After the fall of South Vietnam in April 1975, the NVA erected a victory monument at Khe Sanh attesting to the importance of Khe Sanh to their side. Today, the NVA monument is viewed by international tourists visiting the battlefields. Tourists unfamiliar with the many battles at Khe Sanh may believe the NVA victory claims. The US and Vietnamese forces who fought there know the truth: We won.

The Engineer Build Up

By military doctrine, one Combat Engineer Platoon normally supports one Infantry Battalion. We contribute our expertise with demolitions. We also have pioneer tool chests with axes, shovels, and chain saws. Marine Engineers normally leave these at a base camp.

Combat Engineers carry the same weapons and ammunition as the Infantry. Every Engineer also carries two or more twenty-pound Satchel Charges of explosives. The joke is that a Marine Combat Engineer is really only "a grunt with a satchel charge."

Our Combat Engineer Platoon, 1/A/3, supported the entire Khe Sanh Combat Base. By doctrine, this mission normally would be assigned to a reinforced Combat Engineer Company, a force about five times larger than our platoon and much better equipped.

We were faced with doing the best we could with the meager resources we had. We radioed our company in Dong Ha once a day to report our dead and wounded and plead for replacements and supplies, but few came. We became more exhausted as our casualties mounted, but we never stopped working.

Exhausted men doing a great deal with few resources was the normal state of most support units at Khe Sanh. None of us were going to let anyone down on the KSCB, or on the Hills. In late Fall 1967, our platoon had less than twenty members. We sent teams on 1/26 operations, did mine sweeps and civic action projects in the village, blasted rock for the Seabees to use to improve the runway and roads and operated the KSCB water point. Life was not very dangerous, then.

Battle-weary Engineer veterans such as Cpl Gerald Traum, who fought in the fierce 1967 Hill fights, completed their tours and left for "The World." The rest of us recording this history were arriving. After Thanksgiving 1967, our platoon strength increased to over forty. We knew a big fight was coming, but we had no idea that fight would become the Siege.

Another Combat Engineer Platoon from C Company, 3rd Engineer Battalion arrived about the time the Siege started. We were so busy, we seldom saw them, and strangely, none of us recall what they did. We hope someone records their story. We know they must have been as busy as we were. Captain Bert Ranta arrived to coordinate all Engineer work with the regimental staff. Ranta lived with our platoon in a bunker with 2/Lt. Bill Gay and our platoon sergeant, S/Sgt Ronald C. Sniegowski.

From then on we cleared acres of fields of fire, built hundreds of meters of barbed wire fences, planted hundreds of booby traps and mines, retrieved tons of air dropped supplies that drifted into the minefields, cleared many dead NVA from the minefields, built bunkers, and miraculously kept the water point flowing. We also served as listening posts and reinforced perimeter positions at night.

We worked every day and almost every night in small teams. We seldom knew if our teams had a good or bad day until we returned to our bunkers. That is when we found out about our losses for the day. Some evenings were joyous and some sad.We were only with the units we supported for a short time before we moved on to another mission. Some units never realized we were Combat Engineers. This is why it is so important for Engineers to stay in touch. We were not part of a big family support group like an Infantry Company.

New Fields of Fire and Protective Fencing

In the fall of 1967 most of the perimeter around the KSCB did not have cleared fields of fire or good protective barbed wire fencing. In December 1967, Lt.Gay was talking to 1/Lt. Tim Reeves on the regimental staff about how the perimeter could be improved. Reeves took Gay to talk to Col Lownds about what could be done. Within a day Lownds ordered the Seabees to provide earth moving equipment to help us clear fields of fire, and ordered several Infantry Platoons to work with us to build new barbed wire fences.

The new fences, looking from the enemy side inward, consisted of a high double apron, then a wide empty space to prevent NVA Sappers (i.e., their combat engineers) from breeching more than one fence at a time. An extra wide belt of tangle foot fence, another wide empty space, a triple concertina fence, and another wide empty space before reaching the Marine trenches. Everyone worked hard. The Seabees welded pipes to the sledge hammer heads to replace the broken wooden handles we broke at record rates. We placed empty artillery shell canisters over the fence pickets to create a bigger target for the hammers. Everyone innovated. This Infantry, Engineer Team effort dramatically changed the KSCB perimeter in a few days. The vegetation that once came up almost to the old broken wire was removed. In its place was bare red clay and formidable fencing. The new perimeter protected most of the KSCB and the Special Forces FOB trench lines before the Siege started.

After the start of the Siege, it was too dangerous to clear fields of fire with the Seabee equipment. We did it by hand, burning grass with unused artillery powder bags, and cutting down trees with demolitions. We continued to help the Vietnamese Rangers, 1/9, and 3/26 improve their perimeters while they did a lot by themselves. We wanted very much to help the Hills, but there were not enough of us to be sent there too. We were proud of how much our efforts improved the KSCB perimeter.

Before the Siege, the only type of mines protecting the perimeter was the highly effective Claymore placed by the grunts. But they would not have been enough if wave after wave of NVA attacked. We added hundreds of "Bouncing Betty" and "Shoe Polish Can" anti-personnel mines, anti-tank mines, and innovative booby traps. Our booby traps were made to look like fencing material we left behind in the typical manner of US troops who had too much material. However each of those partially used rolls of barbed wire or abandoned steel stakes was booby trapped and set to explode if an NVA tried to crawl or charge through the fencing. At first, we were able to use the cover of the monsoon fog to hide us when we placed mines. When the weather cleared we had to crawl around in the daylight, or, wait to place the mines at night to avoid NVA fire.

We were often shot at by NVA recoilless rifles and mortars. We never understood why NVA snipers did not kill us one at a time. We expected they would start picking us off one by one any day, which made placing the mines even more stressful. We recorded many of the minefield layouts on cardboard C-ration case covers because we did not have minefield recording sheets. In many cases we paced off the distance between mines by moving on our hands and knees to avoid being shot at or mortared while standing.

We did all this with only one compass that we guarded carefully. When Lt. Gay was wounded he held tightly to that compass even while being treated at Charlie Med, until he could pass it on to Sgt. Sniegowski. If that compass was off, anyone entering the minefields with another compass was at risk. Over the years, we've had the chance to talk to Marine and Army troops that used our minefield recording sheets. We are proud to say that whenever the sheets could be found they were found to be accurate preventing US casualties. Sadly there were many situations where the recording sheets were not found and troops were wounded in our minefields.

We had lots of close calls in the minefields. Once, one our squads found themselves in a maze of grenade and trip wire booby traps the ARVN Rangers placed without telling anyone. While extracting themselves, they crawled through the human waste the Rangers routinely left in front of their positions. We decided that pushing Bouncing Betty mine detonation prongs through a piece of human waste was another good way to fool NVA Sappers, so we added it to our list of camouflage tricks from that day forward.

Many other close calls came as we armed hundreds, if not thousands of mines. We found many old ones from World War II and the Korean War to be in poor condition. We tried to "get the word out" every time we found a problem or a solution because we knew the grunts on the Hills were placing their own mines. Other terrifying close calls came when air dropped supplies would miss the drop zone and land in the minefields. Sometimes we only had to carry the supplies out of the minefields. Other times we would stand frozen in a partially finished minefield as parachutes with tons of palletized supplies came rushing out of the fog. It was a miracle that those pallets did not set off a mine near us or crush any of us.

Many NVA Sappers were surprised and killed by our booby traps as they tried to infiltrate at night, especially in front of the ARVN Rangers. The NVA would have taken heavy losses if our artillery and air power did not stop all of the full-scale attacks they tried to mount against the KSCB. It was gruesome and scary going back in to our minefields to get the NVA bodies out because they were mangled and we knew any mine near the one they set off was now super sensitized. But going in to get their bodies out became a regular task.

Taking the NVA Prisoner That Told Us About The NVA Battle Plans

Shortly before the NVA ground attacks started and after much work on the new fields of fire and protective fences was finished, an NVA recon patrol, including senior officers, risked taking a personal look at the new perimeter. They were discovered and killed trying to escape. As they retreated, one NVA Officer stayed behind and hid. After a few days, he surrendered to the Engineers as we placed mines on the perimeter. We turned him over to the grunts and kept working. His information caused Hill units to attack the NVA while the NVA was moving into position to attack the Hills. A good part of the NVA battle plan must have been changed by the Marines taking the initiative and attacking first.

Imagine what would have happened if the new perimeter had not concerned the NVA so much that they felt they had to try their daring reconnaissance patrol, enabling an NVA officer with so much knowledge of the coming attacks to defect and warn us? Also imagine what would have happened if the few ground attack probes the NVA did try against the KSCB were not so restricted by all the new fields of fire, fences, and minefields?

Opening the Runway on 21 January 1968

When the NVA artillery attacks started on 21 January 1968, the Engineers immediately went to work clearing shells blown out of the ammo dump onto the airstrip. It was a hectic morning filled with CS tear gas, confusion from enemy fire and secondary explosions. We know there were EOD personnel on the KSCB, but we can not remember working with them that day. There was just so much to do that everybody just did what was needed without formal coordination. We did our part to get the airstrip opened, to get casualties out and keep supplies coming in.

Building Bunkers

Before the Siege, many units at the KSCB lived in tents on wooden platforms surrounded by 55 gallon drums filled with dirt and topped with sandbags to create protective walls. After the first day of the Siege, everyone wanted to live completely underground in bunkers. Fortunately, we always lived in bunkers. Before the Siege, friends from other units joked about our damp, dark, cramped bunkers. After the Siege started, everyone envied us. Throughout the Siege, we built some bunkers but mostly, according to military doctrine, we trained people to build them themselves. That was a way to get everyone building.

The Fire Direction Center (FDC) bunker we built for 1/13 was the biggest bunker we built. It is an amusing story. None of us were trained to build large bunkers. We were trained to blow up bunkers, tunnels, and bridges. After brainstorming we ended up using the Seabee equipment to dig a large slit trench over which we built a bridge strong enough to carry a tank. Then, we covered it.

We put empty artillery canisters upside down on the bunker to create a "burster layer." A burster layer detonates a round above an empty space, dissipating the explosion instead of focusing it on the bunker structure. In this case, the NVA rounds exploded when they hit the canister tops, dissipated the blast into the empty shell casings. We got the word out about this use of empty 105 canisters. Soon, almost everyone was making their bunkers stronger with "burster layers." That saved a lot of lives.

Our burster layer solution was real personal. One of our bunkers took a direct hit. Thanks to the burster layer only a support beam split. The bunker did not cave in — that could have killed or wounded many of us. We emerged shaken but alive and started building double and triple burster layers.

The Water Point Miracle

Our success in keeping the KSCB supplied with water was a miracle. We can't believe the NVA didn't target the KSCB water supply. They probably never thought that a reinforced Regiment would depend on a water source located outside of its perimeter and not under its control all the time. The water point was set up sometime in early 1967 outside the eventual KSCB perimeter. This was probably done when the Marines thought they would just be there temporarily.

We had to pump water up from a stream located in a gully on the north side of the perimeter. The NVA could have diverted or contaminated our water source since the stream flowed from terrain the NVA held. The pump had to be hauled down to the stream to pump water up to fill storage bladders. We drew a lot of mortar fire doing that. They could have ambushed us and destroyed the pump every time we rolled it down the hill to pump water up. To our amazement, even though the NVA routinely hit us with recoilless rifle fire when we worked in the minefields, they never ambushed us when we hauled the pump out. They never had a sniper take us out, even though we had to haul the pump out once every few days.

We may have survived because we hauled the pump at such great speed that we surprised everyone. One day we narrowly escaped a napalm drop by the Air Force near the pump site, because the FAC didn't know we were out there. The pipe from the pump up to the bladders was often punctured. During one especially long afternoon and night, we had to figure out how to create a whole new pipeline from damaged pieces. How we solved that unique problem is hilariously funny to explain now. It wasn't funny then. We were being mortared almost the whole time we were crawling around fixing the pipeline. The bladders and purification equipment were damaged daily. We could write a book about the innovative ways we repaired them. Before long, we were patching the patches.

An Engineer Lance Corporal (we think his name was Shipman) kept the water point operating. He is one of Khe Sanh's many unsung, unglamorous heroes. He was always working in wet torn clothes. He also always sported a few bandages from small shrapnel wounds for which he didn't feel he should receive a Purple Heart. Shipman is one of many that deserves an award but never got one. We all just thought we were just doing our job. If Shipman's name was Christman, he died with one of our other platoon members, PFC Emmett Stanton, when the chopper they were on was shot down on 28 February. Stanton and Christman are both listed as "unit unknown" on the KSV Memorial List. Being killed and unidentified was the lot that befell Engineers, since we were attached to larger units and not always accurately counted in the confusion of combat.

Most of us at Khe Sanh didn't even know Stanton was killed until years later. Until we hear otherwise, we will place Christman among our honored fallen, rather than leave him listed as "unit unknown." He had an MOS that was related to the 350 GPM fuel pump that was cleaned and used to pump water to the KSCB.

PFC Delano arrived to replace Christman to keep the water point going. He was soon killed by shrapnel. Who would have ever thought running a water point could be so dangerous? Imagine what Khe Sanh would have been like if we had to run patrols down to the stream to get cans of water instead of pumping it up at 350 gallons a minute, or worse yet, if we had to fly water in because the NVA diverted the stream or simply dumped a few of their decaying dead in the stream everyday?

Bunker Rats

Ray Stubbe in a recent article in Red Clay quoted World War II studies that found that as many as 90% of combatants exposed to continual combat for over 60 days suffer some form of battle fatigue. That wouldn't surprise us, especially when you add the effects of our horrendous living conditions to our constant exposure to danger. Our normal physical condition was one of continual stress from being exposed to danger and to the loss of our comrades, sleep deprivation, hunger bordering on malnutrition, and incredible body filth because we had only enough water to drink.

Our bunkers were alone at the northeast end of the airstrip, across the road from a 1/13 artillery battery. Being alone was good because we could keep our area clean thus controlling the never ending battle with the rats infesting all the bunkers on the KSCB. Other units had to evacuate personnel because of rat bites. That never happened to us. The bad news about our bunker locations was the incessant artillery fire directly over us night and day. The outgoing, added to the constant enemy incoming, made it hard for those of us not helping the grunts man the perimeter at night to get any sleep.

Our isolated position at the end of the airstrip also made it necessary for us to man guard positions around our own area. It would have been easy for an NVA Sapper to drop a satchel charge in our bunkers if one had ever penetrated the perimeter. Between the physically exhausting workload everyday and the perimeter or guard duty we had every night, we probably were much more severely sleep deprived than we ever imagined. Getting basic supplies was also a challenge. Engineers, like other support units at KSCB that operated in a quasi-orphan status without a parent organization often had to scrounge what we needed. Some of our exploits sound like they were written for MASH, the TV Show.

We would trade C4 plastic explosives, which could be burned to heat C-rations, for canned fruit and other goodies that we couldn't get as an independent platoon. Finding an onion was always a special treat that resulted in us all combining our C-rations in a large can to create a "hobo stew"which broke the monotonous taste of the C-rations. We would position a few daring souls to pop up as soon as NVA incoming stopped to go over the fences into the food storage areas and throw out a few cases of fruit or something else good to eat. Most of us lost ten pounds or more before we left Khe Sanh because we only received one, maybe two rations a day even though we worked hard. We suffered varying degrees of malnutrition and vitamin deficiencies. We were just young men, almost all of us under 21 and still growing. We were always hungry.

Our clothes or boots rotted off our bodies, or were torn to shreds in the barbed wire, so we posted an Engineer at Charlie Med to bring us clothing or more M-16 magazines thrown out by the corpsman after they evacuated the wounded and dead. Having to haul heavy loads of mines and other materials was always a problem. Due to constant exposure, it wasn't long before all of our equipment and our only truck were hit so many times by NVA shrapnel that they could not be repaired. This led to our biggest "heist" — a jeep and trailer. We jumped in and drove off with it after the occupants of the jeep jumped out to take cover during incoming. No one remembers the rightful owners ever reclaiming the jeep. We hope that occurred only because of the confusion at the KSCB and not because the original occupants were wounded and evacuated. Life was not easy for anyone at the KSCB. It was hard for us as an independent unit, but we had it many times better than the Marines on the Hills. We'll never forget them. We worked harder on the KSCB, because we knew we were indirectly helping the Hills.

Our Losses Increased

Our platoon was exposed every day and most nights to some type of direct or indirect NVA fire. We tried to be careful and not draw attention to ourselves. We also were fanatical about wearing our protective flak vests and helmets. We tried desperately to get protective shorts but couldn't. Most of our causalities occurred one at a time, but we had a few days when we took heavy losses. One day laying mines for 1/9, four Engineers and five grunts were wounded by recoilless rifle fire. Cpl Claus Berg heard about the losses after working all day on the 1/26 perimeter. His squad immediately came out to help us finish the 1/9 minefield. We all made our way back to the main KSCB together under cover of darkness. On 8 March, Lt. Gay, LCpl Clyde Phillips, and our doc (we think his name was Johnson) were standing by our bunkers talking to Jurate Kazickas, a freelance female reporter working for WOR Radio. She was interviewing Marines from New York City. The NVA got lucky that day. Random NVA artillery rounds wounded all three Engineers and Jurate. Moore was killed a few days later, while attempting to bring hot meals up to our platoon.

Our Personal Experience Were Intense

Each Engineer, like every other person at Khe Sanh, could write a book about their personal experiences and how those experiences shaped their lives. LCpl John Pessoni came to Khe Sanh after going through the worst of the Con Thien battles. He stood out because he was very tall and because he always helped everyone. Pessoni, Phillips, and LCpl Ollie Olsen were part of a team that never stopped working. One day, a Marine tank crew saved Pessoni and Phillips. They were pinned down by an NVA recoilless rifle who caught them working on a forward slope where they were helping a unit booby trap fugas. Fugas was a mixture of jellied gasoline in a barrel that was pushed out from behind by a shaped charge when fired. It is harrowing being pinned down anywhere. It is especially harrowing being pinned down while rigging a booby trap.

Another day Pessoni, Phillips and PFC Upton, who usually supported 1/9 and 3/26 found themselves in a firefight in the 1/9 area. The grunt Gunny Sergeant showing them what he wanted done was wounded. They helped evacuate the Gunny as the jets swooped close in dropping napalm on the tree line from which the NVA were firing. It was Pessoni who later evacuated Lt. Gay, Philips, Doc Johnson, and Kazickas to Charlie Med. PFC Howlett was killed standing next to PFC Terry Parr as they walked across the base coming back from a mission. Parr wasn't scratched. Such unexplainable events happened daily filling us with fear, relief, and guilt.

Parr was a Fire Team leader even though only a PFC. Everyone who could promote him was wounded and evacuated before ordering the promotion. In April, Parr was promoted on the spot by Capt. Bill Nye, the A Company Commander, who was finally able to get to Khe Sanh for the first time. Like so many others, Parr always did his job — and then some. He knew that everything the Engineers did affected many lives. PFC Patrick was killed when our last vehicle was hit transporting supplies. LCpl David Critchley, who normally drove the truck and operated the radio, was spared that day. As our driver and radioman, Critchley was a critical member of the platoon and always on the move. This resulted in him giving much unplanned support to units he encountered. David Critchley and Bill Gay ended up in a Life magazine photo taken during one of Critchley's unplanned assistance stops. They pulled two injured Air Force pilots out of a smoldering observation plane that crashed inside the KSCB. On the day Critchley left KSCB, he dove onto the cargo ramp of one of the last C-123s to land and still be able to take off from Khe Sanh. The crew chief dragged Critchley inside as the plane lifted off through a hailstorm of NVA mortar rounds.

Sgt. Sniegowski and Lt. Gay were with Doctor Ed Feldman and HM2 Tilletson from Charlie Med when he removed a mortar round from the stomach of a wounded Marine. They examined the Marine with Feldman and advised Feldman on how to handle the round. Feldman and Sniegowski went in alone to remove it, to minimize casualties in case it exploded while being extracted. Feldman became a close friend that day and remains one today. Ski was a great Platoon Sergeant. For their heroic actions, Ed Feldman received the Silver Star and Ron Sniegowski, the Bronze Star.

Sniegowski and Gay only argued once. Ski believed it was important to have "green" Engineer replacements clear the NVA bodies out the minefields. He believed this battle hardened them so they wouldn't panic when they got into their first tough situation. Gay felt that was too gruesome for new arrivals to do. After seeing the positive effect of that tough training, Gay decided Ski was right. Not everyone could take the stress. We've struggled to remember the names of more members of our platoon. We recall LCpl Kilroy, who replaced Critchley as radio operator. We also remember Lance Corporals Hrbrich, Lincoln and Fontez, Corporals Bell, Blankie, Ice, and Williams, and a Sergeant Hudson, who after serving two tours in Vietnam, died years later auto racing.

We worked hard. We made a difference. All we could think about was that everything we did on the KSCB also helped the Marines fighting on the Hills. We were not about to let anyone down. Our efforts, the improved perimeter, the minefields and booby traps, the bunkers, the water point, and the help we were able to give to what seemed like a million units, saved lives and helped win the Siege. When the Marines started going after the retreating NVA in April 1968 on Operation Pegasus, the Engineers were again attached as demolition teams. Cpl Kledas and LCpl Richards were wounded while 1/9 was getting ready to move out. They disregarded their wounds and went on the operation as scheduled. A few days later, PFC Phelps stopped an NVA assault on their position and was KIA while helping wounded Marines. For his gallantry, he was awarded the Bronze Star Medal. There is a wing of the Combat Engineers Instruction Company Barracks at Camp Lejeune named in his honor. We were unaware of this until Bruce Bell was located and informed us that he had visited Phelps's family when he returned to the States and learned of the honor bestowed on Randall Phelps.

In June 1968, the surviving members of 1/A/3rd Engrs left Khe Sanh with elements of the 26th Marines to operate further south near Danang until they finished their tours in Vietnam. We don't remember the racial, ethnic, or religious composition of our platoon. We were just young citizens that fought together, cared for each other, and went on to live our lives. Some of us stayed on active service and were able to talk about our experiences with other military men who understood. Most of our platoon went home in anonymity to a public that did not understand or respect what we did until many years later. Each of us has had to find our own way to deal with the insanity that was Khe Sanh.

Finding Each Other Through The Khe Sanh Veterans Association

After thirty years, members of our Platoon started to meet again because of the wonderful Khe Sanh Veterans Association (KSVA) and its successful efforts to include everyone. David Critchley, Bill Gay, Frank Kledas, Terry Parr and John Pessoni were united in 2001 through the KSVA. Most have attended a KSVA reunion. Gerald Traum was the first to join the KSVA but was only found by his platoon mates in 2002 when he placed a memorial to A/T Engineers in Red Clay. Ed Feldman found Bill Gay through professional friends in 2000 and signed Bill up as a KSVA member that very night.

Jurate Kazickas was also reunited with us through the KSVA. Kazickas and eight other pioneering female reporters from Vietnam have just published a book of remembrances entitled "War Torn." Her chapter focuses on her times at Khe Sanh and her being wounded with the Engineers. Bruce Bell found her book on 21 January 2003 and learned Bill Gay and Zazickas had survived. He called them and subsequently found the rest of the platoon.

Bronze Medal Citation for PFC Phelps

For heroic achievement in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam while serving as a Combat Engineer with Company C, First Battalion, Ninth Marines, Third Marine Division. On the night of 3 April 1968 Private First Class PHELPS's unit was occupying a position on Hill 477 near the Khe Sanh Combat Base when the company was attacked by an estimated North Vietnamese Battalion. Despite heavy enemy fire and white phosphorous grenades exploding around him, he delivered effective fire against a squad of enemy soldiers attacking his position, halting their advance. Steadfastly maintaining his position, he continued to deliver accurate fire until the attackers were forced to break contact and flee. On 8 April 1968, his unit's position on Hill 689 came under an intense enemy mortar barrage. Despite the continuing hostile fire and in an effort to expedite the evacuation of casualties, Private First Class PHELPS assisted in embarking wounded Marines aboard helicopters for medical evacuation and was subsequently mortally wounded. Private First Class PHELPS's courage, initiative and selfless devotion to duty despite extreme personal danger were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life in the service of his country.

The Combat "V" is authorized.

We are indebted to Ray Stubbe for starting the KSVA and for pressing us to add our unit history to others already on record with the KSVA. We are also indebted to those Veterans who donate their time to make the KSVA, an organization that includes everyone.

Epilogue

David Critchley served the Federal Government for 36 years. He retired with honors from the Defense Information Systems Agency. At his retirement celebration, attended by a huge number of his colleagues, his many accomplishments were summarized. When Dave made his comments, he chose to remember Khe Sanh first. Bill Gay was fortunate enough to be a guest at the celebration. Dave lives near Pensacola, FL.

Terry Parr went home to York, PA, working for years for Caterpillar Tractor. After struggling alone, he recently sought help for post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). His VA counselor called to tell us Terry did not feel he could ask us for help because some of us were wounded and he wasn't. We are all now helping Terry. Dr. Ed Feldman volunteered too. Dr. Feldman lives near Los Angeles, CA.

John Pessoni went home to New York City. He worked for years with Otis Elevator. Gerald Traum chose to live remotely in Northern California. They both have 100% PTSD disability. They both talk with strong feelings about the members of the platoon and the work we did to help win the Siege. John lives in Toms River, NJ. Gerry lives in Hayfork, CA.

Bruce Bell went from Vietnam to Quantico where he was a starter of the Marine Corps football team. He returned home to Annapolis, MD where he worked as a certified fitness instructor.

Frank Kledas completed a distinguished career in the Marines, retiring as a First Sergeant. Frank is now an instructor at the Colorado School of Trades Gunsmithing School and is a small business owner in Denver, CO.

Bert Ranta was last heard of living in Australia, where he emigrated after leaving the Marines.

Bill Gay saw Ronald Sniekowski once at Camp Pendleton but has been unable to locate him again and wishes he could.

Bill Gay was hospitalized for over a year from wounds received at Khe Sanh. He was awarded the Bronze Star Medal for his heroic actions at Khe Sanh. Col. Lownds helped Bill make an inter-service transfer to the Army Corps of Engineers. Bill completed a military career dedicated to making sure young troops would never again be put in a situation like Khe Sanh. Bill works in the Information Technology business and lives in Great Falls, VA.

We Honor All Who Served

The history of the Khe Sanh battles is a remarkable collection of thousands of personal stories of exceptional service, sacrifice and hardship. We are proud to add our history to all the others. As we find more Engineers with whom we served, we'll update our story.

Until then, Semper Fidelis and God Bless America from: The Veterans of 1ST Platoon, A Company, 3rd Engineer Battalion, 1967-2003.

Where Valor Came of Age

History of 1st Battalion, Ninth Marines, RVN

Excerpts from a story by Colonel John F. Mitchell, USMC, Ret.

Con Thien:

On 5 October 1967, 1/9 relieved 3/9 at Con Thien. The Con Thien Combat Base was receiving heavy incoming of all types. We dug deeper and established a bunker system/trench line for individual survival. No night or daylight patrolling was being executed with night activity being limited to a few LPs at the outer wire. The specific mission assigned the resident battalion was strictly the defense of Con Thien Combat Base and improvement of the defensive posture as enemy shelling would permit. The estimate of the enemy situation at that time was the possibility of enemy attack from the north by up to seven battalions.

The primary friendly offensive action at that time was using supporting weapons only. Available was a 105 battery in general support, 4.2 direct support, a platoon of Ontos, a platoon of tanks, a mixed platoon of Army quad 50s and twin 40s and organic mortars. Air was on an on-call basis, depending on the weather, as well as two 105 batteries at Cam Lo and the 175s at Carroll. I feel that under the tactical restrictions existing at that time, my predecessor with 3/9 had done a good job in holding Con Thien Combat Base. While the casualties were heavy, they were understandable considering the handicaps imposed by the physical terrain and mission imposed by higher authority. The major factors confronting me at this time in order of priority, were:

- Morale factors of the individual trooper, psychologically and physically. This type of situation was against all basic principles of Marine warfare.
- Evaluating the capabilities of supporting arms and integrating all defensive/offensive supporting arms into a coordinated plan.
- To effect a limited, positive ground offensive commensurate with my primary mission of the defense of Con Thien to include both maximum day and night activity.
- Prevent troops and facilities from becoming a target of opportunity as much as possible. This was extremely difficult since our fixed positions were known by the enemy, who had the high ground to the north.
- To continue the constant improvement of defenses (including the start of Dye Marker plan) while keeping casualties to the absolute minimum.
- Finally, inflict as many casualties on the enemy as possible.

Analysis and action taken/accomplished above are as follows:

The enemy operated at will within 800 to 1200 meters of the Con Thien Combat Base perimeter during the day and constantly probed the wire with shape charges and banglore torpedoes during the night. It was obvious to me that, if possible, night and day friendly patrolling was needed. Walking before running — a program of using a squad, then up to a company sweeps to the northwest, west, south, and east of the Con Thien Combat Base was instituted starting with the maximum radius being 500 meters. This increased up to 2200 meters by company, two company size without once experiencing an ambush. However, several heavy contacts with the enemy were encountered. In each case, many enemy were destroyed and an orderly withdrawal executed to Con Thien Combat Base prior to being enveloped by superior forces. By the end of the tenth day, it was common to have two companies and supporting units in the field day and night on assigned missions.

This was primarily successful because no patrol/search and destroy mission was initiated during the hours of daylight, or, by the same route or into the same general areas. I had patrols moving in early morning hours (0300) to pre-designated jump-off spots outside the perimeter. Prior to light, they were well on their way to the objective without enemy discovery. This served several purposes; Night movement became common place. Minimum troops were within the Con Thien Combat Base during daylight hours when most of the enemy shelling took place. The enemy was kept off balance and preoccupied as to where we would strike next and a true picture of my intentions could not be determined. In addition, the troops were kept busy plying their trade while concurrent training and sharpness was maintained.

I established a combat base at what became known as "Yankee Station" approximately 100 meters south of Con Thien. Construction was begun at about the 17th day with constant improvement during the daylight hours and three days thereafter. It was manned by a reinforced company on a 24-hour basis. This eliminated the enemy threat from the south and posed additional friendly attack considerations on the enemy. I feel this forestalled his planned time table of attack. An added plus was the elimination of congestion and targets of opportunity within CCV. This company had only three casualties from enemy incoming while at Yankee Station (34 days). Night ambushes, LPs and OPs were immediately initiated shortly after my arrival. We averaged 12 activities a night. Practically all night probes, enemy mining activity (including banglore torpedoes) stopped.

For the 47 days that 1st Battalion, Ninth Marines occupied Con Thien, a total of only five casualties were incurred from night activity;

It was not uncommon to experience a delay of from 15 to 45 minutes for artillery on observed targets, which was completely unacceptable. A request was made and approved to have the 105 battery within CCB put in direct support of the commander. This resulted in the receipt of artillery fire within two to four minutes from the time of request with obvious results of more kills of enemy personnel. Although the batteries at Cam Lo/Camp Carroll remained in general support, better coordination was effected giving the CCB commander increased priority/authority.

It was a cloudy issue as to who had the authority/control of the air space within the CCB. This was resolved in favor of the CCV commander and daily integrated air strikes were executed under the direct control of the battalion from two strategic OPs, resulting in high ratios of kills on the enemy. During poor visibility coordination between the battalion and the AO on station was effected. This was integrated into the artillery supporting program and enabled constant activity of air or artillery missions at all times. Increased offensive activity when the enemy was expected to attack, obviously upset his timetable and kept him preoccupied.

The above efforts relieved the pressure on CCB, reduced the volume of incoming enemy mortar/rocket fire allowing a major effort to be instigated while establishing the "Dye Marker plan." Eighty percent of the wire, mines, and bunker systems planned at that time were accomplished by 1/9 prior to departure.

Increased confirmed kills — both enemy, destroyed, equipment, secondary explosions, due to supporting arms — resulted in disrupting the enemy Fall offensive. I feel that the above actions of this one battalion materially contributed to this end. I am proud to note that the morale and esprit de corps of the individual trooper was never as high than when this battalion left Con Thien intact with improved training and experienced night training. It was a cohesive organization upon arrival at Camp Evans for further operations. Casualties had been kept to an absolute minimum. Operations at Camp Evans was under the direct control of the Commander of the 4th Marines and his staff. This was the first time after operating under different regimental commanders, they felt the feeling of belonging.

This goes a long ways in morale, esprit de corps and maximum efficiency of the individual Marine. Direct guidance of this nature is both healthy and necessary to any successful attack operation. Keep battalions with their assigned regiment, if at all possible. Any success in guerrilla operations that 1/9 might have experienced while in the Camp Evans areas is attributeable to the direct support, interest and tangible support received by this battalion.

We Arrive at Khe Sanh

On 22 Jan 1968, the first contingent of 1st Battalion, Ninth Marines, arrived at Khe Sanh. Two rifle companies and a 1/9 command group were followed by a rifle company and supporting arms group. This helo lift was followed by the balance of 1/9, less one rifle company and the executive officer which arrived the following day. The helo lift proved to be interesting, as the landings were made in a hail of automatic weapons fire followed by mortar fire from the NVA as we deplaned from the helos. 1/9 received its first casualties at Khe Sanh.

The air strip, as well as the base, was littered with live un-exploded artillery and mortar rounds. The next surprise was where do 1/9 Marines go? There were no guides or directions available to 1/9 Marines. I directed the company commanders to disburse their company as best they could, seek protective cover or trenches, and await further orders.

It was obvious that KSCB was under constant NVA shelling. It was also obvious that no one was safe above ground. Why was I not given at least a brief message with instructions? Welcome to Khe Sanh.

It was late afternoon when my four-man command group and I searched for the 26th Marines command post to report in to the new commander. I understood the chaotic conditions. I realized that the C/O 26th Marines was quite occupied. I was mad, and my sense of humor disappeared over the predicament of my 1/9 Marines.

Compounding this confusing helo landing was the lack of knowledge of the tactical situation at KSCB, as well as the direct hit on the largest ammunition dump, leaving the danger of many un-exploded rounds.

My first meeting with the Colonel Lownds was crusty and to the point. After my short briefing of the current situation by his staff, he gave me orders to assemble my battalion and be prepared for immediate deployment due west of the KSCB. It was about 5pm with not much light left.

I suggested that due to the dispersion of 1/9 at the present time, my lack of any terrain knowledge at Khe Sanh, and darkness approaching, the better part of valor would be an early morning move from KSCB. Col. Lownds insisted that I move out now. I informed the colonel that 1/9 came to fight but not on NVA terms. After further discussion, Colonel Lownds agreed to a daybreak departure for 1/9.

With my initial mission resolved, I left the command bunker in search of a place to stay and a temporary 1/9 command post. By trial and error, we found an abandoned 1/13 bunker equipped with sheets and cots. Since I had no idea where on the base my company commanders were, my order of march, Frag order by necessity, was done by tactical radio. Thanks to well-trained company commanders, 1/9 sallied forth at daybreak, on 23 January. I was thankful to be a whole unit again, eager for a fight, and to control our own destiny.

Movement was slow because of 5- to 7-foot elephant grass and occasional sniper fire.The day was spent in clearing/reconnoitering the area west, southwest of the KSCB. I sought a defensive position to best block a main avenue approach by the NVA.

I chose the "Rock Quarry' which seemed best suited for this mission. It was about 2,000 meters S/W of the KSCB. I personally reconnoitered a small hill fronting the entrance to the valley floor. This knoll was about 500 meters N/W of what became 1/9's MLR.

I directed the acting company commander of Alpha Company to immediately establish a platoon outpost on this position, which later became the celebrated Alpha 1 outpost. Thus, the "dye was cast' for the primary positions/location of 1/9 for the course of the 77-day Siege. I was personally responsible for the selection of 1/9 unit locations.

1st Battalion, Ninth Marines started from scratch in building defensive positions at the Rock Quarry. No trenches, bunkers, wire, mines, or building materials were available. Building defensive positions was of paramount importance. At Con Thien, we at least had bunkers, trenches and covered ammo bunkers, though all needed improvements. In addition, 5- to 7-foot grass surrounding our perimeter imposed difficulties with fields of fire.

The building materials, wire, and mines available at KSCB were slowly sent to 1/9 when available. We were left to our own ingenuity and hard work, digging, scrounging, and utilizing whatever was available from the land. This we did in superb fashion. The fog usually rolled in during the early morning hours, 6-10am. You could actually eat off 1/9's trenches, they were so clean.

I only know of two cases requiring medevac because of rat-bites. This non-battle casualty was a major factor at KSCB causing medevacs. Inspections were held on a daily basis under the supervision of the battalion medical section. In most cases, rat bites required medevac. In some cases, it was an easy way out for some Marines.

Replacements for 1/9 casualties were difficult. I had an informal arrangement with the FOB-3 commander to convalesce a limited number of 1/9 wounded in his superbly reinforced command bunker. It would take a direct hit by a large NVA rocket. 1/9 would select minor wounded junior officers and SNCo's for this RJR reprieve. In a week or two, they were returned to duty. This required no evacuation or replacement.

Basically, the only commands that patrolled daily, weather permitting, was FOB-3 and 1/9. This led to friendly support for each other. Army Major David Smith, FOB-3 commander and I coordinated a plan for patrolling and intelligence gathering. In order to do this, covertly, we jury-rigged a phone the enemy could not tap between our respectful operation centers. Patrol coordination and important intelligence information was gathered for the duration of the Siege.

Initially I was not aware of any animosity between the C/O 26th Marines and the FOB Commander. Very seldom could he get Marine artillery support for his indigenous personnel who ran daily patrols. 1/9 and FOB-3 were the only ones conducting patrols on a daily basis of more than 250 meters. I would help with supporting arms, particularly on FOB patrols to the south. We shared raw in-the-field collection of intelligence information, as well as coordinating our daily patrols.

The following rewards were directly attributed 1/9's patrolling policy

1. The enemy could not probe 1/9's defense wire without facing extinction. In this regard please note that 1/9 had wire, booby traps anti-personnel mines, outside perimeter listening posts, fighting positions and observation posts that averaged 200-300 meters in a 360 degree perimeter from 1/9's MLR.
2. This eliminated bangalore torpedoes, patrol booby traps, and ambushes.
3. Elimination of direct fire weapons, small arms, automatic weapons and minimum mortar fire on 1/9 positions. The NVA were forced to move or pull back the above mentioned weapons or face extinction from friendly supporting arms or combat patrols.
4. NVA tunneling was a reality for 1/9 — but not for long. The easiest tunneling area surrounding 1/9 position, was the south parameter. Capt. Schaefer, Delta Co. reported to me in early March that several tunnels had reached his outside wire, about 250 meters away.
5. The remedial procedure worked out with Capt. Schaefer, was that at early light or just before the fog lifted, he was to send a unit into the tunnel, eliminate the NVA and fill up the tunnel/trench with dirt. Or, if necessary, destroy their tunnel work with satchel charges; then return to their defensive positions. The size of the friendly forces assigned this task would range from a fire team/squad to a platoon. Whatever was necessary to get the job done. The follow-up on this procedure was to patrol frequently to 400 meters south of the rockpile to insure detecting the beginning of tunnel activity.
   This procedure went on for several weeks before it suddenly stopped. The battalion S-2, while monitoring the NVA radio nets intercepted the following message:
   "Discontinue tunneling activities in the 1/9 sector as it is non-productive. We can come back for the destruction of 1/9 positions after we have seized the KSCB proper."
   This was a compliment to 1/9's defensive posture and its success in eliminating the tunneling. Our monitoring of NVA nets also disclosed their complete knowledge of the Marines T/O and T/E of all the Marine units at Khe Sanh. This included the names of all key commanders.
6. In excess of 8,000 tons of supplies, (food/ammunition were delivered by parachute and extraction). Retrieving a significant portion of the parachute supplies (lappes) was an additional mission of 1/9. These supplies landed in no man's land west of Khe Sanh and NNW of KSCB.
   I assigned Charlie Company the mission of recovery, supported by Alpha Company. The Marines assigned this task were subjected to constant sniper/mortar fire while in the open. They were even ambushed. The NVA were competing in this contest to recover these supplies. It was a rare incident when 1/9 Marines lost. 95% of all recoveries were successful.

1st Battalion Ninth Marines was not adequately prepared to repel an enemy attack. Request for additional anti-tank weapons was made to Colonel Lownds. We received one tank, several 3.5 rockets, and tank mines, enough to cover one major approach into 1/9's position, the south perimeter of D company. In order to cover the gaps, we conducted school on preparing satchel charges to be attached to NVA tanks. Since we knew the vulnerability of the Russian PT76 tank, instruction was given in each 1/9 company for a group of volunteers on the what, when, and particularly the where to place a satchel charge on the enemy tank. The C/O of H&S Company was tasked with organizing a reserve force. This group included me and my staff to corral any intruders who broke through.

I directed B and D companies to be prepared to support the attack with their crew-served weapon upon my order. The one tank I had was moved from the daily camouflaged parking protection deep in the Rock Quarry to the top of the hill, D company's position for direct fire support. This was the first time, during daylight hours, that the tank was sent into direct support. I joined the C/O of D company on top of the battalion command bunker, to coordinate the supporting fires. The tank commander unleashed devastating fire power on the NVA to the

S/W on the valley floor. That Sgt. earned his spurs that day with an outstanding display of marksmanship, firing at a range of 500-700 meters to S/W Alpha 1.

Every night this tank was moved under the cover of darkness, to its defensive position facing south in the D company perimeter. Since 1/9's night outposts reported hearing the movement of suspected NVA tanks from the south, in the vicinity of Khe Sanh village, I assumed that the NVA also could hear our nightly tank displacement. The enemy may think 1/9 had a tank capability, but he wouldn't know how many.

I have been asked in the past by my seniors why I had an Alpha-1 outpost. It was a difficult decision, but one made rapidly. An evaluation of the terrain in 1/9's sector of responsibility convinced me that an all-out assault by the NVA on KSCB would require more than one major avenue of approach. Alpha-1 outpost was selected for its potential, being astride the west to east axis to KSCB. I also needed as much warning as possible before the enemy would reach 1/9's MLR.

According to Intelligence cited in the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines Command Chronology for period 1-29 February, 1968, a planned, heavily concentrated enemy attack against the main Khe Sanh Combat Base in early February during the Tet offensive was disrupted by friendly forces and the fact that the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines including its Company A strong point position, forward Platoon outpost Alpha One was occupying one of the enemies main avenues of approach to Khe Sanh.

The unclassified information now available at H.Q. U.S. Marines Corps, Washington, D.C., therefore indicates that this above referred action of Feb. 8, 1968 was not only the heaviest, defensive line combat for any 24-hour period during the Battle of Khe Sanh but that this above action also marked the slackening of enemy ground troop action against Khe Sanh. At this turning point, the NVA tactics began shifting to increasing use of artillery, rocket and mortar shelling at Khe Sanh.

Company A, 1st Platoon's forward outpost action on 8 Feb, 1968 resulted in one enemy Battalion rendered ineffective, and half the total (NVA) weapons captured for Operation Scotland. After this action concluded, two highly important documents were captured, including many other documents and a letter of prime intelligence value. One enemy POW was also taken. The Command Chronology stated that the outpost's resistance at its strong point position (Alpha One) on 8 Febraury 1968 and their supporting companies response the following day appeared to have upset the enemies' timetable. Enemy contact during the middle of the month slackened. Among the weapons captured were thirteen crew-served weapons, three heavy machine-guns, nine light machine-guns and one 60mm mortar.

The total KIA of NVA soldiers exceeded 150 on this day. The 1/9 battalion received over 350 rounds of enemy supporting arms fire in their command perimeter.

When possible throughout the Siege, Colonel Lownds directed that I attend his daily briefing by his staff. In order to get there, my runner Cpl. Luzon Beasly and myself used a mule (cargo cart), the only vehicle there, to make the dash through 2,000 meters of no man's land.

This sometimes subjected us to sniper fire or incoming mortars while en route. The mule had no sides. On such occasions, one, or, the other would give the alert. We would bail out on each side until it was all clear — then continue our trip. Cpl. Beasley was killed in action March 30th, 1968 while administering first aid to wounded Marines from NVA rocket rounds. He unselfishly gave his life for his fellow Marines.

I was unaware until after leaving Vietnam of the slogan, "Walking Dead." As I now understand, my initial situation when I assumed command of the 1st Battalion Ninth Marines was a low morale factor. This was attributed to several factors: heavy past battalion casualties, no clear established goals, objectives, or reason for being there. There was also a sense of not belonging, bouncing from one regiment to another, and a lack of desire to " win" not just survive.

Those above mentioned qualities were revived with significant results. During my tenure, never did we as a whole cohesive, operating unit become decimated by ambush or assault commensurate with an acceptable casualty ratio of friendly to enemy. As a Junior Officer in Korea, I learned this while participating in the Chosen Reservoir campaign and later as an infantry platoon, executive officer and C/O of a rifle company. I know what chaotic trauma a small leader goes through during and after hand-to-hand combat.

Thus, it is very difficult for me to accept a demeaning title such as "Walking Dead." Not on my watch! Never was this "title' ever discussed in my Battalion while I was commanding the 1st Battalion Ninth Marines.

On July 18, 2002, I had the honor and privilege, of presenting long overdue awards of valor to two members of 1st Platoon, A Company, 1st Battalion, Ninth Marines. In a ceremony held at the annual reunion of 1st Battalion Ninth Marines, I presented the Silver Star Medal to Lawrence Seavy-Cioffi and the Bronze Star Medal with "V" for Valor to Edward O'Connor. They earned these awards for defending Hill 64 (Alpha-1) on 8 Feb 1968.

When their position was attacked by a reinforced NVA Battalion outnumbering them 10-1 on 8 Feb 1968, both men, with their platoon leaders severely wounded, became the main leaders to step forward, leading the platoon in a vicious fire fight until reinforcements arrived. The attacking enemy was annihilated.

Squalls Between the Storms

by John M. Kaheny

The time between the Battle of the Hills in late April and early May of 1967 and the beginning of the Battle for Khe Sanh in January of 1968 has often been described as the 4 silent months. Captain Moyers S. Shores II, USMC, in his book "Battle for Khe Sanh," called this time the "Lull Between Storms." This may be because there are few written accounts of combat activity in the Khe Sanh area during this period. Even Ray Stubbe's and John Prados' excellent history of the Siege of Khe Sanh, "Valley of Decision," does not dwell for long on the events immediately following the NVA defeat on Hill 881N. Perhaps as one who was there, I can share some personal insights and observations on those difficult first 30 days at Khe Sanh for the Marines and sailors of the First Battalion, 26Th Marines.

The first week of May, 1967 found 1/26 continuing to guard the main supply route from Danang to An Hoa. Although headquarters remained on Hill 55, on May 2 Alpha Company deployed to the far side of Liberty Bridge and into the villages of My Loc and Phu Loc. Without notice, orders arrive, and the battalion was moved within a week to Phu Bai to prepare for Operation Cumberland, a road-building attempt into the A Shau Valley. The word was changed once again and by May 10 both Alpha and Charlie Companies had arrived at Khe Sanh.

The Hills before the squall.

On the day I arrived at Khe Sanh, I had commanded the Third Platoon of Alpha Company for almost four months. In those months we had been fairly successful in operating against the VC northeast and southeast of Hill 55. We took several casualties from mines and snipers and lost 3 Marines to the enemy. We had even been "Sparrow Hawked" to Walt Boomer's Hotel Company 2/4 and after a successful night helicopter assault, chased an NVA regiment off Charlie Ridge. With many of the platoon being veterans of earlier operations such as Deckhouse and Macon, we thought of ourselves as a well seasoned experienced combat force. We were wrong; we had not seen anything yet.

When the gate of the C-123 dropped onto the red clay of the Khe Sanh airstrip, the first thing we saw was the thick, cold, gray fog known as crachin. As the fog parted we saw them, the walking wounded from the Hill Fights. Some were standing but most were sitting or lying on the dark red clay mud. The line stretched down the road to what later would be called the "Ponderosa." We walked silently past them for several hundred yards to an assembly area where with the help of the slowly clearing sky, we caught our first glance of Hill 861. We were a very serious and somber bunch.

The next day, May 11, Alpha Company boarded CH-34 helicopters and went to Hill 881S. It was a depressing mess. Colonel John Lanigan, commanding officer of the Third Marines, and his staff were preparing to march back to Khe Sanh. They were all spent from the fighting. We wished them well and began preparing our defenses. There were a few fighting holes and several NVA bunkers available for use, but that was it. First Lieutenant Norm Centers, the commanding officer of Alpha Company, placed Rusty Reeve's First Platoon on the west knoll of the hill complex. Larry Bolger's Second Platoon and my Third Platoon secured the main portion of the hill. It was cold, muddy and the stench of rotting flesh was overwhelming. With our blankets in storage not needing them in Phu Bai, we slept in recycled body bags to keep from getting hypothermia. Earl Hawkins, my platoon sergeant, jokingly filled out a casualty card and tied it to my bag, saying he was just trying to be efficient.

The next several days brought 14-hour patrols and long sessions of trench digging. The engineers were forced to blow the trees because their chain saws broke on the shrapnel infested trunks. Centers evidently had promised Lt. Colonel D.E. Newton, the Battalion Commander, that the defensive fortifications could be built in no time at all. This, combined with the battalion staff's lack of appreciation for the depths of the ravines around the hill, caused the men to be worked and marched almost to exhaustion. Most chilling was our uncovering of scores of Marine helmets with holes in the crown and M-16's with cleaning rods down the barrel and rounds jammed in the chamber.

During the next several days, our aggressive patrolling resulted in sporadic sniper fire from the west. Charlie Company, coming off Hill 881S, engaged a few NVA almost due north of 881S. The NVA appeared to flee to the northwest, behind Hill 88 IN. The only significant events for the first 10 days on the hill were the VIP visits. It seemed that every general, admiral, and photographer in WESPAC wanted to be seen on top of Hill 881S.

On May 20,

Centers said he had a mission for the Third Platoon. He informed me that the next morning the Third Platoon would leave very early and proceed west of Hill 881S for about 2,000 meters on a reconnaissance-in-force mission. The sniper activity had caught the attention of the Battalion Operations Officer, Capt. Ray Velasquez, the recent Alpha Company Commander. I was ordered to take two squads, each reinforced with an M-60 machine gun team and a 3.5 rocket launcher team. I would also take along a forward observer team from the 81mm mortar section co-located with Alpha Company on Hill 881S. We were told to wear soft covers and no flak jackets, as we might have to move fast. That was an omen. In addition, I was informed that once the fog lifted we would be supported by two UH-1E gunships, call signs Oak Gate 1-1 and Oak Gate 1-2. The gunships' mission was to recon by fire on targets we would mark.

When I briefed the platoon, I was reminded that my platoon sergeant, Earl Hawkins, needed to be at the Battalion Aid Station the next day for treatment. That meant that Cpl Beard, the 81mm forward observer, would be second in command. Our platoon guide, Sgt Lopez, would be in charge of the platoon's defensive position on Hill 881S. Going out without them did not concern me very much as the mission had been described as "a walk in the sun." I did not even imagine at that time that we were, to paraphrase Sir Winston Churchill, about to march onto the pages of the New York Times.

The next day, Sunday, May 21, 1967 at 0520, 43 Marines and two corpsman slowly moved out the west gate of Hill 881 S and into the dark fog. The fog was so thick that it took us until almost 0800 to reach Hill 821. We set in for a while for the fog to lift. Soon we could see and we moved northwest about 800 meters further along the ridgeline to a place where we could set up an observation post. Just before we got to the small crest, we heard gunshots to the northwest. Some were fairly close but others were more distant. We held up and waited for the sun to burn off the fog at Khe Sanh so the gunships could launch.

At about 1000, Oak Gate 1-1 and 1-2 came on station. I took a hunch and ordered Cpl. Contrereas to have his gunner L/Cpl. Guererro put a smoke round into the tree line that faced us to the north, about 500 meters away. Guererro overshot and the rocket went about 200 meters further into an extension of the same tree line which protected the streambed. I told Oak Gate 1-1 to just go for the smoke. To our mutual surprise, especially Guererro's, the gunships kicked up about 10-15 NVA hidden in the streambed. We couldn't see the NVA but the gunships could and made several runs expending their ammo. We joined in with our 2 M-60's for a short bit until I got a report that the platoon had found a freshly used sniper position just behind us. It had a clear view of Hill 881S. The position was about 1300 meters to the west edge of our position on Hill 881S and the distance explained why we had received so many "spent rounds" on the Hill. We knew the position was recently used because we found a letter he had used to clean himself. We ceased firing down into the streambed/ tree line.

Oak Gate 1-1 then informed me that they had another mission and would be back when we needed them.

Soon we heard distant sporadic fire from the northwest. We set in and made sure no friendly recon patrols were in the area. A bit later, the shooting stopped and we set up a 360 degree post. We saw no movement.

About 1030 things began to get a little strange. Lt. Centers ordered me to assault the tree line. I told him I didn't think that was such a good idea as we only had two maneuver elements and our approach down the slope to the streambed lacked cover and concealment. He suggested we use smoke. We talked for a bit as we started down the slope and I was finally able to convince him that smoke wasn't the solution, as the NVA knew where we were and what our numbers were. In addition, we had no idea of how many NVA were in the streambeds. He then told me to try to envelop the streambed by cutting further northwest. We did, but continued to hear more gunfire in front of us from the higher elevations on the other side of the streambed. Centers then told me to hold up and wait. I did not know at the time but at 1100, Admiral Sharp, CINCPAC and Major General Hochmuth, CG, 3d MAR DIV, landed on Hill 881S. The dog and pony show evidently distracted Centers as the company net went silent for a long period except for requests for our situation and spot reports. It is also highly probable that the gunships had been called back to escort these VIPs.

We were eventually told to sit tight and register artillery. I picked a round piece of high ground covered with elephant grass. It was marked on the map as Hill 729. It was distinguishable by several bomb craters and the burnt out stump of a destroyed tree. Both the stump and the craters would play a major role later in the afternoon. Cpl. Beard and I registered Alpha Battery, 1/13's 105s on likely avenues of approach, focusing on the tree line and streambed to the north. We were too far out for 81's to be of any use.

At about 1500 or so, Centers came back on the net and told me to check out the streambed. I found a way to mask our movement to any NVA who might be watching from the ridge line to the north, by circling west and then north. It seemed like a good move, but it required us to travel into some dead radio space. To solve that problem I had Cpl Fallone and two fire teams set up in the bomb craters and act as a radio relay. I didn't like splitting our small force, but I had no choice as maintaining radio contact with Alpha Company was necessary. I also did not intend to go too far as we were approaching the end of the artillery fan. We moved out slowly and covered our movement.

Once in the streambed, we found a couple of surprises. The first was a well-used trail, the size of a jeep trail. It was in great shape and had too many footprints for our comfort. The other surprise was several holes — about two feet in diameter — going straight into the ground. At first, we thought that they were tunnels but soon figured out that they were caused by dud bombs dropped at high altitude, probably by an A-6 Intruder during the Hill fights.

At about 1700, PFC Runion, a machine gunner, spotted the NVA standing in the open on the ridge line to the north. There were four of them and they were obviously trying to find us. Runion wanted to shoot as they were about 800 yards away. I told him not to fire as it would give our position away. I contacted Fallone who related that he couldn't see the NVA from his position, as he was staying in defilade. I decided it was time to get back together and let the artillery handle the NVA. The lead squad broke right, and we avoided the streambed on the way back. That was a good move and probably kept us from being ambushed.

Once back at the blackened stump, we set up in a lopsided 360 in the grass with most of the fire power on the north side. We had plenty of concealment but little cover except for the craters. When I notified Centers of the location of the NVA observation post, he put the company's artillery forward observer, Lt. Chuck Willis, on the radio. I had but one radio and traffic was pretty cluttered on the company net, and it was about to get worse. Chuck informed me that the NVA position was just outside the range of the 105 battery, but he had two 155 howitzers available for a precision destruction mission. He asked if I knew how to adjust a precision destruction mission, and I responded in the negative. Chuck said it was easy and he would teach me. He did.

The first round was short and low on the slope and the NVA didn't move. I think they knew the range of our 105s and believed that they were safe. I started moving the rounds slowly up the slope. They didn't even flinch, and one of them appeared to flash the universal sign of disrespect towards us. The next round took the top of the knoll right off. Nothing remained. We got them. Everyone cheered. I passed the word to saddle up and head home, as it was 1800 and we needed to be back and guard Hill 881S before it got dark.

At exactly 1805, the NVA charged out of the tree line and assaulted up the slope, supported by mortars, RPGs and grenades. First, they went for the M-60's, rocket launchers and radios. In the initial volley, Runion's arm was torn off and Guerrero's launcher received a hit and the vibrations split both of his hands. PFC Thomas Henderschott was killed almost immediately as a round pierced his radio. L/Cpl Roger Hurd was hit and killed as he fired his M-16. The round went in one armpit and exited the other, testimony to his being in the off-hand position when hit. Dennis Thayer was knocked over by a grenade and momentarily stunned but recovered and came up shooting. The NVA ran right past him. L/Cpl Fraley spotted an NVA machine gun team coming up the slope. He took aim with his M-79 grenade launcher and fired one round into the gunners chest, it exploded and the A/gunner also went down. PFC Kemp cut down several NVA as they charged right in front of him. PFC Mike Trenholm was hit in the arm and his hand was almost lost. Both corpsman, Doc Rock and Doc Brannon were hit by grenade fragments. L/Cpl Faldutti, a fire team leader, was hit in the back of the head with a batch of shrapnel. A second wave of NVA broke out of the tree line. Fraley and the other grenadier, Russell Turner, fired continuously into the NVA formation slowing the assault. Gabe Bovenzi, recently transferred from 3/26, joined in but they kept coming.

Due to the height of the grass, I could not see very much and with one squad radio out of commission things got a bit confusing. I knew one thing for sure — we needed help and fast. Then, the first of three miracles occurred. I called in an on-call fire mission to Alpha 1/13 and gave them an adjustment to bring it in "danger close." We were just within maximum range from Khe Sanh Combat Base and the gun target line was parallel to our position. I asked for a battery six. Just then it occurred to me that with the way Alpha Battery was laid out and the position of the marking gun, there was a great chance that the left platoon's rounds would fall right on top of Alpha Three. I called for the left platoon to check fire and to fire with four guns. The gunners did their job and the rounds landed right between the tree line and our position, stunning the NVA and killing several. I repeated the mission several times. This gave us a chance to consolidate around the craters, but we needed to counter attack to recover Henderschott and Hurd's bodies. My radio operator Bozo Worden handed me the radio and charged down the hill. Soon Cpl. Fallone followed with his fire team. For a short period of time, I was alone on the crest of the crater with only my .45 caliber pistol and the NVA running all over the high ground. I spotted Les Faurebrac moving down the hill and ordered him to protect my rear while I called in the medevac mission. He was torn because he wanted to go help recover the bodies and help the wounded. Alpha Battery continued to fire and we were able to get the wounded to one of the craters. We began having problems with the M-16s jamming, but we solved that problem quickly by using the weapons of the wounded. Just then, the second miracle arrived.

My radio cracked, "Pinefold Alfa Three this is Oak Gate 1-1, we are inbound." Fortunately, the gunships had been monitoring our frequency and had heard the call for the danger close artillery mission. Since we were fairly close to where we had been in the morning, they knew where the NVA's positions were and rolled right in with rockets and guns. Even with the artillery in check fire mode the radio traffic was almost unmanageable. At one point, Steve Street came up and carried the radio. Bozo Worden was now busy trying to recover our dead and wounded. Centers kept demanding information, but we were too busy fighting off the NVA. I told him we had 2 KIA and we would attempt to recover them under the gunships' suppressing fire. Centers then said something over the net that was interpreted by everyone who heard it as ordering me to leave the bodies and pull back. My response was short and to the point. We were coming out together. All of us.

I recall the call sign for the medevac was Button Vermillion. As Button Vermillion (a CH-34) approached, the pilot asked for the location of the zone, the best approach, and if the zone was hot. I looked down the rear slope of the knoll we were on and spotted a place in defilade. I told the pilot that the north side of the knoll was hot but if he could land behind us he could make it. Oak Gate 1-1 concurred.

Cpl. Bozo Wodren and 2Lt. John Kaheny.

Unfortunately, as Button Vermillion was making its approach, the pilot decided that the grass was too high on the reverse slope so he came in towards where I was standing with the radio handset. He must have thought that since I was standing on the crest that it was safe. He came right in. Fortunately, we had Faldutti, Trenholm, and Runion ready to go because the zone exploded with incoming rounds. I heard two large cracks and later would find that two AK-47 rounds had pierced my trousers. The crew chief got out of the CH-34, checked out the bullet holes, threw me the finger, saluted smartly, and jumped back in. Button Vermillion took off with the wounded safely aboard.

With the gunships continuing to rake the tree line, we were able to bring the two bodies to the craters. Soon Oak Gate 1-1 said he was out of ammo. Oak Gate 1-2 said he had enough for one more run. He came in with the crew firing small arms and throwing ammo boxes on the NVA. It was a sight to see! Now we were in trouble. Our firepower had diminished considerably as a result of casualties. In addition, it would take eight Marines to carry the two bodies up the slopes toward Hill 821. If the gunships left to re-arm, we would be in big trouble moving in the open grass. Miracle number three arrived just in time.

You could hear them before you could see them. Four tiny dots with afterburners. Two flights of F-4 Phantoms, pregnant with destruction, roared in from the west. Oak Gate 1-1 would control, freeing me to reorganize the platoon and convince Button Vermillion to come back for the bodies so I could free up the eight Marines carrying our dead. Coming straight down the streambed from the direction of 881S the four Phantoms, dropped a continual stream of 500 pound bombs and napalm so close to us that we had to turn away to avoid the flash and blast. It became difficult to breathe but Oak Gate kept them right on target. Not surprisingly, the NVA finally stopped firing and tried to disperse. The Phantoms kept coming. The First Marine Air Wing was nothing less than magnificent that day.

We had moved about a half a mile when Button Vermillion returned to pick up the bodies of Henderschott and Hurd. This time the zone was cold. I ordered Guererro to get on board also as he was useless with both hands split open. We now had the luxury of freeing up the Marines who had been carrying their brothers.

Slowly, we made it to Hill 821 where Rusty Reeves' First Platoon had come out to help us with our walking wounded. By this time, the Phantoms had done their job and Oak Gate went back to base to rearm. It got very quiet. Rusty greeted me cheerfully, but his eyes went right past me. He said "How many tree stumps were on that knoll, John?" I turned around and looked back at Hill 729. What had appeared to Rusty as tree stumps was in reality scores of NVA troops sweeping the area picking up their dead and wounded. I called for artillery to hammer the NVA but the request was denied. I was told we were now conserving artillery in case our positions were attacked later that night.

It was almost dark when we reached the west gate of Hill 881S. Sgt. Hawkins was waiting for me. I thought that Street and I had been bringing up the rear but just as we got to the gate, Cpl Hinds came out of the tall grass. He had been watching out for us, just in case. Hawkins said he could account for everyone. No one was missing, so the three of us entered the perimeter.

It wasn't until the next morning that we knew how many of the platoon had actually been wounded. Several Marines awoke the next morning to find grenade shrapnel under their skin. Evidently, the adrenaline rush had dulled their sense of pain. Out of the 45 who had left Sunday morning, two were dead, three were evacuated Stateside and twelve were treated and returned to duty. We wrote the after action reports and turned them over to Centers.

On May 23, 1967 the New York Times covered the fight on a page dedicated to war news along with an ironic report of the continuing problems with the M-16 rifles and a general denial of any problem with them by Lt. General Walt. For our part, the Times simply said: "Near Khe Sanh [sic], just south of the demilitarized zone, a reinforced Marine Reconnaissance platoon fought an enemy force for almost an hour. A spokesman said later that 25 enemy guerrillas and two Marines had been killed and eight Marines had been wounded." Captain Shores in his "Battle for Khe Sanh" simply states "On 21 May, elements of Company A, 1/26, clashed sharply with a reinforced enemy company; 25 NVA and two Marines were killed. The same day, the Lang Vei CIDG camp was attacked by an enemy platoon."

The number of NVA killed on May 21 is an educated guess and is based on the reports from Oak Gate 1-1 and the accounts of the individual Marines of Alpha Three. Two things were clear — the NVA was not reluctant to attack in the open during daylight, and the NVA was still out there, despite the good efforts of Alpha Three.

On May 30, Alpha Company moved out in force to check out the approaches to Hill 915, an area just south of where we had made contact on May 21, but we found nothing. Low visibility canceled our air support, so we came back early. We were soon relieved on Hill 881S by Bravo Company. I spoke briefly with Captain Connell, the Bravo company commander, and told him of the danger to the west. He told me that for awhile the only patrolling done would be by a company or a larger force and not by platoons. Alpha headed off to the Khe Sanh Combat Base for showers and beer.

Things were quiet for about a week. On June 5 Alpha Company was sent west on Highway 9 to assist in searching for GySgt Ibanez, a member of a recon team, who simply vanished into the night, leaving only a small blood trail and a dental plate. We found some NVA harbor sites nearby but we got the feeling a tiger may have got him. We spent the night in a deserted Montagnard village on the south side of the road. We heard the artillery firing all night long as Hill 950 came under attack and was overrun. Helicopters picked us up in the morning, and we were first told to prepare to land on Hill 950. In a moment, the orders were changed and we were sent to Hill 881S. Bravo Company was fighting for its life just SW of Hill 821. The company command group and two platoons had walked into an ambush.

When we arrived on Hill 881S, the Alpha Company command group along with 2d Lt. Guy Pete's platoon had already departed and joined the fight. Doug Sykes, the Bravo Company executive officer, met me at the command post. We were soon joined by Rusty Reeves, but Rusty's platoon was still on the way. Centers had checked off the Alpha company net without notifying anyone and was using his radio to help control the air strikes. We had no idea what to do. We could see that Bravo was heavily engaged and that the NVA were still in the grass to the east, south and north of the company. A-4s and F-4s were rolling in dropping napalm and 500- and 1000-pound bombs. We learned that Bravo had lost 18 KIA and 27 WIA. Two of the KIAs were radio operators from A/1/13. Both platoon commanders had been wounded. Second Lt. Dennis McDonald, shot in the leg, was evacuated. Second Lt. Richard Stewart was still in the field with a bullet hole in his arm. Fourteen other Marines had been wounded. Bravo had made a turning movement to the SW off Hill 821, across a saddle known as the land bridge and was isolated by mortar and machine gun fire, including at least one .50 cal. machine gun, before the NVA came out of the low ground to the west and east in an attempt to cut the company off. The NVA had attacked in a well disciplined manner, on line with the command groups behind the assault squads.

Not having any information or orders, Doug, Rusty and I debated what to do. Doing nothing was not in the equation. Since Alpha Three was on Hill 881S and — I am proud to say — eager to attack, I volunteered to go out to Hill 821 to cover Bravo's withdrawal. So Alpha Three went out the west gate again. We moved quickly to Hill 821 and set up our M-60's. There were plenty of targets of opportunity. We engaged and caught many NVA running to the north as the A-4 Sky Hawks continued their runs. One A-4 caught several NVA trying to run up hill away from the A-4. It was no contest. Soon, most of the seriously wounded had departed by helicopter and Bravo Co. was able to consolidate its position. By a little past 1600, Bravo passed through our lines on Hill 821. Several walking wounded were among them including Lt. Stewart. Centers, who had not communicated with Alpha company the entire time, appeared to be embarrassed when he found us on 821. He was glad that we had taken the initiative in coming out to help. We helped with the wounded and marched back to 881S.

Although the official reports state that 18 Marines died that day, only 17 are listed in Ray Stubbe's "Final Formation." They are; L/Cpl. James L. Blaz, L/Cpl. John J. Chase, Cpl. Ronald L. Crooks, L/Cpl. Robert F. Enderby, Cpl. Edward F. Furlong, Pvt. Gale E. Gotti, PFC. Thomas M. Healy, PFC. Kenneth M. Johnson, L/Cpl. Kenneth R. Keefer, PFC. Steven L. Millet, PFC. Larry L. Morris, PFC. Wayne M. Pitts, PFC. Frank J. Shovlin, PFC. Philip A. Van Deusen, L/Cpl. Edward A. Vercouteren, Cpl. Walter L. Ward, PFC. Larry E. Worthen.

Once back on 881S, we consolidated the companies as there was not enough of Bravo Company left to hold the lines. The number of the Bravo fallen impacted the members of Alpha Three severely. Many began to think about what would have happened to us if not for the extraordinary performances by A/1/13 and Oak Gate a mere two weeks prior.

A bit later that day at the Bravo CP on the crest of Hill 881S, I overheard a conversation between Col. Padley who had relieved Col. Lanigan as the senior officer at Khe Sanh, and Lt. Col. Newton, the C/O of 1/26. They were agreeing that the firefight was the result of a chance meeting between two company-sized patrols. I could not believe my ears. Just then Guy Pete interjected and told both officers that what had happened was a well-planned and executed ambush by at least 2 companies. It was hard to argue with the obvious but for some reason the senior officers did not want to believe that the NVA were still operating freely around Khe Sanh. Guy, of course, was right.

Alpha company spent several days with Bravo on Hill 881S until replacements arrived. I was soon transferred to the battalion S-3 section to relieve Captain Cloud who was taking over Charlie Company from Captain Dennis.

A few days later marked the end of 1/26's first 30 days at Khe Sanh. The next 30 days would not bring any relief for Alpha and Bravo companies, and I would soon be temporarily sent back to Alpha company to help out.

Major George Quamo, An American Hero

by Tom Haggerty

"You have never lived until you have almost died. For those who have fought for it, life has a special flavor the protected will never know."

– Special Operations Motto

Since Sept 11, Americans have become familiar with the term "Special Forces" and the role they are playing in Afghanistan. It wasn't always that way, as the story of a young man from Averill Park, N.Y., will attest. So secret were the missions of America's Special Forces in Vietnam in the 1960s that even now, decades after the war, many "official" accounts have never been made public. Most were reportedly destroyed even before the war ended in 1973. The name George Quamo is etched on the Rensselaer County Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington.

But few outside of the select group of men who served with him know anything about the extraordinary heroism and leadership Quamo exhibited there. "I still receive phone calls from guys who served under him," said his brother James Quamo, now of Spencerport, NY. "Some of them even cry telling me how they felt about my brother."

Major George Quamo was a highly decorated Army Green Beret who served in MACV-SOG (Military Assistance Command Vietnam, Studies and Observation Group, formerly known as the Special Operations Group) from 1963 until his death in 1968. About 2,000 people served in SOG during the Vietnam War. It was an all volunteer organization composed of some of the nation's best military personnel, Green Berets, Navy Seals, and Air Force Air Commandos.

SOG took its orders directly from Washington where a small staff operating under the acronym SACSA (Special Assistant to the Chairman for Special Activities) coordinated information and orders from the Joints Chiefs of Staff, White House, and Central Intelligence Agency. Gen. William C. Westmoreland, the theater commander in Vietnam, did not have complete authority over SOG but was kept fully informed of its missions both before and after, and often sat in on debriefings. Covert operations in Southeast Asia were entirely a CIA mission in its early years, but in 1964 it was turned over to the Department of Defense and SOG was established. To maintain secrecy, SOG's budget was hidden in top -secret Navy appropriations.

SOG teams performed some of the most dangerous and heroic missions of the Vietnam War, including cross-border reconnaissance and lightning "Hatchet Force" attacks on North Vietnamese positions along the Ho Chi Minh Trail, in North Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos. SOG teams were also involved in recovering downed US pilots, making prisoner-of-war rescue attempts, and penetrating deep into Laos and Cambodia to lead guerrilla forces they had trained in South Vietnam. Some SOG troops were also trained for HALO insertions — high altitude, low-opening parachute jumps. The activities of SOG teams reportedly diverted some 100,000 North Vietnamese troops from the front lines, thereby, saving thousands of American lives throughout the war.

SOG recon teams suffered 100 percent casualties in 1967, the highest casualty rate of any US unit since the Civil War. It also recorded the highest kill ratio in modern military history, 150 to one, with a high of 158 to one in 1970. Of the 17 Congressional Medals of Honor awarded to Special Forces troops in Vietnam, SOG troops received 10 Medals of Honor, the highest number of any comparable unit of its size in the history of American warfare.

The most highly decorated soldier in American history, Sergeant First-Class Robert Howard of Opelicka, AL, was a member of SOG and received the Medal of Honor, Distinguished Service Cross, Silver Star and eight Purple Hearts. Howard was nominated for the Medal of Honor three times in 13 months, a feat also unequaled in American history. Many who witnessed his heroics felt he should have won the medal all three times. His leadership and bravery earned Howard a direct commission to the rank of captain in 1970 and he retired a full colonel in 1995.

SOG troops received more than 2000 individual awards for heroism in Vietnam, including 23 Distinguished Service Crosses, the nation's second highest award. In the aftermath of the battle of Lang Vie, 24 Special Forces members were awarded one Medal of Honor, a Distinguished Service Cross, 21 Silver Stars, and a Bronze Star.

On April 4, 2001, nearly 30 years after it ceased operations, MACV-SOG was awarded a Presidential Unit Citation during ceremonies at Fort Bragg N.C. The Presidential Unit Citation is the nation's highest unit award and given only to those units that display extraordinary heroism under fire. It is equal to the individual award of the Distinguished Service Cross. Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub, who commanded SOG from 1966 to 1968, said the unit was the most incredible collection of courageous and professional soldiers that has ever served our nation."They accomplished feats of unbelievable heroism," Singlaub said. "They were just extraordinary young men."

MACV-SOG was established on Jan. 16, 1964 and completed its eight-year tour of duty on March 31, 1972. During that time, 10 SOG teams were lost, 14 teams were overrun and destroyed, and more than 300 soldiers were recorded as either killed or missing in action. To this day, 50 members of SOG are still listed as MIA.

In the four years George Quamo served in SOG, he would establish himself as one of America's finest warriors. Young, handsome, and brilliant, the 5'11", 180-pound Quamo was "tough as nails" and one of SOG's most highly-respected field commanders. He spoke three foreign languages (Laotian, Vietnamese, and Thai) and was even an instructor in Vietnamese at the Army language school in Monterey, CA.

Col. David C. "Bulldog" Smith was one of Quamo's last commanders. A tough, former Army Ranger during the Korean War, Smith served two different tours with Quamo in Vietnam, first as a member of the Green Beret "A" teams in the early 1960's and later as a SOG base commander. Bulldog took over as commanding officer of FOB-3 (Forward Obervations Base) of Command and Control North (CCN), located on the outskirts of Khe Sanh in early February, of 1968. Quamo served as his executive officer.

"George was one of the finest soldiers I ever served with," Smith said. He was considered the Lawrence of Arabia of Vietnam. Everyone respected him — the men he served with, the Laotians and the Montagnards. He was an outstanding leader, and he led by example. He never asked anyone to do something he couldn't or wouldn't do himself. He was at ease talking with a general as he was talking to a private. "He was just a great officer."

About a month after taking over as commanding officer of FOB-3, Smith was wounded when a piece of shrapnel from an incoming round struck him in the head. He and Quamo had been planning a top-secret mission where the pair would be inserted deep inside Laos to form a guerrilla force that would attack the North Vietnamese from the rear. After Quamo was reported missing in action in April of 1968, Smith was offered a replacement for the Laos mission. He declined, saying, "I would only go with George."

Born in Lynn, MA on June 10, 1940, Quamo was the oldest son of Alexander and Kaliroi Quamo, who emigrated from Albania to the United States in the 1930s. The family settled in Lynn and raised four daughters, Yilka, Tefta, Andronika and Marietta and two sons, George and James. The Quamos moved to Averill Park, NY, a small community east of Albany, in 1953. The children attended Averill Park High School, with George graduating in 1958. He joined the Army in October of that year.

Quamo, a natural leader (he was president of his class in high school and a quarterback on the football team), was considered "one of the Army's brightest young officers and the "Perfumed Prince," as former SOG sergeant Charles Berg referred to him, didn't take long to earn the respect of his troops.

Master Sergeant Charles "Skip" Minnicks, at 38, was the oldest team leader in SOG when this fresh-faced captain took over the reconnaissance teams in the fall of the1967. Quamo, 27, was the youngest major in SOG when he was promoted to that rank, on Oct 6, 1967. "I was madder than hell when he took over," said Minnicks, a highly-decorated SOG veteran of four tours in Vietnam. "And I made no bones about it. I didn't hide my feelings at all. He looked like a kid and I resented him."

He didn't say anything about it for a few weeks. One day we were in the jungle, he pulled me aside. He said, "We're both in this for same reason. We're both fighting the same enemy, I don't want to fight you too — we have to work as a team." Well, of course, he was right. Minnicks continued, "I really felt bad about how I had acted. But I will tell you something — I grew to love that man. I would have crawled up inside the barrel of an enemy cannon for him. I mean that. He was one helluva an officer. I can't say enough about him. He was excellent."

Operating deep inside enemy lines, SOG teams conducted some 1,398 reconnaissance missions. "Our exploits did not go unnoticed," Minnicks said, "Not one wounded or captured SOG operative was ever returned to us alive. None. George Quamo knew that going in. No quarter asked, none given. His kind of game. He was a man's man, a leader and one helluva soldier." Minnicks and Quamo were both members of "Special Projects," which included developing a guerrilla force to operate in Laos in the Mu Gai Pass area. Quamo commanded four reconnaissance teams including RT Pennsylvania, which ran more than 20 missions along the Ho Chi Minh trail as well as in Laos and Cambodia. The teams were usually made up of three Americans and four or five Bru guerrila soldiers.

The Bru soldiers were part of the Montagnards or "Mountain people" and were said to have an almost magical ability to detect the presence of others in the jungle. SOG units trained Montagnards, or "Yards" as Americans called them, for guerrilla missions and they became a very trusted ally. The North Vietnamese killed thousands of Montagnards during and after the war. To this day, a number of Special Forces veterans make pilgrimages to Vietnam to bring food and medical supplies to the Montagnards. The group has also arranged housing and employment for some 800 Montagnards who have come to the United States to live, many in the North Carolina area. More than 8,000 indigenous soldiers served with SOG during the Vietnam War and many performed with great valor. Many were also killed.

Quamo had an "intense dedication" to both American and Bru teammates. By all accounts, he was an extremely knowledgeable and forceful commander. His intensity and forcefulness are exemplified in an account of an incident written by Rev. Ray Stubbe, the Navy Chaplain during the Siege of Khe Sanh, for the magazine Red Clay. (Stubbe later formed the Khe Sanh Veterans Association and helped edit and write articles for Red Clay — stories related to the Siege of Khe Sanh. A number of theses accounts concerned Quamo's SOG teams at FOB-3.

Operation Pennsylvannia observed units of NVA and knew there was a huge strong force. Part of the NVA plans included the preparation of the Co Roc Massif, a boomerang-shaped mountain just inside the Laotian border. Standing atop Co Roc were Major George Quamo and Master Sergeant "Skip" Minnicks. They observed units of the NVA that had moved most of their forces in the area for the attack on Khe Sanh." Overhead, a birddog aircraft circled with its passenger, Col Harold K. Rose, the SOG commander at FOB-3. Rose radioed Quamo, "I want you out of there. I want you out of there now." Quamo, dressed in his black uniform, all his men dressed in black, simply responded, "To my knowledge, I am in command at this location, out."

Former Marine Capt. Jerry Hudson, who served as an intelligence officer at Khe Sanh, said Quamo was "one super man." "I had heard all kinds of stories about him before I met him," Hudson said. "He was a legend." The guys in SOG used to bring back all kinds of information but because it was all top secret, the information went directly back to the higher-ups in Saigon and Washington. Then it is filtered down to the guys in the bunkers — usually too late.

"George thought a lot of information should have been given to us right away. The North Vietnamese would move their positions or change tactics by the time we got back. So he began giving some of it to us right away. He personally went out and ran a phone line between the Special Forces guys and our bunker so I would get information fast.

"I do not know where he got his information. All I know is you would see him go through the wire with a couple other guys with heavy packs. He would be gone for five or six days. He was really something," Hudson said. Bulldog Smith confirmed Quamo "leaked" the information to the Marines, yet did it without compromising SOG's own top-secret orders. Quamo would tell the Marine intelligence officer (Hudson) that an area was "hot." If I were in your shoes I would try that area, suggesting targets. Hudson had previously trained Special Forces soldiers at the Naval Amphibious Base at Little Creek, VA. in preparation for recon missions that were conducted from submarines near the shoreline, both day and night. Because of his background, Hudson developed a special relationship with SF troops, Quamo in particular. We spoke from the same bible, he said.

Although only a high school graduate, Quamo was a major in Special Forces at age 27. One SOG officer, himself a West Point graduate, thought Quamo so brilliant that he could have gone through college in a year and half. Quamo also commanded "Project Elephant," a SOG operation that sent teams into Laos to train guerrilla forces as well as leading insertion missions into North Vietnam. He also led other missions to Co Roc Mountain while that area was swarming with NVA.

Sometimes he just defied the enemy to come get us, Minnicks recalled. One time on Co Roc, he had all four teams up there while enemy patrols were chasing us all over the place. He led us up a hill and then stood up and defied them to come get us. He was one tough guy. Master Sgt Robert Cavanaugh, the leader of recon team OKLAHOMA, who also served with Quamo on cross-border operations in Laos, said the officer had great leadership abilities. "I often think that if George had lived, he would have become one of the great motivational speakers our time. He had that kind of effect on people."

Quamo's finest moment came at Lang Vei when he led a heroic rescue of the Special Forces unit that was overrun by a North Vietnamese tank attack on February 7, 1968. The outpost located some nine miles from Khe Sanh came under a surprise attack, although SOG observers had been warning of tank tracks and NVA troop movement for several days.

Quamo was in Khe Sanh when he heard accounts of the battle over the radio. He immediately went to the commander of the 26th Marines, who had been under siege themselves at Khe Sanh, and asked for help to relieve the Special Forces at Lang Vei. Colonel David Lownds, and General Rathvon Tompkins, the 3rd Marine Division commander, both denied the request, fearing a large NVA ambush would annihilate a large relief force to Lang Vei.

Undaunted, Major Quamo rounded up 14 Special Forces volunteers and about 30 Bru tribesman and asked them to help rescue their embattled comrades. Minnicks quoted Quamo as saying, "We may not come back, but we have to help these guys out of there." He then contacted Marine CH-46 helicopter pilots and told them to get ready to fly, that an order would come from their commander. An SOG Medic, Harve Saal, who would later write a four-volume account of SOG, said: "George just scalawaged those guys and told them, "You have to do this because your boss said so."

Quamo's persistance saved the lives of 14 surviving Special Forces soldiers at Lang Vei. Years later, Quamo is referred to in the book "Night of the Silver Stars," as making a heroic rescue at Lang Vei. Already awarded two Silver Stars and a Bronze Star for bravery on previous missions, Quamo would be awarded the Distinguished Service Cross posthumously for "exposing himself to a tremendous volume of enemy fire" at Lang Vei.

He was the last man to leave the landing zone, the DSC citation reads. Major Quamo's intense dedication to his men, his coolness in battle and his extraordinary courage are in keeping with the highest traditions of the United States Army. I really believe he should have been awarded a Medal of Honor for getting those guys out of Lang Vei, Minnicks reflected. He saved their lives.

Former Hachet Force platoon Sgt Stephen "Tim" Kirk, who was awarded a Bronze Star at Lang Vei, recalled Quamos leadership. "I rememember him standing out there in the LZ (landing zone) like George Patton. He was totally in control of directing everything in the midst of all that incoming."

A month and half later, on April 14, 1968, Quamo disappeared and the mystery of his disappearance has baffled many who served with him. His last days begin with Colonel Roy A. Bahr taking command of FOB on March 25, 1968. Quamo was also Bahr's executive officer. "I was the last living person to see him alive," Bahr said. I only knew him for about a month, but he was one of the most impressive officers I ever met. "The men loved him and would do anything for him. He was so young, yet so impressive. It was a shame we lost him."

Rev. Stubbe quotes Bahr in an article in Red Clay: "I was 37, going to be 38, and I see George Quamo. He's a major and he's 27 years old, and this guy is sharp. I mean he was outstanding. This guy, he's almost God to these people, because he's such a good man. He had gone into Laos and brought out a whole bunch of Bru just as the Siege of Khe Sanh began. He had such empathy with all the Montagnards, particularly the Bru people."

Bahr said he and Quamo coordinated strikes and patrols outside the perimeter around Khe Sanh, which was surrounded by as many as four divisions of NVA. We then heard the Marines were going to abandon Khe Sanh, and I knew there were some 45,000 NVA in the area. We only had a few Special Forces troops (about 30). It would have been suicide to stay.

Bahr said he drew up an evacuation plan and had the unit's intelligence officer, S2 Hammond Salley, type up the plan because it was so sensitive. Bahr said he knew Quamo had not had any R&R in some time, so he asked him to deliver the Top-Secret papers to Danang and take a few days of R&R. He then walked Quamo down to the airstrip, and watched him get into a U-17, a fixed -wing aircraft that reportedly was "contracted" to the CIA. The plane, registered to Nationalist China so it could not be traced back to the U.S. if shot down, was piloted by two Vietnamese pilots. The plane made a single contact with a radar control central located on Monkey Mountain now Danang, and was never heard from again.

Prior to leaving Khe Sanh, someone had discovered a strange cylinder in FOB-3 with Chinese markings. It had been discovered about February 1, but Quamo decided to bring it to Danang to be assessed. Some have theorized the cylinder might have been some sort of ordnance that might have been shot or exploded while on the aircraft. Minnicks said it was an "unexploded artillery round that Major Quamo wanted examined.

And then there is the story of "Bulldog" Smith and the top-secret plan to go deep inside Laos with Quamo. Both would be declared missing in action even to their families. They would then train and command a guerilla force inside Laos which would then launch an attack on the Viet Cong from the rear. When Quamo was declared missing in action, Smith became angry because he thought Quamo had undertaken the mission without him. Smith had been recovering from an injury when Quamo became MIA. "I was madder then hell, because I thought he had taken off without me," Smith said. He did not believe the report that his friend was missing in action because it was exactly the cover story they were both supposed to have used for the actual mission. "I finally went to General Westmoreland and he told me, George was really missing."

An extensive search was untaken as soon as Quamo's plane was reported missing, including a naval search. Since Danang was near the sea, it was thought the plane might have drifted out to sea and crashed. Six years later, on June 26, 1974,

Vietnamese woodcutters discovered the wreckage in a dense jungle area and the remains of Major Quamo and the two pilots were discovered and identified. The jungle had apparently swallowed up the plane on impact. Bob Donaghue, a former Special Forces radio sergeant who served with Quamo, visited the crash site years later and said the plane had crashed into a mountain on top of a tunnel that was used by the NVA.

"George was a real hard charger and a great commander," Donaghue said. "I loved the guy. Our C/O was 'Bulldog' Smith," Donaghue continued. "Tears still come to his eyes whenever he talks about Major Quamo."

"I asked my brother to be the best man at my wedding," James Quamo remembered. "He said he couldn't make it and that he felt bad, but he had to do some thing important and couldn't talk about it. I got married on April 13, 1968 and he was killed on 14 April 1968."

The remains of Major George Quamo were flown back to the United States and he was buried in Arlington National Cemetery on Oct. 21,1974 as his family and several Army officers and soldiers looked on. There were no bands, no generals, and no parades. He died at age 27, a very "special" soldier.

A Marine Corps Poem

They are the first to come and the last to go,
These are the men who run the show.
They work very hard and through all types of weather,
Marines are well known for sticking together.

They stick together when the going gets rough,
And they are the ones who know how to be tough.
Tough in the body and tough in the mind,
But what is one man if he can't also be kind?

They march into battle as brave as can be,
Marines stay and fight for the sake of you and me.
They fight with strength, with honor, and might,
The Marine Corps fights for all that is right.

So next time you see that great flag flying high,
Remember Marines stood up for you and I.
And as those Marines have protected you,
Hopefully, someday, you'll protect them too.

Written by Kristopher Kay for his grandfather John E. Rotchford, a Khe Sahn veteran, and all of the Marines (veterans, present, and Marines to be)

Upon Heaven's Scenes

by Paul Choclis

And so in the end, my fallen brothers, the regiment will emerge from the ashes and dust, like a grand phoenix. We shall return to the battlefields of Vietnam to mend your mangled, torn, bullet reddened broken bodies, and you shall be made whole once again. We shall March together in the rain and the wind through the corridor of death at Cobi Thanh Tan as we did, so long ago. This time will be different. This time nothing shall harm us. This time nothing shall stop us. This time we are invincible. Monsoon waters will not crack our hands and bleed our feet. Insects will not eat our flesh. Bullets shall not pierce us. Bombs shall not impact our flanks. Trip wires will fade at our crossing. Our boots shall not sink, but rise above mud sucking rice fields and our packs with equipment shall be of burden no more.

The fog shall lift as a giant curtain, before us as we make our final approach to the mountain base of Khe Sanh. A golden sun shall warm our faces and our hymn will be playing. There will be no pain now. We shall rise above the Red Clay plateau marching in a column across rolling hills, jungle canopies, and mountaintops. Ascending into the clouds. It is there we shall enter the great eternal spirit camp of our fore fathers. The place of honor. The place warriors go. For it is there we can finally rest. For it is there we can finally sleep. For it is there as we gaze upon heaven's scenes, we shall find positions guarded by the 26th Marines.

Note From The President

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all who supported my running for the position of President of the KSV. I take this office most seriously, as KSV represents such an important part of our Nation's history and the outstanding veterans who lived and fought that historic time. As well as this, I personally deem it a very important part of my life. I wish to also thank Bulldog for his fine work as President while on the BOD. As Jimbo, Jim, Tommy, and I embark on plans for our next Reunion, hold on to the straps of your boots. Why? Be assured, it will not only be highly attended as we all spread the word to those who may be first-time attendees, but this committee will bring together one hell of a grand time for each and every one of us, sharing some great times together! Until then, see y'all...

President KSV

Cover Story

This month we honor Frank Ceniseros and Bob Mills, two of our most dedicated and loyal members who recently passed away. Anyone who has attended one of our reunions is familiar with both of them. Frank Ceniseros and his lovely wife Virginia never missed a reunion and were the most gracious and loving persons. They loved meeting and entertaining new members. Frank thought the world of the KSV and was an active board member. We will miss his homemade hooch. Bob Mills also never missed a reunion and took pleasure in meeting new friends. Everyone could recognize him by his frayed hat and uniform shirt, sitting at his favorite spot at the bar. He was also very generous and considered the KSV as his family. Bob did not have a family except for his elderly Father and he considered members and their wives his brothers and sisters. He showed his love for the organization, and how much it meant to him when he left us $ 8,000 in his will.

Frank Ceniseros and Bob Mills

I have been a member of the KSV since its inception and knew and loved both of them. I will miss them both.

Notes From the Vice President

Well, we just finished another successful KSV reunion. I want to personally thank Brian Mahoney for his dedicated effort in bringing the reunion to South Carolina. Most members do not know that Brian had to get through a serious family crisis. He still found time to put the reunion together. As in the past, everything did not go as expected. Our beautiful PJ Wodecki, as usual, jumped right in and corrected many of the things that did go wrong. (Jimbo helped a little.) The BOD voted to elect a permanent reunion committee comprised of members who have put together very successful past reunions. The committee will be co-chaired by Jimbo Wodecki and Russ Turner. With these two we also get a bonus — Kathy Turner and PJ Wodecki. We can't miss. I will also be a part of the team.

There was an election of members to fill several Members at Large vacancies and the post of President. Russell Turner, our Sgt.-at-Arms, was elected president. Dave "Bulldog" Smith, as a past president, automatically assumed a place on the BOD. We are fortunate to still have him as a KSV board member. I thank him for his loyal and professional service to the organization. It has been a pleasure working with him in my role as VP. Robert Shippen was chosen to succeed Russ Turner as Sgt.-at-Arms. Dale Pack, Robert Moxley, and Bill Jayne were elected to fill the Members at Large Vacancies. Owen Matthews replaced Bill Jayne as the Chaplain. Welcome aboard to all the new members, and a hearty thank you for those who served.

Although there were a few problems with the hotel due to its age, the staff did an outstanding job with every event we planned for the reunion. The food, entertainment, decorations, and many other things too numerous to mention were provided by AJ, Howard, and their entire staff.

We had in attendance as our honored guest, John Cavaiani (MOH Recipient) and Larry Deibert, former C/O Forward Air Controllers, 220th Airplane Group. John is also a highly decorated veteran of Vietnam. Individual awards were also presented to FAC members Toby Rushforth, Lou Armbruster, Charles Coppess, and Bob Arrotta. James E. Goggins also received his long overdue Purple Heart.

We received an offer we could not refuse from the Hotel that hosted the 2002 Reunion in Los Colinas, Texas, so we are going back there for the 2004 reunion. The reunion committee has already made plans to outdo the 2002 reunion. If that comes to fruition, I urge all KSV members not to miss this one.

Tom Eichler
VP KSV

Notes From the Reunion Committee Co-Chairs

Jim Wodecki and New President Russ Turner

Next year's reunion will again be held in Dallas, Texas. They made us "an offer we couldn't refuse." Plans are for a night at Lone Star Park including dinner and horseracing. A trip to the Air Force Base in Fort Worth, and an evening at Billy Bob's with band, food, rodeo, gun-fighting and bull-riding. More is planned for the week and will be published in the next Red Clay magazine. I will try and get discount rates for flights into DFW or Love Field. It was fun last time and will be even more fun this time around.

Room rates will be $69.00 per night, with the City of Irving refunding us $3.00 per room night for weeknights and $5.00 for weekend nights. I figured they would give us back around $2,300.00 just for coming back this year. Tommy Eichler, our entertainment director who is also on the reunion committee, will be picking the band we will have after the banquet Saturday night. The City of Irving, Texas genuinely wants us back. The hotel in Charleston was a bit old and worn, but the hotel staff made up for that with a gracious effort. Hats off to AJ and staff, Bull-kitty, Carmen, Migion, and Cookie the Grill Sgt., who went out of their way to make us enjoy the week we stayed with them, and to others who were always there when we needed something.

We have grown as an organization to where we need a large hotel with a 300-room minimum, and a hub city airport for cheap flights in and out of our reunion. Many members did not come to Charleston when they could not book a room in the same hotel as other members. Several sites for the following year were discussed, considering we went east this year, southwest next year. Vegas might be in order for the West coast. The KSV has many members from California but when we went to San Diego, only 210 members attended. This compared to 470 in Chicago, 390 in Dallas and 385 this year. Under consideration are Chicago, St. Louis, Denver and Washington DC. Since we wanted to go to DC when the Marine Corps Museum opens in November 2005, we will wait till 2006 to go there.

Anyone who wants to send us a presentation for a city that meets the 300-room minimum and hub city airport, please do so. Contact the local Chamber of Commerce or convention center, asking for what hotels cater to large reunions and have them send us proposals for that city. We will consider everyone's ideas that meet the qualifications we set forth, including California.

Working with Russ we will make each and every reunion better than the last. With great events and reasonable room rates and flights to our reunion.

I have sent out order forms for 2003 Reunion T-shirts to all who attended. If any are left, I will sell them first-come, till they run out. We also are offering an 11X17 Poster. The picture is of the KSCB base and picture of the Citation we gave to the FAC guys, who we honored this year. Everyone signed the poster who attended this year. They are real nice for framing and will be shipped in a tube. They are $13.00 including shipping. We have 300 of these for fundraisers.

Make check for posters to "Khe Sanh Veterans," 2200 W. McGarity Ln., Allen TX 75002

Getting excited already,

GI Blues

Vietnam to Here: A Warrior's Tour

by Sonny Gratzer

This is an outstanding book of poetry. Sonny was a company commander with THE BIG RED ONE in Vietnam. He is highly decorated and was badly wounded and partially paralyzed. After Vietnam, he went back to school and earned an MFA in Creative Writing from the University of Montana. The scope and depth of his writings is truly remarkable. Poets are able to express feelings in a way that we prose writers only dream about.

I give this one a big 5 stars.

John DeFelice called me the other morning and told me his Mom had a massive heart attack and that they didn't expect her to live. As you can imagine, he was very upset. He asked me to write to Red Clay and ask if any of the guys remembered receiving packages from his Mom when you all were in Vietnam. I told him I'd do that. Letter from Virginia Ceniseros

Dear Khe Sanh Veterans,

My family and I would like to take this opportunity to thank you for your prayers, cards, e-mails, flowers and phone calls during my husband Frank's illness and since his death April 2, 2003. We want to thank you for the beautiful heart-shaped floral wreath sent on behalf of the Khe Sanh Veterans' Association for his funeral services. Thank you to Doc Beall and Linda from Albuquerque, New Mexico, for attending his services. Our family truly appreciated your long trip to Coolidge, Arizona. The concern you have shown for me and my family during this difficult time has been an overwhelming and wonderful blessing, and feel we continue to be part of the Khe Sanh Veterans' Family.

Frank was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia on December 19, 2002 and although his leukemia was in remission, he contracted pneumonia and was unable to fight the virus. During his illness, he enjoyed and was truly grateful for hearing from so many of you. Frank was looking forward to the reunion and had already ordered a gallon of "bacanora" to take for all of you who wanted a little shot of Mexican "moonshine." He always got a kick out of the facial expression of those who had never had bacanora and were trying it for the first time.

Frank loved you all and considered you his brothers. I'm sure you will miss him as much as he is probably missing you. I know he is looking down on you with his glass full of "bacanora" toasting you all to have a great time in his memory. Frank always said when he left this earth, he wanted a big party. He was so proud to be part of the Khe Sanh Veterans' Association and was looking forward to getting more involved. We have met so many wonderful people and have made many great lifetime friends. I plan to continue my association with you and know Frank would want me to do the same. Although I am unable emotionally to attend this year, please know that my thoughts are with you. When you have decided where your reunion will be next year, I promised Bulldog I would attend. Again, thank you all of your love and friendship.

Our Best Wishes for a successful reunion,
Virginia Ceniseros and Family

Dear Tom,

I am writing this letter to advise you of the passing of another of our Khe Sanh brothers. Dr. Dan Polland's death was a shock to the many thousands of people that he treated in his many years as an anesthesiologist at our local hospital. I met Dan six years ago when he was treating me for a lower spinal problem that I received when I ejected from a F4B Phantom on 22 Jan 1968 outside of Khe Sanh. Dan spent his tour as a corpsman with the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines from 1965 to 1967. Dan and his family became close friends, and I introduced him to our association. The rest is history. Some of Dan's many exploits were covered in a new book by Ed Murphy entitled The Hill Fights: The First Battle of Khe Sanh."

Dan's love of medicine, and helping others, took root in his duty as a combat medic with the Marine Corps. I want to ensure his friends in the Corps, especially in the 9th Marines, are aware of his passing. Dan's memorial service in Grand Junction was standing room only. I was honored to be able to say a few words of remembrance. He was a great corpsman, an honorary Marine, a superb doctor, and devoted family man. He will never be forgotten by those that knew him.

Brigadier General and Mrs. Harry T, Hagaman, USMC (Ret)

EDITOR'S NOTE: General Hagaman, thank you for notifying us of the untimely death of Dr. Dan Polland. Members of the KSV, offer their condolences, and prayers, to his wife Rebecca, and his entire family. He will be missed.

Ray's Corner

Our founder, Ray W. Stubbe, wanted to share this letter he had written to John Pessoni with all members of the Khe Sanh Veterans

The Khe Sanh reunion undoubtedly looms big right now. A connection to the past that feeds the present with happiness, life, and joy, as much as a birthday (remembering our birth and tying to that beginning of our life with all its forcefulness of life-force) brings happiness, life, and joy to everyone. All of you are my family, and many of those who served at Khe Sanh, as well as those like yourself who I've come to know in the years since, are in my daily thoughts.

Life is so very good! I'll be 65 this 15th day of August, and although life has brought me to a rather different place than I'd have imagined, there are so many blessings all around! Perhaps because of my age and certainly in a large part due to having been in prolonged combat, every evidence of life is to me a great miracle, nothing to just assume or take for granted, nothing to regard as "just the way things are." Even the simple healing of a paper cut is a great miracle. Why do things, for the most part, get better and heal, rather than progress into decay and death? Because they are a great miracle. A few weeks ago, I planted some new flow-ers in my garden, and the beauty of color and abundance of growth, is such a joy. I just came in from an hour's walk along a parkway that's close to my house and just seeing the robins and scampering little animals is so wonderful!

Khe Sanh now comes to my memory in a different way. The loss of so many, quite a few of whom I knew personally and visited six months before the Siege battle began, come to mind through memories of remaining through the night and accompanying patrols from the hill outposts. CAC units and Lang Vei losses had deeply affected me and always will. There were so many more killed than are "officially listed," which has always angered me. What we endured seems to have been dismissed, disregarded, unacknowledged, oftentimes by the officials. What Khe Sanh did to me personally and how it has changed the entire course of my life, obviously makes for some negativities for me.

A few of these include: my changing from a person who was always gregarious and in the company of lots of people, to a person who increasingly keeps to myself and has with-drawn. I changed from a person who more or less regarded my surroundings as safe to regarding life as walking through a mine field with sudden, unexpected disaster always looming. Of course, after 9/11 most of the country, especially those of you on the East Coast and NYC, now feel the same as those of us who were in combat in this regard. Since Khe Sanh, I have believed that every day might very well be my last, and long-range goals and plans and pursuits always have been very difficult for me. Aside from combat, one of things that also happened was that in the middle of the Siege I contracted some odd disease to my kidneys. This may have been from some bug at Khe Sanh. About a week after the Siege began, I was evacuated to Danang for three or four days due to a fever and blood in the urine and returned to Khe Sanh against medical advice. After Vietnam, I had a biopsy of the kidney at Beauford Naval Hospital near Parris Island, where I was assigned. I was told that I had a disease from which I would die within 20 years, that symptoms would go away, and then suddenly flare up and I would die. As a result of that, I made a conscious decision to remain on active duty rather than get out and be with a regular church because if I were going to die at any year, why commit to a long-term effort. Remaining on active duty, with its frequent transfers of duty stations, made more sense to me. Also as a result, I made the conscious decision not to get married and have a family because I felt it would not be loving to someone to start a marriage, and especially a family, if I were going to die at any time! So I became a bachelor, Khe Sanh-related.

BUT ALL THESE NEGATIVE THINGS are nothing compared to the much larger, positive, good, life-enriching things that have come out of that time and that place! Regarding the casualties, I NOW LOOK AT THINGS LIKE THIS: Isn't it a great miracle that although there were more killed at Khe Sanh than officially, that there weren't far more? With the amount of incoming munitions we received, and the lack of concrete bunkers and fortifications, and the amount of NVA surrounding us, isn't it really a miracle there weren't far more casualties? Isn't it a miracle that ANY OF US made it out alive? Isn't it a miracle that just the right people were there at Khe Sanh — people who were able to lead, to work through the situations, to help each other? After all, not everyone could have done what was done!

And isn't it miraculous that so many of us have found each other-after all this time, and with all that has happened since then, we now enjoy each other's company and in a real sense, feed each other with care, concern, affirmation, and are happy to help each other (like with disability claims, and resolving guilt and blanks in our memory)?

And isn't it a miracle that despite the effects of combat that ALL OF US WHO WERE THERE now carry, so many of us have been so very productive, so involved in doing things for the community, have children, have good families, and have achieved such success? (Actually, I think that it's from our emotional wounds that we now are able to do positive things in our community, because we are all the more sensitive to injustice, to needs, to the pains of others, to the issue of war, and so on.)

We have, really, so much for which to be thankful! There is so much that causes us to pause in wonderment at the miracle of life in which we participate, which isn't really spec-tacular in a way, that forces us to acknowledge and be aware of it as a miracle. Which, upon reflection, and stopping to "see" it, overwhelms with a force of the presence of what is good within the situation, that otherwise is sometimes desperate and defeating.

After taking care of dad during a period of grief both of us endured over the loss of my mom, and during a period of de-cline in his health, caring for him for about 7 months, 24/7 with an hour off each day to shop for groceries when a visiting nurse came — by the time of his death, I was in a deep depression. I had gained much weight, lost interest in almost every-thing, and was not in good health at all.

Then I found the gym, lost weight, gained energy, and renewed interest in being active in my church work, and have been given the gift of insight to come to feel gener-ally good! This is a great miracle to me! And a great part of that miracle is due to having been with Marines for so long! For the importance of good physical condition, of depending on the connections with others, and so on, has evidently become so much a part of my inner being, that I started working out at the gym, something that hasn't been part of my normal nature to be doing.

Well, as you can see, I'm doing quite well right now. Life remains, for me, a minefield, but also a place where there are occasional flowers and birds and places of joy and beauty. Life remains short, precious, fragile, and limited but is also so very, very good, renewed and grows and develops as in winter into spring. With what seems dead (branches and twigs of trees, dark earth, bleak landscapes) becomes alive and so abundant in life. People we really care deeply for and who have cared so deeply for us — family, and friends and buddies in combat — still die and we shall too. And yet, there is a continuous stream of blessing we enjoy with those we've known who live in us and continues to live. According to my beliefs we continue to live forever in God who live, forever, and who is connected to us in bonds of love.

Well, I didn't mean to go off in all those directions, but as I sit here this morning, just wanted to share these thoughts with a good friend, and all our members of the Khe Sanh Veterans.

Ode to Ham and Limas

Ham and Limas what a deal
They're my favorite Chowtime Meal.
Mostly beans and very little meat
Still a tasty C-rat treat.
If and when I get my druthers
I'll always pick those "Ham and Mothers."

We Got Mail!

Jimbo,

I am a member and would like to commend you guys for a job well done! In the early days the organization was great and through the right leadership, it has only gotten better. I just want to thank all of you hard working souls for your dedication to keeping this a first class operation! I was at Khe Sanh from the end of December 1967 to right after Easter in 1968, when we left for Quang Tri. Thanks again! Keep up the great work!

Eternally Bonded,
Tom Rottinghaus 3/26

Tom,

I was just reading the two Red Clay magazines you sent me, thanks. My friend Ray Kelly had talked to Dennis Mannion on the computer, and we found out that he lives 1/2 hr from both of us, was in the Corps, in the same places in the Nam, and have the exact same name of a friend who was KIA. The friend also lived near Kelly and I. Now I open your magazine, and see his name again! Small world for us old Jarheads, huh??

We were in Khe Sanh from Sept 66 to Mar 67. When we landed in a C-130, there was nothing but Matson Matting. There was no one there but 2 dozen Seabees and a small special forces camp out near the French village. I remember while on patrol down near the edge of the river bank when a plane came over and sprayed us. We were told to hold our breath. Great huh?I thought it couldn't be worse than working in the tobacco fields back home and getting sprayed. Was I wrong!!

I also liked the story of PCT. I have all the symptoms. Lesions on my arms and face that they told me were caused by Mustard gas, chronic fatigue, and when I get a cut I have a nasty purple scar. I will send e-mail to Doc Miller. I used to see elephant trains going up the mountains, but nobody seemed too excited about it but me. Lot of strange stuff went on there. We were 1/3 when we were in Khe Sanh, then went aboard ship as BLT 1/3. I have never seen an article from anyone in my outfit in your magazine. If you could, would you put a message for 1/3 guys to write? It would be good, OK!! Thanks.

PS – You are doing us all a great service, and I will pass on info to my few friends who are still alive from the 3rd Marines

Dear Tom,

Thank you for sending the two issues of Red Clay that arrived today. The stories are remarkably powerful testimony to the experiences — beyond words — of men who have met challenges that few others are able to imagine. I particularly appreciate the account of Col. Ripley's action at the Dong Ha bridge in 1972. Approximately 15 years ago I visited Memorial Hall at Annapolis. My one enduring memory is the diorama of the sole Marine, hanging from a bridge under fire. It is uplifting to hear the "rest of the story."

My education regarding veterans' issues has been through witnessing the courage and generosity of those veterans who have given our country's citizens a gift beyond reciprocity. There can be no greater humility than to understand that reality. Each year in ethics classes at the medical school, I tell students and resident physicians that our profession could learn a great deal from military professionals regarding integrity and character.

Many times, colleagues upon learning that one of my sons is a career infantryman, have commented, "Oh, they just like to kill people." My response has been, "Once I was ignorant also, not having any knowledge or experience regarding the military. But I have learned a great deal in recent years, for which I am a better person." My work with veterans has not only been a learning experience, but a privilege, as well as a healing.

One of my high school classmates, Donald Walsh, a Merit scholar and a very good man, served in Viet Nam as a Corpsman. He came back to the U.S. for a few days, and stopped to visit me at a state beach park where I worked as a first aid attendant during the summers while in college. He demonstrated how the Corpsmen properly clean a wound. And then he returned to Vietnam two days later, where he was shot through the cross on his back (we were told).

My several trips to Arlington and the Memorial were futile attempts to reconcile the injustice and my indebtedness for this man's life paying for my ability to live, work, and raise a family. The national shame of civilians attacking Vietnam veterans as they returned is agonizingly clear. But the private agony of some other civilians is not known, I believe.

The fact of the matter is that no one heals alone, as the existence of KSV and Red Clay attests. In my case, I can sincerely say that Viet Nam veterans have given me the gift of the opportunity to address my indebtedness. Recognized or not, veterans and civilians need each other. (Unfortunately as psychiatrists learn early in training, most of us resist what we need most.)

Thank you all for sharing your stories and for your sacrifice. Your brotherhood will always remain a testimony to the best of human nature, and I believe, this is what calls some good young men to service.

My best wishes to you all,
Stephanie Mullany

Class Act

Tom,

Like to share an incident that happened at the Indianapolis 500 last weekend. My oldest son goes every year, gets a spot in the infield and does what every "good" young man does when at a race. He had a seat along the infield fence between turns 2 and 3. Part of the pre-game ceremonies included a parade around the track where two members of each service were in the back of pace trucks. All five services were represented, with the Marines being in the last truck. My son related that it was windy and each truck was equipped with hand supports to steady the riders in the back. Because of the wind, the first four services had removed their covers and were holding on to the handles while the vehicles were moving. Not the two Marines, they stood tall and straight, heads covered.

The vehicles went around the track and passed by him one more time heading for the exit. The first four trucks passed, and my son watched the two Marines, still standing proud and tall. Suddenly, the Marine behind the driver (incidentally, my son said his sleeves were covered by nothing but stripes; the other had seemed very young) leaned over and slapped his hand on the drivers side door window. The vehicle rolled to a stop, the Marine stood up, both snapped to a sharp attention, faced to right, and in unison came to a full salute.

Sitting on the other side of the fence was a fire truck with 8 or 9 firemen watching the proceeding in lawn chairs. They held the salute. My son said that one of the firemen realized what was going on, and started a nudge that traveled until all of them saw the two Marines. Sitting a little higher and a little prouder, they acknowledged the Marines salute with a nod. Only at that point did the two Marines drop their salute. The Marine on the left once again leaned over and knocked on the drivers door. It was only then that the vehicle proceeded. The Marines, a true CLASS ACT.

Chance Meeting

Jimbo,

Hoping you had a good Father's Day. I hope by now that you have received the pictures that I sent last week. The real reason why I am sending this e-mail is to tell you that for some time now, I have driven past a house which is located on the next block, and from time to time I see a Marine Corps Flag flying in front ! As I was going through our members directory a moment ago, I ran across an address in the same city where I live. The address is for the very same house that I have driven past for years now, and the home of a Khe Sanh Brother. I will stop by and introduce myself. What a small world, one block over and seven houses down !! Thank you for inviting me to join the KSV and thank you for telling me about the members directory. Your friendship, even though we don't know each other, only shows what we have known all along "Once a Marine, Always a Marine"

A Message from the Commandant of the Marine Corps

THE FREEDOM AND SECURITY THAT HAVE COME TO BE ACCEPTED AS THE COMMON BIRTHRIGHTS OF OUR GREAT NATION, OCCASIONALLY DEMAND GREAT SACRIFICE. FOR OVER 227 YEARS UNITED STATES MARINES HAVE VALIANTLY AND SELFLESSLY MADE THESE SACRIFICES SO THAT THE CITIZENS OF OUR NATION COULD REMAIN FREE TO LIVE THEIR LIVES AND TO RAISE THEIR CHILDREN IN THE LIFE AFFIRMING CONDITIONS OF LIBERTY, OPPORTUNITY, AND SELF-DETERMINATION.

MEMORIAL DAY IS THE DAY OUR NATION SETS ASIDE TO RECOGNIZE THOSE WHO HAVE MADE THE ULTIMATE SACRIFICE IN THE SERVICE OF OUR COUNTRY. EACH YEAR, ON THE LAST MONDAY OF MAY, FAR TOO MANY AMERICANS EMBARK ON PAINFUL PILGRIMAGES TO THE FINAL RESTING PLACES OF LOVED ONES WHOSE LIVES WERE LOST SECURING THE PROFOUND BLESSINGS OF LIBERTY THAT WE ALL ENJOY.

CONSIDER THE ENORMITY OF SACRIFICE THE LOSS OF EVEN A SINGLE MARINE REPRESENTS. MULTIPLY THIS BY THE LEGION OF MARINES WHO HAVE GIVEN THEIR LIVES IN THE SERVICE OF THEIR COUNTRY, AND THE ACT OF HONORING THEM ADEQUATELY SEEMS OVERWHELMING. IN FACT, THERE IS NO SINGLE SPEECH, TRIBUTE, OR GESTURE, THAT CAN BE RENDERED EQUAL TO THEIR SACRIFICE. TO APPROPRIATELY HONOR OUR FALLEN COMRADES, WE MUST NOT ONLY TAKE PAUSE IN SOLEMN REMEMBRANCE, WE MUST ALSO RE-AFFIRM OUR COMMITMENT TO THE CAUSE IN WHICH THEY GAVE THEIR FINAL FULL MEASURE. WE MUST COMMIT OURSELVES TO DOING OUR DUTY AND LIVING OUR LIVES IN A MANNER WORTHY OF THEIR SACRIFICE.

THIS YEAR, DURING OPERATION IRAQI FREEDOM, MANY OF OUR FELLOW MARINES MADE THE ULTIMATE SACRIFICE IN THE CAUSE OF FREEDOM AND SECURITY, AND WHILE NO WORDS CAN ADEQUATELY DIMINISH THE PAIN OF THEIR LOSS, THERE IS SOLACE IN THE KNOWLEDGE THAT THEIR SACRIFICE HAS REMOVED A GREAT THREAT TO WORLD PEACE AND THAT THEY HAVE LIBERATED THE ONCE STIFLED DESTINIES OF MILLIONS OF HUMAN BEINGS. THEY HAVE DONE THEIR DUTY IN THE FINEST TRADITION OF OUR FABLED CORPS, AND NOW WE ARE LEFT TO DO OURS.

TAKE A MOMENT THIS MEMORIAL DAY TO REFLECT UPON THE GREAT SACRIFICES OF OUR FALLEN COMRADES. WHERE POSSIBLE, PARTICIPATE IN THE LOCAL EVENTS THE CITIZENS OF OUR GREAT NATION HAVE CONCEIVED IN HONOR OF OUR FALLEN. MOST OF ALL, RE-AFFIRM YOUR COMMITMENT TO THE CAUSE OF FREEDOM AND TO THE OATH OF SERVICE YOU HAVE SWORN. OUR DUTY WELL DONE IS THE MOST FITTING TRIBUTE OF ALL.

SEMPER FIDELIS,
M.W.HAGEE,
GENERAL, US MARINE CORPS

Dear Tom,

I just found out about Red Clay bunch a few weeks ago, my barber happened to have an old issue laying around that was left by another customer. He showed it to me and I wrote to Chaplain Clark for more information and he sent me a couple of issues and said to send the membership application to you.

My oldest son spent two years teaching English in Taiwan. When he finished his "tour" he went on "walk-about" throughout the East, traveling in mainland China, Thailand, and even made a side trip to Vietnam. While there he wanted to see the mysterious place called Khe Sanh that he had heard me talk about so many times while he was growing up. After his trip up there, he wrote me the enclosed letter from Hue.

After reading the two copies of old editions of Red Clay, I thought his letter to me might be appropriate to print.

Dave Ericson

Taag's letter from Vietnam Sent 9/23/2000

His trip from Hue to Khe Sanh:

Dad, I woke up at five o'clock in the morning and went across the street to a café that had promised me a motorcycle. They were not yet open but a couple of sharp knocks on the door, and the noise made moving a pile of lawn furniture obstructing the door soon had them awake. I ate a quick breakfast of a baguette with cheese and a tomato omelet before getting on the bike for a sunrise start.

I went across the Hue Bridge and turned left following the river until it split into Highway 1. The road was in good condition, so the drive was fast. Unfortunately, my bike was not in good condition and had to be allowed a rest to cool down every hour or so. There was surprisingly little traffic on Highway 1 and even less on Highway 9, which split in Dong Ha. The road was winding and mountainous. The scenery was beautiful.

I was told later that the trees are small because they are just beginning to grow again in many of the areas. I took pictures and stopped at a small village along the road to chat with the children and to share my Pringles potato chips. I took a picture of a little boy with a toy cross bow. His grandfather was showing him how to use it.

After the village, I continued on to the town of Khe Sanh and found that I was going to have a very difficult time actually finding the base. I searched along the old Ho Chi Minh Trail, driving up and down, but had no luck as the base was not marked by any signs. In the end, I was driving through red clay-floored coffee plantations in the hope of coming across it. A very nice farmer offered to lead me there for a fee. Field negotiations having been completed, I followed him through yet more fields to the base.

Everything at the base, except for the runway is green and red. Green for the coffee plants that are now being cultivated there, and red for every bit of brick red soil in between. In no time, it had begun to rain. Really rain. The soil became mud and was slippery. I thought about mud football, but there was no one to play with, so I walked between the rows of coffee seeing the remnants of those who were there before. Old boots, bits of sand bags, pieces of metal, and ordinance that remains there still on the ground because they are live and even the metal-scavenging locals are afraid to touch them.

Arriving at the actual old base, I found a small museum with a brief history of Khe Sanh during the "American War." Pictures of both the Marines inside the base and the NVA on the outside were featured. Some of the pictures were from the Time magazine article of July or August 1968. A museum guide led me through the tactics and strategies employed by the Americans and Vietnamese during the war around Khe Sanh. A mound of weapons that had been left in and around Khe Sanh were piled on a stand in the center of the room next to neatly arranged examples of the weapons employed by the Vietnamese.

I walked the airstrip, which is barren. Nothing will grow on it. It was red and long and marred by rivulets of water now eroding the soil because of the rainy season. In each of the natural trenches were naturally excavated war memorabilia. It rained. I was cold.

I returned to the museum. I was the only tourist that day. I listened to stories of veterans who had returned to Khe Sanh. Other veterans returned to find what they may have lost there. Some cried, they said. I said it was healthy.

There are two guides there — two fathers. One had fought for the South against the other father, who had fought for the North. They fought each other in and around Khe Sanh. They were friends. I also had a father who fought with the Marines, I said. Then, there were three fathers.

I made it back to the road and knew that I still had to go the 150 kilometers that it had taken me to get to Khe Sanh. It was still raining and as I left the mountains, the roads were deeper and deeper in water. I couldn't see the path.

In the rain, I boarded my motorcycle and headed out through the fields towards the Ho Chi Minh Trail (now a very rough and rocky road running near Khe Sanh City). It was very slippery. I fell off my motorcycle, but it was unavoidable. I have never driven on mud like that before. You were right, I remember you trying to explain the mud to Ty and me. I think you have to see it for yourself. It would get into everything. I fell again. Pot-holes were hit that I couldn't see and my already sore ribs and back panged me each time. I hurt my ribs last week when I fell during a boat trip. My back was sore from the motorcycle ride.

I had enough. I stopped and the rain continued. I asked and learned I was thirty kilometers from Hue. Happy that I was close, I ordered some Vietnamese green tea and shared it with a young college student studying English. He bought biscuits and talked. He said his girlfriend is beautiful, but she lives too far away from him. I said I had the same problem. I gave him my e-mail address.

Sunset made the sky orange. It was beautiful but getting dark. My motorcycle lights were broken. I drove next to someone with lights so I could see and honked my horn frequently to be sure bicycles and pedestrians were aware of me. I made it back. I showered and ate dinner. I drank beer with some traveling Germans, and we talked about traveling in German. I went to bed. It was a good day.

It had been a very good day and I will always be glad that I saw with my own eyes the terrain where you spent such a big portion of your life. I took pictures for you and for me. I wished that you could have been there to talk to me about the base. But I know that you wouldn't want to go there. When I return in Christmas, I hope you like what you see in the pictures. Thank you, Dad.

With all my love,
Taag

Tom,

Hope this finds you well.

I am enclosing a newspaper cartoon from 1968. I was researching what the paper had about Terry Roach, Jr., who was KIA on Feb 8, 1968 while serving with A/1/9. While searching I found this and figured you guys might enjoy seeing it.

Just as an interesting point, I also stopped at the high school Terry graduated from and they teach a course about the Vietnam War. Don't know anything about the course, but it's an elective and they do bring in vets (I was unable to participate due to prior plans, but they invited me back.) The information is for Lt. Col. Jack Wells, USMCR (Ret) who is writing about the guys killed from his basic school class — they had the most KIAs. (You published his article in the prior issue of Red Clay.)

This next story is for you, as a Chicago guy and Marine.

For the past year, I've been at the U of C Children's Hospital where my 18-year-old daughter is undergoing treatment for bone cancer. You can guess how that is. A few months ago, she was in for chemo and after a few days, my wife and I took a break for a few minutes before her next chemo. We were at a coffee shop where I was standing looking around when a guy asked me about my cover (Vietnam Veteran) and "When were you there?" Now, Tom, remember I'm in the area of U of C with that cover — anyhow, it's Dave Harrington from the 26th Marines and Khe Sanh!! Better still, he and I were in the same company at Quantico and hadn't seen each other since August 1967! We spoke briefly and have e-mailed since then! Bill Gay is another of our Quantico gang. Anyhow, it was a bright moment in the day.

On page 12 of Red Clay you printed my email which contained information about a MT guy being denied for PTSD — well, since that time he's been awarded 100%!! Figured it might provide hope for others. He'd been trying for ten years.

Thanks

Stress Factors (Coping)

By Cindy Lou Crawford

Why would a husband go into a tyrannical rage when his wife accidentally gives him the wrong driving directions? I do not mean the normal, "Honey, how stupid can you be?" sprinkled with about 25 of his favorite four-letter words. Oh no, I mean hysterical, pounding the steering wheel, panic attack angry!

I know you must think this trivial or even stupid but during one occasion in Houston, Texas, while my best friend and a rather important dignitary sat in the back seat of our SUV, my husband had one of those terrible fits because I had gotten us lost on the interstate. It truly almost caused our divorce.

Now, after twenty-five years of marriage, I know the reason why. "Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man — Reflections of a Vietnam Vet" written by Ernest Spencer solved the mystery. Spencer's book gave my husband, a Vietnam and Khe Sanh veteran, the confidence to write his stressor report for the VA. It also gave me the opportunity to learn more about why my husband over the period of our marriage became less and less able to cope in certain situations.

Of course, I wanted to know more about my husband's Vietnam experience but he never discussed it until now. Ernest Spencer's book put me right there at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I was on patrol in the bunkers, and suffering the losses. Yes, the language is rough, but you must get past the camouflage of Spencer's raw narrative because the message is pure. The book chronicles Ernest Spencer's experiences as a captain in the Marine Corps, living and dying with our husbands, brothers, and sons.

If you ever wondered what life was really like, and I mean truthfully, Spencer's book gives an account of daily life in the business of war — sometimes funny, sometimes frustrating, and many times heart breaking. Spencer tells us what they saw, how they felt, and how they managed a reality that was so totally different from their expectations.

His personal account is the author's personal catharsis and much of the historical account is like an angry volcano erupting from the stupidity and senseless loss of so many young Marines. As I read the book, I knew it was the real deal. No exaggerated heroics or glamorized fiction fabricated to enhance the author's persona.

For me the answer was my husband's very first patrol in Vietnam. His lieutenant, anxious to get the briefing over with, gave visual recon from the top of a hill. As a twenty-year-old sergeant, my husband discovered he had lead his twelve-man squad to the wrong side of the river on the wrong side of the bridge, facing the wrong direction and was firing on his executive officer's patrol. Luckily, no one was injured and my husband had witnesses to the lieutenant's visual recon.

As for me, however, the trauma was lasting. When I would get him lost, I became that lieutenant. Without knowing, I triggered a flashback that put his life in danger. If you do not know where you are, then you are a dead man!

Dear Tom:

I served with the 1st Battalion, 13th Marines at Khe Sanh from 11 March 1968 until the end of April when the whole lot of us were pulled out. I was the Battalion Supply Officer.

After leaving Khe Sanh, we went to Quang Tri for about a month — I'm not sure of the time. At Quang Tri, I was assigned as "Officer in Charge, Battalion Rear." The rear group consisted of the Battalion Supply Section, Mess Section, a Corpsman, and supporting communication and motor transport elements.

Later, the Battalion Headquarters was moved just south of Dong Ha and the Battalion Rear to a place just south of Hue. Later the Battalion, including the Battalion Rear was combined and moved to Da Nang. I left the Battalion in November of 1968 and returned to Okinawa, to our parent unit, 9th MAB. I succeeded Major Kargill as Commanding Officer, Supply Company, Headquarters Battalion, 9th MAB. In March 1969 1 returned to Camp Pendleton where I worked for the G-4 of the 5h Marine Division until retirement in August 1969. Total service, 22 years 6 months.

I'm enclosing some memorabilia that I have kept all these years. I don't know if it has any value, but you are welcome to use it any way you see fit.

I once received a letter from a Corporal Wilkerson who worked for me at Khe Sanh. I think he lives in Chicago. I haven't heard from any of the others.

Sincerely,
Richard W. Snow, Captain USMC RET

"GYPSY" 1/13 Leaves Khe Sanh; Walks Softy...Carries A Big Stick

DA NANG — Their guns roar, and the thunder shakes and devastates the enemy, but the Marines go quietly...very quietly

The men of 1/13 arrived in Vietnam in July 1961. They have been, at one time or another, under the operational control of one division and administrative control of another.

Shortly after their arrival, the light artillery unit was positioned in a little known valley called Khe Sanh. The following battle found the artillery unit in the middle, subjected to shelling by the enemy that Marine infantrymen endured. But their guns roared defiantly back. When it was over, the 26th Regiment and attached units were awarded the Presidential Unit Citation. First BN, 13th Marines was one of those attached units. They were the sole artillery unit with the Marines in the valley. Since the end of April, when they left Khe Sanh, they have become a "gypsy outfit," moving as an entire unit five times.

The unit's subordinate firing batteries have moved, in total, over 20 times. In spite of the number of times they've been displaced, the battalion had, from the beginning of May until the end of August, fired more than 64,000 rounds during more than 12,000 support missions. During that time, 32 of the unit's Marines were cited for heroism, and 40 received Purple Heart Medals. The battalion supported U.S.Army and Special Forces units participating in joint operations, American Navy Advisors and South Vietnamese Army and Vietnamese Popular Force units as well as the Marines in their area of operations.

From July 25 until the end of August, the artillery unit was additionally responsible for fire support of 41 miles along National Route 1, from the Hai Van Pass to Phu Bai. They accomplished this mission although they were operating with one less firing battery than other organizations assigned similar task.

Recently, with the return of the 27th Marine Regiment to the United States, the 2nd Battalion of the 13th Marines marched in parade with the returning Marines. Only one unit of the 13th Marine Regiment remains in Viet-nam. Their guns roar, and the thunder shakes and devastates the enemy, but the Marines go quietly...very quietly.

The Sorrow of Unheralded Soldier Sons

by Jerry Large, columnist
The Seattle Times, reprinted with permission

Bud and Verly Hellwig are patriots. They love their country, and they are just the sort of people who form the heart of America, even now, as they live with wounds in their own hearts. They met at a USO dance in Bremerton, Dec. 2, 1944. He was a tall 19-year-old sailor and she, he says, was the most beautiful woman in the room. He gazed at her blond hair and blue eyes and asked her for a date. She declined but said he could accompany her to church. Two months later, they got married and after the war, they settled down to raising a family — three boys, then a little girl. Bud called me the other day about a letter to the editor Verly had sent to The Times. He was afraid it wouldn't be published and thought it said some things a lot of other people might be feeling, people whose children went off to fight in Vietnam.

It pains them that people who fought in Vietnam were spat upon and demonized. Celebrations for returning Iraq War soldiers sharpen their sense of hurt and anger. They invited me to their home in Shoreline to talk about it. "We don't want to take anything away from those that have come back, that they've made a big deal about, but unless everybody gets the same, it isn't fair," Verly Hellwig said. "Everybody that was involved in Vietnam, whether they lost kids or not, they all feel this terrible pain that our kids came home as bums, and the rest came home as heroes," Bud Hellwig said. All three of their boys volunteered for the Marines; Gary first, then Steven, then Ray. As soon as each one got out of high school, he'd sign up.

"I guess it's our fault. We taught them whatever our country did, they were supposed to support," Bud Hellwig told me. Hellwig ran away from his home in Arizona to join the Navy in WWII and survived the sinking of his first ship by a German submarine. There are big photos of the boys on a wall of their home, amongst the other family photos, next to several framed medals. If you start looking on the left, at the top, the first thing you see is Steven's name. It's been framed. You look closer and you see that it's a rubbing from a plaque. The plaque it came from is part of the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C.

On Jan. 21, 1968, the North Vietnamese launched an attack on Khe Sanh, the most forward U.S. base, and began a major battle that would last 77 days. Steve, who was 19, died the first day of the assault. That was also the year public opinion in America turned against the war. When their son was killed, the Hellwig's got calls from strangers taunting them, Bud Hellwig said. "Your baby killer got killed," they'd say. Their other two sons were jeered whenever they wore their uniforms in public. Every conflict since has reminded them of Vietnam, and especially of Steve. This time the response to returning troops has been enormous.

"The media has made such a fuss, like it was the first time such a thing has happened," Verly Hellwig said. She felt so strongly, she sat down and wrote about it. "What a joy it would have been if our sons and thousands of others returning from Vietnam had been treated to the same homecoming our troops from Iraq are receiving. They may not have won the war, but they all fought like heroes for their country's cause and so very many of them gave their lives. I strongly agree that we owe all the troops a thank you whether we believe in the conflict or not. "Our returning sons were met with only criticism and scorn. They could not even wear their uniforms in public without bearing jeers and insults, were kicked off airplanes when trying to get home to make room for late arriving civilians. No media welcomed them with praise or thanks. "Let's never let that happen again."

Bud Hellwig was more pointed. "How come you are so wonderfully patriotic now, and where were you then?" His eyes glistened with tears. "It's very easy to put a flag on your car," Verly Hellwig added. They supported the Vietnam War then and now. "We were supportive of what our country was trying to do. Our kids thought they were doing a good deed."

They resent portrayals of Vietnam vets as all being drugged out or mentally disturbed. This time their politics are different, but their support for the troops remains. "Mrs. Hellwig and I are not supporters of the President and his policies. We are very much Democrats." But they support the men and women who served in Iraq. "They're entitled to our honor and respect." You can be sure that this Memorial Day they're thinking about their son who died serving his country. "Once somebody said to me, 'Haven't you gotten over it yet?' "said Bud. "When you lose a child, you don't ever get over it. All you can do is hope to be able to live with it. "We want people to know that there are a lot of people like us."

An Eternity of Seconds

Sonny Gratzer

Twice my life turned white in Viet Nam in stillness and calm indescribable.
Pure, chaste white — brilliant, dazzling, stunning white.
I knew what was going on.
I was conscious.
I could see it all — suddenly pain seared my soul.
White, silent suffering covered me and I still knew what occurred
— each time.
I saw bodies flung against bare hardwood trees And I heard my ACAV diesel rumble refusing to quit
when we hit the "mine."
The mine — a U. S. booby-trapped 105 mm giant slug triggered by our own dud butterfly bomb, triggered by our own C-ration can and a nail triggered by their split bamboo tied with vine.
Once, too, while seconds flew
I knew instantly I was mangled, gut shot, spine shot.
The "instant" part not nearly as fast as in knowing the white light I lived in for an eternity of seconds.
My life seems long, extended by lights bright and urgent.
I still don't understand.
Why me, Lord?
But then, why not me, Lord?
I know I've been wrong and done things You don't condone.
Let me know,
or are the pains and aches my signs?
My lost loves merely retribution for crimes against your teachings?
My grief is real,
my understanding unfulfilled.
I need to know when I pray
who to pray for.

I read James "Jimbo" Wodecki's article "Marines at Khe Sanh 1970, Lam Son 719" with interest. First, "LOM SOM 719" was in 1971, but I am sure this was a typo in the heading. I served at Khe Sanh in 1971 flying for 'C' Troop, 2nd/17th CAV, 101st ABN, but I considered myself as a Marine, though I was wearing an Army uniform. For a "combat patch" (the Army allows the wearing of combat patches as part of one's normal uniform wear), I wore a Marine patch, as I had served in combat first with the Marines and would never let anyone forget this. During 1966-68, I had been a helicopter crew-chief (CH-46-A/D) with HMM-262 until my transfer into the Army for their Helicopter Flight Program.

During my combat time with HMM-262 in 1967-68, I was flying out of Khe Sanh on a regular (far too regular now that I think about it) basis. So for me, Khe Sanh, when the Army arrived for LOM SOM 719 was like "coming home." Furthermore, during 1969 and up to LOM SOM 719, I had been flying Cobras for MAV-V-SOGs, CCN mission (MLT-2) out of Quang Tri. So every day we would fly over Khe Sanh, and the hills, headed west to our missions. So for me...I have always considered Khe Sanh my home base, so to speak. One way or another my tours involved Khe Sanh. But my time with the Marines living at Khe Sanh was the defining moment, and even though I was later in the Army, I was and still am a Marine who happened to have also served in the Army.

One last comment. I took a whole lot of verbal abuse (Smile) from those I served with because I wore not only an Marine "combat patch," but also my senior badge was, and still is, the Combat Aircrew Wings, that I earned under fire with the United States Marines (and some of that was at Khe Sanh). Yes, I am proud of my Army service, and flying helicopters was a gas, but being a Marine who served in combat is the pinnacle of honor one could receive.

I spent my first 2 weeks in Vietnam (December 28, 1968 to January 10, 1969) on Namo Bridge as a member of Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment (Bravo 1/26)

On the 6th or 7th of January 1969, I and eight or nine "NFGs" who had only been in-country a few days, were placed on a C-46 helicopter with some veteran combat Marines. We flew to an area where a alleged Marine deserter and NVA soldiers had been observed sneaking into a village to get supplies. We set up an ambush awaiting his arrival. Unfortunately, the ambush site was placed in the middle of some type of ragweed field to which I was highly allergic. I then started to sneeze and could not stop, so the ambush was canceled. We returned to our basecamp at Namo Bridge, north of Danang on Highway 1. I later learned my sneezing had forced the cancellation of an ambush that had been in the planning for many weeks.

The next night, I was placed on bridge guard duty with three other Marines. There were four of us on guard duty in two 2-man teams. We had orders to randomly throw M-26 hand grenades into the Song Cu De River beneath Namo Bridge, in an effort to deter NVA/Viet Cong sappers from swimming underneath the bridge and placing satchel charges. During the early morning hours of January 9, 1969, four other Marines plus the OD came onto the bridge to relieve the four of us from guard duty. With nine of us standing fairly close to one another, one of the Marines who was getting off guard duty said, "I have one more grenade to throw." I heard the spoon fly as he threw the grenade. Unfortunately, the grenade struck the bridge railing and bounced back toward all of us. In the semi-darkness, I saw the grenade when it landed near me. I stepped between two Marines and pushed them safely out of harm's way as I kicked the grenade off the bridge. It exploded only a few feet before reaching the surface of the water.

The next day, I was informed by a corporal, whose name I do not recall, that I had been would be recommended for the Marine Corps Medal for my actions. I was transferred on the 10th or 11th of January, 1969, to Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment. I never received recognition for my actions on the bridge. Someday, I hope to locate witnesses concerning four or five other events that occured during my tour of Vietnam; and, to receive the awards for which I was reccommended and never received. I want to set the record straight for my grandchildren and to somehow try to live down that sneezing spell that aborted a combat mission and possibly negated the capture of Private Robert Garwood, USMC (deserter).

Our Force Recon Company did not live at the base — B Co. 3rd Bn. Recon lived near the ammo bunker. We merely used it as a patrol base and during the worst of the shelling, we seldom went up there but rather we flew over it. We used Ca Lu and LZ Stud for a patrol base during that period. We started running the 4-man patrols in early Spring of 68 along the borders, sometimes out of Khe Sanh and sometimes out of LZ Stud. We worked hard in that area during Pegasus but saw much more enemy activity later that summer after the base had been dismantled. That summer, we worked the 881-861 area and Tiger Tooth Mt. as well as the extreme northwest corner of the country...crossing into Laos a couple of times. I don't know if the Marine units that endured the battle ever learned what we recon teams found during that time but it was impressive...trucks, tank treads, arms caches, fuel, lots and lots of cemeteries...too many to count.

Although we were also 0311s, we lived much better than the Marine infantry...I think all recon men had a guilt thing about that. Of course, our job was also hazardous but after 5-6 days, we would be pulled out and returned to Dong Ha to be debriefed. We were usually there 2-3 days. We would usually get a half-day of rest, a hot meal, a beer or two, draw ammo, mail and then we would receive the next patrol order...a day to prepare, coordinate supporting arms (if we were within range) and then an insertion by either truck or helicopter. We could work the Khe Sanh area one patrol and then into the DaKrong the next...Con Thien and then the Hai Lang. You never knew where you were going next. Usually when a guy made sergeant, he would be sent to a grunt unit. Most recon team leaders were corporals and lance corporals. We were independent so no one messed with us. No one could supercede our orders as we worked directly under 3rd MAF. In short, we fought a much more comfortable war than you guys did.

That is what made me a bit reluctant to be considered a Khe Sanh Vet, but I am honored that I was asked to join and now consider myself among those who I always felt were a cut above every one else — the Marine grunt. I look forward to working with you on this next effort and I hope that you will like it. I enjoyed reading your story about Asian Marines (in the Red Clay issue). We had a Chinese-American in our unit that was from Mississippi. He had the strongest Southern accent I ever heard. He was always joking and could have become a stand-up comic with little effort. He was also a practical joker. His team never let him on the chopper first when being extracted from the bush, since we resembled the enemy in our bush outfits — they were worried about the gunners making a mistake. He left our unit after a while and we lost track. His redneck accent would crack us up and in the Vietnamese village he really shocked everyone. Sure would like to run into him someday.

I now feel bad about the names we had for ethnicities, but I guess it was the Marine way. I cringe now at the word "gook" or "dink," yet I once used it freely. Native-Americans were always "Chief." I am half-Cuban and half-French, so I was the "Spic-Frog" and I never was offended by many jokes hurled at me by my peers. African-Americans were always "Brothers" or "Bloods." Guys from Oceana always called themselves "Pineapple" — we had Pineapple "Chunk" and Pineapple "Slice," one from Samoa the other from Guam. It was innocent but now I guess we have grown up, and we are all politically correct. We were all Brothers and a Family. Wish the world was like that and then there would be very few problems. Your essay about your friend Han Lee was what brought that to mind.

Take care, your bro,
SF Eddie

Why I Joined

by Bill Hubbard

I was reading on the KSV message board about this war our country is now involved in today. All are volunteers. This got me to thinking about why I chose to join the Marine Corps instead of any other branch of service.

I did not join for the glory or adventure, which I considered grand illusions. My reasons were more basic. During this time, most companies wanted you to have your service obligation completed before they would consider offering employment. Another factor was that three of my closest friends from high school also made the decision to join the Corps. This was the real reason. If my buddies were going, so was I. So, while Operation Hastings was still fresh in the headlines, Alvie Bryant, Bill Brown, Robert Simmons, and I all went in together.

We all lived within two blocks of each other in a poor section of Houston, Texas. We stayed together through boot camp and infantry training. Three of us qualified as expert marksman. Bill Brown missed qualifying expert by two lousy points. It really broke his heart. He felt like he let us down.

We all shipped out together on the USS Walker that had 4,000 Marines and a unit of Army postal workers. We got our assignments while on the ship. Alvie and Bill got off in Okinawa, but immediately requested shipment to Vietnam cause me and Robert were going straight in.

I remember offloading from the USS Walker at Danang into an LST and could see tracers flying everywhere from the nearby hills. I felt like my world was coming to an end. But when the ramp of the LST went down, there was Vietnamese selling Cokes. This absolutely shocked me. I thought somebody should have been handing out ammo instead. We all ended up grunt Marines. I served with E Company 2/26. I got hit by an 82mm mortar round on May 22, 1967 and finished up my tour at Khe Sanh in February 1968.

Alvie and Bill were both KIA I found out about it when my mother wrote me. I don't know how they died and have never tried to find out the details. Alvie was a first class guy. If he lived, he'd be 54 years old today. He had a daughter that was born while he was over there and never knew her. I often wonder what she knows about her daddy. About his life. He had the greatest smile I have ever seen. He had a big love for life. She has no idea that it was Alvie loaned me $30 so I could go to Oceanside and have some fun. I never paid him back that loan. Bill Brown was a tall skinny guy that had never been two miles from home before he joined the Marines. He took to smoking a pipe to make him appear more mature. He had a daughter while serving in Vietnam. He was also KIA. Another child that never knew her daddy.

The undoubted star of our group was Robert Simmons. He was the quarterback of our high school football team. He made meritorious sergeant in Vietnam. He got wounded three times before they shipped him home. He received the Bronze Star besides his three Purple Hearts. When I got out, they were going to give me a general discharge, 'cause I was so messed up. It was some old mustang Marine that called me aside and straightened me out and made it possible for me to be discharged honorably. I don't remember the man's name. He also helped me get a job.

I got married but that didn't work out. I remember my wife yelling at me: "What the hell is wrong with you," she'd curse. Her daddy had landed on Omaha beach and spent the rest of his life drinking. You would have thought she'd understand, but she didn't. I had a long talk with my mother shortly before she died. She informed me that on our block alone, five Marines died in Vietnam. I felt so bad about what our poor mothers must have gone through. I told her how sorry I was for us putting them through that. Robert would call me throughout the years like clockwork on the Marine Corps birthday to wish me well.

His mother told me that he had become an alcoholic after Vietnam. The last job he held was a part-time, short-order cook. Robert, our star brother, lived the end of life in a halfway house. He was a good man who only drank to kill his pain. His mother told me he was in a hospital dying of cirrhosis of the liver. Robert encouraged me to quit drinking. I went to see him during his last days. The last day he was so weak he couldn't talk. I gave him a thumbs up. He slowly raised his arm and gave me a thumbs up, turned it down, turned his head to the side and died. It staggered me. I made a vow to him and all the other guys that I would straighten out. I'm struggling but keeping at it. I don't know the big picture but do the best I can.

I'd give anything for just one more day. One more day when the four of us were young and happy and talking about our dreams of what we'd do after the war. God. I miss my buddies so much. I miss and love my friends. To this day I still keep remembering the stink inside my helmet when I took it off. I remember how cold my flak jacket would feel after I'd put it back on after it was all sweated up.

Well I guess I've rambled on a bit too long, but I know that at least you guys know what I'm talking about. I don't care what the rest of the folks out there think about us. Only we know and understand.

On the Reunion in Charleston: Got a kick out of the theme being "Bird Dog Pilots, Our Protectors in the Sky." I forget if I ever mentioned it to you, but I am the current President of the "Forward Air Controllers' (FAC) Association." Our current roster of pilots, maintenance, communications, and intelligence, et al. personnel connected with the FAC Mission is about 2000. I know of several who, along with myself, directly supported the defense of Khe Sanh during the Seige. I got one to come to the last KSV Reunion.

I figured I'd put the word out on our FACNET to let the guys know about this great opportunity to get together with the Khe Sanh Vets. I tried to register at the Clarion today and the gal at the registrations desk said she understood the rooms for the Reunion were already filled and I needed to talk to a guy named "AJ" on Monday. I'm gonna do that so I can put out all the right info to the FACNET guys on my first try.

You smoked me out with the two articles mentioning 1/9 on Hill 64 (8 Feb) and Lang Vei the day before. I was there (FACing) for both of those. Reminded me one more time, I owe you a couple of those stories from my diary. I swear I'll do that in the next couple of weeks.

I told you the one about Lang Vei and my chance meeting with CSM, Special Operations Command, Dennis Thompson (Ret) at the San Diego Reunion in 2000. He was at Lang Vei for the whole thing and ended up a prisoner of war. Dennis and I have been trading e-mails ever since.

About Hill 64: it was only in the last couple of years that I figured out — by matching dates in my diary with the description of the 8 Feb battle on Hill 64 in Eric Hammel's book — I was there facing that battle as well.

I was reminded by the item on a Fort Sumter tour that I have a copy of a letter from one of the family, writing back to Connecticut from her home in Charleston during the bombardment of Fort Sumter. Quite a piece of perspective.

Anyway, I'm looking forward to Charleston and plan to bring my wife, Audrey, this time. It will be a first for her. She's heard me talk about the Reunions and all you characters long enough and decided she has to see for herself. More later.

A Successful Hunt, Marines Never Give Up A Fight

The date was March 11, 1968. The place, the Khe Sanh base near the demilitarized zone in South Vietnam amid the heralded Tet Offensive. Combat was hot and heavy. Even as more artillery shells blasted in, American troops prepared to continue their defense. A short distance apart that morning, Ronald Shouse of Winston-Salem and Clifford Treese Jr. of Allentown, PA, enlisted Marines, were busy at their duties. Shouse was near a big artillery gun, and Treese was atop a truck helping to unload shells into an ammunition dump. Suddenly there was an explosion. "I found myself lying on the ground," Treese recalled. "I heard somebody yelling, 'Incoming!" but there was no chance for anybody to do anything." Shouse and Treese were close buddies. They had served together on the same gun. But that morning is the last time they saw each other until 10 July 1971, when Treese arrived from Allentown for a weekend visit. When he was wounded, Treese had to wait an unusually long time due to the heavy fire that medevac helicopters were taking while trying to land.

I lost all my personal effects, including my address book with all my buddies names and addresses. Treese searched for two years trying to find Ron Shouse. All he knew was that Ron lived somewhere in the Winston-Salem area in North Carolina. Things began to pick up when his wife started calling every government agency she could possibly think of. "Everybody offered to help, but they couldn't find Ronnie," she said.

On the 9th of July 1971, she called the Marine Recruiting Station. Gunnery Sergeant Jan Polly got on the telephone and within a short time, he had Shouse's telephone number and address. Treese and his wife were in their car, headed for Winston-Salem. They drove all night, arriving the next afternoon.

They spent the week talking with Shouse and his wife. "We talked war most of the time," Shouse said "We had a good deal to tell each other. "Shouse said most members of their outfit thought Treese was dead." Treese said he had been wounded at 9:00 a.m. He was taken to the aid station where a small piece of shrapnel was removed. He was bandaged and sent back to duty. At noon the same day, he was seriously wounded. When he was taken back to the same aid station, they asked "You again?" He spent a month at Danang Naval Hospital and a month in the Philippines. He was transferred to Philadelphia Naval Hospital for six months. He was in and out of Wilkes-Barre VA Hospital the next 11 or 12 months while doctors fought to repair his badly, wounded arm. He went to work as a mechanic but re-injured his arm. That forced him to go to work in a company mailroom in Bethlehem, PA. Ron Shouse went to work for Joseph Schlitz Brewing Company. They both promised to always keep in contact with each other and have kept that promise till the present time.

I'm 23 years old, and I've been drawing for as long as I can remember and when I re-discovered comic books at the age of 13, I decided I either wanted to draw comics or do commercial illustration. At the age of 21, after realizing I was going nowhere, I decided that I needed to follow my vision. I left Albuquerque in 2002 and am now studying illustration at the Art Institute of Seattle. I'm glad I'm in school, but the workload doesn't allow a lot of time for my personal projects.

In 1998 a friend of mine loaned me a book written by a friend of his family. The book was Robert Mason's "Chickenhawk." It's about the author's experience as a Huey pilot in the early years of the Vietnam War. I didn't know much about the Vietnam War at that time, and I didn't think I would enjoy the book very much. Almost immediately, I was completely enthralled. Mason didn't overburden his book with political rhetoric or posturing. It seemed to me like an honest and personal account of what he saw and felt while he was in Vietnam. I honestly can't say what it was, but something really caught me. I wanted to know more, and understand more. After a time I borrowed some other books from another friend of mine, including James McDonough's "Platoon Leader," and Nicholas Warrs' "Phase Line Green." Since then, I've read just about every book I could get my hands on — from the stories of Navy SEALs to USAF pilots to Viet-Cong organizers. Except for a few times when I read the memoirs of Westmoreland, Nguyen Cao Ky and a few others, I've tried to avoid political rhetoric and stick to the stories of individual soldiers or operations.

I initially started drawing from photographs of the war to practice figure drawing, and I thought I might as well draw something I was interested in. While reading Mark Baker's "NAM," in which he records the experiences of some of the Vietnam veterans he interviewed. I was so struck by some of the stories that I decided to draw them. I guess my drawings of Vietnam are my way of remembering and honoring those who served there. I hope that I have done that and that I can continue to pay tribute.

HUÊ BATTLE FOR THE IMPERIAL CITY

In late January 1968, the NVA (North Vietnamese Army) and VC (Viet Cong) launched a series of attacks on U.S. and allied bases and S. Vietnamese cities all across S. Vietnam. The attack on the ancient Imperial City of Huê began in the early morning hours of 31 Jan as elements of the 6th NVA Regiment swept into the Old City (Citadel) from the South West, from the South the NVA 4th Reg entered the New City and Hue was soon under communist control.

Within a day elements of the U.S. 1st and 5th Marine Regs., ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam) 7th and 2nd Airborne, U.S. 101st Airborne and 1st Cavalry were embroiled in a battle that would drag on for 26 days of house to house street fighting that would cost the Marines 142 men KIA, U.S. Army 74 KIA, and 384 ARVN KIA, versus an estimated 5,000 plus NVA, VC killed. After some of the fiercest fighting of the year in which some NVA dug into the 20 foot thick walls of the ancient Imperial palace grounds the city was finally back under allied control When the smoke cleared, nearly half of the city was destroyed and 75 percent of the population homeless. Some 5,800 Vietnamese civilians were either dead or missing.

There Are Two Airstrips!

by Tom Esslinger

In the Spring 2003 edition of Red Clay, Steve Johnson did a great job reporting on his visit to Khe Sanh in 1998, the 30th anniversary of the Tet offensive. I accompanied Steve on that trip, and his article prompted me to add to the story. I went on that trip in 1998 because Warren Wiedhahn's Military Historical Tours had enlisted former Commandant General Carl Mundy as the tour leader. When, as a brand new Second Lieutenant fresh out of Basic School, I reported to the Third Battalion, Twenty-sixth Marines at Camp Evans in September 1967, the first person I met was Major Carl Mundy, the Battalion S-3.

Steve's article recounts the moving ceremony (complete with pictures — I appear to the right of center wearing a white shirt and standing to the right of the gentleman in the black shirt) we conducted at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. That ceremony took place on the old airstrip. We were at the combat base for several hours, and I was quite vocal in expressing my opinion that the long, bare, red dirt strip which was said to be the remains of the airstrip was not in the right place! I based my conclusion on the fact that the east end of this area did not drop off sharply toward the Rao Quan River. Likewise, to the north, the land near the airstrip was relatively level, and I remembered this area as sloping gradually to a sharp drop to the river. I found few among us who agreed with me. General Mundy put an end to my comments by pronouncing that he was certain we were standing on the site of the original airstrip. Even twenty-eight years after I left the Marine Corps, I was not about to contradict the Commandant.

In 1998, we could see Hill 861 from the KSCB but could not see Hill 881S where I spent the siege as the Company Commander of Mike Company, 3/26. I was really disappointed to not be able to return to 881S, but there were no navigable roads up there, no helicopters available, and insufficient time to hike there. Therefore, I was intrigued to learn in late 2002 that Frank Gulledge, the webmaster of the excellent Purple Foxes website, was thinking about a trip to Vietnam that would include a hike to 881S. HMM-364 (the Purple Foxes) was the helicopter squadron primarily responsible for supporting the two companies of Marines (my Mike Company and Bill Dabney's India Company) stuck on 881S.

For an outstanding presentation of the imaginative way they accomplished that mission (and lots of other information and pictures on 881S), visit Frank's website at www.hmm-364.org, and click on "The Warriors of Hill 881S." Don't miss the "Dave Powell Photo Collection." I decided to join that tour which was put together by Battlefield Expeditions, an excellent outfit which is a spin-off from Military Historical Tours. Our guide was Bill Stilwagen, a former Marine with experience on the ground and as a helicopter gunner. Bill had been an assistant guide on my 1998 tour and has developed into a first-rate guide.

In early April 2003, our group of eleven former Marines and two grown sons drove the new Route 9 from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh village in forty-five minutes. That trip took over two hours in 1998. After visiting the Lang Vei Special Forces Camp which is in the process of becoming a tourist attraction, we bussed through the rapidly growing suburbs of Khe Sanh village to the combat base. Since our last visit, two new buildings have appeared, there is a new sign, and a destroyed U.S. tank guards the entrance. Obviously, KSCB will also be a tourist attraction. The small museum includes the kind of propaganda Steve Johnson referred to in his article. The museum overlooks the red dirt airstrip. As we toured the area, I again became convinced that this airstrip was in the wrong place. But this time we had a good map and two GPS devices. Bill Stilwagen decided to test my theory. I gave him the six-digit map coordinate for the center of the runway. The GPS showed that we were not on the runway which appeared to be off to the north. We began moving to that area. When we reached sloping ground which seemed right to me, Bill took another GPS reading which showed we were just west of the end of the airstrip shown on the map.

At this point I noticed a Vietnamese man who had been following us. He spoke a little English, and I remembered enough Vietnamese so that we could communicate. He said that he was 35 years old and had lived in the area of the combat base since 1975. I told him what we were doing, and he responded by saying, "There are two airstrips." I asked him where the other one was and he pointed to the northeast. I asked him if he could show us the other airstrip, and he said yes and moved in that direction. We moved through well-tended and orderly new coffee trees until we reached a long flat growth of trees which was the same dimension as the airstrip. As we walked down the strip, we found a path leading to the north which sloped down toward the river. Soon we discovered barbed wire, remnants of sandbags, and holes which were probably part of the C Company 1/26 lines. Several of our party continued down the path and found the waterpoint which had been outside Charlie Company's lines.

After we explored the area some more and talked to our new friend, Le Quat, we agreed that we had found the old airstrip from 1968. GPS readings confirmed that conclusion. As we hiked back to the second, newer airstrip, we concluded that the new airstrip must have been put there when the combat base was reopened in late 1970 to support the ARVN operation Lam Son 719 which took place in 1971. The logistics and air support for that ill-fated operation were centered at the KSCB. Why the airstrip was not rebuilt on the same site as the strip abandoned by U.S. forces in mid-1968 is a mystery to us. But we are certain that the new airstrip is about a click southwest of the old airstrip. The strips are parallel, but the new one is more barren and obvious, and the old one is well-vegetated and well disguised.

We did reach Hill 881S the next day. We departed from a Bru village with the village chief as our guide. Despite the fact that Bill Stilwagen had characterized the hike as "a light hike" and "arduous," it was a very difficult walk. The poor trail, high elephant grass and hot sun took its toll as we labored up and down the beautiful terrain. After five difficult hours, we reached the peak on a beautiful sunny day where we enjoyed the pleasant breeze and the spectacular view of the border with Laos and the mountains beyond. We held an emotional ceremony there, but that is a subject for another article. The purpose of this one was to pinpoint the location of the two Khe Sanh Combat Base airstrips.

EDITORS NOTE: Tom. Thanks for sending in the article. There has been a lot of stuff printed on the airstrip discrepancy. You give a unique reason why it might be so. Thanks for sending this in, and, by all means write more about 881S.

One who has been with you all the way"
Thru MCRD — Edson Range — ITR
Constantly near and never afar.
Whether soaked with rain or muddy ground,
Always dependable never letting you down,
Ready to go when the time came around.
We gathered at the wire to bid adieu,
To an old friend we so intimately knew.
When it came my time to say goodbye

During The Khe Sanh Siege in 1968

A USAF Forward Air Controller's (FAC) Recollections

From diary entries on 6 March, 1968
by Toby Rushforth

The setting is Danang Air Base at 2215 in the evening. These are my thoughts, recorded after an exciting day at Khe Sanh.

NVA Tunneling at Hill 861:

Today was very satisfying! I got up at 0615, grabbed a bite to eat and got my Intelligence and Operations briefs. Nothing really heavy going on at Khe Sanh. That's good! Aircraft #331, pre-flight was normal. Took off at 0845 and headed right up to the Khe Sanh area. Red Eye 04, whom I guessed was one of the highly classified recce and surveillance aircraft, reported moving vehicles 5 miles south of the Main Base. I couldn't find them but started out the day by hitting a new road segment that looked like the most probable location with a "Stinger" flight. I then worked with Kilo 14 and Echo14 on both 861 hills. Between us, we found and hit two mortar, automatic weapons and bunker complexes with three flights of fighters.

For a change, the weather was amazingly clear. I could see so far that I had to fight disorientation for most of the flight. All of the little cloud-shrouded valleys and alleys, trees and hills looked entirely different. Some of the "valleys" now looked like slight depressions in the terrain, dwarfed by mountains in the distance.

FACs were directing fighter strikes all over the area. Their flight patterns were obviously not completely deconflicted. As I was working flights in the Hill 861 area, other aircraft kept surprising us by zipping through unannounced. This was dangerous stuff, but I guess we were all too preoccupied doing our own thing to dwell upon or raise hell about it. It was a good day for finding and beating up the bad guys. I had three flights of fighters stacked up overhead waiting while helicopters swirled over Hill 558 nearby. Man, was it getting crowded. Due to a temperature inversion, the more we bombed, the worse the visibility got, from the dust and smoke hanging in the air. We finally got things more coordinated and blew the hell out of two NVA complexes nearby. Good work from those fighter guys. It was like they were showing off, because the usual weather constraints weren't there. The NVA were firing light to moderate small arms fire at us the whole time, but no one got hit. Amazing!

Then came the corker! "Covey 252, this is Echo 14. How about hitting the gully between the two 861 hills? We think they're digging underneath us." I thought — Ha! They're talking to the right guy. I'd been reporting tunneling on hills for the past several days, and no one seemed interested. I hadn't seen active digging, just turned dirt and holes in sides of hills. Echo 14 was deadly serious on this one. Though I couldn't specifically see the diggings, I had an idea of where the tunnel might be, in what looked like brush camouflage. As I surveyed the hills and considered how close we were going to have to come with the ordnance, my stomach got a little queasy about the potential for hurting or killing some Marines in the process. However, I was absolutely sure they were right about the tunneling and knew we had to do something about it right now. There would be no better time, and the weather was about as good as we'd ever get. We really had to talk our way through this one though. Fortunately, there was no hurry, because no direct attack on 861 was in progress.

Bottom line: I figured I had to leave it up to the fighter pilots who were available to do the job. I'd direct it if they felt confident enough to do it. The next flight of fighters was "Whale 34," a flight of 4 Marine F-4Bs — from Danang, I believe. They were loaded with 500lb. bombs and 5" Zuni rockets. I explained the situation on Hill 861 and asked the fighters: "Does anyone feel uneasy about this one?" "One Negative!" "Two Negative!" Three Negative!" "Four Negative!" Whew! OK, so here we go. I asked Kilo 14 and Echo 14 to move the troops out of the trench lines closest to the target area on the north face of each hill. While they were doing that, I went back to the fighters to lay out the tactics: left-hand race track, attack from the north, heading 160 degrees, and dive down the ravine on the south side of the hill. My plan was to run a tighter race track inside theirs at about 1500 feet and dive down underneath and behind each one to double check their inbound alignment heading on the target and between the two hill tops.

There was only about 100 meters between perimeters on the two hills, so this was going to be as close as I've ever worked in direct troop support. "OK, Whale, keep good spacing to help me control each run on the target. We'll drop one weapon per pass." Lead flew two dry passes on the north-to-south heading ("dry" means "without releasing any weapons.") He was really pressing — high angle dive but very close to the hilltop and down the backside. I felt a deep sense of pride as I watched these guys set up and talk to each other — so sure they could put their ordnance almost in the laps of our own troops without hurting them, while surgically digging out the NVA from the North face of the hill. Kilo got a little antsy as we got closer to actually releasing weapons. The lead F-4 thundering by on the dry passes certainly must have been sobering to the guys in the hilltop trenches. With more assurances, Kilo and Echo said they were ready on the two hills.

I told Whale Flight that if a target run didn't feel just right, to go through "dry" and try it again. The 500lb bombs were first — fantastic! Right on the target, and with no apparent damage to the Marine trenches. The troops continued to report that they were OK. On the first "Zuni" rocket pass, I was right under and behind the fighter as the rocket came off the rail. It did a big corkscrew maneuver, leading me to believe it was out of control. The rest of the world froze in time as the rocket finally straightened itself out and impacted even closer to our Marines' perimeter trench line. Maybe even as close as 20 meters? The troops still reported they were OK.

There were 5 secondary explosions, one very large, as the bombs and rockets slammed into the hillside. We were on the tunnel and explosives alright. Whale 34 flight had finally expended everything they had. What a "shit hot" display of airmanship and support for the troops. As they pulled up from the base to rejoin and head home, I felt a rush of relief. We had gotten the job done without any friendly casualties.

Then, as I watched Whale 34 flight depart and began to tell them how great they were, I caught a big flash of motion through the Plexiglas in the lower part of the cross cockpit door. As I dropped my right wing to get a better look, an incredible sight greeted me. The entire north side of Hill 861 had erupted in almost a volcanic fashion. Rocks, trees, dirt, smoke and a fireball billowing out and away from the hill. There was crap flying everywhere.

Kilo: "Hey Covey, did you see that one?"

"You bet!"

"Holy Shit, are you guys alright down there?!!" It affected the hill all the way up to within a few meters of the trench line. Man! What a blast! The NVA sure had a lot of explosives packed away down there. Good thing the troops had pulled back from the perimeter. "Two Six Actual" came up on the radio. He could hardly talk; it was such a big moment. As I headed for Danang, I realized just how good this whole thing felt. On the radios, I tried my best to help Whale 34 flight and "Hillsboro (Airborne Command Post)" understand what great work they had done and how much it was appreciated by the troops. I believe I alluded to the fact that the whole thing might even have been better than sex?

I subsequently wrote a Letter of Commendation to the Commander of the Direct Air Support Center (DASC) to insure Whale 34 flight got special recognition for their gallant effort that day.

The rest of the story

It's 2 May and I am in the assembly area on the Marine Air Wing side of Danang. I'm waiting for the check-in and boarding process for my R&R to Hawaii. This was really a conflicted time; the heady anticipation of a week in Hawaii was tempered by the thoughts that my FAC buddies were still going to be here, flying every day. They might not all be here alive when I get back? We'd been taking a lot of FAC casualties lately.

In front of me, Vietnamese children were playing with a water buffalo and some dogs, while an older Vietnamese couple (probably their parents) were working their rice paddy with another water buffalo pulling a tiller. Slightly to their right were a few platoons of Marines in combat gear boarding helicopters. What a contrast of peaceful, everyday living with those headed for combat.

"Pardon me sir, but what do you fly?" I was a bit startled as I looked back to my left to see a good-looking young Marine, a bit shorter than myself. He must have seen the wings on my fatigues. I smiled and said "an O-2," thinking there was no way he'd ever heard of one. He perked up a bit.

"What's your call sign," he asked?

"Covey 252," I responded.

He really lit up and blurted out, "You're Covey 252? I'm Hasty Foot 14 Alpha! Gee, sir!" He was so wound up he could hardly talk fast enough. Ha! He made me feel like some sort of a superhero — not only remembered my call sign, but about everything I did and said up there over the last few weeks. He was talking with so much enthusiasm, I could hardly get a word in edgewise for a while. Was I ever pumped up! His name was Michael Dominic. As I stood there in wonderment, he went to get other friends from Khe Sanh. He came back later to get my address — then even later, he took me to talk with "Echo" from Hill 861. Echo seemed to remember me by call sign quite well. I was amazed at the detail recalled.

However, he did relate a couple of sobering notes. On 6 March, during the bombing of the tunneling effort, a couple of those 500 lb.-ers that hit 50 to 100 meters from the trench line did some damage to friendlies. Some trenchline was collapsed and a guy was thrown across a bunker causing a back injury and breaking his arm. Don't know if he was yanking my chain, but he said one fella actually "lost it" during the bomb strikes. Apparently, he'd been in a couple of tough engagements and was emotionally charged anyway. He heard the bombs, came running out of the bunker and saw the F-4 streak by. Some "joker" saw him and yelled "MIGS! It's OK, ours are on the way!" Snap, that was it.

"Echo," whose name turned out to be Bill, said that there were explosives, supplies, etc. all over the side of that hill after we were through. It finished the NVA effort on the hillside. He also said that the guys who were injured had no problem with it. They got medevaced off the hill.

"Hasty Foot 14 Alpha" spoke of other engagements in days past and amazed me with the detail he remembered, dropping green smoke grenades on St. Patrick's Day, the works. They walked all the way through the processing line with me, talking story. What a rare opportunity that was.

I wonder if these guys come to the Khe Sanh Veterans' Reunions? Sure would be fun to shake hands again!

Note: Aircraft #331, flown during this mission is the O-2 now on static display at the USAF Air & Space Museum at Wright Patterson AFB, Ohio.

Reunions and Memories During 1968 Khe Sanh Siege!

by Toby Rushforth, USAF, Retired.

It was late last century, in fact late in 1999, that I first became aware of the Khe Sanh Veterans' Association. I couldn't imagine how I missed it over all those years. I had been a Forward Air Controller, flying O-2 aircraft out of Hue Citadel and Danang AB in 1967-68. That was a very vital time in my life, as I am sure it was for all of us.

I looked forward to my first Khe Sanh Veterans Association Reunion in San Diego during September, 2000. In preparation, I had a baseball cap embroidered with a FAC badge and my radio call signs. The idea was to help anyone who might have something in common come up and talk. That way I wouldn't have to go around tapping everyone on the shoulder to introduce myself and explain how an AF FAC ended up at a mainly Marine and Army/Special Ops type Reunion. I was somewhat prepared, because I had traded some correspondence with Ray Stubbe about the Association and about combat operations in and around Khe Sanh. I had also read his book, "Valley of Decision," and recognized a number of operations in which I had taken part. So, the idea of maybe getting to talk to guys that were on the ground during the Siege while I was overhead was curious and exciting.

My first KSV Reunion:

After I had checked into the hotel in San Diego, I prepared for the cocktail hour around the pool in the courtyard. As I passed a profusion of guys with lots of red on hats and shirts bearing unit designations, it was a very comfortable feeling (for a guy who was virtually a total stranger to all). As I strode out by the pool, I hadn't gone more than 25 steps before I heard someone yell "Covey!" Geez! Did that feel good. I turned to be greeted by Jim Speer who had been on the USAF Combat Control Team there at KS. He was well acquainted with a number of FACs that we knew mutually, who had been in and out of KS early in the Siege. It was a neat way to start out the Reunion, as I noted with some satisfaction that my "hat trick" had worked. Jim had apparently been to previous reunions and quickly began to fill me in.

As the conversation moved between people, places and events, I mentioned that I had been at Lang Vei the morning it was overrun. Jim quickly pointed out a fellow a couple of tables away and said he was there during the battle. I thanked Jim and quickly moved over to stand next to this fellow who was seated at a table engaged in conversation with a couple others. There was a certain intensity, yet off-handedness about him. I must have moved in such a way that he got a hint I was waiting to talk with him. He briefly paused in his conversation and looked up at me. I asked if he had been at Lang Vei when it was overrun. He looked at me with both surprise and curiousity and said "Why, yes, I was." I explained that I was an AF Forward Air Controller who had been there that morning after the North Vietnamese had overrun the camp. As we ran through a quick battle chronology of that fateful morning of 7 February, 1968, he talked about how he had evaded during the battle, and showed up later in the PM after much of the process of evacuating survivors was about concluded. At that point, I blurted out: "Wait a minute, you aren't 'Spunky Hanson 28 Bravo,' are you?" He looked startled and said "Yes, I am." I paused, then said "We had assumed you were killed by the North Vietnamese!" It's hard to explain, but this turned into quite an emotional moment. Who knows how and where that wells up from? Let's go back to recount events long past.

My FAC perspective of the Battle for Lang Vei:

I had been in country and at Danang AB for a few months and by that time, was feeling pretty confident about myself as a Forward Air Controller. By that I mean I had not only survived getting shot at pretty regularl, but managed to live through some episodes of "the stupids" in which I was lucky not to have killed myself. Early in the tour, I sometimes even wondered if I wasn't as much a threat to friend as to foe. In any event, at this point, Captain Rushforth was more of a steely-eyed predator (in his own mind).

In January '68, along with other FACs, I was shifted from the "Tally Ho" mission above the DMZ to "Operation Niagra" over Khe Sanh and its approaches. As we became better acquainted with our new mission area, it was clear that something unusual was in the offing. Signs of enemy activity on the approaches from the North and West were particularly revealing.

On the night of 25 January, the Laotian community at Ban Houaysan (otherwise called "Elephant") was overrun (several miles West of Lang Vei, along Route 9.) Among the intelligence reported by us FACs was that there were tracked vehicle impressions all along Route 9, both east and west of "Elephant." In fact, it was later reported by a FAC that we had killed a tank during that battle. However, the tank quickly disappeared. After the battle, the Laotians and their Vietnamese (ARVN) Ranger liaison retreated to the Special Forces Camp at Lang Vei.

This account of happenings on 7 and 8 February 1968 is from my diary and reflects the facts as I knew them and my feelings at the moment.

> Well! Gerry Harrington and John Buckles had their work cut out for them last night. Lang Vei was being overrun by a large enemy force supported by at least 9 tanks. They said it was an unbelievable sight — walls of tracers, explosions, what looked like flame throwers, yelling on the radios and tanks rolling right over the tops of friendly bunkers. They had difficulty sorting out targets on the ground, but said they did have a B-57 drop some "funny bombs" (cluster bomblets and burning magnesium) on tanks breaching the Camp's southwestern perimeter. They thought the tanks were disabled by that strike?
> I got up about 0500. After a fairly inclusive Intelligence briefing on what little was known about the battle, I moved quickly for the flight line and finished the preflight. Aircraft # 396 was in good shape. It had a standard wing load — two pods of 2.75" white phosphorous rockets, a total of 14. The sense of urgency began to grow as I made the radio calls and taxied for takeoff at Danang. The weather was not that good. I'd have to climb on instruments to get on top and cruise to the Khe Sanh area, then figure out how to get under the clouds and over to Lang Vei. I took off at 0710. After about 40 anxious minutes enroute, I used heading time and distance to get down through the clouds west of Lang Vei. Cloud bases were ragged at about 1000 feet above the terrain. Following Route 9 back to the east, I approached the camp and checked in with "Covey 688," a FAC from Ubon, Thailand who was currently in charge of air operations over the battle area. I could see his O-2 ahead, between cloud layers (forming a sort of fishbowl), circling over patches of occasional trees and brush, which were intermittently visible. Columns of smoke drifted up through the low clouds that were virtually settled on the camp and the rolling terrain around it. It was about 0800 as I fell into trail formation with 688 to listen and try to figure out what was happening. I would be taking over shortly.

Our Special Ops personnel, call sign "Spunky Hanson," were holed up in their Tactical Operations Center (TOC). They were talking to 688 via FM radio. The NVA were swarming all over the TOC, throwing satchel charges, plus smoke and frag grenades down the ventilation shafts and any place they could find access. Spunky Hanson 15A and some CIDG, who had stormed the Camp to rescue the troops, were pinned down by machine gun fire. 688 told them to withdraw so he could bring in some A-1 Skyraiders (Canasta Flight) with lots of guns and ordnance to get the NVA off the TOC. He had the A-1s hold while he dove his O-2 through a "sucker hole" to see if the A-1s could work under these conditions. The terrain was actually in and out of the clouds, an extremely treacherous operation to attempt. I virtually held my breath waiting for him to pop up through the clouds, all the while fearing a flash and column of black smoke would appear instead.

After what seemed like forever, his O-2 popped up through the clouds and he began to talk with the A-1s. It was very risky. They would be in and out of the clouds and in the tree-tops. All four Canasta pilots agreed to give it a try. They formed a "daisy chain" behind 688 and one after the other, dove through the hole in the clouds to see if 688 could lead them close enough to engage the NVA on the TOC. After a short time 688 came back up through the cloud deck. Now we had four A-1s in a tree-top free-for-all, ripping up the landscape, mainly with their guns, strafing the TOC and area around it. I again held my breath, while from an altitude of about 800 feet, except for the drone of my engines, things seemed ghostly quiet. Time was suspended. Again, the tell-tale smoke of an air ground disaster was almost an expectation. When the A-1s came back above the clouds, time started again.

Spunky Hanson said they were apparently successful, as the enemy activity on the TOC had ceased, at least temporarily. I was greatly relieved that the Canasta flight got the job done and were all still flying. It was an amazing feat of airmanship. The A-1 guys were all balls. It was not hard to envision those four A-1s ripping through the treetops, in and out of the cloud bases, high-G turns at treetop level, firing away at the TOC and somehow not hitting each other.

By this time, the inside of my cockpit windows was getting pretty well covered with my grease pencil notes about what was going on and who all the players were. That was a pretty standard practice for FACs, trying to keep track of what is happening on the ground while managing all aspects of the air support.

The clouds were beginning to break up, revealing much of the camp. The TOC had a tank on its side adjacent to it, and the trail/road coming up from the river down by Route 9 (at the Laos border) had two tanks knocked out at about the camp perimeter. I took pictures of the camp and the tanks with my Intel Nikon Telephoto. At about this point, 688 had an engine acting up and had to depart for home. I took over the air operation. The A-1s, bless 'em, were still able to loiter and had napalm and 250/500 lb. bombs remaining.

Meanwhile, we had been trying to coordinate a rescue effort from Khe Sanh. First word was that a ground team would not be sent, because the NVA had certainly set up ambushes at advantageous points along the way. It was also stated that a Helo-Assault Evacuation would not be attempted for awhile due to weather conditions. As disappointing as this was to us, it made our course of action clear. We had to conduct a holding action to keep the NVA away from the TOC until help arrived. Perhaps Spunky Hanson 15A and the local troops could fight their way in?

It wasn't long before Spunky Hanson (SH) came up on "Fox Mike" (FM) again, relating that the NVA were back. "They're all over us out there. Give 'em everything you've got," SH said. At this point, he seemed calm and almost resigned to his fate. Initially, the fighters were pressing so hard to be effective that after release, the bombs didn't even have time to arm and hit the ground as duds. In one case, that may have saved us an A-1. I aligned myself, coming right "down the chute" behind him on his bomb run. His bomb release was very close to the ground, a dud, which kicked up the dirt. The dirt then briefly swirled behind as the A-1 flew through the dirt plume. If it had gone off, it might have nailed him. The A-1 pilots quickly adjusted and managed to keep the NVA occupied with their remaining ordinance.

I asked SH if they could come out and make a run for it. "We've got badly wounded people down here that can't move, some may even be dead. We're not coming out until you come and get us." We periodically continued our calls for reinforcements and hoped for a helo evacuation task force. It wasn't happening and we were hearing words like it wasn't going to happen for awhile. I couldn't understand what the problem was? It was frustrating!

Meanwhile, Spunky Hanson 15A was having a hell of a time getting the CIDG and Elephant people to move against that machine gun and mortar fire. SH15A, a Sgt. Ashley, went back to get a 37MM Recoiless Rifle to bring fires upon the NVA positions. He subsequently knocked out at least two of the NVA gun positions with the weapon. Even then, he and the Bru/Elephant troops were again driven back. At about this time, I noted a green smoke on the northeast perimeter of the camp. Even from 500 ft., I couldn't determine its origin. Was it a friendly trying to let me know he was there? Was it the NVA trying to spoof me so I wouldn't bomb him/them? I never did figure that one out, but elected not to bomb that area unless I determined it to be the enemy, or absolutely had to.

Hobo 01 and 02 then arrived to replace the Canasta Flight. I had them work on the west side of the compound, around the TOC with CBU (cluster bombs), napalm and strafe. They did a terrific job, but the NVA still had some left.

At this point, my own front engine overheated, coughing and sputtering from being run at full throttle for hours. That really caught me in the gut. I could just see a forced landing among the NVA down there, after beating them up all morning. Not good!

Major John Seats, another Covey FAC took over for me and continued the holding action, while waiting for the reinforcements we assumed would be coming sometime soon. The engine continued to shudder and sputter, but held together well enough to climb out of the area en-route to Danang.

The landing was uneventful, and I proceeded directly to the Intelligence debriefing room where I was told to call directly to Headquarters 7th Air Force in Saigon. A Colonel answered the phone and began the debriefing. When I mentioned tanks, he fired off and as much as called Captain Rushforth a liar or maybe just mistaken? After all we had been reporting that day and for weeks prior, I thought it incredible that he was questioning me like this. He was so adamant I became adversarial in tone, if not in words, and described the vehicles as "ya know, they have tracks on both sides, this thing that looked just like a turret on top, with a big long thing sticking out of it (like maybe a big gun)!?" Not only that, I was only 500 feet above them. To my amazement, he still wasn't buying it? I played my Ace of Spades — "I have pictures!"

"Pictures," he shouted! "You get them right over to the photo lab and we'll divert a plane to pick them up immediately!" I did, and he did, like within the hour. I'm sure the pictures were great on the briefing circuit (they came out well), but we never heard about them again.

Note: So far, the most comprehensive account I have read, of what happened on the ground during this battle is "The Night of the Silver Stars," by William R. Phillips, published in 1997 as part of the Naval Institute Special Warfare Series. It was indeed a night of heroism and gallantry. Among decorations the defenders received: a Medal of Honor, a Distinguished Service Cross, 19 Silver Stars and 3 Bronze Stars with "V" for valor as well as numerous other awards and decorations.

8 February, 1968: Hill 64, Alpha 1 Firefight and day after Lang Vei:

These are the thoughts and experiences recorded on 8 February, the day after the Lang Vei Battle. Back in my quarters at 2200, after a full day at Khe Sanh, then debriefings and planning.

0550: It was hard getting up. The bed (eat your heart out, guys) really felt good. Got mission briefing for the KS area and things had apparently gotten quiet. The expectation was that the NVA were repositioning for another direct assault in strength on Khe Sanh. The weather at Danang, enroute and on the Khe Sanh plateau was poor. At Personal Equipment, Scottie was in rough shape, really bleary-eyed. He'd been up for about 24 hours. I had some maintenance problems but pressed on. Aircraft #331 was really in pretty good shape. (Note: this is the O-2 currently on display at the USAF Air Museum at Wright Patterson AFB.)

0645: Take off and climb en-route was all weather until on top at 10,000 feet. Using the same procedure as yesterday, I went out into the flatlands in Laos so I could let down through the clouds without hitting anything. I broke out of the clouds at about 1000 feet above the terrain, found Route 9, and followed it back toward Lang Vei. Joe Johnson, Covey 251, was in the area ahead of me and we began to coordinate areas to Recce so we wouldn't be hitting each other in the low clouds.

Lang Vei appeared to be abandoned. There were several hundred refugees on Route 9 between Khe Sanh City and Lang Vei, headed west? Guess they know where the action will be. The Marines didn't know who they were and were seriously thinking of putting artillery on them. I had to make sure — low pass on the tree tops — oops! Damn trees all around me, zipping by the wings. The tops were defoliated and I hadn't seen them — very tall. The refugees were mainly women and children carrying belongings, etc., old men, some younger. That sure tore at me. Those poor people just don't know where to go — getting it from both sides, one way or another. So, so sad! I felt as though I could actually see it on their faces.

Garden Valley 14 Actual at Khe Sanh called — need air to hit mortar and rocket positions just WSW, off the runway, on the ridgeline. Joe Johnson, Covey 251, went out to the west along Route 9 at about the border to escort some fighters into the area through the cloud layers. We got Canasta 403, a flight of 4 A-1Hs (Navy). They were loaded with bombs (250lb & 500lb) and 20MM strafe. After pre-briefing the fighters and discussing tactics, I marked the ridgeline targets with one of my 2.75" "Willie Pete" (white phosphorous) rockets and cleared them in "hot." We quickly got two secondary explosions indicating that the bombs had indeed found worthy targets. However, at this point, Garden Valley 14 Actual asked us to hold off on the air-strike, and to my amazement, briefed me on a firefight on a nearby hill last night.

Hill 64: Garden Valley 14 Actual described the hill and events as they knew them. The hill wasn't apparent on my map, but there was no doubt that there was still a firefight of some sort going on just to my south. The NVA assaulted the hill in force during the night (mortars, rockets and ground assault) and there was ferocious hand-to-hand combat as the night wore on. The main base supported the Marines in the hilltop defensive positions with direct fire on the east face of the hill (toward the main base), from heavy weapons. However, the NVA simply moved to the back side of the hill to continue the assault.

Garden Valley 14 Actual had not talked to the defenders for some time. Apparently their radios were destroyed or lost in the battle. GV14A said " We don't know what is going on up there. We don't know if our guys are still defending in the trenches, or whether they were driven out of the trenches and are trying to get back in?" My immediate reaction was "How come you didn't tell me this sooner? Here we were dropping bombs on a ridgeline when we had nearby troops in contact?" Couldn't dwell on that. Had to get busy.

I decided that the only way to sort out who was where, was to make a low pass and look in the trenches. From about 1500 feet, I could see explosions and tracers on the hill, but not much more. I planned to get that little sucker going as fast as I could in a dive from the base side of the Hill where there were fewer NVA. I dove at full power on the eastern base of the hill, then snapped it up over the defensive trench lines in about 90 degrees of bank at about 150-200 feet. As I flashed over the trenches at about 230 knots I saw troops in hand to hand combat, grenades going off in the trenches, and about a grand total of 60 troops. The NVA were caught off guard by the pass but hosed me down real good anyway. As I dove down the opposite side of the hill I thought, "How do I get back to altitude with this little thing without giving the bad guys a great tail shot at me hanging on a sky hook?" I flew away for a while, dodging trees, then began my climb while I tried to digest what I had seen.

The predominance of the guys in the trenches were wearing flak vests, and a number had on US style helmets. "That's it!" The good guys are still duking it out in the trenches with the bad guys. I notified GV14A of my conclusions and told them we were going to start putting the fighters on the exterior of the hill and its north and west approaches. I briefed the A-1s on the situation and what we were going to do about it. I had them come in from the north to strafe the bases of the hill and work the strafe up the hill toward the trenchlines. These guys really got down in the weeds for this one, so they could see the whites of their eyes. The A-1s looked beautiful, terrific, skimming through the treetops, blazing away. Sure wish I had one of them. Next it was the bombs in the trees and brush along the western base of the hill. Seemed like this suppressed the NVA for awhile, but they were soon up and at it again. I know we got a mess of 'em, but they were still ready to join the fight.

We had put in an emergency request for prop aircraft that could operate in these mountains, ridges, valleys in this weather. The A-1s were always preferred, because they could carry so much ordnance and loiter for 4 hours or so (depending upon how far they had to travel). Joe Johnson again went west to rendezvous and escorted them back to the battle area. However, we were getting short on fuel.

Bruce Goodhue, Covey 226, arrived and took over air support for the Hill. He had some A-26s en-route (twin-engine, WWII-, Korea-vintage.) They are also great for close air support, working close in bad weather, and being able to hang around for awhile.

As Joe Johnson and I were preparing to leave, we spotted some troops in the open on the back side of the hill headed for the adjacent ridge to the west. With great satisfaction we both unloaded twenty-seven 2.75" white phosphorous rockets on them. We were on target but had to RTB (Return to Base) due to lack of fuel, and did not get a good assessment of the situation after our attack.

En-route Danang: I get a crazy feeling flying around watching those poor guys in the trenches getting blown up. How would I feel if I was down there? Hard to think about. Got a touch of that invincibility complex again too — I was awful low and they were shooting like hell. I'd have given anything for a mini-gun. I was about fired up enough to strafe with my M-16 out the cockpit window. Maybe we should have gone to Dong Ha for a load of HE rockets from the Army guys? Hell! For awhile there, we were about the only ones that could fly in that weather (500' to 1000' overcast, scattered to broken scud from 500' to 1700'.)

Had trouble letting down into Danang for landing. Their radar was overloaded, so I had "Panama" GCI Radar vector me down over the South China Sea. Broke out of the clouds at about 500' above the water. Hmmm! An aircraft carrier right over there! If I had come through the clouds a little further to the left, I might have made a real mess. Really had to piss bad — right there on the ramp.

Called the Tac Air Control Center to debrief, got something to eat and went back to Intel for a detailed debrief for the rest of the troops. My pictures of the tanks at Lang Vei yesterday came out very well and are a great hit on the briefing circuit. Blah!

Yesterday, Spunky Hanson 15A, a Sgt. Ashley, was killed on the 5th assault to rescue the troops in the TOC at Lang Vei. There were more than 9 guys rescued, not sure exactly. Tony Sazanovich was the FAC in charge for the chopper evac yesterday afternoon. He did a hell of a job. They got the crap shot out of them but got all but one of the troops out. Also got some CIDG and Elephant people out too, though I understand it was ugly. Initially the helos couldn't take off because they were overweight with people hanging on the skids. Had to knock (shoot?) some off or lose the whole mission and get everyone killed.

During all this, Tony Sazanovich was contacted by a Special Ops troop who had apparently been evading after the Camp was overrun. His call sign was "Spunky Hanson 28 Bravo." SH28B came out of the trees at the old Lang Vei Camp to where Tony could see him. The Helo Evac force was already fully (over) loaded and pulling out to head for Khe Sanh. It became apparent that the Helos were out of the picture and Tony was preparing to land on the torn up, bombed out, airstrip at the old Camp. However, a large number of NVA arrived first and chased SH28B back into the trees and brush. Tony related that it looked like a lot of shooting during the chase. Last transmission from SH28B was "They're coming up from the other side of the strip." No way SH28B will come out of that alive. If Tony had tried to land for SH28B, it would have been nothing short of a miracle if they made it off the ground. The front prop had only 10" clearance and the ground was too irregular. It would have caught in the dirt and debris.

Meanwhile, today on the hill west of Khe Sanh, Bruce Goodhue worked some more A-1s (Canasta flight), A-26s (Nimrods) and T-28s (Zorro) on the NVA around the hill. They did a great job. When it was over, the good guys were able to get up, clear the outpost, and walk off the hill. After discussions with the relief force from the main base, they went up and reoccupied the hill. After the battle, first glance showed about 50 NVA bodies, plus plenty of captured weapons. [Understand that later, a total of 150 NVA bodies were found, along with a number of machine guns, etc.]

Fingerpaint 50 (Marine FAC) did trap 2 tanks in the river southwest of Lang Vei, and Covey 672 had some "tracked vehicles" pinned down near "Elephant." Hope this weather breaks soon. If it does, we could really clean their clock.

POSTLOG: At the KSV Reunion in San Diego, September, 2000

So here I am, with a lump in my throat and a tear in my eye, shaking hands with Spunky Hanson 28 Bravo — after all these years. His name is Dennis Thompson. I have since found out that he was captured and escaped several times during the next few days. He was a rather belligerent cuss and not amenable to being a prisoner. For this, he got lots of broken bones and worse. After a nightmarish 6 month trek to Hanoi, he was incarcerated with the other POWs, until the end of the war.

Dennis is a retired Command Sergeant Major of the Special Operations Command and, wouldn't ya' know, he was the featured speaker at our KSV Reunion Banquet. We've gotten a lot better acquainted since then. Dennis has a line on all the survivors of the Lang Vei Battle and some of us who supported in one way or another. We plan to meet this September in Las Vegas.

On the other hand, we have been trying very hard to find Tony Sazanovich, the FAC who was flying over Dennis when he was captured. No luck yet. We'd also like to find that "Covey 688," from Ubon, who was there at Lang Vei that morning.

So why do I like Reunions? Gee, hard to figger out! This is only one story.

Note: For those that haven't read it, the best account I've found of the Battle for Hill 64, on 8 February 1968, is in Chapter 16 of Eric Hammel's book, "KHE SANH, Siege in the Clouds." It was only during the reading of this book that I began to realize that the 8 February, 1968 entry in my diary was about "Alpha-1" in this Battle.

A Memorial Day Gift

by Ernie Spencer

I don't feel filled with pride during holidays that honor us. The blues and nostalgia rule such days, for me. The still, hot of the previous day gave way to pleasant morning, brushed by a pleasant Delta breeze that playfully swirled about me as I went for a walk. For some reason, I impulsively walked crosstown instead of my usual downtown route. I love living in mid-town Sacramento. It is quiet, with wide, tree-lined streets and old Victorian homes. A few were out puttering about their yards or walking from their cars to their homes. I became engrossed in my own dreams of times past. It was as I circled back that I saw him, standing across the street. He kept glancing at a paper, leaning on a cane, and gripped a bag of things in a white plastic bag with his other.

I crossed the street and as I began to pass him, he stopped me with a confused glance my way. "Excuse me sir," he said. "I'm lost." His old, Philippine eyes were cloudy and confused.

"Where are you going?" I asked?

"I live in Saint Francis Manor. I can't find it." I know the church named for the saint and had sometimes worshiped there. We were within two blocks of the church. I took the bag from his hand and guided him back across the street in the direction of the church.

"How long have you been here?" I inquired.

During the course of our short, yet painful walk for him, he told me about himself. He had served with the American Army during WWII and later during the Korean War. He was given permission to immigrate to the US because of such service and had recently been taken to Washington D.C. to testify for pension benefits for Philippine vets who had served with our country.

"Do you have a U.S. pension?" I asked.

"No. I live on charity from the Catholic Church." I found the manor he lived at and escorted him inside. As I handed him his small bag, he extended his to shake my hand. "Thank you sir for your kindness," he said with a sincerity that brought tears to my eyes.

"It is my pleasure, sir," I said. "I, too, am a veteran." As I finished my short walk back to my apartment, I reflected on how far I have come, on my own journey. Before, I would have been filled with rage at how veterans are still being mistreated, discarded, and, ignored. Our nation seems to value only current acts of perceived heroism and quickly discards the past. But now, I strive to let my anger go. I was meant to be on that walk and going in the direction I took. I saw the moment as a gift meant for me to have the chance to reach out to someone in need. To help a brother veteran filled me with a calm and peaceful contentment I had not been feeling earlier.

The Valley of Blue Light

by Gary Foster

May 14, 2003

The week in Quang Tri Province promised to be beautiful. Such a welcome change from my previous visit. The farther I drove south from Vinh and the closer I got to Dong Ha, the more excited I became. As usual the weather in Vinh was lousy and due to the high humidity there, I felt wet all the time. But now, as I drove south on National Highway No.1, the air roared through the car as I rolled down the windows to feel the much drier sunshine-filled air. My spirits began to soar as the sun rose higher, lingering at its apex before starting its slow descent back to the horizon, all the while causing shadows to lengthen, shorten, and lengthen again. I drove across the Ben Hai River, stopping briefly to reflect on the significance of an American driving across the DMZ unescorted. I had arrived in Quang Tri Province, Leatherneck Square, and the geographical top of Eye Corps. I was in the meat grinder.

Not much longer, at around two in the afternoon, I arrived in Dong Ha. The date was March 19, 2003. This date is important only to me because it was one week short of three years when I arrived, for the first time, at close to midnight, in Quang Tri Province. Since that time, my company had been working on the design and construction tendering of Highway No. 9 from Dong Ha to Lao Bao, and a bypass that swung north of Dong Ha from Cam Lo to access the Cua Viet Port directly. The total project entailed some 98 kilometers of two-lane asphalt road and about 20 new bridges. Finally, construction on the highway had begun in February 2003, just a month before my arrival. I wanted to see the progress for myself on this historic (in some ways the most historic) highway in Vietnam — even arguably, throughout the world. But I also had other interests for being there. I wanted to try to locate any remnants of the USMC Bridge over the Rao Quan River. I had seen photos of Bridge Number 9 on the KS Veterans website and I wanted to see the actual site myself. I also had another mission: I wanted to try to climb Hills 861 and 558 and place a tiny USMC flag on the latter.

My previous trip to the hills was spoiled due to gloomy, rather doubtful weather and I was so pressed for time that I was precluded from making the necessary effort. Now, I had two days (today and tomorrow) to myself, so I was looking forward to this return. In addition to the two objectives, I would also continue to help Donna Elliot find information about her brother if I could, though I knew there was not much that I could do.

After a quick lunch of french fries and onions, I drove straight to the Rao Quan River where Highway 9 makes a sharp left turn into a horseshoe bend across the river and just below the Khe Sanh plateau. But along the way, I had to stop at Dau Mau and try to orient myself with a photo taken during the NVA attack on that South Vietnam military base in 1972. I identified ridgelines, but everything else had changed and I found no evidence of any occupation, NVA or otherwise. I drove on. I passed the cable-stayed bridge across the Quang Tri River that leads south along Highway No. 14 to the A Shau Valley. It was under construction three years ago but has been completed for over a year. I like the bridge but I must admit, it is out of proportion to the surrounding scenery and environment. The sign pointing the way to the "Vestige of Tacon Base" (Khe Sanh) is still there.

The weather continued to be delightful, but it was getting late. As I drove, I thought back to the many lengthy telephone conversations I had with Dennis Mannion weeks before regarding photos seen on the KS website. Dennis asked me many questions about the landmarks and where KS was in relation to the bridge and vice versa. The places in the photos I had seen were so familiar that I told Dennis I recognized them and had stood exactly where each shot was taken. Dennis sent me copies of his old military maps and after I received them, we had very lengthy, lively telephone conversations. His wife Joan and his family must think we are totally nuts. Dennis recounted so many stories and places. Because of that and some other photos I had sent to KS Vets taken on previous trips, I had stirred up some lengthy e-mails and telephone calls, mostly with Dennis. The photo that intrigued me the most, was that of the pontoon bridge over the Rao Quan River. I knew I could find the exact location of the bridge. I wanted to see if I could match the exact spot from where the photo had been taken showing the pontoon bridge placed next to old bridge piers. I decided I had to see the place for myself. Even if I had been there a number of times, my memory of the precise landmarks, was a little tarnished. I confused the Rao Quan and Quang Tri Rivers at their junction and farther downstream, thinking that the Quang Tri River was a continuation of the Rao Quan River. But I did not mistake the Rao Quan bridge crossing and I went directly there.

I stopped at several places along the Quang Tri River and along the short Rao Quan River. Finally I reached the bridge, labeled by kilometer (km56) in the Vietnamese system, and labeled number 9 in the USMC or Seabees designation. At any rate, a famous bridge and one that cannot be missed. I walked down the embankment on both sides. I could see the remains of an old road that was bulldozed down to the water from the main road. There was no evidence of anyone having been there at anytime, other than the road which had eroded over time. After considerable stomping around and looking, and searching, and adjusting positions, I finally located the exact spot from which the original photograph was taken and I took a photo in the same direction. Again, like at Dau Mau, except for the ridgelines and the old abandoned bridge piers built by the French, much had changed. I would send these photos to Dennis. I spotted a 12x12 piece of lumber that was badly deteriorated so I supposed this was part of a bunker at one time or another. Traffic was minimal as I walked back up to the main road, now paved. There were no sounds at this time of the evening, and there was no breeze. The sun shone brightly, so I had nothing to worry about for the next day.

I had only a little more than an hour of sunlight left, so I decided to drive hurriedly on to Khe Sanh Ville and then on to Lang Vei. I had heard that recent construction on Highway 9 had begun at Lang Vei, ironically. I knew I could not make it to the Khe Sanh Combat Base that evening before nightfall and would not try.

I drove through Khe Sanh Ville, not veering off the highway towards the base, but kept on towards Lang Vei. It does not take long to drive there. Sure enough as I topped a hill, I could see the Lang Vei Vietnamese tank monument and some construction equipment. The crews were simply scraping the ground, beginning their initial earthwork cuts, and clearing the vegetation for the alignment survey and cross sections. "Interesting," I mused to myself. I pulled off the road and stopped the car next to the tank monument and opened the door and climbed down on the ground. Then it hit me: I stopped dead in my tracks. Right there in front of me, the bulldozers had unearthed what had to be the rectangular concrete roofs of concrete bunkers from the Special Forces camp that was overwhelmed by attacking NVA on February 7, 1968. This date marked the first time tanks were used by the NVA in the war. The two concrete slabs were positioned at an angle to one another. So surprised, I thought, "This couldn't be the Special Forces bunkers." But sure enough, just in front of me, totally uncovered, there they were. Logic told me I was looking at history, literally being uncovered before my very eyes. I did not know whether I was seeing the roofs or the floors, but the concrete slabs scraped bare, were completely smooth and there were no wall stems or protruding reinforcing steel that would indicate a wall or a remnant of a wall. "Had to be the bunkers," I said audibly, and then looked around to see if anyone was in earshot. I didn't know how many bunkers there were, but I had heard a rumor that there were remains of an American MIA, James Leslie Moreland, possibly still inside one of the bunkers. I had no way of knowing and do not know now whether there were any American MIA remains there but ever since this visit, I have regretted that I myself could not take the time to explore the situation further. It still bothers me that I was not able to do so. The whole issue of MIAs in Vietnam is not a welcome topic among the Vietnamese, and one has to be careful.

three very large bomb craters behind the tank monument on the ridgeline facing Laos. I was to learn that the equipment operator had almost toppled his bulldozer into the largest one (25 feet in diameter and 10 feet deep).

I have always wondered how de-miners work and what equipment they use. Not far from the tank monument, emerging from behind a small hill, a Vietnamese man was waving a metal detector in front of him just a few inches above the ground. He made long sweeps from left to right and back again as he walked slowly forward. He was de-mining. I walked over to him and tried to take his picture but he was a little wary of this and kept turning away. Finally, I was able to take a shot of him as he worked. Then, he waved me over to the side of the hill and pointed at two mortar shells. I was to learn later these were 40mm and 60 mm shells. We also found a 105mm shell and lots of metal fragments. I told him I wanted a piece of shrapnel, and he took me to a place and waved his detector just above the ground and reached down and scooped up some dirt with his small crooked shovel and, bingo, up came a sizeable piece of shrapnel. He handed me the piece of rusting metal which I pocketed and decided I would bring home and give to Frank Willoughby, the Special Forces commander of Lang Vei during the siege in 1968 (I learned later that Mr. Willoughby passed away in 1998, so I sent the shrapnel to Ray Stubbe for his Khe Sanh archival collection). I returned to the tank monument and then back to the bomb craters. I began spotting mortar shells everywhere and I saw one in the bottom of the largest bomb crater. It had evidently rolled down there when the bulldozers cleared the area. I walked into the crater and much to my surprise, had a very difficult time climbing back out — another one of those life experiences out of the way with no need to repeat it.

The sun began to close with the horizon and I loaded back into the car but just before doing so, I noticed a large billboard sign dominated by the smiling face of an obviously optimistic Vietnamese woman placed by the Vietnam National Administration of Tourism across the road from the tank monument. The sign read half in Vietnamese and half in English, the English version stating, "Vietnam — A Destination for the New Millennium." Yes, right here in Quang Tri Province, central Vietnam, next to Laos, adjacent to the Ho Chi Minh Trail, down the road from Khe Sanh; yes sir, right here on top of a ridgeline at Lang Vei. I stopped and pondered the irony of such a sign.

I drove back to Khe Sanh Ville as it was getting late — in fact, now already dark. I decided to return straight to Dong Ha. The weather remained balmy, so surely the weather would be as pleasant the next day as it had been today. I enjoy the drive on Highway 9. There is hardly any traffic to speak of and the scenic vistas are wonderful to behold. I cruised along; not slowly, but not at a fast pace either. It was a very pleasant drive. Along the banks of the Quang Tri River as I approached a small Bru village, I noticed a vague blue-azure tint along the roadway. I did not pay much attention to it and basically forgot about it. I would be reminded of it the next day. I drove on. Back past Dau Mau and the Rockpile, through Da Krong, past the turn off to Camp Carroll (still have not found the fire base), and through Cam Lo, finally arriving in Dong Ha. The day was over and I looked forward to the next day when I would visit the combat base again and try to climb Hill 558 and maybe some of 861. But the weather was not to be.

To back up: through e-mail correspondence, I had made promises to two US Marine KS Vets: John Pessoni and Jacob Krygowski. Now I reminded myself that the next day I had to carry out the promises. These were not big acts of skill or sacrifice or courage or bravery or deeds that would place me in harm's way. The promises were more symbolic than physical so they should present no problem for me. For John or "Big John" I promised to bring back to the USA some red clay from the base. Before I left the states, I made sure to include in my luggage some plastic zipper locking sandwich baggies with which to collect the red dirt. For Jacob, I promised to place on top of hill 558 a small USMC flag that he had sent to me. That evening in Dong Ha, I collected the plastic bags and located Jacob's letter containing the rolled up miniature flag.

There isn't much for one to do in Dong Ha, but there was one nice bar about 200 feet up the street from the hotel. The beer was so cold, I consumed it in 5 seconds flat, or so it seemed, and ordered another one. But the second beer was as warm as the first beer was cold. What a disappointment. But that is how things work in Vietnam. The bartender replaced the cold beer with a warm beer in the fridge, and then when he received an order for another beer, merely grabbed the one he had just put in the fridge. Beer is beer, right! But the third beer was cold again. Two out of three. Not bad.

My hopes of good weather were dashed as soon as I woke up the next day. The morning dawned gray. So dark was it, that I became depressed thinking that it would ruin my day and interfere with my planned trip back to the Khe Sanh Plateau. I had only one free day remaining. For the second trip in a row to KSCB, the day would probably be murky and wet, the base muddy. Disappointed, I consoled myself with the thought that, "Well maybe up on the Khe Sanh plateau it would be clearer...maybe..."

After the usual four cups of very bitter coffee, brewed Vietnamese style — using a small aluminum percolator, really more of a strainer, placed over the mouth of the glass — at a small café outside the Dong Ha Guest House, sitting on a piece of concrete sidewalk listening to the truck traffic, and watching the kids walk to school with their backpacks slung over their backs, I drank my coffee and shuddered somewhat against the cool early morning wind. Why it seemed so cold to me was a mystery, Anyway, it did. Must have been the dampness.

In the courtyard of the Dong Ha Guest House, I met an American woman named Sandy Northrop. She is an independent filmmaker and was filming a documentary about Vietnam people under thirty years of age and their lives after a war they don't remember. I was to meet Sandy later the next morning and we exchanged many stories about Vietnam and Africa. She made a documentary film about Pete Peterson, who was shot down over North Vietnam, became a POW for a number of years, and later served as the American Ambassador to the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, eventually marrying a Vietnamese woman from Hanoi.

I left Dong Ha for Khe Sanh at around 8AM and soon passed the familiar sounding place names again: Cam Lo, Da Krong, etc. I had been that way and on that road now, so many times within the last three years, yet I never tire of reciting the place names out loud when I see them. I especially visualize them as they appear on the red and white concrete road markers: Khe Sanh – 56 kilometers, Lao Bao – 83 kilometers, Da Krong – 20 kilometers, Cam Lo – 12 kilometers, Lang Vei – 35 kilometers, and so on. I remain attentive to the landmarks and constantly remind myself of the grim history that ensued here 35 years ago. In a very real sense, I have convinced myself that all of Quang Tri Province is hallowed ground, just as much and to the same extent as is Gettysburg. To the Vietnamese, it's haunted — and I'm not so sure it's not, as I was to sense and feel later.

To my increasing chagrin, the weather seemed to be deteriorating the farther west I drove. "The Rockpile should be about here, right?" But where was it? Very low clouds and dense fog just above the roadway convinced me to turn the headlights on. Now to the Quang Tri River where the water was low in its banks. Cloudy. Not looking good. Turning to the right to diverge from the Quang Tri River and merge with the Rao Quan River, still no visibility. Over the Rao Quan Bridge where I had visited the day before, I started uphill towards the plateau. Ears feeling the pressure change just like the first trip three years ago. The weather now — well, quite literally, to use a pilot's vernacular — was finally quite "on its ass." "Dammit!" Reach the plateau, passed the new customs station and into Khe Sanh Ville. Clouds began sprinkling rain. Turn right on the road to the base, make my way to the entrance, and see a sign pointing the way. Site appears abandoned. No one in sight. I park in front of the new museum: an A-frame structure, its concrete floor elevated about 10 feet above the ground. It appears still unused. Strange. Then, I see a person emerge from the door of the old museum located adjacent to the new, elevated museum. I pay my 25,000 dong and talk to the curator. His English is quite good.

I go into the museum room. It has not changed one inch in three years. All the junk is still there. I pick up the same M16 that Paul Knight picked up a few years ago. I am alone and I find the guest registry and thumb through it. And this time I leave a message for Donna Elliot, who would return to Khe Sanh at the end of April in search of her brother Jerry, MIA as a result of a downed helicopter near

Khe Sanh since January 68. "Donna: Welcome to Khe Sanh," I wrote and signed my name. (The recent SARS epidemic got in the way of Donna's plans, and Donna postponed her April trip with Danny Williams until later.)

The man inside the museum accompanies me to unlock and open the gate to allow me to enter the area of the base that has been fenced off behind the old and new museum buildings. The fence was not here three years ago. The new museum will open in June at some Vietnamese ceremony commemorating their imagined victory, I suppose. The man follows me some distance but I quickly elude him only to be met by the omnipresent souvenir hawkers — "Ah, no dog tags this time, buddy" — ever reminded of the chiding I received from Dennis Mannion over my having bought, what were probably phony dog tags there three years earlier. "Yo Bro. Not this time, Dennis."

I indicate with an abrupt gesticulation that I am not interested and the souvenir man walks back to the museum. Now I am really alone. Where to go? And what's with this weather anyway? Wind, clouds, fog, and thunder in the valley below the base. The hills. Where are the hills? In the clouds. Cannot see them, any of them — 950, 1015, 861 and 861Alpha, 881N and 881S, 558, all concealed, or perhaps they disappeared.

Resigned now to the fact that my chances of standing on top of 558 are ruined, I reflected on my previous visit there. I could not make it to the top of 558 but on the road to and from the hill (same road to 861), I encountered about thirty ex-Vietnamese soldiers, NVA to be sure. They were dressed in their best uniforms complete with medals. They were having a reunion. I stopped and I talked with many of them. They could not speak English but Hoang helped me. At first he was hesitant to stop. He told me he did not know how they would react to me — I never hesitate to say I am an American, and Hoang knows that. I said, "Stop the car." After only ten minutes, we were drinking tea and beer and each man shook my hand many times and showed me where he fought. They were all old men now, scrawny and looking hungry. I posted a photo of them on the KS website and an ex-Marine said in an e-mail "The only thing holding up their uniforms is their pride." A fitting comment.

I decide to explore the base, but it was going to rain. Unlike my first trip there, I now know exactly where I am. I decide to find the waterpoint in the valley between the base and the Rao Quan River. Easy. I crossed the USMC runway — the real runway, not the red clay, or what I termed the imposter runway. The path descending to the waterpoint is still there and I begin the muddy, slippery descent. I encounter a man with a machete and, for some reason, with a sudden cutting swipe of his arm, buries the machete in the side of a tree. He smiles and indicates he will join me. It does not take long to walk to the waterpoint down the steep incline where steps have been carved in the dirt, now mud, to make walking a little easier. Once there, its simple scenic beauty struck me. The miniature, enclosed area is pastoral, serene, and very green — a world of its own. Across the stream, widened in places to grow rice, a small boy stood holding a long pole. He was herding his cows (only a few) into the stream. They stood peacefully and drank from the stream unconcerned that I was there. The young boy crossed the stream and stood motionless in the opening where I am sure the Marines had placed pump equipment many years earlier.

I could see up and down the small valley for a short distance. I could also see the clouds were descending even more. It was time to make my way back up the hill to the base. The man who had buried his machete in the tree trunk followed me chattering about something. He retrieved his machete and, with a wave of his free hand, went his own way towards the west, towards the helicopter revetments. Alone again. Wind starting to kick up, clouds racing over the base. The eucalyptus trees begin to sway, their leaves rustling. It's going to rain now for sure, I thought. No raincoat. I would get soaked. Time to get Big John some red clay dirt.

I crossed back over the USMC runway and walked back towards the red clay runway (parallel to the USMC runway) and then turned east and walked towards the ammunition dump. I found remnants of trenches and, I supposed, small bunkers with shreds of sand bag material all around. I noticed that where I was now standing, the ground remained dry, unlike elsewhere on the base. If I was going to get some dirt for John, I preferred it to be dry. I knelt down and scooped red dirt into the self-locking baggie that I had not forgotten to bring with me, and tried to put it in my pocket. It wouldn't fit so I carried it in my hand. Now my hands were stained dirty red and, as I was to find out later, it seemed I could not get the stain out for a couple of days. But now at the west end of the base, the heavens had opened up and I could see sheets of rain sluicing earthward at a wind-induced slant. I was dry but would I stay that way? Well, I still had some things to do, so to hell with it.

I retraced my steps and walked back to the USMC runway. I wanted to find the ammo dump from the perspective of that runway, not from the perspective I had originally found it three years earlier — from the red clay runway. Walking back towards the perpendicular path to the waterpoint, at the junction of the runway and the path, I passed two huts that had been built side by side. A dog started to run after me and was barking. I lived in Africa for 7 years and have been in the company of more than a few lions. One thing I learned: never run from a lion. If near a resting lion and for some crazy reason you want to get closer to him, turn your back on him and you can walk backwards towards the lion to almost within touching range; just don't turn around. If you do, you're dead. But if at a distance and you are being stalked or eyed, never run. It just entices and emboldens the animal, and he will get you. Never run from a dog either. It encourages them more. I stopped cold and just looked at the animal and, as I thought would happen, it stopped in its tracks and merely continued to bark at me. No big deal.

I walked again along the path to the waterpoint and then turned right onto the USMC runway heading east. I was the only person on the base. There was no trace of anyone near me. Not quite true, of course. Another herd of cows was sauntering along the runway towards me and an older man, unlike the small boy at the waterpoint. I let them pass and they continued on. I myself continued on towards the ammo dump along the tarmac. I spotted what appeared to be the tread marks probably of a tank. The parallel lines of the tank tread indented into the cemented crushed stone reminded me of the ruts left by chariots in the stone streets of Pompei. Those are clearly visible after thousands of years. So here, too, is visible evidence of military occupation of the site at some point in the past. I walked on to find the ammo dump.

And there it was, off my right shoulder. A deep depression in the ground, unchanged from when I was there before: the remains of the ammunition dump that was struck by NVA artillery during the Siege in 1968. 105 and 155 shells everywhere. There were more shells lying on the ground than what I had remembered from before, but there they were, still scattered all over the place. I walked down into the depression and walked around gingerly. A little scary here. I was reminded of Lang Vei the day before: one never knows what is under foot in the meat grinder. I stayed for about 15 minutes and then climbed out of the depression the same way in which I had entered it. I stood on the edge of the crater and noticed that the wind had stopped, the rain farther west having also ceased. The base was silent, absolutely silent. Not a sound. Quiet as a tomb. I looked west along the runway and I saw a solid layer of clouds not more than 8 feet above the runway deck. The delineation of the clouds parallel to the earth was so remarkably clear, and without any other landmarks visible, I was transfixed. I was in a strange place filled with such ominous foreboding that it created an aura of suspense, a feeling of unknowing, subterfuge, the calm before the storm, a land filled with deep mystery and mystique — the heart of darkness. I raised my arm and could put my hand into the thick dark cloud just above my head.

I stood gazing westward at the upside down horizon along the entire length of the runway as far as I could see, which could not have been more than 500 feet or so due to the height of the trees, the tops of which were enveloped in the horizontal grayness. The base remained quiet, eerily so, and I continued to stand motionless, turning my head to see if there was a whisper of a breeze. Nothing. Then I turned around and faced the east end of the runway and was startled to see a young girl not more than 20 feet from me wearing a purple jacket and a hat. She was staring right at me. She neither smiled nor did she move. She didn't seem afraid but she didn't seem overly curious either. I waved at her and said "Tsien Chao," meaning hello, but she did not respond. Her skin was dark like most Vietnamese and the hair escaping from beneath her hat was unruly. But her expressionless eyes were penetrating. We stood staring at each other for about 20 seconds. I knelt and placed the bag of dirt on the ground and adjusted my camera and took a couple of photos of her. She did not flinch or react. I stood up and then she raised her right arm and pointed in the direction of hills 950 and 1015. I turned around to see what she may be pointing at and when I turned back to look at her, she had disappeared like a phantom, I supposed into the coffee plants. At that precise moment, the leaves in the trees in the area in which I was standing began to stir as the wind once again picked up. Interestingly, I did not feel the wind, but I saw it move the leaves on the trees. The clouds began to move again, perpendicular to the runway. Now, without question, it was going to rain at this end of the base. It was going to pour buckets.

I headed back to the cover of the museum, a long walk or run in the face of imminent downpours. I made it to the new museum and walked under the elevated floor slab out of the rain that was beginning to stream, in big droplets, from the clouds. I was safe from the deluge.

The man in the old museum, braving the intense rain, came out and walked towards me and asked me "You American?" I said, "Yes." He said to me. "America now bombing Iraq." Not surprised by the timing of events — everyone had known for months that time for Saddam Hussein was coming to an end — but taken by the irony of where I was in relationship to world events, I looked away and said back to him, "So, it starts again."

After awhile the rain stopped. I had one mission left before I returned to Dong Ha. I could not see hill 558 but I could not return without placing Jacob's tiny USMC flag somewhere on the base. But this turned out to be tricky. From the museum, I walked to a secluded place, or rather what I assumed to be a secluded place. I bent down and unfurled the flag and stuck it in the red clay, and then I stood back to take a picture of it for Jacob at which time a Vietnamese man, who I had not seen before, approached me from behind talking loudly. I knew instantly what he was talking about. I gestured that all was OK. And he said "No! No! No!" So I tried to indicate I just wanted to take a picture. He yelled at me some more. So I said, "Ah, OK," retrieved the flag, and acted as if I understood. Satisfied, he returned to the empty museum. Undaunted, I walked about a hundred yards away towards the east behind some trees, well out of sight, and placed the flag in the red muddy Khe Sanh soil again and this time succeeded to take several pictures of it. But then, the decision: do I leave it there, knowing it's not been placed on 558 as Jacob had requested, or do I bring it back with me to the USA? I decided that if I left it there, someone would find it and simply take it, so what's the point? Decision made, I pulled the flag out of the ground, — the bottom of the slim wood flagpole now stained red — rolled it back up and put it in my pocket. I would bring it home and mail it back to Jacob. As Jacob later wrote to me in an e-mail after he had received the flag: "To Khe Sanh and back. Thank you, Gary." Precisely. And thank you, Jacob.

Believe it or not, I had been on the base all day, and now evening was approaching. I climbed in the car, and drove out of the base onto Highway 14 and turned left towards Khe Sanh Ville. At the intersection I stopped at a small café to have a beer and entered a small room. The families living there were all watching TV. So I saw with my own eyes right there in Khe Sanh Ville, on a CNN or, perhaps, BBC feed to Vietnam national television, bombs exploding in Baghdad. The TV showed B52s leaving an English airbase and I thought to myself, "The Vietnamese are no strangers to these things." Darkness was falling fast now and the area was foggy and still rainy. I paid for my refreshment and got back into the car and started back towards Dong Ha — about an hour's drive. Down off the Khe Sanh plateau, past the smugglers who ply the back jungle paths between Laos and Dong Ha, sitting nonplussed on the side of the road on their Honda motorbikes (the passenger is usually a beautiful woman), down the hill and around the Rao Quan corner, and back along the Quang Tri River. The air was misty, dark, and still somewhat foggy, though not like up on top.

My thoughts returned to the girl in purple and how she had disappeared as suddenly as she had appeared. I wondered what it was she was pointing towards. I have heard stories that the area has taken on mystical proportions and is inhabited by ghosts. Even my usual traveling companion Hoang Tran Dung, is uneasy in Khe Sanh or Con Thien after dark. Sometimes he is very quiet. He would prefer to be out of the bush at night. I wondered to myself: was she an apparition? Thinking about it as I drove, I couldn't remember whether I had noticed if her feet left any marks in the damp spoil. Apparitions, even purple ones, float, they don't walk — and they don't need parkas, right? She was no ghost but she did appear very stealthily from nowhere and disappear equally as fast, apparently also to nowhere. I sensed I was never alone on the base but rather was being closely watched. Of course, I didn't try to look for her. I just thought she lived there somehow in one of the shanty houses constructed from odds and ends on the base. How weird.

And to add another dimension to the weirdness, I noticed again the same intriguing, surreal, certainly alluring phenomenon I had observed the night before while returning to Dong Ha. While approaching and entering the same Bru village along the Quang Tri valley that I had passed through the night before, the same strange light-blue tint suffused the road and surrounding area — a faint azure hue — but it seemed to be more intense than the night before, like it was glowing. And as I drove closer, the intensity increased, seemingly beckoning me closer, deeper — as if there would be no escape. Couldn't be the sun. It's long down. No moon. There aren't any lights, there's no traffic. What is this slight, but increasing blue glow that I see enveloping the area? I drove on and approached the village and drove into the blue light. It was like a blue fog.

I was hesitant to divert my eyes from the road but caught sight of something interesting. As if by chance, I looked to my right and could see right into the doorway of a Bru home. The inhabitants were watching TV. I could see the images on the screen clearly; the hut was that close to the road. Of course! It dawned on me in an instant. There were no supernatural forces at work. The light that bathed the area in blueness was just the collective glow from the television sets in each hut. Amazing. Each and every single Bru hut had a small television set! And, all the sets were turned on! Probably, everyone was watching the war. I had never noticed that before and never even thought they had access to such conveniences. Soon, I emerged from the valley of blue light and, continuing on to Dong Ha, saw the light fade in the mist in the rearview mirror. I continued on alone on Highway No. 9 in the darkness towards the Rockpile in Quang Tri Province. The day was over. In some ways, it was disappointing but in many other ways very enlightening and completely unforgettable. The rain continued to fall. America was at war again. Go USA!

My Unexpected Visit to Khe Sanh Hill 861 in April, 1968.

by Hugh D. Cox

In April 1968, I was a first lieutenant with Army Special Forces assigned to MAC-SOG in Vietnam. I was given a mission to fly by Army helicopter to Khe Sanh to deliver intelligence documents to our Special Forces unit located within the Khe Sanh combat base.

The North Vietnamese siege of the base had ended and the U.S. Marines were dismantling much of the base. My flight was a routine one since the air strip at Khe Sanh was not under constant indirect fire. We flew over some of the most historic terrain of the Vietnam war including Camp Carroll, the Rockpile, Highway 9 before we reached the airspace over Khe Sanh.

When we reached that area, I was astonished to see the bombing devastation on the hills and mountains surrounding the air strip — particularly to the West. Miles and miles of B-52 bomb craters pock-marked the landscape. There were tens of thousands of craters within sight.

As the helicopter descended, the pilot received an urgent mission to undertake a medical evacuation "medevac" from a U.S. Marine outpost. The pilot quickly gained altitude and flew northwest from the air strip to a mountain ridge about 2,700 feet high. When we approached the ridge, I could see that it was almost like a knife edge with very steep ridges dropping away from the long spine of the mountain. The pilot asked me to jump off when we reached the mountain top ridge. He explained that he needed no extra weight and promised he would return for me. As the only passenger, I jumped from about 10 feet above the ridge.

I was on Hill 861 and it was one of those war experiences one can never forget.

I was not certain how long I was there. Time spent waiting in a war is irrelevant.This mountain ridge was manned by "A" company, 1st Battalion of the 1st Marine Division (which had recently replaced K company of the 26th Marine Regiment). I saw only a few Marines during my visit.

Several Marines were moving about. Each acted in very exhausted slow-motion carrying canteens, supplies and ammunition back and forth. Their young faces all had heavy beards and deep set eyes. I simply watched them as I sat down with my briefcase and weapon. It was as if they had always been there in filthy, damp and torn uniforms. They moved deliberately in spite of their distant stares. They seemed so young, and I felt so old at age 25. These Marines were experienced combat veterans deprived of adolescence. They carried simple things like water and food as if it was for holy communion. Anyone who saw them on that day in 1968 would be proud to be with them even for a short period of time.

No one spoke to me. These Marines seemed busy and unconcerned about my presence. It was as if I had always been there sitting on the ground in my clean uniform and green beret clutching my briefcase and M-16.

Their defensive position along the mountain ridge was one of the most precarious I had ever seen. These Marines occupied the spine of the ridge for only about 10 meters down the steep ridges from the top. Then there was another 10 meters of cut down vegetation probably filled with mines. Beyond, the heavy jungle loomed just 20 to 30 meters away. The North Vietnamese could have been upon us within seconds. I looked over the other side of the ridge. The defensive setup was the same on both sides of the mountain. Hill 861 seemed to be an invitation to attack.

I thought it was best to wait until I was spoken to. The Marines knew I was there. Army types know that Marines are different. I located a foxhole to move to if needed. I tried not to show my growing anxiety.

This strategic combat location was the bloodiest Vietnam ridge I ever visited. Each attack on Hill 861 was a potential enemy victory. Holding this ridge seemed doubtful to me. I admit I was scared.

I had read the reports of the battles along these mountains and ridges. Hundreds of Marines were killed or wounded in taking Hill 861 and the nearby mountain tops like Hill 881 South and Hill 881 North. Brave NVA soldiers took even more casualties in those battles. In January 1968, the Marines had to take the ridge more than once to secure it. It came under serious attack again in July 1968 — after my short visit. Once secured in January 1968, Hill 861 remained firmly in Marine hands.

Finally after a long period of sitting, I was approached by one young Marine who asked me how he could transfer to the Army. He seemed dead serious. I do not remember my answer. We talked for a half hour in quiet tones while I constantly scanned the tree line below for enemy movement. Everyone knew the elite 324th NVA Division was in this area. Within a few hours, the helicopter returned to pick me up.

During my visit, I knew I was among special men who could be measured by a simple yardstick of courage and trust. Race, class and family background meant nothing on that ridge. I was deeply moved by each man's simple act of sharing with his brothers.

Since that day, I always speak of U.S. Marines in very respectful terms. I will never forget the Corps' finest on Hill 861.

Squalls Between the Storms — Part II

by John M. Kaheny

About a week after the Bravo Company engagement I arrived at Khe Sanh Combat Base to start my new assignment as the S-3 Liaison Officer/Psychological Warfare Officer. I left Alpha Company with mixed feelings. The Third Platoon was now in good hands with my relief — Paul Lojokovic, a bright, dedicated and competent officer. Under the wing of Sgt. Hawkins, he was going to do a fine job. I did feel bad about going to the "real." In the "rear," there were hard backed tents, hot chow and even beer on occasion. Meanwhile the Marines and Corpsmen in the line companies were living in the trenches with C-Rats and a rare warm Pepsi. On the other hand, it was a great opportunity and I would be working with Captain Valesques again and I had spent 5 months leading small patrols and had been spared harm.

Right after I checked into the Operations Section, Master Sergeant Dubois informed me that I was to go immediately to Danang and attend the U.S. Army's Psychological Warfare School because my additional duty was Psyops Officer. The trip almost cost me my bars. Just before I left. Sgt. Nordin, the Alpha Company Admin Chief, told me to visit Sgt. Jamie Freeman, who had recently been transferred to China Beach as the senior lifeguard because of his exceptional performance of duty. I knew Jamie well and witnessed firsthand the reasons why he got such a plumb job. Needless to say, I returned to Khe Sanh on June 22 much wiser mentally, but completely exhausted physically. Sgt. Freeman sure knew how to entertain a young lieutenant!

A few days after my return, I was sitting in the combat operations center being schooled by both Master Sgt. Dubois and GySgt. Lukens when I noticed four holes on the right side of the crotch of my trousers. I innocently asked Dubois why they put the vent holes on only one side of the trousers. He went to a bookshelf, picked up an AK round that was there and put the bullet into the holes. A perfect fit! Both Dubois and Lukens then broke out laughing. Seems that on May 21, the NVA got closer to me than I had believed. As an aside, several years ago at one of our reunions in Philadelphia, Phil Lukens showed up and entertained several members in the bar with this story about a pretty naive lieutenant.

Dubois and Lukens were untiring in their instruction. If I was to clear fire missions in the fire support coordination center, I was going to be trained right. Soon I was catching on and learned to keep my mouth shut and listen. About that time I began picking up some distressing bits of information. Lt. Col. Newton was not generally liked. He kept to himself and was rarely seen outside of his rather well-equipped bunker. Late at night I would brief him on the steps of the bunker on the night activities etc. I was always uncomfortable around him — he appeared very distant. I also heard that many members of the battalion had bad feelings about Norm Centers, the C/O of Alpha Company. I knew Norm pretty well, and he was rather strange on occasion. Some days he was on time and on target, but on others he appeared to be a few clicks off frequency. At this time I just took it all in.

It all changed on the night of June 27. Centers had moved Alpha Company into an open area just south of Alpha Battery 1/13 at the west end of the Combat Base. They were told not to dig in for some reason. The NVA struck twice in the night with mortars. Their target was Alpha Battery but they hit Alpha Company the hardest. Soon Lt. Bolger was dead along with Sgt. Kincaid. Centers had refused to authorize Sgt. Kincaid to proceed to Phu Bai when his tour was up, because the paper work had not come through and Alpha Company was shorthanded. Kincaid died after his tour date. Rusty Reeves was severely wounded in the leg during the first attack.

I knew that Centers had come by the Combat Operations Center shortly after the attack, but I thought he had been ordered to do so. I later found out he had not. Centers had a piece of shrapnel in his arm when I saw him, but he already had gotten medical attention.

Later that night, the NVA struck again. This time Centers showed up at the COC and was shaking severely. He was babbeling about how the NVA were about to overrun the entire base and that he was lucky to have received his third Purple Heart. I did not notice any fresh wounds, but he had lost his composure.

By the next morning, Centers left for Phu Bai with his "third heart," Rusty was off to Cam Ranh Bay and later in the day 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines got hit hard on Hill 689. Captain Bynum of Lima Company was killed, along with several other brave Marines.

Things settled down a bit and on July 4th Lt. Col. Newton was relieved by Lt. Col. Jim Wilkinson. There was an immediate change in the morale of the battalion. One of the first things Lt. Col. Wilkinson did was go out to the access road to the base and meet a rifle company coming in to the base. He and the Sgt. Major had cold sodas and beer waiting for the grunts as they arrived. A new day had arrived, and it did not go unnoticed.

About a week later, Major Heath the Battalion Executive Officers came into the COC late at night and asked me if I would go back to Alpha Company to help out temporarily and if so, when could I be ready. I said I needed about 30 minutes to grab my pack. He then told me that Alpha just got a new commanding officer and that Lt. Stewart, who had been reassigned to Alpha from Bravo Company, had just fallen off a ledge and had been evacuated. The new C/O Captain John Raymond needed an experienced platoon commander. I also teamed that Alpha was moving out before first light to go back up to Hill 881S. I was to meet Captain Raymond at the mess tent ASAP.

I walked down the dirt road to the mess tent in the dark and was trying to find Captain Raymond when I fell in behind some of the Marines from Alpha Three. They were unaware I was there in the dark and were commenting upon the fact that the company had been mix-mastered since the mortar attack, and that I would be going to the Second Platoon with many of the old Third Platoon, but things would not be the same.

Captain Raymond presence was recognized immediately. He was a great leader who really cared about his Marines. He knew that I was familiar with both the enemy and the terrain and made it apparent that he needed to learn and learn fast. He wanted a fight, but a fight on his terms. He put the Second Platoon out on the knoll on the west end of 881 South. At night, the position was isolated, as we did not have enough Marines to protect the saddle that joined us with the rest of the Company on the summit to the east. Bozo Worden was once again my radio operator, and our little command group was augmented by "Ollie" Collins and two scout snipers, Sgt.'s Frank Jones and Gable. Twenty-four years later, Jones and I would serve together again in Operation Desert Storm. I felt very comfortable watching the members of the old Third Platoon, bringing the many FNGs up to speed.

Checking watch one night at about 0200, Jones and Gable thought they caught a Marine smoking weed. The Marine pitched it far outside the wire so there was no evidence for formal proceedings. In addition, all of us in the CP believed he was trying to get sent to the rear on a weak case, so he could shirk and eventually beat the rap. I can't remember who came up with the plan, but we performed an attitude change on this fellow. Jones and Gable disarmed him, tied him up and staked him outside the west gate for the remainder of the night. All night long, they threw rocks down into the ravines. At first light, we had a young Marine with a serious attitude change.

A couple of weeks later Lt. Col. Wilkinson came up to 881 South with a new lieutenant and a large box of Purple Hearts. Most of the Purple Hearts went to the members of the old Third Platoon, like Dennis Thayer and Russell Turner. After the ceremony, Lt. Col. Wilkinson gave me a choice — to stay in Alpha Company with Captain Raymond, or I could go back to the S-3 and the new lieutenant would relieve me. I decided that after six months in the field

I should not press my luck, so I agreed to go back to the S-3. A few days prior, Bravo Company had broken up an ambush on Route 9 several miles east of Khe Sanh. That action is best described by others, but it was a fierce engagement and as a result Route 9 would be closed until after the Siege. It was also the last serious encounter with the NVA by 1/26 until December of 1967.

I returned to the S-3 and continued to learn my new trade. Most of the Marines in 1/26 who deployed to Vietnam in July of 1966 were now going home in August of 1967. The good news was that Andy Sibley returned after a bout with malaria, and Rusty Reeves was back from the Army hospital in Cam Ranh Bay. Rusty had almost lost his leg but refused to be sent home for one reason. I met him walking from the airstrip to the Bn CP and before he even said hello, he asked where Centers was. I told him that Norm was still in Okinawa as there had been a problem with his orders, but he had been ordered to FMF PAC in Hawaii.

Years later I learned that Norm Centers, subsequently promoted to major, was relieved of command of the Marine barracks in Iceland because he displayed some serious dysfunctional behavior. I believe that he had finally lost his battle with the demons who affected him so adversely at Khe Sanh. As a result he was committed to Bethesda Naval Hospital where he would pass away in the mid-1980s.

Anyone Care?

Sonny Gratzer

Misdeeds lay by the road of Annoying and unhappy times
Life's failed ambitions
Stink like molding NVA bodies
Poured from trimvanes
Like so much debris.
Nothing to care for!
Smells are summons!
Failed times smell, too.
Failed limbs and failed bowels
Add up to annoyances for others,
Unlike the Gimp to whom they mean all.
Nothing to care for?
Smells are memories!
What else can they be?

Just so everyone knows...

Publisher Notes

In the past, I have been printing the KSV Directory on a when-ordered basis. It is currently contained in a three ring, clear view, hard cover booklet, (5-1/2X8-1/2). I have been making changes as they came in, and sending out corrected pages to those who have a booklet of this type in their possession. Existing problems are that there are so many annual changes, having different directories, and the current process not being cost efficient. I am now negotiating with the printer to print an entire membership a directory, with my then printing changes, and new member information in each issue of the Red Clay. Members can make their own changes and add the new members to the section provided to continually update their own individual directory. As cost allow, a periodic new comprehensive directory will be put out, perhaps every other year.

Membership Committee Notes

The 2004 annual dues are now due. If you receive a notice, you have not paid, please remit ASAP. Life Members will receive a form to utilize if they wish to honor someone in the memorial section of the Fall KSV Newsletter.

Message from the Reunion Committee

Our reunion in Dallas Texas is all set. We believe we have negotiated the best rates for lodging, food, and drink, at one of the best 4 Star Hotels in the City of Dallas. The staff, whom had previously accommodated us, is overextending themselves, to make our stay as enjoyable as possible. To this day we are still receiving lower rates for planned events, beneficial to members. All proceeds earned from the reunion will be utilized to lower the price of planned events.

The majority of events have been planned as group activities. We wanted the membership to remain as a group even though we would be away from our base hotel. The cost for the event planned for the women, (Complete SPA pampering activities) will also be reduced, utilizing profits from last years reunion. Our Khe Sanh 500 (Kart Races) is for all members of the family, regardless of size or age. The two nights of Country Dancing, and eating at two of the most famous Country Western Bars, will be enjoyable for the whole family,) live rodeos, shopping etc. We had the pleasure and fun of experiencing these planned events away from our own hotel, in addition to the wonderful events the hotel has put together for us. The hotel and their staff operate a first class organiza-

Strap on your helmet for a trip into the hills above Khe Sanh. You can almost hear the crash of the mortars, smell the stench of decaying bodies, and feel the slice of elephant grass on your hands as you walk up those deadly hills with 2d Battalion, 3d Marines (2/3) and 3/3 in the spring of 1967. Not for the fainthearted, Ed Murphy's moving account of the 1967 Khe Sanh hill battles captures the background, sights, sounds, and feel of battle through extensive interviews with over 80 Marines who fought there. The reader will cringe with anticipation expecting the next jam of an M-16 rifle as the Marines fight with grenades, bayonets, machine guns, and a rifle that was not ready for issue to combatants.

From the mouths of the participants and the pages of the after action reports, Murphy recaptures the firefights, ambushes, and medical evacuations that were daily occurrences during this intense fighting. While reading this book, noncommissioned officers (NCOs) will find a wealth of combat leadership to emulate. Junior officers will learn the tools and tricks of their trade — what to do and what not to do. The veterans of these fights will find old friends and many memories both good and bad.

An Army Vietnam-era veteran, Ed Murphy set out to write a "good, exciting story" based on the exploits of real people. Selecting a subject almost neglected until now, he castigates the bureaucracy that sent men into battle with a less than acceptable weapon and then denied it. Murphy wanted to convey an accurate tale as seen through the eyes of the participants. He captures the courage and brotherhood of the heroic Marines who stormed those hills. He accomplished his mission with a book that is good, exciting, and accurate. Murphy paints a clear picture of the horrors of war. His other books include "Dak To" and "Semper Vietnam." He has also written three books on Medal of Honor recipients — all worth reading.

The vast majority of participants had no clue why they went into those hills to fight a tough enemy with a less than tough weapon. Most thought the only battle was against the North Vietnamese Army. Murphy opens the readers' eyes to several battles being fought simultaneously: Marines against North Vietnamese soldiers, Lt. Gen. Lew Walt against General William Westmoreland on strategy, and Marines against the newly issued M-16 rifle.

The obvious battle pitted 2/3 and 3/3 against elements of five different North Vietnamese Army divisions. The author devotes the bulk of this story to the fights to capture Hills 881 North (881N), Hill 861, and Hill 881 South (881S). He gets down with the individual riflemen as they walk through the elephant grass, fight through ambushes from an unseen enemy, and live through seemingly endless enemy rocket and mortar barrages. The inscription on the Marine Corps War Memorial that "Uncommon Valor Was a Common Virtue" was never truer than in those hills.

Two less obvious battles lend credibility to this story — Westmoreland's tactical differences with Walt, and the Marines' struggle with their rifles. Murphy explains the background that led General Westmoreland, Commander, Military Assistance Command and Vietnam, to want the Marines at Khe Sanh. The Marines, led by Lt. Gen. Walt, III Marine Amphibious Force Commander, never wanted to be in those hills. He believed the battle could be won on the coastline where the majority of the people were. The battle between Westmoreland and the Marines over tactics went on until he left in 1968. In a fact-filled Part One, Murphy traces the history of how the Marines got to this outpost. Participants in this battle may be surprised by how many of their friends wore the red clay of Khe Sanh before them. He starts by describing the opposing opinions going back to 1966. The cast of characters includes Lt. Col. Pete Wickwire, commanding officer (CO) of 1/3; Capt

Mike Sayers, CO of Company B, 1/9; and the hated crachin (the rain and lousy weather in that area). Even the legendary general Mike Ryan played a role. Mike Sayers' company played a critical role throughout the story. Part One ends with the introduction of Lt. Col. "Pappy" Delong's 2/3 by air from the special landing force and Lt. Col. Gary Wilder's 3/3 by truck into a battle to prevent disaster.

Another battle that cost the lives of many Marines was between these brave warriors and their own rifles — the then infamous M-16. Issued to 2/3 in Okinawa while the battalion was training for duty as the special landing force and to 3/3 while they were still around the Rockpile in northern I Corps, the M-16 displayed problems almost immediately. The first thought was that Marines were not cleaning their weapons properly. This was quickly disproved by inspections at every turn at the company, platoon, and squad level. Murphy deals with this controversy in concise statements of fact and recollection of rifle problems that became daily routine throughout the battle. The individual accounts of rifle failure at critical moments will awaken anger in the Marines who lived through it. Much to the resentment and frustration of company grade officers, senior Marines continued to blame the rifle problems on individual Marines. Murphy's well-researched description of this controversy will awaken the rage many junior officers and enlisted Marines felt at the accusation that these warriors were not properly caring for their weapons. The rifle would be a thorn in the side of bleeding Marines until the problem was remedied in late 1967 with an in-country retooling of the rifle.

Hill 861 was the pivot point on both of the higher hills, and each battalion lost men there. Part Two describes 3/3's assault on Hill 881S as they passed through Hill 861 and wheeled hard left. A composite battalion (two companies from 3/9 and one from 3/3) under Lt. Col. Wilder fought through a heavily entrenched and hidden enemy. Following in trace up Hill 861, Pappy Delong's 2/3 swung northwest toward Hill 881N. The author devotes Part Three to the efforts of 2/3 to attack an unseen enemy relying heavily on artillery and Marine close air support. Both battalions followed a similar pattern advance — reconnaissance by fire, hit an unseen ambush, fall back, call for supporting arms, and resume the attack. The doctrinal "attack through and ambush" proved a less than useful tactic because of foliage density and faulty weapons. As the battle wore on, Marines, released from the strict rules of engagement of the guerilla war in the South, increasingly relied on reconnaissance by fire.

"The Hill Fights" is well researched and provides a detailed historical background without boring the reader with dry history. Murphy paints the big picture as well as the view from the fighting hole, capturing the zeal of a Marine under fire. He brings the emotions of the individual riflemen and officers alive on the pages, pushing the reader to each new page. Murphy moves gracefully back and forth between the political, the strategic, and the tactical. One minute the reader is with Westmoreland and the next with Cpl. Gerry Pett, capturing the perspective of colonels and privates and blending them into a fast moving story. This book puts the reader on the hill and in the muddy, bloody boots of the Marine warriors.

Murphy relates the controversy over the faulty M-16 from the eyes of the enlisted Marines whose lives depended on it. He often groups all officers and staff NCOs as being critical of the way their men cleaned the weapons. While that was the first inclination, many company grade (and I suspect field grade) officers quickly identified the problem and came to the defense of their Marines. In retrospect, the enlisted Marines were probably unaware of the dilemma that plagued their officers over this rifle and the many arguments and discussions that took place behind closed doors. The author, who drew much of his book from the accounts of the enlisted Marines had no way of knowing either. The clearest example of an outspoken critic of the weapon is 1st Lt. Mike Cervenak of Company F, 2/3 who put his career on the line to go public with a letter to The Washington Post detailing the real problems.

Marines of all ranks will benefit from reading "The Hill Fights" as both an important piece of Marine Corps history told nowhere else and as a factual look into the bloody battle described in this story. Murphy ranks with Jim Webb and Johnnie Clark in his ability to describe the heroism of Marines under fire in Vietnam. This very readable, fact-filled book belongs on the U.S. Marine Reading List. It will be a "keeper" to the heroes who captured those hills.

Lt. Col. Madonna retired from the Corps in 1983. During the hill fights, he was CO, Co H, 2/3. He currently resides in Chester, MD.

Fading Images

As our color guard marched in front of the Vietnam veterans moving wall
We were piped across the expanse by the bagpipers call.

Tall and proud we marched under a shimmering blue sky
All the while our colors we held high.

As we marched and the wall receded to the rear
Our fallen comrades fell in behind their footsteps we could hear..

The sound of our footsteps grew so loud
They caused a hush to envelope the crowd.

When our march was over I turned to look at the wall
I swear, I could see the images of those heroes fading
With the end of the bagpipers call.

We Got Mail

Tom,

You guys do a great job on the newsletter. I am in the midst of intense Hepatitis C treatments from a transfusion I received when I lost a leg to a booby trap. There are many men in my shoes. We suspect the common denominator were the shots we were required to take in boot camp. Those shots were given with air-injected needle guns, one right after another, without sanitation. Blood from the gun could have been passed from one recruit to another. Right now there is a 50% cure rate. I encourage all members to be examined for the disease. It lays dormant and symptoms might not show up for 40 years.

I never showed any symptoms, yet had a very high "Viral Lead" count. I do not think I had any other possibilities for contamination. I never shared a needle, got tattooed, or had my body pierced, except for a little shrapnel. In the September issue of American Legion Magazine, there is an article by Senator John Kerry. I found it disgusting and wrote a reply to the editor which was published in the November issue. I have been getting positive replies from all over the country. You may publish it if you choose to do so.

Although I was wounded prior to my brothers from 3/26 serving at Khe Sanh, I feel very attached to all of you, keep up the good work. God bless all my brothers who represented me in spirit. Know that one Marine was praying for all of you during the Siege. If they could have strapped a new leg on me then, I would have been with you all. You are all heroes in my mind. It was that love that caused me to respond to John Kerry's article where my rage was evident. Good luck to all my adopted brothers, God Bless you all.

M/Co 3/26 66/67

PUBLISHERS NOTE: Lorne, thank you for the kind words. Coming from one that has made such a sacrifice, it means a lot to all of us. I know your prayers must have had a lot to do with those of us who made it home. I thank you for your defense in the article you wrote for American Legion Magazine. I read it and felt joy in your kind words for our service. I cannot print it in our magazine since John Kerry is running for a political office, and our editorial policy also forbids politics in general. Again, I want to personally thank you for your heroic service. We are honored having you as a member of our organization.

Tom,

I just wanted to write a short article concerning my service at the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

After my arrival at Danang, I was transferred to I Corps to serve with Delta Company, 1/26. I would like to dedicate this article to my brothers who fought and died, and those who made it back home. I served as a section leader for M-60 machine guns under the command of Lt. Ernie Spencer. Ernie was a real Marine and to this day, I consider him a friend. I respected him for what he was then, and what he is now. If it were not for him, I would not have made it back home.

Khe Sanh was hell. I saw things that I never saw before. This made me do things I had to do to survive that awful ordeal. When they called the 26th Marines "Professionals," they knew what they were talking about. If I had to do it all over again, I would, if I had Ernie and the rest of my fellow Marines with me. I will never forget what happened at Khe Sanh.

If anyone wants to read a true book about Khe Sanh, I suggest they read "Welcome to Vietnam Macho Man," by Ernie Spencer. It brought back profound memories of my service at Khe Sanh. There, I saw boys turn into men in a very short period. To this day I still cry, when I think of the awful things I saw. I am proud to have served with the brothers like I had at Khe Sanh.

Good morning, my friend.

As I said in my previous mail, I saw the picture of my squadron's namesake on the back copy of the magazine. What a terrific sight. My squadron HMM-364, the Purple Foxes, flew out of Phu Bai until December of '69. As I said, my introduction to lovely South East Asia was flying into Hue!! As Tet grew worse, we were flying into Khe Sanh on a "too often" schedule! We would fly up to Quang Tri and re-fuel, then on to Khe Sanh, the Rockpile, 881

North and 881 South!! Oh, the memories!!! Hell, most of the time we wouldn't even land, just push out the supplies!!!!!! But oh those mede66vacs,!!!!!

Tom Eichler,

I have to assume that you know Ron Murray and that he has sent this poem to you .In the event not, I am forwarding this to you. As I said before, we in the Thailand-Laos-Cambodia Brotherhood (TLCB) care a lot for the 26th Marines of Khe Sanh. This was forwarded to us by one of our great Ladies we have in the TLCB. If you were not aware of this poem, I am really happy to send it to you.

Proud Associate of the KSV.

WE SLEPT WITH ONE EYE OPEN, AS WE LISTENED FOR THE SOUND. A MARINE CALLING CORPSMAN, OR THOSE INCOMING MORTAR ROUNDS.

WHEN THE FIGHTING STARTED, IT NEVER SEEMED TO QUIT. MANY BRAVE MEN DIED UP THERE. BODIES TORN AND SPLIT.

KHE SANH WAS A NIGHTMARE, FOR HOURS IT WOULD RAIN. ROCKET AND MORTAR ROUNDS DOWN ON US, I THOUGHT I'D GO INSANE.

THEN THEY SENT THOSE HUMAN WAVES, TO CRASH UPON OUR WIRE. FOR SEVENTY-SEVEN DAYS THEY CAME AT US, BUT WE WOULD NOT RETIRE.

WE FOUGHT THEM UP CLOSE, HAND TO HAND, WE WERE BRAVE AND BOLD. IT SEEMED MORE LIKE A YEAR TO ME, AT NINETEEN I FELT OLD.

I DON'T KNOW HOW MANY WE FOUGHT, OR WHAT THEY THOUGHT WE WOULD DO. BUT THE US MARINES HAD SENT WORD TO HANOI; THIS WAS NOT DIEN BIEN PHU.

Is Baghdad Safe?

13 Oct 2003

by Gary W. Foster

Baghdad is safe and unsafe at the same time. Many people have asked me what Baghdad is like. I thought I would take some time and write a brief narrative about what I have experienced and have briefly seen so far. I am very safe in the old Palace of Saddam Hussein, and there are quite a lot of Americans, Italians, Polish, British, Nepalese, and Spanish people here. I live in a trailer with a bed made for a midget and a postage stamp-sized blanket. The bathroom is nice but again for a midget. There is hot and cold water, so that's a plus, and the AC is not needed at night. Storage space is at a premium. The weather here at the moment is ninety degrees during the day and in the low sixties in the evenings, and it is very dry. There is not much to do here in the off hours, so I take the shuttle bus from the Palace to the Al Rasheed hotel for a beer or two (or three). Nothing else to do. Hours are long during the day. But wait! There is disco night on Thursday, at the hotel. Whooo Hooo! 70s music. You know, the Bee Gees, Fleetwood Mac, Abba, (love Abba's "Can you hear the guns Fernando? I remember long ago another starry night like this." or some such words, can't remember.

Reminded me of Zaire, dancing late at night at 'Le Club Disco in Kinshasa just 4 degrees 20 minutes south of the equator in the African tropics. The presence of French and Belgian women, mindless music, etc. The Iraqis I have met are all friendly. The men don't ever seem to shave, and they all have mustaches. The women don't smile very much, if ever, or so it seems to me. Some wear a semi-veil, and some don't. We all work with Iraqi men and women all day long. The place here at the Palace could not function without them. The area around the Palace is sealed off (probably 25 square blocks) and the streets are deserted except for American army vehicles going back and forth. This is called the Green Zone here we are safe. I can't understand why the militants (whoever they are) don't mortar us, as we would be a plum target. It would seem to be easy, especially from the other side of the Tigris River, which is behind the palace.

One has to be able to show one's ID at all times, so we wear it around our necks. Quite often, at night, there is sustained gunfire of all calibers. It does not affect us, but I know larger caliber bullets can fly five miles or so — maybe more. So every time I hear gunfire, I wonder where the muzzle is pointed. The destruction from the war here is relatively minimal as far as I am able to see. I was taken to the Baath Party headquarters and visited the domed conference room. The dome was penetrated by two smart bombs side by side and exploded deep into the concrete floor below the dome, blowing everything inside to smithereens. The dome withstood the explosion and the two three-foot diameter holes are still visible through its concrete skin at the apex of the dome. There is lots of looting. Food is good, cafeteria-style and quick with a good variety. I seem to drink lots of Fanta orange soda. There is a pool, overpopulated with the Army. Lot of dust. Smoked a hookah the other night. Apple cinnamon tobacco, I believe it was. Pungent. Evenings are dark, not much light. Power plants are coming back on line steadily but electrical demand outstrips supply by a wide margin. Palm trees are everywhere, as is the American military. It is so weird seeing young women manning a tank or carrying a machine gun that is longer than they are tall. But there are many women soldiers here. There have been several soldiers killed since I have been here. In one case, a young women soldier, aged 19, was shot and killed late at night on a road very near Baghdad. There was a very large explosion today in town. As I said, Baghdad is safe and unsafe at the same time. More later.

As always,
Gary

Marines still caring for Marines

by Tom Eichler

I retired from the Chicago Police Department on May 10, 2003, after 34 years of service. At a retirement party held in my honor, one of the police officers presented me with a gift I would like to share with members of the KSV. Police officer Edward J. May, a former Marine and Vietnam veteran whose Brother John was KIA serving with the Army in Vietnam and was posthumously awarded the Silver and Bronze Star, wrote the following letter to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. I am publishing it this time, along with the response from the Commandant, to show that the United Marine Corps, while engaged in numerous conflicts throughout the world, will still take the time to honor one of its own who served long ago.

Dear Commandant Hagee,

Let me start by introducing myself. I am Edward J. May # 2531668. I was a Corporal and served with Fox 2/1 in Vietnam, 1969 and 1970. Let me also tell you what a fine job you are doing with our beloved Corps. I am writing this to tell you a little about a fellow Marine who just retired from the Chicago Police Department. His name is Thomas Eichler # 1838959, Buzzy, as he is known to everyone, served at Khe Sanh on Hill 861A with Echo 2/26 during the Siege. He was awarded the Silver Star and Purple Heart for his actions. But that is not what makes him special. Buzzy enlisted in the Corps in 1958, served a four year enlistment, and was discharged. When the Vietnam war began, he felt that he had been trained as a Marine and he re-enlisted to serve in combat, the job he was trained for. After being discharged in 1968, he joined the Chicago Police Department, where he rose to the rank of Sergeant. I personally worked with Sergeant Eichler for ten years and would not be the Policeman I am today if not for his leadership. Sergeant Eichler retired as one of the most decorated Police Officers on the Chicago Police Department. He is a Legend.

The reason I am writing this letter is to ask you to send a congratulatory letter, so I can frame it and present it to him, on your behalf, at his retirement celebration on 10 December 2003.

Retiree: Sergeant Thomas Eichler # 1448

Dear Sergeant Eichler, Buzzy

It is my privilege to add my best wishes on the occasion of your retirement from the Chicago Police Department. As a fellow Marine, I want to thank you for your selfless service to this great nation. That selflessness is clearly evident in your service during the Vietnam War.

You further demonstrated commitment to this country through your service as a police officer. You worked your way through the ranks to become a Sergeant in the Chicago Police Department, protecting the lives and freedom of your fellow countrymen. Your retirement from law enforcement is the culmination of nearly 34 years of faithful service. Both the Marine Corps and your community are fortunate to have counted you among their ranks.

Marines everywhere join me in sending you our very best. As you prepare to embark upon this new chapter in your life, you can look back with pride on all that you have accomplished. May you always be blessed by fair winds and following seas and may health and happiness follow you in all your endeavors.

Semper Fidelis,

Mike Hagee

Dear Mr. Spencer,

I am trying to locate anyone who can fill in details about Jack Crosby Bogard, KIA 05 Feb 1968 on Hill 861A. Having grown up together, I have always wanted to know what happened on his final day.

My name is Judy Hornischer. Bob Cahill gave me your name and said you might be able to help me in my search for anyone who might have known my brother HM3 Winston Parker while he was in Vietnam. He was a corpsman with Delta Co., 3rd Platoon, 1st Bn., 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Div. He went to Vietnam in Nov. 1967 and was in Khe Sanh during most of his stay. He was KIA on May 9th 1968 somewhere near Wonder Beach in the Quang Tri Province. I would like to get in touch with anyone who knew him or was with him on his last days on earth. My family does not know much about how he died, and I need to have some closure in my life about this. I still mourn his death and need to put him to rest in my mind. If you can help or know anyone who can, I would greatly appreciate the help. My email address is drh0287@msn.com. My phone number is 402-727-0287. Thank you in advance for any help you can give me.

Judy Hornischer

Dear Judy,

I will publish this request in our next issue of Red Clay magazine. When your brother was killed, I was then a battalion intelligence officer but watched this battle. The man who was then the company commander was killed along with about a dozen other Delta company men. I wish I could tell you more but have no recollection. Perhaps some of our members who read the magazine can give you more information. I can tell you that your brother was highly regarded as a corpsman and loved by all who served with him. My heart goes out to you and your family for your tragic loss.

The Marines Memorial Club in San Francisco was established in 1946 to honor all the Marine KIAs of WWII.

When I lived in the Bay Area, I only went there for an occasional business lunch and for a few Saturday night dances. But now that I live 225 miles away from the Bay Area, I stay at the MMC two or three times a year when I visit my son and his wife and can get a reservation, as it is often booked.

Last week my wife and I spent three days there. She loves the upscale shopping at nearby Union Square and I love all the SF homeless people. But, I also take time to tour the MMC as it has a great museum/library on the 11th floor, a great health club in the basement, and a great lobby that takes up the entire first floor. The dining room is located on the top twelfth floor where they have a free buffet breakfast and a free cocktail hour everyday for guests. Like the hippies say, "Been there, done that."

While I was waiting for my son and his wife to join us for dinner, I toured the lobby for the first time in the long time I have been going there. The lobby walls are lined with battle ribbons made into wooden plaques, pictures of several generals of all ages, assorted photos from all wars and "police actions," and special honor display cases for groups such as the WWII Marine Raiders and the Black Sheep Air Squadron of WWII fame. Other display cases also honor Korean, Vietnam, and Gulf War I Marines from those eras.

But what caught my attention was a display case just for Khe Sanh in the rotunda area near the reception desk. It included photos of the Ammo Dump blowing up, a C-130 on fire on the air strip, and various pictures of troops dug in at the combat base. There was also a map of the Khe Sanh area with little flags depicting the units that held the surrounding hills. Most of the hills were identified with the battalion that defended it — except for Hill 861Alpha. In big, bold letters the little flag reads "Echo Company, 2/26." Wouldn't you know that specific display case is right next to the reception desk, where guests lining up to register can glance at it. Stay healthy, Echoski's. Your company is on fine display in the lobby area of the Marines Memorial Club, 609 Sutter Street, San Francisco, trust me.

Members Celebrate Marine Corps Birthday and Veterans Day

I decided to celebrate the Marine Corps Birthday, and Veterans Day, attired in Dress Blues. No, not the old ones, I bought a whole new set. I attended the first gala ball, sponsored by the Marine Air Wing with a Marine W/5, whom I served with on the Chicago Police Department for 35 Years. Robert Dart served in the Marine reserves for 43 Years (active & inactive). The Marine Reserve Air Wing sponsored the first gala. Many of the attendees had just returned from service in Iraq. I was treated with so much respect that it was embarrassing. I was so proud to be among these young Marines — feeling ecstatic that these fine young Marines are keeping our electrifying history intact and ongoing. It made me feel good all over that these kids were keeping our proud history intact. I was the second oldest former Marine out of the 500 attendees — another was a former Marine born in 1926.

The 24th Marines Infantry Regiment (Home Boys) sponsored the second ball. Again, I was made to feel honored and special. These young Marines go overboard to make you feel like you are still one of them. They have a ceremony where Marine Reservists wear authentic Marine uniforms from the very beginning of the Corps to the present. When your Era is announced, you are encouraged to stand. Needless to say, the Vietnam Veterans received the loudest applause. I am negotiating to have the same pageant if our reunion returns to Chicago in the near future. I attended this ball with several members of the Khe Sanh Veterans: Ken Penn & his lovely wife Bernice, Larry Brown, and William Griffith. I also attended the annual Birthday celebration by the Chicago Police Marines in the company of Ted Golab and Joe Murphy (KSV) held at the Chicago PD Training Academy. Joe Murphy was just honored by the City of Chicago when he was called out of retirement to head a new unit charged with solving old homicide cases.

On Veterans Day, I was an honored guest of the City of Chicago at the unveiling of a monument honoring all veterans. This monument was one of many dedicated at the new renovated Soldiers Field (Home of the Chicago Bears Football Team). I had my picture taken with my Brother (25th Infantry Division, Vietnam) and Mayor Richard M. Daley. All in all, it was a very busy weekend. The blues are now back in the closet, I hope they do not shrink like the last set.

Ron Shouse and his wife flew to Philadelphia, PA and on to Allentown, where they reunited with Cliff Treese, a friend from B Btry 1/13. The following is a short synopsis of how they spent Veterans Day, and the Marine Corps Birthday.

We spent the night in Allentown and on Saturday, drove back to Philadelphia with Cliff and his wife to do some touring around the town. We went first to Independence Hall but could not enter due to the heavy security guarding the famous Liberty Bell. The bell has been moved to a more secure place and is now behind bulletproof glass. We took a carriage ride down to Penn's landing to see the Vietnam Veterans Memorial. It is a very fitting memorial with the names of Vietnam Veterans from that area who were KIA. Their names our engraved amidst scenes from Vietnam, in a amphitheatre setting. There were two Vietnam Veterans guarding the Memorial, since some young skateboarders like to use the facility for their own immature pleasure.

Two of the etched panels depicting scenes from Vietnam.

On the opposite corner is the Korean Veterans Memorial. Scenes of Korea are likewise etched in stone, with the Purple Heart Medal engraved over the entrances. That gave both of us a chill. We returned to our hotel room and had dinner before going to Cookie's Tavern. They advertise that they are the real, unofficial Tun Tavern, and the Marine Barracks of South Philly. It is a great place with a lot of former military men as clientele. We ran into John Corbett, one of the KSV authors ("West Dickens Ave."). Neil Kenny from New York City also stopped by. We stayed for a while and chatted with the Veterans, sort of like a reunion, yet with a lot of guys we did not know — it was fabulous. They treated us like we had been coming in the bar forever. We went back on Monday the 10th and it was unreal. The city police had closed down the street for the celebration at Cookie's on the Marine Corps birthday. We stayed for a while but we knew that we had to get to DC, so after saying our goodbyes to some new friends and Corbett, we were on the road again.

Ron Shouse, Cliff Treese, Bruce Geiger, Ed Ronan, Wes Caton, Col McEwen and others placing the KSV wreath at the Vietnam Memorial on Veterans Day.

We checked in at the Crown Plaza and got a cab over to Roslyn, VA where we met up with Bruce Geiger. Now how about this? An Army Captain coming to the Iwo Jima Memorial to wish the Marine Corps a Happy Birthday — am I the only one to see a little irony in this? We offered to tell everybody we saw that he was really in the Corps, but he said that would not be necessary.

Every year there is a Delta to the DMZ Dance where the ladies of Vietnam can come and reminisce about their Vietnam service and hang out with all of us superhero types. This year marked the 10th year of the Women's Memorial. I warn you now, do not make the mistake and call it the Nurse Statue. I was told in no uncertain terms that the nurses were not the only females who served in Vietnam. USO Ladies or Donut Dollies (a carry-over term from WWII and Korea) the entertainers, and our lady stewardesses called Freedom Birds, all did their part. The music from the 60's played until around midnight. The chorus to the song, "We Gotta Get Out of This Place," was repeated many times. We left the dance and went to the Vietnam Wall and the Korean War Memorial, which are spectacular at night. I could feel the cold on my neck and the hair stand up on my arms not unlike nights we all spent together in early 1968; it was really something you have to experience to understand.

The next morning we went back to the Wall and spoke with a number of veterans. We left a few remembrances. We watched the ladies ceremonies and then went to shine the EGA at the Soldiers Statue. The Park Rangers will not let us shine it anymore because so many Marines have polished it and they are afraid the finish will soon be destroyed. I must admit that the Eagle, Globe, and Anchor are pretty smooth. It was just as well, Airport Security had taken my can of Brasso because they thought it was bomb-making paraphernalia; however, I did give it a quick dust off for everybody. We met up with Bruce Geiger and carried the Wreath for the KSV down to the Wall. On the way we ran into Wes Caton, Ed Ronan, and Colonel McEwen. That was total of 6 KSV. Ed Ronan stood with us for a while, and the Colonel, Bruce, Wes, Cliff, and I marched down to the Wall and laid the wreath from the KSV honoring our fallen brothers. It really felt good to do something for the guys that did so much for us. The ceremony did not last long, yet no one wanted to leave. It was sort of like a family reunion — when it was over, no one wanted to say goodbye. It would be great if more KSV could make it. I will be there on Memorial Day for Rolling Thunder, in Dallas in July, and back to DC for Vets Day. You guys and gals make some plans and join us.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY TO THE CHESTY PULLER FAN CLUB!

Major Bruce A. Greene

by Parris Curry

In 1968, while stationed at Marine Barracks, NAS, Jacksonville, FL, we had a new Commanding Officer come aboard. I believe he had just returned from Vietnam. My post was Sgt-of-the-Guard on the day I met him. He introduced himself as Major Greene (Bruce A. Greene). I would soon come to know him both as a Commanding Officer and as someone who took a personal interest in the welfare and the issues of the men who served under him. This story unfolds in two parts:

Shortly after Major Greene's arrival, I was summoned to his office and this photo was taken as he presented my 2nd Good Conduct Award. Soon afterwards, I received orders for my second tour in Vietnam. I had only 12 days to checkout, move my family back to Pensacola and report to Camp Pendleton. While checking out, I was in Major Greene's office when he asked if I was having any issues to clear up and if there was anything that he could do to help.

I did have one problem, but I could not see a solution in the short time that I had available. I had purchased a home entertainment system (TV, radio, 8-track, record changer in one cabinet) from Montgomery Wards some months prior. It had been taken for repairs twice and was again acting up. There was not a Wards store in Pensacola at that time so I was stuck. In addition, my complaints were being answered by, "We will repair it."

I explained this to Major Greene, and he only asked if I wanted to keep the unit. I did not and I explained that my payments were up-to-date. While I stood in front of his desk, he picked up the phone, called Montgomery Wards, got the store manager on the line. He then explained the situation and explained the fact that they were to pick up the unit, refund all my money and close the account. It seems that the store manager took exception to this "request." Major Greene's voice remained calm as he explained that he was on the board or committee that determines which business establishments in the Jacksonville area are "Off-Limits" to all military personnel and if that unit were not removed by tomorrow morning, Montgomery Wards would find themselves on that list of such establishments.

I gained a new appreciation for what the initials "B.A." stood for. When I got home that evening, the home entertainment unit was gone, there was a check on the table, and my wife was a little confused and wanted an explanation. I don't know that Major Greene realized how much I meant it when I thanked him. The next event was when arriving in Vietnam and being assigned to 1st Bn., 26th Marines.

I never forgot what he did and have told the story several times. I also never expected to cross paths again. I have only recently joined organizations (Delta 1/26 Assn) and started contacting anyone. At the 2001 reunion in Chicago, I met Ernie Spencer. He and I sat in the hotel lobby talking about people, places, and things when Bruce Greene's name came up. I asked if it was Bruce A Greene, and sure enough it was and that he, too, was with the 26th. Ernie also relayed the sad event of Bruce losing his wife, which had occurred since I had met him. Recently, I have unsuccessfully tried several times to contact Bruce. If anyone knows his whereabouts, please forward this to me. I would simply like to say, "Thanks again."

CBMU 301 History

by Art Moore
Contributing Sam Messer, Raymond Cruz

In late December 1966, the detailing of personnel to the 31st Naval Construction Regiment in Port Hueneme, CA began. By March 31, 1967, the men were established as the United States Naval Mobile Construction Battalion 301. On April 7, 1967, the unit was commissioned at Port Hueneme with LCDR Henry Holmes receiving the colors as the unit's first commanding officer. On May 17, 1967, the advance party deployed by air to the combat zone in Vietnam. The battalion's rolling stock went by sea and arrived soon at the NSA Danang deepwater piers. The main body flew out from California shortly thereafter and arrived to establish its base camp at Dong Ha, Republic of South Vietnam. By June 24, 1967, CBMU-301 was up and running. Dong Ha Forward Combat Base, RVN, was located approximately eight miles south of the Demilitarized Zone, which was in Quang Tri Province in the I Corps Tactical Zone. The Dong Ha base was a major source of ammunition, fuel, and food for U.S. Marine outposts such as Con Thien, Khe Sanh, Camp Carroll and Gio Linh.

On February 28,1968, CBMU-301's base camp at Dong Ha was named Camp Spillman in honor of BU-1 Charles O. Spillman who died in the crash of a Marine CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter at Khe Sanh. The mission of the main body in Dong Ha was the maintenance and operation of the 3,700 foot AM-2 aluminum runway. CBMU-301 was also tasked with maintenance and support, U. S. Marine Corps and U.S. Navy cantonments, maintenance of over 17 miles of Combat Base roads, maintenance of the new and old LCU ramps, maintenance of base electrical distribution and support and maintenance of the Dong Ha Combat Base Hospital.

On June 3, 1968, CDR W.E. Burdick relieved LCDR Holmes as C/O of CBMU-301. During CDR Burdick's command, the base camp was moved 8 miles south to the Combat Base in Quang Tri. This camp was named in honor of SW2 Edward C. Adams who died from North Vietnamese Army artillery fire at the Khe Sanh Combat Base on April 16,1968.

On May 22, 1969 CDR Jim Groff relieved CDR Burdick as Commanding Officer. On February 4, 1970, CBMU-301 again relocated its base camp. Under CDR Groff, the main operation was moved south to Chu Lai (60 miles south of Danang on the South China Sea) to fit the needs of the U.S. Marines and other units they were supporting. This camp was named Camp Wall in honor of CBMU-301's former Executive Officer who died in the U.S. after completion of his tour.

In addition to the original main body at Dong Ha and Quang Tri, CBMU-301 had four details as of May 1969.

- Detail Alpha was located at An Hoa, approximately 22 miles south of Danang. The primary mission of Detail Alpha was the maintenance of the 3,500-foot M8-A-1 matting airstrip. Secondary to this is the maintenance support of Marine Corps and Naval shore units based there. This support encompassed maintenance of base electrical distribution system and generators and maintenance of base roads. Detail Alpha also performed selected new construction projects.

- Detail Bravo was located at Khe Sanh, approximately 30 miles southwest of Dong Ha. The primary mission of Detail Bravo was the maintenance of the 3,895-foot airstrip. The secondary mission was the maintenance support for the U. S. Marine Corps and Naval Shore Units on the Khe Sanh combat base. On the morning of January 21, 1968, NVA forces launched an all out attack, and the siege of Khe Sanh began. Detail Bravo endured the 77 day siege while carrying out their Seabee mission to this remote, now famous, battle area.

Awarded a Presidential Unit Citation for their support of the 26th Marine Regiment detail Bravo during the 2-month siege of Khe Sanh.

- Detail Charlie was located at Cua Viet, approximately 9 miles northeast of Dong Ha and 4 miles south of the DMZ. Cua Viet was at the mouth of the Song Giang River (Dong Ha River) and the South China Sea and was a major supply station for Dong Ha. The primary mission of Detail Charlie was to maintain the landing craft ramp with construction and maintenance for Naval Units there.

- Detail Delta was located at Quang Tri, approximately 8 miles southwest of Dong Ha and 4 miles north of Quang Tri City. The primary mission of Detail Delta was the maintenance of the 3,700-foot airstrip. The mission also included the maintenance support Detail for the U. S. Marine Corps and Naval Shore Units based there. Numerous new construction projects were assigned and completed.

The main body of CBMU-301 was moved from Dong Ha to the Quang Tri Combat Base in late 1968.

Detail Bravo Story

From 21 January to 6 April 1968, Khe Sanh was the hottest action spot in Vietnam. A key role in support of this outpost was filled by Seabee Detail Bravo, a detail from its main body CBMU-301 stationed at Dong Ha— the only Seabee unit to have endured the Siege of Khe Sanh. It was important to the allied forces because it served to block enemy infiltration down Route 9. Six thousand Marines, a few hundred South Vietnamese troops, and fifty Seabees defended it. In addition to Detail Bravo, fifteen Seabees from MCB-10 built bunkers and served on the front line with Marines and Special Forces.

Seabees from CBMU-301, Delta and Bravo: Sam Messer, Ensign Kux (OIC of Seabees at Khe Sanh), and Jerel Wenger

On July 12, 1967, a fifteen-man crew led by LTJG Martin J. Kux convoyed equipment, which included three dump trucks, a road grader, a pickup, a TD-9 bulldozer, two water buffalos, and a cherry picker crane. The first month's project was to build shops, offices, and living quarters and large hardback repair shops for the rolling stock. After completing camp preparations, the Seabees turned to the main job of rebuilding and maintaining the airstrip. This was to be no easy task as the monsoon rains began the month of August. Rains that sometimes measured 21 inches in one day. They had to increase CBMU-301 personnel to seventy-eight men. Six mechanics, twenty steel workers, ten builders, ten electricians, and thirty equipment operators. We also had two engineers and thirty men on loan from NSA, Danang.

Khe Sanh runway

Soil density test revealed the need for a more compact base under the current runway matting. The leading petty officer, E04 Browne, estimated the runway should be able to withstand a pressure of 50,000 pounds per square inch in order to support the AM-2 aluminum matting. The previous rock base had sunk into the soft semi-lateritic soil, causing dangerous depressions. This problem continued as the depressions appeared again in March-April, despite the precautions that were taken to solidify the airstrip base.

The airstrip was completely torn down and only helicopters and fixed wing Caribou transports could use the airstrip. For three months Seabees worked 12-hour shifts, 24 hours a day, through the monsoon rains to level and lay an eight-inch foundation of rock to support the new matting. Near the end of the project, Seabees were laying as much as 300-400 feet of matting per shift.

From December to January, the airstrip was fully operational, allowing the larger transports, C-123's and C-130's to land and service the base. As the hazards increased, the C-130's airdropped their cargo and only helicopters and the smaller C-123 planes used the 3,900-foot runway. The Seabees turned their efforts to maintenance and other minor construction jobs. Members of CBMU-301 actually did more construction than originally planned. As enemy action increased, they built three large underground bunkers covered by eight feet of dirt, to protect base personnel. Heads, showers, and hardback huts were the first to be built. Seabees continued to maintain them until increased enemy action leveled the above ground structures. The existing post office and three mess halls were completely destroyed.

During one of the attacks, a refrigerator containing much need drugs at Charlie Med receiving station broke down. Disregarding their own safety, Electricians CE-ls Harold B.Cann and Michael T. Roback left their bunker and repaired it, saving the vital medicine. No enemy shell penetrated their underground structures, but seven Seabees were recommended for Purple Hearts.

Marines continued to fight back. Jets and B-52's pounded the enemy positions, within 1,000-2,000 meters of the base, hurling shrapnel into the Marine positions. The enemy was determined to dig their way into the base and had to be constantly dug out of their moving trenches. Seabees were forced to work all day and man fighting positions at night — sleep was a luxury.

Seabees had four primary missions; the first and foremost was to maintain the airstrip. Their second primary mission was to construct life-saving bunkers for the Khe Sanh defenders and a safe facility to treat the many wounded. The third and fourth missions were to keep the electrical system that controlled all base operations and communication, and build fighting positions for the beleaguered Marines.

Keeping the runway operational was a major task; it seemed to resist all efforts to remain open. It drew enemy fire like a beacon, exposed to the unfriendly mountains, like it was inviting it's own destruction from round after round of enemy artillery and mortar fire. Gaping holes were torn into the aluminum skin each day. Against impossible odds, the Seabees kept the runway open during the siege. "We brought out only enough men to repair the damage," LTJG Kux explained. They replaced matting only if it was in the middle of the runway. The longest it was ever not in operation was 24 hours.

A C-130 that didn't survive the trip.

LTJG Kux, OIC of Detail Delta, examines damage from a delayed action VC rocket.

During the 77-day Siege, they officially recorded 10,000 rounds hitting the tiny base. It was very perilous to remain in the open for even a short period of time, especially for the equipment operators and runway workers, who were exposed more than the others. During the Siege, most of the work performed by the Seabees was done during the early morning hours while the base was encased in a heavy fog.

When they had repaired the east end of the runway, the 35-man crew, moved to the west end. Enemy rounds followed them up the runway while they made repairs. Drivers of heavy equipment would lie on the floorboard to avoid being wounded, while watching for men running for the trench that ran parallel with the runway. Running men were always a sign that an attack was in progress, since the noise of the heavy equipment drowned out the incoming rounds.

Seabees constructed the main operations bunker for the base commander Brig. Gen. C.W. Hoffman, who commanded Task Force Hotel, as well as the two bunkers that housed Charlie Med. When helicopter pilots, newsmen and war correspondents had to stay overnight, they were safely housed in bunkers with members of CBMU-301, where they would often share each other's rations. Although it was not their mission, Seabees took over the job of maintaining the base electrical systems. They rigged the 20KW and 30KW base generators to their 15KW generator, which enabled them to immediately switch over if one became disabled from incoming artillery.

Since so much excavating was required to move all operations underground, the Tractor Front-end loader became the most valuable piece of equipment. Since all this valuable equipment had to remain above ground, Seabees designed and constructed special protection made from 55 Gallon drums filled with earth.

When fresh troops arrived, the Siege finally lifted, and the hills surrounding the base were secured. The enemy ground troops retreated but the artillery attacks continued. Detail Bravo performed magnificently during those early days, and their dedicated efforts saved many lives. Those efforts defeated the enemy's main plan to close the airstrip and deny the defenders the supplies to hold the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Lewis "Sam" Messer about 30 or 40 days into the Siege.

Sam Messer, a Seabee serving with CBMU-301 Det B, at the Khe Sanh Combat Base wrote the following letter to his parents, which appeared in their local paper titled, "I'd Like To Be Hunting."

"Jan 28th. Yesterday we were hit by many Mortars and Rockets. I was lucky to be 30 feet away from the first one that hit. I was fortunate to hear it coming and just made it to my hole. I cannot say it did not scare me. I came out with a little bum after a flare from the exploding ammo dump landed in my fighting hole. "I am fine and unharmed." We are not out of this yet but we are ready for anything the enemy throws at us.

"Feb 4th. I am still safe, and I thank the Lord for that blessing. I wish I were home hunting rabbits or squirrels. I should be leaving Khe Sanh in two months, and should be home in June. Maybe in a few days I will be out of this war and be able to forget it ever happened. I know I cannot ever completely forget it, especially my buddies whom I have seen die here. I will always look back and wonder if it was all worth it, I really hope it was.

"Tell Lynn to get those ball gloves out and oil them up. I am going to give him a real warm up. Tell Robert to save all his money because I am going to win it from him when I beat him at pool. Mom & Dad, maybe we won't have to write letters soon and get to sit down and have a nice talk. Right now all our equipment is either broke or blown up. We are on a 2 meals a day food ration, and one quart of water per man. We are low on C-Rations and the water pumps we built do not bring enough water from the river. I love and miss you both very much."

CDR George E. Krauter relieved CDR Groff on April 24, 1970 in Chu Lai and was last Commanding Officer of CBMU-301.

An advance party from Construction Battalion Maintenance Unit 301 departed the Republic of South Vietnam for Port Hueneme, CA on July 1, 1970.

The sister assumed the remaining duties of CBMU-301 battalion, CBMU-302 that was based at an unnamed base camp in Cam Ranh Bay, RVN. Some of the CBMU-301 crew elected to stay and were merged into CBMU-302. These men continued work in turning over facilities to the Vietnamese Navy so they could continue the fight. CDR George Krauter brought the unit back to Port Hueneme, CA for decommissioning and by October 1970, all CBMU-301 operations ceased. CAN DO!

The Khe Sanh Combat Base

"Why us?"
"Because we're here."

– Anonymous, from the Battle of Rorke's Drift

In late 1999, I was informed of a business opportunity that involved the re-construction of Highway No. 9 in Quang Tri Province. I was required to visit the highway prior to preparation of the proposal. The site visit entailed flying from the United States to Hanoi, driving south to Dong Ha on Highway No. 1, and then along Highway No. 9 to Laos at Lao Bao. I remembered from reading Ronald Spector's Book "After Tet" a few years ago that Highway No. 9 passed near the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I retrieved Spector's book to re-read it prior to my leaving the USA so as to refresh my brief understanding about the Siege and the battles for and around Hills 861, 950, 881N, 881S, and others. I reviewed several maps of the area and I found the general location of the combat base and saw it was located not too far north of Highway No. 9. On one map, with reference to Khe Sanh, I read "airstrip unusable."

Although I am not a former Marine or a veteran of the Vietnam War, I do recall in 1968 the reporting of the intense battles in and around Khe Sanh. A friend of mine named Mike Webb flew CH-53s into Khe Sanh from either Danang or Marble Mountain (I can't remember which) and told me many stories of his combat flying experience. So I was aware of Khe Sanh at that time but not of any of its geographic particulars. I did not know much about the hill battles and I had only a vague understanding, at best, of the significance of Highway No. 9, the location and purpose of Camp Carroll and the Rockpile, the fierce fighting west of Cam Lo, and the various LZs that were established later. I, of course, remembered the many comparisons with Dien Bien Phu, but then, at that time, I didn't know exactly where Dien Bien Phu was either.

Looking back, if there was any engagement or characteristic of the war that evokes Vietnam — akin to Gettysburg in relation to the Civil War — in my mind, it is Khe Sanh. Being somewhat interested in military history, I looked forward to visiting the highway. If time permitted, possibly I could visit the site of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I knew nothing about the physical geography of the base and I had no idea what to expect or what I might see once there. I had little time to prepare for my first visit to Khe Sanh, so I went there not knowing many of the details except what I had read in Spector's book, which I took along with me for reference. My journey to Khe Sanh and the continuous sense of irony I was to experience in Vietnam began in Hanoi.

Hanoi itself is an interesting city. There are few cars, but there seem to be millions of bicycles and motorbikes everywhere. The motorbike has become the primary form of transportation in the city. Entire families ride a single motorbike with each member strategically placed on the seat. Often, in the case of a scooter, one sees a young child standing on the running board in front of the driver with his or her hands on the handles. Hanoi is an extremely quiet place at 5:00am. The streets are dimly lit and the boulevards are free of all traffic. Hanoi is very pleasant at this time of morning, if one such as myself is an early riser and likes to walk. But the population of Hanoi also rises early and by 6:00am, the city is alive with the bustle of its inhabitants and urgent business of the day. By 7:00am, the streets are packed as they will be for the rest of the day, regardless of the day of week. Pedestrians crossing the streets are at risk.

I left Hanoi by car on March 29, 2000 and began the trek south. I departed the hotel at 11:00am and within the next hour, I was outside the metropolis area driving down Highway No. 1, which eventually parallels the coast. I had received instructions from the concierge at the hotel as to the best way to proceed from the hotel to Highway No. 1. I didn't get lost, but I was never sure of where I was and there were no directional road signs to reassure me. At least, if there were, I never saw them. Driving south, I had remembered that a key route in Vietnam during the war was Highway No. 1 but that was south, not north, of the DMZ. I felt the irony of being on the same highway but in "North," not "South," Vietnam. The first things that struck me were the traffic and the noise. The traffic was horrendous due to the narrowness and overuse of the highway. But what amazed me the most is that everyone and everything uses the highway as if it were constructed for purposes other than transportation. The highway was more or less a workbench, a playground, a drying platform for rice, a cattle (buffalo) trail, a workshop, and a resting place with many people sitting patiently on their haunches in typical Vietnamese fashion. More importantly, in either direction, all traffic, all vehicles regardless of type and means of propulsion, and quite a few pedestrians use the exact middle of the highway. Trucks, cars, motorbikes, bicycles, ox carts, tractors, every imaginable vehicle is in the very middle of the road. If the train, which parallels the highway, could use the highway, I felt certain it would be in the middle too. Everyone is expert at playing "Chicken." Everyone, that is, except me. I drove through the towns of Ha Nam, Ninh Binh (pronounced Ning Bing), and Thanh Hoa — finally arriving at Vinh City in the south of Nghe An Province at around 7:00pm. Anyone who has been in the tropics knows that dusk falls quickly. It was dark and Vinh City, which was leveled by B-52s during the war but was re-built, seemed to me, in the darkness, to be a long, very narrow city. It was dimly lit, as was Hanoi in the early morning hours.

The countryside through which Highway No. 1 passes is flat. It is basically a flood plain and is virtually covered with rice fields with very narrow connecting paths and dikes. The typical Vietnamese home along the highway is tall, long, and very narrow. Highway No.1 is under construction over its entire length and I marveled at the mix of manual labor and heavy machinery. Just to the west of the highway lie the mountains, which are dramatic and rise abruptly from the flat lands. It does not take long to figure out that the majority of the population inhabits the land near Highway No.1 and that the coastal area is the most heavily populated.

The next day, I departed Vinh City and continued to drive south through Ha Tinh and Dong Hoi. Just south of Dong Hoi and Vinh Linh, another smaller town that hardly exists now due to the B-52 strikes, is the 17th parallel and the still heavily cratered DMZ. I stopped at the DMZ and observed the memorial that has been erected there by the Vietnamese government. For me, while gazing around the DMZ area, the irony just continued. Finally arriving at Dong Ha that evening, I stayed in a government-owned hotel and relaxed with a few cold Halida beers. The next morning I would visit Highway No. 9 and, as I was now convinced, Khe Sanh.

On March 31, 2000, I left Dong Ha at 6:00am and drove west on Highway No. 9 towards Laos through patches of dense fog. The traffic once outside Dong Ha, was much less than the traffic at any point on Highway No. 1. Although I could not see the mountain ranges until sometime later that morning, I knew I was climbing merely by the pressure change in my ears. I passed many concrete road markers painted in red and white giving destinations to various towns and again it was ironic that the distance remaining to Khe Sanh was specifically mentioned on many of the markers. I did not know there was a village called Khe Sanh. I thought it was just the name of the base. For me, reading about a place I seldom mention and then later using that place name in casual conversation produced a strange feeling. Other than reading about Khe Sanh in Spector's book; I have rarely used the two words, within any authoritative context during a conversation. Yet by the end of the day and by the end of my visit to Vietnam, I had mentioned Khe Sanh in conversations so many times, I could just as easily have been talking casually about Sacramento, Toledo, El Paso, or Charleston. And now before my eyes were signs matter-of-factly telling me how far I had yet to drive to a place I had only read about and a place that had been the center of so much sadness in years passed. I felt like Marlow traveling up the Congo River in search of the mysterious, if not nefarious, Mr. Kurtz in Joseph Conrad's "Heart of Darkness." I was being inexorably drawn into a place from which I would never escape. I mused at the continuing irony I sensed because written on the reverse side of the same road signs that showed distances to Khe Sanh, was the corresponding distance back to Dong Ha. I could turn around at any time, a luxury very few Americans possessed thirty years ago. Not that they necessarily drove Highway 9, of course. I didn't turn the vehicle around.

I continued along the road. I saw road maintenance crews at work and in one instance I stopped to talk with them. I met Mr. Nguyen (everyone it seems is named Nguyen), the supervisor. He did not speak English but when I indicated my interest in what his people were doing, he showed me that they were trying to improve the drainage by cutting ditches alongside the road. They all rode to the worksite each day by bicycle. I stopped many other times to review the road and bridges and at one point just east of the intersection of Route 9 and Route 14, I stopped to look at the Rao Quan River churning white with rapids through various small cataracts. The fog had lifted considerably revealing the terrain. Mountains, peaks and valleys, with broad vistas everywhere. Gone were the ubiquitous rice paddies common along the coastal plains; all now replaced by heavy forest and ground foliage.

Finally at 9:30am, I rounded a curve on top of a ridgeline and arrived at Khe Sanh village. I inquired as to the location of the combat base and was escorted to the base by a Vietnamese on a motorbike, arriving there at about 10:00am. I parked the vehicle next to the building posing as a museum. I was struck by the eerie silence and emptiness, lack of vegetation on the adjacent vacant area that I surmised was the runway, and the amount of heavy erosion around the relatively denuded area. Regardless of how empty and deserted the area was I knew I was standing at a place forever fixed in history and in United States Marine Corps lore. The silence and open space enhanced my curiosity and beckoned me to explore. The weather was sultry and still. There was no breeze. The morning fog continued to lift but a haze persisted over the area masking the features of the surrounding hills. The sky was opaque. I examined the four monuments there: a twisted propeller, a howitzer full of the effects of shrapnel, the carcass of a tank, and a concrete spire covered with Vietnamese writing. Walking along the runway in what I thought was a northerly direction (later confirmed to be westerly), I spotted a half-buried hand grenade and wondered how many more were around. Souvenir hawkers followed me everywhere. I continued to the western end of the runway pondering the red soil, a clay technically termed "laterite" which I knew would be dusty when dry and very slippery when wet. It was dusty that day. I noticed that the runway was heavily eroded, and all metal planking had long since vanished. At about 50 feet intervals, small evenly cut ditches were excavated into the soil transversely to the longitudinal axis of the runway. I thought this must be for drainage; that small culverts, now gone, had been placed beneath the metal planking (I don't recall the correct terminology for this planking material). At the end of the runway, which seemed to have been cut into the side of a slope, there were many paths leading away from the runway. I also noticed a hut at the end of the runway. I climbed a small hillock, and using Spector's book, I spotted what I believed, and later confirmed to be, Hills 950 and 1015 — yet, due to the heavy haze I could not see details of the hillsides, only their shaded profiles. I never did see Hills 861 or 881 North or South on that initial visit.

I remained at the base for about 2 hours trying to imagine what it must have been like to experience the Siege and incoming NVA rockets and artillery, but I knew full well my imagination would fall short of the actuality. It was outside my margin of comprehension. When the souvenir hawkers finally left me alone (often I had to tell them to go away, especially one persistent grubby snaggle-toothed guy who chattered endlessly), I sat down on the red dusty ground probably near some bunker evidenced by torn or shredded remnants of plastic sandbag material. I reflected on where I was. The silence was pervasive. There was not even a whisper of a breeze. Looking up at the mute hills, I listened for any sound but there were none, just the sound of my own breathing. At that point in time I did not know how many Americans died there or how many were wounded, or if I did know, could not recollect it. I knew that several thousand Marines were deployed at Khe Sanh, but I did not know the full strength of the garrison. I was cognizant, however, that wherever I walked, perhaps where I was now sitting, in all likelihood, some unimaginable human pain, suffering, and tragedy had unfolded there years before. Although infinitely more tranquil, I was now in the same crucible. I soon realized, and I have mentioned this to many people, there is no monument to the Marines who were there. Nothing. Just red clay or dust depending on the time of year. In time the area will be reclaimed by nature and all remnants of any occupation, all evidence of any American activity, any landmark marking the bravery and suffering of the Marines will be gone. The only other times I could think of where a similar fate had befallen Americans (and I am sure there are many others) is Bastogne and the Alamo. I have been to both places. Monuments do exist there. Even in France where the Germans were defeated in WWI and WWII there are also some monuments to the Germans, but admittedly not many.

When one enters the Alamo, one sees a sign requesting silence in honor of those who gave their lives in March of 1836. In my mind, the mere sight of the Alamo compels me to be silent. The aura of the bravery there is overwhelming. For me now at Khe Sanh, emotionally I was equally moved. The site elicited my own silence in respect for those who served there.

I left the base having only signed my name in the guest book in the museum. I did not know what message I could leave behind that would be salient to my being there or pertinent to the memory of the Marines who fought and died there or to the historical perspective or significance of the location.

My interest in the base, however, was now piqued. I wanted to learn more about the combat base and the history there. I did not know if my proposal to the government would be successful, and whether I would return to Khe Sanh or Vietnam. As I began to reflect on what I had seen, I became intrigued by the realization that while I had been physically on the base area, I did not know exactly where I was. When I returned to the States, I researched the events of Khe Sanh on the Internet and found the Khe Sanh Veterans website. I have left a few messages. Through the website I came across the names of Chaplain Ray Stubbe, who I contacted, and Dennis Mannion (Kilo 3/26) who contacted me as a result of a message I left in the website's guest book. I have developed friendships with both individuals.

Through my conversations with Ray Stubbe and Dennis Mannion, who last summer returned to Vietnam, Khe Sanh, and Hill 861 for the first time since 1968, I began to question what I had seen. What I found troubling and what began to gnaw at me were aspects of the geography and other characteristics of the base that I came to suspect were not quite right, at least not as far as they would have been remembered or represented by known landmark references that have vanished long ago.

I began to collect information as to the general layout of the base to solve some riddles that were developing in my mind. I tried to figure out exactly where the little museum building is located relative to known locations on the base. Was it located near the north side, south side, east, west, in the middle, near the end, or on the left or right side of the base? Where was it exactly? Another question I had was what happened to all the debris? What became of the US Air Force C-130s that crashed? There is absolutely no debris present that would indicate a C-130 had ever been there. There is no wreckage debris of any kind at all, anywhere. Were the three military pieces that are positioned on concrete platforms originally from the base or were they imported? While I now believe that the howitzer and tank hull were imported — some say not, that they were buried and later recovered by salvage hunters. I think the twisted propeller probably came from one of the C-130s that crashed or were destroyed at the base. Interesting points and questions.

But there were two questions that increasingly bothered me and which cast a shadow over my understanding of the geography of the combat base: 1) How was it that the runway had become so eroded when, working from a chronology of events at Khe Sanh, the runway had been shut down for major repairs for several months and resurfaced with crushed rock and stone prior to the siege? And where was the crushed rock anyway? I mean, was the entire runway picked over for crushed rock? Didn't seem likely. Who would take it and why? There is a quarry not far away which would have yielded the same quantity of rock and much more easily. 2) Why was the (western) end of the runway or turn-around area cut and notched into the side of a hill? The runway at this point is about 30 to 40 feet below the surrounding small hill, which descends steeply and directly to the longitudinal edge of the runway. This didn't make sense either. Photographs I have seen of Khe Sanh and discussions I came to have with Ray Stubbe and Dennis Mannion did not indicate the runway was notched into the hillside.

I read Ray Stubbe and John Prado's book "Valley of Decision: The Siege of Khe Sanh," and Robert Pisor's book "The End of The Line: The Siege of Khe Sanh." Both of these books provided excellent information. The accounts, history, and details in each book were riveting. I also read Eric Hammel's book "Khe Sanh: Siege in The Clouds" with its many references to Dennis Mannion and Michael Ewing's book "Khe Sanh"; and "Semper Fi Vietnam" by Edward Murphy. I re-read Michael Herr's book "Dispatches," which I had forgotten contained a long chapter and narrative about Khe Sanh and a USMC nicknamed "Day Tripper" and which also contains a short account of the author's encounter on the road with some American named Stubbe. I visited the library and read the 1968 Newsweek magazine report entitled "The Agony of Khe Sanh." I was not able to find specific information on the runway. From the magazine photographs I had seen, I could not discern any geographic relief (major changes in elevation) around the runway area. Although some maps show the orientation of the runway differently, most of the information I collected, which appeared reliable, showed the general direction of the runway to be east/west. Later I was to confirm this orientation by the mere numbering of the Khe Sanh runway by the US Air Force. Every runway consists, in fact, of two runways in opposite directions. Each is designated by compass headings to the nearest 10 degrees with each direction being separated by 180 degrees.

The USMC Khe Sanh runways were designated 28 and 10 which means if one were landing on runway 28 (280 degrees), he would be landing in a westerly direction, and if on runway 10 (100 degrees) in an easterly direction. Runway 28 and 10 are separated by 180 degrees, which is correct.

Ray Stubbe sent me an aerial photograph of the base taken in January 1967. I had it digitized and enlarged. I could still not determine exactly where I was and whether the western end of the runway was cut into the hillside.

In late August 2000, I learned my proposal for the Highway No. 9 project was successful and I was to return to Vietnam to negotiate the contract with the government. I was determined to visit the combat base again and this time I would be armed with maps, the aerial photograph provided by Ray Stubbe, and some observations made by Dennis Mannion as a result of his pilgrimage last summer.

Then, just prior to my departure, Ray informed me that a second runway had been built after the USMC vacated the site and that the base had also eventually served the NVA, very probably with placement of SAM missiles. This piece of information influenced my thinking and as a result I developed the theory that the red clay runway near where the museum is standing is not the original Khe Sanh USMC runway. Although this discovery would not be such a revelation and could be easily confirmed by hovering in a helicopter several thousand feet over the site, for the unsuspecting visitor or Vet who would not have access to a helicopter, this fact isn't so immediately or readily deduced from the ground. It would be a shame for anyone, especially a vet, to travel all the way to Khe Sanh from the USA and be misled into thinking that the red clay runway was the original USMC runway. What is the point of returning to a geographical place in one's own history without actually standing in the exact location he or she had occupied years before? Without question, any vet returning would try to find his old bunker, machine gun location, perimeter station, where he was wounded, or where a fellow Marine had died. If a Vet used the red clay runway as an initial reference point to locate his old position and, if this was not the real USMC runway, he would not have correctly identified his old position. Also, after 32 years and changes in the vegetation and geography, one could be easily confused or disoriented about geographic points on the combat base as may be recollected and as they now exist. When Dennis Mannion returned to Khe Sanh and Hill 861, he exclaimed, "everything has changed." To many non-veterans such as myself, reaching the wrong conclusion would be easy because we would have no frame of reference. During this second visit I would set out to prove my theory, but since a helicopter rents for $1,000 per hour, my efforts would be conducted on foot.

Later in early October, I returned to Khe Sanh from Hanoi via the exact same Highway No. 1 south to Dong Ha. The traffic congestion was exactly the same as before. Aside from flying, the site can only be reached by driving west on Highway 9 (or QL 9 in the Vietnamese designation) from Dong Ha. Leaving Dong Ha, the traffic lessens and one passes very quickly through Cam Lo and quiet countryside and across a unique twisting bridge called Cau (for bridge) Dau Mau. While Camp Carroll is obscured, The Rockpile is clearly visible. At about Kilometer 50, one passes the intersection of Highway 14 with Highway 9, which is marked most notably by an impressive and recently constructed, cable-stayed bridge over the Rao Quan River. Then, further along Highway 9, at an acute and very dangerous switchback bend, one crosses another bridge over the Rao Quan River. This area posed a major bottleneck and serious threat to any vehicular traffic in 67/68. At about kilometer 58, one enters Hoang Hoa or Khe Sanh Village. Just inside the town, one turns right onto a very rocky road that proceeds generally north and west. There are signs that point the way to the "Vestiges of the Tacon Base" but they aren't very noticeable. Ta

The newly constructed cable-stayed bridge across the Rao Quan River and the intersection of Highways 9 and 14.

Cong (a different spelling) evidently is a name of a village that existed very near the combat base. About 4 kilometers or so along this rocky road there is a sign, partially obscured, that points to the right along another, this time, dirt road. The dirt road (really more of a path) is narrow and twists through the foliage and overhead canopy. Not too far along the dirt road, one catches the first glimpse of the base through the trees and coffee plants: the corner of a small building painted a dirty, faded yellow that is the museum and guest center and the hull of a tank with its turret and barrel still attached. Almost immediately after that first sighting, driving a bit further, one sees clearly the other monuments: the concrete column attesting to the heroics of the NVA, the propeller, and the 155mm howitzer which the Vietnamese at the museum claimed to be a 175. Immediately behind the museum, one can clearly see the profile of Hills 950 and 1015, which are the tallest hills in the area.

The museum area is located in a flat, relatively sparsely vegetated area. The small museum sits on the ground — there is no pavement. The building is rectangular in shape with a main room that is the museum itself, and a much smaller cramped adjoining room that serves as a refreshment area. There is only one door and two or three windows. Just behind the museum are the remains of the previously discussed red clay runway that points west in one direction and to the east more or less towards Highway 9 in the other. The area around the museum and the runway itself are heavily eroded. The juxtaposition of the museum and the runway could lead someone who was there years ago to believe that he or she is standing on the apron area of the USMC runway where C-130s and other aircraft parked.

The weather during this visit was balmy with clear blue skies and a soft wind that abated the high humidity. There was no fog but during the early morning, the vegetation was heavy with dew. It had rained in the area but on the base itself, it was quite dry and very dusty. The plateau on which the base is located and the surrounding valleys and hills were serene. The base was as quiet as I had remembered it to be several months earlier and seemed now to be even quieter, and in some sense, even more surreal. The sun was brilliant and the surrounding hills stood out in dramatic detail, seeming close enough to touch. The air was so clear that the swaying of the palm trees in the breeze on the distant hills could be clearly seen. The countryside was at least ten shades of deep green. Hills 950 and 1015 stood out in vivid detail, their majestic presence dominating the area. In striking contrast to the cerulean sky, they were bathed in emerald, so verdant was the landscape.

Aside from the people tending coffee plants, the entire area is virtually uninhabited. I saw only two huts with a small family in each. Knowing there is nothing conspicuously visible that would lead a person to know exactly where he or she is relative to what was established there in the 60s, I was still uncertain of my location during this second trip. Based on my research, I thought if I could locate it, there was possibly one feature from which other reference points could be identified — the remains of the destroyed ammunition dump which showed on the map to be on the south or right side of the runway when facing east. That had to be one landmark that should have withstood time and very possibly erosion. Surely I could find that. Taking the maps and the enlarged aerial photograph of the base with me, I walked easterly along the south edge of the red clay runway looking for the ammunition dump or remnants thereof. It had to be to my right if the maps were to be believed, and there was nothing to suggest the maps were incorrect. I found nothing where the ammunition dump would have been if the red clay runway was assumed to be the USMC runway and correctly positioned. I was puzzled but I continued walking east.

I crossed fence lines and I walked through rows of coffee plants to where I thought the aircraft eastern turn-around area was located. Walking any further I would have begun a steep descent, so I knew the runway probably did not extend much beyond this point. There is an area where a turn-around could have been established, but I could not find any evidence of a turn-around area, much less the ammunition dump. I did notice an area forward and to my left as I faced further east that seemed a more likely place for the turn-around, but this would have created a kink in the runway or placed the runway in an orientation at odds with the maps I was using. The area I was looking at some distance away seemed strange. Something remained amiss.

I walked in the direction of that area but turned back thinking I was being fooled. From this location, as I looked back towards the museum now hidden from view by vegetation, I could see Hill 861 perfectly for the first time, and I reflected on Dennis Mannion's visit to the hill last summer and his experiences on that same hill 30 years earlier. When Dennis arrived in Vietnam in 67/68 he had already heard about Hill 861. Ironically, within a few days of his arrival, he found himself atop Hill 861, where he and his comrades spent several months during the Siege. As it happened, one day within 20 minutes after being notified "to pack my shit," he was airlifted off Hill 861 for, I believe, an assaultof Hill 881N, vividly recounted in Murphy's and Ewing's books. Dennis never returned to Hill 861 until last summer.

Unexploded artillery shells at the bottom of the ammo dump.

I began to walk back towards the museum on the opposite side of the red clay runway, disconsolate that I could not verify any geographic point. I wiped the sweat from my face with my shirtsleeve because as I looked down at my papers and maps, the sweat that rolled off my face made them soggy and blurred as my notes were made in ink. After some distance I noticed a fully exposed artillery shell lying on the ground. I kneeled beside it and examined it without touching it. It was rusted dark brown and I noticed the nose was blunted, so I surmised the firing pin was missing, that the shell had never been armed. Further on, I noticed two more shells separated by about 18 inches lying fully exposed in the clay. They were the same size as the one I had previously spotted and I thought they were 105s. I wondered whether these could be from the exploded ammunition dump. I looked around, knowing now exactly what to look for, and I began spotting unexploded 105 and because of their larger diameter and size, 155mm shells. Donovan Webster reminded me of a book I recently read entitled "Aftermath: Remnants of War." In his book, Webster writes about the lasting effects of warfare on the ecology, that a new microenvironment is created by the impacts of war. Although he makes mention of Khe Sanh, what I was now witnessing on the ground before me called to my mind the chapter where he discussed the millions of artillery shells from World War I that litter eastern France.

The author surveying the ammo dump crater with Hills 950 and 105 in the background.

Ahead and to my right, I spotted a large depression and around the rim were various artillery and mortar shells, and something that I supposed was some sort of special hand or rifle-propelled grenade that was painted light blue. I walked into the depression, which is about 10 to 15 feet deep, and I found about 25 more unexploded artillery shells. I looked around from where I was standing in the crater and I spotted shells everywhere leading me to believe I was standing in the crater of the ammunition dump that incurred a direct hit. Although I had learned that the base was dismantled and demolished prior to the end of the war and that ordnance had been placed in excavations around the combat base and destroyed by dynamite, I felt certain I had located the ammunition dump that had been hit during the siege. I was satisfied that I was standing at the very historical core of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The crater is about 100 feet in diameter. With this landmark confirmed in my mind, I quickly realized that the red clay runway I originally thought was the USMC runway was an imposter, because the ammunition dump was on the wrong side of the red clay runway. This must have been the second runway to which Ray Stubbe had referred. Standing in the crater facing west, the USMC runway had to be to my right (north) because the maps showed the ammunition dump to be on the left (south) side of the runway. I took a bearing on the longitudinal axis of the imposter runway and turned 90 degrees toward Hills 950 and 1015 (more or less north) and walked in that direction through elephant grass and high foliage. Within 100 meters walking through the thick vegetation, I emerged into a large rectangular clearing and instead of the ground being covered in red clay soil, it was covered with crushed and compacted gray stone. This had to be the surface of the USMC runway or at least the subsurface over which the metal strips were placed because this gray rock was in stark contrast with the geology of the immediate area, which is basically lateritic clay. There is no geologic basis for this contrast of materials to occur naturally. Further, there was evidence of a tar covering which would act as a bonding and maybe a waterproofing agent for the aggregate. Knowing the USMC runway runs east/west, as does the red clay runway, I paced north and south until I found the limits or the edge of the crushed rock. I then divided this distance more or less in half and determined the midpoint of those limits. With this evidence and the correct juxtaposition or orientation of the ammunition dump relative to this newly discovered area, I knew I had found and was now standing on the centerline of the original USMC Khe Sanh runway (Picture L). From there, I walked to the turn-around area at the east end, which I had spotted earlier. It is now covered with coffee plants. Then I retraced my steps and I walked towards the western end but ran into thick overgrowth and could not see any more of the runway. A young Vietnamese man, probably about 18, provided me with shade from a leafy branch he had torn from a tree. Wherever I walked he walked just behind me holding the branch aloft over my head. He was my personal umbrella bearer. We tried to communicate but could not. Although I was grateful for this gesture, I laughed quietly because I walked so much faster than he did — he was always at a slight run behind me just to keep up. He motioned for me to slow down, but I am not a slow walker. Finally I turned left 90 degrees, and after walking about 100 meters re-intersected the red clay runway at a point somewhat east of the museum.

I walked back to the USMC runway and, looking at the aerial photograph, I was able to locate the path to the water point and a road or path that crosses the runway from one side of the base to the other. They are still there and clearly visible. The path to the water point is still very much in use. The helicopter revetment area is overgrown with eucalyptus trees and coffee plants and there is no evidence of its existence. I began to notice that the eucalyptus trees seemed to grow in a line that borders the USMC runway and I surmise the outline of the runway can be easily discerned by these tree lines. Exploring further, I found the outside USMC perimeter and defensive trenches on the northern side of the base, the side nearest the Rao Quan

River. The existence of landmines was on my mind but I figured if I was inside the perimeter and if I was observant and did not explore carelessly, I would be safe. I returned to the museum elated that I now had my bearings.

Inside the museum, I drank some tea that was offered to me in the side room off the main viewing and artifact collection area. The hawkers were present in and around the building in their usual numbers. Sipping the green tea, I looked at the weaponry placed in two piles on the floor and the photographs on the walls. The weaponry on display consisted of the usual M-16s, M-79 grenade launchers, an M-60 machine gun, a claymore mine, helmets and other gear. One photograph on the wall showed a night bombardment and the tracers and arcing rocket trails could be clearly seen. I wondered: How could those Marines have survived during the height of the bombardment? And again, the irony: here I am sipping tea in an area which 30 years earlier was shelled and rocketed incessantly for three months. I sat at the table in the middle of the room and now with the non-circulating stultifying, breathless air in the museum, sweat poured out of me. I spotted and reached for the guest register on the other side of the table and searched through the pages first for my signature of March 31st (which I found), and then that of Dennis Mannion, which I also located quite easily. In large emphatic letters, Dennis had written: "Let me get the facts straight. We, the Marines, left because we were through kicking ass in this area. I have much respect for the 15,000 plus NVA soldiers who died here. They were terrific, brave men — but they lost! Sorry, but that's the way it was." Dennis went on to add "wounded twice." I thumbed through the entries that had been made since the date of my first entry and I came across an emotional message written by the mother of a Marine who died at Khe Sanh in 1968. She had made the pilgrimage there, much the same as Dennis and others had, on behalf of her son and in an attempt to heal the wounds and perhaps bring closure to her own suffering. I found a clean page in the book and signed and dated the guest register a second time but still I could not find words to write that would convey my own impressions or express my feelings.

Hitching a ride on a motorbike at the museum, I went back to the notched end of the red clay runway. There is a small hut at the top of the embankment just beyond the end of the runway. Walking back to my right at about a 45-degree angle again toward Hills 950 and 1015, I located the western turn-around area of the USMC runway at the opposite end from the ammunition dump. Then, I walked back to the red clay runway through the vegetation and found myself face to face with the museum. Therefore, I think the museum is located on a line perpendicular to the longitudinal axis of the USMC runway extending generally in a southerly direction from the western turn-around area. And of course, the obvious conclusion: the eroded red clay runway that is adjacent to and clearly visible from the museum, is not the USMC runway. I had proved my theory. The red clay runway is parallel to the USMC runway but not as long. The western end of the new red clay runway (the notched end) is about 200, maybe 300 meters further west from the western turn-around area of the USMC runway. The notched end of the red clay runway is cut into the area, which I think was termed "The Ponderosa." The museum is actually at the western end of the combat base and south of the USMC runway. Interestingly, by accident, I discovered machine gun bunkers on the red clay runway, which would seem to indicate, as is a known fact, that the last occupants of the base were the North Vietnamese. Since they had no planes per se or helicopters and reportedly used Khe Sanh as a SAM site, they had no use for either runway in the traditional sense.

For those Vets returning to Khe Sanh after over thirty years who are not convinced of their orientation when visiting Khe Sanh and for first-time visitors who know nothing about the combat base, don't be fooled into thinking that the red clay runway is the USMC runway. If you are interested, when you arrive at the museum building from the road, proceed towards Hills 950 and 1015 (generally north) straight across the eroded red clay runway immediately behind the museum, continue through the trees and coffee plants, and you will find the original USMC runway. From there, other geographic locations on the base as might be remembered by vets should fall into place.

It's Time Now To Meet The People

A Tribute to the Veterans of Khe Sanh)

by Gary W. Foster

The insipid first line of the title belies the essence of this story. It could just as easily be entitled "What Khe Sanh Has Come to Mean to Me." Had it not been for the purchase of fake dog tags several years ago at Khe Sanh, the chances of my having met so many people who experienced something unique, along with the friendship that developed, would have been greatly diminished. In part, because of that specious, certainly improbable purchase, I have found the history of Khe Sanh and its geography and the history of those who served there fascinating as well as intriguing. I feel privileged to be able to visit Khe Sanh as often as I do, and I do not mind the self-imposed obligation to relate my own experiences to those who were there under far more hazardous circumstances than what I am exposed to today. This is my tribute to the Veterans of Khe Sanh.

Khe Sanh is just the physical place name of a small village in a remote corner of Quang Tri Province, Vietnam, but the utterance of those words conjures much more. What is the essence of a geographical location without the commensurate definition of the people that, by their actions alone, transformed the location into an event; an event of past, current, and — in the case of Khe Sanh — continuously recurring significance? Khe Sanh is more than a random point on a map in Southeast Asia. It is a place apart in the minds of thousands of Americans, who by happenstance, fought there in the late 60s. After so many years have passed, Khe Sanh — at least for a very few combatants — may have become intangible or may be just a vague notion. And for those less in years than 30, it has no significance. Khe Sanh is the Alamo, it is Custer's Last Stand, it's Bastogne, Aqaba, Rorke's Drift, Guignancourt, Dien Bien Phu; and it is Stalingrad. The onerous events that took place at these locations live in the past and have been swallowed by history, but they did occur. Like its predecessors before it, Khe Sanh would never have crawled out from obscurity had it not been for the tumultuous and violent clash that transpired there not so long ago.

No longer satisfied with email and telephone communications, the time was now at hand to pay my own personal respect to this unique group of individuals. I decided I would attend the USMC Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in Charleston, South Carolina. A strange decision maybe to some, since I myself am not a veteran but after so many visits to Khe Sanh within the last three years, and many contacts with Khe Sanh Veterans, perhaps I could offer something of interest. At least I would be attuned to some of the conversations. I would not be a total stranger — maybe an outsider but no stranger. Perhaps I could learn something. So before dawn on the Thursday before the Fourth of July, I put my suitcase filled with my clothes and all my Khe Sanh notes in my car and backed out of the garage. The air was hot and muggy and the smell of rain was in the air. The leaves on the oak trees in my yard did not stir, the air being that still. I flipped the air conditioner on and strapped myself in. As I left my driveway to make for the airport, sipping my coffee, I thought to myself, "It's time now to meet the people."

Who would I meet? John Pessoni, Ernie Spencer, Bob Arotta, Glenn Prentice, Tommy Eichler, Jim Wodecki, and maybe Jacob Krygoski to name a few. I had communicated with all of them in various forms. Ray Stubbe would not be there this year. And after so many conversations, running dialogues, and intense email exchanges with a complete stranger, I was especially looking forward to meeting Dennis Mannion who would be there with his family.

Two years prior, the reunion was held in Chicago. That would have been the perfect venue for me: a three-hour drive. But on the Fourth of July that year, on that very day, I was quite ironically and very literally in Khe Sanh.

I made my connecting flight to Charleston in Chicago. While I waited I visited a bookstore and saw Tom Brokaw's book "The Greatest Generation." I have seen that book for over a year and intend to read it but have not yet gotten around to it. I almost bought the book to read on the plane, but I have so many books to read I decided not to. I arrived in Charleston from Chicago about 2:00pm.

The South Carolina dead-of-summer sultry heat hit me like a ton of bricks. Man, was it hot! Man, was it humid! The tall pines prevented any breeze. I retrieved my rental car and made for the hotel. Not easy to locate I discovered. Every time I asked for directions, the people 1 asked pointed in the direction from which I had just come. But eventually I did find the hotel and checked in — room 108, ground level, facing the front parking lot filled with cars and trucks, some with small USMC flags. There were American flags, the occasional yellow and red striped flag of South Vietnam, KS insignias and inscriptions, USMC bumper stickers, and other Vietnam era memorabilia. My room was located directly beneath a very large USMC flag that hung over the outside railing two floors above. I was reminded of my neighbor who died recently. He was a Marine during World War II and was wounded three times on Iwo Jima, survived, served throughout the war, and was highly decorated. He displayed a large USMC flag from a tall flagpole in his front yard. The flag was never lowered and was always lit at night. His name was Dale Plummer.

Many of the Vets had taken the tour of Parris Island, so the lobby of the hotel was more or less empty except for Tommy Eichler slaving away at his computer over some aspect of the reunion. I had met Tommy a year earlier in Chicago, and we recognized each other. "Gary! Welcome," Tommy said and then abruptly, "Thanks for becoming a lifetime member of the association." I was surprised that he remembered. I had decided in the early spring to join the Khe Sanh Veterans Associations on a lifetime basis, as opposed to year to year, in support of the association and the people with whom I had communicated. We talked for about an hour. I met John Corbett, who was selling his new book "West Dickens Avenue." Even though I didn't buy Brokaw's book in Chicago, I decided I would buy Corbett's book but not that day. The title intrigued me. Since there were few vets milling around, I decided I wanted to be outside and explore Charleston. So I drove downtown.

I went to Battery Park and Patriots Point. I visited an aircraft carrier, the USS Yorktown (CV10), which I would visit again the next day. I ate downtown and did some shopping. I returned to the hotel around 7:00pm or so. There were some vets around the bar, but the tour from PI had not yet returned. I went to my room and took a shower. After dressing, I looked outside and I saw that the buses had returned and were disgorging their passengers. I knew Dennis Mannion and John Pessoni were among them, so I walked to the lobby.

The first person I met was John Pessoni, "Big John," who, without hesitation gave me a big hug and lifted me off the ground. I had brought him some red clay from Khe Sanh a few months earlier and he wanted to thank me in person. He had warned me by email that he would give me a big hug — and he did.

Then I saw Dennis Mannion (Hill 861, Kilo 3/26) laughing and talking with a group of people. I couldn't mistake him. He was exactly as I envisioned him from photographs and videotapes he sent to me. Now it was my turn. I walked up to Dennis and gave him a big bear hug and lifted his sturdy frame completely off the ground. We laughed a lot. Our friendliness towards one another, conceived through email and lengthy telephone conversations, immediately congealed, I am sure, into a permanent friendship that over the course of the next three days would become even more solidified. I don't believe I have ever met a more engaging person with more enthusiasm about a topic as was Dennis about Khe Sanh. I met Dennis' wife, Joan and his third son, Devin. Dennis and Devin and I migrated into the hospitality suite where I found a beer or three and listened intently as Dennis openly discussed and reminisced about Khe Sanh, all the while and without missing a beat, energetically pointing to all the photos and maps he had placed on the wall. Some of these I had sent to him. I believe he engaged everyone in conversation and was obviously enthralled to be there. I have never seen a more animated person or anyone with more alacrity.

I met people who were on Hill 950 who never saw Hill 861, I met 881ers who never saw 558 and vice versa. I met people who were at the east end of the base and never saw the west end. I met people who lived and slept with their mortars and never left a 10-foot diameter circle. I met people who remembered the intensity of the incoming shells matching the rainfall. I met people who were on the perimeters and never saw anything of the interior of the base. It never dawned on me but as a member of a unit, you were where your unit was stationed and nowhere else. I never took time to ponder the logistics. I thought a person could just walk all over the base. Not so. You had your fighting position and that was it. That, in it, would be a tedious existence. I met people who were close enough to the NVA to smell them. I met people who killed them and who were wounded by them or stood right next to someone who had been killed by them. I met a man who threw three grenades at once and rattled on the table with his fists three times: boom, boom... boom, imitating the sounds of the grenades as they detonated. I heard of a Marine who was killed within hours of arriving at Khe Sanh.

I remember a story about a Marine who told me he was on one of the hills and for some reason, he visited the combat base for a few days. The base took some incoming rounds and he ducked for cover. He noticed no one else around him was seeking cover, so he made some comment to that effect and was told, "Naw, that's at the other end of the base."

I heard seemingly imponderable stories of men being killed by shrapnel smaller than a BB, and I heard horrific stories of men being blown to bits — there one second and gone the next. I learned how, after an intense barrage of NVA artillery and rockets, the base would be covered with a patina of gray from the shrapnel. I would read about the same phenomenon in John Corbett's book.

I learned more about the geography of the base and the surrounding areas. We talked about the water point, the revetments, the clouds, the rain, the red mud, Charlie Med, and Recon. Still not sure about the significance of Recon and how it differs from other divisions or battalions. We talked about Lang Vei and how the Bru and Montagnards gathered at the gates of the combat base to try to get in after Lang Vei was overrun and destroyed in early February 1968.

The hospitality suite was a great place to interact, but one can't be shy among this group. Conversations continued. I learned about artillery and rockets. Artillery shells are always on range or distance but can drift left or right of target. Rockets are always on the right azimuth but their trajectory is sometimes long or short. I learned about a special small howitzer on 861 that could be used as a mortar, but the shell would rip end over end during its parabolic arc and then tumble harmlessly down the hill. It wasn't very effective.

Conversations lasted well past midnight and like an artillery shell not quite on its mark, I drifted to and from the central bar area where I met Ernie Spencer, Bob Arotta, and Glenn Prentice. "Big John" and I bumped into each other again, and I don't believe I purchased a beer all night. I felt immediately at home with these guys and I did not hesitate to introduce myself to anyone and everyone. Each vet had a tale to tell, and I listened intently. I, too, told of my own Khe Sanh experiences in a situation more favorable to one's health than what the vets found themselves in 35 years earlier. The entire hotel lobby area was packed with former US Marines, and it held a plethora of USMC emblems, uniforms, KS hats, USMC shirts, flags, bumper stickers, books, jackets, etc. I was afloat, ashore, and awash with the USMC. I got caught up in the swirl. It was interesting and it was fun. I was thrilled I had come to Charleston. No doubt about it — I was at the Khe Sanh Reunion.

Many Vets thanked me for the articles I have contributed to Red Clay over the last few years. It's the least I can do and if the readers find what I write interesting, then terrific. I have no personal history with the Marines other than what I have read. But I do know this and I don't think it can be refuted. Each Marine knows they are first in battle for the United States and are proud of that fact, Each Marine knows they are either hated or liked, but each Marine knows they are respected. Each Marine is imbued with the special history of the Marine Corps, of warfare and battles, and reputation and image, and service to country. And each Marine knows that he or she will give 110%. Finally, each Marine believes that he or she is the best the country has to offer. I believe this too.

The Fourth of July, Friday, my second day at the reunion. Well, let's see. Breakfast started with a beer. So far so good. Then I began meeting more people. I met people who were on various hills, and we talked at length. People were from every state of the Union. I met Dennis again and we continued conversations that had started the day before. I studied maps, looked at photos, saw "Big John," and visited with Glenn Prentice. Glenn travels often to Vietnam to help install a water treatment plant in a small village, I think in QTP (Quang Tri Province). I noticed for the first time the USMC flags of the three battalions, (is that right?) of the 26th Marines 1/26, 2/26, and 3/26. All three were at Khe Sanh together.

Around 10:00am, I wanted to go back into Charleston and visit the Yorktown again, which I did. I ate at a French restaurant downtown, and I continued to explore the city. Charleston is a terrific place. I returned to the hotel later in the afternoon and visited with Tommy Eichler. Dennis was in the hospitality suite, and I talked with him for an hour or two, and we agreed he and his family and I would go together to a restaurant downtown that night. Dennis, Joan, Devin and I dined at High Cotton and enjoyed probably the most delicious meal any of us can remember. Talk of Khe Sanh over dinner was minimal, most assuredly to Joan's relief.

Day three, Saturday. Up long before dawn, I explored Folly Beach in the early morning hours and visited the downtown area one more time. I returned to the hotel around 10:00am. There were more conversations about Khe Sanh — some I had heard and some were new. I visited with Peter James, Ed Miles, and Bob Harrison about their experiences on Hill 950. At least, I think all three individuals were on Hill 950. They recalled times when the clouds were so low that they could not see the combat base. The base had vanished. Hills 861 and 881 stuck up through the clouds like islands. They saw rockets being fired from NVA positions that arced up out of the clouds and then back down through the cloud layer into the heart of the base, the explosions lighting up the underside of the clouds causing an eerie visual sensation. They witnessed air strikes with bombs, rockets, and napalm. They saw helicopter crashes, and they watched as two F-4 pilots ejected from their crippled Phantom jet which careened through the sky pilotless, exploding in a large orange mushroom against a mountainside. The night sky was like a fireworks display with explosions occurring on the base. The trailing exhaust of the incoming NVA rockets looked like Roman candles or moving torches. The vets talked about attacks on Hill 1015 and how the NVA were everywhere — in the ravines, on the side of the hill, in the bush — everywhere infested. I did not realize that the Marine contingency on Hill 950 was so small. It seemed to me they would have been easily overwhelmed, but they weren't even though many intense firefights ensued.

Dennis and I disputed a Marine about the presence of the USS New Jersey in 1968. Uh, I fell silent because I did not know many facts about the ship's deployment. Not so, Dennis. He knew them all. But I did know one thing: The New Jersey's guns could not reach Khe Sanh from the sea. The guns' range is about 30 miles maybe less, and the distance from Cua Viet Port (on the coast) to Khe Sanh is at least 30 to 40 miles. I've been to both places many times. The New Jersey had to operate in water deep enough to maneuver and it had to stay out of range of coastal NVA guns. I would imagine it sat about 8 to 10 miles off shore, maybe more. So, no way. Dennis and I looked at each other and simultaneously, without prompting, said out loud in unison, "Can't reach that far." Dennis and I still talk about that coincidence.

Later in a private conversation, Dennis talked about life after the Marines. When he returned to the U.S. and was discharged, he continued his education at the University of Connecticut. He remembered no one would sit next to him. He was surrounded by empty chairs as students moved away from the Marine veteran who had served in that nasty, unpopular little war somewhere in Southeast Asia. No one would talk to him. I heard many other similar accounts. Years ago, my neighbor at my fraternity house at UC Davis, who flew CH-53s in and out of Khe Sanh during the Siege but subsequently left the Marine Corps for university, was something of a curiosity, more to be avoided. We became very good friends. I could always tell he felt ill at ease among the students there, but I don't recall that ever haunting him. His name was Mike Webb.

After lunch at Hooters (had to go to Hooters), Dennis, Devin, Glenn Prentice, and I decided to drive downtown to see the Huntley, a Confederate submarine that sank in 1864 during the Civil War. It had been located in or near Charleston harbor and recently had been recovered. That was an interesting experience and one that we all found very moving. There were artifacts and plenty of historical dialogue. The bodies of the crew were found rather well preserved and were removed from the sub and placed in a morgue located within the large building constructed for the purpose of preserving the remains of the submarine. The bodies are being examined and will be buried with full military honors in the Spring of 2004. Dennis and Devin are planning to attend the ceremony. The sub itself sits in a large tank of circulating fresh water. The presenter there, I believe who is called a docent, said the reverse osmosis or dialysis, or whatever, would take about 5 to 8 years. To keep the metal from deteriorating, the salt has to be removed from the metal fiber and after being submerged for 140 years; it would take a long time to extract the salt from the hull.

Later back at the hotel, I met John Corbett (who goes by Jack) again, and I purchased his book, which he willingly autographed. I read it two weeks later on a plane bound for Hanoi from Hong Kong. I am sure I have been in the area of the Khe Sanh Combat Base he refers to as "West Dickens Avenue." Corbett's account is outstanding and adds much to my understanding of the Siege as witnessed from near the extreme perimeter of the combat base. On a personal level, Corbett's book augments the overview accounts of Pisor, Prados, and Stubbe in their respective in-depth accounts of both the Siege and the fight for Khe Sanh. It should be read by everyone.

I thought some Vets would be interested in my own Khe Sanh notes, so I brought my three-ring binder to show them my interest and the maps I used to spot Hills 861, 881, 950, and 1015, and to tell them how, using an aerial photograph given to me by Ray Stubbe, I located the original USMC east/west runway. It's still there but overgrown. I have walked it several times.

The ceremonial banquet was held that night at the hotel. For the first time in my life, I met a recipient of the Congressional Medal of Honor, and I was honored to have my photograph taken with him. His name is Jon Cavaiani. I sat with Glenn Prentice and Dennis Mannion and his family. The level of conversation at the banquet was at a high pitch and I felt in awe of the reunion and all the remembrances, even if the banquet room was physically too small and a bit disjointed.

After dinner, I had one beer at the bar with Bob Arotta. Earlier in the day, Bob received an award for his efforts during the Siege calling in artillery and close air support on Hill 881S. He was only 19 years old. John Pessoni wanted to buy me another drink, but I do not like to travel in the early morning hours after a night of imbibing and I begged off. Uh, probably not a good move in the presence of Marines. I returned home — so ended my first ever Khe Sanh reunion.

Reflecting now, what are my impressions? What am I to make of this memorable experience and gathering of men? First, the pride among the USMC Vets was evident. Here's a vague thought I have had for the last two years, which crystallized, in my mind at the reunion. When someone joins the military, he or she cannot choose the war. "Uh, Korea. I don't like that one. I'll wait for the next one." Or maybe, "Afghanistan? No, not that one either. I'll wait for another one more to my liking." We never know, any of us, what the future holds and where we will find ourselves. We must accept some things sometimes and persevere. And this is what makes the Khe Sanh Veteran unique and this is why the reunion, and the association are important and special.

I gained many other impressions but I believe the impression that is etched in my mind is this. I also know another group of veterans of Khe Sanh, but they are not Marines. They are veteran Bo Doi — NVA who I have met. They are equally proud of their service to their country, as are US Marines to the USA. But unlike the American serviceman, after the war the government of Vietnam gave them a ribbon from which dangles a medal stamped out of the lid of a tin can. Veteran soldiers of North Vietnam have no benefits. None. No pension. Nothing. Just their pride. We are fortunate to live in the United States.

What of the people I met at the reunion? These are true Americans in the best sense and tradition of the word. I heard concerns but very few complaints; in fact, I am not sure I heard one. I met a tall man named Mickey (I think that was his name) who wore Harley Davidson attire. Not my choice of clothes but who cares? Each to his own. I talked with this giant of a man and I found him engaging and concerned about many issues, PTSD not being the least of them. PTSD was a common topic among all the vets. He said, "Sometimes I feel estranged because of Vietnam. I feel I cannot connect. I wish I could make some friends. My wife is my best friend but sometimes I feel so different among general people." Mickey just wanted to talk and be with people who understood him and who shared the same issues, good and bad. He had just completed, I think, his third or fourth "Run for the Wall," which he said is a very grueling undertaking. He began attending the annual Khe Sanh reunion to become re-acquainted with his own kind. That seems totally understandable, and what Mickey said touched me to the core. These people, just like me, are human with the same desires, fears, hopes, despair, optimism, concerns, and insecurities, all enclosed within the day-to-day grapple of life. I was witnessing a lasting, invisible bond among hearty, good meaning men and their families, which perhaps is taken for granted among their own kind but which I appreciated immediately. The comradeship is very deep.

There is an obelisk in Norfolk, Virginia. It marks the celebration of the 100th reunion of the soldiers of the Confederate army of the Civil War — I believe, the Army of Northern Virginia to be exact. Out of an army of over a million men, there were only four still living that attended and their names were inscribed on the obelisk that was erected in 1965 to mark the occasion of the reunion. These men are now gone from this earth. The Khe Sanh reunion is a living, vibrant historical event for me in a very current, poignant way. If put into a broader time perspective, like the last gathering of the Confederate soldiers in Norfolk, in another 65 years there will be only a handful of Khe Sanh Veterans able to attend the reunion or who will even be alive to recount the events of 1968. The events surrounding Khe Sanh must be remembered and everyone needs to thank Ray Stubbe, Ernie Spencer, Jim Wodecki, and Tommy Eichler, and many others for making all this possible. I also have to thank all the Marine vets who made the reunion so worthwhile and colorful for me.

At the corner of Bethany Home and 16th street in Phoenix, AZ — north central Phoenix to be exact — is a restaurant named "Texaz" (with a "z," not an "s"). They serve the best chicken fried steak in the area, and my family and I often dine there. It's an eclectic restaurant, with a myriad of things on the walls and shelves: license plates, bumper stickers, hats, calling cards, beer signs, and Texas memorabilia. It's not a chain restaurant like Bennigan's but a genuine restaurant, which is why I am sure it's so popular. There are two items in the restaurant that carry some significance. First is a replica of the first flag of Texas pinned to the ceiling. The initial flag of Texas, which flew on the border with Mexico as the state was struggling for independence, did not contain a star. Rather, it was a rectangular Rag with a white field and on the white field there was the profile of a black cannon, and I think, a cannonball. Beneath the cannon's profile, the Texans wrote four words: "Come and Take it." Not a subliminal message, the challenge is clear. If you think you want this land, just come and try to take it. I often think of that flag in the context of the Siege of Khe Sanh.

Secondly, opposite the main door to the restaurant behind the first row of booths, there is an adjoining booth that seats four people. On the partition that separates that booth from the neighboring booth, there are a few mementos. There are two license plates: one from Texas that says "ADL1132" and another from Arizona that says "4RMULE," evidently meaning, "For Our Mule" — not sure about the reference. On the other side, there is a sign from the New Mexico Farm Bureau indicating Erma Trujillo, evidently a member of the bureau, as a property owner. And attached to the middle partition just above the table, are two identical license plates from New Hampshire with the letters "BI-T-T-Y" But what is important is not the identification letters but the slogan written above it. "Live Free or Die." I often repeat these words to myself that we are free. We are a free country, but we are free only because of a handful of people who have made it so and who continue to make it so today. These individuals have insured, by their own personal sacrifice, that other Americans can and will live in freedom. It is the measure of the United States Marines who are no small part of this contribution. In my mind, the Marines fought and held on because of us at home. They also fought because they had to for their own survival and that of their comrades. I am sure in the heat of the Siege, no one there thought "Man, we are really fighting for the people back home." Of course not. But if one looks at the continuum of the US Marines and their history and not at any one isolated event, again it is clear, certainly to me, that they fought for us and for our country. For this, every American should be grateful. I am.

My only souvenir of the reunion, other than Jack Corbett's book, is a small rectangular gold and black lapel pin that reads "KHE SANH." I wore it on the lapel of my suit at the Saturday night banquet and I wore it on my shirt collar when I returned to Chicago the next day. I wanted to buy a hat and a shirt that said "Khe Sanh" but to be honest, I thought wearing them would be a bit presumptuous on my part, and I decided I would leave that to those who actually served there. It is, after all, to their credit and in their honor.

Just before retiring for the last evening in Charleston, I still had some packing to do. I spotted Dennis Mannion and his family and I wanted to say goodbye. Dennis and I talked for about 20 minutes and gave each other a big hug. "You're a hero, Dennis," I said, to which he quickly responded, "No, I'm not." I was taken by his immediate response and humbleness, but I read into it a larger message: these Marines unwittingly found themselves at a location and at a juncture in time and at a time of their own lives when they could have run or stayed to fight. They chose not to run. "Never have, never will," I believe I read somewhere. They made the best of a lousy situation and fought. Who could do or be better? "Semper Fi" is the code by which they live and the code by which they die. I attended another military reunion this summer. When I saw the Marine color guard, I made it a point to walk right up to each one of them and say "Thank you. You guys are the best." When I visit Khe Sanh, and I have since the reunion, the place will assume a deeper meaning for me and I will repeat each time I am there: "Never have. Never will," in honor of the Marines I met at Charleston. I am not sure why, but while driving home and thinking of the reunion, the events that made it possible, and the reason behind its existence, the lyrics of a song by Mike and the Mechanics popped into my head, "Bring my spear. Invest it with my youth."

In Chicago's O'Hare Airport (ORD), I passed the same bookstore I had visited on my way to Charleston a few days earlier and I saw the same display copy of Tom Brokaw's book "The Greatest Generation." I thought about the contents of the book, and I reflected on the meaning of the title. The title suggests that a comparison is being drawn with other generations of Americans who had fought before and after World War II. It's difficult to imagine that Americans in other wars were somehow less great. In many ways, World War II brought out the true essence of being an American and revealed the best of America. That they fought for America for no other reason than loyalty to their country was evident. In selflessly answering the call to arms, they represented one of America's great generations and should be honored as such. They earned their due without question. However, Brokaw's use of the word "greatest," a superlative adjective, bothers me. With no intentions of denigrating anyone who has served in the American military and although I will probably read the book someday, I felt no need to buy and read it now. But if comparisons are to be drawn, in Charleston, South Carolina, at the United States Marine Corps Khe Sanh Veterans reunion, over the 4th of July weekend, 2003, assuming use of the same superlative adjective, I believe I met America's greatest generation.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE: The article by Gary Foster detailing his relationship with Khe Sanh Veterans and his subsequent experience at the reunion in Charleston S.C., is one of the best written pieces on this subject I have ever read. If any of our members fail to consider coming to a reunion after reading it, is beyond comprehension. Gary put in words what most of us experience when we get together. Being a civilian, he brings a whole new perspective to the reunion experience. If he can feel the way he does about his relationship with the organization, w as brothers who have actually experienced Khe Sanh, should have the same feelings ten-fold.

A Short History of FLC-FLSG-A, LSU at the Khe Sanh Combat Base

by James "Jimbo" Wodecki

Unknown and Louis Naple (rt.), who painted FLC sign

After the initial landing near Danang in March 1965, Marine strengths continued to grow until two reinforced divisions and a reinforced aircraft wing, comprising III MAF, were situated between Chu Lai and the DMZ. FLSG-A supported the 3rd Marine Division, and FLSG-B supported 1st Marine Division Forces. Two FLSUs operated at Dong Ha and Phu Bai. FLSG-A was re-designated from FLSG on March 15, 1966. Its subordinate units were charged with supporting 3rd Marine Division troops from Phu Bai to the DMZ. LSU's were established at Phu Bai, Dong Ha, Hue and Khe Sanh. These LSUs were designated Sub Units 1-5. Supply Battalion was established within the FLC structure at Camp Books in February 1967, and provided a most vital link in accomplishing the FLC mission. The 7th Separate Bulk Fuel Company dispensed more than 76 million gallons of petroleum products from fuel points throughout MR-1. Ration Company was charged with procuring and issuing food. Marines unable to visit mess halls received close to 11 million Individual Combat Meals in just a 13-month period alone. The bakery made and distributed more than 12 million doughnuts and almost 23 million pounds of bread. The Battalions ASPs #1 and #2 dispensed ordnance ranging from 5.56mm rounds for M-16 rifles to 175mm shells for artillery guns.

FLC's ammo dump at Khe Sanh in 1966.

EOD Marines recovered over 449,000 deadly U.S. and enemy explosive items, disarming and destroying 95,000 of them. The battalion's Retrograde Facility, charged with the shipping of all classes of excess or damaged gear to other commands, transferred hundreds of thousands of measured tons of equipment. Maintenance Battalion was established in February 1967 and was originally located at the Danang Air Base until commitments grew too large and space too small. In 1969, repair sections began moving to Camp Books.

At Motor Maintenance Company, more than 4,235 vehicles were repaired and returned to their parent organizations. Battalion Service Maintenance processed nearly 5,700 work requests on items ranging from typewriters to canvas. Communications/ Electronic Maintenance Company had repaired more than 40,000 damaged items. Ordnance Maintenance Company had replaced more than 1,600 barrels on small arms and artillery guns in addition to refinishing other pieces. Engineer Maintenance Company provided maintenance support for three Force Engineer Battalions, two Division Engineer Battalions, and all engineer equipment organic to III MAF. Over 8,000 work requests were processed. H&S Battalion was formed in February 1967. Among its many duties, the transportation of cargo in support of combat operations and regulating administrative functions ranked high on the list. While transporting two million tons of cargo in support of 1st and 3rd Marine Division Operations, Truck Company ground out over 11 million miles. Communication Company, FLC's communications link with the world, handled 12 million transmissions, both incoming and outgoing on their complex computerized transmitters. Perhaps one of the greatest achievements by U.S. personnel in relation to Civic Action, was the construction of the spacious, 120-bed Hoa Khahn Children's Hospital at Camp Books. Just a few "Pogues" doing their job, so you grunts could function properly in the field. Glad we could help.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE: FLC also received two Navy Unit Commendations for their achievements. I have posted them in the newsletter, and Jimbo and I will reproduce them on parchment paper for those who wish one. With the citations is a list of the units eligible for each citation as well as the dates you would have to have been with the unit. Most FLC members qualify for both.

FORCE LOGISTIC COMMAND

For Service as set forth in the following
CITATION:

For exceptionally meritorious achievement in the performance of outstanding service with the III Marine Amphibious Force in the Republic of Vietnam from 12 March 1965 to 15 March 1967. Demonstrating an exceptional degree of professionalism and aggressiveness, this provisionally organized command rapidly collected its limited assets to provide combat service support to the Force as it grew from strength of 5,000 to more than 75,000. The constant effort to overcome maintenance, transportation, and supply problems associated with over 23,000 items of combat essential equipment, aggravated by severe climatic conditions of heat, dust, monsoon rains, and mud, coupled with the rigors of a sustained combat environment were highly significant to the successful accomplishment of the mission of the III Marine Amphibious Force. Noteworthy was the efficient manner in which the Force Logistic Command responded to the frequent geographical shifts of troops, and equipment over great distances within the I Corps Tactical Zone. The proper and efficient provision of combat service support to the Force during the lateral movement of the First and Third Marine Divisions in October 1966, a move involving more than thirty thousand troops, and their organic equipment was particularly outstanding. Additionally, the Force Logistic Command was responsible for establishment, operation and support of the III Marine Amphibious Force Transient Facility, which through extensive expert detailed planning and foresight of the Force Logistic Command, rapidly expanded from a facility capable of accommodating 500 transients a month to a facility currently accommodating more than 20,000 transients a month. The distinguished accomplishment contributed significantly to the high state of morale, health, welfare, and comfort of combat and combat support troops within the III Marine Amphibious Force Tactical responsibilities. The effective teamwork, indomitable spirit, and loyal devotion to duty of the men of the Force Logistic Command made very significant contributions to the combat achievements in the I Corps Tactical Zone and were in keeping with the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

All Personnel serving with the FORCE LOGISTIC COMMAND during the period as set forth below are authorized to wear the Navy Unit Commendation Ribbon.

FORCE LOGISTIC COMMAND

For Service as set forth in the following
CITATION:

For exceptional meritorious service while serving with the III MAF in the Republic of Vietnam during the period from 16 March 1967 to 31 May 1968. Demonstrating an exceptional degree of professionalism and aggressiveness in providing support for the III MAF, and the Force Logistics Command, and the 2nd Brigade, Republic of Korea Marines, the officers and men of the Force Logistics Command despite adverse weather conditions, and continually difficult lines of communication, provided Supplies in support of 72 major operations, in I Corps Tactical Zone. Especially noteworthy was the efficient manner in which the Force Logistics Command responded to the increased demands on all supply channels during the re-supply of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, and the rapid build up of friendly forces from 75,000 to 138,000 personnel with the addition of two Army divisions, plus a division equivalent of Army Support Forces during the Tet offensive. Force Logistics Command accomplished Western Pacific MILSTRIP/MILSTRAP Accounting System and the successful conversion to data processing to provide additional and more efficient support in the fields of personnel, supply, and maintenance support to the combat forces in the I CORPS Tactical Zone, the Force Logistics established the only data communication terminal north of Danang to facilitate the processing of supply demands. The Force Logistics Command provided legal service to 18,000 officers and men in Danang area and budgeting and financial management functions for nine external organizations in addition to internal units. Personal effects and baggage processing for medically evacuated Marines and operations of the II MAF Amphibious Forces Transient facility continued in an outstanding manner, contributing significantly to the moral, health, welfare, and comfort of combat and combat support troops. By their loyal devotion to duty, the officers and men of Force Logistics Command upheld the highest tradition of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval service.

My Personal History With 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines and Their Service at Khe Sanh

by Gordon H. Hebert M/CO 3/9

The Early Days

In a way, I was lucky with my mode of transportation getting to the war. They put me on a commercial jetliner. A nice alternative to a troop ship. These ships, as I later found out, were extremely cramped and it took 28 days to make the trip. By the time I arrived in Danang, the guys who left by boat on the same day would not arrive for another 27 more days.

When the doors opened at Danang, it was like a blast furnace. I was aware Southeast Asia was hot, but I didn't know that at certain times of the year, 120 degrees was not uncommon. Danang in 1966 was the busiest airport in the world. The flurry of activity was horrendous. Unlike O'Hare or Kennedy Airports, the second and third busiest, everybody at Danang was armed and instead of airliners coming and leaving at a rapid rate, the majority of the traffic was F-105 Thunderchiefs and F-4F Phantoms. It didn't take long to realize I was in a whole new world.

I originally had orders to report to 2nd Battalion, 4th Marines up at the DMZ. When I arrived at Danang, they informed me that 2/4 had been nearly wiped out the previous week and had been pulled from the field. I was now to report to 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines. We were rounded up rapidly and were taken by helicopters to An Hoa, a village about 25 miles southwest of Danang, where 3/9 maintained its headquarters. The helicopter ride provided our first good look at the countryside.

It was exactly as had always been portrayed, shades of green covering the spectrum, water standing in rice paddies, interlaced by streams and rivers. Peasants with water buffaloes were working the fields. Fighting in this area had been quite fierce several months before but was fairly light at the time (November 10, 1966). During the flight I had a conversation with the machine gunner at the door of the chopper. He said that most KIA's in Vietnam occurred during the first two weeks in country, before one had time to become accustomed to common sense precautions. Later, I wondered if the Marines paid him to say that to the incoming troops.

The next day came time for 3/9 to issue its new arrivals their weapons. We were taken out to an area near the base and issued M-14 rifles. The one the ordnance man gave me, looked as though it had been stored in a barrel of brine. It was so badly rusted that I refused to test fire it. At this time, I found out about the Marine-issued mosquito repellent. A fellow who had been there a while took a look at my M-14 and said," You need some bug juice." "Damn stuff won't do a damn thing for bugs, but it'll clean the hell out of a rifle." With some skepticism, I took his advice. Boy, was he right. It took off everything, rust, bluing, and all. My rifle was suddenly bright silver instead of the dull blue it should have been or the rust red it had been. I was a little concerned about it giving away my location to the enemy, but I would soon find out this was a common color.

The following day we mounted trucks to go to our assigned units. I was assigned to Mike Company 3/9, which was stationed several miles away at a little outpost called Phu Loc 6. Don't ask me where they came up with that name. Phu Loc 6 was a miserable place. When I got there, 1st platoon, to which I had been assigned, was out running a patrol, so there wasn't much to do right away. In the late afternoon, I was sitting down, leaning my back against an old overturned boat, watching the sun set and taking in my new world. Suddenly, from a tree line in front of me, a shot rang out and a bullet hit a couple of inches from my head, denting the boat. I scrambled around to the other side and started thinking about that gunner on the helicopter.

Shortly afterward the outfit got back from patrol and I first met the guys. I told my new squad leader, Sergeant Charlie Fury from Boston what just happened. The He said, "Yeah, we got a sniper out there, cranks off just one round every day about 5:30. Never have been able to catch him. Fortunately, he's not that good a shot. Fury was the leader of a pretty salty outfit, which called itself the 2nd Squad "Gonads." Fury — quite a name for a Sergeant in the Marine Corps. Charlie was nothing like his name would indicate. He was small and quite frail for a Marine and most of the men called him Charlie-the-Tuna.

On November 12, we heard that two nights before on the Marine Corps birthday, another unit was celebrating the event more than they should have. After the party broke up, security was not what it should have been, and a small group of VC sappers snuck into the perimeter and killed a number of Marines in the CP.

One of the more notable characters assigned to my new outfit; was a machine gunner who was known as "The Old Man." The old man was a gentleman about 28 years old from Atlanta, Ga. He was not a big man by any means but had a remarkable ability to handle his M-60 machine gun. I was told a story of one of his exploits in the first few days when I was at Phu Loc. During a big operation, in the days when this area had been quite active, the old man and his M-60 observed a fleeing band of VC crossing a bamboo bridge. The M-60 tends to rise when being fired held in one's hands. The old man, however had a method of controlling this effect and he held the M-60 steady as he mowed down the whole troop on the bridge.

Fighting was not heavy at the time in this region, but there were some pretty interesting occurrences in these early days in Vietnam. We ran several relatively large operations into what was considered to be "Indian country," where the chances of contact were greater than Phu Loc 6. One of my early memories is of one such operation when crossing a large field of rice paddies. We were hit with an ambush from a tree line about 100 yards away. Miraculously, no one was hit and we all ran to the opposite tree line and busted through. Everyone found cover and began to return the fire.

Tom Jenkins, our radioman, took cover in a water bull hooch. He was too preoccupied with what was going on in front of him to notice that the hooch was occupied. Only when he heard a snorting and a frantic pawing on the ground did he turn around. When he did, he saw two very red, narrow eyes in the head of one of the largest Water Bulls any of us had ever seen. This guy had horns that looked like the front of a Buick. At this moment he made his charge and lifted Jenkins up and out of his home. Jenkins still had the large military radio on his back. Like a turtle turned over, Jenkins struggled to no avail. By this time, the water bull was coming out of the hooch to finish Jenkins off. Alertly, one of our point men, Alton Smith, spotted the danger Jenkins was in and emptied a 20 round clip into the behemoth. I think it cost the Marine Corps $200.

This was not the only run-in Jenkins had with water buffaloes. It is a wonder that Jenkins was able to maintain his wonderful sense of humor. Something about Jenkins infuriated water bulls. He never met a water bull that didn't hate him. A few days later we were spread out, sweeping a large field. A single water bull in the field made a beeline for Jenkins. Jenkins had developed a little dance he called the "Liberty Road Shuffle" that never failed to crack us up, which Groucho Marx must have inspired. This day he did the Liberty Road Shuffle in triple time, in tight circles until the water bull got tired of it and gave up. It took a long time before we quit laughing and resumed the sweep.

At this time and for a long time, we had two point men. We were fortunate to have two of the best. Our day point was Smitty, who had eyes like a hawk, good reflexes, and judgment. The night point was Tom Ike, a round-faced little guy with very thick glasses. He had an incredible temper, and nothing failed to upset him. I liked him at once. This Yosemite Sam from rural New Jersey had a sixth sense about the night. His navigational skills were phenomenal. Ironically, both Smitty and Ike later lost their lives in combat while not walking the point.

On these operations, there was a lot of walking involved. Walking in this sector of Vietnam meant crossing numerous rice paddies. Rice paddy dikes were treacherously slippery and difficult to remain upright upon. Being naturally pigeon toed, I developed a method of walking on the dikes that became, upon perfection, almost fool-proof. Private Parisi, on the other hand, was naturally slew-footed and he had a terrible time. Parisi was assigned to my fire team. It didn't take long to figure out that placing Parisi directly in front of me in column would add a good deal of humor to my existence in Vietnam.

Parisi fell into every rice paddy he ever saw. His gate reminded me of a camel — with ankles turned outward and being given the old type combat boots with cleats instead of jungle boots, with the combination, he didn't just lose his footing, he took spectacular falls. I can still remember one time Parisi, loaded down with flak jacket, helmet, probably 300 rounds of ammunition, and a ton of food (Parisi never went anywhere without a lot of C Rations), went literally head over heels, head-first into a very deep rice paddy. He disappeared under the water, and the only thing visible being his helmet floating on the surface, it seemed like several minutes before Parisi reappeared, spluttering.

It was on another of these operations that our old friend, and a good man General Bruno A. Hochmuth, got killed. Bruno was flying in his helicopter, keeping tabs on the operation when a VC fired a rocket. Bruno and his pilot went down to a fiery death.

A common activity in this area was running Platoon Patrol Bases. A platoon would select a piece of high ground and two squads would set up a perimeter and sit all day long. The remaining squad would go out into the boonies and attempt to make contact. If successful, they would call in air strikes. On one of those days our squad was assigned a fixed position on the hill. It was a long hot wait. Toward the end of the day the active squad had luck and called in the flyboys. They were pretty close to us and were putting on a damn good show. This, combined with a pretty spectacular sun set, created quite a diversion as we packed up to return to dear old Phu Loc.

After about a month at Phu Loc, we were moved to Hill 22 at the end of large, broad Green Valley, somewhat nearer to Danang. My emplacement was right next to an Ontos, like a tank but with six 106 recoilless rifles mounted on it. This one was situated to overlook the valley below and its ammunition was a Malais round, named for its French inventor. Loaded with thousands of little darts, it could be preset to spread out at any specified distance.

Mean monsoon season had started some weeks before. Its toll was beginning to be felt along with the cold. Most people had begun getting jungle rot. It was vital to take off one's boots and socks at least once a day to let your feet dry out. Monsoon season made things uncomfortable in more ways than the one cited above. I can remember being out on night killer teams, and my teeth chattering so loudly that I thought there was no way the VC would walk into the killing zone.

It was here on Hill 22 that I met Corpsman Stan Billowitz, a character that would have a profound influence on my life. We were coming back into the base one day when I spotted a fellow wearing the cap I had lost a few weeks before while out on patrol. This was no ordinary hat. An old salt right had given it to me before I left the states. It was the old style herringbone cap and this one had been worn in World War II and Korea. It was easily recognizable, as the old herring bone uniforms had long since gone out of issuance. I asked this fellow if I could look at his excellent cap. He proudly handed it over and sure enough, there was my name on the underside of the bill. I pointed this out to Stan, anticipating that I might have a tough time persuading him to give it up. He instantly recognized that it was mine, and we were fast friends from that point forward.

One day the platoon was running a patrol in an area called Happy Valley. No idea how it got that name, but it was a misnomer. Happy Valley was very heavily overgrown, loaded with VC and heavily booby-trapped. Another squad was walking point this day when their point man tripped a hand grenade, friction-fused booby trap. The VC used this device exclusively because they had no electrically triggered devices such as we used. This is the first time I had an opportunity to see Doc Billowitz in action. Stan tore down the trail and had the badly wounded point man patched up and ready for medevac in less than five minutes. I had never seen anything like it. Speed in health care was Doc's motto.

Doc and I became quite close, and I started to learn more about him. He was on his second tour of duty in Nam. His brother had been killed there the year before. He was educated at Cornell as an engineer. This lofty education did not keep Stan from pursuing his real passion. He and his wife purchased two semi rigs and drove freight all over the country. When they later divorced, Doc signed up for another tour.

A feature of Hill 22 that I found most disquieting was the outhouse. As I recall, it pointed not toward the valley but rather toward a nearby tree line. Outhouse is not a proper term since this one was more of a simple platform with no enclosure at all. One felt as though he were sitting in front of a firing line. I don't know that anyone ever got blown off the pedestal, but I always thought I was about to be sniped at while utilizing the facility.

We spent Christmas and New Year's 1966 on Hill 22. We and the VC had a mutually declared and mutually ignored "humanitarian truce" during this holiday period. Fighting was sharply reduced, however. Billowitz could usually get his hands on some pretty powerful cough medicine, and we had a relatively good time during the last week of 1966.

After New Year's on another patrol through a nearby village, we discovered a cache of weapons under the floorboards of a hooch. It kind of looked like a buildup was under way. Since we were scheduled to move on, we didn't have time to worry about it. We were due for what was known as rebluing. The whole battalion would be removed to Okinawa for additional training, to pick up replacements, and have our equipment repaired and serviced. Before we could catch boats for Okinawa, we had to go to Danang and guard a bridge. We were supposed to shoot anything floating in the river in case it contained explosives. It was here that word came to us that Hill 22 was overrun a couple days after we left.

We head for the DMZ

Dong Ha, the northern most airstrip in Vietnam, held a rusting B-58 Hustler which attempted a landing there once and is where the Marine Division had moved its headquarters from Danang. We got on the ever-present trucks and were taken west about 15 miles to Mike Company's new headquarters, Camp JJ Carroll. Camp Carroll was the major artillery base at the DMZ, and bristled with 175MM "Long Tom" howitzers, the largest land gun we had in Vietnam, 8" motorized guns, 155s, and 40MM anti-aircraft guns, which were used to some considerable advantage against ground troops, later consisting of four of them mounted in a square tandem on a tank-like vehicle. It was reputed that if the 8" gun were to fire three rounds, without being re aimed, that two of the three shells would hit in the same hole, incredible.

When we arrived, Operation Prairie I was going on about three miles from the base. Air strikes were heavy and the guns at Camp JJ were going off constantly. There was a rumor that we were to join the fray, but we didn't. One outfit, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marines took about 100 casualties on this the first of the Prairie series of operations.

The second was not long in coming, and this time we got involved. In Operation Prairie II, several other outfits got hit hard. While we were called out, Camp JJ got hit with a mortar barrage and the VC attempted to overrun it. The emplacement of one of my closest friends, Joe O'Neil from Waterbury, CT, received a direct hit. When we got back only one wall was still standing (with a Playboy pin-up which had suffered shrapnel damage, in a most vulnerable spot). During this action, one of the 40 MM antiaircraft guns fired so many rounds that it overheated, blew up and killed the guys inside.

Right before we left Camp Carroll for Prairie II, we watched as C-130s sprayed Agent Orange into a jungle nearby the base. When we went out, we went directly to this forest, into areas recently sprayed with Agent Orange as well as many times after. I have always felt that the numbness and blue color of my hands when the weather becomes cold is a direct result of this exposure to Agent Orange.

A distinctly interesting fellow arrived to join us about this time. Cpl. Sonny Vasquez had been in Vietnam some time and was an experienced Marine. I think his outfit had been badly hit and pulled from the field. Sonny, unwounded, was transferred to us. Sonny was from Hawaii and Chicago, full of funny stories and lore, and was an amateur magician who taught me a bit of it. Much more on Sonny, perhaps my greatest of all heroes, later.

We had several minor operations and patrols for the next week or so, one of which was called Prairie II, Phase 2. Another time, we went up north to rescue a couple of helicopters that had gone down at the DMZ, but we were too late. One night, we ran a patrol and got delayed crossing a river when up the trail on the other side of the river, some Marine 105 rounds came in and wiped the trail out. If it hadn't been for that river we would have been right there. That same night, Lima Company was setting up night ambushes in another sector from where we were patrolling. One of their squads got set up early and had been waiting, ready to spring their ambush when another of Lima's squads came walking by on the same path. The first squad had no way of knowing it was their buddies and let loose. I talked to some of the guys later. They had killed five and wounded the rest. What grief it must have been for these guys when they realized the mistake they had made. Things like that and the artillery that almost got us aren't supposed to happen. A minor mistake in navigation or reading coordinates can have disastrous results.

Another patrol we ran about this time was into a valley with a flowing stream that was very rocky with boulders of green slime. The walking was treacherous and, Parisi had his usual hard time. My patented pigeon toed approach didn't work on these boulders, and I performed the most spectacular fall of the day. This effort would have gotten a 10 if judged by Olympic officials. It was very similar to Parisi's epic fall reported earlier, head over heels, entering the water headfirst. Only I didn't land in a rice paddy. The guy behind me had his camera at ready, and miraculously caught me as though I was doing a headstand on a boulder. Fortunately, my helmet stayed with me and buffered the blow. I've always wanted a copy of this photo but never managed to get one.

On Okinawa, we had picked up numerous replacements and our Battalion was now over strength. One of these replacements was Corporal Horny, who was assigned as our squad leader. Our first patrol went badly. We had only made it as far as the gate when a flare set there to warn of infiltration was tripped. The bright light destroyed our night vision. It also warned the NVA we were coming. We had to wait another half hour, lying by the gate to regain night vision since the enemy knew we were out there and apparently did not want contact that night. We had just another hot, sweaty, scary night patrol. Trying to make it back to base, we got lost. Horny had Parisi climb a tree to see if he could get the lay of the land. He proceeded to lead us on toward Camp Carroll which, of course, was just sitting there with alert Marines watching into the night, armed to the teeth. A Marine manning the lines threw a high explosive grenade, which blew up as designed. The shrapnel hit two Marines, including a fellow by the name of Engibretson who was sent back to the States with Fury. It also hit Parisi, putting a small crease across the palm of his hand. On another patrol trying to find rocket sites, we received word by radio to stay out the night. Since we didn't expect this night work we didn't have any rain gear with us. It started coming down in monsoon proportions about 6:00pm and just didn't let up. It began flooding so we found some high ground to avoid having to sleep and stand watch in gathering water. It rained so hard no one was able to sleep all night.

Not long afterward, we mounted helicopters to relieve Kilo Company at the Rockpile. This was my first trip to the western portion of the DMZ, going toward the high country. The Rockpile is a huge monolith reaching hundreds of feet straight up into the air. There was a helicopter-landing pad on top that partially hung over the side. I was told that in 1965 a company from 2/5 climbed the sides, hanging from trees in order to shoot their rifles to take the Rockpile from some NVA who were stationed there for observation purposes. If this story is true, I hope someone makes a movie of the incident.

Adjacent to the Rockpile is the Razorback. The Razorback, as its name suggests, is a sharp spine of a ridgeline about the same height as the Rockpile. During WWII, the Japanese fortified the Razorback with a network of tunnels and emplacements. 2/5 took the Razorback at the same time they took the Rockpile. Our mission here was simply to sit in fortifications, so the NVA would not take it back. We were not on either structure but rather near the base of the Rockpile. The hooch's were miserable little places, dark and damp. One night, just after I finally got to sleep, a baby rat fell out of its nest directly onto my face. For some reason, I took pity on the tiny little thing, placed it on the rack and slept on the floor.

After a couple of weeks, we made the trip back to Camp Carroll, marching ten miles or so to meet the trucks. The trek out was pretty scary as there were so many good ambush sites, this still being the same craggy country dominated by the Rockpile and the Razorback. I never really thought I would see them again.

At Camp Carroll, we were instructed to turn in our M-14's and to pick up the revolutionary new M-16. We didn't know what a fateful event this was to be until we got into heavy combat. The old M-14 was a magnificent weapon. It was heavier and the rounds were heavier, thus there was a weight factor, and not all M-14's could be fired on full automatic. These were minor disadvantages though compared with the M-16. The M-14 had the distinct advantage of ease of maintenance. It wasn't so sensitive as the M-16 proved to be. Should the M-14 malfunction, it could usually be fixed by simply banging it against a rock or other hard object.

Next came Operation Prairie III. I thought I had seen a fair share of the war up to this point. Prairie III was the real beginning of the war for me. We left on the 28th of March. It was 118 degrees. On the second day out, India Company got hit by a battalion of NVA about 2,000 yards away from us. They got overrun and lost 50 men. A sergeant from India was put up for the Congressional Medal of Honor. From then on Prairie III was one running firefight. One day, we were sweeping Hill 95 and approaching an enormous thicket. By this time, I had learned enough to walk point without screwing up and thus could take some of the load off of Smitty and Ike. As I started to lead the Company in skirting around the thicket, a NVA machine gunner let loose at the second fire team in the column and hit Smitty six times. One round entered the front of Smitty's helmet and circled his skull between his helmet and helmet liner. This piece of good fortune didn't save Alton Smith. Despite frantic efforts by Doe Billowitz, Smitty died.

I was furious. I said, "Lets go!" to the first fire team. Following little trails that looked like they had been engineered by rabbits but were obviously also used by the NVA, I thought sooner or later, I was bound to come upon the enemy soldiers that shot Smitty. I didn't, however, and as staying in there too long was not a good idea, both from our standpoint and that of the Company outside the thicket, we left.

Operation Prairie III was the first time I saw numerous dead bodies littering a battlefield. I had seen isolated dead enemy soldiers before but nothing like this. The NVA had much less ability to retrieve their dead than we did; the area around where India got overrun was particularly gruesome. On the way back down south to Camp Carroll after the operation, marching on a very long, narrow, straight and lovely path, we came to a quaint little village. A young boy there had a bucket of beer. I, however, had no way of carrying any, because I was assigned the responsibility of carrying the C-4 plastic explosive, for which we had no use on Prairie III. When we did get back, we had one of those monsoon rains like only Parisi could sleep through. I remember sitting on my cot, with the trench lines and the hooch completely flooded, the water reaching the bottom of the cot, drinking those beers and listening to a tape recorder I had purchased on Okinawa.

We stayed at Camp Carroll a day or two after Prairie III, being detached from 3/9 and sent to Dong Ha, where we were assigned to reinforce 1/4, which had been badly beat up. They lost 249 men on Operation Beacon Hill. The first thing we did with these guys was to accompany Delta Company 1/4 in escorting a 60-vehicle convoy to open up a new major Marine base at Con Thien. Con Thien and Mike Company 3/9 were to make the cover of Life Magazine later in the year. The NVA were watching us closely and figured out what was going on. They defiantly didn't want a new base at Con Thien, but we were able to get there before they were able to muster enough force to stop us. That night they attacked, but we were able to repulse them. The next two days we devoted to building up the base. The same two days the NVA devoted their time to building up their forces.

Getting in was relatively easy, getting out was to be a bitch. The day we left was the hottest I ever experienced in Vietnam. It was 128 degrees and I'm certain one could literally fry an egg on the roof of any one of our tanks. We had gone only a short distance on this trail that was just wide enough for our tanks and the trucks we were escorting when the gooks hit. We weren't willing to stall the convoy in order to fight. So we had a moving firefight that paused only long enough for us to gather our wounded and get them evacuated. We were making about a mile every hour and a half. One of our guys, who had been in Nam longer than any of us, got hit. We placed him on top of one of the tanks. I didn't know how he could stand to be on the hot steel but he really didn't have a choice. His leg dangled over the side of the tank. At one point the tank brushed up against a tree next to this very narrow trail and the damage done to his leg as a result was probably worse than the wound he had suffered. It was really a bloody mess. It took five hours to traverse the trail, which had only taken about an hour a few days before.

We went back to Camp Carroll after this mission, and the next night we were sent out on an overnight ambush quite some distance from the base. We were dog tired as a result of Operation Prairie III and Con Thien coming so closely together. We slithered out of the base and made the long night march to our approximate destination. There had been a good deal of discussion that this was an inappropriate evening to attempt an ambush when obviously everybody was going to have a hard time staying alert or even awake. The decision was made to go off into a huge field of elephant grass that was about 6 feet high and where nobody was likely to stumble upon us. We needed a good night's rest. We hadn't gotten much at Con Thien. Out of habit, I suppose, we set up on a line just as we would have done if laying an ambush on a trail and set up a minimum watch, 2 people. Everybody else crashed.

A little later O'Neil heard something moving through the grass in our direction. He was the only one awake at that end of the line and couldn't move to wake up the rest of us. Then he heard enemy voices. Apparently they didn't think they would meet anybody in the elephant grass either. O'Neil removed a grenade from his pouch and pulled the pin. Parisi had been asleep just long enough and right before O'Neil tossed the grenade, Parisi started snoring like a great clap of thunder.

The NVA heard a snore, were startled, and ran away rather than firing into the dark. This was fortunate, but what was unfortunate was that O'Neil had thrown the grenade pin down into the high grass. All this had not created much noise, and everybody was still asleep. O'Neil sat there holding on to his grenade, unable to release it as the spoon would fly off and five seconds later it would blow. He woke us up gently, not knowing how far the enemy had got off to. He explained what had happened and that his arm was getting tired. A brief search for the pin was enough to convince us that this would be a futile effort. Jenkins dismantled a part of the radio for some wire and we tied the grenade where the pin should have gone and spent the rest of the night attentively listening for the return of the NVA. They apparently didn't want us any more than we wanted of them.

Khe Sanh & Hill 881 South

We stayed at Camp Carroll for about a week, running night patrols after digging and filling sand bags for reinforcement during the days. We were averaging about four hours sleep a day. We were miserable and thought we were ready for another operation. Up to this point, despite some pretty tough action, we had not lost too many men. Mike Company was still above T/O, having been reinforced on Okinawa. On the 24th of April, we received word that the NVA had massed at an area called Khe Sanh in the very northwest corner of South Vietnam. Helicopters were due any minute to pick us up — this time they were on time. They took us to Dong Ha where we boarded two C-123 transports for Khe Sanh. Khe Sanh was indeed a beleaguered base. It was under almost constant artillery fire from the hills above it. There was a large battle being conducted on a hill visible from the camp, which I later found out was Hill 861.

There was a lot of firing going on, both near and far, both small arms and artillery, both outgoing and incoming. Our airplanes had attracted artillery fire. The airstrip was shaped kind of like a thermometer, with a ball at either end at which the planes could turn around and take off without stopping. Upon hitting the runway, the C-123 lowered its tailgate an, as it practically slid into its turn at the end of the runway, we jumped off with our gear, and the medium-sized transport gunned its engines and gained speed. As it started to take off, explosions followed it down the runway and it made a narrow escape. In the days to follow many others would not be so fortunate.

Once out on the runway, we were greeted by frantic men who stuck their heads out of their bunkers just long enough to wave their arms frantically and shout to us, "Run like hell!" We didn't need a whole lot of encouraging. We dashed and dove into the trench line just as the artillery started coming in and before the C-123s lifted off. It was late in the afternoon by now and after the fire let up, we moved out to a nearby field, which had been planted with "potato trees." It was a very tense night spent there amongst rows of these stubby little trees, which apparently were eaten by the Vietnamese as a substitute for real potatoes.

The next morning we started off by foot for the large battle being waged on Hill 861. As we started to gain altitude and proximity to the hill, things once again became tense. We were crossing large fields and ridgelines. There was no way to know what we would find over each ridge. We were a pretty seasoned outfit and each man knew what to do. Sgt. Hamm, however, felt compelled every few minutes to turn around and yell at the top of his lungs, "Spread it out, watch for booby traps and keep the noise down. When we got past the foothills and on to Hill 861, we started passing by outfits that had been involved in the battle for the past couple days. They looked shellshocked. Little did we know that in a couple of days those of us who were lucky enough would look the same way.

The battle for Hill 861 was just winding down when we got there. The build-up of NVA first became apparent here two days earlier, when a platoon-size overwhelming force of NVA ambushed a patrol of Marines. They were killed to the man, but not all in the first moments of frantic fire. Some were taken captive and horribly mutilated — an effort to affect the morale of those who would inevitably stumble upon their bodies. The opposite was the effect. Emotions ran high. The effort to walk from Khe Sanh all the way to the top of Hill 861 had taken most of the day. We climbed down the hill, crossing many streams near the bottom. The foliage was thick and nobody needed to be told that we were in deep Indian Country this afternoon. We found a suitable location to spend the evening and did so on full alert. I doubt anybody nodded out that night. The NVA were regrouping, however, and the night went without incident. The next morning we set out toward the west, again crossing numerous small streams coursing through very thick country. We found several hastily dug mass graves, enemy casualties of 861. In the late morning we came to a major trail and shortly after joining it, word arrived by radio to hurry at fastest pace in the direction of Hill 881 South.

There are two hills 881 meters above sea level in this area in very near proximity to one another. It was on these two mountains (they were hills in name only; Hills 861, 881N, and 881S would be classified mountains by any observer) that General Giap had planned his real ambush of the Marine Corps. They controlled the Khe Sanh valley and from here the NVA could, if successful, go straight down to Hue and cut Quang Tri Province off from the remainder of the country. Giap had his NVA dig extensive tunnel and bunker networks in advance of the battle, unknown to anyone except themselves. In several such bunkers, we later found 50-caliber machine guns mounted on bamboo tracks covering the ground below. They were well prepared.

Just before we got our call to sprint the three miles to 881S, Kilo Co. was marching up the mountain, alert but totally unaware of what they were walking into. They were marching directly into Giap's trap. The NVA allowed Kilo's first platoon time to get most of the way up 881 before they sprung. So well camouflaged were they that no Marine sensed what was about to happen. When the NVA hit, it was devastating. Most were killed in the opening volleys. They cut Kilo's platoon into three (approximately squads). Everybody from the top squad was killed except for one Marine named Flowers. Flowers, when the first burst raked the ranks, was hit and fell into a shallow depression in the ground. Remember, this was late morning. Flowers was to remain in this depression the remainder of the day, picking up six more wounds. Only the desperate efforts of the remainder of Kilo Company to save their platoon kept the gooks busy enough and prevented them from killing Flowers. Kilo lost 98 men killed that day, most in their first platoon.

While Kilo was doing what it could, Mike Company was doing what only one of its men, Parisi, had done before — the three-mile dash. Each of us, loaded down with 60 to 80 pounds of gear, truly sprinted to the base of Hill 881S. Rounding the last curve in the trail, it was an awesome sight that greeted our weary band. 881S was enormous and beautiful, very green and picturesque. It wasn't straight up like the Rockpile, but it was quite steep, with a major firefight going on along its slopes directly in front of us. A trail led around to the right of the battle and as our mission was to rescue, and as this trail seemed to be the only way to accomplish it, we didn't hesitate. We started up the hill with our squad still intact in the middle of the company. As an indication of how intensely the adrenalin was flowing at this time, one fellow in our machine gun section carried 1700 rounds of 7.62 machine gun ammo up the hill. This, in addition to all of his other gear.

A big danger in rescue missions is that as you start to save men, you also start to lose men. There is the danger that the combined casualties of your force and the one you are trying to save become greater than the ability of the remaining men to carry out. This process started almost immediately. As soon as the North Vietnamese force became aware that we were trying to flank them, they turned all their firepower on us. Lucky for Flowers and the others from Kilo no doubt. As we neared the top of the hill from this side, the sound was deafening. Most fire fights sound like, "bang, bang, bang" in rapid succession. This one, which was beyond anyone's definition of a firefight, was just one loud explosion. So many guns were going off at once that the individual reports overlapped and the artillery had not begun firing yet so these were all small arms producing one prolonged, loud explosion.

The first squads to arrive near the top had been hit pretty hard, and our platoon was called to pass through them to the front. As we slowly made our way forward, we stopped frequently as the lead men tried to make progress without losing their lives. During one of these halts, I looked over to the right, or north, and saw Marines on Hill 881N as though I was looking through binoculars — they seemed like they were next door. They were running around, obviously engaged in firefights of their own. On another stop farther up the hill, lying down, I looked up at a nearby tree. I don't know if it was the excitement of the moment or what, but a gnarled piece of bark on this tree produced an image of Jesus so similar to the one usually depicted in American religious materials that it was uncanny. I didn't have long to think about this, for we had to move on. If it was a religious experience, it didn't sink in but not infrequently since, it has been a mystifying memory.

We passed familiar faces from the platoon giving up the point, most wounded or showing signs of severe shock. One of the wounded was Napier. His theory that carrying a lot of rounds was a waste of time and energy, for in any serious fire fight there were always lots of casualties from whom ammo could be procured. This would not get tested today, for he was being prepared for medevac. I never saw him again and don't know how seriously he was hit, whether or not he lived. I do know I thought at the time and have since that it was a pity when on this day, his theory was to prove both right and wrong — yet he was not there to see it.

When we got in front, we arrived at the edge of a large field, very near the top. I say large — large for this heavily foliated hill but not large by lowland standards. Perhaps, a little over sixty yards across. It was here, lying low in amongst the trees, some standing, others having already been knocked down, that I found Aponti. He was from New York City, and I had gone through Jungle Training with him. We also came to Vietnam together. He was a very good friend. At Danang, he was assigned to Kilo Company at the same time I went to Mike Company. Aponti had been shot in the forehead. The entire top of his head was gone. It was a sad moment, but one I could not dwell on till later.

A meeting was about to convene, probably the most remarkable meeting I ever participated in. The scene was directly behind the tree line before the clearing. Fury, Smithwick, O'Neil, Ike, Vasquez and I were hugging the ground behind some fallen trees. The bark, limbs and leaves of these trees were popping, crackling from the rapid succession of rounds that were hitting them. The trees were actually dissembling rather quickly and if we didn't do something to quell the fire soon we would lose our cover.

The meeting started with the question, "What the hell are we going to do?" We needed a volunteer, and no one was willing. Finally Vargas said: "Screw it," followed by, "you guys start firing from here, I'll run over there (pointing to the opposite tree line). When I get there, one of you guys go out to that hole (pointing to what appeared to be an old artillery hole about half of the way across the clearing to the left of the route Sonny planned to take, and directly on line with a machine gun that was doing a large part of the current damage to us.) Someone get those LAWs from Smithwick and work down this tree line and take out that mortar and the machine gun over there on the right."

With that, the meeting was over. I knew if I was fortunate enough to live to see another like it, I would be in deep shit once again. This unique, impromptu confab, made memorable by our stammering, stumbling, stuttering response to the poignant question, "What the hell we going to do?" followed by that most eloquent "Screw it!" was indeed incredible. He didn't really think we had come up with a permanent solution. He expected Vasquez to be dead in the next few seconds. Even if Sonny did make it out of the tree line, he had somehow to run sixty yards through a solid wall of steel. The enemy didn't know how quick Sonny was. While the meeting was punctuated with extraordinary indecisiveness, none now followed it at all.

We opened up blindly into the opposite tree lines, for to raise one's head would be to lose it. The NVA were briefly stunned, for up till then, only they had been shooting. They ducked for a brief second before rising again and resuming their volley. In the mean time, Sonny had escaped the tree line and was on his way. It took another second for the enemy to adjust their aim toward Vasquez. Sonny was probably capable of running a 10 flat on a normal day. This was no normal day and Sonny, like lightning, bobbed and weaved his way toward the opposite tree line, rounds kicking up dirt all around him. He reached it and dove through, getting hit, unknown to us, as he did so. It was only a flesh wound and Sonny went right to work. It was here that the first squad from Kilo had been when the trap was sprung. The only one of those guys still alive was Flowers, but there were many wounded there now from the other Kilo men who came to their rescue. Remember the danger of rescue missions. It had happened here. Kilo was helpless.

As fire was briefly deflected toward Vasquez, I ran the approximate 35 yards out to the arty hole on the left. The NVA on that side wheeled around and opened up on me but too late. I dove and slid into the hole. Much to my surprise there were three fellows from Kilo who had taken up residence in the hole some time earlier when their relief mission started to break down. They were unwounded fortunately but very badly scared, petrified really, but awfully glad to see me. I got them organized and we started laying down a heavy volume of fire in the direction of the bothersome machine gun and the other NVA on the left side. Napier's theory would have been busted here. If I hadn't had plenty of ammo at this isolated position, things would quickly have gotten desperate. In the meantime, Smithwick with his LAWs was silencing the mortar and machine gun on that side. The volume of NVA fire was being seriously cut. For the first time that afternoon, it was back to "bang, bang, bang" in rapid succession — a bad firefight.

And just as Napier had predicted, there were plenty of weapons and ammunition lying around waiting to be employed by Vasquez. Sonny grabbed several of the idle rifles. He discovered that the tree line to which he had arrived was narrow and that there was another clearing on the other side of it with another tree line beyond from which the NVA were also firing at a rapid rate. He began running from one spot to another. At each stop, firing two M-16s on full automatic. He kept this up long enough to convince the enemy that at least a full squad had arrived.

I'm not sure if it was our training, our previous combat experience, the fact we all knew each other so well, instinct or just what it was, but we all sensed what needed to be done. A couple of guys had worked over to where Smithwick was. As Sonny would open up across the clearing, Smithwick and his band would start firing at the same time and so would I and the three guys from Kilo with me. When we did this, members of our company would run across the clearing to Sonny and the wounded from Kilo in the opposite tree line. Sonny and the rest of us would open up again and our guys started carrying the wounded back across the clearing. We were able to seriously subdue the enemy fire in this manner but unable to stop it entirely. Many of the porters were hit, as were the casualties they carried. It was a real race to defeat the danger of the rescue mission principle. It took quite a while to complete the task due to the large number of wounded. Many men made numerous trips across the clearing. Many got wounded at least once, but most kept going.

One of these was a kid named Karl Gimple of East St. Louis, IL, a great, strapping German from one of the toughest towns in America, a really nice guy. He got hit three times, once in the leg and twice in the back near the base of the neck, almost in the same place. The last of these brought his rescue efforts for the day to an end, but not before Karl had brought seven men across the deadly clearing. One he carried out on his broad shoulders had his head completely wrapped in bloody bandages. Another was Flowers.

Another guy who got hit ferrying the wounded across the clearing was my good friend Joe O'Neil. He was shot in the neck and the bullet remained there. I didn't see him for a couple of months until I went to Danang on my way to R&R. Miraculously, O'Neil was there, the bullet still in his neck. O'Neil sounded kind of like a frog, or rather like "Frog Man" Henry. A couple of years later, Charlie Fury gave me a call. He said O'Neil was working for the Post Office in his home town of Waterbury, CT and doing fine.

In our hole, the boys from Kilo and I had fired a huge number of rounds and our guns were quite hot. One of the M-16s we had malfunctioned, a recurring major problem with these silly looking guns that looked like they were made by Mattel. At last, the Marine artillery cranked loose. I guess whoever called it in gave coordinates to bring the rounds right up near the tree line where we had started off, not knowing that we were out in the clearing. The first barrage of 105 rounds (8", 155 and 175 rounds would have been much too large for this close quarters confrontation) started in the far tree line and continued walking straight for our hole. Each blast got about twenty-five feet closer. We watched transfixed, knowing that if this didn't stop soon we were in trouble. The last explosion was about twenty-five feet directly in front of us. We knew the next would either land in the hole or very near it. We braced for the shock without much optimism. It never came. The series had ended, thank God.

Other 105 rounds that came in were white phosphorous shells. White phosphorous, or "Willie P" as we called it, would burn through anything and keep burning. If it got on your arm, it would burn through and drop on something else and keep burning unless you dug it out or smothered it from the air, which it requires for combustion. Terrible stuff.

One such round exploded just a few feet away from Parisi. Willie P rounds were very fickle. Sometime they exploded out, other times they exploded straight up. This one went straight up. Parisi was not touched. The explosion did collapse one of his lungs, however, and Parisi got a million dollar medevac from the battle for Hill 881. He got his second purple heart.

Perhaps it was the same round, maybe not, for the last thing I would have been looking at during this period was Parisi but about the same time, a glob of white phosphorous came down on my arm and started burning the hell out of me. I didn't know what it was at first but soon figured it out. I dug it from my arm as fast as I could, for cutting myself a little extra was nothing compared to the horror of Willie P. I had seen a guy the year before when I was stationed at San Diego who had tripped a "Bouncing Betty" booby trap loaded with Willie P. A bouncing Betty has a spring under the grenade and when it is tripped the grenade bounces up to head level and explodes. This guy had lived but I am certain he wishes he hadn't. He was blind and almost all features of his face were destroyed. I could just make out where his nose and mouth had been.

When Sonny finally made the fast track back across the clearing we knew everyone alive was out of there. It was now time for us to do the same. The three other guys had spent a long day and there was no question of who would be the last to leave. As three of us started firing, the other, carrying the broken M-16, took off and made it safely back. Then it was just two of us firing, same thing. The third guy left and I fired on full automatic. Just me now. No one to suppress the enemy fire. I knew all enemy eyes would be on me. Fortunately, their volume of fire was nowhere near as heavy as when we first arrived. I took a deep breath and hauled ass. I knew I was going pretty fast, but it was one of those moments frozen in time. I felt as though I was in slow motion. Rounds were hitting at my feet and in front of me. It was the ones in front that worried me. As I finally approached the tree line I took the longest dive of my life. I crashed into the tree line blindly. A stick jabbed into my side as I landed, and I thought I had been hit. I lay there a few seconds before I realized it was not a bullet at all.

When I got up, I surveyed the carnage that was now in back of the tree line. The guy with the bloody bandages wrapped around his head was there, moaning. Flowers was there, having been pumped full of morphine, laughing and babbling about his going home now. Gimple and many others were still there despite the fact that the exodus had already begun. Smithwick and I stayed back at the tree line firing at the NVA while others gathered up the wounded and started to follow the column down the trail. When the last of them got out of sight, Smithwick and I started to follow. We noticed that there was numerous M-16s lying around on the ground. Smithwick and I picked them up. I don't know why since they were more of a liability than an asset compared to the M-14 or the AK47, which the NVA had. Smithwick and I had about seven of them each. Only one of the M-16s I carried worked and that one only would fire a single round at a time. The others had all double fed, where two rounds try to get into the chamber at the same time. It requires a ramrod to clear this problem, and since they were in short supply in these early days of the M-16, only one was issued per squad. Neither Smithwick nor I had one.

When we reached the last man in line we got a good view down the steep trail. My first thought was, "I am watching a train wreck." The scene was horrible, pathetic. Slightly wounded men carrying badly wounded men. There were hundreds of them. We had started up the hill with almost 250 men and had left many back on the battlefield, but now we also had the survivors from Kilo. The line was unbroken from me all the way down to the base of the hill.

Rather than pursuing us, the enemy had a better plan. As they had registered all important points on this hill in advance for their mortars, this trail was obviously an important point. They knew the trail would be full. They opened up. The first round hit almost in the middle of the column and directly on the trail. I couldn't believe what I was watching. After the smoke cleared, a large gap was in the line where there had been three or four men, carrying other men. Now we were back in the saving business. The trail was very narrow, there was no room to pass, and therefore there was nothing for me to do, being literally the last man in line — only to watch our rear and helplessly watch what was going on in front of me. The situation was ripe for disaster. Fortunately, the first round was the most accurate and while there were more casualties due to these mortars, they were not nearly as severe as they might have been.

We took off down the trail and around the curve to safety, to where we had gotten our first look at 881 earlier. There, behind the protection of the high ground around the curve, lay several dead NVA. They hadn't been there when we had come through earlier. I had an overwhelming urge to start shooting these already dead NVA soldiers but resisted it. I later thought I should have gone ahead and done it. The Marine Corps surely would have thought I had lost my mind and I might have gotten medevaced.

It was late in the afternoon by now, and it promised to be a very touchy evening, plenty to do first. Choppers were continuously coming in with enormous numbers of medevacs, to bring us the water and ammo we were almost out of. After all the wounded were gone, there weren't too many people left around. The first platoon of Mike Company, which that morning had about eighty men with the attached machine gun and mortar units, was now down to fourteen in the field. Only two of those fourteen were unwounded — Hamm and his radioman. Billowitz patched me up with some kind of salve and gauze.

We were directly on a line between 881S and the South China Sea where the USS Iowa stood with its 16" guns. Now that we were off the hill, they were cleared to fire. As these enormous rounds would come in directly over our heads they would sound like freight cars. They sounded very low, and there were some very tall trees in our neighborhood.

This was a very uneasy night, with heavy artillery being sent into the hill by the Iowa. The NVA were unable to get out of their tunnels to walk over and finish us off, which they easily could have done. The next morning we didn't know what to expect, but what transpired made for a very interesting last day of April. Hundreds of airplanes appeared on the horizon. They were of every type and description. Phantoms, Crusaders, Sky Hawks, F-105s and even old Sky Raiders (a dive-bomber, first produced at the end of WWII and now in the service of the South Vietnamese Air Force.) The planes arrived and formed into holding patterns stacked on top of each other waiting their turn to make bombing runs. As those who had dropped their ordnance (mostly 500lb. bombs) left, others arrived. As this went on all day long, I thought there wasn't a hill left. The flyboys came back the next day and did the same thing. April 30, I was told later, set the all time record for the most number of air strikes in the history of world warfare.

The 2nd of May we were assigned the job of taking back Hill 861. Our squad, with just four men left, had the task of walking point. I was the new squad leader by default — there simply wasn't anybody left. Fury, Horny and Vasquez had been hit two days before and were gone, along with the rest. I was it. With Ike (a bandage around his head like the drummer boy in that painting from the Revolutionary War) in front of me, we walked around the curve and got our first look at the hill since April 29th. It wasn't the same hill. A few days before it had been a lush, verdant, overgrown mountain. The sight that greeted our eyes now was from WWI. No foliage, not even many craggy stumps of tree trunks. Everything was brown or black and broken. It was still a big mountain, probably only about two meters shorter than it had been before.

Rather than going around to the right as we had the other day, we took the direct approach, approximately the same route Kilo had taken on its ill-fated trip up the hill. When we started to get up to where the heaviest fighting had been, we began seeing the carnage. There were bodies everywhere, many blown into little pieces by the intensive bombing. The piece that sticks in my mind to this day was a Marine jungle boot with a shinbone sticking up out of it. Here were Giap's tunnel networks and emplacements. The bunkers with the 50-caliber machine guns on bamboo tracks were here. A lot of dead NVAs were here, blown to bits by the 500 lb. bombs and the 16" shells. Not a live NVA soldier was left. All those who lived through the barrage had fled the hill. One Marine we found had been dead only a few hours. We thought we were certain when we left the hill that we had gotten all of the live Marines out, we were wrong.

As we approached the top of the hill, one of those sudden violent thunderstorms rolled over us. A bolt of lightening came out of the sky and hit about thirty yards away. It hit two guys from Kilo Co. They were both killed. Imagine going through what these guys had gone through in the past several days, only to be killed by a flash of lightning after the battle was over. Like the face of Jesus in the bark of that tree, there must be a message here somewhere. Jesus, like most everything else on Hill 881, got blown up in the bombing. It was not the first and was not to be the last piece of lethal irony, as you will soon found out.

When we got to the very top of the hill, we began to dig. This was easier than usual since all the earth had been loosened and turned over for us. As I began to dig I pushed my shovel into flesh. A little more excavation produced a dead Chinese soldier. He had pictures of his family, his passport, a Chinese compass that was far superior to our own, a deck of cards and $148 in North Vietnamese currency. In an old, beat-up bunker about 30 feet away was a dead NVA soldier who had been exposed to the heat for a couple of days and was getting pretty ripe.

Numerous helicopters arrived at the top of the hill throughout the afternoon bringing a variety of welcome things. They brought mail, water, cigarettes, and SP packs. There were also reporters curious to see the scene of battle. They also brought us Doug Sawyer, who had the great good fortune to be on R&R during the big fight. He was amazed to find almost all of his good friends no longer with us and to be witness to this spectacle of destruction. Also arriving by chopper was a new Platoon Commander. Sgt. Hamm, who had been acting Platoon Commander for months, now gave way to Lt. Williams from Georgia. He convened a platoon meeting. I am sure he envisioned a larger force to gather around him. When only a dozen or so showed up, he wanted to know where the rest were. There were no others. That afternoon, one of the reporters by the name of Ernie Zang, who I was told was a famous war correspondent, interviewed me and had his photographer take some pictures. I was nearly black from sun and dirt, torn clothing, bandaged arm, and down to only 155 pounds.

During the following 12 days, we stood watch on Hill 881 by night and during the day we ran patrols, attempting to harass the fleeing NVA to assure that they did not attempt to retake the hill. On one such patrol, we uncovered a mass grave containing about 250 dead NVA soldiers from the battle for Hill 881. As a fallout of the big fight, Sonny Vasquez was put up for the Navy Cross (should have been the Congressional.) Smithwick and I were put up for the Silver Star. Karl Gimple, to my knowledge, was not put up for anything, which would constitute a raw deal for him, because, with the exception of Sonny and O'Neil, he did more than anyone to save lives that day.

During this period, my left arm with its Willie P burn became infected and painful. The blood vessels began turning green, oozing a foul odor, when Doc Billowitz took a look and announced that I had early symptoms of gangrene. Doc pointed out our current depleted state of manpower (especially leadership) and that I should avoid being pulled out, if possible. After a week of so under his care, my arm started to get better.

Nights were pretty interesting. The first night back on the hill was particularly scary, as intelligence spread the word that there was to be a massive attempt to retake the hill. Despite the fact that this didn't make any sense at all, everybody took it seriously. Around sunset, Arty started firing white phosphorous rounds into a valley near the hill on our side. The white clouds created by the explosions, drifted upward getting caught by the slanting sunlight, taking forms. To me, the image of a circus elephant. Later, in total darkness, the sound of a C-47 became apparent. It was circling over the valley, when suddenly there was a mad, whirling scream and a laser of light belching from the plane. It was the first time I had ever saw a gattling gun fired — every fifth round was a tracer round. The stream of light was continuous, like a laser beam from the plane to the ground. When the gun stopped, the beam slowly receded from the plane until all the rounds hit the ground. I later read that a three-second burst from a gattling gun would put at least one round in every square foot of a football field.

On other evenings, we witnessed B-52 strikes in the distance. Everyone has heard that these strikes are massive but until you have seen one, you can't fathom how enormous they truly are. Dozens and dozens of 2,000 lb. bombs exploding on a line, created such a light show that is beyond description. A few days later, we patrolled the area and saw first hand the destruction unleashed, a path of overlapping craters about 40 feet across and maybe 30 feet deep. I don't know if there had been any NVA troops there at the time, but there wouldn't have been any trace of them if they had been there when these massive bombs exploded.

When it was time to leave the hill for Camp Carroll, our squad was assigned the task of walking point for the entire battalion, which was 3/3. During this time period, there were a lot of shifting units around. We had to march about 12 miles to meet our trucks for the drive back east. This was rough country with numerous ambush sites. It was a particularly tough job of navigation through country we had never been in before. Ike was magnificent walking point this day. We went over mountains and down into deep valleys, crossing murky, green streams that were hot and steamy.

Tom had an unorthodox method of carrying his rifle. He would sling it over his shoulder so that the rifle rode upside down under his arm. It would seem that this would make it slow and clumsy to bring up and fire when, in the point position, one needs to be ready to fire in a split second. Tom had perfected his method of flicking the rifle around upright and firing in a heartbeat. As we were near the end of this march approaching a thicket, a covey of birds flew out of the thicket making a great noise. Tom, with his good reflexes, whipped around, took aim, and didn't fire. The only thing about this series of events that surprised me was that Tom was fast enough not to squeeze the trigger.

When we got to the road, we found the trucks had not yet arrived. This gave us time to remove the leeches, which had accumulated on our legs from the long march through the valleys and streams. I had 27 of the little bastards on my ankles and calves. I started to burn them off with a cigarette, which is not as satisfactory a method as using that salt, which did a much better and far less painful job. The trucks finally arrived, and we were off on the long treacherous route from west to east along the DMZ. Route 9, in the western sector, winds around mountains and passes by steep cliffs. One of the trucks carrying some men from 3/3 steered over one of these cliffs, killing several of the boys in the back. Not unlike the lightning a week and a half before, this tragic, totally unnecessary accident just wasn't fair to guys who had so recently survived so much.

We passed by the Rockpile and the Razorback once again and through the craggy country beyond. Once back into the flat-forested country beyond the Rockpile area, we came upon a band of Marines who were walking toward the Khe Sanh area. Our trucks stopped long enough for a brief conversation. When I asked one of them which unit he was from, the Marine told us that his unit was the 26th Marines. Though I hadn't heard of the 26th at that time, I sarcastically told him, "Y'all are pretty famous."

I apologize to this Marine today, for needless sarcasm on my part. In fact, the 26th Marines were to earn a great deal of acclaim eight or nine months later at Khe Sanh when they endured an incredible 77-day siege in early 1968.

While the effort of 1968 has probably gotten more publicity, due in part to the common practice in 1967 of intentionally under-reporting American casualty figures, the differences between the two incidents are significant. In 1968, the battle at Khe Sanh lasted 11 weeks. In 1967, it lasted only about one week, so all the casualties were extremely compressed into a few days. By 1968, numerous improvements had been made to the defensive positions whose construction had been started by us the year before. In 1967, Hills 881N, 881S and 861 were raw territory. In 1968, the battle was largely a defensive one and was strongly supported by heavy artillery and aircraft from the beginning. In 1967, the battle was offensive and initially not supported at all.

One old gunnery sergeant who had been in the Marine Corps since World War II and had been a participant on Iwo Jima, maintained later that Hill 881S in 1967 had been the only thing he ever saw that compared to the battle of Iwo Jima. A Marine Officer later declared that on April 29, 1967, the United States should have declared victory in Vietnam and left the country for good.

In surmising the battle for Khe Sanh in 1967, I will quote from the official Marine Corps account of the battle for Khe Sanh in 1968. "Attempts were made to obtain logs for fighting positions and bunkers in the canopied jungle flanking the hills. This idea was not successful. The trees close to 881 and 861 were so filled with shrapnel from the battles the previous spring that the engineers did not want to ruin their chain saws on the metal." The NVA were not through, and we stayed at Camp JJ only one day before being called out on Operation Hickory. During that day, I was given a Combat Meritorious Promotion to Corporal.

Postscript

I want to dedicate this article to my father, who encouraged me to write about my experiences in Vietnam. I finished the article on the 2nd day of November 1990. My Dad passed away on the 4th of November 1990 at age 82, before he had a chance to read it. He was a great man and lived life to the fullest. He was a professional tennis player, and a leading expert on the Civil War. He published one major book, and numerous other publications. He was a coach and professor at the University of Chicago, where he was involved in creating the first Atomic Bomb in Oak Ridge, TN, where I was born. He was a Vice President of American General Life Insurance Co. I miss him a lot, God Bless his wonderful soul.

Arrival

Into Vietnam I fly
A place where many will die.

When the door opens
I get my first feel of the heat
I'm covered in sweat
Before I walk even a few feet.

As I leave the plane I can't believe my eyes
There lay fifty body bags
Containing dead GI's.

While walking across the tarmac I look around
Searching for a place to go
If "Charlie" should lob in a mortar round.

When into airfreight we are led
I am wondering
"How many of us will go home dead."

In the terminal many GI's going home I see
All of them looking
As if they are staring straight through me.

When into their faces I look
The one thing they all share
That blank look that thousand yard stare.

Already for the end of my tour I cannot wait
Here I sit contemplating what will be my fate.

Mom's White Hair

by Chaplain Ray William Stubbe

Mom's hair turned white one night she heard evening TV news:
A chaplain killed at Khe Sanh, Vietnam, she knew her son was there, where few chaplains breathed life
Was it he? Her heart waited-seconds stitched on eternity's loom while a week wreaked wreckage
As his battlefield oozed into her soul resonating its "battle rock" horror, terror, and pain eventually, She learned he's OK.
As OK as anyone could be in constant shelling, daily death next breath willing, never assured in that place, that paradise of beauty and tranquility now made hell as bombs scraped away all life reverberating explosions in her beautiful tranquility now made hell as bombs scraped away future and hope and life.
A dew of tears, hair turned white, quake crumbling, crushing carefully crafted cathedral constructions housing hopes
Was her soon to be cancer and major heart attack its aftershock
For years I never knew what happened to her,
My own battle pain cocooning me in encrusting hard shell shielding of emotional shelling:
I beheld her white hair merely a result of her age.
She even dyed it to remove its gray (like combat veterans hide their wounds, physical and emotional); I even advised her to display its gray reality.
One night within days of return from battlefield's horror -she assumed I was already asleep-- she tenderly, kissed my forehead
Later, she heard word eruptions from volcanic dream sleep she later mentioned to me.
I never knew what had happened to her, to me-the overtones I didn't hear while fundamental battlefield musical scores replayed WHOMP – BOOM – WHOOSH – ZING SNAP – SCREAMS in presto speed, tarantella madness, forte intensity constantly reverberating, resonating again and again and again its horror song scratched into the LP record of my life replaying its stuck noisome noise while extended death vibrations inverted blessing, inverted peace, inverted life dash to pieces all peace, and one night mom's hair turned white.

Notes from the Editor

Dear Ernie & Linda:

Kare & I arrived yesterday afternoon for our reconnaissance mission of Key West at the beautiful home of Judy & Chuck Van Soye. We report to both of you that Key West is superb. The weather is absolutely delightful and just a little breezy right now. We departed San Juan Island at 40 degrees with rain to arrive here for 74 degrees and clear. Chuck & I will be fishing tomorrow through Thursday. Friday, Kare & I will drive up to Fort Lauderdale to meet you late in the afternoon. You are going to love meeting Judy & Chuck when the cruise pulls into Key West. By the way, we are having Florida lobster for dinner.

Semper Fidelis,
Ross

I got this this morning. I'm leaving Sacramento in a couple of days. I've got a fourteen-day speaking gig on Celebrity Cruise Lines. It's kind of like singing for your supper. My partner Linda and I each do four half-hour talks on our specialties and we get most of our trip covered. We also get to invite guests. It has been a bad winter this last year. Man, oh, man. So many brothers came down with the ol' PTSD bug. Me too. This is why I'm getting out of Dodge and heading for the sunshine: Two back-to-back trips on the Celebrity Century to the Eastern and Western Caribbean. Seven days with Ross and Kare, then seven with Freddy J, my old C/O. Life is good again. Things are definitely looking up.

Note From the Secretary/Treasurer

We have (3) openings for the position of Member-at-Large for the Khe Sanh Veterans Board. Reunion Committee Update

The plans for the reunion are going as scheduled. If you have not made your reservation and registered, please do so ASAP. Some of the planned events require prior notice of total attendance for discount prices. Again, this is the finest hotel at which we have ever held our reunion. Although we are paying a little more than last year, we have negotiated other benefits that far offset the additional charge. The hotel has agreed to lower the price of beer to $ 2.00 a bottle, and threw in an outstanding Continental FREE Breakfast, every day. Remember, this is a 4-star hotel and one of the finest in the State of Texas. The Hotel has yet more amenities for our group, and has bent over backwards to make our stay enjoyable, and most accommodating. They have also set aside (3) special suites that can be converted to one whole barracks type accommodation. (Two Suites with the middle converted to sleep four additional occupants). That breaks down to approximately $ 20.00 a night for those selecting those accommodations. Trust us, the rooms are still far beyond the luxury we have enjoyed in the past. If you want more information on those special rooms, contact Jim Wodecki ASAP, as they will disappear fast. Prepare for an incredibly great time.

Christmas in Vietnam 1966

In Vietnam It's hard to see, a million lights upon a tree.
For as I sit here alone,
I see this Christmas again be born.
On this, the day before,
I see our savior being born.
It is a great day, in our life,
it's one we'll never forget to light.
But then we think as he was born,
of all the sins we may have worn.
The wise men came behind the light, to see the babe that was born that night.
They saw it fit to bring him gifts,
as we do now, upon the 25th.
We all forget what was meant to be,
that we may live for eternity.

Obituaries

Dear Tom,

I wrote this little note to let you know that my husband, Warren T. Prado, Sgt. USMC Vietnam Veteran, and a proud member of the Khe Sanh Veterans, passed away Feb 19, 2002.

I thought I had written when he passed away. He died of Agent Orange and God knows what else. He is buried here at Fort Sam Houston Cemetery, San Antonio, TX. He was a member of MSD (Military Detachment Services). These are veterans who provide complete military services for non-active veterans. He was a Post Commander of the American Legion, La Habia, Ca., and also the VFW here in San Antonio. He was an excellent Father, Husband and Marine. He was all Marine and very proud to be an American.

God Bless you all,
Mrs. Yolanda Prado

We Got Mail

Sharon Pelon, a teacher and loyal member of the Khe Sanh Veterans for years, has taught her students to love and respect our veterans. Through her organization, LASIA, she has involved her kids in many activities honoring veterans. On this occasion her students learned about veterans, and Gold Star mothers, and POW/MIA awareness. The following are a few letters her students wrote to veterans on Valentine's Day

Dear Veteran,

Everyone who cares about you should gather around and think. We should think about how glad we are to have all of this freedom and peace. All veterans and Gold Star mothers and people in the army have changed an important part of my life and a part of my heart. Since my dad is in the Army, I love and respect him and all of the things he did in the Army. I even respect people who aren't in my family but still in the Army. I just can't tell you how much you've been a part of my life. I will always remember all of the people that fought in the war and all of the people in the military just like my dad.

Sincerely, Katrina

Dear Khe Sanh Veteran,

We have a lot of snow in Wisconsin. We just had another storm. We shovel and shovel. We also skate, sled, throw snowballs and build snowmen.

We learned about onomatopoeia today, that is when a word sounds like the real sound. Some words are buzz, splash, thud, and plop. We have seen these words in stories and poems. Sometimes the words sound funny.

We made you a valentine. We are learning more about veterans, Gold Star Mothers, and men who went missing. We think a lot of you and thank you.

All of the kids of LASIA

Tom,

Enclosed is my check for my membership renewal, I am proud to be a member. Since we talked on the phone about a year ago, I have saved enough money to become a Life Member of the KSV. Reading the Red Clay magazine and talking to other veterans made me realize what a mistake it was to keep things inside of me all these years. When I discovered I was not the only one who has done this, it made my life a lot better. Things finally fell into place. I have to write a letter since I do not have the Internet with e-mail.

I am hoping that someone in the organization will remember me. I arrived in Vietnam from Okinawa, in 1967. After returning to Okinawa, I once again returned to Vietnam in January of 1968. I joined B Co 3RD Recon, commanded by Captain Reynolds. I was sent to Hill 861a to set up communications. That was my first meeting with Captain Earle Breeding and the men from E Co 2/26. Most of the guys could not pronounce my name, so they just called me "Corporal Jack." I was wounded on 05 Feb 1968 when the NVA attempted to overrun the hill.

I once ran an ad in the VFW Magazine looking for fellow Marines from E/Co 2/26. Bill Maves responded and said he remembered me, since he did all the medevacs. I was also contacted by a Michael Worth who asked me if I remembered a guy standing on a rise throwing grenade after grenade at the attacking enemy. Tom, if that was you, thanks, you probably saved my life keeping the NVA off of my back.

If anybody remembers me, I hope they will write. I am so proud to be a Marine, and being a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans.

Semper Fi,
Dan "Cpl Jack" Jachimiak

Record Budget for VA 2004

WASHINGTON – The Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) will receive a record budget of $64 billion for the current fiscal year, up $4.2 billion from the previous spending level. The budget for fiscal year 2004, which began Oct. 1, 2003, comes as VA is putting the finishing touches on the administration's proposed budget for fiscal year 2005, which will be formally unveiled Feb. 2. Among the major items in fiscal year 2004 budget are $28.4 billion (including $1.7 billion in collections) for health care, up $2.9 billion from the previous year, and $32.8 billion in benefits programs.

Other budgetary categories include:

- $143.4 million for the National Cemetery Administration, an $11 million hike over last year, plus nearly $32 million in grants for state cemeteries.
- Full funding to expedite the handling of veterans' claims for disability compensation and pensions, a total of $1 billion for all programs.
- Nearly $176 million for health care and other programs to assist homeless veterans, an increase of over $22 million from fiscal year 2003.
- $101 million to support state extended-care facilities, $3 million more than last year; and $522 million for construction, plus the authority to transfer another $400 million to health care construction.

Hepatitis C

For several sessions of Congress, Rep. Rodney Frelinghuysen (R-N.J.) has fought a lonely battle. He has sponsored legislation (H.R. 73, the Veterans Comprehensive Hepatitis C Health Care Act) that would provide testing for the hepatitis C virus for each veteran who served in the active military, naval, or air service during the Vietnam era, or who is considered to be at risk, is enrolled in the VA health care system, and who requests the test, or is otherwise receiving a physical examination or any care or treatment." If the test is positive, "medically appropriate" follow up tests would be provided, as well as appropriate treatment "in accordance with, the national protocol for the treatment of hepatitis" C."

Frelinghuysen's colleague, Sen. Jon Corzine (D-N.J.), introduced a companion bill, S. 1847, on Veterans' Day 2003.

The immediate thrust is to find co-sponsors for this needed legislation in both houses. Then, ideally, the appropriate subcommittees will hold hearings and leadership will push for passage of these measures. The VVA is one of the major organizations seeking more sponsors to get the bill passed.

Department of Veterans Affairs News Release 2003

VA To Grant Benefits To More Vietnam Veterans

WASHINGTON – Based upon a recently released review of scientific studies, Secretary of Veterans Affairs Anthony 1. Principi has decided to extend benefits to Vietnam veterans with chronic lymphocytic leukemia (CLL).

"Compelling evidence has emerged within the scientific community that exposure to herbicides such as Agent Orange is associated with CLL," Principi said. "I'm exercising my legal authority to ensure the full range of VA benefits is available to Vietnam veterans with CLL."

The ruling means that veterans with CLL who served in Vietnam during the Vietnam War don't have to prove that illness is related to their military service to qualify for Department of Veterans Affairs disability compensation. Additionally, for more than 20 years, VA has offered special access to medical care to Vietnam veterans with any health problems that may have resulted from Agent Orange exposure, and this decision will ensure higher-priority access to care in the future. The decision to provide compensation was based upon a recent report by the Institute of Medicine (IOM) that found among scientific studies "sufficient evidence of an association" between exposure to herbicides during the Vietnam War and CLL.

The IOM review, conducted at VA's request, was the latest in a series spanning the period since 1993 when the independent, non-governmental agency first published a report for VA that examined thousands of relevant scientific studies on the health effects of various substances to which American service members may have been exposed in Vietnam.

"On the modern battlefield, not all injuries are caused by shrapnel and bullets," Principi said. "This latest IOM study and my decision to act upon it are the latest examples of VA's continuing efforts to care for the needs of our combat veterans."

VA requested the IOM panel of experts to focus on CLL in their report because of veterans' concerns that CLL shares some similarities with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, which the IOM had previously connected to Agent Orange exposure.

Principi ordered the development of regulations to enable VA to begin paying compensation benefits once a final rule takes effect. Publication of that regulation is expected in the near future. VA will publish will publish further details, when available, on its Web site at http://www.vba.va.gov/bln/21/benefits/herbicide/.

In the meantime, veterans with questions about health-care, compensation and survivor benefits may call a toll-free help line at 1-800-749-8387 for information. VA also encourages Vietnam veterans who have not done so to request a subscription to Agent Orange Review, VA's free newsletter that will keep them abreast of developments on this issue and other policies and scientific findings in the future.

Newsletter subscription information is available from the help line number above. Back issues and additional information about Agent Orange are available at another VA Web site at http://www.va.gov/agentorangei.

Agent Orange–Herbicide Exposure

Vietnam Veterans Benefit From Agent Orange Rules

They are society's leaders. They run businesses; direct organizations; hold political office. In their mid-50s, they are at the height of their social and economic power, earning more than others in their age group. Yet, with their success, they can't escape the inevitable health concerns of a graying population.

They are Vietnam veterans, and the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) is concerned they may regard diseases associated with aging, such as prostate cancer, as just another illness rather than as the result of their military service in Southeast Asia.

VA wants these Vietnam veterans to know that they may be eligible for compensation and health care for certain diseases associated with Agent Orange, the defoliant sprayed to unmask enemy hiding places in the jungles throughout Vietnam.

Special health care and compensation benefits are available to the 2.6 million men and women who served in Vietnam between 1962 and 1975, only 3,300 of whom remain in uniform today. Those discharged during that period are the largest group of veterans receiving VA health care and monthly compensation.

Yet a small percentage of their disability claims are for illnesses scientists have listed as being associated with Agent Orange. VA presumes that all military personnel who served in Vietnam were exposed to Agent Orange, and federal law presumes that certain illnesses are a result of that exposure. This so-called "presumptive policy" simplifies the process of receiving compensation for these diseases since VA foregoes the normal requirements of proving that an illness began or was worsened during military service.

Based on clinical research, the following diseases are on VA's Agent Orange list of presumptive disabilities: chloracne, Hodgkin's disease, multiple myeloma, non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, porphyria cutanea tarda, respiratory cancers (lung, bronchus, larynx and trachea), soft tissue sarcoma, acute and subacute peripheral neuropathy and prostate cancer. A regulation is being developed to add diabetes mellitus.

In addition, monetary benefits, health care and vocational rehabilitation services are provided to Vietnam veterans' offspring with spina bifida, a congenital birth defect of the spine. A new law authorizes health care and monetary benefits to children of female veterans who served in Vietnam for certain additional birth defects. Those additional benefits under the new law will not be payable to the beneficiaries until Dec. 1, 2001.

Veterans who served in Vietnam during the war also are eligible for a complete physical examination. If a VA physician suspects a disease might be related to Agent Orange, VA will provide free medical care. Those who participate in the examination program become part of an Agent Orange Registry and receive periodic mailings from VA about the latest Agent Orange studies and new diseases being covered under VA policies.

Vietnam veterans and their families can contact VA for more information about these benefits. For the Agent Orange Registry physical examination, call a local VA hospital or clinic listed in the government pages of your phone book. To file a compensation claim for a current disability related to Agent Orange, veterans can call 1-800-827-1000 for an application form, or visit VA's Web site:

Announced From Washington Concerning New Vietnam Memorial Museum:

President Bush signed into law legislation authorizing the construction of a Visitor's Center to accompany the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial — "The Wall" on the National Mall. It will be an educational facility, built underground very near the Vietnam Memorial Wall. It will include history and tributes to all 3 million plus men and women who served in the Vietnam War.

Photos in memory of those who gave their lives and are listed on the Wall will be presented, plus more than 60,000 items that have been left at the Wall. The Memorial Fund will be responsible for raising funds needed to build and operate the new Visitor's Center. There will be no federal funding of this project, which will cost an estimated $13 million to build. Veterans, and organizations raised $8.4 million to build the Vietnam Memorial. This project will be a healing as well as an educational memorial for future generations to review and remember. Construction time is estimated to be three years.

Legislative News

H.R. 2297, the Veterans Benefits Act of 2003, which became Public Law 108147 on December 16, 2003, authorizes $1 billion over the next ten years for new and expanded benefits for disabled veterans, surviving spouses, and children. This law allows disabled veterans who own or want to start a small business, to receive on-the-job training for periods of less than six months, or when that training is needed to obtain a license to engage in a self-employment occupation, or is required for ownership and operation of a franchise. The new law also requires federal agencies and departments to give special consideration in federal contracting and procurement. In 2002, disabled veteran-owned businesses, received only 0.13 percent in federal contracts, despite a 3 percent statutory goal.

From the VVA Newsletter Jan-Feb 2004

In September, in an attempt to legislate down the long wait for appointments experienced by too many veterans, Rep. Ginny Brown Waite (R-Fl) introduced, the Veterans Timely Access to Health Care Act. Subcommittee hearings have already been held on the bill. H.R. 3094, which would make the standard for a veteran seeking primary care from the VA, 30 days from the date the veteran initially contacted the VA. Care would be rendered at the appropriate VA medical center, or at non-VA facilities should the VAMC be unable to accommodate the veteran within the specified time frame.

VVA testified in September before the Committee on Veterans' Affairs Subcommittee on Health in support of this bill

The goal of another piece of legislation, H.R. 2379, which seeks to improve access to health care for veterans residing in rural areas, faces a struggle. Language in the Rural Veteran Access to Care Act of 2003, introduced by Rep. Tom Osborne (R-Neb.), attempts to curb what some see as discrimination in deliv- ery of VA health care services to veterans residing in rural areas.

The problems these bills address are at least in part a result of inadequate resources. The administration request for each veteran using a VA medical facility, is only 60 cents on the dollar as compared to a Medicare patient. Until the veterans health care funding base is restored, admirable solutions offered by Reps. Osborne and Waite will not have the desired effect in restoring equity and reasonable standards for care at the VA.

In May, Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (R-Colo.) in May introduced S. 1092, the National War Permanent Tribute Historical Database Act. A companion bill was introduced in the House by his Democratic colleague, Rep. Mark Udall. This legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, authorized the establishment of a national database for purposes of identifying, locating, and cataloging the many memorials and permanent tributes to America's veterans. Sen. Campbell is also the author of S. 330, a bill that calls for severe criminal penalties for anyone who willfully injures or destroys, or attempts to injure or destroy, any structure, plaque, statue, or other monument on public property commemorating service in the Armed Forces. A related bill, H.R. 2076, sponsored by Rep. Christopher John (D-La.), called for grants to repair veterans memorials. In May, these bills became Public Law 108-29.

Facets of several of the aforementioned bills have been rolled into the Veterans Benefits Act of 2003. H.R. 2297 passed by the House in October by 399-0; its Senate companion, S. 1132, passed on the last day of October by unanimous consent. If signed into law by the President, the act would:

- make permanent the State Cemetery Grants Program
- increase the specially adapted automobile grant from $9,000 to $11,000, increase the specially adapted housing grant from $48,000 to $50,000 for the most severely disabled veterans and from $9,350 to $10,000 for other disabled veterans
- add cirrhosis as a presumed service connected disability for ex-POWs
- eliminate the requirement that an ex-POW must have been held in captivity for at least 30 days in order to qualify for presumption of service-connection for several specific disabilities
- make permanent the VA home loan program for members of the Selected Reserve
- expand eligibility for benefits to children born with spina bifida to veterans who served near the demilitarized zone in Korea between October 1, 1967 and May 7, 1975

Finally, several bills have been introduced with a common theme and goal: to insure adequate funding for veterans health care. These include 8.50, introduced by Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.); H.R. 2475, the Veterans Health Care Full Funding Act, introduced by House Veterans Affairs Committee Chairman Chris Smith; and H.R. 2318, the Assured Funding for Veterans Health Care Act of 2003, intro- duced by Rep. Lane Evans, ranking member on the House Veterans Affairs Committee. It is the position of VVA that we must restore the funding base to at least parity with recipients of Medicare, and then move to insure that reasonable increases match increases in medical inflation as well as by greater demand on the system.

Tom,

I thought you, and some of the other members, might be interested in the enclosed from The Economist December 13 issue. If someone had suggested this when we were all looking out over the perimeter back when, the laughter would have been pretty intense.

It really is a weird world.

Planting Trouble – The Coffee Industry

The Economist, December 2003

The village of Khe Sanh, a former battleground in the hills of central Vietnam, is something of an oddity: a booming coffee town amid a global coffee slump. During the mid-1990s when coffee prices soared, Vietnamese farmers planted coffee bushes with abandon. In a decade, the country grew from the world's 16th biggest exporter to the second, helping to create a worldwide coffee glut in the process. This week, as coffee farmers and industry officials gathered in Geneva for a crisis meeting, the Vietnamese are pushing ahead with a new strategy, one that could shake up the market all over again.

The plunge in coffee prices brought ruin to many farmers worldwide. According to a new report by Oxfam, a British aid group, the slump is boosting the drugs trade. In Ethiopia, which produces some of the finest coffee, many growers have uprooted their bushes to grow Khat, which can be chewed as a narcotic and sold for more money. In other countries, such as Peru, coca, which can be processed into cocaine, is being grown as an alternative.

Ray Stubbe

Vietnamese coffee growers have also suffered because of the glut in the market. But not the farmers in Khe Sanh, who have prospered and in the process prompted a nationwide recovery scheme. The key to Khe Sanh's survival is arabica, pricier than the robusta variety most Vietnamese farmers grow. Vo Danh Ke, who owns 2.7 hectares of arabica bushes near the village, says they earned him the money to but a new motorcycle, a television, floor tiles and roofing. His neighbor, Dang Sy Tich, explains how he made enough from his arabica crop to pay off his initial investment in land in just four years. The price has fallen recently, he concedes, but he is still earning a better living then he did growing cassava and rice. "I want to stick with coffee," he concludes.

At the moment, arabica accounts for less than 5% of the coffee bushes in the country. But production has doubled since 2000, according to VICOFA, the Vietnamese growers association. Doan Trieu Nhan, VICOFA's chairman, explains that cheap labor and high productivity make Vietnam one of the world's lowest-cost producers of coffee of all varieties.

Workers spreading outcoffee beans from Madame Poilane's coffee plantation, Khe Sanh village. 1967.

So he reasons the solution to low prices is not to stop growing coffee, but to improve quality and switch to varieties with higher margins. Vietnamese farmers did cut down perhaps 10% of their coffee bushes last year, he admits, but mainly in infertile areas where they never should have been planted in the first place. Instead, VICOFA is encouraging struggling robusta farmers to switch to arabica. Mr. Nhan hopes the same factors that made Vietnam the world's biggest robusta-producer will propel an expansion of arabica.

That is easier said than done. Most of Vietnam's coffee grows in the south, where the climate is not suited to arabica. A special training scheme, whereby big international buyers such as Kraft and Sara Lee, teach growers how to meet their quality standards, also promoted the spread of arabica in Khe Sanh.

In general, however, the Vietnamese government makes a mess of agricultural improvement schemes, says Mandy Woodhouse of Oxfam. It has found the poorest coffee farmers on the least fertile land receive the least help from the government in terms of training, subsidized inputs, concessionary loans and so on. Many of these farmers come from ethnic minorities, speak little Vietnamese, have little formal education and so have the least access to information about prices. They are the people, by and large, who lost money at the height of the slump and who had no safety net to tide them over.

On the other hand, middle-class Vietnamese are investing successfully in arabica without any help, much as they rushed into robusta in the middle 1990s. Duong Xuan Vien, another farmer in Khe Sanh, says he gave up his desk job at a state-owned firm and moved to the hills to grow coffee. "No one wants to quit," he says. " Even now we're planting more."

I am a Khe Sanh Siege Marine. I was stationed on the main base during the Siege, and was assigned to headquarters company, 26th Marines. I have been trying to attend the July 4th reunions for the last 3 years, but I am a builder, and am very busy at that time of the year. The main reason that I have not been able to attend is I live in Wichita, KA, and the people go wild here with fireworks during that weekend. Each year a number of homes and businesses catch fire and some of them have burnt to the ground. I stay outside until about midnight each night, watching for fires. It sounds nearly as bad as 'Nam, if you can believe it. There are laws against shooting fireworks in the city, but the cops can only catch a small percentage. When I move from here, I will be able to attend some of the Khe Sanh Reunions. I am really looking forward to it, as I have much to offer once I get going.

As you see, I am ordering a Khe Sanh Vet hat. I was hoping that it could look like that dirty red soiled clothing that we wore at the end of the siege. But I am still thankful that I can buy one. I will wear it proudly with my Marine Corps emblem and the two purple hearts.

About five years ago I had another case of bleeding intestines, so I gave the VA one more shot at telling me what was causing this condition. They claimed that it was caused by post combat stress (PTSD). I was not able to work, so after a year and half of my refusing to go to their meeting and to enter their program, I finally had no choice but to give in. It has changed my life for the better. However, a side effect of their therapy was to make me write about my experiences. I could only write about a half an hour per day. However, I was determined to do my best. To make a long process short, I have begun writing a couple of novels about 'Nam.

I have been writing poems and songs about 'Nam and veterans. I had originally planned on sending them off to the song agents, one at a time. But the dam broke, and I found myself writing an album instead of just a few songs. I have received tremendous help from others. Everyone wants to jump aboard, after they read a few of the songs. This is the reason this Khe Sanh Hat letter is so long. I had stumbled across an amazing event that apparently happened close to the Khe Sanh fighting, wherein Capt. John Gardner, a Marine helicopter pilot crashed and died in Laos on June 5, 1967.

I read the same Capt. John Gardner, reappeared in April of 1968, and led a lost Marine patrol out of the jungles and back to the CP. I have been doing as much research as I possibly can on this story. I found it unbelievable. But I cannot find anyone from the crash in '67 or in the lost Marine patrol in '68. I have not turned over every stone on my end yet and will exhaust all leads in the next month or so. I ran across the name Jim Wodecki, and my memory locked into the 2002 Khe Sanh Reunion in Texas. So I thought I would kill two birds with one letter.

In going through the Capt. Gardner story, which I know little of, could you offer some additional light and/or guidance on it? It would be very helpful. I do not want to put anyone out in regard to their personal time, but if you could point me in the direction to more facts regarding this story, I would be very grateful. I have run this story past a couple of military people and it gives them goose bumps. When I'm done, their eyes are very wide open with that strange stare. I know this could be an intriguing story if it can be put together. I do a lot of late night writing and will push on this story. I am sending you some of the paper work I have came up with, so you won't need to duplicate it, and I will do serious digging just as soon as I finish a couple of writing projects I am committed to.

If you are not able to help, I will not be disappointed as I have had to really dig for what little I came up with and realize how difficult it is. I would love to find out who was in that lost patrol in '68. They might have been one of ours at Khe Sanh. I do have a Khe Sanh Combat Manual, and will begin reading it cover to cover soon, where maybe some more leads will be found. The reason I am so gung ho on this matter, is that I may write a historical review about events. I feel like they are too special to be taken to the grave. Anyone who survived the siege realizes that the Man upstairs was watching over us. These events are much too special to let die with us vets. I realize that it is very touchy, as I totally ran from anything that was about Nam or about the military for 30 years. Thanks to the PTSD classes, I can now face a little of it at a time. I am recording what we went through for the sake of history. Well it is good to break the ice with another Khe Sanh survivor, and I am trying to find a way to attend the Reunions in July. I am planning on moving, so it may be a better situation in the near future.

Thanks so much for your time. I do plan to be submitting some poems and writings to Red Clay in the near future.

PUBLISHER'S NOTES: Lee, I am so glad to hear that you have finally realized that opening up and discussing your service at Khe Sanh, and writing about them has brought you relief.

The story you have been researching about Lt. John Gardner not being KIA and actually leading a lost patrol back to Khe Sanh is totally fictional. Your own research and facts supplied by the Marine Corps and others, as written below, shows it did not and could not have occurred — even with the wife of Stephen Hanson previously identifying her husband as a captured POW.

As you know, in September 2000, the remains of John Gardner, Stephen Hanson, Timothy Bodden and Bill Laney, were recovered at the site of the crash and positively identified. The only remains still missing are those of Ronald Dexter. This should not deter you from any further research or writing about your experiences. Keep up the good work and please keep sending us more articles for publication.

Synopsis:

On June 3,1967, Capt. Steven P. Hanson, pilot; 1stLt. John G. Gardner, co-pilot; Sgt. Timothy R. Bodden, crew chief/door gunner; L/Cpl. Frank E. Cius, door gunner; SFC Billy R. Laney, SFC Ronald J. Dexter, SFC Charles F. Wilklow and an unknown number of ARVN personnel, all passengers, were aboard a CH-46A helicopter on an extraction mission in Laos.

The USMC aircraft picked up a U.S. Army Special Forces team attached to MACV-SOG, Command and Control, and the ARVN troops they were working with. Military Assistance Command Vietnam Studies and Observation Group (MACV-SOG) was a joint service, high command unconventional warfare task force, which provided their "cover" while under secret orders to MACV-SOG. These teams performed deep penetration missions of strategic reconnaissance and interdiction which were called, depending on the time frame, "Shining Brass" or "Prairie Fire" missions.

The aircraft received extensive automatic small arms fire upon takeoff from the Landing Zone, took numerous hits and crashed 350 meters from the LZ, located about 15 miles inside Laos west of the A Shau Valley. The helicopter did not burn on impact, and continued to receive fire. Three ARVN troops were able to return to the LZ where the troops remaining at the LZ were extracted the following day. The troops waiting at the LZ could not search because of hostile fire in the immediate area. Air searches located the survivors of the crash, but they could not be evacuated. The on1y American found to be in a position to be safely evacuated was SFC Wilklow.

SFC Wilklow gave the following account of what happened to the crew and passengers aboard the CH46:

SFC Dexter appeared uninjured and left the wreckage with a large number of ARVN troops. Capt Hanson was wounded and outside the helicopter, but stated that he had to return to get his carbine. The Marine Corps believes he died of the wounds he received when the aircraft was overrun, although Hanson's wife later identified her husband in a widely distributed Vietnamese propaganda photograph of a pilot being captured.

When last seen, all the other Americans were still in the wreckage, and enemy troops (the U.S. Army states they were Viet Cong; the U.S. Marines say they were North Vietnamese Army, possibly a joint force of both) were tossing grenades toward the aircraft with no attempt to capture the personnel inside. Wilklow left the crash site, and noted that gunfire suddenly stopped. He continued to evade the enemy and was picked up 3 days later.

When Mr. Ky, the Nung Commander was being evacuated by the last helicopter out, he noted several men (undoubtedly Dexter and the ARVN) in a large bomb crater firing red star clusters from a flare gun.

Frank Cius was taken prisoner and released from Hanoi in 1973. He was one of the dozen or so captured by the Vietnamese and taken immediately to Hanoi and were called the "Laos" prisoners. In reality, none of the dozen had been held in Laos. Ronald Dexter, according to Frank Cius, was captured, and died in captivity on July 29, 1967.

John Gardner, according to the USMC, died on the ground after the crash of the aircraft due to intense enemy fire. Billy Laney was last seen lying wounded on the floor of the aircraft between a crewmember with a broken back and the door gunner with a head wound.

NOTE: The USMC states that Bodden, crewchief/door gunner, was shot in the back and never left the aircraft, but reports received by the National League of Families indicate that he was definitely alive after the aircraft crashed. The U.S. did not know Cius was captured until he was released, evidently believing he never exited the aircraft. Wilklow had indicated that the Vietnamese were not trying to capture the occupants of the aircraft. Therefore, as door gunner, he must have been the "door gunner with the head wound", and Bodden the "crewmember with a broken back".

The following information was supplied to me by Jim Wodecki.

The SOG team had left Khe Sanh airbase to see if a 52 strike had knocked out the HQ for the entire Ho Chi Minh Trail. The 9man SOG HATCHETT force was inserted by helicopters from HMM-165. One of the birds crashed and killed the pilot. Major Richard Romine took command of the ground unit during a tremendous ground battle. Romine was later awarded the Navy Cross for his actions. Shark-3, a Chinook 46 from HMM-165, piloted by Captain Hanson, co-pilot lst Lt J. Gardner, landed during the rescue operation, and embarked SFCs Dexter, Laney and Wilklow. Laney had already been wounded in his back. As the plane departed, SSgt Bodden was hit in the stomach and Laney took several more hits. Both engines were knocked out and the plane crashed. Eventually Cius and Dexter were captured, Wilklow was rescued three days later, badly wounded and suffering dehydration. Laney and Dexter died on July 30th 1967 en route to Hanoi. Dexter's body was buried. Cius was released and returned to American forces on 05 Mar 1973.

Of Interest to All Marine Veterans of the Battle of Khe Sanh

The Marine Corps Heritage Foundation is planning to develop the National Museum of the Marine Corps.

The following is from a letter sent by Lt Gen Ron Christmas, President, The Marine Corps Heritage Foundation

It takes a tremendous amount of vision to embrace the idea of a museum that has not been built yet, so I am particularly grateful that supporters with foresight like you stand with us.

That is why, as our plans develop for the National Museum of the Marine Corps, I want to share with you glimpses into what will make our museum rival the finest in the world.

While no museum setting could ever possibly replicate the dangers Marines face in battle, we will use state-of-the-art technology to create exhibits that do justice to the heroism and courage of Marines. Yet make no mistake — it will take the most creative and well-researched designs to sufficiently pay homage to the tremendous sacrifices of Marines.

With your support, we will create dynamic exhibits — like the ones described in the enclosed Exhibit Briefs — that will immerse our visitors in pivotal moments in Marine history.

These "immersion exhibits" will portray critical scenes from World War II, Korea and Vietnam. From the savage battle for Iwo Jima ... to the depiction of the hardships faced by Marines fighting in the Toktong Pass in the dead of winter in Korea. .. to a helicopter re-supply/medevac at Khe Sanh during the height of the 1968 Siege in the Vietnam War... visitors will be engulfed in the sights, sounds, even smells of Marines in action.

State-of-the-art polypanel screens, multi-directional speakers, moving platforms and figures, lighting effects, and other multi-media techniques will be used to re-create a particular moment in our history within these immersion exhibits — figuratively, transporting visitors through time and space.

These kinds of no-holds-barred exhibits will provide a valuable window into our glorious history, and instill the deepest respect for the Marines of our past, present, and future.

And I'm certain you agree that the dramatic stories of Marine valor deserve nothing less than the very finest museum technology and design innovation.

In fact, some of the immersion exhibits we plan to bring you eclipse anything that has been seen in any other museum known to us — truly world-class exhibits that are a fitting tribute to our remarkable heritage.

As you can imagine, Marine history simply cannot be vividly portrayed through the conventional, two dimensional displays that are commonplace in museums. It is only through action that the heroic actions of Marines can be adequately conveyed.

That is why the National Museum of the Marine Corps must go beyond what is expected of museums to capture defining moments in history through the eyes of Marines. Indeed, our Marine heritage deserves more than the conventional displays found in many museums.

As you'll see in the enclosed Exhibit Briefs, immersion exhibits — while costly — will give visitors a sense of the risks that Marines take every day to protect our country. But it will be well worth the extra expense when we create a museum that is worthy of our proud heritage.

With your continued commitment today, we will ensure that our Museum will capture our unique, remarkable history in the most compelling way. I know you share my enthusiasm for preserving and celebrating the precious heritage of the United States Marine Corps. God bless you, and God bless our Corps!

Semper Fidelis, Lt Gen Ron Christmas

Please be sure to read the following Exhibit Briefs, which detail plans for two of our immersion exhibits: the landing on Iwo Jima in our World War II gallery; and Hill 881South, in our Vietnam gallery — just two of the many pivotal moments in our history.

Hill 881-South, 1968 Siege

Within our Vietnam War gallery, an immersion exhibit will depict a moment in the 1968 Khe Sanh Siege. The setting will portray Hill 881-South, a critical outpost of Khe Sanh, during a dramatic helicopter re-supply/medevac at the height of the extended battle.

Visitors will enter from the stern ramp of a reconstructed CH-46 helicopter, almost as if they were replacements, hurrying to exit the helicopter at the command of the crew chief to make way for the wounded Marines to be embarked before the NVA mortars find their mark.

The scene presents the hilltop, blasted and burned, devoid of vegetation, stitched with zig-zag trenches, sandbagged bunkers, and gun positions. A tattered American flag flaps bravely in the down- draft. Macro artifacts in the set include a 105mm howitzer, a 106mm recoilless rifle, and an 81mm mortar, each heavily sandbagged. The use of scenic backdrops and projections add realistic dimensions to the set.

Visitors will feel the tension of the moment as haunted eyes stare at the well choreographed offload/medevacs, knowing the consequences of even the smallest delay.

There is a feeling of urgency to accomplish the necessary tasks rapidly, knowing the next NVA mortar attack could come at any time. Poised close at hand, a corpsman holds an IV bottle aloft over his wounded Marine on a stretcher, anxiously looking for the crew chief's signal to stuff the casualty inside. The radio is crackling. The pilot's voice is tense. We hear the unmistakable sounds of not-too- distant mortars firing.

The lookout warns, "INCOMING!"

The Landing on Iwo Jima, 19 February 1945

In an immersion exhibit within our World War II gallery, the landing on Iwo Jima will be prominently featured. Visitors will enter into a re-creation of a dimly lit ship's compartment, where unseen infrared sensors set off an audio track of exchanges between gathering Marines coming from all around them.

The distant sound of explosions can be heard, then the rasping voice of the Platoon Sergeant at the head of the table says, "Awright, you Marines, listen up. It's almost time to embark our landing craft. Let's take one final look at our assault plan."

At that moment, a scale model of Iwo Jima lights up. "That's our beach," visitors will hear, "Green Beach on the far left, directly below Mount Suribachi. We land, we attack straight across the island, cut off Suribachi before dark. Hit the beach and don't stop. The enemy will hit us with everything they've got. Keep moving and don't bunch up. Follow me."

And that's when the participatory experience really begins. Visitors will step down into a simulated landing craft and sit in near darkness on benches along the bulkhead. The craft rocks gently in the water . .. the engine roars. The sound of major caliber naval guns firing from behind, the shrieking of shells overhead, the muffled explosions ashore — all can be heard.

Flashes of rocket fire and shipboard guns suddenly bathe parts of the bench opposite the visitors in half-light. Then, visitors see the Marines whose voices they heard during the briefing. The faces of lifelike figures appear and disappear in the flickering of the light as we hear their unspoken thoughts from directional speakers.

Through the landing craft's periscope a video sequence depicts the island and its beaches looming larger. The sergeant's voice is heard: "Lock and load!" The Marines opposite the visitors do so, and then go black. Then the ramp lowers and the voice shouts "Go! Move out! Go!"

The visitors follow orders — and exit onto Green Beach in the middle of the action, surrounded by a cacophony of sounds and flashing images depicting the beach and all its horrors. Dear Ernie,

A recent article in Red Clay, the magazine of the Khe SanhVeteran's Association, had a photograph depicting the trench line alongside the airstrip built by Sam Messer and the Sea Bees. It jogged my memory of the time India 3/26 was relieved from our long duration on Hill 881S. We were airlifted off the Hill and thought we were going to a relatively safe position. Unfortunately, we found ourselves fending for our lives in those same trenches. I don't think they knew what to do with us while awaiting further transportation to Quang Tri. The base was still coming under rocket attack and there were no safe structures to house us. We sat in these 3-foot deep shallow depressions that they called a trench line. On Hill 881S we knew what a trench line was, and this was no trench line. We missed the security of our bunny holes on the Hill. Hell, when we first settled in on the Hill, Dabney made us dig the trenches deeper and deeper (thank God he did!). We slept by day, and dug all night when the cloud cover protected us from snipers. Dabney gave direct orders that any Marine caught without a flak jacket & helmet, would be punished. I think they needed someone like Dabney at the base to show them what a real protective trench line looked like.

We watched as a C-130 lumbered in for a landing, and headed for the place where they made their turn, so they could immediately take off. Those getting off jumped as the plane slowed for the turn. As the plane prepared to take off, the rockets came in. Everyone screaming, "Incoming," and I heard those dreadful words, "Corpsman Up!" We assisted the corpsman with many wounded Marines. Finally, 3rd Platoon, led by Lt. Larry "Budda" Boudria (to whom I owe my life), got its chance to fly out of the Khe Sanh Base. Our Freedom Bird was there and when the rear ramp of the CH-46 was lowered, we all raced to escape our months in Hell. SWOOSH, a round came in and a fellow Marine fell injured. The chopper waited bravely as I threw down my pack, propped the injured man on my back and ran across an open field, his weight making me fall to my knees a few times, until I dropped him at the door of Charlie Med. News journalists were watching my actions and never came to my aid. When one of them asked me, "What do you have there?" — referring to the injured Marine I just dropped off — I turned around and said, "Here is what I have," and I punched the guy right on the jaw. Without missing a step I charged back to the waiting chopper.

As I approached the chopper at full gallop, I saw my pack with all my worldly possessions, lying on the ground. My attention was immediately drawn to the Marines on the chopper yelling, "Come on, Doc! The pilot is not waiting another second!" Possessions or Life; Possessions or Freedom? I boarded the Chopper and left my worldly goods for the last flight that day outta Dodge. Months later, my wallet caught up with me. The only item I really miss is the Graphlex 35mm camera, which I used to take the pictures now displayed on the Hill 881S Warrior website. It was the only possession passed down to me from my Uncle, 1st Lt. David Steinberg USMCR, who directed fire for 1/13 from his Observation Plane the first 2 days of the battle for Iwo Jima. He could not land on his ship the Saratoga since it was hit by a Kkamikaze, so he was directed to a smaller carrier, the Bismarck Sea, which later was also hit midship in the powder magazine and sunk with him aboard. I lost his camera but still have his name.

We landed in Quang Tri near dusk. We were greeted with steaks, showers and clean clothes to replace the gear we wore during the entire siege. We went to sleep on the clean white sand (no more red clay) in tents set-up right across the Quang Tri airstrip. We were finally free from the Hill, but in the middle of the night the Hell returned when a Chinese rocket landed in the next tent and killed a few more of those that survived Khe Sanh! I, like others ran into the night, not knowing where to seek shelter or even what the Hell was going on! Those bastards knew we made it through our time on Hill 881S and wanted one more shot at us and they got it! Where is the trench line, where is my bunny hole?

Tom,

Here is a check for my 2004 dues and a donation to help out the Red Clay. You do a great job and I enjoy reading it.

I was in Hawaii on R&R when 2/26 moved to Khe Sanh in January 1968. When I got back I joined up with some of the unit still at Phu Bai. I arrived at Khe Sanh just before the ammo dump blew and I think the truck convoy I went on to Hill 558 was the last one to leave Khe Sanh before the siege. I joined the forward air control team on top of hill 558 and helped to build the air control bunker. When "E" Company on Hill 861a was attacked, the forward air controller was wounded and medevaced so I was sent to replace him until a permanent replacement could be found. I think I was there about 2-3 weeks. When I got back to Hill 558, I was assigned to the headquarters area at the base of Hill 558. I worked radio watch and landed helicopters until I left to return to the US. I spent an extra 2 weeks in Vietnam because I didn't get out of Khe Sanh in time to get my flight out of country.

Here are some pictures I have from Khe Sanh. My camera got wet so the film has red streaks on some pictures and some came out too dark. I thought you may want some for web site or in Red Clay.

Sting of Battle

With Bayonets Fixed: Khe Sanh—30 March 1968

Reprinted from Marine Corps Gazzette, March 2004

by Lt. Col. Kenneth Pipes, USMC(Ret)

One of the most sobering experiences in life is the responsibility of leading young Marines into the teeth of the enemy knowing that some of them will not come out of it alive. It takes courage, faith, an indomitable spirit, and an unfailing trust in the capabilities of the men entrusted to your care. Fighting at Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam in 1967–68 was an ongoing, brutal fight to the death between Marines and soldiers of the North Vietnamese Army. This entry in the 'Sting of Battle' series takes us through a particularly poignant episode of combat as seen through the eyes of a young Marine rifle company commander.

On 30 March 1968, Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines (B/1/26) proceeded from the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base to their pre-designated line of departure located near forward units of the North Vietnamese Army's (NVA's) 8th Battalion, 66th Regiment, 304th (Hanoi) Iron Division. Poised against each other in the coming attack were lineal descendants of one of the most famous divisions involved in the siege against the French at Dien Bien Phu in 1954 and elements of the 26th Marines, one of three Marine regiments of the 5th Marine Division that led the assault against Japan's island fortress of Iwo Jima in February-March 1945.

The attack, scheduled for first light, began at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Immediately upon commencing the assault, the two lead platoons came under extremely heavy mortar, rocket-propelled grenade, automatic weapons, and small arms fire from the 8th NVA Battalion who occupied extensive, well-constructed, mutually supporting bunkers and trench systems.

Under the umbrella of withering fire from nine batteries of Marine and Army artillery that pummeled the flanks of the objective area and created a rolling barrage 50 to 70 meters in front of the two attack platoons, the Marines began breaching the NVA positions. The fight for fire superiority hung in the balance until the attached flame section and combat engineer detachment entered the fray. As their predecessors did on Iwo Jima, these units, covered and assisted by Marine riflemen, began to blind, blast, and burn their way into the NVA fortifications.

For the next four hours the Marines of Company B, some of whom had undergone 70-plus days and nights of continuous, killing bombardment by NVA heavy artillery, rocket, mortar, and concentrated sniper fire, gained some measure of retribution as they routed the NVA soldiers from their fiercely defended positions. Within the breached positions our Marine riflemen were literally walking over the dead and dying NVA defenders.

From the moment of close contact until some 4 hours later when we received the order to withdraw back into the combat base, the fight was hand to hand, bayonet to bayonet, knife to knife, grenade against grenade, and rifleman against rifleman, with the trump card as always, Marines using flamethrowers and combat engineers employing demolitions!

It may seem to some readers that this was just another example of a typical seasoned Marine combat unit doing its job, just another typical day at the office. It wasn't. A significant point must be made here! The rifle company that attacked the NVA that Saturday morning was not the same company that had moved from Hill 881 South 3 months earlier to participate in a battalion sweep toward the Laotian border, and then moved into the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The continuous enemy bombardment while we were in the combat base had hurt B/1/26 more than any other similarly sized defending unit and was exacerbated by the tragic loss of most of an entire platoon on 25 February resulting from an ambush by a reinforced company from the 8th NVA Battalion.

Most of the Marines in Company B on 30 March had joined during the Siege as replacements after the Siege had begun. These young men had traveled a hard road including boot camp, skills training at the Infantry Training Regiment, Staging Battalion at Camp Pendleton, a flight to Vietnam, reporting in to the 26th Marines, exiting the aircraft at the Khe Sanh Combat Base under fire, reporting for assignment to 1st Battalion, and finally, still under fire, joining Company B. To a rifleman, they had no combat experience at the fire team, squad, platoon, or company level.

As it has always been in combat, if it had not been for the leveling skills of a handful of short-timer leaders, privates first class and corporals, led by an experienced company executive officer, company gunnery sergeant, and outstanding platoon commanders, the execution of this company-sized raid on 30 March 1968 would never have moved beyond our frontline trenches.

As noted by the commanding officer of 1/26 and the S–3 (operations officer) who planned the company raid, "The members of Co B performed individually and collectively in a manner normally expected only of seasoned and combat-experienced Marines." I believe that their brilliant feat can only be attributed to their deep and overriding desire to avenge the prior loss of Marines of their company, most of whom they never knew or met! To them and them alone goes the credit for executing arguably the first successful company-sized offensive assault outside the wire since the ambush of their mates on 25 February, and for making it such a success!

These Marines totally decimated the 8th NVA Battalion, including the enemy battalion commander and his staff. In so doing, the Marines of Company B killed at least 115 NVA officers and soldiers and wounded an untold number of their survivors, according to information later passed to the company that had been intercepted from monitored enemy radio traffic!

Still later, Marines from B/1/26 (none above the rank of corporal) who had participated in the raid were awarded two Navy Crosses, nine Silver Stars, eight Bronze Stars, and two Navy Commendation Medals with Combat "V" for valor for individual acts of courage, gallantry, and heroism! Additionally, over 100 Purple Hearts were presented, with several of these Marines earning their awards for receiving a second and third wound.

Just like their predecessors from Iwo Jima, to a man, the Marines of Company B remain intensely proud of their 26th Marines heritage! We will always feel that we who were privileged to serve with Bravo's young, inexperienced, Marine infantrymen that fateful Saturday morning were truly in the company of men who were, are, and will always be "The Immortals"!

Subsequent to the fighting on 30 March 1968, the company was the recipient of the following from the commanding general of the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam:

> Officers and men of B/1/26 USMC deserve highest praise for aggressive patrol action north of Khe Sanh on 30 March. Heavy casualties inflicted on bunkers and entrenched enemy forces indicate typical Marine esprit de corps and professionalism. Well done!
> Gen William Westmoreland

And further remarks from our 26th Marines regimental commander:

> I add my congratulations to the above well-earned commendatory remarks.

The Battle For Lang Vei – 36th Anniversary

by L.T. Cooper
Pictures By Ray W. Stubbe and Harvey Saal (Plaques)

February 7th marks the 36th anniversary of the attack on the U.S. Army Special Forces Camp at Lang Vei, Vietnam (Detachment A-l0l, Company C, 5th Special Forces Group). Beginning at about 1800 hours on February 6, the camp was subjected to an unusually intense mortar and artillery barrage. Shortly after midnight on Wednesday, February 7, 1968 the camp was assaulted and overrun by an estimated enemy force of over 400 infantry from the 66th NVA Regiment supported by eleven Soviet made PT-76 tanks. Fierce ground combat, often hand to hand, took place over the next sixteen hours. By late afternoon, the surviving Special Forces soldiers who had also evaded capture along with their remaining Montagnard and CIDG counterparts were extracted by helicopter or made their escape on foot to the U.S. Marine combat base at Khe Sanh, 8km away. There they received basic medical treatment and were subsequently evacuated to the U.S. Navy hospital at Da Nang. The enemy attack stopped at Lang Vei and did not continue east toward Khe Sanh which was an intended target.

Among the Special Forces defenders were two of the camp's four radio operators, SP/4 William G. McMurry Jr., and SSG Dennis L. Thompson. During the assault, they were wounded and captured, spending the next five years as POWs. The camp's senior medic, SFC Eugene Ashley, Jr. was killed in action during the attack and was posthumously awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for his actions at Lang Vei. Major George Quamo (MACV-SOG) was posthumously awarded the Distinguished Service Cross for his actions at Lang Vei. The attack on Lang Vei Special Forces camp was the first time that the enemy used armor in the Vietnam War.

In April, the 1st Air Cavalry Division finally relieved the Marines at Khe Sanh. Elements of the 1st Air Cav made their way to Lang Vei camp to find nothing except empty trench lines, caved in bunkers, and the hulks of destroyed tanks. However, clear evidence that a horrific battle had taken place was still vividly apparent.

Enemy losses were estimated to have been seven PT-76 tanks along with their three-man crews (confirmed destroyed) and two tanks (probable), and 250 NVA infantry soldiers killed in action. Thirty-six years later, there is still much left to indicate where Khe Sanh combat base was once located. The original airstrip is recognizable, but is barren and little will grow on it. The tall grasses that are indigenous to that region of Southeast Asia have long since reclaimed the surrounding hills where brave Americans once fought. At the former site of Lang Vei camp, the remains of concrete bunkers are still visible but the area is overgrown with foliage. The lone monument to the attack is a PT-76 tank that the Socialist Republic of Vietnam has placed where the camp was once located. Note: As of May 2003, both of these locations (Khe Sanh combat base and Lang Vei camp) are in the process of becoming tourist attractions and are visited by American veterans of the Vietnam War. A billboard has been erected in the area which proclaims that Vietnam is "A Destination For The New Millennium" with a website http:ffwww.vietnamtourism.com

Sfc. Ashley, distinguished himself by conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity while serving with Detachment A-101, Company C. Sfc. Ashley was the senior special forces Advisor of a hastily organized assault force whose mission was to rescue entrapped U.S. special forces advisors at Camp Lang Vei. During the initial attack on the special forces camp by North Vietnamese army forces, Sfc. Ashley supported the camp with high explosive and illumination mortar rounds. When communications were lost with the main camp, he assumed the additional responsibility of directing air strikes and artillery support. Sfc. Ashley organized and equipped a small assault force composed of local friendly personnel. During the ensuing battle, Sfc. Ashley led a total of 5 vigorous assaults against the enemy, continuously exposing himself to a voluminous hail of enemy grenades, machinegun and automatic weapons fire. Throughout these assaults, he was plagued by numerous booby-trapped satchel charges in all bunkers on his avenue of approach. During his fifth and final assault, he adjusted air strikes nearly on top of his assault element, forcing the enemy to withdraw and resulting in friendly control of the summit of the hill. While exposing himself to intense enemy fire, he was seriously wounded by machinegun fire but continued his mission without regard for his personal safety. After the fifth assault he lost consciousness and was carried from the summit by his comrades only to suffer a fatal wound when an enemy artillery round landed in the area. Sfc. Ashley displayed extraordinary heroism in risking his life in an attempt to save the lives of his entrapped comrades and commanding officer. His total disregard for his personal safety while exposed to enemy observation and automatic weapons fire was an inspiration to all men committed to the assault. The resolute valor with which he led 5 gallant charges placed critical diversionary pressure on the attacking enemy and his valiant efforts carved a channel in the overpowering enemy forces and weapons positions through which the survivors of Camp Lang Vei eventually escaped to freedom. Sfc. Ashley's bravery at the cost of his life was in the highest traditions of the military service, and reflects great credit upon himself, his unit, and the U.S. Army.

KHE SANH: U.S. Army Air Defenders Defend Besieged Marine Combat Base

Stories and Photos by Bruce Geiger

Khe Sanh Combat Base, site of the most famous siege and one of the most controversial battles of the American Vietnam War sits quietly on a barren plateau, surrounded by vegetation-covered hill, often obscured by mist and fog. It is hard to imagine as you stand in this peaceful, verdant land that in this very place in early 1968 the bloodiest battle of the Vietnam War took place. Little things help you picture what the history books say happened here. The outline of the airfield remains distinct (to this day nothing will grow on it) In pieces, the ground is literally carpeted with bullets and rusting shell casings.

– Vietnam, A Lonely Planet Travel Survival Kit.

"There is no feeling in the world as good as being airborne out of Khe Sanh," wrote Michael Herr in Dispatches, one of the Vietnam War's most celebrated books, but that was thirty years ago. Today travel guides beckon tourists to visit Khe Sanh Combat Base. It's one of several abandoned combat bases, including Con Thien, Camp Carroll and the Rockpile that you can visit as part of a day trip, provided you have a good four-wheel drive. Buy a travel permit for ten dollars at the Quang Tri Province Tourist Office in Dong Ha and follow National Highway 9, which parallels the old DMZ, west out of Dong Ha toward Laos. Turn northwest at the triangular intersection just before you reach Khe Sanh Town. The base is on the right-hand side of the road, two and a half kilometers from the intersection.

Thirty years ago, I led a column of Dusters and Quad 50s out of Khe Sanh at the end of a 75-day Siege. Most Vietnam vets who were fortunate enough not to have left the combat base in body bags probably figure their one trip to Khe Sanh was enough to last a lifetime. But I'd love to drive a Jeep Cherokee up Route 9, stand in the middle of the abandoned combat base and remember that I was once a young soldier.

My route to Khe Sanh was a circuitous one that started at a Nike Hercules fire control center and led to a Duster turret. My military career began during the summer of 1966 when I received my commission at the U.S. Army ROTC training facility in Indiantown Gap, PA after I graduated from Rutgers University. I embarked on active duty in October 1966 as a second lieutenant at the U.S. Army Air Defense Artillery School, Fort Bliss, TX. Upon completion of the Officers Basic Course, I was assigned to the Air Defense Artillery School Battalion as a battery commander and served for about six months while eager1y awaiting orders to a Nike Hercules unit at some exotic destination in Europe.

In July 1967, after a Pentagon advisor assured me that I would remain in my current duty assignment for the duration of my two-year active duty commitment, I received my orders to Vietnam. Five weeks later after completing a thirty-day crash course in ADA automatic weapons, I was still in shock. I took a thirty-day leave to visit with my family before reporting to Fort Lewis, Washington. In early October 1967, I left for debarkation to Vietnam.

I arrived at Cam Ranh Bay and made my way north over the next few days to Dong Ha on the DMZ, where I reported for duty with the 1st Battalion, 44th Artillery (Automatic Weapons Self Propelled). I was assigned to Bravo Battery as a platoon leader and spent most of the remainder of 1967 with Duster sections or squads at Marine firebases at Con Thien and Cam Lo.

Although the purpose of this article is to recount ADA unit involvement during the Siege of Khe Sanh, it is important to note that some of the heaviest combat engagements in 1967-68 took place in and around the hill at Con Thien. For those of us who fought at both combat bases, Con Thien was in many ways a more hellish and miserable place than Khe Sanh. Duster sections from Bravo Battery played a significant role in the defense of Con Thien and in operations to support the firebase.

In early January 1968, I was re-assigned to Alpha Battery. I remember spending a couple of weeks in Dong Ha, where we were placed on air defense alert after Intelligence reported that the Chinese were scrambling Russian Ilyushin fighter bombers to test our air defenses on the DMZ. The thought of tracking state-of-the-art Jet aircraft with our twin 40mm guns was quite sobering, and I remember being very relieved when we stood down from our air defense mission.

In mid January, I took a section of Alpha Battery Dusters to a newly constructed combat base called Guarding northern approach to KSCB.

A/3, located just below the southern boundary of the DMZ between Con Thien and Gio Linh. A/3, or Tan An Van Giap as it was identified on the map, was a rock-hard patch of dirt hurriedly scratched out by the engineers, surrounded by barbed wire and minefields, and defended by a company of Marines, some engineers, and two Dusters. As enemy activity increased with the Tet offensive in late January, we fired harassment and interdiction (H & I) missions every night into the DMZ. We also used night illumination devices to detect and target NVA infiltrators as they moved through our area of operations. During the early part of Tet offensive, the Citadel at Hue and the combat base at Khe Sanh came under heavy NVA attack. If that was not enough, the North Koreans captured the Pueblo, and several units of the 3rd Division were placed on standby alert.

In mid February I was summoned back to Dong Ha where my long awaited R&R plans were put on hold. I was ordered to Khe Sanh with three enlisted men — Private First Class Arthur Mortman from my platoon and two others from the attached Quad 50s (Golf Battery, 65th Artillery) — to relieve the commanding officer of the Duster and Quad 50 sections. He and several of his men had received shrapnel wounds and had been medevaced before we arrived. By this time, Khe Sanh had been under siege for several weeks and Route 9, the only road access to the besieged base, had been completely cut off. Re-supply and medevac aircraft were coming under heavy fire, and only volunteer medevac missions were being flown Into the Khe Sanh combat base.

After trying unsuccessfully for two days to get a flight from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh, my men and I flew by helicopter to Phu Bai, just south of Hue where we stood a better chance of getting aboard a flight into Khe Sanh. We spent three days waiting on the sweltering runway at Phu Bai before finally getting aboard a Marine CH-53 Sea Stallion, a volunteer medevac mission to Khe Sanh. The pilot, a Marine major, and the crew chief briefed us along with nearly a dozen grunts that boarded the helicopter.

All aircraft attempting to land at Khe Sanh received heavy ground fire, including .50 caliber machine gun, mortar, and artillery rounds. The crew chief had us lay our gear bags on the floor beneath us to shield our bodies from ground fire that might penetrate the underside of the helicopter. We were very nervous and puckered at the thought of .50 caliber rounds ripping through the thin underbelly of the chopper. We would circle down through a heavy cloud cover and have only a few seconds with the tailgate on the ground to disembark with all our gear. As we began our decent, we saw tracer rounds streaking past the windows, through the thick clouds. The crew chief shouted that we wou1d have less than ten seconds on the deck and we had better be off the ramp or know how to fly.

Incoming mortars and arti1lery rounds exploded all around the landing areas. The pilot didn't land the chopper. The crew chief lowered the tailgate as the chopper hovered and we were dumped out like a heap of garbage from the rear of a sanitation truck. We scurried like rats for the nearest trench line or bunker and waited in sheer terror for what seemed like an endless barrage, to stop. The chopper disappeared into the clouds without retrieving any of the casualties it had come for, and the incoming rounds finally ceased. We huddled for at least another twenty minutes before mustering the courage to run from the relative safety of the trenches and made our way across the airfield. We found our gun positions along the northern perimeter of the runway and settled in with our beleaguered comrades to rest and be briefed about the situation at hand.

Our Dusters and Quad 50's had excellent fields of fire commanding all avenues of approach to the northern perimeter of the base. Our two Duster positions were well located at opposite ends of the runway with the Quad 50s placed in between but not more than one hundred meters away from a Duster. The northeast gun positions overlooked a wide-open, grassy plateau, and could easily maneuver to defend the east end of the runway, which sat above the edge of a steep ravine. My command post bunker was situated near the runway's east end, behind the Quad 50s and our ammunition trailer.

The base ammo dump and 105mm howitzers were across the runway about one hundred and fifty meters behind us. On the northwest end, the Duster and Quad 50 squads guard a more concealed approach through trees and heavy brush. Our bunkers and gun revetments were well constructed and sandbagged, considering that two months earlier the Marines at Khe Sanh were hardly dug in. Most structures had been built above ground with few trenches, and only inadequate, interrupted strands of barbed wire were strung in front of the perimeter defensive positions.

First Lieutenant Lyon Grace had commanded the Duster and Quad 50 sections from late October through early December 1967. After the war, he would describe Khe Sanh as...quiet, uneventful place viewed by ADA personnel as a welcome respite from the grueling barrages at Con Thien and Gio Linh and the daily routine of mine sweeps and convoy escorts. When the intense battles of the infamous "Hill Fights" ended in early May 1967, Khe Sanh was regarded as the closest thing to an in-country R&R center on the DMZ. At Lieutenant Grace's request, the Marine command ordered additional fortification on the northern perimeter, since only one company of Marines, two Ontos crews and our Duster Quad 50 sections defended the entire mile-long stretch of the perimeter.

When the siege began on January 21, 1968, the Marines were not prepared for a static defense of the base. Engineers hurriedly dug trenches and laid additional rows concertina wire around the perimeter. Trenching machines were flown in to cut into the rock-hard surface before the attacks reached a peak in late January through mid-March 1968. During my first few days at Khe Sanh, I surveyed our positions and met briefly with Colonel Lownds, commander of the 26th Marine Regiment and its attached units. In my only conversation with him during my seven-week stay, I assured him that our automatic weapons crews had the experience and the firepower to accomplish the mission of defending the northern perimeter of the firebase. There would be several occasions over the next few weeks when I would feel less confident than I did at that proud moment.

Bad weather in February and early March often left the combat base shrouded in fog for hours or even days at a time. With the fog providing cover from NVA snipers and artillery spotters, we seized the opportunity to drive the Quad 50 trucks or the Dusters for water, ammunition and C-Rations. Most other days were spent holed up in our bunkers since NVA snipers and artillery made movement above ground extremely treacherous. My survival instincts and physical senses had reached a peak, having been sharpened for months under the routine bombardment at Con Thien and A/3. I was able to hear mortar, artillery, and rocket rounds leaving their tubes, and could often identify the type of weapon it was fired from, from the sound it made. I never ignored or second-guessed my own instincts or those of others. I would hit the ground in an instant if I thought I had heard a suspicious sound or saw a muzzle flash. At Khe Sanh, my fatigues were always dirty from diving to the ground. My men would jokingly ask if I had been playing in the mud or dirt again.

I remember moving cautiously through the trench line one clear morning when a careless young Marine stood up and walked across an open stretch of ground between unconnected trenches. In an instant he was struck in the side of his face by a sniper round. Fortunately the round went through his cheek and out of his mouth, knocking out a few teeth, but otherwise leaving him in relatively good condition. After some dental work and a few stitches, he'd be back on line, good as new. The incident reinforced my resolve to crawl or scurry on all fours when moving across open ground in clear weather.

Although we did our best to keep our bunkers clean, we fought an endless battle against the infestation of rats. Any Vietnam veteran will tell you, these were not ordinary rats. They often grew as big as large rabbits and were extremely cunning. After weeks of setting traps to no avail, I finally got fed up and decided one night to take serious steps to annihilate one persistent pest. I climbed into my upper rack, and tucked a flashlight and 45-caliber pistol under my sleeping bag. After my section chief had gone to sleep, I lay awake waiting for the telltale scratching sounds of our nightly intruder, and I was not disappointed. I followed the sound of his movement to the baited traps on the floor across from my bunk.

I silently lined up my pistol and flashlight in the direction of the sound and waited for the complacent intruder to began chowing down. At the moment of truth, I simultaneously switched on the flashlight beam and emptied an entire clip in the direction of the monster rat. My section chief bolted from the sleeping rack below, certain we were under attack. I quickly quieted him and assured him that all was okay, pointing confidently toward the array of triggered rattraps in front of us. The rat's carcass was nowhere to be found, and the sergeant was not amused.

We never did get rid of those critters. When the B-52 strikes left large numbers of NVA dead around the base perimeter, the rats began feeding on the decaying corpses. A major panic took place when the doctors at Charlie-Med identified rats infected with bubonic plague and began giving booster shots to large numbers of Marines. Most of my men and I braved the hazardous trek across the runway to get our booster injections.

NVA gunners had the airstrip zeroed in, and few fix-winged aircraft were able to land without being hit. My bunker was only a few yards off the edge of the runway, and every landing and take off was a nerve-wracking adventure. One quiet morning, I had my 35mm camera in hand as a C-130 Hercules landed and rolled toward the turnaround ramp at the west end of the runway. I watched in horror as incoming artillery slammed into the runway and struck the C-130's left main landing gear, causing the aircraft to swerve and crash into a forklift waiting nearby to unload cargo the wing tanks burst into flames that quickly engulfed the aircraft. The courageous fire crew unsuccessfully fought to extinguish the flames. I ran down the runway toward the aircraft, capturing much of the action on film. Runway personnel had rescued the crew, who escaped with only minor injuries. The aircraft and its cargo were completely destroyed.

With landings and takeoffs of fixed-wing transports becoming too dangerous, the Air Force attempted delivery procedures known as LAPES and GPES. Under LAPES (Low Altitude Parachute Extraction System) the aircraft made a low-level approach and a parachute dragged the cargo across rollers, and out the rear doors. Under GPES, (Ground Parachute Extraction System), the aircraft came in low to snag an arresting cable, which In turn yanked the cargo out of the rear. Both procedures were highly risky for the aircraft and ground personnel, and were finally discontinued when runway cargo pallets crashed through bunkers at the west end of the runway, killing several Marines. Thereafter, most re-supply was made by parachute drop from C-123 or C-130 transports over the northwest perimeter of the combat base.

During good weather, tactical aircraft flew extensive missions, dropping napalm and high explosives on enemy positions across the hills and the plateau in front of our northern perimeter. Some strikes were so close to our positions that the intense heat from the napalm was enough to singe our eyebrows. In March, under cover of fog and darkness, enemy troops dug a network of tunnels and zigzag trenches within a few meters of the perimeter wire on the east end of the runway. They went undetected until the weather broke the following morning, when F-4 Phantoms resumed tactical operations and spotted them from the air. The NVA had evidently hoped that they could tunnel under the wire and the runway to plant mines or explosives that would destroy inbound aircraft and/or the runway surface. Had penetration of the perimeter from this unlikely approach succeeded, our gun positions on the east end would have been the primary weapons responsible for repelling the enemy assault.

The F-4 Phantoms immediately launched heavy air strikes with napalm and high explosive ordinance to destroy the trenches. F-4 Phantoms and "'Puff the Magic Dragon," a DC-3 with machine guns and a Vulcan cannon in the doorway, made multiple sorties. Poor visibility often limited tactical air strikes, leaving the air support to the B-52's. Under the code name "Niagara," General William Westmoreland personally directed the activities of the Strategic Air Command, which flew numerous sorties around the clock, dropping unprecedented tons of explosives in defense of the base. The area around Khe Sanh would soon have the unenviable distinction of being the most bombed place on earth.

C-130 struck by artillery crashed into parker forklift. The crew was wounded but saved by fire crew.

We would often be alerted by coded radio messages to shore up our bunkers and take cover at a predetermined time. The B-52s would, on these occasions, be targeting dangerously close to our perimeter, within the allowable minimum safety range. Despite the eerie sounds of the bombs whistling overhead and the thunderous concussions as they rained down on the target area, it was reassuring knowing the 52s were there. The intense carpet-bombing took an incredible toll on the large NVA force surrounding Khe Sanh. In hindsight it can probably be credited with preventing the base from being overrun.

Duster and Quad 50 crews were restricted from routine H&I fire missions to avoid being targeted by the surrounding NVA artillery pieces dug into the hills. Although we had more than a normal supply of ammunition for all of our weapons, our tenuous circumstances dictated we conserve ammunition in the event re-supply became impossible. We relied on the big 175mm guns at Camp Carroll and the Rockpile to lay in their fire missions at predetermined coordinates and suspected NVA positions. Our guns fired only at identified targets of opportunity, or in support of friendly operations around our perimeter.

One sunny morning around mid-March, Duster squad leader Sergeant James "Smitty" Smith and I, were scanning the plateau with our binoculars. We observed movement at the edge of the ravine about a mile in front of our Duster position. We watched and waited to confirm what had appeared to be an NVA soldier's pith helmet moving back and forth, just beyond the drop-off to the Rao Quan River ravine. The soldier, who thought he was hidden from view, presented an inviting target. We knew there had to be a concentration of NVA troops at that spot. I made a decision to engage the target before they had a chance to disperse. Sergeant Smith and I quietly alerted crew members and slipped aboard the Duster to man the twin 40mm guns. We carefully traversed the turret and elevated the guns to engage the last known position of the target. When the helmet reappeared, we fired approximately eighty to one hundred rounds directly on the target area, obliterating everything within a 100 meter radius. The dry brush burned for several hours — at least one of our enemies from the north would not be zeroing in on us ever again. Shortly after midnight and some 1,109 rounds after the NVA barrage had begun, it was over. This would be recorded as the second heaviest saturation of enemy rounds in a single day during the Siege and the heaviest for the month of March. It took a very heavy toll on Charlie Company, 1/26 Marines, with whom my men and I lived and shared the defense of our sector. I later found out five Marines died in the command post bunker that night; Captain Walter J. Egger, Gunnery Sergeant John J. Grohman, First Lieutenant Paul W. Bush, Lance Corporal Stephen C. Shannon, and Private First Class Bennie J. Sisson.

I had come to know and admire Captain Egger. He had only been in-country one month, having arrived at Khe Sanh about the same time. Although my men and I survived that night with no casualties, it would directly impact our lives for many years to come. I am very proud of the Bronze Star With V Device that I received for my actions that night, although I did no more than anyone I knew would have done under the same circumstances. The heavy fighting continued for another week or so. By the last week in March the incoming wound down considerably.

The NVA had apparently gotten wind of Operation Pegasus, the counter-offensive launched to lift the Siege of Khe Sanh, and decided to cut their losses by moving the bulk of their troops out of the area. By the time the forward elements of the 1st Air Cavalry and 3rd Marine Divisions reached the combat base, the NVA resistance had become light. The main forces had no major difficulty routing the remaining elements from the surrounding hills. The base bustled with activity during the first days of April as a crack ARVN Ranger Battalion moved onto the base with support aircraft and equipment. This was the first time since I arrived that helicopters, which had been unable to park at Khe Sanh because of the intense antiaircraft fire, landed and parked in the bays alongside the runway.

For a few days, the ARVN troops shared our bunkers during the evening hours before moving out with several Marine units to "break out" and link up with the approaching elements moving up Route 9 from the east. It was quite a show, and my men and I took the opportunity to get a well-earned rest after we prepared our equipment for departure. All but one of vehicles was up and running by the time our replacements arrived from Camp Carroll on April 14th.

Charlie Company, 1/26 Marines had pulled out before dawn, and we were the only personnel remaining in the sector when my battery commander, Captain James Bonds arrived around mid morning. We wasted no time hooking up the disabled "deuce-and-a-half' truck to a tow bar, and anxiously rolled out the gate onto the approach road to Route 9.

This was my first trip on Route 9 east of Cam Lo village. The grueling 40-50 mile adventure to Dong Ha took over five hours along the winding, rebuilt roads and makeshift pontoon bridges. The devastation caused by the continual carpet-bombing was never more evident than it was along the first five miles of winding roadway to the Marine outpost at Ca Lu. The once dense foliage was burnt out or blown away, for miles. The ground was pockmarked with huge bomb craters for as far as the eye could see. Despite this carnage, it was an exhilarating experience for my men and I, who were ecstatic to finally be out of Khe Sanh and on our way back to Dong Ha.

On a Veterans' Day visit to Washington DC, my family friend and squad leader at Khe Sanh, Sergeant James "Smitty" Smith, helped me remember some of the names of the brave men who served with us during the Siege. Among the names were Alpha Battery, 1/44 Duster squad leader Sergeant Manual Floyd Martinez, who was killed in a subsequent action in early June, 1968, Sergeant Dewey Thornton: Sergeant Norman Shank, Private First Class Earl Pavey, Private First Class Arthur Mortman, Private First Class Lloyd Washington, Private First Class James J. Smith, Specialist 4 Hen, and Private First Class Nelson.

First Lieutenant Lynn Grace added a few names of men from the Quad 50 section of G Battery, 65TH Artillery, who had served earlier at Khe Sanh. These names included Sergeant Hollis Ray Hale, a section chief who left the base prior to the siege, only to be killed in an ambush in early February 1968. Specialist 4 Bowman and Specialist 4 Steven Allen Guthrie Jr. died as a result of a non-hostile weapons discharge at Khe Sanh on January 31, 1968.

My friend Sergeant Joseph Belardo and Charlie Battery 1/44th Artillery, Duster/Quad section relieved us at Khe Sanh after the Siege was lifted. Belardo's Duster track led the Pegasus Relief column onto the combat base. His Duster crew enjoyed an emotional reunion along with his platoon leader in Washington, DC. I apologize to the many other Duster and Quad 50 personnel whose names I have been unable to remember but who are no less deserving of recognition for their courageous service at Khe Sanh.

Dusters, Quads & Searchlights History Order of Battle of ADA Units in Vietnam

The 1st Battalion, 44th Artillery with attached Battery G, 65th Artillery (M-55), and Battery G, 29th Artillery (Searchlight), supported the 3rd Marine Division in northern I Corps area. Based at Dong Ha and Da Nang, 1/44 operated from Phu Bai in the south to Con Thien in the north and Khe Sanh in the west.

The 5th Battalion, 2nd Artillery with attached Battery D, 71st Artillery (M-55), and Battery I, 29th Artillery (Searchlight) was assigned to II Field Force Artillery at Long Binh (north of Saigon).

The 4th Battalion, 60th Artillery with attached Battery E, 41st Artillery (M-55), and Battery B, 29th Artillery (Searchlight) belonged to the 41st Artillery Group of I Field Force Artillery and operated out of Qui Nhon, An Khe and Tuy Hoa. A separate Quad unit, Battery G of the 55th Artillery, was assigned to the Americal Division at Chu Lai. Finally, Battery H of the 29th Artillery (Searchlight) supported operations of the 9th Infantry Division.

Each of the Air Defense battalions had over a thousand men, but the units never fought as batteries, much less as battalions. Demands for fire support far outstripped availability of weapons, and individual fire units were quickly scattered throughout the battalions' areas of responsibility. Each Duster battery had two firing platoons, both of which could be employed independently, as could the six firing sections of each machine-gun battery. As a result, the war fought by the Air Defense gunners in Vietnam was overwhelmingly a sergeant's war, as detached platoons and firing sections found themselves under the operations control of other types of units. Normal missions for the automatic weapons included convoy security, perimeter defense, and fire support for maneuver operations.

Automatic-weapons units began to stand down early in 1971 and had left Vietnam completely by mid-1972. By that time, the Quad and three Duster battalions sent to Vietnam had fired well over four million 40mm rounds and 10 million .50-caliber rounds in support of American, Vietnamese and Allied forces.

M-55 Quad 50

Known as the "Whispering Death," each M-55 Quad 50 consisted of four Browning M2 .50-caliber machine guns mounted in a power turret on a deuce and a half (2 1/2) or 5 ton truck. With an effective rate of fire of 1,000 to 1,500 rounds per minute, the Quad in action "could literally suck the life out of a hillside at ranges up to half a mile." Generally speaking, Quads could not go cross-country in support of maneuver units. But in operations away from established road nets where heavy machine- gun support was needed, it was possible to sling load the Quad with the CH-47 helicopter."

Searchlights

Both Dusters and Quads "served well in perimeter defenses, where gunners could establish clear fields of fire and alternate firing positions. It was there that the AN/MSS-3 (23-inch) and the newer AN/TVS-3 (30-inch) searchlights were most useful, too. At night the searchlights swept the perimeter in the infrared mode, so as to detect the enemy without disclosing their positions. Having found the enemy, gunners switched to visible light mode for target illumination and engagement. Quads and Dusters were quickly on target because the men routinely laid searchlight azimuth indicators parallel with the automatic weapons. The other major use of searchlights was to bounce light from clouds to improve vision for friendly patrols and nearby positions using starlight scopes."

The Duster

Production of the M-41 Walker Bulldog tank was undertaken by the Cadillac Car Division of the General Motors Corporation at the Cleveland Tank Plant and the first production models were completed in 1951. The M-41 was the first member of a whole family of vehicles sharing many common components. The family included the M-42 self-propelled anti-aircraft gun or Duster as it is also known, which was in production from early 1952 to December 1959. Production of the M-42 amounted to 3700 units. The driver and radio operator are seated at the front of the vehicle with the other four crew members in the turret, which is in the center of the hull. The engine and transmission are in the rear. The M-42 has torsion-bar suspension consisting of five dual rubber-tired road wheels with the idler at the front and the drive sprocket at the rear, and three track-return rollers. The first, second and fifth road wheel stations have a hydraulic shock absorber. The steel tracks have replaceable rubber pads.

The heroism its soldiers displayed during the long struggle in Vietnam made the battalion one of history's most decorated artillery unit. Platoon Commander 101

by Joseph Olszewski

Since the majority of the readers of Red Clay were enlisted personnel during their tours, an understanding of the trials and tribulations of being a 2nd Lieutenant Platoon Commander may be of interest. I've learned through reading KSV Message Board posts and via e-mails with my fellow Marines from my company that rifle platoon enlisted personnel thought 2nd Lieutenant Platoon Commanders were just a bunch of college boys who knew very little about combat. One Marine from my platoon still addresses me as "butter bars" in his e-mails to me. Obviously, the reference is to the brass bars on our collars or shoulders, but I think there is some deep introspection to that phrase.

Thus, I thought the readership would benefit with an understanding of how difficult the Platoon Commander Job really was in Vietnam. I remember being very impressed with the NCOs who were instructors at Officer Candidate School (OCS) and The Basic School (TBS) at Quantico, Virginia. I was recruited by the USMC in college. The NCOs who performed those services were all first-class and very professional. I remember being interviewed by an NCO during my senior year in college and thinking, "I'll have to tell a guy like this what to do in combat?" In other words, he appeared tough as nails. He never smiled and reminded me of Dick Butkus, who happened to be a linebacker for the University of Illinois where I was a student. Butkus later had a great professional career demolishing NFL players for about ten years. I was a 5'7", 180-pound 22-year-old who had not run a mile in four years, looking at a man in his late 20s who had probably just ate somebody for breakfast.

TBS was just like college in that we had unending classes, lectures and live participation in leadership. I think the leadership training was even more emphasized than weapons, tactics, CBS (Chemical, Biological and Stealth warfare), land navigation, physical training ("PT"), and the never-popular Technique of Military Instruction (speech class). In short, we had high-ranking NCOs with 25 years of service, Captains and Majors and even Chaplains giving us lectures and seminars on Leadership 101. It was simple "over-learning."

The problem with TBS is that it lasted five months (it was shortened from nine months due to the need for 2nd Lieutenants ASAP for 'Nam duty). It was similar to practicing for a football game over and over and never playing in a real game. In short, it became dull and boring. I remember the instructing officers posting letters on the bulletin boards from recent TBS graduates who were now in 'Nam. We would read words about their actual combat and leadership experiences. I remember reading those letters and saying to myself, "I can handle that job."

Then the grand day in TBS came when our MOSs were announced. I think 60% of my class was assigned "0301," Combat Infantry Officer. Some were assigned to artillery school, others were prearranged to attend flights schools, and the truly brilliant were headed for Language School (never found out what happened to those guys). On that day the realization hit us for the first time. We were headed for the jungles of Vietnam to lead 40 or 50 Marines in combat!!!

After a month of "leave" when I ran three miles daily in my hometown of Chicago, I got on that plane to California to begin "staging." From California I flew to Okinawa, waiting there for the flight to 'Nam. I remember as the plane was approaching Da Nang, the pilots shut off the lights in the plane. I thought "Wow, this place must be jumping with enemy, if they have to shut off the lights of a commercial airliner to land. Once the plane landed, we all disembarked and were waiting on the runway for our duffle bags to be taken off the plane. I remember the crew shutting down the aircraft and leaving before we had received our bags.

I hardly slept that first night, the jet traffic and sound of gunfire and artillery in the distance. I remember waking up the first morning, walking to breakfast and seeing a weary rifle platoon leaving a hooch for a patrol.

I learned from an NCO that I was headed for 2/26 which was stationed at Phu Bai. Getting on a C-130, and flew to the Phu Bai airport along with a few hundred artillery rounds that were on the cargo floor and staring at me.

My first interview was with a Major who was upset that my record indicated that I had not "fan-fired" an M-16 while I was in Okinawa, saying I could not join my platoon until I had "fan-fired" an M-16. During 1967, TBS was still training and qualifying 2nd Lieutenants with M-14s, as M-16s were so new, they were first shipped to units in 'Nam and had not reached the training camps yet. Thus, I sat around Phu Bai for about three days. I finally "fan-fired" an M-16. I had to ask the gunny, how to break down the M-16. I was amazed how light the weapon was, compared to the M-14.

The grand day came when the company commander took me on a patrol to meet my platoon (Third Platoon, Golf Company, 2/26th Marines) were located at a patrol base near a pagoda south of Phu Bai. I've often described that feeling to people who were the parents of teenagers in the 70s and 80s as waking up one day and learning that you did not have two or three teenagers to worry about, but 40 to 50!!! They looked so young, except for the Platoon Sergeant, in his late 20s and about to "rotate" home. He was also the Platoon Commander. He hated the job and couldn't wait for a 2nd Lieutenant to arrive. I never had the same squad leaders for longer than a month, Corpsmen were constantly rotated from one company to another. Gung-Ho Marines who wanted more action, requested transfers to "Recon" units.

I was alerted to a mission called Sparrow Hawk around November 1967. A Recon team was surrounded and had suffered casualties. I was sent to the Communication Bunker for a situation briefing and a lecture by Senior officers. My mission was to blow a hole through the NVA encirclement after landing in an unfamiliar LZ, have the casualties evacuated, and then rescue the remaining members of the team. To accomplish this mission I was assigned an assortment of "attached personnel."

I had 81 mortars, additional radio operators, an extra machine gun team, and a Forward Air Controller. These "attached personnel" totaled an additional 15 Marines, all of whom I had never worked with before. All the Marines for this mission were transferred from the Phu Bai airport by truck. A major and a jeep driver drove me to the airport from the Communications Bunker. Throughout the whole ride, the Major kept telling me how to handle the mission, and what to do if various situations took place. We boarded the helicopters and flew for a good hour. Along the way, it was determined that the Recon Team had been overrun, so there was no need for us to continue the mission.

A common problem with being a 2nd Lieutenant platoon commander was that most of us had not planned on making the military a career. We simply wanted to do well, and have a minimum amount of causalities. Most senior officers had been in the USMC for at least five years and were career officers. The promotion process was based on having successful combat operations, battle commendations and recommendations by senior officers. They aspired to have junior officers be as successful as they could, since it reflected on their own leadership capabilities. Their career advancement could be effected by a poor showing from junior officers. Thus, there was tremendous pressure put on 2nd Lieutenants to perform. I remember enjoying being in the field on patrols and sitting in patrol bases and ambushes, as opposed to being on the base at Phu Bai. In the field, no senior officers were around to pressure us.

I was called to a meeting once at the base and had to leave my platoon alone in a patrol base near a pagoda. I was informed by superior officers that General Westmoreland heard college students in Hue were demonstrating because a 2nd Lieutenant didn't control his troops. There had been an allegation that by troops had caused damage to the pagoda. I did not remember seeing any damages, hated even being in that room.

In late December 1967, the "word" came down that the battalion was going to be sent "North" for long-range operations in the "real" war zone. As January 1968 approached, nobody was sure where we were headed. Around the 14th of January the officers learned that we were headed for Khe Sanh. My troops wanted to go to Con Thien, which had been in heavy combat and was on the U.S. national news every night. One of my Marines who was writing a letter home said, "Where and what the Hell is Khe Sanh?"

We flew on C-130s from the Phu Bai airport to Khe Sanh on January 16, 1968. The approach into Khe Sanh was difficult. We landed and were sent to an area just outside the base and within sight of Hills 558, 950 and 861. The next day the officers received word that 2/26 was headed for Hill 558, but our platoon was going to be a "combat outpost" about 1,000 meters north of Hill 558. While the entire battalion walked to Hill 558 the next day, our platoon continued to the "combat outpost," where we stayed for a good two weeks before we were ordered to Hill 558, when Echo 2/26 was sent to Hill 861 Alpha.

Life as a 2nd Lieutenant on Hill 558 was similar to life at Phu Bai. I recall majors chewing me out about the condition of my troops' bunkers, the lack of depth in the trench lines, and the lack of accuracy of a minefield map they had prepared. There were several minefields established around Hill 558 in February 1968. There had been several instances were Marines accidentally stepped on live mines. On a day in late February 1968, a major told me to enter a live minefield, re-take the compass readings of the location of each mine, and re-do the minefield map. Our platoon had first installed the minefield, and in accordance with the Geneva Convention, built a "cow fence" around the minefield, and placed signs on the fence to warn the enemy with the word "MINH" which is Vietnamese for "Minefield."

One of my leadership failings was that I did not supervise the construction of the "cow fence" and, therefore, I was not familiar with its boundaries and interpretations. Thus, on that eventful day when I entered to minefield to take compass readings and re-write the map, I became confused about where the safe zones where and how to navigate the field. The first and last wooden stakes of the minefield had no live mines and each stake in-between the first and last stake had six mines in a semi-circular pattern at three meters from the wooden stake. Since I misread the cow fence, and the "free zones" when I entered the minefield, I thought I was headed for the first wooden stake. I was really headed for the second wooden stake where the live mines were located and, luckily, I hit the first mine in the pattern. I say "luckily" — if I had walked deeper into the live minefield and hit a mine in the middle of the field, my Marines and Corpsman would have had more difficulty reaching me and would have stepped on a few live mines.

Before my foot hit the live mine, our Company had not suffered any casualties at Khe Sanh. Here was a 2nd Lieutenant stepping on a live mine in a friendly minefield. I felt a slight burning sensation, but no pain. I was informed by a Corpsman who reviewed my x-rays, that I had shattered every bone in my foot, destroying all the nerves. Therefore I did not experience any terrible pain. I remember my Marines carried me on a stretcher to the BAS (Battalion Aid Station), where one Corpsman offered me a cigarette. Since I did not smoke, I responded with "what and ruin my good health?" I recall the entire BAS broke out in laughter.

Later, I was sent by helicopter to Dong Ha, Da Nang, and later that evening to the USS Repose where my left foot was amputated. I believe I spent three days on the Repose and several more days in some hospital in Japan and eventually spent seven months in the Philadelphia Naval Hospital. I was there for seven months, as I needed additional surgery. When you have an amputation, shrunken blood vessels hurt blood circulation, and until that blood circulation improves, doctors will not perform additional surgery.

About a month after my accident, my company was caught in a bunker ambush and about 100 Marines were either KIA or WIA. Since our platoon usually walked point, I would have been third or fourth in the column, and either killed or seriously wounded. Most of those who survived that battle, suffer from PTSD. I learned a great deal from my six months as a platoon commander that helped me in my profession, and in my marriage of thirty-six years. In brief, I had no fear after those six months as a Platoon Commander. My wife and I also only had one child, a son. After having 50 teenagers to supervise, being a parent of one was a breeze.

I feel that joining the USMC, and serving as a Platoon Commander, was an experience, probably the best career move I had ever made. If I hadn't made the decision to join the USMC; I never would have discovered California; I would not have met my wife while walking down a Washington D.C. street one Saturday night while I was in OCS.

My respect to all the NCOs who recruit college seniors for the USMC.

Part II: Seabees Efforts and Successes at the Khe Sanh Combat Base

by Raymond Cruz, Martin Kux & many others, all contributing

A small group of US Navy Seabees was part of a joint endeavor in the successful defense of Khe Sanh. The following articles are personal accounts of the Seabees of CBMU-301 Bravo Detachment.

General Westmoreland, during an interview regarding the siege of Khe Sanh, commented on one of the key elements in the success for holding Khe Sanh. He stated "unlike the French at Dien Bien Phu, we have complete command of the air and ability in keeping the supply line open." Key to this factor, was the supply line, keeping the runway open at Khe Sanh. The only reason for any aircraft, fixed wing or otherwise not being able to land at KSCB, was the fog or the intense shelling. With the runway open, KSCB was able to not only receive the needed supplies but also evacuate the wounded and the bodies of our unfortunate brothers.

As intense were the battles in the surrounding hills, so was the battle to keep the runway operational. This assignment fell to the Seabees of CBMU-301-Bravo Detachment. A small unit that not only had the responsibility for keeping the runway open but also communication, refrigeration, and electrical power to the tower and CP, and many other projects.

From Raymond Cruz: EO, CBMU-301 Det B

My introduction to Khe Sanh was most memorable. I was reassigned from A Co. CBMU-301 in Dong Ha to Detail Bravo at Khe Sanh, some time in the fall of '67. I flew out of Dong Ha with supplies and some green Marine replacements on a Chinook. A few miles out of KSCB, the chopper starts to jerk and the cargo chief yells we're taking fire, return fire out the starboard side. I tried to stand as the Chinook banked hard. The sergeant was pulling the 4 other marines up, yelling to all to fire, return fire. I put a magazine in my M-16 and started firing — at what I have no idea. I then see tracers from the sarge and change direction of fire. In seconds it's over as the Chinook is disappearing towards KSCB. As the big bird touched down, the sarge yelled back to the five now wide-eyed citizens of KSCB, "Good shooting, Marines." I instinctively yell back, "Seabee." He then waves us off. I am still not sure what I was firing at, or if they were just having fun with us.

As Heavy Equipment Operator I was assigned to the nightshift during the major reconstruction of the runway. Detail Bravo worked round the clock to rebuild the runway. There was always a crew either working, eating, or sleeping. Some manage to find time to chug beers with the Marines and swap BS. Those that managed to have some spare time would help in the construction of the two bunkers soon to be Home or filled sand bags.

Every one remembers where or what they were doing on Jan 21, 1968 at KSCB. Most of us in Detail Bravo had put in a full day of work and had just gotten to sleep when the shelling started. We scurried into the bunker and out to the trench. Word had come down to us during the early lull in the shelling that we would have to get to the equipment yard to muster for work assignments. We left the sanctity of our soon-to-become-famous bunker, "The Alamo Hilton." What I saw can barely be described — remnants of our living area strewn about, craters from various size impacts, and live shells lay all around the bunker. The area was not recognizable. The Seabees who lived in the bunker next to the equipment yard and next to the runway had already begun assessing what was left of our equipment and supplies. The equipment yard situated near the runway had received several direct hits and turned out to be a prime target for the duration of the Siege. Three dump trucks and a small tractor were totally destroyed; much of our lumber had shrapnel, and some runway matting was also damaged. The mechanics feverishly began salvaging what they could from the destroyed equipment, repairing the ones that had the least damage. Immediately the repair of the runway became paramount, as it would be for the next 77 days.

Several days later, one of the senior petty officer came to the main bunker. He informed us that we were the spare bodies for the base and would be called to reinforce as needed. We were issued extra ammo including LAWS and M-79 ammo. Human ammo mules is what we were. Our life expectancy just fell off the scale. That dreaded day came one night in early February. A call came in that FOB-3 was being hit hard and needed help. We gear uped and headed down the trenches and above ground at times toward the Special Forces compound. As we passed Marines on the way, we can hear them saying, "They'll never make it." I was going to agree when I was suddenly told to halt and take cover. Our prayers were answered. Orders to return came down the line. Quickly, we returned to the sanctity of the Alamo Hilton to wait for the next time.

Am not sure of the date, possibly in March. I was told to take the small dozer up to a hill outside the gate and dig out some holes for bunkers. I have no idea what hill it was. I think it was with 1/9. I remember going out the gate and heading up the first hill. A gunny stopped me and asked what I was doing. I explained. He then tells me to proceed on up and some one would direct me. At which time, several mortars hit and a recoilless round also impacted behind the dozer. Immediately, I race this slow moving dozer up the hill. Near the top of the hill am given instructions. Those that had taken up residence there knew that the ground became hard as granite when dry. The little dozer had great difficulty digging any hole. Several more mortars and recoilless rounds impact the area nearby. After one of these barrages, word comes up that the gunny has been hit. I am then told to get the fu#$@*& magnet off the hill. I put the little dozer in high and as quickly as possible, I headed on out, the whole time being followed by mortar and recoilless rounds.

A member of the 26th Marines from the Bronx named Frank Droz, a part of a mortar team, left Khe Sanh during the Siege to be married. It was my cousin he married. That mortar team may remember how they got matting for their bunker. Back in the world, Frank and I would laugh about the impromptu visit he got from his future family. Hope the rest of the mortar team made it out safely. Does any one ever remember hearing bugles and drums one night during a firefight out in front of the Grey Zone, or is that something we just talked about it and never happened?

Dennis Waler EO, CBMU-301 Det B

My memories from Khe Sanh. There are many, both good and bad, but two things really stand out in my mind. The first was how we used to hear the artillery firing in Laos when we were working on the runway, and we would run to the edge of the runway counting down — "3, 2, 1" — then hitting the ground just before the incoming shell would hit. As scary as it was, it was almost like a game.

The second and one of the most memorable of my tour was on a Sunday afternoon just before the major ground assault which I think was February 29, 1968. I was on radio watch at the rear of our bunker. I think our call sign, at least on that day was "Blue Delta 1." On the hill to the south of us was a patrol of 15 to 20 NVA. They were in plain view, in uniform, eating a meal. We called in for artillery and I think it was from Camp Carroll or Camp Julian. At least that is how I remember it. Anyway, they fired one round that was about 200 or 300 yards short. They corrected and fired for effect. When it was all over there were numerous bodies on the ground and I don't remember seeing any survivors. Not much to work with, but there were a number of us enjoying the show. I was involved in a few fire fights on the Cau Viet River between Cau Viet and Dong Ha, and was on the runway at Dong Ha when they hit our ammo dump, Sept 3, 1968.

Jack Haigwood CBMU-301-B

Det B My arrival at Khe Sanh in December 1967 was preceded by an earlier tour in Vietnam. I had spent 11 months in country with MCB-5 in an area east of Da Nang close to Marble Mountain. In 1966 and 1967, Khe Sanh was already well known.

I was finally home with my wife and daughter and the thought of returning to Vietnam never even occurred to me. So, there I was, sitting in a field training class at Camp Pendleton when orders arrived for myself and four others to join CBMU-301 at Dong Ha. I had two weeks leave, to take my wife and daughter home and say goodbye once again.

I arrived in Dong Ha November 1967, mad as hell and with a real attitude. I was no FNG to this place and didn't like being treated like one. About three weeks had past when my attitude finally paid off. I was leaving Dong Ha! Guess I showed those rookies.

Next thing I remember was the C-123 I was in, heading to Khe Sanh. It felt like it was doing a nose-dive into the airstrip. My stomach was in my throat and I think I may have wet my pants during that landing. I remember the welcome sign at the radar station and thinking how I wish to hell I was back at Dong Ha.

I dragged what little I had with me to the Seabee bunker at the edge of the airstrip. Entering the bunker, I wondered why these guys lived under ground like rats. I got this sick feeling when I realized why. Sam Messer greeted me with that big grin he still has today and told me to grab a bunk. Boy, was I lucky, I got one of the stretchers mounted to the wall. At least the rats couldn't reach me there, or so I thought. I swear those things could climb anything. I soon met all the other guys and wondered what they all had done to be sent here. Sorry Guys! First impression was that this was the "Misfit Bunch," and I was in it.

It didn't take me long to learn that these guys were a pretty special unit. Everyone worked as a team. The work on the strip was long and hard, but I was starting to like it there. Except for the rats, no one seemed to bother us much. These were hard working and equally hard playing guys. I never realized it then, but I would remember their faces for a lifetime. I first began getting a little shaky about this place when rumors from the Recon Marines next door started to sound like we all might be in some serious trouble. Then, the NVA patrol was killed and laid out for viewing. I think it was Sam that buried them, but I still remember that empty feeling I had thinking that the NVA might well be viewing our bodies soon.

On the evening of January 20th, I remember watching the hills light up from the fighting going on up there and thanking God I wasn't there, while praying for those who were. We knew our turn was coming soon. That morning of the 21st was a real shock when the first round hit. I remember scrambling around in the dark, grabbing gear and crawling into that God forsaken trench. I think I was next to last getting into the trench. Lying there, I first tried to count the incoming rounds, but I lost count after about number three. I was unconsciously digging deeper into the dirt with my fingers and teeth trying to hide from the shelling outside. Maybe an hour or so into the shelling, I started to sing some stupid song along with the guy next to me. We started laughing when someone at the other end yelled something like "shut the "$#$#" up"! I guess I was finally losing it for sure.

Later, two Marines who ran the PX jumped into our trench with us and nearly gave me a heart attack. Who in their right mind would be outside in that mess anyways? If memory serves me, I think their bunker took a direct hit soon after they had left it. Remembering how the hills lit up just a few hours earlier, and after hours of exploding rounds, I thought sure we were going to be overrun that morning. Looking out that slit to see if they were coming in under the shelling was pretty tough but when I did, I remember seeing a couple of Ontos Vehicles parked outside our bunker. I guessed they were there in case the NVA tried to come up the airstrip. I felt some relief knowing they would see them first and I could keep my head down.

Ray W. Stubbe

Hours later, the sight of the mess outside was mind shattering. Unexploded rounds from the nearby dump were laying everywhere. The whole place looked like it had been leveled. The usual morning fog was present, but for once I was happy to see it. I walked the area cautiously avoiding the rounds lying on the ground. I just knew one was going to go off. Everyone was out on the strip working to repair the damage. It seemed like we had to disassemble it to put new mats in place of the ones with holes in them. Eventually, someone came up with the idea to cut the jagged edges away with a torch and fill in the holes. I don't know who it was, but I hope he got a medal for "Good Thinking."

If you could find any humor at all in this whole mess, it had to be when our ensign (God Bless him) put up the "Armed Sentry" sign to scare off the Marines that might try to steal the extra matting we had for the strip. They didn't have to steal it when I was on watch. Just give me time to turn my head and take what you wanted. Besides, these guys were on the wire protecting my butt. (Sorry about this one, Marty, but you have to admit, it was kind of funny.) In his defense, the sign was probably Chief Nunnley's idea.

It always seemed like we got shelled when I was guarding the mats. One night, I was walking around and around trying to stay awake when we experienced some incoming. During my retreat to a safe place, I got my feet tangled in COM wire and hit the ground so hard my rifle came apart. There I lay, unable to do anything but wait for it to end. It only lasted a few minutes I think, but it seemed like hours. After that, I always looked for the nearest bunker when I was out there. Speaking of bunkers, I would like to thank all those guys who were relieving their bowels in the little barrel bunker behind the Ensign's Hut. On one special occasion, that happened to be the closest protection when the incoming rounds hit.

Everyone at Khe Sanh during this time has memories of close calls and lost friends. I still remember a Marine named "Red" we use to play cards with often. Red wore an Aussie bush hat under his helmet that couldn't be missed. I don't remember the exact day, but I do recall that he was supposed to be leaving Khe Sanh very soon. A short round hit in front of him that day outside his bunker and Red died. I never knew his name, but I'll never forget him.

One piece of equipment we had at Khe Sanh was a Galion Grater. I hated the sight of that machine and I think it hated me. I was assigned to maintain all of its two thousand grease fittings. One of the grater's tires was "mortally wounded" by shrapnel and sure as hell one day they dropped a new one in for it. With all the stuff we needed there, we got a tire! I uncrated the tire that day and rolled it over to the lube skid. I leaned the tire upright against the skid and as I let go, a mortar round hit. I was dazed and blinded by it and staggering around when someone took me to the ground (I think it was one of the Recon guys next to us). Three or four more rounds hit within a few yards of us. Later, I saw that the first round had hit about eighteen inches from me just on the other side of that tire. I never got the chance to thank who hit me. I was a bit shaken at the time, but whoever you are "Thank You!"

The weeks following January 20th have been blurred by the years, but it seemed that every day had its moments. Jets dropping napalm, B-52's shaking the ground, incoming arty, more and bigger rats, rain, and fog. However, the worst day I remember was the day I left Khe Sanh. I was leaving on a Chinook in late February and as luck would have it, a C-123 landed before I could get to the chopper. This of course was followed by round after round of incoming. I dropped my bag and ran to the chopper. Just as it was about to lift off, I jumped onto the tail gate. One seat remained empty. A Marine was sitting on the end of the port side row of seats. I motioned for him to move forward but he didn't move. He had that same stare that so many of us had then. When he didn't move, I slid in between him and another Marine. The pilot was circling to gain altitude when we heard a loud pop. I turned to the Marine sitting in what should have been my seat and said, " I think they're shooting at us." His face was pale as he said to me, "I'm hit." As he fell into me, I stood up and yelled to the door gunner. He responded quickly with a first aid kit and started packing the exit wound in the Marine's lower abdomen. The pilot quickly sat us down next to Charlie Med. He was taken away and we lifted off the strip once again. The pilot circled the area looking for the sniper but finally gave it up. I was dropped off at Dong Ha a short time later. Covered in blood and Khe Sanh clay, reality hit. I should have been the one left behind at Charlie Med. I've prayed many times for that Marine. I don't know if he made it or not but would give almost anything to know the name and fate of the Marine that took my bullet.

I left CBMU-301 after a few short months. In those months, I met the bravest, greatest, and most dedicated men I've ever known. On March 9, 1968, I was home with my wife and daughter. As I watched CBS News, I saw an interview with the "Seabees" I had shared that small bunker with. Sadness and guilt for not being there overcame me. I was home and they were still enduring Khe Sanh.

Jerel Wenger, Yeoman CMBU-301 Det B

Sam,

Hot diggedy dawg! When they told me to get my bags packed to move on up from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh, back at the end of June, 1967, I was gung ho to go! Khe Sanh was up there in that peaceful northeastern-most corner of I Corps, up there where they didn't have nightly rocket and mortar attacks, where the land was more verdantly exquisite, where life was a whole lot more civil than it was down in the sweaty, densely-populated coastal plains, or the rugged, overgrown, leech-infested central highlands.

Yup, it was all true back in July 1967, when the sun shone down on Khe Sanh with a heat and radiance like nothing short of a tanning parlor in Beverly Hills, where the sky was a crystalline aquamarine blue from sunup to sunset, where the lush green jungle grew right up to the edges of the combat base and the airstrip, which extended about 300 yards beyond the perimeter. Lovely Khe Sanh, where wild tigers, hunted until recent times from the backs of elephants by the Princes and Kings of Annam, roamed free and left their pug marks in the mud by the banks of the small stream which flowed along the eastern end of the airstrip and then down into the deep valley beneath its foot.

Khe Sanh had the feeling and appearance of a bustling frontier post, with swirling clouds of dust, a forest of ammo-canister utility poles supporting an unruly tangle of wires, cables overhead, a chow hall that served four square meals a day, a throbbing communications center, a fairly busy little airstrip, a proper medical facility with clean cots and crisp linen sheets in a cool, sandbagged warren on the turnaround apron, and all of it ringed by a zigzagging, sandbagged combat trench, fortified with pillboxes and gun emplacements at regular intervals, and staffed by Marines who looked every bit like they meant business and knew how to conduct it. Khe Sanh was a right cozy little place to be, back then.

And Khe Sanh was growing fast, too. A couple of companies of the 26th Marine Regiment were already there, "comfortably" dug in and awaiting the arrival of more of their brothers. There was a contingent of Marine Reconnaissance, Tank and Ontos platoons, 105mm artillery batteries, crash crews, loadmasters and materials handlers, Army Special Forces and liaison personnel, doctors, corpsmen, even a handful of chaplains who were charged with keeping us on the straight and narrow in spite of our intentions to the contrary. Seabees from CBMU-301 had just arrived, by air and overland by convoy up Route 9, bringing about 35 steelworkers, carpenters, heavy equipment operators, mechanics, and electricians along with a couple of bulldozers, a handful of trucks, and an assortment of equipment to maintain and augment the airstrip and the "facilities" that were strewn about Khe Sanh Combat Base.

The first task of the wooden "seats" they left behind. Around the 19th of August, the east end was torn out, shortening the runway to a mere 1500 feet in length. During that first reconstruction phase, the usable half of the runway was only long enough for short-takeoff-and-landing (STAL) aircraft, such as the small-capacity, ugly-duckling "gooney-bird" caribou cargo plane, along with CH-49 Chinook and lumbering CH-53 Hercules helicopters. Those restrictions severely limited the amount of supplies Khe Sanh could receive, and that put MACV's most remote outpost in South Vietnam at some considerable risk. Time was short. The resident Seabees from CBMU-301, reinforced by contingents from the main body and MCB-5 in Dong Ha, worked around the clock, digging out many thousands of tons of rock from a handy nearby rocky outcrop, crushing it to usable size, (Fig 2) and laying it out, grading it, and compacting it to form a foundation for the lengthened airstrip, and then zipping it all up under new aluminum runway matting, finally finishing the first reconstruction of the Khe Sanh airstrip in October.

Having once completed their most pressing job, the Seabees then turned their attention to less immediate issues at hand. The electricians were out and the mechanics were somehow managing to fix all the stuff the other guys broke with indefatigable skill and ingenuity. About that time, the Seabees also started excavation for that magnificent, downright homey bunker dubbed the "Alamo Hilton" by squads of journalists who would later seek shelter and camaraderie in its depths, as well as a headquarters "hooch" and some utility buildings in their equipment yard, conveniently adjoining the airstrip.

Scuttlebutt had it that another battalion of 26th Marines was due to move in soon, and accommodations would have to be thrown together for them. Artillery pieces, ammunition, food and supplies were coming in by the planeload. Platoons of grunts from the 26th Marines were manning the hill positions above the combat base, on Hills 861 & 861A, 1015, 950, as well as on 881South. A steady stream of helicopters were landing, ferrying supplies, ammunition, and fresh troops up to the hills, and bringing back tired, hungry, funky Marines.

All this activity was fine until the rains came. We had been told by salty-dog Vietnam veterans that the monsoon rains in Vietnam were wet, long and intense, that mold grew upon mold, that everything stank, that the soaking wet troops shivered in the cold nights and chilly mornings, and that everything sank, slid and slithered into and over that ubiquitous red laterite mud of Khe Sanh. What we hadn't been told was the good stuff: that the red mud would turn, in the regular downpours and sopping wet fogs of that waterlogged season, into a thick porridge of goo (Fig 1) under the interconnected aluminum facing the runway, and that those slats would start to rear up and buckle, rippling down the length of the runway ahead of and beneath, the enormous, fast-moving weight of the packed cargo aircraft that landed with ever-increasing frequency. Re-supply of Khe Sanh was starting to look a bit problematic.

Our OIC, freshly minted Ensign Martin J. Kux, CEC, huddled together with Marine and Air Force commanders, engineers and experienced NCOs from the main body in Dong Ha, and came up with a plan to rebuild the airstrip again from the bottom up, peeling away its soggy surface, and laying in 3 times the rock that was in the first reconstruction. As reinforcements and additional equipment soon made their way up to Khe Sanh from Dong Ha, the airstrip was soon stripped bare again and the mire scooped out of the way. The blasters, bulldozers, rock crushers, and dump trucks started up an around-the-clock assembly line, and the Seabees once again worked in 12-hour shifts, in the light of day and under the artificial trees of spotlights through the night, recreating our lifeline to the outside world from the ground up.

All during both phases of reconstruction of the airstrip, re-supply of Khe Sanh had to be accomplished somewhat more ingeniously than before. Overland transport of supplies had become impossible with the severing of Route 9 by the ever-present NVA in August. With the airstrip long unusable and soon to be torn out completely, with helicopter and STAL transport limited, risky and slow, and with conventional parachute drops impractical and prone to missing the target, some other method of delivery had to be devised. The new, innovative, never-before-used technology that evolved was the low-altitude, parachute-assisted, ejection delivery system (LAPES), like no other method of military re-supply in the history of warfare, logistics, or engineering. The courage, awesome skill and intrepid flying of the pilots and crews of the MAWs down in DaNang and elsewhere pulled us all through those tenuous days, helping to keep the enemy at bay and keeping us on the ground in Khe Sanh supplied with the materials necessary to defend and feed ourselves, an incredible volume and variety of supplies, munitions, foodstuffs. That's not to mention the huge amount of materials needed to rebuild a nearly four-thousand-foot military airstrip. They brought all that stuff to us by air, too.

With all that tricky flying and a steady buildup of the NVA's antiaircraft capabilities, not all of the aircraft made it safely in and out. A C130, a C123, and a Hercules helicopter were destroyed by enemy fire or mishap, and at least six airmen perished. Two men parachuting from an over flying transport-aircraft, became entangled in each other's chutes and plunged to their deaths. I'm sure members of the loadmaster crews were killed or wounded during their mad scrambles to retrieve those essential supplies from the drop zone. We all know we owe those guys our lives.

The rebuilding of the airstrip at Khe Sanh was done not once, but twice, and with a "can-do" spirit the like of which I've never seen before or since. In the short span of less than 120 days, the old airstrip was completely removed twice. Often enlisting the help of a couple of Marine Corps tanks to pull the heavy slats of the old runway apart. Many, many thousands of tons of rock were "extracted", crushed, transported, laid, graded and compacted for the new, improved and enlarged runway. (Fig 2) Thousands of 20-foot strips of heavy, interlocking aluminum runway matting were flown in by heavy-duty transport helicopter, broken out, loaded onto trucks and transported out onto the emerging airstrip, laid and connected by the Seabees of CBMU-301.

And it was none too soon, either. The airstrip reconstruction was begun in October and completed in December. By that time, a wintry chill was in the air, and reports from the bush and aerial reconnaissance were growing evermore ominous. Many of us were amazed and confounded that the entire airstrip reconstruction project had been completed with a minimum of incoming fire and interference from the enemy. All that would soon change profoundly, forever branded in our memories on the 21st of January 1968. But we had a serviceable airstrip, and a means of keeping those life-sustaining supplies and ammunition pouring in during the 77 days of the Siege of Khe Sanh. Seabees "can-do," and at Khe Sanh, by God, they did!

I had forgotten the Recon patrol that got so badly hit, just a little over a week (if I remember correctly) before all Hell broke loose at Khe Sanh. I remember that Painter and other Bravo Recon buddies told us that there was a lot of activity going on out there in the bush for the last three weeks or so before the Siege started. I also remember that 881 N & S were taking heavy shellacking around then, and I remember the frequent arty support from the base and the air strikes by the Phantoms and the old slow-flying propeller-driven aircraft all around them. I remember the medevac choppers flying up to the hills and down to Charlie Med, ferrying the wounded and the dead. I guess we all knew something was about to break.

I also remember the night your Sam Messer's tent got hit. I'm sure we were there, that evening before it got hit, smoking some whacky-weed with the Recon guys and sharing some of the last cans of beer we Seabees had stashed under our office hootch, listening to the ominous stories of contacts with NVA, ambushes, near misses, and of you Recon guys lying still and breathless while enemy patrols and whole companies passed nearby along shadowy paths through the jungle.

I remember how Sam and I stood disbelievingly the next morning over the sandbag-lined crater where your tent had stood just the night before. I remember being told that "Doc" (weren't all corpsmen called "Doc?") and several other guys had been killed outright, that around three had been wounded and medevaced, and that Painter had been hauled off babbling and crazed from the concussion and the horror. That was one of those moments when there just wasn't any feeling inside — just a numbness, shock, disbelief and hollowness that never completely left me until I had been back in the "States" for many, many months. I feel it again, now, fresh and raw, even so many years later. It may be old age, incipient Alzheimer's, or just plain old dillusion, but your name, "Pagano," sounds awfully familiar, Bob...

Anyway, Sam and I ran into Painter and another Bravo Recon Marine back in '93 at a Red Clay Reunion in Washington, D.C. Ron Painter was healthy and apparently happy and sassy. It was good to see him. If you have it, please send me his e-mail or snail-mail address, and if you do write to him, please tell him that I still remember his dream about the massacre of Indian women, children, and old people at the hands of the U.S. Cavalry, that he told me about back at Khe Sanh. At that time I didn't believe him. It was only later that I found out about Wounded Knee. There were many strong and strange forces afoot at Khe Sanh. I still think of some of them, even now, thirty-five years later. Sam's story about the Marine who told him he was going to be killed and gave him letters to send, rang so true that it called to mind many others.

I had many premonitions myself and each time I did, they saved me from sure death. There was the sudden, irresistible urge to take cover just before a 122mm rocket landed right where I had been sitting in the entrance road between the airstrip and the equipment yard. There was that creepy feeling when I was walking by the ammo dump, just before I decided to get out of there and the ammo dump took its infamous direct hit. There was the night I was on watch in the equipment yard, taking a piss when the low "thump, thump, thump" out of Co Roc Mountain just across the border in Laos announced new incoming; that feeling that there wasn't going to be time to finish the piss, the mad dash for the bunker, squirting like a busted water pipe on the way; that feeling there wasn't going to be time to make it; that reflexive crouch right where I stood, the mangled flatbed trailer and barrels that so perfectly framed my crouching figure, the quick dash and the next blast which propelled me down the stairs into the bunker, never touching a step. There were many spirits afoot in the night at Khe Sanh. There were many spirits, many dark nights, and many unbelievable stories. I can feel them all again, thanks to your letters, and they give me the creeps.

Braegger, CM 1 (CBMU-301 Det B)

I do have a funny story to tell. In the midst of incoming one day, SCPO Benton I, & Lt. Kux went for the generator hole in the yard by the runway. When the shelling stopped as we were coming out of the hole, it appeared to be raining feathers. That's right, there were feathers everywhere. One of the incoming hit one of the bunkers in the forced re-con area, next to us, and it hit their sleeping bags. As far as I know no one was killed, it did hurt some eardrums, and broke the monotony for a few minutes.

Hal Cann, CE-1 (CBMU-301 Det B)

I never had any beer hidden under tents. I had it hidden under the OIC office hooch. I shared a pallet of beer with the Special Forces Chaplain. I remember a picture of a few Bee's with a can of beer in their hands and the caption read "no drinking water in Khe Sanh." I rationed it out at no more than two can's per day and no stashing. It went very well and my guys were happy with the set up. I can still see the Chaplain and I standing near the field office watching the chopper coming in, with the pallet swinging around in circles. What a great sight.

Sam Messer (CBMU-301 Det B)

I have a lot of memories of Khe Sanh, as that was my Home from Aug 67 to March 68. I will try and not go into great detail so as not to take up much space but hit on a few things. First thing was that we had on hell of a time getting parts for our equipment. Sometimes the other Seabees and Marine engineers would come around asking if we were missing parts off our equipment. The answer was always yes, someone was stealing our stuff. But in reality we were sneaking into their areas and stripping what we could get fast for our stuff. Working at night we were able to pull off these acts with out ever getting caught. The only thing we never got fixed was the PTO's on the 2 1/2 tons.

A funny/not-so-funny story. One day we had finished the Alamo Hilton and were bringing rock from the quarry for the top. Frenchy 2nd class EO dumped his load, and took off his bed and didn't come down as PTO didn't work! He was tearing down communication lines and we couldn't get his attention. So the rest of us dumped our loads and on purpose left our beds up and took off for the quarry, also. Needless to say we caught hell. Col. Lownds caught all 5 of us and had us standing tall. He was giving us hell and was going to bust us to E-0, I think he was so mad he would have shot us if he thought he could have gotten away with it. As it so happened Ensign Kux was gone and the Lt./JG Anderson was in charge. Lt. Anderson told Col. Lownds that we were under orders to drive the trucks and that they had been dead lined since November. He told us all to stick our hands out in front of us. Well I had no Idea what was to come, but we all stuck our hands out and Mr. Anderson came down the line and slapped each of us on the hand then snapped us to attention and told us to get our butts back to work! Col Lownds was upset and he called Cmd. Holmes at Dong Ha and Cmd. Holmes flew to Khe Sanh.

They had a argument, and the last I heard was CMD Holmes told Col. Lownds to leave his men alone. He told Lt./JG Anderson to get the lines fixed and left. That was the last we ever heard about it.

Rat Stew

Some time in Feb 68 after the ghost patrol, I was getting ready to eat some c-rat eggs. Frenchy Leblanc called me to the fighting hole outside the Alamo Hilton. He said, "Do you see what I see?" pointing to the garbage dump. I looked out and there were some mamasans from the FOB catching rats. I looked at Frenchy and said what the hell? He said we're going to have a HOT meal. Now, I was hungry as I was down to one c-rat a day and one canteen of water a day. I asked him what are you talking about? He said come with me we're going to get ourselves some hot food. So we took off dodging through the Marine lines, me just following him. He must have done this before, as he knew just where to go and where the holes were in the wire. We somehow got into the FOB compound, and Frenchy strolled up to this Army Staff Sgt. and cool as you please, said got any hot food today? The S/Sgt smiled and brought out some bowls. We all sat down on the ground and I watched as the mamasan dipped the rats into boiling water, pulled them out, gutted them, striped the skin off, then started cutting them up into a pot of boiling stuff. I sat there wondering what the hell am I doing here, as Frenchy and the S/Sgt made small talk for about 30 minutes or so. Then the mamasan took our bowls and filled them and I ate my first HOT meal since Jan 20. It had some green stuff in it and chunks of white meat, and I ate. I knew it was rat but all I could think of was chicken soup.

Memories of Past Reunions

With the reunion getting so close and the recent influx of so many new members to the organization, the staff had an idea to revisit a past reunion. We chose the 1990 KSV Reunion held in Nashville, TN, via KSV Newsletter #12. It was a practice of Reverend Ray W. Stubbe (founder of KSV) to have the attending members relate their experiences at Khe Sanh at our reunions, and how they felt when attending the reunion. Here are some of those remembrances:

General Ray Davis, who has attended all of our reunions (Tampa, Chicago, and present):

It's very moving for me to see such a turnout. It's totally great. It's a sign that we are getting back together. This nation needs the veterans to get together and exercise the type of leadership that veterans alone know about and can exercise. I had three trips in there during the Siege. I appreciated the depth of the foxholes. I had a son who had a platoon on Hill 950 for a long time (this was after the thing was pretty well settled) and I guess Miles' greatest claim to fame is that he is the first Lieutenant ever to clean all the rats out of Hill 950! I'm delighted to be among you and with you, and wish you all the best, and keep the faith.

Ray Stubbe, (Chaplain 1/26)

I was there July '67 to March '68 as the base Protestant chaplain attached to 1/26. The fellow I'd like to mention is Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer. Jonathan came to Khe Sanh about the 15th of January, and came to see me. He was a very young

The Rats of Khe Sanh

THE RATS, THE RATS,
WHY DO I KEEP HEARING THE RATS?
MORTARS, ROCKETS, ARTILLERY.
THE SHELLS KEEP FALLING,
SO MANY, SO FAST!
HEAR THEM SQUEAL, THE RATS,
THEY'RE DIGGING AND DYING, FAST!
INCOMING AND OUTGOING.
HEAR THEM SQUEAL.
THEY'RE SCARED AS HELL.
ME TOO, NO WHERE TO RUN, NO HOLE TOO SAFE,
NO WHERE TO HIDE,
I WANT TO SQUEAL TOO!
THE RATS, THE RATS,
LOOKING FOR FOOD.
ME TOO,
WHAT ABOUT RAT STEW?
RATS I HATE THEM.
I LIVE LIKE THEM,
AN ANIMAL,
JUST LIKE THEM.
NO BATH,
NO SHAVE,
NO HAIR CUT,
SMELL JUST LIKE DEATH!
THE RATS, THE RATS,
WHERE DID THEY ALL COME FROM?
HOW LONG WILL THIS DREAM LAST?

looking fellow — he looked about 12. He said, "I'm a Conscientious Objector." We talked a little. It was always my feeling that I didn't care if anyone applying for CO status were genuine or not. How can anyone measure that? I just didn't want to be on 881-South or 861 at night when it was attacked and have anyone who had any doubts at all that the chaplain wasn't worth protecting along with everybody else! But this one was definitely genuine. He had joined the Marine Corps believing his recruiter who said he would be working with dogs. He said he didn't care what happened to him; he just didn't want to hurt anyone. He had never been in a fight, never fired a weapon. So we began the long procedure. On the 21st of January after we were attacked, the Top of Bravo Company came to see me and said, "Chaplain, we have a problem. Spicer just won't take up his rifle and clean it. The guys are getting a little edgy and angry."

I later found out they were beating him up. In our common desperation and survival concern where we all depended on each other, that was perfectly understandable. I said, "I have a solution. I deserve a clerk. I live in the C-Med area which can always use stretcher bearers." So Jonathan came to C-Med where he eventually became in charge of all the stretcher-bearer details. He turned into a tiger. He repeatedly remained with the wounded on stretchers, laying next to them during incoming when everyone else took cover. This continued through the Siege until the early part of March when they were loading a large group of wounded onto a helicopter. A mortar round exploded, wounding the casualties as well as those carrying them. Jonathan took a little piece of shrapnel in the sac around his heart. The doctors of C-Med were really not equipped to do open heart surgery, but if they didn't he'd die, so they did, and saved him. He was evacuated to Japan but died 2 weeks later from infection. He was awarded a Navy Cross for his heroism. From him I have witnessed and experienced love, concern for others, lived in action on their behalf, that those who are deemed weak are perhaps actually very strong. He laid down his life that others might live.

Fred McEwan, (S-4, 26 Marines & C/O, 1/26

I want to mention one person or two but I can't because there's 2200 you could mention! It's hard to remember faces and people. We could say JACK EGGER when he got killed. He was in Charlie Company and had just reported aboard and was one of these direct rounds [KIA 22 Mar 68] that landed into his bunker. He and the Company Gunnery Sergeant got killed.

Let me tell you just a couple quick stories. The Regimental S-4 had a lot to do with supply of the bullets and the bandages and the beans. General Tompkins would want to know what was the logistic situation at Khe Sanh — water, garbage, ammunition, medical supplies, graves registration, everything. The Seabees rebuilt the airstrip. We found the rock quarry. There was a young buck Sergeant who discovered the stone. We couldn't find rock anyplace for weeks in mid-1967. They finally found the stone on top of the position held by 1/9. The Seabees brought up a rock crusher. We rebuilt the airstrip and got it in good shape. Around December when the North Vietnamese Army blew a French bridge across Highway 9, Colonel Lownds, the Engineer Officer, and myself went there with one of the rifle companies as security. We swam across that river to check out that area, see if the bridge could be rebuilt. It could not, so we left real quick. It was a precarious situation. The NVA were quickly closing in. The last Rough Rider that came across Highway 9 had a load of bunkering materials for the Lang Vei Army Special Forces people.

One funny story: sometimes you do not understand the enemy. We had a water supply on one side of the base which was never shelled. They could have knocked out our bulk fuel pump. On the other side of the perimeter, we had the trash dump. We worked on the dump, and thank God for the artillery. They were the only ones that had the TD-15 bulldozer, which they let us use. The NVA shot at the driver, with machine-guns, RPG's, and mortars. They never did hit him — he sure deserved a medal. On the other hand, the NVA never hit our water or fuel pump, go figure.

Jack Ayers, (366th Tactical Fighter Wing, USAF)
Told of a group of Marines who had been on one of the hills at Khe Sanh and spotted a jet aircraft's tail identification.

I was the Flight Line Expediter. We were in the secure area at the north end of Danang. A group of Marines were looking down our revetment area. So I pulled up and asked, "Do you guys want to take a ride down here?" and man, they piled on. Well, we had one of these security cops there, and he got a little bit upset because I'm taking people down the line, and he challenged me. I said, "What's the matter? Do these guys look like Orientals to you?" So we took them down the line, and we had aircraft in different configurations, maintenance, engines out, what have you. And as I was driving along, the young Marine flipped out on me; I mean he was just out of his gourd! "There it is! There it is!" I said, "Hey, cool it! You're going to fall off the truck. There's what?" And he said, "There it is! There's the SOB that got Charlie off my back!" And I tell you, I've never been so proud in my life!

Lee Klein, (G-2–3RD Mar Div)

I was at Khe Sanh as the Division G-2 Representative. The reason I asked to come up now is because the Air Force officer just spoke. Few people realize the contribution that the Air Force O-1 pilots and their crewmembers made at Khe Sanh. We had an enormously difficult time trying to get Marine O-1 aircraft. In fact, as far as I know, there were only 2 in country or at least attached to the 3rd Marine Division. The Air Force officers (who were a major and, I believe, 3 or 4 lieutenants) were flying in and out in O-1 aircraft, running their spotting missions for Army Special Forces and the SOG units that were either at Khe Sanh or had been flown in from elsewhere. But on all of those missions, they asked me before they took off in the morning and when they came back in the evening, "What can we do for you?" or "What can we tell you?" or "Where can we over-fly so we can tell you if there are changes in the terrain, changes in the trails." Subtitles that those guys were recognizing on a daily basis. For instance, when the dew was wiped off of the plants could be seen very clearly from the air, and they saw things that we would not recognize on the ground. And I'd like to know if there's any way of getting a hold of those Air Force pilots and their crew members who were based at Khe Sanh. I know that the C/O of the outfit will tell you the importance of what they did, at least in terms of the enemy's eyes. The C/O was a Major, and he was shot down with a SAM missile. It's not very typical of the enemy to waste a SAM missile on an observation aircraft"

NOTE: These were the aircraft of 20th Tactical Air Support Squadron, flying as part of Operation TIGERHOUND.

I've done quite a bit of reading about the operations at Khe Sanh, especially the time I was there in April, May, and June of 1967, the Hill Fights. And it's a little disturbing sometimes to read the histories because they're inadequate or inaccurate or at least incomplete — even in some of the histories provided by the Marine Corps. The thing that disturbs me the greatest was the casualty reporting. I was at Khe Sanh those 3 months, and we had 200 KIA, and I know because I counted the casualty lists. Yet in reading some of the official histories, they say that it was roughly a hundred dead and 600 or 700 wounded. I know in 3 months it was 200 dead and 800 injured. Why is that important? It's important to me because if we don't understand what the true costs are, we trivialize those deaths, we won't understand what the costs of those type operations are in the future, and it's easy to plan when you think the costs are far less than they really are and you don't discover until afterwards that the costs are enormous! And they were very heavy in Khe Sanh in those 3 months!

Henry & Dorothy Smith (parents of Cpl. Terry Lee Smith, H&S/3/26, KIA 20 Feb 1968):

We appreciate very much being here. Many of you remember Captain Dabney and Matt Caulfield, and I'm sure they would like to be here. We appreciate very much being able to associate with you people and meet some of the people who were on Hill 881-South. Thank you.

Chaplain Charles (Chick) Kelly, (Chaplain of 1/26, Mar 68)

Hello. This is my first time at a Convention, and I'm glad to be here. I want to find out, where is this guy with the big smile and the blond hair that I used to meet on the line at Khe Sanh? He was gone for a whole month. I said "Where did you go?" He said, "Chaplain. You see this little scar here?" I said, "Yeah." He said, "You see this little scar here?" He says, "I was on the line and this bullet came in here and withdrew here, and it went through the sinus passages and just made one optic nerve a little bit shaky, and they patched me up and sent me back here!" Is that guy here? [He wasn't].

Well anyway, I'd like to say thanks for that wonderful story Doc Blanchfield told about me, but I want you to know the truth. About that time — I'm not a military strategist, but the bullets were getting closer and the noises were getting louder, and I realized it was time to leave! I thought it would be unfitting to lead a "rush out the door," and so I saw this guy who needed help who was blind, and the other guy who had the stretcher, and I thought: that's a great way to leave!

I want to tell you something wonderful that happened at Khe Sanh. I'm proud of this. You know about 10:00 A.M. the fog would lift. The NVA could look right down on you and in came the mortars. I was giving out Communion one day after some sergeants I knew had given me some wine, which they had made from grape juice. When I went to bed, the wine fermented...in my stomach. While I was giving out communion, everyone was down in the ditch. I heard this mortar pop, and I realized I had to jump into that ditch. I did not know if the mortar had hit me in the stomach or the wine had reached its peak of fermentation.

We formed a group of 6 Marines to help give out Holy Communion in small groups due to the danger of having large groups gather together. Two of those Marines; Kevin Macaulay (B/3dRecon), and Ed Prendergast (B/I/26). are here with us. I wrote a letter to the Military Ordinariat and said that this is a good idea, that we should give our Communion this way, and we're doing it, and we're trained to do it, and we'd like your blessing on it. They thought about it for a month, and said No. No other Navy chaplain has asked for this to be done, and we think it's entirely unnecessary. Now every Navy chaplain has assistants giving Communion for them. A concept we started.

Don Samuels, (I Co 3/26)

This is my first reunion, and I've really enjoyed it. I haven't seen anyone I served with since January 20th, 1968. Today I met two of them. I was First Platoon Sergeant of I Company on Hill 881 South, On January 20th we went out and tangled with a NVA battalion on Hill 881 North. I also met my point man, Chet Wilson, and one of my rifleman, Richard Darling. Chet contends he fired the first shot that started the 68 Tet Offensive. Thank you.

Ernie Spencer, (D Co 1/26)

I was with 1/26 from July of 67 to June of 68. I had the distinct honor and privilege to command Delta Company. When I arrived on Hill 861, my XO at the time was a fellow by the name of Bill Fite. Bill was considered an intellectual in Delta Company: he smoked a pipe! and he had an IQ over 70! When I got up there, XO's got to fill you in because he's been in-country about 5 or 6 months. He said: "Skipper...this battalion, the chaplain's crazy, the staff is crazy, and you won't believe it, we got a doctor that is insane!" So I said to him, "I finally found a home in the Corps!" What it was, he had been cared for by Harvey Demaagd. Harvey liked to do jungle sores and apparently he'd done Fite one time, and I told Fite, "Well, I told you guys to wash!" So I got the word when we shifted over to 881, Harvey liked to come out to the field as often as he could. I called Fite over and said, "Hey, Squid-6 is coming up." "O God! Skipper! Gees! Throw me out on patrol! Anything! Get me away from this guy!" I said, "For crying out loud, if we got a doctor that's going to make house calls, I don't want him messing with selecting the men, so the staff officers are going to have to present themselves! Unless you can find a replacement, you're it, Fite!"

We had this new artillery officer, Bill Smith. Fite comes in and says, "Man, I got one, I got a good one for Harvey. It's the new F/O." Bill Smith not only had jungle sores; he had pimples. So I said, "Yeah, he'll do!" So Harvey comes up, gets off the chopper and looking! He's ready. He's ready to rumble! He says, "Where's Fite?" I said, "He went down to the store to get some cigarettes or something," and I sent the word down about Smith. Harvey took a look at him, and we pulled this kid Smith down into the supply tent on 881 just off the LZ then. He's working on Smith, as though he was Michalangelo doing a statue, hitting all these pimples with this syringe! This kid is screaming and yelling. I'm drinking cocoa, and laughing. The supply kid was this innocent little kid from an apple farm in Washington hiding behind there, looking at what these officers are doing, and can't believe it's going on.

One thing I'd like to say to Harvey, after all these years: Your diagnosis was wrong! I got down there to Danang, and the doctor's looking at the chart laughing. I pulled the oxygen mask off and I said, "What's up?" And he said; "I don't think you're pregnant!"

Harvey Demaagd, (Bn Surgeon, 1/26)

Thank you, Ernie. As you all know, I was the Battalion Surgeon for 1/26, and I like to come to these affairs to piece together information that's sort of lost over 20 years, and I thought it was a valuable experience for me. Then, as of last year, I realized another very important reason to come here is to defend myself of what I'm accused to doing in Vietnam! Last year I decided I'd just deny everything. This year, I decided that wouldn't be true. You can imagine what it's like trying to conduct an intelligent interview in a situation like Delta Company up on the hill. I mean they're coming at you in sort of a bizarre way too! So I found that the best defense was to come on to them equally as strong. That's a sound medical practice, by the way! I'm especially pleased that we have corpsman here. I notice in this meeting there's lacking a lot of corpsmen.

David Buffalo. (H&S, 1/26)

David was on Hill 950 when it was overrun the night of June 6/7, 1967, and survived that attack.

Two things I'd like to say are "Welcome Home," and "Semper fi." I started out with 1/26, H&S, from its inception in California, until we shipped out in September 1966, for Vietnam. We were on Hill 55, and later in 67 assigned up to Khe Sanh valley. We ran a radio relay on Hill 950 with A Company, recon, with the security being supplied by either Alfa or Bravo Company of 26th Marines.

We were hit by a reinforced platoon the night of June 6th and 7th, and I believe that is the first time that Khe Sanh got hit with rocket fire from the opposing valley. We were overrun, and more or less the surviving Marines on the hill played dead for 6 to 8 hours. Marines re-took the hill the next morning, when we were reinforced from the Combat Base.

The person that I remember the most were the people that were in the bunker with me, one who died and one who made it through. That night, as we got overrun, the NV A tossed in 2 hand grenades into the bunker. It'd been raining for somewhere around 10 days, so that one of the grenades landed in the mud and sank a little bit before it exploded, but the other one went off, and caught one Marine from the chest up, and got me and a third Marine named Howard whom I will never forget. Howard ran out of the bunker when that grenade went off, I don't know how, God was certainly looking upon him, because he came back in the bunker without a scratch. That was truly amazing. God was certainly was looking after all Marines on that particular night.

It's difficult for me, because I have suppressed a lot of this for a lot of years. Other than writing Ray about it, this is the first time that I have actually said anything about it. I just want to say: thank you for listening, and I'll see you at reunions in the future.

Kevin (Hoss) MacAulay, (B Co 3rd Recon)

I was with Bravo recon from June of 67 until June of 68. I think I'm one of the only guys in Bravo recon who wasn't wounded during the entire period we were at Khe Sanh!

I landed in-country the day after Hill 950 was overrun. Three recon radio operators were killed up at the bunker. Cpl. Howard Withy, Cpl. Dale Speir, and Cpl. Chip Sherrell. I was a radio operator and had no infantry skills whatsoever. I did not belong in any type infantry unit. All I did on patrol was fall down and stay there until somebody pulled me back up again! The Gunnery Sergeant who was in charge of allocating people to the various companies said, "Who are my 3 Recon Marines?" And I looked at the two other radiomen who I had gone to school with and I said, "Dave, those 3 guys are dead. There's no way in the world anyone going to recon is going to survive 13 months in Vietnam." The first name that was called up was mine!

I look back over 22 years and I thank God that I was sent to recon. I met some men, Marines and Navy Corpsmen, who to this day I consider the bravest people I've come in contact with. Last night, I sat from about 2:00 A.M. about 4:00 A.M. talking about Vietnam. More than I have done in the past 22 years. I am impressed with the sincerity of the men who I spent last night with, as I was with their sincerity then, some 22 years ago. I learned to depend on them 22 years ago, and I know in a pinch I could depend upon them again. I thank God for letting me renew that friendship last night and over this weekend."

Les Faurebrac, (B Co 1/26)

I started with Alfa Company and was sent to Bravo Company after the 2d Platoon of Bravo Company that got chewed up on patrol off the back of 881-South, took 18 KIAs and 16 WIAs on June 7, 1967. It was really bad. So I went to Bravo Company, 2d Platoon, and it was there that I met Tom Steinhardt. I had a bet going with him that he was going to have an accidental discharge with his .45 because he had his safety off a lot of times. When it came time for me to rotate off the hill, and go home. I told him instead of giving him 5 bucks I would send him a bottle of whisky. For the past 22 years I felt terribly guilty about that. I put an advertisement in Leatherneck. I looked his name up on the Wall to see if he was KIA. I just figured I'd never find him again. I got here to the reunion, and I saw him signed in. So the first thing I did, I jumped in a cab and went to a liquor store and got the bottle. Last night about 10: 30 I called him up and went to his room, and we talked for about 2 or 3 hours. Check this out, I have been carrying this guilt around with me for 22 years, and he didn't remember it!

I met someone over in Bravo Company at Khe Sanh, and I asked him where he was from, and he told me Redwood City, California. That was just one mile away from where I lived. I went to a rival high school. We played football against each other, and here we are talking. His name was Corporal Ken Claire. Corporal Ken was killed on February 25th on the patrol. About 2 years ago I called up Ken's brother, and told him I was with Ken, and he invited me over to talk with him. He invited me back, he was going to invite the entire family and I was going to bring my slides of the area Ken was in. The family was moved, as was I. It was obvious that people never really get over things like this — it's always something you carry around. Ken Claire brought so much life to Bravo Company. I don't know if people remember...he had a famous Tarzan call. He really added a lot of spirit to the platoon and everybody certainly missed him."

George Bailey, (Sub Unit #1, 1st Radio Bn)

I arrived at the Combat Base the day after the first heavy attack in January 1968. I had little tents and little 2-man, 3-man units, and they had that diamond-shaped antenna with the Portable Radio Direction Finder. It was our job to find the enemy radio transmitters, pass the information to the S-2 who would then pass it on to the artillery batteries for a fire mission. We were in the business of trying to determine the enemy strength during the Siege

We didn't make a lot of friends, because we all had clearances and were an independent unit. I lost half of my platoon one day. They weren't on the wire where they were supposed to be. I started looking, and I drifted off the wire someplace. Pretty soon I saw one or two of them, and they were all packing litters up to Charlie Med. We were getting hit pretty hard, and a whole lot of green folks just came in. They just arrived by helicopter and were on their way to the trenches and were getting hit. My guys were out carrying them back up to Charlie Med. When I found them, I chewed them all out. I was known as "Crazy George" anyway; I was the "Crazy Gunny." So I got them back to the area and after I chewed them out, I ended up putting them all in for a decorations. They were all bloody and beat. I just want to thank them!

Grady Branch, (C BTRY 1/13)

This is my first time at a reunion. The fellow Colonel McEwan was talking about on the TD-15 tractor at the garbage dump, his name was "Dutch." That's all I ever knew him by. I'm sure glad to see a lot of the guys! I was in the motor pool area of Charlie, 1/13. Dutch was the one who dug a hole that we pulled a deuce and a half down into, with a ring-mount with a .50 Caliber on it. We got hit a couple times and the fellow says, "Branch, get off here and get on that .50!" I'm in the bunker. I said, "You got to be kidding!" I was just out there; they had machine-gun fire on that truck. He said, "Get out there and man that gun." I said!, "I tell you what: you come out there with me, and I'll man that gun." He peeked out and glass was going everywhere. He said, "Forget that!" I'm sure proud to be here, and I'm glad to see a lot of you!"

Tom Steinhardt, (B Co 1/26)

I was on that infamous patrol with Bravo Company on June 7th 1967. I was one of the few guys that didn't get hurt. My fire team was all gone except for me.

I was one of the M-79 men, and I got pretty good with it. As a matter of fact, I think it was Lieutenant McDonald who asked me if I could hit a tree out about 300 yards out, and I said, "Yeah, think I can get it." I asked him if I could use the sights this time; he said, "Yeah." He thought I was cocky. I locked and loaded and used the sights, and here was a tree maybe a foot wide. I thought I could get close to it, and that's all I really wanted to do. Well I caught it 5 feet off the deck, and blew it right in half! He didn't say anything; he just turned around and walked away. That was the end of our conversation.

I hadn't seen Les for 22 years. I dropped out of sight. I got over my nightmares in 1972. We did make a bet about the .45 I had carried. I guess I thought I was John Wayne. Last night I got back about 9:30. The phone rings. I picked it up, and it's

Les. He says, "Are you Tom Steinhardt?" I said, "Yeah." He said, "Did you carry the M-79?" I said, "Yeah." There were other things that I also carried C-4, blasting caps and detonation cord. He said, "Well, I got something for you, can I come up?" I said, "No problem." My wife asked, "Who was that?" I said, "Damned if know! He's coming up and he's got something for me!" My wife said, "Well, what if he's coming up to kill you? What if you did something to him?" I said, "Well, we'll know when he hits the door! I'm not going to worry about it. I think I can take care of myself." So he showed up, and brought some pictures which jogged my memory. We got to talking, and he had a bottle of booze. We drank about a third of it. That's why we were late getting up this morning!

This is my first reunion, and I'm glad to be here. The reason I'm here is my son joined the Marine Corps last October. When he got to boot camp, he had a Battalion Commander's Inspection. His CO was with 1/13. My Son Matthew, was standing tall like a good Marine, ears pinned back and his thumbs on his side. The Colonel asked him how tough it was. He says, "Not very tough, sir." The Colonel says, "Why?" He said, "My dad is a former Marine and I have lived with him 18 years!" That is when it all started. That's when I got involved. That Colonel said to make sure I come and see him, and that's how I found out about this organization. I hope I can make every one of the reunions from now on. I feel like I'm back home now. It's just been a great time the past couple of days. I can hardly wait until tonight.

Meeting Les has been a highlight. I'm still looking for a guy for the last 22 years. If anyone ever runs across a guy named Ron Exum, I was interrupted by Ed Prendergast. He lives in South Philadelphia, I have his address, Damn! What a surprise. I have looked for him for 22 years. He is the one that picked me up when I got hit.

Richard Zdunczyk, (B BTRY 1/13)

I had just received this package from a friend of mine. Basically I was an outcast. The reason I was an outcast was because I had this flying over my bunker. Displaying a Canadian flag over the front of the podium. The CO said to take it down because they could use it as an aiming stake. Originally, it was white and red. I was there from December of 67. Khe Sanh got hit in January of '68, and the 3d time I was hit was March 12th, and I was medevaced. The rest of the time I spent at Great Lakes Naval Hospital and the Marine Barracks playing games with the Naval recruits. Also, I was Canadian, and I've been naturalized since June of 1986."

Glenn Rappold, (B BTRY 1/13)

We don't give enough credit to our Corpsmen. If it wasn't for our corpsmen, I'd be dead today. The blast took me 15, 20 feet off the ground... My left leg was under my rear end. I kept on screaming, "Oh my God! Where's my legs?" I played football, baseball, soccer. I said, "I'm not going home with only one leg!" I got hit in the left ribs and it looked like a squirt gun, squirting me in the face. Passed out 3 times. The 3 guys on my gun were from Missouri. They kept on screaming, "Glenn, you leg's there! Your leg's there." "I don't see it." They lifted my head up to see my leg, it was there. They put me on a jeep. I was in shock. "I want a drink of water."

Two guys took me off the jeep on a stretcher, one had a big patch over his left eye, he got hit in the face with shrapnel. There was a water buffalo that dropped some water right there. He dropped me off the stretcher because he slipped and fell, and I rolled off the stretcher. When I got in the underground bunker, he says; "This will quiet you from shaking and getting all messed up, take this smoke." I don't smoke, but sure enough, I stopped shaking. . That night I had to urinate so bad. I was in an underground bunker. I got up off my stretcher and tried to get up, and I fell down twice. This big Spanish Sergeant, who was 6-4, 250 pounds, came in and said, "What's wrong, Glenn?" Said, "I got to urinate." "No problem." Picks me up like that, takes me out, I do my thing, come back. I'm crying. He says, "Why are you crying?" [So choked with emotion he can barely continue talking, Glenn continued.] I said, "Because us Marines really stick together!" That's all I can say.

Dave Steinberg, (I Co 3/26)

I was with 3/26, 3rd Platoon, India, from November 67 through June 68, most of the latter part spent on Hill 881.

They called me "Doc Dave," and I'll tell you, coming back, this is my first reunion. I haven't been called "Doc" for a lot of years. My wife accused me of being distant to people and not letting people get close, I think a lot of us do. I've known a lot of people but not necessarily having a lot of friends. Coming to the reunion this week and being called "Doc" again put it all home that I am certainly proud and happy to be part of this family. As a T-Shirt in the PX says: "We did our very best." We tried to save who ever we could. We were the parent. We were the confessor. We were the cheerleader. We were in charge of sanitation and tried to make life more palatable, which is why I went to Dabney and said, "Hey, we're pretty thirsty. We're pretty plastic out on 881-South, and we're wiping the dew off in the morning because we don't have any water!" "I'll take care of it Doc." So we had more ammo the next day!.. I went back to Dabney and said, "We're starving to death!" "OK, Doc." And we got more ammo! So we seemed to definitely have enough ammo. I personally lost 80 pounds – which, as you see, the family has managed to put back!

Sometimes we were hooking up bodies that we buried under netting. Often times we had green guys that thought they were coming up to a Country Club all dressed up and saying "Where do I go?" The sniper didn't give them enough chance to get the rest of the sentence out before he just picked him off the LZ. So those guys that had to hook those choppers and heavens knows every time a chopper came in I just went to the LZ because if I stayed where I was, that's when they called me out anyhow. So I just went out there and waited for wounded to get wounded. Many times they came in thinking I was hit, but it was a lot of others. I never, ever, had to wait more than a second to get a Marine to help me drag somebody in or put them on a chopper, never had to worry about my buddies taking care of me. I don't remember the names. I don't remember the faces, just did it day after day.

I do remember one individual. He was with mortars, and he came down to our saddle where the 3rd Platoon was. His name was John Francavilla. John would come down and we'd sit and talk in the same spot all the time. I did my job as a Corpsman, and choppers were coming in, and guys were wounded, and it was "Corpsman Up" again. I'd be damned that after 45 days of just everyday talking to John I was called out to the Saddle to treat guys. When I came back, that very spot that we talked for 45 days was gone, and so was John. (K IA 09 Apr 68).

I love you like brothers and sisters. In the Navy, when I went back, every time they'd fall out for inspection, I'd wear my Marine greens! Every time there was a bar fight, they'd say "Come on, Doc! You know what side of the room you belong on!" And the next day at Captain's Mast! Captain at the Naval Hospital would say, "Doc, you like being a E-5, don't you?" I said, "Yeah, but I like to be on the winning team." I'm happy to say I'm on your team!

Pat Breeding, (wife of Earle G. Breeding)

As all of you wives know, when you stay behind, it's not easy. I came home from work and my daughter was in junior high, and I picked up the paper and on the front page it says: "Captain Earle G. Breeding's Company Has Been Overrun." I thought: "This just can't be!" Fortunately, I knew some people to call. I called them, and they said, "No; it's not true. They had a bad time, but they hung in there." I tell you it's the worst evening I ever spent in my life, because I thought he was dead."

Earle G. Breeding, (CO, E/2/26)

There was no such thing as a round coming in and not getting somebody, until we learned that you don't come up during the day, for any reason. The rounds would come in 3 or 4 at a time, we would say, "Did somebody get it?" After a while we quit saying that. When the rounds would come in, we'd say, "Who got it?"

So here comes old Bill Maves. "Do you suppose you could get some of those fancy flying airplanes and come bring them in kinda close?" And he says, "How close to you want them?" And I said, "How close can you bring them in?" And he looked at me, and he says, "Are you crazy?" So we moved everybody off from the west side of the hill between us and Kilo Company. [Breeding looks at Maves.] Bill, tell the rest of the story."

Bill Maves, (TACP on 861-A)

Mr. Breeding wants some close air support. I really didn't have a lot to do with it, the pilots are really good. We had a flight come off a Navy ship. "OIL FLIGHT" was the call sign. They carried 500- pound delayed fuse bombs. Captain Breeding wanted them in close because his men could hear the enemy tunneling. I said, "Well, that's awful close! They're dropping thousands of pounds of ordnance." He said, "Well, I'll worry about what happens!" I said, "OK, you got 'em."

I threw the smoke grenade to mark the target!

They came in, and I happened to be kneeling down next to my CO looking up the trench line. When they finally cooked-off the first two the trenches came together! And that was a close feeling! One Marine had to be taken out suffering from a concussion. We put in the whole flight, and had a lot of secondary explosions. I think Earle got a little grief from the base, they thought he had been there a little to long.

After the Skipper left, we had a lieutenant take over. He didn't have the same view of airpower as Captain Breeding. I was out one morning, and this flight happened. They don't ever land with their ordnance intact, and they wanted to drop it. I said, "Sure, we'll take it." And this Marine came out of his hole. I don't remember his name. He just got up and stretched and looked around. I was standing there with the radio, and he said, "What are you doing?" And I said, "Well, we're going to drop some bombs down here."

They had to make a run right over the hill. They couldn't come from the 881 side because the NVA could shoot them down. So they flew their pattern in over us. This poor guy crawls out of his bunker, turns around, and says, "Where are they?" I said, "They're coming right there!" and just then there are a flight of F-4s. Their bomb racks came open, and it was bombs away. The Marine turned white, and I will admit it made me a little nervous.

This Lieutenant came over and he was irate. He says, "What in the #%F!* are you doing?" And I said, "Hell, we do this all the time! Welcome to 861A!" I handled all the medevacs and re-supply. I sent a lot of people out — that was my job. I always thought I did a good job. I got them out, if there was any way to get them out. I was lucky, I could heal after working with some of the traumas associated with sending people out in body bags."

Steven Fitzgerald, (Adjutant of 1/26)

I was there from July of 67 through June of '68. I was involved mainly in the paperwork end of the battle. I saw a lot of these kids come in, and I assigned them to a company. Sometimes I would have to go the same night and identify their body. It ate at me and when I left Vietnam, I closed the door. That was it, I didn't do anything about it. Fourteen years later, I got involved in what they called a "guided meditation." It took me to a point where I was hurt, lonely, and I felt abandoned. I started talking about my experience with my wife, I hadn't shared a lot of it with her. I closed off again until I saw the PBS documentary program on the Wall in Washington DC. I shed lot of tears that night, and decided I had to visit the memorial. I did, and found it to be a great healing process. Ernie Spencer sent me a copy of his book, Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man. In it he wrote: "Dear Steve, Glad to see you're alive, love Ernie." It means so much seeing these guys here tonight. Reverend Stubbe who used to run around Khe Sanh as gaunt as the rest of us trying to find a hole to live in. He always wanted to go up to the hills and see the troops up there. We had a time of it up there, but a lot of us made it, thank God. A lot didn't; we always have to remember that."

Sid (Fish) Patricio, (D/1/26)

We've been coming together for 3 years, and I enjoy myself every time we get together with the guys from Khe Sanh. It's a real happy feeling to be here with all the guys. I just wish a lot more of us were here that never made it. I'm not much for words. That's it."

Russ Mann, (Medic, 1ST SPECIAL FORCES)

I was a medic with the 1st Special Forces group. My team was slated to launch a mission from FOB-3 at Khe Sanh. We arrived the day before Lang Vei fell and remained there for the rest of the Siege. Needless to say, trench warfare was something I had neither trained for, nor expected. Writing this letter brings old memories into view. One that I'd like to share with you is of the FOB-3 water truck. The most dangerous job at the FOB-3 was the daily drive to the water purification point near the runway control tower. This duty was shared on a rotating basis by the junior NCO's and was equally dreaded by all.

The water truck was a five-ton tanker that provided a highly visible roving target to the NVA artillery spotters. It had been wounded many times in the course of its duties and was a patchwork of welded sheet metal and odd parts. Only the steadfast devotion and ingenuity of our mechanic kept it running and moderately watertight. The seats had bloodstains and the windows were long gone.

The truck growled and rattled so loudly while underway that it was impossible for the driver to hear the muted thump that announced incoming rounds. The best strategy was to closely observe anyone above ground along the route. If they suddenly broke into a run or dove for cover you slammed on the brakes (so the truck wouldn't keep rolling and run over someone if the driver were killed) and lay on the floor of the cab till the barrage was over.

People that lived and worked along the route gradually became aware that the water truck had a tendency to attract unfriendly fire, and began seeking cover as it approached. This caused some confusion on the part of the drivers, and resulted in a somewhat jerky drive, as the truck stopped, and started in multiple repetitions over the course of its appointed rounds.

I've often wondered about the final resting place of the faithful truck that slaked our thirst throughout the course of the siege. Never faltering, delivering life-giving water to those in need despite multiple wounds, a veritable Gunga Din of Khe Sanh. Thank you for allowing an old veteran to ramble on."

NOTE: There were many others who made comments; these are only representative of the kind of sharing, openness, trust, and sharing that characterized the reunion.

Pills

Sick hospital smells
Fill the dead of night
Waiting for the Angel of Mercy
To bring her little white cup
Holding killers of pain
Knowing she will again
Tell you not to become addicted.
Is the alternative to addict to pain?

What's going on here?
Who hurts
Where does it say
You can't alleviate our aches?
Wo is trying to kill us,
Making us adjust to agony?
Goddammit to hell,
Can't you see our tears?
Can't you see how we feel?
Can't you see we are ruined Forever?

Give us our dulling dope,
Go back to your cubby hole
Pretend we're getting better
Out there in the wards of Hell,
Stinking each other out.
We know we must heal ourselves.
We know you are ignoring us
Out of an outdated belief system.
To Hell, I say!
We've been there, we say,
And ow we're here to stay

Old Friends

Old friends are for loving, remembering what they've done while passing time together, when we pass in the setting sun.
Many of you aren't around now, you've taken the Great Hike.
Some of you fought to stay here harder than you liked.
You passed on anyway,
now lying among the trees, green grass and headstone freebies the VA gives us.
You shot your last shot,
aimed your last bow, laying in laterite dust
you knew it was time to go.
You asked for little dying there,
wanting only to know,
"Did I do well, do you care?"
while you make the green grasses grow.
You were better than "well,"
the best of the best.
And I do care,
knowing I'll see you again when my last message is sent in.

Secretary's Notes

I want to take this opportunity to thank the membership for electing me Secretary of the KSV. I am both proud and humbled by your trust. I can assure you that I will work hard towards achieving the goals of the organization. As always, I thoroughly enjoyed the Reunion in Dallas, Texas. It is always a pleasure to meet old friends and find new ones. If I start naming all the wonderful people whom I so much enjoy, I will probably forget someone, so rather than do that, I will just say thank you to all, for allowing me to be a small part of your life.

time. I am a bit disappointed that members who said they would be attending, failed to show up. I know that economy problems and disasters accrue from time to time, yet if you didn't make it, you missed a lot of fun.

Tom and Janice Slaby from 3rd AT's won the 5 free room nights after qualifying in the raffle for those registering early. Next year we are making changes. Register early before the reunion, late registrants will pay five dollars additional. The late fee will pay some one to do registrations at the reunion, so the reunion folks can enjoy a little free time. First place of $1000.00 in the raffle went to Hank Melinson; second place for 5 free nights, went to Al Knight. Third place is ticket number 413863, four free room nights (The winner has not come forward, please do so). Fourth place, 3 free room nights was won by Doug Corbett with Sokoloski claiming the $100.00 cash prize. Congratulations to all the winners. Overall, the raffle was a bit disappointing. Out of 3,100 sent out, only 128 were returned before the reunion. Let us all attempt to be more active in the future.

The reunion had a few glitches, but everything worked out. The Adult Kart Racing was too much for some gray hairs. Many members took advantage of our volunteer van and driver. He made many trips to downtown Dallas and the superb shopping malls. Thursday we had a dance instructor teaching country and western dancing. It was a lot of fun learning the Texas Two-Step and several line dances for our trip to Billy Bob's Honky Tonk in Fort Worth. The instructor returned as the DJ and everyone had fun. Some did karaoke too. Singing competition was fierce, but the singing by those pictured in Figure 1, easily won the competition. Those in Figure 2 just warbled their way through. Billy Bob's Barbeque, billiards, pool, bull riding shows, dancing and drinking were a lot of fun.

Saturday evening's awards banquet was fantastic. The food was superb, and the Emmy-Award winning band made the evening of dancing and drinking a special evening. If you missed the Reunion, there is next year. Hope ya'll won't miss out again. Put away a few bucks a week, then when it's reunion time you'll have enough.

We Got Mail

Seeking Information

Steve Newton tells me that he went back to old posts at the Khe Sanh Vets website and found the one from me asking if anyone knew Bruce. We exchanged e-mails and spoke by phone yesterday. He also put me in touch with Lee Rimkus who lives in Montana. I gather that Steve used to be a member of KSV but dropped out, and Lee is still a member.

Being somewhat experienced with the Internet and having seen lots of strange goings on in that arena, I feel I need to check up a little on these two. Do you have any knowledge of them? Is there a list somewhere of those who did, in fact, serve at Khe Sanh? Do you have ways of checking the information? They both tell me that they were assigned to C/1/26 in early February 1968. I do not have immediate access to my KSV members list, but I hope to find it tonight when I go home. There's no guarantee, since I really have no idea where it is. I just wanted to make sure that they are on the up-and-up before I get too involved with them.

Thanks, Barry Cunningham

Barry, a new membership directory, is being sent to you. Newton is not listed in the old one I have, but Lee Rimkus is listed as a member of C company 1/26 living in Montana. The best way to ask your questions about your brother is to go to our Khe Sanh message board at www.geocities.com/Pentagon/4867. Click into the feature titled "New message center and do a post. It's a no brainer; ask questions about your brother. I note from our book that he was KIA on 8 Feb. 68. There are a lot of C company guys in our organization that were with the company during that time. If you would like, you can write an article or letter about your brother and send it via email and I will publish it in our next issue of our magazine. Not all our members read the message board but they all get the magazine. Talk about your brother if you would like. Include pictures of him and we will do an article on him. We always give special honor to our brothers who were KIA. I am the editor of the magazine and I will personally see to it that your brother receives the honor he is due. Just let me know what you want and I'll get it, if I can.

Respectfully yours,
Ernie Spencer

Subject: L/Cpl. John Burdette Appleton
From: Michael Oyler

Dear Mr. Wodecki,

Earlier today, I tried to send you an email regarding Appleton, a Marine with K/3/9 who died on Hill 881S on April 30, 1967.

I also attached photos of Appleton and his last letter home. If you did not get it, please reply to this message and I will resubmit my email and photos to you. Thank you. How do I get the next issue of Red Clay? You were kind enough to send me a couple of 2002 editions when I registered Appleton's sister, Joyce Standard, as an Associate Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association and a "Gold Star" sister.

Yes, I got the picture. I posted the letter and his picture at www.khesanh.org 1967 link. I sent it to Tom Eichler for the next issue of Red Clay. I posted his picture and letter on our message board to see if I can find anyone who remembers him.

Dear Mom,

I received your letter and was pleased to hear from you. I hope that everyone is fine. Say hello to Jane for me. The weather here is still hot, but we've had a little rain to make things more tolerable. It is peaceful here mostly. Thanks for sending me the package. Nothing broke, I'm glad to say.

I received a letter from Jackie, she didn't say anything about Joyce having her baby at Kilgore Hospital. Maybe she will tell me later. I bet it was nice to have a boy or girl but I guess they have to be.

Yes, he was about to ask if you had or were trying to get your name on that you sent them. If you do get a brand new car, you'll have to send me a picture so I can see it. I hope I finish my overseas time. Right now I haven't fully decided. My mind is mostly stressed on what I'm doing over here. That is mainly what counts.

It is happy that finally they cut down on the riots, which is what they should have done earlier. God bless mothers, but all I can say for a fact that I'll be truly glad to see especially since I'll be free over here.

Well I'll close because I'm running out of light. My candle is burning down low. Bye I'll write.

Love,
Son

Anatomy of a Fire Mission

Showing how Infantry and Artillery fight together

by Paul Marquis

A fire mission starts with a call on the radio. Picking up the receiver, the battery Executive Officer hears the words that never fail to excite an artilleryman: "Contact fire mission, battery adjust." The Exec repeats the order to the guns, which prompts the crew to start a sequence of carefully rehearsed moves. Bravo Battery made do with four or five men to a gun. While two men can operate the gun, five seasoned artillerymen could maintain peak performance over an extended period.

105 destroyed

A typical gun crew consists of a Section Chief, an Assistant Section Chief, a gunner, and an "A" gunner, loader, and powder man. In most cases, the loader did both "load and powder." Meanwhile, the Exec, using an aiming circle, which is an instrument much like an engineer's transit equipped with a scope (capable of both day and night viewing), "surveys in" each gun. During this procedure, each gunner points a telescope at the aiming circle. Using this as a reference point, the gunner makes sure his gun tube is pointed in the correct direction. By this time, Fire Direction Control (FDC) has made all the calculations, determining the range, deflection, elevation, and other firing data, in order to let the guns know what powder charge to use, what angle at which to level the guns, direction, and type of round and fuse to use.

W/1/13 Gun #5

The call for artillery starts as an infantry company advances through the jungle in single file, twenty meters behind the point man. In the middle of the column, near the company commander, marches the Forward Observer (FO); he follows behind the radioman. If a bullet hits the radioman, it has to go through that man's chest and the radio before reaching the FO, who is an extremely valuable member of the company. The dense jungle makes heavy going for the company, which stays off trails to avoid ambushes and booby traps.

The FO's concern is to keep track of the unit's position and to stay in contact with the distant battery of 105 Howitzers. From in front of the company, a burst of small arms fire breaks the stillness. As the Marines hit the ground, someone yells "Sniper!" The company commander checks out the situation and decides to have the FO call for artillery. Having anticipated that request, the FO has radioed the battery as soon as he hits the ground to "contact fire mission" and gives the location (a six-place map grid designation indicating a point on the ground to within 100 meters), and has asked for "Willie Peter" (white phosphorous) shells with a mechanical time fuse. As the company commander asks for the fire, the radioman says, "Shot," which means the shell is on its way and will explode in five seconds. The shell detonates in the air, mottling the sky with white smoke above the jungle canopy. The FO lines up his compass in the direction of the burst. The aim must be adjusted to the right toward the front of the column and towards the sniper. He radios the correction, "Danger close" — the artillery is being asked to fire within 600 meters of the Marine position. "Right 200, drop 200 shell — HE" (high explosive shells, which are fused with a point detonating fuse to explode upon impact, will now be fired by two of the guns in the battery). Again the radioman says "Shot," and five seconds later, the shells explode but the shells are too distant. The FO orders the battery to drop another 100 meters. The next explosions are just right, as the shells fall through their high trajectory and explode in front of the Marine positions. Most of the resulting fragmentation falls out, away from the Marines. A backwash of pebbles, wood fragments, and occasional pieces of metal pelt the helmets of the front ranks, as they hug the ground.

This is what close artillery support means. The company commander, the FO, the point platoon leader, and the artillery battery have thought and fought as one. Only a little ammunition has been expended; seven rounds in all. Best of all, no Marine lives have been lost.

Given the difficulty of target acquisition, and the need for duplicate safety checks, many artillery batteries averaged about five minutes response time. Some batteries responded in less than two minutes. The Marines at Khe Sanh managed to reduce this to an incredible forty seconds. Bravo Battery never stayed in any one place for any length of time, moving from DaNang to Khe Sanh with many stops in between. Bravo Battery had to stay within range of 2/3/3 at all times. They were on the float with 2/3/3 and fought in the Hill Fights with the guns positioned at Khe Sanh. Bravo fired in excess of 13,000 rounds in Hills 881 and 861. Sappers overran Bravo Battery on 28 August 1968, with four Marines receiving stateside wounds. Bravo Battery lost three men (KIA) in an ambush on 18 April 1968, and mourns the loss of a number of Forward Observers.

A Trip to DC, World War II Dedication by Our Roving Khe Sanh Ambassadors

Ron Shouse and Cliff Treese

May 28, 2004: Here we are for another Memorial Day Weekend. Lynn and I flew out of Greensboro, North Carolina to meet up with Cliff and Linda Treese in Washington DC for the annual Rolling Thunder Ride to the WWII, an annual event to keep the public aware of the plight of POW's and those that are MIA from all wars. This year the Dedication of the Monument for WWII Vets was on Saturday and we planned to be there. There were so many veterans and their families attending, it was impossible to get in if you did not have a ticket. The news people told us, 45 blocks were closed to vehicular traffic and a lot of the older Vets had to be bussed in from the Pentagon parking lot.

I thought that a lot of the speakers should have cut short their speeches because of the heat and the physical condition of the older vets, but you know how some people are. If there is someone to listen, they will talk. This was a very nice, fitting tribute to the senior veterans that is long overdue, a must see when you go to DC. A lot of people brought pictures of their fathers and other relatives to leave, like we do at The Wall. It felt great to walk down the street and have a vet from WWII give a clenched fist or yell, "Semper Fi."

Friday Night, we went to the Marine Barracks at 8th and I Streets for the evening parade. We were greeted by Sergeant Major and Mrs. Battaglia, the Sgt. Major of Marine Barracks, and given VIP treatment all night. We met the Commandant of the Marine Corps, General Hagee, gave him a Khe Sanh Vet Challenge Coin and invited him to our reunion. He thanked us. He was a nice guy, probably a holy terror to the guys under him, but he was nice to us. The highlight of the evening was the silent drill parade. Eight platoons in dress blues, the band and the drum and bugle corps all performing at the same time. No commands spoken but every movement precise. Was a great spectacle and if you have not seen this performance you are missing a real treat. I was told that at one time we all looked like that; I just do not remember being that tall. We met "Chesty," the Marine Corps mascot, and had pictures made.

Saturday morning, Cliff and I went to the Pentagon to see if there was some kind of military strategy we could help with. We were told our help was not needed. We were outside taking some pictures when a guard walked up carrying a machine gun and tells us pictures are not allowed. We promptly held up our hands and surrendered. Nice guy, but I would hate to have to fight him. Talk about big — this guy could use the gun for a club. Later in the day, we met Cliffs daughter's family who had never been to DC. Cliff's 12-year-old grandson was amazed at the sights and how the veterans made him feel like he was one of them. By the end of the weekend, Cliff's grandson Dylan wanted to return every year on Memorial Day weekend with his grandfather.

Dylan was afraid after hearing at school and on the news that Washington was in danger of terrorism over the Memorial Day weekend. During our stay at the hotel on Sunday morning, Dylan met dignitaries from the country of Oman who were staying at the hotel. They told him about their country, and how the children of their country were a lot like American children. This eased his fear that not all people of the Muslim faith were bad.

After breakfast Sunday morning, we began preparing to go over to The Wall for the day's activities. We stopped by Thunder Alley for souvenirs and to talk to some of the biker vets, then went across Constitution Avenue to find a place to stand for the parade. DC Police were in front with sirens going and lights flashing. Behind them came Big Paul of Orange County Choppers on the POW Bike and his son Paul Jr. on the Fireman's Bike. The crowd was ecstatic. Paul Revere came by on his Harley along with several other celebrities on theirs. The bikes passed in review for 3 hours or longer, with pipes blaring and the ground shaking, hence the name "Rolling Thunder."

We started our trek to the concert. Cliff and I and our wives were standing on the Arlington side of The Wall, and the concert was on the other side of the Washington Monument. Thirty years ago a couple of miles was nothing but now my tongue was dragging the ground when we finally got to the front of the bandstand. Paul Revere and the Raiders were fantastic. He is just as wild and crazy as he was back in the 60's. Bill Medley, the surviving member of the Righteous Brothers, sang too. Connie Stevens told a few stories of her time with the USO in Vietnam. Chris Noelle, whose sexy voice used to sign off on AFRS with "Good night, all you guys out there and here is a kiss from Chris. Good night." She was one of the announcers on stage. Nancy Sinatra was there and sang her song "Boots." Cliff and I presented her a pink satin jacket like the one that the Pink Ladies of "Grease" wore. It had her name on the front and a pair of jungle boots embroidered on the back saying These Boots Were Made for Walking. Glen Rappold as a gift from the Khe Sanh Vets, gave her a hat she wore during the second half of her concert.

...and Nancy Sinatra.

We did go down to The Wall to leave some things for guys that are no longer with us. This is always a tearful time for me. I did not know them all by name, but I know everyone of them is looking down and is proud of what all of us are doing so that they will not be forgotten. Semper Fi, guys.

I dusted off the Emblems at the Soldiers Statue for everyone. Park personnel will not let us shine them any longer. The Sergeant Major at Marine Barracks said he receives a phone call from the Park Rangers every day that his Marines are shining the Emblems. He said that he assures the park personnel that it is not his men "ruining" the finish on the EGA. He did get the men together and told them if someone knew who is "ruining the finish on the EGA," they should set up an OP or LP so they will not get caught. ADAPT-IMPROVISE-OVERCOME is still the order of the day.

It seemed like there was a Presidential motorcade whenever we needed to get somewhere. We saw the President on his way to Arlington on Monday morning, and he had some sort of conference in our hotel on Tuesday. Cliff and I tried to get a picture, but the Secret Service said no. We tried to tell them how we were important "War Heroes," and almost won the Vietnam War single-handedly, but they did not buy that BS. I got the idea of getting frisked by the Secret Service for a picture to post in the Red Clay. The agent said, "Now, I know you guys are crazy." See, this PTSD thing comes in handy after all. He took our business cards and offered to send us an autographed picture of the President.

The trip was great and would have been better if more of the KS Bros had been there. Our reunion is right around the corner, and Veterans Day is in November. I hope you guys plan to do something other than cook a steak or burger and drink a few beers. Pack up the wife or girlfriend, kids or grandkids and come on up for the celebration next year. You will feel better, and a little less wealthy. What the heck, you have to do something with that big check the VA gives you.

Semper Fi and God Bless America,
Ron and Cliff

"Dragon Slayers"

Robert Bailey's Latest Painting
Story prepared by Gary W. Foster
July 26, 2004

Dragon Slayers by Robert Bailey.

The juxtaposition of American air might against the Thanh Hoa Bridge, fearfully known as the Ham Rong or Dragon's Jaw Bridge, may become, if it hasn't already, the arch-symbol of the air war against the North Vietnamese. Destruction of the bridge became an intense obsession of American military planners. The Vietnamese, obsessing no less, fought to preserve the bridge, which for them had become the supreme symbol of their resistance to American air power. It's not without plausibility then that the destruction of this sacred symbol by the Americans may have been more important than the destruction of the structure itself.

A steel through-truss type structure, the Ham Rong Bridge, designed by Nguyen Dinh Doan, was principally a railway bridge with cantilevered roadways on each side of the main structure. In order to cross the Ma River at its narrowest point and because of limitations of the geometry of the railway curvature, the Ham Rong Bridge crosses the river almost due east-west. The general terrain in the immediate area of the bridge is flat with the exception of a jagged limestone ridge on the west side of the bridge known as Rong Mountain, and a small hillock on the east side known as Ngoc (Jade) Hill. The Ham Rong Bridge derives its name from these two geologic features that figuratively form the jaw bones of the dragon's mouth on either side of the river. Hence the English translation: "Dragon's Jaw."

The bridge depicted in "Dragon Slayers" is the second bridge to cross the Ma River at this location and was dedicated by Ho Chi Minh on 19 May 1964, the same day as his birthday. The first bridge was destroyed by the Viet Minh during the French resistance war many years before. As the air war in North Vietnam intensified, the Americans eventually divided North Vietnam into military regions called Route Packages which began at the Ben Hai River at the DMZ and were numbered one through six from south to north. With deadly portent, the Dragon's Jaw found itself in Route Package 4, assigned to the US Navy, now its primary antagonist.

The Ham Rong Bridge was attacked throughout the war with intense alpha strikes from US Navy carriers, occasional coordinated strikes by the US Air Force and US Navy, independent strikes of opportunity, and stand off attacks by missiles and by lobbing bombs. Navy pilots often dropped unexpended ordnance on the bridge or its environs before returning to their carriers. Under the direction of Nguyen Van Coi, commander of the air defense of North Vietnam, the Vietnamese positioned large numbers of every caliber of anti-aircraft weapon around the Ham Rong Bridge, atop Rong Mountain and Ngoc Hill, creating a formidable defensive curtain.

The Vietnamese made various claims as to how many American planes were shot down while engaging the bridge or its air defenses. The numbers cited by the Vietnamese range between 99 to a preposterous high of 1,000. One claim holds that in one day as many as thirty US planes were shot down while striking the bridge. Although many American aircraft crashed in the area from other nearby actions or missions, historical records show only about 10 aircraft total were shot down while conducting missions directly against the bridge or its air defenses. While many planes continued to be shot down in and around Thanh Hoa throughout the war, LCmdr. Ev Southwick and his RIO, Lt. Jack Rollins, flying a flak suppression mission in an F4 from VF114 on the USS Kitty Hawk, were the last American airmen to be shot down while striking the bridge or its air defenses. Captured just east of Thanh Hoa on the very banks of the Ma River, they became POWs in the Hanoi prison system and were released in 1973.

In all, the Americans flew about 1,000 sorties against the bridge including two special attacks by USAF C130s. The dreaded dragon finally met its fate in May of 1972 when laser guided bombs dropped from USAF F4s, dislodged the massive truss from its western abutment, felling it into the muddy river below. The exuberance of the upper echelon planners remained unabated by this excellent result and additional attacks were planned and executed against the Ham Rong Bridge. On October 6, 1972, a flight of four A4 aircraft, escorted by F4 flak suppression fighters and F4 iron-hand anti-SAM aircraft launched from a 27C Essex class aircraft carrier coordinated delivery of six two-thousand pound laser guided bombs on the structure effectively putting the Dragon's Jaw permanently out of commission. Through "Dragon Slayers," Mr. Robert Bailey has vividly captured the dramatic, poignant action with his definitive and timeless painting of an attack on the Thanh Hoa Bridge in Route Package 4, North Vietnam.

Legal Reform

To Those Who Served at Khe Sanh

by Patrick Brady

This is an addition to my posting "Agent Orange/ Diabetes/PTSD" – by Patrick G Brady, June 8, 2004 at 02:53:24 PM. I have since come to the realization that probably most did not understand the contents of this posting. Let me give you just a sample of my experience. I was co-chair to the patient council on the spinal cord wing at the Long Beach Veterans Medical Center for nine years. During that time I participated in rewriting the MP-5 which became the MP-2. It created a cost-effective home health care program that was a start for taking care of paralyzed veterans in their own homes. The problem with this program was that although it paid for medical aides in the home, it made them independent contractors and, therefore, ineligible for benefits such as heathcare. Also, taxes were not automatically taken out. Hourly wages were not mandated and have remained a battleground every year with the facilities budget. Financial limits were not placed and, therefore, veterans who had won the lotto or were on R-1 and R-2 were allowed this benefit, but non-service-connected veterans on vents have to fight to even qualify. Well, I learned a lot and have come to the conclusion that a word here or a word there changed can make a world of difference in what and how the law is interpreted by legal minds.

The Code of Federal Regulations should reflect the liberal terms for which they were written, yet the laws pertaining to herbicide were written after the fact and they were very restrictive. The time limits were impossible to fall into and so these ailments became impossible to obtain results of service-connection. I am not totally convinced that the Congress intended it this way and maybe we should look to seek a revision through either Congress or by class action. The code I would seek to revise would be Title 38 Code of Federal Regulation 3.309. In part (a) of this regulation it lists, chronic diseases. The following diseases shall be granted service connection although not otherwise established as incurred in or aggravated by service if manifested to a compensable degree within the applicable time limits under Sec. 3.307 following service in a period of war or following peacetime service on or after January 1, 1947, provided the rebut table presumption provisions of Sec. 3.307 are also satisfied. I would suggest that, "within the applicable time limits under Sec. 3.307." be moved to read as follows: (a) chronic diseases due to exposure of herbicides.

The following diseases shall be granted service connection although not otherwise established as incurred in, or aggravated by service following service in a period of war or following peacetime service on or after January 1, 1947, if manifested to a compensable degree within the applicable time limits under Sec. 3.307, provided the rebut table presumption provisions of Sec. 3.307 are also satisfied. (b) The Tropical diseases should also automatically be included if combat was preformed in a Tropical theater. (c) Diseases specific to former prisoners of war, should be amended to include combat veterans that served over sixty days of consecutive combat and "provided the rebut table presumption provisions of Sec. 3.307 are also satisfied" be eliminated. These changes should then be added to: (e) Disease associated with exposure to certain herbicide agents. If a veteran was exposed to a herbicide agent during active military, naval, or air service, the following diseases shall be service-connected would not invoke Sec.3.307 on war time veterans, and would result in the revision of Sec.3.307 and the time limits put on combat veterans. How many of you are frustrated that you have multiple conditions and yet they don't become service connected until after they result in cancer? Is it fair to penalize combat veterans in this way? Sec.3.307 reads as follows:

> Sec.3.307 Presumptive service connection for chronic, tropical or prisoner-of-war related disease, or disease associated with exposure to certain herbicide agents; wartime and service on or after January 1, 1947(a) General. A chronic, tropical, prisoner-of-war-related disease, or a disease associated with exposure to certain herbicide agents listed in Sec. 3.309, will be considered to have been incurred, in or aggravated by, service under the circumstances outlined in this section even though there is no evidence of such disease during the period of service.
> No condition other than one listed in Sec 3.309(a) will be considered chronic. (1) Service. The veteran must have served 90 days or more during a war period or after December 31, 1946. The requirement of 90 days' service means active, continuous service within or extending into or beyond a war period, or which began before and extended beyond December 31, 1946, or began after that date. Any period of service is sufficient for the purpose of establishing the presumptive service connection of a specified disease under the conditions listed in Sec.3.309(c) and (e). (2) Separation from service. For the purpose of paragraph (a)(3) and (4) of this section the date of separation from wartime service will be the date of discharge or release during a war period, or if service continued after the war, the end of the war period. In claims based on service on or after January 1, 1947, the date of separation will be the date of discharge or release from the period of service on which the claim is based. (3) Chronic disease. The disease must have become manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more within 1 year (for Hansen's disease (leprosy) and tuberculosis, within 3 years; multiple sclerosis, within 7 years) from the date of separation from service as specified in paragraph (a) (2) of this section. (4) Tropical disease.

The disease must have become manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more within 1 year from date of separation from service as specified in paragraph (a)(2) of this section, or at a time when standard accepted treatises indicate that the incubation period commenced during such service. The resultant disorders or diseases originating because of therapy administered in connection with a tropical disease or as a preventative may also be service connected. (5) Diseases specific as to former prisoners of war. The diseases listed in Sec. 3.309(c) shall have become manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more at any time after discharge or release from active service. (6) Diseases associated with exposure to certain herbicide agents. (i) For the purposes of this section, the term "herbicide agent" means a chemical in a herbicide used in support of the United States and allied military operations in the Republic of Vietnam during the period beginning on January 9, 1962, and ending on May 7, 1975, specifically: 2,4-D; 2,4,5-T and its contaminant TCDD; cacodylic acid; and picloram. (ii) The diseases listed at Sec. 3.309(e) shall have become manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more at any time after service, except that chloracne or other acneform disease consistent with chloracne, porphyria cutanea tarda, and acute and subacute peripheral neuropathy shall have become manifest to a degree of 10 percent or more within a year after the last date on which the veteran was exposed to a herbicide agent during active military, naval, or air service. (iii) A veteran who, during active military, naval, or air service, served in the Republic of Vietnam during the period beginning on January 9, 1962, and ending on May 7, 1975, shall be presumed to have been exposed during such service to a herbicide agent, unless there is affirmative evidence to establish that the veteran was not exposed to any such agent during that service.

The last date on which such a veteran shall be presumed to have been exposed to a herbicide agent shall be the last date on which he or she served in the Republic of Vietnam during the period beginning on January 9, 1962, and ending on May 7, 1975. "Service in the Republic of Vietnam" includes service in the waters offshore and service in other locations if the conditions of service involved duty or visitation in the Republic of Vietnam. (b) Evidentiary basis. The factual basis may be established by medical evidence, competent lay evidence or both. Medical evidence should set forth the physical findings and symptomatology elicited by examination within the applicable period. Lay evidence should describe the material and relevant facts as to the veteran's disability observed within such period, not merely conclusions based upon opinion. The chronicity and continuity factors outlined in Sec. 3.303(b) will be considered. The diseases listed in Sec. 3.309(a) will be accepted as chronic, even though diagnosed as acute because of insidious inception and chronic development, except: (1) where they result from intercurrent causes, for example, cerebral hemorrhage due to injury, or active nephritis or acute endocarditis due to intercurrent infection (with or without identification of the pathogenic microorganism); or (2) where a disease is the result of drug ingestion or a complication of some other condition not related to service.

Thus, leukemia will be accepted as a chronic disease whether diagnosed as acute or chronic. Unless the clinical picture is clear otherwise, consideration will be given as to whether an acute condition is an exacerbation of a chronic disease. (c) Prohibition of certain presumptions. No presumptions may be invoked on the basis of advancement of the disease when first definitely diagnosed for the purpose of showing its existence to a degree of 10 percent within the applicable period. This will not be interpreted as requiring that the disease be diagnosed in the presumptive period, but only that it be shown by acceptable medical or lay evidence characteristic manifestations of the disease to the required degree, followed without unreasonable time lapse by definite diagnosis. Symptomatology shown in the prescribed period may have no particular significance when first observed, but in the light of subsequent developments it may gain considerable significance. Cases in which a chronic condition is shown to exist within a short time following the applicable presumptive period, but without evidence of manifestations within the period, should be developed to determine whether there was symptomatology which in retrospect may be identified and evaluated as manifestation of the chronic disease to the required 10percent degree. (d) Rebuttal of service incurrence or aggravation. (1) Evidence which may be considered in rebuttal of service incurrence of a disease listed in Sec. 3.309 will be any evidence of a nature usually accepted as competent to indicate the time of existence or inception of disease, and medical judgment will be exercised in making determinations relative to the effect of intercurrent injury or disease. The expression" affirmative evidence to the contrary" will not be taken to require a conclusive showing, but such showing as would, in sound medical reasoning and in the consideration of all evidence of record, support a conclusion that the disease was not incurred in service.

As to tropical diseases, the fact that the veteran had no service in a locality having a high incidence of the disease may be considered as evidence to rebut the presumption, as may residence during the period in question in a region where the particular disease is endemic. The known incubation periods of tropical diseases should be used as a factor in rebuttal of presumptive service connection as showing inception before or after service. (2) The presumption of aggravation provided in this section may be rebutted by affirmative evidence that the preexisting condition was not aggravated by service, which may include affirmative evidence that any increase in disability was due to an intercurrent disease or injury suffered after separation from service or evidence sufficient, under Sec. 3.306 of this part, to show that the increase in disability was due to the natural progress of the preexisting condition.

How many of you now realize the complications in law implemented as a protection and yet abused by our government in an effort to save a buck? How many feel reform is necessary since Veterans Administration continues to deny benefits to combat veterans that were known to be exposed? How many even realize that this affects you? The proximate and secondary conditions are not very well known and as a result conditions that should be service-connected are not. Chloracne, for example, by its own definition is considered to be a clinical sign of exposure. How many in combat bother to report acne of any kind? Let's use some common sense and realize that if you now have a diagnosis of chloracne after you returned from Vietnam, and you were not exposed to a toxic waste dump, it is a pretty safe assumption that you were exposed to Agent Orange. You served in an area that was so saturated with it by 1967 that it would fit the EPA definition of a toxic waste dump. This is where we fought and died. (I CORPS)

Does it make sense that the VA made a declaration that anyone who served in Vietnam was exposed? Yes. The VA then doesn't have to explain the mixing with other agents such as DDT and all its health ramifications. We were exposed to more than just the rockets, artillery, and mortars along with the occasional sniper rounds. We were fighting in a toxic waste dump and now the government wants us to die without a fight from diseases they knew all about. We're in another war now. How are we going to care for the next generation of vets? Our Veterans Hospitals are so underfunded that good care means that at your autopsy it might not say, "death at the hands of another" when in fact, because you had a wish for cremation, it went uninvestigated? I have survived this system for over thirty-six years and believe that it still needs change and the ones that can get the job done are those that were most affected during our last conflict. So do you think with a concerted effort we as combat veterans just might have a chance of revising a few of the injustices? If you do, contact me.

LIMA 3/26th Marines 67-68

You are a brother, as well as I
we fought the same war, share some of the same memories and now we fight a different battle.
what does this mean?
we were for the same reason once in our lives.

the tables have turned,
and we are both different,
fighting a different battle for everyone to see.
if you think it hurts, you don't know how I feel.
we will probably never see this eye-to-eye.
I'm sorry that it had to be this way.

the bell has rung,
the battle had begun,
and now its starting to get weak.

show is over,
judges have decided,
we are waiting for the score.
the same thought crosses our minds
"it better be me, I deserve this" when really no one does...

this fight doesn't matter,
it should be done and forgotten and erased from everyone's minds.
people have been hurt, feelings have been damaged and yet we still beg to differ.

Response To Previous Article "Platoon Commander 101"

by Dan Manley, HM2 G/2/26

I offer my recollections of events as previously described in Joseph Olszewski's article "Platoon Commander 101," which appeared in the Spring 2004 Red Clay.

I joined 3rd Platoon, Golf Company, 2/26 in Jan 68, just prior to the battalion's re-deployment to Khe Sanh. I had previously spent several months with 1st Platoon but in preparation for the move, some of the "short time" corpsmen were rotated out of the field and the rest of us were shuffled around.

Quang Tri, August 1968

On the 16th of Jan 68, we boarded C-130s and were flown to Khe Sanh. We arrived in the afternoon and were trucked a short distance from the runway where we were told to dig in for the night. At that time, I had no idea where we were but, I was informed that this was a hot spot and that I should dig a deep hole. I did. My introduction to the Red Clay.

The next morning, the 17th of January, we packed up and started walking. I was somewhere in the middle of the column and had only a vague idea of where we were going and in what direction. We marched a good part of the day through ever changing terrain. At the beginning of the trek, we crossed rolling hills covered in a sea of elephant grass. Later it became more difficult as we made our way through jungle vegetation and steeper hills. By mid to late afternoon, the word was passed that we had arrived at our destination, as Lt. O described it — our "combat outpost." We were on the top of a hill in the middle of the jungle.

Con Thien, July 1968

Everyone was low on water so a detail was sent out to find a source. I went with them. We made our way down the hill and followed a ravine for a short distance. The ravine suddenly spilled out into a beautiful mountain river. The river, at this point, was maybe 50 yards wide and crystal clear. It was bordered, on our side, by a white sand beach. The far shoreline was rocky and littered with huge boulders. I don't remember much being said, but everyone stripped down and jumped in. I don't remember whether or not we posted outlooks.

In the following days, at least one patrol that we made from our combat outpost involved crossing the river. Our route, I believe, was further downstream from our swimming hole. At this point the river was narrower and the current very fast. The speed of the rushing water made it very difficult to cross without being swept off your feet, to complicate matters we were carrying a full combat load. Someone, I don't remember who, volunteered to carry a rope across and anchor it on the far side. This proved to be a life saver as there was a deep hole in the middle and several guys went under, but managed to hang onto the rope. Eventually, everyone made it across safely. When we left Khe Sanh in April '68, from the helicopter I saw no jungle in this area and there was no sign of the river.

I do not remember how long we remained at the combat outpost, but it was not too long before we went back to Hill 558. When we arrived at Hill 558, the rest of the company and battalion were already there. We set up on the Southwestern portion of the perimeter. HM3 Scarborough and I dug a fox hole on the very peak of the Western hump. We did not consider the consequences of the skyline, yet. We were thinking in terms of being central to the platoon, in case we were needed. Our choice of location was further complicated because we were directly behind a 106 recoilless rifle, which had a commanding view of the valley to the south and west. The gun crew was pretty good about letting us know when they had a fire mission.

During the early days, there were a lot of work details involving stringing wire in front of our perimeter. Lt. O referred to a "cow fence," but I do not remember it that way. I recall that concertina wire was unrolled and stretched across the front of the perimeter. We attached noise makers to the wire and laid out "Tangle Foot." This was crisscrossing strands of wire laid out a few inches above ground. Eventually we had two rows of wire strung with a mine field in the middle. I remember the squad leaders being involved in laying the antipersonnel mines and that they had drawn a map. We were further protected by claymore mines, some of which had been rigged to detonate barrels of gasoline fugas.

I am unaware of the events leading up to Lt. O being in the minefield. I was later told by a squad leader that he had been ordered to correct a discrepancy with the minefield. At the time of the explosion I was at the top of the hill working around my foxhole. By this time I was acclimated to incoming and I knew this was not enemy fire. I grabbed my medical kit in the event I was needed, and made my way toward the explosion. When I arrived on the scene, two of the squad leaders were already there. One I recall was named Mack. I walked over to them to find out what was going on and only then did I realize someone was lying in the minefield. They informed me that it was the "LT" and asked if I was going to help him.

Without thinking, I made my way through the wire and only when I was standing over Lt. O did it dawn on me that now I was in the minefield as well. I had no idea where the mines were or how they were patterned. I could only grit my teeth every time it was necessary to step around the LT. He was in great agony and thrashing around on the ground. I was concerned that he might detonate another mine as he moved around on the ground. By now I was very nervous myself, but intent on doing my job.

Surprisingly, there was very little bleeding probably due to traumatic constriction of the leg muscles. However, I decided to put a loose tourniquet on his leg in case it was needed later. In tending to the wound, it was difficult figuring out what was foot and what was boot so I put pressure dressings over everything. He was in a great deal of pain and yelling for morphine. After some difficulty, I was able to administer three ampoules of morphine. I was so nervous that I had trouble opening the ampoules. Three was the limit, but they did not seem to offer him much relief. I made sure the ampoules were attached to his collar. That way the BAS would know how much he already had. The next step was to get him out of the minefield. For the second time, I came to the realization of the danger we were in. I lifted Lt. O into a fireman's carry and tried to retrace my incoming foot steps. We exited without further incident. A couple of our fellow Marines were standing by with a litter. They helped me get him onto the litter and Lt. O was carried the short distance to the Battalion Aid Station. I had done all I could do so I did not accompany him to the BAS.

Adding Insult to Injury

by Jim Madara

Before the Siege, we lived in tents with sandbag walls and our cots neatly arranged in squad bay fashion. We had no sooner moved in, when the rats came to visit. They chewed on your hair, fingernails, put droppings in your gear, gnawed through packages from home or anything left laying out, and caused all sorts of other mischief and mayhem. Some people would accept them and leave small offerings of C Ration leftovers under their cots to keep them from nibbling on body parts during the night (which, by the way seemed to work!) Other people would get angry and blow a fuse.

"God damn these *&%#ing things," one of my tent mates roared one evening as he stuck his K-Bar into the sandbag wall by his head. "One of these *&%#ing things *&$#s with me tonight and I'm gonna cut it deep, wide and continuous... "He had a wild look in his eye, so I left him alone and silently hoped I didn't have to wake up to a rat butchering.

The next morning I had the early radio watch, so I got dressed in the dark and was using my flashlight to negotiate my way out of the hooch when the beam fell on the K-Bar stuck in the sandbag wall by the head of my sleeping tent mate. Stacked on the blade like a cache of small civil war era cannon balls was a pile of rat droppings! The rat must have had to aim pretty well in the dark and release his load from a ledge about a foot above the blade to place them so neatly.

Tommy,

Greetings! I hope everything is well with you and your family and you're enjoying your retirement. I also hope the reunion plans are progressing well and on schedule. I'd like you to print this page and read it at the reunion membership meeting if time allows. Thanks and have a great reunion.

Fellow Khe Sanh Vets,

I'd like to take this opportunity to wish you all the best and sincerely hope you all have a great reunion. It's a special time to be enjoyed with a very special breed of brothers and survivors who all hold something very dear in common. Relish the moment and the time you can spend together.

Myself, I cannot attend again this year. Last year I was in Federal service, activated with my guard unit in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom and could not attend. This year I find myself in the same situation; our unit was once again alerted on May 10th. We may, indeed, again find ourselves called to duty in the very near future and be obligated to respond. Being the senior NCO in the unit it is my responsibility for that readiness to be maintained and ensure the soldiers are ready, if and when the mobilization order comes.

I know that I am one of the very few from our original ranks who is still actively involved with the military and that, too, would end soon if I were not on a stop-loss program. I have had the distinction of serving in both Southeast and Southwest Asia previously and am prepared to return, if necessary. Time will tell.

I can assure you of two things, however, gentlemen. First, God willing, I will be able to attend another KSV reunion sometime and have the chance to see my original brothers-in-arms again. And secondly, the troops I may have to take with me into harm's way will benefit from the experiences we lived and the lessons we learned so long ago in such a unique place.

Semper Fi and enjoy your time together!

Sincerely,
Bill Maves

Chance Encounter at Khe Sanh

by Craig W. Tourte

I was just another PFC during the ten plus months I was at Khe Sanh. I finally made E3 towards the end of my tour. I have a vivid memory of a special moment I would like to share with my brothers.

I was manning the line on the east side of the base across from HQ.1/13 just a hundred yards or so south of the main gate. It was one of those dark dreary nights when you just stand there looking straight ahead at nothing. Exhausted from lack of sleep, C rats, rain and cold, digging and just plain being there, I turned towards a voice behind me, who said; "How is it going, Marine?" I looked up and saw a squared away Marine holding an M-16. He had a big broad mustache and was accompanied by another Marine with a radio on his back. This Marine was obviously an officer of a type which I had never seen before. He introduced himself as Colonel Lownds. He said he was just seeing how things were going and asked how we were getting along. I swallowed hard and said, "Fine." He smiled, turned away, and continued walking down the trench line. Of course, I knew the name of the commanding officer, but not in my wildest dreams did I ever expect to see him out in the trench line without some type of detachment and virtually alone except for the radio man. I never expected a colonel to express concern for a lowly PFC. It was as if God himself had spoken to me.

That simple act lifted my spirits and for some reason I felt a lot more secure knowing that the commanding officer was in this with us and was exposing himself to the same dangers the rest of us faced. I never saw Colonel David Lownds after that, but I would like to thank him and let him know how that moment touched the life of this lowly PFC.

The actions at Khe Sanh left deep scars on all who served there. I am proud of all who served — and of Colonel Lownds who shared the danger and the pain, and made one lowly PFC feel as if his life was worth something. I hope there are times when you feel the pride I do, in belonging to this brotherhood of Khe Sanh Veterans.

Origin of the Message

"For those that will fight for it... FREEDOM...has a flavor the protected shall never know."

– originating in Vietnam, 1968

by L/Cpl. Edwin L. "Tim" Craft, B Co 3rd AT's (ONTOS)

I graduated from high school in 1966, and all of my course studies had been academic. My main interests besides girls, were marching band and debate. Having won the Kansas State Oratorical championship in 1964 with a speech topic "Optimism Formula for Freedom," my intentions were to become a lawyer. I was aware of the Vietnam war, especially when it began to heat up in 1965. Little did I know that before the next year was over that I would take a journey straight into the pit! of hell, and see the heaviest fighting our country has ever experienced.

After high school, I enrolled in junior college. I paid my own way by working part time for the H. D. Lee Company. When I quit college to join the Marines, my professors tried to get me to reconsider. My grades were well above average, and I probably would never have been drafted. I joined because the guys were fighting and dying, and I did not want them to do anything I would not do.

After joining, I was in the States nine months, then I was sent to Vietnam. We made a stop on Wake Island. It looked like a grain of sand in the middle of the ocean when our commercial flight United 707 Jet pitched downward to land. All of the Marines who fought there became POWs of the Japanese. I later met one of them, and got to know him well. I spoke at his funeral. His name was Bob Eaton.

Next was Okinawa, then Da Nang, Dong Ha, and finally, Con Thien. My first day in the field I met a Marine who would be my Commanding Officer...a fine man. Thirty minutes later, Lt. Dallas Thompson would move in front of me and die from an explosion. He fell right across my lap and died looking into my eyes. We were taking so much incoming, that our Platoon Sgt. ordered us off the hill. When I found a hole to jump in, the Marine in it mistook me for a corpsman and called me "Doc". He said, "'Doc', that is some of the fanciest footwork I have ever seen. They were following you all the way down." I told him, "I'm not a corpsman, I'm a Marine, and I just got here. I was scared and following orders. I don't know enough to plan anything. He just looked at me for a long while and said, "That was still some run, Doc!" Con Thien means "Place of Angels." We were under siege there for several months and were cut off from food and water for much of it.

Leatherneck Magazine called the Siege for Con Thien "Time in the Barrel." We received a minimum of 200 incoming rounds a day, and it was a small place. It felt like they hit every square inch. One thing I quickly learned was how to tell the difference in the sounds of incoming. That knowledge was literally a matter of life and death. Mortars made a high arch, and the initial blast in the distance was a muffled report. Artillery rounds had a bassier sound. It gave you slightly more time to find cover, but if it was on you, then you were in deep trouble. The most terrifying one was the rocket, and it screamed as it came in. You could not tell where it might come down, and it came fast. They also had recoilless rifles that fired large shells. They went off almost at the same time you heard them fired at you.They had a flat trajectory.

After months of carnage, we had a cease-fire on Christmas Eve of 1967. On that day I heard a broadcast on Armed Forces radio and learned the protesters were marching on our Capitol protesting against us. I could not believe what I was hearing. Here we were fighting for freedom and these low lifes back home were fighting against us. I was dazed. I just could not understand it. I was hurt, angered, and disgusted. (This motivated me to write a message on a C-Ration case.)

After that night we got the word that we were going to an area called Khe Sanh. We were under siege for 77 days. It was during this time that I spotted a reporter and asked him if he would mind getting a message back to the world for me. He asked, "What is it?" I told him and he looked shocked and asked if I would mind writing that down. I said, "Sure" and wrote it on a C-Ration case. That message is: "For those that will fight for it...FREEDOM...has a flavor the protected shall never know.

Publishers Note: Tim stated that when he attended a reunion in St Louis, the Marine who had originally found the C-Ration box with that message, questioned him in regards to how some particular parts of the message were written. When he responded, the Marine told him that only the original author would have known the facts he related in his answer. Tim claims this verifies that he was the original author.

My Renewed Faith in the Younger Generation

by Ken and Sharon Pipes

Tom:

I am attaching this e-mail to a letter to the editor of the local Fallbrook paper regarding a fine young businessman that recently did some painting for us. The letter was submitted at the beginning of April and is expanded upon here. I think you will understand why, when you read the story behind the story.

While Mr. Testerman was correcting my more serious painting errors in the family room, I was talking long distance to a family member of a Marine that was killed in action on 25 February 1968. This was a call that I had wanted and needed to make for over 35 years. I just could never get it done. I did not realize that young Mr. Isaac Testerman, the owner of his own business painting company was paying attention to my phone call.

What I did not put in my letter to the editor was the fact that Mr. Testerman gave me a 10% discount off his original estimate because I was a Veteran, and had fought for our country in Vietnam. That saved Sharon and me at least $300.00.

Later that same afternoon we conducted a walk through to make sure that he and his young crew had done a satisfactory job. I broke out the checkbook to pay Ike for services rendered (which was outstanding!) Rather than the amount we had previously agreed upon in the contract, he gave me an additional $100.00 discount with the understanding that that money would be sent to the Khe Sanh Veterans. I agreed, only with the understanding that the money would be donated in his name in memory of Lieutenant Don Jacques, and all of the members of his platoon that were killed in action on 25 February 1968. Enclosed with my original letter and with this e-mail, is the check for one hundred dollars in the memory of the Brave and Heroic Marines who tragically lost their lives on that never to be forgotten day.

What I did not say in my letter to the editor was that Ike and his workers were all under 25 years old, were motivated, hard working and respectful. It was very clear that he held all veterans of our country in the highest regard and with deep respect.

Sharon and I just want you and the members of our organization to know of the actions and conduct of Ike and his crew. They restored my faith and confidence in our younger generation. Perhaps, just perhaps, our fine old country may be in much better hands that I thought.

Tom, please use this letter, the information and the check as you see fit. I do request that in some way, Mr. Isaac Testerman be mentioned in the most positive way possible, and perhaps be given a certificate of some kind. He and others like him, in the military or not, hold our future in their hands. If we have a bunch of young folks like him in the wings — and I now believe we do — our country will be ok.

Publishers Remarks: Ken, my thanks to you and Sharon for your most enlightening letter. I have sent young Mr. Testerman and his young crew a certificate of appreciation from the Khe Sanh Veterans, for the support and kindness displayed to you and your family and the KSV through his generous donation.

A Trip Worth Remembering

Fulfilling the Khe Sanh Veterans Legacy

by Tom Eichler

Our founder, Reverend Ray W. Stubbe, recently placed me in contact with members of a family who lost a loved one at Khe Sanh. The family was seeking closure after 36 years. Since this is one of the reasons Reverend Stubbe founded the Khe Sanh Veterans, I immediately attempted to contact family members.

I had first spoke to Mr. Randy Eggenberger, CEO of Wild Wings. Mr. Eggenberger's company distributes the art and works of Terry Redlin, a world renowned artist, recently voted America's most popular artist and the most widely collected painter of Nature and Americana. Terry Redlin's wife, (Helene née Langenfeld) had lost her brother in Vietnam — Charles T. Langenfeld who was killed in action at Khe Sanh while assigned to Echo Company 2/26 as a corpsman.

Tom Eichler and Randy Eggenberger, CEO of Wild Wings

HM3 Langenfeld distinguished himself during the battle on 05 Feb. 1968, when NVA forces attacked Hill 861A at the start of the Tet Offensive. He was later killed on 17 April 1968 while seeking a fresh water supply for the men of E Co 2/26.

I was put in touch with Julie Ranum, executive director, of the Redlin Art Center, located in Watertown, South Dakota, the hometown of Charles T. Langenfeld. Terry A. Redlin built the center and gifted it to the citizens of Watertown, SD. The Art Center was designed by Terry's son, Charles Redlin, who was named after Charles T. Langenfeld.

Terry Redlin was unveiling his latest works "An American Portrait" at a signing on 7-8 August 2004, at the Redlin Art Center. The Redlin Group planned to honor all America's servicemen at a prayer service on the 8th of August 2004. The final painting in his "An American Portrait" series, titled "His Last Goodbye" [see this issue's front cover), is a scene of a neighborhood, aglow with lights, as families prepare for the upcoming holiday season. The snow glistens in the moonlight and the stars twinkle in the clear night sky. In the painting, Dad has just finished hanging the homecoming banner, having been busy all day getting ready for his son's return. The cars are washed and the garage straightened. Mom has the tree decorated and lit. From the house wafts the aroma of freshly baked chocolate chip cookies, their son's favorite. From the window, she sees a car slowly pull up to the front walk. As she opens the door, expecting to embrace her son, she is horrified to see a representative from the Navy along with a Chaplain, walking up the snowy steps. Her heart sinks as she realizes it is not her son arriving as they had been expecting, but the devastating news that he has been killed in war. As her body begins to crumble from the inside out, she finds herself unable to speak, unable to even breathe. An old buddy drops the teddy, knowing his friend is never coming home again. "His Last Good-Bye" immerses us in the pain of an American family's ultimate loss.

The final painting was inspired by one of Terry Redlin's personal experiences. It captures on canvas the memory of his brother-in-law and dear friend, Charles Langenfeld. Terry and Charles loved to hunt and fish. They also enjoyed chess and other board games and would spend hours together. Even though Charles was ten years younger than Terry, the two shared many interests and had great respect for one another. It was a true friendship and a brotherly bond.

Charles, a Navy hospital corpsman, was killed in the Siege of Khe Sanh, while serving with Echo Company, Second Battalion, Twenty Sixth Marines, on Hill 861A. He had only 8 hours to go before he would have been rotated to the rear and out of harms way. Like many Americans, Terry, his wife Helene, and her family, live forever with the pain of their ultimate loss.

NOTE: Terry Redlin has most generously donated all the proceeds from the sale of this painting, to the Khe Sanh Veterans.

Charles Redlin has spent many years of his life, seeking information on the last days of his beloved uncle. Since I had served and fought alongside HM3 Langenfeld on Hill 861A, and seeking to uphold our founder's wishes, I decided to travel to Watertown to participate in the scheduled event, and present the Redlin and Langenfeld family a posthumous "DOC" Award. I contacted Earle Breeding, the former commanding officer of Echo Company, who also agreed to be a part of the ceremony. We were both included as guest speakers at the ceremony to honor all serviceman. It was our sincere hope that we might bring final closure to the Langenfeld and Redlin families.

Both Earle and I were overwhelmed by the kindness and loving care shown us by the Redlin and Langenfeld families and by the citizens of Watertown. From the Mayor to the owner of the hotel who provided our accommodations, we could not have felt more welcome. They repeatedly thanked us for traveling to their town to honor one of their native sons, who gave his life while taking care of others.

We were honored at dinner by the Redlins and Langenfelds, where we met other members of their immediate family. After looking at pictures and articles, both Earle and I related stories concerning Charles Langenfeld's service and his last days at Khe Sanh. I hope we were able to finally bring the closure the family had sought for so many years. I know Earle and I really felt good being able to do what our organization was created to do. We especially wanted the family to know what a close relationship the Marines had with our beloved Corpsman.

Tom Eichler and Earle Breeding at ceremony.

Julie Ranum did an outstanding job at the Art Center with the service honoring all servicemen. The American flag was delivered to three recently returned veterans from the war in Iraq, by a group of volunteer veteran skydivers. Earl and I presented "DOC" Medals to Helene and Charles Redlin.

We told them we were privileged to share in Charles T. Langenfeld's short life.

Terry Redlin during a private conversation told a personal story about why he also felt Marines and Corpsman had close relationships. When he and Charles were growing up, they were altar boys in the Catholic church. When one of them was serving, the other would always attempt to catch the eye of the other, while sitting in different locations in the church. When they made eye contact, they would do a hand-muffled laugh.

During the military funeral of Charles T. Langenfeld, one of the Marine Honor Guards firing a salute, suddenly did the same hand-muffled laugh both he and Charles had done so many times. Knowing how professional and caring Marines are during such devout ceremonies, he asked the Marine why he laughed in that manner. The Marine, although totally embarrassed by his actions, related that it just came over him and he could not control his actions. Terry believed Charles had spoken to him through one of the Marines he so dearly loved and cared for.

I hope Terry will understand why I chose to relate this incident, since it reflects our close relationship with our corpsman, the legacy of Ray Stubbe, and the depth of our bonds.

My Introduction to a Place Called Khe Sanh

by Charlie Fox, C Co 1/26

I was a L/Cpl. with about 14 months in the Corps. I had been in 106s with 3/6 at Lejeune and Gitmo. I was shocked when I was transferred to Khe Sanh. I was assigned to 2nd squad, 3rd Plt, Charlie Company, 26th Marines, as a grunt. My days of riding were over. I was now one of those guys I used to laugh at as we rode by. Third platoon was commanded by Lt. Jim Epps, who later went to weapons platoon, and was replaced by Lt. Skip Wells.

Khe Sanh was in the middle of the monsoon season and we were living in tents at the Ponderosa. One day we were helilifted to Hill 881, and walked back to the KSCB. The platoon was made up of short timers and FNG, about 50-50. It was the first time I faced making contact.

We packed up one day and headed to the runway to catch a chopper to Hill 950. We attempted to land for three straight days, but it was too foggy. We could not see the top half of the hill. We laid around the airstrip most of the day and would later return to our tents. On 9 December, we again board CH-34s. I was loaded down like a pack mule. I was humpin' everything I own, including plenty of reading material. We got 8 or 9 guys on this thing and the nightmare began. The engine revved up, the whole thing shook and shuddered, one wheel got off the ground, and then the thing just settled back on the runway.

The door gunner is yelling we're too heavy so two guys jump off. Here we go again, revving, shuttering, shaking, one wheel up, then the other, then, we're back on the runway. Two more guys jump out and we try again. I'm sure I'm going to die in this thing, but we're finally in the air using a modified taxi method — I'm way in the back. We touch down on a finger one third of the way up 950. As I go to step out, the chopper shoots straight up in the air and I fall back in. Back to the runway, more Marines load up and away we go again, round two of trying to get airborne. I'm scared and haven't even been shot at. We finally make it and as we start into the LZ, I wind up in the back again.

A beam of light hits me in the eye, I look and see a round hole and can only think, Damn, now the rivets are popping out. As we go in, I hear firing. The door gunner is firing and as I go to jump out, the chopper again shoots straight up in the air, only this time the gunner kicks me in the ass and I freefall with about 75 to 80 pounds of equipment on. I land on my feet in 7 feet of elephant grass and a foot of mud. I go to my knees and immediately split the crotch of my pants, from knee to knee.

I wanted to shoot at the helicopter. We got through the grass and into the trees only to find out that the fun had just begun. Hill 950 is steep. We pulled ourselves up the hill going from tree to tree, sliding in the mud then climbing some more. Two steps up and three steps back. The climb seemed to take forever. Exhaustion and leg cramps had set in by the time we got to the top. Somewhere in this climb, we hit a slightly flat area and are walking easy when someone empties an M-16. My heart stops, I'm looking for cover and something to shoot at but find neither. I probably had that deer in the headlights look. The word comes back that he thought he saw a sniper in a tree, but it was only a monkey. My first real trip out and I learned what essential gear was and what nonessential gear was. Things will change the next time.

Our position was on the very top of the hill. It consisted of bunkers going off a main trench line that went completely around the hilltop. There were several rows of concertina wire trip flares, and claymores. My bunker was on the far side of the hill facing away from Khe Sanh. In the middle was an LZ that was so small that CH-46s and 53s couldn't land. On the Khe Sanh side was a "coal chute" that was used to get rid of garbage. The word is that this place was overrun a year ago, when there were a lot fewer people.

Most days, when you looked out of 950, all you saw were clouds below, no combat base, no elephant grass — not even the bottom of 950. When the sun was out during the day it was pretty nice. At night, it got downright cold. They issued a block of C4 explosives to each bunker. Each guy got to burn some in the bunker to try to warm it up after coming in off watch so you could get a little sleep. Added to the cold and rain was the fact that we had tropical weight jungle fatigues and no field jackets. During one listening post at the edge of the wire, three of us huddled together trying to share body heat in the rain. It didn't matter that we weren't watching because you couldn't see five feet in the fog.

Lieutenant Wells shows up on the LZ one day with a Mohawk haircut, jungle fatigues cut-off at the shoulders and knees, and a football. A football game breaks out. Sometime during this game, a Huey circles the hill. We're all looking, when a radio operator comes out of the CP and tells Wells that a new general is in the chopper. Lt. Wells comes to attention and salutes in the direction of the chopper. It left without landing. Guess we made a great impression.

One day we got a great surprise. Fresh eggs are choppered in, and I get even luckier. My bunker partner didn't eat eggs. I got a can of ham slices, and eventually, after much stirring, made ham and eggs made in a peach can using many heat tabs.

21 December, 1967, Lt. Wells took a squad plus patrol out to hill 1015, which was a rifle shot across from us. Hill 1015 was the only place that Hill 950 had to look up to, and we did it all day, everyday. We're told those "other" people lived over there. We get to the top of Hill 1015 and after walking a little ways, stopped, and everyone got down. Word came back that there were NVA boot tracks in the mud. I was staring hard into the brush and saw little fireplaces built out of stone. We checked them out and were told the NVA cooked on them. I've seen enough, this can't be good. We walked back without any other signs of the NVA, but us new guys knew for sure now that we weren't in Kansas. Toto wasn't anywhere.

24 December, 1967, I'm not a new guy any more, I guess. I'm supposed to be in charge of a three man listening post tonight. As I'm walking to the CP to get a radio, a guy calls me over to the garbage chute and says, "Listen," I hear someone stumbling around in the cans lying at the bottom of the chute. I go to the CP and inform Lt. Wells, and his reply was "I'll fix that." He grabs a CS grenade from a bag as he goes out the doorway of the CP.

We all laughed as the grenade went down the chute. The listening post was cancelled and we went on 50% alert. I had no sooner stepped into my little cutout in the trench when a grenade goes off behind the machinegun bunker, just to my left. I must have ducked real fast, pushing my backside out in the trench, because my gasmask on my left hip took a little hit. Things started getting a little crazy for a minute or two. We had four wounded and were now at 100% alert.

Lt. Wells called for artillery fire around the hill. He put the three M-79 men in the middle of the LZ and had them shooting. The artillery came in and did a job. Thank you, John Kaheny. That was nice shooting. Things got very quiet. Lt. Wells stood in the middle of the LZ that night, and from time to time would yell for one squad or another to throw grenades over the side. This went well until some clown down to my right, threw a white phosphorus grenade. It hit the wire, bounced back and went off on our side of the wire resulting in another guy getting wounded. The rest of the night was quiet. Merry Christmas.

It was about 1100 hours when the chopper came in with Christmas dinner. Turkey, dressing, mashed potatoes, corn, and all the other trimmings, including ice cream. The only problem was that the only thing we had to put all this food in was old mess kits. It was quite a mixture. Mashed potatoes and ice cream mixed with gravy with a peach on top. But, it sure beat C rations. At noon the choppers came back and we flew back to Khe Sanh and tents again. So much for my big adventure. We end up with five WIA's and never saw anyone. 950 was certainly an eye opener. During the siege, Charlie Company was assigned to the Blue Sector, and I got to look at 950 every day. Thank God our stay up there was short.

My Service in Vietnam At Khe Sanh, Chu Lai and Danang

The Personal Account of a Navy Seabee

by Hugh J. McCauley, AIA USN

I joined the United States Navy Fleet Reserve in the early 1960's, serving on a destroyer. I did not like it and transferred to the Seabees to be trained as a construction steelworker. At that time I never heard of Vietnam. In 1965 I received Seabee training at the (CBC) school in Davisville, RI. Upon graduation they sent me to the biggest (CBC) School in Port Hueneme, CA. The war in Vietnam was creeping up on us an we had to receive combat and weapons training, since we were scheduled to be shipped out to Camp Shields, located in Chu Lai, South Vietnam.

At the time we all thought it was a lot better then being sent to Korea.

My battalion was there building support bases off the coast of the South China Sea, located south of the Song-the-Bon River, just north of Batangan. We constructed a lot of Marine support facilities for Marine Air Groups, MAG-12 and 36, and other Marine units. We also did construction for ROK (Korean) troops inland, up in the hills, and other deep field bases. We even serviced some Australian units. Those chaps loved to just sit in the shade and scream out "You Bloody Yanks are Crazy," when we worked in the noonday sun, with the temperature well over 100 degrees. The Australian troops were allowed to wear thin khaki standard issue shorts and did not have to work during the hours when the temperature was at its highest point. Our regulations would not allow us to do the same, and we were extremely jealous. Their parent units had served in North Africa, Burma, India and Malaysia during WWII, and knew how to deal with hot climates, we did not. And we didn't drink tea much either.

We had very little modern equipment, and most of it was outdated. The majority of our work was done by hand. We constructed runways, LZs, POL farms, pipelines, and communications poles, power stations with transmission wires, roads and culverts. We built our own rock quarry, concrete batch plant, piers, and landing ramps. You name it, we built it. Civilian contractors hired under Government contracts to perform the same functions had state-of-the-art equipment, and used civilian workers from all over the world.

In 1966, the tour of Construction Battalion 4 was extended by more than a month because our replacement battalion was being trained at the CBC in Gulfport, Mississippi, and their training was not yet complete. The Navy was involved in a lot of recruiting of new Petty Officers from various construction trades, and re-enlisting former servicemen. Finally their advanced party arrived at Camp Shields. We all felt that relief was on the way. Seabee units rotate as a complete unit, not as individuals. Their construction projects are also assigned to a whole unit. Due to this unit rotation system, a Seabee could do several tours in Vietnam. Some of our guys did three tours in RVN.

Hugh McCauley, MCB-4

In 1967, the Vietnam war became a tougher, protracted struggle, compared to our first deployment in 1966. The enlarging war made it more dangerous and the work became harder. When I joined MCB 4, the Battalion strength consisted of approximately 450 men. With the increased workload the battalion strength more than doubled to over 1,000 men. The closeness which I had experienced with the smaller unit, was non-existent with the larger unit.

While stationed at Danang, we were often deployed as 12- to 20-man teams (detachments), to other parts of the country. My right foot got busted on a job near Danang and I was put on light duty since I couldn't wear a boot. One of my jobs was to act as courier delivering mail, money, tools, cases of food and beer and anything I could get on a chopper, or larger craft, to deliver to our teams. That's how I got to Khe Sanh the first time. I was scheduled to deliver small equipment and leave the next day. The runway needed constant work and lots of earthmoving. The Seabee team there had only small equipment and really needed larger equipment to keep the runway open. I was asked to get a D-8H bulldozer and lots of tools to the CB units at Khe Sanh. The air strip there was narrow, short and actually sloped about 60 feet from the low end at the east to the high end at the west. I loaded the new dozer and other needed equipment into a C-130. This trip concerned me because I had heard that the Khe Sanh runway may not be able to take such a heavy plane loaded with a payload of dead iron equipment. I had heard that no fully loaded C-130 had yet landed at Khe Sanh. But, it was a priority mission and they needed the heavy equipment to keep the runway functioning.

By this time, I had been in and out of the base before on a C-123, and was familiar with the best and safest way to approach and land there. Not that I was a pilot, but it's a gift to understand the physics of it all. I sat on the floor between the pilot and co-pilot and attempted to convey my experience of previous landing. They paid little attention to my advice and began circling the runway, alerting every NVA gunner located in the surrounding hills. They were flying quite fast and overshot the end of the runway. After wasting about 600 feet they got the belly wheels on the AM-2 matting.

Moving at such a high speed and running out of airstrip they threw on the brakes and feathered the props to reverse pitch, which resulted in a very torn up runway. Pieces of the deck matting were hitting the bottom and rear of the plane's hull. My heart in my mouth and looking at the end of the runway coming at us quickly, I had to get to the exit on the lower deck's left side as the plane began to slide sideways uphill. The crash trucks were on hand to chase us from mid-runway to where the plane had to start to turn to avoid climbing the hill in front of us. They turned the craft to the right at the last possible second, but I thought that the left wing and props were toast and trash, given the mound in front of the plane. It was a crazy landing for sure.

I found my way out of the exit while the plane was still moving and tumbled to the ground, got up and ran away from the plane with my a bum foot, leaving everything behind. My panic, however, was short lived because the crash crews took care of everything. The plane made the big turn off the hill and came to rest at the extreme west end. The Seabees and Marines quickly off-loaded the important cargo. I was still shaking from the experience. I left my garrison belt and pistol on the plane. It took some time to get the runway ready for that big silver C-130 to take off again. The new bulldozer was immediately put to work repairing the damage the plane had made to the runway.

My foot was getting better and many of my friends from Detail Bravo and Delta were there, and I got to stay at Khe Sanh for several months. Our Chief, Jim Reevis, was happy to have another hand, even a slightly damaged one. As far as I know, we were the second Seabee team at Khe Sanh; the first team from our MOB was there earlier in 1967 to build the big bunkers for the light-recon pilots who flew right down the throats of the NVA gathering around the Khe Sanh combat base. The enemy was assumed to be getting ready for a repeat of Dien Bien Phu. The NVA were notoriously implacable.

Those USAF spotter planes had cameras and smoke rockets to give real information to USMC intelligence and artillery officers, as well as B-52 groups. The Seabees worked in 10-12 man teams, 12 hour days, 24 hours a day, to keep the runway open. We even supported the Marines on perimeter watches in trenches and bunkers to the north of the runway, when we should have been sleeping. Looking off into the valley of death, we dug trenches and filled sandbags, stood watch and fended off enemy probes or endured their H&I fire. We gave back as good as we got, and with the help of the US Army Dusters. Mounted with double 40mm guns, the tank-like Duster was a great machine, and they had night vision instruments. The first time they parked next to me on the trench line, I had no idea of their capability until they opened up with 100% WP fire, as NVA were creeping up the slope in front of me. I couldn't see them, but the Duster did.

Not to offend anyone, but the hills north of Khe Sanh combat base (950 and 1015 etc.), a series of ridges all assembled in view, we nicknamed Cleopatra's Tit. It was suggestive to the first Marines there. A gigantic natural sculpture of a woman reclined in posture about 4 miles long. Seeing it in profile from the south or looking at it from the air, reminded me of a reclining woman's form. I'm not dreaming this up. Anyone out there among the early teams remember this? This geographical formation was a natural fortress for the NVA.

When things were light and regular, we helped to transport camp workers to and from our base to the western town of the same name. It was a village laid out on both sides of the road with houses, shops, a Catholic school, Buddhist Temple, etc, perhaps 4,000 folks. Most of the trade supporting the town was based on local plantation work with coffee, sugar, tobacco, bananas and handicrafts of many kinds. The town was full of ordinary lowlander Vietnamese. Very few of us spoke Vietnamese but a few of the educated civilian women workers spoke French and our guys from Louisiana could come up with a Cajun phrase. It was always a cause to celebrate. French culture and language was always a good thing for us so far from home.

We saw Bru, called Montagnards by the French. In their ancient Thai-based language, Bru meant that they were real people, as opposed to anyone else whom they called Moy (savages). This included the downland Vietnamese or anyone unrelated to their tribes. The Bru were slash and burn hunter-gatherers, and aboriginal highlanders, who typically moved from place-to-place through the mountains, season-by season. They knew no national borders, and wandered where their old traditions took them like nomads. They marked their settlement lands however, so that the circuit could continue from generation-to-generation.

Lang Vei Special Forces Camp

The Bru had a village called Lang Vei with stilt houses, long family dwellings all made of tree trunks and branches with grass roofs. These aboriginal mountain folks were proud survivors in a natural setting. Anything they could find on four legs was food as they killed elephants, deer, wildcats, monkeys, and big rats. They hunted with crossbows and javelins, as well as special throwing knives. Many of the tribal women were also employed on the coffee plantation operated by a local French family who had been there for a long time. They brought farm tractors to our runway to send out produce from Khe Sanh, where small planes (Pilatus Porters) were used as cargo shuttles.

At Lang Vei Special Forces camp, overlooking the Laotian boarder in the crotch of the Ho Chi Trail (called the Parrot's Beak); I met the camp captain, a graduate of Temple University. He was a Green Beret, ever so grateful to us Seabees who helped support his position. Because of tough topography, a crescent-shaped runway was the only way to layout a strip for light spotters and Caribou cargo planes to get in and out.

The force on that base included Bru tribesmen who loved the US forces and loved to fight the NVA. RVN-CIDG was there in numbers too. Some of our Seabees remained there and worked with them until the place was eventually overrun by NVA. I remember that night, and the noise from that base when we were even in the underground Seabee bunker at Khe Sanh, 5 few miles away. They said later that the captain was sabotaged in his bunker by his own mess chef, a Viet-CIDG-traitor. The film with John Wayne was based on the events of that occasion, or maybe others like it.

We Seabees also built revetments for the small aircraft and kept up with runway maintenance. When the big push started in late June of 1967, we saw lots of large choppers (Navy gray and a kind we never saw before) come in on our runway with many hundreds of Marines. We guessed that the big choppers could have come from a carrier off the coast. The Marines looked fresh and young and marched off to the northwest of the runway and then down to the valley slopes to meet their fate, as their target was what we called Cleopatra. Thing is that they had new model rifles unlike our M-l4s. Indeed, these new guns looked like the plastic toys we had seen back in the States. That part of the story has been a returning refrain from many in early Khe Sanh combat. These new rifles were short of the mark in every way compared to the 30 cal. M-l or 7.62 mm. M-14. The truth is we lost too many men because the new toy-like rifle was just not suited for real combat situations.

I was then a wide-eyed young man of 24 or 25 with a lot to live for, as I watched the Marines that day. They were delivered to the site on whirling blades, assigned the mission and they carried it out with such dispatch and bravery. I couldn't imagine. Some said 500 worthy men were lost that day as if in the twinkling of an eye. At this action, there was a gal from France, a reporter-photographer. She was about my age or younger, very attractive, and blonde. L'Express had allowed her, along with permits from the Saigon Army Generals, to cover this activity in I Corps. She was beautiful, gorgeous, bright and yet our sister. The Marines gave her to us so that we would do the right thing, by giving her our best bunker, guard the latrine for her, and before the battle would begin the next day, we had the honor of a dinner with her in our Playboy bunker. I shared the chore of chef, using C rations mixed with hot Korean beer as sauce. We also had a refrigerator run by a small generator that could keep a case of steaks and beer cold. Just finishing one more day and avoiding being hit, was often cause enough to empty the fridge.

We heard later that this French girl had been hit while covering the battle. We only knew her a few hours and were downcast upon hearing the news. Shortly after this, there were paybacks by the NVA with rockets. We lost some of our Seabee team. The enemy had targeted our part of the compound because we had done so much to help the Marines do their jobs. Smaller mortar rounds were nothing compared to the rockets. We rushed for cover to our small, and not-too-well-made, covered but muddy bunker. My back was to the opening, when a mortar round impacted nearby. The stings I felt were probably dirt and debris kicked up by the explosion. I'd been in other mortar attacks and just got pelted with dirt and stones, so I paid no attention. We left that position after a lull and headed for our big bunker.

We didn't have to talk about what we were doing — it was instinct. We all thought that if the NVA were going to follow up with an assault on the base, they would have to come right through our position. When we got there, our big bunker had become a hospital and morgue. A chaplain and a senior corpsman had done their best with our Marines and our dying and dead men and also attended to the wounded. The corpsman noticed blood on my back and patched me up. He wanted to tag me as wounded. I quickly refused and wouldn't have it. Hell, it was a mere scratch, I thought. No, with all these others really hurt and dead, I didn't want attention. Choppers came in and out above our bunker for a while. It got really quiet that night in the Seabee bunker. Strangers drifted in and squatted in corners with their rifles. No one spoke.

The next morning a message came from my chief (perhaps because I was not behaving too well) that my request for R&R filed many months before was approved. I had to get out of Khe Sanh on my own. Nothing came in except food and ammunition and nothing went out except dignitaries, the wounded and dead. This is the worst part of my story.

My own stuff having been blown away while my hooch-mates and I were underground. I wandered around the next day in the salvaged clothes of a big guy in our detachment who had been killed. I went out to the runway to see two C-123s with rear ramps open to receive full loads of the bodies of the men who had gone down the hill and had to be retrieved as KIA. I was ashamed to ask anyone there. They were stern, quiet, respectful and formal in their duty of loading these corpses on the planes. Given the temperature and the sun, the Marines in those bags were swelling and reeking. There is no way one cannot remember that odor.

I approached one of the attendants, a lance corporal, who totally ignored me. He was focused on the job. He was committed. He never looked at or answered. He was in a trance. I went to the next plane's flight deck and asked the crew if I could travel with them. They shrugged and said, "OK, if you want to go to Dong Ha." I knew that Dong Ha was a large base and that I would be able get back to Da Nang from there by chopper or other transport. On that flight out of Khe Sanh, I was sitting up against the forward cabin wall, looking aver a field of dead Marines, laid out on the cargo deck. Some were so distorted by rigor-mortis that the bags couldn't be totally closed. My thoughts of how they had been killed became torturous as the C-123 cruised eastward. I just couldn't take being the only live passenger on that plane. It broke me up. The intolerable became quickly impossible. I had to move away from that deck of death. I went up to the flight deck and found a comer where I could coil up and just cry as the flight took us (dead and alive) to Dong Ha. There I wanted to find another craft to take me back to Da Nang. The plane was cleared of the dead, pressure washed by an efficient team of experts, then loaded with a troop of entertainers all painted up and dressed in sequins and colorful feathers, musical instruments and sound system equipment. They were joyful and talking rubbish.

What had I just seen, and what was all this? It boggled my mind. A few minutes before this cargo deck was full of the honored dead, now disgraced by living, joking women and musicians on their way to another entertainment gig. I was in no way entertained or amused by them, and they must have noticed my sober lockjaw reserve. They then became quiet until we landed at Da Nang.

I got back to Camp Hoover by hitching rides from the airdrome and entered the gates without a hat or helmet, and filthy. I was written up by the guards for being out of uniform. They wrote the name on my jumper, but it wasn't my name. Chuck Hubbard had died, literally split apart by a large rocket fragment; they didn't know that, and I wouldn't talk. I even had his rifle, all rusty and dusty. I was a mess with a small shrapnel wound on my back. I just wanted to get to my own hooch and rest for the next day. I wanted to get myself together and get out of Viet Nam to my first ever and last R&R, to Malaysia. I became an insomniac and couldn't sleep or eat for many days. It was a joyless departure out of country.

Even on the Malaysian peninsula there was an emergency. Police and soldiers with weapons ready were in the banks, at checkpoints on the roads into and out of towns. Muslim terrorists had boarded a bus near my hotel in downtown Kuala Lumpur, in the most cosmopolitan Asian city I had visited, and they killed the passengers. Sound familiar?

Returning to RVN was like revisiting Hell. From here, because it still breaks my heart, I can't go on because it's just too much for me.

They've recently dedicated an old bridge for the US Seabees. It connects Brattleboro, VT to Chesterfield, NH. The first US bridge or structure to be dedicated to the memory of those who can Build and Fight (Construius Batuimus).

A Patrol Gone Bad

by Tom Ford, D Co. 1/26

This story is about a fictionalized Delta Company patrol off Hill 55 during the fall harvest of 1966. I wrote this a couple years after returning to the "world."

"Yeah, Vietnam will do that to you. Seriously, Dave, if you had any value other than as grunt, you wouldn't be here. If you had any smarts, you wouldn't have joined in the first place. When you consider all the possible military occupations that you might have got into and the fact you ended up as a grunt, it's clear that you're worthless."

Dave had unsnapped his flak jacket, but that wasn't providing much relief from the heat. The slight breeze sweeping across the field could hardly be felt. Taking off his flack jacket would have given some ventilation around his body, but he'd learned not to do that. During his 11 months in Vietnam, he'd seen too many guys messed up by mines and booby-traps.

The heat was exhausting and it was impossible to get comfortable. Dave looked at his watch. It was only 1:30 and he knew that it would be early evening before it started to cool off. The only way to ignore the heat was to pretend you were somewhere else. Dave thought about the "world" as he ate. The world is the United States and home. He thought about the fall session in Michigan, football games, changing colors, and 60-degree temperatures. It felt good to relive, in his mind, the enjoyable things he used to do. All of it seemed like such a long time ago, a distant dream. That was another thing that Vietnam did. It screwed up your time perspective.

Tom Ford, D Co. 1/26

Dave could only stay distracted for awhile. Reality was Vietnam and there was no way to make it go away. The two Marines ate quietly, occasionally looking around to check for anything unusual. Across the field, a group of villagers worked steadily, harvesting rice. They seemed unaware of the Marines. Dave had to shield his eyes from the sun's glare to see them clearly. When the fighting wasn't around, Vietnam had a storybook quality. The villagers were cutting and bundling rice same the way their ancestors had for centuries.

The cluster of hamlets surrounding the field was part of the village of Cam Bo. The field was about a mile and a half in length and a quarter-mile wide. The platoon had come by four days before, but hadn't discovered anything unusual.

Dave was eating a C-ration cracker and daydreaming about his girlfriend Judy when his happy thoughts were interrupted by the radio.

"Delta Two Bravo. Delta Two Bravo. This is Delta Two Actual. Over."

He unclipped the radiophone from his flak jacket. "Delta Two Actual, this is Delta Two Bravo. Over," he responded.

"Delta Two Bravo, put your Actual on. Over."

"Wait one." He turned and tossed the phone to the Squad leader. "Hey, Smitty. The lieutenant wants you."

"Don't throw that thing at me, dammit." Smitty picked up the phone and started talking. His face hardened and he looked pissed off as he handed the phone back. "That son of a bitch," he cursed.

Dave sat up. "What's the scoop?"

Smitty threw a handful of dirt into the field. "Man, I don't know why they're doin' it. We're not going back to Hill 53 right away. He wants to sweep those hamlets over there again," he said, pointing across the field.

"Hell! That's the wrong way, Smitty. That'll take three or four hours, man. We won't get back in until seven or eight o'clock."

"Yeah, I know. He's sending the 1st Squad in from the south and we're to come in from the north. 3rd Squad will stay with him on the side of the field."

"Why the change of plans?" Dave asked.

"What the hell do I know? If I knew, it wouldn't make any difference. We'd still have to do it." Smitty stood up. "Pass the word. Team leaders up," he called out.

In a minute or so, the three team leaders arrived and the squad leader passed on the Lieutenant's orders. "OK, here's the story. We are going to take a look at those people harvesting out there, and then enter the north hamlet of the village and sweep south. Franklin, your team's point. Jones, you're in the middle, and Martinez, you bring up the rear. We are leaving in five minutes, so get everyone ready to go.

While they talked, Dave looked across the field at the people harvesting rice. There were about twenty of them. Everybody was working except for an old man who stood around and watched. Except for him, the villagers appeared to be women and children. This was a contested area and all the men were gone, either with the South Vietnamese Army or off in the hills with the VC.

The squad leader's final word to the team leaders was to tell them to watch their water. It would have to last until they got back in.

"You want me to tell the lieutenant we're leaving?"

"Yeah."

Dave spoke into the phone. "Delta Two. Delta Two, this is Delta Two Bravo. We're movin' out. Over."

Smitty called out for the first team leader. "Okay, Franklin. Get it moving. Keep it spread out. Don't bunch up."

They stayed off the dikes to avoid any mines or booby-traps, and crossed the field to where the women and children were working. Dave always felt like a naked target in the open like this. The Vietnamese ignored the Marines as they approached. All, except the children, kept working. The children jabbered and pointed at the Marines. When their mother spoke harshly to them, the squad leader knew the VC were close by. The children weren't scolded that way when the area was clear. Everyone in the squad instinctively scanned the tree line surrounding the field for a sign of trouble.

C Company patrol to Hill 55

"Delta Two Bravo. Delta Two Bravo, this is Delta Two. Over." Dave replied, "Delta Two, this is Delta Two Bravo. Over."

"Delta Two Bravo, check the ID cards of those people. Over."

"Roger," replied Dave. "Smitty, the lieutenant wants us to check ID cards."

"Pass the word. Check ID cards," the squad leader called out.

The Vietnamese knew the ritual. When the Marines asked for ID cards, they stopped working and produced them. There were all in order. The only male was the old man.

Smitty called for Lance Corporal Bergen, who could speak Vietnamese. "Bergen, see if you can get the old man to tell us where the VC are."

"OK, Smitty." Bergen turned to the old man and greeted him, "Chao ong."

The old man looked surprised. "Cong san o dau? Cong san o dau?"

The old man shook his head. "Kong biet. Kong hieu. [No VC. No VC.]"

"Smitty, he's not gonna talk," Bergen said to the squad leader.

Crazy people, thought Dave. We're here to protect them and they tell us nothing. He looked the people over closely. He'd never really gotten used to the Vietnamese. Conical-shaped hats, barefoot kids, and rag-tag clothes. Old ladies with betel nut-stained teeth and young mothers old before their time. The only thing that seemed right to him were the teen-age girls in their bright, colorful tunics. What a strange place to fight a war, he thought.

The squad spent about twenty minutes checking the people out. Then Smitty, who was looking at his map, called him over. "Tell the lieutenant we found nothing here and we're movin' out," he said.

"Roger." Dave picked up the hand set and relayed the message.

"OK, Franklin. Get 'em movin'. Head toward that break in the trees over there were the trail is," Smitty said, pointing. "Spread' em out. Don't bunch up."

The squad waded through the waist-high rice in staggered formation, staying off the dikes that criss-crossed the field. The village of Cam Bo was made up of eight hamlets. They were strung out around the perimeter of the field and connected by trails. Each hamlet was about 300 yards long and, nestled in the trees were the homes, animal pens, gardens, tobacco and sugarcane plots. During the rainy season when the fields were flooded, the hamlets resembled small islands of palm and banana trees.

Everyone watched the tree lines. He kept his radio antenna pulled down in front of him. The VC liked to shoot at radio-men and machine-gunners. Dave didn't think this actually concealed the fact that he was carrying a radio. It still stuck out like a sore thumb, but it made him feel better. Some radio-men even put their radios in a pack. The worst problem around here, he knew, wasn't snipers — it was mines and booby traps. That was what scared him most. Generally, bullet wounds healed pretty well, but mines just tore a person up.

When the squad got close to the trees, Dave could see some of the bamboo huts. In an open area, he saw two women squatting on the ground. They were shaking a large straw matte disk to separate the rice hulls from the grain. The squad was just entering the hamlet when five shots rang out.

The Marines hit the deck and scrambled for cover. The call went out, "Corpsman up, corpsman up. Franklin's been hit."

The squad laid down covering fire in the direction from which the shots had come, while Smitty and the corpsman ran up to Franklin's position. After a minute, the firing stopped. They knew that the sniper had ditched his weapons and either run away or hidden.

"Delta Two Bravo. Delta Two Bravo, this is Delta Two Actual. Over."

"This is Delta Two Bravo Over." Dave spoke "Lieutenant, we've got one WIA. Don't know how serious yet. Wait one." Dave ran over to where the wounded man was laying. "Smitty, I got the Lieutenant on the radio," he said as he handed over the handset.

Dave knelt down and looked at Franklin. He was in a lot of pain and moaning, but alert. The corpsman had ripped open his uniform and was putting a battle dressing around his thigh where he'd been hit. There was a lot of blood.

"What you think, Doc?" Dave asked the corpsman.

"He'll be okay, Dave: I got the bleeding stopped."

Dave looked at Franklin. "You sandbagger. I knew you'd get out of the Nam before me.

Franklin gave him a weak smile and said, "See you back in the world, Dave."

"Jones, get your team up and get movin' in there," Smitty called out. "See what you can find." He gave the phone back to Dave and said, "give the first squad our position. They're going to sweep in from the other end of the village and we'll meet in the middle." He turned to the corpsman. "Doc, you stay here with Franklin. The lieutenant will be here in about 20 minutes with the 3rd Squad to set up a landing zone. Carver, you stay here and keep the Doc covered until the lieutenant gets here, then follow us."

The squad leader, Dave, and the rest of Franklin's team went into the hamlet. They heard Bergen yelling at a Vietnamese woman, trying to find out where the sniper was. She kept saying she didn't know. Bergen knocked her down and walked away. The squad went about the business of searching the huts and bunkers in the hamlet. The Marines were mad and the people were scared. The squad searched thoroughly, but didn't find anything. After the lieutenant arrived, Carver's team came into the hamlet and joined the rest the squad.

"Tell the lieutenant we're movin' out now."

"Roger, Smitty," Dave replied. "Delta Two. Delta Two, this is Delta Two Bravo. Over."

"Delta Two Bravo. Delta Two Bravo, this is Delta Two Actual. Over." "Lieutenant," Dave said,"we're gonna be movin' down the main trail to the next hamlet. Don't fire in this direction Over.

"Roger, Delta Two Bravo. Out."

The squad proceeded cautiously down the trail, looking for mines and booby-traps. The villagers did not look at them as they passed. Most stayed inside their huts and some inside their bunkers. Dave did not trust the Vietnamese. They never came forward and told them about the VC in the area or the location of mines and booby-traps. They had to know these things, Dave thought. If they didn't, they would step on mines themselves.

"Smitty, it doesn't feel right," said Dave. "They're still in here. I can tell."

"Yeah, me too. Pass the word. Keep them spread out. Don't bunch up."

The squad moved off the trail. Smitty, Dave, and the rest of Franklin's team walked parallel to it. The other two teams moved deeper into the hamlet. They checked the huts and bunkers, and looked for tunnels.

"That sniper could be anywhere, Smitty," Dave said. "Hell, they're probably all VC in here."

"Yeah, Dave. I don't know what to think."

It was cooler inside the village. The tall trees gave a lot of shade. Dave opened the gate to a yard and walked through. The small, one room house was made of bamboo and had a thatch roof. There was nobody in the house or a bunker below it. The villagers used these bunkers as shelter from bombs and artillery. The house had a dirt floor and little else. Inside the door were a couple pots that held rice. Along one wall, there was an altar set up with a picture and two incense holders on it. Dave had heard that these people worshiped their ancestors. He looked over the house carefully. Behind the house in a pen was a water buffalo. These animals became skittish when they smelled a strange scent. A few months before, a guy in the first platoon had shot one with an M-79 grenade launcher when it charged them. As Dave approached, the big animal started to get restless. Dave looked around the pen and saw nothing. He was glad the water buffalo was tied up. Satisfied there was nothing there, he headed back to the trail.

What a crazy, primitive place to fight a war, he thought. Dave didn't hate the Vietnamese like many American soldiers did. Most of the time, he felt sorry for them. To Dave, these folks were just caught up in something they knew nothing about. Right now, though, he was angry like the rest of the squad because of Franklin.

Further into the hamlet, Dave recognized a kid. At first, he couldn't remember when he had seen him before. The kid looked at him and waved. He was about eight-years-old. What the hell is this? Dave wondered. He waved back and walked on. He tried to remember where he had seen the kid before. He thought about his last patrol in this hamlet. Then it dawned on him — the red ants!

It had been during the rainy season. There hadn't been any Viet Cong in the village that day and there was time for relaxation and laughter. Everything was wet and Dave had set down on a grassy spot of ground. The kid had been standing there shaking is head "no," but Dave had ignored him. What the hell would a Vietnamese kid know, he'd thought. But the kid did know. That spot was the home of a red ant colony, and they had attacked Dave with vigor. They climbed up under his uniform and bit him all over. Those red ants were vicious bastards, he remembered. There was no way to get them off except to wash them off, so he stripped his uniform off and jumped into the filthy rice paddy water. The kid had laughed like it was the funniest thing the world.

"Smitty, hold it," Dave told the squad leader. "That kid — he might talk to me. Get Bergen up here."

The squad halted while Bergen and Dave went over to the kid. He didn't run when they approach. He even smiled at Dave. Dave took his hand and Bergen asked him if he knew where the VC were. The kid looked scared. He pointed down the trail and bolted.

"Smitty, the kid pointed down the trail when we asked about the Viet Cong," Dave told the squad leader.

"You'd better get on the horn and pass the word back to the lieutenant."

"DeltaTwo. Delta Two, this is Delta Two Bravo. Over."

"Delta Two Bravo, this is Delta Two Actual. Over."

"Lieutenant," Dave said "we found a kid who indicates that the VC are still in the ville. It looks like they're between us and the first squad at the other end."

"Delta Two Bravo, you act as a blocking force. First squad will sweep in your direction. Over."

"Roger, Delta Two Actual. Out." Dave turned to the squad leader. "Hey, Smitty, he wants us to set up a blocking force here and let the other squad sweep this way."

"Okay," replied Smitty. "I'll take Franklin's team. You stay with me. Jones and Carver, you get your teams on each side of my flanks and spread out all the way across the hamlet. 1st Squad's gonna push 'em towards us to try to flush them out."

Behind him, Dave heard the steady "whump-whump-whump" of the helicopter gunships and the medevac ship approaching. Soon the gunships were hovering overhead, giving covering fire to the medevac chopper as it decended to pick up Franklin. The chopper was on the ground only a moment, and then lifted off again. When it reached the altitude of the gunships, the three helicopters turned and headed back to the hospital at Da Nang. Dave was glad that Franklin got a good wound and probably wouldn't have to come back.

"Delta Two Bravo. Delta Two Bravo, this is Delta Two. Over."

"Delta Two, this is Delta Two Bravo. Over," replied Dave."

"First squad is entering the other end of the hamlet now. Over."

"Roger. Delta Two Bravo out." Dave turned to the squad leader.

"Smitty, they're coming in the other end now."

"Gotcha. Okay, you guys. Pass the word. They're coming in," the squad leader said.

The squad spread out and found good firing positions where they could see through the hedges and trees of the hamlet. The hamlet was about 50 yards wide at this point. Dave sat down next to a clump of bamboo. He could see across the clearing, an intersection of trails by a fence. Smitty was only a few feet away. "How long do you think it'll be before 1st Squad gets here?"

"Shouldn't be too long, Dave."

Dave took out his canteen and drank. It's still going to be a long hump back, he thought. I'd better take it easy. He glanced at his watch. It was 4pm. He checked his rifle once more and clicked the safety off.

The squad had been in place for about twenty-five minutes when the horrible sound of a mine exploding blasted the air and cries of pain rang out.

Jesus Christ, Dave wondered.

"Pass the word. Stay put, "Smitty shouted,"1st Squad can handle it."

A Bouncing Betty mine is vicious. The mine was spring-loaded and didn't explode when it was stepped on. The pressure of a man's foot triggered the mine and released its spring-latch.

When the victim stepped off the mine, it would bounce up in the air and explode about three feet above ground. The mine usually severed the victim's legs just below the hips. The VC had stolen thousands of these mines from the South Vietnamese Army. They were all made in the United States.

Cries of pain burned into everyone's ears. From the right flank, where Jones's team had settled in, a machine-gun suddenly opened up. Then, the riflemen in his team fired too. The firing lasted only a moment and then subsided.

"Jones, what the hell is goin' on?" The squad leader called out. He got up and handed over to Jones's position. Dave followed. Jones was standing over the body of a young man dressed in black pajamas. "We got one, Smitty, "he said.

"Delta Two Bravo. Delta Two Bravo, this is Delta Two Actual. What's that firing about? Over."

"Delta Two Actual, this is Delta Two Bravo. Lieutenant, we think we got a dead VC here. Over."

"What do you mean you think? Over."

"We got a dead somebody here, Sir," Dave replied. "He has no weapon. Over."

"What did the guy do, Jones?" Smitty asked.

"When the mine exploded, he took off running out of those trees over there and into the field," Jones answered. "We opened up and there he is."

"Yeah, Jones, he had to be a VC," he said. "There is no young man his age around here anyway." He pointed to the body. "Check him for papers or documents."

They searched the man's body. There was nothing on it. The wounded Marine was still crying and screaming. The terrible sounds of his dying filled the hamlet. It bothered everyone and seemed to last forever. His agony made the Marines feel hopeless. They didn't even know for sure if the young man they'd shot was Viet Cong. It didn't seem possible, but he might well have been a civilian. That's the worst part of this war, Dave thought. You never really knew who, what, or where the enemy is. It seemed like you could never get back at them. The hamlet finally became quiet, and they all knew the Marine had died.

"Delta Two Bravo. Delta Two Bravo, this is Delta Two Actual. Move into the field and set up an LZ. Over. "

"Roger, Delta Two Actual," Dave responded. He walked over to the squad leader. Smitty, the lieutenant wants us to set up an LZ out in the field."

"OK, Dave. Pass the word. Set up a perimeter out in the field," he said.

"What about him?" Jones said, pointing to the dead Vietnamese.

"Hell, leave him where he is," Smitty said. "Let the villagers bury him. He's one of theirs. "

The squad set up the perimeter and waited. 1st Squad arrived with the body of the dead Marine.

They laid him down in the rice paddy. He had been one of the new replacements and couldn't have been in Vietnam more than a month. Dave hardly knew the guy. The thought that he could end up like him bothered Dave. Being scared was another thing that Dave would never get used to. He wished there was something to cover the body with. It was a terrible sight. The medevac flight was slow, taking about an hour and a half to get there. It seemed longer to Dave, but there was a priority system and a KIA was lowest on the list.

The platoon started back to Hill 53 a few minutes after the medevac helicopter lifted off. It was almost 6pm when they left the landing zone. The sun had dropped lower in the sky, but it was still real hot. They moved quickly across the fields and through the hamlets. Dave's muscles ached and his radio and gear seemed to weigh a ton. The Marines tried to be careful but by then, they were exhausted. The platoon was lucky though. They were fired on twice by snipers, but nobody was hit.

The platoon made it back to Hill 53 in the dark at 10pm. As they entered the company compound at the top of the hill, Dave turned and looked back from where they had come from. In the dim moonlight, the fields and hamlets seemed peaceful. He couldn't see much except the flickering fires from a few lanterns in the far distance. Most of the villagers were in their homes asleep. He imagined that by now someone had taken the body of the suspected VC — maybe even his family. Dave knew that 20 miles away, in Da Nang, someone was preparing the body of the dead Marine for shipment to his family.

God, he thought, Vietnam is unreal. I just want to survive.

Khe Sanh Memoirs

by Ron Smith

Khe Sanh: December 1967

The following is compiled from dates noted on my Official Orders while in the Corps, letters I sent home from Vietnam, official Marine Corps histories (The Battle forKhe Sanh, us. Marines in Vietnam, 1967, U.S. Marines in Vietnam,1968) and from some very hazy memories.

Larry Emond, Ray Lewis, and I joined H&S Company 3/26 at Camp Evans, in Early December 1967. We had gone to radio-telegraph school together in San Diego and went on to Air and Naval Gunfire training with 1st ANGLICO in Hawaii. By the time we arrived at Khe Sanh, we had been together for over a year. On 13 December we left Camp Evans in a convoy to Dong Ha. We passed through Hue, and I was surprised at the size and beauty of the city. Shortly after we arrived in Dong Ha, we were hustled aboard choppers for a flight to Khe Sanh. Some of the people who had been up to Khe Sanh before told us how pretty it would be. They were right, there was the coffee plantation run by the Poilane family, who traced their roots back to the French colonial period in Vietnam. Lush is the most appropriate adjective for the countryside when we arrived. Beneath all the green, of course, was the red clay that powdered the combat base in dust during the dry season and mired it in mud during the rainy season. The surrounding hills still had plenty of vegetation on them. Hills 950 and 1015 seemed like regular mountains. I also remember a priest who rode around on a Honda motorcycle. He had a flack jacket that had RCMP (for "Royal Canadian Mounted Priest") on the back. I can't remember if he was a chaplain or a local priest. I think that he was killed when Khe Sanh village was overrun.

We were put in a section outside the regular lines in order to extend the defensive perimeter of the base. We pitched tents, dug fighting holes, and strung wire. In the main section of the base, there were above ground hootches, similar to those at Camp Evans, a PX (loaded with Brasso, shoe polish, tooth powder, and little else), and a mess hall. I also remember the three of us (Ray, Larry, and me) walking down from the area we were given to the center of the base for a movie shown on a bed sheet. I can't for the life of me recall what it was. I remember the fog, too, which was so thick early in the morning that someone could disappear ten feet in front of you.

When we were settling in, the three of us had a poncho-covered lean-to that we slept in. We dug holes next to it to jump into during the incoming which had already started. I remember leaving the perimeter and following a trail past the Bru village to a water point. I know that we crossed over a three-strand barbed wire fence, and I thought at the time that it was not much different from some of the fences I had crossed in the Michigan countryside. One day, someone from the H&S radio section (I think it was Toby Jackson) took me over to the section where the ARVN Rangers were, and I traded my GI pack and four packs of Salem cigarettes for a nice rucksack, that I kept for the duration of my tour (including a later trip to the hospital in Guam).

Each of us was taking watches on the battalion radio net in a sandbagged tent. I remember that it was cold in the mornings and someone built a stove out of a 55-gallon oil drum. The barrel was still covered in red paint, and it gave off some pretty nasty fumes when it was first fired up. So, I put my gas mask on and was immediately chewed out by a captain for being a smartass. He acted as though that was a character flaw, but anyone who knew me would know that I thought that characteristic was one of my stronger qualities. I have some notes that say that the high temperature for Khe Sanh in December was 79 degrees and that the low was 53 degrees. The cold weather might seem a bit strange because when most people think of Vietnam, they think of the heat, but some of the northern elevations can get pretty cold. We had even colder temperatures up on the hill outposts.

For Christmas, Ray, Larry, and I had a small (about six inches) decorated Christmas tree that Larry's mother sent him. The December issue of Esquire magazine had a cover that featured a Christmas wreath complete with hand grenades, so we thought it would be fitting to take a picture of Ray with a Christmas stocking, sent by his mother, stuffed with grenades and M -16 magazines.

Not long after Christmas, things began to get serious. Along with the increased incoming, there was a copy of Bernard Fall's history of the fall of Bien Dien Phu, and we were ordered to move everything underground. Individual bunkers had to be one or two men only. I think Ray, Larry, and I had a pretty good basement going before anyone told us this. I wound up with a bunker of my own. Ray and Larry dug one together close by.

My bunker was lined with plywood that I had scrounged up somewhere. Since we didn't have any power or hand tools, I had to dig my bunker to fit the wood. It was about five-feet deep, six-feet long, and three-feet wide. I found a log that was about, three feet in circumference and four-feet long to use as my main beam. I ran some marshton matting from the beam to the rear of the hole and then covered it with an extra poncho I picked up somewhere. Then, I covered it all with five layers of sandbags, which was supposed to be enough to stop an 82mm mortar. Of course, most the incoming was from 122mm rockets, and 152mm artillery. Near the front of my bunker, I knocked the bottom out of an ammo box and set it into the side of the bunker to create a hinged window. Ray and Larry had similar windows in their bunker. From this point on, we were filling sandbags, standing lines, or pulling radio watch, heading into January and what was to become the Siege of Khe Sanh.

The Hill Fights Revisited

The Story of Echo Company 2/3

by James R.Cannon E Co 2/3, Major USMC Retired

This story is dedicated to all the Marines, organic or attached, living or deceased, who served with Echo Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marines during April and May 1967, and especially to (then) 2nd Lt. Frank "Ike" Izenour, Jr., Platoon Commander, 1st Platoon, and SSgt. Robert Morningstar, Platoon Sergeant, 2nd Platoon.

Frank was a hard-charging second lieutenant fresh out of The Basic School, a fast learner, a fine person, an excellent Marine officer, and a hell of a good friend of mine. Morningstar was a shotgun-loving, beer-drinking, Staff Non-Commissioned Officer, who wanted everyone to think he was somebody. He was. He was a loyal, dedicated Marine with a heart as big as a barn door who would do just about anything for anybody. He would give you the shirt off his own back, whether you needed it or not. You only had to ask for it. I could and did depend upon him a lot. He was my platoon sergeant.

Preface

The following is a true story. No names, places, times or dates have been changed. This is one man's story of the Hill Fights near Khe Sanh in northwest Vietnam. During the period of 26 April through 11 May 1967, there were many actions and events untold and many acts of valor unnoticed. Every man there has or had his own interpretations as to what took place, his own story to tell. This one is mine. In it, I have tried to depict exactly what took place. I have not told any untruths or exaggerated. I have, however, tried to express my feelings and reactions to certain situations or events.

The Khe Sanh Hill Fights

In April 1967, I was the Platoon Commander of the 2nd Platoon, Echo Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marines. Echo Company (as well as the remainder of the battalion) was participating in Operation Beacon Star in Phong Dien District, Thua Thien Province, RVN, an area in the coastal plains approximately 16 miles north of Hue, against Main Force Viet Cong.

In the morning of 26 April 1967, Echo Company was to land by helicopter and push elements of a large Viet Cong unit into a blocking force. My platoon, the 2nd Platoon, reinforced (rein.), was to be that blocking force. We were to be helilifted into position first. We found, however, that instead of being helilifted into a blocking position, we were being helilifted to Phu Bai, where we would board transport planes to Khe Sanh. I knew that to divert this operation, something big was up.

My platoon (rein.) was the first element of the 2nd Battalion to reach Khe Sanh. Upon landing, we disembarked and moved rapidly to the west side of the runway and established a perimeter. As the remainder of Echo Company and the other companies of the battalion arrived, the perimeter was enlarged. By about 1600 hours, most of the battalion was in. Fox Company would arrive the following day.

Shortly after 1600 hours, the battalion commander gathered his officers and briefed them as to the situation and why we were there. He stated that elements of 1/9 and 3/3 were in heavy contact with the North Vietnamese on Hill 861, that casualties were heavy, and the we (2/3) would spend the night in rear of 1/9, allowing them to move through us that night and that, "Tomorrow we'll kick ass, won't bother taking names."

At that time, I was the 2nd Platoon Commander, 2nd Lt. Frank Izenour was 1st Platoon Commander, 2nd Lt. John Eller was 3rd Platoon Commander and 2nd Lt. Clifton Caner was Weapons Platoon Commander. Captain Al Lyon was our Company Commander and 1st Lt. Jack Adinolfi was executive officer (XO). At the helm of Golf Company was Captain James P. Sheehan, Fox Company's CO was Captain Martin P. Sorensen, and Captain Raymond C. Madonna commanded Hotel Company. Of course, the battalion was commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Earl "Pappy" Delong. Major Wendell O. Beard, who later assumed command of the battalion, was the battalion's XO.

Companies were assigned sectors for the night and we moved into our positions, just west of the Khe Sanh Combat Base and just south of Hill 861. At about 0300, I was awakened and told that Lt. Col. Delong wanted me to take a patrol out at first light to find an avenue of approach to the Hill 881 North area. After coordinating with our company artillery Forward Observer to establish concentrations in support of my patrol, I selected about seven men from my platoon and issued my patrol order.

At first light, my patrol moved out to the west to accomplish our mission, that of finding an avenue of approach northward. The patrol members were excellent Marines. Nothing was said throughout the patrol. All commands/orders and communications were carried out with hand and arm signals. We were out about five hours. No contact with the enemy was made.

Upon our return, we found the entire battalion saddled up and ready to move out. After being debriefed, we were issued our operation order. Golf Company was to attack northwestward, seizing and securing Objective 1, Hill 861. Echo Company was to attack in a northwesterly direction along the same axis but to the west of Golf Company. Hotel Company would be in reserve. Foxtrot Company was also in reserve but, I believe, at the time remained as the regimental reserve or part of it. At that time, I did not know if the elements that were supposed to move through us southward had, in fact, completed their withdrawal.

When ordered to move out, Echo Company moved westward to a ridgeline where we were to wheel and concentrate our movement northwestward. My platoon, 2nd Platoon, had the point. As darkness began to fall on us, we established a company perimeter on the high ground and set in for the night. Meanwhile, Hill 861 was being pounded by artillery in preparation for Golf Company's assault the next morning.

The following morning, 28 April, we continued our advance northwestward as Golf Company assaulted Objective 1, Hill 861. By early afternoon, Echo Company had reached a position just west and slightly north of Hill 861. We began to receive 60mm mortar fire and immediately took cover. Counter mortar fire by the company's 60mm mortar section into the suspected mortar positions quickly rendered the enemy mortars silent. I had received one casualty who had taken shrapnel in the buttocks. He was not medevaced.

At this time, each platoon sent a fire team to a stream nearby to fill canteens. I accompanied my fire team to the stream. Close by, where we filled out canteens, laid two dead North Vietnamese soldiers. One was laying face down in the stream; nevertheless, we needed water and the iodine tablets we carried would sterilize it. So we filled up our canteens and moved back to our defensive positions.

The rest of the afternoon was spent patrolling to the front of our perimeter. It was during this patrolling that my platoon found several dead

Marines. It was apparent they had been caught in a minute ambush. It appeared that before dying, they had hidden their crew-served weapons to prevent the North Vietnamese from capturing them. The bodies that were found were still intact but bloated and black from the scorching heat of the sun. We removed the bodies of the dead without incident to an LZ for helilift back to Khe Sanh. We did not know at the time, but later found out, that the North Vietnamese were in well-camouflaged bunkers approximately 100 meters away with a clear field of fire on the litter detail. The dead Marines were helilifted out without incident. We resumed our defensive posture to await further orders.

Late the following morning, 29 April, M 3/9 and M 3/3 moved out across our front along a small ridgeline from east to west. As they did so, they began to come under sniper fire from the well-concealed bunkers mentioned in the preceding paragraph. In the ensuing firefight, the unit engaged took about nine casualties before air strikes with napalm could be brought to bear on the enemy bunkers. These units were moving toward their intermediate objectives in preparation of an attack on Hill 881 South.

After fine-tuning our defensive posture for the night, Echo Company officers were summoned to the company command post (CP) for a briefing. During that briefing, we were told that elements of the 3rd and 9th Marines were moving to an intermediate objective to our west-northwest to continue the attack on Hill 881 South the morning of 30 April. We were told that literally hundreds of North Vietnamese had been spotted in the open on 881 South and that artillery bombardment would prevail on the hill most of the night. It did. Artillery rained down on Hill 881 South so heavily and for so long, we thought that nothing could have survived it and that the next day would be a piece of cake for the attacking unit or units. Not so, as we could later attest.

The next morning, on 30 April, Echo Company jumped off into the attack. Our mission was to seize the big hill, Hill 881 North. Out intermediate objective was a smaller hill, but by no means small, just south of 881 North. A frag order would be issued later by Captain Lyon prior to the assault on our intermediate objective. We would bypass to the east the unit or units attacking 881 south.

Prior to reaching our intermediate objectives, at approximately 1300 hours, the unit attacking 881 South began their attack. With my field glasses, I could see the assaulting unit in an assault formation, generally abreast, moving from a northerly direction down the ridgeline southward. I saw Marines starting to fall and quickly jerked my field glasses to the left. I saw NVA moving from position to position, resupplying the machine guns in bunkers opposing the assaulting Marines. The NVA bunkers were well concealed and I imagined even more so for the assaulting Marines. To see so many Marines fall caused a deep ache in the pit of my stomach and I thought. "God, I wish there was something I could do."

As we approached our intermediate objective, the tempo of the fighting on 881 South became even more apparent. It seemed as if all hell was breaking loose. My heart went out to those brave Marines. I was quickly brought back to the realization that the Skipper, Captain Lyon, wanted his platoon commanders up for a frag order.

The plan called for the 1st and 2nd Platoons to move up to the base of the hill, and upon signal assault abreast, 1st Platoon on the left, 2nd Platoon on the right. Upon securing the hill, we were to establish a hasty defense with the 1st Platoon defending from 8 to 12 and the 2nd Platoon defending from 12 to 4. 3rd Platoon was to move to an open area to our right front (northeast) and support by fire 1st and 2nd Platoons' assault on the intermediate objective. Upon signal, the 3rd Platoon would move up and tie in from 4 to 8.

The Weapons Platoon Commander, 2nd Lt. Canter, accompanied 2nd Lt. John Eller and the 3rd Platoon to the supporting position. I thought the 3rd Platoon would get bogged down by the enemy in the proposed support position; nevertheless, the 3rd Platoon moved out to their assigned position to establish a base of fire.

Immediately upon the 3rd Platoon reaching their position, my platoon and the 1st Platoon began our advance to the assault position. The undergrowth was much thicker than it had appeared. Grass at the 3rd Platoon position was waist high. Elephant grass and bamboo on the south side of the intermediate objective was well above our heads.

As we neared our assault position, firing erupted with the 3rd Platoon. Firing directed at the 3rd Platoon began to intensify. It was coming from the hill directly to our front. I heard later that Second Lieutenant Canter was hit while directing the fire of one of his machine guns. I thought that to relieve any pressure on the base of fire, we, the 1st and 2nd Platoons, needed to begin our assault immediately. This was OK'd by the Skipper and Frank and I jumped off in the assault. Going was tough and control was difficult but we managed to stay generally abreast by coordination via radio.

We were about half way up our objective when shots rang out. In a split second, I found myself several yards down the hill with my radioman, L/Cpl. Carl R. Hovietz a Navajo Indian tearing at my clothes to see where I was hit. One round, I presume the first, had hit me just above the heart. By some miracle, it had failed to penetrate my flak jacket. Another round had creased my left upper arm and gone into my pack, splattering my can of ham and limas. Still another round creased my left hand and completely destroyed an M-79 grenade launcher I had previously picked up from a dead Marine. Apparently, the antennae from my radio had provided the enemy an excellent reference point. To keep from being further menaced by my radioman's inspection, I sprang to my feet and keeping somewhat lower than before, with Hovietz in tow, I scurried back up the hill to rejoin my platoon.

We broke out of the tall grass just before the beginning of the crest of the hill. I quickly determined that Frank, the 1st Platoon Commander, and I were still abreast and in good shape. If we were to catch hell, it would be any second now. The tempo of the assault heightened. As if acting on cue, our Marines quickened their pace and began to scream. No shots were fired; the enemy had pulled off the hill. We pushed through the objective and quickly established our hasty defense. The objective was ours.

Upon securing the hill, I moved back to the crest where I could observe the 3rd Platoon and the company command group and to signal them to move up. Waiting for the 3rd Platoon and the command group, I again observed 881 South through my field glasses. I saw Marines scampering down the northeast side of the hill, dragging and carrying their wounded. I pondered the courageous efforts of those brave Marines. I was so thankful that our casualties had been so few.

When Captain Lyon arrived at the crest of the hill, I brought him abreast of the situation and informed him of what we had found on the hill. The hill was literally peppered with mutually supporting, well-concealed, strongly built bunkers. There was evidence they had been occupied very recently but were now empty. The area was well policed, which indicated to me that these were well disciplined, well trained, experienced troops. We were to hold this position pending the capture of 881 south.

We began to dig in, camouflage and clear fields of fire. At the same time, each Platoon conducted patrols to its front to ascertain any other enemy positions, avenues of approach, and the general layout of the land. Listening posts were established, and we settled in for the night.

The following morning, 1 May, the rays of the sun quickly found their way through the openings of the canopy above us. Everything seemed so serene and peaceful. Our Marines were taking turns shaving, brushing their teeth, and cleaning their weapons. There was a strange sound I had never before heard in Vietnam and this was my second time in this country. I reported it to the skipper, as did others within the company. It was determined later to be locusts.

In the midst of morning awakening and cleaning up, there came a dull whomp-whomp-whomp. I shouted, "Incoming," as did others who were familiar with the sound. We were receiving enemy mortar fire. The rounds rained down on our Hill with deadly accuracy as if they were guided by an unseen hand. As soon as they had landed and exploded, I rushed to the command post. I told the company Commander I thought they had come from just north of us about 400 meters. I told the company commander I thought the North Vietnamese were firing from some type of platform on the reverse slope of the hill. Counter-mortar fire was called in on the suspected position and the enemy mortars fell silent. We would move through this area the next day and my suspicions would be proven correct. The North Vietnamese had built platforms made of earth and bamboo on the reverse slope of the ridge, extending out far enough so that the rounds from the tubes would clear the hill. In addition, they had dug into the side of the hill for cover in case of counter-mortar fire. The remainder of the day was spent patrolling, cleaning weapons, and preparing for the next day the assault on 881 North. Hill 881 South had still not been secured. The night passed without incident.

The following morning, 2 May, Captain Lyon called the platoon commanders together to issue an operations order for the attack on 881 north. We would wait until Hill 881S was secured and, on order, move out to attack Hill 881N from the south-southeast.

By early afternoon, Objective 2, Hill 881S, had been secured. We moved out in a company column with 2nd Platoon, my platoon, as point. As we moved toward our objective, we had artillery pounding the left side of it. This would cover our movement and we could adjust it as we neared our assault position. The fires caused by the exploding artillery provided excellent screening for our approach to the designated assault positions.

Marines of 2nd Bn., 3rd Marine Division, lead attack on Hill 881N

As we neared our assault position and began deploying, the sky began to turn dark and the wind began to blow. It started to rain. I was hoping that the rain would not put out the fires. To have both the rain and the smoke would be to our advantage. This would screen our movement and, hopefully, the NVA would be down in their holes trying to keep dry.

Having deployed, we began our assault walking our artillery up the ridgeline to our front. Halfway up the hill, the assault was stopped not by the enemy, but by order of the company commander. "How strange," I thought. Nothing stops the assault except the enemy and we had not made contact with the primary defensive positions yet. We would later learn that it was a matter of control; the inability to control such large units, so far out, in such bad weather.

A frag order was issued. We were to return to the position we had previously occupied. My platoon was to move through the rest of the company and take the point in the company's movement back to where we had left earlier that afternoon.

It became increasingly dark during our movement back to our previous position and by the time we arrived, it was night. It was still raining. Everyone was tired and miserable and the bone-chilling rain didn't help. We searched out the inner perimeter and, after doing so, each platoon took up their old positions. It was still raining hard. We put out our trip flares and claymore mines, put out our security, and established 50% security for the night. In each two-man fighting hole, one man would be awake while one man slept.

In my bunker were me, my platoon sergeant (SSgt. Morningstar), and my radioman (L/Cpl. Hovietz). It was 0400 in the morning. The rain had stopped and there was an eerie mist hovering over the hill. I had taken my boots off, wrung the water from my socks, and turned my boots upside down to allow them to drain. Everything was quiet.

My second squad leader, Sgt. Billy Joe Like, broke the silence. I heard him shout, "Halt, who's there?" With that challenge, the entire northern half of the hill exploded. We were hit. I shouted to Morningstar, "Let's go," and sprang for the bunker entrance. As I did so, one of my Marines was blown in on top of me. He was badly wounded. I told Morningstar to take care of him and told my radioman to come on. From my right front at about 2 o'clock enemy machine guns were raking my section of the perimeter. At the same time, enemy mortars were falling over the entire hill. We fired our final protective fires. I could hear the machine gun near the first squad chattering in long bursts and I knew this was not a probe.

My second squad leader was nearly cut in half by machine gun fire. My first squad radioman, PFC John R. Meuse, radioed to me that he was hit and needed a corpsman. I told him to hang on, that I would get to him as soon as I could. My two corpsmen had their hands full, as did all the other company corpsmen. He told me that the machine gun (ours) in his area had been knocked out and that his squad leader was about to set off their claymore mines. I told him to go ahead. I heard the terrific explosion and then there was silence,but not for long. There were more explosions, screaming, agonizing groans of pain, and cursing Casualties were mounting. The situation was extremely bad. I called the command post and told the company commander that I needed help, that we were under assault by a large force, and that all of my crew-served weapons had been knocked out. I also asked for my preplanned artillery concentrations to be fired and called for a flare ship. I was informed that I couldn't have both. I was somewhat pissed. I knew that the flare ships could fly above the maximum ordinance of artillery (arty) and I needed both. I asked for arty and waited. No arty. I screamed into my radio, "Damn the arty, give me some light." Another casualty. I told Hovietz to get him in the bunker with Morningstar.

Captain Lyon told me he was sending a squad from the 1st Platoon up to help me. They never arrived. Another squad was dispatched to me. They, too, failed to arrive. I learned later that both squads were badly hit as they tried to reach my platoon.

I made my way toward the company CP. I stopped at the XO's bunker. He was gone. I thought, "God, I hope he hasn't been captured." I again radioed the Skipper. I asked him to send me a 3.5 rocket launcher team to knock out the enemy machine gun to my right front. I met the team near the XO's position and took them up just behind my second squad. From there, I had a good field of fire and a safe back blast area. I was in the process of directing their fire when an explosion went off just in front of us. My rocket team was knocked out. I was still standing. For some ungodly reason, I thought nothing could touch me. I had put my radioman in the bunker with Morningstar to help with the wounded. As far as I knew, I was the only one alive up there except those that were in my bunker.

The enemy machine gun was still spitting out deadly fire. Trip flares were going off to my right front. I found no one alive in my first or second squads, yet there was movement all around me. My platoon was in trouble; I needed help. I was able to reach the command post and inform my company commander of my situation. There I found the XO. I was glad he was alive. He would soon take over the company.

I informed my company commander that my entire first and second squads were wiped out, that there was only one friendly position up there, that of my bunker where Morningstar, Hovietz and two wounded Marines were located. My third squad, although lightly engaged, was still intact and had suffered no casualties. They were my extreme right defensive squad.

Captain Lyon informed me a platoon of Foxtrot Company was moving up the rear to help block the penetration. I passed the word to keep my bunker protected, that it was occupied by friendly troops. Sometime, from somewhere, I had grabbed an M-16 rifle, firing it until it jammed. I threw it down and pick up an M-14. I overheard reports that the NVA were wearing flak gear and Marine helmets and some were in the trees shouting, "Marine, you die." I cannot attest to this. I do know that they were hard to stop. Even point blank firing into their chests would not ensure they would be stopped. Some had been beaten with entrenching tools or whatever one could get his hands on. Consequently, there was much hand-to-hand combat that morning. We found later that several Marines had died while trying to clear jams from their M-16's.

Initially, these stoppages were blamed on unclean rifles. Such was not the case. Extensive investigation and research would later show that there were two reasons that the M-16 had so many stoppages. One reason was that the cyclic rate of fire was too fast for the buffer rate-reducing group. The other reason was two types of cartridges had been manufactured, one of which had a rim base so thin that often when fired, the extractor would pull off the rim, thereby leaving the spend round in the chamber.

It wasn't long before 2nd Lt. Carroll's platoon from Foxtrot Company arrived. I briefed him on the situation and cautioned him that my platoon sergeant and radioman, along with two wounded, were still in my bunker. I then moved forward with Carroll's platoon and, taking up a position beside a machine gunner, began to direct his fire into the position of the enemy machine gun. He started firing but soon stopped. "Damn jam," I thought as I turned toward him. I then saw why he had stopped firing. Blood was running down the side of his face. I rolled him over toward me so the assistant gunner could take over.

It was now light. I heard the Hueys behind us. Relief was just a few rockets away. Smoke was thrown to mark our positions and to direct the Huey's rockets north of us. One of the first rockets fired hit our command post, wounding our company commander and killing or wounding several other key personnel, including our forward air controller, artillery Forward Observer, and senior corpsman, Doc Kleinschmidt. Doc, knowing that I always carried a plastic tube with me, asked me to perform a tracheotomy should he stop breathing. I promised I would. He had been hit in the side of his left jaw.

At about the same time that 2nd Lt. Carroll's platoon had arrived, word came from Hill 881S that the enemy was grouping on the west side of our hill for a counterattack. The unit commander wanted to know if he could fire 106 recoilless rifles into them.

He was given the go-ahead. I knew how impressive the 106 RR was. I had been a 106RR platoon commander. I had never been on the receiving end though, but knew the devastation the 106 rounds could reap. Meanwhile, Marines on the west side of the hill from both John Eller's platoon and Frank Izenour's platoon, were throwing grenades down the hill as fast as they could pull the pins. The counter attack was quickly broken up.

Word was passed to pull back off the hill, that Hotel Company had been helilifted to our northeast and would be sweeping toward us. We couldn't pull off. My bunker with Morningstar and the other three Marines would be left unprotected. I wouldn't pull off. I would pull back just far enough to keep the bunker in sight. If Hotel Company did reach us, we could get down in our holes and let them sweep over us. With good communications, this could be done. We waited.

Until now, there had been no prisoners taken. It didn't surprise anyone. With the anger built up in our Marines and the tenacity with which the NVA fought, I didn't expect any. From somewhere, God only knows where, word came that "Pappy" Delong would give 20 days R & R to the man who got him a prisoner. Within minutes, we had three. From these three, it was learned that another NVA division was on its way south to retake the hill complex. It was this division that would overrun Lang Vei several nights later.

I was on pins and needles. I wanted to reach my two squads that were still up there. I prayed that some were still alive, but everyone knew there was no hope. Still, I wanted to pull them out. Marines always pull out their dead and wounded. Firing was still going on. We continued to wait. Finally, I pulled my third squad leader back and informed him of what I was about to do. I told him to get the third squad on their bellies; that we were going to crawl back over the crest of the hill and take up the first and second squads' position. I told him that, upon reaching those positions, we would watch out for Hotel Company and, should they approach, mark their positions with air panels. We would kill everyone who wasn't a Marine. With the help of 2nd Lt. Carroll's platoon, we did just that. The lst Platoon also helped. Where was Hotel Company? Out there somewhere, I guess. The fighting continued and at about 11:30 that morning, 3 May 1967, we reached our forward positions. The look on Morningstar's fact as he crawled out of his bunker was one of disbelief. After all, he had been in the midst of hell for well over seven hours and survived. He would be KIA (killed in action) two months later by a single shot from a sniper's rifle.

I surveyed the first and second squads' positions. Only then did I realize the strength with which the enemy had attacked. There were bodies everywhere, mostly NVA. In front of my first and second squads lay about 80 North Vietnamese bodies. The remainder of the hill was literally strewn with bodies. There was no telling how many had been dragged off or died later from this fight. I could not tell black Marines from white Marines. They were all black. Without circulation of the blood, bodies lying in that hot sun for hour hours became parched and blackened.

It appeared that my first squad leader had set off his claymores at the most opportune time. It was also apparent that both squads had been overwhelmed. It was into these two squads that the main thrust of the enemy attack had been launched. I should have cried, but I didn't. I didn't have time. I would cry later, and when I did, the tears would never completely stop. The memory of these Marines, so young, so brave, would stay with me forever.

The official body count of the dead NVA was 137 but we stacked 236 weapons including AK-47's, Russian assault machine guns, mortars, Russian sniper rifles, and SKS carbines. On top of the hill, just behind my bunker, I found a dead NVA. Strapped around his neck was a rectangular metal box. Half of the box contained a radio and radio equipment. The other half contained cooked rice. They had come to stay. They stayed.

With 2nd Lt. Carroll's platoon now attached to our company, we reestablished our defensive perimeter. At the same time, we continued to mop up, account for our casualties, and treat those wounded who would not be medevaced. We had to be re-supplied and replenished with ammo. Our company gunnery sergeant, GySgt. David F. Johnson did a super job. After we helilifted our dead and wounded, I sat down with our first sergeant, "Top" Charles Patrinos, who was sitting on a log near the XO's old position. It was then I learned several of the men I thought were dead had been medevaced out with wounds. In my platoon alone, I had 11 KIA and 17 WIA. I had an additional 5 WIA not evacuated. Morningstar had attempted to come out of the bunker sometime earlier and had been hit in the hand. He was not medevaced. My radioman, Lance Corporal Hovietz, was also wounded but not medevaced. My third squad remained intact.

Shortly after accounting for my casualties, one of the men from my third squad reported that someone was coming down the hill behind us, waving a white flag. We didn't need any more prisoners. POW taking time had expired. I told two of my men to sight in on him and when he got close enough, waste him. They didn't. The closer he came, the more he looked like an American. Who was he? Our Marines didn't wear tiger stripes. He kept coming, waving his flag. My two men kept him in their sights even as he walked into our lines. He was a damn redheaded, freckled-faced, freelance photographer and journalist. He wanted a story but we all had too much to do and had no time for story telling. After a while, he got discouraged and left. Who knows? Maybe he went north.

About 1500 that afternoon, the battalion commander flew in by helicopter to appraise the situation. First Lieutenant Jack Adinolfi had assumed command of the company. Members of the company were still mopping up. After summarizing all that had taken place, I rejoined my platoon in the mopping-up operations.

While extending our fields of fire and improving our positions, I found a bunker that was freshly dug and camouflaged. Lying inside the bunker entrance was a dead North Vietnamese officer. Several others were inside. I went over to where "Pappy" Delong was and told him I would be getting him a souvenir, a North Vietnamese officer's pistol. He was pleased.

I returned to the bunker to get the pistol, but as I approached, the muzzle of an AK-47 came out firing. I hit the deck and rolled. The AK-47 disappeared back into the bunker. I had one of my fire teams cover me while I tossed a grenade into the bunker, after which I crawled back to the bunker entrance. Again, the muzzle of the AK-47 came out firing. Playtime was over. I called for the engineers. I told the engineer squad leader to rig me up a satchel charge; that I wanted an entire bag of C-4. The bag contained four packages of the plastic explosive. I knew that when this blew, no one would ever find the pistol but then too, afterwards, this bunker could definitely be considered friendly.

I had the fire team provide me covering fire while I crawled close enough to the entrance to pull the fuse and throw the charge in. As I threw the charge into the bunker and rolled away, the fire team opened up to prevent the NVA from throwing the charge back out. I estimated there to be about seven NVA in the bunker. No one will ever know for sure. When the charge went off, chunks of earth, pieces of bodies, and other debris were scattered all over the hillside.

I went back to where Lt. Col. Delong was sitting and apologized for not being able to get the pistol for him. Nothing that was in the bunker before the blast could be found. I guess I used too much C-4. "Pappy" didn't seem to mind. During those hours from 0400 to 1100 that morning, I witnessed much bravery from many of our troops. One in particular was that of SSgt. David L. Noakes, Platoon Sergeant of the 1st Platoon. I recall him being badly wounded. I ordered him back to the medevac area to be medevaced. Instead, he made trip after trip up near the fighting to bring out the wounded Marines. Then there was PFC Meuse, my first squad radioman. After being hit in the chest, he continued to fight and died in his fighting hole. After finally reaching his position that morning, I stood there for the longest time wishing I could have reached him in time. I remember thinking, "My God, how young he was." Then, too, there was PFC Johnson, who sat upon the side of his bunker eating peanut butter as if nothing were happening, bullets flying all over the place. I thought I had lost him too, but not from wounds. He would later distinguish himself in an assault on a fortified position south of Con Thien.

As night drew closer, we intensified our efforts to strengthen our positions. This could be the night the North Vietnamese division that was moving south might hit. We would be ready.

The status of our positions that night was as follows: Our XO, lst Lt. Jack Adinolfi, had assumed command of the company and was now the company commander. We were without an XO. My platoon was strengthened to 17 men with the addition of one gun team and one rocket team. Our portion of the defense extended from 10 to 2. Second Lieutenant Carroll's platoon would defend from 2 to 6 and 2nd Lt. Eller's platoon would defend from 6 to 10. Second Lieutenant Izenour's 1st Platoon would fill any gaps and constitute the company reserve. Second Lieutenant Carroll's platoon would revert back to Foxtrot Company the following morning. Although sporadic fire continued throughout the night, nothing major occurred and the night passed with no additional casualties.

Morning came and we were anxious to get the hell off the hill. The stench from the NVA bodies was becoming almost unbearable. Beyond us to the north stood Hill 881N.

Approach to Hill 881

First Lieutenant Adinolfi called the platoon commanders together for an operations order in our attack on 881N. We would attack two companies abreast; Foxtrot on the left, Echo Company on the right. We would have both artillery and air support. Since Foxtrot Company would be on the left; they would pass through our position, pick up Carroll's platoon, and move to the designated assault position. Echo Company would follow in trace, tie in with the right side of Foxtrot Company at the assault position and on order, seize, secure and defend the right side of the objective, OBJ 3. Adrenaline ran high, we were chomping at the bit. "Echo 2, you have the point."

Foxtrot Company came up from our rear end and, after coordinating with our Skipper, continued their movement through us. Echo Company followed in trace to a point where we were to turn northeastward and move to the assault position. We would assault northeasterly up the slope, over the ridgeline, turning northwesterly up the ridgeline. We reached the assault position and waited for Foxtrot Company to get in place. Artillery was pounding the hill. Some dropped within 50 meters of us. When we assaulted, we would walk the arty up the hill in front of us. Upon securing the hill, we would readjust the arty onto a high knob to our north about 200 meters.

Finally, the word came to assault and my platoon moved out as rapidly as possible, keeping generally abreast of the platoon on my right. Echo Company was guide company and Foxtrot Company was to guide on us. Foxtrot Company fell behind on my left and was slow maneuvering even though we met minimal resistance. To prevent any decrease in our momentum, we (Echo Company) pushed forward up the ridgeline and over the crest and into a hasty defense. We were already in our hasty defense when Foxtrot Company arrived. My platoon set in from 11 to about 2 o'clock, where we tied in with the 1st or 3rd Platoon. As Foxtrot arrived, I showed the company commander where to tie in with my most leftward position.

There were a few NVA bodies lying around on the hill, which I attributed to the artillery and previous air strikes. Hill 881N was ours. Just to our front stood a peak. It towered over us. Sooner or later, it would have to be taken. It was too late in the afternoon to do it right now. We set about establishing our night defense, plotting our night defensive fires, putting out trip flares and claymore mines, and establishing our listening posts. There was a sense of relief through the company.

Sometime during the night, we were hit with enemy mortars. They fell short but, still, I called in the coordinates of the suspected enemy mortars and counter-mortar fired. There was some sporadic fire during the night to my right and right front. We were being probed. I had specified 50% alert but throughout the night, I found everyone in my platoon awake. The following morning, to our front at about 1 o'clock, we found two dead NVA, one assault machine gun, and one AK-47.

Later that morning, my platoon was pulled off the line to patrol the ridgeline to our rear, east of Hill 881. Golf Company, after securing Hill 861, had continued their attack northward to support our attack on 881N, if necessary. My platoon was to patrol the ridgeline behind them to search out any enemy they may have missed or bypassed. We made no enemy contact but did find another machine gun and one rifle. Hotel Company had reverted to the battalion reserve.

Upon our return to Hill 881N, the company commander called me to his CP to issue me another frag order. This was to take the high peak to our front. I was told by 1st Lt. Adinolfi that Foxtrot Company had tried to take it while my platoon was on patrol but was unable to do so. I thought to myself, "My God, this is unbelievable." Foxtrot Company was virtually unscathed and numbering, with attachments, well over 200 men. I asked for flamethrowers because I knew that if the North Vietnamese were in bunkers, the best way to get them out was with flame.

I called my entire platoon together and issued a five-paragraph order. Normally, I would have issued the order only to my squad leaders and attached unit leaders, but I only had one squad leader. I expected some grumbling and complaining, but instead they cheered. I was so proud of those few men. We would jump off in 30 minutes. We were preparing to move out when we were stopped and I was called back to the CP. I was told we would remain in our positions and let close air pound it with bombs. I must admit I was very relieved. After the bombing runs were completed, it was only a matter of Foxtrot Company walking up and searching it out.

For the next three days, we maintained our defensive positions and conducted vigorous patrolling. On 9 May, both companies Echo and Foxtrot were to patrol in force northwestward of Hill 881N. Foxtrot Company was to patrol northwesterly; Echo Company would patrol westward, then swing northward to our final patrol objective, Hill 803. Intermediate objectives and checkpoints were established, preplanned fires were plotted, and the patrol order was issued. Our patrol would be made up of the 1st and 2nd Platoons, the company CP, and one section of 81 mm mortars. The 3rd Platoon would remain on Hill 881N. My platoon, the 2nd Platoon, would take the point.

We moved out along our assigned route, assaulting each intermediate objective or checkpoint as if it were defended by enemy troops. As we neared our final objective, Hill 803, we could hear Foxtrot giving situation reports to battalion. They first started off with messages such as "Pygmalion 6, this is Foxtrot 6; we have encountered snipers; we have 1 kangaroo (KIA) and 3 wolves (WIA)." In no time, it became "We have 5 kangaroos and 9 wolves" Their problems were becoming larger with every passing moment. The situation was intensifying.

As we came to the base of the hill to our front, I deployed my platoon for the assault and up the hill we went. Upon reaching the top, the platoon went into a hasty defense. I dropped to my belly and took out my field glasses to see if I could determine what was going on with Foxtrot Company. What I saw horrified me. The North Vietnamese were crawling over the men of Foxtrot Company, stabbing what appeared to me as being wounded Marines. Foxtrot Company had been drawn into a saddle along a small ridgeline and couldn't move. I saw the NVA attempt to drag off what looked like a wounded Marine.

I grabbed an M-60 machine gun and determined that a clump of bushes, which appeared to me to be the closest the NVA had got to Foxtrot Company, would be my reference point. I determined that all left of those bushes were dead Marines and NVA. I opened up with a long burst of fire, raking the ridgeline from the bushes to the tree line at the left end of the finger. The range was about 1100 meters. I turned and told the weapons platoon sergeant, SSgt. Benny R. Gavin, to take the other gun, watch my tracers, and rake the finger from the bushes to the left. Our fire was right on target.

Meanwhile, my company commander had come up behind me. He shouted, "Get off the gun, Cannon." "Go to hell," I replied, and kept firing. I meant no disrespect. He had not seen what I had. I knew what I was doing.

After driving the NVA off, I turned the gun over to the gunner, with instructions to keep the NVA off that finger. First Lieutenant Adinolfi was on the radio with battalion. As soon as the radio conversation was over, Adinolfi turned to me and said, "Jim, you're a leader; go pull them out." I answered with, "You're a commander; give me some support."

First Lieutenant Adinolfi informed me that Foxtrot 6 (Fox Company Commander) was hit and that the entire company was pinned down and couldn't move. He said Lt. Col. Delong had told him, "Send Cannon down there but have him be careful and if he gets into it, pull him out." How could I not get into it? The Skipper informed me that artillery support could not be provided because of the close proximity of the enemy to Foxtrot Company.

I turned to Frank Izenour, the 1st Platoon Commander, and asked him to guide me to the base of the finger where the bushes I used as a reference point were located. I always carried a pen flare in my helmet cover band. I would pop one of these every few minutes and Frank could adjust me. He nodded that he would.

I issued a frag order to my platoon and we moved out, down the western slope of the hill we were on, toward the valley floor. We knew it would be rough going and that time was of the essence. The valley floor was a jungle but not as thick as I thought it would be.

Somewhere along the line, we had inherited a combat photographer corporal and before we moved out, he asked if he could go with us. I could use all the help I could get. He grabbed a rifle from somewhere and left his camera behind.

Some of Echo Company were wounded We reached the valley floor in hardly any time at all. I had informed my point to keep me informed as to anything he heard or saw. I had handpicked my point man. I knew he was good. As we moved across the valley floor towards Foxtrot's position, two things kept worrying me. I kept thinking of the possibility that I may have killed some of Foxtrot's men when I was raking the finger to my front with machine gun fire. The second thing was my plan to envelop the enemy's right flank. It could happen that Foxtrot would mistake us for the enemy and fire on us. I changed my plan. I decided to take the high ground to Foxtrot's rear and conduct a frontal assault through Foxtrot Company.

Suddenly, shots rang out to my front. My point had made enemy contact. I halted the platoon until I could ascertain what was happening. I saw my point man as I moved forward. He had two additional rifles slung over his shoulder. They were enemy rifles. We didn't have time to chat about what had taken place, but apparently he had run into two un-alert NVA and killed them both. He pointed to his right. There, as far as I could see, were freshly dug graves. Bloody web gear lay all about.

By radio, I informed Frank that I had changed my mind; that I would be securing the high ground to Foxtrot's rear and to guide me to the base of the high ground. As we reached the base of the high ground, I asked Frank to have machine gun fire delivered on the northern edge of the finger. This would keep the enemy down and provide us with some covering fire. We formed one line and swept up the hill. At the top, I found 2nd Lt. Carroll and three other Marines. Of the four, two had been wounded. It was payback time. I was glad that I could help him and Foxtrot Company. He had helped me so much just six days earlier.

Second Lieutenant Carroll informed me that he and the other three Marines were the only ones who could break out and reach the high ground. Two of them had been wounded trying to get to the high ground.

Meanwhile, back on Hill 803 where I had just left, the battalion commander had flown in by chopper with a skeleton staff, a 106 Recoilless Rifle section, and another 81mm mortar section. They, too, were under fire, from a hill to the north of them. I again asked for support but was denied at the time, because they were under fire. Because of my preoccupation with pulling Foxtrot out, I may have gotten support later and not realized it.

It was time to act. One fire team and one machine gun, along with the combat photographer, would lay down a base of fire over the heads of us and Foxtrot. Two fire teams would assault through Foxtrot. As the assaulting fire teams passed through Foxtrot, the base of fire would shift their fire from the finger to the edge of the tree line. They would cease fire on a red smoke and join us by hand and arm signal. I would be with the assaulting fire teams.

We moved out and the base of fire opened up over our heads. As we passed through Foxtrot, I overheard a big black Marine ask, "Who was that mother fer on the machine gun?" I asked as I passed him, "Why?" He replied, "He saved our asses." I felt relieved. I believe he was a gunnery sergeant.

We passed through Foxtrot Company and opened up with our assault fire. My Marines began to run, firing and screaming across the northern finger. As we neared the tree line, I popped a red smoke. The base of fire ceased. We immediately went into a hasty defense and I signaled my base of fire up. While my platoon sergeant supervised the defense, I radioed Echo 6 to inform him that we had secured the finger. He, in turn, informed me that choppers were on their way to lift us all out. We were all to he helilifted back to Hill 881 N.

When the choppers began to arrive, my platoon protected the hill while Foxtrot boarded. I had a team survey the dead NVA and strip them of their weapons and equipment for use by our S-2 (Intelligence). Foxtrot had 29 dead and 19 wounded. My platoon had suffered no casualties. The enemy had 33 dead and an undetermined number of wounded.

I was the last man off the finger; the last man to board the choppers. The first three or four choppers were able to make it to Hill 881 N, but the choppers carrying my platoon didn't. By the time we reached 881, the clouds and fog were so thick we were unable to land. It was back to Hill 803 for us. After we landed on Hill 803, the battalion CO joined me in my newfound fighting hole. He asked how 1st Lt. Adinolfi was doing. I told him, "Fine." He replied "Great. I was going to give the company to you but since Jack is doing a good job, he'll keep the company." That was fine with me. I was content with being a platoon commander.

"Pappy" asked me what we needed to defend that hill for the night. I told him we had not come prepared to spend the night. For a good defense, we needed a lot more than what we would get. A chopper would fly in from Khe Sanh and bring us trip flares, claymore mines, a re-supply of ammo, including additional 106 rounds and 81mm mortar rounds and grenades. For now, we would have to do with what we had.

The Skipper issued a defense order for the night. In it, he stated that Lt. Col. Delong had asked for B-52's to bomb the valleys west of us. H & I (Harassment and Interdiction) fires would continue all night from our 81 mm mortars and artillery from Khe Sanh. After the order was issued, 1st Lt. Adinolfi and I had a chance to talk. He told me that Lt. Col. Delong had personally fired the 106 into the back of an NVA as the enemy soldier ran up the hill during the action when my platoon was helping Foxtrot.

During the conversation, I asked 1st Lt. Adinolfi, "What are you trying to do, get me killed?" It seemed that my platoon always had the point, was always the assault element, and always occupied the most likely avenue of approach in the defense. I told him if that was the case, let's get it on right now and settle this damn thing. I added that if it was because he had confidence in me and my platoon, I appreciated it. He didn't answer. I would receive my answer months later by mail. I appreciated the letter, his answers, and the rationale on which he based his decisions.

During that night, I experienced one of the most eerie feelings I have ever had. B-52's bombed the valleys to our west. You didn't know they were even up there until you heard the bombs whistling. By then it would be too late for those below. It wasn't until after the explosions that we heard the sounds of the jet engines far away. They were that high. Incidentally, it was that night that the NVA division moving southward would bypass us and overrun Lang Vei, killing or capturing most of the defenders. After a hairy night of strong easterly winds, constant firing from our 81mm mortars, flares drifting softly and slowly from the skies above, the distant thunder of our artillery, and the screaming of B-52 bombs raining down on the valley below, the fog which had settled in the valleys around us began to dissipate. The sun shone beautifully. It would be a magnificent day.

First Lieutenant Adinolfi summoned his platoon commanders and other key personnel together to brief us as to what we were about to do. We would expend all unnecessary ammo on possible enemy positions, avenues of approach, and suspected enemy bunkers. We would move out in company column back to Hill 881 N, where we would be helilifted back to Khe Sanh, spend the night, get a hot breakfast, and then be helilifted back aboard ship to resume our role as the SLF (Special Landing Force). And wouldn't you know it — 2nd Platoon, you have the point."

LANCE CORPORAL FREDERICK G. MONAHAN
UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS

for service as set forth in the following CITATION:

For extraordinary heroism while serving as an Intelligence Scout with Company E, Second Battalion, Third Marines, Ninth Marine Amphibious Brigade in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam on 3 May 1967. During Operation BEACON STAR, while deployed on a small hill complex south of Hill 881 in the vicinity of Khe Sanh, Lance Corporal Monahan's company came under intense mortar and automatic weapons fire and hand grenade attack from an estimated battalion of North Vietnamese Army forces. Lance Corporal Monahan positioned himself between the command post and the attacking enemy. After repeated vicious attacks, the enemy penetrated the perimeter and had advanced to within twenty meters of the command post when he boldly launched a fierce single-handed assault with rifle fire and hand grenades. With complete disregard for his own safety, he fearlessly exposed himself to hostile fire to direct accurate rifle fire on the enemy. Although painfully wounded by grenade fragments, he repulsed repeated enemy assaults, killing the determined enemy soldiers in hand-to-hand combat as they attempted to overrun his position. With exceptional courage and fortitude, he kept the numerically superior North Vietnamese pinned down for more than two hours until reinforcements arrived at daylight. Steadfastly maintaining his position, he guided the relief force into position and skillfully directed their fire against the retreating enemy. By his intrepid fighting spirit, exceptional fortitude and gallant initiative, Lance Corporal Monahan served to inspire all who observed him and contributed in large measure to the success of his unit in repelling the attackers. His great personal valor reflected the highest credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

In the name of the President of the United States, the Commanding General, Fleet Marine Force, Pacific takes pleasure in presenting to

Second Lieutenant James Roscoe Cannon
United States Marine Corps

for service as set forth in the following

CITATION:

For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action while serving as a Platoon Commander with Company E, second Battalion, Third Marines, Ninth Marine Amphibious Brigade in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. In the early morning hours of 3 May 1967, Second Lieutenant Cannon's Platoon which was responsible for the sector of the company defensive perimeter covering a critical avenue of approach near Hill 881, came under intense small automatic weapons and mortar fire from a numerically superior North Vietnamese force. Despite the heavy fire around him, Second Lieutenant Cannon courageously moved among his men consolidating and skillfully reorganizing his unit's position in order to prevent the enemy from penetrating his command post. On several occasions, he personally engaged the enemy in hand-to-hand combat, driving back repeated attempts by the North Vietnamese to overrun his position, killing numerous enemy soldiers. Subsequently, he fought his way to the command post, informed his company commander of the tactical situation in his sector and assisted in coordinating the company's defensive positions. After the enemy attack had been repulsed, Second Lieutenant Cannon organized his unit and aggressively led his men in searching out the enemy, routing them from their positions and inflicting heavy casualties on the North Vietnamese force. In large measure, due to his inspiring leadership, determined fighting spirit and bold initiative, the perimeter defenses were quickly reestablished. His Platoon, although suffering numerous casualties, remained an efficient fighting unit. By his courageous actions, exceptional professionalism and selfless devotion to duty at great personal risk, Second Lieutenant Cannon upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

V.H. KRULAK

Big John Pessoni Secretary

Notes from the Reunion Committee

After reviewing comments from the membership at the Dallas Reunion, the reunion committee has decided to limit the number of off-site activities at the Chicago Reunion. Many members have suggested more activities at the hotel, rather than activities requiring group travel. In response we have decided to hire our own transportation. These mini-buses will be operated by veteran Police Officers who have volunteered their time and are very familiar with Chicago and surrounding communities. This transportation will be available day & night, for small or large groups of members who wish to visit the many sites that the City of Chicago has to offer. They will drop off and pick up members at regularly scheduled sites, as well as personal requested visits to other sites not on the regular schedule. Each day the vehicles will make scheduled trips to shopping areas, museums, amusement parks, famous Chicago landmarks, and restaurants. There will be a one-time fee of $10.00 assessed with the registration fee for this transportation.

We have one group trip planned for Friday the15th of July to Navy Pier. Here there are a myriad of activities on this peninsula that extends into Lake Michigan, from shopping and a fun amusement park. It is one of Chicago's main tourist attractions. This trip will include a three-hour boat ride with dinner and dancing along Chicago's beautiful skyline. Shopping and free time will be from 12:00pm-6:00pm. The boat ride will be from 7:00pm-10:00pm. The boat docks directly along Navy Pier. Members are encouraged to sign up for this event at the reunion. Members can pay at the pier for this event.

Note from Chairman, Membership & Publishing Committee

With your magazine you will find new pages for your membership directory with changes since November 2004. There were over 300 changes in that short period of time, so you can see why it is important to immediately inform me when there are changes in your personal records (address, phone, email). If you know the location of any member who has moved and who has left no forwarding address per listing, please inform me so we may get them back on the mailing rolls.

Editorial Note

Although our Red Clay magazine has almost exclusively published stories and articles pertaining to our experiences at Khe Sanh, we have made the decision to dedicate a new section of this publication to our brave young men fighting the war in Iraq. So much misinformation has been reported concerning the actions of these young warriors that we felt obligated to publish true stories of their heroic actions. Most of these articles have been sent by our own Khe Sanh veterans, who brought them to my attention.

Note from Editor

Everyone says how much they love our magazine. At the risk of sounding like a broken record, we need more personal stories. You will note that we are having to go "outside" of Khe Sanh for our stories to fill our magazine. This is not our wish. Sometime back I went up on the message board and asked for stories. I received promises that have not been fulfilled. As I stated on the message board, your musings on the message board only last a couple of weeks then they are gone forever. Our magazine will be kept by Texas Tech and other schools "forever." We are a historical society. Do your part. Tell your story.

Book Review – Con Thien: The Hill of Angels

Reviewed by Lt Col. Kenneth W. Pipes, USMC (Ret)

With this sterling book, Captain Coan, Marine Tanker, wounded Vietnam Veteran and combat leader of many battles fought against the experienced and professional North Vietnamese Army in and around "The Hill of Angels," has arrived as a riveting and knowledgeable Marine Corps historian! In my opinion, with the publication of this detailed and well researched work, he joins a small, elite band of Marine authors, who expand the grasp and understanding of a confusing period of the Marine Corps heroic battles in the far northern provinces of South Vietnam!

Unlike most authors, Captain Coan made a bold and commendable decision early in his organizational research period. He would focus his research on the continuing Battles of Con Thien within a four-grid-square area and include all units, operations and major combat actions. Thus, everything that occurred in this arbitrary zone from 1967 until 1969 when the area became the responsibility of the South Vietnamese is included. Major operations in this time period in and around Con Thien will be more than familiar to those that fought and survived these fierce battles: Prairie III, Prairie IV, Hickory, Cimmarron, Buffalo, Kingfisher and Kentucky to mention just a few of the major actions! Marine casualty totals, when viewed in this correct manner are staggering: over 1400 Killed In Action and 9,200 wounded in action.

Impressively, the author's decision moved his writings from personal recollections, which is the format of many books written about Vietnam, to an all encompassing and well documented historical overview of major events surrounding the titanic struggles between our Marines and the NVA for control of this key piece of terrain. Consciously and commendably this approach highlights the individual courageous actions of Marines — from PFC to company grade officers. You will recognize the names of and remember many of these stalwart Marine warriors. I sure did! Details that you may not have known become rhyme and reason for the saga of Marine courage and tenacity — in any clime and place! Rightfully so, few senior Marine Field Grade or General Officers are mentioned. The war in Northern I Corps and their civilian counterparts neither tactically nor strategically was something many of them could nor should be proud of!

Documented here and in the recently published book, "Khe Sanh, The First Battle of the Hills," are the terrible screw-ups regarding the M-16. Though they were wrong, very senior Marines in Vietnam and Headquarters Marine Corps blamed the Marine Infantrymen for not cleaning their weapons properly and their combat leaders for not correctly supervising this necessary combat evolution. They were terribly and tragically wrong in their assessments and testimony before Congress! It was they who were negligent for not giving their last full measure of devotion in defense of their Marines against these dastardly and cowardly accusations! Marines were fighting and dying as they repeatedly and successfully executed Regimental and Division orders — orders that precluded our attack into NVA artillery, staging and marshalling areas just to the north of the Ben Hai River. Few senior civilian or military leaders were as willing to go into the breach for their Marines or Soldiers. As Captain Coan documents, the Marines on the sacred ground in and around Con Thien did not have this luxury! Like their French Foreign Legion predecessors, they marched and died, while their senior civilian and military leaders were generally not willing to place their careers in jeopardy by fighting for necessary life saving changes to the convoluted rules of engagement and failed strategy!

Captain Coan's research moved the stories of the murder of Marine prisoners of war by the NVA from the realm of rumor to fact. The skinning and nailing of bodies to trees, desecration of our dead and wounded by unspeakable mutilation have all been moved from the shadows into the harsh light of day! Was it better that this information was kept (to the extent possible) out of hands of the Marines on the ground? You who were there have your own opinions! Personally, speaking as a rifle company commander at Khe Sanh during the Siege, we and our Marines had a need to know this information!

This outstanding historical writing builds upon the groundwork laid by the Reverend Ray Stubbe and others who have written similar works about the many battles in and around Khe Sanh. The operational battles of Con Thien and Khe Sanh frequently changed names. The reality is that only the name of the operation changed. The committed forces on either side remained much the same, as they were funneled into and out of these meat grinders. Captain Coan's commendable research approach documents the terrible cost in Marines and Soldiers killed, maimed and wounded. Remember: 1419+ killed and 9265 wounded in a two-year period within four grid squares of the "Hill of Angels." It should come as no surprise to those who buy this book that some of the units that fought at Con Thien were then sent to Khe Sanh for the "Battle for the Hills" and "The Siege," before returning to the never ending struggle for control of Con Thien. As we used to say with great justification, "one good deal after the other!"

For the serious historian and Vietnam Marine and Army Veterans who survived the carnage in Northern I Corps, this outstanding book is an absolute must buy! When the reader adds Captain Coan's superb book to "Khe Sanh, The First Battle of the Hills," they will have a nearly compete picture of this trying and demanding time in our Marine Corps history. For our professional cadre of NCOs and officers, the long running fiasco of our experience in that time and place became a template for how not to fight a war. These Marines, who were later to occupy senior positions in our Corps, changed the way we would conduct our future war fighting! Out of the dismal failure of members of the "Greatest Generation" in Vietnam arose the success of Desert Storm and the initial success of the second war with Iraq! With its publication, Captain Jim P. Coan deserves only the highest praise for his book and has earned the support of our loyal Corps of readers! Well done, sir and congratulations!

Captain Coan is an active member of the Khe Sanh Veterans.

Memorial Notes

Representing the Khe Sanh Veterans, I attended the funeral of James Storc of A Co 3Rd SP, who died after a fight from cancer. James was a gifted athlete and played softball (16-inch Chicago-style), most of his short life. The many people paying their last respects came from all walks of life: former Marines, police officers and motorcycle enthusiast. James was a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans. I met him at the reunion held in Chicago in 2000. Although he lived a short distance away, I never really got to know him. While paying my respects, I discovered that I was a few years older than Jim, but we grew up in the same neighborhood and had the same childhood group of friends, who greatly admired him. What a small world. Jim leaves two young twin daughters and a lovely wife and will be missed by all. His two best friends, Joe and Jim Krzak, both former Marines, called Jim "The Colonel." Both said; "Our country lost a hero, and we lost our brother and best friend. We will miss him dearly."

John Noon writes that John W. Greene was a true friend and a great Marine, who could have been removed from a combat zone after receiving 3 Purple Hearts. He refused because he promised John Noon's mother, that he would watch over him. While keeping that promise, John was KIA after the tank he was riding on struck a mine during a combat operation. John Noon still thinks about his friend every day.

David P. Leitch was an international news reporter that was with the Khe Sanh Veterans during the battle of Khe Sanh. His articles focused on the life conditions of the men. His articles reflected a great concern for our welfare. He often spoke to me, and related the agony he still felt for those who endured at Khe Sanh. He was a Life Member of our organization. Two of his writings on Khe Sanh were printed in the book Deadline, Collected Journalism (published in London by Harrup in 1984, "Inside Khe Sanh," pp.6-13; and "Khe Sanh-Two," pp.20-24).

Father Thomas S Stott passed away 18 Jan 2005. Tom served two tours as a corpsman in Vietnam with G Co 2/26, 67-68 and B Co 1/7 in 1970. Tom became a Catholic priest and served several churches in North Carolina. He was a loyal Khe Sanh Veteran and will be missed by all. Our condolences to his loving family.

Help the VA Help You?

by Patrick G. Brady

To Those Who Served:

We are at WAR and have a medical system in the Veterans Administration that is in crisis. Care is a disaster as it tries to put a patch on the dam holding back old problems, along with current problems, and make adjustments for perceived future problems. It is time to step back and look at what is working and what is not. All of our VA Medical Centers are affiliated with a University Medical School, which use us veterans to train their interns and residents. In past years, some within the system had the foresight to set up accredited fellowship programs that granted physicians Board Certification in a particular specialty, such as cardiology, endocrinology, neurology, radiology, neuro-radiology and spinal cord injury and so on. It used to be that these physicians would have to commit to so many years of service within the VA to gain access to these programs but as years passed, these programs were slowly eliminated as not being cost effective.

What they failed to realize was that in doing away with these programs, they did away with a source of future specialists and thus put the load on the staff on hand. Through attrition, we now find ourselves in the CRISIS we are in today. Nursing had similar programs with either a two-year nursing program at community colleges, four-year programs from the universities, or nurse-assistant programs that were set up at the high school level which, upon completion, gave the individual a General Education Equivalency Degree — all at local VA facilities. This was seen by some as being too expensive and that is why we have staffing problems in some facilities today. We need to renegotiate our affiliations with the universities and create through Congressional incentives, if necessary, a return to these types of programs for the facilities that do not have them.

The cost of it will be far less in lives lost due to poor care. Currently, good physicians are stressed to the limit. I stress the fact that these programs be accredited as this is the only way it would end up being an asset to the Veterans Hospital System. There is no reason why we should not have an accredited fellowship program in every Veterans Medical Facility in every specialty that the facility has.

I ask that you copy this and send it to your local Congressmen and Senators.

On page 52, the caption at the bottom of the picture of the KSV Board of Directors, incorrectly has Bob Mills listed. It should read Robert Moxley. Sorry, Bob.

No Greater Love Hath a Man

by Joyce Greenwood

In July of last year I had the opportunity to attend the Khe Sanh reunion with my husband in Irving, Texas. The men and the stories they shared was an experience for me that I would like to share. My husband is a proud Marine who served in the deadliest battle (77 days under constant siege from the North Vietnamese) in the Vietnam War's history.

My weekend experience with these brothers (Marines) changed my way of thinking forever. I will never understand what they went through. I wasn't there. They were. However, I can now understand what they meant when some Marines are called the "walking dead." Our men all gave the ultimate sacrifice for all of us.

When we arrived at the Omni Hotel there were groups of men sitting together, and there were those who sat alone with a blank stare. We gathered for the reception that afternoon, and my husband met another Marine who served in his same unit. This individual had been bayoneted eight times and was presumed dead. He was placed in a body bag. But, medical personnel noticed movement in the bag — he was still alive! He is a living testimony of someone who was determined to live despite his injuries. At the same gathering was another veteran who was also cared for by his nurse. This Marine is paralyzed from the neck down and can only move his eyes. My husband and I acknowledged him with a smile and a pat on his arm. He responded with a beautiful smile.

Another veteran walked in with no hands, the lower portions of both arms were gone. That reminded me of a quote, "I complained I had no shoes, until I met a man with no feet." This was the veteran who carried in the Marine flag during the ceremony that evening.

The evening ceremony began with the salute of flags. After the prayer the various flags — Army, Navy, Air Force, and the Marine — were carried in by their respected veterans. The veteran with no hands carried the Marine flag. He struggled to carry the flag, but he did it. All the brothers saluted him and shouted their hoorah! You would have to have been there to experience that salute, and the grunt of the Marines in unison. I asked my husband how they knew to shout at the same time. He said that it was the sergeant's tone of voice and training he had had as a Marine. I noticed that when the flags were being carried, all the veterans stood at attention. An Indian veteran at our table who was crippled and somewhat bent over, stood tall and tears came from his eyes as he watched his brother struggle to carry the flag. Another veteran had to hold up his right arm with his left arm during the salute. His arm had been re-attached, and he could not use it.

The highlight of the evening was the presentation of the medals to various veterans. A soldier, who had just returned from the Iraq War a week before, was present and he gave an update on the war. He carried in a helmet and lit the candle for the "Missing Man." He asked for our understanding. It was going to be hard for him to talk of the war because he had not yet talked about it to anyone. He asked for a moment of silence for one of his brothers who took the hit and was killed. He said it should have been him, but instead his brother had shielded him. This was an emotional time for some of the veterans present. I observed very few cried — most had only blank stares and looked at the floor. I, along with other veterans' wives, were the ones who cried silently.

We wives were honored and presented a sterling silver necklace with a medicine wheel emblem and the letters "KS"' inscribed in the middle of the emblem. The officer said that if the significant others had not been there for their men, who knows where they would be now? Our young men were rejected when they returned from the war. Some did not fit into the mainstream of society. Instead, they used drugs and booze to soothe their pain and injuries. This is the sad reality of war. Today, many veterans isolate themselves and are homeless, or sit in institutions because of no support system at home. Our society is ignorant and does not understand what sacrifices our men endured for our freedom.

As I observed these men and heard their stories, I thought of the appropriate scripture passage which says: "No Greater Love hath a man than he would lay down his own life for his brother." I said this to myself every time a medal was presented to a veteran.

This experience made me realize that even if some of our veterans may not have the visible scars on the outside, they have scars on the inside. War is so ugly a word. It changes the lives of our men who fought and are still fighting today so that we may enjoy our freedom. I am sure that if my husband's mother were alive today she would say: "My son is not the same person he was when he left for the war."

These brave men gave the ultimate sacrifice when they went to war to fight for our freedom. With this in mind, as Veteran's Day approaches, be mindful of this. Don't take this day for granted as just another day. Show your utmost respect for those veterans you meet. Say a silent prayer for those families who were not as fortunate as us who had our loved ones return from the war.

Our Roving Ambassadors Do It Again

by Ron Shouse

Here we are for another great Veterans Day celebration. A day off, with picnics, parties, football, and beer drinking. I remember when it was just another day — like November 11, 1967. Back then, some of us probably thought absolutely nothing about the importance of it. Little did we know that this was the last Veterans Day that some of our brothers would ever celebrate, and within a little over two months we would all experience what is our bond to each other and a big page in the History of Vietnam.

For years, I tried to forget the 'Nam and did not celebrate this holiday for our Brothers. But alas, I kept seeing some of them on a regular basis in dreams and thoughts and found out later that I have PTSD. I try to remember the good things we did and the laughs we had, rather than the things that all of us would just as soon forget. If we do not remember the Brothers we lost, they will be forgotten. This is the reason that I volunteer for veterans programs in my community. I know we were taught to NEVER VOLUNTEER, but if somebody doesn't step up, it will not get done. I belong to Post 290 of the American Legion. We do the military funerals, parades and any other patriotic programs for our community. So here I am, the tallest guy in the squad (as all of you can tell), out front to give the command for the 21-gun salute for our fallen heroes at the dedication of the Veterans Memorial in our local park. This monument dedication was for the City of King, County of Stokes, in North Carolina. The theme was "ALL GAVE SOME — SOME GAVE ALL." I wonder who suggested this? A few years ago when I was part of a dedication at another memorial, I sent in pictures and wrote to say "Gentlemen, raise your glass, this one is for YOU." Now I say "Gentlemen, raise your glass, because this one is for THEM."

Lands of Russia Ministry
Cadence International

by Dr. David L. Meschke, Chaplain 1/26 Khe Sanh

PURPOSE – To proclaim the gospel of Christ and disciple believers in the military communities (military forces and their families, retired military, and civilians working in the military community) in nations of the former Soviet Union.
STRATEGY - Cadence International is partnering with the Union of Evangelical Christians-Baptists (UECB), a well-established and growing evangelical church in countries of the former Soviet Union. Working together, we identify within their churches former military personnel who have biblical training and who sense the Lord's calling to minister to their military forces and communities, which as yet do not have official military chaplaincies. The UECB assigns these men and their wives to do military ministry, with Cadence providing them prayer support, financial support, and encouragement.
CURRENT STATUS – Our first selection and supporting of military workers took place in Belarus in early 1997, then followed in Ukraine and in Russia during 1998. Additional workers have been appointed each year since then. At the present time, a total of twenty nine national workers are working full-time in military ministry in Russia, Belarus and Ukraine, together with their wives, supported financially by praying donors who provide them funds through Cadence International.

In addition, God has brought Alex and Isabel Jaruchik to serve alongside Dave and Betty Meschke in this unique Cadence ministry. Alex is well known among believers in the former Soviet Union, having translated Dr. J. Vernon McGee's radio program "Through the Bible" into Russian language for twenty-five years. Alex now prepares Bible teaching radio programs which are aired four times weekly by Far East Broadcasting Company, targeting military people in the Lands of Russia. Alex also serves as Dave's translator when they visit our workers in Russia, Belarus and Ukraine.

Military people and their family members are coming to Christ, being baptized, and then being discipled in the Christian faith. Many Bible studies are being conducted. Churches have even been organized in military villages (we would say "military housing areas") adjacent to military bases, and some of them have already acquired their own houses of prayer (we would say "church buildings"). Over three hundred thousand Gospels of John have been distributed by our military workers.
ADDITIONAL SPONSORSHIP NEEDED – Will you prayerfully consider helping to sponsor one of our workers, by prayer and financial support? Financial support for these national workers varies from $200 to $300 monthly, depending on the size of their family and their geographical location. We have several workers who still lack a portion of their support, and we have recently appointed additional new workers for whom we have only a small amount of support. Support in any amount will be appreciated. You may make your check payable to "Cadence International," and send it to P.O Box 1268, Englewood, CO 80150, together with a separate note that your gift is for support of one of our Lands of Russia workers.

Thank you and may God bless you.

Biography

Dr. David L. (Dave) Meschke is the former General Director of Cadence International, the mission known for its first forty years as Overseas Christian Servicemen's Centers, or OCSC. Dave is the founder and leader of Cadence International's "Lands of Russia Ministry," evangelizing among the military forces and families in nations of the former Soviet Union.

Dave was reared in a Christian home in southern Minnesota and trusted Christ as his Savior at the age of twelve. He received his formal training at

Oleg, Nastya, Vadim, Mikhail, guest Dick Barnes and Dave

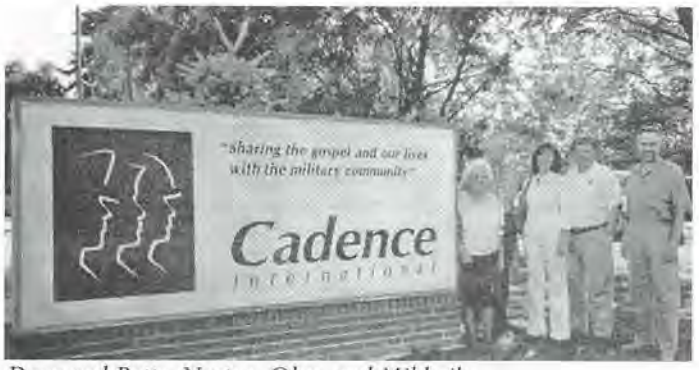
Wheaton College and Dallas Theological Seminary. Following ordination and a short pastorate in Oklahoma, he was commissioned a Navy chaplain in 1957 with the endorsement of IFCA International.

During twenty-one years of active duty service in the Navy, Chaplain Meschke served more than eight years in ships, aboard Destroyer Squadron 26, USS AJAX, USS CORAL SEA, and USS PROTEUS. Much of this time was spent at sea in the Caribbean and Western Pacific areas. He served at Navy bases in Tennessee, Illinois, Florida, California and Rhode Island, and at Marine bases in California and North Carolina. He also served with a Marine combat infantry battalion (1 8t Battalion, 26th Marines, Fifth Marine Division) in the Republic of South Vietnam for one year.

Dave left active duty with the Navy in 1978 to become the General Director of Cadence International. Founded by Jesse Miller and other former GIs in 1954, Cadence now numbers 250 missionaries who lead ministries in some sixty locations near military bases in Korea, Japan, Philippines, Cambodia, Thailand, England, Germany, Italy, Spain, and sixteen states in the U. S. including Alaska and Hawaii.

Dr. Meschke also served from 1981 to 1994 as leader of the military chaplaincy program for IFCA International, known now as Bible Churches Chaplaincy. During those years the number of their chaplains serving in the Armed Forces more than doubled. Dr. Meschke has served in other offices of IFCA International, including the office of National President from 1993 to 1996.

After leading Cadence International for seventeen years, Dave relinquished leadership of the mission in 1995 to pursue gospel ministry to the military forces of nations of the former Soviet Union. To date these nations do not have official military chaplains to carry on religious ministries. He has established a partnering relationship between Cadence and the largest evangelical Protestant church body in these nations. American donors to Cadence are providing prayer and financial support for twenty-nine former Soviet military men and their families, mostly former officers, who are now engaged in evangelistic outreach to their own military forces in three nations of the former Soviet Union, Russia, Belarus, and Ukraine. Dave has made twenty-one ministry trips to these countries, providing training and encouragement, as well as financial support, to those national workers.



Dave and Betty, Nastya, Oleg, and Mikhail

In 1950 Dave married his college sweetheart, Elizabeth ("Betty") Warren, of Oak Park, Illinois. They now live in Centennial, Colorado, near Denver. They have five adult children, one of whom is serving in Christian ministry, fifteen grandchildren, and four great grandchildren.

In 2003, Dr. Meschke was awarded the Honorary Degree of Doctor of Divinity by the Rocky Mountain Bible College and Seminary, located in the Denver area, for his forty-six years of faithful ministry to the military forces of America and of other countries.

March 2003. Sitting on a split bamboo floor in a house on stilts, sipping fresh green tea with Chief Nai in the village of Ruong after a day hike up Hill 881S with the Chief and one of his villagers guiding us, it is hard to imagine the danger and destruction of the area in March 1968 — unless you were there back then. As Ray Stubbe wrote after viewing a picture of my wife and I on the slope of 881S in March 2003, "Who would have thought that a man and his wife would one day stand in a place that once was so dangerous." But we did, and we have decided to return the Chief's hospitality by raising money to build a community library for his village and other villages in the area.

Chief Nai's village is nestled in the valley by the stream below Hills 689 and 881S. He returned to the area in 1972, and today his village numbers about 400 people. In May 2004, my wife and I visited with him again. This time we went specifically to ask him what we could do to help his village. Chief Nai replied that his village has a school, a water purification system, a hospital, and a road was being built; he really didn't need anything else!! But his village does not have a library.

The library that we are building is fully equipped and staffed for one year, and it will also serve the community as a social gathering place. Approximately half of the books will be about unexploded ordnance and landmine safety. The land for the building will be cleared of unexploded ordnance, and landscaped when the building is finished. A librarian will be hired and trained. The cost is about $7000 dollars, and our first library project has been fully funded by my wife and I and our family and friends.

My wife and I are working with Chuck Meadows, Executive Director of Peace Trees Vietnam, Inc. (COL, USMC, Ret.; Commanding Officer, Golf Company, 2nd Battalion, 5th Marines in the battle of Hue City, February 1968). We are looking for others who will help build another library in the Khe Sanh area. Maybe there are members of the Khe Sanh Veteran's Association who would like to build for the future in Khe Sanh today. Perhaps some of the Khe Sanh veterans would like to build a library in memory of some buddies. For myself, I am not only returning the hospitality of Chief Nai, but I am continuing to help the people in the Khe Sanh area in a way that I could not in 1968 or 1969. My wife is a humanitarian at heart, and I am proud to have her as a partner in this project.

If anyone would like to join my wife and me in our community library project, you may send your contribution to Peace Trees Vietnam at the address on the brochure, and mark it for the "Khe Sanh Library Fund." Locations for future libraries, when funded, will be based on needs assessment by the local authorities and agreement with Chuck Meadows and his Peace Trees Vietnam staff. We expect to work throughout Quang Tri Province, and be we are focused in the Huong Hoa District, of which Khe Sanh is the capital I forgot to mention that on our second visit to Chief Nai, after the fresh green tea, he served his own locally prepared rice wine. He said it was 50% and not as strong as that of the next village over which has 65%. Now that was an honor and an experience I will not forget for a long time!! As a matter of fact, I am looking forward to returning to his village to see the library, and I am wondering what Chief Nai will do then.

Hal Croft, K Co 3/3

A poem with a reason but no rhyme

A few yards from the top of 861
Pinned down in a deep, dark fog,
So deeply dark we could only touch and hear.
Hearing dying, wounded marines
Hearing NVA taunts

Crawling toward his garbled groaning
I grasped a taught leg as his voice
Drew fire from the darkness.
A Marine wrenched back and forth
Bleeding from a sucking chest wound.

I pulled a poncho over us
Lit small light to set our stage.
He wheezed as a square of poncho
Seemed to stop the bleeding as hours
That were minutes passed.

The black marine whispered his way to death.
And I rolled away to a hole
And passed into a jealous sleep
While sticky blood dried on my hands
The fog kept me alive for tomorrow.

The fog faded to a gray dawn.
Three black Marines with bare backs
Bandaged white faced the far tree line
Bought time as I bandaged a corporal
Stunned by shrapnel and shock

More mortars, more shrapnel, more shock
The corporal was dead.
Hueys strafed the top of the hill
More time for the few who could walk
To drag the dead down.

My burden had no face
Feeling only his boots, I never looked back.
But felt the thumping of his head
Like a sledge slamming my chest.
A final thump at the LZ.

I spat at a chaplain who told us
"Good job."
Hands crusted with dried, brown blood
Had done no Agood for the black PFC,
The Corporal, or a faceless Marine.

'Twas the night before Christmas and I was on alert
My perimeter was secure with trips set in the dirt
The fog was playing games with me and images appeared in my brain
The jungle grass was making noises I could not explain.

As I strained to see what was in front of me.
Not a mouse or NVA but an ape was staring at me.
I called on the phone to the CP
Shoot the thing it don't matter to me.

My sight was true-my aim was clean
I couldn't pull the trigger
Being Christmas eve
Off he went up a tree — then he did spot me.

He waved and said to me Merry Christmas
So you don't believe, this tale—
It's my tale and I'm sticking to it.
To all a good night.

Tom,

I returned to Vietnam in 2000 with VVRP (Vietnam Veterans Restoration Project). We worked on three projects — 2 in North Vietnam and one in Quang-Tri, near Dong Ha. I went to Khe Sanh and could only observe one small airstrip. Khe Sanh and Vietnam will always be part of our lives. I plan on going again someday. I enjoy Red Clay very much. I am paying for a Life Membership.

Hi Tom,

Having served at Khe Sanh with MCB-4 and being a member of the KSV is indeed an honor. I proudly carry my KSV Life Membership card with me at all times. I have been trying to learn the identity of a Marine lieutenant that also had the responsibility for us Sea Bees as well as his own Marines. He was quite a handsome guy and always looking out for his men and the Seabees who built their bunkers.

He once went on R&R to Danang. He returned with soap, shaving gear, and a lot of other goodies. Our Seabee hut was located near the ammo dump & supply pit, near the old stone tower. During our first mortar attack, I remember all 13 Seabees cramming into a 20-foot slit trench that did not even have a roof. During the attack, this lieutenant came running by and stopped and inquired if we were all okay, without any regard for his own safety. He became an immediate friend to all us Seabees.

I remember on another occasion I observed a dog near the wire by the old tower. He looked like he was foaming at the mouth. I asked what I should do and was told, "Shoot it!" I did and never thought this little act would become a little mini-drama. In the first place, I learned that you do not shoot a dog suspected of having rabies. And you do not shoot a dog that turned out to be the mascot of another group of Seabees in an adjacent hut.

I went from being just another green inexperienced EO Seabee to a hated Dog-Killer. It also brought a few nights of having tear gas grenades tossed at our hooch, by other equipment operators. We also had to have a refrigerator brought up to Khe Sanh to store rabies vaccine. These memories are not much, but I would really like to find out the name of that lieutenant. I heard he was killed leading a patrol in 1967. If that is true I would like to contact his family and express my undying gratitude. He touched so many of us with his acts of kindness, and I would like his family to hear of his unselfish acts. If anyone has any information I would appreciate any help.

KSV in Iraq

An Interview With Cal Bright, KSV, B Co 1/26 now working in Iraq

by James Wodecki

How did I get here, and what qualified me for this job? I was hand-picked along with several others in the middle of 2003. We were picked for certain qualifications per our resume along with job descriptions, prior military status, and performance ratings.

Cal Bright, ready to go

We were all carefully screened for this assignment. Several were disqualified for various reasons. The list went from around 25 to less than 12. We were rated. I finished third. The top 5 were given various tests and TDY assignments and schooling for further evaluation. I did not get picked until March of 2004. In July, I was sent to school in Los Alamitos, CA for basic military training; to HQ DLA for advanced military systems training; to DDC (virtual call center) for another week; and finally to CRC at Ft. Bliss (replacement/staging center) for preparations for deployment to Iraq. I flew from Ft Bliss to Bangor ME, then to Weiszbach, Germany, Arifjan, Kuwait, and finally to Baghdad, Iraq. Flying time took 27 hours with stopovers for refueling.

My position here in Iraq is as a multi-class expeditor, senior material management specialist, equipment specialist, item manager, federal stock class technician, 1-800 technician on everything the military uses, plus what ever else they can add to my job position/title, including gopher. I work 12-hour days, 7 days a week with no days off. I have been working daily since 1 August and will continue until I leave in February 2005. I will return the first of March for my second tour, which will go to the end of June. Hopefully I will make it back in time for the reunion in Chicago.

Entertainment here is scarce. We have a complete gym, and you can jog around the base for exercise. We have a BX/PX (large and small) open 24/7, free laundry, large mess halls with everything you can possibly want to eat. I still managed to lose 15 lbs., walking around and riding the stationary bike. I walk wherever I go, but only on base. You are not allowed off base without armed escort. We do have a recreation center where movies are shown. There is a pool, but with 10,000 people on the base, there is always a long wait. We work 12-hour shifts with breaks for dinner. We sleep in a mobile trailer with five other people. It is very cramped and not comfortable.

My base pay has been lifted so I can earn as much as I want. Being a civilian, I am entitled to overtime, hazardous duty and shift pay for working after 6pm, and double time for Sundays. I get paid every two weeks, my usual 80-hour work pay along with 86 hours of overtime.

My job allows me to travel at least once a week. I go armed — usually with an AK, 870 shotgun, or M-16, and go out for a day or two.

There are many jobs available here — mostly high risk, high paying security jobs. If the guy is currently on military status, he cannot apply until he is discharged. There are many security agencies begging for outside help. Currently they are hiring non-US citizens as well. Leaf through a Soldier of Fortune magazine and search the want ads. For my position, you need to apply for a civil service position and wait your turn, which takes a lot longer than the security agency jobs.

Cal showing off to Iraqi workers

If you want to become a civilian contractor (security), don't go it alone. You can end up on the wrong end of a chopping block. You cannot trust any local Iraqis, Jordanians, Syrians or Iranians. They will not hesitate to kill foreigners seeking jobs. Think long and hard before coming here just for money. I don't recommend it. The tour for a security guard is usually at least 18 months, often longer in most cases.

Q. Those RPG's — are they the same they used in 'Nam on us and what are they doing with captured caches of weapons from Fallujah and other places?

A. The RPG's are pretty much like our LAWS. In Vietnam they had the B40 rocket. Here RPG's are a little bigger, more deadly and a bit more accurate. Most of the weapons recovered by US Forces are redistributed among the Iraqi Security Forces. Much of it finds its way back to the streets, where it is again used by the enemy. The desertion rate here is much higher than it was in Vietnam. When the insurgents attack an Iraqi force a lot of them just run or join in the attack. Sometimes it makes you wonder who you are really supporting.

Q. Are there any similarities between Khe Sanh and Iraq?

A. There are a few, but not many, unless you are on the so-called front lines. One big difference is the suicide bombers. They are everywhere, and they are getting more sophisticated, learning from Hamas and the PLO. You cannot travel on any highway or road (off base) in relative safety. You must be armed, must travel in pairs, or travel in convoy. I travel exclusively with a Marine escort, if I travel off base. I never go with less than 5-7 Marines with me when traveling. It is not like when I was in 'Nam. I actually feel I'm in a POW camp, and we are the armed guards as well.

Q. Are the women prettier than the Montagnard women?

A. You don't fraternize with the local women. Most of them are already spoken for (as in married) (mostly pre-arranged). I have seen several up close and NO THANKS! I have not seen one truly foxy local woman. On the other hand, many of our female soldiers and civilian contractors are nice looking. But, for every good looking woman, there are at least 10 men around them, so I just stay away. It isn't worth the hassle. Almost all locals working on base are Iraqi men. Contracted women are from all over the world, Philippines, Jordan (interpreters), India, South America, Australian, Turks, British, and American.

Q. In the picture, those supplies look a mess, how do you find anything?

A. I was able to find many pallets of cargo destined for the agency I work for. Others were marked for another group, but I beat them to it, so we got another skid of water. I was able to load up a 40ft low boy trailer with no room to spare with equipment that I found.

Cal with fellow workers

Q. Big John Pessoni, wants to know how he can get a pair of those brown boots, size 13. He says they look comfortable are they?

A. I'll take my 'Nam jungle boots over these any day. These wear out in no time. Mine are wearing thin on the heel already and I've only had them since August. Tell Big John they aren't worth it, unless you get the ones that are standard issue for the special ops people. I don't have those, at least not yet.

Q. Can you send us back a captured RPG or some other souvenirs for the reunion?

A. You want an RPG, you better take a number. I would want a few first. By the way, you did notice what I was carrying in the photos. That is Mr. Ivan.

Q. Are you the old man there? Does anyone ask your advice?

A. I am actually younger than many Soldiers/Marines and Airmen over here, so I don't get asked, at least not before the local Marines found out I was a 'Nam vet .They really had questions when they found out I served at Khe Sanh. Today's Marines are just like we were — young mostly, tough and ALL ITCHIN for a FIGHT.

Q. In 'Nam, we had sappers hopped up on drugs. Are those suicide bombers on drugs?

A. The sappers in Vietnam were different from the ones here in Iraq. These guys actually think (no drugs or alcohol needed) that when they blow themselves up, they are going to a better life and will be with Allah. The former regime along with the PLO, Syria and Iran will pay their relatives up to $25,000 for each one who gets blown up. They have no problem getting volunteers. They have their opium and hash but for the suicide bombers, there is no need.

Q. Thanks, Cal, for the interview. We hope to see you at the reunion in Chicago next summer.

Publisher Note: PJ & Jimbo Wodecki sent supplies to Cal. Here is his response to their generosity:

Thank you so much for the two boxes of goodies. They just showed up this past couple of days and already are almost gone. The Marine security guard also says thanks for the pocket knives and D-ring key chains. Hmmmmm... Marines and knives! Interesting combo!

The attached Christmas cards were nice to receive and I couldn't believe that someone took the picture of me and Short Round. That picture means a lot to me, and I'm sure it means as much to Short Tound.

I have been real busy traveling lately, down into the Green Zone and out to Baghdad for the past week. It appears I will be transferred there sometime soon, not sure when. I will be working on station with the people I've been supporting for the past two months. They already have my desk, sleeping quarters and provisions ready for me, just waiting for the signal to go. When I get back, I can give more details, but right now I can't. It was like when I worked in the Choi Hoi out of MACV — only tell you just enough to get your interest

Still doing 12-hour days, 7 days a week. We had Thanksgiving off. I believe my next day off will be Christmas. Not so bad, two days off this year since the first part of August. We still are taking incoming, only averaging 3-10 rounds a day. A big difference from Khe Sanh. Camp Victory South is about 4 times the size of the Khe Sanh combat base, so to me, it's nothing. I just go about my business without interruption while a bunch of these guys even some of the older ones run scared. I just laugh. Well, enough for now. Again thanks, guys. We'll meet in Chicago. I found out that I'll be able to get back home the end of June, so the reunion will be no problem. So take care and stay in touch. THANKS SEMPER FI!!

News From Iraq

Dear Dad –

Just came out of the city and I honestly do not know where to start. I am afraid that whatever I send you will not do sufficient honor to the men who fought and took Fallujah. Shortly before the attack, Task Force Fallujah was built. It consisted of Regimental Combat Team 1 built around 1st Marine Regiment and Regimental Combat Team 7 built around 7th Marine Regiment.

Each Regiment consisted of two Marine Rifle Battalions reinforced, and one Army mechanized infantry battalion. Regimental Combat Team 1 (RCT-1) consisted of 3rd Light Armored Reconnaissance Battalion (3rd LAR), 3rd Battalion, 5th Marines (3/5); 3rd Battalion, 1st Marines (3/1)and 2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry (2/7). RCT-7 was slightly less weighted but still a formidable force. Cutting a swath around the city was an Army Brigade known as Blackjack. The Marine RCTs were to assault the city while Blackjack kept the enemy off of the backs of the assault force. The night prior to the actual invasion, we all moved out into the desert just north of the city. It was something to see. You could just feel the intensity in the Marines and Soldiers. It was all business. As the day cleared, the Task Force began striking targets and moving into final attack positions

As the invasion force commenced its movement into attack positions, 3rd LAR led off RCT-1s offensive with an attack up a peninsula formed by the Euphrates River on the west side of the city. Their mission was to secure the Fallujah Hospital and the two bridges leading out of the city. They executed there tasks like clockwork and smashed the enemy resistance holding the bridges. Simultaneous to all of this, Blackjack sealed the escape routes to the south of the city. As invasion day dawned, the net was around the city and the Marines and Soldiers knew that the enemy that failed to escape was now sealed. 3/5 began the actual attack on the city by taking an apartment complex on the northwest corner of the city. It was key terrain as the elevated positions allowed the command to look down into the attack lanes. The Marines took the apartments quickly and moved to the rooftops and began engaging enemy that were trying to move into their fighting positions. The scene on the rooftop was surreal. Machine gun teams were running boxes of ammo up 8 flights of stairs in full body armor and carrying up machine guns while snipers engaged enemy shooters. The whole time the enemy was firing mortars and rockets at the apartments. Honest to God, I don't think I saw a single Marine even distracted by the enemy fire. Their squad leaders, and platoon commanders had them prepared and they were executing their assigned tasks.

As mentioned, 2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry joined the Regiment just prior to the fight. In fact, they started showing up for planning a couple of weeks in advance. There is always a professional rivalry between the Army and the Marine Corps, but it was obvious from the outset that these guys were the real deal. They had fought in Najaf and were eager to fight with the Regiment in Fallujah. They are exceptionally well led and supremely confident. 2/7 became our wedge. In short, they worked with 3rd Battalion, 1st Marines. We were limited in the amount of prep fires that we were allowed to fire on the city prior to the invasion. This was a point of some consternation to the forces actually taking the city. Our compensation was to turn to 2/7 and ask them to slash into the city and create as much turbulence as possible for 3/1 to follow. Because of the political reality, the Marine Corps was also under pressure to "get it done quickly." For this reason, 2/7 and 3/1 became the penetration force into the city. Immediately following 3/5's attack on the apartment buildings, 3/1 took the train station on the north end of the city. While the engineers blew a breach through the train trestle, the Cavalry soldiers poured through with their tanks and Bradley's and chewed an opening in the enemy defense. 3/1 followed them through until they reached a phase line deep into the northern half of the city. The Marine infantry, along with a few tanks then turned to the right and attacked the heart of the enemy defense.

The fighting was tough as the enemy had the area dialed in with mortars. 3/5 then attacked into the northwest corner of the city. This fight continued as both Marine rifle battalions clawed their way into the city on different axis. There is an image burned into my brain that I hope I never forget. We came up behind 3/5 one day as the lead squads were working down the Byzantine streets of the Jolan area. An assault team of two Marines ran out from behind cover and put a rocket into a wall of an enemy strongpoint. Before the smoke cleared the squad behind them was up and moving through the hole and clearing the house. Just down the block another squad was doing the same thing. The house was cleared quickly and the Marines were running down the street to the next contact. Even in the midst of that mayhem, it was an awesome site. The fighting has been incredibly close inside the city.

The enemy is willing to die and is literally waiting until they see the whites of the eyes of the Marines before they open up. Just two days ago, as a firefight raged in close quarters, one of the interpreters yelled for the enemy in the house to surrender. The enemy yelled back that it was better to die and go to heaven than to surrender to infidels. This exchange is a graphic window into the world that the Marines and Soldiers have been fighting in these last 10 days. I could go on and on about how the city was taken but one of the most amazing aspects to the fighting was that we saw virtually no civilians during the battle. Only after the fighting had passed did a few come out of their homes. They were provided food and water and most were evacuated out of the city. At least 90-95% of the people were gone from the city when we attacked.

I will end with a couple of stories of individual heroism that you may not have heard yet. I was told about both of these incidents shortly after they occurred. No doubt some of the facts will change slightly but I am confident that the meat is correct. The first is a Marine from 3/5. His name is Corporal Yeager (Chuck Yeager's grandson). As the Marines cleared and apartment building, they got to the top floor and the point man kicked in the door. As he did so, an enemy grenade and a burst of gunfire came out. The explosion and enemy fire took off the point man's leg. He was then immediately shot in the arm as he lay in the doorway. Corporal Yeager tossed a grenade in the room and ran into the doorway and into the enemy fire in order to pull his buddy back to cover. As he was dragging the wounded Marine to cover, his own grenade came back through the doorway. Without pausing, he reached down and threw the grenade back through the door while he heaved his buddy to safety. The grenade went off inside the room, and Cpl. Yeager threw another in. He immediately entered the room following the second explosion. He gunned down three enemy all within three feet of where he stood and then let fly a third grenade as he backed out of the room to complete the evacuation of the wounded Marine. You have to understand that a grenade goes off within 5 seconds of having the pin pulled. Marines usually let them "cook off" for a second or two before tossing them in. Therefore, this entire episode took place in less than 30 seconds.

The second example comes from 3/1. Cpl. Mitchell is a squad leader. He was wounded as his squad was clearing a house when some enemy threw pineapple grenades down on top of them. As he was getting triaged, the doctor told him that he had been shot through the arm. Cpl. Mitchell told the doctor that he had actually been shot "a couple of days ago" and had given himself self aid on the wound. When the doctor got on him about not coming off the line, he firmly told the doctor that he was a squad leader and did not have time to get treated as his men were still fighting. There are a number of Marines who have been wounded multiple times but refuse to leave their fellow Marines. It is incredibly humbling to walk among such men. They fought as hard as any Marines in history and deserve to be remembered as such.

The enemy they fought burrowed into houses and fired through mouse holes cut in walls, lured them into houses rigged with explosives and detonated the houses on pursuing Marines, and actually hid behind surrender flags only to engage the Marines with small arms fire once they perceived that the Marines had let their guard down. I know of several instances where near dead enemy rolled grenades out on Marines who were preparing to render them aid. It was a fight to the finish in every sense, and the Marines delivered.

I have called the enemy cowards many times in the past because they have never held their ground and fought, but these guys in the city did. We can call them many things but they were not cowards. My whole life I have read about the greatest generation and sat in wonder at their accomplishments. For the first time, as I watch these Marines and Soldiers, I am eager for the future as this is just the beginning for them. Perhaps the most amazing characteristic of all is that the morale of the men is sky high. They hurt for the wounded and the dead, but they are eager to continue to attack. Further, not one of them would be comfortable with being called a hero even though they clearly are. By now the Marines and Soldiers have killed well over a thousand enemy. These were not peasants or rabble. They were reasonably well trained and entirely fanatical. Most of the enemy we have seen have chest rigs full of ammunition, are well armed, and are willing to fight to the death.

The Marines and Soldiers are eager to close with them and the fighting at the end is inevitably close. I will write you more the next time I come in about what we have found inside the city. All I can say is that even with everything that I knew and expected from the last nine months, the brutality and fanaticism of the enemy surprised me. The beheadings were even more common place than we thought, but so were torture and summary executions. Even though it is an exaggeration, it seems as though every block in the northern part of the city has a torture chamber or execution site. There are hundreds of tons of munitions and tens of thousands of weapons that our Regiment alone has recovered. The Marines and Soldiers of the Regiment have also found over 400 IEDs already wired and ready to detonate. No doubt these numbers will grow in the days ahead. In closing, I want to share with you a vignette about when the Marines secured the Old Bridge, the one where the Americans were mutilated and hung on March 31 this week.

After the Marines had done all the work and secured the bridge, we walked across to meet up with 3rd LAR on the other side. On the Fallujah side of the bridge where the Americans were hung there is some Arabic writing on the bridge. An interpreter translated it for me as we walked through. It read: "Long Live the Mujahadeen. Fallujah is the Graveyard for Americans and the end of the Marine Corps."

As I came back across the bridge there was a squad sitting in their Amtrac smoking and watching the show. The Marines had written their own message below the enemy's. It is not something that Mom would appreciate but it fit the moment to a T. Not far from the vehicle were two dead enemies, lying where they died. The Marines were sick of watching the "Dog and Pony show" and wanted to get back to work.

Two More Heroes

by Sam Messer

This is what Marines do, and always have done. They are your neighbors, the kid who delivers your paper, the cop who protects your block, the high school football star. They are the best: the few, the proud. They lay down their lives for their country. They don't deserve mocking; they deserve to be honored and thanked.

Please read this article about a Marine who sacrificed his life for his comrades in Fallujah:

Marine Sacrifices His Life for Others in Grenade Blast

by Gordon Trowbridge

Fallujah, Iraq Sgt. Rafael Peralta built a reputation as a man who always put his Marines' interests ahead of his own.

He showed that again, when he made the ultimate sacrifice of his life Tuesday, by shielding his fellow Marines from a grenade blast. "It's stuff you hear about in boot camp, about World War II and Tarawa Marines who won the Medal of Honor," said Lance Cpl. Rob Rogers, 22, of Tallahassee, Fla., one of Peralta's platoon mates in 1st Platoon, Alpha Company, 1st Battalion, 3rd Marine Regiment.

Peralta, 25, as platoon scout, wasn't even assigned to the assault team that entered the insurgent safe house in northern Fallujah, Marines said. Despite an assignment that would have allowed him to avoid such dangerous duty, he regularly asked squad leaders if he could join their assault teams, they said. One of the first Marines to enter the house, Peralta was wounded in the face by rifle fire from a room near the entry door, said Lance Cpl. Adam Morrison, 20, of Tacoma, who was in the house when Peralta was first wounded.

Moments later, an insurgent rolled a fragmentation grenade into the area where a wounded Peralta and the other Marines were seeking cover. As Morrison and another Marine scrambled to escape the blast, pounding against a locked door, Peralta grabbed the grenade and cradled it into his body, Morrison said. While one Marine was badly wounded by shrapnel from the blast, the Marines said they believe more lives would have been lost if not for Peralta's selfless act. "He saved half my fire team," said Cpl. Brannon Dyer, 27, of Blairsville, Ga.

The Marines said such a sacrifice would be perfectly in character for Peralta, a Mexico native who lived in San Diego and gained U.S. citizenship after joining the Marines. "He'd stand up for his Marines to an insane point," Rogers said. Rogers and others remembered Peralta as a squared-away Marine, so meticulous about uniform standards that he sent his camouflage uniform to be pressed while training in Kuwait before entering Iraq.

But mostly they remembered acts of selflessness: offering career advice, giving a buddy a ride home from the bar, teaching salsa dance steps in the barracks. While Alpha Company was still gathering information, and a formal finding on Peralta's death is likely months away, not a single Marine in Alpha Company doubted the account of Peralta's act of sacrifice. "I believe it," said Alpha's commander, Capt. Lee Johnson. "He was that kind of Marine."

Another great Iraq SITREP from the CO, Task Force 2/24, call sign "Mayhem 6," Lt. Col. Mark A. Smith, USMC

Semper FIDELIS! Don.

Well, the New Year is upon us...and it is my most sincere hope that this letter finds all of you in high spirits for the blessings that surely will abound in 2005!

The New Year was welcomed by the Mad Ghosts in BIG fashion. We were part of a brigade-size operation, with our "newest, best buddies" from the 2 Brigade Combat Team and Colonel "Fighting' Mike" Formica, as we forayed into previously unchartered territory along the Euphrates River. This was the largest operation to date for the Mad Ghosts and was a "full-up" round consisting of helicopter-borne assault, mechanized assault and motorized assault. It involved virtually every element of the battalion. And, our brothers in the ING were tasked, for the first time, to operate in a field environment for an extended period of time (a task they performed extremely well, I might add!) The mission was precise: establish a cordon of the area and locate Anti Iraqi Forces (AIF) and capture them, and to disrupt their seemingly never-ending supply of ammunition and explosives, with which they fight their cowardly war of IEDs and VBIEDs. Now, with all the moving parts, there are about a gazillion things that could go wrong. NONE did! The Mad Ghosts and our brigade partners were flawless in execution. They swept into an area, coming from 360', in the middle of the night, via helos, trucks, HMMWVs, tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles and at H Hour plus 20 minutes, a stretch of land approximately 16 km long by 10 kilometers wide was cordoned and owned by elements of the Mad Ghosts and the 2 BCT. Many Iraqis woke that day to a situation they had never seen! The systematic search was begun, and approximately 48 hours later, almost 100 insurgents had been identified and incarcerated and an unbelievable amount of cached weapons and explosives had been located and confiscated. Two VBIEDs were located that were in the process of being equipped with their explosives and were destroyed. This was all accomplished through a massive "team" effort, and I would like to recognize some key players:

1. The Marines of the Engineer Platoon from Virginia. They hunt weapons caches like a dog hunts squirrel. Their tenacity in search techniques has ensured hundreds of explosives that saw their life cycle completed through a safe and controlled detonation at the hands of the engineers, rather than at the trigger of a fanatical Muslim seeking a one way trip to Virgin-land. I will never be able to say enough about the performance of these Marines and the unbelievable amount of work they have accomplished for this battalion. And, more importantly, I will never be able to say thank you in any manner of sufficiency for the number of lives they have saved! But, you know what? If you could see the light in their faces when they find a cache...I think they get all the thanks they ever wanted.

2. The Marines of the Truck Platoon from Pennsylvania. Now understand, these Marines are from Truck Co, 4th MarDiv, and as such are designed to be a "tactical" asset used primarily to maneuver fighting Marines to the combat zone. However, reality of counter-insurgency requires that they also be used in a combat service support role: picking up mail, repair parts, etc. These Marines have been tireless in their support and have logged some of the longest hours known to man. And for this operation, they seamlessly transitioned into Warrior mode, and delivered hundreds of Marines to the fight, at night, with night vision goggles (NVGs) and did so without incident. They also are on the Lt. Col. Smith List of Never-Ending Thank Yous.

3. HET 9 (Human Exploitation Team). These Warriors come from all over the Marine Corps, active and reserve, and are the ones who do the field interviews of our persons of interest. Simply said: they are the best in the Marine Corps, and all of Iraq. This group of Warriors has produced more intelligence, saved more lives (both in the Mayhem AO and outside) than any intelligence asset in the war. They are remarkable, sleepless, and define "dedication to duty." CWO2 Murphy, their OIC, was a casualty in October after being shot in the foot, and they have pressed on under the leadership of M/Sgt. Ertz in a manner that is nothing short of inspiring. Please allow me one second to digress: Murph, you should swell with pride and tears right now, for YOUR Marines have been spectacular...and a testimony to your leadership and preparation. (Oh yeah, and don't think for a second you are not in for a rash of — about your letter home following your injury describing your "ambush dance"...skip, shoot, duck, shoot, hop, shoot, swim with the fishes, shoot, etc., etc., etc.)

4. The COC Marines. COC stands for Combat Operations Center. These are the Marines that run the command and control systems. The radios and computers that on the modern digital battlefield are indispensable. Each of them does the work of 3 people, run long shifts and ensures the situational awareness and report/process execution that is critical in this counter-insurgency. For an operation like this one, I had both my forward COC and my Main COC in operation, and they were brilliant in their execution. They are and will always be the "unsung heroes" of the Mad Ghost deployment. (And for me personally, Cpl. Kostyn and L/Cpl. Blackford were a source of humor, the importance of which just cannot be understood unless you have attempted to command in a high stress environment. But for those who have, and for those who will, you will cherish the uncanny humor of such Marines...they helped to sooth the savage beast that is Gy/Sgt. Engram!!!)

5. The fighting Marines of Fox, Echo, Golf and Weapons, who take precision violence to the enemy, and a spirit for victory that knows no equal! H&S Co, who provides the security and support to all these operations, and conducts much of their own patrolling, and "hunting" of the Muj, and who have taken our FOB and turned it into a fortress. The Marines of this last paragraph are the Bn proper, and no Commander has ever had the privilege of leading a better one. My duty is their mission accomplishment and welfare...and my duty has been my honor. Now, with all of that said, let me finish by telling you the best part of the story of this Operation, which was code-named: Operation River Walk, for it goes without saying, we cannot do anything without a "code name." It is just what we do, code names and acronyms. As successful as this Operation was, it like all others, shapes us for future operations. The hunt will go on and ELECTIONS WILL OCCUR.

I have stopped watching the news from the US totally. I no longer can take the maniacal rages it places me in as I swear ungentle man-like profanities at the TV in my dust-covered cubby-hole of an office, directed at "pundits" and "experts" who do not, in my very humble opinion, have a single clue and who report every single incident that occurs here as if they are color commentating on a football game. Well, I can barely fog a mirror intellectually, but I think I know a thing or two about this war thing, and the vast amount that I don't know, I have certified geniuses like Major Dan Whisnant and CWO5 Roussell to teach me. And what I know...war is a slog. And a counter-insurgency fourth generation war is definitely a slog. The only weapon the enemy has IS the MEDIA, and the target is YOU! They are attempting to win this War by breaking your will. I pray that will not happen. Because...and this is the moral of the story, the best part of the story of Operation River Walk is what we discovered about the people. You see, our belief going into this operation was that this part of our Western zone (which we had not been able to foray into much due to other commitments) was the heart of a massive AIF insurgency, replete with popular support and headed by Wahabiists (yes, the very people who brought you the slaughter of 9/11). We found many of the Wahabiists and their caches. They are now headed to Abu Ghraib and their caches destroyed. But the people...no, what we found among the people was MUCH support for the US and what we are doing here. We found a genuine desire to live free and to ELECT who they want, not who the Imams and terrorists want. See, what we found is what we always find: a majority of people being intimidated, terrorized and oppressed by a radical, fanatical and clinically INSANE few.

We found people who want us to finish this fight, no matter how long it takes, and who were genuinely appreciative of our efforts. HUH, a little different than what you hear out of NY and Washington newsrooms. Gotta tell you, would love for my Marines to actually meet these "fighters who are resisting a foreign invasion of Iraq," because they might actually fight the way Soldiers do. NO, what we meet time and time and time again, is radical Muslim extremists whose sole goal is the defeat of America and the spreading of their brand of medieval thinking that abhors technology, enslaves women, cheapens human life and seeks the establishment of their brand of religion, or death. So I say, let all the national media talking heads rave on. Rave on about every single act of insurgent violence and trumpet it as some massive blow to the MNF effort. Rave on about how we are losing. Rave on, as if you really care about any of what you are spewing. Just, Rave On. The ground truth is known by those actually on the ground.

And for those on the ground, we will win, we will bring freedom and democracy to a land that has NEVER known it, and we will suffer and sustain the hardship required to do it. We will do it and we will take the time required for such a massive effort in a world that wants a "drive-through window" war. We will do it in the spirit and with the best example we have: the spirit of 1776, when freedom and democracy was also brought to a land that had NEVER known it, a land that would become known as THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. We will win because, although the violence is a huge part of what we do, ultimately this global war on terror will be won by ideas. And YOUR Mad Ghost, YOUR Marine is the best example of what the best idea in the history of mankind has to offer. Their never ending decency and compassion has lit, and will continue to fuel for the people of Iraq what freedom is truly all about: respect, dignity, hope, love and a personal quest to find meaning in YOUR OWN WAY! For this, 10 of my most prized possessions and reason for my existence gave their last full measure of devotion, on the battlefields of Iraq, and for this, WE rave on!

May God Bless and Keep the families of 2/24...and may we all offer a special blessing on the families of our fallen heroes... and those of our wounded who struggle daily, particularly Regina Simon as she prays beside the bed of SSgt. Chad Simon, and is a beacon of strength and grace for us all. God especially be with you, Regina, and your wonderful husband Chad.

Woodbridge Marine's Wounded Comrade Couldn't Save Him

by Ian Shapira Washington Post Staff Writer

Tuesday, November 23, 2004; as friends and relatives bade farewell to Lance Cpl. Brian A. Medina yesterday at Arlington National Cemetery, one mourner laid his crutches on the ground and put his fists on top of the silver casket carrying his comrade. Cpl. Andrew Ethridge, 23, leaned over, put his forehead on his fists and began crying. Gregory Medina, the father of the dead Marine, stood next to Ethridge, patting his back. "He was devastated and he was feeling that it was his fault, and I was telling him that it wasn't," the elder Medina said after the service. "He was saying: 'Sorry, I did what I could, I am sorry, I could have saved you.' " Cpl. Medina, 20, of Woodbridge was killed Nov. 12 in Anbar province, Iraq, one of two Washington area Marines to die there that day, according to the Pentagon.

Ethridge said in an interview that Medina had gone inside a gated home in Fallujah searching for weapons and was killed by insurgents' automatic gunfire. Ethridge, who was part of a team of Marines behind Medina's, heard the shots ring out and charged toward the house to save his friend, but he was felled by a bullet to his right leg. "I knew that with the amount of fire that was coming out [of the house], no one could escape that," said Ethridge, who roomed with Medina on Okinawa just before they were deployed to Iraq in September. Recalling how it felt to lie wounded, unable to reach Medina, he said: "I was just thinking that I couldn't get to him and that it was weird how getting shot didn't feel like I expected." Yesterday, about 75 mourners, including high school friends and teachers from Prince William's Gar-Field High School, paid their last respects to Medina, who had joined the military because of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "He wanted payback. Something about that day hit home with him," said Medina's father, a construction inspector from Woodbridge and a former Navy Seabee. "But when he got to Iraq, I thought maybe he jumped into this too fast."

Medina was assigned to the 1st Battalion of the 3rd Marine Regiment, which is part of the 3rd Marine Division, 3rd Marine Expeditionary Force, based in Hawaii. He joined the military after graduating from Gar-Field High in 2002, his father said. Yesterday's funeral was preceded by a Catholic service at the Post Chapel, where the Rev. Robert McClanahan, surrounded by a U.S. flag and lighted candles, told mourners that the measure of a life should be taken by the quality of the years, not their number. Small one-page programs with a photograph of the Marine dressed in his uniform were passed out to mourners. Excerpts of great works and maxims were printed on the back. The first one, under the headline "Brian's Legacy to His Friends and Comrades," quoted the famous lines from Shakespeare's "Henry V": We few, we happy few, we band of brothers. Medina was laid to rest near the cemetery's columbarium, in the first grave of a new row, in front of soldiers killed in Iraq and Afghanistan. Gregory Medina, who sat next to his ex-wife, Lolita Converse of Newport News, accepted the U.S. flag. Medina was the 93rd service member killed in Iraq to be buried at Arlington National Cemetery. He left behind three siblings, Jennifer, 19, Patrick, 11, and Andrew, 8, and a stepsister, Stephanie Converse. Harriett Rowe, a guidance counselor at Gar-Field High School who attended the funeral, recalled how Medina was well known for more than being an ROTC member. Medina, it turns out, was a sweet break-dancer. He learned the acrobatic hip-hop dance style while living in Italy with his mother during his first three years of high school. When he returned to the United States to live with his father during his senior year, Medina started a break-dancing club at Gar-Field. "When he started spinning on his head, I said: 'Brian, hold off. I don't think you should do that. I am not ready for you to break your neck,'" recalled Rowe, who was the club's adviser. "But he was real good and serious about it because he wanted to learn and wanted to teach." And people don't understand why I Love You Marines !!!

My Son, The Soldier, Comes Home for Good

by Milton McNeely

An email forward that must be shared with you all. May our Lord Eternally Bless the Soul of this Soldier and all those who fall and have fallen protecting their Mates, Family and our Nation! Semper Fidelis, even unto death! Happy Thanksgiving, my friends. That we have such sons... and fathers... as this, is something to be truly thankful for. God bless all our boys, and their families. And may God bless and watch over my boy in Afghanistan on his third tour in a combat zone.

From Colonel Tom Sims (US Army Retired): My son, the soldier, comes home for good.

At last report, he had left Iraq and was awaiting a flight in Kuwait. With luck he will be in Germany today and then on to Texas. By the way, he is called "remains" but I know better. He is my son.

I want to tell you about him. Not because he is so great a guy, although I think so, but because he represents the thousands of sons and daughters America is sending to far away places to secure our peace and our liberties at home. Captain Sean Patrick Sims, commanding officer of A Company, 2-2 BN, 1st Infantry Division, was killed in action Nov. 13 in Fallujah, Iraq while clearing insurgent occupied buildings. A tough assignment, clearing an urban area. Dirty, dangerous work. Sean lost his executive officer the day before, and I read of the deaths of two Marine captains who were similarly killed in Fallujah.

It is sad when a father must write his own son's obituary. I don't know what to say. My son, like others falling in that conflict, was a hero who believed in his mission, his unit, and his men. He also believed leaders should be in the front leading, not following. And that is how he died. He was well liked and respected by his superiors and the men in his company, who sensed his concern for their well being. He was also concerned about the well being of the Iraqi people and did his utmost to guard them from harm. Sean was a devout Catholic, who lived the tenets of his faith on a daily basis. There is no doubt in our minds that Sean is now in heaven and in the hands of our Lord. We grieve for his loss, which is our loss, but not for his soul. If anything, we ask his intercession on our behalf as he is now much better placed for that effort.

I don't know what to say or how to describe the sacrifice of your blood for this country. Having served in Vietnam twice, having a father who spent 36 years as a soldier through two wars, and a brother who served in Vietnam twice and is now 100% disabled from his injuries there, I am encouraged by the awareness of our countrymen for the sacrifices of our children. I am thankful for the realization by our citizenry that freedom is not free.

My son was not a rampant political supporter for any party, although he was probably more Republican by instinct. But he did have an abiding trust, and belief in the United States of America. He felt we are a moral nation, steadfast in our principles. This nation does not take its commitment of its sons and daughters to war lightly. But unlike many nations in the world, we do not shirk our duties to commit our blood to just and necessary causes. Because that is what keeps us free.

I think he understood something which seems to have been lost in the debates over weapons of mass destruction and poor intelligence estimates in this particular war. That is that sovereign nations must be held accountable for their actions. We cannot tolerate nations that hide behind borders and provide support to enemies who are intent on our destruction. We can debate on how this war developed and was executed. It can not be debated that nations now look carefully at their responsibility and accountability before providing such support. America has made its statement. If you support terrorism, we will find you and destroy you, whatever the cost.

My son understood this and believed what he was doing was right. But he also believed that you can't go in and destroy a country and walk away. He was anxious for the insurgents to be quickly defeated so we could start the nation-building that Iraq so sorely needs. He chafed at the delays and the debates in implementing aid. He was not a romantic. He understood well the backwardness of the country, the stranglehold of its religion and more challengingly, the social and political pressure of the tribal system. They all looked insurmountable when you add them up. But he had been raised in a tradition of grit and putting one foot forward at a time, so he was not deterred by the challenge. He was faced with a difficult, dirty and seemingly impossible task, but his response was not how do I get out of it but how do I get it done.

I think his sacrifice to his nation can best be summed up in a message I received from a friend expressing condolences for his loss: His sacrifice was made to keep my family, my sons and my grandchildren as well as all Americans safe and free and for that we will eternally be grateful. That's nice. My son would agree. That's what he thought he was doing. In retrospect, the true hero here is his wife, who is left a young widow with a young son to raise. She is a woman of grace and grit. She will do well by her son and her warrior husband.

Regards,
Tom Sims

Khe Sanh Memories

Khe Sanh was so very long ago to me,
They now even have tours there for all to see.
No incoming, no trenches, no body bags at all,
Not even brave warriors would not let it fall.
Time passes, we get older, and memories begin to fade,
Unfortunately, the ghosts stay with us every day.

Eternally Bonded

Twenty Seven seconds for each mortar to fall.
From Hill 881N. "Incoming" we did call.
Twenty-seven years and the echo is still there.
Those haunting memories, sometimes so hard to bare.
Our lives go on, the older grayer we become.
But we remain Eternally Bonded, equally as one.

David "Doc" Steinberg

Where DOCs Come From

by HM2 David "Doc" Steinberg

I don't know how many enlisted in the U.S. Navy specifically to become a corpsman. I was in my 3rd year of college as a Psychology major at a University in Chicago, tired of fighting the SDS (Students For a Democratic Society, an organization that disappeared along with the anti-Vietnam protests once the draft was replaced by the birth year lottery...it must not have seemed so important once their butts were safe from the draft.) My Navy recruiter said that with my background I would surely end-up as a corpsman on a psych ward in a Naval hospital, far from that thing going on in Vietnam, which was just heating up in those early months of 1966.

"Doc" Steinberg at Khe Sanh

I joined the Navy to serve as my father did for 4 years during WWII. I joined the Navy since my Uncle, for whom I was named, 1st Lt. David Steinberg, USMCR, was killed at Iwo Jima. To join the Marines would have been too painful for the family. I joined the Navy because I had 4 years of high school Army ROTC, attaining the rank of captain and winning a high school letter for being part of the Precision Rifle Drill Team that won the State championship. After those years of spit and polish, I refused to ever wear a uniform that had brass and needed to be shined with brasso (still cannot get that smell out of my nose to this day.) I joined the Navy because I entered as a HN Hospital Corpsman or E-3 right out of boot camp because of my college credits.

In June of 1966, I took my oath while standing on the 3rd baseline at the Chicago Cubs Wrigley Field ball park. The Cubs Team was lined up along the 1st baseline. Our gaggle of Navy enlisted, were called the Chicago Cubs Company. Our families where invited to watch us take our oath and we were allowed to join them watching the baseball game before we said our good-byes in the stands and promptly boarded awaiting Navy buses for the Great Lakes and Boot Camp that lasted 8 weeks.

My knowledge of precision rifle drill and marching automatically put me in the position of ROPC, Recruit Petty Officer Chief (drill instructor complete with sword and responsibility for our Recruit Company). We won all the honor flags and I marched the company to all classes and required tests (smoke house, gas chamber, swim tests 1-4, etc.) You know I never qualified for swimming, since I never was tested. Once I marched my men to the pool I was yelled at to get my men into the water by the numbers. Once the last group jumped in, I was yelled at to get to the other side of the pool and get my men out of their *#% pool building.

On the last day of Navy boot camp, the men got their striker assignments throughout the Naval Fleet and on-shore operations. The Corpsmen were sent to Hospital Corps School for another 4 months. We learned medicine and healing from Navy nurses and doctors. We gave saline injections to one another as practice, and we laid out stretchers and practiced using field dressings and preparing for evacuation of the wounded, or sick. We were taught how to keep those aboard ships and on the ground safe from injury and disease through sanitation and preventive medicine (although nothing said about supervising the burning of the half barrels from the shitters.) The good news was that there were women. I mean Waves, those of the opposite sex, who were in our classes. The bad news was that we were competing for academic awards throughout Hospital Corp School and while I did place third, the first 2 places went to women.

On the last day of Hospital Corps School, we were assigned to our new duty stations — some to ships, some to Naval and Marine bases and others immediately to FMF or Fleet Marine Force training to serve the Marines in combat. Wherever our assignment was, the training we received was adequate and professional. It was said to be equal to a 2nd year med student's and all were prepared to "Do Our Best" which is all we ever could do in times of peace or combat.

I spent the next year at St. Albans Naval Hospital, Long Island, NY. It was a big hospital and I served on many types of wards and clinics before being accepted to Operating Room Technician Training (setup the surgical suites, prepare and sterilize the instruments, circulate and scrub surgery) where you had to know the numerous surgical procedures as well as the surgeons, if you were to pass the proper surgical instrument at the proper time. We did surgery for combat and non- combat injuries and for all the retired and military dependents from all branches of the military.

I was actually seeing the end of the story I was about to live. These Naval Hospitals were where the combat wounded I later treated on Khe Sanh's Hill 881S for more than 3 months, and later in the bush along the Perfume River near Hue, and the triple canopy jungles off Hill 55 SW of Danang would end-up; that is, if they survived my field medical treatment, helicopter medevac to an in-country Medical Battalion, transfer to a Hospital Ship or NSA, Danang and then on to Japan, etc.

This is also where I saw the real tragedy of war. Not the loss of life or limb, but the reality of our fighting men and women returning to the "World." Many of the amputees did not realize the true extent of their life-changing wounds until they arrived at the hospital where they were to finally be reunited with their loved ones again after their trip to hell and back. Remember that once wounded, the future amputee was in a daze with immediate surgery of the limb — if beyond all hope or following unsuccessful debridement, uncontrolled infection and subsequently, the decision to sever the limb was necessary to save the life of the wounded person. Following months of surgery, stump revisions and getting around on crutches or in a wheel chair on some Ortho Ward in many places along the way back to our Naval Hospital, they remained with other amputees in the same circumstances. They joked around, played games and raced down the halls in wheel chairs doing wheelies. They had become accustomed to their life among the other wounded and helped each other out as they did in war. But "Oh Baby" they would tell me, I am back in the "World" and my gal and my family are coming to see me! They were still the young warriors who left for war and they survived unchanged in their minds and surely they were getting along well, although they had never been tested outside of the accommodating environment that a Naval Hospital provides with ramps and other things that today we take for granted with Disability Laws and provisions.

The tragedy I referred to was more horrific than I would ever later experience in the field and later in many years as an EMT back in civilian life. The tragedy was yet days later when I again passed by that "Oh Baby, my gal and family are coming this weekend." Instead of being filled with stories of hope, he laid under covers, depressed and appeared to have given up. While a one-eyed man is King among the blind, these heroes finally saw the "World," but the "World" saw him completely changed, not able to move around as he did and stunned with the loss of future potential as was once imagined. The family mourned his loss of limb instead of being overjoyed at his very survival and his gal was kind, but he knew from her hollow eyes that she would not be back. I cried for him and promised myself that I would never forget this true tragedy.

I continued my time in surgery as a member of the Open Heart Scrub Team. I did my job and learned to be the best I could, receiving my new rank of HM3 or E-4. Each day other Corpsmen I knew in the Operating Room or in the hospital were receiving their orders to FMF training and 'Nam. The rumor was they needed so many because the life expectancy of a corpsman in Vietnam was about 7 days. However, I was an important member of a specialty surgical team and not every corpsman was sent to 'Nam. I was still there while others were shipped out. One day, a few of my buddies entered the Surgical Suite as I passed the instruments to the doctors during a long operation. I could see their sardonic smiles even under their surgical masks...Dave, it is your turn to become a "DOC" not just a corpsman...you got your orders to report to FMF training at Camp Pendleton, California, 1st Marine Division.

Now it was my turn. HM3 David Steinberg reported to the outskirts of beautiful Oceanside, CA. Thankfully, our new Marine Uniforms with the subdued Navy Rank on the sleeve did not have brass requiring brasso, but what is this stuff about putting our utility hat on a circular hat block and spraying the hell out of it with spray starch! Another entire sea bag with all the utilities, khakis and greens, FMF Corpsmen do not rate the Marine dress blues. We still had our own blues, complete with fashionable bellbottoms for those formal occasions.

I wrote a song while I was in college that went:

Today I received a letter it was from Uncle Sam,

It said "Greetings My Child," you are off to Vietnam!

Well I picked up that letter and read those words of Woe,

Then quickly call my draft board to see if it weren't so.

Well, I told them I was classified as a "student,"

But they said so sternly, "By order of the President"

Without a choice I packed my bags and kissed my sweetheart good-bye,

And before I knew what was happening I lay under bomb-shelled skies!

Now listen to the moral for all you students classified 2-S,

Don't be so sure that you're exempt, for YOU may go next!

My first day in the chow hall line, I understood what they meant by rank has its privileges. I was called out of line and invited to dine with the non commissioned officers in their own mess area. In the Navy an E-4 Petty Officer is nothing and deserves nothing except less duty nights and weekends. I liked this Marine stuff.

We played jungle combat, qualified with the M-14, the .45 pistol, and practice hand grenade, dug trenches and shared a poncho tent half and pole with a comrade who provided the other poncho half and pole so we could sleep in a cozy pup tent...just like we would in 'Nam...are you kidding me? We manned fighting holes on top of a tall hill overlooking the Pacific Coast Highway and shivered all night due to the cool October Night...not the fear of Victor Charlie, who might be lurking in the hills of Camp Pendleton.

After 30 days leave home to Chicago, I flew to San Bernadino Air Force Base to catch a flight to 'Nam. The troops I had trained with, took the 22-day trip to 'Nam by ship. I, HM3 Steinberg reported alone, since corpsmen were sent individually to Vietnam via Continental Airlines to Okinawa and then Flying Tiger Airlines to Danang. That 7-day life expectancy for a Corpsman in the bush must have been more than a rumor if they were sending us over one-by-one via express.

I arrived in late October of 1967 with most of my gear left in Okinawa. Slim chance that in 365 days, I would DEROS back to the "WORLD" and pick it up. I was thirsty as hell in Danang wearing those heavy green starched utilities from the states. I was thirsty and my American greenbacks would not even buy me a Coke until I ran into a departing "DOC" who swapped me for MPC, Military Pass Currency, available in green or red that changed often, leaving the Black Market with worthless wrong-colored paper.

I reported in and learned a few interesting facts, like its MIND over MATTER — They Don't Mind that I Don't Matter. First, due to heavy casualties among "DOCs in I Corp, my orders where changed from 1st Division to 3d Marine Division. Second, my hopes were shattered about spending my year in an OR Suite when the officer at the holding company told me that, he was very impressed with my rank and training in the Operating Room and confirmed that one day soon, after about 6 months with a Marine unit in the bush if I was still alive, I would have that opportunity. The next day I was on a 6-by truck heading north along Highway 1 to Camp Evans. There I was assigned to the BAS, Battalion Aid Station of the 26th Marines, who were engaged at Con Thien, Gio Linh and along the Cua Viet River. I had my own Willy's Jeep ambulance and got my _ ton Military License to drive it everywhere and to fool around on the mule, a pallet on wheels that they would drop loaded with supplies dangling from a parachute. For us it was a go-cart. I remained with the BAS through early December, when we were ordered to pack-up the BAS, turn Camp Evans over to the Army's 101st Airborne, and move to Dong Ha where we were to set up the BAS in preparation for 3/26 to move to that base. We took over a few hooches and dug a bunker that even the rats would have been proud to share with us during incoming. We no sooner completed the bunker than we received word not to unpack, but move the BAS. It consisted of about 15 pallets, the Dang Ha air strip for shipment to a lovely, quiet, mountain local called Khe Sanh.

After nearly 15 days of sitting on the airstrip with the gear, our ride to Khe Sanh arrived. It was now early January and I reported with the gear to the far end of the base to Dr. Feldman. I was one of the Senior Corpsmen and did my daily sick calls by day and typed up death notices on the KIA's by night (Died in Thau Thien Province from whatever). Life was good but the clock was ticking. We just didn't know it.

Something in the air was different earlier in the night before the ammo dump got hit early the next morning. We were told to burn all of our letters from home in case we were overrun. Overrun? That was a good bedtime thought as my eyes closed and those of us in the tent side-by-side on cots drifted off to sleep.

0530 or whatever...BOOM BANG BOOM...we all ran from the Corpsman Tent, and jumped into any depression in the red dirt — incoming, outgoing, the ammo dump was lit-up like the 4th of July. It was dark and we scattered to safety. I curled up like a ball under a pallet near the end of the Khe Sanh runway and fell back asleep. The morning sun and the relative quiet woke me and I climbed out from under the depression I had clawed-out with my bare hands during the chaos. Yes, the pallet of 105 mm artillery rounds protected me just fine...was I nuts!

Later that day, I was told that there had been heavy Corpsmen losses on Hill 881S and that I should take a few things and as a Senior Corpsman, go up there and check things out. I flew in by Huey Helicopter and jumped off with my Unit 1 Medical Bag across my chest. It was a hot LZ with incoming still pounding the Hill. "Corpsman up," was the first thing I heard, and I crested the hill near a motor or gun pit where a Marine was on his back clutching his chest and gasping for air. After months at the BAS, here I was with my very first immediate casualty. He had a sucking chest wound. All my training came back to me and I quickly took the plastic bag from a field dressing bandage and was able to seal the air leak. I wrapped him tightly and a few Marines got him onto the saddle for a medevac.

Trenchline in front of Dabney's CP, Hill881S

I finally reported to Capt. Dabney and told him I was to check on the corpsman situation on the Hill for the BAS down on the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I asked him where the other DOCs were on the Hill. He told me that I was standing in front of him. I was immediately assigned to Lt. Lawrence Boudria of the 3rd Platoon, India 3/26 for all my days on the Hill and what was to turn out to be many interesting months through the summer after leaving the Hill in April. There was one other DOC on our side of the Hill and Dabney ordered me NEVER to be on the same side of the Hill as him EVER! As it turned out, the two of us were the only DOCs for a long time.

The story of the Hill and the DOCs like myself who survived the entire siege is best saved for another time...my intent is to show, where we DOCs come from. We are all Brothers, Eternally Bonded.

Christmas 67 at Con Thien

By Bob McLane

In the fall of 1967, hundreds of bicycles and small trucks carried thousands of tons of rice and bullets along the Ho Chi Min trail through the not so distant mountains to re-supply the hidden army we were fighting across the DMZ. Countless 500-pound bombs dropped from never-ending flight missions of B-52's had failed to stem the flow of supplies.

From as far as seventeen miles away, dozens of long range North Vietnamese artillery batteries hidden in caves along the border of the DMZ, pounded Con Thien night and day. I had been up to the isolated Marine base several times in November, riding shotgun on convoys delivering ammunition and C-rations. This time we were bringing hot turkey and cold eggnog. I volunteered to ride in the lead truck. I had heard stories of guys on a convoy losing their legs because of land mines. I decided to take my chances on the roof of the deuce and a half. I crossed my legs and rested my M- 16 in my lap. I brought along a can of hard candy I had gotten from one of the cooks. I tossed pieces to the kids we passed along the road to Cam Lo. I remembered to yell Merry Christmas in Vietnamese. We rolled through the barbed wire gate around noon and immediately began unloading our Christmas cargo. I laughed at the other guys riding in the convoy. Their faces and uniforms were covered in red dust from the dirt road we had been riding on since we left Cam Lo and headed north. My own face was spotless. Riding on the lead vehicle had its advantages. Con Thien was a cluster of sandbagged bunkers surrounded by mine fields and razor wire. The six 105 howitzers of Fox battery were set up and ready to fire support for any patrols in the area. We were glad we had made the trip without any trouble. We had heard stories about how many times the Christmas "truce" had been violated last year. The cooks set up a chow line and started serving Christmas dinner. They were in a hurry to get this over with and get the hell out of there before something bad happened. The gunny walked over to me and held out a carton of eggnog. "This is for you, McLane." I looked at him and shook my head. "No thanks, Gunny, that is for the guys up here." He smiled at me and shook his head. "No, this eggnog is for you. Watching you riding on the roof of that truck this morning made me proud to call you a Marine, in spite of your weird ways." The gunny didn't have to twist my arm. It was a hot day.

The guys in Fox battery were like most Marines in any line outfit, they could use a shave and a shower. Most were shirtless in the sun. All wore helmets and flak jackets. So far the artillery batteries on both sides had honored the Christmas truce. The food disappeared fast and it was time for us to head south. I climbed back on the roof of the lead truck and waved good-bye to the guys in Fox battery. We rolled out of the gate. We made it back to Dong Ha without any trouble. Eleven months of war still lay ahead of me, but I never forgot the excitement and pride I felt that Christmas Day riding into Con Thien.

The Battle for Hill 950 06 June 1968

Shortly past midnight, approximately 19 very sudden, loud screeching rockets pierced the calm, silent, very dark summer jungle night, exploding on Khe Sanh Combat Base, killing two, and wounding eleven. Killed were Rodney C. Little who was sitting on an orange crate playing cards when the rounds hit, striking the nearby Seabee tent just across the roadway. A round struck the top of the tent pole so that it detonated as an air burst. Also killed was Senior Chief Equipment Operator Donald J. Barnes who had been sent to KSCB to maintain the heavy equipment used to construct roads and facilities at the rapidly-expanding base. June 5, 1967 was the first day of his second tour of Vietnam service. The Seabee camp at Dong Ha was later named in his memory. During the attack, Gunnery Sergeant James Wilkinson Moore, Jr., of H&S Co., 1/26, dashed from his bunker to go to the Seabee bunker, but was knocked back by the blast. Although he suffered torn cartilage, and bruises to his ribs, he still assisted in the evacuation of the wounded, and only after doing so would allow himself to be treated and evacuated.

At 0125 Hours, the SOG unit located at the Old French Fort just east of Khe Sanh village received 6 mortar rounds. The main attack, however, was an assault atop the very steep Alpha Relay on Hill 950. This hill's radio relay capability was used as a radio relay since the PRC-25 radios used by patrols moving on the steep hills and deep valleys were "line-of-sight." They frequently moved into positions where it would have been impossible to communicate with the headquarters on KSCB were it not for this high radio relay site. Approximately 40-50 North Vietnamese Army soldiers of the 6th Battalion, 95th Regiment, 325C Division, attacked 950 from Hill 1015 to its east.

A bunker occupied by (call sign) PINEFOLD RELAY, Cpl. David Buffalo, Cpl. Dale Lloyd Speir, and L/Cpl. Kenneth S. Howard, Marines from H&S Co., 1/26 on the north side of the outpost, were isolated throughout the attack. Cpl. Buffalo was on the radio, calling in artillery on the positions from where the NVA fired, while the other two Marines with him looked and listened for rockets from the north that were fired over the hill towards KSCB. Following the fourth volley of rockets, Howard heard grenades explode on the outpost, and Buffalo reported the outpost under attack. Speir observed an NVA soldier entering their bunker, and unloaded half a magazine at him. Howard observed three other NVA attempting to enter the adjacent bunker, left his bunker and opened fire on them. While outside his bunker, another NVA soldier tossed a grenade into the bunker containing Buffalo and Speir. It had been raining for about ten days and the deck of the bunker was soft mud. Buffalo was near his rack as Speir moved from side to side. "When the grenade went off I remember feeling something hot hitting me. Howard came back into the bunker. Neither of us knew at that time what had happened to Speir. It was at this time I whispered to PINEFOLD that I was hit and the camp had been overrun. They asked me to key my set, once for yes, twice for no, in response to their questions if it got too dangerous to speak. I told them to fire on the camp as it seemed we were the only ones left and in the bunker," said Buffalo.

Buffalo continued. "We found out later, Speir was already dead. The ground was muddy. I always thought the grenade that killed him and wounded me had sunk in the mud before it went off, and he had caught shrapnel in his chest because he wasn't wearing his flak jacket. I was saved because of the combination of the grenade sinking and my being on the top bunk, away from the major explosion. It could be true that Speir either fell on the grenade partially or it landed on him, but as I recall, he was standing. As the night wore on, I prayed that we would be safe and made every promise in the book, if God would see me through this."

Cpl. Wethy told machine gun #2 that KSCB was under attack and then alerted Sgt. Richard W. Baskin, who was in charge of the security detachment atop the outpost. The area of Alpha Relay was very small; there were only 9 Marines from the Security Platoon, radio operators consisting of 6 Marines from 1/26, and 3 Marines from A Co 3Rd Recon. These 18 Marines occupied sandbagged bunkers covered only with ponchos to protect them from wind and rain. It was very easy for these people to just lob grenades in and be effective. Sgt. Baskin had been helo-lifted to the top of Hill 950 on Monday, 28 May 1967 to relieve Sub Unit #5 Marines. Including himself, he had nine Marines in his squad, consisting of two, four-man machine gun crews.

At 0150 Hours a flare was tripped about 30 meters out from the hills east side. One minute later, a RPG fired by the NVA sailed over the hill and detonated a trip flare on the west side of the pe- rimeter. The eastern side of the hill began receiving hand grenades, a few RPGs, and a high volume of small arms fire. L/Cpl. Castillo yelled, "Incoming grenades, everybody get up, we're under attack!" A grenade exploded in front of his position on the west side of the hill. Sgt. Baskin yelled to Cpl. Wethy, the radioman on watch, to bring in artillery on the east side of the hill. Baskin ran out of his hootch and before anybody knew it, there were NVA swarming up the eastern side of 950 and grenades were going off all over the place. "People were screaming and hollering and there was a lot of confusion. At the time I was standing outside my hooch, Baskin dashed into his bunker and grabbed his M-16 but didn't bother with his flak jacket or cartridge belt."

During the initial attack, grenades hit a bunker containing 4 snipers. PFC David Stephenson managed to escape and while moving, was hit by NVA rounds, fell, and was pulled to safety by Cpl. John Roland Burke and PFC Thomas R. Back. A grenade exploded in their midst, knocking both snipers into the bunker and throwing Stephenson away from it. Burke was badly hit in the head, and although bleeding profusely, attended to L/Cpl. Carper, who was also wounded. Burke placed Carper on top of the rack and placed his body on top of him to keep shrapnel and other flying objects from hitting him. As Stephenson struggled to get into the bunker, another grenade exploded, knocking him into the bunker. Burke, after rendering aid to the wounded, charged the enemy from his bunker and was killed by a deadly hail of enemy fire.

Sgt. Baskin saw three NVA soldiers throw the charges/grenades into the snipers' bunker and heard their screaming. Two managed to get out only to be cut down by the waiting NVA, despite his at- tempts to cover them. At this point, Baskin took a W/P grenade, pulled the pin, let the spoon fly and held it. "He finally released the thing, when he and the soldier were looking at each other. It hit him right in the chest when it went off. It was terrible. It just blew him off his feet. His partner there caught a fraction of it, and both of them were aflame. He may have been a lieutenant, and was just blown to pieces. He was like ash when I found him that morning."

Cpl. Powell's machine gun #1 was hit with grenades, seriously wounding Cpl. J. B. Powell, L/Cpl. Lawrence, and PFC's Monroe, and Stephenson. When their machine gun guarding the eastern sector of Hill 950 became unserviceable, the men decided to fall back towards L/Cpl. Balzano's position. L/Cpl. Larry Eugene Lawrence, gunner for the machine gun, covered their withdrawal. When they came under fire, L/Cpl. Lawrence fired point blank at the enemy, driving them back, allowing the three men to make it to safety. Lawrence was hit, fell, stood up again, and was killed. Sgt. Baskin saw him get hit. "I wanted to go out, but I just couldn't. There were NVA on our right flank who were penetrating right up through the center," said Baskin PFCs David Stephenson, and George D. Monroe, staggered into the position manned by L/Cpl. Richard C. Green and PFC Jeffrey L. Arnold, just as PFC Monroe yelled, "Cpl. Powell has been hit." At that moment, two grenades were thrown into Green's hole, and although they exploded, no one was injured. A trip flare went off on the east side showing four North Vietnamese soldiers jumping up and down on top of the radio bunker. L/Cpl. William C. Balzano killed two with the machine gun, while PFC Arnold and L/Cpl. Green killed the other two with their rifles. Sgt. Baskin had moved into a hole in front of Green and Arnold to cover the southeast, as Castillo dashed from the hole containing Balzano's machine gun and took over Baskin's position, killing several NVA soldiers.

The hilltop was shrouded in dense fog. Trip flares created eerie silhouettes. Sgt. Baskin heard Balzano firing his machine gun. As Baskin moved, Cpl. Powell, the gunner on the other machine gun position that had been overrun, came up to Baskin, fell at his knees and said, "Sarge, help me, I am hit in the back." Baskin grabbed him and dragged him to his hooch. They could hear rockets to the northwest over their heads heading towards Khe Sanh.

When Balzano's machine gun froze, he and PFC Arnold desperately attempted to repair it, breaking it down and checking each piece, but were unable to fix it. Balzano told Baskin: "I can fire one round, but can't get any sustained rate of fire out of it." Baskin heard PFC Steve Arnold say: "He's with Cpl. Powell and is seriously wounded. This was my first firefight and I know I'm in a position now where everyone's depending on me as I depend on everyone else." PFC Stupar dashed from the recon bunker, only to be shot and killed. The recon bunker was hit by a RPG that entered the bunker through an opening and exploded inside, killing the three occupants.

The NVA force clearly had fire superiority in addition to their element of surprise. Sgt. Baskin spotted the NVA setting up a machine gun atop the bunker in the center of the outpost using the sandbags for the base of their gun. L/Cpl. Green continued firing at the NVA, and at least five or six fell over the cliff. Marines not in the radio bunkers, or at the east machine gun position, withdrew to the southwestern side of the perimeter where Baskin established a 360 perimeter around one bunker and two other positions. Balzano, PFC Steve Arnold, Cpl. Powell, and PFC Monroe manned a machine gun position while Baskin, Green, and Castillo manned a bunker covering the right flank. A grenade exploded, peppering the backs of Castillo and Baskin.

By 0220 Hours, Baskin requested that artillery be fired on top of the hill. The request was granted. 4.2" mortars, 40mm dusters, and 106s blasted the hilltop. At 0230Hours, 3rd Mar Div COC reported to III MAF COC: "The situation looks grim on the hill. One report received indicated the position was overrun; however, cannot tell complete situation at this time." Ten minutes later: "Three are reported still alive. All contact has been lost with Marines on Hill 950: appears position completely overrun."

At 0500 Hours, fog completely shrouded the outpost. NVA soldiers held the bunker containing the three radios in the center of the hill. Sgt. Baskin told Castillo, "We got to get over there; we got to get that radio. Castillo picked up two rifles from dead NVA. Sgt. Baskin told him to spray covering fire as he maneuvered to the center and assaulted the communication bunker occupied by the NVA. "I knew it was either take that bunker or stay here all day, and who knows what may happen?" As Baskin, Castillo, Balzano, Green, and PFC Arnold went on line and assaulted the bunker, the NVA fled. "They showed their backs and we were happy; we knew we had them," said Baskin. They seized the bunker along with a NVA POW. Communication was restored with KSCB. The Marines heard the NVA dragging their dead from the position, and fired at them until they disappeared into the woods.

Cpl. Buffalo had worried about the antenna sticking out of his bunker. The NVA had evidently assumed no one was alive in this bunker. After throwing one grenade, they made no further assaults on it.

As the morning dawned, "I heard someone ask, 'What the hell is Vietnamese to stop?'

I jumped out of the bunker and shouted "Americans, Americans!" Someone said, "Come the hell out of there," and I did with both my hands preceding the rest of me. I was afraid I'd be shot if I didn't. Howard came out after me. I couldn't walk, re-enforcements had arrived.

At 0945 Hours, KSCB received the radio call from Alpha Relay that all friendly were accounted for. At 1230Hours, weather broke, and helicopters landed elements of Co D/1/26 to secure and evacuate the WIA and KIA. A/Btry & W/1/13 had fired 3,206 rounds in support of the Hill 950 fight. Ma- rines from D/1/26 scouring the area discovered an NVA WIA, PFC Nguyen Van Chat, of C-9 Co., K9 Bn, 95th Regiment, 325-C Division. The 20 year old NVA from Thanh Hoa in North Vietnam, stated that his unit of 100 men attacked Hill 950 with 50 AK-47s and 38 CKC-90s. PFC Chat dis- closed that his unit walked two days and nights from the north of the vicinity of Dong La Ruong, with only six hours rest in the three days preceding the attack. C-9 Company was composed of 100 men (90 of which were combat effective). The mission of their unit was to overrun the Marine position and then retreat back to their base area at Dong Tri Mountain (Hill 1009, known as Hill 1015 on American military maps). The 325C Division began their infiltration into South Vietnam, crossing the Ben Hai River on 7 March 1967 and their first engagement was this attack on Hill 950.

Khe Sanh Vets Return to Vietnam with Gold Star Moms

by Bruce Geiger

In August 2004, four veterans including three Khe Sanh Vets returned to Vietnam as escorts for Operation Gold Star, sponsored by the National Dusters, Quads & Searchlights Association. Beginning with the first return trip in July 2000, the DQS organization has raised over $50,000 to bring twenty Gold Star Mothers to Vietnam to visit the sites where their sons gave their lives. Generous contributions have been made over the past five years by numerous veterans groups including the Khe Sanh Veterans and by individual members. On the four trips made to date, many veterans and several wives have made the trip at their own expense (approx. $2700 each) to escort the Gold Star Mothers throughout Vietnam. They have served as a support group for the mothers and provided background knowledge of the many battles and diverse locations in which they served during the conflict.

The Operation Gold Star IV group met in LA the evening of Sunday, August 16th, 2004 after arriving from their home airports. Escorts for the group included Khe Sanh vets, Bruce Geiger, Jim Smith and his wife Sandy, Bill Griffith, and DQS vet Sam Hopkins. Gold Star Mothers participating on the trip included Anna Roble, Janice Dahlke, Virginia 'Joe' O'Neal, Betty Pulliam, Carol Tabor, and Betty Van Dusen. We boarded a China Airlines flight after midnight for the thirteen hour trip to Taipei followed by another three and a half hour flight to Saigon where we began our in-country adventure with "Happy," as our in-country travel guide.

Our first two days were spent in Saigon, where we did some sightseeing and got a chance to rest a bit from our long flight. On our second morning we traveled by tour bus about a half hour south of Saigon to the Ben Luc Bridge, the site where Janice Dahlke's son Randy Mueller (D- 2nd/47th Inf, 9th Inf Div KIA – 3 Mar 69) was killed. There is a new bridge at the site alongside the old bridge that crosses the Phan Co River, a tributary of the Mekong River, We stopped and held a ceremony honoring the young soldier who was killed while guarding an engineering dredging operation at the bridge. We had a beautiful ceremony alongside the river at an old bridge guard house and concrete quay that stretched out about 10 meters into the river. We attracted a number of Vietnamese onlookers who politely stood and listened as we stood around a special flower arrangement that we had made in Saigon. Information researched by DQS in advance about her son's unit and operations were shared with the group. Mrs. Dahlke also shared remembrances of her son. This set a very positive tone for the five remaining ceremonies, and was a very uplifting experience for all the mothers and us veterans. After the ceremony, we took pictures and gave the locals some American flags and flowers as souvenirs.

In the afternoon we did more sightseeing, strolled around the Saigon streets near the hotel, and shopped before dinner. We departed Saigon the next morning after breakfast for the next leg of our journey to the beautiful mountain city of Dalat, stopping along the way for pictures (and a traffic violation) at Bien Hoa airfield, which is now a huge industrial park complex. We had lunch in the mountain town of Bao Loc after which we visited the nearby Dam Bri Falls, which is among the most famous in Southeast Asia. After getting drenched at the falls, we returned to Bao Loc to warm up with a cup of fresh Vietnamese coffee, and arrived early that evening in Dalat where we spent the next two days sightseeing, learning a bit of Vietnamese history, and shopping. We visited two ethnic Montagnard villages, a Buddhist monastery, and the Bao Di summer palace.

From Dalat we traveled east through the "Song Pha" pass and saw the huge Japanese built hydroelectric plant and pipeline on our way to the coastal town of Phan Rang. There we visited an ancient, ethnic Cham Tower before traveling to Cam Ranh Bay where we stopped at the airport. Thirty-seven years earlier this had been the place where I and tens of thousands of US troops first arrived in Vietnam. We traveled along a brand new coastal highway from Cam Ranh Bay to Nha Trang where we would spend the night. Nha Trang is truly the Riviera of Vietnam's beach resorts. Hotels are all along the oceanfront. Tourists and Vietnamese vacationers were parasailing, boating, and basking on the seemingly endless, white, sandy beaches.

In the morning we traveled north on Rt. 1, then northwest along Rt. 14 to Pleiku via Buon Ma Thuot. We passed through the Ia Drang Valley near Chu Pong Mountain where the 7th Air Cavalry fought the first major battle of the war in 1965, becoming the subject of a famous book and more recently the movie "We Were Soldiers." We had dinner and stayed the night at the Pleiku Hotel. After breakfast we stopped at the site of a former Army/Air Force base (101st Airborne) on our way to Kontum and then to Dak To where we visited a war monument (Russian T51 Tank) and stopped to pet and play with a friendly calf. We drove on to Ben Het near the border (8km) with Cambodia and Laos along the Vietnamese side of the Ho Chi Minh trail. We then returned to Kontum to visit a Catholic orphanage, and visited with kids from infants to teenagers. We also met the ARVN Captain, who on our first OGS trip in 2000 invited us into his home to share his prized rice wine. We took photos, left lots of candy, and gave a generous donation. Our trip continued back to Pleiku, then east along Rt. 19 through the Mang Yang Pass to An Khe, and An Khe Pass to the coastal town of Qui Nhon where we checked into the Seagull Hotel and had dinner before retiring after an exhausting day.

The following morning we traveled north toward Bong Son (Binh Dinh Province) and stopped at Phu Cat, a former US airbase which is now shared by a brand new civilian airport terminal handling two flights a day. We drove north to Phu My, former site of a base camp where Carol Tabor's son Richard Eugene Tabor (E-1st/503rd Inf, 173rd AB KIA – 7 Jan 71) had been stationed and held our second remembrance ceremony nearby off Rt. 631 in a small village near where he had been killed. Local villagers observed inquisitively as we remembered our fallen brother. We rewarded their friendliness and hospitality with candy, pens, American flags, and flowers from the ceremony. We returned south to Qui Nhon for an afternoon of shopping at the local mall which looked like those in any small US town. After checking into a different hotel, we went for a swim in the South China Sea before dinner.

The next leg of our trip took us north along Rt. 1 through Quang Ngai City near the road to My Lai where the infamous massacre occurred. We drove north past the former Marine base at Chu Lai, now an off-limits Vietnamese military installation, before stopping for lunch at the Phoy Hoi garden restaurant in the beautiful town of Hoi An. After lunch we toured the local silk factory where we saw the entire process in the silk worm life cycle, as well as the spinning and weaving of silk yarn into cloth. Silk tablecloths, napkins, scarves, etc. were a real bargain, and we did lots of shopping here. Several miles farther north at Danang, we stopped at Marble Mountain to take pictures and visit the largest marble factory (one of twelve) where we shopped for beautiful, hand carved marble items. Although it began to rain, we visited China Beach where we held a brief memorial ceremony on behalf of a Gold Star Mother who was unable to make the trip. We collected some China Beach sand as a remembrance for her before checking into the beautiful Saigon Tourane Hotel in Danang. In the evening we had dinner at the Apsara restaurant which featured ethnic Cham musical entertainment and a replica of an ancient Cham tower. Back at the hotel, most of the group turned in for the evening, but a couple of us headed out to find dessert at a local ice cream parlor, the"'Indochine Gardens." They were showing "Tom & Jerry" cartoons on a big outdoor screen.

After breakfast we drove by the former "Freedom Hill" in Danang, where there had been a large military installation including a USO and PX. We made our way over to Rt. 1 near the sea and up to the Hai Van Pass, stopping to take photos of the beautiful coastal scenery. Visible from the lower roadway of the pass was a Japanese tunnel project in its final stage of construction through the mountain that will soon divert most commercial trucking from the arduous 21 km. trek over the pass. On the northern coastal side of the Hai Van Pass, we stopped at the beautiful Lang Co beach, which was a 101st Airborne Hqs. known as Eagle Beach during the war. We had refreshments and bought souvenirs before driving past the Lang Co lagoon on the west side of Rt. 1 and the Tam Giang lagoon, where three major tributaries converged from the mountains into a large estuary. Here, a major shrimp farming industry thrives in the coastal plain. We stopped at Phu Bai, the former site of a large military airfield and base, where a new civilian air terminal has recently been completed, and from which we eventually would fly to Saigon before returning home. Further north we drove into Hue City, then along the beautiful Perfume River, and checked into the Saigon Morin Hotel, the finest of all the hotels we stayed in.

After a breather and lunch in Hue, we traveled north to rural Rt. 49, where we headed west about 35 km. into the Ashau Valley and LZ Ripcord. Virginia O'Neal lost her son Samuel Stephen Lance (A-1/506th Inf., 101st AB KIA – 1 May 70) in the vicinity of Ripcord during Operation Texas Star that was launched to regain the initiative in the mountain area east of the Ashau Valley. At the base of Ripcord in a relatively uninhabited area, we held a ceremony in remembrance of the sons of Joe O'Neal and several Gold Star Mothers who were unable to make the trip. Our guide pointed out former firebases including LZ Bastogne and others which were accessible to US troops only by helicopter during the war. We returned to the Saigon Morin Hotel and went out to a local restaurant for dinner. Afterward, a couple of us took cyclo rides around the city, and I visited the famous DMZ Bar where thousands of returning veterans had autographed the walls. We rode along the Perfume River before heading back to the hotel for the evening.

The next morning we headed north again, where we stopped at Camp Evans, former base camp and Hqs. of the 1st Air Cavalry Division, where I spent the last three weeks of my Vietnam tour in September 1968 before returning home. We traveled north on Rt. 1 past Quang Tri City on our way to Dong Ha from where we would visit most of the Marine firebases in and around Leatherneck Square on the DMZ. We had lunch in a rather dingy roadside restaurant across the Dong Ha Bridge on Rt. 1 before heading north through Gio Linh and across the Ben Hai River about 15km. into the former "North Vietnam." Our destination was the seaside village of Vin Muoc, where the entire village of several hundred people moved underground into a network of tunnels for three years, to avoid the heavy bombing north of the DMZ. They dug many miles of tunnels, three levels deep at the edge of the sea, reaching a maximum depth of nearly 70 meters. Several of the Gold Star Moms joined us to explore a stretch of the tunnels which had been fortified and dimly lit to accommodate a growing tourist trade. In addition, the village had added new walkways, exhibits, and a brand new museum building to replace the "shack" which was there when we visited in 2000. On our return trip across the DMZ, we stopped and walked back across the old "Freedom Bridge" which had also been shored up and replanked since our 2000 visit. Water buffalos grazed warily nearby but would not let us get too close.

After passing back through Gio Linh, we headed west just below the DMZ toward A3, and then to Con Thien where we stopped to climb the hill. The 1.5 km climb up a narrow cow path to the concrete French bunker was a bit too difficult for the mothers. Having spent much of the last three months of 1967 on the hill at Con Thien, I was determined to climb to the top alone where I found the bunker overgrown with vegetation. From this vantage point at the top of the hill, I was able to locate both of my Duster positions. I took a Ziploc bag of soil. I also saw an oxcart, pulled by an ox, and got a couple of photos before my digital camera battery died. Predictably, my spare was on the bus at the bottom of the hill! Our tour bus drove south from Con Thien across the new Cam Lo Bridge (one year old) to the intersection at Rt. 9, and then east back to Dong Ha and our modest hotel on Rt. 1. After dinner I took a stroll up Rt. 1 through a relatively quiet Dong Ha which now stretched several kilometers in each direction from Rt. 9.

We arose early, ate breakfast at the hotel, and began our day with a short bus ride to a residential area to visit the last remnant of the huge Marine base at Dong Ha, an old reinforced concrete, aircraft hanger where the airfield had been during the war. It was located behind a group of houses in a residential backyard, and had become a play area of sorts for the local kids. It was here that we had chosen to hold a remembrance ceremony for John Phillip Van Dusen, (USN Seabee KIA – 20 Sep 68 at Camp Barnes, Dong Ha) the son of Betty Van Dusen. John was also a Khe Sanh veteran, having supported operations at Khe Sanh earlier in 1968. He was killed during a mortar attack at Dong Ha. A number of Vietnamese quietly observed our ceremony in the hanger, and afterward were eager to talk with our group. It made for a very rewarding experience, and we gave them American flags, pens, candy, and flowers as a token of our appreciation.

We traveled a short distance west on Rt. 9 just outside the Dong Ha Marine Base to the location of a former compound defended by 1/9 Marines in mid-1967. We held a remembrance ceremony here for Dale A. Pulliam, the son of Betty Pulliam (C-1/9 Marines, 3rd Mar Div KIA – 14 May 67) during a ground attack. Dale had also fought in actions at Khe Sanh and Con Thien.

Continuing out Rt. 9 west through Cam Lo, we stopped at Camp Carroll to explore the former Marine base where C-1/44 Dusters were based, along with the Army's big 175mm guns that supported operations throughout the DMZ. Bill Griffith and I came across a former NVA soldier who had cut his hand with a machete while tending to his herd of cows. It was bleeding and dirty, so we coaxed him to return to our tour bus where we cleaned, disinfected and bandaged the wound. He was so grateful that he gave Bill Griffith his NVA pith helmet for a few dollars.

We drove further south from Camp Carroll to a town called My Loc where I had a memorable "encounter" with a large water buffalo. For as long as I can remember, I have had an insatiable desire to pet one of these beasts, and this handsome specimen was accommodatingly tethered by a hemp rope, tied to a steel pipe that was driven into the ground. I handed my camera to Sam Hopkins, and slowly approached the grazing animal along the rope. It was very nervous, but I whispered reassuringly to it as I bravely inched along the rope, getting close enough to stroke his wet nose just before he jerked his head and snorted at me. When I went back to Sam and the camera, I discovered he had missed the shot. I again showed Sam what to do, and approached the now irritable beast with irrational confidence. As I again got within a few inches, holding the rope tightly in both hands, the beast decided he would have no more of this and bolted to my left. The rope instantly became taut on my right side, and jerked my legs out from under me before snapping from the pipe. It zipped through my hands before I could unclench my fists, leaving me with nasty rope burns and torn blisters. Of course by now, everybody from our group and the surrounding hamlet had seen what happened and was horrified. A few of the guys helped me clean and dressed my wounds at the bus, and needless to say, I was duly teased throughout the remainder of the trip.

Further west on Rt. 9, we stopped at the Khe Gio Bridge to honor one of our C-1/44 Duster comrades, Sgt. Mitchell Stout who on 12 March 1970 had thrown himself on a satchel charge to save his buddies during a sapper attack on the bridge defenses. He was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor, the only Air Defense Artillerymen ever to receive our nation's highest military decoration.

We traveled out Rt. 9 past the Rockpile westward toward Ca Lu where we were delayed at a bridge construction site as rock was blasted with dynamite charges. We took the opportunity to visit a Bru Montagnard village alongside the road. The shy kids hesitantly allowed us to take pictures, but gleefully mobbed us when we brought out the candy and toys. Bill Griffith was like the pied piper, finally getting them to line up to bring some order to the chaos. Some of the Gold Star Mothers held the babies and played with the children. We gave gifts to some of the elders, and finally got on our way when the roadway was opened.

Bruce Geiger with children at Ca Lu.

It was somewhat overcast when we arrived at the outskirts of Khe Sanh. We drove up the road to the former combat base through lush coffee groves and came upon the new museum building that had been constructed since our last visit in 2000. We placed a large flower wreath and held a ceremony honoring the many men who had served here. Those of us who fought here took a few minutes to tell a bit of the history of the "Hill Fights," the "Siege," and the later dismantling of the base. While others toured the museum, I was determined to find my former Duster and Quad 50 positions that I had been unable to locate on my 2000 visit due to erroneous information about the original runway location. This time I humped through the heavy vegetation to the coffee groves where the original runway had been located, and was ecstatic to find the 'blue sector' perimeter where my gun positions had been dug in during the siege. I took another Ziploc bag of red clay, took a moment to remember my Marine friends who did not survive this place, and headed back to our tour bus.

Khe Sanh village

Gold Star Mothers with memorial wreath

Our tour bus traveled back out to Rt. 9 and headed west through Khe Sanh village past Lang Vei, to the town of Lao Bao at the Laotian border. We stopped for lunch at a very nice hotel restaurant, where we had an excellent view of Co Roc Mountain where the NVA gunners had dug in their heavy artillery to fire on Khe Sanh and the surrounding hills during the siege in 1968. After lunch we drove near the border crossing with Laos, where we bought some souvenirs from the local kids before stopping in a large, modern mall to do a little shopping. We backtracked on Rt. 9 and stopped for photographs at Lang Vei, the site of the former Army Special Forces camp that was overrun in January 1968 by the NVA using Russian T76 Tanks for the first time in the war.

By this time it was late afternoon, and we headed back along Rt. 9 to a spot between Ca Lu and the Rockpile, which was as close as we could get to LZ Margo, where the son of Anna Roble, Joseph Edward Roble (E Co., 3rd Bn/26th Marines, USMC KIA – 16 Sep 68) was killed during a heavy mortar attack while defending the Command Post and LZ.

Bill Smith, Bill Griffith, Bruce Geiger

Ironically, one day earlier Joseph Roble had saved the life of Bill Griffith, who was severely wounded during an intense firefight with the NVA, and today Bill Griffith was among the Operation Gold Star group standing in Vietnam beside Anna Roble at a remembrance ceremony in honor of her brave son. For his actions, Joseph Roble was posthumously awarded the Bronze Star with 'V' device for heroism at Arlington National Cemetery in a 1998 ceremony. We gave American flags and candy to the many Vietnamese onlookers who had been quietly observing from the road.

We returned to Dong Ha, where we had a late dinner and retired for the evening. In the morning, we traveled south where we stopped in Quang Tri City at the bridge site of a monument honoring the prisoner exchange in 1973 between North and South Vietnam. In Quang Tri city, we visited the site of the old Citadel that was all but completely destroyed when the NVA stormed across the DMZ in 1975. From Quang Tri City we traveled south to Hue where we took a cruise on the Perfume River. After the cruise, several of us visited the more famous Citadel that had been the scene of intense fighting at the start of the Tet offensive in 1968. We ate dinner in town and spent the evening at the Saigon Morin Hotel. In the morning we drove to Phu Bai Airport where we said goodbye to our tour bus driver and his son, and caught a flight to Saigon. Our last day in Saigon featured an afternoon of high energy shopping which included a trip to the lacquer factory and to the many shops on the streets within walking distance from our hotel. On our last night in Vietnam, we took a dinner cruise on the Saigon River and reminisced about our two-week pilgrimage. The next morning we had a fabulous breakfast before departing for the airport where we said our goodbyes to our guide 'Happy' and boarded our flight to Taipei. Some nineteen hours later we arrived in Los Angeles where we lugged souvenir-laden luggage through customs, said hurried goodbyes, and scrambled to catch flights our own home towns.

We had little time together as a group at the culmination of our journey to reflect upon the intense emotions we had experienced over the past two Anetta_00weeks. The mothers were overwhelmingly grateful for having had this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. As I reflected upon this trip, I was reminded of a symbolic gesture carried out at each of our remembrance ceremonies during all of the four Operation Gold Star trips to Vietnam. It has been described by the mothers as "walking in their footsteps." At the conclusion of each ceremony honoring their fallen son, the Gold Star Mother, joined by a veteran, placed their footprints in the soil to symbolize having walked in the footsteps of her son who gave his life on this Vietnamese soil. This gesture along with the entire two-week experience enabled each of the mothers to complete an important missing piece to the difficult task of dealing with the loss of their sons. For each of us serving as veteran escorts, it had truly been a labor of love.

Barry Fixler is a Khe Sanh Veteran who served with Echo Company, Second Battalion Twenty Sixth Marines, Weapons Platoon, on Hill 861A.

Barry owns and operates Barry's Estate Jewelers, located in Bardonia, New York. On February 13, 2005, two men entered his store and ask to look at engagement rings. A few minutes later, both men pulled out handguns, and Barry was staring directly into a chrome automatic pistol, pointed directly at his head. Without hesitation, Barry knocked the gun away, slid down the counter and pulled out his own handgun. A gun battle ensued and he shot one of the offenders. Both armed offenders ran from the store with Barry in pursuit. The wounded gunman collapsed in the doorway, and Barry covered him and summoned help from nearby shoppers.

Responding police units located the second gunman, along with a third suspect who drove the getaway van. They recovered additional weapons, gloves, and other items used in the attempted robbery. The men will be charged with felony robbery counts. Barry said the two men came into the store and asked about engagement rings. After a few minutes, each man pulled out a gun. He said one robber pointed a weapon, saying, "Don't move! I'll kill you." "Next thing I see is a silver automatic right in my face. All you want to do is stay alive. I did what I needed to do to defend myself. Detectives reviewed the tape from the store's video surveillance camera and ruled the shooting justifiable.

Detectives recovered the suspect's gun near his body. During the search for the armed man, the county's police used a helicopter and tracking dog. Later, Barry stood by his shop with his lovely wife Linda, who had been driving to a doctor's appointment for a sprained ankle when she saw the yellow police tape blocking access to mall. Linda said, "It happens in every area. You got two mutts who don't want to find a job, and they just want to take what other people have. This is something you read about happening to someone else. You never think it will happen to you, I am so proud of Barry." Barry's shop is adorned with a large sign printed with the American flag and the message "Barry Supports Our Troops." Maybe the bad guys didn't get the message, Fellow merchant's came by to offer their support. Cleatis Hunter, who works across the street from Barry's shop, said he heard a gunshot and ran across the street. Hunter said the suspect was lying on the store's floor, covered in blood. John Settle, another merchant called Barry a "good guy," a Rotarian who did charity work for the community. "He does a lot for charity and is a big supporter of our troops in Iraq. Another neighbor who worked next door said, "I am just glad he didn't get hurt. He is a trustworthy businessman and is well-respected in this town."

Barry was a member of my weapons platoon and a personal friend. He had been to my home during the Chicago Welcome Home Parade, and also participated in the New York Welcome Home Parade. On behalf of the Khe Sanh Veterans, I want to give him a Big THANK YOU not only for his courage, but all the other things he does in support of ALL VETERANS.

Taps—John Friedrich, 5th Comm.

by Jim Fowler

John and I served together for over two years in Vietnam. He replaced me when I departed Khe Sanh and helped Ann and I move into our first home at Cherry Point.

From Andy Morris, 5th Comm. webmaster: I once again have the honor of passing along information about John Friedrich. John's wife Marilyn called me this morning to inform me that John had died last Thursday. John's condition had progressed to a point where she had taken John to the hospital and while being treated that day, John suffered a heart attack and died.

I spoke to John on the 13th of February, and he didn't sound very well. I had hoped that we would have him around for a few more months, yet this was not to be. I find myself saddened and happy at the same time. Sad with the loss of a good friend, and outstanding human being, and happy that John didn't suffer for a long time with his cancer. Marilyn seems to be doing good, accepting her loss. John was buried at the local military cemetery in San Diego.

Please send cards if you wish to convey your condolences. The family would also love to hear from

by Hank Melanson

I was looking through the updates for the Khe Sanh and found that John Haaland had moved to Los Lunas, NM from Florida. So I decided to call him and see if we could get together. I was too late. His wife told me that he had past away 26 Feb 05 and will be put to rest in Arlington soon. Dutch had been ill for some time and suffered greatly at the end. His wife is in great pain and is very lonely. If there is any one out there who knew Dutch, please call his wife for support. Dutch was an A/O for the Third Marine Division, had two Purple hearts and a Silver Star.

Semper Fi, Brother Dutch. You are in my prayers.

He was a retired Readjustment Counseling Service Administrator and therapist, St. Petersburg, FL. He moved to Florida from Chicago in 1990, where he served as Regional Manager of Readjustment Counseling Service Midwest Region for several years. He was a highly decorated USMC veteran of the Vietnam War (2 tours). A member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, 1st Marine Division Association, and Disabled American Veterans. He devoted his life to family and fellow combat veterans. A proud warrior with the soul of a poet, he lived the values of the Marine Corps every moment of his life. He was a strong leader, talented orator, and gifted clinician, who left a significant impact on all who knew him. He loved fatherhood, weightlifting, and dog training, and could dance better than James Brown. Survivors include his wife Mary Ann and son Hunter Freedom Clearwater; a sister Susan Lane, and niece Jennifer Sage, both of Pineville, NC. Countless friends and colleagues who knew his integrity and strength, are deeply grieving his passing.

We know "Sky-6" will now be watching over Colonel Cummings. Colonel James M. Cummings, U.S. Marine Corps, (Ret.), passed away on January 17, 2005 after a valiant struggle to overcome pulmonary disease. He was 83 years old. Col. Cummings enlisted in the Marine Corps shortly after Pearl Harbor and fought as a Marine rifleman and non-commissioned officer in the South Pacific on Guadalcanal and Bougainville. He was subsequently commissioned and was in China at the end of the War. He joined the Chicago Police Force and served until being recalled to active duty during the Korean War, then remained a career Marine, commanding the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment in the Con Thien and the Khe Sanh areas of Vietnam.

He retired as the Headquarters Director of Administration after 30 years of service. During his off-duty hours, he coached little league baseball (beginning that program in the Hawaiian territory in 1954 and assisting the development of the Springfield program here in 1956) and CYO basketball in Northern VA in the 50s and 60s. A charter member of St. Michael's Parish in Annandale, he served in numerous lay capacities during a period stretching over 45 years. Book Review

A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered, by Michael Archer. Central Point, Oregon: Hellgate Press, 2005. Pp. viii, 192, notes, $15.95.

In a powerfully written, highly descriptive and fast paced narrative, Michael Archer recounts his experiences as a radioman during the crucial three-month North Vietnamese siege of the remote US Marine outpost at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam in 1968. When he arrived at Khe Sanh in December 1967, Archer had no idea that he would soon be immersed in the bloodiest, most confusing and controversial battle of the Vietnam War. Thus, his story portrays the growing apprehension of the Marines as they realized that Communist forces had encircled the American base with the intention of scoring a decisive victory over the US. Archer effectively conveys the fear, trepidation and general bewilderment experienced by newly arrived Americans in the combat zone, while graphically describing the fall of Khe Sanh village during the early days of the battle.

In the process, Archer blends humor, irony and drama to craft one of the best books written about the Vietnam War and certainly, the preeminent account of the battle of Khe Sanh. His depiction of his personal journey from an awkward, alienated youth to a cynical, hardened Khe Sanh combatant, invites the reader to consider the perplexing situation in the US during the 1960s as Americans argued with increasing fervor over the American commitment to South Vietnam, the often impulsive decisions of young people to join the military at a time when it was engaged in an unpopular struggle, and the loyalty and camaraderie that grew up among those who fought together in South Vietnam.

At the same time, Archer confronts a number of controversial issues left over from the hostilities, including the sometimes uneven performance of South Vietnamese troops, the controversial decisions on the part of US Marine commanders to abandon several US Army positions under attack by superior Communist forces, and the ferocious conflict that arose between the US Army and the US Marine Corps in the midst of the hostilities. As a radio operator working in the 26th Marines Regimental Command Post, Archer examines the complex relationship between enlisted men and officers during wartime and demonstrates the critical role of technology in preventing a North Vietnamese onslaught against the Khe Sanh perimeter.

By far, the best sections of the book are his depictions of the daily existence of Marines at Khe Sanh with all of their idiosyncrasies, foibles, superstitions, dark humor, and forced bravado under the most sustained barrage of enemy fire of the conflict. Archer brings these outrageous characters to life as he portrays the everyday valor of the young Marines endeavoring to survive their time at "The Worst Place on Earth." (pp.124-25) Indeed, despite the poignancy of the story, this reviewer often found himself laughing aloud at Archer's representations of his fellow Marines.

He ends the book with a moving and personal tribute to his childhood friend who was subsequently listed as an MIA in South Vietnam. Yet, his work clearly indicates that Archer remained unprepared for the negative reactions of his fellow citizens towards veterans when he returned to the US. Nor does he attempt to hide the bitterness that all Khe Sanh participants felt after the US command abandoned the base in July1968. Thus, Archer points out that after "over 1,000 Americans died fighting for Khe Sanh in 1968" (p.175), Marine veterans of the battle witnessed the outrageous spectacle of the US command giving up the position without a fight where so many young Marines had recently struggled and died. Perhaps, this superb book's greatest value is that it stands as a metaphor for the frustration and futility felt by those who clashed over thousands of "patch[es] of ground" (p.188) throughout the Vietnam War.

Remembering March 22

by Bruce Geiger

March 22nd is a very bad time for me. It was a hellish night thirty-seven years ago when the NVA pounded the base with nearly 1200 rounds, the second heaviest shelling of the Siege. About an hour after dark, the shit hit the fan, and I, for one, thought this was the final NVA assault. As I was making my way down the "blue sector" trench line to check my gun positions, the C-1/26 CP bunker took a direct hit from a 122mm rocket. The rubble was burning and I helped several Marines try to dig out survivors. I was able to retrieve a corpsman from Charlie Med across the runway, but only a couple of Marines, including Chuck Chamberlin, survived the blast. Killed that night were Captain Walter "Jack" Egger, GySgt. John J.Grohman, 1/Lt. Paul W. Bush, L/Cpl. Stephen C. Shannon, and PFC Bennie Joe Sisson. We will honor their courage and forever keep them in our memories.

Semper Fidelis.

Bruce,

I was a radio operator with Charlie Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, assigned to the Blue Sector north of the runway at the Khe Sanh Combat Base during the Tet Offensive of 1968. As you may recall, the 1st Battalion, 26th Regiment was engaged in a defensive position within the perimeter of Khe Sanh Combat Base. From 1/21/68 through approx. 3/31/68, Charlie Co. was assigned to the "Blue Sector" north of the runway with support from your "Army Guns"—Quad 50s and Twin 40s.

All of us were engaged in securing and holding the northern perimeter of KSCB, along with the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion. On the afternoon of 3/22/68, I had just returned to my Command Post bunker from the area known as the Ponderosa. I'd had the first "shower" in approximately 2 months. Lt. Siegrist, an F/O attached to C Company, and I had taken turns trying to light an immersion burner on a 55 gallon "stove-top," outhouse type shower facility. Each time we attempted to light the burners, we were frustrated by recoilless rifle fire. We finally managed to heat some water and have a half-ass shower!

We emerged with somewhat clean utilities and proceeded down the Ponderosa Road with a new attitude. Mr. Charles opened up on us again with recoilless rifle! My best memory is of Lt. Siegrist dropping to the prone position with his compass, to shoot an azimuth on the RR rifle. We had both seen the muzzle flash and heard the round streaking past our heads, impacting behind us. We raced across the turnout area across the runway, holding onto our helmets and laughing all the way, hoping to make the 'C' Co. CP and call in a fire mission ASAP.

Lt. Siegrist had a "Triumph Motorcycle" T-shirt under his flack-jacket, wire-rimmed glasses. His camouflage helmet cover was real sloppy. I trusted his expertise calling in Fire Missions, which he did as soon as we slid into the temporary Charlie CP. Nothing was heard from that particular gun position after the lieutenant called in his coordinates to Alpha 1/13! Just another day in the life at Khe Sanh.

The couple of days prior to March 22nd were a brief respite from all the shit we'd been dealing with for 2 months. That night, it turned deadly. My last recollection is of reading a letter from my grandmother in Livingston, MT and realizing that we were getting hit real bad. We hunkered down in the Charlie CP. The last thing I did was fill the Coleman lanterns. I'd gotten tired of them going out in the middle of the night. When the round came in that took almost all of us out, it ignited the JP4 from the lantern and caused grievous injuries to my radio operators. The CO and XO and Company Gy/Sgt. were killed outright, too, from the artillery shell that impacted on the roof of the bunker. I was lucky in that the radios beside me took most of the blast. This was the second time that I'd escaped.

L/Cpl. Joseph Thomas Bailey, Sgt/Major Gaynor, Capt. David Ernst, Capt. Egger, Lt. Bush, and Gy/Sgt. Grohman, not to mention Pfc. Jenkins, and two other Marines whose names I cannot recall, were all KIA. I remember waking up and seeing an arm hanging above my head in the wreckage of the bunker. I think one of the officers may have still been alive and trying to get out prior to succumbing to his wounds. All of the men in the west end of the bunker died. I saw a patch of sky and climbed out like a chicken with a broken wing, having suffered no more than a broken shoulder and minor shrapnel and burns to my right arm and left leg. My radio operator, L/Cpl. John Mattern suffered deep second and third degree burns from his chin to his knees, as

Thank you, Mr. Geiger, for crossing the runway that night under fire, to get a corpsman over to our bunker. You did not have to do what you did, but I and my family and the families of those you saved that night thank you. We are forever in your debt. The rest is best left to memory, because all of us have to keep that part away from "polite society." I am sickened by what has happened since March of 03, but I suppose there will always be wars. Thank God for Marines, Soldierswho else would deal with the "dirty devices of this world?"

Thank you again, Lt. Bruce Geiger/Army Guns and Semper Fidelis, Blackbud Charlie, OUT

Bruce,

It was truly a terrible night as I remember it, as I stood in one of our fighting holes, 3rd squad, 3rd Platoon, Charlie Company. I can't remember who else was with me, but it sure sounded like Arty to us instead of a 122 Rocket. We had the lucky position of being directly in front of the old CP when it was hit with a 122 Rocket. I was in the trench line in an overhead covered fighting hole when the concussion knocked me to the ground. The new CP was further to the east than was the old one, but I swear to you, it sure sounded like artillery as it came from the southwest of us and sounded like a low flying jet or a train. It did not have that witch's scream like the rockets had. We lost some very fine Marines that night and Chuck was lucky for the second time.

Bruce:

Talk about scared...

I had 18 days and a wake-up left. I will always have fond memories of Lt. Bush who was my Platoon Leader when we went to the hills in early May 1967 to clean up the mess that was left. He was a compassionate and strong leader who would never put his Marines in jeopardy without being there with us.

SEMPER FI, Paul Bush—you will always be remembered.

Remembering That Night

by Nick Romanetz

Bruce,

Just to keep the record straight, Shannon and Sisson were my Marines, and they were not in the CP that night, but in a bunker just in front of one of your gun positions. They were KIA shortly after the Charlie CP was hit. Their bunker was east of the CP and took a 122 rocket and a third man inside escaped pretty much intact. The CP was brand new and well built. It is thought by many that a 152 round hit it. I think that the Final Formation states all of those KIA's were in the CP. I contacted Rev. Ray some time ago about the correction and that may have been addressed in the revised edition of Final Formation.

Remembering That Night

by Chuck Chamberlin

Bruce,

Nick's right. He ought to know. They were not in the bunker with us that evening. His bunker buddy, Gunnery Sergeant Grohman, chose to come to the CP that evening. Probably hadn't been there 1/2 hr. prior to his demise. "Eee Tai!" Gunny used to say (Japanese for "it hurts"). Despite many aspersions cast at him, Gunny Grohman did care about the guys in "C" Company. Being Company Gunny wasn't a popularity contest, and I saw him cry the day that '53 got shot down southeast of us. He was just stressed like the rest of us. His stress ended 3/22/68. I've been lucky enough to have visited his name on The Wall several times now. Ironically enough, their names are listed in the same position that they died that night...Capt. Egger, Lt. Bush, and The Gunny.

Chuck:

The gunny did appear to be a real hard ass but you are right, he cared very much about the well being of all Marines—from this green 2/Lt. right down to the privates and everyone in between. The Charlie Company lines definitely were in the impact area that night. Two direct hits on two bunkers and a lot of near misses. I remember the next morning as warm and sunny as we recovered our dead and cleaned up the damaged bunkers. Three weeks later, we were at Wonder Beach.

March 30, 1968

by Milton McNeely

The history books say differently but my opinion is that the siege ended on March 30, 1968. Bravo Company, successfully led by Ken Pipes, busted out, kicked ass, and took at least 115 NVA names. That was KIA; no telling how many wounded or DOW.

The target of this outstanding Marine assault was about 850 meters south of the Khe Sanh Combat Base perimeter. The enemy troops, estimated to be a NVA battalion, were occupying a heavily fortified position in the general area where the Ghost Patrol was ambushed on February 25th. A large part of the mission was to recover the remains of our lost Brothers from the 25th, and of course to destroy the enemy and their position.

The NVA must have felt the wrath of GOD was coming down on them when our Marines attacked with flame throwers and bayonets fixed. Many may have rather faced the wrath of GOD than the wrath of a single company of Marines seeking revenge and payback, not only for the 25th but for the entire Siege. Due to the heavy losses that Bravo Company had sustained throughout the Siege the mission was accomplished to a great extent by Marines who had just arrived fresh from the States, just out of boot camp. Much has been made of that fact and high praise was given to the quality of training they received stateside. Credit for the success of this action should go to the 1/26 staff for the excellent planning and coordination of the attack and most importantly to the officers and men of Bravo Company who carried it out.

One of the new guys who had just arrived on the 20th of January was PFC Don Rash. That night, he spent the night in the supply tent along with several other replacements who had arrived that day. They got in late enough that they had not even received weapons, helmets, or flak jackets. Not a good situation when the incoming poured in on the morning of the 21st. Don Rash was one of our new guys who was awarded the Navy Cross for action on March 30th. No amount of training could make this kind of hero who bravely gave his life for his fellow Marines.

On the opposite side of the spectrum from Don Rash was L/Cpl Wayne Moore. On the 30th he had just returned to Bravo Company from a special 30-day leave for extending his tour. He was actually listed on the company rolls at Bravo Company Headquarters as AWOL, as he didn't check in with Headquarters when he returned to his platoon and no one from his platoon notified Headquarters that he was back. Pure administrative error of some kind. He was at the other end of the spectrum from Don because of time in-country not because of heroism. He also heroically gave his life for his comrades in arms and he wreaked havoc on the enemy prior to his fall as did Don Rash.

There were several brave Marines lost that day. Each and every one a hero, but considering the fact that a Marine company was attacking a heavily fortified enemy position manned by a NVA battalion, the Marine casualties were miraculously light. Each and every one was accompanied by heroic and valorous acts that would require an entire book to even come close to an adequate explanation. The heroism, determination, selfless sacrifice, and outstanding leadership of all involved, greatly contributed to the accomplishment of the mission, and kept friendly casualties to a minimum.

This was one of the few successful bayonet charges of the Vietnam War, and is more representative of the Marine Corps and Corps traditions and standards than the rest of the Siege combined. The Marines of Bravo Company did what Marines do best. They left their defensive positions, attacked, and killed the enemy.

In regard to the 6,000 Marines at Khe Sanh being surrounded by 40,000 NVA, a Marine reportedly said, "We have them right where we want them."

My thought is that Bravo Company proved it on March 30, 1968. As a result of that action, the NVA command figured out that the Marines were not being held captive and that the Marines could and would attack and destroy the enemy at will. They decided to cut their losses and withdraw. That's why I think the Siege ended on March 30, 1968.

I also would like to mention some men who were in my squad on 30 March. Besides L/Cpl Moore, there were L/Cpl Smith, my 1st team leader and the best Marine I ever had in Nam. PFCs Anderson and Roper, my M-79 man L/Cpl Sinkowicz, and PFCs Miranda, Wilson, and Black. I'm not sure of his rank, but Shackly and Frank Brice. May have misspelled some of the names, and it is possible that some of these men may have been killed before the 30th, I just can't remember the time frames, but I want to say these men were true MARINES, and their action made me proud to be a Marine.

Mac, I'd like to mention another Marine that I met once and talked to about that day, Lonnie Wayne Morrison, PVT-E2. He had only been in Nam a week or 2 and was awarded the Silver Star for his actions on the 30th. He was in Don's squad.

I will add the names of two fine Marines who died that day. Cpl. Albert "Russ" Sanford, the 81's F.O. who replaced Gilbert Wall, and 1/Lt Marion "Hank" Norman, the Arty F.O. (one fine "down to earth" officer from Texas). Russ had just returned from 30-day leave after extending for "6 more" so that his married brother (also in the military) would not have to be sent to Nam. His mother told me three years ago that "that's just the way Albert was...always caring for his family. His father and brother never could get over losing Russ." Gotta love 'em, huh?

Road to Las Vegas
by Craig W. Tourte

I returned from a little road trip; just me in my old trailer. From Sacramento, California I drove over to Reno, Nevada then south on 395 to Carson City, Bridgeport, Bishop, Lone Pine, and then deep down into Death Valley. From Death Valley, I headed east to 95 and south to Las Vegas where I stayed for a week or so. I reversed course when I returned and drove all the way north up 95 to Reno, passing through numerous little desert towns and villages, stopping often.

While in Las Vegas I happened to get a hold of two Khe Sanh Veterans, Phil Nuchereno and Mike Powers. Both were gracious and shared their personal experiences while at Khe Sanh and what they were doing in their present life. Phil recently returned from Kosovo. I went to boot camp in San Diego with Mike. Ernie Spencer was Mike's CO in Delta 1/26. I never met Phil before and certainly did not remember Mike from boot camp some 39 years ago. I found Mike's memory for dates and places strikingly interesting, as I had forgotten similar details and facts. Phil had a heck of a time of it in Kosovo, often facing down angry mobs that threw rocks and bottles at him. The firing of an AK at the UN troops was not uncommon and two years of that kind of stress would get to anyone.

When I decided to travel to Las Vegas, I connected with them through this website and told them that I was coming. They both took a chance and agreed to meet with me, not knowing or caring what kind of an idiot I might be. I share this with you because I want you to know there are a lot of us out there. We are different for sure, but in a way we're the same. As my friend and fellow Khe Sanh Veteran Tom Horchler says, it does not matter who you are or what you have done, you were there and that is all that matters.

I think if you were to look closely you would find that we Khe Sanh Veterans all carry the same baggage, although I'm not sure I can describe what that is, I only know that it seems to be present in all of us. There is a line out of an old Clint Eastwood movie. Chief Dan George refers to his tribe as "The Human Beings." I think we, as Khe Sanh Veterans are like that, a kind of tribe of Human Beings, because we have developed the ability to feel and perhaps even project something indescribable that few others can.

Regarding My Meeting with Craig in Las Vegas

by Phil Nuchereno

It was a pleasure meeting Craig Tourte. I found him to be a gentleman. He certainly knows about Khe Sanh and is very supportive of all Khe Sanh Veterans. My fiancée and I both like Craig and feel we now have a new friend. A funny thing about Khe Sanh Veterans, I had never met Craig before, but it did not take long before we connected. As veterans, it was as if we had known each other for years. My fiancée and I were both impressed by Craig. We look forward to visiting with him again one day. I look forward to meeting other Khe Sanh veterans that visit Las Vegas.

It Didn't Take Long Before We Connected As Veterans

Phil: Now try to imagine what it would be like attending a reunion. Take the feelings you have now and project them tenfold and I bet it still wouldn't be enough to cover the experience of a reunion. SF

Road Trip to Vegas

Returned from Lake Tahoe on the 12th of this month. Stopped in Lone Pine at a small eatery. While my wife in I spent a week at Zephyr Cove, we had dinner with Jeff Bodenweiser and his wife at a restaurant at Camp Richardson (some may know of the place, not a military installation by any means). Also shared a table at the Charthouse. (Bring a flashlight if you eat there, some of the booths have very inadequate lighting. I asked the waiter for a flashlight, he went to another table, when he brought back a Swiss Army knife [small] with a red light for me to use.) Anyway, it is an interesting trip down 395 from Tahoe to I-15, with a lot of snow on the mountains. I know the Marines still train at Pickle Meadows (near Bridgeport and June Lake.)

Bigfoot Marine

But I Am Not a Killer

A boy in a soldier's uniform, not nowing or understanding.
What is war? Will I ever fill this uniform?
Uncle Sam said, Stand firm, Stand Tall,
Make your country proud.

I must kill to protect my country, my family, and what I've got.
But I am not a killer.

Stands before me this stranger to my eyes,
Yet I must make a decision, will he live or will I die?
But I am not a killer.

An innoceence inside me, now long dead and gone,
No longer a child, no longer carefree,
I must decide will it be him, or will it be me?
But I am not a killer.

His name never known, his face never forgotten,
This boy in a soldier's uniform, so young and so proud.
But a killer he is not.

I return home no longer a boy, yet not a man, I no longer fit in,
Strangers look at me, they call me a killer—a killer.
A country I fought so proudly for spit in my face,
And called me a disgrace.

Now a man aged will past my years. When I dream,
I hear his scream, I see his eyes,
This boy whose life passed before my eyes,
I will never forget them and I'm proud to say, -----
But I am not a killer, ------- a killer I am not.

Seeking Information

by Michael Takiff

I am the author of Brave Men, Gentle Heroes: American Fathers and Sons in World War II and Vietnam, published in 2003 by William Morrow (an imprint of HarperCollins).

> "Michael Takiff's page-turner, featuring the stories of fathers and sons who served in World War II and Vietnam, paints a picture of these two wars through new eyes."
> Army Times

James Bradley, author of "Flags of Our Fathers and Flyboys called Brave Men," a fascinating journey into the hearts and minds of dads and their boys as they discuss the crucible of war." Library Journal called it "a major contribution to the history of these two distinct and influential wars."

I am beginning work on a new book: a comprehensive history of the Tet Offensive of 1968. And I am looking for military personnel, American or Vietnamese, who saw action during the offensive (including any who fought at Khe Sanh, Jan.-Mar. '68). If you fit this description, I'd be most grateful if you'd email me at tetbook@earthlink.net. Please include the designation of your outfit and tell me where you were during this time. Include a brief description of your combat experience during Tet/Khe Sanh. Please include contact information so that we may speak over the phone. Depending on the size of the response to my query, I may not be able to call everyone right away. But I will definitely be in touch as soon as I can. Also, if you know of other people who might have collections and information to share regarding Tet/Khe Sanh, please forward this email to them or include their contact info in your email to me. Thank you for taking the time to read this notice. I will greatly appreciate hearing from anyone willing to share memories about this key period of the Vietnam War.

The following is a series of thoughts from Craig Tourte of his Vietnam experience, and how it has affected him.

(1) Every Single One is Important

Donald Baron Sanders, KIA March 4, 1968. RIP

by Craig W. Tourte, HQ 1/13

There were so many and every single one is important and all should be remembered. All who died at Khe Sanh continue to affect us to this day. How can we forget them? Sometimes we try, but should we forget? They are always standing before us, their memory is with us every day. While we remember them all, there are the personal ones, men who we were with, the ones we still see in our thoughts and dreams. The ones whose young faces we still see and whose voices we still hear. Their quick death was a reminder that it could come to us just as suddenly. We are the ones who now speak for those who cannot. We are the ones who can tell their story because they cannot. We are the ones who can try to make the others understand, because they cannot. We are the ones who can tell their families that they loved them and thought about them every day, because they cannot.

Donald Baron Saunders was just another U. S. Marine Corps private at Khe Sanh Combat Base who died on March 4, 1968, as did many others. I would like to post a small piece taken from the Belleville, New Jersey March Times, "Belleville Sons Honor Roll," dated March 14, 1968.

> Since he had to leave this world, I am glad he left it the way he did, with courage and fighting for his country. There was little else for William D. Saunders to say. He is the father of PFC Donald Saunders who was killed in action in Vietnam recently. The young Saunders, only 20, died of wounds to his head and body from enemy mortar fire in Quang Tri (Khe Sanh) last week. Saunders enlisted in the Marines two years ago on September 28. It was a day that William Saunders will never forget, as it was the elder Saunders' birthday. Donald completed his basic training at Parris Island, S.C., and advanced infantry training at Camp Lejeune, N.C. He volunteered for duty in Vietnam.
> When asked why, Mrs. Maisie Saunders, his mother, said, "Donald was never too talkative. He made his own decisions. I think he felt the boys were doing a good job and he should back them up."

"It was just a job that had to be done for him," added Saunders, "and he never complained." In all his letters there was never a word of complaint. He tried to reassure us, in fact." Mrs. Saunders states that Donald did mention in one letter that he did not know whether it was the last letter or not and that they were surrounded by the enemy. According to his mother, the difficulties of the people of Vietnam particularly affected him. He wrote home about the villagers who had to scramble for food and were so starved that they were eating garbage.

Donald did manage to telephone home just two weeks ago at 3 A.M. to talk to his parents. This is how Mrs. Saunders remembers the call. "We were surprised and so happy to hear his voice. The first thing he said was don't talk about anything military, Mom. There was so much confusion because of the relay through Hawaii that we could not say very much. I said something and then had to wait for it to be relayed. He did say, "What's happening, Mom?" which was his favorite expression. It was so good to hear that. I only wish we could have talked much longer, it was over so quickly, so very quickly. A member of the First Battalion of the 13th Marines, PFC Saunders attended Belleville High School. He was a member of the cross-country team that won the Big Ten Conference Championship in 1965. He was also a member of Little Zion U AME Church in Belleville.

Of the military conditions in Vietnam, Saunders never said a great deal, according to his family. Of course, Mrs. Saunders said, he sometimes wrote that he gave candy and food to the Vietnamese children. The only thing he really asked for was undershirts. It seems that you could not purchase them over there because of the climate. "When he enlisted," the senior Saunders adds, "we hoped for the best, we did not want anything to happen. But we know he was on a machine gun and the first thought of any enemy is to knock the machine gun out. At least he wasn't like those doves or slobs, who try to find any excuse to get out of going. That is the one thing I remember, he never, even after he was in combat, said he was sorry or complained." PFC Saunders leaves besides his parents, a brother Kenneth, who is 16-years-old and a sister, Miss Kathleen, both at home.

Besides being a fellow Marine, Donald was a friend of one of two African-Americans in our unit. I collected what few personal belongings he had and gave them to our sergeant for shipment home to his family. I completed my tour and was shipped home a few months later. When I got home I sent his family a letter. I told them that I had been with Donald shortly before he died and how sorry I was. I also told them that Donald was a great friend and how highly he was respected and liked by all of us. They returned a letter to me thanking me for my thoughts. I never heard from his family again, but to this day I think of them often. There are just so many things I would like to tell them.

Thomas Horchler is another Marine who I was with at Khe Sanh and someone to this day I continue to have an association with. Tom placed Donald's body into his truck and drove Donald to graves registrations. Although that chapter in Donald's life ended that day at Khe Sanh, it did not end for us—and in a way, started a new chapter in the lives of everyone Donald's short life touched.

The point is, all Khe Sanh Veterans have a personal account similar to this one. To us, their loss was not just a number or a name but a real "hit you in the gut" memory. I think a lot of us are still waiting to see how those memories are going to affect us and the lives of those whose lives we have touched, as we continue to turn each new page in the chapter of our life.

(2) Difficult Times

This is a difficult time for many of us. The anniversary of the Siege causes us all to take a moment to remember those who did not return. I think for many of us, the Siege at Khe Sanh was the defining point in our lives; we balance everything against that experience. We also understand that many of our brothers died prior to and subsequent to the Siege, on the hills, in the jungles and in the air. The posts of tributes and final formations attest to the loss still felt by so many.

The 77-day Siege of the United States Marine Corps Combat Base at Khe Sanh, Vietnam at the start of Tet on January 21, 1968, is never far from the memory of those who fought there. We are middle-aged men now, some with whole parts and some missing parts, but we're here. Many others who fought with us are not. We knew so many; we can still see their faces as if it were yesterday. Although we see ourselves for the age we have become, those young faces have never changed. One would think those memories would fade; on the contrary, as we grow older we remember and appreciated their courage and sacrifice even more.

We were the ones who were with them when death came. The one's who held them in our arms, tried so hard to save them and knew we could not. Their loved ones miss them and so do we. I wonder if we may just miss them a little more. Their families have adjusted to their absence and still mourn their terrible loss; we, who were with them, still mourn their death. A song, a cloud, a crowd of happy people in a laughter-filled room brings me back to the thoughts of those who are no longer here. Those young men, who wanted to live, fought to live, tried to live, yet died so that we could live. Men whose faces I still see today. Men I lived with, men I fought alongside, men I endured hardship with, men I loved like brothers, most I didn't know, but I shall never forget them.

We all pay tribute in our own way and we'll never forget.

(3) Road to Khe Sanh

I have only been on two convoys, one into Khe Sanh and the other out. The first was the convoy from Dong Ha traveling sixty kilometers west on Highway 9 to the Marine Corps Combat Base sometime around August 1967. The 9th Marine Amphibious Brigade (MAB) whose men later transitioned to parts of the 13th and 26th Marines, formed up in Okinawa where we loaded onto the U.S.S. Washtenaw County LST (1166. An LST (Landing Ship Tank) that I was sure somehow was lost after WWII and hidden from the cutting torches until it was suddenly discovered and put back into service for Vietnam. It actually was built at Sturgeon Bay, Wis., in 1951. (Late in June 1960, she bade farewell to the United States for the last time. Though her Navy career was destined to continue for another 13 years, the tank landing ship would never return to American shores (Dictionary of American Naval Fighting Ships).(It sure seemed like an old historic relic to me. It was a two-week crawl across the ocean to Vietnam. The Washtenaw seemed to sail at less than slow speed; old rusty smoke belching freighters would pass us day and night. The old tub creaked, moaned and rolled the whole way. We Marines were stretched out on canvas racks deep down in the belly of the ship, with just a couple of inches between us—it was a miserable ride.

It was however, the first time I had ever heard the term "Navy shower." It was hot, sticky and close in that old ship's belly. Another Marine and I were taking a rather long shower and having a pretty good time letting the cool water roll over our bodies when a sailor came in and started yelling at us. I could never tell if some of those guys were enlisted or officers—they wore a khaki type of uniform with silver on their collars so we played it safe and called him sir. He yelled, "Haven't you ever heard of a Navy shower?" We could not understand why he was so upset. Of course, our look was blank and our response was no. His explanation seemed logical to me (they'd run out of water), so we shut off the water until he left and then, joined by others, turned it back on and continued with our new found refreshing experience. It would be our last real shower involving pressurized plentiful water for a long time.

After stopping in Danang to unload some equipment we continued north along the coast and finally disembarked on Cue Viet beach where we unloaded our vehicles and gear. We dug our fox holes in the sand and stayed for a couple of days. We made our way up to Cue Viet harbor and onto small LSUs (Landing Ship Utility) for our trip up the Cue Viet River and ten kilometers inland to Dong Ha. Besides the sniper fire and my rifle jamming because of sand fouling the receiver, all went pretty well. We arrived in Dong Ha just before dark, welcomed by a hail of incoming mortars and rockets. Rockets screamed in, smoke filled the air, loud blasts of detonation from incoming rounds, and outgoing reports from Marine artillery overloaded my senses. It was a total chaotic site as we slowly docked. A rather large Marine lieutenant ran out to meet us and helped us unload the trucks and gear and got us moving up the road. I heard later that he had been a football player in college and was highly regarded by his men. I was immediately impressed with the way he took charge; he seemed like the only one who knew what he was doing and his strength was somehow reassuring. With the confusion of the incoming rounds and his take-charge attitude keeping us all under control, I thought his actions were extremely heroic, it just seemed like he had no fear.

We spent our first night in Dang Ha housed in an above ground wooden type of barracks right next to a unit which just a few nights before received a direct hit from a rocket, killing a couple of Marines. As the rockets and mortars rained into Dong Ha, we all felt particular venerable and knew at any moment we were going to be the next set of casualities. Frequent dashes to the feces and garbage-strewn trenches outside, made for some pretty exhausted young Marines.

The thought of leaving Dong Ha the next day was a welcome relief—what a God-awful place. You just had the feeling that nothing good could ever happen there. Flat, dry, seemingly desolate, and certainly not defensible, and attested too, by the many rounds of incoming we had endured during our stay.

It seemed that the Marine Corps always started any activity very early in the morning and this morning was no different. Hurry up and get your gear together, hurry to get into formation, hurry to get over to the location where the convoy was staging, hurry and get to the truck you would be riding, hurry and stow you gear and then wait around for several hours for something to happen. The wait did give me a few hours to assess the convoy and I have to admit, I was looking forward to the adventure. It was just an incredible assortment of vehicles and weapons. Besides the numerous deuce-and-a-half trucks, there were trucks with quad fifty machine guns on turrets accompanying us as convoy escorts. The quad fifty was originally configured to provide anti-aircraft fire during WWII. There were twin 40 guns placed on some type of wheeled vehicle and it seemed that ever third or forth truck had a 50-caliber machine gun in a turret, placed where a passenger would have normally sat in the front seat. I think there may have even been a tank or two.

We mounted up around mid-morning. It certainly seemed like a formidable force with all the men and supporting arms. We drove from Dong Ha at a crawl, smoke bellowing, gears grinding, trucks swaying and overloaded. A cargo of bright faces, new green uniforms, clean weapons at the ready and not a clue as to what lay ahead. As we entered the dark green foliage of the jungle on Highway 9, Huey helicopter gun ships joined us overhead.

The Vietnamese had been fighting invaders for hundreds of years. The Chinese, Japanese, French, and now the Americans. At the time, there was not a better-trained, experienced, motivated jungle fighting force in the entire world and we were driving through their front door. We must have looked pretty fresh and new to the experienced Vietnamese soldiers who I am sure were hiding and observing us carefully along our route. Highway 9 was a tunnel through the jungle. Deep foliage was all around, often there was a canopy of growth overhead and for the most part it was a narrow, one-lane dirt road. Occasionally we would pass stationary Marine units in defensive positions guarding a bridge or outlook point. It was a long slow ride, and I began to realize how vulnerable the convoy was to sniper fire and ambush.

My first impression of Khe Sanh as we climbed over the crest of a hill was that the base looked pretty desolate, bleak and kind of tired and worn out, but the surrounding jungle was almost Shangri-La like. The jungle was so green and dark that I can only describe the color as a kind of a deep blue.

The convoy passed along the south end of the base and entered the main gate located at the southwest. I don't remember if there were even any guards at the entrance. We made a sharp right turn and stopped. This was going to be our home for some time. Looking out towards the jungle there was one strand of concertina wire and a few yards of tangle foot. There were no trenches or defensive covered fighting positions, just a few fighting holes. I was struck by the realization that compared to Dong Ha, Khe Sanh was rather small with little defensive positions and few Marines.

Marine ready for action, I was tired of being shelled seemingly every day I had been in Vietnam. In just those few days I was tired of having to take it and never having had the opportunity to return any of what I was more than willing to give back to the enemy. Little did I realize incoming was something that would forever shape my life and the lives of those who stood with me on that dusty road. What lay ahead would forever change the U.S. Marine Corps, its history, its future, the future of the War in Vietnam, the political future of this Nation's president, and the future of all subsequent conflicts this nation would ever become involved in. As a young Marine, being up there in the mountains was both frightening and exciting. The bloody Siege of the U.S. Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, South Vietnam was about to begin and none of us knew it.

There wasn't much in the way of a defensive perimeter when our convoy pulled into Khe Sanh from Dong Ha that August evening 1967. The base at Khe Sanh had been occupied at various times over the years by a variety of countries, armies, including various units of the U. S. Army and U.S. Marines. Currently the base was being held by the 9th Marines. The Marines I saw that day appeared to be just as exhausted as the base seemed bleak, tired and worn out. The Marines had been battling in the Hills since 1966 in an underreported slugfest with elements of the North Vietnamese Army while using a newly issued M16 rifle that continually failed, resulting in numerous American casualties.

By looking at the uniforms worn by those troops who had been at Khe Sanh for some time and those of us who had just arrived, the casual observer would have thought we were from two different armies. While our uniforms were relatively clean and kind of a bright green color with green helmet cover and black leather boots, the uniforms worn by the Khe Sanh Marines were stained a dull red color because of the volcanic dirt so prevalent in that part of the country. They all wore jungle boots, which were, of course, also stained a red color. The Marines had a kind of emasculated starved look about them and deep sunken eyes with dark circles around the sockets. Besides being an odd red color, their uniforms were all torn and ratty and kind of mismatched like they had been patched together from different uniform handouts. We dismounted from the trucks at our assigned location and were immediately ordered to "dig in" before we started doing anything else. I took out my entrenching tool, and myself and another Marine started to dig what I can best describe as a kind of hole in the middle of our encampment with no defensive purpose in mind. I confess I did not know what I was doing besides just digging into the ground. I thought I would dig something a few feet below the ground, something sufficient to perhaps sleep in and protect me from whatever, although I didn't know what that was. After a few hours of digging with tired blistered hands, we decided that our protective depression, now about six inches deep and eight feet wide, was good enough. Besides, the ground was really hard, so we decided to call it a day.

We then joined the usual work detail unloading the trucks of the various hodgepodge of equipment carried by a headquarters company. For the rest of the week, one day was the same as the next, primarily setting up headquarters company of the 13th Marines. One evening a couple of those Khe Sanh Marines came by and stopped by our little depression as we were sitting inside. They just stood there for a couple of minutes not saying anything. Then one of them said something along the lines of, when the incoming starts you'll realize that no hole you can dig is deep enough. Incoming. I was thinking more along the lines of small arms fire, but then again I did not really know what to expect.

I had many subsequent conversations with these Marines in the days to follow. Each time they would offer some more advice. Dig your bunker deeper, narrow not so wide this is how to place your sandbags around the top, stock and carry more ammunition than you think you'll ever need, keep your rifle clean, keep lots of water around, this is the way to construct a hell box for your claymores, this is the way to set your claymores out so the NVA won't turn them around on you, check the wire every morning and every night. Somehow hearing it from these Marines who were privates like me, just kind of made me realize that the lessons they were provided were darn important and that I had better listen to their advice.

What was most interesting about my association with these Marines were the long evenings that I spent talking with them. In hushed, quiet whispers they would talk about the hill fights. How the NVA would hide in spider holes and shoot at the troops from behind after they had walked by. How during the battles they were often unable to even see the enemy and they would have crawl to look for Marines who had been wounded and were crying and yelling for help. About how so many men had been lost. How after the battles the Marines would spend the next several days walking the hills looking for the dead and when found, carry them on their shoulders off the battlefield. I tried to listen and learn as much as I could. I could not have respected any group of men more than those Marines.

Then one day I noticed they were gone. No good bye, no good luck, no see you later, no saddle up and move out. They were just gone and we seemed so alone. I think it was then I realized Khe Sanh was over for them. The bloody and long hill fights, the jammed weapons, the carrying of the dead, the sleepless nights, the total exhaustion, the defense of the Marine Corps Combat of Khe Sanh was all behind them. It was up to us now. It was our Khe Sanh to defend. They did the best that they could, they gave all they had left to us and they had no more to give. Khe Sanh Combat Base was closed and abandoned in April 1968 shortly after the 77-day Siege that accounted for over two hundred killed and an untold number wounded. I often drift back and remember those who fought before us, who suffered before us, and to those who were there for us.

(4) Heroes

I wish I had been a hero, but I wasn't. It would have been thrilling to have my peers recognize me for my exceptional bravery and heroic deeds on the battlefield, but there were none. All of my medals from my service in Vietnam and the Siege of Khe Sanh were REMF. When I received shrapnel wounds from the exploding ammunition dump and the numerous incomings, I just took care of them myself, as did the many around me who received the same type of minor wounds and injuries. I was never involved in any heroic deeds or individual acts of bravery.

I have met two real legitimate recognized Congressional Medal of Honor recipients. Captain Jan Vargas, Company G, 2d Battalion, 4th Marines who fought at Dai Do. Captain Vargas was wounded numerous times while he maneuvered Marines across 700 meters of open rice paddy while under intense enemy fire after the enemy launched a massive counterattack at his position. He killed one enemy solider with his knife.

I met John Cavaiani (Staff Sergeant, U.S. Army), at the Khe Sanh reunion in 2003. On June 5, 1971, while serving as a platoon leader on hill 950 or 1015, and while the hill was being overrun he refused to be evacuated by helicopter and stayed behind with the remainder his men fighting off the NVA. While others escaped he grabbed a machine gun and held off the attacking enemy. He was eventually captured and was beaten as he watched others who had been captured and assassinated by the enemy.

Both are wonderful men who anyone would enjoy spending time with. I wonder if I had been placed in those same circumstances, if I would have performed as well. I have known other combat heroes more unsung. Some received a little recognition, but most have received none.

There must be a lot of heroes out there most of us don't know about, because I hear and see them all the time. My attention is often drawn to the loud ones in the bar, club or social gathering who are boasting about their combat experience and heroic deeds and tales of being there. I read stories from the ones who post on the various web sites boasting about their combat experiences with tales of super secret hunter killer teams and events they just cannot talk about, who won't identify themselves by signing their real name or provide the name of their unit or commanding officer. My suspicion is that most of them are phonies. I have not met any real Vietnam Combat Veterans who were loud, boisterous or braggarts (although I am sure there is the exception.) Most seem to have returned home and just lived their lives as best they could.

My point is there really were a lot of heroes in Vietnam. Just ordinary men, placed into extraordinary circumstances, most of us will never hear or read about them.

Where Do They Come From?

This is written by a Navy Commander at a port in Kuwait. No commentary needed, the 3-minute read below says more than a 20-page article could about our warriors and the constitution of our men. Where do we get such men? "They are so damn young."

I was going to the gym tonight (really just a huge tent with weights and treadmills), and we had heard that one of the MEUs (Marine Exp Units) that had come out of service in the "triangle" was redeploying (leaving country). We saw their convoy roll in to the Kuwait Naval Base as the desert sun was setting. I have never seen anything like this. Trucks and humvees that looked like they had just come through a shredder. Their equipment was full of shrapnel blast holes and missing entire major pieces that you could tell had been blasted by IEDs. These kids looked bad too! I mean, sunken eyes, thin as rails, and that 1000-yd. stare they talk about after direct combat. Made me pretty damn embarrassed to be a "rear area warrior."

All people could do was stop in their tracks and stare and feel like me...like I wanted to bow my head in reverence. A Marine Captain stationed with me, who was standing next to me, was also heading to the gym. He said, "Part of 1st Brigade Combat Team, 8th Marines, sir. Took the heaviest losses of any single unit up north as part of Task Force Danger, sir."

As the convoy rolled up, all of us watching just slowly crept toward these kids as they dismounted the Hummers and 5-tons. Of course, we were all shiny and clean compared to these warriors. These kids looked like they had just crawled from Iraq. I had my security badge and ID around my neck, and started to help them unload some of their duffle bags.

A crusty Gunny came up to me and said "Sir, you don't have to do that..." I said, "Gunny...yes, I do..." They all looked like they were in high school or younger!! All held themselves sharply and confident, despite the extreme fatigue you could tell they had endured. "You guys out of the triangle?" I asked. "Yes, sir." Fourteen months and twice into the grinder, sir"—both fights for Fallujah. All I could do was throw my arm around their shoulders and say, "Thanks Marine, for taking the fight to the bad guys...We love you, man."

I looked at these young kids, not one of them complaining or showing signs of anything but focus, and good humor. "Sir, they got ice cream at the DFAC, sir? "Haven't had real ice cream since we got here." They continued to unload and after I had done my handshakes and shoulder hugs, the Captain and I looked at each other.

They want ice cream—we'll get them ice cream. You see, a squid O-5 and a focused Marine O-3 can get just about anything, even if the mess is closed. Needless to say, we raided the closed DFAC (mess tent) much to the chagrin of one very pissed-off mess sergeant and grabbed boxes of ice cream sandwiches (as many as we could carry), and hustled back to the convoy. I felt like Santa Claus. "Thank you, sir." again and again from each trooper, as we tossed up the bars to the guys in the trucks. I'm thinkin', "Son, what the hell are you thanking me for? I can't thank you enough."

And they are so damned young... I will sleep well knowing they are watching my back tonight.

My Return to Hill 861

by Dennis Mannion

Dennis' bunker on Hill 861 (1968)

It was early morning on July 13, 2000, and more than anything else, it was the overwhelming silence that shook me up. Oh, there was the force of the wind that swirled the leaves on the trees and moved the scrub vegetation from time to time, but the only real sound to intrude on my thoughts was my breathing as I walked along what used to be the outer trench line of Hill 861. When I had last been there in 1968, the hill was a place of unrelenting noise at all times of the day and often at night. Bomb runs and bomb strikes, artillery impacts, mortar rounds coming in and going out, recoilless rifle blasts, the thump and whine of helicopters, the incessant chatter of machine guns, all the big stuff, were always in competition with incessant radio static and chatter, entrenching shovels being used, c-rats being opened, muted voices and strident yells.

Now, over three decades later, I stood atop Hill 861 and I was comforted by the fact that terrain features on the distant hills were the same; bomb craters on the NVA-held ridgeline 500 meters to the west were still evident in precisely the same spots as my old photographs depicted; and the remains of my old bunker were exactly where I'd knew they'd be. But the absence of noise was disconcerting. That and standing out in the open exposed to the nearby hills without a care in the world, something that would have brought instant death so many years before!

I had hiked up to 861 two days earlier with seven others—three Khe Sanh vets and some civilians—but this venture back 48 hours later was a solo journey. After hiking by myself from the old combat base access road to the top of 861, I felt honored and blessed to be standing in a place of so much death, destruction, and bloodshed. I thought about battlefields all over the world and the toll in human life on both sides, and it was almost too unrealistic to acknowledge that I was entirely alone on a hill of such military and historic significance. I stood at what used to be my bunker entrance and stared down at my civilian hiking boots. Amazing, I thought, to reflect that the last time my boots were on this exact spot of earth, it was 12 April 68. My boots were scuffed up jungle boots, and I was leaving by helicopter for the quick ride to 881S and the pending Easter Sunday assault of 881N. Now, 32 years latter, I had come back to 861 to say goodbye and to try to come to terms with all that had happened to me and my friends on this hill and on the ridges and in valleys around it.

In February of 2000, when I began the process of making plans for a return to 861, I felt that I needed to do something for buddies of mine who never came home. In April of that year, I was in church for Palm Sunday services, and acting on a hunch, I grabbed an extra handful of blessed palm as I headed out the door with my family. At home I cut off the flimsy ends of the palms, and what I had left were rigid pieces about 20 inches long. I cut those into pieces about 3 inches in length, and I used a magic marker to write in the names of Marines and corpsman who I personally knew who had died in Vietnam. Along with the names I added the dates of their deaths, and when I was done, I put the 28 pieces of palm into a plastic bag. It was an unsettled late spring and early summer at my home in Cheshire, CT. I was soon to return to a place that had been a part of my daily thinking for over three decades and I did not know what to expect. I just knew that with the opportunity in front of me, I had to go. My entire Vietnam trip and return took two weeks, but I am only concerned (as I was then) with my time on 861. Our group spent a total of four days and three nights at Khe Sanh. The initial day was spent touring the old combat base and settling into our rustic accommodations in town.

On Day 2 we got up early for the departure to 861. We rode out past the old combat base in our hired van. Passengers other than me included KS vets Paul Knight (861) and his son Todd, Bob Arrotta (881S), Glenn Prentice (881S), Dave Kniess (my former student), Donna Elliott (searching for info on her MIA brother), and our Vietnamese translator Le Hanh. We stopped the van at a point where the trail to 861 looked promising. It seemed to be in the very area that Kilo Company 3/26 had used back on 26 Dec 67 to hike to 861, and with my original FO map in hand, we set out with heavy packs under scattered clouds and spitting rain. It took over four hours for the lead group (Glenn, Bob, Dave, and I) to get onto 861. The stragglers arrived within an hour of that, so that by noon all of us were on the hill.

We pitched three tents near the old CP bunker, but the wind picked up and the rain really began to pelt us. I paid scant attention to the weather as I had no trouble finding my old bunker! I spent over an hour cutting all the fresh growth away so I could expose the actual hole I had lived in 33 years before. By mid-afternoon one of the tents had collapsed, one was leaking badly (my twenty-year-old, two-man backpacking tent), and there was nothing to see or do. Our initial plan was to spend the night on 861, hike over to 881s the next day, overnight there, and return to town the following morning. The weather conspired against us, however, and by mid-afternoon half the group left for a harrowing return to town in even harder rain, powerful winds, and gathering darkness. Dave, fearing for his very expensive video camera was one of those who left. I stayed, along with Bob, Glenn, and our interpreter. The 4 of us spent a miserable night in a tent that really was designed for 2 or 3 at the most!

In the morning of Day 3, the weather was worse. We staggered out of the crowded tent into winds that were a constant 50 to 60 mph with a cold rain that was driven sideways across the top of the hill. Literally, we could not see beyond 15 feet. Even as fanatical and determined as I was to not leave, there was no point in staying on 861 or heading over to 881s. With great reluctance, we shouldered our rain soaked gear and trudged back towards the old combat base. Arriving in town, we were informed that our group was being arrested. Being on the hills without a permit (and a guide) was a serious violation of local laws and the police demanded our passports! The authorities said that we would have to pick them up in the late afternoon of the next day in Dong Ha (26 miles away). After some discussions with the local authorities, Bob and Glenn got permission to try to get to 881s on the morning of Day 4. He agreed to let them go if they signed the proper forms. I spoke up and asked for permission to go back to 861 in order to retrieve our one good tent. This was a lie. I just felt a need to spend more time on a hill I had come half way around the world to visit. Forms were signed for Dave and me, and that night we packed up for a second return to 861.

Dave and I awoke at 4 in the morning on the 13th of July for our return visit. We had made arrangements for two local kids to give us rides on their motorbikes back to the spot where the trail to 861 left the old combat base access road. It was raining fairly well but the wind had died down. In the dark, I lost track of Dave and his driver. Ten minutes later, I was at the trail junction but without Dave. What I did not know—and would not know until later in the afternoon—was that Dave's driver had stopped for gas, and Dave, sensing that the rain would be bad for his camera, directed the kid back to the guest house. I waited for fifteen minutes without any idea of where Dave was and I was troubled about what to do. Eventually, I paid my driver a dollar, strapped on my pack and turned for 861 alone.

I had no trouble getting up there; in fact, with less weight and no tent to lug, it took just over three hours. I only stopped once, by large tree on Hill 700, for water and a granola bar. In many places, I could see the tracks and boot prints made by all of us in the previous days. By 7:30 in the morning, I was again on the former LZ of 861 but this time I was totally alone! Amazingly, the rain stopped, and while the sun never came out, it was easy to see over to the other ridgelines. For the next 4 hours it was just me, the mist, the memories, and the history of the hill. I felt privileged to be walking around a place of so much pain and so much sacrifice. I walked the entire trench line again, re-visited my old bunker (where I had cut down all the vegetation two days earlier), and dug a bit in the dirt. I found an old C-rat spoon, some barbed wire, part of a USMC flak jacket, and the fin assembly of an NVA 82 mortar. I knew that I had to be off the hill by noon because the van was going to leave Khe Sanh for Dong Ha by 3:00 p.m. So when it was time to go, I thought of the blessed palms in my pocket. I lugged my gear (and the "new" stuff from the hill) down to the LZ. I returned to the top of the hill, and right between my bunker and the old CP bunker, I took out the names of the dead.

Speaking at the top of my voice, I said an Our Father and a Hail Mary. Then, one palm at a time, I read the name aloud and said, "May God have mercy on your soul." As I let each piece go, the breeze caught them and sent them in various directions. After 28 names (and a few tears on my part), I returned to the LZ. As I bent over my pack to tighten things up for travel, I looked back to the top. I was stunned to see a group of figures—15 to 20—standing in a loose formation or a group at the top of the hill. They had on helmets and flak jackets and the wind moved their clothing and the ponchos that some of them were wearing! I blinked, looked away, looked back, and they were still there looking down at me. No matter how many times I looked away and then back, they were still there looking at me. I started to cry and in a loud voice, I asked them to watch over my family and all my friends. As the seconds passed, I felt less alarmed and more comforted. After ten minutes, and knowing that I could not delay any longer, I picked up my pack, saluted the entire group, turned my back to them, crossed the LZ, and dropped off into the elephant grass below. I never looked back at them or the hill again.

It's been almost 5 years since I last walked on 861. I am a different person today as a result of my time up there. Until the day I die, the 13th of July will always be a new anniversary day for me. Semper Fi.

The Zig-Zag Club Chapter 1

by Robert McLane F Btry 2/12

Cameron, Texas 1974

Sheriff Black pushed his hat back and sighed. "Son, sometimes this job can be pretty rough, like when I'm telling a pretty young woman that her husband has just been killed by a drunk driver or a father that his daughter has been arrested for dope.

Sometimes things don't make sense, but a sheriff has to listen when the judge is talking, even if I don't understand a damn thing he is saying. I don't think there is anything wrong with you, but your brother thinks you're nuts and the judge agrees. Now, I have to deliver you to the veterans' psychiatric hospital in Waco. Sometimes, I think the whole world has gone rubber room crazy."

I was beginning to think that my life had turned into a never-ending shit storm, a series of train wrecks where, despite my best intentions, all my dreams and plans had once again ended upside down in a pile of twisted and burning metal while passing strangers stared and shook their heads. These were supposed to be the good times I had waited so long for, the dreams that I had held on to through all those long nights and days in the DMZ. Texas had seemed a million miles away when I was curled up in a fetal position in a muddy trench in Khe Sanh while North Vietnamese artillery shells screamed down from almost eighteen miles away. All I could think about back then was the day that I would climb on board that big freedom bird that would take me back to the world I left behind. I soon found out that it was a world that had changed forever." Don't worry about it, Sheriff. I have been in a lot worse situations than whatever is waiting in Waco. At least I'll be sleeping between sheets."

We passed an old truck loaded down with bales of fresh cut hay. Sheriff Black looked at me. "I appreciate what boys like you have gone through over there for this country. A lot of folks don't, but I do. I appreciate it and I want you to know it."

We waited for the one red light in the small town of Lott to turn green while beside us a long freight train headed north was slowly picking up speed. I smiled. "Well Sheriff, I wish you appreciated it enough to let me hop on that old freight train out of ---------- here." Sheriff Black laughed. "I would like to do that Robert, but I wouldn't be doing the job the voters in Milam County hired me to do. I can't just pick and choose which orders I will follow when the judge hands them down. He said to take you to the VA hospital in Waco and that's where you are going."

We pulled into a truck stop for gas. "Son, I'm getting hungry. I guess we got time for a bite to eat. You can have anything on the menu. Milam County is going to pick up the tab. "We walked into the small cafe and found a booth. The waitress brought over two glasses of water and looked me over. "What did he do?" Sheriff Black smiled. "Betty, he burned down a rock fence back in Cameron! Now get us some coffee over here and a couple of those chicken fried steaks before I arrest you too." I smiled as I drank coffee and people looked around and wondered what was going on. It was pretty obvious from my shoulder-length long hair and beard that I wasn't the new deputy. One couple got up and paid their check and left.

"Looks like I am making some people nervous. Maybe you ought to have me in handcuffs. "Sheriff Black shook his head as he cut into his steak. "Sheriffs in Texas have their own ways of doing things and if enough people don't like it, they can vote them out come Election Day." He looked at me. "Son, I want to ask you a question. What was it like over there?"

I watched the waitress bringing my coconut pie. "Remember that traveling carnival that you ran out of Cameron a few years back? The one with all those rigged games?" Sheriff Black nodded his head. "I remember, folks were losing all their money trying to knock over milk bottles filled with cement. Well, sheriff that was sort of what the Vietnam War was like. Everybody was wearing out their arms trying to knock over some cement milk bottles. After throwing a couple of thousand baseballs, you feel like your arms are going fall off and the damn milk bottles are still standing. This time there wasn't any sheriff coming around to close the game down. My job wasn't all that different from yours. We wore uniforms and carried guns and tried to catch bad guys, Mostly, we just tried to stay alive."

I finished my pie. The sheriff paid the tab and tipped the waitress. We drove through the main gate of the VA hospital and parked in front of the administration building. I guess he had made the trip before. He walked around and opened the door for me. I stepped out and followed him inside. We found a receptionist, and the sheriff signed some papers while I sat in a chair and waited. I looked over my shoulder at a picture of Richard Nixon staring down at me. He was smiling. I smiled back into Tricky Dick's eyes. He seemed to be thinking, I've got you now, my little war protestor. You zigged when you should have zagged.

I saw my brother walk in. I looked at him. "Why are you doing this?"

"Because I love you." Tears welled up in his eyes and he turned away. Sheriff Black walked over.

"Son, I better get on back to Milam County. You take care of yourself, now, you hear? "We shook hands and he left. A man in a white coat sat down beside me and took a ball point pen out of his shirt. He began making notes on a clipboard. He looked over at me. "Sir, my name is Dr. Herster. If you don't mind, I'd like to ask you a few questions." "Sure." I looked at him. He had a gentle grandfather's face and silver white hair. He started asking me questions...a lot of dumb questions.

"Mr. McLane, who is the President? I looked up at Nixon. "That ugly asshole in the picture." I tried to humor him without being rude. Finally he was finished. "Jimmy, could you come here, please?" A large man dressed in white pants and a white shirt walked over. "This is Mr. McLane. Would you walk him over to Building 17 and see that he gets settled in? Thank You." He handed the big man a file with my name written at the top of it. Jimmy smiled at me and we left for Building 17. The Waco veterans' psychiatric hospital was scattered over a sprawling campus of three-story dormitories encircling a large quadrangle of fresh cut grass and towering oak trees. The top floors were screened in. We passed men driving tractors that were cutting the parched grass. Some guys who looked like patients were milling around. They had earned what the VA called "grounds privileges." Their eyes were void of any expression. They were walking in a manner later described as the "thorazine shuffle."

It was a ten minute walk to Building 17. We took the elevator up to the third floor. At the end of the hall, Jimmy took a large ring of keys from his belt and unlocked a gray metal door. Once we were inside, Jimmy locked the door again. We were standing in a large room filled with chairs and desks and people. He walked over to a nurse and handed her the file. "This is Mr. McLane, he just came in." The nurse smiled at me and asked me to sit down. She wasn't all that bad looking. I sat down in a chair beside her desk and waited.

"Welcome to Building 17, Mr. McLane. My name is Nurse Atkins. May I call you "Robert"?"

"Sure," I smiled. I looked over at five guys in pajamas sitting in a row of over-stuffed chairs. They were puffing away on cigarettes and watching a Green Acres rerun on television. A guy in his twenties walked up. He was wearing a faded blue robe. "Miss Atkins, I need a shot." She smiled up at him. "Well Rusty, you are just going to have to wait. Right now I am busy." Silently he turned around and walked over to the television and stared at the screen. After a few more questions, Miss Atkins asked me to roll up my sleeve. "First, I am going to take your blood pressure. Then, I am going to draw some blood for our lab."

I rolled up my sleeve. She rubbed my arm with a cotton swab. "Now, I'm going to stick you. This may sting a little bit. "Ever since I was a little kid, I had hated needles. After all the shots I had taken to go to Vietnam, I had made my peace with the process. She drew several vials of blood while I tried to concentrate on Eddie Albert. He was a veteran of D-Day. Reciting stupid jokes on a television show must have seemed a million miles from Omaha Beach. Nurse Atkins walked over to a locker and came back with a pair of pajamas. "I would like you to put these on, please. You can put your clothes in this plastic bag." She pointed to a small room that had a single bed with spotless white sheets.

I stepped inside. The pajamas were too big, but I managed to tie them on. At least the cloth slippers fit. I walked back out and handed her the bag. She handed me some pills in a paper cup."Dr. Herster has ordered you some medication, you have to take it. If you don't, we will give it to you by injection." She handed me another paper cup filled with water. I tossed the pills down and drank the water. Thanks to the wonders of thorazine, the seventy or so patients on the third floor of Building 17 could be easily managed by a handful of nurses and aides. Nurse Atkins told me I was free to watch television. I walked over to where Jimmy was folding some towels.

"So, how are you doing, my man?" Jimmy smiled at me. "A little nervous, I haven't had psycho playmates since I got out of the Marines." Jimmy laughed. "Heck, don't you worry yourself none. You know I used to wrestle. Anybody that messes with you is going to have to answer to me. I can whip anyone in this building, if I have to. Now, you just take it easy, you hear?" I smiled. "Thanks Jimmy."

A doorway beside the television led to a large screened-in front porch. I walked over and looked down at the trees and fresh cut grass below. I wished

I could smell the grass and feel the sun on my face. What the hell am I doing in here? Will I ever get out? I had been in plenty of tough jams before. I had just spent a year up to my eyeballs in a f#*!ing war: At least I was going to be sleeping between clean sheets.

"Play the hand you're dealt boys. Play it with grace and style." I remember the words my daddy used to tell his customers back in his domino hall. A short, fat man in faded pajamas wandered by singing, "How much is that doggie in the window...the one with the wagging tail?" I later learned he had been on the locked ward of building seventeen for almost twenty years. There were other patients who also looked like they had given up on ever getting out or being sane again. Now, the thoughts that had been running through my mind slowed down to a crawl. Just forming words into a simple sentence seemed to take forever. I felt like I was walking uphill on an endless road of thick molasses.

"Hello." The guy who wanted a shot was looking at me. "My name is Russell I used to be a pilot in the Air Force. Then I tried to kill myself. Now I live here. What did you do?"

"Nothing that called for me being put in here. It seems I have a brother with an overactive imagination."

Russell smiled and began to unbutton his pajama top. "Wanna see where I shot myself? "He opened the shirt to reveal a large vertical scar running across his stomach. "After I got out of the hospital, they brought me here. That was two years ago. This place ain't so bad. I can have a shot anytime I want one."

A middle-aged man with thinning hair and wearing a bathrobe walked over. He looked up at me and smiled with the rapture of a three-year-old and announced, "Haircut day, buddy! Today is haircut day!" Russell nodded at him. "That's Larry. He tried to kill himself too. One day, he closed the garage door and started his car. Unfortunately for Larry, the car ran out of gas. He did succeed in destroying over sixty percent of his brain. He's also been in Building 17 for almost twenty years."

Larry walked over to tell the guys watching TV about haircut day. I liked the big porch. The screened-in windows were open and I could hear birds singing. Patients were free to come here and stare out at the other red brick buildings and the long, high hurricane fence that surrounded everything. It felt good to get away from the damn TV and the blue cloud that floated over the room as the members of the Nicotine Club sat in their chairs and puffed away. I wondered how long I was going to be in Building 17. It was scary to realize that this place would be the final home for many of these poor bastards. They would never leave here alive.

A buzzer announced someone at the front door. One of the nurses reached for the big ring of keys in her pocket and opened the door. An aide dressed in white pushed in a large stainless steel cart. Trays of food were stacked inside. The evening meal had arrived. A line quickly formed as my fellow lunatics patiently waited for the nurses to pass out their dinners. The food was bland and starchy. I washed it down with a paper cup of Kool-Aid. On TV, Green Acres was replaced by a game show where contestants tried to guess the price of a new washing machine. The Nicotine Club yelled higher!" as they puffed away. I was getting a little bored when I noticed an old Monopoly set and a worn out deck of cards on a shelf. I decided to start a game of my own. I took the play money and the deck of cards and sat down at a table. I stacked the different colored bills neatly in front of me and shuffled the deck. I invited Russell and some of his associates to join me in a friendly game of blackjack. I went over the basic rules as I gave each player five hundred dollars of funny money. "Relax fellas, this is play money and this time we are just playing for fun."

My daddy would have been proud of his second son. I dealt each player two cards, one up and one down. "Now don't be afraid to bet 'em up if you feel lucky." Several patients bet their entire stake on the first hand. After they busted, I took back their money. "Try to bet a little more carefully next time. "I smiled as I gave them another five hundred dollars. They promptly bet everything on the next hand and lost again. This time I gave them each a thousand dollars. Gambling with lunatics was like taking candy from a baby. Nurse Atkins walked over and frowned. "Now Robert, I am not sure this is how the Monopoly money was intended to be used."

Russell looked up at her. "Don't worry Miss Atkins, this money is not real and neither are you! "Miss Atkins wrote a short note on her clipboard. "Well, we'll have to see what Dr. Herster says." She walked away. The two face cards Russell was holding weren't good enough, since the six of clubs I dealt myself gave me twenty-one. I gathered in the money from the losing hands and dealt another round. Here's the weird part. I knew when to take another card and when to stand. Every time, I continued to win each hand and lend out more money to the losers until Russell had enough. "Let somebody else deal," he growled. "Sure boys, no problem. "I passed the deck to Larry. I continued to manage the money and every few minutes I lent the losers another thousand dollars. I kept winning. My stake was now up past five thousand dollars. Russell frowned at me. "How do you win every hand?" I looked at Russell and then looked at the two face cards in my hand. I stared at the deck Larry was holding.

"Golly fellas, let me show you," I smiled at Larry. "Give me a hit." Larry tossed me the ace of diamonds. I laughed as I showed them the two jacks in my hand. "That's why you can't beat me. "Any other card in the deck but an ace and I would have been just another loser. I didn't just hope the next card was an ace. I knew it: "That's it! I quit!" Russell shouted as he threw in his cards and started to walk away. "Me too! "Larry growled as be got up and followed Russell. "Relax boys, it was only play money." The game was over. I gathered up the different stacks of Monopoly money and put the box and the deck of cards back on the shelf. Russell walked over and looked me in the eye. "I just want to know one thing. How did you know that last card would be an ace?

I smiled, "Being insane has its advantages." At 8:45 Nurse Atkins turned off the TV and announced it was time for bed. Patients shuffled off to take their last meds of the day and brush their teeth. They climbed into beds that were arranged in a perfect line. At nine o'clock, Nurse Atkins dimmed the lights and my first day in Building 17 was over. Thanks to the level of thorazine in my blood, I quickly drifted off to sleep. The lights were turned back on at 6am. It took a couple of minutes to realize that I had woken up in an asylum. I got up and washed my face. The Nicotine Club was lighting up their first cigarettes. They waited quietly for the TV to be turned on. I heard a key unlocking the big gray door that led downstairs. An aide came in pushing a large cart that held our breakfast.

Someone handed me a tray with a carton of milk and a box of corn flakes. There was also a plate with some lukewarm scrambled eggs and a piece of bacon. There was a small plastic cup of black coffee. I wondered why I was having so much trouble opening the box of corn flakes. Then, I remembered the Thorazine. Accomplishing even the simplest task now required all of my patience and concentration. I gave up on the corn flakes and just ate the bacon and drank the coffee. I curled up in a stuffed chair and went back to sleep.

"Mr. McLane! Mr. McLane!" One of the day nurses woke me up. "You have lab work this morning." She made a note on her clipboard. I shuffled over to a line of patients waiting by the gray door. One by one, an aide called out our names. Then he took a key from his belt and opened the door. We followed him into the hallway. In a few minutes, an old school bus pulled up and we climbed aboard. We rode along quietly to another red brick building and followed the aide off of the bus and inside. I was handed a number and waited. I found out that "lab work" was VA code word for more blood tests. When someone called my number, I walked over to a small desk and rolled up my sleeve. I still thought of needles as instruments of pain and terror, but I waited quietly. The young nurse read the name on my wrist band and then drew several vials of blood. In a few more minutes we were on the bus and headed back to Building 17. All of the comfortable chairs were occupied so I curled up in a corner on the floor and went to sleep. "Mr. McLane! Mr. McLane! You have to stay awake. The doctor will be here shortly making his rounds. He will want to talk to you." "Goddammit! If you want me to stay awake, stop giving me pills that put me to sleep!"

I glared up at the startled nurse. She took her clipboard and made a couple of notes. "Your medication is something you need to talk to your doctor about, but you have to stay awake." She walked away. I walked over to the large screened in porch and stared down at other patients milling around on the grass below. I wondered how long I would be in this hell hole. The big gray door opened and several patients entered and were slowly led over to a table that held some leftover breakfast trays. They sat down and stared at the trays like they were some kind of puzzle. Later I learned that while the rest of us were eating our breakfast, these poor bastards were upstairs getting electro-shock treatments.

First, they were strapped down on a bed. Then a piece of rubber was inserted in their mouth and some kind of gel was smeared on their temples. Finally, a small metal paddle was placed on each side of their head and someone hit a switch, sending a jolt of electricity directly through their brain as their body convulsed and strained against the leather straps.

Back on the ward, the day nurse turned on the idiot box and the TV junkies began their morning fix. The gray door opened again and a large man in a white coat walked in. Dr. Berster. VA regulations required an attending physician to spend a short daily session with each patient who was coherent enough to hold a conversation. Dr. Berster did this while sitting behind a small folding table. One by one, each patient was led over to a small chair for a short visit. Finally it was my turn. "Good morning, Dr. Berster." I was amazed how long it took to form thoughts and then to transform those thoughts into speech. "And how are you feeling this morning, Mr. McLane?" "I am much, much better. I was wondering when I could leave here? "Dr.Berster smiled and looked at his clipboard."Well, you just got here. First, we have to run some tests and try to determine just what it is that caused you to end up here. When we have some answers, then we'll talk about when you will be ready to leave."

"Could you please reduce the dosage of my medication?"

"The current dosage is supposed to help you to stay calm. My notes here say that you snapped at one of my nurses this morning. She was just doing her job. If you continue yelling at my nurses, we may have to increase your medication." Dr. Berster thumbed though the top pages of his clipboard. "It says here you took the Monopoly money and started a poker game. Gambling here is illegal, Mr. McLane."

"Dr. Berster, we were just playing for fun. There is nothing to do here, but watch that stupid television."

"Well, it may just be for fun to you, but one of our long term patients is very upset. He thinks he owes you ten thousand dollars. There will be no more poker games. Do I make myself clear, Mr. McLane?"

"In that case he better pay up. Looks like I'm going to need the money to hire a lawyer to get me out of this dump. Say, they sent me to have blood drawn this morning. What happened to the blood they took yesterday? Did they lose it?"

"The combination of drugs we are giving you is very strong. Mr. McLane, if we didn't monitor it everyday, it could even be fatal. I am afraid you will be having blood work done on a daily basis until I say otherwise."

"Daily?" I repeated the word as I stood up and gripped the edges of' the small table and stared down at Dr. Benter. I wanted to flip it across the room, but even in my drugged condition I knew that was a no-no. I slowly released my grip and sat back down.

"I think that will be all today, Mr. McLane." He nodded at Jimmy and another aide who grabbed me and dragged me over to a bed. They held me down while one of the nurses shot another load of drugs into my ass. Dr. Herster left. The thorazine hit me like a monster wave at the beach. I was carried far out into a turquoise blue ocean where pretty mermaids rode side-saddle on prancing sea horses.

Iraq Veterans Support

by Buck Davis

I attend the Vet Center here in Tallahassee, Florida and there are 12 members in our group, excluding the counselor. The group is made up of three Marines, one corpsman who was with 1/9 in Vietnam, and eight soldiers. We are all Vietnam combat veterans and all have PTSD. One of the Marine members came up with the idea to recognize the 124th Infantry Regiment of the Florida National Guard, who are located here in Tallahassee, for their service in Iraq. Their unit served a tour in Iraq and some of them are going back for another tour soon.

We decided to present a CERTIFICATE OF APPRECIATION with each soldier's name written in calligraphy. Each certificate has the Regiment's patch, the Florida National Guard logo, either the Combat Infantryman's Badge, Combat Medic Badge, or if the individual soldier didn't receive either of the badges, we put an American Flag in the space where the badges are.

At the top of the Certificate across from the Regimental patch, we put the Vietnam Service Medal; it is almost the size of the real medal. In short, the certificate commends the soldiers for their service and sacrifice in Iraq and notes that we, as fellow combat veterans of the Vietnam War, appreciate what they did for our country. The certificate is presented by the Vietnam Veterans Support Group;

Tallahassee, Florida.

The certificates are in full multi-color, printed on a light tan parchment type paper. One of the Soldiers in the unit was killed, for whom we made a special certificate, given posthumously. In addition to the other graphics, in his certificate we put a Bronze Star medal and a Purple Heart medal, to be presented to his mother. We ended up with 125 certificates with the Combat Infantryman's Badge, 4 with the Combat Medic's Badge, and 3-4 with the American Flag. Our little group is going to present the certificates to the National Guard Unit on May 14th or15th, at one of their National Guard meetings. Each Soldier will be presented a certificate at the informal ceremony. The certificates are beautiful for special framing. Sincerest thanks and appreciation is extended to these fine Iraq veterans.

We share this with you, as we are proud of what we did to show our appreciation to these soldiers. We especially feel this way, because we are a small group of Vietnam Veterans desiring to do something special to the best of our abilities. Actually, we feel so good about coming up with the idea, and more amazing is that we actually were able to accomplish this calligraphy, each individual name, and personally present them to each soldier.

Our main motivation other than to do something nice for the Soldiers, was to do something that no one did for us as Vietnam Veterans. Imagine how good we would have felt come home from Vietnam to receive a personal certificate from a group of World War II Veterans or Korean War Veterans. Anyhow, I thought I would share this with you, and if someone would like to give me an e-mail address, I will send the person via e-mail, a copy of the certificates that possibly could be scanned and put on this web site for everyone to see. Thanks for letting me share this with you.

Response to Letter By Buck Davis

by Craig W. Tourte

Had to read the post by Buck Davis several times before I was actually able to get through it. Tears came down my cheeks each time I started, and it took me a couple of times before I was able to read the whole thing. I joined the Vietnam Veterans of America (VVA), Inc. Butte County Chapter 582 because of my friend Tom Horchler. Tom and I were at Khe Sanh together. The VVA started out as an anti-war movement group. Not that I'm for war, but I always felt that for some reason a disservice was done to those who were currently serving, not being supportive of the military. VVA's founding principle is "Never again will one generation of veterans abandon another."

I don't know if Buck and his group of Vets knew this, or if they are members of the VVA. But whatever or however they are made up, they are certainly doing more than their share to carry the message of the VVA and all Vietnam Veterans, along to the next generation. When I joined the VFW and American Legion in my community the whispers were: you lost your war, but we would kind of like you around to do our grunt work, I have not been back.

If you have a moment, I would like you to please read Buck's post again, and think about what it would have been like if former vets had done this for us, of what Buck's group has done for the Iraq veterans. Words just cannot express my appreciation to Buck's group who also represent me. If you have the time, post a little something to Buck and the boys, letting them know you give a sh#t. Read his post and appreciate what they did. I sure do.

They Are All Finally Coming Home

by Donnae

Emmie Ard has a set of fine china in her dining room that her son Randy sent while he was flying Army helicopters in South Vietnam. It was delivered the day after she and her family were told that Randy, 20, was missing in action after his helicopter was shot down over Laos on March 7, 1971. For 34 years, the china set has never been used.

"We wouldn't, couldn't bring ourselves to eat off of it," said Nell Vanvooren, Randy Ard's sister. "It sat in a china cabinet since 1971." After more than three decades of waiting, Randy Ard's family now knows without a doubt that he never left Southeast Asia and died at the hands of enemy soldiers there in the jungle.

His remains were identified in December, 2004 by a special Army lab in Hawaii, and the family learned the results in January. "It was very hard to go through it at first, and I cried every day for a long time, but I put it behind me," Emmie Ard said.

"I think 34 years is a long time to wait for an answer, but he's coming home now, and I have peace with that now, but I still think about the families who don't have peace. There are so many who don't know. "I hope they all will one day."

Few days pass that Randy Ard's family members don't think about him, Vanvooren said. "I always wonder how he would have done something and what he would have thought about something," she said. "He was the oldest and I looked up to him. "This news gives me some peace. I'm just glad he didn't suffer and wasn't in a prison camp for years."

Randy Ard was buried March 19 at the Marshall Memorial Gardens during a family ceremony. He dreamed of flying and wanted to be a pilot most of his life, his mother said. As a teenager, he washed planes at an airport near Pensacola—where the family lived in the late 1960s—in trade for flying lessons to earn his private pilot's license.

Dedication and good grades in high school earned him an appointment to the Air Force Academy, Emmie Ard said. There was no promise of flight duty after four years at the academy, though. "He turned (the Air Force Academy) down because the Army told him they would let him fly," Emmie Ard said, "but he had to fly whatever type of aircraft they chose for him. "He came to me and asked me what I thought about it, and I didn't really want him to go into the (Army) because of what was going on in Vietnam at the time."

Emmie Ard told her son "that he was grown and could do what he wanted and if that's what he wanted to do, I was fine by it." Randy went through flight training in 1970 at Fort Rucker in South Alabama, and soon found himself flying helicopters in Vietnam. On March 7, 1971, Chief Warrant Officer 3 Randy Ard took off in an OH-58 Kiowa helicopter with two passengers from Quang Tri, in what was then the northern portion of South Vietnam.

"He was taking passengers in to Laos," said his brother, John, who gleaned information on his brother's fate from the Army and survivors. "But the enemy had a radio and convinced him to land at another place. He came in to the landing zone and, just as he was hovering, they opened up, shooting him down."

The helicopter went down in Laos just across the Vietnam-Laos border, in the village of Ban Kahn. Randy sustained two broken legs and a shattered pelvis in the crash, but the other two managed to drag him free of the wrecked Army helicopter, John Ard said.

Shortly after the helicopter went down, enemy soldiers were approaching the crash site and the small position of three Americans was about to be overrun. "Randy opened up with his pistol to keep them back, but the others left," John Ard said. "He didn't survive..."

On a pleasant Sunday evening in early March 1971, a government sedan pulled up to the Ard residence with two Army officers. They came bringing the news that Randy was missing in action. "I knew it was bad when I heard the knock on the door and saw the two men from the Army standing outside," Vanvooren said. "I shuddered and I knew it was bad."

The news shattered their world, but not knowing what happened to Randy would haunt the Ards for decades. "I think if we had known he was not coming back it would have eased the pain, but this changed my family," Vanvooren said. "It certainly weighed on my parents and it made their life harsh at times."

Randy Ard's father, Tess, who died in November

2002, was realistic about his son's fate. "He never lied to himself about it," Vanvooren said. "He knew Randy wasn't coming back. It bothered him greatly not having a final answer."

For years the Ard family had few details about Randy. They knew he wasn't with them and was a missing part of their life. It was 34 years of birthdays, family events, Christmas holidays, and a 1975 family move to Albertville without Randy. "All we knew at first was he had been shot down and was missing in action," John Ard said. "The details came out more and more over the years, some from the Army and some from the people who were there, but we didn't know all that much at first."

As a teenager, Vanvooren would play games with herself thinking her brother was alive and well, living an exotic life in Southeast Asia. "I'd think maybe he had woke up and not known where he was and now he was married to a beautiful Asian woman and living a wonderful life," she said. As the years passed and pages on the calendar turned, Randy's family came to realize his life had ended in the Laotian jungle. Logically, after a few years, you know he's not coming home," Vanvooren said. "You have to face that."

The Army provides advisers to help families when their loved ones are classified as missing. It was a nice gesture, Vanvooren and her mother said. "At first, as a kid, you hate the Army. It was the Army that took my brother away," Vanvooren, 50, said. "But as you grow older, that fades and in the end, I've come to appreciate the Army for what they have done for the families. For the professional support they have offered."

The Department of Defense changed Randy's status in 1978, John Ard said, from "missing in action" to "missing, presumed dead" because of the number of years that had passed without any information on the case.

That provided little comfort to the family. Status changes don't provide answers. However, to have his remains on the way home holds the peace the Ards are looking for, John Ard said. "It's a great relief to know this is done," he said. "I want him to be able to walk in here, but I know that's not going to happen," Emmie Ard said. "I've put this to rest and I'm at peace with it now." For 1,842 families that peace may be elusive. That's the number of unsolved missing-in-action cases the Department of Defense still has on the books from the Vietnam War.

The American involvement in the Vietnam War ended when U.S. troops left in April 1975. For years after the war, the Vietnamese government had limited relations with the U.S. government. In 1995, the United States and Vietnam established trade relations. Part of that deal was a full accounting of American servicemen lost in Southeast Asia.

Crash site graves have been identified and sets of remains have been sent to the special Army lab in Hawaii over the past decade. Several sets of remains a year are identified by the lab, bringing closure to family members. As Randy's family make preparations for a burial, the china set he sent home in 1971 sits looking brand new, is unused in a glass cabinet.

"We've talked about using it now that we know, but it would be strange to eat off the china now," Vanvooren said. "I think it'll stay where it is for now."

The Breaker Patrol Are Also Coming Home

On April 23rd, 2005, Lance Corporal Samuel A Sharp, Jr. will be interred at Oak Hill Memorial Park, located at 300 Curtner Avenue, San Jose, California. Sam and three other members of the reconnaissance team "Breaker" have been missing in action in Vietnam since May 10, 1967.

For several months, Sam's unit 1st Platoon, Alpha Company, 3rd Recon Battalion, 3rd Marine Division fought in the Khe Sanh area, near the DMZ in South Vietnam. On May 9th, 1967, Sam was serving as assistant patrol leader with the "Breaker" team on a reconnaissance patrol. The mission was to gather intelligence information on suspected enemy infiltration routes. Given the history of prior enemy sightings in the area, enemy contact was highly probable. The "Breaker" patrol was helicopter lifted into an area just south of the DMZ.

Shortly after midnight, the patrol came under heavy small arms fire. Sam was killed instantly, in the first few minutes of the fire fight. Sam and three other members of the "Breaker" Patrol were not extracted, due to heavy combat activity in the area. Sam Sharp's remains and that of the other three members of the "Breaker" patrol, l/Lt. Heinz Ahlmeyer, Sgt. James N. Tycz, and HM-3 Malcolm T. Miller were recovered in May, 2003 by the Joint POW/MIA teams Accounting Command repatriated to Hawaii in the summer of 2004.

All four were identified via DNA examination. The internments of Lt. Ahlmeyer, Sgt. Tycz, and HM-3 Miller were expected to occur spring 2005, at Arlington National Cemetery, with planning of these ceremonies currently in process with the respective families. Details of these internments are not available at the time of this writing.

Sgt. Tycz

Milwaukee Marine, killed on a desolate Vietnam hilltop when he picked up an enemy grenade to save the lives of his men almost 38 years ago, will finally be buried with military honors

Sigmund and Agnes Tycz never had a chance to bury their son—their 22-year-old Marine named James Neil Tycz. He died on the hilltop overrun with elephant grass on a hot and humid day in 1967. When the three survivors of a seven-man Marine reconnaissance team were finally airlifted to safety off Hill 665 near Khe Sanh, they looked down from the helicopter to see the bodies of Sgt. Tycz and his three fallen comrades.

Listed as "Killed in Action-Body Not Recovered," Tycz remained on Hill 665 until American military casualty teams returned to the spot decades later. His brother, Phillip Dale Tycz, 61, gave the military a sample of his DNA in the hopes one day his brother's remains would be identified. It wasn't needed. All that was found of Tycz were three teeth, which were identified through dental records.

Now Tycz's remains will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery. His four remaining siblings—his parents died within two months of each other in 1988—will gather at the cemetery on May 10, the anniversary of his death, to finally lay their brother to rest. "I'm glad it's over," said Peter Carey Tycz of Franklin, who was four years younger than his brother and joined the Marines because of him.

Phillip Dale Tycz was working at Mobil Oil in Milwaukee the day his family found out his brother had died in Vietnam. One of his sisters called to tell him the horrible news. "It was heartbreaking. It still hurts when I think about it now," Phillip Dale Tycz said Sunday from his home in Plano, Texas. "I felt sorry for Mom and Dad. Dad really took it a lot worse than I expected."

A transfer and a promotion

A transfer and a promotionSigmund and Agnes Tycz received a letter from their son on May 9, 1967. In the letter, which was printed in The Milwaukee Journal, Tycz told "Mom and Pop" that he had been transferred to a new platoon and promoted to platoon sergeant. "The change is a little strange, of course, but I know once my men and myself get used to each other, everything will be just great. They're a platoon of good Marines and I plan on keeping them that way, with my newly acquired 'Sarge's growl!' (Would you believe—my squeak??!)" He mentions the fighting around Khe Sanh, sandbagging his living quarters because of nightly mortar attacks, and the sad task of being a stretcher bearer for wounded and dead soldiers and Marines.

"None of us here like this war, especially after seeing a friend or a fellow Marine wounded or worse, but the majority (I hope for the sake of democracy) believe in fighting off Communist aggression in a weakened country...Our lieutenant passed me the word that we go in at 7:30 a.m. tomorrow. None of us want to go, but that's our job and I pray I will never fail to do it." The letter was signed "Your Marine Son, Neil," and below his signature was a sketch of an American flag and the note: "The U.S. is 'in.' It is free!"

Honored for bravery

Honored for braveryHe was killed one day after his folks received the letter. Tycz, who served in Company A in the 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion of the 3rd Marine Division, was awarded the Navy Cross for his extraordinary bravery. Leading a seven-man recon team on a patrol in enemy-controlled mountainous territory, Tycz and his men were detected by a North Vietnamese Army unit of as many as 50 men, according to the Navy Cross citation.

Tycz's team was attacked by small arms fire and mortars and within minutes, one Marine was killed and three seriously wounded—but not before they killed several enemy soldiers. Tycz deployed the rest of his men, moved among them to direct their fire and shouted encouragement. When the radio operator was hit, Tycz used the radio to call in artillery fire on enemy positions, and when a grenade landed near one of the wounded Marines, Tycz ran toward it, picked it up and threw it. But the grenade traveled only a short distance before exploding, killing Tycz.

Since the area where Tycz and the three other

Marines died was in enemy territory, the military had to leave their bodies behind. From 1993 to 2004, U.S. Marine Casualty Department members visited the isolated site of the firefight eight times, a place that local tribesmen stayed away from because they considered the hilltop haunted.

The first evidence was discovered in 1998—remnants of American uniforms, 31 teeth, nine of which were identifiable, and bone fragments that couldn't be identified. Last month, Tycz's siblings were notified that three of the teeth were from their brother. Now as they prepare to travel to Washington, D.C., for his burial, his family remembers the brother who earned a letter on the South Division High School tennis team, who totaled his older brother's 1958 Pontiac Bonneville on the day he got his driver's license, who joined the Marines because he wanted to do something with his life, who gave up a cushy assignment as a general's aide to go to battle, who wanted to serve his country.

Another Missing Hero Comes Home Hometown Honors Vietnam Soldier

Charles Lindewald, missing since 1968, is memorialized after his remains finally found

Submitted by Donnae

Stephen Bradshaw never met his uncle. But the 26-year-old has always felt a connection to the man who served five tours of duty in the Vietnam War and made the ultimate sacrifice there more than 36 Years ago. US Army Master Sgt. Charles Lindewald has finally come home. The LaPorte native was declared missing in action in February 1968 near Lang Vei in Vietnam when his Detachment A-team 101 Company C 5th Special Forces came under attack. The Green Beret was 28. His body was not found until late 2003.

Since Bradshaw was a boy, he has heard stories of his uncle's bravery in combat. Following in Lindewald's footsteps, Bradshaw also joined the Army, returning home from Iraq in July as a sergeant with the 1st Armored Division.

On Saturday, Bradshaw, who now lives in Chicago, sat in the first row of LaPorte New Church, where more than 130 people gathered for a memorial service in honor of Lindewald, who was awarded three Purple Hearts, a Silver Star and a Bronze Star.

Members of the Wall Gang stood along the perimeter of the packed church, sun shining through the stained-glass windows. On a table stood black and white photos of Lindewald and his brother Tom next to a Green Beret hat.

"I am proud of him," Bradshaw said later at LaPorte's American Legion Post 83, where a reception was held following the memorial service. "I've always felt he has been watching out for me." After the service, a procession of cars and motorcycles worked its way down Pine Lake Avenue to Soldiers Memorial Park, where the LaPorte Honor Guard fired a 21-gun salute and member Dick Kuta played "Taps" on his trumpet under the gray skies. Military veterans from as far away as Portage gathered around the Vietnam Veterans memorial as American flags and POW/MIA flags ruffled in the chilled breeze.

The military service was organized by Amvets 911, Vietnam Veterans Inc., VFW Post 9423, VFW Post 1130, American Legion Post 83, and the Wall Gang.

"I still can't believe this is actually happening," said Vietnam veteran Richard Mose Mrozinski, commander of Amvets 911 and past president of Vietnam Veterans Inc., after the service. "This is what we have been demanding from the government for so long. We want every guy to be accounted for."

Lindewald's sister, Mary Perez of Michigan City, was 17 when her brother went missing. He left for the Army when the 54-year-old was 6. Their brother, Tom, died five years ago. "In the limited time we had together, he was so much fun to be with," she told the Herald-Argus after the service. "Initially [when he was declared missing], I thought there had to be some mistake, but as the years went on, I came to accept that he wasn't coming home. I never realized there was this piece of me missing until his remains were found. There has been a sense of relief and closure."

Perez, who has three adult children, has been touched by the community support she has received. "I can't believe all of the people who still care after all these years." In April, the family will travel to Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia, where Lindewald's remains will be buried on the 29th. His commanding officer and two other survivors of the battle will also be there. Growing up, anytime Lindewald would come home to LaPorte, he would talk about the country's commitment in Vietnam, Perez said.

He felt we did have a place over there. He loved what he did, she said.

Colonel Ross Brown Writes:

Dear Mr. Pounds:

Our mutual friend Skip Funk shared this heart-warming story of your generosity in helping a young Marine from Memphis. Skip's fellow Marines and Khe Sanh veterans sincerely thank you.

My Fellow Marines:

I wanted to start your week out with a great local story from Memphis. A Marine from our area was seriously wounded in Iraq about 2 months ago. It was nearly 6 weeks before he was well enough to travel and come home. His injuries were so serious that he will require therapy for years and will never return to duty or a normal life. He sustained a head wound in combat and was being evacuated when the Humvee he was riding in was hit by a roadside bomb. Every Marine in the Humvee was KIA except him. Recently, President Bush visited Memphis to explain his Social Security program for the future. His presentation lasted about one hour. Our Marine attended with his sister. When the Secret Service realized who he was, he was escorted down to the front row, right in front of the President. When President Bush completed his speech, he left the stage and walked directly to our Marine and spoke with him and his family for several minutes. He also autographed the Marines arm sling and a program the sister was holding without being asked. A local benefit golf tournament was arranged for our Marine.

It was a scramble format with each team of 4 costing $1,000. The tournament filled up so quickly that they finally had to turn applications away. My good friend Charlie Pounds called to tell me that he had signed us up to play in it and that I should set aside April 22nd for the benefit. He sent in his personal check for the entire amount of $1,000. Two days later, the tournament director called Charlie to inform him that the event was full and that he could not accommodate us. Charlie told him to keep the check, it was going to help a very special man.

All of you need to know that Charlie did not serve in the Marine Corps, but believes deeply in our history, purpose and mission. That's probably from being around me so much! He's heard all the stories about every one of you and what you mean to our Corps. Please join me in thanking him for his kindness and support of our Marine. Hope all is well. Deep Respect and Semper Fidelis.

Skip Funk, H&S, 1/26

With the upcoming reunion being held in the City of Chicago, I thought I would pass on these two stories to our membership, sent to me by Craig Tourte.

Story #1

Many years ago Al Capone virtually owned Chicago. Capone wasn't famous for anything heroic. He was notorious for enmeshing the Windy City in everything from bootlegged booze and prostitution to murder.

Capone had a lawyer nicknamed "Easy Eddie." He was his lawyer for a good reason. Eddie was very good! In fact, Eddie's skill at legal maneuvering kept Big Al out of jail for a long time. To show his appreciation, Capone paid him very well. Not only was the money big, but Eddie also got special dividends. For instance, he and his family occupied a fenced-in mansion with live-in help, and all of the conveniences of the day. The estate was so large that it filled an entire Chicago city block.

Eddie lived the high life of the Chicago mob and gave little consideration to the atrocities that went on around him. Eddie did have one soft spot, however. He had a son that he loved dearly. Eddie saw to it that his young son had the best of everything: clothes, cars, and a good education. Nothing was withheld. Price was no object. And, despite his involvement with organized crime, Eddie even tried to teach him right from wrong. Eddie wanted his son to be a better man than he was. Yet, with all his wealth and influence, there were two things he couldn't give his son; he couldn't pass on a good name and a good example.

One day, Easy Eddie reached a difficult decision. Easy Eddie wanted to rectify wrongs he had done. He decided he would go to the authorities and tell the truth about Al "Scarface" Capone, clean up his tarnished name and offer his son some semblance of integrity. To do this, he would have to testify against The Mob, and he knew that the cost would be great, yet he testified.

Within the year, Easy Eddie's life ended in a blaze of gunfire on a lonely Chicago Street. But in his eyes, he had given his son the greatest gift he had to offer, at the greatest price he would ever pay. Police removed from his pockets a rosary, a crucifix, a religious medallion, and a poem clipped from a magazine.

The poem read:

The clock of life is wound but once
And no man has the power
To tell just when the hands will stop, at late or early hour.
Now is the only time you own.
Live, love, toil with a will.
Place no faith in time.
For the clock may soon be still.

World War II produced many heroes. One such man was Lieutenant Commander Butch O'Hare. He was a fighter pilot assigned to the aircraft carrier Lexington in the South Pacific. One day his entire squadron was sent on a mission. After he was airborne, he looked at his fuel gauge and realized that someone had forgotten to top off his fuel tank. He would not have enough fuel to complete his mission and get back to his ship. His flight leader told him to return to the carrier. Reluctantly, he dropped out of formation and headed back to the fleet. As he was returning to the mother ship he saw something that turned his blood cold, a squadron of Japanese aircraft were speeding their way toward the American fleet.

The American fighters were gone on a sortie, and the fleet was all but defenseless. He couldn't reach his squadron and bring them back in time to save the fleet. Nor could he warn the fleet of the approaching danger. There was only one thing to do. He must somehow divert them from the fleet. Laying aside all thoughts of personal safety, he dove into the formation of Japanese planes. Wing-mounted 50 caliber's blazed as he charged in, attacking one surprised enemy plane and then another. Butch wove in and out of the now broken formation and fired at as many planes as possible until all his ammunition was finally spent. Undaunted, he continued the assault. He dove at the planes, trying to clip a wing or tail in hopes of damaging as many enemy planes as possible and rendering them unfit to fly.

Finally, the exasperated Japanese squadron took off in another direction. Deeply relieved, Butch O'Hare and his tattered fighter limped back to the carrier. Upon arrival he reported in and related the event surrounding his return. The film from the gun-camera mounted on his plane told the tale. It showed the extent of Butch's daring attempt to protect his fleet. He had in fact destroyed five enemy aircraft. This took place on February 20, 1942, and for that action Butch became the Navy's first Ace of WWII, and the first Naval Aviator to win the Congressional Medal of Honor.

A year later, Butch was killed in aerial combat at the age of 29, His home town would not allow the memory of this WWII hero to fade, and today, O'Hare Airport in Chicago is named in tribute to the courage of this great man. So the next time you find yourself at O'Hare International, give some thought to visiting Butch's memorial, displaying his statue and his Medal of Honor. It's located between Terminals 1 and 2.

So what do these two stories have to do with each other?

BUTCH O'HARE WAS EASY EDDIE'S SON.

"Jake the Snake" RIP

by Michael E. O'Hara,
Bravo Co 1/26

It is mid-January right this moment as I sit here at my computer. It is very cold but sunny, and fortunately no snow at the present time. It will soon be anniversary time for us all. By the time this gets in the newsletter, warm weather will be here and I should be "flying in the wind" on the Harley. For now, it is only the anticipation of Spring that keeps that hope alive.

It is the time of year, as I know you all are aware, that we all ponder much. We think of days gone by, of friendships that were and have been made throughout our lives. We mourn, we pray, we do all kinds of things that are vacant to our mind at other times of the year. I am no different than most of you in this respect. Mostly, I cry.

I once knew a cabinetmaker that had a brother who did some real hard time in Korea. He had a real bad drinking problem. My friend and I were discussing his brother's problems and I told him the only way to explain it in terms he could understand was this way. He simply had a broken heart. I guess that is what Khe Sanh has come to mean to me. It simply broke my heart.

There are, of course, many stories of brave and good men, those who fell hard and those who suffered dearly. We all know them too well. We all have them. Every company, battalion, unit and organization that was there, have their own personal stories, each and every one compelling in their own right.

But every once in awhile someone comes along in life that totally changes who we are, or who we might become as we grow and mature. Just because they are in your environment, they make a difference. I had a teacher that affected me that way when I was a teenager. I once worked for a man who kind of helped shape my character also. But it was a man I met while patrolling off of 881S in November of 1967 that would, in time, affect who I was and who I would become as much as any man I ever knew. I can't really explain why it turned out that way...it just did.

Quiles Ray Jacobs, or, as he was affectionately known, Jake the Snake, arrived about a month after my arrival with Bravo Company 1/26. Jake was a year younger than me but had joined a year earlier. He was a Lance Corporal, and had arrived with a group that had done some additional training at Gitmo Bay. He was immediately assigned as FTL.

It was a good time for our squad. Many were due to rotate by early 68 and others by the following summer. Most of us were FNGs, and November and December gave us the time to begin to meld together as a team. There was time to develop our map reading skills, learn how to maneuver and hone our overall skills hunting the bad guys. We were fortunate to have this time to "break in."

Shaking the bush came natural to a kid like me from southern Indiana. It was not much different than hunting squirrels. Jake, on the other hand, brought something else to the table. Jake was a street smart kid right off the streets of Los Angeles. It was a tough environment, but he had someone special in his life. Jakes' mother was a devout Christian woman, and she knew how to raise her children. Jake arrived at Khe Sanh fully prepared for whatever might confront him—his mother had seen to that long before the war started.

Looking back on those days, they were hard times. These were the things that brought us all so terribly close to each other for life. The endless nights on watch, the LP(s, the ambushes. The night before the predawn artillery attack which began the Siege, our squad did a night ambush down off the end of the runway in the gray sector. I got blessed walking point and Jake had the starlight scope. It was eerily clear out that night if my memory serves me correctly. Our silhouettes stood out boldly on the horizon. We made no contact but returned early. When we got back Jake said as they were watching through the starlight scope that they could see Charlie sighting in his mortar tubes. I left my boots on when I went to sleep that night.

Jake was a natural born leader. He knew how to treat people, which is the key to getting things done. He knew he wanted to be squad leader. He would have to be patient. Cpl Belfontaine had had the squad a long time and was very good but was due to rotate in early 1968. The squad was handed to two other successors whose stay was short-lived for one reason or another. By early February, Jake was fully in charge of Bravo 2/3.

We never let that affect our never-ending conspiracies though. We were into everything. We ran nightly raids up to the main storage areas. We paid off guards and used anything we could to steal extra food and gear. I know at one point we had stashed over twenty one gallon cans of fruit. We were stealing runway matting, poncho liners—you name it. When they finally caught on to what we were doing we would cook up some other plot. By the end of February, it was getting kind of hard to steal food and other things. Sadly, we devised a scheme of hiding the names of casualties from the gunny for an additional day, so we could draw rations on their names. They would put you in jail today for some of the things we were forced to do just to survive.

Jake turned out to be an exceptional squad leader. We continued to improve our area of responsibility and there was little discord within the squad. Things would soon turn for the worse. On the whole, the company was maintaining pretty well until the end of February, when we lost 27 men from our third platoon. That has been pretty well documented. Those numbers continued to rise. We had no other choice but to accept things for what they were and keep on keeping on.

When the C-123 went down on the sixth of March, we watched as we lost twelve more from Bravo. One was Ron Ryan from our M-60 gun pit in our squad area. He was another one of those "exceptionally fine young Marines."

Jake, somehow, managed to guide us through it all. Late March would add insult to injury, but Jake continued to exhibit his unique leadership skills. On the 20th or the 21st (not real sure) we were running a small squad-size recon. We started out pre-dawn in front of FOB-3, sat in at a defined position and waited for first light. When 0800 arrived, we got up and began to move out when the hostile fire erupted. We were getting it from a tree line. Mortars, small arms, and machine gun fire were impacting all around. For a short while, I think we were even caught in crossfire of sorts by the supporting fire from the base. Dan Horton and Doug Furlong had to be evacuated with severe leg wounds from the mortar fire, and a couple others needed some minor attention from the corpsman.

Once that was completed the orders were to continue on. Jake had been standing maybe a foot in front of me when this action had begun. He had been shot across the back. The bullet went in and out of his flak jacket at each shoulder. It virtually exploded in my face. Jake said he was OK and he actually assisted me with the evacuations. After we had moved on down thru some enemy trenches we found a few corpses and some smoldering web gear. When we stopped at one point to disarm a tripwire I noticed a considerable amount of blood had run down on Jakes trousers from under his flak jacket. I asked him again if he was hurt and his response was for me to assume the point, we needed to complete the patrol and get on back. We did so without incident.

When we got back, Jake asked for the corpsman to look at his back. After a whopping 168 stitches they bandaged up his wounds. That bullet had cut completely across his back. He looked like someone had laid into him with a machete. They wanted to medevac him out of Khe Sanh, but he refused.

Jake never gave up control of the squad. Even with his wounds bandaged he continued to run the day-to-day affairs of our squad. He even led us on the March 30th raid into the ruins of our third platoon in which we would lose twelve more from Bravo, even as we destroyed a battalion from the 66th NVA Regiment. Two evenings before that event, Jake (along with the rest of us) would suffer a heart wrenching loss. Kent and McRae were in Jake's hooch shooting the moose. Just as they stepped out the door, a single artillery round got both of them. It affected Jake deeply until his final days.

Jake and I parted company in April just before the company left Khe Sanh. He was wounded again down on the Go Noi island area. He was shot in the shoulder while going to the aid of another Marine. I would not see him again until 1970 when I ran into him at Camp Pendleton while going through the separation process. It was a short visit. Jake had come home with two Purple Hearts, a Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry, one Bronze Star and a Silver Star. I was not surprised. It would be twenty-two years before we would see or hear each other's voice again in 1992. The years had passed and I was getting the urge to find out what had happened to all those I had served with. I had gotten a call from Bob Hanna who had Jake's personal information. I called Jake on the phone and the plans to go to San Diego began. I was so excited. Good times were ahead. My time with Jake would be limited to three years, but I would come to fully understand why myself, and everyone who ever knew him, found his friendship to be so precious.

When we hooked up for that first time, we were in Los Angeles a few days before the reunion. I had flown out and was staying with my former in-laws in Temple City. I was so happy to see him when he parked the truck. We hugged in the middle of the street for the longest time. You can imagine what the people in the passing vehicles might have thought. I met his wife Naomi (an angel in disguise) and we visited with another Marine from Bravo that night. Ron Hightower was also a squad leader at Khe Sanh in our company and was seriously wounded after the Siege. Jake had been complaining a little of having a stomach ache, but I didn't think about it.

This was in 1992 right after the riots took place in L.A. It would be awhile before I learned what Jake was doing while that stuff was going on. Jake and I both, as it turned out, became home builders. Jake was into some light apartments too. We had a good time in San Diego and were really looking forward to the 25th reunion in Washington D.C. the following year. Jake and I had some surprises lined up for some other special people, working hard all year locating the rest of the squad. We never have found all of them, but we made a really good showing in D.C. that next year. Dan Horton, Steve Foster, Ken Rodgers, Jake and I, all made it. We later found Doug Furlong in Australia.

It was 1993, which would turn out to be the last reunion Jake would be able to attend. He brought his mother and other family with him. He knew more than he was telling us. We had a wonderful time. It would take volumes of paper to go into some of the stuff we did in D.C. We had gone down to the Wall on Thursday evening ahead of the scheduled services to kind of do a private thing. It was raining, getting late and we were getting stewed. I have to tell this. We pulled into a bar not far from the Wall, which was about to close. An unidentified off duty policeman (K.P.) who was with us just whips out his badge and says, "Bar is now ppen!" Ernie Spencer was in the mix and we all got to kidding him about his drinking capabilities. Well, we were drinking double hot shots of whiskey, followed by a longneck. After three rounds I had to defer. These guys were killing me. Then Ernie downs a double shot, sticks two long necks in his mouth and downs them both without hesitation. Don(t ever try to keep up with Ernie at the bar. You are going to lose.

In the fall of 93, I went to San Francisco to see Ernie and attend a Marine Corps Ball. Most everyone who was in the bar in D.C. was there, except for Jake. He did not feel like coming. I knew something was amiss. Ernie told me Jake had confided in him that it was colon cancer. That was just like Jake, it was no surprise.

Jake and I stayed in close touch over the next two years. He missed the 94 reunion and he was beginning to let me know he was pretty ill. He convinced me he was going to beat it. If anyone could, it would be him. When he started making the trips to Mexico for treatment it was obvious it was not working. Then one day after I returned from the reunion in 1994, I got a call from Jake. All he said was "get your sorry butt out here and see me." I knew when I hung up the phone what the deal was. It was almost too much. I began to make my plans for what I knew was going to be a bittersweet journey.

I called Ken Pipes and made arrangements to stay with him and we went to visit Jake together. I think we stayed two nights with Jake at his home in Compton. We swam in the pool, drank some good whiskey in the Jacuzzi, and drove all over visiting some of Jake's properties.

Jake owned an apartment building that he had built, located in the area where the riots had taken place in 1992. His daughter lived there and was the property manager when we were there. It was a very nice, secure and well built facility. While we were in the area, Jake began to explain what had occurred during the riots.

Jake's apt complex was twelve units. He moved all of his tenants over to his home in Compton for two weeks while his wife cooked, washed cloths and generally cared for these people while Jake and company guarded the building with, shall we say, "adequate security" to keep his building from falling prey to the rioters. They never bothered it. They burned down the three adjoining corners.

Those last few days I spent with Jake in August of '94 were very precious. We talked about a lot of things. Jake had been divorced just a few years prior to us getting back together and knowing Jake the way I did, I found it was not what I would have expected. Jake was a very dedicated family man. He refused to be evacuated at Khe Sanh because he knew he would lose his opportunity to go to Hawaii to be with his wife. When I shared my thoughts with him his response was "we simply grew apart" and that was the end of that conversation. That was very typical of Jake. I knew him twenty seven years and I cannot recall him ever saying an unkind word about anyone, even his enemies.

Jake believed all God's children are beautiful people. He always said he did what he had to do throughout his life, no regrets. But he also carried the same load many of us have been asked to carry throughout our lives, and he always said he hoped the Lord could forgive him. I(m sure He did. Jake was without question one of the finest human beings I have ever had the privilege of knowing.

When Ken and I got ready to leave, Jake and I stood in the drive of his home and we just hugged each other, just like we did on that street in Temple City two years prior. I don(t think we even discussed his advancing colon cancer. Ken and I did not have much to say all the way home. I was pretty dehydrated though. We all knew what had just occurred and what was to come.

I regularly talked with Jake throughout the Fall, and into the Winter of 1995. Then the situation got to where I was talking to Naomi every time Jake was in the hospital. Winter turned to Spring and the flowers began to bloom. It was mid-April and Jake was not doing well. During the night of 18/19 April, I had this weird dream that Jake and I were riding in a limo and there were magnolia trees everywhere in bloom. I told Maxine the next morning, and we decided Jake's time was very short.

It was April 19, 1995. Some jerk had just blown up the federal bldg in Oklahoma City. Naomi called. Jake was gone. It's so hard to believe it has been ten years since that moment in time. For those who were fortunate enough to have been touched by his life, you need not be told of his deeds, his presence, or his kindness and all the support he provided this organization in its early years.

Jake was not only a Marine's Marine...a Man's Man, but he was what the rest of us hope we are judged to be someday. A Good Man with a Kind Heart and a Warm Spirit, who did what he could to make this world in which we live just a tad bit better off for having passed this way.

Why Am I In Iraq

by Jim Zucarelli

MSGS Sarnowski and Jim Zucarelli at Camp Victory

A little background on myself. I served with the 26th Regiment from December 1968 to February 1969. I am not a veteran of Khe Sanh. When Doc Whitman organized the "Delta 1/26 Association," I joined so that I could remain active with those Marines/Corpsmen whom I served with. I lasted only two months in country. I arrived as a Second Lieutenant and transferred to the 26th Regiment on 22 December 1968. The 26th regiment was OPCON to the Third Marine Division at that time. I was assigned to Delta Company on 03 January 1969. Delta Company was located on Hill 190 about twenty kilometers outside Danang. I was assigned as the Platoon Commander of the Second Platoon. I commanded the Second Platoon from 03 January 1969 to 22 February 1969. I was wounded the night of February 22nd while out on an ambush south of Hill 190. I was medevaced from the field to the 95th Army Evacuation Hospital at China Beach and then to the U. S. Naval Hospital in Yokuska, Japan.

I was hospitalized for eight weeks. I finished my tour of duty in West Pac on Okinawa at Camp Hansen. When I returned stateside I reported into Camp Lejeune and served the remainder of my obligation in the Second Division with 3/6. I was released from active duty on 01 June 1971. Between June of 1971 and now, there was a huge package of living that was done. But that is a story for another day. Why am I in Iraq? Because I had to pay for a new car. In 1988, I bought a new Dodge Caravan. As I pulled out of the dealership with my new minivan, I said to myself (while my wife and our three children were sitting in their seats), "How am I going to afford the monthly payments?" as I was the only wage-earner in the family. So I looked for a part-time job. The U. S. Marine Corps Reserves would not take me (because of my VA disabilities). The U. S Army Reserves would not take me (because I failed the medical physical because of my VA disabilities). The New York Army National Guard was either blind to these disabilities or had to make its quota. Whatever the reason, I was brought into the New York Army National Guard as a Captain in the Engineer Branch.

The National Guard said I was too old to be an infantry officer (I was a few months shy of age 43), so a combat engineer I became. If you fast-forward to 01 March 2003 and you were a fly on the wall in Defense Secretary Rumsfeld's office in the Pentagon, that was the day he chose the National Guard's 42nd Infantry Division to take over from the Army's 1st Infantry Division (Big Red 1) in Iraq. I have ahead of me a one year tour-of-duty here in Iraq, and I have just completed my first week. One week down and fifty-one weeks to go, or more precise, 356 days and a wake-up. Yes, my next year is truly 24/7/365. There are no such things as a day off, and I work from 0600 to whenever the work gets done, or I pass out from fatigue (never the former; always the latter). It is tough on me being 58 years of age. Keep in touch. As I tell all my Delta friends, I am looking forward to the Reunion scheduled for the summer of 2006 in Washington, DC. Though I wear the desert uniform of the United States Army, I am, and will always be, a United States Marine.

Training for Arriving in Iraq

We stayed at Fort Drum for 5 months and were scheduled to leave 12 November. Unfortunately, the plane developed mechanical problems and we had to sleep overnight in the terminal. A replacement plane arrived and we left the next day. We were in full combat equipment so it was a little cramped. We flew from Fort Drum to Shannon, Ireland, refueled, and then flew over the English Channel. (London was lit up like a Christmas tree), across Belgium, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Romania, Turkey and eastern Iraq (between Baghdad and the Iranian border). We landed in Kuwait City and were immediately driven by bus to an Army base in the Kuwaiti desert. That was Sunday afternoon.

This is where I will be until some time after Christmas. The threat is high but not as high as Iraq. Weapons must be carried. The best way to describe Kuwait is sand and horizon; nothing else. Tonight there is a bright sky with the crescent moon. We are in training for our movement into Iraq and unloading our equipment that came on a Navy ship. The temperature today was 85°F with a gentle wind. The sand is everywhere. Everything is mobile: Port-a-Potties, shower vans, and work areas. This morning there was no water so we all took "combat showers" – from water bottles poured over our heads. The last time I brushed my teeth and shaved from a bottle was in Vietnam. I guess nothing changes very much in the life of a trooper. If we don't push into Iraq until after Christmas, that means we won't get home until early, 2006. I am trying to keep up with these soldiers that are young enough to be my children. One soldier told me the other day that she has a lot of faith in me to lead her as I am AS OLD as her grandfather. Gad Zooks! The chow is plentiful (I wish the water was). I will be sending emails like this until we get more established. Keep us in your prayers.

My Arrival

Arriving anywhere for the first time has its brief moments of exhilaration, which can be timed by looking at your watch, followed closing behind by those moments of sullen reality, which can be timed by looking at your calendar. That was what greeted me arriving here in Baghdad. First, I did get assigned a trailer, which will be my living quarters for the next year. I opened the door and my first comment was: "Geez, they actually swabbed the deck and washed down all the walls in anticipation for my arrival. How lucky I was and what a great bunch of guys at billeting." I discovered I was wrong when I went to choose the bed that would be mine. Both were soaking wet with water, and what I thought was "early spring cleaning" by the billeting staff was really a trailer with 1,000,000 leaks in the roof. The water was everywhere. I went back to billeting and mentioned my dilemma and they gave me that bureaucratic "deer-in-the-headlight-look", and then handed me a box of paper towels and a bottle of Fantastic cleaner. My first night in Baghdad was trying to position my bed so that I could sleep in-between the incessant water drips.

Saddam Palace, now Corps HQ

Standing under Hand of Saddam Hussein statue

Main Gate at Corps HQ

For the next three days I was on my knees scrubbing, swabbing and air drying everything in sight. I was elated. I awoke to noise on my roof and thought I was being hit by a mortar or rocket attack. Lucky for me, it wasn't incoming but the billeting office sent two workers out to patch the leaks on my roof. I can't complain though. I should have taken pictures to show our local union shop how men in Iraq repair roof using flashlights and pitch in the middle of the night. So now that my 8' by 10' area I call "home" is now habitable, I can think forward to learning my job here in Baghdad. Thank God our brains are divided into two hemispheres. My first three days in Baghdad sort of burned out my right half. I will use my left half to work with while the right half recharges.

A Letter to Our Marine Brothers Who served at Khe Sanh

by Buck Davis
1st Engineers

My brother-in-law and I were both in the Marines and served in Vietnam as combat engineers. He was assigned to the 3rd Combat Engineer Battalion, and I was with the 1st Combat Engineer Battalion. He arrived in Vietnam December 1967, and I followed in January 1968. We have compared notes throughout the years, and discovered we were in or around the same places during our tours.

Both of us were at Khe Sanh after the Siege, and we both spent some time on the hills around the base. We both saw combat serving on the hills. I was with 1/1 on Hill 689, and we had a terrible fight with the NVA trying to recover some dead Marines that were killed in an ambush outside the wire. I think we were the last Marines in the Khe Sanh area after it was abandoned. We didn't leave the hill until July 12th or 13th, were overrun and had some bad times during recovery, and lost more good men in the process. But that is not what I want to write about. Tim, my brother-in-law and I spent a lot of time recently talking about the Marines that were at Khe Sanh during the Siege.

We both have been in firefights, received incoming mortars, rockets and some artillery at times, but we couldn't imagine what the Marines went through during the Siege receiving incoming every day. It had to be the most unnerving experience that anyone could go through. Tim and I reflected back on the times we received incoming and what a scary experience it was, but compared to thousands of incoming rounds each and every day, that would be one of the worst experiences a person could go through. I just wanted to let you know that at least two old Marines are thinking about you and your experiences, and we are both amazed that any of you would be sane today after that experience.

I am currently being treated for PTSD, but when I think about the Marines that were at Khe Sanh during the Siege, I would think all of you should be rated at 100% disability for PTSD for going through that experience for such an extended period of time. Tim and I have the deepest respect for you and for what you went through. Thank you for what you did, God bless you for your service at Khe Sanh. I am pretty nuts now, but if I had been there during the Siege receiving all of the incoming you had, I think I would be in a mental hospital.

Tim and I offer you the supreme Semper Fi.

War Story

by Ski-ball

Thirty-seven years ago, right around this date, we received orders from CAC HQ in Phu Bai that we were to take part in a large operation in conjunction with units of 1/1. We were to swing southeast out of our village and then circle out, and come back up in a north direction. 1/1 would push almost straight south out of Phu Bai (all of this on the east side of Highway 1)—the intent being to push the units of VC and NVA going in and out of the fighting in Hue, eventually trapping them against a river where we would prevent their crossing. We took two full squads (for us, that meant 12 Marines total and about 24 PF's). That also meant that we would only leave 4 of our guys in the village, and that even the guys that we normally would not trust to go out on patrol with us, would have to go. Almost from the first, it was an ongoing shootout. Nothing major at first, just enough to slow us down, and irritate the heck out of us.

We finally called a halt in a rice paddy to settle down, get our bearings, and see how 1/1 north of us was doing. Three Hueys supporting 1/1 spotted us, and took positions for what looked like a strafing run. This was probably based on all the Vietnamese characters they could see manning the rice paddy sides. Not having radio communications with them, we started to try to bunker in for the coming attack. Just then, one of the black guys in the other squad, ran out into the middle of the rice paddy, whipped off his helmet, and started pointing at his face, just as the first Huey started to make his run. It stopped directly over him; the door gunner looked out and down. We could see his lips moving, and then he reached way out and gave a wave. All three Hueys then headed north back towards where 1/1 should be moving towards us. We proceeded north, immediately taking more fire.

Ahead of us, we could hear the arty support for 1/1. We were moving in a more congested area, a large number of huts, where a lot of our PF's had families. Our movement was slow, as the rate of fire intensified. Individual huts had to be cleared, and the arty got closer. The arty finally lifted, and we headed for the south bank of the river. As we made a turn next to the river, we spotted a number of civilian bodies lying dead out in the open. As we got closer, I recognized two of them. One was the mother of one of our PF sergeants, and the other was his daughter, about 8-9 years of age.

We had just shared dinner at their house two nights before. The mother had been caught in the back by an arty blast, but there was absolutely no mark discernable on the daughter. As he cradled their bodies, a part of me that had kept me going on so long died, and another part that I had never felt, was born. Sheer, unmitagating, non-feeling emotion for those who would wage war. Violence answered with violence. The only solution. Direct conflict with the love I felt for those who only wanted to live and be left alone. I lost a large part of myself that day. A part that had helped keep my comrades and me alive. For the first time, I truly let the fear of vulnerability get to me. I did not lose the power to kill, but I had the lost the power of not letting it get to me. Where before it was an asset, I now possessed a liability. My war had changed drastically.

Father and Son, Serving Together at Khe Sanh

by Skip Funk

My father, Lt/Col. Harry M. Funk, USAF, was the Liaison Officer for the Air Force in Washington, D.C. from 1966 to 1970. His office was in the old Cannon Building where the House of Representatives was located. When the Siege began, he requested TDY to Guam and was transferred there for 60 days to fly B-52 missions in direct support of Khe Sanh. His reasoning was that if his son could endure what Khe Sanh had to offer, he could leave his comfortable desk job in Washington, and do his part to help me.

I never knew if or when he was flying one of the many missions we witnessed, but I always imagined him up there looking down on us and saying a prayer on our behalf, as they delivered their payload. After I returned home, we sat down many nights and talked of the connection we felt during that tough time. He admitted that during some of his runs that it was very difficult for him to look down on Khe Sanh, knowing that we were in desperate times and wondering if what he was doing was making a difference. I assured him that it made all the difference in the world. In fact, in some of my letters to him during the Siege, I included photos of the Arc Lights in action from our ground perspective, and he shared them with all of his crew members.

Lt/Col. Funk, USAF and Cpl. Funk, USMC may hold the distinction of being the only father/son air/ground team during the Siege of Khe Sanh. To this day I am so very proud of him for stepping forward to do his part on our behalf. I was released from active duty in August, 1968 and returned home to complete college and get my degree. I moved to Cincinnati in 1970 with a new job to be close to him. He was based at Columbus AFB in Columbus, Ohio flying KC-135 tankers. We spent many good weekends together, playing golf and attending Cincinnati Reds baseball games, and enjoying a new connection between father and son.

The sad part is that on Thanksgiving night, 1971, while he TDY in Thailand, a Thai native stopped my father and attempted to rob him. My father resisted and was shot and killed in the attempt. The man was arrested that weekend and confessed to the crime. He was executed by a firing squad within three days. Such a terrible loss. Didn't mean for this to be commentary on my life, but thought the timing of your e-mail and the subject may be of interest to those Marines who did not know the whole story. Thanks for your e-mails and for staying in touch. I attended the monthly meeting of our local chapter of the Marine Corps League last night. Good to stay in touch with our roots. My very best regards to all, Semper Fidelis.

We were all at Khe Sanh together with 1st Battalion 26th Marines. Congratulations on your graduating from The Air War College. I am one of five Marine officers, all lieutenant colonels, graduating from The Air War College in the Class of 1985. The Class of 1985 was comprised of some 270 officer students, mostly Air Force colonels. During our time at The Air War College, I do not recall one single Air Force officer ever stepping forward to tell the five of us Marines that he had served at Khe Sanh or flew missions in support of the Marines at Khe Sanh.

That was until your Air Force General Russell E. Dougherty, former CinC Strategic Air Command, came to speak to our class in the Spring of 1985. After the general's speech, I waited in the lobby until all of the Air Force officers had finished kissing his ring. General Dougherty then looked at me, smiled broadly and walked over without a moment's hesitation. "Ross Brown, what in the world are you doing in that Marine uniform?" General Dougherty inquired. I had grown up at Strategic Air Command's March Air Force Base in California while Lieutenant Colonel Dougherty was raising his family and working his way up the chain of command in the U.S. Air Force. I simply replied that I had always been a Marine and appreciated the support his Strategic Air Command had provided us Marines at Khe Sanh and elsewhere. After that moment, Air Force officers came out from everywhere to tell the five of us how they had played an important role in supporting the U.S. Marines in defending Khe Sanh. Thank you, Mr. Butler and...

Ross,

My really good B-52 story comes from a grainy black and white photograph I acquired when I was researching Crickets on a Steel Tiger (my Air War College report on the interdiction of the Ho Chi Minh Trail 1966-1968). The label on the back says: "104677 USAF U.S. Air Force B-52s crisscrossed the countryside around the embattled outpost of Khe Sanh, Vietnam, leaving the entire area interwoven with geometrical patterns of pock marks. In this pictorial montage which was pieced together from reconnaissance photos, each white dot shows where a bomb fell. The larger white forms at the right are clouds which characteristically hung over the base. April 1968." U.S. Air Force Photo. On the front, the picture is labeled "B-52 STRIKES." Faint vertical lines show where the strip photos have been matched together. Near the lower right corner, a grease-pencil mark encircles the US Marine base at Khe Sanh, and you can barely see the outline of the runway with clouds etched around.

Two other labels northwest of the base indicate the locations of Hill 881 North and Hill 881 South. Those hills are about 4 miles off the end of the runway and had been battlegrounds in May 1967 during the NVA's first major attempt to move in on Khe Sanh. During those Hill Fights, over 100 Marines died and more than 1,000 NVA troops were thought to have been killed. The picture continues for about 9 miles west of Khe Sanh and about ten miles north, so it shows about a hundred square miles. Lines of little white dots cover most of those 100 square miles. There are sections of jungle that are more white than dark. In this region northwest of Khe Sanh, it was believed that either two or three (I don't have my books out to cross-check) NVA Divisions were massing to eventually overrun the Marine base with its 4,000 defenders and create the American Dien Bien Phu that would drive us out of the war.

During the 77-day Siege of Khe Sanh that followed Tet-68, the NVA suffered tens of thousands of casualties within the region covered by this picture. All those little white dots help explain how and why. That picture is part of why A Certain Brotherhood had the storyline that it has. If the NVA could have held off the B-52s and prevented all those lines of white dots, Khe Sanh might very well have been overrun in early 1968. Airpower made the difference. Many of those bombs were loaded on B-52s at U-Tapao. Be proud of our (the TLCB's) role and don't ever forget it. I feel one other personal connection to that picture. For about 2 weeks in late July/early August 1967, I lived in a bunker at Khe Sanh. Flying conditions were miserable; living conditions weren't much better although the Marines took good care of the FACs as they wanted us available and ready when they needed us.

I did get some good missions, helped pull some of our guys out of the jungle, gave moral support to a company climbing a hill one beautiful afternoon, got to do some legal buzzing one afternoon flying cover over a large convoy heading back down from Khe Sanh to Camp Carroll, etc. One memory I have is that in the summer of 1967 that hundred square miles looked mostly like virgin jungle from the air, with the exception of the craters left from the battle in May on Hills 881 North and South. All those lines of little white dots didn't exist. That's part of why I have always been so impressed by that photo from April 1968.Take great pride in having served your country when you were called.

Attacking Hill 881N

by Chester Wilson, I Co3/26

I remember the morning the company left 881S to attack Hill 881N. I was with 1st. Platoon, 1st. Squad. We went around a bomb crater, an area that was very familiar to us. We had been in a firefight the day before when we surprised an NVA outpost. We moved into position for the attack. Names have faded over the years, but I remember Cpl. Coniff & Ron Ford. Ron was on my left, I don't remember who was on my right. We were about halfway to the top when we received fire. Everyone dropped and began to return fire. I was firing my M-14 as fast as I could. Enemy small arms fire was kicking dirt up into my face. I fired a LAW and rolled out of the line of fire. There was an explosion to my left and a scream from Ron Ford—he had been hit. I went to see how bad he was hit. I dressed his wounds, and he headed back to the rear.

A short time later, another explosion, another yell, another wounded Marine. I administered first aid and he had to head for the rear. I resumed laying down a base of fire until Phil Provanzano informed me that everyone else had pulled out and I was the only one left, and they had called for an air strike. I did not realize I was all alone up there. I am glad the NVA didn't know it. I returned to the tree line by the crater where the wounded had been taken to await medevac and the air strike. I helped set up a perimeter for the arrival of the medevac. The helicopter had just landed and picked up wounded, when it was hit and rolled down the hill. Parts were flying off and I was almost struck by one of the wheels. It crashed into the valley and the Marines rushed to rescue the wounded and crew members.

And the end of the day, 1st Platoon was completely exhausted. People have asked me if I was ever shot, I answer no, but it wasn't that the NVA didn't try. I received minor shrapnel leg wounds which I suspect were a lot less painful. To all my fellow Khe Sanh Vets I wish you well.

To my fellow Marines every where, a big Semper Fi.

In Memory of Adrian Brittles, and William Walter (Muddy) Waters III. If anyone is interested Adrian is buried at Turtle Hill Cemetery on the East side of Tampa, Florida. I have been there, and am going this year. I plan on visiting Muddy's grave at Hampton Roads National Cemetery this April. Does anyone know where S/Sgt. Taylor is buried? I would like to pay my respects. He was such a good person and outstanding Marine. We had some good conversations before I rotated.

Reminiscence Time

by Ski-Ball

Thirty-seven years ago this night, I spent my last night in combat. Three Marines and one PF on a night ambush. The ambush was successful with one minor glitch. That is why it was my last time in combat in Vietnam. The years have passed by quickly, though so many of the memories have not. My thanks go out to a Marine chopper pilot who disobeyed orders to pick me up in the dead of night and to those back in Phu Bai, who in spite of a very long night (there was a big brouhaha) going on up near the DMZ that night, and casualties were a plenty, made sure that I was not ignored and kept me up to date why I was not at the top of the list in getting treated.

It was a long night, and even a longer morning. Next to me was a lieutenant who was due to go on R and R, but upon hearing that his unit was in trouble up at the DMZ, got on a chopper to go back up there instead of staying on the freebird heading for some fun. Rank didn't matter in our conversation. On my other side was a young fellow, who seeing I had a Bible, asked to borrow it. I told him it was not in English, but a Bible given to me by my parents written in Latvian before I left for Nam. He just looked at me and said, it didn't matter what language it was written in, the message was the same, and he would just like to hold it for a while.

There were sandbags piled around a lot of the cots we were on, and in the distance at one point I could hear mortars dropping. At that point I couldn't move anymore and just lay there listening, judging in my mind how close the mortars were getting. The next day, I was flown down to Da Nang and from there, a flight to go old Yokasuka, Japan, where I was to spend a few months of my life. A person can do a lot of thinking lying in a cot, especially when the sense of immortality no longer exists. And it is amazing how the effects of war bring out the equality of all men, regardless of race, color, creed, and rank. A lot of thoughts and images went through my mind and heart that night and in those following times. And a new sense of values and love were born.

Ernie: I just wanted to bring this to your attention if I may. On memorial page 6, in the remembrance by Col. Dabney honoring Lt. Puller Jr., you have Lt. Puller listed as having served with 3/1. It should have read 2/1.

I was a member of Golf Co. 2/1 when Puller joined us in late July 1968. I was in Con Thien for the second time. I was the RTO for Captain Woods who assigned Lt. Puller to the 3rd Platoon. I had arrived in country on the 16 January 1968, and was sent to Con Thien. We moved out of that hell hole in March to Ca Lo for Operation Pegesus. I was with H&S Company and arrived at Khe Sanh with the advance party in early April. I went on many operations until we closed the base on July 5, 1968. I've written an article about what happened during the last few days of the base for Ray Stubbe and included color pictures. I hope to see him in July in Chicago.

In Sept, we were finally moved down from Northern I Corps to an area south of Da Nang. This is the area where Lt. Puller was severely wounded by a booby trap. We had been assigned as a blocking force for another unit. I was only about fifty yards away when it happened. It took us almost 45-55 minutes to get him medevaced. When I got to him the first thing I remember him saying; "Am I going to lose by leg?" I answered, "The corpsman will tell you." I thought we had started receiving incoming. Nine months at Khe Sanh and Con Thien had no effect on me. When I got home in February 1969, my mother, future wife and I went to the Philadelphia Naval Hospital to see Lt. Puller and give him some cookies and to shoot the breeze. Lt. Zier, the 2nd Platoon leader was also there. Lt. Zier passed away in 1972 of Agent Orange. So it's 2/1 not 3/1. I feel it is important to get information correct, if possible. Thank You.

God...

Grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference. Amen.

I had an aunt send me a small wallet-size copy of the Serenity Prayer while I was in Nam. I carefully placed it behind the plastic picture protectors, opposite my fiancé's engagement picture. We all know how things will deteriorate, while humping the bush in thick triple canopy jungles to flooded rice paddies. We all took great care to cover our possessions like these with plastic to keep dry; but was near impossible in monsoon rains and jungle fighting. Photos and similar billfold type possessions usually ended up faded and in such shape they were unidentifiable. I did my best to protect my billfold from the elements, so I could recite the prayer while looking at my high school sweetheart's picture, who I was to marry when, or IF, I returned from Nam.

After a year of Hell on Earth, I came home, physically intact, with the prayer and the photo. I still have both today with some minor rice paddy damage. I still recite the prayer daily, and still look at my wife, only now in person. I am so grateful to have both. I have an inner feeling that these two little items—with God—got me through Nam. I share this with my comrades—to use the prayer. It is powerful and it works; maybe not quite as fast as I would like, but then I refer back to the prayer. I am not considered a religious man, but I am spiritual, and have found serenity by the prayer and tons of love and care and understanding from my wife throughout our life's struggles. I hope some of you can use this small Prayer—IT WORKS. It is the mainstay prayer in many recovery groups, so why not in OUR recovery from the WAR. Makes sense to me, and I hope it will for you. Peace, love, and serenity to all our comrades, past and present. Semper Fi.

I wrote this for, and dedicated this to, our brothers on the Wall. The character in this short story is not me, although some of my thoughts and emotions are expressed. He is really all of you.

The Mist

The Marine walked along the path beside the Reflecting Pool. In the past, he had sometimes stopped and moved closer to the water to watch the moonlight quiver off the surface. But today there wasn't a moon to be seen because of the low cloud cover, which caused the air to become thick and consuming.

Slightly stooped, he no longer strode in the deliberate cadence once used as a young man fresh out of boot camp, but in steps so soft and slow he seemed almost motionless, the strength long ago taken out of his legs. Patrolling miles of mountains and valleys around the area known as Leatherneck Square, shrapnel wounds...and time, had all taken their toll.

In the distance, the Vietnam vet could barely see the glow from the lights of the Lincoln Memorial in the background. He knew that the long, shadowy monolith that is known as the Wall would soon come in to view; a great slice cut out of the earth by two mammoth slabs of marble conjoined at the apex. How dark and mysterious, he thought, as he approached the structure. The Marine wondered if it felt somewhat intimidating to civilians and tourists visiting the memorial for the first time.

These were the early morning hours just before the daylight would appear on the horizon. He was always awake at this time of night, for sleep was short and the nightmares relentless.

He always thought it odd that the darkness, which had shrouded death's mask so many years ago at Khe Sanh, had now, ironically, become his closest ally. The darkness protected the Marine's anonymity and kept him isolated from others. It is how he preferred it.

There was a mist in the morning air and it reminded the Marine of the constant fog and mist that would engulf the hills and valleys around the combat base during the monsoon season. It was so dense you couldn't see six inches in front of you. Thinking back, it seemed to him that the monsoons lasted his whole tour of duty in-country.

In the gloom the park lanterns gave off an eerie light and the drizzle surrounding them seemed to dance and swirl until it floated out, as if in reverence, toward the monument. The moisture gently clung to the polished granite making it glisten.

As he passed the panels of names his thoughts were always the same: How could this be? How could so many lose their lives? Why was it that these young men weren't allowed to live out their dreams, to fulfill their destinies?

Questions, always questions...and never any answers.

Standing in front of the Wall, the veteran remembered hearing somewhere that everything in the universe happens in time and space. At that particular time and in that portion of space, events took place that would cost over 58,000 American men and women their lives. Such a heavy price to pay- the cost in American lives, or in the grief of so many families.

There were the memories of losing a close buddy, another casualty with no time to grieve, along with the fear that this may also be your last day on earth as well. There was the anger felt when getting tired of the daily pounding and yelled out loud to the enemy, "Come on, you sons-of-bitches, I'm tired of this—let's go, bring it on."

Alone in the mist, his mind drifted away becoming lost in the present and traveling to a destination becoming more and more distant with time. But the vet's mind hadn't fully betrayed him. He still remembered the laughter of Marines playing practical jokes on one another, the trading of C-rations, sharing cigarettes, and the warmth felt as another Marine shared a letter written by someone in his family back home.

Yes, some memories were soothing to the Marine, but most of them cut deep into his soul. He halted every few steps, at certain panels, and with the softest touch, brushed his fingertips along the names of his brothers. For him though, these are not just names on a wall, they're faces, and with each face there is a story; the stories are of honor and bravery witnessed each day during the battle of Khe Sanh. Touching the Wall was his communion of the spirit, a melding of souls between brother Marines. He felt as if we were all threads, woven together, becoming a fabric of steel gray mist and red clay.

Each time he looked at his brothers on the Wall his feelings of guilt would consume him, forever thinking to himself: why them and not me? The Marine felt that he might not ever be able to come to grips with those feelings.

The first sliver of daylight was beginning to push through the gloom, which signaled it was time for him to go, and say goodbye for now. Shortly, he would again become invisible.

As always, the Vietnam vet's last thoughts were of the betrayal he felt by his country, his government and the politicians that never gave him and his brothers-in-arms a commitment to complete and total military victory. Upon his return to the U.S. he was treated with disrespect and called horrible names by people who didn't even know him. He was judged only because he wore a uniform.

Through the years, the roller-coaster ride of emotions turned from hurt to anger, rage and bitterness, and the only way he knew how to numb those emotions was through alcohol and isolation. However, the numbness was always short-lived.

Also, the man thought about the word "closure" and how many people have used that term in relation to healing. When it came to war, he and his brothers-in-arms knew there was no such thing as closure, just emptiness.

With one last look behind him, followed by a tight, steady salute toward the Wall, the Marine set his cover low on his brow, buried his shoulders deep into his field jacket and pulled the collar up around his neck. As the old warrior turned away, he brought his sleeve up to wipe the droplets from his cheeks and spoke softly to himself, "These aren't tears. Marines don't cry...it must be the mist."

In the Footsteps of Titans

by Gary W. Foster

No one can explain why it so difficult to relate to people who have never been some place where one has been, or who have not been there under the same circumstances, or experienced the same thing in the same manner. For someone who has experienced something extraordinarily profound, an imperceptible transformation takes place within one's psyche: that person is never again the same. His or her persona and perceptions are altered forever. Life takes on a new meaning.

Along with this phenomenon, there is a tendency to want to return to those places where the experience manifested itself, where the defining moment of our lives emerged and was revealed like an incipient statue being carved from a block of marble. There is a magnetic force that compels us to return to special places; that is, places special to each of us. I doubt anyone knows why for sure but it may be the need to relate to our inner selves free from outside influences or judgments; or, especially since we cannot convey it to anyone else in a manner they will understand, to confirm the story again to ourselves, to convince us that the event did, in fact, occur; that we are a living testament to our own destiny molded from such an event. Reunions seem to fill this need and allow each of us a few moments to relive something in our past with our comrades or colleagues with whom we shared a common experience, as if to make tangible again those elusive moments. In my own life, I have returned to my high school, my college and I have revisited places to which I had traveled years ago, such as the south of France or London, where something interesting had happened to me. But I must admit, I am not quite sure why.

The compelling need to revisit a place that is special seems to be directly proportional to the time spent away from that place: the longer the absence, the more the desire to return. Why is this? An answer to this question perhaps cannot be found. But there can be no disputing it, the attraction to return to someplace in one's own history is very strong.

And now mix this place of deep personal value or emotion with a place of profound international, humanitarian, political, or military significance and the attraction or desire to return is exacerbated. It becomes stronger; cannot be denied. Even as I have come to know certain people and have listened to their tales vicariously, I have developed a desire or perhaps, at least, a curiosity to visit that place where their saga unfolded, as if I had been there too by their side. Khe Sanh represents such a place.

Like some of the other nearby geographic characteristics that circumscribe the Combat Base, one hill in particular is one of the more dominant features of the landscape. From the valley of decision, as Ray Stubbe termed it, I have seen it looming on the horizon in the distance, beyond the Combat Base. I have seen the hill in the gray of the early morning hours, through the clouds in the valley, through the rain, and at sunrise and at sunset. I have seen the top as it appeared above the mist of moisture-laden skies. I have seen the hill, on occasion, resplendent in clear weather, a rare phenomenon to be sure because the atmosphere is usually uncooperative—when it seemed the trees were so close I could see the branches and leaves move in the breeze, I could reach out and touch them: they beckoned me. It has happened.

I have been close to it. I have had a desire to climb it but never had the time or, for that matter, the opportunity. My being on top or reaching there has eluded me—like a dream where no matter how hard one tries, one never reaches the destination which always remains out there somewhere beyond one's reach, or when one can never run fast enough to evade monsters, conjured-up captors, or demons of the night. I have stopped thinking about going there, thinking I may never have the chance. The hill is before me always, even in my mind, but as in the dream in which I never reach my destination, I cannot get there. Each time I saw it, it seemed farther away; an unobtainable distant exotic place like Bali Jai. It was a destination seemingly within my grasp but forever slipping away.

But wait, no so fast! What's this? A porthole-size window of opportunity to reach a heretofore unattainable destination, a place I have never been but a place others have visited and which keeps calling them back. And now, do I not feel the overwhelming tug of curiosity, the swelling ineluctable need to seize the moment; to be there, if only briefly, and, as an added benefit, without bodily risk.

Somehow, I knew. Something told me, kept pulling at me. And on 7 April 2005, I embarked on a brief journey that heretofore has so often escaped me. I thought the opportunity would not present itself to me again. For the first time, I had a real chance to truly climb this mountain that lay before me filling the view through the windshield of my vehicle.

"Binh," I said, turning to my driver and pointing through the windshield of our 4-wheel drive vehicle. "See that road up the side of that mountain? Well, drive up there." I continued, pointing upwards through the windshield.

What dramatic changes have occurred in the valleys around and in between Hills 558, and 881. First, a large hydroelectric scheme is being constructed on the Rao Quan River not far from the nearby hills and valleys of the area. This massive undertaking can be viewed from behind a restaurant that serves beer with ice just around the corner from the customs clearance house on the left of Highway 9 as one progresses to Dong Ha from Khe Sanh. But the most amazing thing to see is the number of roads and streets being built in the area around the hills. It was astonishing to see this development. The Yellow Brick Road, which during my first visit was nothing more than a very rough and bumpy cobblestone country conveyance to the Base has been paved, replete with striping and drainage ditches. Driving to the main gate and museum of the Combat Base is easy. Commercial and industrial development is progressing at a rapid pace and it does not appear as if it will stop any time soon. The area is experiencing an economic growth spurt, but I have no idea what's driving it.

As soon as one crests the rise on the road just past the Base, the hill rises dramatically. It fills the horizon; and is unmistakable. The sun, finally having emerged from behind the low clouds, was brilliant and the temperature was not that unbearable, but it was increasing incrementally, inexorably. The hill dominates the area and behind it is Hill 881, and to my right rear is Hill 558 and the clearly distinguishable and indomitable 950 and 1015, each a historical hill so identified by its height above sea level in meters.

Binh turned off the newly paved road onto the smaller road and, bouncing along, we angled up the side of the base of the hill. The road became narrower, but I urged Binh forward. "Keep going," I said, motioning with my hand that we could continue upwards. This hillside road is new, I thought; has never been here before as far as I could tell.

"How far will this road take me?" I mused out loud. The road turned into a trail and then narrowed down even more. Still, we drove upwards. To my right, I spied a small hut with a corrugated metal roof and at that point the road clearly ended. I looked through the windshield and saw a foot trail that proceeded through the thick, lush green coffee plants. "I wonder," I said. I opened the door and climbed down from the 4-wheel drive vehicle. I stood and looked around. I could see the steep sides of the hill before me through the somewhat enshrouding trees and swaying tall grass and ubiquitous coffee plants. To my left there was a valley and then another lower ridgeline and what I thought were the beginning slopes of Hill 881. I turned to look in the direction of the Combat Base and Khe Sanh Ville. I could see the earth cuts being made for the hydroelectric scheme and the ensuing development in the general valley area. Hill 558 was perfectly outlined and now, from this vantage point I noticed that, whereas before there had been very little human activity, a road has inched its way around the sides to the top. "So, Binh" I said, "I can drive virtually to the top of 558 now." Binh looked at me and nodded his head but I knew he did not know what I was saying. "So there's 558." I said out loud, as I surveyed the area to get my bearings, as if Binh could understand me. "Five fifty-eight," I said again, pointing. I remembered Jacob Krygoski – a Marine I have not forgotten but who I have never met – who had been stationed on 558. I thought of John Pessoni but could not remember if he was on any of the hills.

But my sights were set on another possibility that dawned on me. "Jesus," I said, "I'm probably a sixth, or even a fifth of the way up this monster hill". I surveyed the area through the trees and coffee plants. I looked behind and all around me. "And here's a foot trail going up! How far does it go?" I knew what I was going to do. I knew with complete clarity of thought what I was doing. I was not fooling myself and I doubt I was fooling Binh. No, I knew what I was going to do for sure. I was going to the top of this hill! I realized I had known that already as soon as we had turned off the main highway, but I did not allow myself to admit it. I stopped myself. Oops! Wrong shoes, wrong slacks, no hat, no water, nothing. I'm not prepared for this. Fuggit, I'm going to the top.

I started climbing. First, through head-high rows of coffee plants. The going was definitely uphill, but easy and with plenty of downward visibility for footing. "So far, so good," I mused out loud. My breathing was easy. Binh followed me for awhile. The last mountain I ever climbed was Mt. Sinai in the Sinai desert in 1988. That was plenty steep then. I found this upward climb to be relatively easy in comparison. I kept going, taking note however that the trail became steeper with each step and the rows of coffee plants more narrow. I was soon surrounded by thick coffee plants. I reached another small trail that climbed an eight-foot high earth ledge. I pulled myself up by tree limbs and, once on top, realized I had left the coffee plants behind. I was on my way now. I was also on my own, and without water, this last fact not sinking in just yet.

Now on the ledge I looked down and could see the metal roof of the hut and the vague outline of the vehicle. Binh was nowhere in sight. Turning to face the mountain, just in front of me was a barbwire fence lined with scraggly trees, that proceeded up and down the hill, the kind of scene one might find around farms or ranches in Colorado. The fence was trampled down and some posts had fallen, but there was a clear delineation of a property line or something. I stepped over the barbwire with the assistance of a low tree branch that I grabbed hold of and found myself in a narrow clearing that went straight down the fall line of the hill. "Foster, there is no turning back now," I said out loud for anyone to hear, although no one was around to hear me; and to reinforce in my own mind that I was about to undertake something significant, if not onerous.

I looked down the trail and thought this must be the brown stretch of earth that runs up the side of the hill that one can see from the Yellow Brick Road, from the crest near the Combat Base. To my right, the trail went straight down and into the canopies of thick trees and brush. But I wasn't going down. No. I could care less about the descending trail. I was going up. I turned left and looked up the ascending trail.

"Let's see, this mountain is a little less than 3,000 feet above sea level. I estimate I am about 800 feet above sea level. So I have only 2,200 feet to climb." I learned to think of climbing mountains in terms of chunks of elevation or increments and not in individual feet. Psychologically, at least for me, it makes climbing easier, as it makes objectives more attainable. So, in ten feet increments, that's 220 increments; or in 50-foot increments, that's 44 increments. Let's go with the 44 increments. I can do this. I started uphill.

At first my strides were even and long and I gained elevation quickly. I stopped a couple of times and looked at the valley. This much, so far, had been easy. The hut and vehicle had long disappeared from view. I saw shade farther up the trail and decided I would take a five-minute break there. I made it, no sweat well; I was actually sweating pretty profusely. I sat down to relax and felt OK, still breathing evenly. There was no breeze and the sun shone intensely through the trees. The shade I had seen was not much shade after all.

I looked up the trail and could see only a steep slope of the mountain in front of me. "Aw, come on!" I said, "I've climbed at least 300 feet or so from the fence." I should be able to see the top. But no.

I stood up and began to climb again. The trail did not disappear. It just continued up and it began to run through thick grass that was over my head with a riot of briars intermingled all through it. I continued on and quickly found myself entangled in long thorny limbs and briars. They attacked my shirt and pants and finally, becoming so enmeshed with this vegetation, I was stopped until I could disengage from them, pulling each bramble from my clothes with my fingers. Then onward, ever upward again, and again the same thing happened. I was pulling thorns out of me every inch of the way. They stuck to and became embedded in my shirt, in my pants and in my flesh. Now where was the top? I fought my way through the elephant grass and the briars and emerged into another opening. But now I noticed the trees had lessened and there was now no shade at all. And, there was no water. This thought finally was not lost on me and I was becoming quite thirsty. "Aw, the top is just ahead," I said. "Get up and push on." I could not see the valley or the top of the hill or the trail behind me or anything. Just tall grass: tall thick grass with incredibly sharp edges and long thorns.

I continued to climb but noticed during brief pauses that my recovery time was increasing in between multiples of increments. The hill was becoming steeper or I was trying to accomplish too much too soon. "Slow down." I reminded, or rather, warned myself. Then the thought occurred to me, and the implications really hit me. First of all, it's against the law to be here without a permit. Second I am alone with no way to contact anyone. And third, as a renewed thought but one that was becoming more of a concern, not a single drop of water. "What am I thinking?" I felt my pocket. "Cell Phone! I'll call Binh to let him know I'm OK." Dialed in the number, hit the system but could not hit his cell phone. Well, just great. Put the phone back in my pocket

I looked at my slacks, many pulls of thread in the fabric due to the brambles and thorns. "So be it." I looked at my arms and blood was dripping down both of them from multiple scratches and abrasions. "Funny," I thought, as I pulled thorns out of my skin. I was reminded of "The Red Badge of Courage." For some inexplicable reason, my mind went back to my eighth grade year when I had to have a tutor in introductory English literature. The first book I read under her was Stephen Crane's short but definitive novel of the Civil War. How odd, I thought, to be reminded of this simply because of some blood on my forearm. But now my mind began to ponder many things as I sat and recuperated. I watched as a trail of ants marched serenely up the hill, over and under leaves, on the ground next to me. How many Marines, much bloodier than me, marched, trudged, and humped through this area on daily patrols like these ants? How many Marines went up and down this same hill once, twice, many times a day? How many firefights or ambushes ensued here in this mass of vegetation? How could anyone see anyone? A wasp flew next to my head, just out of arm's length, making slow buzzing noises. The breeze had stopped or, rather, I knew the tall grass had stopped its circulation as I sat on the ground sweating.

Sweat now really poured out of me as the sweltering heat spiraled. I was reminded of my second visit to the Combat Base five years ago when I found the ammo dump and confirmed the runway. Sweat poured out of me on that day too. I knew I was dehydrating quickly. I thought, "I either reach the top soon, or I will be forced to climb down." Now, the reality of not having water became very acute. "This is not good." If I could gauge the remaining distance to the top, I could estimate my chances. But I could see nothing. All I knew now was the mountain was sloping upwards in front of me and was snaring me into its steely undeniable grip. Was this tantamount to Kurtz's descent into the heart of darkness? Would this mountain consume me, eat me alive? Would it suck me in and spit me out—spent, exhausted, torn, thirsty, bloody? Apparently so.

Another few increments. Had to sit down. Sweat running out of my body like Niagara Falls. Steeper climbing and rougher going. Looked at my watch: "Let's see, left car at 11:40." Ah, at least I remembered that. "It's now 12:55. Binh must be wondering where I am." And now I wondered whether he may have driven down the trail thinking I may be below him. I reached into my pocket for my cell phone and opened it and dialed his number; hit the system but still cannot hit his phone. "Man! Maybe I better go down. Maybe the authorities followed us here and have taken him in." Though I doubted this possibility, I knew the authorities frowned on such excursions in these hills. "I'm not really supposed to be here." I was in dilemma: a propitious moment of decision. I thought for a few seconds: no water, no communication. Then I thought of Dennis Mannion and his comrades in Kilo 3/26. My mind was made up. Nothing was going to stop me from climbing this mountain! Nothing!

I stood up, blood and sweat everywhere, barbed slacks, and ripped shirt. I turned to look up the trail and words from the children's story "The Little Engine that Could" popped into my mind: "I think I can, I think I can." Not a breath of air. With the steep side slope of the mountain staring me in the face, slowly I put one foot in front of the other and said to myself. "I know I am almost there." I wasn't.

This hill, I realized, was challenging me now. Though it may accept my presence, it would not accept it without proof of my worthiness. Joseph Campbell, the great mythologist, I was sure, would have provided me with some mythological parallels.

With little time remaining, I kept trudging upward into and out of thick grass. No trees. Sun crashing down on me now. I lay down in some tall grass, burying my head in the reeds to ward off the insistent sun, listened to my heart pound away, and felt the sweat continue to completely soak my shirt. My pants were covered in brambles and now red dirt. My breathing eventually slowed and subsided but my heart raced furiously. I was very thirsty. I waited for a few more minutes and stood up again. Worthy I may be, exhausted I am becoming. Can't give up "Never have, never will." I have never forgotten that expression I read once in Red Clay after 9/11, three and half years ago.

Still not quite there yet. The trail opened into thinner and shorter grass and I could see the slopes of "eight eighty-one" to my left and the ridgeline of what I thought connected the mountain I was on to an adjacent mountain sort of to my front. Behind me, I could now see the valley and the roads far below. I could see "nine-fifty" and "ten-fifteen" easily and I knew my bearings. I looked at my watch: 1:30PM. Sat down and then lay down and let my heart pound again on the inner walls of my chest till it rested. Becoming impatient and fearful – I thought I would run out of time, or Binh and subsequently myself perhaps would be arrested – I stood up and followed the narrow opening again up and back into thick grass. Man this hill is up! All the way! Where is the top?

Another increment farther and I lay down again. My neck is now bleeding, as is my face. Well, I'm use to that by now. "Landmines!" The thought careened through my mind. "Oh yeah, I'll bet they're some around here, somewhere." Bombs and mortar rounds; at least they don't pose an immediate danger. If they didn't explode then, they probably won't explode now. But landmines, now that's another story. Wonder if there are any around here? Probably not on this trail. Well, I consoled myself, they'll just add to the predicament I now find myself in.

I got up and turned to the top and marched on and up. Sun, almost directly overhead or at least it seemed directly overhead, continuing to pour its bright heat down on me. I looked to the left and, through the tall grass, could make out round depressions in the earth. Must be bomb craters. But now, what's this in front of me? There appears to be a clearing up ahead. There is! I reached it and the slope flattened out and the climbing became easier. I saw trees up ahead but more importantly; I noted the open sky behind them. I saw the same ridgeline to my left that I had seen earlier at about the same elevation I was. I could see the slope of 881 flattening. "Man, I think I'm going to make it! I can't be very far from the top now."

With renewed vigor and enthusiasm, I made the last 100 steps and emerged through the thick grass to a plateau and, knowing the top of the hill was attainable, I rested one last moment. Time was now my enemy. I could not take much more time. I had other things to do this day and this short climb was but a spontaneous interlude. I called Binh on the cell phone but there was no answer. The top of the hill was just a few feet above me.

I raced the remaining distance; not sure why. Became entangled in thick grass again, and found a new route round, next to a small tree. I saw a trench line in front of me covered in tall grass. I knew it was a trench line because I could follow the contour around to my left and back again to my right. I could see the valley and all the hills; and 881 was right next to me. Hill "five fifty-eight," below me, was clearly identifiable. "Ah, but the breeze, the wind." What a relief. I began to hike up the incline in front of me. I was breathing heavily and sweating like there was no tomorrow. But I was there. I had reached the top.

I lay down on the top to recuperate, and as soon as I did, I could not see anything due to the tall grass. Now I thought, "Was I really at the top?" I surmised so except there were lumps of very tall grass off to my left and front. I walked there but didn't have the strength or time to fight more thick grass. No. This is it. This is the top of the hill. I was there.

I walked all around and looked at the valley and to the adjacent hills and pondered Hill 881 so close that I thought I could climb that too. But no—no time, and no water. I noticed that the Vietnamese had planted several rows of small pine trees. This had to be recent, within the last few days. The diggings for each sapling were not smoothed out by rain. Interesting. And then I realized that the going was easier for me here because before they had planted the trees they had cut down the tall elephant grass with their machetes.

I sat down facing the Combat Base. Hills 950 and 1015, far across the wide valley, were to my left front in clear unobstructed view. I think I was in the approximate area where Ray Stubbe held a service with a rugged cross planted in the ground. The photograph of this is now famous and a mural of it exists in Ho Chi Minh City. I wiped rivers of sweat from my eyes on my shirtsleeve. I could not help but remember that Dennis Mannion, Bob Arotta, Glenn Prentice, Paul Knight, Paul's son, Jeff Knight, Donna Elliot (who lost her brother Jerry (MIA) in February of 1968 in the Khe Sanh area), Dave Kniess (a former student of Dennis' who recorded the team's visit on film), and Lan Anh, their interpreter had climbed the mountain in July of 2000. Preceding me, they had visited where I now was, some of them for their second time.

The wind died down and I felt a sudden sensation. A slight chill swept over my body. Something seemed strange. I felt I was not alone. I felt as if someone else was on the mountain with me. Sitting still in the hot sun with the panorama of the valley spread out beneath me, I hooked my arms over my knees and stared all around. I stared as far to the horizon as I could. There was not a sound, not a breath of air and the grass and leaves on the smaller trees stood still. I remembered the Vietnamese consider the entire valley and surrounding hills to be haunted. I looked into the sky and saw puffy white clouds floating as they do in the American Midwest on a lazy day in late August. I saw their shadows dance across the valley floor below. I listened for any sound. There was none.

Now totally alone and engulfed in eerie silence, I wondered: were spirits of fallen American combatants swirling around me? I stood up and peered into the grass and along the sides of the hill and toward 881 and back towards 950 and 1015. I felt no wind but I sure felt something. Yes, they probably were present with me. And, if they were with me and confused about who I was, and perhaps worried about my intentions, then I wanted them to know I was there as a friend. I had not come up here to interrupt their solitude or to denigrate their sacrifice or to violate their spiritual space. I had come up here to honor them.

I looked at my watch and realized I had been on top for 20 minutes. I had to get down. I didn't have any more time. I walked back to the small tree where I had crested the mountain and looked down and then back across the inclined plateau. The wind picked up briefly. I turned to begin descending the trail back to the hut and vehicle. But after only a few steps I kept thinking about the Marines who had experienced what I had just experienced—the same thing, same place, many years before but in circumstances many times worse, far worse, than what I had experienced this day. Yes, thorns, humidity, heat, beating sun and interminable rain, tall grass, endless sweat, blood, bugs, wounds; but more; the enemy with their whizzing, stinging, deadly bullets and the thump of their grenades, the crunch of their insidious mortars, and the deep pounding explosions of artillery rounds fired from Co Roc Mountain in Laos and elsewhere. This was a very different and very dangerous place 37 years ago in 1968.

I stopped my descent short and stared out over the broad green valley now punctuated with darker green shades from the shadows of the white, hovering indolent clouds, and then back to the top of the mountain I had, on a whim, just climbed. I stood still. "I should say a prayer," I said. But what would I say? I never really pray. Why would I pray now and for what exactly? Somewhat at a loss, I felt I should at least say something to mark this moment and to remember the Marines who had served and died here. In slightly more than a solemn whisper of my voice, I simply and respectfully said the only words I knew appropriate for so many who endured the supreme hardship of this unforgiving, dreadful hill, who never gave up, and who made the ultimate sacrifice: "Semper Fi." I felt honored to be here, albeit in a detached, even morose way. It was a privilege to be where so many brave American men had been years before me. Climbing this lonely mountain in some foreboding, recessed corner of Quang Tri Province in the narrowest waist of Vietnam, taking an opportunity that had presented itself to me and may never present itself again. I knew my life had changed. Yes, climbing this hill was a challenge. Now, having gained the summit, descending it, after but a brief respite on top, made me a little sad. I would not be able to relate this experience to very many in ways they would understand. I knew I was given a gratuitous opportunity to visit the same place so many Marines may have wanted to re-visit but can't. Knowing all this, and knowing the history of this area, I realized I had been given a chance to walk in the footsteps of giants. "No." I thought. "Not giants." Not quite correct. "Titans" is the better descriptor.

Feeling now the soft warm breeze in my face as it rose from the valley beneath me, and seeing the dry, gray-green of the sun-parched, thick, chaotic vegetation as it enveloped the crest and side slopes, I turned my back on the mountain and started my descent. Retracing my steps and disappearing again into the canopies of tall grass and overgrowth as I walked down and back into the coffee plants to the vehicle, I had made my way off a non-descript hill that I had climbed only hours before but a hill indelibly etched into Marine Corps history—perhaps with the other hills collectively in and around Khe Sanh, comprising what has come to be called the Hill Fights, a symbol as historically significant as Iwo Jima. A lonely, grass-infested hill in central Vietnam unknown to most everyone. But to a select group of fighting Marines, and now always remembered by me, a hill that will forever be known in numbers marking its height above sea level, and in words: Eight Sixty-One. I had climbed Hill 861 and stood on the very ground where Titans once stood. None of us should ever forget them, the sacrifices they made, and what they accomplished there.

KSV CHICAGO REUNION SPECIAL EDITION

Reunion Committee Report on 2005 Reunion,
Aside from problems we experienced with the hotel, I believe everyone had a great time at the reunion. Some of our BOD members came up for election and the results our as follows: Russ Turner was elected (Unopposed) as President. Russ was the only Staff member up for re-election. The election for Directors at Large resulted in Doc "Fast Eddie" Feldman being elected to replace Frank Taggart, with other Directors at large maintaining their respective positions for another term.

Due to the overwhelming generosity of our members, our PX did great, with sales of $6,100.00. Reaping a good profit, was the sale of Ray Stubbe's new book, and from our Poem Book put together by Tom Eichler. Our thanks to John Pessoni for the hard work which made this all possible. Sgt. Grits added $1,140.00 from sales of his merchandise; our thanks to Don and Meg for coming. Our silent auction brought in another $1,350.00.Remember, you can visit our PX on line at www.khesanh.org by clicking on the PX link, and we will soon be adding many new items. Any order in next few months will receive a free Khe Sanh Veterans bolo.

We were greatly disappointed in the Hotel. We had negotiated every conceivable item we thought important to our members, and the Hotel just chose to ignore our written contract. In the first place, they promised that the Hotel would undergo a 70 Million Dollar renovation prior to the reunion. They did not spend one dime, in fact the conditions were worse then when we signed the contract. We are presently involved in negotiations to recover monetary damages for all their indiscretions.

All monies recovered will go toward reducing the cost of the reunion in Mobile Alabama next year. For your information, the violations of the contract included wrong rooms, parking issues, no provisions for complimentary coffee and buffet lunch, incorrect food at the banquet, and giving away rooms scheduled for our planned events .The list goes on, but we shall address them.

Again aside from a few scheduling issues with our transportation, we believe everyone had a good time. We are working on upgrading our website with new pictures, PX format, a message board, and guest book. You will need a password to get in; try bjjimbo. Fill out the registration form; all information is private.

SECRETARY NOTES:

There were a few complaints regarding the hours that the PX was supposed to be open. Next year they will be posted to avoid any confusion. Our members were very generous and made the PX a great success. You made us look like a great small business. Lloyd Scudder's daughter Sara did a wonderful job helping set up the PX. There were a lot more volunteers willing to help. I thanked them for their kind offers. The necklaces Ron Shouse and his lovely wife Linda made, were big sellers. We actually ran out of them. Ron and Linda are making some more, so we should have them in the PX soon, for those who missed out.

I want to thank all my Khe Sanh Brothers for sharing one of the best reunions I have attended. It is the one time of my life, when I am really happy and relaxed, just being around friends. There were times I laughed so hard, and time to have met some new brothers from Engineers, whom I know will be back next year. Our brothers from Recon were there in force, but kept getting lost (just kidding guys). The reunion committee worked tirelessly. My thanks too, Jimbo, Russ, and their beautiful wives PJ & Kathy.

A personal thank you to Tommy Eichler, and his brothers Denny & Bobby, for a job well done; you guys were great.

PRESIDENTS MESSAGE:

I would like to thank everyone who attended the reunion this year. We had a very good turn out, with more than 230 veterans, 120 wives, and other family members. Had a few problems, but nothing that our committee couldn't handle. A very big THANK YOU to all who helped with things that needed to be done to make it a great success. Special thanks to Ron Shouse, and Tommy's brothers, Dennis & Robert, for the transportation, and Tommy for the two BBQ's. I would also like to thank the girls for doing such a good job with registration. Thank you all for a job well done. We had a new member added to our board as many of you know. He is Doc "Fast Eddie" Feldman; welcome aboard Ed. Next year's reunion will be in MOBILE, ALABAMA, and already it is off to a good start. It's going to be a great one. There are many things to do there, and we are working to make it a fine trip, to see old friends, and meet new ones. We had several FNGs this year and expect to see more next year. Take care all and see you all in MOBILE.

REUNION 2006

Plans for Mobile Alabama. The trip to Mobile is already looking good, with the pending planned trip to Pensacola, and a visit to their military museum. Watch for a performance by the Blue Angels with VIP status, a trip to the USS Alabama Park, and a planned Mardi Gras at the Hotel with seafood and Southern Pork, and other BBQ's as we get details worked out. We think it will be a great city for our reunion. See ya'll there.

There I go with my Fat Thumbs Again

In the recently published Khe Sanh Book of Poetry, I wrote in a short Bio, that Loyde Arender served at Khe Sanh with K Co 3/26. Loyde upon receiving the book, immediately called me, and informed me of the mistake. He asked me to correct it because he did not want his fellow veterans thinking he was trying to be a Khe Sanh Wanabee. The Mistake was all mine. I apologize to Loyde. Also the picture on the front cover of the Poem Book is our own Jack Corbett, writing home. (West Dickens Avenue)

Major Jerry Edward Hudson (USMC, Ret.)
Age 73, died Wednesday, June 29, 2005

Jerry was born in Fort Wayne, IN on May 26, 1932 to the late Virgil and Hazel Hudson. He grew up in the Masonic Home in Springfield, OH, and enlisted in the Marine Corps after completing high school. He was commissioned right off of the drill field, and retired with the rank of Major in 1971, after serving 21 years. He served in Korea, Japan, and Vietnam, where he was the intelligence officer at the Battle of Khe Sanh. After retiring from the Marines, Jerry moved to Charlotte, NC, as Director of Safety and Security for the University of North Carolina at Charlotte. While working at UNCC, he earned his BS in Criminal Justice. Following retirement from UNCC in 1989, Jerry worked for Hechinger's and then moved to Richmond, VA for a short time before returning to Charlotte where he worked with Wal Mart. A memorial service was held, July 1, 2005 with Chaplain Pressley Stutts of the United States Marine Corps, officiating.

Survivors include his wife, Elaine Price of Charlotte; sons and daughters-in-law, Scott and Kathy of Waynesville, OH, and Mark and Anna, of Norfolk, VA; and grandsons, Paul and Ryan of Waynesville, OH.

General Robert E. (Bobby) Galer Medal of Honor

General Galer was the embodiment of a true Warrior. He first fought at Pearl Harbor, firing at the Zero's with a Springfield 03. His WW II combat service included, among other battles, fighting at Guadalcanal, and earning the first MOH awarded in that campaign. He was one of only two Marines with the MOH to participate in the invasion of the Philippines, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa, the other being fellow Guadalcanal MOH recipient GySgt John Basilone. He bunked with Lindberg and talked his way back into the war after being ordered to leave the Pacific to participate in War Bond Drives after the battle for Guadalcanal. He was shot down 4 times in combat. Three times on Guadalcanal, and the last time as a 37 year Group Commander in Korea, flying a Corsair.

All one has to do to learn about the Marine's Corps's participation in WW II and Korea, is learn about General Galer's service in the Corps. He was an All-American basketball player for The University of Washington before joining the Corps in 1935. He will be buried at the Texas State Cemetery in Austin, Texas.

LARRY "WAYNE" WRAY, 57, died Friday, June 3, 2005, in Fort Wayne.

Born in Greenville, Ky., he was a Vietnam veteran, serving with Marine Helicopter Squadron 165. He was a family man and will be missed by everyone who knew him. He is survived by son, Landon Wray of Witchia, Kansas; daughters, Abby, Ashley, and Amber, all of Fort Wayne; mother, Ella of Fort Wayne; sisters, Linda (Ron) Shroyer of Fort Wayne, and Sandra (Wayne) Watts of Philpot, Ky.; and his companion, Lois Stanger of Fort Wayne.

I met Larry at the Vet Center here in Fort Wayne and ended up hiring him to work for me back in the 80s. Larry wasn't a Khe Sanh vet, but hauled a lot of 1st Recon teams in and out of hot LZs around Da Nang. I lost touch with Larry after the company we worked for was bought and our jobs were eliminated.

Colonel Mark F. Tierney 10/19/42-2/6/05

With the heaviest of hearts I am sorry to report that at 11:40 A.M. on February 6, 2005, Super Bowl Sunday, Lieutenant Colonel Mark F. Tierney, USMCR (Retired) died in his Lake Ridge, Virginia home, as a result of several Agent Orange related cancers. He is one of the finest Marines I ever served with during my thirty (30) years of Active Duty and Reserve service.

The Colonel joined the Marine Corps Reserve in 1964 and after graduation from Boot Camp as his platoon's Honor Man, was trained as a Communicator, reporting for duty with a Reserve artillery unit near his home in the Philadelphia, Pennsylvania area.

Upon completing college in 1968 the Colonel, though eligible for promotion to Staff Sergeant, accepted a commission and volunteered to serve in the Republic of Vietnam. After he was trained as an Infantry Officer and Vietnamese linguist, he reported for duty as a Platoon Commander with Mike Company, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division. Subsequently the Colonel served as a Civil Affairs Officer for the 1st Marine Division and made many trips into Khe Sanh to help the people of that area.

I did not have the good fortune to meet Lieutenant Colonel Tierney until 1991 when we were both mobilized for the Gulf War. He was the II Marine Expeditionary Force (II MEF) Staff Counter Intelligence Officer, and I was the Intelligence Chief for the 2nd Marine Expeditionary Brigade 2nd (MEB). I was very fortunate to serve under him almost continuously from that point until he retired from the Marine Corps in 1995, after more than thirty one (31) continuous years of officer and enlisted service. Though he was my senior in the Corps, I was extraordinarily fortunate to have him became my mentor and friend. He is the first individual I was ever able to talk with about the events occurring at and after LZ Margo, in September of 1968, and all the grief that incident caused me.

I believe that the true measure of the man is in how he treats those who can't do anything in return. That description epitomizes the Colonel. When I was sick last December, he was the one who made sure that I got to the hospital and back home when I was released. He was the one who took me to have my stitches put in, and later removed. While he was in the hospital, he asked me for some addresses and envelopes, since he wanted to make advance tax payments so that his wife wouldn't have to. He also made sure he made a donation to our association knowing full well it would be his last one. He died just five (5) weeks later.

The mentorship and friendship the Colonel gave to me is something I will cherish for the rest of my life. In an era when people have a warped definition of leadership, he was the finest leader that I ever worked for. His philosophy was simple, give your Marines a job, and make sure they have what they need to do the job, then get the hell out of their way and let them accomplish their mission. He was never surprised with at what his Marines produce. On February 11, 2005, Lieutenant Colonel Mark F. Tierney, USMCR (Retired) was buried with full military honors at Arlington National Cemetery.

Colonel John H. "Blackie" Cahill, USMC, (Ret.)

Rest in Peace

Colonel John H. "Blackie" Cahill, USMC, (Ret.), 80, died July 14th, 2005 at Scripps Green Hospital in La Jolla, Ca. He was a resident of the North County for the last 33 years. Born October 22, 1924 in Dorchester, Massachusetts, he graduated from North Quincy High School in 1942 and attended Boston College. In May 1943 he enlisted in the United States Marine Corps, and completed basic training at Parris Island, South Carolina. He was a highly decorated combat veteran of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam.

During World War II he fought in the Pacific Theater, seeing combat in the battles of New Guinea, Cape Gloucester, New Britain, Peleliu and Okinawa. After the end of the war in 1946, he was stationed in China for six months. In 1950, he was deployed with the 1st Marine division to Korea and was with the first Marine unit to fight in that war. He was wounded and evacuated in the battle of Naktong and received his first Purple Heart. He returned to combat with the 3rd battalion, 5th Marines, and was in the historic battle at The Chosin Reservoir. During the Korean conflict he was awarded the Silver Star, our Nations third highest award for heroism. His citation states that this award was given for:" With limited food and ammunition and no possibility for re-supply, Lt. Cahill courageously and successfully directed his platoon's defense against an estimated strength of four hundred. While holding the almost untenable position, Lt. Cahill, continually exposed himself to heavy hostile fire moving from man to man, encouraging and reassuring them until relief arrived. It was largely due to his inspirational leadership and dauntless courage that the enemy failed to break through this vital United Nations position." In Korea, he would also receive a Bronze Star Medal with the combat "V" for valor. In1958, after the Korean War, he attended and graduated from the Naval War College and was promoted to major that same year. In 1965 he was promoted to Lt. Colonel.

In 1968 he was reassigned to the 3rd Marine Division and sent to Vietnam. He saw combat in the battle for Khe Sanh. He was wounded in combat another three times during his tours in Vietnam, and awarded three gold stars in lieu of second, third, and fourth Purple Heart Medals. He commanded 1/9 at the end of the Siege.

He was promoted to Colonel in July 1970, and assumed duties of Commanding Officer, Weapons Training Battalion at Camp Pendleton. He retired after 35 years of active military service with the Marine Corps in 1978.

Gilbert Wall RIP

It is with a very sad heart that I report to you all that Gilbert Wall died on 22 March 2004 of a brain aneurysm. He died in his office while at work at the Black Feet Community College in Browning, Montana. Gilbert was the 81's FO with Bravo 1/26. He served 2 and one half years in Vietnam with the 5TH and 26TH Marines. He was the bravest Warrior I served with, and was a close friend.

CLOTH

The most expensive cloth there ever was, or ever will be.
There are far to few who know the value, or understand the cost.
There are fewer still that have been willing to bare that cost.
Except for a few that came before and a few that came after guys like me.
People seem to choose not to know, or incapable of understanding why.
This piece of cloth will make guys like me actually cry.
These pieces of cloth are all the same shape, all the same color.
It does however come in many different sizes.
Not unlike those who have fought for this cloth, these colors, this flag.

BLOWING IN THE WIND

Peter, Paul and Mary such beautiful
songs they sing, such meaning.

Today at our ward picnic.
Fun we were supposed to have.
Things were going fine till songs we HAD to sing.

Not in a mood to sing or laugh,
I joined the circle on the fringe.

Blowing in the wind,
Once a song I loved.
But its words have such meaning,
today this song made me Flash.

Still now hours later,
the tears want to flow.
The words running through my mind,
time after time.
How many people must die?
When will we say enough is enough?

To a plateau of red clay,
I stood and looked at body bags,
all in a neat row.
Stretchers with my Brothers
dead and dying.

I too want to know when will it end?

BOOK REVIEW:

Foxtrot Ridge: A Battle Remembered. Mark W. Woodruff (2002). Clearwater, FL: Vandamere Press. Reviewed by LT/COL Charles S. Gaede, USMCR (Ret).

"For an obscure and otherwise unremarkable plot of ground, Foxtrot Ridge was the scene of immense courage and carnage from May 1968 through July 1968," writes author Mark Woodruff (p. 189). The most poignant books I have read about the Vietnam War are eyewitness accounts where the author has written his story. Mark W. Woodruff has written Foxtrot Ridge: A Battle Remembered from his perspective--as one of the Marines in Fox Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marines (2/3) who fought the battle.

The "battle of Khe Sanh" may be divided into three segments. The battles in early 1967 in the hills west of Khe Sanh have been called the first battle of Khe Sanh; the isolation and bombardment of Khe Sanh in early 1968 is called the siege of Khe Sanh; and the period from 16 April 1968 to 11 July 1968 would be called the last battle of Khe Sanh. It has been said that the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) began pulling out of the Khe Sanh area in March 1968. That would not have been apparent to the Marines of Fox 2/3 on 28 May 1968, to the Marines of Echo 2/3 on 31 May 1968, or to the Marines of India 3/4 on 1 July 1968, who were all attached by the NVA on Foxtrot Ridge, and to many other Marines who fought intense battles in the area between 16 April and 11 July 1968. A volume in the Marine Corps Vietnam Series, U.S. Marines in Vietnam, The Defining Year, 1968, includes a chapter of the events during this time period, and the battles on Foxtrot Ridge are included among them. However, Woodruff's Battle of Foxtrot Ridge adds substantially more detail to the one battle which gave that obscure plot of ground its name.

Woodruff worries that his book is influenced by his participation in the May 1968 battle. If so, then my review of this book is influenced by my own presence in 2/3 at that time. But I consider that a good thing; no one else can write about an event the same way as the one who experienced it. My company, Hotel Company, arrived on Foxtrot Ridge a few days after the battle was over, when we could smell the odor of decaying flesh in the air.

The foxhole Marine's viewpoint of a battle is different than the viewpoint of any other observer. The great contribution of Foxtrot Ridge is that author Mark Woodruff has interviewed about 27 of the Marines of Fox Company and has reported their recollections of the battle of 28 May 1968. Readers of the book who knew Marines in Fox 2/3, will encounter buddies and read their account of the battle. It will awaken memories.

Woodruff has provided a good drawing that shows the defenses and battle zones on the hill, and he has placed original 1968 photographs that the Marines provided to him throughout the book. He based much of the book's structure on the 2/3 Command Chronology for May 1968, and he includes a complete copy of it in an appendix. Woodruff presents the Marines' story of the battle chronologically in their words. Of course he has made a few editing changes to their words, but he acknowledges that. Here is one story.

Lance Corporal Robert Kincaid: When Mylin yelled that, 'we're overrun,' I stuck my head up. There were two North Vietnamese soldiers standing with their backs at our hole and they were looking downhill, like they did't see our hole or know that we were there. I was shaking to death. I remember and I'm not a bit ashamed to say that I was scared to death. When I looked, those two Vietnamese soldiers standing there had faced Mylin's direction and the corporal that was with me shot one with his M-16, and I shot the other with the shotgun.

It was kind of a simultaneous. I mean we did not plan or conspire to shoot these people. It was just like a conditioned reflex. And I did not really pick one out. I just shot the one that was closest to me. That was the one to my right. I had double-ought buck in that shotgun, he really went down. Then it really intensified heavy small arms fire. It got loud. I could hear voices. I could hear yelling. I could remember RPGs throwing dirt in the hole on top of us. I can remember the dirt going down the back of my T-shirt. And then I can remember it was just Charlie Kholer, and me in the hole. I don't know where the other guy went. pp. 116-117.

Woodruff has included the names and a short biography of each of the Marines he cited in the book in separate appendix. I find this to be an important part of the book, for it brings the reader up-to-date with the men who fought the battle. It also makes this book as much a history of the Marines of Fox 2/3 in May 1968, as it does an account of the battle.

On May 31, 2004, I revisited Foxtrot Ridge. Today Foxtrot Ridge is a short walk from the Khe Sanh Hotel, and a sweaty climb through thick elephant grass and other vegetation. The wood leeches are there too. In 1968, it was a dangerous combat march to it. From it we had a view to the Laotian border, and our observation from Foxtrot Ridge interfered with the Ho Chi Minh trail movement.

But today you cannot see the Laotian border; in fact it is difficult to see a few meters. The vegetation has returned, and from a distance Foxtrot Ridge is just another vegetation covered hill near Khe Sanh.

There are foxholes on the hill, buried beneath the vines, elephant grass, and thick brush. A Vietnamese guide and the local villager, who I hired to cut a trail to the top of the hill with his machete, had never heard of the battle of Foxtrot Ridge, and they were fascinated with the story. It was an education unremarkable plot of ground, Foxtrot Ridge was the scene of immense courage and carnage from May 1968 through July 1968," writes author Mark Woodruff (p. 189). Today the "plot of ground" is equally if not more "obscure and unremarkable." The greatest contribution of the Foxtrot Ridge is to memorialize in history the courage and bravery of the Marines of Fox 2/3 who fought, were wounded, died, and survived the battle on 28 May 1968. Mark Woodruff has told his story and theirs well. You will be glad you read it.

Pen and paper I take in hand. My head to pull from the sand. On television I see things that stir memories. Fog and rain I see, that stirs Khe Sanh up in me.

Blood and Death on the streets, that brings Tet back to me. Children White, Black, and Brown, the hand of Death on their Brow. That stirs- Children, hiding, underground. Uniforms, Fatigues, and Guns on TV That brings back war to me.

Comedy on TV I see, brings no laughter for me. Football, Baseball, sports I love, excitement, joy, anger or pain. No none- none of the above.

No Joys in my life you might say, I have some in a small way. In Jennifer's eyes a glint I see, this touches something in me.
Nieces and nephews anticipation, small children glowing. These bring out the best in me.

AS dusk turns to black, terrible memories come back.
When times I get the stare, I wish somebody would pop a flare.
So that my eyes and brain could see, that there is still beauty around me.

Because of the tears I wipe from my eyes.
I know somehow I will survive!!!

SHORT ROUNDS

Welcome Stop for Warriors Somebody finally got it right

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer Bangor, Maine

Locals of Bangor, Maine are on a mission to greet every military plane, at any time, in any weather. Their tally so far: 200,000 troops. Tired and bleary-eyed, Marines of the 1st Battalion, 7th Regiment, based at Twenty Nine Palms, Calif., were finally back on U.S. soil after seven months on the front lines in Iraq. But, they were still many miles and hours from their families and the homecoming they longed for. Their officers told them they would be on the ground for 60 to 90 minutes while their chartered plane was refueled. They disembarked and began walking through the airport terminal corridor to a small waiting room.

That's when they heard the applause. Lining the hall and clapping were dozens of Bangor residents who have set a daunting task for themselves: They want every marine, soldier, sailor and airman returning through the tiny international airport here to get a hero's welcome. Even if the planes arrive in the middle of the night or a blizzard, they are there.

Composed mostly of those who served in World War II and Korea, they call themselves the "Maine Troop Greeters". They have met every flight bringing troops home from Iraq for nearly two years, more than 1,000 flights and nearly 200,000 troops. "Here they come. Everybody get ready," said Joyce Goodwin, 71, her voice full of excitement, undiminished by the hundreds of times she has shown up to embrace the returning troops. As dozens more Marines came down the corridor, the applause grew louder and was accompanied by handshakes, hugs, and a stream of well wishes: "Welcome home." "Thank you for your service." "God bless you." "Thank you for everything." Faces brightened. Grouchiness disappeared. Greeters and Marines alike began taking photographs. The Marines were directed down a corridor decorated with American flags and red, white and blue posters. Cell phones for free calls to family members are provided. They found a table with cookies and candies. Plates of homemade fudge circulated. "Welcome home, gunny," said Al Dall, 74, who served in the Marines during the Korean War, as he thrust his hand at a startled Gunnery Sgt. Edward Parsons, 31, of Shelby, N.C. "This is incredible," Parsons said. "Now I know I'm really back in the world."

The greeters line the corridor both as the troops arrive and later, as they return to their planes to continue their journeys to Fort Hood, Camp Pendleton and other Army and Marine Corps bases. The airport gift store opens early. T-shirts saying "I Love Maine" are popular, so are adult magazines. The store takes military script from troops low on cash, even though there is no way for the store to get reimbursed. The airport bar does a brisk business, selling Budweiser at $3 a bottle. Some flights have rules against drinking. The commanding officer of this battalion had no such restriction, and the bar was full of Marines laughing, singing, and joking. "We appreciate everything you've done for us," said Bud Tower, an Air Force veteran, who, at 58, considers himself "a kid" among the other greeters.

Kay Lebowitz, 89, has such severe arthritis that she cannot shake hands. So she hugs every Marine and soldier that she can. Some of the larger, more exuberant troops lift her off the ground. "Many of them tell me they can't wait to see their grandmother," she said. "That's what I am, a substitute grandmother." The greeters also turn out for flights headed to Iraq, but those are somber occasions. The Marines on this flight were returning from a lawless stretch of desert along the Syrian border, where they dodged roadside bombs and sniper fire on a daily basis. "When the flights are going over, it's heart-breaking," Lebowitz said. "But when they're coming home, it's heart-warming." The core of the "Maine Troop Greeters" is a dedicated group of about 30 residents who have a highly developed "telephone tree" to get the word out about impending arrivals. Their numbers swell on weekends when particular brigades are due back, such as local National Guard units. Families with young children join in. Most of the greeters support the U.S. mission in Iraq, but their goal is historic, not political. Discussion of politics is banned. The greeters don't want America to repeat what they consider a shameful episode in history: the indifference, even hostility that the public displayed to troops returning from Vietnam. I think there's a lot of collective guilt about the '60s," said greeter Dusty Fisher, 63, a retired high school history teacher now serving in the state Legislature.

The airport in this city of 31,000 has a long runway and is a refueling stop for many overseas troop flights. The terminal is a tidy, homey, two-story structure with skylights and floor-to-ceiling windows that let in copious light. Above the waiting room, a banner reads, "Maine. The Way Life Should Be." Once the troops find seats, the greeters fan out. Phillip Eckert, 70, a bantam-sized ex-Marine with an outsized personality, likes to talk about the "old Corps" and tell stories of tough-as-nails sergeants and crazy-brave officers he knew from Korea. He wears a red sweatshirt that says: "Not as Lean, Not as Mean, But Still a Marine." Eckert leads Marines in raspy versions of the Marine hymn. He does his drill-instructor imitation: "move it, Move It, MOVE IT," he said in a mock-urgent voice. "I whoop and holler at the troops, and they seem to like it, I guess," he said. Jerry Mundy, 69, also a former Marine, likes to dispense mildly salty jokes. "My lady friend just bought us one of those king-size beds," he said. "Trouble is that at my age, after I finally find her, I forget what for."

Others try a quieter approach. Dall makes himself available if the troops want to talk about the traumas of combat. I've been there, so I know what they've gone through," he said. "I say, Forget me, this is your time. I'm here if you need me." Like the Marines, the greeters have had casualties. Four have died since the group started meeting the planes in May 2003. Marjorie Dean suffered a fatal heart seizure while she and her husband, Bill, were on their way to meet a late-night flight a year ago. She was 79. Goodwin missed three days of flights when she was in the hospital for heart surgery. "I felt like I was in withdrawal," he said. "It was awful not being able to be here for the boys." Bill Knight, 83, one of the group's organizers, came to the airport just hours after his doctor told him that he has advanced prostate cancer. "It never occurred to me not to come," said Knight, who served in the Army and Navy for three decades. Francis Zelz, 81, who served in the Navy during World War II, said it is a point of pride to respond even with only a few minutes notice. Many of the greeters were part of a similar welcome-home effort during the Persian Gulf War. "You get a call at 3 a.m. about a flight in 30 minutes, and you think about staying in bed," Zelz said. "Then you realize, no, I can't do that. That wouldn't be right." On one window of the greeters' office at the end of the corridor are hundreds of photographs of Marines and soldiers killed in Iraq taken from newspaper stories.

Inevitably, troops drift toward the window and search for their buddies. Sometimes they scribble small notes of remembrance next to the photos. The 1st Battalion, 7th Regiment suffered 15 dead and 86 wounded. The Marines were left alone to search for their buddies' photos. "There's Wilt," said a Marine pointing to one of Lance Cpl. Nicholas Wilt, 23, of Tampa, Fla. "There's Rowe," said another, a reference to Capt. Alan Rowe, 35, of Hagerman, Idaho. After several long and silent minutes, Staff Sgt. Larry Long, 31, of Clovis, N.M., finally found the photo he was searching for: Pfc. Ryan Cox, 19, of Derby, Kan. "He was a good Marine, a hard-charger," Long said with a catch in his voice. "He would have been a good squad leader." Navy chaplain Lt. Cmdr. Robert White, returning home with the Marine unit to which he was assigned, said the Bangor welcome may prove therapeutic. They need to feel good about themselves and what they've been through," White said. Marine Lt. David Tumanjan, 24, of Boise, Idaho, said the Bangor greeting is both humbling and gratifying. "It shows us that what we did wasn't in vain," he said. The greeters say their payoff is seeing the surprise and smiles on the faces of the troops. "Every flight coming home makes it like Christmas Eve," Tower said.

Don Guptill, 71, who served in the Army in Korea, listened as an enlisted Marine, his eyes fixed on the carpet, talked quietly about being wounded three times. As the call came over the loudspeaker to return to the plane, the young Marine reluctantly pulled something from his back pocket. It was his Purple Heart. He said he was embarrassed to wear it," Guptill said. "I told him: You wear it. You earned it. You wear it for all the guys who didn't make it home. The Marines were barely gone when the Maine Troop Greeters began preparing for the next flight. "It's going to be a busy day for us," said Bill Dean, 70, an Army veteran. "That feels good."

A Visit with OCS/TBS Classmate Gary Morris

By Dave Rogers

Gary Morris is a retired Marine Lieutenant Colonel who lives in Irving, TX, which is not far from my home in Arlington. Until January 17, 2005 we had never met even though we both graduated from the 38th Officer Candidate School class in December 1965, then The Basic School class (3-66). In May 1966 Gary located me via the OCS/TBS web-site at MyFamily.com. He contacted me and suggested that we have lunch together in Irving.

We decided to meet on Monday (Martin Luther King Day) at the Red Lobster on Airport Freeway. After entering the door I immediately spotted Gary wearing a red cap with USMC written across the front with a matching red shirt displaying "38th OCS/TBS 3-66." Gary had attended a reunion of classmates at Washington/Quantico in July 2004 where all attendees received the cap and shirt. We immediately began talking about our training at OCS and TBS along with our wartime experiences in South Vietnam. I learned from Gary very quickly that he has three passions in life, his grandchildren, USMC, and baseball. He also described himself as being an amateur, self-taught artist. He discussed some of his art projects that he had worked on.

After lunch we drove to Gary's home. As soon as we entered through the backdoor from the garage, I noticed his art work hanging on every wall along with various photos. Gary had a story for each photo and painting as we made our way along each wall. There were paintings and drawings of eagles, cowboys, Indians, and musical instruments. One of the photos was of his OCS class. Another showed him alongside squadron members he had served with. We came upon a plaque with the inscription: "Gary Morris Hall of Fame," along with a brief history about his accomplishments as a baseball player at the University of Dallas in Irving. I shook his hand since the only other Hall of Famer I ever had the opportunity to shake hands with was Roger Staubach of the Dallas Cowboys. Being in a hall of fame anywhere is a major accomplishment and certainly identifies that person as a standout player.

Gary had other outstanding qualities besides athletics. He had been recognized by his hometown as Ambassador of the Year and, was the recipient of a Community Service Award. He also received a spirit award from his Alma Mater and special recognition for his support of the armed forces, in particular being recognized for his leadership role in a POW/MIA Recognition Day Ceremony.

Gary showed me his work station for painting and drawing. Before leaving his residence, he gave me four prints of cowboys, one of an Indian, and, one oil painting of an eye-witness scene at Khe Sanh at night during Tet in 1968. It was a scene he had remembered before becoming an artist. Having been at Khe Sanh, I told him that the painting reminded me of the surrounding hills during the Hill Fights of 1967, and specifically the counter-attack by North Vietnamese against Hill 881 North. That painting really invoked war-time memories. The painting and prints have been added to the My Family web-site for viewing. Use Art_by_Gary for the login ID, and password. Comments about the artist concerning his background and art work can be found at this site's homepage. (See Pages 73-75 for an example of Gary's artwork).

Gary's latest endeavor has been to assist a Marine Corporal in putting on a photographic exhibit of his combat photos taken during the war in Iraq. Approximately 500 people from the local FBI office in Dallas will be able to view the show around Memorial Day. One of the photos shows a Lieutenant with a Gunnery Sergeant discussing strategy while studying a map. Said Gary: "The Corporal taking the picture talked a lot about the Lieutenant. To make a long story short, I want to do a work of them hopefully for the basic school from our class in memory of our guys lost." Our OCS class lost 33 of its class members during the Vietnam War. That indeed will be a noble tribute. It was a pleasure to meet and talk to a former OCS/TBS classmate who retired a Lieutenant Colonel. Gary has achieved many other goals in life and received special recognition, for serving his country and others in his community. He is still actively involved with painting and drawing. It provides him much pleasure.

Gary Morris was the first baseman of the University of Dallas baseball team from 1961 through 1964, playing on the most winning team in UD history. His 1964 school team was the first to qualify for postseason play. In 1964 he led the NAIA in stolen bases. He holds school records for most runs batted in for a game, and stolen bases in a season. He also holds the record for most at bats, runs and triples. The inscriptions on several plaques presented to Gary are shown below.

Ambassador of the Year Lifetime Member

Presented to Gary Morris by Irving Chamber of Commerce for an outstanding year of service, April 13, 1985 "The Ulys Knight Spirit Award is given to an alumnus, alumna, or group of individuals affiliated with UNT, who have shown spirit and enthusiasm as they contribute time and energy to a program or activity that has benefited the university family. REPORT FOR INDUCTION PARRIS ISLAND
By Our Roving Ambassadors,
Ron Shouse & Cliff Treese

Get on those yellow footprints, eyes straight ahead, chin in, chest out, shoulders back, stomach in, thumbs along the trouser seams and feet at a 45

Ron Shouse on Yellow Footprints

degree angle. Cut off the Bull S###, you belong to me now maggots. Sound familiar? Treese and I heard something similar to this the first week in April. Things have not changed much at our once home away from home, Parris Island. Recruit Receiving now has a modern brick building, not some old broken down, white clapboard 2 story dinosaur from WWII. The DFNG's now spend a couple of weeks in the Receiving Barracks, learning basic military courtesies, how to make a bunk, and things of this nature. The Drill Instructors still go out of their way to make sure the new recruits are physically fit by allowing them to do lots of push-ups, bends, and exercise the proper use of the sand pit.

Cliff Treese and Ron Shouse, along with Cliff's wife Linda and daughter Brandi, reported aboard MCRD Parris Island and were treated like Royalty. We checked in at the Bachelor Officer's Quarters (Osprey II) and then went over to the PX, and the Parris Island Museum. Gunnery Sergeant Charles Taliano sent a couple of items for our silent auction in July. You may not know him by name but you know the man. He is the Marine Drill Instructor yelling at the recruit with the caption "We didn't promise you a rose garden". After we settled in, we stopped in to see Colonel John Valentin, Chief of Staff at Parris Island. We first met Colonel Valentin on a previous visit to P.I. when we got lost while Searching for a female D.I. Ron had his picture taken with him when the reunion was held at Charleston. He was sitting on the front steps of a very large house, tying his shoe. We yelled to him for directions and he came over to our vehicle. He was very kind, noticed our hats, and asked if we were at Khe Sanh. He told us he talks to the recruits about Khe Sanh and has the greatest respect for all Khe Sanh vets. We presented him with a Khe Sanh coin and he ran into his house and brought out 2 beers labeled Valentin's Red Patch Lager, with a picture of Chesty Puller on it. Being mere enlisted Marines, we did not realize who we were talking to.

Nice of them to remember

Hand to Hand Training

Cliff asked him his rank and he laughed and said he was a Bird Colonel. We felt about an inch tall. We have kept in touch with him and he was kind enough to invite us back. On a subsequent visit to P.I., we spoke to colonel Valentin about doing a story for the Red Clay about recruit training today and how it compares to training in the 60's. Colonel Valentin was receptive and offered any assistance he could provide. He turned us over to Major White in Public Affairs. Major White introduced us to Master Sgt. Art Prioletta, Public Affairs Chief. Over the next few months Cliff coordinated this visit with M/SGT Prioletta. He arranged for a staff van to take us on a VIP tour of the training at P.I.

Our first stop was the hand to hand course. Remember when you would walk up behind your opponent for the "naked strangle?" It is now called "Counter the Strike". It still gets the job done, but it just sounds better. We went to the pool to observe drown proofing. Each group of 10 recruits was supervised by several instructors. Also visiting the pool were a large group of teachers from throughout the U.S.

This was too much for Cliff, he fell out and was taken to the hospital by his wife, treated and released for what was thought to be dehydration. Shouse and Cliff's daughter Brandi continued with the tour.

Remember the Khe Sanh history marker at the rifle range? This sort of gives the appearance of it just being a rifle range. This is not the case. There is a pistol range, small arms range and the rifle range which is actually "pop-up" targets laid out at different distances. They do not qualify here, but they do keep score. I guess you would call it a type of Familiarization or "Fam Fire" course. You shoot from bunkers, from windows, and piles of rocks that let the young guys get a feel of what it is like to shoot from different positions. The recruits spend 2 weeks at the Range, just like we did with a few minor changes. They shoot the M16-A2. This weapon is nice. It is unlike those Matty Mattel pieces of junk we had. These are accurate to 500 yards. They get "Hot Meals" for breakfast and dinner for the 2 weeks, and have a box lunch for the mid day meal. If they qualify with the rifle, they graduate. If they do not, they get put back and do it again.

Non Qualifiers, Dragging Range Tower

The Range Tower is still the same. The ones that do not qualify are still dragging it, but I think it rolls better now. The Women Marines qualify too, but are not dropped back as the men because there are not as many women recruits. If the recruit is still having trouble learning to shoot, they have an indoor course. It is called ISMT or Indoor Simulated Marksmanship Training. This is the biggest facility of it's kind anywhere. It is computerized and will show the point of impact and will tell the instructor why the recruit cannot hit the target without wasting a lot of ammo. Law enforcement from all over has used this facility. We both were given the opportunity to use the range for an hour and half. During the instructions for shooting on the ISMT 45 range, Treese got sick again. Ron fired the 45, and the rifle. Treese's wife drove him back to the hospital where he was admitted. We all thought he was just trying to keep from showing up Ron, but he was really sick.

We had gone to lunch at H&S Company prior to going to the ISMT range. You have your choice of a salad line, a sandwich line, or meat and 2 vegetables. Not bad chow for $3.50. And a far cry from food we ate as recruits. Civilians do all the cooking. There is no mess duty for the recruits anymore. Ron asked if they had any of those delicious powered eggs we ate as recruits but they couldn't find any. Ron was very disappointed. At first we thought Cliff got sick because of the food, but later found out how seriously ill he was. He had kidney failure.

Cliff was AWOL so Ron, Brandi and Linda went to the Crucible Brief. It is similar to our "Elliot's Beach". There are more combat fundamentals and the recruit performs his task with little sleep, and only a couple of C-Rats. They are called MRE's now. The Crucible used to be a requirement to graduate, but this has been changed. We talked some Drill Instructors who had their Crucible cancelled due to bad weather. This just did not sit too well with me because I remember some of the weather we had, and felt that it would have been valuable training for the new Marines.

Right across from the Crucible Briefing Point is the "Gas Chamber". I am sure everyone has tears come to their eyes just thinking about it. Not to mention a runny nose, heaving, and all those bumps on your head from running into trees. I do not know where they got their information but they told us this is supposed to be the worst gas chamber anywhere. If it is worse than the one I went to at Camp Geiger, this should be cruel and unusual punishment.

The Slide for Life has a net at the base of the tower but there are still guys that fall in the water. If they fall in the water, they must put their hands on their head and sing the Marine Corps Hymn as they walk out of the water. The rappelling tower has a big pad at the bottom instead of a sawdust pit. The training is still about the same, so I guess if it isn't broke you don't fix it.

Chow Time

We attended the "Pinning On Ceremony" of the EGA for Bravo Company Recruits that were going to graduate the next day. It was great to see these young men doing what we did some 40 years ago. There is an indoor facility at the end of the Parade Deck that is used for this program if there is inclement weather.

Treese was in Beaufort Naval Hospital, but was determined to attend the Morning Colors and Graduation on Friday. He negotiated with his doctor and was given a pass for the ceremonies. Evidently they didn't trust this Marine to return to the hospital so they sent him to P.I. in the hospital commander's staff vehicle. The driver was told that he had better catch Treese if he fell. Fortunately, he was able to attend both, and was returned to the hospital without further incident. He spent three more days in the hospital before being discharged and returned home to sunny Florida.

We all assembled at Base Headquarters for Morning Colors. There were a lot of parents in attendance. Some of the mothers wore shorts and the bugs were delighted they did. Bug repellent stock hit an all time high that morning. Ron offered to help keep the bugs out of the ladies shorts but was told that would not be necessary. Cliff and Ron were seated in the VIP section and did not kill any bugs which attempted to devour us. We wanted to show the new Marines that we were "OLD CORPS TOUGH". We presented the Commanding General, the Chief of Staff, and the Base Sergeant Major, with Khe Sanh coins, a ball point pen, a copy of the "Final Formation", and had photos taken. We then proceeded on to the Graduation. Sitting right behind us in the grandstand was a Marine recently returned from Iraq and was wounded there. He had sustained an injury to his hand and lost part of his leg. He was there to see his brother graduate from P.I. They both had the same drill instructor at P.I. His DI was overcome with emotion at the sight of the young Lance Corporal and the reason for his attendance.

This will make you proud, and at the same time will make you sad. I swear that I could see all of us right there on the Grinder in our younger days. Everything was perfect and when the Band played the Marine Hymn there wasn't a dry eye in the place. The whole thing took less than an hour. Afterwards I walked out onto the hallowed ground and could not help but think of how many Marines had marched by that reviewing stand, and that I was one of them. God Bless 'em all, Semper Fidelis, Frateas Aeternius.

We would like to thank General Richard Tryon, Colonel John Valentin, Sgt/ Major Robert Hollings, Major White, LT Miller, and M/Sgt Art Prioletta, for their assistance with this tour. They went above and beyond the call of duty, insuring we were provided all the information we needed. Without their help, we could not have completed this story.

TANKS AT KHE SANH
By Craig W. Tourte

Before I volunteered for the Marine Corps I drove a large tractor on the fields of my uncle's farm. I loved driving those beasts and always thought it would be a pretty neat job to be a tanker in the Marine Corps. I always thought that driving a tank must be somewhat like driving that old tractor. During boot camp we were asked what MOS we were interested in. I, of course marked the boxes for tanks, or armor, I am not exactly sure what it said but that is what I was interested in. Of course the Marine Corps had other needs, and my being a tanker was not to be.

When I arrived at Khe Sanh on the convoy from Dong Ha, we turned north from highway 9 and drove towards the front gate of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. There was a stretch of dirt road from the highway (a narrow dirt road) to the front gate of around two hundred yards. As we entered the main gate, we then turned east and drove about a few hundred yards before we stopped. There was not much in the way of defensive positions, a few fighting holes and concertina wire, and that was about it. I don't recall when I first spotted that big M48 tank at Khe Sanh. I think I must have seen it being driven around the base. I was in awe of its size. The engine was a big diesel, which belched thick black smoke. It just looked powerful and aggressive and I envied those who were aboard.

I watched as it moved around the small base, much like a teenager watches that shiny new car he wants but knows he can't afford. At some point during the next several months, that tank parked near the main gate facing south with it's 90mm cannon pointing level out towards the direction of highway 9. I was convinced that nothing would come down that road that the tank could not destroy.

I pulled guard duty at the main gate a number of times. Every time it seemed as though I were alone. I don't recall ever seeing anyone else except that big tank standing guard right behind me. I don't recall ever seeing the crew around. It was like that tank was watching over me and I felt comforted by its presence. A huge 1 million candle-power Xenon searchlight was mounted above the main cannon. I remember thinking that it was the oddest thing having a big searchlight on that tank. It got dark at Khe Sanh and I mean really dark and black. I knew that if it became necessary for that tank to turn the light on, it would draw all of the fire towards it that the enemy would have been able to muster.

That M48 weighted in at 52 tons, and had a 1790 cu inch 690 horsepower diesel motor, with a CD-850 Alison Transmission. The engine and transmission alone weighed over 6 tons. I don't recall seeing that or any, of the other tanks at Khe Sanh fire their cannon but it must have been an awesome sight when they did.

It was one of those really dark and foggy nights at Khe Sanh when the Lang Vei Special Forces Base was over run by NVA tanks. I could hear the sound of the V6 240 horsepower diesel engines coming from the PT76 Amphibious tanks, kind of a muffled sound off in the distance. At the time I was not aware of what the sound was. I knew it was some sort of motor noise but I was not able to identify it. I certainly did not think it was tanks. I'm not sure if any others on the base could hear the motors, but I could, as I stared off in the direction of Lang Vei.

During the Siege I lost track of the tanks and also my interest in them. I was too busy just surviving my own ordeal. As I think back to the Siege and all that we went through, it would have been interesting to have been a tanker at Khe Sanh, especially with all that shrapnel flying around everywhere. The tankers must have felt relatively safe inside those hulking monsters. I imagine when shrapnel hit the side of the tanks it made quite a noise. I never did get the opportunity to ride in a tank. Even today when I see a one, I wonder what it would have been like to have been inside during the Siege, instead of laying on the hard cold ground, enduring the cold, wet, mud, bugs and snakes. I am sure of one thing though, the rats couldn't jump that high.

THE DAY MR. CHARLES THOUGHT KEN PAE WAS IN CHARGE

By Charlie Fox

One on the rules of combat written by "Murphy" states: "try to look inconspicuous." I don't remember the exact date, but one of our members broke that rule and paid the price.

Charlie Company, 1/26 was on the Blue Line with the second squad of the 3rd platoon being just to the right of the water point road. At the time, we were a rather "fat" squad. We actually had a sergeant for a squad leader, and corporals for fire team leaders. I was a lance corporal and M-79 man.

We were, at that point in the siege, where we were restricted to two C ration meals a day, and one canteen of water. We were lean, extremely grubby looking, and very smelly. When you think you smell bad, you do. I've heard stories about showers, electricity, steaks and all the other stuff we dreamed about, but our little group acquired things like candle wax for making our own candles by scrounging it from blown up hootches and bunkers, extra chow by stealing it from the LZ's, and gear from where ever we could "find" it. We got a pallet of stretchers that went out of control on a LAPES drop that provided bunks that we hung from the runway matting bunker roof with comm wire. It helped keep the rats away.

A large pipe, coming from the water point ran directly behind our bunker, across the trench and up the hill where there was a large valve. The pipe then continued towards the runway. After seeing that pipe for many days and cracking my head on it many nights while moving down the trench, it finally came to me that maybe, just maybe, there might be water in it. I knew Mr. Charles was smart enough to poison the water, but that wouldn't matter if we just used it to wash, shave and get our clothes clean. I discussed it with my team leader, Bob Stuart, and it made sense to him, but before we moved on our plan, PFC Ken Pae and another individual entered the picture. Pae got a five-gallon water can, left our little group, and went to the valve on the hill, and hope to get water. Stuart and I were bent over trying to turn the wheel on the valve. It wouldn't open. Good old Ken Pae shouted encouragement. The area to the right of the water point road outside the wire was the home of an NVA sniper who didn't hit many things he shot at. But he was persistent. I know, in this sniper's mind, he was watching the man in charge shouting orders to his underlings, when in reality a corporal and lance corporal were busting their combined butts while two PFC's were screwing off.

In the midst of our struggle with the valve wheel and a lot of cursing and grunting, I heard a very loud "WHANG" and looked to see where the strange noise had come from. Pae was standing there with that deer in the headlights look, still holding the water can. A quick glance at the water can revealed a bullet hole and as Pae raised the can, a bullet hole in his leg. Pae was nice enough to confirm all this by announcing in true Marine style, "I'm $%$^& shot!!" Our training kicked in. In true Three Stooges style, we promptly ran into each other, backed up a step and ran into each other again. I think everyone changed their angle of departure on the next attempt, because we missed each other on the next try and headed for our imagined place of safety. There were no more shots, possibly due to the sniper's laughing so hard at our attempt to flee. Pae and company made it to the trench, while Stuart and I went the other way over the hill.

After doing the usual, "Damn, that was close," and joking away our fear, Stuart and I found a small gully and headed back towards the trench line and started our low crawl back while getting shot at three more times. Our final obstacle was the mound of dirt from the trench. I was convinced we were going to get shot going over it, but my corporal was convinced that we had to get into the trench. So, we devised our plan. "We'll go on three." As I rose up on that magic "three", the ground exploded in my face and I fell back convinced I was dead while Stuart made it into the trench. After a very slow self-examination I convinced myself I wasn't dead, or even hit and decided I was going to remain that way even though everyone thought I had to get in that trench. I did make it into the trench, about ten minutes after it got dark that evening.

Murphy's Law was violated and the violator was punished. When we get to Mobile, Al next year, be kind to Ken Pae when he wants to tell you how I got him shot. Be gentle. Remind him of Murphy's Law and the fact that the enemy, many times, is not up on what our chain of command really is.

WHERE ARE THEY NOW?

By Craig W. Tourte

I have read a lot about Vietnam and Khe Sanh the last few years. I attended the Khe Sanh Reunion in 03 and had a great time. I didn't see anyone I served with at Khe Sanh, except my friend Tom Horchler who I met at Khe Sanh and had a few conversations with while there. I rode shotgun on Tom's truck on the way out of Khe Sanh after the Siege. But, other than Tom, I didn't see any of the few I served with. I did a little research and found most of their names on the Khe Sanh Roster. I didn't remember their names until I researched the roster and it was interesting to recall and remember their young faces and little things about them. Some were funny, some were serious, all wanted to survive and they were from all over the country.

I wrote a little piece on the Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page Web Site requesting that any who saw the article contact me. Their names are not listed as members of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association and I have not seen their names on the KIA list, so I would assume that many survived and returned home. I have found the addresses of a few and written them letters. I expected an immediate response but was disappointed that none attempted to contact me. Tom has had the same experience, some who he has been able to contact have welcomed him and others have requested that he not attempt to contact them any more.

I was watching the Fox Channel and the special on Khe Sanh. It was really interesting and amazing that so many of us survived. A friend asked me if it was really as bad as was portrayed, I thought a minute and told him that often television documentaries seem to make situations seem much worse than they really were, but in this case, reality was much worse than any program or old grainy film could possibly show. I wonder now, in my later years, what has happened to those brave Marines I served with during the Siege at Khe Sanh, to those who stood with me so long ago. I would want to know, just to say hello, and even perhaps goodbye.

I understand that we each must face our own demons, and sometimes there is just not enough room for certain memories. Perhaps it is a good thing some have moved on, and not looked back. I think some do not want to look back at their experience at Khe Sanh, and there are those who would like to reach out, but cannot. Maybe they are the lucky ones.

WHERE DID EVERYONE GO?

By Craig W. Tourte

I have heard and read all of the stories, as I am sure you have. How there were so many of us at the Khe Sanh Combat Base during the Siege, that they just could not put any more boots on the ground in that very small space. How we were stepping all over each other. They could just supply so many people with so much food, ammo, and we had reached our limit. I guess that was true. I have read there were from five to six thousand of us. Seems like a huge number for a place measuring about one half mile by about a mile. They made it sound like we were standing shoulder to shoulder in the trench line with no room to spare. I guess the numbers were correct, but my question is, where in the heck were you?

When that big old rocket screamed in on me, I laid down in a communication trench dug just a few inches below the ground, as it smashed into the ground just inches from me, I was alone. When the 152's went off and were roaring my way, I dived into a bunker on the line and I was all alone as the ground shook from the impact beside me. You must have left. As I got up from my fighting bunker which was just one sheet of runway matting I placed over the trench line, and put a couple of layers of sandbags on top, that rocket entered right where I had been standing just seconds before. I was alone again, where did you go? When I stood guard all night long at the main gate and that snake crawled over my feet and the rats onto my lap, you were not around. I could not see you on either side of me. I was alone as usual, what happened to you? As I looked out into the foggy night, looking for movement and the shadows I knew were the enemy, only I could see them, you were not to be seen. As I ran to Charlie Med to repair the shrapnel wound to the back of my neck, I ran alone and you were not beside me.

When I prayed to God every morning to let me live another day, you did not pray with me. When I thanked God at night for letting me live another day, you were not there to thank him with me. Sometimes at Khe Sanh I just felt so alone. Where were you? Were you standing right beside me? If you hadn't been there with me, I wouldn't be here today. Thanks for sticking around.

MEMOIRS

BUNKERS

By Craig W. Tourte

I was thinking about the word bunker and how it just sounded so solid and safe. When I was down in the bunker. It makes me think of those old films of the trenches from WW1 in France; where the trench was filled up with the soldiers, but the bunker (must have been filled with the officers) were timber covered and safe from incoming artillery. I remember seeing a film of the old generals and officers hunched over some type of map table smoking cigarettes and looking very stern while dust came through the roof. The bunker shook from the incoming rounds, but the bunker held up.

As we made the turn north from Highway 9 into Khe Sanh Combat Base, sometime in August 1967, I noticed there was not much to see. We stopped about 100 meters east of the main gate and dismounted. This base and this spot were going to be my home (H.Q. 1/13) for the next 8 months. Nine months of basic training, ITR, MOS, Staging, a few months in Okinawa, did little to prepare me for what lay ahead.

I think we expected to receive incoming small arms fire and perhaps some mortar rounds and a rocket or two. But, we certainly were not prepared; nor did we fully prepare, for what was to hit us some 5 months later. We dug defensive trenches, filled sandbags with our entrenching tools, put out wire, ran the usual all night LP's, and built a bunker to sleep in. Our bunker looked like all the others being built around that time of year. First we put up those big, canvas, green tents. There were a lot of tents then, pitched everywhere. When it rained we'd take off our clothes and stand next to the edge as the cold water came down in streams. I look at pictures now from those days past, everything looks so green (tents) and red (from the clay dirt) with lots of new green sandbags piled around.

Our sleeping bunker was like all the others that we saw around us. It started with the tent, then 55gallon drums filled with dirt, that were placed around three sides with only the doorway left unprotected. We also filled empty wooden 105mm boxes with dirt and put those on top of the drums. We then loaded more sandbags on top of the boxes. It must have been 6 feet in height when we finished. We found some old runaway matting and placed it over the top and put more sandbags on top of the matting.

We did a good job. It looked pretty good, kind of battle ready. We felt that we would be safe, since we had built a "bunker." I even attached a small California flag to some type of pole I found, and put it on the roof of our bunker. I was proud of the way it flapped in the breeze. I expected some old sergeant, or brass to come along and tell me to take it down, but it stayed in place.

We did our assigned jobs for the next 5 months, occasionally adding new sandbags to our bunker and even a few new wooden 105mm boxes. We placed a couple of pallets on the floor (deck) so we would not always be stepping in the mud. Every day was pretty much the same. We worked on the trench across the road from our bunker, and filled sandbags. I was awed by this interesting place that I knew so little about. Occasionally we'd go beyond the wire a few hundreds yards to look around, and perhaps bring back some timber or anything else we thought was interesting or useful. It was always an exciting adventure for us non grunts, no radio or way to communicate if we ran into trouble, but we did not expect any.

I liked being outside the wire. It made me feel like a real Marine. I knew in my heart I was meant to be a grunt. I hated my MOS, I loved ITR and Staging Battalion, but I was only in for a couple of years and I guess that's where they needed the manpower.

It seems like I was awake all night January 20, 1968. I had guard duty and around 0400 or 0500 the morning of January 21, I was walking around inside our area when I heard something scream right over the top of me. At first I thought it was another one of the F-4's that would fly over the airfield at about 100 feet off of the ground, but when it hit, I knew exactly what it was. The ammo dump blew up after the first round came in. I must have yelled incoming, but the blast woke everyone up anyway and no one had a doubt that we were under attack.

Without orders or any yelling, everyone ran out of our bunker and headed across the street into the trench line. We stood in the trench line and watched the slow destruction of Khe Sanh. We then realized how pitiful our little sleeping bunker really was. As the big rounds from Co Roc fell around us and the rockets screamed in, we realized that nothing that we could have built, and everything that had been built, was useless against such a powerful force that we were experiencing and witnessing.

During the Siege of Khe Sanh, every standing structure that I saw was destroyed, including our bunker. Two rounds from Co Roc landed just a few feet from where I was laying in the trench. The ground shook and lifted me into the air and slammed me back down again. The air was full of dust and dirt everywhere. When the ground settled, I looked out from the trench and saw that on the outer lip of the depression the round had made just a few inches from me. I got out of the trench and stood next to the huge hole that had been blown into the ground. There was still smoke coming out of the middle.

One of the guys I had spoken with the day before was killed by a rocket a few yards away. He had been a Drill Instructor in San Diego and had just arrived at Khe Sanh hours earlier. It was the first time I had a normal human conversation with a Drill Instructor. He seemed like a really decent guy, not a jerk, like so many others DI's Our bunker that took so long to build was useless. We took the sandbags that had not been blown apart and used them to strengthen the trench line. But, we knew there was really nothing that we could do to make our position safer.

We did our jobs and stayed in the trench line during the night. Someone had to carry the dead and injured, hump the ammo, carry the water, go out to the airfield and take the cargo off of the pallets and put them into the trucks to deliver to the guns and other units. Someone had to fill and pile new, fresh, undamaged sandbags onto the bunkers of the officers. Donald Saunders was killed doing this job. He had taken my spot. Someone had to go to the guns at night and hump the ammo when they fired the H & Is, and return fire during the days. Someone had to go beyond the wire and sit out all night long and listen, observe and wait for the enemy. That "someone" was us, it was our job.

I don't know how we could have trained or prepared for our experience. I never heard of any courses given by the Marine Corps on how to build defensive bunkers that would enable one to survive heavy artillery. Apparently the NVA learned and they learned well. It was their home and they had the time and the ability. They knew what trees to cut, how to place the timbers, shore up the joints and protect and reinforce the ceiling.

When I look back on my old photographs taken at Khe Sanh, I notice striking differences. Those photo's taken before the Siege are filled with the color green, green uniforms worn by young men with fresh faces, green tents, green vehicles, green sandbags and standing wooden buildings. As I look at the photographs taken during and after the Siege, I see very little green, or any standing structures. The uniforms of the now aged men are no longer green, but torn, faded and stained the color of red clay, with few photographs of vehicles. There are Photographs of large holes in the ground and piles of cloth, which once served as sandbags. I also see a Familiar sight in these photographs taken so long ago, that are similar to others I have taken during other battles. I see pictures of really brave men.

As I look back now on those old photographs of Khe Sanh taken during and after the Siege, I notice that they were not unlike those photographs and films I remember seeing taken in France during WW1 showing the trenches and bunkers. Of course the difference is that our bunkers which we privates built, would not have withstood those incoming artillery rounds, or much of anything really. I don't know if our officers deep down in their bunkers were standing around a map table looking stern and smoking cigarettes.

SHORT ROUNDS

Part Two
Once A Marine Always a Marine, Brothers Taking Care of Brothers

By Tom Eichler

In issue 60, I printed a story regarding the Commandant of the Marine Corps, taking the time to honor me when I retired from the Chicago Police Department, in 2003. This honor was due to a Police Officer under my command, writing the commandant requesting a letter. As you may recall from the article, the CMC not only took the time to write a letter, he sent a personal photos and his very personal thank you, for my Police and Marine service.

On May 15, 2005, I attended the annual National Police Officers Memorial Ceremony in Washington DC. The Police officer who originally wrote the letter (still an active Chicago Police Officer) also attended. We were the honored guest of Captain Jason Pelt, USMC, assigned to Marine Barracks Honor Detail.

During the twilight parade ceremony we sat with the Commandant and other VIP's. Among those VIP's was the assistant Secretary of the Navy. After the parade, the Commandant visited with his

Tom Eichler with CMC, General Hagee

Marines and the many dignitaries in attendance. I informed one of the senior NCOs of the honor the Commandant had bestowed upon me when I retired. I asked if I could personally thank him, and

Ken Penn, KSV with CMC General Hagee

Officer Edward May with CMC General Hagee introduce him to the Former Marine who wrote him the letter. This Marine was not only a highly decorated Chicago Police Officer, but had lost his brother who was KIA while serving with the United States Army in Vietnam, during a two day battle in which he was awarded the Silver Star, Bronze Star, & Two Purple Hearts.

Once again, the Commandant put aside his busy schedule of activities, and met with our CPD Officer, Edward May, and myself. I thanked him for taking the time to write a personal letter regarding my retirement. He was most gracious and took photos and chatted with the people in our party, which included Ken Penn, KSV. We later met in the Officers Quarters, not only with the Commandant, but with the Assistant Commandant, General William L. Nyland, who was also a gracious host. What other Branch of Service would have the Commandant & Assistant Commandant take the time to honor a couple of old Marine Veterans? The motto "Semper Fidelis" never meant more to me and Officer May. Thank you General Hagee from the bottom of my heart.

Attendance at the Gold Star Mothers Convention, Dallas Texas

By James Wodecki

The American Gold Star Mothers annual Convention was held in Dallas TX, at the Crown Hotel. I attended with my wife PJ, as representatives from the Khe Sanh Veterans association. We arrived early so we could talk to a few of the Mothers, and wait for friends who were attending with us. Ken Waterston vice Commandant of Marine Corps League and his lovely wife Cigi, along with Jim Meeks the National BOD of Vietnam Veterans of America, would join me as guest speakers.

As we entered the lounge we met several other KSV members who were waiting for the banquet to begin. I observed two older gentlemen seated at the bar. One of them, pointing to my EGA tie clip, asked me if I was a Marine. I replied yes, and he told me that his son was also a Marine, and was killed in Beirut. His son's name was Jim Young, whose Mother Judith, was the new National President of the Gold Star Mothers. Mr. Young asked me where I had served in Vietnam, and I replied Khe Sanh. I further informed him that I was there to present a donation to the Gold Star Mothers which would enable one of their members to return to Vietnam to visit the place where their son had breathed his last breath.

A tap on my shoulder from a little lady behind me, and a soft voice said "my son was killed at Khe Sanh in 1968". With tears in her eyes, she presented me with a laminated, boot camp picture of Joey Keith Wheeler who was KIA at Khe Sanh while serving with B Company 1/9. She informed me that Joey was killed at a place called the Rock Pile on March 31st 1968. I gave her a big hug, told her how sorry I was, and attempted to give her a mental picture of where the Rock Pile was in relation to the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

I proceeded to hand her a Khe Sanh coin, and with a shaking hand she graciously accepted. She left our presence to change her dress for the upcoming Banquet. My wife and I then sat with another Gold Star Mother who lost her son during the 9/11 bombing of the Pentagon. He was a Marine who had already served two tours in the Persian Gulf. Just 2 weeks before his death, he had called and told her he was serving in a safe place and did not want her to worry as she did when he was in Kuwait. As luck would have it, he was in a safe location at the Pentagon just a few minutes prior to the plane crash, but left and entered the location where the plane struck.

We then spoke with Anna Heard, the present past President of Gold Star Mothers. We had previously spoke to her on the phone but never actually met. After her son was killed in Vietnam, she made three promises to herself; to become an active Gold Star Mother, to become the president, and bring the annual convention to Dallas, her son's hometown. She had accomplished all three. We had a delicious meal and I sat and pondered what I would speak of when it was my turn to address the convention. When it was my turn, I informed the crowd that the other speakers had already spoke of the items I planned to address, but I have something they did not have, a check for $ 1,000, to help one of their members return to Vietnam. They applauded; I looked at Mary Wheeler, as I spoke on. I told them I could see in all their eyes, their son's presence with us. God Bless all the Mothers who have lost their sons and daughters in war. I thought it was over when Anna and several other Mothers left the room for a few minutes. They have a ritual for replacing the past president position.

Dressed in flashing red, white, and blue sunglasses, carrying fishing poles and wearing funny hats, they returned to the room, Anna leading the way. They led a procession around the banquet room, singing "The Old Gray Mare, She Ain't What She Used to Be". WE were Shaking our heads and laughing as we left to return home.

POETRY

BLOWING IN THE WIND

Peter, Paul and Mary such beautiful
songs they sing such meaning.

Today at our ward picnic.
Fun we were supposed to have.
Things were going fine till songs we HAD to sing.

Not in a mood to sing or laugh,
I joined the circle on the fringe.

Blowing in the wind,
Once a song I loved.
But its words have such meaning,
today this song made me Flash.

Still now hours later,
the tears want to flow.
The words running through my mind,
time after time.

How many people must die?
When will we say enough is enough?

To a plateau of red clay,
I stood and looked at body bags,
all in a neat row.
Stretchers with my Brothers
dead and dying.
I too want to know when it will end.

THE POWER OF A MARINE L/CPL

By Tom Eichler E Co 2/26
Hill 861A

With both of my brothers attending the Reunion, helping with driving our rented vehicles, it brought back memories of how much they both mean to me, and how proud I am of them..

Denny lied about his age and joined the United States Army when he was only 16 years old, being assigned to the 25TH Infantry Division (Cacti). He was a Fire Team Leader, and was sent to Vietnam. Robert was drafted, assigned to the 1st Calvary Division, and also sent to Vietnam. I had reenlisted in the USMC, and was awaiting orders. My Mother received telegrams that both Denny & Robert had been WIA, both for the second time.

Denny was severely wounded while leading a patrol that was ambushed by a large NVA force. He was sent to Japan, and transferred to Great Lakes Naval Hospital to recover from his wounds. Robert suffered the same fate while on patrol, and was sent to a hospital in Japan to recover.

Denny received the Bronze Star, Bobby several Air Medals for Bravery. Both were promoted to Sergeant.

Shortly before I was to leave for Camp Pendleton, I received Denny's Bronze Star and Purple Hearts in the United Stated Mail. I knew that Denny had been transferred to numerous hospitals for rehab, but I still thought his citations should be given in proper Military fashion. By now Denny had recovered and been assigned as a drill instructor at Fort Leonard Wood. Taking pen in hand, I wrote a letter to the Commanding General at Fort Leonard Wood, informing him that I thought his medals should have been given in proper Military Fashion, and mailed them back to him.

I signed the Letter THOMAS J. EICHLER L/CPL, USMC (RET). Well the Army I guess, wanting to avoid the wrath of a Marine L/Cpl, held a Division Parade and presented Sergeant Denny Eichler with his Medals.

I too, was a Sergeant in the Infantry USMC, with E Co 2/26, Hill 861A.

Another bother William, served in the United States Navy as a CPO.

WEB BRIEFS

A series of conversations on the Khe Sanh Veterans Websites, with the niece of a Khe Sanh Veteran KIA at Khe Sanh Combat Base, seeking answers to his death.

Wendy Ferris is the niece of PFC Michael John Laderoute. He was a part of the 3rd Platoon, Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines. A member of the Ghost Patrol, Michael was declared MIA on February 25, 1968, and his status was changed to KIA, body recovered resulting from Bravo Companies successful action on March 30, 1968.We will begin with Wendy's email and questions. My response follows.

First of all I would like to apologize to you for taking so long to get back to you. I have four children that keep me busy. I also I attend college full time and work a part time job. Thank you for the kind words, I understand completely how difficult it is for a lot of the men who served over there and in any other war. My Grandmother has never recovered from the loss of my Uncle. We grew up talking about him in whispers so she wouldn't hear us. I developed a love for a man I never knew and wanted to know. My questions of why did he go, were always there. Why enter a war that was not ours?

When beginning this search I had to worry first of all of offending family members who thought it best to leave the past alone. I didn't want to do that. I wanted to bring my Uncle back into the light, which as a War Hero and member of our family he deserves to be recognized. I was tired of pretending he never was except in some version of a dream that you could only remember snatches of. I was worried about approaching vets who might be hesitant to talk to someone who was not a vet. I have read about the antiwar sentiment and how many soldiers were treated on their return home. I am a believer that even though we may oppose a war, we must support our vets.

I am very happy to say my fears were for nothing. I have been greeted with many emails offering encouragement and support in my search for information. I have spoken to men whose stories have moved me to weep for their loss and pain. When I first started I was shaken to the core at what so many of you went through. It was hard for me to think about, and harder still to imagine going through it. I am so grateful that I will never have to experience it, and am so grateful to those who served. I want to be able to teach my children to be grateful as well. I am looking at the events of February 25, 1968, outside the box and from a lot of different views. I wasn't there, so I cannot say I am correct in my thoughts. I have heard a lot of different versions of the causation of the patrol being ambushed. My Mom thinks that Khe Sanh was used to lure the NVA out in the open.

I know that on March 30 a patrol was sent out to get the remains of the patrol, and many were lost and only a few remains were recovered; nine I believed is the official number, Ronald Ridgeway being one of them. I have been trying to find out when the rest of the remains were discovered and how they determined identification. I found information where the government has tried to classify identity with a handful of bone fragments. As a Biotech student, I know it is impossible. You cannot even determine if someone is male or female using that method.

I have been reading messages that many experience dread with the anniversary of the Tet Offensive. My family doesn't acknowledge the event. My Uncle's birthday was last Sunday, and in my mind I wished him a Happy 56th and wished he was here. This is only one man, and you all have so many to remember and Honor. You have your own demons to carry. I read about your post keeping certain subjects a little more private. You are correct in thinking that there are people out there who would use such information against others. More people need to see and understand what you men have gone through. What you sacrificed and continue to sacrifice. I truly pray that this New Year is good to you and to all the other men and women who served, not just in Khe Sanh, but any war.

Wendy,
Sorry it took me a few days to get back to you but I wanted to visit with a couple of others and do a little research about a few of your questions. Frankly, some of your questions brought up several unresolved questions of my own. I want to thank you for all your kind remarks both in the emails and in your postings on the message board. I also want to thank you for being persistent in asking the questions that you have. Your doing so has prodded me to strongly examine some issues that have plagued me for 37 years. There are a number of fellow Khe Sanh Vets and even family members like yourself, that have many of these same unresolved issues, therefore I decided to post your letters and my response on both message boards. Maybe this will help answer questions for others, and it will also give some of the other guys an opportunity to give their point of view, and maybe answer some questions. I hope you don't mind.

Mac,
I've been reading Eric Hammel's book "The Siege of Khe Sanh"...I have a couple of questions I am hoping you might be able to help me with. M/Gen Tommy Tomkins says that he had ordered patrols to go no further than 500 meters off the wire for the purpose of wanting to bring the enemy closer to the base, and then all patrols were stopped. It was thought that NVA trenches were within 50 meters of the wire. Seismic monitoring was going on just for that belief. I am perplexed about an order given for the patrol on Feb 25. Did Captain Ken Pipes try to have the patrol delayed due to weather, and the request was denied? Does anyone know why that request was denied? If I am bombarding you with questions I apologize and if you would rather not answer, I understand.

Wendy,
Although it has been years since I read it, I recall that Hammel's book was accurate to a great extent. However, different people sometimes see things from a somewhat different perspective. Another thing is that our own memories sometimes deceive us, and some of us have even spent years trying to bury memories that are just too painful to fully acknowledge.

On top of that, there is Post Traumatic Stress Disorder eating away at most of us, and let's face it, as much as we hate to admit it we are getting older and that takes a huge toll on our memory. Another thing is that I constantly have to ask myself, is if I really saw this first hand, was it a dream, or was it just described to me in such vivid detail that the memory is etched in my brain as if I was there.

Captain Pipes probably would have led the patrol himself, but that is not the way that it was done, and would not have been considered even if he requested it. Another thought as to why it was the Third Platoon, is the depth of leadership and competency of the men in the Third. They were all good men. Not to belittle the other platoons. Actually Bravo Company from Captain Pipes down to the newest arrival, was the best of the best.

I'm not sure about the request for a delay of the patrol due to weather. That may or may not have happened and my thought is that it really doesn't matter. After the tragic events of the 25th, there was a scramble to second guess every single minute and detail of the action. I honestly do not think that any of it was deserved at any level.

In war, battles are won and battles are lost. Unfortunately February 25, 1968, was one of the battles that the US lost during the Vietnam war. To my knowledge it was the only one that Bravo Company was engaged in that they lost, and there were many in which Bravo Company was the over all victor, including the one in which I mentioned Jacques having been in prior to the siege. There was also the tremendous victory that Bravo Company claimed on March 30, 1968, and we can also most certainly claim the ultimate victory for the battle of Khe Sanh. Lt. Weiss and his 1st Platoon did an outstanding job in attempting to reinforce and rescue the 3rd. Several more good men were lost in the attempt as they were also ambushed by NVA. The fact that Lt. Weiss and his men were able to avoid not completely falling prey to the ambush, speaks highly of the entire 1st Platoon in itself. Although he was able to do so, it was not his decision to break contact and return to the perimeter. The decision wasn't even from the Battalion Commander as I had previously thought. It probably came all the way from Division. If the whole company had been thrown into the fray, the entire company would have been destroyed. Another observation that I just became aware of, is that Division was also concerned that if the whole company left their defensive position on the perimeter to join in the rescue effort, the entire sector of the perimeter would be so weakened that it could not withstand an NVA counter attack and Khe Sanh would fall.

Personally, I think that Division had it right. I think that the NVA were massed and ready to make just that very strike. The way and place that the 3rd Platoon was ambushed, and the preparations that had been made to ambush the reinforcements, indicate that it was a part of the over all NVA strategy to take Khe Sanh. If Khe Sanh had fallen and the hills lost the supporting fire that Khe Sanh provided, the hills would have fallen soon thereafter. This buries another demon for me. The one that asks, if we did what we should have done in regard to reinforcing the 3rd Platoon, and were the decisions regarding this, the right ones? Did everyone at every level do everything they could have done?

On the issue of the recovery of the bodies of those lost and left behind on the 25th, I have had several conversations and have done little research, but relied mostly on my personal notes at the time. This is one of the reasons this reply has taken so long. It took a while to locate and organize my notes. My notes show that there were eight Marines from Bravo Company that were immediately listed as KIA bodies recovered on February 25,1968. I believe that they were all from the 1st and 3rd Platoons. My notes also show a total of 19 Bravo Marines that were listed as MIA. My notes are very detailed and include name, rank, serial number, MOS, and even next of kin. For Michael J. Laderoute, my hand written notes actually show two next of kin entries. One located in Montreal, and one in New Brunswick, Canada. I only mention this so that you can see the great amount of detail and effort that went into doing everything possible for our lost brothers and their families.

Again, referring to my personal notes: after the highly successful raid on the enemy led by Bravo's Commanding Officer Ken Pipes, on March 30, 1968, the status of the 19 Marines that had been listed as MIA on the 25th, was changed to KIA body recover. After more than a month the decomposition of the remains was very bad. Identification was also hindered by the fact that personal items had been removed by the NVA. Another factor was that in addition to the wounds received that led to their death, the bodies were further torn apart by constant artillery and mortar fire directed to that general area for more that a month.

Ten of those recovered were separately, positively identified and individually shipped home to their family. Nine others were so commingled and in such a state that they could not be separately identified, and were interned in a mass grave at Jefferson Barracks. They were Michael Baptiste, Jerry Dodson, Frederick Billingham, Bruce E. Jones, Michael Brellenthin, John Lassiter, James Bruder, and David Scarbrough. The ninth was Ronald Ridgeway. Ron actually was not KIA, he was unconscious, and apparently the enemy had mistaken him for dead. When he regained consciousness he was taken as a POW.

One of the reasons that we can be fairly certain that there were no other survivor/POW's from the 25th, is because Ron would have seen them while he was taken miles away to a rendezvous camp where he joined up with additional POW's and was then taken to a POW camp. There is no way that Ron could have missed other POW's, either on the march or at the POW camp and he most certainly would have told the Corps during his debriefing. He has also been to at least one Khe Sanh Vets convention and has been in contact with a number of us. There has been no mention of other Bravo Company POW's, because there were none.

As for thoughts that there more Marines KIA on March 30, 1968, my notes show that there were ten Marines lost from Bravo Company. I also later added two more names one from A/1/13 and one from H&S 1/26. Each and every one of these men were true heroes and their loss was mourned by all; however, the battle was an overwhelming defeat for the enemy. Their losses were well over a hundred killed and no telling how many were wounded, or DOW. Considering that a single Marine rifle company was assaulting a battalion of NVA in well fortified positions, the Marine losses were miraculously light. I say miraculously because I truly believe that there was divine intervention that day.

Wendy, thank you again for your persistent effort and questions which caused me to get back into all this. Over the last couple of days I have talked with some truly outstanding men and I probably would have missed that opportunity had not been for your prompting. After gaining new information and some first hand observations from others I have changed my outlook on several major issues. Several of my personal demons have finally been put to rest. I can only hope that some of this information will help you and maybe a few others.

Wendy,

I just wanted to add my thoughts; understandably you are having a very difficult time excepting your Uncle's death, and this I can truly understand. I was on the ghost patrol that day, I was a squad leader, and some of my men didn't make it back from that patrol. Over the years I have had a very difficult time second guessing what could have been, what should have happened, but the fact is what happened, happened. Did Lt. Jacques make the correct decision? Well, here's my opinion, and this is in NO way to take away anything from the Lt. I don't think it was the best decision that could have been made, but Wendy, you should look at it this way. The men that gave their lives on that patrol, more than likely threw a monkey wrench into the NVA's plans to take Khe Sanh. I truly believe that patrol may have saved thousands of lives at Khe Sanh base.

As far as Captain Pipes decision not to send out a large rescue force, I'm sure his decision was one of the toughest he had ever made. To know Ken Pipes, you would know that this man would do anything in his power to save the life of even ONE man, if it was possible to do so.

Wendy, I'm sure from your stand point, you think your Uncle died unnecessarily, but given the choice to have gone on the patrol or not, I bet he would have gone. Speaking for myself, and the men in my squad, we couldn't wait to get out on patrol, we were so sick of being stuck on the base and being mortared and rocketed and not being able to do anything about it. So like I said, you should think of your Uncle as the HERO that he was, and the thousands of lives that he helped save.

Mac & All Who Responded,
From everything I know of my Uncle I know that he lived his life on his own terms. He made a choice to be in Vietnam. I know now there is no one underlying reason for the events of the 25th at least not in my mind. My search to find out what happened was not to lay blame on anyone's doorstep. It was for understanding and peace of mind. My family and I have that now. Thanks to so many, especially Mac and Ken Pipes. In my heart I believe that many more people need to hear the stories of the brave, and heroic men who fought there, died there, who continue to suffer for the sacrifice they made. To survive and return, meant to be changed forever. Not one person who went there came back the person they were. That too was a sacrifice. Not only to themselves, but their families, and loved ones. For those who have never gone to war, the freedoms we enjoy are taken for granted. We take it for what it is and never think about what it Might have cost...

Here in New Brunswick, Canada there are not a lot of Vietnam vets. There are no families that we know that can relate to what happened. We have been solitary in our grief. Finding this website and all of you has changed that. In all of you I see something that amazes me, a closeness that you usually only see in families (and sometimes not even then), the support you offer each other, is so special and unique. Something that someone looking in, can see but not even begin to understand. Something to aspire to, among mankind in general. If the world could reach what you all share, then maybe there wouldn't be any more wars. There is unity among you even when you don't always agree. Thank you so much for your words of support and encouragement. Thank you for welcoming me to your site and sharing with me your memories.

THE GUNNY

By Dennis Mannion

The name is on panel 35 east, line 9, and although the monument in Washington, D.C. doesn't list any particulars, I know that it was January 21st 1968 at about 0330 on Hill 861 at Khe Sanh when Gunnery Sergeant Melvin Rimel was killed by North Vietnamese gunfire during an all out assault on the hill. He was 15 years older than I, he outranked me by a considerable amount, I was not near him when he died, and he wasn't a good friend of mine. It is the Gunny's sacrifice, more than any other, that I still carry around like emotional baggage after all these years.

He was from the small town of Dawson, Pennsylvania and had enlisted in the Marine Corps during the Korean War. Decided to stay in and make it a career, and was part way through his second tour in Vietnam when I joined Kilo 3/26 in the fall of 1967. Every Marine Corps E-7 I ever crossed paths with seems, at least in my memory, to have been a particularly big man, but in the case of Gunny Rimel, that was physical reality. He was well over 6'4"and weighed in excess of 245 pounds with a voice to match. He was married and had 4 children, a facet of his life that I learned 20 years later. I was an enlisted man (E-3) holding down an officer's job as the company's artillery forward observer, and as a consequence of those responsibilities I came into almost daily contact with him as part of the Kilo's command group. He was firm when the job required him to be so; he was a sharer of his extensive field knowledge; and he relaxed many of us under some very harrowing conditions. Our CO, Captain Jasper, was wise enough to know that men like Rimel were the heart and soul of infantry outfits, and I think the best way to put it was that under the aegis of Jasper, the Gunny ran the company like a benevolent dictator.

In some ways, I was innocent about many things in those days, especially the depths of my own fears and my curiosity – but I sensed early on that he was what I like to call "good people." As my first months in-country passed, I began to slowly benefit from his goodness. In December of '67, Kilo was sent to Khe Sanh as part of the buildup, and an aura of impending battle loomed heavily over those last peaceful days of the year. We spent Christmas dug in just off the western end of the runway at the combat base, and he stopped by my tent/foxhole on that special day to share some of the goodies that he had received in Care Packages from home. Along with the material gifts, he seemed almost apologetic for us young kids having to be away from family and friends at this time of the year.

The next day, Kilo hiked up to Hill 861 and replaced a company there. We began conducting daily platoon and multi-platoon sized patrols, with the platoons rotating these assignments. However, as the only artillery FO, I accompanied every one. On the 13th of January, I was informed that the patrol for the day would be going northeast off the hill, down to what would become 861a during the siege. Since they would not be out of sight and within range of our 81 mortars, I could have to day off! After 18 straight days of patrolling great distances, this was welcome news indeed. However, the Gunny had other plans.

He "convinced" me and 4 others to accompany him down into the steep ravine that ran below the entire western side of the hill. The purpose for our little sojourn was to try to find the wreckage of a shot down USMC helicopter (from the Hill Fights back in April 67 and to ascertain whether two machine guns were still in the debris. I had my doubts about the whole thing. Wouldn't the guns have been destroyed in the crash, or wouldn't the NVA have taken them months before. It's not wise or even possible to turn down a Gunnery Sergeant's personal invitation.

We went out the northwest gate, hung a left, and began the slow and cautious process of disappearing into the dense vegetation of the ravine. With our protective barbed wire no longer visible behind us, and the real jungle growth all around, it was as if the war had suddenly left us behind. Take away the grenades, the M-16's, the helmets and the flak jackets, and we easily could have been hikers or campers in some out of the way region of the world. The bottom of the ravine was spooky quiet but the vegetation was not as much of a hindrance, so visibility was better and scattered evidence of the Hill Fights was in abundance – trash, c-rat cans, used LAW tubes, shell casings, and even the remains of two partially buried NVA. But, no helicopter. Sitting by a small stream, we lunched on C-rations and Kool-Aid flavored water and talked. Well, mostly, the 5 of us listened and the Gunny talked. What I remember most was that he spoke about fate and being in the wrong place at the right time. He recounted a few Marine Corps experiences, both from battle and back in the States, where death and injury could have just as easily been him if the timing was right. He talked about FEAR – his as well as ours – and he talked about the responsibility we had to look out for one another. Sitting beside that stream for an hour, it was actually pleasant, and I hated having to get up, gear up, and climb back to the war.

A week later, he was dead, hit by mortar shrapnel when Hill 861 was partially overrun by the NVA in the post-midnight assault that marked the start of the 77-Day siege. I had no advance knowledge of his death, and thus no warning, until I ran by his bunker in the half-light of early dawn. I looked down, stopped short, and knelt. Tears came to my eyes as I used my thumb to close both of his. I knew, in a slow motion sort of way, that the good fortune and protection afforded me (and others) by this individual had left me for good, and that my days on this hill, if not numbered, were due to change. I had already experienced the deaths of others in combat, buddies who were more my age, but this loss was different. The detonation of this 82mm mortar round cost me my guide, my advisor, and my protector. In short, I lost my Marine Corps father, and that is why, there is at least a moment in every waking day since that I think of him and the lessons he imparted.

I often look up at the sky when I think of the Gunny and it is doubly appropriate to do so. Thirty-seven years ago, I looked up to him both literally and figuratively, and when I first found his name on the Wall in 1982, I had to lift my eyes and stand on my tip-toes in order to see his name on Panel 35e.

The next stop is Saigon
Reprinted With Permission, The Marine Corps Gazette
June 1998
By Colonel William T. Dabney

Dabney remembers a conversation he had with General Lewis Burwell Puller concerning the Vietnam War. He believed that Vietnam posed similar strategic problems as North Korea, but there was no vital American interest in Vietnam and Vietnam was not a peninsula.

I met Gen Puller in the spring of 1957. I was a sergeant on active duty on leave after a Far East tour, and was near the end of my 3-year hitch. He had recently retired, lived near my home in Virginia, and was a friend of my father. We met at the funeral of a mutual cousin, to which I had worn my uniform because it was the only appropriate attire I had. Because the old church was too small for everyone, the ladies were inside, and the men were gathered around the gravesite in quiet conversation.

He spotted the uniform and introduced himself in his gruff way, asking me about myself and what I had done in the Corps. I was flattered by his interest, which I later learned extended to all Marines. After the burial, he asked me to come to see him. When I called to follow up on his invitation he asked me for lunch, after which the two of us repaired to the porch with some Virginia bourbon.

My impressions of that afternoon remain vivid. He was reading when I arrived, and there were books scattered all over the house. As we talked, he was unfailingly patient with my ignorance. I was impressed (awed might be a better word) by the breadth and depth of his thinking about geopolitics and military history, and my respect for this aspect of the man deepened as I pursued my own studies at Virginia Military Institute (VMI), Marine Corps Schools, and the National War College. In effect, I knew the man before I knew the legend. The legend, then, does not portray entirely the Marine I knew. He was much more than the medals and 'one liners' for which he is remembered today. I have long felt that to be the Corps' loss because the young men who strive to emulate him today cannot know him for what he really was. God knows we need our heroes. We should not let them be remembered only because they were brave and, as he often described himself, lucky.

It is in that spirit that I have written out my recollections of the conversation, for whatever value they may have to the readers of the Gazette. He had many questions about Okinawa, where the 3d Marine Division had recently moved from Honshu. He was particularly interested in how we trained and how much live-fire training we conducted. When he asked what my plans were, I said I'd been accepted at VMI and intended to return for a career upon graduation. I then asked what he thought was in store for the Marine Corps in the future. He replied that he thought a NATO war unlikely, and we'd probably fight next in Vietnam. He recalled his Marines singing about Saigon as they marched into Hungnam from the Chosin Reservoir in December of 1950. ("So put back your pack on/The next stop is Saigon/'An cheer up me lads/Bless 'em all," as quoted in Robert Leckie's The March to Glory, p. 192.)

Vietnam, he said, was essentially a colonial struggle, unresolved because of the Geneva partition. The Soviets were using it, through support of Ho Chi Minh, to extend Soviet hegemony in the area. In turn, the United States regarded a North Vietnamese attempt to conquer the south as a threat to American interests in accordance with the 'domino theory'-that the loss of South Vietnam risked the eventual loss of all Southeast Asia to the Soviets. The Vietnamese, he suggested, regarded the growing American involvement as offering little more than the prospect of one colonial power replacing another.

When I asked how he thought the war would end, he replied, without hesitation, "The Red Chinese Army will win it without firing a shot."

That leap of military logic was a bit large for a young buck sergeant to understand, and I asked him to fill in the blanks. He began by regretting that he did not have good maps with which to explain. He then discussed Korea, saying that the decisive force in the war and the subsequent peace was the U.S. Seventh Fleet. This was so because the peninsular geography of Korea restricted the maneuver of large armies, whether North Korean or Chinese. They were forced to attack on narrow fronts where they offered good targets for the superior firepower that American industry could provide, and their flanks and supply lines were always vulnerable from the sea.

He said that President Truman's decision to accept a partial victory rather than widen the war into China was correct. We could not have fought two continental campaigns at once, and Europe would therefore have been put at risk. Additionally, given our maritime superiority, widening the war was unnecessary to achieve our original Korean war objective. That objective, he reminded me, was to prevent a Communist takeover of South Korea by force, not, as Gen MacArthur had later decided to reunify Korea. He remarked that he considered Gen MacArthur's decision the classic example of Clausewitz' dictum that war tends to create its own momentum. (He would have agreed, I suspect, with President Bush's decision to stop after liberating Kuwait.)

All great powers want buffer states, and North Korea was precisely that to Red China. It could accept an American army in South Korea, but could not tolerate its approach to the Yalu. Its reaction was understandable and, he said, expected by most Marine and many Army officers at that time.

It was fortunate for Korea, he remarked, that President Rhee had placed South Korean forces Under United Nations (effectively American) command. The ultimate right of command was the power to appoint and relieve subordinates, and we had left the South Korean forces in good shape by appointing competent officers who had proved their worth in battle. (I don't believe it occurred to him that we would not insist upon the same command relationship with South Vietnam.)

He ended his discussion of Korea by saying that the Korean War was strategically necessary because, coupled with our military presence in Japan; it ensured our control of all straits leading out of the Sea of Japan, denying the Soviet Pacific Fleet unhindered access to the Pacific. It also gave us, in Japan, a secure offshore base from which to influence events in Northeast Asia as we chose. He reminded me that Admiral Mahan had called Japan "the England of the Pacific."

Before discussing Vietnam, he said that wars should be fought only for vital national interests, and that those interests were few: survival, strategic position (as in Korea), resources/markets or access thereto, and in limited cases, cultural affinity. He suggested that "saving the world for democracy," however it was phrased, had never been accepted as a vital interest by the American people. Had it been, we'd have joined the League of Nations after World War I. (He remarked to me in 1961, shortly after President Kennedy's inaugural address, that the President's " . . . we shall bear any burden, pay any price, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty," was grand rhetoric, but lousy strategy.) The domino theory was flawed, he said, because China and Russia were and always had been enemies (the Great Wall faces north, he pointed out). The Chinese would view Soviet control of Southeast Asia as encirclement, and would either deny the Soviets supporting transportation links across China or march to prevent it.

He explained that in redesigning our armed forces after World War II for the strategy of 'Massive Retaliation' made possible by nuclear weapons, we had neglected the forces and training to win a conventional war quickly and decisively. We would need time to reconfigure and retrain them, and would probably commit them piecemeal to Vietnam, which would give a resourceful and determined enemy like Ho Chi Minh time to adjust and fight on.

Gen Puller believed that Korea and Vietnam posed similar strategic problems. Both were artificially divided. Both North Vietnam and North Korea were, with Soviet sponsorship, intent upon reunification; they both bordered Red China; they both were regarded by her as buffer states. But there were two critical differences.

The strategic difference was that there was no vital American interest in Vietnam. It did not threaten American survival; it was not located where American or Soviet bases would provide any strategic advantage; we depended on it for neither resources nor markets; we had no cultural links with its people. Consequently, there was even less justification for risking an all out war with the Red Chinese over Vietnam than there had been over Korea.

The operational difference was that Vietnam was not a peninsula. A large army can always outflank a small army if it has room to maneuver, and the long Chinese border with Vietnam, Laos, and Burma provides that room. Invading North Vietnam risked catastrophe by confronting the huge Red Chinese Army in a continental campaign where our fleet could not be decisive. Should we invade we would "Stand a damn good chance of being pushed into the sea" (his words). The North Vietnamese could not defeat us; but since we could not go north, neither could we defeat them. (When I later asked whether we could do so by bombing, he suggested I read the Strategic Bombing Survey done immediately after World War II, keeping in mind that North Vietnam was an agrarian nation.) Consequently, he said, should we commit forces to Vietnam; we would condemn our troops to a prolonged defensive campaign in South Vietnam in which North Vietnam retained the initiative. He cautioned that a salient characteristic of Asian peoples is patience.

He then observed that democracies do not fight colonial wars well. Such wars tend to be long, he said. Absent a vital interest, the electorate of the democratic power eventually concludes that the marginal benefits of a victory are not worth the cost in casualties. Witness, he said the British in India and the French in Indochina. The decisions to withdraw were made in London and Paris, respectively, and not by force of arms in the field. He suggested that the same outcome was probable in Algeria and the other European colonies in Africa. In all cases, the defeat was (or would be) not military, but political.

The North Vietnamese understood that reality, he said, having recently been one of its beneficiaries in the 1954 Geneva Accords. They would shape their tactics accordingly. Since a defensive campaign in a place with porous jungle borders would at best result in a bloody stalemate, at some point the mothers of Peoria and Pocatello would grow weary of burying their sons and petition their elected representatives to bring them home. North Vietnam would then reunify the country on its terms, and the Red Chinese Army would have won the war without firing a shot. Note: In a later discussion (we had several before his health failed in the late 1960s) he remarked that an eventual rapprochement between America and China was inevitable and essential, and that if we withdrew from Vietnam rather than challenge China, we might create an opening to achieve it. Should that occur, he said, it would profoundly alter the strategic situation of the Soviet Union, which would then face the possibility of a two-front war against a steadily strengthening NATO and an industrializing China? Col Dabney later met and married Gen Puller's daughter Virginia. They live in Lexington, VA

The History of the "Ponderosa"
By Irvin Smith
Delta Company 1/3, Khe Sanh

I just finished reading the latest issue of Red Clay. Part of the story on page seven, brought back memories of my time at Khe Sanh. We arrived at Khe Sanh on C-130's during the Monsoon season in December of 1966. I remember we placed our packs on the metal runway being built by the Navy Seabees. Unfortunately, they were soon buried under mounds of freshly dug Red Clay. The Seabees apologized and dug out our gear. We immediately set out in a Northerly direction from the airstrip. I recall Lt. Ronald R. Burton chewing out one of the Marines who had managed to bring his guitar with him. It kept making noise every time the strings brushed up against the heavy bushes and elephant grass.

Once we arrived at the location we would be defending, we dug in as best we could. As luck would have it, one of our Marines knew how to operate heavy equipment. With a backhoe borrowed from the Seabees, we were able to dig much more formative defensive positions. After we were pretty well established, someone thought we should give it a name. Because of the physical layout, I and a few other Marines thought it looked like the place from the television show, Bonanza, so "The Ponderosa" was born.

We spent some cold miserable nights on ambushes, surviving the elements, leeches, and mosquitoes, while waiting for the NVA to attack. Those attacks never came, but there were NVA who would light a lantern down from our lines, trying to draw fire, to have us disclose our positions. We never did fall for those kinds of tricks. Our position was close to the Water Point down by the river. Once Lt Burton let us bathe in the river, a few guys at a time. This almost became a fatal error when a helicopter gunship accidentally opened fire on us. I recall Lt. Burton exiting the river wearing only his pistol belt, radio in hand, screaming for the helicopter to cease its attack. He saved a lot of Marines that day with his quick thinking.

I was not at Khe Sanh during the siege, but participated in the following operations: Prairie, Beaver Cage, Hickory, Bear Bite, Colgate, Choctaw, Union, Maryland, Bear Claw and Buffalo, where I was WIA. I would also like to mention a few of the men whom I was proud to have served with. I might not have the correct spelling of their names, since my memory is some what faded, but here goes: Dave Brook, Bill Southern, Rod Brewer, Ray Kelley, Luewellyn, Lopez, Phil Lynn, Harry Bornfield, Lt Ronald Burton, Lt Spears, Bill Sims, "Doc" Pearson, Jerry Furmanski, Dean (M-79 Man),Alabama, Roger Flood, Don Sweeny, John Cook, and Miller.

In May of 2004, I returned to Vietnam in search of my youth that I lost so many years ago. It was a real good experience except for the accident I had near Namo Bridge, located near Danang Harbor. While jumping from a large rock, all 285 Lbs of me slipped, and I landed headfirst, breaking my arm.

I am still looking forward to returning there with my wife in 2006. I will be going with the current president of the 3rd Marine Division, Mr. Bill Erwin, B Co 1/3 (69), who has returned many times. He and his associates took good care of me in 2004. The country is really very pretty and the Vietnamese people were very good to us on our first trip. I will never forget the ones we left behind. So now you know how and when the "The Ponderosa" got its name, God Bless all of you,

THREE DECADE WAIT ENDS WITH VETERAN RECEIVING BRONZE STAR
By Leonard Skonecki Focus Correspondent

On March 22, 1971, Bloomville resident John

Ward earned something very special. On June 22, 2005, he finally received it.

On that day more than 34 years ago, John was a specialist fourth class in Company A, 27th Engineering Battalion. He was far from home, serving with the U.S. Army in the war in Vietnam. His unit was assigned to repair the primary and assault airstrips of the American base at Khe Sanh. The airstrips were vital for purposes of re-supply and providing air support for American operations in the vicinity.

John and his unit were working on the assault air strip when the primary airstrip was hit by an enemy artillery barrage. According to Army records, John "moved to the damaged strip to begin immediate repairs and came under four additional enemy artillery barrages. Although faced with physical danger, Specialist Ward continued the vital repairing of this critical re-supply airstrip. His intrepid determination and professionalism without regard for his own personal safety was highly instrumental in the successful completion of this mission in a minimum of time. His valorous actions were in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service and reflect great credit upon himself, his unit and the United. States Army. John earned a Bronze Star for his devotion to duty under fire that day. He never received it.

Shortly afterwards, he was discharged from the Army and came home. Other members of his unit were decorated for that action sometime later, but John's order authorizing the Bronze Star got lost. He didn't receive his award until June 22, 2005, in a ceremony sponsored by the Seneca County Veterans Service Commission at the Tiffin Amvets Post 48.

At first, John wasn't concerned with the medal. He knew what he had done. But about 20 years ago, it came to mean more to him. John set about trying to get the medal, without success. He went to the Army, to the military archives in St. Louis, and various government agencies. He hired a professional investigator at the cost of several thousand dollars, all without luck. As the years went, I almost gave up. Roughly10 years ago, John knocked on the door of the Seneca County Veterans Service Commission. Service officer Jim McAuliffe who took up the search. "I tried everything I could he said".

Mac was able to locate a hometown news release about the engagement, but that wasn't proof. I needed the citation, the order. You can buy a medal, but it doesn't mean anything without the order," John said. Then, less than a year ago, help came unexpectedly from Manor, Pa., in the person of retired Master Sgt. George Smeltzer. George had just joined an association of Khe Sanh veterans, a group John already belonged. He casually flipped open his new Khe Sanh directory to see if there were any names he recognized. The first name he saw? John P. Ward

George was a member of John's unit. He was with John on the Khe Sanh airstrip three and a half decades ago. He, too, had endured the shelling. George gave John a call, just to say hello. John wasn't home. His wife Sharon took a message. Finally, John and George talked. Like John, George earned a Bronze Star that day. And, being career military, he'd kept all his Army paperwork, including' the award citation. John's next phone call was to Mac. "After I talked to him for a while, I realized that he was for real," John said. "I told Mac to call him. I can't thank Mac enough for all his work."

Mac and George talked three times over the next 24 hours. Two days later Mac had a copy of George's citation. Now the mystery of John's missing award was cleared up. Everyone had been looking in the wrong place. John's unit was part of the 18th Engineering Brigade. A month after the attack at Khe Sanh, the 18th was re-designated and re-assigned to the Engineering Command. It was the latter unit which issued the award' citations. Armed with a copy of George's order, Mac was quickly in touch with Clifford Snyder of' the National Archives Records Administration in Suitland, Md. George's order gave Snyder a place to start looking.

At first, Snyder came up empty. But he persistently expanded his search until, bingo! he discovered order 394, John's citation, which had laid waiting for 34 years... "It was like a thing come true," John said. Retired Maj. Gen. David Einsel presented John with his Bronze Star and citation. John also received a proclamation from Seneca County Commissioners Joe' Shock, Dave Sauber and Ben Nutter. The ceremony was held at Tiffin's AMVETS Post 48, where John is a member. John Ricker is the post commander. The colors were posted by the Seneca County, United Veterans Council. The Seneca County Veterans Service Commissioners are Tom Evans, John Leifheit, Dave Martien and Jim Rochester, who also attended, Commission chairman Dave Young, also a Vietnam vet, said, "I'm happy, I'm proud that we were able to do this."

The Bronze Star is one of America's highest military honors, John's has a "V" device attached to it The "V" indicates it is earned as the result of valor displayed by the soldier, John's Bronze Star was earned in 1971. On June 22, it found its rightful home. Today, John and Sharon live in Bloomville. Among the 80 persons in attendance was Bloomville Mayor Barbara Jacoby. John has a construction business there. "John does a lot for Bloomville. He donated the equipment building in our park and made picnic tables. Most anything we ask, he does," the mayor said.

Publisher Note: This story is a wonderful example of why Ray Stubbe founded the Khe Sanh Veterans. Our congratulations go out to John Ward for his long overdue award, and to George Smeltzer, for helping in John's quest.

The Swimming Hole

By Jim Madara

HQ Btry 1/13, Comm Platoon

Our first FDC was simply a wide trench scooped out of the red clay by a bulldozer. The trench angled down to a flat area for about 25-30 feet and then angled back up to ground level. We erected sandbag walls at either end of the trench where it started to angle back up and then threw a couple of tents over the top. Officers slept behind the wall in the foreground. Headquarters Battery, 1st Bn. 13th Marines (Artillery) were staged in Okinawa at Camp Hansen and arrived in South Vietnam in the summer of 1967. We arrived on LST 1166 and made a beach landing south of the Cao Viet River and then proceeded by convoy up Route 9 to Khe Sanh. There wasn't much at the base but a few bunkers left by the French and red clay, so we started filling sandbags.

Our construction of hooches and "bunkers" was based on what we had seen at Dong Ha and Da Nang. Our living quarters were large tents with sandbag walls on the sides, and as you can see from

The Swimming Hole. FDC 1/13 after the flood. Note the "telephone poles" made out of 155mm powder casings in the background.

FDC HQ Btry, 1/13, before the Siege. Tent in upper right belonged to the Seabees the picture, our vital command center would not have lasted long during the siege. Within that trench covered with a tent we had radio communications links with ground and air forward observers. There was also a Fire Coordination Control, ground wire link with our artillery batteries, plotting tables, and, later the first computer I had ever seen (which I think was called a FADAC).

Blissfully unaware of what was to come, we settled down to ply our trade. Then, it started to rain and rain and rain. I was standing radio watch one night and noticed water seeping through the sandbag wall just behind me. I stuck a pencil into the bags to mark how high it was getting and moved the pencil a number of times before the game got old and I forgot about it for awhile. Really early in the morning I glanced behind me and noticed the sandbags had become saturated with rain water and was moving like a snake. I yelled something and leaped up to grab hold of the lip of the trench, as the wall gave way and a wall of water rushed over my buddies and all the gear before it disappeared behind a blanket that served as the dividing wall between the work space and the officers sleeping quarters. The last thing I saw in the fading yellow light from the drenched gas lanterns was a very surprised officer dressed in wet skivvies floundering on his rubber lady, as the wave returned from crashing against the far wall. Sorry I didn't get a picture of that.

Things have a way of turning out for the best. After the rains destroyed our first bunker and we dried everything out, the Seabees built us a really nice one up by Alpha Battery. We never would have survived the first day's incoming if we had still been in this bunker at the start of the siege.

The Concert

By Craig Tourte

I went to a concert in Sacramento last night, with Oldies music, mostly from the 60's. Lots of people there were my age: Everyone was enjoying themselves, singing along to those old tunes that reminded us of our youth. The man next to me was telling me what a great time he had during the 60's, gave me a little nod and wink as he went on about his time in San Francisco, the girls and the concerts he attended as a kid. He said his hearing was bad now because of the all concerts and the music was so loud, we laughed and I kind of smiled at him and his wife. They seemed like nice folks.

I enjoyed the music. I'm not much for dancing, or singing along, but I loved the simple lyrics of the songs. It was a beautiful day with warm, clear skies. I enjoyed watching the older women remembering when they were young. There was the occasional old guy with the too young girlfriend, or wife, who looked kind of funny. Almost everyone was middle aged, but I just couldn't see myself as such, though I knew better.

During one of the old tunes; I don't remember which one it was, I started to cry. It came up from my throat and into my eyes and the tears ran down my face. Good thing I had on that big old pair of wrap around sunglasses because no one noticed. It seemed like a long time before I was able to compose myself. Fortunately I didn't have to talk to anyone, or look at anyone directly.

Memories are unique things. We all have them. I don't know what we called them in the years following our return from Khe Sanh. I think to a certain extent, we didn't know we had them. Perhaps we just thought it was an experience and it was over. A memory? The word sounds like something you can turn off and on. I think a lot of us just didn't know why our lives seemed to have gotten so screwed up when we got home. In looking back on our histories of divorces, drug and alcohol abuse, bitterness, and our inability to get along with other people, it seems like a lot of us turned out that way. Most of know why now, they kept telling us it was because of our experience in Vietnam. It is PTSD and we would work through it. I went to counseling classes where we sat around and heard other Vietnam veterans talk about their experiences, but it seemed like they were more interested in talking about theirs than listening to ours. You understood when they talked about their one or two experiences, seeing friends killed in the brutality of war, and you could see that it certainly seemed to affect them, but they didn't and couldn't understand mine. I tried to make them understand, to tell them in my own words what those 77 days was like, but as I looked into their eyes, I knew they were not getting it, none of them.

I have talked to a number of you, with similar stories where you tried to tell others. After you finished you asked yourself why you bothered opening your mouth. One Khe Sanh guy told of when the CP blew up and all were killed but him and when he got to Dong Ha was placed in the medical tent there were dozens of other Khe Sanh Veterans laying around, moaning in pain,. blood running in streams across the dirt and how after his recovery, he felt so guilty because he thought he should have gone back.

Another Khe Sanh guy was talking to the guy next to him and just remembered that the next time he saw him he had no arms and he was confused and didn't know what happened. Another had the breath knocked out of him and the head of the guy who had been standing next to him was now sitting on his lap unattached from his body. Another moved his new squad up the hill and told them to watch him. and when he came down for them, he directed their attention to another fire team off to his right, and now told his men to watch them. Because they would not make it up the hill. When the machine gun of the NVA exploded in front of his position, all of his men got down as they watched the other team continue to stand and die.

Another arrived at Khe Sanh with boots that were too small and a friend he had known gave him a new pair. How those boots meant so much to him after the friend was killed. And, when he was wounded for the second time that day, they cut those boots off and threw them away. This had affected him, because it was all he had left of the memory of his friend. How could anyone ever understand the meaning of having those boots?

I thought of all of those things during that concert, sitting there listening to music on that warm Saturday afternoon. My hearing is not too good, but it is not because of going to concerts with loud music. I smiled at the guy sitting next to me, but not because of his memories of girls and concerts in San Francisco, but because of my memories of a Siege so long ago. He just would not understand why would he, no one else has, and unless you are a Khe Sanh veteran, you won't, and never will.

INCOMING

NEWS FROM IRAQ

This is another combat report from Colonel Bob Chase, G-3, 2ND Mar Div in Iraq.

Was talking to Gino and he asked for some details on the MATADOR fight. Figured, by now since many of you might have caught some of the interviews, you'd like to hear, 'the rest of the story..."

Matador is now officially over, supposedly, they were going to fight our way back and destroy us, guess they missed the turn at the dairy queen. We are back and the final tally was Good Guys 125+ enemy dead, many more wounded, and 39 detainees of some significant value. The bad guys, who talk a real good game, 9 Killed (6 in the one Amtrak) and 30 wounded (most will return to duty). Not a bad week's work.

As we have said, our intent was to make ourselves big by leveraging our firepower and mobility. This area was a real sh--hole for AMZ criminals. We knew it, 1st Division knew it, but working it on a regular basis was tough. We kept some recon there and got the timing pretty well, brought up a bridging unit from the Army in Baghdad, then went across in the middle of the night (that was probably the only part that didn't go on sked, the bank gradient was poorly assessed) but we had near and far-side security already in and a blocking position near the Syrian Border.

The enemy figured out after about 4 hours that we were there in force. They came down with about 100 fighters (no, scratch that they were TARGETS) and made the poor decision to take on a battalion in open ground. They with drew, we went after them into a place called Ubaydi. Many mounted boats and tried to escape North, we pushed Air and the Cobras sunk a bunch of trash barges that night. Meanwhile, we continued to push west across the river. Our far-side units started to see pockets of insurgents move to key areas to emplace mines/IEDs. They came out, snipers took them out; their friends came for the bodies; they, joined them on the deck, permanently.

The force started getting the tanks and LAVs across later than we had hoped; but when they did. Our first casualties came at a high-rise where the enemy had prepared positions; a platoon moved in under fire, 2 Marines, a SSGT and a LCPL were first in the hatch and received a burst of MG fire. As the unit assumed they were dead (no additional fire/no one came out), they lit up the house and dropped it with a couple 500-pounders. As we moved to recover our Marines (NONE LEFT BEHIND), we discovered that the L/CPL, a though wounded, was still alive (he is serious, but stable). Unfortunately the SSGT had taken a round to the grape and had been killed by the initial burst. We moved on; portions of the task force moving along known rat-lines and others working intell developed in the cities of Ramana and Karabila. Fighting was sporadic, intense, and one-sided in outcome. We followed individuals into buildings, we leveled the buildings; all night, every night, Marine Air had eyes up and shooters on-station, talk about a guardian angel! Each night we re-assessed, looked at the intel and developed the next target sets. We stayed down there until a few days ago; then shifted to a series of caves in the north.

The caves were on an escarpment and rumors abound about whether these were, Bin-Laden like caves answer no, mostly small caches and some protection from about everything but a hellfire with a laser designator. We exploited some and closed most of them permanently. The enemy propaganda talked a lot about how they were going to kill us as we retreated, etc. They showed pictures of devastation in Al Qaim (caused by an intramural fight between the tribes and foreign fighters, no less) and blamed the Americans. Al Jazeera called to speak to me and interviewed me twice on air, yes, I called the enemy cowards, and again, they hide behind women and children in the cities and caused their death by their cowardice. Played well, enemy swore they had captured/killed the enemy commander. Went on again last night to ridicule them for their lies and continued fear of death, told them the destruction of AQ was evidence that, the noble tribes of Iraq also reject those that deface their holy places and dishonor their dead. We'll see if a wanted poster appears tomorrow's bad news is, they still didn't get pissed off enough to come out and play. We went back across the river without incident, decided to 'poke a stick' in Ubaydi (where the big fight was), just ONE MORE TIME before we left. NOTHING, they wanted no part of these Marines again. We're all back at base camps and Forward operating Bases, maintaining, cleaning, talking s--t, and prepping for the next smackdown!

NBC interviewed me again, last night, good stuff, but they harped on the casualties. I told them it was war; they wanted to know if a whole squad was killed in the track. As I told them a squad's worth of Marines were killed/hurt (6 KIA, 14 WIA) but it was NOT the catastrophic loss of a squad (it was a HQ track). NBC wanted to know how to refer to them, as a squad, company, etc. I told them, pretty bluntly, "refer to them for what they will always be, US MARINES! They continued to push (I was starting to become a bit agitated); they wanted to know how we considered this a success with the deaths. I nearly lost it. And how would we remember them, would there be a ceremony? You know what happens when I get into this mode. Thought you might appreciate the answer:

We can never replace a fellow Marine or best friend but I can attest that he died doing what we all hope to be doing as Marines, they were advancing, leading, and setting the example. They were being MARINES! It may not matter in the grand scheme of things to anyone but us, but we are singularly proud that we have and know Marines that fought and died like these. We remember and memorialize them and keep them alive every single time we put on this uniform -- we are just honored to wear the same eagle, globe, and anchor as these warrior/heroes. We don't make policy, we don't decide on the fight, but we do fight and win. And when we win, it is because every one of these Marines fight with us in sprit, and we will not, we cannot let them down. To we Marines, Semper Fidelis is more than a motto. It was to them, and to us who were privileged to fight with them, a way of life. Not sure that will get on the tube. Unfortunate, because I think we should all be such Marines when our time comes.

POETRY

This is a poem being sent from a Marine to his Dad.
For those who take the time to read it, you'll see a letter from him to his Dad at the bottom. It makes you truly thankful for not only the Marines, but ALL of our troops.

THE MARINE

We all came together,
Both young and old
To fight for our freedom,
To stand and be bold.

In the midst of all evil,
we stand our ground,
And we protect our country
From all terror around.

Peace and not war,
Is what some people say.
But I'll give my life,
So you can live the American way.

I give you the right
To talk of your peace.
To stand in your groups,
and protest in our streets.

But still I fight on,
I don't bitch, I don't whine.
I'm just one of the people who is doing your time.

I'm harder than nails,
Stronger than any machine.
I'm the immortal soldier,
I'm a U.S. MARINE!

So stand in my shoes,
And leave from your home.
Fight for the people who hate you,
With the protests they've shown.

Fight for the stranger,
Fight for the young.
So they all may have,
The greatest freedom you've won.

Fight for the sick,
Fight for the poor
Fight for the cripple,
Who lives next door.

But when your time comes,
Do what I've done.
For if you stand up for freedom,
You'll stand when the fight's done.

Hey Dad,

Do me a favor and label this "The Marine" and send it to everybody on your email list. Even leave this letter in it. I want this rolling all over the US; I want every home reading it. Every eye seeing it, and every heart to feel it. So can you please send this for me? I would but my email time isn't that long and I don't have much time anyway. You know what Dad? I wondered what it would be like to truly understand what JFK said in His inaugural speech.

"When the time comes to lay down my life for my country, I do not cower from this responsibility. I welcome it."

Well, now I know. And I do. Dad, I welcome the opportunity to do what I do. Even though I have left behind a beautiful wife, and I will miss the birth of our first born child, I would do it 70 times over to fight for the place that God has made for my home. I love you all and I miss you very much. I wish I could be there when Sandi has our baby, but tell her that I love her, and Lord willing, I will be coming home soon. Give Mom a great big hug from me and give one to yourself too.

POETRY

THE BATTLE OF KHE SANH

If freedom needs reminding of honor bright and memories dim with life's fast pace, remember the young marines on the hell of Khe Sanh's face.

Of tanks white hot and holed right through and napalm's glow and medics sprawled across the bodies of their friends and going to the wounded call.

Of steep air-strikes and flare-lit nights twelve yards forward and ten years back, and fighting hard with bayonet's grace as men in black attack, attack.

And gallant youth in hell's own glades cutting, thrusting on the hills, remember those boys and Khe Sanh's sighs where the echoes of courage are calling still

And as you march down Arlington's streets past ashen widows and winding-sheets, and hear the somber bugles shrill pray for the lost on Khe Sanh's hills.

THE COWARD OF KHE SANH

The coward of Khe Sanh,
Each day you see him rise.
He runs outside to take a piss,
Gives the high sign,
Then runs inside.

The coward of Khe Sanh,
Doesn't walk & doesn't run.
He's doing a shuffle,
Bent forward a bit at the hips.

At the sounds of the mortars,
Rockets or arty,
He becomes the fastest man alive!

The coward of Khe Sanh,
Works on the strip,
He hauls ammo from the dump to the pits.
He loads the rounds into the tubes.
He also wants to kill an NVA or two.

The coward of Khe Sanh
Sometimes leaves a trail.
A Trail of shit paper flying behind.
Some ass hole yelled
Incoming!

The coward of Khe Sanh,
See him run,
One hand on his head,
One on his gun!
His weapon is for fighting,
His gun is for fun!

The coward of Khe Sanh,
No where can he run,
No where can he hide.
So each day and each night,
He stands on the firing line.

The coward of Khe Sanh,
He looks at you,
From out of my eyes.

Ray old friend,

I received your books yesterday and was delighted to hear from you, but more importantly, amazed at the thoroughness and excellence of your book "Battalion of Kings." I have sent the copies to our Reference Section where they will become an important source to our many clients seeking information about Khe Sanh.

The book is one powerful and personal work. The format permits the researcher to access the date of an action; casualties involved, and better still, comments about the participants. In fact the research is handed to the requester with little else for him to do. Pretty amazing.

As for my personal involvement, you probably already know from the tapes that I had business at Khe Sanh during my first Company Commander tour in 1967; both opening & keeping open Rt. 9, and the Hill fights. We spent one hell of a lot of time and lost some good Marines--too many--trying to keep the road safe from the Rockpile all the way to Khe Sanh. It became impossible by late '67, and frankly, the cost was not worth it. I have since been back to Vietnam a few times and seen what has become of the road. You would not recognize it; wider, straighter, and now a major route for traffic out of Laos all the way to a deep water port at Cua Viet. Really hard to believe.

My actions on Hills 950 and 1015 in 1971 are in print for the very first time with your account on pp. 426-427. Also, for the first time I have seen the actual number of casualties there, which we didn't know at the beginning of the operation--30. Of the many close scrapes I lived through in two years of fighting with US and Vietnamese Marines that action ranks as one of the most remarkable. Remarkable for three individual reasons; 1) getting off the mountain and through an amazing amount of fire with just a minor wound, 2) being able to evacuate all of the casualties after having made a controlled crash landing on the air strip, and under enemy fire, and 3) getting off the airstrip after having been left there, alone, and with a badly shot up & broken helicopter.

Perhaps there is another factor you are unaware of that would have a major impact years later. As I went about the desperate job of unloading & transferring casualties from the troopship into my still operating helo, I became soaked—very literally "soaked"—in their blood. I even had difficulty holding them and carrying them (alone, without any help) because blood is so slippery it was hard for me to stay on my feet. When the job was finished I looked as if I had fallen into a pool of blood. It was all over me; hair, eyes, chest, back, and unbeknownst to me at the time, it had entered the wound I had received. It also entered the multitude of cuts, abrasions, etc. we all had that never seemed to heal.

Years later I would take an annual physical and the examining doctor would tell me that I had something unusual in my liver enzymes. He then asked me "have you been around any blood in the past"? I told him the story. When he heard this he said, "that's it, you have Hepatitis. When I finally retired from the Marine Corps this disease came at me with a vengeance and my liver finally failed in 2002. So in some way I suppose the enemy did manage to give me a near fatal wound in that action on Hill 950 in 1971. Even so, I beat the odds again. I will include the full story of the liver failure experience in 2002 that turned out to be another miracle of survival.

I send you greetings from your admirers here; Dan Crawford and Bob Aquilina who now have the book and appreciate what you have written. It will be of good use to us. With our appreciation, best wishes, and, Semper Fi,

Dear Reverend Stubbe:

Thank you very much for sending us the copy of "Battalion of Kings": A Tribute to Our Fallen Brothers Who Died Because of the Battlefield of Khe Sanh, Vietnam. I have added it to our collection for the benefit of staff and researchers alike. Along with your and John Prados' Valley of Decision and some documents about the aerial re-supply of Khe Sanh during the siege in January - April 1968, compiled and given to us by Ray Anderson, this volume represents another excellent source of information about .that landmark engagement.

Sincerely,

Dear Ray,
I received a copy of your recent book, "Battalion of Kings" sent to me with your cover letter last Wednesday, July 6th. What a wonderful surprise. It is an incredibly rich documentary. I know that I shall be spending many hours reading through it and reminiscing, with tears, our days of youthful valor. Thank you so much for this wonderful gift, and for your love and dedication throughout all these past years that have brought you to this publication. I know, beyond any doubt, that the love of God dwells richly in your heart. I love you, Ray!

My wife is busy building the library she's always wanted. It's in our living room. When it's finished we intend to spend many hour sitting there and reading. Your book will have a place of honor, just as you have in my heart.

You are an amazing man of God who has sacrificed so much and given so much for others. Thank you from the bottom of my heart for all you do, and all you have done over these many years while serving in Vietnam and at home. Thank you so very much for the new revision of your book written in memory of, and dedicated to, all of those who fought and died during the "Siege of Khe Sanh". This book was created out of the love and compassion you have for your fallen brothers and their families. Dear Chaplain Stubbe, Today I received your book and sat down and read the event of the day of my son's death in Vietnam. All I can think of is that I was so blessed to have a great son who was willing to fight for this free country, and set a good example of love, and friendship to those who were with him. War never will be easy; sometimes God is kind in helping the rest of us find those good men who were with him, and grow to love them as he did. That has been my privilege. You spoke of Gary O'Neil, Billy Moffat, and Lieutenant Ken Penn. I have come to know all of them. They have sort of become my sons, and great friends.

I have met several of the other men were in his unit. Captain Mike Pierson, Howard Whitaker, Billy Joe Hill, Willie Roe Yates, Bob Harris, John Wright, Bob Bates, and several others. I consider them part of my family. I really love them all. I also met three Vietnamese brothers who I became very close to. I think of all those whom you all fought against. They had Mother's too. How sad is this earth that we cannot be kind to one another. We should all live as God has told us to do. I believe that we will all meet in the hereafter, laugh, and rejoice together. For the friendships we have all formed. There will be no war, and we will be a family together.

Thank you so much for sending me that book to remind me how much I care for all of you. Also for the kindness you have all shown me and my family. God bless you in all you do to further the work and love that you so graciously share.

Dear Reverend Stubbe,

I received the autographed copy of Battalion of Kings and want to thank you for sending it. If I can, or should reimburse you for your time, money and efforts please let me know, as I will be happy to do so. In the meantime I wish to say you composed a masterpiece that will always remain in my home. Knowing how my friends and many others died on the battlefield in Vietnam, helps to bring closure to my memories of long ago. I'm sure many others feel likewise. You have done a great service to many Veterans of Khe Sanh. Little did I think when I first attended one of your services at Khe Sanh in 1967, that you would play an important role in my life many years later. But you truly have, and for that I am most grateful. Semper Fi,

Dear Ray,
Thank you for your extraordinary book! I have been reading it since it arrived last Friday and am just in awe of the incredible effort and dedication it required to accomplish something of this magnitude. I didn't think anything would ever again equal the powerful emotions I felt years ago, when alone one evening, just after sunset, I first came upon The Wall in Washington, D.C.

Yet, Battalion of Kings has done that. In fact, it is sometimes too overwhelming and I must stop reading for a while. Though difficult as it is to reflect upon the horrible end each of these young men met, and the often ghastly scenes that forever disturb the sleep of their buddies, such a personal, monument, profoundly honest, heart-rending could never have been achieved in stone. Your ability to weave the lives, and deaths, of these men into the broader historical context, from both, American and North Vietnamese perspectives, gives this tribute a real sense of purpose and continuity that I often find missing in other memorials. .

Dear Ray
I'm unilaterally doing away with such formality of headings. We both know our own names and addresses well enough to not have to write them out with each letter. Anyway, it gives me more room to shoot my mouth off.

Thank you so much for the copy of "Battalion of Kings." I look through it every night, bringing back so many memories of those days when we were so young and charged up with life, even though we were in that place of death. When I read about those men who were killed, I think that they will be forever 18-19-20 years old throughout eternity. Also, that old saying, that as "long as we live, they live" is so true. I want to say congratulations for your work in compiling this testament to those men. It must have been a monumental task compiling this information. I read at random. Wherever I happen to open, that's where I start. I finish each piece and highlight the heading.

For some reason, I think its best that I read it this way. The statements are terse and manly. No morbid sobbing and weeping. Exactly the way it should be. These men died doing their duty to their comrades. I know that sounds heroic, and it was. It was even more heroic in that most people don't know. They don't know who these men were or anything about them. Oddly, that's fine with me because the memory of these men is too much for the average person now. They couldn't conceive of even allowing themselves to be in a place that such men as these actively sought out and put themselves into. They were the boy next door, the H.S. dropout, and the scholar athlete, the religious boy, and the boy with no religious training. All meeting their ends as brothers. That's all I can say of your effort. Well done Ray. I'm proud that I know such a good person as yourself, take care.

We also received many letters of thanks for the recent issuance of The Khe Sanh Book of Poetry. These are all poems that have appeared in our Red Clay Magazine. They are for sale in the Khe Sanh PX for $ 10.00, Plus $ 3.00 S/H.

Here is just one of the letters we have received.

Tom,
Many thanks for the wonderful book of poetry written by members of the Khe Sanh Veterans organization. You and Diana Fecarotta did a great job in editing and putting the book together. To have two of my poems included in your book is an honor. Thank you, also, for including the two poems written by Paulette Mitchell. She and Laurie, Buzzy and Paulette's daughter, were able to attend the 30th anniversary reunion of the Battle of Hill 881 South. I promised them I would try to get the poems published. Thanks to you and Ernie Spencer and others for including the poems in the KSV Magazine.

A Warrior without his Armor

By Tom Clarkson
Gulf Region Division
U.S. Army Corps of Engineers
Baghdad, Iraq

"There is something either highly auspicious or very suspicious about us talking about Vietnam and Iraq today," James S. Zucarelli said with a soft smile that crinkled kind eyes. "I noticed this morning that I have exactly 190 days left on this tour here in Iraq, and as were the number I had in Vietnam, serving on Hill 190!"

A Liaison Officer (LNO) between the 42nd Infantry Division, of the New York National Guard, and the Project and Contracting Office (PCO), Zucarelli is one of a very few. Today, he is an Army Lt. Col. serving in Iraq, and in 1968-69 was a Marine 2nd Lt. in Viet Nam.

His pride is obvious as he states that his father has always been his hero, and clearly enjoys recounting the story of how his father and mother met. Now 88 years old, during WWII, the senior Mr. Zucarelli was a naval aviator on anti-submarine duty, flying PBYs out of the Panama Canal Zone Naval Air Station. His mother and a girl friend, though in their early 20's, in proper Latin tradition, accompanied by a chaperon, had come from Cartago, Costa Rico on a visit to Panama. His father, the senior Mr. Zucarelli was then a young smitten ensign.

At his earliest opportunity, bedecked in a spotless, perfectly ironed, white dress uniform, he arrived, unannounced, at her parent's door, back in Costa Rico.Love prevailed and they were married in Buffalo, NY in 1942. That area, the community of Amherst specifically, has been their, and James' - home ever since.

His boyhood was during an idyllic time, though in the early days of the Cold War, the public was more interested in whether our President Ike would break par in his golf game. Well before the "electronic age" and with only three television stations, no digital pagers, cell phones, or computers, little distracted a young boy from savoring his youth.

Such was the locale for his two sisters, one brother and James' upbringing, middle class upstate New York. From Kindergarten through his high school graduation from St. Joseph's Collegiate Institute, to the Jesuit run Canisius College, his education was Roman Catholic based. At Canisius, he was enrolled in the mandatory, ROTC program. Like many youths, when he and his girlfriend broke up, toward the end of his sophomore year in college, he was distraught and decided he would quit college, join the Marines and go off to war. At the recruiting station, a crisply-attired, ramrod straight, no nonsense Marine Captain fired a question, "Just why you want to join the Marines, son?" It seemed a simple enough question so Zucarelli candidly answered that he'd just split up with his girl friend.

With that the officer rose, walked around his desk, grabbed Zucarelli by his shirt, pinned him to the wall and delivered an impassioned, several minute, diatribe (with liberal use of that particular flavor of profanity only a seasoned military veteran can so capably invoke.) In a highly abbreviated form, the Captain suggested "that was about the stupidest thing he'd ever heard!" By the time James left the recruiter's office, he'd wisely decided to return to his college coursework. He did, however, sign up for the Platoon Leaders Course which would allow him a Marine commission when he graduated. As a result, in June 1968, he went to Marine Corps Base in Quantico, Va. for the Officer's Basic Course and became a Marine infantry officer.

On December 22nd six months later, he arrived in Da Nang. Two days later, he was in his first fire fight when the "listening post" he and several others were manning was attacked. Of that traumatic introduction to Vietnam, he remembers little other than that the only weapon he had at that time was an Army issued .45 caliber pistol. It jammed, and after beating it on the ground to no avail, he found himself weaponless and crouching behind a bush, as though that would somehow stop hostile fire. He was, however, learning fast. He soon said to his Gunnery Sgt., an experienced E-7, "Gunny, you just tell me what to do and I'll do it." Wise that young lieutenant, though like all zealous, enthusiastic, and well intentioned young men, he soon forgot counsel given by more experienced combat hands.

It happened only a short time later after he'd taken over command of the second platoon, Delta Co., 1st Bn., 26th Reg., 3rd Marine Div. Their task early in 1969, was that of the first line of defense, "out in Indian territory." By day they conducted Search and Destroy patrols and at night, set up squad sized ambushes. During his very first patrol, deployed exactly by the book, he saw smoke coming from a cave directly in front of his platoon. Enthusiastically and stupidly, he ran ahead of his men hitting a trip wire, and, as luck would have it, was able to throw himself behind a boulder just as the booby trap went off. The VC clearly heard the Americans coming and had departed the area. After their corpsman had pulled sharp splinters of rock from his face, his platoon sergeant approached and quietly requested, "Sir, might I have a word with you?"

Properly, and polite-like, they stepped behind a large formation of rocks where Zucarelli found himself thoroughly counseled, chastised, and chewed out in no uncertain words. Devoid of the plethora of colorful profanities, the several minute session boiled down to the simple guidance that "You are the Platoon Leader. You do not run ahead of the platoon. You do your job; we will do ours. Do you understand?" Now, he got it! He attributes the fact that he is alive today to the advice, tutelage and friendship of Platoon Sgt. David Hayes.

The anniversary of the '68 TET Offensive loomed ominously ahead in but a few days. As a result, U.S. forces were on high alert but it was work as usual for the Marines. Though his Italian last name translated to "a little sugar" there was nothing sweet in how February 22 would turn out. Zucarelli, himself the twelfth man, took out a squad ambush team, set up their claymore mines, spread out, found cover, and prepared to fire their weapons, on full automatic at any enemy unlucky enough to walk into their trap. At 2015 he quietly did a radio check on the PRC-25 radio. Soon it appeared they had set up in the right place as they silently watched several armed individuals, with the typical, Vietnamese coned hats upon their heads, stepped into their killing zone. Zucarelli set off the claymores and a dozen Marines started spraying rounds into the midst of half a dozen "hostiles."

Momentarily it seemed that all was going off as planned when "suddenly all hell broke loose". A veritable wall of fire rolled upon them, as those, they'd ambushed were the point personnel of a battalion sized VC unit.. A few moments before the fight, he'd removed his helmet and placed his twelve hand grenades in it. As a result of the unholy humidity and sweltering heat, he'd also taken off his flak jacket and jungle fatigue jacket, having fought bare-chested in the battle of - and for - his life.

A squad taking on a battalion! Frantically he called for artillery support, "Box us," he screamed on his radio, "we're not going anywhere for a while." Luckily "Puff", a C-47 gun ship, was soon overhead laying down sheets supporting fire. He formed his prescribed "wagon wheel" defensive position desperately trying to keep the overwhelmingly large force held at bay. However, a sapper slipped through and standing not ten feet away, pointed his AK-47 at Zucarelli. Out of ammo, he realized the enemy was too close to throw his one remaining hand grenade, and too far away to engage in combat with his father's WWII K-Bar killing knife strapped on his waist. His life, he was sure, was at an end when to his side Lance Cpl. Edwin J. Smolarek, Jr., unleashed a burst from his M-16, killing the VC before he could shoot.

As the platoon leader, he ordered his men to withdraw. No sooner had Zucarelli issued the order, than a grenade knocked him down and out. Thankfully, another of his squad noted his absence, came back, and dragged him to cover. This position afforded little cover as he remembers another grenade going off close by and feeling the shrapnel pierce and lacerate the back of his skull. Though eleven of his twelve men were wounded, none had been killed. In addition to incurring a collapsed lung, Zucarelli, sustained a total of seven wounds to his head, back, arms, and legs. When he was medevacted he noted the time, 2205 hours. An hour and fifty minutes had transpired since setting off those claymores in what was supposed to have been a simple ambush.

He was taken to the 95th Evac Hospital outside of Da Nang, the same one that years later was the subject of the TV series "China Beach." Without anesthesia, a doctor diagnosed one of his injuries, promptly put a knee on his chest while a nurse held down his arm and with scalpel in hand, cut deeply though the skin and muscles to the lung so that he could insert a tube into the collapsed organ. Later he remembered a priest giving him last rites and then equally vividly he experienced a sense of total calm as an aura of "whiteness" surrounded him and he found himself looking down on his own mangled body.

Days later as he began recover he put this "out of body" experience off to a euphoric state induced from morphine. He described the experience and said something about it to his corpsman friend "Doc" Whitman. "Doc" quietly listened and simply responded, "Morphine is not given to those suffering from chest wounds. You were given none." He had spent a mental lifetime in Vietnam. It had taken only eight weeks. A like period of physical recovery time was required of him in Yokuska Naval Hospital, in Japan. Repair of deep emotional wounds were on an altogether different timetable. As a result of his extensive injuries, his last eight months of duty were spent on Okinawa. During this time in the hospital, he had ample opportunity to ponder the complicated and difficult decisions facing those in command. Among several incidents, one decision he had made weighed upon him. It was an incident he would later often pose to classes of young leaders that he would address.

They were carefully creeping along on the first day of a five day Search and Destroy mission. Ahead of them they saw two individuals setting a fine tripwire to catch and kill any American forces coming that way. The Marines were able to capture both of them. With over four days still ahead of them in their mission it made no sense to try to take them along as prisoners. Orders were simple - these were the enemy - "dispatch" them.

The two enemies Zucarelli and his men had just captured were seven and nine years old! War is not pretty. As he lay in the hospital he asked himself, "Did he do the right thing?" After significant thought, Zucarelli had . . . . . released the two children.

Upon his own release from active duty. he returned to Buffalo and a public that was massively anti-war. He became a total recluse, not leaving his parents' house during June, July, or August 1971. At the time he didn't recognize his condition for what it was, but now he does, a classic example of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder.

The second part of the process of becoming whole again came with the birth of his first child in 1979. He came out of the self imposed closet into which he had locked himself with his Vietnam experiences and memories. The next step for him was when the Vietnam Wall was built and dedicated in Washington, D.C.

This for many was an acknowledgment and recognition long overdue. His family helped in his healing. An important part of his very existence, Lance Cpl. Smolarek who had saved his life, was himself killed in July 1969. Ironically, though they had not known each other in their youth both were the same age and came from Buffalo. Smolarek was buried directly across the street from where Zucarelli had gone to college and where his daughter then went. She regularly visited the grave of the man who had saved their father's life, sometimes sitting beside it while studying. The family carefully maintains his grave site and, to this day, his daughter keeps her father's savior's picture in her room.

One day he saw an opportunity to determine, through the Vietnam Veterans newsletter, RED CLAY, if those harrowing experiences which had so terribly plagued his mind were truly real or imagined. He placed a simple message in the publication,"Second Lt. James Zucarelli, Delta1/26, USMC, does anyone remember me?" Shortly after its publication Robert Whitman from Ames, Ia., who had been the corpsman of the first platoon, 1/26, contacted him and started their conversation with a simple, "Yah, I remember you." Besides that, he knew the location and contact information of Cpl. Edwin Knight, the one Marine who had not been wounded during that horrific night on Hill190. Ultimately, several of them started the Delta 1/26 Marines Association.

So, what brought him full circle to don once again a military uniform?

Zucarelli had sat down to read the evening paper and saw an ad encouraging veterans to re-enlist in the National Guard. First he tried to get into the Marine Reserve. His numerous wounds and ten point VA disabilities precluded that possibility. Finally, at age 43, he went for a physical so that he might join the National Guard. The doctor was doubtful but Zucarelli, his Vietnam demons now shed, pleaded saying, "I feel that I still owe something to this country and I really want to do this."

When the Secretary of Defense announced that he was activating the first National Guard Division since the Korean War – the 42nd Infantry Division (ID) or the Rainbow Division, the once young Marine lieutenant was 57. By the time he leaves Iraq he will be 59. Does age help someone like him, in a deployment such as this, he's asked? "Wisdom is what we should seek. It's comprised of a balanced blend of knowledge and experience that can be gained only through the passage of time. Awareness of when and how to apply that wisdom comes only through maturity." In a shortened answer his response would be a monosyllabic, "yes!"

His organization, the 42ID has a long and proud heritage. Presently comprised of Soldiers from 26 states and the territory of Guam, it was the first Army Division deployed to France in WWI. It was the unit that liberated Dacau in WII. More recently it constituted the first responders to 9/11 in New York City. Accordingly, the words "Never Forget" now grace their division standard. His job in Iraq is that of "keeping my ear to the rail and my eyes peeled," he explains. "While an extremely difficult position from which to work," he laughs, "my job is to 'make things happen,' be the "conduit guy" and be 'productively reactive'. Furthermore, well aware that we are the first deployed National Guard Division I strive to ensure our excellent, service based image and reputation are properly maintained. "I'm in the information exchange business and sometimes keeping up with that is quite a chore what with the six sectors of the Project and Contracting Office: Oil; Public Works – Water; Electric; Transportation and Communication; Security and Justice; Buildings, Health and Education."

He sees not the remotest parallel of our involvement in Iraq to the experience that was Vietnam "There," he explains, "We were fighting a well organized and structured, ideologically driven force. They had a recognizable cause. Yes, we knew that the NVA and VC was our enemy, but we could have respect for them as believers of that for which they fought. For them it wasn't about Communism … it was simply nationalism. Think about it," he challenges, "Ho Chi Minh didn't do what he did for power or personal gain. He was a nationalist. "Here, we find ourselves fighting desperate, factionalized knots which employ barbaric tactics like car bombs blowing up mosques, and suicide bombers blowing up crowds of women and children." Rhetorically he asks, "And for what end? Do these insurgents really think that they are doing anyone any good?"

Too few grasp the reality that there is no such thing as 'instant democracy'. For the best model imaginable, look at the United States we're still a major work in progress! If put in the proper perspective, it's not a bad analogy to compare our disassociation with King George nearly 225 years ago to the Iraqis now being out from under the thumb of Saddam Hussein. Neither action meant voila, now there's a perfect democracy!

People, like countries, also grow and change. In 2001, Zucarelli and two Viet Nam veteran buddies returned to the country where they lost their youthful naiveté. As a Marine in Vietnam, in the throes of combat, he himself, killed at least seven individuals. One of them had been a female Viet Cong combatant. The memories haunted him. The demons of these deaths rode his soul. He knew not if he returned to apologize or for catharsis. He did know, however, that he returned neither as a victor nor as the vanquished.

While visiting the State University of New York (SUNY) Da Nang campus they found themselves invited to a floating restaurant in Da Nang Harbor. Seated across from him was the city's Chief of Police, and nearby the Mayor. The guest of honor, the Province Communist Chairman, arrived. As a youth this man had worked in the Da Nang Air Force Officers Club. Upon overhearing discussions of upcoming missions, he would slip downstairs to use his wireless to tell fellow VCs what areas they should avoid.

Through an interpreter, the Chairman stilled the assemblage with his query of Zucarelli, "Why are you here?" Conscious of the ramifications of his response, his answer was one of civility and politeness. In appreciation for the country, its people, and the great beauty of its women. The Chairman's cold response was, "Why are you really here?"

Not one to mince words when challenged, the former lieutenant told the interpreter, "Please translate my answer word for word," Upon receiving her assurance that she would do so, he stood, looked the Chairman directly in the eye and stated with calculated directness, "Mr. Chairman, I am here because I once was fighting men like you. I have killed them and they have killed men like me. My blood has streamed from multiple wounds into this very land. No one has the right to tell me that a part of this country does not belong to me or that I do not belong to this country. "

Upon translation of his words into Vietnamese, the silence was deafening. The chairman slowly rose from the dais, and walked to his once bitter enemy. The thought flashed through Zucarelli's mind, "Holy S, what have I just done?" When the senior communist official reached his side, he locked their eyes, looked deeply into them, and then the Chairman took his once antagonist and bitter enemy into his arms and gave him a long hug of love, reconciliation and welcome.

Two old warriors stood side by side, without their armor or arms, and looked into the future.

INCOMING

MY HEROINE

By Joe Moring

At the KSV Chicago reunion, my lady friend Sharon Zunio, was awarded the "Doc Medal," for her service as an Air Force Medical Evacuation Technician. We were on my Harley on our way home, when I attempted to exit the highway in Repent, Idaho, to look for a gasoline station. I looked down, and observed gravel on the pavement "Look out" I yelled, too late. The next thing I knew my head was bouncing off the rocks on the shoulder of the road. I pulled my leg out from under "Baby Blue"(My Harley). I found Sharon, her arms were bleeding, and all cut up. Despite her wounds, Sharon took charge.

She retrieved a pair of sweats from the bike and started to work on stopping the bleeding from my head wound. Sharon managed to stop the bleeding, and pulled me to a safe place while she looked for help. In my daze, I looked up a saw a corpsman holding an IV shouting orders, working on me with her free hand, the other waving for help from passing motorist. I realized it was Sharon. The Ambulance finally came, and took us to the hospital. Sharon was cut and scrapped from her knuckles to the shoulder. The doctor said my eye is going to be ok and I will need a skin-graft on my elbow. He also said if Sharon hadn't been there to stop the bleeding, I would have bled to death in 4-5 minutes. Once again Sharon has proven herself worthy of the "Doc Medal, still saving lives. I truly love her.

SHORT ROUNDS

A Great Day in California!

By Chuck Chamberlin

Took a ride today with KSV's, Craig Tourte, Chuck Teasley and Steve Wiese to the 26 acre residence of Tom Holchler, also a KSV. All together there were about a dozen guys in the group. Craig Tourte arranged for, and provided transportation for everyone. It turned out just great. I learned Chuck Teasley was the C Co 1/26 radio operator whom I replaced before the company left Hill 861.

Steve Wiese was a Lieutenant with B Co 1/26, and survived the February 25 ambush, and the March 30 battle to retrieve those KIA. Craig Tourte served with Hq Btry 1/13 at Khe Sanh. I also met another fellow, R. Cueva from Vacaville, California, who's brother Tony was awarded a Navy Cross, and whom had dated my sister in high school. Talk about a small world. The entire day was an absolute revelation for me. To finally meet and talk with fellow KS Vets in such a great setting was a "changing day" in my life. Without becoming to melodramatic, the thoughts, feelings and behavior of these individuals, and the things we discussed, once again made me proud to still be associated with such a great bunch of guys.

CHARLIE'S THEORY OF CRIME

After working 23 years as a Police Officer, assigned to a one man car on the midnight shift, I became a "thinker", and figured a few things out. I developed the "Pod Theory" years ago, and after years of watching, know it to be true. On Wednesdays spaceships come to America and distribute seed pods. Many come to Central PA. This is because we have two airports. On Thursday, the pods sprout and start producing a++holes. By Friday night, they have all sprouted and there are a++holes all over the place, running around, causing trouble etc until the dawn of Sunday morning. The Sunday morning sun causes them to start to die and by Sunday night all but a few are dead. All are gone by sundown on Tuesday, but on Wednesday, the spaceships return.

There are times of the month when the numbers of spaceships vastly increase. During full moons there is an increase due to the available light for landings. On pay weeks there is an increase due to the extra money available for fuel. I have attempted to verify the spaceship arrivals with the Federal Government, but they deny everything. Other officers working the midnight shift in my area confirmed my theory. Igor Demetrovitch, a Moscow police officer, confirmed my findings also existed in his country, and found the same denials from his government. He also confirmed an additional peak period in his country that is exactly 30 days after their potato harvest.

Bye Charlie, My Good Friend
Charlie thanks for the advice through the years. You had a wit probably because you were from PA. I met Charlie on the IRQ network way back in 95. We found out we were at Khe Sanh but at different times. I attended two Khe Sanh reunions, and kept asking him to attend. Finally in 1997, Charlie decided to attend the St Louis Reunion. Charlie always bought his family with him when he left home. When he arrived, I went to give him a hug. Holding his arms on his side, he looked at me like I was strange. That tough old Marine ex cop, hugging a man he didn't know, it was funny. When he was departing the reunion I went to shake his He gave me a big hug and a kiss on the cheek. I Loved that guy. It is a sad note when one of our own passes. Pray that he is in a better place without pain and sleepless nights. We all know when it is our time nothing can keep us for that appointment. I was one of Charlie's gun team leaders at Khe Sanh. We remained together, and left Nam at the same time. I remember him best as a caring person who took care of all his people. When we left Khe Sanh we camped at an Army supply point. As we were waiting in the chow line, one of the soldiers commented that they have been taking mortar fire during the evening hours.
Charlie remarked that would cease after they ate dinner. That night Charlie set up a night ambush, and sprung it with a LAW, followed by his shotgun. Did not take another round of mortar fire the whole time we were there.

MERRY CHRISTMAS

HAPPY NEW YEAR

HOME WAS WHERE YOU DUG IT

Publishers Comments:
In this issue you will be receiving your annual dues notice. Our dues are supposed to be paid each Dec for the next year. A lot of members did not pay dues until May or June. It is impossible for me to keep track of over 2,000 members all paying their dues at different times. I have made the cutoff period for seven months. So if you waited 7 months to pay dues you are due again this December.

If you receive a dues notice you fall within those guidelines. This does not pertain to new members who have joined this year, or those that paid in November.

Members can now pay their dues, purchase items from the PX, and pay for the reunion with a credit card. This information will be included on all the new Dues, Registration, and PX forms. You may also order by phone with a credit card by contacting our Treasurer, James Wodecki.

REUNION COMMITTEE REPORT:
The reunion planned for Mobile Alabama in June of 2006, is off to a rousing start. Utilizing lessons learned from our recent Chicago reunion, we rewrote contracts with provisions which will prevent failures that occurred with the Hotel in Chicago. The Hotel staff in Mobile, along with the City's promotional agency, are going to provide (which we feel)will be one the best reunions the Khe Sanh Veterans will experience. We have included a special layout in the center section of the magazine (Pages 38-39) detailing plans for the reunion in Mobile.

On another note, we have filed a complaint with the Better Business Bureau, against the Wyndum Hotel in Chicago, alleging many contractual violations. We are seeking monetary damages. If successful, these funds will be utilized to bring the down the cost of the Mobile Reunion.

77 Days at Khe Sanh
By
Raymond A. Milligan USMC
Vietnam April 67 – September 68

Force Reconnaissance Marines are highly trained volunteers. They are cross trained in parachuting, SCUBA, and scouting. Reconnaissance is usually performed with a team of four to eight members. They are inserted behind enemy lines to gathering intelligence. Their motto is Swift, Silent, and Deadly. June of 1967 Bravo Company, 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, "The Eyes and Ears" of the 26th Marines was assigned to patrol the area around the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Little did we know that in a few months the base would become engaged in the longest continuous battle of the Vietnam War. 77 days of constant incoming and our lines probed by the NVA. Hill 861A would be attacked and partly over run. Hill 881S would also feel the wrath of the NVA.

I arrived at Khe Sanh on 13 August 1967, after serving with 2nd Force Reconnaissance stateside. I was assigned to the 3rd Platoon Bravo. We were located along the main road not far from the PX, Post Office and chow hall. The air strip was behind the Reconnaissance area and the Scout/Sniper area was between Reconnaissance and the main ammo dump. Across the road from Reconnaissance was the Regimental Command bunker and Command Post complex.

Before the "Siege" began 3rd Reconnaissance teams ran many patrols around the Khe Sanh area. We lost our first man soon after I arrived. Between June and December, there where five Marines KIA. L/Cpl Garry Tallent was KIA on the 20th of August while his team "Sample Case 1" (2B1) attempted an insertion by a CH-46 Helicopter at (XD 904 498). Gary was hit as he exited the chopper. L/Cpl Marion Meggs team "Frostburg" (2B2) drowned on the 16th of November while his team was crossing the Rio Quan River, coming in off a company patrol. It was Meggs' last patrol which he did not have to go on due to his rotation date being so close. My team at the time of Meggs' drowning, was in route to patrol an area South of Khe Sanh along Route 9. We had our mission changed and were assigned the task of recovering his body. We recovered his body in the same spot he had fallen into the river. His body finally came to the surface after five days underwater. We had reached the site on the fourth night.

PFC Gary Stickel was KIA with Team "Seven-Up" (3B3) on 22nd December during a firefight near Hill 557 (XD 763 411), Ed Pooley was also WIA. I was the Assistant Team Leader of Team "Seven-Up".

On December 30th PFC Terry Jones and L/Cpl Thomas Tingely team "Barkwood" (1B3) were KIA in a firefight 4 KM directly west of Hill 689 (XD 761409). During the month of December, our Reconnaissance teams were sighting large groups of NVA troops moving into our area and around the base. Intelligence would tell us later that the 68th Regiment (artillery), 95C Infantry, 304th and 325th C Division's of the crack NVA regular's, were the ones we were fighting against. The 325th C had participated in the victory for the North at Dien Bien Phu.

The "Siege" started the morning of January 21, 1968 at approximately 0500 hours. One of our Reconnaissance teams on patrol observed the rockets as they came from Laos towards the Combat Base. They radioed the information just before the rounds started to land. We were violently woken from our sleep by the enormous sounds of the rockets and artillery rounds. We grabbed our gear and ran for the bunkers. Soon incoming rounds found the ammo dump which was close to Reconnaissance's area. The ammo dump took a direct hit and fifteen hundred tons of ammo blew up. All of the CS gas also blew up.

The gas then started to cover the whole base. Unfortunately I missed getting my gas mask as someone else beat me to it. It was a long night as I had to breathe using my field jacket as a filter for the gas (now I knew why they put us in the gas chamber at P.I.). We took incoming rounds all day long the first day. Parts of the runway were destroyed, buildings were on fire, and our base looked like something from a category 5 hurricane. Hootches were on fire, the mess hall was blown to bits, and live rounds from the ammo dump continued to explode.

We would get hit by incoming every day for Seventy-seven days straight. No let up. We lived in bunkers, both big and small. These bunkers held from three to as many as twenty Marines. We also had our buddies the "rats" stay with us. We had rats the size of small cats. There were thousands by the end of the Siege. A few of our men were bitten had to go to Charlie Med for a series of injections for fourteen days in a row. Every day that went by you didn't know who would be back in their bunkers that night. Bravo Reconnaissance Company would have ten men killed and close to sixty men wounded during the "Siege". After the incoming slowed down we repaired and re-enforced our bunkers. We dug a trench along the entire length of our company position.

On the first day of the Siege we still had a team out on patrol trying to find a radio that was lost in a firefight on 14 January when 2Lt. Randall Yeary's team made "contact". Both Yeary and Cpl. Richard Healy were killed in the firefight. The team that went out to recover the radio was "Team Barkwood."

On 21 January with the Marines of India Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines left hill 881S. The recon team was to slip away from the grunts and find the radio. That patrol was ambushed and two more Reconnaissance men, Cpl. Charles Bryan who would be awarded the Navy Cross for his actions on that patrol, and PFC Paul Beddoe, Jr. were both killed during the firefight.

Life was going to become very interesting over the next three months. Every day we had jets flying over dropping bombs and making firing runs just outside our lines. B-52 's dropped bombs as close as 1200 meters from our lines. We were limited to one C-Ration meal a day. Ammunition was a priority, food could wait.

We rarely showered, let alone shave. It was an adventure just trying to go to the Head! Bravo Companies mission was reconnaissance. We were the reactionary force in case an attempt was made to overrun the base. We didn't just sit around. Our C/O had us doing all types of details. We would carry the wounded and dead to the planes, fill sand bags, and cleaned up the ammo dump. We did details at the drop zone and picked up materials for our company. We were kept busy so as not to dwell on what was happening.

Eight of the "Bravo" Company Marines who died, were killed the first 13 days of the "Siege". Before it ended, we lost two more. By the middle of February we lost more than half our company.
On January 22, fifty 122mm rockets, five 120mm mortars, and twenty seven 82mm mortars hit the base. We lucked out that day and had no causalities. The next day was my 20th birthday. Several of the guys sang happy birthday, and gave me a pound cake and peaches as a gift. That was my favorite food from the C-rats. I will always remember and cherish that moment.

January 24th was a disastrous day for our company. Late in the afternoon we started to get hit again.

The bunker across the trench from me, contained 20 men. The bunker received a direct hit in the back entrance. Four Marines died instantly and 16 wounded. Those killed were HN Charles Miller, L/Cpl Francis Popowitz, L/Cpl Juan Antonio Rosa, and L/Cpl Gary David Scribner. When the round went off, one of our men (nicknamed Elvis) dove into my bunker. I can still hear him scream today. I just started rocking back and forth hoping this madness would end.

After the men were taken to Charlie Med we had to clean up the bunker. This was the worst time of my life. Body parts were all over the place. I remember picking up a boot of somebody. I just put it down and stopped for awhile. We finally finished our task. I hoped that I would not have to deal with something like that again, but that would not be the case. Things were going okay for us until the 28.th L/Cpl Thomas William Hollis was on perimeter duty, and stuck his head out of the bunker. He was struck in the head by a piece of Shrapnel and killed.

30 January turned out to be very depressing for many of us, especially me. My two mentors and friends would be hit by an incoming artillery round. L/Cpl Timothy Michael Barmer and L/Cpl James Kevin McCann. Barmer was killed immediately and McCann would die of his wounds February 3RD while on the USS Hope. I ran several patrols with both before moving to Assistant Team Leader of 3B3. They taught me every-thing they could think of to help me survive.

Tim died in the arms of one of our Corpsman. Tim was trying to push the others into the bunker when the round hit. The time was 1650 hours. Most of us were outside our bunkers eating or making the best meal we could. Tim and Mac were no more then fifteen yards away from me. Their bunker ran parallel to the main road. I had just said hi to them when the round hit. The next thing I knew I was thrown back into my bunker from the blast. I never got to see them again.

On the 1st of February I made a fast dash to the first airplane that could land. I was going to Hawaii for R&R. One week break from death and destruction. Planes did not land very often at Khe Sanh. Once they did you could count a few seconds and mortar rounds would start to come in. If you didn't make the plane you didn't get to go. No one was going to call a taxi for you. Luck was on my side that day as I made it out.

I returned on the 7th of February and found out no one from our company had been killed. A few days later the Commanding Officer needed someone with a driver's license to be company driver. I did not know that the CO wanted someone with a military driver's license. He never asked to see one, and I didn't volunteer to show one. I ended up becoming the company driver with my own beat up jeep I didn't have to fill sandbags anymore. I did have to drive to the drop zone to pick up supplies and take guys to Charlie Med when needed.

Later on I would regret being in the jeep. In late February I was waiting for our S/Sgt to finish some business in another part of the base. I heard two rounds going off in the background. As I started to get out of the jeep I found myself flying through the air. When I landed I could not see anything, and I remembered saying to myself, being killed was easy. But lucky me, I escaped death again. I had a concussion and punctured eardrums, and a hell of a headache. The jeep was peppered with shrapnel and my helmet had a piece in it.

Except for McCann dying on 3 February, we would not have another death until 22 March when PFC Carl Lyons was killed while working at the ammo dump. On 25 February thirty men from Bravo Company 1/26 went out on what was supposed to be a line of sight patrol. Several NVA were observed and pursued. The men ran right into an ambush. Twenty-seven were killed, two others would make it back to the base severely wounded and one wounded Marine was captured. He would be released at the end of our involvement in Vietnam. This happened just east of our location. The bodies had to stay until 25 March. Marines from Bravo Company went out to recovery the bodies. Recon Marines took over their position. A firefight ensued, and eleven more Marines from "Bravo" Company were killed. They still managed to recover several bodies. The rest of the men would be recovered on 6th April by Delta Company 1/26.

By now we were all pretty numb about what was going on. We had the thousand-yard stare that you read about in war stories. All of us were dirty, sinking, and hungry. Most of hoped the NVA would attack. It was very frustrating to just wait for something to happen. Day in and day out incoming would land all over. One day in March we took over 1300 rounds of incoming. That was the day that General Westmoreland was told he was going home. As the time passed on we just went through the motions.

As April approached ,the incoming slowed to a few hundred a day. Our company would suffer one more casualty. On April 8th HN Richard Smith, one our corpsmen, died from an accidental fire. Smith was pouring high octane fuel in the ditches to help burn out the rats. The fuel got all over him and he caught fire. He went running through our area and was tackled by a Marine. The fire was put out but he died from his injuries. I had been on many patrols with him, and knew him well.

In April, Bravo Third Recon left Khe Sanh for Quang Tri. We would regroup and start running patrols again. Not much happened to our company after Khe Sanh. A few more would be wounded in a fire fight in July. My tour of duty ended on September 1, 1968 and I headed home. That was the best flight of my life. I ended up in a guard company in Washington DC area. I was discharged in April of 69. After being discharged I joined my local police force in June. I started as a Patrolman and moved through the ranks, retiring as Chief of Police in October 1995.

Villagers at the Gate

By Craig W. Tourte

(Please forgive the accuracy of this story as to time frame; this evacuation may have occurred just before the Siege started. I don't think we would have walked the Vietnamese to the airfield and onto an airplane if incoming rounds were landing).

I had been at the Khe Sanh Combat Base since the early part of August 1967. Any contact I had with indigenous people was with the local Montagnard tribe. A strange looking little people by Western standards, elf like in appearance. They wore loincloths and were dark skinned with protruding bellies developed from parasites in their intestines. If you passed one on the road they were hard to spot if standing off to the side. I had no real contact with the Vietnamese and don't recall having seen any subsequent to my arrival by convoy from Dong Ha.

In January 1968 the NVA were coming and the local Vietnamese knew it. "Khe Sanh Village was lost." "More than 1,000 terrified Vietnamese Civilians had arrived at the gates of the Combat Base." "...Madeleine Poliane was there too, with her children...They pleaded to be let in, but Lownds would only let a very few through the gates; he feared the introduction of a Trojan horse into his battered fortress." (The End of the Line by Robert Pisor.)

I had never seen real Vietnamese civilians before, and I certainly hadn't expected to see so many at one time when I did. I had guarded the front gate of the base many times. There was the occasional, yet minimal amount of American military traffic coming and going during the daylight hours, but never any Vietnamese of any sort. Here now, all of a sudden where hundreds of them. Their eyes were hollow and their faces were filled with fright. I thought at the time they were more fearful of us than the approaching NVA. As a young Marine and one who had few contacts with any Vietnamese, I was concerned that any one of them could have a grenade concealed just waiting for the chance to give it a little toss in my direction. (As I stood in front of the group of Vietnamese, and just before I stepped aside to let them pass, I took the two photographs that accompany this article).

We divided them up into small groups and walked with them from the main gate to the airfield to ensure they didn't wonder off. The Vietnamese had all they could carry and looked like refugees in those old World War II movies. Marines walking on each side of the road accompanying them to the airfield. Their pace was brisk and hurried, almost a run, a kind of panic, with little conversation amongst them. A C-130 was waiting for our arrival at the airfield, with the rear ramp in the down position and the propellers turning. I walked with the Vietnamese up into the airplane, which had no additional cargo in its belly. The Vietnamese filled up the huge space inside, sitting on the floor all bunched together. There were lots of women, children and older men, with a few younger men interspersed amongst them wearing partial uniform clothing, which peaked my attention.

I don't recall if we looked through their belongings for weapons or explosives, but I remember at the time thinking it sure would not take much to bring this airplane down if any were armed. I was uncomfortable and apprehensive being with them ,and not liking the enclosed quarters of the airplane having little chance of escape should anything happen. They all hurried inside, where ropes or lines had been stung low across the fuselage every so many feet for the occupants to hold during the flight. It appeared the airplane crew had gone through this routine before. I backed down the ramp out of the airplane and was glad to be away from the Vietnamese who, I knew little about and was highly suspicious of.

I don't remember how many Vietnamese we met at the front gate that day, or how many trips we made to the airfield, but I recall we sure squeezed them into that airplane. As I look at the photographs now, I can see more clearly the terror on each face. Perhaps even expression of a greater terror than I was able to see, those many years ago.

The irony of this of course, is that the Vietnamese sought protection at an American Marine Base and left on an American airplane. Left their homes, fled from their own people, fled to safety while we Americans stayed behind to fight in a long and bloody battle, a Siege that lasted 77 days.

Flame Thrower at Khe Sanh

By Craig W. Tourte

I remember as a kid watching those old grainy newsreels of the Pacific Island campaigns during World War II. The images of the Marines rushing the beach and heading up into the jungle to fight the Japanese. The Pacific Islands were filled with hiding places, including pill boxes, bunkers, natural caves and those dug out by the occupiers. By all visual accounts they were tough battles, the Marines employing grenades and flame throwers to drive and burn the enemy from their fortifications.

In 1967 those battles of World War II in the early forties seemed quite distant to a young private heading to a place I never heard of before. A strange country and war I did not understand and a people I didn't particular care about. I just knew it was a war; an adventure for me and in the Marines was where I wanted to be.

It was a long dusty convoy from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh that August morning. I was happy to be leaving Dong Ha, we had been mortared and rocketed during our short stay, and the facilities they housed us in were above ground. When we heard incoming we'd run outside into the filthy trench that ran alongside our above ground wooden barracks. Of course every sound of a boom was incoming to us, and any loud bang would get us all running, it was just miserable.

As our convoy emerged from the jungle west bound on highway 9, I observed the base and surrounding mountains as we skirted the south end of Khe Sanh Combat Base which then turned north onto the lead in road towards the base. When we entered the main gate we made an immediate right, continued on for approximately one hundred meters then stopped. This base and these mountains were to be my home for the next eight months.

We had entered Vietnam just a few days before, arriving by an LST ship from Okinawa. Landing and disembarking at Cue Viet where we dug into the sand and stayed a few days, drawing mortar fire at night. We continued up the Cue Viet River via small LSU's and into a Dong Ha, which was under a substantial mortar and rocket attack. I didn't get a good look at the defenses at Dong Ha and we didn't have any at Cue Viet, so my understanding of what a base defense should look like was limited.

As I looked out towards the south end of Khe Sanh, I observed a single strand of concertina wire over grown with weeds. There were a few fighting holes here and there, but nothing that I imagined would have stopped an aggressive attack by a determined enemy.

As the days and nights accumulated and I became more aware of my surroundings and understanding of the base and the immediate area before me, I spent some time inspecting the wire in front of my position. It consisted of one strand of concertina wire and in front of that a row or two of tangle foot wire, all overgrown with weeds. There was a dead tree stump some seventy-five meters to the front, which at night took on the appearance of a man standing in an upright position. (Shot at numerous times by new Marines who mistook the tree for an enemy).

The hill fights had recently ended, and what was left of the Marines units were exhausted and worn out from the recent long battles. Those few who remained showed us how to dig trenches and fighting holes, fill sandbags, how to place the Claymore mines out in front amongst the wire, and how to manufacture hell boxes for the Claymore ignition wires. They reminded us to check the mines several times during the night because the NVA would turn them around with the front facing toward us. They told us how important it was to go out and bring the Claymores in during the day so the enemy could not see where you had placed them the night before.

Those who were left and had endured so much in the hills, were not immediately concerned about improving the defenses at Khe Sanh. The grass under the wire and out into the fields of fire was several feet high. I had to stand up and look out into the wire to see anything at all, and during the night any observation to the front ground area was impossible.

I don't think I really expected to see a flame thrower in real life. I had no recall of seeing one in ITR nor did I hear the name flame thrower ever mentioned in any training class. I thought it was an ancient weapon used so long ago in World War I and II, and was no longer part of the modern weapons employed by Marines. I must have been digging (as I always seemed to be doing) when I saw two Marines walk into the concertina wire in front of me. One clearly had two cylinders on his back. I immediately knew that he was carrying a flame thrower. I knew a little about the flame thrower, that you could mix a variety of liquid fuels and that fuel was propelled by compressed gas. I also knew that as the fuel left the gun of the flame thrower, it was ignited at the tip some way. I was not aware that the gunner could just spray the fuel without first igniting the fuel.

As one Marine stood by, the second Marine with the flame thrower ignited the tip of the gun and propelled the lit fuel into the weeds. I was close enough to feel the heat and was immediately impressed. The Marine with the flame thrower then stopped the spray and stepped back for a few seconds, he then just sprayed the area under the concertina with the raw fuel, which was ignited by the already burning weeds and grasses. This went on for a few minutes and then it was over and they left. I watched as the weeds burned and knew that I never wanted to be on the working end of a flame thrower. It was the first and last time I had ever seen a flame thrower in action. I took a picture of that event, but missed the Marine with the flame thrower and was only able to get the stream of raw fuel and burning weeds.

I don't have any recall of weeds continuing to grow under the wire or in the field after that incident. I remember running LP's out into that area which, was pretty lonely and dark. I never shot at the lone dead tree and I don't think I even thought about why nothing was growing out in that field or under the wire where just several months before, grass and weeds were two feet high. I think Agent Orange may have taken care of the native growth and eventually, errant incoming. And that dead tree stuck all by itself seventy-five yards away, the one that looked like a man standing in the upright position, it became a victim of the gunners from North Vietnam, they must have had the same illusion we did.

After The Siege

By Craig W. Tourte

The Khe Sanh plateau was a beautiful spot. It was lush and green, the mountains were a kind of blue color, deep and dark, one could even describe them as breathtaking in their appearance. I arrived at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh sometime in late July or early August 1967. The plateau had a certain feel about it, I could sense there was something about the place but I just didn't know what it was. I was unaware of the brutal hill fights that had occurred just a few months before my arrival but knew there were ongoing small unit skirmished with the NVA. As a young man not particularly taken with history, I had no knowledge of a similar place located in North Vietnam by the name of Dien Bien Phu and the similarities of the circumstance of Khe Sanh escaped me.

Others have spoken about what a nice place Khe Sanh was before the Siege, how there was "nothing going on," but we who were on the base those early months, those of us who were engaged in the daily grind of preparing the defenses, cooking the meals, hauling the water, ammo and other supplies, digging the trenches, filling the sandbags, stringing the concertina wire, knew different. Those of us who had endured the rain and fog, stood guard duty in the trenches knew.

Those of us who arrived during those early months, saw the line of body bags on the tarmac after the ambush in the hills. The men up in the hills on 881, 861, 950, and the others that surrounded that plateau all knew. All of us who were there, even those involved in the smallest of mundane everyday tasks knew. We all knew because we could feel it, smell it, and most of all sense it. You can't exactly explain that sense thing, but one knows what it is when that cold chill runs down the back of your spine. We knew something was about to happen, we just didn't know when or for how long.

The only thing that changed for us on January 21, 1968, was that now all of those strange feeling, we had experienced, that indescribable sense we had, became obvious. We were so used to the constant alert, tension and vigilance, that little escaped our five senses. Now we understood why we had all felt and yes, and even acted the way we did. For those of us who survived that 77 day Siege and saw it through to the end, our nerves where pretty much shot. I think for the most part, we were all in shock for months and even years afterwards.

Then it was over, we packed up and left the Khe Sanh plateau, just like that. No days or months of relaxation, no ease into it, no stand down, just packed up what little we had left that hadn't been shot, rocketed, mortared, hit by heavy artillery, or eaten by rats. We literally hopped on a truck and drove away, heading for the province of Quang Tri. After dismounting the convoy from Khe Sanh somewhere in Quang Tri, I said goodbye to Tom Horchler as he and some of the others I had been with for so long, drove away in their trucks. We found ourselves surrounded by Marines in new green uniforms and weapons at the ready; you would have thought we were prisoners of war.

I still can't understand what that was about. They sort of guarded us while we were afforded the luxury of hot showers and some chow. They all had this strange look on their faces and appeared to be apprehensive of our presence. It might have been that those troops had just never seen Marines in what I am sure looked to them like red uniforms (because of the red clay at Khe Sanh). I don't recall if we had a change of clean clothes but I remember I quickly found myself guarding some kind of fuel dump or tower out in the middle of nowhere, it was the best duty I had in Vietnam.

I was used to the rice fields of Northern California and we were right in the middle of them. I took a bath a couple of times a day in the few inches of water flooding the fields by just striping down and letting the warm water run over my body, it was my own private bath and swimming pond, no incoming and I didn't mind the mosquitoes at all, having grown up with mosquitoes along with the heat and humidity.

There was a grunt unit or other unit of some kind less than 1,000 meters from us on our right on a finger of land jutting out into the rice field. It seemed that all night long they would fire to their front, automatic weapons and rifles with little to no fire control. You would have thought they were constantly getting probed or were in a firefight but there were no incoming rounds towards them, only their outgoing. We would sit up on top of the trench line watching all of the outgoing firing and looking for the incoming rounds of the enemy that would identify their position, but it never came.

There was no fog, it was warm and we could hear the frogs and bugs out in the fields in front of our location. There was no sound of splashing water, no dead silence, no sign of the enemy or that electric, tense feeling like we'd had as we stood all night long in the trenches behind the wire at Khe Sanh waiting for the enemy we all knew were there. I just could not figure that other unit out; they must have been a new grunt or REMF unit of some kind. Another guy and I climbed over the trench and walked about 100 or so meters in the dark out into the field, but there was nothing, and nothing that we could make out over in front of the other unit. We figured they were all just a little jumpy. They must have had lots of ammunition and an inexperienced leadership, or perhaps they just were able to see or even sense, what we could not.

It was great duty and I wanted to stay near the warm running water, watching the farmers work in their fields during the day and ready to take on any comers during the night. In fact, after those long months at Khe Sanh absorbing the thousands of rounds of incoming, we were kind looking forward to a little pay back, but they never came to us; maybe the NVA and VC were just confused by our red uniforms.

One day a jeep arrived and a sergeant told me that my cousin had been killed in an automobile accident back home and he asked me if I wanted to go home for the funeral, of course I said yes and it took me less than 5 minutes to saddle my gear and hop onto the jeep. The next thing I remember I found myself at an airfield and on a damaged C-123 heading for Da Nang to be repaired. I didn't say goodbye to anyone or get any addresses or telephone numbers from those I had endured so much with, in a blink of an eye I was gone

My tour in Vietnam was about up anyway, and my enlistment in the Corps was coming to an end. I knew I was not coming back as a volunteer, in fact I remember having the distinct feeling that God was telling me not to come back. I never did make my cousins funeral and I did not return to Vietnam. I have thought about those few I left behind so many years ago, those I endured so much hardship with. I have a certain amount of guilt for leaving them. Most of us arrived in Vietnam about the same time, so I knew those who had survived with me were not far behind. During the first few years I was home, I'd occasionally watch the war being played over and over on the television, and just being glad I made it home alive. I had known so many who had not. But I also remembered that voice someplace in the back of my mind telling me not to return. Unfortunately for most of us, we can never leave that war behind and the Siege at Khe Sanh will always be with us.

My M-14

By Craig W. Tourte

I had been introduced to the M-14 Rifle in boot camp while at MCRD San Diego (1966 Platoon 1145). As the Marine Corps Rifle Creed states, "This is my rifle. There are many like it, but this one is mine. My rifle is my best friend, it is my life..." At the time I didn't realize how familiar I would eventually become with that weapon. It was a rough, heavy, and at times a punishing beast, but I grew to love its simplicity and especially the way it fired. I had been a pretty good shot with a shotgun and rifle even before I volunteered for the Marine Corps. I had a real fondness for shooting a variety of weapons that we young men carried around in our pickup trucks in the farm country of Northern California. I easily qualified as an expert on the rifle range at Camp Pendleton.

Of particular emphasis in boot camp was the manipulation, assembly, disassembly, care and cleaning of the M-14 Rifle. How many times did I hear, "...The M-14 7.62mm rifle is a magazine-fed, gas operated, shoulder weapon..." I cleaned that rifle so many times it became tedious and boring in its redundancy. As much as I distained the riggers of discipline in boot camp, I found the Infantry Training Regiment (ITR) after book camp to be exactly what I was looking for in the Corps. I don't recall if it was in ITR or Staging Company for Vietnam, that we were exposed to a variety of weapons and allowed the opportunity to fire them. I was assigned a Browning Automatic Rifle (BAR) for a couple of days. I loved the power of that weapon even though the magazine held only 20 rounds. It weighed a ton and taxed all of my strength carrying it around the hills of Pendleton. I could put a lot of rounds out into a fairly tight group, while others could not hit the side of a barn with it.

I flew to Okinawa from El Toro Marine Corps Base in California. I don't recall when I was issued my M-14; it may have been sometime while I was in Okinawa or on the Landing Ship Tank (LST) we took from Okinawa to Vietnam, sometime in late July or early August 1967. We all had selectors (or automatic fire) on our M-14's but my M-14 also had a folding bipod attached to the gas cylinder located just below the barrel. This addition added several more pounds to the already heavy, but durable weapon. It was necessary to depress a series of push buttons to release each leg to the vertical position, and then to level each leg. It was a cumbersome affair and changed the appearance of the barrel. At first glance it did not resemble the M-14 we had spent so many hours training with.

After two weeks at sea, we made a short 36-hour stop in Da Nang harbor to unload supplies, anchoring in the harbor. It was dark , and I was on top of the deck looking out over the water, trying to escape the heat and stifling air of the decks below. Marines were housed six high on stretched canvas racks with just a few inches between each bunk. A sailor on guard duty suddenly walked over to where I was standing and said, "Did you see that?" I asked him what he as talking about, and he told me that he had seen air bubbles coming up from the water like there was a driver swimming under the ship. I didn't know what he was talking about and just kind of shrugged my shoulders when he grabbed his radio and told whomever he was talking to that he had seen bubbles from a diver and that the Marine he was standing with had also seen them. He then asked permission to toss a grenade over the side. It became kind of a big deal with all sorts of Navy personnel running over to the side to take a look. I left not wanting to become involved in the increasing panic of the young sailor and offi-

We sailed north to Cua Viet harbor where we disembarked from the LST. The scene was right out of an old WW II movie, with the bow of the ship opening up with trucks, some pulling wheeled artillery while driving out of the ship. We traveled a short distance and settled someplace near the beach. I dug my first of many foxholes in Vietnam in the sandy beach of Cua Viet, where we stayed for several days.

I'm not exactly sure when we received our first incoming round, but it seemed like it was within hours of our arrival. The explosion was not that close to us, but at the time it certainly was a freighting experience. An Amtrak was traveling along the beach not far from our location when it was hit by a Rocket Propelled Grenade (RPG) or ran over a land mine. They were asking for volunteers to respond but although several of us were prepared to go, it was apparently decided they did not need the assistance of some green newly arrived unit.

The sand was a constant problem, seeming to get into everything. It was difficult to walk in, cold in the evening and hot in the burning sun of the day, it got into our food, packs, clothes, and weapons. We saddled up all of our gear and headed for the mouth of the Cua Viet River to start our journey west to Dong Ha. We boarded a small Landing Ship Utility (LSU) for our cruise to Dong Ha. It was getting dark and we had been sailing for some time, passing small villages and huts dotting the rice fields along the riverbanks.

Suddenly rounds were passing over our heads like so many bees, followed by the report of rifle fire. I looked out over the side of the small vessel and observed the flash of small arms fire coming from a small hut several hundreds meters out into a rice field. I had a magazine locked into my weapon, pulled the bolt back to charge a round into the receiver, but when I released the bolt the round stuck half way into the chamber of the barrel, fouled by fine grains of sand. I sat down on the deck and completely field stripped my weapon, removing the cleaning rode from the rear butt plate and locating a toothbrush I had used for cleaning. By the time I got the round removed, the sand from the receiver, barrel, chamber, magazine, and got the weapon reassembled, our firefight was over.

I was disappointed and embarrassed, but a whole lot smarter and thankful for those many hours in boot camp I had spent dissembling and assembling weapons. I realized that while the weapon was clean, I had failed to empty each magazine and clean each round of the fine grains of sand that had attached themselves to the rounds and inside of the magazine wall.

From Dong Ha we convoyed west on highway 9 to the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. I don't recall when I was first introduced to the M16A1, as not being a grunt unit, we continued carrying the M-14 which was fine with me. I had heard about the failure of the M-16 and the distained Marines who were issued this weapon who had repeatedly voiced about the failure rate. There was some talk about the round making a big hole when it hit flesh, because the round actually tumbled in the air during flight.

That just did not make sense to me and I thought those who said that, just did not know how bullets functioned in flight. I don't think I really thought much about the M-16 until some members of Delta Platoon came back from recovering the bodies and equipment of what was left of the remains of Bravo Platoon "Ghost Patrol." I talked to one of the Marines carrying two of the black plastic M-16's who said they were made by "Mattel Toys" (Pieces of junk) There was not many left of them, and I think some black plastic ones even melted. No Marine I talked to, had ever referred to the M-14 like this.

I had spent some time talking to Marines who had been carrying around the M-16. At Khe Sanh we carried our weapons everywhere we went. One Marine even had this light bipod for his M-16 that supported the weapon under the barrel, it weighed almost nothing. I borrowed someone's M-14 and stuck the M-16 bipod under the barrel of the M-14 and it worked perfectly. All this time I had been carrying this big old heavy bipod attached to my M-14 and this little, light M-16 bipod worked just as well, and even better, because of it's lighter weight and ease of placement.

When I left Vietnam after my tour, I took my rifle with me to Okinawa. I was ushered into a small room where everything was removed from me, but worst of all, my rifle was taken away. I had carried that M-14 for a long time and it had been good to me, I trusted it and we had grown and experienced much together. We were together constantly; slept with me, being my rifle was my constant companion. I knew it would be there for me; as long as I took care it, it would take care of me. I know there were many like it, but that rifle was mine, it was my best friend and at times, it was my life.

Just Another Quiet Recon Patrol!

By Cpl Bob Partain

The eyes of the slim, 20-year-old Marine scanned the hillside as the UH-IE (Huey) gunship carrying his reconnaissance team slipping into the valley below. For Cpl. Sandy R. Reid, the most decorated man in the 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, this was his 23rd recon patrol. "Let's go!" ordered Reid, even before the helicopter had time to touch the ground. Five Marines and one Navy corpsman were out of the Huey and running through the tall elephant grass, before the pilot had time to turn around and check his passengers. The gun ships that had escorted the reconnaissance Marines to a jungle valley just south of the Demi-litarized Zone, made a few wide, lazy circles to make sure the team wasn't receiving fire and then whirled out of sight.

The team was on its own. After establishing radio communication with a relay station, Reid, a Khe Sanh Purple Heart winner, led his Marines to an area which would provide a better hiding place. The team moved into thick jungle undergrowth. They stood in a 360 degree circle watching and listening, when PFC Ruben Zapata, the team's point man, noticed the first indication of enemy activity in their RZ (recon zone). The smell of smoke from a small fire was blowing from within the jungle. "We can't afford to check out the smoke down here, we've got to find out what's above us first," Reid told his assistant patrol leader, Lance Cpl. James Consaul, as he called in a situation report.

They silently worked their way up the steep mountain, pushing aside the bushes and thorn trees and then carefully replacing them so no trail was left for the enemy to follow. The team reached the top of the mountain and stopped for a rest when cigarette smoke and Vietnamese voices made the recon Marines freeze with their rifles at the ready. Three North Vietnamese Army soldiers were moving down a small trail not more than 25 meters away. Wanting to recon the area further, Reid, holder of a Silver Star and Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry, let them pass without giving the word to ambush the unsuspecting enemy. The Marines watched the three NVA with their weapons trained on them till they were out of sight.

The next day passed slowly for the Marines as they searched for enemy trails and looked for additional signs of activity. While on watch the third night, PFC Johnny L. Hood received a report from the teams radio relay point that a large enemy force was headed toward the team's position. After being informed of the report, Reid woke up Consaul. The two sat under a poncho liner and studied their map with a tiny penlight. "If they continue their line of approach, they should go through the valley below," Reid told Consaul, as they scrutinized the map. "And if they go where the trails indicate, we might get some artillery practice tomorrow", commented Consaul as he flicked off the light.

The next day the Marines sat hidden in the thick jungle and watched the valley below for signs of the enemy. But none came. After a day of seeing nothing, they debated about moving to another position. "They might have stopped and hidden for the day," commented Lance Cpl. Glen E. Patterson, as he looked down into the thick jungle. They decided to watch the valley for one more day before moving to another position. The Marines were awakened the next morning with their daily malaria pill, presented personally by their corpsman, Hospital man Duane C. Stinke.

They ate their "long rations" for breakfast and then resumed their observation of the valley below. suddenly, sounds from the valley broke the long silence that had dominated their vigil. The sounds of saws cutting bamboo and other sounds of construction, soon told the Marines that the enemy had moved into the valley to build a base camp. Reid plotted the enemy position, made a report of the NVA activity below, and requested an artillery mission. Within minutes, 105 mm artillery rounds fired from a fire support base assigned to cover Reid's team, which found their mark in the valley. The hillside echoed with the sounds of exploding artillery shells as 72 rounds hit on the enemy position. Reid knew from experience that if anyone was left alive down there, they would come looking for the team. All he wanted to do was get out of the zone.

He had accomplished his mission. He radioed and asked when they were going to be extracted. He was told that the team was scheduled for pick-up the next morning. The Marines found a good defensive position (harbor site) and decided to stay there until next morning when they would move to their pre designated pick-up zone. At first light, they carefully moved down the mountain and then hid in the bushes to wait for the helicopters. They waited for the sounds of approaching helicopters, but none came. Instead came the sounds of heavy rain which continued till mid--afternoon. Suddenly the rain stopped, and shortly afterwards helicopters could be heard in the distance. Patterson switched his radio frequency to the pilot's, and confirmed the Marines' hopes that the 'copters were heading for them.

The recon team waited until the pilots had seen them and then ran for the landing zone just as a CH-46 transport helicopter settled down to pick them up. They scrambled aboard and the helicopter headed home. For Reid it was another completed mission - his 23rd. "A routine mission," said Reid, as he listened to the drone of the helicopter engines taking them back to their home base camp. He hoped that his 24th would be just as easy.

Growl No More

By SGT. BOB MORRIS

A man-eating tiger was killed by members of a small recon patrol when the 400 pound cat attacked a 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion Marine in the northwestern corner of South Vietnam. The attacked Marine survived.

The six-man recon team were on an observation mission near Fire Support Base Alpine, about six miles east of the Laotian Border, when it encountered the tiger. The team had completed its assigned mission and was waiting to be helilifted from the area, when the incident occurred. Bad weather conditions had prevented their immediate extraction and the team had posted a two-man radio watch while the others settled down to sleep.

The tiger struck swiftly and silently. "Suddenly I heard somebody scream," said PFC Thomas E. Shainline, "then somebody else was yelling, it's a tiger, it's a tiger! PFC Roy Regan, who had been sleeping next to the victim recalled, "I jumped up and saw the tiger with his mouth around my partner. All I could think about was to get the tiger away from him. I jumped at the tiger and the cat jerked his head and jumped into a bomb crater 10 meters away, still holding his prey."

The Marines quickly followed the tiger to the crater and opened fire on the attacking beast. They could not be sure which one of them actually killed the tiger, since they all fired at it. Once hit, the tiger released his prey and the man staggered out of the bomb crater." He looked dazed and he asked what happened," recalled PFC Maurice M. Howell. The injured Marine was immediately given first aid treatment and a medical evacuation helicopter was called.

In minutes, a Marine CH-46 helicopter arrived to pick-up the injured Marine, the rest of the team, and the dead tiger. The injured Marine was rushed to the 3rd Medical Battalion hospital at Quang Tri, suffering from lacerations and bites on the neck. The tiger, measuring at least nine feet from head to tail was transported to the 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion headquarters.

After examining the huge beast, Major General Raymond G. Davis, commanding general, 3rd Marine Division, and Assistant Division Commander, Brigadier General Robert B. Carney, Jr., congratulated the reconnaissance team for killing the animal. It is believed to be the same animal that killed a Marine earlier in the vicinity of Fire Support Base Alpine.

Also on hand to examine the beast, now very still and hanging from a ten foot scaffold, was Phan Van Sang, a professional Vietnamese tiger hunter, who had participated in the tiger hunt, organized following the first tiger incident six weeks before.

Sang told the Marines that he had killed five tigers in his 20 years of hunting, but that he had never seen one as large as that man-eating cat. He expressed the belief that the tiger might very well be the same cat that attacked the other Marine. He explained that large cats usually work only in pairs and tend to hunt in the same area.

For the recon team, it was a memorable experience, marred only by the injury to one of its members. But as they looked at the strung-up 400 pound man eater, they knew that this tiger would never attack another Marine.

BOOK REVIEW

Do we need another book about the Vietnam War? Visit your nearest large retail bookstore and stand in front of the military history section. You will find books about the Vietnam War written by snipers, chaplains, and long-range patrol leaders, as well as by platoon, company, battalion, regiment, and even division commanders. The media is well represented with views ranging from strident hawks to malcontent doves.

With this vast selection, should you be interested in Voices of Courage: The Battle for Khe Sanh, Vietnam—the latest volume about Vietnam? The answer is a strong and unequivocal yes. Why such a robust recommendation? The coauthors have strong credentials. Ronald J. Drez served in Vietnam as a Marine. He has written several historical books, some while working with the late Stephen Ambrose. His coauthor, Douglas Brinkley, has written more than a dozen books, including his recent The Boys of Pointe du Hoc: Ronald Reagan, D-Day, and the U.S. Army Second Ranger Battalion (William Morrow, 2005).

The book's structure works extremely well. Drez and Brinkley carefully set the stage for the major battle by providing a concise overview of previous enemy contacts in and around Khe Sanh.

For months before the battle started, North Vietnamese battalions streamed down the Ho Chi Minh trail, setting the stage for a critical battle at Khe Sanh. The authors skillfully weave information extracted from North Vietnamese Army (NVA) archives. Resolution 13, issued earlier by Ho Chi Minh is described. He sets forth a goal of killing 10,000 Americans in a major battle, causing them to depart Vietnam. These forces, led by General Vo Nguyen Giap, killed and captured more than 10,000 French soldiers at Dien Bien Phu. The French departed shortly thereafter. And who was to lead the NVA during the battle for Khe Sanh? It would be none other than General Vo Nguyen Giap.

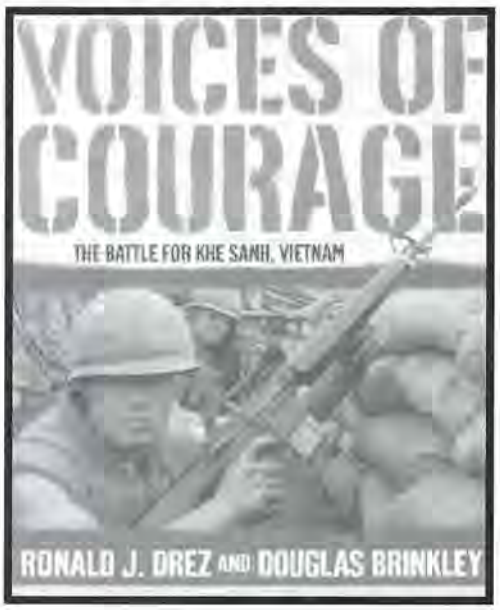
The media frequently compared Dien Bien Phu and Khe Sanh. The authors point out that such comparisons are not valid. Dien Bien Phu was 100 miles from the nearest French forces. Khe Sanh was only 10 miles from significant support. The French had about 100 aircraft. Marines at Khe Sanh could count on deadly Marine close air support, skillfully employed by forward air controllers on the ground, alongside infantry companies. U.S. Air Force B–52 bombers flew missions from Okinawa, Guam, and U-Tapao, Thailand.

If the Marines had a secret weapon the title would go to Marine Capt Mizra M. Baig, who was the target information officer. The Air Force dropped state-of-the-art sensors around Khe Sanh and the hill positions, concentrating on known and suspected avenues of approach. Capt Biag was so adept at interpreting and using the readouts from these sensors that the authors refer to him as "a hired assassin."

Heroes at Khe Sanh were numerous. The authors devote significant space to the gallant efforts of the rifle companies defending Hills 861 and 881 South, particularly the leadership of Capt Bill Dabney, who commanded Company I, 3d Battalion, 26th Marines (I/3/26). Marine helicopter pilots and crewmen were conspicuous in their gallant performance day in and day out. They flew countless missions to the hill positions as well as the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Enemy troops had landing zones (LZs) on each hill zeroed in. Each helicopter received incoming mortar rounds, and even rocket propelled grenades could reach the LZs. Helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft landing at the base had additional threats, to include accurate artillery fire.

The selection of photographs and their placement throughout the book are particularly effective. The maps and sketches are kept to a minimum and are simple, clear, and easy to understand. The illustrations in the book go well with the authors' narrative. They have taken a sometimes—complex battle, and laid it out so it becomes very understandable to the reader.

To summarize, this book is extremely well researched, superbly crafted, and filled with graphic details of pitched battles. It portrays the daily heroism, endurance, and tenacity, displayed by a gallant force of Marines and corpsmen, supported by the Air Force in a prolonged conflict against a dedicated and determined enemy. In the words of Drez and Brinkley, "This book is an attempt to set things straight, and is dedicated to all who fought in our nation's longest, most controversial war, and never lost a battle."



LtCol Wilkinson enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1948, was commissioned in 1951, and fought in Korea and Vietnam. He commanded 1/26 at Khe Sanh. On retirement from the Marine Corps he spent 26 years with Merrill Lynch as senior resident vice manager

OUR KHE SANH ARCHIVES FIND A PERMANENT HOME

By Tom Eichler

With the publication of Battalion of Kings, Chaplain Ray William Stubbe has donated all of his Khe Sanh records and memorabilia, to the Wisconsin State Veterans Museum in Madison, Wisconsin. This includes some 475 books pertaining to what happened at Khe Sanh, about 90 linear feet of files, five boxes of microfilms, over 2,000 cassettes of interviews, several thousand still photographs, several dozen VHS tapes, and a room-full of artifacts sent home from Khe Sanh. The Wisconsin State Veterans Museum includes holdings dating from the Revolutionary War but is especially strong in materials dating from the Civil War to the present. There on staff are about half a dozen librarians, a like number of archivists, and a curator. (Read Ray's Speech on Pages 55-61)

The hundreds of Khe Sanh vets who contributed memoirs, diaries, letters of information, photographs, artifacts, etc., to Chaplain Stubbe may now rest assured that these are safe from damage or destruction by fire, water, theft, or consignment to a land-fill (should Ray suddenly die or become seriously ill and someone had to clean out his house). These materials will not be immediately open to the public, thus guarding privacy concerns, but will be preserved for future historians many decades from now, who wish to gain an accurate picture of our Khe Sanh experience. This collection is undoubtedly the most complete collection of information concerning Khe Sanh that exists, including not only personal accounts, but official documentation from the Department of Defense, all branches of the military service, CIA, DIA, NSA, and the President Johnson Presidential library. About 110,000 pages of documentation pertaining to Khe Sanh have been microfilmed on archival film which should last at least 300 years under suitable climate control, and sets of these films have been deposited with various archives.

Chaplain Stubbe plans to prepare two more books: a collection of quality photographs from Khe Sanh, the other being a collection of translations of official (and in many cases, classified Secret) histories of what happened at Khe Sanh which have been recently translated, including numerous tactical maps, tables, and details that provide "the other side" of what happened at Khe Sanh.

The 40th anniversary of the siege battle at Khe Sanh will happen ,in about two years (2008), a time traditionally for doing special commemorative events (as with the D-Day 40th anniversary). Then, just a decade later-and for us who are getting older, ten years passes very quickly!-we will have the 50th anniversary. Since it takes several years of "lead time" to get some things done, the time to plan is NOW. (Possible suggestions might be a performance of special symphonic musical works which have been written specifically to honor Khe Sanh veterans, a smaller one by Randy Cross and Symphony No.6 by Weresow, the father of a Khe Sanh vet; the issuance of a special US postage stamp, the writing of a commemorative book, a Congressional resolution and perhaps proclamations by the various state governments, a special reunion which would have high-profile dignitaries as part of the program, TV programs, etc.)

RETURN to HILL 861

by Mike Bradbury K Co 3/26

This past July, while the reunion was going on, Miguel "Pop" Salinas and I were returning to Khe Sanh to climb Hill 861, our home of record during the TET siege, with "K" Company 3/26

Following the trail of Dennis Mannion and Glenn Prentiss, "Pop" & I left the states on the 7th of July and were on top of 861 on the 13th, both dates were exactly 5 years after Dennis and Glenn climbed the same Hill.

Pop and I started putting this trip together just before Christmas of last year. 861 is the last place I ever wanted to see again, but after seeing Dennis' video, and realizing that the trip is actually possible, I finally said, "What the hell, I guess it's time." The lessons of "do's & don't do's" learned by Dennis and Glenn, made our trip over there and back fairly uneventful. We were treated well by the Vietnamese wherever we went, in spite of the fact that they are still living in poverty, because the only visible improvements the north has made, is in their own government buildings. People are still living in huts, and manage to eke out a living by peddling produce and souvenirs out in the streets

Khe Sanh has expanded into a small town, and there is now a modern museum of sorts, that lies not far from the old runway at the main base. Speaking of lies, there is a "monument" outside the museum that attempts to convince all foreign visitors that we all got our asses whipped up there, that the "brave and gallant" freedom fighters of the north just virtually routed the Marines out of Khe

Sanh, creating "hell on earth for the Americans", causing our eventual departure in 1975.

True, US forces left Khe Sanh and the surrounding hills. But they did under our terms. They did not run the Marines out of anywhere. There is a tourist log book at the museum, and you can damned sure know that yours truly wrote a paragraph or two in it, stating this. It has probably been removed by now, but It made me feel a little better about it.

With required guides, Pop and I fought the heat, humidity and leeches on the morning of the 13th, and sometime before noon, we were up on our hill again. 861 is considerably higher in elevation than it was back in 1968, or so it seemed 7 years later. I'm 57 and Pop just turned 70. The valley is lush and grown over now, and there is now an observation tower just below 861. As we made the final push over the top, the old "ghost town" began to come alive again. The old trench line started to appear in various places, including the one at the hilltop that once ran through the command post. The area still holds a few hazards like mortar rounds that never went off, and other live projectiles, so you have to be very careful where you walk.

Other things invoked some lifelong bitter memories as well. When I picked up two panels that were once part of somebody's flak vest, I couldn't help but remember the first aid kits we found on the dead North Vietnamese, the ones our media never told the folks back home about, the ones donated to them by the students of Berkeley College in California.

I elected to bring home some dirt from the hill, and dug out a spent slug from an AK-47, the gun that "takes a bootin' and keeps on shootin I", while we were saddled with that "Mattel Toy" that jammed more often than not. As of this writing, the M-16 still requires a considerable amount of maintenance. Our M-14 was a 308, it would kill reliably far beyond the distance of an M-16. You could fire it all day, no matter how dirty it got. Why was it replaced with that plastic piece of crap? Anybody out there know?

There were light-hearted times on the hill as well. There had to be, just to keep morale up. Doc Thomas thought it was funny to drop an inert grenade down the back of my shirt after he had pulled the pin. He wasn't laughing later on, after Mike James and I hung a sign that read "urinal", around his stovepipe chimney he had protruding out of the top of his bunker!

Pop & I came back down off the hill that afternoon, and both agreed that the trip was worth it. The Vietnam War means a lot of things to a lot of people. I know guys who wouldn't go over there again if the trip was free. I believe there is never any closure. If you have the guts to face reality, you did not fight for flag and country, nor Mom's apple pie. Be that as it may, we were there, and despite the fact in the minds of many, we lost war, I know the 26th Marines kicked butt, and took names during that infamous spring of 1968, from one end of Khe Sanh to the other. Vietnam is nowhere near worth the time or money to visit. Khe Sanh by itself is. We won that one, and we won it despite the news media, bombing halts and other political interference.

Ronnie Foster posted this on another board and gave me permission to post here. Ronnie was with FLC

In an interview for a book I am writing, I spoke with Cpl. Lionel Guerra, Bravo Co. 3rd Recon Bn. working out of Khe Sanh in '67-'68, until he was medevaced out on 20 Jan 68. He told me this story: Guerra: We were waiting for the helicopters to pick us up from a patrol. With me were Junior Reather, Kevin Macaulay, and the rest of the team. As we made our way down a hill toward a river, we kept hearing a strange noise behind us, but didn't know what it was. I whispered to the other guys that it sounded like a couple of water buffaloes having sex, and we all had a nervous laugh.

We finally stopped and were positioned near the water and were being very quiet. We had seen an elephant that day as well as a lot of other wildlife, but it was quiet at the time. Suddenly we heard a very loud, scary noise. We weren't laughing anymore when at about that time, pushing its way through the underbrush, stepped this huge beautiful Bengal tiger not more than twenty feet away. I think it had been following us down the hill. The tiger looked and sniffed around, checking out the area, and then slowly walked over to the water and began to drink. It was a magnificent animal, well over eight-feet long. While we were watching it, Reather slowly took his camera out of his pack and took a picture. When the shudder went 'click' the tiger instantly looked directly at us. Our eyes were probably as big as saucers as he gave us the eye. We couldn't fire our weapons without giving away our position.

The tiger stood motionless and stared at us for a moment and gave another loud roar. I thought he was going to charge us, and I did the only thing I knew to do; I roared back. The tiger looked at us for a few more moments and turned and casually walked back into the bush." PFC Junior Reather was killed a few days later during the siege.

Speaking of tiger attacks, after I got hit at Khe Sanh, I spent some time in the hospital in Danang. After I got out, I ended up in Quang Tri with the 3rd Shore Party H&S. I went out on the lines a few times while I was there. I remember one night around 2 in the morning, we heard a terrible scream coming from somewhere out in front of our lines. Then we heard what seemed like 20 shots being fired just in front of us. The next morning, we found out that a Marine on an LP was attacked and was in the process of being dragged away by the neck. The other Marine on the LP with him chased it down and emptied his M-16 on the tiger. I went down to the supply tent and watched the XO skin the tiger and cut his head off to send to Danang for a rabies test. I'm not sure who got the skin, but I know someone sent it home. As for the young Marine, he was never right after that. He was sent away somewhere and we never heard from him again. Anyone ever here this one?

Editors Note: Yes, that story is true. A picture of the Man Eating Tiger also appears in this issue, see Page 16.

"PATCHES"

Patches as she sits on the Pope AFB, sporting a new paint job. The aircraft got its name from the paint that peeled from the body of the plane while it was employed to Southeast Asia. The C-130E returned there recently after getting a new paint job. No longer patchy, the plane still flies regularly for Pope, AFB crews.

For more than 40 years, the C-130 Hercules has carried troops, vehicles and armaments into battle. It has dropped paratroopers and supplies from the sky and provided humanitarian relief around the world. Despite the tough flights, rough landings and combat environments, the C-130 is still considered by many as one of the hardest working aircraft in the Air Force.

"These planes are really a testament to our heritage and a great product," said Capt. Jannell MacAulay of the 41st Airlift Squadron. "Most of the planes are older than their pilots. I feel honored to fly some of these planes knowing what they've done in the past, what they were capable of. "One such plane is tail number 2-1817, more recently known as "Patches. "Born in 1962, one of Patches' first homes was Pope Air Force Base, in 1964. It returned to the base in February 2005. In the 41 years it spent away from North Carolina, it created quite a legacy. One of the aircraft's missions that made the history books took place in Khe Sanh, Vietnam, February 5th 1968.

Khe Sanh was only a few miles from the Demilitarization Zone, or DMZ, in South Vietnam and the Marines who held the base found themselves surrounded by enemy forces in January 1968. Airlift was the only means for bringing supplies in and out of the base. C-130's handled most of the missions that kept Khe Sanh alive despite the barrage of artillery that came with every landing.

Lt. Colonel Howard Dallman and his crew, assigned to the 345th Tactical Airlift Squadron, were scheduled to bring in 35,000 pounds of ammunition and a medical evacuation team from Danang to Khe Sanh Feb 5th. The guidance and control system at Khe Sanh was out, but the navigator believed they could make it in with an airborne radar approach. He was right, "1817" and its crew found the runway and landed, but only moments after touching down, the aircraft was hit by a shell that ignited the ammunition boxes in the cargo hold. The crew began fighting the fire, hoping the entire load would not explode and take a large piece of Khe Sanh with it. Colonel Dallman backed "1817" to a safer area on the runway, and with the help of the fire crews on the ground, the fire was extinguished.

The crew quickly unloaded the cargo and medical team. As they completed their task, the aircraft began to draw enemy fire once again. One of the tires was blown by a snipers bullet and mortars rained in from all directions. The crew stayed with the plane, changed the damaged wheel, loaded a Marine corporal and his out-of-commission bulldozer and experienced engine trouble all before taking off from the battered position.

"1817" was hit again as it left Khe Sanh, but was able to continue its flight. Colonel Dallman was awarded the Air Force Cross and his crew received Silver Stars for their actions that day. Since that time, "1817" has spent time at Dyess AFB, Texas, at Langley AFB, Va., and with the Air National Guard in Boise, Idaho. Upon returning the Pope AFB this year, "1817" had just received a new paint job. Maintenance crews thought it odd that some paint had started to peel back around the windows, but the plane was needed overseas, so the unrestricted C-130 took the long jump "across the pond."

The C-130 that arrived in Southwest Asia looked like a different aircraft than the one that left the United States only days earlier. The paint had not only peeled off around the windows, but in almost every other section of the plane. "The ground crews were calling it Spots and The Cheetah Plane and all kinds of names," said Major Chip Brown, 41st AS. "But the name that ended up sticking was the one Lt.Col. Polly Montgomery gave it Patches. "Most of the missions "Patches" flew were to shuttle troops and cargo into and out of the combat zone. Many of those missions were not easy.

Major Brown told of one such mission. "We were going in to Balad (Iraq) and we received some anti-aircraft artillery fire. Then, as we were putting the gear down and trying to accomplish checklists, a rocket propelled grenade went across the nose of the aircraft. We were the first plane coming into land after the field had been under attack. They thought they had calmed the attack down, but apparently it was still relatively hot."

"Patches" flew thousands of hours in Iraq and although maintainers tried to cover up the yellow spots left by peeling paint, it was a losing battle. The paint just would not stick. What mattered most was how "Patches" flew and there was no denying the aircraft's excellence. "Patches" was the most effective, least broken and most flown aircraft at the base for two consecutive months. When the plane returned to Pope in July for routine inspections, the maintenance crews couldn't believe it was the same C-130."We knew what was going on with the paint in the desert, but I was very surprised to see the extent of it," said Senior Master Sgt. Gregory House of the 43rd Aircraft Maintenance Squadron. "I was expecting to see leading edges and for the tail to be pretty yellow, but I never expected to see the back end of the plane completely yellow." "Patches" was inspected and sent off for a face-lift. The new and improved paint job made a world of difference. "When she got back she was ugly," said Sergeant House. "Now she's a lot better looking and it's harder to pick her out in the crowd. "No longer patchy, the aircraft was up in the sky carrying on its legacy only hours after it returned from the depot." It's amazing what these planes have been through and they are still flying," said Captain MacAulay. "As much as the Air Force says that they're building newer planes to replace the C-130E models, they are still the workhorse of the Air Force. They do a lot of the work out there in the war zone. I'm honored for the experience I've had to fly them. It's been very rewarding and made the reason I joined the Air Force worthwhile. This is what I wanted to do it this is why I wanted to be a pilot."

A MARINES PRIDE

By Phil Nuchereno

Some things in life are life long and will never change. While shopping today I encountered a young recently graduated boot camp Marine. He was wearing dress greens and had a sharpshooter badge. He was walking ten feet tall with his chest out. His mother was with him and you could see how proud she was parading her son in public. Reminded me of myself 39 years ago with my parents.

I starting thinking about Craig Tourte, Mike Powers, and all the other Khe Sanh brothers that post here that I'm sure experienced the same feeling that young marine did with his mother. It was a nice feeling going back in time upon seeing that young marine. Its funny how something like seeing that young marine can immediately bring out the pride. I'm sure each and every one of you can remember after boot camp how tall you walked. I'm glad after all these years I am still able to see a young man wearing a marine uniform walking so proud. That young marine today if just for a few seconds brought me back to a time when I was 19 years old. To a feeling I will never want to forget. At a time when I and all of you walked ten feet tall

Hello Tom,
My name is George Miramontez and I want to tell you that I had a pretty good time at the 2005 Khe Sanh Reunion this past July in Chicago. As you might already know, it was my first time at a reunion. I did not know any of the guys, though some looked familiar, I had a good time. It took me back a few years just reminiscing with the some of the guys about the same places we had been... It was definitely a pleasure meeting all you guys.

At first, I didn't know what to expect. But after being at the reunion, I want to upgrade my membership to a lifetime membership. My only regret was that I was not able to stay for the duration. I had made prior reservations for both Chicago and Washington D.C... Three days in Chicago, and four in DC. I had to see the wall for the first time. I arrived 1 day early in Chicago to meet as many of the guys as I could in the time allotted.

As much as I wanted to stay, I had to tear myself away from the reunion and go see the Vietnam Memorial. I had told Ron Shouse about my intentions, but he said not to go alone. I had no choice but to go alone. It had just been too many years of not being able to see it. Arriving in Washington D.C. I made arrangements for a 2 day tour for some of the monuments, with the Wall Memorial being on the 2nd tour. It was really not enough time for what I wanted to do, but the opportunity was finally here. After making arrangements at the Wyndam Hotel in D.C., I had some dinner and a couple of drinks at the bar, went back to my room and went to sleep.

When it came down to the wire, I was filled with extreme apprehension for my objective. After viewing some monuments, I knew in my heart what I had to do. I slowly walked over to the wall directory for the names that I knew. I slowly started walking toward the wall. Images of faces started filling my mind, like pages in a book. I had no clue of what I was going to do, or how I was going to react at the wall. It was time to make peace and confront the ghosts of my past. With step I took, it became increasingly dif-ficult for me to retain my composure. Ron Shouse was right about what would happen. I continued at a slow pace feeling the hair on my arms bristle, while goose bumps tingled on my arms. When I found the names, I touched them and felt my eyes start to water, occasionally struggling to keep them dry. It was an electrifying ex-perience, so many memories. I felt at peace as I said a silent prayer, turned and left, touching the wall once more.

I felt much better after that and very satisfied that I had finally made it there. I took my time visiting the other monuments, went to a bar and reflected on what had transpired in just a week's time. Tom, I didn't know when my membership expired so I sent you this enclosed application with fees for a lifetime membership. This is a great organization, and I want to be part of it. I hope you are enjoying your retirement as much as I am mine. As always....

Open Letter To All Our Beloved Corpsmen
By Ken Pipes B Co 1/26

Please forward to all our Marine Corpsmen. May God always protect and watch over these exceptionally Brave and Courageous Warriors, now and forever! Thanks Doc's for what you did, what you are doing and will always do--" Going Into the mouth of the guns for your Marines! "Blessings, Prayers and Semper Fidelis. With Great Respect.

From Roy Fleck:
Get My Dad's Goat

I joined the Navy, mostly to get my Dad's goat. He was a Marine who was wounded at Chosin during the Korean war. At the time I really didn't get along with my dad as most 17 year olds don't. As with the men in my family, I knew it was a duty and honor to serve even if it meant going to war myself. Still I wanted to do something in the medical field. In Corps School we were given "dream sheets" to see what we wanted to do after school. We had an old Chief who was an FMF Corpsman during Korea and Vietnam and instead of telling us how great FMF duty would be he told us up front that his job was to discourage us from going FMF because he was not going to send any pansies" (my words not his) to his beloved Marine Corps.

He told us how many seconds the average life of a corpsman was during a firefight (7 seconds), that corpsman, radiomen and officers were shot first in that order, that corpsmen made up the majority of the KIA's and then he took us to this hall which I called the hall of names and read off the names of corpsmen who had been awarded the Medal of Honor and what they did to deserve the medals (Navy FMF corpsmen account for the majority of MOH winners in the Navy).

But what made me realize that I had made the right decision was on my graduation from Field Medical Service School my Dad came up to me and told me that when he was wounded at the battle of Chosin a Corpsman came up to him and with bullets flying he dragged my father to safety and secured his wounds for transport. When he got to the MASH unit he asked about the corpsman who was not with his unit so he could thank him for saving his life. He was told that the corpsman died later that day trying to save another Marine.

He got up patted me on my shoulder and said. "Take good care of them." Oh by the way ,16 of us at corps school showed interest in being FMF corpsman. After the Chief's little "talk" only two of us stepped up. American by birth, U.S Navy by choice, FMF Corpsman by the grace of God.

POETRY

I WONDER

It's a vital link they used to say
Of that far off patch of blood red clay
Until we blew it up and walked away.
Was this reason gone astray?
So many names etched upon the wall
Of those who came and gave their all.
For freedom's future they had to fall.
Is there a name I don't recall?
I see them still, those gaunt drawn faces
Of men and boys from many races.
They appear in the damnedest places.
Isn't memory something time erases?
Now I'm left to wonder why
So many had to bleed and die when we gave it up and still get by.
Is it any wonder I sometimes cry?

A REUNION OF THANKS

By James Wodecki

A reunion between Dr. Geisler and Bob Moxley took place September 24th at 1330 hrs at the Hyatt Regency in Dallas, TX, at 300 Reunion St. downtown Dallas. Colors were presented by local ROTC.

Robert Murl Moxley was born in Portland, Oregon, being one of four children. His parents were both deaf mutes. To ease the burden on his parents. Bob was sent to live with his grandparents in Tumilo, Oregon. His mentor and grandfather taught bob how to hunt and fish. He also taught him the values of what people want and what people need and the honor of pride in every thing one does.

Bob enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1968, and completed basic training in San Diego, California. After basic he was assigned to Delta Company, 2nd platoon, second squad. Bob arrived in Vietnam December 25th Christmas, Morning 1968. His first assignment was with the First Battalion Ninth Marines. He participated in Operation Dewey Canyon and the taking of hill 1044. He was awarded the Bronze Star with "V" for his actions, wiping out a NVA Machine gun nest. Bob was shot in the helmet by an NVA sniper, the bullet was stopped by his helmet liner. It is a Vietnam souvenir he cherishes

Bob fought in Operation Apache Snow in April 1969 where he received the Navy Commendation with combat "V". Bob also fought at the Ashau Valley, Con Tien, Cam Lo, The Rock pile, and Vandergriff.

On June 12th, 1969 Bob's last fight was in Operation Utah Mesa at Khe Sanh, where he was severally wounded. He was hit in the left leg at the knee, he self applied a tourniquet to his leg. Bob then noticed his right arm was bleeding badly from an entrance and exit wound in his bicep, again he self applied another tourniquet.

Bob was stabbed by an enemy bayonet while fighting him off with his K-Bar. Bob passed out and was left for dead. He was placed in a poncho liner. By the Grace of God a helicopter door gunner retrieving the Marines who had been KIA, discovered Bob was alive. He informed the helicopter pilot. Bob was rushed to Charlie Med in Quang Tri.

Dr. Geisler and the other Surgeons at Charlie Med, had orders, and it was a general rule, if you can save a life by removing a limb, it was to be done. In stead Dr. Geisler spent four hours performing a delicate artery transplant that had only been attempted a few times in a combat situation. Without the benefit of special suture materials, Dr Geisler transplanted an artery from Bobs leg, to his arm, saving both limbs.

Dr. Geisler came to Bob in the recovery room and said you are one lucky Marine. Bob said, just look at me! I look horrible. With his leg and arm in that had now turned green and black, in a sling. Dr. Geisler said, you came closer to loosing your arm than your leg and left the room. A corpsman talked with Bob and informed him how lucky he was to have that surgeon take the time he did to save not only his life, but his leg and arm.

Bob's road to recovery started at Charlie Med. And ended nearly a year and a half later at the VA hospital in Portland Oregon, after stops in Yokohama Japan, Cherry Point, and Camp Lejuene, NC.

Bobs dream has been, to find that doctor, who gave him the life that he shouldn't have, and walk to the man on a leg he shouldn't have, and shake the hand of the man with a hand he shouldn't have, hug him, and thank him for what he did.

In 2004, Bob met Charlie Brown in Dallas at the Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion. Charlie works with Medal of Honor recipient Doc Ballard. Who operates the National Combat Medical Memorial & Youth Education Center. Bob asked him if he would help in finding his surgeon. In less than 6 months Bob received word from Charlie, he had located the surgeon who had operated on him. Dr. Geisler made numerous phone calls and cut through miles of red tape, and finally received bob's medical records. Which verified all the facts, the connection was made Bob's Daughter and Son In Law, and their grandson also made the trip to Dallas for the historic meeting. Dr. Geisler's Son, and Daughter In Law accompanied by their daughter, also made the trip. I attended the ceremony with my Wife PJ, and several members of the Khe Sanh Veterans, VP Tom Eichler, Past President "Bulldog" Smith, and several more KSV from the Dallas area.

In a short but moving program, Bob finally met and shook the hand of the doctor who had saved his life. Bob presented the good doctor with a Khe Sanh Veterans "Doc" Medal, and their children exchanged gifts. After swapping stories, both the good doctor and Robert Moxley answered questions from those who had attended the ceremony, which will be the subject of a future documentary.

Bob now lives in the Mountains in Cove, Oregon. He is an avid a hunter, fisherman, and farmer. Bob is a healthy strong man, retired Marine, retired Postal Supervisor, and life member of the Khe Sanh Veterans. He and his wife Rita, are almost totally self sufficient, except when they go in to town for coffee and toilet paper once a month.

Dr. Geisler was born in Midland Texas on Feb 26 1936. He received his BS at the University of Notre Dame in 1957, and attended the St. Louis University School of Medicine in 1961. Dr. Geisler did his Residency and Internship at University Hospital of St. Louis, 1961-1966. his residency in Thoracic and Cardiovascular Surgery was at the University of Texas, Southwestern Medical School, Dallas 1966-1968.

Enlisted USN 1968, he served with Third Medical Battalion 3Rd Mar Div, Qunag Tri & Dong Ha, March to November 1969. He was discharged in 1970, with rank of Commander.

Still practicing Medicine in Dallas Texas, he and his wife Mary have three sons, a daughter, and nine grandchildren.

JUST A LITTLE THANK YOU LETTER
By Dale Lee

Hello Dale,
I have spent some time on this letter trying to find words that make sense and are meaningful to you. However, words have been hard to find because I am not sure if they can convey my heart to yours. So, dear friend, it is time to send this. I continue to look for words that convey my heart but if I keep looking I will never send this. It is like saying thank you to someone who has done you a great service. In reality "thank you" doesn't imply nearly enough description of what it means and how one really feels about the favor/service provided. Dale, thank you.

We really enjoyed seeing you and Sharron this summer. Your boat is great! I hope you used it as much as you wanted this summer and I hope your summer, and now fall, and summer again has and will be great.

I write because I have had many thoughts about you over the years and I want to tell you about them. I am not sure why I am doing this at this time, except that I should have done it long ago, and I want you to know how much I appreciate you. For some reason I feel close to you even though we rarely meet. I remember meeting you and Sharron, having beer and you introducing us to "salty dogs." I remember we went to the drive-in, you wearing your uniform (all Special Forces member were free), and the deer hunt with you and your father. I remember that you didn't talk much about Vietnam except some about your arrival there and how scared you were for a period of time, then, how bold you were because you were tired of being so scared. I don't know much about your experiences in Vietnam, but I do know you saw and experienced much tragedy to say the least.

I went into the Army Reserves, trained for Vietnam, but our unit was not called. Often I wonder if I had what it takes to do what you and over 2 million that were called and served had to do in Vietnam. Recently I found a web page that listed KIA. For the first time I looked up some of my friends names and my heart was saddened. I realized that possibly while I was playing or practicing baseball at the University of Utah, there were friends in firefights getting wounded or killed. These guys, you and many of your friends, had paid a high price. I know many Vietnam vets that returned to the states, who are paying a very high price, in trying to deal with regular, everyday life as the winds of memory and experience in trauma often return.

We have all had our major difficulties in our marriages, jobs, and with our kids. I am glad Marcia had hung in there with me as I can be a jerk at times. I don't know the problems you have struggled with, but I am sure there are some that only death can take away. I want you to know that I honor you in every sense of the word. I appreciate that you served your country while, at times, your country did not serve you. I want you to clearly know that your service and life have been worth while. I don't know where you are, concerning God, but I am thankful that he saw fit to help you and I get to an age that we can look back and be thankful and appreciative that He has surrounded us with people who love us, and has given us the grace to work out our problems and difficulties. I am glad our lives have crossed paths. I can and do tell others, that I have a friend who served our country, who saw all he didn't wish to see, and more. This friend returned, made a life, has people that love him, has grandchildren that will be proud of him, works hard, and now owns a boat to relax on, as much as he and his wife can.

Well, my friend, you have earned so much more, you have run the race and for us all the finish line is getting closer. I pray that you have accepted Jesus Christ as Lord and I pray that you and yours are protected from the enemy's plans, and that pain does not knock on your door; and if it does, that God continue to grant you the grace to handle it. You are an AWESOME MAN, A MAN"S MAN. America is a better place because of you, and I am a better person because I know you. As I re-read this, it seems it may not be as clear as it should. I hope this enters your heart and brightens your day, because there are so many Americans and others that are thankful to you even though they don't know you personally. Continue to love your wife, children, and grandchildren, and know that you are an awesome MAN and I honor you...THANK YOU!!!Your friend,
Larry Williams

THE HIGH GROUND

By Robert Clark

A couple of years ago someone asked me if I still thought about Vietnam. I nearly laughed in their face. How do you stop thinking about it? Every day for the last twenty-four years, I wake up with it, and go to bed with it. But this is what I said. "Yea, I think about it. I can't quit thinking about it. I never will. But, I've also learned to live with it. I'm comfortable with the memories. I've learned to stop trying to forget and learned instead to embrace it. It just doesn't scare me anymore."

A psychologist once told me that NOT being affected by the experience over there would be abnormal. When he told me that, it was like he'd just given me a pardon. It was as if he said, "Go ahead and feel something about the place, Bob. It isn't going nowhere. You're going to wear it for the rest of your life. Might as well get to know it."

A lot of my "brothers" haven't been so lucky. For them the memories are too painful, their sense of loss too great. My sister told me of a friend she has, whose husband was in the Nam. She asks this guy when he was there. Here's what he said, "Just last night." It took my sister a while to figure out what he was talking about. JUST LAST NIGHT. Yeah I was in the Nam. When? JUST LAST NIGHT. During sex with my wife. And on my way to work this morning. Over my lunch hour. Yeah, I was there.

My sister says I'm not the same brother that went to Vietnam. My wife says I won't let people get close to me, not even her. They are probably both right. Ask a vet about making friends in Nam. It was risky. Why? Because we were in the business of death, and death was with us all the time. It wasn't the death of, "If I die before I wake." This was the real thing. The kind where boys scream for their mothers. The kind that lingers in your mind and becomes more real each time you cheat it. You don't want to make a lot of friends when the possibility of dying is that real, that close. When you do, friends become a liability.

A guy named Bob Flanigan was my friend. Bob Flanigan is dead. I put him in a body bag one sunny day, April 29, 1969. We'd been talking, only a few minutes before he was shot, about what we were going to do when we got back in the world. Now, this was a guy who had come in country the same time as me. A guy who was loveable and generous. He had blue eyes and sandy blond hair. When he talked, it was with a soft drawl. Flanigan was a hick and he knew it. That was part of his charm. He didn't care. Man, I loved this guy like the brother I never had. But, I screwed up. I got too close to him. Maybe I didn't know any better. But I broke one of the unwritten rules of war. DON'T GET CLOSE TO PEOPLE WHO ARE GOING TO DIE. Sometimes you can't help it.

You hear vets use the term "buddy" when they refer to a guy they spent the war with. "I and this buddy of mine. "Friend" sounds too intimate, doesn't it. "Friend" calls up images of being close. If he's a friend, then you are going to be hurt if he dies, and war hurts enough without adding to the pain. Get close; get hurt. It's as simple as that.

In war you learn to keep people at that distance my wife talks about. You become so good at it, that twenty years after the war, you still do it without thinking. You won't allow yourself to be vulnerable again. My wife knows two people who can get into the soft spots inside me. My daughters. I know it probably bothers her that they can do this. It's not that I don't love my wife, I do. She's put up with a lot from me. She'll tell you that when she signed on for better or worse she had no idea there was going to be so much of the latter. But with my daughters it's different.

My girls are mine. They'll always be my kids. Not marriage, not distance, not even death can change that. They are something on this earth that can never be taken away from me. I belong to them. Nothing can change that. I can have an ex-wife; but my girls can never have an ex-father. There's the difference. I can still see the faces, though they all seem to have the same eyes. When I think of us I always see a line of "dirty grunts" sitting on a paddy dike. We're caught in the first gray silver between darkness and light. That first moment when we know we've survived another night, and the business of staying alive for one more day is about to begin. There was so much hope in that brief space of time. It's what we used to pray for. "One more day, God, One more day."

And I can hear our conversations as if they'd only just been spoken. I still hear the way we sounded, the hard cynical jokes, our morbid senses of humor. We were scared to death of dying, and trying our best not to show it. I recall the smells, too. Like the way cordite hangs on the air after a fire-fight. Or the pungent odor of rice paddy mud. So different from the black dirt of Iowa. The mud of Nam smells ancient, somehow. Like it's always been there. And I'll never forget the way blood smells, stuck and drying on my hands. I spent a long night that way once. That memory isn't going anywhere.

I remember how the night jungle appears almost dream-like, as the pilot of a Cessna buzzes overhead, dropping parachute flares until morning. That artificial sun would flicker and make shadows run through the jungle.

It was worse than not being able to see what was out there sometimes. I remember once looking at the man next to me as a flare floated overhead. The shadows around his eyes were so deep that it looked like his eyes were gone. I reached over and touched him on the arm; without looking at me he touched my hand. "I know man. I know." That's what he said. It was a human moment. Two guys a long way from home and scared sh"tless. "I know man." And at that moment he did.

God I loved those guys. I hurt every time one of them died. We all did. Despite our posturing. Despite our desire to stay disconnected, we couldn't help ourselves. I know why Tim O'Brien writes his stories. I know what gives Bruce Weigle the words to create poems so honest I cry at their horrible beauty. It's love. Love for those guys we shared the experience with.

We did our jobs like good soldiers, and we tried our best not to become as hard as our surroundings. We touched each other and said, "I know." Like a mother holding a child in the middle of a nightmare, "It's going to be all right." We tried not to lose touch with our humanity. We tried to walk that line. To be the good boys our parents had raised and not to give into that unnamed thing we knew was inside us all.

You want to know what frightening is. It's a nineteen-year-old-boy who's had a sip of that power over life and death that war gives you. It's a boy who, despite all the things he's been taught, knows that he likes it. It's a nineteen-year-old who's just lost a friend, and is angry and scared and, determined that, "Some *@#*s going to pay." To this day, the thought of that boy can wake me from a sound sleep and leave me staring at the ceiling.

As I write this, I have a picture in from of me. It's of two young men. On their laps are tablets. One is smoking a cigarette. Both stare without expression at the camera. They're writing letters. Staying in touch with places they would rather be. Places and people they hope to see again.

The picture shares space in a frame with one of my wife. She doesn't mind. She knows she's been included in special company. She knows I'll always love those guys who shared that part of my life, a part she never can. And she understands how I feel about the ones I know are out there yet. The ones who still answer the question, "When were you in Vietnam?" "Hey, man. I was there just last night."

From Supreme Allied Commander Europe

Dear Chaplain Ray Stubbe,
Thank you for your thoughtfulness in sending me the book, Battalion of Kings: A Tribute to our Fallen Brothers who died because of the Battlefield of Khe Sanh, Vietnam. I was delighted to receive such a fine historical book of our forces in support of their nation. Thank you also for the honor of mentioning my involvement as a First Lieutenant and the brief sketch about my father. I look forward to reading it at my earliest opportunity. This is an excellent resource and will be a valuable part of my library.

Thank you for thinking of me, as well as for all that you have done on behalf of the Corps. I wish you continued success.

SHORT ROUNDS

USMC SPECIAL FORCES?

By Mike Fishbaugh

I always thought our Recon and Snipers were our Special Forces, times are changing:

Marines get OK for Special Forces

The News and Observer November 02, 2005.The Marine Corps is getting its own special operations command, and its headquarters and the bulk of the 2,600-strong force will be at Camp Lejeune, the Department of Defense announced Tuesday.

The command will include a special operations regiment, a unit that trains foreign troops and a support group. Part of the regiment will be stationed at Camp Pendleton, Calif. Some of the command's Marines will come from a Corps expansion authorized in the current federal budget, while others will come from existing units, said Major Douglas Powell, a Marine spokesman at the Pentagon. There's no firm start date, but the command's first leader, Brigadier General Dennis J. Hejlik, has already been chosen. Hejlik not only has combat experience, but has served as chief of staff at U.S. Special Operations Command, an umbrella command that oversees Army, Navy and Air Force units -- and which also will include the new Marines force.

The new force is a natural, said Daniel Goure, a defense analyst with the Lexington Institute, a think tank in Arlington, Va. For years, the Marines have trained and used troops for some special operations missions. "What you've got is units that are already there, or nearly already there," he said. "This is a clear recognition of existing skills."

Also, he said, by maintaining a tight relationship with the Corps, the Marine special operations unit would avoid problems that special operations units in the other services report, such as little control over their transportation, problems with communications systems and issues getting backup from conventional troops with assets such as armored vehicles.

For years the Corps has been inching toward a full role in the special operations community, which is best known for the Army's Green Berets -- whose headquarters is at Fort Bragg -- and the Navy's SEALs. The U.S. Special Operations Command and the Marines signed a memorandum of agreement in November 2001 to start working together more. Since then, said Powell, Marines have worked with special ops troops from other services everywhere from the mountains of Afghanistan to the streets of Fallujah.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the elite special operations units have been worked harder than at any point in history. While they've been getting increasingly more funding, Goure said, they've also been losing seasoned veterans to the Army's Delta Force and the Navy's SEAL Team 6. Those secretive anti-terrorist units, he said, are reportedly growing in size. Also, many veteran special forces troops have been lured into the booming private security industry, where their skills can command salaries of more than $200,000 a year. Meanwhile, the pool of Army, Navy and Air Force personnel who meet the rigorous requirements for recruits to special operations units has remained flat. So it makes sense, Goure said, to turn to the Marines, the one service that has an all-but untapped pool of troops who fit the requirements.

We Get Mail

Tom,

I did not know of the existence of the Khe Sanh Veterans, or I would have joined long ago. I was a member of Bravo Company, 1st Platoon, 1st Battalion, and Ninth Marines. Lieutenant Carter was our Platoon leader.

Although it was years ago, one story always remains fresh in my mind. We were out on an ambush one night when it was so dark, you could hardly see your hand in front of your face. I was with another member of the platoon who had just recently arrived in Vietnam.

Suddenly I heard movement directly in front of our position. I told the new member to find some cover as I was going to issue a challenge prior to taking any action, which would compromise our position.

I was scared to death, and as we were taught shouted "who's there", a voiced replied, "third platoon dummy", and made an additional comment which I won't print. I found out later that everyone else had been told that the third platoon would be linking up with us. To this day, I do not remember being so informed. I know you do not challenge the enemy when you are on an ambush, yet I still do not know why I chose to do so, a few lives being saved. I would really like to meet that Marine from the third platoon some day, to see if he remembers as vividly as I do.

SHORT ROUNDS

WHAT SEMPER FI MEANS TO ME

By Joe Moring E Co 2/9

It means belonging to a special organization that not just anyone can join, or endure and complete its extreme discipline.

It means being screamed at, and humiliated in front of others, having your rifle field stripped and stuck inside your pockets, threatened with being sent to the brig when you have done nothing wrong, and made to do push-ups in the rain and mud, until you need help just to get to your feet. After all that agony, you're called to attention, and asked by your DI if you want to quit. You respond with a resounding NO, and are again made to do push ups. But on Graduation Day, that same DI finally calls you Marine. That's Semper Fi.

Even under conditions of extreme weather, war, illness, fear, filth, and hunger, you always know that the Marines next to you will always be there for you, as you will be for them. That's Semper Fi. When you find a quiet place after a battle, or firefight, and you're still shaking, you say a prayer, or shed some tears for a lost friend (s), or even a few for yourself, you pick up and continue. That's Semper Fi.

When you have been in the field, and re-supply gets hard, you find a small can of peaches that were forgotten at the bottom of your pack. The peaches are all yours, but instead, you call neighboring Marines, and everyone takes a sip of juice, and part of a peach. That's Semper Fi.

You return home to a Nation where a large part of it speaks out against the war you fought, you still hold your head up, and feel a sense of honor for serving this same Nation. That's Semper Fi.

When you hear the question over the years from the young and old, with a voice of admiration and respect " You Were a Marine?" That's Semper Fi.

When you are at a Veteran's Day ceremony and toward the end of the performance the band, the orchestra plays a medley of the Armed Forces tunes. The orchestra leader asks if those who served will stand when their branch of service's song is played. Many stand from the Army, Air Force, and Navy. Only a Few, Proud, Marines for the Marine Corps Hymn, That's Semper Fi.

To me Semper Fi is more then just some secret code, or hand shake like a Fraternity, or some men's social golf club. It's a tribute only few can render to another, who has earned the right to be called... a Marine.

MEMOIRS

MY TOUR WITH KILO COMPANY 3/26

By Brian Mahoney

I joined the marines in 1964 after graduating from Bay Shore High School in N.Y. Three guys who played football with me also joined on a dare. Three out of us four made it home safe. In 1964 the Vietnam War had started to pick up. At that time, Marine boot camp lasted 20 weeks. It was later shortened when the Vietnam War really escalated. My first assignment was as machine gunner with 1st Bn., 6th Marine Regiment at Camp Lejeune, N.C.

I would meet the future C/O of Kilo Company while stationed at Las Pulgas, Camp Pendelton, California. Captain Delanor Bynum was an imposing figure, 6'2, 220 Lbs, and could have been a model for the Marine Corps recruiting poster. He walked into the barracks one Sunday morning while I was reading a playboy magazine. He knocked me on my ass and told me to put away the %&%& book and try reading a Marine Corps Manual. This was our first meeting but would not be our last.

We began training for Vietnam, and were given our last 96 hour liberty pass. I thought about flying to Ft. Hood Texas, to visit my Brother Michael and his wife, Liz, but ran into a buddy of mine who I had served with at Camp Lejeune. Carl Wuestenhoefer, with whom I had done some heavy partying in Santa Domingo in 1965. He told me of this bar where the girls would dance topless if you put money in the jukebox. This was before Topless Bars became the rage. So he, another Marine and Joe Baranoski, and I headed for town. We were not asked for Identification, so we ordered a few beers.

While awaiting the pleasure of the topless ladies, the local police entered the bar and asked everyone for their identification. I handed one of the officers, Carl's identification card. He looked at me and asked me to spell "Wuestenhoefer". I replied "how many chances do I get". All three of us were then placed in handcuffs and transported to the local jail. At the time it was funny, until we learned we would be spending our last liberty in jail. If anyone ever asked me if I had ever been arrested, I reply yes, for not knowing how to spell Wuestenhoefer".

My military career was not going well at all. I would run into the Captain several more times. My Lieutenant was a mustang officer named Lemoine. He was the one who had to go to bat for me with the captain each time I screwed up. He informed the Captain that I was a good field Marine, but acted like an idiot on liberty. The lieutenant once joked that my MOS should have been changed to "1600 Liberty".

The original 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines bordered an APA navel ship out of San Diego in the fall of 1966. I remember working all night loading the magazines with all kinds of ammo. It seemed like it was enough ordinance to fight WWII. Again. There were several ships taking us to Vietnam,; I remember the USS Lenawee having a purple heart on its bridge. A sailor told me it had been hit by a Japanese Kamikaze in WWII. It looked so old I couldn't believe it was still in service. Kilo Company almost never made it to Viet Nam. A typhoon named "Ida" almost sank us on the Lenawee. When the typhoon started we were sitting down at chow on the mess deck. I remember food trays flying all over the place, with both Marines, and Sailors, being thrown across the deck like rag dolls.

We retreated to our squad bay that had aluminum framed canvas racks six or seven high. Everybody was seasick and the decks had about two inches of vomit sliding like waves up and down. One of the seasick Marines was lying under the fresh air vent in an attempt to get some air when he got hit by a torrent of sea water right in the face. He jumped up and yelled "abandon ship." Everybody headed for the hatch until we all realized, there was no place to go in the middle of the South China Sea.

We later found out how close we all came to sinking. Another ship had lost its steering ability, and came within a couple of meters of hitting our ship in the convoy. The ship lost two lifeboats and the steel davits were bent like pretzels. Scuttlebutt had it that a navy chief won a Navy Cross for crawling into a compartment that had potential toxic fumes and fixed the problem, saving many lives. We were never told anything about what actually happened and had to rely on rumors.

When we stopped at the Naval Base in the Philippines, we were granted liberty. At that time, they had in place what they referred to as "Cinderella Liberty". This meant you had to return to the ship before midnight, or face severe discipline. We always headed for the town of Olongapo to the Shamrock Bar. It was well known for the pretty bar girls who treated you like a king. Of course all they really cared about was how much money you spent buying their "Saigon Tea" (colored water), yet you were charged for champagne.

On one of those trips, Sgt. Jim Dearden and I were drinking with two of the girls. Mine was named Lydia Gome. She had a tight dress and a pushup bra. I actually found myself falling in love with a hooker. At that time I really didn't care because I figured I only had a few months to live after we arrived in Vietnam. The aircraft carrier FDR pulled into Subic Bay with thousands of sailors who had been to sea for months. They had plenty of cash and were all looking for a little fun. One of them made the mistake of dancing with "my girl".

I said to Dearden "I'm going to beat the shit out of that squid". Jim was a NCO but he was as drunk as I was. He said "go ahead Jake, I don't like sailors either". I got up to confront the sailor, we had some words and I took a slow motion swing at him. He ducked and I caught Lydia in her jaw. The bar erupted in a huge fight between Sailors and Marines, and I got knocked to the floor. Dearden told me to get out of the bar before the Shore Patrol arrived. As I stumbled down the stairs, a Filipino Police officer tried to stop me, I knocked him down and fled from the bar.

I started to run down the main street. The cop got up, gave chase, and actually began to shoot at me. I observed that my arm was bleeding pretty bad, and tried to hide in some bushes. I was surrounded, and placed under arrest by some very angry Philippine Cops. Fortunately the Shore Patrol arrived and took custody of me. When they found out we were on our way to Vietnam, they released me in the custody of two other Marines from my unit; Sergeant Nunez and Corporal McClelen, who were as drunk as I was. Nunez carried me back to the ship while McClelen cleared a path.

They thought I had been shot by the police. In fact a bar girl had actually stabbed me during the fight with the sailors. On the way back to the ship we began making remarks to sailors on the ship and were surrounded and outnumbered. A Navy Chief attempted to intervene, but the sailors kicked our asses. The civilian authorities notified the ship about our actions the night before and Captain Bynum was really pissed. He called me into his office, showed me my warrant for promotion to Corporal, then proceeded to tear it up. I left his office as a PFC.

When we arrived in Vietnam, Captain Bynum acted like he wanted to win the MOH, or die trying. Although he was always hard on me, he would not ask anyone to do anything he would not do. After Debarking from the Lenawee we loaded up onto trucks to be taken to a Hill in Cobi Tan Valley, located just outside Phu Bai, a province called Thu Thien. It was just prior to monsoon season, ensuring our misery. We were busy digging foxholes, loading sandbags, and setting up our fields of fire.

I was setting up the M-60 machine gun with sand bags when I heard a mortar round fire behind me. The mortar team was adjusting their elevations and covering what was known as dead space. One of the fired rounds fell short and landed in one of our fox holes, killing the two young Marines. These two guys never saw an enemy, never fired a shot, both killed by "friendly fire". This was the beginning of thirteen months of total insanity that would affect every one of us forever.

One day just before the monsoon season, we were sitting on our hill watching the valley below us when someone spotted two VC. Bob Corsa took squad one down into the valley to try to surprise the VC. We were all boots, as far as any real combat was concerned. It was something that should never have been done, because we learned the hard way, how savvy the VC was. I told Corsa that I could probably get them from about 1000 meters with the M-60. Corsa wanted to get closer. We continued to advance towards them when they spotted us and ran away. We went after them like the cowboys would go after the Indians. We were led into an ambush. My A gunner, Ron Zacker detonated a bobby trap. I was in front of Zacker when the loud explosion made everyone hit the ground. I looked at Ron who was black and dazed. He laws in such bad shape; Corsa was also hit in the head and didn't look much better. The third man hit was our radioman Flynn, who got hit in the groin. I fired into the tree line just for the hell of it, but the VC were invisible. Joe Beck dragged Zacker out of harms way. Everyone was finally helped to cover. The corpsman gave first aid and tried to get a med-evac chopper for our wounded.

Corsa got morphine and was screaming obscenities at the VC. Beck was both emotionally upset and extremely pissed, that one of his men was down. He took the gun from me and wanted to kill every VC in the area. Joe wanted to do something, yet felt helpless because the enemy would never show themselves. They were smarter than us. After Joe took the gun, I went back to carry Corsa to the med– evac chopper, and told him he'd be all right, trying to keep him calm. I didn't know if he was going to make it or not. The chopper finally arrived after the Corpsman screamed over the radio for what seemed like forever. We popped a green smoke grenade to indicate the LZ for the pilot to land.

Another guy and myself carried Corsa. I thought we were going to be shot at or blown up. The VC loved to shoot down choppers. Ron Zacker had to hop on one foot to get aboard because there was no one available to carry him, and he obviously didn't want to wait. Twenty-five years later Ron Zacker would tell me what happened. The chopper was hit several times by small arm's fire. I didn't know this because of all the noise. Ron would spend a year in a hospital in Japan. They tried to amputate his leg twice but he wouldn't let them, and still walks with a limp. Corsa was sent to a hospital in the States. He hasn't fully recovered from his wounds. He retired from NYPD because he was having seizures.

Another day we were running one of the many patrols from our hill. Lt. Dobie was leading the squad on a ridge when a sniper opened up on us. We were walking along the top of a large bomb crater and everyone dove into the crater for cover. I felt safe in the crater and saw no need to return fire at an invisible enemy. The Lieutenant yelled get the machinegun going, so I jumped up on top of the crater and wasted about 50 rounds of M-60 ammunition. I fired in the direction of the sniper and he fired a couple of shots back till everyone decided to call it a day, and continued on their way.

During this time I considered our patrols a total waste of time. The VC and the NVA always picked the time to do battle. It would be like that the entire tour of duty. The next day another patrol went out and the sniper fired again. This time I wasn't near the bomb crater. The two Marines, who jumped in just like I did the day before, were blown up by a 155mm bobby trap. I felt lucky and guilty at the same time. Surviving Nam wasn't training or how tough you were. It was pure simple luck. After a few months in country, the many patrols became a haze to me. We were more concerned about the elements than the VC.

One night the entire first platoon went out at night to ambush a large NVA force, that was detected moving by a railroad track. We walked half the night through a very heavy rain. We were exhausted and miserable. I thought if we do find the enemy, their going to kick our tired asses. After realizing that the entire platoon was lost, an officer told us to just stay where we were and do the best we could to stay awake. We wrapped ourselves in our ponchos and tried to watch for the NVA. The next day I woke up and saw everyone in the squad sound asleep. We could have had our throats cut during the night. Exhaustion had overcome any fear. We got away with one that day.

Another day we went into a village with two PF's leading the company. The first couple of villages had Vietnamese going about their business as if we weren't there. The women totally ignored us. The kids would hound us for candy or money. The proud Vietnamese women resented us for turning their children into beggars. There were never any men in these villages. They were either with the VC, or dead. After we walked through the third ville, the two PF's came running past me yelling "Beau Cu VC". Our point fire team had been ambushed. The point man, a PFC named Plott, had been shot. The rest of the team was pinned down.

The call went out for machine guns up. My team consisting of Beets, Blevins, and Kent, hauled ass to the front of the company, along with Sgt. Nunez.

The VC had hit and ran, they were invisible. Plott was dead. We looked for anything to shoot at. The Corpsman who attended Plott was crying. Nunez or Beck spotted heads bobbing up and down in the rice paddy. We all started firing at the movement. I went through a belt of machine gun ammo. Even if we killed ten or twenty, the VC would go to great lengths to hide their dead. They would always be invisible. It started to get dark and the powers to be, wanted us out of this area.

We crossed a canal with Plott now wrapped in a poncho. Captain Wildprett ordered my-team to cover the company withdrawal across the rice paddy. The VC waited until the troops started to cross the open paddy. The shit then hit the fan. A squad was trapped on the other side and the company was taking heavy fire. I was firing the gun as much as I could. Joe Beck was firing and directing my gun at the same time. Nunez was shooting and trying to get artillery support on the VC. Kent was bringing as much ammo as he could carry. He tripped with an ammo can and I almost blew his head off.

The VC were shooting at us and dirt was kicking up all around us. I was scared stiff. If I could have disappeared, I would have. It was a miracle that nobody in the gun team was hit. The trapped squad made it across the canal and Sergeant Ives blew us a kiss in gratitude. Artillery and air support started to pound the VC, and it was over as quickly it began. We eventually made it back to Phu Bai and we were all very glad to be alive. Our gun team was put in for Bronze Stars, but they gave it to one of the Mortar Men behind us.

My A-Gunner Joe Beck had been with me since our days at Camp Pendleton. He actually became my squad leader in Vietnam, after I was busted twice. He had a great attitude, and never complained about anything. His Father was a career Marine, and I accused him of wanting to follow in his Dad's footsteps. He should have been an Officer, nothing fazed him. He always displayed leadership abilities. The only time he deviated from his care free attitude was when someone from the company was KIA. I always had the attitude that the Corps had messed over me, and I constantly bitched about every thing. Joe and I saw a lot of combat together. Unlike the others in the platoon, I was already a machine gunner prior to us deploying to Vietnam, and was not as Gung Ho as the others.

Ron Zacker was also A-Gunner in our machine gun team. I liked Ron because he bitched as much as I did. Zack was as strong as a bull. He could hump the hills with extra ammo and those silly tripods with the best of them. Zack was badly wounded early in the tour. Joe and I both thought highly of him. As close as we all were, when someone got hit and left, it was like they never existed. It was like if you put it out of your mind, it did not happen.

Richie Clark was a Navy Corpsman assigned to our platoon. Richie was from Babylon L.I., about two miles from where I grew up in Bay Shore. We became friends probably because we felt close due to our home town proximity. Richie was very cocky and not liked by the senior NCO's. One day this corpsman was checking the troops for VD. It was called "A Pecker Check". Richie approached the Company Gunny and said, "whip it out Gunny" .The Gunny was furious. He said: "Clark I've been married over twenty years and I don't need anybody to be checking me". Clark was unfazed. He told the Gunny he had his orders and again told the Gunny "Whip it out." I'm convinced that Clark fate changed that day. Every time the grunts went out on an ambush, it seemed they had Clark with them.

1st Sergeant Ben Goddard was a Marines, Marine; he was responsible for implementing all of Captain Bynum's orders. Every time he saw me he would say the same thing; "Mahoney, I am going to make a Marine of you yet", and took a playful swing at me with the shillelagh he always carried. Everyone in the platoon had the greatest respect for him. Even in the 100 degree heat of the jungle, he would hump the hills with all the young Marines. Even the scout dog we had with us, suffered from heat stroke and had to be med-evaced.

We once gave him an AK-47 inscribed by all the men from Kilo Company. He extended for another tour when we left, and suffered a near fatal wound to his neck. He once remarked that when he retired he was going to have a PFC in Dress Blues, chauffeur him around in a limousine. We all said we would be honored to volunteer for that assignment.

Don" Moe" Miller was a rifleman with Corsas squad in first platoon. Moe was a character right out of a war movie. He was from Zanesville Ohio. He always reminded everyone of this very important fact. He should have been from Kentucky or Tennessee, because he had those boonie instincts of Davy Crockett or Daniel Boone. He wore a pair of black lace panties on his helmet that was sent by his girlfriend. Moe was always our point man. If there were enemy in the area he could sense it. If there was a trip wire, Moe could usually find it. My aunt was sending me copies of the N.Y. Daily News, and Moe would always ask me for the funnies. The series that interested us the most was a series of articles called TEEN WISE. It gave teenagers advice on their problems. What a hoot. Here we were in a war and reading advice on how to handle adolescent problems.

Sgt. Victor Oliver Nunez was weapons platoon sergeant. He was from Mexico City. He joined the Marines after seeing John Wayne in "The Sands of Iwo Jima". He was on his second of three tours in Nam. He was wounded seven times; three of those times with us. He was very popular with the troops, and knew how to treat people. He always had a smile on his face. I use to kid him by calling him the "Human Magnet," and the "Human Dog Target". He would laugh at my New York accent, and tell me "Jake, say Coffee".

One night we laid in an open field in a defensive position. It was pouring and windy and we were Freezing our asses off. Vic and I huddled for warmth. I told him the next day that we got engaged last night. We had Amtrac's with us and their guys were starting the engines for heat. One of the grunts got close to the engine for warmth. While the poor grunt was trying to get some warmth the Amtrac Marine stood on top and inadvertently pissed on him. I said to Nunez "everybody pisses on the grunts", Nunez laughed; he loved being a grunt in machine guns.

One night we went out on ambushes to a location known as Rabbit Site. We usually went out about 1500 meters before we set up. On this night it was the monsoon season, and was it ever a wet miserable night. We decided to set up a phony ambush so we could get back to our base. We all began firing. When I opened up with the machine gun I was to close to Richie and I think it later had an effect on his hearing. We radioed back to the CP that our ambush site had been compromised, and requested that we return. Our ploy did not work and we were ordered to set it up again at another location.

After a few months Clark transferred to Recon. I think if he stayed with us he figured the Gunny would eventually get him killed. On rare occasions, we were in hardbacks at Phu Bai. They put us on alert to be choppered to pull out recon patrols. These standbys were called Sparrow hawk. One day corporal Tony Rosell got drunk and began yelling "Sparrow Hawk on the Road". We fell out in full combat gear reading to go. We were halfway to the chopper pads when we found out it was all a joke. The next day 1st Sergeant Goddard had Corporal Rosell wearing a large field pack marching up and down the road, in 100 degree heat.

On another occasion Recon was actually surrounded. We landed about 200 clicks from them and climbed a hill to link up. The point man from recon had a bullet strike a grenade he was carrying, and it was deflected, yet left him only with a nasty burn. Their Lieutenant had taken over his position and was killed. Recon was a hairy job, so they had priority in extracting them from an area. Our squad set up a perimeter and cleared an LZ. You could hear the NVA all around us but couldn't see them. A Huey came in and we started firing so Recon could get out.

It was starting to get dark and we could hear the NVA moving closer. Somebody had a small flashlight and signaled another chopper to get us out. If we stayed there overnight we would be over run by the NVA. A chopper hovered at the LZ and we had one minute to get on. Instead of a Huey they sent a Chinook. We crawled up the ramp as the chopper long. They caught us in an open area with artillery and mortars. We hauled ass for a wood line. I never made it. A rocket exploded near me and I took shrapnel. The blast dislocated my knee. I looked down at my leg expecting it to be gone. I think the rocket hit a soft spot in the ground which absorbed most of the blast. I crawled to the tree line and started digging a hole. I thought the human wave assault was coming next. The NVA were no longer invisible. We later learned we were out numbered 5 to 1.

There were a lot of yells for corpsmen, one wrapped my leg and put a tag on me. He said its all right Jake, you're out of here. It started to rain heavy. I was in a daze. It was like a dream. I didn't even recognize the corpsman. I didn't know were Beck was. The choppers started to come in to take out the wounded. I waited because I wasn't that badly wounded.

When they finally put me on a chopper I was happy to get out. A gunny sergeant with a head wound held my hand the whole flight. I think he was in shock. We landed at a place called C-2. I waited for a while, while they treated the badly wounded. I felt like such an asshole being there. I had trouble walking, but my wounds were minor compared to most of the guys. I regret leaving till this day. They wrapped me up and I eventually went back to help defend Dong Ha. I was on crutches when I ran into my old buddy Jim Dearden. He threw a grenade and it was either thrown back or landed short and got him in the leg.

Sirens went off which meant incoming! Jim and I headed for a trench. Jim had a six pack of cold beer. He also had a portable record player and one record. We spent the next couple of hours drinking beer and singing "Grooving on a Sunday Afternoon", by the Young Rascals. Dong Ha was getting heavy fire from the North, and we could care less. We were getting our load on and weren't concerned with the incoming. From Dong Ha they moved us to defend Khe Sanh. It later would become known as The Siege.

The base was taking heavy rocket and mortar fire. The veterans could hear the rounds when they left the tubes. We would head for the ditches as soon as we heard the distinct noise. The guys with less experience would pile on top of us after the first round landed. I had a new guy say I'm sorry for landing on you. I said, " that's alright, can you get three or four more guys on top of me".

When it was time to rotate home, the Marine Corps gave us the option of waiting longer in-country or leaving on a ship two weeks early. Joe Beck decided he would wait for a plane home. I said give me a row boat and a couple of oars and I'd leave now. If you stayed and took the fast plane ride home you could get killed. Most of the guys not wanting to take the risk, had to take a boring two weeks at sea.

We pulled out of Danang harbor in the fall of 1967. When the ship cleared Viet Nam, one of the grunts yelled "IN COMING' every body in the squad bay nervously laughed. This was the first time in over a year we felt safe. I told somebody I didn't think the NVA had any submarines. A month before the tour of 3/26 had ended they had suffered over 40% causalities in four days. We had caught the heaviest combat at the end of our tour.

I went to the wall
Today and I cried

I cried for the living
And I cried for those Who died

I cried for myself
Because I came home

Someday I will join
Them and not be alone

I cried for the dreams
That will never unfold

For the love unspoken
That will never be told

I cried for my daughter And my wife at my side

For the horror and Anguish covered by Pride

I cried for a nation
So absorbed in its sin

It could turn its back
On its finest young Men.

I cried for my brothers
Who still live in hell

With no one to turn to
Their stories to tell

I went to the Wall
today and cried

FINAL TRIBUTE FOR CHARLIE GOODBYE MY FRIEND

By Neil Kenny Lima Co 3/26

The steady thumping of compressed air, that distinct sound of a Huey Gunship, echoed across the hallowed ground coupled with the volley of fire from a firing squad, as we departed the National Cemetery of Indiantown Gap, Pennsylvania. With family and friends having gone, we few, we band of brothers stood as one, for a last time, to pass in review for a Sergeant of Marines.

Our Brother Charlie Fox has reported for duty at the gates of his creator, in a place far removed from here, here where he has done so much for so many for so long. He shall be long remembered by all whose lives he touched.

When I arrived at the funeral home the previous evening to join the ranks, the seemingly endless line of folks stood quietly gathered. Entering the facility, we sat and waited near Kathy, Todd, Lynn, Grant and the rest of the Fox clan. It would be several hours before the long line of visitors had passed and then we stood gathered as one to softly say a pray and pay our respects to this man.

The folks who came, viewed the many mementos displayed throughout the large viewing area. The 'famous' mud bowl team photo. The State Championship Team in those crisp, red uniforms. The many featured photographs of a man who wore mostly nothing more than a set of sweats, set off by a red ball cap sitting somewhat back upon his head, yet permanently affixed to show that mischievous smile that was inquiring if you might be "Brain Damaged".

There too, were the ample photo arrangements of Marines who had stood beside him through his service in the Corps, and during his journey in the Nam. There was the very helmet that he wore in Nam that he managed to procure. It was adorned with his short timer calendar, hometown slogans of choice, and the name of the now long forgotten girlfriend who never made the rank of wife, mother, companion and friend to this old warrior. The black rubber inner tube held that still full bottle of halizone tablets, accompanied by the all so sacred and precious roll of sh!t paper that we cherished. Especially since we didn't bother to use those halizone tablets.

Attired in his coaching uniform and encased within his poncho liner we placed two coins from our association - one old, one new, a bottle of Jack and a red cover that said it all--Khe Sanh Vet--into his coffin for his final patrol.

We retired to the Holiday Inn and stood in the parking lot into the early morning of the day upon which we would lay to rest our brother, our friend. We did, as Marines are oft to do, fetched and bitched about this and that, and tried to avoid any conversation of all that we knew we would shortly reluctantly do. It was the anticipation of the days events that we sought to somehow displace, while knowing we would surely do that which Charlie would gladly and sadly have done for each of us if it were his appointed duty.

When I think about it, I had only spent perhaps twenty-five or thirty days with Charlie in this life.

Those days were the shared time spent at our reunions. Truth be told, it was the few hours he and I shared in Charleston and Chicago that joined us forever. Just several days before he passed, I was blessed to have sat with Charlie, Kathy and Lynn at their second home - the Red Land Midget Football Field - for several hours into the next morning; talking about this and that, sharing the secrets of our soul.

This past July at our reunion in the Windy City, I sat and listened to Charlie speak to a gathered group of Poolies - young men seeking to earn the Title of Marine. His words were profound. He told them, "I have been married to the same woman for thirty-five years. I have three beautiful and wonderful kids. I have been a police officer for twenty-nine years. I have coached state championship football teams. I have coached state championship baseball teams. I have coached state championship softball teams. The thing of which I am the proudest is having been a Squad Leader of Marines in Combat.

I knew then as I know now and always have, from the time when I was a nineteen-year-old Corporal, that no experience would ever compare to, a squad leader of Marines. I watched as he, who had paved the path for those who would follow, passed the torch to the next generation of Marines.

A lone wasp rested upon my back at the church. It next drifted over to Kathy and the kids. Flying up to the pulpit, it circled Harold Easter, Charlie's lifelong friend, and oft thought of second brother. It settled upon the ear of Tom Shank, a police officer who had the privilege to be trained by Charlie and serve along side him for seventeen years as a member of the Lower Swatara Police Force. My bride, Alice, said that while folks often say butterflies are the soul of our departed who visit to reassure us, it was befitting that Charlie stop by each who spoke of him this day. A feared warrior this Wasp - no better friend, no worse enemy. An insect lost within the confines of a church, or rather Charlie touching each of us to say, I am free of this world and in my final place. I await you each at this place we all call home. Charlie was really more of a Wasp than a Butterfly, if you know what I mean.

The more than mile long procession of cars followed Charlie to the Red Land Midget Football Field. The bleachers were packed with a standing room only crowd who stood silently in the gently rain. Charlie exited his vehicle and escorted by his Honor Guard, passed through the ranks of police officers and Khe Sanh Veterans who stood at attention as he made his way one last time to the fifty-yard line. There his namesake Scott, recited the poem Coach. Charlie's youngest asked all those gathered whom he coached to come to the field. Attired in their bright red jerseys the team huddled around their Coach. The rallying chant was uttered and the players placed their hands upon their Coach vowing to continue as their war chant echoed one last time while Charlie stood upon his favorite battleground.

Exiting the stadium, the long line of twenty-six vehicles, perhaps to symbolize the regiment in which we served, slowly drove through the highways and byways of Charlie's life. Those who we passed along the way, moved aside and waited while we traveled that path that we all shall someday make.

It was befitting the man, this Sergeant of Marines, this Son, this Brother, this Husband, this Father, this Coach, this Friend; to make this patrol to the Final Formation to join that Battalion of Kings.

I shall love you and miss you until I see you in the morning, Sergeant.

A FINAL GOODBYE
CHARLIE"S FINAL FAREWELL
By Tom Ford

On Thursday I went down to Lewisbury Pa to pay my last respects to one of our beloved members, Sgt Charlie Fox. I joined the ranks of fellow Khe Sanh Veterans Bruce Geiger (Dusters&Quads), Sid "Fish" Patricio (Delta 1/26), Neil Kenny (Lima 3/26) and his wife Alice. You would have thought Charlie was the mayor by the amount of people that were present. There was a viewing line that wrapped around the building. I unofficially timed the waiting time at 1hr 25 minutes to see Charlie, and the family. This went on from 1800 till well after 2100 hrs, non-stop. We were warmly received by all.

Friday, in the rain, was the church service. I found myself thinking "God its great to be a MARINE and a KHE SANH VETERAN". While waiting for the services to begin, I had the pleasure of meeting Lt Col. Joseph Innerst, USMC recently retired, who showed up in dress blues, and was quite enamored by our (KSV) presence, as were all. When I thought that it couldn't get any better, it did. I observed two more KSV walking up the driveway. Both of them were wearing the "Siege" hats. They were Ed Goggins from (Pa), and Lee Rimkus from (Montana!) who served in Charlie Co 1/26.

A short time later, Steve Hecknauer (Pa), another Charlie Co guy, comes walking out of the crowd. Now I'm thinking "Squad minus"! It even got better because the young pastor of the church turned the ceremony over to the former pastor, Harold Easter, a life long buddy of Charlie Fox, and a Former Marine and Khe Sanh Vet with Alpha 1/26. His eulogy was outstanding!

From the church we went to the RED LAND MIDGET FOOTBALL FIELD for a "ceremony" that I will carry with me forever. It was a "Pass & Review" at the football stadium where Charlie has probably spent his entire lifetime helping kids. Charlie was carried, in the rain, by family and friends to the 50 yard line and then ALL the "kids" that Charlie ever coached were summoned from the crowd to the casket, and once present, they surrounded it and began what I think (I never played football) was a final cheer for their beloved coach. All of this was witnessed by another 200 people standing at the fence above the field. A very moving moment.

Then at the cemetery, Charlie's mom drags this guy down to our KSV contingent to introduce him and it turns out to be John Sabol, HMM-364 (Purple Foxes) another Khe Sanh Veteran! Wow! Have we got Charlie covered or what? After the prayer ceremony we let all of the people leave the area and WE (We Band of Brothers) Khe Sanh Veterans, stood at attention around Charlie and gave Sgt Charlie Fox, (C Co 1/26) Khe Sanh Veteran, a final hand salute.

In Memory of Charlie Fox
By Corporal Ken Pae

When I arrived in Khe Sanh in November of 1967, I was assigned to Charlie Fox's squad and from that day our friendship grew. I quickly learned to trust and respect his decisions, and relied on him without question. I knew that Charlie, along with God's help, would keep me safe—and they did!

Upon arriving in Khe Sanh, I was assigned to be the radio man, but what Charlie neglected to tell me was that the radio man was always the target—DAMN!

I remember one night after a monsoon rain, that Charlie assigned me to a four-hour night watch. The fog set in and I could not see my hand in front of my face and the silence petrified me because I did not know what was out there.

I also remember going out on LPs at night and Charlie telling everyone to be as quiet as a mouse. Believe me, I was quiet; I think I even forgot to breathe. When I was at the last reunion this past July, I was again amazed at how Charlie could remember every operation, every person's name, their date when they were wounded or killed and where it happened. And, once again, Charlie reminded me how he got me shot in the leg, but I knew it wasn't his fault—I was a casualty of war.

Charlie Fox was the best squad leader a person could ever have. He looked after me and he looked after all of his men, and we love him for it. I am proud to have served with Charlie.

MY UNSUNG HERO
By John Pessoni A Co 3rd Engineers

This is in memory of PFC Randall Phelps who served in my squad at Khe Sanh during the Siege. I used to call him Shultz because I did not like his first name. He was posthumously awarded the Bronze Star with the Combat "V" for bravery, while attached to Company C, First Battalion Ninth Marines. An outstanding Marine who will never be forgotten by the guys he served with God bless you brother till we meet again.

His citation reads in part:
On April 3rd 1968, Randall Phelps was serving as a Combat Engineer with Charlie Company, First Battalion Ninth Marines, on Hill 477, near the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The Company was suddenly attacked by an estimated North Vietnamese Battalion. PFC Phelps, position came under attack by a squad of NVA, utilizing heavy small arms fire and grenades. PFC Randall Phelps, delivered effective fire against the enemy until other Marines were able to join him in the defense of his position. On April 8th, when his position on hill 689 came under an intense enemy Mortar barrage, Private First Class Randall Phelps, again distinguished himself when, disregarding his own safety, he assisted in loading badly wounded Marines aboard a med-evac helicopter, before he himself, was mortally wounded.

I REMEMBER

By Michael OHara
B Co 1/26

On this date in 1967 a battle would rage south of I corps in a rubber tree plantation. A place called Srok Rung near Loc Ninh (hope I spelled it correctly) An Army unit was heavily engaged with a large Viet Cong force. Much bravery was displayed that day. One soldier earned our nations highest honor. (Stryker)

One brave trooper who was KIA that day and died a very hard death was a young soldier named Larry Clayton Banks. Larry was one of my best friends all thru high school. We spent our last leave home together before we shipped out for the Nam. Larry was a sole surviving son but chose to go anyway. He was the only man from my sparsely populated county to be killed in the Vietnam War. Three of us from the same class served at Khe Sanh and survived.

I served with 1st Bn 26th Marine Regiment.
Larry served with 1st Bn 26th Army.

I still miss him terribly.

MEMORIALS

BIRTHDAY TRIBUTE MY DAD, FORGOTTEN HERO, NO MORE!

His son remembers Lieutenant Pham Van Hoa, Vietnamese Air Force

Each year, I pause on this date to commemorate my father's life and to celebrate the Marine Corp's Birthday with bittersweet irony. Now that my father is gone again, I realize I had joined the Marines for him and for South Vietnam, as much as I did for any sense of patriotism to America. I wanted to relieve him of a loser's guilt, a husband's regret, a father's remorse. I had to backtrack four decades.

I was born a Vietnamese in an old French hospital six months before President Lyndon B. Johnson ordered thousands of U.S. Marines into my country. Growing up amid a brewing war in my own backyard, my childhood dream was to become a pilot and serve my country like my father.

A decade later, before communist tanks rumbled through my hometown, my family, minus my father, was flown to Marine Barracks Guam. At Tan Son Nhut air base, Marines had been flown ashore to evacuate Saigon. A few days after we left, my father rushed the U.S. Embassy in Saigon along with a frenzied mob. A shirtless Marine wearing a flak jacket pressed his M-16 against my father's chest and prevented him from entering the compound as the last choppers departed. Stranded and dejected like Miss Saigon, my father watched with shame as South Vietnamese soldiers ripped off their uniforms and threw their rifles into the Saigon River to evade capture by the approaching communist troops.

My mother raised my three sisters and I in California by herself. When we landed in the United States, she was 39, spoke no English and had never traveled abroad. We spoke French, but I thank God, and Buddha, that we didn't go to Paris to live with my aunt, because there I wouldn't have been able to realize my dreams. My mother, however, could not have predicted the powerful forces pulling me to my calling, even in a foreign country.

My father finally made it to America. But once he arrived on these shores he never received a welcome home, veteran's benefits, or a pension. He had served his country for 21 years, South Vietnam's entire existence, and had survived another 12 years in captivity. After the war, his former allies and their journalistic chroniclers, safely home in the United States, portrayed the South Vietnamese as corrupt, incompetent, shadowy figures who had not been worth backing. (Sounds like the Iraqis?) The communists couldn't break him though they repeatedly tried; they forced him into hard labor in numerous reeducation/prison camps where he nearly died. His captors called him unpatriotic, traitor, American puppet, pirate pilot, and cheap mercenary. Finally, with intervention from the Reagan Administration, they allowed him to emigrate.

In 1999, my father became an American citizen, sworn in by Judge David O. Carter, a Marine veteran who had been seriously wounded in Khe Sanh. I was there to witness the momentous occasion, two heroes and former allies embracing each other, two veterans of the war in Vietnam.

Five years ago today, my father took his last breath. He had lapsed into a ten-day-long coma, resulting from a massive stroke amid radiation therapy treatment for lung cancer. Two weeks earlier, he had cast his first and only, presidential ballot in a free election. Around the world, in every clime and place, Marines celebrated the Corps' 230th birthday, except me, I was crying.

At his funeral, my father's old comrades showed up in force to honor him, as did some of my Marine friends. The men who had served with my father in squadrons and in the prison camps had draped a large yellow flag with the three bright-red horizontal stripes over his coffin. The afternoon I gave his eulogy was the hardest day in my life: I had lost my father a second time. I had to eulogize him in English. I had neglected my native tongue far too long for me to speak eloquently of his life and legacy in Vietnamese.

People have told me that with death comes closure. It was the opposite for me. My father's passing away raised more questions and created a greater void inside me, a burning desire to ask him the $64,000 question. "When you think back Dad, were all the fighting and bloodshed in Vietnam worth the price?"

As I began tracing my father's history in the Vietnam War, I came across an old letter he had written me:

Dear Son,
If it doesn't matter to you what I did was a failure, then I will tell you some stories of the past. All I've been doing is to get along with all of you. Things have changed. No one can estimate to what extent. I was a coward. For you guys see me become a loser, my old combat friends will see me with another eye. Another reason, either simple coincidence or you may call it destiny, is you're in the same Marine unit that I used to fly support for, and was rescued by, in the early days of the U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

I was floored. I immediately powered up the computer and Googled various key words. This was what I discovered. I almost didn't get to meet my father at all. This was my first connection to the U.S. Marine Corps.

On April 27, 1964, five months before I was born, my father, then Second Lieutenant Pham Van Hoa (pronounced "Hwa") of the Vietnamese Air Force was shot down in his Skyraider attack aircraft. He had been flying in support of the largest heliborne assault up to that point flown by U.S. advisers in their secret war. After dead-sticking his stricken plane to a loamy field near Do Xa in central Vietnam, he awaited his fate as the Viet Cong rushed down from the hills and closed in. Luckily, a Marine helicopter had followed his smoky silhouetted plane. The pilot landed his chopper next to the Skyraider and the rest is history.

Forty years after that heroic rescue, I tracked down the Marine pilot-turned docent at the Steven F. Udvar-Hazy Center (Smithsonian Air & Space Museum) near Dulles Airport. At age 74, retired Colonel John Braddon still sounded like a tough fighter pilot (he only flew helicopters for one tour). Between leading visitors through the museum, Braddon and I sat down for a quick lunch. We traded war stories, his much longer than mine. He finally shared his memories of that fateful day: "I do not deserve great credit for my action. Years before, USMC helicopter squadrons supporting Vietnamese units had decided to set aside helicopters to rescue downed crews and that is why I was prepared to rescue Lt. Hoa. Also, Lt. Hoa was supporting Marines. In that capacity he came under the umbrella that 'Marines take care of their own.' However briefly, he supported us and became one of us and we made sure he was cared for."

Upon hearing those words, my mission came to an end. I had to meet Braddon to complete my final duties. My father had somehow managed to move on about the Vietnam War before I could. His refusal to blame anyone for the betrayal of South

Vietnam, his lack of bitterness for his imprisonment, his avoidance of hatred were his greatest legacies, affecting me more than his military service. Before he went into surgery, he told my oldest sister: "I'm not afraid to die. I've lived a full life, I have no regrets."

My head is clear, my breaths come free. Thank you Colonel John Braddon. Semper fi Dad. And Happy Birthday Marines!

WEB BRIEFS

I'M SO EXITED

By Steven Wiese, B Co 1/26

I can't begin to tell you how excited I am, that captain Pipes called to let me know he had heard from Mike McCauley who was in my squad in Khe Sanh, he gave me his phone number. I called Mike and we talked about all the old squad members - it was great: He said he had a picture of the whole squad, and he was going to send me a copy, which I'm really looking forward to. The picture was taken before March 30th, so it has all the (old) squad members except Arthur Smith, and that's because Mike said Arthur took the pictures.

I'm so excited that after all these years I finally found a member of the squad, though we really didn't talk that long. I think we were both kind of in shock; we said we would talk again in the near future. I can't express my gratitude to captain Pipes for all the help he has been, first finding Lt. Long, and now Mike. I know the board has helped bring a lot of people together, and that's what it's all about.

The Young Marine and the Old Cop

By Charles M. Grist
Special to the Orlando Sentinel
Posted October 26, 2005

The young Marine, in his dress-blue uniform, sat in the passenger seat of the car. He was visibly upset and his new wife, in a formal dress, stood helplessly nearby. I was the cop called to the hotel parking lot at 3 A.M. for a disturbance. Now that I had found it, I had to fix it. Walking up to the Marine, I glanced at his uniform and immediately recognized the Global War on Terrorism Expeditionary Medal. This meant he had been overseas in the war on terror, probably to either Iraq or Afghanistan. He had been drinking at his wedding reception and his wife said he wouldn't get out of their car.

I asked him where he had been overseas and, staring straight ahead, he said, "Fallujah," a major battleground for Marines in Iraq. When I asked him how long ago, he said he had only been back for a couple of months. Then he started to cry. I knelt down next to the car and told him that I was an Army sergeant and that I had also been in Iraq, stationed in Baghdad. He suddenly looked at me with a look of "recognition," that unique way that one war veteran looks at another. Through wet eyes he said that "they," meaning the insurgents, had killed his friends. It was clear now that the problem was post-traumatic stress.

As I put my hand on the shoulder of this strapping young Marine, I told him that I knew how he felt, and I did. When I was his age, I was returning from Vietnam with similar memories. I told him that it had been 34 years since I returned from that war and I can still see the faces of my friends who died there. After my tour in Iraq, I have new faces to add to the old memories. After he calmed down a little, he agreed to let me help him to his room. I asked him if he was still on active duty, and he said he was on leave but planned to spend his whole life in the Marines. I smiled to myself. He was a spiritually "wounded" warrior, but he was still a warrior.

As we reached the hotel room, I looked at him and shook his hand. I told him that he had lost a great deal in Iraq, but he had also been given a great gift. He asked me what I meant. I explained to him that he had been given a chance to teach other Marines the warrior skills he had learned in combat. Now that he is an experienced infantryman, he not only has the opportunity, but the obligation, to pass his knowledge on to new Marines. This would be the best way for him to honor his fallen comrades. He promised that he would do so. Then he began to cry again. I put my arm around him as a father would for a son. I did feel his pain and briefly my own pain returned, giving me a lump in my throat.

What a sight we must have been; the old cop embracing the young Marine.

At one point the young man said, "They just don't understand." He was talking about the rest of the world—the non-warriors—those for whom we carry the sword. I told him that, no, most do not understand and never will. That is why we take care of each other, just as we did in war. Then the new husband joined his bride in their room.

I walked outside into a hot summer night and returned to my job on the street.

It was time for a cup of coffee.

NEWS FROM IRAQ

MY FINAL FREEDOM BIRD FLIGHT
By Lt/Col Jim Zucarelli

Everyone ... The time is 1230 hours here in Baghdad. I am leaving Baghdad for Tikrit at 1600 hours. The trip is by convoy which should take a little less than three hours. My tour in Baghdad comes to an end. My time in Tikrit will be working with the 101st Airborne Division troops and helping them assimilate into the Iraqi overall combat/ reconstruction mission.

This transitional period will last until the 10th of November (the birthday of the Marine Corps). On that date, I should feel "wheels-up" out of Iraq and fly down to Kuwait. Kuwait will be "hurry up and wait" until the most happiest of "wheels-up" and that is when I leave Southwest Asia for the flight back to the States.

Back in Vietnam, that flight was called the "Freedom Bird". For me, it will be my second, and most definitely my last, "Freedom Bird" flight. This has been a chapter in my life that will be memorable, but laced with a little nostalgia as well. How does one control their inner-most feelings? One does not.

I have been flooded with long ago memories of leaving Vietnam as a young 22 year old Marine Second Lieutenant. Now I find myself trying to come to terms with leaving Iraq as a middle-aged 58 year old Army Lieutenant Colonel. The juxtaposition of this tsunami of emotional feelings is, at times, overwhelming. A world without wars in today's world is a utopian dream. However, when war rears its ugly head those that march off to war are the young; and for me, "America's Finest".

I am an aberration. Too old and too slow. What I have seen in this past year over here in Iraq is America's young that are so innocent I want to adopt them all. and I want to personally bring them all home safely. That is my utopian dream. If I can end my tour of duty here In Iraq with one wish, and one wish only, it would be this. For all of you back home, never, absolutely never, forget this young generation who have left the safety of the American shores for hostile climates throughout the world. Support our troops; pray for our troops; and never ever reject our troops. Say what you want about those leaders who make the decisions back in Washington, DC. I, myself, also hold my opinion. But never turn your frustrations and aggravations against these young men and young women over here just doing their job; with no complaints and no hesitations. Support them. When I see them on the streets of Baghdad they are all "babies". My heart breaks for them. I love them so much. I care for their safety; more than I do for mine.

God Bless, Good-Bye and Semper Fi. See you all back "in-the-world" .

OUR NEW MILITARY

The average age of the military man is 19 years. He is a short haired, tight-muscled kid who, under normal circumstances is considered by society as half man, half boy. Not yet dry behind the ears, not old enough to buy a beer, but old enough to die for his country. He never really cared much for work and he would rather wax his own car than wash his father's; but he has never collected unemployment either.

He's a recent High School graduate; he was probably an average student, pursued some form of sport activities, drives a ten year old jalopy, and has a steady girlfriend that either broke up with him when he left, or swears to be waiting when he returns from half a world away. He listens to rock and roll or hip-hop or rap or jazz or swing. He is 10 or 15 pounds lighter now than when he was at home because he is working or fighting from before dawn to well after dusk. He has trouble spelling, thus letter writing is a pain for him, but he can field strip a rifle in 30 seconds and reassemble it in less time in the dark. He can recite to you the nomenclature of a machine gun or grenade launcher and use either one effectively if he must. He digs foxholes and latrines and can apply first aid like a professional. He can march until he is told to stop.

He obeys orders instantly and without hesitation, but he is not without spirit or individual dignity. He is self-sufficient. He has two sets of fatigues: he washes one and wears the other. He keeps his canteens full and his feet dry. he sometimes forgets to brush his teeth, but never to clean his rifle. He can cook his own meals, mend his own clothes, and fix his own hurts. If you're thirsty, he'll share his water with you; if you are hungry, his food. He'll even split his ammunition with you in the midst of battle when you run low. He has learned to use his hands like weapons and weapons like they were his hands. He can save your life - or take it, because that is his job. He will often do twice the work of a civilian, draw half the pay and still find ironic humor in it all. He has seen more suffering and death then he should have in his short lifetime.

He has stood atop mountains of dead bodies, and helped to create them. He has wept in public and in private, for friends who have fallen in combat and is unashamed. He feels every note of the National Anthem vibrate through his body while at rigid attention, while tempering the burning desire to 'square-away' those around him who haven't bothered to stand, remove their hat, or even stop talking. In an odd twist, day in and day out, far from home, he defends their right to be disrespectful. Just as did his Father, Grandfather, and Great-grandfather, he is paying the price for our freedom. Beardless or not, he is not a boy. He is the American Fighting Man that has kept this country free for over 200 years.

He has asked nothing in return, except our friendship and understanding. Remember him, always, for he has earned our respect and admiration with his blood. And now we even have women over there in danger, doing their part in this tradition of going to War when our nation calls us to do so. As you go to bed tonight, remember this shot... A short lull, a little shade and a picture of loved ones in their helmets

For our troops in Afghanistan, sailors on ships, and airmen in the air, and for those in Iraq. "Lord, hold our troops in your loving hands. Protect them as they protect us. Bless them and their families for the selfless acts they perform for us in our time of need. Amen."

Living Life Under the Rigors of Post Traumatic Stress
Strange Parallels
The Man Behind "The Twilight Zone"
By James Carmichael E Co 2/26

"There is a fifth dimension beyond that which is known to man...It is a dimension as vast as space and timeless as infinity...It is the middle ground between light and shadow, between science and superstition, and it lies between the pit of man's fears, and the summit of his knowledge...This is the dimension of imagination. It is an area we call the twilight zone."

This is a timeless monologue uttered by a familiar if not durable voice whose naturally cropped clauses brought terse drama to the burgeoning television culture of America in the 1960's. In tandem with Rod Serling's opening monologue was that unconventionally eerie music that would set the nation's mental palate for his eccentric style of provocation. That was its design. I was weaned on the clever suspense it brought into my sheltered world. And for 30 spellbinding minutes each week, less commercial interruptions, I was transported into a dimension of surrealism and irony as I'm certain you were. I would miss homework rather than the "Twilight Zone".

But it was only recently, while watching his biography on television that I discovered to my utter amazement that his life was propelled, if not altogether eclipsed by the same disorder from which I and so many of us suffers. I didn't know he was a combat veteran. Amid the immense and immediate world of Rod Serling existed a bewildering ignorance of the writer, the husband and father whose core was as enigmatic as it was dark. Of this I was certain. I knew intuitively watching that commentary on his life just what made him "tick". He suddenly ceased to be the international Star I thought I knew. Instead, he became my brother in arms. He and I, should I say, we all were now joined at the hip, so to speak.

Rodman Edward Serling left for military service with the usual trepidation and determination of many young men his age in a world gone mad. World War two had become fact. But he never fully relinquished his grasp on the nurturing womb of Binghamton, New York, his maternal home. Yet it was with a sizeable number of indisputable genetic family traits that he entered the world at large. We, as his adoring audience, would recognize most of them as we watched him perform on television.

The primary particulars one noticed about him were external and behavioral. As a collage, each formed the boundaries of his enigmatic personality. He was handsome, cheerful, polite and confident. He also had a temper. He could be ruthless in debate and he was given to bouts of depression. His desire was to be a typical teen and to that end he succeeded.

He received from his parents a rich inheritance of abstract but impressive qualities that would stand him in good stead with the up and coming universe of television. His father, Sam, an engineer at heart, passed to Rod the love of language. His mother Esther, lovingly bequeathed her youngest offspring her own engaging disposition and staunch intellect.

Yet all of these genetic qualities needed an engine to drive the whole person forward. That dynamic machinery came in the form of what he did not possess: size. Rod barely stood five feet four and a half inches tall. For a lesser man this might have been an insurmountable impediment. Size, or the lack of it, proved to be Rod Serling's shining motivation. It would propel him beyond an infantry grade position to that of paratrooper. He was a para guy, jump boots and all.

All Rod needed was a directional gyroscope. His birth into a non-orthodox Jewish family was the path his father Sam chose for his family. It was in high school that he began to view all religions with a jaundiced eye. Rod specifically chose to date Gentile girls. Unfortunately, the Jewish fraternity he pledged did not look favorably on this practice and subsequently voted him out. Thus he was banned from participation in his university coterie. Slowly he would have to look at a world he couldn't explain, and within himself for internal inertia. Rod ultimately turned to Unitarianism, as did many Jews of that era.

Yet few of us could have guessed what dark events formed the opening dialogue in Rod Serling's "Twilight Zone" mind. The opening paragraph to this chapter was born and fomented in the South Pacific, Leyte, the Philippines, atop one of the foothills of the Mahonags, in December, 1944, surrounded by hundreds of Imperial Japanese soldiers.

Author Gordon F. Sander, writes this of Serling's dark and dangerous two weeks surrounded by hostile Pacific forces, "One incident in particular that occurred during the siege, during a close-in food drop by army cargo planes, traumatized the once gung-ho 'paraguy.' A friend in the outfit, an equally loquacious Jewish corporal from Brooklyn by the name of Melvin Levy, had a refreshing habit of mock-directing the 'biscuit bombers' during the intense, unchuted food drops. Then, during one of the drops, while Levy, Serling, and the rest of the platoon were taking cover under a palm tree and Levy was doing his monologue, one of the huge crates came crashing through the leaves and decapitated him. Afterward, Serling, still in shock, led the services for Levy..."

"Death was a close companion during those two weeks of hell in Leyte. Today it was Levy, killed by a food crate. Who would it be tomorrow--and how would he die? By a 'friendly' food crate? Or by an enemy jungle knife or bayonet? Was there, perhaps, something about a man's face that indicated his number was up? If only they could tell, the battered and beleaguered men wished, as they hunkered down in their foxholes. Years later, that idea, taken to its supernatural conclusion, would animate 'The Purple Testament,' one of Serling's grimmest and most haunting episodes of Twilight Zone, and one of several war stories with a Filipino setting." (Pg. 45-46 A)

During this stretch of fighting, Sander recalls, "To add to Serling's and the other besieged troopers' sense of hopelessness, news came through of a surprise paratroop attack on the division's rear echelon headquarters at Bito Beach...If Division wasn't safe, who was?" (Pg. 46)

Sander makes other statements like these about Serling and the war's effect on him. Upon Rod's homecoming from the war and subsequent discovery of an almost emaciated mother after the death of his father, "Serling continued to be haunted by his memories of the war." (Pg. 52) "Nevertheless, the effect on Serling, who may have been suffering from what today would be described as post traumatic stress disorder...". (Pg. 52) "Spooked by his memories of the war, Serling had difficulty thinking about the future." (Pg. 52) "Like many combat veterans who also became writers, Serling would never quite purge himself of the war and what the war did, good and bad, to its participants. It was to be his dominant literary concern for the next decade." (Pg 55) "He was absolutely reckless. And sometimes, he would just lie there and we thought he was dead..." his friends wrote of him (Pg. 55). "To be sure, as the nineteen-year old education major was soon to discover, that blustery layer of self-assurance was a thin one. Beneath was a war-scarred man-child with a mass of psychological wounds and insecurities." (Pg. 59).

"Fittingly, Serling's first script writing assignment was to conjure up a fifteen-minute squib to commemorate the nation's first Veterans Day. The assignment gave the injured veteran an opportunity to provide his own posttraumatic definition of courage: Not all battles are fought, not all victories are won on a battlefield. And not all courage is found only in actual combat. As an aftermath to this war, there are men fighting new battles...personal struggles that must be fought and won...and these need as much if not more courage. They are conflicts which thousands of disabled veterans are facing with themselves...veterans come back confronted with readjustments to a life without an arm or a leg...It's a tough fight which requires a certain requisite of courage." (Pg. 56-57)

Rod Serling died at age 50 on June 28, 1975. It had been noticed that he had "presentments of death" which "began appearing in Serling's work" prior to his death. (Pg. 216) George Grunbok "was a fellow passenger on a cruise that Serling and his wife took to South America in 1973." George said this about Rod on that trip, "He was kind of temperamental. He'd be high and low in the same day." (Pg. 217)

Over the years, Serling developed a 4 pack a day cigarette habit. "He was always smoking, basically chain-smoking one right after another." (Pg. 215-16) "His drinking also increased. One Cornell professor recalled seeing Serling sitting by himself in a local bar 'getting stewed.'" (Pg. 216) Serling had his third and final heart attack "while in the middle of open heart surgery". (Pg. 218) The doctors found that he had the arteries of an 80 year old. They simply crumbled in the physician's hands.

You may be as surprised as I was to learn that Rod Serling was a combat veteran. But I am not surprised at his age of death and all that attended it. It seems to me, that without realizing it, several generations have been affected in a huge way by the trauma of Rod Serling's war. Because of the food crate incident mentioned previously, life took the form of irony. This was a dominant theme in Mr. Serling's works. This also was terribly clear to me as I watched a television biography of his life. He had all the symptoms of PTSD but none of his close relations or fellow workers who were interviewed, much less the public, seemed to have a clue as to the reasons he acted as he did. He had what I have and what you may have; a trauma induced disorder that colors all of your life. I just thought you might want to know.

RAY'S CORNER

PRESENTATION TO WISCONSIN STATE VETERANS MUSEUM ON DONATION OF KHE SANH MATERIALS, 10 NOVEMBER 2005 BY RAY WILLIAM STUBBE

Today, November 10th, is the 230th Marine Corps Birthday. On November 10th, 1967, the clouds hung low over Khe Sanh. For several weeks we had several inches of rain a day. Trenches and bunkers collapsed. It was impossible to get dry. Although I grew up in Wisconsin, I've never been colder. The clothing of the Marines rotted and their skin shriveled from always being wet. Hills they patrolled were slick mud slides causing broken arms and legs.

On this particular Marine Corps Birthday, I was on Hill 881 South the hills derived their numbered names from how many meters above sea level they are. We were 6 miles from the border of Laos, a little over 14 miles south of the DMZ, and a little over 4th miles from our main support base, Khe Sanh Combat Base. While all of Khe Sanh engendered a sense of isolation, this place was the edge of life.

The hill was completely socked in with fog, and the troops were assembled. Despite the enshrouding isolation, a CH-34 helicopter pierced through the cover bringing our Regimental Commander, Colonel David E. Lownds. Later I said a brief prayer; Colonel Lownds briefly addressed the troops. He mentioned that we would all soon be in the American history books.

Something was about to happen. We all sensed that even if we weren't privy to Top Secret, intelligence convinced the Generals that Khe Sanh was soon to be attacked with a major force.

We all knew the isolation of Khe Sanh, tucked in mountainous terrain so close to nearby Laos, from where tens of thousands of regular divisions of the well trained North Vietnamese Army could suddenly surround and besiege us. Our isolation was further apparent, since we could be reached only by aircraft and a dirt road called Highway 9. It's sinuous path wound through dense vegetation, bordered by sharp cliffs, and contained 31 old bridges, before reaching Khe Sanh. Bridges washed out, roads were easily cut, and ambush sites were abound.

Khe Sanh sat atop the crater of an ancient volcano, and the monsoon rainfalls had weathered the rock into laterite soil that stained everything with a redish hue. The microscopic particles of the soil penetrated into the skin, making those who had been at Khe Sanh different, almost as though the violence there had penetrated through our skin into our very soul. One could not but help think in such primitive thought of what is "taboo": places, things, and people filled with power that is transferred to those who come in contact with them, making them unsafe for normal society. The volcanoes were the result of a massive slamming of land mass into Southeast Asia, causing a rugged mountain range. There were only a few passes along this north-south mountain range, and one of these was at Khe Sanh along Route 9. Along this ancient route and through this small pass, Mongols and Siamese penetrated from the west, and Vietnamese Anamites assaulted from the east. Khe Sanh was either born in violence, and violence palpably suffused the area like a Spiritual miasma, or it was simply the clouds we were experiencing on this Marine Corps Birthday on Hill 881 South.

Khe Sanh was also a wonderful place, cooler than the coastal areas to the east. It was a very beautiful place, almost like a Garden of Eden with lush vegetation and a large variety of animal life from cobras to ocelots, large tigers, wild pigs, large caribou-like animals called Kouprey, pythons, deer, and an amazing variety of insects and birds. Those at Khe Sanh couldn't help but regard it as an enchanted, spiritual place. Yet, all of us who were at Khe Sanh were to learn that "a thing of beauty is [not] a joy forever!"

Khe Sanh was also the home of one of Vietnam's 31 Montagnard tribes which were of a different racial stock than the Vietnamese. The tribe at Khe Sanh was known as the Bru. They were scantily clad, very friendly, very primitive, and all the Americans who came in contact with them came to like them a lot. Old women were in their 20s having crinkled skin, and smoked small clay pipes and had faces betraying loss of most of their children who died from malaria or intestinal infections. Men hunted with wooden crossbows.

Some of our Marines lived in the Bru villages as part of a program that defended the villagers from the enemy. Half the defense force was Marine, half Bru. The Marines sent home for clothing for the Bru children. Once I accompanied a patrol into a neighboring village. Suddenly realizing I had placed my camera on a tree stump and walked away, I became concerned and told one of the Marines who told me, "Don't be concerned, Chaplain, these people haven't even learned to steal" I returned, and there was my camera.

I arrived at Khe Sanh in the middle of July, 1967, when it was very peaceful and beautiful. The monsoon rains had not yet transformed it into a pool of slick mud. Navy Corpsmen playied basketball at the medical area known as "C Med", and the Doctor wore cut-off jungle boots he called his "Jungle Oxfords." The welcomed cooler air was like walking into an air-conditioned room on a torrid summer day.

Only a few weeks earlier, I had been a student in a Ph.D. program at the University of Chicago, sitting at lunch with some of my fellow students when I mentioned that I had volunteered to go to Vietnam as a Chaplain. "How can you, as a representative of the Christian Church, go there and by your presence support a corrupt Saigon regime?" someone asked.

I had been enlisted in the Navy in the reserves during my senior year in high school, on active duty as a deck hand on destroyers for a couple years after graduation, and knew how teens feel in a military setting, far from home. I told my fellow students that I was not concerned about politics, only that I felt someone has to care for the needs of individuals, no matter where they were. Most of the Marines, averaging age 19, told me they went to Vietnam, after they heard President John Kennedy's motivational words: "Ask not what your country can do for you, ask rather what you can do for your country". They soon realized their purpose was personal survival, and came to realize they were here to protect one another.

Chaplains, of course, are not "military persons" according to the Geneva Accords, but are merely officially attached to military units. According to the Geneva Accords, this status becomes apparent should a Chaplain be captured. It is up to him whether to remain with those captured and minister to them, or return to those who have not been captured! Chaplains do not bear arms or fire either in peacetime or during war, not because there is a moral judgment against bearing arms. According to the legal parlance of the Accords, it's simply because the Chaplain is "exclusively engaged" in ministerial duties. So restrictive is this requirement, that in an article that appeared in our Navy Chaplains' Bulletin at the time, gave a scenario of a Chaplain engaging an enlisted assistant driver as he was driving a jeep, being fired upon. The enlisted man is wounded, unable to fire his weapon, and the enemy creeps closer and closer. While the Chaplain may even have been a marksman in civilian life, he is not permitted to take the man's rifle, even to protect him!

Soon after arriving at Khe Sanh, I flew out on a chopper to Hill 881 South, and conducted a worship service. My text was the story of the Prodigal Son who traveled to a far country where life was very difficult. I noticed that most of the Marines' trousers were torn and ripped. One had a large portion of the crotch missing, exposing his manhood. No one wore undergarments, of course. After the worship service, the Company Commander, Captain John Raymond, told me that I shouldn't talk about their conditions of life unless I experienced them. So I accompanied a patrol to gain insight into the living conditions these men faced. I knew that the message of God's love and the assurance of God's presence was proclaimed more by actions and "being with" than simply in words.

The patrol advanced at a rapid pace down the steep northern slope of the hill - the same slope Marines had fought while advancing up it only a few months earlier. I remember falling so much due to the slope and the vines that forward movement was more from falling forward than from walking forward! After half an hour, felt I just couldn't continue. It was impossible to return, however, the only choice was to continue. We waded through rushing streams and crept along rocky sides of a gorge, gingerly moving atop large, slippery rocks. We frequently fell from vines that tangled our feet. Bamboo thickets, like steel bars, were abound. Tall "elephant grass," about 7-foot tall, was razor-sharp, full of bacteria. Cuts on arms and hands resulted in large sores that remained infected for weeks. Although everyone had two canteens full of water, savoring only a small sip at a time, the water was gone after about 7 hours of patrol. The body became completely numb and mechanically continued moving. Small leeches wiggling on leaves attached themselves to exposed skin, and could only be removed by squirting insect repellant or lighting a match and burning them off. Squashing them only resulted in a large infection. Some Marines had a leech somehow get through their fly and creep up their penis.

Those on the outposts lived a very primitive existence. For the six weeks they were on the hill, they were unable to bathe. The Company Commander once handed me a sandbag full of bars of soap, saying, "Take these to the missionaries in the village; we can't use these up here." Many had teeth that showed advance stages of decay. Most Marines used their tooth brushes to clean their rifles because cleaning rods, patches, and just about everything else, was so scarce. The word among the troops was that the Marine Corps returned money to Congress to justify their existence, claiming they could get along with far less than the Army. There was no light at night except for the command bunkers which had Coleman lanterns and those lucky enough to have been sent candles from home.

The men were helpless over situations arising at home a mother who was beaten by the father, brothers who are veering into drugs or crime, a sister into teenage' pregnancy, an uncle or grandparent who had basically raised the Marine, dying, and the Marine couldn't return home or do anything to help family situations. These were the sort of things they shared with me while I stayed overnight at those various outposts, sharing their life.

I thought of these things one night while sitting at a restaurant with my parents several years later. Two women at an adjacent table were talking and one said, "You know, my neighbor gets a retirement from the military. Can you imagine that? All he did was serve his country!" Some will never know. Perhaps this is best, although our knowledge of good and evil experienced, casts us out from the garden forever.

Then came the monsoon rains, several inches a day, with the temperatures about 50 or 40, and since we could never get dry, the cold penetrated into our soul. Trenches and bunkers collapsed. The laterite soil became as slippery as ice. Fog blanketed the area so that aerial observers could not detect enemy presence and re-supply was always questionable. Those on patrols became increasingly miserable. The airstrip began to wash out and had to be completely re-laid with a crushed rock subbase-all during these rains of Biblical proportions. When the siege battle began and dozens of reporters suddenly descended upon us, many were critical that we hadn't dug sufficient positions, but they didn't know that we couldn't, due to the monsoon rainfall.

By the end of 1967, several of our recon teams made contact, resulting in the death of young Marines. One young man from the recon unit, Rick Noyes, was riding in a 6-by truck for a recon insert. Having lost several of his close buddies, he told me he had 5 months left and just didn't want to go in the bush again. As the truck proceeded past the rock quarry area, some of the men from 3/26 jeered them, "Are there really any enemy out there?" they taunted. A patrol on Co Roc, the cliff just inside Laos that loomed as a minatory harbinger of evil to erupt, discovered numerous indications of NVA presence.

There was always a time of humor in the midst of the approaching havoc. While walking by the recon area, I overheard a Patrol Leader briefing his team, and wanting all their watches synchronized, he said, "Gentlemen, circumcise your watches!" Because senior headquarters knew by the end of November, 1967 that Khe Sanh would be attacked , the issue became whether to abandon it or reinforce it. The decision was made to reinforce, but it had to be made in such a way that the NV A would not be aware that we had discovered their plans and movements through our analysis of their radio transmissions. Thus in mid-December, 1967, another battalion arrived, and in mid-January, another battalion, marking the first time since World War II that the entire 26th Marine Regiment was together.

At one of the evening regimental briefings, Colonel Lownds said that we now needed to concentrate on deception. From the mountain ridge to the north, forward observers from the NVA could easily determine the location of the Regiment's bunker. He said everyone needed to erect false antennae and construct false bunkers throughout the combat base.

The following morning, at the battalion briefing, LtCol Wilkinson repeated the Regimental Commander's comments and added, "Well, after we do that, instead of the regiment receiving a hundred rounds of incoming, the entire base will receive five hundred." His humorous jest was to prove quite accurate.

On Saturday, the 20th of January 1968, a patrol from Hill 881South to Hill 881 North, encountered stiff resistance, loosing two of their Platoon Commanders killed in the battle. As they progressed, they were suddenly recalled to Hill 881 South. Unknown to them, a NVA Lieutenant who had been passed over for promotion had surrendered and disclosed the NVA battle plan.

The blood bath, in which we were all to be baptized with everyone emerging completely changed forever, had begun.

The following day, Sunday the 21st of January, NV A from the 325C Division and the 304th Division

(which had fought at Dien Bien Phu) launched their attacks, attacking Hill 861 and almost overrunning it. The Marines fought back and after a desperate hand-to-hand combat, regained the hill. The Company First Sergeant wounded in his neck and spurting blood, kept himself alive several hours by applying pressure to the wound. The NV A's 66th Regiment attacked Khe Sanh Village leaving several hundred dead. The position was abandoned with the defenders and the civilian seat of local government relocating within the perimeter of the combat base. The combat base itself was shelled, NV A incoming making a hit on one of the base's ammunition positions, causing it to ignite and spew semi cooked-off ordnance and blanket the eastern half of the base in a cloud of tear gas during the attack.

I was with the medical personnel in a ditch as this was happening. As the degree of incoming lessened, casualties poured in and a MEDEV AC helicopter arrived. I remember one of the Corpsmen running to the trench and exclaiming, "My casualty with the leg wound outran me! I couldn't pin on his evacuation tag before he got in the helicopter!"

Being a Sunday I was stunned, and remember walking towards the high impact area where the ammo dump exploded, carrying a brass cross, a bottle of wine for communion, and some religious literature, wondering whether to hold worship services! The tear gas brought tears, and through bleary eyes 1 beheld the specter of devastation. Everything above ground was in shambles. I remember seeing one man on a stretcher with his entire abdominal cavity exposed. One of the corpsmen told me that he didn't think that man would survive. Another man (Mussari) had a NVA mortar stuck in his abdomen, and a doctor, accompanied by a Marine engineer, surgically removed the live round, and the engineer raced to take it to a safe place.

One Marine was brought into C Med (L/CPL Slaugenhaupt) who moaned and groaned on the stretcher, "I lost everything! 1 lost everything!" Attempting to console him, 1 asked if he had lost all his pictures-or a phonograph-or all his clothing-from the incoming hitting his bunker. "Oh no, Chaplain, you know all those peanut butters and jellies in the C-rations? I had been saving them in a wood ammo box, and the incoming destroyed everything. I lost everything!"

The Marines dug deeper and deeper. The Khe Sanh Combat Base was about half a mile wide and 3/4ths a mile long, held about 4500 men, and took about 400 rounds of incoming mortars, rockets, and artillery a day. One day, we received over 1300 rounds, mainly artillery. Together with the hill outposts, there were about 6,000 Americans defending the position. We were surrounded by over two divisions of North Vietnamese and, together with supporting units and nearby forces, the total enemy encircling us was about 40,000.

B-52 strikes dropped their ordnance closer and closer to the base, decimating enemy forces hugging us in a siege. (B-52 Arc Lights aircraft can carry 128, 500 and 750-pound bombs dropped in a rectangular pattern usually 1,000 yards long and 100 yards wide. Most strikes were by 6 aircraft, covering an area one-half mile wide and 3 miles long, all exploding within several seconds, completely deci-mating the area).

Jeanne Dixon's prophecy of 1200 dead at Khe Sanh is approximately correct. For the entire time of American presence at Khe Sanh, there were 1390 Marines killed there. If one adds the Army and Air Force, the total is 2091 killed. During the siege battle itself, from 20 January 1968 through 31 March, there were 402 killed. (Officially, there were only 204). If one includes those killed until the base was evacuated in early July, the total for 20 January to 11 July is 990.

MACV estimated the NVA losses at 15,760 killed by air and artillery plus 8880 from ground action, for a total of 24,640. The local Bru tribe, which was forbidden to evacuate, probably lost at least 2,000 and possibly 11,000 killed.

During the siege battle, 96,000 tons of bombs were dropped, nearly twice as much as was delivered by the Army Air Corps in the Pacific during 1942 and 1943. By the end of March, 1968, the lush, enchanted Garden of Eden with all its beauty, perhaps containing species of flora and fauna not yet known, has been transformed into a moonscape, a wasteland product of human technology, a valley of dry bones. Mountains had been moved, tens of thousands of human lives perished, the lives of survivors, their families and the families of the dead were forever altered.

About a dozen wounded crowded into my bunker one night when medical evacuation helicopters were unavailable to transport them. Half a dozen sat on my bed, survivors of a bunker in the recon area that had taken a direct hit by an artillery round, killing 4, one of whom I had just baptized after his recon team was shot out while attempting to insert, 4 times. One of those sitting on the bed, Rick Noyes, held a roll of toilet paper and was dabbing his head. Crumbled wads of blood-soaked paper cluttered the floor. During the night, squeaking rats darted throughout the bunker. One of the doctors slept on the floor with his feet outside the bunker. I curled up on a small field desk and slept on it for the night.

The next morning I was shocked to see Rick Noyes in the recon area. "Weren't you evacuated?" I said. He then explained that the blood on his head wasn't his own head wound, it was blood from those who died in that bunker when it took the direct hit. The men maintained a sense of humor throughout the ordeal. When the screeching rockets exploded, someone might say, "Wow, those NVA gunners are sure piss-poor in their accuracy. They missed us by at least ten feet!" One Marine dove into a water-filled culvert during incoming, emerging later, half red (from the mud) and half green, from head to foot, creating a sort of clown-like amusement to those around him.

But mostly, the time was grim. Most of us realized how vulnerable we were. Despite good air support as close-in aircraft dropped their bombs and amazingly sublime splashes of napalm, accompanied by cheering troops on the lines, we all knew that if all those 40,000 NVA surrounding us decided to make a human wave assault on us, the battle would be intense and deadly.

Almost all of us, me included, were not privy to the Top Secret technology that kept the NVA from doing that. We had electronic sensors seeded to detect movement and even record conversations. We had COFRAM, ordnance specially designed to cover a rather large area with a huge amount of small metal fragments. COFRAM munitions were manufactured at Amron Corporation in Waukesha, Wisconsin. The artillery variety was first fired when the nearby Army Special Forces Camp at Lang Vei was overrun on February 7th 1968.

I suppose what will linger in my memory is the remembrance of so many good, young men. Men who commonly were seen to dart out during incoming to rescue someone wounded and unable to move. Men who gave their last bit of food or last drops of water to someone who needed them. Men who affirmed life in the presence of death, who had courage while facing great fears, who expressed love through actions of blessing others.

I left Khe Sanh changed forever, as did probably everyone else who was there. I remember arriving at Quang Tri and some Marine along the road yelling at me as he saw me, "must be Khe Sanh!" No matter how much I bathed myself, using a small aluminum mount-out box as a bath tub, the red clay that had embedded itself in my skin, continued to rub off on the white towels as though I was wiping with toilet paper.

My next duty station after my 18 months in Vietnam was at Marine Corps Recruit Depot, Parris Island, South Carolina. I was asked by a doctor at the hospital there if I wanted to medically retire since I had an auto-immune disease that would kill me within 20 years, contracted while at Khe Sanh.

During this time I attempted to make sense of what I had experienced, trying to find some meaning, get a grasp on everything, and so, using diaries I had kept each day while in Vietnam, along with clippings and other materials. I spent evenings and weekends in the Chaplains Office completing [on 01 April 1970] a 1072 single-spaced typed manuscript, Khe Sanh Chaplain in 1970, along with a 378-page manuscript, May Christians Kill.

My attempts to clarify resulted in several additional rewrites of the experience, attempting to make sense out of what is really non-rational. It became an effort that reminds one of the myths of Sisyphus struggling to push a large rock up a hill, only to experience it repeatedly rolling down the hill. The final rewrite was completed 06 June 1989, which was 1106 pages long, single-spaced and included extensive material from other Khe Sanh veterans as well as official documentation. This was submitted to Mr. John Prados who greatly reduced it while at the same time adding the needed dimensions of understanding Khe Sanh at the White House and MACV levels.

I had remained on active duty, and as I look back, the experiences of war had continued to trouble me, although I didn't attribute it to that at the times. There was a helicopter that landed on our brand-new ship one day. It was an amphibious ship, and I went aboard the helicopter which was going to fly to another Navy ship. The Crew Chief told me to strap in. Amazed, I said, "Do we sit down? And strap up?" He said, "Yes," (like you're sure some dumb Chaplain)-Sir! I said, "Your windows-you have windows!" "Of course," he replied. But I said, "No one has smashed them out. How are you going to fire at the enemy?" By this time he was quiet. I'm sure he was wondering how he might call the people with straight-jackets, but I didn't think I was being unusual or different at all. Then I blurted out, "And there are no bullet holes! I don't think this is a safe bird. I'm getting off!" (I'm sure he was greatly relieved!)

The months before my retirement from the Navy Chaplain Corps were spent in an adjacent Veterans Administration hospital in the unit for Post Traumatic Stress Disorder which was newly identified at the time. Prior to leaving there, I decided on two main goals. One was to get a book printed that would preserve what we experienced at Khe Sanh. The other was to start an organization of those who were there.

The first resulted in the book Valley of Decision, co-authored by John Prados, which was published by Houghton Mifflin in 1991 in a limited hardback edition. (And was recently reprinted by the US Naval Institute Press as a quality paper-back in...2004). The second goal resulted in the establishment of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a Wisconsin-based non-profit corporation, on 01 Sep 1988. The organization now numbers about 3,500, includes veterans of the Khe Sanh battlefield from the entire time American troops were there, and has annual reunions in addition to publishing a fine first class magazine.

This past summer, I donated to the Wisconsin State Veterans Museum, over a hundred boxes of files pertaining to my research on Khe Sanh, over 600 books pertaining to Khe Sanh, some 2,000 cassettes of interviews, several dozen VAS tapes, several thousand still photos, five boxes of microfilms, and a room full of artifacts and memorabilia pertaining to Khe Sanh. with the hope that all of these things will help preserve the memory of what we experienced and help clarify that experience to succeeding generations.

Like Odysseus returning from the battle at Troy, I needed to bury the oar of the ship far enough inland where nobody would know what it was. Those who weren't there will never really know the depth of the experiences which these artifacts and these documents dimly reflect; but perhaps some, in succeeding generations may ask "What does this mean?" with curiosity, while those of us who were there ask "What does this mean?", with an intensity that can only be managed by placing the experience within a larger context of meaning. And so, I donate these materials – threads in the greater tapestry of historical lineage this museum preservation and proclamation..
Thank you.

A MARINE SALUTE TO OUR CORPSMEN ON OUR 230TH BIRTHDAY
By Mack

This is for men like Doc Langenfeld, Doc Delapane, Doc Lopez, and all of who were KIA in April of 1968, and Doc Vanderstock, Doc Torres, Doc Wicall and others, all of who were WIA on February 5, 1968. SEMPER FIDELIS!!! from Marine brothers. Too many times we as grunts, forget to thank our Doc for being one of us.

Remember you are one of us and that is exactly how we feel. Thank you great Docs, and your familiesas well. The ideal squad is 13 Marines and a Corpsman. The Corpsman is a Navy enlisted man who has medical training and is skilled enough to get you and what ever pieces that were left of you to a hospital. He's a Navy man, has the respect of the Marines ,and is thought of as one of them known to everyone as Doc. He's the one that responds to the call "Corpsman Up!" He is the one who'll run to you when you've taken one in the chest, the wind is knocked out of you, and you're trying your #### best to move, so the people behind you know you're still alive, yet not moving so much, as to have Charlie pump more rounds into you.

He is there when there is complete chaos, automatic rifle fire, hand grenades exploding, M-79 rounds being lobbed into the brush a few meters in front of you, and more noise than anyone ever hoped to make on the fourth of July. When it seems like you have been laying there for ever, he is the one that has exposed himself to enemy fire to run up to you to scream in your ear, "WHERE ARE YOU HIT!!!" If you're lucky, you can point to the place because you sure as hell can't talk. You're gasping for air because it's leaking out your lung like a tire with a hole in it. You're trying to stay out of shock and feel like your whole body is on fire. You're wrenching with pain and bullets bounce all around your head and body because they are now trying to kill you And the Doc.

For some strange reason, God knows where the courage comes from, the Corpsman seems immune to, or oblivious, of all that is going on around you. His only focus is you. In the movies a guy gets hit once and that's about it, in Vietnam, there wasn't any limit to the number of times you could be hit in one firefight. Hell, you could get hit a dozen or more times if someone possessed little else to do but try to nail your young butt. It should be easy for you to see how panic and fear can work on a guy that has been wounded and is basically helpless and the people keep shooting at him... Fear that every round that just misses you, means the next one won't. Lying helpless, unable to move or breath, can cause a panic that does it's m#######est to conquer your soul and leave you pissing all over yourself in fear.

The corpsman yells for a medevac to be called. One is called by a good radioman while someone else is calling in a fire mission that may take twenty minutes before the first round comes in. A lot can happen in twenty minutes, your whole outfit could be wiped out. If the ambush is big enough and you're caught in a cross fire, it could take a lot less than twenty minutes. The action is hot, bullets burn your skin. They get close enough to feel without actually hitting you and that's close. The dirt and sand are red hot as bullets kicked it in your face. You think, God that was close!! Please God just get me out of this one. I promise to be good from now on. Suddenly, someone is dragging you by your collar or some piece of clothing; you're not sure what is going on, but you do know that the pain is bringing you close to unconsciousness. Your whole body is shaking uncontrollably, your chest has a hissing sound coming from where you think your lung is, it's spouting air and filling up with this warm substance that makes it harder to breath, you're sure that blood is now filling your lung up to the point of collapsing. Fear and panic is gone and replaced with shear terror and shock. Yet this Navy guy keeps miraculously dragging your body towards safety, while half the enemy force are trying to nail him.

"Corpsman Up!" You hear through your fog, you know another one of your friends has just taken a hit and could possibly be worse than you are. "Coming" screams the Doc. He tells someone to keep pressure on the rag covering your chest and not to take his hand off of it. He turns and heads in the direction of the last caller, while the enemy continues to do their best to nail him before he can reach his next casualty. Maybe this is why we considered the corpsman to be one of us, although they never went through boot camp at Paris Island or San Diego, they are Marines at heart and #### good ones. Only a fool or a hero would leave a place of safety to throw his body in harms way for someone he may not even know. I never met a Corpsman that I thought was a fool. To me a hero does things that his logical mind is telling him not to do. His logical mind says to stay put, get further down, yet he goes to the rescue.

The hero goes forward in the face of enemy fire. His only thought is to get to the guy that has called for help. He will get to him!! He may get shot himself, but he will not let that guy die by himself. Sometimes they aren't alive when he gets there, but he's there and exposed to the same fire that killed the man he came to rescue. He goes from wounded to wounded doing what he can to save their lives, doing what he can to give them a little more time; time to get them back to an aid station where they may be saved. Let me be point man any day over being a Corpsman in a Marine infantry outfit. At least I can take cover and return fire.

The Corpsman is special. The Navy offers a lot of other programs that are a hell of a lot less dangerous. Corpsmen know going in that they will be placed in harms way. They knew that they would be assigned to the heaviest fighting areas in Vietnam, yet they volunteer anyway. They care about human suffering and want to do all in their power to aid, and were willing to give their lives to their calling. Check out The Wall, you'll find a lot of corpsman on that wall. They gave their all. Many of us, who were fortunate enough to return home, did so because of their unselfish acts of heroism. In many cases they did so without any medals or rewards except the personal feeling of having done their job and doing it well.

Because of them, thousands of Marines today can greet each other and say welcome home. When you go to see The Wall, a tribute dedicated to Vietnam serviceman who paid the ultimate price for their country, you will see a statue dedicated to the grunts. You will see an area dedicated to the nurses who served their country. What you won't see is a tribute to the Corpsman. A tribute to the men who risked their lives by exposing themselves to tremendous enemy fire, by running, by crawling and by inching their way into the thickest of the thick of fighting, to answer a call for help. They sacrificed their safety to save others lives. I wonder why there are no special honors awarded to these individuals. These men who prevented so many of us here today from having our names on The Wall.

There is a place where a statue could and should be placed. A statue of a single individual, loaded down with his medical gear. A statue representing those that were always ready and willing to give their lives in the hopes that they might save a life. Corpsmen are a special and distinct breed of men who stand out proud and strong. Their everyday acts of bravery and heroism deserve to be recognized by their brothers in arms. They gallantly served and were unselfishly willing to give their all. Because of them, many of us were given the opportunity to make a difference in the world. There are hopes that statue in honor of the Corpsman who served our country so well and who were so important to the Marines in the field, will be in place one day. Statue or not, We would like to personally salute you and to say to you;
Semper Fidelis Marine!

The title is well earned and the honor long overdue. Thank you for your willingness of service and self sacrifice, so that many like myself, today are able to say, welcome home Doc, a job well done.

THANK GOD FOR OUR CORPSMAN
Poem By Ed Becker

From the halls of Montezuma
First words of a famous song,
When Marines go into battle,
A Navy Corpsman goes along.

From its very beginning
The Corps had steadily grown,
And the attitude of a Marine is
"we take care of our own"

Marines may give up their water
Or even their last bean,
But never their Navy Corpsman
Wearing the Marine Corps green.

When Marines and their Corpsman
Are standing side by side,
The first thing you notice
Is the sharing of their pride.

If you are looking for trouble
Of a kind you've never seen,
Attack their Navy Corpsman
The one in Marine Corps green.

MARINE CORPS BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION
By Tom Eichler

On November 12th 2005, I was an invited guest at a Marine Corps Ball hosted by the 2nd Battalion 24th Marine Regiment, 4th Marine Division, (Mad Ghost). The regiment had recently returned from the War in Iraq, where they lost 14 Marines KIA.

I attended the ball with two other Khe Sanh Veterans, Neil Kenny, and Ken Penn, and our editing Director, Diana Fecarotta. Ken Penn attended with lovely companion Gail, whom we met at the reunion in Chicago.

Coupled with attending the Marine Ball, Neil Kenny, had learned that Dan Sinise, the actor/ musician, who portrayed Lieutenant Dan in the movie " Forest Gump", was appearing with his band " Lieutenant Dan's Band", at "Joe's Bar" located at 940 W. Weed St, in Chicago. IL., a fund raiser for The United States Vietnam Arts Program. Neil had wanted to meet with Dan to seek his endorsement for the Scholarship Fund he is attempting to set up in Memory of Jason Dunham, a Marine who gave his life protecting his fellow Marines in Iraq, and who is currently being considered for the Medal of Honor. www.jasonsmemorial.org. After a wonderful time at the Ball, where we had been received warmly by all in attendance, Neil, Diana and I went to the club where Dan was appearing. Upon arrival at the club, we observed long lines waiting to see the show, and absolutely no parking.

The accommodating Valet Parking attendants allowed us to park in front of the club, while we sought an audience with Dan Sinise. Upon exiting our vehicle to enter the club, many young citizens waiting to enter, approached us, shook our hand, and thanked us for our service.

When we entered the club we were again warmly greeted by the security staff, and Owner Ed Warm, who also thanked us for our service. Ed then admitted us to the VIP lounge while we waited for Dan to finish his session. Patrons in the VIP section were very warm, thanking us for our service and offering free libations.

Neil spoke to the manager of Dan's band, and explained our reason for wanting to speak to Dan.

When the band finished playing, they adjourned to the VIP Section for a well deserved break. Although physically exhausted, Dan who has always wonderfully supported veterans causes, agreed to meet with us and other veterans who were there to thank him for all his support over the years.

Anna Sherony one of the founders of Wounded Soldiers - Wounded Heroes, was also there with a severely injured soldier from Iraq . Their group has helped thousands of severely injured veterans from the war in Iraq , and Afghanistan.

Gary was most gracious, as were all his band members, along with the club staff. He agreed to look at the proposals given to him by Neil Kenny. Gary then posed for pictures with our party, and all the other veterans who wanted to thank him for his long enduring support of all veterans organizations.

I would be remiss if I failed to list the goals and accomplishments of the Wounded Soldiers and Heroes foundation. They are a great organization who needs support to maintain their wonderful work.

The Wounded Soldiers' project mission is to assist the men and women of our armed forces who have been severely injured during the conflicts in Iraq, Afghanistan, and other hot spots around the world. Many of their injuries are traumatic amputations, gunshot wounds, burns and blast injuries that will retire these brave warriors from military service. The Wounded Soldiers' mission is to demonstrate love and support by helping to meet the basic needs of wounded service personnel and their families.

It's a program designed to demonstrate physical and emotional support to wounded service personnel by helping to provide quality personal care, and clothing and recreational items to enhance their recovery. Many service men and women are evacuated straight out of the field with no possessions. The Veterans Foundation of Illinois Wounded Soldiers has sent over 1,700 Survival Care Packages and have met with over 600 Wounded Hero's and their families. With help, they want to continue sending Survival Care Packages and assist with the needs of our Wounded Heroes, who are inpatients and outpatients at all US Medical Facilities, both domestic and abroad, along with their families. .

They started the Wounded Soldiers Program back in November 2003, at which time we had 2,000 wounded. We now have over 16,000 wounded soldiers and thousands of them have lost limbs (some of them more then one) thousands are brain damaged, badly burned, blind and/or deaf for life. They have sent over 1,700 men and women care packages to our Heroic Soldiers that are hospitalized at Walter Reed Hospital and Bethesda in Washington DC, Brookes Medical Center in Texas, Naval Medical Center in San Diego, and to the US Medical units in Iraq and Germany.

These young men and women are truly the HEART OF AMERICA. During their visit to Walter Reed and Bethesda in November 2004 and New Years 2005, they delivered an additional 850 care packages to the inpatients and outpatients at these hospitals. They also provided plane tickets to Wounded Soldier Families so they could be together for Thanksgiving, and provided money to families for special needs while caring for their wounded loved ones. In May 2005, their goal was to send 150 care packages to Brooks Medical Center, 250 to Walter Reed, 100 to Bethesda, 100 to the Naval Medical Center in San Diego, and 40 cases of Mrs. Fields cookies to Landstuhl (US Medical Hospital in Germany). Boy do our wounded love Mrs. Field's cookies!

They also purchased over 800 Army, Air force, Navy, and Marine jackets to give to our wounded for Christmas, New Years Eve, Valentines Day and St Patrick's Day at Walter Reed, Bethesda, Brookes Medical Center in Texas and Naval Medical Center in San Diego. They would love to purchase more of the same jackets for our wounded, but their funds are running low (they are hoping for a miracle).

SOME INTERESTING CHANGES FROM THE VETERANS ADMINISTRATION

UPDATE ON CO-PAYMENT PRESSCRIPTION INCREASES FROM THE VA

By Mike Fishbaugh

Co-payments for outpatient medicines prescribed through Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) medical facilities will rise by $1, according to an announcement today by VA. The $1 increase for a 30-day supply of prescription drugs will take effect on January 1, 2006, the first change in VA prescription drug co-payments in four years. "Through sound management practices, efficient pharmacy operations, and price negotiations that put veterans first, VA has been able to contain prescription drug costs," said the Honorable R. James Nicholson, Secretary of Veterans Affairs, noting that co-payments paid by veterans will still be lower than similar expenses in the private sector. The increase to $8 from $7 for a 30-day supply of prescription drugs is required by federal law, which bases VA's co-payments for outpatient prescriptions on increases in the Medical Consumer Price Index.

The $1 increase will not affect veterans who have an injury or illness connected with their military service resulting in a 50 percent or greater disability. Also known as "Priority Group 1" veterans, these patients will see no change in their current prescription drug benefit. Other veterans with less pronounced service-connected ailments, those classified as Priority Groups 2 through 6 – will see their prescription drug co-

Medication for a veteran whose annual income does not exceed the amount of VA pensions Medications for health problems that may be linked to Agent Orange for Vietnam veterans, to radiation exposure, to undiagnosed illnesses of Persian War veterans, or for new veterans within two years of discharge after serving in a combat theater.

Veterans who have no injury or illness related in any way to their prior military service, referred to as Priority Groups 7 and 8 – will also see their co-payments increase, but there is no cap on annual payments for outpatient medicine. Not all prescription drugs will be subject to the $1 increase. Outpatient medications not subject to co-payments included;

SENATE PONDERS VA DISABILITY HIKE

Another article of interest to many of you; those of you who had your claims adjudicated in Illinois, New Jersey, Ohio, Connecticut, Michigan, and Indiana may want to talk with your Service Officers. For almost 30 years, Vietnam veteran Richard Halstead of Bellevue has bounced from job to job, unable to hold down steady work because he couldn't get along with his co-workers, drank and suffered flashbacks to his year in combat.

Starting in the early 1980s, Halstead began receiving monthly checks of about $570 from the federal Veterans Affairs Department because it considered him partially disabled by a mental disorder, called post-traumatic stress disorder, brought on by his service. Halstead applied in 1990 to be considered completely disabled. After 13 years, the VA granted his request, and also agreed to compensate him for his heart disease and diabetes related to Agent Orange exposure, and bumped his monthly payments up to $2,700.

What Halstead didn't know is that for decades, veterans in Michigan and five other states have been shortchanged in disability payments. The two Democratic senators from Illinois, another one of the under-compensated states, have introduced a proposal that would allow veterans to increase their disability payments and receive back compensation as well. Halstead has been receiving as much compensation as veterans in other states since he was declared 100 percent disabled, but he could claim back payments for the previous years.

Halstead, 57, said he would apply for back compensation—but only if there's no chance the VA will lower his current monthly payments. "I just feel that I earned it," Halstead said. During his year of Army combat duty in Vietnam, the helicopter he flew in was shot down six times. Tommy Vietor, a spokesman for Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, said the Senate proposal wouldn't allow the VA to lower the compensation of veterans who apply for back payments.

The disparity in disability compensation was uncovered by a Chicago Sun-Times report a year ago that said Illinois veterans were receiving the nation's lowest disability payments. After members of Illinois' congressional delegation asked the VA for an explanation, the agency's inspector general found that average disability payments for 322,663 veterans in six states—Illinois, New Jersey, Ohio, Connecticut, Michigan, and Indiana—were lower than could be accounted for by obvious factors. At the same time, the review found higher-than-average payments for 182,825 veterans in six other states—New Mexico, Maine, Arkansas, West Virginia, Oklahoma, and Oregon.

The inspector general's report concluded that one major factor was large variation in disability payments awarded for post-traumatic stress disorder.

In response, Obama and fellow Illinois Senator Dick Durbin persuaded fellow senators to insert a requirement in a military spending bill that the VA notify veterans in the six under-compensated states that they may resubmit their disability claims and perhaps receive retroactive payments. Veterans in the states where disability payments are higher than the national average wouldn't lose any money under the proposal.

"We should err on the side of generosity when providing them disability benefits," Obama said in an interview. The freshman senator sits on the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee.

Senate and House negotiators are considering the proposal as they draft a final version of the spending bill for the 2006 fiscal year, which began Oct. 1st. Michigan Senators Carl Levin and Debbie Stabenow support the proposal. Halstead said it sounded fair. "If there is a disparity in the way that they're paying states, why?" he asked. "It ought to be the same across the board."

Congress Approves 4.1% Veterans' COLA

All:
Key words are, ". . . Assuming President Bush signs the bill, S1234 . . ." I believe he will sign the bill, but when is undetermined.

Congress has approved a 4.1% increase in veterans' disability and survivor benefits, effective Dec. 1st. The increase in disability compensation, dependency and indemnity compensation and pensions matches the cost-of-living adjustments in Social Security and in military and federal civilian retired pay. Congress has never linked veterans' benefits to the same automatic COLA formula of other federal entitlements, instead retaining the responsibility for passing a separate annual COLA bill for veterans.

Lawmakers have provided an inflation-matching increase in veterans' benefits each year since 1976, but not always on time for the raise to be included in January paychecks. Assuming President Bush signs bill S1234, there is still enough time this year to process the change for the January payroll. The only negative word about bill S1234, came from Representative Shelly Berkley, D-Nev., who noted that the increase does not apply to the relatively new $250 monthly transition benefit paid to surviving spouses of service members killed on active duty for two years after the death. The benefit, approved two years ago, is paid to spouses with children.

"Unfortunately, our widows and orphans are going to have to survive on a stagnant benefit," Berkley said. An increase in the dependents' benefit is still possible, however, because the House and Senate veterans' affairs committees are negotiating details of a possible veterans' benefits bill that at one time was supposed to be attached to the COLA measure. Discussion on the bigger package of benefits continues, with hopes of passing the measure in mid-December after a two-week congressional break for Thanksgiving, House and Senate committee aides said.

POETRY

We served the years
And paid the price

With thread bare nerves
And sleepless nights

We went to the bush
And ran our patrols

Now it's the inner rage
We fight to control

In an instant we are
There again

Fighting to save
Ourselves and men

It seems that as
The years go by

The dreams get worse
Why didn't I die

Those closest to you
They don't know

For our emotions we Are afraid to show

So we band together
Your Brothers of mine

For only you know
The test of time

To me the truth
Is as the poet wrote

And I want you
All to take note!

We few, we lucky few
For he who sheds his Blood with me today
Will be my brother
TOMORROW

VIETNAM'S ORANGE, WHITE AND BLUE RAIN AGENTS AND WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION; 328 Pages
By Charles Kelley

Charles Kelley, a Vietnam Veteran who served with the US Army 175 MM artillery out of Camp Carroll, pulls no punches with this book of scathing evidence of scientific, analytical, factual data and in your face style, indictment of conspiracy, against the Department of Veteran Affairs and several other government agencies. He promises: "With documented evidence and references to the evidence, I will show that our own government promised her Veterans care, and reneged on that promise. With documented evidence and references to the evidence, I will show that our own government, including the White House, has committed conspiracy against a complete segment of our society, The Veteran." This he does in a systematic, scientific fashion. He references not only American, but foreign scientific sources as well.

Most American readers can now conceive the horrors and use of toxic chemicals on his own people, by Saddam Hussein, or the millions of Jews murdered by gas by Adolph Hitler, but most readers will have difficulty understanding the massive and continued cover up by The American Government of the use and toxic effects of Agents orange White, and Blue, in Vietnam. More than just Agent Orange was sprayed in Vietnam. Also used were agents White and Blue. Never was adequate testing on any of these deadly combinations done prior to their being used in Vietnam.

The evidence presented will shock you and leave you wanting to fix the wrong, the American government has bestowed on the very people who fought and protected our freedom and rights. The author neatly frames his main point with an Introduction by Jeffrey A. Truman on the Feres Doctrine allowing a better legal understanding of the Bureau of Veterans Affairs and unchallengeable power; then with all fairness, Mr. Kelley finishes his book with some recommendations.

Mr. Kelley's engineering background is displayed by his analytical and scientific thinking. He demonstrates his ability to utilize scientific analysis, legal data, medical information and stamina to cut through the bureaucratic and political red tape to show the horrific physical and psychological disorders and genetic defects from exposure to dioxin and other chemicals used in the war by the US Government. The author's intensive and exhaustive research leaves many questions to be answered by the Bureau of Veteran Affairs, the White House and elected officials and their appointees. Time and time again, the author shows the flawed studies, hidden records or altered documents that have led to the premature death of many veterans and the suffering of their offspring due the Veterans toxic exposure, passed on genetically. Time and again, the author shows the U.S. Government's inability to give her Veterans the benefit of the doubt, as mandated by law, the U.S. Government destroying or misplacing scientific data, or spinning the facts to avoid accountability for 40 plus years of cover up, to avoid doing the right thing for her Warriors and future generations.

The readers will notice the author may appear personal, at times, with feelings of frustration and righteous anger, regarding Agent Orange and the whole fiasco about its effects on the human system and the government's lack of accountability. To better understand these personal feelings, the reader must know that Charles Kelley is totally disabled, due to severe polyneuropathy with muscle atrophy, Diabetes Type II, and chronic fatigue and pain. No less than 5 civilian doctors have validated his illnesses, yet the Bureau of Veterans affairs fails to recognize them as service connected due to toxic exposure during service near the DMZ in 1967-68. Being the true patriot that he is Mr. Kelley agonized over writing this book, since it would shed such a bad light on the American government.

He discovered that the area most sprayed was Northern I Corps in 1967-68 while he was there. His major discovery is that the way that everyone was affected by these deadly poisons was by the use of the water since everyone there drank, bathed and used it for cooking and the poisons after spraying entered the water systems.
I salute you Charles Kelley, for your patriotism, undying love for your comrades, and your bravery, to not let this issue die with we Vietnam Veterans and our offspring (this is a multigenerational issue). I am inspired by your ability to continue the fight for Veterans rights and freedom. You sir, meet the definition of hero.

The effects of Agent Orange may not be reversed; but knowledge of this American atrocity may alleviate future pain and suffering. I believe this is the primary intent of the author. I would recommend this book be read by ALL Politicians, All employees of the Bureau of Veterans Affairs, most specifically VA Health Professionals and Administrators. I suggest all Vietnam Veterans and their families read this book and use it for a reference, if you feel you have been exposed to any Toxins or Chemical agents while performing your military duties. Mr. Kelley also touches upon the medical conditions suffered by our Gulf War Veterans. He put his heart and soul into researching and writing this book and has made it his life's mission to find justice for we Vietnam Veterans. Please support him.

OPERATION "SEMPER CRY"

By Jimbo Wodecki

My wife PJ has come up with a novel idea to help the family of a young Marine serving in Iraq. She is asking wives of Khe Sanh Veterans to help her in an endeavor to have a baby shower on line for Doug Pierson, serving his country who is now on his second tour in Iraq and can't be home for his wife and first born.

At our last reunion we met a nice couple L/CPL Doug and Melissa Pierson. Doug was on leave from Iraq and was just married. He was returning for his second tour in a few weeks.

We Khe Sanh veterans sort of adopted them. Since returning Melissa found out they are going to have a baby girl while he is gone. We sent Doug a package to make a few days brighter. PJ had an idea we can do a baby shower for them to lighten their load. A gift card from Wal-Mart, diapers and anything "girl" for the new angel coming would be nice. Doug is sending me a flag he flew with a certificate of appreciation and I will bring it to silent auction at next years reunion and funds will be sent directly to them. If you want to send a package to Doug in Iraq or any of his buddies here is his address. Doug made Corporal since he returned.

Letter Received from Melissa Pierson, after PJ ran the idea past her:

An online baby shower would be SOOOO awesome. Please tell PJ that I think ya"ll are fabulous, and some of the best people in the whole world. Just let me know if I need to do anything. We would be honored and grateful. I don't think I will get to have a real shower before the baby is born, because most of my friends are still at Camp Pendleton and I of course moved near my mom while Doug is gone. Most of my family is not in this area, so it will be a while before I get a real shower. So this online shower would be so cool!!

I am not registered yet; I will probably just register at Wal-Mart since they are all over the country! I am going to get that done within the next few weeks. Baby girl is due March 25th.

Letter from Doug in Iraq:

Jim,
All is as well as it can be in Iraq its just getting colder than hell here, well at the moment, what we all have been waiting for, is happening! We are having a little girl that is going to be daddy's little angel! I have been busy we have had a lot of ops we've been on. I have a gift for you and the rest of the Khe Sanh vets, I flew a flag here and it comes with a authentic certificate in honor all of you. I was also able to get a challenge coin from my battalion. I hope you enjoy them, which are already in the mail; you should get in the next few weeks. I want to thank you again for all you are doing for my wife and I. As far as sending packages, just send them to me and I will make sure that my marines will appreciatively get them. Happy holidays.
God Bless

A MESSAGE FROM THE COMMANDANT OF THE MARINE CORPS

On November 10th, 1775, the Second Continental Congress Resolved to raise two battalions of Continental Marines marking the birth of our United States Marine Corps. As Major General Lejeune's message reminds us, the ensuing generations of Marines would come to signify all that is highest in war fighting excellence and military virtue. Each November as Marines the world over celebrate the birth of our Corps, we pay tribute to that long line of "Soldiers of the Sea" and the illustrious legacy they have handed down to us.

This past year has been one of continuous combat operations overseas, and distinguished service here at home - a year of challenges that have brought out the very best in our corps; In Iraq and Afghanistan. Marine courage and mastery of complex and chaotic environments have truly made a difference in the lives of millions. Marine compassion and f1ex1bility provided humanitarian assistance to thousands in the wake of the South East Asian Tsunami, and here ay home. Marines with AAV's, helicopters, and sometimes with their bare hands saved hundreds of our own fellow Americans in the wake of Hurricane's Katrina and Rita. Across the full spectrum of operations, you have showcased that Marines create stability in an unstable world, and have reinforced our Corps reputation for setting the standard of excellence.

The sense of honor, courage, and patriotism that epitomized those who answered that first call to arms 230 years ago, is still indelibly imprinted on our ranks today. In commemorating our anniversary, let us strengthen our ties to the past by paying homage to those who have gone before us. As we honor the sacrifices of our wounded and fallen comrades, our commitment to one another remains unshakable. We take special pride in the actions of the Marines now serving in harms way, and rededicate ourselves to the service of our Nation and our Corps.

Happy Birthday Marines, Semper Fidelis, and keep attacking!

SECRETARY REPORT

It's that time of year again, start saving your pennies, and get ready for the party to begin. June is coming fast and before you know it the reunion will be here. Be prepared to be busy. There are a lot of things to do this year in Mobile. The PX has a lot of new items to enjoy. The PX helps support our magazine. The membership was very supportive at the reunion in Chicago last year. As an added pleasure I get to meet all you guys and your families. Register before the reunion so you can save a couple of bucks and buy more gear from me. The reunion should be one of our best. The hotel and accommodations look great. Jimbo, PJ, Russ and Tommy did a great job of getting us what we want for Hospitality and PX rooms. We have so much more than last year. We are allowed to drink in the hospitality room. The hotel is even supplying free Kegs of beer. It is always good seeing all of you and knowing that I am in a safe place. Just like at KHE SANH .

PUBLISHER NOTES

I want to remind our members that our magazine is totally financed from the dues paid by our members. The magazine is published three times a year. for each issue, the turn around time for the writing, editing, printing and mailing, is two months. When one issue is shipped the next is already started.

We have a quality printing company that does outstanding work. In order to have an affirmed completion date I must inform them of the quantity of magazines we will be ordering. Our low price is also based on the quantity ordered.

Since the spring issue has to be completed and ready to roll by the end of February, I must have the dues in by March 01. I order the quantity based on paid members. In the future, if your dues are not paid by that date you will not receive that issue of the magazine. I cannot keep ordering extra magazines and hope members will eventually pay their dues.

TREASURERS REPORT

Reunion 2006 Mobile Alabama

Registration for our Reunion 2006 is off to a great start. Many have chosen to pay their registration fees via credit card, which we now have in place. One small request, when calling, please call between 1 pm and 6 pm Central time for registrations, PX items and membership. We prefer everyone use the forms sent to you and mailed to us. It sometimes gets overwhelming when we get calls at 8 am or 9 pm in the evening. Make sure to make your hotel reservations before May 26, 2006, midnight. Rooms may not be available after that. Room rates are $85.00 per night, doubles. Rates are good for 3 days before and 3 days after reunion.

HOTEL RESERVATIONS CALL-(866)749-6069 or FOR ONLINE RESERVATIONS use the Khe Sanh Veterans group code # 25747. Pets are accepted at hotel with a non-refundable pet deposit of $50.00 Many have made suggestions regarding future reunions sites. Here are a few things that have to be in place before that is possible. We began the selection process 2 years ahead for the selected location. Next year is DC that was voted on by the membership to coincide with the opening of the new Marine Corps Museum. The following years are open. If you are really interested, get in touch with your local convention center, ask them for hotels in your town that have done Military reunions. We prefer central locations but are open to west coast places like California, Nevada (Las Vegas), New Mexico, Arizona, etc. The selected city has to have hotels large enough to accommodate everyone from the membership who attends, (300-500). Have your convention centers send us the list of hotels in that city and we will contact them and negotiate. We usually select three places and have the membership select their choice. The last several years voting was limited to certain cities due to the delay in the opening of the new Marine Corps Museum. Last year there were only three other suggestions made besides Mobile Alabama.

PX NEWS

Our PX is doing well, members are increasingly supporting our organization by purchasing items from our PX. Our magazine, RED CLAY is solely supported by dues and sales from our PX. The more items bought, the better the magazine. Good participation from the membership will also allow us to purchase a larger variety of items for our PX. Our items are also designed to attract new members. Someone sees you wearing a hat, shirt, pin, etc with our KSV Logo, and often we get a new member. Every dime we collect goes back to the organization. The entire staff and their families are volunteers and dedicate their own time to the organization.

Please be nice to us on the phone. This is your organization support it.

Election to Board of Directors;
There are several board members up for re-election. If you want to run and be on the board of directors, send your name in to Russ Turner, President, and election committee chairman. You must send in your name or the name of someone you think would like to be on the board, prior to our reunion. A candidate must have attended at least three reunions and be a paid member. Names of candidates will also be accepted at the reunion but will have to wait till the following years' election to run for the board, in accordance with our by-laws. Two members have sent in their names in so far: Dennis Mannion and Neil Kenny. No associate member is eligible for the BOD seats. If you want to change any by-laws or have your own ideas for operating the organization, run for a board seat.

Members of 3RD Platoon, Hotel Co, 2/3, Reunion

By Lt/Col C.S. Gaede USMCR (Ret)

The Marines of 3rd Platoon, Hotel, Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marine Regiment (H/2/3) held a reunion commemorating the 38th year since their service in the Republic of Vietnam from 29 September to 2 October 2005, in Austin Texas. Most of the Marines joined the Battalion in late 1967 after it was assigned a Tactical Area of Responsibility south of Da Nang. In March 1968, the Battalion moved to Phu Bai, and from there to Ca Lu for Operation Pegasus that reopened National Route 9 to Khe Sanh and officially ended the siege of Khe Sanh. On about 10 April 1968, the Battalion moved to a position on Route 9 approximately 6 kilometers east of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The Battalion and the Marines of the 3rd Platoon operated in the hills east and southwest of the Khe Sanh Combat Base until the Base was evacuated in June 1968. Although the North Vietnamese Army was withdrawing, they had many units remaining in the area. The Marines of the 3rd Platoon engaged in many battles. Several of them were killed in action, and more were wounded.

On September 30, 2005 some of the 3rd Platoon Marines and their wives to viewed the sand table model of Khe Sanh that President Lyndon B. Johnson used in his Situation Room for briefings during the siege of Khe Sanh. It was a remarkable experience. In 1968 we Marines knew only the trail we were on, the next hill ahead, and the ground around our fighting holes and to the immediate front. That the President of the United States would have a model of the whole terrain where we were living and fighting, or that he would be spending time pondering it would never have occurred to us.

More memories and emotions were experienced the morning of October 1, when the staff at the Harry Ransom Center at the University of Texas campus arranged a special exhibit of photographer David Douglas Duncan's Vietnam photographs. Duncan, a retired Marine and Life magazine combat photographer is known for the 1967 photo on the front page of Life magazine of the Marine at Con Thien. The Harry Ransom Center staff have prepared a multimedia presentation that combines tape recordings of interviews of Khe Sanh Marines during the siege with his still photographs. Watching and listening to the presentation is to take a step back in time. For those who would like to see and hear the presentation, it is titled David Douglas Duncan: A Vietnam Tribute.

The video is available at http://www.hrc.utexas.edu/exhibitions/online/ddd/multimedia/ Most likely Khe Sanh siege veterans will recognize someone Duncan is interviewing, but veterans who are sensitive to memories of actual sights and sounds from then should be aware that they might encounter some heavy memories. The most memorable event of the Duncan exhibit occurred when L/CPL Patrick J. Hodgkins realized that he was the man in a photograph in Duncan's War Without Heros (p.47). It had appeared to some of us that the photo was "Boot camp," but only he could confirm it. Needless to say, it was an emotional moment for Patrick to see himself in the photo. We are glad his wife was there to experience the moment with him.

Another unique experience occurred on the afternoon of October 01, when Gary Lavergne, author or Sniper in the Tower: The Charles Whitman Story, led the men and women on a personal tour of the University of Texas Tower. Gary's book has been featured on the History Channel as part of the True Crime series, and he is considered the leading historian on Charles Whitman shootings. While the Marines of Vietnam brought honor to the Corps, Charles Whitman, an former Marine, brought dishonor to us on August 6, 1966, by randomly shooting innocent civilians from the top of the Tower. The University of Texas does not promote or permit tours that talk about Charles Whitman, but the Administration was kind enough to grant permission for an exclusive tour for us. SWAT teams were created after the Tower shootings as a way to deal with such events in the future. Watch for a made-for-TV movie based on Gary's book to arrive soon.

We Marines and our wives of the 3rd Platoon, H/2/3 are all grateful to Michael MacDonald, Registrar, Lyndon Baines Johnson Library & Museum, Mary Alice Harper, Photographic Archivist, Harry Ransom Center, and Gary Lavergne, personal friend, for taking their personal time and making special arrangement for us.

We Marines spent much time talking, bonding, with each other, and left the reunion knowing that we brothers had been reunited. It was an opportunity for the us and our wives to share positive memories and emotions, as fresh as they were in 1967 and 1968.

MARINE POEM
Grunts on the Ground

Mountains upward, They would go, Into the clouds, The young and bold.
Heavy loads upon their backs, Life's preservatives in their packs.
Step by step each would climb, from an eagle view the snake would wind.
Slow and silent each step they took, ears and eyes at max alert.
Silence broken, A whistling sound, Tubes popping, Incoming rounds.
Tasting dirt, Voices sound, Corpsman up, Point man down.
Drop the pack, Plot a course, Direct line to the crying voice.
Smoking rifles, Along the crest, In the middle, Gunners nest.
Bullets singing in the air, Sting of dirt, One so near.
Heart racing, Adrenalin flowing, Feet so slow, Keep on going.
Near the crest, Frag a flying, Grunts a fighting, Some a dying.
In the dirt, Limb part, Hope still, Beating heart.
Crimp an artery, Stop the flow, Talk to God in silent woe.
Call for help, MEDAVAC, Blood soaking, Through the wrap.
Whispering plea. Ease the pain, Holding tears, Can't explain.
Popping smoke, Pilot sees, Door gunner firing, Hot LZ
Dust flying, Chopper lands, Poncho passed to outstretched hands.
Rotors roaring, Off the ground, Gave it all, Homeward bound.
On line, Near the top, Pass the word, Hold what you got.
Maps open, Coordinates marked, Radioman's speaks, Here's your mark.
In the rear, Miles away, Big guns blast, Arty away.
Lying low, Voices sound, Friendly fire, Arty rounds
In the valley, Beyond the crest, Enemy mortars, Put to rest.
Above the trees, Buzzing sound, Birddog circling, Snooping around.
Diving low, Above the ridge, Bunkers spotted, Charley hid.
Another circle, Coming down, Popping smoke, Target found High above, Out of the blue, Phantoms roar, Sky hawks too.
Dipping wings, Slowly turn, Lining up, Making run,

Drop the load, Pull the stick, Up they climb, Burners lit.
On the ridge, Flaming blast, Burning napalm, Blazing grass.
Bombers gone, Arty quiet, Grunts moving, Finish the fight.
Inch by Inch, Up the hill, Weapons blasting, Fighting still.
Reach the top, Wall of lead, Spider pits, Straight ahead.
Hit the deck, Belly drop, Machinegun blasting, Rounds nonstop.
Grunts up, Grenades in hand, Pins pulled, Steady hands.
See the pits, Toss the frag, Second later, Charley sags.
On top, Hill secure, Frag the bunkers, Making sure.
Dead and wounded, Many seen, Mostly Charley, Some Marines.
Bandage wounds, Rifle splints, Marines carry Rear sent.
Popping smoke, L.Z. clear, Help on the way, MEDAVAC here.
MEDAVAC out, Re-supply in, Drop the gate, Off new Men.
Gather the dead, Remove tags, Pits of HELL, Zip the bag.
Silent walk, Not a sound, Bags on Chopper, Homeward bound.
On the hill, All that's left, Scorched earth, Freedom's best.
Pass the word, Moving out, Single file, Different route.
Down the hill, In the flat, Compass checked, Fold the map..
Hump for hours, Sun has set, Getting dark, Here we rest.
Perimeter formed, Claymores set, Dig a hole, In I get.
C-Rats open, Heat tab lit, Beans and franks, It's the pits.
Next hole, New man in, Whispering voices, Chat begins.
Where you from, Quick reply, Alabama, Bama guy.
Make a trade, What he says, Beans and Franks for Potatoes and Bread.
Potatoes warmed, Break the bread, Chow down, Field fed.
Boil water, Coffee mixed, Calm the nerves, Caffeine fix.
Stretch the legs, Head in hands, Talk to God, Understands.
Not a scratch, Still alive, Feeling awful, Tell me why.
Little voice, DO NOT FEAR, Give ME the load, Shed the tears.
Fall asleep, restful night, sun coming up, gone the night.
Another day, Snake unwinds, Moving out, Marking time.

CHORUS HONORS ALL VIETNAM VETERANS AT WAR MEMORIAL
By Tom Eichler

The Arlington Good times Chorus paid tribute to all Vietnam Veterans by singing the "Armed Forces/ America Medley" at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial immediately following the Southwest District chorus contest in San Antonio on October 22, 2005. Approximately 100 people listened as 30 barber-shoppers under the direction of Dick Kneeland sang the patriotic songs at the "Hill 881 South" statue located at Veterans Memorial Plaza.

The bronze statue, which was designed by former Marine combat artist Austin Deuel, based on an eye-witness event, is the largest of its kind in the country, weighing more than 10 tons. It is approximately 10 feet high at its highest point, 23 feet long, and 12 feet wide. Two young Marines are depicted, a radio-man looking skyward for an evacuation helicopter while rendering aid to a dying comrade lying on the ground.

Hill 881 South, located in the northwestern part of then South Vietnam, was the site of intense combat during the Vietnam War. On April 30, 1967 a bitter battle took place between U. S. Marines and North Vietnamese Army regulars. The ensuing heavy loss of life was the inspiration of the poem "Death At My Door," inscribed on the base of the memorial. The poem was written by then 1st Lt. David G. Rogers the following day, and dedicated to those who were killed in action. Rogers is a 10 year barber-shopper with the Good times Chorus, and resides with his wife in Arlington, TX.

The Last Stand of Khe Sanh Area United States Army

Mike Fishbaugh

Date : August 1971
Company:Recon Team Kansas, Studies and Observations Group (SOG) Group leader: 1st Lt. Hagen) Action: Republic of Vietnam, 7 Aug 1971, Khe Sanh, behind enemy lines Mission: reconnaissance "prisoner-snatch" Awarded Medals: Army Medal of Honor, Distinguished Service Cross, three Silver Stars

RECON

The once bustling Khe Sanh Marine Base in South Vietnam's extreme northwest had been a ghost town for more than three years by the summer of 1971. It was, however, used briefly that February to support the South Vietnamese invasion of Laos. After that bloody debacle, they abandoned not just Khe Sanh, but the entire region, yielding immense areas to the NVA. Almost overnight, the North began extending the Ho Chi Minh Trail highways into South Vietnam.

In late July 1971, U.S. intelligence began tracking a large enemy force moving across the DMZ a dozen miles east of Khe Sanh, threatening the coastal cities of Hue, Danang and Phu Bai, where the last sizeable American ground units were based.

It was essential to learn what was happening near Khe Sanh. The mission was assigned to a shadowy organization called "SOG". Created to conduct covert missions deep behind enemy lines in Laos, Cambodia and North Vietnam. This top- secret Studies and Observations Group had shifted most of its operations in-country in 1971, to cover the continuing U.S. withdrawal.

From among its clandestine assembly of Army Green Berets, Navy SEALs, and USAF Air Commandos, the Khe Sanh mission became a prisoner-snatch assigned to Recon Team Kansas, an 11-man Special Forces-led element that included eight Montagnard tribesmen.

MISSION

How do you grab a prisoner in the midst of 10,000 or more NVA? Headed by an easy going, lanky Midwesterner, 1st Lt. Loren Hagen, along with Sergeants Tony Andersen and Bruce Berg, the RT Kansas men had brain stormed through several scenarios until settling upon the best option. They would land conspicuously on an abandoned firebase which obviously would draw some sort of NVA reaction, put up a short fight, then extract by helicopter.

But half of Hagen's men would stay hidden on the hill. When the NVA sent a squad up to see if the Americans had left behind sensors or bombing beacons, as SOG teams often did, the hidden men would ambush the NVA, seize a prisoner and come out.

In case a serious fight developed, Lt. Hagen reinforced his team with three more Green Beret volunteers, Staff Sgt. Oran Bingham and Sergeants Bill Queen and William Rimondi, eight Montagnard tribesmen and six U.S. Special Forces troops, a total of 14 men.

DEPLOYMENT

Landing at last light on Aug. 6, 1971, Lt. Hagen surveyed the scrub brush and bomb craters below them. He split his defense into three elements to cover three slopes. Immediately they went to work restoring the old firebase's two dilapidated bunkers and shallow trenches. The enemy must have seen them land. Hagen planned to be ready.

It was well after dark when the SOG men noticed campfires on two facing ridgelines. Unusual the NVA normally masked itself. By midnight, enemy probers were at the base of the hill, firing provocatively from the north, south, east, and west.

At 1 a.m., a USAF AC-130 Spectre gunship arrived, walking 40mm and 20mm fire around the hill nearly all night. Never once did the team fire their weapons, staying blanketed in darkness. At 3 a.m., the SOG men heard trucks and tailgates dropping. This was odd, very odd. Beneath the hill, dismounting NVA soldiers formed up into platoons and companies, which their leaders marched through the darkness to their assigned attack positions, to wait for dawn. Just before sunrise it became forebodingly very quiet. Then, Lt. Hagen heard more trucks arriving.

Fifty miles away at a coastal airbase, a USAF forward air controller (FAC) and a flight of helicopters was lifting away for the false extraction. They would be at RT Kansas in 30 minutes.

Encircled by the NVA as darkness gave way to light, Lt. Hagen detected glimpses of NVA on one slope. On another slope pith helmets appeared, bobbing in the fog. When his men reported NVA on the third slope, too, Hagen realized his hill was completely encircled by NVA. That would require a whole regiment, at least a thousand men.

The NVA regimental commander understood he had to kill the Americans quickly. They'd inadvertently landed almost within sight of the Hanoi High Command's critical new venture, the first six-inch fuel pipeline laid across the DMZ.

The fuel line would be absolutely essential in a few months when entire tank battalions rolled through there for the war's largest offensive. Already the 304th NVA Division was massing there. A regiment of the 308th Division was preparing for the 1972 Easter Offensive.

At LZ Kansas a fourth battalion moved into place. Then, concealed in the ground fog, a fifth battalion arrived. Later, SOG's commander, Col. John Sadler, would learn an entire regiment had stormed the hill, supported by a second regiment. It was a mass assault by approximately 2,000 enemy infantrymen.

As the clearing ground fog revealed the terrible truth, Lt. Hagen had no time for inspiring words, just serious soldier work. In those final moments he repositioned weapons while his men readied grenades and stacked magazines. The Catholic Montagnards made the sign of the cross.

The NVA attacked. Hagen suffered four KIA in four minutes. A well-aimed RPG rocket smashed into Bruce Berg's bunker, collapsing it starting the attack. Fire went from nothing to 10,000 rounds per second. Andersen could see dozens of NVA rushing in lines up his slope. He shot them with his M-60 machine gun. Hagen hollered that he was going to check Berg. He ran directly into a ferocious maelstrom, bullets ricocheting and slamming the earth in front of, behind, and beneath him. He only made it a dozen yards when fire from the other slope cut him down, killing him.

Then Klaus Bingham left a bunker to reposition a claymore and a bullet struck him in the head, apparently killing him. One Montagnard in a trench below Andersen, fired several bursts then jumped up to pull back and fell into Andersen's lap, dead. Four men had died in less than four minutes. Andersen was now the senior man.

Small arms fire hit closer on all sides and grenades lobbed up from below the hillcrest as waves of NVA were scurrying behind small rises and rolling from bomb crater to bomb crater. Andersen dashed over the hill to look for Hagen, but couldn't see him anywhere, just 100 khaki-clad NVA almost at the top.

He fired one M-60 belt at NVA advancing up his own slope, then sped to the other approach and fired belt after belt on the 100 assaulting enemy. By then, grenades started coming from behind him as NVA closed in from his rear. Just a dozen yards away, beyond the curvature of the hill, enemy heads popped up, cracked a few shots, then dropped back down.

Still a dozen minutes away, the approaching Cobra gunships went to full throttle, leaving the slower Hueys behind. Meanwhile, RT Kansas had just run out of hand grenades when a North Vietnamese grenade exploded beside Andersen's M-60, rendering it useless. He spun his CAR-15 off his back and kept shooting. He tossed back another grenade, but it went off in front of him, nearly blinding him. He kept shooting. More shrapnel tore into him. An AK round slammed through his web gear and lodged in his elbow, knocking him down. He stumbled back to his knees and kept firing.

The perimeter was pinched almost in half when Andersen grabbed his last two living Montagnards, circled below the nearest NVA and somehow managed to reach the survivors on the opposite side. He found Bingham, started to lift him, but saw that he was dead from a head wound. All around him he heard, "zzssss, zzssss, zzssss," as bullets flashed past his ears.

LAST STAND

He dragged Bingham back to where Bill Queen lay, wounded. Only Rimondi wasn't yet hit and still firing furiously. Andersen put them in a back-to-back circle just off the hilltop where they would make their last stand. AK bullets had destroyed their team radio, another slug had shot Andersen's little survival radio out of his hand, so Rimondi tossed him another survival radio, their last.

Now the NVA were streaming, rolling over the crest like a tidal wave, their rattling AKs blending together into one never-ending burst. Andersen's men were firing not at NVA, but at hands wielding AKs over parapets and around bunkers. There was no place left to fall back. Andersen was shooting NVA no farther away than the length of his CAR-15 muzzle. The time it took to speed-change a magazine meant life or death. From the air it looked like an ant mound, with moving figures everywhere. Cobra lead rolled in and sprinkled 20mm cannon shells around the surviving SOG men, and at last fighters arrived, adding napalm and Vulcan cannons to the melee. Then at last the assault ebbed, turned, and the NVA fled for cover, just as the Hueys arrived.

Though wounded repeatedly, Andersen crawled out to fire his CAR-15 to cover the landing Hueys. With Rimondi's help, Andersen dragged as many teammates' bodies as he could to the first Huey, then helped the wounded Queen and others aboard the second.

Allied KIA Count: 64%

In one hellacious half-hour, nine of Recon Team Kansas' 14 men had been lost. Lt. Hagen had died, along with Bingham; Berg was presumed dead. Six Montagnards had died. Rimondi and Queen both suffered multiple frag wounds, Andersen had been struck by both small arms fire and shrapnel, and their other Montagnards, too, all had been wounded. "It's amazing that any of us came through it with the amount of incoming that we were getting," Tony Andersen says today, 25 years later. He attributes their survival to his deceased team leader, Lt. Loren Hagen. "He epitomized what a Special Forces officer should be, attentive to detail, a lot of rehearsals, followed through on things," he explains. "We were ready. I think that was probably the only thing that kept us from being totally overrun. Everybody was alert and knew what was happening and was waiting."

As for Hagen's bravery, dashing into a wall of AK fire to try to save Bruce Berg, that didn't surprise Andersen, either. "Lt. Hagen was that kind of officer. He was a good man."

Against the loss of most of his teammates, Andersen learned, the USAF counted 185 NVA dead on that hill, little RT Kansas had killed half a battalion and probably wounded twice that many NVA. But that gives Andersen little satisfaction compared to the loss of most of his team.

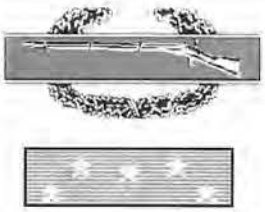
Perhaps Andersen's most difficult duty was carrying the bodies of his six Montagnard teammates, his "family" he called them, to their home village. "As soon as they saw us driving up in the truck, they knew. Wailing and moaning started, and all the grieving." The villagers gathered in a circle around the headman's stilted longhouse. "Through one of the interpreters I tried to explain how proud we were of them, what good fighters they were, that they had died for a good cause."

That would be borne out a few months later when the intelligence generated by RT Kansas' spirited defense helped U.S. analysts read enemy intentions, enabling American airpower to counter the NVA's Easter Offensive.

And though details of this incredible fight would remain classified for decades, enough was disclosed that 1st Lt. Loren Hagen's family was presented the U.S. Army's final Vietnam War Medal of Honor. Tony Andersen, who held together what remained of RT Kansas through those final mass assaults, received the Distinguished Service Cross. Queen, Rimondi, Berg and Bingham were awarded Silver Stars. And now, today, with full disclosure, we can appreciate the significance of their noble stand.

Medal of Honor

HAGEN, LOREN D. - 1Lt, US Army, Inf, US Army Training Advisory Group.
Action: Republic of Vietnam, 7 Aug 1971.
Inducted: Fargo, N. Dakota.
DOB 25 Feb 1946, Fargo, N. Dakota



Citation: 1st Lt. Hagen distinguished himself in action while serving as the team leader of a small reconnaissance team operating deep within enemy-held territory.

At approximately 0630 hours on the morning of 7 Aug 1971 the small team came under a fierce assault by a superior-sized enemy force using heavy small arms, automatic weapons, mortar, and rocket fire.1stLt.Hagen immediately began returning small-arms fire upon the attackers and successfully led this team in repelling the first enemy onslaught. He then quickly deployed his men into more strategic defense locations before the enemy struck again in an attempt to overrun and annihilate the beleaguered team's members. 1st Lt. Hagen repeatedly exposed himself to the enemy fire directed at him as he constantly moved about the team's perimeter, directing fire, rallying the members, and re-supplying the team with ammunition, while courageously returning small arms and hand grenade fire in a valorous attempt to repel the advancing enemy force.

The courageous actions and expert leadership abilities of 1st Lt. Hagen were a great source of inspiration and instilled confidence in the team members. After observing an enemy rocket make a direct hit on and destroying 1 of the team's bunkers, 1st Lt. Hagen moved toward the wrecked bunker in search for team members despite the fact that the enemy force now controlled the bunker area. With total disregard for his own personal safety, he crawled through the enemy fire while returning small-arms fire upon the enemy force. Undaunted by the enemy rockets and grenades impacting all around him, 1st Lt. Hagen desperately advanced upon the destroyed bunker until he was fatally wounded by enemy small arms and automatic weapons fire. With complete disregard for his personal safety, 1st Lt. Hagen's courageous gallantry, extraordinary heroism, and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty, at the cost of his own life, were in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service and reflect great credit upon him and the US Army.

Huong Tan Community Library Dedication
Khe Sanh, 27 October 2005
Charles S. Gaede, Lt/Col, USMCR (Ret.)

In the foothills of Hill 881S on the grounds of a school that serves the people of the Montagnard villages, the first educational project donated by a non-governmental organization to ethnic minorities in Quang Tri Province was dedicated on 27 October 2005. Named the "Huong Tan Community Library" and constructed in cooperation with the Quang Tri Province Women's Union and PeaceTrees Vietnam, Inc. (PTVN) the funds were donated by the friends and family of Chuck Gaede. The funding included the staff, training, and operational expenses for one year.

The library has a reading room equipped with books, tables, and chairs. A separate room serves as the office for the librarian and her assistant. The library office is also a place for the local women to gather to socialize and to share information. It is a "no men allowed" room. The PTVN explosive ordnance disposal team cleared the grounds of unexploded ordnance, and the grounds are landscaped with trees.

Madame Sam, the Chairwoman of the Quang Tri Province Women's Union, conducted the dedication ceremony. District and local women officials, local residents, and the librarian, Miss Xuong, and her assistant, Miss Khong, attended. Quang Le, the PTVN in-country coordinator, represented PTVN, and Chuck Gaede represented all of the donors. Local news reporters attended too.

At the conclusion of the dedication ceremony, Madame Sam presented Chuck with a generous supply of Ca Phe Khe Sanh, the best gift they could have chosen. Madame Sam also used the occasion to award and distribute ten small family business loans to local families from funds provided by the Quang Tri Women's Union.

After the ceremony at the library, Madame Sam hosted a reception at a restaurant in Khe Sanh. Following the reception Madame Toan, the Vice Chairwoman of the Women's Union of the Huong Hoa District, took Quang Le and Chuck to view the proposed site for a second library in Lao Bao Town, near the border of Laos. Chuck is making plans to begin the fund raising for it. The Huong Tan Community Library will benefit the women and children of the Huong Tan Commune for many generations, and it was especially gratifying to see it operational in an area so heavily fought over and destroyed in the Khe Sanh battles. Thanks to all of those who gave funds for the library.

"A Patch of Ground"

Craig W. Tourte

It's funny about this Khe Sanh stuff. So much time has passed and I had not really thought about it much until these last several years. I was not really interested in talking about my experience with anyone else until I had a conversation one afternoon on the telephone with Tom Horchler, a fellow Marine who I had met at Khe Sanh and had not seen nor heard from for some 35 years. I attended a reunion with Tom and had the opportunity to talk to others who went through the Siege and found that many had the same thoughts and (perhaps lack) of feeling's about that event that I had. It seems that many are still trying to deal and understand what it was all about. The last few years have been equally as strange, having grown close to so many who were there.

I just finished reading a book written by Michael Archer titled "A Patch of Ground." I think Michael might have been at the reunion in Chicago this year, but I don't remember. Michael's experience was pretty much what all of us went through during the Siege. It was well written, a fast read and his memory of events and descriptions of the base and horrors of the artillery poundings and loss of those he knew, were excellent and evoked emotion. I had particular emotional memories of my friends Chuck Chamberlin (C/1/26), and Steve Wiese (B/1/26), when Michael described those events that forever changed the lives of both of these fine men.

So what is it about this Khe Sanh THING that sets us apart from so many others? For me Michael said it best in the last paragraph of his book. "...there were times during those years when I could close my eyes and see the insolent young faces of my buddies, the fine red dust of Khe Sanh etched into their every pore. The ease, humor, and courage with which they endured such relentless peril would sometimes seem to me like a dream. In those moments, it did not matter how I felt about the war, the nation that I wished to forget, or myself. It mattered only that I was proud to have stood with them and defended a little patch of ground."

I have always held a very large space in my heart for those who stood with me at Khe Sanh and for those who enabled and supported us. Michael notes that after the base was abandoned the next day a plane flew over and an NVA (Michael describes it as a Viet Cong flag) was flying over the base. It doesn't matter I guess what happened to Khe Sanh after I left, after my war was over. What does matter to me now, is that I am proud to have stood with so many, those who in my later years I have had the privilege of meeting and knowing.

"I still miss him as if it was yesterday"
From Richard Rash:

I have spent the last 37 years at Christmas, without Don, and I still miss him as if it was yesterday.

We grew up in Pageton West Virginia, a small coal mining town. Since all the coal mines have since shut down it is almost a ghost town. Don and his twin brother Ron were born Sept. 14, 1948. I had just started the 3rd grade. On that day, I was walking home from school, and saw my Dad walking to meet me. As he got closer I could see that he had been crying. That struck me because he never cried. As we walked home he told me that I had a new baby brother, and we should be happy about it.

What he did not tell me is that he thought the second twin Don, was stillborn, because when he had left the house the Doctor had already given up trying to get him to breathe, and had pronounced him dead. My Moms sister Anna was there to help in the delivery and she would not give up. She grabbed my brother and held him under the faucet with the cold water running. As we got closer to the house we could tell there was more than one baby crying. Dad threw me on his shoulder and broke into a run toward the house, laughing and crying at the same time. To his surprise he had 2 sons instead of one.

The following year my Mom had another baby, and now had 3 sons all still in diapers, and on the bottle. I, being the oldest, had to learn to change diapers and feed the bottles to my brothers, so my Mom could take a break once in a while. That task brought me closer to the twins and the bond between us grew stronger. At the age of ten I became the world's youngest baby sitter. There were 5 boys. Mom and Dad could not take all of us when she shopped or took care of her household chores. I was the helper.

I remember when the twins were about ten years old; I started to teach them how to use a gun. I had joined the Navy, and when I came home on leave I would take them in the woods with the old single shot 22 dad had bought me on my 12th birthday. We would shoot at pennies stuck in the top of old fence posts. Don became a better shot than me and his brother.

The last time I saw Don was in the late fall of 1967 after he had graduated from boot camp. I was working in Chicago. I asked for time off to see him before he went to Camp Pendleton Ca. I woke him up about 6 o'clock one morning and asked him if he wanted to go Rabbit hunting one more time before he left. He got dressed and we went off over the mountain rabbit hunting. To get to where we were going we had to walk over the hill where the old town water tank was and down the other side to the valley.

As we reached the top of the hill near the water tank we could see that it was so foggy that you could hardly see the road. Snow had fallen the night before. It had warmed up quite a bit causing the fog. We sat near the water tank and chewed the fat while we waited for the sun to come out and burn some of the fog off. I told him about my wife expecting our first baby in December. He talked about his upcoming trip to Pendleton and eventually Nam.

I never knew much about the battle at Khe Sanh on 30 March 68, when Don was KIA. One day, I was browsing through a book store at the mall here in town in 1990. I picked up the book titled, SIEGE OF KHE SANH. I thumbed through the book and on page 200 Don's name jumped out at me.It had a short story of that battle and a copy of His NAVY CROSS Citation. I bought the book and took it home to read. In the book, several of the Marines described the weather on 30 Mar 68, as being so foggy that they had to delay the patrol until they could see well enough. I Immediately I thought about the hunting trip Don and I had been on that day. I wonder if he was thinking about it the morning he died…

Publisher Note:
Donald Rash was awarded the Navy Cross for his heroic actions against a large enemy force on 30 March 1968, while serving with Bravo Company 1/26, at the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

The Proud Tree

By Craig W. Tourte

The plateau that was the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh was my home for approximately 8 months. It was pretty much my world and I didn't really know what was beyond that very small place, it just seemed so far from anywhere. In a way, "Being at Khe Sanh was like being nowhere." *

When I arrived on at Khe Sanh sometime in August 1967 there were minimal defenses and those who had suffered so much during the hill fights were the left over few tasked with defending it. There were a smattering of tents, some hard sided buildings by the airstrip and a too few defensive trenches and fighting holes. A couple of strands of concertina wire were the only obstacles that separated the base from the jungle, enemy and the uncertainty beyond.

Without much thought or planning we started digging, not really sure how deep, wide, long or how to construct a defensive position or build bunkers. We began our digging on the base side of the concertina wire in what we thought was a zigzag configuration where the hard dirt allowed us to sink our small folding entrenching tools. We filled thousands of sandbags, which at first we stacked on top of the trench in front of us, then gradually constructed various covered fighting and firing positions. The clay ground was hard and had that deep red volcanic color I had been so familiar with while living in Northern California in the shadows of Mount Shasta and Lassen.

Our defensive area located on the south side of the base and east of the main gate, was flat and offered relative clear fields of fire. After several months, I became fairly familiar with the area to my front, having spent an abundant amount of time staring out onto the gentle slope of cleared jungle now covered with various grasses and vegetation, before the ground disappeared into the dark green jungle beyond. At night I was often selected to man a Listening Post in front of that position. I was handed a spool with a hand held landline phone and wire wrapped around the spool. I was told to walk out until the wire played out and to lay down and listen and observe. Those were the only orders my two comrades and I were given. I guess if we observed any response or actions of the enemy that we wished to make it was up to us privates. I didn't particularly like this assignment, but I did as I was ordered.

As darkness fell we would maneuver ourselves around the concertina wire and tangle foot being careful not to disturb the Claymore mines as we walked away from the protection of the base and our fellow Marines. I don't really know how many feet of wire was on that spool but it sure seemed like it went out for a long distance. We walked on without a word between the three of us, being careful where we stepped and looking for something resembling a depression or rock or any other feature that would afford some type of covering protection, but most often found none and just laying down on the damp vegetation. As I turned my head and looked back at the base it seemed so far away. Although I don't now have any recall of lights emitting from the base, I have a sense that the base had a certain glow about it.

During one such foray, a distinct tink, tink, tink of metal on metal was heard. All three of us puckered up and searched for the source of the sound. We heard it again, as we looked around unable to determine in what direction the sound was coming from. I happened to be looking over my right shoulder when I heard the sound one more time and realized it was coming from the helmet chin strap hinge of the Marine at my three o'clock. I whispered to him that he was an idiot and that he was making the sound. We all breathed a sigh of relief and that was the end of it. I can clearly hear that sound to this day.

Directly in front of my position and 100 to 200 meters south of the concertina wire, stood the stump of an old dead tree. This stump stood about six feet high, it's odd shape gave it an appearance of having a shoulder. The stump was clearly identifiable in the daylight and we who observed it so often became quite familiar with it's shape, but when day light turned to that Vietnam jungle blackness, it was a different story. During certain moonless nights, in the fog and rain or sometimes just sitting all alone looking forward, the stump seemed to slowly move back and forth and take on other shapes and sizes. If one concentrated on that stump it would on occasion, take the shape of a human form, and all sorts of objects similar to an AK and RPG could be seen hanging from it. More than once the stump gave the appearance of wearing a pith helmet.

One day I walked out to that old stump and noticed several thousand small holes in it, similar to those made by a rifle round. The tree had been dead for some time, was burned and quite battered. As I got closer to the tree, I could see that it didn't resemble a human form at all, it was just an old dried out dead tree whose limbs and other useful wood product had been harvested long ago. I had heard that while others had been out on LP they had mistaken that old tree stump for the enemy and tried to kill it, shooting at it numerous times before realizing that the old stump was not an enemy stocking the perimeter positions. I was told that one team got up and fired at it as they ran back to the base.

It would be interesting if I could tell you that we who were familiar with that old dead tree played tricks on the new guys, but Vietnam and in particular those of us who were at Khe Sanh had no time or patience for such games. Going out into the jungle all night with just a hand held landline phone, laying down and waiting for the enemy to come to us or sitting in the trench line staring and concentrating on the few hundred meters of open area in front of our position while totally exhausted, was serious business and we all knew it.

When SOG moved into the area in the later part of 1967 or early 1968 they took that old dead tree stump out, using the area to land helicopters. I don't know why my memory is drawn to that old dead tree stump. Vietnam had seen numerous battles in and around that area for a thousand years and that tree must have lived several hundred of those years judging by the size of the trunk.

As I look at the photograph I took of the old dead stump, I think back to the many hours I spent laying around and near it, scared and wide awake in the dark, rain and often moonless nights. I can still smell the damp earth, hear the sounds of the bugs and night creatures and remember how alert I became when I could not hear any night or jungle sounds at all. I think of my friend Donald Saunders (KIA 3/4/68) who so often accompanied me, and who had the same doubts, fears and hope for the future I had. I think about what must have been at one time a large proud tree on top of a plateau, which through hundreds of years must have survived thousands of battles, in a place that was nowhere. A place called Khe Sanh.

* "If you were at Khe Sanh you were nowhere," is attributed to words spoken by an unknown officer.

NEWS YOU CAN USE

HIGHER LIMITS EXTENDED IN VA HOME LOAN PROGRAM
By Charlie Taliaferro

WASHINGTON 29 December 2005, America's veterans and their families now have a greater chance to make their dreams of home ownership a reality, thanks to an increase in the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) home loan guaranty limit. Effective January 1, 2006, changes in the loan guaranty limits will mean veterans are able to get no-down payment loans up to $417,000. The previous ceiling was $359,650.

The Veterans Benefits Improvement Act of 2004 tied increases in the VA guaranty to increases in the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation conforming loan limit. When this limit increases, VA guaranty limits also go up, allowing VA to keep pace with rising home values.

VA-guaranteed home loans are made by banks and mortgage companies to veterans, service members and reservists. With VA guaranteeing a portion of the loan, Veterans can receive a competitive interest rate without making a down payment, making it easier to buy a home. More information about VA home loan benefits is available on the Web at http://www.homeloans.va.gov or by calling 1-800-827-1000.

POETRY

THE FACE OF WAR

War is the bitter fruit of man's failure to reason and the arena for old men to wield the weapon of their country's youth.

The old men lay down the gauntlet; the young men bleed and die for it Shouting, "long live the king".

What of the young warrior's who survive, who come home ?Certainly not the men who left,

What is wrong with my son? What is wrong with my brother, my lover, my daddy, my friend?

He is here, but he is not,
He is in PTSD hell until he dies.

A Surprise At the Black Granite Wall

By Doc Pershing

Yesterday I sat and read the entire magazine, it was outstanding. I was grateful for the articles on PTSD, but the entire magazine held my attention. The article on the wall was especially interesting to me. I went to the wall with two other vets from here in town (Springfield, Illinois) back in 1995.We went at the end of April and there was a lot of ceremonies going on, it was the 25th anniversary of the fall of South Vietnam.

We got there late on Friday afternoon. And after checking into the hotel we walked directly to the wall. It was evening by then and just about twilight. I had on my sunglasses that I always wear. As I was walking down the wall there were a lot of people and buses parked. A young woman approached me and asked if I was a Vietnam Vet. I told her I was and she asked me if I would do her a favor. To which I replied of course.

It turned out the woman was from the Pocono Mountain area of Pa. She had brought her girl scout troop by bus to see the wall. She had all the girls lined up and everyone of them shook my hand, and thanked me. I was speechless, and just nodded to them all. That was the very first time since I returned home that anyone had ever thanked me for serving in Vietnam. I was glad that I had those shades on, for I was in tears. I didn't want those little girls to think they were upsetting me. Each and everyone of them was so sweet and polite. I was glad I had the support of my two friends at that time.

So you see when I read the article about not going alone to the wall, I had good reason to agree with that statement. That black granite wall means a lot to we Vietnam Vet's. But it also means a lot to others, especially those little girls that traveled to see it first hand. Semper Fi Brothers.

INCOMING

By Bob Greenwood

I questioned myself whether to write this message or not. It seems the word Tet, always puts me in a down mode especially during the months of January and February. Of course it could be the Vietnamese Buddist Temple just down the road from where I live causing the funk I find myself in most of the time. January 22nd, Delta 1/9 was conducting an operation just north of Dong Ha. At noon everything came to a halt. We got word that choppers would be coming in to take us back to Camp Evans. The peon grunt like me had no idea what was going on or where we were going, just follow orders.

We arrived at Camp Evans and we thought we would be able to go back to the company area and grab some extra smokes or pogey bait. The orders were that nobody break formation because we were waiting to be airlifted to someplace called Khe Sanh. Then word started to filter down that Khe Sanh was some surrounded village, jumping off in some rice paddy, hit the ground blazing away...etc. The rumors. Choppers finally picked us up about four hours later and off we went. When we landed at the base in the late afternoon, I walked out on the airstrip and said to myself, "hey this is not so bad" LOL!!

As we were milling around the platoon leader said "don't bunch up, spread out." While I was standing on the airstrip, several of us noticed some Phantoms making a bombing run off in the distance. Suddenly anti-aircraft shot down one of the Phantoms and the Corporal next me said "Oh $@#%, we're in for some deep, deep $!@# if they can take down a Phantom". The next day Delta Co 1/9, left the base and headed for the rock quarry, along the way we passed hill 64 and saw those French bunkers; man we thought that would be "decent" if we could use them. A couple of weeks later, fate showed us why Hill 64 was not a good choice to make a stand. The platoon from Alpha Company was almost over-run.

I was medevaced on February 22, out of Khe Sanh, and I still cry out for help. So many years ago but it seems like just last week. I can't wait to see my Brothers, at this year's reunion. There aren't many 1/9ers at the reunion but I still feel that sense of Brotherhood from Khe Sanh Vets, and nobody can take that away from me. Sorry. I'm just feeling kind of down.

Semper Fi,
Bob

Just Caring For Eddie
By Thomas D. Segel

If there is any area of news coverage where media bias exists, it is the seemingly universal ignoring of the human face of war by the mainstream press. Those labeled as "traditional" broadcast outlets and print publications have consistently offered the public a laundry list of bombs, bodies and devastation, but have seldom reported little more than the numbers. It is rare indeed when a person or group are examined as living, breathing participants in what is perhaps the most horrifying and uncivilized of endeavors.... war.

To bring the reality of the conflict in Iraq into focus, one must turn to what is rapidly being referred to as "the new media". In more precise language it is the combined efforts of talk radio and the electronic publications of the Internet that reach the heart and the hurt of what is happening to the men and women of our armed forces.

A prime example of this would be when reporting about those who have been wounded in action. Traditional publications seldom report on wounded Americans. If they do, the items are short and usually limited to numbers or totals. Those wishing to learn more must search out websites on the Internet or tune in the commentators of talk radio. A Google or Yahoo search will give you more than 1,400,000 hits on information about Americans wounded in Iraq.

The topic can best be examined using the heart-wrenching story of Marine Sergeant Eddie Ryan. On April 13, 2005, this young Marine was manning a rooftop position along with other members of his sniper platoon. Not much was happening until that first shot and a bullet pierced his brain. It was quickly followed by a second shot that smashed into his jaw. The enemy had not even pulled the trigger that day. Ryan had been the mistaken target of friendly fire. But, this is not really a story of a devastating wound, but instead it is one of faith and prayer.

Eddie Ryan died that day. There was not a breath of life in him when teammate Sergeant Karl Schaeffer started CPR. He continued forcing air into Ryan and applying the life saving technique until the young Marine was again breathing on his own. When Eddie was in condition to be moved, he was flown to Germany. He was sustained by a variety of life support systems and given little chance of survival. His parents were flown in to be by his side. Doctors told them that even if he did remain alive there was no way he would ever remember his family or anything about himself. All his father, Chris could do was remain by his side for hours on end and pray to God for his life.

Eddie never left them. When he was stable enough, he was air evacuated to Bethesda Naval Hospital in Maryland. At the time doctors said it was so he could be close to family and friends at the end. Everyone's prayers continued. WABC's Mark Levin who asked all his listeners to pray for Eddie heard the family had asked for a network of prayer and informed his audience. Sean Hannity reported the story on his radio program. The hometown community and the church offered prayers. They were all answered far beyond anyone's expectations.

Ryan's friend and team leader is "CJ" Quinlan who was still in Iraq, but asked his wife to keep checking on the wounded Marine and report back. It was difficult for Lisa to walk into that hospital room and see a close family friend lying in such a state, but she continued coming and reporting on those visits to those still fighting the war.

One day another Marine returned from Iraq and Lisa Quinlan took him to see Eddie. "I brought Sergeant Taylor White to the room that day and when Eddie saw him he smiled." He recognized Taylor White... his first reaction to seeing a friend. Progress continued and six weeks after being shot Eddie started to move his head. Next he was transferred from Bethesda to a military rehabilitation hospital in Richmond, Virginia. Shortly after arriving he looked at his mother and uttered his first word..."Mom". The very next day His father Chris was bending down and saying, "I love you", when the Marine responded, "I love you too, Dad." At that moment they knew he was aware of his family.

The Marine's recall was proven again when CJ Quinlan returned from Iraq and walked into the room. Eddie looked at him and said "Papa Bear" which was CJ's nickname. Today, Eddie Ryan has gained weight, can talk haltingly, and has full use of his left arm and limited use of the right arm. He can sit up in his wheelchair and has managed to stand with assistance, but is still unable to walk. Eddie has full memory and recalls the events of his childhood and later years. He has a sense of humor and his sister makes him laugh frequently. He is starting to speak in complete sentences.

Eddie's father took months off from work to be by his side. Angie, his mother, quit her job to remain near the wounded Marine, and his sister, Felicia, took time off from college to be with her brother.

This is a story that has been told and retold by website, and email. Few mentions of Sergeant Eddie Ryan appear in the mainstream media. One such mention, however, must be credited to a caring publication. On January 23, 2006 there was a story in The Times Herald-Record, which serves New York's Hudson Valley and the Catskills. It tells of Eddie Ryan's battle to recover from his wounds. It reports on how the family's main concern is that Eddie's release from the hospital is only weeks away, and he will be unable to function in their small home.

According to the Times Herald-Record, "...the hallway to Eddie's bedroom is too narrow for him and the wheelchair. The main bathroom in his family's 1,300 square foot ranch-style home can't accommodate him, either. The living room can't hold Eddie, his mother Angela, his dad and sister Felicia at the same time, Chris Ryan says."

Handicapped assessable renovations, including an addition to the home will carry a price tag of almost $100,000. It is a cost far beyond the family's reach. Eddie is only eligible for $10,000 in government assistance. But, the faith of the entire family remains strong. Their prayers for help are being answered too. People are coming to the aid of Eddie and his family in a variety of ways.

Americans are reaching out. Barry Fixler, a jewelry storeowner, and former Marine ran a special event. All proceeds from his jewelry sales were donated to the wounded serviceman's rehabilitation. Fixler learned about Eddie's condition from his wife, Linda, who is one of the Marine's nurses. Barry is a member of the Khe Sanh Veterans, and a consistent contributor to all veterans causes.

Eddie Ryan's story is being carried on a website donated by A&E Advertising and Web Design. The company has also made arrangements for people to donate to Eddie Ryan's rehabilitation at www.helpeddie.com Marine sniper buddies have joined together and are offering a special rifle in a fund raising drawing that is dedicated to Eddie. Those wishing to purchase a ticket can write to Sniper's Hide at fgalli@intelexltd.com. Chris Ryan is looking into every possible option to assist his son. He is comforted by the public response the family has already received. But, he also noted there are almost 10,000 wounded service personnel who can never return to active duty. "Things have got to change", he says, "not just for Eddie, but also for all these kids giving their lives and their blood for their country. They are not getting taken care of."

I just wanted to inform you of the passing of another great Marine who had served in WWII. Karl R. Leffler was a BAR man, in the first wave that landed at Tarawa, at 18 years of age. He was a Professor at Purdue University and an all around great guy. He never forgot his Marine Corps roots, and was impressed with our magazine and what we went through at Khe Sanh.

Why I Am Who I Am

You may wonder why I'm so different
Why I have so many unusual ways
But feel not alone, for I wonder too
But in answer, this is all I can say...

My life before Nam was quite normal
Not a prep course for what I'd encounter
And in your wildest dreams you'd never imagine How intense just living in Nam could be,

Well, here is part of the story of Life in the Nam
Of how I was changed into what I am

Over there, you didn't see a tree in a forest,
You saw an ambush behind every leaf.
There were no fields of grass to romp in,
Just another place for booby traps and pits.

There were spiders and snakes, elephants, tigers, insects...
None of which seemed to care much for me.
And of course there were people of a different culture,
Who wanted me to die more than they cared for their own life.

So listen to this story...and find out who I am
I'm a man changed by the misery of Vietnam.

I have walked through a river of blood
While death tugged at my shirttail.
I have slept with the corpse of a friend

Who hours before was my bosom buddy.
I have lived in the stench of feces and urine
While rats scampered across my feet.
I have held men too young to shave in my arms
While they gasped their very last breath.
I have cried at the loss of a comrade
And I wondered why it was him and not me.
I have eaten food with blood caked on my hands
While I sat among the wounded and the dead.
I have endured great hunger for food
While my lips were parched with thirst.
I have lived in a hole in the ground with vermin
While my brains seemed to cook in the sun.
I have invaded a land that was not my own
And I hated a people I didn't even know.
I have had muscles ache from extreme fatigue
While my eyes bore witness to the extreme horror.
I have run unafraid through artillery and bullets
While wondering if the next round would get me.
I have grown faint from fear
While my mind entombed the living nightmares.
I have witness pain of intolerable degree
While I held the pieces of destroyed tissue in my hands.

I was obligated to play God, and I did it
As I decided who was to live and who must die.
I have fired at the enemy with a vengeance
And I have promised to kill a friend out of mercy.

I have done these things...

For you, it is a spring rain
For me it is a memory of haunting death.
For you it is a walkway through a pleasant wood area,
For me it is a one-way path to devastation.
For you it is a restaurant with wonderful atmosphere,
For me it is an invitation to mortar attack.

Yes, it is true I have changed.
I'm not who I was and never will be again.
So as you wonder why I am the way I am
Or why I do as I often do,
Please remember...
Sometimes I don't know why either.

WE GOT MAIL

Tom, I am sending in double dues, please pay for a brother who cannot afford to. I am proud to be a Khe Sanh Survivor, and associated with the RED CLAY magazine. I have just completed a two year battle with Lymphoma Cancer. On Dec 14, 2005, I received a most wondrous Christmas present when I was finally diagnosed to be in complete remission.

I was already receiving 100% compensation from the VA when I was first diagnosed with cancer. Lymphoma cancer is associated with agent orange and the many defoliants, used in Vietnam. I thought I had escaped the wrath of those chemicals until being diagnosed in 2004. It is terrible that so many of us are being brought down by these symptoms after being involved in such terrible direct combat as we endured at Khe Sanh. We are in fact still fighting the effects of war in many different ways.

During the war my mother suffered so much always worrying about my well being. She watched the news every day when broadcast live, hoping to get a glimpse of me. Mom and dad are still alive and we spend a lot of time together. That is why it was so hard for me to tell them about my cancer after being diagnosed. I had to deliver the news face to face and it almost killed me. My wife is my strongest supporter. We met and married after I left military service. She also anguishes about this war that never leaves us.

I want to thank everyone for their efforts with the RED CLAY magazine. I find it a very good source of closure to our war.

KHE SANH VETERANS STILL SERVING OUR COUNTRY

Dear Mr. Eichler, just a short note to let you know that my husband, Wayne Silva, D Co 1/26, is still serving in the Marines. His unit has just been activated, and they are headed for Iraq. He will be stationed at Camp Fallujah, with the 1st Marine Regiment.

He is not scheduled to return until November of 2006, which will give him 30 years of service in the USMC. I dare say I do not think there are that many Khe Sanh Veterans in Iraq, especially A 58 Year old. I guess there are still A Few Good "OLD" Men left.

KENNETH W. BARTELS, (B Btry 1/13)
Is also serving in Iraq. As of this writing we do not know the unit he is serving with.

Editors Note: if any member wishes to express their good wishes to Wayne or Ken, here are their email addresses, Wayne -USMC126D@YAHOO.COM.
Ken -DEBABARTELS@AOL.COM
Of course we will be sending our brother WAYNE & KEN our good wishes, and gifts, as we have our other brothers who serve/served there.

MEMOIRS

Journalists and Others

By Craig W. Tourte

The loss of anyone in war is tragic, but it is the nature of the beast. The war in Vietnam was covered and brought to the American public via television live for the first time. I don't know how many journalists were lost covering that conflict, but Bernard Fall, a French journalist, author and educator, comes to mind. I think I have read all of his books dealing with the war in Southeast Asia. Who can forget books such as "Hell In A Very Small Place, the Siege of Dien Bien Phu," and "Street Without Joy." He was a popular individual who was known and loved by many Marines and who's death came at the age of 40 on February 21, 1967, along with those of GY/SGT Byron Highland and L/CPL Glenn Harris while on a patrol with A&C/1/9 near Hue.

I know that Walter, Harry, and Dan were in country. I remember seeing the newsreels of them when I returned home in 1968. Each describing in a breathless whisper the dangers the American forces faced dealing with the soldiers of the north and rebels of the south. They all seemed to be dressed the same, some kind of khaki bush jacket with matching pants. I remember a photograph of Walter wearing a flak jacket and helmet, it made him look out of place and rather odd, I thought at the time how old Walter looked. There were lots of pictures taken by various journalists and cameramen who visited the war. Male and female came and went, some were lost to the conflict, but I never saw nor knew any of them.

I think I have seen most of the photographs taken of Khe Sanh during the Siege. Considering the historical circumstances, there really don't seem to be that many. It appears the majority were taken by the men who were themselves involved in the conflict. I don't have any personal recall of ever seeing a news type person at Khe Sanh during the 8 months I was there. Of course I realize that I was located in one of the more isolated corners of the base and few "visitors" ever came that way. There were few officers around and those who were in the area during the Siege seemed to be fairly inconspicuous.

It was one of those afternoons; a clear day after the fog had lifted. Helicopters would come and go. Toilet waste barrels were burning and the big guns of the NVA had not hurled anything at us for an hour or more. There was a feeling in the air that I could not describe, more of a sense than anything else, but I didn't know what it was. Sgt. Michael Secli had to report to H.Q. 1/26 for some reason, quite a walk (or run) from our location on a road we traveled only when it was absolutely necessary. Sgt. Secli was gone for two or three hours and returned with some exciting news. Sgt. Secli told us that he was talking to someone when he sensed something in the air, which he could not describe. He asked if there was a woman on the base and was surprised to hear that there was a female journalist in the area. I was surprised to hear this news, I never had seen a journalist, newsperson, cameraman or any other type of media at Khe Sanh, at least where our unit was located. On the other hand, there really was not much to look at or report on in the southwest corner of the base. Lots of blown up tents and sandbags, large holes in the ground, jagged metal objects lying all over the place, pretty much the same that could be observed anywhere on the base. But there were few good-looking officers or people of any importance in our area. We were just a bunch of privates, doing our job and trying to stay alive.

It would have been interesting years later, to be able to see my young face on the cover of Life Magazine, to have been able to read a quote I might have made that had historical significance, and which was still repeated to this day. I might have been standing by a sign that read "Home Is Where You Dig It," but it never happened. There was no photograph of me in my torn battle fatigues with cigarette dangling out of my mouth, or my name with hometown listed. No journalist visited us at our little corner of Khe Sanh and if they had, they probably would have spelled my name wrong.

I am reminded that although I did not see any journalists, they did visit Khe Sanh, along with various journalists and photographers who covered the Siege extensively. Ernie Spencer and Lawrence "Mack" McCartney brought Robert Ellison to my attention. Ellison arrived sometime during the start of the Siege but left in February. Ellison was returning to Khe Sanh in March onboard the C-123 Caribou that was shot down while on approach to the base, which tragically killed all. Ellison took numerous photographs of the destructive power of the NVA's incoming rounds, including the famed photograph of the ammo dump explosion featured on the front page of Newsweek Magazine on March 18, 1968. Another famous photograph taken by Ellison was one titled "Marines In Trench" depicting three Marines laying prostrate in the bowels of the red clay trench in their dated flack jackets and helmets, hands over their face and helmeted head. A powerful photograph even when viewed 38 years later and a photograph that still evokes strong remembrances and emotions.

Ellison is also noted for the famous "Red" photograph. This photograph is the face of a Marine with the words "Red" written on the side of his helmet and a PFC chevron drawn on the front. The haggard face, sunken eyes and drawn whiskered cheeks reveal the utter exhaustion and hopelessness felt by so many of us. It is the face of all who went through the Siege of Khe Sanh.

Anyone who has read Bernard Fall's book "Hell In A Very Small Place, the Siege of Dien Bien Phu," cannot help but make the comparison of the Siege at Dien Bien Phu and the Siege at Khe Sanh. President Johnson made the comparison when speaking of Khe Sanh when he summed up his feeling while the fighting was still in progress, "I don't want any damn Dinbinphoo." Khe Sanh Veteran Gordon Young reminds us that Bernard Fall was killed while on a patrol with Marines on his own Street Without Joy near Hue, in the area he so eloquently described and wrote about some years before.

Leland Upshaw and Lawrence "Mack" McCartney inform us that David Douglas Duncan, a retired Marine and then photojournalist visited the base and hills during the Siege. Lawrence McCartney said Duncan visited Echo Company on Hill 861-A after the morning battle of February 5, 1968. Duncan took photographs for Life Magazine and wrote extensively, authoring two books, which include photographs of Khe Sanh. One was "War Without Heroes," and the other was "I Protest." An important passage in his book, "I Protest" reads, "I am no kook, hippie, hawk, or dove. I am just a veteran combat photographer and foreign correspondent who cares intensely about my country and the role we are playing...and assigning to ourselves...in the world today. And I want to shout a loud protest at what has happened at Khe Sanh and in all of Vietnam." Duncan gave the royalties from "I Protest" to the families of Marines killed at Khe Sanh.

One of the more memorable photographs taken by Duncan while at Khe Sanh showed deceased Marines being loaded onboard a CH-46 helicopter. Khe Sanh Veteran Kevin Macaulay, a former Corporal with Bravo 3rd Recon writes, "In all probability, one of the deceased Marines being carried aboard the CH-46 on 21 January 68 was Bill Bryan. We of Bravo Recon gave our brother Marines their last salute as they left Khe Sanh on their way home."

In 2003 David Douglas Duncan was 88 years old and living in the South of France.

It was Jim Madara who remembers the female reporter being at Khe Sanh and relates that towards the end of the Siege that he, and another Marine were driving alongside the airstrip while helicopters were landing and disembarking many starched utility types (could they have been officers?). Both were looking at the crowd for the rumored return of the female reporter when one of the starched utility types got in their way. Jim caught the gleam of a silver insignia going over the fender of his jeep. It wasn't the reporter (female) so Jim decided to continue on and fulfill his assigned mission. He was surprised that he never heard anything else about the incident. Jim's recall is that the silver flash looked a lot like a bird.

Jurate Kazickas was a 24-year-old correspondent visiting Khe Sanh during the Siege. Tall and blond and some said even exotic-looking, she gained access as a free-lancer and the Marines liked her being around. "It was a quiet day, March 8, 1968, and Kazickas was interviewing a group of Marines in the sunshine. Suddenly she heard a whistling sound and the men shouted, "Incoming!" A rocket exploded 50 feet away. Instead of throwing herself on the ground, she made the mistake of running toward the bunker. Shrapnel tore into her face, arms, legs, and rear end."

Johnny "Doc" McBride was one of Corpsmen who had "the pleasure" to cut off Ms. Kazickas pants. "It was a surprise when we saw a female anatomy but we were too busy working on the wounded for it to really make a difference...it was like a treat from heaven...she was very cute. It motivated me to survive the incoming and make it home...I have a letter from her thanking us for taking care of her."

Ernie Spencer remembers that Doctor Ed Feldman was also one who attended to Ms. Kazickas and that Doctor Feldman and Ms. Kazickas are friends to this day. Ernie points out that Bill Gay with engineers was badly wounded as he stood next to Jurate Kazickas that morning.

" Word traveled quickly that a female reporter was among those who had been taken by helicopter to a hospital in Da Nang. The military didn't send flowers. One colonel said, "She got what she was looking for." (Cristina Rouvalis and Bill Schackner)."

Jurate Kazickas is now a 63 year-old freelance writer who lives in New York City and "...still carries the faint scars from the bloody Siege of Khe Sanh." She is a board member of the Adoption Institute, which is dedicated to improving the lives of people touched by adoption, and the co-author of "War Torn." Ms. Kazickas recalls her time at Khe Sanh. "I was only there 24 hours before I was wounded: mercifully not seriously. It was a little humiliating to have shrapnel in my rear end." "... fortunately the only plastic surgeon in all of the northern part of Vietnam was on duty that day, and-he said if you were a Marine, I would just take a Brillo pad and just scrub all of that stuff out of your face, but he worked on me for about an hour, taking out every little piece of shrapnel."

Dickey Chapelle was a war corresponded known for her horn-rimmed glasses and boonie hat decorated with jump wings she'd earned in another war. With cigarettes, custom-tailored fatigues, and pearl earrings, she had a passion for her stories and loved Marines. In the fall of 1965 Dickey convinced the editors of the National Observer to send her back to Vietnam where she had been many times before.

"On the morning of November 4, 1965, Dickey, on patrol with a platoon of Marines, stood second in line behind the platoon leader, Lt. Mauriski. Making their way out of camp, the lieutenant tripped a hidden wire triggering a grenade and mortar that sent shrapnel flying. Dickey was thrown 20 feet and caught a piece of shrapnel in her neck, which nicked her carotid artery. She bled to death, her head in the lap of another reporter. Dickey once told a general, "When my time comes, I want it to be on a patrol with the Marines." She was the fist member of the press killed during Vietnam and the first American woman reporter killed in battle. One can't help wonder, with her love of the Marines and having spent her career striving to be the first, if she couldn't have written a better epitaph."

I think back to 1965 and Chuck Chamberlin transporting the remains of the Marines beloved Dickie Chapelle. I believe Ms. Chapelle's family would be proud to have known that Chuck, a Marine who would survive the bloody Siege of Khe Sanh years later, was the person who was with Dickie on her last journey. I believe it was fitting and proper and to a certain extent, destiny that Ms. Chapell was placed into his care. I believe that Ms. Chapell would have considered it her privilege.

I am thankful for the presence of the journalists and photographers on the hills and base, and for their bravery. Their photographs allowed us to recall the bravery we had in ourselves and helped us to remember our comrades who had not returned.

Editors Note: In the above article Craig speaks of Khe Sanh Veteran Chuck Chamberlin who had to escort the body of Chapelle. Below is Chuck Chamberlin's personal account of that occurrence.

Transporting Dickey Chapelle

By Chuck Chamberlin

One of the worst jobs I had prior to joining the Marine Corps was working for a funeral home out of Fairfield, CA that had the Army contract for bodies being returned from Vietnam. I was paid $1.25 per hour as I recall, and the job consisted primarily of assisting with the processing of remains at Oakland Army Terminal/Mortuary Section. There were about a half dozen of us on the grunt crew, and after unloading the shipping cases from trucks we would then open the cases, remove the bodies, and place them on gurneys, which were then staged for the morticians in the preparation room.

It took awhile to get used to the smell of camphor and Formalin, and that other smell that can't be disguised. I don't think I'll ever forget the sight of so many men's' bodies, some whole and others mangled beyond all recognition. I soon learned to block out the fact that not long ago these were walking/talking human beings. The morticians embalmed the remains, dressed the deceased in their Class 'A' uniforms and, for those that were "viewable", applied makeup to make them more presentable to their friends and relatives. We would then place these soldiers in caskets, using silver spray paint to obscure the glass on those deemed "non-viewable", seal the caskets and place them in plywood shipping crates. An American flag was provided for each of them. I then transported these fallen heroes to San Francisco airport for their final flight home. In the case of those from the Bay Area, I provided transportation to local cemeteries including the National Cemetery in San Bruno, CA for burial with military honors. Business was brisk and there was plenty of overtime.

I think my experience with this gruesome job had a lot to do with my joining the Marine Corps. I figured by then that I'd seen enough Army bodies to last a lifetime. That and the fact that my older brother had done a hitch in the Corps, including 6 months in 'Nam before rotating home for discharge. In my naïve/ignorant teenage mind I thought I'd be better off as a Marine! Little did I know that 2 years later I'd be offered a similar escort assignment by a marine officer while assigned to Casual Company, Treasure Is., CA. By then I was a Corporal fresh out of Oak Knoll Naval Hospital after surviving the Khe Sanh siege. I took a guard detail at the federal building in San Francisco instead, but that's a whole other story.

One Friday night in November of '65 I was told to drive the "funeral coach" (hearse) up to McClellan AFB about an hour north of Fairfield. There, I was to pickup the remains of a civilian "VIP" who'd been flown in separate from the usual route via Air Force transport, and I was told to return the remains to the Travis AFB morgue near Fairfield. I was handed a sheaf of paperwork that in typical military fashion consisted of multiple carbon copies to be duly signed and stamped by the appropriate personnel, and proceeded to carry out this somewhat unusual assignment.

It's been over 40 years since then, but either upon my return to Travis that evening, or the next day, I assisted with removing those remains from the shipping case. I recall being shocked to discover that the deceased was in fact a diminutive female in her mid-40's, with a single small shrapnel wound in her neck. At Oakland Army Terminal I'd gotten used to seeing the remains of relatively young adult males with the entire range of combat wounds. To see this woman with a seemingly tiny wound surprised me, but at the time I didn't know who she was or the circumstances of her death. I have since learned more about the woman I transported from one Air Force base to another that night…

The following information, was compiled from various sources on the Internet such as "Wikipedia" and "digital journalist.org".)

Dickey Chapelle was born Georgette Louise Meyer in Shorewood, Wisconsin in 1919, and by the age of sixteen she was attending aeronautical design classes at MIT. She soon returned home, where she worked at a local airfield, hoping to learn to pilot airplanes instead of merely designing them. However, when her mother learned that she was also having an affair with one of the pilots, Chapelle was forced to live in Florida with her grandparents.

Eventually, she moved to New York, and met her future husband, Tony Chapelle, and began working as a photographer sponsored by Trans World Airlines. She eventually became a professional, and later, after fifteen years of marriage, divorced Tony, and changed her first name to Dickey. Despite her mediocre photographic credentials, Chapelle managed to become a war correspondent photojournalist for National Geographic, and with one of her first assignments, was posted with the Marines during World War II.

After the war, she traveled all around the world, often going to extraordinary lengths to cover a story in any war zone. She later learned to jump with paratroopers, and usually traveled with troops. This led to frequent awards, and earned the respect of both the military and journalistic community.

Despite early support for Fidel Castro, Dickey was an outspoken anti-Communist, and loudly expressed her pro-American views at the beginning of the Vietnam War. Chapelle was killed by a landmine in Vietnam on November 4, 1965; her last moments were captured in a photograph by Henri Huet. She became the first war correspondent killed in Vietnam, as well as the first female reporter to be killed during battle.

Whiskey-voiced and brave, Dickey Chapelle spent most of her adult life in a man's world. She knew how to parachute out of a plane as well as how to fly one, had adventures in three wars, and was remembered by nearly everyone she ever met.

In 1962, she won the Overseas Press Club's George Polk Award for the best reporting in any medium, requiring exceptional courage and enterprise abroad. Her proudest achievement was the Distinguished Service Award, presented by the U.S. Marine Corps Combat Correspondents Association. At her memorial service, a representative of the Women's National Press Club said Chapelle was "the kind of reporter all women in journalism openly or secretly aspire to be. She was always where the action was."

I saw many dead bodies from Vietnam before this one and many more after, but none seemed sadder to me than Dickey Chapelle's. There's one of those Australian campaign hats lying on the ground near her head in the picture, and I read that she'd put a flower in the hatband that morning. I've also read that she once told a general, "When my time comes I want to be on patrol with marines". It's been said that she got her wish, though I've never been sure about that, with her or anyone else. Her last words reportedly were… "I guess it was bound to happen".

I quit that lousy job not long afterward, and within a year was in boot camp in San Diego. Dickey Chapelle is also the subject of a song by Nanci Griffith The last verse is included below:

"It was 1965,
Over Chu Lai in a free fall dive
In a dawn patrol to cover the dead zone ground
She tiptoed through the land mines
All along the enemy lines
But she never saw the one that took her down
She captured the bloody pearls of war so well
That war was bound to steal the end of Dickey Chapelle"

"Pearl's Eye View (The Life of Dickey Chapelle)" by Nanci Griffith/"Maura Kennedy

This photo was part of an article written by Ms Chapelle for National Geographic, Vol 122, No. 5, November 1962. This article documents the first meeting of Dickey and HMM-362. The relationship ended in tragedy as an Ugly Angel helicopter piloted by Greg Lee raced her shattered body to Delta Med at Ky Ha 3 years later. She did not survive. POETRY

My Belated Christmas Greeting to All Khe Sanh Vets

By Mike "Animal" Preston

The embers glowed softly, and in their dim light, I gazed round the room and I cherished the sight.
My wife was asleep, her head on my chest, my daughter beside me, angelic in rest.

Outside the snow fell, a blanket of white, transforming the yard to a winter delight.
The sparkling lights in the tree I believe, completed the magic that was Christmas Eve.
My eyelids were heavy, my breathing was deep, secure and surrounded by love I would sleep.

In perfect contentment, or so it would seem, so I slumbered, perhaps I started to dream.
The sound wasn't loud, and it wasn't too near, but I opened my eyes when it tickled my ear.
Perhaps just a cough, I didn't quite know, then the sure sound of footsteps outside in the snow.
My soul gave a tremble, I struggled to hear, and I crept to the door just to see who was near.
Standing out in the cold and the dark of the night, a lone figure stood, his face weary and tight.

A soldier, I puzzled, some twenty years old, perhaps a Marine, huddled here in the cold.
Alone in the dark, he looked up and smiled, standing watch over me, and my wife and my child.
"What are you doing?" I asked without fear, "come in this moment, it's freezing out here!
Put down your pack, brush the snow from your sleeve, you should be at home on a cold Christmas Eve!"

For barely a moment I saw his eyes shift, away from the cold and the snow blown in drifts..
To the window that danced with a warm fire's light
Then he sighed and he said "Its really all right, I'm out here by Choice, I'm here every night."
"It's my duty to stand at the front of the line, that separates you from the darkest of times.
No one had to ask or beg or implore me, I'm proud to stand here like my fathers before me.

My Gramps died at 'Pearl on a day in December," then he sighed, "that's a Christmas 'Gram always remembers." My dad stood his watch in the jungles of 'Nam', and now it is my turn and so, here I am.
I've not seen my own son in more than a while, but my wife sends me pictures, he's sure got her smile.
Then he bent and he carefully pulled from his bag, the red, white, and blue... an American flag.
"I can live through the cold and the being alone, away from my family, my house and my home.

I can stand at my post through the rain and the sleet,
I can sleep in a foxhole with little to eat.
I can carry the weight of killing another, or lay down my life with my sister and brother..
Who stand at the front against any and all, to ensure for all time that this flag will not fall."
"So go back inside," he said, "harbor no fright, your family is waiting and I'll be all right."
"But isn't there something I can do, at the least,
"give you money," I asked, "or prepare you a feast?

It seems all too little for all that you've done, for being away from your wife and your son."
Then his eye welled a tear that held no regret, "just tell us you love us, and never forget.

To fight for our rights back at home while we're gone, to stand your own watch, no matter how long.
For when we come home, either standing or dead, to know you remember we fought and we bled.
Is payment enough, and with that we will trust, that we mattered to you as you mattered to us.

A Simple Thank You

It is now the beginning of the year 2006. A lot of years have gone by since 1967, and part of 1968, at Khe Sanh. I have had 7 heart attacks and PTSD to compound my health. I would like to express , and I am sure all would agree, what a blessing the Reverend Ray W. Stubbe has been for all of us, especially for our deceased brothers and their families.

Personally I will always be grateful for his belief in my truthful discussions regarding my time at Khe Sanh. God Bless him always. I would also like to express my gratitude to Phillip Wright and Larry McCartney for listening and believing in me. May the good Lord bless them and all who served at Khe Sanh.

BOOK REVIEW
By Tom Eichler

In the last edition of Red Clay there was an article in the memorial section with a story concerning a former Marine paying tribute to his Father Lt Pham Van Hoa, a former member of the Vietnamese Air Force. His son, Quang X. Pham, the former Marine's name should have been listed as the author.

Besides writing that article, Quang X. Pham has written an outstanding book, called A Sense of Duty, My Father, My American Journey. Below is just one of the many fine reviews of his writings

Quangs book reminds us of price they paid
By GORDON DILLOW,
The Orange County Register

This month will mark the 30th anniversary of a shameful chapter in our nation's history. Thirty years ago we abandoned a longtime ally, the Republic of (South) Vietnam.

And with it, along with millions of others, we abandoned Quang X. Pham's dad.

Quang is an old friend of mine, a 40-year-old Mission Viejo businessman who came to the U.S. as a boy refugee from Vietnam, and later served as a U.S. Marine helicopter pilot in the 1991 Persian Gulf War. His father, Pham Van Hoa, now deceased, was a U.S.-trained South Vietnamese Air Force pilot who spent 12 years in a communist "re-education" camp, because he refused to leave his country when the North Vietnamese army swept through South Vietnam in April 1975 - this, while America, after investing 58,000 of its own sons' lives, stood by and washed its hands of the entire bloody and tragic affair.

And even though he became an American who loved his country and served it courageously in uniform, for many years that abandonment rankled Quang's heart. It rankled mine, too.

Quang has written a new book about his father, and about his own experiences as a refugee who became an American Marine. It's called "A Sense of Duty: My Father, My American Journey," published by Ballantine Books (you can get more information at www.asenseofduty.com.) I highly recommend it for anyone who wants to understand what the Vietnam War meant to some of the people who suffered the most because of it - that is, the people of South Vietnam. It's powerful, and moving, and in it Quang tries to dispel a myth about Vietnam that still persists.

The myth is that guys like his dad didn't fight for their country.

"I just want to see South Vietnamese (military men) like my father acknowledged," Quang told me. "Not made into heroes or anything, but just acknowledged for what they did. I wanted to set the record straight."

Certainly the casualty numbers tell a story that's far different from the myth. The South Vietnamese armed forces lost a total of about 250,000 men killed in the war - a number that, as a percentage of national population, was about 50 times greater than American deaths.

And the numbers of the maimed were even greater. Ten years ago, as a reporter for the Register, I went back to Vietnam to cover the 20th anniversary of the end of the war, and everywhere I went I would meet aging former ARVN (Army of the Republic of Vietnam) soldiers who were missing arms or legs or eyes, many of them reduced to beggary because the communist government offered no pensions or even menial jobs for former ARVNs. When they found out I'd been an American soldier in the war they would often break out yellowed, crumbling, long-hidden South Vietnamese military ID cards and tell me, "I was with you, I was with you." And they were.

Now, I know some of my fellow American Vietnam veterans will disagree with me on this subject. They'll call me up and tell me bitter tales about "Marvin the ARVN," about South Vietnamese M-16s that were in perfect condition because "they'd never been fired, and were only dropped once," about South Vietnamese corruption and incompetence and cowardice. Certainly there was no shortage of such things, particularly in the ARVN's politicized upper ranks.

But don't tell me - or Quang X. Pham - that 250,000 guys died with no brave men among them. Don't try to tell guys who got their arms or legs blown off, that they didn't fight hard enough. Don't think that a lot of guys like Quang's father didn't have a sense of duty and honor, even as they lost their war, and their country, and languished in brutal communist prison camps for years and years and years.

In the coming weeks you'll probably see and hear a lot of retrospectives about the Vietnam War, some of them truthful, many of them media myths perpetuated by people who were never even there - the same sort of myths that even now are being created about the Iraq war and the Americans fighting it. More on that in a future column.

But if you think that the Vietnam War was strictly an American war, if you think that the people of South Vietnam weren't worth fighting for, or with, then I have a suggestion. Talk to a guy like Quang X. Pham. And ask him about his dad.

Rest In Peace

In moments of loss and sadness we all tend to look skyward and ask the question,
"Why?" Why her? Why now?

We who have sought this answer for so long for the many who have slipped away from us in this lifetime, whether in the jungles or at home. We who have witnessed these loses since our youth, are perhaps eternally confounded by this part of life which comes to us all at yet some unknown place and time. We share your Grief, We Mourn your loss, We send you our Love, Thoughts, and Prayers, and most of all-We Shall see each other in God's Good Care.

KHE SANH: A COMPREHENSIVE CHRONOLOGY

Many of our members have requested a re-print of an article by Reverend Ray W. Stubbe that appeared in Issue 93 (Spring) which listed which units served at Khe Sanh, and the various combat operations that were conducted. Ray wrote in that same article, a chronology of Khe Sanh going back 130 million years. For this article I have condensed it to the years 1962-1975. Ray has updated the information to include reports from the North Vietnamese Army, and their day to day operations during that period.

NOTE: unless otherwise noted, units indicated participated in the operations for the entire period noted.

08 FEB – US Military Assistance Command, Vietnam (MACV) is established.

02 MAR – 12 Apr - The fall of Tchepone prompts American involvement in Vietnam and becomes the focus of the SEATO exercise TULUNGUN, conducted in the Philippines. The exercise provides a "cover" for introducing US Marine helicopters into Vietnam.

08 JUL – First permanent American military unit arrives at Khe Sanh to check infiltration on Route 9. The "A" Team under the command of Capt WEAVER locates at the Old French Fort (XD 858388, designated Thuong Van on the tactical maps) on the eastern side of Khe Sanh Village.

23 JUL – Declaration and Protocol on the neutrality of Laos is signed in Geneva. The USSR Ambassador PUSHKIN) pledges to the US Ambassador HARRIMAN) that it will keep North Vietnam from conducting operations in Laos. (This is, of course, violated as the Ho Chi-Minh-Trail network is constructed).

16 SEP – A violent typhoon strikes Khe Sanh.
Nov – Operation SWITCHBACK commences as paramilitary operations are removed from CIA control and assumed by MACV. (This includes the USSF "A" Camp at Khe Sanh, which had been prevented from conducting local patrols by the CIA, even from possessing a .50 caliber machinegun for its defense.)

NOV-DEC – The Khe Sanh airstrip is upgraded by laying PSP (Pierced Steel Plate) by an ARVN engineer unit.

05 SEP – An Air America C-46 was hit by ground fire and crashed near XD2548, approx 2 km. NW of Tchepone. Eugene DeBruin and 4 non-US crewmembers parachuted and were ultimately captured while 2 other crewmen were killed in the crash. As a result, Air America began resupply of BV-33 (CP at Ban Houei Sane, XD 625379) from Khe Sanh rather than from eastern Laos.

1964

24 JAN – MACV SOG established.

FEB – Monsieur WOLF, a French pharmacist from Dong Ha, is assassinated on Route 9 by VC following a visit with Monsieur LLINARES, one of the French planters at Khe Sanh.

03 MAR – Father PONCET of the Foreign Missions of Paris arrives at Khe Sanh to begin ministry as the local priest.(He is assassinated in Hue, 13 Feb 1968).

26 MAR – Capt FLOYD THOMPSON, CO of "A" Team at Khe Sanh, is shot down while on an aerial observation flight and becomes the longest-held POW of the Vietnam War. Capt Richard L. WHITESIDES, the pilot, becomes the first American KIA at Khe Sanh.

APR – SESU (Signal Engineering Survey Unit) organized. MAJ Alfred M. GRAY, Jr. (later Commandant of the Marine Corps) makes a preliminary recon of Tiger Tooth Mt. (Hill 1739, XD 832543, the highest point in northern I Corps) with a handful of Vietnamese. He runs out of food, overruns a NVA base camp en-route to friendly positions, and captures a large quantity of NVA documents. SESU's infantry element, 76 Marines from Co G/2/3, is the first Marine ground unit to conduct operations in Vietnam; this is at Khe Sanh.

20 APR – EUGENE POILANE, the French coffee planter and botanical explorer, is assassinated in a Communist ambush along Route 9.

MAY – VC rampage the MILLER's house in a local Bru village during their absence as tensions rise in the Khe Sanh area.

13 MAY – Advance party of ARVN occupy Tiger Tooth Mountain for SESU operation.

13 JUN – MAJ GRAY and his unit occupy Tiger Tooth Mountain for SESU operation.

24 JUN – Operation LEAPING LENA inserts 8-man reconnaissance teams (with 2 Americans per team) by parachute east of Tchepone. Only 5 men survive and return to friendly control.

16-19 JUL – SESU departs Tiger Tooth Mountain During 1964, a 4-star American General visits the POILANE plantation where he is informed that defoliant spray in nearby Laos has caused the POILANE's durion fruit tree to cease producing fruit. A claim for damages is filed at Quang Tri and the Americans pay damages, but the Vietnamese officials keep it for themselves.

USSF "A" team at Khe Sanh relocates from the Old French Fort position to the Khe Sanh airstrip and begins construction of concrete bunkers (which the Marines were later to assume were from the French days).

21 SEP – Presidential approval given for SOG for American USSF to lead reconnaissance teams behind enemy lines.

18 OCT – First SOG mission launched into Laos as part of Operation SHINING BRASS.

22 DEC – USSF at Khe Sanh makes significant contact with sizable unit of NVA and annihilates them.

MAR/APR – North Vietnam reorganizes the battlefield, creating B-4 Front (everything south of Route 9 to southern border of Thua Thien Province) and B-5 Front (everything in Quang Tri Province north of Route 9 to the DMZ). B-5 is also referred to as "Tri-Thien Military Region Route 9."

SEP-OCT – Various intelligence sources reflect large-size NVA units moving into the Khe Sanh area. Debate between Gen WESTMORELAND, COMUSMACV (who believes a sizeable invasion is imminent) and Gen L. W. WALT, CG, III MAF (who believes NVA have no interest at Khe Sanh) develops.

10 SEP – A Det of 65 Navy Seabees of NMCB-10 arrive on the Khe Sanh airstrip to upgrade it. They are augmented on 30 Sep by another 32 Seabees.

Dr. Walt ROSTOW notes that this is the decisive point that determined the result of the Vietnam War: had the US insisted that USSR honor the Laotian Accords of 1961 to prevent North Vietnamese troops to operate in Laos, the Vietnam War would have ended right there. GEN WESTMORELAND continues to plan for an operation to move westward and sever the Ho Chi Minh Trail network to be launched from Khe Sanh airstrip. (This eventually is executed as LAMSON 719 in Jan-Mar 1971, but is far too late).

15 MAY – John and Carolyn MILLER, the Wycliffe Bible Translators, move into concrete house in Khe Sanh village, refurbished by efforts of newly established FOB-3 and funds donated by Marines at KSCB.

21 MAY – Patrol by 3rd Platoon, A/1/26, makes contact at XD751449 resulting in 2 US KIA.

Publisher Note:
If any member wishes a complete copy of the Chronology put together by Ray Stubbe, email me at Teic1448@aol.com, and I will send it to you. Ray is still working on his latest endeavor, a history of the battle of Khe Sanh, from the North Vietnamese Army. I have read portions of the book and was amazed how efficient their Armed Forces were at Khe Sanh. In simple terms they really had their shit together, and were a worthy opponent, even though we kicked their ass.

MEMOIRS

Twenty Years Old

By Craig W. Tourte

On January 8th Joe Harrigan wrote a Post about what he was doing on January 21, 1968. Certainly I cannot forget where I was and what I was doing. Many of us have stated over and over again, throughout these many years where and what they were doing on that fateful day. I have to admit many years have passed where I had not thought about Khe Sanh and what occurred those many years ago. Like my friend Tom Horchler discussed, I too don't think I had much recall of those past events until recently.

So many years have passed and it seems like only yesterday. Young men all, long lives ahead, full of promise and hope. I was 20 years old, young in years but old in life, the result of to much battle in a very short time. I may have spent too much time, during these recent years, thinking about me and perhaps not enough, remembering them. My heart still sees a twenty year old, who had the thoughts that twenty year olds should have had.

I had guard duty and was walking north from the south trench line towards the base interior. I was approximately 100 meters or so north of the wire between what I think were a couple of supply tents, when I heard what sounded like a jet plane scream over the top of my head. At first I thought it was another F4 which had flown low across the base going west to east, like I had seen fighters do in the past (flying east to west). I stopped in my tracks and followed the sound as I looked up into the cold early morning sky, not able to identify the sound at first, but upon hearing the first explosion I immediately knew that the base was under attack. The rockets and other incoming continued and I yelled my alert of "incoming." I'm not really sure why I yelled that, certainly everyone knew it and they all rushed for the safety of the below ground trench line from the above ground tents we had so carefully erected.

The above ground sleeping tents, which we ignorantly called bunkers, had dirt filled 55 gallon drums and ammo box's around the sides, about 5 feet high. We immediately recognized the inadequacy of these structures upon hearing and seeing the impact of the first incoming rounds. The ammo dump had blown and we dodged hot, deadly shrapnel from our own ammunition along with those from the enemy guns the rest of the day and night. I was shocked when I smelled tear gas and had to run back into the venerable protection of the sleeping tent/bunker to retrieve my gas mask, never really thinking it would be necessary to wear a gas mask in a modern day war. Those are my remembrances of that date, when I was twenty years old.

My son came home from college during this winter break. He was filled with stories of school and the girls he had met and the friends he made. He told me it was the best time in his life. The morning he went back to school I went into his bedroom and sat down on his bed. I told him that I loved him and would miss him while he was gone, something my parents never did before I went off to war. Rubbing his back while I spoke to him, I thought back to when he was a child and to all of the things that he did as a small boy. I though of how now, he was a man and that he had his whole life ahead of him, a life filled with promise and hope. I am sure he was thinking all of the things that twenty year old men should be thinking. I was glad he would never have to think that the hole was not deep enough, pray that he ran fast enough, and that at anytime it could be him, or if it was not him, than who, because with so much incoming, it most certainly would be someone, knowing that for us, it was.

"WHAT A WAY TO FIGHT A WAR" INTERESTING NEWS FROM THE WAR IN IRAQ & AFGANASTAN

By Robert Hall

NELLIS AIR FORCE BASE -- Six days a week, Shannon Rogers kisses his wife and two young kids goodbye and wheels his battered 1989 Chevy Cavalier out of the driveway of his suburban Nevada home. The houses here are cookie cutter, done in beige stucco. Like most of the other dads and some moms in this traditional middle-class community, Rogers heads down Interstate 215, toward his job near Las Vegas, using the 30 minute drive to make the mental transition from family man to workplace professional. But Rogers will end up in a place far different from that of his fellow commuters: when he arrives at work, he will be at war in Iraq.

Rogers, an Air Force major and experienced fighter pilot, is part of an elite group of U.S. troops playing a crucial role in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan from the U.S.'s most notorious playground. From Nellis Air Force Base, outside Las Vegas, Rogers controls a Predator, a flimsy drone that has been transformed from a spy plane into one of the wars' most lethal weapons. Predators played a key part in catching Saddam Hussein and have killed al-Qaeda suspects in Pakistan and Yemen. In September a Predator tracked 11insurgents who had attacked a U.S. base in Iraq, then killed them as they fled.

What makes the Predator mission--and Rogers' job--so unusual is the7,000 miles between pilot and plane. Basing the crew members at home rather than at the front keeps them out of harm's way and saves the military money. Still, "for us, it's combat," says Rogers, 34, who has been deployed to battle zones twice, most recently Iraq this summer. "Physically, we may be in Vegas, but mentally, we're flying over Iraq. It feels real."

Certainly the decisions they face are life and death, as TIME observed when it was recently granted exclusive access to operations of the Air Force's 15th Reconnaissance Squadron, which commands 25 Predators from Nellis. It was 10:30p.m. in Nevada, 9:30 a.m. in Iraq, and after two hours of watching insurgents fire a pickup-truck- mounted .50-cal. machine gun at U.S. troops in western Iraq, Rogers and the sensor operator with whom he works were given the command to shoot the truck. Both developed a case of what Rogers calls the "trembles"--the nervousness of wanting to kill the enemy but injure no one else, combined with the enormity of taking human lives. Just as Rogers pushed the button to let fly one of the Predator's Hellfire missiles, a car appeared and started to drive toward the pickup. His partner's job is to keep the missile locked on target or, if necessary, divert it to a place where it would cause as little damage as possible. "What do we do, sir?" the partner asked in a shaky voice. "Stay on the target and hope he drives fast," said Rogers coolly. The car passed, and the truck exploded violently when the Hellfire struck. Rogers let out a whoop and exchanged high fives with his partner. The Predator is an unlikely star. In military terms, it is an unmanned aerial vehicle, or UAV. It was first flown a decade ago and for years was armed with only an unsophisticated camera for intelligence gathering.

After the fall of 2000, when Osama bin Laden was spotted in Afghanistan by an unarmed Predator, the U.S. government sped up a program to fit each aircraft with two Hellfire missiles. Awesome sounding but benign looking, the 27ft. long Predator is painted a dull gray and shaped like an upside-down spoon with wings. The drone is made of lightweight composite plastic and metal, and has a tiny, propeller-driven engine--adapted from a snowmobile's--with a decidedly unimpressive top speed of only 150 m.p.h. Rogers' previous craft, the supersonic F-15 jet fighter, can fly up to 900 m.p.h.

The Predators commanded by the 15th Reconnaissance Squadron are launched and landed by troops at the front, but while they are in the air, up to 24 hours straight every day, they are controlled by Air Force crews sitting in six grounded cockpits at Nellis. Each cockpit consists of two large armchairs set in front of banks of computer screens with keyboards, control joysticks and live video images. Video is relayed from a camera mounted on the bottom of the Predator not only to Nellis, but also to troops on the ground, commanders in the region, and the Pentagon. The crew consists of a pilot who flies the plane and launches missiles, and a sensor operator who controls the camera and the laser targeting device for the two Hellfires.

The crew members communicate with troops and commanders in the war zone through secure instant-messaging systems, as well as radio transmissions routed through a mission controller, who sits in a command center at Nellis and issues orders to the crew. The conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan have proved the worth of unmanned aircraft--which are cheaper and, because there is no pilot to be shot down, politically more palatable than traditional airplanes. The thousand-plus UAVs in the military's arsenal range from tiny craft that can fit in a soldier's palm to ones the size of business jets. Military analysts are predicting that within two decades, UAVs may even take over the jobs of pilots flying fighter jets. It makes economic sense; the $4 million Predator is a bargain compared with the Air Force's newest fighter, the $354 million F-22. The effectiveness of the Predator in war zones, however, has translated into stresses in an unlikely place: back home. The operational tempo puts intense pressure on the small group of men and women who deliver death from a distance. The 180-person Nellis unit runs 24 hours a day, seven days a week, with no holidays. The unit has logged more flight hours than any other squadron in the Air Force yet is only 65% staffed. Crew members are so tightly scheduled that when on duty, they have to ask permission to go to the bathroom and cannot leave their chairs unless there is someone to replace them. The troops call the Predator compound Shawshank because it reminds them of a prison. The schedule demands that the men and women change shifts--days, evenings and overnights--every three weeks, which makes fitting into normal civilian life off base nearly impossible. Morale, say many crew members, is suffering. Crew members are experiencing more problems in their personal lives, including separation and divorce.

One may expect that being home would be a plus for the troops, but actually it's often a complication. Soldiers in the field have to cope with danger, but at least they live in one world, whereas their counterparts at Nellis commute daily from war to civilian life. "How many people can say they went to work today and killed or captured a few terrorists?" says Lt. Colonel John Harris, commander of the 15th. "Our people are proud they contribute to the war from home. But being at home brings some additional stresses.

We're very close to a crisis. Rogers says he feels pulled in two directions, between spending more time helping with the war effort, and also being an integral part of his family. He rushes home after his day shift to jump in the pool with his kids. "At least I get to sleep in my own bed," says Rogers. But he says being deployed in Iraq was easier because he was isolated from the daily errands and the emotional demands of family life. His wife Laura feels differently about his being home. "It takes the edge off being a pilot's wife," she says, "at least I know I won't be getting that phone call in the middle of the night telling me my husband has been shot down or is missing in action."

The Department of Defense POW/Missing Personnel Office (DPMO) announced that the remains of four U.S. servicemen, missing in action since the Vietnam War, have been identified. They will be returned to their families for burial with full military honors. They are: Major Jack L. Barker of Waycross, Ga.; Capt.John F. Dugan of Roselle, N.J.; Sgt. William E. Dillender of Naples, Fla.; and Pfc. John J. Chubb of Gardena, Calif. All were from the Army's 101st Airborne Division. Chubb was buried in Inglewood, Calif., on Feb. 18. Barker, Dugan, and Dillender will be buried on April 12, in Arlington National Cemetery near Washington. D.C.

On March 20, 1971, Barker and Dugan were piloting a UH-1H Huey helicopter with Dillender and Chubb on board. The aircraft was participating in a troop extraction mission in the Savannakhet Province of Laos. As the helicopter approached the landing zone, it was hit by heavy enemy ground fire. It exploded in the air and there were no survivors. Continued enemy activity in the area prevented any recovery attempts.

MINI REUNION LUNCHEON HELD, TO REMEMBER 21 JANUARY 1968, THE START OF THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH

January 21, 2006 CHICO, CALIFORNIA
By Craig W. Tourte

There are times in our life in which events occur that changes our whole being. January 21, 1968, was such a life altering experience. It's difficult to explain certain events to those who have not experienced the same deprivation and hardship. What that event does however, is to bring those involved closer together.

The start of the Siege of the United States Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh on January 21, 1968, was certainly one of those experiences. As we recall the Siege and honor the many who did not return, we not only met those who were present, but find that there were many more who were impacted by that event. We hear from those who fought on or near the base before the Siege, from those who contributed to our survival, and from those who subsequently served in that area of operation both in the air and on the ground. Their experiences were often just as difficult as those of us who were present during those long 77 days.

We Khe Sanh Veterans, in fact, most being Vietnam Veterans I believe, find a certain amount of solace being with those whom we had served in Vietnam with. When together we are able to share experiences and feelings that we are often unable to share with family and friends. On January 21, 2006, a group of 50 or so Vietnam Veterans got together for a luncheon in Chico California to honor those who served and died at the Khe Sanh Base between 1961 and 1971. In a way, it was a gathering to honor all Veterans who served in that conflict.

Veterans and supporters showed up at the Eagles Hall in Chico, thanks to Tom Horchler (the unofficial Mayor of Chico California), a Marine who I had met at Khe Sanh. At the end of the Siege, Tom drove us (with great skill) out of Khe Sanh, away from that which had not been blown up, shot up, bombed, rocketed, mortared, or otherwise destroyed in 77 days, Quang Tri, from Khe Sanh with far fewer of us than had arrived.

Chuck Chamberlin (C/1/26) (Blackbud Charlie), described his experience at the luncheon as, "...the whole thing took on a life of its' own. I hesitate to use the term, networking," but I met more neat guys and their gals, and renewed so many old acquaintances. It was absolutely incredible to have been in the company of guys like Steve Wiese (Ghost Patrol), Mike Archer, author of "A Patch of Ground ,"and my old friend Tony Cueva.

The get-together "Chingadero"..(E.Spencer's word) we had yesterday, at the Eagles Hall in Chico, CA was outstanding. Craig Tourte and Tom Horchler put this thing together, to commemorate that morning 38 years ago, when we all found ourselves actually up against it. Anyhow, we all had a great time. There were about 50 paid ($10.00 lunch) and another 35-50 (who's counting?) that came through."

"The reporter for the local paper was down at the Sierra Nevada Brewery, wondering where the hell all the Marines were suppose to be. There's always that 10% that don't get the word. At the last minute, Tom and Craig changed it to the Eagles Hall due to the great number of folks that wanted to attend. The whole thing took on a life of it' s own." "...I believe a good time was had by all. Once again, I'm proud to have friends and associates of this caliber. I'll remember yesterday for the rest of my life. This was a shakedown cruise..." "We're going to do it again next year to get the wrinkles out, and on our 40th we're going to get a band and have a real West Coast reunion/party!"" We're thinking maybe Reno???"

Steve Wiese (B/1/26) remembers the luncheon as, "...it was a great day, I'm glad that it did come together, I hope it becomes a yearly thing, it's a great reason for all to get together and remember the ones that were not able to come back."

Mike Archer (26th Hq Co) notes, "An outstanding event! Many thanks to Tom Horchler for putting this all together. It was great, finally getting to meet Tom, Craig, Chuck, Steve, the Cueva brothers and all the rest of you guys I had heard about, or from, over the years. I brought an old high school buddy along, who lives in Chico, was in the USMC Reserves, but did not serve in Vietnam. Later that day, he kept talking about how incredible it was to watch all we Khe Sanh Vets interacting like family. He spoke of what an honor it was to be able to spend time among such men-and I told him I felt exactly the same way."

Chuck Teasley (C/1/26) reflected, "...I have spent today reading, "A Patch of Ground" and reflecting. I have read many messages (on the Khe Sanh Message Board) asking why now, some 38 years later, we find the need to travel back. As I look at the photographs with all of the "Old Veterans" who shared a common ground, I think I understand. Being around some of the bravest of the brave and knowing, like my own back yard, each spot they were at is like going back to the old neighborhood. It's safe to talk and laugh about things no one else would understand. No one needs to explain anything, as everyone already knows. It is the same feelings as laughing with the kids you grew up with about things you did as a kid. Things you would never want your parents to know, not because they were so bad, but you don't want to hurt them. Sharing our past with "Outsiders" just does not work. I just want to thank you for making this happen and inviting me to join."

Khe Sanh Veterans know there is a place in the world during the month of January, where it's foggy and cold with towering mountains looking down onto a small, isolated plateau, hallowed by many and surrounded by deep green jungle, where the many souls were of those who did not return. While in other places, it's relatively warm, the sun is out and shinning from a rich blue sky onto the faces of aging men who remember that time so long ago when they were young, and are grateful now, that they no longer have to suffer through the deprivation and hardship they once experienced. Aging men and comrades who remember those who did not return, and on this most appropriate day, honor their memory.

TWO HUMOROUS STORIES TO END THE MINI-REUNION WITH

By Craig W. Tourte

Debt Owed-Debt Paid and Recognized For Heroic Deeds

For those of you who have followed my worthless little stories, here are two more.

I was never a hero in Vietnam; my claim to that most noted Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh is that I showed up. I was never engaged nor was I involved in any singular acts of heroism. I have mentioned many times in my little stories that Tom Horchler drove the truck I rode shotgun when we left Khe Sanh for Quang Tri. Tom tells the story that during the long, dangerous and dusty convoy, I was sitting in a rocking chair perched on top of the load. We all know that there were no such conveniences at Khe Sanh; perhaps his memory is just different than mine. The ride to Quang Tri was not without incident. While descending a narrow road and traveling down an incline, the truck rose up on all three axles on the right side and nearly went over. Tom was able to right the truck and we continued on to Quang Tri. If the truck had gone over it would have been certain death for me. I always joked that Tom saved my life (of course he would have caused my demise if the truck flipped over).

That debt was repaid many times over January 23, 2006, on the golf course. It was one of those beautify days in Chico California. We had a great lunch and got on the course a little after noon. All was well when Tom came to play golf as usual, although I was somewhat shocked to hear the amount of profanity he was using to coax along the ball due to his age related deteriorating skills. We were in separate golf carts as Tom had the much-preferred companionship of his dog Lucy with him. As he descended a small but steep hill his cart locked up and he slid sideways into some rocks, the cart turning over on top of him pinning him to the ground.

Through much effort and individual heroics, I was able to stop my cart just before colliding with his. Casting my fears aside I sprung into action, leaping off of my golf cart and running up to him and yelling, "Hah, are you alright? It just seemed like the thing to say at the time. Tom yells, "Get this thing off me," Without fear for my own safety and completely disregarding any danger that might be present, I lifted the cart off Tom and laid him flat on the ground. While he was laying on the cold ground in great pain I asked him how he was doing. Not receiving a reply and making the instant observation that he was suffering, I thought of just getting a golf club and putting him out of his misery, but collected my thoughts, and grabbed his cell phone which of course did not work. He took hold of my arm and said, "Craig, maybe you could find a Corpsman for me, my legs don't seem to be working." I again sprung into action jumping into my golf cart, never considering the hazards that faced me, and drove alone and unarmed back to the clubhouse at a blinding speed of 2.4 MPH where I called an ambulance.

I returned to the scene and comforted him as best I could by saying, "Does this mean our golf game is over for the day?" He paid for it (I got lunch) and I wanted to make sure he understood his obligation was not yet over. Anyway, everything turned out all right, he was released from the hospital later that evening with some minor scrapes and burses and a few stitches (kind of a nasty to-the-bone cut on his leg). Later that evening he asked me if I would mind rubbing his feet, but I figured I had done enough.

I will never receive any official recognition for my unselfish heroic action but my debt to Tom Horchler for saving my life those many years ago while leaving Khe Sanh is finally paid. Oh, and his dog Lucy was just fine.

Recognized for Heroic Deeds

I wish I could have been a hero. I could sit at the bar and tell all the other liars what a hero I had been. How I had bravely faced the enemy while overcoming my own fears and rushed forward into what I knew were the arms of certain death, but because of my own skill and cunning (and luck) 1 survived to fight again. When the call went up for a volunteer, I wish I could say I was the first to raise my hand. But I didn't do any of those things, and God bless those who in reality did, they truly are the deserving ones and the real heroes.

But in my own little world I became a hero (to myself) when I braved the dangers of the golf course and it's cart path to help my friend and former Marine Tom Horchler, and yes I'll say it, perhaps I even saved his life. Because of my little story, others have recognized me as someone special and deserving. I am proud to announce that 1 am now a legitimate holder of a medal. Our own John Pessoni has bestowed on me that most prestigious medal, the 'BRASS STAR" in recognition of my selfless acts and heroic deeds. John also awarded Tom the medal of the "PURPLE FLOWER" for wounds received, which I hate to say is one of those "I was there medals" not quite as prestigious as the BRASS STAR.

So at the reunion in Mobile in June when I'm sitting at the bar and you over hear me say something like". . . and I was awarded a medal for bravery." You know that I was awarded the BRASS STAR for my heroic deeds and actions on the golf course, not for any action at Khe Sanh. Gee, I hope I don't confuse the two events when I'm telling you about the medal I was awarded.

WEB BRIEFS

Remembering 21 January 1968

By Don Meyer

Today is another anniversary of the beginning of the siege of Khe Sanh thirty-eight years ago. I have been thinking that I did not arrive at Khe Sanh until the 22ND, when 1/9 was sent to reinforce the base, so I had missed the initial attack.

As I think about the siege, I cannot help but think of all of the people who have been affected by their time there. It does not matter if you were there during the siege, the Hill Fights or in combat there before or after these battles, Khe Sanh is a part of your life. If you are like me, and many of you are, you have thought of Khe Sanh for decades, and it stands clear in your mind even today. How many other things, if any, can you say the same about? We all lost something there, and we all gained something there. I lost my youth, my innocence, and that spark that made me laugh and enjoy life. I gained sorrow, regrets, guilt, and a hole in my heart that just won't heal. Khe Sanh was a place that changed each of us forever. No matter what or when your battle was, it changed you. We remember it and honor it each day, and will until the day we die. Some have said that they have been able to leave Khe Sanh behind, but I don't believe that. If it is behind, why do we think of it? Maybe some have learned to cope, and I hope they have, but no one has forgotten.

For those who do not believe in PTSD, let them enter our heads for one day, and see how it plagues our souls, and keeps us awake at night. I wish I could be young again, and be able even for one day, regain the innocence, and the joy of life I left behind. I wish I could see my buddies who died, one more time, and laugh as we once did. But I can't so I count anniversaries.

Don,

I think you really put the right words and feelings into your post. When you stated why Khe Sanh has remained a part of many of our lives, whether we were there during the Siege, Hill Fights, or any of the other combat actions, and operations around Khe Sanh. I was not there during the Siege, just during the Hill Fights. After leaving Khe Sanh in Mid-May/67, Echo 2/9, went to Dong Ha. Dong Ha, which became the 9th Marine's Headquarters. Leatherneck Square, and the Southern DMZ was included in our TAOR.

Throughout most of 67, the 9th and other supporting units 3rd, 4th, 26th, and 1st marines saw some of the bloodiest and hardest fighting of the war. Speaking for me only, over the years my thoughts tended to go back to Khe Sanh, just like you mentioned. After reading your post, and pondering the thought, I believe I now know why. Years after the war ended, many people did not want to know about Vietnam, or how we veterans felt about having served there. Most just wanted to sweep it under the rug. If some did inquire about the war, it was often, " How come we lost?", " Did you really kill babies,?" " Did the Military give you guys drugs before you went into the field"? I withdrew, feeling loss, guilt, and betrayal. For some years, the history of the hard fought battles we fought, and the sacrifices we made, were left from history, and mostly forgotten.

When some of the early movies were made about the war, most were pure Hollywood BS. One place that was remembered due to the Siege, and writings from the ones who were there, a place where most of the truth had been preserved, and was then being written about, telling of the sacrifices, courage, pain, and loss, at Khe Sanh. The Siege, brought to light many other battles, and places that had been forgotten. Especially through books such as "Valley of Decision" which not only focused on Khe Sanh, but all of Northern I Corps, including all services. Other books are, The Hill Fights, Con Thien, etc. I believe I am drawn back to Khe Sanh, not to take credit as a siege vet, but to listen to, and share with a fellowship of Marines, who carry a very special courage, no matter where, or when they served, or where they fought. Khe Sanh is a symbol that will always remind others of what Marines and other military branches who stood shoulder to shoulder, in the darkest of days, 38 years ago, did for our country.

Well said Joe,
Unfortunately, now that history is being told, far too many are perverting the accurate historical record we seek to write. Too many with an agenda, too many wishing to profit for the sacrifices of all those who served. We need to stand ever vigilant and correct the mistakes when they are put forth.

Don,
I remember the day 1/9 arrived. A CH-46 landed in our area at the east end of the base. I will never forget it! It felt like help had arrived so don't worry. I think about Khe Sanh almost every day. Even more, since I have found this site. I never have applied for PTSD benefits but probably have it. I just take it one day at a time. I am more fortunate than others who experienced so much more danger.

Stay in touch with your friends, and brothers, like you do today. I don't know you personally, but I am your friend and brother and always will be until the day I die! I am off work now and will check in Monday.

On this anniversary, I attended the funeral of a friend and fellow Vietnam Veteran. Kind of ironic I guess. After all, it is a day of mourning.

SAM,

I am not a poet, but I've always admired your way with words. Yes, so much was lost and nothing gained from that fight. Still and all, we survived to remember those guys who gave their all...we will never forget. Don't torment yourself anymore. It's easy for me to say, yet I too pace the floor at 2 in the morning, like you. I wish we could bring some of our friends back, but we can't. However, I spent yesterday with some real heroes here in Northern CA, thanks to Tom and Craig. We need to focus on the good human survivor stories that the best of us represent. I never did a single valorous act at Khe Sanh or on the hills, but I believe, having read your poetry, that there is a case to be made for just getting thru that meat grinder and retaining our humanity. It #### near drove me nuts for awhile, but I'll be 60 yrs. old next year and comes a time, you got to' lay down that sword and put away the anger. The Sicilians say revenge is a dish best served cold, and another saying is "the best revenge is living well". Live well my friend, and thanks again for your well written thoughts.

"THANKS JOE"
By Gene Weresow

This past Saturday Jan 21, the anniversary of the siege, the NJ Vietnam Veterans Memorial and Vietnam Education Center, hosted a Khe Sanh remembered in prose and poetry. The event was well attended. I would guess near 100. Poetry was read from the Khe Sanh book of poetry. Much credit must go to Joe Belardo who acted as moderator, and put this thing together.

The day was a great experience for me. I was glad to meet some of these heroes of Khe Sanh. I was humbled by the wonderful people who spoke, and feel honored to have been a part of this tribute to those who fought at Khe Sanh. I think I got more out of this than the audience. The memory of our fallen Brothers lives on here in NJ. God bless them all. Thanks Joe, for asking me to be a part of this.

"KHE SANH REMEMBERED"
NEW JERSEY VIETNAM ERA EDUCATIONAL CENTER
By Nick Romanetz

Thirty-eight years to the day, New Jersey area Khe Sanh Veterans were part of a program entitled "Remembering the Battle of Khe Sanh – In Prose and Poetry." Hosted by the New Jersey Veterans' Memorial Foundation (www.njvvmf.org), the program was held at the beautiful Vietnam Era Educational Center located on the Garden State Parkway in Holmdel, NJ (on the grounds of the old Garden State Arts Center). Joe Belardo, a KSV (Army Dusters/Twin 40's), past board member of the VV Memorial Ed Center and resident of South Plainfield, NJ, arranged the program with the assistance of Sibley Smith, Director of Education at the Center. "The center hosts between 6-10,0000 school aged children each year to attend special programs or just tour the Center and explore the many pictures and artifacts on display." The Center also has an outdoor wall where the names of all of New Jersey's Vietnam era KIA's are engraved in granite, similar to The Wall in DC.

The Khe Sanh event on January 21st was a great success. Nine KSV were panelists for the event and another 10-12 KSV were in the audience, nearly all of us members of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. The event was a mini-reunion! The audience totaled just over 100 persons, many of them Vietnam Veterans from all branches of our armed forces. Sons, daughters, wives and grandchildren of veterans were also present. Although the event was published in local newspapers, several persons that just "stopped by" to visit the Center were treated to the Khe Sanh Experience through the panelists. All of us were honored to have Todd and Grant Fox present, Charlie sons, making the trip in from Pennsylvania.

The format for the event began with an introduction by Sibley Smith and the singing of The National Anthem by Jersey City Fire Captain Daniel Delaney. Moderator Joe Belardo provided insightful opening remarks about the purpose of the event, the significance of The Battle of Khe Sanh and introduced the panelists. Prior to each panelist speaking, Joe read passages or an entire poem from the recently published Khe Sanh Veterans Book of Poetry. To help the audience have a better understanding of Khe Sanh, the event program provided a map of KSCB and units located at the base as well as an area map identifying all of the hill outposts and their proximity to the base.

Gene Weresow (M/3/26 & B/1/26) of Edison, NJ spoke about the now famous "Home is Where You Dig It" sign and explained that the sign meant exactly what it said! He recounted how 11 of 12 men in a patrol he went on off of on Hill 861 were all killed or wounded, he being the lucky one. The weather, c-rats, preparing positions on the base were all recounted and the WIA of the round eye, female, reporter were subjects he touched upon. This being Gene's first time at public speaking at an event like this, he was initially nervous, as were several panelists, but once he got on a roll, his 15 minutes of speaking time was gone and he did just fine!

John Pessoni (A Co 3rd Combat Engineers) of Toms River, NJ simply explained to the audience that the main thing he did was "blow stuff up." His experiences in laying minefields, creating "fugas" obstacles and blowing up trees and having them fall the wrong way were some of the lighter moments of the afternoon. Being shot at while on missions, dodging incoming and realizing that when 1/9 showed up, "they brought their own NVA with them" were a part of John's sharing. His final recollection was about the female, reporter who took shrapnel in the buttocks and his lost opportunity to administer first aid since he was in the immediate area of the blast that wounded the reporter.

George Einhorn (A/1/9) of Metuchen, NJ remembered being on patrol (elsewhere in I Corps) when his unit received a radio message to report immediately back to base. Soon thereafter, his company was loaded on choppers and dropped off at Khe Sanh. His platoon eventually manned an outpost on Hill 64 near the rock quarry. He recounts how a numerically superior NVA force assaulted and partially over ran the hill on February 8, 1968. Only 13 Marines, George included, of about 64 walked off of that hill after the battle. Most of the platoon was killed or wounded. In April '68 on Hill 471, George told of being wounded by shrapnel from a 122 mm rocket, being med-evaced and the chopper out of Khe Sanh being hit by ground fire, and having to return to the base. He says he was wounded again on the aircraft. Eventually being evacuated to Japan and then the Philadelphia Naval Hospital, where he was medically separated from the Marine Corps.

Dennis Whalen (B/1/9) of Toms River, NJ said he would rather face a platoon of NVA than engage in public speaking. However, like Gene, once he got into his presentation, he sailed through with flying colors! Dennis, like George, recounted his company's sudden warning order and immediately choppering into Khe Sanh. He recounts how beautiful it was (Jan. 22, 1968) with the jungle showing "26 shades of green." As he soon recounted, the beauty of Khe Sahn turned into a daily struggle with life and death. As a radio operator, Dennis recalls watching the battle on Hill 64 from the rock quarry. He said it was like a movie with the NVA taking a part of the hill, counterattacks pushing them back slightly and then the NVA regaining the ground they had just lost. The close in battle between Marines and NVA was described by Dennis as "kids being close to each other and having a snow ball fight, only they were throwing grenades at each other." Dennis described the helplessness of watching the battle, unable to help. He recalls an ARVN prop driven aircraft dropping its ordnance on the hill, which seemed to break the back of the NVA as they disengaged from battle. Other recollections included living like an animal and developing a keen sense for incoming. "One you heard the round leaving the tube, you knew what caliber it was."

Neil Kenny (L/3/26) of Staten Island, NY told the audience that by the time he was 19, he had experienced the war, lost his grandfather who was an anchor in his life, and found himself discharged and on the streets at home as a high school drop out. Neil claims that at the induction center, he was found to be 4F but had his medical records changed because "I wanted to go." He recounts that as a young Marine, he sometimes had "a problem" with authority and the chain of command. Seems Neil had the notion that if a PFC was to fill sandbags for a bunker, anyone using that bunker, including SNCO's or NCO's should also fill them, and he let them know that. Neil had the audiences in stitches with his humorous accounts of life at Khe Sanh, but he also presented one of the most poignant moments of the afternoon when he told of the death of his friend Phil Sheridan while attacking 881N on 14 April 1968, and holding a dying Marine in his arms. Neil recounted that there were too many Phil Sheridans in Vietnam, and it was obvious that his comments and presentation had a deep impact on the audience.

Bruce Geiger (Army Dusters/Twin Fortys) made the trip to New Jersey from New Rochelle, NY. He brought many of his large, framed color pictures and set up a display entitled "The Road to Khe Sanh." Bruce spoke of his days as an ROTC student at Rutgers University, his MOS training and the belief that he would spend his Army career in Germany. Calling himself "the Forrest Gump of dusters," he told of his time at Con Tien and eventually winding up at Khe Sanh. One of his most vivid memories was the night of March 22, 1968 when the C/1/26 CP was hit by a 152 arty round. He recalls a night of heavy incoming, the base being on alert for a possible ground attack, and the fact that his lines were being hit hard by incoming. Responding to the call for help at the CP, he tried to get the wounded Marines out of the bunker and assisted Chuck Chamberlin who was in the old company CP about a month earlier, when it was hit by a rocket. The new company CP had collapsed and was on fire. A short distance down the lines near his gun positions and bunker, another C/1/26 bunker took a direct hit from a 122 rocket, killing two Marines and wounding a third. Bruce personally knew three of the KIA's in the CP bunker, and that night remains a vivid part of his Khe Sanh experience. The only panelist to speak well over the allotted 15 minutes, Joe Belardo was nice enough to let Bruce finish telling his story, ultimately leading to Joe replacing Bruce at Khe Sanh.

Joe Belardo was the final panelist to speak. He recounted his experiences in dismantling the base and running a convoy out of Khe Sanh after the base was "closed." He told of being left at the base with about 12-15 men after the 6,000 Marines were long gone, with no "lines," bunkers, or prepared fighting positions. Joe completed his presentation with the reading of an original poem he wrote about Khe Sanh.

Remember that throughout the afternoon, Joe read an original poem about Khe Sanh prior to introducing each panelist. Joe is to be commended for the effort he put forth in organizing this event. John Pessoni had boxes of the KSV Poem Books as well as Ray Stubbe's "Battalion of Kings" available for purchase. I believe that John sold nearly all of the poem books and a good number of Ray's book. I did note that Big John assumed the posture of a rock star or sports celebrity at the end of the presentation in that in addition to selling the books, he was also busy autographing them and posing for photos!

Other KSV that were present were Bill Griffith, Bruce Lewey, Bob Galiano, Mike Urban, and Sid Patricio. Sid is to get credit as the "official" KSV photo-historian. He took several pictures and posted them on the KSV web site, and as I write this, I am told that one or some of his pictures will accompany this article. I must also apologize in that there were a few more KSV at the event, but I do not have their names.

As I read on our two KSV web sites, several remembrances were held around the country to commemorate the 38th anniversary of the beginning of "The Siege." The New Jersey presentation was top shelf. Once again, thanks to all of the participants and a special thanks to Joe Belardo for planning and executing a most successful event!

January 21, 2006, marked the 38th anniversary of the enemy attack that started the Battle of Khe Sanh, the battle that launched the war's pivotal Tet Offensive of 1968. To remember and honor the American military effort in that action, a panel of Vietnam veterans of the Khe Sanh Battle discussed their personal recollections and reflections. The words of other participants were shared through readings of their poems, recently published in The Khe Sanh Veterans Book of Poetry. The panel was moderated by Joseph Belardo of South Plainfield, NJ, a contributor to the poetry book and recipient of the Purple Heart Medal and the Bronze Star Medal with "V" device for valor, for his service during the Battle of Khe Sanh. Panelists included Khe Sanh veterans George Einhorn of Metuchen, NJ, Bruce Geiger of New Rochelle, NY, Gary Parker of Barneget, NJ, John Pessoni of Toms River, NJ, Nick Romanetz of Annandale, NJ, and Dennis Whalen of Toms River, NJ.

The Vietnam Era Educational Center is located adjacent to the New Jersey Vietnam Veterans' Memorial off the Garden State Parkway at exit 116. The Memorial and Educational Center is maintained through a partnership between New Jersey Vietnam Veterans' Memorial Foundation, and the New Jersey Department of Military and Veterans Affairs. The Educational Center is open Tuesday through Saturday, 10 AM – 4 PM. Regular admission is free for veterans and active-duty military personnel. Regular adult admission is $4.00; student and senior citizen admission is $2.00; and children under 10 are admitted free.

It's been 38 years since the Battle of Khe Sanh began, but for the men who risked their lives there, on a remote military base near Vietnam's border with Laos, it could have happened yesterday. "It just stays with you," said John Pessoni of Toms River, a Marine who fought in the 77-day attack, which began Jan. 21, 1968, during what Americans believed to be a cease-fire amid the Vietnam War. "Every day I think of that place," he said. "For a lot of us, it was like yesterday," said Eugene Weresow, another Marine.

On Saturday, the Vietnam Era Education Center in Holmdel marked the anniversary of the battle with a prose and poetry program. "To tell you about Khe Sanh is very difficult," said moderator Joseph Belardo, who served from 1967 to 1968 in Vietnam."You can't understand what it's like to be truly frightened, to take another life, to see your friends die, to pick up the pieces. Before you stands a group of noble men, caught between today and yesterday," he said of the men who gathered Saturday in the center's Testimony Theater. Educational lectures and programs are held monthly at the center, which opened in 1998 on the grounds of the PNC Bank Arts Center and draws between 6,000 and 10,000 student visitors each year.

We do not promote war, but we tell you what it's like," Belardo said. Approximately 1,000 American soldiers were killed in the Battle of Khe Sanh. Nearly 5,000 were wounded. Weresow was the lone survivor of a mortar attack on his 12-man squad. " I walked out of that one alive, as the only survivor--guess God was watching over me," said Weresow, of Edison. The men spoke of the hard times they experienced, spending the night in a hole filled with rainwater because it was warmer than stepping out into the cold night air, experiencing napalm so hot "you could feel the heat coming up your back," showering in the rain and washing laundry in a barrel of boiling water. "It's just what you had to do," Pessoni said. "You had to take care of you. If you didn't, you didn't make it home."

They also shared stories that then, and today, still make them laugh: drinking warm Kool-Aid, cherishing a rare can of peaches and pretending a mess hall's mashed potatoes tasted like those made at home. "It may not sound like much, but mashed potatoes (were) like something from home," Weresow said. "Like something mom used to make." According to some of the men, sharing these stories helps preserve the memories of those who were left behind. I personally find it very rewarding," said Nicholas Romanetz of Annandale, Hunterdon County, a second lieutenant with the Marines, about being a part of the program. "It's very moving," said Jean Varga of Freehold, who was visiting the memorial with a friend. "I looked at this whole journey in Vietnam as an adventure," said Neil Kenny, a Marine from Staten Island who said he grew up playing war games. One night at Khe Sanh, after curling up in a hole as rocket fire passed overhead, Kenny, then 18 years old, said he realized the truth: "I realized that this was not a game. This was not the game I'd played as a kid. This was the real deal."

Prior to attending the program on 21 Jan 2006, some Khe Sanh members, toured the facility, and were interviewed by Bonnie Delaney, a reporter from the Asbury park press. The following are those remembrances.

When Dennis Whalen flew into Khe Sanh on Jan. 21, 1968, on a helicopter, he recalled that from the air, Khe Sanh appeared to be "the most beautiful place on earth." "It was a former coffee plantation, and from the air it was 28 shades of green," he said. "Later, I found out it was the most vicious place on earth."

"The first thing we saw when we got out of the chopper was a pile of bloody boots. I knew that it was bad and it was only going to get worse," said Whalen, who left Khe Sanh just three months later but served two tours of duty in Vietnam, which totaled 19 months. "Khe Sanh was a place I thought I'd never get out of." The Dover Township resident will be one of nine Vietnam veterans who will share their recollections of their time in Khe Sanh during a poetry reading and oral history discussion at 1 p.m. Saturday at the Vietnam Era Educational Center in Holmdel.

Saturday marks the 38th anniversary of the enemy attack that started the 77 day Battle of Khe Sanh, which launched the war's 1968 Tet Offensive battle for Khe Sanh, Route 9, and the other bases in that area, said Joseph Belardo of South Plainfield, who will moderate the program. Belardo served in the Army, and his unit was deployed to Vietnam as the 3rd Marine Division's combat mobile fighting team, under Marine control. He operated a "duster," which was a self-propelled tank with automatic weapons.

Belardo, who was wounded numerous times and received the Bronze Star with Valor and Purple Hearts and other medals, and his crew of Duster C131 were the last to leave the Khe Sanh combat base 10 days after it closed on July 5, 1968. He said he and his crew dismantled the entire base "sandbag by sandbag."

Whalen was a radio operator with Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, and was also wounded while at Khe Sanh. He said he was struck by shrapnel from a 60 millimeter mortar round. Just about everybody who was there got hit," he added. John Pessoni, a Dover Township resident who served with Alpha Company, 3rd Combat Engineers, said he considers himself to be lucky. I never got hit, and I was there during the full siege at Khe Sanh," said Pessoni, who did the nightly "listening" post detail outside the base perimeter.

He also did demolition work and helped install land mines around the base perimeter while he was at Khe Sanh. "I blew stuff up. I'd go out with the grunts (infantry) and do demolition with them," Pessoni said. As Pessoni walked around the Vietnam Era Educational Center for the first time on Jan. 11, he, Whalen, and Belardo looked at maps and photographs and tried to pinpoint their locations for one another.

"Holy mackerel, just looking at all this stuff gives me the shivers,' said Pessoni. "We were all 18-19 years old when we were there. My sergeant, who was 23 or 24, was like our father," recalled Whalen. Sibley J. Smith Jr., director of education at the center, said that when high school students tour the center they are told that Vietnam was "the teenage war."

Belardo said the goal of the program on Saturday "isn't to rewrite history but to give a historical timeline of the Battle of Khe Sanh with recollections from the people who were there." "It was the most famous battle in Vietnam, and it was one of the most bombed bases. It was a jump-off point for Special Forces, and it was the place Marines were stationed to stop the infiltration of enemy forces down the Ho Chi Minh Trail," he said. Pessoni and Whalen said Khe Sanh was also known for its huge rats, and panelist Bruce Geiger, who served as an Army lieutenant with Alpha Battery, 1st Battalion, 44th Artillery the Dusters, described the rats as being "extremely cunning" and "as big as large rabbits" in a story he wrote about his experiences. Geiger's and Belardo's stories have been published in The Vietnam Magazine, and Belardo's recollections have been published in the book "The Soldier's Story - Vietnam in their Own Words," and "The Khe Sanh Book of Poetry." Both have also appeared in television documentaries about the Vietnam War, and Belardo is a past board member of the New Jersey Vietnam Veteran Memorial and Education Center. He was an original member of Victims of Agent Orange, the predecessor of the first Agent Orange Commission.

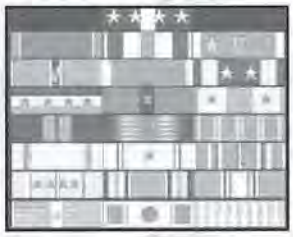
By Tom Eichler E Co 2/26

During the siege of Khe Sanh I served with E Company 2/26 on Hill 861A. I was a corporal, serving as the acting weapons platoon sergeant. As best as I can recall, there were very few if any cameras . Some how I acquired this very small slide action Minolta camera (the kind you saw in those old spy movies). I did not know much about operating it, and one day just went around the whole hill, clicking away. I still had the camera with me when I left Vietnam in 1968. I attempted to have the film developed, and learned it was not film, but very tiny slides, less than a quarter of an inch square. I finally had them developed in 1969, but no one could make them larger, without complete distortion. They sat on a shelf in my home slowly deteriorating. In 2003, Earle Breeding and I traveled to Charlestown SD, to attend an opening of a series of paintings by Terry Redlin, the worlds most popular painter of Americana. We also presented the Redlin family with a DOC Medal for Charles Langenfeld the brother of Terry's wife, who was killed at Khe Sanh while serving as a corpsman with E Co 2/26.

We also met Terry's son Charles Redlin, who as his father, is a very strong supporter of the KSV, and has completed an extensive study of our time at Khe Sanh, during the siege. Charles, utilizing very sophisticated equipment, and many painstaking hours of his own valuable time, restored 99% of those slides. Although they are not pristine, they are viewable. Chuck has preserved a part of History for everyone to see.

A SPECIAL OBIT AND FAREWELL
VIRGINA MONTAGUE EVANS PULLER
"CHESTY'S GIRL"

A MESSAGE TO "CHESTY, WHERE EVER YOU ARE," HAVE THE TROOPS ON ALERT AT THE GATES, YOUR LOVELY VIRGINIA, IS COMING ABOARD.



BY ELLEN ROBERTSON

Virginia Montague Evans of Saluda was 16 and Lewis Burwell "Chesty" Puller was 27 when they met at a cotillion in nearby West Point. Puller, who would become the most-decorated Marine in the Corps' history, was smitten, said their daughter, Virginia Dabney of Lexington." My father said that winning her hand was his hardest battle," Dabney said. For years, he'd go on Marine Corps assignments and return to Saluda to ask Virginia to marry him. She finally said "yes" when she was 29 and he was 40 and a Marine captain. They married in a military wedding on Nov. 13, 1937, at Christ Church, the Episcopal Church in Christ, the church where generations of her family had worshipped.

Mrs. Puller, who was widowed in 1971, has died at her home in Saluda. She was 97. One of three children born to a lawyer's family, she grew up at Evanslea, a big house in Saluda that had 52 windows, said her daughter Martha Downs of Alexandria. She graduated in the early 1920s from St. Mary's School in Raleigh, N.C. "She was everything he ever wanted. They were everything each other ever wanted," Dabney said. "They were absolutely devoted to each other. He sent her roses all the time and they wrote love letters. "Puller "did the Marine Corps. He thought it was the greatest thing and the best way to take care of us," Downs said. "Mother did everything else." "She bought cars and houses and life insurance, and she did it beautifully. But she didn't want anyone to know she was doing those kinds of things. She wasn't sure it was ladylike. She wanted people to think Father was doing all that.

"She was a genteel Southern lady, but an iron lady," Downs said. "If you didn't have manners when you were coming in the house, you did when you left." Mrs. Puller accompanied her husband on a tour of duty in China in 1940. She and her infant daughter, Virginia, left on the last American dependents' ship before the Japanese took Shanghai in 1941during World War II. She also followed him to Hawaii and across the U.S. mainland but returned to Saluda during his combat tours in World War II and the Korean War. When he retired in 1955 as a lieutenant general, the couple settled in Saluda. "She really loved the Marines," Dabney said. "She fed hundreds of them. She knew how much it meant to him. He would bring Marines home off the street if he met them at a gas station." She found Marine husbands for her daughters.

At Christmas, she would be "graciously serving a Southern lunch to sergeants at this end of the table and generals at that end," Downs said. "When my father would get tired, she would say, 'The general needs a nap.' " Mrs. Puller loved history, historical restoration projects, and going to old homes and plantations. She was a member of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities. A son, Lewis B. Puller Jr., died in 1994. In addition to her daughters, survivors include seven grandchildren and eight great-grandchildren.

ANOTHER MEMORY

"Chesty" Puller's Funeral Detail!

I received the below e-mail from an 8th & I Marine, Dennis Bosco, 1970-1973, Long Beach, CA. It contains a fascinating account of his participation in Lt. Gen. Lewis B. "Chesty" Puller's funeral detail.

John T. Reim
"Semper Fi"

Dear John,

When Chesty died I was the Section Leader of the Body Bearers. Chesty was lying in rest at the local Saluda, VA funeral parlor. A Gunny from the HQMC was told to take a Dress Blues button for Chesty's uniform and take me to the burial site. I went to the funeral parlor and the man there did not know how to attach the button. So he opened the casket up and the Gunny put the button on his blouse. He was buried in his Dress Blues with a chest full of medals. I remembered that in Boot Camp we said "Good night to Chesty Puller wherever you are!" The gunny and I bowed our heads and said goodbye to Chesty.

We reported back to the Puller residence that we had accomplished our mission. There was more brass in the house than in the Drum & Bugle Corps. His two daughters and son were there too. The gunny and I were the only two enlisted Marines. I never felt more self conscious in my life. Mrs. Puller saw me and zeroed in on me. Asked how I was doing and said her general always loved sergeants. She told me to take my blouse off (wearing my greens) and sit down in the general's chair and prepared me a huge plate of food and told me to eat. Noticing my embarrassment, she said you just relax sergeant and let me take care of you. After dinner she took me on a tour of their home. I was so nervous I could barely breathe. She was very warm and generous and ignored most of the people there while attending to me. She asked if I wanted a copy of the General's book and I said no Ma'am I have one already. Their son was there in his wheel chair. We made small talk and he was very upbeat and spoke to me for awhile. Finally, the Gunny said we had to leave. After I put my blouse on I thanked Mrs. Puller for her hospitality and tried to stammer out my condolences, and sensing my embarrassment she just came up and gave me a hug. She thanked me for stopping by and said to come visit her anytime.

A few days later we carried Chesty to his final resting place. A week later I received a handwritten letter addressed to me from Mrs. Puller thanking me for the beautiful ceremony. I wish I could take all the credit. I still have it and it is the most cherished memorabilia of my career. A great woman with a huge warm heart.
Semper Fi,
Dennis Bosco

MY ANTIDOTE FOR TET AND THE JANUARY 21, 1968 EXPERIENCE

One evening with Delta Company, Khe Sanh; Belize sailing Expedition

By Doc Cahill

John Rowland, Delta Co 1/26 President, had a novel solution to the depression, intrusive thoughts, and generally bad effects from the memory every year of the anniversary of the Beginning of the siege of Khe Sanh. John arranged for the charter of two, 42' catamarans for a week long sail from island to island along the Belize coast with 7 of his combat Marines/ Corpsman buddies. The expedition began on Jan 21, from San Pedro, Belize, with the Muddy Joe, skippered by Fleet Commander John Rowland, with his lady Rachel, first mate Charles Gallagher, and his lady, Melanie. The remaining crew included: Al Knight, Delta friend, Freddy (HOSS) McEwan, and my Bride, Joyce. All three ladies are members of the Delta Chicks, excellent gourmet cooks, and valuable crew members. The Quo Vadis was skippered by former Delta Company C/O, Ernie Spencer and his lady, Linda, also a member of the Delta chicks. With crew members: Mike Powers, Tom Slaby and his lady Jan, Andy Corr a friend of Delta Co., and Battalion Commander of 1/26, Colonel Fred McEwan.

Being the Fleets' Corpsman, Retired RN and Lifetime Member of the PTSD Health Club, I may have a different or skewed perspective of things. So bare with me! Most of the aforementioned Vets have varying degrees of PTSD, and physical scars, acquired in Vietnam; limiting some social skills; heavy lifting, coherent speech, and graceful moves.

Each catamaran had different rules. The rules for the Muddy Joe were: Have Fun, Have More Fun, and Make sure you have fun! I won't speak of the rules on the Quo Vadis, but let's say the behavior on the Muddy Joe was less military. No set restrictions on shore leave, dress code, or consumption. No taps and the only reveille occurred when captain John decided to start the Muddy Joe's engines or generators in preparation to set sail.

John was excellent instructing what needed to be done in preparation to set sail, to tack, to anchor, and other needs to have an exciting, and safe sailing experience. Amazingly, the rookie crew learned the tactics, and we quickly found ourselves manning our stations without discussion; team work, just like in Nam…..very impressive to John and me.

We found this teamwork very effective dealing with several engine and electric power problems, encountered during our week long cruise. Freddie was a hulk and was the real force in raising the heavy anchors. I assisted Freddie and Gallagher positioned the chain properly as we dragged each anchor in. Raising and lowering of the sails became routine as the three of us took our stations, performing the tasks efficiently. The expertise of our captain in maneuvering the boat around with one engine, made our duties easier. Got to give it to captain John, he had the experience, and we never felt uncomfortable as a crew. Now, where's Big Al, during the crews' tasks… some of you may wonder…oh yeah, he's friggin trollin' off the aft of the Muddy Joe. Ain't caught nothing but a couple damn poisonous blowfish and pressure sores on his ass, in 4 days….. A real fisherman, my sweet sailin' ass!!!! But, his "What me worry" attitude fits in quite well with this crew. If you know him, you must admit, he is a lovable sort!

The Muddy Joe crippled along with the starboard engine useless, leaving the craft with no electrical power, thus no refrigeration, nor power to raise and lower the two anchors. We were also left with no communication. Our crew persevered, even enjoyed the additional challenge…what a Team! We were sailing north through an area, called Bluefield Range. There were several various sized islands, most uninhabited.

It was late afternoon, and we needed to start looking for a place to anchor, as we saw a storm approaching off in the distance. Skipper John decided to have the Cats anchor in a cove protected by two islands from the oncoming storm. One island, Bluefield Caye, had several small weathered buildings, all painted blue/green with a maze of docks, and piers connecting the buildings, and access to this part of the island, was built over the water.

The remainder of the island was well wooded. John explained it was probably an old fishing camp. It looked deserted, so we decided to send a recon team to check it out, after securing the anchors. Our crew chefs (Delta Chicks) informed us, we only had some sausage and ground meat left, which needed to be cooked, since we lacked refrigeration. We thought we'd check it out and perhaps cook our food at the deserted fishing camp and maybe catch some fish… that is where Big Al comes in…yeah ,right!

We lowered the 6' rubber dingy, equipped with a 15 hp outboard to prepare for a beach assault on the island. The dingy, well used with more patches than my favorite childhood jeans, required inflation with the furnished hand pump, on a daily basis. No problem, we had only a few hundred yards to the nearest pier. John, Freddy, and I climbed into the pitiful looking dingy. John takes one pull on the rope and the Evinrude was cranked. There was no movement on the island as we motored to the nearest pier. Freddy jumped up on the dock and secured the dingy, as John and I made our way onto the pier. We stood there a minute looking over the area. "Hello, hello", we yelled…no response. We walk along the pier, I follow Freddy as John takes an adjoining pier to another area. Walking slowly, we watched our step due to missing boards and warped planks, making it a somewhat treacherous walk. Also, the sun was lowering in the sky, as some overcast became evident as the storm moved towards our location.

Stumbling along we yell again "hello, hello, again nothing. Suddenly, Freddy grabs me by the arm and points; "There is someone laying on a cot in that building...there's half a bottle of rum next to him." Freddy and I move closer in unison, just outside the open shack door, we yell a loud hello! A thin, dark, wrinkled, old looking man lept to his feet with a smile, dressed in shorts, tee shirt and ball cap. Looking somewhat startled as Freddy asks; "Do you have any fish or lobster for sale?" The startled man answers; "No, but I can always catch you some!" He extends his hand out and says; "I am Omar, the caretaker of the resort. We do not have much, I am keeping an eye on it while the owner is gone, I welcome you."

John joins up with us and asks Omar if we could cook our food here. Omar becomes very jubilant as he states; "You are Americans and you are welcome to use anything I have, let me show you to the kitchen and dining hall, what is mine is yours." He rhythmically gestures and sings his words. Omar is excited to have visitors...who knows how long he has been on this island alone. He said he would start the generator, while showing us to the dining facility. Amazingly, Omar had a full kitchen with cooking and eating utensils, plates, silverware, gas stove, even a pita pan heater. Beyond the wooden stick wall was a large 16'x20'dining area with multi style tables and chairs. The building was well constructed of vertically attached to small diameter wood posts. There were openings for windows and doors, equipped with wooden storm shutters. The interior was decorated with a 3'x5' flag hanging on each of the four walls; one American, one, British Union Jack, one Belize and one Omar identified from South Africa. It stayed very comfortable in the dining area, with the Caribbean breeze. We thought this is great, and Omar welcomed our suggestion to bring our food and drink ashore and prepare a feast for us all. He agreed to get the kitchen going as we walked to our dingy for the ride back to tell our sister ship and our crew of our findings.

Skimming across the smooth Caribbean bay between the islands in the dilapidated dingy was exhilarating to me. The beautiful blues, greens and turquoise colors of the sea, the sun lowering in the sky, promising a beautiful sunset on the water, and the picturesque islands were just awesome. I am grateful to be experiencing all this....what a paradise I am thinking.....Before I knew it we reached our sister ship and climbed aboard; with excitement in our voices, we tell our comrades of our findings and plans. We invite them to join us, on the island where we can discuss safety plans regarding the storm approaching while we eat and party. We then zip off towards our boat to pick up some crew and deliver drink and food to Omar's.

It requires two trips in the dingy to deliver the crew with a cooler of drinks from the craft to Omar's. We would need to return to the boat for our food supplies once Rachel, Melanie, and Joyce, meet Omar and check out the kitchen. Omar again shows such great delight and hospitality as he meets the rest of the crew. The kitchen will work, and plans are made, but it's time for social hour as the drinks are put on a table with mixers, and Omar's finest glassware, with the local and only Brewery name on it, Belikin, "the Beer of Belize"! Omar then explains he will be back; he had to get some bait to take Big Al fishing...THANK GOD! The crew wanders around the piers and docks checking out the buildings. I followed one pier to another row of blue/green buildings; two were outhouses, equipped with toilet seats and all....gettin' fancy in Paradise, I thought. I lifted the lid and 5 feet below is the clear waters of the Caribbean; Omar explained later, that the marine life biodegrades the feces with no harm to the ecology.....HHHMMMM, I hope to give it a try after supper and tell Big Al not to fish on this end of Paradise! Is this paradise or what, everything works in harmony....ah the tranquility of it all!!

Omar returns with "bait" for Big Al. "Hermit crabs", says Omar. "We catch little fish, and then with little fish, we catch big fish." As he chats with Big Al, the rest of us set up chairs on the pier as the sun begins to set on the Caribbean. Wow what a sight.....seems spiritual in nature, the beauty of it all. I realize how fortunate I am to be here. I hear the crew from our sister craft will not be joining us for supper and are heading to their boat. I was too consumed with the beauty of the setting, before long our crew gathered to watch the sunset. Omar comes to inform us the storm is heading away and will not affect us. Cool…now back to the sunset! You have to see it to appreciate it, not just the indescribable view, but the actual feeling of it all is inexplicable. Amazing!!! Almost total darkness shortly after sunset, but Omar even has lighting provided by a kerosene generator….. As we retreat to the dining hall.

Big Al, Freddy, Rachel and I, climb into the dingy to go to the boat to get the food. Now some had been drinking and were feeling little pain. I'm not sure who was running the outboard, Freddy or Big Al, as they argued on how to start it. Finally under way, Rachel and I are opposite each other towards the front of the dingy holding flashlights in attempt to avoid some low areas where the motor would hit coral or sand. We get halfway to our catamaran, when the motor dies, and there is a smell of gasoline. Al and Freddy attempt to crank it with no luck. Meanwhile we are being carried out by the tide. The gasoline line was discovered lying on the deck and would not stay attached to the motor. Freddy and Al are screaming at each other, Rachel is laughing so hard, I'm afraid she's about to fall out of the under inflated dingy, that now won't start……total darkness, except for the flashlights from Omar's and the lights of our sister boat getting smaller and smaller as we continue to drift out to sea.

Freddy then says; "I'm here to make sure Rachel is safe….(I guess John gave him instructions), But we don't have to worry, we have Doc!" I am then thinking as we float away, yeah, this guy is twice my size not mention Big Al, not named Big for the hell of it. Rachel continues to laugh as Al and Freddy are getting gas all over each other and the dingy trying to repair it. The flashlights are getting dimmer, and I notice a large image ahead of us…oh Shit, it's that red schooner anchored earlier as we entered the cove. We hear John yelling from shore; "PADDLE….PADDLE!" Yeah right, do you think we have paddles or oars, I am thinking….Not a chance! Rachel and I start paddling with our hands. Finally, the engine cranks, I turn my flashlight towards the engine as we accelerate, and see gas spraying out of the junction of the motor and fuel line….but we keep moving….the motor slows, then dies again. Al is attempting to keep the fuel line in while Freddy operates the motor. After several attempts and sputtering of the motor we make it to our boat. By then we are hysterical with laughter, and yelling at each other. As I am helping to "drag" Big Al from dingy to boat he falls onto the steps laughing so hard he is crying. "I peed my pants," Half crying and laughing; "But I have a medical problem!"….."OK, Al, we don't need anymore info about your incontinent issues"; I shout out compassionately! Rachel can hardly walk she is so broken up with laughter.

We finally gather ourselves, and get what we need and prepare to get on the dingy when Big Al yells at Freddy to put his cigarette out because of the gas in the dingy. Freddy complies and flicks the butt! Rachel and I look with alarm as the lit cigarette catches the wind and is blown towards the gasoline laden dingy. I envisioned a ball of flames as I'm sure Rachel did. It just misses and falls harmlessly to the water. WHEW!! We make it back to Omar's with the dingy only dying once, thank goodness!!

The table is set with Omar's dishes and eating utensils. Once again the ladies of the Muddy Joe cook up a delicious meal of egg, sausage and potato burritos with a sautéed mixture of vegetables, using Omar's kitchen. We gather to eat, Omar at the head of the table and the crew were seated opposite each other. Omar says a short Blessing, after which we dig in!! Conversations were going in 2-3 directions as the food is passed around and plates are loaded, while the good food, drink, and friendship are saluted. Everyone is enjoying themselves and each other. Suddenly, the attention focuses in Omar's direction, who is apparently feeling the effects of "good" booze! I was unable to catch the beginning of the conversation Omar was having with Big Al, but I heard Omar make some kind of disparaging remark regarding President Bush.

Big Al, looking pretty well wasted, seemed to be motivating Omar with more political jabs. Omar continues spewing his world political views; his voice became angry and loud. Capt. John, now standing and shaking his finger towards Omar. The crew is scrambling to gather our things as others shout their feelings to Omar. We leave the building with our things, needing a few trips to the docked dingy, leaving Omar with the dirty dishes…sure am glad we were finished eating before Omar became radical terrorist on us.

Freddy and I are carrying things to the dingy, we suddenly hear, "HELP…..HELP", and water splashing. We walk down the pier and see this object wallowing in the water, "HELP ME"...It was Big AL... he had fallen off the dock! Freddy yells, "STAND UP!" Al stumbles around and gets to a staggered stance in the knee deep water, as we reach down and pull him up, laughing like hell. He is a bit unstable; we guide him to a chair in front of the dingy against one of the bunkhouses, to await the dingy ride.

It takes two trips to get the crew to the boat, John has learned to run the motor and hold the fuel line in. The ladies and supplies are taken first with Gallagher using the flashlight to see. Big Al is still in the chair, insisting he is sleeping on the island. Freddy and I tell him that is ridiculous, but Al is too wasted to make a reasonable decision. John and Gal arrive back for us. I say; "Come on Al," knowing he will need help. He is still mumbling about staying on the island...I walk over and get nose to nose with him, I state in a clear, slow, deliberate manner; "Al, if you stay, you will awaken with Omar violating you as you are tied to the bed in there," pointing in the bunkhouse!

Al decided to try to get up; we help him into the dingy and finally head towards the boat. We make it, with no problem, but now to get Big Al out safely. Gallagher ties the dingy up, Freddy is behind Al assisting him. I am leaning on the portside safety cable as I reach and grasp Al's hand. He stumbles aboard the step of the cat...falls against me, he goes down and I, the only friggin Squid on the expedition, go overboard!! Freddy swears I came out of the water faster than I went in! We finally all get aboard. We get Al to bed, I hit the shower, and coffee is brewed. The remaining crew sits together on the deck sipping coffee, already reminiscing about the events just over the last 4-5 hours. We couldn't believe the evening remembrances for a lifetime!

As I think back, I wouldn't change a thing. The whole Omar experience was enlightening in so many ways to me. I feel grateful again to have shared this experience with my comrades and our brave lovely ladies. The therapeutic effect of this trip has been amazing to me, and oh the thrill and honor of being Corpsman of Marines again. Such a pleasure, too sweet for me to express fully! I stated earlier, I am a PTSD survivor.

Upon return I had an appointment with my trustworthy shrink. He has admitted the VA is a major stressor in my life and agreed more time in Belize would do me good. I told him he could help me by giving me 6 months worth of medications and he won't see me anymore...."I'm moving to Belize." ....Shocked, he stated, "I'll give you the meds, but what about your lab work, and other health problems?" I said, "No sweat Doc, they will resolve themselves as I resolve my stress by going back to Belize." He nodded and said, "You are probably right!" Therefore, if you read this in the Red Clay, I should be living in Belize. Thank you Brother John Rowland for your very therapeutic trip...I recommend it to all who suffer with PTSD, or anyone who wants to seek a better way of life...for me at least....From Caye Caulker, Belize, Central America....this is

A PROUD MOMENT

By Steven Wiese B Co 1/26

I have a story that I'm so proud of, and want to pass it on before it's too late.

We Viet Nam guys are getting older. I'm sure we all have stories to tell. Please believe me, in telling this story I am not trying to make myself out as someone who was a lot braver than the next guy, "I wasn't". I just feel the story needs to be told, to show the character, and bravery of the men at Khe Sahn.

I was a squad leader with Bravo Company, 1/26. I had been with B Company since arriving in Nam over a year earlier (I extended my tour six months). I had been in Khe Sahn since the company came off of Hill 881. I'm sure everyone is aware of the history of Khe Sahn receiving the rockets and mortars every night, where my story begins.

It was sometime between the middle of February and the 25th of February 1968. The nightly rocket and mortar attacks had been getting worse. Like most of the Marines in Khe Sanh, it was taking its toll. One afternoon the Lieutenant came down and informed me that intelligence reported enemy activity around Khe Sanh had intensified, and an attack on the base was not if, but when. We were to hold our position for as long as possible. If we were to get probed, and the opportunity to capture an NVA, were available, we were to do so, and not kill him. Headquarters wanted a live prisoner, and it was the highest priority.

I was convinced the enemy was tunneling under our perimeter. I had taken a steel rod about four feet long, that I had "borrowed" from somewhere. I had driven it in the ground in the corner of my bunker. I left three or four inches sticking out of the ground. I would take an empty can, place it on top of the rod, and listen. It was crude but it did work. When it was very quiet once in a while I would hear a faint tick, or click, I assumed this was when their pick or shovel would hit a rock, and I sent word up to the skipper that I thought I heard tunneling. They sent down a couple guys with listening devices, headphones and the whole works. They hung around for two or three hours, said they didn't hear anything, and left. I didn't care, I was sure I heard digging. I was thinking about it one afternoon while my men were on various work parties, filling sand bags, reinforcing bunkers, and the usual daily activities. Suddenly a brilliant idea came to me, at least I thought it was brilliant. They wanted a live prisoner, I thought that shouldn't be so tough, we knew they were out there, so I thought I would take a couple men, sneak out in the middle of the night, an capture an NVA. To me, it seemed a snap.

Well that's how it started, how could I make this work. The best way it seemed would be like a recon team, moving slowly and quietly, with maybe just two men. I couldn't order them to go, after all this wasn't an authorized mission; I wanted Lance Corporal Wayne Moore, and Lance Corporal Author Smith (not Arthur). I knew no matter what happened, I could depend on them. I considered them the best the Marine Corps had, (and on March 30th, they proved it) but I couldn't order them to go. I couldn't even ask them if they would go. I decided the best way was to gather my men, tell them my plan, and ask for volunteers.

Once the whole squad met in front of my bunker, I informed them of my plan. I told them I was sick and tired of sitting around doing nothing, getting rocketed and mortared and just sitting waiting to die. I said I only needed two men, to sneak out from in front of our squad area. We would take no gear of any kind, no flak jackets, no helmets, only a bayonet and pistol. Our goal was not to kill, but to capture, and get back.

I again explained this was not an authorized mission, but I was acting on my own. Everyone was to keep this hush-hush, no one was to know about it. I also told them that this could be a very dangerous mission, and I wasn't really expecting anyone to volunteer. I told them not to make any decisions now, but to think about it, let me know later, if they chose to go.

Here's where the pride part comes in, L/Cpl. Moore was the first man to come to me, I'll never forget it. He did not volunteer, he informed me that he was definitely going, he didn't care who volunteered. I thanked him, stating "I was hoping you would come". The second man was L/Cpl. Author Smith. Smitty said, "you can count on me". I knew I could.

Something happened that day that I had not expected. Throughout the day, every last man in my squad came to me and volunteered. One man told me he was afraid, but, if I didn't get two volunteer's, he would go, because he didn't want to let me down. I never would have taken this individual with me on such a mission, but my respect for him rose a notch that day.

Then something truly remarkable happened. A man from a another squad come to me. He said he heard I was going out, and wanted to volunteer. His name was Corporal Claire. He was one of the members of the ghost patrol, later KIA 2/25/68. I was surprised, and wanted know how he heard about it. He informed me that the rumor was going around. I told him the story was bull shit. He replied, "still, if you are going out, I want to go". I had three more men volunteer from other squad's that day. I had said I wanted this to be kept hush-hush, but still, the story spread. I was told to report the Captain Pipes, immediately.

When I reported to the skipper, I did not think I was quite prepared for what occurred. The skipper commenced to chew my ass. He told me he had heard I was taking a suicide mission outside the wire, and in no uncertain terms that I would NOT go out. If I did, I would be busted in rank to Private, and spend the rest of my days on work details. And if I still pursued my idea, and someone was to get killed, he would make sure I was court-martialed, and put in the brig for the rest of my life. Then, as only a commanding officer can do he said, "do you understand me Marine"? I snapped back as if I was still in boot camp YES SIR. On the way out the door the skipper said "Corporal, you make me proud to be a Marine". Somehow he had turned that ass chewing around, as only a great leader can, and I came back to the bunker feeling proud.

Needless to say, we never went out of the wire that night, or any other night. I hope I've portrayed some of the pride, to have served with these men, these warriors. In remembrance of L/Cpl. Author Smith and L/Cpl. Wayne Moore, who were KIA 3/30/1968.

Heart of a Veteran

Does anyone truly see
Into the Heart of a Veteran?
Secrets and memories only
Each other can grasp and know.
'Nam was cruel, and the rain fell
Onto their skin as they stood,
Young, and scared in that hell.
The ones who came home,
Came home to sneers, and to Friends they no longer knew…
Life went on, but differently.
Some married and had families,
Some never spoke of the things
They had seen, things they had done.

There is a new generation now,
Of the young and the brave,
I am the wife of one of those men.
Letting go, saying goodbye,
Waiting for letters from Iraq every day.
Our baby is due very soon,
A little girl who will change the world.
Will he be home to see her arrive?
We wonder and we pray.

But I have not been alone, you see,
These marines who fought in 'Nam-
They have lifted me above my fears,
Helped me see I will be okay,
And that this baby girl is the prize
At the end of a dark tunnel for one marine.

In the mornings I open my front door,
To see another day begin.
There waiting are baby clothes, gifts,
And cards that contain the prayers and
The well wishes that these veterans have extended to our baby girl.

So, I ask....Does anyone truly see
Into the heart of a Veteran?
I think I have seen a peak.
Love and compassion live
Amidst the memories of war,
Amidst the aftermath of tragedy.

Although it may feel like the world

Has forgotten and left you behind,
This family has not and never will.
You are a true and living example of Unconditional love and support.
And I will always thank God
For making a place for me
In the Heart of a Veteran.

THE FEW THE PROUD, THE FINEST

The Visit

by Craig W. Tourte

I realize that all of our members are not Marines, but for those of you who are, I thought you would enjoy this email a friend sent to me.

My dad, Angelo, was in the hospital in Tacoma, Washington. A former Marine, and veteran of the Korean War, he was having his third knee replacement surgery. A long and very painful operation was going to be made even worse because dad was going through it alone. There was no one to hold his hand, no familiar soft voices to reassure him. His wife was ill and unable to accompany him or even visit during his weeklong stay. My sisters and brother lived in California and I lived even farther away, in Indiana. There wasn't even anyone to drive him to the hospital, so he had arrived that morning by cab. The thought of my dad lying there alone was more than I could stand. But what could I do from here?

I picked up the phone and called information for the Puyallup, Washington Marine Corps recruiting station, where I joined the Marines ten years before. I thought that if I could talk to a Marine and explain the situation; maybe one of them would visit my dad. I called the number. A man answered the phone and in a very confident voice said, "United States Marines, Sergeant Vanes, may I help you"? Feeling just as certain, I replied, "Sergeant Vanes, you may find this request a little strange, but this is why I am calling." I proceeded to tell him who I was and that my father was also a former Marine, and 100 percent disabled from the Korean War. I explained that he was in the hospital, alone, without anyone to visit and asked if Sergeant Vanes would please go and see him.

Without hesitation, he answered, "Absolutely." I asked, "If I send flowers to the recruiting station, would you deliver them to my dad when you go to the hospital?" "Ma'am, I will be happy to take the flowers to your dad. I'll give you my address, you send them, and I will make sure that he receives them," The next morning, I sent the flowers to Sergeant Vane's office, just as we had planned. I went to work, and that evening, I returned home and phoned my dad to inquire about his surprise visitor. If you have ever talked with a small child after that child has just seen Santa Claus, you will understand the glee I heard in my dad's voice.

"I was just waking up when I thought I saw two Marines in their dress blue uniforms standing at the foot of my bed," he told me excitedly. "I thought I had died and gone to Heaven. But they were really there!" I began to laugh, partly at his excitement, but also because he didn't even mention his operation. He felt so honored: Two Marines he had never met took time out to visit an old Marine like him. He told me again and again how sharp they looked and how all the nurses thought he was so important. "But how did you ever get them to do that?" he asked me. "It was easy. We are all Marines, Dad, past and present; it's the bond."

After hanging up with my dad, I called Sergeant Vanes to thank him for visiting my dad. And to thank him for the extra things he did to make it special: wearing his dress blue uniform, bringing another Marine along. He even took a digital camera with him. He had pictures taken of the two Marines with my dad right beside his bed. That evening, he e-mailed them to me so I could see for myself that my dad was not alone and that he was going to be okay. As for the flowers, they hardly mattered, but I was glad for the opportunity to express my feelings. The card read: "Daddy, I didn't want just anyone bringing you flowers...so I sent the World's Finest. Semper Fi."

Publisher Note: I am going to make sure Sergeant Vanes receives copies of this issue of Red Clay, with his story. I will also send copies to Headquarters, USMC, so they know of the wonderful things our Marines are doing.

KHE SANH VETERANS VISIT WOUNDED VETERANS FROM IRAQ

Visit to Camp Lejeune
By Ronald Shouse

Cliff Treese and I went to Camp Lejeune, to visit the young warriors who were wounded in Iraq. Who better to talk to them than a couple of old war Heroes from the 60's. I drove down on the tenth of January from Winston Salem, North Carolina. Cliff drove up from Melbourne, Florida. Upon arrival, I checked in at the Hospitality House and decided to recon the area.

The PX is still in the same place, but now the area around it that used to be a PT Field, is a now scheduled to be a shopping center. The building once used as Force Troops Headquarters, is located in the same place, but is now a barracks. The area where Women Marines were formerly located has also moved. Base and Division Headquarters are still as we left them, and are now designated FSSG.

While I was conducting my recon, Cliff was cruising around the countryside trying to find Camp Lejeune. When he finally arrived, we got something to eat at one of the many fast food restaurants located on the base. After supper we sat on the balcony of the hospitality house and listened to the sound of mortars and artillery fire coming from the impact range located near Courthouse Bay. With the helicopters flying around, it was like being back in Vietnam. We both should have had an attack of PTSD, but strangely it seemed relaxing, or maybe we both just felt safe. We both had the best sleep we have had in years.

On Wednesday, we located the area that we came to visit. It is located at Hospital Point, and is called "Wounded Warrior Unit". Lt Colonel Maxwell who was wounded in Iraq, started this program. It has been designated "Maxwell Hall" in his honor. Even though the veterans we met were 40 years our junior, they received us as if we were one of them.

While these young Marines were eating lunch, Cliff and I put down the convertible top on his vette, and after lunch at Burger King, drove around the base, since it was an unusually warm day, for the month of January. Cliff wanted to visit the base barber to get a military haircut, in case he wore his dress blues during our visit. He did not get a "high and tight", but it was regulation. We also got in a little shopping at the PX.

We returned to Maxwell House, met with Lt. Col Maxwell, and visited with the wounded Marines. We brought the video of the battle of Khe Sanh, produced by the History Channel. After viewing the video, they had a million questions. Cliff and I answered them as best we could. We also told a few humorous stories in regards to what they could expect when they reached our age. We informed them of our organization and its goals, and the most important thing, keeping in touch with each other. If they did, they would discover that they would still look out for each other as we, in our organization do.

We personally spoke with a couple of men that were concerned about their future, since their wounds had ended their military careers. Cliff informed them he had felt the same after suffering his disabling injury, but had persevered, and had led a wonderful productive life. Actually talking to veterans that had been through the same circumstances seemed to have a very positive effect on these young men.

While Cliff was talking to the men, I wandered out and talked to some officers in the foyer of the barracks. I first thought they were advance party for a Congressman that was scheduled to visit. They were in fact there, to inform these wounded Marines of their future benefits from the VA. A female Captain looked me straight in the eye, and said she would make sure that they understood everything they were entitled to, before they left. I do not recall receiving any such information concerning future benefits when I got out, but I could be wrong.

Congressman Jones, representing the Eastern North Carolina District, finally arrived. The Marines did not seem to put much faith in what they thought he had to say. I sort of recall we felt the same way when a politician visited us. Of course, as we did, they sat and politely listened, on their best behavior. Congressman Jones surprised me. He seemed like he was genuinely concerned with the situation these men were in. After he spoke, he took a handful of his personal cards and put them on the table. "If you guys need anything at all he said". Although we had never met him, he seemed sincere, not someone campaigning for votes. After he departed, Cliff and I continued our visit. We presented the Marines with gifts from the Khe Sanh Veterans, and handed out challenge coins from our organization. Cliff and I invited Captain Williams, and his wife to dinner. We decided to meet at the Lone Star Steak house in Jacksonville.

When we left the barracks, Cliff got lost and we almost missed dinner with Captain Williams and his lovely wife. They were just arriving when we finally found the restaurant. Jacksonville has changed a lot in the 30 years since we left. Highway 24 from the main gate still has the pawn shops, but the bars have been replaced with night clubs. There are several shopping malls and restaurants are everywhere. It doesn't look like a military town anymore.

When we went back on base, Cliff and I contacted a young man we had previously met at Dieruff High School in Allentown, Pa. Jeshua Alston told us that he was going to join the Corps and asked us if we would like to come to Parris Island when he graduated. It was almost two years ago that this kid got his first stripe. Now he is a Corporal, soon to be Sergeant, and will be going back to Iraq within the next 2 months for his second tour as a 0311, which seemed to be the primary MOS of all the men we spoke with.

When it was time to leave, I told Cliff that I was going to drive around and reminisce. I ended up at Base Headquarters, and spoke to the Sergeant Major. He was very pleasant, but looked so young. I asked him why all the Marines in the Corps today, looked so young and skinny. He told me it was something they put in the water. I bought a bottle before I left but it hasn't helped me yet. If it works I will get a water buffalo filled to bring to you guys. Cliff called me later to tell me that he went to Clothing Sales to see about a set of the new camouflage utilities, and to the PX for some more goodies.

We returned to Maxwell House and showed the wounded warriors the banner that we all signed at our reunion. We asked if the group would like to have one for all of them to sign. They thought it would be a great idea. Cliff and I will go back to MCB Camp Lejeune for that presentation along with some copies of "Battalion of Kings" for the General and Sergeant Major, sometime in the near future.

Cliff got a late start from Camp Lejeune, so he stopped by Parris Island to spend the night. He got a room on base, and next morning went to see General Tryon, the CG of MCRD, Colonel Valentine, base Chief of Staff and Major White, Base Public Affairs officer. He presented them with a copy of the RED CLAY which included the story we did on returning to Boot Camp. They really liked it, and without these three men opening all the right doors for us, we never would have been able to do it. They made sure we got everything we wanted, and treated us like we were some kind of dignitaries.

Cliff also made a stop at the Parris Island Museum to see Gunnery Sergeant Charles Taliano, the Rose Garden DI. Sergeant Taliano was on his way to Bethesda Naval Hospital to visit the kid wounded in Iraq that had received the note saying "wish you would die". Cliff caught up with him by phone and said he would see him in March when he speaks to a Platoon of Graduates from the 2nd Battalion.

I am sure that I speak for Cliff when I say, we were so proud to be in a room with these men. What the younger generation showed us can not be described in words. You have to stand there to feel the pride and the courage of these young men. In them we saw a lot of you guys, some forty years ago, that no matter what was going on or how bad it was, you had to get back where you belonged to do your job. It was another successful trip by your Roving Ambassadors and we hope you guys can make it someday.

Publisher Notes

I want to thank the members who responded to my request for dues payment. However over 120 members who paid last year did not respond, and are still in arrears. The next Red Clay (Issue 65) will be out the 1st of June. Our printing Company gave us a special deal on issue 64 and if those who failed to pay their dues, do respond, they will be able to receive both issue 64& 65.

Michael Fishbaugh has been added to our staff as the Article Research Editor. He has done a fine job in searching out articles from many sources. Although many of these article are interesting, we would rather have personal stories written by our members. The magazine is only as good as the articles you submit. So get off your butts, jot down those stories, let everyone enjoy them. Pretend your'e are at some gin mill relating of your personal remembrances.

A few of the staff at the hotel are still misinforming members of availability of rooms and the status of the hotel after the storm. We have spoke to them and the problem should be taken care of.

We can assure you there is nothing wrong with the hotel. They are in the process of making a few renovations. They have assured us that guest will not notice the repair work being done. It is a beautiful hotel and they have many wonderful things planned for our reunion.

Real Reason for Reunions

By George Marrett

"I now know why we who have been to war yearn to reunite. It's not just to tell war stories, look at old photos, and drink beer... although we do all of that. We don't do so to laugh at our past mistakes or dry one another's tears either. Warriors gather because they long to be with buddies who acted their best, men who suffered and sacrificed, who were stripped raw, right down to their humanity. I did not pick these men to share my year of toil and torment. They I now know them in a way I know no others. Never have I given anyone such trust. They were willing to guard something more precious than my life. They would have carried my reputation, the memory of me into the future. It was also part of the unwritten code, the reason we were willing to die for one another and our country."

PERSONAL OBIT

Just A Story

By Ski-ball

My brother and I have been estranged for many years. Although my mother tried to have contact with him, there was none. Every year on his birthday she would send him a card with money enclosed. Never was it sent back, nor was it ever acknowledged. Early in the estrangement, I stopped by and knocked on his door, but he would never answer. Telephone calls had the same result. My brother also served in the Marines. Everyone that I ever ran into who knew him in the Corps had nothing but the highest regard for him as a Marine. But, as a brother and a son he was one rotten son of a bitch.
