Plain and simple. Last Wednesday, just as I was ready to try to catch some sleep the phone rang. A voice on the other end asked if I was so and so who grew up in a certain part of Cleveland, and had a brother by such and such a name. I said I was, and, I did. He had seen my brother's name in a public service obit in a local paper and gave me the name of the funeral home that paid for the obit. I thanked him for letting me know, hung up, and called the funeral home. A gentleman answered (who I later learned had also served in the Corps), and after identifying myself, there was a silence on the other end. Finally, he spoke. He told me that he did not know that my brother had any family. My brother had spent his last 8 months in a nursing home. Where when he checked in, he had answered to the question "next of kin, I have no living family members."

He died a pauper and the local Marine Corps League Chapter was burying him the following Tuesday in the nearest National Cemetery. His body had already been cremated. They had funds set aside for such occasions. I filled in some blanks for him, thanked him, and hung up. I said that I would be at the funeral ceremony. I now had one of the hardest tasks in my life to do. Early the next morning I set off on a 4 hour ride to Cleveland to let a 92 year old mother know that her oldest son was dead. That was one long trip. Although she has slowed down, she wanted to go to the ceremony. The following Tuesday my youngest son went with me to help with my mother.

The day was beautiful. I must say that the Marine Corps League Honor Guard did a wonderful job. The tribute was fired with M-1's, and, with precision. The flag was folded by two sharp active duty Marines, who presented it to my mother. Fella's. When Taps was played, my tears rolled. Years ago I had stolen a picture from my brother from when he was in Nam. My wife had blown it up and framed it, because I wanted a face attached to the casket and the name. The social worker from his nursing home volunteered to hold it during the ceremony. She was surprised to learn that he did have a living family. With my son's help, my mother held up as well as could be expected.

He had two ex-wives and a couple of kids. None of them showed. I really don't know if they were aware of his passing. The phone numbers my mother had were no good, and there was no listing for any of them.

I buried a brother who I no longer knew. From his social worker and the funeral director I received what few papers they had, including a well worn discharge paper. Hence the earlier questions. Maybe it was not the way I envisioned, but my mother was able to say good bye to him. It has been a long week. And a lot of thoughts and memories keep crossing my mind. Some good and some bad. But such is life, and, such is death.

MEMOIRS

HILL 861 16 March 1967

By Danny Schuster

Today, March 16, 2006 brought back vivid memories that I usually don't remember. I need to share this. On 15 March 1967, 1st Platoon of Echo 2/9 left the Khe Sanh combat base via trucks, and were dropped off at the French plantation at the foot of Hill 861, to begin a PPB. We were under strength by at least a dozen Marines. We made it nearly three fourths of the way up the hill before dusk. Staff Sergeant Olson, our platoon Commander, chose to leave our squad, (led by Lou Damiano,) in some elephant grass as an ambush. There was a huge ravine near where we set up, and we could hear the NVA talking all night.

When we rejoined the rest of the platoon early the morning of the 16th we informed S/Sgt. Olson that we heard a lot of chatter from the NVA during the night. He requested artillery support from the Base Commander prior to our platoon moving out that morning but was flatly turned down.

We were on the move for about a half an hour when Johnson the point man saw a couple of NVA setting up a home-made claymore mine. He opened up on them and they returned fire, seriously wounding him. If it were not for the immediate action of Doug Goodin, our gunner from Weapons platoon, many of us would have died very quickly. Goodin had the gun up and blazing in a matter of seconds, and the enemy fire subsided long enough for us to set up a makeshift line along a trail through a bamboo thicket. It was shortly after we set up that the enemy started rolling grenades down the hill on us. SSgt. Olson was finally successful in getting air support. I can still remember those crazy bastards flying those jets right at tree top level, dropping 500 pounders on the NVA positions. Those pilots saved our asses. A chopper came in for Johnson. Joe Schroeder was one of the Marines who volunteered to carry Johnson. An enemy soldier suddenly appeared and opened up with his AK47. Joe was killed instantly and, most likely Johnson. Fens returned fire killing the NVA who had shot Johnson and Schroeder.

We were sent out into a perimeter and were digging foxholes when mortars started falling on us. Lou immediately realized that they were walking the mortars with great accuracy, along the line of our perimeter. He got my fire team out and was running behind me when he went down. I remember turning around and not seeing him. I went back and found him. The entire fire team grabbed him and carried him back to our platoon CP area. When we saw how seriously he was wounded, we thought that he was not going to make it.

By now we had between five and seven KIA's and just as many WIA's. Lou was the worst off. A helicopter arrived to med-evac Lou, and the other WIAs. Lou, the most seriously wounded, was the first to be placed on the helicopter. Our fire team carried him on aboard. We are probably alive today because we were on board when a mortar round hit the ramp just as the helicopter was taking off. Most of the men in the immediate area of that chopper were killed by that incoming round. We headed back to base in a badly damaged helicopter. I remember L/Cpl Moore noticed that his chest was bleeding. A corpsman took a look and realized Moore had shrapnel imbedded in his lung. Lou was rushed to the hospital. I learned later that he survived.

On that day, 2/9 suffered the largest loss for a platoon from one company, 12 good men KIA. A platoon from Bravo 1/9 arrived on Hill 861 from another PPB, and lost 6 of their own KIA trying to bail out my buddies from 1st Platoon. By the end of that stinking day there were 18 Marines KIA and 59 WIA from two platoons. The picture is of the memorial service held at Khe Sanh for the 12 1st Platoon members KIA. I regret to this day missing it because I was down in DaNang at the EENT Clinic. Today is not a good day for me.

A RELATED STORY

Here's a related incident, I found amazing. My wife and I were in Las Vegas on vacation 2-3 years ago. We were "casino" hopping down the strip toward the Lexus from the Flamingo. I was losing miserably all week long. We were sitting at the bar at the MGM Grand. I am a video poker player and had just lost another $20 at the bar machine. There was a large screen TV behind the bar. I wanted to leave but my wife still was having some luck on her machine. Just then God Bless the USA started playing with an accompanying video. I sat there sipping a beer and when the scenes from Vietnam appeared. I began crying like a little kid.

The bartender came over, and put another beer in front of me. He said it looked like I needed one. I was wearing my 2/9 cover. After I calmed down, I decided that the $20 I might lose really meant nothing. I stuck another bill in the machine. In the next 20 minutes I hit a $100 and $200 jackpot, then a Royal Flush for $1,000. We left and were heading across the pedestrian walk to the Excalibur when my wife said she thought a man was trying to get my attention. He was from 1/9 and informed me that they were having a reunion at the Excalibur. I said: "great we'll try to find some of them." He cautioned that there were no formal events scheduled at that time of day, so everyone was probably split up. We went into the casino, and I told my wife we'd stop at the bar, and if we did not see anyone from 1/9, we would go back to our hotel.

Not only were there 1/9ers at the bar, but four of them were among those from Bravo 1/9 who came to our assistance on 16 Mar 67. To say we had a "few" would be understating things. What a small, and sometimes wonderful, world we live in. We lost two corpsmen that day Doc, Andy Alderson was the other. They were loved and well respected. Benoit saved many lives that day. I can only do my own little thing, but hope it helps somewhat in allowing them and the other Marines lost that day rest in peace and never be forgotten.

BENOIT, FRANCIS ARTHUR

Hospitalman Third Class, U.S. Navy

Corpsman (Attached), Company E, 2d Battalion, 9th Marines, 3d Marine Division (Rein.) FMF
Date of Action: March 16, 1967

Citation:

The Navy Cross is presented to Francis Arthur Benoit, Hospitalman Third Class, U.S. Navy, for extraordinary heroism on 16 March 1967 while serving with Company E, Second Battalion, Ninth Marines, Third Marine Division (Reinforced), Fleet Marine Force, in the Republic of Vietnam. While returning to the Company Command Post from a night platoon patrol base, Petty Officer Benoit's platoon was suddenly attacked by an enemy force employing small arms, automatic weapons, and hand grenades. Observing several wounded men, Petty Officer Benoit rushed forward into the intense enemy fire to administer medical aid, but was wounded, himself, by a hand grenade before reaching the casualties. Stunned and temporarily unable to move, he waited for the wounded to be brought to him, and then quickly and competently rendered medical assistance while exposed to enemy fire. After the attack had subsided and the wounded had been put aboard an evacuation helicopter, he refused to be evacuated and thus leave the platoon without a Corpsman. When the second helicopter came in, the landing zone was hit by enemy mortar fire, inflicting additional casualties. Petty Officer Benoit again stayed behind to treat the wounded. He was helping the last wounded man into the third helicopter, before boarding himself, when he was fatally wounded by an enemy mortar round. By his technical skill, courage and inspiring devotion to duty, Petty Officer Benoit undoubtedly saved the lives of many of his fallen comrades. His heroic actions were in the highest traditions of the United States Naval Service.

SHORT ROUNDS

LIFE HAS A FLAVOR

By Michael W. Rodriquez

He stubbed his toe and almost tripped on the railroad tie just this side of Castroville Road. He recovered his balance and glanced around, his eyes narrowed in suspicion, hoping no one had seen how clumsy he'd been. He grunted and wondered why he cared whether anyone had seen him. He scratched at his beard and glanced around again. Don't mean nothing, he muttered. I don't care; nobody cares. I don't care, he thought again, and sniffed at the stink of his body odor. He pulled his coat tighter to him and wished he had a match to light the one cigarette he had left. He knew he was saving it for a special occasion, but he also doubted he had any special days left in his life. He felt tired, or hungry, he wasn't sure which. No, he decided, I'm tired. Maybe I just need to sit for a while.

He eased himself down onto the gravel between the railroad tracks and the bushes that lined the rail bed, away from the road. He swung his head left and then right, struggling to remember again why he was so fascinated with railroad tracks. And then a distant memory, as if a dim bulb, lit up inside his brain. He thought he remembered a fight when he was younger, lots of guns and little people and loud noises and people shooting at each other. He knew he hated loud noises, but he could not remember why. He knew he also hated little people, although he could not recall why that was, either. He did know he loved the railroad tracks. They went this way and then they went that way and he had, as a young man, gone this way and that way, too, and he wondered, why did I do that?

He shifted his weight on the gravel and reached into a pocket of his trousers. He withdrew his hand and lifted his most prized possession to his eyes. His hand held a Zippo lighter, a stainless steel lighter that he'd had forever. He'd held onto it all these years, even when he was in the hospital in Seattle. They wanted to take it away from him, but he just set it down on a table and went back for it later. He knew that if this was all that was left of his life and it went away, then he'd go away, too. He flipped the lid open and spun the wheel, no spark flew, and no flame jumped to life. He did not care that it didn't work. What did matter, he still had it, and been able to hold onto it all these years. Longer than he'd held onto . . . What was her name? He grunted, afraid he could no longer remember the name of his first wife.

He'd been married several times, before he got sick, but he didn't care about the others; he just wanted to recall the name of the first girl he married. He glanced to his right, to the tracks coming toward him from the east, and then smiled, showing broken yellow teeth. Thelma, that was her name, why did that matter? He wasn't sure, but he thought it should be important to him. The marriage did not last long, but that was okay; the others hadn't lasted long, either. He sighed and felt his breath wheeze in his chest. He was tired and hungry and he hurt in places he could not even name.

He flipped the lighter's lid shut, the quick snap of it loud in his ears. He turned his head, anxious that no one should see him or his lighter. It was all he had left, it was all that was left of his life, and he closed his hand around it to hide it, but he did not put it back in his pocket. The sun was almost down and he knew he should find a shelter or an alley or something, but he couldn't will himself to stand. I like it here, he decided. I think I'll stay. He sat for a moment and then his eyes closed and his breathing became shallow. His head jerked and nodded once, then twice, and then it fell, resting heavy on his chest. Still sitting between the bushes and the railroad tracks, his heart thudded once, thudded again, and then his breathing stilled and his hand opened. The lighter slipped from his fingers and fell to the gravel at his feet.

He was still there when the cop saw him the next morning. The young patrolman turned his vehicle onto the shoulder of the road and called in a possible vagrant. He stepped from the car and walked to the man. He knew, even as he approached, that the man was dead. Poor old bastard, thought the young cop, and then he saw the lighter at the man's feet. He knelt and, still staring at the man, he picked up the lighter and glanced at it. He read the inscription, glanced at the still-sitting body of the man, and again, read the inscription. "For those who fight for it, life has a flavor, the protected never know."

This saying has been all over the internet, on Zippo lighters- paraphrased in speeches, etc. A quick web search on the phrase resulted in several items found. It appears to have originated at Khe Sanh.

The inscription written on a C-ration box by an anonymous Marine during the battle of Khe Sanh in1968, which states "For those who fight for it, life has a flavor the protected never know." In an article written in RED CLAY, Timmy Craft claims to have written the phrase while serving with A Co, 3rd Anti Tanks. Tony Shaw asks if the statement he saw posted while serving in Khe Sanh, "For those who fight for it, life has a flavor the protected never know" (as cited in Newsweek, February 12, 1968), originated there or is paraphrased an older source.

"You have never lived, till you have almost died. And for those who fight for it, life has a flavor that the protected will never know." Anonymous (Graffiti on a sign at a command post at Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam)

An American flag painted on a tank along with these words: "For those who fight for it, life has a flavor; the protected will never know."

Colonel Edward F. Danowitz, USMC (Ret), Altamonte Springs, Fl says, "These were the most important days, moments, seconds in their lives... We, who are Marines, who lock arms and embrace today, are not friends, or neighbors. We are brothers of combat. For those who fight for it, life has a special flavor that the protected will never know. That is what ties Marines together, and those who were there can savor the flavor that only combat veterans know."

NEWS YOU CAN USE

Purple Heart designation to the Veterans ID

By Mac - Milton McNeely

All, FYI, the following is information that Ken Pipes forwarded requesting that it be shared. Please help get the word out to anyone that you think may have an interest.
Semper Fi,

VA adds Former POW and Purple Heart designation to the Veterans Identification Card VA has added Former POW and Purple Heart (PH) designations on its VIC. These designations are in addition to the Service-Connected designation already displayed on the VIC.

The cards have a photo of the veteran on the face of the card and identifying information imbedded using bar code and magnetic strip technology. Cards are issued to veterans enrolled in the VA health care system and are used for identification and administrative processing purposes. The VIC cannot be used as a credit or an insurance card and it does not authorize or pay for care at non-VA facilities.

Former Prisoner of War and Purple Heart recipients who are currently enrolled with VA and have a current VIC photograph on file will automatically be sent an updated VIC commencing early May, 2006. Former POWs and/or Purple Heart recipients who are enrolled but have not yet been issued a VIC may request the new card by visiting their local medical center to have their photo taken. Card processing will take five to seven days once eligibility is verified. VA encourages any Former POW or Purple Heart recipient who has not yet enrolled in its health care system to do so and once enrolled to request issuance of a VIC.

WEB BRIEFS

Did anyone out there have any contact with Lt. Mariz. He was killed at Khe Sanh on Jan 30 1968. He was only there for two or three days. He transferred in from Okinawa. I'm his son-in law and am searching for information on his short time there for my wife, (his daughter). If you can help let me know. Thanks

Mike Fishbaugh

Mike, I emailed Mr. Hudak and told him that there is a rather extensive story regarding 1/Lt Robert J Mariz of HQ 26 Marines in Chaplain Ray Stubbe's book "Battalion of Kings" page 143. I also informed Mr. Hudak how he could order the book on Khesanh.org by going to the PX section of the site.

Craig Tourte

Craig. Thanks for responding to Mr. Hudak. As I surf the web, I have run across several family's who are tying to find answers and closure on a lost family member. Many received very little, if any information other then what they were told many years ago. I have referred a couple to "Battalion of Kings" and both of our Khe Sanh Web sites. The footnotes alone create a history and tell the amount of time that was spent researching oral interviews, etc, to make this book. I have two copies. One is going to my local college because they do have semester courses on Vietnam in general.

Mike, I also posted this email I sent to Mr. Hudak.
"The things we endured never leave those of us who were there, and others who happen upon this web page can read a little of our history, and learn why we continue to come together.

Pat,
I copied the article that is contained in the book "Battalion of Kings" regarding your wife's father, Robert Mariz. The book is a first hand account as told by others, about their involvement and often last moments with those killed at or near the Marine Corps Combat Base at Khe Sanh. It's a tough read. The experience never leaves those of us who were there. We have a reunion ever year somewhere in the US. This year it is going to be in Mobile Alabama and next year in DC. If you are around during any of these reunions why don't you folks stop by and introduce yourselves. I think your wife would find it helpful to be around the men who endured the same struggle for life that her father did. Also, please check out Khe Sanh.org for more info on the reunion and other materials relating to the Khe Sanh Veterans. I hope reading the below information will be of some help to you.

I want to add one more thing. There was absolutely nothing Lt. Mariz could have done to prevent what happened. The 122 mm rocket was huge and fast. Often we could not hear them since they were launched from miles away from the base. Worst of all, we had no structures or bunkers strong enough to prevent them from penetrating the interior and exploding. Survival for the most part was all just a matter of luck.

HISTORY
The Khe Sanh Combat Base received one incoming 122mm rocket from the northwest, demolishing the company office which was for the most part, a plywood hardback located bear the regimental COC."We didn't spend too much time in there, said James Walsh". The rocket came in, hit just to the west of us, and threw shrapnel throughout the old company office. Both clerks were wounded. It blew the fingers off one, a red-headed man and hit the other one in the leg. I was standing right in the middle of them, and still everything missed me. I don't know how that happened. I found out Lieutenant Mariz had just left the regimental bunker, and was walking past the recon office when that rocket hit, and that's where he as killed."

"Kevin Macaulay, a radioman in Bravo Company, 3rd Recon, recalled the incident: "This brand new Lieutenant, he'd been in country a day or two, just exited the regimental COC bunker. You could tell he was new, his utilities were perfectly clean. His flak jacket was green; ours were stained red, from the soil at Khe Sanh. He walked right into the path of the rocket. He was seriously wounded. We saw him lying on the ground. One of his feet was at a turned at an impossible angle, and almost severed.

We were already carrying our company clerk, a fellow by the name of Ronald Coleman out of the company office who had taken shrapnel from the some round. Coleman lost, I believe, the major portion of all of his fingers on both hands, plus he had a gaping wound over his right kidney. I believe he did later survive. We brought Coleman up to Charlie Med, and came back for the wounded Lieutenant. As we were loading him onto the stretcher, Colonel Lownds, the Battalion Commander, came up out of the COC bunker.

Colonel Lownds watched us as we picked him up and took him to the aid station. We came back with the empty stretcher. Colonel Lownds yelled; " Hey Marines how's he doing" ? I looked at the Colonel, and shook my head. Colonel Lownds was visibly upset by the Lieutenant's death. It was one of the few times that I had seen Colonel Lownds, or spoke to him. It left me with the impression that he did really care for the men under his command.

"Robert Mariz, born 9 July 1930, had enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1948. In 2002 one of his daughters wrote: My dad was very special to me and his memory is very strong in my mind and in my heart. I know I am lucky to have loved him and known him for the years that I had with him. I was 13 at the time that he died. We lived in Oceanside, California. We finished out that school year and then moved to Minnesota (always considered our home state) that summer. My mom has never remarried and still loves him very much. I have a sister, Pasti, who was 10 at the time. He was only at Khe Sanh about 2 days when he died. He had been a courier out of Okinawa for 6 months before going to Khe Sanh. He had traveled to Vietnam as a courier, but at Khe Sanh he would have been permanently stationed until August or September. He would have had 20 years in The Marines as of April in 1968. He had served in Korea when he was young and was at the Chosin Reservoir. I was named after the Marine Corps although my name is spelled differently. If I'd been a boy (I was told) I would have been named Gung Ho or Semper Fi, but I think that was a joke. The Marine Corps was important to him, as was his country. He believed in it."

SHORT ROUNDS

My Personal Opinion

By Craig W. Tourte

I'm going to try and make an analogy here. When we were kids there was this big bully in grade school and we all hated him. He stole lunch money from our lockers and he used to beat up the weaker kids in school. He grew up to become a banker, had 5 kids and took his family to church on Sunday. I still hate him, not for what he became, but for what he was and for what he had done.

Tookey (sic) Williams started a gang when he was a young man. This gang evolved into a huge machine that was responsible for the murder of many of our citizens. After killing four innocent people he was sentenced to die. Twenty-five years later, Tookey wrote children's books from prison, found the lord and by all accounts was a changed man. They juiced Tookey, not for what he had become but for what he had done twenty-five years before. I still hated Tookey for killing the four innocents those many years ago and for founding a gang that has been responsible for the murder of thousands.

I understand and appreciate what Vietnam has become. I understand that most who live in Vietnam now, do not have any memory of the war with the United States. I know that Vietnam is now at peace and united after 1,000 years of various wars and conflict with the Chinese, French, Japanese and Americans. I understand that it is a different world now than the one I lived in 38 years ago. I understand that our war was a long time ago. What the heck, some of the Vietnamese may even love us now, while there are so many other countries that hate us. But as much as I understand all of these things and try to forgive those who brutalized so many of us and their own citizens, I know that for some, there is still a burning in their hearts. Many of us continue to view the country of Vietnam and it's government for what they were back then, rather for what they are now. I have rationalized, thought about this issue; remembered the events of our time, faced my doubts, forgave and tried to understand and move on with my life, but it's still there burning inside of me. I think it is OK if some of us are still pissed off about the whole thing, including being-pissed off at Vietnam, if it just does not make much sense to them, because there are times it just doesn't make sense to me either.

I'm sorry, but I still view the country of Vietnam much like I view the school bully who preyed on the weak and the founder of the gang, that killed four innocent kids so many years ago. I'll continue to be pissed off about it be it ever so irrational.

INCOMING

"Made In Vietnam"

By Craig W. Tourte

One cannot move forward by taking a step backward. When I served in Vietnam in 1967-1968, World War II had been over for 22 years. When I visited Japan in 1980 the war with that county had been over for over 35 years. Today the war with Vietnam has been over for 35 years and my personal connection with Vietnam has been over for over 38 years.

While visiting Japan I was surprised at how gracious I was treated by the Japanese people. I loved the food and felt nothing but the utmost respect for the Japanese and their culture, although some cultural differences were difficult for me to understand. I wonder if I had been a veteran of the Pacific campaigns, if I would have felt the same? I doubt it. While vacationing in Hawaii in the 70's I was standing near a group of Japanese men who appeared to be in their 50's while they pointed out toward Ford Island and were making airplane wings with their hands in flying motions. It was obvious to me that they had some personal knowledge of the Pearl Harbor attack years before. I'll admit to having a cold chill run down my spine. At the moment, I did not have a fondness for the Japanese. They observed me watching them so engaged and immediately stopped what they were doing. It must have been something in my stare.

I am pretty well versed on the history of Vietnam and have a remedial understanding of why America was involved in that conflict. I am not as sure that Vietnam was our enemy as much as we were theirs'. Vietnam is certainly a different country now than when we were there. The median age of the Vietnamese is 25.51 years of age. English is their second language. The literacy rate is 94% making for a lot of skilled workers.

The United States signed a Bilateral Trade Agreement with Vietnam in July 2000. In 2003 the two way trade between Vietnam and the United States was about 6 billion dollars. The United States is the number one trading partner in Vietnam, producing and exporting to the U.S. such things as Levis and Nike shoes, garments, seafood, crude oil, furniture and handicraft items. We export aircraft and spare parts, machinery and industrial products to Vietnam.

It should also be noted that Vietnam is one of the world's safest locations. "This is recognized by the international organizations and the world community. This factor became more and more important after September 11, 2001..."

I have known a few Vietnamese who came here after the war and know that their subsequent generations have contributed to this country in many positive ways. In conversations I have had with some, the war with American is mostly forgotten and seldom mentioned. Visitors from America are welcomed. The world is different now. Our earth has turned many times and many millions have been born since our conflict with that poor country.

So what is the point of this little story? I was in a big box store this weekend and my wife purchased a small table that had to be assembled. As the box was placed into our cart, I read "Made In Vietnam." At that moment I remembered a small isolated base located in the South West corner of Vietnam and I didn't have a particular fond feeling for the Vietnamese. I exclaimed in not too soft a voice, "Made in Vietnam" to no one in particular. As I reflect back, I believe my tone had a slight edge to it. The 19-year-old kid who placed the box in the cart looked at me with a big question mark on his face. My wife had no reaction. I know my reaction does not make much sense, especially given the facts that I have stated above, but I have to tell you, I'm still pissed off. It's an emotion I cannot explain to anyone and an emotion I don't have to explain to you. You already know.

POETRY

A Moment in Time

In the end, I found myself at the "Wall" there for all the world to see, asking myself, "why them and not me?"
The many names reminded me of how life was at hand, to die in a foreign land, Where life was given, and suddenly taken away, for freedom has a terrible price, for the spirit and the flesh, where lives were thrown away,

like the throw of the dice,
Where the true hero in measured, didn't come home at all,
So here I am, standing before the "Wall," listening to their voices crying out,
OH America! have you forgotten?
For whom prays for peace more, than the one who fights the war,
As I stood there with tears on my face,
a lump in my throat,
I could only remember what one great general said,
"Old Soldiers never die, they just fade away."

Duster C131 "Grim Reaper"

By Joseph Belardo

March 1968: If we weren't doing convoys up and down Route 9, my Duster C131 "Grim Reaper" did search and destroy missions behind Camp Carroll, deep into the southwest, towards Khe Sanh. We had observed tracks from a suspected NVA PT76, Russian made tank. Our hope was to be the first to take out an NVA tank, a dream that never happened. Our Duster was one of two Dusters assigned to meet the "1st Cav" by a small outpost behind Camp JJ Carroll called Delta-5. The area where they assembled was a large, flat expanse of land we called the "Plains of Delta 5." We waited all day and all night for them to completely arrive and assemble. We looked at each other in amazement as the morning dew lifted and we saw all the equipment they had. It seemed like they had more equipment than all of the Third Marine Division. You name they had it.

We could smell hot chow coming from one of their portable mess halls, and asked one of their officers if we could get a hot meal. He rudely replied, "You live with the Marines, go eat with the Marines." I told the cocky bastard where to stick it and gave him the finger. The crew thought it was great and heckled him as he walked always as we sat and ate our C-rations. We were attached to the Marines, and were damm proud of it. Needless to say we did not get off on a good start with the Cav. I really didn't care. After about fifteen minute I approached the same officer, and reintroduced myself (the Grim Reaper), the person the Cav was talking to all night. I informed him that my Duster would be his leader on the convoy down Route 9, and the second Duster would be at the rear. Looking him right in the eye, I said "Saddle up Lieutenant; it's time we got going."

He did not like the idea that I, only a Sergeant was giving him orders. (On a Duster an E-5 was the Squad Leader, and considered the Track Commander) I explained that our Lieutenant would catch up to us on the road. We did our job and escorted the Cav. up to Route 9 and west to Calu, which was now being transformed into LZ Stud. Stud would be the jumping off point for the famous Operation Pegasus. Pegasus was the name given to the reactionary forces assigned to reopen the road to Khe Sanh. This particular group of the 1st Cav would brag how they saved the Marines from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh, how they kicked NVAS' ass. But, we knew better. The NVAS' ass had already been kicked and beaten by hundreds of Marines, artillery, jets, Dusters, Quad-50's and a million pounds of bombs dropped by the B-52s. We fought side-by-side with the Cav. The resistance the NVA gave the Cav., on a whole, was minimal compared to the NVAS' actual fighting abilities. Their "minimal" gave the Cav trouble. They saw some action, but nothing like we saw in the prior months. But, the Cav always claimed bragging rights, but as an honorary Marine we knew who the real ass kickers were.

April 9th: LZ Stud was hit by 50 NVA artillery shells. We continued to help the Cav open Route 9 from LZ Stud to Khe Sanh. I always thought they were helping us.? The going was slow and the fighting sporadic. We finally rotated and got a rest. Our new position was on top of Outpost Hill 250 situated outside the northeast corner of Camp Carroll. I can still remember that spectacular view of the DMZ, Dong Ha Mountain, Con Thien, Cam Lo and Route 9. Hill 250 gave us a chance to regroup. My crew would get credit for shooting out three NVA artillery rocket positions in three days. The secondary explosions were fantastic. We yelled with a madman's joy as the enemy positions were destroyed. Dead NVA meant Marines would not die that night. I enjoyed shooting the Marine .50 caliber sniper rifle from the tower on top of 250. It was an awesome experience. The shooter would use Willy Peter rounds from the 106 Recoilless and give us NVA targets to shoot. I must have been back on someone's good list. If I could have chosen a place to spend my tour, it would have been 250. The view from Hill 250 was magnificent. At day break you stood above the low clouds. As the mist lifted, you could see the horizon. It was breath taking, and it also took the breath away from the enemy because of the hills firing and shooting advantage. It is a shame how war mixed and twisted emotions, including mine, I felt safe there. That alone allowed my brain to get much needed relaxation.

April 11: The Rockpile got hit by six NVA rockets. One of the rockets damaged a Duster and wounded one of the crew.

April 12: We were on a search and destroy mission with the Marines behind an old plantation slightly southwest of Delta-5. All of a sudden about thirty Viet Cong (VC) walked out of this tree line. They were all holding their hands and rifles high, yelling "Chieu Hoi – Chieu Hoi" (I surrender).We expected it to be some kind of trap. Almost all of them were dressed in their traditional daytime white pajamas. The Marines searched them and confiscated all their weapons and we marched them all to Delta-5.We kept them huddled in small groups outside of D-5. It was funny, because when we first radioed Carroll that we had captured over thirty of the enemy, they thought we were joking. The leaders of the VC constantly spoke and caused unrest amongst the prisoners and had to be individually separated from the other prisoners. It took all day before they finally arrived with some trucks and took them away. I always wondered where the prisoners went. Another thirty NVA rockets hit The Rockpile. One of our Dusters at the Rockpile spotted the NVA forward observer and hit him with a fast-eighty 40mm rounds. The NVA stopped shooting for the rest of the day.

April 13: At the Rockpile, two Dusters dueled with an NVA rocket team and observed secondary explosions as they hit their mark. Larry Roundtree's Duster was one of two Dusters to be the first to drive into Khe Sanh in 77 days. We got a call on the lima-lima from LT Bligh,"Saddle-up, you're going to rotate to Khe Sanh." immediately. I was shocked when he told me to choose the other track that would be sent with me. To this day I feel guilty for suggesting Steve Harris's track. I knew he would jump at the request, and he knew I would choose him. Steve and I had gone from boot camp to Nam together. He was a courageous soldier and had a good crew. If the Khe Sanh I knew had changed like they said it had, Harris was my first choice. I also knew that LT Bligh would love to send Harris. A few weeks earlier, Harris and LT Bligh had exchanged some serious words about an ambush they were in on the road to Khe Sanh. This was going to be a first; Dusters C131 and C132, sister tracks, would be together, defending one base.

Harris, who was now stationed at the Khe Gio Bridge and had cut his foot real bad while bathing in the river, had been medivaced to Dong Ha. Another real good friend from boot camp, Frank Bardone, became acting squad leader. Bardone would take Harris's crew to Khe Sanh. Harris was never told, and I mean never, that he was going to Khe Sanh. He wasn't even told that his track had left for Khe Sanh without him. Rumor has it, he was really pissed when he got back to the "Bridge" and found that track, complete with crew, was gone. I understand he got very upset with me when he was told I had volunteered him for Khe Sanh. What are friends for? It was about a month before he caught up to his Duster. I always wondered if they gave him KP and shit burning details while he waited to catch a convoy to Khe Sanh.

Captain Vincent Tedesco our new CO would escort us to Khe Sanh. We did not go with another convoy or any other group, just three vehicles; Tedesco and his jeep driver, "Smitty" along with Duster C132, and my Duster, C131.Captain Tedesco was the best commanding officer we ever had at C Battery. He would lead us with courage and a true understanding of how the NVA fought. But, driving to Khe Sanh with only three vehicles I thought was a bit crazy. But, what the hell, you can't live forever! I was always comfortable when Tedesco was in charge. He treated all the Duster and Quad crews with respect and asked for our advice and opinions from each other. The Captain and I hoped our little convoy would not become an accident on the ride to Khe Sanh.

We were the first and, as far I knew, the only idiots ever to make a solo attempt to drive to Khe Sanh. We were about one third of the way to Khe Sanh when my engine blew. Black smoke was pouring out the engine grates. The Duster, known to be fast, was now reduced to a top speed of less then 5 miles per hour. Our track was a great target for any decent NVA sniper, RPG team, or satchel charge thrower. We briefly stopped along the road to assess the damage. Tedesco informed us that he and the other Duster would proceed to Khe Sanh, with all due speed. If anything should happen, he would send help and return with all the Dusters and Quads at the base. My driver Earl Holt, who never cursed or used God's name in vain, uttered his first words of profanity under his breath. Tedesco and Bardone departed for Khe Sanh, assuring us how we were great soldiers "Rough Riders" and knew how to fight, just radio us for help. Bardone yelled: "Remember, we don't make house calls."

We waved goodbye to each other as the dust from the departing Duster hid us from view. Deja vu of January 24th battle on Route 9 was stirring in my brain. One of my crew even took pictures of their Duster as it sped down the road on the other side of the valley. I ordered my crew to unlock the turret, open all the upper ammo boxes and slowly traverse back and forth, and stay extremely alert. I instructed my gunner Wally Owens that if shit happened to shoot the first minute with both 40's on full auto (240 high explosive rounds a minute), and, I'd sweep the area. One cannoneer, George Lewis, was to remain seated, holding two hand grenades to throw in the enemys' direction before he started loading the 40's. The other cannoneer, Benny Sitello was ordered to squat and use the M-60 machinegun to cover the hill and cliff above our right side, and to never stand up. George would load the auto-feeders. All were instructed to keep a low profile and no talking, absolutely no talking. Taking to each other while on the road or during incoming was something I absolutely forbade. All your attention and concentration had to be on your job, the enemy, and the direction they were coming from. They were a great crew and knew what had to be done. It was routine business for road warriors. The balance of the ride to Khe Sanh seemed to take all day. We all thank God to this day that nothing bad happened. Over three hours alone on Route 9 to Khe Sanh was no place to be. Years later at a reunion, we would joke with Tedesco and Bardone about how they left us on the road that day, and how Frank would not accept collect calls. I guess we were the only idiots to ever ride that section of road from Calu to Khe Sanh all alone.

I had not been completely down the road to Khe Sanh in many months. I could not believe how this once picturesque winding road had changed. The all out American push to save Khe Sanh had destroyed the area. The weeks of artillery, napalm and B-52 strikes had leveled everything. I told my men: "Welcome to Death Valley. Almost all the trees were gone or splintered. The terrain looked like the earth was upside down. It made my hair stand on end. We had already chewed up Route 9 from Camp Carroll to Calu. The area was filled with bomb craters, napalm scars, and dead NVA decaying along the sides of the road. The smell of death burned the nostrils and the rotting flesh upset our stomachs. This sight was like nothing I had ever seen. Our slow crawl to the infamous Khe Sanh changed our souls even more. I didn't think we would make it to Khe Sanh alive.

Our arrival at Khe Sanh would turn into a bad omen for my superstitious crew. The Captain was with Bardone, having him take up position at the east end of the runway by the old ammo dump. Our combat section from Charlie "C" Battery was relieving Alpha "A" Battery which was commanded by LT Bruce Geiger. "A" Battery had done the test of time during the infamous 77-day siege. Tedesco would go back with a large convoy and the two Dusters we were replacing. We were taking the bunker at the northwest end of the runway across from "Charlie Med." Another Duster which was departing Khe Sanh was pulling out of the parapet as we arrived. They expressed their joy about leaving. Two Marines waving goodbye stood in the mouth of the track's three-sided parapet next to our new bunker position. The NVA opened up with a barrage of artillery from Co Roc, a mountain enemy fortification in Laos. The first shell was a direct hit on the two Marines. We never heard it coming. They were blown to smithereens. Parts of them were scattered all over our parapet, bunker, and Duster. Tedesco and the convoy left as quickly as possible. We helped the Marines quickly bag as many parts of their comrades as they could find, and ran them across the runway to graves registration.

Our new position was still covered with the remains and blood of the two poor Marines. My crew stood there in disbelief. It was a bad omen. Our job after the battles on Route 9 was body recovery. They had seen death many times and knew all about dying and suffering. But this, direct artillery hit on a fellow American next to what was our new private sanctuary, our new bunker, our new home, was totally unacceptable. We were hoping our bunker at Khe Sanh was off limits to artillery. We should have known better. It happened so fast that you could not even take cover. We did not have time to close our eyes, or, even blink.

The crew had given out their fair share of what we called "being smoked," a term we used when the 40mm cannon shell hit an NVA soldier. When one of ours got "smoked," it had a whole new meaning. My men would remember this day forever. On our Duster we carried rakes, picks and shovels. As my crew checked out their new bunker, I hastily raked the rest of the Marines' remains into a pile. I then shoveled the pile into an old rusty half of a fifty-five gallon drum. I had the crew carry the drum about a hundred feet west of our bunker. I then shoveled dirt on all the blood stained ground around our area. Holt backed up the Duster into the parapet. We were now ready for the NVA. As a team, we quickly finished our task of "it's only a thing – it ain't anything" and went back to business. After we were settled into our bunker, I burned the remains in the drum. As the ashes rose, Earl walked over and read from "the Good Book." The words of God took the mental edge off what now had turned into a very bad day. We would find parts from those Marines who died in our area until we left Khe Sanh. The drum would become our area's crematorium for all the body parts that never made the body bags. We hoped the NVA artillery would not hit our crematorium and kill our friends again. Earl's words from the Bible continually healed our fragile souls.

Dear Diary: FEAR

Nam, where lives are lost and saved everyday without thought of its psychological consequence. I remember the many days of being shot at and the sight and inner fear of seeing a friend shot or dead. Bullets are like something reaching for me, unseen, but heard, unbiased and deadly.

My mind cannot grasp the swift change of events in an all out fire - fight. My trained reflexes have me running, dodging, hiding and returning fire. The shadow of death is all around me. The sounds of war, the suffering, the dying, are in itself... unbelievable.

The fear of perishing that struggle for self-preservation keeps me going. It was just like they said it would be all blood and guts. The only thing they left out was John Wayne.
The military could train me for just about anything, except the harassment and interdiction of artillery warfare. It was like nothing I could imagine. The sound alone made my heart stop. I can only relate to this by having you lie between railroad tracks and have the Baltimore Express pass over you.

One artillery shell fired at you isn't too bad. It only lasts for a few seconds and only hits one spot. When the barrage begins, destruction is devastating. The long lasting artillery attack plays havoc with my mind. If I'm caught in the open, I'm scrambling for the nearest shelter, preferably a bunker. Once inside I'm still not safe. All I have accomplished is the elimination of a lot of shrapnel. We just sit and wait in huddled masses. Listening, wondering, and waiting for the one with your name on it. That endless time, working on your nerves. Minutes seem like hours, hours that feel like days. Screams from the wounded, sighs of the dying, the helping that never seems to be enough.

I begin to wander, dreaming of home, my loved ones and the things we haven't done, but want to. I begin to pray, praying silently, praying in groups. Fear has come a-calling and I have to suck up all that is holy to me, all that has made me what I am, all that will show the men around me that I will get them though this and send them home in one piece.

Like the scream of a murdered woman, a shell lands close and reawakens me to my surroundings. A twelve-foot cube, seventeen feet below Mother Earth, totally in darkness.

Finally it's quiet and we crawl from the bowels, the womb of our Mother, exhausted from mental fatigue. "Thank God I'm alive."

April 19: A Convoy heading to Khe Sanh with Marine Unit G-2/9 was ambushed by the NVA. Dusters provided direct fire support on NVA main positions, enabling the marines to extract their wounded and dead. Four Duster men were wounded in action protecting the marines.

My crew and I hated Khe Sanh. It was a stagnant position and we were road warriors. The siege was over, except for a few snipers that were always trying to kill us. The incoming never stopped, the big guns from Laos pounded the base at will. Hundreds of enemy artillery shells hit the base daily. Living conditions were deplorable. The NVA had blown the base into little pieces. Garbage and debris was strewn all over the place. The only true thing that ruled the base was the rats. Rats were as big as rabbits. Rats grew larger by the day as they feasted on the dead NVA in what we called Death Valley. We shared our bunker with families of rats. A rat crawling on you during your sleep was an everyday common occurrence.

We had inherited a dog, or should I say puppy, named "Rex" from a Marine named Bruce. The dog's name was instantly changed to Comanche, the handle given to Dusters from Charlie Battery. The dog broke the monotony of the constant incoming and that lonely isolated feeling. He was a good dog and was the mascot of everyone on the northwest end of the runway. One day Comanche started frothing at the mouth and shaking. We feared the dog might have rabies. He was still just a pup and liked to gnaw on your fingers. Panic set in. We all thought we had rabies. Rabies meant getting two weeks of shots in your belly, something we all dreaded.

We preferred fighting the NVA and not dying from rabies. I came up with this great idea and gave the dog a name, PVT Charles Comanche. On the next medivac chopper, we sent George Lewis and PVT Comanche to the hospital in Da Nang. We knew George would get some doctor to treat our dog. Avoiding rabbi shots in all our bellies depended on him. Comanche was diagnosed with distemper and was sadly put to sleep. George was no fool, and stayed a few extra days at China Beach. George claimed he could not get back to Khe Sanh. His stories about the USO shows were refreshing. We were all jealous. Our new LT, whom we called LT Dan, lived at the other end of the runway just past the Quad-50's. The LT never knew George was gone.

May 14: Jose Diaz was killed. Khe Sanh removed what little was left of your shame and modesty. The constant incoming had blown up almost all the shitters. The empty 40mm cans became our depositories. The cans, filled with a little kerosene, were placed in the trenches or brought into the bunkers.

God, it was embarrassing. The airtight lids kept the smell down. It was only bad when in use. Burning shitters at Khe Sanh was a no-no. The NVA could and would put an artillery shell on top of them as you took a crap, a mess that nobody treasured cleaning.

Our Duster still had a bad engine and was used only to retrieve recon teams and Marines close to our perimeter. I guess this was good for us, because we could not do convoys, mine sweeps, or search and destroys. The constant body recovery fried our brains and gave a whole new meaning to brotherhood.We all felt guilty when, on June 9, our brothers-in-arms from the 3rd Marine Tanks were destroyed and killed just outside the gates of Khe Sanh. Marine SGT Clifford Evans was killed. He was one of our best friends. I had fought a lot of battles with him on that "Road to Hell. "Our engine was now almost completely dead. If they had replaced our engine in a timely fashion, we might have been able to help or save them. Cries for help on the radio haunt me forever. We questioned everyone, over and over, if they were sure he was dead. I pray for him on my yearly visit to "THE WALL." It wasn't until a few days before we closed Khe Sanh that our engine was finally replaced. I had worried that our engine would finally stop running before getting this replacement. We got there doing five miles per hour, we could also leave the same way.

Water was a prized commodity at the base and we were unable to get our own water, so we built a shower. We cut the lid off an old Agent Orange drum and cleaned the inside out with rags and dirt. The men put a hand release fire hose nozzle in the drums small screw hole. We wedged the drum on top of the bunker and announced to the marines that we had a shower. The guys thought I was crazy because we had not showered for weeks. We took little baths out of our helmets and didn't have enough water for showering. So, I made a deal with this Marine LT who was in charge of the marines who lived in the trenches on our north perimeter. We had showers for all his men, if he supplied us with water. Our position always had water, thanks to our shower. We used our gasoline pump to pump the water up into the drum. It was great while it lasted.

One of the other items we never had enough of was C-rations. Our convoys brought us ammo and mail, but always seemed to forget to bring rations on their weekly jaunts. I would lose another thirty pounds during my stay at Khe Sanh. I weighed around 145 pounds and had lost over 60 pounds since I arrived in Nam. We started to monitor the helicopter drops each evening at our end of the runway. Minutes after the chopper was gone, the Marine Ontos crew and us would raid the shipments. Our stretcher was used to carry off all usable items and food. Our best raid yielded dehydrated hamburgers and string beans. They looked like little gray cardboard squares. If you placed them in your mess kit frying pan, added water and a little heat from C-4, then "Ole" - you got hamburgers. Gary from the Ontos opened a big can of string beans and we all ate like kings.

It was like the original 77-day siege had never ended. The NVA continually pounded the base with heavy artillery. I stopped counting incoming at 250. My brain was beginning to fade. I was losing track of time and dates. I really didn't give a shit. I walked the area tall and proud, defying the snipers. My men didn't question me.

To amuse ourselves, we would have wrestling and boxing matches with the other Duster crews who came in on the convoys from LZ Stud. Our crew, because of our bad ass Kung Fu Master George Lewis, was always the winner. Occasionally we'd even have a rock throwing fight. We were totally nuts. I remember getting hit in the face with this big rock and getting this giant black eye. Captain Tedesco arrived out of nowhere on the next convoy. I think he came just to bust my balls and tease me. "Belardo, I heard how you got that black eye and you're not getting another Purple Heart," the Captain bellowed. My crew thought this was great. We could have all been dead and the command would not have known or even given a shit. Get whacked in the head with a rock and the whole DMZ knew about it. That shiner lasted a couple of weeks. I was known to have handed out a few black eyes. This must have been God's way of getting even. The joke was on me and that was okay.

June 9: Manuel Martinez was killed.The convoy brought me an extra man named Simon. Benny, my cannoneer, tried to take Simon under his wing and teach him what was to be expected and what was happening at this base. Simon was his own man and rubbed everyone wrong. We had a C-ration policy that each person on the crew would take turns eating the famous beanie weenies. Simon was left alone one day to guard the bunker while our Duster went to the other end of the camp to shoot at a suspected NVA position. After our return, George Lewis discovered that Simon had eaten his beanie weenies. George was a very large, very strong man, much larger than Simon and a Kung Fu Master. He was truly a real badass, not someone you wanted to piss off. George carried an old razor sharp "Enfield bayonet" strapped to the back of his flak jacket. He had it out and wanted to carve up Simon. It was amazing how a simple can of food could make a man crack. Simon thought it was a joke, but George went ballistic. Simon was going to die, if I could not calm down George. I had never seen George get so angry with anyone or anything. Simon had crossed the wrong bounds of crew trust. Trust in each other was the only thing we had to offer. It was sacred to my men. To appease George and the rest of the crew, Simon covered our bunker with a new layer of sandbags. Simon filled, tied, and stacked every sandbag by himself, with George as his personal watchdog. I explained the situation to our lieutenant, and about my fear for Simon's safety. Simon left a few days later on the next convoy. Before he left he had to empty all the sand bags he had filled plus a few hundred more. We were taking Khe Sanh apart.

A Douglas A4 fighter plane from one of the aircraft carriers signaled "May Day" to the base that it must attempt an emergency landing on Khe Sanh's short runway. The edges of the runway were already filled with planes and helicopters destroyed during the siege and since our arrival. The base came alive: Men scurried from their holes to get a better look at what might be added to the collection of relics along the runway. Poised with shovels, fire extinguishers, stretchers, and water, we waited with cameras around our necks for the jet's arrival. It was the most excitement we had since the chopper had left dehydrated hamburgers and grapefruit on the runway for us to steal.

The A4 plane landed with its brakes locked and engines in full reverse thrust. It came to a screeching halt a few feet short of the end of the runway. Everyone ran to its aid. The pilot was a little shaken, but seemed to be in good health. The jet had a small hole in its fuel tank and had run out of gas. The pilot was lucky that the plane's tail hook didn't catch on something as he came down the runway. We were all lucky that the NVA were not shooting at the base from Co Roc. The fighter plane was dragged off the runway and into an old helicopter revetment for protection. It would emerge a few days later with its gas tank repaired, a tail hook strapped to the plane's fuselage, and a pilot eager to fly off the base. As the pilot got into the cockpit, he gave all of us the "High Sign." The thumbs up gesture made us all start cheering. The jet roared down the runway, lifted and was gone. Minutes later, the pilot flew the jet about a hundred feet over the runway and did a spiral victory roll skyward. It was a good day for all: The monotony was broken with joy and excitement, and no one was injured.

June 21: I celebrated my twenty-first birthday. My family and girlfriend Nancy had sent me cookies, popcorn, pepperoni and provolone cheese. My crew thought we were at a feast as we celebrated my passage into manhood. We ended our feast with eating our favorite meal from home, Lucky Leaf Baked Apples in a can. After we finished the apples we each took turns putting our tongue in the can, getting those tasty last licks.

We had trouble with this helicopter pilot and crew who got their kicks hovering over our position and causing a dust bowl. This helicopter arrived twice a day to pick up Marines leaving the base. The red clay dust clung to the oiled 40mm cannons. The pilot hovered a few feet over our bunker and had his door gunner point his gun at my men. It was so dusty; we had to re-clean the guns every time he came. One day I met the helicopter at the runway and advised the pilot that his dusting and pointing his gun shit had to stop. The pilot was some arrogant bastard with a severe attitude problem and told me where to shove it. I told him it's not a game and the next time I'd beat his ass. Plus my men would love to have a reason to shoot his mangy ass out of the sky. The next day he did his same routine. As the helicopter was hovering over us, we heard a loud popping noise as the NVA shot him out of the sky. The chopper burst into flames and crashed just outside our perimeter wire. We ran out and saved the mangy bastard, his crew and its passengers. They were lucky only to have some broken noses and minor cuts. The following day we had a group of officer's show up at our bunker and accuse us of shooting the helicopter out of the sky. I laughed and advised them that if we had shot them, they all would be dead. I told them they should go check out the helicopter. It was only on the other side of the wire and visible from the perimeter. I told this officer that they should give us a medal for saving their sorry asses. We were never questioned again.

June 26: I got hit in the left shin with shrapnel. I reported to what was left of the aid station, Charlie Med, across the runway from our bunker. The Navy doctor treated me for my minor wound. After viewing all the Marines with much more serious wounds, I was overcome with mental shame for being treated for my nicked shin. The next several hours I spent assisting as a stretcher-bearer for the wounded and the dead. Again, I was introduced to body registration, a small reminder of the small price I had paid compared to so many others.

Stretchers, wounded and the dead were a daily vigil. When needed, we would help Graves Registration clean and care for the dead. Cleaning their faces and loading them on outgoing choppers was the least we could do for their mothers. The whole crew sometimes helped. We called this detail "Cleaning Faces," an ordeal with much mixed emotions that has lasted a lifetime. Months later, a small rusty spot appeared on my left shin from the shrapnel. It's been over thirty years and the rusty spot still appears. Putting on my socks each day is my daily reminder of my stay at Khe Sanh.

My crew did not get upset when I added a new Grim Reaper symbol on the front gun plate situated between the 40mm barrels. I up-graded from a skull painting to a real NVA skull. The hardships of war had caught up with my moral fibers and my Christian upbringing. Besides, NVA bones were everywhere. To my surprise, the crew thought this was the greatest. They nicknamed the skull "Ho Chi." Kissing their first two fingers; they each took turns patting the skull for good luck. I started speaking openly of never going back to the real world. My crew and I had crossed over to the dark side of life. It was becoming hard to focus on anything nice or anything real. If it wasn't for our CARE packages, perfumed letters from home and mail call, I think we would have totally flipped.

We had been ordered weeks before, to abandon the KSCB. This was something we thought never would have happen. We had kicked NVA ass all over the DMZ. My Duster crew had been in many firefights and lost five Dusters before arriving at Khe Sanh. We were winning the war. The troops thought it was time to keep the ground we fought for and march on Hanoi. Abandoning this base destroyed all the reasons we had fought for. It was political suicide and the warrior did not count. So many Americans had died in vain. So many Americans were severely wounded, both physically and mentally. We all knew it was the turning point of the war. Even though I did not like the war, it was not in my mental make-up to give up, quit, retreat or lose at anything that cost lives. The warrior in me would rise to the occasion, step to the front of the line, face my adversaries head-on, and be mentally and physically accountable. Abandoning Khe Sanh was a personal insult to all Vietnam veterans.

As instructed, without haste, we continued to dismantle the base. I became in charge of our area. I was told not to leave anything standing. All trenches and foxholes were to be filled. All buildings, bunkers and shelters were to be torn down If we could not take them down, blow them up. Nothing, not even the garbage, was to be left for the NVA. Our bunker and the Ontos crew's bunker next to us would be the last to be destroyed. These bunkers would be used to shelter the remaining clean-up crews from the enemy.

The NVA snipers never stopped shooting and the NVA artillery from Co Roc increased their fire missions each day. As trenches and bunkers diminished, our living conditions became a nightmare. As far as we were concerned, the "Siege" was still on. Hundreds of enemy artillery shells hammered us twenty-four hours a day. I stopped counting each time when the hundredth round hit. We would strip the bunkers of all their sandbags. As the sandbags were removed, they would be cut open and the dirt dumped out. All metal roof decking, ammo cans and empty brass used for roof artillery deflecting material was gathered, loaded on trucks, and shipped off the base. The Dusters were used to pull the big roof timbers out of the bunkers. Bulldozers filled the empty bunker holes and the area was plowed flat.

Men crowded into a few small holes and trenches

trying to stay alive. The rats scurried over the debris, men searched for cover and their own place to live or die. Rats, our other enemy, became comrades trying to stay alive. Living under the Dusters became everyone's second home. The enemy knew we were abandoning Khe Sanh. Some asshole had it plastered all over the front pages of every newspaper. The enemy continued to increase their daily artillery barrages on the base. The NVA shelling was unbelievable, killing and severely wounding many of the Marines who lived in shallow shelter holes they had dug in front of our Duster. There was no safe place to hide. We stacked the dead and wounded by the old "Charlie Med." A small group of corpsmen assisted those brought to this area as best they could. Convoys and helicopters seemed to be coming and going on a daily basis.

June 30th: Khe Sanh had all but vanished before our eyes. We didn't waste time and leveled the Ontos bunker with the use of C-4 explosives. Incoming was fierce. We took cover in our bunker, the last full standing fortification. As we crowded in this twelve-foot cube, ten feet underground, an enemy artillery shell hit. The NVA bunker buster artillery shell exploded and collapsed the left rear corner of the bunker, burying Wally and me alive. The only thing that kept us alive and from being crushed to death was the homemade bunk beds we took cover under. It took the guys hours to dig us out. When you dig for men, you dig slowly so you don't cut them in half with the shovels and picks. It was hard work clearing the sandbags, ammo cans, old 40mm brass and runway matting off our bunkers roof. Wally was lucky and only had small cuts and lots of black and blues. My left leg had been partially pulled out of its hip socket and had turned purple, red and blue. I had black eyes, fat lips and a flattened nose. I must have been in shock because it didn't hurt and I didn't remember much. At the aid station the guys held me down as the Doc pulled my leg back into place. It hurt like hell and I passed out. The good old Doc gave me a bottle of that military cure all pill, the APC's (all purpose capsule – aspirins), and sent me back to my position.

Later in life I would suffer from blood circulation damage, a bad back, and numb legs. My men gave me the day off. Mother Earth under our Duster would become our home. I watched as my men slowly removed about five feet off the remaining top portion of our bunker. Hundreds of enemy artillery shells pounded the area around our position. Hell would have been a better place to live. My men slept in the fetal position as if hoping to return to the womb and get a new chance at life. I couldn't take it any more and ordered the bunker to be leveled by C-4. I didn't want anymore of the men in my charge to die from exposure to the enemy artillery. We all started praying with Earl.

The only thing we left was the three-sided earthen parapet for the Dusters, Quad-50's, and Ontos. We slowly moved our clean-up crew toward the east end of the runway. Our Duster would accompany us as a portable artillery shelter and bunker. We eventually rendezvoused with Steve Harris's crew at the other end of the runway. Most of the Marines had already left the base. Our Duster crews and a hand full of Marines guarded the entire length of the north side of the old runway area. It was July 2nd and the mighty Khe Sanh was no more, reduced to a flat plateau with a small group of America's best guarding her.

We frequently moved the Duster to different locations all day, so the NVA artillery could not get a fix on us. Our Dusters were giant silhouettes on a barren plain, the biggest targets left standing on Khe Sanh. Each evening to keep the NVA in check, we continued the Vietnam tradition of shooting from the camp perimeter. Some called it "Mad Minutes." I called it a "Moment of Madness." The Dusters twin 40's cleared the perimeter nightly of any NVA hoping to get close to the base until we could leave for good.

July 4: The day for old glory was spent watching the choppers speed across the base, trailing different colored smoke grenades. This was hopefully our last night at the infamous base. The NVA, who always seemed to have good intelligence, knew this was their last chance to shoot at Khe Sanh. The constant incoming, eventually without my knowledge, fried my brain. July 4th would take on a whole new meaning. Fourth of July fireworks became my Achilles Heel. My family and friends joke at my involuntary twitching and my fast departure from our country's yearly display of freedom.

My family thinks it's the explosive of the fire-works that makes me anxious. I try to explain to them that fireworks are like Dusters shooting. Everything starts real slow, a few bursts here and a few there. There's lots of white, as if the enemy is probing the wire and we're popping flares for illumination with smoke trails floating away in the breeze. Then come a few big explosions, and then a few more; followed by lots of whistling ones and colorful ones. A noise rises from the crowd as both sides start screaming their "oohs" and "aahs." Explosion after explosion, momentum building and building, to the grand finale, then comes the final push from the enemy. There's a final human wave rushing at you, with guns blazing as if they were special ground effects. The crew of the Duster, holding fast in their turret, wait and wait; waiting patiently for that terrifying moment, the heart stopper of every war when the "enemy is in the wire." The Duster on full auto-fire becomes the grand finale, shooting 240 high-explosive cannon shells a minute at point blank toward the advancing enemy. Shells rip them to shreds, exploding in front of you like giant red paint-balls. Each round is followed to its target by the burning tracer of death in its tail. Explosion after explosion can be heard, followed by the roar of war - giving witness, to your day of killing. Like the fourth of July, it ends as fast as it started; and the only thing left is the smell of sulfur and that quiet calm.

July 5: Marine Unit 2/1 had departed Khe Sanh in the middle of the night. I was shocked when I checked the perimeter and found no Marines. Nobody told us they were leaving. I radioed the other Duster to stay on 100% alert. It was eerie looking through our Starlight Scope and seeing no Marines manning their respective positions. LT Dan was radioing everyone for assistance and help. Nobody came or helped.

July 6: The last few troops from Khe Sanh were loaded on trucks and convoyed back to LZ Stud. Steve Harris and our LT Dan took out the first convoy. I was asked to be the rear security on that last small convoy. It was a terrible feeling seeing everyone on that last convoy standing in their vehicles, taking that last look, at what was once Khe Sanh. A Marine officer asked if we could drive around the abandoned base looking for stragglers. The Marines, who were short on radios, were afraid that all their men did not get the word to leave. As we drove around the base, the NVA artillery gave us their final good-byes. So as not to be caught in the NVA artillery, I instructed the last convoy to leave the base and that we would catch up. I told my men to take a good look and say their personal good-byes, because we were the last Americans to leave the mighty Khe Sanh. We were even nutty enough to stop and take a few pictures and make some personal comments about leaving. Standing on the Duster, we each paid a silent homage to our stay at the famous "red clay". The NVA artillery was getting closer and heavier. It was time to catch up to the convoy. I told Earl to put it in high gear; it was time to go home. It was going to be good to get back to Camp Carroll--hot food, showers and seeing our old friends. We had been gone for almost four months.

While at Khe Sanh, I forgot that Steve Harris and I were still on the top of someone's shit list. We would only get as far as LZ Stud, the next combat base. Harris took the north side of the camp, and we had the higher southern slope. We were issued a tent, cots, shovels and picks. An officer I did not know told us to make this our permanent position. The officer ordered us to dig and build a bunker. After we finished, we could get rid of the tent.

The ground was so hard that, after a week of digging, we had a hole only about a foot deep and ten feet square. My men, who had already helped fill in by hand an area about a half-mile square at Khe Sanh, refused to dig anymore. Instead, we helped each other make shallow, individual little graves. The graves were surrounded with sandbags and rocks. During incoming, we would lie in our graves and pray. The ground was so hard on this hill that it was impossible to dig any deeper than a foot. We started to scavenge each day for building material so we could build our own above ground bunker. The bunker would never be built and we really didn't give a shit.

LZ Stud gave me the opportunity to visit with two of my hometown friends who were in the Marines, John Paulus and Leon Rejman. It was good to talk of home and seeing old friends. Years later, Leon would die from Agent Orange related cancer. I recently gave his sister, Stella, some old pictures of us from Nam. John opened his own restaurant in Asbury, N.J., a fabulous place with great food and service.

The Grim Reaper was back on the "Road", running from LZ Stud (Calu) to the Rockpile. Ambush Alley was still holding true to its name. The rear deck of our Duster again became stained burnt umber, and smelled of burning flesh from our hot exhausts. We returned daily to our shitty little tent, now riddled with shrapnel holes. It became a different existence because we had no means of illumination. There were no candles, no burning homemade gaslights, and no electricity. We occasionally lit a candle to see inside the tent. Someone always yelled: "Lights out, keep it low, keep it down." Maybe someone cared if we got killed. We surely didn't give a rat's ass anymore. Our inner core was drained, running on a reserve of pure hostility and hate.

August 5: We arrive back at Camp Carroll at lunchtime. We had not had a real hot meal since Christmas. Our first stop was the mess hall. We had been gone from Carroll so long we felt like strangers. True to our reputation we pushed to the front and ate first. Our first stop "MILK". Our new position was called the "Water Point" and was situated to the right of the main gate leading into camp. I was now a short timer and scheduled to leave Charlie Battery, 1st/44th around August 13. Earl, Wally, and I openly discussed having Earl become the new squad leader. George would become the driver, and they would get a new gun bunny. As the days passed, I became very uneasy about leaving. I had trained my men to the best of my ability, but I was not sure if that was good enough. I thought about re-upping. My insides churned with mixed emotions about going home.

Will they all make it home? It wasn't that I was leaving that made me restless. We had lived and breathed and fought as one unit. To this day I am sure that we were the best in all the ADA. I hoped that the "newbee" coming to my crew would not let my men down and rise to the occasion.

My last day at Camp Carroll was spent in the look-out tower next to the water point. It had been a long year and the view from the high tower sort of put things in perspective. It was my time to leave the DMZ. Captain Tedesco, to my surprise, asked me for my personal night vision Star Light Scope.

"Belardo, I don't need to know where you got that scope, and I'm not sure if I really want to know how you got it, but I want it," he said. Someone was still squealing on me. "Captain, my boys can't shoot gooks in the dark if you take our scope," I replied. We both smiled and laughed. Tedesco joked and said, "Joe, all of us can now take turns shooting gooks in the dark. It's time for you to go home." Captain Tedesco was a great officer. He made the difference through true leadership that was needed in a Charlie Battery captain. I knew he would look after my men. I considered him my friend, and knew my men could trust him and his combat judgment. We shook hands and patted each other's back as we said our farewells. Before I let go of Tedesco' s hand, I thanked him and reminded him about how my crew would follow him to hell and fight the devil for him. I thanked him for not sending me on the Dong Ha Mountain missions. I always felt that mountain had my name on it.

August 13: I said our traditional "So long, see you later" to my friends. I was going home. We never said goodbye; goodbye was forever and bad luck. Leaving was an unbearable mental pain. Part of me has never left Route 9. We would joke and say we knew each other "when." You can add a lot of endings to the word when. When.... nothing you held sacred was sacred anymore. When.... you thanked God you lived and another died. When.... you stopped thinking about dying. When...you stopped thinking of home. When...you (fill in the blank).

In Dong Ha, I was given my unit separation papers and casually handed another Purple Heart with masking tape holding the medal box closed. "We think this is yours, soldier," the personnel section said drolly. True to the end, my personnel files were all screwed up. I was discharged from the Army with what they call "temporary records and a Soldier's Affidavit." It took twenty years of letter writing before I was re-issued my Purple Hearts, Good Conduct Medal, and my other Unit Citations. In 1997, the Air Defense Artillery Magazine did a feature article about the January 24th ambush. Thanks to this article, John "Tank" Huelsenbeck, Earl Holt, Chester Sines, and I were awarded the Bronze Star with "V" for Valor. I had made a promise never to forget Roger Blentlinger, the Marine who risked his life for mine. I refused a medal unless Blentlinger was also awarded the same medal. It was nice that we all finally got some recognition for our service to our country. It was even a better day when I called Roger and told him he was getting an Army Medal. I made a big thing about getting the medal. I was so proud, and yet embarrassed that it came to my house via UPS. I had been told a Senator or Congressman was going to present the award, not the UPS man. What was finally going to give truth and proof to all the Vietnam stories I had told my family has remained in its shipping box?

Everyone going home from the 1/44th met at China Beach. The officers never knew that we had made pre-arrangements for one of our convoys with about twenty men from "C" Battery and Headquarters to meet us at the "Beach." Major parts and supplies had to be picked up at the Da Nang docks. It was an excuse to party for three days. China Beach was glad to get rid of us. We had taken over the whole place. All of us (Steve Harris, Frank Bardone, Larry Roundtree, John Gunesch, Noble Grinner, Wayne Bailey, Haden Waite, Paul Raymond and Ray Ellis) were singing, dancing, drinking, eating and acting twenty-four hours a day as if this was our last day on earth. "It felt great." Jim "Doc" Butler was the last to shake my hand. We said our goodbyes because this was a forever farewell, then I caught the next plane to Cam Ranh Bay. At the Cam Ranh Bay departing center they gave us a quickie debriefing and shipped us the next day to Fort Lewis, Washington. We left Vietnam singing "Summer Time and the Living is Easy" as Paul Raymond strummed his guitar. Thirty-six hours later, August 17, 1968, fitted in my new dress uniform; I got my final discharge from the Army.

As I flew home in what we called the "Freedom Bird", I could not help but think about my past year: about no electricity, just candle power, limited food (C-Rations), water rationing, hundreds of enemy artillery barrages, occasional bathing, no bathrooms, burning shit, living with the rats, scorpions and insects. I remembered every thing crawling on you in your small dark bunker many feet underground, using Agent Orange to defoliate the area around our base positions, friends wounded and dying, taking turns helping at the medical stations and graves registration, carrying the wounded, wrapping, tagging and bagging the dead and picking up the pieces, and, taking another life. GOD, IT WAS A HELL OF A YEAR.

The 1st Battalion 44th Artillery was one of the highest decorated combat units in Vietnam. It earned the Army Presidential Unit Citation, Army Valorous Unit Award, Army Meritorious Unit Commendation, Navy (Marine) Presidential Unit Citation, Navy (Marine) Meritorious Unit Commendation, The Republic of Vietnam Cross of Gallantry with Palm, and The Republic of Vietnam Civil Action Honor Medal.

I ironically had to take the last step of my journey home in a helicopter from JFK to Newark airport. On August 18, 4:59 PM, I emerged as a civilian, still dressed in military clothes, from the shuttle helicopter at Newark Airport, NJ. My family, girlfriend, and about thirty relatives and friends greeted me. I was surprised about how frightened I was about getting off the chopper. I could see them screaming, yelling and crying. I had changed and did not want them to know. It would break their hearts. I never wanted them to know the other Joe Belardo. After a few restless minutes, the pilot told me it was time to go. Like nothing ever happened, I fixed my hat, straightened my tie, put on my shades, took my last deep breath, and stepped out of the chopper to meet my family. My father was the first to meet me. We just stared at each other. We both knew the price of war, he fought in the Battle of the Bulge and we did not need to speak. He extended his one hand to me and just said, "Well." I removed from my wallet his small red religious scapula he had carried in WWII and placed it in his hand and thanked him. "You can have this back when I die," Dad said softly. He hugged me tight and kissed my cheeks and cried. "Now go say hello to your mother, Brenda, Kenny, Nancy and the rest of the family." I was fortunate, my homecoming was wonderful. I was loved and had forgotten how good it felt.

When we arrived at our house, my father had placed a banner on the front lawn that said WELCOME HOME SON. I came home in time for the Labor Day parade. The local newspaper asked to do an article about my tour in Nam. The parade was in my name, and I rode with the mayor in his Cadillac convertible. It was a great homecoming. The following month my parents had to make their telephone number unlisted. The twenty-four hour a day calls never ended. Nameless voices yelling, "Baby burner – child killer – rapist – bastard – village burner – war monger," and a hundred other terrible names. My mother cried, and my father questioned my tour. I was never so sad. The war was bad enough. I thought what we read in the papers was journalistic bullshit. I was wrong. My fellow countrymen hurt me more then I can ever express. For years if I were introduced to someone as a Vietnam vet, the reply would be a single expressive word "Oh." I always wondered what that "Oh" meant. That little word cut me like a knife. Life has its ups and downs. Vietnam filled them both. To this day, I tell everyone that I was "A DUSTERMAN," one of the "LAST GREAT GUNFIGHTERS" and damn proud of it.

Over twenty years would pass before I spoke to an officer from 1st/44TH. Out of the blue, I had this overwhelming urge to talk to them. I had to tell them I understood. They would know what I meant. I wanted to thank him for getting me home. Maybe without any of us knowing it, they gave us that inner drive to make it home. They had signed my New Jersey flag I flown on the DMZ and added their hometowns. After three calls, I was talking to Lt Harden's mother. I was amazed. She knew who I was. She told me the now Lieutenant Colonel Harden would love to talk with me. I called the old lieutenant the next day, and we spoke on the phone for almost three hours. Like magic, speaking with him released my mind and soul from years of hate. It was time for my mind to lock the other me deep in the back of my brain and get on with my life. Talking to him was great. He gave me, the now Colonel Vincent Tedesco's home telephone number at Fort Bliss, Texas. My good ole Captain couldn't believe it was me. We spoke for hours. We all met that year at a military reunion at Fort Bliss. The hugs, tears and stories were the best. The reunion helped us all bury a lot of demons

HEALTH TIP

I was watching the tube tonight and found out that Tiger Woods lost his father to diabetes and prostate cancer. He was a Vietnam Veteran. That doesn't surprise me. Why? Because these problems as well as liver problems, are epidemic among us. It doesn't make any difference whom, or how well known, we are. This type thing has been going on for a long time. So you guys who have not seen a doctor for a long time had better keep looking over your shoulder.

VIETNAM

Such a beautiful land, with green mountains, until the war came,
and left it with bomb craters and blood stains,
The grass so green, the blood so red,
The skies so blue, and so many dead,
We left it, with not a tree standing in places, as we sprayed poison on the trees,
where is thy reward for such deeds?
To run out in the end, with the job un-done, to give up, what was hard fought for and won,
In a world of pain and sin, where does one begin, or end?
with the burdens of life,
or the children's sake?
Where their lives were at stake, precious little one's,
caught in the cross fire,
of the seen and un-seen,
where they did also bleed,
as a result of mans deeds,
Oh come oh Lord,
to settle such things, that all war brings,
broken dreams, broken hearts, and give our world a new start.
Amen

Red Clay to Ramadi and Back

By Dave Kniess

My friends returned to 29 Palms last night after their 3rd tour in Iraq. It was pretty awesome to see them all again. I'm glad they made it home alive. Before they had left, I handed each one of them a small 35mm film container filled with red clay I had scooped up from the combat base in 2000. A sort of good luck charm. Cpl. Mark Dean told me last night that he and some of the others would smear a little bit of that red clay on his arm before every patrol. The spirit of Khe Sanh was in Ramadi for the past 7 months.
I thought you'd all want to know that.

The Lost Patrol

They left the wire
Looking forward to return.
They were not the first
And, God knows, not the last.
It was just a look,
A quick look,
To see what Charles still had.
And they found out
They certainly did, and
That little knowledge
Was a dangerous thing.
They were not the first to die
And, God knows, not the last.
Laying like sprawled children
Gazing at a star filled sky
Until their brothers came
To take them home.

HEROES of the VIETNAM Generation

By James Webb

The rapidly disappearing cohort of Americans that endured the Great Depression and then fought World War II is receiving quite a send-off from the leading lights of the so-called 60s generation. Tom Brokaw has published two oral histories of "The Greatest Generation" that feature ordinary people doing their duty and suggest that such conduct was historically unique. Chris Matthews of "Hardball" is fond of writing columns praising the Navy service of his father while castigating his own baby boomer generation for its alleged softness and lack of struggle. William Bennett gave a startlingly condescending speech at the Naval Academy a few years ago comparing the heroism of the "D-Day Generation" to the drugs-and-sex nihilism of the "Woodstock Generation." And Steven Spielberg, in promoting his film Saving Private Ryan, was careful to justify his portrayals of soldiers in action based on the supposedly unique nature of World War II. An irony is at work here.

Lest we forget, the World War II generation now being lionized also brought us the Vietnam War, a conflict which today's most conspicuous voices by and large opposed, and in which few of them served. The best and brightest" of the Vietnam age group once made headlines by castigating their parents for bringing about the war in which they would not fight, which has become the war they refuse to remember. Pundits back then invented a term for this animus: the "generation gap." Long, plaintive articles and even books were written examining its manifestations. Campus leaders, who claimed precocious wisdom through the magical process of reading a few controversial books, urged fellow baby boomers not to trust anyone over 30. Their elders who had survived the Depression and fought the largest war in history were looked down upon as shallow, materialistic, and out of touch. Those of us who grew up on the other side of the picket line from that eras counter-culture can't help but feel a little leery of this sudden gush of appreciation for our elders from the leading lights of the old counter-culture.

Then and now, the national conversation has proceeded from the dubious assumption that those who came of age during Vietnam are a unified generation in the same sense as their parents were, and thus are capable of being spoken for through these fickle elites. In truth, the "Vietnam generation" is a misnomer. Those who came of age during that war are permanently divided by different reactions to a whole range of counter-cultural agendas, and nothing divides them more deeply than the personal ramifications of the war itself. The sizable portion of the Vietnam age group who declined to support the counter-cultural agenda, and especially the men and women who opted to serve in the military during the Vietnam War, are quite different from their peers who for decades have claimed to speak for them. In fact, they are much like the World War II generation itself. For them, Woodstock was a sideshow; college protestors were spoiled brats who would have benefited from having to work a few jobs in order to pay their tuition, and Vietnam represented not an intellectual exercise in draft avoidance or protest marches but a battlefield that was just as brutal as those their fathers faced in World War II and Korea. Few who served during Vietnam ever complained of a generation gap. The men who fought World War II were their heroes and role models. They honored their father's service by emulating it, and largely agreed with their father's wisdom in attempting to stop Communisms reach in Southeast Asia. The most accurate poll of their attitudes (Harris, 1980) showed that 91 percent were glad they'd served their country, 74 percent enjoyed their time in the service, and 89 percent agreed with the statement "our troops were asked to fight in a war which our political leaders in Washington would not let them win." And most importantly, the castigation they received upon returning home was not from the World War II generation, but from the very elites in their age group who supposedly spoke for them.

Nine million men served in the military during the Vietnam War, three million of whom went to the Vietnam Theater. Contrary to popular mythology, two-thirds of these were volunteers, and 73 percent of those who died were volunteers. While some attention has been paid recently to the plight of our prisoners of war, most of who were pilots, there has been little recognition of how brutal the war was for those who fought it on the ground. Dropped onto the enemy's terrain 12,000 miles away from home, America's citizen-soldiers performed with a tenacity and quality that may never be truly understood. Those who believe the war was fought incompetently on a tactical level should consider Hanoi's recent admission that 1.4 million of its soldiers died on the battlefield, compared to 58,000 total U.S. dead.

Those who believe that it was a "dirty little war" where the bombs did all the work might contemplate that it was the most costly war the U.S. Marine Corps has ever fought five times as many dead as World War I, three times as many dead as in Korea, and more total killed and wounded than in all of World War II. Significantly, these sacrifices were being made at a time the United States was deeply divided over our effort in Vietnam. The baby-boom generation had cracked apart along class lines as America's young men were making difficult, life-or-death choices about serving. The better academic institutions became focal points for vitriolic protest against the war, with few of their graduates going into the military. Harvard College, which had lost 691 alumni in World War II, lost a total of 12 men in Vietnam from the classes of 1962 through 1972 combined. Those classes at Princeton lost six, at MIT two. The media turned ever more hostile. And frequently the reward for a young mans having gone through the trauma of combat was to be greeted by his peers with studied indifference or outright hostility. What is a hero? My heroes are the young men who faced the issues of war and possible death, and then weighed those concerns against obligations to their country. Citizen-soldiers who interrupted their personal and professional lives at their most formative stage, in the timeless phrase of the Confederate Memorial in Arlington National Cemetery, "not for fame or reward, not for place or for rank, but in simple obedience to duty, as they understood it." Who suffered loneliness, disease, and wounds with an often-contagious élan? And who deserve a far better place in history than that now offered them by the so-called spokesmen of our so-called generation. Mr. Brokaw, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Spielberg, meet my Marines.

1969 was an odd year to be in Vietnam. Second only to 1968 in terms of American casualties, it was the year made famous by Hamburger Hill, as well as the gut-wrenching Life cover story showing the pictures of 242 Americans who had been killed in one average week of fighting. Back home, it was the year of Woodstock, and of numerous anti-war rallies that culminated in the Moratorium march on Washington. The My Lai massacre hit the papers and was seized upon by the anti-war movement as the emblematic moment of the war. Lyndon Johnson left Washington in utter humiliation. Richard Nixon entered the scene, destined for an even worse fate. In the An Hoa Basin southwest of Da Nang, the Fifth Marine Regiment was in its third year of continuous combat operations.

Combat is an unpredictable and inexact environment, but we were well led. As a rifle platoon and company commander, I served under a succession of three regimental commanders who had cut their teeth in World War II, and four different battalion commanders, three of whom had seen combat in Korea. The company commanders were typically captains on their second combat tour in Vietnam, or young first lieutenants like myself who were given companies after many months of "bush time" as platoon commanders in the Basins tough and unforgiving environs. The Basin was one of the most heavily contested areas in Vietnam, its torn, cratered earth offering every sort of wartime possibility. In the mountains just to the west, not far from the Ho Chi Minh Trail, the North Vietnamese Army operated an infantry division from an area called Base Area 112. In the valleys of the Basin, main-force Viet Cong battalions whose ranks were 80 percent North Vietnamese Army regulars moved against the Americans every day.

Local Viet Cong units sniped and harassed. Ridgelines and paddy dikes were laced with sophisticated booby traps of every size, from a hand grenade to a 250-pound bomb. The villages sat in the rice paddies and tree lines like individual fortresses, criss-crossed with trenches and spider holes, their homes sporting bunkers capable of surviving direct hits from large-caliber artillery shells. The Viet Cong infrastructure was intricate and permeating. Except for the old and the very young, villagers who did not side with the Communists had either been killed or driven out to the government-controlled enclaves near Da Nang. In the rifle companies we spent the endless months patrolling ridgelines and villages and mountains, far away from any notion of tents, barbed wire, hot food, or electricity. Luxuries were limited to what would fit inside ones pack, which after a few "humps" usually boiled down to letter-writing material, towel, soap, toothbrush, poncho liner, and a small transistor radio. We moved through the boiling heat with 60 pounds of weapons and gear, causing a typical Marine to drop 20 percent of his body weight while in the bush. When we stopped we dug chest-deep fighting holes and slit trenches for toilets. We slept on the ground under makeshift poncho hootches, and when it rained we usually took our hootches down because wet ponchos shined under illumination flares, making great targets. Sleep itself was fitful, never more than an hour or two at a stretch for months at a time as we mixed daytime patrolling with night-time ambushes, listening posts, foxhole duty, and radio watches. Ringworm, hookworm, malaria, and dysentery were common, as was trench foot when the monsoons came. Respite was rotating back to the mud-filled regimental combat base at An Hoa for four or five days, where rocket and mortar attacks were frequent and our troops manned defensive bunkers at night. Which makes it kind of hard to get excited about tales of Woodstock, or camping at the Vineyard during summer break.

We had been told while in training that Marine officers in the rifle companies had an 85 percent probability of being killed or wounded, and the experience of "Dying Delta," as our company was known, bore that out. Of the officers in the bush when I arrived, our company commander was wounded, the weapons platoon commander was wounded, the first platoon commander was killed, the second platoon commander was wounded twice, and I, commanding the third platoon, was wounded twice. The enlisted troops in the rifle platoons fared no better. Two of my original three squad leaders were killed, the third shot in the stomach. My platoon sergeant was severely wounded, as was my right guide. By the time I left my platoon I had gone through six radio operators, five of them casualties. These figures were hardly unique; in fact, they were typical. Many other units for instance, those who fought the hill battles around Khe Sanh, or were with the famed Walking Dead of the Ninth Marine Regiment, or were in the battle for Hue City or at Dai Do had it far worse. When I remember those days and the very young men who spent them with me, I am continually amazed, for these were mostly recent civilians barely out of high school, called up from the cities and the farms to do their year in Hell and then return.

Visions haunt me every day, not of the nightmares of war but of the steady consistency with which my Marines faced their responsibilities, and of how uncomplaining most of them were in the face of constant danger. The salty, battle-hardened 20-year-olds teaching green 19-year-olds the intricate lessons of that hostile battlefield. The unerring skill of the young squad leaders as we moved through unfamiliar villages and weed-choked trails in the black of night. The quick certainty with which they moved when coming under enemy fire. Their sudden tenderness when a fellow Marine was wounded and needed help. Their willingness to risk their lives to save other Marines in peril. To this day it stuns me that their own countrymen have so completely missed the story of their service, lost in the bitter confusion of the war itself. Like every military unit throughout history we had occasional laggards, cowards, and complainers. But in the aggregate these Marines were the finest people I have ever been around. It has been my privilege to keep up with many of them over the years since we all came home. One finds in them very little bitterness about the war in which they fought. The most common regret, almost to a man, is that they were not able to do more for each other and for the people they came to help. It would be redundant to say that I would trust my life to these men. Because I already have, in more ways than I can ever recount. I am alive today because of their quiet, unaffected heroism. Such valor epitomizes the conduct of Americans at war from the first days of our existence. That the boomer elites can canonize this sort of conduct in our father's generation while ignoring it in our own is more than simple oversight. It is a conscious, continuing travesty.

Former Secretary of the Navy James Webb was awarded the Navy Cross, Silver Star, and Bronze Star medals for heroism as a Marine in Vietnam. His novels include The Emperor's General and Fields of Fire.

SHORT ROUNDS

A Simple Thank You

By Craig W. Tourte

I receive lots of emails from various friends and acquaintances. A lot of the messages are jokes and various stories that I in-turn, share with others, and most are pretty funny. Occasionally I get something that just kind of kicks me in the gut. It just seems that the older I get the easier it is for something to draw moisture to my eyes and tears down my cheeks. I am not really sure what it is; perhaps I just have the time now to think about life and appreciate just a littler more the sacrifices made by others. I am especially drawn to those who sacrificed everything, to those who gave all of what little they had.

A friend sent this email to me this evening and I thought I would share it with you. It was one of those stories I was talking about, you know, the one that brings tears to my eyes. ?

Last week, while traveling to Chicago on business, I noticed a Marine Sergeant traveling with a folded flag, but did not put two and two together. After we'd boarded our flight, I turned to the Sergeant, who'd been invited to sit in First Class (and seated across from me), and inquired if he was heading home. "No," he responded. "Heading out?" I asked. "No, I'm escorting a soldier home." "Going to pick him up?' "No, he is with me right now. He was killed in Iraq. I'm taking him home to his family."

The realization of what he had been asked to do hit me like a punch to the gut. It was an honor for him. He told me that, although he didn't know the soldier, he had delivered the news of his passing to the soldier's family and felt as if he did know them after so many conversations in so few days. I turned back to him, extended my hand, and said: "Thank you. Thank you for doing what you do so my family and I can do what we do." Upon landing in Chicago the pilot stopped short of the gate and made the following announcement over the intercom.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to note that we have had the honor of having Sergeant Steeley of the United States Marine Corps join us on a flight. He is escorting a fallen comrade back home to his family. I ask that you please remain in your seats when we open the forward door (so as to) allow Sergeant Steeley to deplane and receive his fellow soldier. We will then turn off the seat belt sign."

Without a sound, all went as requested. I noticed the Sergeant saluting the casket as it was brought off the plane, and his actions made me realize that I am proud to be an American. So here's a public thank-you to our military for doing what you do so we can live the way we do.

WEB BRIEFS

A Dangerous Place

By Craig W. Tourte

Although my personal knowledge of the Marine Corps Combat Base at Khe Sanh is limited to the period of time I was there from August 1967 to April or May 1968, as I look back it seems like I was there forever. To this day certain experiences remain vivid in my memory and dreams. I have read extensively about the events of the Siege and have spoken to numerous individuals who were there with me. Each recalls a somewhat different, yet similar experience to mine.

While the Military Occupational Specialties (MOS) varied, I am sure that 0311 (Infantry) made up the majority of those on the base and surrounding hills. It makes sense that most causalities were to those who held the MOS of an infantryman or a related combat specialty. By more than one account, there were from 5,000 to 6,000 men at Khe Sanh in late 1967.This number includes the hills and various other locations around the immediate vicinity of the base. That would seem to be a fair amount of military personnel, at least by Marine Corps standards. But, regardless of the exact number of U.S. and allied personal at Khe Sanh, it is generally accepted that the number of NVA troops in the area was somewhere between 20,000 to 40,000.

I don't know the ratio of 0311's to other MOS's on the base, but there were certainly many different and varied military specialties present among the Marine, Army, Navy and Air Force personnel. Cook's, truck drivers, office clerks, engineers, Seabees, medical personnel, electricians, mechanics, wiremen, artillery, forward observers, graves registration, supply, radar, fork lift drivers, heavy equipment operators, air traffic controllers, tanks, supporting arms (50s and twin 40s). There might be more. To look at those present, you could not tell one from the other. We all looked the same. Everyone carried his individual weapon wherever he went. Red stained ratty green uniform, tired, scared, skinny and exhausted, grunt, clerk and cook. Each MOS took casualties and all faced the same dangers. We had our time in the V ring. No job was easier than the other.

Tom Horchler was a truck driver with H.Q. 1/13 who risked his life daily, taking incoming while he drove his truck to the dump, hauled water, C rations, sandbags, or artillery shells from the landing strip to the guns. He picked up the dead and gently transported their bodies to Grave Registration. He was a moving, exposed, high value target every day. He Had no trench, armor, sandbags or overhead to protect him. He was unable to hear the rounds leaving the guns of the enemy, unable to run, hide or even hope. All he had was luck and a prayer. He also spent the night standing guard in the trench line waiting for the attack that we all felt was coming. Tom knew he had a dangerous job. No one had to tell him it was dangerous and no one had to thank him for his effort in supporting them. It was the job the Marine Corps gave him. It was just as valuable, necessary and dangerous as any other. There were many at Khe Sanh just like Tom Horchler, not an 0311, but a Marine doing his job which was just as dangerous, just a dirty and just as necessary as the rest of the jobs that had to be done.

Donald Saunders was a 20-year-old Marine from Newark, New Jersey. He had a couple of young sons back home and loved Motown music. He often spoke of his love for his boys, mother and father, his sister, as well as the many friends he had back home. He was well liked and seldom complained about the danger of incoming and the deplorable conditions. Like most of us at Khe Sanh, Donald just did his job the best he could. Donald Saunders was a cook (3371), not foodservice, rear area support, not in the rear with the gear, but just a cook with H.Q. 1/13. He went where and how they went and lived like everyone else did at Khe Sanh while doing any number of jobs not necessarily related to his MOS. Donald Saunders was killed at Khe Sanh on March 14, 1968 when a mortar fell from the afternoon sky while Donald was helping others reinforce their bunker. Donald's father said: "Since he had to leave this world, I'm glad he left it the way he did, with courage and fighting for his country."

At Khe Sanh we were all the same and it did not matter what MOS the military had given us. There was no safe place, no place to rest, hide or sleep.No place safer than another. We were all the same at Khe Sanh no matter the MOS, officer, enlisted or civilian contractor. We all shared in the danger equally and our causalities reflected our presence. I think there were many like Tom Horchler and Donald Saunders at Khe Sanh. Young Marines who did their duty while fighting every day trying to stay alive with courage and for their country.

I certainly recognize the difference between those of you who went outside the wire and those of us who did not. I have had many conversations with my good friend Steve Wiese who walks around this earth with a halo over him and who is apparently wrapped in the arms of the Lord. I have sat spell bound as Steve related his experiences on the hills, on the ghost patrol with Bravo, the March 30 patrol and why he decided to return to Vietnam for another tour of duty. Other experiences Steve says were more dangerous than what he had experienced during the Siege of Khe Sanh.

I have listened to Mike Powers of Delta relate how he assisted those who returned from the Ghost Patrol and of his many assaults against the enemy. I have even had a conversation with Mike's point man who told me how Mike saved his life after he was wounded.

I have talked with Chuck Chamberlin about his experience on the hills and how he survived both direct hits on Charlie Company's CP bunkers. He is still haunted by visions he has of the blood running down the deck of the medical tent in Dong Ha.

I have listened to Neil relate his experiences. I watch, listen and learn.

I did not fix my bayonet. I did not participate in a charging attack or look into the eyes of our enemy. My combat experience is much smaller and limited. But, I did show up and survive for eight months and the seventy seven day Siege at the Khe Sanh Combat Base. There are more heroes than I can ever mention. I don't feel like one of them. No one has more respect for the grunts and the job they did than those of us who stayed behind the wire. It was not because we wanted to, but because that was just our jobs. Believe me, a lot of we REMFS wanted to go along with the grunts, but we did what we were told and stayed behind.

But I, I believe that recognition is deserved for our efforts in being there, suffering, bravery, standing fast, being wounded, and, yes for dying whether it was inside or outside the wire at Khe Sanh, or, any other location. We were who we were. We cannot change the story or our experiences. Above all, we were just Marines and please don't thank us for our "support."

Ed Note: Craig throw away your guilt. We ALL "just" did the task given us.

By John Rowland

Craig. Your observation is very good. To look at anyone who had been at Khe Sanh during the siege, you probably could not tell what MOS they were. Everyone was exposed to the same dangers both real and speculative, but the only area of difference that I can see was that the grunts were the only ones going outside the wire along with F/O and Recon. No one was in any less danger inside the wire than anyone else. I have said to many, that as bad as Khe Sanh was, after we left, I wished many a time to have been back instead of where we went...just my humble opinion only...Semper Fi....proud to have served with everyone at Khe Sanh...just a grunt..Delta 1/26 67-68

Craig. That was wonderful. You really have a way with words. You always seem to get everything just right. Thank you so much. S/F

REMEMBERANCE OF THOSE WHO LIVED AND DIED AT KHE SANH "THE SIEGE" (OCT. 9, 1968)

Mike Fishbaugh found this very interesting article published in the February Issue of Leatherneck Magazine, regarding a ceremony held at Khe Sanh many months after, the Siege.

"This article appeared in the Feb 69 issue. Military officials called it, "Continuing Operations in the Scotland II area". The press called it "The Return to Khe Sanh"

Members of the Fourth and Twelfth Marines wanted to know, "Who ever left?", "These Marines had still been operating in the Khe Sanh Basin since the end of the siege that began January 20,1968, lasted until the end of March, and cost more than a thousand American casualties.

Batteries of the 12th Marines had artillery sites on several of the mountains surrounding the basin, and the 4th Marines had operated continuously in that area from early April (68) until the Memorial Services on that airstrip Oct 9,1969.

Nomenclature differences aside, the fact is that after several days of operation, a memorial service was held on Khe Sanh airstrip to honor the Marines who fell during that bloody bombardment.

The operation leading to the Khe Sanh ceremony began , when elements of the Third Engineers, India Battery, 3/12 and Kilo, 3/4, along with helicopters, combined forces to set up a fire support base, named NAN KING, at the rock quarry about a half-a-mile from the strip.

The next day the 4th Marines began sweeps from several areas toward the strip. There was almost no contact, and few caches were found. Apparently the enemy hadn't been using that terrain to any great extent.

At 0630, Oct 9, elements of Kilo Company, led by Capt Sid Thomas, left Nan King to sweep the road leading from the fire support base to the airstrip.

This part of the operation was also uneventful. An hour later the troops finished their sweep, and set up a perimeter defense around part of the strip. Artillery and strike planes worked over the ridge lines with their ordnance, and then dignitaries began arriving.

The 3rd Marine Division Band landed on the strip first, followed by generals, regimental and battalion commanders, an ARVN platoon, and about 2 squads of the press corps. Engineers set up two flagpoles for the ceremony-others checked a sound system, and Kilo security forces watched apprehensively as helicopters set down on the airstrip and shut down their engines. They felt that if there was one tube, one mortar round and one enemy Soldier left in the basin, this would draw the round like a magnet. But the Marines had done their work well during the operation. The hour-long ceremony was uninterrupted.
By SSgt Herb Richardson

There was another report on the ceremony on 14 October 1969, in the Pacific Stars & Stripes Newspaper, with a few more details of the event.

From Stars & Stripes

EX-FOE JOINS HONOR TO KHE SANH DEAD

The American and South Vietnamese flags once more were raised over the KSCB Wednesday, Oct 09, 1969, honoring Allied dead who fell during the longest siege of the Vietnam War.

A former North Vietnamese soldier who fought American Marines during the 77 day battle stood stiffly at attention and saluted as honor groups slowing raised the flags at the North end of Khe Sanh's 3,000 foot long runway.

As a North Vietnamese soldier, Sergeant Nguyea Trung Thung had crawled within yards of the Khe Sanh perimeter before being wounded in a B-52 raid in February. He later defected to the South Vietnamese Government.

Wednesday, he paid his last respects to those who perished , and those that were wounded at Khe Sanh. The Marines, in full battle gear formed an honor guard on either side of both flag poles.

A chaplain read the Lord's Prayer and other selected passages from the Bible. Sergeant Hubert Day, from Chattanooga Tn., sounded Taps.

The ceremony was interrupted several times by loud explosions over the mountains to the North, as nearby allied gunners kept firing. The North Vietnamese did not fire a single round into Khe Sanh, since the return of the Allies.

In contrast, they fired over a thousand rounds a day during the height of the siege. As the service continued, Marines stood silhouetted on the skyline acting as security guards.

A few thousand yards away, two regiments of Marines and south Vietnamese troops searched the jungle for NVA and supplies. Lieutenant David Tuckwiller, from Charleston WV, who was a platoon commander at Khe Sanh, also attended the ceremony. " It was really quiet today," he said " Everyone was talking in whispers, it was not like that during the Siege".

Frank Noe served with Charlie Company 11th Engineers, and was an integral part of the memorial service, written about in Leatherneck Magazine & the Pacific Stars and stripes in 1969. He contacted Mike Fishbaugh and graciously donated the following Photographs of that ceremony and a short story of his participation.

Hi, Mike, I was with 11Th. Engineers C company, 3rd Marine Division and in country Nov.67-1968-July 1969. My first time at Khe Sanh was January,1968. We were the last ones to get out of Khe Sanh and made it back to the Rock Pile only to be surrounded again. Two weeks later we finally made it back to Dong Ha. We then returned to Khe Sanh in October of 1969 with 3/4 to again raise our Colors and the Vietnam colors, in a tribute to those killed and wounded at Khe Sanh during the siege.

After the choppers dropped us off we were supposed to hook-up with a Platoon from K Company, 3/4. We had trouble contacting them on the radio. We spotted an antenna in the bush. So I crawled in that direction and found a good sized bomb crater full of fellow Marines sound asleep, including the Lt. With The radio in the center. I left the Regiment and Battalion out. (True Story) I am sending you photos of that ceremony, and a aerial photo of the Airstrip.

The Marine Sniper & the Reporter

The Monsters and the Weak
The sun beat like a hammer, not a cloud was in the sky.
The mid-day air ran thick with dust, my throat was parched and dry.
With microphone clutched tight in hand and cameraman in tow,
I ducked beneath a fallen roof, surprised to hear "stay low".

My eyes blinked several times before in shadow I could see the figure stretched across the rubble, steps away from me.
He wore a cloak of burlap strips, all shades of gray and brown, that hung in tatters till it seemed he melted into the ground.

He never turned his head or took his eye away from the scope, but pointed through the broken wall and down the rocky slope.
"About eight hundred yards," he said, his whispered words concise,
"beneath the baggy jacket he is wearing a device."

A chill ran up my spine despite the swelter of the heat,
"You think he's gonna set it off along the crowded street?"
The sniper gave a weary sigh and said, "I wouldn't doubt it."
"Unless there's something this old gun and I can do about it."

A thunder clap, a tongue of flame, the still abruptly shattered;
while citizens that walked the street were just as quickly scattered.
Till only one remained, a body crumpled on the ground, the threat to oh so many ended by a single round.

And yet the sniper had no cheer, no hint of any gloat, instead he pulled a logbook out and quietly he wrote.
"Hey I could put you on TV, that shot was quite a story!"
But he surprised me once again - "I got no wish for glory."

"Are you for real?" I asked in awe. "You don't want fame or credit?"
He looked at me with saddened eyes and said: "You just don't seem to get it."
"You see that shot up length of wall, the one without a door?
Before a mortar round hit, is used to be a grocery store."

"But don't go thinking that to bomb a store is all that cruel, the rubble just across the street, it used to be a school.
The little kids played soccer in the field out by the road."
His head hung low, "They never thought a car would just explode."

"As bad as all this is though, it could be a whole lot worse."
He swallowed hard, the words coming from his mouth sounding like a curse.
"Today the fight's on foreign land, on streets that aren't my own.
I'm here today 'cause if I fail, the next fight's back at home."

"I won't let my Safeway burn, with my neighbors dead inside.
I don't wanna get a call from school that says my daughter died;
I pray that not a one of them will know the things I see, nor have the work of terrorists etched in their memory."

"So you can keep your trophies and your fleeting bit of fame.
I don't care if I make the news, or if they know my name."

He glanced toward the camera and his brow began to knot,
"If you're looking for a story, why not give this one a shot?"

"Just tell the truth of what you see, without the slant or spin; that most of us are sure O.K. and we're coming home again.
And why not tell the folks back home about the good we've done, how when they see Americans, the kids come at a run."

"You tell them what it means to folks here just to speak their mind, without the fear, that tyranny is just a step behind;
Describe the desert miles they walk for their first chance to vote, or ask a soldier if he's proud, I'm sure you'll get a quote."

He turned and slid the rifle in a drag bag thickly padded, then looked up again with eyes of steel as quietly he added:
"And maybe just remind the few, if ill of us they speak.
That we are all that stands between the Monsters and the Weak."

STATE PARKS SEARCHES FOR PURPLE HEART RECIPIENTS

National Purple Heart Hall of Honor to Preserve Stories

ALBANY, NY -- (03/16/2006; 1130)(EIS) -- New York State Office of Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation Commissioner Bernadette Castro today began a nationwide search for Purple Heart medal recipients to share stories to be included in exhibits at the National Purple Heart Hall of Honor museum located at the New Windsor Cantonment State Historic Site in Vails Gate, New York. The facility will honor Purple Heart medal recipients, veterans who were wounded or killed while serving their country.

"The new National Purple Heart Hall of Honor will serve as our nation's only institution dedicated solely to recipients of the Purple Heart medal and offer visitors an incredible journey through military history across generations with a unique combination of historic resources and interactive, state-of-the-art technology," said Commissioner Castro. "Governor Pataki's commitment to preserving our heritage through this one of a kind museum will provide a destination for service men and women to share their powerful stories and poignant reminders of human sacrifice.

"This facility is a fitting tribute to the veterans who have put their lives on the line in support of freedom. I look forward to adding the details of my own family member who served in World War II at the Battle of the Bulge, and together with the information and recollections of other Purple Heart recipients and loved ones, the Hall of Honor will preserve these precious stories well into the future."

The National Purple Heart Hall of Honor is a 7,500 square foot facility that will honor recipients of the Purple Heart Medal through the development and presentation of a series of exhibitions and programs that have been created with the participation of Purple Heart recipients, their friends and families. The Hall of Honor will work with veterans and families to collect invaluable personal information on the background and service information of each recipient, the circumstances surrounding their wounding, the photographs and letters home, and copies of discharge forms or citations that document receipt of the medal. The information collected will be included in exhibits at the museum and an electronic database that will be available onsite and over the Internet for a worldwide audience.

The Hall of Honor will also include a reception area, gallery, exhibit hall, learning and education center for school groups and tours, and presentation room. Through historical photographs documentary film footage, period objects and videotaped recollections by veterans themselves, the Hall will provide a multi-media show exploring the spirit of the American people during times of crisis.

"The National Purple Heart Hall of Honor will honor the nearly two million Americans whose sacrifices have earned them the Purple Heart medal. Now more than ever, it is important to recognize the men and women in our armed forces who were wounded in battle for this country, and those who continue to serve so faithfully today," said Senator Bill Larkin, a retired Lieutenant Colonel in the United States Army. "This historic place will be a reminder of the cost of freedom. It will be a fitting tribute to our veterans and how much we value and appreciate all they have done for our country. It will bring young people especially that much closer to understanding the experience and sacrifice shared by these special veterans."

Governor Pataki has committed $4.1 million toward the planning, design and development of the Hall of Honor. Other funds to support the project include $402,000 in federal HUD/VA funds secured by U.S. Representative Sue Kelly and additional donations from veterans and their families. The Military Order of the Purple Heart (MOPH), the national organization whose members are Purple Heart recipients, has contributed $500,000 toward the project.

"Every Purple Heart veteran is a hero whose story needs to be told so we can fully honor their sacrifices and learn from their experiences," said Congresswoman Sue Kelly. "The Hall of Honor will uniquely highlight these stories and will inspire our community to preserve the legacy of our military heroes and better appreciate the freedoms for which they fought."

The National Purple Heart Hall of Honor is located at the site of the final encampment of George Washington's Army at New Windsor Cantonment and plays a central role in the history of the Purple Heart. To honor service of his troops, General Washington chose a select number of troops to receive a purple cloth Badge of Merit, the precursor to the Purple Heart Award. The present day Purple Heart medal took as its inspiration the color and shape of the badge and added the image of George Washington to honor the man who valued the outstanding service of his soldiers. In 1932, the new Purple Heart medal was presented to 150 World War I veterans at the New Windsor Cantonment site and the medal has been presented to over a million military personnel.

Families who would like to share their story or other materials of Purple Heart recipients to be considered for the exhibition or archives to support the National Purple Heart Hall of Honor, please contact the National Purple Heart Hall of Honor, P.O. Box 207, Vails Gate, New York, 12584 or call (845) 561-1765. Tax deductible gifts to the Hall in support of the ongoing development of the memorial and museum are also being accepted.

* Posthumously

The commanding general of the 3d Marine Division, headquartered out of Da Nang, was Major General Raymond G. Davis. For Davis, this was his third war, having served in World War II, and receiving the Medal of Honor for his heroism at the Chosin Reservoir in Korea. Davis referred to the 9th Marines as the "Mountain Regiment" and his "Strike Force Regiment". As Operation Dewey Canyon began on January 22nd, General Davis had good reason to pay close attention to the efforts of his Marines. Among the men assigned to meet and defeat the enemy in their A Shau sanctuary was a young lieutenant in command of a rifle platoon. By a strange twist of fate that defied military policy prohibiting relatives from serving in the same war zone, Operation Dewey Canyon would send Davis' son, Lieutenant Miles Davis, into harms way. The first phase of Operation Dewey Canyon primarily involved the movement and positioning of air assets. Phase II, the movement of the 3 battalions of the 9th Marines out of Vandegrift Combat Base began on January 31st. It was during this move to position the 9th Marines at the northern edge of A Shau that Lance Corporal Noonan died trying to save the life of his fellow Marines.

Lance Corporal Thomas Noonan did his best to ignore the mud as his company slowly moved down the side of the hillside. It was February 5th, and Operation Dewey Canyon was two weeks old. The men of the 9th Marines were moving into the A Shau Valley, and Company G, 2d Battalion, 9th Marines (2/9) was moving out of its location southeast of Vandegrift Combat Base as part of the incursion into A Shau. It was early in the monsoon season, so the progress of the Marines was hampered not only by the dense foliage, but also by the intermittent rains and the slippery mud. Suddenly, bad went to worse as the lead element walked into the enemy. From their concealed positions, the North Vietnamese opened fire, wounding four men. Further up the hill the rest of the Marines were stuck by the impossible terrain and the hail of enemy fire. No one could reach the wounded. Lance Corporal-Noonan was a rifleman in his company, despite an education that could have granted him an almost immediate commission when he joined the Corps. Now the 25-year old took upon himself the task of rescuing his brothers. Carefully he moved down the slippery slope, ever mindful of the heavy enemy presence. Nearing the wounded, he took cover behind some rocks to shout encouraging words to the wounded Marines, assuring them that help was on the way. Alone he raced across the fire-swept area, locating the most seriously wounded man and dragging him backwards to shelter. Enemy rounds whistled through the area, hitting Noonan and knocking him to the ground. Despite his own wounds, Lance Corporal Noonan got back up and resumed dragging the wounded Marine towards the cover of the rocks from which he had earlier encouraged the men. Before reaching its shelter, enemy fire reached out again, a rain of hot lead striking the young corporal's body. Inspired by Noonan's example, the rest of the platoon charged the enemy, pushing them back and reaching the wounded. All four survived. Noonan was the only casualty. He died, the collar of his wounded comrade's fatigue shirt still grasped in his hands in a valiant attempt to save a friend. He was the first to earn a Medal of Honor in an operation that would test the courage of all the Marines of the 9th.

From January 31st until February 10th, 2/9 continued its movement south, flanked by 1/9 and 3/9. Colonel Robert Barrow, commander of the 9th Marine Regiment (who later became the 27th Commandant of the Marine Corps), coordinated the mission with support from American asset's throughout I Corps. By February 10th the three battalions were poised and ready to enter Phase III, the incursion into A Shau. Along the way they had built numerous fire bases with names like Henderson, Tun Tavern, Shiloh, Razor, and Cunningham, to provide artillery support and maintain supply routes. The large movements of the three battalions demanded a regular and consistent re-supply at Vandergrift Combat Base. On February 13th far to the north, a convoy was carrying supplies to Vandergrift when it was ambushed. In the heavy mortar and small arms fire that followed, the convoy security squad moved to engage the enemy. Marine Lance Corporal Thomas Creek dashed across the fire swept area to take up a better position from which to attack the enemy when he was wounded. Almost as quickly as he fell, the enemy threw a grenade at his position. Nearby were others of his squad, men who were about to die. Ignoring his previous wounds, Lance Corporal Creek rolled on top of the grenade to absorb the blast, sparing the lives of his comrades at the expense of his own. Though not officially a part of the Dewey Canyon operation, in his support role the 18-year old hero's posthumous Medal of Honor must be counted with that of those who fought further south. Even as Lance Corporal Creek lay dying in a gully northeast of Vandergrift, far to the south the 3d Battalion, 9th Marines were crossing the Da Krong River only 13 kilometers from Laos. Phase II of Operation Dewey Canyon was under way. The following morning the Marines of 1/9 and 2/9 began moving out of their fire bases as well, heading southward and towards the North Vietnamese Base Area 611 that ran from the north boundary of A Shau and into Laos.

The move into A Shau was at once both miserable and dangerous. Triple-canopy jungle made movement difficult and two weeks of continuous fog and heavy monsoon rains removed any possibility of personal comfort and made re-supply difficult. The enemy moved freely through the A Shau at night on roads they would carefully camouflage during the day with movable trees and shrubs ingeniously planted in containers. As they moved, the Marines were subjected to heavy artillery fire from NVA guns inside Laos. At night, more troops and weapons moved down the Ho Chi Minh trail. General Davis caused a slight stir on the home front when a newspaper reported a remark made in a personal conversation. "It makes me sick," the 3d Marine Division C.G. had said, "to sit on this hill and watch those1,000 (enemy) trucks go down those roads in Laos, hauling ammunition down south to kill Americans with."

Early in the third phase of the operation, General Davis flew out to meet with Colonel Barrow. Earlier that morning the General had begun receiving reports of enemy contact..."Kilo Company, fire fight, 1 killed, 2 wounded." An hour later Kilo Company was in contact again, more Marines killed, more wounded. Davis did his best to concentrate on the meeting at hand, all the while knowing that his son was a rifle platoon leader in Kilo Company. Even as he landed for his meeting with Colonel Barrow, some of the wounded were arriving...Lieutenant Miles Davis among them. The younger Davis would survive his wounds and subsequently would receive the Purple Heart Medal from his father.

Meanwhile, in the A Shau, other Marines struggled to stay alive and complete their mission. By February 20th, the Marines had moved all the way to the Laotian border. As the enemy played their deadly game of hide-and-seek, raining death on young American Marines and then quickly scurrying across the border into the safety of Laos, Colonel Barrow had seen too many of his men die to the unfair advantage. "The political implications of going into Laos were pretty unimportant to me at that point," he later stated. The policy of US commanders had always been that units could enter Laos or Cambodia, only when American lives were endangered by enemy forces therein. (Usually this applied to SAR (Search and Rescue) missions for down pilots or LRRP (long range reconnaissance patrols). Colonel Barrow saw the danger his own men faced from within and, despite the very real possibility of sacrificing his distinguished military career, ordered Hotel Company, 2/9 to cross the border and set up ambush positions INSIDE Laos.(This plan was approved by General Creighton Abrams, commander of all U.S. Forces in Vietnam...AFTER the border crossing had already occurred.)

With elements of the 9th Marines now operating inside Laos, the other battalions moved out to take up positions along the border. On the morning of February 22nd, the 1st Battalion was in place on ridge overlooking Laos. The Marines of 1/9 called themselves the Walking Dead. On this day, for one company in particular, the name would be all to real.
First Lieutenant Wesley Fox was in command of Alpha Company, 1/9. He was a seasoned veteran, now in his 19th year in the Marine Corps. As a young Corporal he had served in Korea, slowly working his way through the ranks to become a First Sergeant by 1966. The veteran leatherneck, now in his second war, had begun anew...working his way through the commissioned ranks. Fox had already completed a tour in Vietnam, and recently had extended his combat tour. As dawn broke on the forested hillside overlooking Laos, Alpha Company was sent out to look for and destroy a suspected enemy force operating in the region. Lieutenant Fox's 3rd platoon had made contact with them the previous day, and now the Company was looking to finish the fight. In addition, First Battalion was low on water. A detail was dispatched to get re-supply from a stream below, Alpha Company leading the way to provide security as Lieutenant Fox and his men searched for the enemy. As they reached the stream, the enemy appeared.

The NVA seemed to be everywhere, popping up out of hidden spider holes to rain devastating machine-gun and small arms fire on Alpha Company, while enemy mortars fell on the embattled Marines. The suddenness and the ferocity of the attack caught the Marines by surprise, many falling wounded in the initial onslaught. Quickly Lieutenant Fox moved out, working his way through the heavy jungle overgrowth to gain a position where he could assess the situation and direct his platoon leaders. Deadly missiles struck the foliage and bamboo palms around him. Fox located a sniper's position, quickly killing the enemy with his M-16 rifle before moving on. As Fox deployed his platoons, two enemy mortar rounds landed in his position, killing his radiomen and air and artillery observers. Shrapnel stuck the lieutenant in the shoulder but, despite the bleeding wounds, he grabbed both radios and continued to direct the movements of his Marines. The lieutenant who led Fox's 2nd platoon was seriously wounded, and Fox instructed his executive officer to take command of that platoon. When his platoon leader in the 3d platoon was killed, Fox quickly moved in to fill the void and take command. He personally destroyed one position while continuing to should orders and give encouragement. Coolly he spoke into the radio to coordinate aerial and artillery support for his Marines. Among those working to defend these Marines on the Laotian border was artillery officer Harvey "Barney" Barnum, who had earned the Medal of Honor three years earlier and returned, at his own request, for another Vietnam tour. As the enemy fire continued unabated, the executive officer Fox had sent to 2nd Platoon was killed, and another of his lieutenants was wounded. Though wounded, Fox was the only officer in Alpha Company still capable of leading the resistance. This he did with calm professionalism, his Marines repulsing a final enemy assault during which the Company Commander was wounded a second time. Heedless of his battered body, Fox began organizing his survivors in establishing a defensive position. As corpsmen moved about to locate and treat the wounded, Fox refused aid, setting himself to the tasks leadership demanded. By late afternoon his Marines had secured their position, and Delta Company 1/9 arrived to relieve them. Ten of Fox's brave Marines had died and, of the 153 men who had joined him that morning in the patrol down from the ridge, only 66 were able to continue the mission the following day. Despite his wounds, and determined not to leave Alpha Company leaderless, Lieutenant Fox was among them.

For two weeks Captain Dave Winecoff and Marines of Hotel Company operated in Laos, setting up ambush positions to strike back at an enemy that had never recognized the neutrality of Laos and had effectively used it to advantage against American soldiers and Marines. Five days after the border crossing, one patrol from Hotel 2/9 was moving down a road inside Laos when it was attacked by an NVA squad firing automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades from the shelter of their fortified bunkers. Two Marines fell very close to the enemy bunkers, wounded, and trapped. Efforts by others in their patrol were met by heavy and sustained enemy fire. Twenty-one year old Marine Corporal William Morgan slowly began working his way through the undergrowth to a position near the open road directly in front of the enemy position. Yelling encouragement to the wounded Marines, Morgan suddenly stood to his feet and rushed into the open roadway to single-handedly attack the enemy. Fully exposed to the fury of the enemy emplacement, his efforts drew an immediate and torrential rain of enemy fire. Corporal Morgan's lifeless body fell to a heap in the middle of the roadway, but his valiant charge had distracted the enemy and drawn their fire long enough for the remaining men of the patrol to reach and rescue the wounded. A year later, Corporal Morgan's family accepted his Medal of Honor from President Richard Nixon during ceremonies at the White House. His date of heroism is listed as 25 February 1969, and the place of action is listed vaguely as: southeast of Vandegrift Combat Base, Quang Tri Province, Republic of Vietnam. Indeed he sacrificed his life southeast of Vandegrift... far to the southeast...far enough to be outside Quang Tri province and inside the borders of Laos.

On the last official day of Operation Dewey Canyon a reconnaissance company was returning to their base of operations out of Fire Support Base Cunningham when they were attacked. Private First Class Alfred Mac Wilson took charge as acting squad leader of the rear squad, maneuvering his men to outflank the enemy. When two men manning his own machinegun were wounded, Alfred Wilson and another Marine were rushing to man the gun themselves when an enemy soldier stepped from behind a tree to lob a grenade between the two men. Immediately, Corporal Wilson threw his own body over the grenade, dying beneath its lethal blast, to spare his comrade. Hostilities did not end with the official conclusion of Dewey Canyon either. The Marines continued to hold their base camps in and around A Shau as the Mountain Regiment began their slow withdrawal. Two days after Alfred Wilson jumped on a grenade to spare his comrade, a similar engagement occurred at Fire Support Base Argonne near the DMZ, where Marines of the 3d Reconnaissance Battalion, 3rd Marine Division were lending their own support to the Dewey Canyon Operation.

When the enemy made an early morning attack on the 12-man recon team's position, Private First Class Fred Ostrom headed for a two-man position with his friend, PFC Robert Jenkins. An enemy grenade exploded as the men reached their position, blowing off part of Ostrom's right hand and arm. As the wounded man sagged into his position, a second grenade was thrown directly into the emplacement. PFC Robert Jenkins quickly pushed Ostrom aside, then covered his wounded friend with his own body. Jenkins shield of flesh and blood spared the life of his wounded friend, but at that cost of his own life.
Such was the courage of the Marines, from the experienced vets of other wars like General Davis, Colonel Barrow, and Lieutenant Fox, to the valiant young warriors fresh out of high school. They went, they did their job, and some came home. Valor abounded, many were the acts of heroism that went unrecognized, five Marines earned Medals of Honor,.and only one, Lieutenant Wesley Fox, survived to wear it. He does so, humbly, in honor of all those valiant Marines who became a part of his own legacy in Operation Dewey Canyon.

Operation Dewey Canyon officially ended on 3 March 1969, when Hotel Company left Laos. In those 56 days US Marines built more than 20 base camps and accounted for more than 2,000 enemy casualties. Dewey Canyon was different from other campaigns however, in that the real goal had not been a combat mission to destroy the enemy, but a mission to take away his large cache of supplies being stockpiled in A Shau. During the period US Marines captured 1,200 enemy machineguns, 4,000 bicycle tires, 2,200 enemy rockets, and two big 122mm cannons. More than 500 tons of enemy ammunition was confiscated or destroyed, as well as more than 100 tons of rice stockpiled to feed the enemy troops. Much of the confiscated rice was subsequently donated to needy villages in the region. The success of the mission was not without cost to the Marines of the Mountain Regiment either...130 young American boys killed in action, 932 wounded.

INCOMING

"THANKS"

"Doc"Capt John Roberts,USMCR,just wanted to thank the Cap Marines from Oscar Company

I served as a Corpsman with Oscar Company in the Ville, specifically at Oscar II. Thanks for noticing a fine web sight that was imitated by a valiant Marine, SSgt "Bagpipes "Taylor, USMC Retired. There were a lot of great Marines associated with Oscar Company. I only wish that I had more contact with the other 2 platoons than I did. It was the bravery of the CAP Marines and the Army Advisors (District Headquarters) and later the SOG at FOB-3 that motivated me to later become a Marine Officer. I finished up my career in the Marine Corps Reserves serving as the Tank Detachment Officer, Amarillo, Texas, In Charge by retiring in 1983.

I cannot begin to express my reverence and respect for all of you who served at Khe Sanh. I was only able to do my small job because the rest of you taught me how and what to do. I owe a great debt to Marines of Oscar II for my very life. On more than 3 occasions I was saved from imminent death if it were not for some Marine knocking me over the head or tackling me during a mortar barrage. Much has been said about us "Doc's) but in our hearts we knew that we were adopted and we also knew who the real "Warriors" were.

God Bless you everyone and thanks,
Semper Fi

MEMOIRS

The following article, was written by Robert Palmer, and published in the Military Journal. Robert passed away in 2001. It is being reprinted as an honest and riveting account of the Love, Admiration, and respect Marines have for their beloved Corpsmen.

Robert Palmer HMM-163

Robert Palmer joined the Marines in 1965 at the age of 18, and was sent to Vietnam in July 1967. He was there for 13 months, until August 1968. This story is his tribute to a young corpsman with whom he served in Vietnam 33 years ago.

Because of a base closure (Naval Station New York) and the DOD Civilian Priority Placement Program, I transferred to the National Naval Medical Center in 1994 and began working in the office of Command Inspection, Evaluation and Management Control. When I walked through the Medical Center that first time and saw the bright faces and sharp uniforms of the many young corpsmen here, images of other bright young faces returned. Images from another time, another place, and of a young Navy corpsman whose memory had remained with me for more than 26 years.

It was February 1968 in Quang Tri Province, Viet Nam just south of the Demilitarized Zone. As a Marine helicopter crew chief with HMM-163, I helped provide support to friendly forces operating in northern I Corps, along the DMZ with North Viet Nam, the approaches to the Ho Chi Min Trail and the border with Laos. The Tet Offensive had begun and the battles for Hue and the combat base at Khe Sanh were underway. We were nightly subjected to mortars, rockets, sporadic sniper fire and probes along our perimeter. During the day we flew missions: At night we performed the unending maintenance, sometimes in helmets and flak jackets. At night, many of us, including me, were assigned to the perimeter to augment ground forces assigned to defend us. Ground attacks had broken out around us so close that shrapnel from aircraft and artillery fell on the flight line and in the living areas. Bullets would fly overhead or sometimes smack into something. Nerves were frayed, tempers were short, and the fear of being overrun was very real.

On this particular morning, my aircraft a Sikorsky UH-34D had been designated MEDEVAC for the day. I felt uneasy. Flying MEDEVAC often meant going where the action was. At first light I pre flighted, rigged for stretchers, drew two M-60 machine guns from the armory and mounted both port and starboard. I made the yellow sheet entries and certified the aircraft ready for flight.

While stowing gear, checking and rechecking things in preparation for first flight, a young Navy corpsman appeared at my plane and introduced himself. He looked new. He even smelled new. In a rather high pitched voice he cheerfully explained he had been in country only a couple of weeks, and had flown only one other MEDEVAC mission. Sizing up this soft-spoken kid, I decided he would panic the first time we ran into trouble, and from his slight stature I couldn't see how he could help himself, much less anyone else. I tried not to show my contempt as he stowed his gear.

A sergeant from the radio shop arrived. A shortage of aircrews meant volunteers from the maintenance shops to man the second M-60. Soon, the pilots arrived and began their preflight. One I didn't recognize. Another new guy. What a crew, I thought -- a new corpsman, a new copilot and a gunner from one of the shops. The pilot and I were the only seasoned members of the crew. I had a bad feeling about this.

The pilots returned to the ready room and the rest of us made small talk to pass the time. Although I felt a certain arrogance towards the corpsman, I found him likable, cheerful, talkative and excited about the mission. God! I thought, he looks forward to this. I wandered over to the maintenance shack where I knew some of my fellow crew chiefs would be. Seeking sympathy for being assigned such a raw crew, I complained to anyone who listened. I was especially unflattering in describing the new corpsman and made it known I felt he would be useless.

A siren signaled our first mission and, at a full run, we converged on the helo. As the pilots scrambled up to the pit I grabbed a fire bottle. Amid a flurry of flipping switches the pilot signaled engine start. A short prime, a few turns and the fifteen hundred horsepower Pratt & Whitney sprang to life, followed by a brief idle and the signal to engage rotors. I pulled chocks and climbed aboard as we began our taxi roll. Granted clearance, we taxied onto the runway and the pilot pushed the throttle to full power and the runway began to pass quickly beneath us. As we rotated through sixty knots the tail lifted and the main landing gear rose from the runway. The helo pitched nose down as we raced down the runway a few feet above the surface. As I looked aft I saw our chase plane, a Huey gunship, armed with eight M-60's and sixteen rockets fall in behind us. By the end of the runway we were treetop level and as we crossed the outer base perimeter we locked and loaded the M-60's. We began a rapid accent to two thousand feet with our chase plane close behind. Our corpsman looked like a kid who had just gotten off his favorite ride at Coney Island. Don't know why, but that annoyed me.

It took only minutes to reach Dong Ha. We turned west following the river. At the Rock Pile we turned south, again following the river. At Cam Lo we headed west, towards Khe Sanh. A forward element of the 26th Marines had two casualties from an engagement that had just broken off. The terrain was mountainous with towering trees and canopy foliage that hid the ground below. Marines on the ground had moved a WIA and a KIA to an area that air strikes had blown enough leaves off the trees we could see down through the canopy when directly above. They directed us in by the sound of our helo. Unable to land, we would have to use the hoist. From a hover the pilot lowered the helo until the wheels were in the tops of the trees. Leaning out I could see the Marines below. Just as I began to lower the cable and sling came the unmistakable sound of small arms fire.

The reaction below was immediate as Marines sought cover and firing positions. As the firing continued several distinct sharp "thunks" sounded. I knew that sound and realized we were taking hits. As I swung the M-60 into position I called to the pilot, "We're taking fire." No response. As I repeated the warning, the pilot was wryly telling the copilot what manifold pressure and engine rpm should be and to remember to keep rotor rpm up. From almost directly below, a North Vietnamese soldier shot up through the belly of the aircraft. I swung the M-60 out but couldn't lower the muzzle enough to bear on my target below. Almost in a panic I glanced around the helo cabin. The window gunner and corpsman were looking at me, but did not seem aware of our danger. In that instance, I knew I was the only one aboard who knew we were in trouble, real trouble. Again I keyed the mike, "We're taking fire!" "What's that?" came the reply. A pause, then, "I've lost a radio." To the ground the pilot radioed, "Echo Hotel, we're taking fire". "Roger MEDEVAC, at your six clock" came the response. "Roger, Echo Hotel, we're departing" the pilot replied, at which the helicopter rose slightly and slipped to one side. As soon as I had a clear field of fire, I began firing. As I sprayed the foliage and trees below, something made me glance up. Just inches away was the smiling face of the corpsman feeding ammo into the M-60, having pulled most of the belt out of the can. In amazement, and still firing, I stared into his face for a moment and then shouted, "What are you doing?" "Helping" he hollered back, still smiling with no sign of fear, absolutely none. As we stared face-to-face across the firing machine gun a feeling of intense affection and camaraderie for this man came over me. I stared a moment more then let go of the M-60 like it was a hot iron as a vision of dead or wounded Marines flashed before me. I realized I had long since quit looking at what I was firing at. I waited tensely, expecting the radio to crackle with the horrible news I had just shot our own men. It never came; instead a conversation between the pilot, chase plane and the ground unit began as to what our course of action would be. "Crew chief?" the pilot called over the mike.

"Yes sir?" I answered. "We're going back." I somehow knew that, I thought dryly. "Make'em keep their heads down," "Yes sir," I answered. We made a pass at the zone and I opened fire on the spot from which we had received fire, upon which the helo made a hard tight turn and went into a hover in the treetops. I immediately ran the cable and sling down through the trees. When I got the WIA level with the cabin, the corpsman was right there to help pull him in, taking over as I released him from the sling. The young corpsman worked quickly and smoothly over our wounded passenger. I ran the hoist back down for the KIA, expecting ground fire at any moment. Nothing. I brought the KIA up and without a word the corpsman helped pull him aboard. I gave the "All clear!" and the pilot applied power.
As the helicopter rose and rotated away from the zone, muzzle flashes appeared in the foliage below and in our direction. Instantly I returned fire and watched my tracers disappear into the semidarkness below the canopy. Something exploded. God, I thought, the guy was carrying something that exploded. What happened next so startled me I fully quit firing. The whole area erupted in one explosion after another with streams of tracers and rockets pouring into the site. Awed for moment I just stared, then looked up and there was our gunship almost directly above us laying in a withering fire at the enemy below. A deep sense of pride for my fellow flyers came over me, as I realized not a word had passed between the pilots, the gunship saw my tracers and responded to cover our departure, possibly saving us. I glanced to my side and there was our corpsman, a foot away, taking in the whole show. He looked like a kid who had just had the adventure of his life.

Clear of the zone we headed east along the river, back towards Cam Lo. Since the WIA injuries were not life-threatening, the pilot decided to stop at the nearest firebase and assess our damage. We landed at a small sandbagged clearing manned by fellow Marines. I unplugged the mike and exited the aircraft. Sure enough, as I crouched and crawled along the belly of the aircraft, I found various hits. All were through the empennage except one in the fuselage at the radio compartment. That explained the radio. As I mentally traced the path of some of the rounds, the engine changed pitch and the aircraft raised up on the struts and suddenly lifted off, leaving me sitting there on the ground, staring in disbelief. As I stood up I saw Marines running for cover. Standing alone in the middle of the landing zone in a flight suit, I felt abandoned and suddenly very vulnerable. A running Marine stopped dead in his tracks and looked at me with an expression of "What in the hell are you doing here?" and then yelled "Incoming!" That I understood. I quickly covered the dozen or so yards to the nearest sandbags. "What's happening?" I asked. "Our guys spotted NVA setting up mortars to hit the LZ" a Marine replied. We waited for the rounds, which should be seconds away. Nothing. Soon, people started to fidget. A few minutes more and the all clear was passed.

I asked, "What happened?" A dirty, tired Marine looked at me and grinned "We took'em out." I vowed never to call these guys "grunts" or "ground pounders" again. No sir, never. After a few more minutes came the welcome sound of a helicopter. My helicopter. The helo landed and I climbed aboard to grins of the crew. I tried to act dignified and not show the utter relief of being back on board. We took off immediately, too dangerous to sit on the ground for long. I plugged back into the intercom and the pilot called down "Sorry crew chief, I thought you were on board!" Yeah right, I thought.

We climbed to altitude as we retraced out route back out of the mountains and back to Dong Ha. Dropping off the KIA and WIA we headed south and quickly covered the last stretch to Quang Tri. On landing the pilot taxied back to the revetment from which we had started. Once the chocks were in place and the aircraft shut down, I began removing the various gear I wore starting with the flak jacket. The corpsman strode up to me and announced, "Boy, when I fly I want to fly with you!" adding, "When you fly you see action." Puffing out my chest I explained this was pretty much routine (a lie). And, if you fly with me you'll probably see some action (another lie). I sadly informed him that because the MEDEVAC mission is rotated, he would also have to fly with other crew chiefs. We talked on and as we did I realized I had made a new friend. Shy at that age and not good at making friends, what friends I had were precious to me. I liked this guy.

Because of battle damage my aircraft was grounded for repairs. I watched silently as my new friend gathered up his gear to report to a new bird. As he walked away I remembered the things I had said about him earlier that morning. Feeling shameful, I decided I must fix that. I went to the ready room to see what discrepancies the pilot wrote up. As I thumbed through the logbook I saw where the pilot had scrawled across the yellow sheet, "Crew chief can sure sling lead." On seeing that, my ego soared through the roof. On leaving the ready room my feet barely touched the ground. Today I had made a friend and had confirmed my manhood. To anyone who would listen, I had to tell about the new corpsman and the morning's events.

As I talked to my fellow crew chiefs it was, "Hey, you know that new corpsman? He's going to do just fine." I added, "We took fire this morning and he did great! Don't worry about him, he'll hold his own." Satisfied that I had undone some of the damage I did earlier that morning to my friend, and of course amplifying my role a little, I set off to find my new friend. We chatted a bit about being in country and going back to the world when our tours were up. I finally had to leave and take care of my aircraft that was down for repairs. The war goes on.

Having made sure the sheet metal and radio shops had my aircraft scheduled for repair, I realized it was lunch. I left the flight line on top of the world, walking a little more erect and with a little more authority and relishing the events of that morning. Having finished noon chow, I returned to the flight line for the tasks at hand. As I strode towards the flight line a passing crew chief asked, "Have you heard?" "Heard what?" I replied jovially. "We lost the MEDEVAC bird. Went down in the zone," he replied, still walking. "What?" is all I could choke out. "Yeah, shot down," the crew chief added. In shock I asked, "What about the crew?" "The corpsman got hit, hit bad," he called back. How bad?" I demanded. He stopped, stared at me for moment studying my expression and then shaking his head stated grimly, "He won't be back," and walked away. In a daze I walked to the ready room and asked the duty NCO if he had any word of the crew. "They're trying to get'em out. Chase is still on station but the zone's too hot to extract them. It's pretty bad up there," came the reply. Again I asked, "The corpsman?" Looking up at a map on the wall, the sergeant restated what I heard before. "Took hits, real bad." "Dead?" I softly asked. "Don't know," muttered the sergeant.

The rest of that day was mostly a fog. It kept going over and over in my mind. 'Why? Why him? He wasn't there to kill anybody. He didn't deserve this.' Over and over I thought, 'Why?' A heavy feeling of guilt and shame came over me as I remembered making fun of him earlier that morning, and putting him down behind his back. That day I vowed I would never again pass judgment on someone without really knowing them (didn't happen) or talk about someone behind their back (didn't happen either). I never found out what became of that corpsman. They got the crew out and he and a crew member were Medevaced, but after that, nothing. Never heard a thing. I wanted to say I was sorry.

Sometimes when I realize I'm taking someone else's inventory instead of my own or passing judgment with out really knowing a person, I think back to that corpsman I briefly knew so many years ago. And when I walk the halls of the National Naval Medical Center and see young corpsmen with bright faces filled with a future yet to come, I feel in some small way, I have somehow come full circle

Edit Note:
When Colonel Ripley almost passed away from a very serious illness we published an article in Red Clay. About the Commandant of the Marine Corps taking charge and providing immediate transportation for medical treatment, helping to save Colonel Ripley's life. Many of our newest members may be unaware of the outstanding service the Colonel has given to the Marine Corps and the United States of America. He is also a distinguished member of the Khe Sanh Veterans and has contributed his time, and materials to our organization.

Col. John W. Ripley

By Jennifer Sheppard, USNA-AA Staff

The first Marine to receive the Distinguished Graduate Award, Col. John W. Ripley, Class of '62, has lived a life of service to this nation, his community, the Naval Academy, and the U.S. Marine Corps. His careers, both military and civilian, epitomize the highest standards of duty, honor and integrity.

Colonel Ripley served in the Marine Corps for 35 years. He served two infantry tours in South Vietnam, one as a rifle company commander in the demilitarized zone and one with the Vietnamese Marine Corps during the 1972 Easter Offensive. He was Lima company commander in the Leatherneck Square area of Dong Ha, Con Thien, and Khe Sanh. Ripley was wounded in action, but returned to complete his tour. During this tour of duty, Colonel Ripley was awarded the Silver Star for "conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action ..." during combat operations. While leading a relief column, his unit came under heavy fire from recoilless rifle and automatic weapons. He "led his unit out of the impact area across 200 meters of open terrain, repeatedly exposing himself to hostile fire, as he directed artillery fire and air strikes."

Ripley's true test came during the 1972 Easter Offensive. Then-Captain Ripley was the lone Marine to the 3rd Vietnamese Battalion when a large force of North Vietnamese regulars, backed by more than 200 tanks, surged toward the capital of the Quang Tri province, which, if captured, would leave a clear path to the ancient capital of Hue. One strategic bridge across the Cam Lo River, at the town of Dong Ha stood in the way.

While under continuous enemy fire, Ripley loaded a backpack with explosives and, hanging from the bridge, pulled himself hand-over-hand to the center of the bridge where he planted his demolition charges. He made a dozen trips to the center of the bridge before he had placed 500 pounds of plastic explosives in the girders--enough to drop the bridge and stop the invasion. By dropping the bridge, Ripley trapped the advancing force on the other side of the river, where it was decimated by air strikes and naval gunfire. His selfless action delayed the fall of South Vietnam by nearly two years. For this, Ripley was awarded the nation's second highest combat award, the Navy Cross.

John Grider Miller captured Ripley's Easter Offensive actions in the book, The Bridge. They are also depicted in a diorama outside Memorial Hall. Ripley's other service included duty with the Marine detachment aboard USS Independence (CVA-62); with a Force Reconnaissance Company; on an exchange tour with the British Royal Marines; and as commander of a battalion and a regiment. In addition to typical staff billets, he served with the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps units of Oregon State University and the Virginia Military Institute. He also was the senior Marine and director of the division of English and history at the academy.

Ripley has earned six valorous and 14 personal decorations. Following his retirement from active duty in 1992, Ripley was president and chancellor of Southern Virginia College in Buena Vista, Va., and subsequently he was president of Hargrave Military Academy in Chatham, Va. He was selected by the Marine Corps commandant to be the director of the history and museums division in 1999.

REUNION

I see them through tears welling in my eye
Try to stop raging rivers I might as well not try Boys ... no, now men, standing at the end of the hall
Men I haven't seen since tempestuously awful days long ago
Days held in infamy for thirty-nine years, or so
Men who in days of yore offered their all
This band of brothers occupy nightly dreams since my fall
When this combat infantryman bit the dust
Though long ago I've shed combat rust
Now about to greet my brothers-in-arms, I must...

For I have marched with this band-of-brothers in dreams
Walking tangled wood where real horror in repugnance teems
We were much younger then when we humped the gear
Remember days of piss and vinegar with wall-to-wall fear
Digging foxholes, hiking, laughing, living with these men
Humping the knotty shadow's rustic den
Just another click or twenty ... where have the good times gone
Thirty-nine years ... what happened to our fighting prime brawn?
Some I see are still raw-hide tough fighting machines
Though most are not, gone a long way from our teens...
Some still haunted by fetid memories that will not let them be
Some still fight long ago battles in their mind they see Old men, paunchy and overweight
Brothers of the Nam tempting fate, irate
Remembering good times ... haunted by bad times
The best of men ... the worst of men
Together in dinky dau times that tried men's souls
Times that determined where our future goes Times that after thirty-nine years lives with us still Buried down deep, Vietnam memories old soldiers fill.
I've not seen them since we roamed jungles black and deep Since we scaled the highlands where eagles keep Since we humped the killing zone
Dancing the edge of death, so far from home
Negotiating raging rivers to tropical savanna grassland
Playing deadly games with the NVA brigand
Whose greatest wish was preoccupied with our dying
Wary of Vietcong Papa sans our way defying
Fetid fear a constant despair, put way back there...
With smells of rotting death wafting in vile air.

We came in-country strapping brave youth
Patrolling eye-high elephant grasses rude and uncouth
Bearing war weapons lightning with thunder malevolent
Hoping to remain to sweet life somehow relevant Laughing so we wouldn't have to think where we were Bravely fearless to make bad times go like a blur
Beaucoup gung-ho and naive
By the cruel war made men to deceive
Veterans only hoping to survive
Long enough to make it back to "the world" alive.

Now, back-to-back, again we face the past
Remember times that will forever last Beside men we walked the lip of death with
Who mid fear and a leap of faith
We cast our lot with Faced the devil with Stood before the bar of judgment with Calling on all powers that be, beseeched
This motley crew mixed and matched
We laughed, we dreamed, we bellyached...

Men of Mississippi, New Jersey, California, and Oklahoma bonded
We'd only two choices, do it or die, so we responded Defended each other for very life depended Gained deeply abiding love for our combat brothers
Black, white, red, yellow or polka-dotted men war gathers
We became as one in this world of harms, there were no others
Family and boyhood friends so very far away
Far from this life-and-death passion play
So this band-of-brothers worked cooperatively, intimately Closely together in concert, forever, cohesively

Awesome!

It is a Great photo of an Air Force training squadron flying in a never-done-before "USA" formation over the control tower "Taj Mahal" (HQ building) of Randolph Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas

The planes are traveling 400 mph and you had to be just right to get the shot at that instant. It is a hard formation to maintain as the ones in the S are just a little graduated degree behind the next one, and remaining that way to maintain the formation.

INCOMING

I am a Life Member of Khe Sanh Veterans. I served with India Company 3/26, in Lt. Fromby's 3RD Platoon on Hill 881S. I was a machinegun squad leader. I arrived at India Company in July 1967, right after the Hill Fights, and through Ambush Alley, Cua Viet, LZ Betty, them back to Khe Sanh for the second time. I rotated home from Danang in August of 1968.

At this point in my life. Most of the names and faces of those who died in Nam have become less clear and are more difficult to recall. It seems my close friends are now barely discernible. I don't quite know how it goes for the rest of you Khe Sanh guys. But I believe we are slowly becoming "the World War II Vets" of our society. It seems as though only events remain, and the faces manifest themselves less and less. Those of us, who have remained in contact with each other throughout the years, must be realizing that our numbers are dwindling. Like me, they look forward to living out the remainder of their lives knowing what we did as young men, during those times, at that one place, and have lived to recount the valorous things that were done by those who served and survived such battles as the siege of Khe Sanh, battles at Con Thien, Cam Lo, the Rockpile. We are truly blessed.

Issue 63, of the RED CLAY included a letter by one of our fellow survivors, "77 Days at Khe Sanh, by Raymond A. Milligan. USMC, Vietnam April 67 - September 68. "His article moved me to write this letter. Mr. Milligan detailed an incident involving the insertion of a recon team on Hill 881 N by India Company, including my platoon. I recall that incident, and the number of casualties we sustained in the insertion. The part of the story that moved me was that I knew Corporal Tommy Hollis. Since it was my platoon that would contain the insertion team, I ran into Tommy the night before during our briefing.

Tommy Hollis and I were in the same Platoon in boot camp. He was a generous, happy -to-be-alive kind of guy. His last day on Earth, he and I sat on op of my bunker smoking and talking about what was to take place the following day. I recall him talking about how he was really scared and truly believed he was not going to survive this operation. I remember telling him that it was all "pre-operational jitters" and that I felt that way before every operation. I remember telling him since my platoon was going to provide the insertion, I would take extra care and make sure he at least got there in one piece. Getting him back was another story. We knew going in, that 881 N had plenty of NVA in well fortified positions.

Lt. Fromby's Platoon had the responsibility of flanking to the right of the main body of India Company, as they frontally advanced on 881N. I recall we had been given a "take five and smoke em' if you got em," as we prepared to move out. Someone began firing an M-79 at us. We tried to determine where the fire was coming from. The main body of India Company had made contact with a superior NVA force. Our column began moving out when automatic weapons opened up. I had a habit, gained from previous squad leaders, of always walking with my point gun team, to determine the situation, quickly set up and provide fire. I don't recall much after the intense fire we received. I remember fighting was intense, back and forth. We had to collect Marines KIA, under fire. Those KIA included Lieutenant Fromby and his radio operator. We called in medevacs with the help of an F/O who was with our platoon. I recall being extremely frightened while running around making sure that men were in position, creating the LZ, and staging the dead and wounded for the incoming birds. But most of all, making sure that our men continued to "stay the course!" Tommy Hollis died during that insertion. Tommy was right; he didn't making it through that operation.

Because of this, I believe that Mr. Milligan was mistaken, when he believed that Cpl. Tommy Hollis was killed in the trenches. I hope that some of us who were there during this incident can clarify things. If we are incorrect, please provide knowledgeable information so that families of friends lost will have as true and accurate assessment of how their loved ones died.

A Story Of Fiction? "Bonded Together"

By Craig W. Tourte

This is just a little story of fiction. It has a little of me in it and as you read further, you may find that it may have some of you, (fiction? perhaps not).

From the book "Band of Brothers" by Stephen E. Ambrose (pg 220), describing battle with crack German armored and infantry divisions. "...beyond the wounded and killed, every man at Bastogne suffered, men not wounded by shrapnel or bullets were nevertheless casualties. There were no unwounded men at Bastogne." "...I'm not sure anyone who lived through that one hasn't carried with him, in some hidden ways, the scars. Perhaps that is the factor that helps keep...men bonded so unusually close together."

The Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh was a cakewalk for John, compared to the suffering of so many others. Oh sure, John had the usual wounds inflicted by the millions of sharp edged pieces of shrapnel flying around, and at one time he was sent down to Charlie Med to get patched up, turned and left after viewing the carnage and wounds of those who were far more injured than

he. Sure John carried a stretcher for those who were wounded and killed, had thousand of close calls and ran for his life more times than he was able to count or remember. The NVA tried their hardest to kill him, but John guessed it just was not his time.

So John carried a guilt these many years as he remembered the roar of the tank motors and 20-hour battle that raged at Long Vei as he stood staring out into the fog. At the time, John did not understand the full extent of the circumstances.

John stood by the side of the road as Bravo left the wire that morning, listened to the battle and watched as the bodies came back months later.

He spent an afternoon talking to Marines before they left for the hills. And visited their green fly covered body bags sitting on the airstrip before the helicopters came to carry them away, their battle and war over.

John spent hours talking to Marines he had served with, about their fears, desires and their children and families. John wrote letters to parents and loved ones of the dead Marines he had known and served with. But John had survived, and it was war. But unlike them, John made it home alive, Vietnam was a distant past. There were the occasional nightmares, but didn't we all have them ?John thought. There were important things at hand now, marriage, a job, raising kids, dealing with in-laws. He had been to Vietnam so what? lots of men had been to Vietnam and they were fine, although John had never met one who had served during the Siege at Khe Sanh.

As John got older he became more pissed off at everyone and everything. it wasn't him, he rationalized, it was them, those assholes. John's wife told John he had changed. he was not the person she married 25 years ago. John told her to take a hike. what the hell, the kids didn't like him anyway. maybe it was her who changed.

It was so long ago, yet those nightmares about Vietnam kept coming back, more vivid now, even after all of these years. His apartment was a lot smaller than the house he once owned and lived in with his family. Sometime the walls would close in, but he had been in smaller spaces. Besides, no one was shooting at him. John told himself that he could take it. At least he had not been wounded, like so many others he knew and had served with. The war was a long time ago.

John left his job. He didn't like anyone at the stupid job anyway. The wife had moved on and into a new marriage, how did she put it? "I'll never, ever marry another Vietnam Veteran." John seemed to spend more time alone now. He once again visited the park where he spent many hours reading. Just sitting by himself, not really thinking of anything any more, not of his wife, job or even Vietnam. John was not sure, but there just seemed to be something about the guy sitting all alone at the table over by the water. The guy was reading something and never looked up from his book. Another middle aged man sitting alone at the table in the park, but there was something about the guy that drew John's attention. John thought the guy looked familiar, but just could not place him. As John continued to stare at the man, a strange feeling suddenly came over him. It kind of started in his feet and slowly worked it's way up to his head and into his brain, causing his ears to ring and his face to flush red with blood. Thirty odd years flashed in front of John's eyes and he was suddenly looking at a young wounded Marine he remembered as Carl. John stood up and rushed over to the man and yelled: "Carl?" The man flashed his eyes from his book to a face he recognized immediately…

John and Carl had both been wounded at Khe Sanh. Some wounds were more obvious than others.
"…there were no unwounded men at Bastogne…I'm not sure anyone who lived through that one hasn't carried with him, in some hidden ways, the scars. Perhaps that is the factor that helps keep…men bonded so unusually close together."

There is a point to this story, I wonder if you got it?

OBIT

Major General Houghton

Mike Fishbaugh

General Houghton died of natural causes, March 27, in his home in La Jolla, Calif., at 85 years old. He was a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans

The San Francisco native retired after 35 years of service in the Marine Corps, leaving the depot behind as his final duty station. Enlisting in the Marine Corps April 15, 1942, Houghton was commissioned a second lieutenant September 26 of the same year. Houghton is noted as a legend in Marine Corps history by peers and loved ones.

According to former Marine sergeant, Rudy M. Contreras, Houghton was an enlisted man's friend. When Houghton formed a Marine reconnaissance unit in 1949, PFC Contreras became good friends with Capt. Houghton and was eager to train under his command. "He was a very, very disciplined person, and of course he expected that from his troops," said Contreras. "But he didn't think he was above anybody else. The troops really respected him for his attitude."

Contreras was unable to serve under Houghton's command because he was reassigned to a unit in San Francisco, while Houghton took charge of 1st Marine Division's reconnaissance company. But they continued a friendship and later, during deployment to North Korea in 1950, Contreras crossed paths with Houghton again. "He was strict," said Contreras. "He expected you to do whatever was expected of you. He was very fair. He wouldn't pat you on the back, but he was very fair."

Enemy forces destroyed bridges across the Han River, an entrance into Seoul, Korea that Contreras' unit needed to utilize. Houghton's reconnaissance team, the same one Contreras tried to join a year earlier, was sent to secure a route for Marines to cross the waterway as an overpowering force. Contreras saw Houghton before he swam across the river. Houghton was wounded in action and sent back to the United States with his first Silver Star and a Bronze Star with Combat "V." "I never did get to serve with him, but I would have liked to. He was a good man," said Contreras.

After several assignments and promotions, Houghton took command of the 5th Marine Regiment in the Republic of Vietnam, February 1967. During a six-month period, Houghton was awarded the Navy Cross, a second Silver Star Medal, and a second and third Purple Heart Medal. In April 1973, Houghton was promoted to major general while assigned as commanding general, Force Troops, Fleet Marine Force, Pacific and as the chief of staff, Fleet Marine Force, Pacific.

That year, Maj. Gen. Houghton assumed command of the 1st Marine Division and the 1st Marine Amphibious Force. In 1975, he concurrently assumed command of the 3rd Marine Division and the 3rd Marine Amphibious Force, and he completed his final two years in service at Marine Corps Recruit Depot San Diego. "I went to the depot to talk to the commanding general," said Contreras. "I didn't know at the time that (Maj. Gen. Houghton) was the commanding general." When Houghton's aide-de-camp told Contreras the general was ready to see him, he walked into the office, not expecting to come face to face with an old friend.

"Holy mackerel! He came up from behind his desk and hugged me and we stood there and we talked," said Contreras. "He told the major 'I'm closing up. I'm closing up shop for the day. One of my boys is here.'" And with that the commanding general left the office at 8:30 on a Friday morning and didn't return for the weekend. Houghton invited Contreras to spend the weekend at the general's quarters, attend an afternoon tea-party held for colonels and generals only and purchased a new tie and shirt so Contreras would fit in at the event. 'I want you to look presentable for tomorrow,' he told me. For me it was the highlight of my tour at the depot," said Contreras.

Houghton awards include four Presidential Unit Citations, the American Campaign Medal, the Asiatic-Pacific Campaign Medal with three bronze stars, the China Service Medal, the World War II Victory Medal, the Korean Service Medal with two bronze stars, the Vietnamese Service Medal with three bronze stars, the Vietnamese National Order 5th Class, the Vietnamese Army Distinguished Service Order 2nd Class, the Vietnamese Armed Forces Honor Medal 1st Class, the Korean Presidential Unit Citation, the Vietnamese Armed Forces Meritorious Unit Citation, the Philippine Independence Ribbon, the United Nations Medal and the Vietnamese Campaign Medal.

Houghton's good humor and strict nature were in keeping with the utmost Marine Corps traditions. A legendary leader and inspirational person, Maj. Gen. Houghton touched many lives and left a great impression on the Marine Corps for years to come. Maj. Gen. Houghton is survived by two sons, Samuel and Kenneth Houghton; two daughters Pamela Robles and Penny Dudek, and six grandchildren.

KHE SANH VETS HONORED

Students Honor Khe Sanh Vietnam Veterans in Surprise Ceremony.

By Christy Strawser
Daily Tribune Staff Writer

Vietnam war veterans Chuck Lemke, and Bob Johnson got a hero's welcome Thursday, March 23, 2006, at a surprise pep rally put on by the students at Norup Middle School in Berkley, Michigan, where the two vets work.

The tears came first for Robert Johnson, whose blue eyes were wet even before the Norup Middle School band finished "The Marine Corps Hymn." He wasn't the only one in tears inside the school gym, which was packed with whooping young people who hoisted banners as the patriotic music swelled. "Welcome home" was spelled out in red, white and blue, with each letter on an individual poster that kids held high. Johnson's colleague, Chuck Lemke, welled up too as the music ended and middle schoolers walked to a podium on the gym floor to thank both men for serving their country in Vietnam.

The event was a surprise "Hero's Welcome" that students and staff planned on the sly for Johnson, a paraprofessional at Norup, and Lemke, the school's head custodian. The kids learned in class that some Vietnam veterans were badly treated when they came back from war, spit on and mocked. So they wanted to make sure the two veterans at their school knew their sacrifices were appreciated, even if it came 37 years late.

Charles Lemke & Robert Johnson

"I tend to get a little emotional," Johnson, 59, said. "The emotion of this day is pride. I'm proud of every person in this room." Students were proud they managed to keep the big day a secret from two people who know their building better than anyone. Staff pulled the wool over Johnson's eyes by telling him they were planning a welcome home for Lemke, 60, who was away the last two weeks, from a return trip to Vietnam.

During the celebration, kids read poems, the band played patriotic songs and fellow veterans appeared to give Johnson and Lemke flags and sweatshirts. Students hugged them and handed over thank you letters. "It was hard to keep the kids from talking," custodian Joseph McGee said. "That was my job; I kept telling them it was a secret. But this is awesome. I love it. I've never seen anything like this before."

Thursday was Lemke's first day back at work after an emotional return trip to Vietnam. He and wife Susanne, along with humanitarian volunteers, revisited places he had only seen in nightmares since 1968. "I had suppressed a lot," said Lemke, who was in the country from August 1967 through May 1968. "But going to the places where I served, it was just, there are no words, really." Returning to Vietnam reminded him of long marches, the sound of ammunition fire breaking through thick fog and the Red Clay that embedded in his skin in Khe Sanh. "You couldn't scrub it off, it had to wear off," he remembered.

Johnson also fought in Khe Sanh, a Marine base under siege by the North Vietnamese during a relentless attack that lasted several months. They think they probably met at one point, but neither remembers it. "We might have looked the same back then," said Johnson, who was in Vietnam from 1967 through 1968. Johnson stayed in the military until 1997, when he retired and brought some military order to Norup. Lemke left the service as soon as he got home in 1968.

"I was a civilian 10 days after my last run," said Lemke, adding that he went to work in a bank and kept his military past quiet to avoid confrontation. At the time, he didn't think anyone would be proud of his service in Vietnam. "I just kind of kept it a secret," he said. "A lot of us did that. The (emotional) bricks didn't start falling until 18 years later. "And when he was ready to start talking about the war, Norup kids were ready to listen, according to Assistant Principal Vince Gigliotti. "It's always important for us to take a look at history."
Charles Lemke is a current member of the Khe Sanh Veterans and served with K Co 26Th Marines.

ANOTHER VISIT TO PARRIS ISLAND

By Cliff Treese

Prior to leaving our visit with the Marines wounded in Iraq, (Issue 64) I made arrangements with Captain J.A. Garris to give a talk to Platoons 2020 and 2021, prior to their graduation. This was part of a program called "Once a Marine". Arriving at Parris Island, I contacted Captain Garris to discuss the topics he wished discussed with the graduating Marines. One of the main topics he stressed was "Married Life." I presented him with several more gifts from our PX.

I drove over to the museum to visit S/SGT Taliano. I gave him a copy of the picture that I had made of the Hooter's Girls holding Marine jackets. He said he would find a perfect place to hang it. Everybody that saw the picture said it would make a perfect recruiting poster. I gave him a hat and a new Home is Where You Dig It pin. It was getting late and I wanted to stop by Colonel John Valentin's office to say hello, and give him a few of the Khe Sanh window decals and some key chains.

The next morning, prior to my scheduled speech, I went back to the museum to see S/SGT Taliano. He wanted to look up some names of Marines that he knows who were at Khe Sanh, which he did not have an address for. Unfortunately, they were not listed in my Unit Directory. I went to the PX to find something for my wife Linda. While there I met two guys wearing vests with Viet Nam patches on the back. One served with the Marines the other the United states Air Force.

It was close to the time for my talk so I headed over to the office of captain Garris. He informed me the talks are usually an hour long, but since he wanted the recruits to see the Khe Sanh documentary, I should take as long as needed. He introduced me to the rest of the staff of Golf Company: Capt. J.M. Lane, C.O. of Golf Co., Capt. G.H. Baum, and the Battalion C.O. Lt. Col. J.P. Gfrerer.

Captain Baum was the officer who would be introducing me to Platoons 2020 and 2021. The platoon size is about half of what it was back in 1966. They attempted to play the Khe Sanh Documentary As you might expect, the VCR didn't work. I ended up talking for about an hour and fifteen minutes. After word I held a question and answer period. Besides answering questions about Khe Sanh I managed to talk about married life in the Corps, as requested by Captain Garris. One recruit informed me that his father served at Khe Sanh and talked about it very little. He said his dad was coming to the graduation, and if I came, I could meet him.

The Platoons that I talked with had an exchange student from the Romanian Army who was there attending DI's school. He was learning our methods of training to take back to Romania. After my speech, he approached me, and said he wanted to shake the hand of a Khe Sanh Survivor. He then took the word" ROMANIA" that was over his left side shirt pocket, held on by velcro and handed it to me. In turn I gave him a Khe Sanh pin from my hat.

The recruits now get 5 hours of base liberty on the Sunday before graduation. The DI's asked if I was going to attend the graduation ceremony, and be available for more questions. The recruits still get a one day graduation liberty to visit with parents who might arrive early. They also get to leave the Island right after graduation and go home with their family. While waiting for the recruits liberty to start, I met a senior DI from Hotel Company. I asked why some recruits are wearing the green camo utilities and a few others the tan ones. He said the ones in tan are the ones who did not qualify on the rifle range.

I went over to the PX and was approached by several recruits who shook my hand and asked more questions about Khe Sanh, and what the Corps was like in the 60's. Eventually several of us went to the Pizza Hut, for Pizza. Before leaving the PX, most of the recruits filled up on candy and junk food that they hadn't had for the past 12 weeks. New recruits have their pay put into the Federal Credit Union and are issued a debit card for their purchases.

The recruits informed me that the DIs instructed them to buy a watch, and that all the junk food or drink had to be gone before they got back. I never saw so many kids eat so much candy in such a short time. I told them to take it easy or they would be sure to get sick. They said they didn't care it would be worth the stomach ache. After filling there bellies with Pizza, we went over to the Subway/bowling alley to sit and talk about their experiences in the Corps. I told them that I was leaving in the morning for Camp Lejeune to visit the Wounded Warrior Barracks but I would be back in time to see their pinning ceremony of their EGA on Thursday and graduation on Friday. I then left for Camp Lejeune to meet with Ron Shouse for our second visit with the wounded warriors.

CAMP LEJEUNE VISIT

When I arrived at Camp Lejeune my room wouldn't be ready until later that afternoon.. I drove around the base for awhile and stopped by the PX so I could call Ron Shouse on my cell phone. The use of cell phones while driving on base is a definite no-no. Ron said he was en-route and should be at the base by 1830 hours. Ron called and we went to supper, then back to the Hospitality Inn, relaxed and watched TV.

The next day we called the Wounded Warrior Barracks and talked with Gunnery Sergeant Barnes. The gunny informed us that we could come after 1400 hours. Since we had time to kill, we roamed around the PX. Ron had been told by his wife Lynn not to bring any more junk home. He did exactly as he was told. He only purchased valuable treasures that are now on display in his office.

The "Wounded Warriors" in Day Room

The gang met us in the parking lot. It really was like seeing some old friends. When we went down the last time, there were 14 in the unit. Since then, 3 have returned to their original Companies. There are now 24 in the Wound Unit. We sat and just talked to them and even though we were some 40 years their senior, they acted like they had known us forever. They are even starting to joke about how they got hit.

Corporal Maguire, with Banner we had made for the Wounded Warriors

Colonel Maxwell's wife appeared at the barracks and informed us that the colonel had to go to Bethesda Hospital for treatments for his wounds. We asked Mrs. Maxwell to accept our gifts and the signed banner we had brought on behalf of the wounded warriors. She informed us that she had to leave right away to pick up her children, but would make sure the colonel received our gifts.

Gunny Barnes gathered all the wounded Marines in the day room, and accepted, and hung up the banner we had brought from the Khe Sanh Veterans. While talking to the wounded warriors the name of Khe Sanh Veteran Glenn Rappold came up. Corporal Maguire who had lost his right arm and had a severe head injury, informed us that he had met Glenn at a parade welcoming him home from Iraq. When Glenn found out Corporal Maguire had not yet received his Purple Heart, he gave him one of his he had received in Vietnam. I immediately called Glenn and had him talk to Corporal Maguire.

We also spoke to an E-5 Corpsman named Joe Roe, who was wounded by an I.E.D. (Individual Explosive Device) on his right side and his right hand. He said he was blown down an embankment and into some water that woke him up. He did not realize at the time how badly he was wounded. He also did not want his squad of Marines to know how scared he really was. He joked about his injuries and when a stretcher was brought in for him he refused, stating " I walked in with my Marines and I will walk out with them." Joe was also the Corpsman that stabilized Colonel Maxwell when he was struck in the head, prior to going to the hospital for surgery. He lost the pointing finger on his left hand and will tell you that he gave the "Hadji's" the finger. A little humor for the guys who were hurt worse than him because he did not want the younger guys to be any more scared than what they already were.

It was after 1700 hours. The wounded warriors were having supper brought in to them by the Navy Wives organization. At least two to three times a week, different organizations bring them meals so they don't have to eat at the mess hall. We decided to say our good byes for now and that we would be back. One said "You were our heroes, and we just want to be as good as you guys were." If anyone has a comeback for this, I am all ears?

We learned some of the vocabulary from the Sand Warriors. Anybody remember the Gook Shop? Well, it's called a Hadji Mart now. I was told the sand gets ground so fine that it looks like talcum powder, sticks to everything and is called Moon Dust. I seem to remember some red dirt somewhere a long time ago that did the same thing, except it was called RED CLAY. Funny how some things never change. One of the Sergeant's told me that the only good thing about that place was that you did not have to go far to fill sand bags. He could fill 2 from the crack in his ass every day.

Before we left, Ron went to see the Commanding

General and Base Sergeant Major. They were TAD somewhere but he left both of them copies of "Battalion of Kings". He received a thank you letter and an invitation for us to stop by again for pictures.

General Tyron on Final Run With Graduating Class

General Tyron after Run with Graduating Marines, with Cliff Treese

Marines From Golf Co, Receiving Their EGA

RETURN TO PARRIS ISLAND

General Tyron & Sgt/Major Barret

I left Lejeune and headed back to Parris Island. I arrived about 1800 hours and went right to the Osprey Inn Billeting Office. This time I was assigned a room in the BOQ

I went to the 2nd Battalion to see Captain Garris. Nobody was in the office so I went outside and met a DI who said the graduating Platoons were out for their last run. As I drove back to the BOQ, I saw the Platoons on their final run being led by General Tyron, the CG of Parris Island. He even addressed the parents in his running sweats. I spoke with him a few minutes and had a picture taken. He had to leave right away to get dressed for the EGA pinning ceremony, being held at 1200 hours.

I was seated in the reviewing stand and was introduced to General Amos, Commanding General of II MEF at Camp Lejeune. Except for being a little cool, the weather cooperated as far and it did not rain. Now that they were officially Marines I stayed on the parade deck and welcomed them to the Marine Corps. Several introduced me to their parents, who informed me that their sons could not stop talking about what they had learned about Khe Sanh.

I went to the base museum to visit with Sgt Taliano. Many of the recruits were there purchasing items and I was again introduced to more parents. I went to The Traditions Restaurant to get something to eat before it got too crowded. After being seated at a table, the family in the next table started talking to me about their son. The father was a former Marine and he wanted to shake my hand for being a Khe Sanh Survivor and for the service I do talking to people about Khe Sanh, and my injuries. He said his son pointed me out as soon as I walked into the room. He said it was such a coincidence that his son was talking about meeting me and then I walked in and got a table next to them. The Romanian Sergeant who I had met, walked up to me and thanked me for spending time with the recruits. I told him that I was in their shoes 40 years ago, when I went through Parris Island. The only difference was that nobody came to talk to us before most of us got the orders FMF WESPAC. It's unfortunate that most of these Marines are probably going to get their orders on Graduation day. I got up early and went to Headquarters Bldg. for Morning Colors. In attendance were General Tryon CG MCRD, Lt. General Amos CG IIMEF Camp Lejeune, Female Air Force General Peterson, CO National War College, Colonel Valentin, Chief of Staff MCRD. Along with many parents and friends were several Jr ROTC Detachments from various states who all came out in the bitter cold. The base Marine Corps Band played as a detachment of the base MP's did the honor of raising the flag. After the ceremony at Headquarters was complete, everybody headed for the Parade Deck for the Graduation.

As I arrived, I was informed that due to the weather, the ceremony would be held indoors. We were escorted to the reviewing area to watch the ceremony. I sat behind retired Sgt/Major Barret who is the instructor for a Marine Corps Junior ROTC at a high school in Rutherford, N.C. He was there with some of his students to watch the 37th and 38th of his Junior ROTC graduates attend and graduate from Parris Island. Lt. General Amos sat to the side of me with General Tryon. I must admit, the indoor ceremony just isn't the same as out on the Parade deck. After the ceremony I took a few pictures and said my good byes. Capt. Garris asked me if I would come back and next time he said he would have a TV and VCR that works. I went outside and got into my Vette and made the 5 hour drive home. I meeting all these fine Marines both at Parris Island and Camp Lejeune was a real honor for both of us

By Jim Dawdy (Seabee)

It can be a long night indeed. From midnight to 4:00 AM can seem endless when it's just you and a Marine in a muddy foxhole on the northwest perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base in a monsoon rain. It's freezing cold. Few words are exchanged as you peer into the darkness. Thoughts of being back in the world, lying with your girl on the sand on the bank of the river, the moon reflecting off the ripples of the water as it courses its way over rocks worn smooth by hundreds of years of sand gently but persistently, wearing away the jagged edges. "Sweet nothings" being softly exchanged.

You are startled back into reality when a flare eerily illuminates the tall grass across the re-supply drop zone. You remember the training at Pendleton. Don't straighten the pins on your grenades. Don't reveal your position by unnecessary talking. Keep your safety on so you don't accidentally blow away the guys out on listening post in front of you. You start to imagine all manner of bad things. Fear starts to twist your insides into a ball-and it's only 2:00 AM.

What else can you say but: "Sure" to this Marine you have only known for a few days when he quietly asks if you will promise to see to it that his wife receives his wedding band if he "gets it" tonight.

Is there anyone else on the line, or are we alone? Haven't heard a thing for a long time. Haven't seen anything since the flare. All is distressingly quiet.

It's easy enough for a kind of suppressed panic to set in, and the longer it's quiet, the easier it seems to believe that the night will never end. That you won't survive to see the dawn. The stress increases moment by moment.

Suddenly there is a strong, confident voice out of the darkness: You fellows okay? How 'bout a little coffee-its not very hot, but it'll help. Looks like it's going to be another quiet night, and there's only one more hour until you're relieved, but stay alert."

You're gonna make it. You know you aren't alone. Someone does care. THE SARGE.

SHORT ROUNDS

"Snakes"

By Craig W. Tourte

I don't have an aversion to snakes. My cousin and I used to hunt for rattlesnakes in the foothills of Northern California. With 22 caliber rifles slung across our backs, tall leather cowboy boots on our feet with thick socks and carrying short handled shovels, we'd hike up into the dry grass and granite rocks above the small community of Maxwell. The same quarry where granite slabs were harvested to build the Ferry building in San Francisco and the infamous Folsom Prison.

We would not have to spend much time hunting; rattlesnakes just seemed to be everywhere. We would make lots of noise and step carefully listening for the tell tail sound of their rattles. We'd kill them immediately, not waiting for them to coil up or slither away. When we got home we'd skin them out and place their hides on long boards to dry out, then hang them around the walls of the house. Although the skinning omitted a foul odor we often took the meat into the house and after cutting it into small chunks, fryed it in a large black skillet with a little flour, salt and pepper. And yes, it tasted just like chicken.

I did some jungle training in Staging Battalion at Camp Pendleton before flying to Okinawa and then shipping via LST 1166 to Vietnam in 1967. At Camp Pendleton we all humped out into the hills and practiced attacking ridgelines. After one practically long day we gathered in a bowl between some hills. It was raining and we had not slept or eaten for a couple of days. It was supposed to be some type of survival training. There was a large pot of boiling water and some rice was added. I don't think many had ever eaten rice before, but Northern California was rice country and I always enjoyed the rich texture of the glutinous medium grain cornels.

Someone had killed a rattlesnake and with a certain amount of pride was holding it and showing it around. It was somewhat humorous to watch the city boys pull back at the site of the dead snake, not wanting to get close to the dead creature. I suggested that we place it into the pot of rice. Most agreed. I skinned it out, cut it up into small chunks and threw it in the pot. We were all cold and hungry and though lacking spices, that pot of boiled rice and snake tasted pretty darn good.

There were lots of snakes in Vietnam and the mountains of the northern area of South Vietnam identified as I Corps. The Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh had more than its share. The scourge at Khe Sanh Combat Base during the Siege however, was not the snakes, but rather the huge rats that were everywhere. But, snakes did play a part in that experience. If there had been more snakes perhaps there would not have been so many rats. We didn't seem to notice the rats so much until the Siege, but we certainly noticed and often came into contact with large snakes.

There was little sleep for any of us at Khe Sanh and this day was no different than any other. My responsibility was the front gate, which was located at the southwest section of the base. There were no orders or instructions as to what I was suppose to do, who I was suppose to call or notify if a situation arose. There where no, what ifs just the order that I had front gate duty. I took that to mean that if any NVA attacked the front gate my responsibility was to kill as many of them as I could before they killed me.

It was a pleasant evening, a few stars were out and there was little fog. I could not see anything to my front beyond 50 meters, but I could hear the insects and sounds of the jungle, which told me that no little people were in a line of assault to attack my position. You get into a habit of listening very carefully when you're alone, waiting for the enemy to come and kill you. It's important to be able to identify sounds, and after many hours of concentration, listening and studying the blackness ahead, one learns to identify the sound of an animal moving through the brush, a rat digging or the sound of humans running in your direction.

Despite being totally exhausted, hungry and filthy, I was alert to the sounds of the jungle and experienced at staying awake and listening very carefully. I caught the familiar sound right away. There was no mistake and I was not in doubt as to what was causing the familiar crawling and slithering sound. I knew immediately that a snake was near. I was alone in the trench and remained perfectly still. The sound grew closer as I tensed, knowing the snake was moving in my direction. Although I knew a little about the snakes of northern California, I did not known much about the snakes of Vietnam.

I could hear the sound and feel the weight of the reptile as it crawled over my right boot, slowly inching it's way along the dirt floor of the trench. As the snake crawled off of my boot and inched it way along the trench line, I lit my trusty Zippo lighter to take a look, it was a huge black creature at least 6 feet in length. It was the first and only snake I ever saw at Khe Sanh. I am sure there were many lurking around the many holes and crevices so often occupied by the large, cat sized rats that were so prevalent.

When I returned to Northern California after my tour in Vietnam, my desire to hunt snakes was over, but I spent considerable time shooting at rats.

Another outstanding Khe Sanh Veteran Poet/ Writer is discovered.
Rufus Daigle, B 3rd Recon Artist/Poet
Meet the Mystic
Arts and Letters Volume 31, No. 49 April 13, 2006
By Andrew Hodgdon

Khalil Gibran once wrote, "Life without love is like a tree without blossom and fruit." As a fellow artist, Santa Cruzan Rufus Daigle has dedicated his life to mirroring that philosophy. First taking up the pen at 5 years old, he's published two volumes of poetry that celebrate the most elusive poetic muse: happiness. "I'm trying to find myself as a human being, to find happiness in myself and share it," Daigle says.

On Friday, April 7, the poet read from his book, "The Mystic Sings" at the Santa Cruz Public Library. Although he carries an extraordinary amount of passion in his heart, Daigle has suffered through a great deal of pain. He is a disabled veteran who was wounded in The Siege of Khe Sanh in 1968.

Upon returning home to Louisiana, he began exhibiting his work before moving to Dallas to attend Southern Methodist University. Chance delivered Daigle to San Francisco, where he connected with artists of all walks of life. He later invested in a 100-acre ranch in Clear Lake to farm grapes, "I've always wanted to contribute to the land; my poems are prayers for the land," he says.

It was here in Northern California that Daigle composed "From the Wings of an Angel." This book of poems demonstrates a distinct talent for rhythm and word placement. His style of arrangement presents the reader with clear and honest sentiments. The metaphors are fluid and rhythmic, producing vigorous imagery. "The book explained how I felt about love," Daigle says. "It comes from seeing so much death in Vietnam. I wanted to clarify that love exists, and say just how beautiful that is so people can understand and connect."

He eventually opened a gallery in Berkeley and has since seen his paintings exhibited in Oakland, San Francisco and Seattle. In addition to his U.S. displays, his work has also hung in the Virgin Islands. Daigle's recent book, "The Mystic Sings," is a collection of poems and paintings that symbolize an intense search for clarity within the context of angst, racism and war. This colorful combination of visual and written mediums will definitely appeal to impressionistic art fans. One poem, entitled "Requiem to a White Owl," pays witness to one of Hawaiian folklore's legendary deities. Other pieces, like "Pele's Angel," remind us that destiny may very well return us from whence we came. The book is, "A little more mosaic, more complicated, because I have grown and the work has become more intricate," Daigle says. "I want to leave an impression about beauty, as well as the erotic and the painful."

Rufus Daigle read from his collection of poetry and exhibits two of his newest paintings on, Friday, April 7 at The Mountain Art Center for the Poet's Eye/Artist's Tongue exhibition. On Sunday, April 9, he performed at the Santa Cruz Main Library for Poet/Speak. He was also featured Monday, May 8 at Independent Voices through the Santa Cruz Art League. Those interested in poetry readings can call 402-1232, or contact Rufus available at Bookshop Santa Cruz and the Capitola Book Café.

In a letter to Mike Fishbaugh, he wrote: "Mike, yes I am a Khe Sanh Veteran, I was with 3rd Recon. I also sell prints. Giclee's, number prints on acid free canvas. I also just had another book published. If interested in purchasing my work, let me know. I really live in Hawaii, growing coffee and painting. Rufus 831-419-8403

ANOTHER KHE SANH VETERAN STILL SERVING WITH DISTINCTION

Story By Miranda G. McLeod
Staff Writer

Jackie Bevel, assistant to the State Attorney, said "You'll know he's a Marine when you walk in." Was she ever right. State Attorney Harry Shorstein has Devil Dog written all over him, as much as he bleeds orange and blue. "You'll come to learn Marines are very proud," he said. A fact already known, but dually represented by Shorstein's Bronze Star with Combat "V", Marine statuettes and autographed photo of General Alfred M. Gray, Jr., former Commandant of the Corps. "All Marines are very proud of Marines. We don't hide it," he said.

A native of Jacksonville, Shorstein received both his bachelor's and law degrees from the University of Florida before he joined the Corps. Mr. Shorstein was commissioned a 2nd Lieutenant in 1963. After graduating law school, he served as a Captain in the 3rd Marine Division in Vietnam, seeing active combat duty during the Tet Offensive, Battle of Hue, and the siege of Khe Sanh. His decorations include a Bronze Star with Combat "V", Combat Action Ribbon, the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry, and a Presidential Citation. He served as a platoon commander and Commanding Officer of B Company, 4th Am-Trac Battalion.

Shorstein's done a lot of serving and has experience in both the defense and prosecution of criminal cases. After his return from Vietnam, Shorstein worked as division head in the Office of the Public Defender. From 1970-74, he served as division head and Chief Assistant State Attorney. He was the youngest person to serve as General Counsel for the City of Jacksonville. He worked in the private practice of law for 15 years, and was appointed as State Attorney in 1991.

Shortly after becoming State Attorney, Shorstein focused his office's attention on juvenile crime. "We're very, very proud of what we've done," he said. "In its simplest form, it's a very comprehensive approach to juvenile crime, with a focus on being tough when appropriate, including trying juveniles as adults, but more importantly focusing on prevention and early intervention. To me, it's common sense."

He has a lot of faith in the tight-fisted juvenile justice program. Last September Shorstein issued a biannual, 38-page Statement on Juvenile Justice which hammers down the logic of the program. "What's made us so successful, is that (the program) has the tough component and progressive prevention/early intervention and they mesh. As a result, our record on reducing juvenile crime since 1992 is unprecedented anywhere in the world," he said.

The State Attorney's office has been recognized by national and international media for the progress it has made. The juvenile justice program has been profiled on CBS's "60 Minutes," "The News hour" with Jim Lehrer, "NBC Nightly News" with Tom Brokaw, U. S. News and World Report, The New York Times, USA Today, and Parade Magazine. "There are some who think we are too tough at times, and there are some who think we are too prevention oriented, but there really hasn't been any opposition," he said.

Shorstein says he'll run for State Attorney again in 2008. As a captain in the Marine Corps, Shorstein received the Bronze Star with a Combat V for his participation in the Siege of Khe Sanh, which he says was arguably the most well-known siege during Vietnam. There were reportedly 5,000 Marines surrounded by more than 100,000 Viet Kong and North Vietnamese troops. "We really didn't do a whole lot because we were shelled all the time by artillery mortars and rockets. We just hoped not to get hit - we dug holes to get into." Shorstein also received the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry and a Presidential Unit Citation

MIN-MINI REUNION

By Mike Fishbaugh

I Had the pleasure last Sunday to spend a couple of hours with Mike Archer and "Doc' Topmiller. Mike was having a book signing "A Patch of Ground" at the Joseph-Beth Bookstore in Lexington, KY. I met Mike last July in Chicago at the Reunion. Doc is a professor at Eastern Ky University and has made several trips back to Viet Nam on research for the school. Mike was to visit the university and speak in one of Doc's classes this past week. I Had a great time.

Mike

It was great seeing you again too. In addition to Doc Topmiller's two history classes at Eastern Kentucky University, I gave presentations about Khe Sanh to four other classes, as well. Those professors had also adopted A Patch of Ground for their courses, so the students knew something about the subject. My goal was to illustrate for them for them how combat by Marines along the DMZ differed tactically, and in intensity, from fighting in other parts of South Vietnam. They asked many questions and I came away surprised at how hungry these kids were for information about the Vietnam War, a far cry from the early 1970's when I returned to college on the G.I. Bill and found discourse about the war far less civil (how's that for a monumental understatement?). The admiration, and, for want of a better word, "awe" with which they regard Vietnam vets would, and should, make us all proud. I'm off to the University of Delaware on May 4 to continue to tell our story, and hope to submit an article to Red Clay in the next couple of weeks about "Khe Sanh on Campus." Thanks again for driving all the way into Lexington to say hi. It was good seeing a familiar face.

Riding in Helicopters

By Jack Haigwood

Late in February 68 I was on my way to Dong Ha by means of a Chinook. While I was making my way down the strip, a C-123 was approaching the runway. Incoming rounds soon followed. I made a dive for the chopper tailgate and was the last man on board. The Marine sitting in the last seat didn't slide forward so I squeezed in next to him. As we lifted off, a sniper bullet hit making that "pop" sound. The bullet hit the Marine next to me going thru his left buttock and exiting his lower stomach. He lost so much blood that the floor of the plane was covered red. We sat back down at Charlie Med where they took him away. Those few minutes and that Marine are etched forever in my mind. I always wonder about him? Did he live ? Did he die? I also wonder way he didn't move forward and let me have that seat.

Semper Fi Brother! Where ever you may be.

DAYLIGHT

Three hours to daylight
The end of another long night

As I stare into the darkness
I have awesome power under harness

We have been lucky so far tonight
There has been no enemy in sight.

Two hours to daylight
If he shows we will unleash our might

Is he here, will he come?
Will all die or only some?

One hour to daylight
Maybe we will not have to fight.

Finally I see it, daylight
I thank God no one had to die tonight

C-130 Hercules Lands on U.S.S. Forrestal

Edit Note: There have been many stories about the giant C-130's that served us so well at Khe Sanh, actually taking off and landing on a US Navy Carrier. Here is an Excerpt from Herk: Hero of the Skies, by Joseph Earl Dabney, Airlines Publications and Sales, Ltd., 1979., that details how and when it was accomplished. I have also included pictures of the C-130's aboard the U.S.S. Forrestal.

When one reviews the encyclopedic range of accomplishments by the C-130 Hercules and its valiant aircrews over the years, surely one of the most astounding took place in October 1963 when the U.S. Navy decided to try to land a Hercules on an aircraft carrier. Was it possible? Who would believe that the big, four-engine C-130 with its bulky fuselage and 132-foot wing span could land on the deck of a carrier?

Not only was it possible, it was done in moderately rough seas 500 miles out in the North Atlantic off the coast of Boston. In so doing, the airplane became the largest and heaviest aircraft to ever land on an aircraft carrier, a record that stands to this day. When Lt. James H. Flatley III was told about his new assignment, he thought somebody was pulling his leg. "Operate a C-130 off an aircraft carrier? Somebody's got to be kidding," he said. But they weren't kidding. In fact, the Chief of Naval Operations himself had ordered a feasibility study on operating the big propjet aboard the Norfolk-based U.S.S. Forrestal (CVA-59). The Navy was trying to find out whether they could use the Hercules as a "Super COD" - a "Carrier Onboard Delivery" aircraft. The airplane then used for such tasks was the Grumman C-1 Trader, a twin piston-engine bird with a limited payload capacity and 300-mile range. If an aircraft carrier is operating in mid-ocean, it has no "onboard delivery" system to fall back on and must come nearer land before taking aboard even urgently needed items. The Hercules was stable and reliable, with a long cruising range and capable of carrying large payloads.

The aircraft, a KC-130F refueler transport (Bu No 149798), on loan from the U.S. Marines, was delivered on 8 October. Lockheed's only modifications to the original plane included installing a smaller nose-landing gear orifice, an improved anti-skid braking system, and removal of the under wing refueling pods. "The big worry was whether we could meet the maximum sink rate of nine feet per second," Flatley said. As it turned out, the Navy was amazed to find they were able to better this mark by a substantial margin.

In addition to Flatley, the crew consisted of Lt. Cmdr. W.W. Stovall, copilot; ADR-1 E.F. Brennan, flight engineer; and Lockheed engineering flight test pilot Ted H. Limmer, Jr. The initial sea-born landings on 30 October 1963 were made into a 40-knot wind. Altogether, the crew successfully negotiated 29 touch-and-go landings, 21 un arrested full-stop landings, and 21 unassisted takeoffs at gross weights of 85,000 pounds up to 121,000 pounds. At 85,000 pounds, the KC-130F came to a complete stop within 267 feet, about twice the aircraft's wing span! The Navy was delighted to discover that even with a maximum payload, the plane used only 745 feet for takeoff and 460 feet for landing roll. The short landing roll resulted from close coordination between Flatley and Jerry Daugherty, the carrier's landing signal officer. Daugherty, later to become a captain and assigned to the Naval Air Systems Command, gave Flatley an engine "chop" while still three or four feet off the deck.

Lockheed's Ted Limmer, who checked out fighter pilot Flatley in the C-130, stayed on for some of the initial touch-and-go and full-stop landings. "The last landing I participated in, we touched down about 150 feet from the end, stopped in 270 feet more and launched from that position, using what was left of the deck. We still had a couple hundred feet left when we lifted off. Admiral Brown was flabbergasted."

The plane's wingspan cleared the Forrestal's flight deck "island" control tower by just under 15 feet as the plane roared down the deck on a specially painted line. Lockheed's chief engineer, Art E. Flock was aboard to observe the testing. "The sea was pretty big that day. I was up on the captain's bridge. I watched a man on the ship's bow as that bow must have gone up and down 30 feet." The speed of the shop was increased 10 knots to reduce yaw motion and to reduce wind direction. Thus, when the plane landed, it had a 40 to 50 knot wind on the nose. "That airplane stopped right opposite the captain's bridge," recalled Flock. "There was cheering and laughing. There on the side of the fuselage, a big sign had been painted on that said, "LOOK MA, NO HOOK."

From the accumulated test data, the Navy concluded that with the C-130 Hercules, it would be possible to lift 25,000 pounds of cargo 2,500 miles and land it on a carrier. Even so, the idea was considered a bit too risky for the C-130 and the Navy elected to use a smaller COD aircraft. For his effort, the Navy awarded Flatley the Distinguished Flying Cross.

"A Marine's Story"

Bob Ringham (I/3/26)
By Craig W. Tourte

Twenty-Three years ago I was visiting the island of Hawaii with my lovely young bride when I had the occasion to strike up a conversation with another fellow vacationer. We talked about the subjects fellow vacationers talk about, the island, where we were from, what we did for a living, what we had seen and enjoyed about the island, that sort of thing. I don't remember exactly how the subject came up, but Vietnam, Marines and Khe Sanh just seemed to naturally flow into our conversation.

We had a rather extensive conversation about Khe Sanh. At that time I (and not again until 2003 when Tom Horchler called me) had I ever knowingly spoken to another Khe Sanh Veteran. After a few days we went our separate ways, but did manage to exchange addresses. We wrote back and forth several times. It turns out he was a reporter/photographer for The Chicago Sun-Times. When I returned home from Hawaii he sent me a little Chicago Sun-Times newspaper. The article was about his return to Vietnam, "I had to go back...I left part of my life in Vietnam, and I wanted to see if I could find it." This newspaper contained a four-part series of his personal memoirs and exclusive photographs of his return to Vietnam from Hanoi to Ho Chi Minh City.

The years have passed and I have researched his name on Goggle and written to him, reminding him of our conversation in Hawaii, but for whatever reason, he has not responded and I have had no further contact with him. I thought it would be interesting to the readers of Red Clay to read a little of this well written article about his experience on hill 881 in 1968 with I/3/36.

From the Chicago Sun-Times
"Return To Vietnam"
By Bob Ringham (I/3/26).

"The first time I flew into this airport (Da Nang), 18 years ago, I was a Marine carrying an M-16 rifle. And I thought I was protecting my country from communism. This time I was carrying a camera and sitting next to a Russian tourist. It was hard to believe there was a time when I thought it was my job to keep this guy from invading the United States."

"He was fat, and he looked like a middle-class American. If we both took off our clothes, I thought, there'd be no way to tell which one of us was the communist. This is where I entered Vietnam on January 15, 1968. It was a huge military air base then, busier than O'Hare Airport. The first thing that hit you was the smell of jet fuel and the sound of helicopters and Phantom jets."

"That smell is gone now. There are weeds pushing up through the runaways. The aircraft bunkers are crumbling away and the first thing that hits you is the silence. It's like a metaphor for Vietnam. All of Vietnam seems to be crumbling away. There's poverty everywhere. Buildings are decaying. Vehicles falling apart. These people may have won the war. But they seem to be losing the fight for a better life. I had always thought Da Nang was just a U.S. base, and I was surprised to find it's also a city of almost half a million people.

I photographed it but that film was later confiscated. I was 18 when the Marine Corps flew me in here from Okinawa, and I thought I was ready for combat. Then I saw a guy with the strangest eyes. He was standing outside a transit station, just staring out at nowhere. I went up to him and said: "Why do they send old guys to fight this war when the Marines have got all these young smart-asses like me to do their fighting?" "I'm only 19 he said." Right then I realized I was getting into something over my head. He said he'd come from Khe Sanh and I thought: Oh my God! That's where I'm going"

"I got there fast, that same day. They put me on a C-130 transport, with a bunch of other grunts, and the crew chief said: "When we land at Khe Sanh, we are not going to stop the plane. The back of the plane is going to open. We'll drop your bags out. Then you guys jump out to the right, pick up your bags and run to the trench." We landed, and the back fell out. They threw out our gear. We jumped and we ran. There were explosions. As we were diving into the trenches, the Viet Cong were walking mortar rounds down the runaway..."

"I reported to a sergeant who assigned me to India Company, 26th Marines, 3rd Battalion. There were three hills in front of Khe Sanh that were key to control of the area, and India Company was up there on one of them: Hill 881. They flew 10 of us there in a helicopter. It came down on the hill with two machineguns firing. As we were getting off, they were throwing dead Marines into the helicopter. I was the last one off, and I stepped on the chest of a dead Marine. That's how I found out what people looked like when they got hit. We took a lot of casualties on the hill. Basically we just sat there and took a beating from mortars and snipers. There were about 50 or 55 people in my platoon when I go there, and by March 1, there were only eight left. The rest were all dead or wounded. There were two guys who were real good friends, Robert Wiedeman and Frank Szymanski, I was standing duty watch one day when Wiedeman came by with some peanuts. He asked me it I wanted some, and I said no. So he walked on around the corner to talk to Szymanski, and a mortar round came in and killed both of them instantly, I felt guilty about that for a long time."

"A couple of days later, on March 1st, a mortar round blew up our command center, I was assigned to a work detail to rebuild it, with four other guys, and we were digging a hole together when another round came in and hit us. One guy was killed instantly and another guy lost his nose. One guy had a chest full of shrapnel, and another had a concussion. I caught a lot of shrapnel in both legs in my butt and in my left arm. The left leg was the worst, it was laid open, and I couldn't move it. But you don't bleed a lot with shrapnel; because it's so hot it sears the wound shut."

"I was lying there like a dummy, trying to remember if I was suppose to yell for a medic or a corpsman. It didn't matter, because we had none. The two we'd had were killed. So a grunt put a compress bandages on my legs, and they carried me to an artillery bunker. I spent the night in the bunker, and the next day, two guys carried me to a helicopter landing area, but a sniper opened up so they dropped me and ran off. I crawled on my elbows to some sandbags and I lay there all day, out there with the sniper. But he knew I wasn't going anywhere, and he was waiting to nail anybody that tried to come for me. I didn't want to be there when night came. But they came out just before dark and carried me back to the bunker. The next day they brought in maybe six helicopters and three Phantom jets and two gunships. The Phantoms were dropping napalm and the gunships were blasting away, and the helicopters were shooting everything in sight when one of them peeled off and landed. They got me on board with the other wounded. The crew chief was firing an M-16 out the back door when we took off and the hot casings were landing on me."

"...I got a Purple Heart in the hospital on my 19th birthday, March 15th. A Marine Colonel came by with a Master Gunnery Sergeant, and he pinned the Purple Heart on my pajamas. He also gave me a birthday cake. Then he moved on to a young Marine who'd lost both legs and pinned a Purple Heart on him. The Marine tore it off and threw it on the floor, and he said, "That won't bring back my legs." The Colonel lost his composure and left the ward. But the Sergeant stayed. He held the Marine in his arms, and the Marine was crying, and the Sergeant told him he should be proud to be a Marine and proud to be an American. Then the Colonel came back and pinned the Purple Heart on again. This time the Marine left it on. But he was right, it didn't bring back his legs."

I found this old newspaper and letters from Bob Ringham, while going through a box of old stories I had written. I keep all my old service related stuff in a cardboard box, deep in the closet of a back bedroom. I came across some other old photographs of Marines I had known, names mostly forgotten now. I wonder sometimes, where they are and what they are doing, and if they have survived as long as I have? I think there may be a number of Bob Ringham's out there, men we fought alongside and men we cried with over the loss of fallen comrades, wounded men carried away, some never seen nor heard from again. I wonder if they too sit in their little offices located in the rear of their house located in a small corner of America, wondering about those they once knew, about those who survived a place called Khe Sanh?

KHE SANH VETERANS STILL SERVING
Michael Ray K Co 3/26

Retired Davenport cop is training Iraqi police
By Dustin Lemmon

Michael Ray, second from right, a retired Davenport police officer, is pictured with Iraqi police officers in Baghdad. Ray is in Iraq with the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team to teach law enforcement skills to new police officers in the Middle East country.

It took Michael Ray years to put his experiences in Vietnam behind him. It wasn't until an opportunity to help in Iraq came along that he found a way to put them to rest for good. His family says Ray, a retired Davenport police officer, has been working in Iraq since November, training Iraqi police. His wife and son said he's trying to help the Iraqis in hopes that its people will be in better shape to run the country themselves when Americans leave than the people of Vietnam were. "Being a Vietnam vet, he felt like they never got to put things to rest," Shawn Ray, Michael's son, said. "If the world is a better place he's going to feel good. "Ray's wife, Barbara Ray of Buffalo, recently returned from Costa Rica where she and her husband were able to vacation before he had to return to Iraq to finish the final six months of his voluntary duty. She said her husband was shot in Vietnam when a bullet that went through his lieutenant struck him in the shoulder, exited his body and hit another soldier in the ankle. The lieutenant died, she said. Ray served at the fire base in Khe Sanh during the Tet offensive in 1968, in which the base was attacked by the NVA in one of the largest and most remembered battles of the Vietnam War.

Barbara Ray said her husband didn't talk about the war for a long time but saw volunteering in Iraq as an opportunity to make up for the failures he saw in Vietnam. "He had been in Vietnam and he kind of felt at the time that rather than having closure over there we just kind of left," Ray said. He thinks "as people we owe it to (Iraqis) to help them get their freedom. "Michael Ray, 60, served in the military for 11 years and worked for 23 years as a Davenport police officer. He was shot in 1987 while working a security job at a restaurant in the Village of East Davenport. Ray retired from the police force in 2001. It's the second time Ray has served in the Middle East in the past three years. Prior to serving in Iraq, he was in Qatar for a year working in security for DynCorp International. His duties in Iraq are more dangerous, his wife said. "He's not working in the Green Zone (a safe zone in Baghdad)," she said. "He's actively going out to the Iraqi police stations. "Ray and other members of the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team have been teaching the Iraqis how to use guns, to search people and to write paperwork, Barbara Ray said.

"They're happy to have them there," she said of the Iraqis, adding her husband speaks to them through an interpreter. "He's just amazed by their desire to learn. They want to help. "One of Ray's interpreters befriended him after telling Ray about how his own father was killed when he was younger. The man took to calling Ray his "father," Barbara Ray said. She said her husband doesn't talk much about how dangerous the job can be. On their vacation he did finally admit that he wasn't in a safe place while working in Iraq. She said other volunteers on the team have been killed by explosions, and Ray himself has witnessed attacks. "They have to dive into bomb shelters on a regular basis," Shawn Ray said. Barbara Ray said she hopes the experience helps both the Iraqis and her husband. "He's helping them to see Americans as individuals and that we do care," Ray said. "I hope it makes him feel like he did something good"

INCOMING

PAYING OUR RESPECTS

By Ron Shouse

Cliff and I don't always get to do happy things and this past February was no exception. Bravo Battery Alumni, class of 68, Tom Keaton, Jerry Williams, Cliff and I journeyed to St Louis Mo to attend the funeral of Glen Rappold's wife, Helen. Our KSV President, Russ Turner, and his lovely wife Kathy, arrived to pay their respects on behalf of the KSV.

While in St Louis, Cliff, Glen and I had the opportunity to visit the Missouri Air National Guard and meet the Commanding Officer. We talked for awhile, gave him one of our coins and a pen from the KSV, and had pictures taken. As we were leaving the HQ Building we noticed a sign that said 3/24 USMC. There was no way we were going to pass up an opportunity to square away the younger bunch, so in we went. Most of these men had done a tour in Iraq, some in a combat status, but mostly support. We were well received and again took a few pictures. We also went to Jefferson Barracks National Cemetery to visit our memorial to those who were KIA on 06 March 68, when the aircraft in which they were passengers was shot down at Khe Sanh. They were buried in a mass grave. God Bless Them All.

We also visited the wonderful memorial that Glen built in his back yard. As the sign said, it was really a labor of love to have built such a wonderful remembrance to our brothers who were KIA.

Dear Tom,

I am writing about the comprehensive Chronology of Khe Sanh published in issue 64 of Red Clay. The unit I served with was not included in the Lam Son 719 operation. I served with Delta Company 14TH Combat Engineer Battalion, USA. We were stationed at Camp Evans & Quang Tri. Our Battalion Headquarters was actually located at Quang Tri. I and four other soldiers actually led the operation up the mountain. We started at dusk and arrived at the Khe Sanh Plateau at 10:00 the next morning.

"LESS WE FORGET"
Robert Jenkins, Medal of Honor KIA 05 Mar 69

Vietnam Hero: 36 years later, memory lives on in hearts of family, friends.
By Randy Lefko
Palatka Daily News

It was Feb. 5, 1969, and Operation Dewey Canyon near the North and South Vietnamese border was two weeks old. American forces were holding a hilltop in the jungles just inside the South Vietnamese border in a vicious fire battle with North Vietnamese troops.

On March 3, a platoon of 12 U.S. Marines from the Third Reconnaissance Battalion, Third Marine Division, was inserted into the battle after the North Vietnamese continued to barrage the American troops.

Two days later, Robert Jenkins Jr., a 20-year-old Interlachen Marine, and Fred Ostrom, a 19-year-old New York Marine, were side by side in a muddy hole with their machine guns blasting away with 10 other Marines trying to stave off the offensive. "Robert was a machine gunner and I was his assistant pushing the ammunition into the weapon," said Ostrom, who was wounded by a grenade earlier, losing part of his right arm and hand. "The enemy threw a gas grenade into the hole as we were getting sliced by bullets left and right," said Ostrom. "I ran to get my gas mask when they threw a hand grenade into the hole. Robert saw it, ran toward me, pushed me out of the way and jumped on the grenade. He absorbed the full blast. I will never forget Robert for that." That was 3 a.m. on March 5, 1969.

Jenkins was killed instantly, said Ostrom, who continued the fight until a platoon of Huey helicopters came in about 7:30 a.m. and cleared the area of enemy fire. "I got hit with another grenade two or three minutes later and broke my arm in four places," said Ostrom. "When the choppers came in, the medics lifted Robert and took him to the helicopter. Marines never leave a Marine." Later in March of 1969, Jenkins was honored with the U.S. Congressional Medal of Honor and the Purple Heart and has been honored with the National Defense Service Medal, the Vietnam Service Medal with two bronze stars and the Republic of Vietnam Campaign Medal.

Jenkins' father, Robert Sr., 83, and mother, Willie Mae, 80, have lived in Interlachen since 1947 and still remember their son every March 5. "I kind of mill around the house that day and look around hoping to see him walking out there," said Jenkins Sr. "Thirty six years and his memory is still here. His momma doesn't talk about it much. It pains her to talk about it. I wish he was still around." Jenkins Sr had been a soldier during World War II, but was only in the Army eight years before being asked to leave for medical reasons. "They told me I had medical problems before I went in and it wasn't because of my service," said Jenkins. "It's garbage."

Jenkins said Robert wanted to join up and get his 20 years after hearing what had happened to him. "Robert went right down and joined up," he said. "He said, 'Papa, if you went in, I'm going in." On a spring day in 1969, Jenkins can't recall exactly when, he was sitting at a pond fishing in the west side of Interlachen. "I saw this car pull up and a Marine captain got out and walked toward me," he said. "I knew. It hit me real bad when he told me my boy had been killed in the war. I just went to pieces. After all this time, I still don't know exactly how he died."

Not long after the news about Robert, his younger brother, James, joined the Army. "I took him down to Palatka and we signed him up," said Jenkins. "They told me not to worry about James because he wouldn't see any front line action because of Robert being killed." James served his 20 years and retired, but has been absent from the family for about three years. "All I know is he is in Gainesville somewhere," said Jenkins. "He don't come around here no more. Maybe because of Robert, it's too tough." In 1977, the Putnam County School District honored Jenkins by naming the Robert H. Jenkins Jr. Middle School in Palatka. Ostrom and fellow Marines fund the Robert H. Jenkins Jr. Memorial Award, which is awarded to students who exhibit good citizenship, hard work and an unselfish attitude. In Interlachen, the Robert H. Jenkins Jr. Memorial Park stretches along Atlantic Avenue just a few yards from the Jenkins' house. "I come out here time to time and just drive up and down the road," said Jenkins. "The town of Interlachen keeps it clean." Ostrom said he has been lobbying for a Navy ship, a guided missile destroyer, to be named in honor of Jenkins.

"I don't know what else I can do to thank him," said Ostrom, now 56. "I have been fortunate enough, because of Robert, to enjoy my family and my grandchildren all because of him. I will never forget what he did for me. My son Sean has a 2 year old named Brock Robert Ostrom that was named for Robert."

Retirees Dig in Heels Over Tricare Fees
Stars and Stripes By Tom Philpott
April 06, 2006

Ignoring the intimidating props, boxes of angry letters from thousands of military retirees senior Defense officials and military leaders appeared March 29 before a contentious House subcommittee to make their case for hiking Tricare fees sharply for under-65 retirees and their families. In the verbal sparring that ensued, Pentagon leaders gave as good as they got. But no lawmaker took the role of referee. All threw punches on behalf of retirees, and treated with kid gloves a second panel of witnesses representing dozens of pro-retiree military associations and veteran groups.

The Pentagon's plan to boost out-of-pocket Tricare costs for 3 million beneficiaries, to include a tripling of managed-care enrollment fees for retired officers and a doubling for senior enlisted retirees, seemed to shatter some traditional alliances and form new ones. Republicans and Democrats together questioned the realism of projected cost savings from raising Tricare fees and the wisdom of doing so in wartime. The active duty four-star officers in the room spoke in support of the increases. Retired officers led the opposition.

David S.C. Chu, undersecretary of defense, and Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., the Pentagon's health affairs chief, reminded the armed services' subcommittee on military personnel that, since 1995, Tricare benefits and the beneficiary population have grown, program costs have soared, yet Tricare fees have remained the same. They portrayed it as a bureaucratic oversight that now needs correcting. Otherwise, military health costs, which have doubled since 2001, could double again by 2015.

Defense leaders were joined by the vice chiefs of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps, who echoed the contention that a prized benefit will be difficult to sustain unless fees are raised. "For 11 years we have not done just service to this benefit, in that we failed to index" Tricare fees and CO-payments to inflation, said Adm. Robert F. Willard, vice chief of naval operations. Benefit enhancements, rising medical costs nationwide and a widening disparity between Tricare cost-shares and private health insurance premiums have led to a migration of working retirees and their families back intoTricare.

That recent shift, said Chu, is encouraged by civilian employers, some using cash incentives, hoping to trim their own health care obligations. Indexing Tricare fees to medical inflation back in 1995, said Willard, "would have prevented the current crisis that we find ourselves in." But Rep. Vic Snyder of Arkansas, ranking Democrat on the panel, challenged Willard's use of the word "crisis." "A crisis implies we're not going to pay for anything. We're going to pay for health care for our men and women in uniform, and retirees. We're going to sustain the program. The question is how ... and right now there's not a lot of ... enthusiasm for the method you all have proposed," Snyder said.

He also questioned department hand wringing over the widening disparity between Tricare fees and private health insurance premiums. "We want there to be a disparity because that's part of what we give for people turning their life over to us 24 hours a day," said Snyder. Snyder referred then to comment from Gen. Robert Magnus, assistant Marine Corps commandant, in defense of the higher fees, that Tricare would remain the "gold standard" of health plans. If that's true, Snyder suggested, migration of retirees will continue despite higher fees because "people are going to jump from the silver standard. They're going to jump from the copper and bronze standard."

"The issue is ... can we sustain the gold standard," said Chu. "What happened in the last 10 years is we polished the gold standard to a very high luster. The result is that private companies and state governments are trying to shift their appropriate medical costs to the Department of Defense." To the charge the planned fees would climb too far and too fast, Chu said another way to look at them is that for 11 years, "our beneficiary population has enjoyed a relief from indexing."

Defense officials estimate the higher fees will save $11 billion by 2011. The assumptions are that 144,000 current users will decide to leave Tricare and another 350,000 beneficiaries, who would have shifted to Tricare if fees stayed frozen, will stay with their private sector plan. What the estimates really mean, said Snyder, is that 500,000 retirees don't agree that the increases are modest, as Chu suggests. Chu said younger retirees should be willing to contribute more to sustain the program and "to deal with the [employer] cost-shifting issue."

"Usually when a product improves people are happy to help contribute to the cost of improvements," Chu said. "And that's what We're asking here." Retired Navy Vice Adm. Norbert R. Ryan Jr., testifying on behalf of The Military Coalition, a consortium of service associations, called the planned fees "disproportional and inappropriate." Ryan said he was surprised to hear uniformed leaders take "a sky-is-falling approach" to Tricare costs. The greater danger to an all-volunteer force, during a long war, would be raising future health care costs for careerists facing their second or third wartime deployment, he suggested. Snyder asked if the firestorm over Tricare fees could have been avoided if officials pushed for a more modest change, perhaps to adjust retiree Tricare fees in the future by the percentage rise in military retired pay each year. Ryan said he couldn't be sure that wouldn't anger retirees.

Retired Army Maj. Gen. William M. Matz, speaking for another group of associations, the National Veterans Alliance, said it was "astounding" to hear the Pentagon explain a cost-saving plan intended to discourage thousands of retirees not to use their earned benefits.

WE GET MAIL

Tom,

Perhaps our ships crossed in the past……it would have been long ago!

My wife just sent me the Spring Issue of Red Clay.

Appears she sent (see "pg 22) - a short note that was picked up by RED CLAY…. Thanks for your kind thoughts and support from fellow Marines who have served and continue to serve our country in its time of need.

As I reflected upon the current issue of RED CLAY and what my Situational Awareness is currently in Iraq (IZ) I have noted a common theme that may be of interest to those who served in VN. The list is not comprehensive nor is it meant to be. However, in the heat of battle, it represents some observations that I have made as a result of having two deployments in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom (OIF).

Although the "Lord" allowed me a safe return as I departed KSCB on the 27th or 28th of Dec. 1967. The experiences serving with , D Co 1/26 for 12 months have remained ingrained in my soul and a day does not go by wherein I do not reflect upon the good and bad times we all experienced during that time. My tour in 67 was two fold – Rice Patty's in the AO of Hill 55 in Da Nang and the daily conflicts we experienced at Dodge City / Liberty Road and continual "Sparrow Hawk" operations at other AO's are distant memories. This does not include the second phase of my tour wherein we were at KSCB and performed combat missions that principally emphasized as I recall: Perimeter Security of KSCB, Major Operations and Defense of Combat Outposts at Hills 861 and 881 that overlooked the KSCB.

The "Threat" we marines experienced in Viet Nam (VN) are different in some ways to what we are experiencing in IZ. . However the "Threat" remains and how the Insurgents in IZ deliver upon that "Threat"' has tremendous similarities in what we experienced in VN.

Upon reflecting on VN in relation to my second deployment in support of OIF some startling similarities with different names:

Tom – Although the names are different … there is a tremendous similarity as evidenced above.

Reading the Chronology of KS in RED CLAY only reminded me once again of the details of what we often forget over time. You must Thank - Reverend Stubbe for his historical efforts.

Jim Savage, Henry Gagne, and Mike Powers were friends that I served with in D Co. as there were others - Smith, Taylor, Lennox, Gervasi, and Talbot. I am sure there are other names that I can recall over time. And of course there is my former CO Capt. Spencer. Most of the names of other fellow marines are a distant memory.

In the event you see Ernie, tell him I said hello and remind him that I am the Marine who lived down the street in Martinez.... I am sure he will remember me and his book Macho Man that he presented to me is a constant reminder of that time and place where we shared a common experience.

I have read RED CLAY over the years and as a result of the recent issue I have reflected on the experiences and event with far more thought.

I am thankful for that reflection the Red Clay offers.

Tom, again, I appreciate all the support. Upon my completion of over 30 years of service in the Marine Corps, perhaps at that time I can fully participate in the KSV reunion. I often wanted to attend, but my obligations with career and the Corps often conflicted with the reunion schedule. It was unfortunate, but perhaps the future will allow me the opportunity to meet once again with those I had the honor to have served with.

Note 1:
Tom the individual gear we utilized in VN was often referred to a 782 gear.... However, the issue today, although similar is far more complex and technologically evolved. With all this technology comes the price of weight and complexity.

My observations are that today's Marines' are far more mobile than we were during my tour with the 26th Marines. For the most part as a 0311, I remember the word was "Grunt" and "Humping," were synonymous.

As such I have not reflected on the personal gear issue regarding a compare and contrast. Basically, today the Marines have more 782 gear to complete there Missions.

Footnote:

Thanks for allowing me the time to reflect on a time and place that had a significant and dramatic impact on my life and family some 39 years ago.

As a side note.... As I prepared to send this email … I received an email from Mike Powers, who I had the opportunity to share many moments with in 1967. I have not heard from Mike in over 39 years … I received positive contact from him today via email.

I look forward to getting back to him in the near term.

MEMOIRS

AWOL FROM KHE SANH

By Tom Eichler

In an article written entitled "Professionalism versus Managerialism in Vietnam", written by Professor Richard A. Gabriel in the January-February 1981 issue of the Air University Review, he attempted to assess the combat performance of the Marine Corps in Vietnam based on certain statistics, which included the desertion rate. Lieutenant Colonel W. Hays Parks USMCR took issue with his findings, in the May-June Issue of the same review. The following is an excerpt from that article, which includes the desertion statistics from Khe Sanh during the entire siege.

Colonel Parks based his findings on his experience as a Marine infantry officer and judge advocate during the Vietnam War. Having served as the chief trial counsel (i.e., senior prosecutor) for the Second Marine Division (1967-68) and the First Marine Division (1968-69). Professor Gabriel's attempt to assess the combat performance of the Marine Corps in Vietnam based on certain limited statistics was not supported by the cases tried.

Colonel Parks agreed, as Professor Gabriel argues, the Marines placed greater emphasis on maintaining a disciplined military force than did the Army. Thus, while the Army had five to six judge advocates per Vietnam division, the Marines had as many as eighteen prior to the August 1969 revision of the Manual for Courts-Martial, more after that date, most of whom concentrated on military justice. In fairness to the Army, Colonel Parks stated that the Army judge advocates handled the claims program for all of Vietnam, thus permitting the Marines to concentrate on military justice. Other factors impacted on Marine performance.

Colonel Parks found there was a serious error on Professor Gabriel's part in his conclusion that "Marine Corps units suffered problems equal to or even greater than those found in Army units" with respect to certain offenses. They did have different philosophies regarding disposition of offenses. The Marine Corps took even the slightest infraction to trial, whereas the Army very early in the war began referring most of its offenses to non judicial punishment or Chapter 10 (administrative) separation. Professor Gabriel seemed to acknowledge this with his comments on the rigid disciplinary system of the Marines but neglects it in his conclusion regarding the similarity of offense rates.

Colonel Parks cited one example to show the disparity of attitude toward prosecution between the two services. In 1968 he tried three Marines who deserted from Khe Sanh at the height of the siege. They made their way to Saigon, where they became part of a 50-man (3 Marine, 47 Army) black market ring dealing in postal money orders. All 50 were deserters. He tried the three Marines before general courts-martial and gained sentences in excess of ten years for each. Although the soldiers were susceptible to the same charges, they were allowed to plead guilty to lesser offenses before special courts-martial or accept administrative separation because of the shortage of Army judge advocates.

Colonel Parks also disagreed with Professor Gabriel when he inferred that desertion/AWOL occurred in combat units, citing the "desertion per thousand rate". Colonel Parks stated those statistics were for the Marine Corps as a whole, not for the Marine Corps in Vietnam exclusively.

Colonel Parks stated that in the First Marine Division in Vietnam during 1968-69 (the height of the Corps involvement in Vietnam), fewer than a dozen Marines were tried for desertion; the Third Marine division was even less (a Marine Division in combat Exceeded 25,000 strength). That is why he says Professor Gabriel really missed the mark when he used stateside statistics to compare "Marine and Army battlefield Performance."

Ed Note:
I do not think the matter of desertion was ever debated prior to Mike Fishbaugh printing the article on the Khe Sanh Veterans Web Site. Several of our members responded to the article, myself included.

One of the Corpsman I met while at the BAS at Khe Sanh went on R&R and tried to return while the siege was at its peak. A couple of "not able to land" flights and he just didn't come back! Morris was a Silver Star recipient from earlier battles, so to think him a coward doesn't fit well! He ended up in jail in Da Nang, reduced in rank and I'm sure well persecuted. I ran into him in the Philippines on the way home! I didn't agree with Morris' actions, but going through what we went through, I couldn't hold it against him either! I'm sure he has paid a great price over these years! If you happen to see Morris, tell him " I am glad you made it home."

I was injured and sent to the hospital directly from Hill 861-A on March 7, 1968. Three (3) weeks later I was released from the hospital and had to make my own way back to Khe Sanh. I had a heck of a time, I checked in at the USMC Liaison Desk at every location but couldn't make it back until March 31. Every place I went—Camh Ranh Bay, Da Nang, Dong Ha, and Quang Tri—I got an excuse as to why I couldn't get a flight. I was fortunate to meet some Sea Bees at the airport in Da Nanag., They let me spend the night with them and told me to come back If I still couldn't get out. Come to find out that one of the "Bees" was the cousin of a high school classmate.

I Finally got out after two (2) nights with the "Bees" when I met a Sergeant from 1/9 who told me to go to my battalion rear and I told him "that's what I'm trying to do Sir, the 2/26 rear is at Khe Sanh." When he heard that he got real helpful and took me to the 1/9 rear. I guess he was impressed that someone wanted to go back. Anyway, 1/9 Marines helped me get back and even had me carry extra equipment to Khe Sanh for them. I can't blame them in the least bit. The guys needed it and it had to get there somehow.

Bottom line, I was an 18 year old PFC with just eight (8) months in the Corps and not a whole lot of skill or savvy but I managed to make it back. It wasn't easy though, so I can understand if someone was "delayed en-route." But to go over the hill" strikes me as a weak excuse.

I Sure would like to know who those three Marines who were court martialed were. We lost several Marines who left for medical reasons and never returned, through the years we've found one or two of them, but there are several still "MNIA" as "Missing - Not in Action."

(Interesting side note) I learned form my two nights with the "Bees" that they can drink almost as good as a Marine. CAN DO "Bees" CAN DO.

On 5 February 1968, our positions on Hill 861A were overrun at the start of the Tet Offensive. After a horrific battle the enemy was severely defeated. It came at the cost of 11 Marines KIA and many more WIA. I was a participant in that battle as was Larry McCartney. I was scheduled for R&R shortly after the battle. I was fortunate to be going to the much desired country of Australia. Through all the chaos in Vietnam, I managed to make it to the R&R center in Danang. I did this by begging transportation from every source available, even flying with those Marines who were KIA at Khe Sanh.

When I arrived at Danang I was approximately two hours late checking in. Thus, they gave away my flight to Australia to some non combatant, even though there was time to correct the change and allow me to go to my original destination. Here I was filthy, covered with Red Clay, covered with the blood of those Marines who did not make it, and I was being treated like dirt.

I was sent to the Philippines for R&R which I really did not want. In fact I requested to go back to Khe Sanh, and give up the R&R. I was instructed to go on my R&R and to quit complaining. When I returned to Danang, like Larry, I attempted to get back to at Khe Sanh. No one wanted to go to Khe Sanh because of the siege.

Although I could have easily stayed at Danang or went to some other nice place, I felt like Larry. I had an obligation to get back to Khe Sanh. Although it wasn't easy, I managed to make it back to Khe Sanh by begging a ride with a helicopter crew from Marble Mountain, who were bringing a repair crew to Khe Sanh to fix a damaged CH 34.

Upon landing at Khe Sanh during a barrage, the repair crew were all wounded while disembarking from the CH 46, because they tried to bring off some equipment. I had previously told them to kick the equipment out the rear door and run like hell for the trench line along side the airstrip.

I made it to the trench line just as it took a direct hit. It was full of Marines who like myself, were waiting for a helicopter to take them to their respective Hills. Most of them were killed or wounded. I had my backpack and canteens on my belt blown off, but was not seriously wounded. To this day, I do not know how I survived.

Even though those who served at Khe Sanh endured many such experiences, they as I , had no thought about going over the hill. I find citing such experiences as a weak excuse.

THE FINAL INSPECTION

The Marine stood and faced God,
Which must always come to pass.
He hoped his shoes were shining,
Just as brightly as his brass.

"Step forward now, Marine,
How shall I deal with you?
Have you always turned the other cheek?
To My Church have you been true?"

The Marine squared his shoulders and said,
"No, Lord, I guess I ain't.
Because those of us who carry guns,
Can't always be a saint.

I've had to work most Sundays,
And at times my talk was tough.
And sometimes I've been violent,
Because the world is awfully rough.

But, I never took a penny,
That wasn't mine to keep..
Though I worked a lot of overtime,
When the bills got just too steep.

And I never passed a cry for help,
Though at times I shook with fear
And sometimes, God, forgive me,
I've wept unmanly tears.

I know I don't deserve a place,
Among the people here.
They never wanted me around,
Except to calm their fears.

If you've a place for me here, Lord,
It needn't be so grand.
I never expected or had too much,
But if you don't, I'll understand.

BOOK REVIEW

"LURPS"
By Robert C. Ankony

From a blue-collar neighborhood in southwest Detroit to the badlands of northern I Corps, Ankony's memoir is a vivid and unusually honest tale of one man's journey to war in South Vietnam and back...From his remarkable eyewitness account of the North Vietnamese attack on Quang Tri City during the 1968 Tet Offensive to his description of the equipment and skills a soldier in Vietnam needed to survive, [Ankony] has given us an highly readable tale that is sure to entertain and inform anyone who has an interest in the war" -- Dr. Erik B. Villard, US Center of Military History, Washington, D.C.

"Lurps is the memoir of a juvenile delinquent who drops out of ninth grade to pursue a dream of military service. While a paratrooper in Europe, he volunteers for Vietnam where he joins the elite U.S. Army LRRP/Rangers--small, heavily armed long-range reconnaissance teams that patrolled deep in enemy-held territory. Set in 1968, during some of the war's major campaigns and battles including Tet, Khe Sanh, and A Shau Valley, Lurps considers war through the eyes of a green young warrior. The compelling narrative and realistic dialogue engrosses the reader in both the horror and the humor of life in Vietnam and reflects upon the broader philosophical issue of war.

This poignant, autobiographical, coming-of-age story explores the social background that shaped the protagonist's thinking; his quest for redemption through increased responsibility; the brotherhood of comrades in arms; women and his sexual awakening; and the mysterious, baffling randomness of who lives and who dies."
Bob,

Thanks for the book and the lovely words. I was just planning on writing you yesterday, to tell you that your book, unlike any other that I've worked on, keeps coming back to me--all those images that seem so real that I surely must have lived them myself. More than anything it's the voice--your voice--that comes through without any of that macho, glory-days strutting that seems to leak into even the best books about war and combat. Through your unflinching honesty (and your innate storytelling ability), you've contributed something real and valuable about war, about that war, and about imperfect humans and the sometimes mysterious ways in which they transcend their own mediocrity.

Hats off, my friend--it's a beautiful thing,.

Mike

In The Highest Tradition
By B.B. Yarborough

Fig 1

Second photo (Fig 2) taken by me during the Memorial to the 33 KIA's of 3/1 in May 2005. Behind the CO (LtCol W. Buhl), is Kasal in the wheel chair. Talking to him is Frank Albano who was in my infantry company during the Korean War. I talked to Kasal that day, and although there was a question at that time if one of his legs could be saved (he received 7 bullet wounds plus shrapnel from a grenade), his main concern was how long it would be before he could get back o duty.

Third photo (Fig 3) taken by John Wintersteen at the 3/1 homecoming April 1st, 2006. Kasal is in leather jacket with walking cane. Here is the happy ending. On May 1st, Kasal was promoted to Sergeant Major, decorated with the Navy Cross, which was end result of nomination for Medal of Honor), and assigned to a three year tour as head of a recruiting office in Des Moines, Iowa, which is near his home. I attended the ceremony for now Sergeant Major Brad Kasal on May 1, 2006.

Fig 3

The last photo (Fig 4) of this Marine's Marine is a testament to what will power, medical care and prayer can accomplish in the relatively short time of 1 1/2 years.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20350-1000

The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the NAVY CROSS to

FIRST SERGEANT
BRADLEY A. KASAL
UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS

for service as set forth in the following

CITATION:

For extraordinary heroism while serving as First Sergeant, Weapons Company, 3d Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, Regimental Combat Team 1, 1st Marine Division, I Marine Expeditionary Force, U.S. Marine Corps Forces Central Command in support of Operation IRAQI FREEDOM on 13 November 2004. First Sergeant Kasal was assisting 1st Section, Combined Anti-Armor Platoon as they provided a traveling over watch for 3d Platoon when he heard a large volume of fire erupt to his immediate front, shortly followed by Marines rapidly exiting a structure. When First Sergeant Kasal learned that Marines were pinned down inside the house by an unknown number of enemy personnel, he joined a squad making entry to clear the structure and rescue the Marines inside. He made entry into the first room, immediately encountering and eliminating an enemy insurgent, as he spotted a wounded Marine in the next room. While moving towards the wounded Marine, First Sergeant Kasal and another Marine came under heavy rifle fire from an elevated enemy firing position and were both severely wounded in the legs, immobilizing them. When insurgents threw grenades in an attempt to eliminate the wounded Marines, he rolled on top of his fellow Marine and absorbed the shrapnel with his own body. When First Sergeant Kasal was offered medical attention and extraction, he refused until the other Marines were given medical attention. Although severely wounded himself, he shouted encouragement to his fellow Marines as they continued to clear the structure. By his bold leadership, wise judgment, and complete dedication to duty, First Sergeant Kasal reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

For the President,

Secretary of the Navy

SHORT ROUNDS

Did You Ever Wonder What Happened To The " MARLBORO MAN".

Michael Preston wondered what ever happened to the Marine whose picture was plastered across hundred's of newspapers, after the Battle of Fallujah. He found this interesting article which answered the question. what ever happened to the "The Malboro Man".

By MATTHEW B. STANNARD
SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE

The photograph hit the world on Nov. 10, 2004: a close-cropped shot of a Marine in Iraq, his face smeared with blood and dirt, a cigarette dangling from his lips, smoke curling across weary eyes .It was an instant icon, with Dan Rather calling it "the best war photograph in recent years." About 100 newspapers ran the photo, dubbing the anonymous warrior the "Marlboro Man." The man in the photo is James Blake Miller, now 21, and he is an icon, though in ways Rather probably never imagined. He's quieter now – easier to anger. He turns to fight at the sound of a backfire, can't look at fireworks without thinking of fire raining down on a city. He has trouble sleeping, and when he does, his fingers twitch on invisible triggers. The diagnosis: post-traumatic stress disorder.

His life in Kentucky, before and after the clicking shutter, says much about hundreds of thousands of new war veterans as his photograph said about that one bad day in Fallujah, a photo Miller cannot see as an icon. "I don't see a whole lot," he said. "I see a day I won't care to remember, but that I'll never forget." As a teenager from the hills of eastern Kentucky, Miller followed in his grandfather's footsteps and joined the Marines. He left for boot camp in November 2002. Four months later, the war in Iraq broke out. "Before I knew it," Miller said, "I was thrown into the mix without even thinking about it." For a while, Iraq didn't seem all that bad. Miller and his fellow Marines settled into a routine, setting up hiding places among the palms and sand, and watching for the white pickups that insurgents used to plant bombs and fire mortars.

There also was time for candy and laughter with the Iraqi children who came running to see the U.S. troops. Miller felt he was helping. Then, on Nov. 5, 2004, in the middle of a sandstorm, the Marines got word that they might be heading for an assault on Fallujah, at the time, the capital of the Iraqi insurgency. No U.S. forces had gone inside the city in months. And now Miller would be among the first. He had been a Marine for less than two years. "It puts butterflies in my stomach right now," he said. "I don't know if you can describe it. I don't think words can."

The days before the assault were an intense blur of training, preparation and fear. But there was one bright spot, when Miller ran into a good friend in the chow hall, Demarkus Brown, a 22-year-old from Virginia whom he had met in infantry school. Now they were together outside Fallujah. The assault began Nov. 8, 2004, when U.S. planes hammered the city in advance of the artillery push. Miller was under fire from the moment he stepped out of the personnel carrier. It lasted into Nov. 9 – the day that, for a while, would make Miller's face the most famous in Iraq.

As Miller remembers that day, he was on a rooftop taking fire and calling for support on his radio. As insurgent bullets from a nearby building pinged off the roof, a horrified Miller heard footsteps coming up the stairs behind him. He said he raised his rifle – and barely had time to halt when he saw it was embedded Los Angeles Times photographer Luis Sinco. Miller returned to his radio, guiding two tanks to his position. When they opened fire, he said, the thunder left his body numb – but the building housing the attackers had collapsed. Later, he said, they would find about 40 bodies in the rubble. "I was never so happy in all my life to take that handset away from my head," Miller said. "I lit up a cigarette." His ear was bleeding from the sound of the tank firing – Miller still can't hear out of his right ear. His nose bled from a nick he took when his rifle scope and radio got tangled up mid fire. He looked at the sunrise and wondered how many more of those he would see. He was vaguely aware that elsewhere on the rooftop, Sinco was taking pictures.

At a briefing the next day, Miller's gunnery sergeant walked up to him, grinning, and said: "Would you believe you're the most famous Marine in the Marine Corps right now? Believe it or not, your ugly mug just went all over the U.S." The Marines wanted to pull him out of Fallujah, Miller, said, not wanting their poster boy to die in combat. But he stayed. He won't talk about the weeks that followed. He only mentions moments. The day his column barely survived an ambush, escaping through a broken door as bullets struck near their feet. The morning he woke up to discover that a cat had taken up residence in the open chest cavity of an Iraqi body nearby. The day he discovered Brown, his friend from infantry school, had been killed.

"When we found out, I told a couple of my buddies who were close to him, too. We just sat around, and we didn't say much at all," Miller said. "You didn't have the heart to cry." But it wasn't those terrible benchmarks that affected him the most, Miller said. It was the daily chore of war: the times he had to raise his rifle, peer through the scope and squeeze the trigger to launch a bullet, not at a target, but at a human being. "It's one thing to be shot at, and you shoot a couple rounds back, just trying to suppress somebody else," Miller said. "It's another thing when you see a human being shooting a round at you, knowing that you're shooting back with the intent to kill them.""You're looking through a scope at somebody. It's totally different. You can make out a guy's eyes."

When Miller returned to the States, none of the Marines talked much about the strain that war puts on one's emotions, Miller said. The "wizards", military psychologists, gave the returning troops a briefing on the subject, but nobody paid attention. Miller dismissed the early signs, too. When he and his buddies reacted to a truck backfire by dropping into a combat stance and raising imaginary rifles, well, that was to be expected. And when his wife, Jessica, the childhood sweetheart whom Miller had married in June told him he was tightening his arm around her neck in the night, that was strange, but he figured it would pass. So would the nightmares he began to have about Iraq.

Then one day, while visiting his wife at her college dorm in Pikeville, Miller looked out the window and clearly saw the body of an Iraqi sprawled out on the sidewalk. He turned away. "I said, 'Look honey, I just got to get out of here'. I couldn't even tell her at the time what had happened," he said. "(I thought), 'Well, that's it. That's my little spaz I'm supposed to have that the psychiatrists were talking about....I'm glad I got it out of the way." But he hadn't. Jessica Miller, a psychology student, tried to help with a visualization technique. But when he looked inside himself, Blake Miller found a demonic door guarded by a twisted figure in a black cloak. Under the cloak's hood, he spotted the snarling face of the teufelhund, a Marine Corps icon – the devil dog. "So I come out again, without closing the door," he said. "After all this happened, my nightmares started getting a lot worse."

Finally, Miller went to a military psychiatrist, who diagnosed him with signs of post-traumatic stress disorder. Miller thought that meant he could not be deployed. But in early September, he joined a group of Marines headed to New Orleans in the wake of Hurricane Katrina."I really didn't want to go....There was a possibility we would be shooting people," he said. "We could be going into another (urban warfare) environment just like Iraq, except this would actually be U.S. citizens. Here we go, Fallujah 2, right here in the States." Not long after they arrived, as Hurricane Rita bore down on them, the Marines were packed into the amphibious assault ship Iwo Jima to wait out the storm offshore. And one day, as Miller headed for the smoke deck with a Marlboro, a passing sailor made a whistling sound just like a rocket-propelled grenade.

"I don't remember grabbing him. I don't remember putting him against the bulkhead. I don't remember getting him down on the floor, I don't remember getting on top of him. I don't remember doing any of that," Miller said. On Nov. 10 – one year to the day after the Marlboro Man picture appeared in the Los Angeles Times, Miller was honorably discharged after a medical review. His military career was over. Miller returned to eastern Kentucky, the place he had spent years trying to escape. He wanted the familiarity and the safety of the people and land he'd known since birth. "Maybe it made me think twice about what I had lost," he said. "What I was really missing."

In a way, though, his family is still missing Blake Miller, the Miller who left Kentucky for Iraq a couple of years ago. The man who left was easygoing, quick to laugh, happy to sit in a relative's house and eat and smoke and talk. The man who came back is quick to anger, they say, and is quiet. And when he takes a seat in his adoptive grandmother's home, amid her collection of Christ figurines, it is in a chair that faces the door. Mildred Childers, who owns those figurines, sees Miller's difficulties as a crisis of faith. She still remembers Miller's call just before the assault on Fallujah, and his question: "How can people go to church and be a Christian and kill people in Iraq?" He was raised where that's one of the Ten Commandments, do not kill," she said.

Recently, some of his Marine buddies have been calling Miller up, crying drunk, and remembering their war experiences. "There's a lot of Vietnam vets … they don't heal until 30, 40 years down the road," Miller said. People bottle it up, become angry, easily temperamental, and hell, before you know it, these are the people who are snapping on you. "Jessica Miller interrupted. "You're already like that," she said. She recalled her first glimpse of the Marlboro Man – an image seen through tears of relief that he was alive, and misery at how worn he looked. "Some people thought it was sexy, and we thought, 'Oh, my God, he's in the middle of a war, close to death.' We just couldn't understand how some people could look at it like that," she said. "But I guess for some people it was glory, like patriotism." She looked at her quiet husband through the smoke drifting from his right hand. "This is the dark side of the reality of war…People don't want to know the Marlboro Man has PTSD."

Stories You Will Not See On Your Local News
By Doc Wurth
K CO 3/9

I grieve for the families of these fallen heroes. I am also darnm proud that we still have these selfless patriots being raised in this country who understand that there is something greater than themselves in this world. This includes my son, Eric.

Karla Comfort received a lot of looks and even some salutes from people when she drove from Benton, Ark., to Camp Pendleton, Calif., in her newly-painted, custom Hummer H3. The vehicle is adorned with the likeness of! her son, 20-year-old Lance Cpl. John M. Holmason, and nine other Marines with F Company, 2nd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division who where all killed by the same improvised explosive device blast in Fallujah, Iraq, in December.

For Karla Comfort, having the vehicle air brushed with the image of the 10 Marines was a way to pay homage to her hero and his fellow comrades who fell on Iraq's urban battlefield. "I wanted to let people know (Marines) are doing their jobs honorably, and some of them die," said the 39-year-old from Portland, OR "I don't want people to forget the sacrifices that my son and the other Marines made."

Leading up to her son's death, Karla Comfort had received several letters from him prior to his return. He had been deployed for five months, and Comfort "worried everyday he was gone until she got the letters and found out the date he was coming home," she said. Marines knocked on the front door of her home in Farmington, Mich., at 3 am with the dreadful news. "I let my guard down when I found out he was coming home," she said. "There are times that I still cannot believe it happened. It's very hard to deal with."

Karla Comfort came up with the idea for the rolling memorial when she and her two other sons attended John's funeral in Portland, Ore. "I saw a Vietnam (War) memorial on a car, and I said to my son Josh, 'we should do something like that for John,' she recalled."He loved Hummers." She purchased the vehicle in January and immediately took it to Airbrush Guy & Co. in Benton, Ark., where artist Robert Powell went to work on changing the plain, black vehicle into a decorative, mobile, art piece.

"I only had the vehicle for two days before we took it in," she joked. Two hundred and fifty man-hours later, Powell had completed the vehicle. The custom job would have cost $25,000. Out of respect for Karla Comfort's loss and the sacrifices the Marines made, Airbrush Guy & Co. did it for free. Comfort only had to purchase the paint, which cost $3,000. "I love it," she said. "I'm really impressed with it, and I think John would be happy with the vehicle. He would have a big smile on his face because he loved Hummers."

Karla Comfort gave Powell basic instructions on what to include in the paint job. But in addition to the image of her son in Dress Blues and the faces of the nine other Marines, there were several surprises. "He put a lot more on than I expected," she said. "I think my favorite part is the heaven scene."

On the left side of the vehicle, a detail of Marines are depicted carrying their fallen comrades through the clouds to their final resting place. The American flag drapes across the hood, the words, "Semper Fi" crown the front windshield and the spare tire cover carries the same Eagle Globe and Anchor design that her son had tattooed on his back.

"All the support I have been getting is wonderful," she said. Karla Comfort decided to move back to her hometown of Portland, and making the cross-country trip from Arkansas was a way for her to share her son's story. It's also her way of coping with the loss.

"Along the way I got nothing but positive feedback from people," she said. "What got to me was when people would salute the guys (Marines). It's hard to look at his picture. I still cry and try to get used to the idea, but it's hard to grasp the idea that he's really gone."

When 2nd Lt. James Cathey's body arrived at the Reno Airport, Marines climbed into the cargo hold of the plane and draped the flag over his casket as passengers watched the family gather on the tarmac. During the arrival of another Marine's casket last year at Denver International Airport, Major Steve Beck described the scene as one of the most powerful in the process: "See the people in the windows? They'll sit right there in the plane, watching those Marines. You gotta wonder what's going through their minds, knowing that they're on the plane that brought him home," he said. "They're going to remember being on that plane for the rest of their lives. They're going to remember bringing that Marine home. And they should

The night before the burial of her husband's body, Katherine Cathey refused to leave the casket, asking to sleep next to his body for the last time. The Marines made a bed for her, tucking in the sheets below the flag. Before she fell asleep, she opened her laptop computer and played songs that reminded her of 'Cat,' and one of the Marines asked if she wanted them to continue standing watch as she slept. "I think it would be kind of nice if you! kept doing it," she said. "I think that's what he would have wanted."

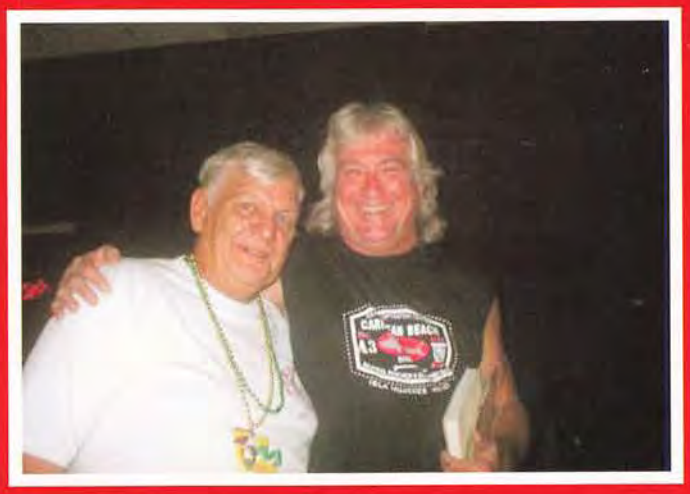
THE KHE SANH VETERANS 2006 REUNION, MOBILE ALABAMA

OLD WARRIORS AND GOOD FRIENDS

TOGETHER AGAIN

PARTY TIME AT VEETS BAR
JIMBO WITH OWNER DOUG PREVITO



From The Office of the Secretary

The reunion in Mobile though smaller than expected was one of the best I have attended. Members were very generous and supported our PX very well, enabling us to earn enough funds to purchase additional items for next year in DC.

I met two guys with whom I served with in Vietnam, Luther Upton and Clyde Phillips. It was the greatest feeling being with them again after all these years. The reunion committee did another outstanding job. My condolences to Neil Kenny and his lovely wife Alice on the loss of their beloved pet Charlie who attended the reunion with them. Charlie made a lot of friends at the reunion.

And, a get well to Glenn Rappold who had a stroke while undergoing a heart exam. The latest news is very good and he should make a full recovery. Next year's reunion should be the biggest ever because of the new Marine Corps Museum. See you all there. Semper Fi

Big John Pessoni, Secretary KSV

From The Desk of The VP

I hope that all who attended our annual reunion in Mobile had a good time. There were a few little things that went wrong, but what the hell, we are not the IBM Corporation. There were several things voted on at the membership meeting that concerns the whole KSV organization. Annual dues were increased to $ 30.00, and a Life Membership will now cost $ 250.00. Both increases will be effective 01 January, 2007.

There was also an election held for the offices of Vice President, Secretary, and three positions for Members At Large. There were no candidates for the office of VP and Secretary so Tom Eichler and John Pessoni were re-elected. Seven candidates ran for the three open spots on the BOD. Dan Fisher & Cliff Treese were re-elected and George Myrick was the top vote getter for the third opening. I want to personally thank Ron Shouse for his faithful and dedicated service as a member of the KSV BOD.

Another subject decided at the membership meeting was the location for the 2008 annual KSV Reunion. The location for 2007,Washington D.C. has already been chosen. There were four entrees, all from the West Coast: San Diego, Ca., Albuquerque NM, Las Vegas NV & Reno NV. The membership selected Reno Nevada, for the 2008 Reunion.

Message From The President

I want to thank all who attended our reunion in Mobile, Alabama. Though the turn out was not as large as we would have hoped for, most had a good time. Remember, your attendance and being able to see old buddies again is what the reunions are really about. Jimbo and I, are working on next years reunion in D.C.. We hope to have the plans finalized very soon. Hope to see many more in Washington next year for the new Marine Corps Museum, a visit to the Viet Nam Memorial, and a trip to 8th and I. This is my 4th year as president of this fine organization. I want to thank each of you for the trust you placed in me.

We expect a large turnout for the reunion in Washington. We need to have the registrations submitted as soon as possible, when we have the date finalized. We know many members will be bringing their families to see the many sites Washington offers. We will keep this in mind while selecting the hotel, affording the membership the opportunity of taking advantage of the fine Metro System in Washington D.C..

PROCLAMATION

WHEREAS, an organization was needed to promote renewed fellowship of those who survived the Khe Sanh and RVN experience thus forming the Khe Sanh Veterans Association Inc.; and

WHEREAS, one of the goals of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association Inc. was collecting and preserving an . accurate history of service in and around Khe Sanh; and

WHEREAS, it also honors and preserves the memory of those who were either lost at Khe Sanh, later killed in action, or later died of wounds received there; and

WHEREAS, they reach out to the loved ones of those who died, so that they might better understand the nature of their loved ones service at Khe Sanh; and

WHEREAS, they promote research and understanding of the Khe Sanh experience to help heal wounds both physical and mental, of the Khe Sanh experience;

NOW, THEREFORE, I, Mayor Samuel L. Jones, on behalf of the City of Mobile and the members of the Mobile City Council, do hereby proclaim Thursday, June 29, 2006 as

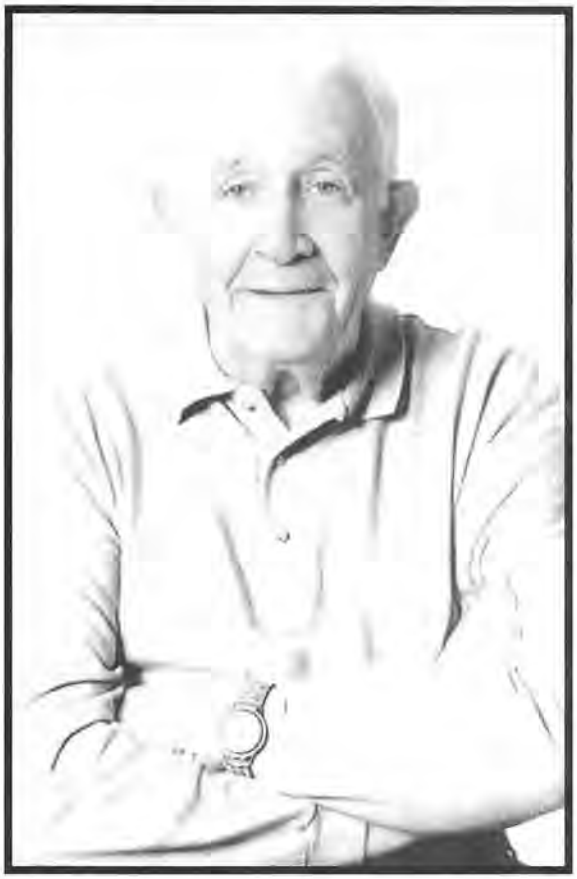
Done in the City of Mobile, Alabama this the 22nd day of June, 2006.

MEMORIAL

James E. Heagy was a loving friend of Mike Worth, Doc Lancaster, Bill Griffith, Steve Haisley, Larry McCartney and Bruce Lewy, all from E Co 2/26. They served with his son L/Cpl James W. Heagy who was KIA on 06 Dec 1968 while serving with E Co 2/26.



James E. Heagy was born on September 29, 1925 in Pittsburg Pennsylvania, the second son of William and Margaret Heagy. He leaves behind his wife Mary, daughter Marilyn Hudson, her husband Stephen, 3 grandchildren Stephanie Hudson. Timothy Hudson, his wife Elyse, Daniel Hudson, and, his faithful dog Buddy.

Jim had many fond memories of his service on the naval destroyer USS Hale during WW II, he never tired of telling stories of his experiences.

Upon leaving the navy he met Mary Postell. They were married six months later on June 1, 1946. Their marriage lasted for nearly 60 years. She was the apple of his eye. He was always proud to show off the pictures of her that he kept in his wallet. They were blessed with a son and daughter. Their son Jimmy was born in June 1949. He was KIA while serving with E Co 2/26 USMC. He recently commented to his wife how very special their daughter Marilyn was to him. There was nothing he enjoyed more than spending time with her, whether telling stories, good natured teasing, or, just having a cup of coffee.

William Heagy, Jim's father was a police officer for the City of Pittsburgh PA. and was killed in the line of duty. This inspired Jim to also pursue a career as a police officer. He achieved the rank of Lieutenant in a distinguished career for the City of Pittsburgh. Upon his retirement from the city he worked for the University of Pittsburgh police department.

Jim was well known for his integrity, quick wit, and sense of humor. He had a great love of sports especially the Pittsburgh Steelers. He was also very loyal especially when it came to his family. He was very proud of his three grandchildren who lovingly called him Pap.

In 2000 Jim and Mary followed the family and moved to South Carolina. Twenty years earlier they began an annual tradition of vacationing at the condo Jim bought in South Carolina to watch their grandchildren grow up on the beach. Mary has been a Jehovah Witnesses for more than 50 years. Though not a Witness himself, Jim supported his family and encouraged them to practice their faith.

Jim passed away peacefully at 2:00 p.m. on Friday March 10, 2006. He was at home sitting in his favorite chair while Watching sports with Mary and Buddy.

"Warriors of the Past: A rendezvous with Eternity"

By Ron 'Doc' Ferrell (FMF)

30 June 1998-0600 Ka'u, Hawaii.

The bedside alarm went off like a Tsunami Warning. Damn!I swung out of bed. My guts were doing an E ride at Disneyland. This was the day. After more than thirty years of self-imposed isolation I was about to catch a United flight from Keahole airport in Kona, Hawaii and fly to Washington, D.C. My bags were already packed as I staggered to the kitchen to fire up the coffee. Ugly thoughts of 'Chicken Kiev' intrusively invaded what remained of my sleep. Airline food...swell! The sun was just popping over the Volcano. The morning light penetrated the O'hia forest illuminating the bright red Lehua blossoms on the trees. The morning mist lay thick, enshrouding the landscape.

A shiver ran down my spine. It was as if I could walk into the mist, disappearing like a time traveler. Where would the mist take me? The future did not exist. Today was racing towards me at 700 plus miles per hour. There would only be the past. A past that I had tried without success to forget. Time. A man made concept was playing hard-ball catch up today.

Spencer, I thought, what the hell have you gotten me into? "Hey! The trip will do you good," he said. "You can run with the gunfighters again, and the 'Wall', will be a healing process." Yeah right! I poured a cup of steaming coffee while my gaze stayed fixated on the mist. I thought of Huggo's my favorite watering hole in Kona town. On the center bar post is a bronze plate that says "Free beer tomorrow!" So much for the future.

The thud and bump of the Boeing 767 as it landed startled me and chased away the fatigue of a 14 hour flight. The engines reversed thrust and the speed brakes engaged.

"Doc!" "Yeah?" I turned. There was no one sitting next to me, or even across from me. The flight crew was firmly strapped into their pull down seats in shoulder harnesses. Why is that passengers don't rate a shoulder harness?. Just a seat belt. It doesn't make much difference in the end if you auger in at over 400 knots. I miss trains. I had been careening though space five miles above the earth's surface while stewardesses passed out Marriot's version of the 'Last Supper' and called it our in-flight dinner.

Before we left two Boeing mechanics were tweaking the aircraft for pre-flight.

One says to the other, "Well, what do you think?" His accomplice replies, "Yeah! I think it'll get off the ground!" I was trying to amuse myself. A failed attempt to forget the voice that had called out to me moments before. F###ing voices! They never shut up. The past follows me wherever I go. I suddenly realized I could not escape my past, even at speeds approaching Mach 1.

Dennis Higgins a veteran Marine had driven in from Racine and was there to greet me. I spotted him immediately. Age had taken its toll on him as it had done to me but his eyes, our eyes, had not changed. They will never change. Our eyes had witnessed the crucible and carnage of war never change. Eyes that hold a thousand yard stare in a ten foot room. Eyes that were witness to slaughter. We have a look that frightens people, causing them to abruptly turn and take another direction. It was not hard to spot a Marine warrior in the crowd.

We loaded my gear in his Grand Cherokee and headed for the Crowne Plaza Hotel. In exactly 27 minutes the 'Past' would have my ass. Dennis already had a room, I was doubling with Spencer. Served him right. This was his idea. After checking in at the desk a bellhop with a cart stacked my gear. We walked to and stepped into the elevator. Just as the elevator doors were almost shut, the 'Past' jumped in and pressed the button for the fourth floor.

"Doc!" the voice shouted. I looked at the bellhop. "What?" I responded with a look of surprise.

He looked at me. "Sir?" His expression began to form a pattern of confusion as it etched its way across his face.

"You said 'Doc', how'd you know?" I asked, stunned by his psychic ability.

"Sir? I didn't say nothing sir." he replied defensively. His eyes screamed. I have to get out of here...right now!

The elevator stopped, the doors opened and he pushed the cart quickly down the hall, turned right and disappeared. By the time I caught up with him he had the cart empty and asked me for my magnetic coded door lock card. I handed it over...he shoved it in, opened the door, carried in the gear, pointed to the bathroom, telephone, air conditioning, coffee maker, closet, blinds then without waiting for a tip, headed for the door..."have a nice visit sir. Welcome to Washington." I looked down the hall. He was gone.

I flopped my suitcase on the bed and opened the luggage. I rummaged through the piles of clothing looking for a small velvet maroon colored bag. There it was. I gently opened it. All was well. It had survived the long trip from Hawaii. My past was intact. I awakened it from its 32 year nap and laid the four tier ribbon bar on the dresser. Washington, D.C., in the first week of July was in the middle of a heat wave. It was suffocating. The humidity was palpable. The heat radiated off the concrete. The water tasted like Clorox. It was like Vietnam with a really bad traffic problem. I turned up the A/C to max and headed for the shower. A cold water shower. It was great. The shower smelled like Clorox. Chlorine must be a hot item in the District of Confusion. I put on a fresh Aloha shirt, shorts, deck siders (no socks) grabbed my walking cane and let my innate olfactory senses lead me to the hotel bar.

After the elevator stopped and opened I was surprised to see the lobby filled with a crowd of people and luggage. English disappeared in the sea of languages that chattered throughout the lobby. The international flair of the crowd put me at ease. It reminded me of Hawaii where all cultures, nationalities and races come together in harmony. I spotted the bar and began shouldering my way through the crowd. The bar was filled. I stood there listening to the shouts, yells and laughter. Time slipped away...I entered the bar, I was 50 years old...by the time I was able to commandeer a barstool, surrounded by veteran Marines I felt as though I was 19 again. It was great, God I felt so alive.

The bartender was suddenly in front of me. "May I offer you something to drink Sir?" He took me by surprise. 'Sir' was not in my lexicon of salutations. I automatically, without thinking, looked behind me to see who the bartender was addressing. There was no one immediately behind me...just the clamor of the crowd in the lobby. I turned and looked at his face filled with expectation.

My 'Past' ordered a Budweiser, "Ice cold! Colder than my second wife!" The bartender laughed and said, "Here you go Sir!"

"Mahalo Nui (thank you)," my 'Past replied. I reached for my wallet and took out a ten spot and laid it on the bar.

The bartender asked, "Is it cold enough for you?"

I said:"close, but not quite...do you have a freezer?" He grabbed my ten and walked off laughing.

The first beer went down like water. Despite the A/C in the hotel the heat and humidity of Washington was not comfortable for me. I am used to the trade winds of the Hawaiian Islands. Artificial atmosphere isn't all it's cracked up to be. There is no substitute for real oxygen. Behind me in the lobby hung a large banner. "Welcome! Khe Sanh Veterans!" Another veteran Marine walked in and sat on the stool to my right and shouted out his drink order over the decibel level of the crowd. My 'Past' moved from the vacant stool to accommodate him.

He introduced himself and said he was with Recon at Khe Sanh. I told him I was never near Khe Sanh. I was in and out of country before that party began. I second guessed his next question and told him I was an FMF Doc with 1/5 and H&S III M.A.F. in '66 & '67 in Quang Ngai. I second guessed his third question and told him I was here because of Captain Spencer with Delta 1/26.

Before I was halfway through my second brewski, Recon ordered another one for me. My "Past" did not object. I scanned the crowd. Never have I seen so few drink so much so fast in such a short period of time. I knew that I was surrounded by my Marines...the gunfighters. I was in hog heaven. The hotel staff on the other hand seemed to be on the verge of hysteria. They were out manned, out gunned and way over their heads with this crowd. This was better than a frat party. I wanted to shout 'FOOD FIGHT!'

'Doc!" a voice shouted. I ignored my 'Past'. The little s.o.b. never shut up. 'Doc! Hey...Doc, dammit I'm talking to you!" Ooops! My past had taken a nap and I was blindsided by the present. I turned. There stood the biggest damn Marine I had ever seen. Way over the height limit for the 'Corps'. Then again, you have to remember back then he was a kid, and a male does not stop growing until he's 28 years old or so. This guy went the distance! He picked me and my past up like a couple of five year olds and hugged the shit out of us. He dropped us on the barstool as suddenly as he picked us up. His face radiated a smile that was from his heart, as only a Marine can do. After all, we Doc's" were their pets. "Where are you from Doc?" he asked. Someone said, "Hawaii". "No shit Doc! That must' be damn nice, beats the shit out of 'Philly'!"

"That's affirmative!" I responded...."but you have to live somewhere...right?" He just grinned.

I have no idea who said "Hawaii". Maybe it was me, or my 'Past' or Rrecon on my right. I turned and there was Spencer. He had checked in invisible in the crowd that filled the lobby and had gone to our room and changed and was in the bar wearing my red gift Aloha, ("flowers and parrots" Tom Selleck, Magnum P.I.) shirt with shorts and sneakers. He spotted me and gave me a Marine style hug. I said, "Ernesto...you took me by surprise...you look just like Tom Selleck. I swear. I can't tell the difference." I got a Quantico induced U.S.M.C. officer's frown in response. My 'Past' started laughing.

"F###g Doc's are all the same," he growled. His fake anger only fueled my laughter and the sheer joy of being back with the Corps The Proud. The Few. The Marines! It made up for the past 32 years of misery. Everything that was me was firing in perfect synaptic order like an in-line six. I was on the fast track to Nirvana or Hell. At the time I could have cared less. Spencer ordered a bud-lite or Coors I can't remember. I looked at him. He returned my stare and it screamed 'f##k you doc!' I started laughing again. Recon' looked at me, and I said; "Officers!. He shrugged in acknowledgement. Party time! I had once asked Ernie if Quantico had ever given him a Marine Corps officer's saber. He evaded the question. The sabers are custom made to meet the man. I assumed they did not give Ernesto a sword, he being half Korean. It was quite simply too close to the 'Code of Bushido'. I loved to rag on him. He is my good friend. I used to kid him as to how he got to be a Marine officer in combat with a degree in 'Philosophy'. It would always light his fuse. I crack myself up. It made no difference in the end what your background was...you were a target; cannon fodder.

I met Air Force pilots, Aussie's, two Scotsmen, doggie's, but mostly Marines crowded the bar. I met four FMF Docs. My "Past" was curious, and examined them closely. We wondered how they differed from us. They were attached to large Marine combat units up North, while I was operating more or less independently almost two years earlier down South in Quang Ngai Province. I spotted several Marines with life-long debilitating injuries from the war. I looked to my "Past". His eyes welled with the tears of regret, compassion, anger, frustration and guilt. We ordered another beer.

The beer fest had lasted all night long. After the bar closed, Marines spread out, many going downstairs to the large hospitality suite that held more booze than the bar upstairs. Others went to their rooms and opened up their private stocks and held mini-reunions. My 'Past' said "Doc it's time. Let's go" My legs felt like rubber as I stepped out of the front entrance to the hotel. I had sheathed my walking stick in its silk cover and began the six block walk to the 'Wall'. The traffic was light. The pimps and hookers were still out trolling for last minute victims before the sun came up. Then, they would hide from the light like vampires.

I found the grassy green park and began following the red picket searching for a way inside. Finally I came upon an entrance to the park. My 'Past' spotted the well worn trail and I followed it. Large oaks dotted the landscape. We stayed on the trail moving deeper into the park. My peripheral vision spotted a shadowy figure dart behind a tree. I slipped the knot on the silk sheath and continued. "Doc. Over here!" "Shut up!" I muttered quietly to my 'Past', before realizing he had not uttered a sound. "Doc! Stay on the trail." Ah f##k! I was really losing it. The grass was wet with night dew. Small wisps of mist floated through the giant oaks. The trail stopped abruptly. I turned and there it was. A long black granite Wall. As I followed the walk in front of the Wall it became higher, and I could look over the wall and beyond under the early morning mist. Something moved. "Over here Doc!" My 'Past' was scared shitless and mute. I could see our reflection in the Wall. Was that me? "Morning Doc," someone said. I turned. I was alone with my 'Past'.

The names etched into the granite seemed endless. "Hey Ferrell. I have someone coming down to watch the desk, let's raid the galley!" my 'Past' whispered, "Larry?" I stopped and faced the Wall. Larry where are you? I mentally asked. My 'Past' remembered the midnight raid on the galley at NAS Pensacola Naval Hospital. My eyes followed the names down the Panel. There he was. Lawrence Terrell Steiner, Panel 09E- Line 125. I knelt using my walking stick as a crutch for balance and forced my left hand to lightly trace the surface of the etching. My 'Past' intrusively remarked, "Hey Larry look at me. Been a long time huh?" The cold black slab was mute. "Later today I'm bringing a buddy of mine for you to meet. Watch over him 'Doc' Okay? His name is Mike. He was a damn good Marine."

I stood, I could not see the Wall clearly. As dawn approached my eyes were filled with tears. I turned and started back toward the end of the Wall where I had left the trail. My 'Past' whispered, "Larry I saw your pink slip at Chu-Lai. I've always known where you were." I reached the trail and started for the park entrance. Some one said: "Later Doc." My 'Past' did not respond. He was in a hurry to get back to the hotel, and had a ten yard head start on me. I wondered if he bore witness to the non-existent theory we describe as the future. By the time I caught up with my 'Past', the present found us entering the lobby of the hotel.

2 July 1998-1800 'The Vietnam Memorial Wall'

The Khe Sanh Marines arrived at the Wall that evening. Long lines of Marines and visitors crowded the path searching for memories. My 'Past' had no need to search for remembrance. I had carried it with me securely locked for eternity within a private recess in my mind. My 'Past' held the key and was the gatekeeper to my cerebral dominance. He had effectively for the past 32 years compartmentalized my anxiety, aggression, rage, pleasure, sexuality, phobias, obsessions, compulsions and stress.

I shouldered and made my way through the crowds working my way to Panel 09E- Line 125. My 'Past' had locked up the endorphins and decided to set panic free. I had Mike Mahoney's framed eulogy with me. I knelt and propped the frame against the Wall, carefully aligning its left border to Larry's name. My hand trembled as I removed my Corpsman insignia from my lapel and tried to place it carefully upon the frame. I dropped it twice. My 'Past' whispered, "you can do it...try it again." 'Panic' was busy discovering and pushing all my stress triggers. My 'Past' decided to open the floodgates and filled my eyes with tears as I finally placed the pin on top of the frame.

I was exhausted. A failed exercise in self-control. I stood and backed away. My 'Past' was busy introducing Mike to Larry. I felt as though I were eavesdropping on a private conversation. I thought 'Panic' had flipped the switch on my auditory nerve. The silence was deafening. I looked at the crowd and realized there was nothing wrong with my hearing. No one was speaking. The scream of silence emanated from the Wall. Someone said: "You did your best 'Doc." I turned. There was a woman standing behind me. I said: "My best was not good enough."

She said: "Pardon me. Are you speaking to me?" I was losing it. I was on a fast track to a room with neoprene wallpaper. My 'Past' said, "Later Mike. See you Larry. Aloha Nui Loa." Someone said, "Semper Fi! Doc." The woman behind me offered me a handful of Kleenex. She did not have enough. I mumbled my thanks, and started for the end of the Wall, not bothering to wait for my 'Past'. He would find me soon enough.

The sweltering heat of the city did not seem to be present at the Wall. I felt a chill in the air while those around me soaked with perspiration. I was on the edge of eternity, and the Wall was the black abyss, a doorway to something mortals could only explore with their final breath. My 'Past' stepped out of the Wall and found me frozen before the Vietnam Memorial Statues of three men in combat gear. They looked so real. The on one of the statue's arms stood out in perfect detail. I watched closely, looking for signs of pulsation. My 'Past' castigated me for my foolishness. We left the hollowed ground and returned to the hotel. I went to the bar and ordered a beer. My 'Past' informed me that my rendezvous with eternity would come in due time.

3 July 1998-0900 "Arlington National Cemetery"

Buses filled with Khe Sanh veterans passed through the gates of Arlington. I watched as the winding narrow road lead us through rolling acre upon acre of tombstones. Monuments to people who had given their lives for their country. The countless thousands of markers seemed to go on without end. We got off the buses and walked towards the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. My 'Past' and I were overwhelmed by the expanse of the cemetery. This was where eternity warehoused the millions of souls who had paid the ultimate sacrifice. It struck me that while this place was vast, it was not the only national cemetery. I thought of 'Punchbowl' National Cemetery in the crater of a dormant volcano on the island of O'ahu in the middle of Honolulu.

I tried to focus my attention on a formal Marine Corps ceremony. The mother of a Khe Sanh Marine who died 30 years ago was being presented his Bronze Star for valor posthumously. My 'Past' kept turning my head away from the ceremony as we stared in awe at the rolling hills covered with thousands of grave markers. I forced myself to pay attention to the ceremony. The color guard, all Marines, so young and magnificent in their full dress blues, stood at attention like statues. For them, eternity might have to wait, then again, it could be upon them with the next conflict and their time could be measured in hours, a few days, or, weeks. We all have a prearranged boarding pass to eternity.

It was time to return to the buses for the trip back to the hotel. My 'Past' decided to remain and contemplate the warehouse of souls that was Arlington. He would meet me later at the hotel bar and give me his thoughts. After the bar had closed and the booze downstairs in the Hospitality suite was exhausted, I decided to return to my room. I grabbed a quick shower and packed my gear, making sure my bamboo walking stick was securely stored in its custom made traveling box. Everything was ready to go. All I had to do was grab a couple of hours sleep. It did not come.

I lay there on the bed. My mind was racing with the events of the last couple of days. Washington was a monument to the dead. My 'Past' asked, "What did you expect?" I couldn't answer that. All I could think of was that I had to get out of there. The distance from Washington to my island home in Hawaii was far. I dreaded the 14 hour return flight. I closed my eyes. The comatose sleep that slammed the door on my 'Past' and barred the memories never came. The 'Past' entered without knocking. "Hey Doc, Have you figured it out yet?" he inquired. I was too tired to answer. Too tired for guessing games. Then the shocking answer to his question hit me like a sucker punch. I realized my 'Past' born under fire in the bloody chaos of combat in Vietnam 32 years ago was closer to my island home than the Washington monuments to death. My 'Past' had followed me to Washington to embrace eternity and discuss my fate.

6 July 1998-0550 Ka'u Hawaii

I normally awaken early. Today was no different. The day before, my 'Past' and I had boarded a jet and chased the sun west to Hawaii. I did not have to suffer the hangover of jet-lag. I put on the coffee, then went to my home office and booted the computer. By the time I was up and ready to go the coffee could be heard gasping its last effort to percolate one more time. The coffee was done. I poured a cup and looked out the kitchen window. The sun was popping over the volcano, but dark clouds on the southern tip of the island told me it would be an overcast morning. The ground mist that enshrouded the landscape within the O'hia forest was darker, thicker, more forbidding. I picked up my cup and walked outside and stood there for a moment. The mist was a dark gray wall. It stopped at the very edge of the forest on my property line, as though it was not permitted to cross its boundary.

I sat my cup on the lanai railing and walked to the edge of my property. I stood before the gray wall of mist. My 'Past' urged me to step into the mist. It said, "Go on! See what's there. Catch a glimpse of eternity. What are you waiting for?" I knew it was only water vapor. My 'Past' told me that fact was irrelevant.

I said, "There is nothing there but O'hia trees and bush grass."

My 'Past' said, "Forget logic...take a chance!" I told my 'Past': "You're making me crazy.

" Shut up," he laughed.

What the hell! I walked up to the gray wall of vapor and stepped inside. I turned and could barely make out the house, 75 yards away. I stepped deeper into the mist. My 'Past' said, "Can you see them?" See who, I thought. He replied, "The warriors." I thought...this is nuts. I don't see anything. Something rustled in the grass. I startled and looked to my right, something moved. Probably a mongoose I thought. My 'Past' chuckled at my assumption.

A chill ran up my spine. Whatever had moved was no mongoose, pig or dog. It was something larger. I could hear the bipedal footstep; the cadence of a human moving through the grass. He could not have been more than 20 yards away. I shouted, "Hey! Who are you...come over here?" There was no answer to my call. I looked up and the morning sun was burning a hole through the overcast like a laser. The light of day penetrated the mist and its heat began to vaporize the gray shroud. I stood still and watched its ethereal departure. It was there and it was gone. Suddenly it was a brilliant sunny morning. The mist had disappeared, replaced by the light of a full sun. I was standing in the bush and could clearly see my house. I turned and surveyed the area. Nothing but trees and bush grass.

I stepped across the boundary to my land and started back to the house, wondering where I left my coffee. My 'Past' said, "Did you see them?" No! I thought. I didn't see a damn thing. Shut up! My 'Past' started laughing. "Eternity just touched you and you don't believe your own senses," he said. I found my coffee and took a sip while staring at the forest. My 'Past' said: "Don't worry Doc you don't have to believe in eternity until you die, then we'll talk."

Semper Fidelis

Ed Note:
Very nice riff Ron. I helped Daddy scatter Mama's ashes off the rim of Punchbowl that over looks Diamond Head, Waikiki and Pearl Harbor. Two years later I did Daddy's, myself. Army full dress service. Flag. Three volleys from M-16's. I went and shook each of those riflemen's hands after. They seemed surprised. "Thank you Soldier," I said as I went down their line, left to right and proudly pumped their right hands, looking each in his eyes. I'm thinking of doing my last gig there.

A DREAM COME TRUE
Short round Is Getting His Hands

Lloyd Scudder, who survived Khe Sanh only to lose both hands in a training accident, is finally getting his hands. After a long four years, the first hand is in place and you can see by the pictures(Page 10) he was making good use of it. Soon he will have both. God bless you Short round. More to come.

MINI BOOK REVIEW

How we make Marines
By Ron Smith

I am reading Larry Smith's new book, THE FEW AND THE PROUD: MARINE CORPS DRILL INSTRUCTORS IN THEIR OWN WORDS. After reading a piece from Parade Magazine yesterday, I hade to run out to the book store and pick up a copy of the book. I am about halfway through, and I have enjoyed every minute of it. Smith gives equal time to both Parris Island and San Diego.

ED NOTE:
I reprinted the excerpts from Larry Smith's Book which Ron Smith mentions in his article as it appeared in PARADE Magazine June 4, 2006. Craig Tourte also responded with a short article concerning discipline at the end of the article by Larry Smith.

How We Make Marines
By Larry Smith

How does the Marine Corps take 17-year-old civilians and in 13 short weeks, transform them into Marines? How do they motivate those young men and women to become members of a group that needs to function at the highest level under enormous stress? Parade Contributing Editor Larry Smith spent two years researching his new book, THE FEW AND THE PROUD: MARINE CORPS DRILL INSTRUCTORS IN THEIR OWN WORDS. He discovered that drill instructors are the key to making a Marine-and that there are lessons all of us can learn from them.

They arrive by bus, usually after dark, when they are more likely to be disoriented. A drill instructor wearing a "Smokey" hat comes in yelling that he will give them only seconds to get off "his" bus and line up on the yellow footprints painted on the street outside or face unmentionable peril.

Thus begins what many former Marines call the most difficult period of their lives. "In the beginning, we cried," recalls Staff Sgt. Christine Henning, 29. "We didn't know what they were saying. We didn't know what they wanted us to do. "They have joined the Marine Corps for different reasons. "I'd say that half come to escape from something," notes Sergeant Henning, who eventually became a D.I-Drill Instructor-herself. "It may be family, limited prospects, a small town, no jobs, drugs, alcohol abuse. They want to fix things in their lives. Some just come for education. Some come for travel. "

"Many are totally convinced, by the time they're 17 or 18, that they'll never amount to anything," says R. Lee Ermey, 62, a D.I. at the Marines West Coast Recruit Depot in San Diego in the 1960s who later played the rugged Gunnery Sergeant Hartman in the film Full Metal Jacket. "The drill instructor's job is to turn that around-and that's what he does."

Leadership by Example

"Drill instructors were not spit out on a rock, and the sun didn't hatch them," says Ermey. "They graduate from the D.I. School, and the drill instructor is the best the Marine Corps has to offer. Their leadership qualities are second to none. Nobody ever forgets his drill instructor."

"The underpinning of the psychology of recruit training is leadership by example," explains Maj. Keith Burkepile, 37, who was director of the Drill Instructor School at Parris Island, S.C., for the last two years. "The drill instructor becomes the role model, and the recruit is inspired to emulate him or her. We want the Marines to be successful with their units, successful on the battlefield, successful in life. "Here's how they do it:

We Toughen Them Up

Once "aboard" the depot-whether at Parris Island or San Diego recruits go through "Receiving," where they get their heads shaved, receive gear and undergo medical and physical tests. During the next three days, called "Forming," they meet their drill instructors and learn how to be recruits. Twelve weeks of actual training follow.

Parris Island. 4 miles long and 3 miles wide-is known as a hard place, made special by sand fleas, stultifying heat and 500 fearsome drill instructors. It has four recruit-training battalions, one of them exclusively for women. More than a million young men and women have survived training there since 1915.

The physical challenge is grueling. In three months, recruits learn to march, to move through water with packs on, to rappel from 60-foot towers, to practice hand-to-hand combat and fight with a bayonet simulated by use of the pugil stick (like a giant Q-tip). They must qualify with the M-16 rifle, handle gas masks and solve the "Confidence Course culminating in an 11th-week event known as "The Crucible," which lasts 54 hours and consists of combat-related activities that can only be accomplished through teamwork. Recruits get four hours of sleep a night, and limited rations.

We Demand Obedience

The very first thing a Marine learns is immediate obedience to orders. "There's no getting around that Marines are trained to kill," says Chuck Taliano, 61, who trained recruits at Parris Island during the Vietnam era "The drill instructor's job is to teach the basics of how to do it-by hand, by bayonet or by rifle-and how to stay alive. In a war, you haven't got time to debate the issue. You have to give them instant willingness to obey orders."

How do you instill that kind of discipline? "By example," says Major, Burkepile, explaining: "The sand fleas are going crazy, biting all over the recruits. The drill instructors are standing there. They're not scratching. They're not itching. You don't think they're getting bit? They're getting bit too. They're demonstrating by example.

"You know," he adds, "self-discipline-even if it starts with letting yourself be bitten by a sand flea-will take you a long way in life. Americans love to eat good food, and it takes discipline to say when you've had enough without overdoing it. What makes a woman take care of kids and a family all day long and then, when her husband gets home go out on a run? That's discipline. She makes herself do it."

That self-discipline fosters independence and confidence. "If you think about it," says Burkepile, "self-discipline will get a young man or woman of 22 to do a lot of things. It may send them to college, where they'll have good study habits and succeed. It also translates to the workforce: Your self-discipline will get you to work every day. It'll get you to pay your bills. When you talk to bosses in charge of hiring people, they say that once they have a former Marine on the job, they start looking for more.':

We Instill Motivation

"Motivation," says Major Burkepile, "comes from wanting to be better in life. It makes you feel good. We do two-hour physical-training sessions here in the morning that are very hard. You've got to get up for that, you've got to get motivated. Motivation comes from each of us being around each other. You see another person pumped up, and you go out and get pumped up, and it rubs off on the next person. It's infectious. If they're fired up and motivated-if they're working together as a team they're going to perform better.

"In the civilian world, you look for like-minded people who are similarly motivated to help you acquire discipline."

We Insist On Teamwork

"Recruits learn how much easier everything becomes when they put the other guy first and help each other out-whether it's making a rack or cleaning your weapon," says Major Burkepile. "When people start helping each other, things get done faster and better. "We all get selfish. That's just human. But you feel better if you help someone else."

We Work Them Hard

"If there's one thing recruits do at Parris Island, it's work hard," says Major Burkepile. "Discipline, pride, self- respect, motivation-they all tie into that. If nothing else, hard work builds character. Hard work makes the unit better, it makes the individual better, and it keeps you mentally sound. A lot of times when they're working hard, the recruits don't realize that their physical condition is getting better. At the same time, they're learning something new. Now they can translate that skill that they just learned by working hard into another task-whether in the Marine Corps or out. Hard work also builds camaraderie.

"I'm a horrible procrastinator around the house, but once I start doing something, I feel a lot better than if I'm sitting on my lazy butt watching TV."Hard work also prepares you for what could be down the road. Nobody knows what tough times are ahead-in the Marine Corps or out. If you know how to work hard, you can cope. It's a habit of mind. "It's the same with kids. If they have halfway-decent work habits, it's going to payoff in school, it's going to payoff in life, and it's going pay 0 for society."

We Keep Them Busy

"If the recruit isn't busy," says Major Burkepile, "he feels sorry for himself. He thinks about Mom and Dad, TV, other stuff he could be doing. He thinks, 'Why did I do this?' But if he's busy all day, he doesn't have time to think about it. Training is over before he knows it. "Keeping busy is a value in itself. It keeps you focused, keeps your mind off things that might drag you down."

Attitude also is important, adds Major Burkepile: "The PT instructor will say, 'Look, you have to be here. Why not get the most you can out of it and make it fun? Make it positive.' All of sudden, they're motivated, and they're getting in shape. "To anybody out there who wants to get fit, I say: 'Find a way to make it fun-whether it's a walk in the evening or running with friends or competing in a small way. The same with your job: Find a way to make it fun.

We Honor Tradition

"As training goes on," says Major Burkepile, "the weight and responsibility of the Marine Corps tradition really starts to sink in. When they receive that eagle, globe and anchor pin the day before graduation, many recruits will cry. They know the torch has been passed to them. "In the civilian world, you make sure your children know where they came from-what their grandparents did, how they came over from the old country and built a life or worked selflessly for decades to provide for the family, surviving the Great Depression or World War II or Vietnam_. It's important to pass that stuff on. That's family tradition.

"If you believe in democracy and America, it doesn't matter if you're a Democrat or Republican: You believe in the freedoms we have. Preservation of that doesn't always come without work and even bloodshed. That's part of the responsibility faced by these young recruits. They have not only the weight of the nation on their shoulders but also the weight of the Corps: not letting down the Marines of the past and the Marines right beside them - the man on the right and the man on the left. That's a powerful motivation. It's learning to be part of something large: than yourself."

By Craig W. Tourte

Ron. This has nothing to do with the book, THE FEW AND THE PROUD: MARINE CORPS DRILL INSTRUCTORS IN THEIR OWN WORDS. It just looked like a good place to insert a little story.

After boot camp in San Diego, I was off to Pendleton for ITR. We had a large company and were instructed by "Troop Handlers." Some were pretty hard Marines. Most had recently returned from Vietnam. Being pretty salty and a full-fledged Marine right out of boot camp, most of us were of the opinion that we could no longer be treated like "boots." The Troop Handler said he wanted the biggest shit bird in the company and picked a guy out who was now our appointed leader. The handler told us that whatever the guy said was an order to be obeyed like it had come from God himself.

I'm kind of hard headed and do not suffer fools lightly. I thought the guy was an idiot and I picked a fight with him, because he was really stupid and I was not about to follow this knucklehead anywhere. After I made my point, the troop handler (E5) called me into his office, stood me at attention and reached over and knocked me clear across the room onto the floor. He then stood over me and said: "When that guy tells you to do something, you're to consider it an order as if it came from me. Do you understand?" Of course I understood quite well and learned what the word "discipline" meant, must be a derivative of disobey. I never forgot that lesson. Training is expected to produce a specific character or pattern of behavior.

SHORT ROUNDS

A Khe Sanh Story

By Craig Tourte

Since tomorrow is Memorial Day I thought I would share a little Khe Sanh story with you. I went to boot camp with Mike Powers who eventually served at Khe Sanh with Delta 1/26. Ernie Spencer was Delta's C.O. Last year during the reunion in Chicago I was sitting at a table with Mike and some of his Delta company and platoon members. It was the big Saturday evening party and everyone was having a great time. I was by myself, just hanging out at their table listening to the conversations. Sitting next to me was a man who served in Mike's squad. I can't remember his name, but he looked kind of like a bookkeeper or accountant. Mike got up and left the room for a few minutes and the guy says to me: "You know, Mike saved my life in Vietnam." I told him that Mike and I had been in the same boot camp platoon in San Diego. I had met him again in Las Vegas earlier that summer. I thought he was a great guy and Mike thought a great deal of the men in his company and his CO (Spencer).

The guy told me that as the squad approached a hill he got hit in the chest. Mike pulled him down inside of a shell hole and put a dressing on his chest wound and that if it had not been for Mike's fast action he would not have made it. I was stunned because it was just so matter of fact and said with little emotion. I looked at the guy closely and saw in him a respect and appreciation for another man that would be difficult to describe to anyone else. Mike is a pretty unassuming guy, and has a quiet edge about him. I would not find it unlike him to spring into action during a firefight, or, to put himself on the line for his men. Mike came back and the guy left for a few minutes. I told Mike what I had just been told: Mike looked at me and said something along the lines that it was no big deal. Two out of three of us at that table thought it was a great big deal. Because of Mike's action someone was with us that night who in all probability would not have been were it not for the unselfish action taken by a fine squad leader those many years ago.

As I looked around the room that evening, I saw many just like Mike. Some were dancing with their wives and girlfriends, some even dancing on top of a table. Others talked to friends they had just met and some with those they have known for many years. I'm sure there were many stories and experiences that could be told about other men in the room that evening, just like the one this guy told me about Mike Powers. I find that I am always broken up with emotion being around these guys. Hero's all. By the end of the evening with a fair amount of adult beverage consumed on my part and tears running down my cheeks, Mike put his arm around my shoulder. I think Mike is just the kind of guy who is there when you need him. At that time and moment nothing else in the world seemed to matter except being in that place with so many great men. I'm looking forward to the reunion next month. If you haven't been to a reunion you're missing out on sharing those conversations, emotions and feeling that you haven't been able to share with anyone else for a very long time.

Rick Johnson/ Hill 881- 1967
By James A. Jones
Editor ,East Manatee Herald

Sharing the Vietnam experience Brawny Rick Johnson looks a little like the actor Alec Baldwin. He's got an easy smile, nice personality. A Marine veteran of the Vietnam War, this East Manatee resident carries ugly scars on the front and back of one leg from a rocket attack at Dong Ha. Doctors, all but one wanted to amputate. Rick knows how lucky he is to still have that leg and to be walking around. He is one of a number of Vietnam veterans who called or sent e-mails to me earlier this year when I wrote a series of articles about returning to Vietnam.

Before I was a newspaperman, I was an Army officer during the Vietnam War. Rick was preparing to make his own pilgrimage to Vietnam and he wanted to pick my brain about what I had seen and experienced. We sat in The Herald's East Manatee newsroom one day and exchanged memories and experiences. He was going on the journey with Robert and Patty Allen. Robert is pastor of West Bradenton Baptist Church. Rick would be with the Allen's for a week and a half and then be on his own for a week and a half. My advice was simple: 1. Get an aisle seat on the plane so that he could move around, and 2. Go anywhere and do anything, within reason, while in Vietnam.

Rick had been involved in a harrowing ambush on Hill 881 near Khe Sanh on April 29, 1967, and later had been badly wounded during an attack at Dong Ha, five miles south of the demilitarized zone between North and South Vietnam. Rick made his return journey to Vietnam 39 years after he was wounded and medically evacuated. I was curious about what he found. "We had a really great time. Everyone was really kind to me," Rick told me Friday. But if he hadn't been persistent, he would have never gotten back to Khe Sanh. His driver didn't want to take him there, said it was too dangerous. "You should have been there the first time," Rick told his driver, recalling that ambush on Hill 881. Eventually, Rick made it to Khe Sanh, but not Hill 881.

At Khe Sanh, he encountered a bus load of American students from Cornell University, who were preparing to visit a museum at the site. Their instructor asked if I had served in Vietnam. I talked with him a bit, and he asked me if I would mind speaking to his students. So I got to teach college for an hour!" Rick said. Rick gave the students a different version of history than what was presented in the museum. The retired Marine also learned a few things during his recent trip. He got to stay in Vietnamese homes and see how strong families are in that part of the world. And he also got to see Ho Chi Minh City, the former Saigon. Like me, he found it a bit disturbing to see the flag of the former North Vietnam flying over the entire country and to see the soldiers in the communist uniforms. He was concerned that the country is still not as free as it should be. When he stayed in the homes of local citizens, they had to report his presence to the authorities.

He didn't get to do everything he set out to do. He wants to go back again. Next time, he'd like to find Hill 881 and just stand there and reflect. James A. Jones Jr., East Manatee editor, can be reached at 708-7916 or atjaones1@HeraldToday.com.

USMC LIVES ON
Great story by Scott Jones

Photo showing the "GUNNY" standing very tall and giving a one finger salute as he walked to a HUMVEE with his uniform mostly torn off and many field dressings covering his extensive wounds...

Article taken from the OMAHA WORLD TRIBUNE

The Marine Corps Gunnery Sergeant in the picture is Michael Burghardt, part of the Explosive Ordnance Disposal (EOD) Team that is supporting 2nd Brigade 28th Infantry Division (Pennsylvania Army National Guard). I heard the below story first hand last Saturday during a video teleconference between his Brigade Commander and the 28th Infantry Division Commander. I thought that others should hear it as well, as I think it demonstrates the true spirit of most of our troops on the ground (from my experience).

John

Leading the fight is Gunnery Sgt Michael Burghardt, known as "Iron Mike" or just "Gunny." He is on his third tour in Iraq. He had become a legend in the bomb disposal world after winning the Bronze Star for disabling 64 IED's and destroying 1,548 pieces of ordnance during his second tour. Then, on September 19, he got blown up. He had arrived at a chaotic scene after a bomb had killed four US soldiers. He chose not to wear the bulky bomb protection suit. "You can't react to any sniper fire and you get tunnel-vision," he explains. So, protected by just a helmet and standard-issue flak jacket, he began what bomb disposal officers term "the longest walk," stepping gingerly into a 5ft deep and 8ft wide crater.

The earth shifted slightly and he saw a Senao base station with a wire leading from it. He cut the wire and used his 7 inch knife to probe the ground. "I found a piece of red detonating cord between my legs," he says. "That's when I knew I was screwed."

Realizing he had been sucked into a trap, Sgt Burghardt, 35, yelled at everyone to stay back. At that moment, an insurgent, probably watching through binoculars, pressed a button on his mobile phone to detonate the secondary device below the sergeant's feet. "A chill went up the back of my neck and then the bomb exploded," he recalls. "As I was in the air I remember thinking, 'I don't believe they got me.' I was just ticked off they were able to do it. Then I was lying on the road, not able to feel anything from the waist down."

His colleagues cut off his trousers to see how badly he was hurt. None could believe his legs were still there. "My dad's a Vietnam vet who's paralyzed from the waist down," says Sgt Burghardt. "I was lying there thinking I didn't want to be in a wheelchair next to my dad and for him to see me like that. They ! started to cut away my pants and I felt a real sharp pain and blood trickling down. Then I wiggled my toes and I thought, 'Good, I'm in business.' "As a stretcher was brought over, adrenaline and anger kicked in. "I decided to walk to the helicopter. I wasn't going to let my team-mates see me being carried away on a stretcher." He stood and gave the insurgents who had blown him up a one-fingered salute. "I flipped them one. It was like, 'OK, I lost that round but I'll be back next week'."

Copies of a photograph depicting his defiance, taken by Jeff Bundy for the Omaha World-Herald, adorn the walls of homes across America and that of Col John Gronski, the brigade commander in Ramadi, who has hailed the image as an exemplar of the warrior spirit. Sgt Burghardt's injuries, burns and wounds to his legs and buttocks kept him off duty for nearly a month and could have earned him a ticket home. But, like his father who was awarded a Bronze Star and three Purple Hearts for being wounded in action in Vietnam he stayed in Ramadi to engage in the battle against insurgents who are forever coming up with more ingenious ways of killing Americans.

IRAQ

An officer's tribute to his fallen Marines

To family and friends and all those back home who support the fight for freedom. I just sealed the envelope on what I hope to be the last condolence letter I ever have to write. As I addressed the envelope to the mother of my most recent fallen Marine, I inscribed "FREE" on the upper right corner to denote the lack of postage due to its origin being a combat zone. As I wrote that word, I felt the pen - and my heart become heavy. Four simple letters, written to denote the cost, or lack thereof, of sending a letter to home from combat. Four simple letters that sum up everything written inside of that envelope. The postage is free, liberty is not. All of the Marines who we evacuated after the horrible IED attack on the night of 01 May have fallen, each at his own time. Yesterday was their memorial service. Memorial Day weekend was an appropriate time for such a service. Moving units around at the last minute to get as many Marines back inside the wire just for the few hours they needed to pay their last respects to their fallen brothers is the type of Memorial Day weekend one experiences during war. I have received quite a few emails from family and those friends who I consider family, wishing us the best during this Memorial Day weekend and thanking us for the sacrifices made. Those people who should be thanked are the ones that won't come home and those families they won't come home to.

Lance Corporal Robert Moscillo - Combat Engineer, man of God, brother to five and son. Robert was killed on the night of 01 May.

Robert spent many years growing up trying to figure out what his path in life was going to be. When he felt called to religious service, he decided to join the Marine Corps first to serve his country and to earn the money he needed to attend the religious education he sought. He was attached to my platoon for about a month before he died in the IED attack on 01 May. A source of entertainment, motivation, and spiritual outreach among the Marines in the platoon, he will be sorely missed.

Corporal Cory Palmer Recon Marine, Sniper, Marine Combatant Diver, Son and Brother.

Cory Palmer wanted to hike the entire Appalachian Trail. He loved surfing and lived for having fun. He was one of the finest Marines I've ever served with. He died on 06 May as a result of the burns he sustained on the night of 01 May four days before his 23rd birthday.

Enthusiasm "intense feeling for a subject or cause, eagerness, zeal ...something inspiring." Corporal Cory Palmer personified enthusiasm for the Marine Corps, for having fun, and more importantly, for his family and his brother Marines. Indeed, Cory was "something inspiring." A specimen of physical greatness and mental ingenuity, he was a natural leader. Though he didn't hold a leadership billet during most of his time in the platoon, Cory led Marines. Every Marine in the platoon would follow Cory, myself included. He was a man who had the courage to speak his mind, and the courage to take the enemy face on. Paddling against the waves to find the one he wanted was the way that Cory operated in all that he did. Whether surfing, or wading through the tides of war to find the best way to destroy his adversary, Cory always maintained his composure and followed through on every occasion. Cory and his enthusiasm will be missed.

Corporal William "Brad" Fulks Recon Marine, Golden Glove Boxing State Champion, Son, Brother, and Boyfriend.

Brad Fulks was a quiet professional who was deeply respected by every man in the platoon. He died on 18 May 2006, 15 days after his 23rd birthday.

Toughness "so strong and resilient as to withstand great strain without breaking." Corporal William Bradley Fulks was tough. A quiet professional, he was humble, yet had every reason not to be. A golden glove boxing state champion, he could put a man on his face in a second, yet never once let that quality show, unless he needed to. It was easy for me to tell that the men in the platoon felt comfortable around Brad whether out in town or outside the wire they felt protected. I know that if I had to survive a bar fight, or a gun fight, he'd be the one I'd want right by my side and I know that the rest of the platoon feels the exact same way. Brad and his toughness and quiet dependability will be missed.

Sergeant Alessandro Carbonaro Recon Marine, Recon Team Leader, Husband and only Son.

Today is the one-year anniversary of the marriage of Sergeant Alessandro Carbonaro and his wife Gilly. A year ago he was married in Washington D.C. Days ago, he was buried a few miles south, in Arlington Cemetery.

Wisdom"insightful understanding of what is true, right, or enduring...a native good judgment." Sergeant Alessandro Carbonaro personified wisdom. Refined in his ability to communicate, Alex quietly commanded the attention of the platoon at times. His words and opinion were valued among every man and his good judgment was often sought from those both above him and below him. Many times, I went to Alex for ideas and advice on how to accomplish a task, never walking away without a better plan than the one I had started with. It was easy to tell from my first days with the platoon that he cared greatly for his Marines and their welfare. After the horrible IED attack, as his fellow Marines treated his wounds, he continued to ask about his team members, ignoring the pain he himself was experiencing. He truly cared for others more than himself the mark of a great man and a true leader. Alex and his caring nature and wisdom will be missed.

The four great Marines listed above are only those from my platoon. Our battalion has lost two more and there are others who are still in naval medical facilities beginning their healing process. Some have been killed in the enemy's cowardly but effective IED attacks. Others have died and been wounded in close range firefights with determined and fanatical foreign fighters, members of well known terrorist organizations like the one responsible for September 11th. One of these men is Petty Officer 3rd Class Lee H. Deal, a Special Amphibious Reconnaissance Corpsman whose funeral was Friday in Baton Rouge, LA.

A former student of West Monroe High School, he was to be married upon his return from this deployment to his wonderful fiancé.
All of these Marines are those who should be remembered this Memorial Day weekend, along with all those who have paid the ultimate price in every war before ours.

I have been fortunate to have such a great family and such great friends to know that everything we do here is supported from those back home. I've received numerous care packages some which have been gestures of extreme generosity (thanks Mr. Art!). I've taken these care packages and massed them together, then separated all the things inside to make "sniper re-supply packages" to drop off to my recon teams and sniper teams when we replenish them with water and ammunition. The men greatly appreciate your generosity.

Have no doubt that as the American people grow wearier and more impatient during this war, that our resolve grows even stronger. The enemy knows that his greatest friends are those in America who can work to demoralize the country and to break our will to fight. He has learned from history and knows the impact of the media and the influence of famous people who have no idea what freedom means or its real cost. Today's Jane Fonda's still exist and all those factors that made it so difficult to achieve a strategic victory in Vietnam are the same factors that exist today.

We won the tactical fight every time in Vietnam. We continue to win the tactical fights today. It is at the strategic level that America is so vulnerable because of the influence of the masses the most often times uneducated masses, those that are swayed easily by the media and by famous people who are out of touch with reality. The evil we face today in this world in fanatical Islamic Fundamentalism is as bad or worse than the evil faced by communism or even Nazism during WWII.

Many people agree that our participation in WWII is what prevents us from speaking German today. To stand by and idly watch whole portions of the world succumb to the demands of Islamic Fundamentalists is as bad an appeasement as Europe in the late 1930s. The men who fight and kill these evil people every day in this war understand this. I can only hope that those back home, the masses who affect foreign policy decisions, can look at history and come to understand this. The war we are fighting is a just war and a necessary war. During this Memorial Day weekend, let us not forget those who have paid the ultimate price fighting it.

Robert Moscillo, Cory Palmer, Brad Fulks, Alessandro Carbonaro Strong physically powerful, robust, healthy, difficult to break, durable, intense, violent, persuasive, and forceful." Robert, Cory, Brad, and Alessandro were strong Marines and strong men. All were intense and violent against the enemy. They protected their fellow Marines. In his own way, each was persuasive. Each was robust, healthy, and difficult to break. We must not look at their passing as them having broken, or given in. We must look at it as their passage to a place where their strength, their toughness, wisdom, and enthusiasm will be used for a much greater cause, that of the Lord. They remain among us, watching over the platoon and using their talents to protect us against evil a much greater foe than anything we'll face on earth's battlefields.

Thank you for your constant prayers. Please pray for the souls of these Marines and for their families this Memorial Day Weekend.

Warren native and Veteran of the Siege of Khe Sanh, inducted into Local Hall of Fame

By Joshua Hudson Tribune Chronicle Assistant Sports Editor

Dennis Pardee doesn't regret much about the decisions he has made in his life and on the football field. And why should the Warren native? He has seen success on the football field with Warren G. Harding and the Case Institute of Technology. He also served in the USMC During The Vietnam War, as the CO of A Btry 1/13 , at Khe Sanh. He earned several distinguished awards, including a Bronze Star and a Purple Heart. His gridiron accomplishments earned Pardee more recognition when he was inducted into the Case Reserve Athletic Club Hall of Fame.

Pardee remembers his reaction. I had to sit down, he said. After 50 years, I was finally in the Hall of Fame. His April recent hall of fame induction goes with the one he received in 2001 to the Warren Sports Hall of Fame. The enshrinement into both halls of fame capped of an amazing football career for Pardee. He earned four letters in football and two in track while at Case. In 1953 he was a unanimous choice to the all-conference team, received the Les Bale MVP award and was named to the Associated Press All-Ohio Small College Team.

The success Pardee enjoyed at Case may have never happened if he didn't put education first in his college decision. Pardee graduated from Harding in 1951 and was being recruited by Ohio State, Michigan and Notre Dame, but decided on the Case Institute of Technology because of its engineering program and its academic reputation. He said he was close to attending Ohio State, but since the Buckeyes already had a running back in Howard Hopalong Cassidy, he decided Case was the place for him. "Its a good thing I didn't go to Ohio State because I would have been sitting on the bench," he said. "I also thought about joining the naval academy out of high school, but I really wanted to be an engineer."

The military would call later in life, but first came a shot at the National Football League. When Case dropped football in the 1954 season, Pardee received a letter from the university's running backs coach, who also happened to be the son-in-law of Baltimore Colts coach Weeb Ewbank. The letter asked Pardee if he wanted to come and try out for the Colts. But since he also worked to pay for his school, Pardee couldn't afford the time off. "I didn't come from a very wealthy family, so I had to work," he said. "I ended up a couple of credit hours short of my degree, so I had to work so I could finish going to school."

Pardee spent a year working at IBM after graduation, but was informed that he was going to be drafted to help fight in the Vietnam War. Instead of waiting for the day where he would officially be drafted, Pardee decided to join the Marines. But his football career didn't end because he was in the military. Pardee spent time playing with the Pensacola NAS, Camp LeJeune and two years with the Quantico Marines. He also played inter service football at Fort Meade and led his team to three straight championships. "I switched over from halfback to quarterback on those teams because I lost a step, "Pardee said. " I was also the coach on those three teams."

He served in the Vietnam War between 1967-68 and was an artillery battery commander during the siege of Khe Sanh during the Tet offensive. He retired from the Marines in 1969 and worked some odd jobs before working as a civil engineer at the Vienna Air Base, which is where he retired from in 1993. Now Pardee spends time golfing, even though he admits his football success hasn't carried over into his golf game. I play golf but I wouldn't exactly say I am good at it, he said. I get to spend a lot of time with my wife, Beverly, and I am satisfied with everything I have done.

INTERESTING LETTER

April 18, 2006
Dear Crimson Tide Fans,

I often get asked to compare coaching in the NFL to college. Both have many positives, but I think one of the main reasons I love college football is that we get to help shape young men's lives. We have young 18 year old boys come to Tuscaloosa and we get to watch them mature into young men. We are convinced that the experience of football will help them understand the challenges of life.

This past year I received a letter from one of our former players, Nathan Cox. He graduated from the University and then joined the Marines. He was in Iraq during this past fall. Nathan opened our eyes to the importance of college football and the importance of protecting our country. He is truly a special young man. His family did an outstanding job of instilling great character in him and we hope the University of Alabama has had some Impact on him as well. I hope this letter inspires you the way it has inspired our team.
Roll Tide!
Mike Shula

THE LETTER:

Coach Shula and Team,

I wanted to take a few minutes to write ya'll and congratulate you on how the season is going. I have tried to follow you as closely as possible, and have not been able to watch a game yet but have kept up through newspaper articles and the programs the athletic department has been gracious enough to send me. I did however get an email of Prothro's catch, amazing. I wanted to take a few minutes of your time to write you and let yourself and the team know how much College Football really means to people, and how much this country should mean to your players. Hopefully, you will be able to share this with the team in some capacity, and if not just give them my best.

I came to Alabama in the fall of 2000 with the hopes and dreams of playing time and a national championship ring. You all know how the story goes. During my four years we had four coaches and a 24-25 record, and as for me personally I didn't accomplish everything I had hoped for but wouldn't trade my experience and the friends I made in Tuscaloosa for anything. I joined the Marine Corps Officer Program as soon as I graduated in May of 2004. Many thought I was crazy for giving up Law School or a good job to do it, but I truly believe in this country and felt it was something I had to do.

I still remember 9-11 like it was yesterday, coming up to practice and watching the TV as they showed the planes crashing into the World Trade Center over and over. We were suppose to play Southern Miss that week, and I recall being so angry that I wanted to leave school that afternoon to enlist and go fight.

Four years later I am now serving with 3rd Battalion

6th Marines India Company as an Infantry Rifle Platoon Commander in charge of about 60 Marines over in Western Iraq. It is truly a war zone over here, as not a day goes by where we don't get shot at or IED'd in some capacity. It seems like every day we lose another Marine. It doesn't seem fair that 18year old kids have to die before they get a chance to really live, but no one complains here or asks for sympathy.

This is something that every single one of us chose to do for one reason or another. All of my Marines enlisted during a time of war and chose to do Marine Infantry, which is as front lines as you get on the battlefield. We knew what we were asking for and we have certainly got it.

You have no idea how much college football means to the Marines over here. Nearly everyone has a team they follow and almost use it as their identity.

Each week I have Marines coming up to me and telling me the score and how good ya'll are playing. They want to know all about each of you. "Who's the fastest, the strongest, the biggest?" Does Brodie get all the girls? What is Coach Shula like? What was it like to play there?" I respect all of you for not only having the ability to play major college football, but also just having the fortitude to stick with it. I know it is not always the easiest thing to do, but like Coach Bryant used to say: " if it was easy everyone would do it." Looking back on my career there that is really one of the few things I can hang my hat on is that I simply never quit.

In closing I want to wish you well on the rest of the season. My Dad mailed Alabama hats to everyone in my platoon, so remember you have a lot of people pulling for you even in Iraq.

I know sometimes it can be disgusting how serious some fans take football, but the truth is it really does mean a lot to people, everyone needs something to root for, especially over here.

Finally, I want to leave you with this. I believe in this country, I believe it is worth fighting for no matter what the cost. There are a lot of young men over here that have made sacrifices that you can't begin to understand in order to be here to fight for you and your families back home, so that you can live in a place where 90,000 people can go watch a football game on Saturday afternoon and have something to cheer about. They are all proud to do it, and ask nothing in return. I just want all of you to be grateful for the opportunity you have, and not to waste it because the truth is no matter what your beliefs are young men are dying day in and day out to give their fellow Americans a chance to make a better life for themselves. We have a quote that hangs about the Marines barracks by George Orwell that says, "People sleep peaceable in their beds at night because rough men stand ready to do violent things on their behalf."

Take care of each other, be proud to be an American, and enjoy the good days because the bad ones will come. I am sending ya'll a flag just as a reminder of what our country stands for. I hope you will find a place to put it, and that it makes you as proud as it makes me. So next time the Star Spangled Banner plays, do me a favor and stand a little straighter, stick your chest out a little further, and take a second to remember what it means to be an American, then go kick someone's ass for me.

A Day at Khe Sanh with A Company 3rd Shore Party Battalion

By Jerome Howell
3rd Shore Party Battalion, A Co.

I have always felt there was humor at Khe Sanh, sometime hard to come by, but it happened. The time frame was a few days after the day we took in over 1300 rounds, around February 21, 1968. I had only been in Khe Sanh about a week digging bunkers and air lifting supplies on the LSA to the hills. I learned that there were three places one had to be at his utmost in awareness; The Navy shower, the outhouse, and the medical station. Of course anywhere on the base was dangerous, but some areas seemed to attract a lot more incoming; the West Turn Around Point, our Company area because it was very close to it, the LSA where I air lifted supplies, and the medical station, especially at the height of the siege when we were getting hit with so much artillery.

The LSA was a very dangerous area. We had a couple of names for it. We called it the Impact Area, or the Saddle. We didn't have any cover. Standing on top of a load of small arms ammo, army logs, or water under a chopper, one couldn't hear anything. At one point if one could hear the report of a firing, it only took about 4 seconds to get to you. If we had time we would join others in the trenches, or hid between the rock crushers the Seabees left near the LSA. I do not know how many know the story behind the big hole where the C-123 that was hit on the West Turn around Point. It was dragged off the Turn around Point and deposited in that hole. It was big enough to hold most of the plane. This hole was about 30 feet from my bunker where Sgt. English, and L/Cpl Ron Kieger and I lived. One day someone left a pallet of anti-personnel mines there. As the day wore on we became very concerned.

I decided to take a shower, and wash my lovely socks. They were so stiff I think I could have bounced them off the wall inside the bunker. I was enjoying a rare occasion at Khe Sanh. A shower. A Russian Rocket came in and hit near the West Turn Around point. I suddenly got the feeling I had better leave the shower. I made it to the closest bunker, a small one, the smaller the better I thought and jumped in it. There was already someone in the small bunker. I can't remember his name, but he was from Minnesota. He looked at me astonished since I was almost naked. He said: "What the heck!"

I said:"showers are dangerous around here!" He and I spent the next 15 minutes that seemed like an hour, hugging each other counting the rounds coming in. All of a sudden there was this huge explosion. The bunker we were in collapsed on us, and the lights went out. I was stunned for a few minutes. After it was over the Marine in the hole with me says: "Man, we will have to quit meeting like this."

My reply was, "Don't worry about it. I will take a spit bath from now on."

I had to get up enough courage to get back to the shower again, but this time I took my uniform with me. The explosion left a very large hole, as I said about 30 feet from my bunker. A few days later I was standing next to it looking at it and a Major came by and asked me what caused the hole. I thought I would be a smart ass and told him, "Well sir, didn't you hear about that 300mm Chinese artillery piece they brought down here?" He turned white faced and walked away mumbling that he would have to check it out.

Every now and then nature calls. I grabbed a Play Boy magazine that I had stashed and off to the outhouse I went. I wasn't in there five minutes when a 130mm round came in and hit behind it in the 3rd Engineer area. It helped me out the front door. I crawled to the Navy shower to pull up my pants. There sat the Battalion Chaplain with a smile on his face. He says: "Well, it looks like they caught you with your pants down."

I said: "Well sir, it's nice meeting you, but I must be on my way, this Navy shower and I do not get along too well." I left him there as I crawled to a bunker. I never could find that Play Boy magazine. I have written Ray Stubbe and he can't remember if it was him or not. He did say that he heard the explosion of the anti-personnel mines and that it was heard all over the base.

INCOMING

Packing up & Moving out

By Craig W. Tourte

I'm moving in three days. Shutting off the phone, email, fax and mailing address. You'll be hearing from me again some time in the future, but not until I'm settled in and have a little time to think about things that have changed (and establish new fax, email and phone lines). We all change a little as time goes by. I can't hear or see as well as I once did. I am intelligent enough to realize that my motorcycle days are over because my reaction time is just to darn slow now to be safe, and my back hurts too much to sit on a bumpy ride for any length of time. I'll be gone from this house on Friday and then off to the reunion on Tuesday the 27th. I look forward to seeing all the other old men who have also have changed as much as me, some for the better and others for the...well, you get the picture.

This will be my third reunion, and I have enjoyed all of them, each a little more than the last. I went to my new mailbox today and what do you know? My new edition of Red Clay was there (Thanks Tommy and the rest of the staff). It's another great edition. I got to thinking, what is going to happen when those who give so much to this great magazine and association are no longer able to contribute? What happens then? If I'm still around, I think I'll feel kind of empty and alone. I don't think I want to be the last man standing. We're all so fortunate for the dedication of those who work so hard to make our lives a little more rewarding.

On page 3 George Marrett wrote an article titled Real Reason for Reunion. I thought I would share it with you, just in case you are not a member of the Khe Sanh Association and/or do not subscribe to the Red Clay magazine and are not attending the reunion this year.

"I now know why we who have been to war yearn to reunite. It's not just to tell war stories, look at old photos, and drink beer…although we do all of that. We don't do so to laugh at our past mistakes or dry one another's tears either. Warriors gather because they long to be with buddies who acted their best, men who suffered and sacrificed, who were stripped raw, right down to their humanity. I did not pick these men to share my year of toil and torment. Know them in a way I know no others. Never have I given anyone such trust. They were willing to guard something more precious then my life. They would have carried my reputation, the memory of me into the future. It was also part of the unwritten code, the reason we were willing to die for one another and our country." Thanks again George, you wrote an outstanding piece.

Ski-ball wrote an article titled Just A Story. This was a sad story about the death of his brother. It was an excellent piece of writing and kind of kicked me in the gut. It's strange how our lives have little turns and twists. Reading these articles written by Khe Sanh Veterans makes me appreciate having survived these 59 years and helps me to understand that I am not alone in this world. I know I'm not getting out of here alive, but while I'm here, it's kind of nice to realize there are so many of you who are just like me.

See you at the reunion

VAMC Chillicothe Physician Assistant Gary Sallade was appointed the 2004 - 2005 AMVETS National Chaplain at their convention in Spokane, WA. Sallade, a Vietnam veteran, is a life-member of Chillicothe's Price-Tatman AMVETS Post 4, where he has long been Post, District and Department of Ohio Chaplain.

Originally from Pennsylvania, Sallade served in the United States Navy from 1966 – 1969 as a Corpsman and was assigned to B Co, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment in Khe Sanh during his time in Vietnam (1967-68). For his service, Sallade received the Combat Action Ribbon, PUC (2), Vietnam Cross of Gallantry, and Fleet Marine Force Badge.

Sallade is active in a variety of community activities. His involvement with veterans extends beyond his VA and AMVETS duties. He takes time to honor veterans from an earlier generation through his involvement with the local "Sons of the Union Veterans of the Civil War" group, often traveling to Gettysburg, PA for activities surrounding Remembrance Day. Sallade is also a member of the Veterans of Foreign Wars where he served as Post Surgeon from 1997-1999, and the Khe Sanh Veterans Association.

Since 1987, Sallade has been involved in the local community as a high school soccer coach. In 2004, his Unioto High School "Shermans" advanced farther than any Ross County team had ever gone in the state tournament, making it to the Division III Soccer State Final Four in Columbus before losing 3-1 to Cincinnati Hills Christian Academy. "There are people whose paths we cross everyday who have some need in their lives that we – you and I – might alleviate if we just take the time to do so," said Sallade

A Physician Assistant with both the Medical/ Surgical and the Primary and Preventive Care Lines, Sallade has been married to fellow employee, Brenda Sallade for 16 years and has three children, Scott Sallade, 36, Louisville, KY, Shelby Sallade, 32, Cincinnati, Ashley Caudill, 20, Chillicothe and a 5 month old grandson, Casey (Scott).

SHORT ROUNDS

THE MARLBORO MAN: PART TWO

Ed Note: This is a follow-up article on the story which appeared in Issue 65 of Red Clay.

Courtesy of the Chronicle

With a surgeon's care, James Blake Miller adjusted the two rows of ribbons on the coat of his Marine Corps dress blues. Then he adjusted them again. He pulled on the coat, cinched the white belt that fit a bit more snugly than when he left the Marines in November, carefully adjusting the collar. "After this," he muttered, "I ain't wearing the mother again unless I'm buried in it." He slid a pack of Marlboros into a sock -- nothing goes in the pockets of a Marine's dress blues, and walked outside.

In the five months since The Chronicle revisited the story of Miller who became known as the "Marlboro Man" after a photo of him smoking during a break in combat in Iraq was published in hundreds of newspapers in November 2004 -- everything and nothing had happened to him and his wife, Jessica. But on this day, June 3, Blake and Jessica were getting married, again. Through the generosity of neighbors in Pike County and strangers in the Bay Area, they would have the big wedding they had wanted but couldn't afford a year ago, when they settled for a ceremony in a county building tucked behind an auction house.

Miller always said he spoke out about the terrible things he'd seen in battle and about the turmoil in his life since his discharge from the Marines with a diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder so that others would get help. And for a long time, he had declined offers from well-meaning strangers, falling back on his working-class values that said help is something you give yourself. But in the end, Miller succumbed to a determined effort by friends and strangers to thank him for his service with more than words; people who saw him as a symbol of American troops fighting overseas; a war fought by men and women they thought deserved more. In the end, Miller accepted those offers. But even as he adjusted his uniform and prepared to meet his bride under a floral gazebo, he still seemed to struggle with what he was being given.

"What do you say to someone who does something for you like that?" he would say, again and again. "What do you say?" Reaching out Miller's story struck a chord with a public conflicted over the war in Iraq. Hundreds of people e-mailed The Chronicle; others wrote to Miller care of general delivery in Jonancy, the tiny hollow where his father lives. One man rode with his wife on a motorcycle from Kansas and spent two days at a body shop in town, hoping the young veteran would stop by. When he failed to appear, the man drove away, leaving a message for him: "It will be all right." Some people knew little of the war, like a fisherman from Rhode Island who sent the Millers $20, saying he didn't know anybody in the military and wanted a way to help. Some, like a Delaware mother who wrote that her Marine son committed suicide after his return from Iraq and thanked Miller for speaking out, knew too much. Some wanted to do more than say thank you.

"I was so struck by the simplicity of Blake," said Eunice Davis, a resident of Pleasanton who read about Miller in The Chronicle in January. Like many who contacted Miller, Davis opposed the war but supported the troops fighting it. "He went through so much, and seems to want so little," Davis said. "He didn't wish for a Mercedes. He wanted a wedding and he wanted to please Jessica." When she finally tracked the Millers down, they seemed a little baffled," she said, by her question: "Did they still want to have that big wedding? They absolutely did not know what to do with what I was saying to them," said Davis, who remembered how people treated veterans returning from Vietnam and worried the same thing was happening again. "Blake kept saying, 'I can't let you spend that kind of money' ... he kept saying he wasn't looking for handouts."

While the Millers mulled, Davis began a quiet end-run around their reluctance. She called the Kentucky Chamber of Commerce, which gave her the number for a wedding planner in Pikeville. "For about five or 10 minutes, I had no idea who she was talking about," said Missy McCoy, a co-owner of Signature Events. "Then she said 'Marlboro Man,' and it all started coming together." Softening a hard road The uncertainty Davis encountered in Miller's feelings about his wedding was an indication of his life.

Since January, some things had gotten easier. After the Department of Veterans Affairs confirmed the diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder, or PTSD, that forced him out of the military, he had begun receiving disability payments, staving off the financial panic that had begun to consume the couple. He and Jessica moved from her grandparents' house into their own apartment over a furniture store in Pikeville, just off Highway 23, where coal trucks rumble day and night, not far from the high school they attended. Jessica was working as a dance instructor. They talked about going into real estate.

Like many young veterans, Miller also spent some of the benefit money on a treat: a Harley-Davidson Softail Standard motorcycle, the first bike he ever bought new, chrome dripping off an engine that roars like an idling rocket. Jessica wasn't too happy, and a newspaper story that mentioned the motorcycle drew a couple of nasty letters from folks accusing him of malingering on the public dime. Miller didn't care. "Ever since I was a little kid, I could get pissed off, get on the bike, and I didn't have a care in the world," he said. Now he spends many afternoons tooling through the mountains of eastern Kentucky, pumping his fist at passing coal trucks that respond with blasts of their horns and thinking as little as possible about the past.

"Sometimes, I think about how good it is to have a second chance to ride. Then I think about all the guys who didn't get that chance. Then I just crack it," he said, his hand opening up an imaginary throttle. "Best thing to do." It's also one of his only things to do -- Miller's life, since he left the military, has become somewhat static. The disability checks have insured his basic needs are met, but despite his continuing nightmares and waking visions, he has not had a therapy session since January. This month the VA scheduled him for his first follow-up after The Chronicle asked about his treatment.

He looked into a job with the police, he said, but was told he couldn't be hired for an armed position because of his disability. The VA will review Miller's condition in January, and by then, he hopes, he will have recovered enough to get and hold a job. In the meantime, there are too many days when he wakes up with no reason to get out of bed, when it's too easy to just lie in the dark listening to the coal trucks and thinking about the guys who aren't receiving checks because they don't know they need help; or the guys who just landed in Iraq and will never get help because they're never coming home. "It's like a big guilt trip, day in and day out," Miller whispered. "I just lie there and rot."

"As alone as he feels, what Miller experiences isn't uncommon among returning vets," said Dr. Robert Huwieler, a clinical psychiatrist at the VA in Huntington, W.Va. Like Miller's irritability, his nightmares and his memories, the guilt and the inertia are classic symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder as is a tendency to avoid contact, either by throwing oneself into work or by hiding from the world. "The casual observer simply can't see the wounds, and the veteran has a motivation to conceal them," Huwieler said. "What we would like people to do is to be able to talk sooner." Miller doesn't have a lot of folks to talk to. But lately he's been having long talks with Luis Sinco, the Los Angeles Times photographer who took his famous photo in Fallujah. And he talks to the people who track him down. "Being able to talk to those people ..." he shook his head. "If they hadn't sent me those letters, I don't know what I would have done."

The days before the wedding gave Miller plenty of reasons to get out of bed. The last-minute crises that seem to accompany all weddings. A pastor unexpectedly canceled. Tuxedos and dresses needed alterations. Invitations never got mailed. Miller hand-delivered one invitation two days before the wedding, pulling up at the home of Debbie Thomas with a roar. Thomas' son, Ernie, had joined the Marines with Miller and is still in the service. On the day of the wedding, he was scheduled to board the amphibious-assault ship Iwo Jima. "Now the rumor is he's going to be going to Iraq," Thomas said. Miller was silent a moment, his eyes on the ground. "I thought he was just supposed to be in the area, but stay on the ship," he said. "Well, now the rumor is he's going," she said.

In fact, none of Miller's Marine friends were expected at the wedding. He and Jessica had kept pushing up the date, hoping they could hold the ceremony before anybody shipped out. But when they finally learned his friends' ship dates, it was too late. "It's hurting him that he's missing it," Thomas said to Miller. "He wanted to be there." Miller replied, "He was going to be my best man." "And I guarantee that you'll be his best man," she said. A proper wedding instead, Miller's best man was Jeremy "Bobo" Tackett, a lifelong friend who grimaced as he worked his way into his tuxedo in the locker room of the golf course where the wedding was being held. "I feel like a plus-sized Chippendale," he grumbled. Guests were arriving -- friends, relatives, people from wildly different chapters of Miller's story, gathered together on the same page. Eunice Davis and her husband, Ron, finally met Jessica, who wore the white dress she had been saving for the occasion and a diamond-studded wedding ring donated by James Allen Schultz, a Maryland jeweler. Eunice Davis gave the younger woman a lace Italian handkerchief. "It's only for happy tears," she said, which Jessica promptly provided as her uniformed husband looked on, smiling.

"These young men and women -- God bless them," Ron Davis said. "Not just the men and women that go, but the Jessica's of this world. She has to deal with the post-traumatic stress, but she does it smiling and with love. That's courage. "Not far away stood Sinco, the photographer whose offhand shot of Miller's face -- the last photo on a bad day -- made Miller an icon. "To this day, not a day passes when I don't have a thought about Fallujah," Sinco said later. "What separates me from Blake and all the other guys is I didn't have to shoot anybody."
He dragged on his cigarette. "I'm a journalist; I'm not supposed to hope for an outcome to a story," he said. "But just this once, I wish for a fairy-tale ending. "Miller's fellow Marines were not the only guests missing. His own father and brothers did not make it, pulled away by the demands of work in a paycheck-to-paycheck life. In the end, though, the wedding came off without a hitch, well-stocked not only by the Davis' contributions but by donations from local businesses. Cooks set out chafing dishes filled with pulled pork and prepared a chocolate fountain; a local rising bluegrass star, Bo Isaacs, tuned his guitar; a bartender laid in a supply of Corona and tucked away a quart jar of moonshine.

At the appointed time, Jessica's "papaw," Hursel Fouts, guided the bride to her uniformed groom waiting under a floral gazebo. Pastor James Cantrell read the vows as the couple wept and smiled and "I do"-ed in the right places. At the end they walked off together through a shower of applause, toward a hill where an American flag turned ruddy in the sunset.

Within days, the Millers were on a plane to Washington. The National Mental Health Association, an advocacy group, had asked Blake to tell his story on Capitol Hill to try to persuade lawmakers to boost funding for veterans with post-traumatic stress. In the marbled halls of Congress, he was greeted as something of a celebrity -- and a mental health expert. "I've read a lot about you," said Rep. Mike Michaud of Maine, the ranking Democrat on the House Veterans Affairs subcommittee that handles health issues, gripping Miller's hand as he entered his office. Sitting across from each other, the congressman and the former Marine were an incongruous pair. Michaud, a silver-haired two-term lawmaker, was dressed in a standard-issue dark blue suit and red power tie. Miller, with the high-and-tight haircut he got for the wedding and a day-old beard, looked more like a country-and-western singer in his cowboy boots, blue jeans, striped shirt and sport coat.

But it was Michaud who spent most of the hour peppering the 21-year-old Kentucky native with questions: "How did Veterans Affairs treat you? Are there enough services in rural Kentucky? Have you read my bill to increase counseling for vets with post-traumatic stress?" Miller was polite, constantly calling the lawmaker "sir," but also blunt, especially when talking about the failure of the VA to adequately treat post-traumatic stress. He described how he couldn't get an appointment to see a psychologist for five months.

"It's upsetting because there are veterans out there who want to get this s -- out, who want to have it fixed as best as possible," Miller said. "Some things you can't ever get rid of and you can't ever be cured of. You can't run away from it and you can't hardly deal with it." His eyes turned watery as he explained how he sought treatment after he started having blackouts. He was afraid that, in a dark moment, he might hurt Jessica. He'd heard similar stories from other troops back from Iraq. "Take any loved one you have -- can you imagine waking up in the middle of the night to realize that you had harmed them in some way?" he said. Jessica, who recently received her degree in psychology, told Michaud that, in many cases, wives and other family members must persuade veterans to ask for help. "Usually Marines or soldiers will see it as a sign of weakness, so often it's going to take someone else," she said. As they left, Michaud urged Miller to continue to speak out -- to lawmakers, to VA officials, to his fellow veterans. "You shouldn't underestimate yourself as one individual, what you can accomplish. You telling your story is really powerful." It's the kind of thing Miller has heard often over the past five months: that telling his story to the world is helping other vets who lack his ability to speak out despite the pain and the pride. He always appreciates the kind words, but wonders if the people who say it aren't missing the point. "It's not what I can do to help people," he would say. "It's what everybody else can do."

WE GET MAIL

Tom,

Please accept this donation towards the expenses of the Red Clay. As time passes and memories fade it's important to be reminded of what we did and the sacrifices of our brothers so long ago. I have lost touch with most of my unit. While I seldom see reference to my platoon in the magazine, my memory is tweaked with each issue. Several things jump to mind as I write this.

It took me a long time to make the trip to the wall. Rolling Thunder was my first experience. I looked at the panel that has the names of those lost the first night. I found Sgt. Terry Smith and the others. Terry stood out from the others because I had to go to Dong Ha with Frank Jones to identify his remains. The trip down and back was the usual mad dash on and off the helicopter. We snipers never liked or used helmets prior to January 19, 1965. We sure used them after that. I tried to contact Terry Smiths family a couple of times over the years with no results. I believe he was from Arizona if anyone knows them.

For a time Frank Jones and I were assigned to Hill 881. I remember living in a bomb crater out on the knoll. I don't recall the unit we were assigned to. I believe the Lt. was John Kaheny. We didn't have a severe problem with rats like we did on the line at the base. I shot a deer and we boiled it up with a mixture of C's in a 55 gal drum.

When I left the Hill I was sent to run a section of the lines that stretched from the gate down towards the trash dump. The sniper hooch had taken a direct hit from a rocket and we lost most of our new Remington 700's I was platoon boss but we were spread out with little means of communication. I got hurt on the 19th, but helped many more seriously hurt than me. A gun pit took a direct hit and I carried two of the wounded to C- Med. Does anyone remember the elephant skull in front of C-Med, or where it came from?

I had been hurt the first night, then again on February the 8th. I was med-evacted to Danang where they operated on me. The doctors who worked in a bunker on the north side of the runway saved my life. Before I was flown out, Jones and a couple of others came over to see me. Frank had gathered all my gear including my weapons and put them in a sea bag which apparently went out with me. The next time I saw it was in my parent's living room, just as Frank had put it together. There was live ammunition and a loaded NVA Pistol in the holster. I was on leave from the Hospital in Key West. My Dad told me it was delivered by taxi. What's the chance of that happening again?

While I was in the hospital at Bethesda a General came by and presented me two Purple Hearts and the Bronze Star. I think McNamara was with him. I still have the picture. I was later told that Lt. Grebe who arrived just before the siege started, made the recommendation for the Bronze Star. I contacted him several years later because I never received a written a citation. He told me that he had put the war behind him and didn't want to talk about it with anyone.

Just prior to the siege a battalion sized outfit, either 3/26 or elements of the 1/9, came up from Dong Ha. I was selected to lead them out to a helicopter crash site near the Laotian border on hill 1015. I am not quite sure of the details. Frank was with me as usual. We were the only ones with red utilities. The rest of the patrol was new and had recently arrived in country. We spent a lot of time helping them with their gear.

Thank all of you for your efforts on the magazine. I hope to meet some of you next year in DC.

Vince Gable,
Sgt. HQ 26th Scout/Snipers

Dear Tom,

First of all I would like to tell you how much I enjoy our magazine, Red Clay. It has come a long way since the beginning of the organization. I have trouble putting it down and read it cover to cover.

I was in A Co 1/9 at Khe Sanh and also participated in Operation Dewey Canyon. I was wounded on Hill 471 in April 1968. I spent a month in the hospital and returned to 1/9. I finished my tour in March of 1969.

I am a Life Member of the KSV and have been to several reunions. My wife and I also went to a mini-reunion in Charleston SC. My former CO Mac Radcliff was the guest speaker. My friend and fellow Khe Sanh Veteran had a heart attack and passed away in his room that very evening. I did CPR on him until the arrival of the EMT's.

His death was hard on me and brought some of the nightmares back. An eerie thing though... his room number was 1/9/3. I have been thinking about attending the 40th anniversary. In 2008. That will be my first reunion since Charleston

I am inclosing a donation for the magazine, for a job well done. What would one expect, it is done by Marines.

Sincerely
Leonard Cosner
A Co 1/9 2ND PLT

Tom,
I found this article in the VVA Veterans newsletter.

Class of 1968

In June of 1967, two buddies, Ron Ridgeway and Bill Meeks, Jr., dropped out of Sam Houston High School in Houston to enlist in the USMC. Both served in Vietnam. Ridgeway served with the 26th Marines at Khe Sanh, where he received three Purple Hearts. He was a POW from February 1968 to March 1973. Bill Meeks served as a radioman with the 27th Marines and also received three Purple Hearts.

Ridgeway and Meeks are members of Chapter 343 in Houston and have sons serving in the Armed Forces. In May, Ron Ridgeway and Bill Meeks received their high school diplomas at a special graduation ceremony in Huntsville Texas. Texas law allows high school diplomas to be presented to men or women who quit school to serve in the U.S. Armed Forces during a time of war. Although both men had earned their GEDs while in the Marine Corps and had attended some of their high school reunions, they had never received their diplomas. The date of the diplomas was May 31, 1968.

Ernie,

I would like another copy of Kelly's book for a nurse friend of mine. Her ex husband was in the Marine Corps in Vietnam. She informed me that he helped load 55 gallon drums of Agent Orange in helicopters for dispersal on jungle canopies.

One of their children was born blind, and she is very interested in reading about Agent Orange. On my first tour in RVN when I was flying Med evacts, I remember seeing Agent Orange being loaded on those big helicopters. I think they were UH-34's. We called them "Deuces". This was at Marble Mountain.

Mr. Wodecki,
Enclosed find a check for $ 100.00, for the Khe Sanh Veterans. I appreciate receiving the issues of Red Clay and read them entirely. Your publication is so professional. Jack would be very proud of you all. Even more proud then he was in 1966-1967. Use the funds where they will do the most good.

Jim and PJ,

I just want to thank you again for bringing your group to Mobile. I do hope you will return in 2009. The reunion banquet was very special and thank you for including us. The dinner we had on Sunday was a nice way to end it,. thanks again for that./ I will always treasure the plaque. People in our office cannot get over it.God Bless
Jerry Buzzard,
Mobile Bay Convention & Visitors Bureau

Hey Tom,

I hope this finds you well. The enclosed check is from some students in Branford High School, Branford, CT. I spoke there yesterday on my KS experience to about 200 kids. They had had a bake sale and raised some money for a veterans group that I deemed important. So you guys get it! The Teachers name was Mindy Baker.

Concerning the reunion. I had every intention of going, but I am in the middle of a medical setback. An old injury, not illness, (thank God,) is going to keep me away. I had knee replacement surgery on a battered left knee a few weeks back. I actually hurt the knee as a result of a pretty brutal, cheap shot block on 5 Dec 69 at Lejeune

It's been over 30 years since that day. I have had two major surgeries and 2 scopes. In the last two years it's been bone on bone and unrelenting pain. I had to have the replacement even though I worked very hard at rehab. I outworked every flicker in the place, that's for sure. I never got full range of motion back. They have tried a few things, but I have to have a MUA (Manipulation Under Anesthesia) in mid June. Essentially, they bring me back to the hospital, knock me out, and manipulate the knee joint in every normal movement, breaking all the adhesion's/ scar tissue that prevents me from walking normally right now. The Doc says it won't hurt because I will be asleep, I told him: "Yeah, but I do have to wake up, then what?

I'll be forced to spend two to three in the hospital depending on swelling and pain. I had lots of both after the last replacement. Then it's home for bed rest and rehab twice a day that will last for 10 to 14 straight days. That effectively puts me out of the reunion. I wish I could be there to put up my pictures and see some of the guys. I'll miss it. Next time I, hope.

Tribute to Corpsman John Michels

This is our Corpsman
Assigned to a tent at Dong Ha the tent was blown up by incoming rockets you cared for the wounded
At a trash dump near Cam Lo you bathed and bandaged and laughed and played with Vietnamese children

You were initiated at the Dunes into the Marine Corps a bucket of scorpions was poured on to your chest

You drank chocolate milk to celebrate a Marine's birthday and once again to celebrate Ho Chi Minh's birth day at Quang Tri Bridge

You marched naked across Quang Tri Bridge proclaiming to the laughing Vietnamese that "The French have returned"

You listened attentively as your men read letters from their friends and families at home

You watched in horror as your friend Richard Jorgenson was thrown from a truck into a speeding tank
(The tank stopped 1 foot away from Jorgenson - he sustained broken ribs but survived)

You survived a four hour firefight tending to heat stoke victims
Lima Company suffered no serious casualties but as we prepared to leave the battlefield victorious
an explosion took the life of Major Joseph Loughran

Like a skilled surgeon you delicately removed leeches from our eyelids and the insides of our mouths

When Marines were trapped on a mountaintop - using a machete you cut your way through hundreds of yards of thick vegetation and successfully relieved them

On the way up the mountain you came across half dead
North Vietnamese soldiers you gave them water and blessed them with the Sign of the Cross
then moved on

You fed starving Marines with handfuls of Cadillac dog food when the food was gone you allowed them to continue sucking the flavor from your hands

You warned us not to drink water buffalo piss then you fought to get your share of the puddle

You made helmet liners for your Marines out of captured
NVA women's black panties

You participated in our beauty contest after a great deal of debate

we all came to an agreement that "Adak of The Mole People" was the prettiest girl in the world

Each day you passed out Useless malaria pills at night you cleared the mouths and throats of malaria victims.

You took a needle and thread and sewed poncho liners into vests to keep your men warm at night

You used powdered coffee creamer & sugar and made "Railroader's Turkish Taffy" and shared it with other soldiers and the Vietnamese

When a priest came to celebrate mass you pressed the Turkish Taffy into wafers the wafers and the blood on the ground were consecrated in the Sacrament of Holy Communion

You calmed your men who were trapped in an eight grenade daisy chain booby trap they all survived that day

You played a game with your men dispatching pages of James Mitchner's book "Hawaii" to Pvt Strande for instructions Strande would receive the page then send back appropriate quotations from his Bible

When Tom Strande was killed you tied him to a tiger litter and helped carry him up a steep hill

When a Marine who had lost the use of his arms tried to help carry Tom Strande with his teeth
you understood and helped him

You shared with your squad
L/Cpl James Leroy Brown's bottle of "Manila Rum" at our Last Supper
(Less than 24 hours after John Michel's death, Brown would die in a mine field)

Your life was saved by our scout dog the dog was cut down you ran through machine gun fire to retrieve the dog's body

You were cut down by an M-79 grenade surrounded by wounded Marines the Marines all badly cut up and in pain cried out for their "Corpsman" a Marine by your side cried out in horror
"This is our Corpsman!"
there was silence
all cries and all physical pain ceased

You were tightly wrapped by a friend in a rubber poncho - he fanned you and stayed by your side
"Do you hear them Doc? I can hear them!
They're coming for you, Doc, it won't be long"
You heard my voice and you smiled.

JUST A LITTLE STORY

By Ray Pritte

I arrived in country in late 1965. I was assigned to MAG 11, H&MS 11, and a C-117 Crew. That was my actual FPO address. We had at one time three C-117Ds and a C-45 Beechcraft. After my obligatory 13 months. I had my choice of duty stations. I Picked VMGR-352 at El Toro (KC-130Fs). Thought I was going to have it made in the shade, an 0800 to 1600 job with some training missions here and there for my last year and a half, forty miles from my parents place. Made in the shade? Not! I Should have realized by that time that the Marine Corps didn't operate that way, especially during war. Wishful thinking I guess. I took 30 days leave and reported in to VMGR-352. Within a couple of weeks I found myself detached with an half dozen other planes and crews to VMGR152 at where else, but my favorite place in the world. Danang. The VMGR-152 ramp was about 100 yards south of my old ramp. To get around the congressional prohibition on sending someone back involuntarily for a second tour, they always sent us TDY and rotated us back to El Toro occasionally for a week or so to keep the books straight. What a crazy existence.

Once I got to spend a weekend at my parents place. Big Sunday dinner. After dinner I watched the TV news. Of course it was non stop footage from Vietnam. Very surreal. Here I was in sunny, Southern California, eating a fantastic dinner with my parents folks knowing I had to get up at 0330 to get back to El Toro for an 0500 briefing for a Transpac refueling for Navy and Marine Corps jets (primarily F-4s and A-4s) all the way across the pacific to Danang. We might get an overnight stop at Futema. We hauled every kind of trash you can imagine in country for a couple of weeks before handing in our plane just out of check to 152 and taking one of their battle weary wrecks back to El Toro. Once one of the planes that we had flown all across the Pacific was found to have cracks in the wing roots that you could drop a nickel into.

I went down in a 117 on the 10th day of Operation Hastings and lost the rest of my 5 man crew. How I survived I don't have a clue. I was really messed up bad. I spent four months at the Naval Hospital at Yokosuka, then was given the choice of staying on in Japan on embassy duty, or, going back to my old squadron. It was not a hard decision. Embassy duty? Good grief. Plus no combat or flight pay? My last flight out of Danang was in August of 68 to go back to school on the GI Bill. I was one of the few enlisted crewmen who was around so long that participated big time in Operation Hastings and was still around for many missions into Khe Sanh during the Siege.

I have lost touch with almost everyone but a couple of special guys who I crewed with. They are on the CC, except for Donna, She is a special friend of mine who was a Sgt in the Army. Her brother Jerry was a door gunner who went MIA during the Siege. Tom Eichler is the Chairman of the Membership Committee and VP of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association (KSVA).I am a life member of the KSVA. A number of other 352 and 152 guys are also members.

Dedicated to the Chosen Few, the Grunts of Kilo Company

I am a grunt company Kilo Company, 3Rd Battalion 26th Marines. I have been from Khe Sanh to Chu Lai, Dong Ha, to Danang. I have humped the Oklahoma Hills. I have swept the Arizona Territory in areas like Dodge City. I have made beach landings, vertical envelopments and used the old feet to find the enemy. I have been T/O and rated as ineffective, but I have survived to see the enemy at its lowest level. I have fought both NVA and irregular guerillas. My finest hour occurred on December 26 when my sister companies and I were deployed to Khe Sanh. We were chosen to man Hill 861 just west of the combat base. It was a major post between the enemy and Khe Sanh. The hill remained quiet until Jan 15 1968, while my men were preparing for Tet. Rumors were that 50,000 NVA were in my area. On 21 January 1968, at 0230 Hours, we met the enemy. My men and I were ready though the fog blocked our vision. The cries and yells came towards me. Again and again they pounded at me, but my men fought valiantly. Many paid the full price. Only 15 NVA broke my lines, but that was soon closed. The enemy fought on through the night. By 0600 just, as fast as they had came, they disappeared. They had run away, soundly defeated. I had weathered the fight well, with 14 men killed, and 22 wounded. Their count stood at 250 dead and 6 captured. I had stood firm. We stayed there 5 months until the enemy withdraw from the area.

I then moved to Quang Tri where my men and I again searched out the enemy. We hopped around from LZ to LZ without many losses, but we did inflict losses on the enemy. In May of 1968, my sister companies and I were called to another part of the country, this time to the hills that surrounded Danang. There my men and I spent more than a month in the bush. My men and I discovered large weapons and food caches. Contact was light, but the scars I received at Khe Sanh were still sore. I spent the hot summer in the hills and rice paddies around Hill 10 and Hill 55. I had a few days in the rear once in awhile.

In September 1968 my sister companies took over the Hi Van pass. My mission was to protect the road to Phu Bai. I remained there until November 1968 and was invited to tour the area called Dodge City. I joined a gigantic cordon to block enemy forces and helped to push back the enemy. Again my men fell but the enemy paid a high price. My sister companies and I killed over 500 enemy in twenty days of fighting. I sustained three killed and 11 wounded. The news of being a special landing force late in December 1968. I found out we were equipped with sea legs when we went aboard the USS Ogden, then on to the USS Valley Forge. They planned as I had, not to get used to life on ship, because on 16 January we were off again. The next few months found my men and me in Chu Lai, and An Hoa. I was cut down to nothing, but always seemed to get new people. My men and I were both scared. On March 22 we were extracted and taken to Hill 55. where we remained for three days, until we were once again called out to hump more hills. For a month I combed the Oklahoma Hills. I lost one of my best officers on this operation. It always seemed that the good men were always the first to die.

After the Hill operations we once again returned to the ship. I wondered what they had planned for me now. We stayed on the ship until June 12th, when we left and went to the Esso Plant. The Esso Plant was a familiar site. It was good to be on land again. After 97 days we left the Plant and returned to the Hi Van pass. I left and went to Hill 190 where I spent 3 months. I did a large part while there, acting as a reaction force, finding and destroying enemy supplies. After three months we switched to the Namo Bridge. The VC had tried my force once, and they again failed. What of the future? A pacification force? leave Vietnam? No one knew for sure, only that I will move on with the courage and Espirit De Corps that has kept me alive so far. I have seen many men and will see more. I have received numerous awards. The PUC, and the Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry are among the honors won by my regiment. I am a grunt company, but it is the men and their morale, and physical courage help me stay strong. Peace may come, but until then I will do my duty as a grunt company.

Our Roving Ambassadors Visit to Washington DC for Rolling Thunder

By Cliff Treese B 1/13

Ron and I accompanied by our lovely wives flew to Washington DC to participate in Operation Rolling Thunder, it is a tribute by Bikers at the Vietnam Memorial to our fallen Veterans who perished during the Vietnam War. Cliff also had two of his buddies from the VA attend the ceremony.

We decided to visit a few of the museums while we were in DC. We always choose a few different ones each time we visit Washington. We chose the Aerospace and Native American Museums (Pic # 1 & 2).

Ron and I felt right at home when we got on the escalator. The steps all had Parris Island yellow footprints on them. We looked around for D.I.'s to start yelling at us. Ron and I tested our flying expertise in an F-14 simulator. Needless to say, we are better at artillery than flying. We flew most of the mission upside down.

At the Native American Museum there are numerous displays from all the different tribes, from Alaska to Florida. While leaving the museum we ran into two Native American Cherokee Indians from Tennessee. They are both from the UCAN Veteran's Society & Honor Guard. One of them was Paul D. (Four Eagles) Green from Cleveland, TN (Pic # 11).

Ron, his three buddies and I had tickets for the Evening Parade at 8th & I. We were concerned if they would even have it, but as we approached the subway entrance the sky opened up. When we arrived at 8th and I God must have been looking down on we Marines. Just as quickly as the rain started, it stopped. We were hungry. Since we were early we stopped at a bar called Marty's. Ron met a man who was looking for tickets for 8th & I. He gave them the two extra tickets we had for our wives who chose not to attend. Ron's three buddies who were all soldiers, were very impressed by the parade, as are all who have had the pleasure to attend the ceremony. After the program, we stopped and said hi to Chris Noel from Vietnam Armed Forces Radio Station.

The next morning Ron and I walked to The Wall.

The perfect time to visit the wall is before the crowd arrives. You can take your time and have a little privacy. We went to panel41E and 45E to pay our respects to two of our friends from B 1/13, (Ron Dempsey and Louis Goi). We spent a few minutes talking about the good times we had with them before Khe Sanh. We really miss our friends.

We walked back past the Three Soldier's Statue to visit the flagpole with the Service emblems at the base. We were proud to see that the Marines are still polishing their portion of the base, even though it is against Park rules. (Pic # 4) We heard Gordon Painter singing by the Reflection Pond and walked over to the stage. (Pic # 6) We have met Gordon on our previous visits to Rolling Thunder. Gordon is a great guy and took the time to speak to us between songs.

By this time a crowd was gathering and we followed them back past the Three Soldier's Statue to the far end of The Wall. CNN news approached Ron and I and asked if we would participate in an interview. Ron and I along with a Khe Sanh Marine sniper from 1/9 were interviewed by their reporter. The reporter asked us our opinion of the war in Iraq compared to Vietnam and why we came to visit The Wall. Ron's interview aired Sunday morning. Mine aired Monday morning.

Ron disappeared. When we finally found him he was checking out the custom bike being raffled by Rolling Thunder, along with the chassis of a young lady promoting the raffle. (Pic # 3). I don't know how many tickets he bought but we had a hard time getting him away from that bike.

On Sunday, the day of the Parade, we returned to Thunder Alley. Constitution Avenue is blocked off when the parade starts. The parade usually takes several hours to complete. It starts with the usual D.C. Police motorcade followed by the Rolling Thunder vehicles. This year's parade was reported to be 750,000 strong. Biker's come from all over the country to participate. When the parade comes down Constitution Avenue, you know why it is called Rolling Thunder. You can hear the parade coming long before you can see it. It is an awesome sound and sight.

We returned to the stage area by The Reflection Pond to listen to the show put on each year by the Rolling Thunder Organization. Each year celebrity performers donate their services to the Rolling Thunder cause and honor Veterans with a free show. For more than twenty years a veteran portrays a POW and sits in a bamboo cage during the performance. (Pic # 7 & 7A)) He is carried in by an honor guard and endures the heat in order to illustrate the humiliation of being caged like an animal and the plight of the many POWs during the Vietnam Era.

As the program began I looked behind me up the steps of The Reflection Pond with the Lincoln Memorial in the background and witnessed hundreds of veterans and their families standing with their hats off and their hands over their hearts during an excellent rendition of the National Anthem performed by Gordon Painter (Pic # 10). Ron and I heard that Nancy Sinatra would soon be leaving the motor home to come to the stage area.

Although Ron and I were both Cannon Cockers" we decided a recon mission was called for in order to find Nancy's bus. We put the bus under siege until Nancy surrendered and agreed to a Peace Conference before going on stage. As always, Nancy graciously granted us a few moments of her time and posed for pictures with us (Pic # 8). I asked her about the jacket we had made for her two years ago. She said she still has the jacket and wears it on regular occasions. She remarked that she can always count on the Khe Sanh Veterans'to show up for the Rolling Thunder Concert. Monday, Ron and Lynn left to visit their daughter in Maryland. Linda and I returned for the services being held at The Wall. Four new names were added to The Wall this year. Their surviving family members were special guests at the ceremony. Jimmy Fortune, formerly of the Statler Brothers, returned to The Wall once again to sing his moving song, More Than A Name On The Wall. There wasn't a dry eye in the area. After his performance, I approached the stage to speak with him. I had met him two years ago and presented him with a Khe Sanh hat and one of my cards (Pic # 9). He remembered me and remembered his camera crew had filmed Ron, Glen, and me with him at the Wall. He informed me that he plans to use the footage shot that day for a music video of the song More Than A Name On The Wall.

He presented me with an autographed CD of his new song In God We Trust. As always, the ceremony at

The Wall was very moving. Wreaths were laid to honor those who lost their lives in the Vietnam War along with those still unaccounted for. Taps were played by a bugler and bagpipes who stood on top of The Wall at its apex. We returned to the hotel to get ready for our flight back to Florida. It was the perfect ending to another great trip to Washington, D.C.

BOOK REVIEW

RED PLATEAU: Memoir of a North Vietnamese Soldier. By John Edmund Delezen. Published by Corps Productions. 141 pages. Stock 0961852925. $14.35 MCA Members. $15.95 Nonmembers.

Reprinted with permission from Leatherneck Magazine, June 2006.

"Red Plateau" takes you inside the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) by using a unique concept. The author, John Delezen, a decorated, multi-wounded Marine veteran of the war in Vietnam, writes the story through the eyes of a young, newly conscripted recruit who is transformed into a highly dedicated member of the NVA. This is accomplished by using diaries and ledgers kept by Nguyen Van Tuan and members of his battalion. Delezen previously wrote the well-received "Eye of the Tiger," based on his experiences while serving in 3d Force Recon Company along the Demilitarized Zone in Vietnam's northern I Corps.

How did the author become so knowledgeable about our former enemy? After the war, he studied Vietnamese and returned to Vietnam. While touring Hue, he was relaxing near the Trang Tien Bridge when he met former NVA soldier Nguyen Van Tuan. This casual meeting of two former enemies led to a life long friendship. The author and Tuan, who possibly faced each other in mortal combat, became like brothers. The result of countless meetings led to a supremely crafted narrative, "Red Plateau."

Tuan becomes the voice of Delezen's short but powerful book. Through Tuan's eyes, details of life in the villages of Vietnam and the daily life inside the NVA come alive. Conscripted into the army, Tuan received three months of harsh train-ing and became part of an infantry unit. After training, the unit moved south along the Ho Chi Minh Trail. The first few kilometers by truck were the last ride during the war for Tuan. For the next six years he and his comrades covered mile after mile on foot. His unit moved south through the Truong Mountains (ominously called the "Door to Death), where U.S. aircraft were always on the prowl, searching for targets along the trail. The most feared weapons for Tuan and his comrades were B-52 bombers and napalm. Young North Vietnamese women manned many of the antiaircraft batteries along the trail .

Using Tuan's voice to describe the move south, the author's prose is masterful. Even the most hardened veteran of the war should feel a kinship to the typical NVA soldier. The author's well structured narrative benefits from seemingly endless sources of information mined from the diaries and journals covering years of combat in South Vietnam. The book's title comes from the coloring of these documents, mostly tinted red by long exposure to the clay soil which permeated the area of combat operations of Tuan's unit.

The reader will learn the innermost workings of the small infantry units of the NVA, including the close bonding between NVA soldiers and the difficulties of traversing long distances with extremely limited support and sparse rations. Mail from home was almost non existent. When a soldier was fortunate enough to receive a letter, he eagerly shared the news with others.

To ensure the young soldiers maintained proper communist attitudes, a political officer accompanied each small unit, or cell. The performance of these omnipresent and oft times barely tolerated officers is described, as well as punishment imposed on soldiers for minor infractions. After reading of the dangers faced day and night by the NVA, the reader may wonder how so many survived to enter battle in South Vietnam. Air strikes decimated their ranks. Malaria and dysentery were common ailments.

Using the voice of his friend, Delezen has captured the daily challenges of living, traveling and soldiers dying beneath the triple canopy week after week. He takes you inside their "hearts and minds" as well as any author has done. His success is due to many factors. The language skills were most helpful, but the real key was his deepening friendship with Tuan, who provided access to countless documents and records of years of combat by a small NVA unit.

Most important, Delezen's talent for expressing the innermost feelings and motivation of low ranking

NVA soldiers is what separates this short and inexpensive paperback book from the many other books about a war that claimed more than 58,000 American lives. "Red Plateau" is well worth reading for many reasons, not the least of which is learning of the leadership skills displayed at the platoon, company and battalion level. The captains and majors portrayed in "Red Plateau" had fought the French for years and now faced a new and more formidable enemy, armed with devastating weapons and numbering more than half a million. The leadership traits portrayed in "Red Plateau" provide valid "lessons learned" for decades to come.

Hey Ernie

I missed you at the Reunion. However, I did pick up the "Red Plateau" book you published. Fascinating story for anyone (like me) who could see himself and people he knew dancing in and out of it. Delezen's poetry is evident throughout as a filter through which Tuan's tale is told. At times, I wondered just how much of the telling was Delezen's?

No matter, it's a hell of a story that I couldn't put down. The sensitive, poetic way the story is related really helps conjure those tender and stark moments and images. Another reason, I suppose, is that I really could visualize much of the terrain and some of the events being related. On page 101, for instance, Tuan heard "helicopters" over the fallen base at Lang Vei in the early light hours. Nope! That was definitely me and another FAC in our O-2s, sizing things up and directing air strikes. The second paragraph he describes the aircraft in the treetops and fog? That had to be "Canasta" flight, four Navy A-1s from the carrier. As a follow up to my contacts with the Lang Vei survivors, I have struck up a liaison with one of these "Canasta" pilots. Amazing how his diary parallels mine in thought and events. I plan to share the book with him. It'll knock his socks off. It all got me thinking again about putting my own diary into readable form. Gotta get it digitized first, I guess.

Ray Stubbe's "Battalion Of Kings" makes a good cross check of daily activity during the Siege, doesn't it? Got one of those as well. That was one grand hotel we were at in Mobile. Since I missed the last two reunions, it was great to see so many familiar faces again. So you are in El Dorado Hills, CA now? Nice area. I still have a sister in Sacramento and visit fairly often. My annual sabbaticals are the "Sacramento Dixieland Jubilee" and the "Reno Air Races." Maybe we can connect for more Thai food on one of my trips through?
Cheers,

Toby Rushforth

Ed. Note. Thai food is an insider joke between Toby and me. It happened in Waikiki. Got a great Thai place right here in El Dorado Hills. Half hour from Old Town Sac. on the road to Tahoe.

REFLECTIONS OF THE PAST
MCRD San Diego

By Craig W.Tourte

I'm heading down to San Diego next week from Northern California. It is about a 9 or 10 hour drive. My son is turning 21 so I though I should spend a little time with him (OK so I got a late start). Over the phone he was telling me how difficult it was only having one little in the wall air-conditioner. He told me it was 85 with a little rain. I didn't want to start on, about where I was, or, what I was doing when I turned 21. But I can remember it quite clearly. His turning 21 will be a special memory for me.

I'm going to be in San Diego for a couple of days before my wife flies in., She is still employed while I lay around on my butt a lot. While I'm there I think I'll drop in to see MCRD. I haven't been to the place since I left in1966 (platoon 1145), although I have often stood inside the San Diego airport looking at it just across the runaway. I have noticed the changes and observed that there appears to be far fewer recruits than when I was there with Bill Poland and Mike Powers, both Khe Sanh Veterans. I must have looked kind of funny to the other people if any of them spent any amount of time observing me. The memories come rushing back and I can't help but think of all the many who went before and after me and of those who did not return.

I seem to remember that boot camp was a short, but difficult 8 week course. Mike Powers reminds me that most who were in our platoon were East coast Reservists. I think it's going to be a little difficult when I first get in my car and make my way to the front gate. I'm sure they'll wonder who this old man is. I'll wear my red Khe Sanh Veteran shirt and see if that gets me into the officers club. Do they have an officers club? I won't tell them I was just a Private, make that an E4 when I got out in 1968, but I always kind of felt like a private. I hope I don't find myself yelling: "Yes Sir."

My wife is flying back to Northern California from San Diego on August 3rd and I'm heading up the coast to beautiful San Louis Obispo to play some golf. I'm going to be by myself. Sometimes it's good to spend some time with your memories and thinking about one's youth. A long drive to nowhere in particular kind of clears my mind of the little stuff and helps me to remember and appreciate all that we as Khe Sanh Veterans went through, and to realize that as much as things change, they remain the same.

My Tour of MCRD San Diego
First Visit After Boot Camp

By Craig W Tourte

Realizing that I graduated from the Recruit Depot exactly 40 years ago was daunting this morning as I toured the historic facility. It was the first time I had returned since I graduated from boot camp. Mike Powers (D/1/26) and Bill Poland (HQ 1/13) were in my 1966 graduating platoon 1145 and both served at Khe Sanh. They look so much older now. I of course look much the same as I did when I graduated. OK, so I've gained a few pounds, but give me a few weeks and I'd be right back to where...another dream I'm afraid. The most painful experience was realizing that the new recruits would be my grandchildren's age (providing I had any). I met Lt. Col. Thomas A. Richards, U.S.M.C. (Ret.) who is currently the Executive Director of the Marine Corps Recruit Depot Museum Historical Society www.mcrdmuseumhistoricalsocidety.org. We talked a little about Vietnam and his 20 year military career. He was a graduate of the Recruit Depot and served there as a drill instructor. He served in Vietnam in the early 70's.

The Historical Society is currently constructing a new wing featuring the Vietnam War. The Society has donated $150,000.00 towards this effort, which is now making its way through the bureaucracy for approval. I gave Col. Richards one of our Khe Sanh coins. He was very appreciative and in return gave me a gold coin with the Eagle Globe and Anchor that read "United States Marine Corps, Semper Fidelis." The flip side read, "MCRD Museum Historical Society, San Diego California." It was very impressive and he called to me and came outside saying he forgot to give it to me when I was in his office. I took a few photos of the Vietnam glass case devoted to our war. A case measuring about 8X10 with a few artifacts inside is all that is currently presented, but that should change sometime in the future. There was a small typed notice mentioning Khe Sanh and Tet, but that was about it.

I stood out on the grinder and had a conversation with another former Marine who retired 4 years ago. He served 20 years and retired as a drill instructor. He told me about some of the changes he had seen at the Depot over the years. I didn't say much other than nod a little. I figured, what was the use talking about the base as I knew it 40 years ago. I wondered over to the theater which has not changed at all. There was some kind of small ceremony going on inside for enlisted NCOs who had completed various college courses. My attention was drawn to two Privates cleaning the floor up in the balcony seats where our platoon always managed to sit during the mandatory church services on Sunday. The theater remains hot, stuffy and airless inside. Outside, I stood over on the side where I had my photograph taken with my parents, grandparents, aunt and uncle the day I graduated those many years ago. Me standing uneasy before my family, proud in my new green uniform. They are all gone now, but that stoop on the North side of the steps has remained the same. I wondered how many other young Marines have stood there with their families.

I received quite a few "Good Morning Sir," as I walked around, feeling like an ancient forgotten relic of centuries past and forgotten. The grinder is still as large as I remember, but now it seems that one third is devoted to parked vehicles. There were a couple of recruit platoons marching on the grinder. It just did not seem as impressive with all the cars and trucks parked around. The recruit platoons didn't look to be as large as the platoons we had during the Vietnam period, but they did look pretty sharp, I think graduation is every Friday. The Marine Corps Band was playing somewhere off in the distance.

The music stopped me in my tracks, remembering when the band would march to the large flag every evening when the colors were taken down. I am still moved by the music and the memory. Of course all of the old Quonset huts are gone now, the new barracks having taken their place some 35 years ago. I was happy to leave the Marine Corps and the Recruit Depot when I returned from Vietnam and where I was stationed shortly before I go out in 1968. I confess as I left the Depot I never looked back. But, as I got in my car and drove out the front gate this morning, I knew I had left a little of me behind this time and then realized that I had left a great deal of me behind when I drove out of those same gates in 1968.

REPLIES:

First Visit After Boot Camp

By Dennis Mannion

Craig: Very nicely done. When the reunion was in Charleston, I naturally took the hour long bus trip to PI. I don't remember if you were there. Sorry. At the conclusion of the tour, they unloaded us at the PX Cash Sales area with instructions to stay in that location for the hour or so. I waited 30 seconds before "drifting" away. I knew I'd never find my barracks in 1967. We were in the old wooden ones left over from WWII and they were long gone. It took 15 minutes or so to walk to the Grinder. I believe that we were there on a Thursday with graduation on Friday.

Two platoons were alternating time between the vast pavement and the visitor stands. There was plenty of wide open space for both, but they alternated close order drill and some DI TIME while sitting at rapt attention. I stood quietly to the side of the stands and could not help but smile at all the: "Sir, Yes, Sir" response and the constant use of the DI's: "Do you understand me?!"

One of the DI's approached and said: "Good Afternoon, Sir." He saw my reunion tag with the Khe Sanh name and inquired if there was anything I wanted. I asked if it would be OK to walk out to the dead center of the Grinder where I knew I had walked all those years before. He said, "A Khe Sanh Marine Sir? You can walk anywhere you want out here. Take all the time you desire."

I eased my way down in front of the seated platoon so that I was in the absolute center of all that concrete. I then walked straight out until I was in the exact middle. I did a 180 degree turn. No. I did not point one foot behind me and do an about face. I took in the view. The last time I had that same view with the stands in front of me and the Iwo Jima statue to the left. It was Graduation Day on 16 March 67. I knelt right at that spot, down on two knees like in church, and said a quiet prayer for the Platoon 236 guys who never made it back, the Khe Sanh guys who never made it back, and, all the Marines and Corpsman from our era who never came home. I stood for a minute...brushed away a tear or two ...rejoiced that my good wife and one of my sons were back at the PX waiting on me, then turned and walked on a 45 degree angle to reach the end of the Grinder. As I walked, I kept looking down at the concrete wondering if my spit polished boots (never done quite right) had ever made contact in that exact same spot 3 plus decades before. We spent a lot of time out there. I bet they did.

Great story Craig

I made the same trip in May of this year. I visited MCRD for the May 5th Graduation and was proud to see that it was my beloved 3rd Battalion graduating, exactly 10 days short of forty years since I had stepped on those yellow footprints. I mentioned this to the Lance Corporal at the gate. His reply: "I heard you lived in Quonset Huts back then."

I too saw the sign for the "Little Saigon" area and El Toro which is in the process of being converted into a Housing Development similar to New York's Central Park area. For some reason I always thought El Toro was much further North. During my return to the States, the crew from the Continental Airlines flight allowed me to stay on the airplane for its final leg to LAX where I caught a flight to Chicago. I'm-saving Pendleton for the next trip and maybe 29 Palms where I went to 50 caliber School.

Fishing the Rao Quan

By Dan Fisher D Co 1/26

The column of green clad Marines snaked slowly along the north bank of the Rao Quan River where it intersects with Route 9 east of Khe Sanh Combat Base. A place known on tactical maps as the "Hairpin."

At intervals of 50 feet two Marines would drop from the end of the moving column and begin digging fighting positions facing both the river and the steep embankment to their immediate rear. Their mission was to provide security for engineers constructing a crossing some distance up stream from an earlier blown bridge.

It had been four weeks since the 1st Battalion, 26th Marines arrived at Khe Sanh following the Hill Fights and life was hectic for all the Battalion's companies occupying, fortifying and defending the Combat Base, the three Hill outposts and running long range combat patrols in all directions right up to the Laotian Border below Co Roc Massif. NVA units roamed this Area of Operations and announced themselves in quick and deadly encounters.

One pair of Marines thrown together by chance finished their fighting hole and began the uneventful watch to their front and back. The hot, humid jungle conditions of the river gorge weighed heavily on their attention span and they searched for anything to talk about to keep alert. Suddenly, familiar swirls in the river captured their attention and they talked excitedly of fishing back home in the mountain streams of Arizona and the woodland lakes of Minnesota.

When "the word" passed to shift the watch to fifty percent one Marine scurried to find materials for their new quest. A sturdy bamboo shoot, a length of trip wire, a hook fashioned from an old frag pin and tipped with a piece of pork steak rounded out their tackle.

Quietly, one Marine plied the murky, river currents while the other carefully scanned the river and surrounding embankment for sign of enemy or their ever-roving platoon sergeant with each taking turns to fish. Did they catch fish? I can't remember and it didn't much matter. It was a well deserved break from the stark reality they had come to know.

That mission soon ended and they went on to many others but each Marine carried that fond memory for years to come often retelling it during family fishing trips of how they once fished a distant jungle river.

Fast forward 33 years to the 2000 Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in San Diego. Both of these angling Marines, Ray Palmer and Dan Fisher, were brought together again by Delta Company historian, Tom Howard, who, during his research noted two similar fishing stories, Memories of that long ago fishing excursion remained sharp with both veterans. Gifts were exchanged and promises of future fishing trips were made, but under different circumstances!

MY THE PATH TO RECOVERY

By Robert Schoondermark M CO 3/26

During my path to healing, I was in the VA Hospital in Hot Springs SD in May of 2001. While in a "Sweat Lodge" at the hospital, I found myself on my knees with my forehead touching the ground much like the Muslims pray. Actually, I was just trying to get my nose out under the wall of the lodge to get some cooler breaths of air.

My simple prayer was: "God, AA says if a person is on their knees and sincerely ask the creator, he will remove the urge and craving," Since I could not handle life with or without alcohol and apparently the creator wasn't going to allow me to die, I needed help. If he would take this urge and craving, I would strive to do as he would lead me. I had a lightning flash and those awakening lightning beings shocked that urge and craving right out of my body. I have not had the slightest desire to touch alcohol in over 5 years. Thank you brothers. To share serenity, and stay on the path, we are blessed to walk together whatever times we can.

Ed Note: Robert sent in a copy of the buckskin legacy he gifted to the PTSD program at the VA Health Care facility in Black Hills, SD in 2003. A copy was also accepted in the permanent collection at the Angel Fire memorial in 2005.

Khe Sanh Hillbillies

By Craig W. Tourte

The 77 Siege of the Corps Combat Base at Khe Sanh was pretty much a grind for those of us who survived that most harrowing experience. The time we spent at Khe Sanh prior and subsequent to the Siege was no cakewalk either. The deprivation was constant the whole eight months that I was on the base. There was too little water and what was available was always warm, the foul taste often masked by a dry powered sweet cool aid in red or orange flavor. The quality of food was mostly poor, often consisting of a canned mystery surrounded in lard with a familiar label but unidentifiable when opened and poured, grease and all onto a dusty metal pan before being placed into the oven of a portable gasoline fired cook stove. Some dried bulk and food products were left over from the Korean War. Any fresh or frozen meat received was saved by the Gunny for the field grade officers. When the cooking facilities (mess halls and stoves), small tent in the case of H.Q. 1/13 were blown up during the Siege, we subsisted on C-Rations, another dated canned product. Three or four months of C-Rations during the Siege did not offer one's digestive system much relief from the familiar cramps and dysentery.

It was often difficult to obtain replacement uniforms for the too quickly rotting ones we had arrived in. Our stateside leather boots quickly turned a kind of greenish color within a matter of weeks and a strange mold grew on the exterior before the leather rotted away. The replacement canvas jungle boots, although occasionally found to have been worn by another and uncomfortable for the most part, were a welcome relief from the leather boots. There seemed to be little in the way of weapon cleaning material and troops often questioned the reliability of the new M16 rifle. There was little or no electricity or artificial illumination for most of us. Toilet (head) facilities were limited to a board placed over half of a 55 gallon barrel partially filled with diesel fuel. The eight months I spent on that Red Plateau just seemed to stretch on forever with just miserable, endless days and nights of rats, snakes, fly's, and other assorted winged insects. The Siege caused more misery than I ever thought possible.

The 77 day Siege brought new challenges for survival. In addition to limited amounts of food and water we were forced to deal with other very basic needs like toilet paper and soap to wash our hands. During the Siege, in addition to the lack of everything else, we had little or no sleep. It was a kind of dull, numbing dream like state. We stayed in the same clothes for months at a time, were never clean, never rested and always exhausted

I was happy to leave Khe Sanh after eight months up on that plateau. I miss nothing about the place and have no desire to return. I have spoken to others who sometimes boast about spending two or more tours in Vietnam. Bless their hearts, but I knew I could not return to Vietnam, I felt that to hesitate or return would mean certain doom for me. All of those who returned for more war were just bigger and better men than me. I have observed with interest the pictures shown to me by many other Vietnam Veterans. You know the ones? Grinning and posturing with weapons proudly displayed, perhaps some bodies of NVA or VC laid out as a kind of grotesque trophy. The Siege was exhausting for me both physically and mentally. I knew I could not go through anything like that again: The war was over for me.

The years passed and I tried to forget, but of course that did not work out well for me, nor for many of us. I kept visiting Khe Sanh whether or not I wanted to be there. Khe Sanh continued to visit me. I unwillingly returned there night after night. An unwelcome visit that I could not control. Although the visits were short, they were often and just long enough to see the faces of those I'll never forget. I could smell that unmistaken odor of war, and it stunk.

Thirty-eight years passed and I slowly begin to recall the names of those who I served with. Although my recall of certain events faded over the years, occasionally a voice, name or photograph would bring me back. After the Siege, what was left of our unit packed what was not blown, rocketed, mortared, shot or burned up and hastily piled what little was left into duce and a half trucks for the convey to Quang Tri.

I had met Tom Horchler at Khe Sanh. We found that although we lived in small neighboring towns in California, we had the same Marine Corps Recruiter. During the Siege we often spoke of our chance of survival, each promising to visit the other's family if the other did not return. Tom was a truck driver with HQ 1/13. He had a dirty, dangerous job with no sandbags to hide behind, no trench to jump into. Just a large moving target, driving the dead and wounded, artillery rounds and pallets of the provisions of war to all points in the bulls eye of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I rode shotgun on the truck that Tom drove out of Khe Sanh.

I went to Boot Camp in San Diego, California (Platoon 1145, 1966), ITR and Staging with Mike Powers (D/1/26) and William (Bill) A. Poland (HQ 1/13). I served with both at Khe Sanh, though at the time I was unaware that Mike was also present on the base. I respected Bill. He was quiet and competent. He never complained about our horrible circumstances, like the water, food, twenty-four hour days, incoming and the wounded. I on the other hand bitched and complained all of the time. When I got home from Vietnam I talked to Bill on the telephone. He was living some where in Ohio I think, and working at a GM plant. Bill invited me to visit him and said he was pretty sure he could get me on at GM. I declined the invitation and lost track of him.

It's strange how the computer has made the world a smaller place. After 38 years I was able to contact Bill Poland and met him again at this year's reunion in Mobile, Alabama. Bill is still a quiet guy, who like the rest of us, has been deeply affected by the war and the Siege at Khe Sanh. I am proud of the fact that I was able to introduce Bill to our Khe Sanh family for the first time and signed him up in the Association. The reunion and our meeting after 38 years was an emotional experience for both of us.

A few of the photographs I took at Khe Sanh survived. They're old, faded and grainy. The photographs take on a new meaning for me now. I see a Marine looking back at me who is young and healthy and the same age my son is now (21). I also look into the faces of those who did not return with me. A sad moment, but a moment that helps me to appreciate what I now have and appreciate the sacrifice made by so many. Tom Horchler, Mike Powers, Bill Poland and I all made it back from Vietnam and the 77-day Siege of Khe Sanh, although we all continue to carry the emotional scars of our experiences from that time in history.

Tom recently came across an old photograph he took of our small unit after the Siege. He told me that he took the photograph just before I climbed onto the back of his truck for our long crawl in the convoy off of the plateau and out of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The little black and white photograph barely survives time. It's crumpled, faded and the film is kind of bubbling up away from the paper. The faces of the seven men in the photograph are clearly identifiable. I have no recall of Tom taking the photograph. I was stunned when I first saw the photograph. My initial response was that the look on the faces on the seven men were of angry. Upon closer scrutiny, I realized that none of the men were posturing with a weapon, nor did they have flak jackets or helmets on. They all carried the same deep, fixed stare, and were just totally and utterly exhausted and spent. Their wounds from the long Siege were unseen to the naked eye, but I am sure are a little more visible today.

Tom had the photograph repaired as best that it could be done. The technician noted what appeared to be some type of photo damage to the open doors and blended them away. Tom had to tell the technician that the blemishes were in fact holes made by shrapnel and were not a flaw in the film. Tom calls this photograph the "Khe Sanh Hillbillies." Shortly before the picture was taken, Tom got a cardboard bottom to a case of C-Rations and wrote on the cardboard "Khe Sanh Hillbillies" and placed it on the front of the trucks radiator. Apparently that is what he thought we all looked like, a bunch of poor hillbillies heading out of town in a beaten down old truck. Tom drove.

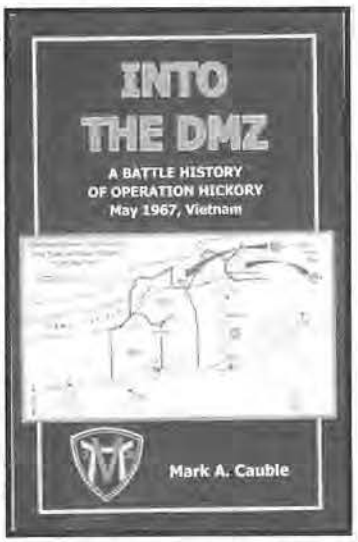
INTO THE DMZ: A BATTLE HISTORY OF OPERATION HICKORY May 1967, Vietnam

Big Bear, CA (October 20, 2005) - Mark A. Cauble, Barstow Community College History instructor, has just had his book published. It is entitled "Into The DMZ: a Battle History Of Operation Hickory," May 1967, Vietnam.

Leatherneck magazine says of Into The DMZ, "Twice wounded as a member 1st Platoon Golf Company, 26th Marine Regiment, and now a professor of history, Mark A. Cauble has written a book for those who were there! More than that, he puts the fighting into historical context and writes a thoroughly satisfying read for Vietnam history buffs."



"Into The DMZ" tells the little-known story of one of the most intense battles of the Vietnam War. It is an account of the courage and endurance of men in combat. In early 1967, the North Vietnamese Army attacked American forces from vantage points within the Demilitarized Zone. They ambushed the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, and Operation Hickory was launched to save 2/26 and to destroy the enemy. The author introduces and concludes this book by examining the battle in context of the Vietnam War and the larger struggle between the West and Communism. A historian, philosopher and participant in Operation Hickory, his three distinct voices give the work a unique perspective.

Comprised from numerous eyewitness accounts, the battle narrative drops the reader into the thick of the action alongside the Marine riflemen. Academic research supported by military documentation provides details with maps, drawings and actual photographs from Operation Hickory. "Into The DMZ" describes how these warriors indeed earned "the red badge of courage."

Mark is that uncommon person who matured in the 1960s and, though not unaffected by the political turbulence of the era, put everything on the line for his country when fashionable opinion turned against it .

The unit sprang into action following a North Vietnamese ambush on May 8, 1967. Based on his records and memory, and those of his fellow Marines, supplemented by the official Marine record, Mark Cauble tells of his unit's day to day operations, which constitutes the heart of his book. But he also provides the larger context of the Communist assault on the world, first in 19th century writings (Marx and Engels), and then in wars (Lenin, Trotsky, Stalin, Mao and many others) in the 20th, against non-communist regimes. Mindful of his own sacrifices and those of his buddies in combat ; some making the supreme sacrifice, Mark Cauble connects the unglamorous, tedious and violent experiences of young Marines in a hostile foreign jungle to the grand acts of statesmanship that ultimately vindicated their service.

Richard Reeb, Ph.D.

Another Reviewer: Bradley T. Bellah (Los Angeles, CA)

There have been many books written about the history of America's involvement in Vietnam. Some have concentrated on the political aspects and fallout, while others have analyzed the military's overall plans and objectives. The best have taken the reader into the war in an attempt to explain what the everyday Marine or Soldier experienced in Vietnam. INTO THE DMZ: A BATTLE HISTORY OF OPERATION HICKORY ranks among the best books I have read about combat, from the battle plans of an operation, down to the very sounds, smell, and horror of the battlefield.

Author Mark Cauble is a history professor who served with the Marines in Vietnam and was a participant in Operation Hickory. His training as both a Marine and as an historian gives the reader a unique view of the Vietnam experience. The book is bracketed with a prologue and epilogue that lays out a brief history of the region before and after America's involvement. Mr. Cauble places Vietnam into its rightful place in history; as the costliest battle fought within the larger global conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union, known as the Cold War.

Operation Hickory took place in May 1967. The goal of the operation was to save the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, who had been ambushed by the North Vietnamese in the Demilitarized Zone that separated North and South Vietnam, and, annihilate the enemy.

Mr. Cauble's style is very detailed and visual. Drawings of weapons and enemy tactics are provided, along with photographs and maps. The early chapters build a kind of nervous anticipation of what is to come. As the Marines head out on patrol; looking for an unseen and well defended enemy, carrying 100 pound packs in 100 plus degree weather, the reader is given a glimpse of the day to day, minute to minute life of a Marine in the field. In addition to facing enemy fire, the Leathernecks had to battle thirst, foot-long leeches, yard-long centipedes, tigers and rats. One rat in particular was so formidable, it became known simply as "the King Rat." Some of these stories make you shudder and laugh at the same time. However, the real strength of the narrative lies in the eyewitness accounts from the battlefield.

The depiction of what it was like to be under enemy fire is very intense and disturbing. The sound a man makes after being shot. Selfless acts of heroism that, in many instances, lead to death. The sense of dread knowing that the enemy is nearby but remains unseen. Dealing with jammed weapons and low ammo. Seeing men next to you suddenly killed or wounded; and the general confusion and chaos that ensues. These images will linger in the mind long after the book is put down. Those who have never served in the military will find this book invaluable when trying to understand what their fathers, brothers, sons and daughters in the Armed Services have endured and sacrificed in order to protect the everyday freedom that the rest of us take for granted. Mr. Cauble views history through the lens of a philosopher. This viewpoint assists the reader in placing the experiences shared by Vietnam veterans into the larger, universal experiences shared by all brave men and women who have served in time of war. This makes the subject especially relevant in today's world.

Military buffs and historians will no doubt relish in the details of Operation Hickory. Those who have never read a book on Vietnam and wish to understand this very controversial and turbulent time in American history will find "Into The DMZ" an excellent place to start. The book is very well researched. Extensive end notes and bibliography are provided for those interested in further research into the war. Highly recommended!

One Day in the War

By Ron Smith H&S 3/26

The event I am going to describe is similar to a number of experiences of the men during the siege. Like many of my memories, this one is clouded by thirty-eight years. Some of the experiences in question are as clear as if they happened yesterday. Some of it is pretty blank. The event is one of the attempts to get the bodies of Gunny Wire and Gunny Robitaille (both from Mike 3/26) off of Hill 881S.

The Gunnies were killed in the same hole on 23 February 1968. KIAs were routine medevacs, and that status combined with foggy weather made it difficult to get a chopper in to pick up the bodies. It probably didn't help that we had a UH-34 permanently parked in one of our LZs. I am not sure how many attempts were made before my number came up, but the Gunnies had been dead for several days. The odor is something that I will never forget.

I was picked to help get the bodies into the LZ. I had been working the LZs as part of my TACP duties. I am not sure how the three grunts from India Company had been selected. It was hot that day. We worked up a pretty good sweat getting the bodies out onto the LZ. India Company had run out of body bags, so the Gunnies had been wrapped in ponchos and placed on stretchers. We had two men on each stretcher, it was tough work. When we were told that a bird was on the way in, we had to hoist the stretchers out of the deep trench line that circled the hill and run to the LZ, bent low to make smaller targets for the NVA sniper on 881N.

Once in the LZ, we waited in a shallow trench for the medevac chopper. When I was given the word, I popped a yellow smoke to identify our LZ. We were out of the trench and moving towards the chopper while it was hovering in the LZ, but it started taking fire from 881N and had to abort. Before it took off, the crew chief tossed out two body bags. We raced back to the shallow trench to await the mortar rounds that usually followed the choppers into the LZ. After we were certain that the LZ was quiet, we raced back to the main trench line in our bent over positions, picking up the body bags on the way.

Once we were safely in the trench line, huffing and wheezing, I remembered a small plastic bottle of Crown Royal that I had been saving. Ever since I had joined 3/26 at Camp Evans, I had been trying to get my dad to send me a bottle of whiskey. My dad was a man who was not opposed to a good stiff drink, or two, or three. He was afraid that I would somehow get in trouble if I was found with a bottle of whiskey. When I convinced him that the worst that could happen was for me to get my head shaved and sent to Vietnam, he sent me a small plastic bottle that held about four shots of Crown Royal.

After I had retrieved the bottle from my Willy Peter bag we each had a shot that burned all the way down. I heard that the HST team was given the task of putting the Gunnies into the body bags that we had collected. I never envied them that task. The details about how the bodies finally made it off the Hill are best told by Captain Dabney:

"Worst conflict with regulations involved two KIAs. Round landed in hole not much left. Had no body bags, put remains in ponchos and staged in zone for next bird. Weather went sour, couldn't get birds in. By second day, troops were watching rats crawling around bodies. Hot up there in daytime with obvious consequences for condition of bodies. Sent radio message requesting permission to bury them 'till we could get them out. Reply, negative. Regulations prohibit field burial in RVN. But I had a serious morale and health problem. Sent second message explaining problems, again requested permission to bury. Again, denied. As I've said before, people who write regulations have never been anyplace like 881S regulations are written in air-conditioned offices. By third day, with weather still zero, I sent message down saying that unless otherwise directed, I intended to bury KIAs that evening. Kept copy of message so there would be a record for finding them later. Got no reply. Buried them that night. Couple of days later, weather lifted and first bird came up to get nets and slings. Had no medevacs, because weather so bad NVA couldn't see to shoot either. Couldn't justify risk of trying to land bird to pick up permanent routines. Disinterred them, put them in net and piled other nets/slings on top of them to hide bodies. Had to do that because regulations also said you could not transport remains externally. Bird one of yours picked up load. We called as he lifted off and told him he had bodies slung underneath. He rogered, and said nothing more.

Apparently he said nothing when he delivered them at Dong Ha, either, because we never heard any more about it. I'd probably have been relieved over that one if he hadn't kept his mouth shut." (Other recollections from Captain Dabney can be found on the Warriors of Hill 881S website

I can't remember the names of the three men who shared this experience with me. They are long forgotten. I would however, like to hear from them if they happen to run across this little piece. My e-mail address is rsmythe@mindspring.com.

RESPONSES TO ARTICLES PUBLISHED IN ISSUE 65

Tom,

In the last issue of Red Clay (65) there was a great article from Joe Belardo. I have great respect for Those army ''duster'' guys, loved having them around. They gave me a safe, warm, fuzzy feeling. The part of the article that talks about Simon stealing George Lewis' beanie weenies is great. I and others can really relate to wanting to kill anyone that would steal your food. One would rather mess with an angry Pit Bull, then fool with a grunts chow. Eating became a ritual with us. It was the only time you had to yourself. The preparation was like a priest prepping for a High Mass for the Pope., The enjoyment was better than sex, I think.

Subconsciously you knew it could be your last meal. It also was a marker that your short-timer calendar was one day shorter. We had so little to treasure. Food became the most important thing in the world. You would savor each delicious morsel. Now You probably would not eat the same food even if it was going to make you $10,000 to eat it on a reality TV show. My personal experience was having some stupid FNG filch a couple of cookies I had gotten from the states in a care package, big mistake on his part , it took three guys to pull me off him.

What is really amazing is how what we did then for such a short time has changed our entire lives, and our eating habits, at least mine. I know I have never gone back to what I once was. Go to a restaurant and there are no seats available where you can put your back against the wall, and face the door. What do you do? I have a solution., Go to a different restaurant.

Before Vietnam, I ate three normal meals a day, at a normal speed. Now I eat each one very slowly. My brother on the other hand, wolf"s down his food as fast as he can, starting with the favorite part first. He was a "60" gunner grunt and got interrupted to damn often in the bush. I guess he thinks Charlie is going to ambush him in McDonald's. Carry On.

Rats in the Bush

There are different kinds of rats in the bush.
There are four legged rats, two legged rats,
and rats in a box.

All of these rats can be found in the bush.
Some of the rats you learn to live with,
some you don't.
Some you learn to kill, some you don't.

One of the good kind of rats crawled into tunnels, the other good rats came in a small brown box.
The boxes are all the same shape and size.
What came inside the box could be bad, or good as gold.

It didn't matter that it could be over forty years old.
You can mess with all the rats but one in the bush.
You never, never mess with another mans C-RATS, or you may not leave the bush.

Oh yea you can do something else with the four legged kind in pinch.

Tom,

The article in the last issue of Red Clay (Issue 65) where the troops had returned to Khe Sanh to hold a memorial service, brought back a few vivid memories. I was one of seven Seabees who were already there pulling up the airstrip.

We went in with our tools and two Marines. The next morning a bunch of helicopters arrived with a band, flags and a lot of high ranking Officers. They played the U.S. and Vietnamese National Anthems and raised several flags. They then left as quickly as they had come taking all their equipment with them. There was a film crew taking pictures of the event. I know they took pictures of a load of runway matting being carried away. We left later the same day and the strip was still there

The Battle of Long Tan
Fellow Australian and New Zealand Vietnam Veterans Finally Receive Recognition
108 ANZACS vs 2500 VIET CONG

By Paul LePetit
July 16, 2006

It is one of the most remarkable battles in the history of war, yet one of the most unknown and unacknowledged. On August 18, 1966, 108 young Australian and New Zealand soldiers, most of them doing national service, found themselves isolated and facing 2500 trained and dedicated North Vietnamese and Viet Cong soldiers. In an extraordinary 3-1/2 hours during a monsoon, in the mud and desolation of a rubber plantation, the Anzac troops lost 18 Australian soldiers and had 24 wounded. The enemy lost 800 men, with 1,000 wounded.

"This is an opportunity to correct history," said Martin Walsh, executive producer of The Battle of Long Tan, a documentary that will be aired close to the anniversary of the forgotten conflict. Directed by award-winning documentary maker Damien Lay, The Battle Of Long Tan will focus not on the politics of the war (at that time there were no protests going on in Australia), but on the individuals and the parts they played in the heroic encounter.

The documentary includes interviews with not only the men of the Long Tan contingent, but their enemy as well. "One of things we are trying to focus on is why the men from each side were there," Walsh said. "We want to change the perception of the Vietnam veterans," a perception that has been shaped to a great degree by Hollywood and by politics. "If you meet these soldiers, they are the most well adjusted people you could find," he said. Walsh said that the film had not been made without encountering difficulties. There are still agendas where people want to steer history down certain paths. "Australians actually won their part of the Vietnam War."

Filmed in Australia, New Zealand and Vietnam, the documentary begins with an action sequence recreating the battle itself. It was fought by accident. At the major base Nui Dat, performers Col Joye and Little Pattie had begun a concert, the first special act for Australian forces. But the day before enemy mortars had pounded Nui Dat killing one soldier and injuring 22. The Long Tan men were one of several groups sent to patrol the environs to ensure that enemy mortars would not land on the concert area. By the time they reached the edge of what would be their battle zone they could still hear the concert in the back ground. Little Pattie, then 17 and Col Joye were evacuated soon after fighting began.

The chaos of the battle was intense. In the rain and with lighting hitting the barrels of the guns, the Australian force was down to 100 rounds of ammunition at one point and would have certainly lost if the helicopter supply ships had not disobeyed orders and returned under fire to replenish the batteries.

The documentary talks to the participants and explores their feelings. "It is so rare to get first hand accounts of war like this," Walsh said. "It is very moving. Almost all the men we talked to had not told their story, even to their families." The filmmakers also had great support from the Australian and New Zealand defense forces.

The New Zealand Army provided a gun battery of the identical type used at Long Tan and men to work it. "They spent the day firing the original artillery, while a fire brigade hosed them down to emulate the conditions at the time," Walsh said. The day after the battle the commander of the American forces, General William Westmoreland, flew in to look at the scene No one believed that this could have happened. "In all military history the world over, this is one of the most remarkable achievements," Walsh said.

And sadly for the men involved, there has never been proper recognition of their heroism. Lay is working up to 22 hours a day to complete the project. He includes the seven commanders, both allies and enemy in the film.

A Reunion Story

By Craig W. Tourte

This was my third reunion and I think I enjoyed it the most. I had a great time at the first two I attended, but they were pretty emotional for me. The first reunion was followed by a DUI, depression and some other issues relating to PTSD that I had to deal with. I skipped a year before I attended my second reunion. This one was much better. I felt stronger and was not as overcome with emotion. I think I may be getting a handle on this PTSD thing after all. This was the first reunion a friend from Khe Sanh attended, and he reminded me so much of myself when I attended my first one. I hope he does not have to go through what I did, and he returns next year when the reunion will be held in D.C..

My wife came this year, a big step. I was not sure if it was the brightest idea I ever had, but things worked out. I don't think wives (or others) can really ever understand this Khe Sanh thing, but it was my effort to help her understand why on occasion, I'm so screwed up. I can't begin to describe the event. One really needs to experience it for themselves. I think she came away with a slightly better understanding of what was involved in this reunion, other than just a bunch of middle ages men sitting around talking about past adventures and shared experiences.

I'm getting to know a few more at each reunion I attend. Sometimes it's not too easy. I sometimes feel like an outsider, but I hang in there and meet as many people as I can knowing that next year I'll know just a few more and meet others I had not known. I was sorry that my friend, Chuck Chamberlin (C/1/26) was unable to make it this year. I missed his company.

Delta had another big gathering this year. They're a great group of tight, brothers. I have always admired the bond they have for each other. I have never fixed bayonets, charged the tree line, or humped into the hills. I was on the Khe Sanh Combat Base for 8 months. I was not a hero. I showed up and did my job, survived the Siege and that's about it Please don't thank me for my support. During the Saturday evening banquet at the reunion, I was impressed at the many tables that Delta had reserved. Middle aged men, they no longer look like the warriors they once were. But I could sense a certain spirit and could still see the fire in their eyes. It might have just been the anticipation of the buffet that was about to be served, but perhaps not.

My wife and I found a table with a couple of vacant seats and sat down with some others. I was happy to be with them. We all introduced ourselves and I knew once again that I was among brothers. I went to boot camp in San Diego (platoon 1145, 1966) with Mike Powers from Delta. Through these reunions I have gotten to know Mike once again and I am proud to be able to call him my friend. Mike came over to our table and asked if we would like to sit with Delta. I was stunned and appreciated Mike's invitation, but didn't want to intrude. I thanked Mike and told him how much I appreciated his invitation, but that I didn't want to interfere. Mike told me that John Rowland, Delta's president asked him to come over and invite us to sit with him and his wife at Delta's table. The invitation was more than I could take. I can't began to tell you how proud I was to have been invited to sit with the men from Delta Company. We found a couple of vacant seats next to John and our wives talked and got along together just fine. I introduced myself to the others at the table and they were all very gracious to both of us. It was pretty cool being able to sit with these fine men who I have admired and observed from the outside. I appreciated being able to sit down with them and being treated like a brother and friend. Thanks Mike Powers and John Rowland and the other Delta brothers for making this reunion a memorable one. You truly are a great bunch of men whom I am proud to know.

Ed Note: We're thinking of giving Craig his own magazine

BROWN DOG

By Don Bumgarner

Here is a Vietnam story I received from a guy who was in C/1/3 during 1966. I don't know the writer of the story, or if he was in C/1/3. I know 1/3 was in the area of the story. The writer, Charles P. Dugan wrote it. I thought it was good and wanted to share.

If you know Dugan or what unit he was with, let me know.

The year was 1966 and I was a newly assigned machine gunner in an infantry unit that was protecting a high mountain pass that was between Da Nang and Phu Bai, Vietnam. The pass is called Hai Van Pass, which means Place of the Clouds. It is located 30 km north of Da Nang. The Marine Corps name of the hill that my unit was on was Hill 724. It was a dangerous and treacherous area that was of high strategic value. There was only one narrow highway that wound up steep cliffs (Highway 1) that reached the peak at Hai Van. At the base of the hill was a small village called Namo. My story starts in that village.

On a patrol through the village my squad noticed a small wooden cage outside of a hooch. We were new to Vietnam and unaware of the customs of the people. We were always alert for booby traps and we moved closer to the cage. Inside the cage was a small, brown puppy that brightened up when he saw us approach his cage. He began wagging his tail and wanting to be held. It was love at first sight for all of us. Don't tell anybody, but most Marines are real softies when it comes to animals. The owner of the hooch came out and I decided to offer to buy his puppy. I just didn't like his living conditions. The old villager started his trying to up the price and after much debate, he decided on a price. He then pulled out a sharp knife and proceeded to open the cage.

All of us were shocked that he pulled a knife out and we all raised our weapons to him. He looked very frightened and assured us that he meant us no harm. He explained in gestures that he was just going to prepare the dog for us. We were confused and then he made the motion of drawing his knife across his neck to tell us that he was going to kill the dog and dress it out for us to Chop-Chop. I can only tell you that the anger level went up 100 notches at that suggestion. We then realized that the dog was being raised to eat by the villager. I unbuttoned my flak jacket and reached in and took the dog from his hands. I threw the money on the ground and placed the pup next to my heart so I could carry him up the long torturous climb back to our base camp.

The first event that happened was all of us knew that it was going to be a challenge to get our superiors to allow us to keep him. It was a miserable walk back to our hill. Our fears were baseless because we had a wonderful Captain named Silva, and he allowed us to keep the puppy as a mascot. We loved him before, but we really loved the Captain after that. Next we had a heated debate on what the dogs name should be. It was not an easy process since Marines are very bull-headed and strong willed. After much serious and highly intelligent discussion we arrived at the unique name of Brown Dog. You have to know Marines to appreciate this.

Brown Dog was the darling of the hill and only one Marine hated him and that was OK because we all hated him too. We all decided that if Brown Dog didn't like him that there had to be a damn good reason. Later he proved to be a coward in combat and was removed from our hill. Brown Dog was very happy that he left. I lost a stripe because I caught this guy kicking at Brown Dog and I informed him not to do that again. I guess I did the informing a little too harsh, and the 1st. Sgt. explained the error of my ways.

Brown Dog had a ritual during his life on the hill. At night we were in bunkers staring out into a dark, fog filled jungle. We were issued Seismic Listening Devices which consisted of probes planted in the ground in front of our bunkers. We had a small console inside that had earphones. We could hear footsteps approaching, or animals moving. We got pretty good with the device. Brown Dog would make the perimeter of our positions and visit every bunker to check on "His" Marines. He was always a welcome visitor and he spent all of his non patrolling time in his daddy's bunker, MINE! He also went on patrols with us and had an intense hatred for the Vietnamese. He would growl and really act up when he would see or smell one.

On April 1, 1967, we were dug in and the fog was pea soup thick that night. I was in the machine gun bunker and we were really spooked. About 3 am Brown Dog shot up and went on full alert. I rang the field phone and informed the Command bunker that Brown Dog had alerted. Our Lieutenant advised me to trust my Seismic Device and not a damn dog.

My bunker was the forward bunker and the most vulnerable. I looked at my machine gun crew and whispered that I was going to disobey the Lt's stupid order. They all nodded as I prepared the pop-up flare to shoot into the sky. I popped the flare and lo and behold we had beaucoup Gooks in the wire! All hell broke loose and it was a very violent battle that night. It was up close and personal fighting and many people on both sides were killed and wounded. Brown Dog was hit by shrapnel but continued to fight the enemy. I saw him attack the leg of an NVA before he was wounded.

The attack failed and for what seemed like an eternity, we waited for the sun to come up. There were dead people in the wire, burning, and moaning out in pain in the darkness. I held Brown Dog in my arms and awaited the medevac helicopters that were coming to help our wounded. I really thought Brown Dog was going to die in my arms.

When the choppers came I handed my baby to the door gunner and asked him to get him medical help and told him that we would all be dead if it wasn't for Brown Dog. Marine to Marine, he gave me his word and I watched the dust-off. My Captain pulled me aside and told me that he was glad that I never followed orders. He rubbed my head and told me that he was going to call to Headquarters and tell them the story and he assured me that Brown Dog was going to get the best of care.

Brown Dog had lost a lot of blood so I really didn't have much hope. The next day we received word that Brown Dog had been taken to Army Vets and they had saved his life. He had over 100 stitches, needed blood and antibiotics but he was going to live. He was the hero to all of us. He received a canine award for heroism and we promoted him to Cpl. I also got my stripe back much to the chagrin of the Lieutenant.

Cpl. Brown Dog returned to a hero's welcome as we had a full formation to welcome him home. I left the hill June 9th, 1967. He was in very good hands with the Marines on the hill. I tried to take him home but that was impossible. I really hurt having to leave him on the hill, but I knew the Marines would take excellent care of him.

I have always thought it was so ironic that once he was going to be eaten by the Vietnamese, and instead he caused the death of so damn many of them.

All of my friends still have his picture and we all know that we would not be here today if it were not for a little, mixed breed named Brown Dog. He will be in our hearts until we die and a part of our souls forever.

When we assemble for our reunions, we always toast Brown Dog. Rest in peace little Warrior and wait for Your Marines to join you. We will always be Semper Fidelis to you and your memory. A Salute and three cheers for the finest Marine on our hill!

Ooo-Rah Brown Dog!

CATHERINE LEROY 1944-2006

SHE WILL BE MISSED

I can't believe it. I sat with her at her apartment last summer, sipping tea as we thumbed through her new book, UNDER FIRE: IMAGES FROM VIETNAM, and talked about how she wanted to do a documentary on the Paparazzi in Los Angeles. We went and saw the latest version of The Quiet American a few years ago. It was pretty amazing as she recounted what she had seen and done so long ago. Side trips to Cambodia with a "Dashing young French Embassy staffer." She told me about getting snatched in Hue during TET, only to be let go after she protested to a young NVA officer in her sometimes to often vulgar language. Just amazing stuff this woman told me about, like getting wounded, a plate in her head, Khe Sanh, Beirut. This woman was a walking history book. I wish I had written down everything she told me.

I had no idea she was sick. I feel privileged to have known her. Here's an Interesting quote from a former colleague of hers, Jonathan Randal of the Washington Post: "She spoke the most disgusting English. I asked her where she learned it from and she said 'the Marines'."

Rest in Peace Catherine. I'm sure the Marine's are looking after you.

REST IN PEACE

Catherine Leroy, the French-born photojournalist whose stark images of battle helped tell the story of the Vietnam War in the pages of Life magazine and other publications, died Saturday of cancer, a physician at St. John's Health Center said. She was 61.

Leroy was 21 years old in 1966 when she took a one-way ticket to Saigon to document American troops in Vietnam. A year later she became the only accredited journalist to participate in a combat parachute jump, joining the 173rd Airborne in Operation Junction City. In 1968 during the Tet Offensive, Leroy was captured by the North Vietnamese Army. She managed to talk her way out and emerged with images of the North Vietnamese Army in action that were used for a Life magazine cover.

A famous 1967 photo, "Corpsman In Anguish," portrays a young Marine, his face wrenched in torment, hunched over the dead body of his friend, while smoke from the battle rises into the air behind them. Leroy worked for the Gamma and Sipa photo agencies and later sold her work to The Associated Press and United Press International. Her photos appeared in publications worldwide.

In 1972, Leroy shot and directed Operation Last Patrol, a film about Ron Kovic and the anti-war Vietnam veterans. After Vietnam, she covered conflicts in several countries including Somalia, Afghanistan, Iraq, Iran and Libya. Leroy co-authored the book GOD CRIED with Tony Clifton, about the siege of West Beirut by the Israeli army in 1982.

She Will Be Missed .

We met in Khe Sanh. I took her picture near the recon area and air strip. We talked for about an hour. 35 years later I meet her at a BBQ at David Kniess' house. We talked about Khe Sanh, and Con Thien. I was never at Con Thien with 3/26, but the stories she told were something. She had guts, I'll miss her.

Marine Holds a Wounded Comrade at DMZ Operation Prairie 1967

Catherine Leroy was born in Paris in 1944. She was twenty-one when she left for Vietnam, in 1966. Two years after arriving there, she was captured by the North Vietnamese Army during the Tet offensive in Hue. Her intrepid reporting made her one of the war's most published photographers. In 1967, she became the only journalist to partake in a combat jump. She photographed the Marines during the bitter hill fights and was wounded in action. She has won many awards, including the George Polk, the sigma Delta Chi, and the Art Directors Club of New York. For her coverage of the 1976 Civil War in Lebanon, she received the Robert Capa Award, the first women to do so. In 1983 with Tony Clifton, she published GOD CRIED. In 1997 she was honored by the University of Missouri for distinguished service in journalism.

ANOTHER ARTICLE ON A FOLLOW UP STORY CATHERINE DID ON TWO OF HER MOST PUBLISHED PHOTOS FROM THE VIETNAM WAR

Legendary Photographer Catherine Leroy went searching for the men captured in two of the Vietnam War's most famous images. She found how history, and pictures, change even heroes.

BY JEFFREY ELBIES
September/October 2005

Though the Vietnam War ended 30 years ago, its distant thunder continues to echo. It was perhaps the most intimately photographed war in history, and in those still images the fighting has never ceased. The most powerful of the pictures are the ones that captured the apperceived truth of the morally contentious conflict. In these sustaining images, it is the suffering of the combatants alone that speaks with authority. To mark the anniversary of the fall of Saigon, Paris Match magazine decided to track down the subjects of two such photographs. One was a shot of a wounded black Marine reaching out for an injured comrade, made on October 5, 1966, by Life magazine photojournalist Larry Burrows, who would himself be killed in a helicopter crash near the Cambodian border in 1971. The other image showed a bewildered Marine kneeling over the body of a fallen comrade, taken in April 1967 by legendary photographer Catherine Leroy. To photograph the two men, the magazine assigned Leroy herself, now living in Los Angeles.

Over the years, Leroy had kept in touch with the Marine she photographed that day in the bloody battle for Hill 881 near the border between South and North Vietnam. His name was Vernon Wike, and he lived by himself in a small home in Prescott, Arizona. When she and Paris Match correspondent Regis Le Sommier met Wike in 2005, it was clear that the man Leroy had photographed so long ago had come back from the war with a burden he could never rid himself of. Married four times, with two daughters he no longer speaks to, he had been living meagerly on a $325-a-month pension. The 58-year-old told Leroy that he felt more like 80. "While not physically hurt, he suffers from extreme Post Traumatic Stress Syndrome, waking from nightmares every night," wrote Le Sommier. "On his arms, he has tattoos of the names of his dead comrades. He's lost in a jungle of his own mind."

For Wike, the haunting memories and the pictures that Leroy shot of him during the war had become intertwined in a psychological spiral. The "Hill Fights" of spring 1967 were toe-to-toe slugging matches between Marines and North Vietnamese troops near the Marine outpost at Khe Sahn. Leroy, a freelance photographer who would later be seriously wounded while covering the war, arrived at the battle in the late afternoon that day on a re-supply helicopter, wearing combat fatigues and a white handkerchief over her hair. She quickly learned how intense the fighting there was. "I was standing next to a colonel, and suddenly I heard a zzzzzzzz-ing sound near my ear," recalls Leroy. The colonel said, "You better take off that white handkerchief, because someone just shot at you.

She began following a Marine company on an assault through the bombed-out terrain. "It was hard to walk, because the earth was loosened and giving way, and the noise of the battle was deafening," Leroy says. Pinned down by gunfire, she saw a wounded Marine four meters ahead of her. "I heard someone yelling, "Corpsman, corpsman!" And I saw this other Marine rushing to the wounded man, and he put his ear on the man's heart. Then he looked up in total anguish." The man in anguish was Wike. Recounting his story of that day to Le Sommier, he said, "I heard a bang, and I lifted my head out of the trench and saw my friend Rock -- it all happened like in some dream -- his body started falling and I threw myself at it. The only noise I heard was his heartbeat disappearing little by little. The bullet was in his chest." As Leroy recalls the incident, Wike, who had been among the lead assault, then picked up the dead soldier's rifle and disappeared among a second wave of Marines. "He was yelling, 'I'll kill them all!" she says.

Wike returned home from Vietnam without any physical injury but troubled. In 2003 he accidentally shot himself with a gun he had placed in his pants pocket. In 2004 the house he was living in burned to the ground. Leroy photographed Wike in the cluttered bedroom of the small apartment he moved to after the fire, shooting with a Mamiya 7 and a single strobe. As she worked, Wike told her that her images of him as a young man had marked him forever; after 30 years, he said, it was still those pictures that woke him from his sleep at night.

Two days after the portrait session, Wike suffered a stroke that paralyzed his body and cost him his sight. He later moved to the home of a sister in the Mid-west. "Vernon," says Leroy, "is haunted." Leroy found the black Marine in the Burrows picture with the help of Burrows's son, Russell. Jeremiah Purdie was living in Fayetteville, North Carolina, a framed print of the famous image hanging in his home. A tiny shell fragment was stuck in a corner of the frame -- a fragment that entered Purdie's skull that day in 1966, when, during the battle for Mutter Ridge, Burrows photographed him. That battle was part of a six-month action called Operation Prairie whose aim was to cut off North Vietnamese infiltration through the Demilitarized Zone into the South. It turned into a costly affair, pushing U.S. casualties for the week to their highest of the war.

When Burrows cabled New York with instructions on handling his damp film, he found himself apologizing: "Sorry if my captioning is not up to standard, but with all that sniper fire around I didn't dare wave a white notebook." While covering the fighting for Hill 484, Burrows took a series of photos of a wounded black Marine being evacuated. In the most famous image from the series, the wounded Marine, Purdie, reaches out to a mud-covered comrade. After he came back from Vietnam, Purdie tried to bury his memories of the war. But he, too, had nightmares. His wife, Angel, told Le Sommier that her husband often woke up screaming. It was only three years ago that Purdie, after counseling from a PTSD specialist, began to talk about his experiences during the war. He said the counselor had liberated his fears, finally convincing him that he hadn't abandoned his comrades when he was flown out of the battle.

Purdie had joined the Marines during the Korean War because, he said, it was the only service that would "take a black man." After Vietnam, he worked as a Marine Corps recruiter, talking to young men, most of them black, in parking lots and supermarkets. For his efforts in the battle for Hill 484 he received the Bronze Star. His wife told the Paris Match reporter that Burrows's photo had helped Purdie deal with his memories of Vietnam -- allowing him, in a sense, to remain connected to his fellow Marines who never came home. "When I photographed him, I could tell he was tired, so I had him just sit on his bed," says Leroy. A month after the portrait was made, Purdie died. "I consider myself lucky to have met him, and photographed him," says Leroy.

SHORT ROUNDS

A GIFT TO THE KHE SANH VETERANS

By John Pessoni A Co 3RD Engineers

1st Platoon, A Company, 3rd Engineer Battalion (Combat), 3rd Marine Division played a significant role in the support and security of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, with a small force of about 20 dedicated Marines. Although our ranks were slim, we provided support for the entire base. Normally a Reinforced Combat Engineer Company with much more resources would have been assigned this type of mission.

One of the missions we successfully completed was the demolition of rock from what was a mountain, and later referred to as the Rock Quarry. This rock the Seabees used to improve the air strip and roadways. This effort kept the air strip open even though greatly shortened. We fortified the meager perimeter fence by installing hundreds of meters of high double apron fencing, extra-wide bolt of tangle foot fence, and triple concertina barbed wire.

The fence lines included by hundreds of booby-traps and mines. We sent teams on combat operations with 1/26, performed mine sweeps and civilian action projects in the village. We operated the Water point located outside the perimeter. It was not controlled by Marines at all times. Following the explosion of the Ammo Dump, we cleared live shells blown onto the runway, and sent teams throughout the base to find more live rounds. We built numerous bunkers after the Siege began since most of the troops lived in above ground, or inadequately protected hootchs.

Although we suffered killed and wounded, we were determined to keep going. We are proud of what we did in support of all the Khe Sanh Veterans. In recognition of these accomplishments we wish to dedicate our unit guide on to the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, on behalf of John Pessoni, David Critchley, Duke Upton, Wally Hoffman, and Clyde Phillips.

MAD DOG MEDEVAC

By Aaron Carter HMM-163, MAG -16, FMAW

At 1800 hours, on 26 January 1967, Sgt. J. Vradenburg and I were securing our UH-34D helicopter at Khe Sanh. We had just finished adding a gallon of engine oil to the tank when our aircraft commander Capt. Gunniss and Co-Pilot 1st Lt. Hein jogged around the tail of the bird toward us. Captain Gunniss informed us that we were launching on an emergency extraction to extract a recon team (Mad Dog) located at position XD 673527 (300° radial on Channel 58 at eleven miles).

Our flight departed the base at 1805 hours. The flight consisted of our ship, Superchief 1-9 Superchief 1-10 our wingman, and two UH-IE gunships Deadlock 4-0 and 4-2. En route, Captain Gunniss advised that the LZ was hot and warned us to conserve ammunition. During the first few minutes of the flight, our information was updated. Mad Dog advised that one of the team was wounded and that they believed they were surrounded by enemy troops.

By 1815 we were approaching the zone from the south at about 1,000 feet above ground level (AGL). The LZ was something of a pinnacle, in hilly terrain, elevated about 600' above the surrounding area. Radio contact was established with the team after some initial communication difficulties. There was a lot going on. In addition to our flight, two CH46 helicopters were orbiting the area, on a mission to insert troops. With so many helicopters in the air, and so much happening on the ground, radio traffic was snarled. That ended when Captain Gunniss declared: "medevac priority."

As we initiated a reconnaissance pass over the LZ, we took fire from at least three automatic weapons, positioned about ten feet apart, on a hill approximately 800 meters west of our position. I began to return fire on all three guns while advising our pilots that we were taking hits to the port side. During the exchange, I expended about 100 rounds and eliminated at least two of the three targets. A hasty inspection of the aircraft revealed about eight hits to the helicopter fuselage without critical damage.

Concerned about the enemy location and strength, Captain Gunniss continued flying on a northerly heading as he considered the best approach corridor into the LZ. As we over flew the LZ, Mad Dog leader came up on frequency and said: "You're not going to leave us? You're going to come and get us, aren't you partner?" Lieutenant Hein called back: "We'll get you out." Mad Dog called again and said: "We have another man down."

Deadlock Leader advised the team to pop two smokes; yellow for the team position and red for the nearest enemy position. Shortly thereafter two plumes of smoke could be seen with the red about thirty meters west of the yellow. Deadlock launched attacks on known and perceived enemy positions while we staged for a northerly approach. Deadlock received no enemy fire during its strike.

We began our second approach from the north, flying at a height of 400' AGL. As we approached the LZ, we began taking fire from several enemy positions beneath us along our approach corridor and from the north and east. Sgt. Vradenburg and I returned fire on as many targets as possible while sustaining about twenty more hits to the aircraft. Captain Gunniss aborted the second approach, maintaining a northerly heading. As we over flew the zone, Mad Dog came up on the radio and said: "Don't leave us." Lieutenant Rein called: "Roger, we'll get you."

Another quick check of the aircraft revealed no evidence of critical damage. As far as airworthiness was concerned we were good to go for another approach to the LZ. Sgt. Vradenburg and I reorganized our ammunition supply. The look in his eye gave me the impression that he felt like I did. I believed that Captain Gunniss would get us into the zone by whatever means necessary. But, I was not so confident that we would be able to get out once we had touched down. Another concern was the fact that the zone was not big enough for more than one helicopter. If we could not depart the zone, the team would have to relocate to another LZ. With two wounded, that might not be feasible.

Experience had taught us that a helicopter moving low and fast is a hard target for VC shooters. Most of the hits we took in flight were near the tail section. The VC it seemed, knew nothing about duck hunting, but the VC never had trouble hitting us on the ground. Our first passes over the zone had given us a chance to see some of the soldiers shooting at us. Some were wearing black pajamas and some were wearing NVA uniforms. Among helicopter air crews, the NVA had a reputation for remarkable marksmanship. For this reason, when we knew they were in the area, it was standard operating procedure to fly nap-of-the-earth at top speed (150 Knots). Even their mortar crews had trouble hitting us when we were low and fast. But that kind of flying demanded much of the pilot. I can't recall how many times I had to peel a tree branch from a wheel strut. Some pilots delighted in their skill and liked to bump the hilltops with the landing wheels as we over-flew them. It made for a thrilling ride, but it was not without risk.

By now Captain Gunniss had a plan. From his viewpoint in the cockpit, he could see that the LZ was choked with elephant grass. His plan was to come in low and hot, terminate the approach with an extreme flare, then touch down on the spot with minimal ground speed. While in the zone the elephant grass would provide enough concealment to give the recon team time to board the aircraft. If the team moved quickly; with the cargo door facing the team, we could be in and out in less than fifteen seconds.

Fifteen seconds is an important time standard for combat aircrews. The standard denotes the life expectancy for a crew engaged in a scenario such as the one we were facing. The standard was carefully explained to flight crews trained at NATTC, Memphis and to pilots trained at Pensacola. Proceeding with full appreciation for our situation, Captain Gunniss began the approach from the north at 85 knots and 50' AGL. All was quiet until he flared to bleed off air speed. About ten meters from the LZ, the enemy opened up with a heavy volume of fire. We immediately began taking many hits and Sgt. Vradenburg and I returned fire as best we could.

Captain Gunniss reacted to the heavy volume of fire by executing an 1800 pedal turn and touched down tail first on the spot. The turn oriented me westward. I came face-to-face with the heaviest concentration of incoming fire. My first impression,;and vivid memory, of this moment would always be its likeness to an Independence Day fireworks finale. From our 7 O'clock through our 9 O'clock, the volume of incoming fire was immeasurable. While my body was busy returning fire on innumerable targets, my mind had time to reflect on the reality of our situation. I felt certain that our helicopter would be disabled within the next few seconds. I began to conserve ammo by firing in two-to-three round bursts.

There were so many targets, prioritizing was difficult. The concentration of enemy fire seemed to increase with every tick of the clock. I glanced toward Sgt. Vradenburg to see if he was okay and saw that he was very busy on his gun. The elephant grass was about eight feet high and very dense, but the main rotor downwash caused the grass below it to bend away from the aircraft. This allowed a clearer view of incoming tracers. Most of the incoming rounds seemed to be coming from light shoulder weapons. Others were obviously 51 calibers. My mess tray hung slightly aft of the port gunnery hatch. One round hit a corner of the tray. A 30 cal grazed the left side of my flight helmet. Another tore through the upper tight shoulder seam of my flak jacket. One 30 cal round severed the fuel pressure indicator line as it passed through the flight deck consol. A 51 cal passed in front of my face and continued upward between the feet of Captain Gunniss, before exiting the aircraft through the nose section. It was clear from the trajectory of the 51 cal round that the gun was positioned close at hand. I put about fifty rounds in that area.

Most people would say that ten seconds is a short period of time. I believe there are many combat veterans who have experienced ten-second periods that seemed like an hour of pure hell! Lieutenant Hein, looking down and to his left could see the Recon team hopelessly pinned down and advised Captain Gunniss. Because of the inability of the team to move to the aircraft, and seeing the intensity of incoming fire increasing with time, Captain Gunniss elected to depart the zone.

Seconds before liftoff, I experienced stoppage on my M-60. I haven't the vocabulary to express how unhappy I was about this development. I raised the feed cover to clear the feed mechanism and fired again. But all I got was a single round. I reset the ammo belt and fired. Once again I got stoppage after a single round! As I worked to reset my belt again we lifted off and I observed six men; face down on the ground just ten feet from our former position, all wearing black clothing. Since much of the incoming fire had been at close range, I fully believed the men to be VC.

Our briefing included nothing about how the team members were attired. As far as I knew, they were wearing the standard Recon uniform typical of what we saw at base camps. There is no doubt in my mind that had my gun been operational, six recon members would have lost their lives as we lifted off from that zone. As incredible as the timing of this stoppage may seem, this next point is even more so. Once clear of the zone my gun began to function normally and I resumed firing on enemy targets. After returning to the air base at Phu Bai, I had the weapon inspected by our armorer who gave it a clean bill of health. No defect was found. I used that same gun for the remainder of my first tour in Nam (about eight more months) and it never let me down. To me, this is something of a miracle.

During the sortie, I fired about eight hundred rounds. Sgt. Vradenburg fired an equivalent number. With smoke in the cabin, flight deck, and with hydraulic oil streaming into the cabin from the main transmission deck, we limped back to Khe Sanh to perform an emergency landing at 1835 hours. During the sortie our helicopter took enough hits to require 138 patches to the fuselage. Additional repairs included replacement of two main rotor blades, three tail rotor blades, the intermediate gear box, a hydraulic line, and a fuel pressure indicator line. Three helicopters (CH-46 Sea Knights) were lost in the LZ during the night-time hours that followed. According to the information I received after returning to Khe Sanh, Superchief 1-9 was the only helicopter to get in and out of the LZ that night. The team was recovered as part of a vertical envelopment operation that lasted another three days.

After-action reports were filed. Stars & Stripes got wind of the story and they made a big deal of it. They took photos, one of which I'm enclosing with this write-up. Captain Gunniss received the DFC and Sgt. Vradenburg and I each received a Navy Commendation Medal.. But to me, the real heroes of this story are the six members of that Recon team who demonstrated exceptional courage at great personal risk. I have never met them, nor have I communicated with them, but I would very much like to. I am often invited to share my Vietnam experiences with history classes and youth groups. This story is one that I often use as an example of the types of missions combat aircrew members participated in while serving in South Vietnam.

The story deserves a better ending than I am able to give it, with the facts I have at hand. Also, I would like to hear this story from the perspective of any or all of those six recon members. If you read this story and you were one of those six Marines, I want to hear from you. My contact information is on the membership roster.

A Visit to The Wall

By Larry McCartney, E Co 2/26
Hill 861A

Saturday, January 17, 2004 is a landmark day for me. It is the day I finally started to feel the healing from a lifetime of pain and bitterness that started in Vietnam. While I still have much of that pain, that intense bitterness, Saturday, January 17, 2004 is the day that with the love of God and the help of family I started to take some of the edge off and I can only hope that in the years ahead the constant throb continues to decrease as it has since that day.

To be sure, I am no different than millions of my brothers and sisters who experienced the horrors of war in Vietnam and the betrayal of our country upon our return. As a matter of fact I've been far luckier than many. I have some semblance of a normal, "successful" life; not the life I wanted, but a good life none the less. Those who have "walked the walk" and "talked the talk" know there is a rage that lurks below the surface, maybe well controlled, but a rage nonetheless.

My rage verged on going out of control for many years, but was held in check with the help of the love of my family, my father, mother, five brothers, five sisters, as well as various brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, nieces and nephews. While that rage destroyed relationships and deprived me of establishing a family of my own, I was extraordinarily fortunate because it never completely alienated my family: They always hung in there with me.

Saturday, January 17, 2004 is a landmark day because, quite by accident, that is the day that I took my family to The Wall with me. My family was in the Washington, D. C. area that day because my brother-in-law was ordained an Episcopal minister and after the ceremony three of my "baby sisters" asked me to take them and my niece to The Wall since they had never been there. I was momentarily hesitant because the only time I have ever been to The Wall was when I went with those with whom I served during Khe Sanh Veterans reunions, or holidays such as Memorial, or Veterans Day. I quickly discarded that hesitancy though, remembering all their love and support through the years. They deserved the trip.

As we were en-route to The Wall I learned that my other two sisters, as well as three of my brothers and their wives, were following us. It would be a "family reunion" of sorts, I steeled myself for the experience. I need not have.

By the time we all arrived, parked and started our tour it was early evening. Dark and with a light rain, the lights cast an eerie glow. I first took my family to the statue of the nurses, then to the three infantrymen before I could muster up the courage to walk the length of The Wall. I first stopped at Panel 37 East, Bogard, Lamitie, Molettiere, Rimson, Smith, Staples, Stevenson, and Taylor, and told them of the morning of February 5, 1968: and how incredibly lucky I was that day.My job was to hold the rear flank and wait for a call that never came because we only needed a few good men. As we continued to walk, I mentioned other names: Calvin, Gomez, "Corky" Foster, C. C. Aguirre, Borrell, Lt Distefano, Jefferies, Nelson, Wright, Harris, Doc Langenfeld, Doc Delaplane, Doc Lopez, and how my luck continued to hold. They had died during the incoming that was intended, but failed to break our will and I never got more than a few minor scratches.

During our walk I purposely walked directly to Panel 59 West I told them about June 6, 1968. Baker, Campbell, Flyte, Hale, Hayes, Lobbezoo, Piccano, Prock, Schauble, Seawright, Pete "Little Shep" Shepherd, Lonnie "Big Shep" Sheppard, and Sullivan and again how incredibly lucky I was. Like Alan Ray Smith who was KIA on February 5, I had arrived in country with Denny Lobbezoo. But for the luck of the draw, platoon and squad assignment, they were on The Wall, but not me.

Slowly I walked back to Panel 43 West and while looking directly at it I quietly told my family that the closest I ever came to being memorialized on that piece of granite was right there. September 16, 1968 with Cunningham, Gary Daffin, Donohue, "Bull" Durham, Hunter, Rivers, Joe Roble, and Cliff Spiller who died two weeks later. I didn't go into any detail about the events of LZ Margo; just a few miles east of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, just that I was incredibly lucky to be one of the one hundred forty six wounded and not one of the twenty two killed that day. I did tell them that this was the day that permanently shaped me. And why I returned for a second tour in Vietnam, stayed in the Reserves, volunteered for the Persian Gulf War, Haiti, Bosnia and other assignments I had. This was why I was so full of hurt and anger. This was why I was constantly "pushing the envelope" throughout the years, and why I was trying to write of my experiences. As I spoke, two of my "baby sisters" held onto me while I finally was able to cry.

The tears aren't all cried yet., The anger and bitterness isn't gone. The writing isn't done. But with the grace of God a step forward as been taken. Only time will tell.

THE UNEXPLOITED VULNERABILITY OF THE MARINES AT KHE SANH

©2000 By Peter Brush

Like Ia Drang before it, both the North Vietnamese and the Americans declared victory at the battle of Khe Sanh in 1968. These dual claims of victory are not inappropriate in a tactical situation where the adversaries have different goals. At Khe Sanh, US commander General William C. Westmoreland was certain the Communists' primary goal was another Dien Bien Phu; namely, to isolate and capture the Marine combat base. The Communists, on the other hand, claimed that Khe Sanh was merely a diversion to draw US forces away from the populated areas of South Vietnam in order to maximize the effects of the Communists' efforts during the great Tet Offensive of 1968.

But the Communists were not completely rigid in their tactical thinking. Their diversionary claims notwithstanding, they would have captured the base at Khe Sanh had they been able. The North Vietnamese, however, were unable to seize the base due to superior American firepower. They could have forced the Americans out of Khe Sanh, but they never realized the means by which this could have been done.

Both sides had compelling military reasons for their interest in the region around Khe Sanh. The geography of Indochina made Khe Sanh militarily significant. General Westmoreland felt the critical importance of Khe Sanh was clearly apparent. It would serve as a patrol base for the interdiction of enemy personnel and supplies coming down the Ho Chi Minh Trail from Laos into northern South Vietnam, a base for covert operations to harass the Communists along the Trail, the location of an airstrip for aerial reconnaissance of the Trail, the western anchor for the defensive line along the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) separating North and South Vietnam, and a jumping-off point for a land invasion of Laos to cut the Ho Chi Minh Trail. According to Westmoreland, abandoning the US military presence at Khe Sanh would allow the People's Army of Vietnam (PAVN, the North Vietnamese Army or NVA) the ability to carry the fight into the populated coastal regions of Northern South Vietnam. For the Communists the region around Khe Sanh was the avenue for their entry into northern South Vietnam. From a strategic standpoint, it would clearly be in the best interests of the PAVN to end the American presence at Khe Sanh.

Khe Sanh was located on Route 9 which ran from near the South China Sea at Dong Ha westerly to Savannaket, a market town in Laos along the Mekong River. This old French highway ran just south of and mostly parallel to the Demilitarized Zone. In August, 1967, Communist forces destroyed many of the bridges on Route 9, blocked the passes, and mined the highway. Khe Sanh was effectively isolated from overland resupply and would remain so for the next nine months. The Marine garrison at the Khe Sanh Combat Base could only be provisioned by air.

In October, 1967, General Giap ordered men and material sent down the Ho Chi Minh Trail and infiltrated across the Laotian-South Vietnam border in the vicinity of Khe Sanh. In response, General Westmoreland ordered the reinforcement of the Marine garrison there. Westmoreland wanted a large Marine force at Khe Sanh in order to entice PAVN troops into a killing zone where massive firepower would destroy them in large numbers. The limiting factor was that this force had to be small enough to be supplied by air. The result was a reinforced Marine regiment of about 6,600 men. On January 21, 1968, the PAVN began rocket, artillery, and mortar attacks on the Khe Sanh Combat Base. US air and artillery assets prevented the enemy from massing his forces in sufficient number to launch effective ground attacks on the base and surrounding hilltop positions. As long as Khe Sanh could be adequately supplied with ammunition, POL (petroleum, oil, lubricants) and food, the Marines could maintain their positions.

Concerns over the ability of the US to successfully defend Khe Sanh were manifest at the highest levels of government. President Lyndon B. Johnson, his national security advisor, the advisor's military assistant, and the National Security Council staff representative for Vietnam were all kept abreast of the developing situation around Khe Sanh. President Johnson summed up his feelings regarding Khe Sanh while the fighting was in progress: "I don't want any damn Dinbinphoo." Both General Earl G. Wheeler, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and General Westmoreland assured the president that preparations for the defense of Khe Sanh were adequate and that the base would be successfully supplied. Support for the defense of Khe Sanh received priority over all other operations in Vietnam.

The job of supplying the Marine base at Khe Sanh fell to various Marine Corps and US Air Force aviation units. This airlift would have been a massive operation even under ideal circumstances. The purely logistical problems were compounded by poor visibility that fell below minimum requirements for airfield operations 40 percent of the time. The PAVN added to the difficulty by directing a heavy volume of antiaircraft and artillery fire at incoming aircraft.

The re-supply process suffered a sharp setback on February 10 when PAVN gunners shot up a Marine C-130, fully laden with fuel bladders, while it was attempting a landing at the Khe Sanh airstrip. As a result of this incident and fire damage sustained by other aircraft already on the ground, C-130 landings were temporarily suspended during February. At the beginning of March this suspension was made permanent. Consequently, during these periods, the Marines were denied the use of the best heavy-lift aviation assets in their inventory. Most supplies thereafter were delivered by parachute. According to the official Marine Corps history of the battle of Khe Sanh, these parachute drops ". . . were sufficient for bulk commodities such as rations and ammunition." Certain supplies, such as replacement troops, medical evacuations and medical supplies, could only be delivered by aircraft that made actual landings on the runway at Khe Sanh.

In the opinion of this writer, who was present during the siege, this official assessment of the success of US supply capabilities regarding rations was overly optimistic. A hot meal was defined as heated C-rations. The Marines at Khe Sanh sometimes went weeks without hot meals. Rations were routinely limited to two meals per man per day. One Marine reported that he went several days with only one C-ration meal per day. A company commander on Hill 861, located about two miles northwest of the combat base, reported his men were forced to go for days without water. Another reported that his water ration was one-half canteen cup of water per day, which had to suffice for drinking, shaving, and brushing teeth.

Water is an extremely difficult commodity to deliver to a besieged garrison. It is heavy. It must be handled in special containers that cannot be used for the delivery of other liquids, and water containers are vulnerable to incoming artillery attacks. One helicopter crew attempting to deliver water to Hill 861 was rattled by PAVN fire, panicked, and released its cargo from a height of two hundred feet. The parched Marines watched the water containers burst apart in mid-air.

Had the Communists realized the vulnerability of the Marine water supply, they could have forced the abandonment of the combat base. The Marines occupied various hilltop positions surrounding Khe Sanh. These positions, initially supplied from the combat base itself, were later provisioned by helicopters flying from the 3d Marine Division Forward base at Dong Ha. Water for the combat base came from the small Rao Quan River which flowed through hills to the north occupied by the PAVN.

Even though the combat base was not dependent on air-lifted water as the hill positions were, it was, nevertheless, often a scarce commodity. The water point itself was located about 150 meters outside the northern sector of the base perimeter. There was a small hill and tall grass that obscured visual contact with the water point. The water was lifted ninety feet over an 800-foot span by pumps. A dirt dam twenty-five meters wide caused the formation of a reservoir six feet deep. During the extensive rains of September and October, 1967, the dam broke. US Navy EO1 (Equipment Operator First Class) Rulon V. Rees led a detail to repair the dam in the fall of 1967 using old scrapped Marston matting from the airstrip. This detail blasted a crater in the river bed about thirty feet in front of the dam to act as a reservoir in case the river level fell. Marston matting was placed on the face of the dam.

No patrols went out to get the water. It was pumped inside the perimeter and went to a large black rubber water tower container. This reservoir was frequently punctured during the siege, causing temporary lack of water on the base.

Had the PAVN realized how vulnerable the Marines' water supply was, they could have interdicted it by diverting the Rao Quan River or contaminating it, thereby forcing the Marines to attempt a breakout. However, General Giap, who achieved victory at Dien Bien Phu in part due to his meticulous battlefield planning, seems to have not realized the vulnerability of the Marines' water supply. Nor did the local PAVN commander. General Westmoreland did not become aware of the magnitude of the potential water problem until the base was surrounded by the North Vietnamese. By that time, a successful evacuation was not possible.

The concept of an overland evacuation of a reinforced regiment, fighting its way through two or three PAVN divisions that held every tactical advantage, presented a problem of such magnitude that Westmoreland was reluctant to consider it. The Joint Chiefs refused to consider it.

Had the PAVN succeeded in interdicting the Combat Base's water supply, 3rd Marine Division commander General R. M. Tompkins is quoted in one source as saying that it would have been impossible to provision Khe Sanh with water in addition to its other re-supply requirements. However, in a letter to General Davidson, General Tompkins stated that water could have been added to the provisions already being supplied to support the base. By examining the supply requirements and the logistical capabilities of the Americans it is possible to determine which of these contradictory statements is correct.

III Marine Amphibious Force (III MAF) headquarters established the official supply requirement for Khe Sanh at 235 tons per day. The Americans were hard pressed to meet these requirements. The airstrip was completely closed on various occasions due to the weather or damage sustained from enemy fire. During the month of February alone, the Combat Base had a deficit of 1,037 tons of supplies actually delivered compared to scheduled deliveries. The air delivery problems were compounded when the use of the large C-130 cargo planes was curtailed due to hostile fire. Passenger requirements were met by the use of C-123 aircraft. The smaller capacity of the C-123s necessitated a five-fold increase in landings. More landings meant more targets; one aircraft upon returning to Da Nang was found to contain 242 holes before the maintenance personnel gave up counting. In the first month of the siege four major aircraft were lost to hostile fire.

Helicopters were widely used as re-supply vehicles. Only helicopters could reach the hilltop positions, whose supply requirements were 32,000 pounds per day. Helicopters were stationed at the combat base at the beginning of the fighting. These aircraft became so vulnerable to hostile fire that they had to be kept constantly in the air whether they had missions to perform or not. Eventually losses became so great that this unit was deployed away from Khe Sanh, as helicopters were being lost at a rate faster than they could be replaced. No less than thirty-three helicopters were destroyed or permanently disabled between the beginning of the siege and the end of March, 1968.

These losses were sustained without the implementation of an additional requirement for water delivery. According to the relevant US Army field manual, the water supply requirement for drinking, personal hygiene, food preparation, laundry, and medical treatment is six pounds of water per man per day. These levels provide enough water to support continuous combat operations for extended periods. The implementation of this requirement would have added 158 tons per day, an additional load of 67% over the supply requirement without water. Unlike ammunition and food rations, which could be palletized and delivered by parachute without the need for special containers, water was difficult to stockpile during the periods when re-supply was possible, for use when landings were not permitted due to weather or hostile fire. The official optimism of US commanders regarding re-supply at Khe Sanh notwithstanding, the Americans would not have been able to provide the base with water under the existing tactical conditions.

By March the PAVN began withdrawing from the Khe Sanh area, and in April the Marine regiment was replaced, allowing it to withdraw via the newly reopened Route 9. The primary goal of the American forces at Khe Sanh was to destroy large numbers of North Vietnamese soldiers. In this they were successful. Although the official body count of enemy soldiers killed at Khe Sanh was 1,602, the US command placed the total number of North Vietnamese at between 10,000 and 15,000 killed in action. American deaths sustained in the siege itself, plus mobile operations in the Khe Sanh tactical area after the siege, totaled approximately 1,000 KIA. In a war that focused on kill ratios and body counts as a measure of success, Khe Sanh was placed in the win column by the American military.

As with the Americans at Khe Sanh, the French garrisoned Dien Bien Phu as "bait" for the Vietnamese Communist forces. An American observer there reported that the French base could "withstand any kind of attack the Viet Minh are capable of launching." When the Viet Minh knocked out the airfield at Dien Bien Phu, resupply became impossible and the French became isolated and vulnerable. On May 7, 1954, after sustaining heavy losses, the French were forced to surrender. The very next day the Indochina phase of the Geneva Conference began. France's loss at Dien Bien Phu led directly to their withdrawal from Indochina.

Victory in combat, however defined, often hangs by a tenuous thread. Even with the claim of victory by the US at Khe Sanh and during the Tet 1968 fighting in general, the psychological victory of the Vietnamese Communists during this period led to the beginning of the end for the United States in Vietnam. It was during the 1968 Tet Offensive that opposition in the US to the war in Vietnam, in terms of regarding involvement as a mistake, first rose above 50 percent and exceed the level of support. Approximately one fourth of all the television film reports on the evening news programs in the US during February and March, 1968, were devoted to portraying the situation of the Marines at Khe Sanh. Had the North Vietnamese simply interdicted the water supply of the Marines at the Khe Sanh Combat Base in 1968, thereby forcing the Marines to evacuate and inflicting heavy casualties upon them in the process, the United States could have easily have met a fate similar to that of the French.

"LOOKING BACK, PRESSING ON"

By James Rutherford Chaplain 2/3

The great philosopher Charlie Brown and his friend Lucy were in a discussion about life. "You know," said Lucy, "life is like being on a cruise ship out on some great ocean. On the ship of Life there are some people seated in deck chairs at the rear of the ship, looking back at where they have been. And then there are others seated at the front of the ship, preoccupied with where they are going and what the future holds. Now, Charlie Brown, considering that you are on some ship out on the great ocean of Life, in which direction is your deck chair facing?"

"Well," replied Charlie, "out on that great ocean of Life, I'm still just trying to get my deck chair unfolded!"

Some of us will relate to Charlie Brown, while others may well be found locked into the events of the past. In every generation there seems to be some colossal event which largely shapes and defines that generation of people. For our grandparents it was the Great Depression. For our parents it was World War II. For us it is probably related to Nam. Listening to your stories shared at this year's Reunion over the past few days reminds me that many of us have been shaped in large measure by what happened there. I have been, and so have you. Perhaps we never really have a clear picture of where we are going until first we know where we have been. For us, looking back is like the re-opening of a photo album.

In my album I see a picture of CPL Norman L. Cox. He was ecstatic about a young daughter whom he had never seen. Four weeks short of that long-awaited meeting, he was killed in action three miles east of Khe Sanh.

LCPL Steve Olney's girlfriend had said 'yes' to his proposal of marriage, and he wore a silly, perpetual smile for his good news. But he died on a ridge someplace south of Con Thien.

2nd Lt. John Spindler had indicated to his chaplain that he intended to begin study for the priesthood upon completion of his Marine Corps service. A 122 round ignited a pile of ammunition atop Hill 689, and John went home early to be with God.

I see in my album a picture of LCPL Mike Turner. Mike had his life mapped out pretty thoroughly as well, but he died in the same blast that killed 2nd Lt. Spindler.

Capt. John Roesler hoped to return home to re-build a fractured marriage. A "bouncing Betty" prevented that during Operation Pegasus.

Ken Kirkes hoped to return to Tennessee to help his dad with the family-operated grocery business, but was instead killed while engaged in one of the Hill Fights.

HM3 Ron Keller, having saved several lives, looked forward to entering pre-Med training upon completion of his current tour. Time ran out for Ron during Operation Scotland II.

These and so many similar stories are not unlike yours. They are the pictures in your internal photo album. So many of the world's best and most promising we left behind. I read for you an excerpt from one chaplain's end-of-tour report:

At 3rd Medical Battalion in Phu Bai, Mass Casualties was the cry heard again and again. Within minutes a C-123 or the helos would begin delivering their bloody cargo, Marines! Sons of shop-owners, auto salesmen, nurses, short-order cooks they were. Newly-weds, hot-rod enthusiasts, jokesters. Some were college students. Yet there they were! Bleeding! Suffering! Bewildered! And while the doctors worked swiftly and silently, litter-bearers raced and corpsmen darted in the hope of saving lives. Some single mother's only son coughed and died without a whimper. To the uninitiated it would seem the entire world had gone mad, but there would be no time for protracted reflection in that chaotic scene. It was a visit to Dante's "Inferno," as day after day, night after night, the scene was re-enacted. And when the wounds had been sutured, the mangled limbs removed, and the shattered nerves calmed, the triage area again became a waiting room of anticipation for the next drama or tragedy which would surely ensue.

"After Operation Fortress Century there were Operations Kingfisher, Formation Leader, Knox, Foster, Badger Hunt, Houston, Ford, Pegasus, and Scotland II, the latter two breaking the back of the siege of Khe Sanh. The sun was hot, the nights cold, the rains drenching, the miles long and hard, the heart homesick, the body weary, but those brave men having been thrust into this violent society bore their suffering well. Who can ever forget the open, festering sores on the feet of Marines who had been unable to remove their boots for 28 days? Nor the anguish of the Staff Sgt., suddenly realizing that the bunker he'd just blown up was the hiding place of a small Vietnamese baby. Or the pathos of the Company Commander who raged over having lost his Platoon leader to a "bounding Betty," but who himself was blown away the next day by a similar device. "And who can forget the pale bodies and ashen faces of the 26th Marines after the Khe Sanh siege? Each looked ancient; as though they had just emerged from the jaws of hell, and they had! And what of the pleading of the corpsman, critically wounded, asking the chaplain to pray for his buddies whose screams he heard even as he was being med-evaced? And what of the S-3 officer who inadvertently sent a Platoon into a "hot LZ," having been given the wrong grid square marking? Fourteen "kings" were crowned that day!"

Yes, we look back, and what we see and remember shapes us in large measure into what and who we are today. But that was 38 years ago; one-half a lifespan for most of us. What about today? In view of all that has attended our past, what now are we to do? I suggest that we are now to press onward in the following ways:

We must remember the unpaid obligations to our brothers who did not return. Ironically, some who helped us to survive did not survive themselves, and we owe them a huge debt.

We must keep aflame the candle of THEIR unspent days.

We must drink deeply of our lives because of the life denied THEM.

We must maintain attitudes of gratitude, and not relegate ourselves to being self-indulgent "whiners."

We must, to the best of our ability, accomplish and fulfill all that THEY might done and become, as well as reaching our own hopes and dreams.

We must offer a double-portion of generosity, sacrifice, responsibility, goodness, compassion, honor, and love in THEIR name.

So much for THEN and NOW. How about TOMORROW?

I will now put on my chaplain's cover and ask you to move your deck chairs and join me at the bow of the ship. There are two Great Realities about Tomorrow, and they are these:

1. We Will All Die!

The rich will die, and so will the poor. The educated will die, and the ignorant. The haughty will die as well as the humble. Both vagabonds and kings will die. The heart transplant recipient and the surgeon having performed the heart transplant will alike die.

Recently in Florida near where I live, two newly-weds, very much in love, decided to ease out of their wedding reception without telling their guests. They confided their plan for an early departure to their best man, who assisted them in slipping out without disrupting the enjoyment of their friends. Following them to the outskirts of town, their best man watched in horror as a collision ensued involving an intoxicated driver and the newly-weds. All three died instantly. Death is no discriminator. It takes from us those whom we might deem the worst, and it robs us of our best. All of us have known this to be true for at least the past 38 years.

Several years ago a Pulitizer Prize was awarded for the year's top photo. It depicted a young man, slumped behind the wheel of a car, who had died of a drug overdose. In the foreground was a parking meter with the words, "Time Expired," clearly visible. It is beyond us to find logic and to make sense of why some die so early, while others live a statistically normal lifespan. There is no earthly reason. And this brings me to great reality Number Two:

2. We Will Never Die!

A contradiction to reality Number One, you say? No! According to Holy Scripture death is a brief pause and not an end; a semi-colon and not an exclamation point! Death occasions a separation between body and spirit (soul). The body "goes to sleep," so to speak, while one's life essence, spirit, personality, or soul; whichever term we choose to use, goes to be with God. There is a part of us which does not sleep even when the body does. The mind, along with the central nervous system, keeps vigil and effects involuntary responses within which sustain life even while the body is at rest. Our dreams represent the mind's processing of each day's countless memories, experiences, and other stimuli even while the body if for all practical purposes out of commission. This explanation is painfully over-simplified, but it is offered to make a point: Death is only the cessation of one's physical being and not of one's spiritual nature. Holy Scripture affirms that at death we pass into a most intensive awareness of self, God, and others. It is of utmost importance that we know that truth within God's Word; it is as important and as vital as our knowing the Author of the Word.

This has come across much more clearly to me in recent days. Just a few weeks ago I lost my best friend and the love of my life after her twelve-year battle with cancer. I miss my Carolyn terribly, even though there are rare moments when I can feel some joy that she is at last free from all pain the the horribly debilitating effects of cancer. Somewhere in the Bible, Jesus said: "Do not lay up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust consume and where thieves break in and steal, but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven .. for where you treasure is, there will your heart be also." What huge deposits you and I have made into God's bank through our many earthly losses - the loss of parents and siblings; for some of us the loss of children and mates. And always, always, there is the memory of our buddies and our shipmates, now gone from us for these 38 years.

But we press on. We choose to not 'lose' our lives by too long placing our deck chairs toward the rear of the boat. Living too much in the past can be immobilizing and is a sure prescription for wasted years and a wasted life. Remember that the only things we can do for those who have left us too soon is to complete their lives through our well-lived lives. Drinking to their memory might have its place, but it's no substitute for living out their lives through our own deeds of support, hearts of compassion, and our acts of kindness to others.

Marines, let's re-commit to giving primary focus to the future and not just to lingering in the past. Let's face forward and not sulk at the stern of the ship. Let faith, truth, and God's purpose light and guide your way as you continue in the journey; from God, to God.

May God bless you, and, SEMPER FI!

The Thing War and Other Events Do: Lessons from Vietnam and Elsewhere How We Change and What Causes the Change.

By Gary Foster

Ngo Thi Tuyen – Hero of Thanh Hoa

The war in South Vietnam was fought by male combatants from America, North and South Vietnam, Korea, New Zealand, and Australia. The same cannot be said for the military forces north of the DMZ. Hanoi termed the war a People's War. Woman fought alongside men. Not many women marched south to fight the Americans, but they fought their own war in the north. They fought American fighter and bomber planes that sought to destroy the war-making infrastructure of North Vietnam. They operated machine guns and anti-aircraft batteries and they faced the daily perils, alongside their male companions, as war was waged against them from above.

She still lives in a tiny house off a main street in Thanh Hoa. No longer young, she maintains her fighting spirit and pride; and also her graciousness. The woman, once not more than 18 years old, is Ngo Thi Tuyen. In the flicker of a camera shutter she was captured on film carrying large anti-aircraft shells on her back to the gun emplacements on a mountain top near the Ham Rong Bridge. The determination in her young face as she trudged up the hill to the gun emplacement burdened with the weight of the two Russian made artillery shells is telling.

As a result of the ordeal, Ngo Thi Tuyen became a national hero, an official title bestowed on her by her government that she proudly carries to this day. At such an early age in 1967, Ngo Thi Tuyen crystallized what women of her country should and did do in the struggle against the Americans.

Saigon

At the definitive end of the war, April 30, 1975, when the North Vietnam Army entered Saigon and crashed through the gates to the Presidential Palace, Tudo was renamed Dhong Khoi. Regardless of the name it was on Nguyen Hue near the intersection with Tudo Street, kitty-corner from the Opera House that I saw her. Climbing out of a deux cheveaux French made Citroen - a funny little car - she alighted with such alacrity and a bright splash of color, that my eyes became instantly riveted. I had not seen a western, less a blond woman for many, many weeks, and the instantaneous contrast that she presented among the sea of short dark haired Vietnamese intermixed with the green uniforms of American servicemen was no less than striking. While the surroundings seemed somewhat dull and lifeless, she was brilliant, vibrant, alive.

There was something mysteriously attractive about her, beyond description, beyond her western skirt, blouse, heels and flowing blond hair. She had stepped into another, exotic world, a world of intrigue, excitement, danger; and into this world she brought a reverse exoticness of elegance, and élan that was missing in the teeming turmoil and insane craziness of Saigon. In the cocoon of relative safety of Saigon, she seemed to swirl and thrive within the chaos. I could almost surmise by her expression that, like Durga, the Hindu goddess who makes her home on the battlefield, she was comfortable in a war zone, albeit in the relative safety of the capital city, but in the middle, or rather towards the end of a war nonetheless. I watched her from in front of the Opera House.

Within the breath of a breeze, she was swallowed up by the bustling crowd, disappeared, gone forever. I never met her but the image of that single fleeting moment remains.

Dinner in Kikwit

War changes a person. But other things do too. And these should be no less counted.

Kikwit was the embodiment of the Congo: remote, exotic, dark, foreboding, and in the middle of nowhere. Sitting on the banks of the Kwilu River, it was mute testimony to times gone by when Belgian farmers cultivated palm oil and frequented their private social club, le circle sportif, in town overlooking the river. The tennis courts, now empty and stripped of their lights and fence and net, are silent. Players, scurrying across the court in maddening play, their white tennis balls swooshing across the net or sailing over the fence, are only ghosts. The white boundary lines of the court are now faded into antiquity. The swimming pool, past host to children splashing in the shallow end while their parents sipped cocktails at the nearby sheltered bar has become the washing machine for the local population as women do their family's laundry from the edge or steps at one end of the pool.

The entire area surrounding Kikwit is covered with palm trees. Our camp was nestled in among them a fair distance from town. John and his wife invited me to dinner at their home one evening in camp. "Gary, my wife and I would like to have you over to the house tonight for dinner." House? Wife?

When someone invites a guest to their home, the invitation should be treated as an honor, a privilege. In some cultures the guest is obliged to bring a gift; and in any event that is always a nice gesture. But John's invitation was curious, almost comical. His wife was not his wife at all, but some girl he had picked up in a village, probably between Bakali and Gobari, maybe even as far back as Gembo or Bankana who traveled with him from camp to camp as the electric transmission line project we were working on progressed half way across Africa – seems to me her name was Chantel - and his house, not in another town or suburb but rather in the middle of a jungle with beat up trucks and mud covered bulldozers parked just nearby that replaced more sophisticated sedans and convertibles thereby completing the picture back home, looked just like mine. It was nothing more than a 10 foot by 10 foot square room that contained a small bed, a smaller desk, a folding chair and a reading light. And of course there was a single door and window that opened on one wall. The windows usually never worked or leaked in heavy rain and one had to take care when entering the room because you would either trip on the door sill or hit your head on the top of the door frame. Connected to the back of your home was another one exactly like yours. We lived in duplexes. Air conditioners cranked all night blasting the square room with cold air that dissipated in the noon day sun and more quickly if the generator failed. You were separated from your neighbor by three inches and each of you could hear everything the other person was doing.

The community in which John and his 'wife' lived and in which I lived was not a neighborhood in Sacramento or Des Moines, but rather, linked by a wood planking sidewalk, it was a line of hootches that resembled trailers and which comprised a construction camp in the middle of the nowhere of an African jungle not found on a map. There was no town square and this was not Newport Beach. Forgotten by time in no-where's ville, this was the ultimate in chic jungle ticky-tacky housing.

John can be forgiven for the nuance ,or for his reference to a contrived, if not phony living situation. After so many months in the boonies, one struggles for some semblance of society, of home, of normalcy. After awhile, having been removed from society, nothing is normal. Often many of us used gestures and phraseology, which made more sense back home in our own society than to our current situation. Why not? Who cared? What consequence would it have? Home, hootch, house, porta-camp; camp, neighborhood. What was the difference?

In the belly of Africa, so removed were we from reality, from our world, we all began to react in our own unique ways to our environment to preserve our sanity. Some drank too much. We all did. Some smoked ganja. Some read. Some went for walks and exercise. We built large bonfires at night, and we played our tape cassettes till they wore out or until everyone went bananas. There was a large cross section of music, from country and western to classical, but it seemed the favorite sound among everyone to the detriment of other music soon focused on Fleetwood Mac and Abba. Their songs could be heard throughout the camp at all hours, day and night, and from camp to camp. "Do you hear the guns Fernando?" We became mesmerized by their music.

But mostly what we all longed for was to be out of the jungle and back in normal society. John was trying to create that normal society in Kikwit. Who can blame him?

Baghdad: An Abrupt Breakfast with a Dour MP

The giant mess hall in the Palace in Baghdad was very quiet each morning at five hundred. Sometimes the waiters would serve coffee early but mostly they placed it on the table at about 5:30. Sometimes the coffee was scalding hot and at other times it was tepid, even cold. One never knew.

Jennifer Greely could be seen each morning early in the Palace of Baghdad in the cavernous dance hall that served as our dining mess. She usually sat toward the back on the left side at one of the longer rectangular tables. She had silky dark hair pulled behind her head and cold black piercing eyes. She seldom smiled and her eyes would dart around the room in a nervous gesture suggesting tedium - tedium with the people around her who were not part of her unit and with whom she knew she could never identify. Jennifer Greely was probably about 22 or 23 and had arrived in Baghdad from Mobile about 8 or so months before. I know this because one day, I saw her sitting by herself and asked if I could join her. She said nothing, just motioned for me to sit down. The coffee in its giant aluminum pot with a spigot at the bottom that leaked had not been brought out yet so we waited.

"What's your name?" I asked.

"Greely," was the quick reply.

"I know. I can see your name tag on your uniform. What's your first name?"

"Jennifer."

"Where are you from?" I asked.

"Mobile."

How long you been here?"

"Eight months." And with that last response she got up and left the table. So much for me. I never talked with her again.

For the rest of my stay in Baghdad, I would see her and say hello, but she would never return the gesture. Once I saw her sitting eating her lunch and I said hello and she dismissed me with an irritated wave of her hand. Later, I was to learn a little about Jennifer Greely though I didn't learn very much. She was an MP, a policeman, or rather a police woman. She had been in the army for two or three years and would probably re-up. Through a colleague of her's I was to learn that MPs are not only peace officers and enforcers of rules and regulations and protectors from Navy drunks on shore leave, they were also the last line of defense. Jennifer carried a 9mm Beretta

Army issue hand gun. She also carried an M16, glow sticks, and two grenades in their own pouches. I saw her in complete military regalia, helmet (Kevlar), bullet proof vest, camouflage uniform, webbing, glow sticks, canteens, ammunition clips, a two-way radio, and her trusty 9mm Beretta automatic pistol.

I saw Jennifer on guard duty, walking the perimeter, outside the Green Zone's concrete barriers on patrol, and standing guard duty late at night at the main entrance to the Palace when we would return from the Al Rasheed hotel more than slightly tanked. Jennifer was intriguing to study and it was fascinating to watch her expertly manipulate her weapons to load and unload them, check for ammunition and point her rifle and pistol into the tilted barrel filled with sand to "clear her weapon" before entering the Palace building, or her bivouac area. She was always easy to spot because she had a unique gait to her walk. Greely was a sergeant of some lesser rank, maybe a corporal. A few details and her name were all I knew, or was ever to find out about her. The day I left Baghdad, I saw her climb into a Humvee and was driven away, her M16 pointing out the right side of the vehicle.

Linda's Sorrow

The tallest building in Bangkok in 1972-1973 was the Dusit Thanni Hotel. Air America maintained an office in the hotel. Bangkok bustled then as it does today but back then it was a haven for military men on R&R. The Dusit Thanni, tired, run down today and now overshadowed by many taller buildings, was not the only hotel back then. The city was dotted with simple rectangular hotels, 5 or 7 stories tall and about 10 or 15 rooms long. These were dubbed R&R hotels. Like cookie cutters, they all looked alike: main door placed squarely in the middle of one side and air conditioners continuously blasting away. They provided accommodations to the giant influx of military from Vietnam and catered to their more lurid or salacious needs as they caroused through the city in search of what O'Brien terms poontang.

I met Linda as I returned from Chaing Mai. I arrived in Bangkok by bus. I had taken three buses during the night each one stopping at a terminal in some town where I would catch the next bus. I passed by Udorn and saw continuous waves of US Air Force jets roaring into the night sky on some mission to Vietnam as the bright flames from the afterburners streaked behind the jets. From Udorn, at about 4 AM, I caught the last bus to my final destination at some point near Don Muang International Airport, on the distant outskirts of Bangkok, where I could catch a metropolitan bus into the city. She got on there and sat next to me.
She wore dangling gypsy type earrings and a yellow and red scarf around her head and she was reading a book. Her bags were at her feet and she wore a long brightly colored dress, sandals and rings on her toes. She wore the scarf she told me because when she had been a little girl she had been accidentally scalded with boiling water and the hair on one side of her head never grew back.

During the 45 minute ride into town past the Dusit Thanni Hotel we talked and agreed to meet later that night for some Singha beer and Thai food. I was staying at the Thai Song Creet hotel and she was staying at an equally dumpy rat infested hotel across the nearby klong.

We stopped at an intersection with the Dusit Thanni in sight.

"I have an AK47 in my bag," she volunteered

. "What? Where did you get that?" I asked.

"Outside Saigon on the road to Can Tho. I got it after a big battle. Lots of VC were killed and I found the rifle, so picked it up as a souvenir."

"You mean you brought it with you here."

"Yep, got it right here," she said as she kicked her bag with her foot.

"What are you going to do with it?" I asked with keen interest.

"Take it home and put it on the wall."

"Why?"

"To remind me of my time in Vietnam."

It turns out that Linda traveled to Vietnam to be part of something larger than life, larger than her life. She traveled there on her own, with little money and stayed for four years doing various jobs and eventually working in an orphanage. She was tired now, the Vietnam conflict was drawing to a close and she wanted to go home. It had drained her. There was no more war. When asked why she felt compelled to come to Vietnam, she said "It's the only war we got." It seemed to me this was a cliché and it seemed I had heard the same remark somewhere before and after. But I saw it in her as a genuine statement. Her eyes assumed a distant look and her face became expressionless. "I loved it there. I had fun, great fun, dated lots of guys and went everywhere. It was a great adventure"

"You went into the countryside?"

"Many times. I always went by chopper and would stay out until I wanted to come back to Saigon. It's easy. Just go to Tan Son Nhut or Bien Hoa and get on a Huey. Sometimes I didn't care where I went, I just went. And then I would have to grab any ride I could to get back to Saigon. Simple. Now I'm going back to the States." She shrugged.

"How do you feel about that?" I asked. Linda became sullen as if a realization which she had pushed into the depths of her mind to be forgotten, denied, cast aside had suddenly been pried back out in the open by someone being too nosey. I was not prepared for the pitiful stream of litany that followed.

"I'm not sure what waits for me. I'm scared. I've changed. I'm not the same as I once was. No one will understand me." Linda looked out the bus window and I saw a tear run down her cheek. She began to cry slightly. Vietnam and all its memories, still so fresh in her mind, were forever in her past now. Gone. The last four years were evidently so incredibly exciting for her, it filled a void that had resided in her for all her life, gave her purpose mixed with adventure, she was part of something, it was so intoxicating, like a rush now descending, where would she get her next fix? She left Southeast Asia the next morning for Hawaii, I supposed, and then on to Oregon, I think.

The Congo River and the Transformation of Margot

Seeing a sunset on the Congo River is like seeing no other sunset. Sweeping north, running west and then dipping south before it empties its brown, hyacinth infested water into the Atlantic Ocean, The Congo River is the only river that flows across the equator twice. Due to its geographical location, it experiences the deluge of two distinct rainy seasons and as such the large drainage basins and the myriad of tributaries maintains the mother of all rivers at flood level year round.

Trois Zed (three Z) day occurred sometime in the early 70s. President Mobutu, himself renamed the country known as the Belgian Congo. The name he chose was Zaire. While he was at it, continuing to exert, if not flaunt his self assumed benevolent power, he also took the time to rename the currency the Zaire and the mighty river that has flowed since the dawn of time La Fleuve du Zaire. But to me it will always be the Congo River.

Passing through Kisangani, once called Stanleyville, the Congo River flows to Kinshasa, itself a renamed Leopoldville, and on past the giant hydro-electric schemes at Inga, its angry water squeezing into the narrow chutes, and finally disgorging itself into the Atlantic Ocean past Matadi. But it's at Kinshasa, just across from Brazzaville, that the river opens into a large basin that slows the torrents of the river to a calm pool. Still fast moving, the Stanley Pool, wide at Kinshasa, embraces the city with a ponderous, and at sunset, a beautifully serene lake.

She had arrived in Kinshasa; like we all did, at a little past midnight. She was met by the project facilitator, placed in a yellow bus and driven to the Memling Hotel in the heart of the city arriving there at about 3 AM. Kinshasa at that hour is quiet and dark, even intimidating. But when she woke up the next morning and peered outside, she would have seen a world very unlike her own and she may even have felt a bit of fright. She really had very little to worry about. Africans may appear intimidating but for the most part they are docile people, chaotic perhaps, but docile.

We never knew Margot had arrived, that Margot was among us. People walked across the compound all the time and some we knew, some we didn't. So it would not have caused a stir that she appeared at the gate in the same yellow bus and then be seen among the trucks and other vehicles.

Unprecedented for us, Margot was not just a visitor, she was an employee, a worker. Women did work on the project, but they were wives of the men who had been assigned there and they did small tasks to keep themselves from getting bored. The project never brought over a female to be an active construction worker. Margot was not a tourist, no, she was coming to Zaire to work on our project as someone's assistant. She was; like all of us, an expatriate.

It didn't take long for word to get out. Management was asked to find her a job on the project so she could gain overseas experience. So she arrived, but without much fanfare. Her tumultuous exit, on the other hand, was much more infamous and caused quite the raucous among the expats.
Margot went bamboo, an expression we used to indicate someone was leaning away from his or her ways at home and towards the indigenous lifestyle and local manner of living. No one could figure it out. One day she was a Western woman, hailing from somewhere on the East Coast, the next she was in the jungle, in a manner of speaking, barefoot and, yes, very pregnant. When the transformation occurred exactly no one can say for sure, but it happened with lightning speed. She was a hippie, or so the word was, and the Zairian culture facilitated that lifestyle's foibles. She went to hangouts that other Americans frequented, but then she disappeared. It was learned that she had begun hanging out dans le cite, dancing till all hours in local bars to Zairian music. She started to come to work barefoot, then with Zairian dress and finally it was as if she had forgotten how to comb her hair or wear makeup, or, it was commented, take a bath. She finally just stopped coming to work at all. She had gone native on us. She had gone completely bamboo.

When the Project Director sent her home a very delicate and awkward matter everyone knew about Margot. She allegedly took her Zairian boyfriend with her and she left Kinshasa festooned with beads and bangles and African jewelry, quite literally barefoot and pregnant. How did all this happen? And how so quickly?

War is Truth

Men go to war for economic or territorial gain, or to satisfy ego. There are no other reasons for war. But why is everyone so captivated by war? What I believe Norman Mailer tried to suggest in THE NAKED AND THE DEAD, his attempt at the perfect war novel, is that war is truth in a way no other truths exist in or about life. Pull the pin on a hand grenade and the truth is it will explode and kill. Yank the lanyard on a cannon or a howitzer and the truth is the projectile that had been stuffed in its breach moments before is sent unerringly on its way, on its destructive mission. Governments and people talk and write, but there is no guarantee that the truth is spoken or written. There may be and usually is a hidden agenda. Load bombs into the bomb bay of an airplane, and the truth is, once released, death and destruction will result.

But Mailer also examined ethics and morality and good versus evil in his book and suggested that integrity, noble, good deeds, good intentions, do not always result in good, happy, or, noble results. The truth is war kills. It also maims. We are fascinated with this for some reason. So fascinated are we that as we close with it we become even more intoxicated with its ferocity and increasing danger. That is, until the risk of danger and harm outweigh the fun of witnessing it, and if we are not involved, we pull back. And this is another source of our fascination. We are intrigued by men who have joined an organization and must perform as expected. They cannot pull back

At the first battle of Bull Run, all of Washington DC turned out to watch the resulting carnage as if it was a theatrical play. But as the horrors of battle: cannon exchanges and charges of Infantry and Cavalry ensued, whole Platoons cut down as if by giant scythes many people reeled in horror and returned along the Warren Turnpike to the safety of the Potomac and their homes in D.C. But many stayed to watch. Men and women followed the movements of certain Platoons or Regiments as they marched and fought along the unfinished railroad or in the open undulating fields. They touched human drama and suffering of war, but did not themselves become singed.

"It's good that war is bad, for I should come to love it." Spoken at Fredericksburg at the height of battle when the Confederate army was slaughtering the Union forces as they drove up the hill to Mary's Heights, Robert E Lee stood among his General Staff confident his Army would win the day and the war. Months later, the General would suffer his worst defeat at Gettysburg and the tables would turn. In each case, the world stopped to watch and later to pay tribute in the form of monuments, reunions, stories, and historical accounts that are read to this day. Unlike any other human endeavor, we memorialize war in a way that keeps it at the forefront of our conscience and we love it. We love the drama, the risk, and the essence of destruction. We cannot believe that we love it, but we do. War is Raw, or so goes the epithet for a particular wrestling show. War is truth in its rawest form.

The Shooter of Baghdad

So characterized by prolific dust, I often referred to Baghdad as the brown city. Not a particularly inspiring skyline, the buildings of Baghdad seemed squat, old and dusty. Baghdad itself is a twisting spaghetti of streets and byways, small alleyways and paths. The Tigris river loops through the city and because of the dissected geometry of the city layout and non-descript landmarks, one can easily become spatially disoriented.

In Baghdad everyone had a gun, some had several. It was a fact of life. One became used to it. There was no option. Guns lay on desks, propped up in the corner, or they were laid on the floor. The rifles, as they were handled, clicked and clanked and clacked and one became so used to the sound of someone manipulating them that each type of weapon could be identified merely by its signature sound as it was laid on the desk next to a computer, table, or floor. Guns were prolific and they were everywhere. And, in a very unsettling way, they always seemed to be pointed at you.

She was a shooter. She was not in the military. She was a contract worker. She always had three guns. She carried a 9mm automatic pistol, a smaller automatic pistol and an M4. An M4 is a smaller version of the M16. The weapon is basically the same, but the barrel is shorter and the stock is such that it can be used as a pistol or a shoulder held weapon. It's a no non-sense, extremely lethal weapon. All shooters carried the M4 in front of their bodies with the muzzle pointed to the ground. If you had an M4 and didn't carry it this way, you would be considered a novice and ridiculed. You were not part of the club.

She was not often in the Palace grounds, but when she was, she was noticeable. She was one of them. She moved with them. She walked with them, talked with them and rode with them. She lived with and worked with them. She talked to no one else but her comrades in arms. She was a body guard, a shooter, in short, a mercenary.

She wore glasses, a white and black kaffier scarf the type that Palestinians wear and her brown hair was pinned loosely behind her head with a gold clip in a sort of flailing pony tail. She wore dark green baggy cargo pants loaded with clips of ammunition and she carried clips in the pockets of her bullet proof vest. She carried her M4 in her hand with the sling and the muzzle pointed to the ground, or slung loosely over her shoulder. She walked with total confidence. She never spoke to anyone except to her comrades.

One day a convoy of vehicles pulled up in the parking lot. She opened her door, climbed out and stood guard for the person she was protecting as he emerged from the vehicle. She stood with steeled eyes, and looked around her with her M4 loaded, at the ready. She was the center of attention. I detected a slight smile at the corner of her lips. She was proud of who she was and what she was doing. She was clearly enjoying the experience immensely.

The Hills of Khe Sanh

The small, sleepy town of Khe Sanh and the Combat Base are reached by highway from Dong Ha in the east and Lao Bao in the west. Highway 9 has been completely upgraded now with a wider thoroughfare and new concrete bridges. The time required to drive to Khe Sanh from Dong Ha is a little over one hour. The drive is scenic and at locations as it parallels the Quang Tri River, majestic.

It was along one of the slopes to the top of the mountain that a photographer took photos that became famous and were seen all over the world and are seen to this day. Heretofore perhaps not a well known photographer, the person looking through the view finder, pressing the shutter button as the violence swirled and the carnage continued unabated, recorded the events for history which may even have become the pictorial definition of the experience called the war in Vietnam. One particular picture showed Vernon Wike, a Corpsman, or Hospitalman, who tried to save the life of William Roldan, a Marine who had been seriously wounded in the chest. But with a flicker of a pulse and a chest full of gurgling blood, the wounded Marine succumbed to the only fate left to him and he lost his life. Realizing this, the Corpsman left him to tend to other Marines as badly wounded elsewhere on the slopes of the mountain.

The image is hauntingly without hope. We are drawn into the scene, the chaos of the battle and we see the fear in the Corpsman's eyes. We feel great sympathy and a loss of hope because it depicts one individual in a situation he cannot control, and from which he may never escape. With mud and blood covering his military fatigues, soaking wet with his sweat, his body low in the dirt with shrapnel and bullets flying through the air, the corpsman was captured in the 35mm frame in a desperate, hopeless bid to save the young Marine's life. That one single image appeared in magazines in the USA and was flashed throughout the world. The world took note and that little corner of Vietnam called Khe Sanh suddenly lost its anonymity and became a special deadly place on the map as the world would continue to watch.

The photographer, feisty though she has been described, was not a war-hardened journalist who had bounced from war to war, though she did later. Pressing the shutter of a camera is not gender biased. The photographer was none other than a 21 year-old French woman named Catherine Leroy who had come to Vietnam to report on the war through the lens of her cameras. So determined to capture the essence and drama of the struggle in this small country, to close with the phenomenon called war. She had gone into the very core of combat to capture on film the horrors that would occur. She succeeded. The result was poignant and startling. Her craft and dedication, her skill and her fearless desire were manifested in her work. The photographs she took speak for themselves. Leroy, already well known in certain circles and in Saigon, became internationally famous overnight. She survived the horrific onslaught on Hill 881N and Vietnam. She lives today in California. One can only imagine the transformation she underwent from a peaceful life in France to war ravaged Vietnam, then the transformation again afterwards, back to her more peaceful, safer environment from where she came. After such experiences, no one is ever the same.

The Uzi

I wasn't bothered when Cynthia had her picture taken while holding an Uzi. As we stood outside in the sun-spiked entrance to the museum we had just toured in Jerusalem, she had struck up a conversation with an Israeli soldier who had been leaning against a low concrete wall that served as the perimeter of the walkway. Before I knew it, she was holding the Uzi that just a moment before had been slung over his shoulder. I could tell she had never held a firearm before, or ever exposed to one in such an intimate manner. I knew Cynthia knew nothing about the weapon, but I also knew, that she was captivated by it. It held some sort of fascination for her. So compelled, she succumbed to her curiosity and, overcoming a tinge of shyness at the triviality but frankness of her question; like the awkwardness of a young boy when he timidly seeks permission from the pilots, much taller than he, to sit in the cockpit of a plane, she finally asked if she could examine it. Could she hold it? I saw that she was slightly intimidated by the little levers and small gadgetry that adorned the sides and top of the weapon and by the ungainly clip that held 20 or 30 rounds of neat little 9mm shiny cylindrical brass casings tipped with rounded, not quite as shiny, copper bullets. But she held it anyway.

There was no mistaking it. Standing beneath a scorching midday sun that penetrated a deep blue cloudless Israeli sky, suffusing the area with a sharp brightness, there she was, light brown hair flowing, seemingly a weapons expert with an Israeli machine gun in her hands. When she posed, finger on the finger-guard that protected the trigger, with her other hand holding the short fore stock, the little black fire-spitting machine I never new if the safety was on with its olive green sling now dangling just above her knees, was prominently displayed in front of her body the entire image to be caught on 35mm film. And it was.

The camera clicked several times. Captured for all time, like Lee Harvey Oswald photographed in Dallas with his Italian made rifle before events at Dealey Plaza, Cynthia, wearing her IDF uniform with the small blue SAREL ribbon emblem, emblazoned with Hebrew writing, looped through the epaulet on her left shoulder, would be seen forever with a loaded, very lethal weapon in her hand.

No, I wasn't bothered by any of the scene unfolding before my eyes. I stood nearby and gazed nonplussed at her and the others without emotion or expression. I even accepted the ironic implausibility. If she wanted to hold the gun, so be it. She could hold the gun.

I did, however, find it all very curious. Was this the same Cynthia who many weeks before was uncomfortable sitting next to a very young Israeli soldier who escorted us on the bus we, 11 women 7 men, as we left Tel Aviv and embarked for Nafa in the Golan Heights, because he, with a confident nonchalant matter-of-factness, held a loaded gun, clip in place - an M16 to be precise? Was this the same Cynthia? Really?

The other women in our group who had crowded around Cynthia displayed the same novel interest as they took their turn being photographed with the suddenly popular instrument of death. Were these the same girls with whom I had just spent many weeks in Golan and who would cringe sometimes at the mere mention of guns or stayed awake all night out of fear of the Merkavas as they practiced night maneuvers and fired their main 105mm cannon and 50 caliber spotting Browning machine gun that was slaved to the main gun? What happened? What caused Cynthia and her gender colleagues to change? How? Why all of a sudden did they become so fascinated with guns? Why did they so spontaneously want to hold one? And, more interestingly, why was I, an unwitting observer of this unreal ceremony, surprised to find the scenario unfolding to be so fascinating, if not perhaps a slight turn-on?

REACHING OUT

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR : BAY STATE VETERAN NEWSLETTER

From Reverend Ray W. Stubbe

Dear Robert:
Many thanks for the special edition of Bay State Vietnam Veteran (Vol. 2, Issue 3, Winter 1994) with the cover feature on Khe Sanh and related battles and the well-done story by Ted Stratford along with your comments and numerous photographs. This issue is a spe-cial treasure, and I am very grateful you sent it to me. Your letter reflects how we are all being reconnected after all these years: someone knows someone else, and then eventually old friends that had not seen each other for decades suddenly have the wonderful surprise of reconnecting! Your work with your publi-cation greatly helps in this process. I'm sure, along with providing much useful informa-tion and stories that promote pride in having served and gratitude for having had that opportunity. (At this time, however, I doubt many would have regarded serving in Vietnam as "an opportunity!")
Thanks for your thoughtfulness, my friend.

Semper Fi

From Russ Turner, President KSV

Bob,
You asked what I remember over the past 38 years. I remember being a young 19-year-old from Missouri going to a place that I had never heard about, and thinking that it was going to be like playing war as a seven or eight-year old with the neighborhood kids. Little did I know, just what lay in store for me. I remember the look of death, the smell of death: Yes, There is a smell of death. Flesh burnt from Napalm, bodies that had been left from the Viet Cong laying in the hot sun for days that had a smell you can never forget, and still can smell it if you stop and remember.

Remembering helping to put the dead and wounded buddies on a medevac chopper and hoping that they would make it, but never knowing if they did survive, and still wondering if they survived. Coming to reunions and seeing some of those who did make it and being elated to know it. One thing about war is the bond of friendship that you make, not just with the guys that you served with, but with the guys that were there while you were there with you in another Platoon, or another Company. Being able to share the same experiences with them and talking about it with these brothers that are like family you can share your thoughts with, and help each other in the healing process.

I can also remember good times that you have when you are not out on patrol, the laughter of playing a joke on the FNGs just arriving in country. The down time when you could lay back and enjoy a hot beer with a letter from home and sharing these letters with each other. The KHE SANH Vets are a special group of veterans from a time in history that is not like any other group of veterans. Don't get me wrong. I do not think that we are better than any other group, just that we have a special bond because of what we went through and experienced while we were there.

Marines and their Corpsmen
Submitted By

Mac - Milton McNeely

Another email forward from Ken Pipes that I thought you all would want to see regarding Marines and their Corpsmen.

All hands:

Ellen Bradley sends this out of the Navy News Service. It is on patrol in Afghanistan with Marines and their Corpsmen. When I was in the Marine Corps Corpsmen never had to buy a beer. I trust it is the same today.
Thanks Ma'am,

Navy Corpsmen: A Marine's Best Friend

Navy News Service
July 9, 2006
By MC1(SCW/SS) James Pinsky

The corpsmen warned me the air would be thin up there, but I didn't notice. This was my first combat patrol and like a child trapped in the dark, I was petrified. The shoestring-narrow roads around the 6,000-foot mountains of Torkhem, Afghanistan make the battle-hardened Marines I was embedded with something the Taliban doesn't nervous.

The drivers, behaving more like tightrope walkers than desert warriors, eased their Humvees along the trails with one eye on the path and the other pragmatically scanning the limitless caves and nomad populations for the enemy. I didn't move, not a millimeter, while we climbed along paths so narrow that I honestly thought if I breathed too hard I'd tip us over the side, plummeting us more than a mile down to certain death.

I didn't breathe. I didn't blink. I waited for Taliban to ambush us from behind every rock, and there were a lot of rocks. HN "Doc" Joseph Nededog, noticed my white knuckles. "You know, I've been waiting for months for one of those goats to fall off the side of these mountains," Nededog quipped. "They never do," he said with a grin. I smiled, and finally breathed. That's what "Docs" do. They make everyone comfortable, a when you're a corpsman for Marines in the heart of insurgent country, helping a photojournalist keep his lunch down and his lungs working is an easy day. Nededog has seen worse.

After all, it wasn't the enemy that made these combat veterans slow their pace, and rightfully so. It was Afghanistan itself, not the besieged Taliban, that claimed 3rd Platoon's first soul in a humvee rollover less than a month before this patrol. Doc Nededog rolled that day too; still, he managed to treat his turret gunner who lay motionless, crushed between his weapon and the callous Afghanistan desert floor. It wasn't enough. Third Platoon lost a Marine that day. Losing any Marine is terrible, but to these Marines, all Marines, the thought of losing a corpsman was unimaginable. That's how much Marines love their corpsmen.

"We're a brotherhood out here. To lose a corpsman would be a huge blow," said Marine SSgt. Matthew Morse, 3rd Platoon Commander, "maybe more than losing a Marine, because our corpsmen are our security blankets." And when you're actively seeking to eradicate some of the world's most dangerous guerrilla warfare fighters, you bring one hell of a security blanket. "Corpsmen have the trauma training to react to any situation," said Morse. "The corpsman who was in the vehicle that rolled and killed one Marine had enough awareness to recover from his injuries and still treat the Marine."

And that's what Marines expect corpsmen to do because history says they will. No single rating in the Navy is more decorated for valor than the hospital corpsman. The Marines don't wonder if he will save their lives. They just wonder when. "Being a Marine is hard enough, and we are their corpsmen," said HMC Claude English, 1/3 Marines battalion medical chief. "We're the ones who get them home to mom and dad. If they get hurt they come to you, and that's why they cherish you."

Rollovers are the least of Doc Nededog's worries today. Just a few miles away from their convoy, black smoke billowed into the desert sky. Too far away to harm these Marines, it garnered no more than a passing glance. The sights and sounds of war don't impress them any more. But the smells do. The burning trash and raw sewage odors linger like cheap perfume, giving some areas of Afghanistan an unforgettable stench. "The smell always reminds me that something isn't right here," said Nededog.

Hours later, back at Firebase Torkhem, officially called Forward Operating Base (FOB) Torkhem, the Marines found out that the smoke, caused by a fuel truck explosion from an improvised explosive device (IED), may have been meant for them. "The Taliban know we're here helping the Afghan border police," said Morse. It could have been ugly, but the border police did their job. They found the bomb in enough time to get everyone away. Nobody was hurt, not even the driver."

Just a year ago, according to the international police mentors, that bomb would have made it through to its destination. The training is working. And that was why Doc Nededog and his Marines climb and drive Afghanistan's mountains and cross its deserts. They play big brother to the developing Afghan border police, helping them stand on their own. The idea being few bullies would pick a fight with a little brother with such a ferocious sibling. So far the plan worked, making 3rd platoon's corpsmen combat-wise - very bored.

Phu Loc, 1967. 2nd Lt. James Capers, USMC, led a 10-man patrol to destroy an enemy base camp. The Americans were advancing when a mine went off, seriously wounding several men. One lost a leg, another lost a kidney. The team's war dog died. Capers was hit 13 times. Then artillery rounds began to rain on them. Capers tried to go to his men but with a broken leg, he had trouble standing. Then his team's corpsman, a man he knew as Doc Smith, charged 40 meters through enemy fire, landing on Capers before giving him a shot of morphine.

"Doc came through the carnage," said Capers, who retired in 1978 as a Major. "He fell on me and saved my life. He fell on me; he had five children. That's not in the corpsman manual." Capers paid tribute to men and women like Smith at the 108th Hospital Corps Birthday Celebration, held June 16 at Naval Hospital Camp Lejeune. The retired Recon officer was an ideal speaker for the event; a recipient of three Purple Hearts and two Bronze Stars who worked alongside Navy corpsmen on numerous missions.

Back in Phu Loc, Doc Smith stayed with Capers' team, calling in air strikes and artillery after treating the 10 wounded, becoming for a time the patrol's leader. He stabilized the men until they could be transported to safety. Capers spent days flying to Phu Bai, then Da Nang, to Japan where he nearly lost his leg to gangrene to Alaska, before finally landing at Andrews Air Force Base and going to Bethesda Naval Hospital, all the way cared for by Navy corpsmen.

Capers would go through three surgeries and a blood transfusion, but he would survive. He and wife Dorothy celebrated their 46th wedding anniversary Saturday. "Had it not been for those guys, she would have been a widow," said Capers. Friday's celebration marked the day in 1898 Congress established the U.S. Navy Hospital Corps. That year, hospital corpsmen were assigned to the Marine Expeditionary Battalion that landed at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, during the Spanish American War.

Like any military birthday celebration, honors were rendered to the U.S. flag, with tributes read from Marine and Navy leaders. Under the hospital flag pole, sailors in their whites served as the color guard. Guests stayed cool under lightly swaying tents. The youngest and oldest corpsmen in the hospital command-Hospitalman Apprentice David Guimond and Master Chief Raymond Guynn, respectively cut the first pieces of birthday cake. It's like a family, said Guimond, who was born in 1987 and enlisted in the Navy last year.

Asked why he became a corpsman, Guimond said, "Because there's a huge future in it. I'll have the knowledge to save others." Before the birthday cake was wheeled out at the Naval Hospital celebration, those gathered first paid tribute to those corpsmen killed in action since June 2005. Nine in all, killed in a helicopter crash or while on combat patrol or engaging the enemy or by homemade bombs, serving in the front lines of this conflict with their Marine brothers and sisters.

Each name was read aloud, marked by the ringing of a bell, matched with the nine stands solemnly draped with flak jackets, helmets, and firearms. Back in Vietnam, during the battle of Khe Sanh, a young corpsman tended to wounded Marines all night long. Doc said he was a little tired, and sat down for a minute. The bugles began to blow, calling the unit back into action. A Marine reached for Doc, but he didn't get up. He'd died. Capers was stunned. He never even learned the corpsman's name. "I wondered: what man of men was he? Who were his parents? Who told you, you had to do this?" Capers wondered. Then: "You instilled that in him," Capers told the corpsmen in the audience. "You taught him that you stay at your post."

BOOK REVIEW

"THE TWINS PLATOON"

AN EPIC STORY OF YOUNG MARINES AT WAR IN VIETNAM

By Christy W. Sauro Jr. Zenith Press

On June 28, 1967, 150 young Minnesotans were sworn into the U.S. Marine Corps at a Minnesota Twins baseball game and came to be known as the "Twins Platoon." Author Cristy Sauro Jr., who was a member of the That Platoon tracks the history of many of his fellow recruits from that ball game ceremony through boot camp at MCRD, San Diego and into the maelstrom of Vietnam by late 1967 heading towards the infamous TET Offensive of 1968.

Author Sauro interviewed many veterans of the Twins Platoon, their family members, friends and girlfriends to grasp the mood of those times when public support for the Vietnam War was beginning to shift. The boot camp experiences related by Sauro and other members of the Minnesota Twins Platoon 3011 will ring true with all Marine veterans who read this book.

The bulk of the book continues with the deployments of the newly minted Twins Platoon Marines to Vietnam by December of 1967. Their orders disperse them to a wide variety of Marine units and occupational specialties. Of particular interest to Khe Sanh Veterans are the chapters dealing with "Siege" experiences by several "Twins" veterans. Other members of the Twins Platoon personally describe their harrowing experiences in the battles of Hue City, Dai Do and the search and destroy operations around Da Nang through the remainder of 1968 and into 1969. The book contains a fine collection of the veterans' personal photos and the jacket cover photo is by honored Khe Sanh photo journalist Robert Ellison.

Their wartime experiences weigh heavily on many of the "Twins" Marines who return home and Sauro's descriptions of family efforts to understand their sons speaks of a more simple time before delayed psychological stress from combat was even recognized by mental health professionals. The book concludes with author Sauro finally coming to grips with the meaning of his own Vietnam experiences in the scope of American public opinion.

The Forward by Brigadier General William Wiese (ret.) and comments by Major General James Livingston, MOH (ret.) and noted Vietnam War author Eric Hammel reflect the strong brotherhood of the Marine Corps and respect for Mr. Sauro's fine story of young men in war and its aftermath.

The Necklace And The Indian

By Craig W Tourte

While at the reunion in Mobile, John Pessoni (A 3rd Eng) was handing out necklaces, he gave one to me. They immediately caught my eye, made of yellow, white, green and red beads arranged in the resemblance of a South Vietnamese flag. I was quite taken with them. Unlike a hat or T-shirt that might proclaim one's being a Vietnam Veteran, the necklace was much more subtle, more a little clue than a statement. I begged John and he gave me a couple of them before the reunion was over. There was just something about the necklace that had become kind of symbolic for me. Although I tried, on several occasions to take the necklace off, I found that I just could not., That necklace just became my personal little statement.

When I got home from the reunion, several of my friends who are also Vietnam Vets noticed the necklace right away and asked if I could get one for them. I called John who told me that Ron Shouse (B/1/13) had made them and that Ron had provided quite a few for the reunion. I called up Ron and he told me that he would be more than happy to make up some more and send them , to me. He refused payment, so I sent him a shirt to show my appreciation.

While I was in San Diego this week, I got a room at a small motel that sits on the outskirts of the Gas Lamp District. It's a new redevelopment area with lots of small bars and restaurants. I spent a couple of evenings just kind of walking around watching the people, going in and out of the various neighborhood bars, enjoying thinking and being by myself. Wednesday, I found myself in just such a bar, although I don't remember the name. It was just a few blocks from my motel, so I felt comfortable sitting all alone knowing that if I consumed a little to many adult beverages, it was a short walk back to the motel and bed.

It was early evening and there were just a few patrons sitting at the bar sipping on a variety of alcoholic mixtures. There was a baseball game playing on the television. I sat near a corner of the bar so no one could sit on the right of me. There were a lot of empty stools to my left. Unless the bar was full, it would be strange for anyone to sit down right next to me, but someone did.

I continued to watch the game but not really watching it while lost in my thoughts I noticed that the guy who had sat down next to me, kept looking at me. When I glanced at him, he'd look back down at his drink or the television. I noticed that he was probably about my age and looked like life had been pretty hard for him. Sometimes you can tell how life has gone for people by just looking at their face and seeing a life of hard times. After several minutes he turned towards me. I looked at him, wondering what he wanted, or, more likely, what he was going to ask me to give him. I saw his eyes go to my neck and he said: "Vietnam." It was then that I realized I was wearing the necklace that Ron had made and which I had not removed since the reunion in July. Looking at him full on, I realized that he was an American Indian.

During my attempt at higher education after high school, I had the occasion to attend a Junior college, but considering the fact that I had been the product of the public education system and my high school GPA was 1.96, I realized that my chance of being successful at that endeavor was slim to none. Though not successful, having flunked out after the first semester, I had become good friends with a Native American from the Hoopa Valley up in Northern California. After I flunked out, my stepfather suggested I should pack up my crap and find some place else to live. My Indian friend who also flunked out, suggested that I come up and stay with him on the Reservation for the summer. Having no where else to go, I drove to the coast along the Klamath River and stayed with him for a couple of months. I developed a very intense appreciation and respect for these American Natives and later noted their Warrior spirit was evident in the Marine Corps and in Vietnam.

"Yes, Khe Sanh" I responded. We both turned around to face the bar again, saying nothing. By this time of the evening I'm afraid I was feeling the full effects of the several stops I had made before I had found my way into this place.

After what seemed like a few minutes, he said: "That was a long time ago." My recall now is that I just nodded, unable to say anything and I'm afraid I was caught up in the moment, like I can get some times. I reached up and unhooked my necklace and placed it into his hand, stood up and walked out of the bar and back to my motel room.

Looking back I don't know what happened. I wish I could have asked him the usual questions, like, when were you there? Who were you with and where were you in Vietnam I wish I had shook his hand and asked his name, but I'm afraid I just couldn't. I think there are times when words can't be spoken, and often, they just don't have to be spoken, like trying to explain a Khe Sanh experience to someone who was not there. Sometimes you just can't find the words to describe it.

Apache and a beaded necklace

By Ray Palmer

Craig, I am a full blood Apache and was with Delta 1/26 from November of 66 to November of 67. I wanted to meet you at the last reunion, but unfortunately could not. I wanted to meet the Marine who could capture with words, with easy, events and near events that happened a long time, ago and yet in my mind just yesterday, and with the blink of an eye a moment ago. Read with fascination your accounts of the meeting with the unknown Indian and the transfer of the beaded necklace. The person need not have been an Indian. In several words you have captured a ritual that is common among American Indians, "what is mine is yours" and nothing asked for in exchange.

If you could give me an address where I can send a "replacement" beaded work... I would like to replace the one you gave to the "Indian. Also, I'll add the unit you were with.

Marching In The Fog

Still On The Road

By Craig W.Tourte

As I marched on the grinder of MCRD San Diego in 1966, darkness was an early visitor during the month of October. It was relatively early in the evening for Marine recruits and our training continued unabated by the closing Darkness and invading fog, which seemed to wrap itself around the towering skyline of downtown San Diego, then slowly creep down into the valley of the depot. Occasionally, the fog was so dense it blocked out all but the hallo of light omitted by the incandesces of the tall structures.

We spent hours and hours on that grinder, marching back and forth, listening to the constant shouting cadenced of our Drill Instructors. The marching orders of left, right still ring in my ears and invades my sleep forty years later. As I stood out on the grinder this week during my first visit back to where it all began, I once again looked up towards the same towering skyline, knowing many were the same buildings I viewed from this exact location forty years ago. This time I no longer wondered who occupied the structures, why they were not home with their families sitting before their televisions, eating what and when they desired and admiring their freedom to come and go as they pleased. I now wondered if those up in the tall office buildings ever thought of the hundred of thousands of fine young men who had passed through the Depot. So many training and marching off to some conflict or war in a far away land most had never heard of. As my memory of my marching returned and I again cast a glance towards the skyline, I remembered then feeling so alone, but yet looking forward to an adventure, the likes of which I could never have imagined.

I volunteered for the Marine Corps. I was a sole surviving son and did not have to go to Vietnam, but I had nothing and nowhere else to go. The Marine Corps and a war in a far away land called to me, a call I was unable to ignore. The Marine Corps was where I wanted to be, and strange as it may seem to an outsider, Vietnam was where I needed to be. I neither understood nor cared about the politics involved. I left San Diego Thursday, August 4th around 2100 hours. Interstate 5 climbs North past the Depot as it snakes its way towards Los Angeles. The traffic was moving at its usual snails pace and I caught the San Diego skyline in my rear view mirror. I could see the tall towers of the city and the fog once again approaching as it began to wrap the upper stories of the city in its cool white shroud. As I distanced myself from San Diego and my memories of what was really the start of my life, I felt a tug at my heart and a lump form in my throat. There might have even been tears in my eyes. It's hard to explain these things to outsiders. But I know you'll understand.

I had intended to drive to Los Angeles and find a small motel near the freeway and get some sleep before starting up the coast Highway 101, but the thoughts and memories of times past occupied my mind and I didn't want to lay in some motel room and stare up at the ceiling for the rest of the night while those thoughts you know the ones ,once again occupied my brain. I drove past Camp Pendleton and Oceanside, turning off onto the 405 near the old Marine Corps Air Base of El Toro, where so many of us flew off to another world and some never to return, towards the West and the beach cities that skirt the city of Los Angeles. The miles were stacking up as I left memories of San Diego, boot camp and the Siege of Khe Sanh far behind. It was around 2300 Hours. I had my window down and the radio up, I was starting to feel pretty good. The cool air rushed into my nostrils and up into my head, clearing my brain of painful memories. I had recovered, for the most part, from my melancholy. Around the city of Huntington Beach, in Orange County, I spotted a small green California road sign off on the East side of the highway. I don't know what there was about this relative inconspicuous sign that drew my attention to it and I was passed it in an instant. Normally, I would have missed it. I don't know why I happened to look along the side of the highway while going the un-posted, but "mandatory" speed of 80 miles per hour on the L.A. freeway at that time of night, but there it was. I had seen it and it was too late. The sign read: "Little Saigon."

A couple of hours later I knew it was no longer safe for me to continue, I had driven too far and the only room I could find out in the middle of nowhere was an expensive Marriott. It was that or sleep in my car. I had not eaten all day and the only restaurant within miles was closed. I was not able to sleep and stayed up and wrote, The Necklace And The Indian story I posted. I drifted off sometime during the early morning hours only to be awaken around 0830 by a knock on the door and the announcement in broken English, "Housekeeping," and by the voices of other non English speaking workers outside of my window, cutting the hedge. It was time for me to move along.

Membership Information

Sir,

My name is Tom Nickols, son of T.L. Nickols, Retired GySgt... I need to know if as a son, I would be allowed to join your group. I realize that my military service was not one during your time, but I am currently working on a project that may be of interest to you and all of the Marines in your group.

Dad served from 1953 to 1973 as a radio operator and load master. From a single photo, I can see that he started in C-47S. I'm not yet sure if it is Marine Corps or Navy. My project started some 10 years ago when I decided that I was going to find out exactly what dad did, who he did it with, and what differences his life made to not only us, his family, but to the men and women he served with and the Corps as a whole.

Through your Web Site I was able to connect to a friend of my father. He uses the name Raven. Through Raven I have found that Dad did make a difference. He did make a real and lasting contribution to all who would follow him and the staff he worked with. This project, once completed will give all of the Marines and their families the tools needed to develop some of the most accurate histories available today on any single aircraft.

The plan is simple. I am currently collecting the data needed so that any Marine or family member can use this book, or CD to look through the aircraft, duty stations (Both home and abroad), Combat sites, i.e., Vietnam, Japan, China, Thailand, etc., and bring stories into memory through recollection of these items. It will be open, meaning you will not need to contact me to use any information or photo's to write your history. I hope this will help all groups or organizations that want to write their history to share with others. First hand accounts always make the best reading. They are always from the heart and mind of those directly involved.

Laying this out, I will start with the aircraft that was replaced by the then known as GV-1's. These were I believe the R4DS, RSDS and I think some of the C-47S AKA "Gooney Birds." From there I will put in order of acquisition as best I can the KC130 and the units who received them. This will be complete with photos of all planes, provided I can find them. I think I need 4 or 5 more to have at least one shot of each. With all of this in place, the book, or CD set will simply grow.

As a Marine looks through the material, he can spot a plane that triggers a memory of a particular flight or mission. I hope he will say: "Oh yeah, I remember that KC130. That's the one that had the goofy ADF. Never would read true." Or the dreaded in flight emergency, like: "That 130 had the worst wiring of all. During short field operations, the pilot's breaker board started smoking due to frayed wires caused by vibrations emitted through the aircraft under stress." All of this type of stuff is what makes for some good reading. I realize my examples may never have occurred, but you get the idea.

Once a story is developed by the Marine, or family member, simply submit it to me, or your organization representative, and their story will be added to the collection. Updates will occur about every 90 days, and be mailed out to all who want the update. I hope this project will keep all Marines, still in service,nally at home, including their families, up to date on the most recent accomplishments of how the KC-130F evolved from 1st off the line to the new J. This project will be supported by a dedicated server for the internet guys out there. The server, once I get the rest of the parts, will be the home of the KC-130F Information Center. This server should be online in late September.

Well guys, I would really like some input on what you think. I know this is doable, and I hope that it helps to serve everyone's best interests. This could become one of the best ever written and updated history books on the KC-130FIR/J ever written.

Reunion in Branson Missouri

By Cliff Treese B Btry 1/13

After an excellent trip to Washington, D.C., for Operation Rolling Thunder, Linda and I left home to embark on another little outing. We drove to Albany, Kentucky to see her mom and the rest of her family. Linda's mom is not in the best of health since her stroke a few months back. We arrived there in time to spend some time with her before we came to the conclusion that she could no longer live by herself. Since her stroke she has became totally blind and could not get around by herself. Linda and her brother made arrangements for her to be put in a nursing home close to their home. Linda and I spent another week in Albany getting things straightened up at her mom's place. We visited her every day.

Linda informed her mom that we were leaving the next morning to go to Glen's house in Missouri. We were going with Glen to attend the welcome Home Reunion in Branson MO. Linda told her that their family reunion was coming up in a few weeks and she would try and make it back to take her. She was in a little better spirits after hearing that.

Linda and I got back on the road and drove to St. Peters, MO. to Glen Rappold's' house. We arrived about supper time and decided to go to Hooters, our favorite dining establishment, for supper. Last time we were there the girls signed a poster for the Wounded Warriors. We took a few more photos (Pic 1&2). Glen and I then went to his memorial and attempted to put new flags up. I talked him into doing it the right way by lowering the poles down instead of trying to climb a ladder up the extended poles. If I hadn't been there Glen surely would have fallen off and broke something (Pic # 3).

We left Glen's and headed for Branson. As we got near, we were driving in a long construction zone. We had crossed a bridge with only a few feet of shoulder on our right and a concrete barrier to our left. Glen who was driving the lead vehicle, decided to stop and relieve himself. When he got back in his car he pulled out without looking, and almost hit a truck as it came over the bridge. The driver hit his brakes and swung over to the shoulder where Linda and I were stopped. Fortunately I was driving our Dodge with the Hemi in it. I floored it and drove up the shoulder to get out of his way. He passed me and wouldn't let me off the shoulder. He was mad at me and kept moving over to try and run me over the embankment. I hit the brakes and let him go and pulled in behind him. When the construction zone ended and I could pass him, he gave me the bird. My PTSD was shifting into high gear at this point. All I could think of was to get in front of him and lock up the brakes. I thought the better of it, and just took his plate number to report him to his company.

We finally arrived in Branson and checked into our hotel. I had to locate Larry Wilhite, the manager of Mansion America, to find out when they planned on showing the documentary on Khe Sanh from the History Channel, "Khe Sanh the unsung Heroes." I was asked to be there during the showing by Lou Reda from Reda productions who produced it for the History Channel. After touching base with Larry, the three of us decided to walk around and see the sites. There was a Huey flying around that was giving rides for a fee. We walked up to the Traveling Wall that was on display in the parking lot. There were several large tents set up with vendors.

The next morning we returned to the Mansion because they were showing the documentary on the big screen in the theatre. The showing went well and we met several veterans who said they served at Khe Sanh. I had the new banner with me, and they signed it. We met up with Chris Noel and sat and chatted with her awhile, and she signed our banner (Pic # 4). I told Linda and Glen that I would like to go over to the landing area and take a chopper ride. I finally convinced Linda, and off we went. The ride was great and we found out the co-pilot was a pilot who flew in and out of Khe Sanh (Pic # 5&6). The lady who checked us in before going up was a former Marine who retired as a Sgt Major (Pic # 7). When we left the flight area we heard drums beating, and we watched an original Native American Pow-Wow (Pic # 8).

The next morning we attended the Veterans Parade which ran through the streets of Branson. They had old WWII military Ducks there to take the Vets who would rather ride than walk. Glen and I hung our Khe Sanh banner on the side of the Duck and climbed aboard. The Duck was filled with Army Veterans. We were the only two Marines aboard. As we passed the reviewing stand, the announcer announced: "Here comes the Khe Sanh Veterans," then said to the others on the stage,:"Does anybody know about Khe Sanh?" Many vets in the area all yelled and cheered(Pic # 9).

I had one guy run up to the side of the Duck and told me he was from C Btry 1/13. I told him we were from Bravo 1/13 and he should sign the banner. This man ran along side of the Duck while signing the banner. Linda was waiting in front of our hotel to get a picture of the banner on the Duck. I asked the driver "Capt. JED" if she could come aboard and he stopped in order for us to lower the ladder and get her aboard.

We arrived back at the Mansion America building where we made several new friends. Among them was Air Force Brig. General Robbie Reisner who was the ranking senior POW in the Hanoi Hilton. The General related a few stories of his captivity by the North Vietnamese and the tortures he endured. Chris Noel, along with the owner of Mansion America, Mr. Bucknell, was also there with the General to receive awards (Pic # 10).

When the show started the Marine Corps Color Guard came on stage to present the Colors. Several different entertainers appeared on stage to sing and perform. They had a short skit depicting the Viet Nam Wall with Veterans standing at the Wall and hearing voices of fallen buddies coming from the Wall. They also had a group of singers come on stage singing and dressed in clothes from all eras in American History from the Revolutionary War to the Present War in Iraq (Pic # 11)

The next morning was the first day of a two day out door concert. The show wasn't due to start until 1:15 PM, so we went over to the tent area to walk around. A man named Harry Schiltz came up to me and asked if I had been in Khe Sanh during the Siege. I told him that I had been. He said that he was in a Long Range Recon unit around Khe Sanh and he was the only survivor from his patrol, after they walked into an ambush. After being bayoneted in the back, he crawled and hid in a tree trunk until it was safe. He then made it back to our lines, and later received the Navy Cross (Pic # 12).

We heard music coming from the stage area, so Linda and I walked over to the stage and set up our chairs. They wanted to get things started a little early. Paulette Carlson of Highway 101 came on stage first to perform a few songs to get the crowd warmed up even though. her band wasn't scheduled to come on until 7:20 PM (Pic # 13)

The National Anthem was sung by Shawna Stratton. The first scheduled group to perform was The Liverpool Legends, better know as the Beatles. George Harrison's sister is the manager of this group and has moved from England to Branson (Pic # 14 & 15). The MC of the show for the two days was Rex Smith. Rex made an announcement that if anybody wanted to pass their hats up front he would mention their unit. I took my hat off and passed it up to Rex. I was the first to do so. He then announced: " Here's to all you survivors of Khe Sanh." Everybody in the place stood up and cheered. He went to pass my hat back. I told him to keep it and to wear it proudly. He told us that he lost an uncle in Nam who was a fighter pilot who was shot down. His remains were never recovered. He gave everybody their hats back and wore ours (Pic # 16).

All during the show on Saturday, choppers and other military aircraft flew low over the stage area. Most of the aircraft were rebuilt and flown by Vietnam Veterans. Mickey Gilley and his band also performed. He still sounds good (Pic # 17). Chris Noel came on stage and was presented with Paul Revere's hat and announced that he would not be there (Pic # 18). She then shocked the stage crew by calling for all Vietnam Vets in the area to come up on stage (Pic # 19). Everybody looked around and said: "I hope this stage holds us all."

Artemus Pyle of Lynyrd Skynyrd and the band were next to perform. Artemus came on stage and announced that he was in the Corps from 1969 - 1973 in the Air Wing and in Nam for one year. He told us with a name like Pyle, what do you think his DI called him in San Diego MCRD? GOMER. I went to talk with him as his show ended and he told me to come back stage. Linda and Glen followed. We talked and took some pictures (Pic # 20 & 21).

Rex Smith the MC, followed by singing several songs one called "From here to Eternity" that talks about the battle for Khe Sanh. Chely Wright, was great She talked about a guy she met while entertaining troops in Iraq. She noticed that name on his uniform was the same as hers. He asked her to go out on a date and she asked if they could possibly be related. He said he didn't think so. She told him if we move to Kentucky it would be okay. She learned a few days later he was killed the next day in an explosion. She was an excellent performer.

Glen had to be back in St. Peters for a doctors appointment on Monday morning. Linda and I both said we might as well leave early, because we had an 1100 mile trip ahead of us. We all left out around noon and headed our different ways home.

INCOMING

Hi Tom,

Last month, I had the rare opportunity to attend an Educator's Workshop at Quantico where I learned about OCS, the Basic School, the War Fighting Lab, new weapons and tactics, and the Marine Corps University. Accompanying us for the week were a group of young officers. All except one had served in Iraq.

At the end of the week, I presented a copy of Mike Archer's book about Khe Sanh to the commanding general of the Marine Corps Recruiting Command. I reminded him - gently - that Vietnam is just as important to the USMC story as any other war and that the USMC should embrace Vietnam vets and ask for our help in supporting the USMC and its recruiting efforts.

I am a professional historian now, but at Khe Sanh I was a corpsman.

Publisher Notes:
The notice for the 2007 membership dues have been mailed out. A reminder, the dues for a regular membership have been raised to $30.00, and a Life Membership is now $250.00. Please pay your dues ASAP. We are required to have our budget in place for 2007 at the annual reunion. It is a lot of work for me to keep up with thousands of members paying at separate times. I will see you all at the reunion, and I wish you all a very Joyous Holiday season.

Tom Eichler

Secretary Notes:
I wish all my Khe Sanh brothers a Merry Christmas and a Happy New year. The reunion is just around the corner so get your room reservations as soon as possible. They are going fast. This reunion will probably be the largest the KSV has held. Try your hardest to join us in DC. Please get your dues in on time. It supports our magazine and PX. We have new items. You will receive the new brochure with the dues notification. Current registrations reflect that many members will be bringing their families and arriving a few days prior to the start of the reunion.

Big John Pessoni

Note From The President
We will be holding an election for the office of President and several Directors' positions. If any member wishes to run for a position on the BOD, they must notify me prior to the reunion. Call me for the qualifications

DENNIS RICHARDSON
A CO 3RD ANTI TANK USMC

It is with heavy heart that I notify you of the passing of our friend and comrade in arms, Dennis Richardson. As you know, Dennis had not been in good health for the past few years but he was a fighter and he fought up to the very end. Don't have any details at this time, will pass them as I learn more. In the meantime please remember Dennis, his wonderful wife Susan and their lovely family in your prayers.

WILLIAM FEYH
3RD FORCE RECON USN HN

Dear Tom,
I am writing to inform you of the passing of my husband, William H. (Bill) Feyh, on November 9, 2005. He was a corpsman with 3rd Force Recon in Vietnam and retired from the Navy as a LCDR in 1996 after 34 years of service to our country. He always had a soft place in his heart for Marines and for the men he served with. He was laid to rest in Barrancus National Cemetery on board the Naval Air Station, Pensacola. May your good work be continued through the Khe Sanh Veterans Association.
Sincerely,
Leah A. Feyh

Another of our Brothers has passed. Sorry, but right now I just can't find the words. Here is the email that Phyllis, Virgil's wife, sent and the reply that I sent to her.
Milton McNeely

Mac and Ken,
Virgil passed away today at 11:30 a.m. He died at Crossroads Hospital. I feel like my heart is broken. Today is my birthday. He had sent me flowers at work. I went by the hospital this morning. and we had coffee together at 6:30. I told him I had to go to work but would be back a little later. He said OK. He called me at 9:30 a.m. told me he loved me, and we talked for a few minutes. About 30 minutes later the hospital called and said he had taken a turn for the worse.

The doctors worked on him for about an hour and a half. He would not have a pulse and then he would. They took him to ICU continuing to work on him. He stopped breathing several more times. The doctor said the more times he quits breathing the chance of him coming out of it were less. I took his hand and told him it was OK to go. I told the doctor when he had done everything he could do to just let him go. I loved him so much. I feel like I am in pieces. Thanks for the many prayers
Phyllis

Phyllis,

May our Lord bless, keep and comfort you. God's word tells us that to be absent from the body is to be with the Lord. Virgil told me several times how blessed he was to have a wife such as you. I know by your remarks that you loved him very much. Please let me know about the funeral arrangements. I will share the info with others

GARY DAHLHEIMER 3RD ANTI TANK USMC

I just received word yesterday that Gary Dahlheimer, 3rd AT's, died in his sleep in Fresno, CA. Remember him and his family in your prayers.
John Hargesheimer

Gary, In July 1993 at the 25th anniversary reunion of the Khe Sanh Vets (my first reunion) you came over to this new guy and introduced yourself in your distinct, gravel voiced way. Yours was the first welcome I received. It made me feel more at home. After much discussion, we made the connection to Bruce Saffel, 3rd ATs, also of my hometown. You sent me on a mission to contact Bruce and he in turn contacted others of 3rd ATs. The rest is history.

I last saw you in Chicago, 2005 with the results of your stroke slowing you down but never stopping you. Farewell good friend. God speed.
Semper Fidelis
Dan Fisher D Co 1/26

I first met Gary Dahlheimer at my first Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in Chicago in 2001. Gary was with a group of Ontos Marines who had been attending the KSV reunions for many years. Gary was a great guy, and had some interesting stories of his time in Vietnam with Alpha Company, 3rd Anti-Tank-Battalion, Ontos). I last saw and talked to Gary at the 2005 Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in Chicago. This was after his stroke, and it had taken a toll on his health. When he arrived at the 2005 reunion he was pretty upset. The airline had lost his wheelchair. I was saddened to hear of Gary's recent passing.

A MESSAGE FROM THE COMMANDANT OF THE MARINE CORPS

On November 10th, 1775, our Corps was born as the Continental Congress raised the "first and second battalions of American Marines." Each year as we celebrate our birthday, we pause to reflect on the Marines of yesteryear who fought in our touchstone battles and forged the modern Marine Corps with their courage, integrity, and undying commitment to their fellow Marines. Each of our storied battles is a link in the long chain that binds all Marines together-from the Continental Marines at Bunker Hill to the Teufelhunden crossing the wheat fields of Belleau Wood. This chain binds us to the Marines on the crest of Mount Suribachi; it passes through the ice and snow of the Chosin Reservoir and the steaming jungles of Vietnam, and it anchors firmly today in the desert sands of Iraq.

This year's celebration again finds many from our ranks serving with distinction in harm's way. As we have for the past 231 years, our Corps is answering the Nation's call. I can report first hand that our Marines fighting on the front lines of the Long War on Terror are performing brilliantly, acquitting themselves with honor, dedication, and dignity in difficult and dangerous environments.

All Marines are making a difference. Regardless of where you are serving, you are adding new chapters to the legacy that was earned with sweat and blood on old battlefields. Just as previous generations of Marines shaped today's Marine Corps, your deeds are molding the Corps of tomorrow. Our Corps has never been stronger, and all Americans are extremely proud of your magnificent performance and unwavering commitment to serve our Corps and country. With high caliber Marines like you, our future has never been brighter.

Another irreplaceable element of our success as Marines is the terrific support we receive from our families. Through the long hours, the exercises, and the combat deployments, their support is unconditional and firm. They give us love and devotion, providing us with the strength to drive on when duty calls. Today we should all acknowledge our loved ones for their patient, steadfast service.

To all who have earned the title Marine, to the superb Sailors who serve with us in every clime and place, and to our precious families-I wish each one of you a heartfelt Happy 231st Birthday.

Semper Fidelis and Keep Attacking!

A Foggy December Morning

By Craig W. Tourte

As I sit here cozy and comfortable staring outside into the gray foggy morning, my thoughts wander back to December 1967. We started with a large green tent made of canvas. Somehow there seemed to be just enough room for all of us lower ranked Marines to find a place to lay our "rubber ladies." We may have even built a kind of bunk bed so we all could fit inside. Wooded pallets were placed on the floor so we would not always have to walk in the mud. We slept in our clothes, occasionally taking off our boots, but having them unlaced and nearby for a quick put on and lace up. We may have had a few candles, but certainly no electricity that I remember, and, nothing to keep us warm on those short days and long, cold, wet, and foggy nights.

Since we were in a war zone; although we had not seen any "action" yet, we knew it was a future possibility, being a small mountain base with the very strange name of Khe Sanh, located somewhere in South Vietnam. I am not sure any of us at the time really understood where it was in relation to direction or borders. It was not until years later that I learned the runaway of the airstrip ran East and West. For some reason I had always thought when I looked up at hills 950 and 1015, I was looking to the West. I often visualized that the ocean was on the other side of those mountains and I could see our ships off shore like those old World War II movies, ready to fire over those mountains in our support just like I had seen in those old black and white movies and newsreels.

It started with just a very few sandbags and then we were able to acquire some empty 55 gallons drums which we filled with that strange red earth, enough to place around the base of the tent. We felt pretty comfortable with those drums around us, about waist high, but for months continued to build our above ground bunker. We acquired some wood and old rusty runway matting and placed it over the bulkhead on top of our single layer of sandbags. The sandbags by now were hard as rock, having soaked up water. The clay dirt placed into each sandbag with a small entrenching tool soon becoming hard as cement. Up and up we went, putting layer upon layer of sandbags, building a ring around the tent. I placed a long pole on top where I placed a small California State flag. We all felt safe and comfortable inside, feeling that our little above ground bunker would protect us from the incoming which we really didn't understand or know anything about.

It leaked a little, was cold and damp, but it was all we had and we called it our "bunker." We were all so young and green then. We worked our butts off on almost a 24-hour clock. there was just so much to be done. On those few occasions when the weather would clear we would stand or sit outside in the sun, thinking most often about home, family and Christmas. The mail would arrive and we would all share with the others the things young men shared. Mostly we talked about girls and cars. Occasionally one of us would walk the long walk to the little wooden post office over by the main base area to pickup the mail or drop some mail off, but most of us seldom got over there. I remember there were several little wooden buildings, one was a post office, some type of commissary I think, and Graves Registration was in a large green tent. I hated to even walk by; it always had that "smell." We all worked so hard on our above ground bunker, but on January 21, 1968, we found it was all for nothing. War is always such a learning experience.

Sunday Morning Patrol

By Leland Upshaw

WARNING ORDER

Place: KSCB
Date: 25 DEC 67 Extraction 30 DEC 67
Time: 0700
Mission: Reconnaissance Patrol - Perform reconnaissance in six grids making observations of enemy activity. Engage enemy with supporting artillery and air.
Method: Walk Out/Walk in Unit: Bravo Co/3rd Reconnaissance Bn. 1B2 Call Sign "Old Colonel" Assignments: Eight man patrol armed with M-16's; M-79 Grenade Launcher, HE Grenades, Thermite Grenades, Smoke Grenades, 2 PRC-25 radios with tape and whip antenna, air panel; and food and water for five day mission.

Special Orders: Christmas cease fire in effect. Do not engage the enemy unless engaged first.

The morning was quiet and damp. As we departed our company area all were still asleep other than normal security watches. As we put on our camo, saddled up our heavy gear and walked west along the main street, all we could hear were our own feet stepping through the crumbling red clay and occasion puddle.

As we proceeded along our way parallel to the air strip looking to our left and to our right, a certain calm seemed to be present. The normal activities of digging in, filling sand bags, loading materials; burning ####ters, cleaning rifles, etc. were put on hold for an extra 30 minutes for the men to sleep in.

As we approached the area of the tarmac and Charlie Med., a lone CH-34 helicopter was doing a low and slow pass on our right with streaming red and green smokes attached to the landing gear. My thoughts were... Christmas cease fire? Why are we going out on patrol to hunt the enemy if there is a cease fire? On this mission would we meet the enemy? Would we get ambushed with someone getting wounded or killed? Will I perform well and shoot the enemy before he shoots my fellow team member? Many thoughts race through my mind as I walk into the area that could end up being the jaws of death. I'm bewildered and sad being in a place like this on Christmas, I just swallowed up these feelings and realized here it was just another day and surviving was the most important thing.

We passed through the western outside perimeter of the base across our "friendly lines" into what often was referred as "Indian country." From this point forward our attention levels were heightened and we go into our recon mode. Whispering, keeping good intervals, closely observing to our right, left, rear and our point man always looking ahead for ambushes, traps, and a safe area to pass.

We complete our mission on December 30 in the morning with no contacts. Our mission uneventful just cut hands from elephant grass, sore and wet feet, hungry because of limited rations carried. Any cigarettes left are wet and unsmokable. Still, we are OK. We did not see the enemy, and as far as we knew he did not see us. We were safe once again. Four days closer to our rotation date. Four less days we have to spend in the Nam. We clean up ourselves, and our gear, and wait to get our next warning order in about three days.

That same day 30 DEC 67 one of our other teams was not as lucky. Team "Clemson Song" 1B2 was patrolling directly west of hill 689 and was hit by the enemy. L/Cpl Thomas Tingley and PFC Terry Jones were killed. I, along with my fellow recon brothers went down to the chopper pad when these two lost brothers were brought in. Death was real. Why just days before I had seen these men, with their smiles, their jokes, and most important, their presence. They were the same as me, just doing their job. The thoughts of that day will never leave me. It could have been us, "Old Colonel." Were we lucky? Was it just not our day? I don't know.

I think about these men and others that I was with that perished before and after this date. I will never forget. Christmas is supposed to be a happy time for loved ones and friends. While I do celebrate this time of year I still remember those that missed the many things I have had an opportunity to enjoy.

May this Christmas bring Joy and Happiness to all my fellow Khe Sanh brothers and their families.

History of special forces
Richmond Times Dispatch

The creation of the Marine Corps Forces, Special Operations Command makes sense to a military historian who has spent more than 60 years around the Corps.

Bruce F. Meyers is a retired colonel who fought at Iwo Jima in World War II and Khe Sanh during the Vietnam War. He also commanded the first Marine Force Reconnaissance in 1957. He has published a number of books on Marine Corps history and practices law in Seattle.

In a recent e-mail, he said the Corps' entry into special operations reminds him of past efforts to improve intelligence-gathering and reconnaissance skills, drawing on the lessons learned battling the Japanese.

After the Korean War, the 1st Force Recon experimented with novel ways to plan for atomic warfare with the Soviets. This included launching Marines from submerged submarines and parachuting from jets.

The trailblazing unit developed sky hooks for moving aircraft to use during emergency pickups of troops on the ground. That extraction technique later was portrayed in James Bond movies.

The Marines also worked with new techniques that assisted helicopter pilots navigate in distant and unfamiliar landing zones, Meyers said. He noted that this was before the development of the Global Position System.-- Chip Jones

Vietnam Veterans speak to Marines back from Iraq
By Rick Rogers
Union-Tribune Staff Writer

The Marine Corps is tapping the experience of Vietnam veterans in hopes of keeping today's troops from suffering mental anguish caused by combat.

Camp Pendleton's post-deployment program seeks to help Marines and sailors adjust to life after war. Aiding in the effort are members of the American Combat Veterans of War, who use memories of their time in Vietnam to encourage Marines to seek counseling if they feel anxiety from their combat duty.

"We know what combat is about," said Bill Rider, a former Marine wounded three times in Vietnam and a veteran of the siege of Khe Sanh. At least 40 of his friends died in Vietnam, including several squad members.

"I'm going to address the guilt complex. If someone was hurt, and it was unavoidable, you must let it go," Rider said. "Your big enemy right now is post-traumatic stress disorder. It will attack you. It will kill you. It will make you beat the hell out of your wife or husband or girlfriend."

In the low light of a conference room yesterday, about 75 members of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force who returned just days ago from Iraq inched up in their seats to listen.

Marine Corps officials did not allow reporters to question the service members.

Mental health is a major concern among Iraq and Afghanistan veterans. Defense Department and Department of Veterans Affairs statistics suggest that one-third of all combat veterans suffer post-traumatic stress or some other mental illness. If not treated early, these can turn into lifelong, debilitating conditions.

"(Post-traumatic stress) is a progressive, fatal disease. If you don't get it off your chest, it will take you out," Rider told his audience, mostly young support staff members. He told them to watch out for themselves and each other, and not to let pride or stigma keep them from getting help.

Symptoms of post-traumatic stress include being overly vigilant, as if anticipating an attack; sleep disorders; and self-medication through drugs or alcohol.

Col. Darcy Kauer, commander of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force's headquarters group, brought the veterans into the transition program six months ago. He said education is essential in treating the mental stress and keeping men and women ready to fight. So far, 1,200 to 1,500 Marines and sailors have gone through the transition program.

"I've seen what can happen when people don't transition well," Kauer said. "We are trying to find whatever tool . . . to prevent (drunken driving) or a marriage from falling apart. "If we've got a weakness, let's take steps to improve it and make things right. The Marine Corps is serious about this."

STILL SERVING-NEWS FROM IRAQ

By Robert A. Hall

This is one of the guys I've been sending care packages to, one of the grandsons of my Colonel, KSV John Studt. From his Mom.

I'm passing along what I know so far about Jonathan's injury. It's late on Monday night so I hope this is coherent. On Sunday night, Jon (3rd LAR, Iraq) called his brother, Danny (1/3, Hawaii) and told him the following:

Some time Saturday, their Light Armored Vehicle hit an IED (improvised explosive device) containing two mortar rounds and it "tore up the vehicle", rendering the Marines inside either unconscious or dazed, and killing the driver instantly. When Jon came to, he grabbed his weapon and set up his position of defense until help arrived. He also pulled the Lieutenant, who was pinned behind their turret gun, out of the vehicle. Later, after the adrenaline began to wear off, he realized there was something wrong with his ankle and was then taken to the field hospital in "the rear" where he was told it was fractured. He's being treated there and was told he won't be allowed to return to his unit until their deployment is up, the end of this month.

According to Danny, Jon sounded a little dazed but pretty upbeat. He told Danny that, after things settled down a bit, he went back to their destroyed vehicle and grabbed his brother's picture out of the place where it had been tacked up. He also told Danny that he's pretty sure he gets a Combat Ribbon now, and maybe a Purple Heart. So typical of Jon.

I'm told he gets to sleep in a warm bed each night and use the phone or computer whenever he wants to now. I am thankful to God for protecting our son and I want to thank each of you for praying as well. When I know more, I'll be happy to forward information to you. God bless, Publisher Note: Both of Colonel Studt's grandsons are back from the wars, but both are returning. John's Son a Lt Colonel is still serving in Iraq. God Bless them all.

MODERN PIRATES 1968 HAWAII

Ernie Spencer

They are what are left. Bred in fetid back water ports and towns throughout the world. They started in crude hewn craft barely seaworthy, then stole or traded their way upwards to ever expanding fleets of ships. They greased, stole, stalled, smiled, and continuously lied. Lied even when they did not have too. Streams of lies and BS pour out their mouths. Steamship owners and executives of shipping companies. Today's pirates. They seem like some macabre collaboration between Federico Fellini and Gilbert and Sullivan. Two weeks after leaving Nam my shipping career begins. I'm hired as a management trainee at Matson Navigation. Right from Nam to the "world" just like That I went. Combat to BS. Parading egos on review. The company has a near monopoly on shipping into the state of Hawaii. Even most of the military supplies are shipped in by Matson. "Aloooha, Matsoon," the switchboard operator purrs to the incoming callers. Matson is making a ton of money. It's the height of the Vietnam War. I'm what everyone wants now. A married male with a college degree and most important, military service completed.

I've always disliked those guys. Military Academy types. Any man who locks himself away during his prime partying years has to be sick. Your best years, wasted. Marching, saluting. College was the best years of my life. I majored in Philosophy, officially, but party is what my real major was. Man did I have a good time. I joined under the PLC program when I was 19 in 1963. I knew what was coming. I saw the war taking off. I was going to get in all the fun I could before I faced it. Lock yourself away in a military school without booze and women? Man that is sick.

All of my bosses at Matson, there in Hawaii, are Academy graduates. Most from Kings Point (the Merchant Marine Academy), but one from Annapolis. The Annapolis guy we nicknamed "itch" because he was always scratching himself nervously. He did twelve years in the Navy and "got out." Nosey, kiss ass, short hair, first class jerks every one of them. Two weeks after I begin with Matson, I'm hit. "I cannot find anything physiologically wrong with you, Mr. Spencer." I'm sitting on the edge of his examining table, shirtless, gazing outward at him. The doctor they brought me to never asks about why I might be this way. Nam never occurs to either of us. An hour earlier I had collapsed with severe stomach cramps, at my desk. The excruciating pain subsides there in the doctors office.

Damn right I feel awkward after taking a cab back to the office. Too ashamed to ask anyone for a ride. Clank! The metal doors come down. Put behind. Forgotten. "It was nothing, really, just a stomach flu," I say to Bob. Sincere the concern in his eyes. Bob was from New England. Served in the Army just after the Korean War. Now besides working for Matson he's also a lieutenant colonel in the Hawaii Army Reserves. Hawaii is a very patriotic, flag waving state. "Sheat Ernie, the closest I ever came to combat was those bath and massage houses over on Okinawa. Heee." A weasing hiss to his self generated laugh. So obvious his attempt to draw me out. I ain't war rappen with some chain-smoking never saw nothing doggie, I think to myself. "I'm fine Bob, you're the one that needs help." We both laugh. He's one of the few management people at Matson who is compassionate. I like Bob. Within the month Bob and I are sitting alone in his cubicle, chairs near to one another, staring into each other's eyes. He sighs openly then slowly almost inaudibly speaks. "My daughter and I went to identify him today. They were married less than a year. My granddaughter is two months old. She'll never know her father. He was a Navy corpsman.

Volunteered. A local boy. Hit a booby trapped artillery round while on patrol with the Marines. I hope my daughter gets on with her life." Passively we gaze to and away from one another. To the traffic flowing by on the busy boulevard. Through thin curtained large glass walls we see the traffic outside our ground floor office. We sit. Watch. Bob needed to tell the story of the dead. Why do they always think that I need or want to know? Maybe they know I understand.

THE GREATEST GENERATION ?

My father was rescued in 1964 by a Marine H-34 after getting shot down in his Vietnamese Air Force Skyraider over the Quang Ngai Province. There has been much deserving attention to the Battle of Iwo Jima with the recent release of the movie "Flags of Our Fathers." Yet the Corps had 101,574 killed and wounded in Vietnam, almost 4,000 more casualties than in World War II. It was only in the number of dead (19,733 to 12,983) that WW II held the greater number. Vietnam was not a simple "civil" war as depicted in history books and pundit columns.

Here's to your health and to our Corps. May we garner another 231 years of tradition unimpeded by progress!
S/F,
Quang X. Pham

SHORT ROUNDS

Ponderings From A Bus Bench
By Craig W. Tourte

I sold my house in the suburbs and moved back to the city and into the little house I have owned for the past 30 years. As could be expected, the neighborhood has gone through a few changes, but the same old lady still lives next door. I thought she was old thirty years ago, in reality she was much younger than I am now. The 60-year-old homes in the neighborhood are filled with mostly middle-aged blue-collar workers, retired people and a few young families.

The grocery store across the street is closed and boarded up with a tall chain link fence around the parking lot, as is the Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant next door. There is a vacant lot where the old Chevron gas station once was. New fast food restaurants have sprung up along the busy main street and a 24-hour AM/PM opened on the corner a few years ago. Just down the street a few blocks sits the little neighborhood bar called Ernie's Interlude. Of course Ernie has been deceased for many years now, and the place is currently owned by his nephew, who lives out of town and takes little interest in the place. Ernie's sits in a little 4-business strip mall that has seen better days. A nail solon run by Vietnamese ladies, a smoke shop and late night liquor store with massive iron bars on the windows run by an East Indian are all neighbors of Ernie's. A broken down car wash is in the back, where Ernie's regular customers park in the evening out of sight of the street and neighbors, their vehicles hidden from spouses, old lovers and the late night cruising of police cars.

A few nights ago I found myself sitting at the bar in Ernie's. A U shaped affair with 20 or so stools around the bar and a few tables off to the side. There are the perennial photographs in cheap dusty frames hanging on the walls. Old photographs of the now long deceased Ernie and his many customers. Mostly people now forgotten, who played golf and tennis in various tournaments and events sponsored by Ernie's establishment. Small, cozy and quiet, with libations that are reasonable priced and most often the 3 working television sets are tuned to the latest sporting event. Occasionally a customer will put a few dollars into the new satellite system music center (jukebox) and play a slow country song or oldies from the sixties or seventies. The bartenders and even a few of the regulars are starting to recognize me, but I still feel obscure and comfortable. Ernie's Interlude is my kind of place.

It was well into the evening and dark outside. I had walked into Ernie's around 9:30 PM; it was now around midnight and time for me to leave. Walking to Ernie's from my house is not much of a problem, but walking home can sometimes be a challenge for one who has spent any amount of time consuming adult beverages. The drink I ordered at Ernie's cost $4.00; the same drink cost me $11.00 (a single shot) at the Riverview Plaza Hotel in Mobile Alabama during the reunion this year (2006).

I have to be very careful when walking home from Ernie's because I have to cross two, 2-lane city streets before walking into my neighborhood just a few blocks away. At times, the walk home can be a dangerous adventure. About half way home, there is this old bus bench that sits all alone near the roadway and next to the chain link fence that surrounds the now boarded up grocery store. There are several battered, rusted and long forgotten newspaper racks nearby and of course the area is littered with various amounts of trash and castoffs. It was cool and dark that evening, with few vehicles traveling along the normally busy street in front of me. I was really not in a hurry to go home, I walked out of Ernie's because I knew that I still could make it home in my current condition. About half way home, I took a seat on the old bus bench. Here I was, an inebriated lonely, middle age Vietnam veteran sitting on a bus bench in the dark, late at night, next to some junky abandoned and rusting newspaper racks, surrounded by trash, pondering my failures and difficulties in life.

A police car drove slowly by and the two young policemen inside gave me the once over but did not stop and continued on down the street. The area has quite a number of low rent and government subsidized apartments, so it is not unusual to see interesting characters walking along the street at various times of the day and night, although I happened to be the only character out on that particular evening.

My thoughts went back many years ago, when I too drove a big shiny police car around the same beat and along the same street. I was a young man, former Marine and Vietnam veteran and a survivor of the Siege at Khe Sanh just a few years before, feeling fortunate to have a job and knowing that I had already faced danger much worse than anything a policeman could possibly face. On the lookout for various thieves, robbers, drunks, drug dealers and unscrupulous characters who might be sitting on vacant old bus benches in front of boarded up grocery stores late at night waiting for the opportunity to attack the innocent, rob late night business establishments or take what did not belong to them. I was deeply pensive and found myself lonely, depressed and feeling worthless.

My thoughts went to my friend Tom Horchler who I had served with at Khe Sanh in 1967 and 1968, some 39 years ago. In 2003 Tom suggested that we attend the Khe Sanh Veterans Association Reunion to be held in Charleston, South Carolina. I would not know anyone at the reunion, but wanted to spend as much time with Tom as I could. In 2003 he was the first Khe Sanh veteran I had spoken to in 35years. I felt a real comradeship with him.

It was a truly rewarding experience to be able to meet and talk to so many Khe Sanh veterans in Charleston. I don't think I had been around so many really interesting people before in my life. It was clear that many had been attending these reunions for years. The respect and affection they had for one another was overwhelming. I am not a particularly garrulous person, but I tried to meet as many as I could. Neil Kenny, John Pessoni, Bruce Geiger, Dave Drake, Dennis Mannion, Erick Clark, John Rowland, Jim Wodecki, Tom Eichler, Milton McNeely, Nick Romanetz, Lloyd W. Scudder, Cliff Treese and Ron Shouse are just a few of the many I met at the reunion, each a hero to me and each with his own individual experience and prospective of that time in history. They were a completely fascinating group of individuals.

I found it interesting to observe how each interacted with the other. Some were with their families and others came with other veterans or by themselves. I noticed that Lloyd W. Scudder drew an unusual amount of attention from the other veterans. Many walked over to meet him and have a picture taken with him. There was seldom a time when he was not engaged in conversation with someone. I noticed the great love, respect and admiration so many had for this man. He of course obliged them all and was more than accommodating with their requests.

I also noticed that Mr. Scudder was missing his hand at the end of each arm. I made my way to Mr. Scudder and introduced myself, he was happy to extend his arm to me and acknowledge me. I told him this was my first reunion and that I was pleased to meet him. We exchanged some small talk, but shortly others had gathered around and it was time for me to move along and allow them to have some time and conversation with him.

Over the next several days, I think Mr. Scudder came to recognize me. Towards the end of the reunion, I had the occasion to sit down and talk to Mr. Scudder and he told me a fascinating story about his injuries.

Mr. Scudder was with Bravo Company, 1st Battalion of the 26th Marine Regiment, at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh in South Vietnam and was at Khe Sanh during the 77 day Siege that started on January 21, 1968. On February 25, 1968, 2/Lt Donald Jacques took Bravo Company across the wire located at the East end of Khe Sanh and into a horrific battle where numerous Marines were killed and few escaped the ambush. This event was later known as the Ghost Patrol. It just so happened that Mr. Scudder was visiting his brother at another base in Vietnam during the time that Bravo went across the wire and he returned to Khe Sanh with the gut wrenching feelings of loss and guilt that many such survivors carry in their hearts the rest of their lives.

When Mr. Scudder returned home from Vietnam he was assigned as a weapons instructor at the Marine Corps Camp Pendleton in California. One of his assignments was to instruct new Marines on the proper handling and throwing of the hand grenade. Mr. Scudder would accompany the new Marine into the grenade pit, no more than a hole in the ground, and instruct the Marine on how to hold the grenade, pull the pin enabling the safety spoon to be released when thrown, then to toss the grenade safely.

The Instructors where having problems with this particular batch of grenades and all of the instructors were apprehensive of their use. But in the Marine Corps, one does what he is ordered and the Marine Instructors carried on with their duties of instructing the new Marines, who would most certainly soon be on their way Vietnam.

Mr. Scudder was in the grenade pit with a young Marine and was giving him instructions on how to hold the grenade with the safety spoon against the palm, how to remove the pin and how to toss the grenade. He was standing directly in front of the Marine, instructing the Marine on how to place the grenade in one hand and how to remove the pin with the other hand, pull his arm back and toss the grenade. The young Marine managed to remove the safety pin on the grenade but then froze in place. Mr. Scudder placed both of his hands around the hand of the young Marine so the Marine would not drop the grenade or release the spoon. As Mr. Scudder turned his head to the right to call another instructor over to place the safety pin back into the grenade it suddenly and without cause exploded in his hands, killing the young Marine and severely injuring Mr. Scudder. As a result of the tremendous blast Mr. Scudder lost both hands, the use of his left eye, damaged several ribs and suffered severe internal injury.

Gravely injured, Mr. Scudder was then transported to Oaknoll Naval Hospital in Oakland California where he lay for over three months recovering from injuries that many men would have succumbed to. On more than one occasion an officer came into his hospital room and interrogated him, questions where asked why he mishandled or dropped the grenade. Mr. Scudder wondered if the Marine Corps was blaming him for the accident, and holding him accountable for the deadly explosion. Mr. Scudder was discharged from the Marine Corps upon his release from Oaknoll Hospital, his pay was placed into the front pocket of his trousers and he was transported by pickup truck to the bus terminal in downtown Oakland California.

The Marine Corps pickup that transported Mr. Scudder into Oakland, parked across the street from the bus terminal and the driver opened the door for Mr. Scudder and pointed to the terminal. Unable to see clearly he stumbled as best he could across the street and purchased a bus ticket home to Oregon. It was necessary for Mr. Scudder to ask the ticket agent behind the counter to remove money from the pocket of his trousers in order to pay for the bus ticket, Mr. Scudder told the ticket agent, "I don't have any hands."

Many years have passed since the accident, an accident which can be directly attributed to the Vietnam War. Training cycles were accelerated and shortened as young men were rushed to Vietnam. Munitions, weapons and equipment necessary for war were manufactured at a record pace. On occasion newly manufactured munitions would unexplainable explode, fail to explode or somehow malfunction. Poorly made weapons like the newly issued M-16 rifle were placed into the hands of Soldiers and Marines with the prior knowledge that the rifle had serious deficiencies. Weapons would most often fail to fire during critical periods of combat. Weapons failure was blamed on poor cleaning and maintenance by the very men who were issued this poorly manufactured rifle. Thousands of young men were killed and injured as the result of these failures. It was later revealed that the Department Of Defense had prior knowledge of the weapons potential for failure.

Through these many years, Mr. Scudder has tried many alternatives and ill fitting prosthetics provided by the Veterans Administration. After so many failures Mr. Scudder kind of gave up on the Veterans Administration and to a certain extent, I think the Veterans Administrating may have forgotten about Mr. Scudder. He has continued to persevere and endure these many years despite his injuries and the seemly lack of concern by the Veterans Administration. Mr. Scudder told me at this years Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion (2006) that the Veterans Administration was going to give him another try with something newly developed and he was looking forward to it's success.

It has been over 4 years since I first met Mr. Scudder, and I think about him every time I hear someone gripe or voice a complaint about an irrelevant event in their life. I think about a very brave man who faces real challenges each and every day, challenges most of us could never imagine. Mr. Scudder is popular at the Khe Sanh reunions, not because of his loss of limbs, but because of his bravery, inspiration and his perseverance.

Sitting on that old bus bench all alone in the dark after my departure from Ernie's Interlude, it was time for me to end my melancholy and leave. It was time for me to stop feeling lonely and sorry for myself, to stop feeling depressed and worthless. I opened up the door to my house, went in and went to bed where I knew I belonged. I was thankful for another day and so appreciative of the man who helped me to appreciate what I have. A man who was severely injured during the war in Vietnam while trying his best to instill a little knowledge of combat and survival to someone else, a man who gave all that he could give, Lloyd W. Scudder, the bravest and toughest Marine I know.

Lloyd W. Scudder also served as the Sgt. At Arms of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. This article was written with his permission.

KHE SANH VETERAN "SOUNDS OFF" CORRECTS TELEVISION SHOW

From: Michael Preston
To: Show, "War Stories"
Subject: Inaccurate reporting

Your Fox News is absolutely the best thing on television. I love war stories by Colonel Oliver North. He gets a giant Semper Fi from me. While watching a recent issue of war stories, I realized that some of the pictures were not of the place being featured. Is it normal to insert file footage to embellish a historical documentary? Or was this an honest mistake? The story of "Hamburger Hill" contained photos I recognized as place I am intimately familiar with, Khe Sanh! Two of the pictures were of the ammo dump blowing up at Khe Sanh during the Siege. They were taken the morning of 21 January 1968. What are they doing in an Army film about Hamburger Hill? Another picture of a Marine looking up out of a fighting hole was also taken at Khe Sanh. It was a Marine with kilo Company 3/26, where I was.

The picture of the ammo dump exploding with 2 marines in the fore ground was taken by Robert Ellison. This photo is in a book "The Vietnam Experience'', 1968 by Clark Dougan, Stephen Weiss Boston Publishing Co. pg. 60-61. Library of congress catalog card number 83-70672 if you would care to look it up. We have had so much smoke blown at us over the years it would be heart breaking to find out that nothing has changed, just more spin by the media and more bullshit. I would sure be disappointed if the Colonel knew. I would like to hear from you before I send this email to any one else, like The 3rd Marine Division Association, Khe Sanh Veterans, The National Museum of the Marine Corps and The Heritage Center., etc.

This is not the first time that the struggle at Khe Sanh has been used to glorify and embellish other stories and those of us who sacrificed. I do not like it at all. I bet Colonel Lownds would be pissed if he knew, maybe he does, I don't know. All the best

Mr. Preston:

First, let me thank you for taking the time to write in and thank you for your support of War Stories. Let me reassure you that this was an "honest mistake." I can personally attest to the days we spend at the National Archives looking for materials and the hours we spend in the edit room examining footage frame by frame in an attempt to identify people, places and things. Unfortunately, our average is not perfect.

I can offer you no more explanation than this. But I can promise you everyone who worked on that show has been made aware of your e-mail and they will be that much more diligent in the future because of it. Finally, you may be familiar with Col. John Ripley (USMC RET). We recently returned to Dong Ha, with Col. Ripley, for an episode on the Easter Offensive in 1972 and his role in stopping the NVA advance. It is set to air October 1st. As a Marine I thought you would be interested.

Again, thank you very much for writing in and thank you even more for your service to America.

All the Best,

SHORT ROUNDS

Welcome To Delta Company

By Rod Jordan D Co 1/26

In April 1968, the Tet offensive was winding down, and our battalion was still at Khe Sanh, but would be withdrawn shortly. When I heard I was going there I thought this is great, I just arrived in country and will probably be dead by next week. As it happened I never made it there. I and Larry Kautz were treated to some incoming mortar and rocket fire as we landed at Dong Ha. I still remember the pilot saying when the ramp went down "jump out, I'm not landing." We looked at each other and said "what the hell is he talking about." We found out very quickly.

After about a week of truck convoy duty in Quang Tri we finally boarded choppers to join our battalion. When we arrived we were told to stow our equipment. We then went to the beach to meet our new company, Delta. The day was beautiful and the white sand and water made you think you were at a resort. I'm thinking, maybe I will stay here my entire tour, Yea right! We met most of the company that day, Most were lying on the beach or swimming and some playing football. They deserved those few days. They had earned it.

The company did not stay there long. We went out on a chopper rescue one night and almost got our asses blown up by the Navy. The third platoon was gone for awhile and when they got back we were about to embark on a journey none of us could have foreseen. The first week of May will always live in my memory. In my first fire fight I saw 10 men die and many more wounded. It was bad. I was a new guy and scared. But you learn fast in war and you learn to harden yourself even when a good friend goes down. For our battalion and our company, the summer of 68 was a hard test of courage, and shear will to carry on. Only the guys who lived it will understand. We lost many Marines in those months. The ones like me who survived also did our country, and the Marine Corps proud. I knew many good men over there and I miss them. One man who inspired me was Sergeant Henson. He died in June of 68. That was a sad day for all of us. He was All Delta!

The Search For. . . "Corpsman Jim"

By Patricia Naple September 21, 2006

My husband, Louis (Louie) Naple, Jr., a Marine Corps veteran, served in Vietnam 1966--1967. He was in I Corps and traveled to Dong Ha, Quang Tri, Phu Bai and Khe Sanh. Over some period of time during our marriage, Louie would share pieces of an event that occurred while he was in Khe Sanh. The details of this event have never left my mind.

The event took place in early March, 1967. Khe Sanh was hit with extensive mortar and rocket fire, leaving several Marines wounded and some killed. Louie ran around ordering (carrying) some men into foxholes, bringing others to the battalion-aid-station driving a jeep under fire, and then assisted "Corpsman Jim" in treating the wounds of other fellow Marines.

The next day "Corpsman Jim" told my husband that he had informed the officer-in -charge about Louie's bravery while under fire. However, the officer never filled out any paperwork, thus the events of that evening were never recorded and Louie never received recognition for his actions of that night.

As the years wore on I decided that I wanted to try to rectify this situation for Louie. I wondered if we could find "Corpsman Jim." Louie did not know his last name, but remembered that he was from Newark. When I got a computer in 2000 I began to search for "Corpsman Jim." What follows is the story of my six year journey through websites, e-mails, correspondence, and conversation. . . all to find the person who witnessed Louie's bravery at Khe Sanh.

Whenever I would meet someone from the military, I would ask if they were a Vietnam Veteran, their years of duty in Vietnam and their branch of service. Then I would proceed to tell them of my search for a particular Navy Corpsman. One encounter was with a gentleman named Francis "Fran" Elliott who had been a Navy veteran, and I lit up at the prospect of him knowing/finding "Corpsman Jim." He provided me with many websites to check, as well as newspapers and magazines I could write to and place ads in their Searching For sections. I found out that this Navy Veteran was heavily involved with all sorts of activities in Worcester's veteran community, and decided that Louie should meet him. Louie now is actively involved in many such activities related to being a veteran, including the Massachusetts Vietnam Veterans Memorial; the Veterans of Foreign Wars; the Marine Corps League and other local groups.

I began to submit information to various veterans' websites, but they were unable to respond with any information regarding "Corpsman Jim," probably because I wasn't able to supply a last name. I even e-mailed the Today Show to no avail. I also e-mailed many veterans and in the process talked about things in their lives from the past (serving our country) as well as more recent happenings in their lives. Some veterans told me that although they'd received medals, that they'd put them away in draws and forgot about them and the war. Nonetheless they were anxious to help me in my search for "Corpsman Jim," however difficult it might be for them.

One night at the computer, I typed in Khe Sanh and up came the Khe Sanh web site. Jim (Jimbo) Wodecki was the first person with whom I corresponded. I learned from Jimbo that he was with my husband at Khe San, and that they both shared the same details of that evening in March 1967. Jimbo didn't know "Corpsman Jim's" last name.

Still working without a last name, Jimbo told me about a reunion that the Khe Sanh Organization was going to have in 2002 at which they would be honoring Corpsmen. Here was my opportunity to see if I could finally locate "Corpsman Jim." Louie and I talked it over and we decided to go to Texas and see what the Khe Sanh Reunion was all about and also to see if we could find our Corpsman.

We attended the reunion, but the Corpsman we were looking for was not there. Louie was delighted to meet Jimbo Wodecki again after some thirty plus years. Jimbo was very helpful in obtaining more information for us about "Corpsman Jim."

When we arrived home, Jimbo had e-mailed us the roster of I Corps. The last name on it was J.M. Mitchell- MOS 8404 (Corpsman). Shortly thereafter, Jimbo sent me a copy of the Unit Diary. The last name on the Unit Diary was James M. Mitchell. Jimbo e-mailed Louie and said that this was the "Corpsman Jim" we'd been searching for.

Finally. . . we had a last name, but the struggle to locate and communicate with him was far from over. As I mentioned earlier, my husband remembered that "Corpsman Jim" was from Newark. Living on the East Coast, I just assumed it must be Newark, New Jersey. Much later we discovered that it was Newark, Ohio.

I continued the search and even called a few Mitchells, but no luck. Another contact that Jimbo gave me was a Master Gunnery Sergeant Lawrence McCarthy. Actually I had e-mailed this man many times before, and although he was very helpful, we were unable to locate Corpsman Jim Mitchell. One day while watching the History Channel on TV, a man was talking about the Vietnam War, and discussing things that I'd heard about. Suddenly his name flashed on the screen - - Master Gunnery Sergeant Lawrence McCarthy. was watching the person to whom I'd sent so many e-mails. Soon thereafter, Louie and I were able to meet Larry in person at the Khe Sanh reunion in Charlotte, South Carolina.

As time went on, we continued to visit the Khe Sanh web site with the hopes of eventually obtaining some small piece of information that would help in our search for "Corpsman Jim." Then, a break came when a Mike Fishbaugh posted a list of Corpsmen's names on the Khe Sanh website. I e-mailed Mike and asked if he had ever heard of James M. Mitchell. He said no. However, I e-mailed him explaining why I was looking for this particular Corpsman in the hopes that he might in some small way join us in the search. And he did.

Mike Fishbaugh wrote to the National Personnel Records Center in St. Louis, MO where he forwarded the information about James M. Mitchell, and they responded, providing Information Releasable under the Freedom of Information Act.

That's when Louie and I learned that Corpsman Jim's Newark was in Ohio and not New Jersey. Mike Fishbaugh and I both found an address and phone number. Mike called James Mitchell, and I wrote a letter. However, neither of us received a response. Mike told me that sometimes veterans do not want to be reminded about their experiences, but, in my heart, I was hoping that "Corpsman Jim" did.

I told a fellow worker Rich Breagy, a former Marine and Vietnam Veteran about my long search for James M. Mitchell. Rich said that he had a corpsman friend in Vermont and that he would e-mail him over the weekend to see where I might go to continue my search. By Monday evening I had obtained 2 websites. I e-mailed both of them with my story, and one responded. To my surprise, the response read. . . . I think I have located him." I could not believe it! Finally!

However, because of the Privacy Act, he could not give me Corpsman Jim's address, but that I could provide him with mine, and he would forward it to him. Instead, I chose to give him my husband's name, address, and telephone number. Then anxiously awaited a response via telephone, computer, e-mail, or snail-mail.

On March 25, 2006, 1 called home from work to check my phone messages. One message was a voice that said. . . "Sergeant Naple, I am your Corpsman that was with you in Khe Sanh back in 1967." I couldn't believe what I was hearing!

Naturally, the first thing I did was to call my husband Louie to give him the wonderful news. Louie was speechless then finally said. . . "I just can't believe it!" I asked him to wait until I got home from work so that we could listen to the message together. We did, and then Louie called and spoke with Corpsman James M. Mitchell that evening. I haven't yet met Corpsman Jim, but 1 feel connected. He's been on my mind for 6 years.

Jim said that he never forgot that night, or my husband. He hadn't spoken about it in nearly 40 years. Jim had retired at 20 years from the Navy as a Chief Corpsman and moved from Ohio to a Southern state a few years ago. Louie and I are planning to visit with Jim on our drive to Florida next vacation.

It still remains to be seen whether Louie will be decorated for his bravery that night at Khe Sanh. But, it is the story of a six-year journey to find "Corpsman Jim" that is so important to tell. The reunions,.the veterans we met and those we communicated with through e-mails, phone calls, in person, and the stories about their life-experiences that they shared with me. To all of them, and veterans everywhere, I would like to say. . . Your service to your country was more than just medals and accolades and you didn't wear the uniform for the exorbitant amounts of money that you were paid. But, what you wear on your chests, are your credentials, your resumes. They're emblems of the quality of your service to your country. Thank you so much for all that you have done for us. God Bless.

SHORT ROUNDS

MY FIRST BUT NOT MY LAST REUNION

About 15 years ago, a man came through my town trying to sign up people for the MOPH. We talked about Vietnam and where and with whom we had served. When I told him that I was at Khe Sanh during the Siege he told me about a reunion the Khe Sanh Veterans hold each year. Like everything else I've, done since Vietnam, I, procrastinated about it. I didn't join the MOPH and I didn't try to get any information about the reunion. Like most of you, I did not want to think about it or talk about it. I couldn't help but think about it, but mostly I just suffered in silence. I'd lost touch with the friends I'd made over there and they had lost touch with me. Then 5 or 6 months ago, somebody told me about the Khe Sanh web page. I went on line, entered my name and low and behold, the next day I had an e-mail from John Pessoni. He told me about the reunion in Mobile. I hadn't seen Big John or anyone I served with in 38 years. Don't get me wrong, I've probably met 200 people who said they were at Khe Sanh they must have been with you guys because they sure as hell weren't with us. I think they are, what Neil Kenny would call "Wannabes." I went to the reunion I can't begin to tell you how much it meant to visit with my old friends, Clyde Phillips, David Critchley, Wally Hoffman and of course, my good friend John Pessoni. Combat Engineers are like red-headed step children. We were sent out in 3 or 4 man teams to support the infantry units.

We didn't get to know a lot of the guys we served with because we were moved around so much and speaking from personal experience, guys in 3/4, 2/9, 1/9 and 1/26 sometimes weren't around long enough to get acquainted. And I guess we weren't around very long either. I got to meet a lot guys at the reunion that I would never have known had I not gone. Neil, Fish and I took a trip to Waveland and Bay St. Louis, Mississippi to see the total devastation caused by Katrina. This was my first reunion, but as I told John and Neil, as long as I'm physically able, I won't miss another one.

I told my shrink at the VA that I slept better those 4 or 5 nights than I had in 38 years. I felt as safe as if I was in Mamma's arms. I love you guys. Thank you for having the Reunion and thank you John for staying on me to make sure I came. It did a world of good for me. I won't miss another one. By the way, I have since joined the Khe Sanh Vets Organization and the MOPH.

VIETNAM VETERAN THANKS REDWOOD CITY FOR SUPPORT

San Mateo County Times 12 August 2006

On July 24, Sgt. Vince Rios, USMC (Ret.) of South San Francisco presented the City Council of Redwood City a signed copy of the. book, "The Names Not On The Wall'" written by John "Doc"Hutchings.

A close friend of Doc Hutchings, and the only Vietnam veteran from San Mateo County , portrayed in the book, Rios expressed his thanks to the City of Redwood City for its long standing support for the individuals who have served in the United States

Armed Forces

The book, which describes Hutchings' experience as a combat corpsman in Vietnam is a vivid and compelling story. It is made all the more real for the local community as Redwood City is described in a poem On the books jacket as "The Town That Cared" Hutchings and Rios both belonged to the 1st Marine Division . Their unit, Alpha Company 1St Marine Division 5Th Marine Regiment, was adopted by Redwood City in 1981.Hutchings on many occasions, saved the lives of many marines, including Rios who was injured six days prior to the end of his second tour of duty in Vietnam. An enemy explosive device vaporized both of his legs, left his right arm dangling from his shoulder and partially amputated his left index and ring finger.

Rios was awarded three Purple Hearts, being shot twice in previous actions, and Two Bronze Stars with "V" Device for Heroic Achievement. He has rebuilt his life and dedicated himself to obtaining four college degrees (including two Master's) all the while working to serve veterans. He has also been presented a myriad of other awards for his military duty and civilian community service. Redwood City's role in the author's Vietnam experience stems from the seriously divided nation to which he, and many others returned, having risked their lives to do their duty and serve their country.

Many were greeted not with thanks, but largely with scorn and contempt. This devastating demoralizing experience was repeated throughout the country. In the midst of that controversy, "one town in Northern California wanted to do what a nation was afraid to do: welcome its warriors home at last", according to the book. That town was Redwood City, which invited the 1St Marine Division to be honored for its service by taking part in the 4th of July parade. Members of this unit, including Rios, still today march in the parade.

Redwood City also continues to support our armed services through Yellow Ribbon Redwood City (www.yellowribbonrwc.com), a community based committee of volunteers who have come together to offer support to local deployed servicemen/women and their families.

"Doc" Hutchings closed his book-jacket poem with these words:
"Much older now, we'll march once more.
Our formation not so pretty.
We'll proudly salute the town that cared…
God bless you, Redwood City.

MEMOIRS

The End

By Craig W. Tourte

It seems as if there is always an identifiable beginning and end to most battles. The sound of the bugle, the first and last shot fired, the raising of a flag, the lone survivor, the eerie silence, the rush of the breeze and the lingering smell of death.

The presenting of medals and awards, the arrival of the general or politician to take credit for the victory (never for the defeat) confirms that the event has ended. Those involved in the battle are quickly forgotten while the credit is accepted by too many who had little involvement in the event itself. Some even represent that they participated during the most brutal and terrifying moments, but confirmation of their presence years later, is often difficult and embarrassing.

The Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh started on January 21, 1968, when at 0530 Hrs the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) rained hundred of rounds of mortar, artillery and rockets into the base interior destroying the main ammunition dump. And an estimated battalion of NVA attacked K/3/26 on Hill 861. "After penetrating the southwestern portion of the Marines perimeter, the enemy was repulsed leaving 47 dead..."

The nightmare that was the Siege at Khe Sanh officially lasted for 77 days and nights, ending on April 1, 1968, after the launching of Operation PEGASUS when, "...Marines from 2/1 and 2/3 attacked west from CA Lu along Route 9. Elements of 3d Dde, 1st ACD conduct helo assaults into LZ Mike and Cates and a joint engineer task forced begin repairs of Rout 9 from Ca Lu to Khe Sanh." Although the opening of Route 9 from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh most often signifies the end of the Siege, the base itself continued to absorb hundreds of daily incoming rounds fired by the enemy hidden in the surrounding hills.

For the lowest ranked Marine, one day was the same as the next. I certainly recall when the Siege started and heard the first rocket pass over my head as it traveled west to east. I am a little unclear when the Siege ended. The official date of April 1st is insignificant to me. I have no recall of the blowing of the bugle, the raising of the flag or that the battle, Siege or danger was over. April 1st, 1968, was much like the past 77 days, and would be like the next 17 to me, until April 18, when we withdrew by convoy, driving eastbound on Highway 9 to Dong Ha and then to Quang Tri.

What I do remember, although I don't recall the exact date, is that there was something remarkably different about this day. I was standing in the trench line looking south. It was relatively warm that afternoon when I heard the obvious sound of a helicopter in the distance. I was accustomed to the sound of helicopters at Khe Sanh and observed numerous models. The strangely odd and dated Sikorsky Choctaw UH 34 made frequent landings into the FOB base located south of my location. The huge CH 53 heavy lift Sea Stallion would fly over and land at the airstrip, often slinging cargo under its belly. The CH 46 Chinook with its double rotors were always awesome sights to behold. The UH-1 Huey seemed to make it presents known every day at Khe Sanh, coming and going with troops and wounded, a life savor to so many. After 8 months at Khe Sanh I was able to recognize the unique sound each helicopter model made, a sound I can to this day often identify and a sound that on occasion brings a chill to me and causes me to duck down just a little.

This afternoon the sound of this particular helicopter was different. Clearly identifiable as a fast moving, low flying helicopter, the sound was not a model I could identify. This helicopter was the bugle I could not hear, the flag I did not see, the breeze I did not feel. It was the last shot fired I did not hear and it was the eerie silence after the battle. The sight of this helicopter was the signal for me that the Siege was over.

I could hear it rushing up towards me and suddenly it passed over my head, much like the first NVA rocket did months before. It was fast, long and slender and looked like a snake as it flashed overhead making a wide banking turn to the south before it turned once again and headed over the base. I remember someone saying in a whisper "Cobra." I was stunned; it was the most beautiful sight I had ever seen and I could not take my eyes off it. I watched as the Cobra circled overhead, daring the NVA to molest it. Not imagining that a sane enemy would launch an attack against such an awesome machine. Around and around it flew, as Huey's and other helicopters followed it into Khe Sanh. Clearly the Cobra was the king of the battlefield.

On April 8, 1968, the 2/7 Calvary arrived at Khe Sanh. The United States Army had arrived (what took you so long) with all of its new weapons, lots of troops, new green uniforms, plenty of food, and a magnificent helicopter called COBRA.

Craig,

Nice post on the board. I'm just reminding you that 1/1 was part of the group opening up highway 9 into Khe Sanh. Parts of the unit stayed until the base was closed in the later part of July.

Cobra was a neat looking bird--to bad it had a 'dead zone' where it couldn't see and therefore lots got taken down. All you needed was some gunner not worried about the second cobra which should be covering the first--watching that blind zone---but, hell, a grunt team for a cobra was a great trade for the NVA.

First cobra I saw was at Camp Evans in early Feb '68 when the 1st Air Cav got the birds. They said they were the first unit in Vietnam to get them--could be since I know other Army flying units always said the "Cav" got the gear first. A point of interest was that one, if not the, best pilot at that time had been an enlisted man in the navy (air wing navy) and wanted to fly but without a degree he could not in the Navy or the Marine Corps. His background made him a sure thing for the Army. He became their first Cobra pilot, working around Hue during Tet. I saw that unit lose over 20 helos in one day, and had them all replaced in one day.

Terry Charbonneau

Craig,

You may share my story with anyone. Thanks for asking.

Funny, how your story made me think of that time and place. I was part of a convoy that was bringing units of 1/1 back to the Phu Bai area from Quang Tri/Camp Evans area. We'd been at it a few days and had been told how important it was to maintain the time schedule. No reason why it was important, but during my 13 month tour it was the only time there was such stress put on the movement of units. At my level that is. I was in charge of a convoy the first day going through Hue City and all that but on the second day I became the 'trail officer'. We became delayed in the Tet celebration which was on- going in the streets of the city.

We had no security, no extra drivers, only one Marine to a truck-except for the gun trucks with the .50cal and naturally a radio for me. So when some Army LRRPS wanted a ride to Camp Evans I was happy to allow their rifles to join us. While stuck in a traffic jam in Hue the Army guys wanted to go get some booze. I allowed them but said that if we started to move and they weren't there; that was their problem. They went looking and came to a house with a long front yard that had a large table and guests all having a good time. The GIs asked if they could buy some beer. The young men there said yes, they'd sell some. But, the oldest man there (appeared that) and at the head of the table said: "NO wine number ONE," and gave them each a full large glass of wine. He refused their money and wouldn't let the young men have it. Wished the GIs a happy Tet. They made the convoy and slept to Camp Evans.

We were late getting to Evans and didn't have 'full' efforts loading the vehicles and therefore had to leave ten trucks there (with the junior officer-me). That was the night Tet started and those trucks with all their supplies sat until weeks later when we could finally get back to Phu Bai---the saddest part is that Marines had to go into the Hue fighting without helmets, etc because they were on the truck at Evans.

To this day I question what I could have done different to get one or two more trucks on that last convoy. And, yes I have answers of what I could have done. The answers aren't just being more of an asshole with people (I did some of that) but different decisions which affected the outcome. Now, you know one of my memories--a motor t memory.

Some of the other stories of that period are funny, like me being the senior Marine. A 2d Lt out of school at Quantico for 4 1/2 months and representing all the Marines stuck at Camp Evans. I met each day with an Army General. He was nice and understanding of our situation.

You get all that reading for opening up some of my memories. The next time we drove past the house were the wine was obtained it had graves in the court yard and many holes in the home and walls around the yard. Hue was the only place were I heard a Vietnamese kid say thank you for something after begging for food. At that time they were starving and would eat whatever was given. The begging was a con and they'd go nuts if you opened it.

DANGER IS WHAT YOU MAKE IT

By Jim Dalto K Co 3/26

Life on Hill 861 was not easy, comfortable, or safe. Exhaustion, hunger, and thirst were constant companions. Our days were filled with working parties. We did a lot of digging, deepening the trench line from what was referred to as "knee deep" to an average depth of six feet. Chopping fighting holes and bunkers into the parapet of the trench line, filling thousands of sandbags and empty wooden ammo cases to reinforce our positions. Digging sleeping holes into the back side of the trench; not that we got to use them much. We dug until our hands blistered and our arms, shoulders, and backs screamed with pain.

Working on the wire in front of the trench line was worse. When the company was hit that first night, 20-21 Jan 1968, there were minimal segments of wire in front of the lines. By the time we were done, we had a hundred feet out from our lines simply stuffed with every type of obstacle that we could think of, with offset gates throughout so the enemy could not run straight at us. Barbed wire, concertina wire &, razor wire, strung from ankle height to something a man would have to pole vault to get over.

As obstacles went up, we would string all sorts of special little surprises into the tangles. Trip flares, wired grenades with smoke grenade fuses in them. Many claymores and various homemade booby traps made out of empty plastic mortar rounds stuffed with C-4 and machine gun belt links, hooked into trip wires or claymore hell boxes. We even worked up some Foo-Gas devices wrapped around a Willy Peter mortar round on the front. All of it hooked to a claymore hellbox and set to cover strategic approach routes. Everybody wanted to get their hands on one of the hellboxes.

Working out on the wire was extremely dangerous. It later became progressively more dangerous every day we were exposed out in the open. NVA Mortar Hogs, never, ever, passed up an opportunity to rain misery down on us. We were also trapped by our own devices protecting our positions. You could not dive for cover when incoming enemy fire hit for fear of landing on one of our own booby trap devices. All you could do was crouch down and listen to your hole pucker to the max.

Bad as working on the wire was, re-supply runs were worse. Our miniscule LZ was nothing but a bulls eye. When they dropped a round down their mortar tube we knew it would hit the LZ. Every man on the base knew that, we called it the Death Race.

The worst part of catching a re-supply detail was the wait. Whoever was unlucky enough to catch that detail had to quietly gather in the trench line below the LZ and wait. Everyone knew that once a chopper committed to an approach, the NVA would begin dropping rounds. We knew we had at most, 30 seconds to come out of the trench, run to the LZ, grab something and beat it back to the relative safety of the trench. Everyone had seen a buddy shredded up there. A death race Indeed.

Personally, it took every ounce of courage I had to take that first step in the death race. Once you started moving, you were too busy to worry. We had to do it. Without those supplies we would be in a world of hurt. So we did it again and again, terrified beyond comprehension, doing our job nonetheless. To me it was the very definition of courage and heroism, and every trooper on the hill did it.

We couldn't even go to the bathroom in safety. Urination was no problem. We simply took a bunch of those ubiquitous, empty, plastic mortar shell containers, threw away the screw-on tops, poked holes in the other end with pick blade on an entrenching tool, and then buried it at an angle in the side of the trench. If you had to use your bowels it was a different matter. There was a small outhouse built on a level portion of the hill but it was completely exposed. It seemed like the NVA had an observer that told their mortar teams when someone went inside, and they would immediately conduct a fire mission. You learned to make it a quick head call and get back to the safety of the trench line. I would always try to hold any bowel movement until darkness fell. Cleaning our only "head" was a nasty job usually given to those who had screwed up and were being punished. It was commonly referred to as "burning Shitters." I would pray that the NVA would shell the position when it was my turn to clean the head. But they knew it was a lousy job and they actually wanted us to suffer through it.

One time one of the Marines used JP-4 instead of Diesel fuel while performing this duty. He soon found out that JP-4 was more volatile than Diesel fuel. He was blown backwards and his eyebrows and eyelashes were burned off, and he was covered with fecal matter. After our corpsman determined he had no serious injury he broke into hysterical laughter, as did the rest of the platoon. Since there was no extra water for a bath you can imagine what the poor Marine had to endure. Fellow Marines stayed down wind of him threatening him each time he drew near their position. We all felt sorry for him, but you just had to laugh at his predicament. Even our Platoon commander found humor in the accident, commenting "that marine was squared away and is the most clean shaven one on the hill."

Against The Odds

To the eastside shore, did draw me, to the eastside shores, of unknown forces did I go?
Bound to a future shape, where my ancestors before me, to a place called Vietnam.
And we marched to someone else's drum, and as the storms rose up, of the demonic, who's eyes will shame you, down the barrel of my gun, I will name you one by one.
Day by day, my brothers marched to war, yet never to know what we were fighting for.
Was it to complete desires, worldly gain? designed for worldly men,
We were masters of the harp, with ears and hands to lend, soldiers come and go, for the love of thee, fighting, and dieing to be free,
They said "the parties over now,"
As the curtain came down,
It is not enough to just, remember
Or do for others as we weep,
Do we weep for ourselves or those departed,
Only to find ourselves where we started,
Only in forgiveness will healing come,
And may never be realized by some.
To linger in a war past gone,
Will never allow one to find home,
It is not always be what we die for,
But what we live for

John Ortiz points to the floor of his Wichita home. He knows now it is safe to walk upon, he says. It won't collapse or blow up. But it took years for Ortiz to understand that his own floor won't kill him. On Hill 881 South during the Vietnam War, nothing felt safe. Ortiz hugged that hill for 77 days, from Dec. 26, 1967, until April 1968, his clothes rotting, rats skittering across his face at night, shrapnel flying, friends dying.

But he and 400 or so other Marines managed to hold onto the hill during the Tet Offensive and preserve the nearby base at Khe Sanh. An exhibit on Hill 881 South is part of a the new National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Va., which was dedicated Friday. It is an "immersion" exhibit, meaning it re-creates the surface and atmospheric conditions of the area, and includes a panoramic mural of the surrounding terrain. Ortiz, 57, doesn't need to be immersed in the area again, but he and his family will visit the museum next week. They didn't attend Friday's dedication, choosing instead to join a reunion next week of more than 200 Marines who fought on the hill.

KSV John Ortiz Holds the Hat he wore on Hill 881S in 67-68.

A Vietnamese phrase book that Ortiz used on the hill is one of the artifacts on display. Ortiz says he is thrilled, even overwhelmed, at being a part of the museum. But he doesn't feel personally connected to the exhibit, he says. It is not about him, he says. "To me it's about all the people who were there and all the people who supported us," Ortiz says. "Even the museum, it's still not about that hill or Khe Sanh. It's about every single Marine that ever had anything to do with Vietnam."

Ortiz and the others didn't know the strategic importance of the hill at the time. He was just a kid then, an 18-year-old lance corporal, a communications specialist who manned a telephone and radio and coordinated mortar fire. Hill 881 South was the farthest outpost of all the hills ringing the Khe Sanh base. It was near Laos, only a mile from the Ho Chi Minh trail. If 881 South fell, the enemy would overrun the other hills and be able to fire at will into the base, which was down in the valley. When the enemy failed to take the hill, it abandoned the plan.
Ed Note: The distance to the border was further and direct fire into the KSB is incorrect.

Of the 400 Marines manning the outpost during the siege, 44 died. They were under constant attack from mortars, rockets, artillery and small arms fire. They lived in rat-infested bunkers and trenches on minimal C-rations and rationed canteen water. Ortiz wrapped himself like a mummy at night because the rats ran over him to get to the tins of C-rations hanging behind his head. Their canteen water was only for drinking. A Marine risked being court-martialed if he used it to wash or shave.

Ortiz showered twice in his 77 days on the hill -- when it rained enough to rinse soap off his body. Hygiene wasn't the worst problem. "When you're on the hill," Ortiz says, "you don't know what's going to happen. Every day, every step, every breath, every movement for all that time, you are watchful. "Your antenna went up and stayed up," he says. "To this day." Ortiz never was physically wounded, even though rounds of shrapnel frequently struck near his bunker, flew into the doorway and bounced around inside. "It's a miracle anybody got off that hill without some sort of physical injury," he says.

Ortiz had received training in basic Vietnamese, so he served as a translator during prisoner interrogations. Interrogations were brief because 881 South was a just a way station for prisoners. What he remembers most about the interrogations is giving food to one of the prisoners. Not just any food, but a highly coveted pound cake. The time he was most afraid was when he was to be taken off the hill. He knew the hill. Everything beyond it was unknown territory, he says. Ortiz remembers flying off the hill to Khe Sanh, which was still under attack, then to relatively safe Quang Tri. There, he kissed the tarmac and joined other Marines in throwing his rotted clothing onto a bonfire.

After showering, putting on fresh clothes and dining on his first warm meal in months, Ortiz heard incoming rockets that killed several of the hill survivors. "That's the way it was," he says. "It's the same with Iraq. You see a person today, and tomorrow they're gone." Ortiz arrived home in the midst of hostile anti-war sentiment. A few people asked him questions about the war, but then dropped it. Girls wouldn't date him. Boys laughed at his Marine haircut. So Ortiz swallowed the war and kept his experiences to himself.

Eventually that silence exploded inside him. He became ill with anxiety and suffered frequent panic attacks. He began receiving counseling for post-traumatic stress disorder in 1992, and it took four years to deal with the worst of it. Ortiz worked full time at the Mid-America All-Indian Center, where, even though he is Mexican-American, he rose to executive director. But he left the center in 1998 when the pressures of the position triggered a relapse into anxiety, mood swings, sleeplessness and nightmares. Ortiz hasn't had a steady full-time job for 10 years. But he's made it financially by doing a mix of small, temporary jobs and some consulting work while living on Veterans benefits that increased as his disability ratings increased. His wife, Pam, worked full-time for a cosmetology supply firm until she left last year to care for her ill father. Ortiz, who has a master's degree in sociology from Wichita State University, wants to work full-time again as a counselor to veterans.

For fun, he is a drummer with a band, "The Neons," and has an online business buying, selling and restoring drums. He and Pam have three grown children and four grandchildren. They make up for all the negative experiences he has endured, he says. His feelings about Veterans Day change from year to year. Some years he's into it. Other years he prefers not to think about it. His feelings about this week's reunion are mixed, as well. It will be a bittersweet time. He feels a close, family bond with the Marines he fought with, but the memories they share aren't pleasant. And they all feel the way he does about being part of the new museum, he says. It's an honor, but it's not about them. "Nobody feels like a hero," Ortiz says. "We feel like survivors."

ANOTHER KSV IN THE NEWS
Milford man to reunite with Fellow Marines

By Amelia Skimin
Staff Writer

It could have been another Alamo.

In 1968, about 6,000 American Marines faced 20,000 North Vietnamese soldiers at the battle of Khe Sanh. At the end of the battle, the United States proved victorious. Thousands of North Vietnamese soldiers were dead, as were a few hundred Americans. More than 400 American Marines were wounded.

Among the wounded was 19-year-old Kenneth Warner, now a Milford resident. He'd arrived in Vietnam the previous year and became a squad leader for second squad, first platoon, India Company, 3RD Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment.

After being wounded, Warner eventually made it to an evacuation point and was evacuated to the Khe Sanh Combat Base by helicopter. From there, he was sent to a hospital in DaNang then to the U.S.S. Sanctuary, a hospital ship.

Once he had healed sufficiently, he returned to combat, back to Hill 881 South, where he'd been stationed before. He was there for nearly a month before receiving his orders home.

In the years since, Warner has often thought about the men with whom he served, wondering what happened to them. Many, like him, were only teenagers at the time. Later this month, he'll be able to stop wondering. Next weekend Warner, his wife, Donna, son, Jesse and daughter, Margo will be in Virginia to join his company for a reunion to coincide with the opening of the Marine Corps Museum. More than 220 Marines will attend.

"I'm anxious to go," Warner said. "There's people, a couple of names I've thought of for 38 years." At the reunion, the members of India Company will be joined by the Purple Foxes, the Marine helicopter squadron responsible for getting members of India Company up and down their hill.

The Marine Corps Museum will feature a Marine battle for each major United States war. The Vietnam War will be represented by the battle of Khe Sanh. The exhibit entrance will be a Purple Fox helicopter, with actual voice recordings playing in the background. The air in the exhibit will mimic the temperature and humidity of the battle.

In addition to visiting the museum, the reunion will include a visit to the Vietnam Memorial. "This is something I've never been able to do," said Warner, of the visit. It was only about two years ago that he was ready to see it. Until last year, Warner didn't know the full significance of the battle of Khe Sanh, particularly Hill 881 South. It was actually his son who found out.

As a senior at Milford High School, Jesse had spent some time talking to Marine recruiters. When he mentioned to the recruiters that his father had been in India Company, 26TH Marines, the response from the recruiters was surprising. It turned out that the actions of the Marines on Hill 881 South is taught to new Marines as part of the Corps' history.

When Jesse told his father, Warner decided to check it out for himself and found a Web site devoted to the "Warriors of Hill 881S," maintained by Col. William Dabney, Warner's commander. It was on the site that Warner learned about the museum and the reunion.

"It was just something that went on in my life. I never realized its significance," Warner said.

6-7-67

By Steven Wiese

I find myself today thinking back about my time in Vietnam, so I'd like to ask for a little help, on June 7 1967, I was involved in a patrol that went off of Hill 881. There were many men killed and wounded that day. I had been in country for several months at that time this was my first real firefight, what I would actually call a battle. During the fight I pretty much fired off all the ammunition I had, the machine gun team had been killed so I picked up the M-60, not that I really wanted it. I just remember laying on the trigger and spraying the side of the Hill, if I saw muzzle flash I'd fire in that direction, there was chaos on the Hill men running in all directions a lot of yelling and screaming, since the NVA were in spider holes they seem to be all over the Hill. I was on the side of the Hill which was facing towards Hill 881, I can see the Hill and I can see people on it. I couldn't see anyone else on the Hill I was standing on. I could hear people yelling so I moved in that direction which was basically to the top of the Hill. The total, actual events of that day are much to long a story.

Which brings me to my question, Medivac choppers were called in, and there was another Marine with me, loading dead and wounded onto the choppers. It was about the third or fourth chopper in that this individual was shot. I think he was hit in the leg but I'm not sure, he looked at me said: " I'm going home," and then he jumped into the chopper. I watched him fly off with a huge smile. Does anyone know who this individual was? My squad leader was a Black Marine his name was Corporal Ward. He was killed that day. If anyone knows of his family members I would like to try to get in touch with them. He was a fine man, and a fine Marine. Rest well my friend.

There is also a man who had the radio when we finished loading the dead and wounded we were told they would not send another chopper to pick us up the LZ was to hot, that we would have to walk back to the Hill. I remember they were five or six of us, I was walking point with the 60, and the guy with the radio was behind me. If anyone knows who these men were I'd sure like to talk to them. I also like to give thanks for this web site, knowing you are out there for support has been very helpful, thank you all. B/1/26 Lives on

Steven,

Well, I thought I was the only one that drifted back to 6/7/67, as for the radioman you are looking for, you found him. It only took almost 40 years but that not bad for us grunts. I was Lieutenant McDonald's radioman 2nd Platoon "B" Co. my nickname was "Yogi" from Baltimore, Md. I can see the men on the hill running around and remember the look on their faces as we walked inside the wire. I had a Medivac tag on my shirt. I got smacked early that afternoon, but as hot as the LZ was, the walk back to the hill looked like the best bet. Once on the hill the General (I thought it was General Walt) came up to me and said "Marine you look like you have had a bad day come with me. I was medivaced down the hill in his chopper. I was grateful. Speaking of being grateful, I am grateful you made it back. WELCOME HOME thanks for reaching out.

Semper Fi

Denny (Yogi) Bowers

Steven,

I was there with you that day, my squad was on the left side we were going up the slope in a "V" formation. We took about 40 to 50 motor rounds before the NVA stormed us. Most of my squad was killed in the initial volley. I hit the ground and remember thinking I got to get out of the kill zone. Rolling to my left as the mortars exploded all around me I came across a wounded Marine bleeding badly. As I was patching him up the NVA were all over the place and shooting our wounded. I had a face to face with a few of them as they ran right past me in the tall grass. One seemed to see me but did not shoot right away, I shot one and the other two ran off.

From hill 881s they were shooting direct fire from the 106's right over my head.As the NVA scattered I made my way to the top of the slope and came across an M-60 gunner who was struggling to shoot and load the M-60, I dropped next to him and helped feed ammo.

At this point the gun ships arrived, followed by F-4's, as I recall laying there at the M-60 position, a large piece of one of the 500 lb bombs being dropped fell near us. I heard it hit the ground. I looked over and saw a smoldering piece of shrapnel. (Could that gunner have been you?) There was one VC running from left to right and the gunner (you?) let out a stream of rounds but never hit the guy. Remember the chopper coming in to pick up our wounded and us policing the area. I humped back to 881S with six M-16's and other gear. Eleven of my squad was killed that day, I think we lost 15 in all. I can't answer your questions, but I can still see that day vividly. We were a two platoon patrol, and I know for sure that we were in soft covers and no flak jackets; it was a very hot day. Platoons from A Co, came down from 881S to cover our withdrawal. I still don't know how I survived that day without a scratch. I think of it often, and remember those we lost. May they rest in peace?
Semper Fi Bravo Brother
Gene Weresow

Gene,
Yes that could very well have been me, there were a couple of men that stopped and helped load ammo for me that day the last guy hooked on 3 or 4 more belts of ammo so I had like 500 or 600 rounds in one long belt, I remember getting up to run and the ammo hung up in the grass pulled me over. There was a guy who called out that there were a lot of NVA coming up the ravine. I looked over and the side of the hill was crawling with NVA, there was a SGT that told 5 or 6 of us to take our grenades one in each hand, we stood in line on the side of the hill he said on his command pull the pins, but don't throw the grenades until he said so, I remember him counting 1,2,3 then he said throw. I know some of you are going to read this and think what a bunch of crap, I swear this really did happen. Was I ever happy to see those F-4's. Are you going to the reunion in D.C. ? We need to get together and talk.
Semper Fi brother.
Steven Wiese

Gene,
The platoon from Alpha that came out to Hill 861 was the 3d platoon. I was the platoon commander. Later just before dark back on Hill 881S we merged with what was left of Bravo Company for the night defense. Wish we could have done more.
John Kaheny

Steven,
I was with Alpha Co. 81's on 881 and we watched the fight (albeit helplessly). Never realized so many were lost! I remember you returning to the hill. I also remember a big Sgt. leading the way. Name forgotten. Wish we could have been there to help. If I remember right, we weren't allowed to fire any support because of the close in fighting until after you started returning. Needless to say, glad you made it back. Your story sparked one of my forgotten memories.
Bruce Buck

Steven,
I am planning to go to the reunion, hope to make the reservations soon. There is a lot more to be told on that battle. Hope to get together with you and exchange our thoughts. Do you remember the General up on 881S when we returned, I think it was Walt, there were other officers in his party and I remember one with a movie camera, wish I could see those flicks, I'm sure the guys on top of the hill got a eye full. BTW as I said we did get support from 881S, they did direct fire some 106's, probably saved my butt. But it was awful close. Thanks guys who ever you are.
Semper Fi
Gene Wereslow

Gene
Yes, I do remember the general, I talked to Ernie Spencer about that day he told me there was a general visiting Khe Sanh and when the fire fight broke out he jumped a chopper and flew up to 881, the general and I had a little discussion after the fire fight, I wonder if he's still alive I would love to talk to him and see what he remembers of that day. Yes there was a camera crew there. I'd love to see that footage. The 106's did give us cover fire on the way in but the F-4's are what saved our butts. I think the NVA coming up the ravine would have overrun the hill, but when the F-4's showed up they turned and ran. Outstanding. I'm looking forward to talking to you in D.C.

Steven

Steven,
Just finished reading the command chronologies for June 67. The General was B/Gen Metzger not Walt as I previously stated.
Gene

Steven,
Dear Sir, You are one of the few, the proud, and the only remaining men that fought the fight. Many more assisted you, not to mention the air support that you received. I was a lowly Cpl. back at the Base. I stand in awe of your superlative duty Mr. Wiese. I wish I could've been with you and Bravo. But, then, I would probably be dead. Here's health to you and to our Corps which we are proud to serve. In many strife we've fought for life, and never lost our nerve. Blackbud Charlie, Out.
Chuck Chamberlin

Steven,
I was with then Lieutenant John Kahney. I remember going out to hook up with what was left of Bravo. Remember being scared as hell with what we were going to find. Felt so helpless when we got there. I just wished we could have gotten there faster, see you in DC in July.

Follow-up on 6-7-67
Steven Wiese

I don't think I can explain what I'm feeling right now. It is kind of like one of those did I shut the garage door? Did I turn the stove off? You know the feeling, like there's something you forgot to do. Once Ernie Spencer told me, "you have to be careful what you say on a public board, or in public in general", thank you for that advice Ernie. I would like to offer a little explanation in regards to my previous 6-7-67 post. On the day that happened, I was mad, angry and upset, and wanted revenge. So what did I do, I extended my tour in Vietnam. It might have been a foolish thing to do, but I had just turned 19 in May and was young, dumb, and you know the rest.

Because of my extension I ended up in Khe Sanh during the siege. As you know I was a member of the ghost patrol (2-25-68) and I went out on March 30th 1968 on the payback patrol, I was involved in an ambush on Route 9 with Lieutenant Long, so I've asked myself many times why I am still here. I must have been spared for something. I must have been destined to make some great contribution in life. But here I am getting old and I've accomplished nothing great. I haven't made the world a better place to live; I'm not a doctor saving lives, so I asked myself why? I asked this question of the shrink at the VA, she thought for a moment and you know what her reply was: "Maybe it's so I can remember these men and tell their story, to family members of what heroic men they were." Well I'm no Mickey Spillane so writing is out. One day I hope I will be able to reach their family members. Maybe there's someone who would like to hear from you. Thanks again guys for your support.

Steven,
I know how you feel I've wondered those things for years. I've come to realize that we were all spared for a reason. You don't have to know that reason. For me, it may be my family my kids and my grand kids. I may have not done anything worth writing about, but who knows what my children, or grand children will do. Maybe nothing, maybe something wonderful. Often you don't know how you touch the lives of other people and how that affects them. So I would guess that at least indirectly you have accomplished much. At least that is what I hope for. I've quit trying to figure it out. I think it goes hand in hand with the survival guilt we all feel to one extent or other.

For me, I've always tried to do the right thing, and treat people as I would want to be treated. I hope that is enough in the eyes of the Lord. Let it go. Stop trying to figure it out. Just do the best you can with the time you have left. BTW, I was in the point squad on 7/27/67, and in Lieutenant Long's platoon, when we again walked right into that ambush. I had a chi com land and explode not 3 feet from me. Just minor wounds, go figure. You can't. Hang tough Bravo Brother, the good Lord makes the calls not us.
Semper Fi,
Gene Weresow

Steven,
I am sure everyone wonders about the same thing. When out on patrol and the guy next, beside, or behind you gets hit, why not me? When we were down at 55 it happened a lot. Someone hits a land mine, booby trap, or hit by a sniper, why not me? Were we saved for something or just lucky? Were we saved to remind the world of those who did not make it? Heaven and our creator only knows. The other question I have is, why is it that all us old men who kept it locked away for so many years, now seem to be consumed by it? I am proud to say you are a friend. If it were not for all this Khe Sanh stuff we could have walked our dogs by each for years without knowing the common bond.

Chuck Teasley

Steven,
The one thing I have learned is that most of use will never discover another Penicillin, the vaccine for Polio. The one thing we can do is be there for each other. Sometimes it is just reaching out and touching one person, and making their life better even for one moment so they are able to get through that day. Because of what we have been through it has made us stronger then most. We are a little more honest with our feelings, and we feel love, anger, and pain more then a lot of people.
Have a good day

REFLECTIONS

USMC SAN DIEGO
By Craig W. Tourte

I few months ago I drove down to San Diego and visited the MCRD. I was disappointed in the museum. I had thought that such a distinguished facility would have had more artifacts reflecting Marine Corps history. I was assured the museum was a work in progress and that a new wing would be open soon. As I wandered over to the small case that reflected the Vietnam War I observed a 12X24 inch paper plaque placed into a wall box attached to the bulkhead. This is what plaque read:

"From 1965 to 1973 US Marines served in Vietnam to help contain the spread of communism in Southeast Asia. Marines were engaged in a variety of conflicts fighting against organized Viet Cong (VC) guerrilla groups and units of the North Vietnamese Army (NVA). At the height of the involvement in Vietnam, the Corps had more than 75,000 Marines ashore as part of the Third Marine Amphibious Force. The majority of Marine Corps operations conducted during this decade were small unit actions, battalion size or smaller. The most notable campaign of the war was the Tet Offensive of 1968, which began for the Marines with the siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base at Khe Sanh. By 1969 the Marines had begun to withdraw from Vietnam, and by the end of 1970 there were only 21,000 Marines and 1,200 Navy men left in I Corps. The last Marines left Vietnam in force on 25 June 1971. The Vietnamese War became the Marine Corps longest war, and it left 14,691 Marines dead and 88,633 wounded. The Marines also lost 252 helicopters and 173 fixed-wing aircraft in combat, and 172 helicopters and 81 aircraft operationally during the war."

I remembered thinking as I was reading this plaque and viewing what little items were available depicting that conflict so long ago, that our experience was somehow being reduced to a small footnote in history, to a plaque located in a dark back room over in a corner that is covered with dust and is seldom visited.

I'm looking forward to viewing the Marine Corps museum in DC during the reunion next year; I heard they have done a great job.

Craig,

I agree with you, after your post about visiting MCRD and how much you enjoyed it sparked the wife and I into making a special trip to San Diego to watch a graduation and visit the museum, we totally enjoyed the graduation, but to say the museum was a disappointment would be a huge understatement. That same trip we had the opportunity to visit with Captain Kenny Pipes, what a privilege that was. It made the whole trip worthwhile. P.S., Thanks again for inviting me along to celebrate the Marine Corps birthday, still not sure if I'm sober yet.

Craig,

Tony Anthony (3/26) and myself serve on the Board of the MCRD Museum Historical Foundation. Tony is the president, I am the vice president. The Foundation raises funds for the museum and also organizes the documents that provide personal experiences of Marine Corps veterans to the recruits at MCRD on T-20. We do not operate the museum which is run by the Marine Corps for the purpose of highlighting the base's role in Marine Corps history beyond just Vietnam. As that is the museum's mission, it should not be expected that the Vietnam War is its primary focus. However, the Foundation has made a gift to the Museum to expand its Vietnam exhibit which will be opening soon. It will be a first class display. If you would like you can always make a contribution to the MCRD San Diego Museum Historical Society and help us out. Check out mcrdmuseumhistoricalsociety.org

John,

I have written a number of articles regarding my recent visit to MCRD San Diego and my remembrances of boot camp (platoon 1145 in 1966 along with Mike Powers from D/1/26 and Bill Poland from H.Q. 1/13, both of whom are Khe Sanh Veterans and members of our association) and my impression of the museum. Please let us know when the new Vietnam War exhibit is available and open to the public I am wondering if they'll have some type of ceremony? I'll take another drive down there from Northern California and check it out. I'll even make a donation. Maybe I can get some of us old Khe Sanh Veterans who live in California or near, to meet in San Diego and we can view it together.

Memories

I remember you!
As always being the smiling one.
The kid who never quit,
Until the last battle had been won.
I remember you!
The night we graduated from high school,
So sure of ourselves.
Lord knows we sure thought we were cool.
I remember you!
When we joined the Corps," look what we done"
Going home in our dress blues.
Your Daddy huggin you, smiling, saying "That's my son!"
I remember you!
When we got our orders for war.
We were so excited;
The noble heroes were going to settle the score!
I remember you!
Walking ahead in the mist and gloom.
Wet, cold, and scared
Never knowing our lives would change so soon.
I remember you!
The screams of the dying.
Faces full of pain and horror,
People running, disappearing, never seen anymore.
I remember you!
When the rockets hit, then that terrible roar,
The sounds of combat.
The reality of War!
I remember you!
Torn and dismembered, staring up at me,
Seeing your insides floating in the slop.
Wondering, praying, thanking God it wasn't me.
I remember you!
Trying to hold on with your one good arm.
Never crying----
And me covering you, trying to keep you from further harm.
I remember you!
Asking when the choppers would land.
Looking you in the eye,
Lying, telling you they're coming as fast as they can.
I will always remember you,
When the light left your eyes.
Feeling your body quiver
In protest to the pain when you died.
I'll always remember you
Old friend: it was 20 years ago today and I still think of you often,
And still don't know what to say-----
EXCEPT, I MISS YOU ERIC!!!!

Air Force Chief Master Sgt. John Gebhardt, of the 332ND expeditionary Medical Group at Balad, Iraq, cradles a young girl as they both sleep at the hospital. The girl's entire family was executed by insurgents; the killers shot her in the head as well. The girl received treatment at the U.S. Military hospital in Balad, but cries and moans often,. According to nurses at the facility, Gebhardt is the only one who can calm down the girl, so he spends several days holding her while they both sleep in a chair.

DEALING WITH "THE GREATEST GENERATION"

By Ernie Spencer

I have one daughter (Evie). She was a great gymnast. During her freshman year of high school, she won the championship for her school. Being a gymnast gave her great upper-body strength. A couple of her uncles (on her mother's side) were also gymnasts. Four of them became Marines. One served in Vietnam and was WIA. The other three served post Vietnam. One died as a Cobra pilot on a night training mission at Quantico. The other two were: an Admirals aide, and the other, electronics weapons repairman. Her mom became a Navy Corpsman (Reserve) and was called up during the first Gulf War. She retired after sixteen years as a 1st Class. Evie inherited my reputation as a brawler. When she was a freshman, her fellow high school students hung out in downtown Walnut Creek on Friday nights. One Friday night a male junior started harassing her girlfriend a little too much. Evie hit him with one overhand right (Daddy's favorite punch) and decked him. He became the laughing stock of the school.

In college she often went partying up at Chico State, then the most famous party school in the country. Evie's future husband (at the time) is not a fighter. Some of the guys in the bar started harassing him. Evie stepped in and hammered the clowns. During a flight she was taking in the early nineties, she happened to be seated next to an old guy. You know the type, his pants up near his armpits. Evie proudly carries my dog tag from Nam on her key chain and happened to remove it from her purse. The old turd grabbed it from her and said loudly:

"What are you doing with this Marine dog-tag? Evie politely replied:
"That's my dad's. He was a Marine and wore it in Vietnam.
"Oh yeah" the old goat sniffed, "I was on Iwo Jima!"
"Oh really?", Evie said. "My daddy was the CO of Delta 1/26 at Khe Sanh during the Siege. You ever heard of that battle? His unit also fought on Iwo.

And by the way, what unit were you with on Iwo, and, what wave did you go in on?"

His jaw dropped. She doesn't know who landed when, but knew by his expression that she had him, since he just looked straight- forward, head down.

"Now give me my keys, f_ _k head, or I'll kick your sorry, old a$$. He meekly handed them back.

After they landed and he scurried out, she got in one last shot. "Say hero. You weren't a REMF by any chance, were you?

SUB UNIT 5

By Larry L. Larsen
Sub Unit 5

I have attended a couple of Khe Sanh Vets reunions, both at Chicago. I have always enjoyed myself. Very often I am asked what Sub Unit 5 was. I either try to explain what it was or tell the curious that we were in a submarine in the Roa Quan.

Actually Sub Unit 5 was a small company sized unit that was formed on 1 February 1967 and disbanded on 12 January 1968. It was part of HQ Bn, 3rd Marine Division. It existed for slightly less than one year. During its life it was never anywhere else than Khe Sanh.

There were other sub units from HQ Bn as well. Sub Unit 2 was at Dong Ha. Sub Unit 4 was in the Phu Bai area. SU4 consisted mainly of CACs Alpha and Hotel. I believe that there was also a Sub Unit 1. I have not found any record of a Sub Unit 3.

Sub units were not only limited to HQ Bn. I have found reference to them in records of other units such as the 26th Marines. I believe that the FLC organization had many of them scattered around. Sub Unit 5 appears to have been formed to control the base at Khe Sanh when 1/3 left early in 67. For a time SU5, B/1/9 and a handful of personnel from other units were the total USMC force at Khe Sanh. This came to a screeching halt with the advent of the Hill Fights in April of 67. By the middle of May, much of the 9th Marines and the 3rd Marines were engaged in a bitter battle there. Other units would come and go during 1967. 1/26 showed up at the end of the Hill Battles and spent the rest of 67 there. The 26th Marine Regiment HQs soon moved to Khe Sanh. And we all know what 1968 brought.

Sub Unit 5 consisted of a large variety of MOSs. Maybe it can best be compared to the H&S Company of a Battalion. There were communicators, combat engineers, Motor T, cooks, PX and postal clerks, intelligence, air strip supply, water supply and even a Marine with an MOS listed as a clarinet player. And there were a large number of 03s. Many of the O3XX MOSs were assigned to CAC Oscar. CAPs Oscar 1 and 2 operated in the village of Khe Sanh. 3 were in the Bru village near the gate. They were the only CAC units that worked entirely with Bru forces. CAC Oscar was transferred from SU5 to SU4 in July of 67. In 1968 the CAC units were formed into a separate organizations know as CAG.

Some of the Marines in SU5 were already at Khe Sanh when the unit was formed. Some came from 1/3. Others had been at Khe Sanh TAD from Phu Bai with HQ Bn. Some volunteered. Others were sent. I know of one Marine who spent his entire tour at Khe Sanh with SU5. Some SU5 Marines remained at Khe Sanh when the unit was disbanded shortly before the siege. They either joined HQ Bn, 3rd Marine Division, the 26th Marines or some other unit. Many of the Marines I knew in SU5 had tours that ended in 1967. Many, me included were gone before the siege started. Some had time left to do on their tours. More than one extended and stayed in Vietnam. I know of one who first extended for six months. When he returned to the States, he decided to re-enlist and return to Vietnam. He ended up with 3rd Recon and returned to Khe Sanh long after the Marines had abandoned it.

SU5 Marines were very involved in the evacuation of the Bru at Lang Vei when they were mistakenly bombed by the US Air Force on 2 March 1967. The next night SU5 lost its first man. Raymond Goodwin who was killed by incoming on 3 March 67.

Four more SU5 Marines were lost on hill 689 on 27 June 67. They were Marines from CAC Oscar. SU5 Marines accompanied patrols from time to time. They manned LPs and the perimeter. They provided security for MedCap patrols. The communicators manned equipment in the COC until the unit was disbanded. Supply Marines worked with the air drop and LAPES supply runs. During the fall of 67 the runway was undergoing repair much of the time. The only fixed wing aircraft that could land were the bird-dog observation planes and the C7A Caribou. Supplies arrived by either air drop or LAPES. Manpower arrived and departed by chopper. Hwy 9 had also been closed. SU5 Marines also helped man the site on Hill 950.

Early in 67 the base was under the command of whoever was the senior officer pPresent. That officer would be the CO of SU5. The Hill Battles pretty much ended that. After the 26th Marines took over SU5 was just another support unit. The total strength of SU5 reached a high of 139 in May of 67. By November of 67 it was down to 38.

In May of 67 there were 7 Navy personnel assigned to the unit, six corpsmen and a doctor. Others passed through SU5 in a matter of days. KSV founder Ray Stubbe was originally assigned to SU5 when he arrived. Some of this had to do with billets with other units. Ray of course become the 1/26 chaplin. Another became a civil affairs officer. I have the MPRs for SU5 except for the month of January 68. MPRs were just that, a monthly personnel roster. If an individual was not part of the unit both at the first and last days of the month, he did not appear on the roster. Dennis Alfred O'Connor was a sad example. He was KIA before he was ever listed on a SU5 MPR.

I was in the communications platoon of SU5. We occupied some hard-back hooches near the Grey sector. Other SU5 Marines were scattered around the base. It is sometimes said that Khe Sanh was a quiet place in 67. I guess that is true for much of it. But roughly 300 Americans lost their lives at Khe Sanh in 1967

I have spent about six years researching SU5 and its men. I have the above mentioned MPRs. HQ Bn CCs and a few other records. There really is not much mention of the unit. I have managed to track down about 45 of the men who were part of SU5. When I first started looking I could only remember two names. I have since found both of them, JJ Johnson and Sgt John Drum.

I also found the radioman that slept on the cot next to mine. I have started a web site for SU5 at http://www.subunit5.bravehost.com/welcome.html. In July of 2005 at the KSV reunion in Chicago, seven SU5 Marines reunited. That would have been the most in one spot since it was disbanded. I was a lowly private for most of my time at Khe Sanh. (That's another story). I worked hard at avoiding anyone who had much rank and I thought might be looking for a shit detail volunteer. In the last few years I have spoken with Majors and Colonels and even an Admiral. I have spoken with Sergeants Major. I have even spoken with a CWO 4 (I don't think I ever even saw one when I was in the Marines.) They all have one thing in common. It is this brotherhood called the Khe Sanh Veterans Association.I hope that this has helped to explain what Sub Unit 5 consisted of. Welcome home brothers. Semper Fidelis.

Watching over and praying for our Warriors who have served, and are still in harms way throughout the world

Camp Lejeune in North Carolina opened the first wounded warriors barracks to lift Marines' morale and help wounded service members return to active duty or transition out* of *the Marine Corps.

By Kara Petrovic

As more and more Marines-wounded by roadside bombs and in shootings-continue to return from Iraq, they are surrounding themselves with other wounded Marines to share in their final phases of recovery.

In September 2005, North Carolina's Camp Lejeune welcomed six Marines wounded in Iraq as the first residents of the first-of-its-kind wounded warrior barracks, The barracks, called Maxwell Hall, officially opened in November 2005. Today, 35 Marines live and work together, and call Maxwell Hall home. The barracks-named after Lt. Col. Timothy Maxwell, who sustained severe brain damage after mortar shrapnel pierced his brain-brings the hurting together to heal together.

Maxwell, a former operations officer for the 24th Marine Expeditionary Unit, was on his third tour in Iraq when he almost died Oct. 7, 2004. He awoke to an empty hospital room longing for his unit. The isolation was enough to drive him mad. At that moment, he started thinking about other wounded Marines who were probably experiencing similar feelings and recovering alone. "These guys have a hard time talking about the war, especially to people who haven't been through war," Maxwell said. "Most are right out of high school, and they needed a sense of togetherness. They didn't need to go back home or back to empty barracks."

After returning to the U.S., Maxwell, along with Gunnery Sgt. Ken Barnes-another wounded Marine-approached their superiors in March 2005 about converting a building at Camp Lejeune into living quarters for wounded warriors, so that they could recuperate together. Some commanders initially objected to the idea, but Maxwell and Barnes pressed on to convince those who weren't sold on the idea. "We kept telling them, 'Who can take care of Marines better than Marines? Barnes said. "From the outside looking in, we proved that no one else can take care of them better."

In August 2005, Maxwell and his supporters were successful as Camp Lejeune's former officers' quarters were transformed into six personal living spaces. Since then, the barracks has expanded to include 40 rooms. But unlike traditional barracks, wheelchair ramps replaced steps and hand-bars were installed to accommodate residents' needs. A recreation room also includes computers, a big-screen TV and a videogame system to keep up morale. "It's all about togetherness here," Maxwell said. "It's not fair that some have to spend time alone. Coming here gives these Marines a place to hang out."

The Path to Recovery

As of August 2006, 65 Marines and sailors have lived, worked and recovered at Maxwell Hall since it opened its doors. Barnes, the top enlisted man in charge of the barracks, said wounded warriors are treated like Marines. They are up-each morning by 5:30 a.m., straightening their living quarters and in formation by 7:30 a.m.

When Marines first arrive at the barracks, they are divided into five different squads, depending on the severity of their wounds and mobility, and assigned a job to perform four days a week. A sergeant leads each squad. "The sergeants are key," Maxwell said. "By looking at their sergeants, it gives these wounded Marines a chance to see what they're going to look like in six months." According to the Department of Defense, 6,195 Marines have been wounded in Iraq and 91 Marines were wounded in Afghanistan as of Aug. 5, 2006.

Like Barnes, who lost his arm to a roadside bomb in Iraq on Nov. 2, 2004, the barracks' 46 staff members, except two, also have been wounded in either Iraq or Afghanistan. Staff members coordinate doctors' appointments and help Marines with mounting paperwork and future plans. "We're more than a barracks," Barnes said. "We offer them a chance to be part of a team again. There's a huge piece of your life missing when you are wounded. I look at life a lot differently now, and that's partly due to the barracks. I've learned to talk better and adjusted myself around people."

Maxwell's wife, Shannon, his 12-year-old daughter and nine-year-old son supported Maxwell's vision from the beginning. Shannon also helped found a support group for spouses of wounded veterans. "We fully believe that the barracks concept is beneficial to them," Shannon said. "Family members can empathize with and love them, but since they haven't walked in their shoes, they can't understand how that really feels."

The Real Wounded Warriors

The wounded Marines staying at Maxwell Hall are similar to thousands of service members across the country in their passion for their country and their need for camaraderie.

At 15, Brandon Love stood beside his older brother with envy as he watched him enlist with the Marine Corps. "It was always my dream to join," Love said. "I told the recruiting officer right there that he'd see me in three years."

Love followed in his brother's footsteps and joined the Marines, becoming a lance 'corporal with F Company, 2nd Battalion, 2nd Marine Regiment. He deployed to Iraq in 2005, but his tour ended Sept. 23, 2005, outside Karmah, after a car explosion sent shrapnel piercing through his right arm and bursting his eardrums. The following November, the Charlottesville, Va., native joined other wounded warriors, including two from his own unit, at Camp Lejeune. "For me, the camaraderie is the best part," he says. "Everyone here has been through similar things. We can joke about our wounds with one another without anyone else getting offended." Four days a week, Love works as a photographer in Camp Lejeune's Public Affairs Office, snapping photos of group functions to display for public viewing. Love says he enjoys covering the barracks' events, but says he's ready to move on.

"I'm ready to go back to Iraq," Love says, "Wherever my boys are going, I want to be there," For Sgt. Jason Simms, 28, of Philadelphia, the road to recovery has been a longer process. He was wounded only four months into his deployment. Simms arrived in Iraq in March 2004 with 3rd Pit" D Co., 2nd Light Armored Reconnaissance Bn., attached to the 1st Marine Division. On July 1, 2004, the 'Humvee he was riding in rolled over a land mine during a routine patrol sweep along a highway in Fallujah. Simms suffered burns to his hands and face, as well as a broken leg. Simms, who has been with the barracks since it originally opened, works as its 2nd squad leader. "This is one of the best things the Marine Corps has done," Simms said. "I think it helps them with the healing process because I'm hurt, too. I wish I could have come straight to a place like this."

Simms' unit redeployed to Iraq in September, but with each passing day he continues to improve and looks forward to re-enlisting. "I've got more surgeries ahead of me," he says. "As soon as I can return to active duty I want to be back in Iraq. Hopefully, I'll be able to leave a few months from now."

For some Marines, however, the decision of whether they will return to their units after their wounds heal is uncertain. "There are times I think about just going back to school to become an auto mechanic," said Lance Cpl. Collin Wolf, 22, of Boston. A member of 1st Mobile Assault Plt., Weapons Co., 3rd Bn., 6th Marine Regt., Wolf was only five weeks into his tour when the Humvee he was riding in hit a land mine, embedding shrapnel into his right leg and shattering his femur. Since mid-April, Wolf's been recuperating at the barracks. "After you've been sent home, 90% of the guys back in your unit don't understand the extent of combat injuries," Wolf said. "They do here. If I wasn't here, things would be a lot harder." Wolf works in the barracks' inter-support section, making phone calls to wounded Marines across the country. He provides answers to questions about what each Marine can expect during his recovery. "I wish more people knew about the barracks," Wolf said. "Not having a place like this would make it harder to recuperate."

Wounded Marines coming home from Iraq will continue to receive the best care possible, but not only at Camp Lejeune. Based on Camp Lejeune's program, California's Camp Pendleton opened a West Coast Wounded Warrior Center in August. The center, located less than a quarter-mile from Camp Pendleton's hospital, can house 26 service members. Officials expected to have half of the center's rooms filled by late August.

"I'm excited for them, but we all knew it was coming," Maxwell said. "It was only a matter of time. Once Pendleton's center picks up, it's going to be better than [Camp Lejeune's], because they've been watching what works and what doesn't." Although Maxwell is close to ending his career with the Corps, he said he will always remember the fulfillment he received by helping Marines like Love, Simms and Wolf.

I've enjoyed working at the barracks, but I don't like getting credit for the idea," Maxwell said. "We need to give credit to all the veterans who had to come back wounded and alone."

The Soldiers Voice

Whether you agree while I sit here in this fox-hole
Whether you believe this cause is right or wrong.
Whether just or unjust.
I am the one here.

I didn't choose to create this fight.
I have to believe it will be worth it in the end.

Like you I am someone's child.
Please don't be unkind.
Don't cut me to the bone.

I fight to sleep at night.
I fight for you to sleep at night.
I fight to come home,
You are already there.
I fight to save my own soul,
Yours may already be saved?

I'm not here based on any religion.
I'm here with many,
Yet I'm here alone.

I'm not the one to blame for all this.
I stand in this hole to create strength for us all.
Don't hate me because I'm here.
Think. Of me walking to free us all

STOLEN VALOR ACT MOVING THROUGH CONGRESS

By Catherine Stortz Ripley /C-T
News Editor Saturday, November 18, 2006 9:24 PM CST

Claiming to have received the military's second-highest honor may be unethical but most likely not illegal. However, legislation is working its way through Congress that would make many of these types of situations criminal acts.

Just this week, U.S. Congressman Sam Graves added his name as a co-sponsor to the Stolen Valor Act which was introduced by Colorado Congressman John Salazar. The legislation would penalize distributors of phony medals and those who fraudulently claim to be decorated veterans. Salazar's legislation would place criminal penalties on those who falsely claim to have risked their lives for our country, restoring honor to those who have truly earned it.

"As soon as I learned of these misrepresentations, I contacted Congressman Salazar's office to add my name as a co-sponsor to the Stolen Valor Act," Graves said. "It is reprehensible and unethical to claim unearned military decorations, but unfortunately it is not illegal.

Congress needs to close this loophole so we can protect the integrity of those who have truly earned these military honors and prosecute those who fraudulently claim these awards." Graves said that he plans to bring the matter to the attention of House leadership "to help ensure we move forward on the Stolen Valor Act."

The Stolen Valor Act was inspired by a paper written by Pamla Sterner, a student at Colorado State University at Pueblo, to tighten a loophole for people fraudulently wearing military awards. Sterner's husband, Doug, operates homeofheroes.com, a Web site dedicated to honoring veterans. Mary Schantag, who runs the Skidmore, Mo., nonprofit POW Network with her husband, Charles, that exposes people who claim military awards they have not earned, says passage of the act is needed not only because individuals are stealing other people's valor, but because of the impact such activities can have.

"We've got to increase the penalties," she said. "We've got to find a way to stop this because these guys are literally changing the history of Vietnam and our conflicts."

Schantag has been involved in investigating the claims made by Jim Fields, who delivered the keynote address at the Veterans Day service in Chillicothe on Saturday. Fields claimed to have received the Navy Cross, which is the military's second-highest honor; however, today (Friday), he told the Constitution-Tribune that he didn't have the Navy Cross and later reportedly told the Marine Corps Times newspaper that he never made reference to-having the Navy Cross.

"You've got to figure that if Fields went out there and started telling stories, he had an entire audience believing he was something he was not," Schantag said.

Some people falsely claiming military service and honors believe their actions to be harmless. "They think it is a victimless crime and it is not," Schantag said. "There are families, veterans, people who listen. It's not right. It is morally wrong, ethically wrong. Donald Ballard, who is Missouri's only living Medal of Honor recipient, is a strong proponent of the legislation and said that even Fields had expressed support for getting the Stolen Valor Act passed "One of the discussions we had was that he talked about helping us find these phonies," Ballard said.

Ballard said that with pending legislation, it would be wise for Fields to set the record straight. "He better admit it now because it's going to be a felony very shortly," he said. "If this law passes and you still claim you've got it, it will be a criminal offense." Ballard predicts that there will be a "major turnover" in exposing fraudulent heroes regarding many honors, including the Bronze Star, Distinguished Service Cross and Silver Star.

Pursuing fake heroes is nothing new to Special agent Thomas A. Cottone Jr., with the FBI in West Paterson, N.J., who says that he has worked on a couple hundred cases involving stolen valor - from Medal Of Honor impostors to other individuals wearing very high military awards. He told of one case in which an individual posed as a highly decorated Marine Captain sitting with the family of a Marine killed in action. The man, who had lifetime memberships to numerous military organizations, confessed that he had never even served in the military. In another case, Cottone was receiving the Honorary Marine Award along with another individual during a prestigious ceremony. However, it was proved that the other individual receiving the honor had 21 unearned combat awards. He was later court-martialed and convicted.

Cottone is outraged by what some individuals try to pass off as truth. "They are not someone just playing dress-up," Cottone said. "They are stealing acts of valor.

They are there to steal the unearned admiration and respect and, literally, steal the acts of valor that real service men and women did to earn those things.

"The impostors go out of their way to be in the spotlight and get anyone to listen to them," he said. These actions are very different than those shown by individuals who actually receive these honors."Most of them, to a fault, are the most humble people," he said. "Most of the real people who have been there, done that are humble."

"Bridge on the River Kwai"

By Tom Eichler E Co 2/26

I was sent this article from the Stars & Stripes from 10 December 1967, depicting Marines from E Co 2/26 guarding Seabees repairing bridges on Highway 1, recently destroyed by the Viet Cong. It reminded me of a picture hanging on the wall of myself and Barry Fixler from E Co 2/26 with people from the village near a bridge which had just been rebuilt, which we were guarding. We had nicknamed it The Bridge on the River Kwai.

I thought members might recognize some of the men in these pictures attached to the following article:

"NAM AU GO GO"

By John Akins

John Akins joined the Marine Corps in 1967 because he was eligible for the draft and wanted to serve two years and get on with his life. He was just 19 years old. He did not expect to be an infantry point man slogging to the combat base at Khe Sanh during the 1968 Tet Offensive. The impact of violence and death changed his life.

With very little training, he was plunged into the Heart of Darkness, as Joseph Conrad called it. He found himself "beyond good and evil, beyond fear, beyond sex and death, in the dark interior of the human mind and soul. Detached, addicted to danger and violence." He learned to survive. Many were killed all around him, and he became a killer.

Going home was almost impossible. At times he wished he would stay on forever. "I'd fallen in love with the Vietnamese Goddess of War," he says in Nam Au Go Go. He got home without serious wounds, except for his mind. He worked at ordinary jobs but without satisfaction. Eventually, he made several trips back to Vietnam to visit the places where he had fought. "I was looking for my soul," he explains Nam Au Go Go is available on several internet book seller sites.

"Gallery of Grunts"

Heroes but No Heroics By Henry Allen Washington Post Staff Writer
Sunday, November 19, 2006; D01

The new National Museum of the Marine Corps shows you the Marine Corps as it is, which is mostly enlisted men, anonymous grunts, and war as it is, which is dirty, crazy and endless. No victory parades up the Champs-Elysees or down Fifth Avenue through the tickertape, no full-dress surrenders, no girls kissing Marines at war's end, no wreaths, triumphal arches, reflecting pools or any of the World War II Memorial stuff on the Mall, no generals holding binoculars with one hand and pointing over the battlefield with the other, not that many officers at all, really. And just about no ideology about freedom, America the beautiful or making the world safe for democracy.

A staff sergeant named Steven Sullivan, one of the builders of the exhibits, last week stood inside the big circular hall that holds fighter planes and displays, which include a helicopter disgorging troops in Korea and Marines hitting the beach at Tarawa. He summed up the ethos of the whole 118,000 square feet of the place: "No grandiosity, no heroic garbage." One doesn't think of the Marine Corps shrinking from advertising its glamour: the Iwo Jima flag-raising monument, those grandiose TV ads with knights, dragons and swords, and the bumper sticker braggadocio: "Marines -- When It Absolutely, Positively Has to Be Destroyed Overnight." And there's the 210-foot spire that slants over the museum in unavoidable line-of-sight of travelers driving on Interstate 95 past the Marine base at Quantico. The museum itself, however, is not about glamour; it's about the Marine mystique. And despite the glamour created by supremely adroit Marine public relations, the mystique is founded on -- of all things -- a willful and even perverse modesty.

Not the modesty of Spartans or kamikazes, or the French Foreign Legion parading at a half-time funeral step with leather aprons and axes, but a pristine and hard-eyed dirt-farm stinginess, a nearly lost American poor-but-proud aesthetic that makes Marines enjoy their belief that they're always fighting with hand-me-down equipment and not enough troops (because one Marine is as good as 10 of any enemy, a belief that was just as wrong when the Confederate army believed it, too). There are also the casualties that provoke the perverse Marine boast that the corps is the finest machine ever developed for the killing of young American men. A friend of mine once heard a Marine colonel say to an Army colonel: "The Army uses tanks to protect men. The Marines use men to protect tanks. "Hence, at the end of the museum's three most powerful displays World War II, Korea and Vietnam -- you see not jubilation in triumph but merely a list of Marine casualties, dead, wounded and missing. And carved into the stone of the entrance hall are the words of Sgt. Maj. Dan Daly, twice a Medal of Honor winner: "Come on, you sons of #####es, do you want to live forever?"

If you cannot savor this sort of irony and understand that it is irony, the Marine mystique will elude you. But like a beautiful woman, the Marine Corps is secretly delighted to think that you don't understand it. Beyond that, it doesn't give a ####. A museum video screen shows a reporter in Vietnam talking to a Marine who just put himself under enemy fire, risked his life, to retrieve a dead man. "What possessed you to go out and get that body?" "He's a Marine." "What do you mean?" "He's a Marine. I'll take care of him." Semper Fi, as we Marines say to each other for the rest of our lives. It's short for Semper Fidelis, the Marine motto: Always faithful. Fighting their way back from the Chosin Reservoir in Korea -- exhausted, under fire, sick, wounded and frostbitten -- Marines walked so that their trucks could carry the dead, as if they believed that men die but Marines live forever, a bleak immortality akin to the Greeks' underworld; self-sacrifice but with none of the transcendence of martyrdom.

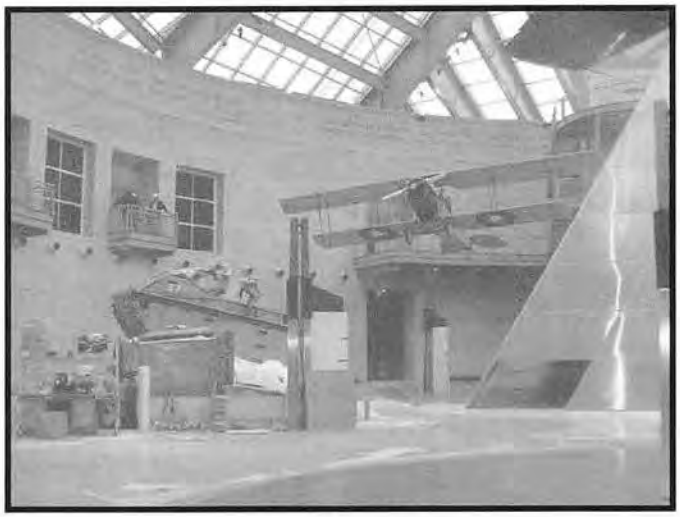
The point here is the admirable or at least intractable modesty – an arrogance of modesty -- that creates the Marine mystique as Marines know it and the museum shows it. The mystique drives the Marine Corps and preserves its rituals, most important among them being boot camp, which has not changed much in living memory, an initiation rite that begins with chaos and terror fomented by the rabid indignation of drill instructors at your trespass. It ends, months later, with a graduating platoon gliding across the drill field with the oblivious elegance of a ship sailing along a horizon.

The museum conveys the terror of the first days in boot camp by understatement. It plays the drill instructors' shouts (Louder! Louder! Look at the weapon! Shut your mouth!) at room-conversation volume and lets you amplify them in your mind. You wander through the museum's dark and noisy labyrinths -- the popping of helicopter blades, the artillery and machine-gun fire, bomb bursts, MOVE OUT! MOVE OUT!, landing craft engines grinding toward the beach of Iwo Jima, Bugs Bunny singing "Any bonds today?" in a WWII cartoon, and phrases floating through the air from a thousand recorded recollections: Now the Marines would get their chance like cattle in a slaughterhouse we shall land stench of rot. You see medals and weapons collections and mannequins (molded and placed by Staff Sgt. Sullivan) of Marines killing and being killed, and all the idiosyncratic relics, the old dog tags, a letter opener made from shrapnel, ammo boxes, a canteen with a bullet hole in it, a pinup girl, a straight razor, all with the banality of someone else's souvenirs.

There's no glory when you walk off a trembling CH-46 helicopter to find yourself marooned on Hill 881 South, which was a very hot landing zone for months near Khe Sanh, Vietnam, live bodies flying in on helicopters and dead ones flying out while mortar shells exploded, rats prowled behind the sandbags, and the Marines fired back at the mortars with 105mm howitzers like the one you see here with tires flattened by incoming shrapnel. The mystique goes deep. It provokes the fists thrown at or by sailors and soldiers in waterfront bars. It may instill the knack to be found in the lowest private for talking smack to the media, "telling sea stories," as Marines themselves say, and making civilians believe them. The Marine Corps is a cult, a tribe, a religious order. The mystique even prompts the occasional American male to lie about having been in the Marine Corps (as in the new novel by Jim Lehrer, a former Marine lieutenant, called "The Phony Marine"). If you were a Marine, those men make your flesh crawl with pity. You say: My God, if I could be a Marine, they could have been Marines; don't they know that? Perhaps they couldn't have. But so what? You were a Marine and they weren't, and that is all the difference. Listen up, people! That is all the difference. And that difference is what the museum is all about.



The National Museum of the Marine Corps, 18900 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Triangle, Va., is open daily except Christmas, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Admission is free.

Vietnam vets give out meals to 300 families

By Kirk Moore and Lauren O. Kidd

Asbury Park Press

TOMS RIVER - Thirty-five years ago, these men were carrying sandbags, ammunition, wounded comrades on stretchers. Tuesday, under a cold sun, Vietnam veterans passed out turkeys and bantering like the young warriors they once were.

"Nice pickup truck. Where'd you get it?"

"You know what they used to say: "How many Marines does it take to drive a truck? One to turn the key and two to push it.' "

Laughter rolled across the parking lot, along with carts of food bound for some 300 households in need. The annual project has grown since 1986, when the Vietnam Veterans of America Chapter 200 in Brick started by collecting food for a half-dozen families, recalled John P. Dorrity, director of the Ocean County Veterans Service Bureau.

"We do a lot with single mothers and veterans' families," said Dorrity, a former Army aviator who's worked for the veterans program since 1995 and brought the annual holiday food drive with him to the county office. "This is important. If we don't take care of the weakest links, we're nothing as a society."

About a dozen veterans turn out to help in the collection and distribution, and do their bits to bring the whole operation together. One man has friends in the trucking business who helped transport some 250 turkeys and food packages from the Food Bank of Monmouth-Ocean Counties.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars District 12 helps collect food, as does the American Legion, other veterans groups and a number of private donors, Dorrity said. Chuck Hogan of VVA Chapter 200 leaned against the bed of his pickup truck, which was loaded with bundles wrapped in supermarket bags. Canned peaches and boxes of Goya rice mixes bulged under the plastic.

Students at schools in Lacey, Toms River and Lakewood collect food, too, Hogan said. The distribution is set up with help from local veterans groups and churches. The group's most distant shipment is 30 turkeys and food packages distributed through the Vet Works office in Trenton, he said.

Meanwhile, members of Ocean County Hunger Relief will be picking up more than 600 microwavable Thanksgiving meals today that have been prepared by students of the Ocean County Vocational-Technical School in Brick. The full-course meals, which include turkey, stuffing, mashed potatoes and vegetables, will be given to "those we consider most vulnerable," said Carol Latif, executive director of Ocean County Hunger Relief.

The group will distribute the meals based on its master list of Ocean County motels where the homeless reside. Latif said the microwavable meals are essential because some people do not have a stove and cannot have a meal, even if they are given a full turkey.

Latif thanked those who have donated food for the holiday season, but wanted to remind donors that the needs of the hungry are "all year round." Food bank managers reported donations are fewer and food supplies are tighter than usual this year, Dorrity said.

Ocean County Hunger Relief also announced that Thursday, Thanksgiving meals will be served at the Shore Vineyard Church in Beachwood, the Church of the Epiphany in Brick, the Macedonia Baptist Church in Lakewood, the Village Lutheran Church in Lanoka Harbor, Lacey, St. Martha Church in Point Pleasant, St. Gregory's in Point Pleasant Beach, Simon's Kitchen, Our Lady of Perpetual Help, Parish Hall in Seaside Heights, and Jesus is Lord in Toms River.

At the veterans' food distribution, John Pessoni of Toms River and Richie Mannes of South Orange handed off the turkeys and food packets from the bed of a panel truck. Like most of the group, Pessoni, a Marine veteran of the Khe Sanh siege in 1968, has been doing it for the better part of a decade now.

"I'm serving as an apprentice," quipped Mannes, the newcomer. But he enjoys the charitable work. On Thanksgiving Day, he said, "I'll be at a soup kitchen in Newark."

Near the middle of April, 1968, the siege was finally lifted. Word was the Air Cav had came up Highway 9 and were taking over Marine positions. We Marines were slated to move out of our positions and complete clearing the Khe Sanh area of the enemy. Kilo Company was to take Hill 881N, news that really made our ears prick up. While the prospect of going up 881N was a bit scary, Kilo Company had been sitting on our Hill, taking it, for two-and-a-half months. Now it was our turn to dish it out, and we weren't thinking at all kindly toward the NVA. Even better news, two other companies of the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines were going with us – Mike and Lima companies. The Corps had gotten it right, for once...gave the job to the men who'd earned it. We were a mite enthused.

Moving out involved several steps. It started when elements of 2/26 assaulted out from the KSCB toward our positions, a show we enjoyed immensely. Once they reached our Hill, and took over our positions, we were choppered over to Hill 800E, just adjacent to Hill 881S. From there we saddled up and began climbing towards the 881S trench line. We'd made it maybe about 3/4 of the way there when, "BOOM!" a large explosion sounded out from above the trench line. For a moment, I wasn't too concerned; then chunks of shrapnel started thumping into the leaf litter around us. I turned away, facing back downhill, and "Whump!" a goodly-sized chunk of steel hit me right in the back of my right knee. Took my leg right out from under me, and down I went.

Nanny, the Squad's resident Texan, was the man closest to me. He'd heard the thump, saw me go down, and then immediately scrambled over to check me out. Finding a hole in my pants leg, he whipped out his Kabar knife and slit the cloth, searching for the wound. There was a pause, a chuckle, then he said, "Man, you are one lucky S.O.B.!"

"What! Why!?"

A Corpsman was there by then, and, after a quick scan of my leg, pronounced, "Didn't even break the skin!" Incredulous, I craned around and discovered that the Corpsman was right. There was a welt, a bit bigger than a half-dollar but no blood. To me it was a real good news/bad news kind-of situation. My luck had, incredibly, held once again, but maybe I had just used up the absolute last of it. That thought had my head really spinning as they helped me back onto my feet and we completed our trek up to the trench line.

Kilo Company spent the night on 881S.With several Companies on the Hill, everybody managed to get all of four hours of uninterrupted sleep, an out-and-out luxury. We moved out at dawn, loaded for bear. We did our approach march in columns, carefully picking our way through a jungle blown to rags and tatters. It was eerie, very close to spooky there, especially when we found an unexploded bomb in our path. It was a Snake bomb, the type which had these large, rectangular, slotted fins, designed to pop out as the bomb cleared the aircraft and slow the thing enough to allow the plane to get clear of the blast zone. In this instance, the entire body of the bomb was imbedded in the soil, with only the fins visible, flush with the ground. Because of the tangled jungle wreckage, our only available path required every man in the Company to step over the thing. While it might not sound like much, nobody looked happy about taking that particular cautious step. As for myself, I discovered that my crotch can cringe independently.

We finally arrived at the base of 881N, peeled off the column into our assault lines, and tensed, steeling ourselves. After the kind of wait that ages a man years, arms were waved, orders were shouted, and we started moving uphill. It turned out that there were very few NVA on the hilltop, and they all died very quickly, each one with probably pounds of rounds in them. The only casualty we had that I know of was a Sergeant who suffered a broken finger by waving his hand behind a man cracking off a L.A.A.W. rocket. While everyone was just tickled pink about the general outcome of all this, the amount of NVA butt we did kick was miniscule compared to the amount we wanted to kick.

After policing-up the area, we humped back through that shattered jungle to Hill 800E, where we dug-in a perimeter for the night. Scuttlebutt buzzed through the ranks as we dug our holes, all of it boiling down to, "We're getting out of here!" When anyone would eagerly quiz an officer or senior NCO about this line of thought, they wouldn't say, "No." But they did grin, which was as good as a confirmation in our almost frenzied minds. So we spent a very long night of anticipation there mostly sleepless, and collectively wanting the sun to rise.

Rise it finally did and we had our C-Rat breakfasts in a high state of dithering anticipation. After breakfast, the Squad Leaders were summoned over to our Lieutenant's hole to get the word. They didn't even have to speak when they returned, their smiles told it all. Even Slaybaugh had a real smile on his face, rather than his usual mean smirk. Their confirmation of great news put smiles on the faces of every man in the Company, something which hadn't happened for quite some time. Our Platoon, the 2nd, was damn-near ecstatic. The word was that we were slated to be the first to leave. Though our particular Squad was slated to be the last of the Platoon to board, we cheerfully allowed ourselves to be put through the rigmarole of being staged at the edge of the LZ and sorted into boarding sticks.

Anticipation reigned as every man's eyes avidly searched the skies, eager to be the first to spot our tickets out of there. At long last we heard the chop-chop sound of approaching rotors, then spotted four outright beautiful Banana Boats [CH-46s] winging our way. Eagerly we surged to our feet and edged forward toward the LZ, only to be crushingly disappointed a few moments later when the choppers suddenly broke-off their approach, then quickly disappeared. Everybody seemed to slump, like a day-old balloon, and the bulk of the Platoon ended up bunched up and milling in confusion. Slaybaugh, our Squad Leader, took one look at this mess, shook his head in disgust, and said: "You guys might as well just crap out. It'll take them at least a week to sort out that mess."

His statement made a lot of sense to us, since no grunt would choose to stand if they could sit down. So our entire Squad went to ground. I lay down almost like I was relaxing in a recliner, with my pack as a backrest, my M-79 ammo bags as armrests, and my hands clasped behind my helmet... the picture of ease and content. Suddenly I heard the LT's voice urgently shouting, "Spread out! Break it up!" Turning my head to the left, I saw him shove his way into the middle of the muddle, his arms spread wide, trying to physically force people to move... when, BANG! a large mortar round detonated at his feet!

I know it all happened in a split-second, but it seemed like I was watching it unreel nanosecond by nanosecond, extreme slow-motion, like time had hit a sudden swamp. I could see the instantaneous black dust ball, with a flash at the epicenter. I could see the Lieutenant's shredded body flipping backwards, spraying blood and flesh, obviously dead. I could see the bulk of the Platoon falling away from the center of the blast, looking like the bloody petals of some obscene flower...

Shock froze me there for a moment, then more mortars started landing. Rolling over onto my stomach, cowering at the slaps of concussion, I tried to melt into the earth as the barrage continued. After maybe a dozen rounds, there was a lull. In the sudden silence I heard the awful cries and groans of the wounded. An utterly ghastly sound that hit me deep, flinging me headlong into a complete blue panic, sending me scrambling away from the impact zone as more mortar rounds started coming in.

I crawled maybe 100 feet before I was able to stop my stampede. Looking back, I spotted a Corpsman moving through the continuing fire, heading toward the wounded men. Suddenly ashamed, I wiggled out of my gear and scurried after him. I caught up with him as he started tending to a Marine whose legs were riddled with shrapnel. The Corpsman looked up at me as I arrived and shouted, "Let's get him the hell out of here!" I nodded in instant agreement; we both grabbed a shoulder of the man's flak jacket, then, posthaste, dragged him out of the impact area and over the lip of the hill.

Once the casualty was in relative safety, I left the Corpsman to bandage him while I dashed back over the hilltop, intending to retrieve my gear, then return and provide protection for them. As I was returning to them, however, another Corpsman waved me over to him and the casualty he was frantically working on. As I knelt beside him, I could immediately see why the Doc was so concerned. The poor casualty was a complete mess. His entire body, was riddled with shrapnel, his face gouged and ruined, his right arm ending in a blackened stump halfway between his wrist and elbow.

"We gotta get this guy outta here!" the Corpsman yelled. "He's in bad shape, so we gotta carry him. We'll need help!" Nodding, I quickly scanned the area and spotted another guy from my squad, Wissinger, wandering almost absently by. Jumping up, I collared him, pulled him over, and told him to lift the man by the legs while the Doc and I each took a shoulder. Together we hustled him off the hilltop to relative safety. As the Doc started working on the casualty again, I hovered nearby, ready to help in any way I could. It was then that the wounded man groaned, opened his eyes for a moment, and then passed out again. I knew those eyes!

"Oh my God, it's Tweedy!" I said, literally gagging with sorrow.

Tweedy was one of those guys who'd look like a teenager at 30. A baby-faced, almost beautiful kid, who's big, cornflower-blue eyes reminded everyone who saw them of a certain cartoon canary's. It just plain broke my heart to see those eyes set in that bloody, mangled face. Horrified, I turned away, sudden tears blurring my vision.

Several bad minutes later, the chop-chop sound of a helicopter pierced through my grief. It was close. Looking skyward, I saw the beautiful sight of a CH-46 hovering above us, the pilot looking directly at us.

"We gotta get him on that chopper!" I yelled. Springing to my feet, I quickly scoped out the area around us and spotted a slightly flattened part of the slope nearby. Using my M-79 as a pointer, I alerted the pilot to it and saw him nod in comprehension.

Carefully, oh so carefully, that pilot maneuvered his Banana Boat down and around. There wasn't enough room to simply land, so he had to put just his rear wheels down on that small flattened spot while keeping the nose in the air and the whole ship level. It was a stunning feat of airmanship, but that pilot did it and held it there as we scrambled to get aboard. Because of the slope, boarding was a bit of a project. The rear rotor's arc was dangerously close to the slope, nearly clipping the grass, so we couldn't simply run for the chopper's rear ramp; not without being turned into hamburger in the process. Instead, we had to run toward the nose, then back along the body of the chopper and get on the ramp from the side. Somehow we managed to do all that. The second we cleared the ramp, I saw the crew chief yell into his mike and the pilot immediately jerked that bird into the air. We were safe!

Our relief lasted only seconds. As we gently lowered Tweedy to the deck, he regained consciousness and promptly freaked completely out. The Corpsman, while trying to hold him down, whipped out an ampoule of morphine and attempted to inject it into Tweedy's left arm. But Tweedy, crazed, dazed, and in pain, was struggling too hard. Sickeningly, he was even beating on the Corpsman with the stump of his right arm. Without thinking, I jumped in to help; grabbed his stump and pinned his heaving body down as gently as I could... a few seconds that have haunted my nightmares for decades.

Once the Corpsman finally got the morphine into him, Tweedy passed out again, and I was able to collapse back onto the nylon-mesh bench seat of the chopper. Trying to relax, I glanced over at Wissinger, who was sitting next to me, staring into space, zonked out on horror. I noticed that he was holding his left arm in an odd way. Looking closer, I saw a bloody hole, about the size of a quarter, in the back of his left wrist. I showed him the wound, then, as he goggled at it in horror, pulled out a battle-dressing and slapped it on his wrist.

All of this had taken maybe three minutes to transpire, and I'd pretty well had it. I needed to relax, maybe light up a smoke, and try to calm the shakes. As I sat back, however, my left elbow bumped against the nylon mesh and I felt a sharp nip of pain. Lifting my arm, I discovered a thorn-like, blackened piece of shrapnel jutting maybe a half-inch out of my elbow. Disgusted and royally pissed, I yanked the thing out and flung it away from myself, then bummed a Band-Aid from the Doc.

The chopper flared in for a landing just after I got my Band-Aid on. We set down next to Charlie-Med, inside the main Khe Sanh perimeter. People with a stretcher were standing by, and they hustled on board the second our ramp touched down. All hands gently placed Tweedy on the stretcher, and then the bearers hustled him off the chopper and through the entryway of Charlie-Med and out of sight. As soon as the rest of us had debarked, that chopper was back in the air, barely waving a farewell. There were more wounded to rescue.

About then, with events suddenly slowing to subsonic, I finally had a few moments to fall apart... and promptly did. I became convinced that Tweedy wasn't going to make it, that he needed a priest. Just as I was about to run off half-cocked, I noticed someone hustling toward the hospital. To my complete amazement, I spotted a cross on his collar. It was a Chaplain. I told him about Tweedy in a rush of words, begging for him to help the guy. He didn't hesitate. Giving my shoulder a quick, comforting squeeze, the Padre said, "Don't worry, son, I'll see to him.", then hustled through the door into Charlie-Med.

That moment of comfort didn't last very long at all. A few minutes later, chopper after chopper began shuttling in, bearing the bloody bodies of what used to be my Platoon. It was a time of terrible sorrow for me, watching my friends, hurt and bleeding, being carried into Charlie-Med. It was like finding out your brother was in a car crash, multiplied by more than twenty. I can only describe it all as... heartbreaking.

Eventually, some order was reestablished and Kilo Company gathered itself and moved across the airstrip into a trench line near where the plateau dropped off. This section was manned by an ARVN Ranger unit, not a man of whom had ever heard the phrase, "Police up the area." The trench was half full of rotten garbage...not litter, garbage...and smelled like a dump. Rats were scrambling in profusion all over the place, bold enough to cavort in the daylight.

As we settled into this mess, we at last had time to take stock of ourselves. It wasn't good. Our Platoon now consisted of one seriously under strength Squad, barely two fire teams. Kilo Company, already woefully short of men, was no longer considered operational. We were out of business.

A pall of despair settled over us as darkness fell. I was in a bad way. Along with my load of grief, it occurred to me that I'd been hit twice in the past several days. My luck had held, but did I have any left? I was still in Khe Sanh, and seriously doubting that I'd ever get out in one piece.

Author's Note

When I recently saw my first copy of Red Clay ever, I had quite a shock. I recognized a face I had only seen once 38 years ago. It was Padre I had met outside Charlie Med on that awful, 15th of April day in 1968. The name under the picture identified him as the Rev Ray Stubbe. I have since written to Padre Stubbe, thanking him for the comfort he gave me and my dying buddy so long ago. Someday, soon, I'd like to shake his hand.

One of the people I contacted after I received my copy of the Khe Sanh Membership Directory was Dennis Mannion – Kilo's arty FO. While we were talking, I learned that my Lieutenant and he were close friends back on Hill 861. He knew the Lieutenant's name. Ashamed, I had to admit that I did not. I could not recall ever having heard it. To me he was simply the LT. When I talked with him, I had always addressed him by his rank or I called him Sir. Mannion understood completely, and then told me his full name – Benjamin S. Fordham who went by his middle name of Steve.

Learning his name seemed to heal a decades old hole in my heart. Lt. Fordham had been my platoon commander for months. I had liked him. He was a nice guy, a good officer, and by God, a fine Marine. He died in front of my eyes while trying to save the lives of his men. The grief of it has echoed in my mind for all these years. But now, knowing his name offers me a great deal of comfort. I can finally honor him...by name. I'm proud to have known him.

MONSOON

By Gene Weresow

Monsoon season in Vietnam can be difficult to deal with. Especially when your job description involves a lot of outdoor activity. I would estimate that the Marine Corps grunt in a full thirteen-month tour (if he makes it that long) spends 99% of his time outdoors. Most nights are spent in a hole he has dug in the ground. But there are nights when he does not even get the luxury of a hole. This is the story of one such night.

It was a typical monsoon night, visibility was poor, the night was cold with seemingly never ending rain. Trudging through the jungle mud was even more demanding when visibility required that you maintain physical contact with the man in front of you. So it was this night that required each man in the column to reach out and put his hand on the shoulder of the Marine in front of him. This night you would not hear the squad leaders and platoon commanders barking out orders to "keep spread out". Mike Company of the 26th Marines moved out at night fall for an unnamed village somewhere in a part of South Vietnam know as the Co Bi-Than Tan Valley. This was part of Operation Chinook. Our mission like so many times before was "search and destroy." We were to enter a village that was suspected of being used by the VC. Not that the village like many others was sympathetic to the VC, but it was being used none the less by the Viet Cong to supply and unwillingly recruit additional fighters for their cause. Mike Co. was tasked to go into the village, relocate the local populous to a new location, and deny the enemy of anything of use to them. Food, shelter, recruits and such. Many of these villages were used as a base of operation for the enemy.

We marched in this monsoon muck for what seemed to be all night. Noise discipline was none existent as the beating of the constant rain absorbed any sound we made. So we humped for miles it seemed, arm to shoulder. Physically and mentally the night had taken its toll on me and many others. It's not that we were not able to sustain the march. We were in good shape and this march under normal conditions would have been a piece of cake, even with the full packs, full compliment of ammo and three days rations. I began to think that I should have gotten rid of the extra set of utilities and socks I had stashed in my pack. Early in our tour we learned that one should not wear skivvies to prevent chaffing in the jungle environment. Later at Khe Sanh I would find out that luxuries like extra utilities and socks were hard to come by. At Khe Sanh the clothes would literally rot off our body. The M-14's we carried were heavier than the M-16's we were later issued and on this night it seemed that the lesser weight of the rifle and ammo would have been welcomed. As I reflect on it now the M-14 was a much better weapon in these conditions. The 30 weight motor oil I used made for trouble free operation of my weapon, were as the M-16 needed a lot more tender loving care to ensure its effectiveness when the need arose. Still, we were Marines and there was no excuse for a weapon that did not fire when needed. A clean weapon was essential if one had any hope of survival.

Reaching the village, we waited for daybreak. We scooped out the area once daylight came. We moved in and confirmed through the village elders that the VC were indeed active in the area. We found no other evidence of their presence. The village was made up of mostly elderly woman, men and children. Some were in need of medical attention. Corpsman soon became busy attending to their medical needs. The rest of us stood security and searched the village. The plan was to relocate these people to a newly built relocation area and destroy the village. As we gathered them up the call went out for choppers to fly them out. The weather was so poor that all air traffic was grounded.

During monsoon season visibility was poor even on the ground. I could not imagine aircraft flying even in the daylight hours. As so often happens in the Marine Corps we were to hump it out to a road where vehicles would pick up the villagers and transport them to their new home. They did not want to leave the only home they had ever known. I felt a sense of real pity for these people. How, I wondered, could people live under such meager conditions? There was no electricity, no phones, no amenities of any kind that we had at home. It seemed that they were living in the dark ages, by our standards they were. I came to realize that if this is all they ever knew it is the whole world to them and most of them had never been very far from their home. So it was natural for them to be upset about leaving, even with the promise of better homes.

As often as not with the Marines the order of the day was hurry up and wait. We hurried to get the people ready to go, to round up all their belongings, which by my standard should have been all earmarked for the dumpster. Packed up, saddled up and ready. We then sat around for a couple hours until the brass figured out what the next move would be. The word finally came down to saddle up and moves out. Among the villagers were a few poor souls who could not make the hump to the road without help.

There was one old man that we had to carry because of his poor health, I don't know what he suffered from, but knew that this guy would need to be carried the whole way. As the march began, we left the burning huts and the dead live stock. I felt sad. I could see in their faces the fear and uncertainty of leaving their lifelong home as they watched it burn. The man we carried reminded me of my Dad. Not that he looked like him, but I guessed his age at about the same as Dad, and he was slight of build like him. was really sad for him and the others. We carried this man and others for what seemed to be ten miles, often on our backs. The monsoon rain had not let up and the going was made even harder by the additional weight. The trip to the road took longer than expected and the transport was postponed for another day. We spent another night in the monsoon rain, I had no idea where we were and sure hoped the powers that be knew more than I did.

The night was uneventful. No enemy were encountered. As dawn brought a new day, we loaded and sent the villagers on their way. I found out that the man I helped carry on my back did not survive the night. It was yet another sad moment in an ever more complex war.

Mike Company 3/26, completed another search and destroy mission. We searched for the enemy, did not find him, we destroyed a village and maybe managed to help kill an aging man. Should we have gone into that village? Did we do those people any good? Would the aging man and all the villagers been better off if we had just left him and the others alone? Another successful search and destroy complements of the USMC. We did our job, but did we do any good I wondered? It was another one of many sad days in South Vietnam.

Christmas At Khe Sanh

By Craig W. Tourte

The Marine Corps Combat Base at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam was located in one of the most isolated sections of the country and a long, lonely, treacherous way from any combat support. Someone once said: "If you are at Khe Sanh, you are nowhere." Initially supported by just a few thousand men, it often lacked the basic necessities of electricity, clean water and adequate washing and bathing facilities. In the monsoon months the Khe Sanh base was a muddy mess. There were few visitors even before the Siege, other than the occasional professional athlete, or B movie star who would make the very dangerous journey to spend just a few hours, staying near the Headquarters Complex, not venturing to the increasingly dangerous hills.

I grew up watching the old black and white newsreels of Bob Hope visiting the troops during the various wars and conflicts. In the early 1960's I would watch Bob visiting the troops in Korea, Da Nang and Saigon. Thousands of troops would sit or stand around a large raised stage, which contained Bob and a full orchestra with beautiful dancing girls. Generals and various field grade officers were present and the troops all had big smiles on their faces. The laughter would thunder at Bob's jokes about the various politicians and Generals involved in the conflict, some were even present during the show. Everyone came to see Bob and his Holiday show. A good time was had by all.

I spent over 8 months on the Khe Sanh Combat Base and went through most of the seasons including Thanksgiving, Christmas and the Siege. Not once did I see Bob or any other celebrity visit the base with good reason. Khe Sanh was a dangerous place and if you managed to get there, "You were nowhere." When I rotated back home I was asked numerous time if I had ever seen Bob Hope. My mouth would drop, unable to explain the depravation I and my fellow Marines had gone through for so long. My response was most often just a smile and a simple, "NO."

I thought about what it would have been like if Bob Hope had brought his holiday show up to Khe Sanh. To that dark, dank very dangerous plateau way out in the middle of nowhere. I closed my eyes and thought for a few minutes and decided I'd have Bob and his show visit Khe Sanh during Christmas of 1967. Sorry if you missed it. We all did.

What a joyous time we all had at the Khe Sanh Combat Base during Christmas of 1967. Besides the weather just being down right pleasant, Bob Hope and Ann Margaret flew in on a couple of C-130's. The Seabees built this big stage over by the ammo dump. We had lights and everything. First Battalion of the 26th Marines went up into the mountains and cut down this huge pine Christmas tree and a tank retriever went out and carried it back. It was placed into the ground over by headquarters. I think some USO guys came up from Saigon and covered the tree with lights and placed a big star on the top. You could see it from miles away. The guys on the hills said it was a beautiful site to behold. Folding chairs were placed out for several thousand. The troops were brought in from the field, down from the hills, and out of the trenches to enjoy the show. Thank goodness the enemy did not select this time to attack, because no one was on guard duty. I guess it was just a sign of respect by the NVA not to attack during this very special time of year.

I cannot tell you how lovely the backup singers and dancers were who accompanied Ms. Margaret. Her voice sounded as sweet as a dove in June. I am embarrassed to describe the short skirts Ms. Margaret and the dancers wore. We were all given warm long johns and gloves as Christmas presents from the USO. Although these items had been left over from the Korean War, they were still much appreciated. Food was flown in from Da Nang, big hams and turkeys with lots of gravy. We were all able to eat as much as our small stomachs could hold. I should not reveal this; and it may have even been against regulations, but there was a hosted bar and we were able to have as much adult beverage as we could consume. All the guys were very careful and responsible with their drinking, which made our Colonel proud. Mr. Hope was particularly funny when he told that joke about the General and the flower girl. We all laughed so hard we cried. When Santa flew in on the helicopter we all yelled in excitement like little children.

A couple of Generals came up from Saigon, they were quite impressive standing up on the big wooden stage in their uniforms with all of their shinny stars and ribbons, hero's all from wars of old. We could tell how proud they all were of us at Khe Sanh. President Johnson sent a representative. He stood up on stage in a bright blue suit with a white shirt and red tie and told us what an important job we were all doing and that he had a personal message to us from the President himself. Then he said something I'll never forget; he said the President of the United States said to all of us at Khe Sanh, "Endeavor To Persevere." Although I did not understand the meaning at the time and it sounded like something out of a Clint Eastwood movie, it was inspiring just the same.

The next morning the Donut Dolly girls who had come with the show gave all of the guys donuts with lots of hot coffee. It was just more than most of us could eat. We were all sad to see Mr. Hope and Ms. Margaret, the big band, the singers and dancers; the donut girls, Santa, the chefs; the President's representative, and the generals leave us. What a great time we all had. Sorry if you missed it. Oh well, that's war...and one more thing, we persevered.

I have now reflected on that period of time, Christmas at Khe Sanh 1967 and it appears that I have misspoke and that my recall of those events as stated in the story above are in error. I fear it all may have just been wishful thinking and a figment of my imagination. As you who were at Khe Sanh during Christmas 1967 well know, Bob Hope and Ann Margaret never came to Khe Sanh during Christmas of that year nor any other year nor did any other USO entertainer. The weather was poor with rain and fog 24 hours a day as it always was during that time of year. There was no stage with lights built by anyone near the ammo dump, or a tall pine Christmas tree (in Vietnam) with lights seen a mile away placed next to headquarters. No tank retrievers on the base. No singers or dancers in little skirts. No ham or turkey with gravy. No open bar with unlimited amounts of adult beverages. The troops never came out of the field, off the hills, or out of the trenches. We did not sing Christmas carols Santa did not visit us, but hill 950 was probed by the NVA on Christmas eve. No Generals came. No Presidential representative in a blue suit with a message taken from a Clint Eastwood movie not yet filmed. No presents of warm long johns and gloves left over from the Korean War given to us by the USO and no jokes told by Mr. Hope about a General and a flower girl. And, we did not laugh until we cried.

I'm sorry. I wish all of those things had been true, but they were not. No my friends, it was a Christmas best forgotten and the last Christmas for so many who were on or near Khe Sanh in 1967 just before the long Siege began. We didn't have much then. It was a miserable time for us all, but I am thankful for what I now have. I think often of those who are no longer with us. I remember them to this day. I'm thankful now for every Christmas I have had since.

VIETNAM WAR VETERANS ARE REUNITED
The Sandersville Progress
By Curt Parsons
Contributing Writer

In 1968 Marine Corporal Frank Archer of Sandersville and fellow Marine Jimmy Dalton were airlifted to safety from the Battle of Khe Sanh in Vietnam. It was the end of their tour of duty, but they left behind buddy Joseph Harrigan who had about four months of duty remaining. It was only this year, 38 years after leaving Vietnam, that Archer was sure Harrigan had made it back to the states.

Archer and Harrigan were tank mates during the Battle of Khe Sanh. Dalton was in the same platoon but was assigned to a different tank. Archer recalls U. S. troops as being surrounded and vastly outnumbered by the North Vietnamese. Because of enemy fire, "everything flown in had to be air dropped," said Archer who at different times served as loader, gunner and driver of his tank. Harrigan was the tank commander.

Archer recently contacted the Sandersville Progress and spoke about his joining the Marines and about the Vietnam War. "When I joined the Marine Corps out of high school I wanted to serve my country," said Archer who ended up being sent to Vietnam. Archer was wounded in 1967 prior to the Battle of Khe Sanh. He spent several months recovering off shore on a navy hospital ship, before returning to the battlefield.

Archer said, when it came time to leave Khe Sanh there was "so much fire fighting and shooting going on," that it took several tries before he was able to climb into a hovering helicopter. Only after boarding the helicopter did Archer realize Dalton had also made it aboard. Although opinions were mixed regarding our Country's involvement in the conflict between North and South Vietnam, Archer said he was unaware of opposition to the war until he returned home. "I just thought that everybody was supposed to serve their country," said Archer.

Both Archer and Dalton were discharged in 1969 from Quantico, Va. It was the last time the two saw each other. Archer got married a short time later and took a job with the Georgia State Fire Marshals Office.

This past spring Joseph Harrigan contacted Archer from his home in Pennsylvania after spotting his name in Red Clay, a Battle of Khe Sanh veteran's publication. Harrigan told Archer he had talked with Dalton, who is from Virginia, but is now living in Macon. It seems that Harrigan and Dalton were looking for Archer and he was looking for them. The three have talked separately with each other and plan to meet face-to-face in Washington D.C. in July at a convention of Khe Sanh veterans.

According to the on-line encyclopedia wikipedia, the Battle of Khe Sanh was a "clear tactical victory for the U.S, "but a debatable strategic victory. The encyclopedia goes on to say that the Khe Sanh base was abandoned by US troops in June of 1968 because of a change in strategy.

INCOMING

A FITTING TRIBUTE
By James "Jimbo" Wodecki

On Monday November 13, 2006, Jim Spear USAF, Bill East USMC, and my self gave interviews about assault weapons, booby traps and artillery, used in the Vietnam War. John Culbertson author of "Arizona Territory" a sniper with 2/5 and another KSV Boyd Barclay (Captain Hook) National Commander 98-99 of the Purple Heart Association were also there to be interviewed. These interviews were held in Arlington Texas by the Discovery channel for an upcoming new Television Show called "Flashback".

I saw it as a chance to let out the anger in me for the Marines who died in the Hill Fights of 1967. They will be remembered. I informed the interviewers that the Colt weapons company and politicians should be held accountable for the disaster that followed the issuance of M-16 garbage rifles to our troops. That piece of junk jammed constantly from the poor quality of gunpowder used in the ammunition when it first was issued. Marines were found shot in the back by the NVA on the Hills 861 and 881. They had also been stabbed in the back by our leaders. You will have to watch the show for the rest of my story. Since I was never under NVA artillery fire

Jim and Bill gave interviews on that subject.

On 15 November, the Vietnam Memorial Moving Wall arrived in Garland TX. I left a copy of the Battalion of Kings and a Poetry book, at the Wall so others could read the heroics of these men KIA at Khe Sanh, and the softer side of our thoughts in our poetry book. I discovered Colonel Don "Doc" Ballard was going to be guest speaker at the dedication ceremonies. I wondered what we could do for the dedication and those Corpsmen and Medics who never received the "DOC" Medal we had given to members of the Khe Sanh Veterans. I then wrote another citation similar to those we had issued. With a few changes to reflect all who had served and died in Vietnam.

Attending the ceremonies on 18 November, were Congressman Sam Johnson and his wife Shirley. Sam is a decorated war hero, whose awards include two Silver Stars, two Legions of Merit, the Distinguished Flying Cross, and one Bronze Star with "V" for Valor, two Purple Hearts, four Air Medals, and three Outstanding Unit Awards. During the Vietnam War, Johnson flew F-4s. While flying his 25th combat mission in 1966, he was shot down over North Vietnam. He spent nearly seven years as a prisoner of war, half of that time in solitary confinement. Johnson recounts the details of his POW experience in his autobiography, "Captive Warriors."

Also attending the ceremony was Congressman Jeb Hensarling, Texas State Representative Joe Driver and Ann Herd, past Gold Star Mothers President, Dorothy Shafernocker (Momma knockers) who's son died while with Sea wolfs helicopter in Vietnam. Dorothy can always be seen at the moving wall. In her younger years she even trucked it all over the country.

Colonel Donald "Doc" Ballard MOH and Chuck Wright USMC were there as guest speakers. Chuck or Charlie Brown as he prefers, is leading the way for a National Memorial for Corpsmen and Medics killed in Vietnam. Our own Billy Martin was there representing the Marine Corps League. My wife PJ and I represented the Khe Sanh Veterans.

There were veterans from all wars, including WWII, Korea, Vietnam, Panama, Kosovo, Desert Storm and Desert Shield, Afghanistan and Iraq. There were young men and women in the ROTC also attending. The senior citizens center where it was held is a city memorial with benches on the grounds with names of Garland Texas Heroes from all wars.

The colors were presented by the Disabled Veterans of America. Songs were sung by Michael Perry, and we all joined in. Sam Johnson walked slowly to the stage to speak first. What a great man still serving his country. Charlie Wright informed the participants of the actions surrounding the MOH being awarded to Doc Ballard. Doc Ballard spoke of the differences in the MOH between service branches. He found humor on a bleak day and even got in a few jabs at the Marines. It was a nice speech very politically incorrect. Doc said he wasn't running for any office so he could say what ever he wanted.

During my speech I informed the crowd that the Khe Sanh Veterans presented the first Doc medal to Don Ballard, in Dallas TX in 2004. Fittingly the last one cast should recognize all Corpsmen, Medics, Doctors and Medical personnel who died in Vietnam. We had a little ceremony with me reading the citation. Donald E. Ballard Medal of Honor recipient Presented the "Doc" Medal. Colonel. Ballard thanked all of the Vietnam Veterans and Families and friends gathered for recognizing these special "Docs," these Men of Honor.

Doc and Ann Herd placed it by the wall to be put in a museum as all mementos are when left at the Wall. It was all video taped and shown on the local TV channel 16 in Garland .I was promised a CD of the events.

PJ and I had Doc Ballard and Joanie over for dinner at our home in Lucas. We watched football and I Barbequed. Doc Ballard informed me that there was another MOH recipient from the Korean War who lived in Lucas. This came as a shock since only 10 people reside in Lucas. It was a fun and relaxing week. Three different shows will be on Discovery Channel and one on Channel 16.

The Members of the KHE SANH VETERANS Association takes great pleasure in presenting the "DOC" Medal to:

all Corpsman, Medics and Doctors, who saved thousands of lives during the in Vietnam War. Of the 58,168 names listed on the Vietnam Memorial Wall. 2,096 are Corpsmen and Medics. Many thousand more would be listed here if it were not for these brave men and women.

For extraordinary heroism and outstanding performance of their duties in action against the North Vietnamese Army and Viet Cong forces in the Republic of Vietnam This Medal is cast in Honor of you "DOC" .Throughout the Vietnam War, imbued with an unrelenting combat spirit and initiative and undeterred by heavy hostile artillery, mortar and small arms fire, under extremely difficult terrain, incessant heat and monsoon rains, the Docs were there, saving lives. Thank You "Doc" from all of the Khe Sanh Veteran members.

Presented at this Vietnam Veterans "Moving Wall", Garland, Texas.

PUBLISHER NOTE:

The following is a follow up to the article on page 37 "Stolen Valor Act moves Through Congress" and why it is an important piece of legislation.

FBI agents have arrested a St. Louis businessman who they say posed as a highly decorated Marine Major even though he never served in the Corps. Forty-eight-year-old Michael Weilbacher was arrested while attending a local Marine Corps League meeting. Federal authorities say he was spotted earlier this month at another event, the Marine Corps Annual Birthday Ball, wearing several distinguished medals.

"He was wearing the Navy Cross, two Silver Stars, four Bronze Stars and just about every medal in the book," said Major William G. Dragan, who attended the event and told ABC News that he immediately became suspicious of Weilbacher. "He boasted of getting his Navy Cross by leading a secret mission against drug cartels in Colombia, which seemed very strange to me," Dragan said.

Weilbacher's girth also raised suspicion, Dragan said. "He is massively overweight, something like 400 pounds, and yet he claimed he had just left the Marines, which did not add up because he could never meet USMC physical standards," Dragan said. Federal authorities say there is no record of Weilbacher ever serving in the Marines. Weilbacher was charged under a federal law that makes it illegal to wear Armed Forces medals without being authorized. The charge carries a penalty of six months in prison and/or a fine of $50,000.

A bill currently before Congress, "The Stolen Valor Act of 2005," would also make it against the law to make verbal or written fraudulent claims of having been awarded medals or decorations.

FBI agent Tom Cottone Jr., who has investigated more than 200 cases of imposters wearing military medals, says, "They do it to feed their own egos and gain instant respect and admiration." "The imposters also attempt to enhance their careers and achieve financial gain," Cottone says. "There are probably thousands of individuals currently wearing unearned medals and decorations and thousands more making false claims of receiving military awards. "Weilbacher was released on bond today after an initial appearance before a federal magistrate. He is scheduled to be arraigned in federal court Dec. 7. He could not be reached for comment.

A Former Marine Sergeant Gary Lakis, who boasted of a chest full of medals was exposed on World News Tonight as having never seen combat or won the medals he wore on his uniform. He was investigated by both the FBI and the Defense Department's Criminal Investigative Service. But, the U.S. Attorney's office in San Diego did not prosecute the case.

As for Lakis, investigators say he had moved to Australia during the time he was under investigation.

Lakis had been awarded a $66 million government contract to enhance security at U.S. Navy bases on the west coast and in Hawaii. But Pentagon records obtained by ABC News showed that Lakis never saw combat and never received the medal he wore.

"LESS WE FORGET"
Article Leatherneck July 1968
"USMC 11"

By John Martin

The Marines who manned the isolated base at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, needed help. The members of the 26th Marine Regiment and its supporting units were surrounded by estimated tens of thousands of North Vietnamese regulars. For 77 days, commencing with the first heavy enemy bombardment on January 21, 1968, the Marines had been under the constant threat of an all out enemy attack. The only supply route was by air and, in landing and taking off, several fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters had been destroyed by enemy artillery.

But no one was sitting idly by during the crisis. In addition to the Khe Sanh Marines' own reply from the artillery pieces of the 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, U. S. aircraft strafed, bombed and blasted enemy strongholds in the surrounding hills. On April 1, Operation Pegasus was initiated with the mission of clearing the land supply route to Khe Sanh and easing the pressure on the Marines who were holding it. Route #9 stretches from Dong Ha in the east, through Ca Lu and Khe Sanh, and eventually to the Laotian border. From Dong Ha to Ca Lu the road was clear for convoys. But from Ca Lu to Khe Sanh it ran along the twisting and picturesque Quang Tri River and then over the mountainous hills to Khe Sanh. And ever since the enemy had planted an ambush on the road, January 13, 1968, the area had been considered hostile territory and the lifeline to Khe Sanh had been cut off from U. S. traffic. Removing the enemy forces from that area was the first objective of Pegasus.

After B-52 strikes and Marine artillery had saturated the hills adjacent to the road, the U. S. Army's First Air Cavalry Division began to sweep the terrain above the Route #9, moving toward Khe Sanh. The Marine phases of the penetration began with the First Marine Regiment, composed of its own 1st and 3d Battalions and the 2d Battalion from the Third Marines. They moved directly through the valley, clearing out enemy positions which had escaped the onslaught of the air and artillery strikes.

Almost directly in the wake of the First Marines, the 11th Engineer Battalion began their work on the road. The Marine engineers had been given until April 12 to fulfill their mission: To improve and widen the road to accommodate traffic to Khe Sanh and, where necessary, to erect bridges capable of supporting the heavy vehicles which would soon be moving up and down the road. Although the road bore the designation of Route #9, the 11th Engineers quickly posted their trademark signs as fast as they moved up the road. The signs, unofficially, renamed the 18 miles of winding highway "USMC 11."

The 3d Platoon from the 3d Bridge Company kicked off the engineering operation when they began putting up the first bridge, April 1. They were succeeded by Alpha Company, Bravo Company and Delta Company of the engineers, all of whom played a curious game of leapfrog in opening the road and building the bridges. According to 1stLt Duncan Hoffman, executive officer, Alpha Company, as soon as the road was cleared far enough ahead one company of engineers would begin work on a bridge. Then, as quickly as another site was open, a second company would leapfrog the construction at the first site to begin work farther down the line. The pace quickened from there.

The 11th Engineers provided bridges at 18 crossings, including several supplementary bridges called "by-passes," to complete the project by April 11, one day ahead of their deadline. Commencing with Bridge 9/17 (the 17th bridge on Route #9 and the first bridge past Ca Lu), they worked their way up to the Rao Quan Valley which precedes the hill route to Khe Sanh and planted Bridge 9/34 at the bottom of that valley. The going was nearly always rough, the dust gathering on the Marines' sweat-soaked bodies like insects on flypaper. But one thing which added speed to the engineers' efforts was the fact that the French had worked along the same route years before during the French-Indochina War. Although the N.V.A. had blown up all the remaining French bridges during their activities of the past year, the sound masonry abutments still remained in most cases and these provided a tailor-made foundation upon which the Marines could improve.

Even this, however, was not always possible. In several cases, at Bridge 9/34 for example, the French supports were too far apart to allow the engineers to construct a practical bridge in limited time. In these cases, by-passes were constructed and the French abutments were turned into guard posts or used as parking spots for tanks. The engineers constructed the bypasses by first positioning several large cylindrical steel culverts lengthwise in the river bed, allowing the water to flow through them. The culverts were then packed into place with numerous sandbags and covered with tons of dirt from dump trucks. Bulldozers carved out a supplementary road leading to the by-pass and smoothed over the dirt on top of the by-pass to form a driving surface.

In addition to the by-passes which were constructed at all sites where a conventional "bulk" bridge was impractical, by-passes were also set up alongside the places where there were bulk bridges. Further, at a site where only a by-pass could be built, two by-passes were made. This served a twofold purpose. First, the by-passes allowed an easier means of crossing for heavier equipment, such as tanks. Second, they imposed a double challenge to any enemy sneaking in to attempt to blow up one of the bridges.

More security came with the Marines of Fox Company, 2nd Battalion, Third Marines. Men like PFC Richard Miller and PVT Richard Farnsworth were strategically detailed along the road at every bridge site to set up bunkers as guard posts and to defend the bridges if an attack materialized. Another observation post against enemy activity was "The Rock Pile." This imposing rocky crag sits along "USMC 11" and the Marines who man it have an excellent view of several of the bridges near Ca Lu. The guard duty was made easier, in places. Many of the bridges were built as little as 75 to 100 meters apart. Miles wound out between others.

Problems, of course, were bound to occur as the road work progressed. At severely cratered. Here, explosives had to be used to dislodge more dirt and the excess was then pushed around by the bulldozers to fatten up the road. One factor which aided the dozers in their quick improvements on the road was the old surfacing laid by the French. In only a few places could the hard surface still be seen through the layer of brown dust which now covers the road and clouds up behind each passing vehicle. And, elsewhere, although parts of it had been broken up by artillery and other spots had crumbled from long use, the hard chunks still provided an excellent foundation upon which the 11th Engineers could build.

With the old abutments still standing and the road surface still evident, further earmarks of another era were found in abandoned French bunkers alongside the road. It was obvious that Route #9 had played a significant part in the history of the struggles of South Vietnam. One of the most vivid and tragic sites of French activity is present in the vicinity of Bridge 9/34, spanning the Rao Quan River deep in the valley of the same name. The Rao Quan River is a tributary to the Quang Tri River. None of the 18 bridges, in fact, crossed the Quang Tri itself, but spanned the streams which lead into it.

Evidence of French attempts to bridge the Rao Quan lie within 150 meters of the present 9/34. At one point, the river is still somewhat bridged by the twisted wreckage of a now rusted steel suspension framework which was blasted from its high supports, 50 feet above the river bed, by the enemy many years ago. Close by, a cement bridge with steel reinforcing cables protruding from its broken body, also lies in bits and chunks in the river where it met the same fate as its metal counterpart.

A third French bridge was never completed. Its supports jut out from both sides of the enclosing hills but the signs are apparent that the work was suddenly abandoned before completion. Why, no one seems to know. The Marine version of 9/34 is a floating bridge which consists of a wooden platform resting across four rubber pontoon-type floats. The floats were heli-lifted in by the Army's CH-54 "Sky Crane."

Cooperation between the Marines and the Army had been outstanding all through Pegasus, and the 11th Engineers received a special commendation from the Commanding General of the First Air Cavalry Division for their work on the road. Army helicopters were used on other bridges too. Bridge 9/28, according to Major Joseph C. Thorp, 11th Engineers S-2 and S-3 officer, was fitted with a 30-foot platform atop the old French abutments. Bridges 9/31 and 9/33 both received 38-foot, four-inch spans. In each case, the bridges were lowered by the helicopter while Marine engineers on the ground guided the heavy platform into position with guy lines. But the action wasn't all on the bridges. Pfc Kevin Rooney, of Fox Company, was guarding Bridge 9/32 and commented, "There hasn't been much action this close to Ca Lu but they get more further on up the road."

Rooney was right. Delta Company, 11th Engineers, was patrolling the section of road nearest to Khe Sanh and they were kept busy. A portion of the company, led by 1stLt Floyd Campbell, captured two NVA. soldiers almost at Khe Sanh's doorstep and discovered several more enemy bunkers in the area which they cleaned out with Willy Peter grenades. PFC Larry E. Ramsey, a combat engineer with Delta, was usually the grenade heaver and PFC Larry E. Sherbert and PFC J. R. Albert were always close by with more handfuls of the hot stuff to back him up.

With the road finished by April 11 and officially opened April 12, the first vehicle rolled into Khe Sanh. It was a Jeep and its chief passenger was LtColonel V. A. Perry, commander of the 11th Engineers. But a Jeep is a versatile vehicle and, with the road making treacherous curves in places, and plagued by bumps and dips, LtColonel Perry knew that one final test had to be made before the road could be considered in satisfactory condition. He ordered his men to take the "low-bed" to Khe Sanh.
"If that low-bed can make it," said SSgt Donald Thompson, NCOIC of the engineers' motor transport section, "anything can make it." The low-bed was a large, cumbersome, 5-ton truck and, for a trailer, pulled a long flat-bed designed for hauling heavy equipment. At 9:30 a.m. on Easter Sunday the low-bed rolled out of Ca Lu and, with SSgt Thompson and 1stLt Bud Westmoreland, motor transport officer, bouncing ahead in a Jeep, it began its slow, plodding journey up "USMC 11." At 11 a.m. the low-bed rolled over the pontoon bridge at 9/34 and then I up the steep hills toward Khe Sanh. The supply route to the Marine base was open and ready for business.

With convoys now going back and forth along the road, things began to slack off. Enemy shelling of Khe Sanh had picked up again but none of the enemy showed up along the road and it was assumed that the N.V.A. had vacated the area for the time being. No chances were taken, however. Marine artillery was called in on several of the hills near the bridges every night. The Marines stood their guard posts with alert eyes. But now, with a little time off, members of Fox Company, like Cpl Terry A. Kelley and Pfc David J. Gardner, took advantage of a job well done by going swimming in the ice cold waters of the Rao Quan River.

Cpl Frank Geramita found that the swift-flowing water beneath Bridge 9/32 enabled him to get a decent shave without cutting himself in a million places. And LCpl Tolbert McGlohorn could now brush his teeth in the clear stream with no pasty after taste to rinse out with the precious supply from his canteen. The Marines found other sport in bicycles, apparently left behind by the enemy in their hasty departure.

A good share of the engineers was still hard at work, though. Many of the supplementary bypasses were still under construction next to the bulk bridges. They had to be completed as soon as possible so that the convoys could use them while the professional-type bridges were being moved elsewhere in Vietnam. But the big goal had been achieved, that of opening the supply route to Khe Sanh. And, with Marines in Khe Sanh already branching out into the surrounding hills to chase down the enemy, it looked like the recent activities of Pegasus had served their purpose.

And, in addition to the road, the engineers could count several things at Ca Lu itself among their recent achievements. Upon arriving there they had built almost all of the bunkers, cleared fields of fire, set up ammunition and oil supply points, and had constructed the berms (fortified parking places) where the helicopters could land. On the road itself, they had put in an estimated 40,000 man-hours in meeting their deadline and had used more than 5,000 equipment hours. And one piece of that equipment, now sitting back at Ca Lu, sums up the whole theme of the engineers' accomplishments on "USMC 11." On one side of the truck is painted the words: "If you can't swim it; bridge it." The other side reads: "Khe Sanh or bust."

The Defenders of Khe Sanh, As Reported By Leatherneck Magazine July 1968

By John Martin

Although the few newspapers which had filtered in shortly before the Easter weekend declared that the threat to Khe Sanh was over, the Marines who were manning the base were taking no chances. True, they could now eat their C-ration meals above ground and engage in outdoor activities such as football and volleyball without fear of incoming rounds, but they still made it a point to keep their helmets on and their flak jackets tight about their bodies whenever they ventured far from the safety of their bunkers.

But there was a definite release of tension in the air. With the withdrawal of several battalions from the Khe Sanh base to go into the surrounding hills to seek out the enemy, and the knowledge that the road from Ca Lu was being secured by the infantry and made accessible by the engineers, the atmosphere was one of a big, inaudible "Whew!" For 77 days, commencing January 21, 1968, the Marines had lived a life of constant harassment. It had been approximately two and one-half months of constant enemy shelling, day and night. For 11 weeks they had lived with filth, grime, red dust -and rats. There had been uncountable hours, minutes, and seconds of fear, prayer, hope and death around the battle-scarred bunkers of Khe Sanh.

But in spite of it all, morale ran high. And Col David E. Lownds, the commander of the 26th Marine Regiment and its supporting units during the continual peppering of Khe Sanh, "never had a doubt" that, in the event the enemy had elected to attack, Khe Sanh could have been defended. "I had the finest enlisted men in the world," Colonel Lownds stated. "And they had the best morale, under the conditions, that any commander could ask for. Since January 21," he recalled, "there was no hot chow, no beer, and no showers available. But every Marine I saw had a smile on his face. To them goes all the credit." Lt/ General Robert E. Cushman, Jr., commanding general of the III Marine Amphibious Force in Vietnam, expressed his opinion as to why the North Vietnamese had never ventured to attack Khe Sanh. "Because they'd have been slaughtered," he said, "and they knew it!"

General Cushman attributed the let-up on Khe Sanh to three things. First, he pointed out; there was the fortitude and combativeness of the Marines there. Second, there was the tremendous air effort which blasted the enemy from their positions in their hills. And, third, there was the accurate barrage of artillery fire directed at the enemy by the 1st Battalion, 13th Marine Regiment. "The trouble is," said General Cushman, "that everybody counts the incoming rounds. No one ever counts the outgoing. We replied a hundredfold to every enemy shell. We beat them down. The area was becoming untenable for the enemy."

The opinions of General Cushman and Colonel Lownds are shared by all the Marines who can say, "I served at Khe Sanh." Corporal Don H. Wiggins was "kind of disappointed" that the enemy had never attacked. And L/Cpl Timothy Wright, who had been flown into Khe Sanh as a replacement in early March, during the heat of the onslaught, told us that he didn't mind it a bit. "I knew what it was like when I found out I was coming here," he said. With the bigger part of the threat to Khe Sanh diminished, it was evident that a smaller force could handle the base itself and that many of the Marines would move into the hills surrounding Khe Sanh to provide a greater area of defense. Some were glad about leaving their bunkers; others were not.

"I was scared out of my wits when I got here in February," said L/Cpl Joe Haggard, "but, now, look . . . here's the place. We dug the bunkers and got the incoming, and now I might have to leave. There may be hot chow in other places but this . . . this is home."

Sgt Johnny Baker shared Haggard's opinion. "I was shaky when I got here," he admitted. "But Khe Sanh is like any other duty station. If I'm going to get 'blown away,' I'll get 'blown away' no matter where I'm at"

All the Marines seemed to think of the incoming rounds in a philosophical manner. "If I get hit," said PFC Robert Reyna, a member of Alpha Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, "there must be a reason; because something is guiding my every step and movement. I'm proud to be here and glad to be doing my part."

And Lt Charles T. Kelly, USN, one of the chaplains at Khe Sanh, had words to that effect in his Holy Saturday services, held in a dingy bunker at Khe Sanh. "Men," he said, "we must consider ourselves dead to sin, but alive to God."

The men sang "Rock of Ages" and "Holy God, We Praise Thy Name," and Chaplain Kelly gave the epistle to Cpl Jim Hill to read aloud and Cpl Dennis Finley read the gospel. Faith, hope and sheer determination helped sustain the Marines at Khe Sanh during those hammering days. They had faith in their own capabilities; hope that the supplies would come in; and the pilots had sheer determination in flaunting enemy fire to deliver their necessary cargoes.

Reminiscent of the Berlin Airlift in scope was the supply stream which flowed into Khe Sanh. In spite of heavy enemy artillery and hornets' nests of small arms fire, directed specifically at many of the incoming planes, the pilots got through to Khe Sanh. They either unloaded their cargoes in precious seconds on the runway before taking off again or dropped them from the air by parachute.

And the fact that not all the supply planes flew out again was dramatized in the wreckage of several helicopters and transport planes, lying in twisted metal graveyards along the airstrip. But the planes rolled in despite the enemy, because the Marines at Khe Sanh needed the supplies to keep them going. "They did a good job," remarked Major W. T. Cook, assistant S-4 officer for the 26th Marines.

"We received outstanding support from the Air Force planes, the Third Marine Division, and the Force Logistic Command."

Corporal Ernie Ross, a member of the open air post office section at Khe Sanh, also had praise for the mail drops. "Most of the time," he said, "the mail came in whenever they could get it to us. Once, more than a week went by with no mail. Then, they dropped in 40,000 pounds of it." Looking at an aerial view of Khe Sanh is like looking at one-third of the base. The rest is underground. In small, one- and two-man "hootches," to larger L-shaped "office" bunkers, all the way up to the underground complex which houses the Combat Operations Center, the Marines lived and worked beneath the red dust carpet of Khe Sanh, their way lit only by candles and, in some places, electric lights that didn't always work.

One of the most vital and active points was "Charlie Med," the casualty treatment center operated by Charlie Company of the 3d Medical Battalion. Although Charlie Med treated upwards of 2,000 casualties during the siege of Khe Sanh, according to Lt Edward Feldman, one of the Navy doctors there, his own biggest challenge came on the first day of the bombardment when PFC Robert Mussari was hit by an 82-mm. mortar fuse which lodged in his stomach without detonating. "They brought him in with a large battle dressing on his abdomen," recalled Lt Feldman, "and we took him down inside Charlie Med and padded him with sandbags."

While HM3 Roger Tillotson, a Navy corpsman, stood by with four flashlights shining into the exposed area, SSgt Sniegowski handed the instruments to Lt Feldman who removed the tissue around the fuse and extracted it in a ten-minute operation. The fuse, which was slightly smaller than a hot sauce bottle, was then buried outside until an EOD team could arrive to blow it up.

"We had no anesthetic available for the operation," Lt Feldman said, "but he never flinched or cried once. He said he wanted to come back to Khe Sanh again." (Mussari received additional treatment in Pennsylvania.)

"This is typical of all the Marines," Feldman went on. "They never cry out in pain. In all of our experiences, most of the casualties are more worried about their buddies than themselves. None of them wanted to leave Khe Sanh."

PFC James C. Heard, who had arrived at Khe Sanh shortly before the hostilities began, was one such Marine. Heard was hit in the arm with shrapnel from an exploding mortar. His wound wasn't serious enough to warrant evacuation. However, he was the type who would have wanted to come Back, if the injury had required him to be medevaced. Heard shared the unanimous sigh of relief, however, after the threat to Khe Sanh had died down. "You feel real good after everything is over," he said.

The Army's First Air Cavalry Division, having finished its sweep up Route #9, had moved into Khe Sanh. But they were already in the process of mounting helicopters out again, to head for other parts of the war. The Marine force, too, had been largely diminished, with field units swarming the hills around Khe Sanh to take enemy positions and provide a more mobile defense of the area.

And, while the 11th Engineers put the finishing touches on Route #9, the supply route they had nicknamed "USMC 11," the enemy struck again at Khe Sanh. All day on Easter Sunday, artillery rounds fell on the base. This time, the fire was thought to come from inside Laos, since Marines had captured most of the enemy gun points in the hills. But incoming was nothing knew to Marines in Vietnam, especially those at Khe Sanh, and the possibility of the problems involved in an enemy ground attack had been eliminated.

Perhaps one of the biggest threats to Khe Sanh during the deluge was the fear of the unknown. Newspapers had suggested that the defenders of Khe Sanh might meet the same fate as the French had in the historic battle of Dien Bien Phu. On March 14, the 54th day of the Khe Sanh saga, the word went around that North Vietnamese General Giap, who was reportedly masterminding the attack on Khe Sanh, had finished Dien Bien Phu on Day 54! But Khe Sanh is still there and the Marines are now certain that history will not repeat itself. . . .

One of our KSV members is a great artist and true patriot. His name is Dennis Smith. If you are traveling on Interstate 5 between Sacramento and Portland or on to Seattle stop and take the time to see this memorial. It is only 10 miles or so up highway 97 out of weed California. Weed is on Interstate 5, you will be glad you did. This memorial honors all veterans from all wars and peacetime. It is called "the living memorial sculpture garden" It was founded by a group of veteran's in1988. It is now sponsored and maintained by the Kiwanis club of Weed/Lake Shastina. Dennis Smith did the sculptures. I am pictured paying my respects to our colors and a memorial to the Iwo Jima marines. The sculpture is named: "the greatest generation.'' Mike "Animal" Preston.

Another sculpture is called' So Much, By So Few, For So Many " The mountain pictured in the background is Mt.. Shasta . All 14, 142 feet. I think it is the second highest mountain in California, right after Mt. Whitney @ 14,494 , the tallest mountain in the continental U.S., AWSOME !

Sam Messer, CBMU-301 DET-B and several other Vietnam Veterans recently spoke to a group of Schoolchildren in regards to their service in Vietnam and Khe Sanh. The following letter was sent by their teacher thanking them for taking time to enlighten her students

Hi Sam and friends,

It was so good to hear from you. I just got back from being with the eighth graders where I met you. My class has been on Thanksgiving break and we just got back on Tuesday the 28th. I just finished getting my pictures printed so they could see you and your friends. They were very excited about you and we have looked at the web pictures. With all the media attention and so forth they are very smart when it comes to Iraq and the current war. Vietnam is known by some because some have relatives that were there too. My older brother had a draft number of three when he was just 19 so he joined the Air Force. He was there for three months and then was stationed in Thailand. We all here at our school want to thank all of you for your bravery, love of country, or whatever you possessed to go fight such an unpopular war. We thank you, respect you, and pray for you for protecting our rights and freedom. The kids want to write you so be on the lookout for some letters. Again it was so nice to meet you and your buddies. Take care and just drop us a line now and then. We will be e-mailing you also if that's ok? They have some questions but I will e-mail them next week. We pray for you and your family everyday. Love, Kathie Hockenberry and her second graders

Kathie and class:
I am sorry for the delay in emailing all of you. Sometimes things happen that you don't have control of. My wife and daughter insisted I accompany them on a road trip to Florida, and back home to Olathe, Kansas. You and the kids made a bunch of grown men cry at Arlington, and we thank you for it! Some of those men pushing me around had never been thanked or welcomed home, when they returned from Vietnam. You made a good weekend great. I thank you again for all of us old farts. I have a web site I hope you and the kids will visit, plus a copulation of questions and answers from the last few years from students looking to interview a Vietnam Vet.

My Web Site shows me as a 21 year old kid in Viet Nam. There are pictures that show a regular kid, growing up in Kansas in the late 40's and 50's. I went to Vietnam a 20 yr old naive, kid. I turned 21 at Khe Sanh, Oct 18, 1967, the site of the 68 Siege that lasted 77 days. By the time I left Khe Sanh I felt like a 45 yr old man. If You Have questions I have not answered email them to me at Sam & Brenda's web site. You can also visit the Khe Sanh Veterans Website, where we go to find support from our brothers.

IT GOT PASSED

The Stolen Valor Act Passed a vote in the Senate & House of Representatives and only awaits the President's signature

The House of Representatives passed a Senate-approved bill Wednesday that would make it a felony to claim unearned military decorations. The bill would close a loophole in current law that allows phony recipients to escape prosecution as long as they don't physically wear the awards they claim.

If signed into law by the president, the Stolen Valor Act of 2005 would impose up to six months imprisonment and a maximum $5,000 fine for any false verbal, written or physical claim to an award or decoration authorized for military members. Penalties would be doubled for fraudulent claims to decorations specifically awarded for combat valor, such as the Navy Cross, Silver Star and Medal of Honor.

During floor debate on the bill, which was passed unanimously by the Senate Sept. 7, House Judiciary Committee chairman Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., referenced recent cases in Illinois and Missouri of men who have never served a day in uniform each claiming to be Marine officers and recipients of the Navy Cross, the nation's second highest award for valor. Rep. John Salazar, D-Colo.,who introduced the House version of the legislation in the summer of 2005, said the bill re-introduces a precedent set by George Washington in 1782. When he established the Badge of Military Merit, the nation's only military award at the time, Washington wrote, "Should anyone who is not entitled to these honors have the insolence to assume the badges of them, they shall be severely punished," Salazar said.

The House's approval of the Senate bill, introduced by Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., on Nov. 10, 2005, was the result of a last-minute bi-partisan effort to put the legislation to a vote before the end of the current session. Salazar agreed on Sunday to set aside his own bill, which has been hung up in the judiciary committee since he introduced it, in order to support Conrad's nearly identical legislation on the Senate side. "We don't care if our name is on it. We don't care if we're 30th on the list of co-sponsors. We just want something done," Salazar spokesman Tate Rosenbusch said Monday

Sound Off Letter of the Month

Although we just celebrated the 231st anniversary of our beloved Corps, I want to take a moment to recall the 229th Birthday of the Marine Corps. In another uneventful day for us here in America, we went about our business without notice to the valor, courage and commitment of a lowly private first class.

PFC Christopher Adlesperger that day in Fallujah, Iraq, did what it is Marines do. This Marine on that day did rise in the blinding chaos of combat to distinguish himself by seeking to protect and save his fellow Marines. Although he survived the events of November 10, 2004, Adlesperger was later killed in action.

This Nov. 10 would have been the 25th birthday of Jason L. Dunham from Scio, N.Y. We better knew Jason as Corporal Dunham, formerly of "Kilo" Company, 3d Battalion, Seventh Marine Regiment. On April 14, 2004, in Al Anbar province, Cpl Dunham raced to a checkpoint to be there for his Marines. The events of that day and its resulting combat led directly to his death.

Cpl Dunham's actions saved the lives of his fellow Marines that day. It brings me directly to my own day of infamy when, as we stormed Hill 881 North in a fire team and squad assault, I watched helplessly as Lance Corporal Philip F. Sheridan raced to the hilltop to get a better location to call in the supporting fire that he knew would protect and save his Marines. LCpl Sheridan died that Easter Sunday, on the side of a hill far from his home in Garden City, Long Island, N.Y.

What, then, were the meanings of this Nov. 10 and the ceremonies? I should hope it was to recall that we, who have served in good times and bad, remain ever faithful—that from the inception of our Corps in Philadelphia at Tun Tavern to the present conflicts around this globe, we Marines have always been, and shall always be, willing to do that which others could not or will not do.

From the first recruit to earn the title to those Marines who today wear the eagle, globe and anchor, being a Marine should be a joyous and somber event.

The joy of our collective service and sacrifice to God, Country and Corps is, suffice it to say, well deserved. We remember that freedom is not free, and only those who have fought for it understand its price.

These are the emotions that brought me to the 231st anniversary of our Corps. It was another chance for me to recall all who have come before, during and after my time in this greatest of all organizations.

Marines Save Iraqi Baby to Honor Fallen Medic

A Routine Patrol Turned Into a Mission to Help Sick Child. The story of a group of Marines' quest to save a sick baby in war-torn Iraq gives some hope to humanity this holiday season.

At the center of the story is Navy medic Chris Walsh and the 1st Battalion 25th Marines. The Marines were patrolling the streets of Fallujah in June when they faced an enemy attack. "An IED exploded immediately adjacent to Chris' vehicle, so they all piled out to chase the trigger man," said Capt. Sean Donovan. But the Marines had a surprise encounter in their pursuit." And as they did so, a woman came from one of the houses calling to them that the baby was sick. So they stopped, and Chris came up and looked at the baby," Donovan said. "And this was baby Mariam, and it was immediately clear to him that this baby desperately needed care." Baby Mariam was just 2 months old and suffering from a rare intestinal abnormality. Under the threat of another attack, Walsh had to make a quick decision. "Right on the spot, the mission changed from the trigger man to the baby girl," Donovan said. A routine military mission suddenly became a lifesaving mission for Walsh and those around him.

"The shared willingness to engage this mission was the bravery of the family in bringing her forward," Donovan said. Visiting Under Cover of Darkness For the next three months, Walsh and the team made house calls under the cloak of darkness into the dangerous city to help the baby. They were trying to get baby Mariam stabilized, taking photographs, consulting experts, and trying to get her papers to leave the country for medical care. Staff Sgt. Ed Ewing led the visits. "We showed up at all different times of the night," Ewing said. "They never knew when we were coming. We did that purposely to protect us and protect their family."

As months went by, the unit continued its routine patrols. On Sept. 4, tragedy struck when one of their Humvees was hit once again by an IED. This time three men in the unit were killed -- Lance Cpl. Eric Valdepenas; Cpl. Jared Shoemaker; and Walsh, baby Mariam's guardian angel. For those who survived, saving baby Mariam became a eulogy to their fallen comrades. "To honor Chris, to honor the other men that died in the battalion, we had to go through with the mission and keep fighting," said Father Marc Bishop. Mission accomplished eventually the Marines won their fight, and baby Mariam was granted permission to leave Iraq.

Dr.Rafael Pieretti from Boston's Massachusetts General Hospital performed the surgery, which took place in October. "She's doing well," Pieretti said. "She's gained weight. She's socializing more. She has a different life." On the eve of baby Mariam's arrival, Walsh's mother, Maureen, received a letter from Donovan, telling her the story of a life that was saved because of her son's big heart. The letter from Donovan read in part: "Although he won't be visible, Chris will be very much on that patrol, the hope for Mariam's very tiny life having arisen from the charity and gallantry of your son." Recently Maureen Walsh met baby Mariam. "It made me feel like Chris was there," she said. "He wanted something like this. He wanted to make a difference in somebody's life."

WHERE DO THESE MEN COME FROM?
Daniel's Ordeal

Monday November 13, 2006 started like any Friday the 13th only it fell on Monday that week. I joked with my office mate about how frustrating the day had been when I received the call that put my world on hold.

At about 1:30 in the afternoon I received a phone call from Major Mathews in Iraq. He made sure he was speaking to L/CPL Renshaws mother and then said "Your son is stable, he has been shot. He was airlifted to the hospital and is out of surgery and stable. I will stay on the line as long as you need and answer any questions you may have". I couldn't think of any questions. He knew I would have some so he gave me his email address and told me someone from Hawaii would be calling to be my liaison with the Marine Corp.

Before he hung up he gave me our first goal. As soon as Daniel was stable enough to travel they would be sending him to Germany. So I had a small first step. I would come to cherish each step and each goal because they all gave me hope.

Within the next two hours I got a call from the liaison in Hawaii. He told me that the Marine Corp would be sending me to Daniel when they knew where he was going to be. Thus started the most profoundly life altering experience anyone could have.

I always want to remember the support I received from our family and friends and dozens and dozens of total strangers. After Rusty and I went and told my parents and my sons they started a phone web. I would call them for the next 2 weeks with any updates and they would call everyone they knew and on and on. What a blessing it was to not have to speak to all those people each time there was information on Daniel. Email was the easiest way for us to communicate and we eventually received emails from as far away as India. Prayer circles were started all over the country and the media showed great restraint by dealing with Greg Merchel and allowing us our space.

Tuesday I spent the day waiting for the phone call from Germany telling me Daniel was stable enough to move. I got that call from the surgeon in Germany who spent a lot of time explaining Daniels injuries, and treatment. She told me that Daniel had received excellent care in Iraq and the surgeons there had done a magnificent job cleaning him up and caring for his wounds. She then told me that his next step would be the US and they would call me when he was going to be moved. Lastly she gave me a phone number to call Daniel.

Wednesday morning at 7:00 a.m. I made the international call and spoke to Daniel. He said he was great. I wondered if he was really great or just great drugs. It was great drugs, but just getting to speak with him, his voice low and whispery gave me hope and happiness that I carried with me all day.

Thursday. When I called Daniel he said "Mom, I hurt." Those are the three words that will devastate any mother. I started doing laundry so I would have clothes to pack when they told me I could go to my son.

Friday, the Marine Corp Liaison called me at about 4:00 and told me Daniel had arrived in Bethesda. We asked if we could fly on Sat. He called back 20 minutes later with flights leaving Saturday morning at 6:30.

All during this week, my family and friends and total strangers sent me cards letters and emails with best wishes for Daniel. A fellow realtor offered to handle my business and even the bank brought us flowers. The Guys from the Army Recruiting office upstairs in my building brought me a plant, a card and offers of assistance in anything we might need. I told them I would probably need muscle when we got back because Rusty's house was under contract and we had to move him out of it. They actually helped us move.

Saturday we were on our way. When we arrived in Washington DC. The Marine Corp Liaisons office sent a van to pick us up. He took us to our room in the Navy Lodge, got us checked in and then straight to Daniels room at Bethesda. During our stay the Marine Corp paid us $60 per day for meals, all of our lodging and our airline flights. The Semper Fi Fund covered the cost of our cell phone bills and any other bill we might have. The goal is for the family's of the injured to have no financial hardship while they stay with their Marine. Some of the families had stays of months. The Marine Corp and Semper Fi fund paid lost wages, bills, childcare, whatever was necessary for these families.

My first glimpse of Daniel was hard. I noticed how thin his face was, his coloring was very bad and he was in a lot of pain. My second glance showed me the most beautiful quilt covering his bed. It was a purple heart quilt hand stitched and quilted to keep him warm. This was the first of many lovely gifts sent from people all over the United States as their way to support our injured troops.

They do deserve our support. The next two weeks went by in a haze of hospital rooms, hotel rooms, McDonalds and Subway. The overall strongest feeling during this time was one of hope and happiness. Ward 5 is where most of the injured marines are sent when they get out of intensive care. Most of the Marines had lost limbs or had injuries that were very severe. The surgeon called Daniels injury, "just a simple gunshot wound." It is extremely difficult to wrap your mind around that phrase, however compared to 90% of the men on Ward 5 Daniels injuries were simple for the surgeon. He had a sliced liver collapsed lung, shattered diaphragm and a couple cracked ribs, but all of them would eventually heal.

The people I met during our stay were incredible. The servicemen were upbeat most days and working hard to get healthy. The overall attitude was excitement. Excitement for the future and all of the things they would be able to accomplish once they healed enough to get their new prosthesis'.

The technology is exciting. Even the young men who lost both legs would get new ones with computer chips that would match their strides; Deep sea divers could get special prosthetics for diving. There was never a feeling of loss with these men. Even on the bad days they and their families were supportive of each other. One father told this story, his son had brought back a virus from Iraq and his leg would not heal enough to get a prosthesis. Every few days they would have to go back into surgery to have the bad tissue removed and the pain was intense. The continual surgeries and the lack of progress had zapped his sons will to fight and the father was very worried. All he asked for was the spark back in his sons' eyes. The doctors tried every medi-was working. The known cure was penicillin; however his son was allergic to that drug. The doctors finally decided to give him penicillin in a 2% solution and adjust the amount every 15 minutes to build up a resistance to the allergy. That day when the man went into his sons' room after the treatment his son said " Dad, can you please take me outside. I want to be in the sun." The treatment had worked and the Dad got his wish. His son was on his way to recovery and would be able to leave Bethesda in a week or so to start his physical therapy and get his new leg. They had been in the hospital 4 weeks by that time. Everyone on the Ward celebrated the victories. No matter how bad the day was, no where was there the attitude of lucky him. Every parent and every injured Marine felt lucky me.

We met parents who had been staying in housing on base for as long as 4 months, working to bring their sons home. No one was bitter. They were just grateful to be able to be with their loved ones.

The other overwhelming feeling was that the injured servicemen would all go back and do it again even knowing they would come home torn up. In the mind of the Marines the struggle is basic. Good versus Evil and protect your brother. I was deeply affected by the courage of these young men.

We had a couple of tough days. The worst one came after we had been there 3 or 4 days. Daniel got a call from his buddies in Iraq. At first we were really excited but the call was a sad one. The patrol that had taken Daniel to the Medivac unit had hit an IED and 3 or the 4 men on board had died. One of them was Daniels close friend L/CPL Mario Gonzales, he had held Daniels hand while they put him on the helicopter and he said you lucky guy you're going home. They had been through Afghanistan together and we have tons of pictures of the two of them goofing off and showing off. Daniel had thought that they had hit the IED after dropping him off and he shut down on us. He did not respond at all to anything we said or did. Nor did he want to talk to us about his friend. The new commander of the Marine Corp just happened to pick that day to visit the ward and when he saw how frightened I was he wrapped me in his arms and I sobbed. The poor man got mascara all over his beautifully pressed uniform. He held me as long as I needed and in his eyes was amazing compassion. I will always remember the look in his eyes and the mess I made of his uniform. We laugh about it now.

We started to search for the surviving Marine, Staff Sgt Wilson. The next day we found out he had been transferred to Bethesda and was still in intensive care. We asked a nurse if we could take Daniel down to see the Staff SGT and she said she would check. The next morning Rusty was walking the Ward with Daniel and saw the name Wilson on one of the rooms. They checked with the nurse and sure enough it was the man we had been looking for. His injuries were severe but he is a jolly man, and talked to Daniel as long as Daniel could stay about his friends and what had happened to them. They had hit the IED one day after dropping Daniel off, not the same day as Daniel had feared. After Daniels first visit with Staff Sgt Wilson he really started to get better. He had them unhook him from the morphine and the IV. He started walking as much as he could and we visited Staff Sgt Wilson often. Many times the Staff Sgt's family would come get us because during that time the Staff Sgt would have flashbacks and nightmares and call for Daniel. They helped each other in Bethesda just like they did in Iraq. These men have a bond that most of us will never experience. They understand that this bond is very special. They don't take it for granted, ever.

We had many special visitors while we were there. An amazing parade of high ranking Military men visit the ward regularly. We also had one person who was not in the military that made a huge impression on me. The Governor of California, Arnold Schwarzenegger came on Thanksgiving Day. He has visited ward 5 on Thanksgiving for 13 years. There is no publicity, no cameras and no agenda. He sits with each man as long as they wish. While he is there no outsiders are allowed on the ward. He is there for the wounded, period. He spent almost his entire thanksgiving day on the Ward. We were in the last room he visited. He did not seem impatient or in a hurry when he came in. He asked Daniel how he had been shot with real interest and compassion in his voice. Daniels story went something like this.

When he got shot it felt like someone had hit him in the head, even though he knew he had been hit in the midsection. He said he knew what starts felt like. He fell face first onto the ground and his buddy Langden ran over to him. His buddy then went and found a safe place for Daniel and ran back over to him, to try to drag Daniel to the hut. Daniel realized that they were still being shot at and he weighed well over 200 pounds with all his gear so it would be really tough and dangerous for his buddy to drag or carry him.

Daniel got up on his feet and ran with his buddy to the cover. Then, he said "I did a perfect Hollywood dive into the hut. It may not have looked like a perfect dive to anyone else, but in my mind I could have been in the movies." The Governor laughed.

My best day came on November 27, I had told Daniel that we would be a little late that morning because we had to do laundry. He had not eaten much up to that point and we had tried everything to get something in him. We had even bought jello, fruit, ice cream, and Campbell's soup, whatever we could from the convenience store to try to tempt him to eat something. The day before we had met SSgt Wilson and Daniels attitude had improved but he still had not been hungry. I was not too concerned about showing up at 10:30 instead of our usual 8 a.m. The first words out of Daniels mouth were "Mom, where have you been? I'm starving." He did not say it in those exact words. He spoke it like a Marine with some color interspersed here and there. I walked right out into the hall and danced a jig. Everything got better after that. We had no more bad days.

Daniel had three different roommates while he was at Bethesda. The first was a double amputee who had his spine fused and had lost a lot of the use of his right arm. He left for Walter Reed a couple days after we arrived. He was in a lot of pain most of the time but still was excited about being able to walk again.

The second was a wonderful man who was a lieutenant in the navy and was and explosives guy. He had gotten wounded in a remote controlled blast but had not lost any limbs. He had the most wonderful sense of humor, his outlook was "sew me up doc I have work to do." His wife's outlook was a little different but she is very special and we grew very close in the hours we spent together.

The third roommate was a retired Marine who had served in WW2, Korea and Vietnam. He had needed surgery and was on the ward to recover. He proved the saying "Once a Marine, always a Marine." The day after his surgery he had wanted to sit up in the chair, so much to the dismay of his wife, doctors and nurses he pulled out all of his IV's, and tubes and sat in the chair. It took the nursing staff more that 15 minutes to hook him back up and his wife made him promise to call the nurses next time. As she left later that day she asked us to keep and eye on him so he didn't do it again. "He is stubborn" she told us

"So don't let him get impatient and pull out his tubes again." He had written a book on Guadalcanal and we are reading it. We had been blessed again with our roommate.

We finally were able to bring Daniel home on Wednesday November 29, 2006. We were met at the airport by the Freedom Riders, the VFW and Mayor Doody. We were also met by a huge contingent of family and friends. Our plane arrived in the middle of the day. We were touched and humbled by the reception we received. The media was out in force; Daniel doesn't understand why we think of him as a hero. On the way home that very cold day Daniel stated his beliefs perfectly. He simply said, " Mom, this country is very special and worth protecting."

I promised this letter to you all awhile ago. It has been hard for me to leave the intensity of Ward 5 and adjust to day to day. Daniel turns 21 next Tuesday. I will forever be grateful he made it. I am including a copy of the poem Daniel wrote while he was in Bethesda. It is potent.

Poem by Daniel Renshaw, written November 26, 2006.

There are times in our life when we were struck by tragedy
And you know you would not make it through without your family
Something very similar just happened to me
Fighting in Iraq is what starts my story
Walking through the streets trying to keep people safe
Then a pain then a bang then I landed on my face.
More shots rang as people ran and marines began to fight Still in a little daze and pain causing a haze I had lost all my might Langden found a spot and while under heavy fire he ran back out into Then my mind cleared as I saw him there I knew he came for me

His life for mine he was willing to trade without skipping a beat
I couldn't let that happen so I climbed onto my feet
He half carried me back to the place where he had found the spot
He gently helped my down as he screamed Corpsman up
I couldn't help but think my life I would have to pay
Then as if sent by God Marines were there to save the day
The medivac called and people going every which way
I heard it over and over from my buddies you do not get to die today
Then up the streets the humvees roared as they pulled up to my shop
More marines jumped out and began to shout we're here to pick him up Upon arriving at the LZ Gonzo came to me he held my hand and said
Don't worry man soon you'll be home free
My gunner from Afghanistan a best friend he was to me
He gave me strength while we waited there at the LZ
He helped me to the bird and covered my eyes for me
I'd never get to repay him because 2 days later he died by an IED
Lying in a hospital with things hooked up and beeping
Drifting in and out of consciousness but not really sleeping Pretty soon I was able to start accepting a phone call
The people on the other end are the ones who are worth it all
The ones I'd take 10 bullets for and never flinch or fall
My family and my friends you know I love you all
They flew me to Bethesda where my family I'd get to see
I'd get to hug and kiss my mom, my dad and of course Rusty
But upon there arrival they got no proper greeting
Just me being a jerk with no proper reason
How painful it must have been to see me lying there
And added pain of me lashing out acting like I didn't care
With me every painful step on the path to recovery
Though I am weak they are strong and bear my burdens for me
I want my message loud and clear in what I'm trying to say
If it weren't for my loved ones I would not be here today.

Sam Warlick Remembered
By Robert I. Morgan

I served with Sam Warlick at Camp Lejeune before we went to OCS at Quantico. I was in the 3rd Platoon of Bravo Company; he was the Honor man in the 4th Platoon. Our graduation day in late March 1967, was a delightful spring day. Our futures were glorious; we were young; we were Marines and content in our expectations of leading rifle platoons.

My roommate at The Basic School, Frank McLavy, and I ran into Sam and a buddy of his in San Francisco on the way to Viet Nam in early October 1967. We had drinks together; I think at the Top of the Mark. I joined the 2nd Bn/26th Marines. Sam went to the 2nd Bn/9th Marines. I was at Khé Sanh when I learned he'd been killed in action--as I heard it--going forward.

Others among my comrades have been killed. The Marine I personally mourn most, however, is Sam Warlick. Perhaps it is because my parents and I met Sam's mother at the commissioning ceremonies. Sam's mother has come to represent all the mothers who have lost sons in war. I no longer remember the details of her appearance. I spoke to her for only a minute or so.

My fleeting impression of her never left me. She was very southern, very charming, and extraordinarily beautiful. I always intended to get in touch with her and others members of Sam's family to tell them of the esteem in which I held Sam. The same feelings were shared by anyone who had ever served with him. I regret I did not attempt to make contact until a couple of years ago. I did not remember her name and was unsuccessful. After this article appears in the newspaper in Raeford, members of his family may contact me, I sure hope and pray that they do.

Recently, I attended a reunion in Fredericksburg with Col. Bill Dabney and friends of mine in 3/26 who served on Hill 881S. We went to the new Marine Corps museum. There are walkways there lined with bricks individually dedicated to comrades and to our service. I looked in the index to see if one had been dedicated to Sam. I didn't find one. I hope I haven't intruded in ordering a brick dedicated to Sam in honor of Sam's mother. It reads, "Sam Dixon Warlick-NC"; "E/2/9 KIA 30 Nov 67"; "He'll be remembered."

If anyone would like to get in touch with me concerning these matters, I can be reached at: the Tarbell Professional Association, PA; 45 Centre Street; Concord, New Hampshire 03301; 603-226-3900, or rmorgan@tarbellpa.com.

Responses:

Dear Robert,

I am the sister of one of Sammy's friends, Harold. They were like brothers. Sam is being remembered in Raeford and hearts are pouring out their memories. I wrote a column about Sammy and Harold. I do columns for the weekly paper in Raeford when they have need for "filler"... I still find it hard to think of myself as a columnist.

You are so right in your memories of Pearl Gold Cornwell Warlick, Sammy's mom. She was just as you said, only more. She was my mother's best friend. When my mother died, she became "my mother" and when my daughter married, Mrs. Warlick was "the grandmother" at the wedding. Such an elegant woman, but with a heart that came out through every pore in her skin! She was correctly named. She was a "jewel"

When Sam died, I was determined that Mr. and Mrs. Warlick would know I had not forgotten him, so on his birthday, remembering 30 Nov. 967, I did something for them. Mrs. Warlick is dead now. But I still let Sam's sister's know I remember. This year, his sisters and my brother gave me permission to write a column about him. I am going to send this column to you.

Thanks are to God for you and the others like you, my son-in-law, Cody, is a Marine living in Sneads Ferry, but he has Rheumatoid Arthritis, so he was retired from active duty.

I will be glad to answer any questions you might have. I am sending this letter from me to Sam's sister and to my brother. Judie lives in Greensboro, NC and my brother lives in San Antonio. They can answer more questionsfor you. Judie had a very interesting experience a few years ago at the wall in DC, Ask her about it if you talk to her.

I was blessed to accidentally find the Marine Corp Museum Ceremony on the PBS TV one night. I called and asked if it will be played again. They said they don't have rights to repeat it at this time, but they will try to get them before Memorial Day or Veterans' Day.

Dear Ms. Williams:

The paper called and asked me to draft a single letter for this Wednesday's edition of the paper. I've combined the original draft and the response. I had carelessly assumed that the first was published this morning. I didn't say so in the letter, but one reason I was reluctant to drive to North Carolina and persevere until I found the Warlicks was an instinctive sense that their loss must have been truly terrible to bear. I shrank from adding to it. I'm not sure which course would have been the correct one. Now, however, I very much regret not having met Mrs. Warlick before she died. My mother is still in relatively good health and turned 83 on 9 Nov 06. She lives alone in Ellisville, Mississippi. My daddy died in 1993. RIM

PS: I'll cancel the brick if anyone finds it intrusive. By the by, we all called him, Sam. I never heard him called Sammy. Semper fi'.

Robert,

You may call me Limar. I was only 5 years older than Sam. As he got older he was Sam, but can't you just see "Sammy" in that photo with my brother as they stopped on their way to school. I am sure you would have called him Sammy had you known him at age 7.

As for not going to see the Warlicks, you are right. It was an awful thing for them, but Mrs. Warlick liked to talk about Sam. She and I talked lots of times and just looked at photos. Whatever your choice, it was the right one, because Mrs. Warlick would have wanted you to do what made you feel comfortable. She was one of the most unassuming persons I ever knew. She was only VAIN in one respect. She never told anyone, not even my mother, how old she was! That was off limits!

The Brick is just a very special thing for you to do and I am sure Barbara and Judie will be so thankful that you did it for their brother. I do hope you get to talk to his sisters. I know that my cousin and I were just talking about Sam. A lot has been brought up with the column I wrote. (you did get that and the responses, didn't you?), My cousin lived in my grandmother's house just 2 doors down from the Warlicks. She was living there while her husband was in Vietnam. He retired as a Col. Mrs. Warlick told my cousin that she would come to see the new baby soon, but that she just couldn't come right then, She always believed that Sam was doing what he was supposed to do that that it was what he wanted to do.

Thanks for the memories, Limar Sue

CHRISTMAS AT KHE SANH

Pinned down in Khe Sanh, Christmas '67

By: William J. O'Connor, C Btry 1/13

During the Christmas holiday of 1967 I was a captain in the U.S. Marine Corps stationed in South Vietnam as the Battery Commander of "C" Battery 1st Battalion 13th Marine Regiment at an isolated combat base known as Khe Sanh. During this period it was quite calm but enemy activity was starting to build up.

I remember quite clearly that a truce was declared during Christmas Eve but, as usual, the enemy did not honor the truce and we had to return fire with our 105mm Howitzers during the evening of Christmas Eve. Christmas Day was not all that special because we were in a desolate area where the food was terrible and there wasn't anything that would really get us into the Christmas spirit and there definitely weren't any USO shows.

One of the few things that would remind me of Christmas back home was a small Christmas tree which my wife sent to me, complete with Christmas lights. That tree occupied a special place in my bunker and brought to me the only Christmas spirit which I would experience. I also remember that Christmas dinner at the battalion mess hall was not that great and my troops complained about the quality of the food, which I fully agreed with.

Christmas was a very depressed time because we were far from our loved ones. This was not the first time I was away from home for Christmas. As a young Second Lieutenant, I spent my first Christmas away from home in Hong Kong. At 0500 on the morning of January 21, 1968, we were attacked by a superior force of NVA regulars and almost overrun. When the smoke cleared we were surrounded by a force of 55,000 NVA regulars. We were only a force of 5,500 men and we were out of ammo, water and chow, with no firm idea of when we would be re-supplied.

During the attack we had not only lost all of our aiming posts to incoming enemy fire but had also lost our aiming post lights. The Christmas spirit re-visited us when we dismantled my Christmas tree and used those lights as our aiming post lights. Even in the midst of a destructive warfare situation we were able to look at the Christmas colored lights and retain some sort of Christmas spirit.

Needless to say, every Christmas serves to remind me of those terrible times in Vietnam but also reminds me of all of those brave Marines who served with me during that terrible Siege of Khe Sanh.

Used by gracious permission of Bill O'Connor

One veteran's holiday memory, but offered with thoughts of ALL the brave who served & with special remembrance of those who cannot be with us to celebrate holidays. THANK YOU! For your priceless gift to all of us & to our country. May your holidays & every day be happy, peaceful & blessed?

From The Publisher:

The Khe Sanh Veterans Association had the pleasure of honoring members of the 2nd Battalion 4TH Marines when they recently returned from a tour in Iraq. A plaque was presented to the families of each of the 11 Marines who were KIA. I, and other members of the KSV, have a very personal relationship with many members of 2/24 here in Chicago, and have attended many of their functions. We have met Lt/Col Mark Smith and are aware of the fondness he possesses for every member of his Battalion. The tribute he has written says it all, God Bless the United States Marine Corps and the United States of America, Where do we find such men?

A Beautiful Tribute to Fallen Marine

LtCol Mark Smith sends this beautiful tribute to fallen Marine L/Cpl Wichlacz who paid the ultimate price for our freedom

Lt. Col. Mark Smith
It is again my unfortunate duty and with gut wrenching sadness that I report to you the death of Lance Corporal Travis M. Wichlacz, Fox Company, 2nd Battalion, 24th Marines, USMC. L/Cpl Wichlacz was killed on 05 Feb 05 when an improvised explosive device was detonated immediately adjacent to the HMMWV he was riding in. L/Cpl Wichlacz was part of a force conducting a raid against a suspected terrorist location when the IED was initiated. He sustained fatal injuries as a result of the explosion. He was killed instantly and felt no pain. He was secured by his brother Marines in the patrol, air medevaced back to FOB St. Michael, and then with the utmost of dignity was prepared for his final journey home, which began approximately 12 hours after his death.

Now, when L/Cpl Wichlacz arrived at FOB St. Michael, I went to our Shock Trauma Building to greet him. The Medical Section, our fabulous Navy Surgeons and Corpsman from the US Navy, conducted their unfortunate task of documentation and identification. This is not enjoyable duty, but the professionalism and reverence with which these amazing Sailors conduct this task touches your heart and your soul. They may be Sailors, but my US Navy Staff are Mad Ghosts, part and parcel of this Mad Ghost Team, and will forever have both my undying respect and my gratitude, for they give everything they have (and then some) to tend to the wounds of my Marines, both living and dead. Following the medical responsibilities, the Navy Chaplain Lt. Manilla gathered us all around the peaceful body of L/Cpl Wichlacz and said both a blessing and a prayer. I then held his hand and wished him Fair Winds and Following Seas for his final journey home. And, I told him JOB WELL DONE! For he had given all that others would live, and live abundantly, in freedom and with the ability to seek their own journey. For this, I know he will be rewarded in Heaven.

Then, you leave the building. This is the moment that the Devil has his day. For at this point, I was filled with anger, hate and rage! The mind races with thoughts of vengeance. The body wants to lash out in violence in pay back for what has been done. And, you then look around at all the tools of violence and destruction at your immediate disposal and realize it would not be a hard thing to do!!! But, as it should be with the Devil, he gets but that fleeting moment of control, because the rage is replaced with respect. The respect of a fallen hero who calls to you to remember Who and what you are: A UNITED STATES MARINE. The hero himself seems to speak to you from beyond the land of the living and reminds you that we are the ones that do well, and destroy only evil. He tells you that we came to free the oppressed and set the conditions for long-term stability in a region that has never known it and by doing so will ensure the freedom and safety of our beloved back home. No, it is but a very fleeting moment that the Devil gets, it is a LIFETIME of remembrance, respect and honor that the hero earns. That we will never dishonor our fallen, that we will stay our course no matter how difficult, that WE WILL ACHIEVE VICTORY is the only outcome there can be! And, with YOUR Marines, YOU'RE Mad Ghosts that is what it shall be. VICTORY with honor. VICTORY that delivers violence ONLY to the cowardly enemy, and compassion, respect and admiration for the people of Iraq, who we free and protect, and who have Suffered unspeakably for far too long.

When this moment of illumination comes, from which all follow on actions are guided, I will tell you, it comes with intense grief. But that is O.K. That grief only speaks to the righteousness of the cause and the realization of the heavy price freedom requires. L/Cpl Wichlacz paid it, we now have a lifetime to earn it.

I am not a fan of Hollywood for its politics. I have never really been able to grasp, in my simple Hoosier mind, why people who make a grotesque amount of money by pretending to be something, honestly and earnestly believe that we care what they have to say about politics. No, that one has always escaped me. I mean, playing pretend is what my angelic daughters do, and although I love them more than I love my next breath, and would lay down my life for them, I have come to the conclusion I do not want Brittani and Nichole establishing National Policy and the use of force to achieve it...at least not while they are 8 and 6! So, I kind of feel the same way about Actors. But, as an art form, as a medium designed to stimulate the mind and touch the soul, well, on that count, sometimes Hollywood hits it out of the park. One such instance was the movie saving Private Ryan. For if you would, my wonderful families of 2/24, I would like to ask you in light of L/Cpl Wichlacz passing, and in honor of all 11 of our fallen heroes, to reflect with me. Reflect on the final scene in Saving Private Ryan. The scene where Ryan is old, gray, round and soft in the middle, and he is with his wife and fully-grown children. They are visiting Arlington National Cemetery. Ryan is at the grave of his Company Commander and reflecting on the events of a battlefield over 50 years past.

He is reflecting on the shared violence, the shared hardship and the death of his comrades. As he is reflecting, he is sobbing. Sobbing the tears of a pain that knows no relief, knows no easing in its passage of time. And then, he says to his wife, words to the effect of, "tell me I am a good man. Tell me I have been a good man." Many is the time, 11 to be exact, that all I wanted in this whole world was to feel the soft hand of my beautiful and loving wife on the back of my sobbing head and telling me I am a good man, that I have done right by my Marines and my country. Because, you see, that is what we owe L/Cpl Wichlacz, our 11 and all who have given their lives in this and all previous Wars. We owe them to live good lives. Good lives in the sense that we always think first and foremost of the cost of freedom! That we remember a life lived free, is a life lived without hardship, and most of the time in frivolity and miniscule tasks. But the majesty of it, is that we have the time and space to be engaged in the frivolous and miniscule.

That we grocery shop, go to movies, go to ball games, eat out, eat in, barbeque, drink beer or not drink beer, attend the soccer games, watch our kids flip monkily through gymnastics, go to Disneyworld...we do all these without nary a thought, because a lineage of Warriors since 1775 have given us that freedom. That we never forget that, that we always pay honor to that is OUR CHARGE. Please ladies, understand, no preaching of morality here. I am not defining living a good life by any means other than NEVER forgetting what the price of our American lives really is. Our freedom, our ability to do the things we do as Americans, which we Mad Ghosts miss so dearly and will never take for granted, has been paid for with the blood of YOUNG Americans in battle. That the National Anthem ALWAYS be sung with that in mind, that the pledge of allegiance always be said with pride, conviction and a commitment to defend it, that you respect the flag when you see it, these are the requirements of a "good life" for an American. Never forget these MEN! Never forget these Warriors! And, in our case in particular, as the families and Marines that are 2/24, NEVER FORGET THESE MAD GHOSTS! For the reasons for which I would rightfully earn eternal damnation are many and varied, but that I ever dishonor these wonderful heroes, well, I am confident that will not be one of them!

So in your reflection, please join me in a final farewell to L/Cpl Travis M. Wichlacz: good night sweet and gentle Warrior. You have touched us all. We have been deeply and profoundly saddened by your death, but we have been even more enlightened and touched by YOUR LIFE. Rest in the embrace of angels, Travis, rest in the embrace of angels! WE LOVE YOU. God Bless the Magnificent Marines and Families of 2/24.

Merry Christmas, Snake

By Robert A. Hall

A Vietnam Christmas

Eddie wrapped a length of C-ration baling wire around the trunk of Aunt Thel's tree, and wedged the end between the bunker's crumbling sandbags. That corrected the starboard list caused by a bent stand. Considering that their mail had been air-dropped from a C-130 cargo plane, the two-foot artificial tree had come through remarkably well, with only the bent leg and one broken limb. At Snake's suggestion, they had turned the "bare spot" to the wall and trimmed the tree with the surviving decorations and local crafts: a tin star cut from a C-ration can, a pair of lance corporal chevrons with the black coating worn off so they glittered, some brass M-16 shell casings.

Eddie would have preferred canned peaches from Aunt Thel, but he thought the tree looked right cheerful in their bunker. He twisted the tin star to catch light from the radios and began softly singing: "Jingle bells, mortar shells, V. C. in the grass-- You can take, your Merry Christmas, and shove it up..."

He sensed "incoming" and ducked as Snake's boot banged into the wall, safely away from the precious tree, sending a trickle of sand dribbling through the slats of the wooden pallets that served as the bunker's floor. Eddie turned and saw Snake smiling at him over a can of C-ration ham and limas. You couldn't get pissed at a guy who would trade you beanies and weenies for ham and "slimies," which every reasonable person hated the way Santa's pointdeer Rudolph hated clear weather.

Eddie wiped his eyes to get rid of the stinging caused by grit from the sandbags. It didn't help. "Since when did you get the Christmas spirit?" he asked, "I thought you were a Black Muslim?"

Snake had announced his new religion several weeks ago, the fourth in seven months. Though he maintained a devout facade, his "conversions" were a standing joke in the platoon. Eddie had reasonably pointed out that while he, himself, was black, Snake was a white dude, an awkward start for a Black Muslim. Snake's response was that Eddie was an Uncle Tom; and, that since there was no other black dude to be the radical on their radio relay team, he would have to do it himself, "Just like every goddamned thing else around here."

"Can't be a Muslim on Christmas Eve," Snake smiled, and continued dropping pieces of John Wayne crackers through the floor planks for the rat. He's been trying to kill the rat just last week, but, following the lead of the Viet Cong, had declared a Christmas truce with it yesterday. Eddie picked up the jungle boot, and turned it over, observing that it was nearly new. He looked down to his left boot, where the electrical tape holding it together was coming loose. The sides had rotted and he hadn't been able to scrounge replacements from supply's limited stock.

"Hey, Snake, how about giving me your extra boots? We're the same size, almost." "Certainly, my man," Snake promised, "As soon as the Sear's catalog comes and I can order something more stylish. We might, however, barter--I do admire that K-bar knife on your belt." Snake rose and headed to the bunker door, which hung precariously from the hinges of shell boxes. "I'll go switch generators."

He went into the night, taking only a small flashlight, to carry out the regular task of alternating the 400 cycle generators that powered their AN/TRC-27 radio relay unit. Eddie was re-taping his boot when the first mortar round exploded in the small perimeter. "Christmas truce!" he spat, lunging for the door, "Little rice-propelled bastards!" By the time the Corpsman had checked the flow of blood from Snake's mangled leg, and closed the flap of open flesh on his right cheek, the painkiller had taken hold and he was babbling happily.

"Lucky break, Eddie," he said, laughing, "I tripped over the goddamn antenna guy wire and couldn't make the hole. Now I'm going home for Christmas, buddy. I'll be dancing in Time's Square on New Year's Eve while you're still stuck in this shit hole, man."

Eddie glanced at Snake's leg and winced as they loaded him onto the stretcher. "Nail one of them hippy broads for me," he said. Snake laughed again, almost a giggle. "Hey, Eddie," he said, "You can have those boots." He gave a weak, cheery wave. "Merry Christmas, man." "Merry Christmas, Snake," Eddie said, then he impulsively pulled the K-Bar from his belt and laid it on the stretcher, knowing that some rear-echelon pogue would probably steal it from Snake. "Take that home as a souvenir of this slice of paradise."

Snake waved again as the corpsmen hefted the stretcher and struggled carefully up the muddy slope toward the med-evac LZ. "Merry F----ing Christmas," Eddie whispered to himself. He turned to go check the radios. The grit was bothering him again. Now, he thought, who the hell can I trade ham and limas to?

HOW I SPENT THE "SIEGE"

By John M. Kaheny

OK! I am now 62 years old and it is time to tell the truth. Not every Khe Sanh veteran suffered during the siege. I commuted. Yes, that's right, I commuted to the siege. Sounds like a contradiction in terms but it is true. You see, I was smart enough, I know that's very debatable, to extend my Vietnam tour for six months just two months prior to opening day. The reason was simple, I had orders to Camp LeJeune and I was a bachelor. When Lt/Col Wilkinson advised me that I might get killed by extending I told him that there were things worse than going to Camp LeJeune in 1968 and I would take my chances. I don't gamble anymore.

The rules were fairly simple. I received 30 days of free leave for extending but I had to start taking them before my normal rotation date. I was also entitled to 10 days travel but if I was gone from the 1st battalion, 26th Marines for more than 40 days I would be charged regular leave for those excess days. I could go anywhere in the world for free. Initially I was planning on going to Europe with Ross Brown who also had extended but my Dad was ill with cancer (I had already been home for emergency leave in October) and he was not expected to live much longer. I made the decision just to go home and spend some time with family and friends.

Like most lieutenants I really did not know the system and for some reason I thought that my overseas tour started the day I arrived in Danang January 20, 1967. I didn't consider the fact that it was the date I left CONUS. So it was about February 15 when I finally got around to asking Bill Ferrall, the S-1, where my orders were. He checked and was told by 3d MARDIV G-1 that they were holding them in Phu Bai thinking that I would come and get them. I was also informed that I needed to get there ASAP before they expired. It was now late afternoon and I grabbed my pack, pistol, flak jacket and helmet and took off running to say a quick good bye to the Marines in the battalion S-3 where I worked.

When I entered the COC I was told to report to Lt/Col Wilkinson ASAP. My first impression was that he obviously knew that I was leaving. When I met him in his office at the west end of the command bunker he was very somber. The reason he called me in was to ask me if I wanted to take command of Charlie Company as Capt David Earnst had been severely wounded and was about to be evacuated. He also told me that Sgt Major Gaynor had also been wounded and was in critical condition. When I informed him of my orders he didn't hesitate and told me to see to my father as I could always get another command. He was and still is a very wise man.

After my quick good bye I took off for the airstrip. Once there I met Lt King from 3d Battalion, 26th Marines who had just arrived by helicopter from Hill 881S. In his hands was a WP bag with the remains of a Marine hit by a mortar. We walked over to Graves Registration together. He was going home also so we soon both started walking over to where the outgoing passengers were waiting. It was then when a corpsman came over and asked us for help.

A CH-53 was inbound and was going to take out the wounded including David and Sgt Major Gaynor. I volunteered to be a stretcher bearer for Sgt Major Gaynor. Once the CH-53 landed the usual NVA response began and we ran out through the incoming and loaded the chopper as it made its turn without stopping. It was just starting to get dark but we were on our way.

King gave a cigarette to Capt Earnst and I held the IV bottle for the Sgt Maj. The Sgt Major was failing and I found myself squeezing the IV bottle in frustration. By the time we got to Dong Ha it was dark and the Sgt Major had turned gray. King and I made our way to Delta Med and became separated as we were asked to perform different tasks. It was a bad night, Sgt Major Gaynor didn't make it.

I spent January 16th at the battalion rear in Phu Bai. The base was a mess, Marines were moving out and the Army was moving in. When I checked into the Division Personnel Office I was assisted by a crusty Warrant Officer who was stunned when I requested to return to 1/26 after my leave. I assured him that the siege would be over by then and that I just wanted to continue to serve with my friends. He gave me one of those looks and said 'Well OK, Lt!"

That night I found my way to what was left of the Division's officers club. It was also in complete disarray with nothing to drink but crème de menthe. Several lieutenants, all recent arrivals were sitting on some crates watching the night sky over Hue explode with star clusters. I joined them and told them what Khe Sanh was like. Soon the same Warrant Officer appeared and came over to us. He was looking for volunteers to go to the 5th Marines in Hue, but clearly said to me that I was going home and not to even think about it.

The next day, I linked up with King in Danang and after a brief visit to the Danang Press Club (that's another story) we flew to Okinawa and beautiful Camp Hanson. Walking down the main drag to the mess hall I ran into Sgt McNeil, Lt/Col Wilkinson's former driver and radioman. I asked him if he could go on liberty with King and myself. He informed me that only Staff NCO's and officers were authorized off base liberty. I said we could fix that and later that night the three of us piled into a cab, with McNeil in the middle. When asked for our IDs at the main gate, King and I placed our cards on the window glass, McNeil held his up and they didn't check his rank. So we all had a good time in Kim village!

The flight home was uneventful and soon I was home at our house in Point Lookout, New York. It was February 21, 1968. There was no time for adjustment. A week earlier I had been cold, wet and surrounded by 40,000 NVA, now I was drinking Rusty Nails, eating steak, sleeping in my childhood bed and watching my buddies slugging it out on the nightly news on TV.

It being winter in New York, I soon realized I didn't have enough winter clothes. My mother had donated what had been left of my college clothes when I went of to Vietnam a year earlier. My sister, who thought I was a lunatic for extending my tour, took me out shopping and tried to make me look civilized.

A few days later, my sister and I went to see " I Never Sang For My Father" on Broadway. New York City seemed to be in another universe.

My parents were supportive of what I was doing but were concerned about my return to Vietnam. I had asked to go back to 1/26 even though I could have requested another assignment, but that was were my friends were. My Dad, being "Old Irish" said little but understood. My mother, whose brothers had seen the worst of World War I, never gave up hope.

Reading the newspapers was a stressful event as the reporting of the war was to say the least pessimistic. Everyday someone was saying that the Marines were in imminent danger of being overrun. I didn't believe it for a minute.

I borrowed my sister's car and headed to Washington DC to visit some of my college buddies who were in either law school or dental school at Georgetown. Unlike them I had spending money so we were able to get me to the point where I didn't think of the war as much. I took several other trips to visit friends including flights to Boston, Pittsburgh and Rochester.

I was trying to catch a military standby seat to Boston on Eastern Airlines in order to save a bit of money when I received a gift of kindness. The stand by line was very long but I was prepared for a long wait. To fly military stand by in those days, you had to be in uniform. I was in the line only a few minutes when a flight attendant asked me to follow her. We went around the line and through a door where I met the captain of the plane. He told me I had a jump seat in the cockpit if I wanted one. I was on my way!

Boston was a great college town and my college roommate was in graduate school at Boston College. He was married and lived right next to the campus. Finding dates was not a problem. One day as I was walking down the street my eye caught that infamous copy of Newsweek with the siege on the cover. I was shocked to see inside the pictures of Bravo's dead. I recognized Lt Jacques and several others. It made me ill. To this day I have never bought another copy of Newsweek.

I soon took off for Rochester and was bumped up to First Class on the request of a bunch of businessmen who were all WWII veterans. By the time I got to Rochester I was pretty well oiled. My return flight to New York was delayed due to a snow storm so I spent St. Patrick's Day in the Holiday Inn at the airport.

When I arrived in Pittsburgh I ran into Pat Fitch of Bravo Company and formerly of H&S Company in the airport. I knew Pat quite well from his work in the S-1 shop. When he saw me, he ran up and gave me a hug. It was then that I heard the complete story of the "Ghost Patrol". Pat's tour was over and he was on his way home on leave. It was a very emotional meeting.

It was soon time to get back to the war. I flew to San Francisco and took the bus to Travis Air Force Base. After checking in at Travis I ran into a bunch of CH-46 pilots at the officers Club. They were on their way to Danang and pumped me with questions and a few drinks. Soon we took off for Okinawa but we got diverted to Japan because of a typhoon. Having spent most of our money before leaving, we arrived at an Air Force Base in Japan fairly broke. The slot machines became a godsend and we were able to win enough to go to dinner in Tokyo.

On March 31st I arrived in Danang via Okinawa and made my way north to Phi Bai. As my travel and leave had expired due to the side trip to Japan I was eager to get back to the battalion. I went to Division Disbursing and picked up the payroll knowing it would give me priority at the landing zone.

The helicopter pad was total chaos. There were more Marines in line than boat spaces available. I went to the shack where a corporal was trying to bring order to the mob and identified myself as a pay officer. Knowing the rules he put me on the top of the manifest. Behind me was a tall Marine captain. He was immediately displeased that I had priority and he did not. After a few words with the corporal he was given a slot right behind me. He still wasn't happy. I introduced myself and he told me he was Captain Champion and was on his way to take over Bravo Company. I said I was from 1/26 and if we got in safely I could take him to the CP, or at least where it was when I left. He looked at me funny but I realized that he had not yet been the subject of a full blown NVA artillery attack. Convinced that I was about to die anyway, I may have appeared flippant to him.

The flight in on a CH-34 was uneventful until, of course, the landing which must have been very exciting to the uninitiated. We jumped out into a sheaf of incoming, finding defilade behind the burnt out wreckage of another helicopter. Captain Champion's eyes could not have been larger. He said "what do we do now Lieutenant?" I looked around to get my bearings and decided that since 950 and 1015 appeared to be in the same place as when I left that I could find the CP by dead reckoning. We made our way through the rubble to the road that led to the COC and I advised Captain Champion to keep an eye out for a hole to jump into on short notice.

As was my habit in those days I was whistling when we entered the COC bunker. Almost immediately I heard the words "pay up". Seems that the radio operators and journal clerks had a bet going about whether I would actually return. After the initial reaction Corporals Mattingly and Sheetz came over and greeted me. They smelled like, well you know, but I was glad to see them. The bunker was a pit. Filthy only begins the description. Dark, damp and dismal was a start. I reported formally to my new battalion commander, Lt/Col F.J. McEwan, who understandably was in a rather foul mood. I asked about my assignment and he told me that I would stay in the S-3 until we left Khe Sanh and maybe longer. We have work for you he said. I went back to the COC and settled in and got up to speed. I was back in the war but I was also home.

I soon learned the details of what had transpired while I was gone and of Bravo Company's bayonet charge a few days before. The bad news was given to me slowly by Bill Ferral the S-1. I had lost a number of good friends, both from H&S Company and from my days in Alpha Company. It was time to get back to work and prepare for Pegasus.

The Football Player

by Craig W. Tourte

Another "I wanted to do" story, "but..."

So I have been playing golf on Tuesdays with the group from our little neighborhood pub around the corner. I'm just a little younger than most, but there are a few Vietnam Vets, and a couple left from the Korean War. Most are civilians and didn't goers. About 20 who got no closer to a battle than their television sets, or the latest Life magazine. All in all they treat me well. Just leave me alone and we'll all get along just fine. After golf, while at the pub a few of us trade war stories. The bulk of talk seems to be about operations and illnesses as opposed to the topic of several years ago. You know what I'm talking about.

We have a former professional football player in the group. He played in the early or mid 60's for the Detroit Lions. After ball, he went on to management. The guy is in his early 70's, but still a great jock. About Elvis's age, I think. He is quite the hero around town, looked up to by the patrons. He's full of football stories about games and players long forgotten .

We piled into different automobiles for the ride to the golf course. The football guy asked me to ride with him because he was unsure of the way. That was a little odd; since he has lived most of his adult life, aside from college, and playing professional football, in this town. On the way to the golf course the conversation started with the usual small talk. I was proud that this guy who is so admired by all, asked me to ride with him.

About 10 minutes into the ride he got real quiet and turns to me and says: "Craig, I just wanted to let you know that I tried to sign up, but I had real bad knees and couldn't pass the physical." He said the day of the Marine Corps Birthday, he happened to be in the bar and heard a few of us as we sat around and talked about Khe Sanh. At first I didn't know what he was talking about until I turned to look at him. I saw a little tear in his eye. He said that he had always wanted to go into the service but could never pass the physical. I asked him when he could have served. He told me that Korea had gotten over and Vietnam had not yet started. I didn't know what to say. I think I said: "that's all right," but I'm not really sure.

The point of this story is that I get pretty sick of the excuses I have heard over the years from the one's who ran away so that others could take their place, but I am also touched by those who try to tell me in their own way that they do appreciate those who answered the call. I think it was a big deal for this tough, old, professional football player; the hero of so many Sundays and stories, local athlete who is looked upon and admired by so many, to even address the subject with me. I was stunned that he would feel so guilty in my presence. It must have been difficult. I appreciated him feeling that we were something special. I knew deep down in his heart that we were all heroes to him, and that he knew he could never be one of us.

TO OUR SOLDIERS COME HOME

Being returned to a society which they were sent to protect, some were praised as heroes, some spat on in disgust, some shunned because they could not return to the nine to five and softball and barbeques on the weekends. These are men who now see through different eyes. Eyes that search for meaning with a vacant far off stare. These same eyes that witnessed the inhumanity and horror of war first hand, forever seared into their minds, forever changing their beings.

Some bare scars of the flesh, but it is the wounds of their souls which take the most time to heal. For this they turn to each other. Forever bonded together by the blood of their fallen brothers, and the tears that have fallen since, they again band together to fight a different battle. This battlefield is not laid with mines, or filled with the roaring din of battle. These men fight to find reason and closure for the acts that are inevitably performed, or witnessed by soldiers in a time of war. Why so much death? Why are they left behind? Why is innocence lost to so many? These are questions that have no answers. The only truths are the screams and cries echoing from their past. Time may help to quiet these echoes a bit.

For some the sounds will never die down. For others they may. However slight or great their healing is a testament to their allegiance to one another. Knowing and relating to one another that they are not society's rejects, or cold blooded savages, but brave men who have been to the very limits of mans' nature. Only now are some coming to grips with their past, through the open arms of each other. So to you heroes, I salute you with immeasurable respect and pride. From this young citizen, appreciation and gratitude.

POETRY

'Twas the night before Christmas, he lived all alone, in a one-bedroom house made of plaster and stone.

I had come down the chimney with presents to give,
and to see just who in this home did live.

I looked all about, a strange sight I did see,
no tinsel, no presents, not even a tree.

No stocking by mantle, just boots filled with sand, on the wall hung pictures of far distant lands.

With medals and badges, awards of all kinds,
a sober thought came through my mind.

For this house was different, it was dark and dreary,
I found the home of a Veteran, once I could see clearly.

The Veteran lay sleeping, silent, alone, curled up on the floor in this one bedroom home.

The face was so gentle, the room so unclean, not how I pictured a United States Veteran.
Was this the hero of whom I'd just read?

Curled up on a poncho, the floor for a bed?
I realized the families that I saw this night, owed their lives to these Veterans, willing to fight.

Soon 'round the world, the children would play, and grownups would celebrate a bright Christmas Day.

They all enjoyed freedom each month of the year, because of the Veterans, like the one lying here.

I couldn't help wonder how many lay lone, on a cold Christmas Eve in a land far from home.

The very thought brought a tear to my eye,
I dropped to my knees and started to cry.

The Veteran awakened and I heard a rough voice,
"Santa don't cry, this life is my choice;

I fight for freedom, I don't ask for more,
my life is my God, my country, my Corps."

The Veteran rolled over and drifted to sleep,
I couldn't control it, I continued to weep.

I kept watch for hours, so silent and still and we both shivered in the night's cold chill.

I didn't want to leave on that cold, dark night,
this guardian of honor so willing to fight.

Then the Veteran rolled over, with a voice soft and pure, whispered, "Carry on Santa, it's Christmas Day, all is secure."

One look at my watch, and I knew he was right.
"Merry Christmas my friend, and to all a good night."

THOUGHTS AT CHRISTMAS

Christmas Eve 2006

Greetings Marines:
During my lifetime of 62 years (44 years as a U.S. Marine) I have met precious few combat leaders of Marines. Our Lt/Colonel Jim Wilkinson, Captain Ernie Spencer, Lt/Colonel Charlie Davis and Lt/ Colonel Ken Pipes are truly our Marine Leaders.
Semper Fidelis,

The pebble filled C rat cans were hung on the wire with great care
With armed Claymores in place the NVA would not dare
When up on 950 there arose such a clatter
J B was alerted and said what on earth is the matter?
We popped some alum and alerted Spooky 1-4
Then called in the 81's, the best in the Corps
On Alfa, on Bravo, on Charlie and Delta
Even Ross' cooks and bakers were digging deep in their shelter
The noise got so loud even the rats left their nests
The NVA realized they had challenged the best
So they slipped away, over the crest
Dr. Ed had finished some C rat Candy
And said I think I'll open a medicinal brandy
The Motor T officer stumbled into a ditch and fell on his bean
His tour was shortened but his record stayed clean
Young T-Bone was manning an LP at Midnight
When he saw ole Santa through his trusty Starlight
He heard him exclaim to all at Khe Sanh 'ere he sped out of sight "Happy Christmas to all and to all a goodnight!"

A Christmas Story worth Repeating
Kilo 3/26 Christmas at Khe Sanh
By Dennis Mannion K 3/26

Like weary travelers, who finally get to rest in the comfort of their own homes after a week of constant motion and movement, the members of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment spread out into the foxholes and bunkers that made up the company's perimeter at Khe Sanh. It was Christmas Eve 1967, and we had just returned from a four-day operation that had taken us west of the combat base into the rugged hills and terrain of the Khe Sanh Plateau. Despite minimal creature comforts at the base, it was a relief to know that we didn't have to hike those hills for a while. That alone was a legitimate Christmas present.

In terms of the physical setting and the expected sounds and colors, this was sure to be my bleakest holiday ever, but it remains the Christmas that stands apart from all the others, and the one which memory doesn't confuse, over three decades later. My radioman, Dave Krom, and I headed straight for the position that we had constructed the previous week. Even though it was just two foxholes covered with a tent-like affair of scrounged parachute silk, we felt elated to be home for the holidays. At mid-day, a rumor which had been circulating since the previous morning turned into reality. An arriving helicopter touched down just outside the company area, and mailbag after mailbag began to spill out onto the ground!

The distribution of our Christmas mail, which had been held in storage for nearly two weeks, required the work of scores of Marines as there were thousands of letters and hundreds of "care packages." More than anything else, it was the sheer volume of these packages that brought a festive, holiday atmosphere to our corner of the war. Denied a chance to be in the real world, it was as if its realities had been sent to us, and each package opened helped to reduce the tensions and the fears accumulated during the previous week.

By late afternoon, Kilo Company was almost giddy with child-like happiness and Christmas spirit. Since Dave and I had not drawn perimeter guard that night (another present), we settled in under our parachute hooch to feast on our collective packages and to recall Christmas memories from earlier years. With our military gear relegated to the sides of the tent, the war almost seemed to have been replaced with plentiful food, laughter, and friendship. Considering how the previous four months had been spent, we had another gift to be thankful for, we were still around for the holiday while a number of our companions were not. Sometime after midnight, wrapped in a poncho-liner and surrounded with gentle memories of home and the holidays, I drifted off to sleep thinking of my family and mostly my mother.

I was jolted out of my sleep on Christmas morning by the sound of "Jingle Bells!" Two Marine Corps helicopters with Santa's painted on their sides were making repeated passes over the combat base, and loudspeakers mounted in the doors were playing one Christmas song after another. It was incredible! Within seconds, people from all over were up, out, and on their feet to cheer and to wave. The show didn't last more than 10 minutes, but it was enough to get our day off to a magical start.

At noon, a Catholic chaplain celebrated mass out in the open, and as I sauntered over, I was suddenly struck with the thought that 12 noon on Christmas Day in Vietnam corresponded exactly with 12 midnight on Christmas Eve in Connecticut. While I knelt with rifle in hand in the red dust of Khe Sanh, my family was kneeling in the pews of St. Mary's Church in New Haven for Midnight Mass. It was the only time in my 13 month tour when I knew exactly what members of my family were doing at a given moment. I used to wonder and guess at their actions and activities from time to time, but in this short period of mass and remembrance, I was linked to them with a bond that stretched over 15,000 miles. In spite of the distance, I never felt closer to any of them as I did at that moment, and the simple act of closing my eyes seemed to move me out of the war and into the comfortable surroundings of family and home.

By nightfall, Christmas morning in Connecticut, I was strapping on the weapons and gear of an infantryman and preparing to move to an ambush position outside our protective barbed wire. Our route out the gate took us directly across the very ground where mass had been said earlier, and where, through the miracle of Christ's birth, I was permitted to stand for a moment at a window to the world.

Message From Editorial staff:

The Khe Sanh Veterans sent complimentary copies of our publication to every Veterans Hospital and Veteran Centers in the United States during the early 1990s. As the magazine grew in size this became a financial liability for the Khe Sanh Veterans, and we discontinued the practice.

We have recently began sending the Red Clay to the Wounded Warriors from Iraq, at both Camp Lejeune, NC. and Camp Pendelton, CA. We would like to again continue sending the Red Clay to the Veterans Hospitals and Veteran Centers.

What we propose is that a member, or members send in a $50.00 Donation. This donation would be specifically designated for the purpose of sending a one year subscription (10 magazines each issue) to the Hospital or Center of your choice.

Each magazine mailing would be accompanied by a letter with the name of the Khe Sanh Veteran/s making the contribution. This donation package would also be available to non KSV subscribers to our magazine who wish to participate. Please let us know your thoughts on this proposal. NO WE ARE NOT TALKING ABOUT SOMEONE ELSE. How about YOU reading this, stepping up to the plate.
$ 50 is the cost of a nice dinner with the spouse. This is a worthy cause. We need to get our message out to more people.

Happy Holidays KSV Staff

SECRETARY'S NOTE:

I just wanted to remind the membership that we have invited two veteran Service Bureau officers from New Jersey to the reunion. If you have been contemplating filing a claim for PTSD, bring all supporting documentation with you. If you are already receiving 30% through 70% bring your DD-214 , and supporting documentation, John Dorrity noted he can handle your case from New Jersey with no problem and bring you up to 100%. Please pass the word if you know of any member seeking help with filing a claim. Both Bureau Officers are highly proficient at what they do and have volunteered their services.

The DC reunion should be one of the largest the KSV have held. We are expecting many new members. Registrations show that many are bringing their family to make it an extended vacation. This is your chance to see the many sites our Nations Capital offers. Please support our PX and bring a few items for our silent auction, which supports our Magazine RED CLAY. Hope to see you all there.

Big John Pessoni

PRESIDENTS MESSAGE:

Just a reminder that there will be an election for President and several Director positions at the reunion. All members seeking to run for a position should notify me in writing, prior to the reunion. Call me if you need to know the qualifications required for the positions that are up for re-election.

There are still a lot of members who have not paid their 2007 dues. Please try to get those delinquent dues in prior to the Reunion so we can complete an accurate budget for the upcoming year and still print three issues of our Magazine Red Clay.

RICK DEARING USMC
CHARLIE CO 1/26

I am sending this e-mail to advise the passing of my brother Rick Dearing. Rick was in C Co 1/26 from January 1968 until February 1969 and at Khe Sanh the entire duration of the siege. When I arrived in August 1968 I hooked up with him for a visit at Troi River bridge and we went to Japan on R&R Christmas of 1968. Rick finished his tour as a SSgt stationed at HMX-1 flying with Marine One during the Nixon presidency. When discharged, he entered law enforcement and retired from DEA as a GS-14 ASAC in Washington, DC a year and a half ago. He was currently working for Booz & Allen. He suffered a heart attack while at work. We were both Marines and in law enforcement together. I will miss him. Another Marine to guard the Pearly Gates of Heaven.

THOMAS J. KERR USMC HMM-164
1947-2007

Tommy Kerr, a Vietnam veteran and railroad worker, could be a bit gruff, but that's not what his former Boy Scout troop members remember most about the Greenwood resident. "He loved that Scout troop," said Eric Denney said of Mr. Kerr, 59, who died Wednesday from heart-related problems. The makeup of Mr. Kerr's Troop 270 looked a bit like a lineup of characters from a sitcom, Denney said. About half the kids were from a church, and some came from economically disadvantaged homes. Under Mr. Kerr's leadership, they became a close-bit group. Mr. Kerr provided the spark that led Deaney and others to become Eagle Scouts. Mr. Kerr had a couple of rules about fighting. If his Scouts got into a fight, Mr. Kerr made it clear he would take on the winner. If they fought with a Scout from another troop, Mr. Kerr never condoned it but wanted to bow whether they had won.

Other Scouts probably heard campfire stories on camping trips, Denney said. 'We heard stories about Khe Sanh," he said, speaking of Mr. Kerr's experience as a Marine. Mr. Kerr grew up in a small town in upstate New York and met his wife, Linda, at a wedding in Fort Wayne, right after he returned from Vietnam. She was attracted by his "pretty" eyes and fell in love with him. He was stationed in North Carolina and vowed to come back for her when she turned 18. He did.

The couple moved to Greenwood in 1980 after he landed a job with Amtrak, where he was a general foreman. They joined Christ Our Shepard Church of the Brethren, where he also was an associate pastor; and he agreed to start a Boy Scout troop. More recently he was a member of Greenwood Christian Life Church. Some of the kids Mr. Kerr invited came from families who didn't have much, so he helped buy their uniforms. If a Scout had a problem, Mr. Kerr helped, even if it meant taking a boy to the library to make sure he was doing his homework, his wife said. In his own way Mr. Kerr was paying back the type of help he received from adults who took a special interest in him when he was a boy, his wife said. "I think that kind of rubbed off," The Kerr's had bought a 5-acre ranch near Spencer, where Mr. Kerr planned to work with horses after he retired in May. He already was planning to hold a hog toast there to celebrate

Other survivors include daughters Alisha Ann Hess and Nicole Jeanne Kerry Taylor; his twin brother, Douglas L. Kerr Jr.; another brother, Roger Kern and a sister, Nancy I Hammond.. Mr. Kerr's Scouts, who once called him "Sarge," served as pallbearers.

OBIT

COLONEL HARRY L. ALDERMAN, USMC COMMANDING OFFICER THIRD BATTALION TWENTY SIXTH MARINE REGIMENT

Colonel Harry L. Alderman, 79, died Sunday, February 4, 2007, at his home in Burleson. He had Alzheimer's disease. Funeral services are 10:00 a.m. Wednesday at Crosier Pearson Mayfield Funeral Home in Burleson. Inurnment is planned at Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia. Visitation was 6-8 p.m. Tuesday, February 6, 2007, at the funeral home. A native of Clovis, CA, Col. Alderman enlisted in 1945 and served aboard the cruiser USS Huntington as part of the WWII European Occupation. He was commissioned in 1948 and fought in the Korean War which included the Battle of Chosin Reservoir. Following his return, he served as aide to Major General Lewis B. "Chesty" Puller and participated in an amphibious landing of Beirut, Lebanon in 1958. During the Cuban Missile Crisis, Col. Alderman served as executive officer of a deployed battalion.

During the Vietnam War, Col. Alderman served as commander of the Third Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines in the siege of Khe Sanh and later served as executive officer of Task Force Clearwater, a Riverine Force unit. He retired in 1974 while serving at Marine Corps Headquarters in Arlington, VA. Harry was preceded in death by his wife, Patricia, in 1973. Survivors include sons, Robert Bruce Alderman of Alexandria, VA and Brian Joseph Alderman of Austin, TX; daughters, Joanne Elaine Webb of Austin, TX, Helen Christine Alderman of Burleson, TX and Nancy Claire Bilderback of Houston, TX.

April 30, 1936-May 3, 2006

Mr. Honn was born in Bradley, Ill. to the late Joseph George Honn and Pearl Geneva Wheeler Honn and was married to Dolores White Honn.

He was owner of Jerry's Lawn and Grounds Maintenance Service and was retired Master Sergeant in the United States Marine Corps. During his twenty years of service to his country, he was awarded the Marine Corps Good Conduct Medal with Silver Star, the National Defense Service Medal, Combat Action Ribbon, the Presidential Unit Citation Ribbon with Star, the Vietnam Service Medal with 3 Stars, the Republic of Vietnam Gallantry Cross with Palm, and the Republic of Vietnam Campaign Medal. Jerry spent two years in Vietnam serving with the 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, 5th Marine Division. His last five months in Vietnam was at Khe Sanh in 1968.

After retiring from the Marine Corps in 1974, Jerry moved his family from New River Air Station in Jacksonville to Goldsboro. He attended Wayne Community College where he earned a degree in Turf Management.

Recently, Jerry became very interested in the arts and began painting with the Soul's Palette, a special group formed to nurture the emotional needs of patients who have serious, chronic illnesses through Southeastern Medical Oncology Center. A memorial service was held at Main Street Cemetery with full military honors.

In addition to his wife, he is survived by his sons, Gerald E. "Jed" Honn and wife Joanne of Goldsboro, and Gregory A. Honn of Fla.; sister Donna Krizan of Odessa, Fla.; brothers J. Michael Honn and Jan of Kankakee, Ill. and James K. Honn and Anita of Gilman, Ill.; and grandchildren, Emily Madison Honn and Brittany Honn. Jerry was preceded in death by son Jeffrey Honn and sister Joyce Honn.

Monument to Raymond "Mike" Clausen, Jr. Unveiled

By Debra Lemoine
Advocate Florida parishes bureau
January 28, 2007

PONCHATOULA -- Hundreds stood in the pouring rain to watch a parade in Hammond that welcomed Medal of Honor recipient Raymond "Mike" Clausen Jr. home from the Vietnam War on July 31, 1971.

Almost 36 years later, another crowd stood in the cold, drizzling rain to honor the U.S. Marine again Saturday morning. This time, they unveiled a monument at his gravesite in the Ponchatoula Cemetery detailing his heroic actions that led to the nation's highest military citation being presented to him. What drew the veterans and Ponchatoula and Hammond residents to this site Saturday was a man they loved for his bravery who said what he thought despite the consequences, friends said. Yet they credit his impulsive nature to saving the lives of 19 Marines trapped in a minefield near DaNang, Vietnam, on Jan. 31, 1970.

"He was a Marine you wanted with you when you were really in trouble," said retired Col. Walt Ledbetter, the commanding officer of Marine Medium Helicopter Squadron 263. Ledbetter flew the mission that led to Pfc. Clausen's medal. Ledbetter received the Navy Cross for the same mission. Clausen died at age 56 from liver disease on May 30, 2004. Since then, retired State Trooper and Vietnam veteran Phillip Monteleone of Ponchatoula spearheaded the formation of the Mike Clausen Foundation and efforts to raise $19,000 to pay for the memorial. The memorial wall includes a carving of Clausen and an artist's rendering of the mission that led to Clausen's medal. The other side displays a narrative of Clausen's Medal of Honor citation signed by President Richard Nixon.

"This is not only for him," said retired Lance Cpl. Ed West, one of the Marines rescued by Clausen. "This is your Vietnam Wall in south Louisiana." Clausen did three tours in Vietnam and flew in more than 1,900 combat missions, Ledbetter said. On Jan. 31, 1970, Ledbetter briefed his crew on a mission to rescue two platoons trapped in a minefield. He warned the Marine crewmen not to get off the helicopter or they, too, would need rescuing.

"I lowered the ramp," he said. "Mike Clausen looked out on that minefield and he knew what needed to be done. Six times he walked out of that aircraft. If he had not done that, the mission would not have succeeded." Ledbetter said Clausen's entry into the minefield while under enemy fire meant that the pilot had to land in that field only three times to collect all of the men. If Clausen remained inside, Ledbetter said he would have had to land in that minefield six to eight times, increasing the chances that the rescuers would have landed on a mine as well. The platoons were "Kingfisher" forces, dropped into battles by helicopters to surprise enemy forces. Once the platoons landed, they surprised the targeted North Vietnamese troops, who ran for the tree line for safety, said retired Lance Corporal Steve Bish, a radio operator on the ground during the fight.

The Marines followed and ended up in the minefield, he said. With directions from helicopter pilots surveying the scene from above, Bish was able to walk out of the field unharmed. Others, such as West, who lost both his legs when a mine exploded, were killed or wounded by a mine before they could be picked up by rescuers. West said he never had a chance to meet Clausen again after that mission. He saw Clausen only twice - once when Clausen carried him from the minefield on a stretcher and then again when Clausen covered West with flight jackets to keep him warm enough to avoid going into shock from his wounds.

In civilian life, Clausen graduated from Hammond High School before signing up for the Marines. He married his wife, Lois, in 1976 and moved to Ponchatoula. He also survived a debilitating car crash, having to relearn how to read and write during his recovery, Lois Clausen said. He also worked as an inspector for Boeing at its aircraft refurbishing facility at Lake Charles, and she traveled every weekend from their home in Ponchatoula to see him there, she said. "He was a wonderful person," Lois Clausen said. "Everybody likes him."

Vietnam-Era Marines Recall Siege

By Betty Porter
For Florida Today

Palm Bay, three former Marines who survived the Vietnam War's Siege of Khe Sanh told American History students at Brevard Community College recently that the experience forever cemented them as brothers. The three decorated men: Cliff Treese of Palm Bay; Philip Mineer of Fort Myers; and Ronald Shouse of Winston-Salem, N.C., said they are committed to keeping alive the memory of the 1,267 U.S. soldiers who died in the battle 39 years ago. Khe Sanh Marines are eternally bonded, said Treese, who lost an arm in the fight. The Khe Sanh Combat Base was a remote American outpost that initially came under sporadic attack by North Vietnamese forces in the spring of 1967, only to come under full-scale siege by January 1968. Eventually, American forces drove through to rescue the embattled Marines by April 1968.

Though credited as a military victory for the United States, the strategic significance isn't fully understood today. Some historians suggest the siege was a diversion preceding the Tet Offensive, others theorize the North Vietnamese planned to replicate previous military victories at Khe Sanh and attempt a knockout punch of American forces. It took a while for me to be able to tell some of my experiences from my tour in Vietnam, but now when asked, I do answer questions about it for the younger generation, for the simple reason that there is little or no information about the War in Vietnam in the history books, Shouse said. Treese was incorrectly listed as killed in action for three days, leading to a heartbreaking telegram to his family. Days later, he made a phone call telling his loved ones he actually survived he spent three and a half years in military hospitals. The three decorated Marines were invited to the Palm Bay campus to speak by History Department Chairman and Associate History Professor, Laura Dunn. The vets spoke to the U.S. History II classes of instructors Patrick Richards and Joe Roberts. Both classes were filled with students who were not born when the Vietnam War took place. Most of the students however, were about the same age as the three vets when they fought in Vietnam, age 18.

Eighteen-year-old student Jacob Stonecypher of Palm Bay who attended the vet's presentation in his morning U.S. History II class said, I felt personally moved by their presentation and I have a lot of respect for these men. It's cool that they are reaching out to the younger generation to help us understand what it was all about and what it was like actually being there. I didn't realize all that went on in that War and how many soldiers were killed until these three Marines spoke to us, Alicia Glass, 19, of Palm Bay said, adding, Nor did I realize how young the Marines were who fought in Vietnam.

It probably influenced my decision as to what part of history that I will do my term paper on, Josh Tuchman, 19, of Palm Bay said, adding, Their presentation was really interesting and I really want to learn more about it. Tuchman's history instructor, Joe Roberts, said he was only 13 at the time of Khe Sanh, but noted that the battle was legendary in the Marine Corps history. He said he remembers being personally entrenched and very interested in what was going on in the Vietnam War, remembering the media coverage of it, and that he especially paid close attention to it during the five years leading up to his being eligible for the draft. The war had wound down by that point, but I know that it had such an effect on me that it probably led me to became a history buff, he said. Roberts U.S. History II class viewed a 44-minute History channel video called The Battle of Khe Sanh that chronologically documented the 77-day Siege of Khe Sanh and featured in it photos and commentary by Treese. Then the class had the opportunity to ask questions of Treese and his two Marine comrade buddies as well as view up close the many Vietnam artifacts and personal photo albums the Marine trio had brought. Treese, Mineer, and Shouse will be attending a national Khe Sanh reunion this July 2-8 taking place in Washington, D.C.

MARINES AND THEIR CORPSMEN

Fellow KSV:
A very moving and timely story. After reading this you will begin to understand the bond that exists between Marines and their Corpsmen. We are eternally bonded by the trust and need for each other under less than desirable conditions. If I live for another 100 years, my love and respect for Marines will not have diminished one iota. Long live the Marine Corps.
Semper Fidelis!
John "Doc" Wurth
L Co 3/9

By Jim Sheeler
Rocky Mountain News

December 30, 2006 ARLINGTON, Va. The sergeant with no legs sat inside the cemetery, thinking about how this homecoming was supposed to happen. The 24-year-old Marine had spent the past two months in a hospital bed, grimacing as he devised his own painful physical regimen to strengthen the tender stumps that end just above his knees, hoping to earn his prosthetic legs early. His unit wasn't supposed to return from Iraq until April, so he figured he had plenty of time to learn how to walk. "I wanted to walk when they came off the bus to see all of them, but especially 'Doc,' " he said, referring to the last face he saw before everything went dark. "I wanted to shake his hand and say, 'Thank you.' "Wednesday morning, near the perfect rows of headstones that stretched up and along the hillsides at Arlington National Cemetery, the man in the wheelchair spoke quietly, in a soft Southern drawl. "To be honest," he said, "I'm pretty nervous about this." "You'll do fine," his mother said. The sergeant's body is still riddled with shrapnel wounds, pitting the skin on his entire left side with deep pink scars. What is left of his legs jutted from the wheelchair, filling only a fraction of his jeans, which were folded at the place where his knees used to be. Only one hand works.

He looked over at his wife and two daughters, at his parents and the rows and rows of white marble. Somewhere out there was a fresh grave. As he entered the place known as "our nation's most sacred shrine" for the first time, the sergeant said he was unshaken by the seemingly endless headstones. What got to him, he said, are the people left behind to grieve. "I just think about all the families," he said, "and the people like myself who had to go into Arlington for this."

The sergeant's father wheeled him into a waiting room, where the Marine asked to sit in the corner, out of the way. Soon, the room was filled with crisp Navy uniforms - admirals, chiefs and hospital corpsmen, many of them sporting dress coats jingling with medals. Then, down the stairs, the sergeant saw the people who wore no uniforms, the ones who wore only grief.

As it turned out, the man with no legs didn't need to learn how to walk to welcome home Navy Hospital Corpsman Christopher A. Anderson. Doc's family walked over to him. A choice to 'go green 'Marine Sgt. Gregory Edwards took his last step Oct. 21. After six weeks in country, Alpha Company was on patrol in Ramadi, Iraq, conducting house-to-house searches when a hidden explosive detonated. He woke up and saw the hazel eyes he recognized immediately.

The lanky 24-year-old from Longmont wore a patch with two snakes intertwined around a winged staff - the caduceus, the traditional sign of a healer, and the emblem of a Navy corpsman. He was the only one of them in the squad who was not a Marine - the most important one of them all: the one they all called Doc. Before being deployed, Navy corpsmen say, they have a choice to "go blue," serving their time on a ship or stateside, or to "go green," assigned to the Marines.

Christopher "Doc" Anderson volunteered to go green. Before arriving in Iraq in early September, Anderson was assigned to Alpha Company of the 1st Battalion, 6th Marine Regiment - a group with a decorated history dating to World War I. The rookie corpsman was soon on the front with the infantry, saddled with securing some of the most dangerous neighborhoods in Iraq. Before the Marines headed to Ramadi, they had to know that the sailor from Colorado with the massive pack of medical gear was the kind of man they could trust with their lives.

Marines don't train field medics of their own; they rely on Navy hospital corpsmen, as they have for more than a century. A traditional saying holds that a Marine infantryman doesn't wonder if his corpsman will save his life - he wonders when. "When you get a new corpsman, he has to prove himself, that he can do the same things the Marines can do," Edwards said. "When we do PT (physical training), he has to keep up. When we go on our hikes, he has to carry the same ear, plus his medical gear, which must weigh an additional 30 pounds. And he can't fall back. "A fourth-generation sailor, Doc Anderson never fell back. Although relatively scrawny, it didn't take long for Anderson to prove that he could run as quickly as any of the "grunts," with the same endurance. He used his height to help shorter guys over walls and fences, following behind, always looking out. Using his medical equipment as a universal translator, and ice-breaker he treated Iraqis as well as his own men, forging trust in a place where the word often has no definition. If he saw an Iraqi child with a cut or scrape, he would paste the child with antibacterial cream and bandages and attempt to win his part of the war with Band-Aids.

Among the Marines, he earned frequent smiles, often at his own expense. He was teased endlessly for his trademark bouncy walk - a literal spring in his step - which he swore he didn't do on purpose. He stocked an endless reserve of bad jokes, the punch lines of which he would laugh at much too loud and much too long, until everyone around was laughing both with him and at him. "I like to remember the good times with Doc," Edwards said. "Sometimes he was a complete jackass." 'You're not going to die on me' One week before the funeral, the sergeant sat outside Walter Reed Army Medical Center and closed his eyes. "You're going to have to give me a minute here," he said. For weeks, he couldn't tell the story of what happened that day - he lied when asked about it, saying that he couldn't remember anything.

The problem was he could remember almost everything. On Oct. 21, his patrol had stopped in front of one of the houses owned by a government official in Ramadi, he said. The sergeant stepped on what he thinks was a mine or a radio-controlled explosive. "I was unconscious. And when I woke up, the first face I saw was Doc Anderson," Edwards recounted. "He said, 'Don't worry about it sergeant; it's not that bad.' "The sergeant looked up and saw his legs - or what little was left of them. He saw all the blood, looked at his mangled hand and he went into shock. "Doc kept saying to me, 'Stay strong. Stay with me, Sgt. Ed,' " the sergeant said. "He said, 'You're not going to die on me.' "The Marines carried Edwards into an Iraqi home, where Anderson began emergency first aid. "I told him, 'You take care of my babies.' "Doc Anderson said, 'You're going to take care of your babies. You're going to be just fine.' ""There was a lot of pain. "The sergeant stopped and closed his eyes again. "Give me a minute," he said. Once transferred to a Humvee, Anderson kept working, tying tourniquets with one hand while elevating the sergeant's head with another as they sped to the nearest aid station. That's when Doc started shouting at his patient. "While we were in the Humvee, I could feel myself slipping away, wanting to go to sleep, and Doc started yelling at me," Edwards said.

"I was ready to enter whatever after life there is, and he kept yelling at me, telling me it was going to be OK. "Anderson later would tell his friends and parents that it was the most terrifying day of his life that he constantly second-guessed himself, wondering if he had done everything he could have and should have. He told his closest friends that he had lost the sergeant's pulse three times on the way to the clinic but that each time he had managed to bring him back.

More than 30 days later, Edwards woke up at Walter Reed in Washington, D.C. He remembered one voice: "The last thing I heard was Doc saying, 'You're going to be OK.' "Prankster got 'squared away' One of the highest compliments a service member can bestow on another is to say that he or she is "squared away. "Squared away means that nobody has to worry when the action starts - someone who is squared away can be counted on, even in the most hectic circumstances, to perform flawlessly. As a boy, Christopher Anderson hardly fit the term.
A prankster with a Bart Simpsonesque streak, he was a master of mooning his cousins from the car. Along with his brother, Kyle, he drove plenty of schoolteachers to the brink of breakdown.

As he grew older, he could juggle girlfriends like a street husker. A stickler for dressing immaculately, he spent inordinate amounts of time choosing his clothes and was known to change clothes as many times as Cher before going out to a bar. As a teenager, he worked as a baseball umpire, learning to moderate, keep constant watch and mediate disputes. After graduating from Longmont High School, he worked many jobs - from clothing sales clerk to bar bouncer, but always left one option open. Three generations of Andersons before him had enlisted in the Navy. His Father served as an elite Navy SEAL. In 2005, he became the fourth. Soon after signing the enlistment papers, he committed himself entirely. At boot camp, he was voted the "honor graduate" of his company. He then returned to Longmont during Christmas break and spent all of his spare time at the recruiting office, trying to bring as many sailors as possible along with him.

His enthusiasm sparked the interest of Navy Commander Dave Copp, who awarded Anderson the Navy Achievement Medal even before the young sailor entered corpsman training school. "I remember this kid," said Navy Chief Darrell Crone, an instructor at Naval Hospital Corps School in Chicago, who oversees the Internet site corpsman.com. "He was decorated with an award before he got to our school. We thought, 'What the hell is this - what kind of brown-noser is this?' "After a couple of phone calls, he found out. "He wasn't a brown-noser of any kind," Crone said. "When he was on leave, he was actually recruiting. Normally when kids go home, they lie on the couch and play video games. He was out there doing the job. He was the kind of guy who, if there was a nook or cranny to get things done, he could just do it."

After Anderson's death, his father received a call from his son's commanding officer, who told a story of the first time he saw Christopher in Iraq. The lieutenant colonel remembered pointing to the only serviceman there who wasn't a Marine and asking about him. "The master sergeant looked up and said, 'Oh, that's one of our docs, Anderson. He's the most squared-away Marine we've got,' " Rick Anderson said. "And that was Christopher - squared away. "Sacrificing for kids 'like mine' Last week, inside Ward 58 at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, the sergeant shook out a Marlboro Red. These days, despite what the doctors say, even his mother won't give him grief about smoking. "I figure he survived that," Cheryl Edwards said, nodding toward his legs. "He can have a cigarette. "

After 36 surgeries, much of the shrapnel remains inside. The sharp chunks of metal will work their way out during the next several years, as his body expels the war. Edwards' left hand was shattered in the blast, the bones pulverized "like powder," he says. The hand is now a gnarled brown mess of dead, flaky skin and giant Frankenstein stitches that wrap around the fingers that have been reattached and secured with surgical pins. He can move his thumb and forefinger like a crab pincer, but he lost some of his knuckles, so his other fingers are shorter than they were. At one point, surgeons suggested amputating some fingers to save his hand.

"The doctor came in and said, 'How attached are you to that index finger?' " Edwards said. "I told him, 'I'm attached to all my body parts. I've already lost enough.' The stumps of his legs are discolored patchwork quilts of skin grafts. One leg was rebuilt with the thigh muscle from a donor body; it now ends several inches above his knee. The other was amputated through the kneecap. On his head, a bandage covers a quarter-sized dark red hole, which otherwise remains framed in the "high and tight" Marine haircut. Outside the hospital 10 days ago, a man in a camouflage uniform paused at Edwards' wheelchair and offered his hand in thanks.

"I get that a lot," he said after the man left, pulling out another cigarette. "But me, personally, I don't think I need to be thanked for my service. I chose this. I know that being blown up or dying is one of the hazards of my job. If you don't expect to get hurt as a Marine infantryman, you're in the wrong line of work. "This was his third tour in Iraq. He went in on the initial invasion and saw the statue of Saddam Hussein fall. During his second tour, he was nearly electrocuted and spent time at Walter Reed recovering. Although he is a living example of the war's cost, he prefers to look back on what he says will be lasting benefits of his sacrifice. "I lost my legs not for this country, but for the country of Iraq, so their children will be able to run around, just like mine," he said as he watched his daughters, ages 3 and 5, playing on the hospital grounds. "If time was turned back, I'd do it all over again. "He says he told the same thing to President Bush last week. Before leaving for Texas for Christmas vacation, the president and first lady made rounds at Walter Reed, speaking to many of the wounded. Edwards' mother said that the president, after visiting with Edwards for about half an hour, spoke to other injured service members then returned to the sergeant's room. "(The president) said, 'Some of the guys have cussed me out. Some said they hated me. But I'm going to quote you word for word in my next speech,' " Cheryl Edwards recounted. "He said, 'I'm going to quote you,' " the sergeant said. " You just watch.' "Outside Walter Reed, Edwards' girls ran back to him, and he boosted Paige into his lap. The girls call the stumps of his legs "Daddy's boo-boo. "Memorial Day never ends.

At Arlington National Cemetery, the American flag flies at half-staff every weekday, as an average of 25 funeral processions a day amble near it, past the white rows of marble, where privates and unknown Civil War veterans lie near Medal of Honor winners and presidents. Arlington is where Memorial Day officially began, the place where it never ends. The cemetery holds the remains of more than 300,000 men and women on more than 600 acres. According to the Department of Defense, the cemetery recently acquired more land, which should keep it available for burials until 2060.That is, if the current rate of burials holds.

In section 60, the place where they bury soldiers from the latest war, the headstones are still fresh. The first of those tombstones is for another man from Colorado, the first casualty from the Iraq War buried at Arlington: Russell Rippetoe, of Broomfield. Not far away lies Lt. Col. Ian Weikel, of Colorado Springs, who was killed in Iraq in April. In between are several men who were stationed at Fort Carson - Lt. Col. Eric Kruger, Chief Warrant Officer Dennis P. Hay, Sgt. Neil Armstrong Prince and Spc. Hoby Bradfield. Since Sept. 11, 2001, a total of 21 Navy corpsmen have died in Iraq and three have died in Afghanistan, making up more than one-third of the total Navy casualties. Not far from the cemetery, the massive Iwo Jima memorial towers over an intersection, honoring the Marines who raised the flag over Mount Suribachi during World War II. Although it is considered a Marine memorial, one of the men immortalized 32 feet tall in heavy bronze is John "Doc" Bradley, the unit's corpsman. At the beginning of World War II, corpsmen and Army medics wore red crosses on their uniforms. That stopped when the enemy began using the crosses as targets, knowing that the servicemen would do anything to save their medics. These days, the corpsmen wear the Marines' digital camouflage while in combat zones and carry full weaponry. Still, as the tombstones reflect, they remain primary targets.

At Arlington, visitors can buy a $6 ticket for a "Tour mobile" that whisks them through the cemetery in 30 minutes - a tour that pauses at the eternal flame of President Kennedy, the Tomb of the Unknowns and the home once owned by Robert E. Lee, back when the cemetery was a plantation. The Tour mobile doesn't go near section 60.Across the street, the ground is empty. There, workers are preparing section 61. The unspoken bond.

Back inside Walter Reed, Edwards grimaced. He lives every minute with pain that would make most people wince, so when his face contorts in pain during physical therapy, it nearly shakes the hospital table. "I'm not a very good patient," he said. "I have no patience. "Nearby, men with new computerized legs ran on treadmills, while others tried out their new arms.

In a corner of the room last week, two little girls and a young boy watched How the Grinch Stole Christmas, oblivious to their parents' trying to figure out their new limbs. After he awoke in the hospital, Edwards asked not to see his own two girls. "It's not that I didn't want to see them," he said. "But I didn't want them to see me. "When he first heard that his Doc died Dec. 4 from a mortar attack, he asked his wife and kids to leave the room. "My dad stayed with me," he said. "For two days, I was heavily depressed. I was heavily medicated. It took me two days to cope with it without being medicated. Now that the funeral is close, I'm starting to have a hard time with it again. "Last week was the first time he spent a night alone - sometimes, while asleep, his arms will flail and his body will thrash with the inevitable nightmares, so family members take turns watching him, making sure someone is there to wake him from battle. Only a week before, the commandant of the Marine Corps met with Edwards at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

In the center of the lobby is an enormous bronze statue of a Navy hospital corpsman carrying a wounded Marine, as the injured man's legs drag the ground. Edwards said, he plans to send his Purple Heart to the Anderson family. "It's the only way I can say thank you," he said. "I can't put it into words, what a corpsman means to his Marines. "He thought back to that bronze memorial. "It says it all in that statue," he said. "It's called The Unspoken Bond." 'Daddy will tell you one day' Wednesday morning, inside a building at Arlington National Cemetery, the Anderson family walked past the Navy officers, directly toward the man in the wheel chair. Debra Anderson was immediately intercepted by another mother. "Your son saved my son's life," Cheryl Edwards said through sobs, locking Debra in a hug. "I thank you. I thank you so much. And I'm sorry. So sorry." The women hugged, then the men did the same, thumping each other on the back. "He saved our son's life," Cheryl Edwards repeated. Together, the families walked to Sgt. Edwards, who sat with his 3-year-old daughter, Paige, in his lap, and 5-year-old Caitlin and his wife, Christina, by his side. "I'm so glad you're here," Debra Anderson said. "I wouldn't have missed it for the world," he said quietly. "I didn't give them a choice at the hospital. I told them I had to come." "I know Christopher was so worried about you," Debra Anderson said. "He was so worried."

"He did everything right. Be proud of him," the sergeant said. "If it wasn't for him, I wouldn't be here. I wouldn't be able to hold my daughter on my lap. "Rick Anderson then bent down in a deep hug. With the knuckle of one finger, he brushed the hand of one of the girls and smiled. "Your boy kept me alive," Edwards said. "I wanted to let go, and he kept me alive." Kyle Anderson approached Edwards and during a long embrace told the Marine that he now carried part of his brother with him. Kyle told the sergeant he always would consider Edwards his brother. Edwards looked up at Anderson's parents. "If there's anything I can ever do for you, you let me know," he said. "You just take care of these girls," Debra said, offering one of the largest smiles that many family members have seen since her son was killed. "We want to watch these girls grow up," she said. From her father's lap, Paige pointed at Christopher Anderson's mother. "Who dat?" the 3-year-old said. "You'll understand one day, OK?" her grandmother said. "Yes," the sergeant said, stroking her hair. "Daddy will tell you one day." 'They all come home'

In section 60 of Arlington National Cemetery, the sun flashed off the bugle of a lone sailor who stood among the thousands of headstones. Dormant trees scratched toward the blue sky, holding dried cherry blossoms that had turned brown. The burial was supposed to take place last week, but the family was caught in the blizzard and spent the night at Denver International Airport while the sailors rescheduled the burial for Wednesday. The Andersons spent Christmas without their son, without an ending. It had been 23 days since the sailors first rang their doorbell to tell them the news. The day before Christopher's funeral, the Department of Defense announced the death of another corpsman - another piece of news that hit hard in the crowd of mourners, which included several families who have sons serving in Alpha Company, still in Iraq.

Earlier in the month, the Siruchek family from New York received a call from their son, a Navy hospital corpsman, who told them that his best friend had been killed. Lots of people called Christopher their best friend. "Matt asked us to come for him," Adam Siruchek said. "He said, 'Since I can't be there, can you go in my place?' "The couple knew they had no choice. They didn't know how hard it would be. "The biggest fear in our mind is that it could be us in those chairs (near the casket)," Becky Siruchek said. "They're living our worst nightmare, the thing we actually have nightmares about. And they're going through it. "As the Anderson family approached the flag-draped casket and took their seats, six sailors surrounded it and lifted the flag.

The chaplain spoke, and the rifle salute cracked. The lone bugler then began the first few notes of Taps, and Edwards dropped his head, without wiping his tears. Methodically, the Navy honor guard folded the flag into tight triangles, slapping each fold into another, as if the flag were starched. A rear admiral presented the flag to Debra. Within 15 minutes, it was over. Debra's sister, Sherry McDonald, handed out a bag filled with dark brown dirt, sent from the home field of Chris Anderson's favorite baseball team, the San Diego Padres. Each family member took a fistful and dusted it onto the casket. Kyle, imitating his brother as an umpire, spread some of the dirt on his own jacket. Debra placed her hand on the casket and held it there for several minutes. Slowly, she let go. The sergeant's mother walked to Debra Anderson again, and they embraced. "Greg says he wished it was him," she said, crying again. "He says he wishes that it was him who came home in the casket instead of Christopher. "The two women held each other for a long time." They all come home," Debra Anderson finally managed to say, as they hugged on the bright green artificial turf laid out over the mud where another family would soon stand. "They all come home. "A father's salute .After everyone else climbed into their cars and prepared to leave, Rick Anderson stood with Kyle at the gravesite. The two men put their handprints in the dirt, and smeared it around. -Kyle Anderson didn't want to leave the casket, and, once again, it fell to his father to convince him to go. For the past three weeks, Rick Anderson had been the quiet rock, steadying his family, comforting them, looking out for everyone, the way he had taught his son to do, the way his son was doing. He spoke at his son's funeral in Longmont and said he cried long and hard during his private, personal conversations with God.

On the outside, with his friendly face and salt-and-pepper moustache, he looked more like the real estate salesman that he is, rather than a former member of one of the most elite special warfare units in the country. But after all of the quiet, all of the stoicism, Rick Anderson stood at the empty gravesite, took a deep breath and let out a Navy SEAL war cry that carried over the headstones. "HOOYAH, KID!" he shouted at his son's casket, his voice breaking. "YOU DID GOOD."

Field of honor Eligibility for burial at Arlington National Cemetery includes:

• Anyone who dies on active duty.

• Any retired veteran with 20 years service or greater from the regular military.

• Reservists who have one period of active-duty service other than training who are age 60 or older and have a total of 20 years or more.

• Honorably discharged recipients of the Medal of Honor, Distinguished Service Cross, Distinguished Service Medal, Silver Star and Purple Heart.

• Other eligible service members include former prisoners of war and veterans who are medically disabled with a 30 percent rating or greater before Oct. 1, 1949, as a result of their military service and were discharged for that reason. Their spouses are eligible for burial alongside their husbands or wives. Source: Department Of defense Sheel-erj@rockymountainnews.com

INCOMING

With Any Luck

By Craig W. Tourte
HQ Btry 1/13

I don't care what "they" say, aging is a difficult physiological process to endure, at least it has been for me. Don't get me wrong here, I'm happy to be around and mourn those who are no longer with us. One would think that as one ages, life would get a little easier to endure. I was talking to my friend Tom Horchler a couple of weeks ago and the topic of how much longer we had came up. I told Tom I was lucky if I could squeeze out another 15 or 20 and Tom responded that he hoped he didn't have that long.

We were the lucky ones, the ones who came back, being able to survive our service at Khe Sanh. That's what I thought for so many years until I started to talk to other Khe Sanh Veterans about our experience. Seems most carry a lot of pain and life has been difficult. What I find particularly interesting is how much we have in common with each other. Sure we have our individual issues, but I think on a whole we have the same, how can I say this, the word "core" comes to mind. I thought I was lucky, but I have found that so many others have carried such pain through the years that now some do not feel so lucky to have made it through. Their experience at Khe Sanh has taken such a huge toll on their life.

On January 21st I was sitting around talking to about 20 old guys, (yes even older than me) all vets of various conflicts. Most were WWII and Korean Veterans with a few Vietnam Vets in attendance. We went around in a circle and each told their story. Some told heart breaking stories of their combat experiences, some came to tears and were not able to relate their experiences other than to utter a few short sentences. Still, most had never seen combat. What struck me was that the ones who identified themselves as Vietnam Veterans seemed to stand apart from the rest. Another observation I made was that those who had not experienced combat seemed to want to talk about their experience the most. The ones who identified themselves, as having been in combat didn't seem to have much to say.

I certainly don't mean to identify myself as someone who has a lot of combat experience. I was just a REMF who was fortunate enough to survive the Siege. I wore my Khe Sanh T shirt that day, the one I got at the reunion a couple of years ago. I told the group that this day was special for me and that I was wearing my shirt in honor of those lost 39 years ago, when the Siege at Khe Sanh started I received a lot of comments, all seemed to know about that event and one man said that he had flown B-52's around Khe Sanh during the Siege. I thanked him and shared with the group a little about the experience of being on the base when the bombs were dropped, how we heard the noise, and how the ground shook and how the B-52's most likely saved us all.

This same group met several more times during the next twoweeks but I didn't attend. The old (older) guys wanted to talk about WWII and the frozen Chosen. I had shared my experience and figured that was enough. I think Vietnam Veterans are just a little different and there don't seem to be as many of us around as there once was, a natural physiological process. There were no young vets in attendance. In a few more years and with any luck, I'll be one of the old guys. Wait, that's what I am now, Oh God.

MEMOIRS

"JERRY"

By Donna Elliot
Sister MIA Jerry Elliot

Something startled me from a deep sleep to being wide-awake and totally alert. I scanned the room in the predawn stillness; the soft light of the coming day filtered through the bedroom curtains and reassured me that all was in place in my bedroom.

Cindy, cuddled next to me, was sleeping soundly. I couldn't shake the feeling that something was wrong. When I have premonitions it feels like manic butterflies in my stomach. I can't remember when the premonitions first began, it seems like I've had them since I was a little girl. Mama says that having a sixth sense has always been a gift that some of the women in her family are blessed with. I don't know that I consider it a gift. I hate this feeling of knowing something is about to happen, but never knowing exactly what to expect.

I kept trying to pin my anxious feelings down, figure out what, or who, it was related to. Then it hit me like a hard fist in my soft belly, somehow I just knew that Jerry was alive, but he was in very, very serious trouble. I was extremely upset about this feeling and I wanted it to go away. I tried to will the uneasiness away, forcing myself to think about anything that would hold my attention for a few seconds. Maybe I'm dreaming and I'll wake up. I don't know how long I laid there like I was paralyzed while crazy thoughts flew around in my head at the speed of light. My heart was pounding like a frightened rabbit caught in a wildfire. What is it, what's happening? Why am I experiencing these weird thoughts about my brother? As I lay in bed trying to sort these feelings into something less bewildering and frightening there was a loud, solid knock on the front door. Time stood still and for a moment, one last peaceful moment, I was frozen in time. I knew somehow that there would be soldiers on the other side of the door, standing there, disheartened with terrible news about Jerry. What nightmares they must have when they closed their eyes to sleep.

I can hear Mama down the hallway waking Daddy, exaggerating in her panic, "Bill! Bill, get up! There's someone beating on the front door!" Daddy rolled out of bed with a sleepy but resigned groan, and I listened to his bare feet smack the tile floor as he walked quickly down the hall, to the front door. Mama was moving around in the bedroom searching for her robe. I imagined her wrapping it around her tightly, like a shield, then she stepped into the hallway and walked into the living room just as Daddy turned on the lights. There was the whoosh noise the door made when it was opened. From my bed I could see down the hall to the open door. I caught a glimpse of olive-drab dress uniforms as two soldiers stepped inside, and without speaking, closed the door behind them. I could hear the deep male tones of their voices, although they spoke in hushed tones. I couldn't understand their first words, but I was stiff as a board because I knew it had something to do with Jerry, and it was not good.

I slid up in bed, leaning stiffly against the headboard. I didn't really want to hear what they had to say, but their words floated down the hall, charging the air like thunderbolts. "Are you Mr. Elliott?" one of the soldiers asked. "Yes, Bill, just call me Bill, and this is my wife, Mary," Daddy answered. They identified themselves as Casualty Officers, and then a steady, calm voice spoke directly to Daddy, "We regret to inform you that your son, Private Jerry Elliott, has been listed as missing-in-action." "Missing-in-action," the words hung in the air, too mind-bending to absorb. I couldn't breathe for the choking lump in my throat; my heart was so heavy my chest hurt. I hid my face in my pillow and tried to shut the words out, but they were in my head bouncing around, "missing, missing, Jerry is missing". Mama's screams gradually turned to wails, "Oh no, oh no! Not Jerry! It can't be Jerry, I told him not to try to be a hero!" Mama's screams pierced my heart, I wanted to run to her, but I was afraid to see her face. I didn't know what to do, so I did nothing but cower in my bed and stare at Cindy's sweet little face untouched by tragedy.

They solemnly read from the Report of Casualty that on January 21 Jerry was serving as a "Gunner of a military aircraft on combat operation, which, while on the ground after the passengers had disembarked, was hit by hostile small arms fire, exploded and burned. He was last seen engaging the hostile forces in a firefight after leaving aircraft to assist crew. Search is in progress." Daddy saw the Casualty Officers to the door, thanked them for coming in person, closed the door behind them, and locked it securely, as if locked doors would keep more bad news away. There was an odd stillness in the house without the usual smells and sounds of morning. There was no coffee perking, or the sound of Mama and Daddy's lively morning conversation as they planned their day. They were not talking to each other at all, and I was scared to get out of bed and break the silence. I felt like I'd eavesdropped on a sacred grown-up conversation, and if I let them know that I'd heard most of what was said, it would make it all too real, and I'd have to be an adult too. I wasn't ready for this, I was only 16.

Long minutes passed before I gathered enough courage to slip out from under the warm covers, move quietly down the hall, and peek around the corner into the living room. Daddy was sitting in his chair staring at nothing, tears running down his face; and Mama had her head in her hands, openly sobbing. I'd never seen my Daddy cry before; I didn't want to see it then. For some reason that frightened me more than Jerry being missing. My world was unraveling and there was nothing I could do to stop it. I wanted to run to my parents, tell them that I loved them, tell them that everything was going to be alright, that somehow I knew Jerry was going to be alright. But what if they didn't believe me? I desperately searched for safe words of comfort, but I couldn't think because my mind was going in so many directions at once. I wanted to ease their minds, but I couldn't make myself go into that room so full of raw pain. Instead I eased back down the hall into the bathroom, shut the door, and shoved my face into a towel so hard and tight that I couldn't cry. I vowed that I would never cry in front of Mama and Daddy, I would be strong for my family, I would show them that they could lean on me, that I could hang tough because I sincerely believed that Jerry would come home. As I sat alone in the bathroom I realized that everything had changed now, none of us would ever be the same again. Even when Jerry was found things wouldn't be the same because now we know how dangerous being a soldier really is. There won't be anymore pretending that war is all glory and that nothing bad can happen to him.

I started to think about Jerry, wondering where he was, if he was hurt, hungry, tired. Are they being mean to him? Does he know that I know that he's alive, even though I can't explain how I know? I can't bear these thoughts, so I shoved them into a dark corner of my mind, and every time they tried to raise their ugly heads I pushed them back down again. Later that day the Western Union telegram came, it read exactly the same as the Report of Casualty, but it also advised, "In order to protect any information that might be used to your son's detriment, your cooperation is requested in making public only information concerning his name, rank, service number and date of birth." It is Sunday in Mississippi, but because Southeast Asia is a day ahead of the U.S., we got the news on January 21st, the same day that Jerry went missing in Vietnam. When I did return to school on Monday I would remember what the Army had said about keeping quiet for Jerry's sake. I would try to carry on like nothing has happened. In fact, as far as I was concerned there was nothing to talk about, Jerry might be missing, but he was still alive. The Army, his friends, they were searching for him. All we could do now is wait.

Days, then weeks go by. Our house was not full of laugher anymore. Home was not a place that I particularly wanted to be. Mama and Daddy barely talked to each other, or Cindy and me. "Where's Jerry?" sat in the middle of the supper table like an ugly centerpiece that everyone tried to ignore. Cindy tried to end the silence by chattering about her school days in second grade. She didn't understand what had changed, why everyone was so sad, because she had no idea what MIA meant. Mama wanted to protect Cindy. Why break her little heart over her "Butter" until he was found, alive or dead.

We were both left to figure things out on our own, because we were without parents who knew how to cope with a situation where you're not supposed to talk about a soldier that's missing. That left all of us without a support system, no one to talk to, no shoulder to cry on. It was like a kidnapper telling the family of his victim not to call the police or he would kill their loved one. Daddy returned to work and kept himself too busy to think, except in the evenings after supper when we all watched television together and every once in a while I would see his dark brown eyes shiny with unshed tears. Mama was alone all day while Cindy and I were at school. Little about the next couple of months stands out in my mind except for the many times I would come home and find Mama sitting with Jerry's picture in her arms, rocking back and forth, saying over and over again, "Mama loves you Jerry, Mama loves you."

SHORT ROUNDS

KSV MEMBERS STILL SERVING
DAVID LORD
1/26 Khe Sanh Veteran
MOPH's National Service Officer in Mexico

MOPH's only National Service Officer assigned outside the United States is David Lord. His jurisdiction is the entire country of Mexico; however, all his veteran claims are submitted through the MOPH National Service Office in Houston, TX. David moved to Mexico over ten years ago, spending the first six years in Guadalajara and Lake Chapala. The most recent four years have been spent in Puerto Vallarta, which fronts on the Pacific Coast a thousand miles south of Tucson, Arizona.

David began his service to veterans in Mexico by becoming the Service Officer at an American Legion Post 3 in Guadalajara in 1996. While there, he discovered numerous WWII, Korean and Viet Nam-era veterans needing assistance with physical problems due to age or service-connected disability. Many had no medical coverage due to low income. Then David became aware of a program available through the VA for veterans living in foreign countries and decided to get such a program off the ground in Mexico. He negotiated an agreement with the Mexican Fifth Regional Military and the Mexican Military Hospital to serve U.S. veterans at the same rate charged for the service given to Mexican veterans. It was a first, as far as he knows, where U.S. veterans received treatment at foreign military facilities and hospitals outside of wartime. Word traveled fast by word of mouth, and soon David became well known by all veterans in the area. He spent many hundreds of hours serving veterans in Guadalajara using his special medical program devised to assist veterans from his American Legion Post.

Since moving to Puerto Vallarta and becoming a National Service Officer with MOPH, David travels extensively throughout the region assisting veterans with VA claims, writes weekly columns in the local English language newspaper, the Vallarta Tribune and contributes to the on-line news at . He also receives numerous e-mails (some even from the US) asking for advice or help.

David revels in his recent success stories where he assisted a veteran or dependent in receiving VA benefits they were unaware of. One example he cites is of a veteran named Mike living in Puerto Vallarta. Mike was barley able to survive on his social security income of around $500 per month, but with David's help, he is now receiving over $1,400/mo. in pension from the VA.

David also recalls helping a widow of a veteran who died over forty ago receive a death pension benefit of $7,200 per year. This income has made a tremendous difference to the widow as well as her family members who used to pay for her total support. The widow now enjoys the dignity of paying for her share of food, clothing and medicine.

Veterans with emergencies also find their way to David. Last year, a young Iraq war veteran came to Puerto Vallarta with his family on a cruise ship. While the ship was in port, the veteran had several post-traumatic "episodes" of anti-social behavior that landed him in a Mexican jail. The veteran's attacks of PTSD were viewed as retaliatory by the Mexican police who beat him badly despite the fact his behavior which was triggered by intense flashbacks where he believed he had been captured and was fighting for his life. The more he fought back, the more he was beaten. David did not hear of this incident until the following day when the veteran was transported to the local hospital for sedation and treatment of the injuries. David's NSO credentials and reputation at the hospital, allowed him to enter the intensive care unit and stay with the veteran for three days. David was finally able to negotiate the veteran's release from Mexican custody so he could leave the country with the assistance of a doctor as his travel companion on board a commercial aircraft.

One last example of David's work is a veteran who lives hundreds of miles from Puerto Vallarta in central Mexico. David was able to travel many miles to assist this man who now receives a healthy compensation check monthly from the VA. David acknowledges that without the help of the MOPH Service Program, which finances David's outreach expenses, much of his work would be limited. He also credit's much of his success to Don Hubbard, the MOPH NSO in Houston, TX who processes his claims through the Houston VARO and to his Regional Field Supervisor, Gary Mason in Waco, TX.

We salute David Lord for his tireless work and compassion in the service of veterans abroad in Mexico!

Biographical note: David Lord served in Vietnam as combat Marine for 1st Battalion 26th Marines, during which time he was severely wounded. He received the Purple Heart and the Presidential Unit Citation for his actions during the war in Vietnam. In Mexico, David now represents all veterans south of the U.S. border all the way to Panama, before the V.A. and the Board of Veterans Appeals. David Lord provides service to veterans at no fee. DISASTER AT DONG HA

By Mike "Animal" Preston
CBMU-301 Det B Seabees

At Dong Ha, five miles below the DMZ, the Seabees of MCB-11 lived through the worst ammunition disaster in history when the enemy launched a 140-mm rocket attack and blew up 20,000 tons of ammunition on the afternoon of September 3, 1968. Elements of the Viet Cong combined with North Vietnamese People's Army rocket companies, infiltrated within 10 miles of Dong Ha and bombarded the town in a harassing action designed to disrupt the national elections being held that day. In addition to Army and Marine artillery and infantry units guarding the area, Marine Air Group 16 operated a landing strip in conjunction with the Air Force just outside of the town. Three hundred yards southeast of the airstrip MCB-11 was encamped. Concentrated between the Seabees and the air strip was a fuel dump holding 40,000 gallons of aviation Gas and an ammunition dump containing 20,000 tons of explosives – C4 plastic explosive, artillery shells and sundry types of ammunition.

MCB-11 had been deployed at Dong Ha since April and the men suspected the enemy would attempt something spectacular to detract from the elections, but just what the Viet Cong had up their pajama sleeve was unknown. At 1400 the first rockets came screaming in, their tail vanes making the peculiar high pitched whistle so familiar to fighting men in Vietnam. The first two shells dropped with deadly accuracy into the aviation gas dump. The fuel blew up with a roar and sent a long black column of smoke into the sky. The NVA used the smoke column as a mark to range in on the ammo dump and the Seabee camp.

History's Biggest

One rocket battery "walked" a train of explosions across the Seabee camp while another battery slammed missiles unto the ammunition. The ammo dump took several hits, then blew up. The men rattled around in their mortar holes helplessly as succeeding shock waves shook the camp. The 20,000 tons of ammunition continued to explode during the next eight hours. For the record, it was the biggest ammunition disaster in history. In 1917 a munitions ship blew up with 11,000 tons of ammo in Halifax; in April 1944, a ship with 270 tons of explosives blew up in Bombay, India, and caused great damage and loss of life; in Port Chicago, California, on July 17, 1944, the SS E. A. Bryan with 5,000 tons of ammunition blew up and killed 323 civilians and Navy seamen.

At Dong Ha, the ammunition tonnage was four times greater than the Port Chicago disaster, yet, miraculously, not one man was killed by the blast. All subsequent casualties resulted from enemy fire. By the time the ammo dump erupted, most of the Seabees and Marines had made it to their dugouts. However, many men of MCB-11 remained above ground, dodging smoking hot artillery shells raining down from the ammunition dump explosions, as they carried wounded comrades to the battalion aid station. Leading Chief Petty Officer Ed Hanby remembers the first effects of the bombardment. "The rockets came in, two of them, and hit the aviation gas which exploded all over the place. Then two more rockets or artillery shells hit the ammunition dump and it started to 'cook off.' Dud shells and smoking live ones were falling all through the camp. The rockets started to hit our camp and that is when we began having casualties."

Seabee Casualties

Two days before the September 3rd attack, the North Vietnamese rockets and 152mm artillery had hit the Seabee camp with devastating accuracy. The first rocket struck the hut of Builder Richard Sheets and Constructionman Richard Wager. Wager was killed as he dived toward his mortar hole trap door in the floor of the hut. Sheets was peppered with shrapnel and burned from the blast. He survived to return to the battalion a month later after treatment on the Naval Hospital Ship Repose. Five other Seabees died and many were wounded in the first few bursts of the rocket barrage. The North Vietnamese were firing the 140mm Russian made rockets and 152mm artillery shells from camouflaged vantage points above Dong Ha.

The 140mm rocket, as described by Chief Engineering Aid Quinton W. Willis of Preston, Kentucky, is eight inches in diameter and five feet long. The warhead is 85 pounds of high explosive with an impact fuse of bronze metal. They are very accurate and dependable. There has never been a dud 140 mm rocket that we know of, we only have knowledge of them from some captured from the Viet Cong.

The launching platforms for the enemy rockets are simple affairs: two 2x6 boards about ten feet long are nailed together to form a "V". The launchers are laid on the ground and wooden wedges are placed under the boards. The rocket is placed in the "V" trough and the rocket is ranged by moving the wedges to the proper positions. The accuracy of the rocket fire indicated that Viet Cong artillery spotters had infiltrated the area around the camp and called in the rages to the enemy batteries. The NVA rocketeers bombarded the Seabee camp and the MAG 16 compound for several hours.

Evil Speakers

Enemy loudspeakers hidden in the rice paddies around Dong Ha lent an incongruous note to the happenings during the election period. After the ammunition dump had blown up, the Viet Cong via the speakers accused the American forces of launching a B-52 air raid against Dong Ha. This bit of propaganda backfired on the enemy for the villagers were quite aware of the true nature of the explosions. The metallic chatter from the loudspeakers gave the nights a nightmarish quality. Acts of heroism performed by the men of MCB-11 were so numerous they almost became routine. BUC William H. Neal and SWF2 Joseph H. Wood ran through the enemy barrage to rescue BUCN Sheets who was standing in the blazing wreckage of his hut, riddled with shrapnel and his clothes on fire. The men put the fire out and carried Sheets three hundred yards to the aid station through the shells raining down from the explosions. These two men also assisted two other Seabees who had been mortally wounded. PN3 William E. Andre and DT2 Michael D. Nelson saved the life of BUH3 Robert A. Martindale who had been blown out of his hut by the blast. Though seriously wounded, BUHCN Edward J. Stier, aided by BUH3 George C. Dorman, scrambled through the smashed huts to assist in the removal of dead and wounded men. LTJG Robert Cahill, Delta Company commander was slightly wounded while aiding other wounded men to safety.

UTP2 F.E. Beckett and SF1 Stanley Loziol were welding up holes in the water tank when a round landed near them and blew out the tires on their welder.

Pickup Service

The men of MCB-11 performed numerous acts of heroism during the September 3 rocket attack – one of the most outstanding was that of BU2 Floyd J. Pratt who rescued 30 Marines trapped in the burning Ammunition Supply Point. Pratt tells it as: "We were finishing a concrete pour just outside the rear area of the camp. The rounds came in and set off the ammunition which began exploding loudly. We completed the concrete work, then got back into our truck and headed for the back gate. A Marine sergeant stopped me by the back gate and asked if I could drive the truck into the ASP to rescue some Marines. So I did."

Pratt drove his truck into the thick of the exploding ammunition and 30 Marines piled aboard from where they had been trapped in mortar holes. Pratt got the men out in quick time. Another Marine Sergeant asked Pratt if he would return to the ammunition depot and rescue some wounded Marines supposedly trapped in a bunker. Pratt drove his truck back into the inferno and reached the bunker. Ammunition was going off all around his truck and whizzing pieces of shrapnel bounced off the truck cab and body. Pratt's last trip proved fruitless – all the Marines had been evacuated minutes before his arrival. Pratt calmly drove his battered truck back to his company area.

The last elements of MCB-11 were flown into Point Mugu Naval Air Station on December 6, completing the battalion's second deployment. Not all of the men of the battalion came back; nine will remain in Vietnam forever, killed in action by Viet Cong and North Vietnamese regular army attacks at Khe Sanh and Dong Ha. This is the story that goes with my pictures that I sent you a few days ago Tom. I wish I had more film that day because the night shots were spectacular. Later that night ''Charlie'' walked some rounds through our area to the north of MCB 11 but nothing like they went through being right next to the ammo dump.

I never did hear if any of those Seabees got decorated for their bravery that day. I wouldn't be surprised if they didn't, after all it was just their job, just another day at the "office.'' I saw this kind of heroism hundreds of times at places like Khe Sanh, Qua Viet, in the hills, everywhere. I hope it was recognized this time.

WE GET MAIL

In response to an article written in the 67 issue, Winter 2006 on page 14, Short Rounds "Welcome to Delta Company" by Rod Jordan D Co 1/26.

I pulled Sergeant Henson back that day with a sucking chest wound. Even with all the medical help he was given he died. He was truly a warrior, one to be proud to have served with him. There are not many people alive that served at that time in 1/26. There were a lot of very brave men who gave it their all. You came in country after Khe Sanh when we were Quang Tri. I was in Khe Sanh for the whole siege and with you for all the battles we fought after. I am sorry I don't recognize your name but 38 years is a long time. I spent 12 months and 26 days in Viet Nam and 38 years talking about it. You are right when you say only those who were there will understand it. I understand it and am thankful I made it with no purple heart. I hope you are proud of the time you served, I am. Some of the names you may remember are Bill Hudnall, (HUD), Mike Cutini, (WOP) Don Friedsam, and DOC (Sam Newton). My name is Mike Beauregard, "BEAU" and as an E-3 I led the battalion of 16. That's all that was left until you came. Semper Fi.

IN MEMORIAM

Terence Raymond Roach Jr. Birmingham, MI
KIA 8 February 1968, age 25
A Company, 1st Bn, 9th Marines
By Jack D. Wells

Terry Roach grew up in Birmingham, Michigan the only son of three children. Terry's mother and father were in vaudeville, and passionate about their Irish heritage and Christian beliefs. People recall that to be around the Roach family was uplifting, positive and a joy to be around. All throughout high school, Terry was a confident, free spirit of a young man who once was suspended from his high school for wearing kilts to class. Terry was athletic and played varsity baseball in high school.

After high school Terry and his friend Tony Martinaitis were going to join the Army, and Tony recalled: "Terry enlisted in the Marines. The Marines! Can you imagine? Terry wanted more than anything to be a Jarhead. Oh God, how I miss him." After boot camp and six months active duty, Terry returned home and enrolled at Wayne State University in Detroit, Michigan. Terry loved Irish history and music and met his wife to be, Lynn O'Connor, at the Irish Music Club at Wayne State. Terry was proud of his Irish background and loved to sing Irish fight songs in the student union. At Wayne State, Terry was famous for wearing his Irish kilt to class.

In Terry's second year at Wayne State, Terry applied to join the Platoon Leaders Class program offered by the Marines which would lead to a commission as a second lieutenant after graduation from college. In the summer of 1966 Terry attended ten weeks of training at Quantico, Virginia. Terry successfully completed the course in August and returned back to Wayne State University and upon graduation in December 1966, was commissioned a Second Lieutenant in the Marine Corps.

Terry married Lynn in May 1967 and in June left for Quantico to join the Sixth Basic School Class. At Basic School, Terry ended up in the same platoon as his friend Tom Rainey who Terry knew from PLC's at Quantico. On a crisp fall day, the first day in November, Terry and 498 other lieutenants graduated from Basic School. Terry had received his orders to Vietnam and he and Lynn returned home to Michigan to get her settled before his departure.

On November 30th Terry flew to Norton Air Force Base in California, where he joined up with about thirty classmates for a flight to Okinawa where they stayed for a few days before continuing on to Vietnam.

Upon arriving in Da Nang, Terry and several other new lieutenants flew by C-130 to Phu Bai where they were briefed on the enemy situation by the Commanding General of the Third Marine Division. Terry wanted more than any thing to be given command of a rifle platoon and hitched a ride on a truck convoy the next day to Camp Evans to report in to 9th Marines ahead of some of the other lieutenants he had arrived with.

At Camp Evans, Terry was given command of 1st Platoon, Alpha Company, 1st Bn, 9th Marines. At Camp Evans, Terry and his men made frequent patrols in the area around Route 1, which was named "The Street Without Joy" by the French in the "French/Indo China" war in in the 1950's. Lt. Roach's platoon had several brief skirmishes with NVA soldiers the latter part of December 1967 during which his platoon sergeant and one of his Corpsman were killed.

Farther north from Camp Evans, around Khe Sanh, the final few weeks in December through early January were deceivingly quiet as thousands of North Vietnamese soldiers that were pouring into the surrounding hills and valleys tried to avoid any significant combat with the Marines. This lull in the fighting changed after midnight on January 20, 1968, when North Vietnamese forces launched an attack on Hill 861 northwest of Khe Sanh. Six hours later, a enemy artillery barrage commenced on the Khe Sanh base causing heavy damage and the Marines ammunition dump to blow up. Two days later on January 22, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines were ordered to move from Camp Evans to reinforce the Marines at Khe Sanh and the battalion became under operation control (OPCON) of the 26th Marine Regiment headquartered at Khe Sanh.

The day after arriving at Khe Sanh, Terry's platoon, reinforced with a weapons platoon, was sent out to a small hilltop referred to as "Alpha 1" in reference to the First Platoon of Alpha Company. The position was also referred to as Hill 64, which was in reference to the number of Marines on the hill instead of the height of the hill in meters. This was done to mislead NVA specialists that monitored the Marines radio transmissions.

The fortified Hill 64 position was about 500 meters in front of 1st Battalions lines which were near what was called "The Rock Quarry". Terry's Marines were to be forward security for the battalion and to prevent an attack on the Khe Sanh Combat base from the large number of NVA forces that were in the hills to the west.

Nights were always terrifying on Hill 64 as heavy fog rolled in after sunset and did not lift until just before dawn. The night time hours always seemed filled with sounds of things moving around the northwest side of the hill as the Marines strained to see in the fog and the darkness.

In the early days of February 1968, tension was high on the Hill 64 outpost when Division intelligence reported that electronic sensors had detected what was thought to be a North Vietnamese Army regiment moving into the Khe Sanh area.

Lt Roach was doing every thing he could think of to prepare his men and his Alpha 1 outpost, for the expected attack by the North Vietnamese. Lt Roach instructed the squad leaders to brief their men that in the event of an attack, the Marines were to get out of their bunkers to avoid being trapped if NVA soldiers were able to get inside the defensive wire obstacles. Lt Roach had his Navy Corpsman go around to each of the bunkers to give refresher lessons on basic combat first aid. The Chaplain for 1/9, Lt Jack Heino, also came out to the isolated Hill 64 outpost to conduct religious services for the men. In Terry's letters to his wife Lynn he wrote about his platoon radio operator L/Cpl Jim Rizzo. Terry wrote:

I put Rizzo up for a Bronze Star for his action during operation "Badger Tooth". He is a fine young Marine. Men like Rizzo really make me feel proud of our country and the Corps. Rizzo is going home in April and will go back to Kent State University after he gets out of the Marine Corps"

The bond between a platoon commander and his radio operator was typically strong. Twenty four hours a day they were never far from one another and shared the same bunker. The radio had to be monitored all day and all night. Radio operators and their platoon commanders were among the primary targets in any attack by North Vietnamese Army soldiers.

Around 3:00 AM on 5 February, Lt Roach's men could hear the attack by over 200 NVA sappers that breached E Company 2nd Bn, 26th Marines defensive wire on Hill 861A just two miles to the north. Classmates 2dLt Jeff Bodenweiser and 2dLt Don Shanley and their men were fighting for their lives.

After midnight two days later, the Alpha 1 Marines heard distant explosions of battle coming from the Lang Vei Special Forces Camp about four miles away as hundreds of North Vietnamese soldiers supported by tanks attacked and overran the position around 1:00 AM on February 7, 1968. The Lang Vei attack was the first time that enemy tanks had been used against American forces since the Korean War.

On a daily basis, Lt Roach double checked all his defensive positions on the hill and verified the artillery and mortar defensive fires with a forward observer from D Battery 2/12, PFC Larry Seavy-Cioffi who had joined the Hill 64 Marines just three days earlier.

PFC Seavy-Cioffi remembers that Lt Roach was an intense officer, and seemed to be preoccupied with the worry and responsibility that he bore for the sixty five men on the hill. In a philosophical discussion with PFC Seavy-Cioffi over C-ration coffee one afternoon, Seavy-Cioffi remembers Lt Roach saying "God is my rock", (2 Romans: 2) when talking about the imminent peril the Marines were facing. Lt Roach also wanted to send out patrols in the area forward of their position on the hill. His request was denied because it was considered to dangerous to patrol the area forward of the Marines position.

Around 1:00 AM the morning of 8 February there seemed to be more movement than usual outside the tangle of concertina wire surrounding the hill. Around 3:00 AM, Lt Roach moved around the position checking on his Marines and the defensive positions. A little after 4:00 AM, the hill erupted from a heavy mortar barrage fired by North Vietnamese soldiers from the 101D Regiment which drove the Marines to cover within their bunkers. The sound of a bugle signaled that the attack against the Marines by an estimated battalion of North Vietnamese soldiers had begun.

Eighteen year old PFC Ed Welchel's bunker on the west side of Hill 64 was the first to get hit by chicom grenades and a red smoke grenade signaling the start of the attack. The concussion of the grenades blew PFC Welchel's helmet off, throwing him against the wall of bunker, knocking his rifle out of his hands. Choking red smoke filled the bunker. It seemed that Lt Roach was there immediately, helping the stunned PFC Welchel to the relative safety of another bunker, before moving off into the smoke and darkness to rally his Marines on the west side of the position and to try and halt the NVA attack.

Minutes later, the barrage ceased and attacking NVA threw canvas on top of the barbed wire and breached the Marines defensive positions in two places. Lt Roach hurriedly assembled a squad of his men and led them forward against the attackers who were now inside the position. A short time later Lt Roach was killed while moving in a trench line towards the attacking NVA soldiers, firing his M-16. Lt Terry Roach was posthumously awarded a Bronze Star for his heroic actions. Part of 2dLt Roach's Bronze Star Citation reads:

"Disregarding his own safety, Second Lieutenant Roach unhesitatingly left his covered position and fearlessly moved about the fire-swept terrain he fearlessly engaged the soldiers in hand-to-hand combat until he was mortally wounded".

Fifty one Marines and Corpsman on Hill 64 were killed or wounded during the furious battle. At first light, a relief force of 2nd Platoon, Alpha Company led by the company commander, Capt J. Radcliffe drove the NVA attackers off the hill and rescued the gallant survivors of Alpha 1 who had battled the numerically superior NVA force with such a ferocity that they prevented the enemy from taking total control of the hill. After evacuation of the men who had been killed and wounded, Alpha Company was ordered to abandon the position and air strikes were brought in to destroy any remnants of the defensive positions that might be subsequently used by the communists.

Lynn Roach and Terry's family were devastated when they were told of Terry's death in Vietnam. Terry's daughter, Mary Scott, was born three months after her father was buried with honors on a cold winters day at Sacred Heart cemetery in Detroit. Terry's father never recovered from the shock, and for the final years of his life, after brewing the traditional morning coffee, with a tear in his eye would always make a toast to his son and the "Corps."

The Company Commander of Alpha 1/9, Captain Max Radcliffe still finds himself waking up sometimes in the early morning darkness and hearing the voice of L/Cpl Rizzo saying: "Skipper, they are all around us, you got to come and get us"

Terry's daughter is now married and has a family. Mary Scott named her son, Terry in honor and memory of the father that she never saw, who was taken from her in the battle on Hill 64.

Overcoming Neurotoxicity (Agent Orange/Gulf War Syndrome) With a Simple Natural Treatment

By Dr. Howard Peiper (Khe Sanh Veteran)

The nervous system comprises the brain, spinal cord, and a vast array of nerves. Bodily functions controlled by this complex network of nerve processes, transmitters, hormones, receptors, and channels are movement, thought, vision, hearing, speech, heart function, respiration, and numerous other physiological processes. Although toxic substances can adversely affect every major body system the nervous system is particularly vulnerable. Unlike many other cells nerves have a limited capacity to regenerate.

If a substance adversely affects any of the structural or functional components of the nervous system it is considered to have neurotoxic potential. At the molecular level a substance might interfere with protein synthesis within certain nerve cells leading to reducing production of a neurotransmitter and stimulating brain dysfunction. Neurotoxins can adversely affect sensory or motor functions, disrupt learning and impair memory processes. They may also cause detrimental behavioral—effects which give rise as the earliest signs of exposure. In addition, there is evidence that the adverse effects of some neurotoxic-induced neurodegenerative diseases may not become apparent until years after exposure (i.e. cancer, diabetes, MS, Alzheimer's, Parkinson's).

Scientists have found that when certain species of rice grains are grown under optimal conditions, and are harvested at the proper age, they contain top quality functional and essential nutrients such as polysaccharide polypeptides. Rice grains meeting these criteria are perfectly suited to enhance the cellular energy (ATP) production of the mitochondria for DNA repair and cellular regeneration. They combat free radicals and enhance the detoxification process establishing an anabolic (building) phase increasing the functionality of the body's natural healing power.

An important function of polysaccharide polypeptides is its ability to detoxify the body. Avoiding contact with neurotoxins during wartime is virtually impossible. A buildup of these toxins within the body can manifest as many forms of illness. By not identifying the cause of the illness many physicians misdiagnose and prescribe what become "band-aid cures." The first step in bringing the body back to health is to detoxify externally and internally, thus removing toxins from the system. Polysaccharide polypeptides can assist this process and when these toxins are eliminated it helps to support and strengthen the glandular system, accelerating the healing process.

Polysaccharide polypeptides stimulate cognitive enhancement primarily through its influence on important neurotransmitters. These neurotransmitters relay information between neurons and rely on specialized brain chemicals to function properly. While memory is an extremely complex phenomenon, neuronal transmission is even more complex Polysaccharide polypeptides support neuronal transmission by:

- increasing levels of noradrenalin (thinking, learning, planning)
- balancing levels of dopamine (libido, information processing)
- increasing levels of acetylcholine (memory) Increasing levels of serotonin (mood, sleep, balances appetite, lowers substance cravings)

Please take note that depression is a symptom of insufficient serotonin levels. Scientists have found that a positive therapeutic effect of polysaccharide polypeptides was revealed in patients who exhibited pronounced depressive states of varied origins. Studies also reveal that polysaccharide polypeptides have been shown to preserve nerve cell function by supplying food and nutrients at the cellular level. The concept is simple. Provide the cell with food easily recognized and utilized by the cell's DNA (the "molecule of life") to generate energy and this will provide the vehicle for repairing cell damage.

Studies have shown that polysaccharide polypeptides help nerve cells produce normal proteins, allowing these connections to actually be rejuvenated. This is incredible news for people who are affected by neurotoxins (i.e. Agent Orange, Gulf War Syndrome). Nerve cells exposed to these neurotoxins were ultimately protected from damage after adding bioglycanate to the medium. A degree of cellular regeneration of the nerve dendrites and axons was also seen. These extraordinary results have consistently been observed in subsequent research.

Polysaccharide polypeptides are a high, bioactive form of essential elements that improves the cellular environment within which to create a harmonious basis for ultimate gene expression. It has been proven that it can work both in vitro and vivo to correct degenerative health problems at the cellular level.

AIR FORCE MOH

Rescue at Kham Duc

Tom Eichler E Co 2/26
Publisher

In early 1968, the North Vietnamese Army launched a major offensive into South Vietnam. It began in January with an attack on the US Marine Corps base at Khe Sanh, just below the Demilitarized Zone. The siege lasted 77 days, with the marines sustained by air strikes and aerial re-supply. The main blow of the offensive fell on Jan. 31, the Tet lunar New Year holiday, when the NVA and the Viet Cong attacked military bases and population centers all over South Vietnam.

In May, in the second phase of the offensive, two NVA regiments attacked the US Army Special Forces camp at Kham Duc, located in a valley about eight miles from the Laos border and 100 miles south of Khe Sanh. From there, US Special Forces, augmented by South Vietnamese soldiers and Montagnard irregulars, kept watch on the Ho Chi Minh Trail on the other side of the mountains. The camp also impeded enemy infiltration of the South Vietnamese highlands.

Kham Duc had a 6,000-foot-long asphalt runway, built in the 1950s to bring in materials to build a hunting lodge for South Vietnamese leader Ngo Dinh Diem. Wooded hills rose on all sides. The camp was not built to withstand a major assault by artillery and infantry, and it did not hold out long against the large NVA force. The attack began May 6 at a forward operating base, Ngoc Tavak, three miles to the southwest. The casualties were heavy, and two Marine Corps helicopters were lost. Survivors retreated to the main camp. Kham Duc was reinforced by airlift in the May 10-11 period, but the NVA occupied the surrounding hills, sweeping away the defensive machine gun outposts. The North Vietnamese could shoot down on the camp and on aircraft landing there.

As the attack intensified with heavy fire from artillery, mortars, and recoilless rifles, Military Assistance Command Vietnam changed its mind about reinforcing Kham Duc. Army Gen. William C. Westmoreland, commander of US forces in South Vietnam, decided to evacuate the camp instead. The US faced the need to bring out about 1,000 people, not only US troops but South Vietnamese soldiers and, in some cases, their family members. Army and Marine Corps helicopters would conduct about half of the evacuation, but fixed-wing Air Force air lifters would be needed as well. At 8:30 a.m. on May 12, the Air Force's 834th Air Division, which controlled all the C-130s and C-123s operating in South Vietnam, was told to begin an all-out effort to evacuate Kham Duc.

The C-130 was the primary tactical air-lifter in Vietnam and was on its way to becoming one of the greatest airplanes of all time. It carried three times the payload of the old C-123 that it was to replace. However, the Vietnam War gave a new lease on life to the C-123, which had been declared obsolete and was scheduled for retirement. It was ideal for missions into short airstrips and remote locations. The K model of the C-123 had two small jet engines fitted on wing pylons for extra power at takeoff.

Also around 8:30, 7th Air Force ordered maximum priority for air strikes to support the evacuation. US airpower pounded the NVA positions throughout the day, beginning with B-52 strikes at dawn. Tactical airpower flew about 140 sorties at Kham Duc, 120 of them from Air Force units in Vietnam and Thailand.

Check Ride Diverted

Since the evacuation wasn't laid on until 8:30 that morning, Air Force units in Southeast Asia had already begun operations for the day before they got the news. Lt. Col. Joe M. Jackson, commander of a C-123 detachment at Da Nang, had taken off at 7 a.m. for his semiannual flight check. Maj. Jesse W. Campbell, the flight examiner, was in the co-pilot's seat. Jackson had scheduled the check ride for a cargo mission, no passengers, to various locations up and down the coast. The flight check involved such things as shutting down an engine, best done without passengers aboard.

This was Joe Jackson's third war. He enlisted in the Army at Newnan, Ga., in 1941, when he was 18 years old. He became a crew chief on B-25 bombers, and then earned his commission and wings in the aviation cadets. He flew P-40 and P-63 fighters and, toward the end of World War II, B-24 bombers. After the war, he returned to fighters and flew 107 combat missions in F-84s in Korea. He was one of the first Air Force pilots selected to fly the U-2 reconnaissance aircraft. Jackson is credited with several aeronautical innovations, including a bomb-tossing method to deliver nuclear weapons from fighter aircraft, later adopted by Strategic Air Command for use by bombers.

Jackson was serving as a war planner in Europe when he got his orders to go to Vietnam. After being checked out in the C-123, he arrived at Da Nang on Aug. 28, 1967. His detachment, part of the 311th Special Operations Squadron at Phan Rang, had eight aircraft. They had seen hard duty during the siege of Khe Sanh. Jackson's call sign for the check ride was "Bookie 771." The crew, in addition to flight examiner/co-pilot Campbell, consisted of the flight engineer, TSgt. Edward M. Trejo, and the loadmaster, SSgt. Manson L. Grubbs. The aircraft they were flying was a C-123K, the model with the booster jets under its wings.

Early that afternoon, they were told to return to Da Nang for diversion to the evacuation of Kham Duc. Campbell declared the flight check over (Jackson passed) and stayed on for the air evac mission as co-pilot. They drew flak vests, extra ammo for their .38 revolvers, and an extra M-16, and were airborne for Kham Duc at 2:55 p.m. The camp was about 45 miles west of Da Nang.

Upon arrival, Bookie 771 reported in to "Hillsboro," the C-130 airborne battlefield command and control center (ABCCC), and joined the other aircraft stacked up over the base. In another one of the airplanes then orbiting Kham Duc was Maj. Gen. Burl W. McLaughlin, commander of the 834th Air Division.

Evacuation of Kham Duc

A fierce battle had been raging at Kham Duc since daybreak. The first helicopter to arrive, an Army CH-47, was shot down about 7:30. Moments later, an Air Force A-1E was shot down outside the camp perimeter. The NVA shot and killed the bulldozer driver who was trying to clear away the helicopter, which was blocking the runway. It was eventually pushed to the side, but the runway remained partially obstructed.

In all, seven aircraft—three helicopters, the A-1E, an O-2, and two C-130s—would be lost that day at Kham Duc. When Bookie 771 got there, a good deal of the action had already taken place.

The first C-130 in that morning was flown by Lt. Col. Daryl D. Cole. The crew had not yet heard about the evacuation and was delivering a full load of cargo. Cole drew ground fire as he approached and landed with extensive battle damage. A main landing gear tire was flat, and the wing fuel tanks had been punctured and were leaking. The crew could not unload because panicky Vietnamese civilians and irregular troops rushed aboard and refused to budge. The damaged airplane could not take off with all that weight. Cole taxied off the runway, and the crew hacked away as much of the bad tire as they could with a bayonet. When the aircraft drew mortar fire, the Vietnamese fled. One explosion came so close that it shattered a cockpit window. The fuel leak had thrown the aircraft out of balance, but despite the problems, Cole got it into the air and back to Cam Ranh Bay, where the crew counted 85 bullet and shrapnel holes.

At midmorning, Capt. Phillip Smo-ther--man, an O-2 forward air controller working tactical air strikes on enemy positions, was shot down over the base. He made a controlled crash and got his airplane off the runway. He found an abandoned Air Force radio and remained on the ground for five hours, translating the base's needs for close air support to the ABCCC and the forward air controllers. He worked one strike that put ordnance just over 30 yards from his bunker. He left on the last C-130 that took passengers out.

Early in the afternoon, Maj. Bernard L. Bucher's C-130 took off with 150 women and children, families of the Vietnamese irregulars, aboard. The aircraft was shot down as it cleared the field and crashed with no survivors.

Lt. Col. William Boyd Jr., also flying a C-130, saw Bucher go down. Ground fire was heavy as he approached. As he was about to touch down, a shell exploded 100 feet in front of him. He pulled up, went around, landed, and took 100 people aboard. He took more battle damage on the way out. The aircraft made it to Cam Ranh Bay, where somebody spray painted "Lucky Duc" on the side, referring to its fortune in surviving.

As Lt. Col. John Delmore's C-130 came in, the cockpit was riddled with ground fire. The enemy was trying to kill the crew. Delmore crash-landed, but he had no brakes or hydraulic power and little directional control. The airplane struck the remains of the CH-47, and Delmore wrestled it off the runway, where it hit a dirt mound and stopped.

About 4:30, the ground commander ("Crossbow") reported that all friendly forces were clear and requested air strikes to demolish the base and the equipment left behind.

The airborne command post then gave an order to the fighters that were in the area to go in and destroy the camp," Jackson said, but "the C-130 that had just taken off said, 'Negative, negative. I let three members of the combat control team off,' and that's when the dead silence was so loud. It was just like hitting a guy in the face with a dead fish."

Capt. Robert M. Gatewood, duty controller on the ABCCC, said, "A hush could be felt, literally, over the radio as all agencies realized the implication of this statement."

After a few moments, the ABCCC broke the silence to tell the strike fighters to hold up and to send some O-1 and O-2 FAC aircraft down to look. They weren't able to see anything. An airplane would have to go in to get the combat control team.

The Combat Control Team

Maj. John W. Gallagher was mission commander of the combat control team, although he was a C-130 pilot, not a combat controller. The other two members of the team, TSgt. Morton J. Freedman and SSgt. James D. Lundie, were both fully qualified combat controllers. They had come to Kham Duc as part of the first contingent of reinforcements May 10. Their job was to control the airlift and coordinate the approach, loading, and unloading to expedite departure of the airplanes and limit their exposure to ground fire.

On the morning of May 12, Gallagher heard that the airlift mission had been canceled. There was room for confusion. According to an Air Force study of the battle by Lt. Col. Alan L. Gropman, 7th Air Force called off the C-130 evacuation about 10:30 because of the severity of ground fire. Military Assistance Command Vietnam subsequently ordered resumption of evacuation. Gallagher decided the CCT should pull out, overruling the opinions of Freedman and Lundie, who thought that the team ought to stay. On Gallagher's orders, the CCT boarded Cole's C-130 when it left at midmorning for Cam Ranh Bay.

McLaughlin, learning that the CCT had left before the job was complete, ordered that they go back in. Indeed, Cole's airplane was the first C-130 into Kham Duc. By the middle of the afternoon, seven more C-130s and a C-123 landed at Kham Duc. However, these flights were finished by the time the CCT returned to the camp in the late afternoon. A great many people were involved in the evacuation, which was a complicated operation. Some of the details—such as the situation of the CCT—got lost in the weeds.

When the CCT got to Cam Ranh Bay, Gallagher was told that the team had to go back to Kham Duc. Major Jay Van Cleeff, whose C-130 had been diverted to Cam Ranh Bay, was instructed to fly them to the embattled camp. That seemed strange. Previously, Van Cleeff's crew had understood they would be making a container delivery system airdrop at Kham Duc because it was too dangerous to land. Now they were going to put people on the ground there.

Gallagher and Van Cleeff called "Hilda," the airlift control center at Saigon, and questioned the order. Hilda told them they were "talking too much over the air" and that the CCT should go back to Kham Duc and help with the evacuation. Before they left Cam Ranh Bay, Freedman tried to obtain an FM radio, but was unable to do so. He would have to rely on his survival radio.

Van Cleef landed at Kham Duc about 4:20, and the CCT got off. The airplane stayed on the ramp for a few minutes, then left.

There was nobody at Kham Duc except the CCT and the enemy. Everybody else had been evacuated. To make matters worse, Freedman's radio wouldn't work, so they couldn't notify anyone of their plight. The NVA had placed three .50-caliber machine guns along the runway. Freedman put one of them out of action, killing the gunners with his M-16.

Lundie had a rifle as well, and they had enough ammunition to fight for a while. "Sergeant Lundie had five magazines and I had six," Freedman said. Several airplanes passed over the field, and then a C-123 came in, rolled by, and took off before the CCT could flag it down. The stranded airmen did not know if they had been seen by the air lifter crew.

"The thought of another plane was impossible and illogical because the NVA were moving all around us," Freedman said. "So much ammo was blowing up you couldn't tell 'incoming' from our own, and it was throwing debris all over the runway. Even if they knew we were here, no man in his right mind would attempt a landing. I never felt so lonely in all my life."

They were close to despair when Gallagher called out: "There's a 123 on short final."

It was in this C-123K Provider that Jackson and his crew made their courageous rescue. The K model had small jet engines to assist in max-performance takeoffs. Ignoring safety, Jackson kept them at high power, keeping time on the ground to fewer than 50 seconds. Miraculously, not a single bullet hit the aircraft.

Assault Landing

The first 123 that went in looking for the CCT was "Bookie 750" from Phan Rang, flown by Lt. Col. Alfred J. Jeanotte Jr. Fighter aircraft escorted him down and strafed the jungle, but the enemy fire was hot.

Rather than reversing engines to come to a full stop, Jeanotte kept moving down the runway, looking for the CCT. He accelerated to full power and took off. The C-123 had broken ground before the crew spotted the CCT waving at them. Jeanotte did not have enough fuel left to land again, stop, and make another maximum effort takeoff. The next airplane in the queue was Joe Jackson's Bookie 771. Jeanotte briefed him on where the CCT had been seen. Col. William K. Bailey, commander of the 311th Special Operations Squadron, to which the C-123s were assigned, later described the situation.

"Kham Duc by now was a battleground in hostile hands. It was under heavy ground and mortar attack," Bailey said. "The hostile forces had long since zeroed in on the airstrip with small arms, mortars, light and heavy automatic weapons, and recoilless rifle fire. Within the immediate vicinity of the runway, manned hostile gun emplacements had been established. The camp was engulfed in flames; its ammunition dumps were continuously exploding and littering the runway with debris. In addition, the remains of an enemy destroyed... helicopter reduced the runway length to approximately 2,200 feet." Jackson was at 9,000 feet when he got the call to go in. He had watched the enemy gunners blazing away at Jeanotte.

"I was not going to make a long, low approach like this other airplane had because I saw the fire that he had drawn from this ridge on the southwest part of the field, and I [didn't] want any part of that," Jackson said. "I decided to make my approach extremely steep, just as straight down as it would go."

(Many published accounts of the mission are in error. They say Jackson applied full aileron and opposite rudder for a "sideslip" descent. Jackson says that never happened.)

On an assault landing, Jackson said, "the airplane more or less slams into the ground, [and] at that point, you normally reverse the propellers ... to reduce your stopping distance." However, he was not going to do that. Reversing the propellers on a C-123K would automatically shut off the two auxiliary jet engines to prevent damage to the engines from debris and gravel thrown up by the propellers.

"I briefed the guys that I would not reverse the engines unless necessary because I didn't want to have to take time to start them," Jackson said. "It took about a minute or so ... to get them started, and I figured that was too long.

"I briefed the co-pilot, Major Campbell, [and] I said the only thing I want you to do when we get on the ground is to make sure that the flaps get from the assault position, which is full down, back up to the takeoff position. [I] briefed the loadmaster, ... as soon as this thing touches down, I want the doors opened just as quick as possible."

With that, he closed the throttles, put the landing gear down, put the flaps down full, and set the propellers in a flat pitch. The jet engines were started and idling. Jackson took the old airlifter down in a dive it was never designed to make, descending at 155 mph. Supposedly, the flaps would not hold at that speed. Around 151 mph, the wind pressure in the "blowup valve" blows the flaps back up to prevent damage to the system. However, the flaps held.

Bookie 771 leveled out 50 feet above the ground and 1,500 feet from the runway. Jackson came in from the southwest and touched down at the very end of the airstrip, some 2,200 feet from the wreckage of the CH-47 helicopter. That much runway, he said, was "adequate to stop in, but you have to clamp on the brakes pretty well."

Jackson's unorthodox descent took the enemy gunners by surprise, but they soon adjusted their aim.

50 Seconds on the Ground

"It didn't seem like there was any possible way for a plane to get in," Lundie said. "The whole camp was burning and exploding. When I looked up and saw that C-123 coming in, it was like a miracle. I couldn't believe it."

The CCT was "in a ditch alongside the runway and they started running toward the runway when I was about halfway down on the landing roll," Jackson said. Two of the enemy machine gun positions along the ramp were still firing. One was under the wing of Delmore's C-130, and the other was beside the wreckage of a UH-1 helicopter. Gunners in the hills were shooting down at them. "I saw tracers coming out from under the airplane that had apparently struck the runway and were ricocheting off the runway, under the airplane," Jackson said. The C-123 "only sits about two feet off the ground, so they were missing mighty close."

Jackson figured the hillside gunners "just kinda underestimated the range. That made the bullets drop enough to just hit the runway underneath the airplane and then ricochet out the other side." As Jackson was turning the airplane around, Campbell exclaimed, "My God, look at that!" A 122 mm rocket, apparently fired at zero elevation from the ridge to the north, was coming down the runway toward them. It struck the ground, bounced, and came to rest about 30 feet from the airplane, but it did not explode. It was a dud.

The CCT, having sprinted from the ditch, boarded the airplane quickly. "The loadmaster said, 'All on board,' and Campbell made a very astute observation like, 'Let's get the hell out of here,' " Jackson said. Jackson steered around the dud rocket and ran the throttles up. The jet engines reached 100 percent, and they were off. They used only about 1,000 feet of the runway for the takeoff roll.

"I say that we were on the ground somewhere around 40 to 50 seconds," Jackson said.

Fifteen seconds after the airplane started moving, the spot where it had been stopped erupted with mortar fire. Jackson figured the mortar shell had been in flight something like 40 seconds and that they made it away just in time. When they got back to Da Nang, they checked the airplane for bullet holes. There weren't any.

In nominating Jackson for the Medal of Honor, the 311th SOS commander, Bailey, noted that "miraculously, Bookie 771 survived the approach, landing, turnaround, and departure without receiving a single hit."

Hilda, the airlift command post in Saigon, almost struck again. According to Sam McGowan—a C-130 crew member in Vietnam, now a prolific writer on airpower—after Jackson had gotten the first CCT out, Hilda ordered another C-130, carrying another CCT, to put them on the ground at Kham Duc. The order was not rescinded until the C-130 was about to go in.

Medal of Honor

The critical moment at Kham Duc was captured for all time in a photograph taken from the air during the 50 seconds that Bookie 771 was on the ground. It is believed to be the only photo ever taken during an action that led to the award of the Medal of Honor.

The picture is fuzzy and the scene is obscured by smoke, but Jackson's C-123 is clearly visible on the runway, as are the other aircraft shot down earlier in the day. The photo was taken moments before the dud rocket got there. The CCT can be seen running from the ditch. It is not known who took the photo, but a copy of it was attached to the nomination for the Medal of Honor.

There only one known photo of a Medal of Honor action taken while it was under way. Joe Jackson had just put his C-123 down to pick up three combat control team airmen. Jackson braved close-in enemy fire from both sides of the runway and from the hills above Kham Duc. Jackson himself received a copy of the photo through regular distribution about two weeks after the battle. It arrived at Da Nang aboard a cargo airplane and was turned in to the airlift control center, which passed it on to Jackson. The photo was between two pieces of cardboard, wrapped in brown paper with Jackson's name on it.

Shortly after the Kham Duc mission, the wing vice commander from Phan Rang was visiting Da Nang and staying with Jackson. The two of them were together when the vice commander got a telephone call. Hanging up, he told Jackson that he was to be nominated for the Medal of Honor.

While the nomination was pending, Jackson was directed not to fly any more missions. He finished his tour in Vietnam in August with 298 combat sorties.

The Medal of Honor was presented to Jackson at the White House by President Lyndon Johnson on Jan. 16, 1969.

Co-pilot Campbell was awarded the Air Force Cross. The crew members, Trejo and Grubbs, were decorated with the Silver Star. There were other awards for the action at Kham Duc. Bucher, who died when his C-130 went down, was awarded the Air Force Cross, as were Boyd, the pilot of "Lucky Duc," and Jeanotte, who made the first attempt to rescue the CCT.

Cole, pilot of the first C-130 in, who made it out with the destroyed tire and leaking fuel tanks, received not only the Silver Star but also the Mackay Trophy for most meritorious flight of the year.

Eight months after the Medal of Honor ceremonies at the White House, Jackson was at the Air Force Association convention looking at the exhibits when he ran into Westmoreland. They talked about the war and Kham Duc, and Westmoreland said, "You know, I was the guy who recommended you for the Medal of Honor."

He had followed the action at Kham Duc closely as it unfolded. Apparently, the call to the vice wing commander at Da Nang had been the word from Westmoreland, coming down the line, to make the nomination.

Jackson spent three years in the Pentagon in the Directorate of Plans. In 1971, he was reassigned to the Air War College faculty to teach strategic studies. He retired in 1973 after 33 years in the Air Force.

Reunion in Charlotte

Jackson went to work for Boeing, setting up a training program for the Iranian Air Force, which was using Boeing 707s in a number of roles. He was in Iran for three years, then came back to Seattle to work in Boeing's training department. He retired for good in 1985. In the years since then, he has kept busy with volunteer work and other activities.

In May 1997, Joe Jackson was being honored at the observance of the 50th anniversary of the Air Force at a race at the Charlotte Motor Speedway in North Carolina. For one person in the crowd of 185,000, it was a special surprise when Jackson was introduced. Jim Lundie of Concord, N.C., recognized the pilot who had rescued him at Kham Duc 29 years before. It was an emotional moment as Jackson and Lundie hugged and shook hands.
"You hear about long lost family members being reunited and the emotions they feel," said Lundie, who had left the Air Force in 1968. "This was the same close family feeling for me."

TASK FORCE GLICK

Robert A. Younghans,
Sergeant Major, USMC, Retired
11th Engineers-H&S Co- Task Force Hotel

In early spring 1968, I was a CWO2, 1360 Construction Officer, S-3 Delta of 11th Engineers Battalion, stationed at Dong Ha. The XO, Major William Mannix instructed me to find a qualified officer who was demolition qualified. The battalion was to provide an officer to TASK FORCE GLICK at Khe Sanh. I only knew of one officer who fit the request. Captain Joe Plyer, the Commanding Officer of Charlie Company, who was about due to rotate back to the States. Major Mannix looked me in the eye and said: "Gunner, looks like you are it." He added, "relax, you will probably get a Legion of Merit for the job I am assigning you." Major Mannix was aware I had once taught Demolition and was the OIC of the Demolition Range at MCES, Courthouse Bay, CLNC.

I was instructed to report to B/Gen Jacob Glick, C/O of Task Force Glick at the KSCB. After reporting in, I contacted M/SGT Joe Vance of C Company 11th Engineers. My orders were to blow the 37th ARVN Rangers trench line and positions. In theory, this would reduce the size of KSCB, and make it easier to defend. The problem we faced included the fact that the ammo dump had been blown up prior to our arrival, leaving no TNT, and little C-4 or DET CORD. In addition, each Ranger position held CS and Frag Grenades. With help from the 26th Marines we gathered most of the grenades and placed Grade Three 105 HE rounds in each position as a Charge, and primed them with a small amount of C-4 tied together with DET cord. We notified Task Force Glick and the S-3 for the 26th Marines, and blew it.

I contacted the senior Chief, from CBMU 301 who provided a Dozer and operator to backfill the area. Once this was completed I was "loaned" to Task Force Hotel, and worked with them until relieved. I believe that the Legion Of Merit remark by Major Mannix was an idle one; He had to forsee the job we accomplished with so little at Khe Sanh. During that same period, operation PEGASUS was developing, and what MSGT Vance and I had accomplished was past history. I find it disappointing that most of the published accounts of the Siege do not mention Task Force Glick, and an even lesser mention of Task Force Hotel.

"THANKS"

Harold D. Fosmo, Jr.
Hotel Co 2/3

I want to sincerely thank the Helicopter crews for the following two incidents that took place while I served with H&S Company at the base of Hill 558. There were several helicopters inbound with mail in cargo nets. One of the bright colored bags fell out of the net quite a distance our perimeter. The helicopters flew over dropping the nets at our locations. The helicopter the bag dropped out of turned around and headed back to pick it up. The flight commander told him on the radio to leave the bag and get back in formation. There was no reply from the pilot or crew of the helicopter even after very angry calls for them to turn back. The helicopter touched down briefly and a crew member grabbed the bag. The helicopter flew over our position and threw the bag out to us. I hope they found out there was something wrong with his radio. That act of bravery meant a lot to those of us that received mail that day. If the pilot and the crew of that helicopter read this, I want to say thank you for all of us.

I had just directed a helicopter landing for a Medavac. The crew asked me if there was anything we needed. I jokingly replied: "cold beer would be nice." I had forgotten about it until one day I again landed a helicopter for another Medavac. One of the crew held a paper bag out the window and dropped it. I caught the bag and inside was a six- pack of beer. By the time I shared with everyone, I only got a few swallows, but it was great. If the pilot and crew of this helicopter read this I want to say thank you for all of us.

UPCOMING REUNIONS

The Third Marine Division Association will hold it's Annual Family Reunion August 15—19, 2007 In Las Vegas, Nevada. Headquarters Hotel, Plaza Hotel & Casino (Downtown). Anyone who served in, was attached to or served in support of the Third Marine Division at any time since it was formed on September 16, 1942 is eligible and cordially invited to attend. For Membership and Reunion information contact: SGT MAJOR BILL KRUEGER, Retired. WE GET MAIL

Tom,
Thanks so much for the Red Clay Magazine. It was forty years ago I left the small town of Spring Hill, Kansas for Vietnam. Some of what happened there is still with me. I served with a lot of good men in Kilo Company 3/26 and Charlie Company 1/26 at Khe Sanh on Hill 861, 1967. I am still fighting with snakes in my bunker or PTSD. I take it a day at a time, and with God's help I hope to some day have total peace.

SHORT ROUNDS

THE VIETNAM VETERAN WHO STARTED IT ALL

By Rudy Estela # V-75366

Here at Ironwood state Prison in California, there is a Vietnam Veteran who is fighting a different type of war far away from the jungles of Vietnam, a war of literacy. As I walk the prison yard I notice there are a lot of prisoners walking around carrying a stack of books like a normal college campus. We now have a college program, which originally only benefited veterans. The program has now expanded to benefit all inmates, which I'm grateful for. I am currently enrolled in the college program as a full time student. The person who created this program, and who we owe it all to, is Mr. James A. White Jr., a Vietnam Veteran who served in the U.S Marines, and in the U.S Army. With the Marines, he was in Vietnam for a year and a half attaining the rank of sergeant. He joined the US Army as a helicopter Pilot and flew both Scout and Helicopter Gunships. He was there for three years reaching the rank of CWO- 2. All of Mr. White's time in Vietnam was in northern "I" Corps.

Thanks to the college program many of the initial students have graduated, and others such as myself are now trying to obtain an A.A or A.S degree. More A.S's then A.A's. All of this could not have been done without the vision of this man. The college program was started in 2000, with only 53 inmate students. In 2007, there are 5,000 students state wide. With the opportunity of a higher education many of us will have a better chance to become productive citizens. As I interviewed this remarkable man I learned his main goal is to give people the chance for them to find better jobs. I also want Vietnam Veterans who read your magazine to know that from inside a California Prison, there is a warrior who is doing so much to help out society.

My Return To Vietnam

By Jim Dawdy
Runway Repair Khe Sanh Seabees

I went back to Khe Sanh for the first time in over 39 years. I hired the hotel car and driver for the day from the Hotel Morin in Hue. We drove in an almost new Mercedes Benz van to Dong Ha and picked up a guide. We then proceeded west along Route 9 through Cam Lo, Ca Lu, past Camp Carroll, with a roadside stop at milepost 31, to look at the Rockpile. The road is very modern and extremely smooth, with wide paved shoulders and large bridges

I was absolutely astonished at Khe Sanh town, a bustling business area (free economic zone) with buses from Thailand and Laos going by every few minutes. The area has about 30,000 residents with many multi-story buildings and new ones presently under construction. We continued on Route 9 to Lang Vei, and the guide led me into the trees where the remains of one of the old bunkers was located. There is also a PT-76 tank on a concrete pad on display there. The old base is now a coffee plantation with coffee bushes 7 feet tall, and lies beyond a fence around the new museum, which is quite substantial and, all-in-all, fairly non-critical. The caretaker unlocked the gate for us and the guide and I walked toward where the trail started down to the stream, where our water point was. I think the old runway is about where the electric power line runs today. The guide (48 years old) has been up 861 and 881S, and seemed very knowledgeable about the area. If it wasn't for 861, 950 and 1015, I would hardly recognize the place. I will try to e-mail a few pictures when I get back. Total cost for day trip from Hue-driver, guide and vehicle =$150.

Does anyone remember my cousin Earl Harris E Co 2/26 Hill 861A

Larry Harris

Mr. Harris:
I remember your cousin and the February 26, 1968 incident in which he and Michael Wright were injured and later died from their injuries. Earl was a good Marine and a good young man, the world misses men such as him.

Semper Fidelis
Larry McCartney; PFC; Echo Company,
2nd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment

Thank you Mr. McCartney,

I was unaware that Michael Wright and my cousin were injured the same day. Was there a flurry of mortar fire that day? Are there any details of the events on Hill 861A. Am I correct, was it Hill 861A. Forgive my ignorance and I trust you will let me know if I am intruding with my questions. I believed that Hill 861A was under almost continuous mortar fire from mid-February until the end of the month. I have read all I have found until now, but have not found out many details of what occurred during the month. I believe the camp withstood a major and prolonged attack on February 22, and was temporarily overrun. I did find out from Jim Wodecki there is a book available, I believe put together by those who served at Khe Sanh and the hills around it.
Respectively,
Larry Harris

Mr Harris,

First and foremost, you are not intruding. A basic tenet of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association is that we reach out to the family of those lost at Khe Sanh. Another tenet is that we maintain and preserve an accurate historical record of what occurred. Your inquiry is most welcome. Yes, it was Hill 861-A.

The major and prolonged attack to which you refer occurred at 4:05 A.M. on February 5, 1968; exactly thirty nine (39) years ago today. PFC Earl Harris was a part of the defense of the hill that withstood the attack: the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) penetrated our perimeter but never managed to establish a foothold on Hill 861-A since Echo Company immediately counterattacked and pushed them off. The hill was under pretty much continuous mortar attack the entire month of February, but it was heaviest during the last two weeks of the month. Michael Wright and your cousin were next to each other and both injured by the same mortar round, there were no hand grenades involved.

At the time they were at or near a position that was close to the northwest corner of our trench line. It was mid-afternoon and a helicopter was inbound to the LZ which was on the southeast corner of our trench line. Normally when the enemy lobbed mortar rounds at us we could hear the tubes go off, but in this case the enemy used the sound of the incoming helicopter to mask their firing. Under normal circumstances we would expect incoming mortar rounds to impact at or near the landing zone (LZ), so it was out of character that rounds landed near the northwest corner; the round that killed Earl and Mike and wounded at least one other likely fell short of it's target--the LZ.

There are several books and articles concerning what happened on that hill during different times of the 1968 Tet Offensive. Some of those involved are CC on this E-Mail and there are others who they can put you in contact with. Please feel free to contact me at any time and I will do what I can to assist you in your search for information.

INCOMING

Looking back at a Divisive War in the Wisconsin Veterans Museum

Kenneth Burns

It resembles any ordinary suburban front door, except that it is mounted on a museum kiosk. As people approach, a doorbell rings brightly, inviting them to pull the door open. Then they see a mournful display: vintage Western Union telegrams announcing the grim fate of two young Wisconsin men who served in the Vietnam War. One was killed in action in 1970, and the other was reported missing in flight in 1965.

The door greets visitors to "In the Belly of the Dragon: Life and Death in I Corps," an exhibit that opened in September at the Wisconsin Veterans Museum (30 W. Mifflin St.). I Corps was the northernmost military region of South Vietnam, and much of the heaviest fighting occurred there. The exhibit documents extraordinary events that took place in I Corps, as well as more prosaic moments, and it is dedicated to the 530 people from Wisconsin who died there. The exhibit is modest in scale, just one smallish room. A handful of large displays dominate the collection, including one documenting the battlefield funeral service, photographed for Life magazine, of an American killed at Khe Sanh in January 1968. The service was conducted by chaplain Ray William Stubbe, of Milwaukee. Across the room is a replica of the canvas domiciles that housed American soldiers in Vietnam. This one is decorated with pinups from Playboy, and there also is a copy of Catch-22, the satirical antiwar novel by Joseph Heller.

Accompanying the display are ammunition crates holding the wartime possessions of Wisconsin men who served: a compass, a knife, many cigarette lighters. Other arrangements collect snapshots of soldiers at their leisure. In one, especially poignant, a shirtless young man prepares a Chef Boyardee spaghetti dinner at an outdoor stove. "An American soldier enjoys the comforts of home," the caption wryly notes. Another display recalls the life of Walter Draeger, the Air Force pilot reported as missing in flight in that devastating telegram. His helmet is behind glass, and there is a photograph of him riding a bicycle and smiling. What is most moving about the exhibit is a mailbox holding what appear to be actual letters home from the war. These visitors can handle and read. In one, dated Feb. 17, 1968, Sgt. Jerry Paul writes to La Crosse from Ai Tu. "Had a gunner 'freeze' on a gun," he reports. "Have to replace him, could get someone killed if he's to shook to fire." It is a grim and necessary reminder of a troubled time, this collection, and it is marred only slightly by ubiquitous images of that titular grinning dragon -- an awkward metaphor for Asia that is not aging well. But apart from the heartbreaking imagery, what haunts me most is the ringing of that cheerful doorbell. During my visit, it tolled again and again as visitors walked beneath a sensor mounted over the door. It was a sad sound, but it delighted a group of young children. "Who's there?" they asked again and again in response, and pulled the door open. "In the Belly of the Dragon" will be on display until March 2008.

Sonnet for Those Who Serve in the War on Terror

'Tis not for riches, glory or a name,
'Tis not for fickle politicians' praise,
Or you whom every errant breeze yet sways—
Your cheers and jeers are mostly much the same.

The troops who go out armed for Uncle Sam
Are different from the boys and girls at home.
The comradeship that claims them for its own
Has stretched from Valley Forge through Vietnam.

Why would a man or woman take a gun,
And wear the uniform and go and serve
In some hell-hole that touches every nerve,
And might not make a difference when it's done?

They do not fight for flags and apple pie,
But mostly for each other. That is why.

The Marines of '64 Reunion

How does our Corps and country find
Such special men as these?
The bonding of long years ago,
Was dusted off with ease.

Across the barracks moonlit grid,
Sang hearts with tears of pride;
The Marines of '64 again,
Formed up from far and wide.

We ever shall remember well,
The battlement "Taps" so clear,
In honor of our fallen mates,
So far, but always near.

A special time, a special place,
Rare bonding, if you please.
How proud each man to call his own,
Such special men as these.
Semper Fi!

STORIES YOU WILL NOT SEE IN THE LOCAL NEWS

"God Bless Denzel Washington One of the Good Guys"

Denzel Washington and his family visited the troops at Brook Army Medical Center, in San Antonio, Texas (BAMC). This is where soldiers who have been evacuated from Germany come to be hospitalized in the United States, especially burn victims. There are some buildings there called Fisher Houses. The Fisher House is a Hotel where soldiers " families" can stay, for little or no charge, while their soldier is staying in the Hospital. BAMC has quite a few of these houses on base, but as you can imagine, they are filled most of the time. While Denzel Washington was visiting BAMC, they gave him a tour of one of the Fisher Houses. He asked how much one of them would cost to build. He took his check book out and wrote a substantial check to help build one. The soldiers overseas were amazed to hear this story and want to get the word out to the American Public, because it warmed their hearts to hear it.

NEWS FROM IRAQ

By Hank Melanson
E & F Co 2/26

Capt John Dunn sends this SitRep from Lieutenant Commander Heidi Kraft MD USN. The Commander was deployed with the Alpha Surgical Company, 1st Medical Battalion, the First Marine Expeditionary Force, in Iraq. The doctor gives a very explicit definition of what life is like in Iraq.

I MEF from Camp Pendleton, CA, was just replaced by II MEF, Camp Lejeune, NC. "Subject: Greetings all from hot, hot, hot Iraq. We are short indeed...although not quite as short as we had originally thought...our flight home has been posted and is showing up 3 days later than planned. The good news is that we leave in the middle of the night and arrive (all admin complete, including turning our weapons into the armory) around dinnertime at Pendleton on the same day we leave (11 hrs time difference).

The other good news is it appears we've got commercial contract air carriers taking us home...so we don't have to worry about sleeping on the cold steel deck of an Air Force C-17. So...we turned over authority of the surgical company last week to our replacements, who had a serious trial by fire here in multiple ways, including multiple traumas, surgeries, increased risk to their personal safety, power outages, water outages, and camel spiders in the hospital...all in their first 4 days. But a few days ago, we heard the helicopters coming and knew they were dealing with multiple traumas, several of which were going to the OR...and we sat in our barracks and waited for them to call us if they needed us. They never did. Last week was the ceremony to mark the official end of our role here. Now we just wait.

As the days move very slowly by, just waiting, I decided that one of the things I should work on for my own closure and therapeutic healing...is a list. The list would be a comparison: "Things That Were Good" about Iraq and being deployed with the Marines as one of the providers in a surgical company, and "Things That Were Not Good." Of course, it's quite obvious that this list will be very lopsided. But I thought I would do it anyway, hoping that somehow the trauma, the fear, the grief, the laughter, the pride and the patriotism that have marked this long seven months for me will begin to make sense, through my writing.

Interestingly, it sort of turned into a poem. To be expected, I guess. Most of all it's just therapy, and by now I should be relatively good at that. Hard to do for yourself, though. So here goes...in reverse order of importance...

Things That Were Good

Sunset over the desert...almost always orange Sunrise over the desert...almost always red The childlike excitement of having fresh fruit at dinner after going weeks without it Being allowed to be the kind of clinician I know I can be, and want to be, with no limits placed and no doubts expressed

But most of all, The United States Marines, our patients... walking, every day, and having literally every single person who passes by say "Hoorah, Ma'am..." Having them tell us, one after the other, through blinding pain or morphine-induced euphoria..."When can I get out of here? I just want to get back to my unit..."

Meeting a young Sergeant, who had lost an eye in an explosion...he asked his surgeon if he could open the other one...when he did, he sat up and looked at the young Marines from his fire team who were being treated for superficial shrapnel wounds in the next room...he smiled, laid back down, and said, "I only have one good eye, Doc! , but I can see that my Marines are OK."

And of course, meeting the one who threw himself on a grenade to save the men at his side...who will likely be the first Medal of Honor recipient in over 11 years... My friends...some of them will be lifelong in a way that is indescribable My patients...some of them had courage unlike anything I've ever experienced before My comrades, Alpha Surgical Company...some of the things witnessed will traumatize them forever, but still they provided outstanding care to break, for 7 endless months And last, but not least... Holding the hand of that dying Marine

Things That Were Not Good

Terrifying camel spiders, poisonous scorpions, flapping bats in the darkness, howling, territorial wild dogs, flies that insisted on landing on our faces, giant, looming mosquitoes, invisible sand flies that carry leischmaniasis 132 degrees Wearing long sleeves, full pants and combat boots in 132 degrees Random and totally predictable power outages that led to sweating throughout the night Sweating in places I didn't know I could sweat...like wrists, and ears The roar of helicopters overhead The resounding thud of exploding artillery in the distance The popping of gunfire...Not knowing if any of the above sounds is a good thing, or bad thing

The siren, and the inevitable "big voice" yelling at us to take cover... Not knowing if that siren was on someone's DVD or if the big voice would soon follow The cracking sound of giant artillery rounds splitting open against rock and dirt The rumble of the ground... The shattering of the windows... Hiding under flak jackets and Kevlar helmets, away from the broken windows, waiting to be told we can come to the hospital...to treat the ones who were not so lucky... Watching the helicopter with the big red cross on the side landing at our pad worse...watching Marine helicopters filled with patients landing at our pad...because we usually did not realize they were coming... Ushering a sobbing Marine Colonel away from the trauma bay while several of his Marines bled and cried out in pain inside Meeting that 21-year-old Marine with three Purple Hearts...and listening to him weep because he felt ashamed of being afraid to go back

Telling a room full of stunned Marines in blood-soaked uniforms that their comrade, that they had tried to save, had just died of his wounds Trying, as if in total futility, to do anything I could, to ease the trauma of group after group...that suffered loss after loss, grief after inconsolable grief... Washing blood off the boots of one of our young nurses while she told me about the one who bled out in the trauma bay...and then the one who she had to tell, when he pleaded for the truth, that his best friend didn't make it...

Listening to another of our nurses tell of the Marine who came in talking, telling her his name...about how she pleaded with him not to give up, told him that she was there for him...about how she could see his eyes go dull when he couldn't fight any longer... And last, but not least... Holding the hand of that dying Marine.

PAUL GALANTI - FORMER POW TIMES-DISPATCH
GUEST COLUMNIST
Sunday, January 28, 2007

Since I was otherwise occupied as a POW in Hanoi and wasn't able to observe firsthand, I suppose it was a '60s thing -- when everybody who was anybody was or deeply aspired to be a victim. And, later, when the soldiers who'd fought valiantly in a war they actually won handily en route to defeating an entire evil empire demanded the same respect given every other element in society -- deserving or not -- they were accorded their own category of victimhood and enshrined in the most out-of-sight, obscure memorial in Washington, D.C. The re-writing of history to correct the many historical perversions has been very slow in coming.

I remember writing one of my first Op/Eds about the Vietnam "Wall," which reminded me then of a big hole in the ground or a large open mouth ? la a contemporary actress/ally of our enemy. But it was a nice gesture. Although it tended to patronize the suddenly glamorous former "baby killers," most of our contemporaries in military service shrugged it off as a belated, sort-of thanks from a grateful nation. From my first days in the military, I was taught that our job was to serve; there would be tough times but keep a stiff upper lip and press on. And enjoy the good times and camaraderie that military life -- almost exclusively -- engenders. Most movies back then had male heroes who sucked up adversity and pressed on. Mothers encouraged their daughters to marry the strong, silent types -- like John Wayne. On my return in 1973, being greeted by crowds and overuse of the sobriquet "hero" was embarrassing and confusing. The words and articles written about our incarceration in the filthy, miserable dungeons of communist Vietnam were laced with the term "heroes" -- and there were, in fact, a few of those. But it became apparent, early on, that by hero the writers and speakers and extollers usually meant victim -- as in you poor guys. There was obviously a confusion of terminology! In fact, the roles had been reversed. At Home, the Same Spin

During my entire time in the infamous Hanoi Hilton POW compound, I felt like Winston Smith in Orwell's 1984 as the North Vietnamese propagandists talked about their glowing victories and mocked American efforts as the ignominious defeats of the U.S. aggressors and their lackeys. Now that I was home, I began to feel that propagandists in our country had developed their own strain of Newspeak to justify their weak arguments. When we POWs were released in February 1973 after the crushing B-52 raids and crippling of North Vietnamese commerce, I thought we'd won. Imagine my surprise when many Americans apparently indoctrinated by academia and a powerful media seemed to think we'd been routed.

Fast forward to 2007. Reading the generally unbelievable mainstream media, one would suspect that unemployed communist propagandists had found a new home -- as journalists. Their endless agonizing over American losses omits any mention of the good things that are happening throughout the Middle East or even the crippling losses of the other side! Embedded in the safe Green Zone, reporters write damning articles that cannot be corroborated. I'm almost glad this is happening because I can now see with my own eyes what transpired here in the 1960s while I read between the lines in Vietnam. From the condescending words used to describe the fighting forces, to outright exaggerations and lies, efforts are made to transform our servicemen into "victims." Regardless of how it started, the assault on America by our own tenured, unassailable academy, by our own "free" press and politicians for personal gain is undone by e-mails from actual soldiers and Marines in harm's way. But the true story usually fails to gain traction. It's much easier to manufacture hand-wringing bad news to weep and wail and whine about our valiant troops/victims than it is to find something interesting to report about our successes. Call it the Dan Rather/Jayson Blair School of Journalistic Integrity -- it has a deleterious effect on those who never cross-check the stories. It's a good reason that polls can swing up and down by 10 percentage points on the basis of an unreliable but sensational story. Military Doesn't Need Sympathy Our armed forces are not victims. They are not in Iraq because they're dumb. They are performing selfless acts on behalf of all Americans, and they don't need sympathy. That, simply, is what they do. Proudly. And justifiably so. Always have, always will. It's something the Hate America crowd will never understand. Frankly, most of those serving don't care what their de facto domestic enemies think of them. But, if those ungrateful Americans ever need help, their armed forces will be there serving proudly.

MARINES HELPING MARINES
Wounded Marine Goes Home in Style

By Jim Garamone
American Forces Press Service

Lance Corporal Steven Eastburn, arrived back in Hawaii on an executive jet. Pace visited service members at David Grant Medical Center at Travis while his C-40B aircraft was being refueled. Eastburn was at the hospital, and Pace asked the 20-year-old Marine if he would like a ride back to Hawaii. "Of course" the Marine said. "This is a big government plane," the chairman said. "We can always make room for one more." Eastburn was wounded while pulling guard as his squad was setting up an observation post. A sniper shot him through the right arm just above the elbow. "There was a second shot, but he missed," the lance corporal said. "My squad leader came out to get me." His squad gave him immediate attention then got him to a medevac point. He was flown to Balad Air Base, Iraq; and then Landstuhl, Germany; before going on to Andrews Air Force Base, Md.; and finally to Travis.

At Andrews, Eastburn received a new treatment called a peripheral nerve block. The treatment uses a machine to place a small bit of local anesthetic into the affected area. "It gives the wound a chance to heal without the side effects of morphine or other drugs," said Air Force Dr. (Lt. Col.) Bill Whelan, a flight surgeon traveling with the chairman. "Many people get nauseous due to the side effects of morphine. But with this, Steven is able to eat and gain strength. He's doing well." Eastburn will be assigned to Tripler Army Medical Center in Hawaii, closer to his unit's home base.

As the jet pulled up to the distinguished visitor area at Hickam, a number of people were there to meet and greet the chairman and his wife, Lynne. Eastburn's parents were also there. The chairman came up the aisle of the plane and told the young lance corporal to "lead everybody off the plane." "Thanks for the ride, Sir," the lance corporal told Pace. "I won't forget it."

Members Still Serving "The Mightiest Corporal in the World Award"

By Glenn Prentice
C Btry 1/13 & I Co 3/26

For the second time in a year, Bob Arrotta and I spent the weekend at the Yuma Marine Corps Base. We were invited by the Major in charge of a class for training the top Aviators and Radio Operators to be Forward Air Controllers in Iraq. We gave them a two hour class on our experiences on Hill 881S (Using Power Point with sound, and all of our photos) on Close Air Support, Super Gaggles re-supply methods, medavacs in "Hot LZs," and Arty missions.

In addition we discussed tactics and counter tactics employed by both sides. There are many similarities that can be drawn with problems and solutions on Hill 881S, and current problems facing our Marines in Iraq. At the end of the program Bob was presented with a plaque bearing his name and Photo from the Hill 881S.

The entire class must complete a run with simulated missions that are timed and scored for accuracy. The award is called "India 14." (Bob's call sign in Vietnam). A similar award in Bob's name is located in the East Coast School. We should all congratulate Bob on his recognition and continued service to the Corps.

BRIGADIER GENERAL WALTER " TABASCO MAC" McILHENNY, USMC (DECEASED)

Brigadier General Walter Stauffer "Tabasco Mac" McIlhenny was born 22 October 1910 in Washington, D.C. He received his education at Force School and Central High School in Washington, D.C., and Lane High School in Charlottesville, Virginia. He later attended the University of Virginia, also in Charlottesville. He served two years with the Washington High School Cadets, and four years in the Virginia National Guard, attaining the rank of platoon sergeant. Honorably discharged from the National Guard on 15 June 1935, he enlisted in the Marine Corps Reserve and completed the Platoon Leaders' Class that summer. He was commissioned a Marine Reserve second lieutenant, 3 December 1936, with a rank date of 6 November. During subsequent summer assignments to active duty, he attended the National Rifle Matches at Camp Perry, Ohio, as an instructor and shooting member of the Marine Corps Reserve Rifle Team. He was a member of the 1937 team that won the Hilton Trophy and the A.E.F. Roumanian Trophy; coach of the 1938 team that won the Roumanian Trophy; captain of the 1939 team that won the Rattlesnake Trophy; and winner of the Bronze medal in the National Individual Rifle Match, which entitled him to the Distinguished Marksman Badge. Prior to reporting for extended active duty in World War II, he was an engineer with the Continental Oil Company until 1940, when he joined the family firm, the McIlhenny Company of Louisiana, makers of Tabasco Sauce.

Called to active duty as a first lieutenant following the outbreak of World War II, General McIlhenny served continuously until December 1945. After completing The Basic School for Marine Corps Officers at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, he was assigned to the 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, at New River (later Camp Lejeune), North Carolina, and served with that unit throughout the entire war. In May 1942, he embarked with the 5th Marines for Guadalcanal, where the 1st Marine Division made its initial landing on 7 August 1942 under heavy enemy fire. For heroism as Executive Officer and later Commanding Officer of Company B, 1st Battalion, 5th Marines, during the landing on Guadalcanal and its subsequent capture and defense, he received both the Navy Cross and the Silver Star Medal. He also received two Purple Hearts for wounds received in this campaign, along with the Presidential Unit Citation that was awarded to the 1st Marine Division (Reinforced) for heroism on Guadalcanal.

In December 1943, he again participated in combat against the enemy, this time at Cape Gloucester, New Britain, as the 1st Battalion's Plans and Training Officer. He served subsequently as Regimental Intelligence Officer, and 3d Battalion Commander. In September 1944, during the landing on Peleliu, Palau Islands, he served as Regimental Plans and Training Officer. Again, he received the Presidential Unit Citation as a member of the 1st Marine Division (Reinforced). The unit was awarded the honor for heroic action in the assault and seizure of Peleliu. On his return to the United States in December 1944, then Major McIlhenny was assigned to Marine Corps Schools, Quantico, Virginia, where he completed the Instructor's Orientation Course and served as an instructor in the Rifle Units Section. He also completed the Artillery School at Fort Benning, Georgia, during this assignment. Relieved from active duty 26 December 1945, Major McIlhenny continued his affiliation with the Ready Reserve in his home state of Louisiana. He organized and trained Volunteer Training Unit 8-25 in Lafayette, Louisiana, and commanded that unit until his retirement from the Reserve. On 1 November 1959, he was placed on the retired list of Marine Reserve officers and was advanced to brigadier general by reason of having been specially commended for heroism in combat. In addition to his Marine Corps service, General McIlhenny was one of the founders of the Marine Military Academy in Harlingen, Texas, a private military college preparatory boarding school for boys in grades 8 through 12 that remains the only school in the world to offer military leadership based on the traditions of the United States Marine Corps. Under his guidance, the Marine Military Academy has grown steadily since 1965. He supported the Academy from its very inception and was of the original seven co-guarantors of the loan to establish the school. Many major projects were undertaken through his leadership and he is listed as a major contributor to the Academy. For many years, he served as the President of the Board of Trustees of the Academy and was the President Emeritus of the school at he time of his death.

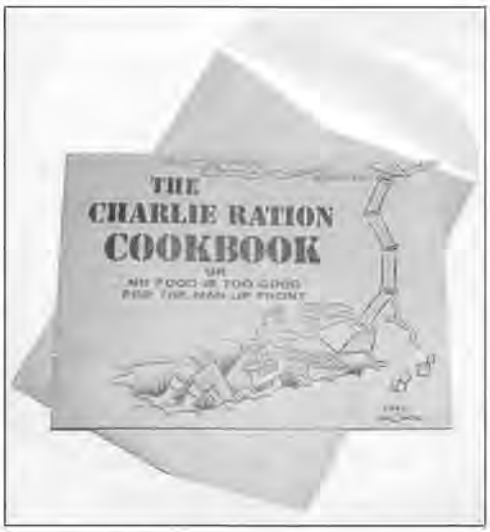
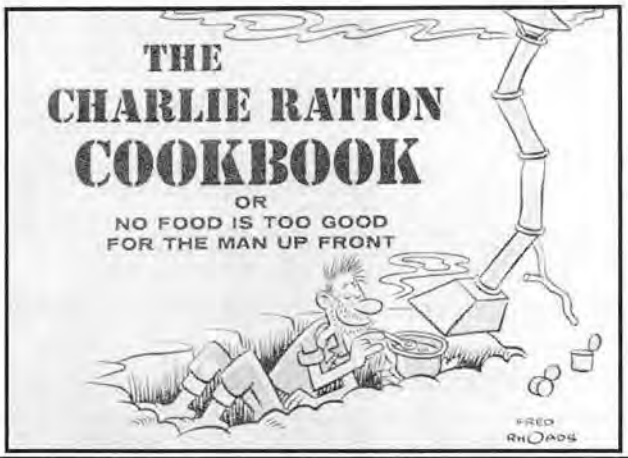
However, Brigadier General McIlhenny was perhaps best known as the president of the McIlhenny Tabasco Sauce Company, located in New Inberia, Louisiana. His company's creation of two recipe books under his direction, The Charlie Ration Cookbook and The Unofficial MRE Recipe Booklet, and donation of thousands of bottles of the hot pepper sauce to Marines serving in Vietnam have helped make Tabasco a standard fair for those serving in the field even today. Brigadier General McIlhenny passed away 22 June 1985 after a brief illness. He had made his home on Avery Island, Louisiana, and was laid to rest there in Grove Cemetery after a simple military service.

During the Vietnam war Brig. Gen. Walter S. McIlhenny son of the 2nd company president of McIlhenny Company from his experiences with C-Rations as a soldier during WWII came up with the idea to send soldiers copies of the Charley Ration Cookbook filled with recipes for spicing up C-rations with Tabasco Pepper Sauce wrapped around two-ounce bottles of Tabasco Pepper Sauce along with a handful of a P-38 type can openers all in a waterproof canister. The first thumbnail below is the canister and it's contents. The second is a copy of the magazine ad sent to me by the Historian & Curator of the McIlhenny Company. The next thumbnail is of a Charlie Ration Cookbook that was sent in an envelope without the Tabasco Sauce or openers. The other thumbnails are the Charlie Ration Cookbook itself:





Great battles have not only produced famous generals, but gourmet dishes as well. Chicken Marengo was named after the battle of Marengo, in which Napoleon Bonaparte defeated the Austrians on the 14th of June, 1800. This dish was first cooked on the battlefield itself by Dunand chef to Napoleon.

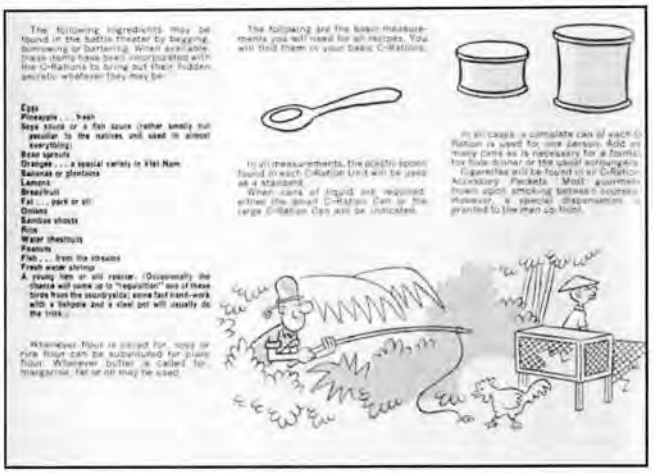
Bonaparte, who ate nothing until after a day's battle was over, had gone forward with his general staff and was a long way from his supply wagons. Seeing his enemies put to flight, he asked Dunand to prepare dinner for him. All the chef could find were three eggs, four tomatoes, six crayfish, a small hen, a little garlic, some oil and a saucepan. He then and there created the Chicken Marengo.

The dish was served on a tin plate, the chicken surrounded by the fried eggs and crayfish with the sauce poured over it, the water being laced with brandy borrowed from the General's flask. Bonaparte, having feasted upon it, said to Dunand, "You must feed me like this after every battle."

The American fighting man today does not have a personal chef, but he does have his C-Rations. The contents of these remarkable packages contain far more nutriments than normally required for any man in the field and offer solid, good-tasting meals that are the envy of fighting men all over the world. Occasionally, though, a trooper will find it necessary to depend on C-Rations for a prolonged period of time . . . and it is with this in mind that TABASCO brand pepper sauce thought of a recipe book to help add dash and variety. There is no telling what gastronomic creations can be concocted with the C-Rations as a basic, combined with what the American trooper can find in the field or village near the combat zone. All he needs is imagination and a buddy who will act as assistant chef.

Whether eaten alone, with a buddy or two or in a group, the recipes found in this book are predominantly based on the single units and various combinations of the basic C-Rations. Outside ingredients may help, but they are not essential to the menus. Another thought: when combat situations make it impossible to do anything with your C-Rations except open them up and eat them cold, adding Tabasco right from the bottle will always add a distinctive bright flavor.

G.I. Joe has gone gourmet. These recipes were created for the fighting man in the field. Bon appetit.



The following ingredients may be found in the battle theater by begging, borrowing or bartering. Where available, these items have been incorporated with the C-Rations to bring out their hidden secrets, whatever they may be:

Eggs
Pineapple . . . fresh
Soya sauce or a fish sauce (rather smelly but peculiar to the natives and used in almost everything)
Bean sprouts
Oranges . . . a special variety in Viet Nam
Bananas or plantains
Lemons
Grapefruit
Fat . . . pork or oil
Onions
Bamboo shoots
Rice
Water chestnuts
Peanuts
Fish . . . from the streams
Fresh water shrimps
A young hen or old rooster. (Occasionally the chance will come up to "requisition" one of those birds from the incumbrances; some fast front-work with a fishpole and a clear pair will usually do the trick.)

Whenever flour is called for, soya or rice flour can be substituted for plain flour. Whenever butter is called for, margarine, fat or oil may be used.

The following are the basic measurements you will need for all recipes. You will find them in your basic C-Rations:

In all measurements, the plastic spoons found in each C-Ration Unit will be used as a standard.

When cans of liquid are required, either the small C-Ration Can or the large C-Ration Can are indicated.

In all cases, a complete can of each C-Ration is used for one person. Add or many cans as is necessary for a family, for late dinner or the usual extravagance.

Cigarettes will be found in all C-Ration accessories. Packets. Most gourmets frown upon smoking between courses however, a special dispensation is granted to the man up front.

PORK MANDARIN

*One can pork steak
Green onions, chopped
Two spoons water chestnuts, chopped
Three spoons butter or oil or fat
Three spoons flour
Five spoons pineapple chunks, fresh or canned Small can pineapple juice, fresh or canned
Half a can orange juice
Two spoons lemon juice
Generous dash TABASCO pepper sauce

One spoon soya sauce . . . two, if desired
If any candied ginger or fresh ginger root is available, a few slices may be added.

This original for this recipe took a lot of time; if you followed it, the VC would be sitting on your lap. Here's a new quick way to cheat Charlie and have some thing different.

Melt the butter or oil or fat and sauté the onions and chestnuts for about five minutes. Add the flour and stir until smooth. Add the pineapple juice, the lemon juice, the orange juice and continue cooking until the sauce is smooth. Add the pineapple chunks and other ingredients and, if available, the candied ginger or ginger root. Continue cooking until the sauce is very smooth. Now separate the pork steaks and add to the mixture, along with the juices from the can. Continue cooking until heated and bubbling. This may be served over boiled rice or crumbled crackers.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

TIN CAN CASSEROLE

*One can franks and beans
*One can beef-stuff with potatoes
Generous dash TABASCO pepper sauce
*One can crumbled crackers
*One can cheese spread, melted
*Four spoons green onions, chopped coarsely
Two spoons butter or oil or fat
One small can of water, if necessary

The casserole can be elegant, but as most meal-kits, women often use it as a camouflage for a hasty meal after a long day in the field. Make it a recipe to put the Old Lady's Bridge Luncheon to shame.

Melt butter or oil or fat and sauté onions in it. Then add the cheese until it is melted and well blended. Now add the crackers for a few minutes and then return to can or other cooking utensil. Combine a can of franks and beans with the beef-stew and potatoes to this mixture and correct the seasoning. Cook for as long as necessary, seeing that the casserole is always moist. However, if it gets too thick, add a little water as a thinning agent.

This can be served over boiled rice with an added dash of Tabasco just before eating.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

CREAMED TURKEY ON TOAST

Four spoons bamboo shoots or bean sprouts
Two spoons green onions (green part only)
Two spoons butter or oil or fat
*10 spoons milk
Three drops TABASCO pepper sauce
*Salt and pepper to taste
*One can turkey loaf, sliced
*One can white bread
Two spoons flour

This is a more elegant version of War D's "shit-on-a-shingle."

Melt butter or oil or fat and sauté onions or bamboo shoots. Add flour and cook until smooth. Now add the spoons of milk, a few at a time, and continue cooking till sauce is thick and smooth. Add other ingredients and then the sliced turkey, and continue cooking till turkey is well heated through. Serve immediately over rounds of white bread which have been fried in butter or oil or fat or toasted, if possible.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

FISH WITH FRONT LINE STUFFING

Green onions, chopped (green and white parts)
Two spoons butter or oil or fat
Generous dash TABASCO pepper sauce

One spoon lemon juice
Eight spoons bean sprouts
*One can crumbled crackers
Two spoons water chestnuts, chopped
One spoon soya sauce
*Salt and pepper to taste
*One can ham and egg, minced
*Enough spoonfuls of milk to moisten mixture

Catch a fish. The above stuffing is enough for about a two pounder. Scale and clean the fish and stuff with the above, prepared as below. The stuffing may be doubled pending on how many and what size fish you caught.

Rub the fish inside and out with a little lemon juice and a few drops of Tabasco, as well as a little melted butter or oil or fat.

Melt butter or oil or fat and sauté onions in it. Then add bean sprouts and water chestnuts and cook for about five minutes. Add the minced ham and egg mixture and then add all other ingredients, adding the milk last and just enough to moisten the stuffing.

Stuff the fish with this mixture and secure with a string if necessary.

If a moist shell oven is possible, bake the fish in it, but make sure not have to cook for very long, no matter how it is cooked. If an oven is not available, the fish can be cooked in a sauce pan some butter or oil or fat and turned frequently until done, basted with a little water in the center of the stuffing should be heated separately.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

COMBAT ZONE BURGOO

Two spoons butter or oil or fat
Three spoons chopped onion
One chicken, cut up and boiled until almost tender
*One can spiced beef with sauce
*One can ham and lima beans
*Can of crackers, crumbled coarsely
*Salt and pepper to taste
Generous dash TABASCO pepper sauce

Kentuckians will recognize this as a variation of a back hills Burgoo, which is a real man-size dishing. It is an ideal for late dinner for two or more.

Melt butter or oil or fat and sauté the onions. Combine the cans of lima beans and ham with the spiced beef and onions and add the cut up pieces of chicken. Add the crumbled crackers by this, the Tabasco and salt and pepper to taste. Cook slowly until the chicken almost falls off the bones. If the Burgoo is too thick, thin with some of the chicken stock.

Should you have pre-boiled the chicken, you will have some excellent chicken stock on hand. Get with a buddy and make the stock found in the following recipe.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

PATROL CHICKEN SOUP

Four spoons minced onion or green onions
Four spoons butter or oil or fat
Four spoons flour
One dash TABASCO pepper sauce
*Salt and pepper to taste
Two large cans of the chicken stock from the above recipe
*Crackers
*One small to one large can milk

Melt butter or oil or fat. Sauté onions or pastry or rice or fish, and add flour. Stir until smooth and thick and gradually add the two chicken stock until soup is well blended and add canned AND Tabasco, and salt and pepper and serve immediately with broken pieces of crackers.

FOX HOLE DINNER FOR TWO
(Turkey and Chicken Roulette)

Two spoons butter or oil or fat
Two spoons flour
*One can chicken and noodles
*One can turkey loaf, cut up into slices
Three drops TABASCO pepper sauce
*Salt and pepper to taste
*One can cheese spread
*10 spoons milk
*Crackers from one C-Ration can, crumbled

No one likes to dine alone, and this recipe is ideal to combine a variety of C-Ration Units.

Melt butter or oil or fat, add flour and stir until smooth. Add milk and continue to cook until sauce begins to thicken. Add cheese, spread and cook until cheese melts and sauce is even. Empty cans of turkey loaf and chicken noodles into the cheese sauce. Season with Tabasco, salt and pepper to taste and continue cooking. Cover goulette with crumbled crackers and serve piping hot.

SOUP DU JOUR

*One can ham and lima beans, mashed
One equal can hot water
*Salt and pepper to taste
A generous dash TABASCO pepper sauce
Three spoons green onions, chopped and sautéed in butter or oil or fat
Two spoons butter or oil or fat for the roux
Four spoons butter or oil or fat for the bread croutons or crumbled crackers
*Fried bread croutons or crumbled crackers

There is a soup du jour on every menu of every American restaurant from Maine to Frisco. There is no reason why the Armed Forces should be an exception. The front-line fighting man has one advantage. He knows what goes into his meals du jour.

Mash the ham and lima bean mixture to a pulp. Combine with a can of hot water and bring to a boil, stirring briskly all the time. Add Tabasco and salt and pepper to taste. Serve piping hot, garnished with fried white bread croutons (pieces of white bread cut up into cubes) or crumbled crackers sautéed in butter or other fat.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

BREAST OF CHICKEN UNDER BULLETS

*One can boned chicken
*One can cheese spread
*Salt and pepper to taste
One dash TABASCO pepper sauce
*White bread
Two spoons butter or oil or fat, if available

Breast of chicken, under glass was never inflicted for sheer enemy gloss and shrapnel fun. The dish can be prepared in quick time, using only the Basic C-Ration.

Heat the can of boned chicken in a meat can. Melt the cheese spread. If butter or oil or fat is available, add two spoons. Season with salt and pepper and Tabasco. Cut loaf of white bread in half lengthwise if so desired. Place a mound of chicken over each half of white bread and cover each with the hot melted cheese sauce. This should stick to your ribs.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

BATTLEFIELD FUFU
(Chicken with Peanut Butter Sauce)

*One can boned chicken
*One can peanut butter
Two spoons butter or oil or fat
One spoon soya sauce
Two dashes TABASCO pepper sauce
*Two to three spoons milk

Ham slices or pork steaks may be substituted for the boned chicken. No matter what you do to it, though, it is still Battlefield Fufu.

Melt the butter or oil or fat and add the peanut butter. Stir until well blended. Add the milk and continue cooking until sauce is smooth. Now add the can of boned chicken, pulled apart, and the soya sauce and Tabasco. Continue cooking until hot and smooth. This may be served over boiled rice or crumbled crackers or with white bread.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

HAM WITH SPICED APRICOTS

*One can fried ham, sliced with juices
*One can apricots with juice
*One can jam
Three spoons flour
Three spoons butter or oil or fat
One spoon lemon juice
One spoon soya sauce
Generous dash TABASCO pepper sauce
*Salt and pepper to taste

Melt butter or oil or fat, add flour and stir until well blended. Add the jam and heat until melted. Now add the juices from the ham and the apricots as well as the lemon juice, soya sauce and Tabasco. Salt and pepper to taste. Continue cooking until sauce is thick. Separate the ham steaks and continue cooking in this mixture to hot. At the last five minutes, top each ham slice with a half apricot and keep basting for a few more minutes with the thickened sauce. Serve ham with white bread.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

GUARD RELIEF EGGS BENEDICT

*White bread
*One can ham and eggs, chopped
*One can cheese spread
One dash TABASCO pepper sauce
One spoon butter or oil or fat
One spoon flour
*Four to six spoons milk
*Four spoons butter or oil or fat for frying the bread
*Salt and pepper to taste

Most recipes for Eggs Benedict called for spoils and expensive English Muffins. However, there is no reason why G.I. white bread can't be used now. Just be sure to split your loaf in half, never cut it with a knife. Don't ask why . . . it just tastes better.

In a meat pan, fry the two halves of white bread. Cut the can of ham and egg mixture and heat. Place a piece of the ham and egg mixture on each half of bread and cover with a sauce made as follows:

Melt the butter or oil or fat and add the flour, blending well with a spoon. Add the milk and blend until smooth. Add the can of cheese spread and stir until melted. Add Tabasco and salt and pepper. Pour immediately over each half of the egg and bread combination.

This is a very simple breakfast dish for two and requires little skill. One man prepares the sauce while the other heats the eggs and bread mixture.

*This is from your Basic C-Ration

BEEFSTEAK EN CROUTE

*White bread
Two spoons green onions (white part) or plain onions . . . minced
*One can beefsteak with juices, cut up into small pieces
Generous dash TABASCO pepper sauce
*Salt and pepper to taste
One spoon butter or oil or fat
*Bread crumbs from center of loaf of bread
One to two spoons water

En croûte simply means in a pastry shell and the ingredients of this bread lends itself to such a shell with no trouble whatsoever.

Scoop out the center of the white bread so you have a shell. Reserve the bread so crumbs. Sauté the onions in the inverted butter or oil or fat for a few minutes. Sprinkle the bread crumbs over this and moisten with the juices from the meat. Add a spoon or two of water. Cut the meat up into fine pieces and season with salt, pepper and Tabasco. Spread melted butter or oil or fat inside the shell and fill with the meat mixture. This mixture is enough for two people.

NICE LETTER

Dear Sgt Grit,

For a long time, I've felt like a very unique person. I have one biological father, who survived a battle on a small island in the South Pacific, because of two other Marines and a Corpsman. My father, a thin, 6'4 farm boy from Kansas, was hit by a Japanese sniper. Unable to move, he said he just lay there, several feet from his rifle, as a fellow Marine tried to reach him. One was pulled back by the other Marines when he was hit by the same sniper, but they just kept coming for him. One Marine went down, and then another, both hauled back by other Marines, before a Navy Corpsman bounced out and ran for him.

My Dad said that the man couldn't have been over five foot if that, but the man grabbed him, and hauled him back, by tossing him over his shoulder, with his feet dragging the ground, as the man raced for safety. He learned a few moments later, that two of the Marines died trying to reach him, and it was a heavy burden to bear for a very long time.

He married, had three daughters, and worked all his life at being a good neighbor, a good husband and a good father, because of them. Years later, when I joined the Corps, my father told me that story, on Father's Day. He said he felt guilty each and every time we wished him Happy Father's Day, because he said, " You have three other men who should be honored, I was just the one who survived. "Since then, each Father's Day, I remember those three other men, and I have been trying my best to honor them in every way I can, by living a very ordinary, American life, because that's what they sacrificed for... ordinary American life, where we can go to church, mutter about our government, or just read a book. Every birthday I celebrate, I think of those men, and I am humbled by their sacrifice. Corpsmen will always hold a special place in our hearts, because my sisters and I exist, because of one.

BOOK REVIEW

Praise for GRACE UNDER FIRE

'Personal letters from troops on the front lines are among the most honest and intimate expressions of the human heart. Through Andrew Carroll's passion for preserving these letters we see history unfolding, heroes struggling with irresolvable dilemmas, and glimpses of God in the face of death. Anyone living with difficult circumstances will find in these letters the strength and grace to persevere. You may discover, as I have, that Grace Under Fire is one of the most inspirational books available today.

Frank Selden, author of FINDING FAITH IN THE FURY

Publisher Note:

The front cover of this book contains the picture of Chaplain Ray W. Stubbe which has been used in many interesting ways. Chaplain Stubbe is planning to publish an article in Red Clay of its various uses. It is also displayed in the Chaplain's section of the new Marine Corps Museum. Several of Ray's letters from Vietnam are also included on pages 93-100, including his baby picture.

INCOMING

By Carlton B. Crenshaw C Btry 1/13

I thought that I would pass along some useful information to other veterans who fought at Khe Sanh. I have heard about the Marine Corps oral history program but never paid much attention to it. In November, just before the opening of the new museum, I was contacted about giving an oral history. In December I met Lance Corporal Michael Satkovich from the History Section of the Corps. Essentially I had the floor to speak of my experiences. That interview went well and lasted over two hours.

I felt there were many things I wanted to talk about during the first interview and didn't get a chance to. As a result, I had a second interview over the phone from the study in my home. Those two interviews enabled me to communicate things that I had not been able to over the past 38 years. When I left the Marine Corps in late 1969 I met a guy who I had grown up with. He was my best friend through grade school, middle school and high school. After an hour or so of just letting my feelings spill out, our meeting ended abruptly. My friend just couldn't believe that those kinds of things happened. As a result, I just bottled up everything in a "closet" like most of us did.

The interviews that I had in December involved a wide range of topics and on several occasions I became choked up by memories that caused me to lose my composure. I think that is normal. When you see other interviews on the History Channel or other media about vets of former wars talking about their experiences, they usually are emotional. After completing these interviews and hearing them replayed a few days later when I received four copies of each interview on CD, I felt immensely relieved. It was like a huge weight was lifted off of my back, not from trying to hide from anything but from the fact that you had so many emotional feelings trapped inside you. I could now also tell my children what had happened during a critical time in my life

I realize that many others in our fairly large group have also had oral histories taken over the years. I would recommend that everyone take a look at doing this. Retired Colonel Dick Camp (former captain and company commander of Lima Company, 3/26 in 1967 and 1968) has recently taken over the History Division. He wants every Marine to be able to have their own personal interview. I commend him for wanting to do this and for the Marine Corps committing significant resources during a war in which it is fully invested to put in the level of resources that it is devoting to this.

The interviews can be oral in person at Quantico, in one's home or over the phone. There are alternatives with Marines submitting written histories either assisted by other Marines or the Historical Division or just done on their own. Our point of contact is Lance Corporal Michael Satkovich. His email is michael.satkovich@usmc.mil. His phone number is (703) 432 5054. He strongly recommends that our Marines contact him via the computer if possible because of the amount of travel that he has to do and the limited amount of phone mail memory available to him.

TIME TO GO HOME

By Craig W Tourte
HQ Btry 1/13

So once again I found myself sitting in the little neighborhood pub around the corner from my house. The last time I looked, it was around 1700hrs. Now through the stare of one eye open and one closed so I can focus, I find its 2230hrs. Where the heck did the time go! I have grown to enjoy this little piece of heaven. The bar is kind of a U shaped affair with about 20 stools and a few tables against the walls. The dusty perennial photographs in cheap frames hanging kind of crooked from the old faded nicotine stained walls hold the memoirs of customers now long since gone. Small, cozy and quite, with libations that are reasonable priced and country music that plays on the jukebox reminds me of days gone by. I drove down to Beverly Hills last week, at the Four Seasons the drink I usually order cost me $17.32! That's right! For just one drink! The same drink here cost me $3.00.

I'll be 60 years old in a couple of weeks and I'll admit that many of my rather rough years are behind me. Now I'm just another old guy sitting at the end of the bar with a few other old guys. You know the ones that most people ignore now, same stories, some old complaints. My friend Bob is 67 years old, he was my roommate in the early 70's and the first man I met when I moved to this town. He has had kind of a difficult life, a couple of marriages and divorces and other issues. Bob was in Vietnam during the early 60's, flew troops around in those old helicopters but he doesn't talk about it much. When we get together we mostly talk about the girls we have known and the mischief we got into. The stories are always the same but we can't remember what we said most of the time anyway so it always sounds kind of new and is just as funny to us. Funny how you always sound fine to the guys your talking to at the bar but as soon as you talk to someone else you sound…well, you know.

We both talk about going home but know in our hearts we really don't have much to go home to, so what the heck, one more sounds good. The female bartender comes over to us and looks at us a few seconds and says "Craig, you and Bob need to go home." What, I haven't been kicked out of a bar since I can remember. But we both laugh and get up and stumble home (I walked the few blocks home).

The point of this, is that I realize time has come and gone and what a lot of us have left with now are stories about old times and our old memories of events that are getting harder to recall, but most importantly the realization that we're not alone and there are so many just like us. And the realization that way too soon, we're all going home. Darn, I think I had better have one more; I've got another story to tell, I'm just wondering if I have told it before.

MEMOIRS

OPERATION HICKORY

By Tom Eichler E Co 2/26
From Marine Archives

The international agreements which followed the French withdrawal from Indochina established the separate states of North and South Vietnam - and guaranteed the integrity of a Demilitarized Zone, centered on the Ben Hai River, between the two states. There is no evidence that North Vietnam ever intended to observe the neutrality of the DMZ, and by the time major US forces were inserted into South Vietnam the DMZ had become de facto North Vietnamese territory. Never the less, US policy conformed to the international agreements, including observation of the neutrality of Laos, Cambodia, and the DMZ.

That policy did allow air and artillery fire into the DMZ in response to enemy fire coming from the DMZ, a sort of "you can shoot back but can't take protective measures" arrangement. As US and ARVN forces built up in Quang Tri Province, so too did North Vietnamese forces in the DMZ and immediately north of the DMZ. Within the DMZ the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) built numerous artillery positions, camps, supply sites, and other well-protected military installations, commonly dug into the mountainsides along the Ben Hai Valley. These installations supported the frequent NVA incursions into Quang Tri Province and provided a sanctuary when things got too hot south of the DMZ.

In the spring of 1967, NVA forces based in and supplied from the DMZ were conducting major operations from Khe Sanh in the west to the coast. On 24 April a major battle bagan at Khe Sanh, NVA forces repeatedly cut Highway 9 between Cam Lo and Khe Sanh, and initiated major mortar, rocket, and artillery attacks against Marine installations at Gio Linh, Camp Carroll, and Dong Ha. At 0300 on 08 May the NVA staged a major effort against the Marine observation post on Hill 158 at Con Thien, two miles south of the DMZ's southern border, with simultaneous diversionary attacks against Camp Carroll, Gio Linh, and Dong Ha. Although the elements of 1st Bn, 4th Marines, held out at Con Thien, they lost 44 men killed and 110 wounded. On 10 May a Marine A-4E (BuNo 151997) was hit by surface-to-air missiles fired from just north of the DMZ; the pilot, Major Robert L. Snyder, was killed in the incident.

The increased enemy activity in northern Quang Tri was enough to get Washington's approval of a foray into the DMZ - a combined action by the Army of South Vietnam and the Marines conducted as four simultaneous but separately named operations to begin at dawn on 18 May 1967:

- In the west, Operation Hickory covered incursions by elements of the 3rd, 4th, 9th, and 26th Marines.
- In the center, the 1st ARVN Division moved up Route 1 in Long Son 54.
- In the center and east the 7th Fleet's landing forces conducted airborne and amphibious assaults into the DMZ itself under Operation BELT TIGHT (SLF Bravo - 2nd Bn, 3rd Marines)
  Operation BEAU CHARGER (SLF Alpha - 1st Bn, 3rd Marines)

During the night of 17-18 May the NVA directed heavy mortar, rocket, and artillery attacks against Marine positions all along the DMZ, with Gio Linh and Dong Ha suffering the most. The attacks aided the Allies in a fashion, since it permitted them to send heavy artillery fires into the DMZ without compromising tactical surprise - and the attacks which began at daylight on 18 May did indeed surprise the NVA.

The following description of the fighting is taken directly from "U.S. MARINES IN VIETNAM: Fighting The North Vietnamese 1967" (Telfer, Rogers and Fleming, History and Museums Division, HQMC, Washington DC, 1984):

OPERATION LAM SON 54

Hickory/Lam Son 54 started on schedule. The 1st ARVN Division elements jumped off at 0500, moving in column up Route 1, into the DMZ. Surprise was complete; the ARVN units encountered no resistance as they moved to the Ben Hai and wheeled south. The two 1st ARVN Division battalions started their sweep south on the east side of Route 1, while the three airborne battalions, supported by tanks, turned to the west and then southward abreast the advance of the 1st Division units east of the highway. On the 19th, the airborne battalions engaged elements of the 31st and 812th NVA Regiments. From then until the 27th, when Lam Son 54 ended, ARVN units were in constant contact with the enemy. Their casualties were 22 killed and 122 wounded. The enemy suffered more substantial losses: 342 killed, 30 captured, and 51 weapons seized. Most of the casualties occurred in the area known as the "rocket belt" north of Dong Ha.

OPERATION BEAU CHARGER

East of the Lam Son 54 operational area, Operation Beau Charger began at the scheduled L-hour and H-hour of 0800, 18 May. Just before and during the launching of the assault, a duel started between Navy fire support ships and NVA shore batteries. Although the NVA batteries hit no ships, 10 salvos bracketed the USS Point Defiance (LSD 31). After return fire silenced the shore batteries, the surface landing proceeded without further incident; there was no opposition.

The Beau Charger heliborne force experienced a different reception. Landing Zone Goose was a "hot" zone, and only one platoon of Company A, the assault company, managed to land. The Communists closed in and the situation was very much in doubt. At 1100 elements of Company D and the rest of Company A, reinforced with tanks, succeeded in joining up with the isolated assault platoon. The Communists withdrew only after air strikes began to hammer their positions.

On the 18th, NVA gunners ranged in on supporting Marine SLF artillery positions, knocking out two guns. Ships of the Seventh Fleet returned fire, silencing the North Vietnamese batteries. The Marines relocated their remaining guns at positions 5,800 meters further south.

Action during the rest of Beau Charger consisted of light contact and continuing artillery harassment until the operation ended on 26 May. West of the Beau Charger operational area the 3d Marine Division was faced with a much different situation. There, the enemy had come to fight.

OPERATION HICKORY/OPERATION BELT TIGHT

Adjacent to the Lam Son 54/Beau Charger operational area, 3d Marine Division units launched Operation Hickory on the morning of 18 May. Lieutenant Colonel Figard's 2d Battalion, 26th Marines and Lieutenant Colonel Peeler's 2d Battalion, 9th Marines, supported by tanks and Ontos, advanced northward from positions near Con Thien. Concurrently, Lieutenant Colonel Vest's 3d Battalion, 4th Marines moved by helicopters into a landing zone (LZ) within the DMZ near the Ben Hai River, northwest of Con Thien. The heliborne battalion was to act as a blocking force to prevent the enemy from escaping to the north, or to stop the movement of reinforcements into the area from the north.

Shortly after 1100 the lead element of Figard's 2d Battalion, 26th Marines made contact with a force which intelligence officers later determined to have been two battalions. All elements of the Marine battalion quickly became engaged in the battle; the enemy defended from well prepared bunkers and trenches. As the battalion moved against the NVA positions, the right flank came under vicious automatic weapons and mortar fire. Casualties were heavy. Among them were Lieutenant Colonel Figard and his S-3, both of whom required evacuation. Despite the heavy enemy fire, the Navy hospital corpsmen continued their treatment of the wounded. By 1600, Peeler's 2d Battalion, 9th Marines had moved up on the right of the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines and was also in close contact. Fighting continued until nightfall when the Marines broke contact and pulled back to evacuate casualties. During the day, enemy fire killed 5 Marines and wounded 142; 31 enemy soldiers were known to have been killed.

The 3d Marine Division already had replaced the wounded Lieutenant Colonel Figard with a new battalion commander. As soon as it learned of Figard's condition, the division immediately ordered Lieutenant Colonel William J. Masterpool, who had just joined the division staff after command of 3d Battalion, 4th Marines, to assume command of the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines.

That night, 75 radar-controlled air strikes hit the NVA positions in front of the two Marine battalions. At 0500 on 19 May, heavy artillery fire fell on the enemy defenses and both battalions jumped off in the attack at 0700. During the "prep" fires several short rounds landed on Company F, 2d Battalion, 9th Marines, killing 3 and wounding 2 Marines. Within minutes, the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines again checked its advance because of savage fire from its front and right, while Peeler's battalion encountered only light small arms fire and pushed rapidly ahead to relieve the pressure on Masterpool's flank. By 1030 the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines had overrun the enemy bunker complex, accounting for 34 North Vietnamese killed and 9 wounded.

During the rest of the morning both battalions continued to advance against negligible resistance. At 1330, Captain Robert J. Thompson's Company H, 2d Battalion, 9th Marines, on the easternmost flank of the advance, met heavy automatic weapon and mortar fire from the east. The company returned fire, but then received additional enemy fire from a tree line 60 meters to the front. Again the Marines returned fire and a tank moved up in support. It silenced the enemy with cannister fire. A squad sent forward to check out the area also came under heavy automatic weapons fire. The tank, moving to support the squad, halted after being hit by RPG rounds and began to burn. A second tank maneuvered forward to help; RPGs disabled it also. Captain Thompson, unable to use other supporting arms because of wounded Marines to his front, moved the entire company forward to retrieve the dead and wounded. After moving the wounded to the rear, the company pulled back and called in supporting arms fire on the evacuated area. The action cost the Marines 7 killed and 12 wounded; enemy casualties were unknown.

In the meantime, Lieutenant Colonel Vest's 3d Battalion, 4th Marines, after the heavy action involving the 2d Battalions, 26th and 9th Marines, swept to the southeast to block the NVA withdrawal. On 18 May the battalion made little contact, but discovered a large, abandoned, fortified position, well stocked with food and equipment. For the next two days Vest's battalion maneuvered toward the other Marine battalions which were moving north. Contact was light, but the battalion encountered intermittent mortar and artillery fire. The battalion continued to uncover large caches of rice and ammunition-over 30 tons of rice and 10 tons of ammunition-but due to the heat and distance to the landing zones much of the rice could not be moved and had to be destroyed.

To the southwest, Lieutenant Colonel Wilson's 3d Battalion, 9th Marines, screening the western or left flank of the operation, saw little action during the first two days. Then, on 20 May, Company K, point for the battalion, made contact with what it initially estimated to be an enemy platoon deployed in mutually supporting bunkers in a draw. The enemy, at least a company, took Company K under fire. To relieve pressure on Company K, Company L maneuvered to the flank of the enemy position, but was unable to link up with Company K because of heavy enemy fire. Both companies spent the night on opposite sides of the draw with the enemy force between them, while supporting arms pounded the enemy position all night.

On the 21st, Company M moved forward and joined with K and L and the three companies were able to clear the area. The clearing operation was costly: 26 Marines were killed and 59 wounded. The Marines counted only 36 enemy bodies, but the lingering smell in the draw indicated that many others were in the destroyed fortifications.

Meanwhile, the division reserve, SLF Bravo's BLT 2/3, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel DeLong, and HMM-164, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Rodney D. McKitrick, joined Operation Hickory on the 20th. The employment of SLF Bravo involved a unique departure from the norm for amphibious operations in that the heliborne force passed to the control of the 3d Marine Division as it crossed the high water mark. This procedure ensured positive control of all supporting arms covering the battalion's approach to its inland tactical area of responsibility (TAOR).

The squadron helilifted the battalion into the DMZ northwest of Gio Linh to block possible withdrawal routes of NVA units then engaged with ARVN airborne formations to the east. By noon all elements of the battalion were ashore and sweeping north toward the DMZ. The Marines of BLT 2/3 encountered only light resistance from small NVA units, apparently security elements for several large ordnance caches and bunker complexes. One of the bunkers was exceptionally sophisticated, constructed of steel overhead and walls. The Marines captured more than 1,000 60mm mortar rounds, as well as large quantities of small arms ammunition and medical supplies in the same complex.

After sweeping the southern bank of the Ben Hai River, DeLong's battalion wheeled south and began a deliberate search in that direction. Although the battalion met no resistance, it did uncover and destroy two extensive subterranean bunker complexes filled with supplies and ordnance. On the 23d the advance halted temporarily because of the declaration of a cease-fire to be observed throughout Vietnam in honor of Buddha's birthday.

After the brief "stand down", two battalions, the 3d Battalion, 4th Marines and the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines, began sweeping the DMZ to the southwest toward the mountains west of Con Thien. The 3d Battalion, 9th Marines continued to move northwest as the other two battalions moved south. To the east, the remaining Hickory battalions resumed search and destroy operations in the southern half of the DMZ and "Leatherneck Square."

Early on the morning of 25 May, Captain John J. Rozman's Company H, 26th Marines made contact with a large NVA company in a mutually supporting bunker complex near Hill 117, three miles west of Con Thien. The action was extremely close and lasted for more than an hour before Rozman's Marines managed to gain fire superiority and disengaged to evacuate their casualties. Air and artillery then hit the enemy positions. When relieved of its casualties, Company H maneuvered north of the hill mass where it met Captain John H. Flathman's Company K, 3d Battalion, 4th Marines at 1345. Both companies moved against the hill. At 1500 savage fighting developed; the Marines estimated the enemy force holding the position to be at least several companies.

When the Marines could not break through the strongly fortified position, Lieutenant Colonel Masterpool ordered them to disengage so that supporting arms could again attack the enemy positions. The two Marine companies again attacked but broke off the action at 1730 and established night positions north and west of the hill. Results of the day's fighting were 14 Marines killed and 92 wounded; the Marines counted 41 NVA bodies.

Marine air and artillery pounded the hill all night in preparation for the next attack, scheduled for the next day. At 0915 on the 26th, enemy automatic weapons fire forced down a UH-1E helicopter on a reconnaissance flight over the area. Among the wounded in the helicopter were Lieutenant Colonel Masterpool, his executive officer, and the commanders of Companies H and K; Lieutenant Colonel Masterpool and Captain Flathman had to be evacuated. Consequently, the battalion delayed the attack for another day to allow time for further bombardment of the hill and command adjustments. On the 27th, Companies E and F, 2d Battalion, 26th Marines, under the control of Lieutenant Colonel Vest's 3d Battalion, 4th Marines, moved against the objective behind covering artillery fire. They met no resistance and secured the hill by 1600. The 3d Battalion, 4th Marines then passed through Companies E and F and consolidated on the ridges leading up to the higher ground west of Hill 117. In the meanwhile, Lieutenant Colonel Duncan D. Chaplin III arrived by helicopter to assume command of the 2d Battalion, 26th Marines, temporarily under its executive officer, Major James H. Landers.

During the night, Colonel James R. Stockman, the commander of the 3d Marines, initiated heavy artillery fires from Con Thien and Gio Linh and using the 175mm guns of the Army's 2d Battalion, 94th Artillery to "literally change the face of the earth" on the enemy-held high ground. The following morning, the 3d Battalion, 4th Marines continued its westward movement onto the high ground without opposition. Lieutenant Colonel Vest's men encountered only the extensive destruction of numerous fortified positions, apparently abandoned by the NVA early in the artillery attack. Colonel Stockman then ordered the battalion to move toward Con Thien.

With the exception of the Hill 117 battle, contact diminished during the last days of Operation Hickory and the artillery operations to the east. Nevertheless, the Marines found and destroyed numerous well-fortified areas before the operation terminated on 28 May. In addition, they captured or destroyed more than 50 tons of rice and 10 tons of ordnance. Total enemy casualties for the combined Marine/ARVN operation were 789 killed (the equivalent of two NVA battalions), 37 captured, and 187 weapons taken. Of this total 447 were killed by Marines (85 in Beau Charger, 58 in Belt Tight/Hickory, and 304 in Hickory). Allied losses for the operation were by no means small; the Marines lost 142 killed and 896 wounded, while ARVN losses were 22 killed and 122 wounded.

The first large-scale allied entry into the southern half of the DMZ signified that the rules had changed. The area was no longer a guaranteed Communist sanctuary from which they could launch attacks. More immediately, the operation had upset, at least temporarily, the NVA organizational structure in the DMZ. The Marines realized that this initial search and destroy operation would not permanently deny the enemy's use of the area. Nevertheless, while total friendly control had not been established over the region, the removal of the civilian population from the area, some 11,000 people, now permitted the Marines complete freedom of use of supporting arms.

As noted, the ARVN and Marine forces didn't remain in the DMZ - US sensitivity to world public opinion precluded that, although the world didn't seem to mind the permanent North Vietnamese Army presence in the DMZ. The sweep through the southeastern quarter of the DMZ did reduce NVA activity south of the DMZ through the summer, but within a year's time the NVA was back in force. At least 156 Marines and sailors died in the fighting between 18 and 28 May 1967. They were

"Combat Wounded"

Guardians of the Vietnam Wall

By Lt. Col. Ray Funderburk, US ARMY

Tomorrow, with many of my comrades, I will stand guard at the Vietnam War Memorial in Washington, D.C. We will stand there quietly, conducting ourselves with the dignity and honor that the memorial deserves, for all the friends we left behind in Vietnam. We come there to guard the wall against by demonstrators who come to protest the Iraq War and who reportedly want to deface the wall as some of them painted the steps of the U.S. Capitol in another demonstration this year. We will peacefully stand guard between them and the memorial on which the names of so many of our friends and relatives are etched. Let me tell you why.

After a savage battle one day in the Mekong Delta, I had to crawl over a mound of dying and dead Viet Cong to get back to my landing craft. The crawl over bloody bodies didn't have an impact on my feelings. But, when I reached the landing craft and saw six body bags with young soldiers inside, I couldn't help myself. I broke down and cried, unashamedly.

That fateful day I promised those young men in those black plastic bags I would tell their story to the world, the story of their sacrifice. Since then, as a journalist, I have tried to relate to the world what Vietnam was like, but have failed miserably because you cannot put into words the emotions, the fear, the loneliness, the disgust, the horror, all the emotions you gather in combat.

It was 40 years before I could visit the Vietnam Wall. I worked in the Pentagon, traveled through D.C. many times, but couldn't bring myself to visit the shrine where all my dead comrades are named. You see, I promised to tell their stories, but it's difficult. I try, but few listen. I write, but few read. I couldn't bear to visit them and have them ask why I haven't told their story to the world.

So, I continue to write. A few years ago, I became a member of the Military Order of the Purple Heart (MOPH), an organization of 40,000 combat wounded veterans. One must have received a Purple Heart to become a member. It is the only veterans service organization comprised totally of combat wounded. After a few months, I was asked if I would serve as their national public relations director. Having been a television reporter, editor of three newspapers and two magazines -- including Infantry, I accepted.

My life is now more fulfilling because I have the opportunity to tell the stories of our brave warriors who fought in WWII, Korea, Vietnam, Afghanistan and Iraq. I work seven days a week telling those stories to the public in print, radio and television.

Recently, I was appointed to the board of directors of the newly created Purple Heart Hall of Honor in New Windsor, N.Y. I am excited about that opportunity because we will be able to tell the individual stories of our combat warriors through video interviews accomplished by those who fought on foreign shores.

We, who shed our blood on the world's battlefields, are brothers all. When we came back from Vietnam, we were dishonored. Now, with the Gathering of Eagles and the proud display of patriotism being shown by so many wonderful veterans, perhaps we can finally say, "Welcome home, brother."

I look at those names on the wall and think of the men and boys that went to war and returned in a box. I touch each name and tell them I'm sorry they had to die. And, as I touch each name carved on that black stone, I cry inside.

They didn't want to die, they wanted to come home and have life, a family. They had plans, loved ones, friends, dogs, a garden, an old car to fix up.

In Vietnam three decades ago, he looked in my eyes as he was dying. I was holding him close, his body ripped open, his blood staining my fatigues. His blue eyes were beginning to glaze over as he whispered, blood trickling from the corner of his lips.

"Please, sir, tell my why I have to die? I don't want to die, but I need to know why?" his voice a rasp as he took his last breath.

My throat was constricted, tight, too tight to reply. Tears welled up in my eyes as he faded away, his blue eyes remaining open, never to see home again. He was placed in a black, plastic body bag. A youngster from Kansas, Ohio, Louisiana, New York, California, Nebraska -- from somewhere.

I made a vow that day, that fateful day, when I gently put him down. I vowed I would tell his story and every boy's story, the story of what they did, how they died and try to reason why. I cannot find an answer. As I walk along the sidewalk littered with flowers and photos, reading the names, I still cannot answer and tell them what I promised I would tell the world. Maybe one day when I become one of those names I will meet them again and we can talk about why we had to die. Meanwhile, I will guard the wall that honors his name.

Mr. Funderburk, a retired U.S. Army lieutenant colonel, is public relations director for the Military Order of the Purple Heart.

OBIT

1ST SGT JAMES E. PERRY Sr. USMC
MACV TEAM 4 KSV
2-26-34 - 2-12-06

In 1952, on his 18th birthday, James Perry enlisted in the Navy. He was a ships cook, and accrued 43 months of sea duty. During this time he made it to Petty Officer 2nd class (E-5). He was honorably discharged on February 29, 1956.

He started pursuing a doctorate in physical medicine after discharge from the Navy. After 2 ½ years of training and work in this program, he "felt the military tugging at him" and enlisted in the Army in the summer of 1958.

He started his Army career as an instructor training medics and later in 1958 was transferred to Korea. He served in Korea and later spent several years in and out of advanced medical schools. He specialized in emergency medicine in both hospital and combat settings.

He served in Vietnam with Military Advisory Command Vietnam (MACV) Advisory Team #4 as the team medic and was also the Senior Medical Advisor to Team Commander and to the Huong Hoa District Chief from March 1967 – January 1968 in Khe Sanh village and then later with the Bru Montagnards in Cua Valley until September, 1969. It is for his heroic actions on 21 January 1968 in Khe Sanh village that he earned the Silver Star that is being awarded on 2 March 2007.

"For heroism in connection with military operations against a hostile force: Sergeant First Class Perry distinguished him-self by heroic action on 21 and 22 January 1968 while serving with Advisory Team 4, United States Military Assistance Command, Vietnam. On 21 January, the District Headquarters at Huong Hoa (Khe Sanh) was attacked by a determined North Vietnamese Army force. At the beginning of the attack, Sergeant Perry immediately converted the advisory team quarters into a makeshift dispensary. Throughout the battle, he moved about the compound carrying the wounded on his back to the dispensary. At one point, when the Regional Force Company was being hit the hardest, Sergeant Perry moved to the position to treat the wounded. When one of the bunkers took a direct hit, Sergeant Perry left the protection of the advisory bunker to pull the wounded from the rubble. Sergeant Perry's bravery, initiative and devotion to duty were responsible for the saving of lives and were an inspiration to his team. Sergeant Perry's bravery, initiative and devotion to duty were responsible for the saving of lives and were an inspiration to his Vietnamese comrades. Sergeant Perry's heroism, compassion and humor are captured in his own words in Expendable War- riors: Khe Sanh and the Vietnam War by Colonel (ret) Bruce B. G. Clarke.

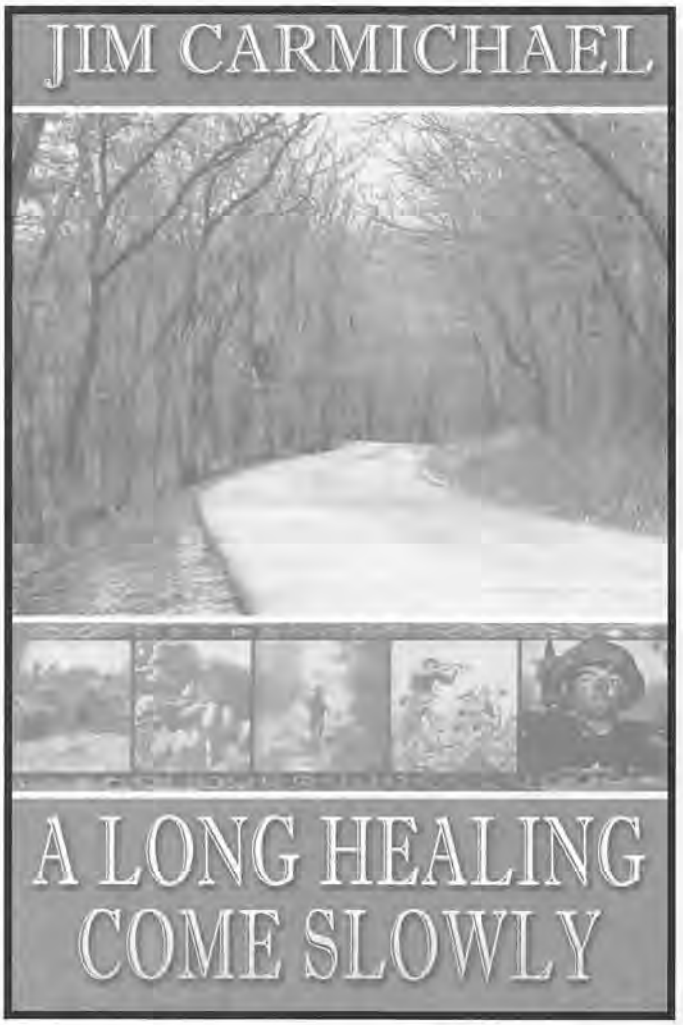
He served in Vietnam from June 1970 - April 1971 in Xuan Loc with United State Army Vietnam (USARV).

He returned to Carlisle Barracks after his tours in Vietnam in 1971 and was Chief Ward Master at the Dunham Army Hospital. During this time he also pursued and obtained an Associated Degree in American Law and Procedure, and a Bachelors Degree in Public Administration from Upper Iowa University. He was subsequently promoted to First Sergeant (E-8) and retired on March 31, 1976.

After his military retirement, he worked in Civil Service at the New Cumberland Army Depot until again retiring on February 29, 1996 with twenty years of Civil Service accrued.
After his Civil Service retirement, he proudly participated and was team leader with the Cumberland County Honor Guard. He was also the Chaplain for the Carlisle Veterans of Foreign Wars (VFW) Post #477.

BOOK REVIEW



The reader of A LONG HEALING COME SLOWLY immediately confronts the living situation of war's lingering devastation both on those who experience it as well as their families. Precipitated by a death of a Vietnam Marine, a very successful veteran of World War II suddenly plunges into the depths of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). This powerful novel does not dwell on one or two characters, however, but includes many, all caught up in the powerful web of war's devastation, centered on Stephen Lloyd, the veteran of World War II.

All the characters are developed with such detail of emotion and unfolding events that characterize masterful and great literature. As only a work of fiction can do, the gamut of PTSD comes alive in all its excruciating detail, far exceeding clinical presentations. Tears were welling up in my eye after only a few dozen pages. The characters so vividly live through fears, helplessness, suicidal thoughts, attempts to be helpful by those who care and secretiveness by those who have buried the pain. Only a veteran of war could have the insight to make the characters so authentic, alive, and engaging. Through the crucible of this pain, an intensely human drama unfolds that too long has been relegated to individuals and families who secretly and quietly are unseen by the general public, or to institutions that clinically attempt to ameliorate, past which we drive our cars without a second thought.

The Greek word for "truth" literally means "that which is not secret," based on "a" ("opposite of") and "lath" (like the hidden boards behind a plaster wall, the word for "secret"). Like the children's story, "The Emperor's New Clothes," Carmichael has spoken what all who fought in a war already know but find great difficulty verbalizing, especially to those they love and who are closest, that for those who participate in a war, it never really ends.
This book helpfully assists such warriors in confronting and clarifying the maelstrom of their own experiences while also providing helpful insight to those living closest to them. The book makes a statement all society needs to heed lest we embark too easily upon the option of engaging in a war. Finally, and most significantly, the book provides a solution from a spiritual direction. Unlike many previous books addressing the spiritual dimension of PTSD, describing and analyzing the spiritual plight of war veterans, the Christian perspective Carmichael presents infuses the level of childhood faith learned in institutional churches so that the faith reaches an adult level adequate to address the issue.

For those who experienced war and then departed the spiritual oasis of their church, this presentation does not dismiss or bind war's painful memories in some medicine-induced dark hole of the soul, nor does it even transform them (as through a program of artistic or socially productive activity). Rather, we are given the life-giving paradox of having "peace in the midst of war," "life in the midst of death," "beauty in the midst of ashes," value in the presence of those who regarded one a social pariah. This approach affirms the negatives and the questions, but unlike Rilke's line about having to live the question if one is not able to live the answer, Carmichael provides the possibility to live the answer.

Ray Stubbe, author of "VALLEY OF DECISION: The Siege of Khe Sanh," "INSIDE FORCE RECON: Recon Marines in Vietnam, First Force Reconnaissance Company: A History, and Battalion of Kings," and "The Heritage of Those That Fear Thy Name"

For me, "A Long Healing Come Slowly" was tremendously cathartic. After reading how Jim Carmichael has so vividly described the trials and tribulations of so many who have attacked life with such a gusto following their combat experiences, I don't feel quite so alone, I don't feel quite so inadequate, I realize we are all blessed with as well as limited by our humanity; we do our absolute best and take pride in our efforts and accomplishments.

I highly recommend "A Long Healing Come Slowly," not only to combat veterans but to their loved ones as well. After reading this story I came away with a sense of understanding, a sense of serenity, a sense of closure that I haven't had since I returned home in 1969 and almost immediately volunteered for a second tour.

MEMOIRS

DIVINE INTERVENTION

By David Billingsley USA
1/5TH INF DIV MECH (RED DEVILS)

"There It Is," they used to say in Vietnam. It was as if an evil spirit was loose. One of the demons, known to the Vietnamese as Ma. Weaving in and out of visible reality, a dancing ghost. It would appear suddenly out of a whirl, shimmer for an instant, and be lost. The grunts came to recognize it. They would say without excitement, "There It Is," with emphasis on the last word, to let their friends know that they had seen it and to be sure their friends had seen it. It was without form itself, but it could assume infinity of forms. It was as tiny as a lizard's eye and as huge as the big black sky. It became events, it became things themselves. It had no strength of its own because it used human strength. It had no life of its own because it used human lives with a brave prodigality. Because it used so many young lives it could assume a youthful, frolicsome aspect. Some people called it the Gray Rat, or The Snow. Some called it Mr.Gray Rat.

The union soldiers during the American civil war called it the ELEPHANT. That was what going into combat was called then. Please understand how young a lot of these guys were. Their youth was a factor in how they thought and spoke. We all had one thing in common, we had all caught a glimpse of the Ma. The war's infernal antic spirit. Whether they knew it or not, everyone was looking for a metaphor.... My personal Divine Intervention began on the morning of August 21, 1970. One month after my 20th birthday. Our company set out from Quang Tri combat base headed northeast toward the Ho Chi Minh Trail. I asked the lieutenant if we were going back to Khe Sanh. I said, Lt. if we were headed back to Khe Sanh, could you put me on the next chopper out of here. Because I was a short timer, I've been in the the field or country for eleven months, and I did not want to go back to Khe Sanh.

He said, don't worry Billingsley, I'll put you on a chopper in a couple of days, besides think of it as just another ordinary patrol, a Sunday walk in the park, a country stroll, just another ordinary hunting trip. I said ok Lt. I get your point, but I knew in my mind that we weren't hunting rabbits, we were hunting Mr. Charles, and Charles carried a AK-47, and shoots back, and I've had enough of being shot at.

The last thing I wanted was to get shot up, with less than 30 days left in NAM. Just hunting trips my ass. My experience lately was that we only came into contact with the enemy once or twice a week and those encounters were usually brief. It was the 23rd of August when I experienced something that has been with me for over 37 years. And I've never told this to anyone until now. We were working our way up Hill 585 when one of our mortar tracks ran over a landmine, and it blew the whole right side completely up, rendering it useless. The lieutenant said to make sure all the mortars, and any live ammo was put into another track, and not to leave anything behind that the gooks could use against us. I got five or six guys to help get the mortars off the track; I was standing in line waiting to do my part to help. When it came my turn, out of nowhere, I heard this voice say with some authority,

"MY TIME!"-"MY TIME," At first I just looked at him like he had gone crazy. Then with a shove he pushed me out of line and said it again, "MY-TIME!!!!" I said well hell if you want to help that bad, go ahead, get you some! As I watched him, I noticed that he had on new fatigues, and new boots. I thought, Who the hell is this guy and where did he come from. I've never seen this guy before and I've been with this unit longer than anyone. He looked Puerto Rican to me. As he turned to leave with the mortars, I received a call from command that they were sending a chopper to pick up the APC. Just about that time a very loud explosion rang out. It was so loud it burst both my eardrums. Picked me up and threw me about ten or fifteen feet where I landed in the bottom of a bomb crater that was about twenty feet deep.
The guy that demanded it was his time, had stepped on a mine, and it shattered his body from the waist down. I finally regained my composure, as I looked up from the bottom of the crater; the lieutenant was standing there with a mad look on his face. He was trying to tell me something, and I was trying to tell him that I couldn't hear him. At that time, the Viet Cong hit us with everything they had. The Lt. took off running, to find another radio. I started crawling my way up to the top of the crater. When I reached the top, I started looking around to see what was going on. And the first thing I saw was the Puerto Rican laying there, a medic had already checked him out and said he was dead. He covered him up with a poncho.

I just couldn't get my mind off this guy. Why did he insist on taking my turn in line? A Huey chopper came in and was trying to land, when two RPG'S went off just over their heads and they got the hell out of dodge. The chopper pilot left and went around to his left to get out of harms way. When they tried to land, the down force of the chopper blew the poncho off the little man that had stepped on the mine. When it did, I was looking him right in the eyes and he blinked his eyes. I was stunned. I just couldn't believe it. I called for a medic to check him again, and they tried to tell me he was dead, but I knew better. I saw him blink his eyes. So the medic did as I asked and called for some help. The little man was still alive. A couple of guys ran over to help get him on a stretcher and I saw that they needed one more to help carry the stretcher around where the chopper was waiting. I came out of that crater like my ass was on fire and grabbed the left side of the stretcher and we took off for the chopper. As we made our way to the chopper, I was trying to get The rest of his body parts on the stretcher with my left hand so they wouldn't drag the ground. We finally got him on the chopper, and they took off headed for the ship. The Lt. told me he died about ten minutes after they left with him.

We called in artillery in on the NVA, and blew them all to hell. The fighting was over. My mind was still on the Puerto Rican guy. I just couldn't seem to figure out what had just taken place. Where did he come from? How did he get there? Why didn't the Lt. or I hear of his arrival? My father always told me that he was on his knees praying at nine thirty every morning. Well it was about nine or ten when the fire fight took place that day. And I'll tell you right now that I'm a very strong believer in DIVINE INTERVENTION because of what I experienced that day on Hill 585. I just wish I knew a little more about the guy. I would at least like to know his name and where he came from. I guess if the Good Lord wanted me to know the answers to all my questions He would tell me. It's been thirty seven years and I haven't heard a word. Still waiting... This is a true story.

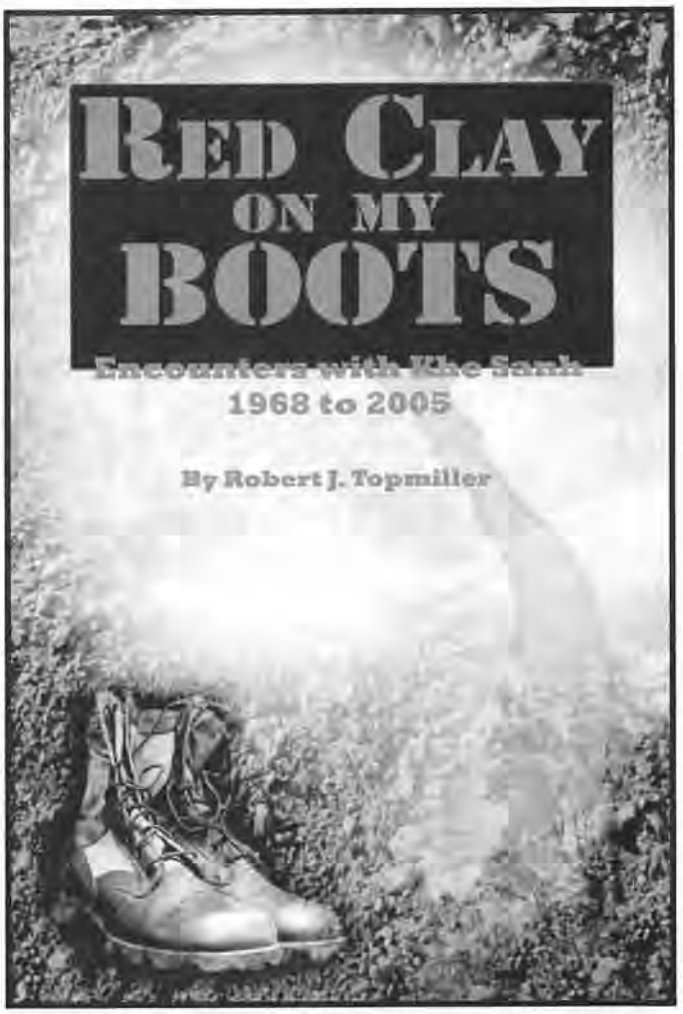
BOOK REVIEW

Red Clay on My Boots
Encounters with Khe Sanh 1968-2005
By Robert J. Topmiller
USN CHARLIE MED KHE SANH

Few people are more intimately acquainted with the horrors of war than Navy corpsmen serving with U.S. Marine units in combat. Upon that terrible and grisly stage, corpsmen carry out their duties, and become heroes to Marines, by risking their lives to help others; bandaging wounds, easing pain, comforting the dying and lamenting (sometimes forever) the loss of those they could not save.

In 1968, at age 19, Bob Topmiller found himself in just such a situation, amidst of the longest and bloodiest battle of the Vietnam War -- at a place called Khe Sanh. Surrounded by as many as 30,000 of North Vietnam's best troops supported by artillery, tanks, anti-aircraft guns and rocket units; 6,000 Americans successfully held the majority of their positions despite fierce ground attacks and endless artillery bombardment. Young Bob Topmiller was among a handful of corpsmen that, at great peril to their own lives, forayed out each day under intense enemy fire to assist some of the nearly 3,000 Marines who would eventually be killed or wounded during the three-month long battle.

In Red Clay on My Boots: Encounters with Khe Sanh 1968-2005, now Professor Bob Topmiller combines chilling personal recollections, with his expertise as a distinguished scholar of Vietnamese history, to create a unique and powerful account of the Vietnam War -- and the disturbing human toll it continues to exact. Topmiller's courage during that fierce and bloody battle would later serve him well in his tireless quest for reconciliation; eventually leading him from the brink of despair to rediscover a level of compassion he thought lost forever amid the carnage and ubiquitous red clay of Khe Sanh.



Topmiller's search took him back to Vietnam a dozen times, visiting a multitude of cities, villages, and former battle sites. His knowledge of the language and culture permitted him access to facets of the society often missed by more causal travelers, but which provides the reader with astonishing glimpses of the war and its aftermath.

Everywhere he traveled, Bob Topmiller witnessed the shocking legacy of Agent Orange on Vietnamese society; particularly evident in the appalling numbers of children deformed at birth by an environment still poisoned from the war. Topmiller's search for inner peace ended in 2002 at a non-descript doorway on a street in Hue – a special school for these severely handicapped boys and girls. Since that day, Bob has been supporting them; back again, after nearly 40 years, easing the pain of war.

Terrifying, heartbreaking, enlightening and, above all, honest; Red Clay on My Boots is a story hard to forget.

Robert "Doc" Topmiller is an Assistant Professor of History at Eastern Kentucky University and served as a corpsman with the 26th Marines Regimental Aid Station from January through July 1968.

Mike Archer, author of A Patch of Ground: Khe Sanh Remembered

Broken hearts, ruined minds, wrecked families, and shattered lives are all realities of the Vietnam War. Real people suffered because of the fighting, death, and tragedies that occurred at the battle of Khe Sanh. This is a story of a Vietnam corpsman immersed in the bloodiest, most confusing, and controversial battle of the Vietnam War.

As the war ends, the author tries to re-build his life but finds his mind and heart are still on the battlefield in Vietnam. How did this happen? Why did I survive? When will the nightmares end? Was it all for nothing? He has been fighting his own internal war for the last forty years. This is his story.

Robert Topmiller entered the U.S. Navy in 1966 at age seventeen and trained to be a Hospital Corpsman. He served in South Vietnam in 1968 with the 26th Marines during the battle of Khe Sanh.

Topmiller received his B.A. and M.A. from Central Washington University and his Ph.D. from the University of Kentucky. Currently, he serves as an Assistant Professor of History at Eastern Kentucky University where he teaches World History and the History of the Vietnam War.

Marine's statue stands tall in support of troops. Conklin man utilizes oak tree to create striking, 8-foot-tall tribute

'It's a tribute to our people in uniform. Regardless of your opinion on war, you've got to support them.'

Looking at Rick Correll's hand carved Marine statue, you sense how foolhardy it would be to challenge a real-life Marine on duty. The statue, more than life-sized and called "Semper Fi" looks something like Winston Churchill when he stared into the eyes of the Nazi war machine and backed it down. "I was calling him Winston for a while," said Correll, 56, of Woodcrest Way, a Marine during the Vietnam era. 'It's a tribute to our people in uniform. Regardless of your opinion on war, you've got to support them". I don't want the stuff that happened to us when we came home from Vietnam ... they called us baby-killers.' Well. People can have their minds made up, and it doesn't matter to me what your opinion is, just so you support our troops.'

The statue was carved from a large, old red oak tree that might have toppled into Correll's house during a storm. He liked the tree and had it trimmed back to a big stump. After a year he decided to have it carved. "I had Gordon Cook, of Whitney Point, come in, "Correll said. "It took him a couple of weeks, because he had to go back and work out his graphs and drawings. It took him as much prep time as the actual work. It's hand-carved, and with a chain saw." The 8-foot statue was finished June 5th Correll has since been applying sealer to protect it from the weather. Correll said the tree's roots are still in the ground, giving it a solid foundation He is working on night-time illumination, so he can fly the flag with his statue around the clock. "People are always stopping cars, and taking pictures, always taking pictures," he said. Some don't have to take pictures, though, and they are pleased about the statue. "Its awesome." said Rob McKay, one of Correll's neighbors. "From the beginning, when they took the tree down, we all thought it was a great idea: We knew he'd do it. And we thought, if his vision came to light, it would be perfect.

McKay said the statue improves the neighborhood, and it gets people thinking about things that should never be far from their minds. "Too often people see the military, and it's only on TV," he said. "But I think something like this statue keeps it in people's minds, that there are military living next door, there are military living in their neighborhood. It's here, not just on television. I'm proud to live next door to a Marine." The statue brings home what kind of people is living there, said McKay's daughter, Step, 15, for whom the statue has become a landmark as well as a lesson. "People first said, 'Oh, boy, what's it going to be? And now, a lot of my friends find my house by it," she said.

Rob McKay said he is encouraged by the people who come to look at the carving. 'They drive by, and they stop to look at the statue. It gives them a moment of reflection." Which seems to be what Correll hoped would happen. "We've got guys, right now, fighting and dying," he said. "They are people on guard for you. Without them, we're sunk."

OBIT

Michael Robin Lovett
D Co 3rd Recon KSV

Michael Robin Lovett, age 58, of Glen St. Mary, FL died Monday, March 12, 2007 in an automobile accident. Robin was born and raised in Jacksonville, FL and he was an avid surfer and musician from an early age. Following his 1966 graduation from Ribault High School, Robin joined the USMC where he proudly served in Company B, 2nd Recon Battalion, Special Forces in Vietnam. For his brave service in the Battle of Khe Sanh, Robin earned a Purple Heart and the prestigious Cross of Gallantry, along with numerous other military decorations.

Robin was proud to have worked his entire life exclusively as a professional musician. His musical career began at age 14 when his band, Robin & the Counts, performed onstage behind the Biff Burger on the corner of Soutel and Harborview in Jacksonville. After returning from Vietnam, Robin formed the local bands West and Strawberry Fair. With his brother Terry, Robin and Strawberry Fair toured up the east coast to New Hampshire, where they eventually settled and evolved into the band Fair Exchange. Fair Exchange was followed by The Lovett Brothers Band, an immensely popular band which toured New England for several years. Robin and Terry broke off to form the acoustic/electric duo, then trio.

The Lovett Brothers, with the addition of younger brother Marvin. When his brothers returned to Florida 1983, Robin performed as Manchester New Hampshire's favorite solo act for the next twenty years. During that time, Robin also formed the legendary BTC Jam Band, which played every Tuesday night at the Boston Trading Company for the better part of a decade. From 2000 to 2003, Robin played lead guitar and vocals with the ever-popular Grinning Lizards band, capping off his 20 year Northeastern tour. Robin's epic journey came full circle when he returned to his childhood home of Florida to be with his mother, his close-knit family, and the beaches that he loved.

Robin's kind soul and joyous spirit were cherished during his lifetime and will be tremendously missed by those fortunate enough to have been touched by his love. Family members include his wife, Michelle Lovett of Glen St. Mary, mother; Linteen Daymon of Jacksonville, seven children; David Lovett of Jacksonville Beach, Christopher Lovett, Ryan Lovett both of New Hampshire, Joshua Lovett, Zachary Maynard, Cheyenne Regnier and Jesse Regnier all of Glen St. Mary. Brothers; Terrell (Michelle) Lovett of Palm Harbor, Fl. Marvin Lovett of Clearwater, Fl. and Madison Lovett of Vero Beach, Fl. sisters; Sharon (Dave) Westcott of Macclenny and Linda Sorrentino of Mass. and grandson; Alexander Lovett all survive.

England Awards British Distinguished Flying Cross To Marine Major Serving With British Forces In Iraq

Marine Major William Chesare, left, is the first U.S. pilot to earn the British Distinguished Flying Cross since World War II. British army Pvt. Michelle Norris, right, became the first woman ever to be awarded the British Military Cross at the same ceremony.

England's Queen Elizabeth II awarded the British Distinguished Flying Cross to a U.S. pilot for the first time since World War II during a ceremony at Buckingham Palace in London on March 21, according to a Corps release. Marine Maj. William Chesarek was serving as an exchange officer with England's 847 Naval Air Squadron in Amarah, Iraq, last year when British forces on the ground came under "repeated attack from rocket-propelled grenades and small-arms fire from insurgents using large, hostile crowds for cover," the release said. Chesarek spent five hours flying overhead in a British Lynx helicopter identifying targets and covering the British troops on the ground, the release said. "Given the serious threat to the forces on the ground, and the inability to return fire given the crowds of protesters, Chesarek elected to fly repeated passes at very low level, under heavy small-arms fire and at least one near-miss from an RPG, in an attempt to distract and disperse the crowds," according to the release.

Chesarek is currently assigned to Marine Corps Forces Europe.

The "Walking Dead" Show Valor on Hill 689

The 1St Battalion 9Th Marines earned their nickname in Vietnam in a fight so fierce they were forced to leave men behind.

Reprinted from VFW Magazine Feb 2007
By Shannon Hanson

As the siege of Khe Sanh came to a close in mid-April 1968, elements of the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, held the high ground on Hill 689 a few miles away. It appeared that enemy units were returning to the area, as Marines had made contact with remnants of an NVA platoon on April 13 and 15. On the morning of the 16th, Capt. Henry D. Banks of A Company led two reinforced platoons totaling 85 men on a search-and-clear mission southwest of the perimeter on the hill. At 10 a.m., Banks ordered two squads to search a nearby ridge covered in four-to-six-foot elephant grass. They soon came under small-arms and sniper fire. The first Marine killed was Cpl. Robert H. Littlefield. David Ford remembered; "The first shot fired went through Littlefield and almost hit me. I thought he was going to live. Toward dark, I saw him still laying there, but by then he was dead:'

Banks deployed the company, with 1st Platoon establishing a base of fire and 2nd Platoon, led by 1st Lt. Michael P. Hayden, attacking up the ridge. NVA fired from well-concealed bunkers in a horseshoe shape and drove the Marines to the ground. "It appeared that when the 2nd Platoon had got into position to assault, that they [NVA] were just waiting for them, and just cut them down with small-arms fire: Banks said. Hayden said their only choice was to attack and take the hill, and under machine-gun cover, he led the charge. "We didn't move 15 feet when Lt Hayden got hit and was killed," said Sgt Paul J. Cogley "Suddenly, they opened up and everybody hit the ground. We stayed that way for a least an hour

Banks ordered the 2nd Platoon to fall back but the dead and wounded. were still within 10 feet of the enemy bunkers and could not be extracted. Casualties mounted, and soon 10 Marines had been killed, 20 wounded. At about noon, Lt Col John H. Cahill, commanding officer of 1st Battalion, ordered D Company under Capt. John W. Cargile, to assist A Company in evacuating the dead and wounded.

Heroism Abounds in C Company

Meanwhile, Cahill moved out with two platoons of C Company, led by Capt. Lawrence Himmer, to sweep the bunker complex from the rear and clear out any enemy resistance. 2nd Lt. David O Carter of 2nd Platoon led the advance up the ridge. Enemy fire broke out from hidden fortified positions and Himmer, both platoon commanders and several squad leaders fell with wounds. "We got to the top of the hill—they were everywhere," Carter said. "They were dug in bunkers. I was hit three times. I went up there with 32 men, and only eight men didn't get hit we did one hell of a job up there. I think the only thing that saved us was basic aggressiveness"

PFC Eddie It Pritchett saved Carter's life. Himself wounded, Pritchett knocked Carter down to keep him from being hit, and placed him in a protected place. Pritchett then jumped into an NVA occupied emplacement and engaged them. He received the Bronze Stat After Carter and the platoon sergeant were wounded, Cpl Jose Ruiz took charge of the platoon. He rendered first aid to the wounded, regardless of the danger "He got down and gave each and every one of them the best medical care he could." Cpl John Kocsis said. "After this, he and his men continued on the assault There he gave his life by jumping in front of a wounded Marine to save his life." For his selfless bravery, Ruiz was posthumously awarded the Silver Stat Pfc. Mauro Martinez also showed battlefield bravery when he threw his body over Cpl William P. Holland to shield him from rounds and was mortally wounded. He received the Navy Cross. "He paid the supreme sacrifice in order that one of his buddies would live," read the award recommendation. C Company's valiant assault enabled A Company to extract all of its WIAs and most of its KIAs.

Not Enough Walking Bodies

By 3p.m.,A and C companies had suffered high casualties And were nearly immobilized in the elephant grass by enemy fire from the bunker complexes. Cahill ordered D Company to deploy along A Company's right flank and attack across the ridge. The company advanced, but with the deep grass and enemy fire, progress was slow with casualties mounting. "Our movement in any forward direction was nominal due to intense fire and extremely accurate sniper fire," Capt Cargile said. "We were receiving sniper fire from two to three directions. Still, we could not pinpoint the source. The snipers were very good. Four out of my five KIAs had been shot in the head." After learning of D Company's heavy casualties at 5:30 p.m., Cahill ordered the battalion to extract the wounded and any KIA's they could, and pull back. Cahill was unaware that Gen. Rathvon Tompkins had issued a standing order that all KIAs should be evacuated. "We were forced to do something we had never done before—just leave bodies out to report people as missing," said 1st Lt Kenneth L Harman, executive officer of C Company "I don't feel this was through carelessness of the individuals. It was simply that there weren't enough walking bodies left to carry the limp bodies out."

Cahill said he felt that "additional Casualties would have resulted if I had chosen to remain on the hill. Plans were formulated by me to recover the KIA's on the 18th, but other plans by higher headquarters had been made preventing the battalion to do this job." H Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marines was sent in to recover the bodies several days later "This was a fierce fight," said David Brombaugh, who was part of the recovery operation. "We lost KIA and WIA in our unit. The bodies were in bad shape from the days left there, and many were mutilated. We got all the bodies the morning of the 22nd and walked back to The Sanh."

In total, the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines lost 43 killed in action on Hill 689 and 32 wounded. The 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marines sustained six KIA's and 55 WIA, in the recovery operation.

The Rescue of Cpl. Hunnicutt

The morning after the battle, on April 17, Marines heard the voice of Cpl. Hubert H. Hunnicutt III calling across the valley. He was wounded and taking shelter in a bomb crater. Volunteers in two CH-46 helicopters attempted to rescue him, but when they landed, they received heavy fire from NVA and found only decapitated and disemboweled bodies of Marines. A second rescue attempt shortly after yielded not Hunnicutt but a Pfc. G. Panyaninec.

Hunnicutt, meanwhile, crawled out of the crater and came upon Capt Himmer, who was still alive. Hunnicutt stayed with Himmer, receiving AK-47 fire in the leg, hand and elbow and playing dead for about five hours. He moved Himmer down the ridge, but they were separated when Hunnicutt fell into a gorge. The following morning, Hunnicutt yelled for help again. "About noon, an Army Huey started flying around me," he recalled. "It dropped two red smokes on me and scared me to death. I thought they were going to blow me away." Hunnicutt was rescued and received the Navy Cross for his efforts to save Himmer, who was never again seen alive.

MEMORIES (Web Chatter)

March 22, 1968
By Bruce Geiger
1/44th Arty (Dusters) A Btry

Those who were on the Khe Sanh Combat Base 39 years ago tonight will remember the heavy bombardment, officially recorded as the second heaviest of the siege (1100+rounds). Many will also remember the losses suffered by C Co 1/26. The company CP took a direct 122mm hit, killing Captain Walter 'Jack' Egger, Gunnery Sergeant John J. Grohman, First Lieutenant Paul W. Bush, Lance Corporal Stephen C. Shannon, and Private First Class Bennie J. Sisson. Although the horror of that night will remain with me forever, so will the bravery of the Marines, Soldiers, and corpsmen that assisted in rescuing many others from that burning bunker including Chuck Chamberlain who we have been fortunate to have with us for several recent reunions.

Bruce,

I, too, always think of this date and reflect back on that night. Just to share with other KSV members...GySgt Grohman shared a bunker with me near of one of your guns (quad .50?). The word was that we were going to get shelled that night at about 2200 and we might expect a ground assault as well. The Gunny said he thought it best that he go to the CP and be available should the CO need him. At about 2200, the company was manning the lines, awaiting whatever was to come. I clearly remember that the NVA were late in starting the shelling. According to my wrist watch, all hell broke loose at about 2210.

Just to keep the record straight, Sisson and Shannon were not in the CP bunker. They were in a bunker right in front of one of your guns about 30 yards from my bunker. There was a third marine in that bunker, junior, who got out without any serious injury aside from some hearing concerns from the explosion. Both bunkers were hit within 10-15 minutes of each other. I think that may have been the night that the ARVN Rangers had a probe on their lines. I recall the next day being clear, sunny and mild. A grim task excavating both bunkers and attending to the dead. Chuck Chamberlin was in the company bunker and was instrumental in getting the wounded out right after it was hit. As I recall, 5 gallon cans of fuel caught fire and there was the danger of ammo and grenades in the CP bunker cooking off. That was the second time during the Siege that Charlie Company's CP was hit. The first time the CO, Dave Ernst, was seriously wounded and the Bn SgtMajor, who was making the rounds, was killed.

Nick Romanetz
C Co 1/26

Bruce and Nick,

I too remember that night like it was yesterday. I was in our trench line alone of fighting positions checking with my squad member on watch when it happened. We were to the west of the CP. I remember vividly what sounded like a low flying aircraft landing directly to our front and down the side of the plateau, the next one was closer to our trench line but to our east approximately 50 meters the next one is the one that I believe hit the CP. It didn't sound like rockets to me it sounded more like artillery. I would venture to say that it came from Co Roc judging by the sound. I could be wrong but that was my impression that night and it still haunts me knowing that so many of our men lost their lives that night.

Steve Hecknauer
C Co 1/26

Steve,

I agree with you, I think the round was a 152 artillery from CoRoc. As you recall, that was a brand new "state of the art" bunker with a double roof. Unless it was a 122 rocket with a delay fuse, I think artillery is the right call.

Nick Romanetz

For The Record
By Chuck Chamberlin

I was fortunate to have survived both direct hits on the Charlie CP. Just wanted to mention that in the first hit, on February 15, one of my radio operators, L/Cpl. Joseph Bailey from Gainesville, NY was seriously wounded. He died of those wounds on February 19. Another of my radio operators, L/Cpl. John Mattern, was also badly burned and suffered shrapnel wounds in the second CP hit on March 22. Like I said, I was very lucky to be evacuated to the Repose, then to Japan, then home. A long time ago, but we'll always remember.

A Vietnam War project in Cowboy Country

By Richard Bernstein Published: March 25, 2007
The International Herald Tribune
All rights reserved

LUBBOCK, Texas: This low-slung, spread-out town in the Texas Panhandle would seem almost a foreigner's stereotype of cowboy America, a place where a tourist attraction is a prairie-dog park, the vehicle of choice is a four-door pickup, and the surrounding land supports some of the largest cotton and cattle farms in the world. Lubbock (metropolitan population about 250,000) is also the kind of conservative town likely to be supportive of a president during a time of war, and, indeed, it has more than its share of sons and daughters doing service in Iraq. The other day, the top story in the local press was the return home, after an eight-month tour of duty in Iraq, of a reserve transport battalion that is headquartered here.

And if the war in Iraq seems present and close in Lubbock, memories of that other terrible American war, Vietnam, are also keen in a town that has more than its share of Vietnam veterans. But there are more than memories here. Lubbock, home to Texas Tech University, a world-class institution with over 28,000 students, is the site of a fast-growing center that, after only 18 years of existence, boasts the largest documentary collection on the Vietnam War outside of the official, government-maintained National Archives in Washington. At a time when many are seeing the Iraq war as a kind of Vietnam in the desert, the Vietnam Project and its enormous documentary collection would seem especially valuable, and, no doubt, it is. But though the purpose of the project is clearly educational and scholarly, it is not uncontroversial. When a few years ago a former South Vietnamese ambassador to Washington, Bui Diem, came to speak here, for example, some members of the history department protested his presence on campus.

Today in Americas NY police spied on activists before 2004 convention Gonzales's congressional support wanes CIA awaits rules on questioning suspects Similarly, some experts on Vietnam have charged that the Vietnam Project, while ostensibly open to all points of view, is really "a right-wing think tank," as one writer put it, whose purpose is to rehabilitate the image of the former South Vietnamese government and to portray the American war in Indochina as a noble effort. In other words, even as the Iraq war inspires a certain emotion in Lubbock, the Vietnam Project stokes some of the intensity of feeling that the Vietnam War still provokes in the country at large, 32 years after the war ended there in a Communist victory.

The Vietnam Project is the brainchild of a remarkable academic entrepreneur named James Reckner, who, decades ago, served two tours of duty in Vietnam, advising the South Vietnamese Army in riverine warfare. Reckner's academic specialty is Theodore Roosevelt and the development of American naval power, but he started the Vietnam Project in 1989 when he began teaching a course on the Vietnam War and discovered that the university possessed very little material on it.He gathered a band of local veterans, and the archive was born. The first documents in the collection were a bundle of letters, the envelopes still caked with the mud of Khe Sanh, that a Lubbock resident, Dan Siewart, sent to his mother. "At that point, the whole archive sat in my hand," Reckner recalls. Now there are some 20 million pages of documents, including a 12,000-volume library, some 500 oral histories of former American soldiers who saw duty in Vietnam, and thousands of carefully catalogued boxes of other things, from North Vietnamese propaganda materials, to American after-battle reports, to comic books showing public attitudes toward the war.

Reckner is particularly proud of what he deems to be his inclusive approach to the Vietnam War, and he has numerous examples. Former South Vietnamese officials and current North Vietnamese generals have met each other at his twice-annual conferences, during which last year there were presentations by both the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth (the group that opposed John Kerry's presidential candidacy) and the Vietnam Veterans Against the War. William Westmoreland, who commanded American troops in Vietnam, has spoken here, and so has Daniel Ellsberg, who leaked the Pentagon Papers to the press.

Reckner is also proud of the several hundred scholarships sponsored by the Vietnam Project that enabled poor Vietnamese and Cambodian youths to go to college in their home countries. He brings young American groups to Vietnam even as Texas Tech has become one of the chief places where Vietnamese students study in the United States. And yet, clearly, what he feels as the unwelcoming attitude of some of his colleagues in the history department saddens Reckner - and makes him angry. "I've attracted $10 million in donations for the Vietnam Project, and the history department does its best to ignore its existence," he said.

Perhaps what is at the bottom of the different views at Texas Tech is not so much the Vietnam War itself but the deeper cultural conflicts that were aroused by the war - the conservative sense of patriotism that is almost palpable in a place like Lubbock, contrasted with the cult of personal liberation and general critique of American foreign policy that emerged from the antiwar movement of the 1960s.

In this sense, Reckner remembers when he met Nguyen Vinh Uoc, a senior military leader in Hanoi and one of the North Vietnamese officials who has spoken at Texas Tech. "I told him, 'You and I have more in common than I have with some American people who favored your side during the war,' " Reckner said. "Devotion to duty, respect for the chain of command, and dedication to service. "The American Kulturkampf, in other words, continues and is deeply felt, even though it so far has not been at the center of the intensifying and ever more emotional arguments taking place in this country about the Iraq conflict and whether to stay in it, or to leave. That of course could change. In the meantime, when future historians study the personal side of the Iraq war, they will, if Reckner has anything to say in the matter, come right to Lubbock. Quietly, he has already begun to collect materials on the Iraq conflict - beginning with some 135 linear feet, or 41 meters, of FBI materials on terrorism

A WARM AFTERNOON

By Craig W Tourte
HQ Btry 1/13

I hadn't seen my friend Tommy (Louie) Horchler (HQ Btry 1/13) for quite some and as it turns out, it was one of those days when I just had to get out of town for a little peace of mind. A person can go nuts sitting around for too long, and besides I just felt the need to once again connect to a brother. I know that if things get kind of crazy around here I can always slip up to Chico and be around the brothers and feel at ease, kind of recharge the old batteries and I knew that Tom would be happy to welcome me anytime. He lives on the top of a mountain on 27 beautiful acres of heavenly peace and quiet. Amongst fields of dark green grass and beautiful old growth oak trees. A far cry from where we both served so many years ago.

It was about 0745hrs. and I telephoned Steve Wiese (B/1/26) knowing that he would probably not be doing much himself this day. His wife told me that Steve was still asleep so I suggested that she wake him up because I was sure he would want to take the hour and a half drive with me up to Tom's little farm. I had taken Steve and some other Khe Sanh Veterans up to Tom's a couple of years ago for a mini-reunion and we all had a great time.

The sky was a bright blue with not a cloud visible anywhere, the weather was mild and there was little traffic on the mostly one lane road heading north to Tom's house. As usually, Tom was happy to see us and we were welcomed with open arms and hugs all around. We sat for a couple of hours just kind of shooting the breeze, talking about our time at Khe Sanh and others that we had known. We talked about the upcoming reunion and how much we were looking forward to renewing old acquaintances and making new ones. Tom made lunch for us, another perfect meal as always and then it was time to say goodbye. It's always a little rough to say goodbye to the ones you love and saying goodbye to my friend Tom is never easy. But I'll be back soon.

I felt privileged to be able to ride with Steve Wiese, one of the few survivors of the Ghost Patrol. I think Steve is one of the bravest and most humble individuals I have ever known. I rate Steve right up there with the very few real heroes I have known. Not necessarily for his actions during the Ghost Patrol, but for his 18 months of real combat experience in and around the hills of Khe Sanh.

Last month a local television station did a two or three day segment on PTSD. Steve was featured on the segment and did an outstanding job representing us Khe Sanh Veterans. I was very impressed and telephoned the lady who did the interview. I wanted her to know a little of Steve's background and that Steve was not embellishing his experiences. I didn't tell Steve I had done this nor did I ask for his permission. Anyway, about halfway home from Tom's house Steve told me that the lady who interviewed him had told him that I had called. I didn't respond and waited for Steve to continue. He didn't say anything else; there was just that moment of silence. I told Steve that those of us who served at Khe Sanh and knew of the Ghost Patrol were aware of how difficult it was, and that I thought he deserved what little recognition he and the others received. I dropped Steve off at his house and we talked about getting together for dinner with our wives and then said the usual goodbyes.

I like those little pauses in my life, where I can take a minute or longer to think about those I truly love. To say a little thank you for having had the privilege of knowing people who are truly special. I take that pause, that moment, after every Khe Sanh reunion. It was a wonderful end to a warm afternoon.

USS Jason Dunham (DDG 109)

Submitted By Mike Fishbaugh
FLC-FLSG

WASHINGTON (NNS) -- The Department of Navy announced March 23 that the Navy's newest Arleigh Burke-class guided-missile destroyer will be USS Jason Dunham (DDG 109), honoring the late Cpl. Jason L. Dunham, the first Marine awarded the Medal of Honor for Operation Iraqi Freedom.

The Secretary of the Navy, the Honorable Donald C. Winter, made the announcement in Dunham's hometown of Scio, N.Y.

"Jason Dunham, the friendly, kind-hearted, gifted athlete who followed his star in the United States Marine Corps went on to become one of the most courageous, heroic, and admired Marines this great country has ever known," said Winter. "His name will be forever associated with DDG 109. May those who serve in her always be inspired by the heroic deeds of Jason Dunham, and may all of us strive to be worthy of his sacrifice."

Dunham was born in Scio on Nov., 10, 1981, sharing the same birthday as the United States Marine Corps. After high school graduation, he enlisted in the Marine Corps in July 2000, and completed recruit training 13 weeks later at Marine Corps Recruit Depot Parris Island.

Following his first duty assignment with Marine Corps Security Forces, Kings Bay, Ga., Dunham transferred to the infantry and was later assigned to Company K, 3rd Battalion, 7th Marines, based in Twenty nine Palms, Calif. Before deploying to Iraq in spring of 2004, Dunham was selected to lead a rifle squad -- a position that ultimately placed him on the front line in the war with the Iraqi insurgency.

On April 14, 2004, Dunham's squad was conducting a reconnaissance mission in Karabilah, Iraq, when his battalion commander's convoy was ambushed. When Dunham's squad approached to provide fire support, an Iraqi insurgent leapt out of a vehicle and attacked Dunham. As Dunham wrestled the insurgent to the ground, he noticed that the enemy fighter had a grenade in his hand. Dunham immediately alerted his fellow Marines, and when the enemy dropped the live grenade, Dunham took off his Kevlar helmet, covered the grenade, and threw himself on top to smother the blast. In an ultimately selfless act of courage, in which he was mortally wounded, he saved the lives of two fellow Marines.

In November 2006, at the dedication of the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Va., President Bush announced that the Medal of Honor would be awarded posthumously to Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham.
During his speech, Bush said, "As long as we have Marines like Cpl. Dunham, America will never fear for her liberty." President Bush presented Cpl. Dunham's family with the Medal of Honor during a ceremony in the East Room of the White House on Jan. 11.

In the spirit of this Marine, USS Jason Dunham will continue protecting America's liberty by providing a dynamic multi-mission platform to lead the Navy into the future. Utilizing a gas-turbine propulsion system, the ship can operate independently or as part of carrier strike groups, surface action groups, amphibious ready groups, and underway replenishment groups. The ship's combat systems center on the Aegis combat system and the SPY-Ld (V) multifunction phased array radar. With the combination of Aegis, the vertical launching system, an advanced anti-submarine warfare system, advanced anti-aircraft missiles and Tomahawk cruise missiles, the Arleigh Burke-class continues the revolution at sea.

MY JOURNEY TO HAVING A FAMILY

By Sara Scudder

In order to tell the story of two very wonderful people who came into my life nearly seven years ago, it is necessary to give you a little background information. I was born and grew up in Alaska. My aunt and uncle would come to visit a few times over the years. I knew them as Aunt Pat and Uncle Scoot. They would bring my cousins and I T-shirts with our nicknames printed on them, fruit, cookies etc. We loved it when they came to visit we had so much fun with them. We would go fishing and camping, things that our families didn't do with us.

Eventually I got put into foster care for a few years and was scheduled to get adopted by a native family. My case worker informed me that my Aunt Pat and Uncle Scoot had contacted her and were also interested in being foster parents. I thought back to the times that I traveled with my family to visit them in Oregon. It was like a completely different country. Not at all like Alaska, it was warm and always green with vegetation. I immediately agreed, since I would still be in the family.

I went to visit them on Easter weekend. It was different than I had remembered, maybe because I had done a lot of growing up in the last few years. They welcomed me into their home and showed me what a real family was like. Soon after that I moved to Oregon to live with them.

You'd think my story would end there with a happily ever after, but this was just the beginning. The first time I heard the words Post Traumatic Stress Disorder they didn't mean a lot to me, just a bunch of words that an eleven year old tried to understand. Aunt Pat and Uncle Scoot explained it to me, and I thought I understood, but until you start living with someone who has PTSD, and you witness what it has done to them, you don't fully understand. It was really hard to enter a home where everyone except you have been living with PTSD and understood its symptoms. I had to learn by living in it, to understand it, and work around it the best I could.

About a year after moving to Oregon a wonderful thing happened, they decided they wanted to adopt me. Aunt Pat and Uncle Scoot became my Dad and Mom. We had a few hard times, but the good times outweighed the hard times. We went hunting and fishing, and a few years ago we started attending the Khe Sanh Veterans annual reunions.

My Dad is Lloyd Scudder (Shortround) and my mom is Pat Scudder. At our first reunion I was reserved, just absorbing things that took place. Some might have thought it as being rude, but hanging back was my way of learning. I learned a lot about my Dad and the men he served with in Vietnam. I learned their sacrifices, brotherhood, PTSD, and how my Dad got to be how he is now.

The next year we went to Dallas, Texas for the reunion, and I remember feeling extremely safe, and at home around all my Dad's brothers. The Khe Sanh Veterans made my whole family feel stronger. We now know that my Dad isn't alone in the things he has to deal with, and that my Mom and I aren't alone in helping him to deal with the past. Members of The Khe Sanh Veterans offered a helping hand, and we have taken them up on the offer more than once.

I am extremely thankful to my parents and The Khe Sanh Veterans for helping me heal a broken heart from my childhood. They have helped me break down walls I put up before moving down to the lower forty eight. I better understand the words Post Traumatic Stress Disorder, though I cannot fully explain it to someone who isn't themselves familiar with it.

The 2007 reunion in Washington DC will be my last reunion for awhile, as I am headed off to Oregon State University, where I will major in Medical Technology. I want to thank The Khe Sanh Veterans for being so supportive, and I'd especially like to thank my Mom and Dad, the most wonderful people that have come into my life .

"HEEDING GOD's CALL"

By Fr Daniel Kelley Jr.
CAC-O USMC KSV

Fellow Khe Sanh Veterans,

The month of April will be a busy one for me. I will come out of my preferred "monastic" seclusion of living with my daughter: I will visit my friend Nancy B. in Kimberly, Wisconsin for a week. Then, I will be off to Elgin, Illinois to visit my son and his family for several days. I return to Indianapolis (Carmel) for my grandson's birthday (He will be two years old on April 14th. Then, I will be off to Mt. Michael Monastery in Omaha, Nebraska to visit a monk friend who will profess his final monastic vows. I will also take advantage of the eight days there for a spiritual retreat. Then finally, I go to Chicago on April 26th for my flight to Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam, an 18 hour flight arriving on April 27th at Tan Son Nhat Airport in Saigon.

I am now receiving Social Security which has enabled me to fund the air-fare to Saigon and to live there. I will set aside money from future S.S. checks for my return home airplane ticket. I will be on a limited budget but I trust in our God.

The decision to go now "seems" right. While I have felt very comfortable living with my daughter's family, I sense it is time to take the next step in God's plan for me. I have been cautious over the years but our God "seems" to be pushing me in the direction of returning to Vietnam. I do sense what is ahead and trust in our God that he will provide in spite of the difficulties I may encounter.

I have spent these past weeks going through old computer back up files and organizing them: reading past communications, deleting redundant files, and adding files. It is amazing the copious number of files that I have accumulated on Khe Sanh, Vietnam, the Bru montagnards, and such Vietnam topics as language, culture, religion and current events over these past none years.

In this process, both trips (February 2005 and August 2006) have provided me with a realistic sense of what I can expect when I live there. I plan to stay with Trung Nguyen's family in Saigon from May until August 2007. My main objective is to develop a conversational ability in Vietnamese. I have been studying Vietnamese on and off for several years. I have developed an English- Vietnamese- Spanish- (some) French glossary database with about 8,000 plus entries so far. This has helped me to acquire some basic reading and writing skills in Vietnamese. I have had limited practice though in listening and speaking in Vietnamese, so I am hoping this trip will enable me to develop these conversational skills.

I have already sent my tourist visa information to "TTT Pro Expert" in Chicago to be processed. If I can resolve the visa issue while I am there in Saigon, I will stay for a year. There are several options: Option 1) I have chatted on the internet with a Filipino teacher working in an international school in Saigon. Every three months he goes over to Cambodia in the morning. In the afternoon he returns to Vietnam with his new tourist visa. Option

2) I can get a sponsor, either a volunteer organization or commercial company, which would hire me to work for them which would entitle me to a long term work visa. Though my major goal is to pick up conversational skills in Vietnamese initially, I will also look for work, whether it be to teach English or do volunteer work. I have some internet contacts (e.g., teaching English to a Christian group) that I will pursue when I arrive there.

If I am able to extend my time in Vietnam beyond three or four months, I will attempt to go back up to Quang Tri and Thua Thien – Hue Provinces. I have read on the internet that Hue University has studies and projects with ethnic minorities. I am hoping to be able to visit Hue University and makes some contacts there. I still marvel that I was able to make the trip to Thailand and Vietnam in Feb.-March 2005, again God's mysterious plan. .

MEMOIRS

SMALL UNIT ACTION IN VIETNAM
By Captain Francis J. West, Jr., USMCR

THE BATTLE FOR HILL 488
"HOWARD'S HILL"

Preface: The author was on another patrol the night of the Howard fight. He met with the men of Charlie Company, who relieved Howard's platoon, immediately upon their return and taped their comments and reactions. Then he went to the hospital at Chulai and interviewed Howard and his men, talking later with the pilots, the Special Forces officers, and Howard's company and battalion commanders.

The Marine Corps has a tested tradition: it will never leave alone on the field of combat one of its fighting men. It will go to fantastic lengths and commit to battle scores of men to aid and protect a few. This is the story of a few such Marines, of the battle they fought, and the help they received from all the services, not just the Marine Corps. Some 20 miles inland to the west of the Marine base at Chulai runs a range of steep mountains and twisting valleys. In that bandits' lair, the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese could train and plan for attacks against the heavily populated seacoast hamlets, massing only when it was time to attack. In early June of 1966, the intelligence reports reaching III MAF headquarters indicated that a mixed force of Viet Cong and North Vietnamese was gathering by the thousands in those mountains. But the enemy leaders were not packing their troops into a few large, vulnerable assembly points; they kept their units widely dispersed, moving mainly in squads and platoons.

To frustrate that scheme and keep the enemy off balance, the Marines launched Operation KANSAS, an imaginative concept in strategy. Rather than send full infantry battalions to beat the bushes in search of small enemy bands, Lieutenant General Lewis W. Walt detailed the reconnaissance battalion of the 1st Marine Division to scout the mountains. The reconnaissance Marines would move in small teams of 8 to 20 men. If they located a large enemy concentration, Marine infantry would be flown in. If, as was expected, they saw only numerous small groups of Viet Cong and North Vietnamese, they were to smash them by calling in air and artillery strikes.

Lieutenant Colonel Arthur J. Sullivan had set high training standards for his battalion. Every man had received individual schooling in forward observer techniques and reconnaissance patrol procedures. He was confident his men could perform the mission successfully, despite the obvious hazards. "The Vietnam war," he said, "has given the small-unit leader -- the corporal, the sergeant, the lieutenant -- a chance to be independent. The senior officers just can't be out there looking over their shoulders. You have to have confidence in your junior officers and NCOs." One such NCO was Staff Sergeant Jimmie Earl Howard, acting commander of the 1st Platoon, Charlie Company, 1st Reconnaissance Battalion. A tall, well-built man in his mid-thirties, Howard had been a star football player and later a coach at the San Diego Recruit Depot. Leadership came naturally to him. "Howard was a very personable fellow," his company commander, Captain Tim Geraghty said. "The men liked him. They liked to work for him." In Korea he had been wounded three times and awarded the Silver Star for bravery. In Vietnam he would receive a fourth Purple Heart and be recommended for the Medal of Honor.

As dusk fell on the evening of 13 June 1966, a flight of helicopters settled on the slope of Hill 488, 25 miles west of Chulai. Howard and his 17 men jumped out and climbed the steep incline to the top. The hill, called Nui Vu, rose to a peak of nearly 1,500 feet and dominated the terrain for miles. Three narrow strips of level ground ran along the top for several hundred yards before falling abruptly away. Seen from the air, they roughly resembled the three blades on an airplane propeller. Howard chose the blade which pointed north for his command post and placed observation teams on the other two blades. It was an ideal vantage point.

The enemy knew it also. Their foxholes dotted the ground, each with a small shelter scooped out two feet under the surface. Howard permitted his men use of these one-man caves during the day to avoid the hot sun and enemy detection. There was no other cover or concealment to be found. There were no trees, only knee-high grass and small scrub growth. In the surrounding valleys and villages, there were many enemies. For the next two days, Howard was constantly calling for fire missions, as members of the platoon saw small enemy groups almost every hour. Not all the requests for air and artillery strikes were honored. Sullivan was concerned lest the platoon's position, so salient and bare, be spotted by a suspicious enemy. Most of the firing at targets located by the platoon was done only when there was an observation plane circling in the vicinity to decoy the enemy.

After two days Sullivan and his executive officer, Major Allan Harris, became alarmed at the risk involved in leaving the platoon stationary any longer. But the observation post was ideal; Howard had encountered no difficulty, and, in any case, thought he had a secure escape route along a ridge to the east. So it was decided to leave the platoon on Nui Vu for one more day. However, the enemy was well aware of the platoon's presence. (Sullivan has a theory that the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese, long harassed, disrupted, and punished by reconnaissance units in territory they claimed to control absolutely, had determined to eliminate one such unit, hoping thereby to demoralize the others. Looked at in hindsight, the ferocity and tenacity of the attack upon Nui Vu gives credence to the colonel's theory.) In any case, the North Vietnamese made their preparations well and did not tip their hand.

On 15 June, they moved a fresh, well-equipped, highly trained battalion to the base of Nui Vu. In late afternoon hundreds of the enemy started to climb up the three blades, hoping to annihilate the dozen and a half Marines in one surprise attack. The Army Special Forces frustrated that plan. Sergeant 1st Class Donald Reed and Specialist 5th Class Hardey Drande were leading a platoon of CIDG (Civilian Irregular Defense Group) forces on patrol near Nui Vu that same afternoon. They saw elements of the North Vietnamese battalion moving towards the hill and radioed the news back to their base camp at Hoi An, several miles to the south. Howard's radio was purposely set on the same frequency and so he was alerted at the same time. Reed and Drande wanted to hit the enemy from the rear and disrupt them, but had to abandon the idea when they suddenly found themselves a very unpopular minority of two on the subject. Describing the reactions of the Special Forces NCOs later, Howard could not resist chuckling. "The language those sergeants used over the radio," he said, "When they realized they couldn't attack the PAVNs, well, they sure didn't learn it at communications school."

Even though the Special Forces were not able to provide the ground support they wished to, their warning alerted Howard and enabled him to develop a precise defensive plan before the attack was launched. Acting on the report, Howard gathered his team leaders, briefed them on the situation, selected an assembly point, and instructed them to stay on full alert and to withdraw to the main position at the first sign of an approaching enemy. The corporals and lance corporals crept back to their teams and briefed them in the growing dusk. The Marines then settled down to watch and wait. Lance Corporal Ricardo Binns had placed his observation team on the slope 40 meters forward of Howard's position. At approximately 2200, while the four Marines were lying in a shallow depression discussing in whispers their sergeant's solemn warnings, Binns quite casually propped himself up on his elbows and placed his rifle butt in his shoulder. Without saying a word, he pointed the barrel at a bush and fired. The bush pitched backward and fell thrashing 12 feet away.

The other Marines jumped up. Each threw a grenade, before grabbing his rifle and scrambling up the hill. Behind them grenades burst and automatic weapons pounded away. The battle of Nui Vu was on. The other outposts withdrew to the main position. The Marines commanded a tiny rock-strewn knoll. The rocks would provide some protection for the defenders. Placing his two radios behind a large boulder, Howard set up a tight circular perimeter, not over 20 meters in diameter, and selected a firing position for each Marine.

The North Vietnamese too were setting up. They had made no audible noises while climbing. There was no talking, no clumsy movements. When Binns killed one of their scouts, they were less than 50 meters from the top. The Marines were surrounded. From all sides the enemy threw grenades. Some bounced off the rocks; some rolled back down the slopes; some did not explode, but some landed right on Marines and did explode. The next day the platoon corpsman, Billee Don Holmes, recalled: "They were within twenty feet of us. Suddenly there were grenades all over. Then people started hollering. It seemed everyone got hit at the same time. "Holmes crawled forward to help. A grenade exploded between him and a wounded man. Holmes lost consciousness.

The battle was going well for the North Vietnamese. Four .50 caliber machine guns were firing in support of the assault units, their heavy explosive projectiles arcing in from the four points of the compass. Red tracer rounds from light machine guns streaked toward the Marine position, pointing the direction for reinforcements gathering in the valley. 60mm mortar shells smashed down and added rock splinters to the metal shrapnel whining through the air. The North Vietnamese followed up the grenade shower with a full, well-coordinated assault, directed and controlled by shrill whistles and the clacking of bamboo sticks. From different directions, they rushed the position at the same time, firing automatic weapons, throwing grenades, and screaming. Howard later said he hadn't been sure how his troops would react. They were young and the situation looked hopeless. They had been shocked and confused by the ferocity of the attack and the screams of their own wounded. But they reacted savagely. The first lines of enemy skirmishers were cut down seconds after they stood up and exposed themselves. The assault failed to gain momentum any place and the North Vietnamese in the rearward ranks had more sense than to copy the mistakes of the dead.

Having failed in their swift charge, they went to earth and probed the perimeter, seeking a weak spot through which they could drive. To do this, small bands of the enemy tried to crawl quite close to a Marine, and then overwhelm him with a burst of fire and several grenades. But the Marines too used grenades and the American hand grenade contains twice the blast and shrapnel effect of the Chinese Communist stick grenade. The Marines could throw farther and more accurately than the enemy. A Marine would listen for a movement, gauge the direction and distance, pull the pin, and throw. High pitched howls and excited jabbering mingled with the blasts. The North Vietnamese pulled back to regroup.

Howard had taken the PRC-25 radio from one of his communicators, Corporal Robert Lewis Martinez, and during the lull contacted Captain Geraghty and Lieutenant Colonel Sullivan. With his escape route cut off and his force facing overwhelming odds, Howard kept his message simple. "You've got to get us out of here," he said. "There are too many of them for my people." Sullivan tried. Because of his insistence upon detailed preplanning of extraction and fire support contingencies, he was a well-known figure at the Direct Air Support Center of the 1st Marine Division and when he called near midnight, he did not bandy words. He wanted flare ships, helicopters, and fixed wing aircraft dispatched immediately to Nui Vu. Somehow, the response was delayed. And shortly after midnight, the enemy forces gathered and rushed forward in strength a second time. The Marines threw the last of their grenades and fired their rifles semiautomatic, relying on accuracy to suppress volume. It did and the enemy fell back, but by that time every Marine had been wounded.

The living took the ammunition of the dead and lay under a moonless sky, wondering about the next assault. Although he did not tell anyone, Howard doubted they could repel a massed charge by a determined enemy. From combat experience, he knew too that the enemy, having been badly mauled twice, would listen for sounds which would indicate his force had been shattered or demoralized before surging forward again. Already up the slopes were floating the high, singsong taunts Marines had heard at other places in other wars. Voices which screeched: "Marines -- you die tonight!" and "Marines, you die in an hour." Members of the platoon wanted to return the compliments. "Sure," said Howard, "go ahead and yell anything you want." And the Marines shouted back down the slopes all the curses and invectives they could remember from their collective repertoire. The North Vietnamese screamed back, giving Howard the opportunity to deliver a master stroke in psychological one-upmanship. "All right," he shouted. "Ready? Now!" And all the Marines laughed and laughed and laughed at the enemy.

The North Vietnamese did not mount a third major attack and at 0100 an Air Force flare ship, with the poetic call sign of "Smoky Gold," came on station overhead. Howard talked to the pilot through his radio and the plane dropped its first flare. The mountainside was lit up. The Marines looked down the slopes. Lance Corporal Ralph Glober Victor stared, then muttered: "Oh my God, look at them." The others weren't sure it wasn't a prayer. North Vietnamese reinforcements filled the valley. Twenty-year-old Private First Class Joseph Kosoglow described it vividly: "There were so many, it was just like an ant hill ripped apart. They were all over the place."

They shouldn't have been. Circling above the mountain were attack jets and armed helicopters. With growing frustration, they had talked to Howard but could not dive to the attack without light. Now they had light. They swarmed in. The jets first concentrated on the valley floor and the approaches to Nui Vu, loosing rockets which hissed down and blanketed large areas. Then those fast, dangerous helicopters -- the Hueys -- scoured the slopes. At altitudes as low as 20 feet, they skimmed the brush, firing their machine guns in long, sweeping bursts. The Hueys pulled off to spot for the jets, and again the planes dipped down, releasing bombs and napalm. Then the Hueys scurried back to pick off stragglers, survey the damage, and direct another run. One of the platoon's communicators, Corporal Martinez, said it in two sentences: "The Hueys were all over the place. The jets blocked the Viet Cong off." Two Hueys stayed over Howard's position all night; when one helicopter had to return to home base and refuel, another would be sent out.

The Huey pilots, Captain John M. Shields and Captain James M. Perryman, Jr., performed dual roles -- they were the Tactical Air Controllers Airborne (TACAs) who directed the bomb runs of the jets and they themselves strafed the enemy. The North Vietnamese tried unsuccessfully to shoot the helicopters down and did hit two out of the four Hueys alternating on station.

By the light of the flares, the jet pilots could see the hill mass and distinguish prominent terrain features but could not spot Howard's perimeter. To mark specific targets for the jets, the TACAs directed "Smoky" to drop flares right on the ground as signal lights and then called the jets down to pulverize the spot. Howard identified his position by flicking a red-filtered flashlight on and off, and, guiding on that mark, the Huey pilots strafed within 25 meters of the Marines. Still on the perimeter itself the fight continued. In the shifting light of the flares, the pilots were fearful of hitting the Marines and had to leave some space unexposed to fire in front of the Marines' lines. Into this space crawled the North Vietnamese. For the Marines it was a war of hide and seek. Having run out of grenades, they had to rely on cunning and marksmanship to beat the attackers. Howard had passed the word to fire only at an identified target -- and then only one shot at a time. The enemy fired all automatic weapons; the Marines replied with single shots. The enemy hurled grenades; the Marines threw back rocks.

It was a good tactic. A Marine would hear a noise and toss a rock in that general direction. The North Vietnamese would think it was a grenade falling and dive for another position. The Marine would roll or crawl low to a spot from which he could sight in on the position, and wait. In a few seconds, the North Vietnamese would raise his head to see why the grenade had not exploded. The Marine would fire one round. The range was generally less than 30 feet. The accuracy of this fire saved the life of Corpsman Holmes. When he regained consciousness after a grenade had knocked him out, he saw a North Vietnamese dragging away the dead Marine beside him. Then another enemy reached over and grasped him by the cartridge belt. The soldier tugged at him. Lance Corporal Victor was lying on his stomach behind a rock. He had been hit twice by grenades since the first flare had gone off and could scarcely move. He saw an enemy soldier bending over a fallen Marine. He sighted in and fired. The man fell backward. He saw a second enemy tugging at another Marine's body. He sighted in again and fired. Shot between the eyes, the North Vietnamese slumped dead across Billee Holmes' chest. He pushed the body away and crawled back to the Marines' lines. His left arm was lanced with shrapnel, and his face was swollen and his head ringing from the concussion of the grenade. For the rest of the night, he crawled from position to position, bandaging and encouraging the wounded, and between times firing at the enemy. occasionally the flares would flicker out and the planes would have to break off contact to avoid crashing. In those instances, artillery under the control of the Special Forces and manned by Vietnamese gun crews would fill in the gap and punish any enemy force gathering at the base of Nui Vu."Stiff Balls," Howard had radioed the Special Forces camp at Hoi An, three miles south. "If you can keep Charlie from sending another company up here, I'll keep these guys out of my position." "Roger, Carnival Time." Captain Louis Maris, of the Army Special Forces, had replied, using Howard's own peculiar call sign. Both sides kept their parts of the bargain and the South Vietnamese crews who manned the 105mm howitzers threw in concentration after concentration of accurate artillery shells.

"Howard was talking on the radio. He was cool," Captain John Blair, the Special Forces commanding officer, recalled afterwards. "He stayed calm all the way through that night. But," he chuckled, "he never did get our call sign right!" In the periods of darkness, each Marine fought alone. How some of them no one died know. But the relieving force hours later found one Marine lying propped up against a rock. In front of him lay a dead enemy soldier. The muzzles of their weapons were touching each others' chests. Two Marine entrenching tools were recovered near a group of mangled North Vietnamese; both shovels were covered with blood. One Marine was crumpled beneath a dead enemy. Beside him lay another Vietnamese. The Marine was bandaged around the chest and head. His hand still clasped the hilt of a knife buried in the back of the soldier on top of him.

At 0300, a flight of H34 helicopters whirled over Nui Vu and came in to extract the platoon. So intense was the fire they met that they were unable to land and Howard was told he would have to fight on until dawn. Shortly thereafter, a ricochet struck Howard in the back. His voice over the radio faltered and died out. Those listening -- the Special Forces personnel, the pilots, and the high ranking officers of the 1st Marine Division at Chulai -- all thought the end had come. Then Howard's voice came back strong. Fearing the drowsing effect morphine can have, he refused to let Holmes administer the drug to ease the pain. Unable to use his legs, he pulled himself from hole to hole encouraging his men and directing their fire. Wherever he went, he dragged their lifeline -- the radio.

Binns, the man whose shot had triggered the battle, was doing likewise. Despite severe wounds, he crawled around the perimeter, urging his men to conserve their ammunition, gathering enemy weapons and grenades for the Marines' use, giving assistance wherever needed. None of the Marines kept track of the time. "I'll tell you this," said Howard, "you know that movie -- The Longest Day? Well, compared to our night on the hill, The Longest Day was just a twinkle in the eye." But the longest night did pass and dawn came. Howard heralded its arrival. At 0525 he shouted, "O.K., you people, reveille goes in 35 minutes." At exactly 0600, his voice pealed out, "Reveille, reveille.'" It was the start of another day and the perimeter had held. On all sides of their position, the Marines saw enemy bodies and equipment. The North Vietnamese would normally have raked the battlefield clean but so deadly was the Marine fire that they left unclaimed many of those who fell close to the perimeter. The firing had slacked off. Although badly mauled themselves, the enemy still had the Marines ringed in and did not intend to leave. Nor did haste make them foolhardy. They knew what the jets and the Hueys and the artillery and the Marine sharp shooting would do to them on the bare slopes in daylight. They slipped into holes and waited, intending to attack with more troops the next night.

Bursts of fire from light machine guns chipped the rocks above the Marines' heads. Firing uphill from concealed foxholes, the enemy could cut down any Marine who rose up and silhouetted himself against the skyline. Two of the .50 caliber machine guns were still firing sporadically. There came a lull in the firing. A Huey buzzed low over the hillcrest, while another gunship hovered to one side, ready to pounce if the enemy took the bait. No one fired. The pilot, Major William J. Goodsell, decided to mark the position for a medical evacuation by helicopter. His Huey fluttered slowly down and hovered. Howard thought the maneuver too risky and said so. But Goodsell had run the risk and come in anyway. He dropped a smoke grenade. Still no fire. He waved to the relieved Howard and skimmed north over the forward slope, only 10 feet above the ground. The noise of machine guns drowned out the sound of the helicopter's engines. Tracers flew toward the Huey from all directions. The helicopter rocked and veered sharply to the right and zigzagged down the mountain. The copilot, First Lieutenant Stephen Butler, grabbed the stick and brought the crippled helicopter under control, crash landing in a rice paddy several miles to the east.

The pilots were picked up by their wingman. But Major Goodsell, who had commanded Squadron VMO-6 for less than one week, died of gunshot wounds before they reached the hospital. The medical pickup helicopter did not hesitate. It came in. Frantically, Howard waved it off. He was not going to see another shot down. The pilots were dauntless but not invulnerable. The pilot saw Howard's signal and turned off, bullets clanging off the armor plating of the undercarriage. Howard would wait for the infantry. In anger, the jets and the Hueys now attacked the enemy positions anew. Flying lower and lower, they crisscrossed the slopes, searching for the machine gun emplacements, offering themselves as targets, daring the enemy to shoot.

The enemy did. Another Huey was hit and crashed, its crew chief killed. The .50 calibers exposed their position and were silenced. Still the North Vietnamese held their ground. Perhaps the assault company, with all its automatic weapons and fresh young troops, had been ordered to wipe out the few Marines at any cost; perhaps the commanding officer had been killed and his subordinates were following dead orders; perhaps the enemy thought victory yet possible. But then the Marine infantry came in. They had flown out at dawn but so intense was the enemy fire around Nui Vu, the helicopters had to circle for 45 minutes while jets and artillery blasted a secure landing zone.

During that time, First Lieutenant Richard E. Moser, a H34 helicopter pilot, monitored Howard's frequency and later reported: "It was like something you'd read in a novel. His call sign was Carnival Time and he kept talking about these North Vietnamese down in holes in front of him. He'd say, 'you've got too get this guy in the crater because he's hurting my boys.' He was really impressive. His whole concern was for his men." On the southern slope of the mountain, helicopters finally dropped Charlie Company of the 5th Marines. The relief company climbed fast, ignoring sniper fire and wiping out small pockets of resistance. With the very first round they fired, the Marine 60mm mortar team knocked out the enemy mortar. Sergeant Frank Riojas, the weapons platoon commander, cut down a sniper at 500 yards with a tracer round from his M14. Marine machine gun sections were detached from the main body and sent up the steep fingers along the flanks of the hill to support by fire the company's movement.

The North Vietnamese were now the hunted, as Marines scrambled around as well as up the slope, attempting to pinch off the enemy before they could flee. The main column climbed straight upwards. While yet a quarter of a mile away, the point man saw recon's position on the plateau. The boulder which served as Howard's command post was the most prominent terrain feature on the peak. The platoon hurried forward. They had to step over enemy bodies to enter the perimeter. Howard's men had eight rounds of ammunition left." Get down," were Howard's first words of welcome. "There are snipers right in front of us." Another recon man shouted: "Hey, you got any cigarettes?" A cry went up along the line -- not expressions of joy -- but requests for cigarettes. It was not that Howard's Marines were not glad to see other infantrymen; it was just that they had expected them. Staff Sergeant Richard Sullivan, who was with the first platoon to reach the recon Marines, said later: "One man told me he never expected to see the sun rise. But once it did, he knew we'd be coming."

The fight was not over. Before noon, in the hot daylight, despite artillery and planes firing in support, four more Marines would die. At Howard's urging, Second Lieutenant Ronald Meyer quickly deployed his platoon along the crest. Meyer had graduated from the Naval Academy the previous June and intended to make the Marine Corps his career. He had spent a month with his bride before leaving for Vietnam. In the field he wore no shiny bars, and officers and men alike called him "Stump," because of his short, muscular physique. Howard had assumed he was a corporal or a sergeant and was shouting orders to him. Respecting Howard's knowledge and performance, Meyer obeyed. He never did mention his rank. So Staff Sergeant Howard, waving off offers of aid, proceeded to direct the tactical maneuvers of the relieving company, determined to wipe out the small enemy band dug in not 20 meters down slope.

Meyer hollered for members of his platoon to pass him grenades. He would then lob them down slope toward the snipers' holes. By peering around the base of the boulder, Howard was able to direct his throws. "A little more to the right on the next one, buddy. About five yards farther. That's right. No, a little too strong." The grenades had little effect and the snipers kept firing. Meyer shouted he wanted air on the target. The word was passed back for the air liaison officer to come forward. The platoon waited. Lance Corporal Terry Redic wanted to fire his rifle grenade at the snipers. A tested sharpshooter, he had several kills to his credit. In small fire fights he often disdained to duck, preferring to suppress hostile fire by his own rapid accurate shooting. Meyer's way seemed too slow. He rose up, knelt on one knee, and sighted down slope looking for a target. He never found one. The enemy shot first and killed him instantly.

Meyer swore vehemently. "Let's get that . You come with me, Sotello?" "Yes, Stump." Lance Corporal David Sotello turned to get his rifle and some other men. Meyer didn't wait. He started forward with a grenade in each hand. "Keep your head down, buddy, they can shoot," yelled Howard. Meyer crawled for several yards, and then threw a grenade at a hole. It blasted an enemy soldier. He turned, looking upslope. Another sniper shot him in the back. Sotello heard the shot as he started to crawl down. So did Hospital man 3d Class John Markillie, the platoon corpsman? He crawled toward the fallen lieutenant. "For God's sake, keep your head down!" yelled Howard. Markillie reached his lieutenant. He sat up to examine the wound. A sniper shot him in the chest.

Another corpsman, Holloday, and a squad leader, Corporal Melville, crawled forward. They could not feel Meyer's pulse. Markillie was still breathing. Ignoring the sniper fire, they began dragging and pushing his body up the hill. Melville was hit in the head. He rolled over. His helmet bounced off. He shook his head and continued to crawl. The round had gone in one side of the helmet and ripped out the other, just nicking the corporal above his left ear. Melville and Holloday dragged Markillie into the perimeter. From Chulai, the battalion commander called his company commander, First Lieutenant Marshall "Buck" Darling. "Is the landing zone secure, Buck?" "Well," A pause. "...not spectacularly." Back at the base two noncommissioned officers were listening. "I wonder what he meant by that?" Asked the junior sergeant. "What the hell do you think it means, stupid?" Replied the older sergeant. "He's getting shot at." Ignoring his own wounds, Corpsman Billee Holmes was busy supervising the corpsmen from Charlie Company as they administered to the wounded. With the fire fight still going on to the front, helicopter evacuation was not possible from within the perimeter. The wounded had to be taken rearward to the south slope. Holmes roved back and forth, making sure that all his buddies were accounted for and taken out.

The pilots had seen easier landing sites. "For the medical evacs," Moser said, "a pilot had to come in perpendicular to the ridge, and then cock his bird around before he sat down. We could get both main mounts down -- first -- the-tail -- well -- sometimes we got it down. We were still taking fire." Holmes reported that there was still one Marine, whom he had seen die, missing. Only after repeated assurances that they would not leave without the body were the infantry able to convince him and Howard that it was time they too left. They helped the Navy corpsman and the Marine sergeant to a waiting helicopter. Howard's job was done. Another had yet to be finished. There was a dead Marine to be found somewhere on the field of battle. But before a search could be conducted, the last of the enemy force had to be destroyed.

First Lieutenant Phil Freed flopped down beside Melville. Freed was the forward air controller attached to Charlie Company that day. He had run the last quarter mile uphill when he heard Meyer needed air. With the rounds cracking near his head, he needed no briefing. He contacted two F8

Crusader jets circling overhead. "This is Cottage 14. Bring it on down on a dry run. This has to be real tight. Charlie is dug in right on our lines." At the controls of the jets were First Lieutenants Richard W. Deilke and Edward H. Menzer. "There were an awful lot of planes in the air," Menzer said. "We didn't think we'd be used so we called DASC (Direct Air Support Center) and asked for another mission. We got diverted to the FAC (Forward Air Controller), Cottage 14. He told us he had a machine gun nest right in front of him." As they talked back and forth, Menzer thought he recognized Freed's voice. Later he learned he had indeed; Freed had flown jets with him in another Squadron a year earlier.

Freed was lying in a pile of rocks on the military crest of the northern finger of the hill. Since he himself had flown the F8 Crusader, Freed could talk to the pilots in a language they understood. Still, he was not certain they could help. He didn't know whether they could come that close and still not hit the Marine infantrymen. On their first run, he deliberately called the jets in wide so he could judge the technical skills and precision of the pilots. Rock steady. He called for them to attack in earnest. When they heard the target was 20 meters from the FAC, it was the pilots' turn to be worried. "As long as you're flying parallel to the people, it's O.K.," Menzer said. "Because it's a good shooting bird. But even so, I was leery at first to fire with troops that near."

Unknown to them, the two pilots were about to fly one of the closest direct air support missions in the history of fixed-wing aviation. They approached from the northeast with the sun behind them, and cut across the ridgeline parallel to the friendly lines. They strafed without room for error. The gun-sight reflector plate in an F8 Crusader jet looks like a bulls eye with the rings marked in successive 10-mil increments. When the pilots in turn aligned their sights while 3,000 feet away, the target lay within the 10-mil ring and the Marine position was at the edge of the ring. The slightest variance of the controls would rake the Marine infantrymen with fire. In that fashion, each pilot made four strafing passes, skimming by 10 to 20 feet above the ridge. Freed feared they would both crash, so close did their wings dip to the crest of the hill. The impact of the cannon shells showered the infantrymen with dirt. They swore they could tell the color of the pilot's eyes. In eight attacks, the jet pilots fired 350 20mm explosive shells into an area 60 meters long and 10 to 20 meters wide. The hillside was gouged and torn, as if a bulldozer had churned back and forth across it.

Freed cautiously lifted his head. A round cracked by. One enemy had survived. Somebody shouted that the shot came from the position of the sniper who had killed Meyer. The lieutenant's body lay several yards down slope. The F8 Crusaders had ample fuel left. Menzer called to say they could make dummy runs over the position if the Marines thought it would be useful. Freed asked them to try it. The company commander, Buck Darling, watched the jets. As they passed, he noticed the firing stopped momentarily. The planes would be his cover. "I'm going to get Stump. Coming, Brown?" he asked the nearest Marine. Lance Corporal James Brown was not a billboard Marine. His offbeat sense of humor often conflicted with his superiors' sense of duty. His squad leader later recalled with a grimace one fire fight when the enemy caught the squad in a cross fire. The rounds were passing high over the Marines' heads. While everyone else was returning fire, Brown strolled over to a Vietnamese tombstone, propped himself against it with one finger, crossed his legs and yelled: "You couldn't hit me if I was buried here!" His squad leader almost did the job for the enemy.

On the hill relieving the recon unit, however, Brown was all business. He emptied several rifle magazines and hurled grenade after grenade. When he ran out of grenades, he threw rocks to keep the snipers ducking. All the while he screamed and cursed, shouting every insult and blasphemy he could think of. Howard had been very impressed, both with Brown's actions and with his vocabulary. He was not out of words when Darling asked him to go after Meyer's body. As they crawled over the crest, Brown tugged at his company commander's boot. "Don't sweat it, lieutenant, they can only kill us." Darling did not reply.

They reached Meyer's body and tried to pull it back while crawling on their stomachs. They lacked the strength." All right, let's carry him." said Darling. It was Brown's turn to be speechless. He knew what had happened to every Marine on the slope that had raised his head -- and here was his officer suggesting they stand straight up! "We'll time our moves with the jets." When the jets passed low, they stumbled and scrambled forward a few yards with their burden, then flattened out as the jets pulled up. The sniper snapped shots at them after every pass. Bullets chipped the rocks around them. They had less than 30 feet to climb. It took over a dozen rushes. When they rolled over the crest they were exhausted. Only the enemy was left on the slope. The infantry went after him. Corporal Samuel Roth led his eight man squad around the left side of the slope. On the right, Sergeant Riojas set a machine gun up on the crest to cover the squad. A burst of automatic fire struck the tripod of the machine gun. A strange duel developed.

The sniper would fire at the machine gun. His low position enabled him to aim in exactly on the gun. The Marines would duck until he fired, then reach up and loose a burst downhill, forcing the sniper to duck. With the firing, the sniper could not hear the squad crashing through the brush on his right side. Roth brought his men on line facing toward the sniper. With fixed bayonets they began walking forward. They could see no movement in the clumps of grass and torn earth.

There was a lull in the firing. The sniper heard the squad, turned and fired. Bullets whipped by the Marines. Roth's helmet spun off. He fell. The other Marines flopped to the ground. Roth was uninjured. The steel helmet had saved a second Marine's life within an hour. He was not even aware that his helmet had been shot off. "When I give the word, kneel and fire," he said. "Now!" The Marines rose and their rounds kicked up dust and clumps of earth in front of them. They missed the sniper. He had ducked into his hole. The Marines lay back down. Roth swore. "All right put in fresh magazines and let's do it again." "Now!" Just as the Marines rose, the sniper bobbed up like a duck in a shooting gallery. A bullet knocked him backwards against the side of his hole. Roth charged, the other Marines sprinting behind him. He drove forward with his bayonet. A grenade with the release pin intact rolled from the sniper's left hand. Roth jerked the blade back. The sniper slumped forward over his machine gun.

The hill was quiet. It was noon. Darling declared the objective secure. In the tall grass in front of Riojas' machine gun, the infantrymen found the body of the missing Marine. The Marines paused to search 39 enemy dead for documents, picked up 18 automatic weapons (most of them Chinese), climbed on board a flight of helicopters, and flew off the plateau. The Marines lost 10 dead. Charlie Company and the Huey Squadrons each lost two. Of the 18 Marines in the reconnaissance platoon, 6 were killed; the other 12 were wounded. Five members of Charlie Company were recommended for medals. Every Marine under Howard's command received the Purple Heart. Fifteen were recommended for the Silver Star; Binns and Holmes were nominated for the Navy Cross; Howard was recommended for the Medal of Honor.

If the action had centered on just one man, then it could be considered a unique incident of exceptional bravery on the part of an exceptional man. It is that. But perhaps it is something more. On June 14th, few would have noticed anything unique about the 1st Reconnaissance Platoon of Charlie Company. Just in reading the names of its dead, one has the feeling that here are the typical and the average, who, well-trained and well-led, rose above normal expectations to perform an exemplary feat of arms: John Adams, Ignatius Carlisi, Thomas Glawe, James McKinney, Alcadio Mascarenas, Jerrald Thompson. SHORT ROUNDS

PLANNED MEMORIAL
Hill Fights
Vietnam Vets Memorial in D.C.

By Mick Hughes
H&S Co 2/3

Preliminary information has been received that those K.I.A. and survivors of the "Hill Fights" (April 24 through May 12, 1967) will be recognized at Memorial Day Services (May 28, 2007) at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C.

One of the things needed to move this recognition closer to fruition is a head count. Most of the men who participated in this battle were from the following units:

2nd Battalion, 3rd Marines
3rd Battalion, 3rd Marines
"B" Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines
"E" Company, 2nd Battalion, 9th Marines
"K" Company, 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines
"M" Company, 3rd Battalion, 9th Marines
"C" Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines
Elements of the 12th Marines
Elements of the 1st MAW
Khe Sanh Tigerhound Site 23rd TASS
Det 13, 15th Aerial Port Sqdn.

Tentatively, the schedule calls for the survivors of the "Hill Fights" to walk a short distance to assigned seating just prior to the commencement of the official program. Speakers will address the assemblage from a podium on a stage just to the front of assigned seating. There will be a main wreath laying after which a small contingent of " Hill Fighters" will place a wreath at the panels that contain the names of our K.I.A. The balance of the "Hill Fighters" will have moved from their assigned seating and walk in a column of 2's behind the wreath laying contingent..

If you are a veteran of this battle, please check your schedule and attend this ceremony if possible. There is no dress or grooming code but please be advised that similar ceremonies have been televised live, have gotten widespread news coverage and are archived in video format by various agencies. We are already a part of history. Our demeanor at this ceremony has the potential to be history in the making. My jungle jacket will stay in the closet this weekend and my sport jacket will get an airing. Let your conscience rule!

Remember that this Service honors the deceased of all wars, especially Vietnam. All planning is subject to change at this juncture. The earlier we get this done the more smoothly all will go. Please take part. Send me your Name, Rank, Unit, current address, phone, e-mail and whether you have special needs and want assistance. Officials in D.C. will get only the info that is necessary and after the ceremony the list that is created will be used only for networking and notifications. If you ever desire to be removed from the list let me know and your particulars will be expunged.

This ceremony is open to the public. However, "Hill Fighters" ONLY please in formation and assigned seating. Assigned seating is limited so it's first come first served. If you don't get yourself on the "Hill Fighters" list in advance, there won't be room for you. The general public will assemble at areas indicated on the grass facing the panels. There should be plenty of room for family and friends who can join their "Hill Fighter" after the Service. Please notify as many "Hill Fighters" as you can of this event.

SHORT ROUNDS

Mohawk

By Craig W Tourte
HQ Btry 1/13

My 21 year old son called me and said that he was heading home for a few days during college spring break. He warned me that he had a Mohawk haircut. I kind of laughed to myself remembering that during staging; a few of us went into Oceanside and got Mohawks and some tattoos, anticipating our deployment to Vietnam. Sometime during one of the long hot and dry stumbles up and down the hills of Pendleton, a Sergeant come over to us and chewed us. It was fun being just a little different and we figured what the heck, our chances of making it back were slim anyway. The Marine Corps did not like individual behavior, especially if that behavior was from a bunch of lowly privates.

I look forward to my son coming home for a few days. I had him kind of late in life and he means a lot to me. I have tried to give him the love I did not get from my stepfather, seems we were always at war with each other. Now that he is gone, I have finally gotten some sleep and don't have quite the nightmares I had about him when he was alive. I'll admit the dreams about him were pretty bad for me for a long time and to this day they occasionally pop up.

When I returned home from Vietnam I hooked up again with my friend Tom Horchler. I met Tom during the Siege and rode shotgun on the truck he drove out of Khe Sanh. Turns out we had the same Marine Corp recruiter. Anyway my mother and stepfather moved to Chico which just happened to be where Tom was living. I felt pretty lucky to have survived the Siege and I guess I told my mother and stepfather about my feelings of good fortune. My stepfather didn't much care that I made it back and I don't think he was happy to have me in the house. He handed me the house key and said, "That can be taken away." I got the hint. Tom and I went out for the evening and did what most young Marines do when they return from a war. I got home sometime the next morning in the anticipated state of bliss. My mother was not happy with me and my stepfather told me to pack up my stuff (not the word he used) and get out. I left that afternoon and never spent another night in their house.

My point is, I look forward to seeing my son, Mohawk, tattoo or in any other form of hair or clothing attire. He knows he always has a home anywhere I happen to be. Growing up and living with my idiot stepfather taught me a lot about what it means to be a father. And the value of loving a child. At least I know my son does not have nightmares about me, I've got enough for the both of us.

Letter of Thanks

A few weeks ago a Tyler Helmick, a young man came on our Web-Site asking for help with a 5-6 grade Social Studies project. His project was on the history of the Siege of Khe Sanh. His efforts were rewarded with the grand prize. He will go forward to county level judging this weekend. Supporting our youth and keeping this time in history alive is a worth while effort. Below is his thank you letter written to Dennis Mannion.

Tyler's Helmick Letter

Dear Mr. Mannion,

This is Tyler Helmick. I wanted to let you know that they finally held our school Social Study Fair today. They postponed it due to us missing a lot of school in Feb and March. Thanks to you and the other guys. I won Grand Prize in my school. Next week I will compete against all other 5th and 6th graders in my county. Wish me luck and pray for me. Thanks again.

"I CARE"

By Steven Wiese

My wife tells me that Roger called; he wants us to meet him at Carvers for dinner. Roger is someone I met through my wife, they have been friends for over 25 years. As a matter of fact Roger's wife

Cathy is and has been my wife's best friend. They have money, and Roger has always been very opinionated and outspoken (money seems to give you that privilege) so with that being said, off we go to Carvers. As we arrived we saw Roger's Mercedes-Benz SL 55 in the valet parking area so we knew that Roger was there.

We proceeded to the outside patio because Roger is a very heavy smoker and we knew that's where he would be, and he was. The waitress came and took our drink orders. There was the usual small talk, our drinks arrived and this being March 30th, I wanted to make a toast to the men of Bravo Company and to the men that didn't make it back, something I do every year. Roger blurted out, "it's been over 30 years, nobody cares, just forget about it and get over it." It took me completely by surprise and I sat there in silence.

My wife looked at him and said, "He's spent over 30 years trying to forget about it. There are some thing's you just don't forget." I looked at him and said, "I care." That was my only response. The rest of the evening was the usual small talk, but it was still bugging me. We said our see you later's and we went home. But I couldn't get it off my mind, how could he have been so callous. I thought back to a World War II vet I met. I see now that he obviously had PTSD although at the time I had no idea what that was, and he probably didn't either. Anyway, I can clearly remember thinking that he probably hadn't had it any worse than I did and I put up this wall. The war was a thing of the past. So why couldn't he? Have I become this man?

I wish I could go back and give him the respect he deserved. Do the younger people of today look at me and think, "what's wrong with this old man, the war ended so many years ago why doesn't he get over it?" Which brings me back to Roger's questioned "who cares." Well I believe the people that loved them care, their families care, the men that new them that stood shoulder to shoulder in combat with them care. It's our responsibility to remember. So every year I will continue to make a toast to these men, the ones that made it back, and the ones that did not, and I care that you DON'T Care.

Bravo Company Lives On

Steve,

You can "get over it" and still care.
Just because you remember the men you met (and the beauty of it is that it was purely random and co-incidental) doesn't mean you haven't "Have over it". I think most of us have lived our lives, worked, been good citizens, husbands and fathers, and still have had a spot in our hearts reserved for those guys who touched our souls on that Red Clay plateau so many years ago. Roger is entitled to his opinion and to speak his mind and his heart because we served our country to preserve his right to do so. I feel sorry for anyone who doesn't CARE because it shows a certain corruption of the soul that must be more difficult to live with than the memories we have of a time long ago in a place far away. I just returned from a visit to Khe Sanh, and believe me; I was treated with great respect by the Vietnamese I encountered because I am a veteran. I think that they CARE, even though we were enemies. I think that says more good about them, than what Roger says demonstrates about him. Thanks, Steve, for prompting me to feel good about myself this day because I CARE.

Jim Dawdy Seabees

I CARE

Steve,

When I was making all the trips to Southern California, for my parent's final days, I got in touch with some childhood friends. One night my oldest friend said "get over it" when Viet Nam came up in a conversation. I can not print what I replied, but he got the message. On another night while having a few drinks he brought it up again. As he did not serve he said he did not get it, why hang on. As it turned out, it was more about why he did not serve. The more he talked about not going, the more I could see there was guilt. Guys like your wife's friend don't want to hear about it as it brings up their short comings. More than once I have listened to guys talk long about why they did not go, trying to convince me they did the right thing. In the end it is always the same. I am OK with myself as they are still explaining themselves. They want us to "get over it" so they do not have to face their own short comings and guilt. I'll bet they still wonder if they could have held up and made it through. We do not have to question ourselves as we did and are here and still care.

I CARE

Steven,

I was moved by your posting, particularly because, like every Khe Sanh vet, I will forever remain in awe of the courage and enormous sacrifice made by you and the other men of B/1/26 on 25 February and 30 March 1968. We last met on January 21, 2006 at a gathering of Khe Sanh vets in Chico, CA. Since then I have had the good fortune to able to travel around the country fairly extensively; speaking to various groups, including many college classes who have adopted A Patch of Ground in their history and political science courses. Last month Doc Topmiller and I spoke to over 100 people at Bentley University near Boston. When I first started lecturing to these classes, I anticipated the same kind of negative "who cares," or worse, reaction that you recently encountered, from the students and professors I would be facing. I'm sure my trepidation was a hold-over from the early '70s when I was trying to get a college education on the G.I. Bill amid the constant din of anti-war activities. It seemed to me in those days that most of those kids had probably never experienced anything more stressful in their lives than having a pencil break during a test – and I spent several of those years on campus seething with resentment.

Yet to my surprise (and delight) I've found today that students and professors are greatly interested in our war and honestly appreciative of the sacrifices made by the troops who went. This sentiment has, in my experience, held true among students and faculty at both the schools that are traditionally conservative, as well as those that have a more politically liberal history. I believe one explanation for this is because the Vietnam War was so painful to the nation at-large that when it ended, almost everyone shut-up and tried to forget it. Consequently, a whole generation came to know very little about what really happened on the ground in Vietnam (with the exception of a few "Rambo"- type movies). The good news is they are now hungry to know. Every history professor I've spoken to who teaches a course on the Vietnam War has had to turn students away each semester because the interest in the subject is so high. There are more people out there who care about the Vietnam War than there are sources of accurate and available information about it. I would strongly suggest every Khe Sanh vet write down, or record an oral history of their experiences before we all dry up and blow away. It would be an invaluable gift to our grandkids - and theirs.

Sorry to ramble on so long, but I'd like to make a final comment on your Mercedes-driving product of "privilege." It seems to me that people who have every potentially character-building event in their life "taken care of" by their parents or influential friends, live their lives in a world without consequences. My childhood friend Tom Mahoney, who I enlisted with under the "buddy system," was the last Marine to die on Hill 881S. On July 6, 1968, after getting a "Dear John" letter from his girlfriend filled with anti-war epithets ("baby-killer,"etc.,) he made a mistake and was shot and killed by the NVA. After several futile attempts by his platoon (1/B/1/1) to recover his body, his remains are still up there somewhere, just 50 meters outside the west gate. His girlfriend was the daughter of a doting multi-millionaire and so she had never wanted for anything. I bitterly carried that injustice inside me for decades until I realized that many of the hereditarily privileged in our society are developmentally stunted – adolescents for life – and, as much as we would all like to smack our teenagers in the back of the head sometimes, we usually cool down and realize they just don't have the ability to know any better.

I went where others feared to go and did what others failed to do...
I asked nothing from those that gave nothing...
And, reluctantly, accepted the thought of eternal loneliness, should I fail...
I have seen the face of terror, felt the chill of fear, warmed to the touch of love...
I have hoped, pained, cried...

But foremost, lived in times others would say best forgotten...
At the very least, in later days, I will be able to say with greatest pride,
That I was indeed a soldier"...

Thank god we care!!!
We stood together
We bleed together
We cried together
Some died together
I care!!!

"Taking The Time To Care"

By Craig W Tourte

I was deeply moved by Steve Wiese's post, "I CARE" and I have been thinking about those words a lot since he made that POST. Today I went for a little drive north up Interstate-5 towards Redding, California. There is not really much for the traveler to see between Sacramento and the Oregon State line to speak of. Oh there are a few sleepy little farm towns of a few hundred to a couple of thousand people. Little towns with names like Yolo, Arbuckle, Williams, Maxwell and Willows. Nowhere towns. One would not have any reason in the world to stop and visit if there was not a specific reason.

Maxwell is about an hours drive north of Sacramento. The sign says the population is 500. That sign has not changed for the past 40 years that I know of. Sure it's citizens have come and gone like the wind and dusty fields that surrounds the town, but the population generally seems to stay at about 500. If you were to turn off the busy interstate and drive through the one main street, you'd wonder who in the world would live in this place. One bar and restaurant now where there once were five, a post office and a couple of schools with no more than a total of 100 students. The cemetery is the usual mile out of town located on a few dry acres of too long grass, off the two lane roadway leading up into the foothills. There are no doctor or dentist offices, drug stores, AM/PM's or hardware stores, it's just a small town with one overpriced gas station and where people all seem to know each other. Just folks from a small farming town living out their lives in mostly obscurity as best they can.

The cemetery is a step back into time with dates of the deceased dating back 100 years or so, all at rest next to those who departed recently. As I stood amongst the tombstones, small monuments erected by various family members in memory of the deceased, I thought it a lonely place but yet peaceful and quiet. I walked over to the tombstone of my long departed friend Bill (Buddy) Denman. As I read his tombstone one more time, I thought of what my friend Steve Wiese said to the question, "Who Cares?" Before I left for boot camp in San Diego around August on 1966 I stopped off at Buddy's house. He was leaving for Vietnam and was excited and yes even looking forward to the adventure. I don't think Buddy had ever traveled more than a few miles from Maxwell. As we spoke, I knew I would not be far behind; we talked about our approaching adventures and what we would do when we both returned from our tours, what stories we would tell.

William Luther Denman, PFC, A CO, 2nd BN, 27th INFANTRY, 25 INF DIV, 25 August 1945-05 November 1966.

"Dau Tieng, Tay Ninth Province, 03 Nov 1966- elements of the 196th Infantry Brigade and the 25th Infantry Division got into a heated fight with entrenched and bunkered VC troops, a fight grew into a full-fledged battle fought over a three-day period. Landing Zone Lima Zulu, slightly north of where the 1st Bn, 27th Infantry fought on 03/04 Nov, drew some of the heaviest fighting beginning after C Company, 2/27 Inf, was inserted at about 1400 on 04 Nov." "C/2/27 moved south from LZ Lima Zulu, intending to link with 1/27, but could go only a few hundred meters before being stopped by VC dug into a tree line Unable to move forward, with enemy troops infiltrating to their rear, the battalion and company commanders dead, and under fire from three sides, C/2/27 pulled together after nightfall, using a left flank displacement to get out of the "horseshoe" and avoid encirclement. The maneuver worked, and C/2/27 held out through the night amidst sporadic hand-to-hand fighting. By 1030 on 05 Nov, Alpha 1/27 fought through and relieved C/2/27."

"At the same time, HHC and A Company, 2/27, were coming into LZ Lima Zulu, intending to take the VC from the rear, pounding them against the anvil formed by A/1/27 and C/2/27. It didn't work; the VC anticipated the move and the arriving troops found themselves in a "hot" LZ. As the day progressed additional forces were brought in, eventually encouraging the VC to break contact and withdraw from the field."

"While the engagements cost the VC dearly, with several hundred known dead, the US infantrymen paid a high price of 50 men killed in action over the three day period. William Denman was one of twenty American killed at LZ Lima Zulu on the 3rd day of the fight."

I stood all alone in the cemetery today near a little town out in nowhere, staring down at the tombstone of my friend William (Buddy) Denman. The sky was a clear blue and town was a mile or so away. No cars were on the roadway and no one else was within sight. I repeated the words that Steve had said, "I Care" and it helped.

MEMOIRS

Battle of Khe Sanh
Preliminaries

Publisher Note: With so many new members joining our ranks, I thought it would be a good idea to publish a quick overview of the start, reason, and end of the battle for Khe Sanh. There are no specifics concerning each epic battle that took place, just a general overview. Information comes from many different sources

The Camp

The village of Khe Sanh was the seat of government of Huong Hoa district, an area of Bru Montagnard-villages and coffee plantations, situated about seven miles from the Laotian frontier on Route 9, the northernmost transverse road in South Vietnam. The badly deteriorated Route 9 ran from the coastal region, through the western highlands, and then crossed the border into Laos. The origin of the combat base lay in the construction by American Special Forces of an airfield in August 1962 outside the village at an old French fort. The camp then became a Special Forces outpost of the Civilian Irregular Defense Groups (CIDG), whose purpose was to keep watch on PAVN infiltration along the border and to protect the local population. In November 1964 the Green Berets moved their camp to the Xom Cham Plateau, the future site of KSCB.

During the winter of 1965, Khe Sanh became the location of a launch site for the highly-classified Military Assistance Command, Vietnam Studies and Observation Group SOG (the site was first established near the village and was later moved to the French fort). From there, recon teams were launched into Laos to explore and gather intelligence on the PAVN logistical system known as the Ho Chi Minh Trail. The plateau camp was permanently manned by the U.S. Marines during 1967, when they established an outpost next to the airstrip. This base was to serve as the western anchor of Marine Corps forces, which had tactical responsibility for the five northernmost provinces of South Vietnam (I Corps). The Marines' defensive system stretched below the (DMZ) from the coast, along Route 9, to Khe Sanh. In 1966, the regular Special Forces troops had moved off the plateau and built a smaller camp down Route 9 at Lang Vei about half the distance to the Laotian border.

Border Battles

During the second half of 1967, the North Vietnamese instigated a series of actions in the border regions of South Vietnam. All of these attacks were conducted by regimental-size PAVN/NLF units, but unlike the usual hit-and-run tactics utilized by communists' forces, these were sustained and bloody affairs. In early September, PAVN intensified battalion-size ground probes and sustained artillery fire against Con Thien, a hilltop stronghold in the center of the Marine's defensive line south of the DMZ in northern Quang Tri Province. Mortar rounds, artillery shells, and 122mm rockets fell randomly but incessantly upon the base. The September bombardments ranged from 100 to 150 rounds per day, with a maximum on 25 September of 1,190. The American commander in Vietnam, General William Westmoreland responded by launching Operation Neutralize, an aerial and naval bombardment campaign designed to break the siege. For seven weeks, American aircraft delivered from 35,000 to 40,000 tons of bombs in nearly 4,000 air strikes.

On 27 October, a PAVN regiment attacked an (ARVN) battalion at Song Be, capital of Phuoc Long Province. The North Vietnamese fought for several days, took casualties, and fell back. Two days later, the 273rd NLF Regiment attacked a Special Forces camp near the border town of Loc Ninh, in Binh Long Province. Troops of the U.S. 1st Infantry Division were able to respond quickly. After a ten-day battle, the attackers were pushed back into Cambodia. At least 852 North Vietnamese soldiers were killed during the action, as opposed to 50 American and South Vietnamese dead.

The heaviest action took place near Dak To, in the central highlands province of Kontum. There, the presence of the 1st PAVN Division prompted a 22-day battle that saw some of the most intense close-quarters fighting of the entire conflict. Somewhere between 1,200 and 1,600 North Vietnamese troops were killed while 362 members of the U.S. 4th Infantry Division, the 173Rd Airborne Brigade, and ARVN airborne elements were killed in action. Ominously, three of the four battalions of the 4th Infantry and the entire 173rd were rendered combat ineffective during the battle. American intelligence analysts were quite baffled by this series of enemy actions. There appeared to be no logic behind the sustained PAVN/NLF offensives, other than to inflict casualties on the allied forces. This they accomplished, but the casualties absorbed by the North Vietnamese seemed to negate any direct gains they might have obtained. The border battles did, however, have two significant consequences that were unappreciated at the time - they fixed the attention of the American command on the border regions and they drew American and ARVN forces away from the coastal lowlands and cities.

Hill Fights

The Khe Sanh Valley

Things remained quiet in the Khe Sanh area through 1966. Even so, General Westmoreland insisted that it not only be occupied by the Marines, but that it be reinforced. He was vociferously opposed by General Lewis W. Walt, the Marine commander of I Corps. Walt argued heatedly that the real target of the American effort should be the pacification and protection of the population, not chasing PAVN and the NLF in the hinterlands. Westmoreland won out, however, and the 1st Battalion 3rd Marine Regiment (1/3) was dispatched to occupy the camp and airstrip on 29 September. By late January 1967, 1/3 was relieved by Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 9th Marines. .

On 24 April 1967 a patrol from Bravo Company became engaged with a PAVN force of unknown size north of Hill 861. This action prematurely triggered a North Vietnamese offensive aimed at taking Khe Sanh. The PAVN forces were in the process of gaining elevated terrain before the launching of the main attack. The 2nd and 3rd Battalions of the 9th Marine Regiment, under the command of Colonel John P. Lanigan, reinforced KSCB and were given the task of pushing the North Vietnamese off of Hills 861, 881 North, and 881 South. North Vietnamese forces were driven out of the area around Khe Sanh after suffering 940 casualties. The Marines suffered 155 killed in action and 425 wounded. In order to prevent PAVN observation of the main base at the airfield (and their possible use as firebases), the hills of the surrounding Khe Sanh Valley had to be continuously occupied and defended by separate Marine elements, thereby spreading out the defense.

In the wake of the hill fights there was a lull in PAVN activity around Khe Sanh. By the end of May, Marine forces were again drawn down from two battalions to one, the 1st Battalion 26th Marines. Lieutenant General Robert E. Cushman Jr. relieved General Walt as commander of III MAF in June. On 14 August, Colonel David E. Lownds took over as commander of the 26th. There were sporadic actions in the vicinity during the late summer and early fall, the most serious of which was the ambush of a supply convoy on Route 9. This proved to be the last overland attempt at re-supply for Khe Sanh until the following March. During December and early January there were numerous sightings of PAVN troops and activities in the Khe Sanh area, but the sector remained relatively quiet.

A decision then had to be made by the American high command: either commit more of the limited manpower in I Corps to the defense of Khe Sanh or abandon the base. General Westmoreland regarded this choice as quite simple. In his memoirs he listed the reasons for a continued effort:

"Khe Sanh could serve as a patrol base for blocking enemy infiltration from Laos along Route 9; as a base for SOG operations to harass the enemy in Laos; as an airstrip for reconnaissance planes surveying the Ho Chi Minh Trail; as the western anchor for defenses south of the DMZ; and as an eventual jump-off point for ground operations to cut the Ho Chi Minh Trail."

As far as Westmoreland was concerned, all he needed to know was that PAVN had massed large numbers of troops for a set-piece battle. Making the prospect even more enticing was that the Combat Base was in an unpopulated area where American firepower could be fully brought to bear without having to worry about civilian casualties. The opportunity to engage and destroy a formerly elusive enemy that was moving toward a fixed position promised a victory of unprecedented proportions.

Marine intelligence confirmed that, within a period of just over a week, the 325th PAVN Division had moved into the vicinity of the base and two more divisions were within supporting distance. The 324th PAVN Division was located in the DMZ area 10-15 miles north of Khe Sanh while the 320th PAVN Division was within easy reinforcing distance to the northeast. They were supported logistically from the nearby Ho Chi Minh Trail. As a result of this intelligence, KSCB was reinforced on 13 December by the 1st Battalion 9th Marine. Regiment

At positions west of Hill 881 South and north of Co Roc Ridge, across the border in Laos, PAVN established artillery, rocket, and mortar positions from which to launch attacks by fire on the base and to support its ground operations. They were assisted in their emplacement efforts by the continuing bad weather of the winter monsoon.

During the rainy night of 2 January 1968, six men dressed in black uniforms were seen outside the defensive wire of the main base by members of a listening post. After failing to respond to a challenge, they were fired upon and five were killed outright while the sixth, although wounded, escaped. This event prompted General Cushman to reinforce Colonel Lownds with the rest of the 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines. This marked the first time that all three battalions of the 26th Marine Regiment had operated together in combat since the invasion of Iwo Jima during the Second World War. In order to cover a defilade near the Rao Quan River, Foxtrot Company, 2/26 was immediately sent out to occupy Hill 558.

On 20 Jan, a PAVN lieutenant of the 14th Anti-Aircraft Company, 325th Division defected at the base and laid out the plans for an entire series of North Vietnamese attacks. Hills 881 South, 861, and the main base itself would be simultaneously attacked that same evening. At 00:30 on 21 January, Hill 861 was attacked by approximately 300 PAVN troops. The Marines, however, were prepared for the attack. The North Vietnamese infantry, though bracketed by artillery fire, still managed to penetrate the perimeter of the defenses and were only driven back after severe close-quarters combat. The main base was then subjected to an intense mortar and rocket barrage. Hundreds of mortar rounds and 122mm rockets slammed into the base, leveling most of the above-ground structures. One of the first enemy shells set off an explosion in the main ammunition dump. Many of the artillery and mortar rounds stored in the dump were thrown into the air and detonated on impact within the base. Soon after another shell hit a cache of CS tear gas, which saturated the entire area. Hours after the bombardment ceased, the base was still in danger. At around 10:00, the fire ignited a large quantity of C-4 and other explosives, rocking the base with another series of detonations. PAVN forces, however, did not launch a ground attack.

Simultaneous with the bombardment at KSCB was an attack launched against the Huong Hoa District headquarters. There, elements of the 66th Regiment, 304th PAVN Division were opposed by Bru CIDGs, Regional Force (RF) troops led by their Army advisors, and a platoon of Marine CAP. The force managed to hold out until the morning of the 22nd, when helicopters were sent in for their extraction..

This attack revealed that the 304th PAVN Division had just arrived from the DRV with all three of its regiments, the 9th, 24th, 66th, the 68B Artillery Regiment, and the 14th Anti-Aircraft Battalion. Attached in support was the 24th Artillery Battalion. The division took up positions southwest of the Combat Base. There has been a significant discrepancy, however, as to what infantry units of the 325th Division remained in the Khe Sanh sector. An ARVN document study conducted after the battle concluded that only one regiment, 95C remained at Khe Sanh. According to the study, two regiments of other divisions held blocking positions on Route 9. They were the 31st Regiment of the PAVN 341st Division and possibly a regiment of the 324th Division. Two battalions of the 3rd Regiment later moved south to Hue to participate in the battle for that city during the latter stages of the Tet offensive.

To eliminate any threat to their flank, the North Vietnamese made the decision to attack Laotian Battalion BV-33, located at Ban Houei Sane, on Route 9 in Laos. The battalion was assaulted on the night of 23 January by three PAVN battalions supported by seven tanks. The Laotians were overrun, and many fled to the Special Forces Camp at Lang Vei. This action in Laos, not the attack three weeks later at Lang Vei, marked the first time that PAVN had committed an armored unit to battle.

Due to the arrival of the 304th Division, KSCB was further reinforced by the 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment on 22 January. Five days later, the final the Special Forces camp at Lang Vei. This action in Laos reinforcements arrived in the form of the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion, which was deployed more for political than tactical reasons. PAVN artillery made its debut on the battlefield on 24 January, when a bombardment by 100mm and 152mm guns began with Hill 881 South, moved on to Hill 861, and then worked over the main base. The Marines and ARVN dug in and hoped that the approaching Tet truce (scheduled from 29-31 January) would provide some respite. On the afternoon of the 29th, however, the 3rd Marine Division notified Khe Sanh that the truce had been cancelled. The Tet Offensive was about to begin.

During January, the recently installed electronic sensors of Operation Muscle Shoals (later renamed Igloo White), which were undergoing test and evaluation in southeastern Laos, were alerted by a flurry of PAVN activity along the Ho Chi Minh Trail opposite the northwestern corner of South Vietnam. It was due to the nature of these activities, and the threat that they posed to KSCB that General Westmoreland ordered Operation Niagara I, an intense intelligence collection effort on PAVN activities in the vicinity of the Khe Sanh Valley.

Niagara I was completed during the third week of January, and the next phase of the operation, Niagara II was launched on the 21st, the day of the first PAVN artillery barrage. The Marine Direct Air Support Center (DASC), located at the Combat Base, was responsible for the coordination of air strikes with artillery fire. An airborne battlefield command and control center (ABCCC), in the form of a C-130 aircraft, directed incoming strike aircraft to (FAC) spotter planes, which, in turn directed them to targets either located by themselves or radioed in by ground units. When weather conditions precluded FAC-directed strikes, the bombers were directed to their targets by either a Marine AN/TPQ-10 radar installation at KSCB or by Air Force Combat Skyspot MSQ-77 stations. This LORAN-based system could direct aircraft to their targets in inclement weather or in absolute darkness.

Thus began what many considered "the most concentrated application of aerial firepower in the history of warfare." On an average day 350 tactical fighter-bombers, 60 B-52s, and 30 light observation or reconnaissance aircraft operated in the skies near the base. Westmoreland had already ordered the nascent Igloo White to assist in the Marine defense. On 22 January, the first sensor drops took place (Navy Squadron VO-67) and, by the end of the month, 316 acoustic and seismic sensors had been dropped in 44 strings. The Marines at KSCB credited 40 percent of intelligence available to their fire support coordination center to the sensors.

By the end of the battle of Khe Sanh, U.S. Air Force assets had flown 9,691 tactical sorties and dropped 14,223 tons of bombs on targets within the Khe Sanh area. Marine Corps aviators had flown 7,098 missions and released 17,015 tons. Naval aircrews, many of whom were redirected from Rolling Thunder strikes against the DRV, flew 5,337 sorties and dropped 7,941 tons of ordnance on the enemy.

Not even this amount of unleashed firepower was enough to calm the anxiety of American leaders in Washington. On 1 February General Earle G.

Wheeler, chairman of the Joint Chief of Staff, raised the issue with Westmoreland of "whether tactical nuclear weapons should be used if the situation at Khe Sanh should become that desperate." Westmoreland replied that their use would probably not be required. He added, however, that if the situation did change dramatically, "I visualize that either tactical nuclear weapons or chemical agents would be active candidates for employment." Westmoreland then established a small study group to examine the consequences of what was nicknamed Fracture Jaw. Westmoreland later wrote that "Washington so feared that some word of it might reach the press that I was told to desist.

Fall of Lang Vei

There had not been much activity (with the exception of patrolling) thus far during the battle for the Green Berets of Detachment A-101 and their four companies of Bru CIDGs stationed at Lang Vei. That changed radically during the early morning hours of 7 February. The Americans had previous forewarning of PAVN armor in the area from Laotian refugees from camp BV-33 (just across the border on Route 9), which had been overrun by an armored assault on the night of 23 January. Although PAVN was known to possess two armored regiments, it had not yet fielded an armored unit in South Vietnam, and besides, it was thought impossible for them to get one down to Khe Sanh without it being spotted by aerial reconnaissance.

It still "came as a shock" to the Special Forces troopers at Lang Vei when 12 tanks attacked their camp. The Soviet-built PT-76 amphibious tanks of the 202nd PAVN Armored Regiment churned over the defenses, backed up by an infantry assault by the 7th Battalion, 66th PAVN Regiment and the 4th Battalion of the 24th PAVN Regiment, both elements of the 304th PAVN Division. The ground troops were specially equipped for the attack with satchel charges, tear gas, and flame throwers. Although the camp's defenses were overrun in only 13 minutes, the fighting lasted several hours, during which the Special Forces men and Bru CIDGs managed to knock out at least five of the tanks. The Marines at Khe Sanh had a plan in place for providing a ground relief force in just such a contingency, but Colonel Lowndes, fearing a PAVN ambush, refused to implement it. Lowndes also rejected a proposal to launch a helicopter extraction of the survivors. During a meeting at Da Nang at 07:00 the next morning, Generals Westmoreland and Cushman accepted Lownds' decision. "

Army Lieutenant Colonel Jonathan Ladd commander, 5th Special Forces Group), and the commander of the SOG compound (whose men and camp had been incorporated into the defenses of KSCB) proposed that, if the Marines would provide the helicopters, the SOG recon men would go in themselves to pick up any survivors. The Marines continued to oppose the operation until Westmoreland actually had to issue an order to Cushman to allow the rescue operation to proceed. It was not until 15:00 hours that the relief operation was launched and it was successful. Of the 500 CIDG troops at Lang Vei, 200 had been killed or were missing and 75 more were wounded. Of the 24 Americans at the camp, ten had been killed and 11 wounded.

Logistics And Supporting Fire

Colonel Lownds estimated that the logistical requirements of KSCB were 60 tons per day in mid-January and rose to 185 tons per day when all five battalions were in place. The greatest impediments to the delivery of supplies to the base were the closure of Route 9 and the winter monsoon weather. From the beginning of the battle until early March, low-lying clouds and fog enclosed the area from early morning until around noon. Even then, the cloud cover rarely rose above 2,000 feet, closing the airfield to all but the most intrepid aviators.

Making matters worse, any aircraft that did brave the weather and attempted to land was subject to enemy anti-aircraft fire on its way in for a landing. Once the aircraft did touch down, it became the target of any number of PAVN artillery or mortar crews. The aircrew then had to brave the anti-aircraft gauntlet on the way out. As a result, 65 percent of all supplies were delivered by paradrops delivered by C-130 aircraft. The Air Force claimed that, during the siege, 14,356 tons were delivered to Khe Sanh by air (8,120 tons by paradrop). 1st Marine Aircraft Wing records indicated that the unit delivered 4,661 tons of cargo into KSCB.

The re-supply of the numerous, isolated hill outposts was fraught with the same difficulties and dangers. The fire of PAVN anti-aircraft units took its toll of helicopters that made the attempt. The Marines found a solution to the problem in the "Super Gaggle" concept. 12 A-4 Skyhawk fighter-bombers provided flak suppression for massed flights of 12-16 helicopters, which would re-supply the hills simultaneously. The adoption of this concept at the end of February was the turning point in the re-supply effort. After its adoption, Marine helicopters flew in 465 tons of supplies during February. When the weather later cleared in March the amount was increased to 40 tons per day.

As more infantry units had been assigned to KSCB, artillery reinforcement kept pace. By early January, the defenders of KSCB could count on fire support from 46 artillery pieces of various calibers, five tanks armed with 90mm guns, and 92 single or Ontos-mounted 106mm recoilless rifles. The base could also depend on fire support from U.S. Army 175mm guns located at Camp Carroll. Throughout the battle, Marine artillerymen fired 158,891 mixed rounds. Marine analysis of PAVN artillery fire disclosed that PAVN gunners had fired 10,908 artillery and mortar rounds and rockets into Marine positions during the battle.

Final Attacks

On the night of the fall of Lang Vei, three companies of the PAVN 101D Regiment, moved into position to attack Alpha-1, an outpost just outside the Combat Base, held by 66 men of the 1/9 Marines. Under cover of a mortar barrage, the North Vietnamese penetrated the perimeter and pushed the remaining 30 defenders into the southwestern portion of the defenses. For some unknown reason, the PAVN troops did not press their advantage and eliminate the pocket. A relief force set out from the main base and attacked through the North Vietnamese, pushing them into supporting tank and artillery fire.

On 23 February, KSCB received its worst bombardment of the battle. During one eight-hour period the base was rocked by 1,307 enemy rounds, most of which came from 130mm (utilized for the first time on the battlefield) and 152mm artillery pieces located in Laos. Casualties from the bombardment were ten killed and 51 wounded. Two days later, the first PAVN trenches appeared, running due north to within 25 meters of the Combat Base perimeter. That same day, a patrol from Bravo Company 1/26 Marines was ambushed by a PAVN force estimated at battalion-size. Casualties during the contact amounted to nine Marines killed, 25 wounded, and 19 missing and presumed dead.

At the end of February, American intelligence postulated that the 66th Regiment, 304th PAVN Division was in the process of mounting an attack on the positions of the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion, on the eastern perimeter. On the night of 28 February, the Combat Base unleashed artillery and air strikes on possible North Vietnamese staging areas and routes of advance. At 21:30, the attack came on, but it was stifled by the small arms of the Rangers, who were supported by thousands of artillery rounds and air strikes. Two further attacks later in the morning were halted before the North Vietnamese finally withdrew. PAVN, however, was not through with the ARVN troops. Five more attacks against their sector of the defenses were launched during the month of March.

By mid-March, Marine intelligence began to note an exodus of PAVN units from the Khe Sanh sector. The 325C Divisional Headquarters was the first to leave, followed by 95C and 101D Regiments, all of which relocated to the west. At the same time, the 304th PAVN Division withdrew to the southwest. That did not mean, however that battle was over. On 22March over 1,000 North Vietnamese rounds fell on the base, and, once again, the ammo dump was detonated.

On 30 March, Bravo Company, 1/26 Marines, launched an attack toward the location of the ambush that had claimed so many of their comrades on 25 February. Following a rolling barrage fired by nine artillery batteries, the Marine attack advanced through two PAVN trench lines, but the Marines failed to locate the remains of the men of the ambushed patrol. The Marines claimed 115 North Vietnamese killed while their own casualties amounted to ten dead, 100 wounded, and two missing. At 08:00 on the following day, Operation Scotland was officially terminated. Operational control of the Khe Sanh area was handed over to the Army's 1st Cavalry Division for the duration of Operation Pegasus.

Cumulative friendly casualties for Operation Scotland, which began on 1 November 1967, were: 205 killed in action, 1,668 wounded, and 25 missing and presumed dead. These figures do not include casualties among Special Forces troops at Lang Vei, aircrews killed or missing in the area or Marine replacements killed or wounded while entering or exiting the base aboard aircraft. As far as North Vietnamese casualties were concerned, 1,602 bodies were counted, seven prisoners were taken, and two enemy rallied to allied forces during the operation. American intelligence estimated that between 10,000 and 15,000 PAVN troops were killed during the operation. These figures, however, should be considered in light of the methods by which they were obtained. The estimates were almost exclusively gathered by indirect means: sensor readings, sightings of secondary explosions, reports of defectors or POWs, and inference or extrapolation.

Relief and Results Operation Pegasus

Planning for the overland relief of Khe Sanh had begun as early as 25 January 1968 when Westmoreland ordered General John J. Tolson, commander of the Army's 1st Air Cavalry Division, to prepare a contingency plan. Route 9, the only practical overland route from the east, was impassable due to its poor state of repair and the presence of PAVN troops. Tolson was not happy with the assignment, since he believed that the best course of action, post-Tet, was to utilize his division in an attack into the A Shau Valley. Westmoreland, however, was already planning ahead. Khe Sanh would be relieved and then utilized as the jump-off point for a "hot pursuit" of enemy forces into Laos.

On 2 March, Tolson presented a briefing and laid out the concept of what became known as Operation Pegasus. The operational plan for what was to become the largest operation launched by III MAF thus far in the conflict, was simple. The 2nd Battalion 1St Marine Regiment and the 2nd Battalion 3rd Marine Regiment would set out from LZ Stud at Ca Lu (16 kilometers to the east of Khe Sanh) and head down Route 9 while elements of the 1st Air Cavalry leapfrogged by helicopter down the road, air-assaulting onto key terrain features to cover the Marine advance. The advance would be supported by the fire of 102 pieces of artillery. The Marines would be accompanied by their 11th Engineer Battalion, which would repair the road as the advance moved forward. Later, the 1st Battalion 1st Marine regiment and 3rd ARVN Airborne Task Force (the 3rd, 6th, and 8th Airborne Battalions) would join the operation.

General Westmoreland's planned relief effort infuriated the Marines, who had not wanted to hold Khe Sanh in the first place and who had been roundly criticized for not defending it well. The Marines had constantly argued that technically, Khe Sanh had never been under siege, since it had never truly been isolated from re-supply or reinforcement. General Cushman was appalled by the "implication of a rescue or breaking of the siege by outside forces."

Regardless, on 1 April, Operation Pegasus began. Opposition from the North Vietnamese was light and the only problem that hampered the operation was continual heavy morning cloud cover that slowed the pace of helicopter operations. As the relief force advanced, the Marines at Khe Sanh moved out from their positions and began patrolling at greater distances from the base. Things heated up for the air cavalrymen on 6 April, when the 3rd Brigade encountered a PAVN blocking force and fought a day-long engagement.

On the following day, the 2nd Brigade of the 1st Air Cavalry captured the old French fort near Khe Sanh village after a three-day battle. The link-up between the relief force and the Marines at KSCB took place at 08:00 on 8 April, when the 2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry entered the camp. The 11th Engineers proclaimed Route 9 open to traffic on 11 April On that day, the commander of the 1st Air Cavalry ordered his unit to immediately make ready for operations in the A Shau Valley. At 0800 on 15 April, Operation Pegasus was officially terminated. American casualties amounted to 92 killed in action, 667 wounded, and five missing. 33 ARVN troops were killed and 187 wounded. Estimates of PAVN casualties were 1,100 killed and 13 captured.

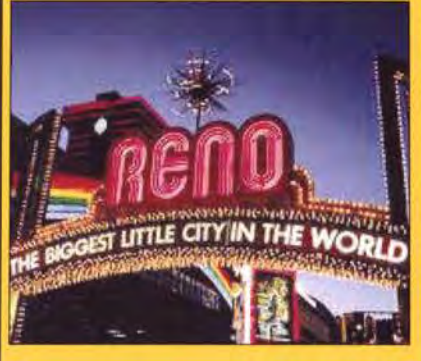
Reason Khe Sanh Veterans 2008 Annual Reunion



From the President:

I want to thank the membership for their trust in electing me President of the KSVA. I will do my best, as I have in my past positions, to promote and improve the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. The election also resulted with John Pessoni moving from Secretary to Vice President and Robert Moxley (formerly Director at Large) moving into the Secretary spot. Successful candidates for Director at Large include Neil Kenny, Larry McCartney and Luther Upton. WELCOME ABOARD.

Thanks go to Russell Turner for his outstanding leadership and guidance during his two terms as President and Co-Chairman of the Reunion Committee. Thanks also to the outgoing Directors at Large-Ed Feldman & Dale Pack. Last, but certainly not least, a giant Thank You to Colonel David Bulldog" Smith for his unwavering leadership at a Two Term President and Two Term Past President. You've left a tough act to follow!

The reunion was a success regardless of the Snafus caused by the Hotel. We have just returned from Reno Nevada and have completed plans for the 2008 Reunion. It will be held at the Silver Legacy Hotel, Reno NV July 28-03 August 2008. The complete details are included in this issue.

A Big Thank You From Russell Turner

I want to thank the membership for their overwhelming support during the two terms I was honored to have served as your President. Your continuing support made my job a lot easier. I know Tommy will continue to improve our organization as he has done in the past. I also congratulate John Pessoni & Bob Moxley on their election to Vice President and Secretary respectfully, as well as our three new Directors at large: Larry McCartney, Luther Upton and Neil Kenny. A thank you also goes to Ed Feldman & Dale pack our outgoing Directors at Large.

From The Vice President

I want to thank the membership for their faith in electing me Vice President of the Khe Sanh Veterans. With my new job I also assumed the responsibilities as Director of the Khe Sanh Veterans PX. I have many plans to expand our inventory and offer many new Items. The new telephone number for the PX is 732-948-9803. Please continue your terrific support of the PX. Profits allow us to publish our Red Clay Magazine, which is consistently improving with your support.

REUNION SHORTS

The Prodigal Bible Finds its Way Home. "A Terrific Reunion Story"

By Tom Eichler

I was approached by former colonel Nick Romanetz and Captain Ernie Spencer at the 2007 KSV reunion in Washington, DC with a very interesting tale. While going through some old memorabilia, the Colonel found a Bible which was given to him at Khe Sanh by a chaplain or his assistant. He observed that the Bible was already inscribed with a name and the following story tells how the Bible was reunited with its original owner

Colonel Nick Romanetz:
Prior to this year's KSV Reunion in DC, I was rummaging through my old military stuff looking for items to donate to the silent auction. One item I came across was a pocket Bible, that had been given to me by a Chaplain or his assistant during the siege. The small Bible was encrusted in red dust and the cover was beginning to separate from the body of the book. I had put my name, rank, unit and time at Khe Sanh inside the front cover of the book. However, my information was placed above the name of a person printed in the "property of" section of the Bible. In recent years, because of visits to the KSV home page, I recognized that name as someone who occasionally posted, but I did not know the individual. Checking the membership directory and the web site for reunion attendees, I saw that John Rowland was a member of D/1/26 and was scheduled to attend the reunion. After the Bible had almost been donated to a Vietnam Museum at MCRD San Diego, I decided to bring the Bible to the reunion and try and find John Rowland and determine how his name came to be in the Bible and explain how it came into my possession.

After getting settled in at DC, I went to a person I knew could help me find John. The always reliable "Macho Man" Ernie Spencer knew John and within minutes, pointed him out to me in the hotel lobby area. I approached John, introduced myself and showed him the Bible. He looked astounded and asked where I got the Bible from, explaining that it had been his and somehow he lost or misplaced it. After some small talk, we went our separate ways and in my mind, a small mystery was now solved, end of story.

Shortly thereafter, Ernie approached me and explained that he spoke to John about the Bible and John shared with Ernie in detail the significance of that Bible in John's life and his Khe Sanh/Vietnam experience. Ernie asked if there was any way possible the Bible could be returned to John and without hesitation, I agreed. Ernie suggested we not let John know of our discussion and Ernie suggested that I present the Bible to John prior to the start of the dinner.

For those of you in attendance at the dinner, you know that I was able to give the audience a brief background on the Bible and, after 39 years, return it to its rightful owner. Once again, membership in KSV and being an active member of the organization has provided someone with a bit more "closure" to our Khe Sanh experience.

Tom Eichler:

I later interviewed John to obtain the full story how John obtained, and lost the Bible subsequent to its return at the reunion.

John stated the Bible was given to him by a chaplain in early January 68 shortly after Tet, along with a rosary, which John still possesses. The Bible was of great comfort to John many times during the onslaught of incoming and the precious times when we had a few moments to rest. Delta was not given much notice when they were told to saddle up and left Khe Sanh after the siege, John was under the impression they would be coming back to the base after the operational sweep they went on. John, somehow, negligently left it behind with a few other personal items. "We never went back," John stated, instead went to the Rock Pile, and a few other places, each worse than the one we left, I would have felt better if it had of went with me. It was a total surprise getting it back...it is an important keepsake, red stains and all, that I will pass on to my grandson with a little history of when and where it was first given to me and how I was reunited with it after all these years."

Thank you Nicholas Romanetz from the bottom of my heart.

MY KHE SANH EXPERIENCES

By James Dalto
Kilo Company 3/26 Hill 861

MED EVACTED

During the second week of February 1968, Lang Vei was overrun and a big, silver C-13O crashed and burned on the Khe Sanh airstrip. I was assigned to a working party to dig a foot-deep trench from our Platoon CP down in the main trench located at the Company CP on top of the hill. This small trench would, hopefully, protect the lima-lima line from shrapnel. The lima-lima line was simply a field telephone wire, or land line, which allowed instant communication between the Command Post. Shrapnel from enemy mortars had a habit of regularly clipping said wire and cutting off communications between the Command Post.

I was one of two men assigned the task. The other Marine assigned had been injured, and should have been in a hospital. He had become robot like, and had to be ordered to seek protection when we were being shelled. We decided that the safe way for us to accomplish the mission was to complete the task ASAP. We began digging like a pair of gophers and had finished about 25 feet when we were hit by incoming. None of us was hit by shrapnel but the concussion blew both of us into the trench line. The Marine that was helping me, struck an empty grenade case and suffered a deep gash across the bridge of his nose and was bleeding pretty bad. I landed on my head crushing my face and jaw and injuring my back teeth.

I remained conscious and there was a lull in the barrage. A few seconds later I could faintly hear Sergeant Strong hustling down the trench, yelling, "Is everyone OK? Is everyone OK?" like he always did after an attack, his concern for his men driving him to get help to anyone who needed it ASAP. When he observed us lying in the trench line he began yelling, "Ripple up, Ripple up the coded call for a Corpsman." As soon as he left, mortar rounds started impacting in the trench. I was slowly regaining some of my faculties and noticed we were only a few yards away from gun bunker. After a few attempts, I was finally able to speak legibly, yelling out, "You! In the gun bunker! We need help" Sorry! We don't make house calls in weather like this", came the disappointing reply.

Though I still couldn't stand, I was by this time able to crawl, and angered by their response. I managed to crawl over my buddy's body. Then, using only my arms, lever his body over mine, closer to the door of the gun bunker. Three times I repeated this process, until I finally heaved him to the doorway. Two sets of arms immediately emerged, the hands grabbing the shoulders of his flak jacket and dragging him inside. I was completely spent, I couldn't even crawl. I was able to rollover onto my stomach, just enough for the men in the bunker to see one of my outstretched arms. A moment later, strong hands gripped my right wrist and I felt myself being pulled inside to safety. I felt a great surge of relief, and then promptly passed out.

The next several days were no fun for me at all. The conditions on 861 were bad and I soon developed a raging infec-tion in my gums. It was bad and the Head Corpsman determined I had to be med-evaced, ASAP. The weather gods, must have had it in for me, the cloud cover rolled in again, completely enclosing the LZ for days. By the time the LZ was usable again, I was feverish and disoriented and it took several attempts to get on a chopper. In fact, I don't even remember boarding any chopper.

I recall wandering around the main Khe Sanh base, looking for the dentist's office. This took quite some time, but I finally wandered into the dentist's office. A dentist administered Novocain and the pain went away. The dentist determined my crushed teeth and swol-len gums were combining to make it impossible for the doctor to be able to extract the infected teeth. The in-struments he needed had been destroyed in the shelling so he ordered me to be transferred to Dong-Ha for treatment. I reported to the Landing Zone Master, who informed me that there were no more aircraft flights due in that day; I'd have to come back the next morning.

I made my way to the Kilo Company rear area, near the Battalion Aid Station, checked in, and settled in for the night. Things were going fairly well until the Novocain wore off. The pain of half-extracted teeth caused me pain beyond the bounds of one's imagination. I spent that eternal night in what can only be described as hideous pain. So intense that I was actually begging people to shoot me, just to make it stop.

Morning finally came and some kind soul drove me down to the airstrip, where the LZ Master took one look at my evac tag and told me that there was a fixed wing due in shortly, and that I was to run onto it the moment it came to a stop. Even in my semi-delirious state, that sounded like the world's most excellent idea to me.

I waited in a large bunker full of other casualties, which was located adjacent to a widened area of the runway; a turnaround area. As we waited, members of the LZ party circulated among us, assigning teams of ambulatory casualties to individual stretcher cases, with instructions to carry said stretcher onto the plane once the LZ Master gave us the signal to move.

Despite my pain and delirium, I was able to reach deep down into my psyche and tap into the last of my physical and mental reserves. Crouching almost like a runner waiting for the starter's gun, I concentrated, focusing all my attention on the LZ Master in the doorway. The wait felt like an eternity, but was probably no more than 15 minutes. Suddenly, the LZ master was signaling us to move out, punctuating his hand movements by yelling, "Move. Move. Move." with each wave of his arm. Parris Island conditioning suddenly kicked in and I found myself up and moving in almost perfect coordination with the other men carrying our assigned stretcher. Out the door we burst, our ears assailed by the beautiful scream of turbo-prop engines. A camouflage painted C-123 loomed into view, dropping its rear ramp as it moved. The plane jerked to a stop just as the first of our gaggle reached the bottom of the loading ramp. Up and in we hustled, barely noticing the disembarking replacements moving past us.

Within moments, everybody was on board, the Crew Chief yelled into his microphone, and the plane jerked into motion, the rear ramp rising as we moved. The pilots hustled that big bird down to the end of the runway, wheeled it around like a Corvette pulling out of a drive-in diner, then, without stopping, pushed the throttles to the stops and we screamed down the strip. The landing gear banged over the seams of the Marston Matting at an ever quickening pace for a few seconds, then went silent as we broke free of the ground. Almost immediately the tail dropped as the pilots put the nose up and clawed that beast up into the sky. As the plane spiraled upward, I caught a last glimpse of Khe Sanh wheeling beneath us. Artillery fire was hitting the airstrip.

Relief seemed to melt my bones at this point, and I, as the saying goes, fell right through my ass, and collapsed to the deck next to my assigned stretcher. I revived somewhat a few minutes later, when the plane's crew began circulating among us, passing out packs of Marlboros, smiling and nodding, offering whatever non-verbal comfort they could. At that moment, I actually loved those guys. I damn near cried.

It then occurred to me that I had a full pack, 20 whole cigarettes. I ripped that pack open, jammed a Marlboro in my mouth, and fired that sucker up. I drew that first delicious drag deep into my lungs, reveling as the nicotine buzz coursed through me and started to dampen my shakes. Satisfied, I turned and grinned at the guy whose stretcher I'd helped carry. In response, he held up two fingers on his unbandaged hand in the wordless universal plea, "Hey buddy, can I get a smoke?" I hesitated a moment, noting the bandages swaddling his chest, then nodded. I pulled out another cigarette, lit it off my own, and gave it to him. We lay there together and chain smoked for the rest of the flight.

A short time later, the C-123 circled and began to descend, almost fluttering down to a nearly glass-smooth land-ing on some huge airstrip. Once we'd taxied to a halt, the engines shut down, and the ramp came down. I could see a bunch of ambulances and several helicopters parked along the tarmac. Air Force medics then hustled aboard and began to gently move us off the aircraft. My smoking buddy and I ended up together on a weird looking silver Air Force helicopter. It had two tilted rotors, mounted side-by-side on top, so the rotors moved through each other's arcs, like the blades of a mix master. As we lifted off, the thing flew weird; in a series of sort of juddering hops. It was a bit unsettling.

We didn't have much time to worry, in just a few minutes we were sitting on a helipad in front of what was obviously a hospital, a real big one. A stretcher-bearing party quickly hustled my smoking buddy away, while a Corpsman took me by the arm and led me into a nearby building. The blast of air conditioning that hit my face when the door opened almost floored me. My escort steadied me, led me over to what I assumed was a Corpsman, and helped me into a chair next to the desk. The Corpsman leaned over, grabbed my evac-tag, and carefully examined it. "You're not supposed to be here." he said. "Huh?" I replied, completely flummoxed. "This evac-tag says you should be in Dong Ha." "I'm not? Then where the hell am I?" "You're in Danang this is the Naval Hospital at China Beach" he added, giving me a look reserved for gibbering idiots. "You have to get up to Dong Ha for treatment." "How do I do that?" I asked in desperation. "Not my problem." he replied, with the calloused tone of a born bureaucrat, and then waved me away in dismissal.

Crushed, almost overcome by despair, I rose to my feet and staggered away. I was so disoriented by this time that I headed in the wrong direction, toward a larger desk sitting by itself at the far end of the office, some tears of frustration coursing down my face. The man sitting behind the larger desk, a salty older Master Chief wearing crisply pressed khakis, noticed my distress. He rose, walked over to me and asked what was wrong. He patiently listened to my tale of woe and, with a sympathetic look in he eyes he reached out to touch my arm, his mouth opening to make his reply. The instant he touched my arm, however, his eyes widened in alarm and his hand flew up to my forehead.

"Holy Shit!" he exclaimed as the back of his hand touched my forehead, "This man is burning up! A second later he spoke again, the tone of command snapping out, "We're admitting this man, stat! Get him a seat. Detail somebody to get him a wheelchair and take him down to Dental Surgery! And, for God's sake, someone get him a cup of coffee!" In a blur of activity, I was lowered into a chair by gentle hands and a cup of coffee was pressed into my hands. This done, The Chief laid a comforting hand on my shoulder, leaned over, smiled, and said, "You just relax, son. We'll take good care of you now." instantly guaranteeing my vote for his sainthood.

Less than 15 minutes later, I was sitting in a dentist's chair, with a doctor and two Corpsmen prepping me for surgery. While one Corpsman started me on an IV set-up, both to rehydrate me and bring my fever down, the doctor began to pump Novocain into my gums, shot after shot, until my entire face seemed to go cold and numb. The numbness devoured my pain, leaving me practically wallowing with relief in the chair.

The doctor talked to me the entire time, explaining in detail everything that was going on. Drifting in pain-free bliss, I wouldn't have cared if he'd started farting out Sousa marches; but I listened raptly as the doctor explained, in a reassuring voice, how he had the Corpsman starting huge doses of' antibiotics through my IV set-up, and a number of other procedures. I was too giddy with relief to give much of a damn about anything.

Once he was sure that the Novocain had taken effect, the doctor began the extractions. As he worked, I became more and more amazed at how easily my teeth were coming out. From previous experience, I knew that pulling teeth took quite a bit of effort, but not on this occasion. They seemed to be coming out with all the effort it would take to pull the petals off a daisy. The doctor showed me each tooth as it was extracted. The roots of each one were covered, with some sort of white corruption. The doctor explained that the white stuff was the infection itself; and that the teeth had already been detached from the jawbone by the infection, which was why they were coming out so easily.

It took about an hour until the doctor finally finished. He'd extracted all of my top teeth and two of my lower back molars, which, he explained, had been badly broken in my fall. Those lower molars had been the most difficult extractions, since the infection hadn't progressed as far as the others. They weren't detached from the jawbone, but they were too damaged to save. As the doctor stitched up my gums, he told me that all of my remaining teeth had been severely traumatized, and that I would probably lose the rest of them by the time I was forty.

After a bit of rest and once the doctor decided I was stabilized, I was helped back into my wheelchair and taken down to a general ward. One of the ward staff helped me into a hospital bed and I was left in peace. Exhausted, depleted, pain free at last, I fell asleep almost immediately. I woke up the next morning to a blood- soaked pillow with a Purple Heart pinned to the pillowcase, and with absolutely no immediate memory of where I was or how I'd gotten there.

FIELD EXPEDIENT

Once I'd been discharged from the hospital, I was sent back up to Khe Sanh, until such time as a dental plate could be made for me. On my return to Khe Sanh, I reported in at Kilo Company's rear area, expecting to be choppered back up to Hill 861. Instead, after conferring with a doctor up at the B.A.S., Kilo's Top Sergeant told me that I had to stay down in the main perimeter with the rear element Something about there being no 'soft' foods up on the hill. I'ld have to wait until I had teeth again before I could return to the Company. Since the Top Sergeant pointedly mentioned I didn't need teeth to work, and I was otherwise unhurt, the Top decided to give me a job. Assistant Supply N.C.O. For a moment, I was flattered. A real job title and everything, an. ad hoc N.C.O.. My balloon was popped a minute later, when the Top gave me a more detailed overview of what my new job entailed.

It seemed that every day the CP up on Hill 861 would radio down a list of specific supplies that the Company needed for that day. The Top would compile, then scan the list, separating out the items available within the KSCB itself, then pass along the rest. He would then give this 'locally available' list to the Supply N.C.O., in this case, another P.F.C. named Brown (my boss), and order him to transport this stuff down to the staging area down at the LZ. Brown would then grab me up, we'd jump on the Mechanical Mule, and off we'd go.

Now, the Mechanical Mule was a weird little vehicle which everybody seemed to inexplicably, love. Why? I have no idea. This vehicle was as low-tech as you could imagine. It was simply a flat, rectangular deck surrounded by a short rail, with a tubular-steel framed driver's seat welded onto the front. The thing had a souped-up lawn-mower engine, a three-speed manual transmission, and no suspension system; just four rubber tires at the ends of two straight axles. Since Brown, like everybody stuck in that beleaguered perimeter had developed a great aversion to being out in the open, he tended to always drive at top speed. That tendency, plus the lack of a suspension and those myriad holes which seemed to magically appear allover the place, meant that we spent a lot of our driving time airborne. I had to maintain a death grip on the railing to avoid falling off. I didn't complain. My attitude toward being out in the open exactly mirrored Brown's.

While both Brown and I worked together loading and unloading our cargo, my main duty was to hold onto the cargo as we bombed along. As for loading, we always strived to accomplish that just as quickly as possible, since any supply point, like the P.O.L. depot (petrol, oil and lubricants), or any ammo dumps, were all prime targets for the NVA. As for unloading, we worked out methods designed to cut a lot of time out of the process, since the airstrip was the NVA's #1 prime target. It was no place to linger.

The method we came up with was as we neared the painted circle at the end of the runway which designated Kilo Company's staging point, I would jump off the still-moving Mule and running alongside, start to sling the cargo toward the circle while Brown braked the thing to a stop. Sometimes I was able to complete the unloading before Brown completed stopping. At other times, when our cargo was delicate or more usually liable to explode, we handled it a bit more carefully. That was simply good common sense. While it did take longer, especially when handling an item like a case of 106mm Recoilless Rifle rounds, (which took two people to lift) we would only take a few moments to unload. The LZ landing party had the job of getting the stuff on a chopper or in a cargo net so once we were off-loaded we were free to jump back onto the Mule and bomb on home.

Like anyone else, when not working I tended to jump in a hole and stay there. My hole was a small, tiny actually, one-man bunker that I shared with one of the Company clerks, a Corporal named Andrusi. There was just enough room inside to set up a single folding canvas cot, which the two of us shared. (Nothing romantic, folks.) Andrusi was a fairly organized dude, so he had some amenities available; candles, his own 5-gallon jerry can of water and a case of Kool-Aid. His prize possession was a small, battery-powered record player and maybe three 45 rpm records. Nowhere near all the comforts of home, but all in all not too bad, considering. Add a steady supply of cigarettes and we were in hog heaven.

The fly in the ointment in this little set-up was Andrusi's best friend, another clerk/Corporal named Rogers. Roger's main claim to fame was his aversion to sleeping in a bunker. In deference to his touch of claustrophobia, he'd set up a cot in the large tent that served as the Company office. I always thought of him as a bit of a sarcastic S.O.B., mainly because he immediately nicknamed me "Fang" because of my severe lack of teeth at the time. This raised a few problems for me because Rogers, being Andrusi's best buddy, spent most of his free time hanging out in our bunker. The two of them would sometimes gang up on me, poking fun.

They used to heckle me mercilessly about being a grunt. While most people are aware that inter service rivalries, like the Marines vs. the Army, or the Navy, or the Air Force, exist, they aren't aware that some rivalries exist within the various services. In this particular incidence, the two of them were what we grunts called "pogues". Pogues were rear-echelon types, the ones we grunts called "The guys in the rear, with the beer and the gear." They in turn laid nicknames like "bush beast", on us grunts. They always loudly proclaim that a dude had to be dumb, or crazy, or both, to end up as a grunt. While it wasn't anywhere near as intense as street-gang behavior, they did manage to really tick me off sometimes. I began thinking up ways to get back at them. Lowly grunt my ass.

Andrusi unwittingly provided me with the exact opportunity I was looking for one morning. Brown and I were getting ready to make our daily supply run when Andrusi asked me, in an almost offhand way, to see if I could scrounge up some nails during my travels. He went on to explain that he wanted the nails so we could hammer them into one of the wooden support beams in our bunker, so we could hang our gear on them rather than throw the stuff under our cot. I immediately realized that this was a fool's errand, we didn't have a hammer. Not letting on that I'd realized I was the potential butt of his little joke, I agreed that it sounded like a great idea and promised to see what I could do. Of course,I had something completely different in mind; a plan both diabolical and stunningly brilliant, downright evil, in fact.

That was a terribly difficult morning for me. It was extremely hard to keep a straight face while I was practically gibbering with anticipation inside. Luckily there was no one in sight when I finally did find some nails, so I was able to do a little happy dance to tide me over through the remainder of my little counter scam. I was also able to take advantage of the few moments of privacy to perform the most important part of my set-up; removing the blasting cap from my emergency frag, a grenade that I always carried with me, hanging by its spoon, which was inserted in the little pencil pocket on my flak jacket.

Arriving back at our bunker, I took a moment to compose myself then dropped down into the bunker, to discover that the set-up was absolutely perfect. Both Rogers and Andrusi were sitting there on the cot, grinning at me. "Hey man," I chirped, "I found some nails!" I continued, pulling them out of my pant's pocket and showing them to Andrusi. "Hey, great man!" he replied, "Now we're all set!" "Yeah" I continued, "Now all I need is a hammer!" "Hammer, we ain't got no effin' hammer!" Andrusi said, still blissfully unaware that I was no longer the butt of his little joke. He and Rogers grinned at each other in anticipation, both of them obviously in on the joke.

Working up a 'thinking hard' face, I hemmed and hawed for a moment, then did a 'Eurekal!' face. Then I took one of the nails, set it point-first against a wooden beam, and, before either of them could react, grabbed my emergency frag and started whacking the head of the nail with the base of the frag, hard enough to pierce the thin metal skin of the grenade. For a moment the two of them froze goggling in horror, then simultaneously bolted for the bunker door, where they had a brief, but extremely vicious little fight to be the first one out the door. Rogers won. He was a short timer down to about two weeks.

I was still laughing several minutes later when the Top stuck his head through the entryway and said, "Hey Dalto! Your buddies tell me you're driving nails with a grenade Don't you know that's dangerous?" "Not when you take the cap out first, Top." I snickered back, quickly unscrewing the ring and spoon assembly and holding it up to illustrate its fuse free status. "Just teaching those fool pogues not to mess with a grunt," I added.

Though he tried not to laugh, the Top just busted up at that. He head back to the CP Bunker, shaking his head and still laughing. My two victims returned to our bunker several minutes later suitably abashed. No more special errands for me. The kidding incidents also dropped in frequency, precipitately. They were especially careful not to say the word " crazy" around me again. As for the nails, I used an E tool to complete hammering them into the beams. Hanging up our gear was really a good idea.

NEW TEETH

February slowly rolled into March, each day seeming to stretch into years. Tedium and terror combined in mind-numbing monotony while tales of close calls circulated among our bunker society. In our Company area, delayed-action fused artillery round had hit between us and the B.A.S. leaving an unbelievably deep and wide crater, which gave anyone who saw it quite the case of the willies. There wasn't a man among us that hadn't had at least one close call.

I suspect it really was our own fault. Andrusi and I were snugly ensconced in our little bunker, doing our Kool-Aid, cigarettes, playing records thing; the Khe Sanh equivalent of an orgy, except without the sex or booze. Dazed by this non-debauchery, it never occurred to us that we were burning a candle, and maybe our light discipline wasn't so good. I have absolutely no recollection of what happened next, having been severely and instantly rendered unconscious. In fact, the entirety of the next two days is really fuzzy. When I try to think back on this period, all I get is the impression that I was inside this gigantic bell. Andrusi filled me in about the details later, once I could hear him again.

According to Andrusi, one of those Katyusha siege rockets exploded right next to our bunker. He said the explosion was so loud he couldn't even hear the start of it. Just, all of a sudden, his ears are screaming and me, he and everything else in the bunker is airborne inside this chunky black cloud, then all of it landing in a single heap in the far corner of the bunker. Andrusi added that while he had not been knocked out, he had most definitely been heavy-duty stunned, so it took him a while to get his fecal material recompacted and start to make sense of things again. One of the first things he noticed was that the really heavy thing on top of him was me. Immediately his priority switched to my buddy's-hurt mode. He said he worked on me about ten frantic minutes before I finally came to. Then he dragged me out of there and up to the B.A.S.

The crazy doctor went over me pretty thoroughly up at the B.A.S. other than a nose bleed and various bumps and bruises associated with taking an unscheduled flight inside a bunker, I was physically unhurt. Most of my problems, including my screaming headache, came from a double dose of concussion. Not only had I taken a very large dose of the semi-solid wall of air type of blast concussion, I had also, since my head had been in contact with the wall closest to the explosion, taken the equivalent of a right haymaker from ground concussion. There was also the possibility that I had landed on my head at some point. While at first I did get a smidgen of sympathy from the crazy doctor, who's current insanity emerged immediately after he'd been a tad too close to the first ammo dump that had blown up back in January, such sympathy quickly evaporated. The second he determined that my injuries weren't life threatening, he completely lost interest in me. He told a corpsman to give me a big bottle of Darvon and then told me to go away. Like I said crazy.

Andrusi told me he'ld taken me back to our bunker, where, he added, rather than just falling asleep I immediately seemed to lapse quietly into a coma. I was slightly more lucid when I struggled back to consciousness late the next morning, and it was no fun at all. My entire body, every last atom of it, seemed to be vibrating; my head felt like I had an elephant sitting on it. My hearing was like I had a thick gauze bandage wrapped around my ears. I felt like screaming, but I instinctively knew it would hurt too damn much. Andrusi, God bless him, started feeding Darvon to me until the pain faded enough for me to stand up. Bladder pressure then forced me up and out of the bunker. When I turned to start toward the head, I promptly fell into this God-awful crater. My cognitive faculties weren't quite up to speed yet, and it hadn't occurred to me that there might be a big hole nearby and I should maybe look out for it. Luckily, I didn't wet myself, but I was so discombobulated that I instinctively knew that I had no chance of making it out of that hole with dry pants. I was still in the process of relieving myself when Andrusi wandered up, looked down at me, and said, "Yeah, that effin' hole scares the piss outta me too."

He was right. That effin' hole was downright scary. The damn thing was bigger than our bunker. The sight of our tiny bunker seemingly teetering on the very edge of that chasm reduced me to a weak-in-the-knees, gibbering idiot. One full layer of sandbags was nothing but eviscerated ragged tatters. Bad as our bunker looked, the company office tent was much worse. Most of the shrapnel produced by the rocket had splashed forward into the tent, chopping up all the equipment inside. A good deal had hit Rogers' cot, reducing it to kindling and shredding his poncho liner. Rogers hadn't been in his bunk when the rocket had hit. He'd been visiting over at the CP bunker at the time. He was short, less than a week away from his DEROS, and his 'short timer's blues' had him at a level of paranoia so intense that you could almost see an aura. This incident didn't help him any. While it did instantly cure him of his aversion to sleeping in a bunker, it now became a major chore to get him out of a hole. When he did emerge, he scurried a lot.

As I continued to eat Darvon like Tic-Tacs, life swiftly returned to what passed for normal at the KSCB. Though Andrusi and I were pretty tight by then, I was nowhere near the point of forgiving Rogers for the Fang nickname he'd laid on me. I soon reverted back to my normal pagan ways and tormented him in every way I could, mainly tweaking his paranoia at every opportunity. Every morning he'ld wake up looking hopeful, cheerfully chirping about how little time he had until the sacred 'wake-up'. I'ld give him the hairy eyeball and say, "You aren't outta here yet. Those suckers are after your butt, personal-like!" and then cackle like a crazed hyena as I watched his bubble burst. Some people thought I should lighten up on the dude, but he never did stop calling me 'Fang'.

Finally, one very, very good day, two sets of orders came in. One set ordered me down to Danang to get my new teeth. The other set was Rogers' Freedom Bird ticket; he was going back to the "World". I hadn't seen a happier look on a man's face since the first time a lady mistook my face for a saddle. He almost instant-ly disappeared, then reappeared two minutes later with all his gear in hand, literally dragging Brown behind him, and giving me a "Why aren't you ready yet?" glare. You can't argue with a man when he's right, and all I had to do was grab my rifle, so it was less than ten minutes later when Brown dropped us off at the LZ.

After presenting our orders to the LZ Master, we were directed to the staging bunker. We were organized into a boarding stick and told to stand by; the first chopper would be coming in once the ground fog cleared. The wait, like all such waits when something good lies at the end of it, quickly became interminable. Every second seeming to move through glue. Being right next to Rogers was no great treat either. He spent the entire time chain smoking and softly chanting "Lift, Goddammit!" at the fog under his breath. As irksome as this soon became, I didn't bust his chops about it. I figured that if something bad happened to him at that point, it would probably also happen to me. At long last we got the stand-up signal, then the wave-out and bustled outside to see a beautiful Banana Boat touch down as we cleared the bunker. Up the boarding ramp we hustled !(Nobody, but nobody got on or off a helicopter slowly at Khe Sanh.) The last man onboard raised his arm to signal the crew chief, who then yelled into his mike, and the pilot jerked that bird off the ground. Willing the thing up, we passengers fixed our eyes out the back end watching the ground race away from us. Right about the count of five, we saw a mortar round explode in the exact spot we had just vacated. There was a momentary flash of fear, then relief as we continued to gain altitude without a hitch. A minute later and we were in cloud. We could breathe again. We continued to climb until we popped out above the cloud layer. Khe Sanh was blessedly out of sight.

A short and fairly jubilant flight later and we were on the ground in Danang, a place widely believed by the average grunt to be safer than, say, Cleveland. In contrast to the tension we'd been under at Khe Sanh, we were now relaxed to the point where we were able walk naturally, rather than march or run, amazed at what a pleasure it was to walk erect. Eventually, we sauntered into the M.A.T. (Marine Air Terminal) and presented our orders to a clerk at the counter. Rogers was told that his Freedom Bird was scheduled to take off early the next morning, then directed to proceed to a transient barracks area located near the Freedom Hill PX complex. I was to proceed to the hospital at China Beach; and no, there was no bus. Rogers and I, never expecting to see each other again, split amicably and headed our separate ways.

I spent most of the rest of that morning asking directions as I hitch-hiked across the Danang perimeter, arriving at the hospital about a half hour before lunchtime. Amazingly, I had my new dental plate in time to still have lunch there. As good as it felt to be able to chew again and to have things like condiments available the greatest pleasure of the meal turned out to be simply sitting in a chair, at a table. I felt like Conan the Barbarian the first time he hit the big city.

Once they threw me out of the hospital mess hall, I started hitchhiking back toward the airfield. At one point, I was dropped off near a bridge somewhere around the Deep Water Pier. As soon as I cleared the truck my antennae went up; I could hear gunfire. Confusingly, the firing didn't sound anything like a firefight. It had the steady deliberation of a firing range. As I moved forward, I noticed a long line of Marines spaced about ten meters apart the entire length of the upstream side of the bridge. Each man, in no particular order, was firing down into the river every few moments. Perplexed, M-16 at the ready, I moved up to the first man on the line and asked if he needed any help. Without ever taking his eyes off the water upstream, firing slowly and steadily, the guy explained to me that his unit was the bridge guard. He went on to explain that the enemy regularly tried to blow up that bridge by floating explosives down the river. The guards' job was to shoot at anything floating down the river before it came within 50 meters of the bridge. They did this 24/7, using big spotlights at night. I left that place shaking my spinning head at the complete insanity and perfect sense of their job.

I made it back to the M.A.T. around 1600 hours, only to learn that there were no more flights up to the KSCB that day. I was then directed to spend the night at the same transient barracks that Rogers had headed for that morning. Still being somewhat sane, I felt no great urge to zip back up to Khe Sanh, so this sounded like an idea I could really get behind. Cheerfully unlimbering my thumb again, off I went. Within an hour-and-a-half, I was checked into the transient barracks. I'd had a lot of people staring at me during my travels, very probably because my jungle utilities were a different color than anyone else's; the same rusty Khe Sanh's clay. As a result, I had quite a few things planned; taking a long shower, washing my filthy clothes, sleeping on a mattress, with a pillow and sheets. All such plans were summarily scuttled a few moments later when I ran into Rogers and his new posse of short-timers.

They had several extremely interesting items of information for me. First they told me that the big place across the road was the Freedom Hill PX complex. Then, much more importantly, they added that you could get California-style cheeseburgers, French fries, and, wonder of wonders, beer. My immediate reply was, "We ain't there yet?" We spent the remainder of that evening rapidly drinking ourselves comatose(we called it the Tooth & Freedom Party).

At 0500 the next morning, well before the first blush of dawn some sadistic S.O.B. started pumping reveille through a bunch of large loudspeakers at full volume, the noise of which heterodyned disastrously with our crippling hangovers. Startled into movement, we were herded onto what we called 'cattle cars' open flat-bed trailers equipped with rows of wooden bench seats. Fifteen minutes later we found ourselves standing in the dark very near the end of a line of men more than 500 feet long. This line led into a large mess hall tent, located near both the airstrip and the M.A.T.
Not a big fan of standing at the end of a very long line and savagely hung over, I was not in a good mood. Rogers' cheerful chirping about being so close to safety and already past the sacred 'wake up' swiftly raised my bile. Overwhelmed by the urge to ply the needle one last time, I said, "Hey man, you're not out of Nam yet. Those effers could still get your skinny ass!"

No sooner were these words out of my mouth than two large Katyusha rockets exploded on the far side of the airstrip, more than a quarter-mile away. The timing couldn't have been better if I'd paid those gunners. The immediate reaction was complete chaos, with hundreds of people scattering in every direction at very high rates of speed. All except me. I'd only run a few strides. Inured to conditions at the KSCB, enemy fire hitting at that distance didn't worry me that much. Besides, I soon noticed that no more fire was coming in so I stopped. I soon found myself alone; everyone else had disappeared.

Since there was no longer a line of men in front of me, I decided no one could hassle me about cutting in line if they weren't there and hustled up to the door of the mess tent. Looking inside I was amazed to find the place completely deserted, even the cooks and servers had run off.

Incredulous, I drifted forward toward the serving line, almost slavering at the feast laid out before meat, eggs, pancakes, sausage, bacon, toast, butter, home fries, boxes of cereal, tapioca pudding, fresh fruit, chocolate milk, for God's sake! Smiling my brand new smile, I slowly scanned over the delicious vista and announced, "Well, well, well! Looks like the perfect chance for me to put my new teeth to the acid test!" Then, rubbing my palms together in glee, I dug in. I took some of everything I liked, just piling the food on my tray, stuffing every pocket I had with fruit and boxes of Post cereals, pouring myself an entire pitcher of chocolate milk. I ate and ate and ate--some more. After awhile, the mess hall staff filtered back in. They glared at me quite a bit, but I didn't care. I paused only long enough to give them the finger, then resumed eating. After a good hour of munching, my jaws aching, I was finally done. Struggling to my feet, I waddled out of there and over to the M.A.T., groaning with pleasurable pain.

As for Rogers; even though I kept an eye out for him, I never did see him again. I figure he must have dived into a hole somewhere and pulled it in after himself; emerging only to run up the boarding ladder of his Freedom Bird, probably cursing me with every step, not that I blame him.

SETTING A RECORD

Like any of my days at the KSCB. Once Brown and I had finished breakfast, we reported in to the Top, who gave us the welcome news that all we had to do was pick up and stage some engineer's stakes and we were done for the day. This had us in a pretty good mood as we set off. Within a half-hour, we were bouncing merrily along toward the airstrip, a dozen or so bundles of short engineer's stakes on board. I didn't even have to lay on the stakes to keep them aboard, so I could hold on with both hands, the extra security definitely a plus in my book.

Down at the LZ, our speed-unloading went perfectly. I had all the bundles off and staged before Brown could get out of his driver's seat and we were heading back, bombing along the end of the runway, relaxing and doing some sight-seeing. I was sitting cross-legged, Indian-style, staring off to our right at a weird looking armored vehicle called an Ontos, which was parked along the perimeter bunker line. When I turned to my left to impart this cogent observation to Brown, he wasn't there. He'd stuck the Mule in neutral and bailed out on me.

A motion caught my eye and I looked up to see three fountains of dirt, exploding enemy artillery rounds, at the far end of the airstrip. The sound of the first explosion reached me about the same time, punctuating the fact that the explosions were walking down the middle of the runway, directly toward me! I was off that Mule and sprinting toward the bunker line cringing as the noise of the explosions got louder, ergo closer, at a truly terrifying rate. By the time I hit the trench line concussion was slapping at me. A heartbeat later just as I was in the doorway of the nearest bunker, an artillery round exploded right next to it, close enough that I found myself deafened and flying through the air, enveloped in the dust ball of the explosion.

Things turned pretty hazy for me then. I'd bounced off the far wall of the bunker. Along with being pretty well jellied by concussion, all I could do was wallow on the deck in sheer terror, barely aware of the continuing barrage as it walked back over the bunker line. After some time, I recovered a bit, there was a lull in the shelling and I suddenly heard Brown's voice, yelling, "Hey Dalto! You alive?" "Yeah! Still in one piece!" I called back, clapping my helmet back on and sticking my head out of the bunker door, just in time to see Brown come pelting out of the trench. "Let's get the eff outta here!" he called as he legged it toward the Mule, sitting, a few hundred feet away still idling. Sounded like a great idea to me. A stride and a jump and I was out of the trench, but Brown was way ahead of me. He was in the driver's seat, had stuck the thing in gear, and dug out while I was still more than 100 feet away. About the time Brown hit second gear, artillery started coming in again hitting the airstrip. That inspired me to reach down inside myself and hit stripe-assed ape gear, gaining on the Mule. As Brown slapped that thing into third gear, I caught up with him and dived forward, landing belly down spread eagle on the flat deck of the Mule, grasping the deck rail with a death grip as Brown kept the pedal to the metal, practically flying through the shell holes.

Once we cleared the immediate impact area, Brown spared a second to glance over at me, then did a bit of a double-take and said, "Uh, Dalto ••• don't panic or nothin', but I think you're hit!" "What! Where!" I yelled, my lips going numb with panic. "Back of your left knee!" I craned around, frantically scanning down my body, and saw a wet, red stain about halfway down my left leg, setting off a molten wave of shock that seemed to drop my stomach straight through the soles of my feet. I spent the rest of that short trip cursing non-stop. I have no idea what I said, but it made Brown cringe a bit. We very quickly arrived at the Company area, whereupon Brown stuck the Mule in neutral, switched off the engine, jumped off the still-moving Mule, and dove into the CP bunker. I stayed on the Mule until it coasted to a stop, worried about further injuring my leg. With enemy shells still screaming overhead, I sat there for a few minutes, carefully checking my leg. After a very close inspection, I discovered that I was O.K., with no holes in my pants leg or, more importantly, my leg. There was some blood and tissue there, but I concluded it must have come from someone else. Vastly relieved, I instantly became so happy that it didn't occur to me for at least a week that I had a piece of someone else on my pants leg.

Almost giddy, I hopped off the Mule and trotted over toward the CP bunker. As I approached the doorway, I heard the Top's voice angrily berating Brown about "leaving a wounded man out in that shit," which was why I was laughing when I dropped through the doorway. The Top spun around at the sound of my boots hitting the deck and asked, "Dalto, you O.K.?" "Yeah, sure, Top" I replied, happy as a clam in mud. "It's just a piece of someone else," I added, turning and pointing to show him the stain on the back of my pants leg. Giving me a very weird look, the meaning of which went right over my head, he added, "Glad you're O.K" " He then turned back to Brown and continued chewing him a new, and much wider anal orifice; amply proving yet again that senior Marine NCOs can really cuss. I thought it was hilarious.

During another lull, I made it back over to my own bunker. Shortly afterward, the NVA opened up again trying to set a record.. This time they shifted fire, soon hitting the ammo dump about 75 Yards away from our Company area. While they didn't manage to detonate the entire ammo dump in one fell swoop, they did set it on fire. As we watched, the fire began to eat its way through the ammo dump, pallets full of ammo detonating one after another every few minutes. The entry door of our little bunker faced directly toward the conflagration, almost giving us the illusion of watching TV, which is actually a very accurate analogy. Andrusi and Rogers and I sat side-by-side on that canvas cot/living room couch, sipping Kool-Aid, smoking cigarettes, laughing and scratching, whooping and hollering three dudes watching the greatest fireworks show imaginable. And what a show it was. I'm completely sure that most of the American population has never witnessed a real explosion from relatively short range, mainly because doing so is extremely dangerous. At the same time it can be quite impressive as a Show, a spectacular form of entertainment. For instance, a pallet of artillery ammo goes off with an enormous flash, a big, rolling ball of dust, a noise so loud you stop hearing it immediately after it begins a slap of concussion like a hard left jab, and smoking bits of metal arcing through the air. A simultaneous violent assault on all your senses.

A pallet-full of rifle ammo, however, blows in a rapid series of smaller explosions, maybe a box at a time; each burst throwing out a glowing parabola of red-hot lead in every direction. Though not a serious assault it was a visual treat. The whole thing was enormously entertaining, made even better by the caperings of the poor slobs who were fighting the fire. Maybe we three were born without a sympathy bone; or maybe it relates to the fact that I totally got it when Tolkein used the phrase, "Mad for fun", but we thought it was hilarious as explosions blew those guys off their feet and tumbled them around. Here were brave men, with balls of pure forged brass, trying to put out that conflagration by shoveling dirt on it, some of them using E-tools, for God's sake, and we're sitting there laughing at them until our ribs ached.

I guess it simply never occurred to us that those men were in serious physical danger. In fact, the very idea of physical danger never entered our heads until after a particularly large explosion, the business end of a l06mm recoilless beehive round skipped past the door of our bunker spewing out flechettes, some of which flew in and bounced off us. From then on, through the rest of that day, and all that night, we listened to the rest of the show cowering on the deck in our bunker.

LAPES

The morning after that big shelling we crept tentatively out of our bunkers to see our familiar landscape littered with what looked like tons of expended ordinance. The WIA bunker, home to Kilo's 'walking wounded; looked especially woebegone; covered with soot, with many of its' sandbags shredded. We had been very worried about those guys, since their bunker was much closer to the burning ammo dump than ours. Gratefully, our emergence was greeted by Crazy Tim's insane cackle and the gleam of teeth as everyone inside grinned out of their powder- smoked, grimy faces at us. We'd taken no casualties, an intense relief to everyone. Once the Top had ascertained his men were all OK, he surveyed the scene, tilted back his helmet, scratched his head and said, "Well men, let's get this area policed up." And that's how we spent the entire day; sweeping back and forth over the Company area, nervously picking up blackened bits of ordinance and carefully depositing them in a nearby crater.

Routine quickly reestablished itself over the next several days and our main priority, after staying alive, returned to finding different ways of amusing ourselves. I had Rogers, who'd developed a roaring case of the 'short timer's blues', jumping into holes for an entire afternoon when I discovered that tapping my boot heel lightly against a full 5-gallon jerry can full of water perfectly reproduced the faint little 'bump' noise that announced that the NVA was sending us yet another H.E. round in from Co Roc.

Most of the time, however, our main entertainment was supplied by our flyboys. At any given time on a clear day, you could see every aircraft in the U.S. inventory that could carry armament making attack run after attack run all around the plateau, dropping tons of holy, high hopping hell on the NVA. I know that personally, the thought of the NVA getting their collective asses waxed warmed the very cockles of my heart. Not a very Christian attitude I admit: but those yahoos were trying very hard to murder my young butt. So it was that I regularly joined all the other troopies standing on top of bunkers and screaming, "Yeah, get some" at every explosion. I've always considered this air show the greatest morale booster we had inside that beleaguered perimeter.

Our favorite part of the air show was, by far, the LAPES runs (That's Low Altitude Parachute extraction System). LAPES was a supply delivery system which did not require a fixed-wing aircraft delivering cargo to come to a stop. This was very impor-tant because, with plenty of practice, the enemy artillery could eventually begin their shelling before a fixed-wing aircraft could complete its' land-offload-takeoff cycle. As a result the Khe Sanh airstrip had been closed to fixed-wing aircraft since shortly after that big, silver C-130 had been hit, crashed and burned on the 10th of February. Helicopters could still make it in and out safely, but they couldn't carry enough to supply the 4,000 or so souls we had at the KSCB. Choppers could bring in replacements and evacuate our wounded, but it would take an entire squadron of Banana Boats (CH-46s) to bring in one C-130 load; and we needed several C-130 loads, every day, ergo LAPES.

The LAPES process itself is both fascinating and thrilling to watch. The big plane would come in, wheels, flaps and cargo ramp down, engines whispering on low power. Close to the ground the ship would flare out: raise the nose, with the landing gear seeming to grope for the ground like a bird reaching for a roost branch. Inside the plane the crew would release the stay chocks holding the roller-mounted cargo pallets in place, then the Load-master would pull a drogue parachute release the instant the back wheels kissed the ground. Slipstream would drag the chute out the back end, with said chute inflating almost instantly with a "pop", providing the impetus to start the cargo pallets moving. At a command from the Loadmaster, the pilots still keeping the nose up, would crack the throttles up to a full-engine-power scream, adding yet another source of inertia to the process. The cargo skids, still attached to each other by a single, wide, nylon strap, would slide out the back end and onto the runway, while the plane would simply take off again; total of maybe ten seconds ground time, and tons of supplies delivered. With not much in the way of real entertainment at hand, we troopies really looked forward to these LAPES runs, so we soon worked up an alert system. There were always some men on watch along the perimeter line. When one of these sentries would spot a C130 pop out of the clouds that always seemed to be hovering over the hilltops, they'd yell out, "LAPES comin' in!", which, in true Marine fashion, would be echoed by everyone who heard it.

In the time it took for the plane to get even with Hill 861, about four clicks out, the tops of every bunker were covered with spectators yelling encouragement. There was an almost festive air to the whole affair, somewhat accentuated by the variously colored state flags individual Marines proudly displayed over their bunkers. Now even though a normal LAPES run was a great spectacle, it was what happened after the skids cleared the aircraft that everyone was actually looking forward to. Each skid was not a single object, but a mating of three various parts: the cargo items themselves, which were attached to the second part, wooden pallets, several of which were, in turn, attached to large, flat, thick, aluminum skid plates, forming what we called skids of about 9 cubic yards. These multiton bricks were moving at more than 100 mph when they touched the runway, at which point all bets were off. Occasionally there would be little irregularities in the runway, like one of those pesky holes that kept magically, and loudly, appearing all over the place. These would impart a touch of English to the trajectories of the skids. They'ld curve. Many times, the new curved trajectory would lead off the narrow runway. The skid would then hit the dirt in a huge ball of rust-colored dust, then an edge might collide with a ridge of hard clay or something and complete chaos would result as the whole assembly separated and scattered all over the area.

Sometimes the single nylon strap that linked the individual skids would fail to break and a second skid would pile into the first, instantly doubling our thrill. We'd whoop and holler and grab-ass for a few seconds, then jump into the nearest hole to avoid the inevitable barrage. NVA gunners already had in the air, headed our way. A few desperate nearby people might run out and steal, I mean salvage the aluminum skid plate, hoping to beef-up a bunker roof, but everybody else was back underground before the dust settled. Another aspect of these LAPES runs that appealed to we troopies was just how slick the operations appeared. That and the sensation of putting one over on the enemy would put a grin on our faces. The daring and skill displayed right in front of our eyes was a distinct thrill, made complete by the sight of the aircraft lifting off and steeply clawing back into the sky, safe and sound, untouched. Safe and sound were the touch words here.

Those aircrews were risking their collective butts to help all of us stay alive. We admired them; loved them like brothers. Nobody hoped to see the alternative to safe and sound. We had already seen that on February 10th and while it had been spectacular, there had been absolutely nothing approaching entertaining or fun about it. Instead there was horror and regret and sympathy and thoughts of families swamped with despair. Almost superstitiously, we refused to think about something going catastrophically wrong, for fear of jinxing them.

MEMOIRS

DREAMS

By Don Meyer

I was asked to expand in my thoughts about dreams. I tried and really don't like it. Nevertheless, here it is.

I dreamed I was back in Khe Sanh last night. It was a dream so realistic that I could almost smell the red clay from a freshly dug trench. I could feel the warmth of the sun on my back and hear the guys cutting jokes as their e-tools cut into the moist ground. I sat on the side of the trench and I was just staring at the surrounding hills. I could feel the dirt against my body and I looked so young and felt so strong. I just sat there and stared at the hills and was struck by the beauty of my surroundings, how the brown and green colors seemed to so natural together in the midst of bomb craters and areas burned from napalm.

I don't know why, but I felt like I had only been in Khe Sanh for a few days. Maybe the fact a trench was in the process of being dug made me feel that way. I was not afraid I was happy and content for some reason. Maybe it was the beauty of the place and being with my buddies I don't know. I felt none of the anger that has eaten away at me for all of these years and I was full of hope and pride, just a content young man with purpose.

Looking out at the hills I knew there were other Marines on many of the hills looking down on me and hoped that they were safe. I felt a connection to them and knew that them being there was to protect me. I also knew that the enemy was out there but I felt no fear of them, it was just so beautiful and I was so happy.

When I awoke this morning I remembered this dream and it has stuck with me all of this day. Being awake, the feelings from the dream were soon gone replaced by the anger that has plagued me for so many decades now. The anger that is slowly killing me, that has left me numb to all emotions. I truly miss the feelings from last night and wish desperately that they could once again return to me.

I tried to remember when I died inside and could not think of just one event. It finally came to me that each day in Khe Sanh as we were so unmercifully bombarded and each night with the stress of the dark and the lack for sleep from two hour watches we slowly died. It was so subtle that I never realized it and so numb that I did not care.

When was this numbness replaced by anger. What could be so traumatic that it has dominated me so all of this time? Then I remembered after the battle Khe Sanh was abandoned. I felt betrayed and the empty area was replaced with a feeling of anger that came from the sole. All of the sacrifice, all of the pain, the death and for what. The only reward a warrior has for his death is to know that it was for something more important than him. It is a pact between him and his leaders that his efforts have meaning. This is a trust that is sacred and holy in its commitment. Without this trust there can be no battles, no wars. We made this commitment at Khe Sanh and honored the agreement. So many were crippled and died to protect and hold that piece of ground and I remember no complaints. Then when it was over we were betrayed and the base demolished and left to the enemy to take without a shot. The agreement was broken and the terrible losses could not be justified. The anger was born of betrayal and nurtured by deceit.

My emotions have been barren for so long and I miss feelings so much. No amount of medications or therapy have been able to return the good feelings to me only dreams seem to do that. Instead of putting Khe Sanh behind me and focusing on my many blessing, I think of it every day. I go to our Khe Sanh web board like a junkie looking for my next fix to be reminded of this time in my life and relive events that cause the anger I feel. I go to counseling where I have to talk about this time in my life and think this will help heal me. I go to 1/9 reunions to refresh the memories that have been forgotten just to increase the load I already bear. I take medications and alcohol to dull the pain and then seek out places so I can't forget. What a life.

Then the dreams come as they did last night and I feel so happy. In a short while the happiness is replaced again by the anger because the dream only reminds me of what I have lost. Nevertheless, I love these dreams and pray for their return. Once we were young, once we were happy and once we lived a life with purpose. We were not born as we live in old age, we were made this way. The dreams give hope that in our afterlives we will reclaim our happiness and have eternity to sit and look at the hills.

FLAGS

By Craig Tourte

I always fly my flags during the Memorial Day (3 day) holiday. I have a fairly bright American flag and a rather old faded Marine Corps flag. Of course Memorial Day is not the only time I erect the flags outside of my home. I also put them out on January 21st and on the Marine Corps Birthday. I was driving around town yesterday and I noted a rather lack of flags flying from the neighborhood houses and businesses. I don't think it is a lack of patriotism but rather an exhibition new generations have not yet recognized. We all know there is a war going on, but to be perfectly honest the war seems to only touch those who have a hand in the conflict. For the most part, Americans continue to just go about their business and only slightly follow the sacrifices made by so many, a familiar experience I might add.

Years ago I had a small California flag I flew from a pole over our bunker at Khe Sanh before we moved into the trenches. We soon realized that what we thought of at the time as a bunker was really no more than some barrels filled with dirt and a few sand bags over the top of the above ground target, which proved inadequate. Somehow, in all of the confusion and craziness, that little red clay stained, faded and tattered California flag made its way back home with me. I kept it in the sea bag I had with all of my other Marine Corps memorabilia, too small uniforms, covers and other assorted odd and ends. For some reason I liked keeping the stuff around, but at the time I wasn't sure why. As much as that poor little flag went through; the Vietnam War, the Siege at Khe Sanh, Okinawa, El Toro and back to MCRD San Diego, it somehow managed to survive all the moves I made as a young man finding his way after the war.

Unfortunately, my little flag didn't survive my biggest struggle and greatest failure of all, my first marriage. There was something about" why are you keeping this old junk around the house?" You know, wives can sometimes just drive one crazy, and I'm afraid my little flag didn't survive the marriage either. I don't know why, but I find myself wishing I still had that little flag, something to remember and look back on, a very personal time for me and for so many others. Now when I fly my American and Marine Corps flags, I know deep down and see in my heart, that little flag flying proudly with them.

"OLD JUNK"

By Ron Main

Greg,

When I left Khe Sanh in July 68, I threw my flak jacket into a crate that we had for damaged and worn out 782 gear. A week later, and back on Okinawa, and on my way home, I saw the crate in the VMGR 152 supply warehouse. I stood over the crate looking at all those torn and red clay stained flak jackets and web gear and the smell of Khe Sanh.

I dug through the crate, kicking up a cloud of red dust, and found my flak jacket, and helmet. I took the torn helmet cover, and my flak jacket, put them into my sea bag, and they came home with me. Both sat in the rear corner of my garage on Long Island, New York for 20 years. When I moved to Colorado in the mid 80s, I left them with my Aunt. She put them in her garage. When I came back to Long Island for a visit, I wanted to take them back to Colorado. But I learned that my chronically neat grandfather (Pop), who I loved dearly, had thrown out my flak jacket. I asked him why.? He said, " Why do we need that filthy old thing around. " I pictured my flak jacket sitting in a pile of garbage on the curb and it broke my heart. I don't think " normal people " get it. They often mean well. But they just don't connect with what so many things we feel. Anyway. My cousin, hid my helmet cover so Pop couldn't get to it. He gave it to me and I took it back to Colorado. It sat in my closet for years.

In 2003 my niece went to Vietnam as part of a campus at sea semester in college. My sister Diane went to meet her in Saigon. I gave Diane my helmet cover and told her to take it back to Vietnam and bury it somewhere. Naturally she wasn't going anywhere near Khe Sanh, but I told her that was OK. Just bury it back in the soil of that country where it belonged. She took the helmet cover, and when she was somewhere in the Mekong Delta, a honey farmer buried it with a little ceremony in his family plot. You can't make this stuff up.

Here's where it get interesting... When at Khe Sanh, all my gear got torn up by incoming one day in mid March. I couldn't find my helmet. So I went to a pile of discarded gear near Charlie Med, and got another helmet that had been worn by a marine who had been either wounded or killed. He'd written on the brown side of the cover: " You haven't really lived until you've faced death.. Khe Sanh 68. " Knowing that he might be dead, I couldn't look at it. So, I turned the cover over and put the green side on (didn't stay green for long.)Well, at the last minute before my helmet cover got buried, my sister saw the Khe Sanh inscription. She cut that piece off, and took it back to me. All of the rest of the cover is now back " in country. "

I've been writing screenplays for years, and in 2003 I was at the Austin Film Festival with Kelly, a very pretty friend of mine who also writes screenplays. We were both quarter finalists at the fest competition. Her husband John is a movie accountant and he works on all of the big Hollywood movies. At the fest, she introduced me to screenwriter Bill Broyles, who she met on the set of " Castaway " when John was working on that movie. Being both former marines (Bill was a platoon leader with 26th Marines in 69) Bill said he was writing a screenplay for Tom Hanks about a chaplain at Khe Sanh. I said, " Do you mean Chaplain Stubbe..? " His eyes lit up and he said: " You were at Khe Sanh.. I want to talk with you.." Bill, me, and he and Kelly's mutual writing coach were supposed to meet for lunch, but Kelly and I went to the wrong restaurant. I never saw Bill again.

In 2005 I asked Kelly how Bill was doing. She said he was very down because the studio Fox 2000 didn't want to make a depressing movie about Khe Sanh because the younger audience wouldn't be able to relate to it. I sent Kelly the piece of my helmet cover with the Khe Sanh inscription to give Bill encouragement. When she opened it Kelly said it smelled, but she would send it to Bill anyway. When Bill received the helmet cover at his home in Wyoming, he became very emotional. He told Tom Hanks about it, and director Ed Zwick(Courage Under Fire, Glory, Blood Diamond, etc) who was to direct the Khe Sanh movie. Bill told Kelly to tell me, that little piece of the helmet cover is now their " battle flag " to someday get their Chaplain Stubbe movie made.

Because of this, last year I made Bill, Tom, and Ed, Associate Members of KSV. I often think of that marine whose helmet I wore, who wrote: " You haven't really lived until you've faced death.. Khe Sanh 68 " Wherever he is, or whoever he was, he has not been forgotten. Should he be alive and a KSV member, and happens to read this posting, he'll remember writing those heart felt words on his helmet cover, that now speak so eloquently for all of us on this Memorial Day Weekend. I have to thank my little sister Diane for seeing the profound message in his words, and bringing that little piece of the helmet cover back, to continue its journey. Perhaps it's because in July 68 when she was 17, and I was again back at Khe Sanh, she went to visit my friend Ronny Vivona (G 2/26) at the Philly Navy hospital 7th floor " white lie ward " after Ronny lost his legs on hill 700. She told me only recently how the sight of seeing so many torn and suffering young marines her own has never left her, and how it was something a young girl shouldn't have seen. Perhaps she became one of us that day. Perhaps she knows the true meaning and message of our " old junk. "

Very Best to all of you on this Memorial Day.. Good to be alive..
Ron

ANOTHER REUNION STORY

Tough Guys

By Craig W Tourte

I met a lot of tough guys at the reunion. Men who I had only met on two occasions (reunions), but who I have known for 38 years. I was kind of a tough guy too. I had a long career dealing with people who had problems and tragedy in their lives. I often had to be the cool, calm and collected one to make sure certain events turned out successfully. I comforted victims of assault and violence. I have had guns and knives pointed at me, cut down the suicide victim from the rafters of their garage while their families stood and watched, removed the gun from the hand of the dead after they had shot themselves. I have dealt with a wide range of troubled individuals in our society. I tried to show compassion certainly, but that compassion was not necessarily coupled with emotion. As the years progressed, I found it a little more difficult to express emotion, even when dealing with my own family issues. The word coldness comes to mind, and there were times when I wondered if I even had the ability to feel any emotion at all, an issue I'll admit, that concerned me.

There were a lot of tough guys at the reunion, perhaps not so much in body any more, but certainly in spirit and character. Combat Marines, veterans of brutal fights and various battles. Men whose toughness was honed by years of hard living and conflict. Men who could easily describe the brutality of war and the witnessing of sometimes-indescribable death of their friends and comrades. Men who had committed the necessary acts of war on other individuals and to coin a phrase, didn't blink an eye. Men who had gone through several marriages, because they were now unable to express emotion to another human being. Men whose families and friends still cannot understand their coldness. Yep, there certainly were a lot of tough guys at the reunion.

I have made an observation about myself at these reunions and it is that it usually takes me about twelve hours or twenty minutes talking with Neil, before this tough guy is reduced to pretty much a blubbering, sobbing idiot. Of course I'm over stating this, but certainly I get overwhelmed with emotion, the tears uncontrollably run down my cheeks, and I certainly feel like a blubbering idiot. I have tried to be circumspect about this unusual occurrence in me, this uncontrolled emotional feeling. It is not depression, sadness, nor is it sensitivity to anything that is said or discussed. I think it is just a feeling of humanity and humility and respect for those I am around. I think of these men who 38 years ago shared the most personal and intimate moments of their lives together and although it was a long time ago, it seems like yesterday. I think of my friend Chuck, who was one of the few who survived the rocket attack on the CP (in fact he survived two attacks) and Bruce, who was the one who pulled him out. Chuck credits Bruce with saving his life 38 years ago. Chuck said, "I hope Bruce is here, I would like to meet." I was not present when Chuck and Bruce got together that evening at the reunion, but just the thought of that moment, chokes me up.

There were a lot of tough guys at the reunion, you could tell who they were, they were the ones hugging each other with tears running down their faces. I didn't want the reunion to end, I didn't want to leave, and I wanted this moment to always be. I didn't want to leave these fine men who I had met twice before, but who I had known for 38 years. I was humbled to be in their presence and even though I was so proud to be accepted by them. If you're a tough guy and a Khe Sanh Veteran and you have never been to a reunion, you should think about going, there will be a lot of tough guys there, and you'll never be the same.

SHORT ROUNDS

THINKIN ABOUT IT...

By Craig W Tourte

I had a great three days up at my friend and fellow Khe Sanh Veteran Tom Horchler's house this past weekend. I played in a little Memorial Golf Tournament put on by Rich Cueva in memory of Bob Shelton and Jessie Flores, who were KIA during the Vietnam War. After the tournament Rich had most of the folks over to his house for a barbeque, but for some reason I just was not in the mood to attend. Sometimes my "disorder" kicks in and I have a need to not be around others. It is something I battle on occasion, Tommy and the others understand because they all suffer from the same thing.

Shortly before the Tournament began I started to battle those little demons again, so I decided not to ride in the golf cart. I strapped the golf bag over my shoulders and humped up and down 18 holes. I have to admit it felt pretty good, the straps digging into my shoulders and my 60 year old calf muscles and sore back crying out for rest and Gatorade but for some reason I found myself enjoying the pain. I had settled down considerable after the golf game but still was in a funk so thought it best to go back up to Tommy's and be by myself.

Chuck Chamberlin (C/1/26) played in our foursome, I told Chuck that I was heading back up the hill to Tommy's house and would not be going to Rich's. Chuck said that he was going back with me (I appreciated his support); we stopped off for a Pizza and headed back up to Tommy's farm. It was great sitting on the green grass under those huge old growth oaks. We shared some common adult beverages and talked about nothing for what must have been a couple of hours before Tommy Horchler (H.Q. 1/13) Jeff Green (H&S 3rd Marine Div.) Ned Borlaug (I/3/3) and his brother Nell Borlaug (E/2/11) showed up. We spent some time looking up at the big open sky with the full moon shining down upon us and talking about our individual experiences in Vietnam, along with other subjects, but the primary theme seemed to be our memory of our experiences in Vietnam.

As I listened to the various conversations, I was struck how the topic was just matter of fact with little emotion evident. We each shared our stories, mostly in memory and appreciation of others. I was thinking at the time, it is often difficult for me to even speak of Vietnam in the presence of those who were not there and have no connection, if I try to verbally recall those experiences I often get this big knot in my stomach and I am overwhelmed with emotion, so I have found it best to avoid the subject. I was thinking how comfortable it was being around other Vietnam Veterans, not having to explain anything or looking over and seeing that kind of glazed, often confused expression others get when the subject comes up. We all turned in early that night, exhausted from the punishing golf game. On the drive home I realized how refreshed I felt, like a big burden had been lifted off of my shoulders. Ifound myself content and yes, even happy can describe my mood. There is just something uplifting and refreshing about being around other Vietnam Veterans that money cannot buy and therapy cannot heal. It was great being around other Vietnam Veterans who understand my idiosyncrasies and for the most part, are just like me.

SHORT ROUNDS

GOOD PEOPLE AT REUNIONS

By Steven Wiese

Well another reunion has come and gone I had a great time, this year my wife Deborah accompanied me to the reunion. I was looking forward to her meeting some of the people I've talked about over the years, especially Ben Long and his wife Joyce, Ken Korkow and his wife Liz, and a member of my squad and friend Mike McCauley and his wife Ruth. The week went by quickly and I wish I could have spent more time with all of them, but we enjoyed the time that we had with them. I really enjoyed seeing the familiar faces of the people I had met on previous reunions and I felt a little more at ease this year and met some new people, which was great, Craig Tourte took me up to the Delta guys room, they welcome me openly, told me to make myself at home, and help myself to the libations. I had a good time and really enjoyed them, thanks guys for your hospitality.

We took some of the field trips, went to the Marine Corps Museum which was great. We did the 8th and I parade "no comment" although we did enjoy it, we took the subway in the town and saw the Declaration of Independence, and did some sightseeing there. This brings me to the reason that I am writing this, I had the privilege of meeting a gentleman named James Kaylor. To be honest I don't remember exactly how we met, he is just one of those guys that you feel comfortable with right off the bat, you know the type. In our conversation James said weren't you on the payback patrol, to which I replied yes, so James asked me if I had the poster for the payback patrol, I said no that I haven't even seen it, so James says you were on that patrol you should have the poster, he says I'll give you mine, I said that's OK you should keep it but thanks for the thought, James says no before the reunions over give me your address I'll send it to you.

The conversation went on to other things and I really enjoyed talking to James (he's a character to say the least). Over the next couple days we crossed paths with James a couple more times; when he would see us he would greet us with a big smile and talked to us like old friends. Well the reunion came to an end I never did give James my address, but then we all know how it is, we meet new people say give me your address and I'll do this are I'll do that, but somehow the things never seem to happen, I'm ashamed to admit it but that's how I felt about James sending me the poster, so I never really gave it too much thought.

Deborah and I are back at home trying to get caught up on the chores that need to be taking care of after being out of town for a week, the phone rings, the voice on the other end says this is James Kaylor, I just want to verify that your address in the Khe Sanh directory is correct, I tell him it's correct, he says OK I'm getting the poster off to you today, I tell him that it's OK he didn't have to send me the poster, his reply was basically shut up I told you I would send you the poster and it's on the way.

James lives on the coast of California, and he knows Ken Pipes, for those of you don't know Ken Pipes, he was Bravo Co. Commander, he led the payback patrol, he was also wounded that day and Ken was awarded the Silver Star, a true hero.

James takes the poster to Ken Pipes and told him he was sending the poster to me, he asked him if he would sign the poster for me, Ken put an absolutely wonderful dedication to me on the bottom of the poster. I what to give a special thanks to Ken Pipes for taking the time to sign the poster for me, and for his lifelong dedication to us old war dogs. And a very heart filled thank you to James Kaylor for reminding me that there are still some truly good people in this world.

Steven Wiese
Bravo Co. lives on.

GREETING and SALUTATIONS

I am Neil Joseph Kenny. I entered the United States Marine Corps in June of 1967. I served in Vietnam with Lima Company Third Battalion 26th Marine Regiment from January 1968 through December 1968. I was reassigned to Charlie Company First Battalion Fifth Marines for the remainder of my 'Tour of Duty'. It also was the end of my tenure in the Marine Corps, as I was separated from active duty in January 1969.

It was a time when I went from a 'Civilian to a Marine' from a 'Private to a Corporal'. Most importantly it was a time where I went from a 'Boy to a Man' It was a time that brought me from the frivolity of youth to the fruition of adult life and I was still only nineteen years old whence I was thrust back upon an unsuspecting and often uncaring world.

I was then and am now most proud to have earned the title of Marine. Some of my very good and trusted friends are men who have served this country in various branches of the military. I myself actually did a three year stint in the New York Air National Guard. My Dad served in WWII with the United States Army. He was assigned to pick up dead and wounded while at the 'Battle of the Bulge'. My younger brother served eight years in the United States Navy. He is a plank owner of the USS Platte. My older brother served two years in the United States Air Force. We're still not sure how he managed that. Geez, my middle daughter is a Captain in the United States Merchant Marine. Her first job was as a Third Mate aboard a 'rollo' bringing humvees into Grenada during the military operations that took place there during the last century.

Why is all of this relevant? Well, maybe it isn't; or perhaps it is to demonstrate what one might see as a sense of service that is prevalent with the many that frequent our social circle. One thing that has always been out there is the friendly inter service rivalry that has existed between the various branches of the military. It exists within the various branches of the different branches of the military services themselves. This issue extends down to the Company and Squad levels as a 'can you top this' rhetorical and frivolous folly.

It has become with an increasing amount of vitriolic venom a much more ominous fact that there are those amongst us who would have one believe that their service is of a higher calling and thus more meaningful then that of others. Theirs was and is the greater sacrifice and thus the only service of any valor. This is a point of interest from one whose family has served in most all of the branches, both during times of conflict as well as moments of relative calm.

We as a family have had some serve at the 'Tip of the Spear', while others were asked to perform duty that didn't require as much exposure to the flame of conflict that is in fact the fire which tempers the steel of the person of whom we are today. My family has always respected the difference that each of us has had to endure while in service to this nation. I wonder why it is that not every family can do the same.

At the Marine Corps League Detachment that I belong to approximately ninety percent of our members were never called upon to face the chaos of combat. The ten percent of us who have, are a menagerie of folks who have been to the islands of the Pacific, the tundra like atmosphere of Korea, the steamy jungles of Nam, the urban sprawl of Lebanon, the sweaty Caribbean locations of Grenada and Panama, the mountainous nether lands of Afghanistan, and of course the never ending sandy patches of Kuwait and Iraq.

Does being in all of these aforementioned places make us better or lesser Marines then the ninety percent? Are we more of a Marine, or less of a Marine than those others?
No. I would think not. What may best be said is that collectively we are different Marines.

A young Warrior from Echo Company 2/6 may have said it best when he stated,

"Never above you, Never below you, Always beside you."

I could not have stated it so eloquently if I were to search my dictionary and thesaurus while researching a long overdue term paper.

Presently I spend much if not all of my time working with or for members of the Military Service. I have a fair knowledge of what the government offers as to benefits for Veterans and their families. I spend a good amount of hours on a daily basis assisting Veterans of all branches and eras of service, to obtain what they are entitled to. Since I do not write any checks, I am not concerned with how much or what percent they obtain, my focus is primarily that they get what they are entitled to. Nothing more, nothing less.

Recently I have been extremely busy with the establishment and daily operation of the Corporal Jason L. Dunham Memorial Scholarship Foundation Inc. I am happy to say that we are now a bona fide entity and are pushing forward to assist Marines and Corpsmen who are seeking to obtain or further their college education.

At my most recent reunion, I had the pleasure to bring along with me a young Marine Sergeant who served with distinction in Iraq. It was wonderful to see the collective body of guests and veterans from the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines rise as a single unit and to applaud this young man's service. I was proud to say that I was a member of this group of 'Gathered Warriors'.

What saddens me is the continuing discourse that prevails with the: I, Me, Mine, mentality of 'can you top this', and I was and am more then you.

At another past reunion someone was selling shirts that stated, "The older we get, the better we were." I bought the shirt. I refuse to buy into the mentality. I was at Khe Sanh, from day one to day done, during the 'Tet Offensive of 1968.'Since we see the world from behind our own eyes, I can only say for myself that I didn't feel that Khe Sanh was the worst place that I was at during my tenure in Nam. I do not believe that neither the Marines of Bravo 1/26; nor the Marines of either Echo 2/26 or Mike 3/26 would agree with my assessment. I was not on the Ghost Patrol or either of their hills during the siege. I know not of their suffering nor pain, or loss on the personal level with which they did endure. I do know that I was there to share the same fate with them if it were that we were to go down. At the end of the day these men – both known and unknown - to me are my Brothers.

"Never above me, Never Below me, Always Beside me."

It is that Espirit de Corps that allowed me to prevail beyond Khe Sanh through the many months of carnage that Lima Company would endure to my own finality with war during Operation Meade River.

What I come away with at the end of the day is the Camaraderie, Love, and Brotherhood that one comes to in the experience of war. War fought by young boys, who become men all too soon and sudden. A War that from our baptism of fire until our last breath tempers our hearts and souls. A War which if left where it was could allow us to be together and rejoice in life with our spouses, children, and grand children; and most importantly with each other. A War that I can leave behind only while in the company of my Brothers.

I would guess this is why that outside of my family there are not many folks who I associate with who are not Warriors and/or those who have served in this Nations Military.

I am getting older and have a desire to share my remaining time enjoying the company of those who would laugh together while remembering those who have given their all so that we could. I would think it prudent and wise to use the time remaining to work for the benefit of those who have followed the path which we have paved for them.

To those who choose to go into the new day, I would ask that you travel the path with me, rather then traverse it alone. For it is our unity that shall enable us to forge a brighter future for all that come after.

THE COIN

By Craig W. Tourte

The month of October is a busy month of traveling for me, seems I'm always out of town this time of year. A few weeks ago it was Dana Point in Southern California then a drive down to San Diego. Last week it was Pebble Beach and these last four days I spent down around Palm Springs, just got home this evening. Next week it's over to Oceanside then down to San Diego and once again to Palm Springs. The week after that it's a few days at a place by the name of Graeagle, a small community in the mountains located just a little East of Truckee which is South of Reno and East of North Lake Tahoe. Just so you'll understand, all of this traveling is not related to any importance I might have but rather it's related to a good friend who for some reason just seems to enjoy my marvelous companionship.

Anyway, during my travels I always carry a few Khe Sanh coins with me. Just in case I might meet another veteran or someone who might have an interest in our experience. As a matter of fact the other night I was talking to a person who asked if I knew of a tax exempt organization which consisted of veterans because his/her company was required to donate a certain amount of money. I am efferting that now, and of course I recommended our association (that's another story). I provided that person with a coin so they would not forget our conversation.

I'm going to try and be vague here to protect the innocent, but I knew that I would be once again meeting our California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger at this particular event I would be attending in Palm Springs. I had met him last year and the year before that. By meeting him I really mean shaking hands with him as he worked the small crowd of people I happened to be among. The first year I decided not to have my photograph taken with him, I had just witnessed soldiers returning from Iraq at the airport and felt they were more significant and I wasn't in the mood for a B movie star running for office. The second time I saw him he was up on stage, but I knew this time would be different; I would have the opportunity to be right next to him. I had left my camera in my golf bag but I did have a couple of Khe Sanh coins with me.

The time had arrived, here he was coming right at me, the usual hanger on's, ass kissers and photographers and security guards with him. For a few seconds he stood all alone and I was just a few feet away. I placed the Khe Sanh coin in my left hand and approached. I extended my right hand and said, "Nice to see you governor." He took my hand and shook it and quickly moved along. My intention of course was to shake his hand with my right and hand him the Khe Sanh coin with my left. I wanted to say something meaningful and deep, like, "On behalf of the Khe Sanh Veterans I would like to present this coin to you" or something along those lines. But I'm afraid I failed, for some reason this occasion just did not seem appropriate.

As I look back on this failed presentation of mine, I have to ask myself, if I was able to give the Governor one of our coins, would he understand the meaning, the significant of it all. Would he appreciate our sacrifice? If I was able to just slip the coin in his pocket and he came across it later, would he even know what it was, perhaps he would think it was just a trinket of some kind or perhaps a joke of some sort.

While at Dana Point a couple of weeks ago, I had the occasion to sit down with California's former Governor Pete Wilson who I have known for a number of years. I had sent Governor Wilson a Khe Sanh coin and a copy of the "Battalion of Kings" and Ray Stubbe's book, "B5-T8 In 48 QXD, the Secret Official History of the North Vietnamese Army of the Siege at Khe Sanh..." a number of months ago. I didn't have to wonder if Governor Wilson would understand the significant of the coin or if he even knew what Khe Sanh was, or if he was even aware of the sacrifices made by so many, those now long years ago. I didn't have to explain to Governor Wilson what it meant to be a Khe Sanh Veteran. Governor Wilson looked me in the eye and thanked me for the gift I had sent him. For you see, California's former Governor Pete Wilson, had been a Marine Corps Officer.

HOW IT GOT THAT WAY

Khe Sanh is made of red clay,
some think nature made it that way.
The ground is red that part is true, but how it got that way some have a different view.
When it's dry it turns to dust,
it covers everything and looks like rust,
When it's wet it turns to mud'
it sticks to everything like some kind of crud.
Troops on the ground have this to say' it took a lot of their blood to make it that way.
Yea the dirt is red alright'
some of us still see it every night.
Khe Sanh is made of red clay'
40 years later it still won't wash away.

SHORT ROUNDS

I wrote this some time ago and recently found it with my pile of non-throw-aways. Here goes Brothers!!!

As I watched the show in silence
it seemed like yesterday
The songs the storytellers were singing were new to you and me
The camera scanned the audience and the faces looked quite strange
The beads, the flowers, the experience have all melted away
Where once the Legends of songs stood grasping for the why's and how's of life

Some have left this world without control of even their own lives
Twenty years back I was just a kid trying to grow way before my time Today I've reached the middle age and wonder where went my life
The songs that echoed from the tube reached out and reminded me
Of a time not long ago which seemed for them to be carefree
To sing of love and freedom was easy for those days but for some we sang in silence for death was a heartbeat away
As I watched the audience I see them trying to relive a portion of their lives when they were but mere kids
I remember seeing faces much like I see here of people scorning young men who survived a deadly scare
Today the thoughts of yesterday makes some happy to hold dear for some the sounds of battles still ring too loudly in our ears
The memories are embedded in all our minds and hearts, of songs of hope of lyrics,
and of how we left our mark.

FACES AND PLACES

What were their names, I can't remember.

In my mind I see all these young faces.

They are like photographs I will always remember.

Where were we, the names of all those places?

Those are like maps in my mind I still look at.

All those faces go with different places.

I can't stop seeing all those young faces –

Why can't I remember the names of those faces?

Why can't I remember the names of those places?

But every day I walk those places

And I see those faces.

RICK GETS IT RIGHT AGAIN

On my most recent trip to Washington, DC guiding a group of disabled vets I had this poem by Rick to give to his best Buddy Mark Miles, it is a beautiful piece of prose and I guarantee you that no one at the Wall after reading it had a dry eye .

IT SEE'S ALL

It doesn't mater if you're short or tall, you can't hide because it sees all.
When you go there you'll find you're among friends,
they are right there with you one and all.
Short at the ends but the middle is tall,
but that's not what's important at all.
You'll want to touch it, to feel it,
young or old won't matter at all.
It draws you in and touches your soul.
sound seems to disappear, time slows to a crawl.
They just keep coming, the lines seem endless, it stands quietly waiting to see them all.
Some ask how, some ask why,
they whisper as though they are shy.
The words said out loud, the words never said,
the thoughts in your head, it hears them all.
It sees every smile, every tear drop fall,
the boys on the wall see it all.

The Great Race, Man vs Incoming

By Mike "Animal" Preston

See the man running down the runway? (now you know why they call it a "runway") that could be me, why am I running, look almost straight up, about 60 - 70 feet and slightly to the right, that would be north west, some of you would know that the rest of you would be clueless. That little black line is what was commonly known as "incoming." I think it is a 155 round or a 140 or 122 rocket can't tell from the picture, doesn't matter they are all lethal. Maybe the guy doing the Khe Sanh "shuffle'' was one of you guys reading this. We all did it a lot if you happened to be a Khe Sanh Grunt.

The only thing is that is almost certain that I can tell about this picture is the branch of service this guy is in, army-no, air force-no, marines maybe, most likely navy, huh? What makes me think the odds on favorite is a naval man. Aren't sailors supposed to be clanking anchors? Well he is more than likely a Seabee out in the V-Ring as we called the runway, looking for arty holes or fixing one, that's the only reason to be out there on the runway, or maybe he was just suicidal! Given the terminal (that's a fitting term) velocity of a 155 & 70 Foot AGL. That round is going to impact in about 02. Seconds or less. I wonder if the guy got through it unscathed.

RED CLAY and DRESS BLUES

By Dennis Mannion

The conclusion of Record Day at the Parris Island rifle range in February of 1967, and I moved slowly away from the 500 meter firing line. I had just qualified with a score of 219 and earned a Sharpshooter badge, but I was barely able to suppress the angry emotions welling up inside. I shouldered my M-14 rifle and tried as best I could to mask my bitter disappointment. The importance of the scores we earned this day had been stressed to the platoon almost from the moment we departed from the Receiving Barracks seven weeks earlier. Time and time again, we had been told by our three drill instructors that it didn't matter what kind of shooting totals we earned in the practice rounds leading up to Record Day. The only points that had any merit would be from our last day on the range, and that score would be entered into our Service Record books.

All week long in pre-qualification target practice, my scores had been consistently in the low 200's. I had had no trouble with standing and shooting at 200 meters and the same was true in the prone position at 500 meters. For me, the stumbling block had been the 300 meter line where sitting and kneeling were the required shooting positions. I had been a weightlifter in high school and in my two years of college, so scrunching into those tight shooting postures had been all but impossible. There were times that week when the DI's actually sat on the back of my neck and shoulders to "get me lower and tighter."

On Record Day, my point total at 200 meters equaled what I had fired all week, but surprisingly my scores at 300 meters were better than they had ever been. So good in fact, that I was eager to get to the 500 meter line. I really felt that as long as I continued to shoot well an Expert badge was now within my grasp. In the prone position, my first few shots were dead center. Then the unthinkable – some shots were out of the center ring! My aim and my focus seemed to be off. I was not hitting the middle of the target as consistently as I had all week. More frustrated with every squeeze of the trigger and struggling to maintain some sense of control, I fired my last bullets and totaled up the score. With an empty feeling, I recorded 219 in my shooter's book. That was better than anything I could have hoped for, and it was higher than any score I had earned all week. Still, to miss out on an Expert badge by a single point – after getting so close – was devastating. It had been in my grasp and I had let it slip away. I had no one to blame but myself, and the few tears that I tried to blink away were self-directed and anger-driven.

Moving off the firing line with others in my squad, I kept my head down as I fought to control my ragged and jumbled emotions. Suddenly, there was a great jolt of pain in my lower back and the sensation of being propelled forward and down. My senior DI had kicked me in the tail bone area, and as I fell to the sand, he was on top of me in an instant. He rolled me onto my back, slapped my face and screamed that I was a disgrace to his Marine Corps. Behind a quick flurry of fists and open hands, he called me just about every profane word that is applicable to women. He hauled me to my feet and shoved me away with the words, "Get off my firing line, you snot-nose bastard."

In the barracks that night, we sat in a circle around the DI's desk. Whatever topic covered that night is lost to me, but as we stood up to go back to our racks, the senior DI angrily singled me out. "They mismarked your target twice today," he said. "Your final score was a 221. Are you happy now, cry-baby?" Even if I had a response, there is no way I would have said anything to any of my drill instructors. I was happy with the 221, but my lower back had an ache that would not dissipate for months and the humiliation of being kicked to the ground would linger even longer.

February melted into March, and Platoon 236 began to recognize that graduation day was less than a month away. In the evenings there was small talk about who might make PFC and, more significantly, who the platoon honor grad would be. With the honor grad designation came a set of Dress Blues. Heading into the last two weeks, I figured I had a chance at PFC and just possibly honor grad as well. I had done very well in many aspects of training and had been recently assigned as a squad leader. However, I have never been enthralled with uniforms, conformity, and the allure of colors and spit shined polish. In those final days I had made up my mind that if I won the Dress Blues, I'd look to sell them as soon as I could. No disrespect in that; someone else would have had a much greater appreciation for them than I. My sole purpose in joining the service after flunking out of college was to serve in Vietnam as part of a Marine Corps infantry company. There was nothing in my three year enlistment that was even remotely connected to uniforms and colors.

Still, I did have a strong opinion as to who our honor grad ought to be: Carey Lee Johns. Back in early January, when our platoon had first formed up, fate had me standing next to Carey Lee when we approached a line of Navy Corpsmen for a series of medical shots. As the two of us stood abreast with our shirts off, the doctor supervising the corpsman pointed to the two of us and said to the ever-present drill instructors, "Don't you wish they all looked like these two, knuckle dragging ape maggots!?" One of the DI's replied, "If they all looked like these two, I'd be out of a job." It was a real emotional lift for me to be compared to Carey Lee, and from that moment on, I knew that my boot camp experience would be physically tough but not insurmountable. Carey Lee, to my mind, was the best of us in the platoon – he looked, acted, and comported himself as a Marine's Marine. Not a man in Platoon 236 could have been disappointed when he was selected as the honor grad. I was happy for him and proud of him as well. After graduation he and I were inseparable as we completed Advanced Infantry training at Camp Lejeune. A month later, with leave papers signed, we sat next to one another on a bus to the airport in Washington, D.C. We were headed home; he to Alabama and me to Connecticut. We shook hands at the terminal and promised to stay in touch, but as with a lot of friendships in the military, we never saw one another again.

I arrived in Vietnam in September of 1967 and was assigned as the artillery Forward Observer with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines. In mid-December we were sent to Khe Sanh as part of the Marine Corps response to tens of thousands of North Vietnam Army soldiers advancing into the region. Just after Christmas Kilo hiked up to Hill 861 where we would endure the 77 day siege. That campaign ended in mid-April of 1968, and the company choppered out to the relative safety and comfort of Quang Tri. By the end of May I was transferred out of Kilo and assigned to the 12th Marines as part of a naval gunfire FO team. Using firepower from cruisers and destroyers in the South China Sea, we operated in small groups along the coast of South Vietnam in an area north of the Cua Viet River and south of the Ben Hai River (the DMZ).

In early summer, I was with my FO team waiting for a military barge to ferry us across the Qua Viet. It always took time to off-load and load, and as we waited in the shade for our turn, a platoon of Marines disembarked and set off down the road. Suddenly, one of the Marines stopped, looked over and shouted, "Hey, Mannion!" Puzzled at hearing my name from a stranger, I stood and moved into the sunlight. I could hardly believe my eyes. It was Sgt. Hicks – one of my junior drill instructors! We shook hands and exchanged the customary in-country greeting: Who are you with and when did you get here? We only had a few minutes to talk – his unit was moving south and I had to get on the barge. He walked me over to it, and I asked him about recognizing me and remembering my name. After all, he had been a drill instructor before my boot camp time and for some months afterward. With all those recruits, how had my name and face stayed with him? His answer stunned me. "Because of the Dress Blues," he said. I honestly had no idea what he was talking about and said so. He replied that the honor grad award could just as easily have gone to me, but that that our senior DI wouldn't even consider it because in his mind I was a cry baby. He added that there had to be a consensus with all three drill instructors and my tears on the rifle range had squashed any chance I might have had. "Sgt. Hicks," I countered, "None of that matters to me. It really doesn't. Carey Lee Johns earned and deserved that award. He was the best of us. I probably would have sold those Dress Blues the first chance I got. And here's another thing. I've been here 10 months now and in that time, I've seen plenty of tears on lots of faces." He responded by agreeing with what I had said about Carey Lee. In addition, he said that he had seen those same types of tears himself and that our senior DI had not been in any combat prior to becoming a drill instructor. The barge was ready for boarding and Sgt. Hicks had to rejoin his unit. There was only time for a black and white, Polaroid picture.

The two of us – a former DI and one of his recruits standing shoulder to shoulder with our backs to the Cua Viet River. Sgt. Hicks: in a jungle shirt, crew cut, and with a squint that could bore holes through anyone; and me: 22, looking years older, deep shadows under the eyes, long hair, red dirt from Khe Sanh still clogging most of my pores, and wearing a non-regulation T-shirt. We shook hands in the mid-June sun, wished each other luck, and he hustled down the dusty road. I have thought of him often in the past 40 years, but I have never seen or heard from him since.

In November of 1982, I went to the dedication of the Wall in D.C. I am not a joiner of groups and I knew no one who was traveling there, but I just felt a need to be in attendance. The day before the dedication, I heard someone say that the phonebook sized books that list all the names on the Wall were going to be available for purchase and I bought one. Over a year later, I chanced across my Parris Island yearbook, and I decided to go through the platoon roster and cross-reference the names with the names in the Vietnam Memorial Directory of Names. As I progressed through the first part of the alphabet, I developed a real sense of foreboding and a gut-sick, empty feeling inside. I almost didn't want to continue because of the listing I felt I was going to see. Sure enough, there it was Carey Lee Johns, Oneonta, Alabama, 18June 68.

I didn't try to blink back the tears this time. Their source was heartache, not anger, and besides, there was no DI to lash out and reprimand. It would be another two decades before I learned that Carey Lee had died on one of those red clay hills outside of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. It's almost impossible now to remember him and not think of Sgt. Hicks at the same time. After all, when I encountered Sgt. Hicks near the Cua Viet River it was the 3rd week of June in 1968. I take some comfort in the knowledge that around the time of his death, the two of us had been reminiscing about Carey Lee and the honors that had been accorded him. Our 10 minute, chance encounter was, without our knowing it, our funeral service to him and for him. Carey Lee Johns, my boot camp buddy and fellow Marine won a set of Dress Blues, went to Vietnam, and forfeited everything, while I lost out on an award and a uniform but was permitted to live, to remember, and to grieve.

SHORT ROUNDS

BRU KIDS
By James Dawdy

How can you ever forget 'em? Those pitiful but smiling little urchins who hung out waiting for food. clothing, and cigarettes ('You give me one Salem cigarette #1 GI?"). Of course, it was somewhat comforting to have them around because we could, correctly or incorrectly, believe that their presence indicated no enemy activity that day.

In the picture of the four kids, you will notice two who have C-ration boxes tightly protected-a very valuable commodity in an area devastated by war.

The kid in the white shirt and USMC soft cover has on what must be at least a size 13W pair of boots (mine were 11R), and the kid in red shorts has what appeared to be empty ammo bandoliers wrapped around his feet. Footwear was apparently at a premium. The kid with the big boots had an empty M-60 ammo bandolier slung across his shoulder with C-rations in it. Nothing went to waste. You can't help but wonder what happened to them. Did they die from errant fire, ours or from the enemy, on their village? Did they grow up to go to school, have wives and kids, and see peace and prosperity for their families? We all hope so. It made us feel good to share our meager resources with them. It restored our faith in our own compassionate humanity, and allowed us to see within ourselves the qualities which keep us sane, even in the midst of the horror, death and destruction of war.

MY STORY

By Sgt Vincent Rios

In 1964, I graduated from Diamond Hill-Jarvis High School in Ft. Worth, TX. I enlisted in the USMC and graduated from MCRD San Diego. In 1965 I reported to Alpha Co., 1st Bn. 5th Marines, 1st Marine Division at Camp Margarita, Camp Pendleton, California for unit training. I embarked with the battalion for Okinawa aboard the USS General J.C. Breckenridge troop carrier in the normal rotation cycle as a transplacement battalion. The 1st Bn., 5th Marines arrived in Naha, Okinawa, and exchanged banners with the 2nd Bn., 9th Marines, 3rd Marine Division, the battalion it replaced. After undergoing intensive jungle warfare training, the new E/2/9 sailed for Vietnam aboard the USS Pickaway, arriving at DaNang in July. In November, I and several other Marines from my platoon were transferred to A/1/1 where I served until July 1966, returning to Camp Pendleton as a corporal, assigned as a brig guard.

In 1968 I was assigned to the most decorated regiment in the USMC as 2nd Platoon Sergeant and acting 2nd Platoon commander of A/1/5 until I was severely wounded by an enemy explosive device in February 1969. I was evacuated via various military hospitals in Japan to the Oaknoll Naval Hospital in Oakland, CA, where I was medically retired from the USMC and transferred to the VA Medical Center in Los Angeles, to recover from my wounds. My awards and decorations are as follows: three times awarded the Purple Heart, twice awarded the Bronze Star, the Presidential Unit Citation, the Meritorious Unit Commendation and the Vietnam Cross of Gallantry with Palm. I also received the Vietnam Service Medal with four battle stars.

In the spring of 1969 I found myself near the middle of a string of hospitals that would punctuate my previously relatively undisturbed medical history. I believe it was at the Oaknoll Naval Hospital in Oakland, California that the only photograph taken of me as an in-patient exists. In the photo with me is a Marine lieutenant colonel pinning me with a Bronze Star Medal. Actually it was the second award but the first had not caught up with me nor was I aware that it was coming. I never knew who the colonel was; he was probably the Marine liaison from the 12th Marine Corps District Headquarters, then housed at the Treasure Island Naval Base located in the middle of the Bay on the Bay Bridge, half way between Oakland and San Francisco.

The first Bronze Star Medal Award was for Heroic Achievement; the second was for Meritorious Service. If anyone wants to read about my close encounters in Vietnam in 1968-1969 that back these awards, send me a check for $35.00 to the War Memorial Commission at 401 Van Ness Avenue, Room 101, San Francisco, CA 94102. I will mail you an autographed copy of Doc Hutchings book "The Names Not On The Wall"

I have plenty and if anyone recognizes the colonel in the photo let me know I would like to connect with him. Maybe one of our A/1/5ers who come out for this years July 4 Parade in Redwood City can let me know .

Khe Sanh Veterans Son Performs Above The Call of Duty

The son of one of our own has performed a terrific act to assist children of what is approaching 1,000 Marines who have been killed in the line of duty in Iraq and Afghanistan. On 8 July, 2007 Travis Prentice swam 20 miles, nearly across the English Channel from England to France, and only missed his goal of a channel swim completion due to a sudden change in the current as he approached the French coast. Travis had wanted to find a meaningful way to contribute to his country after 9/11. Over the years Travis has been well acquainted with the Marine Corps. His father, Glenn Prentice, fought at Khe Sanh with Charlie Battery, 1/13 and was assigned to India Company, 3/26 on Hill 881 South during the entire 77 day siege during the January-April period of 1968. Glenn was both a radio operator as well as a forward artillery observer who helped fend off the nearly 3,000 NV A who were dug into our hill.

Travis dedicated his swim to the children of some of the finest people who have lived in America. His efforts will assist many children who will not know what it is like to receive encouragement and support from their father or mother as they move through life. The funds that are being raised as a result of the heroic accomplishments of this young man are being channeled through the Marine Corps Scholarship Foundation. I would like to encourage the Marines who fought with me and Glenn Prentice to make a contribution in Travis' name to the Marine Corps Scholarship Foundation 121 S. Saint Asaph Street Alexandria, Virginia 22314-3119.

Travis Prentice lives in the San Diego area and works for the prestigious investment firm Nicholas -Applegate.

SOMETHING TO HATE

By Craig W. Tourte

I was reading an essay today by Tony Quinn who was an Army information officer in Saigon in 1966 and 1967. This article was amongst several written by a number of authors comparing the war of today with that of Vietnam in response to the presentation before Congress given by General Petraeus now, and that given by General Westmoreland at another time. Now don't go nuts, although the premise of his article was to make a political point, my post is not going to be a political statement of any sort, so you don't have to prepare to write me nasty responses.

Mr. Quinn made the observation-and I think the same ones made by the numerous Khe Sanh Veterans who have visited Vietnam-that, "Everything the United States wished for in 1967 has happened by 2007. There is not a more pro-American country in Asia than Vietnam, a friendlier people and a more entrepreneurial capitalist society. As in China, communist flags are everywhere, but the real story is an unfettered capitalist economy the government has fostered." "...you can hardly find any sign that Americans were ever in Vietnam." "...a special display marks the collapse of the socialist subsidy economy in the late 1980's and its replacement by, do moi, the free market. "...in the heart of old Saigon-nobody uses its communist name, Ho Chi Minh City." Mr. Quinn goes on to describe a clean, vibrant Vietnam, open and welcoming Americans and other tourists.

I'll admit that since my experience in Vietnam, it has been difficult for me to just "get over it," without feeling that certain kick in my gut when I read the words, "Made in Vietnam" on some of the products I purchase. I am afraid I am just lost in time and unfortunately I still carry some old scars and harbor-I am aware of misplaced-feelings about the-even present day- Vietnamese, most not alive during my little adventure into their country forty some odd years ago. During the reunion, Dennis I think, and others brought albums of photographs of their recent visits to Vietnam. I sat alone at the table where the albums were offered for viewing and looked at each photograph carefully. I noted the people of Vietnam today, the landscapes, the little shops and villages, the streets and houses, I looked at the schools and churches and the children, all clean and well nourished. I noted how much the area around the Khe Sanh Combat Base had changed. I saw the now wide, paved roadways, where once small dirt paths had been, the once dusty dangerous avenues in which Bravo, Delta, Charlie and other proud American fighting units had walked so carefully many years ago and where so many Americans, some I knew, had fallen years before. I was searching for the old and familiar, and I guess I was looking for something, anybody or anything to hate., But I found only the now smiling and welcoming faces of a seemingly emerging and by Asian standards, the now prosperous Vietnamese. While I sat there at the table, open albums in hand, I was looking for something inside of me, a sort of awaking or awareness, anything that would tell my soul that it was over, that was then and this is now. I guess I was looking for something in myself that said, "get over it." And although I have a fairly well educated understanding of Vietnam and its history of a thousand years of fighting off invaders and the fact that the Vietnam of today welcomes the West and Americans, I still struggle.

There was a short time when I thought I was over these feelings. I mean, how much more of an understanding of the historical view of this situation does one need to change one's mind and to be truthful, I am really talking about my heart. I bought a golf cap the other day. It says White Hawk on the front and I paid twenty dollars for the cap at a really nice golf course and one I could only afford to play once a year. I wore that hat every time I played, but it got so sweat soaked and dirty I stuck it in the washing machine. When I pulled it out of the washer I was kind of stretching it out when I noticed a small label that read, "Made in Vietnam." Something kicked me in the gut and I realized that I have not as yet came to terms with myself and I have not gotten over it, and at my age-rationality aside- I don't think I ever will.

LETTERS

By Craig W. Tourte

I like most of you while in Vietnam, wrote letters home to family and friends. Of particular concern to me at the time of the Siege at Khe Sanh was trying to stay alive, a daily and I must say, hourly endeavor. I must have written about lots of things including my fears, events, incoming and the death and injury to many comrades. I'm sure I must have mentioned the battle of Lang Vei. That event was significant to me as I stood looking out over the wire into the fog clearly hearing the echoes of motors and the raging all night battle occurring just a few miles away.

A few years ago, a man I have known since childhood tried to talk to me about my experience in Vietnam and Khe Sanh, but I'm afraid I just was not ready to share my experience with someone who had not been there, friend or otherwise. He told me that he and his mother, who I wrote to often, had saved the letters I had written from Vietnam. My friend wanted to know if I would be interested in reading them. I declined, but thanked him for thinking that my letters had meaning to him and his family.

I attended a family event last evening; I lived with my aunt and uncle before and after I went into the Marines so my cousins are more like siblings. About half way through this event, one of my cousins, who is now in his late 50's, came over to my table and sat down; he had been consuming a few adult beverages and was friendlier than normal. Although I only see him every five years or so, to this day I appreciate his family taking me in when I had nowhere else to live.

Anyway, he says something along the lines of, "I remember the letters you wrote home from Vietnam, when you talked about Lang Vei and the tanks, and your concern that they might run the wire of the combat base." My cousin had been in high school when I was in Vietnam and later went into the National Guard but did not serve overseas. He closed with the usual; "Gee, I wish I would have served in Vietnam." I overlook that last statement because I have heard it so many times before from the now old partiers who used to laugh at us while they searched desperately for a way to get out of going into the service. I knew there was no hidden meaning in my cousin's statement and that he was just feeling the effects of the liquid depressant.

I was a little stunned at his statement about Lang Vei and it took me a few seconds to recover. I asked myself how a kid in high school would remember anything I wrote in a letter to his family 39 years ago because I certainly didn't remember myself. Then he said, "My sister still has your letters." I then blurt out, "I don't want to read them." Again, I kind of shocked myself with my volunteer statement of not wanting to read those letters. I truthfully thought I had gotten over all of that.

After the event I went home and I thought about me not wanting to read those old letters I had written to family and friends and asked myself why. Was it because I was too embarrassed to read what I know are mostly ramblings of misspelled words, illegible handwriting and illiterate composition or was there something else I wasn't admitting to myself, perhaps something deep down that I have not as yet identified. It may be a little of both, but I am not even curious, not even just a little bit and for some reason the thought of seeing those letters sends a chill down my spine.

Craig,

Last year I handled my parent's estate. In doing so I came across all my old letters. With a nice glass of wine, or was it more, I sat and read them. Now at six decades of age, I saw a very scared young man. Full of bravado and sharing only stuff that would not upset the folks. I'm sure my parents saw through all of it. Looking back is not a bad thing. It tells us where we have been and gives us a bench mark. As I tell my wife, who wonders why I keep going to this site, it gives me balance. No matter how pissed I get over little stuff now, when I look back it isn't nothing. So go on and read the letters and reflect back to the worst of times. Then you will truly see how good it is now.

Craig,

As usual, I love reading your posts. You are truly a man who speaks from the heart and have the ability to articulate your feelings. You do have a gift.

I would encourage you to check those letters out. I spent 30+ years blocking out the past, but found I was unable to do so. A few years ago I got on the internet and it has changed my life forever. I no longer try to block out the past but readily embrace it. I know I served honorably and in "the moment" did what I felt needed to be done. If I have learned anything in my 61 years on this earth is that the past can not be changed one iota. It is forever cast and can not be altered no matter how much we wish it to be different.

As I have searched and shared those events of so long ago I have found each of us seem to have 3 or 4 events that seem to stand out from other lesser events. In my research I have found some of the players involved with one of those "haunting" events. I was shocked to find that others involved had a different slant on things. Some of the main elements were the same but some of the pieces I had put so much stock in were not as important as I had perceived them to be. In fact, some of my recollect was missing some very important facts. Through the years my memory had twisted things into a form which was quite different from the actual facts. I know this to be true, because one of those involved could verify the events factually because he had an old letter he had written 2 days after the mission I was so troubled about. The fresh, factual events of that day were enlightening. It did not change the outcome but offered a clear picture of the events and things came into a much better focus.

A few years ago I asked my mother if she had any of my old letters. She said no and did not want to be reminded of those awful things that happened back then. I was truly saddened by her comments and asked no further questions. I am still a bit hurt by her comments but will not approach her about it. I know she had no intention of hurting or offending me. I would love to read some of those old letters. I know they would help to add some clarity to some of the things that now seem foggy and distant.

You will have to make the ultimate decision about those letters. A suggestion here: Get the letters, check them out, and if so moved sit down and share them openly with those you wrote them too. My guess, those close to you will see you in a different light. When you share from the heart you connect to loved ones and family in a new way. I know you understand this because you and others who post here do it every day. They share from the heart and if you have been there, you understand at a deeper level. A burden share is a burden lessened.

Craig,

Some may remember the small three inch reel of recording tapes good for an hour with their own mailing cases made by 3M corp. A while back I found a small stack of the boxes with tapes in each one in my memory box. One of the tapes was the one I sent my folks from Khe Sanh after being in the thick of it for a month. I felt strange as I listen to the tape because time blurs your memory of things you really do not want to remember.

Also it was funny to listen to my mother and father, plus my younger sisters making small talk. Both my brother and I sent tapes on a monthly back home in Boston. My folks would record on any tape that they had for about 15 minutes. The rest of the tape was my brother's voice. My only problem was that I had to go to the city library to find a machine to listen to the tapes.

Craig,

My Mom kept all off the letters she received from me (VMGR 152) Ronny V (G/2/26) and Jack Lambert (ASP#1) I still have some of them, and the envelopes. Ronny wrote about not being able to get mail in or out of Khe Sanh, I wrote one where the pen jumped off the page when a flare exploded right over my head, and Jack wrote about how lucky he felt to be at Khe Sanh in 68 as apposed to 67, when the weather was worse.. His letter was dated 3/15/68.

Craig,

Your post reminds me of my own plight with letters I sent home. My parents had saved every letter I sent. They even numbered them as they received them. For many years I did not care to read them either. Several years ago I did read the letters and found them to be mostly uninteresting and lacking any substance. I wrote mostly of how my moral was and benign things, such as digging bunkers and filling sandbags. I would talk of friends and how I missed home, milk and moms apple pie. There was never anything about the firefights, the shelling or the death of friends and how I felt about these things. I wish now that I had written about these things. So that I could have a better understanding of the person I was then. The gory details were left out to spare my folks additional worry.

One letter had a dark blotch on it that could have been mistaken for a dried blood. I circled it and wrote underneath, "don't worry mom this is not blood". As I looked at the letter, checked the date and realized that it was the stain of red clay from Khe Sanh. Many letters were dirty and poorly written as often times I would write them at night with little light. I know that my lack of detail did little to lesson their fears as they had told me that Khe Sanh was on the news nightly. It was during this time that my Dad wrote his Khe Sanh symphony.

Still, the letters were good to read as they gave me a better perspective of time line. Each envelope was marked with my return address that included the platoon and company I was with at the time. They also helped me to remember certain things that I had completely forgotten. I could picture myself sitting in a bunker or fighting hole as I wrote those letters they helped me to remember the strife and hardships of those days and how I overcame them and somehow survived.

My first impression was how could I have written such dribble. I came to realize that the babbling miss spelled sloppy letters were from a scared teenager, who for the first time in his life was on his own. Far away from home and had no idea what the next day or hour would bring. Loved ones don't care how you write, just that you write. Remember how important mail was for us, my guess is that they were just as important to our loved one. Read them, Craig, remember, and never forget. They are part of who you were and what you are now.
God Bless

Gene Weresow

Craig,
Years ago when my parents passed and I was cleaning out my mother's "papers," I was hoping to find the letters I sent home. I do have newspaper clippings, Life and Newsweek magazines of the siege but no letters. My interest in the letters is to look back at the person I was then and to reflect on the scared kid I was and how that experience helped shape me into the person I came to be. I also wrote in general terms, such as "things are a little tough now, but I'm OK." We all know of guys who wrote the same thing and the casualty assistance officers arrived at their house before their letter did.

Knowing it is a personal thing for you, reading your old letters could bring on a whole series of emotions and memories, some better than others. Perhaps reading them would bring some type of "closure" to this thing. I just wish I had mine to read. Best wishes and Semper Fi.

Craig,
After my first wife passed away in 87 I was going through some boxes came upon letters that I had sent to her while I was in Vietnam. To my surprise she had kept every one of them and had them in order as to when I had sent them to her. It took me a couple of months to get up the courage to read them. But I am glad that I did. As I read them I could see a young boy being scared to death at first, but as the months went by I could see a young boy turning into a man much older than his time. It took me maybe 2 to 3 months to read all of them, but now as I look back, I am glad that I did. Some people don't want to do this and it is easy to understand. Just my 2 cents worth.

Veterans Disarmament Bill

Could Come Before the Senate at Any Time
Gun Owners of America (GOA) provides Senators with several pro-gun amendments

Wednesday, September 12, 2007

The Senate could bring up the Veterans Disarmament Bill at any time, as a result of its passage in the Judiciary Committee a few weeks ago. The bill—introduced by F-rated Representative Carolyn McCarthy and Senator Patrick Leahy—is ready to come to the floor.

Gun Owners of America delivered draft amendments to every Senate office yesterday, providing important changes that must be made to the bill. Among others, the most important amendment would make it clear that veterans suffering from PTSD are NOT prohibited persons, and thus, are not to be denied the ability to purchase a firearm simply because of emotional problems resulting from their service to this country.

The Military Order of the Purple Heart is opposed to the McCarthy-Leahy bill, having stated on June 18 of this year, that "For the first time the legislation, if enacted, would statutorily impose a lifetime gun ban on battle-scarred veterans."

Military veterans are justifiably concerned that this bill will legitimize the very thing that President Clinton did over seven years ago, when his administration added 83,000 names of veterans—suffering from maladies such as PTSD—into the NICS background check system.

Proponents of the bill argue that this bill gives veterans a mechanism for getting their names off of the prohibited person list. That's like giving a mugger access to your home, but then stating you can hire a lawyer and pay THOUSANDS UPON THOUSANDS of dollars to eventually (maybe) get your stolen items back.

If the proponents are right—that this bill will actually help gun owners—then surely they won't object to friendly amendments that are designed to make it unmistakably clear that military veterans or grownups who suffered with ADHD as children will never be denied the ability to purchase a firearm, simply because they once had a "determination" from an anti-gun shrink that said there was the MINISCULE possibility that they could pose a danger to themselves or others.

You can be sure that if the McCarthy-Leahy bill passes, it will just be a first step. Consider some of the bigoted statements made by celebrities and politicians which not only show their contempt for gun owners but their pompous thinking which leads them to believe that we are all crazy for wanting to own a gun:

Ø "I don't know that he's mentally qualified to own that gun."—Democrat Presidential candidate Joe Biden, insulting a YouTube viewer during a debate after the man referred to his semi-auto as his "baby." (July 25, 2007).

Ø "Isn't it possible that we all have that bit of insanity in us? That's why I'm for gun control . . . I don't really believe that a human being who feels [things] should have the option [that is, access to a gun] at their fingertips."—Actress Jodie Foster, quoted in a Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence press release (August 20, 2007).

Ø And then there're the studies which will be, no doubt, used by liberal anti-gunners to strip away the gun rights from more and more law-abiding citizens, using the pretext that a shrink's diagnosis proves these people shouldn't own guns:

Ø "A quarter of the Afghanistan and Iraq war veterans treated with U.S. government-funded health care have been diagnosed with a mental disorder, according to a study published Monday."—AFP news (March 12, 2007).

Ø "The number of American children and adolescents treated for bipolar disorder increased 40-fold from 1994 to 2003, researchers report today in the most comprehensive study of the controversial diagnosis. Experts say the number has almost certainly risen further since 2003."—New York Times (September 4, 2007).

Even before the studies started rolling in, gun haters were already working the legal loopholes as best they could. When the Veterans Administration got caught adding veterans' names into the NICS system during the Clinton presidency, they defended their actions by saying it was "required by law"—a statement which was just flat out false.

But it's notable to hear what a spokesman for the VA said in an interview with World Net Daily on June 27, 2000. He said the most common way of finding a veteran "incompetent" is when he or she receives a formal rating of incompetency from a VA panel of medical representatives or from "a duly authorized VA medical center, government agency, or even a PRIVATE PHYSICIAN." (Emphasis added.)

That's what HR 2640 is all about. McCarthy and Leahy (and others like Senator Chuck Schumer) are forging the legal chains that will be used to keep hundreds of thousands—if not millions—of decent, law-abiding Americans from owning guns . . . not because of what a court rules, but because of what ONE INDIVIDUAL says.

Over two hundred years ago, Patrick Henry warned about the "chains" that were being forged to enslave them. If he were here today, would he not warn us again?

Thankfully, there are many of you who are sounding the alarm. State groups from all over the nation are pumping out alerts to supplement what GOA is doing at the national level. Just yesterday, the New Hampshire Firearms Coalition (NHFC) called its members to action, stating that HR 2640 is a Trojan Horse, which sounds justified on the outside with promises of keeping "mental defectives" from having firearms. But when one takes a closer look at the details of the bill, the group said, it reveals "a huge expansion in those who will become a prohibited person; an expansion that could potentially include most Americans."

In addition to pointing out how many shrinks could prohibit average Americans from owning guns, NHFC points out that many pediatricians could make similar anti-gun "determinations" (using the language of the bill) to disarm their patients—since after all, these docs believe that "any household with firearms is 'dangerous,' even if they are properly stored."

Good point.

ACTION:

1. Stay informed: GOA has a mammoth section on it's website which both gives the specifics of the Veterans Disarmament Act and answers the claims made by supporters of the bill. Please go to http://www.gunowners.org/netb.htm to get more information, including the proposed GOA amendments that were delivered to each Senator on Tuesday.

2. Alert others: Forward this alert to pro-gun friends and family and ask them to take action as well.

3. Take action: Please contact your Senators, even if you have already done so. You can use the pre-written message below and send it as an e-mail by visiting the GOA Legislative Action Center at http://www.gunowners.org/activism.htm (where phone and fax numbers are also available).

----- Pre-written letter -----

Dear Senator:
I oppose the Veterans Disarmament Act, which is being pushed by Representative Carolyn McCarthy (HR 2640) and Sen. Patrick Leahy. This bill will expand the 1993 Brady Law and disarm hundreds of thousands of combat veterans, among others.

I understand that Gun Owners of America (GOA) distributed several amendments recently to every senatorial office to address the mistaken arguments that supporters of the bill have. I also understand that proponents of this bill are claiming it will actually help gun owners.

They argue that this bill gives veterans a mechanism for getting their names off of the prohibited person list. That's like giving a mugger access to your home, but then stating you can hire a lawyer and pay thousands upon thousands of dollars to eventually (maybe) get your stolen items back.

Well, if the proponents are right—that this bill will actually help gun owners--then surely they won't object to friendly amendments that are designed to make it unmistakably clear that military veterans or grownups who suffered with ADHD as children will never be denied the ability to purchase a firearm, simply because they once had a "determination" from an anti-gun shrink that said there was the MINISCULE possibility that they could pose a danger to themselves or others. That is what the GOA amendments are designed to do.

I still believe that the Brady Law has done more to register gun owners and deny guns from of law-abiding Americans than to keep guns out of criminals' hands. But adopting these amendments will at least prevent an anti-gun administration from doing what the Clintons did in 2000 when the Veterans Administration added the names of some 83,000 veterans into the NICS system.

All Servicemen & Women Aren't "Military Heroes" Saluting Our Veterans

On this Memorial Day, I'm thinking about the comment "military hero" made so casually by any of us who have never been in battle when referring to our troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. It's incorrect! The dictionary defines a "hero" as: "A person noted for feats of courage or nobility of purpose, one who has risked or sacrificed his or her life." That doesn't apply to 99 percent of the American soldiers who have ever shouldered a rifle. A "military hero" to me is a soldier who charged off a landing craft at Omaha Beach into weathering German machine-gun fire from the cliffs above. With his buddies dying all about him on D-Day, this soldier survived and fights his way through Europe during the final 11 months of World War II in Europe. Finally he stood at the Rhine River in Germany, watching the advance of Russian troops moving westward during the closing days of the war. That's a "military hero."

A "military hero" might also be a member of the 101st Airborne Division stuck in a foxhole at the Battle of the Bulge during the freezing cold winter of 1944, fighting the unexpected advance of the German army in the biggest battle on the Western Front during World War II. Under armed and under clothed, not freezing to death was an accomplishment, and holding the line against a fantastically well equipped German army was almost superhuman.

A "military hero" might also be all of the 177 B-24 "Liberator" bomber crews in the 9th Air Force who flew the low level raid on the German oil refineries at Ploesti, Romania on Aug. 1, 1943. German antiaircraft guns and fighters shot down 54 of these bombers. Pilots of five of the American heavy bombers received the Medal of Honor for their actions "above and beyond the call of duty" while participating in that attack. A "military hero" might also be any of those "leather-necks" who charged ashore at Iwo Jima on Feb. 19, 1945, and spent the next 36 days taking that eight square mile island away from the Japanese. Very few Marines survived the entire battle without being wounded: Some 6,825 American servicemen died on that god forsaken volcanic island, and 19,189 more were wounded The Japanese lost almost all 22,000 of their defenders; only 216 enemy soldiers were captured.

A "military hero" might also be the survivors of the aircraft carrier USS Yorktown that went down during the battle of Midway that began June 6, 1942 and ended four days later. By then, four Japanese carriers had been sent to the bottom by American air power. Carrier based planes from the Yorktown played a key role before she was put out of commission by enemy planes. The Yorktown was sunk after the battle by a torpedo from a Japanese submarine while under tow. This battle was a turning point in the Pacific theater. Never again did the Imperial Japanese Navy go on the offensive in World War II.

A "military hero" might also be any of the members of the 1st Marine Division who marched to Chosin Reservoir and back during the freezing winter of 1950 in the early months of the Korean War. The division was up against a numerically superior army of North Korean and Chinese soldiers who had them surrounded most of the time. Like the Battle of the Bulge five years earlier, it took a lot of effort in the subzero weather for a Marine not to freeze to death. At one point during the battle, Maj. Gen. O. E Smith, the division commander, was ordered by Gen. Douglas MacArthur, supreme Allied commander in Korea, to retreat. His response: "Retreat hell! We're surrounded and we're just advancing in another direction."

A "military hero" might also be an Army, Navy, Air Force or Marine aviator shot down over enemy territory during the Vietnam War. Many of these pilots, like U.S. Sen. John McCain, were captured and spent years in solitary confinement in a North Vietnam POW camp. In McCain's case, he was offered his freedom by his captures, apparently because he was the son and the grandson of two U.S. Navy admirals. He wouldn't consider it and came hobbling off the U.S. military transport plane in 1974 with the rest of our repatriated POWs from the "Hanoi Hilton" who were true "military heroes."

A "military hero" might also be a Marine who took part in 'the 77 day battle involving their artillery base at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam between Jan. 21 and April 1, 1968. Gen. William Westmoreland took on Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, the legendary North Vietnamese commander. Some 6,000 U.S. Marines were surrounded by an estimated 30,000 North Vietnamese Army and Viet Cong troops. The Marines lost 730 killed and 2,642 wounded. It's estimated enemy losses were in excess of 10,000. The siege of Khe Sanh was finally broken when a re-supply column broke through to the besieged fire base.

There are only three recipients of the Medal of Honor that I know about that have any connection to the Sun's circulation area: The late PFC Douglas T. Jacobson, USMC, WW II, Port Charlotte; PFC Hector Cafferata, USMC, Korea, Venice; the late Lt. Clyde Lassen, USN, Vietnam, Englewood. I had the privilege of interviewing Cafferata a few years ago. He was a green Marine recruit in Korea who took part in the Chosin Reservoir campaign. Although badly wounded, he and his buddy held off a hoard of attacking enemy troops during the bitter cold fighting at the reservoir. "I'm no hero," he assured me. "All I did was do my best to save me and my buddies butts." The next morning they found more than 100 dead enemy soldiers in front of their position. Cafferata's commendation says there were only a handful of enemy dead in front of him. Asked about the discrepancy the platoon leader who recommended Cafferata for the Medal of Honor told me/Nobody would believe how many dead there were in front of his spot on the line so we reduced the number."

The next time you use the phrase, "military heroes," make sure that's what the person is you're talking about. To use it indiscriminately is to cheapen its meaning for true "military heroes."

A Warriors Heart

Those that say a soldier only wants to fight, knows nothing of the warriors heart.
It is true he will not hesitate to fight,
a war he did not start.
Soldiers aren`t the ones who decide to go to war,
but are willing to go and bare that scar.
A soldier is not eager to kill,
he doesn't really want to fight.
He does so out of honor and duty,
he does so when the cause is right.
Not many know it but its true,
few things are as fragile as a warriors heart.
During the battles he is hard and cold,
but his torment comes to him late at night.
Often horrible things happen he can not control, that is when all the terrible stories get told.
In battle often there is no time to think,
all he can do is react.
When it`s over and all is calm, right or wrong it`s not possible to take anything back
So say what you will, think what you want, but make sure you get this part right,
few things are as fragile as a warriors heart.

GENERAL PACE 2nd PLATOON REUNITED

By Cpl. Ryan Blaich, II Marine Expeditionary Force (FWD)

KARMAH, Iraq (Sept. 5, 2007) -- Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, made a unique visit to Marines stationed here, Sept. 4. As far as meetings with four-star generals usually go, this event was much less formal. It seemed more like a gathering of relatives, a way for Gen. Pace to connect the hardened war fighters of today to the heroes of his past. It was evident he saw himself, and his old unit, in the Marines who stood in front of him.

Nearly 40 years have passed since then 2nd Lt. Pace first stepped into a combat zone as a platoon commander. The year was 1968 and the battle was infamously known as the Tet Offensive in Vietnam. It was there he battled against communism and the hand of fate, which made a profound impression on Gen. Pace's commitment to country and Corps. The event marked a time in his life never to be forgotten throughout his career as a Marine infantry officer.

Decades later and less than a month before he retires from office, Gen. Pace returned to the battlefield to join the same platoon of Marines he led into combat as a final salute to the Corps and to those who have ever served in 2nd platoon, Company G, 2nd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division.

Gen. Pace stood stoically in front of men who have seen many recent battles, some just weeks prior. He shared much of his past with them as they stood silently, gathered around weight benches and dumbbells at their outpost, known as Observation Post 3, near downtown Karmah. Only the hum of a lone generator could be heard as Gen. Pace not only recalled the full rank and names of the men who perished under his command, but his fight to make sense of it all as well.

"Guys to the left of me got shot. Guys to the right of me got blown up and nothing happened to me at all. I didn't understand that. I got out of Vietnam without even a scratch on me," Gen. Pace said. "But, I made a promise to myself back then that I would continue to serve in the Corps, in their memory, and try to do my job out of respect for them." Gen. Pace said he would only retire after he stopped getting promoted, and in his words, "It worked out OK."...

Read the rest to understand what a devastating blow to the military and the US Marine Corps that the PC police and the media have given us.

...Most people would agree it worked out a little better than OK.

On Sept. 30, 2005, Gen. Pace was appointed to his present position, making him the first Marine to ever serve as the president's top military advisor. He also serves as the military advisor to the Secretary of Defense, the National Security Council and the Department of Homeland Security. Until recently, no other Marine had ever made it to vice chairman, except Gen. Pace.

Despite the long list of successes on Gen. Pace's resume, he never forgot where and with whom it all started.

"After just over 40 years of service, when I do get out, I will still owe the Marines of 2nd platoon, Golf Company, more than I could ever repay," he said. "I'm so proud to be here with you."

The platoon seemed in awe, almost speechless by his visit. Maybe they were trying to digest the idea of a top-ranking, four-star general who humbly made it his priority to meet each of them individually, hand out coins and take personal photographs while thanking them for their sacrifices.

As Marines maneuvered around the outdoor gym for a group photo with the most distinguished member of their platoon, Gen. Pace said, "I'ld love to be able to show my guys from Golf, 2nd platoon, your picture. I know they'll be proud of you," referring to the Marines of his Vietnam platoon, who he still visits.

It is this close knit bond between Marines, officers and enlisted, which Gen. Pace said is the foundation to the health of the Corps.

After each Marine had their photograph taken with the general, got their coin and asked their questions, he had one final gift to give, a knife. Both symbolic and traditional, the K-bar knife has been a staple of Marine combat gear for generations. It was this he chose to bestow upon the latest platoon leader of 2nd platoon.

"I wanted to give you this. From one 2nd platoon leader to another," he said. "Out of respect for who you are, out of envy for your future time in our Corps and out of envy for your opportunity to lead these Marines."

1st Lt. Chad Cassady, a former sergeant, was the proud owner of the new knife and said he felt privileged to receive such a gift from a man he has long respected. Cassady had met Gen. Pace nearly two years ago at the Marine Corps Ball ceremony, not long after Gen. Pace was elected to chairman. He did not think their paths would ever cross again.

"I didn't think I'd ever see him again," Cassady said. "I never could have imagined we shared a connection."

Cassady does not plan to use the weapon in combat, but instead will proudly display the grand memento in his house. Not everyone there got a K-bar, but perhaps was able to take away a sense of belonging.

As the platoon's Corpsman, Seaman Kyle Bourgeois, put it, "I just feel fortunate."

Silent admiration filled the eyes of lance corporals and captains alike and everyone present received something less tangible than a steel blade or a metal coin. Gen. Pace was handing to each of them an item that never fades or gets dull; a sense of pride and the relentless will to succeed.

The bonds formed and shared between Marines, units, and platoons are timeless.

"Forty years from now, you'll remember these officer's names and they'll remember yours," Gen. Pace said. "A lot of stuff is going to happen between now and then. You are going to have a lot of experiences, most of it is going to be a blur, but you remember this, you'll remember each other and I'll bet you, you'll find ways to get together."

"It'll be very difficult for me to walk away," he said. "I was shaking hands the day before yesterday in Afghanistan and a soldier came through and said, 'Sir, thank you for your service. We'll take it from here.' As I look at you, that's spot on. You have taken it."

More Dreams

Today I found myself talking to this man I have known for over 15 years. We have not been good friends, just happened to work together a few years ago. I knew that he had been in the Army in Vietnam, had a purple heart and had a rather rough time of it but he didn't discuss this with anyone and to tell you the truth when I worked with him was prior to my involvement in this whole Khe Sanh thing and before my first reunion and my understanding of PTSD.

Of course a lot of things have changed for me during these past five years, getting into the PTSD program thanks to Neil Kenny and Tom Horchler and a lot of others I have met at the Khe Sanh reunions. I have been able to get a handle on this thing and manage pretty well now, in fact I have helped others to understand, like others before have helped me. Anyway, this guy and I are having this discussion about Vietnam, I wait for the man next to me to leave, him not being a Vietnam Veteran I didn't want to say anything around him because I knew that he would not have understood our discussion and if he heard our conversation he most likely would have misconstrued what we were talking about.

I start the conversation by asking, "You got a heart in Vietnam, didn't you." He answers, "Yes I did." I tell him my story, about sitting next to this former Marine I knew, telling him I was about to go the my first Khe Sanh reunion but not really looking forward to hearing a bunch of old men talk about the war because it was not something I thought about any more. The guy looks at me and says, "Craig, Vietnam is something I think about all of the time." You have heard this story before from me, but I wanted to lay the foundation for you. When he said this I was shocked knowing that in fact I had thought about Vietnam every day and until he said that to me, I hadn't realized I had in fact had dreams or thought about Vietnam.

Back to this guy I used to work with. I tell him the same story and then I look at him and say, "Those dreams I had every morning and every night are the same dream that you have now, aren't they?" I was not really sure what kind of reaction I would get from this guy; I mean he is one of those rather formal individuals who keeps his emotions to himself. He looks at me kind of in shock and says, "How do you know what dreams I have?" My response is, "I know because they are the same dreams I and ever other Vietnam Veteran I know has had." He swallows hard and tears come to his eyes. Now this man is 63 years old and it's in a public place in the middle of the afternoon and he has never talked to anyone about his experience before. I was not quite prepared for his response, but his starts to tell me about his experience in Vietnam and how it has affected life. How the smell of the dirt in his yard reminds him of the tunnels he used to go into. How when the top of the tunnel touched his back it scared him and he is always reminded of this when he feels and smells dirt.

We talked some more and I gave him my email address and telephone number and told him to think about what we talked about and to call me later if he thought he might like to file with the VA and perhaps talk further and that I knew what it was like to feel all alone and be in our world, you know the world where you can't explain the pain to anyone else?

The point of all of this is that I think it is important to have compassion for others who are, even after all of these years, still trying to get a handle on all this stuff. It's important for them to know that they are not alone and that what they have dreamed, felt or are going through, is a road that many of us have already traveled.

POETRY

Tell Me Why The Bullet Passed Me By

I heard it pass right next to my head, why did that bullet pass me by.
No one will ever be able to tell me,
so I'll always wonder why.
It went right by with a rush,
it hit the guy next to me in his head.
Was it not my time,
was it his instead.
Only thing I know is I'm still here,
and he is still dead.
So many near misses,
too many too close to call.
Why did those bullets pass me by,
now their names are on the wall.
I can still see their faces, they look so young,
it some times makes me cry.
No one has the answer,
so I'll always wonder why.
There are a lot of theories and explanations, but no one really knows why.
Yes those bullets passed me by,
yes sometimes it makes me cry.
I will never know why.

MEMORIAL DEDICATED TO RAY PRITTIE

Dear Mr. Eichler,

The friends and colleagues of Ray Prittie at the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power dedicated a bronze plaque to Ray's memory on Memorial Day, May 28, 2007. We over-collected for the plaque by $196. Ray's family asked that we give the extra money to the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. Therefore, enclosed is a check in the amount of $196 for the Association's general fund.

Please feel free to email me or my colleague John Miller if you would like more information about the ceremony for Ray.

My email address is wayne.bamossy@ladwp and John's is john.miller@ladwp.com

MEMORIAL SERVICE HELD FOR ANTHONY PEPPER KIA 06 APRIL 1968 HILL 558 WITH GOLF CO 2/26

My brother, Anthony John Pepper (Tony) served with Golf Company 2/26 and was killed April 6, 1968 at Khe Sanh. I would love to hear from anyone who was there, who might have known him, or was nearby on that day. I am writing a book about him and would love anyone's thoughts. He was never sent home. We had a memorial service for him at Arlington this past April. Several of the Marines he served with came and paid their respects. It was truly wonderful.

SEMPER FI and God Bless,
Carrie Pepper

HISTORY: In April 1968, Cpl. James M. "Jim" Trimble and PFC Anthony J. "Tony" Pepper were members of Company G, which was conducting a search and destroy operation to interdict enemy activity moving from Laos into the northwestern provinces of South Vietnam. When North Vietnam began to increase its military strength in South Vietnam, NVA and Viet Cong troops again intruded on neutral Laos for sanctuary, as the Viet Minh had done during the war with the French some years before. This border road was used by the Communists to transport weapons, supplies and troops from North Vietnam into South Vietnam, and was frequently no more than a path cut through the jungle covered mountains. US forces used all assets available to them to stop this flow of men and supplies from moving south into the war zone.

On 6 April 1968, Company G engaged a large communist force in heavy combat on a grassy hillside overlooking and in view of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The battle site was located approximately one mile west of Route 608, less than two miles northwest of the combat base, six miles northwest of the city of Khe Sanh, nine miles east of the South Vietnamese/Lao border and 24 miles south of the demilitarized zone (DMZ), Quang Tri Province, South Vietnam.

Cpl. Trimble and PFC Pepper quickly established a fighting position within a bomb crater. During the vicious battle that raged around them, several Marines were killed and wounded, and the bomb crater in which the two Marines were located took a direct hit from a mortar round. After several unsuccessful attempts were made to recover Jim Tremble and Tony Pepper's remains by surviving members of Company G, their unit was forced to withdraw from the grassy hill under fire.

On 7 April 1968, US forces returned to the battle site. During an extensive search and recovery (SAR) operation, the unit recovered the bodies of nine Americans, but found no sign of Cpl. Trimble of PFC Pepper in or around the area. At the time the formal search was terminated, Jim Tremble and Tony Pepper were declared Killed in Action/Body Not Recovered.

On 24 June 1993, a joint American/Vietnamese team under the auspices of the Joint Task Force for Full Accounting (JTFFA) traveled to the area of loss where Company G had been engaged in combat. Team members interviewed local residents, but located no witnesses who had information pertaining to this case. The team also traveled to the battle site to conduct a surface search for the missing Marines, but found no remains or personal effects belonging to either Cpl. Trimble or PFC Pepper.

After completing the surface search, the team determined that Jim Trimble and Tony Pepper died as a result of a direct mortar hit during the battle in which nine others were killed; and that the day after the battle, the area was thoroughly searched and the remains of the other nine men were recovered and subsequently identified. Further, during the original search, no trace of either Marine was found in or around the bomb crater. Based on these facts, the JTFFA team determined, "It is unreasonable to expect that bone splinters could be located 25 years after the incident in a case such as this. The remains of each individual are unrecoverable."

The fate of Jim Trimble and Tony Pepper is not in doubt and there is virtually no chance that their remains are recoverable today. Above all else, these men have the right not to be forgotten by the nation for which they gave their lives.

SMATHERS, LILLIAN WEBSTER - 86, passed away peacefully, with her family beside her, on Friday, April 20, 2007 at Givens Health Care, her caring home for the past five years. She was preceded in death by her husband, Hugh Heron Smathers. Born Lillian Sitman Webster in Knoxville, Tennessee on September 25, 1920, she was the daughter of the late Cora Blanton Davis and Frank Watkins Webster. She attended the University of Tennessee and was a member of Chi Omega Fraternity. Lillian was a former member of Church Street Methodist Church and the United Methodist Church of Gatlinburg. She was an active member, for many years, of the Smoky Mountain Hiking Club, the Southern Appalachian High-Lands Conservancy, and the Retired Citizens of Gatlinburg. Lillian leaves a daughter, Joan Worth of Asheville; a son, Michael Worth and special friend, Lucille Biscaglio of Des Plaines, Ill; granddaughter, Juliellen Sarver of Alexandria Va.; grandson, Jon Sarver and wife, Amanda Mills; and two great grandchildren, Emma and Ellis, all of Asheville. She, also, leaves behind the generous and caring staff at Givens Health Care; Smoky the cat; and AJ the dog. A celebration of her life was held at Givens Estates on April 23, 2007 with Reverend Joe Fulk officiating. Her ashes will be placed in the Jonathan Webster Family Cemetery in Mt. Pleasant, Tenn. in June. Memorial donations may be made to Southern Appalachian Highlands Conservancy, 34 Wall Street, Suite 502, Asheville, NC 28801, or to the Animal Companion Fund, Givens Health Care, 600 Barrett Rd., Asheville, NC 28803. Condolences may be sent to Lillian's family at 149 Wyoming Rd., Asheville, NC 28803. Asheville Area Alternative Funeral & Cremation Services is assisting the family.

BOOKS

WELCOME TO VIETNAM "MACHO MAN"

By Craig W. Tourte

I just finished "...Macho Man," written by Ernest Spencer (Copyright 1987 by Corps Press) and as a result, I'm exhausted and mentally drained. I tend to read more than one book at a time, often moving between books as time allows and the mood strikes me. I settled down on the couch the other day, intending to read just a few chapters of Macho Man but I found I couldn't put the darn thing down, it emotionally consumed me. Mr. Spencer was the Commanding Officer of Delta Company, 1st Battalion 26th Marines during the Siege of Khe Sanh, occupation of Hill 881 South, along with other battles and operations. It is his story written in the raw-and to some I'm sure shocking-vernacular of a combat Marine. Within the first few pages we learn that Mr. Spencer's college major was philosophy, which explains his often subtle philosophizing interjections.

When I was a young police officer soon after returning from Vietnam, I used to have dreams about firing my service weapon, I could see the bullet leave the barrel of my weapon in slow motion as another undesirable pointed his gun at me, the dream ended there, never completed, I woke up sweat soaked and agitated. It may have had something to do with almost getting shot on more than one occasion, you know those alley's, armed suspects, dark houses, walking down the hallway, that sort of thing, those days before SWAT was introduced into law enforcement agencies. I thought mine was an unusual dream until I had a conversation with a friend and patrol partner who told me he had the same dream. In fact one day at the range when he fired his weapon the bullet did just that, left the barrel of this service weapon in seemingly slow motion and traveled about 20 feet before it fell onto the ground, a failure on his part to properly maintain his weapon and ammunition.

I have had many dreams about my time at Khe Sanh, none that really frightened me, but they were there none-the-less. Within the last year or so, I have been having the same dream about Vietnam, peculiar since my experience at Khe Sanh has been so long ago. I was thinking I was the only one who has had this dream-as I thought I was the only one who was having that dream when I was a police officer-which seems to be occurring more frequently. What is also odd, I spent my tour in Vietnam as a "Poge" synonymous with REMF. In the chapter titled, "Fantasy," I was shocked to read Mr. Spencer's dream has been my current dream. Mr. Spencer has a right to our dream; I'm not so sure I do. "...I am invisible...I go out alone at night...I make my way silently and invisible through enemy lines..." Why I ask myself, is our dream so similar when our experience was so different?

I was particularly fascinated with the chapter titled, "Crazy." When I was a young police officer and too soon after my experience at Khe Sanh, I responded to a possible bomb at a bank, a common call in those days and a very real possibility in the 70's. I took the package outside and stuck my face real close and then opened it up. I didn't care, what happens, happens. As I now reflect back, I think that act may have been something left over from Vietnam. Mr. Spencer relates in "Crazy,", "...I can't think of any guy who goes through Khe Sanh who doesn't get strange...I never take a guy out of the field for just being strange...I also know I am strange." After all of these years, I now feel vindicated for my occasional "strange" behavior and I am certainly aware that I am still a little crazy.

I thought "Welcome to Vietnam, Macho Man" was an outstanding read. Upon reflection, I think regardless of one's MOS or experience there is a little Macho Man is all of us. One cannot read this book without seeing some of themselves in its characters, sense the dangers or recall the sounds of incoming and remember the horrors of war. Mr. Spencer was truly the Macho Man.

There are a few first editions still available, which I am sure Mr. Spencer would be more than happy to send to you if you were to contact him via his address in the directory. I know the publishing and bindings of the hard back editions are expensive to produce, so you might consider that when ordering, but your historical copy will be autographed by the author. The paperback edition can be purchased by going to Amazon or www.corpsproducitons.com. Just for information, I purchased mine and Mr. Spencer was kind enough to autograph it for me.

KHE SANH VETERANS HONOR IRAQ WAR HERO

By Tom Eichler

The KSV had the honor of the presence of one of our newest Marine Veterans from the war in Iraq at our annual Awards Banquet at our reunion in Washington DC. Neil Kenny introduced Sergeant Jeramiah Workman to our organization. Jeramiah was our Honored Guest and warmly welcomed by the membership.

Sergeant Workman was awarded the Navy Cross for his Heroic actions while serving as a squad leader Mortar Section Weapons Company, 3rd Battalion 5th Marine Regiment, Regimental Team 1, 1st Marine Division. His Citation is attached.

Citation: For extraordinary heroism while serving as Squad Leader, Mortar Platoon, Weapons Company, 3d Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, Regimental Combat Team 1, 1st Marine Division, U.S. Marine Corps Forces, Central Command in support of Operation IRAQI FREEDOM on 23 December 2004. During clearing operations in Al Fallujah, Iraq, Corporal Workman displayed exceptional situational awareness while organizing his squad to enter a building to retrieve isolated Marines inside. Despite heavy resistance from enemy automatic weapons fire, and a barrage of grenades, Corporal Workman fearlessly exposed himself and laid down a base of fire that allowed the isolated Marines to escape. Outside the house, he rallied the rescued Marines and directed fire onto insurgent positions as he aided wounded Marines in a neighboring yard. After seeing these Marines to safety, he led another assault force into the building to eliminate insurgents and extract more Marines. Corporal Workman again exposed himself to enemy fire while providing cover fire for the team when an enemy grenade exploded directly in front of him causing shrapnel wounds to his arms and legs. Corporal Workman continued to provide intense fire long enough to recover additional wounded Marines and extract them from the besieged building. Although injured, he led a third assault into the building, rallying his team one last time to extract isolated Marines before M1A1 tanks arrived to support the battle. Throughout this fight, Corporal Workman's heroic actions contributed to the elimination of 24 insurgents. By his bold leadership, wise judgment, and complete dedication to duty, Corporal Workman reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service. Home Town: Richwood, Ohio

We have instituted a new magazine section to thank those members who contribute so generously to the" Khe Sanh Veterans. Their contributions allow us to continue to expand and improve our Red Clay magazine. There will be four levels of contributions: DIAMOND over 1,000, PLATINUM over 200-1,000, GOLD over 50-200 and SILVER 20-50. Each member will receive a new membership card, corresponding with their level of contribution

KHE SANH VETERANS VISIT TO WASHINGTON MEMORIALS

The membership traveled to Washington DC for a visit to the War memorials. Although the entire area was closed to the public for a scheduled 4th of July parade and activities our group was allowed to have a private viewing of the memorials. The group also visited the Iwo Jima Memorial for a group picture.

Presidents Message

Several years ago Terry Redlin, the most renowned painter of Americana, donated all the proceeds from one of his paintings titled "His Last Goodbye" to the Khe Sanh Veterans. This painting is the last in a series he painted honoring his Brother-In-Law Charles Langenfeld, a corpsman who was killed serving with Echo Company 2/26. Charles was decorated for his actions on 05 Feb 68 when Echo Company's positions on Hill 861A were attacked and partially overrun.

This picture is depicted on several of the Khe Sanh Veterans publications; "The Khe Sanh Veterans Book of Poetry" and Ray Stubbe's Book "Battalion of Kings". In case our members are interested the Redlin's Art, "His Last Goodbye" is available in 2 sizes: Limited Edition (signed by Terry Redlin and limited to 3500 prints, measures 18-1/2" X 32" and sells for $ 195.00. An Elite Edition that measures 14" X 24" sells for $ 75.00 and is not signed by Terry Redlin. Both versions are available framed. Any questions can be directed to Julie K. Ranum, 605-882-3877 or via email at redlinac@redlinart.com.

Remember all proceeds from this beautiful painting go to the Khe Sanh Veterans, through the generosity of the Redlin family. So far the fine Redlin family has donated over $ 22,000 to our organization from the sale of this painting.

Vice President Reunion Reminder

The Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in Reno Nevada on July 28-03 August, is expected to be the largest attended reunion in the history of the KSV. Please submit your registration forms and make Hotel reservations as soon as possible. We also have many new items in the Khe Sanh Veterans PX. All proceeds from the PX are used to support our Red Clay Magazine, so your continued support helps the magazine continue to grow.

OBIT

ERNESTO "GOOIE" GOMEZ

On November 26, 2007 Gooie received a full military funeral conducted by the Marines of Henderson Hall in Arlington National Cemetery. From across this nation 70 plus individuals gathered to pay their last respects. In addition to Gooie's family there were, numerous Vietnam veterans that Gooie had served with from HMM-364 and HMM-262, two men representing Colonel Dabney's Warriors of Hill 881S, two active duty Marines who had served with HMM-364 during Operation Iraqi Freedom, the photographer who captured the essence of Hill 881S, a representative of the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation and a contingent of the Patriot Guard Motorcycle Club.

(ABOVE) LtGen Henry W. Buse, Jr., presented the Navy Cross to Cpl Ernesto Gomez for extraordinary acts of heroism while serving as a helicopter crew chief in Vietnam.

Navy Cross Citation

For extraordinary heroism while serving with Marine Medium Helicopter Squadron 262, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. On 25 January 1968, Corporal Gomez was the Crew Chief aboard a CH-46 transport helicopter assigned an emergency medical evacuation mission on Hill 881 near the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The pilot proceeded to the designated area and landed in the zone as two Marines began leading a casualty, whose head and eyes were covered with bandages, toward the helicopter. When the entire landing zone was subjected to intense enemy fire, the two men were forced to drop to the ground. Observing the blindfolded casualty attempting to reach the aircraft unassisted, Corporal Gomez Gomez unhesitatingly left the helicopter and rushed across the 25 meters of fire-swept terrain to the side of the injured man. Quickly pulling the Marine to the ground, he selflessly used his own body to shield his comrade from the hostile fire impacting around them, and as the enemy fire continued, he took cover with the casualty in a nearby rocket crater. Corporal Gomez remained in this exposed area until another crew member rushed to his assistance. Then the two Marines, protecting their wounded comrade from further injury, carried him to the helicopter. The pilot was quickly informed that the injured Marine was aboard, and the aircraft lifted from the hazardous area for the medical facility at Khe Sanh. Corporal Gomez's heroic actions were instrumental in saving his companion's life and inspired all who observed him. By his courage, selfless concern for the safety of his fellow Marine, and unswerving devotion to duty at great personal risk, he upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

Pat Donovan, who flew many missions with Gooie, one of which earned him a Navy Cross also, submits the following in remembrance: Carleen, we are with you now and always recalling Gooie's voice at Hill 881S who now lives on at the Marine Corps Museum. You are all in our thoughts and prayers of praise for the life and presence of Gooie who remains with us always.

Caldon and wife Alisha of Ramona, California; four grandchildren, Delaney, Caitlin and Noah Caldon and Alexis Williamson; father, Clifton Mailes Caldon; brother, Brian Edward Caldon and wife of East Berne, New York; sister, Janet Kochanowski and husband Jack of Avon, Connecticut; and several nieces and nephews. He was predeceased by his Mother, Eleanor Esterbrook Caldon.

OBITS

Lieutenant Colonel James W. Warner USMC

Lieutenant Colonel James W. Warner, a decorated veteran of the United States Marine Corps, died on March 13 at the Western Medical Center in Tustin, CA. He was seventy-four. Born in Redwood falls, Minnesota, the son of Verona and Roy Franklin Warner, he graduated from Redwood Falls High School, and then attended Hamline University in St. Paul in 1951, leaving school to volunteer for the Korean war. Training as a naval aviator in Pensacola, he was commissioned a Second Lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps. Among his early assignments as a helicopter pilot, he won the coveted duty of flying President Dwight D. Eisenhower. Promoted to the rank of Captain, his outstanding service was recognized with an award for Honorable Service at The White House.

A Major during the Vietnam war, he was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross, for heroism in combat on March 15, 1968. At war's end, he became Director of Facilities Management at the Marine Corps. Air Station, Santa Ana, and won a commendation for "exceptionally meritorious service". Retiring from active duty in 1972, he entered the University of California at Irvine, majoring in Classical Civilization. In an unprecedented action, the Classics Department, including the entire faculty and fellow students, commended Lieutenant Colonel Warner. They wrote: "All differences in age, background and outlook between you and your fellow students evaporated in your obvious enthusiasm for the acquisition of knowledge. Your presence in the classes and in the Department in general has been greatly beneficial".

His late wife, Rosalie Ogden Warner, passed last year. Lieutenant Colonel Warner is survived by his sister, Judith and her husband, Marvin Penski, his daughters, Leah Labrador and Louise Griffin, and his sons, James Warner, Jr. and Daniel Warner. His grandchildren are Kelly, Theresa, Sarah and Wendy Warner, and Spencer James Griffin. Col. Warner's wishes will be granted and his ashes will be flown to Avalon Harbor where they will join his beloved wife Rosie of 49 years. Catalina Island was their home away from home

TWO HEROES

By Beryl H. Bushaw

This is remembrance of two fallen Marine heroes who died 23 years apart in two different Wars. First, my Uncle, Sgt. Ray E. Bushaw 3/24 Reg. 4th. Marine Div. KIA on March 3rd. 1945 during the assault on Hill 382, Iwo Jima, Sulpher Islands in WWII. My Uncle Ray was my main inspiration to join the Marine Corps in 1966.

Second, my friend Don Saunders who was KIA on March 4th. 1968 during the Siege of Khe Sanh. I served with Don with 1/13 from July 1967 until his death. Don was a good and loyal friend to all; it was my honor to have known and served with Don at Khe Sanh.

"VERY INTERESTING"

By Craig W. Tourte

Interesting about life and the little twists and turns it takes. Beryl called me on the telephone today. Those of you who receive the Red Clay magazine might remember the photo that Tom Horchler took of our little unit standing in front of the truck after the Siege and just before we loaded up and left Khe Sanh, although I'm afraid I may have misidentified Beryl in the photo. It was the first time I had talked to Beryl since Quang Tri where we all ended up some forty years ago. We talked about an hour, an emotional moment for the both of us I'm sure. Beryl asked about Fred Thomas Jr. He said that he had made several attempts at contacting people by that name but without any luck. We were all pretty close at Khe Sanh and made various promises to visit each other should we survive. It was with great sadness that I told Beryl that Fred had extended his tour and was KIA in the early part of 1969. Mike Fishbaugh sent the story to me and I wrote a little article about it in Red Clay and posted something on the board about it.

I asked Tom Eichler to send Beryl the new edition of Red Clay and a few past editions. Beryl recently got a computer and just found our web site, this is his first POST. It's good to have another join out family and a pretty nice surprise to have on our birthday. Welcome home Beryl and welcome to the brotherhood.

OBIT

Jim Melanson B Co 1/26

By His Son Tony Melanson

My Dad, Jim Melanson was born April 30, 1946 of Wilson and Helen Melanson in Manchester NH. He was 61 when he died on December 15 with my sister Karina and I by his side.

He graduated from Weare High School in 1964 where he played basketball. My Dad loved basketball, and actually was a huge fan of the Boston Celtics during the Larry Bird era. I remember watching those games with him and enjoying every moment.

He served as a Marine from 1966 to 1968. Upon his dispatch to Khe Sanh in Vietnam he served with Bravo Company, First Battalion, 26th regiment. He reported in July of 1967 and was an Infantryman in the second platoon. To quote his commander Ken Pipes "His service during the 77 day Siege of the Khe Sanh combat base exposed him to the single most intense, sustained, extremely dangerous and stressful fighting of the Vietnam War".

Over time my Father learned to be proud of his Vietnam service and later in life you would almost never see him without one of his Vietnam caps perched on his head. Once a Marine, always a Marine. To say he saw active combat would be an understatement. For his service he received the following medals:

Purple Heart with 1 Gold Star
The Combat Action Ribbon
The Presidential Unit Citation with one Bronze Star
The National Defense Service Medal
The United States Vietnam Campaign Medal with at least two Bronze Stars
The Republic of Vietnam Cross of Gallantry with Palm and Frame
The Republic of Vietnam Civic Action Ribbon with Palm and Frame and the Republic of Vietnam Service Medal with Device

His commitment to our country, the Corps and to our freedom is incontestable.

On August 30th 1969 he was wed to my Mom, Donna who is here today. What a hope for the future she would bring into his life. The hope she supplied would always light his life. Thanks Mom.

He graduated from the NH Technical College and began a career as a welder. He gave birth to two children, Karina on September 7 1972, and I on April 16 1971.

He moved to Oregon for a few years in 1987, returned to the New Hampshire around 1992 where he would live in Belmont, and then Concord for many years. For a brief time in the final two years he lived with Karina and her husband Robert where they lovingly cared for him as his health was becoming increasingly fragile due to liver disease. He then lived at Epsom Manor Nursing Care facility in Epsom NH.

For those of you who knew my Dad you saw many facets of a man.

His humor was really special. Jump up and sit down sort of funny. In fact it was only a few days ago that I connected with a combat marine who served with my Dad and his humor was one of the things he mentioned with emphasis. Combat and funny don't usually mix. I remember seeing him make other people laugh with dry side-stepping wit. Even my friends found my Dad's humor contagious.

He was charming. I think his genuine gentle spirit, appreciation for people, and his humor endeared him to those he met. This was so true at Epsom Manor Nursing Home. You should have seen the way they loved my father.

He was creative. Did you know my father has a patent to his name? We had dropped ceilings and wood paneling in our house...necessity being the mother of invention he patented a special picture hanging device that would clip to the frame of the dropped ceiling to keep us from banging holes in that really sacred and special wood paneling...that wood paneling is still there...with holes I might add.

He was an outdoorsman. He would fish for just about anything. Have any of you sat on a 5 gallon bucket at night with a flashlight fixed to a bobber waiting for a catfish – or hornedpout as we call them - to bite while listening to the hiss of the gas lantern and the only thing between you and the swarm of mosquitoes was the smoke from your dad's stogie? Ok. That was a family outing.

Have any of you stayed up in the evening getting your ice fishing traps untangled so you could go out at dawn on a winter morning, cut through 30 inches of solid ice with a chisel and wait for the flag to spring up? Ok. That was a retreat. Have any of you been struck by lightning...twice at different times... while camping? My Dad was...and I am not exactly sure what that was all about...but twice??

He was a thinker. He loved poetry. Some of his poetry was published in the Union Leader. He loved art and things that were delicate and beautiful.

He was creative. In fact I credit him with my innovative spirit. I also remember this picnic-basket-with-pulley contraption he set up. We lived on the second floor of a duplex and he rigged this thing up so we could have BBQ's outside without carrying all the stuff up and down the stairs.

He was content. He never was one to complain. He found pleasure in the simplest of things. Give him the Boston Herald, a Stogie, a few diet cokes, a front porch, sunshine and a scratch ticket...and he was in the lap of luxury. His favorite meal was a fried fisherman's platter. He loved a fire in the fireplace on Tremont street in Concord and later at my home in Vermont.

He was a survivor. Oh my goodness. The stories we can tell. He was a survivor to the very end. Even on December 14th as he was dying he said to me OH MAN TONE...IM HAVING A BAD DAY. He was a master of understatement too.

He was troubled. He struggled with debilitating mental illness, no doubt a result from his experience in Vietnam. He was a drinker much of his life and nearly all of mine. It took a little piece of everyone, but it certainly cost him the most. God's grace has been alive in the people who loved my Dad. Thank you for loving him.

You know, he was a man chasing freedom. Freedom for his country, freedom in the outdoors, freedom of expression, and freedom from pain and mental anguish. That pursuit of freedom made the man we know, and took the man we love.

Surrounding us here are symbols of freedom. The first time I drove in I was struck by the rows of American flags waving. I was impressed with the beauty of this place. It is an honorable and fitting place for those who have fought for freedom.

Many of you here have served in the military. Some of you have seen active combat and have fought for our freedom in foreign places. Some of you have experienced personal sacrifice in some way because of this noble pursuit. Perhaps others of you are a child, brother, sister or spouse of one of those who have put themselves on the line for freedom. We thank you and are grateful for your service, sacrifice and support and that you have come to honor a good soldier and a loving man.

My Dad was captivated by this thing called freedom. He fought for freedom, He hoped for freedom as he began a new life with Donna after his tour in Vietnam. He lived it out through his love for the outdoors. He saw freedom born in new life through his children Karina and I.

Ironically, he is more free now than he ever was while here on earth. This is often used as a trite cliché. But I can assure you it is not trite, nor a cliché. It is the most powerful truth known to human kind. True freedom is everlasting, breaks bonds and lets you discard the baggage of life. That's what my father wanted more than anything - to drop his own baggage and live a life of freedom.

I want you to close your eyes for a moment. When I say the word freedom what comes to you mind first? Maybe it's an American Flag waving against a bright blue sky, a peak athletic experience, financial freedom, a 4th of July parade, an adventure to the deep wild, or the Statue of Liberty. These are all good things. But for each of us, including me, freedom can be just a symbolized concept.

Sometimes those things that we think will make us most free make us most captive.

What does true freedom – the kind from God himself - What does that look like in our lives? Where does our freedom come from? Can you count on it? Is it infallible? Because my father made a profession of faith in Jesus and chose to believe in Him, our hope rests in God's promise that he is now experiencing true and complete freedom in eternity.

POETRY

WOUNDED IN ACTION

I'm a good girl I am don't eat much, don't smoke won't take up much room can sleep on the floor

I've noticed the scar that seams you in two puckered burn marks of war purple tracks on your arm unseen wounds in your mind

I can cool with my hands soothe with my mouth let me draw out your pain make you whole once again heal you crack open your door so I can slip in close it tight lock it well keep me

WAR WOUNDS

there's a hole in my chest where my heart used to be
I palpate the edges assess the damage
worse than I feared music hurts, sunlight blinds can't eat, can't sleep don't speak, barely breathe frigid torso, frozen limbs far too painful to think wash your hands wash them well don your greens glove up my gurney is near numb me more replace my heart tuck it in make it fit suture me

anoint the wound check my pulse blanket me leave hands wet with blood

WHY I GO TO REUNIONS

By Neil Kenny L Co 3/26

I have been going to the Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion since 2000 in San Diego. If I am honest I would have to admit that my hope was to reconnect with at least one of the many Marines with whom I had served with in the many hills and rice paddies of the land know as the 'Nam'.

During my stays with the members of the association at the various locations across the country, I have only met one or two members of Lima Company 3/26. Neither of those folks were people whom I had the pleasure to serve with. At the second reunion that I attended in Dallas, I was able to convince my absolute best friend Phineas to attend. It was indeed grand.

Just prior to this years reunion, I received an email from a fellow who stated that he knew several folks who had served with Lima. I had read the email and marked it to be reread and responded to. I did not however do so prior to the trip to Washington, D.C.

Standing in the hospitality room, I was approached by an unassuming gentleman in the company of an extremely attractive woman. He politely inquired if I was NJ Kenny and did I know or recognize any of the people in the photographs that he flashed in front of me.

Looking at those photos was the opening to a window in my mind and a light upon the darkness of my heart. I knew damm near every name on the sheet. It was a moment of raw, unnerved emotion as my psyche raced back thirty nine years to the playground of my youth and I was immediately overwhelmed.

Andy Bryant. Jesus H. Christ! He and I walked point for the Marines of 3/7 on some shithole hill that Lima company had previously explored and bled on. When we were first dropped in on these guys, someone escorted us up to the senior officer there who first demanded that I receive brand new jungle boots, and then nearly went completely apoplectic when I introduced PFC Bryant who immediately and loudly in his very best Amos & Andy persona waved his right hand across the sky while telling this man, "You can just call me Andy." I had everything to do to keep myself from not fall down laughing. I know without a shadow of a doubt that Captain Bennet would have responded with an equally humorous retort.

This Colonel, on this day, on this hill, failed to see the humor, or the humanity, or the honesty, or the love, or the 'Spirit of the Grunt'; in that moment and in that response. Too Bad.

I on the other hand would go to my grave with the memory of the moment and a deep unbinding love for my Brother Marine, PFC Andy Bryant.

I continued seeing PFC, later Cpl. James laughing while surrounded by Mike Hill and Roger Broughman. Wow!

I watched James get killed on December 8th, 1968 during Meade River. I saw clearly Roger writhing in pain as a second round tore through him as they sought to patch up his first serious hit.

I recall with vivid detail that moment when I knew I was going to lead Marines as Mike Hill, shattered by the wounds to his best friend and mentor stated, "Rogers hit. What are we going to do?"

I felt the uncontrolled rage as the new Sergeant who knew nothing about infantry and/or Grunts stated, "Put out your panels." "Mark your lines I called in Air." Turning to this moron this lowly L/Cpl told him to call it off as we still had Marines down and in the drop zone. Seeing his pathetic facial expression, I moved forward with several Marines whilst gleefully peppering the area with a sustained rate of fire in short eight to ten round burst. God, I so love the passion and finality of combat.

Glancing at the group shot and seeing Ronnie Morse who carried an M-14, who collected gold teeth and cracked some Air Force dude in the snot locker for taking flicks of 'Real Marines' without prior permission are all fond and cherished memories that flooded out of the hidden valleys of my mind and race to the surface of my face while standing in the hospitality room.

Later, back at home I would unfold a hidden thought and then with precise clarification recall Ed Cowfer. Not standing in that group photo, but rather; leisurely strolling down the line during a barrage of incoming back at Khe Sanh and when challenged as to what the ____ he was thinking; his simple response was, "Nice day for a walk." Someone said, "He is shell shocked." No one knew or heard of PTSD, it was after all Tet of '68.

As quick as these memories overloaded my sensory capacity, someone rattled the doors, shouted out for all to mount the buses and we'd be off to the Museum. This unassuming Gent with the pretty wife grabbed his photos exited the room the doors were shut, and I stood there thinking; 'Was this some sort of ghost from my past who'd come to stir my emotions and then disappear?'

For the love of me, I could not locate this couple and was confused, dazzled, and bewildered by my emotional controls that now were abounding with every conceivable sensation any human being could experience. All of this, and in nano seconds. Incredible!

Entering the museum, I spotted Lima Six - Captain Dick Camp - my first CO. Then after a few moments located Bill Correia and his lovely bride Pam. These weren't ghosts at all. These were the affirmations that I was alive. That I did indeed survive and that I would have many more conversations to recover and recall the many parts of my Heart and Soul left behind in the rice paddies and hills of that place we all called the 'Nam'.
Yeah!

This is why I go to reunions. I am already packed for Reno. How about You?

MARINE CORPS BIRTHDAY

By Craig W. Tourte

I was shopping in a large sports store the other day and approached the counter with my articles for purchase. I happened to be wearing the black "Khe Sanh, USMC" T-shirt I had purchased through the Khe Sanh Association PX. The clerk was a young man with short hair and a very intense look on his face. As I placed my items on the counter he mumbled something which I couldn't understand because now everything pretty much sounds like a mumble. I had to ask him several times what he said, and he repeats, "How long were you in."

I realized he has observed the lettering on my shirt and I say, "Two years." That was the end of the conversation but we conveyed a lot of information to each other with those few words. I said "Semper Fi" as I turned and left the business. I went to the neighborhood grocery store after that, and there was a young man bagging up my groceries at the check out counter. He looked at my shirt and says that after college he is either going into the Navy or Marine Corps, he hasn't decided which one yet, I just smiled at him and say, "Good for you, try to go in as an officer."

About 10 of us celebrated the Marine Corps Birthday this year in a little watering hole (not Ernies). There was a birthday cake and a small cake cutting ceremony. The oldest Marine was 82 and the youngest Marine in attendance was 58 and owns the local Coke bottling plant and the distribution system, obviously the most successful of the bunch and after he arrived no one purchased any more adult beverages, the tab was taken care of. I had one beer the 3 hours I was there, because I don't drink and drive any more, but I still had a good time. It was a shame Steve Wiese and Marco Soto could not make it, I always enjoy spending time with other Khe Sanh Veterans this time of year.

As I look back now, these many years since I have returned from Vietnam, there was a time when I would not tell anyone I had been a Marine or had gone to Vietnam. I certainly never attended a military celebration of any sort in a public place, bar or otherwise. Perhaps the old veterans were all over at the VFW, but I was never invited to join them. Also for many years military service was something to be avoided by most young people. I recall a time when it was "Go to war or go to jail" and serving was not necessarily a privilege, calling or personal preference, but rather an alternative to incarceration, and for us going nowhere who had few opportunities. Aside the fact that my step-father told me it was time to pack up my stuff and get out, I volunteered. The Marine Corps and yes, even the Vietnam war pulled at me, it was something I knew I had to do (although as I look back now, I am not sure why), besides I was certainly not headed down a bright career path.

I think things have changed now, at our little party we did wonder why there were no young veterans, but what young person would want to hang out with a bunch of old geezers anyway. I hope those young veterans and active duty personnel were somewhere celebrating the Marine Corps Birthday and Veterans Day that followed. How proud they must feel for the acknowledgement they receive for their service and sacrifice and not trying to be inconspicuous, like so many of us had to be for so many years.

BOOK REVIEWS

EXPENDABLE WARRIORS

Clarke's purpose is to set the record straight, clarifying reports and stories that have failed to accurately depict what happened.

Clarke describes the experiences of himself and his colleagues in the battles around the Khe Sanh Combat base in 1968, during the Vietnam War. He looks at the decision-making at multiple levels surrounding the battle, which he judges to have been a bloody tactical victory and a strategic defeat for the United States. Reference & Research Book News:

"Expendable Warriors reveals a little-known chapter in the story of the siege of Khe Sanh--how the battle really began and who was targeted in the first and biggest North Vietnamese assault in the opening round of an epic clash." - Joseph L. Galloway, co-author of We Were Soldiers Once...and Young and Triumph Without Victory: The History of the Persian Gulf

"Warrior, professor, deep thinker, and highly engaging and articulate writer, Bruce Clarke has written with compassion and wisdom borne of his personal experience in the village of Khe Sanh, 38 years ago. Good war stories take a long time to write, and this one is worth the wait. I am fascinated by the tale and the wonderful new insights that this major historian and military analyst brings to the reader. His sharing of the battle before the battle, the defeat of an NVA Regiment before the main Khe Sanh battle ever began, is masterfully told. A real page turner. And the lessons learned that he shares are well worth noting at a time when we are again, as a nation, engaged in war." - John K. Swensson, Dean, Language Arts Division; De Anza College and Custodian, The DeCillis Viet Nam Conflict Collection

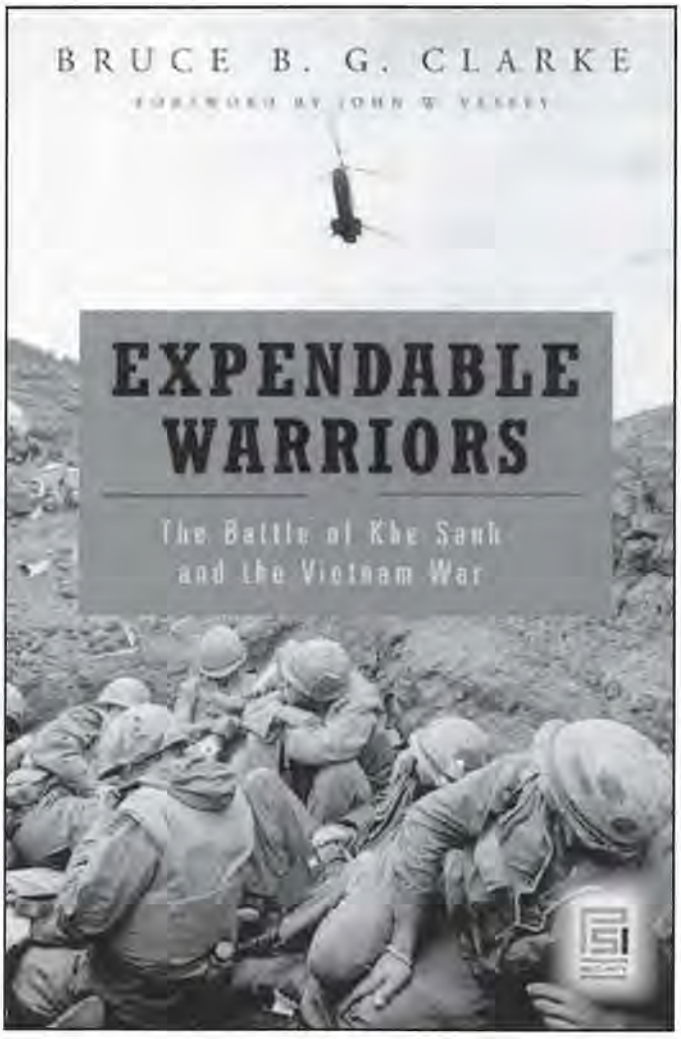
"Most books studying the 1968 siege of Khe Sanh focus on the Marine Corps' defense of the base and the hilltops to the north. Other books examine the fall of the nearby Lang Vei Special Forces Camp overrun by North Vietnamese tanks. To most Khe Sanh was a Marine battle. While heavily shelled and the hilltop outposts fought off attacks, the main base experienced only minor ground attacks. There was another battle though, unheralded in most books, the vicious fight for Khe Sanh Village south of the main base. This fight saw 25 Army and Marine advisors and 175 Vietnamese irregular troops fighting off a North Vietnamese regular battalion. Bruce Clark aptly describes the valor and spirit of the defenders as they beat back repeated assaults with little support from the main base. This is a first person account of a virtually unheard of battle characterized by heroism and dedication to duty." - Gordon L. Rottman, author of Khe Sanh 1967-68

"I'm honored that Bruce Clarke has portrayed the bravery of not only the Americans but all of us who fought and won the largest ground battle of the siege of Khe Sanh. We believed in our cause and dedicated our lives to it and this book clearly illustrates what many efforts about the Vietnam War do not--the bravery and efforts of the warriors who fought beside the Americans in the Vietnam War." - CP Nhi, Vietnamese District Chief

For those with a vivid memory of the Vietnam war, there is consolation in knowing that the impact of that war altered and shaped politics and warfare for the next generations. But in that altering we must take the lessons and apply them to new situations, new challenges and new policy dilemmas. To fail to do so would mean that the warriors at Khe Sanh and all of Vietnam were truly expendable, The battle of Khe Sanh was won and the Vietnam war was lost at the same time. Expendable Warriors describes at multiple levels the soldiers and marines who were expendable in the American political chaos of Vietnam, 1968. On January 21, 1968, nine days before the Tet offensive, tens of thousands of North Vietnamese regulars began the attacks on the Khe Sanh plateau, which led to the siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Gen. Westmoreland was fully aware that the North Vietnamese would attack but he declined to alert or warn the small unit of American soldiers and marines serving at Khe Sanh in an advisory capacity, considering them expendable in the greater strategy. Not just an analysis of the battle, Expendable Warriors also ponders the question of how to win an unpopular war on foreign soil, linking battlefield events to political reality.



BRUCE B. G. CLARKE (Col., U.S. Army, ret.) was Director of National Security Studies at the U.S. Army War College, and is the author of Conflict Termination: A Rational Model (Strategic Studies Institute, U.S. Army War College).

LETTERS FROM TOMMY J.

EXCERPT:

Chapter Three

In Country: Da Nang

The 1st Regiment of the Marines in 1966 were stationed in I Corps, the northeastern part of South Vietnam. Pronounced "eye" corps, the area comprised the five northern-most provinces and contained the port city of Da Nang, just south of the demilitarized zone (DMZ) at the 17th parallel. Fighting had been heavy in that zone throughout the year, and in October, U.S. Army combats units were introduced to provide reinforcement. The enemy had more than doubled in size, from 23 battalions in midsummer to 52 by the end of the year. During this era, refugees swarmed into Da Nang from the embattled countryside. Tommy J.'s first encounter with its population would be in the form of children, who begged for (and were given!) his dinner before he could eat it.

The next encounters he would have were not so innocent. The area surrounding Da Nang was heavily infested with Viet Cong, who were conducting a form of combat almost unheard of at that time. Prior to the war in Vietnam, American soldiers fought in an orderly manner, on battlefields, and in rows of troops. That was how it had been done in World War II and in every other war prior to that. But in Vietnam, everything changed.

Guerrilla warfare against American troops used three main tools: ambush, sabotage, and espionage. The jungle and mountain terrain in Vietnam facilitated this approach, making hiding and ambushes easier. Sympathetic villagers hid and protected the Viet Cong, allowing them to set mines and hide rice caches and weapons nearby which were the life blood of the guerrilla fighters. Battles were almost always sudden and unexpected. The North Vietnamese objective was to destabilize American troops through extensive, low-intensity confrontations-to tie them up in unexpected battles for no real reason-a tactic that lowered morale, caused psychological terror, and gave the NVA the upper hand.

Finding the enemy was one of the biggest challenges to the American forces. The Viet Cong had created extremely complex and intricate tunnel systems over vast regions of South Vietnam, built over a period of 25 years, beginning in the 1940s when they fought the French and Japanese. The tunnels allowed the Viet Cong to control a large rural area, and formed an underground city with living area, kitchens, storage, weapon factories, hospitals, and command centers. They could be several stories deep and house up to 10,000 people.

For the North Vietnamese troops, these tunnels were fighting bases, capable of providing continuous support. The bases were well hidden from American spotter planes, and the remote swamps and forests provided ample cover from air and ground alike. Vents were installed in order to hear approaching helicopters. Smaller vents were used for air. There were hidden doors and punji traps. At deeper levels, there were chambers for arms factories and a well for a steady water supply. There were storage rooms for weapons and rice, and hospitals for guerrillas. Communication tunnels connected one base with another. The tunnels not only allowed guerrilla communication, but they allowed surprise attacks, even within the U.S. military bases. Weaponry changed. The Viet Cong arsenal-handmade but deadly-included booby traps, pits, rocket-propelled grenades, mortars, and recoilless rifles. Recovered American shells and bombs were turned into traps, mines, or another explosive devices. One of the most common, and hated, mines was nicknamed the "Bouncing Betty." It was triggered by the release of pressure on the mechanism. The soldier could stand on a Bouncing Betty, hear the arming mechanism operate and know perfectly well that if he moved his foot, the mine would jump in the air and blow up at chest height. Mortars were easily portable and easy to operate, their main appeal being their extensive flight time. A mortar team could set up a position out of the sight of the enemy, fire a number of rounds, and be moving away from the firing sight before the first rounds even hit their target.

The list of non-explosive booby traps was just as deadly, including punji stakes, bear traps, crossbow traps, spiked mud balls, double-spike caltrops, and scorpion-filled boxes. The punji stake was by far the most common booby trap weapon. It was a shoot of bamboo or metal with needle-like tips that had been hardened by fire. These tips were often coated with excrement, poison or other contaminants to cause infection. Designed to "fix," or locate American troops, punji stakes caused a wound that, if not treated within 24 hours, often required amputation. When victims were medivaced out, the Viet Cong often shot down the helicopters.

When Tommy J. arrived at the Da Nang air force base, he was assigned to Fox Company, 2nd battalion. The second Battalion, 1st Marine Division had recently completed its participation in Operation Hastings during which many of its members had been wounded or killed, including the commanding officer. Captain Gene Deegan assumed command of Fox Company during late August 1966. Deegan was well-liked and respected, with a genuine concern for his men. In Fox Company, Tommy's job would be to conduct search and destroy missions, and run ambushes and combat patrols.

LETTERS

Thursday, Dec. 28

Dear family,

I am here! We got off the ship this morning at Danang and were split up to our different organizations. They then trucked me to my Battalion area and I was assigned to a company and platoon. My platoon is out in the field right now on a mission. They won't be back till tomorrow. Only 6 boys are in the platoon with me from the whole draft and I don't know any of them.

Viet Nam was quite a shock. The people, the houses and stores and everything. I was trying to eat dinner, but all the kids kept begging for it, so I gave most of it away.

They only have tents for us to sleep in and there is only mud and rain right now. The monsoon season is still on. I was issued a rifle immediately when I got here and told I must carry it everywhere. To eat, sleep, and anywhere I go. We get our combat and jungle gear in the morning.

I don't know if I will ever get the mail you have mailed before this letter, or if it will take a long time if I do. Use the new address to get it here faster. Tell Kaye about it for me.

I am just north of Danang a little ways. It is not too nice right now. I see patrols going out tonight and they are all wet and muddy. Loaded down with ammunition and wearing all kinds of gear. I guess I'll be doing it soon.

I'll have to get all the U.S. money I have changed into some kind of Viet Nam money. I don't know why.

I guess I'll close and mail this. Don't worry.
I love you all.

Dear family,

I hope you have started off the New Year in good humor and spirits. I was standing guard on our line when the New Year came in. There were no horns or yells but it started a new year. It has rained every day I've been here. Just mud and rain. You can't keep dry or clean. It sure is a miserable feeling. The monsoon season should end next month, I hope.

We will be leaving this area I am in now about tomorrow to move to a new location. We are going to an artillery location for 6 weeks. Then we come back here to the company area.

I will finish a 3 day indoctrination period today, in which you have to stay in the battalion area before going to the field. It is just a rule.

This is a different war than I expected. You not only fight the V.C., you also fight the weather, snipers, and booby traps. Most of the company's wounds come from traps.

The platoon stands on a notice to be ready to go to an emergency anytime. They have 4 + 5 missions all the time. I guess I'll not get to write very often.

I have seen them bring in V.C. suspects, and dead V.C. It sure makes you that much more scared. I guess I'll overcome it though.

Well, I must close now. Will write again later. I love you all.

Your son,
Tommy J.

P.S. We just got the word to pack up only essentials to move out tomorrow.
Happy New Year

January 4, 1967
Dear Pat,

I hope this finds you well and in good spirits. I am in a new and exciting place. I guarantee you don't get bored.

All it has done is rain everyday. It will rain till the end of this month. Then the hot weather comes in.

We live in tents when we are not in the field. They don't stay in the tents too often. This is a bigger war than people think. Every time the platoon goes out, they get in a firefight with the V.C. I am just trying to get a little experience, but it sure is nerve-wracking. I get awful scared when I hear those bullets.

We are just north of Danang right now. The Regiment moves around a lot.

I sure miss home now. I am really learning how to appreciate home and those everyday things you don't think about. Maybe this will be a fast year.

Everywhere I go, I have to carry my weapon and ammunition. I eat, sleep, and go to the bathroom with it. Some friend. I hope it does its job.

How's your school coming along? I hope you and Patsy are getting along O.K.

Well I'll close for now and go hunting later on. Raise Hell for me! Write if you get a chance. Your old pal,
Tommy J.

Dear family,

I have just been lifted up in spirits this evening, when I finally got a letter from you. It was written Dec. 31 and had the Kool-aid in it. Thanks a lot.

I haven't written lately because I have been becoming a veteran. We left Friday on a search and destroy mission - my first - and have just come back. Friday we captured 4 V.C. suspects and sent them to be interrogated. Friday afternoon we were helicoptered to an area where they had some V.C. trapped in a area. After landing, we were crossing about a 500 meter rice paddy when the V.C. opened up on us. My heart stopped, I know. I jumped into a rice paddy and was under water. Then I came to my senses and began to return fire. We assaulted their position and they fled. We killed 4 of them and that was my worst part. I am certain I killed one, because I aimed and shot at him when he ran. It is a awful feeling. I still can't get over it. They told a couple of us to put them in some raincoats and move them to a pick-up area.

I just couldn't do it. I couldn't even look at them. The Sgt. didn't make me do it. He said all new ones were like that. I am trying to look at it as if I had to kill him or be killed. This is a crazy war. I never thought war could be so nerve-wracking.

The rain still comes everyday. I can't keep dry clothes. I am going to need those socks you are sending. I have stopped wearing underwear; too much to dry out and it gives you a rash.
I haven't gotten the candy yet; I hope I get it though. I hope I get all the back mail. If you had anything important to tell me in those letters, tell them over.

We are on 10 min. standby right now. That means if they give the word, we have to be ready to move out in 10 min. I hope we don't go. I am so tired and feel still wet.

I will close and hit the rock; I mean cot. I love you all so much.

Your 1st son,
Tommy J.

Dear family,

I am writing this short letter just to ask you to send me a few articles I need and can't get here, because they don't have a P.X. where I am. I hope you don't mind and you can get some money out of the bank to pay for this and 2 packages of film I am sending home to have developed. They were taken at home, Camp Pendleton, Disneyland, and while on ship. Send me the ones of you and Kaye back please.

I'll close now.
Articles
1. Tooth brush
2. Lighter fluid
3. Small piece of steel wool
4. 1" paint brush
5. Pack of Razor Blades
6. About 6 Air Mail stamps for sending home film
7. Writing Paper (like this)

8. A candle for use for light. About 6" or 8" tall

Jan. 10

I didn't get to mail this off yesterday. I got 5 letters and a box of fruitcake last night. Sure feel a lot better. I finally got one from Kaye and Mom Davis also wrote. It was real nice of her - she said it was her first letter of the New Year. She also sent a dollar in it. I was surprised but glad. The Bowman's sent the cake.

We went out all last night and guarded a bridge that the V.C. had been firing at. They didn't come last night. I just got ate up by mosquitoes.

I guess we will have a patrol later on today. I'll close now. I love you all.

Tommy J.

P.S. Packages under 5 lbs. come by air mail. I hope you don't mind sending these things. They are just necessities. Don't worry if you can't send them.

Jan. 10, Tuesday
Dear Mom and Pop Davis,

I received your letter and was real glad to hear from you. It was one of the first letters I have gotten since I have been here.

The weather right now is rainy and cool. The monsoon season will not be over till Feb. Then the hot really begins. This rain makes it a big problem to keep clean and dry clothes. I'll be glad when it stops raining I think.

I spent Christmas on the ship and we got to Da Nang, South Viet Nam the 28th Dec. We had a turkey dinner and church services that day.
My company is now just north of Da Nang. We are working all around the Da Nang area. The Viet Cong are everywhere. We live in big tents and have to use cots to sleep on. But we can get pretty comfortable sometimes.
Mother and them send me everything I need so don't worry about me. Say hello to everyone and I'll write more later.

Love always,
Tommy J.

Dear family,

I hope this finds you all well. I received your letters you had to re-mail today. I also got one from Kaye.

We have been on a 2 day operation called "Sparrow-Lark." A search and destroy mission. Bombs were dropped and then we started sweeping through. Guess where we got hit again. You're right, in the rice paddy. We opened up firing like 3 or 4 divisions. We got to the other side and found 4 wounded V.C. women. The most of them had fled. We also captured one man. Women fight along with the men. It is hard to picture. After that action, we didn't see any more the rest of the time. Now I am back at the area and we have to guard the camp tonight. I guess I'll have a hard time catching up with my rest.

I am glad you and the Bowmans got the packages I sent. I hope they were good. Kaye told me about the present you gave her. It sounds real nice. How is O'Keefe's soccer doing now? I guess they play as many games as we did last year.

Well I have to close and get ready to guard. I'll write more later.

By the way, I hate to ask again for something, but would you please send me a combination lock for a footlocker I made. Master lock will be fine. Thanks.

I love you all.

Tommy J.

Jan. 13, 1967

Dear family,

I didn't get to mail these as soon as I thought I would but maybe it is for the better. I got a big story to tell about what happened when we went out on the ambush this morning.

We had been out since about 4:30 a.m. and had not done anything. Then we started walking through some jungles around some villages which run along a river. It was about 7:30 a.m. and just as we came upon a hut, we spotted V.C. in it. They saw us, opened fire and took off. We returned fire and began to chase.

Just as we had almost lost them, we saw one of them just going down a hole in the ground. We had a hand grenade fixing to throw when one of our bullets got him and the grenade blew up. We started firing on the hole, throwing in grenades and smoke and everything. Then we thought all were dead. We only expected 2 in there. I guarded the hole as our squad leader started in. Just as he had got a little ways in the hole, a grenade came rolling out. We all jumped for our lives. The grenade went off and one of our boys got fragments in the cheeks and mouth. We fired more ammunition in the hole and started in again. We asked them to surrender and they said nothing. Finally, the squad leader pulled one of them out and he was dead. He had an American made weapon. We thought that was all, but when we went in further, we found two more and another American weapon with American gear and grenades. All, except one, were dead and blown all apart. I really got sick. We tried to keep him alive, but he finally died. We then radioed in our success and Headquarters was real happy. Just as we thought all was over, we started getting automatic fire from snipers across the river. They really had us in a fix. The bullets were hitting all around. The boy who was beside me got hit in the leg. He was from Georgia. I was shaking and in shock, because the bullets had me pinned down. I almost froze. Then some finally started firing back. I crawled up to the edge of the river and sprayed the whole area with bullets. We saw the V.C. running and we really laid it on. I don't think we killed him, because they couldn't find him. We had been fighting for about a hour or more. Finally, reinforcements got there because we only had 11 men out there. We called in a helicopter and got the wounded out. Both boys are going back to U.S. because it is their 3rd purple heart. One has only been here 4 months.

The communist V.C. had all kinds of documents, N. Viet Nam money and other stuff. They were in pitiful shape. I won't describe it. never thought I could be so scared. I don't think I can take this place. We only have 7 men in our squad now.

I am praying like I never prayed before.

I am now kind of ashamed to send this letter, because I know how you will start worrying. Please don't. It is my battle now. I have come back in and trying to rest. It is awful hard to believe war. I know why Daddy hates to see war pictures. I jump at the slightest noise now. I'll be unbelievable when I do come home.

I will close now. Just pray and please don't get upset. It will be awful if I knew I was harming you.

I love you all.

Your son,

Tommy J.

Bandera Honors its Veterans, Reunites Friends

Don Jennings A 1/9
By Mike Fishbaugh

Zeke MacCormack
Express-News

BANDERA, TX — On a trip from Hillsboro to reunite with Marine buddies from the Vietnam War, Don Jennings chanced upon veterans who may have made his reunion possible.

At Saturday's "Bandera Honors Veterans" event, Jennings saw an exhibit with photographs of helicopters shown flying out of Khe Sanh - where he saw combat with the unit known as "The Walking Dead." "We were looking at their display and realized they probably evacuated some of us during the siege of Khe Sanh," said Jennings, 60, one of about 20 members of the 1st Battalion, Ninth Marines squad gathering here.

The pictures belonged to Charlie Baker, 62, of Medina. As a Marine helicopter crew chief, Baker repeatedly swept in amid heavy enemy fire to take troops out of the military base near the Laos border that came under siege by North Vietnamese troops in 1968. Handshakes ensued as men bonded by battle decades ago and exchanged names. The belated introductions were just one of many touching moments at the commemoration to local military personnel that this small town began in 2005. "I'm glad to see people remember and care," said San Antonio resident Martin Martinez, 58, who served in an Army artillery unit in Vietnam.

County Judge Richard Evans, one of several speakers, implored the crowd to thank the veterans on hand "for my country ... for my freedom ... for my way of life." A middle school choir serenaded an audience of about 100 gathered beside the Bandera County Courthouse. Prayers were heard for those felled in combat long ago, and for those now in harm's way - or headed there. Dennis Sykes, who traveled from Denver to see Jennings and other friends, called the event an unexpected - and pleasant - surprise. "It's such a homey feeling and such a tight community," said Sykes, 60. "This is a microcosm of the best of America."

Vets like Raymond Baker praised organizers of the event for raising awareness about military conflicts that have lapsed from public consciousness. "Most people do not know history. This is history," said Raymond Baker, 59, one of three brothers of Charlie Baker who also served in the military. At a nearby table, Glen Bishop shared photos he took of fellow Army Air Corps paratroopers filling the sky above post-war Germany in the 1950s. "It brings back a lot of memories," said Bishop, 72, of Pipe Creek. "I'm glad to be part of it." Looking over the table laden with documents and keepsakes from a half-century ago, his wife, Laura Bishop, said, "It means everything to him because this is his history."

They learned of the event only Friday from a neighbor, Dawn Mayorga, who's three vibrant children in the Army smiled from dozens of exhibited photos. Her 19-year-old son, Austin Medley, was deployed in September to Iraq with the 10th Mountain Division. "He called yesterday, Morale is good. He said 'Send candy and chips,' " said Mayorga, 52. Her 22-year-old son, John Medley, is an infantryman stationed at Fort Hood who will be deployed in 2008 to Iraq. Daughter Jackie Mayorga, 19, is a medic who's deploying from Hawaii to Iraq next month. Despite the obvious hazards facing her kids, Dawn Mayorga said she's at peace because their fates are in God's hands. And, she said, "Every time one of my kids is deployed I know someone else's kid comes home. That's what keeps me going."

SHORT ROUNDS

WHAT I NEVER HAD..

By Craig W. Tourte

I never...

I was sitting around my favorite watering hole yesterday after playing a game of golf, shooting the stuff with a few old guys my age. Because of the little event planned for the birthday coming up the discussion got around to "where were you and what did you do." One of they guys talked about his time in the Air Force and how he saw the world and the various bases and countries he had been in. Another talked about his time in the Navy and the food on the ships and how his bunk was right under the flight deck and the noise it made. Another said that he was in the Corps but never made it Vietnam but had spent time at Twenty Nine Palms and Okinawa. Then one of the guys smiled and asked me where I was, while I was in the Marine Corps. Of course everyone knew where I was and I didn't want to disappoint anyone. I tried not to make my story into a whine but I knew what they all wanted to hear. I started out with "I Never…"

I figure I spent, give or take somewhere around ten or eleven months, in Vietnam. Eight of those at Khe Sanh. The other times in Quang Tri after the Siege, guarding something way off away from everything. Anyway my story started off, "I never sat on a flush toilet, I never spoke to a Vietnamese, I never was in a town or large village, I never went into a bar, I never took a bath or shower from a forced water pipe, I never had hot running water, I never walked on cement or asphalt, I never saw a women except from a distance, I never slept in a bed, I never had a pillow or blanket, I never slept in sheets, I never saw a television, I never listened to a radio, I never sat in a chair, I never wore any under clothing, I never had my cloths washed except from a bucket, I never ate a hamburger or had French-fries, I never had any shaving crème, I never walked on a rug, I never had more than one pair of boots, I never stood near a heater, I never had more than one pair of socks, except for two occasions of warm beer I never had any alcohol, I never went to a USO show, I never went anywhere without a weapon, I never had nor wore civilian clothes, I never saw nor did I talk to any civilians, I never rode in a car…"

I think I stopped at that and looked around, I was kind of shocked to see the look on all of their faces, mouths were open and eyes were wide and strangest of all, no one said anything. I said, "I think it's time for me to go home" and I stood up and walked out. When I got home, I thought a great deal about what I had said and oddly the list got longer. I looked around my house and the list of "I never" just seemed to continue on forever. I hate the "my time was tougher than your time" thing because each has their own individual crosses to bare and after all, I was a REMF, so I know that my deprivation was much less than many and certainly less than those up in the hills of Khe Sanh. But for bar speak, it turned out to be a rather interesting topic, not a boast, perhaps more of a whine.

What I Did Have

By Craig W. Tourte

Did Haves...

Well if I "Never had" than what is it that I did have. Before the Siege we had some wood pallets down on the floor of the tent we called our "Bunker." But we didn't really have a bunker so to speak, more of an above ground tent with a few barrels filled with dirt and sandbags on top. I did have a rubber lady for a mattress but she didn't last too awful long after I took her to the trench line and laid her down on the dirt. I did have some kind of left over sleeping bag from Korea but it got kind of wet and moldy and I finally ended up with a poncho and liner to place over me. I didn't have a candle or electric light but I did have a lighter I think, or matches that came in the C Rats. Before the Siege we had a roll of toiler paper at the 3 holler but after the siege started it was those small pieces of paper again from the C Rat packet.

We didn't have any way to wash our clothes except a barrel cut in half and hand soap, we hung our clothes on the concertina wire to dry. After the Siege we didn't wash our cloths at all because of the lack of and value of water. I must have had a comb because I notice what hair I had was combed in the picture that Tom Horchler took of what was left of us, before we loaded up and left Khe Sanh. I must have had a T shirt of some kind because that is what I had on in the picture. I don't think I had a uniform fatigue shirt any more by that time. I noticed none of us had a smile on our face in the photograph, but we did have our lives and at the time that was good enough. Also none of us are holding weapons, you know those hero photographs some of us took when we wanted to look like real warriors, I guess we had gone way past that after the Siege. I don't think we felt very warrior like, mostly exhausted I think.

I've sat here trying to remember a few of those little conveniences that we did have before and after the Siege. We had hot food of course before the Siege, but as I said, I never thought is was very good. No sweets that I can remember and the water tasted pretty bad, even after we poured in the Kool-Aid type of mixture, and it was always warm. No movies but there were a few magazines flouting around, I think I had Miss month in my fighting position on the line before a rocket roared into it a few seconds after I had gotten up and out of it. No more Miss month, to bad I really enjoyed her and no more such magazines. I had a small camera that I was able to take a few photographs with, but that was stolen by the Army when they came up and saved us. I apologize about the lack of information in this little essay, I really thought I would have been able to come up with a few more "Did Haves..." Perhaps I just can't remember the goods, only the bads, but then there was nothing good about Khe Sanh.

What I Had!

By Mac Milton McNeely

What I had was being a part of history on the making end as a doer not a spectator.

What I had was the chance to see if I would stand and serve or cut and run.

What I had was much more than those that have not been there can possibly ever understand.

What I had far outweighs what I did not have.

What I had is what has made the person I am.

What I had was the opportunity and honor of serving God, Country and Corps with some of the finest individuals and greatest true heroes that our nation has ever known.

The older I get the more I recognize it.

POETRY

Vietnam Pilot's Reunion

A gathering of Eagles who long ago
flew in harmonious synch together in carefully arranged formations as they performed their noisy ballet over the trees.

Now grey or defoliated, larger and weathered,
wrinkles and folds abound,
all sadly closer to the ground.

Come together in one place,
These remain -
Not gone to the Father - still here to live each long day among those blue, cloudy skies, recalling those dances with white puffs of moisture along the way to battle.

Memories good and bad
Now buried or twisted
Come rising back to the surface
as barely recognized faces,
All changed except for eyes or smiles, awaken to recollections long since buried.

Joy abounds,
old friendships renew.
Excitement captivates
as thrilling recollections return to life from places no one ever gets to see anymore.
Sadness consumes on learning of early departures or bad tidings befallen.
Fear rises and is pushed back hard avoiding ugly memories buried way back when.

Can those feelings be shared?
Camaraderie, isolation, fear, bravery,
bad luck, good luck,
quick thinking, poor judgment,
God's mercy.
Bear them alone my friends.
You own them completely forever.
Heavy or light,
you carry them yourself –
only to be shared with God.

Reunion yields a great gift.
A common destiny is shared as we volunteer once again, facing truth at long last with no lies possible.

Eagles we were – Eagles we remain - standing tall within our lives, raising those memories
Of doing the best that we could.

INCOMING

ANGELS

By Craig W. Tourte

Fate, destiny or angels, what do you think? I was in the car the other day with my friend Steve Wiese. As most of you know, Steve is one of the few survivors of the Ghost Patrol and participated (make that volunteered) in the revenge patrol a month later. Now Steve is around 6 foot 4 or so, and is a huge target for anyone looking for something big to shoot at. How he survived an 18 month combat tour is beyond me.

As we're riding along, Steve starts telling me the story of his small squad of 6 to 8 Marines out on patrol. They were heading in a certain direction towards 881 (my best recall), and as Steve and his squad approach a ridge, with the objective of climbing the next hill, Steve stops the patrol and gazes out at the objective. A chill, voice or just his experience as a combat veteran told Steve to avoid the hill and go around. The following week a large combat unit attacked the hill Steve avoided that afternoon. A fierce battle ensued as the Marines attacked the well fortified enemy positions dug into the sides of the hill. If Steve and his small squad of Marines had ventured forward that afternoon, neither he nor his men would have survived. Steve participated in the attack the following week and was lucky, once again, to have survived the brutal assault.

My little fighting position on the line located near the southwest corner of the Khe Sanh Base was nothing more than a few sandbags and some type of overhang cover. Just a small turn or notch in the long trench. I still had a rubber lady, she wasn't much but she was better than sleeping in the mud. I dug this little position out with my small entrenching tool, filled every sandbag and put what little I possessed inside. It was one of those clear days you could see forever, unfortunately so could the NVA. For some reason, a voice, a feeling or destiny I got up out of this position and walked just a few feet west when I heard the familiar sound of rockets leaving their tubes. I jumped into the trench just a few feet away and buried myself as deep as I could. By this time, I had the experience to be able to determine in just milla-seconds the anticipated trajectory of the rocket which I knew was heading right at us. Rockets are split second things and it was all over very quickly. With a huge explosion of noise, smoke, dirt and whizzing of shrapnel it was over. I got up and looked at the ground just a few feet from me. There was a huge hole in the ground, the sides of which were black and the hole still smoking, and to my amazement, there was not just one hole but three in succession. I climbed out of the trench and glanced over at the next rocket impact only to see that it dove sideways into my fighting position, which I had occupied just seconds before.

As I stumbled in that direction, I observed that sadly my rubber lady did not survive the attack and I knew that my nights of sleeping up out of the mud were over. I remember laughing wilding at the sight and I was soon joined by others who apparently also saw the humor it what was not humorous at all, but I think we were all a little crazy by then. Who knows the reasons for our survival, was it fate, destiny or does each one of us have an angel sitting on our shoulder, whispering in our ear, into our brain. Perhaps we were spared for a reason or we were just lucky. I'd prefer to believe in the Angel theory.

Angels

By Sam Messer

I believe in Angels!

I had numerous escapes from death at Khe Sanh. I believe that God gave my angel orders to save me and he/ she did just that! Blown off my bull dozer, a rocket hit my rough terrain forklift, when it blew me off. A mortar hit in back of my 2-1/2 ton dump truck on the strip, artillery round hits right outside our fighting hole, a buddy sits on me so I can't get out of the hole, and saves my life! We all had close calls numerous times! So why are we alive? I BELIEVE my ANGEL and GOD had some reason to this that day I don't understand. With all the Pain in the body and the PTSD, I sometimes believe (wish) I had died. The old me did die so why is the new me still here? I hope I have served their purpose for keeping me alive!

Angels
By Phil Nuchereno

Sam. I do believe in a higher source, possibly an angel, that too saved me from some really close calls in my 13 month tour in Nam. In addition to having served in Khe Sanh during the siege, in other areas of Nam I had some really close calls with stepping on foot mines. On two occasions I was right next to fellow Marines who had stepped on them blowing their feet off. I had just walked in the same location missing stepping on the mine by inches. I contribute my mother's prayers helping a lot when I was over there.

Angels
By Butch Brown

Angels, YOU BET!! One morning on Hill 881 South at approx 5 minutes to 6, my buddy Ed Woolverton was standing in the trench line facing the opening of our FDC bunker. We were with 81's, out of my right peripheral vision, and up about 2 O'clock I saw a black object coming in fast, only to hear the ziiiiiiiiip of an 82mm mortar round coming in. I yelled "incoming" we hit the deck, the round impacted on the top of our FDC bunker; Ed and I were already on the ground, low crawling/running around the corner to my bunker. That little bunker I had hand dug into the side of the trench wall, and sand bagged the crap out of the top with my own 2 hands. We stayed there for quite a long time. Eventually we came out with Sgt Mack, our squad leader taking one look at us with eyes the size of silver dollars, grabbed us and said "Woolve, Brown"!! I believe he thought we'd been blown away. I crawled on the top of the bunker retrieving the fin assembly of the one lone 82mm mortar round, and said, "This will make a nice souvenir". That round hit maybe 3 feet above us and almost dead on to our front. One click left, we'd been vaporized. Angels, YOU BET I BELIEVE IN THEM!! I packed that fin assembly all over Nam with me, until I rotated out, then, rather than mess with some phony paper work to keep it, I left it, on Okinawa in a garbage can, when we sealed our sea bags. A FEW CHRISTMAS STORIES THAT MISSED ISSUE 69

By Lt/Col James B. Wilkinson, USMC (Ret)

In the spring of 1965, units of the 9th Marine Expeditionary Brigade arrived in South Vietnam. As they stormed ashore, ready for battle, lovely young ladies welcomed them with floral bouquets. The Marines were given the mission of protecting the airfield at Da Nang and were soon patrolling the surrounding villages and paddies. Their enemy, clad primarily in black pajama-like garments, supported the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam and were called Viet Cong. Armed with single-shot rifles, punji stakes and other rudimentary weapons, they were a formidable foe, blending in with farmers and villagers when not setting up ambushes or planning other actions against the Marines. Identifying Viet Cong was a major challenge. It was reminiscent of a vintage Western with John Wayne as the grizzled, old Indian fighter. When a cavalry officer reports, "We just saw a patrol of Apaches!" Wayne replies, "Sir, if you saw them, they weren't Apache."

By 1967 American forces in South Vietnam numbered approximately 500,000 troops. Marines included the First and Third Marine divisions plus supporting forces, including a variety of Marine aviation units. The Marines were assigned to I Corps, in the northern portion of South Vietnam. The enemy also had grown from a poorly equipped but effective group of Viet Cong into a far more capable force. Large numbers of well-trained and -equipped units of the North Vietnamese Army had moved into South Vietnam. Their arsenal included the old reliable AK47 rifle, rocket-propelled grenades, rockets, field artillery and an up-to-date communications and command structure.

Like the Viet Cong, the North Vietnamese units proved hard to locate. But in the spring of 1967, friendly patrols detected enemy forces in the extreme northwestern corner of I Corps. The enemy was present in well placed fighting positions and bunkers in the vicinity of Hills 881 South, 881 North and 861. Several Marine infantry battalions were tasked with destroying the enemy units. The ensuing conflicts became known as "hill battles" with both sides suffering heavy casualties.

When the fighting ended, the Marines occupied Hills 881 South, 861, 950 and Khe Sanh Combat Base. Hill 881 North was not occupied. The enemy withdrew, probably across the border into Laos where they could regroup and take on replacements that moved south along the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

American leaders at very high levels decided to maintain a force at Khe Sanh Combat Base. Their strategy was to lure the North Vietnamese into a set-piece battle, where air and artillery coupled with the courage of the individual American fighting man would prevail.

The enemy viewed a future battle for Khe Sanh as another Dien Bien Phu—the French outpost the North Vietnamese had battered day and night with artillery and ground attacks. The French surrendered Dien Bien Phu in 1954 after suffering extremely heavy casualties. This decisive battle led to the defeat of French forces in Vietnam. Like Khe Sanh, Dien Bien Phu was located close to Laos. In August 1967, Colonel David E. Lownds assumed command of the 26th Marine Regiment. During most of 1967 he had only one battalion under his command. The 26th Marines were part of the 5thMarDiv. However, when additional forces were needed in Vietnam, the regiment was moved from Camp Pendleton, Calif., and became part of the 3dMarDiv.

For the last half of 1967, up until Christmas, life at Khe Sanh Combat Base was uneventful. The defense of the base, Hills 861, 881 South and 950 remained with 1st Bn, 26th Marines. That battalion also was responsible for security of the bridge over the Rao Quan River. A rifle company was given the mission. Every six or seven weeks, companies would be reshuffled to and from the hills, to the base or to the bridge.

Life on the hills was far more Spartan than life at the base, with C-rations delivered by two ancient UH-34 Seahorse helicopters. The helicopters were so old their Marine passengers joked that the old "birds" suffered from mental fatigue.

When the squad-size patrols left the hills, the triple-canopied jungle, which began a few hundred yards from each hill position, enveloped them. Patrols oftentimes stayed out for several days, even during heavy monsoons or "cratchins." (The French used le crachin to describe light rain, coupled with fog.)

Christmas Best Forgotten

By Craig W. Tourte

OK so I'm not going to post my Christmas at Khe Sanh story this year. You know the one where Ann Margaret shows up on the well lighted stage placed over the ammo dump...yea, that one. Although I still think that story is one of my better BS pieces, I guess because I see such hilarious absurdity in the possibility or probability. I still can't get over the number of people who believed it could have actually occurred. One even said that he must have been up in the hills because he missed it.....Oh please. Still others demanded that I no longer write fiction, so that was the end of my fiction novel period.

Anyway, I was out driving around this evening in the dark (no not aimlessly) and the rain was really coming down. Now I realize California rain is not the same rain you folks get in other climate locations, I mean I played golf on Tuesday, but please try to follow the story here. Anyway it's cold and wet and the wind is blowing and I'm trying to remember how miserable I was 40 years ago at about this time. Now because of personal issues I had with my now deceased mother and step-father, Christmas was never much of a thrill, so I can't look back and remember how wonderful it was sitting around the old living room with the folks and grandma, you know the warm and fuzzy Christmas feeling, but I really envy those who can.

I do have some pretty vivid memories of a number of years ago spending Christmas with a few other lonely and bitter drinking buddies hanging out and complaining about this time of year, seems everyone else was so darn happy and filled with the Christmas spirit, which of course I never had, and to tell you the truth, I'm not so sure to this day I know what it is. Now getting back to my story. I guess for Christmas our mess must have put out a pretty decent meal, because if we didn't I am confident that Tom Horchler, Paul Turnbull and a few others, who had the privilege of eating in our mess, would even to this day, tell me about it. Tom always relates how good he thought the food was (he even kept a few of the menus) however others were not so complementary.

Anyway you look at it, Christmas at Khe Sanh was lousy, the food was rotten, the weather cold and wet with that damp fog rolling in and staying all night. No heaters, no lights, no blankets, wet clothes, socks and boots, and no radios or televisions or Christmas carols. The red clay mud stuck to your boots making them 5 pounds heavier and you became 3 inches taller. I didn't think about Christmas at home, I didn't think about mom because I knew that she was not thinking about me, and I'm sure Christmas was just a little more enjoyable for her knowing that I wouldn't be hanging around. But worst of all, worst of all about Christmas at Khe Sanh, was that tall, leggy Ann Margaret with the dancing girls from the USO show, who never showed up on the stage that was never built over the ammo dump.

Christmas best forgotten.....not for me. It was my most memorable

By Dennis Mannion - K Co 3/26

Some time in the 80's our local newspaper sponsored a "Memorable Christmas" contest. I submitted the following and earned a first place award. It has been in Red Clay before (and Leatherneck Magazine) but not for some time, and since the event is approaching 40 years & because Craig called it "best forgotten" I decided to copy it here. It will always be the Christmas that stands out in my memory...even today. S/F

CHRISTMAS at KHE SANH

Like weary travelers, who finally get to rest in the comfort of their own homes after a week of constant motion and movement, the members of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment spread out into the foxholes and bunkers that made up the company's perimeter at Khe Sanh.

It was Christmas Eve 1967, and we had just returned from a four-day operation that had taken us west of the combat base into the rugged hills and terrain of the Khe Sanh Plateau. Despite minimal creature comforts at the base, it was a relief to know that we didn't have to hike those hills for a while. That alone was a legitimate Christmas present.

In terms of the physical setting and the expected sounds and colors, this was sure to be my bleakest holiday ever, but it remains the Christmas that stands apart from all the others, and the one which memory doesn't confuse, over decades later.

My radioman, Dave Krom, and I headed straight for the position that we had constructed the previous week. Even though it was just two foxholes covered with a tent-like affair of scrounged parachute silk, we felt elated to be home for the holidays. At midday, a rumor which had been circulating since the previous morning turned into reality. An arriving helicopter touched down just outside the company area, and mailbag after mailbag began to spill out onto the ground!

The distribution of our Christmas mail, which had been held in storage for nearly two weeks, required the work of scores of Marines as there were thousands of letters and hundreds of "care packages." More than anything else, it was the sheer volume of these packages that brought a festive, holiday atmosphere to our corner of the war. Denied a chance to be in the real world, it was as if its realities had been sent to us, and each package opened helped to reduce the tensions and the fears accumulated during the previous week. By late afternoon, Kilo Company was almost giddy with child-like happiness and Christmas spirit.

Since Dave and I had not drawn perimeter guard that night (another present), we settled in under our parachute hooch to feast on our collective packages and to recall Christmas memories from earlier years. With our military gear relegated to the sides of the tent, the war almost seemed to have been replaced with plentiful food, laughter, and friendship. Considering how the previous four months had been spent, we had another gift to be thankful for – we were still around for the holiday while a number of our companions were not. Sometime after midnight, wrapped in a poncho-liner and surrounded with gentle memories of home and the holidays, I drifted off to sleep thinking of my family and mostly my mother.

I was jolted out of my sleep on Christmas morning by the sound of "Jingle Bells!" Two Marine Corps helicopters with Santa's painted on their sides were making repeated passes over the combat base, and loudspeakers mounted in the doors were playing one Christmas song after another. It was incredible! Within seconds, people from all over were up, out, and on their feet to cheer and to wave. The show didn't last more than 10 minutes, but it was enough to get our day off to a magical start.

At noon, a Catholic chaplain celebrated mass out in the open, and as I sauntered over, I was suddenly struck with the thought that 12 noon on Christmas Day in Vietnam corresponded exactly with 12 midnight on Christmas Eve in Connecticut. While I knelt with rifle in hand in the red dust of Khe Sanh, my family was kneeling in the pews of St. Mary's Church in New Haven for midnight mass. It was the only time in my 13 month tour when I knew exactly what members of my family were doing at a given moment. I used to wonder and guess at their actions and activities from time to time, but in this short period of mass and remembrance, I was linked to them with a bond that stretched over 15,000 miles. In spite of the distance, I never felt closer to any of them as I did at that moment, and the simple act of closing my eyes seemed to move me out of the war and into the comfortable surroundings of family and home.

By nightfall, Christmas morning in Connecticut, I was strapping on the weapons and gear of an infantryman and preparing to move to an ambush position outside our protective barbed wire. Our route out the gate took us directly across the very ground where mass had been said earlier, and where, through the miracle of Christ's birth, I was permitted to stand for a moment at a window to the world.

A Different Christmas Story

By Michael Preston

Every year around Xmas time I get to thinking about those Christmas's I spent away from home, three in total, what a drag ! C-rats ala-king for Xmas dinner, O-Boy , yum-yum ! I think about all the guys who did it before me to keep this country free, wow! Just think how lucky those guys in Korea were to be there for Xmas, it was really cold and snowy just like it is supposed to be at Christmas, that probably helped to cheer them up, ya think ?

And how about those lucky guys in " Belleau Woods" in the big war! I think the guys who probably had the most fun at Christmas were those guys who were taking boat rides across the Potomac with that big guy who kept pointing at the icebergs ahead, these guys had the finest equipment that the revolutionist could afford, what fun. Well we ended up sitting in the steaming jungle, 90 degrees or what ever, 90 % humidity or whatever it was, doesn't matter-there wasn't much Christmas atmosphere in the Nam. It would have been nice to have some snow, don't ya think? Well, on second thought maybe not. Anyway, every year at Christmas I offer a message to my fellow veterans whether it be something I have conjured up or something someone else has. This year someone sent me this one and it was good enough to bring tears to my eyes so I figger it is good enough to send to you tough guys .
MERRY CHRISTMAS, SEMPER FI "ANIMAL"

The embers glowed softly, and in their dim light,
I gazed round the room and I cherished the sight.
My wife was asleep, her head on my chest,
My daughter beside me, angelic in rest.
Outside the snow fell, a blanket of white,
Transforming the yard to a winter delight.
The sparkling lights in the tree I believe,
Completed the magic that was Christmas Eve.
My eyelids were heavy, my breathing was deep,
Secure and surrounded by love I would sleep.
In perfect contentment, or so it would seem,
So I slumbered, perhaps I started to dream.
The sound wasn't loud, and it wasn't too near,

But I opened my eyes when it tickled my ear.
Perhaps just a cough, I didn't quite know, Then the sure sound of footsteps outside in the snow.
My soul gave a tremble, I struggled to hear,
And I crept to the door just to see who was near.
Standing out in the cold and the dark of the night,
A lone figure stood, his face weary and tight.
A soldier, I puzzled, some twenty years old,
Perhaps a Marine, huddled here in the cold.
Alone in the dark, he looked up and smiled,
Standing watch over me, and my wife and my child.
"What are you doing?" I asked without fear,
"Come in this moment, it's freezing out here!
Put down your pack, brush the snow from your sleeve,
You should be at home on a cold Christmas Eve!"

For barely a moment I saw his eyes shift,
Away from the cold and the snow blown in drifts.
To the window that danced with a warm fire's light
Then he sighed and he said "Its really all right, I'm out here by choice. I'm here every night."
"It's my duty to stand at the front of the line,
That separates you from the darkest of times.
No one had to ask or beg or implore me,
I'm proud to stand here like my fathers before me.
My Gramps died at ' Pearl on a day in December,"
Then he sighed, "That's a Christmas 'Gram always remembers."
My dad stood his watch in the jungles of ' Nam ',
And now it is my turn and so, here I am.
I've not seen my own son in more than a while,
But my wife sends me pictures, he's sure got her smile.

Then he bent and he carefully pulled from his bag,
The red, white, and blue... an American flag.
I can live through the cold and the being alone,
Away from my family, my house and my home.
I can stand at my post through the rain and the sleet,
I can sleep in a foxhole with little to eat.
I can carry the weight of killing another,
Or lay down my life with my sister and brother
Who stand at the front against any and all,
To ensure for all time that this flag will not fall."
"So go back inside," he said, "harbor no fright,
Your family is waiting and I'll be all right."
"But isn't there something I can do, at the least,
"Give you money," I asked, "or prepare you a feast?
It seems all too little for all that you've done,
For being away from your wife and your son."

Then his eye welled a tear that held no regret,
"Just tell us you love us, and never forget.
To fight for our rights back at home while we're gone,
To stand your own watch, no matter how long.
For when we come home, either standing or dead,
To know you remember we fought and we bled.
Is payment enough, and with that we will trust,
That we mattered to you as you mattered to us."

PLEASE, Christmas will be coming soon and some credit is due to our U.S. service men and women for our being able to celebrate these festivities. Make people stop and think of our heroes, living and dead, who sacrificed themselves for us.

SHORT ROUNDS

From a "Doc"

By Mike Fishbaugh

BURY ME NEXT TO A MARINE

Bury me next to a Marine,
When my time comes to an end,
So I can spend eternity
Beside my brother and friend.
I've served beside them for years,
And they inspired me every day,
They've never ask for anything
So a debt I can never repay.
None of them served for money,
None for glory or fame,
But they've served in every clime and place,
Heroes with but one name.
No will ever out do them,
Their honor is never outdone,
They will go down in history
As America's favorite sons.
Marines will never fail you,
And their guard will never cease,
Please bury me next to a Marine,

So I may rest in peace.

Written by Robert L. Owens, a 2nd Class Corpsman serving with Marines in Iraq
WELL SAID ROBERT!

Many Times I have tried to express my feelings about the Marines I served with!! Even the Marines of today, I have a bond with! You just have to had been there to understand how corpsmen respect Marines.

THE COMEDIAN

By Craig W. Tourte

I attended another social function last night comprised of approximately 200 lobbyists and business types. This event took place in a nice restaurant which was completely reserved for the occasion. Most of the folks were younger than myself as they should be, since I am now old and retired. The seating were tables that held six people of which I knew only one other. The lady sitting next to me engaged me in conversation and revealed that her son was 27 years old and was in the Army and currently serving in Iraq. She told me that he had served 4 years in the Marine Corps but because of his extensive tattoos the Marine Corps refused his request to reenlist, so he joined the Army. When he left the Marine Corps he was a Lance Corporal and when he went into the Army they made him a Sergeant. She continued that this was his 3rd tour in Iraq as he had served in Iraq once as a Marine and this was his second tour as a solider.

I told her that I was sure that she was proud of him for his warrior spirit, which just could not be explained. That there are those who are called to serve, who just have to go where the action is. Not that he wanted to go but that something deep inside told him that he had to go. We discussed how hard those decisions were on the family and love ones but it was an unfortunate reality for those that have that spirit. She had a tear running down her cheek about then so I thought it best to move on to something else, but I knew she appreciated my understanding of how she felt.

The conversation continued and her husband (not the father of her son) asked me if I had served and where. So of course the subject of Khe Sanh came up. He told me that he was familiar with Khe Sanh. Although he had not served in the military his father and uncle had. He was very interested in Khe Sanh and compared the experience to Belleau Woods and other Marine Corps battles. I asked him how he was so aware of that event and he told me that he was a student of history and was very familiar with the Siege. He was very kind and I hate to say this, but seemed kind of awe struck and enthralled with me and kept saying "I cant' believe that I'm sitting here with someone who was at Khe Sanh." We discussed the little book of essays I'm putting together and of course he said he wanted to buy one as soon as it was published (I put him on my list).

The entertainment for the evening was a well known comedian of political satire. I normally stay away from these types because they inevitable say something that just gets me, but since it was a primarily conservative crowd and I was a guest, I hung in there and tried to maintain a pleasant smile. Of course he got around to George W and the Iraq war. Now I don't want to make a political statement because we all have our opinions on these issues but he mentioned with great laughter all of "the lies" (you have heard them before) about why we were in Iraq, why we're staying on and on. I glanced over at the lady who was sitting next to me and her face was stone cold and from where I was sitting I could feel the chill running down her back. You see, regardless of how one feels about this whole situation, if you're a parent and your child or loved one is in danger, you want, you need to feel that their potential sacrifice is worth it. At the very least, you don't want to be sitting in a room with 200 other people who are laughing about it, knowing they don't understand your pain and to you, it's not a laughing matter.

She handled the situation better than I would have been able, given the circumstances and I'm sure she expected something like this and she did not seem to take it personally. But when the event was over and she and her husband got up to leave, I saw the look on her face. The look that said she was all alone, and no one else would understand, except I did.

Rain (Southeast Asia Monsoon)

Talisman Submission
Jack Baumgarten, CW162

3/16/06

Once I was where it rained all of the time.
Canvas sagging against tent poles under pools of water trapped above.
Floors of mud underfoot, cold with ridges of black walls and dams holding each little pool in place.
Sickening warm breezes turning cold on my wet shivering face.

Joy is sleep
in sodden bed role on canvas cot
head buried in damp pillow of bad smelling rags and clothes hiding from the tiny lizards seeking comfort too.

Sadness is morning,
somehow warm in my damp reverie.
Socks and shorts warm with me hidden under my feet.
Boots camouflaged in dirt hiding under my cot and calling to me from their puddle.
Rise I must,
me and that lizard,
shivering again as cover is cast aside.
Arms and legs enter the mildewed cloth of yesterday's garments.
Toes feel moisture rise up between them from saturated inserts below.
The morning cleanup ceremony begins with wet face staring back out of the small mirror between running beads of rain.
All of that water and nothing to brush my teeth with!

Quietness comes from the sound of rain falling on mud and skin from boots pulling out of sucking holes from canvas too wet to complain about the beat of the rain.
from eyes peering between dripping brows.
from wet pant legs rubbing each other.
from knowing that it will rain again tomorrow.
from when I fall in the mud to join the rain in that sad hole as my warm fluids help fill the space around me.

Soon I will be riding away
On a wet canvas litter
Between two sets of hands
The rain will stop as the zipper pulls the plastic bag together across my moist face.
I ride away from that cold damp home lying amid my brothers
In the misty rain that never ends.

STRESS and PTSD

By Craig Tourte

I'm really pretty new at this PTSD stuff, I didn't know much about it until I connected with Tom Horchler about four years ago. Of course Tom insisted that I file for PTSD but it was not until I attended my first reunion and talked to Neil and others that I came to realize what all of this really meant. I know that some see it as just a means for others to receive VA benefits and it's hard to describe its effects and ramification to those not so well informed and in particular to discuss it with those who deny having any form of the disorder themselves. Subsequently, I have read a great deal on the subject and of course I have now gone through the process. As I talk to others who are currently working through the system trying to obtain the assistance and help they need, I find that one of the many issues they face is having to describe what combat action they saw. Questions like, "How many dead did you see, did you kill anyone, did you help anyone who was wounded, what was your MOS, what citations did you receive." And provide names and letters from associates who can vouch for their experience. I think what they (whoever they are) are really asking, is how much gore (death and injury) did you see and why can't you just get over it?

Chaplain Ray Stubbe wrote a wonderful letter of support for someone a number of years ago. The letter is quite long as he describes the experience of being at Khe Sanh (and the hills) during the Siege. But I think the most important aspect of this letter reads in part:

"The emotional consequence of all of this involved: a constant awareness of imminent personal danger and death, feelings of abandonment, a deep awareness of vulnerability, and inability to do anything, and the frustrations of helplessness..." Now here is what I feel is the most important issue in his letter.

"I'm sure you are aware of Lt.//Col Dave Grossman's book on killings where... Swank and Marchand's much-cited World War II study, determined that after sixty days of continuous combat, 98 percent of all surviving soldiers will have become psychiatric casualties of one kind or another...also found a common trait among 2 percent who were able to endure sustained combat: a predisposition toward "aggressive psychopathic personalities." Having been in contact with many hundreds of the survivors of the Siege battle at Khe Sanh, I have been made aware that almost all are 100% service-connected for PTSD, as one might conclude from the experience..."

What I get from the information provided in this letter is that PTSD is not about exposure to death and injury, although that is an important aspect, but rather how long and intense was the sustained and continuous stress of the experience. Of the many individuals I have spoken to about this subject, I cannot recall one saying in truthfulness that after their experience at Khe Sanh, life has been a bowl of cherries and everything has been grand. But rather we have spoken about broken marriages, dependent abuse, dreams, anger and you know the rest. For those who don't have PTSD, or just deny having it, may I suggest they read and learn as much as they can about this disorder and then talk to those who have been diagnosed. You might find a common thread and perhaps then you might understand what this is all about, and who knows, you might even find that you have just a little PTSD yourself.

A REBUTTAL

All service men and women are heroes in some eyes.

I am an associate member of the Khe Sanh Veterans and have been for several years. I look forward to receiving the Red Clay Magazine.

While I was not there it is extremely interesting reading about the war through a Marines eyes, for some of us that were not there we can only imagine what it was like. To me, every man and women that came home from Viet Nam was a hero. Every one of them has a story to tell of the hell they endured. I had many friends who served in Viet Nam and some that never made it home. They were all heroes in my eyes, and to many who knew them.

In your issue 69 Red Clay there was an article by Mr. Moore and his concern on how loosely the term hero is used. In all honesty I do not feel that many of the American people would agree with him. There are many men and women in Iraq, Afghanistan and many other parts of the world that are risking all for their country and the American people. While some of those military personnel will not see battle, a large majority will and have. My nephew has just recently returned from Iraq. While injured in battle he is one of the lucky ones that came home alive. He was injured while trying to help three wounded soldiers that were taking heavy fire; I would call him a hero. Listening to his stories of the war in Iraq was the same as listening to the Khe Sanh veteran's talk of their experiences in Viet Nam.

I truly do not know the statistics of the war in Iraq or Afghanistan and the brave men and women there defending our country, but I am sure that more than 1% of them have shouldered a rifle to defend them selves or one of their comrades. As Mr. Moore pointed out, the dictionary defines hero as: A person noted for feats of courage or notability of purpose, unless we are there we can not know how many times one of these brave people have fired a gun, Flew a Jet, guided a tank or any other form of putting themselves in harms way. A military (hero) might be one of these people.

The other term of hero that Mr. Moore alluded to was, one who has risked or sacrificed his or her life. Unless you know or knew someone who is serving or has served in Iraq or Afghanistan, you can not possibly know how many times one has risked his or her life. They might also be a hero. My nephew is a Captain in the rangers and had seen his share of battle. He said when you are with a platoon of men and women and you are the responsible one, you do not think of your well being or safety, you think of theirs. He explained to me that his entire platoon felt the same way, think of the person next to you in battle and doing what you can to keep them safe. These types of people may be heroes.

While Mr. Moore gave many fine examples of a hero in his opinion, which I agree with, there are many other examples that we never will know. We will not know them unless you know someone who has gone through it. Whether it be, Omaha Beach, The Battle of the Bulge, The Bomber crews, Leathernecks, Survivors of the USS Yorktown, 1st. Marine Division, The Viet Nam War, or any other conflict that has seen U.S. military men and women on foreign soil. These people are truly heroes.

But please do not cheapen the meaning of hero by saying that 99% of the young men and women who serve our country today are not heroes because they have not shouldered a rifle in battle, you do not know that as a fact. While some of them may not be or have not been in harms way during their time at war, they are still in someone's eyes a hero, because they did indeed go to war. By Mr. Moore saying they are not heroes is the same slap in the face that the brave young men and women coming home from Viet Nam went through. They were indeed heroes, they came home to a country for the most part that did not appreciate what they did or had gone through. I know that simple attitude has changed in today's society by the support for the military men and women seen all over the United States. While some do not agree on the war it seems that we all agree on the support of the military men and women; well most of us anyways. These men and women may be heroes.

The word hero is not misused in most cases in my opinion. I do not call someone a hero unless they deserve it in my eyes. I belong to an organization called the Patriot Guard Riders. We have buried many, many Heroes; we have done many memorial rides for WW1, WW2, Korea, Viet Nam and Iraq veterans. We do many send off rides for heroes going to battle, and many welcome home rides for those coming home from battle. In every aspect of what we do, the people we deal with think that their loved ones are indeed heroes. Who are we, or who is Webster to say that these people are not heroes. The interpretation of the word is better left to those who use it and not for anyone person to say they are not. Many of the words in today's society have several meanings; this must be one of them because it seems to me that an awful lot of people I talk to see these brave men and women as heroes.

Nha Trang

A white sand beach
fed by the south China Sea.
Sky as blue as blue can be.
The sun high and hot beating down on that hot sand.

A peasant woman with leathered skin smiles as she approaches our little group.
Crows have walked on the corners of her eyes.
Paths to her ears have been carefully sketched across her forehead.
A curved wooden beam lies across her shoulders – each end supporting a basket hung with coarse hemp.
The baskets carefully loaded, balanced between her bony shoulders.

Lips covering teeth blackened from beetlenut open to ask: "You buy pineapple DiWi?"
Machete in her left, pineapple on her right, her hands deftly peel brown skin from the fruit-carefully carving out the eyes, and quartering the center into four popsicle shapes.
"10 Piasters DiWi. You numba one G.I. for sure!"
as she pockets our script.

The juice runs down our chins and fingers onto the hot sand.
Our palates water from the sweetness as we whittle those popsicles down.

Suddenly, artillery rounds explode in the distance
And bracket double reports of giant howitzers.
Oily smoke bellows across the palms on the wind.

We wipe the sugary juice from our faces as we watch the jets scream over the trees, wings bending, unloading gifts of napalm.

She turns back to us – barefoot on the hot sand - -

BOOK REVIEW

ONE DAY AS A LION
True Stories of the Vietnam War Heroes From Collin County, Texas
By Ronnie D. Foster

"It is better to have lived one day as a lion, than to live ten thousand years as a sheep."From an ancient Tibetan proverb

The era of the sixties was a turbulent time in America. Nowhere was the impact any greater than in my home of Collin County, Texas. During the 1860s, it was a war between the states of the North and the South that divided the country so drastically. Hundreds of local men and boys left their families, ranches, and farms to form up in the town squares, and march off to battle. Just over 100 years later, in the 1960s, the country was again divided over a war between the North and South. But this time the battles were being fought on the other side of the world in the rice paddies and jungles of a small obscure country in Southeast Asia called Vietnam, a place that was practically unknown to the average American at the time. Nonetheless, America was again going to war, and again called upon her young men to wage the fight for freedom. And just like 100 years earlier, the young men of America answered the call and proudly wore the uniform into battle after battle.

I was just one of hundreds of those boys pretending to be men who left in search of adventure, the chance to be a living participant in the making of history, and to always have the inner feeling that we fought for our country. When World War II hero and US Navy veteran, President John F. Kennedy said, "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country," many of us took him literally and accepted that challenge. Twenty-one of those boys from Collin County, Texas, who did take that challenge, did not come home.

Those men, the ones who did not come home, paid the ultimate price so that the rest of us could live another hundred years as free thinkers and doers. Freedom does not come free; it comes with a heavy price.

This book is an attempt to tell the stories of those 21 young men. Through the details of available official military records, history books, veterans' websites on the Internet, photographs, maps, personal and eyewitness accounts, letters to family and friends, and my own experience as a Marine Corps veteran of the Vietnam War, I have attempted to tell the stories of their young lives to the best of my ability. As I began to write this book, my war had been over for 35 years. For some of the guys, I found an abundance of information, and for others not much at all. I have tried my best to tell their stories with the honor and dignity they have earned and deserve. Many of them were friends of mine, some I had never met, but we are all brothers in an elite family of warriors, freedom fighters, and adventurers.

In January of 1961, President Kennedy explained the presence of American military personnel who were involved in a war in that obscure little country in Southeast Asia: "Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, to assure the survival and the success of liberty..."

A small section of the population of the United States was becoming vocal in their opposition to our intervention into what they saw as another country's war. On September 2, 1963, the President answered those critics: "... These people who say that we ought to withdraw from Vietnam are wholly wrong, because if we withdrew from Vietnam, the communists would control Vietnam. Pretty soon Thailand, Cambodia, Laos, Malaya would go, and all of Southeast Asia would be under the control of the communists and under the domination of the Chinese...."

After President Kennedy was assassinated on Friday, November 22, 1963, in downtown Dallas, Texas, 15 miles south of the Collin County line, the problem of Vietnam fell into the lap of another Texan, Lyndon B. Johnson. The President was the son of a Collin County girl who was born just three blocks south of the square in McKinney, the county seat. On August 3, 1965, his reply to the growing number of war critics on why we had 16,000 military advisors in South Vietnam was: "If this little nation goes down the drain and can't maintain her independence, ask yourself, what's going to happen to all the other little nations?"

On the eve of the presidential election in 1964 between Johnson and his Republican opponent, Barry Goldwater, the Viet Cong (VC) staged a rocket attack on the American air base at Bien Hoa, in the southern part of the country, killing American personnel there. The United States' Ambassador to Vietnam, General Maxwell Taylor, urged a retaliation bombing on Hanoi, but the President refused. The VC attacked again and again, becoming bolder each time, and instead of their traditional guerrilla style of hit and run fighting, they began showing the influences of their training advisors from North Vietnam, China, North Korea, and Russia, as they utilized more battalion-sized operations.

At the time, the only large American military installations housing American troops were air bases, and they, as well as the aircraft on the ground, were becoming more and more vulnerable. The protection of the bases had been left up to the Army of the Republic of South Vietnam (ARVN), and it was becoming increasingly apparent that they could not be counted on to do that job. On March 8, 1965, the President ordered 3,500 US Marines to land and deploy in a position to protect the air base at Da Nang. Three weeks later, the VC attacked the American Embassy in Saigon, as regular troops of the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) began pouring into the South by way of what would become known as the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

President Johnson, in a speech to the nation on January 12, 1966: "How many men who listen to me tonight have served their nation in other wars? How many are not here to listen? The war in Vietnam is not like these other wars. Yet, finally, war is always the same. It is young men dying in the fullness of their promise. It is trying to kill a man that you do not even know well enough to hate. Therefore, to know war is to know that there is still madness in this world. For we have children to teach, and we have sick to be cured, and we have men to be freed. There are poor to be lifted up, and there are cities to be built, and there is a world to be helped. Yet, we do what we must. I am hopeful, and I will try with the best I can, with everything I've got, to end this battle and to return our sons to their desires. Yet as long as others will challenge America's security, and test the dearness of our beliefs with fire and steel, then we must stand, or see the promise of two centuries tremble."

And just like that, the politicians of the world had gotten us into another war. And just like that, boys from all over Collin County answered the call the same way that our fathers, grandfathers, and great grandfathers had. Some volunteered seeking an adventurous opportunity to see the world and to be a part of history; some dutifully went when their names were called. Some went kicking and screaming all the way, but once they got there, they did their jobs with honor and dignity. Those called, served with just as much duty and honor as the volunteers. According to the most decorated soldier of that war, the late Colonel David Hackworth, US Army (Ret), he could tell no difference between the regulars and the draftees in the soldiers who served under him. They were equally good soldiers.

A good friend of mine, Frank Seals, joined the Marines after he had graduated from McKinney High School in 1965. At the completion of boot camp, and just before he shipped out for Vietnam, he came home wearing his summer tropical uniform and was a changed man, not a boy anymore. Frank was slim and trim with an attitude and a look in his eye that I didn't quite understand at the time. He was a Marine, by God. Just like those legendary guys I had read about on Guadalcanal. Although he was only 18, having earned that famous Eagle, Globe, and Anchor on his hat, Frank would never have to prove his manhood again.

He told me stories about what it had been like so far. Yes, boot camp had been hell on earth. I was totally fascinated. In fact, I wanted to hear all about infantry and jungle warfare training with live ammunition in the hills and on the beaches of Camp Pendleton, California, the same place I had read about in the novel "Battle Cry," written by Marine Corps veteran Leon Uris. Frank told me that Pendleton was where they had filmed the movie that was made from the book. I could easily picture myself wearing that uniform, but I didn't know if I had what it took. Not just anybody could wear those clothes. But he told me if he could make it, I could make it. Honestly, I wanted to go, and it scared the hell out of me.

My dad, his brothers, my mom's brother, and my two older brothers, had been soldiers during WWII, Korea, and the Cold War against communism. I decided there was no way I was going to miss this one, a real genuine shooting war. What an adventure, and what stories I would have to write about when some far-off day I did get ready to settle down and remember it all for my kids and their kids to read about. And I was not the only kid who felt that way. The Marine Corps was full of them, 17 and 18 -year-old guys like me, most of us from the poor side of town, never having been anywhere, and ready to see the wonders of the world, and be just like Audie Murphy, the most decorated soldier of World War II, who was from my hometown of Farmersville, Texas.

We soon learned, however, there was no glory in war. That fallacy comes from those Hollywood movies where men die without pain, without spilling blood and guts, or missing limbs or heads, terrible sucking chest wounds, or crying and screaming. And the movie soldiers always seemed to have time to say a few last meaningful words.

In Vietnam not everyone was involved in direct combat, although no one place in the country was ever totally safe from death and destruction. Our war was basically one in which there were no front lines like there had been in all the ones before. It was a new kind of war in which the score was kept not by the amount of ground gained and conquered, but by body counts, a daily tally of the number of soldiers killed by each side.

Everyone who went there has a story to tell. Twenty -one young men from Collin County went and never returned. Someone has to tell their stories. Out of those 21 heroes, there were 13 soldiers of the US Army, one sailor, and seven Marines.

On March the 5th, 1966, the Vietnam War hit home for the first time. One of the Marine Corps' mottoes is "First to Fight." That usually also means first to die. Our first casualty was an 18-year-old Marine, PFC (Private First Class) Royce Glen Scoggins of McKinney.

LATE OBIT

COLONEL CHARLES KENNETH GRIMES, USAF

Charles passed away on January 24, 2008 at the Tennessee Veterans State Home in Humboldt. He had turned 85 on January 9. He leaves his wife, Joyce Callaway Grimes; his daughter, Deborah Anne Marston; his son, Charles K. Grimes Jr.; his sister, Dorothy Owens; eight grandchildren and seven great- grandchildren and Rosie his pet Chihuahua. Ken Grimes was born in Memphis, Tennessee on January 9, 1923. He spent his childhood in Memphis and attended Humes High School, succeeded by Elvis Presley two years later. He enlisted in the service near the end of World War II and volunteered for pilot training. He qualified to fly the B-17 just before the end of the war but never flew a mission. His military career spanned nearly 30 years during which time he served in the Korean War and Vietnam War. He became a command pilot and reached the rank of Colonel. His final combat tours were served in Vietnam flying missions in the C-131 including dangerous low-altitude parachute extractions in Khe Sanh during the siege of 1967-68.

After retiring from the military in 1973, he worked for 5 years at Boeing Corporation in Wichita after which he fully retired to become a passionate golfer. Ken had a parallel academic career beginning as an undergraduate at the University of Alabama where he received his BS in engineering. He later obtained a Masters degree from M.I.T. and a Ph.D. in aeronautical engineering from Caltech. He became an instructor at the Armed Forces Institute of Technology at Wright Patterson Air Force Base and headed the Structure and Materials division of the Flight Dynamics Laboratory there. He was married to his first wife, Celena M. Grimes in 1941. In spite of the vicissitudes of three wars and periodic separations, they remained a devoted couple for 45 years, living together as newlyweds, parenting two children, and enjoying an early retirement traveling to Hawaii on three occasions. Perhaps their most cherished role was as grand-parents. He steadfastly took care of Celena throughout her long bout with pulmonary disease. Ken was remarried to Frances Larrison Grimes in 1987.

Their life together was tragically cut short when Fran succumbed to ALS in 1999. Subsequent to Fran's death, Ken was extremely fortunate to meet and marry Joyce C. Nichols in 2001 with whom he happily shared the last several years. The visitation was held on Saturday evening, January 26 from 6-8 p.m. at Memorial Park Funeral Home. The interment took place in Memorial Park Cemetery at 2 p.m. on Sunday January 27 under a military honor guard.

MEMOIRS

Michael Fishbaugh turned up the following articles and photos that were published in "The Vietnam Airlifter" Newsletter April of 1971. It is a tribute to those Air Force Heroes who kept Khe Sanh Rolling Freight specialists are probably among the hardest working men in the Air Force. These men keep the supplies moving in one of the hottest spots at Khe Sanh.

S/Sgt. Gerald Bickford, a freight specialist at the Khe Sanh Air Base, recently found himself surrounded by a news team from one of the television networks in Vietnam. "How long have you been in Vietnam?" the correspondent asked Bickford who is something of a legend "for being where the action is." "Forty-eight months," came the crisp reply. The startled newsman asked what the men who unload the aircraft in the unprotected areas did when the shells began coming in. "We run like hell," Bickford replied.

"I beg your pardon," remarked the correspondent. "We run back to the bunkers.'" Then the newsman asked why he hadn't seen the freight crew running when some enemy shells hit the base a few minutes before. Sergeant Bickford, replied, "We have to get the aircraft unloaded before we take off." The Staff Sergeant later commented, "I hope he understood that without supplies we wouldn't be winning this war."

They're a rough crew, dressed in whatever will keep them warm and dry. Often, mud that is four and five days old will cover their fatigues. According to their first sergeant," they're doing one helluva fine job." What MSgt. Donald Haselrig, First Sergeant of the 8th Aerial Port Squadron was referring to, was the performance of the 16-man mobility team that is handling the freight at the forward supply base. "I've seen them at work and at play," he said, "and, I can guarantee you they do both just as hard."

Even as the C-130s taxi toward the off-load area, the cargo crew moves in with fork lifts to unload the huge aircraft. All the men who hustle the freight at Khe Sanh are volunteers. Besides the long hours, the work is dangerous. In recent days, enemy rockets and artillery shells have fallen on the base. The airmen who work along. The exposed section of the runway makes tempting targets for the gunners.

S/Sgt Bickford found some cold water a refreshing break from the hard work. The water containers lid sufficed as a cup for the thirsty men

"However, A/lC freight specialist Arlos Anundson said, "This really doesn't bother us. We're too busy to think much about it." Usually the members of the team spend about two weeks al Khe Sanh and then return to Tan Son Nhut for a short rest. M/Sgt. Walter Moore, in charge of the Squadron's detachments explained that after a short time at the forward base, the men become exhausted. "We try to give them as much of a break as possible," he said. Lt. Col. James Rock, who is in charge of the Air Force ground effort at Khe Sanh, praised the work of the freight specialists. He noted that an aircraft was rarely on the ground for more than ten minutes and it isn't unusual for a plane to be turned around in less than five minutes. This means that if the weather holds, the Air Force has been able to bring in 500 tons of badly needed supplies a day. The record for one day here has been 1,000 tons of cargo.

Living and working at Khe Sanh are three maintenance men who are at Khe Sanh to perform emergency repairs on aircraft that have problems. Fortunately, these are few and far between. Sgt. Michael Marabelle explained that he and the other two maintenance men spend most of their time helping to move cargo. "Everyone helps out here," he remarked. "That's important." The men of the mobility team seem to thrive on the hard work. Sgt James Dausch explained, "I volunteered for mobility, to be, where the action is. I really enjoy it. I wouldn't want to do nothing else."

They're all Volunteers. The Work is hard and dangerous. Yet, without them the airlift into Khe Sanh wouldn't work.

"Any man who works for me had better be an individualist and hard headed to boot, if he wants to be a success as a combat controller," asserts Capt. Donald R. Howie, OIC of the Combat Control Team (CCT). After nine months as chief of the 834th's CCT, the captain should know what it takes to be a winner. Sanh.

A combat controller is the first man into a forward location. Equipped with a radio jeep and a supply of gasoline, he sets up shop as soon as he arrives and proceeds to guide aircraft into the field. He has complete responsibility for contacting each aircraft by radio, giving them landing instructions and talking them "around" any hostile fire in the area. He must be able to make decisions based on what he knows, and once made, he must stick to this decision. "Sometimes a two-striper will have control of all aircraft at a particular airfield," added the captain, between bites of a C-Ration breakfast. "In this case he must be able to make decisions on what he has been taught and overrule the recommendations of senior men not in his career field ."

"Me? I love my job." he explained. "This is the only place in the world where a combat controller can perform as he was taught. I'd like to come back for another tour but since there is only one officer slot in Southeast Asia, I'm pretty sure I wont be able to."

"Since there are no other officers with my specialty over here, I have a free hand in how I deploy troops. We're allowed to operate pretty much the way we want to, as long as the job gets done. It's more meaningful than some other jobs because you are in on both the planning and executing stages." Finishing the C-Ration ham and eggs he tossed the can into the fire and strolled back to the radio jeep and a session of reminiscing about the past nine months.

"It's a fairly exciting life over here. I've never been in a firefight or had anyone shooting directly at me, but I've had my share of rocket and mortar attacks," "There was the time at one base when enemy mortars blew up a fuel bladder not 100 yards from our jeep. Exciting wouldn't be the word. I guess scared would come pretty close to how I felt".

During one operation, he was controlling airlift operations into an isolated airfield on the border when the strip came under attack, "They were shooting helicopters off the end of the runway," he related. "You feel pretty lucky to get out of a situation like that without losing any aircraft."

"The aircrews put a lot of faith and trust in the controllers when they are coming into a field," he continued, scanning the skies with an unconscious habit. "Anytime a field I'm working comes under attack and I can get the aircraft off safely, I feel like I've done my job."

NOTEWORTHY DATE IN HISTORY
"MISSION AT KHE SANH"
MEMORIES ON THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE START OF THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH
By LT/COL DAVE HARMON USAF 314 TAW

February 29, 2008, marks the 10th anniversary of one memorable day in a 31-year military career, occurring during what became known as "The Tet Offensive" in the Vietnam War. That battle now celebrates its 40th anniversary.

My C-130E crew was stationed at CCK Air Base, Taiwan and flying out of a forward operating location in Tuy Hoa Air Base, Republic of South Vietnam. Our mission was to fly Airland and Airdrop missions delivering personnel and equipment throughout Southeast Asia.

We reported to Operations at "O'Dark Thirty" for mission assignment and briefing and were told we would be dead-heading up the coast to Da Nang and flying three round-trip "B3" (Bullets, Beans and Band-Aids) Airland sorties from there to Khe Sanh. We had flown the same mission six months earlier (while flying out of Cam Ranh Bay) without a hitch; but this was different.

I said to the briefing officer that I thought C-130 landings at Khe Sanh had been suspended due to the intensity of the attack being waged against it by the North Vietnamese Army (NVA). I was told that 834th Air Division (Air Force tactical airlift command and control in Saigon) had decided to try a "test" mission to see if it might be successful. We finished the ops and intel/threat briefings, checked out extra flak jackets (to put under our seat cushions) and got underway.

Air Force Aerial Port units are responsible for preparing cargo and passengers for transport, rigging airdrop loads, and the on-loading/off-loading of aircraft. Upon our arrival at Da Nang the Aerial-Porters were ready for us and we were quickly loaded and on our way. Khe Sanh was manned by components of the 3rd Marine Division and other various attached units. It was located on a small plateau in the mountainous northwest corner of South Vietnam and positioned as an interdict on one of the main Communist infiltration routes into South Vietnam. North Vietnamese General Giap had committed several Divisions in the attempt to do to our forces at Khe Sanh, what had been done to the French 34 years earlier in the siege of Bien Dien Phu. He surrounded Khe Sanh and began a series of continuous bombardments and attacks. However, he did not reckon on two differences: modern air support and the character of the US Marine Corps.

B-52's, fighters and helicopter gun ships rained death on the NVA forces surrounding Khe Sanh and the Marines gave as good as they got with outbound firepower and ground attacks. Key to the Marines' effort was aerial resupply, without which they would have been defenseless, since all ground lines of communication had been severed. That is where Tactical Airlift came in.

In the years before the Vietnam War, Tactical Airlift forces (C-130's, C-123's and all the supporting adjuncts for battlefield aerial delivery) had been improving tactics, equipment, and training for a mission that all planning indicated would become a major factor in modern warfare. A number of exercises were carried out in Florida, the Carolinas, Missouri and the desert Southwest developing new formation and short-field landing tactics and aerial delivery methods such as the Ground Proximity Extraction System (GPES), the Low Altitude Parachute Extraction System (LAPES), the Container Delivery System (CDS), the Parachute Low Altitude Delivery System (PLADS) and improved personnel and heavy equipment airdrop capability.

Unfortunately, one factor missing in these exercises was a ground force willing to place its logistics requirement in the hands of aerial re-supply in order to stress the Tactical Airlift system to the point of realism. Army trucks were organic, plentiful, and unhampered, so ground commanders (with other agendas) preferred surface resupply in these exercises. The result was a lack of the realism of a Bastogne or a Khe Sanh scenario. (Fifteen years later, I tried to get ground forces participating in a "Century Independence" exercise to agree to such a scenario and it was still like pulling teeth.)

Fortunately, early in the Vietnam War, a situation was reported to have occurred when cargo was seriously backlogged in the marshalling yard of Tan Son Nhut Airport in Saigon. A visiting Four-Star General asked the Aerial Port Chief Master Sergeant how many more C-130's were needed to move the cargo to all the forward locations in South Vietnam that needed it. It was rumored that the Chief told the General that if one more C-130 were sent to Tan Son Nhut, they would have to begin vertical parking. It was a good thing that the wrong question was posed to the right person. The Chief took the General to the Aerial Port Squadron loading equipment yard and showed him the broken loading equipment awaiting replacement parts and repairs. The General got the message and that was the beginning of a new look at how to use the C130 in a combat theater. The answer was simple: do whatever you have to do to minimize ground time between sorties. That meant that aircraft maintenance, refueling, and loading capabilities would have to be supported first if they were to be able to support the airlift mission.

(At this point, I am sure some of you "snow on the roof" types are thinking: "good grief, didn't we learn anything from the Berlin Airlift?" Well, the wheel does have to be reinvented from time to time now, doesn't it?)

By the time the siege of Khe Sanh and the Tet Offensive came about, the Tactical Airlift system may not have been a "well oiled machine," but it was pretty close. Even at Khe Sanh we had a hard surface planked runway over 3,000 feet long with an adjacent hard surface ramp and a Marine, radar Ground Controlled Approach (GCA) in operation. When the weather was lousy (which was most of the time) we could get an instrument approach for a landing or extraction. A procedure was even developed to get a GCA approach to the drop zone (DZ) west of the runway when the weather was too low to land or the threat level was too high for Airland ops. It was a really fluid situation. Our side didn't always own the entire DZ and the GCA would adjust a flight path accordingly. Considering the environment they were operating in, these GCA controllers were the best I have ever seen.

My Squadron (776th TAS) lost one crew and aircraft, on a GCA to Khe Sanh in bad weather, when they hit the upslope just short of the runway and skidded onto the runway on the side of the aircraft. A picture of a Marine fire fighter trying to chop his way into the cockpit appeared in Life Magazine; but only one crewmember made it out of a forward window.

As I mentioned above, my crew was not without Khe Sanh experience before the day that has kept so much of this era vivid in my memory. We had flown Air-land missions into Khe Sanh in August and December of 1967, and had made four heavy equipment airdrops at an outpost (Lang Vie) west of Khe Sanh. The materials we airdropped there were used to build a bunker which enabled the unit to survive a subsequent armored attack and make it back to Khe Sanh during the initial phase of the siege. We also made GCA-guided, CDS airdrops to the Khe Sanh DZ during the siege.

As I recall, the weather at Khe Sanh on this Leap Year day was about 4,000 foot overcast with good visibility. We broke out several miles east of the field with a clear view of something that looked to be out of a movie set. There was smoke in several locations from incoming ordinance, pieces of this and that here and there, a badly damaged C-123 along side the runway and another on the runway. There were also people shooting at us from off the east side of the field. The tower said it would be a few minutes before the C-123 would be clear of the runway and we would have to go around.

As we were making the go-around, we were still taking hits from the ground fire. I tried as much evasive maneuvering as possible as I pulled up to the right. The field was under attack, the runway was blocked and we had unknown battle damage. No one would have faulted us for aborting the mission at that point. But a quick query of my crew showed that they still wanted to try to land and off-load as much as I did. So we came around again on a steep approach with a lot of side slipping to attempt to get the folks shooting at us to aim at where they thought we were going as opposed to our actual flight path.

This worked somewhat and we made it to touchdown on the runway end where I applied full reverse and stomped on the anti-skid braking in order to make the mid-field turnoff into the off-load ramp. Everything at Khe Sanh sloped uphill from east to west so that all that had to be done in the off-load area was for the loadmaster to open the aft ramp and door and pull the emergency cargo release handle while the pilot taxied out from under the palletized load.

As I turned into the ramp, I saw a Marine motioning us towards him. I was distracted by something (I think it was noticing our Cargo Door Open light coming on) and looked away from him momentarily. As I looked back, all I saw was a large explosion just in front and on the left side of the aircraft, which rocked the aircraft to the right. Stunned, I instinctively made a quick inventory of my personal parts, glanced over my shoulder at my crew and made a quick scan of the engine instruments; everything appeared OK and then I thought, "Oh shit, that Marine." I looked out to the left and, as the smoke cleared a little, on the other side of a newly formed 10 to 12-foot wide crater a foot or two deep in the ramp (more than likely from a 122mm rocket) was that Marine giving us the "get that mortar magnet out of here" wave-off. He must have heard or seen the incoming rocket and dove for cover behind one of the metal Conex Containers along the ramp.

That seemed like good advice since more incoming could be on the way and they seemed to have us pretty well zeroed in. I taxied onto the west end of the runway and advanced power to the BTTW position. Somewhere in all this our loadmaster got the ramp and door closed and I elected to accelerate in ground effect and fly off the east end of the field at brushing-the-tree-top level, dropping down into the valley to the east and getting out of the immediate area before climbing out. I guess this tactic worked, since we didn't feel ourselves taking any more hits. However, while beginning the climb-out I discovered that I couldn't get nose-up elevator control much beyond neutral.

We set up a long straight-in approach for a landing to the south back at Da Nang using trim, flaps and power to help with pitch control and made an uneventful landing. Post-flight inspection revealed evidence of a fire in the right aux tank and lots of holes. One of our maintenance officers later gave me a note listing 104 hits in the aircraft.

Air-land operations were once again suspended at Khe Sanh, but a successful Air Drop/Extraction program continued until the siege was finally broken.

The DFC I received for flying this mission did not mean as much to me as another medal I received for that mission, even though it ranked below the DFC. The 3rd Marine Division took the time to find the names of other service members who had been on the ground at Khe Sanh during the siege and allowed us to share the Navy Presidential Unit Citation, which the Division was awarded. Wow, a Navy medal for a "Blue Suiter."

I transitioned to the C-130A model and flew another Southeast Asia tour out of Naha AB, Okinawa. And by the end of the Vietnam War I had flown in 9 of the 11 Air Campaigns into which the conflict was divided. But every Leap Year day since then (and 2008 is the 10th since 1968) my thoughts go back to the 3rd Marine Division and the siege of Khe Sanh.

On the 40th Anniversary of the start of the siege of Khe Sanh Chuck Garrior submitted this speech to his local newspaper,. He also supplied Photographs from Khe Sanh.

Today, January 21, 2008, marks the 40th anniversary of the start of the Siege of Khe Sanh in South Vietnam and the TET 68 Offensive. Unlike the 40th anniversary of D-Day at Omaha and Utah Beaches where the Presidents of the Unites States and France speeches were noted around the world, I fear this date will past in history without the same fanfare.

The 77 day siege and the other major TET 68 battles for the Cities of South Vietnam were victories for the US Military at a heavy cost of life and many thousands wounded. Some of these wounded are today still carrying the scars and memories of these battles on a daily basis. The Siege of Khe Sanh was fought by the Marines with support from the Navy Corpsmen (Field Medics) and Seabees, plus the airlift and B-52 Arc Light bombing missions of the USAF. There was also close air support by the USAF, Navy and Marines. It was not a pleasant experience to be on the receiving end of day after day heavy incoming rounds number in the hundreds or better than a thousand, Everyone's primary worry was to hoping one of the rounds didn't have your name on it. Incoming rounds were serious business, but to have a sniper round miss you by a few inches could make you very uneasy you for a quite a while.

The North Vietnamese military commander, General Giap recently stated in his book that his army of soldiers was signifantly defeated by the pressures brought to bare by the US Military. He was just about to sue for peace when he saw hundreds of thousands demonstrators in the streets in cities across the United States. He also knew that Uncle Walter "C" on the CBS Nightly News told the home front we had lost the war. General Giap then knew that he still could win as long as the United States was a divided country. General Giap just waited for thing to go his way.

When the Marines, Soldiers, Airmen, and Sailors came home in 1966-1973 there were no welcome home speeches or parades. Today if you see a Vietnam veteran take the time to tell them "THANKS" for your service to your country, even if it is 40 years late.

COUNTER MORTAR RADAR AT KHE SANH

By Richard McCullough

On the morning of 22 Jan 1968, the US Army field artillery detachment (radar), 1st battalion 40th artillery was located at C-1 just south of Gio Lin, when we were notified of a movement. We were instructed to move to Dong Ha. A couple hours later the battalion radar officer showed up and informed us that a helicopters would be arriving shortly to airlift us to Khe Sanh. Our radar was slung beneath a CH-53 and we hopped aboard.

We arrived at Khe Sanh around 1400 hrs, There was nobody around the airfield. I had my guys get into the trenches until I could find somebody from the 13th artillery. I found my way to the COC and met Lt/Col Hennelly the arty commander. He arranged for a truck to get our radar moved off the airfield and we set up the radar in the 13th arty motor transportation area. Our 2nd helicopter arrived with our jeep and trailer with a generator and spare parts. We had the radar up and running within hours. It was time to sand bag the radar, luckly we were given ammo boxes to fill instead of sand bags.

We were housed with Gunny Drakes mortar section, and my guys helped then when they could. We shared everything together. On the second night, we could hear a special forces team in Laos requesting an air strike on an NVA convoy, which they did not receive. The next morning I went to the daily briefing at the COC. We did learn that a air strike was later made on the empty convoy going back north.

After the briefing, Col Lownds took me aside and introduced me to Major Hudson and Capt Baig so they could give me enemy weapons locations that they knew about. Capt Baig informed me that he was expecting a rocket attack out of the north. I went back to our radar and briefed my guys on what to expect. A couple hours later we got hit with about 200 rounds, we tried to call in weapons locations on our PRC-25 radio, but it turned out, other radio antennas were down and only a few forward observers were left on the net, so we both had no luck talking to the guns that afternoon.

With the attack over, it was time for us to move our radar console into a fox hole. This was no fun with the Khe Sanh hard dirt, but we got it done. The FCC had the wire team install a hot line to the radar.

I instructed my guys to switch over to the radio if the land lines went down. I can't say enough about the wire teams that repaired the lines during the attacks. They took their share of casualties. As we were situated at the NW end of the runway, we could watch the planes land and the pilots taking pictures with their cameras until the motor rounds starting landing off their wing tips. They dropped their cameras and took off, I have seen foot lockers and helmets come off the tailgate on take off, but never a body.

I remember when one of Gunny Drakes guys time was up and the gunny had to go with him to bring back his flak jacket and helmet, he only did that once. Our seven man detachment, and the mortar crews shared everything, especially when our battalion courier arrived with spare parts. My boss, Major Thomas always sent loafs of bread and a couple cases of beer. The engineers were next to us and I also became close with them. I remember the time Bill Gay got wounded when the female French reporter didn't get in the bunker quick enough. Actually we were close with everyone around us. We even went to the drop zone with the mortar crews to help them unload supplies.

We had the army riggers from 109th QRTRMSTR and even stars and stripes reporters stayed with us for a couple of days. Our detachment was given a letter from the 26th marines for outstanding performance of duty on 4-5 Feb 68. Our seven man detachment stayed the whole time of the siege and later moved to Quang Tri with the 1/13th arty. Lt/Col Hennelly came down to our radar every morning to see how we were doing. During our stay, we appreciated all the support we got from the Marines. Cannot say enough for mortar battery who were always ready to shoot fire missions when we called them in. Especially when we had aircraft in the area and we couldn't get artillery fire missions. The USA 238th field artillery detachment received the following awards for our service at Khe Sanh:

SP5 Patrick Harrington, Bronze Star for Valor
SP5 Patrick Odgen, Purple Heart
SSG Richard McCullough, Army Commendation for Valor.

1. The following message from the Commanding Officer, 26th Marines to the Commanding General, 3d Marine Division has been brought to my attention:

"1. Request you pass to the 1st Bn, 40th Arty our most sincere appreciation for the outstanding performance of duty of the 238th Field Artillery Radar Detachment this location during the night of [illegible] Feb 68.

"2. Weather prevented OP's from determining azimuths to rocket/mortar sites thereby eliminating the possibility of obtaining a grid intersection. By their aggressive search operations they were able to track and plot some fifteen active mortar and rocket sites providing extremely accurate data for arty suppression fires, thus contributing significantly to breaking the enemy attacks with minimum friendly casualties."

2. I add my commendation to that of the Commanding Officer, 26th Marines for this example of outstanding professional competence. Performance of this caliber, under unusually adverse conditions, not only contributes immeasurably to our success in combat but adds to the high esteem in which Army artillerymen are held by the Marine Corps.

THE GENERAL of VAL VERDE

By Bill Sonjag
Feature Writer

From the small back yard of his comfortable home, high on the bluffs overlooking the Devils River, Maj. Gen. Gerry Prather (USAF, retired) enjoys the tranquility of cactus gardening, bird feeding, and people watching on boats below. His hours of serenity on the desert high above Lake Amistad are limited by Prather's hectic, self-imposed schedule of public service.

"God has blessed me with a good personality. I smile a lot, and get along well with people." Maj. Gen. Gerald Prather (U.S. Air Force, retired) understates the impact he's had on those around him in his fruitful and gratifying 73 years. Prather is well-known in nearly all Del Rio civic, military and business circles, but only a fortunate few have come to understand the vast career foundation of his military success. Fewer still may appreciate those underpinnings as the source of Prather's contributions to the community which he and his wife, Carolyn, chose for their final approach and landing in 1986. Before he completed his 32 years of service to the U.S. Air Force, Prather was honored with a Bronze Star Medal with "V" device, the Distinguished Flying Cross, and an ascent through ranks from airman first class to major general in record time. Since his retirement, Prather continues to serve and be honored for his leadership. But his story begins in a one-bedroom tarpaper shack in the stubborn, red clay of Troup County, Georgia.

His first recollection of home was outdoor privies, heating and cooking over coal in a pot-bellied stove, going barefoot all summer, and getting a fresh, single pair of shoes at the beginning of each school year. The Prather home – sited inconspicuously behind his step-grandfather's house in La Grange – was barely a rifle shot from the Chattahoochee River where it wends south to become the border between Alabama and Georgia.

One of Prather's prized memories is this portrait sent to his father, Pate Prather, from his training days at Hondo Air Base in the U.S. Air Force Aviation Cadet Training Program. There, Prather trained in the same type of aircraft, the AT-6 "Texan" used by the namesake of Laughlin Air Force Base, Jack Laughlin, a decade after Laughlin went down in the Pacific during World War II. (Contributed photo/ Gerald Prather)

Prather pauses to recall the details of his C-130 "Hercules" combat supply missions in Vietnam, discussing his 13 months in service during the heat of that conflict, 1967-1968. Prather was awarded both the Bronze Star and the Distinguished Flying Cross for his bravery and skills before he returned to the United States with the rank of major.

A crisp, confident Capt. Gerald Prather pauses for a snapshot on entry to his C-130 "Hercules" cargo and tactical airlift plane at Ton Son Nhut Air Base, Saigon. "I think this was just before a mission," Prather said. "I look too clean here for it to be afterwards."

"A friend of mine at Khe Sanh shot this while I was dropping supplies to the base. This is my aircraft, but I don't remember what the cargo was. It was taken in 1967 on a mission when we didn't have time or safe enough conditions to land there," Prather said.

Pate Prather strove to keep his family clothed and fed, but with a fourth grade education, he jumped from meat packing to automotive repairs, and finally to the mills. Cotton was still king in Georgia, just as sheep were the four-legged monarchs of south Texas, and Gerald remembers his dad starting as a weaver, tending the shuttles and bobbins of Callaway Mills, while his mother, Hazel Belle, spun cotton in the same plant. "My great grandparents were Creek Indians, and my grandfather died in the 1920s, plunging the family into poverty. My folks married when they were very young, and my mother only went through the seventh grade. We lived in pretty sparse conditions," Prather recalled. "But we didn't even know we were struggling." He is the eldest of four children of Pate and Hazel Belle Prather.

The Prather's moved to a slightly larger house on Orchard Hill, where Pate had long walks to work at the mills, next to a four-acre farm from which Gerald rode a plow mule to school, and climbed trees to catch 'possums to sell for a quarter apiece. When he was in the fourth grade, the family moved to Murphy Avenue in town, and stayed put until he graduated from high school. "My teacher told mom I wasn't doing well, so she sat me down in the kitchen with the multiplication tables and said if I moved from there, she'd get the biggest peach tree switch I'd ever seen. So, I became kind of a math whiz," Prather said, chuckling at the memory and how it sounded when he talked about it. In high school, Prather was center for The Grangers, wearing blue-and-white football jerseys, played trumpet, French horn, trombone, baritone and base in the band, "And I wrote the school song which they still sing today," Prather laughed. He was class president in both his junior and senior years, and won a Callaway Mills music scholarship to Oglethorpe University, Atlanta.

But the scholarship had strings. Parents had to work at the mills, so when Prather's parents divorced, he lost the scholarship. "But I stayed busy all the time. I've always lived by the words of Charles Wendt. 'Success in life is not so much a matter of talent or opportunity as of concentration and perseverance,'" Prather said, adding, "...and damned hard work." So, he sold insurance, waited tables until, "One day a buddy of mine drove by and said he was going down Valdosta to take a test to see if he could be a pilot in the Air Force. Well, I'd never even seen an airplane. It was 1953, 1954, Korean War time, and I was invited to take the aviation cadet test, an all day battery. It wrung us out."

Brig. Gen. Gerald Prather, en-route to a combat communications exercise at Mildenhall England, flew several British officers and a couple of his own junior officers in a Royal Air Force helicopter. "All I remember was that when we got there it was cold, raining and snowing," Prather said, adding that, though a British officer was co-pilot, he flew the bird himself to Mildenhall. He waited half an hour for the results with 40 other boys. On a list of 10 that passed the Aviation Cadet test, Prather was included, his friend was not. "He was pretty torqued about that," Prather said. At the age of 19, and with only a year of college under his belt, Prather enlisted in Atlanta and was sent immediately to Lackland Air Force Base, San Antonio, for basic training. It was his first trip exceeding 75 miles from home.

He got his airman first class stripe, was sent to Goodfellow Air Force Base, near San Angelo to help maintain the B-25 Mitchell "Heavenly Body" fleet there. Then, back to Lackland for pre-cadet training. "I liked it. They gave us a place to sleep, clothes to wear, food to eat, and $40 every two weeks," Prather said with a chuckle. Then, Prather began a seeming unending series of training assignments for a phenomenal range of kinds of aircraft, beginning with the AT-6 "Texan" trainer at Hondo Air Base, followed by the T-33 "T-Bird" at Laughlin Air Force Base. Here he met Carolyn, only three weeks before graduation, and things got serious quickly. At his 1956 graduation from Aviation Cadet pilot training, on Laughlin's flight line, Prather's mother pinned on his new rank insignia, and Carolyn pinned on his silver pilot's wings. "First thing a new 2nd lieutenant does is buy a new car, and I bought a two-tone green, 1956 Pontiac for $3,200, and I proposed to Carolyn in it on a hill overlooking Lake Walk [smaller lake inundated 13 years later by Lake Amistad]," Prather said. "I told her I'd probably be dead before I turned 26 because I intended to be a fighter pilot." Also on her mind was the lifestyle of fighter pilots as "hard-drinking, hard-living, hard-working, risk-taking, where every man was a tiger."

While stationed at MacDill Air Force Base, Fla., Brig. Gen. Prather was keenly aware that many troops in the U.S. Readiness Command were airborne qualified, so, at the age of 45, he took a few weeks to go to Fort Lee, Va. to learn parachuting. He also packed his own parachutes, and graduated – seen here – with three enlisted men, a lieutenant and two majors, Oct. 24, 1980. Then came F-84 fighter training at Luke Air Force Base, Ariz. The nickname of the single-seat, swept-wing beast was "Thunderjet," but Prather and his comrades called it "a ground-loving whore," an indictment of the jet's legendary heavy weight and poor engine thrust. "But I was a damned good pilot, and could make just about anything fly. And I still can. That served me well, and has kept me alive," said Prather. Carolyn took a train to meet him at Luke and they were married in November, 1956, at the base chapel. He had no money at the time, so Carolyn bought the Arizona marriage license. After a three month temporary duty assignment, island-hopping an F-84 across the Atlantic to Avino, Italy, Prather came home and learned to fly the country's first supersonic fighter, the F-100 "Super Sabre." But not for long. With the close of the Korean War and increasing tensions with the Soviet Union, different kinds of pilots were needed, and Prather and his F-100 buddies were assigned to B-52 crews at Mather Air Force Base, Calif. Expecting to be stuck on a ground radar assignment, Prather was pleased when he ended up in the cockpit, first as a co-pilot, then as a pilot and finally as aircraft commander.

Was the transition from a sleek, fast fighter to a monster bomber daunting? "Absolutely!" Prather exclaimed. "It scared the hell out of me!" Moreover, the big bombers carried massive ordnance. "This was Cold War time, and any one of them could have won a war if they got through. They were loaded for bear," Prather said. But high-altitude patrolling was the mission. The 24-hour patrols took Prather and his crew from California to New York, then to Greenland, the North Pole, down to Alaska, across the Aleutian Island chain, and along coast of Washington and Oregon, and back to Mather in California.

Prather points with pride to his diploma from the Air Force Technical Institute, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio, graduating with a Master of Science degree in electronics and communications that set the course of his career in re-engineering the entire Air Force communications systems with integration of all data automation components. By 1961, Prather was aircraft commander, then his was a "lead crew," next a "select" crew in the top 10 percent of the hierarchy of the Strategic Air Command (SAC). He was eligible for the rank of major, but spurned it so he could return – with Air Force tuition – to Auburn University. He finished his electrical engineering degree in two years, graduating in 1966. Though he hoped to get back to fighters – specifically the F-4 "Phantom," Prather ended up in the C-130 "Hercules," a four-engine turboprop cargo and tactical airlifter.

In 1967, he began flying combat support missions in Vietnam. "I flew everything from lettuce to ice, fuel in big bladders, ammunition from Da Nang, Saigon and Plei Ku to Khe Sanh and little bitty airstrips all over South Vietnam," Prather said. He was awarded the Bronze Star with a "V" device (for valor) during the infamous 1968 Tet Offensive. At Tan Son Nhut Air Base, near Saigon, rows of aircraft became vulnerable to incoming mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and rockets. A C-130 took a direct hit, and Prather, under fire, scrambled to the flight line to move adjacent aircraft from the threat of fire.

Prather's medals were assembled for him for presentation when he was awarded the Order of the Sword, Oct. 17, 1986, by the enlisted men and women in his last unit, the Air Force Communications Command. Two medals he values highly include the Distinguished Flying Cross, third from left, top row, and the Bronze Star with "V" (Valor) device, just below the DFC medal.

In the chaos of incoming ordnance, a fire extinguisher was dropped, exploding in Prather's face. He was hustled away and irrigated with water. "They saved my eyes, but not my skin, so they took me to a hospital, but there I saw all the seriously wounded being brought in and I just walked right back out. Those guys were in much worse shape." He was then sent to Cam Ranh Bay, setting up operations centers and briefing rooms for three days with no sleep. Finally a lieutenant colonel ordered him to bed, threatening court martial if he refused.

Later in 1968, Prather ferried fresh marines and ammunition from Phan Rang to Tam Ky, a marine-controlled village south of Da Nang, along the coast of the South China Sea. The marines on the ground and nearby Army units were under attack, and badly needed the re-supply, but they and the landing strip were concealed under dense cloud cover. Prather flew out to sea to descend below the clouds, and then flew back to the marines underneath the overcast receiving small arms fire. "I was hearing this 'thump, thump … thump,' and heard another pilot scream, 'I'm getting fired on,'" Prather said.

Prather verbally guided the other pilot into Tam Ky, then followed using the same procedure. On landing, his flight engineer pointed out dripping holes in the bird's fuel tank, and Prather ordered them jammed with segments of carved broom sticks. Prather's plane and the other craft, also with plugged holes, sustained more hits on takeoff. Landing in Saigon, both aircraft were pulled aside for repairs. Prather's plane had taken 48 hits. "And no one was hurt. Isn't that wonderful?" Prather enthused. For this successful mission, ingenuity and bravado, Prather received the Distinguished Flying Cross, awarded for "Heroism or extraordinary achievement … in aerial flight." "But my favorite mission, was one to Khe Sanh during monsoons after the Tet Offensive of 1968. No one could get in there because of the clouds, but I finally found a little hole in the clouds one day, and dropped through it with re-supply of ammunition," Prather recalled. Hoping for a quick exit, he ordered the cargo kicked out the back door, but got a message from his loadmaster. "We've got a problem back here, Boss. I've got a load of 100 marines back here packed and ready to go." The war-weary troops had scrambled aboard before the cargo door could be closed. "Our authorized load was about 60, but these guys were all red with mud, so we just jammed them in there and took off anyway. And I'd do it again," said Prather.

Maj. Gen. Gerald Prather, in "mess dress" uniform, and Mrs. Carolyn Prather pause for a portrait during an annual, formal Christmas dinner for all officers and their wives and senior leaders in the community at Scott Air Force Base, Ill., about 1985. "The missions I hated the most over there were carrying out the body bags. With a lot, all you can do is stack them up like cordwood, and their body fluids are leaking onto the airplane, and the stench was horrible because the bags had been lying out in the sun for who knows how long. When you're carrying 50 or 60 KIAs out at one time, it's just bad news all the way around," Prather said, eyes moistening. Prather flew 500 support missions in Vietnam in the C-130, commenting, "And none of them were routine." Pinning on the brass oak leaves insignia of major, he returned to the United States, after 13 months "in country" in July, 1968.

Back-to-back directed assignments were to commands of communication squadrons at Chanute Air Force Base and Scott Air Force Base, both in Illinois. "When people ask how I got into the communications business, I say, 'I don't know, can't even spell it," Prather quipped. In truth, his degree in electrical engineering and an Air Force on the threshold of sweeping, global changes in communications technology forecast the marriage. Promoted to lieutenant colonel a year earlier than protocol permitted, Prather was sent back to school, to the Air Force Institute of Technology, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio. In less than a year, Prather completed his Master of Science degree with a thesis on communications electronics meteorological program management, for which he received the Commandant's Trophy because it revealed systemic efficiencies that could actually be implemented, Air Force wide.

With the Strategic Air Command at March Air Force Base, Calif., a trio of colonels interviewed Prather and asked, bluntly, "Do you want to make general?" to which Prather – shocked – replied, "Yes, I think I'd make a good general." He was promoted to colonel – seven years ahead of the norm – and was reassigned to Air Force offices in the Pentagon. "So I went to Washington D.C. in 1972 with my wife, four kids, a dog, and a cat. I'm just a little country boy trying to get along in the big city, and I was a little nervous. They called me up there to implement my thesis," Prather explained.

Maj. Gen. Prather at his desk in the Pentagon, serving as assistant chief of staff of Air Force informa tion systems in which he planned and merged all communications and data automation systems for the service. "It was an extremely challenging job for three years, developing the first satellite communication systems for the Air Force. For example, we needed to be able to send code words during the Cold War to all the B-52s flying, and we had to have cryptographic security for all the communication systems, from telephones to the satellites." At Offutt Air Force Base, Omaha, Neb., Prather went underground. In the command post beneath SAC headquarters, Prather was deputy chief of staff for communications and electronics, always in communication with – and sometimes riding in – a command-post-modified KC-135 "Stratotanker," always airborne to take over command of SAC if nuclear war destroyed the base. For his work in support of below-ground missile bases scattered in remote locations across the northern tier of states, Prather was awarded the Minuteman Missile Badge. Prather became first commander of a Strategic Communications Area – 1975-1977 – then transferred to Ramstein Air Base, Germany, as deputy chief of staff for U.S. Air Force Europe (USAFE), in charge of all communications in European and Mediterranean countries – 1977-1980 – and was promoted to brigadier general in 1979.

Prather's official U.S. Air Force portrait following the 1983 announcement of his rank as major general. In 1980, Prather left Germany for MacDill Air Force Base, Florida, becoming the senior communications officer for the U.S. Readiness Command – now U.S. Central Command, CENTCOM, running the wars in the Middle East – in which he developed the first war plans for an invasion of Iraq. "We also had plans for invasion of all the Middle Eastern countries to respond to any tactical needs that may arise there where we have potential for certain levels of conflict; they've all been modified many times, but we began the planning back then," Prather explained. At MacDill, Prather received the Defense Meritorious Service Medal.

Back to the Pentagon in 1981 with broadened communications responsibilities, Prather was awarded his second star (1983), and ordered to implement his plan to merge all Air Force communications and data automations functions throughout the service. He was named assistant chief of staff of information systems. Two years later, Prather was moved into the top slot of his career, commander of the Air Force Communications Command, assigned at Scott Air Force Base, Ill. Here he was leader of one of the most pivotal organizational transitions in the history of the Air Force, and oversaw an immense command of 60,000 people in 747 units, squadrons and wings. "The communications command is still everyplace the Air Force is, and a whole lot of places the Air Force isn't," Prather said with a wink. In 1986, Prather retired, closing out a 32-year, immensely gratifying and productive career. "They wanted me to go back to Washington for a third star [lieutenant general] and another five years, but I just didn't want to go back to that political environment, and we were tired," Prather said. "The kids call Del Rio home, and I love the people here. I don't regret a bit of it." But his troops wouldn't let Prather slip away easily. NCOs in his last command started a petition among 50,000 enlisted personnel in the communications command, worldwide, to honor Prather with the Order of the Sword, a commendation from the enlisted ranks for service rendered in a distinguished career. "Chief Master Sgt. Jeremiah T. Hayes started a petition before I even left, and I knew nothing about it. It's a thing where all the enlisted personnel have to sign the petition or at least not say 'No.' Even a single blackball kills it," Prather explained.

There was no blackball, only overwhelming support from the enlisted ranks, and the sponsors bought airline tickets for the Prather's to return to Scott on Oct. 17, 1986 for the presentation. "They reserved the entire officers' club, and it was completely full of visiting troops who put on a show that watered my eyes, literally," Prather said. "It was an absolutely beautiful, formal military ceremony." In the history of the Order of the Sword, only 226 men and women have been selected, including comedian Bob Hope, Gen. Curtis LeMay, and Secretary of Defense Casper Weinberger. Prather was number 111. When he moved to Del Rio, he was immediately hired as a defense contractor's consultant, and was traveling more than he wanted. He launched a second career in civic service to an imponderable list of organizations, all aimed at improving the community of Del

Rio in a dazzling variety of tasks. At the behest of Val Verde County Commissioner James S. Leonard, Prather became Precinct 3 Justice of the Peace, serving for a decade. He created the Justice Juvenile Court with the help of Administrative Assistant Otila Gonzalez. In the first year, he heard 401 juvenile cases, requiring the participation of parents or guardians. In 1997, Prather was elected president of the Del Rio Chamber of Commerce, and he remains an active life member of the board of directors. He also participates on the Convention and Visitors Bureau committee and the Special Projects Committee of the chamber, and is also a life director and vice president of the Military Affairs Association.

In the 1990s, Prather was on the board of the United Way, and was president for two years. He is Eagle Scout advancement chairman for the Amistad District of the Boy Scouts of America and was district chairman for three years. Prather has been a member of Lions Clubs for 50 years, has served here as vice president of the Host Lions Club, and still serves as chaplain. Ordained as a lay Eucharistic minister, Prather served in that capacity with St. James Episcopal Church for three years, as senior warden of the vestry for three years, and as a trustee for five years. He was also a chaplain for the Juvenile Detention Center, 1994-2005, and continues as chaplain at Val Verde Regional Medical Center. "My philosophy has not been to seek employment, but to seek service to the community. The major result, of course, is that I know almost everyone in this community, and they know me, and I pride myself on that," Prather said. His pride extends to continuing warm relationships with Laughlin Air Force Base, including the last 15 commanders of the 47th Flying Training Wing. Brig. Gen. Tod D. Wolters, commander of 325th Fighter Wing, Tyndall Air Force Base, Fla., and Prather were good friends when Wolters commanded here at Laughlin, 2004-2006. "Tod used to call me the secretary of defense of west Texas," Prather said, chuckling.

Though Prather is gratified about his service to youth in Del Rio with the juvenile court system, ROTC at Del Rio High School, and the Boy Scouts, the military man will not let go. He serves now on the board of directors of the Laughlin Heritage Foundation, and remains available for military service if needed. Though retired, Prather is never completely off the hook if his nation needs

A COMBAT STORY

By Lt/Col C.T. Anthony

As I sat there on Christmas Day 2007, I couldn't help but recall Christmas celebrations of the past. I'm sure that you do the same. Many bring back very pleasant memories and others, maybe not so good. One Christmas which always comes to mind for me is Christmas, 1966.

The date, December 24, 1966. As a Staff Sergeant 0369, I had recently arrived in Vietnam and was assigned to Delta Co. 1/26 which at that time was operating off of Hill 55 southwest of Danang. The Company was short of Lieutenants so I was assigned as Platoon Leader for the 1st Platoon. My Platoon Sergeant was a Sergeant with lots of experience in Vietnam and the Marine Corps. He had almost as much time in the Corps as I had but was not what you would call a "garrison Marine". He had been busted a couple of times for relatively minor offenses but was an outstanding combat leader.

On Christmas Eve, my platoon was given the mission of setting up ambushes on Liberty Road to prevent the VC from laying mines and planting booby traps. There was supposed to be some type of truce in effect but the VC still placed mines and booby traps out regardless of any truce. This would be my first time to take the platoon out as their leader and to say the least, I was a little nervous and apprehensive. I didn't really think that we would see any real action but the thought was still on my mind as to how I would react if we did encounter the enemy. I had been in the Corps for a little over 12 years and although I had extensive experience in the infantry field, those were years of relative peace. I had never experienced any type of actual combat. Yes, I had been on many live fire ranges where we did a lot of firing of various weapons but never had I been on the receiving end of enemy fire. I had heard of how others had reacted, some very bravely and others, totally terrified. As leader of the platoon, I hoped that I wouldn't be one of the latter.

Around 2000 hrs, we left the Hill and were about 500 yards from the Hill on Liberty Road when we received automatic fire from a small village to the west of the road. With columns on both sides of the road and well spread out, two Marines were still wounded. Needless to say, when the initial rounds came into our formation, my ass puckered but I was happy to find out that the training I had received allowed me to automatically react as I had been trained to do. Sure there was a certain amount of fright but this didn't keep me from doing what needed to be done. I passed the first test. A great feeling. The automatic fire stopped after we returned fire with our own weapons as well 81MM mortar fire which because there had been problems in that area before, were ready to respond as soon as we made the call for support. We evacuated our wounded back to the Hill then continued to move down the road where we then set in our ambushes. We never received any more fire that night nor did we see any of the VC. It rained all night and with just a poncho to try and stay dry and warm, made for a miserable evening. That was how we welcomed Christmas, 1966. In the morning, we hiked back to Hill 55 and spent the day there cleaning our gear, getting some rest and wishing each other a Merry Christmas. No snow but lots of rain.

That also was my introduction to leading a platoon in combat. I was happy with the way that I had reacted but happier with the Marines in the platoon. Many of them had been in Country for some time and had lots of combat experience. They knew exactly what to do. In fact, several of them were combat tested vets of Operation Hastings, the first major Marine Corps operation conducted in the fall of 1966 in the DMZ area, so to them, taking just a few rounds of incoming fire was not a big thing. "Pineapple", my Platoon Sergeant, was so calm I don't think he even hit the deck when the rounds were coming into our position. I can't say that I did the same. That also was my introduction to the frustrations of fighting the VC in the area of Hill 55. Lots of planted mines, booby traps and hit and run tactics with seldom ever having the chance to really engage the enemy. It seemed that every time we went out on patrol we suffered casualties of some type to either enemy fire, booby traps or mines and most times, never saw the enemy. For me it was very frustrating and seemed like a hell of a way to fight a war. They were like an invisible enemy.

So as we take time to celebrate Christmas, this is also a time to remember those service men and women of all wars not here to celebrate with us, but especially those with whom we fought. For many Marines and other service personnel serving in Vietnam on December 25, that Christmas of 1966 would be the last Christmas they would ever know. They gave all while fighting a War that they didn't fully understand or maybe didn't even agree with, but still continued to serve their Country with pride. The question that haunts those of us who survived that War is why them and not us? Such a question doesn't really have an answer but haunts all survivors of war.

I know that each of you have your own stories and memories but I just wanted to share this one with you. This is special to me.

To all, have a very Merry Christmas and a Happy, Healthy New Year. Continue to pray for and remember those on the frontlines of defending our great Country. They too will have their own special memories of their Christmas of 2007.

BATTLES REMEMBERED

FOXTROT RIDGE

By Captain Rob Robinson

A narrow ridgeline 1,000 feet high, just south of the DMZ, now has a name. FOXTROT RIDGE. Until a company of US Marines moved up onto the ridge in December it was just another unnamed hill. Overgrown with thick jungle. But the men of 2nd Battalion, Fourth Marines can tell you about it. And somewhere in the hellish green tangles on other DMZ ridge, elements of a battered NVA battalion can well remember it too.

Behind the Ridges new name came a tale of courage and grim determination

Waiting on the ridgeline Was an estimated company of fully-armed, well trained, hardcore NVA. They were prepared to defend a bunker complex housing their battalion headquarters: explained Lt. Col. Joseph C. Hopkins commanding officer of the Marine battalion. Crouched inside their bunkers with automatic weapons, the enemy had their orders. Defend the hill to the death was the plan, later revealed by a prisoner captured inside one of the bunkers.

Three days of sporadic fighting, constantly moving forward, had placed an infantry company by Captain Richard J. Murphy in a position atop a nearby mountain. We dug in for the night, put out our listening post, and all was quiet except for our Marine Mortars and artillery, firing to seal off possible avenues of enemy movements, " said Cpl Richard E Durkee, a radio operator." About 7:30 a.m. we started to move eastward along the ridge. The hilltop dropped of into a saddle and started up again toward another crest, said Durkee. "As soon as the point man reached the top and started down, the enemy took the lead element under fire."

The narrow trail with sheer cliffs on both sides, made it impossible for leathernecks to deploy immediately. They continued to press forward on the path, despite the enemy fire. "At first the firing came from several bunkers hidden among the trees on a slope halfway up the next hill, "added Durkee, who was on his second tour in Vietnam. The initial burst of fire subsided. Captain Murphy got his men on line with two platoons assaulting down into a draw and up towards the bunkers already observed. Murphy, who was due to leave Vietnam and return home the next day, alerted the Battalion commander by radio and began the attack. The foe waited.

When we got into the draw deep in a wooded area thick with jungle growth and vines, all hell broke loose, said Cpl Thomas L. Kilduff who was following the action and keeping abreast of it on the radio he carried. A machinegun immediately pinned down a squad on the left flank. On the other flank another gun opened fire, killing the platoon commander and pinning down the rest of the Marines, "Kilduff continued. " By that time it was 9:00 a.m. and the bullets were thicker than anything I had ever seen in my 12 months in Vietnam." Marines kept moving forward into the fire from the bunkers. A platoon was called up from another company and moved down the trail. They headed into the ravine to maneuver around the bunkers.

"They passed right by two enemy bunkers without, seeing them. They were just too well hidden," said Kilduff. The bunkers opened fire catching some of the men in crossfire. Back up on the' ridge, Marines quickly set up the machineguns and mortars to give covering fire to those in the draw.

"As the battle grew in intensity. Cpl. Durkee and two others made it down the trail and got to one of the enemy bunkers," added Kilduff. "Using the bunker for protection they fired at other bunkers below. Even while shooting, Durkee, who had been wounded in the hand continued to talk on the radio. He was concerned about his wounded buddies in the ravine and was trying to get them out

Hearing cries of the wounded below. Durkee radioed to a Marine twin engine Bronco circling overhead and called for the pilot to fire smoke rockets directly at his position to screen the wounded with thick smoke. Screaming in at treetop level, the Bronco pilot fired his rockets, the exploding rockets sending thick smoke in every direction. The wounded that could walk got up and started to help the others up the hill. Our gun had been fired so fast that it had burned out and we were out of ammunition. I radioed up to the crest and asked for another weapon and more ammo:'

While waiting for the ammo, Durkee threw grenades at several of the bunkers while other Marines rushed in to assist the wounded. Kilduff heard Durkee's call for ammunition and radioed him to "hang tight", a weapon and ammunition were on the way down to their position. Kilduff put down his radio and with two volunteers, 2nd Lt George B. Rogers, and L/Cpl John R. Donnley, ran to Durkee's position.

When they got there, Durkee was now firing at the enemy with his pistol. Lt Rogers after reaching Durkee's bunker dashed several times to the ravine to assist the wounded. One of the enemy soldiers who had been routed from his position managed to creep within 30 yards of Kilduff, Donnley and Durkee before opening fire on them. Donnley threw a grenade and killed him.

The wounded had all been removed from the ravine and Marine & Navy jets went into action, firing rockets and dropping their bombs just in front of the Marine advancing on the enemy bunkers. The Arial support was magnificent, the best we have ever seen, exclaimed Lt/Col Hopkins.

On some of their runs the pilots placed their ordinance only 50 yards ahead of our men. At times the Marines ran out of signaling devices and resorted to lighting heat tablets to mark their positions for the planes.

The ridge looked like a wild moonscape, with broken and charred trees, split by bullets and large pieces of shrapnel., giving silent evidence of the fierce battle that took place.

There are not enough words to describe the pride I felt for the men who took that ridge, concluded Lt/ Col Hopkins.

The Marines left the ridge with 3,000 enemy uniforms, 2,000 pounds of Rice, a complete enemy mortar, and enough ammunition and weapons to keep a NVA regiment from waging an all day battle. They also accounted for 46 Enemy dead.

Near Self-Destruction

By Gene Weresow

February 1967, Mike Company Third Battalion 26th Marines were on a search and destroy mission, as a part of Operation Chinook. We were operating near the Co Bi-Than Tan Corridor of the Thua Thien Province South Vietnam. Only weeks before, Company M was engaged in one of the first battles against the 802nd Viet Cong Battalion. Which saw the death of Marine Lance Corporal Paul Evans, KIA firing the 3.5 rocket launcher, while he repeatedly exposed himself to enemy fire. Camp Evans was later named in his honor. It was initially a Marine base later taken over by the Army.

On this day the monsoon rains fell relentlessly. It seemed the more miserable we became the more the rain fell. It was our job to sweep a certain area to clear it of VC activity. The sweep started out routine, with no contact. As the day progressed we were subjected to more and more sniper fire. Later we were to sweep through a Hamlet that was suspected of harboring VC. It was late in the day and we had little time to reach our objective before nightfall, some nameless hill where we would set into a defensive position for the night. Our progress was slow because of numerous booby traps that took their toll. We encountered every thing from punji traps to buried 105 MM rounds. It was at this time that we lost one of our M-60 gunners, L/Cpl David Frischmann, a good guy with a big heart; I knew him well, as I did other KIA and WIA from that day. His death stands out in my mind more than the others because I was very close to him when he set down his M-60 onto a rice patty dike. He hit a 105 round, the concussion sent me sprawling into the rice patty as I watched his charred remains sail over me. To my amazement I survived without a scratch. The image of those charred remains, of a friend and fellow warrior will be with me always.

Because of casualties and med evacs we were running further and further behind in reaching our objective for the day. Moving through the village we came upon a several underground shelters, not much more than a hole in the ground with room for maybe 2 or 3 people, I guess they were used by VC or the locals to avoid shelling or to hide from anyone who was perceived as enemies. The monsoon rains continued to fall; it was near dusk as we sloshed through the mud, clad in ponchos which did little to keep us dry. I came across one of those holes in the ground as I looked down I could see a small entrance with support timbers on either side. At this point rather than going down or doing further investigation, we were told to just throw a grenade into it and keep moving. Recalling my training, I figured I would wind up and throw it hard so that it would either bounce around or stick in the mud, not giving the enemy any time to pick it up and throw it back. Yelling "fire in the hole", I wound up and gave it a mighty heave. I watched the grenade fly down the hole, strike one of the supports and just as quickly fly right back out. Yelling grenade I started to run, tripped on the poncho and fell face first into the mud. I thought, oh no, I'm dead. Luckily there was no one else nearby. Thinking get up and run-no not enough time-so I buried my face in the mud and hoped for the best. The explosion was deafening but I survived unharmed. There was a lot of confusion from other guys thinking that we had an enemy throwing a grenade at us. Once I explained what happened I thought I was in a world of trouble, the platoon commander just said, lets move out. We did roll another grenade into the hole.

I often thought about that day, and wondered how many guys actually died by their own hand, I would guess that this experience was not unique in combat. It was one lesson learned the hard way. It was my first, but not my last, close encounter with a hand grenade.

SHORT ROUNDS

28-18-36

by Craig W. Tourte

I'm sure I have forgotten more than I remember. I can't remember the important stuff, let alone loads of useless information I have heard over the years. I can't remember my first wife's middle name or even when I married or divorced her. I can't even remember the date I married my current wife, but I do remember her middle name and I wrote down her birthday so I wouldn't forget.

I have moved around a lot over the years, throwing out junk and even stuff I didn't want to get rid of, but the EX got tired of seeing some of the stuff around the house and to avoid another argument I gave them a toss. I miss that little California flag I flew at Khe Sanh. It was a sorry little rag, full of shrapnel holes and red stained from the clay earth. For some reason I think about the little flag even to this day, I see it waving proudly in the fog, kind of lonely but bravely making a statement that American's are here. It all seems so long ago.

Before I went to Vietnam I put some little tokens in a box and kept them in the closet out in the garage at my aunt and uncles house. I'm not sure why I kept them, I guess at the time they seemed important to me, things I knew I'd never use again, but all the same, they had become a part of my life and the mere possession of them, picking them up, handling them brought back memories. These little trinkets were of no value really, just silly little things that were only important to me. When I'm gone whoever comes across them will have no idea of their value and meaning to me, it will all die with me, just as well I suppose. I'm sure they'll ask, "Why did he keep these?"

I came across a couple of those little useless items the other day. They were in a dusty box stuck way back in the corner. I didn't know what it was at first, until I opened the box up and saw them. I sat there for almost half an hour with tears running down my face for some reason; old man's sentiments I suppose. They brought me back to boot camp and platoon 1145 at MCRD San Diego. Mike Powers (D/1/26) and Bill Poland (HQ/1/13) were in my platoon and we all three served at Khe Sanh during the long bloody Siege 40 years ago.

One of the objects was the little red plastic shaving kit we'd carry to the showers. It had a small rip on one side but other than that it was in fairly good shape. The thin plastic isn't holding up well, but I think it'll survive what years I have left. It serves no purpose now, just a memory of those cold walks to the showers and the shouts of, "Hurry up recruits." The other object was a small combination lock that we placed on our footlockers. Some would forget to lock up and all of their belongings would be thrown on the deck by the drill instructor. I never forgot to lock mine; the punishment was much too severe. I learned quickly. I have not looked at, nor held that little combination lock since I got out of boot camp in 1966. I apparently packed it around during my various moves, and it was one my few possessions that survived my first marriage, but I didn't remember even having it. I certainly haven't spun the combination for over 42 years. I noticed how clean and shiny the chrome was as I picked it up and took it out of the old brown box. It looked as if it had been issued to me today, not 4 decades ago. I turned it over in my hands a couple of times, each turn in my hand was another memory as I gazed at the hard plastic combination dial. Without hesitation I quickly turned the dial, 28-18-36 and the little lock sprung opened; I guess there are just some things you never forget. Yep, that little lock opened up a lot of memories.

VOICE of THE TIMES
KSV In The News

Forty years ago a handful of United States Marines, Army, Navy and Air Force warriors spent more than 77 days defending a small set of outposts in northwest Vietnam. The place was Khe Sanh and the enemy was led by Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) commander who defeated the French at Dien Bien Phu. He had three divisions, with an estimated 30,000 troops to attack us at Khe Sanh.

Richard Dworsky I CO 3/26

The mission of India Co., Third Battalion 26th Marines, was to hold a Hill known as 881South and act as a combat outpost for the 26th Marines on the Khe Sanh plateau. When it appeared that the enemy was attempting to close on the hill, India requested and received permission to make a company reconnaissance-in-force north on Jan. 20, 1968. India, with more than 200 Marines and corpsmen, jumped off before dawn and before it had gone 1,000 yards, the 1st Platoon made heavy contact with a sizable NVA unit. There were several casualties, and the platoon consolidated its position, but the first helicopter sent to evacuate the casualties was shot down, crashing about 200 yards down the slope Another assault by the 3d Platoon succeeded in seizing the objective, but at high cost. Its lieutenant and several others were killed, and for a time the platoon held the hill against strong counterattacks, with a lance corporal in command.

At about this time, an NVA lieutenant surrendered to the Marines defending the base. He was immediately interrogated and reported that all outlying positions around the base would be attacked that night. India was consequently ordered to break contact immediately and return to its previous position. It arrived shortly after dark. That night, all outlying positions around the Khe Sanh Combat Base were assaulted except 881S. The force that had been designated to attack 881S had been met and mauled that afternoon and, having been located, was shelled throughout the night. Additionally, 881S provided more than 1,000 rounds of fire support to another hill that was attacked. That evening began the siege that lasted until April

In addition to standing watch, digging deeper trenches and fighting positions became the daily routine. The title of this column, "home is where you dig it," became the Khe Sanh motto. In some ways it was like trench warfare in World War 1. Lack of supplies, digging equipment, bunker material, constant battles with rats, rain and mud, cold, fog, and all under constant artillery, mortar and sniper fire and observation of the enemy seemed to be the order of the day. But, we were never outside the range of our own artillery support, air power and communications. Logistical support by air also became so hazardous that only the plight of the Marines and the president's order to "Hold Khe Sanh" could justify the terrible losses of aircraft encountered in resupply attempts Several C-130s and C-123s were destroyed on Khe Sanh's airstrip while attempting to bring in the supplies, but the enemy siege became so tight that C-130s were finally prevented from landing and were forced to resort to par dropping the supplies. This still did not solve the problem of re-supplying the ever-more-besieged outposts around Khe Sanh, where water and food became secondary to ammunition. Helicopters still had to brave the heavy mortar, artillery, rocket and automatic weapons fire to carry the critical supplies from Khe Sanh to the surrounding hilltop outposts. New delivery methods were designed.

Heroism was routine. The helicopter zones were always "hot." The enemy's weapon of choice to attack them was the 120mm mortar, which was always deadly. Most dangerous were the medical evacuation missions. It took time to carry badly wounded men from cover to the helicopter and then return to cover, and the mortar rounds were often already announced as being "on the way." Yet there was no occasion when men had to be ordered to carry stretchers. To the contrary, it was often necessary to restrain too many men from lending a hand and exposing themselves unnecessarily. Seven helicopters were shot down, yet we never called for a medevac that didn't come, weather permitting.

There was never a climactic day or event. Rather, from Jan. 21 through April 17, the threat to life and limb remained essentially unchanged. The dangers were greatest during helicopter operations because those offered the most lucrative targets to the enemy's gunners. The potential for catastrophe, however, was greatest at night or during the frequent foggy weather when we could not see to detect the enemy's approach or to bring our massive supporting fires to bear against him. That potential took a psychological as well as a physical toll. To stand in a trench for eight hours on a given night without relief, in total darkness, in a fog so thick that even a magnesium flare could not pierce it, all senses focused on detecting any sound, any smell, any hint of movement to the front. It was trying in the extreme to the Marine required to do it. To require all hands do so nightly for three months was to stretch the limits of resolve.

Forty-two Marines or Corpsmen died on or near the hill and nearly 200 were wounded, not including aviation casualties whose numbers, being reported separately, were unknown to us. Our commanding officer, Bill Dabney, noted that none of these losses occurred in a single pitched battle, but rather in discrete incidents scattered over the course of the siege. Incoming was constant, and although we learned to cope with it to a point, a lucky round in a trench line or active medevac zone was just as deadly in April as in January. Through it all, the troops did their duty. We stood our watches. Others flew their aircraft or serviced helicopter zones, manned outposts, engaged the enemy and raised the flag daily as zealously at the end as at the beginning. We were never asked to stand back-to-back against the flagpole with fixed bayonets, but rather to endure. By enduring, we triumphed.

I didn't pick the men I fought with but I have an attachment to them that cannot be described — and I have the same attachment to those who carry on today. Never have I given anyone the trust I gave these men. As William Manchester wrote after his fighting service at Okinawa, and after all these years, I also recognize that these men and women, and I mean all who served in Viet Nam from all branches of the services, in the end, didn't fight for their country, their government's mission and not even their branch of service but for each other. I salute those warriors of the past and those of today and I am proud to have been one of you.

Richard Dworsky. Ph.D., was a platoon commander with India Company on Hill 881S during the siege until he was wounded and medevaced. He has several decorations for bravery including a Bronze Star and Navy Commendation Medal and 3 purple hearts as a result of his tour in Viet Nam. He has lived and worked in Anchorage for almost 30 years.

Randy Worthley A Btry 1/13
Ralph Sargent Hq Btry 1/13

Randy Worthley took shrapnel in his neck and upper leg during heavy enemy shelling June 27, 1967, in Khe Sanh, Vietnam, which killed two of five fellow Marines assigned to a 105-millimeter howitzer. Today, some 40 years after the siege of Khe Sanh, Worthley, then a lance corporal, figures he made it out of Vietnam in pretty good shape, considering how many didn't come back alive.

He was treated in an underground hospital on the Marine base at Khe Sanh and returned to duty shortly thereafter. He said he still has nerve damage and lacks feeling in much of his thigh.

"I'd say I came out OK, physically," said Worthley, who received the Purple Heart. "It could have been a lot worse. We lost what, 58,000 there?"

Monday is the 40th anniversary of the start of the siege of Khe Sanh, in which about 6,000 Marines and other service members were cut off from ground support and held off persistent attacks on their base by North Vietnamese forces totaling around 34,000.

Worthley, who left the Marine Corps in October of 1968 and is now a master electrician, also received the Presidential Unit Citation and Combat Action Ribbon for his service in Vietnam. He served at Khe Sanh from June of 1967 until January of 1968, before the "official" 77-day Siege of Khe Sanh occurred between Jan. 21 and April 8, 1968.

But that doesn't mean Khe Sanh was a peaceful place when he was there. "We were some of the first troops sent there to beef it up," Worthley said.

"We fired thousands and thousands of rounds there -- 1,200 in one mission."

When enemy fire came in, rather than hiding out in bunkers, his unit's job was to go out to their howitzers and return fire. Their targets were often enemy troops moving ammunition on the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

Ralph Sargent, 72, of Augusta, managed to escape injury during his time in Khe Sanh, but just barely. On March 9, 1968, a North Vietnamese rocket struck the headquarters tent where he spent most of his waking hours in Khe Sanh, injuring three Marines and killing a lance corporal who was due to return home in just 13 days. But Sargent, an Augusta resident and Gardiner High School graduate who fought in the 77-day siege of Khe Sanh against an estimated 34,000 North Vietnamese, wasn't there. Instead, he had jumped -- literally -- onto the back of a moving C-130 cargo plane nine days earlier on emergency leave so he could help his family back in Maine deal with the death of his brother-in-law, Guy Robert Bean, who was killed in combat in Vietnam at the age of 21.

Monday, the 40th anniversary of the start of the siege of Khe Sanh, Sargent said he plans to do what he usually does every year on that day. He'll flip through some of his old photo albums and books of mementos and commendations and think about his experiences and lost buddies in the Vietnam War. He figures he's lucky to be around to reflect, and not just because of the rocket that killed his unit's machine gunner, Lance Cpl. Wilbur Stovall, whom Sargent said was like a son to him. Sargent almost didn't make it out for his emergency leave. Due to persistent incoming enemy rocket and mortar fire, the few planes that did land on the crater-marked airstrip at Khe Sanh usually never came to a full stop. Their loads of supplies were attached to parachutes, which pulled the pallets of supplies out the back of the C-130s. Then the planes, after touching down, without stopping, would take back off. So Sargent had to run out onto the airstrip to board a plane out.

"I ran and jumped for the tail, but my pistol belt got held up on the ramp," Sargent said. "It was stuck. I couldn't get in and I couldn't get out."

Another service member saw what was happening, grabbed Sargent and pushed him up into the plane. But in so doing, the man was left hanging from the ramp as the plane began to takeoff and left the ground. The other man fell to the ground.

"The last thing I saw was him landing and rolling on the ground," Sargent said of the other service member. "I don't know if he made it or not. I still see that guy, rolling on the ground, today."

Another close call came when a 152-millimeter artillery shell flew over his foxhole, close enough so he could feel the heat coming off it. Other than a touch of shell shock which caused Sargent, for a time even after he'd left a combat area, to yell "Incoming!" and dive to the ground when he heard loud, explosive-sounding noises, he made it out of Khe Sanh without getting injured.

Both Worthley and Sargent spent most of their time on the base, as most fighting at Khe Sanh consisted of exchanges of artillery fire, not direct, face-to-face combat. Both Marines said the defensive assignment of holding the base while under siege was frustrating for many of their fellow Marines because, they said, Marines are used to being on the offensive.

The steady barrage of enemy shelling led to them spending most of their time underground in bunkers. Worthley said they filled large wooden ammunition boxes with dirt to build up their walls and strengthen their bunkers from attack. Sargent said they used nearly anything they could find, because proper supplies were hard to come by in Khe Sanh, which was surrounded by the enemy and reachable only by aircraft. "We didn't have proper protection for our bunkers," Sargent said. "All of our corrugated steel went to the north, thanks to Robert McNamara (U.S. Secretary of Defense from 1961-1968). We had nothing to stop anything more than an 82 millimeter mortar. They (the North Vietnamese) were using heavier shells than that. They had 152s. We had sandbags, 55-gallon drums and empty ammo boxes so we'd fill them full of dirt for protection. Anything we could find."

Sargent was battery gunnery sergeant and platoon sergeant of a 36-man reactionary platoon. During his service in Vietnam he was awarded a Navy Commendation and the Bronze Star with a Combat V for heroic achievement, for his role in an attack not at Khe Sanh. He said he didn't want the award because he received it for his actions in an attack in which 35 Marines died.

"I did nothing but do my job and get the wounded out of there," he said of the Bronze Star. "I didn't want it. I wear it in memory of the Marines who got killed that night."

Marines made up the bulk of forces at Khe Sanh but all branches were represented. Sargent said sometimes they were short on supplies so weren't allowed to use water to shower, and were limited to two C-ration meals per day., The first wave of what many consider the official siege of Khe Sanh started with a major attack at 5:30 a.m., Jan. 21, 1968. "They hit us with rockets, mortars, everything," Sargent said. "The third round hit our ammo dump. We had all kinds of stuff in there. It was quite a Fourth of July display. It was two or three days before it settled down."

Worthley came into and left Khe Sanh, which is on a plateau surrounded by the Coroc Mountains located near the North Vietnam and Laos borders, by helicopter. Bullets were coming through the bottom of the helicopter when he was flown out.

A native of Mexico, Worthley attended technical school on the GI bill after the Marines and became a master electrician. He and his wife Carol have two adult daughters. Sargent was in Khe Sanh from September of 1967 to April 18, 1968. He was in the Marines until he retired from the Corps, Sept. 30, 1976.

Later he worked for the state and Digital in Augusta, before retiring. He's been married to his wife and high school sweetheart, Onise, 53 years. They have two daughters and five grandchildren. One grandson joined the Marines, though Sargent noted he did not pressure him to do so. The number of casualties suffered by both sides at Khe Sanh has long been disputed. The official count of deaths released by the Marines counts 205 deaths and 1,668 wounded. The Khe Sanh Veterans Association, founded by Vietnam historian Ray W. Stubbe, a Navy Chaplain at Khe Sanh and founder of Khe Sanh Veterans Association, estimates there were 730 Americans killed in action in Khe Sanh. More than 2,500 were injured, according to multiple accounts. Khe Sanh was abandoned by U.S. troops and leveled by July of 1968.

"The powers that be decided it wasn't of important strategic use," Sargent said. "All this waste of blood and human lives, and they turn around and level it."

The Army's Best Invention

Story by Major Renita Foster

THE P-38

WWII & KOREA

VIETNAM

It was developed in just 30 days in the summer of 1942 by the Subsistence Research Laboratory in Chicago. And never in its 52-year history has it been known to break, rust, need sharpening or polishing. Perhaps that is why many soldiers, past and present, regard the P-38 C-ration can opener as the Army's best invention.

C-rations have long since been replaced with the more convenient Meals, Ready to Eat, but the fame of the P-38 persists, thanks to the many uses stemming from the unique blend of ingenuity and creativity all soldiers seem to have. "The P-38 is one of those tools you keep and never want to get rid of," said Sgt. Scott Kiraly, a military policeman. "I've had my P-38 since joining the Army 11 years ago and kept it because I can use it as a screwdriver, knife, anything."

The most vital use of the P-38, however, is the very mission it was designed for, said Fort Monmouth, N.J., garrison commander Col. Paul Baerman. "When we had C-rations, the P-38 was your access to food; that made it the hierarchy of needs," Baerman said. "Then soldiers discovered it was an extremely simple, lightweight, multipurpose tool. I think in warfare, the simpler something is and the easier access it has, the more you're going to use it. The P-38 had all of those things going for it." The tool acquired its name from the 38 punctures required to open a C-ration can, and from the boast that it performed with the speed of the World War II P-38 fighter plane.

"Soldiers just took to the P-38 naturally," said World War II veteran John Bandola. "It was our means for eating 90 percent of the time, but we also used it for cleaning boots and fingernails, as a screwdriver, you name it. We all carried it on our dog tags or key rings." When Bandola attached his first and only P-38 to his key ring a half century ago, it accompanied him to Anzio, Salerno and through northern Italy. It was with him when World War II ended, and it's with him now. "This P-38 is a symbol of my life then," said Bandola. "The Army, the training, my fellow soldiers, all the times we shared during a world war."

Sgt. Ted Paquet, swing shift supervisor in the Fort Monmouth Provost Marshal's Office, was a 17-year -old seaman serving aboard the amphibious assault ship USS New Orleans during the Vietnam war when he got his first P-38. The ship's mission was to transport Marines off the coast of Da Nang. On occasional evenings, Marines gathered near Paquet's duty position on the fantail for simple pleasures like "Cokes, cigarettes, conversation and C-rations." It was during one of these nightly sessions that Paquet came in contact with the P-38, or "John Wayne" as it's referred to in the Navy. Paquet still carries his P-38, and he still finds it useful. While driving with his older brother, Paul, their car's carburetor began to have problems. "There were no tools in the car and, almost simultaneously, both of us reached for P-38s attached to our key rings," Paquet said with a grin. "We used my P-38 to adjust the flow valve, the car worked perfectly, and we went on our merry way."

Paquet"s P-38 is in a special box with his dog tags, a .50-caliber round from the ship he served on, his Vietnam Service Medal, South Vietnamese money and a surrender leaflet from Operation Desert Storm provided by a nephew. "It will probably be on my dresser until the day I die," Paquet said. The feelings veterans have for the P-38 aren't hard to understand, according to 1st Sgt. Steve Wilson of the Chaplain Center and School at Fort Monmouth. "When you hang on to something for 26 years," he said, "it's very hard to give it up. That's why people keep their P-38 just like they do their dog tags. ... It means a lot. It's become part of you. You remember field problems, jumping at 3 a.m. and moving out. A P-38 has you reliving all the adventures that came with soldiering in the armed forces. Yes, the P-38 opened cans, but it did much more. Any soldier will tell you that."

Sgt/1st Class Chuck Tredinnick by Mike Fishbaugh

A virtual salute, but the pain still very real

It was Jan. 29, 1968. Sgt. 1st Class Charles "Chuck" Nichol Tredinnick, formerly of Dallas, was serving in the U.S. Army as a combat engineer in the Special Forces in Vietnam. In just one day, Tredinnick and his group were to return to Okinawa, Japan, and then back to the United States. Before their scheduled departure, the soldiers volunteered for one more mission: to recover American bodies and retrieve an MIA/POW from another special forces team on Hill 471 outside of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. That turned out to be a deadly decision. Tredinnick was killed in combat when he was shot in the chest. He was 33.

Like the 50,000-plus Americans who perished in Vietnam, Charles Tredinnick is listed on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall in Washington, D.C. He is also listed on a Web site called the Virtual Wall Vietnam Veterans Memorial. His widow, Joy, never remarried, and lived in the couple's North Carolina home until her death in 2005. In 2002, she posted this message on the Virtual Wall:

"They say that time heals all wounds, so why won't this one heal? It's been over 34 years now and you are still in my dreams all the time. I still miss you so much. We used to talk about growing old together ... sitting on the front porch in our rockers and watching the rest of the world go by. It's not much fun sitting there alone."

While serving in Vietnam, Charles Tredinnick often wrote home to Joy, telling her not to worry because "only the good die young." Two days before he died, he wrote: "Well darling that's about it for today. I don't know when I'll get the time to write again.... So until then know I love you very much and always will."

Keeping his memory alive Charles Tredinnick's older sister, Jean Tredinnick Donnora, 77, of Cocoa, Fla., remembers the day she found out her brother had died. "I worked for the telephone company in Dallas and I got a call from his wife's uncle and he told me he was missing, and of course I got scared and I started to cry and they let me go home," Donnora said. Donnora went home and called Joy Tredinnick, who said that Charles Tredinnick's body was found. "I was just crushed," Donnora said. "I don't know how else to explain it. In fact, I still miss him."

Charles Tredinnick wanted to be a Marine, but they would not accept him because he had flat feet. So he joined the Army. Later, Charles Tredinnick advanced to a ranger and then a member of the Green Beret Special Forces. He served in Germany and did two tours in Vietnam, was awarded the Purple Star, two Bronze Star awards, Silver Star, National Defense, Vietnam Service, Vietnam Campaign, Combat Infantryman Badge, MACV-SOG Presidential Unit Citation Commemorative Coin, and the Army Master Parachutist. He also was given the Ranger Special Forces Airborne and MACV-SOG patches.

Donnora was close to her brother and named her son Charles after him. Sadly, little Charles passed away in 1960 at age 5 after being run over by a school bus in Shavertown. Donnora does not own a computer and has never seen the Virtual Wall, but says she saw the moving wall and has pictures of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall in Washington.

Charles Tredinnick's cousin, Dennis Tredinnick, is the contact for Charles Tredinnick on the Virtual Wall. Dennis Tredinnick, 62, of Glen Gardner, N.J., never met his cousin but feels it is important to honor him because he, as the most decorated Tredinnick, is the family hero. Dennis Tredinnick, also a veteran, stays in touch with about seven men who served with Charles Tridinnick, including Jim Taylor who was with Charles while he died.

"I was interested in what they thought of my cousin and what experiences and things they went through in 'Nam," Dennis Tredinnick said. "I guess I was learning more and more about Charles, who I didn't know." Charles and Joy Tredinnick are buried in Arlington National Cemetery. Charles Tredinnick is listed on Panel 35E Line 063 on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall in Washington, D.C.

At the end of Joy Tredinnick's posting on the Virtual Wall, she included a poem she wrote about her husband titled "My Green Beret." The last stanza reads, "So, as the lonely days and nights pass, And I re-read that letter. ... his last, I tell him, "You're right as always, my darling. ... Only the very best die young."

Navy Pilot Returned to US

By Mike Fishbaugh

In the late summer of 2002, a team of Defense Department MIA hunters in Ho Chi Minh City got a call from their counterparts in the Vietnamese government. Some Vietnamese fishermen had discovered human bones and airplane wreckage off an Phu Quoc island in the Gulf of Thailand. They wanted to turn over the remains and believed that it would guarantee them an opportunity to immigrate. The Americans took the remains and wreckage given to them and attempted unsuccessfully to get to the underwater site a few miles offshore. Some months later, the bones were flown to the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command in Hawaii, where they stayed in a laboratory for five years.

On Monday, those remains come home, to a hallowed ground that overlooks the old Naval Air Station in Dallas, where a young Fort Worth man took the naval officer's oath in 1964. That was before Lt/jg. Frank E. Hand III left for the war in Vietnam, before he and 11 other young men went down trying to find Viet Cong gun-running boats.

Growing up Frank Hand could be found most days in the mid-1950s on the playground of Oakhurst Elementary School, leading a touch football game of neighborhood boys. His parents' house backed up to the school, and it was there and at the Riverside Baptist Church where Frank and his younger brother Bruce spent much of their youth. Frank was born in 1942 in Charleston, S.C., when their father was an instructor pilot for the Navy during World War II. The family had moved to a house on Westbrook Avenue in the summer of '51 when Frank Hand Jr. took a job with the Federal Aviation Administration in Fort Worth.

He was an outgoing boy at Carter-Riverside High School, an Eagle Scout, and an accomplished swimmer. He, and later his brother, worked summers as lifeguards at the Ridglea Country Club. "He made enough money to buy a nice car," his brother said. "He was mechanically inclined, so he could work on it. It was a black, two-door Pontiac Bonneville, a '58, if I remember. Talk about a cool car." After graduation in 1960, Frank started at what was then Arlington State College to study architecture. He did that for three years but decided to take a break and work for an architecture firm to earn money. The draft board noticed the change and reclassified him as eligible.

So Frank Hand, presumably unwilling to chance the Army or the infantry, went to NAS Dallas to compete for a spot in officer candidate school and a shot at naval aviation. Romance in Florida Linda Merriman, a local girl in Pensacola, Fla., thought she had met the most gorgeous man in the world. A Texas boy, a Navy officer candidate and pilot in training. He drove a new Corvette. He was, without a doubt, living the high life. "It was like Officer and a Gentleman," Bruce said of his brother's relationship.

After a year of dating, Linda and Frank Hand wed on a warm August day in 1966 in the First Baptist Church in Pensacola, an arch of crossed swords over their heads when they left the sanctuary. They moved frequently over the next several months, going from flight school to more flight schools. Finally in 1967, he was assigned to Patrol Squadron 26 in Brunswick, Maine, and immediately prepared for deployment to Southeast Asia.

He wrote Linda a letter every day he was gone, beginning in November 1967. "He just wanted me to stay busy and pass the time because I had so much free time on my hands," she said. "He would tell me all was going well and 'I wish I could be with you.' They were great love letters. I kept all of them. "He called me at Christmastime. I believe that's the last time we were able to speak."

The last flight

When Frank Hand, 26, took off on April 1, 1968, with three other officers and eight sailors in a P-3 Orion from an air base in Thailand, the biggest news in Vietnam centered on the military's efforts to break through the siege at Khe Sanh. Hand's crew was on a routine mission, scanning the waters off Vietnam for Viet Cong.

On his airplane he served as the co-pilot -- was hit by anti-aircraft fire from a Cambodian gunboat, according to news accounts. The pilots attempted to fly to land to improve their chances for rescue, but the four-engine aircraft didn't make it. No one survived. Search and rescue crews recovered something from every man on board, so none were ever listed as missing in action. All searchers found of him, according to the Defense Department, was a boot bearing his name.

On April 24, 1968, he was laid to rest in Barrancas National Cemetery in Pensacola, where Linda wanted him buried. The service was held in the First Baptist Church, 20 months after his picture-perfect wedding. Hand's parents went on, of course, though they grieved terribly. His mother, Dottie, was especially close to Frank. His father, Frank Jr., grieved more quietly, choosing to channel his feelings into a years-long search to find out more about his son's last flight. Years later, his son Bruce discovered paperwork indicating that his father had been planning a trip to Vietnam to go to the crash site. "Dad was very quiet," Bruce said. "He was of that generation where you kept your feelings to yourself."

Linda and Frank Hand had planned exactly six children. They would all be boys, they decided jokingly. After a few years, Linda remarried and started a family. She now lives in North Carolina. But Frank has never left her. "I still share his love and will forever," she said. A memory revived thirty-eight years after Hand died. An official with the Department of the Navy called Bruce and requested a blood sample. To say it was a surprise is a wholly inadequate description for what it did to Bruce, who felt as if he had been struck by lightning on a cloudless, sunny day.

"I got excited," Bruce said, Frank's closest living relative. "But then I had to tell myself to sit down, nothing is going to come of this." It did. The Navy followed up a few months later, at the beginning of the summer, to tell Bruce the story of the Vietnamese villagers and the successful DNA match with several bones of Frank's. No other crewman's remains were found. Larry Greer, a spokesman for the Defense Prisoner of War/Missing Personnel Office in Washington, said finding additional remains of servicemen happens more often than people would think. "It amazes me when I hear that Vietnamese villagers or fishermen have gone to the trouble of finding who to give these to," Greer said. "It tells me that they are very much aware of the U.S. commitment to the recovery effort."

Bruce called Linda, other family members, members of the Patrol Squadron Association. He heard from officers on active duty today in Frank's old squadron in Maine, and he learned about the memorial there with an etching of Frank's name from the Vietnam Memorial in Washington. For the first time in many years, Frank and his memory had been very much alive. "The Navy wanted to know what I wanted to do, but I needed to take a breath and consider all this," he said. "Well, the summer went by pretty quick, and I decided that the fall would be a nice time for this."

The Department of Veterans Affairs gave Bruce permission to place Frank's remains in a columbarium at the Dallas-Fort Worth National Cemetery, ordinarily not allowed because he already has a spot at a national cemetery. "While this has presented a unique situation, for reasons of compassion, we decided to honor the Hand family's request," said Ron Pemberton, director of D-FW National Cemetery.

The Navy agreed to provide four F/A-18 Hornets to perform the "missing man" formation over the cemetery on Monday, a particularly special gesture for Bruce. The executive officer of Patrol Squadron 26 is coming to Texas for the service.

"This has all been good," Bruce said. "Everything has just come together beautifully."

Linda Shoemaker will be there, too, with the friend that introduced her to Frank 42 years ago.

"I never, ever dreamed of something like this," she said. "I've shed many tears since we got the information. I am thrilled to bring him home. But it opens up a lot of hurt, and a lot of happiness, too."

MIA/Air Force- Brought Home

By Mike Fishbaugh

Air Force Captain Stephen Rusch was in his aircraft over Laos in 1972 when he was shot down. Rusch was 28 years old and never heard from again. Bob Heath knew the Captain's late father well and remembers the anguish he endured. "His father was obviously distraught for the loss of his son," Heath said. "And not knowing where he was." They have now found where he was. After years of excavating the wreckage and testing remains that were recovered, two teeth have been positively identified as those of Captain Stephen Rusch.

His daughter Sharon was just 6 years old when his plane was shot down. She is now an Air Force Colonel and is escorting her father's remains home from the pacific. "I've missed my dad," she said. "I miss my dad every day of my life. I think about him all the time. The Colonel can't help but pay tribute to the military teams who made it possible for her dad to buried, properly.

It wouldn't have mattered if it was his whole body or two teeth. The fact of the matter is these people worked very hard to bring him home to us." There is a plaque hanging at Lambertville City hall with Captain Rusch's picture. City Clerk Marie Rossiter sees it all the time.

God gave my Dad the gift of true freedom. Because he is a gracious, loving God he wanted my Dad, and indeed each of us is to know we are accepted, secure and significant. Let me repeat that in case you missed it: Because he is a gracious, loving God he wanted my Dad, and indeed each of us is to know we are accepted, secure and significant. In this we are free to live life fully and experience eternity.

"The family can finally put everything to rest. His daughter will know where he is now," Rossiter said. Jim Conover is a former Marine and Vietnam War veteran. He knew Stephen Rusch when they were kids attending First Presbyterian Church together. "He was just a wonderful kid and just a great guy," Conover said. He too says this is a case of the U.S. military, never forgetting those left behind. I would have had a hard time delivering this message if I didn't believe it.

"Just the idea that they kept looking and looking and looking and digging and digging," Conover said, this country goes to great expense as they should, because these people are the true heroes of this country, they should not be forgotten." After so many years missing in action, Captain Stephen Rusch will have a final resting place at Arlington National Cemetery.

MEMORIES

By Denny Bowers B Co 1/26

Forty years ago, Ocean Pines resident Denny Bowers and many other veterans were surrounded by the North Vietnamese in the Battle of Khe Sanh, one of the many battles caused by the Tet offensive of 1968.

"We were surrounded by somewhere between 20 and 30 thousand North Vietnamese," Bowers said. "When you're surrounded, you're surrounded."

Bowers said where he was stationed was a very small part of the entire country, and the country as a whole saw attacks due to the Tet offensive.

"Historians are still trying to figure out what the North Vietnamese really wanted to do," he said. "There are two schools of thought -- either create a diversion or take and overrun the combat base -- but no one really knows."

Sarge Garlitz of the Worcester County American Legion said events that transpired were misinterpreted by the press and subsequently American citizens.

"Many have not been honored because of the way the liberal press had it turned around," Garlitz said. "When the soldiers returned they were shunned."
But Garlitz wants to honor them now on the 40th anniversary of the Tet offensive.

"It is not to celebrate the Tet but to recognize the anniversary," he said.

On Thursday, Jan. 31 a wreath was placed on the Worcester County Veteran's memorial in memory of the beginning of the Tet offensive.

"I just want to give them a nice pat on the back and thank them," he said. "I was not at the Tet offensive; I was in other parts of the world, but I just think it is right that we can honor those who were there."

Garlitz came to the decision to honor the anniversary through a discussion with a colleague.

"An associate of mine was at the Tet and he got the silver star for it," he said. "He informed me of a rededication and I couldn't attend so I thought, why not have recognition in Worcester County?" To his knowledge, Garlitz is the only person holding a service on the 31st.

"Kansas proclaimed recognition of the 30th anniversary and wanted to get the governor of each state to recognize it in the future but someone dropped the ball," he said. "I'm just picking it up as county commander."

Now that he's started it, Garlitz is receiving feedback from veterans who want to attend.

"People are coming out of the woodwork for the way they were treated when they came back from Vietnam," he said. "We have a lot of people around that really are in awe because Worcester County is going to recognize those for serving in a victory that was called a defeat at the time in 1968. Instead of making those guys heroes they made them into martyrs."

He hopes a member of each service will give a short prayer at the memorial and then veterans can come to the American Legion post on Saturday, Feb. 2 to share their stories.

"I just want the public to know that these people are heroes and I think it is serious," he said.

Bowers, who is not only a veteran but the Vice President of the Veteran's Memorial board, agreed and wanted the public to just have the knowledge.

"If nothing else, the purpose of this is to bring the American people to the realization of its occurrence, and it shouldn't be forgotten," he said.

We have instituted a new magazine section to thank those members who contribute so generously to the Khe Sanh Veterans. Their contributions allow us to continue to expand and improve our Red Clay magazine. There will be four levels of contributions: SILVER $ 20.00-50.00, GOLD over 50.00-200.00, PLATINUM over 200.00-1,000, and DIAMOND over 1,000. Each member will receive a new member-ship card, corresponding with their level of contribution.

State of Alaska -Governor - Proclamations - Full Proclamation Tet Offensive 40th Anniversary Remembrance Month.

WHEREAS, in early 1968 there were Alaska men and women serving in the Armed Forces of the United States, in uniform or as civilian employees within the military environment, during a time of armed conflict in Southeast Asia.

WHEREAS, these citizens of Alaska in Land, Air, and Sea forces who with countrymen, Republic of Vietnam forces, and international allies, all stood fast together and did what was right when the enemy launched a massive surprise assault early in 1968 against the populace and the legitimate government of the Republic of Vietnam.

WHEREAS, the fighting raged for long months at fixed installations and outside the perimeter wire from the delta to the DMZ, in bambooed hamlet, ancient city, along forested tracks and rice paddy dikes, in red clay valleys, up sheer hills, under triple canopy, in the air, on brown rivers, and out on blue water close to white sand beaches, and to twisted canals in massive swamps growing from the mighty Mekong.

WHEREAS, our forces properly and completely held at every point around the compass, in spite of heavy direct and indirect fire; first, stopping, defeating, and then pursuing the enemy in their many thousands from Hue, Dong Ha, and Khe Sanh, among others, in the north, and in the central highlands around Pleiku, Nha Trang, Cam Rahn, Dalat, Tay Ninh, Cholon, the ends of the runways at Tan Son Nhut and Bien Hoa, the joyless streets of the capital city, down through the Rat Song to the southernmost tip of an embattled land.

WHEREAS, because it was so far from U.S. shores, families and friends in Alaska homesteads, people overseas, as well as citizens all across our land, heard fragmentary reporting of the great Tet battles, without context: and other than direct communication with those who were there, the American people at large have often been saturated with faulty accounts coming from the self-serving of media and academia. It is time for the bottom line truth of Tet 1968 to be told: the enemy's battle was lost, and freedom – at least for a time – was sustained.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, Sarah Palin, Governor of the State of Alaska, do hereby proclaim February 2008 as: Tet Offensive 40th Anniversary Remembrance Month in Alaska, and encourage all Alaskans to remember the courage brought forth in support and defense of freedom and render long overdue honor and respect to those who were there, drew fire, and sacrificed so much and tell them WELCOME HOME.

I THOUGHT IT WAS OVER

I thought my war was over when I left Viet Nam, little did I know that it had only just begun.
Seems like I've been going a hundred miles an hour, backwards ever since.
Its like chasing a ghost,
or trying to out run the sun.
Working hard to stay busy all the time, helps to keep the demons inside the fence.
I like to do things I can do alone,
I don't like to go where there might be a crowd.
I miss a lot not going along,
but I avoid places that are loud.
Being alone is safer when the anger comes,
it comes instantly over nothing and is quite strong.
I'm on alert seemingly all time time, jumping at every sound to see what's wrong.
Successfully avoiding idol thought, keeps me from thinking about all the guys that didn't come back.
All those sights, smells, and sounds you don't want to be around,
because what you really don't want is another flash back.
Yea I thought the war was over,
but the private war had just begun.
I know now that this war will never be over,
and trying to live with it is no fun.

A FOREST FOR THOSE WHO FELL IN VIETNAM

Khe Sanh Veteran Geoffrey Steiner, H CO 2/9 Buried his anger and hurt and made a place for vets to heal

Ten years out of Vietnam Geoffrey Sterner was still fighting. He tried suicide, did time in a VA psychiatric ward, wrestled with an alcohol problem, got divorced. He ended up in a trailer on a dead-end dirt road near Cushing. "I walked out of society and into the woods, just like so many vets," he says.

And there, at last, he found peace: by planting one tree for each American who fell in Indochina. The forest on his 100 acre plot is now Minnesota's official testament to the veterans of the Vietnam War; it may be the nation's only living memorial.

Steiner has planted some 32,000 trees so far-'more than 35 varieties, from one-foot-high pine seedlings to six-foot poplars-burying his anger and hurt about the war in each hole he digs. He draws strength, too, from the visits of other vets and their families. A minister from Minneapolis stopped by recently; he'd lost a son in Vietnam.

"It did him good to see the trees," Steiner says. "People can come here and heal."

The State of Minnesota donated some saplings, but Steiner, 37 then pays for most of the trees out of his disability check. That can be a strain, but he and his new wife say they trust the Lord to provide. 'Says Steiner,
"I am here if there's hurting, if there's any way I can help."

DREAMS
By Craig Tourte

Dreams, My son came home from college this past Christmas. His friends came over to visit and they all sat around kind of excited and talked about their various adventures since they got out of high school in 2004. Several girls came over that evening and the excited voices and stories they all told about their lives were quite interesting. They have so much to look forward to, so innocent in their anticipation of the future. I had a hard time realizing that most were older than I, when I returned from Vietnam in 1968, worn out and exhausted, an old man in a young man's body.

I played golf with a group of men today, they are all my age, some are veterans, most are not. The guy I was riding with asked me what I did when I got home, he was interested to know if I went out right away and found some girls, partied, had a good time. I thought about that for a few minutes. I told him that I don't really think I even thought about girls when I got back. I remember I drove up to Chico and Tom Horchler and I got drunk, I don't remember much else about that night, now that I think about it, we were both pretty crazy and didn't know it, but for the most part, I have little recall of the years after my return.

Tom and I have discussed how we both were pretty much in shock for a few years when we got back and agree that those years are a bit clouded for us. Sure I had dreams for years upon my return, but I just don't recall what those dreams were. All I remember is that I had a hard time sleeping and a lot of perspiration, having to get up several times during the night and change my T-shirt. It was not until I recently read Ernie Spencer's book "Welcome to Vietnam Macho Man" that I realized I had exchanged dreams from the one I could not recall, for the persistent dream that I could recall, the same dream Ernie has. When I went in for my Social Security Psychiatrist evaluation I discussed this dream with the shrink, it wasn't long after, that I received my full percentage.

I told my golf partner today about my dream, I think he is still in shock, he didn't say much to me after the game, but he did buy me a drink at the bar. I am certain of a few things though, when I returned from Vietnam and the long Siege at Khe Sanh, I didn't sit around with friends and fresh faced girls and excitedly talk about our adventures and the future. I was mostly numb, exhausted, confused, and pretty much just wanted to be left alone. I'm much better now, the years have mellowed me, I don't sweat at night like I used to. I occasionally still have that dream, but like I told the Psychiatrist, they're nine thousand miles away.

Once you have experienced combat, you will never be the same innocent person you were before. I too had some bad times upon my return to CONUS. I was glad to be home and not living in a hole in the ground. Yea things were different , friends who did not serve no longer related to you, maybe out of guilt or because they didn't see things your way. "The world" had changed, but I think that we had changed more. That is why the adjustment was so hard. All in all most of us became better people in the long run.

Like many Khe Sanh veterans, we had great dreams coming home but many bad dreams. Back in the spring of 1971 my wife and I moved into our new home in Honolulu. Something happened early one morning when I woke up, telling my wife to get on the floor and keep as quiet as possible. I rolled out of bed laying flat, and kept telling my wife to do this because of the VC, and I don't have my rifle. While laying on the floor, I went back to sleep while she was wide awake not knowing what was going on with me. After about a half hour she came over to my side of the bed to find me in a very deep sleep. She left me alone and went back to bed.

Sometime about 5:30, I woke up finding myself on the floor, not remembering how I got there. My wife was in bed sleeping. I got up to get ready to go to work at Hickam. I was in the kitchen when she asked me if I had made her a cup of coffee. She did not say anything and gave me a good-by kiss as I left the house. Three days later after she talked to our neighbor (an USAF 1st Sgt) about what to do, he talked to me about what happened for about an hour or so. All I could tell him was that I did not remember the incident.

There were a several other bad nights when I woke up screaming and/or she found me dripping wet on the sheets. As time went by the incidents faded making my wife a happier person. It took about five years that before I could stand to be around persons firing off fireworks. In Honolulu there were two fireworks date, New Years Eve and July 4th. My performance reports at Hickam between 1972 and 1974 reflected that I had aggressive behavior problems needing adjusting. My major problem was that I was the only one of six enlisted personnel that had been exposed to combat duties in Vietnam.

The office NCOIC was a flake who made remarks that I was too slow and got hit by incoming rounds. Looking back on my life between 1967 and 1975, in the 80's I felt bad and sad. Today I look at those years as my adjustment time of my life. My wife now complains that I sleep too good.

Coming home, what a trip that was. I remember, other than the joy of being safe, it was not what I had dreamed about in country. Don't get me wrong, I was happy but I just felt out of place. I even went back to my high school to visit my old teachers and everyone seemed to stare and they treated me different. I couldn't think of a thing to talk about and really felt uncomfortable. I never went back. All of my buddies were gone, either drafted or in school, so I had no one to talk to.

I did however, chase every women that stood still and acted like a dog in heat. My girlfriend, from before, had written me a Dear John and was gone which is probably good. To fill the days, I sat in the same bar each day by myself and drank until closing. Each day I ate Mexican food because I had missed it so. Actually I was very lonely at home. Don't get me wrong it was really good to see my parents again, but things were just different. I wished for any of my buddies from Vietnam to talk to so I could relate. As far as dreams, I think we all have had them over the years, many being bad. I take meds now to help with bad dreams. Home just wasn't what I had dreamed of in country, but it was better than being in a war.

By Ernie Spencer

For the sake of your families, you all should write down your memories. My book started as a present for my parents. I never talked about the war, until after I went full blown PTSD.

On Jan. 5, 1985. I went to a shrink for the first time and he had me write down what eventually became my book. It was cruel in looking back, but for Christmas of 1985 I gave my parents the manuscript and said words to the effect: "Here mom and dad, you wanted to know what happened to me in Vietnam? Merry Christmas," then left. My late mom told me when I went to visit them several weeks later: "Thank you my son (she always referred to me that way, the possessive case "my son"), NOW I understand your anger." She told me that my manuscript so unnerved my late father that it literally screwed him up for two weeks. Years latter after mom died, daddy asked while we were on a cruise: "why didn't you tell us what happened to you over there earlier?" I said: "I just assumed you knew, what with Khe Sanh being in the news everyday." "But we had no idea how bad it really was," daddy said. I just shrugged my shoulders and said: "well, now you know."

ROBERT ELLISON REMEMBERED

By Kevin Lynch

Young, gifted and white, Robert Jackson Ellison heard the majestic, dreamlike voice of the Rev. Martin Luther King speaking about a better world to young students and thousands of others on the vast National Mall in Washington on that day in August 1963.

Maybe that better world is what Ellison, the child of a military family, started searching for. He would say that King's dream became his, and he promptly dropped out of the University of Florida. And in the best of his photographs, you see the complexities, the situations and the spirit of humanity. Racial injustice was the backdrop, just as the inhumanity of war may have led him to Vietnam and the Dominican Republic.

Since childhood Ellison had been fascinated with small reptiles, and he majored in herpetology. Now he would try to capture something larger. The move was, perhaps, rash and demonstrably dangerous. Ellison gave up tuition payments for the daring life of a freelance photographer and paid for it with his life. In March 1968 he died, at 23, in a military incident fraught with miscommunication.

We are left with extraordinarily compelling and beautiful photography that has been collected as "An Instinct for Light: The Photography of Robert J. Ellison," currently showing at the Wisconsin Veterans Museum through June 15.It is an exhibit worth seeing and pondering during this Black History Month and in this dark era of America as a nation at war.

It's easy enough to see that this young man was committed to American ideals. He was inspired, all right, as the photos also show. But that was cold comfort to his mother, Miriam Eaton, and all those who loved him and his potential. Today his mother has built an edifice of pride on her loss. "Many times I wished he could have been my friend instead of my son," she tells a nearly packed lecture hall on a yet another snowbound Madison evening. "We were in sync in so many ways. He didn't want to come back a basket case. If he would have been drafted it would have been a whole different story." Eaton, now 86, expresses poignant irony while recounting her son's creative willfulness.

"He wasn't an easy child to have, but what an experience he was," she laughs.

She recalls that her son was an instinctive daredevil who had tried to catch poisonous sidewinders in the Mojave Desert. Eaton is a trim, petite, still-practicing artist who has lived in Milwaukee for many of the years since her son's death. She clearly encouraged her son and helped him not to judge others by their skin color. "I know how it was back in my day, the separate bathrooms and water fountains and everything," she says. "I never saw Negroes as different. Bob was the same way. He just cared about people, so much."

Big donation

Eaton recently donated a large amount of her son's prints, contact sheets, diaries and other personal documents to the Veterans Museum. She had contacted museum officials to donate the letters of her first husband, Jack Ellison, a World War II veteran. Then the museum staff learned what her son had accomplished and found out she had more.

The exhibit includes 16 excellent photographs by Ellison, including some stunning color prints from Khe Sanh in Vietnam, superb black and whites from the civil rights movement and political and military upheaval in the Dominican Republic, a touching family scrapbook, and several well-wrought narrative panels with photos of Ellison himself.

Museum exhibition curator Jeffrey Kollath says there's enough for another exhibit, and, indeed, one longs for more of Ellison's civil rights-era photos, shot for Ebony magazine and others. But the ones here are masterful. One views King from right under his podium, in a stylized fish-eye lens shot from below, through a battery of microphones. As King reaches out, his arm becomes a perfectly circular limb, signifying the virtually global reach of this man. King's speech came on the 200-mile "March Against Fear" in Mississippi in June 1966. Ellison is also there later in the dramatic march, close up to clearly angry activist Stokley Carmichael as he exhorts the crowd with his famous "black power" speech, shortly after a sniper shot civil rights activist James Meredith.

A third photograph peeks in on a young African-American boy on the famous Selma, Ala., march in 1965, eyeing the photographer with a wary defiance as his mother's gloved hand tunes in a radio he is holding. Several years later, Ellison found himself in Vietnam, shooting for Newsweek. The Web site Digital Journalist features several of Ellison's war photos from this show in "Requiem," a documentary tribute to fallen photojournalists.

Rockets bursting

Correspondent Peter Arnett, renowned for his Gulf War television reporting, recounts in "Requiem" seeing Ellison lying on top of a bunker "with rockets bursting 30 or 40 feet away. I ran out and yelled, 'What the hell are you doing up there?!' Ellison only shrugged and said, 'How else am I going to get shots of the night fighting?' "

Arnett's story helps explain how Ellison got the amazing photograph at Khe Sanh that ended up on the cover of Newsweek magazine. A bomb hits an ammo dump, and scrambling soldiers freeze reflexively. The scene blazes white hot and hellish red, with fire and debris spewing skyward. The explosion is framed in the foreground with a slashing ridge and back dropped by a hunkering mountain and a cherry sky. Ellison's instinct for finding a perfect cinematic setting is amazing.

Finally, one can see the whole story of Khe Sanh in the exhausted, ravaged face of an American GI. Here, in red tones of muddy facial contours and empty eyes, the young photographer sees his fellow man with extraordinary insight, compassion and courage."He was there longer than any other journalist, about 14 days," says Ellison's photographer compatriot Jim Caccavo, in an interview at the exhibit opening. Ellison had just delivered the eight color photos that ran in one edition of Newsweek, an unprecedented accomplishment at the time, says Caccavo, who had met Ellison when both men, aged 23, had covered the "spy ship" USS Pueblo in Korea earlier in 1968.

Ellison had decided to deliver beer, cokes and cigars as gifts to men he had met in Khe Sanh. So he hopped onto a two-engine C-123 troop transport plane loaded with 48 reinforcement troops, flying into the heavily embattled region. A small Vietnamese plane mistakenly landed just when the C-123 should have. So the pilot of the American plane circled to re-land. In the brief duration, intense enemy gunfire hit one engine, and the plane spun out of control and crashed. There were no survivors.

GETTING OUT THE NEWS

Yesterday I assisted a Vietnam veteran in filing a claim for an increase in his percent of service connected disability for a medical issue he has had since he was on active duty; and which has become much worse. As we talked he mentioned that he had had prostate cancer several years ago and still had some residual problems. He was shocked to find out that prostate cancer is one of the 11 diseases which are "presumed to be service connected" if a person served in Vietnam — or has been exposed to certain herbicides, most notably one called "Agent Orange."

We filed a claim for the residuals of the cancer and medical problems, which are secondary to the cancer. The sad thing is that this Veteran, who has already suffered so much for our country, had no idea that he could be compensated for these medical problems. Last week I met a lady who lost her husband to cancer as a result of his exposure to herbicides in Vietnam. He was ill for over a year, and died in November of 2007. He never knew that he was eligible to file a claim for compensation for this 'presumed service connected' medical problem. The VA compensation would have been a godsend to this family when the man became too ill to work.

We are currently helping several young veterans who have been injured, or are ill, from their service in Iraq or Afghanistan. Most of the time they have no idea what the 'presumed to be service connected' disorders are that pertain to them. And no one seems to be standing in line to get the word out to them.

There are four lists of 'presumed to be service connected' medical conditions which are published by the VA. They are also listed in a VA Benefits Handbook, which is published every year by the government. The VA medical Centers, Regional Office, and Outpatient Centers have made these books available for no fee in the past. Unfortunately these Handbooks are scarce in printed form since the VA made the information available on the internet.

The four lists are, Former POW's, Vietnam Veterans (and those exposed to Herbicides, i.e., Agent Orange); Atomic Veterans (Exposed to ionizing radiation) and Gulf War veterans. Because of the space constraints of this column, we are unable to print them all here. If you, or someone you know, is a former POW, or has been exposed to Ionizing Radiation please consult the appropriate list for disorders which may affect you.

Following are the two lists which affect the largest number of veterans in our area:

Vietnam Veterans (or any veteran who can prove exposure to herbicides-most notably Agent Orange)

Soft tissue sarcoma (other than osteosarcoma, chondrosarcoma, Kaposi's sarcoma or mesothelioma); Hodgkin's disease; multiple myeloma; respiratory cancers (lung, bronchus, larynx, trachea); non-Hodgkin's lymphoma; prostate cancer, Type II Diabetes; Chronic Lymphocytic Leukemia, Chloracne or Porphyria Cutanea Tarda and Peripheral neuropathy (other than as secondary to diabetes).(with the last two disorders to be diagnosed within one year of exposure.)

Gulf War veterans: (Anyone who served in the first Gulf War and or the current War on Terrorism)

Medical unexplained or undiagnosed*, chronic multi-system illnesses defined by a cluster of signs or symptoms that have existed for six months or more, such as; Chronic Fatigue Syndrome, Fibromyalgia, Irritable Bowel Syndrome; any diagnosed or undiagnosed illness that the secretary of VA determines warrants a presumption of service connection; Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis (ALS), otherwise known as Lou Gehrig's disease.

* Symptoms of an 'undiagnosed illness' include: Fatigue, skin symptoms, headaches, muscle pain, joint pain, neurological and respiratory symptoms; sleep disturbances, GI symptoms, cardiovascular symptoms, unexplained weight loss and menstrual disorders.

If you or anyone you know, has been diagnosed with any of the above disorders you should get your medical records together and file a claim for compensation immediately!

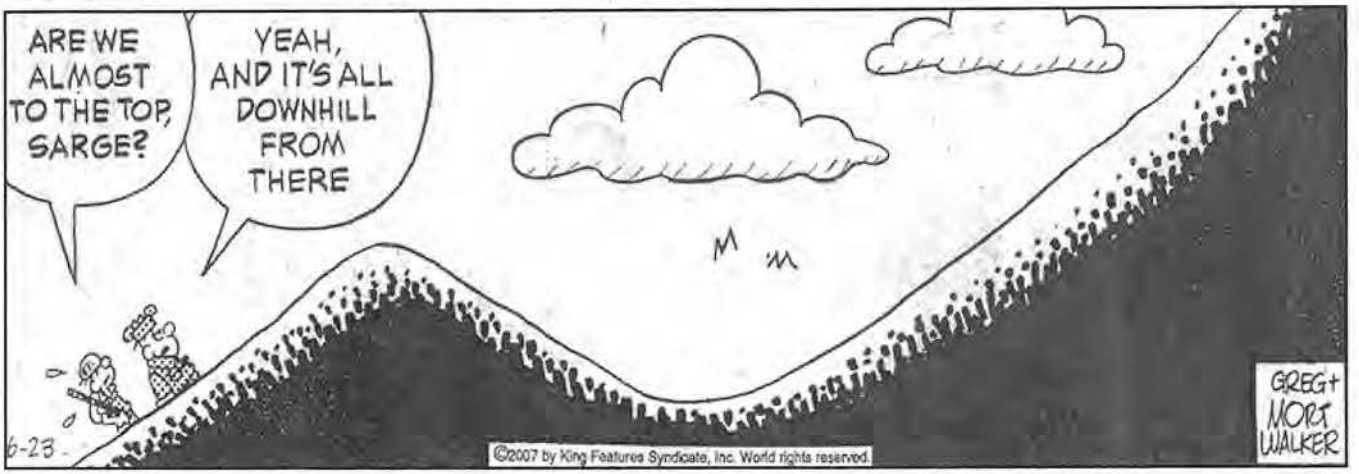
CLIMBINGHILL 881S FROM THE SOUTHERN SLOPE

By Reverend Ray W. Stubbe

Hi Tom:

Just a short note. I was cleaning our some piles of papers in my basement you know what an absolute mess of quantity of "stuff" there is in my basement! I came across this "Beetle Bailey" comic strip that 1 had copied this summer. You perhaps don't know this personally from your time at Khe Sanh, but perhaps you do, since many hills in Vietnam were this way. But I do recall that on the very first time 1 accompanied a patrol off of Hill 881-South, a platoon from A Co 1/26 (commanded at the time by Captain John Raymond), that we returned to the hill via the south slope. We had left by the very steep north slope, which is about a 60-degree (or greater) slope, mostly falling down rather than "walking" down, and this was the slope by which the hill was attacked by our Marines during the 1967 Hill Battles! I found it very difficult to comprehend how Marines could fight UP the hill in that situation.



Beetle Bailey Mort, Greg & Brian Walker 23 June 2007

Anyway, the SOUTH slope is like that portrayed in this comic strip. After about eight hours of solid up and down sharp hills, through rivers strewn with very large boulders, through thickets of bamboo and elephant grass so tall I frequently lost sight of the Marine in front and the Marine behind me, and became temporarily lost (in an area where we all knew enemy might be lurking), elephant grass that painfully cut like sharp razors, as we were all panting heavily, leg muscles aching, somewhat delirious and nauseated, we were approaching our position on Hill 881South. It was the late afternoon and I was so very, very relieved!

Then, as I got to the top of what I thought was Hill 881South, I suddenly realized I had climbed only part of the approach-another hill with a much longer and also steeper slope, lay before me! How discouraging, how dispiriting, how outrageous!! At that point, I didn't think I could go on. I was 29, grossly out of shape (I had just come on active duty after about a week's notice while finishing up a year at the University of Chicago in a Ph.D. program on "ethics and society", and before that, a year organizing a new congregation, and before that, seven years in college and the seminary so I was flabby, and overweight!) A corpsman on that patrol gave me some of the water in his canteen, and when I finally reached the company CP on top of Hill 881-South, Captain Raymond gave me some precious fruit juice and I gradually became re-hydrated.

That experience, however, determined how I lived for the next several months, mid-July through November of 1967. I'd fly out to one of the outposts (Hills 881-South, 861, 950, Lang Vei Special Forces Camp, or walk out to the nearby CAP OSCAR CP just outside KSCB, visit with the men there, hold a worship service after the evening resupply, and after the platoon patrol returned, remained overnight in one of the troop's bunkers, before I'd go out on re-supply to the next hill. I did this Monday through Saturday, returning to KSCB Saturday, in order to hold three worship services on the main base.

On Sunday (at the 1/26 mess hall, at Ponderosa area for 3/26 (until September, when they left for Operation KINGFISHER), at and HQ Battery of 1/13 in the western area of the base). On Sunday night I went out to CAP OSCAR-3, spent the night with them after a worship service, and usually accompanied a CAP patrol into the Bru Villages on Monday morning.

I thought of all these things because of this simple-drawn cartoon from "Beetle Bailey!" Those who served on Hill 881-South and patrolled from it (mainly the different line com-mies of 1/26, and perhaps some from 3/26) are the ones who might also recall that southern slope of that hill.

A Vietnam War nightmare: Purple hearts on Valentine's Ridge

By Steve Luhm
The Salt Lake Tribune

Valentine's Day memories:

George Lindell nearly died on the holiday in 1968 in During his half-completed tour of duty in Vietnam, U.S. Navy corpsman George Lindell had seen enough combat to recognize the "pop" of a mortar being fired and to calculate where the shell would hit. This one was headed directly at him. In the late afternoon of Feb. 14, 1968 - Valentine's Day - Lindell glanced at his squad leader, Corporal Dennis Fleming. They shouted a warning to each other and dug their fingers into the ground, hoping for the impossible, trying to somehow burrow themselves out of harm's way. The explosion sucked the air from Lindell's lungs, and the intense wave of searing heat that accompanied the bursting mortar round made those oppressively humid Midwestern summers that always enveloped his hometown of Wautoma, Wis., seem like an ocean breeze. "It felt like I got smashed in the chest with a sledge hammer," Lindell recalled, 40 years later. "I couldn't catch my breath. I was numb all over. I couldn't move. I just flopped around, like a fish out of water. My ears were ringing." Only a few feet away, Fleming had been killed instantly. As Lindell struggled to regain a sense of his surroundings, a lightening bolt of pain from his shredded left leg raced through his body. "I heard someone screaming - above the ringing in my ears," Lindell said. "Then I realized it was me."

Not wanting to draw unwelcome attention to himself or his location, Lindell forced himself to stop. He didn't want to look at his leg, fearing it might not be there. Another corpsman arrived to help and asked where he had been hit. Lindell welcomed the question: "I figured my leg was still there. Otherwise, he wouldn't have asked." Nearby, Marine Steve Miera tried in vain to conceal his position. Like Lindell, he found himself in the crosshairs of this fierce North Vietnamese army attack - a far cry from his carefree elementary-school days in Ogden. Without warning, a "potato-masher" hand grenade known as a chi com" hit the ground next to him and rolled once, stopping about 18 inches away. "There wasn't anything I could do," Miera said. "I just pulled my helmet down and pulled my shoulders up and waited for the explosion." It never happened.

"I waited and waited and waited," Miera said, "but all it did was smoke a lot. It was a dud." For Miera, Valentine's Day was just beginning

Deal with the whatever is out there

For most people, Valentine's Day is flowers and chocolates, cards and special meals with loved ones. For Miera, Valentine's Day is a bloody jungle ridge in a long-ago war. During the Vietnam War, the Ca Lu combat base was spread over low rolling hills, where a narrow dirt road known as Route 9 comes up from the south and bends toward Khe Sanh, a besieged U.S. outpost about eight miles to the west. this was dangerous country, just a few miles from North Vietnam. Thousands of the enemy's best troops thrived in the surrounding mountains and jungles. "Morale is high," Staff Sgt. John Edwards wrote at the time, "partly because we live at the edge of civilization but mostly because of our XO, Major John Oliver. . . . He has our confidence. We feel safe with him. He knows the ropes."

Because North Vietnamese attacks had made Route 9 a treacherous supply route, the U.S. troops at Ca Lu did not have much to eat. Breakfast often consisted of a peach slice or dry cereal bar. In early February, American patrols along Route 9 and in the mountains west of Ca Lu started coming under increasing mortar and small arms fire. A company-sized patrol, about 170 men, was ordered into the area to "deal with the whatever is out there," Edwards wrote. Another Marine, Gene Miller, heard the same thing. "We had been getting incoming from those ridge lines and I guess they wanted to find who was sniping at us," he said. Asked what he remembered about the orders for Kilo Company, Lindell shrugged and said, "Most of us didn't know what we were doing - never did."

As a communications chief, Edwards could have stayed in the relative safety of the combat base. Instead, he asked Major Oliver if he could go on the patrol. "He gives me his blessings," Edwards recalled, who also secured needed permission from Capt. Alexander Ward. "He gives me a warm welcome and said, 'We're just going out to get that mortar.' I think it's optimistic to believe the NVA only have one mortar out there, but I keep that counsel to myself." After dark, Edwards became restless. He rose from a fitful sleep before dawn, stuffed a can of fruit cocktail into his pack, put on a flak jacket and helmet, holstered his .45-caliber pistol and decided to pick up an M-14 rifle. As a non-commissioned officer, Edwards had the option of carrying a rifle into the field. On Valentine's Day, he took one along.

Not alone on the mountain

Kilo Company left the sanctuary of the combat base through the north wire, turned west and inched its way through thick brush alongside Route 9. The pace was maddeningly slow, but one designed to prevent a careless rush into an ambush. Lindell remembers stopping only to fill canteens with rain water that had collected at the bottom of bomb craters. Edwards transferred his .45 from holster to pocket, fearing the thick brush would rip it from his side. By mid afternoon, the patrol reached an unremarkable 200-meter mountain about one mile west of Ca Lu. Kilo Company was standing - uninvited - in the NVA's living room.

The Marines, along with their Navy corpsmen, circled the mountain before starting toward the top. Miera had the unenviable job of "walking point," meaning he led his comrades into the unknown. "He was very good at it, being the outdoors-type," Miller said.

Miera was the first to realize the Marines were not alone on the mountain: "We were coming out of dense jungle - toward a big ravine, and heard a metal clicking sound. Like hitting pipes with a hammer. So I stopped the column and called for a fire team." Instead of receiving support to deal with a possible attack, Miera was pulled off the point and sent "about three guys back" in the column. "The C.O. made up his mind, I guess, that nothing was going to stop us," Miera said. Word of the clicking noise and Miera's request for a fire team trickled back to the other Marines on the patrol. "They told us not to worry about it - to keep going," Miller said. "We didn't like that very much." The young American who replaced Miera as the column's point man inched forward. He didn't get far, Miera said, before "all hell broke loose." This anonymous place in Vietnam had just gotten a name: Valentine's Ridge.

No more jokes

Lindell was wounded just above the ankle - the back of his leg torn open. Fleming, his squad leader, was not as fortunate. The direction of the mortar fire and the slope of the ground at its impact point hurled most of the shrapnel at him.

"Only a short time before, we'd been joking as we hugged the ground, joking to keep the fear from overcoming us," Lindell said.

Another corpsman came to Lindell, tore off his boot and hastily dressed his wound. Lindell heard the screams of others all around him. Suddenly, a wide-eyed lieutenant slid down next to him "like Pete Rose."

He shouted an order to retreat because of the advancing North Vietnamese and ran down the mountain. The corpsman helped Lindell stand and, together, they followed the lieutenant - enemy bullets crackling around them every step of the way. Lindell felt "tremendous guilt" about leaving Fleming's body behind, but there was no choice. In the gathering darkness, getting away from an enemy who did not take prisoners alive was a matter of survival. Crashing through the brush, Lindell lost his .45, which because of its worn condition had always made him think it was World War II vintage. "My hope," he said, "was that some NVA would find it, try to fire it and it would blow up in his face."

Lindell had been wounded by a faceless enemy. Others were not. As soon as the firefight began, Miera "saw a bunch of NVA" and opened fire. "I killed two of them," he said, though he quickly turned and started down the mountain because "there were too many of them. It was total chaos. We were getting hammered from both sides. ... I made it down on my belly." Trading his now-jammed rifle for one off "a guy who'd been killed," Miera moved forward again to search for the Marines who had replaced him at the front of the column after he reported the clicking noise. There no sign of them - just the enemy.

Backing down the ridge on his stomach, Miera ran into a guy from my squad," who started shouting when the NVA began throwing rocks from the top of the ridge. "In hand grenade school, you are taught to holler if you saw one coming in," Miera said. "Maybe the NVA knew this because they started throwing rocks and this guy starts yelling, "May Day, May Day" - like they were real grenades. I told him, 'Shut up, man. If you holler again, they're going to kill us.' In the confusion and under heavy fire, Miera lost track of the panicked Marine. He made it down the mountainside but decided to make a final search of the initial firefight area and moved forward again. "There was nobody there, not even the NVA," Miera said. "I wondered what the hell was going on."

The enemy spotted Miera during his final retreat and opened fire. Miera dropped behind a tree. A burst of bullets passed through the pulpy trunk, just over his head, spraying him with "an acid-like juice. I could feel in burning." On the move again, Miera ran into two more NVA soldiers. The first "saw me and fired but nothing happened. I guess his gun jammed." The second "fired and missed. I returned fire and killed him. But I put another burst into him, just to make sure." Darkness now claimed Valentine's Ridge, and Miera was alone. He felt for one bullet he had put in his pocket. It was still there. He sighed with relief. "They told us - because of how the NVA treated captured Americans - to save the last round for yourself," Miera explained. "So that's what I did." When the firefight began, Miller saw his squad leader, Cpl. David Schneider "got killed right off the bat. I was close to him and went over the checked on him. But" The enemy fire increased. Along with several others, Miller withdrew but stopped to help a Marine who had been wounded. They talked about home. "I didn't know the guy," Miller said. "But he was telling me about his car." Miller wasn't finished giving first aid when word came to continue the retreat.

The Marines in the group started to do so, but Miller screamed for them to wait until he was done with his corpsman-like task. He threatened anyone who thought about leaving. The others waited. Headed down the mountain again, Miller saw "several NVA popping up out of the brush and firing at us. So I fired back. I don't know if I hit any of them, but they were not far away - not at all." Miller's group reached the base of the mountain. "We set up in kind of a defensive perimeter, but we were so far from the rest of the platoon, there was no way to get back," Miller said. "And it was pitch black by then." Edwards was also caught in the chaos, despite his position near the rear of the column. A tear-gas grenade forced him to gasp for breath. Shrapnel from a mortar shell grazed his left temple. Another nearby mortar blast killed Lt. William Reese and wounded Capt. Ward, who later died.

Edwards, who always brought maps and critical communication frequencies into the field with him, found a radio. He contacted Maj. Oliver, who told him to gather everyone he could find and withdraw to Route 9. Edwards happened upon Miera, Miller, Lindell, a communications wireman from his platoon named Wilson and another Marine. (In the confusion, in such complete darkness, Miera, Miller and Lindell didn't know about the other two members of their group until years later.) According to Edwards, "Everyone was wounded to some extend. We took stock of our situation in a gully at the bottom of the ridge." Edwards radioed for an evacuation helicopter. None were available. He told the others and called for a vote on a course of action. Do they spend the night at the base of Valentine's Ridge, or do they try to hack their way through the pitch-dark jungle and reach Route 9?

'Let's get off this hill'

Bleeding from a shrapnel wound near his eye, Miera wasn't sure what he wanted to do, so he asked Edwards if they should try to search out and rejoin the rest of the company still fighting on Valentine's Ridge. Miera didn't like the answer: "John said, 'If we try walking to their perimeter, 100 grenades are going to come our way.' Since he had the highest rank, I said, 'Well, you're in charge.' And he said, 'Let's get off this hill.' " George Lindell recalls "a couple of guys were thinking about trying to reach the road beside the hill." His training took over. "They asked if I wanted to go," Lindell said. "Since one of them was wounded, I figured they may need a corpsman, and I still had my corpsman bag, so I went." It was a terrifying journey.

The group started up the mountain, slipped over the top and dropped down the backside, mostly on their knees and stomachs. Their pace was glacial because of the darkness, the terrain and fear of stumbling upon an enemy that was all around them. We were just trying to find a way out," Miller said. "And in that situation, you are scared sh-less." Miera started as the point man. He used a sheath knife his father had sent him from home in Taos, N.M., to cut a tunnel through the jungle vegetation. Even at such a slow pace, Lindell had a difficult time keeping up. His pants were soaked in blood from ankle to groin and, he was missing one boot, leaving his foot prickled with thorns. "I was falling behind when I heard, very close to me, a large animal breathing," Lindell said. "I assumed it was a tiger or a rock ape. But I wasn't armed and I didn't want to yell out because there was fighting go on all around us. So I kind of whispered to the guys, 'Hey, hey, hey.' They held up until I stumbled up to them."

Edwards replaced Miera as the group's point-man, and Miera dropped behind Lindell, who feared he was becoming a burden. "My leg was cramping and I was exhausted," Lindell said. "I remember telling them, in my best John Wayne voice, to leave me there because I knew I was slowing everybody up. I said they could come back for me. They laughed, quietly of course, and said they'd move as fast as I could. Thank God." Because he still had the radio, Edwards was able to talk to Maj. Oliver and others along Route 9. They kept shooting flares, so any stragglers on Valentine's Ridge would know where to head. "Later," Edwards wrote, "the mortar guys told me they $4,000 on flares." Hours into their journey, Miera "heard someone behind us. So I told John, 'Why don't you guys go about 30 paces and I'll sit here and see what the hell is following us.' Then I thought I'd just rig a grenade with some fishing line my dad had sent. But I thought about that and said, "Sh-, it might be a Marine and I don't want to kill one of our own guys.' "

Edwards was not interested in a confrontation. "We do not fire," he remembered. "They might be Marines and, if they are the enemy, we are in no condition for a fight." Said Miera: "We stopped. They stopped. We stopped. They topped. Then I heard a crack in the brush and a little rock rolled down into the big ravine next to us. That was it."

No love for Valentine's Day

As the pitch darkness at Valentine's Ridge grudgingly surrendered to dawn, the exhausted group inched its way down a stream bed when Edwards heard the voices of Marines patrolling Route 9. Miera's first thought: "I was afraid somebody was going to open up and cut us to pieces." Safely on the road, Miera asked Edwards for his sheath knife - the one they had used to slash their way through the jungle. But it was missing. "Losing that damn buck knife," Edwards wrote, "was the lowest I felt all night." Thirty-five years later, Edwards met up with Miera again.

One of the first things he did was give him a new knife. Edwards, Miera, Miller, Lindell, Wilson and the unidentified sixth Marine were escorted back to Ca Lu for treatment for their wounds and - in Lindell's case - medical evacuation. "Without those guys," said Lindell, who still lives in his Wisconsin hometown, "I would not be here today." A short-timer with only three months left in Vietnam, Miera was "sent to the rear" and served as a military policemen on a bridge in Quang Tri where, he said, "I got shot at more times than I did during that ambush." Miera returned home to New Mexico in July. Miller replaced Cpl. Schneider as a squad leader for a short time before being pulled from his in-country duties to work in "company supply, for some reason." Asked if his experience on Valentine's Ridge still impacts his life, Miller fell silent. After a brief pause, he said, "I never get too happy on any holiday." Todd Wermager, a senior geography major at the University of Wisconsin - Eau Claire, is working on a Historical Geographic Information Systems (GIS) project with Professor Joe Hupy. Joe is a well known geographer who, along with his wife, specializes in soil and terrain disturbances caused by high-explosive artillery and bombs. A few years ago they studied the WWI battleground at Verdun, France and last year, with the assistance of Glenn Prentice, surveyed the Khe Sanh battlefield.

Hupy is inspired to translate the fighting at Khe Sanh into an atlas of maps depicting the precise location and description of fighting. His hope is to allow people to understand the battle at Khe Sanh not only chronologically, but also spatially. He envisions a time when students can, as an example, move a computer cursor to the map location of Hill 861A and learn (from information provided by those who were there) a first-hand description of what took place.

Professor Hupy has chosen the Khe Sanh battlefield, over the many great battlefields of past wars with which he and his wife are familiar, because, as Joe once told me, "students of today's generation should be educated on the Vietnam War and it should be remembered to the utmost degree. " He envisions maps with various themes to help students better comprehend the battle conditions. As an example, one map might indicate where the artillery firing from Co Roc was located and show the range of those guns as opposed to the range of our Howitzers (as they say a "picture is worth a thousand words.")

I hope you KSV members will all consider assisting in this worthwhile project. To do so, or to get further information, please contact Mr. Wermager at WERMAGTA@uwec.edu. Should you have concerns that there might be a hidden agenda here, please check with Ray Stubbe or Glenn, both of whom are familiar with Hupy's work.

Incidentally, Joe recently advised me that he is trying to obtain funding from the university to attend the reunion in Reno this year in order to personally provide Khe Sanh vets with more information about this project.

PUBLISHER NOTE:

I do not know where this article originated or who wrote it. It was sent to me by several members of our organization, who requested it be included in Red Clay.

In a message dated 2/16/2008 5:48:06 P.M. Eastern Standard Time, Nam Vet6 writes:

As I came out of the supermarket that sunny day, pushing my cart of groceries towards my car, I saw an old man with the hood of his car up and a lady sitting inside the car, with the door open. The old man was looking at the engine. I put my groceries away in my car and continued to watch the old gentleman from about twenty-five feet away, when I saw a young man in his early twenties with a grocery bag in his arm, walking towards the old man. The old gentleman saw him coming too and took a few steps towards him. I saw the old gentleman point to his open hood and say something. The young man put his grocery bag into what looked like a brand new Cadillac Escalade and then turn back to the old man and I heard him yell at the old gentleman saying, "You shouldn't even be allowed to drive a car at your age." And then with a wave of his hand, he got in his car and peeled rubber out of the parking lot.

I saw the old gentleman pull out his handkerchief and mop his brow as he went back to his car and again looked at the engine. He then went to his wife and spoke with her and appeared to tell her it would be okay. I had seen enough and I approached the old man. He saw me coming and stood straight and as I got near him I said, "Looks like you're having a problem." He smiled sheepishly and quietly nodded his head. I looked under the hood myself and knew that whatever the problem was, it was beyond me.

Looking around I saw a gas station up the road and told the old gentleman that I would be right back. I drove to the station and went inside and saw three attendants working on cars. I approached one of them and related the problem the old man had with his car and offered to pay them if they could follow me back down and help him.

The old man had pushed the heavy car under the shade of a tree and appeared to be comforting his wife. When he saw us he straightened up and thanked me for my help. As the mechanics diagnosed the problem (overheated engine) I spoke with the old gentleman. When I shook hands with him earlier he had noticed my Marine Corps ring and had commented about it, telling me that he had been a Marine too. I nodded and asked the usual question, "What outfit did you serve with?" He had mentioned that he served with the first Marine Division at Tarawa, Saipan, Iwo Jima and Guadalcanal. He had hit all the big ones and retired from the Corps after the war was over.

As we talked we heard the car engine come on and saw the mechanics lower the hood. They came over to us as the old man reached for his wallet, but was stopped by me and I told him I would just put the bill on my AAA card. He still reached for the wallet and handed me a card that I assumed had his name and address on it and I stuck it in my pocket.

We all shook hands all around again and I said my goodbye's to his wife. I then told the two mechanics that I would follow them back up to the station. Once at the station I told them it was appreciated that they had interrupted their own jobs to come along with me and help the old man. I said I wanted to pay for the help, but they refused to charge me. One of them pulled out a card from his pocket looking exactly like the card the old man had given to me. Both of the men told me then, that they were Marine Corps Reservist. Once again we shook hands all around and as I was leaving, one of them told me I should look at the card the old man had given to me and I said I would and drove off. For some reason I had gone about two blocks when I pulled over and took the card out of my pocket and looked at it for a long, long, time. The name of the old gentleman was on the card in golden leaf and under his name..... "Congressional Medal of Honor Society."

I sat there motionless looking at the card and reading it over and over. I looked up from the card and smiled to no one but myself and marveled that on this day, four Marines had all come together, because one of us needed help. He was an old man alright, but it felt good to have stood next to greatness and courage and an honor to have been in his presence.

America is not at war. The U.S. Military is at war. America is at the Mall.

MEMOIRS

EASTER SUNDAY 40 YEARS AGO

By Mike "Animal" Preston

Do any of you have any memories of Sunday April 16th 1968? I sure do. I remember that day with great clarity, or so I thought until I read a letter at home that I found amongst my mothers papers. She passed a while back and some boxes didn't get examined at that time. About 9 months ago I was doing just that when I came across all the letters I had written my folks during my tour, WOW! what a revelation!

It made it very apparent how the mind and memory can get things screwed up in 40 years. Amongst her letters was letter from a lady friend who lived in Shreveport, La. who informed my mom that I was in an AP wire story in the Shreveport Times. The article was written by Jurarte Kazickas for AP wire services. I called the Shreveport Times and they were glad to send it to me .

This was Jurate's 2nd trip to Khe Sanh, she was there the first time the 7th to 8th of March. She was wounded along with Lt. Bill Gay and 3 others. She went down to Dong Ha to D med I think. Well this ballzy lady came back with operation Pegasus for more. She interviewed three of us, myself, Frank Faur, and Cpl. Al Brewster. Amazing courage to come to a place like Khe Sanh when one did not have to be there; reminds my of Sean Flynn and Dana Stone.

Jurate was a tall (6') raven haired beauty, certainly memorable. Frank Faur remembered her with great clarity. I had a little fun with Frank by calling him up anonymously and asked the question "How Many Easter Eggs Did You Get In 1968! He of course thought this was some kind of nut (he was right) or a crank call. I yanked his chain for a few minutes until I didn't figure he was going to take any more, then I told him who I was. You are now wondering what the hell am I talking about, huh? Well when you read the following article it will become clear and then you can have a good laugh too! Give him a call he lives in "Joysey" now, not far from "Big John".

EASTER EGGS

By JURATE KAZICKAS
KHE SANH, Easter Sunday 16 April 1968

Six thousand Easter eggs arrived by helicopter at Khe Sanh this foggy Sunday morning. Two minutes later six mortar and rocket rounds exploded on the air strip, wounding three Marines.
"They told us there were Easter eggs on the strip," said Marine PFC Frank Faur, Easton, PA. "I went to check them out and then those rounds started coming in. They say the siege of Khe Sanh is over. Who are they trying to kid?"

This was Easter at Khe Sanh. Religious services were held at the base early in the morning, but the men in the field, outside the barbed wire perimeter, had no time for organized prayer. Five miles away, on Hill 881 North, units of the 26th Marine Regiment were fighting an estimated battalion of North Vietnamese soldiers in a bitter struggle to take the hill. Contact continued all day. More than a dozen dirty men with bandaged hands, heads and feet came limping off the choppers from Hill 881 to await evacuation to the medical station at Dong Ha. They had missed the incoming rounds by only a few seconds.

The sun finally broke through the thick clouds, and the uneasiness brought on by the morning attack diminished. Billows of red dust from Jeeps and trucks covered the Marines as they worked near their bunkers, packing their gear. The Marines have been relieved at Khe Sanh by Army troops of the 1st Air Calvary Division. The Leathernecks are expected to be gone in three or four days. " Easter? Yeah, I heard about it on the radio," one Marine said. "I celebrated by jumping into a hole."

Word spread that Easter eggs were to be flown up from Da Nang and distributed. By mid afternoon Marines were carrying pink and green tinted eggs in their helmets. Most of the egg shells were cracked. Some eggs were raw inside, but the men didn't seem to mind."The last time I had eggs was three months ago," said Cpl. Al Brewster, of Delhart, TX. "I can't believe we got them. Its a nice surprise."

Waiting to leave, the Marines made jokes about the eggs, and about the 1st Cav painting their insignia all over the base like they had been there all along or had "saved" the Marines, and joking about the end of two long months of incoming artillery."Am I glad to be getting out of this place," said Seabee Mike Preston of Arnold, California, both of his hands bandaged."That is what happy Easter means"
End of Article

Well now you know about the Great Easter Egg Hunt , why didn't they bring beer? Oh, I remember, they already had beer to go along with their steak sandwich's. I tried to buy some of their beer but they just laughed and said no. Well what was I to do ? Being a SeaBee, I had attained the rank of "Master Comshaw Artist" so I offered them a bottle of "Mikie's Magic Elixir" which was furnished by Sean Flynn for rack rent in the "Hilton", and it worked . I hope they all got drunk.

While I am on the subject of comshaw I just have to stray from Easter for a moment and relate a little episode involving myself and "Flash" Mytnic,(I think). We had a conex box buried for a supply bunker in our equipment yard. A young Marine appeared and said he needed some nails for the CP, I replied, " what do you have to trade?" He informed me that Col. Lownds wanted the nails and he could not believe that someone would shake down a Colonel. He left only to return later with a large can of "real" coffee! I bet the Colonel never knew. I always wondered? One thing for sure is the coffee came from "officer country" and we celebrated with a good cup and some stashed pecan rolls.

Back to Easter Sunday: I am not sure of exact days and dates that things happened, any input would be welcome. I think the siege was officially over on the 8th, and the incoming all but stopped, I recall it got "spooky" quiet. Enter the "Cav." I remember them going around without pots and flak jackets; we on the other hand wore ours even to the "chic sales"; they thought we were nuts.

We had a area for people waiting to be flown out. It was a square of sand bags 4-5 feet high in a square 20 foot square. I was not hurt all that bad, and just hung out letting others who were hurt badly go on to DaNang. When the incoming came in, I thought to my self, yes "Sir Charles" just sprung the trap, let some people get complacent then "Kerblaam". If memory serves me correctly they "walked" the rounds down the runway from about the center of the strip, 150 yards or so from us, towards the south east end of the runway where the "Cavs" helos were staged. I remember a bunch of guys running to the helos and then getting the hell out of there. Did they ever come back ?

I don't know because I got a flight out a couple of hours later. If someone has an answer for me, I'd sure would like to know. I recall reading something about it in Ray's book but it escapes my mind. Whomever said the "siege " was over sure as hell didn't think about hills 881 and 689, and others too many to mention. There was a young Marine on a litter laying next to me who had come off of 881. I don't think he even owned a razor, yet his career in the NFL as a place kicker wasn't going to happen, that was for sure. I held a smoke for him as best I could, he never shed a tear or complained once, brave young man, real Marine grit.

My outfit lost one of our own that day (even though the siege was "over"). SWF2 Edward "Cody" Adams was KIA by arty. I must have a leak in my roof because there are water drops hitting my key board as I write. I sense I will move away from this morbid subject now, and compose myself and regain my sense of humor.

The Marine Corps is certainly the stepchild of the services, when it comes to budget! The helo that I got a ride out on was a CH-34 piston engine job. I am pretty sure, some were retrofitted to gas turbine but I don't think this one was. This was definitely Korean vintage aircraft. Just think it was probably older than most of its passengers! Not me, I was 24. After surviving Khe Sanh your mind starts doing strange things. I started to think of all the guys who died leaving in a chopper or a plane!

My outfit lost a First class BU Charles Spillman just that way! As I gazed at this flying antique it struck me funny that the pilot was sitting right above a big red cross. I thought wow, what a good aiming point for the NVA. Hells-bells why not a cross-hair or a bulls-eye "YIPE"!

Well here is the punch line to this whole article, I have perfect clarity about that day. I can see it in my minds eye at will. But to semi steal a quote from a past president who said "I do not remember that women"! How could I not remember a beautiful round-eye after not seeing one for 5 to 6 months? To much morphine? Distracted by more important things-the wounded around me-concern for them? That is what I remember most vividly for sure, the frustration of not being able to do more for them. I have that same feeling now when I assist a disabled vet now, wishing I could do more, but I do get a lot of satisfaction from what I can do for them. I am really sorry I don't remember Jurate, but with any luck I will meet her some day, maybe in Reno.

About The National Memorial Day Parade

The National Memorial Day Parade, presented by the American Veterans Center, is held annually in Washington DC, and is an opportunity for thousands of patriotic Americans to come together. They honor those who have sacrificed so much in service to our country. The event celebrates all those who have served in uniform from the American Revolution to Operation Iraqi Freedom, and seeks to educate the public about the meaning of this hallowed day.

Over 250,000 patriotic Americans lined Constitution Avenue for the 2007 parade, in honor of all who have served and sacrificed. The Grand Marshals of the 2007 National Memorial Day Parade, our wounded service members from Iraq and Afghanistan, pictured with Honorary Marshal Gary Sinise, star of CSI: New York and Forrest Gump.

For nearly 70 years, Washington, DC—our nation's capital and headquarters of our military—was without a parade on our Armed Services' most sacred day. This despite the fact that parades on Memorial Day have been a tradition in towns across America for well over a century. Sadly, in recent years, many of these parades have been fading away, as the true meaning of Memorial Day is being increasingly forgotten. In 2005, the American Veterans Center decided to bring this great tradition back to the nation's capital by creating the National Memorial Day Parade. Not merely an event for Washington, the National Memorial Day Parade is an event for the entire country—a major parade which seeks to draw the attention of Americans to the real meaning for the holiday: honoring those who have served, and died, to preserve our liberties. The National Memorial Day Parade has quickly become a tradition in which Americans of all ages and generations can share. In only its second year, the parade drew over 250,000 spectators, a testament to the public's desire to honor our heroes in uniform. The parade includes nearly 200 elements, units, youth groups, and parade floats—as well as hundreds of veterans from World War II, Korea, Vietnam, Desert Storm, and Operations Enduring Freedom and Iraqi Freedom.

Pictured on the front cover is our own Khe Sanh Veteran Thomas Tompkins, H&S Co Comm 26th Marines, leading the parade. Thomas is a Civil War re-inactor and was met with thunderous applause when it was announced he was a Khe Sanh survivor. He was also honored by being invited to sit at the podium with VIP 's participating in the Memorial Parade.

VETERANS FROM ALL WARS AND ALL UNITS ARE HONORED IN THE MEMORIAL DAY PARADE

HEADQUARTERS MARINE CORPS (Jan. 28, 2008)

"I am an NCO dedicated to training new Marines and influencing the old. I am forever conscious of each Marine under my charge, and by example will inspire him to the highest standards possible. I will strive to be patient, understanding, just, and firm. I will commend the deserving and encourage the wayward. I will never forget that I am responsible to my Commanding Officer for the morale, discipline, and efficiency of my men. Their performance will reflect an image of me."

(Noncommissioned Officers Creed, Headquarters Marine Corps Promotions Branch)

I can remember the day I got promoted to NCO like it was yesterday. Pinning on that extra stripe didn't just mean extra pay or privileges, it meant I'd achieved a rank that is not taken lightly and is highly respected by all throughout the Marine Corps. That promotion will always be one of the proudest moments in my career.

I have no doubt that getting promoted to NCO is as momentous an occasion for junior Marines nowadays as it was for me back when I got promoted. It was for that reason alone that I felt just as insulted as all of the NCOs around the Corps when I read the "Baby NCOs" story in the Marine Corps Times a couple months ago. Regardless of the story subject, there will never be a time and a place that the words "baby NCO" could be used to accurately describe junior Marines – never!

Getting promoted to any rank in the Marine Corps is an accomplishment and to insinuate that the Corps' new batch of NCOs is going to be any less deserving than their predecessors is absurd. If anything, Marines of this day and age are just as combat hardened and have as great a responsibility as their predecessors. Undeniably the Marine Corps Times supported its story with a memo from the Center for Naval Analyses, but even the analysis didn't show the reader the complete Marine.

About half of the Marine Corps is made up of Marines in the ranks of private through corporal; nearly 70,000 Marines are ages 21 and below. It's these young, junior Marines – through the mentorship of the Corps' great staff noncommissioned officers – who will be carving out the future of the Marine Corps for all to follow. As the senior enlisted Marine in the Corps, I have witnessed the great things the Corps' small-unit leaders are doing both on and off the battlefield.

I have seen Marine NCOs serving in combat in billets one, two, even three ranks higher than their rank dictates – and in some cases, officer billets. I've witnessed junior Marines barely old enough to vote and definitely not old enough to drink, make split-second decisions on the battlefield that saved the lives of many of their fellow Marines.

I've read countless award summaries describing heroic acts by Marines wearing the very rank the Marine Corps Times insulted. I've seen severely wounded Marines more concerned with not letting their fellow Marines down by leaving the battlefield, than they were with receiving life-saving medical treatment. I've visited numerous hospitals where Marine NCOs struggled to rehabilitate themselves in order to simply walk 10 feet after surviving an IED blast in Iraq.

And sadly enough, I've said a silent prayer for the more than 300 Marine NCOs who have given their lives during Operations Iraqi/Enduring Freedom. I'm confident that in five, 10 or 15 years, it will be Medal of Honor recipient Cpl. Jason Dunham or the more than 30 junior Marines who have received either the Navy Cross or Silver Star who will grace the pages of Marine Corps history books. These are the kinds of Marines that are going to be filling the future ranks of the Marine Corps, regardless of what some reporter wants to imply. So when I read a story that mentions anything but praise for the thousands of Marine NCOs around the globe, I feel it is my duty to speak out – it is the right thing to do. I will never sit idle and let anyone speak negatively about the Marines serving in the Corps. he Corps is extremely proud of the Marines serving today and I'm especially proud of the junior Marines who, as I once did, strive to achieve the rank of NCO – one of the best ranks in the Marine Corps. I trust that when promoted, each new NCO will take the NCO Creed to heart and will never let the Corps down.

ONE HOUR OF SLEEP
Steven Wiese B Co 1/26

Sleep-------Will tonight be the night that my sole will rest? Tonight like so many before, will the sounds, the smells, not let me sleep? I hunger for that hour of sleep, where I do not hear, I do not see, the battles of so long ago. The ones I will fight again tonight I'm sure.

How I hunger for that hour of sleep, where my sole will not weep, please let tonight be that night. The one I do not hear the cries, the one I do not lay and wonder why so many years ago I did not die. One hour of sleep for my sole to rest; will tonight be like so many before-the blood and gore, the horrors of war. The memories of those left behind. Please let tonight be the night I capture that hour of rest.

Craig Tourte Writes:
Steve was one of the few survivors of the Ghost Patrol and I know this is a very difficult time of year for him. I also know that his post, was really hard for him to write, I could feel the pain in his words. Some thought it was just a poem and added theirs. I wanted the readers to know who Steve was so I wrote a little story and posted it alongside of his post. I wanted to share it with you.

I read Steve's Posting with a heavy heart. Steve said many things in his short post of around one hundred words. A simple post really, and not so unlike many others that have been posted on this board. Sure I whine and complain a lot, I disagree with some and applaud others' opinions. You've read my postings about how difficult it was for me, food, cold, and deprivation. But come on, we all know that in comparison to others, my experience was really nothing at all. In around one hundred words, Steve said so much more than I have ever said in the thousands of words and stories I have written on this board. Sometimes I say to Steve, "Did I ever tell you about the time I burnt my finger on hot grease." We both laugh, and Steve knows it as my little way of acknowledging the sacrifices and battles Steve went through during his 18 month combat tour in Vietnam, while acknowledging my own lack of combat experience. He kindly never responds with anything more than a smile.

With that said, for those of you who don't know, Steve was a squad leader with Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, and one of the few survivors of the "Ghost Patrol" ambush that took place on February 25, 1968, just a few hundred meters outside the wire of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. I don't want to restate the facts of that horrific and ill fated Patrol, but Steve's personal account of survival is one of the most fascinating recollections I have ever heard in my life. From the on line march forward towards the tree line, to the conversation he had with 2/Lt. Donald Jacques just moments before the overwhelming forces of the North Vietnamese Army practically annulated the Patrol. The devastation caused by the accuracy of the countless automatic and crew-served weapons fired by the enemy, how Steve survived when most around him fell, to his crawling from one dead Marine to another, his desperate attempts to help the wounded, and his long lonely crawl back to the wire of Khe Sanh as he struggled to persevere.

As most of you know, Bravo Company reconstituted itself in the days and weeks that followed and on March 30, 1968, attacked the same tree line. Another horrific battle ensued which is often referred to as the "Revenge Patrol.' What most don't know is that Steve volunteered for that Patrol and once again led his men into the arms of battle, this time, soundly defeating the enemy, but with the unfortunate loss of many heroic Marines. A personal remembrance, just as fascinating as the first, as Steve recounted the many individual acts of heroism amongst the Marines, while minimizing his own efforts."I hunger for that hour of sleep, where I do not hear, I do not see, the battles of so long ago. The one's I will fight again tonight I'm sure." "...will tonight be like so many before-the blood and gore, the horrors of war. The memories of those left behind."

I could not say that in a thousand words and have them mean anything. Steve can write a hundred words and make most of us feel the pain he feels in his heart each and every day. It's a difficult time of year for all of us, full of long, lonely sleepless nights, dreaming those dreams and seeing those young faces, still hearing their screams and cries for help, slowly turning whitish pale as life leaves their battered body, their silent cry of desperation, of trying and wanting to live, and we remember it all, as if it were yesterday. "Sleep---Will tonight be the night my soul will rest?" I think that might be the question that will never be answered.

FOR DEDICATED SERVICE ABOVE AND BEYOND

CHAPLAIN RAY W. STUBBE

Ray W. Stubbe served as a chaplain for the 26TH Marine Regiment at the Khe Sanh Combat Base, from July of 1967 until the siege was lifted in 1968. When Ray returned to life in the United States he had never forgotten. the men who fought and died during their tenure at Khe Sanh. He had a dream that all those brave men, from whichever branch of service they had served in at Khe Sanh, should always remain as a family, to maintain the bond which will always and forever keep them in each others hearts. Ray also felt that an organization was needed to promote renewed fellowship of those who survived the Khe Sanh and RVN experience. Ray's other goals included: collecting and preserving an accurate history of service in and around Khe Sanh, honoring and preserving the memory of those who were either lost at Khe Sanh, later killed in action, or later died of wounds received there, reaching out to the loved ones of those who died, so that they might better understand the nature of their loved ones service at Khe Sanh and also, to promote research and understanding of the Khe Sanh experience to help heal wounds both physical and mental, of our Khe Sanh experience.

Legend has it that the organization started at a local watering hole in 1983, when Ray provided other members with a list of 19 other Khe Sanh Veterans. These Khe Sanh Veterans formed the association and elected a board of directors, with of course, Ray becoming President, and Earle Breeding being elected Treasurer. When asked how he was chosen, Earle will tell you that when they passed the hat around for donations; they used his hat. From those 19 names, people began being contacted, thus other new members joined. By the following year, membership had doubled; in February of 1986, the first newsletter was mailed out to 350 members. These men reached out to other veterans they had known, and the list rapidly grew. On September 1, 1988, the Khe Sanh Veterans were legally incorporated. Through the continuing efforts of Ray Stubbe, we now have a membership of over 3,000. Ray had not only reached, but exceeded every goal he had set out to accomplish for our organization. He is, and will always be, the HEART & SOUL of the KHE SANH VETERANS.

IN MEMORY

We remember now, our brothers who died because of what happened at a place called Khe Sanh in the country of Vietnam. It is appropriate for us who are veterans of those events to do so. It is incumbent upon us who carry the precious memory, however also painful, to ensure that these men, and what they did, are not forgotten.

For those who served at Khe Sanh, this list may assist you to piece together just what happened in the chaos of battle. This list may prompt you to face your pain and, knowing the truth, be freed. This list may help you find a name of a close friend, perhaps even someone who saved your life, a name that you perhaps have since forgotten-so when you visit the Memorial Wall in DC you may be able to pay your respects- to touch the name, make a rubbing, place a flower or memento, shed a tear, say a prayer, to pause, to reflect. Hopefully this list will facilitate closure of open, unhealed wounds.

Names cast in bronze, engraved on a wall
Faces branded upon our hearts
We cannot forget; we know them all
Soul-seared scenes that n'er depart.

Perhaps this listing will finally put to rest the questions of casualties at Khe Sanh: how many there really were. Perhaps this may enlighten others to appreciate however limited, your experience there, as a World War I poet (E.M. Walker) put it:

Now you are one with us, you know our tears..
You have tasted of our hopes and fears.."

THE KHE SANH VETERANS 2011 MEMBERSHIP DIRECTORY

For those who did not serve at Khe Sanh, this list will reflect the cost of battle; it indicates the burden and the price of serving. When President Kennedy declared in his Inaugural Address of 23 January 1961: " we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty.. And so ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country," perhaps we really did not comprehend the magnitude of the price and the greatness of the burden when these words motivated so many to go to Vietnam.

How can one read through these pages without realizing just how good and decent these young men were who gave so much, who cared so deeply about others? Although the full story surrounding each loss is not provided-not enough books could contain a full description of the degree of caring, sacrifice, giving, service and dedication that was the common characteristic of all who died. Alongside such dedication, however, remains the horrible nastiness and, brutality of war, of which US Confederate General Robert E. Lee once remarke4 in 1862 after watching the slaughter at Fredericksburg: "It is well that war is so terrible or we should grow fond of it." For those who were not at Khe Sanh, may this confrontation with the specter that jolts into greater appreciation those who fight the wars to which politicians and civilians send as so many "hot hearts for chilling deeds" [Sophocles, Antigone], and greater soul-searching deliberation before committing them.

In a much greater purpose, however, this special listing is neither to prove a point to posterity, nor to benefit those of us who still remember and cannot forget; this document is really for our brothers. It is to honor these men who died "because of Khe Sanh," that this listing has been compiled, out of love to them and respect for them.

KHE SANH
FIRMLY STOOD
THE FEW
COURAGEOUS SHARING LIFE IN SERVING SERVING LIFE IN SHARING VICTORIOUS
SEMPER FIDELIS

By far the greater number are those who died thinking of others, that others might live. Not all died in some especially heroic manner, some were simply ensnared in webs of death spun by others, and yet were involved in living to serve which is why they were there. For the most part, these are ordinary men involved with their destiny of extraordinary deeds and circumstances. Heroes always change what is, confront that which means life-or-death for others, and transform the situation by their personal involvement in it. These are real people yet great people, ordinary people yet extraordinary. These are people who make a difference.

One Khe Sanh vet stated: "..he was more than just a battlefield statistic. It's funny how an average person reading books about a particular battle-these KIA's are just statistics or names. But every KIA had somebody in their outfit that could tell you a personal story about them. "[Daniel O. Allen] Kevin Macaulay says: We are all better persons for having known them.

Another reason for these lists is to note the trauma of those who were near their friends who died and who have carried these memories. "Surely, he hath home our grief's and carried our sorrows." [Isa 53.4]. One vet declares: "We are the tears of those who died." May those who read this document gain a greater appreciation of those who lived these experiences and now carry these memories since for some, the memory is like a scratch in an LP record that repeats the same portion of a melody. Maybe this list will enable the picking-up of the playing arm so that the song may continue.

Listen

Listen close

there is a voice for each and every name a silent picture for a distant friend a memory shared with subdued words timeless conversations easing the pain of loss left behind yet carried where weary feet drag through the passage of time

And its sudden stopping imparting a message to the stunned the living those stumbling for meaning crying in their relief mourning the loss
Avoiding the answer of when

of who

for some even yesterday
And then there is the future the utterance of all of companionship
And love.

Poem by Talis Kaminskis, 1994

Of those left behind
By those who remain
Memories of comrades
Of blood, and of pain
