guys.

All of this flashed through my mind in a matter of seconds. I was glad I was alone. This was tougher than I thought. My original intent was to try to get as close to the company area as I could and, very privately, play "Amazing Grace," the "Marine's Hymn," and then "Taps" on my practice chanter. The practice chanter is not much more than a fancy flutophone and it's used for fingering practice for the bagpipes. The bad part is that it doesn't sound like much. Just sort of a muted buzzy sound. I had debated with myself whether to bring the bagpipes themselves and I finally decided that if I had them with me, at least I would have a choice. I deliberately did not bring the drones...those three big pipes that stick up over the left shoulder. I had correctly assumed our bags would get pretty rough treatment on this trip and I just didn't want the drones damaged. It was enough that I was risking damage to the pipe chanter, air bag, and blowpipe. However, the drawback to playing the pipes instead of the practice chanter is that the pipes were meant to be heard over the noise of battle, so if I did play them it would not go unnoticed.

Why would I care if anyone heard me? Isn't "Amazing Grace" an appropriate tune to play on such an occasion? The problem was that I had attempted to play "on the bag" only a few times and did badly to say the least. I had never gotten all the way through any one tune. Playing the practice chanter is not much more than blowing into a plastic tube. But playing the bagpipes brings several new dimensions into play. Imagine rubbing your stomach, patting your head, whistling a tune, and marching in step all at the same time, with almost no practice. Then, imagine doing all that at a very special event, in front of sixty people, with no practice at all. When General Mundy asked me in Hue if I would participate in the memorial service I was flattered to be asked, while at the same time knowing I couldn't do it. It was hard enough just being here, let alone being part of the program. After the group had some time to look around, General Mundy assembled us and began the memorial service by presenting a Purple Heart medal to Rob Sutter, a former Marine captain, for his brother who had been killed here. That was followed by comments from the General and Alan McLean, a former Marine 2nd Lieutenant who had lost both legs and is now an Episcopalian Priest.

I was pacing around behind the group trying to calm down. I kept trying to wet my lips but I was so dry I virtually couldn't spit. A recording of the Marine's Hymn and Taps was played and, finally, General Mundy gave me a nod. If I'd had any confidence at all that I could do this, I would have just launched into "Amazing Grace" from behind the group. Remember...I had never played a complete tune on the bag and I had only attempted that in front of my pipe instructor.

Even though I knew it would break the mood a little, I felt I had to explain that this was a maiden flight for me so I started saying something like, "I should tell you all that..." and they all turned around! With everyone looking at me I instantly felt I was going to make a damn fool of myself. This was a very personal and serious occasion for me and the enormity of it kind of overwhelmed me. I had to stop and regroup for a moment. I then went on to explain my situation and that if they would bear with me, I'd give it a shot.

I play better now.

It must have been pure adrenaline, but I did it! It wasn't perfect, but it was "Amazing Grace!" Ordinarily, a solo piper plays that tune through twice. When I got to the end of the first rendition, I didn't dare do it again. I instantly felt 20 pounds lighter. I had amazed myself. As I was putting my pipes away all the Khe Sanh veterans came over and patted me on the back or put their arm around me and said it was great. There wasn't any phoniness about it either. They really meant what they said. I couldn't see very well right then, but I think it was Rob Sutter who put his arm around me and said, "Thanks, brother." It was well worth all the mental wear and tear I had put myself through.

I felt completely dehydrated. I bought two cans of pop from a little girl not much bigger than her cooler and chugged both of them down. That was it. I had done what I came to do and for the rest of the trip I would just be Joe Tourist. There was a drawback, however. Now everyone was convinced that I was just too modest and was, in fact, the pro from Aberdeen!

The sun was heading down as we left Khe Sanh. My only regret was not being there at sunset so I could hear the Rock Apes hooting in the hills. Rock Apes was the generic name we gave to any monkey we saw. The most common were a gibbon-like animal that traveled in groups through the treetops as easily as we walk down the street. Every evening, just at sunset, when we were in the bush on missions, the Rock Apes would settle into their roosts and begin howling. It was a long, drawn out "whoo-whooo-whooo" that gradually went up in pitch. Imagine the din when thirty or forty of them were going at it. This chorus would last about fifteen minutes, and we could sometimes hear it coming from several locations around us. When on patrol, the closer we set in at night to one of these groups without spooking them, the better off we were. The Rock Apes did not hoot if anything unusual was going on, so a lot of monkey noise nearby meant we could relax just a little.

The return to Dong Ha was long and quiet. I checked out the room and noticed that the beds were clean and freshly made but that was the extent of the amenities. The waitresses and other staff were in spotless white *Ao Dai*s and were very efficient. They probably hadn't seen this many people at once in a long time. The food was fair but there were a couple dishes I noticed hardly anyone touched. We just weren't sure what it was. About 9:30 I dragged myself up the stairs, got buzzed by a bat in the hall, and hit the sack.

I decided to take the day off because the group was going to two or three locations that I had never been to when I was here thirty years ago. Just by coincidence I found out that three other people were staying back to go to the Lew Puller School in Dong Ha to deliver pens, pencils, etc. Puller was the son of Marine Corps legend General Lewis Burwell Puller who, while in Vietnam, lost both legs, as well as other serious wounds. Because of who he was, or rather, who his father was, there was tremendous pressure for him to be THE SON OF CHESTY PULLER! His wounds brought his Marine Corps career to a crashing halt and he fell into various addictions and mental problems. One thing he accomplished, though, was to generate considerable donations to an organization called the Vietnamese Memorial Association that was formed to build schools in Vietnam. Because of his efforts, the first of these schools was named the Lew Puller School and there is a bronze plaque with his likeness on it near the front door of the school.

The other three people visiting the school had known Lew as a kid and teenager. This was a special visit for them. Ed Henry had told me that a visit to the school was planned, but I wasn't sure if it necessarily meant the whole group was going. Since I was staying back and had no other plans, I asked if I could go along. I had about ten pounds of pencils, pens, and crayons with me. After a ten minute kamikaze ride we arrived at the school. The cabs pulled into the schoolyard and right up to a flagpole. The school is a masonry, two story, L shaped building with about a two-acre schoolyard. The hallways are external, much like many buildings in the southern US.

One of the group had the headmaster's name, a Mr. Quoc. Somehow, he thought it was pronounced "duck." Two people came out and he asked for Mr. Duck. They obviously didn't speak or understand English, and they had no idea what the word "mister" meant, so the word "duck" had no relevance either. After a few minutes of asking into the whereabouts of Mr. Duck, the desk clerk/spy came out with a lady who turned out to be Mrs. Mai, the assistant headmistress. She understood just a little English, didn't know anything about Mr. Duck, but invited us to her office. It was about ten by twelve feet and had little in it aside from two tables arranged in a T shape with chairs around them. As we sat down, a thermos of green tea was produced and poured into a china teapot, and, from there, into tiny china cups. We toasted, I don't know what. Our spokesman kept trying to explain our presence in his horrible French, which the younger Vietnamese do not speak.

Finally, a couple of us just opened the bags of stuff we'd brought. I think it was only then that Mrs. Mai realized why we'd come. She was very happy to see the pencils and pens and when she saw the two cigar boxes of crayons I'd brought she appeared very surprised and grateful.

Someone began beating what sounded like a bass drum and all the kids came pouring out into the schoolyard. There are two sessions, morning and afternoon, for grades one through six and the total enrollment is 374. Most of the kids wear the school uniform of white shirt and blue pants or skirt. They immediately fell into ranks. For you tactical types, it looked like battalion in column with companies on line) and began a few simple exercises to the beat of the drum. The littlest ones were in the middle and just kind of jumped around. Then, at a certain signal on the drum, they all went screaming back into the school. I had gone down the hall and around the corner to videotape them and before I knew it, my position was overrun and I was hip deep in munchkins.

After things calmed down, they were herded back to their classrooms and we were shown the school's computer room. There were six or eight rather used looking computers someone had donated. Like our hotel, there does not seem to be any electricity during the day so I don't know what good they were. We were introduced to the computer teacher, so I guess they use them, but I don't know when.

On the way to the school, we had passed a large intersection where two or three blown-up American tanks are on display. They are just rusted hulks with weeds growing up around them with a sign dedicated to the Heroes of the People's Army. On the way back to the hotel, the guy in the cab with me said something about stopping to take a picture. I said I would rather not because my ankle was quite sore (it was) and he said OK. In my mind, though, I didn't want to stop because I knew what our tanks look like and didn't need a picture.. It's probably just me but I think any show of interest in something like that is demeaning. It is a monument to the actions of communist forces that almost certainly resulted in American deaths. Remember, even though we are now in South Vietnam, we are in communist South Vietnam and are officially the bad guys...the enemy...the defeated enemy. Except for the South Vietnamese who know better, the people here see us as returning survivors of a beaten invader.

Back at the hotel, I took a short nap and then went down to meet the other three for lunch. While I was lounging in the lobby talking to the desk clerk/spy, a group of about a dozen doctors, nurses, and EMTs from the States checked in. They were in Vietnam holding clinics in several rural areas. I'm not sure who their sponsor was but there are lots of groups like them working all over the world.

About 4:30 the rest of our group came in, tired and dusty. At 6:00 we had an audience in the restaurant with a Mr. Ky. He was a company commander at Khe Sanh, an NVA company commander, that is. Now he is the 2nd to the top dog in the Dong Ha district of Quang Tri province. He arrived with a small entourage including the ever-present Political Officer who is the watchdog at official functions. The Political Officer introduced Mr. Ky to us and made some welcoming remarks. By now it was dusk outside and the electricity had not yet been turned back on so the only light was from light stands put up by the film crew.

Through one of our two interpreters, Cheong, (pronounced Chee-ung) Mr. Ky gave us the party line about letting the past go and work on the future. Blah, Blah, Blah. About then the electricity came on. There was some lengthy discussion between Mr. Ky and Cheong but before any translation was made, Thrinh, (pronounced Cheen), our other interpreter said that Mr. Ky would now take any comments or questions about the action at Khe Sanh. Apparently that was the wrong thing to say because the Political Officer immediately jumped in and there was more discussion in rapid fire Vietnamese. Then Cheong said that because Mr. Ky had another pressing engagement, he would have to be leaving soon and it would be more productive to talk about the future. Afterward, there were several people honestly wondering if we would see Trinh again. Two former Viet Cong who had been in this area were introduced. One was pretty normal looking. The other guy looked like a pretty tough nut.

A couple of people made a few comments and General Mundy made a few comments. Then Mr. Ky and entourage made their exit. The whole thing was pretty much a dog and pony show, but I guess that's politics. We were all ushered out of the restaurant so they could set up for dinner. While we were waiting, the power went off again and the waitresses passed out candles. That probably happens a lot. After about thirty minutes the power was restored and we had dinner. Power went out again at 9:00.

Trinh showed up for breakfast, alive and well, so I guess he didn't dishonor his family too badly. We left the hotel for the bus ride back down to Da Nang but on the way, we stopped at the Puller School. This was obviously the planned visit I wasn't sure about. They trooped all the kids out for the aerobics demonstration, but it wasn't like yesterday. That was much better. We stopped at a few sites in the Dong Ha area and then headed south.

On the 20th, it would be Colonel Meyers' 50th anniversary. His wife was here on the trip and they will be re-married by Father McLean. Colonel Meyers asked me to play "Amazing Grace" for them at their wedding. That was also the anniversary of their son's death. Another no-pressure situation. As mentioned before, I think some people think I know how to play bagpipes. They were soon to be shown the error of their thinking.

Tomorrow the group would be in An Hoa. I hadn't planned on going but Colonel Christy hinted that he would very much like "Amazing Grace" played there. He lost 100 Marines there in an ambush because of a screw-up at battalion HQ. He wanted me to play the "Navy Hymn (Eternal Father)" but there aren't enough holes on the chanter to cover the octaves needed to play it. Colonel Christy didn't mention my pipes for An Hoa, so I didn't bring it up. We cycled over to the Military Museum. It was sometimes difficult to keep a straight face after reading the ludicrous captions on most of the photos. I saw the same photo in three different places in the museum with a different caption on each of them. The picture was of an American GI leaning against a tree with his head down as if he was taking a breather. One caption had him "trapped in a valley," another had him "retreating before the People's Army," and the third had him, "lamenting the crimes he had committed."

Many items on display were nothing more than propaganda posters showing smiling NVA distributing rice to the oppressed people of the American-backed puppet regime of the South. There were large maps of battles where the NVA killed "thousands" of Americans. Oddly enough, Khe Sanh and Hue did not appear on any map and there was no other mention of either place. One photo showed two US medics obviously treating a Vietnamese heat casualty and one of them was holding a canteen to the victim's mouth. The caption explained, "Two American criminals were administering water torture to a brave patriot." Yet another showed a number of NVA looking over several bodies lying on the ground. The caption read, "Our brave warriors examining some of the 1000 Americans killed in May 1965." In May of 1965 I'm not sure there were much more than 1000 Americans in all of Vietnam, let alone that many killed in one action. The best part was that all the bodies in the photo were clearly Asian! The photo contradicted the caption. I guess it must be a case of "don't believe your eyes, believe what you're told."

I took a nap and then hung out in the lobby until 6:30pm when I went with Father McLean to the hotel restaurant to help him set up for Colonel and Mrs. Meyers' wedding. Alan suggested I pipe them in to the "Marine's Hymn" and then at a certain point play "Amazing Grace." Despite how things turned out at Khe Sanh, I didn't have any more confidence in myself and was rapidly getting very nervous. I had not previously learned the Hymn and had taught it to myself on the practice chanter only over the past couple of days.

The restaurant was not air conditioned. My hands were very sweaty. My fingers kept sliding off the holes on the chanter and I messed up both tunes. I was probably trying to hold the chanter too tight. Later, the Meyers' and others said I did a good job and the missed notes didn't mean a thing, but it didn't make me feel much better. I didn't plan on doing any command performances. With my nearly total lack of experience as a musician, to have my first two gigs be a 30th anniversary memorial service and a 50th anniversary repeating of the vows was like a passenger trying to land a 747 after the pilots both have heart attacks.

The Meyers' wedding was held under "field conditions," but otherwise went well. The hotel provided two huge flower baskets and a cake and had made up a sign congratulating them on their anniversary. The English spelling was very creative, but they tried hard. The hotel and restaurant staff was there for the service and knew what was happening, but they all looked a little confused at our bizarre rituals. Tomorrow we'd fly to Saigon.

Only two more nights in country after that. We stayed at the Saigon Star Hotel. Another very nice hotel. Saigon is very different than any city we've seen so far. Except for the signs in Vietnamese and the obvious Asian population, you would think you were in a typical large European city. Wide streets and boulevards, relatively clean with a lot of space devoted to parks.

During a farewell dinner that night, there was a single table set with a black table cloth, a plate with a little bit of rice on it, and a vase with a rose. The chair was tipped up as if it was being saved for someone. It represented the missing man.... those dead or unaccounted for. After dinner, there were several toasts and General Mundy was presented a marble plaque. The floor was then opened for any remarks and several people made very moving comments.

All in all, it was a memorable trip and MHT did a flawless job. I would highly recommend it to anyone and even if you weren't there during the war, it's a tremendous trip into a significant era of Marine Corps History.

Marine Combat Engineers At The 1968 Siege of Khe Sanh

The 35th Anniversary of the Start of the Siege

Story by Bill Gay, Bruce Bell, David Critchley, Frank Kledas, Terry Parr, John Pessoni, and Gerald Traum

This is a history of the part that 1st Platoon, A Company, 3rd Engineer Battalion (Combat), 3rd Marine Division played in the North Vietnamese Army Siege of Khe Sanh during the 1968 Tet Offensive. We had a great platoon. We are proud of what we did.

We paid heavily as many units did. At least eight members of our platoon were killed. So many were wounded that none know the final count. Several are disabled today from wounds and from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD).

We write this history for each other, our fallen comrades, our families, the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, at the urging of an older VA PTSD counselor who uses this history to train younger counselors when someone says they were in the Siege.

As our reasons for writing this history increased, so did its length. We added background to help all families understand Khe Sanh. As each of us remembered more, we added more details. Skip over the background information if you already know it. Smile with us as you read the personal stories. We decided that the only truth that is absolute is that each of us remembers the truth differently.

The Khe Sanh Tactical Area of Operations

What Khe Sanh was can be succinctly defined by the titles of historical works authored by Chaplain Ray Stubbe of the 1st Battalion, 26th Marines ("The Valley of Decision" and "The Final Formation"); by writer Robert Pisor ("The End of The Line – The Siege of Khe Sanh"); and combat photographer David Douglas Duncan ("I Protest").

The Khe Sanh valley and surrounding mountains were beautiful, settled by the Bru mountain tribes, Vietnamese villagers and French coffee plantations. Located in the northwest corner of Vietnam about ten kilometers from North Vietnam and Laos, the valley was an important logistics and invasion route for the North Vietnamese Army when they invaded the South.

Hundreds of US fighting men died and thousands more were wounded, as Stubbe states "because of Khe Sanh." Thousands of Bru and Vietnamese citizens and tens of thousands of NVA soldiers were killed and wounded at of Khe Sanh. The French had a combat base at Khe Sanh before 1954. Army Special Forces started operating in the area in the 1960s. Marines arrived in the mid-60s, building a combat base and defeating the NVA in the vicious fights to control the hills surrounding the Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB), what were later known as "The Hill Battles."

The US presence reached its peak in late 1967 and early 1968 when the 26th Marine Regiment held the KSCB and the Hills against attacks by two NVA Divisions. The NVA attackers probably outnumbered US defenders about 4 or 5 to 1, even though the 26th Marines were reinforced by the 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment, all types of Marine units including 1/A/3rd Engineers, Army, Air Force, Navy units, and a South Vietnamese Army Ranger Battalion.

Route 9, a single lane road, connected the larger Vietnamese cities and Marine bases in the east to Khe Sanh. It also connected Khe Sanh to Laos. The Viet Cong and NVA damaged the eastern length of the highway beyond use sometime in 1967, denying US forces the benefit of being supplied or reinforced by road. The western length of Route 9 to Laos remained open, enabling the NVA to supply and reinforce their units from the Ho Chi Minh Trail. With Route 9 cut, the Marines at the KSCB and on the Hills had to be supplied by air.

That was not too difficult when the Marine garrison numbered only about 1,000. US planes could airdrop supplies on the KSCB using radar controls from the coast near Da Nang, even when visibility fell to a matter of a few feet during the Winter Monsoon season. Supply by air became a real challenge when our strength grew to over 5,000. Supplying the Hills was a tougher job. The Hill defenders, and those who risked their lives supplying them suffered greatly.

The Siege Begins

The fiercely fought 1968 Tet Offensive started at Khe Sanh at the height of the Monsoon season. Close Air Support by fighter-bombers and helicopter gunships, and medical evacuation aircraft often could not help the defenders of Khe Sanh in those early days.

NVA artillery hit the main KSCB ammunition dump the very first time the NVA unleashed what became almost daily massive shelling attacks. The Lang Vei Army Special Forces camp near Laos and the few Marines with the Vietnamese militia in Khe Sanh village were quickly overrun by large NVA forces. NVA tanks, never before used by the NVA against US Forces, smashed through the wire at Lang Vei.

The Marines on the Hills defeated violent NVA attacks. The KSCB was also probed by NVA ground forces.With the Hills and the KSCB undefeated, the NVA used its overwhelming troop strength, artillery and rocket resources, and logistics capability to create the Siege of Khe Sanh.

The NVA relentlessly punished defenders of the Hills and the KSCB with mortars, artillery, rockets, recoilless rifle fire, and direct rifle fire for 77 days until early April. We all knew we could be hit at any time or crushed when an explosion collapsed a bunker or trench.Our normal human senses took on animal-like acuity. We moved like cats from one protective cover to another to minimize the chance of a being hit by a round we did not hear coming. But we heard most of them coming and tensely waited to find out if that round would wound or kill us, a friend, or a nearby stranger.

In April, the Marines broke out of the KSCB and the Hills, attacking the NVA. Many more Marines were wounded and died in these fights, part of Operation Pegasus. The 11th Engineers broke all records building about eighteen bridges and bypasses to enable Army and Marine ground forces to flood into the Khe Sanh area by road, and overland.

More Marines were killed and wounded in engagements in the following months until the Marines departed in the summer of 1968. This departure permanently ended the US presence at the KSCB and on the Hills. Marine, Vietnamese, Army Special Forces and Army regular units continued to operate around Khe Sanh on a temporary basis inflicting great damage on NVA units while continuing to suffer casualties themselves.

Lightly equipped Combat Engineers such as 1st Plt A Co 3rd Engrs were always fighting alongside the Marine maneuver units. More heavily equipped Force Engineers, such as the 11th Engineer Battalion, were always working somewhere to keep supplies flowing to the Marine maneuver units.

Few Knew The Magnitude Of The Siege

From official government records, we know that more US bombs were dropped in defense of Khe Sanh than were dropped in some major theaters during all of World War II. Courageous Air Force and Marine cargo plane and fighter-bomber pilots and crews, and helicopter pilots and crews from all services kept our supplies, replacements, and close air support coming no matter how much NVA anti-aircraft fire was directed at them and no matter how many aircraft and men they lost.

Special US intelligence units in Thailand listened to NVA movements on sensors that a Special Navy anti-submarine warfare squadron, diverted from sea duty, dropped around us. That information helped Marine and Army artillery Forward Observers and Air Force Forward Air Controllers direct devastating fire on NVA units night and day when the NVA prepared attacks.

We recently learned from an article in Red Clay, the KSVA Magazine, that the Navy flight crews who dropped the sensors had to fly so low and slow they were decimated. Most of us crawling in Khe Sanh's red clay never knew these brave men were sacrificing themselves to help us survive.

The Joint Service effort and US technology that helped us win the Siege was impressive, but in the final analysis it was the individual Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen, and Marines at Khe Sanh that held firm, enduring the worst artillery and ground attacks the NVA could deliver. Human costs were high for everyone. Stubbe recorded the names of about 600 US confirmed killed in action. The Charlie Med surgeons log shows they treated about 2,500 wounded in action.

Those numbers don't include all the wounded, and may not include all the dead evacuated directly off the Hills to the rear, the Navy fliers who perished dropping sensors, the pilots and aircrews from all Services shot down, the Special Forces and CIA operatives killed in Laos and North Vietnam while directing fire on NVA reinforcements heading for Khe Sanh, and others that we are just learning about. If we knew who all of those warriors were, the total of US warriors lost at Khe Sanh would be much higher.

Additionally, thousands of innocent Bru mountain tribe members and Vietnamese civilians were murdered by the NVA when the NVA swept into the area. US firepower probably killed many more of those that could not escape the area when we started bombing, or chose to stay in their ancestral homes. Official estimates of NVA casualties around Khe Sanh are about 15,000. Thousands more NVA died on the Ho Chi Minh Trail carrying supplies to the two reinforced NVA Divisions surrounding Khe Sanh.

The once green landscape around Khe Sanh became a barren moonscape from US bombs and US and NVA artillery. Huge amounts of Agent Orange herbicide was sprayed and has ruined the lives of many fighters and civilians on both sides. We've learned that tactical nuclear weapons were positioned for use in case US forces at Khe Sanh were in real danger of falling. Anyone who knows the terrain at Khe Sanh knows that everyone in the area on both sides would have suffered badly if tactical nuclear weapons had been used.

Presidential Recognition

Khe Sanh was declared one of the most significant battles of the Vietnam War. We now know that President Johnson had a scale model of Khe Sanh in the White House and was briefed almost daily on our ability to hold. It would be years before we personally understood the significance of having survived Khe Sanh. Khe Sanh was mostly just red clay to us. We saw it from a few inches off the ground. While we were there, we doubt any of us thought of Khe Sanh's strategic significance. For their dedicated efforts the defenders of Khe Sanh were awarded the Presidential Unit Citation, which is equivalent to the Navy Cross, if it were an individual award.
