The sergeant major – again, he's not really a sergeant major but, he did act the part – could take a few lessons in driving. Not that the driving environment was the best but his handling of the clutch and the brake and the accelerator, were, at best, uncoordinated. Not knowing where we were but, unlike the C5, at least we could see out. Iraqis were less than three feet from me. We were held up by a huge traffic jam. Just like LA, I thought. Now what would keep a would-be terrorist from just walking up to us, at a standstill, and just blast away? Not a nice thought. We made it through the emboutillage and plowed on through traffic first to the left, then to the right. Not much talk in the vehicle, just cigar smoke and guns out the window. Everything had a thin layer of dust and the buildings were all brown. Just to our left I saw the crossed swords that were always shown on TV. Paris has the Eiffel tower, NYC has the Empire State Building, Rome the coliseum. Baghdad has crossed swords. We approached a large arch, heavily guarded by tracked vehicles and soldiers. Driving beneath it, we entered the green zone, and apparently, relative safety. We continued along a barricaded street and drove past the Palace with the bust of Saddam Hussein on top. We drove through another arch, around barricades and then turned to the right to the IPC headquarters, stopped in front of a white building and unloaded everyone and everything. We stayed there for about 2 hours and then the sergeant major turned and pointed at me. "You're with me." I said "Yes Sir."

Back into the SUV, all gear accounted for and we went to the Palace and my new home for the next many months. We parked in a large dusty lot and unloaded my things and lugged and pulled them to the security gate several hundred feet away. The sergeant major assisted me through the gate with the aid of my military ID card that was issued to me in Virginia, and I met my escort. The sergeant major said "See ya. Have fun. Be careful." With the assistance of Paul Dobie and Captain Brian Song, I found my way past the guards to wherever: billeting, office keys, ID badge, in-processing, travel orders, name, rank. "Oh you're a civilian. Sign here." Papers attesting to this and that, forms to be filled out - last name first, first name last, but the very next form was reversed: first name first and last name last. Scratched out my name to re-write it. Social security number. "Want my passport number?" "No just your social." Confusion, barb wire, blockades, fences, signs, noise all around, helicopters flying overhead, soldiers everywhere, guns all about, humvees, dust, noise, more noise, more dust. I was at the Palace. A man approached me. "Come with me, I'll show you your billet." My last billet, the night before, I remembered, was, in fact, a pallet. Things can only get better. Outside the gate, past another gate and sandbags and rows of barb wire and armed soldiers, down a path two inches deep in dust, past white trailers all lined up nice and neat, past row 6, turn right, all the way down row 5, to unit 10, left side or, rather, 5/10Left. Key in the door. Enter; air conditioner full blast to combat the intense heat from the Iraq sun.

"Ok," the man says, as he fumbles with his clipboard, turning some pages and removing the cap from his Bic ballpoint pen with his teeth. "Foster, Gary, social 242-76-6485, civilian, room 5/10 Lima." I stood dumbfounded. "Confirm with me," he said, as he gestures around the room: Bed frame. One each. Mattress. One each, Sheets, white, blanket, gray. One set. Pillow. One each. Curtains. One set, blue. Closet with four shelves. One each. Nightstand, one each with two shelves. Night lamp with working 25 watt bulb, One each." The man checks to be sure it turns on. "Keys to room and closet. Don't lose them," he says as he hands them to me. "All in order, sign here, and initial each item." I take the clipboard and do as I am told and hand it back to the man. "Take care and have a good day and welcome to Baghdad." The man leaves, I look around at my new home: nine feet by nine feet, by eight feet high. Wow, and the closet has four shelves! Imagine. Hey, and a night lamp. With a 25 watt lightbulb! Unbelievable. This is truly living. And, further, I get one window with blue curtains. I look out and see another trailer three feet away. Great view. The air conditioner works. "Ka-chunk." The air conditioner compressor kicks in. Helicopters fly overhead, shaking the world to pieces. What a din they make! I look at my watch. It's 3PM. No, it's fifteen hundred hours, I unsling my computer from my shoulder and drop it to the floor. I move my other luggage and kick off my shoes covered in dust and lie down on the bed – one each, I remind myself - and close my eyes. The helicopters returned, flying right overhead, rattling the windows and shaking the box I now live in. The whacking noise of the rotor blades faded slowly into the distance. I opened my eyes, burning from the dust and lack of sleep, and looked straight up at the stark ceiling. With my mind blank, my body drained, I asked myself: what was it the man said? "Welcome to Baghdad." I fell asleep.

KHE SANH IS STILL MAIMING & KILLING

Do Thien Dang, a victim of unexploded ordnance is seen at his mushroom farm in Vietnam's central Quang Tri province, 600 km (372 miles) south of

Hanoi, Feb. 28, 2007. (Kham/Reuters)

KHE SANH, Vietnam — Swishing his metal detector across the red dirt of his backyard, Le Van Thang points to the spot where he buried two grenades. He found the explosives about five years ago while plowing the family garden. He says he called authorities to take them away, but they refused. "The soldiers said two grenades weren't enough to bother with," Thang explains. "They said to call them back if I found more."The explosives have been sitting there under a tree, just a couple of yards from his back door, ever since.

Thang lives just outside Khe Sanh, in Vietnam's Quang Tri province. His two-room concrete home sits on a jungle-covered hilltop about 15 miles from the former demilitarized zone (DMZ). Until 1975, the DMZ divided the communist north from the pro-Western south. It was the site of some of the fiercest fighting of the Vietnam War, and as a result, is littered with explosives.

Unfortunately, Thang's situation is not uncommon. Thirty-five years after the end of the war, families across the central provinces live in fear of explosions that happen on a regular basis.

In early 2010 alone there were several blasts. Locals were burning a stump when a bomb rocked a schoolyard in Dong Ha, about 30 miles east of Khe Sanh, shaking walls and shattering windows. Luckily all 550 students were in class at the time of the blast and escaped injury.

About a week later, a man was seriously injured while weeding a coffee plantation beside the former U.S. Marine base outside Khe Sanh. Then, in February, just before the Vietnamese New Year, a 40-year-old man was killed while clearing weeds from his banana trees.

Many of the accidents involve unexploded cluster munitions, large weapons often deployed from the air that release dozens, sometimes hundreds, of smaller, baseball-sized "bomblets," or "grenades." They were widely used in the central provinces during the Vietnam War.

Cluster bombs blanket large swaths of land and have a high "dud" rate, meaning they don't explode on contact and go on injuring and killing civilians long after wars officially end. Experts say the cluster bombs used in Vietnam are estimated to have a "dud" rate between 5 and 40 percent.

Three years ago, while digging for scrap metal, Thang came across a cluster bomb and carries the scars of that encounter with him today.:

POETRY

FACES

Faces,
forever young and eager, hearts aglow, of a time gone by and days of long ago.

Faces,
etched in memories, burned into the mind,
men of Honor and Courage are their kind.

Faces,
never mind their color, race or creed,
they were always there in the hour of need.

Faces,
Into the breach they willingly go,
For their fellow man they charge the foe.

Faces,
they die today to right the wrong, for Fallen Warriors gone to long.

Faces,
for them they set the standard high,
and on this day they do or die.

Faces,
they sacrificed for those who went before,
as they have done since times of yore.

Faces,
Of the fallen, never to fade away,
'till on the morn of calling,
when we shall be called away.

3 STARS

By Craig Tourte

I continue to visit my old hangout of Ernie's Interlude even though I have moved out of town. I return once a week to play golf with the boys but no longer consume adult beverages because I now must drive home, unlike the old days when I could simply walk a couple of blocks to my house. I realize I am much better off for it, but I sure had a lot of fun in those days. Ernie's had not changed much since it open in 1959, but eventually all things must change and so it is for Ernie's, having been sold early this year to an interesting young lady who doesn't much care about keeping the place as it was. The photographs of the now gone and mostly forgotten have been removed from the walls, replaced by new paint, brighter mood lights and low cost pictures of adult beverages purchased from a discount retailer and a much cleaner restroom.

The day and early evening crowd has pretty much remained the same but I heard the crowd that comes in the later hours is much younger. I'm fairly well known now, having gone through most of the stories of how I almost single handed won the war, and I have handed out various necklaces and bracelets I have made to the few Vietnam Veterans who are still around and to a couple of civilians who served in Vietnam as contract employees supporting the military effort.

Yesterday just before I left, one of the guys said that he wanted to talk to me and asked if he could speak to me privately. I was just a little reluctant as the last time we spoke, he spent way too much time telling me how he found the Lord, not that there is anything wrong with that, when one is in the correct frame of mind. Anyway, we go outside and sit on the bench and I'm hoping this is not going to take a whole lot of time and he is not going to invite me to learn more about the Lord or ask me to loan him money. As he is talking my mind is wandering off some where and I'm not really tracking the subject matter. He pulls out a business card with the name of a Marine Corps General on it and then shows me a Challenge Coin.

I'm still not focusing on the connection between he and the General, something about a family gathering or wedding or something. I smile and try to look interested. My friend then asks if I would mind making a necklace and bracelet for the General and write a little something about the bead colors. I tell him sure, I'll be happy to do that and confirm that the General served in Vietnam.

At home that evening I started to think about the colors used in the necklaces and various stickers with the green, yellow and red colors. I come up with my own theory which I knew was wrong and POSTED a little something on the board hoping for some correct input, which was kindly provided by Leland. I managed to put together a pretty impressive necklace and bracelet and then wrote the below note to my friend. "Please find the packet I have made for General XXX which includes a necklace and bracelet and three Khe Sanh Challenge Coins, two gold and one silver. One of the gold coins is for you. Along with these I have also placed a couple of issues of our Khe Sanh Veterans Association magazine "Red Clay." Please note the numerous articles authored by yours truly. You'll also note there are no advertisements and most, if not all of the stories and articles are first hand accounts.

The Khe Sanh Veterans Association is open to any member of the military or civilian who served on, near, over or around the United States Marine Corps Combat Base during the years of that war 1962-1972. During the Siege of that base, roughly the months January 21, 1968 to mid April 1968, it is estimated that around 6,000 service members served on the base and the surrounding hills.

Many years have passed and unfortunately a great number of us who endured the Siege have passed away. If the Association were limited to those who served only during the Siege, the Association would be few in number so we accept anyone who fought in the area of operation included air crew members flying above and those who fought at the Army Special Forces Base at Lang Vei which was just a few miles away from the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The battle of Lang Vei, which occurred on February 7, 1968, was significant in that it was the first time the North Vietnamese used tanks while assaulting a fix position. That story is chronicled in the book "Night of the Silver Stars" by William Phillips. Many survivors of that desperate fight attend our annual Khe Sanh reunions." "Vietnam Veterans have taken to placing various items on their automobiles, wearing jewelry or other trinkets which identifies themselves to other Vietnam Veterans. Most notable these include something with the colors green, yellow and red aligned in the order of: Green, yellow, red, yellow, red, yellow, red, yellow and then green, all usually aligned in a vertical fashion.

The South Vietnam flag was yellow in color with three spaced red horizontal lines. You'll notice that when Americans use these colors the outside borders are green and the red lines are vertical. Seems there are a number of opinions on why this is, but most likely it is because these stickers and other devices - including the necklace and bracelet - are modeled after the Vietnam Service Ribbons/Medal with the red horizontal lines rotated 90 degrees. The green seems to be a carry over from the green Vietnam Campaign Ribbon/Medal which is green and white with vertical stripes. In addition to those colors mentioned, the necklaces and bracelets that many American Vietnam Veterans wear - and those who support and recognize the sacrifice of these veterans - often contain the colors black and white to symbolize those "Missing in Action" and not forgotten.

On occasion you'll also see some blue beads or something blue in color which represents the red, white and blue of the flag of the United States and again, everyone has an opinion on this and I guess it is up to the person who made the device to make the call on what the colors mean to him." "I invite anyone who is interested to visit the private membership web site, "Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page" and the official Association site "Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc." "That said, here is the "Quid Pro Quo," I'd like an autographed business card and photo from General XXX and perhaps he could send me a short note I could submit to our magazine for publication consideration.

I recently met John L. Estrada the 15th Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps (Page 35 & 36) who was kind enough to send me his Challenge Coin along with an autographed photo and business card. In July of 2007 I was honored to have a personal tour of the office of the Commandant of the Marine Corps, General James T. Conway at the Pentagon in Washington D.C., and was presented with one of his business cards." "Hope this meets your requested. Please let me know if there is anything else I can do for you." I called my friend on the telephone and told him that I'd drop off the items at the bar this afternoon. I was listening to him now and discovered that his friend the General was currently on active duty and was a 3 Star Lieutenant General in the Marine Corps currently stationed in Washington D.C. I wonder if I'll get an autographed photograph from him and one of his challenge Coins, I'll let you know.

FOLLOWUP ARTICLE 3 STARS GENERAL PANTER

You'll recall my June 30th POST titled "3 Stars" - in which an acquaintance requested that I make a necklace and bracelet for his friend Lieutenant General Frank A. Panter and along with that, provide a little account describing the history of the green, yellow and red colors. Of course I was happy to comply with his request. I made up a little packet which included not only a necklace and bracelet but in addition, I included a couple of "Red Clay" magazines and one of our Khe Sanh Gold Challenge Coins. I wrote a little brief which I knew he would forward along to the General and requested that in return - kind of a Quid Pro Quo - I would like an autographed photograph of the good General and one of his business card. In today's mail I received a wonderful autographed photograph of General Panter, a business card and a beautiful Marine Corps Challenge Coin with the inscription "Headquarters Marine Corps - Washington DC - Deputy Commandant - Installations and Logistics." The writing on the photograph reads, "To Craig Tourte and all the Khe Sanh Veterans. Thank you sincerely for your sacrifice and dedication. Semper Fi, Frank Panter, Lt. Gen USMC."

MEET WITH SGT MAJOR ESTRADA

David Tonick and I left New Mexico after the dedication of the "Khe Sanh Bridge" on May 27, 2010. The Acoma Native American People, as will as all the others we had the pleasure of meeting in New Mexico were more than hospitable and we found the countryside rugged, colorful, historic and strangely inviting.

We both wore the new Khe Sanh shirts that we received from Tom Eichler in appreciation of our traveling to New Mexico from California and assisting in the dedication ceremony. It was early afternoon as we sat in the Albuquerque New Mexico airport waiting for our flight home when a man approached and thanked us for our service. He continued that he had also served in the Marine Corps and mentioned that we, and all of those who went before us, set the standard for today's Marines.

CRAIG TOURTE & SGTMAJ ESTRADA

We voiced our appreciation of his recognition and sat back down as he walked towards his flight gate on the other side of the building. A few minutes later the same man returned and told us that he had retired from the Marine Corps two years ago and then he presented us with a challenge coin. I held it in my hand as I looked it over and noted the words "John J. Estrada, Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps." I was a bit taken back and terrible impressed that he would thank us for our service. We visited for a few minutes and he gave both David and myself his business card and promised to provide a second coin so we both would have one.

When I got home I found that Sergeant Major Estrada was originally from the nation of Trinidad and Tobago and immigrated to the United States at the age of twelve. He enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1973 and did his recruit training at Parris Island. He served the majority of his early years in the Marine Corps in various air wings and in 1982 as a Staff Sergeant, became a Drill Instructor the Recruit Depot in San Diego.

In 1990 as a First Sergeant he served in Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance in Okinawa Japan and later with Light Armored Reconnaissance Battalion, 1st Marine Division at Camp Pendleton. From 1995 to 1998, Sergeant Major Estrada served with BLT 2/1 and then deployed with the 11th Marine Expeditionary and 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit to the Western Pacific and the Arabian Gulf. He participated in Operation Southern Watch and Operation Iraqi Freedom.

Sergeant Major Estrada assumed his post as the 15th Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps on June 26, 2003. On April 25, 2007, Sergeant Major Estrada stepped down from his post as Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps, turning over the post to Sergeant Major Carlton Kent. He retired from the Marine Corps in June 2007. I have met many during my various travels, at times just wearing something that identifies the Marine Corps brings a "thank you for your service" greeting. On the occasion that I wear a "Khe Sanh" shirt or hat or other means of identifying myself as a Khe Sanh Veterans, I am most often offered a hand shake or personal comment or greeting. Of course, I appreciate them all and I am most appreciative that the former Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps took a few minutes to thank all of us, when he took the time to talk to David and myself. On behalf of all Khe Sanh Veterans, thank you Sergeant Major John L. Estrada for showing your appreciation for those who fought so hard at the "Battle of Khe Sanh."

PAST SERVICEMEN HONORED AT BRIDGE DEDICATION

Published Thursday, May 27, 2010

CIBOLA COUNTY - On May 26, transportation officials were joined by members of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., New Mexico Department of Veterans Services, Vietnam Veterans of America and local officials to pay tribute to veterans at a dedication ceremony for the new Khe Sanh Bridge.

The bridge was dedicated to honor and preserve the memory of those servicemen who were killed in action or later died of their wounds while fighting at the Battle of Khe Sanh, Vietnam. The Battle of Khe Sanh claimed the lives of 2,097 U.S. servicemen.

In November 2009, an official scenic historic marker was erected alongside Highway 124 (the historic Route 66) about one mile east of the Khe Sanh Bridge. The historic marker was dedicated to the ten New Mexico servicemen who lost their lives at the Battle of Khe Sanh. In April 2010, the State Transportation Commission approved naming the structure to the Khe Sanh Bridge. The structure will symbolize bridging the gap that bonds all veterans and their families together and will forever keep them in each other's hearts.

Transportation officials and dignitaries such as Representative Ken Martinez, Allen Weh, a veteran of the battle and a Republican governor candidate and Cibola County Commission Chairman Eddie Michael were among the speakers at the event that drew a crowed of more than 100 people. Weh is a retired colonel who spoke at the event of his first assignment experience at Khe Sanh.

"Many veterans from all over the country fought and lost their lives at this battle," said Transportation Commission Chairman Johnny Cope. "The Khe Sanh Bridge is dedicated to their courage and sacrifice."

"I am deeply honored to dedicate this bridge to those who served at Khe Sanh and gave the ultimate sacrifice," said District Six Transportation Commissioner Jackson Gibson. "As a Vietnam veteran, I am also proud that the traveling public will be reminded of our freedom and the price that comes with that freedom, every time they drive along the Khe Sanh Bridge."

"Our veterans are heroes and the Khe Sanh Bridge stands as a symbol of their battle for freedom," said Transportation Secretary Gary L.J. Girón. "Their sacrifice and service will never be forgotten."

The Khe Sanh Bridge, located along I-40 at Exit 104, was reconstructed in 2008.

KHE SANH BRIDGE DEDICATION

By Craig W. Tourte

On May 26, 2010, it was an honor to once again return to the great State of New Mexico (Red Clay Magazine, Spring 2010, Issue 75, Khe Sanh Memorial Road Marker) and stand with Tom Eichler, David Tonick, Ray Palmer, Earl Clark and numerous other veterans for the dedication of the "Khe Sanh Bridge" in recognition of those who were lost during the "Battle of Khe Sanh." Those appearing on the Agenda represented a wide range of dignitaries' from the state and surrounding Native American lands.

As noted on the agenda schedule, "The Posting of the Colors was preformed by the Vietnam Veterans of America, Northern New Mexico Chapter 996. The invocation by Pueblo of Acoma 2nd Lt. Governor Ron Charlie. Past President Khe Sanh Veterans Tom Eichler. District Six Transportation Commissioner Jackson Gibson. Rebecca Montoya for Transportation Secretary Gary L.J. Giron. Message from Transportation Commission Chair Johnny Cope. Sarah Cobb for U. S. Senator Tom Udall. New Mexico Representative W. Ken Martinez. Cibola County Commission Chair Edward Michael. Tom Wagner for New Mexico Veterans' Services Secretary John Garcia. Colonel (Retired) Allen Weh. Native American Indian Veteran Sergeant of Arms Harold Lockwood. Closing Prayer by Pueblo of Laguna 2nd Lt. Governor Marvin Trujillo, Jr."

I met Harold E. Lockwood (HMH-CH-53) for the first time on November 10, 2009, when Tom, David and I traveled to New Mexico for the dedication of the "Khe Sanh Memorial Road Marker." Harold is really the unsung hero and driving force behind these two memorials. As I watched Harold stand at the lectern, addressing visitors and various state and local dignitaries, speaking of "Our Spirit World," and how significant this memorial was to his people, I was struck by his commanding presence. His sweeping arm gestures and a clear voice demanded attention, recognition and respect. Khe Sanh Veterans and especially the Veterans from the state of New Mexico, can thank the Native American People and in particular Harold Lockwood, for his gallant effort, persuasive abilities, intelligence and perseverance in prevailing on the state of New Mexico to name these two memorials in honor of those who fought and died at Khe Sanh.

The invocation was given by Pueblo of Acoma 2nd

Lt. Governor Ron Charlie and the closing prayer by Pueblo of Laguna 2nd Lt. Governor Marvin Trujillo, Jr., a former Officer in the United States Marine Corps. Both spoke in the beautiful Keresan language of the Keres Pueblo People. Although I did not understand the words, I certainly understood the meanings and was especially moved when Mr. Trujillo translated some of his message into English and used the word "Creator" in his litany, which was a wonderful way to address the beliefs of all who were in attendance.

I was particularly impressed that New Mexico Representative W. Ken Martinez took time in his busy schedule to drive some one hundred and fifty miles to personally attend this dedication. The reasons were clear, and his sincerity impressive when he said, "Western New Mexico honors our Veterans."

He was there as proof of those statements.

Once again Tom Eichler emceed the dedication, introducing the various speakers, honored guests and dignitaries. Tom presented no less than twenty-nine individual plaques of appreciation from "Khe Sanh Veterans" which he personally authored, had printed, framed and then read each inscription as he made the presentations. In additional to all of his individual effort, Tom gave the following remarks on behalf of Khe Sanh Veterans:

The Battle of Khe Sanh has been described as the longest and deadliest battle of the Vietnam War. Forty two years ago and nine thousand miles away from home, the attention of this nation was focused on the Marines, Soldiers, Sailors and Airmen who stood shoulder to shoulder on the hills and in the muddy trench lines and collapsing bunkers of the United States Marine Corps combat base located in the far North West corner of what was then South Vietnam. So isolated was the Khe Sanh combat base that Brigadier General Lowell English once complained that "when you're at Khe Sanh, you're not really anywhere." For seventy seven horrific days and nights, these brave men, comprising one reinforced American regiment of less than six thousand, held out against an overwhelming North Vietnamese Army force of more than two divisions of hardened combat soldiers.

At the time, President Lyndon Johnson said about Khe Sanh, "...more than any other stretch of territory, it is a place where the meaning of this war is clearly revealed. This is a decisive time in Vietnam. The eyes of the nation and the eyes of the entire world - the eyes of all of history itself - are on the little, brave band of defenders who hold the pass at Khe Sanh..."

With little food and water, the ammunition depot destroyed, facing frontal assaults on the defensive perimeter by the North Vietnamese, thousands of artillery, rocket and mortars shells raining down twenty four hours a day, the defenders of the combat base at Khe Sanh were virtually cut off from any outside support and were absorbed in an hourly struggle for their very survival. According to calculations accompanied by names and dates of death, it has been determined that over one thousand United States Servicemen lost their lives during that infamous seventy seven day siege.

The mention of Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy in President Obama's inaugural address, forever confirms to our nation and the world that the Battle of Khe Sanh holds a significant place in America history.

Today the name Khe Sanh holds a special place in the hearts and minds of those of us who participated in that battle. For those who survived those long and deadly months on top of the Khe Sanh plateau and on some of the surrounding hills, the name Khe Sanh denotes a place of reverence and is consider by many to be hallowed ground. For many of us who were there, Khe Sanh is a place where the souls and spirits of our fallen bothers will forever reside.

It is amongst the Native American Acoma People that the great State of New Mexico chose to honor the memory of those who faced such incredible hardships at Khe Sanh, by naming this bridge in their honor. As we stand here looking out across the Acoma, viewing the beautiful unbroken red earth valley and hills, not so dissimilar in color to the red clay earth of Khe Sanh and glance up into the wide open sky, we understand why fate has brought "The Battle of Khe Sanh" road marker and the naming of the Khe Sanh bridge here. Somehow fate has brought us to this spot, because this ground is also a sacred and hollowed place. It is a place where Native American People have also faced great hardship and sacrifice and a place where their ancestors, including those who fought at Khe Sanh, will forever be. Hallowed ground, a roadside marker and now a bridge, a connection, a passageway, with a name and a place that honors those who sacrificed so much.

On behalf of all Khe Sanh Veterans, I want to thank the state of New Mexico and the Native American people for remembering Khe Sanh by naming this bridge in their lasting honor."

As the dedication was coming to a close, I once again took a few minutes to reflect on this place. The statement made in Tom's speech attributed to Brigadier General Lowell English came to mind, "When you're at Khe Sanh, you are not really anywhere." That may have been true then, but what makes Khe Sanh some place that is significant is the memory of the fallen, now forever remembered by a Road Marker and a Bridge not far from Mt. Taylor, or Tspina "Tsoodzil" the turquoise mountain, sacred to Native Americans. I am confident, that from the day of this dedication, not one of the ten's of thousand who pass by will forget who we were, what we did, that so many were lost and that we all loved America.

I GET PICTURES

Dear Tom,

Really enjoyed issue 75 of RED CLAY. Over the years, I've sent in photos that I took in March of 67. In particular shots of a memorial service held on 23 March for the men of E 2/9 and B 1/9 KIA on and near to Hill 861(16 March 67). Actually Danny Schuster (E 2/9) had one printed with a letter he submitted to RED CLAY, but he forgot to ask for my permission, and didn't really know that I had taken it. That was OK with me since he got my photo published. Well, I'm going to try again. I've always believed that these photos represent a tribute to all those who died at Khe Sanh. Thank you for your consideration.

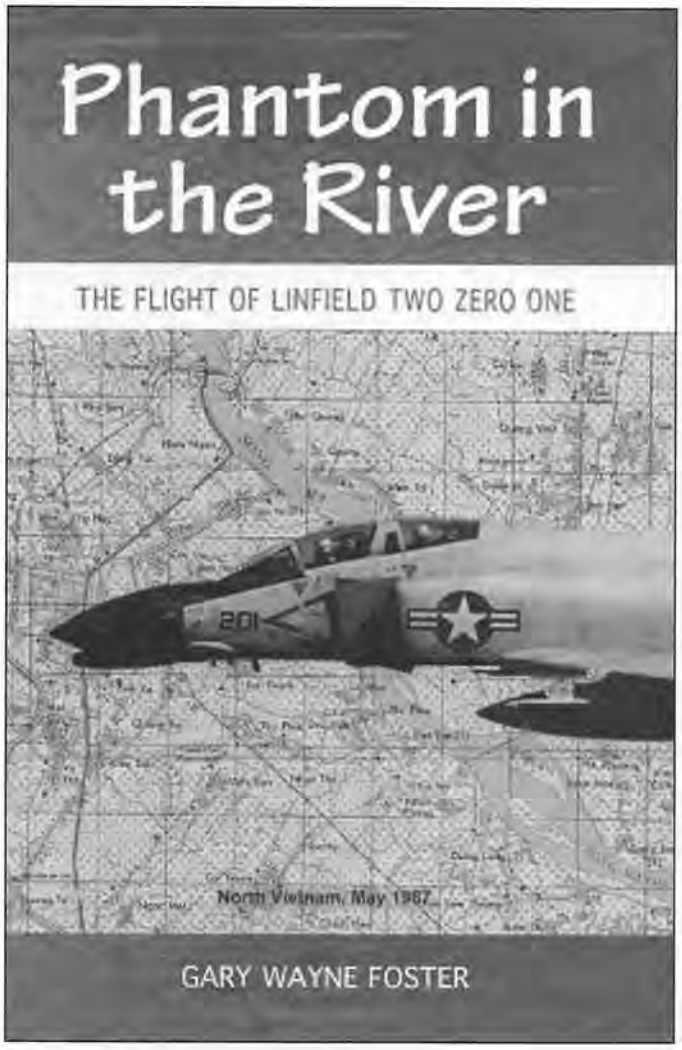
BOOK REVIEW



INSPIRING –WELL DONE!

As the non-technical daughter of Herman Barkey, the "Father of the F-4", I was impressed and fascinated by the detailed account Gary Foster portrayed in "Phantom in the River". His chronology of the mission to destroy a critical bridge should be of interest to both the military professional and aerospace enthusiast. Gary's in– depth interviews especially with the downed pilots effectively portray the human emotions of our lengthy conflict in southeast Asia. It also reflects the mind set of the enemy. Congratulations, Gary, on a difficult task - well done!
P.S. Having also worked at McDonnell Douglas where the F-4, F-15. F-18, etc. originated, "Phantom in the River" is inspiring.

Phantom in the River

Who amongst those of us who survived the Siege of the United States Marine Corps Combat of Khe Sanh could forget the awesome power of the Air Force, Navy and Marine Corps F-4 Phantom II jet war planes with bombs, bullets and napalm, working the hills, valleys and the creeping ever closer trench lines of the North Vietnamese.

In his book "Phantom in the River," Mr. Foster offers a short 217 page history of that fine aircraft from inception, forward thinking design of Herman Barkey, development, production and the delicate "danger management" intricacies of carrier combat operations to the moment to moment description of the shoot down in North Vietnam on May 14, 1967, of Linfield Two Zero.

One from the USS Kitty Hawk and the flight crew comprised of Charles Everett Southwick and David John Rollins and their desperate attempt to save their fatally stricken Phantom. Within the first few pages, Mr. Foster acknowledged the many who assisted in his nine year research of facts and writing effort including, but not limited to Khe Sanh Veterans John Pessoni, Reverend Ray Stubbe, Bob Arrotta, Tommy Eichler, Mike Archer and Dennis Mannion.

Mr. Foster's professional writing ability, engineering experience, attention to detail, vast amount of research, which included visits to the crash site in Vietnam of Linfield Two Zero One and conversations with those who were present during the shoot down and in-depth interview of the crew who revisited their Phantom some 35 years later, as it now sits at the Air Defense Museum in Hanoi, is a compelling composition of that beautify aircraft known as the F-4 Phantom and the air war in Vietnam

Phantom's Story

I found the Phantom in the River: Flight of Linfield Two Zero One an entertaining easy read. The author has blended the personal stories of the people involved on both sides with a thorough and complete technical analysis of the flight and what brought the aircraft down. I enjoyed the mix of the personal stories with the technical details. I was first totally engrossed in the personal stories in the beginning of the book. They are very well written making me feel like I was there talking with them in person. The many photos made the stories and the people come alive.

The details of how the flight took place were also very interesting. I got the feel of the aircraft carrier and what it must have been like taking off day after day to go on the next mission. Mr. Foster also provides great insight into the aircraft itself. He has spent time in Viet Nam and has personally climber all through the wreckage. This was coupled with research into the aircrafts design and construction.

This work has been painstakingly researched and is very well written. I picked the book up and read it through in one day anxious for the next part of the story. I thoroughly enjoyed this account of an actual event that needed no embellishment, it just needed to be told well and Mr. Foster delivered.

A fascinating story from the Viet Nam War This story, about the May 1967 attack on a bridge in what was then North Viet Nam by planes from the US carrier Kitty Hawk, grabs the reader from the beginning and doesn't let go to the end. The author skillfully weaves the human story together with fascinating details about the machines and the methods of war in that time. The people involved include the two crew members of the F-4 Phantom of the title, Linfield Two Zero One, who were shot down in one of many attacks on North Viet Nam's Thanh Hoa bridge; how they spent years as POWs in North Viet Nam; and how they were released and then ultimately, and poignantly, returned in 2004 to the site of their capture and imprisonment. Also shown are the Vietnamese who defended the bridge and then dealt with the American captives.

The author does not judge the combatants; he only tells us what happened and lets the reader reach his own judgments. Every bit as interesting is the tremendous technical detail the author provides-- on the design of the F-4, the procedures for handling planes on a US carrier in the Gulf of Tonkin, the anti-aircraft defenses at the bridge, and many other aspects of the story. Focusing on those details bring the story to life, and makes the story more real and affecting than a more general description would. This is a fine book, and it is highly recommended for anyone who wants a window to that time and place 43 years ago.

Fascinating Story of two American Navy Airmen I enjoyed Phantom in the River, The Flight of Linfield Two Zero One by Gary Wayne Foster.

The Author found the wreckage of a U.S. Navy F-4B Phantom II jet fighter in Hanoi and decided to investigate the history of the plane. After finding the official history he decided to fill in the gaps with research and personnel interviews. The result is a fascinating story of two American Navy airmen who were downed while trying to bomb the Ham Rong Bridge in North Vietnam on May 14, 1967, captured, repatriated and 37 years later returned to the spot where they were shot down.

The Author provides a detailed historical perspective of what led up to the downing of Linfield Two Zero One. Foster leads the reader through the rational and development of the F-4 Phantom; the design and construction of the Ham Rong Bridge by the North Vietnamese; rational for the air war over North Vietnam; and carrier and flight operations on the USS Kitty Hawk in the Tonkin Gulf in 1967. His development of the background details in basic terms was especially helpful in understanding the story

I thought the Vietnamese perspective was interesting and could only have been obtained by careful field work collecting bits of information which the author points out did not always agree

I thing it is a remarkable book and gives true insight into the varying aspects of the air war over Vietnam in 1967. It is a good story. The Author provides basic details for someone not familiar with military jargon. The book contains a great collection of past and present photos that support the story. It should be required reading of anyone interested in the history of the Vietnam War.

ED NOTE

Gary is a frequent contributor to this Magazine. I have read the book, and agree with every review listed above. It is a fascinating book, as are all Gary's articles in Red Clay.

The below contributions were made after I requested just $5.00 to cover the cost of shipping volume four of the new KSV Membership Directory. Some sent in a lot more as detailed below. The only reason I posted the amount contributed on this occasion, was to ensure the membership that a record is kept of every dime they contribute.

OBIT

LTCOL THOMAS H. TIMBERLAKE USMC

LtCol. Thomas H. Timberlake Jr., U.S.M.C., retired, 66, passed away Tuesday, April 13, 2010. He was the beloved husband of Linda Garrett Timberlake; father of Meredith L. Timberlake and brother of Stewart Timberlake. He was a native of Greenwood, Miss., and a longtime resident of Slidell.

He retired from the U.S. Marine Corps after 30 years. He served in Vietnam for two tours and was an infantry officer. He was a member of the Marine Corps League, Military Order of the Purple Heart, M.O.A.A., the VFW and the American Legion Post 185.

AN EULOGY

By W.R. "Rut" Whittington Colonel, USMCR Ret. , 19 April 2010

Remembering Tom Timberlake, LtCol. USMC Ret.

Tom and I first met in the summer of 1968 when we began training as 2d Lts in "B" Company, The Basic School at Quantico. It wasn't smart, but they formed platoons according to the alphabet. Our 5th Platoon started in the "S" names and went through "Z". Since many things in life and particularly in the Corps are done by alphabet, those of us who spend excessive time in the rear of pay lines and chow lines get a bit "strange". In other words, don't form a platoon from people at the last of the alphabet. Tom and I were the only two former enlisted Marines in 5th Platoon. He had been a Sgt and was returning from Viet Nam and recovering from wounds. I had been a Cpl then gone to college and would be on my way over following TBS. Tom, therefore, could take a more relaxed attitude about TBS than the rest of us. With Tom being from Mississippi and me from Louisiana, plus our prior service, it was natural that we would be buddies. I can recall many scenes from those days, but I will mention just a couple that have that true "Timberlake stamp" on them.

TBS makes the land navigation training unnecessarily difficult. All features are removed from the training maps except for contour lines and natural features. Each Lt is assigned a unique series of calculations to make, requiring numerous, 1,000 meter plus "legs" going through the dense brush to find numbered boxes. Boxes are all over the place and too close together. Once you get one box wrong, the rest of your calculations will be off. Tom asked me: "Whit, are you going to run that course"? I told him yes. What other choice did I have? Tom had devised a plan where he stood in place, stopped Lts walking by, asked them what box they were coming from, and how far away it was. Somehow he compiled all of those responses, determined his answers and passed the exercise. I spent all day beating the brush, failed and had to repeat. To this day, I don't know how Tom did it. He explained it to me, but I still could not understand it. I'd say it was luck, but I know him too well. It was genius.

One other "Timberlake special" from TBS was the Saturday when there was an outcry on the 3d deck of the BOQ. One of the Lts had walked into the shared toilet between the rooms and found a dead deer hanging from the shower head. Tom calmly explained that there was a married Lt whose pay was messed up and he could not feed his kids. Tom palmed a 7.62 round from the rifle range, took his issued M-14, shot the deer near Camp Barrett, and was preparing it. Those kids got venison to eat. Tom took a great personal risk to do a good deed. No one in "officialdom" ever found out about it. Can you imagine that happening today?

We headed in different directions following TBS graduation. Tom went on to serve with Recruiting in New York City, as a Company Commander in OCS, Range Officer at Parris Island and attended Command and Staff College. Years later, I was in my first year as C.O. of 3/23 and "word" came in that our new, incoming Inspector-Instructor would be the departing C.O. of Marine Barracks Panama, a Tom Timberlake. Sometimes you just get lucky!

No one has ever been a better Battalion I-I than Tom Timberlake. He knew just how to play that role. He toiled tirelessly to make 3/23 look good while he quietly and unselfishly operated in the background. Col. Jack Garcia, former C.O. of the Command and Staff College, was our Regimental Commander. While Col. Garcia and Tom were very different individuals, they knew each other and had mutual respect and rapport. I managed to fit into the middle of all of that.

Everywhere we went for conferences and training, Tom knew people and they knew him. His contacts were invaluable to us. In Operation Solar Flare in 1987, 3/23 was attached to the 2d Marines. The C. O., Col. Mike Byron, knew Tom and that helped us integrate and operate successfully. Tom provided wise advice and counsel at all times. Most of the time I listened. Sometimes, especially when dealing with the 23d Marines Regimental staff, I did not. I recall walking back from a meeting with Col. Garcia at Camp Rilea in 1988 when Tom looked over at me and said words to the effect: "If you could just learn when to keep your mouth shut, we'd do a lot better". We both laughed. I knew he was right. I just wanted to have some fun! He forgave me.

We stayed in contact these 20 years following the 3/23 days. Tom provided professional advice on several major State Police initiatives during my command there. When we designed the huge range and training complex now called the Joint Emergency Services Training Center, Tom helped with the design and showed us how to lay it out on the ground. He would not sign a contract. You could not pay him. He just helped. When we had a fatal shooting during training, Tom reviewed our safety procedures and provided counsel. He had been there and done that. His assistance was invaluable.

Our last contact was approximately three weeks ago when Tom called. He wanted to know how William was doing. William, my youngest son, is a 2d Lt and Platoon Commander in "G" Co. 2/8 at Camp Lejeune. Tom, knowing that 2/8 is ramping up for another deployment to Afghanistan said: "You know, they have too many rules over there. If William gets hurt, the two of us will go over there and use our own rules to deal with some folks". I said I'd go. Heck, I'd follow Tom anywhere!

Tom departed this life a bit early. He's younger than I am. But, he lived life to the fullest and was a true patriot. Tom Timberlake was a family man, a man's man, and a Marine's Marine. Anyone who can say they were a friend of Tom's has been blessed and is indeed fortunate. Tom was the embodiment of our motto, Semper Fidelis.

Khe Sanh Veterans Visit the 'Center for the Intrepid' and 'Warrior & Family Support Center' at Brooke Army Medical Center

By Bruce M. Geiger

Last summer I hosted a very successful annual reunion of the National Dusters, Quads & Searchlights Association in San Antonio, and I was eager to return this year to enjoy San Antonio's hospitality without the anxiety and stress that goes along with this responsibility. When the KSV first attempted to arrange a visit to the Center, they were rebuffed for several reasons by members of the Staff of the Intrepid Center. Neil Kenny took up the Endeavour and contacted officials he has met during the many events he sponsors for service members at his own expense throughout the year. His efforts were rewarded, and he asked if I would again lead a delegation from the KSV. I knew instantly that my personal desire to see the Khe Sanh sand table at LBJ Library would have to be put aside in favor of this important mission to visit with and to encourage the dedicated, recovering Soldiers, Marines, Airmen and Sailors.

On Friday morning our group of about a dozen Khe Sanh veterans and wives formed a small caravan of vehicles, and departed the hotel for the short trip to Ft. Sam Houston. We were met at the entrance by Norma Guerra, the Deputy Chief of Public Affairs & Community Relations who has been with the facility since 2007 when it was turned over to the Physical Medical Service at BAMC. At the time I did not realize that those in our visiting group had not been appropriately briefed beforehand in anticipation of the severe head trauma and burn disfigured patients we would visit with. For anybody unprepared to see these disfiguring injuries for the first time it was an understandable shock.

Unfortunately for a few in our group the initial shock was too overwhelming and any human being could be expected to have the same reaction. Having made five previous visits to this facility, Brooke Army Medical Center, and Walter Reid I was able with some difficulty to control my emotions barely enough as not to make the patients feel uncomfortable. Craig Tourte and a few others did not want to take the chance that the inability to conceal their emotions might have an unintended negative effect on the patients, and their compassion led them to discontinue the tour. (See Craig's Article Page 55)

Those of us that remained visited and talked with the rehab patients and were both inspired and humbled by their dedication, perseverance and positive attitudes. It was wonderful to have Lloyd Scudder with our group. He talked to the kids like an experienced older brother, all the time smiling and joking. With his own experience and knowledge of the difficult rehabilitation he was able to put them at ease and give them hope for a full and productive life ahead. We did our best to convey our personal gratitude to each of the warriors we met and handed each of them a Khe Sanh challenge coin. We were also inspired by the compassion and dedication of each and every staff member we met.

The tour included all of the center's facilities and the rehabilitation process which begins immediately upon the patient's release from the hospital. Under the direction of the Physical Medicine Service at BAMC, physiatrists work closely with orthopedic surgeons and other physicians to coordinate all care. The Military Performance Lab (MPL) analyzes human motion with particular emphasis on amputee gait (walking). The Computer Assisted Rehabilitation Environment (CAREN) is a 21 foot dome with a 300 degree screen upon which a variety of "virtual realities" may be displayed. The patient is fitted with a harness and stands on a computer controlled force plate as he navigates the variety of "virtual" paths, trails, hills and even balances in a rowboat. The simulator is the first of its kind in the world and holds much promise for the patients at the center. In the Gait Lab up to 24 cameras use infrared light to track the position of reflective markers placed on a patient's body. Joint angles are calculated and analyzed and force plates in the floor, parallel bars, and treadmill measure ground reaction forces in three directions. Information gathered ultimately helps physicians, physical therapists, and prosthetists adjust their treatment plans and improve patient function.

In addition to the latest physical therapy equipment and techniques, patients are given occupational therapy that focuses on restoring health and function following injury or illness. Treatment activities are designed so that patients can successfully perform tasks and activities of daily living like bathing, dressing, shopping, cooking, writing, performing household chores and everything needed to function on a day-to-day basis. A community integration program gives patients access to a wide variety of activities including horseback riding, paint-ball, archery, kayaking, golf, and skiing among others.

Specialized equipment includes a tread wall and a 21 foot climbing tower with auto-belay to promote strengthening, agility, and aerobic conditioning. A natatorium includes a six lane pool for pre-running activities, kayaking, water basketball and volleyball, and general swimming. The 'Flowrider', a unique indoor activity adjacent to the pool, is used to improve balance, coordination, strength, motivation, and confidence.

A state-of-the-art on-site prosthetics lab is staffed by expert technicians. They use computer assisted technology and high-tech materials in combinations of acrylic resins, carbon fiber composites and titanium to fabricate artificial limbs customized for each patient and a variety of unique specialty limbs for sports and other activities.

Individual case management is provided for each patient and their family. This includes a behavioral medicine service with comprehensive psychiatric support services for each patient to maximize their potential for emotional, mental, spiritual, and physical recovery

Upon conclusion of our tour, all in our group were left in awe of these courageous warriors and this amazing facility. We were unanimously humbled by the experience and honored to have participated. Upon departing the Center for the Intrepid we visited the nearby Warrior and Family Support Center that provides a comfortable, welcoming and friendly environment for wounded warriors and their families to relax, have fun, participate in activities and find support as they transition to their new 'normal'.

The director of the facility, Judith Markelz greeted us, gave us a brief history of the facility before having a staff member take us on a tour of the facility. The initial idea came from physicians at BAMC who saw a need for family members to be intimately involved in the rehabilitation of their service members. A vital part of recovery meant providing a "safe" environment away from the hospital. The concept of the WFSC was then developed by a committee established to support troops who were in combat operations and on the road to recovery.

The WFSC opened in a small and cramped meeting room in December 2003. Through the extraordinary generosity of the greater community led by local developers Steve and Les Huffman, a 12,000 square foot, state-of-the-art $5.6 million facility was built solely by donations. It was completed in less than 18 months and opened its doors on December 3, 2008. Since its beginning in 2003 the old and new centers have seen 360,000 visitors. In 2009 alone the WFSC has had more than 81,000 visitors The Ft. Sam Houston WFSC is the only one of its kind in the military offering a safe and caring environment for military families to reconnect during medical treatment.

The WFSC offers a wide variety of services including information and referral to both military and civilian organizations, educational classes, state-of-the-art computer lab and business center, large kitchen and dining area for cooking and eating with friends and family, big screen TVs and entertainment room for video games and movies, beautiful outdoor patio and garden area for relaxing, free long distance calls to anywhere in the continental U.S., camaraderie with other Wounded Warriors through events at the center and in the local area, free DVD checkout with the latest releases, donations and support from the local community through food, small personal items, goodies, blankets and special events. Although it has a small staff and receives minimal funding from the Army for utilities and maintenance, the WFSC receives overwhelming support from its many volunteers and donations of services and funds from the local community in San Antonio.

The Khe Sanh Veterans Board of Directors is currently considering a proposal to make a substantial donation of $50 Walmart gift cards on behalf of the organization to be distributed to patients at BAMC, at the Center for the Intrepid rehabilitation facility, and at the Warrior & Family Support Center.

MY VISIT TO THE INTREPID CENTER

By Craig Tourte

I had the privilege and extreme honor to visit the Intrepid Center (named after the aircraft carrier Intrepid), a $50 million dollar rehabilitation center for wounded warriors located at Fort Sam Huston. We were a group of about a dozen led by Bruce Geiger. I should not say "led" that would be incorrect. Guided, would be a much better word, for Bruce has done this before. I didn't know anything about the Intrepid Center, thinking is was just another tour hastily put together at the last minute.

Bruce addressed the injured and conveyed our gratitude as Khe Sanh Veterans. A tour was provided of the state of the art facility and the group was able to speak to many. I don't want to make this about me, but I was not able to go on the tour. I tried and I wanted too, but I just could not. For the most part I was in shock and I don't know why. My heart cried out and I was sure I would be unable to check my emotions for much longer. I felt out of place and was thankful that Lloyd Scudder was with the group. He talked to the kids like a brother, with a smile on his face and a knowing heart, he was the voice of experience and comfort. He belonged, I certainly felt like I did not, more intruder than a guest so I thought it best that I return to the hotel.

I talked to Bruce about this later in the evening and he assured me that the men and women at the center were very positive and enjoyed talking to the visitors who came by and I know Bruce was correct, it was my pain, my weakness and my heart that ached for them all and I was not prepared. I was glad I went, although I didn't get much past the front door, and it is something that I will remember and think about for many years to come. A reminder of how so much is given to so many by so few. During the dedication ceremony General Peter Pace stated in his remarks. "There are those who speak about (wounded warriors) today - He lost an arm. He lost a leg. She lost her sight, I object, Pace told the injured troops in attendance". "You gave an arm, you gave a leg, and you gave your sight as gifts to your nation that we might live in freedom."

I thought the Intrepid Rehabilitation Center was so moving and so important, I posted my story on our Web Site. I wanted those who were not connected with our group and happen to come across the web board to have as much information as I could provide. I invite anyone who is interested to go to the web and type "Intrepid Fort Sam Houston" for more detail of this wonderful facility.

INTERESTING TRIP TO THE LBJ LIBRARY
LBJ's SAND TABLE MODEL:
A MOVING ARTIFACT FOR KHE SANH VETERANS

SEE GUYS THERE IS WHERE I TOLD LBJ, I LIVED ALL THOSE MONTHS

STORY BY DENNIS MANNION K CO 3/26

During the 2010 Khe Sanh Veterans reunion, twenty-two vets (and a few civilians) set out on a road-trip from San Antonio. It would be a journey not just through space, but through time as well. The destination was the LBJ Library in Austin, and the mission was to revisit Khe Sanh, in a sense, by viewing the battlefield model that their Commander-in-Chief and his aides had agonized over in 1968. The Khe Sanh sand table is now housed in the archives at the LBJ Library & Museum, but just over 4 decades ago it was a permanent fixture in the White House Situation Room. In the days leading up to the siege, President Johnson was having a difficult time visualizing the terrain in and around Khe Sanh, and an aide suggested that constructing a sand table -- in reality a 3-D map -- might help. There was a big fight shaping up around Khe Sanh; it was not a matter of if the NVA might attack, but when. As U.S. military planners prepared their defenses and brought in battalions of Marines, NVA commanders were marshaling their forces in the mountains and the approach valleys leading toward the Khe Sanh plateau. The sand table gave those in the White House the ability to track enemy troop movements and troop locations in relation to the Americans dug in at the combat base and on some of the hills. Crude by today's standards of computer generated imagery, scans, and high definition satellite photography, the sand table was what the President used week after week in order to be kept informed of the ever changing battlefield conditions. It is said that he often wandered into the Situation Room late at night to stare at the sand table as results from the siege (already the next day over in Southeast Asia) were being reported back to the Pentagon.

Most, if not all, of the twenty-two of us had the same, immediate reactions when we walked from the basement corridor of the library into a brightly lit workroom and saw the historic artifact for the first time: "It's so small!" I am sure that in our minds we were expecting to see something the size of a ping pong table at the very least! I know I was. I had looked forward to seeing trench lines, artillery pieces, Army quad-40's, big bunkers, cleared fields of fire, the water point, and even the 235 empty Ham & Lima Bean C-rat cans surrounding Neil Kenny's fighting position. However, as we were soon to learn that morning, fine detail was not what this special map was all about.

We had gathered in the front lobby of the library just a few minutes before and met Mike MacDonald the library staffer who would be our guide when we viewed our own history. After a few introductory remarks and a gentle but firm admonition that it was permissible to get as close to the sand table as we desired but not to touch any part of it, we were in the elevator heading down. One more pause, another request that we not touch anything on the table, and the doors to the workroom opened. That initial shock at the small size of the sand table caused the group to pause at the door, and there were a few awkward moments before the group closed in on the White House version of our collective Khe Sanh experience. Suddenly, there were 22 voices all seeming to talk at once. There was a bit of nervous laughter and good natured kidding. Questions were asked, terrain features pointed out, and exclamations of surprise and excitement. On more than one face, I saw tears.

I held back as the others surged forward because I really wanted to gauge their reactions. The sand table wasn't going anywhere and Mike had assured me that he'd give us all the time we needed. I knew I'd get my chance. So, I waited and watched. We are a society of cameras of every size and shape, but in the initial minutes, cameras were not being used at all. I sensed that the veterans needed just to be close to the sand table because an unspoken, emotional link said, "I was down there somewhere at the very same time that the President of the United States was staring down at this map!" Hearing the excitement in our voices, my wife Joan turned to one of the library aides and said, "You may think you are looking at a group of middle-aged men, but if you close your eyes and listen carefully, what you are hearing are the voices and feelings of 19 and 20 year olds."

When a space opened up, I moved closer to the table and got my first glimpse. Real small, I thought again, but terrain features that have been locked in my head all these years were suddenly right below me in three dimension. Some were marked with white flags and others I just knew. Tiger Tooth Mountain (1371m), 881 North and South, the 689 ridge line, 558, 950 & 1015, 700, 918, and of course, 861. Also visible in miniature detail was the ridge line 500 meters to the west of 861 where the NVA had been dug in for the most of the siege -- and took a horrendous pounding -- as well as the solid, green knoll that would soon become known in USMC siege-history as 861a. The artist who created the sand table had painted the perimeters of 881s and 861 in exactly the same shape they had been, but greatly reduced in size. 881s was accurately created as two hills connected by a sloping saddle of land that ran east-west, and 861, now the size of small button on the sleeve of a shirt, was realistically depicted as a pork chop shaped hill with the bigger bump to the north and the lower bump (and the LZ) to the south. "Amazing," I said out loud but really to myself. Easily discernible, too, was the Rao Quan River and its tributaries north of the combat base as well as the Xe Pon River and its distinctive oxbows over by Lang Vei. This river served as the border between Vietnam and Laos, and tucked distinctly above one of those oxbows on the Laotian side was a steep thrust of terrain. I had only spent 4 days down at the combat base in 1968 and that was when the siege portion of Khe Sanh conflict was over, but that sinister land formation on the sand table took my breath away. I was looking down on the Co Roc massif. Missing of course, were the 130 and 152 mm guns that the NVA had fired from inside those formidable cliffs. I opened my right hand as wide as possible. I put my thumb directly over Co Roc and lined up my little finger towards the north east. Just beyond that outstretched finger was the painted-on perimeter of the combat base, no bigger than a wooden match. In real life, the distance between the big guns and the runway was 14,000 meters, but LBJ's view of that same distance was just a bit wider than my open hand. "1000's upon 1000's of enemy shells crossed this space," I thought.

Suddenly, cameras were out and being pointed everywhere. There were close ups of the sand table, individual poses, small groups, even the entire group at one point as well as non-posed, informal photos. Replace the digital cameras with Kodak Instamatics, load in real film, skip the large group shot, and it could have been us doing the same thing 42 years ago. With the photo session concluded, it was time to close this window to our past, say goodbye, and head back to San Antonio.

I purposely delayed with Mike MacDonald as I wanted to be the last vet to see the table before the cover went on. I paused at the door and watched as 3, white-gloved library staff carefully placed folded up lengths of tissue paper over the entire Khe Sanh Area of Operations. Standing nearby were two others who would carry the cover over and clasp it in place. "Farewell," I thought. "Not sure if I'll ever have the opportunity again." I felt connected to the sand table but more to what wasn't visible than what was. I had hoped to see the 81mm mortar pits on 881s and the 105mm parapets down at the combat base because their respective crews had saved all of us on 861 when the siege began just after midnight on 21 Jan 68. I really wanted to see Jerry Elliot, an Army door gunner who, on 21 Jan 68, left his own intact Huey and raced across open ground to help others from a crashed Huey near the Old French Fort and was never seen again on this earth. I wanted to see the section of trench line at the combat base where Father Brett and Cpl Chin lost their lives in February; they had been on 861 & 861a just the day before. I wanted to see Captain Bill O'Connor's green smoke sifting over 881n on the 17th of March of that year. I wanted to pinpoint those multiple NVA mortar tubes located northwest of 861 whose muzzle blast directions told me in an instant whether it was going to be us on 861 or the Marines on 861a who were going to be hit in the next 14 seconds. It was terrifying if the muzzle blasts were angled toward me, yet I always felt relief, horror, and guilt if they were pointing toward E 2/26's positions.

I was hoping to see the U.S. flag that Kilo 3/26 raised on Easter Sunday on 881n after Lima, Mike, and Kilo companies conducted a personal Easter Egg hunt on the 14th of April. I wanted to locate the exact spot of terrain between 881s and 881n where Kilo's Lt. Fordham died the very next day. President Johnson had been in Vietnam back in October of 1967 and had awarded Lt. Fordham his first Purple Heart at a military hospital in Cam Ranh Bay. I have the photograph. Did that same, big hand that pinned the medal on the Lt's bathrobe also grip the edge of the sand table on 15 April 68? I sure hope so.

I wanted to see all of that and much, much more. But I couldn't. Nor would I ever even if I were to take up permanent residency in the LBJ Library. In the early 1960's, ABC had a prime time, TV, cop show set in NYC entitled "The Naked City." Every episode concluded with the following: "There are eight million stories in the Naked City. This has been one of them." Only 8 million? Hell, I know of a small sand table in Austin, Texas that has 10 times as many stories.

THE ACTUAL SAND TABLE USED BY LBJ

WHY WE REMEMBER

By Craig Tourte

It was one of those evenings at Tom Horchlers house. I, Tom and Ned Borlaug were sitting under a giant Oak tree in front of Tom's house. It was a beautiful evening, large open sky and Tom's two large Golden Retrievers lying at our feet. The mention of Vietnam seldom comes up when we gather, there is really not much to be said that we have not already discussed and sometimes bringing up the subject of Vietnam is just to painful a memory.

However when that rarity does occur, there are no heroic stories, no stories of adventure or humorous memories at these gathering, which on occasion are attended by quite a number of Veterans, all friends of Toms. That is unless someone has the need to vent, it builds up you know, and sometimes it helps to release what is in your heart, if the right people are around, there are not many outsiders who would understand. Anyway, it was one of those moments.

Ned Borlaug served in Vietnam during the early years, was involved in some nasty firefights which involved numerous loses. Ned served with India Company, 3rd Battalion, 3rd Marine Corps Regiment, 1st platoon and 1st squad, from March 15th to December 15th, 1966, the days of M-14 rifles and newly issued jungle boots. Ned remembers that the M-14 he was issued had been used by another Marine, and still bore the blood stains of the previous owner.

1966 was a difficult year for the 3rd Regiment, under strength and involved in the early battles around Da Nang, Chu Lai and the Hills around Khe Sanh and the DMZ. From the book "The Hill Fights, The First Battle of Khe Sanh" - "...under fire, trapped in a hell of sudden death meted out by unseen enemies, they fought impossible odds with awesome courage and uncommon valor."

Ned told us that some of the dates of death and one of the names were misstated on the list in the magazine, but he understood that putting the magazine together was a difficult task and that mistakes can and do happen, but he appreciated the opportunity to memorialize their memory. I knew this was an important issue for Ned - it was important because he was all some of them had, many now forgotten by family and friends. Ned and I discussed their loss and the circumstances of each death.

On April 3rd, LCPL David E. Hornby was shot by a sniper as David and Ned were digging a fox hole in Elephant Valley, located in the A Shau Valley.

On April 4th, PFC Jack D. Gilbert was on Operation Orange when he was killed by a snipers bullet.

On April 13th, LCPL Jose A. Pacheco was killed by a hidden 155 mm artillery shell booby trap mine near Hill 55.

On April 14th, SGT Robert L. Vaden was wounded by a hidden booby trap mine in the same explosion that killed Jose A. Pacheco, dying of his wounds the following day.

On April 15th, PFC Ralph H. Livesay was killed by a hidden booby trap mine near Hill 55.

On April 24th, CPL Daniel B. Duffy Jr. was killed by a hidden booby trap mine near Hill 55.

On April 30th, SGT Molimau A. Tela was killed by a hidden booby trap mine hear Hill 55.

On August 1st, PFC Victor Morales was shot and killed by a sniper

On August 7th, LCPL Bobby L. Eaton was killed by a booby trap near Hill 21.

On November 9th, PFC Ronnie H. Bintliff was killed along with Charles Roberts by a Chinese hand grenade near Mutter's Ridge along the DMZ.

On November 9th, PFC Charles A. Roberts was killed along with Ronnie Bintliff by a Chinese hand grenade near Mutter's Ridge along the DMZ

On November 28th, PVT William R. Devore was killed by a snipers bullet as he stood next to Ned.

On November 29th, LCPL Michael A. Baronowski was killed by rifle fire along the DMZ. * The Vietnam Tapes of Lance Corporal Michal A. Baronowski - " In 1966, a 19 year-old Marine took a reel to reel tape recorder with him into the Vietnam War. For two months, until he was killed in action, Lance Corporal Michael A. Baronowski made 3 inch open reel tapes of his friends, of combat, of life in the foxhole. 34 years later, his comrade Tom Duffe brought those tapes to Lost & Found Sound." Producer Christina Egloff with Jay Allison - Links, The Vietnam Tapes on NPR's Lost & Found Sound.

On December 7th, PVT Richard C. Brandt was killed by rifle fire during a firefight near the DMZ. It was his 3rd Purple Heart which was awarded along with a Bronze Star - both posthumously.

I didn't count the names listed in the Memorial Page, I wanted to, but I couldn't. Each name is so important, each a hero. Some killed in war and others survived their tour but left us too early. A reminder of how temporary this all is. Everyone should have a friend like Ned, who after so many years, remembers each so clearly, mourns their loss and knows how important it is to memorialize their memory.

"CEREMONY"

By Craig W. Tourte

I made two trips to the state of New Mexico to honor the hero's of the Siege of the beleaguered Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, the hill fights and other battles in the Khe Sanh area of operation. The Memorial Road Marker and Bridge are now forever standing tributes to both the fallen and to those few survivors of those long ago battles.

Two trips by air and an hour drive out to the Laguna Reservation located west of Albuquerque, didn't really take up much of my time and it was an honor and privilege to have been able to attend both of those dedications. After the first dedication of the Memorial Road Marker I wrote a short article about that event which was published in Issue 75/Spring 2010 of the Khe Sanh Veterans magazine "Red Clay."

My second trip out to the Laguna Reservation for the Khe Sanh bridge dedication was likewise inspiring and once again, I felt privileged to have been able to attend. While attending this second dedication, Ray Palmer (D/1/26) a Native American from Fort Apache Arizona walked over to me and handed me a small blue book with the title "Ceremony." He didn't really say much about the little book other than it was something he thought I would be interested in reading. I looked it over and found that it was a story about the Laguna people and their lands, the very land where we stood that day.

When I returned to California, I set the little book aside because I wanted to finish the several others I was currently reading. For some strange reason my emotions continued to reflect on my two visits to the Laguna and I was having a rather difficult time understanding why my mind was always drifting back there. At the strangest times I'd just kind of feel and sense the Laguna, like a spirit that was whispering to me, in words I could not understand. I would see that red sand, the bellowing white clouds in the wide open sky and the large open wind swept canyons over and over in my subconscious. I would remember the words Harold E. Lockwood (HMH-CH-53 Sea Stallions) told me about those from the Reservations and about the early Missionaries taking the Native American children from their parents and the hardships his people even now continued to face.

I finally devoted time to that little book Ray Palmer gave to me, as a gift, he said. It was a sad and painful read about one culture dominating another and Native American Soldiers from the Laguna Reservation who returned from the war in the Pacific and faced the nightmarish demons so many of us have faced ourselves. I am not new to the hardships faced by the Native American people and for a short period I lived on a Reservation in North West California. Although a novel, the book had some inspiring lines, for example, "It took a great deal of energy to be a human being." "The dreams did not wait any more for night, they came out anytime." "As long as you remember what you have seen, then nothing is gone." "As long as you remember, it is part of this story we have together." I thought of many of us when reading this book and specifically when I happened to come across those lines.

Though first written in 1968 by a female Native American about her people, I certainly found those lines applicable to many Khe Sanh Veterans. Our stories and memories of the ones we lost will not die, as long as we remember them, their deeds, their sacrifice and their heroics, "Then nothing is gone." As long as we remember what we saw, "It is part of this story we have together." It takes work to continue on with this thing we call life, "It took (takes) a great deal of energy to be a human being." Perhaps the author "Leslie Marmon Silko" was talking about all of us when she wrote this little 240 page novel, and didn't even know it. I usually keep the books I have read, putting them up on a shelf when I am finished with them. Something about just seeing them there is comforting. I guess it's kind of like friends or neighbors you once knew.

Most of the books I read are about people's lives and their conflict. If I got rid of them I would feel like I was abandoning their soul. However this book from Ray, I'll not keep. It has a spirit and I know it will never belong to me. It does not belong on a dusty bookshelf hidden from others, but rather with a Native American, to perhaps share with someone else or at the very least, to be home, to be kept dry and safe with it's own people. It needs to be treasured and cared for and perhaps its spirit can once again be shared with others.

Gold Star Mothers Memorial Dedicated

Former Khe Sanh Seabee Veteran Jack Haigwood, Past President of VVA Chapter 649, Honors Gold Star Mothers With New Memorial

Gold Star Mothers Memorial Dedication Clermont County, Ohio May 8, 2010
Story and Photos by Ken Williamson *1

There's nothing more special than a Mom. This May, on the day before Mother's Day, VVA Chapter 649 and the Clermont County Ohio community of Union Township recognized a group of special moms with the dedication of a Gold Star Mothers Memorial. Erected in Union Township's Veteran Park, the black granite memorial with its gold star against a gleaming white background and an engraved poem by Sandi Estridge Eucks, stirred the emotions of all who viewed it, especially the forty plus Gold Star Mothers who attended the dedication ceremony.

With tears in her eyes, Vietnam era Gold Star Mother Bertha Balsley remembered the day her son Bob was killed. "I came here today to honor my son. It seams like yesterday when I got the news that he was killed during a rocket attack on November 16, 1968. He would be 64 this May."

The pain of their loss never goes away", said past VVA 649 President, Jack Haigwood, who served with Detail Bravo at Khe Sanh during the siege of January 1968. The monument was a two-year dream of his. "We have thousands of monuments dedicated to our fallen heroes", he commented, "but not many to the mothers who still bear the pain of their loss after decades have passed". Teaming up with AVVA member Regina Herbolt, the two sought design help and funding for the project. "The funding, over $18,000, came from three significant donors, plus other smaller gifts and a donation from Chapter 649. Union Township provided all of the infrastructure and landscaping and the two major donors were Edward Nurre and the Clermont County Veterans Service Commission", Jack reported.

"No one wants to be a Gold Star Mom", commented an emotional Carol Prazynski. "My stepson was killed on May 9, 2005 in Iraq. All he ever wanted to be was a Marine and he believed what he was doing was right and I find some peace in knowing that. We never doubted that Taylor would come home, we just didn't know that he would bypass ours."

Following the ceremony, a 21 gun salute by the Southwest Ohio Memorial Team, and taps, the Gold Star Mothers and guests placed American Flags around the monument in honor of their fallen heroes and their moms.

Bertha, staring off into the distance said, "Always honor your son. He's always there with you."

OBIT
LUCY'S LAST SWIM
By Tom Eichler

Having had dogs all my life I knew the pain Tom was going through, having experienced the grief several times with my past 3 pets whom I had to put to sleep. In fact I have all of my pets who have past away, buried in my back yard. They all have granite tombstones and are buried in individual little crypts in oak coffins. This might sound a little extreme, but those of us who love our pets will not find it so.

I called Tom to express my sorrow about Lucy and although extremely broken up he informed me of one of Lucy's last acts. Tom stated that Lucy had never been in the water since she had been his companion. He always assumed she was afraid of the water. Recently he was at a swimming pool with Lucy, and she was laying next to the pool doing a breast stroke, but would not go in the water.

She then circumvented the entire pool observing that there was not a place for her to climb out, if she had jumped in. When a friend of Tom's moved the rubber tube he was in, and Lucy saw the stairs leading into the pool, she just dived in and swam a few laps. Tom still had to help her out of the pool.

Tom related his last days and hours with his beloved pet, but I cannot write them without reliving what I had also gone through with my pets. We both were crying like little babies. There is no shame to admit that; as Craig wrote: the love we have for our pets is as strong as it is to any human being.

The following are condolence messages left on the Khe Sanh Veterans Website with the passing of our beloved KSV Mascot.

CONDOLENCES:

I've had three dogs during my adult life and absolutely loved them all, to this day I morn the loss of each one of them. When Tom and I became reacquainted, some 35 years after Vietnam, I found him living by himself in a little one bedroom house tucked in an old and tired section of town. Not really wanting a dog, or pet of any kind for that matter, fate brought Lucy and Tom together. Lucy was there, not just for Tom but for all of her "uncles" who visited Tom and grew to love and admire his little golden companion. Lucy only had friends, and I don't think she ever met animal or human she didn't like.

For those of us who have pets, simply stating that we love our animals, is insufficient to describe our emotions or our attachment to them which is as strong and as it is to any human being. The ravages and painful memory of Vietnam took its toll on Tom, as it has on all of us. Lucy was not only his constant companion but his support, comforter, protector of emotions, guardian of his psyche and I think, one of his main reasons to preserve. I don't have any pets because I just can't take pain of their loss, but I loved going to Tom's house and to spend just a few minutes laying on the carpet next to Lucy, it brought me great comfort.

She always seemed happy to see me, no matter if she remembered me or not, she always made me feel just a little special. Tom often brought Lucy out to the golf course with him and I enjoyed her company on many a fine course. She was well behaved and at times, a much better golf partner than I was. I recall one afternoon when she was sitting on the grass and I was addressing my golf ball getting ready to hit,when she walked up to my ball and placed it in her mouth and moved it about 5 feet closer to the pin and dropped it on the ground. It was the funniest thing I had ever seen and we all had a great laugh. I think she knew my game.

I'll miss her smooth and shiny golden coat, the way she smelled, her smile, and happy face. The way she seemed to remember who I was and her excitement in seeing me again. I'll miss laying on the floor with her; I'll miss the comfort she gave to me. I'll miss petting her and I'll miss seeing her on the golf course. She'll always have a very big place in my heart. But as painful as it is for me, I know Tom will miss her even more…..

FROM FRIEND to FRIEND

You've giving me a special gift,
So sorrowfully endowed,
And through these last few cherished days,
Your courage made me proud.

But really, love is knowing
When your best friend is in pain,
And understanding earthly acts
Will only be in vain.
So looking deep into your eyes,
Beyond, into your soul,
I saw in you the magic, that Once more makes me whole.

The strength that you possess,
Is why I looked to you that day,
To do this thing that must be done,
For it's the only way.

That strength is why I've followed you,
And chose you as my friend,
And why I've loved you all these years...
My partner 'til the end.

Please, understand just what this gift,
You gave me, means to me,
It gave me back the strength I've lost,
And all my dignity.

You took a stand on my behalf,
For that is what friends do.
And know that what you did is right,
For I believe it too.

So one last time, I breathed your scent,
And through your hand did feel,
The courage that's within you,
To grant me that appeal.

You cut the leash that held me here,
Dear friend, ... you let me run,
Once more a strong and steady dog,
My pain and struggle done.

Please don't despair my passing,
For I'm not far away,
Forever here, within your heart,
And memory I'll stay.
I'll be there watching over you,
Your ever faithful friend,
And in your memories I'll run, ... a young dog once again.

With heartfelt condolences on your loss and with hopes that the sentiment in this verse helps some. It helped me.
Lucille Biscaglio

Tom,

I'm sorry for your loss. I didn't know LUCY but I know I would have liked her. Below is something that I wanted to share with you . . .

When an animal dies that has been especially close to someone here, that pet goes to Rainbow Bridge. There are meadows and hills for all of our special friends so they can run and play together. There is plenty of food, water and sunshine, and our friends are warm and comfortable. All the animals who had been ill and old are restored to health and vigor.

Those who were hurt or maimed are made whole and strong again, just as we remember them in our dreams of days and times gone by. The animals are happy and content, except for one small thing; they each miss someone very special to them, who had to be left behind. They all run and play together, but the day comes when one suddenly stops and looks into the distance. His bright eyes are intent. His eager body quivers. Suddenly he begins to run from the group, flying over the green grass, his legs carrying him faster and faster.

You have been spotted, and when you and your special friend finally meet, you cling together in joyous reunion, never to be parted again. The happy kisses rain upon your face; your hands again caress the beloved head, and you look once more into the trusting eyes of your pet, so long gone from your life but never absent from your heart. Then you cross Rainbow Bridge together....

I have pretty much drawn a blank on what I personally can write for this issue. So I have put together some quotes that I use to influence how I behave and control my Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder. I have been blessed with a family that has stuck with me through thick and thin.

All of us need to take the time to show appreciation to those close to us.

Selected Verses Proverbs 31:10-31
New Living Translation
Who can find a virtuous and capable wife? She is worth more than precious rubies. 11 Her husband can trust her, and she will greatly enrich his life. 12 She will not hinder him but help him all her life… 17 She is energetic and strong, a hard worker. 18 She watches for bargains; her lights burn late into the night…20 She extends a helping hand to the poor and opens her arms to the needy…25 She is clothed with strength and dignity, and she laughs with no fear of the future. 26 When she speaks, her words are wise, and kindness is the rule when she gives instructions. 27 She carefully watches all that goes on in her household and does not have to bear the consequences of laziness. 28 Her children stand and bless her. Her husband praises her: 29 "There are many virtuous and capable women in the world, but you surpass them all!" 30 Charm is deceptive, and beauty does not last; but a woman who fears the Lord will be greatly praised. 31 Reward her for all she has done. Let her deeds publicly declare her praise.

"Love and Death- Death sweeps everything away. It yields to no one, and once you are in its power you cannot escape. So with love: it takes control of your life, and like a gigantic fire, it cannot be doused. Love must be treated with the greatest caution and respect." Unknown

"It's not what happens to you, but how you react to it that matters." Epictetus

"Regardless of what came before or what has yet to come, what matters most right now, is how I choose to respond to the challenge before me. Will I lie down or will I fight? The choice is mine and I choose to finish strong." Dan Green in Finish Strong

"Life is 10 percent what you make it and 90 percent how you take it." Irving Berlin

"In human life there is a constant change of fortune; and it is unreasonable to expect an exemption from this common fate." Plutarch

"We must become the change we want to see in the world." Mahatma Gandhi

"Don't worry about anything; instead, pray about everything. Tell God what you need, and thank him for all he has done. 7 If you do this, you will experience God's peace, which is far more wonderful than the human mind can understand. His peace will guard your hearts and minds as you live in Christ Jesus. Philippians 4:6-7

"Each one should use whatever gift he has received to serve others, faithfully administering God's grace in its various forms. 11 If anyone speaks, he should do it as one speaking the very words of God. If anyone serves, he should do it with the strength God provides, so that in all things God may be praised through Jesus Christ. To him be the glory and the power for ever and ever. Amen." I Peter 4:10-11
Deuteronomy 33:25 (NLT) ...may your strength match the length of your days.

"No pessimist ever discovered the secrets of the stars, or sailed to an uncharted land, or opened a new doorway for the human spirit." Helen Keller
My goal is to stay and look at things on the bright side.

OBIT

JOHN F. PRINCE
1943-2010
KHE SANH VETERAN
USMC L CO 3/26

John Frederick Prince Jr., 66, was born in Phoenix, Ariz., at St. Joseph's Hospital on Oct. 29, 1943. He was the oldest son of John F. Prince, Ph.D., and Margaret Ovens Prince. He passed away Sept. 6, 2010.

John attended St. Gregory's Elementary School,

Brophy College Preparatory, Phoenix College and graduated from the University of Arizona with a degree in history in 1966. While at St. Gregory's, John was active in sports and the Boy Scouts of America. At Brophy College Prep John participated in football and baseball. While a student at Phoenix College, John was active in the wrestling program. He also was a tackle on the football team, receiving the Most Improved Player Award his sophomore year. At the University of Arizona John was a guard on the Wildcats football team during his junior and senior years.

Upon graduation from the University of Arizona John volunteered for the United States Marine Corps and was commissioned a Second Lieutenant in December of 1966. After further officer training, John was deployed to Vietnam as an Infantry Platoon Commander. John served two tours of duty in Vietnam. He served with the third battalion, 26 Marine Regiment, during which time John saw continuous combat action in Northern "I" Corps along the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ), most notably in defense of the Marine Combat Base at Khe Sanh. John was the recipient of the Purple Heart for being wounded in the service of his country. He was honorably discharged from the Marine Corps at, Camp Pendleton, Calif., in 1970.

After the completion of his honorable military career, John entered the banking industry specializing in commercial and residential financing in Phoenix. This banking experience prepared him for a real estate career in both the rapidly growing Phoenix and Prescott areas. While in Prescott, John worked for Realty Executives. He was also active in the community and with Veteran's Affairs.

John was a kind, loving brother, uncle and godfather. He will be sorely missed by his family and friends. John is survived by a brother, Michael; sister Terry Prince Sims and her husband Bill; sister Mary Martha; six nieces and nephews, Jonathan Sims, Christopher Sims, Jacqueline Prince Sims, Matthew Prince and his wife Tiffany, Brittany Prince, and Hawley Prince; and a grand-niece, Kylee Prince.

John was interred with full Marine military honors at Arlington National Cemetery on Tuesday, Nov. 16, 2010. Contributions may be made in memory of John Frederick Prince Jr. to the VA, 500 Highway 89 North, Prescott, AZ 86313, or to the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation, 3800 Fettler Park Drive, Suite 104, Dumfries, VA 22025.

GEORGE F. HILLHOUSE
1947-2010
KHE SANH VETERAN
USMC C CO 1/26

George Frank Hillhouse, age 63, passed away on November 21, 2010. He was born in Jasper, Florida, to the late Frank Jesse, and Eloise Padgett Hillhouse. He had lived most all of his life in Perry, Florida. His occupation was a welder, and he retired from Martin Electronics Maintenance Department. Mr. Hillhouse was a U. S. Marine and a member of the Purple Heart Association, and the N.R.A. He enjoyed hunting, and riding his Harley. He was preceded in death by a sister, Ruth Gray. Survived by his wife, Gail Hillhouse of Perry, FL, (2) daughters; Kimberly Skinner of Perry, FL, Tori Hillhouse Walker and husband Daniel of Perry, FL, (1) brother; Kenneth Hillhouse and wife Nancy of Perry, FL, (4) grandchildren. Funeral Services were held at Joe P. Burns Funeral Home on Wednesday, November 24, 2010 at 11:00 A.M. with Pastor Tim McDonald officiating. Interment followed at Carlton Cemetery.

Remarks from his Brother posted on the TWS website: He was my brother. Because we had the same father, and also because we both belonged to a fraternity of brotherhood that only a few will ever know. We were both United States Marines. He was Marine SSgt. George F. Hillhouse. Two tours in Vietnam in 1967 and 1968. He was at the Battle of Khe Sanh. Awarded two Purple Hearts, Cross of Galantry, and the Navy/ Marine Corps Achievement Medal with Combat V, among his many awards.

He was a Drill Instructor, a Tunnel Rat, and the best older brother a man could ask for. He died doing what he loved. He had a massive heart attack sitting in his tree stand with his rifle still in hand when we found him. We buried him today at the Carlton Cemetery in Perry Florida. He was laid to rest with a full Marine Corps Honor Guard, and me, his little brother standing guard over his body until I was sure he was home. I'll miss him greatly, but I know that tonight he is checking in for duty with the Lord for the ultimate duty station. Guarding the Gates of Heaven with my father, Marine Sgt Frank J. Hillhouse and all the brother Marines that have gone before us.

THE WALL

by
Gary W. Foster

The Vietnam Veterans Memorial is a conundrum of sorts. Of all the monuments in Washington, D.C., it is the least intrusive, the least obvious, the least prominent and the least adorned or embellished. It has no lavish displays such as Greek Corinthian columns or facades of wreaths or garlands carved in white stone. From ground level, it is not visible from certain angles and even when seen through the trees from afar, it is not conspicuous. One could drive all around the Mall area and never notice it. No flag flies directly from atop and there is no statue at its center as there is in the Jefferson Memorial. It is an understated unprecedented style of architecture that conveys little in terms of the obvious. There is no mistaking the Washington Monument but for a first-time visitor, if he or she did not have some sort of guide he or she could miss the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, the Wall, altogether.

At each end of the Wall's twin entrances, there are waist-high, lighted stands that protect a thick book that contains the names of Americans killed or missing in Vietnam. The book provides directions as to where to find a name on the Memorial. Other than that, there is little decoration. In some ways, the book of names is as much a memorial as the Memorial or the Wall itself.

The Memorial is the most modest simplicity of a monument that lures, compels one to visit and that drives home a compulsive if not disorienting subversion or bewilderment of consciousness that cannot be dispelled so easily and which will linger for a very long time with anyone who visits the Wall.

The Vietnam Veterans Memorial, dedicated in 1982, the design of Maya Ying Lin, may be the most famous and most emotionally moving memorial in Washington DC, if not in the United States. It's not a building, not an amphitheater, not a stage, not a dome or an enclosure. It's not an obelisk and it is not a cemetery. If one were to characterize it, it's a study in open, uncomplicated plane geometry. But of course, it is much more.

The Vietnam Veterans Memorial is a series of one hundred forty-eight vertical granite panels, each measuring forty inches wide of varying heights, but level along the top. They are placed side by side, divided evenly into seventy-four panels in opposite directions, seventy of which, in each direction, bear the names found in the books at the entrances. The division of the adjoining walls is noted by the vertex of an angle, also called, but not quite accurately, the apex. The two series of panels, or vertical walls, conjoin and form an obtuse angle of one hundred twenty-five degrees. Panels are numbered left to right on the east wall and right to left on the west wall. Panel numbering begins with 2E (second panel east wall) and 2W (second panel west wall). The first panels of each wall, panels 1E and 1W, are not identified but rather are deduced from 2E and 2W. The tops of the walls are horizontal while the bottoms of the walls extend down below the top tapering as the slab stone path descends towards the vertex from each pointed end of the Wall. At panel 20E or 20W, the sloping pathway levels out and for the next forty panels, twenty panels in each direction from the vertex, the pathway is flat. It is on this flat portion of the walkway that the significance of the Wall can overwhelm and it's here that everyone stops to just look at the thousands of names. It is here that one can understand why the Memorial and the message it carries are so powerful. It is here, at the bottom of a slightly carved depression in the surrounding terrain, that the Wall is more significant than may have been originally presumed. The monument, known as the Vietnam Veterans Memorial or the Wall, has now swallowed us up.

At the top of panel 1E, at the vertex of the two walls of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, the engraved words serve as an introduction to the visitor. They read: "In honor of the men and women of the armed forces of the United States who served in the Vietnam War. The names of those who gave their lives and of those who remain missing are inscribed in the order they were taken from us."

Of course, what follows, equally engraved in the sparkling, highly reflective black stone from southern India, is sobering: the chronological listing of the names of 58,000 Americans who died or are still missing in Vietnam between 1959 and the spring of 1975. The first name on panel 1E (not marked but left to deduction since the next panel is clearly marked as 2E), at the left top, is Dale R. Buis and marks the beginning of the long lineup and endless list of faceless names most of which are unknown to anyone.

Perhaps like the War itself, the Vietnam Veterans Memorial or again, more simply, the Wall, for first-time visitors is confusing, disorienting - so many names, left and right, in no seeming order, certainly not in any alphabetical order, excepting alphabetizing those people who died on the same day. The volume of names grows as a visitor walks along the stone pathway, descending inexorably from either direction to the flat portion of the pathway, to the conjunction of the two wing-like, shiny, obsidian-like, granite slabs constituting the Memorial's walls. It's a descent to the confluence of two rivers seemingly without a beginning, bearing known and unknown names, that begin as tributaries at either end and, accumulating names along the way, ever flowing, eventually spills them unashamedly like an unabated waterfall from the top of the apex of the angle - of the start and end of a horrific event in American history - and inundates with unequivocal proof of what we sacrificed. We are awash with a deep sense of loss, desolation, disbelief, perhaps denial, and bereavement. So many names of Americans gone from this earth. So many.

We are still stunned since 1975. Try as we might to comprehend, we remain perhaps unsure as to what happened. Starting in 1959, how did the war continue to consume, to grind us up for sixteen long years and turn a unified country into a victim of self -loathing and self-destruction. Why were those who served their country who saw duty to country as a first obligation come home to such vehement hatred? Why were they vilified so? Why did they come home as villains and where can they go to repose, adjust, to reconcile and re-unify? And as the conflict in Vietnam now fades, as two generations of Americans have passed with a third on the way, we remain still, to this day, uncertain as to why it even occurred at all; why so many Americans lost their lives in such a faraway place called Vietnam, with so many families destroyed. And now, some may even wonder about the relevancy of it all.

The magnitude of names, as they cascade, panel by panel, into our consciousness in interminable, unquantifiable numbers engraved before us, overwhelms our comprehension and vision and beseeches us to take notice, to pause and reflect. We peer into the endless darkness of the Wall and see ourselves. We cannot turn away. Perhaps we are ashamed of the hurt that has been caused, even in deep pride, perhaps there is a shame that we dare not admit. Like the motorcycles of Rolling Thunder, the culmination of the Run for the Wall, the names keep coming. Endlessly.

At the sharp end of the east entrance to the Memorial, where the stone pathway rises to meet and becomes tangent with the horizontal top of the Wall, a mirror image of the entrance on the west side, an aging man wearing a ball cap that says "Vietnam Veteran" reminds visitors: "Remember, you are standing at neither the end nor the beginning of the War." But then he was interrupted and could not continue his explanation. Neither the beginning nor the end of the War? OK, so where are we?

When Maya Ying Lin designed the Wall, did she really know the significance of her design, the power it would assume? She only had a small model and her imagination with which to work. Standing west of the vertex of the obtuse one hundred twenty -five degree angle that the planes of the adjacent walls form, standing west of the vertex, looking along the westerly wall, one can clearly see the reflection of the Washington Monument in the distance; and east of the vertex looking along the easterly wall, what would be the reflection of the Lincoln Memorial somewhat closer, but obscured by trees. This imagery has been written about so many times that it may seem as if that is all there is to the Wall. But, no.

The two monuments' reflections silently stare at us from the depths of the obsidian reminding us of earth-shattering events for the United States – the struggle for independence and the creation of the United States of America by one man against overwhelming odds, represented by the gargantuan sharp white obelisk; and, almost one century later, the emergency of saving the same republic by another, represented by a rectangular, equally white, Greek-like structure.

The Wall, set in such tranquil, inviting surroundings, takes its place among so many memorials to much more distant times that have evaporated, been relegated to history, sometimes forgotten, and yet in some ways, from the face of the Wall, stare back subtly, yet poignantly at us to remind us of what this country has supremely given, generation after generation, and the sacrifices that have been made by so many Americans for over two hundred years. It is who we are and what our country means and for which it stands.

But reflecting on the Vietnam Vet's comments at the east entrance, the Vietnam Memorial, or rather the War, starts in the middle of the monument at the vertex and extends seventy-four panels, about two hundred fifty feet in both directions, But even then, this depiction isn't quite correct: 1959 is the starting date on panel 1E, and in years, the panels move east, left to right, until the up-angled stone pathway and top of the wall merge at a point. And then, beyond this point, into infinity – seemingly like the War, year after year after year, the fighting and killing would not stop, it would not go away.

To reach the chronological beginning of the Memorial, or of the War, one has to walk past so many names. One becomes enmeshed, even entranced before one starts the historical journey. Walking along the pathway, the names march past as if on a conveyor, first at our feet, such as the first name encountered, John H. Anderson Jr., on panel 70W, and then as we descend, level with our chests, then our eyes, then above our eyes, above our heads, finally from our feet to high above us, the names keep flowing past us by the many hundreds per panel, by the many thousands overall. We started the walk with only a few names, now the quantity of names before us is staggering, surreal.

From either end of the Memorial, we descend slowly into the unknown to the beginning of the War, to 1959, a vague, now distant date, obscured by decades, unknown by increasing numbers. The long, sloping black-granite pathway draws us down, deeper and deeper. While we may feel we cannot exit from the depths of some morass, in so doing, as we descend, without any denouement to guide us, we arrive at the same geographic point as the beginning, to the end of the War, in which we have been consumed for so long, never believing we can climb out of the chasm; and with the War now over, still a sinking feeling in our hearts that we may never leave the abyss – we are at the alpha omega.

The Wall, even in its simplicity, is forever a reminder of indescribable circumstances, of an era that has almost slipped from our grasp, from any notion of our understanding. The shooting is over; the pain and trauma seem not to be. We linger at the interior vertex of the obtuse angle and we scan the row after row of names, disbelieving, that overwhelm us and while we may never comprehend why, we understand clearly the haunting lyrics of a moving song: "All the grey soldiers who cannot get older."

We enter the Memorial from either end, this is true, but we enter the Vietnam War at the bottom of the depression, at the vertex or conjunction of the wing walls and proceed east to infinity, to a hoped-for catharsis, but the journey is not over. We return to the War from the west and we proceed downward, back to the abyss, back to the vertex, to the War's end. The Vietnam Veterans Memorial has brought us full circle, and we are left with a concise, walking history of the War, a history not in narrative form but, quietly, through tens of thousands of names silently sliding past us, proudly staring at us from the black obsidian in which our faces are vaguely reflected. We are there, but we are not. Those with engraved names are forever.

Finally, standing at the beginning and, simultaneously, at the end of the War, turning left or right, we walk on a level pathway that begins a slow ascent at panel 21E and 21W. We ascend out of the depths of the Memorial, slowly up the same stone pathway in which we descended, perhaps to the last name on panel 1E, Jessie Calba, and again, the question: Did Maya Lin understand the stirring significance of her design? Like so many Vietnam Veterans who only recently have come to terms with their experiences and emotions, having sorted through them, and moved on, the gradual ascent may in some way represent the healing process through which each combatant – for this is a memorial to them and their fallen comrades - may have passed to move on in life, beyond the bloody battlefields of Vietnam, to see beyond the horizon. At the top, at either end of the Memorial, the quiet surroundings of the gentle sweeping, sloping terrain covered in soft green grass, the green trees and foliage, the inviting deep shades and soothing shadows and the white marble of the other monuments emblazoned by the daily sunrises and sunsets embrace us.

At the bottom of Panel 1W – again not marked - to the left, and next to 1E, having now come full circle, we see the date 1975 and the following words: "Our nation honors the courage, sacrifice and devotion to duty and country of its Vietnam Veterans. This memorial was built with private contributions from the American people. November 11, 1982." The last name on panel 1W, the adjacent panel to 1E, at the right bottom, is Richard Vande Geer

Those who survived the War will not be on earth much longer and their names will never be there. The Vietnam War Memorial sends a subtle yet awesome message to all of us. We say goodbye to the three servicemen statue that faces the Wall and the nurses statue not far away each of which again remind us one last time of a horrific past and of courageous sacrifice on the part of so few for so many. We turn for one last look at the Wall. For those who survived and equally for those of us who did not serve, the Wall reminds us to love our country and honor and do good by those who fought for us. That's our lasting tribute to those who fell for us, their names forever seen in black granite; it's our memorial back to them. That is all they would ask.

During the early morning of the day of Rolling Thunder, the raging, roaringly loud, last leg of The Run For The Wall on Memorial Day weekend 2010, the Vietnam Veterans Memorial was enshrouded in a light ground fog that slowly crept over the contours and hovered just above the manicured lawn level with the top of the Wall. The area was quiet, very few visitors; those that were there walking along the footpath in slow reflective repose, in deep thought and introspection. The base of the Wall was lined with flowers, mostly red, and some other artifacts that had been placed there. There were pictures, cards, banners, badges, insignias; but mostly there were flowers and quite a few wreaths. The sun had yet to rise on the Memorial but the area was suffused with a goldish glow, the sky was turning its deep blue. The Washington Monument pierced the vacant sky as it pointed prominently upward, dominating the visual scene. Constitution Avenue was almost cordoned off in preparation for the procession of thundering, V-twin motorcycles at noon that Sunday.

The early morning provides time to walk around the area in solitude and quiet. A splendid view of the Mall awaits a visitor who climbs the steps to the Lincoln Memorial. The wide steps are inviting as the edifice renders each visitor insignificant. The colossal statue of a seated Abraham Lincoln beckons visitors inside.

"Fourscore and seven years ago, our forefathers..." Everyone recalls that these are the opening words of the address President Abraham Lincoln gave at the dedication of the cemetery at Gettysburg; or what is more commonly known as "Lincoln's Gettysburg Address." The Gettysburg Address is forever enshrined in stone on the south or left interior wall of the memorial. Everyone knows these words. Some individuals may have been required to memorize the complete Address in grade school. Lincoln's oratory style was criticized as a truncated, characterless off-handed statement by some. But the words and sentence structure which have been examined in minute detail by scholars are incredibly powerful and will live forever. More so than the equally provocative words spoken by Edward Everett who gave a resounding two hour-long speech at the same ceremony and who preceded Lincoln; and who considered himself a professional orator. Virtually forgotten, nobody remembers or little cares about Mr. Everett's speech at Gettysburg.

It's on the opposing wall of the Lincoln Memorial that words, perhaps of even more significance, are to be found engraved. These are from President Lincoln's second inaugural speech in early March 1865. President Lincoln's words at his second inauguration resonate as strongly today as they did over one hundred fifty years ago. His speech ends with the following: "...let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan..."

Rolling Thunder lasted for almost three hours: the incessant, deep throttled rumbling and roaring of sound that was all around us; fading in and out, increasing and decreasing, waxing and waning, loud and not so loud, then loud again, but constantly rumbling, ear-splitting. The deep cacophony emanating from the four-stroke engines of literally thousands and thousands of Harley Davidson motorcycles that had assembled at the Pentagon and were now crossing over Memorial Bridge split the air endlessly as they roared beneath the giant fully-leafed trees, darting into and out of the shade that dance across Constitution Avenue cast by the large trees. The motorcycles passed by the Vietnam Veterans Memorial. The incessant roar did not stop. The bikes and their riders came from all over the United States. They congregated in towns and cities and places along the way, before making the ride to Washington, D.C. – The Run for The Wall. A collective show of patriotism and in honor of their colleagues and comrades, some riders trailed long American and POW-MIA flags behind their bikes. Some flew multiple flags.

On the front of his motorcycle vest, a Vietnam Vet had embroidered these words: "Loud Pipes Save Lives." The meaning is a little vague but it seems that the loud exhaust from the motorbikes may have been a symbol to remind us that perhaps war may not be the answer and in participating in the Run for the Wall, the loud noise may make us think; thereby to save lives.

While the motorcycles thundered, the Wall kept drawing us back, like some compelling force. Seldom, does one stop to ponder to any real extent all the things that are placed at the foot of the Wall. The amount of mementos placed at the Wall since the dedication ceremony in the early nineteen eighties is staggering. What people leave behind can seem mundane or deeply poignant, full of personal meaning. The full spectrum of remembrances are symbolized by what is brought to the Wall and placed at the base.

More entrancing than the roar of thousands of motorcycles passing nearby, her words were as eloquent and captivating as any to be found. What she had placed at the Wall to the left of the vertex was so compelling that it had to be read in its entirety. Written on lined school tablet paper with three holes punched in the left margin for a three-ring binder, the poem she wrote wasn't lengthy. The paper had been folded into half, then into half once more and into half yet again. The note must have been carried in her purse or her pocket before she knelt down to place it at the base of the Memorial. The words were precisely written in pencil in capital and small block letters. Succinctly composed, and without errors or cross-outs or mark-overs, the poem, consisted of just twenty-four lines, contained just one hundred nineteen words.

The writer had brought the poem to the Wall and placed it at the bottom of a panel near the apex, on the lip of the channel. The poem was dated May 27th 2010, so it probably had lain there for two nights or so. But the night dampness and early morning fog and wet dew and the heat of the day quickly took their toll on her work and threatened to relegate the flimsy, vulnerable paper to that of trash. The words, still visible, though faded on the wet paper – the ink of the blue lines bleeding through the paper - were from her heart. One could easily see that she had taken time to construct the poem, perhaps having written and re-written it many times until she was satisfied, before transcribing her thoughts onto a final, mistake-free draft. What would have inspired her to take the time to compose a poem and then leave it at the Wall?

The paper on which she had written the words was not sturdy and, exposed to the night's wetness and the heat of the day, was being consumed by the environment. It had begun to deteriorate. It would seem that she had not made a copy of the poem, since it was written in pencil. This had to be the original and only copy of her emotional work. The words would be lost forever. What a shame for her to have spent so much time writing such a touching tribute and compassionate poem only for it to be destroyed or collected by the park rangers and possibly discarded as scrap paper.

Not to be and deep apologies offered and hopefully accepted, but the poem was retrieved and salvaged, the paper dried, and pressed flat, and slipped into a plastic protector, never to be lost or so immediately threatened. It was placed back at the Vietnam Memorial as she intended but this time protected from the elements. But the words should not be lost. The poem by an anonymous woman needs to be preserved for history, to be recorded for all to read; not abandoned.

Poems can be categorized as closed form or free form. Poems written in closed form follow very precise rules, requiring strict adherence to convention. Open form suggests the opposite: non-adherence to any rules (but in fact, open form poems still follow implicit guidelines; if nothing else the number of words per line being one of them). Her poem is significant because of its simplicity and conciseness. It is written in open form but still has a definite style unique to the poem and its flow of words.

Her open form poem contains a series of four-line stanzas that could be likened to quatrains, but not quite. The poem is neither a sestina nor a villanelle. It's not an aubade certainly, not a ballad, it's not an epigram, not an ode, not a limerick, not an epic, but, it is a moving, heartfelt elegy. If one were to look closely, allegory can be found. There is no recognizable meter. Most lines are end-stopped but, in a couple of cases, enjambment would seem apparent.

The poem is written in blank verse with rhyming occurring within the line in three cases and between the lines only in the last stanza. There are no couplets, certainly no heroic couplets, but it does contain caesura, a natural pause. Assonance is present but not prevalent. Definitely not a sonnet, her poem more or less does have a type of octave (setting of the scene) and sestet (some action or cathartic outcome) that characterizes a sonnet. Anapest is not readily seen but there is a rising meter. While the meter is hard to identify, the average length of line is five words, which could be likened to iambic pentameter but not precisely by a strict definition. The poem has a definite rhythm and a definite voice and the connotation is impossible to deny. The poem exhibits few characteristics of classical poetry and follows no particular convention. But the emotion and message it conveys are too powerful to ignore.

Opening with alliteration, the twenty-four line poem conveys deep emotion and perhaps deeper reflection, an inward look to self and outward look, a ponderance as to why. It's a tribute to those who fell in combat and to those who suffered losses and came home, not least to the scourge and non-acceptance by one's own society of a person who served in an unpopular war and returned home to an indignant, impatient and un-thanking society. The average length of a line is only five words. The poem ends with a solemn pledge.

From Scranton, Pennsylvania, carried purposefully to the Wall, preserved here and forever, the moving poem, precisely written in pencil on lined school tablet paper, that speaks clearly and deeply to a now -remembering, now-indebted; now-grateful and now -humbled nation, the writer speaks to all the Vietnam Veterans - indeed to all of us - in a way perhaps many never could or can understand.

Who knows why this woman placed this untitled poem at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial located next to Constitution Avenue and not far from the Lincoln Memorial? It is not for any of us to know. It's only for her to know. It's not addressed to anyone in particular. Whatever her reason or reasons are, however, the words written by Kayla Reichle should never be lost. Her poem, following no convention of prosody or style but her own, without precise characterization or use of poetic tools, placed at the base of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial on Memorial Day weekend 2010, reads:

Reflections reflecting realities deflected only by engraved names soul by soul, to the whole the mass majority of men.
Candle Light vigils, midnight visits they will never truely forget the booming, blasting everlasting
In the cores of their minds.
Fighting a cause, sealed no applause
They went over, came back judged
Mud wasn't the only thing in which they trudged.
Ghosts now rest here, old friends linger as those left behind shed tears.
Thinking back on darkness in their eyes they still carry weight wear the suit of a different type of business man.
Stand here, I salute
A tribute with tears
To those under these years men, military peers who died with their fears and will NEVER be forgotten.

And to the right of the sixth line, she adds a peace symbol at the end of the following words.

To all those who gave their lives in service; rest in peace.

It was about 3:30pm when the last of tens of thousands of V-twin Harleys passed the Vietnam Veterans Memorial. The Run for the Wall, Rolling Thunder, now over, had reigned for over three hours in a loud, rumbling tribute to those who served and to those who will never return. As the last motorcycle passed and faded into the distance, silence prevailed at the Wall, leaving only so many mementos left behind and Kayla Reichle's salvaged words to resonate with the emotions felt by all.

Rolling Thunder was over. Visitors to the Wall were leaving. Memorial Day weekend had just about come to a close. What would each person take away from the experience? Perhaps the answer is revealed by some words inscribed on the back of a van parked on a side street near Thunder Alley. "For those who fought and died for it, Freedom is a flavor that those who have been protected can never know."

To be sure, America owes its deepest gratitude to every American veteran, to every American service man or service woman. We should not forget what they did and are doing for us. We cannot forget that it is they who fight for our freedom and our great country.

SALUTING OUR VETERANS: JIM KAUFFMAN

Monday, November 1, 2010
By ADELE MALLOY
Correspondent

To many Delaware County military veterans, indeed, many Pennsylvania veterans, Jim Kauffman is a household word. To those who know him well, he's "Super J."

For the last half-century, Kauffman has devoted himself to helping military veterans and to their causes. He came by the occupational profession the hard way, he earned it.

Fresh out of the service in 1968, Kauffman joined the American Legion and worked his way through the ranks to post commander three times, currently serving as first vice commander, Murray Stuart American Legion Post 566 in Glenolden. He also had served as commander at the county level.

His family moved from southwest Philadelphia to Norwood when he was 10 years old. He attended local schools, graduated from Interboro High School, Class in 1966, and was almost immediately drafted into the Army

Kauffman got his first look at G. I. life at Fort Gordon, Ga., where he marched his hot, dusty way through basic training with a bunch of other green recruits. This turned them into tough soldier material in short order.

His unit was shipped to Fort Bliss, Texas, where they learned all they ever wanted to know about Nike Hercules Missiles, a giant leap in his trek to Vietnam. He never put his knowledge of Nike Hercules Missiles into battle, but he got proficient with automatic weapons, anti-aircraft artillery.

Kauffman spent more than a year rolling in the dust and the mud with the Army's 1st Battalion, 44th Artillery Automatic Weapons Self Propelled attached to the 3rd Marine Division. There were no soft cots, no tents, no roofs over the G.I.s heads. They just made do.

Food was C-Rations, a delectable selection of cardboard room-service three times a day; canned chopped meat, maybe lima beans, often stale crackers, maybe a bit of fruit once in a while. The beverage of choice, or not of choice, was whatever water could be found; often rain water caught in rain ponchos or helmets, boiled or treated to a shot of tasty or not tasty, water purification tablets. On rare occasions, water was transported in, most often, not.

Pay day was scheduled once a week. Sometimes a helicopter delivered the wages, but there was no place to spend the money, so the guys didn't really care.

"Rarely, we found some beer to buy, but not often. Once a helicopter brought the paymaster in under a hail of hostile fire. 'I'm gettin' the hell out of here,' he said, and that was the last we saw of him," Kauffman chuckled.

The five-man crew received its baptism into battle during the Vietnamese Tet New Year's celebration in 1968. When enemy shells came whistling their merry way overhead, the guys would dive, headfirst under their Automatic Weapons Duster, a large tank -like contraption that held their twin 240 mm cannons.

They slept under the same Duster, or tried to sleep, on the hard ground, no matter the weather; hot as hell is the summer, a little cooler in the winter. The men cooled off in the heat by tearing the sleeves off flack-jackets, wearing them only if a commanding officer was in the area.

"The CO's didn't worry too much about what we were wearing. The uniform of the day was whatever we happened to be wearing when we had to engage the enemy...and that was most of the time," Kauffman laughed

Their equipment, old antiaircraft weapons confiscated from the National Guard were first sent to Vietnam in the fall of 1966. The Army deployed three battalions of Dusters, each with a headquarters battery, four Duster batteries, one Quad-50 battery and an artillery searchlight battery

While the Dusters were highly effective warriors, the old equipment needed a lot of maintenance and parts were hard to find. The gas-powered Dusters were susceptible to engine fires. Although a Duster could travel over long distances and rough terrain, such use caused excessive wear on engines, transmissions and suspensions, but the equipment was fairly simple to maintain for a trained crew

Its high ground clearance and sturdy suspension system allowed it to withstand land mine explosions with minimal personnel casualty. It also provided fairly good cover for crew members to catch whatever sleep possible during infrequent lulls in hostile attack

The 40mm shell had an effective blast and fragmentation capability with a highly sensitive point-detonating fuse that limited effectiveness in jungle growth. In dense forest, the Quad's .50-caliber projectile could punch through cover that would detonate the Duster's 40mm shell too early for it to be effective

The 40mm shell was better suited against field formations and was able to furnish indirect fire using data from field artillery fire-direction centers.

GIs in the 44th Artillery gave tremendous support to the Marine I Corps. Both units valued the capability of the 40mm's and the .50-caliber fire in the field and in perimeter defenses to break up ambushes and to provided cover for supply and tactical convoys along contested highways

Dusters of the 44th Artillery led the task force of Operations Pegasus that broke the siege of Khe Sanh Airfield in April 1968; provided critical protective fires during the Tet offensive and later took part in Operation Lam Son 719

Kauffman boasted that his unit earned at least two Presidential Citations and a Navy Department Citation for service supporting the Marine I Corps effort.

Personally, Kauffman remembered he had earned the Vietnamese Service Cross; National Defense Medal; Good Conduct Medal and was made Squad Leader during the Battle of Hue City, receiving a Medal for Valor. Kauffman also earned the Purple Heart, but is still waiting to hear from Washington on that one.

Kauffman was just 20 years old when he made Sgt., Squad Leader, E-5 in just 19 months.

Far more important to him than medals and citations is the memory of the heroics of his comrades, especially those who made the ultimate sacrifice.

Kauffman told proudly of visiting the Vietnam War Memorial in Washington, D.C. where he found the names of his buddies, but he would rather remember them alive than talk of their demise. Kauffman still keeps in touch with some of his comrades.

"I just had a long talk with my buddy, Garvin Reese in Smokey Town, Alabama. He's still the same laid-back guy I knew in 'Nam," he remembered.

"We never lost any serious battle, but we lost some serious friends," Kauffman said.

He left the battlefield in 1968 by way of Fort Lewis, Wash., and from there to Philadelphia.

After the service, Kauffman worked for the Veterans Administration and as Building Manager, Philadelphia Veterans Administration Hospital.

"I often worked 100 hours a week, three jobs at a time," a habit he picked up in Vietnam where the days often had no beginning and no end.

Kauffman also had his own local bar business where he worked after his regular jobs to support the loves of his life, daughter Diane, sons Tom, Brett, and Kevin.

As for the future, he's looking to slow down a little.

"I'll always be around the Post, but it's time to kick back and let the younger generation carry the ball," he said.

VA Begins Paying Benefits for New Agent Orange Claims

Submitted by James Sigman

VA Encourages Affected Vietnam Veterans to File Claims

WASHINGTON – The Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) has begun distributing disability benefits to Vietnam Veterans who qualify for compensation under recently liberalized rules for Agent Orange exposure

"The joint efforts of Congress and VA demonstrate a commitment to provide Vietnam Veterans with treatment and compensation for the long-term health effects of herbicide exposure," said Secretary of Veterans Affairs Eric K. Shinseki

Up to 200,000 Vietnam Veterans are potentially eligible to receive VA disability compensation for medical conditions recently associated with Agent Orange. The expansion of coverage involves B-cell (or hairy-cell) leukemia, Parkinson's disease and ischemic heart disease

Shinseki said VA has launched a variety of initiatives – both technological and involving better business practices – to tackle an anticipated upsurge in Agent Orange-related claims

"These initiatives show VA's ongoing resolve to modernize its processes for handling claims through automation and improvements in doing business, providing Veterans with faster and more accurate decisions on their applications for benefits," Shinseki said

Providing initial payments – or increases to existing payments – to the 200,000 Veterans who now qualify for disability compensation for these three conditions is expected to take several months, but VA officials encourage all Vietnam Veterans who were exposed to Agent Orange and suffer from one of the three diseases to make sure their applications have been submitted.

VA has offered Veterans exposed to Agent Orange special access to health care since 1978, and priority medical care since 1981. VA has been providing disability compensation to Veterans with medical problems related to Agent Orange since 1985.

In practical terms, Veterans who served in Vietnam during the war and who have a "presumed" illness do not have to prove an association between their illnesses and their military service. This "presumption" simplifies and speeds up the application process for benefits.

The three new illnesses – B-cell (or hairy-cell) leukemia, Parkinson's disease and ischemic heart disease – are added to the list of presumed illnesses previously recognized by VA.

Other recognized illnesses under VA's "presumption" rule for Agent Orange are:

Acute and Subacute Transient Peripheral Neuropathy

· Chloracne

· Chronic Lymphocytic Leukemia

· Diabetes Mellitus (Type 2)

· Hodgkin's Disease

· Multiple Myeloma

· Non-Hodgkin's Lymphoma

· Porphyria Cutanea Tarda

· Prostate Cancer

· Respiratory Cancers

· Soft Tissue Sarcoma (other than Osteosarcoma, Chondrosarcoma, Kaposi's sarcoma, or Mesothelioma)

· AL Amyloidosis

Veterans interested in applying for disability compensation under one of the three new Agent Orange presumptives should go to www.fasttrack.va.gov or call 1-800-827-1000.

MY TRIP BACK

By Don Gillespie
C CO 1/26

Hey, Lieutenant Nick,

I'm not a computer wizard so don't hold your breath waiting for the CDs. The three of us intend to work on that, but remember we work on Irish time. You'll absolutely get copies of everything.

We landed in Danang on the 1st of October. Twenty -three hours flying is not what I remembered from the first trip. It was exhausting. Commercial lines packed you in like sardines and Air Singapore was no different. The first impression my sons had after touch down, was the heat. The first thing that came to my mind was "Wow it still smells". The airport in Danang was a mess, poor conditions, very dreary looking, and I thought I landed in a bad 1960's B movie. The only signs of Americans there, were single aircraft hangers on the far side of the runways, which were very old and very run down. They reminded me of open ended Quonset Huts, but bigger. On the way out of the country we saw a few MIGS parked, but couldn't get my camera up fast enough to take a flick. After we got out of the airport it was the traffic we had to deal with. My son who is in law enforcement said it looked like a traffic cop's worst nightmare. Thousands of motor bikes going every direction; what a free for all, a Chinese fire drill looked more organized.

For the first two days we hung around Danang then traveled to the Hai Van pass area where 2nd platoon operated later in '68. I don't recall too much after Khe Sanh, and before Hai Van. I was injured mid May, and treated in Japan until I returned to the Company four months later. If my memory serves me correctly, you left the platoon after we left Khe Sanh. I recall our paths crossed once again some time in August '68. I was in Okinawa in transit on the way back to the Company and you and another officer walked by me near the base movie theater. You must have been on the way home. You stopped me and were joking with me about looking like a new guy again then wished me well. Do you recall that?

We arrived in Khe Sanh village (town size now) on the 4th of October and checked into the Thai Ninh Hotel, pretty much the only game in town. The hotel was a minus 4 star. The flicks on the internet are very deceiving. For two nights we slept on box-springs, oh my aching back. The food was all local and I wasn't thrilled about that. What I wouldn't have given for a case of C's right about then. The saving grace was son Donald having a case of Nutri-Grain bars and a case of bottled water. I pretty much lived on that and cooked rice for the time I was there. Our first night in the town we walked around. Streets lights were on, people were out and friendly. There is even an ATM machine on Route 9, the main road in town. The local kids were very curious and we were surprised that some could speak a little English. The next morning we headed to the firebase.

We spent hours at the firebase. My boys got a bit of Marine Corps history. I showed them where I was when I was a new guy. We went down to the area where I went on my first squad size patrol off the end of the runway with Cpl Zamecnik (?) and LCpl Tate in November '67. I related to them how I felt during that time being in the middle of that and only four months after graduating high school. Lieutenant do you remember Zamecnik and Tate? I told my boys stories about us and of the Marines who were lost-not just at Khe Sanh but later in the Hai Van area as well. I even recalled names and things I haven't remember for years. I talked more about that place to them than I have ever done. I found Charlie Company's positions at Khe Sanh.

The area is now a farm for coffee bean plants, thousands of them. We did see impressions in the ground at certain places and suspect they are remains of bunkers and or trench lines where our platoon was set in. I did see some engineer stakes in areas and took pictures of a few. We saw unexploded ordinance. One looked like a 60mm mortar round. I couldn't tell if it was a dud, defused, or what, but needless to say we danced around that area carefully. I even walked down to where I used to sit on LP's outside the wire at night. The second day we were at the firebase and on top of 861; the boys experienced how fast the fog and rain would roll in & out, the effect of razor sharp elephant grass on skin, and how quickly leeches preyed upon you. We spent more than a few minutes pulling those blood suckers off. And check this out-while moving about Charlie Company's lines, I found the partial remains of a US Marine flak jacket with one plate remaining inside. I brought it home with me. I was surprised no one said anything to me about it when leaving the country or entering the USA.

The country is in sad state. Whoever believes that type of government works, needs to go to Vietnam and see how those people live. It is horrible! The poverty level is as bad as it gets. They have big corporations coming into the country and building 4 star hotels that pay slave labor wages to the people who work there, and think that its a good job. No welfare benefits there Bro! Either you work or starve. If you go outside of the hotel area, it's a Ghetto!

As soon as you leave the hotels you deal with the poor, horrible conditions there, and that constant smell which lingers. Walking the streets is bad. Da nang city is a dump. Once we crossed the river from the city we headed straight for the beaches on the South China Sea. The beaches near Danang were nice. We were told the area called China Beach is like a resort area. We didn't walk in that direction. When we did get to the beach, we walked north towards Marble Mountain, the beach where it was deserted, yet having clean and warm water. While in Danang city we met a Catholic nun. She worked with the poor and children abandoned by their parents. They have nothing, it was so sad. Traveling around we had to pay tolls or get permits (what a bunch of B.S.) All that was, is an official lining his pockets with our money. We had to pay a fee for permits to hump 861, then another fee to go down the Perfume River in Hue. We decided to travel as the locals did and took the only train from Danang to Hue. Mistake! It was bug infested, smelled and was very dirty. While we were at the station in Danang trying to board, one of the boys turned to me and said, "Dad look". What had caught his attention was a female who decided to use the tracks as a bathroom. The train station reminded me of the traffic patterns there-total confusion. There was pushing and shoving just to get on and off the trains, if you gave an inch you were screwed.

The living conditions in Hue City seemed a bit better. The city was cleaner and better maintained, maybe because more tourists are there. We saw many more westerners in Hue then in Danang. We saw a few young long hair Americans wearing Communist Star T-shirts similar to the now Vietnamese flag. My sons said to me when they pointed them out, "They just don't get it". I wanted to walk over to them and give them a history lesson. The biggest draw in Hue was the Citadel. Most of it has been rebuilt but if you go to the rear or the far sides in the back, you still can see the damage done in '68. We met and gained the confidence of a few younger people, waiters, waitresses, and drivers. One guy that took us on a boat ride was really a good guy; he didn't try to rip us off. He seemed like a stand up guy and one thing he and others had in common were that they are very curious about America and its people. Most of the people we met were born after the Americans left. I asked some of the younger people what they thought of America and a few thought America is a violent place. That opinion is based mostly on violent American TV shows that are shown there.

Even though, some of the people we met wanted to come here. Most citizens cannot pay for the visa fee required to the government. The average income is just under 1K per year. We found a bar in Hue called the "DMZ", yes that's right DMZ. It caters to westerners, food, music, etc. People who visit the bar could leave a message on the wall. We saw this writing from a former American soldier, 1st Air Cav; he visited there in '03. In big bold letters he wrote on the wall "We didn't lose - we left". Needless to say, I left a few choice words OOH RAH!

I was at a Catholic Church in Quang Tri Province. The church was originally build by the French and damaged during fighting; and is being re-built. From what I understand it is a place where Vietnamese Catholics make pilgrimages, and while I was there, I met this former NVA who is Catholic and visiting from the north with his family. This guy didn't have an arm and was about my age. He kept looking at me and I kept looking at him, when the person who was our driver asked him a few questions. The driver introduced us. We spoke through our driver for a few minutes. My family standing there was looking at him and his family was looking at us. As I was walking away from thinking what just happened. From what I could gather talking to our guide; the military people left from the "Puppet Government", who are the guys treated people worse. When the communist took over in '75 they were kicked out on the street, scorned by everyone, and everything they owned was seized by the new government. I'm not sure how the NVA veterans are treated. I was curious but never got a straight answer about that.

When traveling up North (I Corps), we stopped at two museums. The theme was the people's victory in what is called the "American War". One of the museums was in Dong Ha and the other at the combat base. Both were full of inconsistencies. Most of the photograph's I recognized were shots taken by David Duncan Douglas in his publication of "I Protest". The captions below the photos were things like "American soldiers flee in panic from the people's army", etc. A lot of the equipment displayed was most likely taken in 1972 or later. The M-16's displayed had the newer type flash suppressors and the flack jackets were army type, not the type worn by US Marines during the fighting. When we were at the museums I tried to set the caretakers straight on the facts, but all I got back were stares.

As our time was winding down we tried to get out a day earlier but couldn't find three open seats on a flight to Singapore from Danang. The boys wanted to scope out Singapore for a night. They said they saw and had enough of Vietnam and asked me how we did what we did under those conditions in '68. I still wonder about that.

As we boarded the plane at Danang airport, a soldier or policeman (couldn't tell the difference in uniforms) was standing at the bottom of the steps and the guy said to me "see you soon". I looked at him and said "I don't think so". I really don't think he understood the sarcasm in my voice, he just kept smiling.
Choi Oi! I made it out again!

Since I've been back people have asked me what I got from the trip. The last day at the firebase I walked the length of the airstrip by myself. I remember walking and thinking about the young men who didn't come home from Khe Sanh and Hai Van area. I could vision these guys. I was laughing and crying at the same time thinking of some of the juvenile things we did together and then how fast that would change into a life and death situation. We were only kids. Then it was so quiet and peaceful I could hear myself breath. As I was walking back to meet my sons I kept thinking what was the purpose of all that. I know I have always loved my country and have always been proud I served as a US Marine and even prouder I was a 0311 with the 26th Marines. What my sons both said was, if anyone wants to say negative things about The United States of America they should go to Vietnam and see how life is there. The boys also told me that by going there, they have a better understanding of the conditions we lived under and they hold a life long love and respect for all the US Marines who did their duty.

God Bless America

MARINE CORPS BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION
By Craig Tourte

It just seems that I run into other Khe Sanh veterans where ever I go. Yesterday while celebrating the Marine Corps Birthday - myself, Steve Wiese (B/1/26), Marco Soto (A/1/26), Pete Torres (G/2/26) and David Lind (H&S 2/4) headed over to the historic California town of Benicia where we got together with around 80 or so other Marines and took a few yachts over to Pittsburg for a little Birthday celebration. Our little sub-group of Khe Sanh veterans tries to meet at least a few times a year and the Marine Corps Birthday is one of those times. Pete Torres invited us and we had a great time with calm water, great food and wonderful companionship. I asked Tom Horchler (H.Q. 1/13) to go, but he said he gets sea sick (what?) and Dave Tonick (A/1/26) failed to give me any adequate excuse, so I'll have to work on him just a little harder next year. Of course during this little event I happened to run into a former Marine who was also at Khe Sanh and didn't know anything about our Association.

John Pessoni always kids me about this, you know, always coming across other Khe Sanh Veterans. Anyway this Marines name is Michael McDaniel and he was with the CAP unit at Khe Sanh village. He is the past President of the Diablo Valley Veterans - kind of a unassociated group of Vietnam Veterans in the Bay Area of California. I emailed Mike a copy of our membership application and gave him the addresses of both web sites. With that "Happy Birthday" and have a good Memorial Day. I'll see if I can get Mike Fishbaugh to post the photo of our little group and of myself with Mike McDaniel. Oh, and I'll be the good looking one seated on the far right with the Band-Aid on his nose.

Moving Moments

We celebrated the Marine Corps Birthday at the Pittsburg Yacht Club after an hour or so yacht ride to their Marina from the city of Benicia greeted by a bagpiper playing the Marine Corps Hymn as we sailed into the harbor. This little cruise has been a tradition now for twenty years and at one time I'm told involved over 250 current and former Marines, there were around 80 or so this day and my first cruise with them.

There were the usual speeches made by very bright former officers and enlisted who had a fantastic command of the English language with voices expressing stories that were both witty and words eloquently spoken. Four young Marines in fine dress blues from some local installation preformed the standard raising of the flag and cake cutting ceremony and we all sang the Marine Corps Hymn and pledge to the American Flag.

There was a funny little formation out front with a dress-right-dress and attention, about face, those kinds of things preformed by old men who had not forgotten - all done with smiles and giggles remembering how it was so serious back then. During one of the little speeches I happened to notice a rather small, elderly man standing in the corner supported by a silver framed walker. He looked frail, had on some kind of black baseball cap that was sitting off center. At first I thought he was connected in some way with the restaurant, he didn't look like a former Marine - we have a sort of look about us you know - and then the former Marine who was acting as Master of Ceremonies informed those gathered that for the first five years of this event, everyone would walk over to the little Mexican Restaurant around the corner when they disembarked from boats and have a wonderful lunch, but then the number became too large and the restaurant was not longer able to handle the crowd.

I'm uncertain of this but I think the Mexican Restaurant continued to cater the event even now. Anyway the host introduced this elderly man in the walker as the owner of this Mexican Restaurant. He was handed the microphone and in very broken English and heavy accent, related how he and his family had come to this country, worked very hard and had very little. He went on to describe how he loved American and was so grateful for everything and how he appreciated the sacrifices made by its veterans. Not once did he express anything but his gratitude for what this country had provided to him and his family.

With a guitar player standing next to him, he then sang the National Anthem, of which I do not know all the words, but he did. It truly was a "small world moment" and one of the most moving and memorable moments I can recall having for quite some time and of course I was chocked up as tears rolled down my face. So many folks want and expect so much and this little guy wanted and expected so little and so appreciated what America offered him and those veterans who made it all possible. At that moment, I was so sorry I had left my Khe Sanh coin in my truck back in Benicia and was unspeakable moved by what I had witnessed.

MARINE CORPS BIRTHDAY SURPRISE
Meeting Another Khe Sanh Veteran

By Craig W. Tourte

I have met many Marines both young and old, all had interesting life stories. Some pertaining to combat and others involving life's struggles and tribulations. Interesting folks these Marines I have encountered, all exceptional in their own right, most with "Small World Stories" seldom shared with outsiders. I met former Marine Michael McDaniel for the first time at the 235th Marine Corps Birthday celebration in Benicia California. Michael is the past President of the Vietnam Veterans of Diablo Valley. He served in the Marine Corps for 4 years and served 2 tours in Vietnam from September 1967 to 1969, receiving 2 purple hearts. Vietnam Veterans of Diablo Valley was instrumental in erecting a 1 million dollar monument in Danville California to honor all those who served their country and is involved with assisting homeless veterans.

After a rather long and personal conversation I asked Michael if I might share his experience with other Khe Sanh Veterans, he was reluctant but finally relented.

Michael told me his first combat experience in the Marine Corps was in September 1967 with the 9th Marine Corps Regiment at Con Thien. Around December 1967 they conducted sweeps in and around Khe Sanh, Camp Carroll, The Rock Pile and out towards hills 471 and 1015. His first encounter with a Combined Action Group (CAG) was in December of that year while working around the Khe Sanh Combat Base. He became friends with a fellow Marine by the name of John Balanco who was attached to a local CAG. One of the prerequisites for application to a CAG unit was that the applicant had to have a certain amount of combat experience. Michael noted that the living conditions in the CAG were much better than those out in the field, Balanco talked him into applying and he was accepted.

He applied for the CAG unit through Oscar 1 and after going through CAG training was assigned to that group, arriving on January 20th, 1968. While attached to Oscar 1 he worked with Lt. Thomas Stamper, Captain Bruse, Sergeant Kasper and Captain Clark instructing the Regional Forces (RF) with a Lieutenant Nhi. Michael spoke Vietnamese, however most of the RF's consisted of Montagnards who spoke only limited or a different dialect of Vietnamese. He assisted these forces in directing South Vietnamese air strikes and artillery strikes from American Forces.

After Khe Sanh Village was attacked by the North Vietnamese Army's (NVA) 66th Regiment the remaining forces walked to the front gate of the Khe Sanh Combat Base but the RF's were denied entry. Not wanting to leave their comrades the Marines walked to FOB-3 located at Lang Vei. Five days after arriving at FOB-3 he was transferred to 3rd CAG and was assigned to Hotel 4, 6 &7. During that attachment his locations were overrun 3 times and of 2 of those, he was in command.

He remained with Hotel 7 the remainder of his time in country. On April 27, 1969, while operating on a patrol with another CAG unit they were hit by two NVA companies and he was wounded 6 times and peppered with shrapnel in a running four hour battle. His RTO sustained forty rounds in his radio but fortunately received only two body wounds. The 101st Airborne was sent to assist them and it took that unit 6 hours to reach them. Because of his wounds he was listed as killed in action on site. It was not until he was moved to a medical unit was it discovered that he was still alive but severely wounded.

Out of the 6 American and twelve RF's who had been in that battle only himself, the radio operator, corpsman and 1 RF survived. He was subsequently evacuated to Japan where his recuperation took 4 months. Michael told me that he only spent approximately 2 weeks near Khe Sanh, a time he remembers as difficult and a place where he was nearly killed.

I was some thirty years later that he became reacquainted with his old friend from Vietnam John Balanco and became involved in the Vietnam Veterans of Diablo Valley, seeing his old friend again for the first time during a 4th of July parade. His friend passed away some years ago due to illness but he remembers that during many conversations there was never any mention or recall of the night of January 21st, when Khe Sanh Village was attacked by the North Vietnamese Army.

MARINES FACE A DIFFERENT KIND OF "ENEMY" AT RODEO RANCH

By Lee Warren
Contributing Writer
The Heartland Gatekeeper

The Korkow Rodeos ranch near Pierre, S.D., is used to accommodating tough men -It has been producing rodeos for more than 60 years-so when a couple of busloads of Marines pulled into the ranch in late July, they fit right in.

The Marines were there because a team of people that included Vietnam combat veterans wanted to show the men how much they appreciated them. They threw horseshoes, shot rifles, fished, hunted, feasted (including smoked rattlesnake), and participated in a little rodeo action - resulting in two of the Marines going to the emergency room. Other than being sore, they were fine.

Marines face a different kind of 'enemy' at rodeo ranch

One group of warriors serves another group of warriors

While this wasn't a "Christian" event, Christ was present and presented in one-on-one conversations as the Lord led. Ken Korkow of Omaha, regional director of the Christian Business Men's Committee for Nebraska, Iowa and South Dakota, spearheaded the event at the family ranch. Korkow is a decorated former Marine and (Navy Cross) Vietnam War vet eran .

Korkow was wounded in combat and lives with what he now understands to be Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). Given that many of the Marines who were at the ranch were also combat veterans, he said he knew that many of them would be dealing "with PTSD" at some point in their lives.

He also knew many of them simply needed to know somebody really cares about them.

William "Fritz" Klumpp, a Vietnam veteran who was shot down on his 30th combat mission and went on to fly 106 more, was at the ranch for the same reasons as Korkow.

"I went out there just to love these guys," said Klumpp, who lives in Virginia. "To let them know that there were a group of men, veterans, who not only appreciated the sacrifices they're making, but to be able to serve them, to be able to give them a great time, to have an opportunity to share with them in whatever context, might bring real healing at the hand of God."

Klumpp said PTSD can lead to drug use, alcoholism, pulling away emotionally from family members, divorce and just reckless behavior in general.
"A lot of these guys have experienced things and they may not even be aware that they are dealing with anything like PTSD," said Brian Ascherin, an Arizona resident and decorated Vietnam veteran. "So my focus was to visit with guys and to understand that we have pasts that have had significant and often times traumatic impacts that have affected our lives.

"It's easy to get stuck in the past and even though you may get to the point that you feel like you are a survivor rather than a victim of the past, to move ahead in life and live with a hope for the future, or, for guys who really don't have any kind of a spiritual foundation in their life, dreams for the future.

"A lot of the guys' identities are, 'I'm a Marine. I'm a Marine first and last. I'll die a Marine.' And so, just in visiting with guys and finding out that, 'Hey, there's other things in the world; other things in life, other things in your family that you need to be aware of, be thinking of, be hoping for, be dreaming of, and not being a prisoner of the past or even a prisoner of the present.' "

"My perspective was to be a friend, be a help, serve them, help them have a good time, kick back and ask God for an opportunity to visit with them about the real stuff that makes up life, and ask myself,

'What can I share? What can I do to help you in maybe clearing up some perspectives based on our common experience," Ascherin said.

Korkow pointed out that the leadership team needed to be wise when interacting because each man's experiences were different. Some of the problems they heard about were common, some were not.

Klumpp. spoke to another man who was hurting because he had just been through a divorce and was not able to see his two-year old daughter.

"They were a great group of young men," Klumpp said. "Some of them opened up. Just by things that they didn't say - the fact that they wanted to hang close to a few of us and gave us opportuni-ties to share where we've found our healing and strength -- I felt like that was very meaningful.

"It was an outing for a group of warriors who were served by another group of warriors who now have a new Commander in Chief."

All of the Marines were offered a copy of a book called Wild at Heart written by John Eldredge and a copy of the Vietnam Veterans Bible.

Wild at Heart is promoted as a book that "gives men permission to be what God designed them to be - dangerous, passionate, alive, and free." The Vietnam Veterans Bible is the New Testament (in a camouflage cover) interspersed with testimonies from Vietnam veterans, including Korkow and Klumpp.

Ascherin said many of the Marines climbed back into the buses with tears in their eyes. Klumpp said he heard one Marine say he had never had so much fun in hiSs life. Many stories were left untold. But one thing was certain, the God who knows all things was at work.

Ken Korkow was raised in Blunt, SD by Erv and LaFola Korkow, well known producers of professional rodeos.

Ken served in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1966-1968, serving in Vietnam in 1968. He was wounded in combat and received the Navy Cross, the nation's second highest award for combat valor. The Governor of South Dakota named a special day in his honor as South Dakota's most highly decorated Viet Nam veteran.

Ken received a B.S. in Agri-Economics from South Dakota State University in 1970 and graduated from University of South Dakota in 1972 with a Masters of Business Administration.

From 1972-1974, Ken worked with S.D. Industrial

Trap shooting was a popular activity for the Marines at the Korkow Rodeo Ranch

Development and Expansion Agency in Pierre, SD From 1974-1978, he developed a real estate company focused on farm and ranch sales, and then went on to do site selection and development work for national companies.

In April 1984, Ken joined the staff of Christian Business Men's Committee USA. He is currently Regional Director of CBMC Heartland, serving Nebraska, Iowa, and South Dakota. Regional Director of CBMC Heartland, serving Nebraska, Iowa, and South Dakota. On August 10, 1968, Ken married Liz Alm of Wahoo, NE. The couple currently resides in Omaha, Nebraska. They have three children.

He is a former member of Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association; former president, Central South Dakota Board of Realtors; and former president, North and South Dakota Farm and Land Institute.

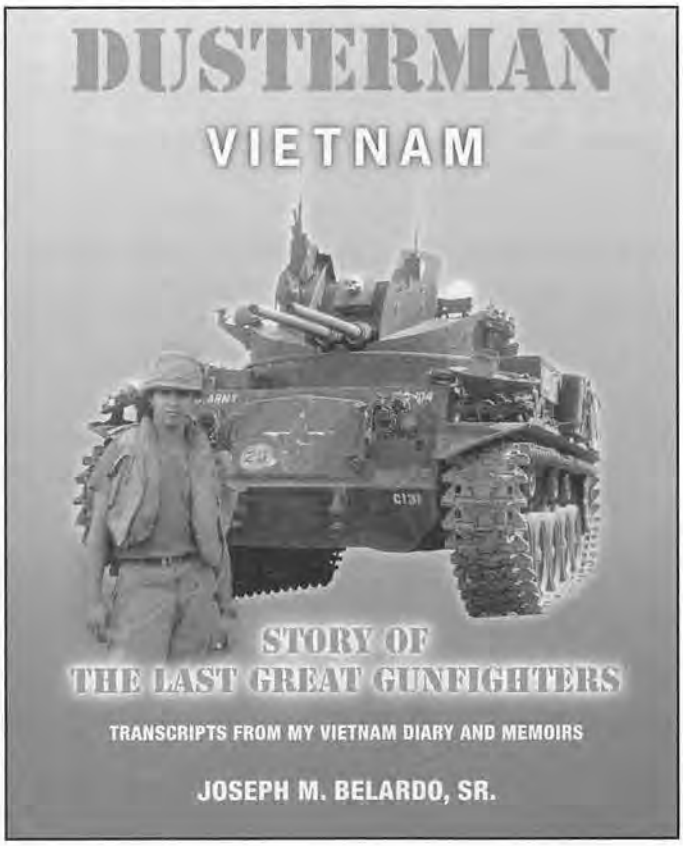
BOOK REVIEW



South Plainfield, New Jersey resident and Vietnam Veteran, Joseph Belardo, releases his new book;

Dusterman – Vietnam…. Story of: The Last Great Gunfighters.

Dusterman is a transcript of Joe's diary and memoirs, including photographs, while he served in Vietnam in a specialized Army mobile combat team and body recovery unit called "Dusters" that were attached to the Third Marine Division along the DMZ in 1967 and 1968 during TET.

His book will take you across the DMZ from combat base to combat base and gives a detailed, day-by-day, frontline battle and body recovery narrative of daily combat life while attached to the Marine Corps. His fascinating, introspective memoir reveals a sensitive soul's struggle to be physically and mentally strong amidst unimaginably horrible suffering and dying.

Joe and his crew hold the distinct honor of being the last to leave the finally abandoned Khe Sanh Combat Base.

He has appeared in two television documentaries: The Soldiers Story and Vietnam War with Oliver North. He is an author who has been published in the book The Soldiers Story – Vietnam in Their Own Words, Vietnam Magazine – Dusters Battle for Route 9, The Khe Sanh book of Poetry and the Khe Sanh Magazine "Red Clay."

Joe's medals include the Bronze Star with Valor, Purple Hearts and numerous Marine Corps and Army medals and citations.

STRANGE HAPPENING ON THE JERSEY SHORE
By "Fish"

Took a slow train to the Joisey shore yesterday just for the sh|ts and giggles. Walked around the boardwalk, (planks laying on the beach) looking for the elusive "Joisy Devil" then went to a nearby Joisy Greek type diner for a bit of lunch and what do I see sitting there stuffing their faces.

These guys were claiming that they were Khe Sanh Veterans, I doubt that. Jessie the waitress agreed.

Here I was minding my own business, just walking 'long da Boardwalk, when I met dese cweatures @ da corner of thoity thoid and thoid. As for Jessie, I can't really say 'cuz I wasn't paying attention, 'bout all I remember is hearing a female voice say sum-thin 'bout "a real man" and den she plopped in my lap. Hey guys, what can I say; when ya gots it, flaunts it. :-) :-) :-)

GREAT seeing you guys again. Gots to do that more often. Any others in the area wanna join us next time?
Semper Fidelis!

A CORPSMAN'S REFLECTION

A Tribute to Medal of Honor Recipient
Richard David DeWert

I woke up yesterday morning with a sweat-soaked shirt, wondering what it would be like if I had been Richard DeWert.
A hardened smile that echoed tears of pain,
A mother's neglect at leaving her child in the rain.
He went willingly with visions of heroism and pride,
To become a Hospital Corpsman in our Nations' fight.
With hopes of the future, to be a doctor someday,
A harsh taste of combat and the dreams fade away.
It was early April with Dog 2/7,
No angels of mercy were looking down from heaven.
A bitter long trek to the 38th parallel,
When they took enemy fire and his Marines began to yell.
"Everybody down, were in for a fight", the smell of fear and death took them in to the night.
On patrol the next morning as a thick fog rolled in,
The eerie silence of what was to begin.
Suddenly the fog lifted as quickly as it came,
The platoon's being cut down by bullets in vain.
Cries for "Doc" were all that he heard,
Marines gasping for air as they said their last word.
"Don't go out there Doc, wait until it's time", a reply was met with, "You do your job, I'll do mine."
No time for thinking they're bleeding fast,
He pulled his first Marine to safety as he felt the first blast.
His leg burning, a sharp pain indeed, Ignored for the comfort of his Marines in need.
Dodging through bullets, a daring second trip,
He carried the injured from the enemy's tight grip.
Undaunted by his own condition, his only thought of saving lives, Dashing automatic fire for a third grueling time.
Another sharp blast of enemy fire, Piercing pain to his shoulder and he's beginning to tire.
Persistent in his commitment of saving
these men,
Out for a fourth time to meet the enemy again.
Assuring his Marines it was going to be alright,
Machine gun fire rendered his mortal plight.
As he lay over the Marine he was to save,
A thousand angels laid feathers at his blood-soaked grave.
As for the men who witnessed such courage and compassion,
They were inspired to move quickly against the enemy's action.
Some say it was Doc who saved them all,
His selfless sacrifice in answering the call.
I woke up this morning with a calm and grace,

As I looked in the mirror and saw my face.
I realized a few things about my wondering and dismay,
About the legacy Richard DeWert has left us today.
The Hospital Corps can forever stand tall,
For this young man, so fragile, gallantly gave his all.

The Medal of Honor is what they gave,
His selfless deeds so proud and brave.
Long may you rest our brother DeWert,
No longer to bear the pain of those that are hurt.

OBIT

All Marines are Rifleman first, but then there were some of us who done a little galley duty also, from time to time please join me in remembering a great icon of the entertainment community. The Pillsbury Doughboy died yesterday of a yeast infection and trauma complications from repeated pokes in the belly. He was 71.

Doughboy was buried in a lightly greased coffin. Dozens of celebrities turned out to pay their respects, including Mrs. Butterworth, Hungry Jack, the California Raisins, Betty Crocker, the Hostess Twinkies, and Captain Crunch. The grave site was piled high with flours. Mrs. Butterworth delivered the eulogy and lovingly described Doughboy as a man who never knew how much he was kneaded. Born and bread in Minnesota , Doughboy rose quickly in show business, but his later life was filled with turnovers. He was not considered a very smart cookie, wasting much of his dough on half- baked schemes. Despite being a little flaky at times, he still was a crusty old man and was considered a positive roll model for millions.

Doughboy is survived by his wife Play Dough, three children: John Dough, Jane Dough and Dosey Dough, plus they had one in the oven. He is also survived by his elderly father, Pop Tart.

The funeral was held at 3:50 for about 20 minutes.

ED NOTE: Changes on Pages 26-35 are in response to my recent letter seeking changes for the 5Th Edition of the KSV Membership Directory. There are still many members who did not respond as of 17 Jan 2011. Lets get them in soon, so I may have the new directory printed prior to the upcoming reunion.

LATE OBIT

ERNEST H. COLLETTE
1934-2010
KHE SANH VETERAN
USMC M CO 3/9

Ernest Henry Collette, eldest son of Ernest O. and Mary Florence Stochaj Collette, was born June 2, 1934, in Putnam, Connecticut. He departed this life Sunday, October 17, 2010, in Lake Regional Hospital, in Osage Beach, Missouri, at the age of seventy-six years, four months, and fifteen days.

On April 20, 1968, he was united in marriage to Betty LaVerne Mason Anderson, and to this union one son and one daughter were born. He was preceded in death by his parents; a daughter, Lori Ann Collette; a granddaughter, Caitlyn Cribbs; three brothers, Tom, Bob, and David Collette; and two step-brothers.

Ernie is survived by his loving wife, Betty, of the home; two sons, Ernest R. Collette, and his wife, Pam, of Springfield, Missouri, and Daryl Anderson, of Lubbock, Texas; a daughter, Kristi Cribbs, of Scottsdale, Arizona; four granddaughters, Marisa Maldonado, Dyan Covington, Jesse Cribbs, and Brooke Collette; a great-grandson, Anthony Ynessa; two brothers, Jerry Collette, and Denis Collette, and his wife, Sandra, all of the State of Massachusetts; a number of nieces and nephews; as well as a host of other relatives and friends.

He was born and raised in Connecticut and Massachusetts, where he attended parochial school during his education years. Ernie proudly served his country in the United States Marine Corps for twenty years, with combat in both Korea and Vietnam. While serving in Vietnam from December 1966 until January 1968, he was involved in combat at Con Thien, Khe Sanh, Hill 881 South, Camp Carroll, Dong Ha, Cam Lo, Cua Vet, DMZ, C-2, Hill 861, and Gio Linh.

During his tour in Vietnam, Ernie's company was featured in a Life Magazine article by photographer, David Douglas Duncan. He is shown in a couple of the photographs in the article. He is also named in the book Vietnam Sons, for some the war never ended by Dale Keuter. The book is written about his company (Mike Co., 3rd Bn, 9th Marines, Third Marine Division) in a 1967 incident and other combat situations experienced by M/3/9.

After retiring from the Marines, he and Betty made their home in San Diego, California for several years, and Ernie worked as a security guard at Campbell Shipyards. Later, when the family moved to Lebanon, Missouri, Ernie worked as an assembler at Tracker Marine Ernie was a member of Sleeper United Methodist Church. He had a love for animals and there was usually a cat or a dog as part of their household. For many years he had several tanks of tropical fish that he tended faithfully. His family was very important to him and he especially enjoyed his granddaughters and great-grandson.

Ernie was a loving husband, father, grandfather, great-grandfather, brother, and uncle, and was a caring neighbor and friend. We celebrate his life and know that he will be fondly remembered as a devoted family man, a courageous and decorated Marine, and a true patriotic citizen.

LATE OBIT
JOHNNY F. LYON
KHE SANH VETERAN
LT COL USAF C-130E PILOT

Memorial Services for Johnny Foster Lyon, 73, of

Bryan, Texas, were held, Monday, December 6, 2010 at The Texas Hall of Fame in Bryan, Texas. The service was followed with a military burial service at Providence Baptist Cemetery at 3 p.m. Dr. Malcolm Bane officiated both ceremonies.

Mr. Lyon passed away peacefully his loving family, and friends surrounding him, on a beautiful Sunday morning, November 28, 2010 at his home in Bryan, following a courageous yearlong battle with Cancer. Johnny Lyon was a model of grace under pressure he handled an extremely challenging year with courage, dignity, and determination. He remained a "Fightin' Texas Aggie" to the end.

Johnny was born on January 17, 1937 to Johnnie R Lyon and Louise Margaret (Warlick) Lyon, in Bryan, Texas. He was the absolute apple of his folk's eye, and he managed to live a life of accomplishments that clearly illustrated their admiration and confidence in him was justified. The life lessons his parents imparted to him were cherished and often repeated by Johnny.
Johnny served in the USAF from 1960-1 981 as an Air Force Pilot, serving in Vietnam and retired as a Lt. Colonel. He also served at Officer Training School, at Lackland AFB in San Antonio, Texas, imparting maturity, wisdom, and leadership to all he commanded.

Upon his return from the Air Force he built and opened The Texas Hall of Fame, along with life long friend Paul Emola. The Texas Hall of Fame continues today as the premier live Country Music Venue in the Bryan-College Station area. When he was not busy with all the jobs on his plate, he operated his Father's beloved Ranch between Snook and CaIdwell, Texas.

Johnny graduated from Texas A & M University (Class of 1959) with a Bachelors Degree in Business Administration. He later attended Sam Houston State University and earned a Secondary Teaching Certificate. Johnny was a life member of SIGMA CHI.

Johnny Lyon had a little saying" "It's not what you make, it's what you don't spend" And although he was widely known for his frugality, he was the most generous man in Texas, having helped many, many friends, family, and his community in their time of need.

In this spirit of wise spending, the family respectfully asks that in lieu of flowers, contributions be made to Providence Baptist Church and Brazos Valley Hospice Care. He would greatly appreciate any assistance these two fine organizations would receive in his memory.

Johnny Lyon was a lifelong entertainer, with his beloved Country Nu Notes he made the rounds all over Texas and for many of the musicians and fans that adored him, the music stopped on 11/28/2010.

Visit his website to learn more of the man and his music. www.johnnylyon.com

Simply stated: We have lost a man of character, who possessed a million special talents and exhibited splendid behavior throughout his life. He was absolutely wonderful.

He was preceded in death by his parents, a brother; Billy John Lyon, and a son John Ross Lyon.
He is survived by his wife, Suzy Joseph Lyon; and two daughters, Terrilyn Lyon Seale and her husband, Todd and Amber Lyon Clowe and her husband, Duncan, and their two children Emerson and Parker Clowe.

The Family wishes to acknowledge the support, friendship and love shared with Johnny Lyon by his dear friends Joe and Judy Powell. No two people could ever have provided more comfort, assistance, and love than them. They helped provide, "the peace that passes all understanding". God Bless them both for their love and dedication.

LATE OBIT

JILL BORLAUG
DAUGHTER OF NED BORLAUG
KHE SANH VETERAN
USMC I CO 3/3

Jill was born in Redding to her parents Ned and Donna Borlaug and had a younger brother, Erik. She passed away at her home.

She was very involved at Grant School with cheerleading and being student body president. She then went to Nova where she was head football cheerleader. At Shasta High she became involved in swim team and school functions. She also was actively involved with her horses, water skiing, snow skiing and crafts. Her family and friends were very important to her. A memorial for her was held on Friday, September 10, 2010 at 2 p.m. at Allan and Dahl's Funeral Chapel in Redding. . In lieu of flowers please send donations to NAMI Local chapter or your favorite organization.
"Love you as high as the sky, Jill"

NEW ITEM FROM THE VA

The Department of Veterans Affairs is making available a new medallion to be affixed to an existing privately purchased headstone or marker to signify the deceased's status as a veteran. If requested, the medallion will be furnished in lieu of a traditional Government headstone or marker for veterans that died on or after November 1, 1990, and whose grave is marked with a privately purchased headstone or marker.

The medallion is currently available in three sizes, 5 inches, 3 inches, and 1 ½ inches. Each medallion will be inscribed with the word VETERAN across the top and the Branch of Service at the bottom. Appropriate affixing adhesive, instructions and hardware will be provided with the medallion.

Important: This benefit is only applicable if the grave is marked with a privately purchased headstone or marker. In these instances, eligible veterans are entitled to either a traditional Government-furnished headstone or marker, or the new medallion, but not both.

For family members of eligible Veterans interested in submitting a claim for the new medallion, instructions on how to apply for a medallion will be updated on NCA's web site at www.cem.va.gov/hm_hm.asp. Until a new form specifically for ordering the medallion is available, use VA Form 40-1330; Application for Standard Government Headstone or Marker.

THE POOR BOY FELL DOWN

November 27, 2010 Associated Press
AUGUSTA, Ga. - A U.S. Marine reservist collecting toys for children was stabbed when he helped stop a suspected shoplifter in eastern Georgia. Best Buy sales manager Orvin Smith told The Augusta Chronicle that man was seen on surveillance cameras Friday putting a laptop under his jacket at the Augusta store. When confronted, the man became irate, knocked down an employee, pulled a knife and ran toward the door.

Outside were four Marines collecting toys for the service branch's "Toys For Tots" program. Smith said the Marines stopped the man, but he stabbed one of them, Cpl. Phillip Duggan, in the back. The cut did not appear to be severe. The suspect was transported to the local hospital with two broken arms, a broken leg, possible broken ribs, assorted lacerations and bruises he obtained when he fell trying to run after stabbing the Marine. The suspect, whose name was not released, was held until police arrived. The Richmond County Sheriff's office said it is investigating.

KSV IN THE NEWS
By Diana Fecarotta

Chicago IL.

O'Hare Airport, located in the City of Chicago, is one of the largest airports in the United States. The O'Hare USO had recently completed a state of the art renovation of their facility.

It is an ultra modern facility with numerous amenities, which include special rooms for veterans traveling with children, hot & cold food, computers, televisions, quiet rooms with recliners, and many more activities and services to aid our traveling veterans. After completion of the project, retired Chicago Police Department, Sergeant Pat Scanlan, who along with his lovely wife Kathy, unpaid volunteers of the USO, made a discerning discovery.

Along with hundreds of souvenirs and mementos left by the many service members, was a plaque from the Chicago Fire department, honoring servicemen. Since a large majority of the CPD are former members of the Armed Forces, Sgt Scanlan felt there should also be a plaque honoring our servicemen from the Chicago police department.

Sergeant Scanlan Pic #1 brought it up to Chicago Police Department Deputy Superintendent Daniel Dugan, Pic# 2 who was now the Commanding Officer of the O'Hare Police facility.

Jeff Hoffman, Pic# 3, a Lieutenant with the Chicago Police Department, assigned a Watch Commander of the 23rd Police District who volunteered; to assist with the designing of the Chicago Police plaque, which would honor our servicemen.

It was decided that keeping with the Vietnam War Era, the main theme should be the tumultuous years of the many anti war protests held in the City of Chicago.

As pictured in the Pic # 4, a 1960's Chicago Police Department's Riot Helmet, flanked by two police batons was chosen. These items were donated by Lt. Jeff Hoffman. All Chicago Police riot helmets include the star number of the police officer. Lt. Hoffman donated the helmet and batons. Now came the decision of which star number should be placed on the helmet. The criteria for this selection would have to include the selected members service to his country and the Chicago Police Department.

Retired Chicago Police Sergeant Allen Piantkowski Pic# 6 on page 45 has received many accolades for his volunteer work with the military and police communities, who is also one of their most generous contributors, was asked for his input. His brother, Edward J. Piantkowski, a highly decorated soldier, was Killed In Action during the Vietnam War, while serving with the 196th Light Infantry Brigade. Al Came up with the design of the plaque shown in Pic # 5 on page 44.

Al served with Former Marine Tom Eichler on the Chicago Police Departments Tactical Team for over five years. Sergeant Scanlan was aware that there was a picture of Tom in Al's home, of a plaque hanging on the wall of the Pentagon, outside the offices of the United States Marine Corps. This Plaque held a pictured story of the battle on Hill 861A on 05 Feb 1968 for which Tom Eichler had received the Silver Star Medal for Gallantry. (See Att Picture A to the right) →

Tom was also one of the most decorated Police Officers on the Chicago Police Department, and in in addition to the Silver Star Medal was the recipient of two Purple Hearts for his Vietnam Service. It was decided to place Tom Eichler's Star Number on the Memorial Plaque.

On 11 November 2010, a small ceremony took place at O'Hare airport in the USO. Several members of Tom's Family were in attendance. In picture # 7, three of his six brothers attended, two of which were decorated wounded veterans from their service in Vietnam. Dennis, who served with the 25Th Infantry Division, is a retired Chicago Police Sergeant, Robert, served with the 1st Cavalry Division, and Donald, who currently is a member of the Chicago Police Department. In Pic #8 his two sisters Karen & Garnet, are with them. His sister-in-law Rene, is shown in Pic # 9. Also in attendance, were many members of the Armed Forces passing through O'Hare and making use of the new facility.

Dan Dugan emceed the dedication, in Pic #10,who informed those in attendance, why and how the plaque was designed, why Tom's star number was chosen, and read Tom's Silver Star Citation. Tom & Pat Scanlan then presented the plaque to Jeane Quinn, senior Volunteer of the O'Hare USO in Pic # 11.

It was also a special day for Former Deputy Superintendent Daniel F. Dugan, a well respected, decorated member of the Command Staff of the Chicago Police Department, who was serving his last day before retiring. Thank you Dan for your service to our Country and the City of Chicago.

THESE STORIES NEVER GET TO OLD

A SURVIVOR OF TARAWA

By Craig W. Tourte

During a casual conversation my neighbor mentioned that his 91 year old father had served at Guadalcanal and Tarawa and would be visiting him during the Christmas holidays. I asked if I could have the privilege of meeting his father. He agreed and told me his father had even written a biography of his life which included his war time experiences. My neighbor provided that biography to me which included 15 pages of his fathers experiences in the Marine Corps. I cannot express how privileged I was to be able to read a most interesting account of an extraordinary life. On December 23, 2010, Steve Wiese (B/1/26) and I talked to Captain Bollum, who was just shy of his 92nd birthday, about his experience in World War II. He graciously granted permission to quote extensively from his biography. For purposes of this article however, in many cases

I have shortened the text, excluded words, phrases and paragraphs along with paraphrasing sentences and placing my comments in italic in order to condense this story into a manageable piece. What heightened my interest while reading his biography was a little statement in the middle of the story which read, "I do not intend here to go into detail as to the battle for Tarawa, I recommend to you the book by Robert Sherrod, "Tarawa-The story of a battle," which does an excellent job of doing so..." "Rather, I will limit this to what I directly experienced." I was captivated by that statement and it is just the kind of recalled historical event I thought Khe Sanh Veterans would find interesting. Captain Bollum's written biography is articulately composed and compelling and I was privilege to have been able to not only read but hear his first person accounts. With that said, any errors, omissions or editing mistakes are solely mine.

"...I decided I wanted to enroll in the Navy flight program and took the South Shore into Chicago for the physical exam. Having worn glasses since I was about 17, I knew the eye exam would be a problem, so I rested my eyes all the way there. But to no avail -I flunked." "...then came Pearl Harbor. My best friend, Tom Webster, had gone through OCS at Quantico and was now a 2nd Lieutenant in the Marine Corps, so I guess that pointed me in that direction. Anyway, on December 10th, 1941, I said my goodbyes and took the South Shore to Chicago and the U. S. Marine Corps enlistment office. My eyes didn't seem to be a problem and I passed the physical ... we were soon on the train headed for the West coast. As I recall, a Corporal who was shipping over was in charge of us and he certainly used very loose reins. We were just regular passengers and had sleeping car berths and ate in the dining car as we pleased. We went through Kansas City...and during stops we could have beer if we wished. I remember that when we stopped in L.A, that just about everyone got off and had a drink - on the premise that it would be a long time before we could do it again. I believe that the trip took five days."

CAPTAIN ROBERT BOLLUM USMC

"Upon reaching San Diego and the Santa Fe station, we were bussed to the Recruit Depot...it (training) was a little tougher than I had expected. Also, it was complicated by the fact that the Marine Crops wasn't quite ready for the massive influx of new recruits. We didn't have any dungarees or other work apparel and had to wear dress greens, because that is all they had. We didn't have dress shoes and had to wear "boondockers" instead. There were other similar shortages. However, the training was there and did the job. I did hate the pith helmets, which not only were used in boot camp, but as the required cover later at Camp Elliot. I don't remember the number of my recruit platoon; however, it (recruits) was probably pretty representative of our nation, although perhaps weighted more from the Midwest area." "...I really liked the number of little, cocky, somewhat illiterate, Polish and Hungarian boys from the Chicago area. Several became my good friends and helped materially in expanding my vocabulary of heretofore unheard-of words. I wouldn't say that boot camp was a breeze, as there were times that it was very, very far from that." "...we made mock shore landings on the shore of San Diego Bay, about where Harbor Drive is now. We were all in eight-man pyramidal tents and the area where we would wash up and brush our teeth was in the open."

"One day I was called out of our training and told to go the office and there was Tom Webster, my longtime friend. He was now a 1st Lieutenant and heard that I was in boot camp and stopped to say hello." After a number weeks, "...we moved to Camp Matthews in La Jolla, where UCSD (University of California San Diego) is now located. There we qualified with the Springfield 1903 rifle and the Colt 45..." "Upon completion of boot camp and graduation, I was assigned to the Special Weapons Company in the 4th Battalion of the 10th Marine Regiment, Second Division. It was expected that we were to receive motorized 75 mm guns, but we didn't have them and our training was that traditionally the gun was just fired by pulling the lanyard at a predetermined target. What we were trying to do was to have the gunner sit on the metal area behind the gun and aim at a moving target and then fire. As a result, my lower legs took a real beating."

"The whole regiment went on maneuvers to Imperial County in March of 1942. We set up a new camp, called Camp Dunlap, near Niland and just East of the Slaton Sea. We lived in two-man pup tents, mostly placed in old dry stream washes for some wind protection." "...we went on several very long and very hot all day hikes... There was water to wash your face and hands, but no showers. Every few days we were trucked into Brawley and were able to use the showers at the Municipal Pool-and, of course also the pool." "...while there I made PFC on March 16, 1942, and on April 4, 1942, I was promoted to Corporal."

"We returned to Camp Elliott about the end of April and I appeared before the Selection Board and on May 11, 1942, I was informed that I had been selected for Officer's Candidate School. It was to be at Green's Farm, a complex of buildings and tents a few miles East of Elliott. In the meantime, I was granted 15 days leave..."

"... I started OCS on June 15, 1942, which completed with our graduation on August 4, 1942. (I was 25th out of a class of 77). "...on July 17, 1942, I was discharged from the Marine Corps and commissioned the same date as a 2nd Lieutenant in the USMC Reserve. Then back to Elliott and assignment to K Battery of the 4th Battalion, 10th Marine Regiment, Second Marine Division. We then began intensive training, including schooling in fire control tactics using an enormous 'sand table' which gave a fire control officer the ability to practice without actually firing the guns...." "Nellie's Tit was a mountain formation behind the firing area which we used as an aiming point." "In July the Regiment hiked from Camp Elliott to Del Mar and stayed at the racetrack. Officers bunked in the Jockey Club and men in the stable area...we had some entertainers down from Hollywood, including Tyrone Power, who by that time was in Marine uniform."

"In anticipation of our going overseas several of us went...to Los Angeles...I purchased a sleeping bag and a short collapsible air mattress, just long enough to support me from the shoulders to the hips. It would easily roll up in my bedroll and inflate with a few good puffs and turned out to be a godsend."

"In the middle of October we started loading our gear into the Matsonia (a converted passenger liner) at Navy Pier at the foot of Broadway in San Diego...on October 19, 1942, we sailed out of the harbor for what turned out to be a fifteen-day voyage. We had no escort ships and depended on 'zigzagging' and maintained high speed to avoid Japanese submarines. Double-decker bunks were crammed into every area of the ship, including the drained swimming pool. Officers were in cabins, but they had been stripped of beds and replaced with double-deckers. The meals were excellent, as the ship had been only recently removed from passenger cruising and the larders were still stocked with excellent food." "On November 2, 1942, we reached the harbor of Auckland, New Zealand only to find out that we were supposed to go to Wellington...(where we arrived on November 4, 1942,). The next morning...got on a train and arrived at a little town called Paekakarike" for training at the former New Zealand Army Camp.

"Prior to leaving New Zealand - for Guadalcanal - we had been issued Reising guns, replacing the 1945 Colt pistols for the officers and the 1903 Springfield rifles for the men. They fired a .45 caliber bullet and could be set for single or automatic fire. We all qualified before we left, but were not too happy with them. They were short; having a heavy wire shoulder stock that could be snapped out, but just weren't as accurate as we were used to. They were light and easy to carry and I guess that is why they gave them to artillery troops. Then we found out that they rusted easily in the damp weather of the island. So there then was a rush to trade with the army units or anyone else, and we ended up with a lot of shotguns, Tommy guns and M1's that appeared from somewhere. (We did find that some of the infantry really prized the Reising for its capability of being able to spray a lot of bullets at a time, which was handy for patrols). A similar problem was with the ammunition for our 75mm guns. Most of it was World War I issue and we quickly found that we were having duds. But the final straw was when we started having 'shorts.' Most of our firing was close to our own positions and accuracy was vital. So, we arranged to get a supply of newer ammo from the army and then stole some additional and bulldozed a big hole and buried the old."

GUADALCANAL

"In the middle of December we began preparing to ship out and on December 21, 1942, we embarked on the USS President Hays accompanied by other ships carrying the rest of the division and also the usual Navy protective vessels. The President Hays was one of three President Line ships, which carried the Marines to the initial invasion of Guadalcanal and continued to provide transportation for Marines and Army in the area. Unlike the Matsonia, where my cabin was down in the bowels of the ship, I shared a cabin on the main deck with a view of the outside with seven other officers in four double-decker beds and with one head. We stopped at Noumea, New Caledonia for a few days and the 6th Marines did a practice landing..." "On the morning of January 4, 1943, we lay to off the shore of Guadalcanal. I was surprised to find that you could actually smell the island - sort of a musty, unpleasant odor."

"We went ashore in LCVP's (Landing Craft Vehicle Personnel) and bivouacked that night near the fighter strip on Henderson Field. Early that evening we were treated to our first sighting of 'Washington Machine Charlie' as he dropped a few bombs." (So named because of the broken rhythm of the airplane motor) "The next day we took over the former position of our brother battalion, 1st Battalion, 10th Regiment and began support fire for the infantry. As the days went by, we occasionally moved our positions westward as the Japanese were pushed back. We supported at various times, different battalions of the 6th Marines and the Army Americal Division and one of our batteries was detached and went by water around behind the enemy as a part of an Army operation. We were relieved to be moving away from the airfield, as it had nightly bombing, sometimes very heavy. We occasionally received counter artillery fire on our battery position from the enemy, but fortunately, not very accurate. We also received a few random shells from 'Pistol Pete' an enormous gun that fired an equally enormous shell" (Research indicates that this weapon was most likely a 105mm Howitzer type 92. 'A few of these guns made it to Guadalcanal and were known as Pistol Pete for their harassing fire.') "On the afternoon of February 1, 1943, we moved from our position and put all of our guns on a sloping hill facing the ocean, as they anticipated a Japanese navel attack...it never came..."

"Guadalcanal was a large island, with date palm groves along the reasonably flat shore areas, hills and valleys inland rising into what were some pretty good-sized mountains. It was hot and sticky, with not too many bugs and it almost always rained about 4 PM. The area was full of land crabs and their rustling sound as they moved at night added to the concerns we had about snipers and infiltrators, who were frequently found. Going to the head (in slip trenches) at night was a real adventure, particularly during the first days on the island, before men got adjusted."

"A frequent assignment for me was liaison to the CO of the infantry battalion that we were supporting. With a radio man and his TBY backpack radio.

I would stay with the CO until he knew what fire missions he wanted during the day and during the night, we would locate them on the map and send the coordinates and type of fire requested back to our fire control section. As the support assignments changed we would have to take off and find the new infantry group. The only roads were along the shore, so finding them involved the ups and downs of the valleys and hills."

"When we first got there (Guadalcanal) the Japanese were trying their best to send in additional troops and supplies. However, that changed in early February and they started trying to remove as many troops as possible and resistance markedly decreased. On February 9th, our command said that hostilities were over and on the 11th we went back to near the fighter strip and started preparations to leave. Our battalion had suffered 3 killed and 20 wounded. (Seven of the wounded came from a muzzle burst in my battery from a communication wire that someone unknown strung in front of one of the guns…").

"On February 25, 1943, we boarded the President Hays and were back in Camp Paekakariki on March 2, 1943." "…while on Guadalcanal I had been notified of my promotion to 1st Lieutenant. When I got the papers, I found that it was effective as of March 1, 1943. On board ship, we were reminded that henceforth we were to be clean-shaven. So, I had proceeded to remove the full red beard that I had grown from December 21st to then - over 9 weeks." "While on Guadalcanal I had heard that - my friend - Tom Webster had been wounded and evacuated. In Wellington I met someone who knew him and was told that he returned and had been killed." Capital Bollum only recently found that his friend Tom Webster had been buried in the National Cemetery in Hawaii.

"Our battalion had been designated for rubber boat training and as part of that we participated in Division maneuvers, practicing breaking down our pack howitzers into units that could fit in a 10-man rubber boat. We ended up in rubber boats at Tarawa, but the guns came in on larger landing craft."

TARAWA

"On October 15, 1943, we boarded the USS Feland. It was one of a class of attack transports that had been recently produced and had almost the lines of a destroyer and was capable of high speeds. All of the berthing of the troops was in large dorm-like spaces filled with double-decker bunks and with noisy air-blowers (no air-conditioning in those days) lining the ceilings. On all of the other ships we had fresh-water showers, but here it was saltwater. We were issued saltwater soap, which supposedly would later, but really didn't. After the shower, you still felt sticky."

"The convoy proceeded to Efate, New Hebrides, with more ships joining as we went along. At Efate, the infantry practiced landing, but we stayed aboard. Several days later we were told our destination and briefed on the details. We were part of the 6th Marines, Reinforced, and were to be in reserve."

"On the morning of the 20th, we were off Tarawa atoll and it was quite a site. I have never seen so many battleships, carriers, cruisers, destroyers, transports and other ships…" "First the battleships and cruisers started firing their big guns and then the fighters and bombers from the carriers took their turn. Then the amtracs and Higgins Boats started in and the battle was on."

"With the battle ashore going badly, the 6th Marines were notified that they were taken off reserve and would be landing early the morning of the second day. The landing would be at the West end of Betio and, because of the reef, it would be in rubber boats. My Dog Battery was assigned to the 1st Battalion of the 6th and although the guns would not go ashore initially, my CO, Captain Kittrell and I, with several of our radiomen would go ashore with the infantry in order to locate where our guns could go." (Steve Wiese noted that it was his understanding Dog was an army term but Captain Bollum assured us that he was correct in that Dog, not Delta was used at that time by the Marine Corps) "That night we had the usual early steak and eggs breakfast about midnight and were ready to go at dawn. We went down the cargo nets and into rubber boats, which initially were to be towed by landing crafts. The line of departure was a long way from the shore and we had been going for several hours when suddenly we were overtaken by our own ship. Apparently the threat from Japanese shore guns was now gone and they moved up the line of departure. Meanwhile there was seasickness aboard the rubber boats from a combination of the bobbing motion from being pulled and the exhaust from the landing craft. Late in the afternoon we reached the reef and the landing craft left us to paddle the rest of the way in-about 2,000 yards. We reached shore without anything more than sporadic firing at us."

"By that time it was almost dark and we spread out on the sand on the shore side of the seawall. There were several bodies nearby and one of our men nudged one with his foot saying, 'Is this a Jap or a native?' (Captain Bollum describes the body as not in uniform but rather wearing a loin cloth) "As he did the body sat up and there was a pop and every-one yelled, 'grenade.' Everyone hit the ground, but nothing happened. It was a dud. Meanwhile the Jap had disappeared over the seawall and no one was disposed to go after him. The order was passed that we were to stay on this side of the seawall and to dig in as much as we could in the dry sand away from the water. Watches were assigned and we tried to get some sleep. However, several hours later we heard the drone of an engine and what we thought was a Betty 80 Japanese bomber dropped its bombs on our moonlit beach. When the confusion was over, we found that one bomb made a direct hit on one of our small group positions, with resulting heavy casualties. With the bomber still overhead, the order came to move to the over side of the sea-wall, where we were not so visible. The rest of the night passed without incident and without sleep."

"The next morning, November 23rd, I tried to eat something for the first time. I had a C ration can of some sort of meat and tomato, which managed to stay down. Then we began to move with the Com-mand Group of 1/6, staying behind the flame-thrower and firepower combination, which was tak-ing care of the pillboxes and blockhouses ahead. When we reached the middle of the island on the South side, we were stopped temporarily by sniper and machine gun fire from somewhere to the North from the airport area. So, we went one by one as fast as we could run from one blockhouse cover to the next. The man in front of me made it almost all the way, when next to a big palm tree he tripped. We thought he had been hit, but he got up and ran to cover. So I followed only to meet a large explosion by the tree. It blew me up in the air and I landed in a state of shock. I didn't feel pain, just sort of numb. The next thing I knew a corpsman was bending over me and wanting to pull me out of the line of fire. I remember being sort of grumpy about the prospect of having to move and I guess I was beginning to feel the pain. Anyway, he did pull me back behind the tree and gave me morphine and sulfa and I guess did what he could to bandage me. I don't know how long I was there, because I was sort of in and out of consciousness. I was told later that I went on a stretcher to the battalion aid station and then was loaded on an amp track and returned to my ship, the Feland and the operating room there. Many months later I ran into a dentist from South Bend that I had know there and who was part of the Feland medical staff. He told me that after they had worked on me that they put me on the floor with another man, so they could watch us, as they were doubtful we were going to make it."

"...my next recollection was lying in bed in a ward of the hospital ship, USS Solace, without any mem-ory of how I got there. I had a cast on my right leg all the way to the hip and found out later that they had drilled holes through my ankle and just below the knee and inserted stainless steel pins in the holes. On the other leg and lower abdomen area I had hundreds of little pieces of shrapnel on the skin surface. The next few days were pretty much of a blur and I slept a lot."

"After about 9 days aboard the hospital ship we reached Honolulu and I moved to US Naval Hospi-tal Aiea Heights. It was, I believe, a 3-story struc-ture, with rooms opening onto a typically Hawaiian breezeway or lanai. While I was there I had a visit from several of the men from my outfit, including the man who had been ahead of me before I was wounded. He said that he tripped over some sort of wire, that apparently was to a delayed fuse and that he had been told that the explosion came from a sea -mine that had been buried there. H also said that the explosion actually sent me up in the air. Nothing much else happed while I was there, except all the little shrapnel bits were beginning to come off and they itched a lot. While there a Marine Colonel also visited me...and presented me with my Purple Heart."

"After two weeks there, on December 16th, they moved me back aboard the USS Solace and into a ward again. Then they took me into an operating room. Sometime later, after I was conscious, one of the corpsmen explained that they had taken off the cast and cut open the back of my leg in order to remove an infected area that they had detected. He also explained the purpose of the pins and that they placed my leg in a metal frame that had sliding 'U' shaped forms that the pins fit into. They were then tightened in order to hold my leg stable before they removed the cast and then after a new cast was on, they removed the metal frame."

"We were on our way back to the states, and on December 23rd, we arrived at San Diego. I had been overseas just over 14 months, but it seemed much longer." (Captain Bollum related that in total, he had been in a combat zone for 5 weeks and 3 days) "In my ward I could hear a band playing outside and, what seemed like a long time, I moved to a stretcher and to an ambulance. By that time the band was long gone and I must admit, I briefly felt a little short-changed. However, upon arrival at the San Diego US Naval Hospital in Balboa Park and being settled into bed, the corpsmen immediately offered to have me telephone home. They rolled my bed out into the corridor and by a phone booth, where I was able to talk to my Mother and Dad. They previously had been notified that I was wounded."

"On June 19, 1944, I received an official award of the Presidential Unit Citation, with star, for the Tarawa Invasion, together with two battle stars on the Area Campaign Ribbons."

I was privilege to have been able to spend time with Capitan Robert Bollum; his convalescents from wounds were long and painful. Capitan Bollums successful post battle recovery is representative of his intelligents and perseverance. He and men like him, set the standard of excellence, bravery and honor for future generations of America's fighting forces. He continues to reside in the San Diego area and I am grateful for the time he spent with us. As a very small token of appreciation, I presented Capitan Bollum with a new Marine Corps cover, a Khe Sanh coin embedded in acrylic and a copy of the summer 2010, issue 76, Red Clay magazine.

BOOK REVIEW

BEYOND MY HORIZON

An Educational Odyssey & Combat Memoir

By CLAUDE REGIS VARGO

5.0 out of 5 stars A Must Read Book!

"Author Claude Regis Vargo has written a one of a kind book. It doesn't fit neatly into your standard book genres as it takes the reader on an inspiring, informative and entertaining journey. In his book "Beyond My Horizon: An Educational Odyssey & Combat Memoir" he takes us on an inspirational journey. We see how he has survived so much in his life - including a war. His book is not just some self-centered story that looks at his personal life but it blossoms into a self-help road map that readers can follow dealing with higher education, PTSD and even on how to handle college debt.

The author reminds us that if he did it then you can too - and he really means that. He challenges his readers to improve their lives. The book is heavy with self mocking and making fun of his own short comings with education. His late life wake-up call to get an education is certainly inspiring. The book is worth your time and money to buy and read it."

CHAPTER FOUR
From Hippy Hair to a Baldini

My brother, Mark, and I were the best of friends until he left for the seminary in San Antonio in the tenth grade. Mark was eighteen months older than I, and my mother trusted him explicitly over me. Somewhere between Cub Scouts and Boy Scouts, we were old enough that we were permitted to strike out on our own for sheer adventure in our small township of Bay Village, Ohio. Mark was always the leader and always got blue clothes because of his blue eyes, where I always got what I thought were frumpy-looking brown clothes because of my hazel green eyes. Little did I know then that it would not be too long before I would finally have a completely green wardrobe to match my eyes.

Mark and I would go hiking to such exotic places as our church, the school, the public library, and the post office, where he would always pick up and bring home all kinds of applications that could lead to all kinds of exciting careers all over the world. At church he always picked up the questionnaires for joining a seminary, and at the library I would look in the back of the magazines and copy the addresses of military academies such as Valley Forge and Virginia Military Institute to mail away for admission forms. It seems that even at that young age my brother always saw himself in a priest's tunic and collar, while I saw myself as nothing other than the six-and-a-half-foot-tall cardboard Marine Corps sergeant on display in the local post office.

The cardboard-cutout sergeant was regally outfitted in the Corps traditional dress-blue uniform, with royal-blue trousers and a red stripe screaming down each side. He had a proud chest adorned with several medals, his massive jaw was square, and his eyes were transfixed with determination. Mark and I would go to the post office every Saturday morning—after chores, of course—and I can remember telling my brother, "That guy would look great in our bedroom."

We both agreed and concluded, "They'll probably throw him out anyway." True to my prediction, one Saturday afternoon, Mark and I went to the post office, and found the sergeant gone. When I asked a postman at the post office where they had put my Marine after I saw he was "missing in action," the postman looked at me like I had three green eyes.

Week after week, month after month, Mark and I filled out applications and requested information. But the more postcards we sent out, the more mail Mark received in return, including complete information packages loaded with pamphlets from the Jesuits, Maryknolls, and Oblates, which were all foreign missionaries. I always thought it was amazing how the mailman or the registrars' offices evidently knew that my family could not afford a military academy boarding school and the recruiters always knew that I was too young to join the Marine Corps, because I never got a thing.

Mark and I would trek excitedly to the library each time a package came so we could locate and match up on the map the possible countries that we could go to. The year 1959 was a very exciting time compared to today, and the world was still a relatively young and simple place to us, with plenty of new adventures.

Looking back, I realize now that Mark was always destined to help the needy of the world. He succeeded in doing just that, as, in just a few short years after all of our library trips, he would be stationed in India, Bangladesh, and Thailand. I, on the other hand, never received any correspondence but still retained a burning desire to be that Marine Corps sergeant dressed in the royal-blue trousers with the red stripe down each side and a chest full of medals.

I do not feel very old, but I do remember, in the early days of black-and-white television, when the dancers I envied, such as Jean Murray and Fred Astaire, wore tuxedo slacks with elegant, shiny black-on-black stripes. I guess by then I already knew that I wanted to be a sergeant and a gentleman dressed in that beautiful uniform and respected. I could never imagine the gravity of the situation that would lead me to earn those stripes the hard way. As far as all those military academy applications I mailed in, it would be about twenty years later, in a mother's sordid confession, that I would learn the bittersweet but horrible truth: it hadn't been the postman, the registrars' offices, or the recruiters who had thwarted and ruined my goals of being a sergeant; it had been my mother, who had been my unknown personal gatekeeper. My goal of being an academy cadet and a tall, blue-uniformed Marine sergeant had been intentionally sabotaged. But despite this, my goal of being a Marine was realized sooner than my mother or I could ever have predicted.

JOINING THE MARINES

"Some people live an entire lifetime and wonder if they have ever made a difference in the world, but the Marines don't have that problem."

Ronald Reagan

It was about a month after my graduation-less graduation ceremony that I decided to join the Marines. At that time, Gloria was barely a sophomore in an all-girl high school. I had decided that because we were still so young, we should just do what we both needed to do for now and, in two or three years, if we still felt we were meant for one another, we could get married. It didn't hurt that both our fathers had got together and mutually decided that we needed to separate and that I should go into the Army and far away to Germany.

But no one tells Claude Vargo what to do, so it was the Marines, and I proudly, but admittedly nervously, left for boot camp on June 23, 1967. I was barely nineteen years old.

After surviving the Incarnate Word sisters, the Basilian brothers, and the Oblate priests browbeating me for years, I was pretty relaxed with my drill instructors at boot camp, and I felt at least a little ahead of my peers in dealing with the initial shock of boot camp. My drill instructors did not do anything to me psychologically that the nuns, brothers, and priests had not inflicted on me and others.

I stood more than a bald headed foot taller than my head drill instructor (platoon commander), Staff Sergeant Lowery, but I looked up to him. He was a great teacher to me. He ruled with an iron fist but was fair-minded, if that was possible under the circumstances of boot camp. I really liked this man; he trained us well, and everything he showed me would eventually help to keep me and my platoon alive. The only thing he ever did to me that I really resented was for some indiscretion on my part one day, when he grabbed me by my collar, crushed my Adam's apple and climbed on my kneecaps, screaming bloody murder down at me while bending me like a longbow. I got over the resentment, though, and I couldn't know it at the time, but just a few years later, he and I would cross paths under more positive circumstances. We would have a very warm and wonderful reunion...because we were both still alive.

During Christmas of 1967, I was at Camp Pendleton, California, and was given five precious days off by my employer, the United States Marine Corps. I had just joined that June, but with six months' worth of the infamous and grueling boot camp, Infantry Training Regiment (ITR), and tank school at Del Mar, I was ready to defend my country. Before our brief Christmas release, we had each signed our last wills and testaments and actual death warrants that said we would not exceed a 500-mile-radius travel limit. A couple hundred miles extra to go home to Houston was no big deal, I figured. Well, maybe it was closer to 700 miles out of jurisdiction, but as just a nineteen-year-old pimpled and lanky teenager with the prospect of going to war looming, who really cared?

I had a great time home on leave, never sleeping but instead walking around like a proud peacock, as most Marines do on their first leave home. After leave, on the way back to camp, my luck being what it was, when my flight landed on the evening before I was due back on base, it was not in Los Angeles as scheduled. We had to make an unexpected landing in Las Vegas due to a very bad fog. The stewardess cheerfully told all the passengers that we were lucky that the airline was putting us up at a multi-star hotel until the fog lifted. This was to be a seminal moment in my life, because we had been told that Marines missing from their outfits that were shipping out to war zones would be shot the next day at sunrise, per the aforementioned death warrants we had signed. In Marine jargon, it was called "missing a movement." There were absolutely no excuses and it was taken deadly seriously.

I desperately tried everything to get back to Camp Pendleton: bus, train, even a private helicopter. Finally, I started hitchhiking the 300-odd miles left to the deployment center for processing. Naturally, I was a dollar short and an hour late. My outfit had already left. I was condemned and resigned to my fate with a personal firing squad in less than twenty-four hours. I was sure glad they had made us make out our wills before the Christmas break to save time.

I checked in and was immediately put in shackles; my status was now changed to deserter in a time of war. This was a severe military matter, but I had convinced myself that some other unlucky turd had got my seat on the plane over to Viet Nam and I would go on the next available space, no problem. I did not think that the Marines really wanted to make an example out of little ol' me for being a couple hours late. I was wrong, again. This was really serious stuff.

While I was chained to a brick wall in wrist and ankle shackles, I conversed with the officer of the day, who was sitting at a desk, rubber-stamping a stack of papers. The new "brown bar" second lieutenant wasn't too crazy about his assignment and was about as excited as I was about me being latched to the wall. He initiated the conversation by jokingly asking me who I had murdered and was relieved to find out I was just another tardy pimpled teenager. We continued small talk, I think mostly because he felt my captivity looked like overkill for my crime against humanity. After a few more exchanges, I found out he was from Cleveland, Ohio, and had actually distantly known my cousin while at Case Western Reserve College and that they had become closer while in Officer Candidate School (OCS) in Quantico, Virginia. Thankfully, it wasn't long before my dossier was rubber-stamped and I was on an olive-drab dark green school bus headed to 'Nam.

Semper Fi or Die—Khe Sanh

Our flight from San Francisco to Anchorage actually slid in sideways on the runway upon landing. I had thought that was the worst flight of my life, until the flight that landed in Danang. We flew right over the world's busiest airport and just dove straight down in a corkscrew to miss the enemy flak. I never knew, or even considered, that a commercial Boeing 707 could dive so steeply, like a dive bomber, straight into Danang, then the world's busiest airport...with my stomach just ahead of the plane. That pilot was amazing, but I guess we were also just lucky that we were not hit by any flak or surface-to-air missiles.

It wasn't long before I was processed in and reported in to our tank battalion headquarters in Phu Bai, South Viet Nam, about halfway to the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) from Danang. Once we were in the DMZ, life was all about filling sandbags with monsoon mud, battling constipation and diarrhea, and getting used to being in a war zone. Nothing actually happened for a couple of weeks, until the Tet New Year Offensive started and all hell broke loose all over the country. Then I was quickly headed to the front line in the proverbial Year of the Snake.

Everyone could tell I was a Freaking New Guy (FNG) because my utilities were still vibrant camouflage-green, my boots were still black, and I was limping and dragging one of my legs because of an anti-Hepatitis A gamma globulin horse shot painfully received between my hip and my butt. I think Nurse Hefty had used both fists to cram that spike into my hip. I had heard her grunt just to inject the extra-thick serum, which had the consistency of napalm and Dep hair gel, but I had known better than to cry out.

When I arrived in Hue City, which had been overrun and was under siege, one of the first things I noticed was the incredibly smelly "Perfume River," which ran through the city. It reminded me of the solid waste treatment plants back home, only a lot stronger and more toxic. The locals all had clothes lines in their backyards, but instead of freshly washed clothes hanging there, dried and rotting fish and shrimp were waving in the gentle breeze.

As I was in Hue without a tank assignment yet, I was swiftly drafted into the infantry. I found myself assigned to a hastily formed provisional infantry unit, running behind a tank and carrying a brand-new M-16 with Cosmoline still glued to the weapon, and two hand grenades hung from a just-out-of-the-box flak jacket. It was a cold, almost-freezing January on the other side of the world, and I now had my nose stuck up the dragon's ass. It was a fifty-two–ton, thirteen foot- high monster whose exhaust of 750-horsepower belched out diesel fumes at an enormous rate, while it intermittently hurled 3'6" rounds onto a stubbornly entrenched opponent. I finally evaded the tank's ear-blistering, unannounced explosions and constant machine-gun chattering when a group of us switched dragons for the back of a "zippo" flame tank, which also added the smell of napalm and burning flesh to the stench covering the area. I ran over pools of blood and wondered whose body parts had been scattered around us as we made street-by-street advances.

The central business district of Hue City had been recently overtaken by the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) in the first major Tet Offensive of January 1968 and the first siege of the war. We could see the enemy flags fluttering in the wind but could not rout the embedded troops in the citadel because we were not permitted to carpet bomb or fire indiscriminately on the ancient city, for political reasons, so we just went from street to street, firing point-blank at targets. But politics surely did not stop the enemy from shelling and sniping at us anywhere and everywhere. As we recovered precious military real estate in the middle of the antiquated metropolis, major enemy offensives broke out all over South Viet Nam. Tanks became hot-ticket targets in which crewmen were dropping like flies, but I immediately volunteered for a tank for the protection I thought it would afford me. I would soon find out that, once again, I was wrong.

For my next thrilling military flight with my stomach shoved up into my Adam's apple, I was choppered into Khe Sanh, next to the DMZ, via a couple days at Camp J.J. Carroll. About twenty-five of us were packed in like cattle aboard a CH-46 Sea Knight chopper, or "Phrog."We hovered in the cloudy fog that hung over the plateau for what seemed like an eternity. Finally, the back loading ramp magically opened and a mist drifted in and out, much like our guarded and shallow breathing. There were slowly blinking red lights behind the crew cabin, warning us of the impending danger at hand.

The pilot shut off the engines, and there wasn't a sound except the wind whistling through the cabin and our hearts pounding. We hit the ground and did a dead-cat bounce, and the jet engine turbines on the CH-46 screamed back to life louder than the mortars, artillery, and rockets that were pouring in underneath us and all around us. Adding to the confusion was a blaring bullhorn yelling for everyone to depart orderly but quickly. Was he freaking kidding? It was now every man (and boy) for himself. After the initial recoil from the jets being restarted, the chopper's front end lifted, and all of us newbies fell out on top of one another, like Yahtzee dice on a table. The chopper hit its afterburners and was gone in an instant, leaving us to fend for ourselves.

I left my duffel bag, along with my lunch, right there on the tarmac, somewhere a couple of miles from North Viet Nam. I didn't ask questions, instinctively diving into the first trench and bunker I could find. The walls were corrugated metal, damp from constant moisture; the lights inside flickered as the gas generators strained to keep up with the electrical demands of war. The odor reminded me of a cross between my high school biology lab and the French Quarter in New Orleans—very noxious and damp, with 99% humidity.

The two punch-drunk ghouls inside the bunker were dressed in half civilian attire, with no visible rank, insignia, or identifying service patch but were calm as cucumbers and passing a joint between them. I smoked cigarettes just like all Marines but had never smoked marijuana. If those ghouls had passed it to me, I would have sucked that whole joint down in one drag to calm my totally shattered nerves. Once the shelling abated and I had started to collect my wits, one of them chucked a packet of C-ration (C-rat) toilet paper at me, ostensibly to clean myself up, then starting laughing profusely. The other said, "Welcome to hell!"

As I hastily left the bunker, I turned and saw a sign that read:

Graves Registration Please take a number.
You might be next!

Already moving into action, several men were dragging the most recent screaming wounded and the dead, either to graves or Charlie Med, the hospital in another dirt bunker. Some of the guys I had just been on the chopper with were, just that quickly, casualties of war. This was the first time I had ever heard human beings screaming in agony, and it all seemed like a surrealistic dream, far from the life-sized Marine posters in the post office at home.

On or near the tarmac were Corpsmen and Army medics dragging bodies onto stretchers and carrying them toward Charlie Med. Behind them were another group of troops quickly repairing the rocket-laden blast holes in the twisted metal tarmac. It all looked methodical, choreographed, and rehearsed. These were the Navy "Seabees" (Construction Battalion, or CBs), and these were absolutely some of the bravest men I have ever seen. They never knew when one rocket or artillery attack would end and another would start but would do their jobs, riding forklifts and Caterpillars with their unit's flags proudly flying aloft, like it was an ordinary day at the job site back home.

One guy I saw had a red target painted on the back of his flak jacket and was running around, yelling at the adjacent mountain peaks. As I looked out from my hiding place in a trench alongside the runway, standing in ankle-deep water with baby rats paddling, bobbing, and floating all around me, I heard the NVA snipers pinging at the scurrying and zigzagging Seabees. My bladder was full, and my urinary tract was burning. There was no sign for a "head" or anywhere else to piss, and I didn't know whether to let it go in the trench, find a nonexistent tree, or run around to try to find a damn head somewhere. This was definitely something they had not taught us in boot camp, infantry training, or my specialized training, tank school.

Khe Sanh, like all military encampments, was divided into different colored sections so dumb-asses and FNGs like me would know where they were going: North was blue, gray was east, and red was west. But I didn't know where I was going. If someone back at Camp Carroll had told me where to go when I got here, I sure as hell could not remember at this point. I just ran perpendicular to the arc of those freaking missiles, and I didn't give a damn which sector I was running to, only what I was running from.

I must have missed the class back in basic training when they had discussed the rockets, missiles, artillery, and mortars now raining down on me. Or when they had described the divisions of tens of thousands of battle-trained and hard-core equipped enemy called the NVA regulars assembling as close as one hundred meters outside our perimeter, ready to close-in and lock horns with us.
Later in the siege, it would be confirmed that several Russian tanks and aircraft had been spotted adjacent to the base. That's when the scuttlebutt began that President Johnson was arguing with some of the Joint Chiefs of Staff about having the nuclear option, just in case. I just never thought of myself as an option or a just in- case.

But on my first day in Khe Sanh, I was sprinting blindly, clutching my duffel bag in front of me, when suddenly I felt something hit the duffel bag...hard. I felt like I was Jerry Ellis holding a punching bag when Mohammad Ali let loose with his best punch to my solar plexus. There was an explosion that I never heard, and amazingly, it probably had my name written on it by some gook on a Co Roc mountainside just inside Laos. The round hit so close in front of me that I ran right into the hole in the ground that it had just created. Thankfully, the only wound I had was to my pride. When I dropped my duffel bag, I saw it was shredded like a gutted stuffed animal, and everything was falling out of it, including my skivvies. I picked all my stuff up out of the mud with both arms and ran away as fast as I could, cradling the remains of my bag like a thirty-pound unwanted tumor. There would be no Red Badge of Courage, no Purple Heart, and no body bag for me on this day...but the war wasn't over yet. For me, it had just begun.

"They are in front of us, behind us, and we are flanked on both sides by an enemy that outnumbers us 29:1. They can't get away from us now!"

Lieutenant General Lewis B.
"Chesty" Puller, USMC

The Khe Sanh Combat Base (KSCB) was about the size of one of the new super regional malls that were springing up back home from coast to coast, which usually had four national anchor tenants. I figured I ran past Foley's, Sears, Montgomery Ward, and J.C. Penney, then all the way out to the last car in the parking lot before I asked directions while the rocket attack abated and my bladder trouble began again. But I decided it was all just burning fear and just another short squirt away.

I ambled all the way back to the west end of the base, the gray sector, where the tank park was located. I got there just as another barrage started up again, and I ran to the tank command post, which was designated by three large, empty ammo boxes covered with a poncho. A haphazardly etched sign read "Bravo Company, 3rd Platoon, Third Tank Battalion." The first thing I noticed was that the tanks were right in the line of fire to those screaming and screeching rounds flying through the air, and the dirt and metal each explosion produced. I was in a mountainside monsoon of light rain and heavy artillery fire with a large red and-white bulls-eye suspended over our position.

I had arrived on a Sunday, without going to church, and wondered if I was going to hell or if I was already standing in it. A Gunnery Sergeant (Gunny) took my orders and in return gave me three boxes of C-rats. Instead of the delectable Spaghetti and Meatballs or Beans and Wieners, I got Ham and Mothers (lima beans), Ham and Mothers, and one more Ham and Mothers. Before I was assigned a tank, I was shown an underground bunker and an elevated shelf nearest the ceiling that was my intended sleeping spot.

I thought my day had already been a nightmare, but didn't know the nightmare had only just started. These were bunker's hours, not banker's hours. I was lying on my back with my nose a little less than an inch from a wood beam that I could barely see. The only light was a flickering diesel lamp set up in the middle of a dozen guys coming and going 24/7 from duty on the perimeter of the base. As there were only three tanks to guard an airstrip and an entire command post (CP), they were always busy in direct-fire support of a very aggressive opponent always watching, always probing.

I clutched the three cardboard boxes of C-rations next to me while the night's barrage of screeching missiles landed over and under our position, when the acid burning in my stomach kicked in. In between the offensive and defensive volleys of artillery, the only sound we heard was of the squealing rats scurrying on the beams above us, when someone in the dark told me to keep my .45 ready. "Ready for what?" I wondered.

Then all was quiet...I thought everybody including the rats had left the bunker, but as I felt a hundred eyes looking at me, I decided this was no Disney movie. In the next instant, I heard a pistol shot and saw a muzzle flash not but a few feet from me, and a dead rat the size of a large cat and his offals landed on my chest and face. I was so close to the flash that I got face and neck burns from the gunpowder. Whatever I felt that was wet, I did not want to know. My first tank commander (TC) had just shot at point-blank range the platoon mascot that had been eyeballing both my C-rats and me. When the sergeant stepped out of his umbrage, he thought he was cute by blowing the smoke off the barrel of his .45. He jerked his head quickly to the right and said in his drill-instructor-imitation voice, "Topside, Private," for guard duty on the perimeter, I ascertained.

When I saw Gunny Martin again a day or so later, my stomach was growling, with each rumble greater than the previous pang, blaring for some meager degree of nutrition. I asked him when he was going to pass out another round of boxes. I also told him I wasn't too keen on the chef's special of ham and lima beans but would take them if he didn't have anything else. He looked miffed, laughed, and asked me if I had already eaten them all. I told him, "Yes, yesterday, Gunny—breakfast, lunch, and dinner."

He shot back, "Yeah, but they were for Monday, Wednesday, and Friday," and with a shit-eating grin, he said, "Check back with me next Sunday, Private!" It was a very long and very hungry week.

In January 1968, Khe Sanh was an unheard-of outpost, with an airfield defended by a couple of thousand Marines of the 26th Regiment. Shortly after I arrived there, my brother, Mark, the seminarian, mailed me a copy of Bernard Fall's Hell in a Very Small Place. Ironically, included with it was a note asking me if I knew where Khe Sanh was. In his note he told me that Jeanne Dixon, a noted prophetess and author of A Gift of Prophecy, had correctly foretold and warned then President Kennedy of his impending assassination. Mark further wrote that Ms. Dixon had also predicted that U.S. Marines would be overrun at Khe Sanh...exactly where I was standing. In Fall's book he gave a chronology of how the French had been driven out of Viet Nam after they had been slaughtered and almost annihilated at the battle of Dien Bien Phu. There was such similarity between the enemy garrisons at Dien Bien Phu and Khe Sanh, they were almost indistinguishable. The same General, Nguyen Van Giap, was also in charge of Viet Nam's battle plan for Khe Sanh, and now a lot wiser on how to defeat his second world-class superpower.

I don't think I had even finished reading the first chapter before a friend of mine named Dale Sandifer stuck his nose into the back cover and immediately ascertained these similarities. He was an incessant reader who quickly wanted me to tear the book in half so he could read it at the same time so we could exchange each other's halves later. Before we could do that, however, the scuttlebutt about my book had spread so quickly that in no time, I was sent to the CP bunker and was standing tall in front of "the Man," who asked if he could borrow the book. Who was I, a private, to say no?

The battle for the hills surrounding Khe Sanh started before the Tet Offensive or my second set of back-to-back offensive siege of Hue City and defensive siege at hand. The hills surrounding Khe Sanh were named 1015, 950, 861, 881 North, 881 South, and 64, based on their corresponding elevation in meters. They were called hills but were really jagged mountain peaks with intermittent jungles surrounding them.

In the hills surrounding the "plateau of death," the mist and the clouds hung around the tops like doughnuts on sticks. We only had five tanks at Khe Sanh, three in the main compound and two on Hill 64, the "Rock Quarry," which was where I would be stationed soon. The lack of tanks had occurred because the NVA had "eliminated" the mountain road bridges and then methodically surrounded us with a couple divisions of troops and a couple more divisions (approximately four units of 11,000 men each against our 4,000 total troops) in reserve. The siege was on, and we had to work with what we had.

I remember discussing the battle tactics with a couple of my buddies, Bob Dougherty and Joe Harrigan, not long after and asking, "If you were the North Vietnamese general in charge, where would you attack next?"

They both replied, "Well, the lowest hill, surely not the highest."

We all felt sick as I replied, "Yep, that's what I figured as well."

We then ascertained very quickly that we had better get ready. We were on Hill 64, the lowest and the most vulnerable of the hills.

A few days later in early February 1968, we were hit hard and partially overrun on Hill 64, in what would turn out to be one of the heaviest single days of fighting in the heaviest battle engagement of the war. We spotted different colored sparkling flares and quickly used one of our tank's radios to call the CP and determine the meaning of the different colors, as this was no birthday party. Next, I distinctly heard the NVA bugles over our wire in the background and knew exactly what they meant. As a young man I had played trumpet in the band, but in the Scouts I had blown a bugle. I could "Name that Gook Song" in three notes, because I knew exactly what those staccato notes and that crescendo meant in any language—CHARGE!

We had been assigned and attached to the First Battalion Ninth Marine Regiment, 1/9, respectfully and reverently nicknamed the Walking Dead because of the fierce fighting they had encountered and the number of casualties they had taken. We were constantly at point-blank range and always expected any moment that the NVA's sapper squads and rocket-propelled grenade (RPG) units would wipe out our two tanks. But we held our line that day and throughout the siege and never were completely overrun like they had been on other hills such as 881and 861, or like the French at Dien Bien Phu.
The commanding officer, Colonel John F. Mitchell, later wrote about that day:

"The total KIA of NVA soldiers exceeded 150 on this day. The 1/9 battalion received over 350 rounds of enemy supporting arms fire in their [our] command perimeter."

In the two tanks on the Rock Quarry, I was a gunner and a loader. That night, I can remember a senior infantry officer who stuck his head into the turret and said, "Good shooting, boys. Change your skivvies and carry on."

He didn't know how right he was, because I again had bladder trouble. But we would not have to worry about changing skivvies much after that, because, one by one, all our underwear would drop out our trouser legs after having rotted off during bouts of diarrhea and constipation and from us not having taken our trousers or boots off for weeks on end.

BETWEEN ROCKETS AND A HARDER PLACE

After I had been at the Rock Quarry for about two weeks, I was continuously on shitter duty, even after that job should have been rotated, but I acquiesced to get along with living in the dirt cave with several other grungy tankers. I really didn't like the cave for three reasons: the dirt was always lightly falling from the ceiling, which told me it could cave in by itself or with an explosion above; no one could stand up in the cave, especially me; and the cave was on the direct arc path of the incoming rockets, mortars, and artillery from Co Roc, Laos. I didn't feel like dying crushed below a mountain of dirt. The other side of the Rock Quarry was just opposite the arc of incoming missiles, and it was all rock. Other tankers had earlier attempted to dig a cave on the other side with several types of explosives, but to no avail.

I thought otherwise sleeping under a probable mudslide or cave-in was not in my best interest and I started digging into the rock side by hand, using a tank chisel and an eight-pound sledgehammer. To protect the blisters on my left hand, I would wrap the hand with grungy rags, which were really just old rotted skivvies and T-shirts too dirty to wear that could stand up on their own as if they were heavily starched. I tried chiseling with the hammer in my left hand, but that beat my knuckles up worse than the blisters, so I wrapped the skivvies around my left palm and continued banging with my right hand.

After about three to four weeks and after developing new blisters underneath all the calluses, I was able to curl up in a ball and sleep in a fetal position in my newly cut rock womb, uninterrupted save for guard duty. After another couple weeks of chiseling, I was able to almost stretch out my legs without my final teenage growing cramps. Next in my cave, I made a dissecting right turn so a direct explosion outside the cave would not have an effect inside; I didn't worry about my ears at the time.

Another couple weeks went by, by which time I had made a left-hand turn in the mountainous rock and had a descending Z-type configuration. It was at about this time that the other seven tankers on the Quarry also became convinced that the rock side meant a better chance of survival from the rockets and missiles. The first person to ask about joining me in my cave was Dale Sandifer, so I told him we would both dig until we could stretch out. Before Dale was finished with his part of the cave, Larry Basco pronounced, "Three digging is better than two," while jokingly calling me Huckleberry.

About the time Larry came on board, the other tank crewmen decided to dig their own caves as well. As it turned out, before we left the Rock Quarry and our rock caves, the dirt side, which we had by then converted to munitions storage, got hit, and the entrance totally collapsed on top of where we would have been.

When we were digging, the clanging went on twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. What we did not know at the time was that the North Vietnamese were also digging, but more rapidly, in the soft dirt that led up to our defensive lines and perimeter. The perimeter had a triple strand of razor -sharp concertina wire, which we knew would only slow them down in an attack because they had offensive sapper units and RPG battalions that could melt through our defensive positions like a hot knife through butter.

"We've gotta get out of this place If it's the last thing we ever do.
We've gotta get out of this place.
Girl, there's a better life for me and you."

Eric Burdon & the Animals

In spite of the dire situation we were in, life in and around the cave was somewhat tolerable, and the camaraderie almost reminded me of being in the Boy Scouts and the Explorers, the difference being that the worst thing that happened in the Scouts was that you could easily get popped with a wet towel on your bare butt. At Khe Sanh you could get your ass kicked or, worse, die.

At night in our Rock Quarry caves, we would listen to Hanoi Hannah on a transistor radio and see by the light of the homemade, diesel-burning lanterns made from C-ration cans. Because we had no ventilation shaft or any way of circulating the oily smelling air from the diesel fumes, and because we had to cover the cave entrances with ponchos because of the blackout, we were always suffocating in greasy soot. After about an hour of diesel light we would have to blow out the lamp, our faces black with soot, and we spit out black balls of oil crud against glistening shrimp-colored granite walls and a black, greasy ceiling.

We had to stand guard every night, with a three-hour shift per man. Guard level was at a minimum of 25% the majority of the time: 25% equaled one man standing guard, 50% was two men, and so on. We were at 50%, 75%, and, at least once a week, 100%, as the NVA were assembling and a close-in attack was imminent, again.

Besides invaluable sleep, water and food were the other most precious commodities. We could forget about ice or toothbrushes. Virtually nonexistent beer went for $5 per can. The treasured hard liquor was $100 a bottle, but for a twelve-bottle discount, the Air Force boys would give us a bargain deal at $1,000 per case. They bought it tax-free in Thailand for $2.40 per bottle—nice guys, what a bargain. It would be a year before we gave those rear-echelon pricks some inter-military branch payback, when we charged them equally exorbitant prices for NVA weapons and stash that we brought back from enemy arms caches out in the field. The Air Force guys probably took the weapons home to make themselves into frontline war heroes instead of flying pogues.

Before I hit 'Nam I had been about 175 pounds having been chiseled by Marine Corps boot camp, but I would end up dropping about fifty pounds at the Rock Quarry over the next couple of months. The more I cut that rock, the more weight I would lose, and the whole time I was chiseling my personal cave, I was always wondering if I was digging own grave.

PURPLE HAZE

It was at the Rock Quarry in late March 1968 that I received my first of several wounds. There was always so much metal flying and lying around that we could never tell if we were running over rocks or rocket parts. If we were fairly far away from our tank or cave, we had to hustle at double-time, which Time magazine dubbed the "Khe Sanh shuffle." I constantly worried about breaking an ankle or a leg from hitting the jagged metal that protruded up from the ground. It was during one of the hundreds of barrages, while I was running to my tank, that I was caught between two mortar blasts that came in right on top of me. As the first explosion hit, I ducked so fast, my helmet came off. When I tried to scoop my helmet up like a fumbled football, the next explosion tore at the left side of my head. As I realized what had just happened, I also discovered that my arms and face were sitting atop burning, hot metal.

I quickly saw other boys hitting the deck and chewing rocks out of fear; the gooks had our exact coordinates and were dropping rounds in on us as fast as they could load. They were "firing for effect," and we were in their crosshairs...sitting ducks.

Larry Basco saw me get hit and flew out of our cave as the cinders were still pelting down from the blast. He grabbed me by the scruff of my neck and the back side of my flak jacket and pulled me backwards into the cave. Although very skinny, I was still heavy. But he was strong, and he pulled me into the cave as I lost consciousness. Both of us wound up in shock: I from my wound and Larry from the sight of all the blood. What I was really puzzled at was that it didn't hurt, not like I had thought it would. The concussion from the blast had blown me up against the tank and scared the living shit out of me.

I can remember screaming at Larry, asking him, "How much of my brains are left?" as I was afraid to feel the left side of my head.

I reached down and pulled out of my right hand a piece of hot, jagged metal that was burning like hell. At the same time I had been hit, our friend Gunz (Ralph Gonzales) had almost lost his right hand when it was nearly severed by a mortar round, and several more grunts had also been wounded and were screaming in pain.

In all the confusion, I can't remember who started yelling first, Larry or me, but we both screamed, "Medic!" until reality set in that Army medics were not in the Marine Corps, only Navy corpsmen were. The Marine Corps does not have corpsmen, chaplains, or anyone else who cannot pick up a weapon and fight. I don't know what hit us both so funny just then, but Larry and I both began to laugh hysterically. I touched my wound for the first time to see what was left of my head. Larry urged me not to touch anything, but I couldn't resist, as the blood had now filled my left eye. I decided to take a chance. It wasn't as bad as I had thought, but my head had still been split open like a coconut.

Gunz and I and a couple other wounded grunts were stacked on a mechanized flatbed infantry mule and rushed to Charlie Med, the base hospital across no man's land, and then into the CP. I think I was more in shock than hurt, so I really felt for the other Marines I knew were worse off than either Gunz or me. Because of the number of dead and wounded coming in, chaos was the flavor du jour. Someone put a tag on my blouse and scribbled something on it. Gunz and I stayed overnight in Charlie Med, listening to the screaming and puking going on all around us. Everyone knew that no matter how bad the wounds were, no one, not even the dead, could be medevaced, as the NVA gunners were blasting right out of the air anything and everything that could fly.

Gunz and I were reported as missing in action (MIA) because we were not in either tank park, in the CP, or at the Rock Quarry on our tanks. I still believe that Larry Basco should have been honored for his bravery and that because of him I am still here today to write this. His actions saved Gunz and me from further wounds and probably from dying.

While all this was going on, there was no Jimi Hendrix music in the background; Robert Duval was not surfing on the Rao Quan River; and Oliver Stone was not hanging out of a Hollywood chopper, yelling, "Cut!" This was the real deal. Our guys were being cut down, dismembered, and bleeding to death in the ugliest and most grotesque ways that you can see, hear, smell, taste, feel, or imagine.

As the brutal days and long, eerie nights of the siege passed slowly by, we were totally focused on what the next day was going to bring, and we were becoming ever grungier from the elements.

We had to constantly clean our tank weaponry with petrochemical products, and our clothes were covered with months' worth of oil, dirt, grease, and grime. While at Camp Carroll, I developed a rash and it began producing welts and bumps all over my body. I recall they burned and itched ferociously but would not break. When I went to a field hospital, the corpsman covered almost my entire body with calamine lotion and told me to return later. When the boils still did not break, I was later medevaced, and doctors injected about 100 of the boils on the back side of my body with cortisone. This procedure was extremely painful; I bit down hard on the clean rag stuffed in my mouth. I was asked to return two days later, and the process was repeated on my front side.

As I moved naturally in the normal process of my duties, the boils began to break. Dark purple blood and yellow pus was secreted from approximately 200 open wounds over my entire body, all in different stages of bursting, oozing, and scabbing. After each session of injections and breaking, instead of being wrapped with medicinal bandages, the open boils were sprayed from above with a good concentration of Agent Orange (at Khe Sanh, 43,705 gallons were sprayed, and the Rockpile, 110,050 gallons. This process was repeated several times over the next couple of weeks and months, with less and less cortisone being injected each time. The doctors and corpsmen were astonished that I voluntarily returned to receive this kind of painful treatment, but I just thought of the alternative—infection.

After the war, I would continue to have large grape- or half-golf-ball–sized boils under my armpits that leaked pus and dark blood intermittently. This continued for nine consecutive years, until I finally sought treatment at a private dermatologist in Houston.

During both my combat tours I was out in the field for fourteen major operations, constantly exposed to the dirt, rain, humidity, sun, and heat of the Asian outdoor environment for months at a time without a shower, and I had direct exposure to a plethora of chemical agents.

Sometime during April 1968, my buddy Dale and I had the great idea to take a shower in the next steady rain that came by. After about three or four months of not showering, we thought it would be great to get the grunge off. While we were ferociously scrubbing and withering in the cold rain, Dale reached into one of the storage containers on the tank's fenders and pulled out a wire brush to scrub himself, and we both busted out laughing.

But in the irony of war, at that same moment, on the knoll behind us, the grunts were placing several of their buddies who been killed in the previous night's firefight onto a large net that was hanging from a line attached to a Sea Knight chopper hovering overhead. When we looked up and saw it, we quickly found it petty to worry about not having had a shower for so long.

With that, our moment of lightheartedness ended and we both quickly hustled to get the soap off and get dressed as the rain subsided. As we were trying to put our other dirty, but at least cleaner, clothes on, the chopper took off over us with its lifeless cargo. As we looked up, all we saw were arms and legs protruding from the spinning cargo netting, and as we watched, we were doused with splatters of red and black blood.

About the same time, a couple hundred meters behind us and outside of our lines, an F-4 Phantom was splashing napalm over enemy trenches, and my conscious thoughts were drowned out by the roar of afterburners and the agonizing screams of my dying enemies. This is the reality of war—death and payback.

In another mortar attack, our water buffalo on wheels, the main source of water for all of us on the hill, was hit as well, so from then on, water was rationed. It is no wonder that forty years later I am still rat-holing water for insurance, just in case. In one of the subsequent attacks, enemy artillerymen hit our ammo dump, taking it out, along with most of our tank rounds. Before long, everything was rationed, except for us Marines.

Because we had lost our platoon barber to a rocket, our hair was almost civilian like once again. However, the body lice were plentiful and it was hard to find privacy to shave under the arms and the hairy parts of the body they could latch on to.

The insects in Viet Nam were large, but the rats were humongous, and as someone said, they were faster at opening a C-ration can than a hungry gunny. The rat population was reported to be well over a million, and they would feed on the dead and wounded, regardless of which side they were on. Rat bites were prevalent, so much so that we shot them regularly. But, the word was passed to stop shooting with our pistols, because some grunt had put a bead on a speedy Gonzales and shot his sergeant in the ankle.

Occasionally, one of the tankers would go down from the Quarry for tank supplies and other sundry items like popcorn. The Quarry was sixty-four meters higher than the main CP (hence its official designation, Hill 64) and about the longest quarter of a mile I have ever carried anything. When exchanging and rolling a 300-pound tank wheel that distance, it was a challenge not to dump it over by going too fast on the way down, but it was the trip coming back up that was a real bitch.

One such trip, I'll never forget. I had gotten delayed in leaving the CP for another quarter-mile race up the hill. It seemed like a lifetime before, but it had been only seven months earlier that I had held a trophy in the air after winning the Top Competition Eliminator at the one-quarter-mile drag strip back in Dickenson, Texas. In this race from the CP, I took off rolling one newer 300-pound tank wheel, and my trophy, if I made it, would be the three cans of traded popping corn stuffed into my pockets. Once I was outside the CP, the concertina wire was closed behind me and I was on my own. I was having difficulty rolling the tank wheel, which made my progress slower than I really wanted. But because of the constant barrage of rockets flying overhead and the snipers' pings, I kept moving and rolling that damn wheel as fast as I could.

It was nearly dark by this time, and nighttime always came ultra fast during this, the monsoon season. It got dark so quickly mainly because of the rain clouds and the setting sun, and now I found myself in no man's land in the dark. Any real estate between the CP and the Quarry was considered no man's land at night because both perimeters closed their respective ingress and egress with concertina wires and only let guys in who were coming back from duty on listening posts and had the correct password.

Because I was a tanker and not used to coming and going on foot, I had never thought to ask for the password before leaving. A light rain had now turned into a heavy downpour, and I tried to pump the wheel over my head. When I had been pumping iron as a civilian, I had made the "300 Club" by bench-pressing the "big three," but this awkward, muddy tank wheel was now my grounded 300-pound albatross. When I tried to roll it, the wheel jumped over the ruts in the road one way and then the other, and I had secret thoughts about leaving it and running up the hill without it or a password. By now the mud trench was a running river of red, muddy clay water.

Every night was a complete blackout for both sides, but occasionally we could see a flicker of light on our side as well as theirs. This night I saw no light anywhere. As I progressed up the hill, the thought crossed my mind that I could very easily be shot by one of my own infantry guys or my brother tankers.

Or, even worse, I could run into the concertina wire or walk into our minefield. The rockets and mortars were still intermittently dropping in the rain, and the visibility was almost nil, and I walked smack-dab into an infantry mule.

An infantry mule is like a large, elevated flatbed go-kart with a steering wheel protruding above the bed. I thought this was a good chance for me to put that damn wheel on that mule and get a free ride up the rest of the hill. I was wrong; the driver was dead and in the ditch. Worse than that, a couple of minutes later, I heard some Vietnamese men yelling to one another in the rain. I didn't know if they had seen me or not, nor which side of the DMZ they came from, ours or theirs, but I didn't care. I slid into the muddy, watery ditch with the dead mule driver and partially covered myself with the wheel and a lot of mud.

I was shaking like I had palsy in a cold winter rain, with only a pistol and a tank wheel. Whoever they were, they passed on by like thieves in the night while I continued to shake, and I was not going to ask them any questions. Whether they were friendly ARVNs or enemy PAVNs, the odds were 50-50, and I wasn't taking any chances announcing that I was an American. They could have been North, headed South or South, headed North. I didn't care, I just knew that I was on the DMZ between the two, and I briefly thought about my 20th birthday, which had just blown by without any ice cream, cake, or candles.

I stayed frozen in that watery ditch, with that damn tank wheel and the stiff, dead driver next to me, until morning light. I thought it would be safer to stay there till first light, safely hidden, rather than getting shot or stepping on a landmine. It turned out that my buddies at the Quarry had covered for me, thinking I was still at the CP and the CP had thought I was back at the Quarry. I finally accomplished my "short" mission that morning, when I not only rolled that freaking wheel up the hill and into the Quarry, but still had one of the popcorn cans left to share with the guys.

ATOMIC BOMBS AWAY

The siege of Khe Sanh was a never-ending cascade of bombs, artillery shells, and mortars from both sides. The amount of munitions expended during the siege at Khe Sanh is staggering. It is estimated that the North Vietnamese fired over 40,000 rocket, artillery, and mortar shells on American positions during the Khe Sanh combat phase, which were responsible for a large percentage of the American and allied casualties.

Then there were the munitions we fired at them. Our artillery fired back around the clock, 24/7, from Camp Carroll. The big guns fired around the perimeter an estimated total of around 150,000 rounds into NVA positions from inside the base during the siege. Also were the nonstop sorties from carrier-based A-4 Intruders, and the DaNang-based F-4 Phantom tactical aircraft.

Between March 22nd and 23rd 1968, the NVA decided they had a real treat for us and unleashed the mother of all artillery and mortar attacks. During a ten hour period, a record 1,109 rounds were unleashed and fired on KSCB, for an average of more than 100 incoming rounds per hour.

But the granddaddy of them all were our B-52 Arc Light raids dropping racks of 2,000-pound bombs, each one of which left a crater big enough for a tank or two. According to John Prados and Chaplain Ray W. Stubbe in the book Valley of Decision: The Siege of Khe Sanh, "That amounted to almost 1,300 tons of bombs around Khe Sanh, the equivalent of a 1.3 kiloton nuclear weapon, every one of the 77-day siege."

It has also been said that "All the bombs hit their intended target 100% of the time, because they all hit the ground." While we were in our cave during the arc light raids, the bombs were so close that we were popped around in that cave like the corn popped to make our popcorn.

The final push to relieve us and the besieged 26th Marines was named Operation Pegasus. The Army, headed by the 1st Air Calvary, had been staging with the 1st Marines at Ca Lu and arrived at Khe Sanh on April 1, 1968. By the end of that month, the NVA had finally decided they'd had enough of this direct confrontation and would take their four divisions, or what was left of them, to the east along the DMZ. We would now have a great chess move, in that we would be going from a defensive to an offensive position and would be going from the prey to the predator.

Oddly, the first thing a supper gaggle of Army choppers brought in to us was boxes of apples and oranges. We thought this was all too funny but welcomed the fresh fruit that we had not seen in many, many months. Upon seeing the crates of fruit, I immediately remembered from my health class in high school that scurvy was a result of a vitamin deficiency, and I had to chuckle. When it was our turn to take our tank from our Rock Quarry nook down to the CP, we dismounted and ran to the choppers, where we were given a selection of a couple of apples or oranges. The guy in front of me bit deeply into his apple and left half his teeth in it, spitting out the other teeth and dripping blood. After seeing this, when my turn came, I told the guy passing the fruit out to give me two soft oranges. I savored them slowly, slice by slice, as my gums were mushy and my teeth were wobbly. It had been months since I had last seen my toothbrush, which we had used for cleaning weapons.

PRESIDENTIAL RECOGNITION

The 26th Marine Regiment had been reinforced by elements of the 9th Marine Regiment, and, to a lesser degree, various elements from the Army, Air Force, and Navy personnel, and our five tanks from Bravo Company, Third Tank Platoon. Of the approximately 230 Marines in Tanks alone, there were almost one hundred medals awarded for heroism, from Purple Hearts upwards, including Bronze Stars, Silver Stars, and Navy Crosses.

The twenty-plus tankers who were at the siege of Khe Sanh, along with the 26th Marines and attachments, were awarded the Presidential Unit Citation (PUC). (See Appendix A.) During the entire Viet Nam war, only eleven PUCs were presented to Marine units—the Walking Dead were awarded two. The degree of heroism required for a PUC is the same as that which would warrant a Navy Cross to an individual, which is second only to the Congressional Medal of Honor. For the Marines who died and the several thousand more who were wounded at Khe Sanh I have always thought everyone deserved a little bit more public recognition than just the front cover of Time magazine. I have also always wondered what the North Vietnamese received for their part.

The total estimated number of bombs dropped, artillery fired, and mortars tubed during the siege of Khe Sanh exceeded 100,000 tons of ordnance during the seventy-seven day siege. The total number of casualties is very hard to determine for various and obvious wartime reasons, but unofficial estimates put NVA casualties at between 10,000 and 15,000 around Khe Sanh and thousands more in the surrounding trails. Official estimates of American dead at Khe Sanh are put at 730 soldiers, and counting. Because soldiers were medevaced directly from the base to expire elsewhere, it has been difficult to account for them accurately.

Operation Pegasus would officially end the siege, but not the fighting, within the valley or the plateau. The siege of Khe Sanh officially ended on April 11, 1968, when the main supply road, Route 9, was finally cleared and the combat engineers reopened it and supplies began moving through the enemy lines again. Khe Sanh Combat Base was dismantled and officially abandoned on June 23, 1968. The battle for Khe Sanh is historically recorded as the turning point in the Viet Nam War and one of the most notable and proudest battles in Marine Corps history, but one for which both sides have since claimed victory.

A LITTLE LATE MEMORIES OF CHRISTMAS IN 1967

I'm in northern California visiting my grandson, and while out on an early morning walk/run thinking about how good life has been to me, I started thinking about past Christmases-and breaking through the fog was Christmas 1967. Al White and I were in Staging Battalion in Las Pulgas, he from the Blue Ridge Mountains of Tennessee, and myself a city boy from the canyons of Manhattan. The folks around Oceanside didn't want us Marines to sit in squad bays on Christmas and bless their hearts that many of them invited us into their homes that day to enjoy a meal and good cheer.

Don't recall much about the day but Al and I enjoyed being civilians for a few hours drinking a few beers and enjoying the meal and festivities. Two weeks later we were both in Khe Sanh and some months later Al was killed during Meade River. So here I was many years later, looking forward to a second Christmas in California, remembering Al had his last one here. I thank the ordinary folks who invited us in so long ago, and said a prayer for Al.
Dave O'Toole

While on a hill at Quang Tri on guard duty, there was a "Special Services" GP tent set up, and we could hear Christmas music playing. Everyone kept up each other's spirits.
Ron 1/11

This has been in Red Clay twice, I think. I'll add it to the memories in case someone might have missed it...or for those who might enjoy seeing it again. S/F Dennis

Christmas At Khe Sanh -- 1967 was like weary travelers, who finally get to rest in the comfort of their own homes after a week of constant motion and movement with members of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, who spread out into the foxholes and bunkers that made up the company's perimeter at Khe Sanh.

It was Christmas Eve 1967, and we had just returned from a four-day operation that had taken us west of the combat base into the rugged hills and terrain of the Khe Sanh Plateau. Despite minimal creature comforts at the base, it was a relief to know that we didn't have to hike those hills for a while. That alone was a legitimate Christmas present.

In terms of the physical setting and the expected sounds and colors, this was sure to be my bleakest holiday ever, but it remains the Christmas that stands apart from all the others, and the one which memory doesn't confuse, even four decades later.

My radioman Dave Krom and I headed straight for the position that we had constructed the previous week. Even though it was just two foxholes covered with a tent-like affair of scrounged parachute silk, we felt elated to be home for the holidays. At midday, a rumor which had been circulating since the previous morning turned into reality. An arriving helicopter touched down just outside the company area, and mailbag after mailbag began to spill out onto the ground!

The distribution of our Christmas mail, which had been held in storage for nearly two weeks, required the work of scores of Marines as there were thousands of letters and hundreds of "care packages." More than anything else, it was the sheer volume of these packages that brought a festive, holiday atmosphere to our corner of the war. Denied a chance to be in the real world, it was as if its realities had been sent to us, and each package opened helped to reduce the tensions and the fears accumulated during the previous week. By late afternoon, Kilo Company was almost giddy with child-like happiness and Christmas spirit.

Since Dave and I had not drawn any military duties that night (another present), we settled in under our parachute hooch to feast from our collective packages and to recall Christmas memories from earlier years. With our military gear relegated to the sides of the tent, the war almost seemed to have been replaced with plentiful food, laughter, and friendship. Considering how the previous four months had been spent, we had another gift to be thankful for – we were still around for the holiday while a number of our companions were not...including LCPL Mike Suniga. Sometime after midnight, wrapped in a poncho-liner and surrounded with gentle memories of home and the holidays, I drifted off to sleep thinking of my family and mostly my mother.

I was jolted out of my sleep on Christmas morning by the sound of "Jingle Bells!" Two Marine Corps helicopters with Santas painted on their sides were making repeated passes over the combat base, and loudspeakers mounted in the doors were playing one Christmas song after another. It was incredible! Within seconds, people from all over were up, out, and on their feet to cheer and to wave. The show didn't last more than 10 minutes, but it was enough to get our day off to a magical start.

At noon, a Catholic chaplain celebrated mass out in the open, and as I sauntered over, I was suddenly struck with the thought that 12 noon on Christmas Day in Vietnam corresponded exactly with 12 midnight on Christmas Eve in Connecticut. While I knelt with rifle in hand in the red dust of Khe Sanh, my family was kneeling in the pews of St. Mary's Church in New Haven for midnight mass. It was the only time in my 13 month tour when I knew exactly what members of my family were doing at a given moment. I used to wonder and guess at their actions and activities from time to time, but in this short period of mass and remembrance, I was linked to them with a bond that stretched over 15,000 miles. In spite of the distance, I never felt closer to any of them as I did at that moment, and the simple act of closing my eyes seemed to move me out of the war and into the comfortable surroundings of family and home.

By nightfall, Christmas morning in Connecticut, I was strapping on the weapons and gear of an infantryman and preparing to move to an ambush position outside our protective barbed wire. Our route out the gate took us directly across the very ground where mass had been said earlier, and where, through the miracle of Christ's birth, I was permitted to stand for a moment at a window to the world.

Dennis,
Was that Hill 918 we went up or "The Other Hill 950" to the Northeast---I remember when we were briefed, that there was a large NVA force up there---I am glade we had no contact but remember one Marine died by setting off his own bobby trap! Another Marine dropped his M-79--a round hit an "New Guy's" leg broke it--he only had three weeks in country! That same day--Lt. Chuck my F.O., went down from the heat--I had to carry his pack---then I fell down a steep cliff, lost some of my gear---lucky I landed on my a## so I did not get hurt!

Glen,
That 4 day op was out to 918. I remember the heat as well and the fact that not one NVA sighting was made by anyone in the battalion....not one but there was plenty of physical evidence that indicated many. Scary. You are correct about there being only one KIA in that battalion operation and it was Kilo's Mike Suniga. We were atop the 689 ridge line on the final night of the 4 days/nights out in the bush. He was new to Kilo (only a few weeks in) and for whatever reason, he decided to rig a grenade out in front of his foxhole as it got dark. In the early light of the next day, he moved out to retrieve it, and in the damp wet elephant grass, he dropped the thing before he could get the pin back in. I have no doubt that he was wet, sleepy, tired, nervous, chilled, shaky, etc. He reached down for it and the explosion took off both arms. Two corpsman worked like mad to save him, but the loss of blood was too much. It happened 30 feet from me -- I was mixing up some C-rat hot cocoa at the time, and in all the years I made hot chocolate for my kids, I always remembered that moment. It's crazy how that stuff stays with you.
Happy New Year
S/F Dennis

I seem to remember a few illumination flares being fired directly over the base. There was no color, just stark black and white, and no sound. It seemed everyone must have been watching in silence. I wondered what they were thinking.
Chas Rost

Dave,
thank you for posting that memory it "jogged" my memory of Christmas 1967 as well; as an eighteen (18) year-old kid fresh out of high school, boot camp and infantry training, it was my first Christmas away form home. Having arrived in Vietnam exactly one (1) week earlier. I spent Christmas 1967 @ the Phu Bai Combat Base with a Jewish Marine from New York, Lance Corporal Barry Fixler; read about it in "Semper Cool: One (1) Marine's Fond Memories of Vietnam."

That Christmas was a "watershed" in my life as I'm sure it was for many of you. For me if was a time that I established and solidified lifelong friendships; many of those men are, like Al White, gone now, but others visit this message board, some come to our reunions and I am in contact with a few more. I'll be eternally grateful for those friendships.

My God bless and keep all of our brothers, now and forever.
Semper Fidelis!!!

Christmas of 67'
I was on Hill 950 with Charlie-3. The NVA screwed with us enough to keep us on red alert all night. I remember mud everywhere, cold, it being so foggy that you were lucky to see the first row of wire;there were trip flares being set of by the wind, and the sound of Christmas music coming from a gun bunker to my left. It was one of those nights where you strained your eyes looking into the fog for the enemy and yet your mind wandered to the Christmas' you had as a child and what those at home were doing right then. Ahhh... the years fly bye and yet they don't. I can never forget that Christmas Eve.

Big Skip Wells didn't dress up as Santa and sing Christmas carols, did he?
Nick Romentz

Down in Danang we had a little Christmas Eve party and went outside at midnight to watch the light show. On Christmas Day I hitch hiked into Freedom Hill for turkey, and myself and a few other guys commandeered a First Mar Div gunny in a mighty might filled with presents, dressed as Santa, and rode with two grunts riding shotgun wearing red elf caps. We gave the presents destined for HQ First Mar Div to the kids on Dog Patch. First time I ever saw Santa wearing a 45. Splendid Christmas all around.

There is no good place to be away from home at Christmas. A hill outside the perimeter of the Marine combat base at Khe Sanh in Vietnam would surely rank high among the worst. On Christmas day, 1967, Sergeant James Oyster stood duty on this far away outpost. Thankfully, it was a quiet day and hot food was brought up to the hilltop by helicopter. The same aircraft took away three friends rotating back to the states, after a sad farewell for those left behind. An airplane flew overhead playing Christmas carols. When the Marines heard "I'll Be Home for Christmas," several half-joked that they should shoot the plane down. Sergeant Oyster noted his thoughts about all this in his diary.

We've been outside all day just kind of messing around and we had a spotter plane fly over playing Christmas carols. Sitting there listening to that was kind of sad: kind of melancholy I think. You know that back home the family were opening the Christmas presents and I hoped they were thinking of me. But it is just not the same. This is not the first Christmas I have spent away from home. This is the first Christmas that I was in a position where I couldn't at least get on the phone and call them. But I'm sure they are thinking of me. I hope that they are praying for me, too.

I spent a Christmas day in Vietnam at the Phu Bai combat base with a lot more amenities than those enjoyed by Sgt. Oyster. On Christmas day now, I am surrounded by friends and family with all the comforts of home. For all of us in safe and secure places, it is a time to remember those who are not so blessed. At this moment there are men and women on alert at lonely outposts far from home. Some are in danger. All are lonely. All are missing their families and loved ones. They deserve our thoughts and prayers.

The angel said to them, "Do not be afraid. I bring you good news of great joy that will be for all the people. Today in the town of David a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord. This will be a sign to you: You will find a baby wrapped in cloths and lying in a manger." Suddenly a great company of the heavenly host appeared with the angel, praising God and saying, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men on whom his favor rests." ~Luke 2:10-14

Betty and I have been listening to a stack of oral interviews taped in 1968 concerning the siege of Khe Sanh. Cooks, truck drivers, Major Generals, Privates, ammo techs, armorers, artillery gunners, forward observers, grunts, Captains, Lance Corporals, intelligence staff, First Sergeants, Second Lieutenants, mortarmen, M-79 men, machine gunners, Corpsmen, radio operators, Lieutenant Colonels, and recon marines.

Listening to those voices from forty-two years past I ponder what they tell me now. I lived my own personal hell through the blasts and flashes, the shuddering felt through my own two jungle-booted feet anchored to the damp bottom of the trench, but after hearing these chilling tales, I realize there was more than one way to endure the siege. Trying to make coffee and pastries for the officers at Regiment while incoming pounded around you, wrecking your gas ranges. Trying to pull mortar rounds out of the ammo pit while incoming slammed into the adjacent ground, threatening to light up the whole ammo dump. Trying to call in artillery while bullets snapped by the side of your head. Trying to keep tires fixed after shrapnel has shredded them. Keeping the undetonated incoming enemy rounds cleaned out of the gun pits so your guys could shoot your big stuff back at the bad guys.

Betty and I listened to rationales for tactics, strategies, not saving this patrol, that position, why it was okay for some men to die for the greater good. Like those recon patrols that ran out from Khe Sanh before the siege began. Eight-man teams, no helmets, light weapons, a radio, a lot of tools to signal someone if you were in trouble. Out to our bastion on 881 South then into the jungle, maybe by chopper, maybe in a larger patrol of grunts , maybe by sneaking out at night, onto a trail through the head-high jungle grass that loved to find exposed flesh and slice, slice, slice.

A testy business, recon, running into large groups of the enemy and having to try and hide, or run away, getting shot in the back, leaving comrades' bodies behind for another day (that's a bitter salt tablet to bite into), sitting in tight 360s back to back to back to back firing away at the onrushing North Vietnamese soldiers intent on murdering you.

We ventured up to the spiny ridge on 881North (not 881 South where we lived in muddy bunkers, but 881 North, which was never occupied by the Marines) a number of times in my tour. I always seemed to be on point as we approached, the refuse of the big battle fought there in May 1967 evident. Maws of shell holes and bomb craters, the bush stunted. Snaggle-toothed trees on top of the ridge which reminded me of a razorback the way it cut at right angles to our search and destroy missions. On the demon's spine, I knew, knew, knew, Charlie the Killer hid there, his machine guns, his AK 47s aimed right at my Adam's apple. I could feel it. But no, they never raked us with enfilade fire. They stayed secluded in their spider holes like tarantulas, waiting.

The sky was usually dotted with clouds and the place smelled of mud and mold and damp. A lot of men died on 881 North and the adjacent hills and valleys. I just patrolled around it, over it, climbed it, set up perimeters on it, ate beefsteak and potatoes cooked over a heat tab on it. Smoked Lucky Strikes and Camels and maybe Pall Malls on it. Got soaked.

The last time I was up there was on a patrol on Christmas Eve, 1967. The day started foggy but broke clear. We patrolled up 881 North, down the backside and in the direction of the DMZ. I drank water out of a creek that slithered over tiny flat rocks. The corpsman threatened to write me up for not using Halozone. "You'll get liver flukes and they'll eat your liver up." I drank more and cursed him under my breath. I drank more just to show him—show him what? I don't know.

We walked around fresh bomb craters with red mud shoved up as if giant subterranean dinosaurs had been at work. The trees hung over the trail and the jungle grass attacked us the same as every other day. No rest for our wicked butts, no rest because of Christmas. The same every day, patrols, patrols, fog, rain-soaked utility blouses, red mud stains on the skin, rain-soaked toes, mist. I wished for a cobra, a krait to show up in the trail and threaten one of us, maybe me. Some life . . . some life besides the deadly boredom of waiting, waiting for the surprise, waiting to die.

That night, Christmas Eve, back on 881 South we stood 100-percent due to a red alert even though there was a Christmas truce. Charlie the Killer probed around outside the wire. Fog choked the black morning after midnight and we couldn't have seen Charlie if he'd been sitting ten feet from us.
Christmas day arrived magnificent, like Jesus coming out of His tomb, shards of dawn raking the grove-mottled ridges, the trees with their tops blown off. I led a five man fire-team-sized patrol down around the west side of Hill 881 South along the creek that bubbled and sang in the canyon. An easy patrol, only the imprints of unfamiliar boots in the mud, and here and there unusual ammo pressed into wet, red, muddy spots. Not like the times we patrolled in floods when men were swept down the canyon caroming off boulders as big as stateside houses, or the time the Hueys mistook us for Charlie and pinned us down as they circled around and around like voracious raptors intent on making a kill. They fired rockets and hot snaps from their nasty little mini-machine guns that brrrrrped, brrrped at us as the tracers lit up the dark spots beneath the bluffs. Mr. Dillon on the radio screaming "Cease fire. Cease fire. We are friendlies. We are friendlies." Hidden beneath the lips of huge stones and roots as old as the Renaissance, we did not miss the balky, twisted humor there—friendly fire. But not this Christmas morning patrol . . . just a heated argument between me and Sergeant Deedee about grids and coordinates and clicks and trails and how best to follow the map from checkpoint to checkpoint.

After we struggled through the slick mud and ascended 881 South, hot chow arrived from the cooks at Khe Sanh. The choppers (our friends this day) whap-whapped onto the LZ with just-cooked turkey and ham, and mashed potatoes and gravy and dressing and green beans and hot rolls and pie and ICE CREAM (even though it melted by the time we got to eat it).

We left Hill 881 South the next day, after our two month stay up there, and dreamed of never having to ascend Hill 881 North again, and not long after this, Recon started getting their butts kicked out there on a daily basis. Ones, and twos and threes, they died out there in thick clops of tall hardwoods and the head-high jungle grass and the big red bomb craters. And with their dying, way down where one cannot deny what one knows, we knew it would not be a surprise. But we didn't want to know it, so we acted like we didn't. And ate our chow, and went on patrol and waited for . . . what? The greater good?

By RADM Paul L. Lacy Commander, USN

This day, we celebrate the Birthday of Jesus Christ, the Son of God and the Founder of Christianity. The essential and basic message Jesus Christ extended and still extends to mankind is peace to all men as we travel through life to His Eternal Father.

We are members of a powerful, rich and resourceful nation; our mission is not conquest, subjugation or tyranny but peace to all. The motto of our modern Navy exemplifies this - Peace through Power.

On this great day, as we find ourselves in Vietnam and members of the United States Navy, let us be justifiably proud of ourselves for the simple reason we serve our nation in the land of the Vietnamese merely to bring and to extend that precious gift of gifts - Peace. In such a capacity, then your reward will be great as Christ, the Man, promised, "because you have done this to the least of My brethren, you have done it to Me."
May the Christ Child bless you and yours always.

While I was at the hospital in Danang during Christmas, I picked up a menu. In hindsight I now realize this was my big meal before Khe Sanh, which I went to within two weeks of discharge from said hospital.

Guys,

I can remember being on the west end of the base just prior to our hike up to 861. It was cloudy, foggy and freezing all day. I remember wondering why it wasn't snowing, it seemed cold enough.

As I recall it was around noon that a "34" made a pass across the base from west to east, along the axis of the runway and at about 200 feet. To all of our surprise, and barely audible above the roar of the roters and engine, the crew of the "34" was playing "Jingle Bells" over a loudspeaker hung out the side of the bird and they leaned out and popped green and red smoke to trail behind ! That was my most memorable Christmas ever !

A much belated "Thanks" and "Merry Christmas" to the pilots and crew for that surreal memory !

ON TO NEW YEARS EVE 1967

Not much specific recall of most of my New Years Eve days/nights. Most tend to blend together in memory. There was the '73 Sugar Bowl in New Orleans when ND beat Alabama for the national title. My brother and I were there and got onto the field after the Irish win.

However, my most vivid recall is from 1967 when a reinforced platoon was sent south off 861 at 0530 towards the 689 ridge line. It was a long, long day in the elephant grass, and even though we were due back on the hill before dark, there were objective, terrain, and communication issues that plagued us all day.

By late afternoon we were still a long way from "home." The darker it got the slower we moved and it was after 2100 before we considered ourselves close to 861. At that point we were 500 meters west of the hill on the very ridge line that the NVA used to attack us 3 weeks later. That 500 meters was "as the crows fly" and we still had 1000+ meters to cover in total darkness. The mortar crews on 861 began to fire illumination rounds in order to help with visibility, but had the NVA been there on that 31Dec67, it might have proved disastrous. Most of us jogged / ran uphill the last 100 meters to the gate in our protective barbed wire, but it was close to 2300 before my RTO and I staggered into our bunker. Filthy, out of breath, exhausted, hungry, and oblivious to even the attached leeches, we struggled out of our 782 gear, touched canteens, wished each other a better New Year, swallowed some water and fell sound asleep.

Goodbye to 1967 and hello 1968. I hope the attached photo comes through. If not, I'll submit to one of our computer guys. Taken at mid-day, the 689 ridge line is in the middle distance and our objective was the dark, flat area in the lower left below 689. The distant hills and clouds are in Laos.

Happy New Year to all who read these words.
S/F Dennis

Dennis, How's This?
Mike Fishbaugh

Dennis,
Wow someone still had an M-14 I see! I wonder why the BN CO did not use I 3/26, we were only about 30min. from the 689 Ridge line--We patroled that at least four times a week. We also patrolled Northwest of the 689 toward Laos many times--that was a hump----You should have spent the night on Hill 881S! Then left in the morning when it was cooler Hahah I felt your pain Dennis I made that trip a few times toward Hill 881N and toward your Hill!
Glenn

Can't believe you made both the ND/MSU game in 66, and the ND/Alabama game in 73. I watched the 73 game in a bar in Time Square New York, oblivious to the New Years Eve celebration going on outside. Still have your ND/MSU 66 Game book. Hope to return it to you in person at the next DC reunion. Great photo! Pretty much says it all with an eloquence w/o words. I had an little black Instamatic 126 in Nam myself.
Happy New Year.!S/F

ED NOTE: TO KSV MEMBERS: I have decided to post the latest list of Donations starting in our Tax Month, of Aug 2009. This was done to first show the membership that every donation, in every amount, is greatly appreciated and recorded . Secondly, it shows how proud we are of your generosity which allows the printing of our magazine, purchasing & designing of new items for our PX, and the maintenance of our Scholarship Fund. We have not abandoned color coded donations listing it just takes much time to adjust and change levels, and should be available for the next issue. Thanks a Bunch

THE FOOT STEPS OF TITANS

By Gary W. Foster
April 2005

No one can explain why it so difficult to relate to people who have never been some place where one has been, or who have not been there under the same circumstances, or experienced the same thing in the same manner. For someone who has experienced something extraordinarily profound, an imperceptible transformation takes place within one's psyche: that person is never again the same. His or her persona and perceptions are altered forever. Life takes on a new meaning.

Along with this phenomenon, there is a tendency to want to return to those places where the experience manifested itself, where the defining moment of our lives emerged and was revealed like an incipient statue being carved from a block of marble. There is a magnetic force that compels us to return to special places; that is, places special to each of us. I doubt anyone knows why for sure but it may be the need to relate to our inner selves free from outside influences or judgments; or, especially since we cannot convey it to anyone else in a manner they will understand, to confirm the story again to ourselves, to convince us that the event did, in fact, occur; that we are a living testament to our own destiny molded from such an event. Reunions seem to fill this need and allow each of us a few moments to relive something in our past with our comrades or colleagues with whom we shared a common experience, as if to make tangible again those elusive moments. In my own life, I have returned to my high school, my college and I have revisited places to which I had traveled years ago, such as the south of France or London, where something interesting had happened to me. But I must admit, I am not quite sure why.

The compelling need to revisit a place that is special seems to be directly proportional to the time spent away from that place: the longer the absence, the more the desire to return. Why is this? An answer to this question perhaps cannot be found. But there can be no disputing it, the attraction to return to someplace in one's own history is very strong.

And now mix this place of deep personal value or emotion with a place of profound international, humanitarian, political, or military significance and the attraction or desire to return is exacerbated. It becomes stronger; cannot be denied. Even as I have come to know certain people and have listened to their tales, vicariously, I have developed a desire or perhaps, at least, a curiosity to visit that place where their saga unfolded, as if I had been there too, by their side. Khe Sanh represents such a place.

Like some of the other nearby geographic characteristics that circumscribe the Combat Base, one hill in particular is one of the more dominant features of the landscape. From the valley of decision, as Ray Stubbe termed it, I have seen it looming on the horizon in the distance, beyond the Combat Base. I have seen the hill in the gray of the early morning hours, through the clouds in the valley, through the rain, and at sunrise and at sunset. I have seen the top as it appeared above the mist of moisture-laden skies. I have seen the hill, on occasion, resplendent in clear weather - a rare phenomenon to be sure because the atmosphere is usually uncooperative - when it seemed the trees were so close I could see the branches and leaves move in the breeze, I could reach out and touch them: they beckoned me. It has happened.

I have been close to it. I have had a desire to climb it but never had the time or, for that matter, the opportunity. My being on top or reaching there has eluded me, like a dream where no matter how hard one tries, one never reaches the destination which always remains out there somewhere beyond one's reach, or when one can never run fast enough to evade monsters, conjured-up captors, or demons of the night. I have stopped thinking about going there, thinking I may never have the chance. The hill is before me always, even in my mind, but as in the dream in which I never reach my destination, I cannot get there. Each time I saw it, it seemed farther away; an unobtainable distant exotic place like Bali Hai. It was a destination seemingly within my grasp but forever slipping away.

But wait, no so fast! What's this? A porthole-size window of opportunity to reach a heretofore-unattainable destination, a place I have never been but a place others have visited, and which keeps calling them back. And now, do I not feel the overwhelming tug of curiosity, the swelling ineluctable need to seize the moment; to be there, if only briefly, and, as an added benefit, without bodily

Somehow, I knew. Something told me, kept pulling at me; and on 7 April 2005, I embarked on a brief journey that heretofore has so often escaped me. I thought the opportunity would not present itself to me again. For the first time, I had a real chance to truly climb this mountain that lay before me filling the view through the windshield of my vehicle.

"Binh," I said, turning to my driver and pointing through the windshield of our 4-wheel drive vehicle. "See that road up the side of that mountain? Well, drive up there." I continued, pointing upwards through the windshield.

What dramatic changes have occurred in the valleys around and in between Hills 558, and 881. First, a large hydroelectric scheme is being constructed on the Rao Quan River not far from the nearby hills and valleys of the area. This massive undertaking can be viewed from behind a restaurant that serves beer with ice just around the corner from the customs clearance house on the left of Highway 9 as one progresses to Dong Ha from Khe Sanh. But the most amazing thing to see is the number of roads and streets being built in the area around the hills. It was astonishing to see this development. The Yellow Brick Road, which during my first visit was nothing more than a very rough and bumpy cobblestone country conveyance to the Base, has been paved replete with striping and drainage ditches. Driving to the main gate and museum of the Combat Base is easy. Commercial and industrial development is progressing at a rapid pace and it does not appear as if it will stop any time soon. The area is experiencing an economic growth spurt, but I have no idea what's driving it.

As soon as one crests the rise on the road just past the Base, the hill rises dramatically. It fills the horizon; and is unmistakable. The sun, finally having emerged from behind the low clouds, was brilliant and the temperature was not that unbearable, but it was increasing incrementally, inexorably. The hill dominates the area and behind it is Hill 881, and to my right rear is Hill 558 and the clearly distinguishable and indomitable 950 and 1015, each a historical hill so identified by its height above sea level in meters.

Binh turned off the newly paved road onto the smaller road and, bouncing along, we angled up the side of the base of the hill. The road became narrower, but I urged Binh forward. "Keep going," I said, motioning with my hand that we could continue upwards. This hillside road is new, I thought; has never been here before as far as I could tell.

"How far will this road take me?" I mused out loud. The road turned into a trail and then narrowed down even more. Still, we drove upwards. To my right, I spied a small hut with a corrugated metal roof and at that point the road clearly ended. I looked through the windshield and saw a foot trail that proceeded through the thick, lush green coffee plants. "I wonder," I said. I opened the door and climbed down from the 4-wheel drive vehicle. I stood and looked around. I could see the steep sides of the hill before me through the somewhat enshrouding trees and swaying tall grass and ubiquitous coffee plants. To my left there was a valley and then another lower ridgeline and what I thought were the beginning slopes of Hill 881. I turned to look in the direction of the Combat Base and Khe Sanh Ville. I could see the earth cuts being made for the hydroelectric scheme and the ensuing development in the general valley area. Hill 558 was perfectly outlined and now, from this vantage point, I noticed that, whereas before there had been very little human activity, a road has inched its way around the sides to the top. "So, Binh" I said, "I can drive virtually to the top of 558 now." Binh looked at me and nodded his head but I knew he did not know what I was saying. "So there's 558." I said out loud, as I surveyed the area to get my bearings, as if Binh could understand me. "Five fifty-eight," I said again, pointing. I remembered Jacob Krygoski - a Marine I have not forgotten but who I have never met - who had been stationed on 558. I thought of John Pessoni but could not remember if he was on the any of the hills.

But my sights were set on another possibility that dawned on me. "Jesus," I said, "I'm probably a sixth, or even a fifth of the way up this monster hill". I surveyed the area through the trees and coffee plants. I looked behind and all around me. "And here's a foot trail going up! How far does it go?" I knew what I was going to do. I knew with complete clarity of thought what I was doing. I was not fooling myself and I doubt I was fooling Binh. No, I knew what I was going to do for sure. I was going to the top of this hill! I realized I had known that already as soon as we had turned off the main highway but I did not allow myself to admit it. I stopped myself. Oops! Wrong shoes, wrong slacks, no hat, no water, nothing. I'm not prepared for this. Fuggit, I'm going to the top.

I started climbing. First, through head-high rows of coffee plants. The going was definitely uphill, but easy and with plenty of downward visibility for footing. "So far, so good," I mused out loud. My breathing was easy. Binh followed me for awhile. The last mountain I ever climbed was Mt. Sinai in the Sinai desert in 1988. That was plenty steep then. I found this upward climb to be relatively easy in comparison. I kept going, taking note however that the trail became steeper with each step and the rows of coffee plants more narrow. I was soon surrounded by thick coffee plants. I reached another small trail that climbed an eight-foot high earth ledge. I pulled myself up by tree limbs and, once on top, realized I had left the coffee plants behind. I was on my way now. I was also on my own, and without water, this last fact not sinking in just yet.

Now on the ledge I looked down and could see the metal roof of the hut and the vague outline of the vehicle. Binh was nowhere in sight. Turning to face the mountain, just in front of me was a barbwire fence lined with scraggly trees, that proceeded up and down the hill, the kind of scene one might find around farms or ranches in Colorado. The fence was trampled down and some posts had fallen, but there was a clear delineation of a property line or something. I stepped over the barbwire with the assistance of a low tree branch that I grabbed hold of and found myself in a narrow clearing that went straight down the fall line of the hill. "Foster, there is no turning back now," I said out loud for anyone to hear, although no one was around to hear me; and to reinforce in my own mind that I was about to undertake something significant, if not onerous.

I looked down the trail and thought this must be the brown stretch of earth that runs up the side of the hill that one can see from the Yellow Brick Road, from the crest near the Combat Base. To my right, the trail went straight down and into the canopies of thick trees and brush. But I wasn't going down. No. I could care less about the descending trail. I was going up. I turned left and looked up the ascending trail.

"Let's see, this mountain is a little less than 3,000 feet above sea level. I estimate I am about 800 feet above sea level. So I have only 2,200 feet to climb." I learned to think of climbing mountains in terms of chunks of elevation or increments and not in individual feet. Psychologically, at least for me, it makes climbing easier, as it makes objectives more attainable. So, in ten feet increments, that's 220 increments, or in 50 feet increments that's 44 increments. Let's go with the 44 increments. I can do this. I started uphill.

At first my strides were even and long and I gained elevation quickly. I stopped a couple of times and looked at the valley. This much, so far, had been easy. The hut and vehicle had long disappeared from view. I saw shade farther up the trail and decided I would take a five-minute break there. I made it, no sweat... well; I was actually sweating pretty profusely. I sat down to relax and felt OK, still breathing evenly. There was no breeze and the sun shone intensely through the trees. The shade I had seen was not much shade after all.

I looked up the trail and could see only a steep slope of the mountain in front of me. "Aw come on!" I said, "I've climbed at least 300 feet or so from the fence." I should be able to see the top. But no.

I stood up and began to climb again. The trail did not disappear. It just continued up and it began to run through thick grass that was over my head with a riot of briars intermingled all through it. I continued on and quickly found myself entangled in long thorny limbs and briars. They attacked my shirt and pants and finally, becoming so enmeshed with this vegetation, I was stopped until I could disengage from them, pulling each bramble from my clothes with my fingers. Then onward, ever upward again, and again the same thing happened. I was pulling thorns out of me every inch of the way. They stuck to and became embedded in my shirt, in my pants and in my flesh. Now where was the top? I fought my way through the elephant grass and the briars and emerged into another opening. But now I noticed the trees had lessened and there was now no shade at all. And, there was no water. This thought finally was not lost on me and I was becoming quite thirsty. "Aw, the top is just ahead," I said. "Get up and push on." I could not see the valley, or the top of the hill, or the trail behind me, or anything. Just tall grass: tall thick grass with incredibly sharp edges and long thorns.

I continued to climb but noticed during brief pauses that my recovery time was increasing in between multiples of increments. The hill was becoming steeper or I was trying to accomplish too much too soon. "Slow down." I reminded, or rather, warned myself. Then the thought occurred to me, and the implications really hit me. First of all, it's against the law to be here without a permit. Second I am alone and no way to contact anyone. And third, as a renewed thought, but one that was becoming more of a concern, not a single drop of water. "What am I thinking?" I felt my pocket. "Cell Phone! I'll call Binh to let him know I'm OK." Dialed in the number, hit the system, but could not hit his cell phone. Well, just great. Put the phone back in my pocket

I looked at my slacks, many pulls of thread in the fabric due to the brambles and thorns. "So be it." I looked at my arms and blood was dripping down both of them from multiple scratches and abrasions. "Funny," I thought, as I pulled thorns out of my skin. I was reminded of "The Red Badge of Courage." For some inexplicable reason, my mind went back to my eighth grade year when I had to have a tutor in introductory English literature. The first book I read under her was Stephen Crane's short but definitive novel of the Civil War. How odd I thought to be reminded of this simply because of some blood on my forearm. But now my mind began to ponder many things as I sat and recuperated. I watched as a trail of ants marched serenely up the hill, over and under leaves, on the ground next to me. How many Marines, much bloodier than me, marched, trudged, and humped through this area on daily patrols like these ants? How many Marines went up and down this same hill once, twice, many times a day? How many firefights, or ambushes ensued here in this mass of vegetation? How could anyone see anyone? A wasp flew next to my head, just out of arm's length, making slow buzzing noises. The breeze had stopped or, rather, I knew the tall grass had stopped its circulation as I sat on the ground sweating.

Sweat now really poured out of me as the sweltering heat spiraled. I was reminded of my second visit to the Combat Base five years ago when I found the ammo dump and confirmed the runway. Sweat poured out of me on that day too. I knew I was dehydrating quickly. I thought, "I either reach the top soon, or I will be forced to climb down." Now, the reality of not having water became very acute. "This is not good." If I could gauge the remaining distance to the top, I could estimate my chances. But I could see nothing. All I knew now was the mountain was sloping upwards in front of me and was snaring me into its steely undeniable grip. Was this tantamount to Kurtz's descent into the heart of darkness? Would this mountain consume me, eat me alive? Would it suck me in and spit me out, spent, exhausted, torn, thirsty, bloody? Apparently so.

Another few increments. Had to sit down. Sweat running out of my body like Niagara Falls. Steeper climbing and rougher going. Looked at my watch: "Let's see, left car at 11:40." Ah, at least I remembered that. "It's now 12:55. Binh must be wondering where I am." And now I wondered whether he may have driven down the trail thinking I may be below him. I reached into my pocket for my cell phone and opened it and dialed his number; hit the system but still cannot hit his phone. "Man! Maybe I better go down. Maybe the authorities followed us here and have taken him in." Though I doubted this possibility, I knew the authorities frowned on such excursions in these hills. "I'm not really supposed to be here." I was in dilemma: a propitious moment of decision. I thought for a few seconds: no water, no communication. Then I thought of Dennis Mannion and his comrades in Kilo 3/26. My mind was made up. Nothing was going to stop me from climbing this mountain! Nothing!

I stood up, blood and sweat everywhere, barbed slacks, and ripped shirt. I turned to look up the trail and words from the children's story "The Little Engine that Could" popped into my mind: "I think I can, I think I can." Not a breath of air. With the steep side slope of the mountain staring me in the face, slowly I put one foot in front of the other and said to myself. "I know I am almost there." I wasn't. This hill, I realized, was challenging me now. Though it may accept my presence, it would not accept it without proof of my worthiness. Joseph Campbell, the great mythologist, I was sure, would have provided me with some mythological parallels.

With little time remaining, I kept trudging upward into and out of thick grass. No trees. Sun crashing down on me now. I lay down in some tall grass, burying my head in the reeds to ward off the insistent sun, listened to my heart pound away, and felt the sweat continue to completely soak my shirt. My pants were covered in brambles and now red dirt. My breathing eventually slowed and subsided but my heart raced furiously. I was very thirsty. I waited for a few more minutes and stood up again. Worthy I may be, exhausted I am becoming. Can't give up "Never have, never will." I have never forgotten that expression I read once in Red Clay after 9/11, three and half years ago.

Still not quite there yet. The trail opened into thinner and shorter grass and I could see the slopes of "eight eighty-one" to my left and the ridgeline of what I thought connected the mountain I was on to an adjacent mountain sort of to my front. Behind me, I could now see the valley and the roads far below. I could see "nine-fifty" and "ten-fifteen" easily and I knew my bearings. I looked at my watch: 1:30PM. Sat down and then lay down and let my heart pound again on the inner walls of my chest till it rested. Becoming impatient and fearful - I thought I would run out of time, or Binh and subsequently myself perhaps would be arrested - I stood up and followed the narrow opening again up and back into thick grass. Man this hill is up! All the way! Where is the top?

Another increment farther and I lay down again. My neck is now bleeding, as is my face. Well, I'm use to that by now. "Landmines!" The thought careened through my mind. "Oh yeah, I'll bet they're some around here, somewhere." Bombs and mortar rounds; at least they don't pose an immediate danger. If they didn't explode then, they probably won't explode now. But landmines, now that's another story. Wonder if there are any around here? Probably not on this trail. Well, I consoled myself, they'll just add to the predicament I now find myself in.

I got up and turned to the top and marched on and up. Sun, almost directly overhead or at least it seemed directly overhead, continuing to pour its bright heat down on me. I looked to the left and, through the tall grass, could make out round depressions in the earth. Must be bomb craters. But now, what's this in front of me? There appears to be a clearing up ahead. There is! I reached it and the slope flattened out and the climbing became easier. I saw trees up ahead but more importantly; I noted the open sky behind them. I saw the same ridgeline to my left that I had seen earlier at about the same elevation I was. I could see the slope of 881 flattening. "Man, I think I'm going to make it! I can't be very far from the top now."

With renewed vigor and enthusiasm, I made the last 100 steps and emerged through the thick grass to a plateau and, knowing the top of the hill was attainable, I rested one last moment. Time was now my enemy. I could not take much more time. I had other things to do this day and this short climb was but a spontaneous interlude. I called Binh on the cell phone but there was no answer. The top of the hill was just a few feet above me.

I raced the remaining distance; not sure why. Became entangled in thick grass again, and found a new route round, next to a small tree. I saw a trench line in front of me covered in tall grass. I knew it was a trench line because I could follow the contour around to my left and back again to my right. I could see the valley and all the hills; and 881 was right next to me. Hill "five fifty-eight," below me, was clearly identifiable. "Ah, but the breeze, the wind." What a relief. I began to hike up the incline in front of me. I was breathing heavily and sweating like there was no tomorrow. But I was there. I had reached the top.

I lay down on the top to recuperate, and as soon as I did, I could not see anything due to the tall grass. Now I thought, "Was I really at the top?" I surmised so except there were lumps of very tall grass off to my left and front. I walked there but didn't have the strength or time to fight more thick grass. No. This is it. This is the top of the hill. I was there.

I walked all around and looked at the valley and to the adjacent hills and pondered Hill 881 so close that I thought I could climb that too. But no: no time, and no water. I noticed that the Vietnamese had planted several rows of small pine trees. This had to be recent, within the last few days. The diggings for each sapling were not smoothed out by rain. Interesting. And then I realized that the going was easier for me here because before they had planted the trees they had cut down the tall elephant grass with their machetes.

I sat down facing the Combat Base. Hills 950 and 1015, far across the wide valley, were to my left front in clear unobstructed view. I think I was in the approximate area where Ray Stubbe held a service with a rugged cross planted in the ground. The photograph of this is now famous and a mural of it exists in Ho Chi Minh City. I wiped rivers of sweat from my eyes on my shirtsleeve. I could not help but remember that Dennis Mannion, Bob Arotta, Glenn Prentice, Paul Knight, Paul's son, Jeff Knight, Donna Elliott (who lost her brother Jerry (MIA) on 21 January1968 in the Khe Sanh area), Dave Kniess (a former student of Dennis' who recorded the team's visit on film), and Lan Anh, their interpreter had climbed the mountain in July of 2000. Preceding me, they had visited where I now was, some of them for their second time.

The wind died down and I felt a sudden sensation. A slight chill swept over my body. Something seemed strange. I felt I was not alone. I felt as if someone else was on the mountain with me. Sitting still in the hot sun with the panorama of the valley spread out beneath me, I hooked my arms over my knees and stared all around. I stared as far to the horizon as I could. There was not a sound, not a breath of air and the grass and leaves on the smaller trees stood still. I remembered the Vietnamese consider the entire valley and surrounding hills to be haunted. I looked into the sky and saw puffy white clouds floating as they do in the American Midwest on a lazy day in late August. I saw their shadows dance across the valley floor below. I listened for any sound. There was none.

Now totally alone and engulfed in eerie silence, I wondered: were spirits of fallen American combatants swirling around me? I stood up and peered into the grass and along the sides of the hill and toward 881 and back towards 950 and 1015. I felt no wind but I sure felt something. Yes, they probably were present with me. And, if they were with me and confused about who I was, and perhaps worried about my intentions, then I wanted them to know I was there as a friend. I had not come up here to interrupt their solitude, or to denigrate their sacrifice, or to violate their spiritual space. I had come up here to honor them.

I looked at my watch and realized I had been on top for 20 minutes. I had to get down. I didn't have anymore time. I walked back to the small tree where I had crested the mountain and looked down and then back across the inclined plateau. The wind picked up briefly. I turned to begin descending the trail back to the hut and vehicle. But after only a few steps I kept thinking about the Marines who had experienced what I had just experienced; the same thing, same place, many years before, but in circumstances many times worse, far worse, than what I had experienced this day: yes, thorns, humidity, heat, beating sun and interminable rain, tall grass, endless sweat, blood, bugs, wounds; but more; the enemy with their whizzing, stinging, deadly bullets and the thump of their grenades, the crunch of their insidious mortars, and the deep pounding explosions of artillery rounds fired from Co Roc Mountain in Laos and elsewhere. This was a very different and very dangerous place 37 years ago in 1968.

I stopped my descent short and stared out over the broad green valley now punctuated with darker green shades from the shadows of the white hovering indolent clouds, and then back to the top of the mountain I had, on a whim, just climbed. I stood still. "I should say a prayer," I said. But what would I say? I never really pray. Why would I pray now and for what exactly? Somewhat at a loss, I felt I should at least say something to mark this moment and to remember the Marines who had served and died here. In slightly more than a solemn whisper of my voice, I simply and respectfully said the only words I knew appropriate for so many who endured the supreme hardship of this unforgiving, dreadful hill, who never gave up, and who made the ultimate sacrifice: "Semper Fi." I felt honored to be here, albeit in a detached, even morose way. It was a privilege to be where so many brave American men had been years before me. Climbing this lonely mountain in some foreboding, recessed corner of Quang Tri Province in the narrowest waist of Vietnam, taking an opportunity that had presented itself to me and may never present itself again. I knew my life had changed. Yes, climbing this hill was a challenge. Now, having gained the summit, descending it, after but a brief respite on top, made me a little sad. I would not be able to relate this experience to very many in ways they would understand. I knew I was given a gratuitous opportunity to visit the same place so many Marines may have wanted to re-visit but can't. Knowing all this, and knowing the history of this area, I realized I had been given a chance to walk in the footsteps of giants. "No." I thought. "Not giants." Not quite correct. "Titans" is the better descriptor.

Feeling now the soft warm breeze in my face as it rose from the valley beneath me, and seeing the dry gray-green of the sun-parched thick chaotic vegetation as it enveloped the crest and side slopes, I turned my back on the mountain and started my descent. Retracing my steps and disappearing again into the canopies of tall grass and overgrowth as I walked down, and back into the coffee plants to the vehicle, I had made my way off a non-descript hill that I had climbed only hours before, but a hill indelibly etched into Marine Corps history - perhaps with the other hills collectively in and around Khe Sanh, comprising what has come to be called the Hill Fights, a symbol as historically significant as Iwo Jima - a lonely, grass infested hill in central Vietnam unknown to most everyone; but to a select group of fighting Marines, and now always remembered by me, a hill that will forever be known in numbers marking its height above sea level, and in words: Eight Sixty-One. I had climbed Hill 861 and stood on the very ground where Titans once stood. None of us should ever forget them, the sacrifices they made, and what they accomplished there.

THE CALM BEFORE THE STORM

Michael D. Bradbury
K CO 3/26

Cobi Tahn Valley had been a strange operation. We slipped and slid in the monsoon rain and mud from one jungle to the next, with some fairly steep hills in -between, and never once crossed paths with the enemy. "If the truth be known, he was probably "caved-up' someplace and merely had enough sense to "stay in out of the rain." But long range patrols still had to be run.

For me, although cold, wet and miserable, it did eat up a couple more weeks on the calendar, and if the rest of this tour stayed quiet, that would be ok with me. It wouldn't of course, but you had to make the best of what you had.

Back at Camp Evans, I saw the only Thompson submachine gun I would ever see in Vietnam. It was carried by our Company First Sergeant. His name was Goddard, who had fought in Korea plus 3 tours in 'Nam. He was tall, strict, and hard enough to back it up. He hated civilians too, and their ways.

We'd gotten back to Camp Evans somewhere around Thanksgiving. "Thanksgiving" in Vietnam, would come and go without notice. There was nothing to be thankful for over there, unless you were still alive, and you were glad everyday for that.

With the "Christmas season" coming on, Goddard's sister had sent him a pair of very nice thick wool socks to help him keep his feet warm. A very nice gesture. problem was, they were in bright "Christmas" colors. Our tent was about a hundred feet from Goddard's, and right around noon, you could hear him yelling and cursing at the top of his lungs, throwing things around, etc.

A few of us went outside, and one dude came walking by at a fast pace, and warned us all to stay away from the "1st Shirt's" tent.

"What's going on?"

"Goddard just got a package of socks from his sister, and they ain't olive drab, he was I pissed! He threw the whole package in the burn barrel!. Stay out of his way today, if you guys know what's good for you!"

1st Sgt Goddard was one of those "unforgettable people" you'd expect to read about in Reader's Digest. He was a "Marine's Marine." Someone had once asked him if he was married. His answer became common knowledge to the entire camp, "If the Marine Corps wanted us to have wives, they'd have issued them to us!"

He carried that Thompson, barked orders and strutted around with a "Patton" sort of stature, but as we would find out at Khe Sanh, in combat, he walked the walk.

Just before Christmas, we loaded up in 6x6's and headed for some distant outpost up by the DMZ, called Khe Sanh. "We were "loaded for bear." I knew this was gonna big a "big one" because all three rocket teams in the Company had been ordered to take the big stovepipes as well as the LAAWs. When the big "crew served" bazookas were coming with us, it meant something.

Larger quantities of ammo, C-rations and water would be flown up after we got there. We got there on Christmas Eve. In the morning, we would have the last hot breakfast we would have for the next 4 months. Looming out beyond the main Khe Sanh base itself, were Hills, 881 North, 881 South and 861.

"K" Company would be relieving another Marine company on 861. Just before we "saddled-up" to begin the long hike up there, this little supply jeep with a small trailer behind it came sloshing down the muddy road on "Main Street." As he got closer, the driver and I just sort of looked at each other as he pulled up and stopped.

"Is that you, Bradbury?" Even under the helmet, that West Virginia accent was unmistakable, it was Ron Patrick from Barstow (the other guy in that phone booth story).

I replied, "What are you doing here Ron?, You're supposed to be in supply someplace!"

He thumbed a gesture behind him to his loaded trailer, and said, "I'm still delivering supplies, but I gotta tell ya, I'd rather be back in Barstow right now! What are you guys doing here?"

I ain't sure yet" I answered, but I guess we're gonna find out soon enough."

"Well", he said, "I gotta go. Maybe I'll see ya later, keep your head down!", and he drove off. I never saw him again. I have often wondered if he made it home.

By early afternoon, "K" Company made it to the top of 861, and the outfit we were relieving looked like a bunch of out-of-work, unshaven bums. They'd been expecting us, gave us the 50-cent tour of the trench line and bunkers around the crest of the hill, and wasted no time vacating the premises, as soon as their Company Commander passed on his "notes" to ours.

We spent the next few hours filling in positions along the trench lines and mortar pits. 3rd platoon was assigned to the stretch of trench line that looked to the south, giving us a pretty good look at the main Khe Sanh base itself, where we had just come from.

2nd Platoon covered the northeast direction, with 1st Platoon watching the northwest.

For the 2nd time in my life, I was living on a hill, but 861 would soon prove to be a lot rougher hill than Potrero ever was. This was not a good "neighborhood" to be in.

Retired Royal Australian Marine becomes honorary US Marine

By Cpl. Rebekka S. Heite, Marine Corps Base Japan

CAMP HANSEN, OKINAWA, Japan — Retired Royal Australian Marine, Col. Ivan J. Cahill, was awarded the title of Honorary U.S. Marine Nov. 19 for his conduct as the company commander of Company E, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marine Regiment, 3rd Marine Division, from Dec. 1, 1967 to Dec. 31, 1968 during the Vietnam War.

"Wearing the title of United States Marine is challenging, rewarding and earned," said Maj. Gen. James B. Laster, commanding general, 3rd Marine Division, III Marine Expeditionary Force. "Therefore, after carefully considering and reviewing Col. Ivan J. Cahill's service to our (Marine) Corps, without a doubt, I recommend with utmost enthusiasm he be awarded the title of Honorary Marine.

While with the Marines, Cahill was awarded the Bronze Star Medal with combat distinguishing device for leading the Marines during Operation Auburn in Vietnam from 1967-1968.

During the operation in the Dien Ban District, Quang Nam, Republic of Vietnam, Cahill moved the company out of the landing zone to assault positions, preparing to attack the assigned objective, according to the citation. Almost immediately upon landing, the company began receiving small arms and automatic weapons fire from both the front and flank.

"Capt. Cahill, with extraordinary coolness and tactical acumen, deployed the Marines under fire to meet this unexpected threat to the operation and for the next several hours, he directed not only the company's fire power, but the use of air and artillery support."

Cahill didn't stay in a fighting hole during this battle. Instead, without regard for his own safety he " ... courageously moved about the battlefield, encouraging the Marines of the company in their action against the enemy," according to the citation.
As the only foreigner to have direct command of an American rifle company in combat, the battlefield isn't the only place that Marines wanted to be near Cahill.

"His manner of saluting, flat palm of hand facing forward and brought crisply to his hat-brim, reverberating slightly as it snapped to a stop in the British manner, cased whole groups of young Marines to deliberately cross his path so that they could salute him and then watch the spectacle of his return salute," according to Mark Woodruff on www.diggerhistory.info.

"(Cahill) epitomizes camaraderie and esprit de corps," said Laster. "He has lead and inspired Marines not only in a combat zone as a U.S. Marine Corps company commander, but continues to strengthen the bond between Australian and American service members."

"To this day, over 40 years after his service, veteran Marines are unstinting in their praise of both his personal courage and combat leadership," said Laster. "He has proven himself to be a leader of Marines."

SOMETHING ABOUT CHRISTMAS
By Craig W. Tourte

There is something about Christmas; perhaps it is just the commercialization of this otherwise religious holiday recognition that disturbs me. It is certainly a wonderful time for so many, the celebration of the birth of our religious and cultural foundation no matter ones religious preference, a time to remember family, children, friends and those who have passed. I know it is a difficult time for our troops who are away from home. I think most remember where they were at Christmas and what they were doing, perhaps participating in a religious ceremony of some sort, maybe even an exchange of gifts, and it is certainly a time for great meals and for a few, even a libation or two with friends. I wish I had some found memories of the 1967 Christmas at Khe Sanh, I mean the Siege had not yet started, but it was cold, wet and foggy and just plain down right miserable.

A few days ago I was sitting around with 3 other men my age, all veterans of the Vietnam War. Two had been in the Army and one in the Navy. The subject of Christmas and USO shows came up and the question was asked if anyone had seen Bob Hope. There were some funny stories; one guy said it was strongly suggested that he attend the Bob Hope Christmas show although he just wanted to sleep. Another mentioned a USO show he saw and how much he enjoyed it. My vague recall now is that a small contingent of the Marine Corps Band showed up on the Khe Sanh base and a couple of them found there way over to the South West corner were we were located. I'm thinking it must have been around Christmas, for I can't imagine why they would have been there if it was not for that reason. I think that was around the time we were all offered one coke or one beer (both warm of course) but I can't be sure, I was pretty excited about receiving that beer.

For the past several years I have offered my "Christmas at Khe Sanh" story, kind of a little parody on the Bob Hope and Ann Margaret USO Vietnam Christmas Shows. I enjoyed writing the story, a ridiculously impossible event that some actually believed occurred and a few wondered why they did not attend or just could not remember the event. Surprisingly, no one said they had actually seen the show. I'll remember Christmas again this year, not for the commercialization, unneeded gifts or unwanted guests. Not for the un USO show that did not occur at Khe Sanh in 1967. Not for my disappointment of never having seen Bob or Ann, but rather for the memory of those who did not return with us, for those who have passed and those of us who have reached the shadow of our years and are now ill or otherwise confined, lonely, in pain or are just plain miserable, along with those who are in good spirits and health. God bless us all for our perseverance, our pride, courage, and patriotism.

Craig,
In reading our post, "Christmas at Khe Sanh", some may enjoy it, and tell their Christmas tale also. Speaking of the band, I dug this picture out of my photo album. I do not know the exact date, but was informed it was Dec of 67.

I spent Christmas 67 in boot camp (SD), 68 at Dong Ha, 1969 at Camp Books (Red Beach) in Danang, and 1970 at MCAS Yuma....

REUNION COMMITTEE:

We have finalized the KSV reunion, set for the week of 18-24 July 2011. It will be held at the Kahler Grand Hotel, located in Rochester MN. The room rates are 89.00 a day, good for 2 days before, and 2 days after the actual reunion dates.

The registration form & information for events held at the reunion, are included in this issue of the magazine. In Brief, the Hotel is Pet Friendly, there iare no parking fees, including in and out privileges. The Rochester Convention Bureau will be hosting an early bird welcome reception on Wednesday evening. On Thursday, there will be a 2 hour ride on a Mississippi river boat. Lunch will be served, and rather than try to gauge what type of luncheon everyone would like, we decided to provide all the ingredients, several meats, bread, salads, and condiments. While you take in the beautiful sites, having a few cocktails, you can make your own sandwiches as you like. Or, if you are lucky, maybe one of our beautiful Khe Sanh Women will do it for you

Since the boat only holds 129 people, there will be 2 separate tours. The first tour will start at 12:00 Noon to 2 pm and the second tour from 2 pm to 4 pm. The Captain has agreed to allow all of our members the opportunity to be photographed driving the Mississippi River boat.

On Friday, we will have our KSV Memorial . It will be held outdoors at the beautiful Soldiers memorial a few blocks from the Hotel. Transportation will be provided. We will have audio visual equipment at the memorial. Tom Eichler is requesting that each member who may wish to read the name of the person(s) they are honoring at the ceremony, send him a photo so it may be shown on the Black granite panels of the memorial.

The Hotel has recently been renovated, and is beautiful. It and other Hotels are connected to the Mayo Clinic from the lower floor, where there are over 65 unique stores and boutiques; novelty shops and restaurants, are within walking distance. The KSV will also provide transportation for groups of members who may wish to travel to the Mall of the Americas, and other sites not on our regular schedule.

Please send in your registrations as soon as possible as we have to notify our travel vendor & the hotel Food & beverage manager, of the number of attendees, so we have adequate travel means, and food for the banquet on Saturday. The enclosed pamphlet has photos of all the activities we have set up, and of all the other amenities the hotel has to offer. Russ & I had a great time setting it up and everyone from the City of Rochester were just warm & wonderful.

There will be an election for members of the KSV BOD, including the office of president. So if you are contemplating running for office you have to notify the KSV Secretary of your intentions prior to the reunion. Also call to assure the office you want to apply for, is up for election.

Big John's KSV PX has a ton of beautiful new items, specifically designed for the KSV. If you would like to donate items for the Silent Auction, and are not coming to the reunion, you may mail the donated items to John . The proceeds from the PX & Silent Auction allow the KSV to print our Red Clay magazine, maintain our scholarship fund, and purchase items for our PX.

SUSAN SAFFEL
1946-2010
WIFE OF BRUCE SAFFEL
A CO 3RD ANTI TANKS

Susan(Riemenschneider) Saffel age 64, of Oakdale Beloved Wife, Mother, Grandmother, Sister, Friend Passed away peacefully November 27, 2010 with family at her side. Susan was born November 26, 1946 in St. Paul, where she lived most of her life. After graduating from Harding High School, she earned a degree in special education at St. Cloud State University. While there she was active in Alpha Xi Delta and retained close friendships with her sorority sisters through the years. She taught in St. Paul, Roseville and WBL until her health forced her to retire early. She was diagnosed with a hereditary lung disease called Alpha 1 Anti Trypsin Deficiency in 1992, which eventually led to a bilateral lung transplant on 5/18/04.

Eternally grateful to her donor, she vowed to live every day to its fullest. She and Bruce loved to travel and made lasting friendships that reached across the U.S. as well as Mexico, Canada and Puerto Rico. Her passions were needlework, gardening, travel work and playing games, but her biggest love was family. She is survived by her beloved husband and caregiver of 44 years, Bruce; daughters, Amy (Jim) Grothaus of Hudson, and Alissa (Matt) O'Hara of Lino Lakes; beautiful and adored grandchildren, Joshua, Alexander and Lauren O'Hara, and Olivia and Oscar Grothaus; mother Nina; brothers, Richard and James (Pat), dear friends and many relatives. Susan was preceded in death by her father, Floyd.

She met her many medical challenges with great strength and courage. A funeral service in celebration of Sue's life was held Friday, Dec. 3rd at 10AM . Interment Fort Snelling National Cemetery. In lieu of flowers, donations in her honor preferred to the Fairview University Lung Program. Thank you to the healthcare professionals at Fairview University Hospital and clinics for the excellent care provided.

RONS HOUSE PARTY AND THE A SHAU VALLEY

By Craig Tourte

I happened to find myself at my friend Rons - not his real name - house last weekend, Ron had a few friends over and asked me to come over. Ron is my age, an attorney and not a Veteran. Ron grew up in Pacific Palisades California and attended high school with radio personality Michael Medved who Ron describes as being the most intelligent person in his high school and a great guy. Quite a few celebrities lived near Ron while he was growing up. His father was some type of president of an automobile manufacturing plant or something like that. Gregory Peck lived around the corner from him along with other notables; all described as pretty nice, down to earth folks. Ron's friends are affluent and they should be, they are high achievers and work long hours. Writers, attorney's, engineers, lawyers, all kinds of professional people. I have known Ron for some 30 years now, while not running in the same social circles, he is a friend and a decent human being and his friends treated me well and were friendly. Not an easy task for them as I tend to be somewhat reluctant to mingle and converse with those I am unfamiliar with.

Some years ago Ron had mentioned that he had a friend who had also served in Vietnam and that perhaps one day I would meet him. Turns out his friend happened to be at Rons house the day. I was standing listening to three or four others when Ron approached and said that I had something in common with - I forget his name - the man standing to my right. Ron said that we were in Vietnam at the same time. I asked his friend when he served and he told me November 1968 and then mentioned something about 1969 but I failed to follow. We shook hands and that was it, at least for the next hour or so.

I did the best I could with small talk with folks I had never met before we all tried our best to be pleasant and interested in what the other person was saying. I found myself in the kitchen just before I left and Ron's friend walked over to me. We started to talk a little about Vietnam and he told me that he served with the 101st Airborne in the A Shau Valley. I said, Oh, Hamburger Hill, hill 937. I think he was a little shocked that I knew something about it. He kind of opened up and said that he had been wounded and had a hearing loss as a result of his injury. I asked him if he had applied for Veterans Benefits and he gave me the same old line I have heard before, in fact I said the same to Tom Horchler a number of years ago. "I got out alive, and that's all I care about." He did say that he was collecting 10 percent because of a hearing loss. My response to that was the same one that Tom told me those many years ago. "You get your paper work together and I'll take you down to the VA. I'm sure they won't give you any benefits but if they want to give you some money and you don't want it you can give it to me." The guy just kind of looked at me; I could see he was thinking it over. I told him about my situation, and to be honest it is something I have a difficult time talking about without tears coming to my eyes - strange after all of these year, I don't find it getting any easier. I think the guy saw the emotion in me and he kind of softened and said something along the lines of, "No one else can ever understand." It was then that I knew he was one of us, a brother with the pain of remembrance. We hugged - and I'm sure those who saw us wondered why - before I left. It was pretty cool, you just never know at these things when you'll meet one of us.

NEW PX ITEMS

Khe Sanh Veterans', Inc. Scholarship Foundation
A message from the Chairman, Dan Fisher and the Committee

2010 begins the second successful year of our new Scholarship Foundation. Tremendous support through donations from the Khe Sanh Membership has provided the Foundation with enough funds to increase Scholarship awards to $1000 for each accepted, young scholar. Remember that your donations are tax deductible and that you can memorialize a comrade with your donation for publication in "RED CLAY". The reunion silent auction is another source of financial support, so bring in those special items you think can sell.

We have seven scholarship awards to announce this year. Four are new applicants and three are second year applicants. Below are short summaries of these scholars. A hearty 'Well Done!' to each of them. Be sure to encourage your children and grandchildren to apply for Scholarship grants from Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc.

Reunion Committee

The annual Khe Sanh Veterans Reunion in Rochester, MN., is fast approaching. We need to have your registration form completed and your hotel reservations made. You can always cancel if circumstances will not allow you to attend the reunion.

We have to let the hotel and other businesses where we have booked events, know exactly how many members will be attending. Food and transportation has to be ordered, and there is a very small per cent allowed for additional persons attending.

We have an array of beautiful new items especially designed for our membership, available in the Khe Sanh PX. We have also purchased our own Steamed Hot Dog machine in addition to our Pop Corn & Coffee machines, for the hospitality room. These, and other amenities are the result of your generous contributions.

We hope you and your families will take advantage of the Mississippi Paddle Boat ride scheduled for 21 July. Russ & I took the ride while in Rochester negotiating with the hotel, and had a great time. Lunch will be served, and the Captain will allow each member to drive the boat, and be photographed doing so.

There are numerous vendors selling a hundreds of different items and food during the street festivals directly outside of the hotel. There is also live entertainment from several different bands.

If you wish to donate items for the silent auction you may send them to John Pessoni or myself. We want to thank Ron Shouse for again donating numerous hand crafted Vietnam Beaded Necklaces for our PX.

There is also an election for President, and several BOD positions, so let our Secretary know prior to the reunion if you choose to run for any of the offices.

ONE LAST PLEA TO PLEASE GET YOUR REGISTRATION FORMS IN, THE REUNION IS JUST A FEW SHORT WEEKS AWAY

CHAPLAIN'S CORNER SUMMER 2011

New International Version
I pray for safe travel to Rochester for everyone in July. I hope to renew old friendships and make many new ones.

Chaplain Ron Rayner

Memorial Day is a day to remember those who have served our country and passed on. It is also a time to pray for those are serving today.

Almighty God, with reverence and love we pause to pay tribute to those who have served our nation and now rest from their labor.

We also pay tribute to our honored and valiant United States Armed Forces. Please grant that we may be ever mindful of their service to our nation, and that we may be ever aware of our fellowship with all who have served our nation. Please guard our homes, churches and schools, our entire land and all therein from harm and destruction. Please preserve the integrity of this Nation founded on religious principles by protecting it from all enemies within and without. We beseech You, O God to shield and protect our armed forces, in the air, on and under the sea, and on land. Please bless them with victory. May it be Your will that the dominion of tyranny and cruelty be brought to an end and the kingdom of righteousness be established on earth with liberty and freedom for all mankind. Please grant us the strength, courage, and wisdom to fulfill your wishes. We thank you for the freedom and abundance that we enjoy this day. Amen (Taken in part from VVA Ritual Book)

It is so easy to get caught up in the busyness of our daily lives and forget the sacrifices of the people that ensure our safety. The United States Military, police officers, and firefighters lead the way by risking their lives in a dangerous world. I believe daily prayer for those who serve is the greatest gift that we can give. It also is good to provide encouragement by saying thank you when the opportunity presents itself. And of course, cards, letters and packages sent overseas are always appreciated.

"Worry weighs a person down; an encouraging word cheers a person up."
Proverbs 12:25
New Living Translation
"For I know the plans I have for you," says the Lord, "They are plans for good and not for disaster, to give you a future and a hope. In those days when you pray, I will listen. If you look for me in earnest, you will find me when you seek me."
Jeremiah

END OF WATCH June 02 2010

SADLY MISSED AND ALWAYS LOVED

You bid no one a last farewell or never said goodbye.

You were gone before we knew it, And only God knows why.

A million times we needed you, A million times we cried.

If love alone could have saved you, You never would have died.

In life we loved you dearly, In death we love you still.

In our hearts you hold a place No one could ever fill.

It broke our hearts to lose you, But you didn't go alone.

For part of us went with you The day God took you home

Marines from The Chosin Reservoir Detachment 968 were honored to serve as Casket Guards during the Funeral Visitation Period. The detail consisted of Walter Golladay and Robert Collier.

POETRY

WompWompWompWomp

WompWompWompWompWomp…the sound!
It could be heard faintly in the distance.
It was the same but louder on nearby ground.
The dust filled my eyes, ever unmasked.
I ran to it, I ran from it, maybe I fell down.
When I needed it most my soul danced.

A Silver Bird deserted us in South Vietnam.
It took us home if we made our time.
But that big, ugly Huey was the battle ram.
It rescued us if we bled in the slime.
It pitched and yawed, I swear it even swam.
If there were trees it could even climb.

Old UH-1, in all forms, was OD green, yes.
The men inside had brass 'nads' too.
It was required, and they all were the best.
I never saw a crew that would not do.
Crazy men matched the ships, nothing less.
We Grunts on the ground…we knew!

We saw the Cobras, we prayed for fast fliers.
The B-52s made the earth shake below.
Puff made the sky red and our spirits higher.
The Bumble Bees were spotting a show.
"Chinooks" handled big stuff, major suppliers.
Hueys touched us every day down below.

Those old work horses were tough as hell.
Like a Timex they kept on ticking.
They carried ammo, supplies, men and mail.
We went to hot LZs pulses racing.
At times they carried food we even smelled.
In a firefight they heard our crying.

We watched the horizon for their smoking fallen.
If close to them, we would protect them.
Their sixties were voices to us, angels had spoken.
Those with red crosses were from heaven.
Dead or alive, they were there for us, loving iron.
They are the best horse the Army has seen.

It is hard to believe the best are to be retired.
They are like us, I suppose, and history now.
They are tough and can serve, but not desired.
A reliable, tough old Huey is not enough.
I can pull a trigger but I just can't get there.
Let's go to the bone yard and sit down.

This was written at the request of J.C. Fischer for the retirement of the Phenomenal UH-1 Huey helicopter that served us so well in Vietnam
And other soldiers for thirty or more years. We salute it and all it has done.
I could write forever. Images keep flashing. It is now the next afternoon and The old baby is still in my mind. How do I stop it? I cannot. It was too big, too Much a part of what we did, too huge part of our life on the ground. I was in an Air mobile brigade and we lived with the machine…and our dead left with it.
Thank God I did not see more of that than I did. I witnessed a lot of wounded
Carried away in its not so gentle hands, but they were relatively safe there,
Soon to be in gentler hands. One vision stays with me. As we ran to her,
We were bent at the waist like subjects approaching their queen.
That was as it should have been and as it should be now as the queen Retires to her final resting chamber. It should be something grand.

For many the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall is a place to commemorate the dead for Charles "Graves" Roth, age 62 of Collingdale each year he would visit the Wall remembering those who died during the Tet Offensive and his best friend Robert L. Stanek who died on Feb. 4, 1968.

But on this breezy day on March 7, it was a day to celebrate life. Today he would meet the Marine whose life he had miraculously saved forty-three years ago.

Roth was in Graves Registration where he tended to over 2,700 bodies of the fallen soldiers, children and even military dogs in Vietnam. He would retrieve bodies during the day repelling out of helicopters and spend his nights preparing the dead for their trip home. He and another Marine would fingerprint the soldiers and then put them in body bags.

On April 25, 1968 Gil Hernandez, 63, of Elko, Nev. was in the middle of a combat zone riding on top of a tank when he was hit by satchel charges and grenades. He suffered intense injuries to his back, both of his legs, his liver and his arm. He had a punctured lung, six inches of his small intestine was removed and shrapnel was pulled out from his skin. He was brought to Graves Registration for his return home. Roth would fingerprint the left hand and then a fellow Marine; Bob Boutwell would fingerprint the right hand. Roth saw a twitch from a body that was to be fingerprinted. It was Hernandez. Roth's observation would save Hernandez life.

He moved again and Roth remembered that if you hit someone three times you can revive them. He hit him three times and he was breathing. He sent him back to the surgeon, Dr. James Finnegan who again pronounced Hernandez dead sending him back to Graves Registration and called on a second surgeon to concur also pronouncing the young Marine dead.

Roth began hollering "this Marine is alive" They continued working on Hernandez and found a faint pulse. Amazingly, Hernandez was pronounced dead three times before being sent to Japan for treatment. His injuries were so massive he never would have survived the plane ride home to the states.

Roth always remembered Hernandez wondering what the outcome was, wondering if he was alive or a name on the wall. He didn't know his first name and wondered if any of the names of Hernandez on the wall was the man in the morgue. For Hernandez it was like a dream. When he woke up, he only remembered the first time he was revived by Dr. Finnegan.

Neil McCrossen, of Springfield and a member of Roth's Darby's Post 598, was reading an article in VFW magazine about Hernandez and Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. McCrossen called Hernandez about Roth and he urged him to get in touch with Roth. After that phone call Roth wrote to Hernandez wondering if this was the man who left Dong Ha alive or if Hernandez, the man he revived had become a name was on the wall.

Though separated by miles, the two have worked for the same cause for years. Roth like Hernandez suffers from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder and works to help all veterans reclaim their lives. Hernandez is a member of Post 2350 and was in Washington D.C. on this day in March to lobby for veterans rights and meet the man who saved his life. Roth, with members from Darby Post 598, the Upper Darby Marine Corp League and family members came on bus from Collingdale to meet Hernandez welcoming him home. The two met embracing and hugging as onlookers took pictures with cameras and phones recording the event.

Like super heroes the two had faced staggering odds and now faced each other glad to see a miracle come out of Vietnam at this sacred memorial. After pictures were taken, Hernandez talked about his injuries emphasized the need to help the young veterans returning to American soil.

"All I remember is how I was treated when I came home, " Hernandez said. "People were hollering at me. I want to make sure veterans are not treated like us. I take pride in Iraq and Afghanistan veterans. I will help the vets until the day I die," said Hernandez.

Roth, a member of the Vietnam Veteran Motorcycle Club and a past commander of Darby Post 598 works with a support group helping young veterans cope with Post Traumatic Stress ran through the Upper Darby Marine Corp League.

Hernandez talked about his injuries and how grateful he was to Roth for saving his life.

"I was told I would never walk but you can see I'm walking," Hernandez said. If it wasn't for Graves, I wouldn't be here today. But Roth disputes the acknowledgement.

"I'm no hero. I'm a Marine. It's what we do. The heroes are on the wall. I didn't save his life. Four of us carried him back and forth. The guy who did the surgery saved his life. I was just doing a day's work in a bad place.

" After the two talked the group saluted those on the wall with a special tribute to Roth's friend Robert Stanek with prayers, laid wreaths, played taps and a final salute to those who gave all whose names are listed on the Wall. They exchanged patches and pins vowing to meet again.

"I have finally something positive about Vietnam to talk about, said Roth. You made it brother, welcome home."

DREAMS

by Craig W Tourte

I down loaded Barry Fixler's book "Super Cool" onto my Kindle yesterday and read about a quarter of it. I found Tom Eichler was Fixler's squad leader and his squad called Tom "Ike" and that during a patrol Fixler accidentally took a leak into Tom's helmet and never told him about it, it was pretty darn funny. But this post is not about "Super Cool" I'll save that for after I finish the book, which so far is pretty darn funny, an easy read and can be purchased through the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc PX.

I don't recall now what it was, but last night there was something that Fixler said in his book which triggered the thought of dreams. Now I have had two very vivid and reoccurring dreams during my life. The most prevalent is the reoccurring one I had involving the abuse I suffered at the hands of my step-father - who fortunately for him and me I suppose, is no longer with us - and which unfortunately on occasion still raises it's ugly head in the dark of night.

The second dream that I have is a vivid memory of when I was a young police officer many years ago, I used to dream about someone pointing a gun at me and when I attempted to fire my weapon the bullet would travel a few yards and then drop onto the ground. I have shared this with other police officers and this dream does not seem to be mine alone.

Subsequent to my service in Vietnam I have had other re-occurring dreams about that experience - none pleasant. Now to my point. I have no recall of having any dreams while serving 10 months on the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Now perhaps I did dream, but then with time, age and my current limited mental capacity I don't or can't recall what they were about. I have given this quite a bit of thought and have reached the unscientific conclusion that one must first be asleep in order to dream and sleep was something that neither I nor anyone I knew received in an adequate amount. I was always exhausted, on guard and sleep came in small spurts of time. Not enough I think to trigger my dream mechanism - to use a less than scientific term. So the question is, was it just me or did you dream, and if so, what was the primary subject matter, excluding dreams of the opposite sex or in some cases I'm sure don't ask, don't tell may apply - especially to some of the Navy guys.

Hey Craig

I wasn't a police officer but I have similar dreams. In my dreams I am confronting some sort of enemy, and I either can't find my weapon or I have a weapon, but can't find any ammo for it. In some cases I am actually shooting the enemy, but it has no effect.

You are not unusual about not dreaming at Khe Sanh during the siege. I was there for almost eleven months, and I did dream occasionally. But not during the siege. I am by no means an expert, but some of the guys I served with in 81's, and Bravo 1/26 as the FORO told me at reunions they didn't dream either.

I think the constant fear and the incoming had a great deal to do with it. Compound that with each of us losing close friends, I believe we just "Shut down". My nightmares come and go today, and I hardly dream good stuff. One of the most telling discussions about dreaming was with a good Khe Sanh friend who said to the VA Doctors re: PTSD was "My time in Nam has taken away my ability to have good dreams...PTSD has taken them away forever"!

It was after that exchange that they finally awarded him 100% T&P. I'm sure he is not alone and it is another price we pay for the siege of Khe Sanh. I don't have the wonderful writing skills and story-telling that you have but I think you know what I mean by this little story.

Semper Fi Craig and give Brother Weiss a hug for me when you see him.

POETRY

POW/MIA

How can I get where his head has been?
How can I feel what he has felt in his solitary prison?
How can I see what he has seen through his blood-shot eyes?
How can I know what he knows in the marrow of his bone and flesh?

I cannot.

How can I smell the filth of his body unwashed and bloody?
How can I feel his frayed nerves and pained heart?
How can I taste through his blood and urine?
How can I sleep on his dank, cold floor?

I cannot.

How can I see through the slits in his four by four box?
How can I touch the splinters of his bamboo bars?
How can I scoop the slop from his metal china?
How can I feel creatures crawl on my skin?

I cannot.

How can I know his absolute loneliness?
How can I see the depth of the abyss into which he has fallen?
How can I know the agony caused by his keeper's boots in his ribs?
How can I feel the sting of lashes as they descend on his decaying flesh?

I cannot.

How can I know the torment of thirst with water so near I can smell it?
How can I know the throbbing in his head when he thinks of home?
How can I feel dry tears run down his face when no tears are left?
How can I feel the desolation that fills the absence of hope?

I cannot. I came home.
How can I feel his chill as he wraps himself in his tattered rags?
How can I know his forlorn spirit as he thinks of his lost loved ones?
How can I share his hopelessness as he realizes home will never be again?
How can I fight back the tears as I take myself where he must have been or is?

I cannot. I came home. I am free.

But am I?

As long as he is there am I ever free?
As long as he is imprisoned or missing, am I with him?
Does his spirit cry out to mine asking me to find him somehow?
Have we forsaken him by not demanding more be done than has been?

Perhaps.

Does remembering him in prayer and in thought free him somehow?
Does keeping his memory and absence alive pass through time and space?
Can he know it and can he feel it, and know that we care but are as helpless as he?
Is there a chance thoughts penetrate his cell so he knows he is revered in our guilt?

I pray it is so.

Am I, in my own way, a prisoner in my own land, without respect?
Am I a pawn in the hands of false prophets as they disrespect his sacrifice?
Am I weak; unable to bring him home if he lives, as long as only words are said?
If he lives, does he even want to come to a home-land that left him behind and dead?

I am impotent. All I can offer is the promise that I will never forget.
I cannot feel his pain or know his loneliness and feeling of desertion.
I can tell him I am free but part of me can never be separated from him.
Even if I ignore his plight, I cannot disclaim my country's neglect of him.

It is our guilt. Remembering is our duty; no matter the war.

But one was worse than all the rest.
It is Vietnam.
In losing him we have lost honor.
In conceding victory we gave up the strength to bring him home.

I am home.
I will always remember.
Am I free?
Part of me can never be free as long as he is there.

My Unexpected Visit to Khe Sanh Hill 950 or Hill 1015 in April, 1968.

by Hugh D. Cox

(Updated on April 26, 2009) More recent Internet postings and photos about the mountains around Khe Sanh now convince me that I was on Hill 950 or Hill 1015 and not on Hill 861. My own photos show that the helicopter pilot flew to the north from Khe Sanh. I could not see the runway from whatever Hill I was dropped on because of a ridge. See diagram at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/File:Kasa.jpg . Good hill photos are at http://www.hmm-364.org/khesanh.html . A superb description of the battle for Hill 950 on June 6, 1968 is at http://www.khesanh.org/redclay/issue-60-memoirs.htm (scroll down).

In April 1968, I was a First Lieutenant with Army Special Forces assigned to MAC-SOG in Vietnam. I was given a mission to fly by Army helicopter to Khe Sanh to deliver intelligence documents to our Special Forces unit located within the Khe Sanh combat base.

The North Vietnamese siege of the base had ended and the U.S. Marines were dismantling much of the base. My flight was a routine one since the air strip at Khe Sanh was not under constant indirect fire. We flew over some of the most historic terrain of the Vietnam war including Camp Carroll, the Rock Pile, Highway 9 before we reached the airspace over Khe Sanh.

When we reached that area, I was astonished to see the bombing devastation on the hills and mountains surrounding the air strip - particularly to the West. Miles and miles of B-52 bomb craters pockmarked the landscape. There were tens of thousands of craters within sight.

As the helicopter descended, the pilot received an urgent mission to undertake a medical evacuation "medevac" from a U.S. Marine outpost. The pilot quickly gained altitude and flew northwest from the air strip to a mountain ridge about 3,000 feet high. When we approached the ridge, I could see that it was almost like a knife edge with very steep ridges dropping away from the long spine of the mountain. The pilot asked me to jump off when we reached the mountain top ridge. He explained that he needed no extra weight and promised he would return for me. As the only passenger, I jumped from about 10 feet above the ridge.

I was on Hill 950 or Hill 1015 I think and it was one of those war experiences one can never forget.

I was not certain how long I was there. Time spent waiting in a war is irrelevant.

This mountain ridge at Hill 861 was manned by "A" company, 1st Battalion of the 1st Marine Division (which had recently replaced K company of the 26th Marine Regiment) (I do not yet know the Marine Corps units on Hill 950 and Hill 1015.) I saw only a few Marines during my visit.

Several Marines were moving about. Each acted in very exhausted slow motion carrying canteens, supplies and ammunition back and forth. Their young faces all had heavy beards and deep set eyes. I simply watched them as I sat down with my briefcase and weapon. It was as if they had always been there in filthy, damp and torn uniforms. They moved deliberately in spite of their distant stares. They seemed so young and I felt so old at age 25. These Marines were experienced combat veterans deprived of adolescence. They carried simple things like water and food as if it was for holy communion. Anyone who saw them on that day in 1968 would be proud to be with them even for a short period of time.

No one spoke to me. These Marines seemed busy and unconcerned about my presence. It was as if I had always been there sitting on the ground in my clean uniform and green beret clutching my briefcase and M16.

Their defensive position along the mountain ridge was one of the most precarious I had ever seen. These Marines occupied the spine of the ridge for only about 10 meters down the steep ridges from the top. Then there was another 10 meters of cut down vegetation probably filled with mines. Beyond, the heavy jungle loomed just 20 to 30 meters away. The North Vietnamese could have been upon us within seconds. I looked over the other side of the ridge. The defensive setup was the same on both sides of the mountain. Hill 950 or 1015 seemed to be an invitation to attack.

I thought it was best to wait until I was spoken to. The Marines knew I was there. Army types know that Marines are different. I located a position to move to if needed. There were no fortifications on "my" part of the ridge. I tried not to show my growing anxiety.

This strategic combat location was the bloodiest Vietnam ridge I ever visited. Each attack on any of the Khe Sanh Hills was a potential enemy victory. Holding this ridge seemed doubtful to me. I admit I was scared.

I had read the reports of the battles along these mountains and ridges. Hundreds of Marines were killed or wounded in taking these hills. Brave NVA soldiers took even more casualties in those battles. In January, 1968, the Marines had to take some ridges more than once to secure them. Hill 861 came under serious attack again in July, 1968 - after my short visit. Once secured in January 1968, Hill 861 remained firmly in Marine hands.

Finally after a long period of sitting, I was approached by one young Marine who asked me how he could transfer to the Army. He seemed dead serious.

I do not remember my answer. We talked for a half hour in quiet tones while I constantly scanned the tree line below for enemy movement. Everyone knew the elite 324th NVA Division was in this area. Within a few hours, the helicopter returned to pick me up.

During my visit, I knew I was among special men who could be measured by a simple yardstick of courage and trust. Race, class and family background meant nothing on that ridge. I was deeply moved by each man's simple act of sharing with his brothers.

Since that day, I always speak of U.S. Marines in very respectful terms. I will never forget the Corps' finest on Hill 861.

VOICE FROM THE PAST

By Craig W Tourte

One of the Marines I spent 10 months on the Khe Sanh Combat Base with, was Edward Lawida. Ed was one of those give all, poster Marines, tough and unafraid, and the pride of any Marine Corps Recruiter. He quietly accepted all that was ordered of him, I never heard a complaint, grumble nor did I hear fear in his voice. Powerfully built with a funny Massachusetts accent to those lazy California ears of mine. Where he was always squared away, I was frumpy. Where he was an outstanding Marine, I was a sorry representative, where he was brave, I was frightened.

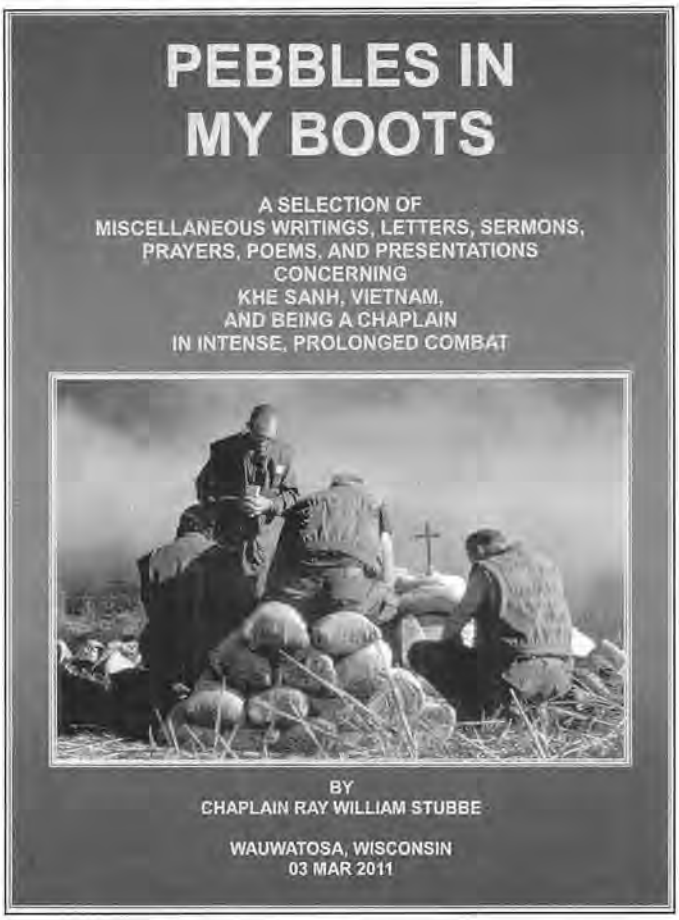
After his Vietnam tour Ed continued in the Marine Corps as an Embassy Guard in Moscow and even later, an additional assignment working with the CIA. I was amazed as we all huddled in the trench line during incoming, to look over at Ed and observe his arm extended upward as he recorded the incoming rockets and artillery shells and to see this big smile. I lost track of Ed after Vietnam, on occasion I'd pull out some old faded photographs and see Ed's face and wonder if he was still amongst us. Through the modern age of computers I found him some forty years later. He has now attended a couple of our reunions and still resides on the East coast. I talk to him on the telephone from time to time and look forward to seeing him once again at our reunion in Rochester Minnesota this July

At the Khe Sanh reunion held in Denver Colorado I reminded Ed about those recording he used to make, wondering if my voice and the voices of others could be heard. I knew the tapes he made were personal letters home but I was always fascinated about those tapes which contained the sound of incoming and wondered if my voice and the voices of others - some no longer with us - could be heard. Ed told me that he had not listened to the tapes since he returned home from Vietnam. I suggested that Ed have the tape recordings transferred to CD so that they would be saved and would not fade with time. A few months later Ed sent those tapes to me along with a small reel to reel recorder and suggested that I have the tapes recorded on CD if I wanted. Turns out the recorder was no longer operative so I had a friend who works in the recording industry make the copies for me.

After almost 6 months I received those tapes back, the voices and sounds now professionally recorded on CD. It took me a few days to get up the nerve to listen to them. I reserved an evening that was dark and quiet and sat alone as I listened to his voice for what seemed like hours. It was haunting and unsettling to listen to the words he spoke so many years ago, as he related to his sister the various actions, his most personal feelings, loss of friends and experiences he was going through and most poignant his desire to return home to family and friends. The CD's were clear as if he was sitting right next to me and as I listened, mysteriously the tears flowed down my cheeks.

There were however, no recordings of the incoming. I was exhausted when I had finished and didn't sleep at all the rest of the night and poorly for the next several. I boxed the tapes and CD's and sent them along to Ed wondering if he would ever listen to them. I am occasionally reminded by a childhood friend that he still maintains the letters I had written to him while I was at Khe Sanh and he has offered to let me read them. Each time I have turned him down, not really having an answer as to why, even to this day, I am unable to read the words I wrote. I know he does not understand and I am not sure I understand myself, but for some unknown reason I can't seem to find the sturdiness to read them. Just something deep down in my psyche, perhaps some day, but not today, nor anytime soon.

BOOK REVIEW



Ray Stubbe's lastest Book is a Selection of Miscellaneous Writings, Letters, Sermons, Prayers, Poems and Presentations concerning Khe Sanh Vietnam, and being a Chaplain in intense, Prolonged Combat.

The various prayers, sermons, talks, presentations, letters, reports, and poems in this collection reflect the experience of intense and prolonged combat as well as an entire 21-year active military service and the attempt to understand and derive meaning of it within the framework of a Christian perspective. In many ways, this collection is a parable for all Christians living in the world, "in the world and not of it," in the world as the channel of God's Presence bringing blessing, peace, love, forgiveness, salvation, healing, call to justice, challenge to become whole and generally maximize the precious gift of a fragile, precious, and tenuous live.

Many ask: What was Khe Sanh all about? What are your Vietnam experiences? How do you deal with it? How has Vietnam affected your life? What is PTSD? Why did you stay in the military? What does a chaplain do? My answers to all of these queries and much more is somewhat, even if dimly, reflected in this collection.

Because this compilation includes several different presentations and talks to widely differing groups, many incidents and stories are repeated.

I am especially grateful to Mr. Tom Eichler who has devoted so many of his years and efforts for our Khe Sanh Vets for meticulously editing this compilation of documents for typographical errors, designing the cover, and getting it printed. Without Tom's dedicated efforts, this book would not have been possible.

Because of the wide variety of "audiences," these will not be understood, of interest, or of value to most, and perhaps the effort of &:ywv quarens intellectum lIIagony'-{the Greek word for athletic contest!) seeking understanding," to make rational what is inherently irrational, is as futile as Sisyphus attempting to roll the stone up the hill, only to have it continuously roll down and never to rest on top of the hill!. Yet, the attempt perhaps may be understood in terms of the Greek IlUO't~pLOV ("mystery," not as an enigma to be solved, but rather as something that draws us into deeper and deeper layers of meaning) as one is goaded in an almost Faustian quest to gain a more complete understanding because these experiences remain as pebbles in one's boots, impeding one's progress in the journey of life. It is precisely in this pain that one meets God who is found on the Cross, who is with us no matter where we are. The pebbles must be acknowledged. The quest of seeking understanding or placing them within God's Presence in prayer, discloses my soul, which is reflected in these words as in a mirror.

ED NOTE:

Ray has put his heart and soul into his latest book. The book is beautifully done in vibrant colors (See PX Pictures), and it is only being sold in the Khe Sanh Veterans PX, price $ 10.00. I only printed a few hundred copies so get one as quick as you can before they are all gone. They are currently available for shipping.

POETRY

To my comrades who sleep in the cool earth under the shadows of monuments, you do not have to hear the platitudes of politicians, or shield your eyes from the glare of medals nor stand interminably in formations under noon day suns

Sleep peacefully while wrens debate and longleaf pines whisper your names, reverberating memories in the beating hearts of those who love you still.

California Military History Museum & Presentation by Col. Bruce Clarke (ret) Author of "Expendable Warriors."

By Craig W. Tourte

On March 19, 2011, I along with Steve Wiese (B/1/26), Marco Soto (A/1/26) and David Lind (H&S 2/4) attended a presentation by Colonel Bruce Clarke (ret) held at the California Military History Museum located in Sacramento, California. Colonel Clarke is the author of the book "Expendable Warriors," "The Battle of Khe Sanh and the Vietnam War." The book explains that "On January 21, 1968, nine days before the Tet Offensive, thousands of North Vietnamese soldiers attacked the U.S. Marine base at Khe Sanh in remote northwestern South Vietnam. The ensuing siege ended seventy-seven days later in a tactical victory for the United States, which eventually abandoned the base, making it a heartbreaking and controversial symbol of American involvement in Vietnam. Bruce Clarke participated in the battle as a young U.S. Army officer advising the Marines, and his book combines his firsthand experiences and archival research to describe the saga of Khe Sanh."

The California Military History Museum is the state's official military museum and houses over 30,000 artifacts as well as a library and archives. The museum also has five satellite museums at Camp Roberts in Southern Monterey County, Camp San Luis Opispo, Fresno Air National Guard Base, the Los Alamitos Joint Forces Training Base in Orange County and the National Guard Armory in San Diego. I noted the Museum appeared to have an abundance of items associated with the United States Army and was told by Museum Director, Dan Sebby that the Museum was primarily Army focused. All of the war's this nation has been involved in are represented with uniforms and artifices of that time period. (PIC # 1 & 1A)

The lecture was held on the second floor of the museum. I introduced myself to Colonel Clarke and asked him if it would be permissible to hang the red "Khe Sanh Veterans of Northern California" banner I had brought along. Colonel Clarke was kind enough to agree and welcomed our attendance.(Pic # 2) His presentation included a PowerPoint display of various photographs and grafts from his book, his articulate lecture reflected his intelligence and superior education at West Point and the University of California Los Angeles. As is stated in the forward of the book written by John W. Vessy, General, U.S. Army (retired), "As a young Captain and district advisor he (Clarke) led the valiant defense of the District Headquarters (located at Khe Sanh village) against an enemy force of possible regimental size..." "The fight around the village, in my opinion, ranks among the most resounding victories at Khe Sanh, and has never been adequately or correctly reported in extant histories."

Colonel Clarke's lecture covered the full range of that battle and concluded with his describing his command of troops in the defense of the Army FOB -3 compound located next to the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Colonel Clarke and the men under his command at the Khe Sanh Village District Headquarters and later the defense of the FOB-3 compound were all gallant and extremely brave against overwhelming odds. They persevered with courage, sacrifice and honor. As expected, Colonel Clarkes interpretation of events that occurred at the combat base were slightly different than recollections of some of the former Marines who were in attendance, but still, it was interesting to hear his views on the siege and the interaction between the Army and Marine Corps command structure.

Colonel Clarke was presented with a couple of remembrances of appreciation for presenting his lecture in Sacramento and he in turn presented Museum Director Dan Sebby with one of the newly designed gold Khe Sanh challenge coins.

LAM SON 719

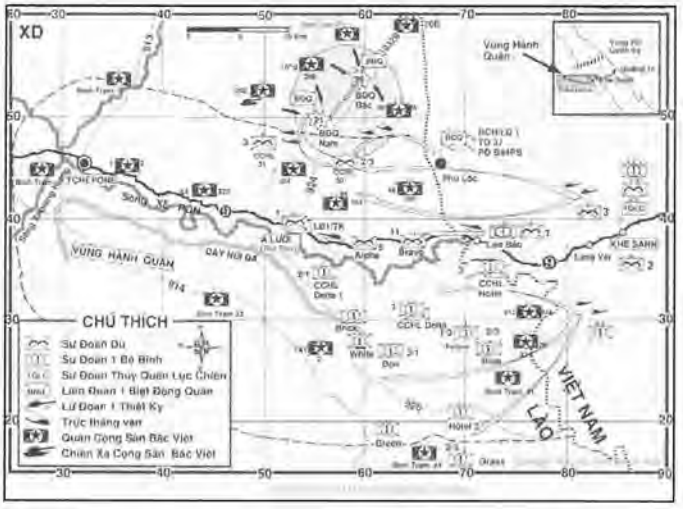
This is probably one of the most misunderstood or misinterpreted operations of the entire Viet Nam War.

ED NOTE:

This Article is one of the best synopsis of Operation Lam Son. It was taken From the Military Images Web Site. It best describes the use of the Khe Sanh Base which our membership heroically defended for so long.

As early as 1967 U.S. planners had planned a ground offensive against Laos to interdict the Ho Chi Minh Trail but had determined that 5 to 7 U.S. – ARVN divisions would be needed. Because the troops were not available and the political climate was never favorable, the idea was put on the back burner but kept simmering.

On December 8, 1970, the plan was re-examined because intelligence was following a PAVN logistical build-up in southeastern Laos. The Vietnamization process along with the gradual reduction of U.S. troops was threatened. The plan became known as Dewey Canyon II (the movement of U.S. supporting troops to the border)/ Lam Son 719 (the ARVN controlled incursion) and had two options: if the North Vietnamese fell back under the attack as they did in Cambodia, then the ARVN would move down the Trail destroying everything they came across. If the North Vietnamese put up resistance then the ARVN was to cause as much damage as possible and conduct a fighting withdrawal back into South Vietnam.



Somehow the 5-7 division estimate was overlooked because in February, 1971, only three ARVN divisions would be involved– the 1st Airborne Division, the 1st Infantry Division, and the Marine Division, supported by the 1st Ranger Group, the 1st Armored Brigade and the 5th Regiment of the 2cnd Division – some of the best troops the ARVN had. What was overlooked was that Hanoi had deployed an entire army corps (70B) made up of the 9th, 19th, 29th and 39th infantry regiments backed up by the 208th, 304th, 320th and 324th Divisions as well as the 202nd armored regiment. The corps was well equipped with 19 or 20 air defense battalions with 23mm, 37mm and 57mm. Hanoi's plan was to smash the offensive and then counterattack along Route 9 towards Tchepone.

The Dewey Canyon II part of the operation began when a task force from the 1st Bde of 5th Mech consisting of elements of the 1st Battalion, 61st Infantry (Mechanized), the 1st Battalion, 77th Armor, the 3d Squadron, 5th Cavalry, and Troop A, 4th Squadron, 12th Cavalry left Quang Tri at 0400 29 January with the mission of establishing logistical bases, keeping Route QL-9 open to the border and covering the withdrawal of the South Vietnamese. By nightfall the task force rolled into Fire Support Base Vandergrift. Because Route 9 was known to be in such a poor state of repair, at midnight Troop A, 3rd Squadron, 5th Cavalry and two engineer companies led out on foot following a bulldozer with headlights blazing. When a damaged bridge or other obstacle was encountered, a few cavalrymen and engineers were left behind while the rest of the task force moved on. The next morning, the cavalry troop vehicles moved out and joined the group on foot and arrived at Khe Sanh at 1400 on 1 February. With Highway 9 opened from Vandergrift to Khe Sanh, the road was opened all the way to the border by elements of the 1st Squadron, 1st Cav the following day

Following close behind the 5th Mech task force were four battalions of the US 108th Artillery Group. On 29 January, the 2nd Battalion 94th (175mm/8in) Artillery arrived at LZ Vandergrift along with the 5th Battalion (155mm SP) 4th Artillery. The Battalions were escorted by 1/44th Dusters and Quad 50's with two Dusters assigned to each firing battery, with the Quads and a searchlight going to battalion headquarters. 1/44th was assigned for convoy and perimeter duty. On 1 February, the 8th Battalion (175mm/8in) 4th Artillery moved through FSB Vandergrift to a position on the Khe Sanh Plains that was given the name Firebase Flexible. The 5/4 artillery moved to the old Special Forces camp at Lang Vei

On 4 February, the 2/94 artillery also moved to Lang Vei. A Battery (8 inch) was moved south and located on a forward slope where they had unobstructed coverage of Highway 9 into Laos. The battalion was given a new mission of general support for ARVN I Corps artillery with priority fires to the 1st ARVN Airborne Division. In this capacity on 8 February, the first day of Lam Son 719 A Battery fired a prep on LZ Yellow and B Battery fired on LZ Blue. B & C Batteries with 175 mm guns could shoot an additional 5 kilometers into Laos then the 8 inch guns of A Battery, even though A Battery was located eleven kilometers further west then B & C Batteries. That evening at 2000 A Battery received the first of many incoming rounds they would experience in the next few weeks. 8/4 Artillery occupied positions from Lang Vei north at Ta Bet and Halfway Point as general support for the area north of Highway 9.

There was a big sign at the border, "NO US PERSONNEL BEYOND THIS POINT." The sign, of course, had no relevance for those flying over it. But because no Americans would cross the border on the ground, then the U.S. advisors would remain in South Vietnam and the ARVN would have to do their own coordinating of supporting fires, helicopters and air support. Never been done before. Even though the planning for Dewey Canyon II and Lam Son 719 was a carefully guarded secret and only a few individuals knew what was really being planned, all written plans had to be translated and there were enough communist sympathizers among the translators to provide Hanoi with complete sets of documentation as quickly as it was delivered to South Vietnamese and US Army commanders.

At 1000 on 8 February M-41 tanks and M-113 APCs of the lead elements of the RVN 1st Armor Brigade, the 11th and 17th Cavalry Regiments (fewer then 17 M-41 tanks between them) crossed the border into Laos. Lam Son 719 had begun as the two units, accompanied by two South Vietnamese airborne battalions, moved 9 kilometers down Highway 9. Intelligence reports had indicated that the terrain along Route 9 in Laos was favorable for armored vehicles. The reality was that Highway 9 was a neglected forty-year-old, single-lane road, with high shoulders on both sides and no maneuver room. As the units moved forward they were surprised to find the entire area was cratered by bombs and long overgrown with dense grass and bamboo. The Cav units had to stay on the road.

Here politics had raised its ugly head. Because U.S. low level recon had been forbidden until just one hour before the first airmobile assaults, the condition of the roads would be a complete surprise. All five available air cavalry troops had been consolidated under the control of the U.S. 2d Squadron, 17th Cavalry with the task of locating and destroying antiaircraft weapons, finding enemy concentrations, and carrying out reconnaissance and security missions, including the rescue of air crews downed in Laos. To give them complete autonomy, they were placed under the control of XXIV Corps. Thus, there was no early recon of roads and no recon of North Vietnamese antiaircraft positions, leaving the air cavalry to screening the landing zones just before the assaults. The Air Cav troops performed magnificently. The rule of no Americans on the ground in Laos included the Blues of the air cavalry, so they were replaced with the Hac Bao of the ARVN 1st Inf Div, an arrangement that was satisfactory in all respects

1st Aviation Brigade was reluctant to have too many of its assets transferred to the 101st Airborne Division because the two battalions available were scheduled to stand down and one of the battalions the 223rd) was a fixed wing battalion, not a combat assault battalion, and needed a quick conversion to a CAB. Quickly, 1st Aviation Bde pulled detachments with helicopter S-3 and S-4 experience and sent them to the 223rd Assault helicopter companies had been moved from as far away as Ninh Hoa and there was a concern that the NVA might believe that the country had been stripped of aviation assets, so the powers that be added an entire layer of call signs on top of the aviation call signs that had always been used. "Dolphin 26" was now "boats 26." Gunship units stubbornly stuck to their old call signs which made them easier to identify. UHF communications were limited because the battalion hdgt's were located at Quang Tri. This was resolved when battalion forward locations were established at Khe Sanh. From about the middle of February on, the weather became a factor when many of the LZ's were socked in until noon or later.

While the 1st Armored Bde was struggling down Highway 9, helicopters under control of the 223rd and 158th Aviation Battalions were crossing into Laos loaded with ARVN troops. Three battalions of the 3d Regt, 1st ARVN Inf Div air assaulted into FBs HOTEL and BLUE south of Route 9. Two battalions of the 1st ARVN Abn Div air assaulted into LZ 30 and LZ 31 north of Route 9. The 21st ARVN Ranger battalion was air assaulted into LZ RANGER SOUTH. 105mm batteries quickly followed and were landed on LZs HOTEL, 30 and 31 by Chinooks.

As the first troops consolidated their positions on the LZ's, the air cavalry moved out to reconnoiter the front and flanks, seeking landing areas and destroying antiaircraft positions. But the demand for gunships became heavy as units on the ground encountered NVA troops. In the air cavalry, emphasis shifted to locating enemy troop concentrations and indirect fire weapons that posed an immediate threat to South Vietnamese forces. Thus, long-range reconnaissance was sacrificed for fire support. The air cavalry screened the 1st Armor Brigade's advance along Route 9 all the way to Aloui, which the brigade reached in the afternoon of 10 February. Within three days Vietnamese airmobile forces on the ridgelines to the north and south had moved abreast of Aloui.

On 12 February, the 39th Ranger Battalion was airlifted to a location named Ranger North, three km northeast of Ranger South. The two ranger battalions were northern flank security for FSB 30 and 31 protecting the north side of the main attack route down Highway 9. Headquarters of the 1st Ranger Group was located at Ta Bat, and artillery support from the 64th Artillery Bn (105 mm) was located at Phu Loc north of Khe Sanh. The area was made accessible by a secondary road, known as Red Devil Road that ran roughly parallel to Route 9, from Fire Support Base Elliott to Khe Sanh. Constructed by the 3d Squadron, 5th Cavalry, and elements of the 7th Engineer Battalion, Red Devil Road allowed the 3rd Squadron, 5th Cavalry to continue operations north of Khe Sanh until 7 April.

The main thrust along Highway 9 made by the armored and airborne units halted at Aloui and waited for orders, but orders from I Corps and the Airborne Division conflicted The 1st Airborne Division was unable to keep the route open and heavy rains set in making the road impassable. The armor and airborne troops had to be resupplied by air and in their static position they became a target for intense enemy fire; losses in men and equipment mounted. Eventually a point was reached when the 1st Armor Brigade could not, if it had been ordered, move west of Aloui.

The U.S. 175 batteries were moved from Lang Vei to Lao Bao, a bulge in the border near where Highway 9 crossed. They were now farther west then any U.S. maneuver battalion and began coming under intense artillery fire from 122 and 152 mm guns. Counter battery radar was kept busy

On 14 February, patrols from the 39th Ranger Battalion on Ranger North began making contact with PAVN forces. Artillery from the 64th Artillery at Phu Loc was called for support. By 1600 all the companies of the battalion were engaged and more artillery was called for, this time C/44th located on FSB 30 added its support. Under intense artillery fire, the NVA pulled back allowing the Rangers to consolidate their position. On the following day the Rangers engaged in aggressive patrolling and killed 43 NVA and captured two 37mm AA guns. This was ominous, it indicated a large unit in the area and that the PAVN intended to push the attack. In fact, three PAVN regiments were closing in on the Ranger positions.

The NVA maneuvered its large units until the 18th when again they attacked in strength. With strong artillery support, this time including 175mm from the 2/94th at Lao Bao, the Rangers held on. During the 19th and 20th the attacks continued until finally on the afternoon of the 20th there was no more contact with the artillery forward observers. The 39th had abandoned its positions and evaded back to Ranger South rather then surrender. For three days the Air Cav had not been able to penetrate the weather and resupply the 39th and had been only able to offer limited support. When Air Cav finally got to the LZ late on the 20th, they counted over 600 NVA bodies in the positions. The CO of the 2/17 Air Cavalry wrote, "We could not re-supply them for three days. When ammunition was about to run out, they got out of their positions, counter-attacked then continued to fight with captured weapons." That night flares lit up the sky over Ranger South and in the morning the attacks started. For four days and nights the 21st Ranger Battalion and the remains of the 39th held their positions. Between NVA attacks, the LZ was bombarded with 122 mm rockets and artillery.

On the morning of the 25th, the Rangers were ordered to evacuate the LZ. Again the 64th and C/44th artillery were directed to maximize fire-support for the rangers. About 1000, a flight of helicopters escorted by four Cobra gun-ships extracted the Rangers and took them to FSB 30. Later, all but one company were evacuated to Phu Loc.

At the same time NVA pressure had begun to build at Ranger North, and the South Vietnamese command was debating whether to continue the drive west, pressure on FSB 31 was increasing. On the morning of 18 February it was obvious a full blown coordinated tank-infantry attack with supporting fire from artillery and rockets was underway. I Corps ordered the 17th Armored Cavalry north from Aloui to reinforce Landing Zone 31. The airborne division modified the order to stop south of the landing zone and wait to see if the site was overrun. Neither headquarters had eyes on the scene. As a result of the confusion, the 17th Armored Cavalry augmented with tanks from the 11th Armored Cavalry did not arrive at Landing Zone 31 until 19 February when some airborne units had already been pushed back.

In the first battle between North Vietnamese and South Vietnamese tanks, a tank in the 1st Squadron, 11th Armored Cavalry Regiment, destroyed a North Vietnamese T54 tank. The South Vietnamese forces retook a portion of the landing zone by the end of the day. Six T54's and sixteen PT76's were destroyed, with none of the South Vietnamese M41's lost. Direct and indirect fire continued to pound the airborne troops, and finally, on the 25th the 17th Armored Cavalry Regiment and the Third Airborne Battalion were pushed off the landing zone to the south. 120 ARVN soldiers were trapped on the LZ and captured as well as the headquarters for the 3rd Bde of the Airborne Division.

After Landing Zone 31 fell, the airborne units were pulled out and the 17th Armored Cavalry was left on its own southeast of the LZ under heavy enemy pressure. A major attack at noon on 27 February was repulsed by the cavalry supported by tactical air and air cavalry gunships. Twelve PT76's and three T54's were destroyed at a cost of three armored cavalry assault vehicles. Still the cavalry remained in its location only to be attacked again on 1 March. This ended up being a night battle supported by South Vietnamese artillery, U.S. tactical air strikes, and cavalry gunships. Six B-52 arc light missions were used on Tac air targets. Fifteen enemy tanks were destroyed at a cost of six armored cavalry assault vehicles.

The commander of the 1st Airborne Division failed to either support the 17th Armored Cavalry or to pull it back, in spite of recommendations from the American advisor of the armored brigade or the acting advisor of his division. On 3 March the Vietnamese Chief of Armor, after consulting with the I Corps commander, intervened by radio and ordered the 17th Cavalry south to more defensible ground under cover of air support from I Corps. By this time the cavalry was surrounded on three sides and would have to retreat through direct tank fire. The move succeeded and the cavalry eventually fought its way back to the 1st Brigade at Aloui.

As February drew to a close, the ARVN I Corps commander assessed his situation. His main thrust was no longer viable, his right flank had disintegrated, but the PAVN attack had lost its momentum and under heavy pressure from the air had not been able to deliver a crushing blow from the north that could carry beyond Highway 9. The 1st ARVN Infantry Division was intact and relatively undisturbed on the south, and he had the Marine Division in reserve at Khe Sanh. Aviation assets were largely intact. The OH-6's and OH-58's had been withdrawn as scouts because they were too vulnerable in the 12.7 rich environment, but the scout role had been taken over by groups of 2 – 6 Cobra's working with a C in C UH-1H and were very successful, their speed and agility allowing them to avoid the NVA AA fire.

The NVA tanks were a threat in being, but whenever they were spotted the reaction was swift and violent. One round fired by B Battery, 2/94 landed between two PT76's and flipped them both upside down. When the air cavalry encountered tanks for the first time, high explosive antitank (HEAT) rockets were not available, so what was used was whatever ordnance was on board. The Cobra gun-ships opened fire at maximum range, using 2.75-inch flechette rockets to eliminate enemy troops riding on the outside of the tank and to force the crew to close the hatches. As the gun run continued, high-explosive and white phosphorus rockets and 20-mm. cannon fire were used against the tank itself. Eventually HEAT rockets became available, but they were not always effective. Although these rockets were capable of penetrating armor plate, they could do so only in direct hits. Engagements therefore had to take place at ranges of 900 to 1,200 meters, distances that exposed the gunship to the tank's heavy machine gun and to supporting infantry weapons. Between 8 February and 24 March, air cavalry teams sighted 66 tanks, destroyed 6, and immobilized 8. Most of the tanks, however, were turned over to fixed wing aircraft, which could attack with heavier ordnance.

The collapsed northern flank had served its purpose in giving early warning of large PAVN units on the move toward Highway 9. NVA tanks had been unable to close with the 1st Armored Brigade but the brigade in its present position was nothing more then static pillboxes that themselves needed to be protected. The brigade was strengthened with additional units as they became available including three companies of tanks, however, the reinforcement was so piecemeal that it was difficult to tell just who or what was committed. Many units never reached Aloui and simply plugged up the withdrawal. Only one-third of the cavalry squadrons and two-thirds of the tank squadrons available to I Corps were used in Laos, amounting to five tank squadrons and six armored cavalry squadrons total.

As the I Corps commander reviewed the situation at the end of February, withdrawal seemed premature without another attempt on the objective, so the Marine Division was moved into locations vacated when the 1st ARVN Infantry leapfrogged toward LZ Hope. One incident that may or may not have influenced his decision was that the BBC had already announced South Vietnamese troops had occupied Tchepone.

On 2 March, the 7th Marine Battalion, 147th Brigade, was inserted into Fire Support Base Delta. Over the next three days, the 147th Brigade Headquarters and the 2d and 4th Battalions were also brought into Delta. During this same time the 258th Brigade was inserted at FSB Hotel.

The first part of the assault on Tchepone required the 1st Battalion of the 1st Infantry Regiment to be inserted at Landing Zone Lolo, 13 kilometers southeast of Tchepone on 3 March. Twice the landing had been postponed and twice additional prep fires were brought in to suppress NVA fire on the LZ itself. Finally the NVA were driven out of their trenches, retreating west. Still the landing was very hot with 11 helicopters shot down and 44 others damaged by ground fire. Once the LZ was secure, 105 mm howitzers were airlifted in. On 5 March, troops were assaulted into LZ Sophia to protect the south flank of the main attack. The LZ was well protected by anti-aircraft up to 23 mm and the helicopters suffered, with three shot down on the first lift.

6 March would be the day for the final assault into Tchepone. Prep fires for the assault included everything from B-52s to the 175's at Lao Bao. B-52's literally blew the tops off of mountains revealing underground storage facilities. U.S. tactical air strikes or air cover sorties were scheduled every 10 minutes. One hundred twenty U.S. helicopters assembled at Khe Sanh but were forced to depart 90 minutes earlier then planned because of incoming fire, however, preparations for this part of the operation had been so carefully planned that no problems resulted and when the first aircraft dropped off the 2/2 Battalion at Landing Zone Hope, four kilometers northeast of Tchepone, only incidental gunfire was encountered.

The North Vietnamese had not anticipated such a move and could not react quickly enough to stop it. By nightfall, 276 helicopter sorties (some aircraft making three trips) had landed about 5,000 ARVN troops against a loss of seven helicopters.

Tchepone itself was just a small village but around it the PAVN had established sanctuary base 604, the main base for attacks in Quang Tri Province, and base 611, south of 604 and closer to the border, used to launch attacks against the city of Hue and Thua Thien province. These base areas consisted of many small storage depots and five large storage areas, each between 1 to 2 square kilometers, stocked with weapons, ammunitions, logistic supplies, medical supplies and rations. Other areas around Tchepone were used for troop replacement and training. For a week ARVN troops wandered about the two base camps methodically destroying everything in sight or using artillery, Tac air or gunships to destroy the depots. Over 9,700 secondary explosions were documented, sometimes continuing for a half hour after the initial strike. The NVA were in a state of shock at Tchepone, over 5,000 were killed in the depot area - mostly rear area troops or troops in rest centers - with another 69 captured as air cavalry roamed the area unopposed. Thousands of tons of enemy supplies were destroyed and a POL pipeline was cut in several places. Almost 4,000 captured enemy weapons were airlifted out and brought back to Viet Nam.

As the ARVN troops began moving down Route 914 to the south, the PAVN forces finally began to react and started putting up stiffer resistance each successive day as the NVA 2cnd Division moved north. Generals Abrams and Weyand saw a tremendous opportunity to strike a mortal blow, with the exception of the 2cnd Division, PAVN units were being withdrawn from the battle area, there was no general reinforcement of 70B Corps. Abrams tried to get President Thieu to commit the 2cnd ARVN Division into Tchepone to create what they saw as the only single decisive battle in the entire war, and one that could cripple the PAVN so badly the war might be won. Thieu agreed about the strategic possibilities but settled the question with one statement, he wanted a U.S. division to go also. With the current political climate in the U.S., both knew it would never happen, and so was squandered the possibility of cutting the jugular of all NVA operations in the south. Even though the I Corps commander had control of the 2cnd Division, he would not make the move without Thieu's approval, so he waited while his corps was becoming ever more endangered. Finally, Thieu's response was to order a withdrawal.

The withdrawal began from positions around Tchepone and Sophia West overland to LZ Liz. Two battalions and the 2nd Regiment CP were extracted to FB Sophia East and then on to FB Delta 1. The next day two more battalions moved to LZ Brown. The 1st Regiment continued operations in base area 611 southwest of LZ Lolo while the 3rd Regiment worked southwest of Delta1 and LZ Brown.

PAVN forces were still not organized enough to contest these evacuations but it would be a different story four days later when it was time to evacuate LZ LOLO. The NVA had almost an entire division in place at LOLO to confront the three battalions of the 1st Infantry Division that were being evacuated. The evacuations continued and the attacks grew in intensity until finally the only troops left were 420 men of the 4th Battalion. Over the next two days this unit was reduced to 88 men taking cover in a ravine and commanded by a sergeant. Finally, on the afternoon of 18 March, the last 36 battered survivors were pulled from the LZ.

LZ Sophia East, also known as Sophia II, located east of LOLO was to be evacuated on 20 March. The U.S. Air Force and Army helicopters flew 1,388 gunship sorties, 270 tactical air strikes and 11 B-52 missions dropping 909 tons of bombs, and by 1300 hours, the 3d Battalion, 2d Regiment, 1st Infantry Division was extracted and taken to Khe Sanh. Twenty eight of the 40 helicopters involved in the lift were hit. A short distance away, the 4/2 Battalion was left on the ground when the lead helicopter in the flight was hit by fire and exploded in the air causing the evacuation to be aborted. The 4/2 was later evacuated under fire from LZ Brown.

On 18 March it was discovered that the NVA were gathering a regimental size unit northwest of Aloui, so the 1st Armor Brigade was ordered to withdraw by the I Corps commander. To cover the withdrawal, he allocated two U.S. air cavalry troops to the airborne division. It was at this point that the most severe command difficulties within the ARVN came to light. The 1st Armor Brigade had been placed under the control of the airborne division, but the division had no idea what to do with the armored troops and often they were left to fend for themselves. The airborne division commander was senior to the I Corps commander and was extremely miffed about the situation, even refusing to attend command briefings. And President Thieu tolerated the situation. So as the 11th Armored Cavalry Regiment acting as rear guard to the 1st Armor Brigade abandoned Aloui, no Air Cav was to be seen. The Air Cav had been ordered to support airborne battalions in other locations.

Between Aloui and Landing Zone Alpha, the armored column was ambushed at a stream crossing and four M41 tanks were abandoned in the middle of the stream isolating the 11th Armored Cavalry on the west bank. The airborne soldiers abandoned the cavalry and kept on marching east down QL 9. No reinforcements were sent and no recovery vehicles came to remove the abandoned tanks. The 11th fought on alone, and after three hours cleared a way across but had to leave seventeen disabled vehicles on the west side of the stream. The NVA used the vehicles as machine gun positions until the vehicles were destroyed on 25 March.

On 20 March the armor brigade reached Landing Zone Alpha, regrouped, and moved on. Still no air cavalry. The next morning the hapless 11th Armored Cavalry was leading when the brigade was ambushed three kilometers east of Fire Support Base Bravo. Air strikes were called in, one accidentally hitting the South Vietnamese with napalm, killing twelve and wounding seventy-five. The brigade pulled back west to regroup and were informed by a prisoner that two North Vietnamese regiments were waiting in ambush farther east. Less then 5 kilometers from South Vietnam, the column turned south abandoning the road. Unknown to them, the airborne division had combat assaulted troops north of the ambush and cleared it. The armor column was never informed that the road was clear and after two difficult river crossings and a 17 kilometer detour cross country, finally reached South Vietnam and linked up with the U.S. 1st/ 77th Armor. A MACV advisor to the Armored Brigade met the column at the border and counted the vehicles, 25 out of 62 tanks and 64 out of 162 APC's returned; the totals included those vehicles added as reinforcements . Sadly, most had not been combat loss, they had broken down or ran out of gas and been abandoned.

The next day, the 1st Armored Brigade and a paratrooper battalion were ordered to go back and recover the 17 damaged tanks and APCs left behind by the 11th Cav. Once again American air cover had been promised and once again it was diverted. The brigade succeeded in picking up the vehicles and had the 17 vehicles in tow when, once again, they were ambushed crossing a river near Aloui. The four lead M-41 tanks were hit with RPG's blocking the route. For three hours the South Vietnamese fought to survive until the disabled tanks were pushed aside and the column could move. All the vehicles that were being towed as well as the four M41's were left behind and later destroyed by Cobras.

Starting on 18 March, the NVA 324B Division had gradually closed around the LZ's held by the Marines. On Fire Support Base Delta, the 147th Marine Brigade Headquarters received 400 incoming rounds that killed eight marines. The 7th Battalion maneuvering outside the LZ received about the same number of rounds and medevaced five wounded. An NVA defector from the 812th Regiment, 324B Division told the Marines that the entire 324B Division was committed to what the PAVN called the "Route 9 campaign" with its 29th, 803d and 812th regiments. The 29th Regiment had been beaten up pretty badly, but the 812th Regiment was intact and was engaging the 258th Marine Brigade at LZ Hotel. Positioned around Delta were about 10 antiaircraft guns entrenched on the mountain slopes around the base that could not be silenced. The 7th Marine Battalion operating outside the LZ was under constant pressure from fire and ground attacks. They reported that the enemy even used a noxious gas and tank mounted flame throwers.

On 19 March it was discovered that the 308th NVA Division with its 36th, 102d and 88th regiments was maneuvering to attack from the north. The 258th Brigade on Hotel was constantly under pressure and FSB Delta was encircled. The 2d and 4th Battalions were stopped when they tried to reinforce the base. Five of the ten 105-mm howitzers were out of action due to the enemy fire. NVA troops reached the defense perimeter and dug in making helicopter resupply impossible, but the 7th Marine Battalion and the troops of the 147th Brigade could hold on because they had a ten day reserve of supplies.

At LZ Delta a fierce attack began at dawn of 21 March by the 29th and 803d Regiments of the 324B Division supported by very accurate mortar and direct artillery fire said to be from tank guns. 175-mm guns provided close support as well as 13 Tac air sorties and a B-52 mission that was diverted to the area. A prisoner of war later reported that a battalion lost 400 men from the B-52 strike. The NVA attack was stopped and the base held, but they had used up their reserve of supplies. A resupply effort was successful, seven U.S. UH-1H helicopters brought ammunition and took out wounded but an eighth helicopter was shot down. Two nights later LZ Delta was abandoned under cover of a B-52 strike. The Marines conducted an orderly withdrawal to Hotel that met no opposition.

For 24 March the 14th CAB daily log contains the entry, "LZ Hotel was evacuated without incident." All South Vietnamese military units were now out of Laos, although for more then a week South Vietnamese soldiers, Marines and American helicopter crewmen would be showing up at U.S. firebases after walking out. So ended Lam Son 719.

LAMSON 719 would never have been undertaken without the massive helicopter support available. One question is; did the large number of aviation losses sustained justify the operation? It did raise questions about the use of helicopters in the assault role.

American aircraft losses to inventory included ten OH-6As, eight OH-58s, 53 UH-1Hs, 26 AH-1Gs, three CH-47s and two CH-53s. The VNAF also lost seven UH-1Hs. Combat damage accounted for the loss of 90 helicopters while the rest were lost to non -combat related incidents. Damage not resulting in loss figures are difficult to pin down. There were 644 aircraft damage incidents to 451 different aircraft reported, but this does not impact availability figures because few damaged aircraft were down more then 24 hours. A very effective recovery operation brought back almost all aircraft that were salvageable and more then a few that weren't. Losses to helicopter crews in the 45 days of combat flying over Laos amounted to a total of 210 casualties; of this total 152 were WIA, 26 KIA and 32 MIA.

Flying over Laos created unique challenges to aircrews, one of which was the amount of flight time crews endured. Aviation units OPCON to the 101st could not maintain the level of flight hours required to support the operation and at the same time adhere to the USARV flight time regulation which limited pilots to 120 hours per month. A waiver of the regulation was granted to units directly supporting LAM SON 719.

Combat exposure was greatly increased during the operation. Using sortie information from the Aviation Statistical Summary, combat damage rates were established and then compared for aircraft operations over Laos and the Republic of Vietnam during LAM SON 719. This comparison showed that the threat damage was thirteen times greater when flying over Laos.

Anti-aircraft missiles were rare occurrences over Vietnam, however, over Laos there were 14 occasions when missiles were reported or photographed, and although there were no confirmed shoot downs of helicopters by missiles, there were occasions of aircraft being hit at altitudes up to 4,000 feet AGL.

But there is another way to look at aircraft losses during the operation. Aircraft loss rate was 21 losses for every 100,000 sorties, or a loss rate of one quarter of one percent. Another way of looking at it is one aircraft lost for every 963 flying hours. The final analysis shows this to be a very high rate of accomplishment versus attrition.

UH-1H aircraft made up most of the losses with 53 lost for 369 committed. Most of these losses were UH-1H aircraft in the troop transport or resupply role and more than half of these were lost on final approach to landing zones. Two hundred and thirty-seven UH-1H aircraft were damaged on 344 different occasions. Nearly twenty-nine percent of all the UH-1H losses occurred on 3 March and 20 March 1971, with respective operations to assault LOLO and to extract forces near BROWN. Altogether there were 84 incidents of damage to UH-1H helicopters on these two days.

As could be expected, the older, slower UH-1C/M gunships suffered much more then Cobras, many of which were hit by 12.7-mm fire but either limped back or were recovered and, eventually, got back in the fight. I have not been able to find exact loss numbers for UH-1C/M aircraft, and can only suspect they are tangled up in UH-1H and AH-1G figures, although combat damage reports record forty-eight different UH-1C/M aircraft damaged on 66 different occasions. The older gunships were the lowest priority for recovery operations and consequently, few were brought back. The required commitment level for UH-1C gunships was 60 aircraft, although more then that were probably committed as replacement aircraft were brought in.

WHERE EVERTHING TURNED INTO ITS OPPOSITE

A Presentation to Wauwatosa Retired Men's Club
15 March 2011
Rev. Ray William Stubbe

When it was all over, I'd gone from 175 pounds to 128 pounds. My mom saw me and cried.

When it was all over, what had been a lush Garden of Eden paradise was now a moonscape devoid of life. More tons of bombs were dropped in our immediate area for a little over 60 days than were dropped in all of the Pacific in World War II.

When it was all over, well over 20,000 of the enemy were killed, over 10,000 local civilians that lived within five miles of our base, and 475 of our own. Khe Sanh was undoubtedly the bloodiest battle of the Vietnam War. During the prolonged and intense battle, trucks obviously didn't go around collecting trash. As a result, we had a large rat problem--and I mean large "rats," not just a large "problem"!Then it seemed as though the Pied Piper of Hamlin came; the rats mysteriously left us. The opinion of the senior officers was that they left us because there was just too much good food "out there"--all those thousands of dead bodies to munch on!

When it was all over, 19 year-olds were facing and living questions of a 60 to 70 year-old.

When it was all over, I'd completely changed. Many years later, I was told I screamed in my sleep. During the battle, I experienced God's Presence more profoundly than I ever had. At least two dozen men I know of later became priests and ministers because they experienced God in all those black, bleak days of battle. Negatively, as soon as the battle erupted, I was convinced that I couldn't count on living another day, and since then, it's become difficult to make long-range commitments, plans, or projects.

When it was all over, those around me, those who loved me and were greatly relieved I was alive, nevertheless lost much. I gave a talk to 6th Graders of St. Matthew's grade school (13 May 1988). At the end, they asked some very perceptive questions, one of which was: "How did you being over there affect family back home?" My dad was standing in the rear of the classroom, so I suggested they ask him. He said, "My wife and I were watching the evening TV news when they reported that a Chaplain had been killed at Khe Sanh." Suddenly dad was choked -up; he could hardly talk. He continued, "We didn't know for over a week if Ray was alive or dead." He said my mom's hair turned white. I never knew. I was wrapped up in my own issues, plans, and pain.

Today, I want to talk about a time when everything turned into its opposite

Today, I want to tell you about something that happened over 44 years ago, yet created after-shocks that linger. When President Obama was inaugurated (20 Jan 2009), he mentioned four battles in our nation's history. He said: "For us, they fought and died, in places like Concord and Gettysburg, Normandy and Khe Sanh."

I want to talk about one of those "far away places with strange-sounding names." Vietnam was, indeed, a strange place. It's literally and exactly halfway around the world. When it's noon in Washington, D.C., it's midnight in Vietnam. Those in Vietnam frequently said they were "in the Nam," while everybody else was "in the world." And when we returned "to the world," having adapted and survived, WE became the ones who were perhaps regarded as strange, and for many of us, everyone else was very strange. To paraphrase an old saying, "You can take a man out of the battle, but you can't take the battle out of the man." Someone observed, "for those who fight in a war, it never ends."

I was a student at the University of Chicago in a Ph.D. program. One day, while eating lunch, I told some of my fellow students, "I'm going to Vietnam as a chaplain." I'd served some years as an enlisted sailor on a Navy destroyer, and felt I knew how it felt to be in the service. They were asking for chaplains, so I volunteered. They were horrified. One of them said, "How can you, as a representative of the church, by your very presence there, be an endorsement of the church on a corrupt Saigon regime?" I said, "I'm going there to help people." A few weeks later, while giving a message to a Marine that his uncle had died--it caused him to cry, for he had been especially close to his uncle--the thought actually came to my mind, "Yeah, I'm supporting a corrupt Saigon regime by being here!"

I traveled to Khe Sanh by helicopter. Below, the hills looked so beautiful--like they were covered with green velvet. The sun shining off an occasional stream gave the appearance of Christmas tree tinsel.

A couple of weeks later, while with a Marine infantry patrol walking those hills, we climbed up and down steep hills, covered with grass taller than a man with sharp, cutting edges; we went through rushing streams with large boulders, we encountered bamboo thickets like a maze of steel rods, vines with spiked thorns that pierced our hands or tangled our feet causing us to fall. I learned that what is seen from a distance is far different than what is lived on the ground, or as the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein once observed, "the map is not the terrain."

Vietnam was many things to many people. There is no simple, single image or story of Vietnam A new Catholic chaplain arrived and occupied an old mortar pit that was covered by metal sheets. During his first night in this bunker, a scurrying rat lost its footing, dropped on the Father's bare chest and bounced to the floor. And he screamed "Shit!" as he sat up. As he was telling me this the next morning, he said that he had just been in a rear area where he called on a senior chaplain in the rear area. He said: "He lived in a plywood, air-conditioned hootch. A record player was playing some nice music. A Vietnamese woman was washing his clothes. He told me to go over to the bar and make myself a mixed drink from all the bottles of liquor he had along with ice cubes in his refrigerator. After awhile, he said, 'Well, you can stay here as long as you want, but I have a tennis match to go to.' Then, as he left, he said, 'Vietnam really isn't all that bad once you get used to it.'" The experience of that senior chaplain and the Father who had a rat bounce off his bare chest was obviously a far different experience of "Vietnam" than what he chaplain in the rear area experienced!

The day after I arrived, Navy medics, called "corpsmen," delivered a 5-pound baby girl in the morning. In the afternoon, a barrage of battle casualties arrived, including a Vietnamese soldier with half his face out, just a red cavern in the side of his face, including one eye out. It was all blood. He also had two puncture wounds in his chest and a shattered leg. Amazingly, he was still alive. The man died despite a desperate fight he made for his life. A birth, a death. A corpsman looked at me: "This is war," he said

I arrived at Khe Sanh in July of '67 and for the first six months there, there was little enemy contact. But we did have rain. About 7-inches a day for several months. All underground bunkers and trenches collapsed. It was cold. The main combat base was 495 meters above sea level (or 1624 ft.), the temperatures were in the 40s. We slept in our wet clothes. Although I grew up in Wisconsin and went to school in Minnesota, I've never felt more constantly chilled than I did during those monsoons.

In addition, all the 31 bridges over the road connecting us to our support bases to the east were washed out, making us completely dependent on air resupply, and that was precarious due to many days of dense fog. Aerial observers were unable to spot signs of enemy troops moving into our area. Two Marines drowned crossing raging rivers. Some were killed and many severely injured as bunkers collapsed.

On Marine Corps Birthday, a helicopter managed to pierce dense fog blanketing one of our outposts. We gathered together in that wet, cold, miserable place, with shriveled skin and caked with mud. He told us, "You all will soon be in the American history books."

About six weeks later, Sunday, the 21st of January 1968, our base came under attack by rockets and mortars, ignited our ammunition dump, and all the structures above ground--which was just about everything--were a shambles.

It was about 5 in the morning. Suddenly, the skies were filled with plumes of yellow flames from burning fuel, streaks of red, and shrieks of loud explosions. Tear gas from our exploding ammo dump filled the air.

A Navy corpsman ran back to the doctors, out of breath, saying, "My casualty outran me to the helicopter. I couldn't pin on his evacuation tag indicating his wounds." What kind of wounds did he have?" "He was wounded in his legs."

As I walked the base, stunned and numbed, I saw a man on a stretcher, his abdomen completely exposed. Only bare intestines were visible. The doctor whispered to me, "He's going to die."

A doctor successfully removed a live mortar that had become embedded in another Marine's gut.

A recon Marine, loading casualties on a helicopter, told me that their scout dog dashed into the helicopter and sat between the pilots. When his handler came to coax him out, he growled. He wasn't about to spend another moment at Khe Sanh. The recon Marine said, "That dog was smarter than all the rest of us!"

Three days after the battle began, a round landed on top of a bunker. One of the survivors of that bunker walked into our medical area in complete shock, shrapnel wounds peppering his back and face with small, black spots, little holes with small burn marks. Blood dripped out of a few of them. Then more arrived and went into my bunker for the night since they were unable to be evacuated by a helicopter. My bunker could hold two comfortably, and there were four Marines sitting on my bed. They fell asleep in a sitting position. One dabbed his bloodied head. The floor of the bunker filled with pieces of blood saturated toilet paper. I curled up on top of a field desk, about 3 feet by 3 feet. A surgeon was lying on the floor. Incoming enemy rounds continued throughout the night.

The next morning I went to the Graves Registration and said prayers over six dead bodies, four from the collapsed bunker. One of the dead was a man I had just seen yesterday with a cheerful, up-beat conversation. I had baptized him a few weeks earlier. As I walked to the area where the bunker had been hit, the Marine with the bloodied head was amazingly there, digging dirt to fill sandbags. He said he didn't have a head wound; the blood was that of others in the bunker.

One night we were told "this is the night; we're going to be attacked." I left my bunker and stayed in a bunker on the trenches with a gun squad. I remember that as I walked to that position, there was a Marine in the trench who didn't see me approaching

He was reading from a small prayer book that I had distributed earlier. During the night, the Marines on duty entered the bunker. Everyone was jumpy. One of them had a small 45 RPM record player that played the Credence Clearwater version of the jumpy tune, "I Heard it on the Grapevine" over and over again. A few days later that position took a direct hit. I ran down there, pulled out, and carried one of the men I had talked with that night. He had no head. Only strings of flesh hung out of his neck. There were small pieces of flesh all over the place—a hand, an arm, a stringy piece of flesh intertwined with cloth and caked with mud and blood.

We were isolated, vulnerable, and under heavy shelling. That battle erupted occupied 25% of all Vietnam film reports on TV evening shows during February and March, 1968. Shocking images of horror appeared in numerous popular print media, e.g.,, "The Agony of Khe Sanh" cover of Newsweek, March 18, 1968. Haunted faces appeared in the media describing Khe Sanh defenders as having a "thousand-yard stare." A possible replay of the famous French defeat at the siege of Dien Bien Phu plagued the minds of many causing President Johnson to demand the Joint Chiefs of Staff declare in writing that Khe Sanh would be held. Nuclear weapons were considered for Khe Sanh's defense.

We received up to 1600 incoming rounds, mainly rockets and artillery a day for a period of about 77 days on our small base about half a mile wide and a mile long. We were down to one C-ration meal a day (we should have had at least three), were without water for several days at a time, and our clothes rotted. Daily, those close to us were killed from the incoming. Bunkers and trenches collapsed, suffocating those in them.

When the enemy started using heavy artillery, we suddenly had craters on our base in which a man could stand and be below the surface of the surrounding ground. A new bunker being constructed for the regiment headquarters--supposedly sufficiently sturdy to withstand these rounds. It was hit before it was occupied, completely destroying it. Two large, deep craters on either side of the mail base road near our battalion aid station were constant reminders; there was no safe place at Khe Sanh. We all knew we were going to die. The enemy used tanks for the first time in the Vietnam war, over-running an Army Special Forces camp about five miles away. Khe Sanh village, the seat of local government, was abandoned the first days of the battle as an indefensible position.

We dropped more tonnage of bombs in the small area surrounding Khe Sanh than were dropped in all of the Pacific in World War II.

B-52s dropped about 1,022 tons a day in our immediate area. Unseen and unheard because they fly at high altitude, suddenly an area about one mile wide and three miles long is completely destroyed in seconds. That's an area about North Avenue to Center (which is about.5 mi.) and Wauwatosa Avenue to Highway 45 (about 3 miles). Because they are so destructive, they had been prohibited from dropping bombs closer than 3 miles of friendly lines, but in our situation, with the enemy digging trenches closer and closer to our lines, they were brought within half a mile. The earth continually shook. Bodies of the enemy were seen tossed far into the air. This was every day for about three months.

Several Marines told me of the base postal clerk. We were still getting paid. They'd give him a hundred dollars and ask for a money order. He'd give the man one for $200.00. Another came with fifty dollars. He'd be given one for a hundred dollars. Everyone was happy. One Marine asked, "How can you do this?" He replied, "Well, all the incoming is burning up all the records. There's no record." The Marines got twice the amount they requested. Everyone was happy. Who said Marines aren't creative?

Everyday heroism was common. While rounds still exploded, it was common to see a Marine dash out to rescue a wounded man. We all knew we were going to die, so why not do something helpful while we can--which is good advice for all of us, isn't it? During incoming, Marines went out to splice severed land lines to restore communications between command centers and the artillery. During incoming, Marines checked on the welfare of their troops. During intense shelling, Marines temporarily took cover, but then emerged to do their job--moving supplies, digging trenches and bunkers, treating casualties. No fear paralyzed us. I didn't see anyone crack up as I moved, constantly, bunker to bunker, trench to trench, day after day.

Determined attacks involving hand-to-hand combat in which the enemy penetrated and almost overran three of our outposts, failed. Marines valiantly fought and held with a determination; as we sing in our National Anthem," despite the rockets' red glare, the bombs bursting in air, our flag was still there!"

Marines shared and cared for each other. It was common to see one give his last drops of water to another, or to share his last bits of food. We were all down to one C-ration a day (we should have had three, of course), and we all lost weight due to reduced rations and the stress of living and working in that situation.

We may have been few against a far-outnumbering foe, but we had just the right people. Officers making very difficult, often painful, decisions that saved us; individual Marines that cared for each other; doctors who didn't have the appropriate training but who did open heart surgery and other things that saved many lives. Having just the right people was no accident. It's truly a miracle that any of us made it out of there alive! It's a miracle that I'm with you here today.

All these young men were brave and resolute, so very, very human. They were, as a group, perhaps the best I've ever lived with. Like Don Quixote who saw the lovely Dulcinea in the common bar maid, the nobility of humanity was disclosed in these grubby, dirty Marines.

God was with us in that darkness, that desperation, in men giving their last drops of water, sharing their food, in the courage in the midst of desperation, in the affirmation of life in the midst of death--pulling in a wounded man while rounds are still exploding. God did not remove us from the pain of battle, but God was certainly with us in it: in men who cared, in leaders who made the right decisions, in awareness that in our isolation we were not alone.

We have a Khe Sanh Veterans group which reconnects many with their long-lost buddies who can fill in the missing parts of their experiences: "Whatever happened to---?" or help heal hurts. One man called me back in 1993 recalling how he attempted to dig-out a collapsed bunker containing our Supply Officer, Lieutenant Kim Johnson. He remembered that he had dug so slowly, and felt so guilty. "If only I had dug a bit faster, perhaps we might have saved him." Then, because of our Khe Sanh Veterans group, he contacted another Marine who was also involved in digging out that bunker. The Marine told him that he dug fast and furious. "How can this be," he asked me. I told him that under the stress of battle, sometimes things move in slow motion. He said that that phone call was the most important phone call in his life. We all need each other!

In the end, we all become wounded healers that heal each other, hungry beggars that feed each other, dying men giving life to each other. In the end, we will all be remembered by what we have given, not what we've accumulated. The meaning of life is in self-emptying service to one another, beholding the presence of God in the face of a friend, being a blessing to each other.

POETRY

Grad Night

Graduation night,
finally out of school.
I'll put of going to college for a year,
this is going to be cool.
Time was up,
have to pick a school.
I had no idea,
that it was the fantasy of a fool.
Because Uncle Sam, chose me from 2 years of his school
He taught what I need to know, to become his tool.
For a year I was a foreign exchange student, in the land of sun and fun.
Where you studied 27-7, while carrying your gun.
We got to spend a lot of time, in the jungle and the sun.
But to be honest,
there wasn't a lot of fun.
We all looked forward to graduation, which meant you survived.
Which meant you could go home, so you could spend the rest of your life reliving being away from home.

MINI REUNION IN NORTHERN CALIFORNIA, HONORING 43RD YEAR OF THE START OF THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH

By Craig W. Tourte

I asked Tom Horchler (H.Q. 1/13) what he thought about having a little get together this year in commemoration of the 43rd anniversary of the beginning of the Siege at Khe Sanh. We both knew that was friend speak for, why don't you put something together, attend to all of the details, do all of the work - and I'll show up and take a little credit if things go well and have deniability if there is a failure. Tom shrugged his shoulders and in his usual can do spirit responded with an agreeable "Sure." Tom has devoted much of his later adult life to assisting Veterans. He was one of the driving forces behind both the successful and well attended Vietnam Veterans of American and Caring Veterans associations in and around the Northern California Chico area, which means that Tom has not only many friends and acquaintances but understandable is well respected amongst the rather large Veteran community.

Our commemoration was held at the Eagles Hall. It was pretty darn great to be amongst friends remembering a date like this, even though I knew few in attendance they were all brothers to me this January 21st, 2011, whether they served at Khe Sanh, in the military or attended to show their appreciation and support for those who did. Each and every one was a friend of Toms, a magnificent testament of how admired and loved he is by all who know him.

It was both an honor and privilege to have been able to say a few words about why we were all present that day; "Today, on the 43rd anniversary of the Siege at Khe Sanh, we take this opportunity to remember those who fought on the hills, in the valleys and on the combat base. We also take this moment, to especially honor those who did not return home with us and also to remember those who to this day, carry the wounds and memory of the Vietnam War, in their hearts, minds and bodies.

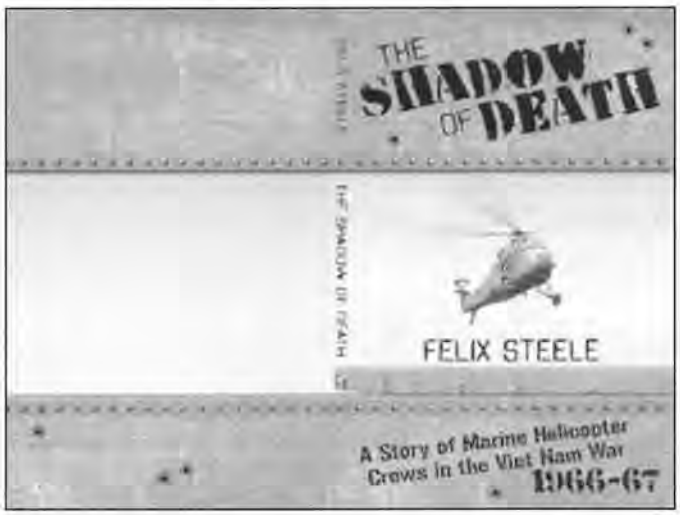
As LBJ personally sent off Marine reinforcements to I Corps from El Toro Marine Air Station, Calif., on February 17, 1968, he told them: 'This is a decisive time in Vietnam. The eyes of the nation and the eyes of the entire world, the eyes of all of history itself, are on that little brave band of defenders who hold the pass at Khe Sanh....'

The Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh was an historic event. The mention of Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy in President Obama's inaugural address, forever confirms to our nation and the world that the Battle of Khe Sanh holds a significant place in American History. Today we remember, not only those who fought at Khe Sanh but also those who have fought other battles and continue to fight this day for the freedom of all Americans."

It was a warm, sunny and pleasant day in Chico. A good day to remember old friends and meet new ones, to recall the sacrifices of others, to appreciated all that we have and another wonderful day to be alive and thankfully to be an American.

BOOK REVIEW



Felix Gideon Steele III was born in Selma, Ala. where he lived until graduating high school, when in 1962 the family moved to Arizona. In 1964, following two years of college, he joined the Marine Corps and spent the next five years flying helicopters. He flew helicopters for Air America for a year after the service, then returned to college, graduating from Arizona State University in 1971. He settled in Pinetop in 1976.

History books seldom tell you what individual combatants experienced during the Viet Nam War. They'll tell you about the politics of war. They'll give you place names, statistics and dates. But statistics don't reveal the shattering sounds, grisly sights, smell of death, emotional devastation and black humor that is the reality of war. Only the best kind of war fiction does.

Felix Steele's novel, The Shadow of Death, shows the battle zone in close-ups. It is a book about war devoid of Hollywood heroics or political agendas. It is the story of Marine helicopter crews in Vietnam in 1966 and 1967. It is not a bedtime story for small children.

One of the main characters is made of metal. It is a UH-34D helicopter like the one author Felix Steele flew for five years during the Vietnam War. The H-34 comes across as a reluctant hero, determined to do its best for the Marine Corps, God and Country. Like the crew, it flies into the battle zone to do a job, even when it is hit, limping and bleeding. The old helicopter is a real "jarhead."

Seasoned Marine Sgt. Berger explains it to young Capt. Street when asked what a "jarhead" is. "A jarhead is a Marine, officer or enlisted, who has experienced combat and is still gung-ho," Berger replies. "Wounded or unscathed," he adds. "Anybody who is fresh out of training can be gung-ho, but after being in combat, people sometimes change their tune and lose their gung-hossity."

Capt. Street has his own kind of admiration for the helicopter he flies. In this episode, the crew is on a medevac mission in the Que San Valley south of Da Nang. To lighten the mood, Street begins talking about the helicopter. "This old H-34 is one hell of a bird," he starts out. "If we didn't have it loaded down with all this armor and radios and fuel we'd be like driving a Cadillac. Also, it has great range. Why you could gas this baby up with a full 1,200 pounds of avgas and fly from New York to Chicago."

Steele begins each chapter with an appropriate quotation, sometimes his own. The chapter called "The Helicopter" starts with his poem: "You can fly through the air with the greatest of ease, but not through the ground, water or trees."

The chapter about the dangers of flying in the DMZ ("Demilitarized Zone") quotes an old mountain man saying: "Some days you eat the bear, and some days the bear eats you."

And, there's the young combat Marine's take-off on the psalm inscribed on his helmet: "Yeah, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil for I am the meanest m..... in the valley."

The author's style is intense. He rations out his words with the care of a person saving the last drops in a canteen. It is exactly right for the story he tells, but requires re-reading to absorb all the details.

His descriptions fly by when you're an observer, passing over the country in a helicopter. You sweat when you're sitting on the edge of a cot in a jungle "hootch." In one sentence, Steele sums up the atmosphere surrounding a crew on night duty waiting for a medevac call. "It's a hot sticky humid night, mosquitoes, gnats, flies and whatever else the jungle environment has to annoy us is in full bloom."

The author explains: "Men on night medevac duty, also known as 'death row,' make sure their life insurance is paid up. This is the most dangerous mission chopper crews fly."

He inserts an occasional explanation that adds to the story rather than slowing it down: "Little did the young pilots know in their naivete' that the helicopter crews would have a casualty rate which would far exceed the ordinary foot soldiers. They would be 27 times more likely to become maimed, crippled, horribly burned, killed outright or receive a million dollar wound than a grunt."

Steele's unpolished, cut-to-the-bones style suits his material. His novel may be short on story, but it's long on realism. The book jacket states: "This book attempts to describe the horror of the helicopter crews who spent most of their efforts saving the lives of wounded Americans, Vietnamese, and even enemy soldiers. The author survived over 600 missions as a helicopter pilot during the period when the DMZ was being militarized and the battle of Khe Sanh, when the U.S. Marines took the area "

The vast majority of lives saved during the period when the book takes place were saved in the H-34 helicopter. Steele says, "The crews of these obsolete flying machines were some of the best men to ever come into the field of aviation."

ere he has a land surveying business. He lives in Pinetop with his wife and son.

The Shadow of Death is available in paperback at the Bookworm in Pinetop for $12.95; at Amazon online in paperback, $12.95; ebook at Amazon for $8.99; and Barnes and Noble as a paperback and ebook for the same prices.

A RECOMMENDATION FOR AN ESCAPE FROM THE COLD STORMY MONTHS

Hale Koa Hotel - Oahu, Hawaii

By Craig W. Tourte

Pretty darn cold just about anywhere in America during the winter months. It seems as if it was particularly cold, windy and rainy in all of the continental United States. Strong storms closing airports, schools closed for weeks on end, floods on the plains, travelers stranded everywhere and numerous don't travel warnings. California was not spared this harsh weather, the Lake Tahoe, Sierra Nevada mountain area had the most snow ever recorded. Global warming of some sort I suspect.

An escape from the cold was mandatory and in early February (2011), escape I did, to the beautiful state of Hawaii, island of Oahu and modern cosmopolitan city of Honolulu. What I like about Honolulu compared to the other islands of Hawaii is the town is open past 8 P.M., diverse, safe and has the best beach in all of the islands. There is another reason why I enjoy coming to Honolulu, and it certainly is an incentive to remain as long as I have the time and funds, and that is the Hale Koa Hotel on Waikiki Beach.

The Hale Koa Hotel which means House of the Warrior is owned by the Department of the Army and is an Armed Forces Recreation Center resort hotel. Those returning from the Vietnam War and pervious wars will remember processing through Fort DeRussy and that is where the hotel is located. One would not recognize the place today. The only commonality is the physical location, the hotel opened in 1975 and a major expansion came in 1991. It has two pools, a beverage bar, luau garden, and two pretty decent restaurants. It is located right next to the Hilton Hawaiian Village and on the best beach in all of Waikiki. The hotel is just a short walk along the safe streets or beach to the newly developed and revitalized down town area. On every Friday night, starting exactly at 1945 Hrs. the Hilton sets off a great fireworks display from the beach, easily viewed from the Hale Koa.

The hotel prices are determined by one's rank at time of service. All of the rooms are decorated and for the most part furnished the same; the price is determined by your rank and location of the room in relation to the beach. The hotel requires that its guests be active or retired military, 100% disabled (VA), DOD employees or their family members. The hotel is self-sustaining and does not receive any government funding. The price of your room is all that is charged, there is no hotel, state, federal or local taxes or hidden fees attached to the bill. Covered parking across the street is $7.00 per day. I think the Hilton charges over $20.00 per day to park. As an example of price, an E-4 at end of service, such as myself, could stay in a Garden View room for around $125.00 per night and the best room which is a deluxe ocean front is $210.00 per night - which you'll have to reserved a year in advance. This hotel is not Fairmont quality, so if ones expectation are such, this may not be the place for you, but having stayed in the Hilton next door, I would certainly say the rooms at the Hale Koa are comparable is quality and size and in most cases, the views are superior and it certainly is not as crowded as the Hilton and other beach hotels.

As one enters the Hale Koa there are few indication the hotel is owned by the Department of the Army. A military identification card to access the hotel driveway, stay in a room or use the PX and restaurants is required.

Although there are a few overt indications the hotel is associated with the military, for the most part, in appearance it is like any other Honolulu hotel. I did however find a small show case located in the lobby near the elevators which contained a few photographs of an Army unit in Vietnam. In addition to the photographs this display case contained a helmet, meals from a C-Raton box and dog tags. There was a shelf just under this display case that had nothing on it and that's where I placed two Red Clay khe Sanh magazines.(Pic#1) In anticipation of this first and historic act, I placed a tab on the magazines indicating they were not to be removed and that they had been donated by Khe Sanh Veterans.

I kept an eye on the magazines all week and noted they were still on the shelf when I left eight days later. I could see they were being read and replaced. (Pic 1B). I will say that those military folks seem to be able to follow directions. There were mostly retired people staying at the hotel, but there were a few young families and current serving military. Hale Koa has a web site which can be accessed just by typing in Hale Koa Hotel. I have stayed at the Hale Koa 5 times now, and I plan on staying there again. There is a lot to see and places to visit on the island of Oahu and numerous military bases with some pretty decent golf courses. I am looking forward to my return to the warm weather, cool tropical breeze, great food and to the Hale Koa Hotel.

FROM THE WEB FEBRUARY 25th 1968, THE GHOST PATROL

Posted on February 24, 2011 by Steven Wiese

February 25th, the date of the Ghost Patrol, arouses many emotions for those who fought at the Marine combat base at Khe Sanh. Memories range from remembering the day, or for some deep depression.

It's a difficult day for me personally, not just remembering the many brave men who died that day. My ghosts are remembering the men who were left on the battle field that were wounded, or the men that who may not have been wounded but just pinned down by extremely heavy gun fire. Marines are known and proud of the fact that we do not leave our own behind, but we were out numbered by thousands that day----but that doesn't make it any easier.

Bravo lives on.

In 2004 and 2005 I was contacted by the niece of Michael J. Laderoute, MIA/KIA February 25, 1968 while on patrol known as "The Ghost Patrol" during the 77 day siege of Khe Sanh.The following is my response to one of her inquiries.

My Response:

Although it has been years since I read it, I recall that Hammel's book was accurate to a great extent. However, different people sometimes see things from a somewhat different perspective. Another thing is that our own memories sometimes deceive us and some of us have even spent years trying to bury memories that are just too painful to fully acknowledge.

On top of that there is Post Traumatic Stress Disorder eating away at most of us, and let's face it as much as we hate to admit it we are getting older and that takes a huge toll on our memory. Another thing is that I am constantly having to ask myself if I really saw this first hand or was it a dream or was it just described to me in such vivid detail that the memory is etched in my brain as if I was there.

The questions that you raised about Lt. Jacques struck home with me. Because of the loss of life in his platoon and the nature of the incident many questions have arisen about his competence, qualifications and leadership abilities. Another was what was the selection criteria that the Marine Corps had in place for officer selection at the time and was it followed. After some discussion and a little research, I have come to the conclusion that he was qualified, competent and fully met the requirements for an officer and more importantly for a Marine Platoon Commander. He was well regarded by the men that served under him and that speaks volumes in itself. He was also thought highly of and worthy by the Bravo Company Commanding Officer, Ken Pipes.

He had also been Platoon Commander for maybe five months or so and had actually been engaged in at least one firefight prior to the siege. Five months may not seem long to civilians but five out of a total of a thirteen month tour for a Marine Platoon Commander would be considered seasoned. His level of training and experience was at about par with the other two Platoon Commanders. As to why he was the chosen one, I cannot say for sure, but knowing the others involved they probably all three volunteered and may have even flipped a coin to see who had the privilege of going. If he had been allowed to do so Captain Pipes probably would have led the patrol himself, but that is not the way that it was done, and would not have been considered even if he requested it. Another thought as to why it was the Third Platoon is the depth of leadership and competency of the men in the Third. They were all good men. Not to belittle the other platoons. Actually Bravo Company from Captain Pipes down to the newest arrival was the Best of the Best.

I'm not sure about the request for a delay of the patrol due to weather. That may or may not have happened and my thought is that it really doesn't matter. After the tragic events of the 25th their was a scramble to second guess every single minute and detail of the action. Lots of finger pointing and nit picking blame going around. I honestly do not think that any of it was deserved at any level.

In War Battles are won and battles are lost. Unfortunately February 25, 1968, was one of the battles that the US lost during the Vietnam war. To my knowledge it was the only one that Bravo Company was engaged in that they lost and there were many that Bravo Company was the over all victor including the one that I mentioned that Jacques had been in prior to the siege and the tremendous victory that Bravo Company claimed on March 30, 1968, and we can most certainly claim the ultimate victory for the Battle of Khe Sanh.

Like you, I too for more than thirty-five years now, had somewhat cast a little blame on Lt. Jacques for being out of the assigned area. Some, now I know it was unfounded, rumor had it that Jacques went chasing two NVA like a dog after a rabbit and led his men into an ambush without regard or forethought. I learned a couple nights ago that none of this was true. As was common at the time, the patrol had a number of predetermined checkpoints at which they were to call in. At least a part of the reason for the patrol was to attempt to locate some enemy mortar positions that had been attacking the base and as always the capture of enemy prisoners was a priority.

Somewhere between the second and third checkpoint, Lt. Jacques radioed that he had spotted some NVA that he thought it possible to capture and he ask for permission to try to capture them. He was told to be careful and not get into anything that he could not get himself out of and he was given permission to attempt the capture of the enemy that they had spotted. Jacques and his senior NCO were on site and in agreement about his request to pursue the sighted enemy. Higher authority gave him that permission based on Jacques' observation and evaluation. The approved pursuit of the NVA is what took the 3rd Platoon off the designated route. There is no way that Jacques, any of his men or the approving authority could have known that the NVA were actually the bait that was leading them into a horseshoe shaped ambush that was extremely well planned and well executed.

Several of the men that survived the action of the 25th feel like Jacques got a really raw deal and that he was unfairly criticized by people that didn't know anything about the actual happening that day. Based on this new information and comments of those that were there, I have been able to bury that demon once and for all.

Lt. Weiss and his 1st Platoon did an outstanding job in attempting to reinforce and rescue the 3rd. Several more good men were lost in the attempt as they were also ambushed by NVA . The fact that Lt. Weiss and his men were able to not completely fall prey to the ambush speaks highly of the entire 1st Platoon. Although he was able to do so, it was not his decision to break contact and return to the perimeter. The decision wasn't even from the Battalion Commander as I had previously thought. It probably came all the way from Division. If the whole company had been thrown into the fray, the entire company would have been destroyed.

Another observation that I just became aware of is that Division was also concerned that if the whole company left their defensive position on the perimeter to join in the rescue effort, the entire sector of the perimeter would be so weakened that it could not withstand an NVA counter attack and that Khe Sanh would fall. Personally, I think that Division had it right. I think that the NVA were massed and ready to make just that very strike. The way and place that the 3rd Platoon was ambushed and the preparations that had been made to ambush the reinforcements indicate that it was a part of the over all NVA strategy to take Khe Sanh. If Khe Sanh had fallen and the hills lost the supporting fire that Khe Sanh provided, the hills would have fallen soon thereafter. This buries another demon for me. The one that ask, did we do what we should have done in regard to reinforcing the 3rd Platoon and were the decisions regarding this the right ones? Did everyone at every level do everything that they could have done?

On the issue of the recovery of the bodies of those lost and left behind on the 25th, I have had several conversations and done a little research but mostly I rely on my personal notes that I made at the time. That's one of the reasons that this reply has taken so long. It took a while to locate and organize my notes. My notes show that there were eight Marines from Bravo Company that were immediately listed as KIA body recovered on February 25,1968. I believe that they were all from the 1st and 3rd Platoons. My notes also show a total of 19 Bravo Marines that were listed as MIA. My notes are very detailed and include name, rank serial number, MOS, and even next of kin. For Michael J. Laderoute, my hand written notes actually show two next of kin entries. One located in Montreal and one in New Brunswick, Canada. I only mention this so that you can see the great amount of detail and effort that went into doing everything possible for our lost Brothers and their families.

Again referring to my personal notes: after the highly successful raid on the enemy led by Bravo's Commanding Officer, Ken Pipes, on March 30, 1968, the status of the 19 Marines that had been listed as MIA on the 25th, was changed to KIA body recovered. After more than a month the decomposition of the remains was very bad. Identification was also hindered by the fact that personal items had been removed by the NVA. Another factor was that in addition to the wounds received that led to their death, the bodies were further torn apart by constant artillery and mortar fire directed to that general area for more that a month. Ten of those recovered were separately positively identified and individually shipped home to their family. Nine others were so commingled and in such a state that they could not be separately identified and they were interned in a mass grave at Jefferson Barracks.
They were Michael Baptiste, Jerry Dodson, Frederick Billingham, Bruce E. Jones, Michael Brellenthin, John Lassiter, James Bruder, and David Scarbrough. The ninth was Ronald Ridgeway. Ron actually was not KIA, he was unconscious, and apparently the enemy had mistook him for dead but when he regained consciousness he was taken as a POW.

One of the reasons that we can be fairly certain that there were no other survivor/POW's from the 25th is because Ron would have seen them while he was taken miles away to a rendezvous camp where he joined up with additional POW's have missed other POW's either on the march or at the POW camp and he most certainly would have told the Corps during his debriefing. He has also been to at least one Khe Sanh Vets convention and has been in contact with a number of us. There has been no mention of other Bravo company POW's because there were none.

As for thoughts that there were many more Marines KIA on March 30, 1968, my notes show that there were ten Marines lost from Bravo Company. I also later added two more names one from A/1/13 and one from H&S 1/26. Each and every one of these men were true heroes and their loss was mourned by all; however, the battle was an overwhelming defeat for the enemy. Their losses were well over a hundred killed and no telling how many DOW or wounded. Considering that a single Marine rifle company was assaulting a battalion of NVA in well fortified positions, the Marine losses were miraculously light. I say miraculously because I truly believe that there was divine intervention that day.

Wendy, thank you again for your persistent effort and questions which caused me to get back into all this. Over the last couple of days I have talked with some truly outstanding men and I probably would have missed that opportunity had not been for your prompting. After gaining new information and some first hand observations from others I have changed my outlook on several major issues. Several of my personal demons have been finally been put to rest. I can only hope that some of this information will help you and maybe a few others.

Although he did not physically die that day Ed Rayburn was in fact KIA. He was horribly wounded and lived (If you can call his life Living). For another agonizing 8 years . He like many others history has forgotten, and that should not be happening. I believe he should be honored for his sacrifice as if he died that day 43 years ago. Ed Rayburn joined Bravo on 17 Aug 1967 and was WIA in 25 Feb 68 and sent home. He passed away on Jan

23,1976. With the help of Police Chief Tom Martin of the South Haven PD, MI, he located and forwarded a photo of Ed's final Resting place.

Henry McDonald was a friend of mine. We partied in Philly after ITR. Shipped out to NAM and landed at Khe Sanh Base early January 68. Just in time for the "big party". Will always remember that Day, we were so young 19. God Bless Henry and all those other fine Marines and Corpsmen who gave their all. Semper Fi…

My uncle, Donald Jacques, was on that patrol. I am forever grateful for the Marines who did bring him home for my family. We mourn his loss. To all of you who did make it home from Khe Sanh - thank you. You are in my prayers, especially on February 25th.

I'll never forget that morning, when someone woke me, and the skipper needed me on the radio, because 3rd platoon ran into a hellish firefight. I know we all from Bravo Co. wanted to get our asses out there and help them. Finally the skipper gave me the word to go down to 1st platoon to try and help get some of our guys back. That day will live in my mind forever.

I think that many of us in Charlie CO wanted to give assistance on that day. I know that I'll never forget that day. To those Bravo Brothers that are still with us and for those that gave everything I salute you.

RESPONSE FROM CAPTAIN KEN PIPES C/O B CO 1/26

To all who posted, thank you for your messages, sharing history, thoughts, comments and observations. I would like to respectfully add to this thread, something that I seldom do. It is like discussing family business with folks that are not family. There are, of course, exceptions and this is one of those exceptions.

Briefly, and to fill some, perhaps known, yet, not mentioned information gaps I would add the following:

I did and continue to think of and recall Lt. Don with respect and fondness. He was a good, well trained and competent Marine Officer. His background, training and experience exceeded that of most of us who were at Khe Sanh during the Siege. I recall that Don was attending Syracuse University when he enlisted and went to PI for Boot camp. Upon graduation he was nominated for, selected and attended OCS at Quantico. This is number two of the Marine's Big Three. Finally, he completed what was then and remains, among the most demanding of entry examinations; he attended and graduated from Marine Officer's Basic School.

My point, Don could have remained in college, as many non-hackers of our generation did and not gone through the rigorous requirements needed to attain the standards expected and demanded if one is to join our exclusive Rod and Gun Club! Additionally, he was a Mustang. Only he and one other Officer, as I recall, can/could claim that illustrious title. I think only one other qualified who did duty in Bravo Company just before and during The Battle for the ground that each of you and those that are no longer with us, so valiantly and successfully defended.

This deadly fight was not the first, nor will it be the last Marine battlefield tragedy. On the Canal in WW2, the 1st Marine Division G-2, LtCol Lou Gottage, lead a force of Marines that were ambushed. All but two Marines were killed; their remains were not recovered until long after that battle concluded.

At KoTang Island, our Marines withdrew, accidently leaving approximately a Squad behind, who, to a man. were murdered by the Khmer Rogue.(sic) Those men were not recovered until years later. Don, just as Col. Gottage and the Squad Leader at Kotang, died on the field of battle with his men.

One of Bravo's best and most well know Warriors, CPL. "Chief" Gilbert Wall, now passed, in a letter to me and again when he came to visit in our home in Fallbrook, spoke highly of Don as a Platoon Leader, Man and fellow Marine He remembered that they uncovered the extent of and how close the NVA had entrenched toward our lines.

Additionally, I have discussed this action with several members of our Company both on the phone and at our reunions while trying to address their comments, discussions, questions and concerns. There is a written and unwritten law in our Corps of Marines that the Commander is responsible for everything that his men do or fail to do. That being said "The responsibility" for what happened that day, which none of us who were there will ever forget, by the law, is mine and mine alone!

It is my hope this answers the important question and places that day and those days that came before and after, in the proper prospective, it was and will remain, mine!

Finally, Don was not the first Marine Officer from his family. His sister was Commissioned and served our Corps and Country, well prior to Don following the same demanding and difficult path.

I consider, then and now, that Lt. Don was a decent, dedicated, well trained, loyal and professional member of our "Band of Brothers." We all miss each member of our Clan of Warriors that fell in battle at Khe Sanh. Each Marine is, and will forever remain an important part of us. Thus, it will remain until we are called before our final judgment. My feeling is illustrated in the poem that accompanies the listing of those that we lost in the Siege--"Bravo's Brave Rifles." The words came to me late in the night as I thought of that day and what came before and after. May our Lord Bless them, each one--and their families

I summary and to each that posted on this thread, thanks. We must never forget those with whom it was such an honor and privilege to serve and those Marines who will forever remain our Most Cherished Companions at Arms

In closing and in tribute, we should forever remember that later aircraft photo's indicate that members of Don's Platoon, even after the NVA ambush, continued to assault the trenches--some actually made it before passing to glory, taking many of the enemy with them! What magnificent Marines they were! With admiration and respect to them and to you.

WITH BAYONETS FIXED KHE SANH—30 MARCH 1968

by Lt. Colonel Ken Pipes

One of the most sobering experiences in life is the responsibility of leading young Marines into the teeth of the enemy knowing that some of them will not come out of it alive. It takes courage, faith, an indomitable spirit, and an unfailing trust in the capabilities of the men entrusted to your care. Fighting at Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam in 1967–68 was an ongoing, brutal fight to the death between Marines and soldiers of the North Vietnamese Army. This entry in the 'Sting of Battle' series takes us through a particularly poignant episode of combat as seen through the eyes of a young Marine rifle company commander.

On 30 March 1968, Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines (B/1/26) proceeded from the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base to their pre-designated line of departure located near forward units of the North Vietnamese Army's (NVA's) 8th Battalion, 66th Regiment, 304th (Hanoi) Iron Division. Poised against each other in the coming attack were lineal descendants of one of the most famous divisions involved in the siege against the French at Dien Bien Phu in 1954 and elements of the 26th Marines—one of three Marine regiments of the 5th Marine Division that led the assault against Japan's island fortress of Iwo Jima in February-March 1945.

The attack—scheduled for first light—was delayed by heavy ground fog that obscured the entire objective area. As the blinding fog began to lift, our Marines, with bayonets fixed, crossed the line of departure outside the wire of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Immediately upon commencing the assault, the two lead platoons came under extremely heavy mortar, rocket propelled grenade, automatic weapons, and small arms fire from the 8th NVA Battalion who occupied extensive, well-constructed, mutually supporting bunkers and trench systems.

Under the umbrella of withering fire from nine batteries of Marine and Army artillery that pummeled the flanks of the objective area and created a rolling barrage 50 to 70 meters in front of the two attack platoons, the Marines began breaching the NVA positions. The fight for fire superiority hung in the balance until the attached flame section and combat engineer detachment entered the fray. As their predecessors did on Iwo Jima, these units, covered and assisted by Marine riflemen, began to blind, blast, and burn their way into the NVA fortifications

For the next 4 hours the Marines of Company B—some of whom had undergone 70-plus days and nights of continuing, killing bombardment by NVA heavy artillery, rocket, mortar, and concentrated sniper fire—gained some measure of retribution as they routed the NVA soldiers from their fiercely defended positions. Within the breached positions our Marine riflemen were literally walking over the dead and dying NVA defenders.

From the moment of close contact until some 4 hours later when we received the order to withdraw back into the combat base, the fight was hand to hand, bayonet to bayonet, knife to knife, grenade against grenade, and rifleman against rifleman, with the trump card as always—Marines using flamethrowers and combat engineers employing demolitions!

It may seem to some readers that this was just another example of a typical seasoned Marine combat unit doing its job—just another typical day at the office. It wasn't. A significant point must be made here! The rifle company that attacked the NVA that Saturday morning was not the same company that had moved from Hill 881 South 3 months earlier to participate in a battalion sweep toward the Laotian border, and then moved into the perimeter of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The continuous enemy bombardment while we were in the combat base had hurt B/1/26 more than any other similarly sized defending unit and was exacerbated by the tragic loss of most of an entire platoon on 25 February resulting from an ambush by a reinforced company from the 8th NVA Battalion

Most of the Marines in Company B on 30 March had joined during the siege as replacements after the siege had begun. These young men had traveled a hard road including boot camp, skills training at the Infantry Training Regiment, Staging Battalion at Camp Pendleton, a flight to Vietnam, reporting in to the 26th Marines, exiting the aircraft at the Khe Sanh Combat Base under fire, reporting for assignment to 1st Battalion, and finally—still under fire—joining Company B. To a rifleman, they had no combat experience at the fire team, squad, platoon, or company level.

As it has always been in combat, if it had not been for the leveling skills of a handful of short-timer leaders—privates first class and corporals—led by an experienced company executive officer, company gunnery sergeant, and outstanding platoon commanders—the execution of this company-sized raid on 30 March 1968 would never have moved beyond our frontline trenches.

As noted by the commanding officer of 1/26 and the S–3 (operations officer) who planned the company raid, "The members of Co B performed individually and collectively in a manner normally expected only of seasoned and combat experienced Marines." I believe that their brilliant feat can only be attributed to their deep and overriding desire to avenge the prior loss of Marines of their company—most of whom they never knew or met! To them and them alone goes the credit for executing arguably the first successful company-sized offensive assault outside the wire since the ambush of their mates on 25 February—and for making it such a success!

These Marines totally decimated the 8th NVA Battalion, including the enemy battalion commander and his staff. In so doing, the Marines of Company B killed at least 115 NVA officers and soldiers and wounded an untold number of their survivors, according to information later passed to the company that had been intercepted from monitored enemy radio traffic!

Still later, Marines from B/1/26—none above the rank of corporal—who had participated in the raid, were awarded two Navy Crosses, nine Silver Stars, eight Bronze Stars, and two Navy Commendation Medals with Combat "V" for valor for individual acts of courage, gallantry, and heroism! Additionally, over 100 Purple Hearts were presented, with several of these Marines earning their awards for receiving a second and third wound.

Just like their predecessors from Iwo Jima—to a man—the Marines of Company B remain intensely proud of their 26th Marines heritage! We will always feel that we who were privileged to serve with Bravo's young, inexperienced, Marine infantrymen that fateful Saturday morning were truly in the company of men who were, are, and will always be "The Immortals"!

Subsequent to the fighting on 30 March 1968, the company was the recipient of the following from the commanding general of the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam:

Officers and men of B/1/26 USMC deserve highest praise for aggressive patrol action north of Khe Sanh on 30 March. Heavy casualties inflicted on bunkers and entrenched enemy forces indicate typical Marine esprit de corps and professionalism. Well done!
Gen William Westmoreland

And further remarks from our 26th Marines regimental commander:
I add my congratulations to the above well earned commendatory remarks. Col David Lownds sends.

TRIBUTE AND TRIBULATION KHE SANH REMEMBERED

To the men who scaled their mountains and Seized that far flung plateau,
To the men that held the arena
Against the best the enemy could throw.

Who walked the jungle covered valleys
And waded the leach laden streams;
Who moved through the green shrouded alleys,
Till their muscles cramped and screamed.

To those who fell wounded and bleeding,
Yet arose to fight on 'til the end.
To those who fell wounded and bleeding,
Never to rise up again.

To our comrades who carried the rifle; Who fired both cannon and gun.
To those that supplied and fought with us We knew that they'd never run.

To the pilots who flew the fast movers,
And herded choppers all over the sky.
Who calmly watched the green tracers
As they went arching and howling by.

To Gentleman Jim, our commander,
And Jacques, Claire, Morris and Chief.
To Snake, Mike, Korkow and Rash,
And other heroes we respect and keep.

To Stubbe, our brave navy chaplain,
Who intercede for us as our link.
And to DeMaggd, our battalion surgeon, Whose skilled hand drew us back from the brink.

To Blanchfield, and our navy corpsmen,
The finest and most courageous of all
Who daily and nightly fought to reach us,
Refusing to succumb to the law.

So now as we move far from the valley,
And the years march away to the fore.
We and our families remember,
All those who made it happen; and more.

CAPTAIN
KENNETH W. PIPES
MARINE CORPS

For Service as set forth in the following:

CITATION:

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Silver Star to Captain Kenneth W. Pipes (MCSN: 0-81285), United States Marine Corps, for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action while serving as Commanding Officer of Company B, First Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, THIRD Marine Division (Rein.), FMF, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. On the morning of 30 March 1968, Company B launched an attack on a well-entrenched, numerically superior North Vietnamese Army force near Khe Sanh Combat Base and immediately came under intense automatic weapons, mortar and anti-tank rocket fire. Realizing the seriousness of the situation, Captain Pipes fearlessly maneuvered across the fire-swept terrain deploying his men and adjusting supporting arms fire on the enemy. Although sustaining a serious wound, he ignored his painful injury and led his men in a determined assault, seizing the hostile emplacements. Steadfastly refusing medical aid, he repeatedly exposed himself to the intense fire as he supervised the destruction of numerous bunkers and ensured that all wounded were treated and evacuated. Upon being directed to break contact, he unhesitatingly remained with the rear element of his command and directed an orderly withdrawal from the hazardous area. His resolute determination and heroic actions inspired all who served with him and were instrumental in his company accounting for 115 North Vietnamese soldiers confirmed killed. By his courage, bold initiative and unfaltering devotion to duty in the face of great personal danger, Captain Pipes upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service.

CORPORAL
MARINE CORPS

For service as set forth in the following:

CITATION:

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to Corporal Kenneth A. Korkow (MCSN: 2258125), United States Marine Corps, for extraordinary heroism while serving as Mortar Section Leader of Company B, First Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, THIRD Marine Division (Reinforced), Fleet Marine Force, in the Republic of Vietnam on 30 March 1968. During a search and destroy operation in the vicinity of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, Company B suddenly came under intense small-arms and mortar fire from a well-entrenched North Vietnamese Army battalion. Fearlessly exposing himself to the hostile fire, Corporal Korkow quickly deployed his mortar section into firing positions and, moving about the fire-swept terrain from one squad to another, directed heavy barrages of accurate fire against the enemy, destroying four fortified bunkers. Alertly detecting a hidden mortar site which was pinning down elements of his company, he advanced to a position dangerously open to enemy fire and, employing his own mortar, single-handedly destroyed the hostile emplacement. As the battle intensified, Corporal Korkow repeatedly disregarded his own safety as he moved from one position to another, encouraging his men and directing their fire. Observing a Marine fall wounded by an enemy explosive device, he selflessly rushed into the hazardous area and assisted his injured comrade to an aid station established to the rear of his company. Although seriously wounded while returning to the forward area after assisting more casualties to the aid station, Corporal Korkow resolutely continued to encourage and assist his men and comfort the wounded until he was medically evacuated. His intrepid fighting spirit inspired all who observed him and contributed immeasurably to the final defeat of the numerically superior enemy force. By his uncommon valor and selfless devotion to duty in the face of extreme personal danger, Corporal Korkow reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

PRIVATE FIRST CLASS
DONALD RAY RASH
MARINE CORPS RESERVE

For service as set forth in the following:

CITATION:

The President of the United States of America takes pride in presenting the Navy Cross (Posthumously) to Private First Class Donald Ray Rash (MCSN: 2230103), United States Marine Corps (Reserve), for extraordinary heroism while serving as a rifleman with Company B, First Battalion, Twenty-sixth Marines, THIRD Marine Division (Reinforced), Fleet Marine Force, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. On 30 March 1968, while conducting a reconnaissance in force near the Khe Sanh Combat Base, Company B suddenly came under a heavy volume of small-arms fire from a numerically superior North Vietnamese Army force occupying fortified positions. Although the majority of the hostile fire was directed at his squad, pinning down his companions, Private Rash disregarded his own safety as he unhesitatingly left a covered position and launched a determined assault against the enemy emplacements. Ignoring the hostile rounds impacting near him, he fearlessly advanced across the fire-swept terrain, boldly throwing hand grenades and delivering a heavy volume of rifle fire upon the enemy force. Although continuously exposed to the intense hostile fire, he resolutely continued his vicious attack until he had destroyed five enemy positions and killed numerous North Vietnamese soldiers. When his company was subsequently ordered to withdraw while under accurate enemy mortar fire, he steadfastly remained behind, and as he delivered suppressive fire to cover the evacuation of casualties he was mortally wounded. His bold initiative and resolute determination inspired all who observed him and were instrumental in his company accounting for 115 North Vietnamese soldiers confirmed killed. By his courage, intrepid fighting spirit, and selfless devotion to duty, Private Rash contributed immeasurably to the accomplishments of his unit's mission and sustained and enhanced the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life for his country.

THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH BRAVO! COMMON MEN, UNCOMMON VALOR

By Francis Rae
Submitted By Thomas Soerensen

Betty Hosford Rodgers grew up at the edge of Sacramento County, just a stone's throw from the border with Sutter County. She and I met in 1961 in high school and quickly became "best friends". As high school girls do, we had long endless conversations about boys, whether we would be asked to the prom, and what our future lives might be like. The Beatles had not yet been discovered, no one had gone to the moon, and we watched black and white television.

One thing we certainly never could have imagined in 1961 was that 50 years later she would be spearheading the making of a documentary film (and I would be covering it in the newspaper) about a battle that had not yet happened, in a country we had not yet heard of.

The siege of Khe Sanh by the North Vietnamese began January 21, 1968, and lasted 77 days, finally ending in April, 1968, when Betty's husband Ken Rodgers, then a Marine lance corporal with Bravo Company, First Battalion, 26th Marines, boarded the helicopter that lifted him from the hills of Khe Sanh when the battle was finally over. Ken says, "I looked out of the chopper, and I could see those hills." And I thought: "There's a story."

Over the years Betty, a photographer, and Ken, a writer who teaches on line writing classes, talked about what such a story might look like, and how one might go about telling it. They even contemplated making a movie about it, although they had no filmmaking experience. But then, during the 1970's and 1980's no one in this Country wanted to hear such a story and most who had lived it weren't ready to talk about it.

Finally in 2010, after a phone call to the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation followed by a letter written by Betty telling them what she and Ken would do, to their shock the Foundation granted "seed money" to begin making the film. The Foundation also offered help with historical aspects of the film, stating they believed that the history of Bravo Company during the siege should be preserved. Suddenly Betty and Ken were film makers and they knew they had some quick learning to do.

In April 2010, 42 years after the chopper plucked Ken from the hills of Khe Sanh, he and Betty began the first series of interviews, close to home in Idaho. This was quickly followed by more interviews of Khe Sanh Bravo Company veterans during an 8,000 mile journey that spanned 18 states, with additional research at Quantico Virginia and the Nation-al archives in Washington D.C.

Back home in Idaho during the last quarter of 2010, as they catalogued photos and archival film clips, and watched interview after interview; reality was setting in. The original seed money was long ago spent, they had used their savings, and Betty had come out of retirement to go back to work to raise money to finish the project. But still there was not going to be enough money to finish the editing process (which will require hiring a professional film editor) and put the final film "in the can."

To make the documentary they had formed a non-profit organization which can take tax deductible donations, and a number of donations have come in, but not enough so far to complete the project. Ken and Betty hope that enough money can be raised to complete the project in time for the GI Film Festival in May, 2011, in Washington D.C.

Yes, as Ken said to himself that day in 1968, there is a story; but he and Betty are keenly aware that it is not merely a "war" story, or a "historical" documentary. It is the story of individual courage and valor, of the will to overcome and persevere against all odds, and to stand tall in the face of unimagined adversity.

Many of the marines who survived the Siege of Khe Sanh are now in their sixties and seventies and time is beginning to run out to document their stories.

Ken and Betty do not debate the war of 50 years ago and whether the men should have been there in the first place ..... that is not the point. The point is, they were there and deserve to be remembered and honored .... for their valor and bravery.

In considering the story Ken and Betty are preserving for future generations, it occurs to me that none of us know when or how circumstances will test us. There can be many different kinds of "wars" and different kinds of "battles" we may be called upon to face and to fight in our lifetimes. We should all ask ourselves; do I have what it takes? Am I up to the challenge, whatever it may be, when the time comes?

HELL IN THE HILLS OF KHE SANH
Reprinted From Vietnam Magazine

By Barry Fixler
E CO 2/26 HILL 861A

For nearly 80 days, Marines on the hills surrounding Khe Sanh endured one of the war's fiercest fights

The top of what became known as Hill 861-A was just virgin land covered with elephant grass and bamboo when I first saw it. My company, Echo 2/26, had to claw through the dense vegetation and up the steep slopes of what would become a bomb-scarred hilltop with trenches reminiscent of World War I. In fact, over the next 77 days Khe Sanh would earn the dubious record of receiving the heaviest bombardment of a small area in the history of warfare.

All we knew in mid-January 1968 was that we were leaving Phu Bai for a place called Khe Sanh and were loaded down with war gear, all that we could carry. I only knew of it as a company operation, and how it affected me, Lance Cpl. Barry Fixler. I was unaware that we were part of a huge, regiment-size operation. None of us had a clue.

They put our whole company in a mammoth C-130 transport plane, and it seemed that this operation might be a little bigger than most. We knew we were going to an area closer to the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) than Phu Bai, so it probably would be worse, but I was a seasoned Marine with six months of combat, so I was unworried, confident.

The DMZ was anything but demilitarized. It was intended to exist as a zone free from any military presence by either North or South for a limited period until national unification elections took place. But history didn't follow the diplomats' script. The zone and the areas around it saw some of the greatest destruction and carnage of the war.

After we landed at the Khe Sanh combat base and organized, we humped outside the lines and into the fields. We dug in on a small hill the first couple of nights. There was no outpost. We were the only Marines there, and we still did not know what our objective was or what actually was happening.

We all had an eerie, uneasy feeling, though. Whatever we were doing, it wasn't routine. We knew that we were in a bad spot; we just didn't know how bad. We finally ended up at the base of a steep hill, a mountain almost, about 2,500 feet high. There was only one overgrown trail, so the 150 or so of us started up it in a single column. The terrain was horrible and took hours to climb.

I carried a rocket launcher that looked like a huge bazooka, my M-16 rifle and ammunition, all my grenades, my gas mask and a minimum of two rockets. That's a heavy load, and we still had to be alert for an ambush at any second.

The hill was very steep and the trail was overgrown, but carrying everything required both of my hands, so I couldn't use them to help myself up the trail. It was a real struggle, and the heat was oppressive. We were given no breaks to rest. We were screwed—very vulnerable and spread too thin. I still think we were lucky that we reached the top without being slaughtered. The NVA must have been able to see us.

We were the first Marines to reach the top of 861-A, and not a soul was there, just wild grass, bamboo and other vegetation all over the place. We had obscured lines of sight, which would make it difficult to find targets when we had to shoot back at whoever would inevitably start shooting at us. The enemy could have sneaked up to within 10 feet of us and we wouldn't have been able to see him. So the first thing we did was start digging in.

Darkness was falling on us fast, and we were totally out of water. The only moisture that we found was on bamboo shoots that were covered with mites. I remember snapping the bamboo rods and putting our tongues to them to catch the drops of water as they trickled out.

For the next two or three days, we continued to entrench ourselves and clear lines of fire. Someone erected an American flag. We didn't get the barbed wire and concertina razor wire emplaced around our position for about a week, so it was a good thing that the NVA didn't zero in on us quickly.

Hill 861 already was getting pounded and had been overrun once, and within three days we were catching mortars and rockets on 861-A. Each day grew more intense, and we got the feeling that we might be there for awhile, but we had no way of knowing that it would turn into 77 days of hell.

The NVA became increasingly better at aiming their mortars, rockets and artillery. They would rain mortars up and down the lines. Ba-boom! Ba-boom! Ba-boom! We even were hit by our own artillery a few times. Things like that just happened, and we felt helpless against it.

Medevac Helicopter arriving on Hill 861A

The first week of February, the NVA really turned it on. Rockets and mortars were almost constant. On February 4, a chopper came in to evacuate the wounded and bring in replacements and supplies. The new guys ran off the chopper, and I ran on to offload supplies.

Heavy rockets and mortars showered the landing zone, and as the chopper lifted off, I jumped into a trench and ended up next to one of the new guys. He had been in Vietnam for a day or two, and on the hill for all of one minute. He was clearly shaken by the intensity of the situation.

"How long you been in-country?" he asked.
"Six months," I told him.
"How could you live that long? How's that possible?"

I remember the conversation because the new Marine's name reminded me of the actor Humphrey Bogart. He was killed the next day.

Too many Marines were killed on Hill 861-A on February 5, 1968, when we were totally overrun. The North Vietnamese swarmed in from all directions. They were all over the hill. Three or four Marines were right there when the first NVA popped up, and they just got overrun. The shooting was intense, and waves of enemy soldiers just kept coming, coming, coming.

Dead and wounded Marines gathered at the LZ waiting for Pick-UP, after the battle.

Everything went down at once: artillery, rockets, mortars, small arms, bayonets, even tear gas. It took us all night to kill all the North Vietnamese who had gotten into our lines.

I heard more of the fighting on February 5 than I saw. The enemy was so close, swarming over and through our trenches, that there was a serious risk of shooting one of our own guys. So another Marine and I instinctively ended up with our backs to each other, holding our position in the trench line. It was total chaos, pitch black and the constant explosions from rockets, artillery and grenades created a strobe light effect.

We used gas grenades on the NVA. Tear gas is heavier than air, and it blew back on us and filled our trenches, forcing us to wear our gas masks that night. This limited our vision even more. You're looking through goggles, and one of the first things that you can see is that a lot of your guys are dead or seriously wounded. Our ears rang from the constant explosions, and each flash of light from the blasts briefly illuminated a portrait of death through the goggles.

It was like being blindfolded and spun around 50 times. Then they take off the blindfold, flip the lights on and off, blast your ears with noise loud enough to make your nose bleed and you have to try to identify and shoot the enemy—all night long. We lost a lot of Marines that day. They can't simulate that experience in boot camp.

Marines carry a wounded comrade across a bomb crater to the LZ for a medevac. The Photographer, Robert Ellison, died in a plane crash a short time after photo was taken.

You don't have time in a situation like that to note individual acts of heroism, but as I found out later, my mentor, Cpl. Tom Eichler, was a hero that night. Hill 861-A could well have fallen if Tom hadn't done what he did, and that would have changed the entire course of the war. His actions were emblematic of what made Khe Sanh a part of Marine Corps lore: perseverance against overwhelming odds.

Three of our men manning a machine gun were injured when the NVA overran their position in the initial assault. Three times Tom dodged enemy fire to carry each of the men to safety.

He killed three NVA in hand-to-hand combat, stopping them from firing a rocket into a trench filled with Marines. When the enemy managed to establish a machine gun position inside our perimeter, Tom wiped it out with grenades, and he sprayed cover fire that allowed our own machine gunners to move into a position to defend us.

He stood above the trenches to throw grenades down on the advancing enemy, and the entire time he made sure that we were kept supplied with ammunition. Tom was seriously injured early in the assault, but his injuries never slowed him.

Fellow Marines struggle to help a severely wounded member to an aid station.

When dawn came, we counted 109 North Vietnamese bodies sliced and diced all over the hill. I remember thinking: "What? Another one? Another one?" Even spread over maybe two acres, 109 was a lot of bodies. We had seven Marines killed, and at least 30 seriously wounded—guys missing limbs, or so damaged that they probably died within a few days. At best, they lived but never fought again.

We waded through the trenches and gathered the wounded and dead. After a corpsman had stabilized a wounded Marine, we wrapped him in a poncho and carried him to a staging area near the LZ, to be evacuated to a field hospital. We just kept lining them up, and helicopters came and choppered them away.

One of the guys I helped suffered multiple severe injuries, and I talked to him to try to keep him from going into shock. He asked me to find his hand.
"I need my hand. Can you look for my hand?"

I asked where his fighting hole was and told him I'd look for it. I meant it, too. But when I got to his area and started looking around, reality set in. Debris and body parts were everywhere. "It's hopeless," I thought. "Even if you find a whole hand, there's no way to know if it's his."
We needed immediate reinforcements, and when they came from other units, they all had looks in their eyes that said: "Oh my God, I'm screwed! I am screwed!"

We didn't put their minds at ease.

"They're definitely gonna attack us again tonight," I told the green Marines. "Be ready because they're coming back. Those mothers are coming back tonight!"

The new guys all were wide-eyed and solemn, and you could tell that they were thinking, "Ah shit, I'm gonna die tonight!" Those of us who had been on the hill since the beginning didn't think that way.

I looked at myself sometimes and couldn't see the green Marine who had landed in the country only six months earlier.

Barry Fixler (No Helmet) posing with members of Echo Company on Hill 861A, all proud of outlasting and defeating the NVA for 80 Days on Hill 861A. As Fixler recalled " We are Marines, we all felt 10 Feet Tall".

In no way could I show fear to the new guys. I had to raise my confidence to a new level. Those guys picked up on that real fast, and pretty soon, the ones who survived, they talked the same shit. They needed to see the example to have that confidence, and then they fed off of it. It rattled us but it didn't scare us.

I was just hell bent to kill the enemy. It was more like, "C'mon, you gave us your best shot yesterday, and now give us your best shot today!"

And they did. The NVA continued to bring it. They never overran our position again, but they laid siege to us for another two months, throwing everything they could at us: artillery, rockets, mortars and grenades.

"Trench Warfare"
Barry Fixler (Left) standing in Hill 861A Trench Line with James Heagy (Center) KIA and James Kaylor later recipient of the Silver Star.

Long after the siege, when my ears had quit ringing, I still thought sometimes that I could smell the gas. Anyone who ever has been gassed will tell you that things can't get much more fucked up. Unless you've experienced it and found the discipline within yourself to apply your training and overcome it, you can't control yourself. You can have the best rifle in the world, but it's worthless against gas.

The night the NVA overran us, I was moving from off watch to on when the skies lit up and we scrambled to organize and fight back, and then I smelled the gas. The odor is distinct and unforgettable. I didn't know that we were using the gas. I assumed it was the NVA gassing us, or that a Marine had been blown up and his gas grenades had exploded with him.

I was seasoned then and thought I was cool, and I'd let my hair grow nice and long. I didn't panic, but as I held my breath and put on my gas mask as I had learned in boot camp, the band of it tangled in my hair, and the only thing that I could do was start yanking my hair out by the roots. It was like pulling clumps of grass out of an overgrown lawn.

My head had been shaved during boot camp, the last time that I had do the gas mask procedure, but doing it with long hair while under enemy fire was a whole different matter. I cleared the tangled spot, fit the mask on and blew to clear the gas from inside and I was ready to fight, but I was pissed at myself for not getting a haircut.

I was promoted to a squad leader at Khe Sanh, and it wasn't long before I began asking myself how long I could last. Second lieutenants and squad leaders passed through a revolving door of death at Khe Sanh.

New second lieutenants were always coming in. More men in that rank were probably killed, by percentage, than those in any other rank, and squad leaders couldn't have been far behind. Second lieutenants had no credibility; that was something that had to be earned. Second lieutenant was the lowest rank for an officer. They had just finished training in the States. What war did they have in the States? No war.

On top of that, second lieutenants came into units full of seasoned Marines who had been in combat for a year or more. The officers probably trained as hard or harder than the enlisted men, though. First they had to go through four years of college, and then through officer's candidate school and training, but still they had no combat experience.

Second lieutenants had to be in the worst spot at all times because they were leaders. They had to be where the bad stuff was happening at every moment, and so they were vulnerable. The position of squad leader among the enlisted men was based on who had been in the squad longest when rotations came, and on who still was alive and able to fight.
Becoming a squad leader meant the world to me, but I suddenly had responsibility for anywhere from seven to 12 guys. Every morning, squad leaders from my platoon had to report to the command post (CP). The order would get passed down the trench line, "Squad leaders up!"

Mike Lucas, waves three fingers signifying that he received his third Purple Heart at Khe Sanh, which meant he would be taken out of a combat area.

That meant that I had to run as low as possible through trenches to get to the CP, where Captain Earle Breeding waited. I usually was ducking from mortars and rockets. The CP was a little sandbag hut in which six to 10 guys could fit, but we had to sit. There was no room to stand because a taller structure would have been a big target.
Captain Breeding barked out orders, telling us our jobs for the day, what our plan was. "OK, 1st Platoon, you're doing good. Mortars. Where's mortars? Where's machine guns?"

Maybe Captain Breeding would want an extra listening post, an LP. That was the worst of the worst. They sent two men out at night past the edge of our perimeter, the other side of the razor wire, to listen for the enemy and notify us if they heard them. It was like throwing them to the dogs. They were cannon fodder.

Or he could order a squad to go out and clean up C ration cans that were carelessly thrown out past the perimeter. "1st Platoon? Send a squad out to police the area south of your line. We have animals out there scavenging your C rats and we're gonna get complacent. Next time the enemy probes the line, we'll think it's rats!"

Maybe he would order us to repair the concertina wire. A working party. "Third Platoon, send a working party out there and throw more wire."

There was always something to do. We never sat around. We survived by staying busy, and if we weren't assigned to a working party, we had to dig deeper and pile sandbags higher.
Captain Breeding gave us these orders every morning, and as I got used to being a squad leader, I began to notice: "Whoa, another new face! Oh my God, another new face!" I saw the same faces for a few days, and then one would be gone and replaced by someone new. Sometimes guys just got rotated back to the States, but most of the time they were wounded or killed. I'd wonder, "Whoa, who's going to replace me when I get it?"

Years later I saw the movie Spartacus with Kirk Douglas, and for some reason one of the scenes reminded me of our morning meetings with Captain Breeding. Before they called Spartacus and his opponent into the ring in which one of them would die, the two warriors sat in a little room and stared at each other, knowing that one of them was doomed.

That's the exact feeling I had when I sat in the squad leaders' meeting. It was just like the two gladiators in Spartacus. I would look at the faces and think: "Who's the next one to die? Am I next?"

Strange, but a person gets used to being bombed every day. It's survival of the fittest. It got to a point when we were being mortared that we didn't ask, "Did anybody get hit?" It was, "Who got hit?" We took casualties at all hours and from all directions. Sometimes the helicopters would drop in reinforcements, but they were never enough.

One day in mid-February, during a rare break in the incoming, Mike Lucas called to me from two foxholes over. Mike was one of my best friends.

"Hey Fix! Fix! Fix! Hey Fix, I got something cool!"
"What the hell could he have that's cool?" I thought. Nothing had changed for weeks.
"I have cupcakes!"

"How the hell could you have cupcakes?" I asked him. We were under siege, living in trenches, men dying. How could he have cupcakes?

We would get these tins of compressed pound cake, and every so often our C rations included miniature Hershey bars. Mike got creative.

We always had C4, which is an explosive that's a little like Play-Do. During the day, but never at night, we could use little pinches of it to heat our food. Without a detonator, it wouldn't explode, but it would burn. We would light the C4, place an empty can upside down over it, then put the can with our food in it on top of that. It was like a little burner, and it made the food a little easier to get down.

Mike must have formed the pound cake into three little cupcakes, and then melted his Hershey bars and dripped the chocolate over the pound cake. He presented it to me and another Marine, Lance Cpl. James Anthony Wood, really nice on a piece of cardboard, like he was a chef or something.

Like a jerk, I didn't catch on right away. It didn't dawn on me that he could have just made the cupcakes. "Where did you get those cupcakes?"
"Some helicopter guy just flew them in for us."

It really didn't matter. Mike, James and I probably spent 10 minutes just admiring those little cupcakes, and then we only ate them in nibbles, nice and slow—three tough Marines giggling like school kids and eating cute Khe Sanh cupcakes. That was James Wood's last treat.

On February 25, 1968, the NVA had zeroed in on one area so well that it was almost certain death. Around sunset, one of the corporals found me. "Fixler," he told me, "we lost three Marines; no one has their hole. Give up one of the men from your squad. Someone has to be in that hole."

The position was totally vacant. We had lost so many Marines in that foxhole that I just knew whoever I put in that hole was a dead man.

Mike Lucas and I met back in July 1967 in Phu Bai. We were both from New York, and we hit it off right away. We had similar personalities. We were buddies from then on and stayed on the same operations and in the same platoon.

Then James Anthony Wood was attached to our squad, and he and Lucas became extremely close. They shared the same hole and always were hanging out and laughing. I was 19 years old, and I got a little jealous: "Jesus Christ! I'm losing my best friend."

So when the corporal told me I had to give up a man to replace the ones who had been blown out of that doomed foxhole, I had to make a decision real quick. It was almost a certain death sentence.

I made a call—Wood—and he manned that hole. Mike volunteered to go with him. "We're going in together."

Wood was killed within hours of my decision. The foxhole took a direct hit from a mortar after dark. "Minutes before, we were talking about home, watching through binoculars," Mike said years later, "and the mortars started coming in and he was completely disintegrated, no head at all."

Somehow Mike survived it, and when daylight came, he looked down at his flak jacket and saw part of James Wood's face. There were pieces of flesh, and the stubble from Wood's beard was impaled in the protective jacket, little hairs just standing erect.

It was a heavy blow to Mike and I could tell it shook him up. Mike was a tough Marine, a great Marine. That means James Anthony Wood was, too. But as hard as it hit him, Mike had to shake it off, like we all had to. We were fighting a war, in a pitched battle, and we were taking losses daily. There was no time to reflect on our situation. We simply endured what had to be endured.

TIMOTHY D. SHARPE
KHE SANH VETERAN
D CO 1/26 USMC

Timothy David Sharpe, 64, of Statesville, passed away on Monday, April 18, 2011 at Iredell Memorial Hospital. Mr. Sharpe was born on Nov. 4, 1946 in Alexander County and was the son of the late Glenn Washington Sharpe and Pauline Rhyne Sharpe. He was a graduate of Celeste Henkel School and served in the U.S. Marine Corp. during the Vietnam War. On May 29, 1976, he was married to Judy Galliher Sharpe, who survives of the home and was retired from Norfolk Southern Railway. He was a member of Bethel United Methodist Church and enjoyed the outdoors, hunting, fishing and gardening. In addition to his wife of 35 years, he is survived by one son, David Glenn Sharpe (Torie) and two grandsons, Eli and Lane. Also surviving are two brothers, James Barnard Sharpe (Nellie), Joe Wayne Sharpe (Betty), one sister, Virginia Kay Johnson (Franklin) and many nieces, nephews and cousins.

VIETNAM HONEYMOON

By Michael Bradbury

There was a "third act" of the "Donna/Olds Movie" timeframe.

Shortly after I got back up here from Phoenix, before I ever met Donna, I got a long distance call from Miguel "Pop" Salinas down in Texas. "Pop" & I had served together in Vietnam and were on Hill 861 during the fight for Khe Sanh during the TET Siege.

He said he was planning to go back there for a couple of weeks, and that since Vietnam opened up for visitors, two other guys from our outfit had gone back over there for a visit. We talked at length about it, over the next couple of phone calls. Our trip would not only entail going back to Vietnam, but back to Khe Sanh, and back up to Hill 861.!

I had to "wrestle" with this a bit, but finally called him back and said "Ok, let's do it." Within the next month, there were six of us going, but as time went on, the other four dropped off one by one, as they weren't ready to deal with it again.

"Pop" said he was going no matter what, and asked if I was "committed".....and I said that "I probably should be", but I was going. The trip would be in early July, which gave us plenty of time to get our Passports, Visas, shots, plane tickets, accommodations, reservations and such.

When Donna & I decided to get married a few months later, I told her to pick the date, and whatever it was, would be fine with me. She chose the 30th of June....."Pop" & I were scheduled to fly out of San Francisco five days later on July 5th, and it would be a 2-week trip. Her birthday is on the 13th of July and I'd still be in 'Nam for that as well!

Donna & I had just taken a trip to the coast, and any other trip would have to wait until after I got back. She's a real trooper though, and when I decided to cancel my part of the trip, she stepped-in and said "No Way.....this is something you and Pop need to do....I'll be fine.....just be careful and get back here safely."

"What about your birthday?"
"Believe it or not, I'll have another one next year too!.....You need to go!"

She was right. We got married outside of City Hall on a beautiful day, and my old friend and then-Mayor Joe McNeal performed the ceremony. All of a sudden, I didn't want to leave, but way down inside, I knew she was right.

Pop & I flew into San Francisco on the 3rd, where fellow Khe Sanh buddy Randy Mapel flew up from San Diego to meet us. We three would spend the next day driving around San Francisco in a rental car, then Randy would fly back to San Diego, Pop & I would head for Hong Kong, then on to Saigon (now Ho Chi Minh City).

With a rental car, I drove us into San Francisco, and showed 'em around a little. I drove up to Potrero Hill, then out to Galileo High to show Pop & Randy where I grew up with my "hooligan friends." We had lunch out on Fisherman's Wharf, and got as caught-up on old times as we could. It was a nice visit. (we still call each other every now and then, and meet up at the Khe Sanh re-unions from time to time).

On the 5th, Pop & I flew to Hong Kong. We had about a 6-hour layover, before the connecting flight into Saigon (I've always refused to call it "Ho Chi Minh City").

We passed through customs and caught a taxi to our Hotel for a much needed sleep. We were able to make reservations for transportation to Hue City in a few days, then up to Dong Ha, Quang Tri and finally Khe Sanh itself.

I videotaped the entire trip, along with my still-camera shots, and spent the first couple of days shooting film around Saigon.

I also called Donna nearly every night (from Saigon anyway, where we had good telephone access), and I wrote to her in a special "travel diary", everyday Pop & I were over there, no matter where we were (even from the top of 861).

Soon it was time to head north. We flew from Saigon to Hue City, spent the night, contacted our "tour driver and guide" and headed further north through Dong Ha, Quang Tri, and finally into Khe Sanh, which had now grown into a town, where it was only a "village" the first time we were there. It was the 11th of July. The next morning (12th) we hooked up with our "Hill Guide."

Actually, Neither Pop or I needed a guide from this point. Even through 40 years of jungle re growth, you could still see 861. Guides were required for all "foreign" visitors, due to the unexploded ordinance still lying around on battlefields, and Vietnam was now getting American trade and did not want any "incidents or accidents." Guides were fairly cheap though, and Pop & I had prepared for that.

We visited the little "museum" they had there, and planned for the long hike up to the hill the next day. Then it started raining, it rained long and it rained hard. This was potentially disastrous. We had to climb 861 the next day on the 13th, because we had to be in Danang for the flight back to Saigon on the 14th. In good weather, it was very "do-able." But if it was still coming down the next morning, it might be too muddy & slick to make the climb, and that IS what we had come back over to do.

It was an uneasy night, but we managed to sleep. The next morning, it was cool, a bit foggy but it had at least stopped raining. With guides in-tow, we had a quick bite, threw bottled water in our packs drove as far as we could, to the base of the hill-range, then got out and started up.

Forty years earlier, when we were young and in-shape, we hiked-up there in Company formation, loaded down like mules, but still made it in an hour or so. In 2005, we were a pair of old geezers and the climb seemed like a trek up Mount Everest, particularly in the humidity over there. But, inside of three hours, we finally made it. I carefully filmed it, including the unspent ordinance we had to be constantly watching for. The guides and us had a nice rest, had a little lunch, and we checked out some of the trench line that nature hadn't yet reclaimed. I filled an old water container with dirt from the top to take back, a couple of pieces of protective panels from someone's old flak vest, and our Hill Guide found a spent slug from an AK-47. This came home with me too.

It was really strange being up there again, after four decades. In 1968, it looked like "Craters of the Moon" from all the artillery and mortar barrages, burned-out areas from napalm and Agent Orange. In 2005, it had all pretty much grown over with thick elephant grass, and there were even flowers growing in various places in the valley. Except for the occasional mortar rounds still laying around, you wouldn't have guessed a war had once raged up there.

It was the 13th, Donna's birthday.....after we got to the top, we wished her a happy birthday on the camcorder tape. In a way, this was really insane. I meet the gal of my life, and just five days after we're married, I leave the country! On her birthday, (the 1st one we would spend together), I'm standing on top of this God-forsaken, leech-infested hill about 9,000 miles away!

Pop and I took some time wandering along what was left of the trench line, just sort of remembering, and collecting our thoughts. Finally, it was time to head back down the hill. We were wringing wet with sweat from the climb up, but it felt pretty good going back down.

Several hours later, were we in a hotel in Danang, and then back in the air heading back to Saigon in the morning.

Our last couple of days found us touring around Saigon, filming the traffic (that you'd never believe), and we wound it up with a trip to the "Chu-Chi Tunnels". I'm glad I video'd it all.

When we went through customs before the plane trip back to Hong Kong, I wasn't sure if I'd be allowed to take soil out of the country (I'd filled that water jug with dirt from 861), but I didn't declare it and nobody asked, so we got on the plane back to Hong Kong, a short layover, then the long trip back to San Francisco.

I'd managed a pretty good nap on the plane, and got a commuter plane from San Francisco to Boise. I called Donna from SFO and she was there to pick me up in Boise. What a welcome sight! Long trip, emotional trip, and a new chapter in my life to start when I got home. I'm so glad I got this trip on videotape.That camera, was a story in itself.....and a short one, that I'll share on my next post.

THOSE OLD GUILT FEELINGS, DON'T WE ALL HAVE THEM

By Ray W. Stubbe

My first chaplain's clerk at Khe Sanh, Glenn Waller, recently wrote me and suggested his brief piece might be printed in our Red Clay. It focuses on his guilt feelings over getting out of the field in order to be my clerk. He had been scheduled to become the Company Radioman for the CO of A/1/26, Captain John Raymond, and I snatched him to become my clerk. Little did I realize that my action may have caused him a life-time of guilt!

Like most of us who served in Vietnam, there's always something over which we feel some guilt. Perhaps this is due to some ill-defined, faintly felt, generalized guilt hidden in the darkness and cobwebs of the basement of our self, that is projected, hung-on (like ornaments on a Christmas tree!) something that is right before us, that we can see and realize. It's like the husband who comes home after a bad day at work and takes it all out on his wife and kids. They didn't do anything, but they are there, available, to pin-on all the anger he couldn't take out on his boss or whatever.

So also the guilt many Vietnam vets feel, usually completely unwarranted, that's hears in the "if only's": if only I did this instead of that, if only I was able to remain more alert and stay up all day and night for the whole time, if only I knew that person or that situation better, if only I was a bit more energetic, and so on. The "if only's" will drive us to despair until they dissolve when we get into conversations with others, usually comrades in the same bunker or the same patrol, who let us see things from a different perspective or gain awareness of the bigger picture of what was really going on and what resulted.

Glenn's short piece is about him becoming my Chaplain's clerk. He doesn't realize that the reason the CO of A/1/26, Captain John Raymond, was so angry was that Glenn had been chosen to be the Company radioman, and I took him. Glenn may have politicked for the position, but I'm the one who chose him out of three very good candidates for the position. I'm not going to fall into the trap of now feeling guilty, however! It was an appropriate thing for me to do and it was an appropriate thing for him to apply.

Glenn's Letter:

I left my unit to become the Chaplain's assistant in month seven of my 13 month tour. I politicked hard for the job in order to get out of the field (a survival technique). I Left behind a job as a radio operator, and a reputation of being a slacker, not pulling my weight. To the Marine Corps and especially the 26th Regiment I offers my humble apology.

I carried that guilt for many years and somewhere along the way during a counseling session my counselor caused me to reflect that this was no ordinary war. Most everyone had a goal of completing the 13 month tour and getting the heck out of Dodge. This is quite counter to the motto "Semper Fi" of the Marine Corps. I lived with that hanging over my head as I attempted to make sense of what I did and what I had become. Could I ever have been able to call myself a "Marine?"

Then slowly, and surely I regained my self respect. The captain was very much against losing me to the Chaplain and I always thought it was because of my bad reputation. Later, while I was in Iraq (for the 2nd time) I learned the true reason I had been selected to become the Company radio operator. As I began to write about my Viet Nam experience I came to realize the risk for which I had traded jobs. I drove the chaplain off base several times into the village of Khe Sanh and had only an M-16 for defense.

ED NOTE:

Glenn, I am glad you decided to share that deep felt guilt you carried unnecessarily for all those years. I as many, believe we have all felt some degree of guilt for whatever reason. Welcome to the club.

The victims of US military campaigns are usually nameless civilians in far away places, but there are also victims closer to home - the soldiers so often used and then discarded by the establishment. Binding Their Wounds is a book about US veterans written by a US veteran - Bob 'Doc' Topmiller. Topmiller fought in Vietnam, founded a school for orphans there, and become a professor of history before he passed away. Close friend and scholar Kerby Neill stepped in to complete the book. The result is a history of US veterans and their treatment by the US establishment from the early republic to the recent wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Binding Their Wounds offers policy recommendations to improve post The victims of US military campaigns are usually nameless -conflict treatment and care for veterans which are long overdue.

It is in the nature about war that we prepare for combat but rarely for its aftermath. Vietnam vet and historian Robert Doc Topmiller began Binding Their Wounds while he was still struggling with his own PTSD but died before he could finish the book. Completed by his friends, the book provides an engaging account of America s attitudes and treatment of its veterans, from the revolutionary war forward. Major chapters focus on the failures of the Department of Defense and the Department of Veterans Affairs (and its predecessors) to address the needs of vets exposed to radiation in post World War II military experiments, vets suffering from Gulf War illnesses, and vets exposed to Agent Orange during Vietnam. Particular attention is given to the persistent issues of trauma and suicide in soldiers and veterans. This volume documents strengths and shortcomings of military and VA responses to the needs of our servicemen and women and suggests ways that we can do better, including the avoidance of armed conflict. Rich in personal accounts of veterans, Doc's own story is compellingly woven into the narrative.

Robert J. Topmiller joined the Navy at seventeen and served as a hospitalman with the Marines at Khe Sanh, Vietnam. Later a businessman and professor of history at Eastern Kentucky University, Doc Topmiller wrote two books on Vietnam: The Lotus Unleashed: The Buddhist Peace Movement in South Vietnam 1964 1966 (2002) and Red Clay on My Boots: Encounters with Khe Sanh 1968 to 2005 (2007). He was working on Binding Their Wounds when he died.

He left a wife, three children, and three grandchildren. T. Kerby Neill is a Navy veteran and clinical psychologist. Dr. Neill worked in the VA and later spent most of his career as a child psychologist. He is the author of Helping Others Help Children: Clinical Supervision of Child Psychotherapy (2006). Retired from psychology in 2004, he devotes much of his time to peace education. He is married, a father, and grandfather.

BOOK REVIEW

A must read for any Vietnam veteran, especially marines who fought there. Dr. Finnegan's moving account of the year he spent in the company of marines as a surgeon has to be unequaled in hardship and daily courage. Thank you Dr. Finnegan, for what you did for America's finest and thank you for the historical rendition of how you performed complicated life saving surgery under such primitive conditions for the 77 days of Khe Sanh.

He honed his healing and surgical skills literally under baptism of fire, when in 1968 at the age of 29, he was thrown into one of the worst battles of Vietnam while treating more than 2,500 casualties in a three-month period....." The Catholic Star Herald

Poignant, sad, witty and apolitical in tone, In The Company of Marines reads like an experiential anthology of Finnegan's late-'60's tour of duty- one punctuated by three months in an underground bunker tending to wounded soldiers" Main Line Today
Everyone should read this, It is not a political story of the Vietnam war, It is the story of one man's time in Vietnam as a Navy surgeon caring for the Marines. Very poignant. Everyone should read it!!!!

I bought this book because I had known the author personally when he was a surgical resident at the Hospital of the University of PA. He was good then, and in his book tells the story of some very skillful and selfless episodes during his service in Vietnam. It is a spare volume and would have benefitted from more detail, more stories, and a more sophisticated writing style. Dr. Finnegan has apparently gone on to a successful career. and I must say it was a pleasure knowing him.

I have read many books regarding the siege of Khe Sanh. Dr. Finnegan's recount of his time in Vietnam was riveting. It was very easy to read and I couldn't put it down until I had finished it. This book gives the reader such insight into the heroic deeds that Dr. Finnegan and his colleagues preformed everyday. It was such a pleasure to read and I highly recommend It.
This is a book written from the heart by a heroic surgeon. His language in the book is basic, direct and conveys in an excellent manner what one medical team did in the Vietnam conflict. His descrip-

WOMAN WEARS POW/MIA BRACLET FOR NEARLY 40 YEARS

Kathy Strong was 12 years old when she put on a bracelet to keep vigil for a solider missing in Vietnam -- now it's time for her to take it off
(CBS News)

WALNUT CREEK, Calif. - While the war raged in Vietnam, POW/MIA Bracelets were all the rage. The metal bracelets, sold by the millions, each bore the name of a soldier who was either still a prisoner in Vietnam, or missing in action.

CBS News correspondent Steve Hartman reports the idea was to wear the bracelet and only take it off your wrist when your Veteran came home.

They were very popular with kids. In 1972, when she was 12-years-old, Kathy Strong got a bracelet in her Christmas stocking.

"I was really excited," Strong said. "I read the paper that came with it. And I just thought. I'm going to keep it on until he comes home."

Strong, now 50, still remembers the name: James Moreland. Moreland was a Green Beret who'd been stationed in LANG VEI.

Moreland went missing in the winter of 1968 after the enemy over took his position. At the time, no one knew much more than that - so Kathy remained optimistic.

"They showed footage of the soldiers coming off the planes, and I always thought wherever he's flying into I'm going to be there and I'm going to give him my bracelet and I'm going to put it on his arm. That's how I always pictured it," Strong said. "But that wasn't meant to be."

After so many years, it became obvious to even the most hopeful, that everyone who could come home alive, had come home alive. Eventually, the bracelets went the way of the pet rock.

However, Strong wore her bracelet much longer than most. In fact, James Moreland's name has been on her wrist every day, without exception, for the past 38 years.

"I just wanted to keep the promise," Strong said.

At this point, Strong says keeping the promise means wearing the bracelet until Moreland's remains are found and returned.

"I knew there was family out there who was waiting for word, and I was just going to wait along with them," Strong said.

Anita and Linda are Moreland's sisters and closest surviving relatives. When they heard about Kathy a few years ago they asked to meet.

"To have worn his bracelet for so long," Anita said, "we just love her to death."

"She did care," her sister Linda added. "And she still does care."

Strong said she thinks about Moreland everyday. "It's usually when I have my hands out in front of me - you know, maybe driving a car or typing on the keyboard and I just think I wonder when he's coming home."

She's been wondering almost 4 decades -- but no more. In January, James Moreland's sisters got word that their brother's remains had been found and identified. In May he'll be buried, between his mother and father, in a full military funeral.

Strong said she's "going to remove the bracelet and have it buried with him."

WALNUT CREEK WOMEN ATTENDS ALABAMA MEMORIAL FOR SOLDIER WHOSE BRACELET SHE WORE FOR DECADES

By Mike Oliver
Birmingham (Ala.) News

BRIERFIELD, Ala. -- They came to pay respects to a fallen Green Beret killed 43 years ago. They came Saturday from all over the country and all over Alabama and even Walnut Creek. About 400 crowded around a gravesite at a little country cemetery about 40 miles south of Birmingham.

They came to pay tribute to James Leslie Moreland, born in Bessemer Sept. 29, 1945, killed in Vietnam Feb. 7, 1968 -- but whose remains were only recently positively identified and brought stateside.

"I hope everyone knows why we are here today," said Col. Paul Longgrear, Moreland's commanding officer, in the eulogy. "We are not here to celebrate a burial. He was already buried in the debris of war. We are here today to celebrate a homecoming."

Moreland was buried Saturday at Ashby Cemetery in Bibb County in a spot long ago reserved for him, between his mother and father.

A 21-gun salute punctured the rural quiet. When taps played, retired and active military, at least one-third of the crowd, snapped salutes.

Then roaring through the clouds came four Navy jets in formation, until one jet dramatically peeled away, symbolizing the departure of this fallen soldier.

Moreland was a 22-year-old Special Forces medic when he was last seen mortally wounded at Lang Vei on the South Vietnamese border in a battle remembered as the first time the Vietnamese used tanks. In 1978, the Army declared Moreland dead, although his body had not been recovered.

His mother, Gladys Parks, went to her grave, knowing her son was probably dead, but refusing to give up, Moreland's sisters said.

"When they asked Mom, 'Do you want him to be declared dead,' she said 'no,'" said Linda Brown, 62. "She wanted him to be brought home first."

Several excavations at the battle site over the years yielded numerous bits of remains that took years to identify. Late last year, DNA from family members was a match for Moreland. The family was notified earlier this year and prepared for the burial in the family cemetery.

Before burial Saturday, a 51-year-old Walnut Creek woman removed her MIA bracelet featuring Moreland's name and put it in the casket. Kathy Strong had worn it ever since she received it as a Christmas present at the age of 12, in 1972.

"Although I'm not wearing the bracelet any more, he will be with me the rest of my life," said a tearful Strong.

After a 2008 Bay Area News Group feature on Strong and the 40th anniversary of Moreland's disappearance, the soldier's family contacted her and they started a relationship. A friend visited the spot where he was last seen and brought her dirt, barbed wire and a bullet from the area, which she kept as mementos.

Strong researched Moreland's Green Beret unit and learned more about the young man whose name adorned her bracelet.

Once his remains were identified, Strong vowed to attend his funeral.

By later afternoon Saturday, her wrist was bare.
The night before the burial there was a standing room only memorial service at the American Village in Montevallo in which Gov. Robert Bentley made a surprise appearance. He gave the family a flag that had flown at the state capital.

"Never in my dreams would I have thought it would be like this," said Moreland's older sister, Edna Anita LeMoine, 73, of Olympia, Wash.

At the cemetery Army officers presented LeMoine with the flag from the casket. They had folded the flag and tucked in three spent brass M-16 shells representing: duty, honor, country.

Moreland's childhood years were spent in Alabama, before he finished high school in Anaheim, where he became an all-county football player at Western

At least two dozen retired and active Green Berets attended from around the country.

"It's been worth waiting 43 years to see this," said William Amelung, a 65-year-old retired Green Beret who trained with Moreland and "earned our berets together"

"If you look at history, there would not have been this kind of support in '68," Amelung said.

Retired Sgt. Major Dennis Thompson served with Moreland at Lang Vei and traveled from Washington state to attend the service. When asked why, the fellow Green Beret said simply, "Because he would have done the same for me."

KHESANH VETERANS ATTEND BURIAL & MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR SFC JAMES L. MORELAND KIA AT LANG VEI

By Thomas Eichler E Co 2/26
Hill 861A

Hundreds of veterans, and people who did not know him, read or learned the story of James Moreland, also attended the memorial services. Among them were many members of the Khe Sanh Veterans association.

Gary Jones, the brother of Scott Jones (KSV Security Plt) and Colonel Longgrear, James Moreland's former Commanding Officer were an integral part in putting together the memorial.

Khe Sanh Veterans came from across the country. Toby Rushforth the F/O Pilot who first observed the tanks attacking Lang Vei, and assisted the defenders, came with his beautiful Wife Audrey, all the way from Hawaii.

Khe Sanh Veterans Jack Haigwood, Dennis Waler, and Ron Miller an army veteran, drove their motorcycles from Ohio to join members of the Patriot-Guard Riders in the memorial motorcade. Ed Kufeldt, one of the Helicopter Pilots who flew the rescue mission at Lang Vei, and Bruce Marcus one of the A-1 Skyraider Pilots at the battle of lang Vei, also travelled long distances to attend the memorial. Rich Green and Bill Balzano, Hq Security Plt, also came to honor James Moreland.

I presented each member of the Moreland Family, a certificate from the Khe Sanh Veterans (See Back Cover), and a certificate to Mary Strong who wore James Moreland's MIA Bracelet for 40 Years. At the memorial service, she placed the bracelet in his casket.

Mrs. Daphney Walker of 899 Rolling Mill Road
Brierfield Alabama Took over 500 Photos and gave a disc to the Khe Sanh Veterans to use in our magazine. Many of the photos that appear in this issue came from that same disc.

Day is gone, gone the sun.
From the hills, from the lake, from the skies.
All is well, safety rest; God is nigh.

Go to sleep, peaceful sleep,
May the soldier or sailor, God keep.
On the land or the deep, safe in sleep.

Love, good night, must thou go,
When the day, and the night, need thee so?
All is well Speedeth all to their rest.

Fades the light, and afar goeth day,
And the stars shineth bright,
Fare thee well; day has gone, night is on.

Thanks and praise, for our days,
'Neath the sun, neath the stars, 'neath the sky we go, 'This we know, God is nigh.

"HARDEST WORKING JUDGE HONORED"

DAVID O. CARTER
KHE SANH VETERAN
C CO 1/9

SANTA ANA – On a recent Sunday morning, the judge in charge of one of the biggest legal battles in American business walks into his courtroom nursing a McDonald's senior coffee and wearing an untucked button-down shirt, tennis shoes and blue jeans that hide his UCLA Bruins socks.

David O. Carter, a U.S. District Court Judge, may not look the part, but here, in this 9th floor courtroom, there's no doubt who's in charge.

Bleary-eyed attorneys and their assistants, weighed down by boxes of exhibits and documents, stream into the Ronald Reagan Federal Courthouse. And Carter, 66, helps carry one of the boxes. Technically, the courthouse is closed. But that's rarely stopped Carter from holding regular weekend sessions during big cases. He doesn't want the jury to sit through sidebars and delays, so he handles motions and other details of complex litigation when jurors have gone home – on weekends, holidays, early mornings and late evenings.

Within seconds of getting into his courtroom he checks the burnout factor, asking attorneys how they're hanging in. Then, just after 8 a.m., Carter gets to the nitty-gritty of what he wants to hammer out. Speaking rapidly, at times shaking his coffee, Carter, a decorated Marine and the grandson of a onetime bailiff, makes legal point after legal point about the case at hand, Mattel v. MGA Entertainment Inc., an epic multimillion-dollar clash over who has the rights to the popular toys, Bratz dolls.
Judge Carter's isn't a typical courtroom.

HUMANE MARINE

"He will address the most hard core gangster in the same way that he addresses the CEO of a publicly traded corporation," says Kate Corrigan, president of the Orange County criminal defense bar.

"He doesn't demand of the lawyers anything that he doesn't demand of himself," says Santa Monica attorney Mark Overland, who once spent six months in Carter's court, trying a case related to the Mexican mafia. "He's definitely the hardest working judge I've been in front of, and I've been practicing now for 45 years."

That may be a product of his upbringing.
Carter, 66, grew up in Portland, Ore., Oakland and Fremont, attending eight schools in six years. His father left the family when Carter was a baby, and he was raised by his mother and his maternal grandparents. They shared a household with two aunts, one a bartender and the other a dancer.

Carter won a scholarship to UCLA, where he graduated with a 4.0 GPA. After college he joined the Marines and found himself in Vietnam on Christmas Eve 1967.
In Vietnam, Carter's 62-man platoon fought one of the war's pivotal battles, the bloody Siege of Khe Sanh. On April 16, 1968, Carter and his men scaled Hill 689 to help another Marine company pinned down by intense enemy fire.

A grenade blew off a part of his upper lip. His arm was shattered in 38 places by sniper fire. Bleeding, he helped other casualties and fought for five more hours until he was forced to leave the battleground. Eight men in Carter's platoon survived. His actions earned him the Bronze Star and Purple Heart.

While recovering from his wounds in a hospital he made a commitment to go to law school "simply because I wanted to have some independence, maybe have some small influence in some way, and maybe help somebody who might need help someday."

Carter's grandfather, Melvin Lane, had been a courthouse bailiff in Portland. And as a kid, Carter accompanied him to court once a year.

"I remember leaving – because those judges were so gracious – believing that my grandfather ran that courthouse," Carter recalls.

"So, here are judges who had so much humility and humanness to them that they took their court staff and made a grandson believe that my grandfather was the primary person in the courthouse. I have never forgotten that."

AN IDEALIST, STILL

As the Mattel v. MGA case wound down, with jurors finding that Bratz belonged to MGA, it was difficult to remember that Carter's judicial history as a judge in Orange County has been largely about people, not money.

Carter has duct-taped the mouths of unruly defendants. He has personally inspected junkies' arms for track marks. He has applauded, from the bench, when an offender took what Carter viewed as the right path.

And he's worked to fix his mistakes.
"The thing about him also is when he makes a mistake he tries to remedy it," says defense attorney Overland. "Usually judges rule and they think they're infallible."

Two years ago Carter resurrected the tattoo removal program for ex-cons in federal court that he originally launched in the 1990s when he was on the bench of the Orange County Superior Court.

"Judge Carter believes that some defendants can change their ways," Corrigan says, adding that Carter's optimism isn't blind and that he isn't easily conned.

"For those to whom he gives a chance, they will be reporting to him on a regular basis in his courtroom and keeping him apprised of their efforts to rehabilitate their lives ... I have seen clients really flourish under this model.

This, along with other aspects of his willingness to think outside the box, separate Judge Carter from other judicial officers."
The bench has humbled Carter and he's mindful that his decisions go beyond the legal minutia.

"It's been quite a journey ... I'd sure like to leave the bench with a legacy of having not lost my humanity."

At an age when many near retirement, Carter remains an idealist.

"I think that when you lose your ability to change with the times ...it's time," to make your exit, he says. "You never want to leave the bench with people saying 'what a good judge he or she used to be.

ACCOUNTING FOR ROCKETS
The Attack of May 17, 2007 on the IZ
Baghdad, Iraq
By Gary Foster

Sometimes they whistle, sometimes, in their arcing flight from one side of the Tigris to the other, they are silent. Sometimes they are rockets and sometimes they are mortars. But in either case, when they hit the ground, the explosion shakes everything. The sound of the detonation is piercing and reverberates far and wide around the entire area sending shivers up everyone's spine. There is no mistaking the sound the replication of which is not possible through the printed word. The word "Boom" would be reserved for explosions that are relatively far away, the pressure wave mitigated by the air; and "Bang" would be more for instantaneous, sharper explosions the sound of which is not insulated by strata of air or nullified or diffused by distance. These impacts are of course much closer in – sometimes - gritting my teeth - right next door.

Some people who arrive in Baghdad and are not attuned to the sounds of rockets and mortars often comment, "Uh, no, I didn't here anything last night. What rockets?" What? One can only wonder. At the other extreme, others react quickly and awkwardly to sounds that are not commonly or frequently heard or are not familiar; such as the sudden loud banging of the lid on a large garbage dumpster. All unfamiliar sounds become the same: rockets. Not true of course, but the trick is to learn to distinguish sounds and be able to discern quickly the specific sound of rockets, if one can, while they're still in flight and gauge where they will fall. But then of course one needs to know where one is in relationship to the launch point. This is the hard part. Then the dilemma: if one were to gauge that the round is going to fall on him or her, it would suggest a rapid departure from the area. That having been said, the real trick is to get inside under cover immediately when one hears the whine or an explosion. There are reasons for this. Rockets and mortars are deadly and one never knows what the intentions or thought processes are of the gunners. They may shoot the first round here, the next round there, etc. There is no way of knowing. Is it a clustered barrage on a specific target or just harassing indiscriminate firing?

Our first night in Baghdad, we heard a long whistle, then silence then a big boom. The projectile went over our heads probably a thousand feet high or so and landed two kilometers away. Then a second one soared overhead and then a third. But it was the fourth one that was a bit different. The whistle was short not shrill and sure enough the rocket landed much closer to us. And, for sure, it went Bang. The round fell very close.

The role of artillery, it has been explained to me, is to cause confusion, disruption and disarray among advancing enemy troops or to cause demoralization among the enemy who may be amassed several miles away. The constant explosions, in addition to the usual destruction that ensues, would be psychologically debilitating: a portent of ominous things to come from the advance of the opposing army. The pounding would be surely unnerving. Rockets and mortars are being used here like mini-artillery. I am reminded of what my friend Dennis Mannion once old me. Projectiles from artillery are usually on range but they can waver left or right. Rockets are usually on their intended azimuth but can fall short or long. Good to know if one is on top of a hill; and good to know in general. But in the IZ, this knowledge does not provide much of a comfort.

Depending on the size of the rocket or mortar shell (usually denoted in inches or millimeters of diameter), the same affect can be facilitated. The problem with rockets of course is that some may be supersonic and the sound of the missile as it flies through the air will be heard only after the explosion at impact. This is not very helpful when accounting for rockets. Too late. Mortar shells, on the other hand, just fall from the vacant sky like giant stones. The situation is not much better. There is little advance

So when the rockets (actually 122mm mortars) hit us on the 17th they turned an otherwise mundane day into an exciting day – perhaps that's the only benefit of rockets. We kept count. The first impact occurred at about 3:30PM and it shook the building. Then there was a second one farther away and then a third and fourth A slight pause and then number five: BANG! Just outside the building. I turned to my colleague and said, "Alan, they're not stopping." I was right. Then more: boom, bang, boom, bang, BANG - far, close, far and close and then very close. With our bodies tensed, still as mannequins, our hands poised over the keyboards of our computers, like unfinished statues, we looked up at the ceiling - dust settling. A slight pause and they started again. This time Bang... Bang... Bang in rapid succession. They had us in their sights. We could not tell with any certainty on which side of the building they were landing but they were near and we began to realize they have the area targeted and bracketed. They were just dropping the rounds down the launch tube and letting them launch and arc over the river to land among us. We were sitting ducks. Then it turned quiet. We waited for more but none came. Surely there would be more. The barrage was over. Three hours later, after the all-clear, we ventured outside expecting to see devastation. We saw nothing. Then a crowd began running to the back of the building and we followed them. My God! Look at that! The entire area was torn apart. Smashed cars and trucks, shattered windows, punctured tires, scarred vehicles, the smell of gasoline and shrapnel holes in the walls of rooms of trailers where people stayed. Debris everywhere. One car took a direct hit. It was reduced to a pile of smoking, twisted steel.

We walked across the street to the Freedom Tower area. Same thing: big congregation of people and 30 heavily damaged cars. We spotted the impact craters in the parking lot and saw broken glass everywhere; again the smell of gasoline from punctured gas tanks. Cars were splattered with shrapnel. Continuing to look around, we noted the walls of buildings were all pitted and gouged, some windows shattered, palm trees scarred and branches cut off, fronds on the ground. The place was rendered quite the mess.

The impact craters were shallow, about 3 feet in diameter, but the spread of shrapnel, not the depth of crater, is what is important. The pavement immediately adjacent to the craters was gouged in a radial pattern away from the center. This is what tells analyst the direction and angle of impact.

Two people who hear or see the same event never see or hear the exact same thing. The number of shots heard in Dealey Plaza in 1963 range between 3 and 5. Hence accounting for rockets requires confirmation through a ground count. After each rocket attack a sweep is made of the area to be sure there is no unexploded ordnance. Accounting for rockets is an easy counting process: here's one crater...there's two around the corner... now three, up the street to the left... etc. Once all rockets are accounted for, specialists examine the crater and the broadcast of shrapnel. Impact analysis is an oft heard expression. This is somewhat interesting.

Every type of ordnance has a signature explosion and a known range. Knowing the type of ordnance, as may be deduced from the sound, one can ascertain the distance limits from which it may have been fired. That effective radius is now known. But the direction from which the rocket came, remains a key unknown. The blast scene will reveal this piece of the puzzle. The spread of shrapnel will reveal approximate direction (and distance).

Impacts can be straight down, that is perpendicular to the flatness of the lay of the land, or oblique. If the spread of shrapnel is evenly distributed in a circular pattern away from the blast center, then the trajectory was more than likely a fully developed parabola. The projectile went up, arced and fell straight down. Depending on the caliber of the round, the launch tube may be near. In this case, maybe coalition forces can kill or apprehend the perpetrators quickly.

If the spread of shrapnel is more lopsided or fan shaped, then the projectile came in at an angle (obliquely) meaning the tube was more likely farther away. This poses a more doubtful arrest. It further raises the importance of the answers to the same set of questions: from where and from what distance? Assuming the launch was not seen, these questions can be answered through an examination of the spread or lie of the explosion and the resulting spray of shrapnel.

We are often perplexed at how small the resulting crater is. This is not too surprising really given that rockets are designed not to destroy facilities but rather to create chaos and to annihilate troops or ground forces. The bang is seemingly more disconcerting than the destruction, but of course it's the reverse that is really more of a concern. This is to neither ignore nor downplay the menacing effects of the shrapnel or its insidious killing behavior.

After the sustained rocket attack of the 17th, we found hundreds of pieces of shrapnel on the sidewalks and streets and on roofs. Everywhere we looked we found shrapnel. One doesn't have to look hard. Shrapnel comes in all sizes: small shards to large chunks. Because of its irregular, jagged shape, shrapnel is easily distinguished from rocks or pebbles of roughly the same size. But when finding shrapnel so far away from the blast center, what one realizes is that within a 500 foot radius of an impact site, the area is lethal. The noise of the explosion, regardless of how loud or muffled, belies the true affect of the ordnance. Its spread of steel-alloy barbs can kill and maim at distances one may consider safe. On a more but very simple level, it's not wise either to walk around barefoot when accounting for rockets. Shrapnel is razor sharp, jagged; and due to its texture and color somewhat difficult to spot. Just because the explosion has past and the shrapnel now lies inert, it can still cause injuries.

And today, the 19th of May, mortars and rockets again - and lots of people caught outside. LTCOL Maun counted eight in rapid succession. The British Embassy compound is being hammered, or so they say. Tony Blair is here. No M&Ms, no licorice, nor twizzlers nor strawberries from the PX today. No tidbits and teasers, nothing at all to while away the day. Accounting for rockets; that's all there is.

JAMES OYSTER
D CO 1/26

Moving Trees begins with the 20-year-old's trip from his family's West Virginia farm and follows him through the hot, steamy jungles of Vietnam to the final injury that sends him home. Readers can relive his courage at facing another day and mourn with him as he holds a dying fellow Marine. Small luxuries like hot chow and showers mean the world to men living from day to day. Oyster holds nothing back, whether it's descriptions of R&R, impatience about getting back to the action or fear when the enemy starts shooting. Although the young Marine survives the war, it changes him forever.

Author James Oyster received two Purple Hearts and a Bronze Star with Valor as a Marine during the Battle of Khe Sanh and other engagements during the Vietnam War. During his tour, Oyster served as a fire team leader, squad leader, right guide, platoon sergeant and platoon commander. He spent eight months at Bethesda Naval Hospital recovering from his injuries. After his discharge from the Marine Corps, he taught middle school and high school and served as principal and coach during an educational career that has lasted almost 40 years.

EAST SIDE PARK NAMED FOR EL PASO MARINE KILLED AT KHE SANH DURING VIETNAM WAR

by Milan Simonich / El Paso Times .

So brave was Marine Sgt. Jesus R. Vasquez that he picked up a burning mortar shell and tried to throw it into a Vietnamese crater before it could detonate and hurt his buddies.

The round exploded before Vasquez could get rid of it, killing him at age 20. He did not know it, but he succeeded in protecting his platoon, just as he intended.

"By his bold initiative, gallant fighting spirit and loyal devotion to duty, he was instrumental in saving his comrades from further injury or possible death by absorbing most of the impact with his own body," Vasquez's citation for the Navy Cross says.

The Navy Cross is America's second-highest award for combat valor, behind only the Medal of Honor. Vasquez died on Jan. 30, 1968, and his parents accepted the medal on his behalf five months later. That was the last time he made news.

Vasquez's story shows that even heroes who give their lives for others can be mostly forgotten.

Manuel A. Gameros, a 72-year-old Navy veteran and retired teacher, wants to change that by shining attention on Vasquez. Gameros has become interested, perhaps obsessed, with Vasquez's short life and terrible death.

He learned about Vasquez on the Internet, scrolling through "the virtual wall" of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial. It contains the names of the 58,260 U.S. servicemen who died in Vietnam. Included are Vasquez and 125 others from

"I don't know anything at all about him, except what I've read," Gameros said. "But what he did was extraordinary. I would like to see a street or a city park named in his honor."

Gameros has experience in bringing the stories of servicemen to the public's attention.

He was part of a group that sought public recognition for another fallen Marine Corps sergeant, Roberto Ituarte. A rifleman, Ituarte died in combat in Vietnam on Dec. 11, 1965, when he was 24 years old.

After a campaign by Gameros and others, school board members in the Socorro district named a new elementary school in honor of Ituarte in 2005.

Now, Gameros said, his hope is to persuade somebody in government to provide a fitting tribute to Vasquez, whose compelling story never received much attention, perhaps because much of the country had turned against the war in Vietnam by the time he died.

Vasquez's death was reported in a two-paragraph story in the El Paso Times. When his parents accepted his Navy Cross in June 1968, the newspapers covered it with a photo and a caption that misspelled the first name of Vasquez's father, Emilio.

By then, President Lyndon B. Johnson had decided not to seek re-election, largely because he had escalated the war in Vietnam and much of the country was angry about it.

But from every indication, Vasquez died doing the job he coveted.

Born in El Paso on the Fourth of July, 1947, Jesus

Roberto Vasquez became the kind of gung-ho Marine who looked like he belonged on a recruiting poster. His interest in military service defined him as a teen ager.

At Jefferson High School, he was a second lieutenant in ROTC and a member of the rifle and drill teams. Vasquez graduated from Jefferson in 1965, then worked briefly at a drugstore. He enlisted in the Marines at a time when other young men were scrambling to obtain draft deferments.

By April 1966, less than a year out of high school, he was combat ready, having completed training at Camp Pendleton, Calif. His heroics in South Vietnam began after enemy soldiers fired mortars and rockets at the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Several rounds landed in an ammunition supply area, starting a fire.

Vasquez "rushed to the burning munitions and assisted in fighting the fire," says his citation for the Navy Cross.

It was there that he saw a burning 81mm mortar round. He grabbed it because he knew his buddies' lives were in danger, and he did all he could to keep them out of harm's way.

Before the attack on the ammunition depot was over that day, Vasquez and three fellow Marines were dead. The others were from Minnesota, Virginia and Connecticut, places Vasquez probably never got a chance to see.

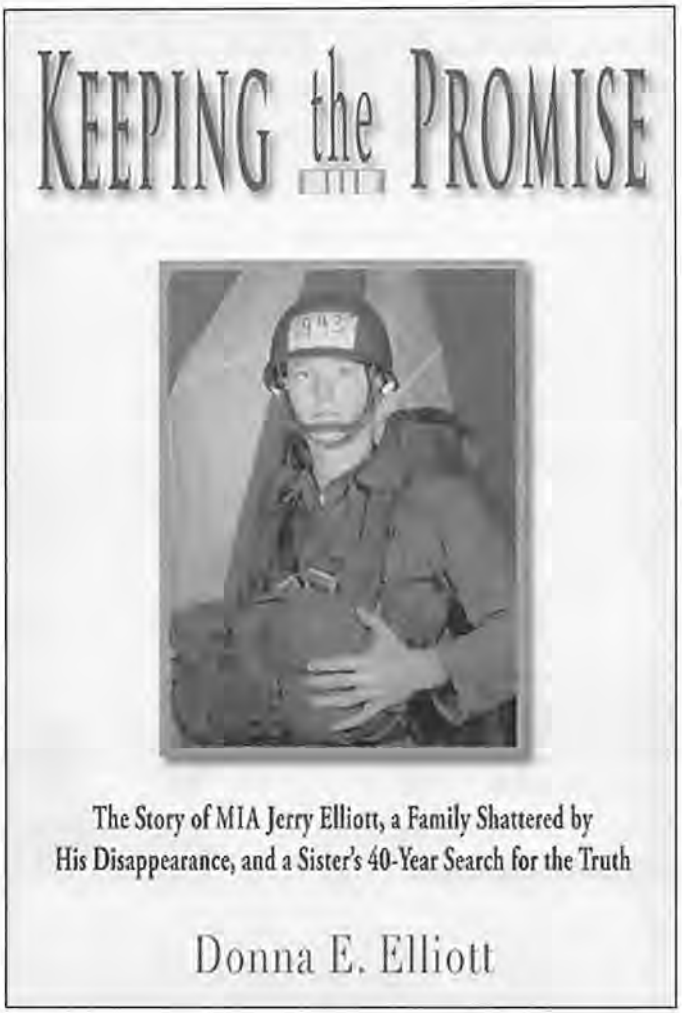
As a recipient of the Navy Cross, Vasquez has a place in military history. Gameros wants more. He says a lasting tribute to Vasquez in El Paso is long overdue.

SERGEANT JESUS R. VASQUEZ
USMC, EOD 1ST FORCE SERVICE REGIMENT/FORCE LOGISTIC COMMAND

Citation:

The Navy Cross is awarded to Sergeant Jesus R. Vasquez, United States Marine Corps, for extraordinary heroism while serving as an Explosive Ordnance Disposal Technician with the Ammunition Company, Supply Battalion, First Force Service Regiment/Force Logistic Command in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam on 30 January 1968. During a mortar and rocket attack at the Khe Sanh Combat Base, several rounds landed in the ammunition supply point, igniting a stack of ammunition. Sergeant Vasquez, unhesitatingly rushed to the burning munitions and assisted in fighting the fire. Observing an 81mm mortar round burning and aware of the proximity of his comrades and the possibility of detonation, he lifted the round in an attempt to throw it into a deep crater where its lethal effects would be absorbed should it detonate. In his attempt to throw the round, it exploded, mortally wounding him. By his bold initiative, gallant fighting spirit and loyal devotion to duty, he was instrumental in saving his comrades from further injury or possible death by absorbing most of the impact with his own body. His great personal valor reflected great credit upon himself and enhanced the finest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life for his country.

BOOK REVIEW



On January 21, 1968, the 282nd AHC was on a mission to support U.S. troops under siege in Khe Sanh village when the lead helicopter was shot down by the North Vietnamese. In the midst of the enemy, Jerry Elliott jumped from his gunner's seat to rescue fellow Black Cat soldiers, and simply vanished. The military listed him as Missing In Action--MIA--a hellish classification that provides neither comfort nor closure to those back home.

Officially designated as "Case 1000" by the Department of Defense, Jerry's fate is still uncertain, despite a determined quest for the truth by his younger sister, Donna. Frustrated at nearly every turn by the POW/MIA bureaucracy, she stoically continues the search--one that has taken her from Washington, D.C. to Vietnam and back again.
Keeping the Promise is a bittersweet tale of a sister's unending dedication to do just that--keep the promise made to her brother, to the families of the POW/MIAs, and most importantly, to those left behind in Southeast Asia: We won't stop until every last man has the fullest possible accounting.

READER REVIEWS

I just finished this book by Donna Elliot. A story of Jerry, Donna's brother, who was missed in action during the VN war. He still remains as MIA. It also tells about, how Donna has been trying to locate his remains and how she got in touch with Jerry's friends in the army. This book is highly recommended to all, who are interested in the VN but also to all who wants to read a well written book about a family, who has had tragic time but also many happy times. Donna knows how to put a story together. I read the book without a break, from the beginning to the end. Just couldn't stop. I can assure you, that this book is one of the best. So I advise you to get it as long there still are copies available.

Keeping the Promise is an inspiring and emotional journey of a sister's search for her brother. Jerry W. Elliott, a much loved son, brother, and friend was classified as missing in action (MIA) on January 21, 1968 in Vietnam. Although Jerry's status as MIA set the Elliott family on a path of bitter despair and struggle, his sister Donna's journey in Keeping the Promise is one born out of a tremendous desire to honor a promise and find truth. She's waded through bureaucratic red-tape and trod the hills of Vietnam - all for the sake of bringing our unaccounted soldiers home.

I experienced strong emotions while reading Keeping the Promise. I chuckled at humorous memories shared and shed tears as I imagined being told my big brother was missing in a war. I felt anger and frustration with the lack of answers provided to the Elliott family, but I also felt an overwhelming sense of hope for reconciliation and closure for the families of those still missing because the search continues. The POW/MIA families, the Vietnam veterans, and others who care will not stop searching until there is a full-accounting.

I highly recommend Keeping the Promise to the military history reader who also enjoys understanding the social effects of war, to everyone with a loved one currently serving in the military, to the families of those still unaccounted for, to those who love their siblings, and to anyone who wants to be inspired by hope and determination.

I have known Donna Elliott for several years after meeting her online through the Khe Sanh Veterans Association (A group of Veterans, of which I am a member, who served at the Khe Sanh Marine Base in Vietnam).

Donna is an excellent writer and wordsmythe. She has that rare talent of putting you right into the events and, at times, it was so real I had to put the book down for a while and come back to it later. I am a Combat Air Force Vietnam Veteran who flew missions into Khe Sanh where Donna's brother disappeared. I cannot fathom the pain and agony she has gone through all of these years while dealing with a government bureaucracy that at times seems to be the real enemy. I respect Donna's tenacity and her fortitude to find out and seek closure on her brother's fate. I pray to God Almighty that she will find the answer to her brother's fate soon.

I consider this book in a "Must Read" category for every American citizen who values the sacrifices and the honor of servicemen like Donna's brother who gave their best effort in a very unpopular war. You will not be disappointed in reading her brother's story. It is one of those books "you just can't put down" until you have finished

Donna, I pray that you find closure and peace in your lifetime and that Jerry's sacrifice will be duly noted and honored at the highest level in our Country and that I will one day see and greet you in person.

EVENTS WE EXPERIENCE IN "KEEPING A PROMISE" PART ONE

Glenn Prentice was a 19 year-old radio operator and forward observer attached to India 3/26 during the Siege of Khe Sanh in 1968, one of only 17 out of 350 Marines to serve on Hill 881S who was neither killed nor wounded. In late January, after India Company had tried to take Hill 881N and were getting hit with powerful 122mm mortar rounds, he was part of the working party tasked by CPT Bill Dabney to lower, or dig deeper, the ammo bunker near the top of the Hill 881S where explosive rounds for the 105 gun, 106 recoilless rifles, and 81 mortar rounds were stored.

After digging a few feet into the red-clay dirt, the Marines unearthed hundreds of rapidly decaying bodies of North Vietnamese soldiers, apparently buried during the Khe Sanh Hill Fights during May or June 1967. "It was gruesome and smelled so bad we had to quit," Prentice recalled, "The bodies were black with yellow stuff leaking out—a sickening sweet smell that made you lose your cookies."

Obviously, the smell never left the young Marine's memory because forty-three years later, on April 12, 2011, as Glenn walked atop Hill 881S in order to lead General Thanh Minh Tran and other members of the Quang Tri Provincial Military Command to the general location of a mass NVA burial site, the smell of rotten flesh once again licked his nostrils and sickened the combat veteran. He turned pale in the warm Asian sun, was tempted to turn and leave this place of tragic memories and haunting smells. I knew my friend endured only because due to a strange turn of events, he was there to help the Vietnamese recover approximately 200 of their war dead in exchange for information on one U.S. MIA...my brother, SSGT Jerry W. Elliott.

In July 2010, U.S. Army vet, Joe Schmeling, had accompanied Glenn to his old battlefield on Hill 881S in the company of Duy Thanh Nguyen. Duy [Dwee] is a guide with DMZ Tours in Dong Ha, which appears to hold exclusive rights to the 'special permits' required by tourists to stay out of trouble in Quang Tri Province. He overheard Joe ask Glenn if he knew were any NVA bodes were buried on Hill 881S, and took particular interest in the response of, "Yes, about 200."

The following August, about three weeks after Glenn had returned to the U.S., he received an email from Duy requesting his assistance. Would he be willing to return to Khe Sanh and lead the Vietnamese military to the mass grave. Glenn's response was two-fold: "Yes, I understand why your government wants to recover the bodies to give relief and peace to the families of the fallen NVA soldiers. I am willing to come back to Hill 881S to assist...I would only ask one thing in return—that you would allow me to talk to a few NVA former soldier's that might know about a former helicopter crewman who was MIA at the Old French Fort in January 1968 named Jerry Elliott. I have been assisting his sister, Donna, for years to find any information regarding her brother."

Glenn's effort was appreciated, but I didn't really think the Vietnamese would agree to his terms, or even had the funds to recover their MIAs. Months went by and we didn't hear a word. Perhaps it was the $1M the U.S. gave to Vietnam in November 2010 to help locate and identify the remains of the Vietnamese soldiers missing in action during the war that generated the February 2010 email from Duy announcing the final conclusion of the Quang Tri Policies Committee of the Provincial Military Command [unit responsible for recovering NVA remains.] The mission was a go!

According to Duy, in March 2011, he and a representative from the Huong Hoa District level would survey the site. From April 21 to May 5, a recovery team from District and Provincial level would begin the excavation of remains, and "...they will help Donna to do something." Duy required that we provide him was completed.

In order to move things along and promote goodwill, I quickly with passport and visa numbers. Glenn and I were told to plan to be in Khe Sanh for the duration of the recovery on Hill 881S, so we assumed any discussion regarding Jerry would come after the recovery provided Duy with information that might be helpful regarding the NVA MIAs on Hill 881S, and in location potential live witnesses relative to Case 1000: "It is deeply meaningful for veterans to help veterans find each other's war dead. To assist , I attempted to research records that might help identify the soldiers buried on Hill 881S/High Point 845. Perhaps these approximate 210 war martyrs served with Su Doan 325 and fell in battle between 26 April - 01 May 1967. I find no exact location of a mass grave in the records. Marine's who walked Hill 881S/High Point 845 on 02 May 1967 remarked that only one body of a North Vietnamese soldier remained on the hill. Possibly the comrades of those killed had buried their friends in one of the many bunkers before leaving the area. It is fortunate that Glenn remembers where he found this grave in January 1968 so their families can have traditional burial ceremony when they are recovered.

Concerning my brother, Jerry Elliott, he disappeared on 21 January 1968, when Tran Dinh Ky, a soldier with the 11th Company, 9th Battalion, 66th Regiment, 304th Division, fired a B-40 round that crashed the lead helicopter at Ku Boc/The Old French Fort, just south of the village of Khe Sanh (location is now next to fire tower by new soccer stadium.) Jerry left his position on a different chopper to aid survivors of the crashed helicopter, and he was left behind alive on the ground. 1st LT Nguyen Dinh Thiep and other members of the Quang Tri 258th Local Force were captured when they tried to escape to Lang Khoai. This is all the knowledge I have regarding my brothers fate."

On April 6, 2011, Duy informed us that Mr. Phien and Mr. Duyet with the Provincial Military Command, and Mr. Tam with the District Military Command, had traveled with him to Hill 881S in a QUAT (Russian 4-WD jeep.) He made mention of land mines and ordinance in the area and told us that a forest guard reported recent explosions on the hill due to heat.

Duy said they also went to the Old French Fort, now known as the District Military Watch Tower. He stated he had told Mr. Phien about Jerry's case and Mr. Phien had promised to contact former Division 304th veterans and organize a meeting. Phien would also attempt to find Mr. Ky, the soldier who had fired the B-40 that caused Blackcat #021 to crash.

Things were looking pretty good, when suddenly Duy began to waffle, claiming he was only a 'middleman' who couldn't decide anything, and he couldn't lose more time from work without financial contribution to the company. He ended the email with, "But finding the lost bodies is a humanitarian face. Maybe you understand my situation. I will let the things to the Military Command to arrange everything my themselves." In an attempt to smooth things over, I invited Duy to lunch when we arrived in Dong Ha on April 20th. He readily accepted and asked if Mr. Phien would also be welcome, to which I agreed. After all, how much could a typical Vietnamese meal in Dong Ha cost?

Cathi Gautreaux and I flew into Da Nang on April 15th and taxied with our friend, Tam [Tom] Le, up to Hue to meet Glenn. I phoned Duy from Hue on the 19th to let him know we would be in Dong Ha the next day for our lunch date. He insisted on sending one of the DMZ Tour drivers to pick us up. The price he quoted seemed fair enough, and tourism was Duy's main income, so Glenn and I agreed to accept the taxi and make the man happy.

Early the next morning, the four of us crowded into a van stuffed with luggage and Khe Sanh survival food, and began our journey with high expectations. DMZ Tours owns a restaurant and a hotel; we had assumed Duy would meet us at his place of business. I knew something was amiss when three or four young Vietnamese boys frantically flagged the taxi down in front of a different restaurant near the Hwy 9 turn in Dong Ha.

When Glenn introduced us, Duy actually stepped back when he realized who I was. He said I did not look as expected. Still not sure what he meant by that. We were quickly ushered to an upstairs dining room prearranged by our host. Basically, Duy was courteous to both Cathi and I, but tended to focus his attention on Glenn. He was not pleased to meet Tam at all, but seemed placated when I told him she was only along to visit friends in Khe Sanh.

Mr. Phien joined us shortly thereafter, but declined to share the lackluster meal placed on the table before us in the stuffy, fly-filled dining room. When the waitress brought the meal ticket, we were shocked to discover the bill was over $2M dong, right at $100 USD! In America we call that a bribe, but what's an MIA sister to do in these circumstances?

We paid the bill, continued onto Khe Sanh, checked into the Tahi Ninh Hotel, unaffectionately nicknamed 'The Pink Palace," and prepared to meet with the Quang Tri military the next morning at 0830 and travel up to Hill 881S by jeep.

At 0800 Glenn knocked on our door and told us to hurry, the brass was downstairs and waiting. Duy ushered Glenn, Cathi, and me into a jeep with him to make sure we had little contact with the Vietnamese military without him present, even though there was an obvious language barrier. By this time we had become suspicious that he might be involved in a scheme of some kind to sell Glenn's MIA information to the Vietnamese government, but without understanding the system we were at a loss to see how he could directly benefit monetarily.

The road to Hill 881S was rough and quite a few washouts. Nothing I don't deal with every winter up here in the Ozark Mountains, but I think our white-knuckled QUAT driver was from the city. We bounced up the hill, expecting the oil pan to drag off anytime as the driver centered the jeep across big rocks, but we finally made it to the base of the hill and eagerly climbed out to hump the rest of the trail. Everyone except Duy that is, he hired the local gate guard to motor him to the top.

As usual in the hills of Khe Sanh, Glenn went into military mode and all I saw of him going up Hill 881S was his back. Even the young Vietnamese soldiers had hard time keeping up with this 'old' surfer-dude Marine. At nine o'clock on a sunny April morning it was already hot, so we ladies decided to pace ourselves. The NVA remains weren't going anywhere, and fortunately, no memory demons were chasing us. Besides, the trail required attention. UXO littered the area. Duy had been advised to have the hilltop burned off and the EOD Squad defuse and remove UXO before recovery operations took place, but it appeared as if someone had spent only enough time with a flamethrower to scorch the tallest elephant grass. No real prep work had taken place and the ground was baked hard as a rock from the sun. Provided the actual grave could be rapidly located, it would still takes weeks with pick and shovel to excavate hundreds of fragile remains.

Glenn pulled out maps and photos, moved from one position to another, and pointed out the Vietnamese officers the various minefield locations and the approximate location of the mass grave as Duy translated. Cathi, Tam, and I stayed in the background and watched. After an hour or so, I handed the General a copy of a 1967 NVA map of the area. Until that point he seemed only mildly curious and polite regarding the two American and one Vietnamese females. Perhaps he wondered why we were there at all, surely crossed my mind. He was immediately engrossed with the map and it was passed around to each of the military personnel present. Shortly afterwards, Glenn announced we were going back to Khe Sanh for lunch as guests of the military.

After our meal at a local restaurant, which was much better than the Dong Ha slop, General Tran requested Glenn, Cathi, and I sit at a table with him and Duy to drink tea and discuss important matters. Glenn insisted Tam be present because we wanted assurance Duy was conveying exactly what we said to the General. I tried to give General Tran information on a small burial site south of the Old French Fort which I suspected contained 304th NVA, but Duy quickly said, "We have already recovered these men." He placed the Google Earth image on top of his paperwork without explaining the information to the General. With a polite smile, I daintily reached over and pulled it back into my pile.

In summary, Glenn and I were asked to return to Khe Sanh in May or June when the recovery of the soldiers on Hill 881S would be attempted. Since our return home, we've since learned the Vietnamese plan to proceed with the excavation at the end of May without us. Lesson learned: when dealing with Quang Tri officials demand the information we want before providing the information they want.

Was this seventh trip to Vietnam an extravagant waste of energy and money? Probably, but I blame it on the 'middleman.' Would I do it again? Yes, in a heartbeat if I though we could find the truth about what happened to Jerry. If your brother was last seen alive in the middle of a battle surrounded by the enemy, wouldn't you?

People and Events We Experience in "Keeping a Promise" - Part Two

Our trip to Vietnam wasn't all bad. Snow and Phat, our Khe Sanh friends, invited us to their home for a traditional family meal, and the following day we rented motorbikes and rode up to Hill 881N on our own. The Bru living there are poor and not in good health. Tam helped us buy a little food and medicine and distribute it to those who needed it the most.

We bought flowers and joss sticks and rode motorbikes up Duong Hung Vuong Street to the center of the Old French Fort. Cathi, Glenn, Tam, and I climbed to the highest ground on the northeast corner and conducted a brief Ceremony of Remembrance for Jerry. As the red and yellow roses blew to and fro in the wind, I silently called out, "Where are you, brother?"

Even though Cathi and I discovered when we got back to Da Nang we couldn't change our flights and come back home early without heavy change penalties, at least we were able to attend the Dam Gio of Dale Lewis, a dear friend and U.S. Army vet who passed away last year from Agent Orange related cancer. Dam Gio is the occasion in Vietnam's ancestor worshipping culture where family gathers to remember those members who have passed away. Dale was always willing to go the extra mile to help a MIA family member or friend. He is very much missed and will never be forgotten, so it was an honor to be able to pay tribute with his Vietnamese family.

To cheer me up and celebrate my birthday, Glenn took us on an open jeep tour to visit the site of the old Freedom Hill PX and Beer Garden; Hill 55 aka home of the 9th Marines 'Walking Dead'; and Camp Reasoner, dedicated to USMC LT Frank Stanley Reasoner, who posthumously received the Medal of Honor for his actions in the Vietnam War. A hand-lettered sign once stood near the gates of Camp Reasonser which read: "...First Lieutenant Reasoner sacrificed his life to save one of his wounded Marines. 'Greater Love Hath No Man."

We toured Monkey Mountain in the rolling mist to visit the old Marine Air Control Squadron Four LZ on Hill 647. Cathi spotted a bird of paradise on the way back down, and we all bailed out of the jeep for rare glimpse of a small group of endangered Son Tra red-shacked doc lingers (pygathrix nemaeus.)

The tour ended at Tam's Pub with tasty cheeseburgers and mang smoothies. All in all, the jeep tour turned out to be the highlight of our trip. Jeremy and Tam will take you to any long forgotten military site that has special meaning, and find the correct location or your tour down memory lane is free. http://lookingglassjeeptours.com/

KHE SANH VETERANS

HAPPY HOLIDAYS

THE KAYLOR GRAND HOTEL WITH THE ROCHESTER CONVENTION BUREAU HOSTED A WELCOME PARTY FOR THE KHE SANH VETERANS. ALSO INVITED WERE MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL EAGLE CENTER, WHO RESCUE AMERICAN BALD EAGLES. SEVERAL OF OUR MEMBERS POSED FOR PICTURES WITH ONE OF THE RESCUED BALD EAGLES, WHO ALSO ATTENDED.

TWO OF OUR BRAVE" 3RD ENGRS"

The KSV reunion was quite a success. Although our numbers were somewhat less than other reunions, mainly due to its location and lack of direct airport flights, everyone had a good time.

The City of Rochester and the Grand Kahler Hotel bent over backwards to ensure we enjoyed our stay. The Convention Bureau hosted a welcome party with free food and cocktails, with a appearance by the mayor of Rochester who personally welcomed us.

The Luncheon cruise on the Mississippi River aboard a authentic Paddleboat, was enjoyed by all. The Captain let everyone who chose, to actually take a turn operating the boat.

Rochester has one of the most beautiful Soldiers Memorials, and we decided to have our regularly scheduled Memorial Services,there outdoors at sunset. Wayne Stillman, one of the curators of the memorial, who is also on the committee of the BELL OF HONOR, sat down and helped in the planning. He also arranged for the Bell to be a part of our ceremony.

The ceremony was emceed by our Chaplain Ron Rayner who did a wonderful job. Each of the four services marched in their colors as Ron read aloud the number of personnel that were lost at Khe Sanh from that branch. The ceremony was very touching. Members on Wayne Stillman's staff provided the Audio and music, and seating arrangements as well. After Taps was played and the ceremony ended, the president of the Khe Sanh Veterans, David "Bulldog" Smith, gifted Wayne Stillman, with a new automatic bugle to be used by the Local VFW and Memorial Staff for future ceremonies.

There was an election held for members of the KSV BOD. Tom Eichler was elected President, Russell Turner a Member At Large. All other incumbents retained their seats. Normally I would thank those who did not retain their seat for their services, but Mike Fishbaugh is still aboard in another position so he can continue to contribute his expertise to the KSV. And as always, another shout out to our outgoing president, Bulldog Smith, for his continuing dedication to the KSV.

Every member should have received a package from me, which contained a complete color brochure of all the different items that are available in our PX, and a registration form for the upcoming reunion in Washington DC. However, I neglected to put down Russell Turner's Postal Zone. The correct zone is 63010. Please get them in early since we are again expecting a very large crowd.
REUNION COMMITTEE

Last but not least, we have to thank the lovely Kathy Turner who is the real force behind a successful reunion. She would like to stay behind the scenes and not be recognized, but she does too much for the KSV, not to be. Let us not forget Carol & Dave Meyer and all the other volunteers who do so much to help the reunion committee.

Chaplain's Corner Fall 2011

By Chaplain Ron Rayner

The Rochester reunion was fun and educational. The last three reunions I have attended have shown me that Tommy Eichler, Russ Turner and their families are great examples of people who truly give much of their time for the benefit of all. They certainly have my gratitude for a job well done.

"Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor"

Thank you Ken and Betty Rodgers for a job well done! This is a very moving and inspirational program. I hope there is plenty of notice on the message board before it is on television.

The Rochester Veterans Memorial was very inspiring. This beautiful series of engraved stone walls is a very fitting way to honor United States Military personnel, past and present.

Our Memorial Service went well in the heat and humidity. I believe some of the compliments on the service resulted from some advice from George Burns; "The secret of a good sermon is to have a good beginning and a good ending; and to have the two as close together as possible."

I quoted parts of Ecclesiastes chapter 3 (KJV) in the service; "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under heaven: 2 A time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant and a time to pluck up that which is planted; 3 A time to kill, and a time to heal; a time to break down and a time to build up; 4 A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn and a time to dance; 5 A time to cast away stones, and a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing; 6 A time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away; 7 A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silent and a time to speak; 8 A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war and a time of peace."

For those of us who are affected by Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder it is very important to remember what this says. Most of who were involved in a time of war killed, mourned a friend, lost part of himself or herself, and hated. We also wept, embraced and laughed. War is certainly an intense time that teaches us to take every opportunity to love the people we care about.

So many people quote the Ten Commandments saying "Thou shalt not kill." I personally like the New International Version which says "You shall not murder." Many of us were killers, but not murders. Joshua, Gideon, Samson, Saul, and David were all warriors sent forth to kill in the name of the Lord. We killed for our country and in defense of ourselves and our friends. I fully believe now should be a time of peace in our personal lives. We should be supporting those who are now fighting for our country. The Bible does say there is "A time to kill."

Two books that I recommend for the healing warrior are Stories of Faith and Courage from the Vietnam War by Khe Sanh Veteran Larkin Spivey and Wild at Heart by John Eldredge.

Larkin Spivey uses the daily devotional format to relate 365 short stories from the Vietnam War to Scripture. This book shows how any experience, good or bad, may be turned into positive life changing event. I believe the following quote from Romans 5:3-5 sums up Larkin's book quite well; "We can rejoice, too, when we run into problems and trials for we know they are good for us—they help us learn to be patient. And patience develops strength of character in us and helps us trust God more each time we use it until finally our hope and faith are strong and steady."

John Eldrege in Wild at Heart explains from a biblical point of view why men are the way they are. Eldredge says "in the heart of every man is a desperate desire for a battle to fight, an adventure to live, and a beauty to rescue." He quotes Exodus 15:3; "the Lord is a warrior; the Lord is his name.

I believe this is so true. It is just too bad political correctness and the people that want to weaken the United States of America push their agenda of just being vanilla to everybody and not offending anyone. A perfect example is France after resisting the Germans for four years in World War I. There was a campaign by liberals after WWI to berate military, heroics and guns as if they started the war. It worked. It took less than four weeks for Germany to defeat France in WWII. I believe the left in America keeps trying to do this same type of thing with anti-gun campaigns and all the crap that was put on us Vietnam veterans after our return home.

Joshua 1:6-9 (New Living Translation) is quite clear "Be strong and courageous, for you will lead my people to possess all the land I swore to give to their ancestors.

7 Be strong and very courageous. Obey all the laws Moses gave you. Do not turn away from them, and you will be successful in everything you do.

8 Study this Book of the Law continually. Meditate on it day and night so you may be sure to obey all that is written in it. Only then will you succeed.

9 I command you—be strong and courageous! Do not be afraid or discouraged. For the Lord your God is with you wherever you go."

For those of you out there that have mental conflicts going on, these books may help. I pray we can all take "time to keep" the positive aspects of our experience and "cast away" our bad memories.

RAYS CORNER

VETERANS DAY TALK
By Rev. Ray William Stubbe

11 November 2011 - Veterans Monument, Miller -Coors Brewing Co., Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Upon entering the remarkable National World War I Museum in Kansas City, Missouri, a visitor first sees a large map of France set in the floor below his feet. The map is covered with thousands of red poppies. There are so many, it is as futile to attempt to count them as it would be to count the colored leaves of Fall through which we recently walked. A guide quietly whispers that each poppy represents a thousand killed. It is overwhelming. The scene becomes a window through which we peer at another reality. Like standing in the midst of the black granite Vietnam Memorial Wall, we are silenced, overcome by the enormity of the loss.

When America entered World War I in April, 1917, the war had been going on for three years. When it started, most assumed it would be over within months, but like the fly caught in a spider's web, once started, the agony seemed to have no end. New horrors snuffed soul and spirit as machine-guns, warplanes, bombing, and poison gas, made the conflict a foretaste of hell. Ten months earlier, on 01 July 1916, 60,000 British soldiers marched in parade formation at the Somme River against German strong points, only to be mowed-down by a new weapon of war, the machine gun. The Battle of the Somme raged for four months, only mercifully stopped by rains. It was as if they were tears from God! There were over a million (1,293, 907) casualties in four months, just one battle of World War I. [There were 419,654 British casualties, 204,253 French casualties, and 650,000 German casualties.] During World War I, more than 8 million soldiers died, at least 19 million were wounded, and civilian casualties, obviously in the millions, can only be guessed.

That's why so many poppies cover that map of France in the World War I Memorial Museum at Kansas City, Missouri--over 8,000, one for each 1,000 soldiers killed. One is reminded of Lieutenant Colonel John McRae's famous poem written in World War I after four years' service in that war as he mourned the loss of a friend killed in that war and just before he himself was killed on 28 Jan 1918:

"In Flanders fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place: and in the sky
The larks, still bravely singing, fly
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

Today, we observe Veterans Day, formerly known as Armistice Day. [First observed in 1920, it became a legal holiday by act of Congress on 13 May 1938.] But, because World War I, the "War to End All Wars," only laid the seeds of future wars--World War II and Korea, Congress voted [on 01 June 1954] to change Armistice Day to Veterans Day, a day to honor all veterans, living and dead, of all American wars.

For a brief time, Veterans Day was moved to create a three-day weekend, but the significance of the sacrifice and service of veterans and not a long weekend's personal pursuit of pleasure, soon returned Veterans Day observance to November 11th. [The Uniform Holiday Act, signed 28 June 1968, made Veterans Day part of a 3-day weekend, along with Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, and Columbus Day. The first Veterans Day under the new law was observed with much confusion on 25 Oct 1971. On 20 Sep 1975, President Gerald R. Ford signed legislation restoring the annual observance of 11 November, beginning in 1978.] This year's celebrations are not only the " the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month," but also the year 2011!

During a visit with my folks while on active duty, we were sitting quietly at a restaurant. Two ladies were conversing at an adjacent table. One said: "Would you believe, my neighbor served in the military for twenty years, retired, and is now drawing a pension?"

Her comment stunned me, paralyzing a sudden surge of anger. She would never know the six or eight month separations from family while serving overseas on a Navy ship, the regular grind of long watches at night followed by a full day's work, weeks without showers on a ship at sea, separation from growing up with friends over the years, missed job opportunities, not to mention war's horrors, terrors, and ugly scenes seared forever on the soul. You want my pension? Fine! You can also take my nightmares, my wounds, my inability to live a normal life! my lost innocence, my social isolation. You can have these also! Today, in the midst of high unemployment, veterans have an even higher rate. An alarming percentage of the homeless are veterans. Their suicide rate exceeds that of their civilian peers.

As I sat there at that restaurant table, listening to their conversation, my mind raced to a small bunker on a remote hilltop outpost in Vietnam. The Company commander there had taken the stiff cardboard sleeve of a carton of C-rations and written on it:

"God and the soldier we adore,
In time of war and not before;
The battle ended and all things righted,
God's forgotten, the soldier slighted."

The Company Commander was Capt John Raymond, USMC, commanding A/1/26 on Hill 881-South, Khe Sanh, Vietnam, noted in Stubbe: Khe Sanh Chaplain (unpublished manuscript), 01 April 1970, diary entry for 18 August 1967. Although Capt Raymond attributed the poem to "Lord Marlborough," it was actually written by Frances Quarles (1592-14), and its original form is: "Out God and soldiers we alike adore / E/en at the brink of danger, not before / Our God's forgotten, and our soldiers slighted." [Oxford Dictionary of Quotations, 3d rev. ed., London: Oxford University Press, 1953, p. 404, No. 9].

One of the stories to emerge from World War II tells of a soldier coming home after years of being away in the war. He telephones his parents. "I'm coming home," he tells them. They are ecstatic. He says, "I'm bringing home a friend who was badly wounded." Still overcome with joy, they tell him, "Bring him with you. It will be great to have both of you home!" His voice becomes serious, "But you must know that he has some ugly scars." They say, "That's OK. We know that war does bad things." Softly, he says, "But he also has lost a leg and an arm, and he has difficulty with large groups of people." They say, "Well, son, maybe it might be best if he goes to a hospital for those things where he will be more comfortable. But we are so excited that you're coming home." There's a click. He hung up the phone. He was the "friend," the wounded, damaged man.

At his inauguration, President Kennedy uttered those words: "Let every nation know .. that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and success of liberty " [Kennedy, John F., Inaugural Address, 20 January 1961] Today, we pause to consider that price, that burden:

Many of us will be more focused on a family member--a father or mother, brother or sister, a son, a nephew or niece--or perhaps a boy or girl from the neighborhood or church. For, as the German poet, Goethe, once noted: "I am rent to the core by this simple one's suffering; you pass carefree over the fate of thousands." [Goethe, Faust II, 439f.]

Veterans Day focuses not only on the enormity of those lost in war, but on the living veterans who today live lost lives. A recent newspaper article noted there are roughly 107.000 homeless veterans in* America and goes on to state: Many of them are chronically condemned to wander our streets because the trauma they suffered serving our country has left them profoundly brain-damaged or disabled with terrible psychiatric conditions like post traumatic stress disorder.. These wounds of war are physically invisible, but they are no less life-threatening." [Lawrence Tribe and Bobby Shriver, "Why Wounded Warriors Sleep in Dumpsters," The Wall Street Journal Thursday, 9 June 2011, p. A21.]

Following the death of his brother in World War I, the American poet, Archibald MacLeish wrote his poem, "The Young Dead Soldiers:"

The young dead solders ... who has not heard them?

They have a silence that speaks for them at night and when the clock counts.

They say: We were young. We have died. Remember us.
They say: Our deaths are not ours; they are yours; they will mean what you make them.
They say: Whether our lives and our deaths were for peace and new hope or for nothing we cannot say; it is you who must say this.
They say: We leave you our deaths. Give them their meaning Remember us.

Today, we remember. The word, "remember," as used in the Bible, refers not to mere thoughts in our mind, but bringing something from the past in order to affect present action. In other words, we pause and ponder in order that we might do something now.

Today, we rededicate ourselves to serving others and serving our country
Today, we rededicate ourselves to promote peace and justice.
Today, we rededicate ourselves to care for those who have borne the burden of the battle and their families.
May God bless us all with the vision and the strength to do this. God bless you all!

THE LION OF KHE SANH

COLONEL DAVID E. LOWNDS COMMANDING OFFICER 26TH MARINE REGIMENT KHE SANH VIETNAM

David E. Lownds of Naples, FL, born October 4, 1920, passed away peacefully on August 31, 2011. As all good Marines do, the "Lion of Khe Sanh", Colonel David E. Lownds, USMC (Ret) reported for duty on "heaven's scene." A veteran of three wars, Dave Lownds was wounded on Saipan and again on Iwo Jima; braved the enemy and elements in Korea; operated behind enemy lines in the Dominican Republic Expedition; and commanded the Twenty-Sixth Marine Regiment at the Battle of Khe Sanh during the infamous Tet Offensive of 1968 in Vietnam. For his actions at Khe Sanh, he was awarded the Navy Cross, our nation's second highest award for valor. Married to his wife, Jean, for 69 years, he is survived by her, seven children, 19 grandchildren, and 23 great- grandchildren. He will be sorely missed. In lieu of flowers, the family has requested memorial contributions be made to Avow Hospice, 1095 Whippoorwill Lane, Naples, FL 34105 or online at www.avowhospice.org. Services will be held at a later date.

TRIBUTES: KHE SANH VETERANS

From Dick Peloquin JR.

I will advise my father Dick Sr. He has great respect for Colonel Lownds. May you go with God Sir. I will not soon forget our brief meeting, I feel privileged that I have had the honor of meeting a legend The Peloquin family offers our prayers and condolences to Colonel Lownds loved ones.

From Craig Tourte

In 2004 I wrote a little article regarding Colonel Lownds which was published in Red Clay, issue 59 Fall 2004. At Ernie Spencer's suggestion I sent a copy of that article to the Colonel. Although ill, Colonel Lownds was kind enough too responded with a personal letter thanking me for remembering him and the kind words. After 4 years and 3 moves I was finally able to put a copy of the article, the magazine and the letter I received from Colonel Lownds into a frame and place it on my wall. Now, one of my most prized possession.

THE STORY
By: Craig W. Tourte

I was just another Private First Class (PFC) during the ten plus months I served at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh in Vietnam. I have a vivid memory of a special moment I would like to share with my Khe Sanh brothers.

I was manning the defensive perimeter trench line located on the southwest side of the base across from the Headquarters Battery, First Battalion, Thirteenth Marine Regiment, a hundred yards or so northeast of the main gate. It was one of those dark dreary nights when I stood looking straight ahead at nothing. Exhausted from lack of sleep, a diet of cold C rations, rain, cold fog, digging and just plain being there. I turned towards a voice behind me, which asked "How is it going Marines?" I looked up and saw a squared away Marine holding an M-16 rifle. He had a big broad dark mustache and was accompanied by another Marine with a radio strapped to his back. This Marine was obviously an officer of a type which I had never seen before at Khe Sanh. He introduced himself as Colonel Lownds. He said he was just seeing how things were going and asked how we were getting along. I swallowed hard and responded, "Fine." In my surprise at seeing the Colonel I might have mumbled something else, but I don't recall what it was. Colonel Lownds smiled, turned away and continued walking along the trench line.

Of course, I knew the name of the commanding officer on the combat base, but not in my wildest dreams did I ever expect to see him out along the trench line at night, without some type of security detachment and virtually alone except for the radio man and I never expected a colonel to express concern for a lowly private.

That simple act lifted my spirits and for some reason I felt a lot more secure knowing that the commanding officer was in this with us and was exposing himself to the same dangers the rest of us faced. I never saw Colonel David Lownds after that, but I would like to thank him and let him know that moment touched my life. It was a moment I'll forever appreciate and remember

THE RETURN LETTER

Dear Craig.

I recently returned from a few months in Tampa where they took care of some cancer all my head. I regret delay in responding to your letter and I must say Ernie Spencer was correct as I thoroughly enjoyed your letter.

I would have liked to put these thoughts in my own hand writing however my hand writing has deteriorated to such a degree that in most cases I can't read my own hand-writing.

They changed the name of our street a couple of years back so the new statistics are in the letter head.

I thank you for remembering me after all these years and the kind words you had for me.

Semper Fi,
Colonel David Lownds

Another Lownds Story
Lownd's Mustache

I only saw Colonel Lownds on the Khe Sanh Combat Base a few times. I was impressed with his prominent large black mustache, ending in a twisted point. Even then he looked very distinguished with the authority of command, and often a big cigar protruding from his lips. I would say more like a movie character than a Marine Corps Infantry Battalion Commander.

Dennis Mannion sent me a link to an interview Colonel Lownds did some thirty years ago. The interview was thirty-five odd pages and quite interesting. Regarding the mustache, and I'll paraphrase here, and not quote his exact wordings, you'll understand what he is saying about this issue. Colonel Lownds said that a leader is recognized because he knows what he is doing and because people recognize who he is. In order that others know who you are and that you're around you have to have something distinct. My standard trademark in the Marine Corps was to always carry a stick. It wouldn't be anything fancy, it'd be a broom handle, or something I'd pick up and I'd say this is my stick. I didn't use it as a walking aid but the young Marines would recognize me when I carried it around. If I happened to visit another battalion or another company I would sometimes inadvertently leave it there, they would always send someone to my unit after I left and say that the Colonel left his stick behind. This was one of the ways people would know that the Colonel was in the area. I didn't have a stick at Khe Sanh, I couldn't find one, that's a good excuse, so I grew a mustache, and I guess it became quite famous.

So that's the story, the colonel grew his mustache because he couldn't find a stick to carry around. I think the mustache was a good choice. I'd forget someone carrying around a stick back in 1967/1968 on a muddy combat base; I could not forget a very photogenic Colonel with a large black mustache.

CRAIG

By Mac - Milton McNeely
I met Colonel Lownds several times. Having a pair of hair clippers, I once had the honor of trimming his hair. It was sometime in the middle of the siege and as luck would have it we had incoming. My hands were shaking and the haircut was somewhat botched. Not sure if it was the incoming or just the stress of cutting the Colonel's hair. We have lost an outstanding Marine Officer and leader. Prayers of comfort and blessings for the friends and family that mourn his loss.

By Gene Weresow
Rest in peace Colonel. I Salute you sir!

By Chaplain Ron Rayner

I considered it to be an honor and privilege to serve my country in the United States Marine Corps under such a fine officer as Colonel David E. Lownds. A sympathy card has been sent. If anyone has further details on the arrangements, please let me know. Semper Fi,

By Doctor Ed Feldman
Colonel Lownds, I remember you studying the maps in the regimental command post. Your composure set the example for Marine Leadership. Business as usual...Godspeed.
S/F Ed Feldman., one of the C Med Surgeons.

From Dave Doehrman
I spent a few minutes with Col Lownds at the '97 St Louis reunion. We were at the mass grave site at Jefferson Barracks for the victims of the C-123 crash and the Col was kind enough to pose for a few photos. I was glad he was able to attend at least one of our reunions. He had some rough decisions to make at Khe Sanh but his leadership and composure inspired a lot of people during those days in our history.

THE LION OF KHE SANH

When the last wave touches down and we move to high ground above a shore no mortal has seen.

Till the last trumpet sounds and the guns quiet down, hold fast our Colonel of Marines.
We all will move fast, arriving at last to link up with that

MORE REMEMBERANCES OF THE LION OF KHE SANH

Capt H.J.M. ("Mac") Radcliffe (CO, A/1/9)

remembers that after the Alpha Outpost (Hill 64) had been attacked and A/1/9 lost over 30% of its company on 8 February, he had told his troops, "Nobody gets into the Company perimeter I don't know about it." "They called down and said, 'We got somebody coming into your area.' I said, 'Stop him! We had a lot of press people and others coming in. I said, 'Who is it?' They said, 'I don't know who he is, Sir. He has a moustache and cigar and has his radio operator with him.' Well, I knew right away that was Colonel Lownds. He looked at me and said, 'How you doing, Captain?' I said, 'Fine, Colonel.' He said, 'No.' He pulled me aside, away from the radio operator, and said, 'Mac, how you doing?' And I said, 'I'm hanging in there.' And he said, 'I know you will.' And he gave me a cigar. Just that touch. I knew what I'd known before, but reinforced the fact that we had a caring, concerned, intelligent, super Regimental Commander, who knew what the hell it was to 'take it,' 'take it,' 'take it' and bounce back to be a Marine!"

On one of his walks through the KSCB during the Siege, Colonel Lownds came into the Ponderosa area containing D/1/26 and noticed the men's clothing was getting raggedy. He told George E. Myrick, "Corporal, you get clothes anyway you can get l'em!" "I said, 'Yes, Sir! We stole them off the comm. lines. So I got his shirt. A day or so later, Lownds was again visiting the area, walking around. He saw his shirt, but said nothing at the time. Returning, he simply said, 'Nice shirt, Corporal! You got my sox, too?' and he walked away."

John Hargesheimer (A/3rd AT Bn)

remembers that during the Siege, "I was sent to deliver a message to Col. Lownds. I had to go to the concrete bunker that was his headquarters and was led through the maze to where he was. He was sitting in a chair and he looked exhausted. He didn't look up when I delivered the envelope, but he did thank me. I immediately turned around and left, but it left a lasting impression on me of the enormous responsibility that this one man had to carry and I was humbled. After that experience I prayed every night during the siege for Col Lownds. If anyone needed God's help and strength it was Col. Lownds during the siege.

LtCol Frederick McEwan, the S-4 of Regiment during the Siege

Remembers "Around December [1967], the North Vietnamese Army blew a French bridge across Highway 9. Well, Uncle Dave, who was Colonel Lownds, and the Engineer Officer and myself went to a steel bridge over the river at Route 9, and we swam across that river to check out that area, see if the bridge could be rebuilt. It couldn't. So we got out of there hastily. It was a precarious situation.

LtCol Louis Rann, the Executive Officer of Regiment

Remembers the radioman leaning over and saying: "Colonel, the President wants to talk with you! The President's on the other end of the phone!" Rann notes, "I won't tell you what Colonel Lownds said—you're a minister!" "Shit?" "Well, a few other choice words!" "The next thing I know, Colonel Lownds picked up that phone [and was saying], 'Yes, Sir!.. No, Sir!' He's standing at attention!" Rann thought, "My God, it is the President!" Afterwards, Rann asked, "What did he say?" Lownds:

"He said, 'I made the Joint Chiefs of Staff sign a paper that we're not going to make you guys surrender!'"

Chaplain Ray Stubbe remembers in a few paragraphs from a letter he recently sent to General Ron Christmas regarding the passing of Colonel Lownds

Dear General Christmas:
As I mentioned on the telephone, Colonel David E. Lownds had a profound effect on my life. Although I was assigned to 1/26 and not the regiment, for a long time, 1/26 was the only battalion at Khe Sanh and I came to know Colonel Lownds through informal conversation and the evening regiment briefings. Soon after his arrival at Khe Sanh on 12 August 1967, I noticed his presence at memorial services for a Marine from recon that had been killed while his team attempted an insertion and for a Marine who drowned in the nearby Rao Quan River. His concern and interest in the welfare of the Marines at Khe Sanh was plainly evident. He cared.

I recall an incident during the monsoon rainfall in which a recon team had completed about eight days of patrolling, had run out of water and food, and due to the weather, the helicopters couldn't extract them. 1/26 had alerted an infantry company to move to them and bring them back. (They were south of us, south of Route 9, as I recall). Knowing all the men in the recon team, I had obtained permission and decided to accompany the patrol. Just as we were about to depart the combat base, the skies cleared and the helicopters were able to extract the team. Colonel Lownds suddenly appeared with our infantry patrol and informed us that the team had been successfully extracted and thanked us for preparing to rescue them. He didn't have to do that, of course. His presence there spoke volumes of his concern for his men.

I recall talking to a recon Marine (Kevin Macaulay) who overheard a conversation in the regimental bunker. It was a conversation between Colonel Lownds and the recon commander who was about to commit another team to replace one that had just been shot out. Obviously, we knew where the enemy was! Colonel Lownds told the recon commander, "Don't you care about your men? Why are you sending them to the place where we already know the enemy is located?"

Colonel Lownds had his humorous moments. At one regimental briefing, he had just returned from a visit to 3d Marine Division at Phu Bai, and he jokingly reported to the staff and officers gathered about his trip "to the wonderful world of 'Bai'." I can still hear him talking about how they "actually had sidewalks of wooden pallets so you don't get your boots muddy!" (laughs). "And then there was hot and cold running water--and flushing toilets!" (more laughs). "They actually had air-conditioning--but I don't think they'll ever get it as cool as we have it here at Khe Sanh!" (by now he was on a roll, and everyone was roaring!)

As I mentioned to you, General, I am firmly convinced that I am here today because of some very difficult, agonizing decisions that Colonel Lownds made during that Khe Sanh siege battle. In fact, had I given a short eulogy for him, I might have been tempted to use the text from John 10.10 ("I am come that they might have life, life in its abundance") and noted that while this may be strange to use for a Marine officer, it certainly reflected what Colonel Lownds accomplished. He made numerous decisions that all turned out right. Probably from his earlier duty as a regimental S-2 (in which he had, by the way, two very junior lieutenants who later served him as Captains during the siege--Jerry Judson, one of his S-2 scouts who was, during the siege, his S-2, and Capt Earle Breeding, another scout who was the commander of E/2/26. Earle tells me that when 2/26 arrived at Khe Sanh just a few days before the battle erupted, the officers and staff of 2/26 were in the regimental bunker and Colonel Lownds said, "We will hold." And then spotting Earle, continued, "Won't we, Captain Breeding?" to the astonishment of all the officers of 2/26!))

Kevin Macaulay Remembers his compassion

Kevin Macaulay, a radioman in BRAVO Company, 3rd Recon, recalls an incident: "This brand new Lieutenant—he'd been in country maybe two days—had just exited the [regimental] COC bunker. His utilities were perfectly clean. His flak jacket was green where the rest of ours were red because of the clay. His helmet liner and helmet cover were perfectly green. His jungle boots were the bright green and the dark black that characterizes the jungle boots. And he walked out of the COC bunker and right into the middle of this barrage. He was wounded extremely severely by this 122mm rocket that came in, and we saw him lying on the ground. One of his feet was at a totally impossible angle; his foot was almost severed, and there was a big pool of blood around him.

We were already carrying our company clerk, a fellow by the name of [LCPL Ronald D.] Coleman out of the company office who had taken shrapnel from the same round. Coleman lost, I believe, the major portion of all his fingers on both hands, plus he had a gaping wound over his right kidney. It looked, as we loaded him on the stretcher, that he was in bad shape, but I believe he survived. His kidney, I think, was destroyed though; luckily we have two of them. We ran Coleman up to Charlie Med and then we came back and there was a group around this poor Lieutenant. As we were loading him onto the stretcher, Colonel Lownds came up out of the COC bunker and he spotted us there. Immediate recognition came upon his face as he saw this poor Lieutenant lying, and Colonel Lownds watched us as we picked him up and took him to the aid station.

We came back with the empty stretcher which was now totally covered with blood. Colonel Lownds looked over to us and yelled, 'Hey Marine, how's he doing?' And I looked back over to Colonel Lownds and I shook my head. And you could see the look that came across Colonel Lownds' face; you could see how visibly upset he was by this man's death. It was one of the few times that I had seen Colonel Lownds and had direct conversation with him. I had seen him numerous times in the COC bunker, but it was the first time I had ever really spoken to him, and it just gave me the impression that the man really cared. Not only did he care about the entire base—the worry that he had on his mind that we had anywhere between ten to forty thousand NVA around us, but he was concerned about the individual. And he was visibly shaken by this man's death."

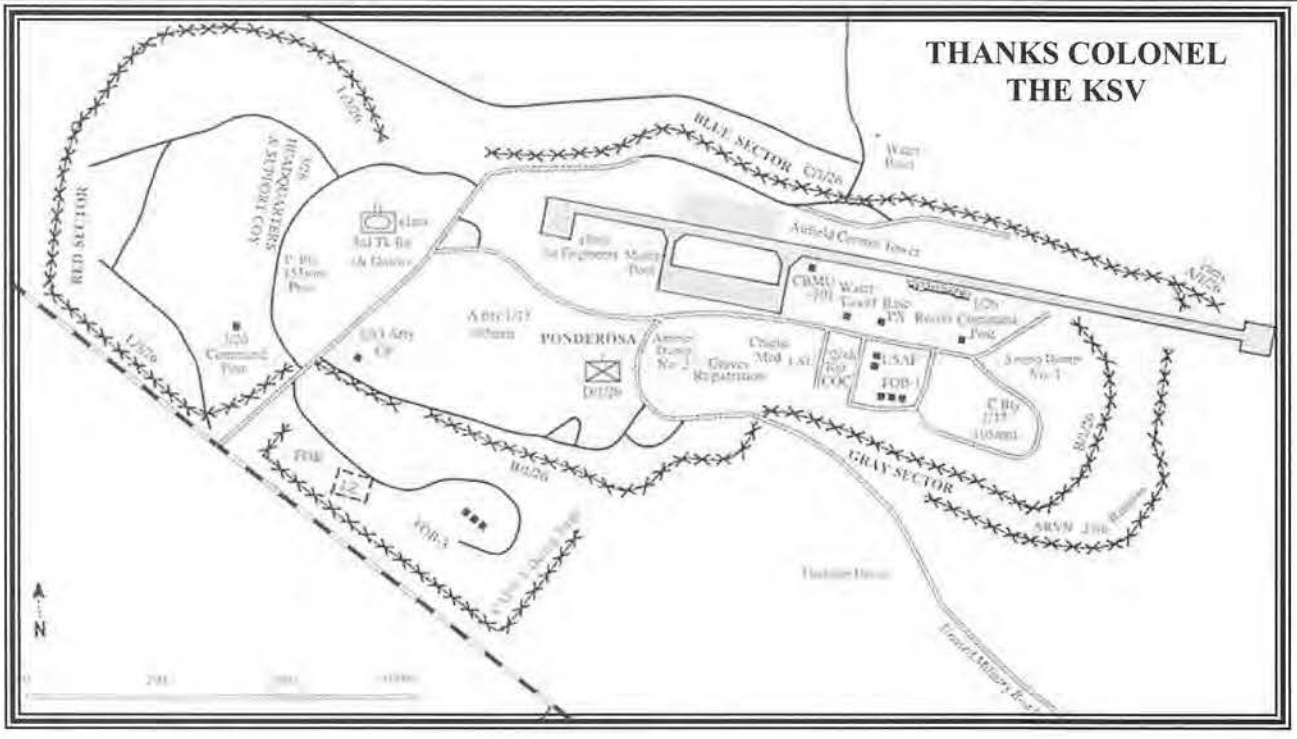
The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to Colonel David E. Lownds (MCSN: 0-15530), United States Marine Corps, for extraordinary heroism while serving as Commanding Officer of the Khe Sanh Combat Base in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam from August 1967 through March 1968. Upon assuming command of the vital combat base located in western Quang Tri Province and tasked with the responsibility of interdicting major North Vietnamese resupply routes and blocking any enemy invasion attempt from the west into the northern provinces of South Vietnam, Colonel Lownds immediately established combat outposts on Hills 881 South, 861, and 950, and launched extensive and highly effective patrol activities throughout his area of responsibility. Despite the hazardous, mountainous terrain, thick jungle foliage, and adverse weather conditions, Colonel Lownds' valiant combat leadership and indomitable command ability were the central instrument in achieving and maintaining the superb combat posture of the base. On 28 January 1968, when North Vietnamese divisions launched a coordinated attack on the Khe Sanh Combat Base with rockets, artillery, mortar, and machine-gun and small-arms fire, and with their main attack directed at Hill 861-A, Colonel Lownds' superb knowledge of and appreciation for the terrain and his aggressive utilization of all supporting arms minimized the effectiveness of the enemy attack and resulted in a large number of enemy casualties. During daily enemy rocket and artillery attacks, and on 23 February when the firing reached its peak with more than 1300 rounds impacting on the combat base, his superior tactical judgment, calm leadership, brave demeanor, and resolute endurance were an inspiration to all around him and were a prime factor in maintaining a high level of morale among his men. Giving no thought to his own safety, while exhibiting a compassionate concern for the welfare of his Marines, he gallantly and repeatedly exposed himself to hostile fire making daily visits to outlying units to observe tactical operations and to study conditions confronting his unit commanders. During the period 1 November 1967 to 31 March 1968, Colonel Lownds organized and directed Operation SCOTLAND, a highly effective search and destroy operation throughout the Khe Sanh tactical area of responsibility, which resulted in numerous enemy casualties, the capture of several enemy, and a large number of weapons confiscated. By his gallant leadership, distinguished personal bravery, and selfless devotion to duty throughout, Colonel Lownds upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.



FLEET WEEK, SAN FRANCISCO

October 8, 2011
By Craig W. Tourte

I found myself this weekend with my good friend David Lind (H&S 2/4, battle of Dai Do, April 30 - May 3, 1968) in San Francisco attending Fleet Week. Eight or so ships led by the aircraft carrier Carl Vinson from the United States Navy, a few from the Canadian Navy and the United States Coast Guard came through the fog of the Golden Gate Bridge and anchored in the bay and along the docks. You'll remember the Carl Vinson as the ship which conducted the burial at sea of Osama Bin Laden's body on April 2, 2011. The Blue Angles F/A 18 Hornet aerobatic demonstration awed the many thousands. The United State Marine Corps 1st Expeditionary Force from Camp Pendleton was with the fleet. The Marine Band and Marine Corps exhibits along Pier 39 were big hits with the crowd, many having their photograph taken next to the Hummer painted in Marine Corps scarlet.

David and I were properly attired, I wearing my Khe Sanh USMC ball cap and David with his "Magnificent Bastards" 2 Battalion, 4th Marine ball cap. Both of us wore black shirts with the Marine Corps Eagle, Globe and Anchor.

Our first stop was the "Buena Vista" restaurant and bar located at 2765 Hyde Street near the Hyde Street Pier. There were few in the establishment that time of the morning as we sat alone at the bar. We became engaged in a conversation with Doug the manager who "Thanked us for our service." When we decided to get breakfast, Doug said the breakfast was on the house. I took off a "Home is where you dig it" pin from my hat and pinned in on Doug's shirt. His eyes lit up and he thanked us again. After we finished we decided to have an Irish coffee before we hit the road and Doug told us that was also on the house. We left grateful for his acknowledgment of all veterans.

We next found ourselves at the Marine Memorial Club & Hotel at 609 Sutter Street. Edda Rodriguez the Club manager was filling in for the usual staff that time of the morning. After an engaging dialogue with our new friend Edda she told us that our libations were on the Club and she "Thanked us for our service."

We returned to the Hyde Street Pier to the area of the Historic Ships where the C.A Thayer, Eureka, Hercules, Alma Balcluta and the Epppleton Hall are docked for exhibit. We entered the Visitors Center/ Ticket Boot to pay for our entry, there was a Park Ranger at the counter taking the entry fee, she noted our hats and shirts and said, "Thank you for your service" before handing us a couple of free passes and telling us have a good time.

We next wandered over to Pier 39 where the Navy and Marine Corps had set up various tents and exhibits. About a dozen or so members from the Marine Crops Band were playing some up beat tones and the crowd was really enjoying the sounds when a man who was standing in front of me turned around and noticed my Khe Sanh ball cap. He said that he was also a Khe Sanh Veterans. He didn't have a Khe Sanh ball cap but a division cap. He said that he had been an 0311 with 3/26 on 881. He was not aware of the association. I gave him a card with my name and email and wrote the name of the two web sites (Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page & Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc) and told him to email me his name and address and that I would send him a magazine and membership form. He was pretty darn excited and we spent about twenty minutes talking about our experiences.

We walked over to the Marine Corps exhibit drawn by the loud (rap type) music where hundreds stood around talking to the Marines and trying chin-ups on the bar they had set up to draw in the young people. We stood back about ten yards on a little rise in front of the exhibit. I was suddenly aware of someone standing next to me and turned to see a Marine Gunnery Sergeant. I noted his name tag to read "Garcia." Gunny Garcia "Thanked us for our service" and handed both of us a printed picture - in gold - of the flag rising at Mount Suribachi.

The rest of the day went on like that with many "Thank you for your service." I was stunned having never experienced anything like that before and especially considering I was in San Francisco. All in all is was a wonderful experience I'll not soon forget. When I arrived home at the train station and just before walking to my car I was approached by a young man carrying a backpack. He said that he had notice me on the train and just wanted to say "Thank you for your service." What a day…

IF WE HAD JUST ONE MORE DAY

By Craig W. Tourte

-THEN-

Every time I come to this web site I spend just a few seconds viewing the photograph of our founder Ray Stubbe, ministering to Marines at Khe Sanh. Although I didn't personally have any contact with a minister during my ten or so months at Khe Sanh, there are many who did and all that I have spoken with had infinite praise for those who provided that comfort and guidance. Many have spoken about these fine men, their selfless heroics and sometime tragic and unfortunate loss. It must have been quite a responsibility trying to explain pain, loss, deprivation and suffering - and faith to young men in those circumstances, then again; perhaps just the comfort of devotion was enough.

To Whom Do I Pray

In boot camp (First Battalion, Platoon 1145, M.C.R.D. San Diego 1966) we had a kid by the name of Talbert R. Sakamoto. We all were required to attend Sunday religious services. As we stood in formation, Platoon Commander Staff Sergeant Golubski ordered, "All the Catholics over here, all the Protestants over there and the Mormons stand there," leaving Recruit Sakamoto standing by himself. "What religion are you?" Staff Sergeant Golubski asks Sakamoto, "Buddhist" was his response. Staff Sergeant Golubski doesn't miss a beat and immediately instructs Sakamoto to attend religious services with the Protestants. You see, the Drill Instructors recognized that it didn't matter whose God the Marine(s) served, whom he prayed too, how he prayed or what name he called his God or religion. What was important was that he had the opportunity to pray - or not - to whomever he wanted and it didn't really matter who was around or where he was. Let me try to make this just a little simpler. One's religion doesn't make one special or better or worse than anyone else, it's the opportunity to serve whom you please, that is what's special, one of our inalienable rights and just one of the many principles Marines have fought and died for these many years.

-NOW-

I first posted the above in April 2010 and happened to come across it again. This is a most difficult time for us who are getting along in years. So many have been ill and left us too soon. Once strong and always brave men who served so gallantly. I said a little prayer at Khe Sanh and it went something like, "Please let me live just one more day..." I'm going to a funeral on Monday, the wife of a close friend of mine who I have known for over forty years passed on last week. She was ill for just a few months when her condition became such that she left us. We never know when it is our time and I was thinking if we all had "just one more day." One more day to say the things we had wanted to say, one more day of life, I wish she had just one more day so that I could have hugged her and said goodbye but I waited to long and gave her a little wave at the door, thinking that she was going to be alright. Perhaps just one more day to say, I'm sorry or I love you. Just one more day is all we need, just one more day to make things right. Perhaps just one more day to ask for forgiveness and to tell others we forgive them. But most of us leave without having just one more day to do or say those things that should to be said. If we all only had, just one more day to make things right.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY
HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS 3000 MARINE CORPS
PENTAGON WASHINGTON, DC 20350-3000

MEMORANDUM FOR SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

ROLE OF THE UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS

SEP 12 2011

Secretary Panetta, as we explore ways across the Department to adjust to a new period of considerable fiscal austerity, there emerges a clear imperative that our Nation retain a credible means of mitigating risk while we draw down the capabilities and capacities of our forces.

Our Nation faces an uncertain future; we cannot predict where and when events may occur that might call us to respond to protect our citizens and our interests. There have always been times when events have compelled the United States to become involved, even when such involvement wasn't desired; there is little doubt that we will have do this again in the future. Complicating matters is the fact that since the I 990s, our nation has significantly reduced the number and size of our bases and stations around the world.

We are a maritime nation. Like so much of the world, we rely on the maritime commons for the exchange of commerce and ideas. Many depend on us to maintain freedom of movement on those commons; we continue to take that responsibility seriously. Your naval forces are the solution set to fulfilling our global maritime responsibilities.

Naval forces are not reliant on host nation support or permission; in the conduct of operations, they step lightly on our allies and host countries. With the increasing concentration of the world's population close to a coastline, the ability to operate simultaneously on the sea, ashore, and in the air, and to move seamlessly between these three domains represents the unique value of amphibious forces. Operating as a team, amphibious forces provide operational reach and agility, they "buy time" and decision space for our national leaders in time of crisis. They bolster diplomatic initiatives by means of their credible forward presence. Amphibious forces also provide the Nation with assured access for the joint force in a major contingency operation. Modem amphibious operations, like the TF-58 assault that seized Kandahar airport 450 miles inland in 2001 shortly after the 9/11 attacks, seek to avoid enemy strengths by exploiting gaps and weaknesses.

When the Nation pays the 'sticker price' for its Marines, it buys the ability to remain forward deployed and forward engaged to assure our partners, reinforce alliances, and build partner capacity. For 7.8% of the total 000 budget, our Nation gains the ability to respond to unexpected crises, from humanitarian disaster relief efforts, to non-combatant evacuation operations, to conduct counter-piracy operations, raids or strikes. That same force can quickly be reinforced to assure access anywhere in the world in the event of a major contingency; it can be dialed up or down like a rheostat to be relevant across the range of military operations. No other force possesses the flexibility to provide these capabilities and yet sustain itself Logistically for significant periods 0.1 time, at a time and place of its choosing.

"Expeditionary" is not a bumper sticker to us, or a concept, it is a "state of conditioning" that Marines work hard to maintain. Given its mission to be the expeditionary force in readiness, a tiered readiness concept is not compatible with the Marine Corps' missions because its non-deployed units are often called upon to respond to unanticipated and varied crises on a moment's notice.

The Marine Corps fills a unique lane in the capability range of America's armed forces. A MiddLeweight Force, we are lighter than the Army, and heavier than SOF. The Corps is not a second land army. The Anny is purpose-built for land campaigns and carries a heavier punch when it arrives, whereas the Marine Corps is an expeditionary force focused on coming from the sea with integrated aviation and logistics capabilities. The Marine Corps maintains the ability to contribute to land campaigns by leveraging or rapidly aggregating its capabilities and capacities. Similarly, Marine Corps and SOF roles are complementary, rather than redundant. Special Operation Forces contribute to the counter-insurgency and counter-terrorism efforts of the Combatant Commanders in numerous and specialized ways, but they are not a substitute for conventional forces with a broader range of capability and sustainability.

The Marine Corps was specifically directed by the 82nd Congress as the force intended to be "the most ready when the Nation is least ready." This expectation exists because of the costly lessons our nation learned during the Korean War when a lack of preparedness in the beginning stages of the conflict very nearly resulted in defeat. Because our Nation Cannot afford to hold the entire joint force at such a high state of readiness, it has chosen to keep the Marines ready, and has often used them to plug the gaps during international crises, to respond when no other options were available.

Anecdotally, the American people believe that when a crisis emerges - Marines will be present and will "invariably turn in a performance that is dramatically and decisively successful - not most of the time, but always." They possess a heart-felt belief that the Marine Corps is good for the young men and women of our country. In their view, the Marines are extraordinarily adept at converting "unoriented youths into proud, self-reliant stable citizens - citizens into whose hands the nation's affairs may be safely entrusted." An investment in the Marine Corps continues to be an investment in the character of the young people of our country.

Finally, in an increasingly dangerous and uncertain world, we must continue to provide the protection our Nation needs and to preserve our ability to do what we must as the world's only credible remaining super power. As we face inevitable difficult resource decisions, I believe that we must also consider how we can best mitigate the inherent risk of a reduced defense capacity ... like an affordable insurance policy, Marine Corps and the Navy's amphibious forces, represent a very efficient and effective hedge against the Nation's most likely risks

IN THIS RED EARTH, BLOODLUST FOR SURVIVAL

A GREEN BERET MEDIC AT KHE SANH "DRUGS AND DEATH"

By Denis Chericone U.S. Army Special Forces Medic 1967-1968

REPRINTED WITH PERMISSION FROM BAY STATE VIETNAM VETERAN

It took at least three weeks of raging siege to explode Dada into the relative solace of drugs. He offers no excuses about his drug usage. In fact, he says without the presence of some hard-core drugs at Khe Sanh, he would have probably lost his mind and messed up more than a few wounded guys because the situations were always so nerve-wracking that if he hadn't been under the influence of something, he would have screwed up the sensitive emergency procedures that were necessary to grab back his comrades from the arms of death.

He never even knew he was getting hooked on drugs when he was taking them because the siege had ways of diverting attention from certain evolutions within oneself. I can imagine: A man is laying in the middle of an open and exposed area wounded with shells bursting all around him. He cannot, cannot move because of his wounds and he lays there, naked to the searing metal heating the air and Dada was one of the few men who had to, just had to go out and drag the man to safety. Yeah, safety, a hole in the ground. Dada told it so clearly, as if it was something that had happened to him just moments before and even I knew then that this was a something he was never going to forget.

"We spent the first five days under the shells filling sandbags and learning basics, like knowing when to dive for cover. Yeah, basics, sandbags, we must've filled a million of 'em. We were all so tired, so very, very tired, but we had to get the base ready for the attack we knew was going to come after they stopped shelling us. We had to fill sandbags, dig deep slit trenches, re-enforce the flimsy structures we'd already put up and then, get this, because it was after some guys got hurt while they were taking a dump, we had to bury our shithouse underground. An underground shithouse, hell, even then, so early on, I learned to get in, drop my pants, eliminate and get out in all of about twelve seconds.

Talk about some of the hemorrhoids I saw during the siege. Everyone became an expert quick shitter. I was the one who had to go in take out and pull the wounded guys out. The sight was enough for all us. No one lingered after that, no more daydreaming while eliminating ... Believe me, no one " Dada laughed cynically, "Talk about feeling vulnerable yeah, I love it when people tell me they're feeling vulnerable now days. Just love it...It took us five days around the clock, working to get things in minimal shape for the attack. It seemed the shelling grew more severe every hour, but we worked, until we were ready to drop and I stayed awake for those five days, wide awake, son, wide eyed, wide awake.

We were given the best speed the army had in its drug arsenal then to get the job done. Of course no one said anything about taking the speed because everyone knew we simply had to because we were going to die if we didn't get our area ready for the North Vietnamese and after five days and nights of working, digging, sweating, cringing, cowering, carrying, throwing and lifting, I fell asleep on the nude ground, fell asleep in the middle of one of the worst rocket barrages of the siege and you know, I was so tired, I just didn't care if I died or not. They launched about two hundred of their big one-two-two rockets at us that night and I just didn't give a shit.

I found a very comfortable casualty bag, crawled inside, put my helmet under my head and fell asleep for fourteen hours, from 8 p.m. to 10 a.m. and none of my friends bothered me. When the rockets began coming in they yelled at me to come into the trench with them, but I didn't care, just didn't. I waved at them and said, 'Tomorrow, guys.' I remember them screaming at me that I was going to die, but I just curled up within the sheep-skin of that bag and drifted into my first good night's sleep in quite awhile. They finally got pissed off at me and let me alone and the next morning I could hear them whispering to one another, 'You think he's still alive? Think he got hit?' and when I popped up out of the bag and yelled, 'F_ THE GOOKS CAUSE THEY MISSED !!!!!!' All my buddies laughed and cheered. I laughed, too, and it was one of the last times I laughed at Khe Sanh.

! liked the speed immediately. I'd never taken it before and this particular kind, was wonderful because they'd added an agent to it that prevented you from becoming depressed once it wore off. Christ Almighty, it was powerful, potent stuff. There were times . . . there were times when 1 was so high on the stuff that I would try to get myself killed. 1 would scream into the face of certain death. One time one of our choppers was shot down inserting a team into Laos and they'd called us for an immediate rescue. I'd just dropped about three of those pills and was feeling real good, real good, so 1 volunteered to go over the line with the rescue team to pull them out and when we hit the crash

I sat in the ,door of the chopper screaming down at the little People who were all shooting at us, 'YOU CAN'T KILL ME! YOU CAN'T Kill ME!' Dada paused a moment, musing, a slow smile growing on his face. "I dunno .. , dunno why I wasn't dropped in my tracks right then. I should've been. I was the perfect target, perfect and I presented myself like that more than once to the Little People.

When I wasn't on some kind of dope, I didn't feel like that, that's for sure. Yeah, the army had a dope for every occasion and I found out about all of' em."

Dada found out about them all right. He found out about them the hard way, stone-cold hard, the hard of necessity, desperation, the dead-end of perspective, the wasteland of no other choices. The amphetamines just didn't do it for him, though, at least not with death. They could handle the boredom, the dangers, the gnawing unknowns even, you know, the moments when the combatant has time to lay back and wonder what dark, black shrouded desolation the sun is going to drag into his smoking and bitter world in what Dada told me should have been spelled "mourning" instead of the one that means a new day.

"Yeah, new day ... I used to look at the prospect of another day of bombs in the same way as if my neighborhood back home had been infested by the plague and it was only a matter of some time, a few moments, yeah, ha-ha, a few moments before it got to my house and started painting the exploding boils on my family ... family and those guys were certainly my family ... and I felt closer to them than I ever did to my own family and for awhile, I'd feel guilty about that, but after a few thousand more pregnant bombs aborting their explosions, I didn't give a shit anymore, it just didn't matter."

Dada's ideas, views, beliefs on the war, his war, from the war, his war, were not always similar to the beliefs of people who think they know something about war. When he talked about the other guys at Khe Sanh being his family, he didn't mean anything else but family, blood family. Their blood ran outside of their bodies and I guess it makes a stronger bond that way. They were his brothers, uncles and in a few cases, his father. He never told me it directly, but I understood, even without his saying anything about it, that he loved those men he lived with during the siege. Life becomes, among other things, compressed in war. There's not much time to edge around friendships just to make sure the potential friend is not going to screw you over. You either make friends or you don't and Dada said there weren't too many guys who didn't make friends.

"I needed friends. Had to have friends, had to. There was one of this 'not make friends' shit because they might get killed. At least friends gave you the illusion that you could maybe survive a little longer or come out of a raw spot with ' your balls still hanging on ... It was so intense having friends, intense . . . it was compressed like everything else, the love of it, I mean . . .' yeah, love . . . I know it sounds strange, but that was it . . . that was all of it . . . I mean . . . what is it that makes a man run out into the middle of exploding metal, white-hot bits of killer steel, hunting for fresh, flesh, yeah, hunting ... it was alive ... what makes someone do that, run out into stalking death to pull a friend to safety? WHAT? WHAT? ... Tell me, it's anything else but love, anything and I'll tell you don't know what you're talking about, at all ... We would do anything for each other, anything."

Dada grew hot, passionate whenever he would tell me of the sacrifices the men would make for each other. His face glowed in a way I can only compare to the faces of old women praying alone in a cool, quiet and softly shadowed church on an autumn afternoon. If this was a belief or an expression of faith, Dada believed it deeply and possessed as much faith as those women and the people who taught them the fundamentals of faith.

"But friends couldn't do all of it, all that it took to put up with the intrusions, sacrifices, unending sacrifices and insanities that come with combat, war or whatever else you call it when large groups of people are at each others' throats ... Yeah, my buddies could wrap an arm around me or hold me when the tears were sweeping my legs out from underneath me. They could bring me back when I caught the speed of light and traveled a little too far, a little too fast and suddenly found myself out in a place that nobody knew existed and if they did, they sure as shit didn't want to go there ... " Dada's voice grew softer, "Sometimes when I looked at a scene of such extreme horror that it hit me in the chest like a heart attack and then all of a sudden I was looking at pieces of precision, reality, there was a crack in the air, many cracks and it was what was left of my world, the world I knew, had known and there was something behind the fragments of the horror that were splayed before my eyes and death became fractured, fractured like the bodies themselves . . . what lay before my sight was so entirely harsh and merciless not even nature itself was able to portray it in its own reality ... I dunno, I dunno, son, I'm not sure I can describe this as it happened or appeared . I do know that when shit like this occurred I usually wound up desperately, and I mean desperately, seeking out some strong, Jackass narcotics, anything really that would take that scene away or maybe, hopefully, lessen its impact on my heart, soul and mind The first time I needed some medication . . . the first time I the first time ... " Dada went quiet for a moment. His eyes fell or drifted into the stream of years between then and now and finally came to rest on the moment he first needed the drug.

"I drank half a pint of paregoric straight down and I was breathing so hard that I gagged on my own breath, not the drug, but my own breath people think being a junkie is fun or easy or something anything but what it really is .. rough, demanding and very, very unpredictable work ... and most of them think you're just being irresponsible because you're maintaining a habit or wanting to get high; but I never did it to get high, never. I just did it to get to that place where I couldn't see or feel those scenes anymore. Yeah, it'd be nice, so nice if they could walk up to you and go, 'Here's your war pills. Take three a day and one before bedtime and you'll never ever even believe you were in a war after a few weeks. You'll laugh when you hear the word, 'WAR'.' Ha-ha. Ah, f_ what they think ... "

Sometimes Dada would really get going and sometimes he was glorious ... prolific, poetic, proud but not arrogant and most importantly, at least for me, patient. There was so much about the military, especially the war part, that was most impermeable to my understanding. It was another world to me, a world my father had lived in for three years, but one

Special Forces Medic, Denis Chericone worked, and is still working on making this baby well. She had a very bad case of dysentery mimicking cholera. She is getting better, as you can see through tender care and a good diet, it's taking effect.

that was confusing because the things Dada would tell me about the military and yes, especially war, contrasted so dramatically to what my world fed me about warfare. .

It wasn't quite how popular culture portrayed it, not even close. Bullets and bombs don't play favorites and they don't give a shit how good looking you are or how big your muscles may bulge. Oh, how Dada would laugh when those celluloid soldiers took out the bad guys. Laugh, laugh, laugh. "Yeah, look, John Wayne parting the machine gun slugs like Moses walking through the Red Sea. Ha-ha, ha, ha, ha ... " I often wondered what I myself would have done in Dada's place.

Who would have told him the truth about war and it made me realize that he never stood much of a chance in avoiding it because he never had many choices. He just didn't know there were any choices because there was never anybody in his life to give him any. Everybody was still beguiled by the whipping we gave the Germans and Nipponese. They were bad guys and America helped beat 'em. When Dada was a young kid, people were still proud that they did those nasty Nazis and Nips in and good, too. War accomplished good things in those days, not, at best, moral confusions in the troops and the confusions, while they didn't necessarily make the men hesitate to pull the trigger, get the job done or do whatever it took to survive, did manage to surface once they made it back to the golden shores. And that's what Dada had to live with once he began to understand that things weren't exactly like he dreamed they'd be when he returned home. Horne, it had been a hope, a dream, a desire for so long while he was in the war that once he reached it, he was confused and lost. It wasn't the same place he had longed for. Something, someone had changed, drastically, deeply and it was him.

He thought he would be able to leave the drugs behind in the war once he'd made it; but he was wrong, so very, very wrong. After the rush of happiness began to wear off and he discovered that home was just as confusing and almost as deadly as the combat zone, he reached for the one thing which had provided for him in times of extreme distress while under the gun: drugs.

A CRYING SOLDIER'S PRAYER
1966 VIETNAM
CPL Ronald Gulbronson
A/CO 1/26

By Bette Tranum-Mallow
Tribune Correspondent

"The monsoons had stopped. It was so hot, so very hot, and the war was raging all around us. "June 27, 1967, I had been there for eight months. I was 22 years old when I arrived and celebrated my 23rd birthday on Hill 881 in Vietnam, arriving in Khe Sanh, as a replacement troop with the 26th Marines Regiment A Company 2nd Platoon, 1st Squad, the previous October 1966.

"Eight months of agonizing fighting and watching my buddies and friends blown up with mortar attacks. A horrifying time of life or death in a horrifying place called Vietnam."These words were from the Marine who spent eight long months fighting for his country while knowing each day or minute could be his last - Marine Cpl. Ronald Gulbronson of Knobley Road, Keyser."I depended on God, my buddies and letters from my girl friend, who later became my wife, Peggy, to get me through," he said.

The day had started much like most of the other days - fighting in and around a foxhole and listening to the sounds of war all around and hearing the cry of the wounded everywhere."I jumped into a large foxhole as a mortar round started coming to my right in a barrage of three. Some of my buddies became causalities. My lieutenant came towards me, he said, 'Get your men together, we're moving out as soon as this barrage is over.' As squad leader, it was my job to get them moving. "As we were talking, another round landed directly in front of us, about 100 meters away. Knowing that the North Vietnamese Army was shooting in rounds of three, I told my lieutenant to 'jump in! jump in!,' The third round landed in my foxhole, my lieutenant was dead and I was severely wounded. My legs felt numb, but I got to my feet, dazed.

One of the guys was screaming that his hand was gone. Another buddy, Rodriguez, was screaming with head injuries and reaching for me. Both of my knees had been hit and I couldn't hold him, so we fell back into the foxhole. He was dead."The NVA fired another round directly into our foxhole. I was hit in the stomach, left side of the chest, and the upper part of my arm and shoulder, and both knees. I later found out my lung had been perforated, and the sac around my heart was torn. All around me was the cry, 'Oh my God, Help Me.' It seemed to be coming from everywhere," Gulbronson said. "My friend and good buddy Neil Shaffer was asking 'Gil are you alright?' "'I can't move,' I answered. 'Move Rodriguez off of me.' We knew he was dead, I had felt the life leave his body.. There were other dead bodies on top of Rodriguez and he had to move them also. I mustered all the strength I could and slid out from under them.

"Seven men had died around me and I was covered in their blood and there was a pool of blood forming in the foxhole. Someone was yelling for him to come on. I managed to crawl out. I pulled myself up on my captain's knee, I could feel my blood pressure dropping and I felt that I was going to die. I told him to tell my mother that I had been attending services and praying while I was there. He promised, 'I will,' and I knew that if he survived he would.

"I managed to crawl away and I pulled my New Testament out of my pocket. Pain was setting in and it was agonizing. I was preparing to die. I was screaming, 'God Help me!' and I will never forget that feeling.

"All of a sudden, I had the sensation of floating about chest high, the pain and bleeding actually stopped, and then nothing. Someone found me and placed me on a mule (like a four wheeler with a bed on the back). As we were headed for a first aid station, we were fired on, the driver hit what seemed to be a log and I went flying through the air, and was dragged along by one foot. I yelled and he stopped and put me back on and I lost consciousness again. "I regained consciousness among a pile of dead Marines, they had placed me there for pickup, thinking I was dead. I raised up on an elbow and saw a light coming towards me. A Marine saw me and said, 'We have to get him to an aid station. I lost consciousness again and woke up when we went through the door of the aid station.

"'Are there any doctors here?' I asked. I don't think there were, I think it was just a lot of brave men bandaging the most severely wounded and tagging them. I saw my chaplain, David Menske, and yelled for him. After praying with me he said, 'There's only one chopper coming for the wounded, and we have to get you tagged and out on the airstrip.'

"I think it was only by the Grace of God that I was lucid enough to recognize the chaplain. The doctors told me later if he had not tagged me and got me on that chopper, I would surely have died. I blacked out again, only to wake up and see the bottom of a large chopper descending. What brave men they were, the medics! While they were loading up, I heard one medic say 'There is only room for one more, the Marine beside me was not moving, so I raised my hand. They stepped over him and picked me up. The last thing I remember was being loaded into an ambulance truck.

"I came to sometime between the chopper ride from Khe Sanh and the Phu Bai Hospital. I had an IV connected to my arm. Lying there in the emergency room on a cot, a priest came over to me, he had his Bible open and was giving me last rites in Latin. The doctor was working on another Marine when my knee started pumping out blood. It was squirting across the floor with every beat of my heart. I hollered and they came over and put pressure on it. The doctor also rolled me up on my side because I was short of breath. He wanted to insert a tube in my left lung. He couldn't get the tube between the ribs because he cut back too far, so he cut again.

"I remember him saying, 'Major surgery with no light. Get him to Danang for abdominal surgery.' "Every thing went dark again. When I came to again, I was still clinging to my little Testament. I was removed from the plane to another chopper. "Amazing enough, God had kept me alive. I don't remember the ride to the Danang Hospital, but when I regained consciousness, I was lying on a marble slab by myself. Every once in a while a Navy corpsman would look around the corner. I guess to see if I was still alive. I was still covered with Rodriguez's blood. I said to myself, the next time I see one of them I'll holler and I did. I said, ' I'm in a lot of pain, I need help.' A short time went by and then two corpsmen came and rolled me over onto a cot with wheels and took me into Xray. I will never forget the pain as they rolled me from one side to the other. I could feel the steel shrapnel cutting the inside of my body.

"I lost consciousness again only to wake up looking at a man's face. I will always remember his face and the comfort his presence gave me. In a comforting voice, he said ' Everything will be all right buddy' I was in the operating room and don't remember anything until I woke up in the Intensive Care Unit. After 10 to 12 days in the ICU, during which time General Cushing presented me with the Purple Heart, I was sent to Bethesda Naval Hospital. I was back on U.S. soil. I spent almost 9 months at Bethesda. I had to have one more surgery for skin grafts and to recover from my wounds. Then I was discharged to go home. I received a medical retirement from the Marine Corps with General Cushing signing my retirement certificate.

"It has been over four decades since the attack at Khe Sanh, and there is never a day that goes by that I don't think about it. And I think about what God and the medics did for me that day. "About two years ago I started dreaming about what happened and how God was there for me. Almost every night I would wake about 2:30 with the thoughts of what I was dreaming, I feel God was telling me it was time to tell my story. I have done a lot of praying, crying and shaking, it has been really hard to recount those terrible days, but after telling and talking about it and giving my testimony for God, the dreams have stopped and I am at peace. My story is told.

"Thirty-eight years later in 2005 I got to meet my chaplain again. I had read an ad for a reunion of Khe Sanh, I called and talked to the present chaplain and he gave me Meschke's phone number at his home in Colorado. To my surprise he was going to be in Altoona, Pa., for a meeting and we decided to meet for lunch. He spoke at my church, Mt Zion, later that year. I had the privilege of introducing him to my family, friends and church family. I said he was my hero, and he responded 'I'm no hero, all I did was console you and pray for you'. "That was what I needed and God did the rest. "My friend, Dalton Rogers, wrote my story as I gave it to him into a song titled 'A Crying Soldier's Prayer,' and the song is sung by Ed Elza, a local musician, with music put to the words by Dick Atkinson, who has a recording studio in Eckhart, Md. "I will always remember the screaming, 'Oh, my God, help me!' and how God smiled on me, allowing me to live. The CD is finished, my story has been told.

"One last thought, my little Testament that was such a comfort; I kept with me always, until it and my suitcase were stole from me in a hotel where I was with my son Charles, who is now a lawyer in Texas. I hope the thief gets the same comfort from it as I did in Vietnam.

"The proceeds from the CD will be donated to a church. I dedicate this story and CD to all my brothers and sisters who served in Vietnam. A special thanks to my mother, Mary, my second mother, Marg, and to my brother, Dr. Tom and to my sisters Nan and Denise, to my wife, Peggy, who had been steadfast throughout the whole ordeal and to my children, Rhonda, Charles and Brian, for all their support and prayers.

"I love you all. To My God…Thank you forever!"

A BIRTHDAY TRADITION

By Mike Bradbury
K CO 3/26

I had left for the cemetery to participate in the lying of the wreaths for Veterans Day. That night we gathered for a time-honored tradition that goes back a lot further than that.

On the 236th anniversary of the U.S. Marine Corps, Marines everywhere gathered someplace to celebrate the birthday. If there are only 2 or 3 living in the smallest of towns, they'll get together at the local coffee shop on the 10th.

There was a time here in Mountain Home when there were only 6 of us who we knew of, and we'd meet at the old Scrubby's Restaurant

This particular gathering was in 1996. The "bearded guy" on the end is me.....then Dave Labar, Denny Densley, Brian Krazcnavolggi , Chuck Abrahamson and our then Marine Corps League Commandant, Brett Allies.

Over the next 15 years, those of us still in Mountain Home are Marine Corps League members, and include the wives and kids now at our annual birthday celebrations. We had it at A.J.'s that night.

After dinner and the announcements, we all stood and sang the Marine Corps Anthem. My old buddy Irv Levine was our Guest of Honor, and he & I provided the music

Irv, an old F-105 fighter pilot who had flown missions at Khe Sanh, sang Marine songs that he wrote. I sang the "Ballad of Ira Hayes and finished up with a patriotic instrumental medley. It was my first time in public since the hand surgery---it felt good!. A good time was had by all, and then it was time to cut the cake.....and of course, it can't just be any old cake!.

By Corps tradition, the oldest Marine present, always gets the first piece of cake and hands it to the youngest Marine present. If you have a Guest of Honor, he gets the first piece, so fighter pilot Irv found himself right in the middle of things.

One of the guys , brought a flag his uncle took off a dead Japanese soldier on Iwo Jima, That was a real piece of history

There is no such thing as an "ex"....."Once a Marine, always a Marine".....and Marines will celebrate the birthday every November 10th until the earth no longer exist! his is not a put-down, just a fact.....but I'd bet that most servicemen from the other branches don't know the year their branch was founded, let alone the actual date.....without having to look it up. I doubt that anyone else but Marines get together every year to celebrate the birthday!

It's more than just a branch of the service.....it's a brotherhood, and one I've always been proud to be a part of.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

RAY E. TORRES USN
E CO 2/26 HILL 861A

STERLING – Tears flood Ray E. Torres' cheeks as he recalls a nightmare.A wounded survivor of the Vietnam War's longest battle, the 64-year-old Sterling man appeared in "Vietnam in HD" a documentary airing on the History Channel in three 2-hour segments. Torres served in 1968, the bloodiest year of the Vietnam War, when 16,592 Americans died, according to the documentary produced by Lou Reda Productions. His story will surprise many in the community, Torres said. He almost never discusses the war, to avoid "uncontrollable outbursts of emotion."

"They probably never realized what I went through," he said. "I know when I see people out in the street now, after they see the movie, that they're going to be coming up to me, and I am going to have a hard time." The documentary will focus on Torres' experience at Khe Sanh. He read that more bombs were dropped there than anywhere else in the history of aerial warfare.

he North Vietnamese Army violated a truce on Jan. 31, 1968, by attacking Khe Sanh and all of South Vietnam on Tet, the Vietnamese New Year, in an action known as the Tet Offensive. At Khe Sanh, the siege lasted 77 days. The 6,000 Marines fought against 20,000 to 40,000 enemy soldiers. "It was probably the biggest battle of all of Vietnam," Torres said. Torres, a 1965 graduate of Sterling High School, was a Navy corpsman with the Marines. Stationed in the dangerous trenches of Hill 861A, he knew the only way down, before the battle ended, would be with a wound or in a body bag.

One day, the North Vietnamese Army hit a platoon hard, and Torres, trained as a medic, rushed to the scene. He found four Marines wounded by grenades. As he checked the men, all wounded or dead, another grenade landed in a foxhole and exploded 2 or 3 feet from him. "In that couple seconds, your whole life flashes before you," he said. The blast lifted Torres off the ground and threw him. He suffered a concussion, multiple injuries to both legs and an arm, and two ruptured eardrums. When he shielded his face, a nail went through his hand. Shrapnel, dirt and rocks also blew into his eyes, impairing his vision. The corpsman, who always tried to rescue others, screamed for someone to save him. Through mortar, rifle and machine gun fire, and exploding grenades, another corpsman heard his cry. The Marine tried to drag Torres to the company aid station, but a large boulder stood in their way. The corpsman told Torres, who did not think he could walk, to hop out of the trench as soon as he yelled and started firing. "To this day, I don't know how I got over that rock," Torres said. "And I don't know if he got out alive or not. ... He saved my life." Marines cut off Torres' clothes to assess his injuries. As the fighting continued, tear gas blew into his wounds.

The Americans eventually overpowered the enemy there in hand-to-hand combat. The next morning, Torres was to be loaded onto a Medevac helicopter. It was crowded, so he was told to wait for the next one. Torres believes someone was watching out for him – the enemy fired at the chopper he almost boarded, and it crashed. "I always feel guilty about making it out; and the other ones ..." he trailed off.

Torres still has ringing in his ears caused by nerve damage, as well as some hearing loss. An irremovable piece of metal is lodged in his knee. And he struggles to sleep soundly. His wife, Caroline, 61, and his family are proud of him. "We feel very fortunate," she said. "Ray's been a very strong person, and a very good leader, and just a very good example through all these tough times for himself, physically and mentally." Torres, who was awarded the Purple Heart, recognizes that many others also were affected by the war. Even unwounded soldiers should be considered casualties, he said.

Overcome with emotion, Torres did not talk about Vietnam for 28 years. His family never knew the details until his son, Ray Jr., asked him to speak to his history class at Sauk Valley Community College in 1996. Honored, Torres agreed. His presentation included war stories before Khe Sanh. With permission, Tom Tegge, the professor, filmed Torres' presentation. Years later, he included footage in a documentary for the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C. Lou Reda Productions, a company that makes documentaries for the History Channel, saw the presentation and left Torres a message last November.

"I had to play it over and over to make sure it was not a joke," Torres said, according to his biography provided by the History Channel. The company asked him to appear in the documentary. Worried about his emotions, Torres hesitated, but eventually agreed in hopes of leaving a legacy for his children. His family includes Tanya (John) Craft, 37, and Thomas (Michelle) Torres, 31, both of Sterling, and Ray Jr. (engaged to Magen Steele), 35, of Montgomery; and five grandchildren. In March, Lou Reda Productions flew Torres and his wife to Pennsylvania for filming. They enjoyed a fancy hotel and limo, all paid for by the company. "I never in my wildest dreams had ever imagined that something like this could ever happen to me," Torres said, according to his biography. "It is truly humbling, and an honor, and something I will cherish for the rest of my life.

"Scott L. Reda, an executive producer for Lou Reda Productions, praised the Sterling veteran. Talking to Torres, Reda said, helped him realize all the stress and work involved with producing the documentary was worth while. Reda hopes viewers will respond."We want everyone in this country to hug a Vietnam vet," he said. The History Channel will fly Torres and his wife to D.C., on Veterans Day to attend the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Award Ceremony at the Capital Hilton Presidential Ballroom. The all-expenses-paid trips and recognition, however, will not relieve the heavy burden Torres carries. He will never forget the fallen Marines he served alongside. "We didn't need to lose all those lives there," he said, choking on his words. "...They were all so young. ... To this day, I can't get over that." About "Vietnam in HD" "Vietnam in HD" a 6 -hour documentary covering the war from 1961 to 1975, aired on the History Channel. Torres was featured on a segment in regards to the battle on Hill 861A on 05 Feb 1968, when the Hill was overrun by the NVA.

GOD BLESS ALL NURSES

Write Today To Honor The Nurses Who Served Us In Vietnam

In 2010 I attended an Historical camp in the State of Ohio, we referred to it as "The Eastern Primitive Rendezvous." Sitting on a wooden stool by a group camp fire, American and Canadian campers were discussing the current conflicts in Iraq & Afghanistan, and the plight of the many "Wounded Warriors."

When it was my time to speak I informed the group that I served in the U.S. Marine Corps during the Vietnam War and was severely burned at the Khe Sanh Combat Base in North Vietnam. The protective concertina wire we had erected around our perimeter had become overgrown with elephant grass.

Utilizing JP4 & gasoline , during the afternoon heat we had just spread both fuel on the overgrowth, when someone prematurely touched of the fuel before we could all get clear. I became enveloped in a fireball and was burned over my whole body including my Hair, face. Ears, and upper body. Fortunately a corpsman was right there treating my burns and administrating Morphine.

When I awoke, I was on a stretcher in a helicopter being medivaced. I was then transferred to a C-130 and flown to the Air Force Hospital in Cam Rahn Bay. Infection was already setting in, and my skin began to split apart, getting worse by the minute, I fell in and out of consciousness.

A nurse pulled a mattress across the ward floor and placed it between me and another wounded Marine. She continually treated her patients, draining wounds, keeping liquids on my burns, changing bandages, and anything else she could do to make us as comfortable as possible.

At lunch time she brought in food and fed it spoonful by spoonful to myself and another Marine, occasionally taking a spoonful herself, making it a picnic like atmosphere. She worked and cared for her patients 24 hours a day. She constantly reassured her patients that they would recover and never let them give up hope.

After three weeks at the Air Force Hospital I was flown to the 6th Army convalescent Center to complete my recovery. When my wounds finally healed I returned to Whiskey Battery 1/13 at Khe Sanh. I never did get the name of that wonderful nurse, or even get to thank her. But from that day on I held all nurses in the highest regard.

At Khe Sanh things became worse, with the constant enemy barrages. Construction began on a Medical Bunker, and helicopters with medical markings flew in and out of the base when they could. During one of their runs a Medical Helicopter was shot down near the bunker and numerous Medical Personnel and Marines were wounded. I never did learn how many were actually KIA.

Ned Thompson who was also at the Rendezvous, informed the group that his wife was a nurse in Vietnam on a Medical Helicopter and recalled that incident. She had terrible memories of her Vietnam experiences, and even though he tried to help her, one day she just walked away and disappeared. Just another casualty of the Vietnam War.

I offer this poetry from an unknown nurse, also a victim of the War in South East Asia.

POETRY

A Nurses Tribute:
TAKE MY HAND

I gaze, alone, at my reflection in the black granite wall, The memories of hell, Vietnam, are so very easy to recall. The smells, the wet, the whirring of a Huey's noisy blades, Sweep over me and remind me of a debt that's still unpaid. For it was in that damp, dark land my soul did find its heart,
And my childhood dreams of happy innocence forever did depart. For was there, dying soldiers taught what it really means to give, And through their death I learned what it really means to live.

My journey and my mission in that dark and death-filled land, Was to remain with dying soldiers and to offer them my hand. I never heard their laughter, and I never knew their joy,

I only shared the part of them that war was trying to destroy. But though their bodies were broken, so many beyond all hope The valor of each soldier was courageous above all scope. Their pained and anguished faces, I will forever preserve. With such valor and greatness I, a very young girl served.

And when I heard their prayer, "Please God, let me remain", I promised each and everyone they would not die in vain.

It seemed so simple that first time, after all, just a single name. The promise easy, until the list was proportional to its' shame. My sight now from tears has blurred, my memory has faded. God forgive me, I can't recall one name of a soldier that I aided. So I've come to this special place to make my peace at last.

To say hello, to cry goodbye, to say I'm sorry for the past.

In the quiet early morning from the Wall, a voice did speak. He said "I'm that first soldier whose name you've come to seek. You'll find me on this panel built to honor all who died, Just place your hand upon the wall and I will be your guide". The soldier had the answers that I had sought so long He told me I had forgiveness, he told me all blame was gone. For it was that first dying soldier who taught me how to live And through his death I learned what it really means to give.

DEAR SOLDIER:
Gentlehawk Talks to Them

My heart remembers you so clearly, like it was yesterday. Your final hours confused me so, I almost lost my way.

I've tried to remember your names but your faces have grown dim. If only I could just recall if you were Vince or Bill or Jim.

I remember your frightened journey from that death filled land

I walked that road beside you and you took my outstretched hand. I now see your face reflected here, reaching out in love to me

You know I would have traded places but it wasn't meant to be.

['m saddened by all the memories, yet I will never let them go, Because soldier, I too, left a piece of me in that war so long ~go. You asked if I'd remember you, and I promised that I would

I told the world you would have stayed if only that you could.

I ask for your forgiveness, and for you to know how hard I tried. You are in my dreams, my sleepless nights and always when I cry. The memory of your screams come to me even in quiet thought, Screams still, so loud within my soul, I wonder what they bought.

How can I who cared so much forget a name and face so clear,

Of one who shared their soul with me in a long past sad, sad year? So, from the prison of my mind I have come to unlock the door. To talk to you my soldier so I can strive to grieve no more.

Your greatness is forever reflected in the love within my heart Your courage my guide and map from which I will not depart. And when my earthly war is over and life's battle is won at last

I, in death, will call to you and we will travel on the path of past.

I speak as one who went to Vietnam, we share a common pain, We left so many brothers and sisters there and never felt a gain. We have fought the angry demons and tried not to feel their shame We try so to forget those years but we will never be the same.

Our struggle with our dreams and memories never fade with time, We still hear those voices saying our service was a crime .....

But soon our journey will be over and we will leave this land

Our load will be lightened by taking your outstretched hand.

In that quiet early morning on a cold, cold February day, the Wall wet with the tears of many, echoed the soldiers answer to me .

MY BELOVED GENTLEHAWK HEAR ME.....

I couldn't see your face that day, the blood had filled my eyes, But, your beauty though hidden from me, could not be disguised. Dressing my wounds, taking my pain, and I saying I did not sin,

I remember your kindness and I remember your name was Lynne. And though in my heart I knew the answer, I begged you not to lie Please nurse, Is the hell of Vietnam the place that I must die?

You softly said, "Life goes on in death, it simply turns a page", I knew your words were truth, still I struggled with my rage.

How gently you spoke, "Dear Soldier, step to heavens bright light, It is a place of peaceful sleep, where pain gives up without a fight. For God is coming to take you, far from this dark and fearful land, This journey will be less frightening, take my outstretched hand."

You said while I crossed over, you would never leave my side, Your strength gave me courage and helped to stem the raging tide. The years have come and gone yet, you nurse, still mourn for me.

I know you would have traded places, but it wasn't meant to be.

I reach out now and touch your hand reflected in this great wall

I see your tears and hear your prayer and still ever loving call.

I asked you to remember my name, you promised that you would, I know that you have tried and tried with everything you could. Remember, I was much too frightened to make that trip alone,

Thank you nurse, for helping me take that walk to heaven's light. In my peace I'm grateful for your company on that fateful night.

All of the brothers and sisters this wall holds precious and dear, Send you who lived, forgiveness and want to take away your fear. For now we walk beside you, it our time to lead you on your way. We'll give you the strength and courage you will need for every day. When, my brothers and sisters, it's time to leave your earthly land, We'll walk along your journey, and take your outstretched hand.

In Loving Memory to honor the bravery and courage of Four Eagles who were called home on April I?, 1969 so that I might live •••• to help all know their valor. Now in the autumn of my years, one day soon,

I will reach and take their hands.

IS WAR HELL

By Denny Bowers
B CO 1/26

OCEAN PINES -- Is war hell?
Was William Tecumseh Sherman, a Union general during the Civil War, correct when he made that historical statement?

"That's putting it mildly. It is just total insanity," Vietnam veteran Denny Bowers said.

The 63-year-old Ocean Pines resident was a young Marine when he was injured twice, during incidents about six months apart. He received two Purple Heart medals.

A citation signed by the Secretary of the Navy honored him for "heroic achievement while serving as radio operator with Company B, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Division against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam."

On June 7, 1967, "during a search-and-clear mission near Khe Sanh, elements of Company B came under an intense mortar attack, which was closely followed by an assault from a platoon-size force of North Vietnamese Army Regulars. During the ensuing fire fight, Private 1st Class Bowers observed a fellow Marine engaged by the enemy.

"Realizing the seriousness of the situation and disregarding his own safety, he unhesitatingly exposed himself to the heavy volume of enemy fire to assist his comrade. Although painfully wounded in the leg, he quickly obtained a rifle from a casualty and ran across 30 meters of fire-swept terrain to give it to the beleaguered Marine.

"After returning to his own position, he steadfastly ignored his painful injury and calmly and skillfully resumed his duties as a radio operator until he was subsequently medically evacuated.

"His heroic and timely actions at great personal risk were an inspiration to all who observed him and were instrumental in the accomplishment of his unit's mission," the citation states.

He was honored for upholding "the finest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service."

He was injured again Jan. 21, 1968, when the Khe Sanh Combat Base came under enemy mortar and rocket attack. Bowers was praised for leaving his covered position and exposing himself to intense fire. He "fearlessly ran 25 meters across the hazardous area to the platoon's ammunition bunker. Although wounded by fragments from exploding ordnance and sustaining several burns from burning gasses, he steadfastly continued his determined efforts and reached the bunker," the citation states.

Bowers picked up several rounds of mortar ammunition and carried them to the gun crew, which had been unable to fire due to lack of ammunition because they had to evacuate their original position and seek cover in a trench line. His legs and upper chest were wounded.

But Bowers, a native of Baltimore, doesn't consider himself a hero.

"No, the heroes are those dead Marines we picked up and put on a plane and those guys laying, wounded, calling for their mothers," he said as he discussed his experiences from the kitchen table of the home he shares with his wife, Peggy.

He was 18 when he enlisted in the Marines, and on his 19th birthday, after training, landed in Vietnam. He recalled being surprised by the activity around him, quickly moving people, planes, helicopters.

"I knew I wasn't in Baltimore anymore. Anybody who tells you they aren't scared is a liar. You lose your childhood instantly when the first bullet goes over your head. Nothing touches, nor does anything make you ready for combat. You can do all the training in the world. It takes your innocence away instantly," he said.

In August 1966, his boot camp training began at Parris Island, S.C. He also had infantry training at Camp Geiger, within Camp Lejeune, N.C. After a 30-day leave, he was sent to California to Camp Pendleton for additional training before going to Vietnam. His job in the Marines, he said, was a basic grunt, an infantryman.

He was first stationed south of Da Nang, Vietnam. The enemies were farmers, women and children with guns and booby traps.

"I knew of children who were killed because they were the enemy. It's horrible to shoot anybody. It's the most horrible thing in the world," he said. From Da Nang, he was flown to Khe Sanh Village and ordered, right off the plane, to "grab the dead Marines and put them on the same plane we just got off of. I had never even seen a car wreck. That takes me back to a time I'd rather not talk about," he said.
Bowers recalled 18 men, fellow Marines, being killed in one day.

"They would give their life for me. They're my brothers," he said.

He remembered exactly how long he was in Vietnam -- 13 months, four days and two-and-one-half hours.

"That's a long time to be frightened to death," he said.

His final months of duty were in the United States, stationed at Camp Lejeune and working as a marksmanship instructor and brig guard. After discharge, he was flown to an airport in California. There, radical Vietnam War protesters threw water balloons filled with urine at returning Marines.

Three days later, he was in downtown Baltimore watching a protest against the war.
"Then, it occurred to me what I had done allowed them to do what they were doing. They had the freedom to do it. It helped me be a hell of a lot less angry," he said.

Bowers earned a Bachelor of Science degree in personnel labor relations from the University of Baltimore and worked for the Disabled Veterans Outreach Program for 31 years, retiring in 2007.

He has helped build a monument to veterans at Arthur W. Perdue Stadium in Salisbury and a memorial to deceased Wicomico County veterans positioned in front of the Wicomico Youth & Civic Center, also in Salisbury.

About five years ago, he helped plan the Worcester County Veterans Memorial in Ocean Pines.

"I carry the same demons as everybody who saw what I saw. As difficult as my military career was, it is the foundation of who I am because, no matter what happens in my life, it is not as bad as being shot at," he said, smiling. "It truly was the foundation of my life, of who I am."

DOCUMENTARY FILMING TAKES LOCAL WAR VET BACK TO VIETNAM

By MIKE FISHBAUGH

RAY CALHOUN
M 3/3 April 30,1967 Hill 881S

SAN DIEGO -- A Scripps Ranch resident who was awarded the Silver Star for his heroic actions during the Vietnam War will soon be returning to Southeast Asia as part of a documentary. Two years ago, Lester Ray Calhoun was belatedly awarded the Silver Star for heroism in Vietnam. Wounded and knocked unconscious twice, he fought back against Viet Cong soldiers while providing medical aid to other fallen Marines near him.

In 2012, he's going back for the first time since he fought there.

In the mid 1960s, he and two friends, Tim Haley and Mike Hogan, enlisted in the Marines as part of the Corps' "buddy plan." Each was sent to Vietnam, separately. They were in different battalions and their tours of duty were during overlapping timeframes. Now, the three friends are reuniting almost 50 years later for a documentary in production titled "Through Their Eyes." Calhoun, a former Marine lance corporal, hopes it will help rid him of some ghosts that haunt him. "Maybe allow me to say more complete, final goodbyes to some guys that didn't make it," said Calhoun. The trio's return to the killing fields won't be easy emotionally for any of them. Haley said, "The thought of going back to Vietnam is scary; to walk on the ground again is going to be tough." Hogan spoke of the pain he's experienced, and said, "Until you've been where we've been, done what we've done, and seen what we've done, don't bug me." The filmmakers want to delve into the impact of the war on the three idealistic young men.

Director Jason Frizado told 10 News, "To really understand what they went through, you need to go back and be there."Producer Tony Mohareb said the goal is "understanding the war they fought; not necessarily the war we know about." Like so many war vets, Calhoun has battled post-traumatic stress disorder. He hopes this will help close the circle. "I'm hopeful it will help me put this all in a box and put it somewhere," said Calhoun."Through Their Eyes" is targeted for national release on Veterans Day 2012. For more information about the film, visit www.indiegogo.com/through-their-eyes.

MIKE,

Interesting that you should post this today. I just got back from visiting the traveling wall here in Bridgewater ,NJ. I went to pay my respects to all the brothers who fought with me and Denny on that faithful day. June 7,'67. I found each name touched it said some prayers and was moved almost to tears by their sacrifice. May they rest in peace.

I GET MAIL

Dear Mr. Eichler & Red Clay,

I would greatly appreciate if you could consider telling the story of LCpl Keith Perrelli and the passing of his Mother Emma. After LCpl Perrelli was KIA, his parents became very passionate about supporting the war in Vietnam. His Father Frank, was more than just passionate when it came to War Protesters. He was known to "crack" a few heads , if he observed anyone who even thought carrying an NVA flag was a good idea.

Rich De Lotto

ED NOTE: Rich it would be my pleasure, to include Keith's story in Red Clay. Most of the material you provided was scanned from a newspaper and unreadable. From what I could decipher, after Keith's death, his parents attempted to have his brother, who was serving in the US Army, home from Korea, under the sole surviving son's act. I do not know the income of that request.

LCPL KEITH FRANCIS PERRELLI USMC
KIA 25 September 1967
Con Thien Vietnam

Keith grew up in the Atherua section, where his friends nicknamed him "Buddy".

His grand parents, Mr. & Mrs. Iwanoski operated "Olly's Tavern" on Van Houten Avenue for many years. In 1962, the family moved from Clifton to Oakridge. Keith still remained friends with many from Clifton such as Eddie Freed.

Keith enrolled in Franklin High School which has since changed its name to Wallkill Valley High School He lettered in 3 sports and graduated. Keith's brother Duane had already decided to enter the Air Force when Keith decided to enlist in the Marines. Keith received basic and advanced infantry training during 1966 and was ordered to Viet Nam soon after. He arrived in January 1967, and was assigned to the 3rd Marine Division. Participating in Operation Junction City, Keith Perrelli found himself and his fellow Marines cut off from his company. Acting as a forward observer, Keith called in artillery fire to protect his unit from being over run. During this engagement, Keith was wounded and later received the Purple Heart for his actions.

During this time of the war, North Vietnamese forces were making a concerted effort to invade the northern provinces of Viet Nam and route American forces there, primarily U.S. Marines. During September 1967, in attempting to throw back enemy forces by utilizing B-52's, Navy 7th Fleet fire power, long range artillery and jet fighter bombers, General William Westmoreland was quoted as saying " ... this is the heaviest conventional bombardment in the history of warfare". At the fire base called Con Thien, U.S. Marines would suffer over 1,100 killed or wounded during this month. On September 26, 1967, Marine Headquarters announced that in the previous 24 hours, 2 Marines had been killed in the Con Thien area.

On September 25, 1967 Lance Corporal Keith Francis Perrelli serving with the 3rd Marine Division, was killed in action by an artillery and mortar bombardment of his sandbagged position at Con Thien. He left behind his parents, a brother and a sister.

KEITH'S MOTHER RECENTLY PASSED AWAY

Emma Perrelli Gold Star Mother, of Hudson, Fla., passed away Oct. 21, 2011

A Mass was held at Blessed Katri Church, 427 Stanhope Rd. Sparta, N.J., at 12:30 p.m. Saturday, Nov. 19. Repast followed in the community room after the Mass.

A Gold Star Mother belonging to many veterans' organizations, Emma was most proud of VVA Chapter 1003, named after her son, Keith F. Perrelli.

She is survived by her husband of 68 years, Frank; son, Duane; daughter, Deidre Sponheimer; four grandchildren; five great-grandchildren and many nieces and nephews.

VIETNAM MARINES HONOR THEIR CORPSMAN

Written By

Vietnam veteran Marines of the 3d Platoon, Company H, 2d Battalion, Third Marine Regiment, Third Marine Division honored their corpsman, Hospital Corpsman Third Class Roy "Doc" Moon, with a surprise presentation of an M 1 carbine at their biannual reunion in Memphis, Tenn., on May 15. Moon's wife, Nancy, accompanied him to the reunion as did his son, Chris, who lives in Memphis.

Five 3d Plt Marines who had been wounded and treated by Doc Moon in Vietnam were at the reunion and spoke with praise about his treatment of their wounds on the battlefield. Former Sergeant Ben "Tex" Williams said: "All of our corpsmen were good; they were great. But as good as all of those corpsmen were, there wasn't any of them that came close to filling the shoes of Doc Roy Moon. We love you, Doc. Semper Fi."

The most seriously wounded man, former Private First Class John "Weasel" Griffin, reunited with Doc Moon for the first time since Doc had treated and prepared him for medical evacuation from the Khe Sanh area on April 30, 1968. "Right after the mortar exploded, I was still numb," Griffin said, "when Doc came over and tended to me, and calmed me and assured me that I was in pretty good shape, even though I was concerned about my fathering ability. Doc, thank you for being right there when we needed you most."

Former Corporal Joe Richardson, wounded in the same mortar attack, said, "This is the bravest man I've ever met. Without any reservation at all about his own life, his own safety, he was professional, and when you yelled for Doc, he was there.

All I can say about Doc is Semper Fi, brother, and thank you from the bottom of my heart."

Former Cpl Patrick "Boot Camp" Hodgkins and the author, then-First Lieutenant Chuck Gaede, also spoke highly of Doc Moon's treatment of their wounds.

Moon arrived in Vietnam on Oct. 5, 1967, and was assigned to the 3d Plt. He stayed with the 3d Plt until May 14, 1968. His tour in Vietnam included the 1968 Tet offensive and operations at Con Thien, An Hoa, north and south of Danang, and Khe Sanh. He was awarded the Navy Commendation Medal with combat "V" for saving the life of a Marine who was seriously wounded by a Viet Cong explosive device in January 1968. Although Moon narrowly escaped injury when he fell into a punji pit with rotten stakes, he never was wounded.

Doc Moon (above) is surprised by the presentation of a special gift, an M1 Rock-Ola carbine, that is very similar to the one he has with him outside this Montagnard house (below) in Vietnam in December 1967.

At some point during his tour, he acquired an M1 carbine, which he carried with him in the field.

Knowing his fondness for the M1, members of the 3d Plt planned a surprise presentation for their next reunion. One of the Marines, Sgt Joe "Bama" Whittington, located a Rock-Ola carbine with a known history. Whittington refinished the carbine and built a matching wood presentation case. Sgt Williams had a plaque made for the presentation case with a Vietnam-era picture of Doc Moon and the inscription:

"Semper Fi Doc Moon. We knew we could always count on you! Marines, H/2/3 1967-1968."

Doc Moon's relationship with the 3d Plt Marines began in Vietnam and has continued since. He attended the first platoon reunion in 1995 and every one thereafter, including a return trip to Vietnam in 2001. He calls and visits some of the Marines frequently and is friends with many of them. His relationship with the Marines was and remains even closer than it normally is between a corpsman and his Marines.

Holding his new carbine Moon said: "I always wanted one of these. This is what I carried over there. I carried it because it was little, and I could run fast with it. I really didn't know how to use it. They issued me a .45, a first aid kit, a flak jacket and a helmet, and that's what they sent me to the field with. I didn't know a soul there.

"I joined Third Platoon at a place called Con Thien, which is just a short distance from the DMZ [Demilitarized Zone]. It was rainin', muddy; I was by myself. I didn't have a friend in the world. I got off that six-by truck that day, and from that day on, I've been a Marine. I spent all of my time with the Third Platoon. I was fortunate. I was one of the few corpsmen that didn't get transferred from unit to unit."

The 3d Plt Marines were equally fortunate to have Doc Roy Moon with them.

LtCol Gaede, an infantry officer and Vietnam veteran, retired from the Marine Corps Reserve in 1998, after 29 years of service. Obtaining his doctorate in 1993, he retired from the University of Texas at Austin in 2007. Presently, he is an officer in VFW Post 3377 and on the board of his local chapter of the Military Officers Association of America. He is also a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans.

KHE SANH VETERANS MINI-REUNION

Khe Sanh Vets
Mini-Reunion - Key Largo FL

For the last several year a group of Khe Sanh Veterans have been gathering in Key Largo, FL in January. About the same time of year January, 21 as the 77 day Siege at Khe Sanh began. The number of folks attending has grown and so has the good time enjoyed when we gather.

The Moose Club in Key Largo (Mile Marker 98.8) is the main bunker (watering hole) where we start out. We enjoy such things as a fishing trip; visit to dolphins sometimes; some good restaurants; some horseshoes; and a ride down to the most Southern point of the US, Key West, and most importantly good brotherhood.

Key Largo is 92 miles South of Ft. Lauderdale and 63 miles south of Miami. If you fly Ft. Lauderdale is a little bit further to drive but flights there are generally cheaper. Jack Corbett (West Dickens Avenue) started this tradition and it is certainly worthwhile to continue. Several hotels/motels are available in the area. The Pelican, http://www.hungrypelican.com/ is one that sounds good with 2 doubles at $110 and single Queens at $90. Check website for others. Mention Khe Sanh Vets when calling. There are quite a few others in the area. CALL EARLY TO MAKE RESERVATIONS since things book up early.

This is a VERY INFORMAL gathering and spouses, significant others, family and other veterans are always welcome. Please feel free to call or e-mail with any questions you may have. My telephone number and e-mail address is in the Membership Directory.

COMING HOME TO LESS THAN A HERO'S WELCOME

By Karl MARLANTES C CO 1/4

Karl Marlantes is the author of What It Is Like To Go To War.

I returned to America in October of 1969 after 13 months as a Marine in Vietnam. While I was there, I would comfort myself by imagining all the girls I ever knew hugging me in a huge warm group embrace. Somehow, I thought something similar would be waiting for me when I came home.

I was totally unprepared for what actually happened. My big brother picked me up at Travis Air Force Base in California. As we started to leave the terminal he put his hand on my shoulder and warned me that there might be trouble outside. "Trouble?" I asked.

I'd just gotten back from Vietnam. But the war held no hurt or humiliation like what happened as we drove through a crowd of protesters shouting obscenities at us, flipping us the bird, and pounding on my brother's 1960 Valiant with their fists and protest signs. I can still see the hate-filled face of a protester snarling at me through the passenger-side window. I can still feel my utter bewilderment and pain.

There were no hugs. My long imagined safe harbor was sewn with mines of hate.

Vietnam) held no hurt or humiliation like what happened as we drove through a crowd of protesters shouting obscenities at us, flipping us the bird, and pounding on my brother's 1960 Valiant with their fists and protest signs.

This kind of thing no longer happens. I'm immensely happy that America has learned to distinguish the kids fighting our wars from the adults making the war policies. But I worry that instead, we have become smugly complacent.

These days, there are yellow ribbons, beer commercials showing people clapping at airports, and banners on freeway overpasses. There is the well-intended "thank you for your service," and a hasty handshake. I've even received these, 40 years late. I know it is done with kind intentions, so I smile and say thank you. But inside I feel hollow — even slightly embarrassed. I know too many people who have died doing what I am getting thanked for. I also know, having gone through four decades of trying to reintegrate into my own culture, that ribbons and handshakes fall way short of what returning veterans actually need. A real "welcome home" is being helped with these challenges.

We veterans are just part of a complex and interconnected web of people who voted for the policymakers who decided war was the right response, who paid their taxes to finance it, who grew the food, who financed the factories where the weapons were built or who taught the scientists who designed them. The veterans' part of this web is that we were the ones who pulled the trigger at the end of the line — and carry the burden of that for everyone else.

I recently shared a radio interview with a young veteran from Afghanistan. He'd been back two years. While we were waiting to go on the air he told me that three of his friends from his own small unit had already committed suicide. Two years. Although suicide statistics for veterans are very difficult to pin down — is a drug overdose a suicide? How about cirrhosis of the liver? — Veterans Affairs statistics from 2010 show that 18 veterans commit suicide a day.

Clapping at airports and a handshake is way better than what happened after Vietnam, but clearly it isn't enough.

Our troops are coming home and our part of the killing over there is ending. Our work to end the killing over here is just beginning.

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to First Lieutenant Karl A. Marlantes (MCSN: 0-103269), United States Marine Corps (Reserve), for extraordinary heroism while serving as Executive Officer of Company C, First Battalion, Fourth Marines, THIRD Marine Division (Reinforced), Fleet Marine Force, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam. During the period 1 to 6 March 1969, Company C was engaged in a combat operation north of the Rockpile and sustained numerous casualties from North Vietnamese Army mortars, rocket-propelled grenades, small arms, and automatic weapons fire. While continuing to function effectively in his primary billet, First Lieutenant Marlantes skillfully combined and reorganized the remaining members of two platoons, and on 6 March initiated an aggressive assault up a hill, the top of which was controlled by a hostile unit occupying well-fortified bunkers. Under First Lieutenant Marlantes' dynamic leadership, the attack gained momentum which carried it up the slope and through several enemy emplacements before the surprised North Vietnamese force was able to muster determined resistance. Delivering a heavy volume of fire, the enemy temporarily pinned down the friendly unit. First Lieutenant Marlantes, completely disregarding his own safety, charged across the fire-swept terrain to storm four bunkers in succession, completely destroying them. While thus engaged, he was seriously wounded, but steadfastly refusing medical attention, continued to lead his men until the objective was secured, a perimeter defense established, and all other casualties medically evacuated. Then, aware that all experienced officers and noncommissioned officers had become casualties, he resolutely refused medical evacuation for himself. His heroic actions and resolute determination inspired all who observed him and were instrumental in a decisive rout of the North Vietnamese Army force with minimal friendly casualties. By his courage, aggressive fighting spirit, and unwavering devotion to duty in the face of grave personal danger, First Lieutenant Marlantes upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

STORY LEADS EDITOR TO PRO ASSISTANCE WITH VIETNAM FILM

By BILL COATES
Valley Life Editor

Ken Rodgers and his wife, Betty, shot a film about the battle of Khe Sanh in Vietnam and the Marines who fought it. They had footage of interviews with more than a dozen Marines of Bravo Company. All had endured the months-long siege at Khe Sanh in 1968. And they had footage of archival photographs and newsreels by prize-winning photographers. Assembling it all into a coherent narrative was another matter. Rodgers didn't want to tackle editing the film himself. He wanted it done professionally, but he despaired of finding a film editor up to the task. That was late last year.

Bill Coates/Dispatch (2010), Ken Rodgers and his wife, Betty, visited Casa Grande last year. The visit led to a newspaper article about a film they were making. That, in turn, led to hiring a film editor who had worked with George Lucas and Francis Ford Coppola

Then in January, he got a call from John Nutt. It was a call out of the blue for Rodgers. And one of those things that seemed too good to be true, like making $1,000 a week working part-time out of your home. Nutt had too-good-to-be-true credentials, including 40 years' experience as a film editor, working with industry giants like George Lucas and Francis Ford Coppola. Nutt, however, turned out to be the real thing. And he turned the Rodgers footage into a well-honed documentary, one they're submitting to major film festivals. First on their list is Utah's Sundance. From Nutt's end, Rodgers said, it wasn't a call out of the blue. It arose from a series of happy accidents. It led to a screening of the finished film at Lucas' Skywalker Ranch.

Before last December Nutt had no idea who Ken and Betty Rodgers were. He had no idea they had a project that called for a film editor. After all, they lived in Boise, Idaho. Nutt lived in northern California. In December, however, Nutt and his wife, Ann, just happened to be visiting their daughter in Tucson. It was the Christmas holidays, just after a Dec. 19 article about Rodgers and his film project appeared in the Casa Grande Dispatch. The Associated Press picked it up, and it ran in Tucson's Arizona Daily Star. The article came about because the Rodgers had been visiting Casa Grande earlier in December. Betty showed up at the Dispatch offices and said her husband had nearly completed a documentary about Vietnam. She thought it would make a good story. So did I. Rodgers, after all, had grown up in Casa Grande and gone to high school here. As a Marine, he was at Khe Sanh, witness to some of the deadliest fighting in Vietnam. And he made a movie about it. All it needed was some editing. The article mentioned Rodgers was looking for an editor.

By chance, Ann Nutt saw the same article. She suggested he call Rodgers in Boise. Nutt, it happened, was a Vietnam veteran himself. A film like that could resonate. Nutt balked at first, but his wife kept at it. And so he called. So out of the blue came the call from a Vietnam veteran and seasoned film editor. He also offered a good price, a very good price. Nutt got the job. "He edited the movie at his house," Rodgers said. But Nutt went a step further. He took the film to sound editor Mark Berger at Skywalker Ranch in Marin County. "We were there," Rodgers said. "We watched and actually participated a little bit, although we were kind of in awe of the place."

He and Betty spent four days at the ranch while Berger worked on the sound. "It was amazing what they do. These guys can hear stuff that I can't hear," he added, Berger worked with Nutt, who also has lengthy credits as a sound editor. Sometimes they had sharp disagreements, Rodgers said."They were arguing over stuff, then they would look at us to settle it for them," Rodgers said.

Nutt and Berger eventually put aside their differences. They eliminated the distractions of what started out as something of a handmade movie. "We did a lot of these interviews on the road," Rodgers said. "There were buzzes and hums and the lighting wasn't right, and they cleaned up all of that. The interviews, Rodgers said, have an un glossed quality about them. That fits the material.

"It's a documentary about a rough subject," Rodgers said. It's titled, "Bravo! Common Men, Uncommon Valor. "It has had a few informal screenings already, including one for the employees at Skywalker Ranch. Rodgers also showed it to a reunion of Khe Sanh Marines in July. This would be a hard audience to please. They approved, Rodgers said, joking: "They didn't yell and throw stuff at me.

"They also showed the film to most of 14 Marines and one Navy corpsman they interviewed for the movie.

At least one has refused to see it. Another has since died. "That leaves four guys that have not seen it and they don't seem to care."Perhaps for some of them, the Vietnam War has never ended. For others, it's not worth revisiting.

For younger generations, it's a war that has no personal meaning. It's a chapter in the history books, like World War II. The film, in any case, documents a battle that was something of a microcosm of the war itself. Marines took a fierce pounding and the siege was eventually broken. It was an American victory with little strategic value, according to an account in Wikipedia. It was that kind of war. Rodgers had first planned to show the film at the GI Film festival in Washington, but Nutt suggested he aim higher. So he's starting with Sundance. A submission doesn't guarantee entry. Rodgers should hear back on that next month. The Sundance Film Festival is in January. Beyond that, Rodgers plans to submit his film to South by Southwest in Austin and the Tribeca in New York City Film festival rules prohibit public showings in advance, but private screenings are OK. And, in December, Ken and Betty Rodgers will bring their film to Casa Grande for one such showing. For an invitation, contact Rodgers by email at kennetherodgers@msn.com.

In this Marine combat memoir, Steve Johnson recounts his service in Vietnam from April 1967 to May 1968. Only 17 when he enlisted in 1964, Johnson deployed to Vietnam with the 3rd Reconnaissance Battalion, 3rd Marine Division, and his tour included such now famous locations as Phu Bai, Khe Sanh, Nha Trang and Quang Tri, among others. With a sometimes humorous tone, Johnson describes a war of often terrified high school and college-aged youngsters faced with exotic plant and animal life, monsoon rains, harrowing reconnaissance missions and death. Details are plentiful about tactics, equipment, geography and, always, fellow Marines.

Steven A. Johnson served more than 17 years in the Marine Corps on active duty and in the reserves (including a call-up for active duty in Desert Storm). He spent 20 years with the Jamestown, New York, Police Department, and six with the Chautauqua County Sheriffs Office. He lives in Jamestown.

AN UNEARNED APOLOGY

Chaplain William R. Hampton

The place was the valley known as Khe Sanh in the jungle mountains of South Vietnam. This valley had been a coffee bean plantation operated by a Frenchman until the war. The 26th Marine Regiment was tasked to cut off the Ho Chi Minh Trail, over which supplies were carried from North Vietnam into South Vietnam. The Marines had built an airstrip and encircled it in a one mile square with trenches, bunkers, land mines and concertina wire to protect the 5,000 Marines and Navy personnel inside.

Thirty thousand NVA (North Vietnamese Army) took positions in the immediate deep jungle and on the surrounding mountains and began what became the famous "Seventy-Seven Day Siege" of Khe Sanh, attacking from all sides and firing rockets and mortars 24 hours a day for 77 days. Continuous fog and clouds made air support extremely difficult.

It was 29 February 1968, a little more than a month into the "siege". Planes were hit by rockets when the landed, so they would sometimes "pretend" to land but push off pallets of supplies and deposit passengers and then take-off again without completely stopping.

On this day there were pallets of mailbags which were quickly distributed to the respective battalions. When my 3rd Battalion received its mailbags, our postal clerk went to work in the mail tent. I didn't think he was sorting the mail fast enough, sol appointed myself to assist him.

At one point I picked up a mail bag and moved it some six feet across the tent floor. Just then a round came through the tent and detonated exactly where I had been standing. Had I not moved, it would have been a direct hit. Even then the concussion from the explosion knocked me to the ground, and I lost consciousness for a few seconds. When I regained consciousness I could see but not hear. I quickly looked around to see if all my body parts were still there, while my hearing was returning.

The mail clerk was shrieking in pain. That round had torn into him, and he was bleeding profusely. A corpsman responded to the cries, and we moved him to the battalion aid station. After some medical attention from the battalion surgeon, we carried him to the airstrip medical bunker and waited for a medevac chopper to take him out to the hospital ship. He was in such bad shape that I was sure he wouldn't make it alive. I never heard from or about him again until ....

On Saturday, 12 Jun 2010, I received a phone call. The caller identified himself as a Marine I had assisted in Vietnam when he was wounded. He described the mail tent incident and said he was calling to apologize!

I was stunned! Apologize for what, I asked. "I know it has been 42 years, but I need to apologize for all the expletives I used when you were trying to help me. When you helped me to the airstrip you looked at my dog tag and said something about me being a "Lutheran" the same as you, and I cursed at you. It's taken me 42 years, but I want you to know that I'm sorry for the way I treated you."

In the following conversation I learned that his name is Bradley Barton and he was from Illinois. He was discharged from the Marine Corps and is a paraplegic. He currently lives in Portland, Oregon and says that he is a "happy camper" and grateful to be alive.

That's all I know as of now. I have sent him a packet of appropriate propaganda-about my return to Vietnam a few years ago, etc. He located my name from the Khe Sanh Veterans Association directory. I'm looking forward to more conversation ....

DEAD MARINES DOG TAG IN VIETNAM IS DISCOVERED 43 YEARS LATER

Valerie Chinn

NEW ALBANY, IN (WDRB) From outside of the Davis family home, you can see they are Marine proud, as the American flag is flying.

For four decades, Larry Davis has been on a mission to learn more about the death of his brother, Marine Randy Davis. Medals, including the Purple Heart, and pictures of his younger brother, an 18-year-old machine-gunner, are displayed in the home.

Larry Davis was emotional as he said, "It's been 43 years and there isn't a day that goes by that I don't think of him. He was a damn good kid."

Randy was killed by enemy fire in Khe Sanh, in North Vietnam back in 1968. A non-profit organization Tours of Peace Vietnam Veterans amazingly found his dog tag that he wore around his neck when he died. After verifying Larry was his brother, the organization recently sent the Davis family the dog tag. It's still in great condition although it's hard to read and is even dusty from the Vietnam soil.

He says, "It just brings the thing whole circle for me and I can't begin to tell you what it's worth to me...It's like he's right here with me. It's like getting a piece of him back home."

Valerie Chinn asked, "How do you think your parents would feel knowing you have this?" Davis says, "Well, that's another subject. His death actually killed my mother. She died nine months later at 51. She never got over it and we haven't either. But I don't know...they'd be ecstatic to get something back other than what they sent in a sea bag."

They never had a chance to say good-bye because his casket was sealed. His father even questioned if Randy's body was inside. He had wanted to open it to make sure, but didn't.

Even in one of Randy's last letters, it's as if he knew what was going to happen to him. He told his family that his time was running out.

Deidre Davis, Larry's wife says, "I've read all his letters. I feel like I know him. I've got a brother-in-law that was killed in Vietnam and he's in my heart."

Larry says when talking about the dog tag, "He was just a young kid, but he did his job well. There's nothing I'd take for this."

And their search for answers about Randy is not over. They're hoping to talk to the men who served with him, when he died.

THE LIVING MEMORIAL SCULPTURE GARDEN

VISIT BY KHE SANH VETERANS

By Craig Tourte

The Garden is located at the southwestern base of Mt. Shasta, on the Klamath National Forest Land in the Goosenest Ranger District. It was founded in 1988 by a group of Siskiyou County veterans and is sponsored and maintained by the Weed/Lake Shastina Kiwanis Club. A Memorial Wall celebrates the honorable discharged veterans of our nation's conflicts from the Revolutionary War to the present.

Dennis Smith, a Vietnam War Marine Corps sergeant and veteran of the siege of Khe Sanh, is the metal sculptor whose works grace the Sculpture Garden: "Each sculpture has personal meaning for me in terms of life experience and personal incidents. Through the arts we have the means to peacefully consider violence and to ask questions." His work is specific yet symbolic, monumental yet intimate, patriotic yet cautionary. " I don't think the purpose of art is to entertain, but to uplift, edify and educate.

We got out of our vehicles and walked around the 100 or so acres and viewed the 10 sculptures.. As an example, quotes from the literature inspired by the Sculpture Dennis Smith states - A tall figure with one arm raised - The Peaceful Warrior. There must be those who, loving peace, will fight against aggression to preserve that peace The Peaceful Warrior honors those who step forward when asked to do so.

A female figure with hands out holding an American flag - Those left behind. Who can repay those who have lost loved ones in combat. Sculpture depicting the second raising of the flag on Mt. Suribachi, Iwo Jima. The Greatest Generation. A soldier exists in a cage - POW & MIA, outside the cage on a simple metal arch hang POW and MIA bracelets, wreaths, flags and flowers placed by visitors. Dennis states in the literature.

A soldier exists in a cage. Imagine confinement, mosquitoes, leeches, rats, rotten rice, rotten fish, abusive guards, and little chance of survival. Hope is reaching for the will to hang on. Couple embracing - Coming Home. Vets feel a lot of emotional pain upon returning home. Wounded Warrior with amputated left arm - All Wounded Warriors symbolizes all serviced-connected wounds. there are many ways to be wounded. Sculpture of nurses carrying stretcher - The Nurses- courageous souls who bring the healing arts to places rife with injury and death. A tall elegant figure plays a flute.- The Flute player symbolizes peace and tranquility. At the 38th Parallel a sword lays broken - Korean War Veteran who remembers the Korean War Vets? The Memorial also has an area titled Hot LZ Memorial Wall which contains names of veterans etched on Granite Memorial Wall.

We must have spent and hour visiting the sculptures, each with our own interpretation of what an individual sculpture signified to us. It was fascinating to hear Tom, Dave and Ned discuss how they thought a particular sculpture was relevant to their experience. Dave Tonick placed a Khe Sanh coin at the base of the POW - MIA arch where that coin joined the many bracelets of MIA's, Vietnam colored beads, feathers and other assorted tributes and symbols all with significant meaning to those who placed them there.

2011,the name "Khe Sanh Veterans" will be etched on this granite wall, like the Khe Sanh roadside Memorial in Albuquerque New Mexico, our name, battles and those lost will be perpetually remembered.

STORY AND PHOTOS OF THE ACTUAL CEREMONY WHICH WAS ATTENDED BY NUMEROUS KHE SANH VETERANS, ON VETERANS DAY 11 NOV 2011

Veterans Day, November 11, 2011 - Living Memorial Sculpture Garden, Siskiyou County, California
By Craig W. Tourte

The twice annual dedication of names placed on the granite-clad Memorial Wall located at the foot of Mount Shasta was well attended with 300 of those who paid tribute to the memory of those who served in our military. At this particular dedication the words "Khe Sanh Veterans LM" (Life Member) was forever etched into the richly dark granite of the Sponsor Wall which will forever remind all who view that monument of the sacrifice and perseverance of those who served.

The dedication was well attended by over twenty veterans of that Battle.

Master of Ceremonies, Dr. John B. Runnels, Capt. U.S. Navy Retired - delivered the words I presented as a representative of the Khe Sanh Veteran Association.

"All who have served are honored here, their names may not be inscribed in these beautiful granite stones, but they are still remembered for their service and for their sacrifice. We also take this moment to honor those who did not return home with us and to remember those who to this day, carry the wounds and memory of war in their hearts, minds and bodies. Today we remember not only those whose names appear on this wonderful granite memorial but also those who continue to fight for the freedom of all Americans. "

"There is a poem in the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden pamphlet that starts with the words "A place to remember where we have been. A place to remember what we've been through. A place to remember those faces so well of friends and loved ones…." As stated in the pamphlet Dennis Smith, the artist and the creator of these wonderful sculptures is a former Marine and survivor of the historic Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh in what was then the country of South Vietnam. Dennis is quoted as saying "Each sculpture has personal meaning for me in terms of life experiences and personal incidents."

"Please note the presence here of the many who served on the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Through Dennis's vision and creations, this place holds a special and even reverent significance for those who served at Khe Sanh. As an example the "Wounded Warrior" sculpture with right hand reaching up into the air and the left arm missing a limb was inspired by Dennis's friend and our comrade Lloyd Scudder and the struggles that Lloyd and all the other wounded have had to endure. Lloyd is a Khe Sanh Veteran and an inspiration to all of us for his strength, courage and perseverance. The Sculpture the "The Nurses" depicting three nurses, carrying a stretcher was inspired by the tragic death PFC Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer who was killed in action at Khe Sanh on March 14, 1968, another friend of Dennis and also our comrade."

"We each have our own interpretation of what an individual sculpture signifies and how it is relevant to ones own experience and memory. The Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh was an historic event. The mention of Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy in President Obama's inaugural address, forever confirms to our nation and the world that the Battle of Khe Sanh holds a significant place in American History. As a representative of the Khe Sanh Veterans and Tom Eicher, President of our Association, I am privileged and honored to have been a part of this special dedication - to have the name "Khe Sanh Veterans" etched into the granite Sponsor wall. This truly is a special place that remembers all of the veterans of this great nation who have given so much and have asked for so little. Through this inspiring Living Memorial Sculpture Garden, we honor them all. "

I GET LETTERS

Dear Tom,

I am a Legionnaire and a member of the KSV. Enclosed is a copy of a response I sent to the American Legion Auxiliary Executive Director/ National Secretary, Ms Mary "Dubbie" Buckler, regarding a portion of her article, "Dubbie's Message," in the August, 2011 American Legion Auxiliary Magazine.

In her article she stated that she visited Ground Zero in New York City, and prior to her leaving she asked and gained permission to affix a flag and an American Legion Auxiliary 9/11 Tribute sign on the multi-story high fencing that surrounds the construction site; she said that sign bearing the American Legion Auxiliary Emblem, is the only one there for everyone to see.

I believe Ms Buckler's action should inspire our organization to follow suit and I hope you agree. This is a golden opportunity and should be a national goal for our association.

THE ARTICLE

A COUNTRY CHANGED:
Reflecting on 9/11-10 Years Later

We are now in the longest period, of war in our nation's history. Sept. 11 marks the 10th anniversary of the worst attacks ever to occur on U.S. soil. Al-Qaida and its 19 hijackers spent about a half million dollars plotting and hijacking planes they used to attack the United States, killing 2,995 people and causing more than $50 billion in direct economic damages. A recent "Costs of War" report from the Eisenhower Research Project at Brown University's Watson Institute for International Studies assesses that costs associated with the U.S, military response to the 9/11 attacks will exceed $3.7 trillion.

War is indeed costly - at home and abroad. More than 6,000 U.S. military service members have given their ultimate sacrifice in Operations Iraqi Freedom (OIF), Enduring Freedom (OEF), and New Dawn (OND])) under Commanders-In-Chief from both political parties. More than 1,700 who have fought in OIF/OEF/OND are amputees, more than 150,000 have Traumatic Brain Injury, and more than 67,000 have Post Traumatic Stress diagnoses. Federal obligations to care for past and future veterans of these wars will likely total between $600-$950 billion, and the Watson Institute study projects those costs of war will not peak until mid-century.

Our brave Navy SEALs eliminated Osama Bin Laden, but Al-Qaida remains a multinational force that continues to threaten our security. Nearly 10 years after declaration of the War on Terror, we live very differently than we did before we were attacked. Our youngest generation is known as the "Homeland Security Generation." Travel forever changed. U.S. airline passengers annually spend a collective 46,000 years in security lines. Airport security alone grew by the billions. Oil is a confounding cost, off living factor. Costs have driven the exodus of U.S. manufacturing. And our country's "post 9/11 era" debt is beyond what most of us can even imagine.

This summer, I visited Ground Zero in New York City. Before I left, I'd gained permission to affix a flag and an American Legion Auxiliary 9/11 tribute sign on the multi-story-high fencing surrounding the reconstruction site. That sign, bearing our national organization's emblem, is the ONLY one there for everyone walking to Ground Zero to see.

A wave of patriotism engulfed our country 10 years ago. The American Legion Auxiliary keeps patriotism alive. As members, we devote our service to our veterans who served and our troops serving today. They sacrifice dearly to protect us and preserve our heritage of freedom. The American Legion Auxiliary knows that freedom isn't free. I think most of us believe it's priceless. And, so is our right to belong to the ALA. As a member, I positively think that honoring those who make me eligibile to belong is worth an extra $5 bill.

Mary "Dubbie" Buckler
Executive Director/National Secretary

LATE OBIT

MAJOR JAMES R. CANNON USMCR
ECHO CO 2/3

Major James R. Cannon, USMC (retired), of Los Lunas, died on July 14 after suffering a heart attack on the morning of July 7 and was kept on total life support for seven days. Jim was born in King George, Va., on Oct. 2, 1936, and was the son of Clyde and Tishie Belle Cannon of Fredericksburg, Va.

Jim was a 24-year veteran of the Vietnam War and the recipient of the Silver Star, the Bronze Star with Combat "V" and two Purple Hearts. He was an active member of many military associations and enjoyed helping many service men and woman to receive their benefits from the VA.

Jim left behind a wife, Judy. He was the loving father of two sons, Kevin R. Cannon and Corey J. Cannon; two daughters, Dawn C. Smith and Faith C. Cook; and two stepdaughters, Paula Spear and Naomi Spear. Jim had 11 grandchildren and six great-grandchildren.

He was preceded in death by his brother, Joseph, his former wife, Freda L. Robinson, and wife, Marylin Spear, Jack L. Cannon and Lonnie A. Cannon; and sister, June Trigger.

His funeral service was held at French Mortuary on July 20, and was interred at the National Cemetery in Santa Fe with full military honors. He will be missed by all of the men who served with him, the veterans and their families who knew him, his friends, his brothers and sister and by his children, who thought the world of him. His favorite charity was the Fisher House Foundation, which helps servicemen and their families.

WALKING WITH GIANTS-THE TIGERS OF HMM-262

By Beth Crumley

If they ever tell my story let them say that I walked with giants. Men rise and fall like the winter wheat, but these names will never die."

One of the things I love most about my work in Marine Corps history is the opportunity to interact with both active duty Marines, and with veterans. Over the course of the years, I have spent time with many veterans groups, and I have cherished every one of those experiences. This past weekend, however, I experienced something extraordinary. I was a guest at a reunion, held on Marine Corps Base Quantico, of Marine Medium Helicopter Squadron 262. The gathering was much like that of any other unit held aboard Quantico. It was marked by a great trip to HMX-1, the Evening Parade at Marine Barracks, 8th and I, and a trip to the museum. Friendships were renewed, meals were shared, great stories told.

And what, you may ask, was so extraordinary about this? HMM-262 is not one of the more recognizable squadrons. Their history is not spoken in the reverential tones sometimes given to other aviation units. While someone with an in-depth knowledge of Marine Corps helicopters in Vietnam might be aware they operated out of Ky Ha, Marble Mountain, off the USS Tripoli, and in Quang Tri, the importance of their mission in Vietnam remains largely unknown. They are, in so many ways, the forgotten squadron, and that is almost criminal. Their accomplishments, their sacrifices, their devotion to duty should be legendary in the annals of Marine Corps history.

HMM-262, under the command of LtCol Ural W. Shadric, arrived in Vietnam on 4 December 1966.

Shortly after their arrival the command moved to Ky Ha, in Quang Tin Province. By February 1967, HMM-262 established a record for CH-46 squadrons in Vietnam by flying some 2198.2 hours in support of combat operations. (A large number of missions were flown in support of Operation Desoto.) Major General Louis B. Robertshaw sent the following message:

"Your monthly record of 2198 hours during February impressive. All time high for CH-46 in combat. Achievement made more impressive by lack of any operational aircraft accident while operating strenuous hours during inclement weather. Record provides sound evidence that operational effectiveness and flying safety are mutually supporting. My congratulations for inspiring squadron performance."

In April, HMM-262 moved from Ky Ha to Marble Mountain Air facility. Throughout the month, the squadron flew 1,425.7 hours, transported 6,602 troops and 737 tons of cargo in support of several operations, prompting General Westmoreland to send a message to all hands which read, "Your achievements mark you as the finest men our nation has ever sent into battle; you deserve the honor, respect, and the support of all the American people..." LtCol Shadrick simply said, "each of you passed through the "valley", and have proven yourselves to be the toughest "Mothah" there..." But it was at this time that the squadron began to be plagued by a shortage a pilots, a problem that would continue throughout the war.

By July 1967, Major David Althoff, a Marine who would come to be described as "the finest CH-46 pilot in the Marine Corps." arrived for his second tour in Vietnam, serving as Operations Officer with HMM-262. It was also during the month of July that the squadron began receiving missions titled "Khe Sanh Augmentation" and "Dong Ha Augmentation" as the war in Northern I Corps heated up.

It should be noted by the summer of 1967, the Marine Corps had ten squadrons of CH-46 helicopters. Of these, approximately half were being equipped with the new "D" model, while the rest were still flying the "A" model. Three of those squadrons were in Vietnam and one was on board the assault ships of the Special Landing Force operating in the South China Sea.

During that same year, there were several catastrophic incidents involving CH-46s. On 3 May, a CH-46D crashed at Santa Ana. Subsequent findings led to the grounding of all CH-46 helicopters. Ten days later all helicopters were released for flight by the Navy. That same day, a CH-46A crashed off the coast of Vietnam when the tail pylon broke off in flight. Over the course of the next few months, other crashes resulted in a comprehensive study of CH-46 problems by order of General Keith McCutcheon. Yet another crash on 3 July resulted in a "CH-46 Reliability Review Conference," scheduled to convene in August. On 31 August a CH-46A of HMM -262 "yawed at 3000 feet and lost the tail pylon." Major General Norman J Anderson, commanding the 1st Marine Aircraft Wing, ordered all CH-46s be "restricted to emergency combat requirements which could not be met by other aircraft."

Technicians from Vertol, Naval Systems Command and several other agencies converged on Vietnam in an effort to pinpoint the cause of the failures. They concluded, "although the specific causes of the CH-46 accidents were varied, the ultimate structural failures occurred in the area of the aft pylon." Several structural and system modifications were suggested. The entire modification program was to be performed by personal of the Boeing/Vertol Company, but Marines were required to assemble and disassemble the aircraft.

Ernesto Gomez, Receiving Navy Cross

In Vietnam, rather than undertaking such modifications on airfields under sporadic enemy attack, General McCutcheon established a plan under which all repairs take place at MCAF Futema, Okinawa. The Marines of HMM-262 were selected to move from the Special Landing Force to Futema to prepare all of the aircraft.

On the twelfth of October, a detachment from HMM-262, consisting of 9 aircraft, 19 officers and 25 enlisted Marines embarked aboard the USS Tripoli to provide emergency medium lift capabilities to the Special Landing Force. This detachment came to be known as "The Poor Devils." In late November, Major Althoff took command of the detachment, now equipped with modified aircraft.

The modification program was completed in December 1967. On 10 January, the Poor Devils detachment was dissolved and joined her parent unit at HMM-262's new location at Quang Tri Air Facility Once relocated to Quang Tri, the average helicopter pilot was flying 100 hours per week.

Command chronologies for the period covering the siege of Khe Sanh and surrounding hill outposts clearly show that HMM-262 flew almost constantly in support. An entry of 23 January, 1968 clearly states, "HMM-262 continued to put forth an all out effort to Support Operation Scotland and the besieged Khe Sanh." The command chronology for February further states, "The squadron's mission during Operation Scotland was to provide aircraft for resupply and medevac to the Marine outposts on Hills 881, 861, 861A, 558 and 950 as well as the Khe Sanh Airfield." It also notes that near the end of February a strike system was evolved to resupply the outpost near Khe Sanh. (This would be the advent of the SuperGaggle. While many have taken credit for the genesis of the SuperGaggle tactics, there is compelling evidence that it evolved during a conversation between Major David Althoff and two other officers of HMM-262.) The narrative summary of events in March, 1968, notes, "HMM-262 flew in support of Operation Scotland, Napoleon, Kentucky and Lancaster II, with the majority of operations being in support of Operation Scotland....Generally, three factors were involved in limiting total flight time. From approximately 1 March- 15 March, 1968 numerous hits in support of operation Scotland created a shortage of aircraft." There was also an issue with a shortage of Helicopter Aircraft Commanders. The April command chronology reads, "The squadron's mission, concerning Operations Scotland and Scotland II, was to provide aircraft as necessary, for resupply and medevac to the Marine outposts on Hills 881, 861, 861A, 558, 950, 689 and Khe Sanh Airfield.

All of that said, what made this gathering so extraordinary? The veterans, themselves. These are extraordinary men...I will say again, that their accomplishments, their sacrifices, their devotion to duty should be legendary in the annals of Marine Corps history, but that is not the case. One would expect such giants of the Corps to continually pat themselves on the back. They do not. They are an incredibly humble group of men, who believe that they were simply doing their job.

Dave Althoff
Quang Tri

Among them, are a number of crew chiefs who did a remarkable job of keeping their birds in the air despite an incredibly grueling flight schedule and severe damage due to enemy fire: Corporal Joseph "Jake" Jacobs, Corporal Kreig "Hip" Loftin, and Corporal Robert "Lead-Ass" Harrison, so named because he was shot down or crashed so often. Said Harrison, matter-of-factly,

"Shot down/crashed... several times....I crashed into 950 and rolled down the mountain once, I was shot down a few times, but got the plane out each time. I was shot down (up) the first 30 seconds of my first combat flight, with Althoff, at Finger Lakes."

Another exceptional Marine served as crew chief with HMM-262. Lance Corporal Ernesto "Gooie" Gomez, received a Navy Cross for his actions during a medevac on Hill 881S, a Marine outpost situated between Khe Sanh Combat Base and the Laotian border, manned by India and Mike Companies, 3d Battalion, 26th Marines:

On 25 January 1968, LtCol Melvin J. Steinberg, commanding officer of HMM-262, flying the medevac mission, told Gomez, "We're going to get bloodied on this one." Gomez later wrote, "The clouds were very low and it was very cold and it was drizzling...On the way there I listened on the radios for any information that would help me complete my mission. I was told that two Marines would load the wounded."

As the aircraft touched down, they began taking enemy fire. Said Gomez:

"There was a lot of action on the hill. Tracers coming in and going out....There were shells hitting the zone we were going to land in. The smell of powder hurt your lungs. Through the smoke I saw two men running towards my bird with the wounded Marine between them....He had bandages over his eyes. I could see the blood on the bandages.... He couldn't see. We were taking .50 cal fire. They started shooting RPGs and mortars. They were trying to get the bird, and they were using the wounded Marine."

Steinberg asked, "What's going on, Gomez?" He replied, "I have to disconnect, I have to go get him." Cpl. Gomez, without hesitation, ran out of the helicopter and rushed across the fire swept terrain to the side of the wounded Marine. Enemy fire followed him. He reached the wounded man and tackled him, shielding him with his body from the hostile fire. Lifting the wounded man to his shoulder, Gomez ran back towards the chopper. "The small arms fire was very, very accurate...it hit him in the leg and spun him around....I covered him and told him, 'We're almost there, I'm gonna get you to the bird." He motioned for the left gunner to help, and together they carried the blinded Marine to the helicopter.

Reconnecting to the intercom system, Col Steinberg said, "Something big has hit us, Gomez…I'm going to try to make it to Khe Sanh. We've gotta get out of here." It wasn't until the next day that Gomez discovered two zippers on his flight suit and part of the heel of his boot had been shot off.

Nominated for the Medal of Honor, Gomez learned in early 1969 that he had been awarded a Navy Cross. Part of the citation reads,

"Corporal Gomez's heroic actions were instrumental in saving his companion's life and inspired all who observed him. By his courage, selfless concern for the safety of his fellow Marine, and unswerving devotion to duty at great personal risk, he upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps."

Bad Scene, Early 1968

Gomez later wrote;

"I'd grown old in this country….It was getting worse around Quang Tri. Not only was there Khe Sanh, but there was Hill 881S, Carol and the Rockpile. You could die at any one of those place. Some of the extracts were so hard to perform, with wounded Marines and hard to land places….Being awakened and told 'you got another mission.' I thought I had just laid down two minutes ago. ….HMM-262 lost twenty crew members in the month of February alone. We had been serving the Khe Sanh area alone….One squadron couldn't possibly do the job. We were ragged and tired beyond words…."

And then there is LtCol David Althoff, an extraordinary Marine, and an extraordinary pilot:

Major Althoff arrived in Vietnam to join HMM-262 in June, 1967, and t wasn't long before he became known as "Balls to the Wall Althoff." First Lieutenant Michael Mullen, a young pilot assigned to HMM-262 once stated,

"He was the squadron's idol. We all thought the world of him as a man, an officer and a pilot…..He would never ask one of his junior pilots to fly a mission he had never flown. When we went on a 'hairy' mission went with the knowledge that it could be completed, because the Major had already done it several times before."

Corporal Vernon Crews, echoed the sentiment,

"I used to like to fly with the Major because he was so damned cool when the going got rough. I guess it used to rub off on the rest of his crew, too….We got into real scrapes with him, and at times he would return back to base with a chopper full of holes. But in 13 months he never lost a man on a mission. I doubt if you can find a better helicopter pilot in the Marine Corps."

Major Althoff was nominated for the Alfred A. Cunningham Award in 1968. Awarded to the outstanding Marine Corps aviator each year, the nomination package, prepared by LtCol Mel Steinberg, details Major Althoff's service with HMM-262. It includes the following resume of award recommendations:

"On 2 February 1968, Major Althoff launched as section leader of two CH-46s assigned a night emergency reconnaissance team extraction. The ceiling was 700 feet and gave only 300-400 feet clearance over the zone. The recon team was surrounded by an estimated 100 NVA and were pinned down by automatic weapons fire. After making radio and visual contact with the team, Major Althoff commenced an immediate approach. Fire was received during the approach in spite of the gunships and the 46's own suppressive fire, however, the approach was resolutely continued. Numerous hits were taken in the controls closet and cockpit as the aircraft landed, but Major Althoff calmly remained in the zone and directed suppressive fire for the gunships on several automatic weapons positions. Not until every member of the team was aboard did he lift from the zone. Immediately the aircraft took several hits causing one boost system to fail, the ramp hydraulic system was shot out, and one fuel quantity gauge fell to zero. Despite the heavy enemy fire and now IFR conditions, Major Althoff was able to return the aircraft to a friendly area and make an emergency landing."

"On 13 February 1968, Major Althoff was leading a flight of Ch-46s resupplying the hills around Khe Sanh. As his wingman took an external load onto Hill 881S, he came under heavy .50 caliber and small arms fire. The drop was completed in spite of this fire, but as the helicopter lifted a 122mm rocket exploded in the zone just behind the aircraft seriously wounding three Marines. As the pilot headed his aircraft towards Khe Sanh, a call for an emergency medevac came from Hill 881S. Major Althoff, having monitored the actions on the radio, and with full knowledge of the enemy .50 caliber and rocket positions, immediately volunteered to pick up the critically wounded men. Approaching the zone under the cover of fixed wing jets, UH-1E gunships, and his own .50 caliber machine guns, he came under intense fire. Resolutely, in spite of numerous hits, he continued into the zone. Still taking fire and more hits, he calmly waited until all the medevacs were loaded before lifting. More fire and battle damage was received while departing the hill, but Major Althoff managed to fly the crippled aircraft successfully to Khe Sanh to desperately needed medical aid."

"On 20 February 1968, Major Althoff launched in below minimum weather from Quang Tri to Khe Sanh to pick up emergency medevacs. Upon arrival the medevacs were not all ready. Given a secondary mission to resupply Hill 881S, Major Althoff proceeded directly to the hill to first pick up external cargo nets and slings. As he approached the zone he saw that no one had been alerted of his coming and waved off. One of the Helicopter Support Teams, however, had seen him approaching and was making his way to the hook-up point. At this time the hill exploded with incoming mortars and .50 caliber fire meant for the helicopter. The exposed Marine was severely wounded. The unit immediately called for an emergency medevac. No fixed wing or gunships were available, however, Major Althoff immediately started another approach to the hill. Upon landing, the Marines in the trenches started forward with the wounded man. Again, the zone came under heavy .50 caliber and mortar fire. The Marines took refuge in a shell crater, still Majotr Althoff remained on the ground. It took at least one minute to get the wounded man aboard. During this time, the aircraft received battle damage to the controls from the mortars and .50 caliber fire. Nevertheless, Major Althoff was able to lift off and get the critically wounded man to medical aid. The aircraft was declared unsafe for further flight due to the severe battle damage."

"On 21 February, 1968, Major Althoff led a flight of two CH-46s to Khe Sanh to resupply the outlying hills. The two aircraft delivered 88,000 pounds of desperately needed ammunition, water and rations. Hostile fire consisting of small arms, automatic weapons, .50 caliber and mortars were received on 15 different occasions during the day and both aircraft received numerous hits. In addition the LSA at Khe Sanh was under constant artillery, rocket, and mortar barrage, making the pickups extremely hazardous. Late in the afternoon, the weather at Khe Sanh deteriorated to the point that all the hills and even the LSA were completely socked in with a large clear area separating the two. The fog and low ceiling, however, did cause the enemy to quit shelling the hills and the LS, giving the hook-up crews a relative degree of safety. In view of this fact, Major Althoff elected to continue and led his flight for another hour and a half in these hazardous conditions. This was accomplished by air-taxiing from 1 ½ miles out of the LSA in to the pick up point, guiding along a dirt road at an altitude of five feet, picking up the load and departing IFR to the clear area. The drop zones were also obscured and the same air -taxiing procedure was used except this time it was up the side of a mountain. The hazards of vertigo and minimum ground clearance made the successful completion of this mission extremely noteworthy." (It should also be noted that the hills had not been resupplied in three days due to the inclement weather.)

"On 13 May 1968, Major Althoff launched as leader of a two plane section assigned the mission of extracting a four man reconnaissance team. The team had walked into the area the previous night to attempt to recover the body of a Marine killed in an earlier action. As the team searched for the body, they were ambushed and one member was killed and two others seriously wounded. It was determined that additional men would be need to be inserted in order to aid the wounded to a pick-up zone. Major Althoff picked up a quick reaction force and inserted them within 100 meters of where the team was pinned down by mortar and automatic weapons fire. As the reaction force moved toward the recon team, they sustained two wounded, but managed to get the recon wounded. At this time, due to intense mortar and automatic weapons fire, the team became separated into three groups and each headed for a potential landing zone. All of the zones were within 200 meters of known active enemy positions. Major Althoff unhesitatingly landed in the first zone, and while awaiting the team to board received shrapnel from mortars through the cockpit. He steadfastly remained in the zone, however, until all members of this group were loaded. Only then did he lift and proceed to the next zone. Again, the aircraft came under mortar fire, again he waited. The third zone was no zone at all, but a bomb crater on the side of a steep slope. The steepness of the slope precluded entry through the rear ramp, so Major Althoff maneuvered to a position sideways just over the crater and hovered with the crew dropped the side door and pulled the Marines on board. While in this precarious hovering position with only inches of rotor clearance from the side of the hill, the aircraft came under automatic weapons fire and again sustained battle damage. Major Althoff, however, resolutely remained in the zone until the last man was aboard, the departed taking all members to safety." (One of those recon Marines, Corporal James D. King, later stated, "For Major Althoff to turn and one more time fly straight into what he knew was an extremely life-threatening situation for himself, his crew, and the other Marines on board was far beyond what any Marine would view as duty. If not for his devotion to God and country and extreme bravery, myself and others certainly would have been in God's hands.")

"On 18 May, 1968, Major Althoff was diverted from resupply work at Khe Sanh to an emergency reconnaissance team extraction. The team was located on a steep ridgeline bordered on one side by trees, and covered with 8-11 feet high elephant grass. Mortars were seen impacting in the team's position and by the time Major Althoff arrived, seven of the eight men had been seriously wounded. Neither the team nor the UH-1E gunships or the 01-C Spotter overhead could spot the source of the mortars. Due to the gravity of the situation, however, Major Althoff decided to attempt an immediate extraction. During the approach two mortars landed within ten meters of the team's position, but the approach was resolutely continued. The ridge line could only accommodate two wheels so Major Althoff backed in with only his main mounts touching and the nose of the aircraft hanging over a 200-300 ft. drop to jagged rocks below. Several of the recon team were unable to help themselves to the aircraft, so the two side gunners left the aircraft and began carrying them on board. The loading was extremely slow, and mortars continued to land within 10-30 meters of the aircraft, Major Althoff resolutely remained in the zone maintaining his precarious position for eight minutes. Automatic weapons fire was received during this time but was quickly silenced by the crew chief using the starboard .50 caliber machine gun. Not until every member was aboard did Major Althoff lift from the zone and depart."

"On 3 June, 1968, Major Althoff launched as section leader of two CH-46s with a mission to resupply Khe Sanh. They were diverted to an emergency medevac mission. The unit was located atop a 1500 ft mountain with the top 1000 ft in a cloud. The unit reported taking incoming mortar fire all morning. Major Althoff then asked the unit's radioman if he could hear the sound of his rotors. He reported that he could. With this Major Althoff disappeared into the cloud as he air-taxied up the side of the mountain (once again one of the most dangerous maneuvers in helicopter aviation) Between this aviator and the ground radio operator, neither of whom could see the other, the zone was reached and the wounded loaded on board. He was further informed that further down the mountain were five more critically wounded men, but that the steepness of the slope would not allow them to be carried to where the helicopter sat. Once again, relying solely on the directions of the radioman, Major Althoff airtaxied, in completely IFR conditions, down the mountain to a point where the wounded Marines could reach the helicopter. The five men were picked up and all were expeditiously taken to medical aid."

During his time with HMM-262, Major Althoff earned three Silver Stars, three Distinguished Flying Crosses and more than 50 Air Medals. (There are any number of Marines who flew with Althoff, or who were rescued by Althoff, that feel those Silver Stars should have been Navy Crosses or Medals of Honor.) Additionally, he was awarded the Cunningham Award and it should be noted that both the nomination package and the award citation clearly credits Major Althoff with the development of the Super Gaggle, despite the fact that many others have claimed to be responsible for it's implementation in resupplying the hill outposts:

"During his squadron's commitment to the support and resupply of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, Major Althoff conceived, developed and coordinated unique tactical concepts to insure mission accomplishment. His development of fixed-wing tactical jet, helicopter gunship, and helicopter transport time sequences and delivery techniques coupled with flawless coordination of the committed air elements before and during each resupply mission made a signal contribution to the survival of this outpost."

It should also be noted, that is was Major Althoff who flew United Press International photographer David Powell onto 881S. Powell's photographs of life on the hill are some of the most notable of the Vietnam War, and captured the grim realities of life under siege. Said Powell, "The best thing I have ever done was photograph the Marines who held the outpost on Hill 881S. I would not have been able to do that without Major Althoff and the Marines of HMM-262."
UPI photographer David Powell

And so I can only ask, why is it, that this squadron's history is not better known? Why is it that David Althoff remains largely unknown except to those very well-versed in Marine Corps history? The Marines who served with HMM-262 represent the VERY BEST of Marine Corps aviation, and this squadron deserves to have their history shouted from the rooftops. Perhaps LtCol Althoff said it best,

"When I first checked into HMM 262 in June of 67 I knew that I was joining a Squadron that had a great combat reputation. After I was there a short while I discovered the reason for that well deserved reputation. I soon had total confidence in all members of the team that made up this top-notch combat outfit. From top to bottom, or rather from one end to the other, I developed a very deep respect for each and every one of you. I knew I could depend on the quality of the maintenance, the skills of the HACS and the Co-Pilots, the expertise of the crew chiefs and gunners and the support that was provided by everyone else on the "Team" (the bravest and most dependable men I have ever met).

What I saw was complete and total dedication and commitment to the mission that we were assigned. I especially enjoyed the closeness and camaraderie that we shared as we flew, worked, laughed and partied together. We also cried together over those Marines we brought back in body bags or shot to pieces, and our roommates and friends who gave their all in that strange land so far away.

I had the privilege of serving with you on the SLF aboard the Tripoli and the Valley Forge. The "POOR DEVILS". We then went ashore at Quang Tri in December of 67 and supported the troops all along the DMZ from the mouth of the CuaViet river on the coast to Dong Ha, Con Thien, Gio Lin, Camp Carroll LZ Stud, the Rock Pile, Razorback Ridge, Khe Sanh, Lang Vei, all of the hills around Khe Sanh, Hue, Phu Bai, and a whole lot of other "bad assed" spots, too numerous to mention. I left the squadron in July of 68 with tears in my eyes, knowing what those of you that were staying behind would be facing in the months to come.

I will never ever look at a young American in his late teens or very early twenties, and have any doubts about what he can and will do if he is called upon to fight for his country. I saw so many of you risk everything and willingly go far above and beyond the call of duty to rescue your fellow Marines from the most desperate situations; never hesitating to go back and do it again, day after day, night after night.

The Squadron was aptly named the FLYING TIGERS and each of us will carry the mark of the TIGER to our graves because it was so indelibly inscribed on our bodies, our hearts and on our minds. I'm proud to be numbered among the finest group of fighting Marines in the history of the Corps, HMM-262."

Well said, Col Althoff, and to all of the veterans of HMM-262, my thanks for allowing me the honor and privilege of spending time with you, and "walking with Giants." Your accomplishments, your devotion to the mission at hand, your sacrifices, were nothing less than extraordinary.

YES THERE WAS ARTILLERY AT KHE SANH

By Brian P. Heslin
G BTRY 3/12

Dear Tom, I do not remember where or when I heard or read the statement "If you were not 0311 you were just support." The author or speaker of that statement could not have really served at Khe Sanh, if they truly believed that. Our unit, G Btry 2/12 had convoyed via route 9 to the KSCB., in late March or early April, 1968.

I do remember that my friend and bunker-mate, Leslie G. Aputen was killed during a mortar attack on 15 May 1968. That was shortly after we arrived, so I guess we were not Siege Marines. We took a great deal of incoming, whether or not that qualified our unit as "Siege Marines".

Our Arty unit saw a lot of action in support of 0311 Marines. I recall one direct fire mission supporting a special forces unit that was being over run about a mile northwest of our position on the base. They requested artillery help with the NVA already in their wire. We informed them that some of their own troops could be hurt, and they still requested the mission, due to the critical situation they were in.

We killed a lot of NVA and stopped the attack, without hurting a single one of the special forces soldiers. The special forces unit C/O gave our C/O an M-14 with an engraved plate, thanking us for our support.

Nothing was ever said about our grubby artillery men's outstanding life-saving mission, so I guess we were just "support". Tom I guess we can't all be heroes so if you ever see the "Rambo" that made the statement regarding 0311's, give him my best.

KSV VETERANS IN THE NEWS

By Craig Tourte

It started innocently enough with a short email from Tom Eichler copying an email to me he had received from a Military Channel documentary producer. Since the producer was in Southern California and Tom lived in Chicago, Tom requested that I assist the producer in any way that I was able. See email:

Hello Mr. Eichler, I hope this finds you well. My name is Greg DeHart. I am producing a series of three documentaries for The Military Channel titled, Battle Gear. The episodes are Bombers, Armor, and Remote Operated Vehicles. Basically, the series tracks the evolution of each technology. In the bomber show, one of the bombers I am highlighting is the B-52. Specifically, I am covering their involvement at the Battle of Khe Sahn (sic). My hope is to get the perspective of those on the ground during the time of B-52 bombing runs. Respectfully, my hope is that you, or someone you recommend, would agree to do an on-camera interview about their experience with the B-52s. Ideally, that person would be on the west coast. But I am happy to go where ever you see fit. Is this something you might help with?

Thank you for your time. I look forward to your response.
All the Best

After a brief conversation with Mr. DeHart, I made several attempts to find someone who lived in Southern California as Mr. DeHart related that he would be doing some filming at the Marine Corps Base of Camp Pendleton. I tried to interest someone who had expertise as it related to this subject and in-front camera talent and experience, but they all were unavailable. Mr. DeHart told me that he was behind in production, so the last person I recommended was my good friend and close neighbor - of seven miles - Steve Wiese (B/1/26). Steve has done this sort of things on more than one occasion including a local Northern California filing on a Vietnam related subject; his latest experience was the documentary film Bravo, Common Men, Uncommon Valor.

Steve is gregarious and articulate; I on the other hand, am just a bit reserved. I told Mr. Dehart that Steve would do a wonderful job in his oral recall of his experience with B-52 bombing runs around the Khe Sanh Base but that neither of us had anything to do with the planning, directing or guidance of the aircraft. Reminding Mr. Dehart that we were both rather lowly enlisted personnel. Mr. DeHart told me our experience of the bombings was just what he was looking for. I spent a few minutes with Steve discussing the subject and he agreed to participate, not knowing I had already volunteered his participation.

Mr. DeHart arrived at my house along with cameraman Lon Magdich, and set up their equipment. I was a bit surprised when Mr. Dehart said that he wanted to interview me in addition to Steve for the documentary. I explained to Mr. DeHart that my experience on the subject was limited and that because of the incoming during the Siege, my world was small and limited to just what was occurring around me and that I was really not that aware of what was occurring elsewhere on or near the base. Mr. DeHart told me that was what he wanted to hear and the next thing I knew I was sitting on a chair with makeup on my face, a little microphone attached to my shirt and a camera in front of me. The filming was much like having a conversation with a friend, with Mr. DeHart just out of camera view while I answered a few questions.

I hummed and hawed, repeated myself and basically did a terrible job of explaining that my recall of B52 operations around the base was primarily at night when I could hear the bombs falling from the aircraft, the bombs hitting the ground and off in the distance the sound of the high flying planes leaving the area. I'm afraid I made quite a mess of the whole interview but of course Mr. Dehart told me that I did just fine and my recall was what he was looking for.

After Mr. Dehart finished with me they situated the camera on Steve as he sat on a chair. I found it pretty darn funny when they placed a bib around his shoulders while makeup was applied. I thought Steve looked much better with the makeup and suggested that he might consider using it more often ; Steve did a wonderful job during his interview, recalling his many experiences and observations.

I found the whole filming experience both entertaining and educational, but I fear most of my interview will find itself on the cutting room floor, as it should be. I would frame my performance as inadequate and disappointing. I was grateful Steve agreed to participate in this and I did not try to go it alone. Steve's performance on the other hand was Academy Award material. Mr. DeHart told me that he expected the series to be shown on the Military Channel sometime in December.

SUMMER CAMP 1968
Mike Bradbury's Response to a War Critic

Having just posted off from an aggravating blog, the timing is perfect for this one. This was already scheduled to be my next piece anyway, so with that in mind, it's only fitting to "re-title" it, and dedicate it to the JUNKYARD DOG, a contributor who has taken delight in taking "Post-Shots" at the military, retirement benefits, etc. But the snide remark about that "summer camp" I attended in 68, well, you know the old saying, a picture is worth a thousand words, and sometimes you do have to "draw pictures" for some of these liberals, and "ARMCHAIR RAMBO's" .so I certainly wouldn't want to disappoint anybody!!

My Vietnam tour began in September of 1967 with "K" Company, 3/26, here at Camp Evans (not too far from Da Nang). As my 3 room air-conditioned apartment wasn't wired & plumbed yet, I am seen here filling sandbags for a bunker.....at the right are my two other room mates, Randy Mapel and Doug Weber.

While I was over there, the bulk of our air support came from the Marine Air Wing in Da Nang, with their F4-B's.The Marines had airplanes too

There were Skyraiders and Huey Cobra's as well (we didn't have "stealth & drones" back then)

As we had no shower facilities, sometimes we'd get to smelling pretty bad, so we'd get "evicted" from one "campground" to the other, as pictured here, from Hill 55 to Quang Tri

Navy Corpsman Jim "Doc" Thomas. To this day, we're best of friends. "Doc" loved to "camp out" too, so we turned down a barracks in Saigon with "houseboy & maid service", to dig our own apartment here at Dong Ha. (We knew if we did a good enough job, the Colonel might give us our merit badges.)

Women & kids a mile or so on the outskirts of Hue City. I took this shot just before we SLAUGHTERED them all! (We were well-known for "baby-killing" and "village-burning", as any professor from Berkeley can attest to-----those guys know EVERYTHING!)

" Hey, did you guys hear we're going to Khe Sanh for Christmas?"
NEAT!!.....do they have hot chow and internet service there?

At Khe Sanh, when Isaac Walker & I found out we were gonna have to HIKE up to Hill 861 with all of our gear, we decided to write the ACLU to PROTEST this kind of treatment by LBJ!

Doc", in the trenchline of our new home on 861.....and our 3rd Platoon M-60 machinegun team, Padgett, Moore & Robinson. "Hey guys, wanna send out for pizza tonight?...and a case of brew?

At this point, I'd Like to thank Kodak for building such a solid product. I'd bought this 124 at Camp Pendleton, carried it in my pack, all over 'Nam, and it still works TODAY.....if there were still the old 126 cartridges for it!

We weren't at 861 long, when the NVA's neighborhood "welcome wagon" started inviting us to picnics and BBQ's You should have been there with us, JYD.....beats any high school or college "tailgate party" you've ever attended!

But the smell of burning cordite was so offensive, the Air Force flew C-123's through our valley to give the place a sweet "orange" scent.

As you can see right here from our trenchline, they dropped that crap right in our laps. At right is my Geneva Convention Card. (because I'd enlisted, I never HAD a DRAFT CARD TO BURN!)

Left: expressing my feelings about those "First Aid Kits to the NVA from Berkeley, and the rest of the yellow-bellies back home. And the last shot is Doug Weber & I in Okinawa in November of '68.....13 months later & heading home to the "tickertape parades", free dinners, and minted commemorative coins!" You REALLY MISSED OUT, JYD.....but it's good that the youth of America has all of you well-read professors to keep us all straight about "what really happened at SUMMER CAMP."

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student or who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization. Your contributions are tax deductible.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 6/1/2012 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid- up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA in Vietnam and if family members are associate members of KSV, Inc. Children of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and financial need. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

THE AWARDS

The award will be $300.00 minimum per school year for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each year applied.

2.

The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to:

Mr. Dan Fisher
Chairman, KSVSF Committee
6050 52nd St. No.
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

1.The money is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the candidate's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant.

3. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

4. The Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon proof of registration sent to the Review Committee Chairman when it becomes available.

5. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of July of the current school year.

6. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before June 1 of the current school year to be attended.

7. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

Criteria: Point Selection System /Maximum of 100 points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points (attach last school GPA transcript)

- GPA 4.0 = 40 points
- GPA 3.5 = 35 points
- GPA 3.0 = 30 points
- GPA 2.5 = 25 points

b. Extracurricular activities. Max = 35 points total

IN HONOR AND MEMORY OF
Colonel WILLIAM H. DABNEY
United States Marine Corps
Commanding Officer Hill 881S
KHE SANH VIETNAM 1968

The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to:
William H. Dabney (0-80399), Colonel [then Captain], U.S. Marine Corps, for extraordinary heroism while serving as Commanding Officer of two heavily reinforced rifle companies of the Third Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, THIRD Marine Division (Reinforced), Fleet Marine Force, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam from 21 January to 14 April 1968. During the entire period, Colonel Dabney's force stubbornly defended Hill 881S, a regional outpost vital to the defense of the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

Following his bold spoiling attack on 20 January 1968, shattering a much larger North Vietnamese Army (NVA) force deploying to attack Hill 881S, Colonel Dabney's force was surrounded and cut off from all outside ground supply for the entire 77 day Siege of Khe Sanh. Enemy snipers, machine guns, artillery, and 120-millimeter mortars responded to any daylight movement on his position. In spite of deep entrenchments, his total casualties during the siege were close to 100 percent. Helicopters were his only source of re-supply, and each such mission brought down a cauldron of fire on his landing zones. On numerous occasions Colonel Dabney raced into the landing zone under heavy hostile fire to direct debarkation of personnel and to carry wounded Marines to evacuation helicopters.

The extreme difficulty of re-supply resulted in conditions of hardship and deprivation seldom experienced by American forces. Nevertheless, Colonel Dabney's indomitable spirit was truly an inspiration to his troops. He organized his defenses with masterful skill and his preplanned fires shattered every enemy probe on his positions. He also devised an early warning system whereby NVA artillery and rocket firings from the west were immediately reported by lookouts to the Khe Sanh Combat Base, giving exposed personnel a few life saving seconds to take cover, saving countless lives, and facilitating the targeting of enemy firing positions.

Colonel Dabney repeatedly set an incredible example of calm courage under fire, gallantly exposing himself at the center of every action without concern for his own safety. Colonel Dabney contributed decisively to ultimate victory in the Battle of Khe Sanh, and ranks among the most heroic stands of any American force in history. By his valiant combat leadership, exceptional bravery, and selfless devotion to duty, Colonel Dabney reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS
GROUP HOPING TO ADD NEW MEMBERS
MARINE CORPS LEAGUE'S KENNEBEC VALLEY DETACHMENT 599

By Keith Edwards Staff Writer

Submitted By Ralph Sargent C & W BTRY 1/13

AUGUSTA -- They wear the uniform proudly, these old Marines.

MEMBERS WANTED

Anyone interested in joining the Marine Corps League's Kennebec Valley Detachment 599 may just show up to one of its meetings, which are held the first Wednesday of the month at 6:30 p.m. at Kennebec Valley Federal Credit Union in Augusta. Call Sargent at 622-0316, or email johnpoulin@msn.com.But they'd like others to wear it with them, even those who may have never worn a uniform before.

The Marine Corps League's Kennebec Valley Detachment 599 is 65 members strong, part of a statewide organization of about 500, but it wants to get stronger so they can do more in the community and for their fellow Marines and their families.

The nonprofit fraternal group is made up mostly of retired Marines, but is also open to active duty Marines and even, through an associate membership program, to those who have never been a Marine or even served in the armed services.

The detachment is hosting a statewide meeting of the Marine Corps League on Sunday at the Augusta Elks Lodge at 397 Civic Center Drive. People interested in joining may come check it out to get a feel for the group, according to John E. Poulin, 65, of Augusta, commandant of the detachment. Poulin is a Vietnam veteran who served in the Marines from 1963 to 1967, and in the Army Reserves for 11 years, including time as a drill sergeant.

"We'd like to grow; we know there are a lot of Marines and (Navy) Corpsman in this area, but they don't know we exist," said Ralph F. Sargent, 77, of Augusta, junior vice commandant of the detachment. He served in the Marines from 1952 to 1976, including the siege of Khe Sanh, Vietnam, and retired as a sergeant major. "We're not in parades. At our age, we're not marchers anymore. We're trying to build this unit up, and have larger participation, so we can do more for the community."

Their community involvements are many, including fundraising and participation in Toys for Tots; the Harold Alfond Center for Cancer Care; Good Shepherd Food Bank; Young Marines; Wounded Warriors; a homeless veterans project; and a program donating free, hand-carved canes to veterans.

"We're active; we're not just sitting on our laurels," said Donald T. Brawn, 82, of Augusta, senior vice commandant of the local detachment, an active Marine from 1950 to 1952, including service in the Korean War.

Sunday's events begin at 10 a.m. with training to certify people to serve in honor guards, including the proper care and handling of the flag at funerals. The training will be followed by "pack growl," of the Military Order of the Devil Dogs, which is closed to the public and which members declined to discuss. There will also be a lunch courtesy of the Elks, followed by their regular business meeting from 1 to 2 p.m.

The Marine Corps are the smallest of the armed services and its post-active duty organization tends to have a harder time attracting as many members as, say, the American Legion, said Bill Schutz, 70, of Windsor. Schutz is sergeant at arms for the detachment and a Navy Corpsman from 1960 to 1966 who served with the Marines for the last two years of his service.

What the group offers, in addition to the chance to help others through donations and other activities, is camaraderie, group members said.

"There's that connection you share, because you had the same experience," Poulin said. "Once a Marine, always a Marine. Not a day goes by I don't think, 'What are we doing for vets? Are we doing enough? And how can we raise more and do more?' We need members, younger members. We want to grow and do more."

Through their associate member program, they also welcome men and women who didn't serve in the Marines, but who share their ideals. Associate members can't hold elected office with the group and face some other limitations, but they may participate in many of the group's activities.

"We welcome them," Poulin said. "We're not a paramilitary organization, though we do wear the uniform proudly."

1ST SGT ROY D. LOGAN USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
B CO 1/26
by Mac - Milton McNeely

With heavy heart I must share the sad news that Bravo Company First Sergeant Roy D. Logan Sr., passed January 18, 2012.

Top Logan served with B/1/26 before, during and for a short time after the Khe Sanh siege in Vietnam.

His tour of duty in the Corps includes service during WWII after which he was discharged but called again to serve during the Korean conflict. Choosing to make a career of it at that point later brought him to Vietnam in 1967. He retired from the Marine Corps shortly after leaving Vietnam and returned to his home and family in Pennsylvania.

Ms. Patricia Cummings, Top's daughter, wrote to inform us of his passing and said, ' We had a military funeral with an honor guard from the American Legion & a contingent of Marines as casket guards. He was buried in his dress blues because as you know "Once a Marine always a Marine!"

I have several fond memories of Top, but the thing that stands out the most right now is how much he cared for the men serving with him. One of the first things he talked about after regaining contact a few years ago, was the losses of February 25, 1968, the delay of retrieval of those lost, and the condition of his Marines when they were finally repatriated.

Next is the calming influence he had on those around him even during some of the most stress filled life-threatening times during the Siege. Having served with three different First Sergeants in Vietnam, I can sincerely say that Top Logan was the one that I admire and respect most. The best of the best at a time when it was most needed.

A memorial service was held for Roy David Logan Sr. on January 21, 2012, at Cutright Funeral Homes Juniata Valley Chapel, Alexandria, Pennsylvania. February 17, 1921 - January 18, 2012. The memorial pamphlet pictured the American Flag on the front with the Marine Corps Hymn on the overleaf.

Semper Fidelis First Sergeant Logan -- You are missed.

WATSON T. MOSEBAY JR. F CO 2/3 USMC KHE SANH VETERAN November 28, 1941—January 17, 2012

Watson T. Mosebay,Jr., also known as "Sonny," died in hospital of cardiac arrest, Jan. 17,2012. He was 70 years old.

He is survived by a loving sister, Helen Mosebay Shepperson; his maternal aunt, Madelyn Carter, and uncle, Albert Carter, Sf. Also included are many cousins, allover the USA, and other countries, and many, many friends.

Watson was born in Washington, PA in Nov., 1941. That was a happy day for the Mosebay family. Watson graduated from Washington High School, in Washington, Pa., and received his BS in Political Science from Washington and Jefferson College, Washington, PA in 1965. Right out of college, he was drafted into the Army. He didn't like that so he decided to be, "the few; the proud" and joined the Marine Corp.

After boot camp, at Camp Lejeune, SC, where he turned 25, he was sent to Viet Nam, where he served 13 months, 3 days. When "Sonny" returned from Viet Nam, and finally became a civilian, again, he joined the Xerox Corporation where he became one of its top sales reps. Later he would join Ayrest Pharmaceuticals, where, again, he excelled. When Sonny's mother became ill, he returned to New Jersey, and has remained in South Jersey ever since.

Watson's great love was the Marine Corp, and he was a member of many military organizations, and always encouraged vets, and their wives, to do all they could do to advance the cause of veterans, and especially the ones who had/have seen combat. He was a life member of the VFW, the MOC, the American Legion, Khe Sanh Veterans, and quite a few others; and he always participated in any way he could. He used to say, "Once a Marine, always a Marine. And that requires all you can give of your time and money."

Watson Mosebay, liked people, and people liked him. He was a wonderful son, brother, and friend. He was also a great patriot.

BRIGIDAIRE GENERAL JACOB E. GLICK USMC CG T/F GLICK 3RD MARINE DIVISION KHE SANH VETERAN February 12, 1920-August 24, 2011

Brigadier General Jacob Ezra Glick retired from active duty, July 1, 1971. As Deputy Director for Command/Areas and Deputy Director for Operations (Regional Operations), Organization of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, from September 1968 - June 1971, he earned the Distinguished Service Medal. In this critical position, he directed the Pacific Division in developing policy and operational recommendations, reviewed all plans pertaining to the Pacific Command, and other matters requiring action by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Born on February 12, 1920, in Burlington, Iowa, he graduated from Mount Carmel High School (Illinois) in 1937 and from the U. S. Naval Academy in 1941 with a B.S. degree in Electrical Engineering. On graduation from the Naval Academy in December 1941, he was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps.

During World War II, Lieutenant Glick saw duty in the South Pacific with the 12th Defense Battalion, FMF, as a Company Commander and Radar officer until 1944. He received a Letter of Commendation with Commendation Ribbon from the Commanding General, FMF, Pacific, for meritorious conduct during the seizure and occupation of Woodlark Island, British New Guinea, the assault and occupation of Cape Gloucester, New Britain, and the assault and occupation of Peleliu Island in the Palau group.

Returning to the United States in December 1944, he reported to Headquarters Marine Corps, Washington, DC, where he became Radar Officer, G-4 Division, until June 1946. From there, Captain Glick returned to the U. S. Naval Academy at Annapolis and received his M.S. degree in Electrical Engineering in May 1949. After attaining his Master's Degree, be became Officer in Charge, Marine Corps and Ground Electronics' Design Branch, Bureau of Ships, Washington, DC, and served in this capacity until February 1952. He was promoted to Major in 1947, and to Lieutenant Colonel in July 1951.

During the Korean conflict, Lieutenant Colonel Glick service as the Signal Battalion Commander and Assistant Division Communications Electronics Officer with the First Marine Division, FMF, from April 1952 until February 1953. For service in Korea, he was awarded the Legion of Merit with Combat "V", and the Bronze Star Medal with Combat "V".

Upon his return to the United States, he became Atomic Warfare and Guided Missiles Officer, Tactics, Techniques and Training Group, Joint Landing Force Board, and later S-3 Officer, Service Battalion, Marine Corps Base, Camp Lejeune, NC.

From September 1955 until June 1956, he attended the Command and Staff College, Senior Course, Marine Corps Schools, Quantico, Virginia. He then saw a three-year tour as Chief, Atomic, Biological and Chemical Instruction Group, Supporting Arms Section, Marine Corps Educational Center, Quantico.

Then Lieutenant Colonel Glick was detached in June 1959, he reported to the 1st Marine Brigade, FMF, for duty as Communications Electronics Officer, and later, Commanding Officer of Service Battalion. While serving in the latter capacity, he was promoted to Colonel in May 1961. He next served as Assistant G-3 (Plans Officer), FMF, Pacific, from July 1961 until June 1962.

Returning to the continental United States, Colonel Glick was ordered to Headquarters Marine Corps, Washington, DC, to serve for two years as Assistant to the Deputy Chief of Staff (Research and Development). In July 1965, he completed the National War College, Washington, DC. He received his M.S. Degree in Business Administration from George Washington University in 1965.

Colonel Glick was assigned duty as Assistant Joint Plans Officer, Staff, Headquarters Commander-in-Chief, U. S. Atlantic Fleet, Norfolk, Virginia. For exceptionally meritorious service during the period July 19, 1965 to April 17, 1967, he was awarded a Gold Star in lieu of a second Legion of Merit.

After his promotion to Brigadier General on May 1, 1967, he became Commanding General, 9th Marine Amphibious Brigade/Commanding General, FMF, 7th Fleet, and served in this capacity until January 1968. He was awarded a Gold Star in lieu of a third Legion of Merit for exceptionally meritorious service during this assignment. His next duty was Assistant Division Commander, 3d Marine Division, Fleet Marine Force, Pacific. For service in support of the Republic of Vietnam, General Glick was awarded the Vietnamese National Order Medal 5th Class and the Vietnamese Gallantry Cross with Palm by the President of South Vietnam.

A complete list of General Glick's medals and decorations include: the Distinguished Service Medal; the Legion of Merit with Combat "V" and two Gold Stars in lieu of a second and third award; the Bronze Star Medal with Combat "V"; the Navy Commendation Medal with Combat "V"; the Presidential Unit Citation; the Navy Unit Commendation Ribbon; the Navy and Marine Corps Meritorious Unit Citation; the American Defense Service Medal with A; the American Campaign Medal; the Asiatic-Pacific Campaign Medal with three bronze stars; the World War II Victory Medal; the National Defense Service Medal with one bronze star; the Korean Service Medal with three bronze stars; the Vietnam Service Medal with four bronze stars; the Vietnamese National Order Medal 5th Class; the Vietnamese Gallantry Cross with Palm; the United Nations Service Medal; the Korean Presidential Unit Citation; and the Republic of Vietnam Campaign Medal.

Funeral services were held on Tuesday, December 13, 2011 at Ft. Myer's Old Post Chapel interment followed at Arlington National Cemetery with full military honors.

Colonel Bertram Arthur Maas USMC (Ret.) passed away on Saturday, May 28, 2011 of lung cancer. Bert was born on June 14, 1931 to Lt. Col. Arthur B. Maas and wife Charlotte in Omaha, Nebraska. Raised in St. Paul, Minnesota, he graduated from St. Thomas Military Academy and attended the United States Naval Academy graduating in 1953 and becoming a 2nd Lt. in the U.S. Marine Corp. Two years after meeting on a train coming from Chicago, he married Charlotte Ann Hiser of Bethesda, Maryland on June 9, 1953. They became the parents of six sons, John (Wendy), Michael, Curtiss (D.), Charles, Stephen, and Brad.

Bert was also the proud grandpops of John Henry, Jennifer, Bryan, Jessica, and Nicholas Maas. He also leaves behind his beloved sister Jean Schiefelbein of Eden Prairie, MN and many nieces and nephews. Following flight training at Pensacola, FL, and Corpus Christi, TX, Bert became a fighter pilot. He attended the US Naval Post graduate School Monterey, CA and the Industrial College of the Armed Forces. He later transitioned into helicopters and one of his career highlights was a tour in HMX-1, flying Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy. He commanded gunships squadron VMO-6 in Vietnam for which he received the bronze and silver stars.

Bert's final three years on active duty in the Marine Corp. was as the CO of Marine Aircraft Group 49 at Willow Grove, PA flying A4's and CH53s. After retirement Bert enrolled in George Mason School of Law and was admitted to the bar in 1986. He enjoyed boating and spending time at his beach cottage in Emerald Isle, NC, with his family. He and wife Charlotte were married for 57 years and were residents of Vienna, VA for over forty years.

WELCOME HOME

VIETNAM VETERAN'S DOG TAG ENDS UP IN NEW JERSEY BACK FROM VIETNAM TOM QUIGLEY B CO 1/26

Tom Quigley has a piece of his past back.

The former U.S. Marine and Vietnam veteran lost his dog tag 43 years ago, most likely when he was wounded on March 30, 1968, at Khe Sanh.

On Thursday, a member of an East Coast motorcycle club devoted to returning dog tags lost by servicemen in Vietnam gave Quigley's back to him. The two met at Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 755 on Old Jacksonville Road.

"When you first look at it, you have that momentary flash in your mind," said Quigley, who first learned his dog tag had been found when a stranger contacted him earlier this year.

Then Sue Quinn-Morris, president of the ladies auxiliary of American Legion Post 372 Cherry Hill, N.J., sent him a photograph of the tag, and it was an exact match to the duplicate Quigley has in his basement.

"People are always reluctant at first," said Bob Hamilton, a member of the Nam Knights Motorcycle Club "They're leery of what's going on."

Nam Knights' members are former members of the military or law enforcement. The club has about 40 chapters along the East Coast and one in Milwaukee, Hamilton said.

Hamilton made the trip to Springfield to deliver Quigley's dog tag. He then was to go to Battle Creek, Mich., to return another tag to the mother of a Marine killed in Vietnam.

Quinn-Morris, who Hamilton said is in charge of the Nam Knights' website, is dedicated to returning dog tags to Vietnam veterans. She has spent two years trying to locate owners of dog tags found in Vietnam more than a decade ago by retired policeman Manny Santayana.

On a trip to Vietnam, Santayana saw G.I. dog tags hanging in a stall in a marketplace, Hamilton said. "It upset him, and he ended up buying all the guy had — an ammo box full," Hamilton said.

He contacted the Pentagon and found the owner of one of the tags, but the Pentagon wouldn't let him participate in the return of the small piece of metal. So Santayana decided to do the research and return the tags himself. Eventually, the torch was passed to Quinn-Morris.

She found Quigley because of a 2010 story in The State Journal-Register about the former Marine's memories of Khe Sanh.

Hamilton said his club has returned about half-a-dozen dog tags.

"Because I am a Vietnam veteran, it can get very emotional," he said. "I run into more people who served at the same time and in the same area that I did."

"The feeling is indescribable," he said. "It's like giving them a piece of their past."

Hamilton said he and his fellow club members perform the service "because it was something that was never done for us."

"We will not let any member of the military today or in the future be treated like we were," he said. "It's our way of welcoming a Vietnam veteran back. Many were traumatized not only by the war but by how they were treated back home."

Quigley said there's a good chance his dog tag lay in a trench line until scavengers found it after the Khe Sanh base was abandoned and bulldozed.

He plans to put the dog tag in a case, then in his safety deposit box until it is passed on to his children, then hopefully to their children.

"You can't be appreciative enough, thankful enough for what they do," he said of the people responsible for his dog tag's return. "They know how much we appreciate it. It was even more meaningful that it was a fellow Marine bringing it back to me."

KSV MINI REUNION

THE 44TH KHE SANH ANNIVERSARY REMEMBERANCE LUNCHEON CHICO CA JAN 21, 2012

By Craig W. Tourte

We had another fine gathering of Khe Sanh Veterans, fellow Veterans, friends, neighbors and supporters from the community in Chico California on January 21, 2012, to remember and honor those who endured the Battles at Khe Sanh, the Siege, the Vietnam War and all those who have given their all for our wonderful country and continue to fight this day for the freedom of all Americans. Tom Horchler is the driving force behind the many events focused on the Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. Once again Tom was the inspiration and one of the main reasons for the large turnout. He directed me to inform the various newspapers of the time and place of our gathering and we were fortunate to have the Chico Newspaper Enterprise-Record take up our story, printing a full page of photographs, interviews and history of that Battle.

Tom's interview was particular poignant with words clearly descriptive of the events of which those just reading the article could only imagine. "...Horchler remembers the lush green beauty of the Khe Sanh jungle and mountains, and the clear blue sky when he first arrived. It was a landscape that despite the heat, humidity, bugs and rain, he appreciated. He remembers, too, the horror of watching that landscape transform into a moonscape as the barrage of bombs, artillery...and Agent Orange assaulted the area. I saw it with my own eyes, it went from a living place to a place with nothing but dead, dead plants and trees and people. It was an unbelievable transformation. The killings, the plane crashes, the rats, the dead, the dying, the wounded, the gore and the fear. It was an impossible situation..." "He said he finds some solace in gatherings, such as the upcoming luncheon of Khe Sanh Veterans."

This luncheon was special, but not necessarily an unusual gathering of Khe Sanh Veterans, all Tom's friends who meet ever few months for breakfast or other events such as the dedication held at the Living Memorial Sculpture Garden in Weed California on Veterans Day November 11, 2011. The Khe Sanh Luncheon in Chico was attended by the usual gathering of friends and acquaintances of Tom Horchler (H.Q. 1/13) which including but was not limited to;

David Tonick (A/1/26),
Richard Cueva (1/11/155's),
Daniel Ferguson (W/1/13),
Bruce Kates (H.Q. 1/13),
David Lind (H&S 2/4),
Ned Borlaug (I/3/3),
Marco Soto (A/1/26),
Andres "Pete" Torres (G/2/26),
Kenneth "Buzz" Sawyer (H.Q. 1/13),
Ty Kittle (1/4),
Mike Perry (1/4),
Chuck Teasley (C/1/26),
Steve Wiese (B/1/26),
George Owsley (USN CBMU-301 DET-B),
John L Moore (USN MCB-301 Seabees), Thomas Soerensen A/1/13)
to name just a few - I apologize to those I failed to mention.

I was once again privilege to have been able to say a few words on behalf of Khe Sanh Veterans. "Today, on the 44th anniversary of the Siege at Khe Sanh, we set aside this date and this hour to remember and mourn those we lost. We survivors of that horrific event will never forget the ones we stood shoulder-to-shoulder with in the trench lines, those who faced incredible hardships on the surrounding hills, those who flew above in a desperate attempt to extract our wounded and dead and supply us with the critical material necessary for us to persevere. All will be forever cherished in our hearts. We survivors of that long and horrific battle will never forget the fallen. We will never forget how and why they sacrificed for us and for our wonderful country. We will never forget where they served or who they are. The fallen heroes of Khe Sanh will continue to be a part of who we are, for the rest of our lives. We also take this moment, to honor those who to this day, carry the wounds and memory of the Vietnam War, in their hearts, minds and bodies."

"As LBJ personally sent off Marine reinforcements to I Corps from El Toro Marine Air Station, Calif., on February 17, 1968, he told them: "This is a decisive time in Vietnam. The eyes of the nation and the eyes of the entire world, the eyes of all of history itself, are on that little brave band of defenders who hold the pass at Khe Sanh...."

"The Siege of the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh was an historic event. The mention of Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy in President Obama's inaugural address, forever confirms to our nation and the world that the Battle of Khe Sanh will forever hold a significant place in American History."
"Today we remember, not only those who fought at Khe Sanh but also those who have fought other battles and continue to fight this day for the freedom of all Americans." "On behalf of Khe Sanh Veterans, thank you all for coming and God Bless America. "

Marine Corps Gunnery Sergeant Stuart McIntyre & Joe Rosenthal

By Craig W. Tourte

It was just another casual conversation between a couple of old Marines - Stuart (Stu) McIntyre served in the Marine Corps from 1941 to 1968 - but it was this comment that caught my attention. I forwarded to Stu some internet photographs I had received of the battle for Iwo Jima and the next time I saw Stu he told me he had a photograph autographed by Joe Rosenthal of the flag raising on Mount Suribachi (Iwo Jima, February 23, 1945). With that I invited myself to Stu's house to take a look at this most famous and historic photograph.
Stu related that around 1963 he and Gunnery Sergeant Bill Dedic - who at the time was also the night manager of the Marines Memorial Club in San Francisco - were stationed at Treasure Island. They served as Liaison between the courts and the Marine Corps for those members of the Corps who found themselves in trouble and appearing before the judiciary.

On occasion Stu and Bill Dedic - while wearing their Marine Corps uniforms - would visit an establishment which served adult beverages and was located close to Chinatown and near the old Hall of Justice. Stu subsequently became friends with the bartender and during one of his visits he noticed a photograph of the raising of the flag on Mount Suribachi attached to the wall and mentioned it to the bartender. The bartender told Stu that Joe Rosenthal was an occasional visitor to the establishment and would ask Joe if he would sign a photograph for Stu. On Stu's next visit the bartender presented Stu with a photograph autographed by Joe Rosenthal which bore the inscription "With best wishes to a damn good Marine, S/Sgt Stu McIntyre from Joe Rosenthal." Stu told me that it was shortly after he received the photograph that Joe Rosenthal came into the establishment while Stu and Bill were there and Stu personally thanked Mr. Rosenthal.

"Iwo Jim Memorial - The picture inspired sculpture Felix De Weldon, who created a life size model of the photograph. Paid by donations, it was later cast in bronze and in September 1954 it was brought to Washington, D.C. as part of a memorial designed by Horace Peaslee. At the 179th anniversary (Birthday) of the US Marine Corps on November 10, 1954 the memorial was dedicated by President Dwight D. Eisenhower."

While I found that photograph most compelling I happened to notice several other items attached to the wall of Stu's office. One photograph was that of Fleet Admiral Chester William Nimitz in that famous and now familiar photograph of Admiral Nimitz seated on a chair before a desk on the deck of the USS Missouri taken on September 2, 1945 when Japan formally surrendered on board the Missouri in Tokyo Bay. The bottom of this photograph had the hand written inscription "To S/Sgt McIntyre with best wishes, Chester Nimitz."

On December 15, 1947 Admiral Nimitz retired from the office of Chief of Naval Operations and received a third Gold Star in lieu of a fourth Navy Distinguished Service Medal. However, since the rank of Fleet Admiral is a lifetime appointment, he remained on active duty for the rest of his life, with full pay and benefits. He and his wife Catherine moved to Berkeley, California. After he suffered a serious fall in 1964, he and Catherine moved to US Naval quarters on Yerba Buena Island in San Francisco Bay."

Around 1964 and during the time Admiral Nimitz resided on Yerba Buena Island his personal driver was a United States Marine who requested the Admiral sign the historic photograph for Stu to which the Admiral graciously agreed.

I noticed a shadow box on Stu's wall which held three (3) sliver dollars with inscriptions next to each coin. The coins reflected the dates 1933, 1935 and 1938. Stu told me there is a tradition called the "First Salute" and is often referred to as "The Silver Dollar Tradition or Salute" where newly commissioned second lieutenants present a silver dollar to the first enlisted man that salutes them. The coin symbolically acknowledges the receipt of respect due the new rank and position. In 1967 Stu was assigned as Assistant to the Marine Officer Instructor in the Navy NROTC program at Dartmouth College located in Hanover, New Hampshire and gave the first "Salute" to three newly commissioned officers. I observed the inscriptions next to each coin to read, "2d Lt John M. Masters Jr. USMC - Given to him on his 18th birthday by his father General John M. Masters, USMC." "2d Lt Francis B. Lovely USMC - Given to him by his Mountain Warfare Instructor, Army Sergeant Tim Lake." "2d Lt Warren C. Cook, USMC - Found by Lt Cook while on his first watch in the Marine Corps as a PFC."

I also observed a photograph of a young Sergeant of Marines Stuart McIntyre standing before a middle aged man and asked Stu about the significance. Stu told me that he was presented his E6 Staff Sergeant rank while attached to the American Consul General in Hamburg, Germany and was receiving his promotion to Staff Sergeant by Consul General Clare Hayes Temberlake who was married to an Italian Countess and who would later become Washington's first Ambassador to the Congo, later Zaire now the Democratic Republic of the Congo during that country's violent transition from being a Belgian colony. Ambassador Timberlake passed away on February 23, 1982 at the age of 74.

Stu had other just as interesting mementoes' such as a photograph of the Marine Corps Mountain Warfare Training Center located at Pickel Meadows in the Sierra Nevada Mountains and a photograph of the dedication of the Edwin A. Matus field near what was then El Toro Marine Corps Air Base located in Orange County, California. Lieutenant Matus was a helicopter pilot who often took Stu along with him on training flights. On one particular morning Lieutenant Matus asked Stu if he would again like to accompany him on a flight but Stu was unable to make the flight that morning. Lieutenant Matus's helicopter was involved in an accident that afternoon and Lieutenant Matus did not survive.

It has been both an honor and pleasure to have known my dear friend Stuart McIntyre who graciously invited me into his home to share these special memories of great historical significance. Stu is now 86 years old and as the saying goes "Once a Marine always a Marine." I mentioned Stu in an article I wrote four years ago "Playing golf with the Gunny." Stu was 82 years old at that time and I made the following observation regarding a golf trip up into the mountains with Stu, myself and two others. "We crawled out of bed full of creaks and moans, consumed various pain and muscle remedies to endure the rigors of the day. Sore backs, elbows, knees and plenty of complaints from the younger guys. I found myself having to take a moment or two to just kind of stand without falling down....what was interesting was that the three of us, who were under 80 years of age, were the ones who did all of the complaining and moaning. I never heard a word from old retired Marine Corps Gunnery Sergeant Stuart McIntyre. He never took a pill of any kind; he just stood without swaying, hit the ball straight, long and never complained of an ache or pain. He didn't say, but I suspect he considered us a bunch of 'None Hackers' perhaps even 'Girly Men,' nor did he correctly call me private." Stu remains the picture of health and vitality with a regimen of exercise and recuperation.

Stu permitted me to take his photograph holding the framed photographs autographed by Joe Rosenthal and Admiral Nimitz. It was my honor and privilege to present Marine Corps Gunnery Sergeant Stuart McIntyre with a Fall & Winter edition of Red Clay Magazine Issue 79 and a Khe Sanh challenge coin.

BOOK REVIEW

An unknown name on a gravestone is as dead as the person in the grave-until someone tells you a story about that person. John Foster, in Heroes From the Wall , has brought dead names on the Vietnam Memorial Wall to life through telling the stories behind the names. With careful research, interviews with people who knew the men, and a story-teller's eye for the detail that captures the character of the person behind the name, Foster reveals the heart, hopes, dreams and ultimate sacrifices that were made by these soldiers and Marines. A Vietnam veteran himself, the author's respect for his subjects is communicated loud and clear. The reader is given a portal through the smooth reflections on the smooth granite into the real lives, the real people, who died so young. These unsung heroes have now been sung.

When the author John Douglas Foster was wounded while serving in Vietnam during the 1968 Tet Offensive, he received more than a piece of metal in his body haunting memories of comrades opened his soul in a quest to learn more about those who didn't return. Sketching a fascinating portrait of the lives of those who fought and died valiantly, Foster pens a riveting and gut-wrenching read in Heroes From *the Wall.

A clear-eyed tale of truly honorable individuals who were not just mere names, numbers and statistics, Heroes From the Wall ensures that these unsung heroes will never be forgotten by future generations who didn't know them on the battlefield. Foster seamlessly captures their quirks of personality, playful antics, heroic actions, compassion and care for others, their caring and sharing with their comrades, tender concern for their family, and affirmation of life while engulfed in places of death. Leaving readers with a newfound respect for the nameless heroes upon turning the pages, Foster writes with candor and resonating tone.

Whether one served in Vietnam or not, Heroes From the Wall cannot be read without shedding a tear. For those who did serve there, who experienced the bond formed by those serving together in combat and who suffered a loss from among a cherished band of brothers, this book reinforces that which we knew - the bond is never broken. As the stories are told of those lost on Vietnam's battlefields, only a few from among the 58,195 stories on the Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Wall, we once again experience the pain of their loss but, decades later, can also join in celebration of their lives as heroes. It is important for young people to read about the life stories of an earlier generation's young men who answered America's call to fight an unpopular war, selflessly giving of themselves. Our fallen brothers cannot be forgotten. Heroes From the Wall makes sure the reader will not.

GHOST RIDER FOUNDATION

By Tim DeWolf
Exec. Dir. Ghost Rider Foundation

Ghost Rider Foundation was founded by LTJG K. DeWolf USN Medical Corps. She is my daughter, and was a friend of Ghost Rider. After his death she joined the Navy on a scholarship to become a Physician Assistant with a goal of working in Mental Health. Her first duty station in March will be - MCRD Parris Island SC and she will work at one of the battalion BAS.

I participated in setting up LZ Stud and a couple of arty hilltop positions to support KSCB, and a couple of convoys. I believe one was with Task Force Hotel. I finally ended up on one of the rebuilt bridges between Stud and KSCB during the pullout. My commanding officer and the best man I ever knew Lt. John H. Carson CO of Echo CO died on June 6,1968 while taking replacements out to the bridges, and delivering mail to the outposts.

I am the Executive Director of a small 501c3 Charity that works with veterans returning from the recent conflicts. The Foundation is called Ghost Rider Foundation because that was the Marines nickname who took his own life January 6, 2008. Ghost Rider's name was Sgt. Joe Lorek of 2nd LAR, 2nd Mar Div and he was from Mentor Ohio.

Like many of our generation I was diagnosed with PTSD and have managed to live a troubled but successful life.

Since then we have worked closely with dozens of veterans from all services. Some only require financial assistance but gradually our focus shifted to guiding the most troubled into counseling and back to the VA for treatment. I have spent more than a few nights in bars listening to these men, some have slept on my couch while I sat next to them, we have fostered their dogs while they were away for treatment, we have done the best we could. Our most difficult challenge is often in court and I hope that the next great movement from our fading generation will be to push for veterans courts in all of our towns and counties.

In the nights I have spent with them and listened as they talked about "being done with it" I started hearing familiar and repeated lines. Eventually I wrote these down and when I did the tears and memories came back to me. I have shown this to a few of the men Ghost Rider Foundation worked with and many have asked for a copy. The piece seems timeless as it speaks to me as loudly as it does to them. I have attached this in two formats - if you would like to put this in one of the copies or on the website you have my permission. I am not a poet and it isn't the words that are important - it is the feeling and meaning of those words.

Thank all of you for the fine work you do - keep it up.

The last goodbye

Nights and memories are my enemy. Faces, names, smells and dates are not just memories but experiences.
At night I can feel the shock waves of explosions, hear the ping of bullets and the cries of the Wounded.
Fate spared me - not skill and I refute that luck even exists.
I am home but my heart and memories are elsewhere.
I am the same yet people treat me differently. And I wonder how that can be.
Sleep eludes me and I have no wants or desires and I just long for one day to become the next.
I miss all of them and lament that I returned and not they.
The photos of us together mock me for they are not here but lie silently in their graves
I cannot endure tomorrow without them and I need more than want to be with them once again.

It is not cowardice to step into the unknown darkness to rejoin them.
It is not selfish, it is not weakness, it is my duty.
I would not do this if it were not taking me to a better place and back among my comrades..
I do not do this to escape or to hurt but to escape hurting.
I love my family but I do not belong to them any longer.
I am going where I need to be – a warriors final peace.
Love - A Veteran with PTSD

Forgive my literary license but this reflects the thoughts of what veterans have told me.

HONORING A TRUE AMERICAN HERO

The survivors of Lima Company 3/3, gathered at Quantico, VA to dedicate a memorial to Colonel John Ripley, our Company Commander in 1967. The monument was placed at the USMC National Museum.

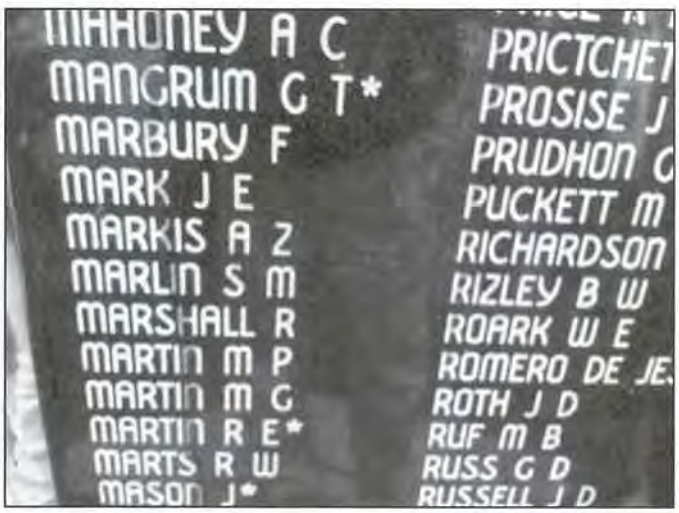
A special bond is formed with those who serve together in combat. It was great to see old friends, tell tales, share laughs, cry, remember the fallen, and to again be young and invincible (at least in my mind).

In the photo below we are gathering for a prayer service at the Chapel within the USMC National Museum grounds. The men in the baseball caps are Marines who served with Lima 3/3 in 1967.

The chapel was filled to overflowing for the prayer service.

After the prayer service we walked down a sidewalk through the trees to the site of the monument for the dedication. Kevin Macdonald is pictured to the left and that is me in the center with the windbreaker.

The memorial monument is unveiled after presentation of the colors, as rain commenced to fall.



The names of all who served under Ripley's command of Lima Company in 1967 are inscribed on the monument; the fallen have an asterisk by their name. The different color of the letters is a result of rivulets of rain water streaking down the granite.

Pictured below is Bud Wang left, yours truly center and Kevin Macdonald right. Pictured in the backound is the Museum. The museum is world class.

The monument to Ripley is placed next to a small bridge. This is fitting, as Ripley was awarded the Navy Cross, second highest military medal, for blowing up a bridge at Dong Ha, South Vietnam on Easter Sunday, 1972. This action stopped a major invasion by North Vietnam Regular Army mechanized troops. Many believe Ripley should have received the Congressional Medal of Honor.

JUST A FEW AWARDS PRESENTED TO CAPTAIN JOHN W. RIPLEY

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to Captain John W. Ripley (MCSN: 0-84239), United States Marine Corps, for extraordinary heroism on 2 April 1972 while serving as the Senior Marine Advisor to the Third Vietnamese Marine Corps Infantry Battalion in the Republic of Vietnam. Upon receipt of a report that a rapidly moving, mechanized, North Vietnamese army force, estimated at reinforced divisional strength, was attacking south along Route #1, the Third Vietnamese Marine Infantry Battalion was positioned to defend a key village and the surrounding area. It became imperative that a vital river bridge be destroyed if the overall security of the northern provinces of Military Region One was to be maintained. Advancing to the bridge to personally supervise this most dangerous but vitally important assignment, Captain Ripley located a large amount of explosives which had been pre-positioned there earlier, access to which was blocked by a chain-link fence. In order to reposition the approximately 500 pounds of explosives, Captain Ripley was obliged to reach up and hand-walk along the beams while his body dangled beneath the bridge. On five separate occasions, in the face of constant enemy fire, he moved to points along the bridge and, with the aid of another advisor who pushed the explosives to him, securely emplaced them. He then detonated the charges and destroyed the bridge, thereby stopping the enemy assault. By his heroic actions and extraordinary courage, Captain Ripley undoubtedly was instrumental in saving an untold number of lives. His

On 21 August 1967, Company L was assigned the mission of reinforcing a convoy that had been surprised by a large enemy force and was pinned down. With one rifle platoon, a small command group, and accompanied by two M-42 dual 40-mm. anti-aircraft guns, Captain Ripley was leading the relief column when it suddenly came under intense enemy automatic weapons and recoilless rifle fire. Disregarding his own safety and the heavy volume of hostile fire, he moved to the machine gun mounted on the vehicle and opened fire, pinpointing the location of the well concealed North Vietnamese and enabling the 40-mm. guns to deliver accurate fire on the enemy positions. Directing his unit to dismount, he quickly organized a defensive perimeter while coordinating supporting artillery fire and simultaneously controlling the remainder of his company which was widely separated from his position. Repeatedly exposing himself to the hostile fire, he directed artillery fire and air strikes upon the attacking enemy force and courageously adjusted fire missions to within fifty meters of his position. Throughout the following three hours, his skillful employment of supporting arms and direction of the fire of his men repulsed the determined enemy attacks and forced the hostile units to flee in panic and confusion. His aggressiveness and outstanding professionalism were an inspiration to all who served with him and were instrumental in the successful extraction of his unit from an extremely hazardous situation. By his steadfast courage, superb leadership and unfaltering devotion to duty at great personal risk, Captain Ripley upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service.

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Legion of Merit to Colonel John Walter Ripley (MCSN: 0-84239/1653859), United States Marine Corps, for exceptionally meritorious conduct in the performance of outstanding services to the Government of the United States as Marine Corps Representative and Director, Division of English and History, United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland, from July 1984 to June 1987. Colonel Ripley's contributions as Division Director and ex-officio member of the numerous high level deliberative bodies had a lasting influence on the course of the Naval Academy and the Naval Service as a whole. As Marine Corps Representative, he spearheaded a dynamic information program whose success was unmatched in the history of the Academy. The heightened awareness of the role and capabilities of the Marine Corps and the enthusiasm for service as a Marine that was generated throughout the Brigade of Midshipmen was attributable directly to his personal involvement and to his superb leadership of the Marine Corps team at the Naval Academy. Colonel Ripley's genuine commitment to the highest ideals of his service, frequently displayed as public forums where he lectured on the values of the military ethic, and his unflagging work to promote the aims of the Marine Corps, led to a substantially improved image of the Marines within the Brigade and within the community as a whole. By his adroit leadership, visionary farsightedness, and inspiring devotion to duty, Colonel Ripley reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and of the United States Naval Service.

Through his energetic initiative, superb managerial skills, and dedicated focus on mission accomplishment, Colonel Ripley was responsible for the unit becoming one of the top NROTC units in the country. Using his foresight, innovations, and outstanding leadership, he developed and instituted the only Operational Leadership Naval Science course taught to Marine Option NROTC students which placed the Unit as one of the top producers in the Nation for the Nuclear Power Program with an accession rte of 33 percent above requirements and a ten percent increase in student academic grade point average performance. In addition to his regular duties, Colonel Ripley served on the Academic Board, Admissions Committee, and the Leadership Committee which enhanced the status of Navy programs on campus and contributed to the academic excellence of the institute. Because of his military bearing, exceptional expertise, and esprit de corps, he was respected and admired by all. MILITARY CAREER

John Walter Ripley was born on June 29, 1939 in Keystone, West Virginia and his family lived there until he was five years old. They then moved to Portsmouth Ohio, where they remained for some years before finally settling in Radford, Virginia. John Ripley enlisted into the Marine Corps in 1957 at 17 years of age. A year later, he was appointed to the U.S. Naval Academy by the Secretary of the Navy. He graduated in 1962 with a Bachelor of Science degree in electrical engineering, and received his commission as a second lieutenant. After completing the Basic School, he joined the Marine Detachment on the USS Independence (CV-62).

After his sea duty, he joined 2nd Battalion, 2nd Marines. In May 1965, Ripley was transferred to 2nd Force Reconnaissance Company, and after training, he deployed to Vietnam with his platoon.

In October 1966, Ripley joined 3rd Battalion, 3rd Marines in South Vietnam. He served as Company Commander of Lima Company, known as Ripley's Raiders[was wounded in action, then returned to active duty and completed his combat tour.

During his two years of Vietnam service, he participated in 26 major operations. In addition to numerous decorations for extensive combat experience at the rifle company and battalion levels, Ripley was awarded the Navy Cross for extraordinary heroism in destroying the Dong Ha bridge during the April 1972 North Vietnamese Easter Offensive (also known as the Nguyen Hue Offensive). That action is memorialized at the Naval Academy with a large diorama titled "Ripley at the Bridge."

While under intense unrelenting enemy fire, Ripley dangled for an estimated three hours under the bridge in order to attach 500 pounds of explosives to the span, ultimately obliterating it. His action, conducted under enemy fire while going back and forth for materials, definitively thwarted an onslaught by 20,000 enemy troops and dozens of tanks and was the subject of a book, The Bridge at Dong Ha, by Colonel John Grider Miller. He attributes his success to the help of God and his mother. When his energy was about to give out he began a rhythmic chant, "Jesus, Mary, Get me there". His body taxed to its extreme limits, his action is considered one of the greatest examples of concentration under fire in the annals of U.S. military history. It also delayed NVA forces from taking Saigon for another three years.

Following his tours in Vietnam, Ripley served with Marine Force Reconnaissance, was an exchange Officer with the British Royal Marines, and was a Commanding Officer of 1st Battalion 2nd Marines, and the 2nd Marine Regiment. His final tours in the Marine Corps were in charge of the NROTC detachments at Oregon State university and the Virginia Military Institute, and as the senior Marine at the United States Military Academy teaching English and history. He earned the "Quad Body" distinction for making it through four of the toughest military training programs in the world: the Army Rangers, Marine reconnaissance, Army Airborne and Britain's Royal Marines, according to Miller's book. He was also the only Marine officer to be inducted in the U.S. Army Ranger Hall of Fame. Ripley retired from the Marine Corps in 1992 after 35 years of active duty service. He received more than five awards for his acts of bravery in Vietnam.

TRANSITION INTO HELL

Staff Sergeant Bruce E. Kates
By Craig W. Tourte

There are many who slowly transitioned into Vietnam and onto the Combat Base of Khe Sanh. Some attached to the 9th Marine Amphibious Brigade arrived via aged ships on a slow sail from Okinawa. The USS Washtenaw County, LST 1166 was just such a vessel. Remnants of the 13th and 26th Marines arrived towards the end of July 1967 and then convoyed west from the rather large Marine Corps Base of Dong Ha on Highway 9 which had the appearance of nothing more than a well worn wagon trail. As our convey entered the main gate located at the south west corner of the base we stopped 100 meters or so just east of the entrance. Upon entering the base I observed a couple of strands of concertina wire, a few hundreds yards of cleared fields of fire and the jungle. No bunkers, trenches or fighting positions were apparent. We disembarked from the overloaded and groaning trucks with our rifles, backpacks and small entrenching tool, and started the process of making habitable the flat clay earth and fortifying our positions. With blistering hands and aching muscles we dug, dug and dug some more, digging trench lines and filling countless sandbags, all the while enduring the too common ailment of dysentery, heat and humidity of the day and cold rain and freezing temperatures of the winter months. As the months passed every so slowly and our bodies adjusted to our environment we gradually became hardened, our hands became callused, our muscles strengthened and our dysentery subsided.

We became accustomed to living in deprivation, I never sat on a toilet seat, never had a shower from a forced water pipe, never slept in a bunk, never had a pillow or sheets, any washing of clothes was done with a cold bucket of water with the clothes hung over the concertina wire to dry. I never walked on cement or asphalt. I never listened to a radio, never sat in a chair, never wore any under clothing, never saw a television, never had any shaving cream and didn't have sufficient warm clothing to endure the freezing nights and this was all before the Siege started on January 21, 1968. We were always exhausted, working some twenty hours a day and then crawling out into the jungle to man an all night listening post or standing guard in the trench line, for month after tiring month. Our transition from soft to hard was long and slow and in some cases mentally challenging. Our dusty and dirty bodies covered in red clay earth and tattered soiled uniforms reflected our long presence in such austere conditions. By January 21st those of us who had remained on the combat for so many months had become to a certain extent, accustomed to the deprivation and hardships of life on one of the most desolated bases in all of South Vietnam.

Any new arrival to the combat base was easily recognizable by their strikingly bright green uniform, in some cases shined leather boots, pre-dysentery body mass, high and tight hair cut, clean shave, light non-tanned nor red clay stained skin color and in a certain manner in which they carried (walked) themselves. The transition from state side to the Khe Sanh Combat Base must have been unexplainable, unimaginable and horrific, especially so for those who arrived during the Siege.

Sergeant Michael Secli, William (Bill) Poland, Edward Lawida and I were together discussing current events when one squared away Staff Sergeant appeared. It was obvious he was a fairly new arrival to the combat base with shined black leather boots, clean pressed green uniform and white skin. The Staff Sergeant told us that he had recently arrived from San Diego where he had been a Drill Instructor. It was a pleasant conversation and we thanked him for coming by and wished him well. I remembered thinking at the time that it must have been very difficult for the newly arrived Staff Sergeant to come to Khe Sanh right from the states. It was not too long after that conversation took place that we heard the Staff Sergeant had been seriously wounded and another killed. I remember thinking at the time how sad that he had just recently arrived and was wounded in such a short time after getting there.

"Battalion of Kings - March 8, 1968 - page 249." "At 1220H, "A" Battery, 1/13 received one incoming round…Sergeant Donald R. Chamblin, Jr., a wire chief of 1/13 was mortally wounded in the attack…." "Corporal Ernest Frank, one of the wiremen for Headquarters Battery found himself atop a pole holding the black communication wire….in a letter to his parents he writes: Friday…I was climbing poles all day and splicing power lines…I had just put one line up on a pole and was starting up with another line when I heard a pop in the distance. I jumped off the pole and crouched behind a bunker…an artillery round landed about 30 feet away from us. It landed right between 2 bunkers where our Staff Sergeant in charge of the radio operations, our Sergeant. who was chief wireman and our supply Corporal were crouching….the Staff Sergeant and Corporal were pretty mauled up….the Sergeant was only just 20 years old and both his legs were completely blown off at the upper thighs….he had one leg completely blown off and the right leg was hanging on by a piece of skin…he asked "Am I dead"… and I said no, just hang in there…he didn't make it."

On January 21, 2012, I met Staff Sergeant Bruce E. Kates, at a Siege remembrance luncheon held in Chico, California. Of course I didn't realize that Bruce was the same Staff Sergeant I had talk to that day so long ago at the Khe Sanh Combat Base but as our conversation continued it became clear that he was in fact one in the same. Bruce told me that he served as a Drill Instructor at the Marine Corps Recruit Depot in San Diego from January 1965 to October 1967. Thirty day after he left San Diego he found himself at Khe Sanh arriving on November 18th. Bruce told me that the other Marine who was wounded by the incoming artillery round was Corporal Ross L. Teague, who he has had no further contact with. Bruce told me the round broke his back and his femur bone along with numerous other permanent related injuries. Bruce said that he heard the incoming round before it hit.

What an interesting experience to once again talk to the same Marine I had spoken to so many years ago. I was thankful he had survived and contacted Mike Secli and the others and told them of my meeting Sergeant Kates again. All who served on the Marine Corps Combat of Khe Sanh, on the surrounding hills or who served in the villages went thought their own transition to Hell. It must have been particularly difficult for those recent arrivals, unaccustomed to the hardships of life in a remote outpost and enduring a long and horrific Siege.

FIGHTING POST TRAUMATIC STRESS DISORDER

I attend PTSD group therapy sponsored by the VA through the Pontiac, Michigan Vet Center. My group is helpful in the fight against PTSD. I recommend seeking professional psychological help for anyone showing the symptoms of PTSD. I also believe the most important PTSD therapy I engage in is the time I spend with God. I presently have two daily devotionals that I start the day reading, The Upper Room (upperroom.org) and Stories of Faith and Courage from the Vietnam War by Khe Sanh Vet Larkin Spivey. The Scriptures help to point my mind in the right direction.

The day I am writing this article, March 22, the scripture from The Upper Room is James 5:15 (NSRV): "The prayer of faith will save the sick and the Lord will raise them up." This reminds me that prayer and faith can be major factors in the treating of any illness or condition such as PTSD.

The scripture and story from March 22 in Stories of Faith and Courage from the Vietnam War reinforced this theme. John 3:17: "For God did not send the Son into the world to condemn the world, but to save the world through him." The story concerned Chuck Dean, the author of Nam Vet. I had read Nam Vet twenty years previous and it plays a major role accepting that I had PTSD and helping me in my battle. It also provided part of the inspiration to become a chaplain. I highly recommend Nam Vet to help fight and cope with PTSD.

Chuck Dean's story on March 22 told of Chuck hitting rock bottom with PTSD and asking a friend for help. The friend simply told him, "Chuck, you need the Lord."

Survivor's guilt and guilt over things we have done are two of the symptoms of PTSD. II Chronicles 30:18-20 (NIV) …Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, "May the Lord, who is good, pardon everyone who sets his heart on seeking God—the Lord, the God of his Fathers—even if he is not clean according to the rules of the sanctuary. And the Lord heard Hezekiah and healed the people."

There are two themes here. Those who have faith in God need to pray for and encourage faith in God for those who need help. Those who have problems that won't go away need to seek God.

There are many passages in the Bible that state "seek God" and one of my favorites is Psalm 9:9-10 (NLT) "The Lord is a shelter for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble. Those who know your name trust in you, for you, "O Lord, you have never abandoned anyone who searches for you."

The main reason I need daily devotionals is simple. While I am completely satisfied with my material needs; anger and suicidal feeling visit me on a regular basis for no reason that makes sense to me. I believe as Paul describes in Ephesians 6:10-18 (NLT): "A final word: Be strong with the Lord's mighty power. Put on all of God's armor so that you will be able to stand firm against all strategies and tricks of the devil. For we are not fighting against people made of flesh and blood, but against the evil rulers and authorities of the unseen world, against those mighty powers of darkness who rule this world, and against wicked spirits in the heavenly realms.

Use every piece of God's armor to resist the enemy in time of evil, so that after the battle you will still be standing firm. Stand your ground, putting on the sturdy belt of truth and the body armor of God's righteousness. For shoes put on the peace that comes from the Good News, so that you will be fully prepared. In every battle you will need faith as your shield to stop the fiery arrows aimed at you by Satan. Put on salvation as your helmet, and take the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. Pray at all times and on every occasion in the power of the Holy Spirit. Stay alert and be persistent in your prayers..."

My prayer for all the Khe Sanh Veterans and their families is from Numbers 6:24-26 (NLT): "May the Lord bless you and protect you. May the Lord smile on you and be gracious to you. May the Lord show you his favor and give you his peace."

VVMF's Essay Contest Grand Prize Winner is... Donna E Elliott!

Donna wins a care package from VVMF and her essay was read at the 30th Anniversary of the Groundbreaking of The Wall ceremony. Here is Donna's essay, titled

"The Blade and the Cross":

On 21 January 1968, my brother, SSGT Jerry W. Elliott was declared Missing-In-Action in Khe Sanh, Vietnam. When the 55th Joint Task Force (JTF) investigated the loss site in 1999, his buddy, Mike Teutschman and I were present. After interviewing two local residents who had scavenged the Old French Fort, the team presented me with a charred section of rotor blade from Black Cat #027. The blade had survived a B-40 rocket attack, laid undiscovered in the red dirt of Khe Sanh until found by a farmer, and then spent years holding up the corner of a cow pen. Jerry had left his position as door gunner on a different chopper to assist survivors from this crashed and burning helicopter when he disappeared.

I brought it back to America. May 2000, found us in the Pentagon parking lot with Run For The Wall, waiting to ride in the Rolling Thunder parade and carry the rotor blade in a pine box to the Wall. Many notables mingled with the bikers, but I never knew the name of the man I remember the most. He stared at the blade for a long time before he spoke. He was one of two survivors from a chopper crash. The other crewmember had managed to return to the crash and recover a small piece of stainless steel from the helicopter, which he used to make two crosses. The vet reached into his pants pocket and a small piece of silver flashed in his palm. He explained this cross was never out of his sight; he carried it with him at all times as a reminder of the friends he had lost. Tears welled up in his eyes when he choked out, "I don't know why I didn't die that day; they were all such good men." Around noon, the lead bikes began to roll out. As soon as the wheels stopped turning, strong hands reached out to carry the heavy wooden box to its final destination at Panel 35E in an honor guard procession. One by one, the riders touched Jerry's name with bowed heads as a silent statement of respect. Overwhelmed, I left the Wall. Like a moth to a flame, I later returned. While bending over the pine box, which now overflowed with miscellaneous mementos, I lost my balance and leaned into the Wall to break my fall.

That's when I saw it. Tucked deep into a corner of the pine box was the small silver cross! For reasons unknown, the Vietnam vet from the parking lot had chosen to leave his talisman at the Wall in remembrance of Jerry. His gift an anonymous, selfless act, reminiscent of actions I'd heard combat vets share about their brother soldiers on the battlefield. I placed the cross on one end of the blade, where it gleamed boldly. I hope my nameless friend from the parking lot walked away from the Wall that day with as much peace in his heart as I felt at that moment.

LAW WILL EXTEND TAX BREAK TO SPOUSES OF VETERANS

Submitted By Vincent Rios

The cut applies to disabilities that are 100 percent service-related.
By Jim Vertuno Associated Press

AUSTIN - Tens of thousands of spouses of totally disabled veterans in Texas will qualify for significant property tax relief under a law taking effect Sunday.

Texas law already exempts veterans who are declared 100 percent disabled because of combat injuries or other service related causes from paying property taxes on their home. As of Jan. 1, that homestead exemption will also apply to a spouse after the veteran dies.

The change will help some of those spouses, many living on fixed incomes, to keep their homes, said John D. Burkhardt of the Austin chapter of the Military Order of the Purple Heart veterans group.

Some of our veterans have owned their homes for many years, and when they die, their spouse can get hit with huge bills;' Burkhardt said.

The measure is one of a handful of laws taking effect in 2012. The homestead exemption for disabled veterans' spouses required an amendment to the state constitution, which voters approved in November.

It won't come cheap. According to a Senate analysis, the exemption is estimated to cost state and local governments about $25 million in property taxes by 2016.

Sen. Dan Patrick, R - Houston, one of the authors of the law, called that an insignificant budget impact compared with the sacrifices made by the veterans and their families.

When they came back from war 100 percent disabled, that's a very special class of soldiers!' Patrick said.

We're not talking about people living in million - dollar houses. For the most part, we're talking about people trying to get by on military benefits!'

Texas has about 300,000 disabled veterans, and nearly 25,000 of them are designated as 100 percent service-related disabled, according to the Texas Veterans Commission. About 16,600 of those are between ages 55 and 75.

The homestead exemption applies to the veterans' primary residence and expires if the surviving spouse remarries. The exemption moves with the surviving spouse to a new home if the home would be an equal or lesser dollar value compared with the old one.

The new restrictions on homeowner associations require them to give homeowners three to 18 months to pay late dues or fines.

Homeowners will also be allowed to contact their association directly about their late payments, even if the association has retained an attorney or collection agent.

The law also allows homeowners to prevent their association from using foreclosure if the ban is approved by two-thirds of its members.

A provision requiring associations to get a court order before foreclosing took effect Sept. 1.

Homeowner advocates say they have been fighting for the protections for years.

This is the first time we got protection that had real teeth:' said Harvella Jones, president of the Richmond-based National Homeowners Advocate Group.

MAY THE LORD BLESS OUR SERVICE MEN AND WOMEN AND BRING THEM HOME SOON

Growing up, I wanted to be a doctor, but money was scarce so I went to nursing school. In 1966, during my senior year, an Army Nurse Corps recruiter came to talk to us. It all sounded so exciting; I would have a chance to travel, it paid well and most importantly, I was assured that I wouldn't have to go to Vietnam if I didn't want to - which I didn't.

I signed up and after basic training, was assigned to Letterman Hospital at the Presidio of San Francisco. During my two years at Letterman, I received orders for Vietnam three times. The first two times I said no. But the third time, I decided that my two years of experience would probably be a huge asset over there. We landed in Tan Son Nhut Air Base and when the airplane door opened, I nearly fell backwards, overwhelmed by the heat and the stench.

Suddenly all my experience seemed trivial. Being 23 years old seemed very young.

I was scared, but there was no turning back. After our debriefing, I was assigned to the 67th Evac Hospital in Qui Nhon. When the helicopter landed on the hospital tarmac, they set my things onto the ground. I climbed out, straightening my skirt. The soldiers in the helicopter yelled, "Good luck, Captain," as they took off. I was in my class A uniform, which meant I was also wearing nylons and high heels. Nothing could have been less appropriate for the surroundings. Miles of barbed wire topped by concertina wire encompassed the hospital compound and the large adjoining airfield, along with acres of hot concrete.

I squared my shoulders and marched inside the grim cinder block building in front of me.

I was told to get some sleep, because I started tomorrow. I gratefully fell into a bed and in the morning, donned my hospital uniform - fatigues and army boots just like the soldiers.

Because I was a Captain, I was made Head Nurse on the Orthopedic Ward, which primarily held soldiers with traumatic amputations. I took my role very seriously and had a reputation for strictness. Although I had been a nurse in the States for two years, it did not adequately prepare me for Viet Nam. I witnessed a tremendous amount of suffering and watched a lot of men die.

One of my rules was that nurses were not allowed to cry. The wounded and dying men in our care need our strength, I told them. We couldn't indulge in the luxury of our own feelings. On the other hand, I was always straight with the soldiers. I would never say, "Oh, you're going to be just fine," if they were on their way out. I didn't lie.

But I remember one kid that I didn't want to tell. The badly wounded soldier couldn't have been more than 18 years old. I could see immediately that there was nothing we could do to save him. He never screamed or complained, even though he must have been in a lot of pain.

When he asked me, "Am I going to die?" I said, "Do you feel like you are?" He said, "Yeah, I do." Do you pray?" I asked him. "I know 'Now I lay me down to sleep.'"

"Good," I said, "that'll work."

When he asked me if I would hold his hand, something in me snapped. This kid deserved more than just having his hand held. "I'll do better than that," I told him. I knew I would catch flak from the other nurses and corpsmen as well as possible jeers from the patients, but I didn't care. Without a single look around me, I sat on the bed with him. I put my arms around him, stroking his face and his hair as he snuggled close to me. I kissed him on the cheek, and together we recited, "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep, If I should die before I wake, I pray the Lord my soul to take." Then he looked at me and said just one more sentence, "I love you, Momma, I love you," before he died in my arms - quietly and peacefully - as if he really were just going to sleep.

After a minute, I slipped off his bed and looked around. I'm sure my face was set in a fierce scowl, daring anyone to give me a hard time. But I needn't have bothered. All the nurses and corpsmen were breaking my rule and crying silently, tears filling their eyes or rolling down their cheeks. I thought of the dead soldiers mother.

She would receive a telegram informing her that her son had died of "war injuries." But that was all it would say. I thought she might always wonder how it had happened. Had he died out in the field? Had he been with anyone?

Did he suffer? If I were his mother, I would need to know. So later I sat down and wrote her a letter. I thought she'd want to hear that in her son's final moments he had been thinking of her.

But mostly I wanted her to know that her boy hadn't died alone.

THEY GAVE SO MUCH COMFORT

EDIT NOTE: When I started to gather information regarding the Life of Colonel William Dabney, and read this article, written by Beth Crumley, the Reference Historian History Division, Marine Corps, I could not have come close to her wonderful History of Colonel Dabney.

In Memoriam: Colonel William H. Dabney

It isn't often that one can look back in time and know exactly when life changed. I can. While serving as a contract historian on the National Museum of the Marine Corps project, I traveled to New York for a meeting with Batwin and Robin Productions.

Also in attendance was Colonel Joseph Alexander. His last instructions to me during that meeting were "Learn everything you can possibly learn about the siege of 881S and the resupply of the hill outposts around Khe Sanh Combat Base." I never imagined that simple tasking would change my life so completely.

Upon my return to Virginia, I began work. I read everything I could find on Khe Sanh Combat Base and the surrounding hill outposts. When I finally felt I had a solid background, I contacted Major Frank Gulledge, who served as the webmaster for "The Warriors of 881S." Over the course of the next several months I spoke at length with a number of veterans, Marines who had served on the ground, as well as those who had resupplied the beleaguered outpost by air. One of these veterans was Colonel William Dabney, who commanded the Marines on the hill. He was more than willing to field any questions I had, to offer his opinion on a variety of subjects. By this time, I was completely hooked on the story of 881S. I asked Colonel Dabney if he would take the time to speak with me at length about his service in Vietnam. He was ... but only if I was "properly prepared." Colonel Dabney proceeded to email me a very extensive reading list! I learned something about Colonel Dabney that day ... he demanded excellence of himself, and expected it in others.

So who was Colonel Bill Dabney?

Born on 28 September, 1934 in New Brunswick, Canada, Dabney was the son of Hugh and Mary Dabney, a Virginia native. After moving to the United States in the 1940s, Dabney enrolled in Yale University in 1953. A year later, he left Yale and enlisted in the Marine Corps. Upon graduation from recruit training, Dabney reported to the Third Marine Division on Okinawa ... and was promptly put on mess duty for 71 consecutive days. Assigned to the communication station at the northern training area, it was during this time that he decided the Marine Corps would be his life, not as an enlisted man, but as an officer. Said Dabney, "I was so impressed by the dedication and competence of the officers I'd seen, and I thought, 'this would be a great way to spend a career."

Discharged as a sergeant in 1957, Dabney served with 100th Rifle Company, Marine Corps Reserves while attending Virginia Military Institute. There he met and married Virginia McClandish Puller. Her father was also a VMI graduate, and a Marine ... perhaps the most famous Marine of all. Said a friend of Dabney's, "It took a hell of a man even to ask for the hand of Virginia Puller, the daughter of General Lewis B. "Chesty" Puller," and a hell of a man to meet with his approval. Bill was that man."

In 1967, Dabney reported to Vietnam for duty with the 3d Marine Division, serving as company commander with "India" Company, 3d Battalion, 26th Marines. The war was heating up in Northern I Corps.

By February 1967, elements of the 9th Marines moved into the area around Khe Sanh, to protect a detachment of Seabees whose mission was to extend and improve the airfield located there. Increased contact led to reinforcement of Khe Sanh with a second company. By April, the Marines had encountered strong North Vietnamese Army forces in fortified positions. Two battalions of the 3d Marines were committed to the area. In some of the bloodiest fighting of the war, which came to be known as "the Hill Fights," the Marines gained control of the commanding terrain overlooking the combat base.

By October, the North Vietnamese 325C Division had once again moved into the area. Operation Scotland, the mission of defending Khe Sanh Combat Base, and using it as a base for offensive operations against NVA forces, became the responsibility of the 26th Marines. Said Col David E. Lownds, commanding the 26th Marines, "All indications are that we are going to get hit. How bad, I can't say."

In early December 1967, the 3d Battalion, 26th Marines moved to Khe Sanh and were briefed that the NVA was building up forces in the area. Ordered to sweep the area south and west of the base, the battalion moved from Lang Vei north and west to within 2 kilometers of the Laotian border. The Marines then swept northward, finally arriving back at Khe Sanh shortly before Christmas 1967. They made no contact with the NVA nor did they find any evidence of recent enemy presence in that area. By mid-January, 1968, however, intelligence officers of the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam (MACV) had observed a definite and significant shift in the patterns of movement of the North Vietnamese Army. Instead of moving well to the west of the Khe Sanh Combat Base, the NVA was infiltrating into South Vietnam from Laos and the Ho Chi Minh Trail, and assembling in large numbers in the area of Khe Sanh and its supporting outposts. Any hope the NVA had of a successful attack on the combat base would depend on their ability to seize, or at least neutralize the hill outposts, especially Hill 881S and its nearby neighbor, Hill 861.

India Company, 3/26 was given the mission of occupying and defending 881S. Dabney's Marines made an overland march from Khe Sanh to the hill. From 27 December through 17 January, India Company patrolled the area aggressively, sometimes to the limit of the range of the attached 81mm mortars (about 4000 meters).

Marines of 3d Platoon, "India" Company, photographed the morning of 20 January, 1968.

At 0500, on 20 January 1968, India Company began a reconnaissance-in-force up Hill 881N, encountering an NVA battalion moving towards Khe Sanh. It was the opening move in a siege that would last 77 long days. That night, India Company was ordered to return to 881S. Said Dabney, "The mission was still to hold 881S ... There were a bunch of guys up there and they'd come prepared to fight. We hosed down 881N and all the ground between it and 881S til dark, with air, 81s, 60s and all the artillery we could get ... For once we knew where they were." That night the enemy hit Khe Sanh and all the outlying outposts EXCEPT 881S.

Veterans of the embattled outpost credit Dabney's leadership with keeping them alive throughout the siege. Lt. Carlton Crenshaw, who commanded the 105mm howitzer detachment on 881S wrote:

"Captain Dabney, being the senior officer on the hill, is in charge of both India and Mike Companies. He is an excellent Marine ... I think I might have mentioned it before, he is the son-in-law of the Marine Corps' most famous general and war hero in the Banana Republic Wars of the 1930s, World War II and Korea -- Chesty Puller ... Captain Dabney has a lot of weight on his shoulders and has grown weary up here. He is thirty two years old and looks like he has aged five years up here on Hill 881. He also leads a magic life in terms of not being hit. He personally supervises every medical evacuation we have. He is there helping to direct the helos in. He gets stretcher bearers moving the minute the wheels touch ground. When we get replacements or the return of our stretcher bearers, he directs them immediately to a nearby trench because it is only a matter of seconds before a mortar round will land. He has had a round land close to him every day for the past three weeks! He is 6 feet 4 inches, like myself, and is also a big target for the snipers. He has had a helmet shot off his head. During a mortar attack the other day, I saw Captain Dabney standing on a trench wall shaking his fist and cursing at the NVA..."

What was life on 881S like? It was about digging in, living day to day with no relief in sight. It was about lack of food, lack of water, lack of sanitation. It was about the wounded, and the dying and the dead. And the fog ... and the rats ... and waiting for resupply and medevacs. Said Crenshaw, "Our small force here on Hill 881 is pretty tired -- there is no place to go, constant incoming, attacks at night, inadequate amounts of food water and mail. We are under siege constantly."

Through it all Marines fought and endured and sometimes found humor in life on the hill. And Colonel Dabney never failed to remind me that he was incredibly proud of his Marines. He would often say, "These were AWESOME men, Beth."
Colonel Dabney later wrote:

There was never a climactic day or event. Rather, from 21 January through 17 April 1968, the threat to life and limb remained essentially unchanged. The dangers were greatest during helicopter operations because those offered the most lucrative targets to the enemy's gunners. The potential for catastrophe, however, was greatest at night or during the frequent foggy weather when we could not see to detect the enemy's approach or to bring our massive supporting fires to bear against him. That potential took a psychological as well as a physical toll. To stand in a trench for eight hours on a given night without relief, in total darkness, in a fog so thick that even a magnesium flare could not pierce it, all senses focused on detecting any sound, any smell, any hint of movement to the front, was trying in the extreme to the Marine required to do it. To require all hands do so nightly for three months was to stretch the limits of resolve. We all knew that if the North Vietnamese assaulted there was no possibility of reinforcement or withdrawal. Aside from the preplanned supporting fires, we were entirely on our own. The Marines had daily opportunities to take the measure of their enemy. He was brave, he was disciplined, and he was not suicidal, so they knew that he would assault only when he was reasonably confident of success, and with adequate strength. They also knew that if wounded, they would be evacuated to a medical facility only when and if the weather broke and the helicopters could fly -- that there was little their Corpsmen could provide save comfort and some morphine to ease their pain. Forty-two Marines or Corpsmen died on or near the hill and nearly two hundred were wounded, not including aviation casualties whose numbers, being reported separately, were unknown to us. Seven helicopters were shot down, yet we never called for a medevac that didn't come, weather permitting. None of these losses occurred in a single pitched battle, but rather in discrete incidents scattered over the course of the siege. Incoming was constant, and although we learned to cope with it to a point, a lucky round in a trenchline or active medevac zone was just as deadly in April as in January. Through it all, the troops did their duty. They stood their watches, flew their aircraft or serviced helicopter zones, manned outposts, engaged the enemy and raised the flag as zealously at the end as at the beginning. They were never asked to stand back-to-back against the flagpole with fixed bayonets, but rather to endure. By enduring, they triumphed. They were magnificent!"

Colonel Dabney's leadership during the siege was finally recognized on 15 April 2005, when he received the Navy Cross in a ceremony at Virginia Military Institute. On a clear, spring day, friends, family, and veterans gathered together to mark this occasion. The VMI cadets conducted a parade and pass in review. I shall never forget the sight of Colonel Dabney rising out of his wheelchair to render a salute, or the pride in the voices of "his Marines."

Later that day, the Navy Cross was presented in Jackson Memorial Hall. Before a magnificent mural depicting the battle of New Market, in which the VMI Cadet Corps spearheaded an infantry charge across a rain-soaked wheat field, the Navy Cross was affixed to Colonel Dabney's suit jacket. Colonel William Grace, the Commanding Officer of the NROTC Unit, VMI, read the citation:

"For extraordinary heroism while serving as Commanding Officer of two heavily reinforced rifle companies of the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam from 21 January to 14 April 1968. During the entire period, Colonel (then Captain) Dabney's force stubbornly defended Hill 881S, a regimental outpost vital to the defense of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Following his bold spoiling attack on 20 January 1968, shattering a much larger North Vietnamese Army (NVA) force deploying to attack Hill 881S, Colonel Dabney's force was surrounded and cut off from all outside ground supply for the entire 77 day Siege of Khe Sanh. Enemy snipers, machine guns, artillery, and 120-millimeter mortars responded to any daylight movement on his position. In spite of deep entrenchments, his total casualties during the siege were close to 100 percent. Helicopters were his only source of resupply, and each such mission brought down a cauldron of fire on his landing zones. On numerous occasions Colonel Dabney raced into the landing zone under heavy hostile fire to direct debarkation of personnel and to carry wounded Marines to evacuation helicopters. The extreme difficulty of resupply resulted in conditions of hardship and deprivation seldom experienced by American forces. Nevertheless, Colonel Dabney's indomitable spirit was truly an inspiration to his troops. He organized his defenses with masterful skill and his preplanned fires shattered every enemy probe on his positions. He also devised an early warning system whereby NVA artillery and rocket firings from the west were immediately reported by lookouts to the Khe Sanh Combat Base, giving exposed personnel a few life saving seconds to take cover, saving countless lives, and facilitating the targeting of enemy firing positions. Colonel Dabney repeatedly set an incredible example of calm courage under fire, gallantly exposing himself at the center of every action without concern for his own safety. Colonel Dabney contributed decisively to ultimate victory in the Battle of Khe Sanh, which ranks among the most heroic stands of any American force in history.

By his valiant combat leadership, exceptional bravery, and selfless devotion to duty, Colonel Dabney reflected great credit upon himself and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service."

Ladies and gentlemen, these men standing before you, and the Marines and Navy Hospital Corpsmen, living and dead, whom they represent, are the men who, for 77 days at Khe Sanh, held the hill and poured hot steel on a determined enemy. The same forces under the same general besieged Khe Sanh as had overwhelmed the French at Dien Bien Phu. At Khe Sanh, they were faced by these men, and they quit and faded away. These men did their duty and endured -- Stonewall Jackson would have called it resolve -- and by enduring, they triumphed."

It is the greatest honor of my life to have served with these patriots in battle. I wear this decoration only symbolically, as their commanding officer. It is these men who earned it."

Colonel Dabney left the stage, aided by his wife Virginia. He stopped by the first rows in the center of the hall, where the veterans of 881S were seated. In a booming voice, he said "Follow me, men." They would have followed him to the gates of hell, had he asked them. He was the recipient of the Navy Cross, a Silver Star, two Bronze Stars and two Navy Commendation Medals ... but I believe he felt one of his greatest rewards was commanding the Marines on Hill 881S.

Later that day, after the reception, many of us had an opportunity to spend time with Colonel Dabney and "his Marines." It was a fantastic day, and one that I shall be forever grateful for ... but my great respect and admiration for Colonel Dabney goes much deeper than the fact that he was an American hero. You see, Colonel Dabney was the kind of Marine who always felt it was his duty to mentor those who came after. I spoke with so many Marines that day who told me stories of Colonel Dabney inviting them to his home, talking with them for hours, mentoring them throughout their careers. Upon hearing of his death, former Sergeant Glenn Prentice, who served on 881S, stated, "I do not have the words to express my feelings. Col. Dabney was my C.O., my teacher, a man we followed into the breach -- taught us of life and death -- showed me how to put others before oneself. Bob Arrotta and I over the years would visit Bill -- cleared up many ghosts we both had. I will truly miss him -- but he will be always with me. Farewell my friend -- be at peace!"

He gave so much to so many ... including me. There was never a time when I asked a question that I failed to receive an answer. There were times I turned to him for his wisdom and guidance and he was always willing to share his insight.

When I first started working in the field of Marine Corps history, all I really wanted to do was write World War I history. After working on several projects over the course of many years, I found that the majority of the projects which crossed my desk were on Vietnam. Although I enjoyed the history of the Vietnam War, I was reticent. I started talking with those people whose opinion I respected. More than one told me to stay away, that Vietnam was "still a minefield." I spoke at length with Colonel Dabney about this. He was quick to remind me that I had a responsibility to those who served in Vietnam, that their courage, their valor, was no different than the Marines who fought at Tarawa, at Peleliu, at Iwo Jima, at Chosin. The difference was in the way they were perceived by the outside world. Every time I give a lecture on Vietnam, I use those words. Largely because of Colonel Bill Dabney, I embraced the history of the Vietnam War, and it has been one of the greatest gifts in my life.

I never had the opportunity to know Colonel Dabney when he was healthy. He was largely confined to a wheelchair and on oxygen ... but he remained a giant of a man.

Thank you, Colonel Dabney, for giving me the opportunity to walk with giants of the Corps. Thank you for your wisdom and your guidance. You were a true American hero, and you will be remembered as such ... and you will be missed by many.
Rest in Peace, sir.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

VETERAN RETURNS TO VIETNAM FOR CLOSURE, PERSPECTIVE

By Judith McGinnis

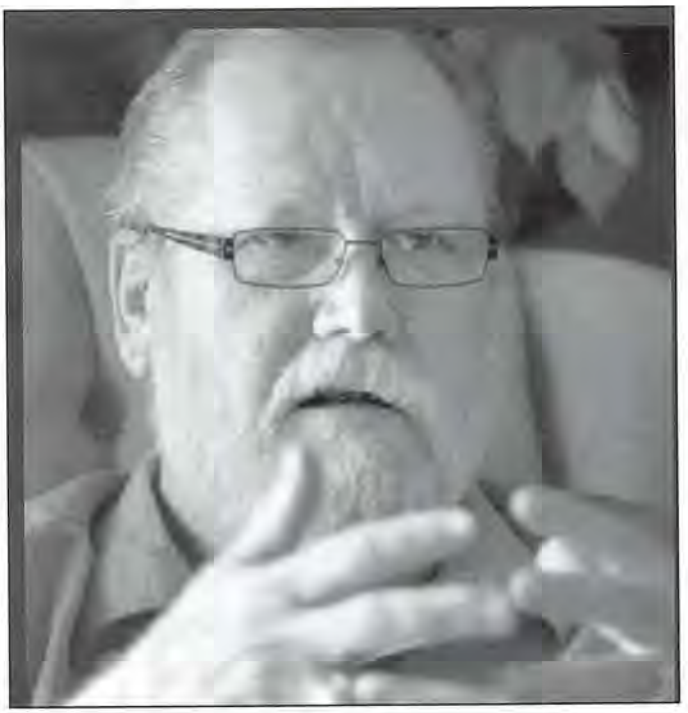
When Carl "Gus" Gustafson left Vietnam in 1968, wounded so badly doctors doubted he'd ever walk again, the thought of going back seemed remote. With time and determination, Gustafson beat the odds. He walked, married the love of his life, made a career and raised a family. Still, there were unseen wounds he and 10 other Vietnam veterans set out to salve when they recently returned to the country that changed their lives forever.

Each year the VFW-administered Robert Charles Kahle Fund provides Purple Heart recipients all-expense paid trips back to their battlefields. Everyone in Gustafson's group saw each sight with different eyes.



Torin Halsey/Times Record News Carl Gustafson fought in Vietnam in 1967 and '68 with the 1st Battalion 9th Marines. He was wounded and returned home with a Purple Heart. He recently returned from a trip back to the country coordinated by the VFW to help veterans reconcile a very turbulent time in their lives.

"His (Kahle's) hope was that some guys might heal, seek closure from their experiences," said Gustafson, who was a 19-year-old lance corporal with the 1st Battalion 9th Marines the day his platoon was ambushed by Vietcong during the Tet Offensive. "He never served in the military so it's pretty amazing he'd want to do that."

Like any other traveler, Gustafson tells parts of his story in snapshots. Pictures of Hoa Lo Prison, known to the thousands of men imprisoned and tortured there as the Hanoi Hilton. The tomb of Ho Chi Minh — known to American troops as "Uncle Ho" — architect of the North Vietnamese invasion of the South. The beautiful Stilt House where he laid those plans.

A photo of the infamous Hanoi Hilton, a site used by the North Vietnamese Army to house, torture and interrogate captured servicemen.

"We went to Khe Sanh, where I was wounded" Gustafson said quietly. The former Marine tends to talk more about the near misses of that day rather than the nearly 20 wounds he received. "It was my Waterloo."

As they traveled to Ho Chi Minh City, the vets saw evidence of a nation attempting to reconcile its wartime past with its struggle to build a future. Monuments of shattered metal overlooked utility poles burdened by nests of hastily installed cables.
They say 73 percent of the people alive in Vietnam now "weren't alive when Saigon fell in 1975. But you can talk to lots of people in the U.S. now who don't know anything about the Vietnam war," Gustafson explained.

"We were never ill treated while we were there. A lot of people there still think 'Marine No. 1'. A few gave us dirty looks. We know people we met who were 60 or older could have been on either side of the conflict."

Unlike his return in the late '60s like many soldiers

Contributed photos Carl Gustafson stands in front of a Vietnam temple that was rebuilt after being bombed out in the war. The temple had stood for hundreds of years prior to the war and it was reconstructed to the exact specifications of the original.

he was advised to wear civilian clothing — when Gustafson arrived in Wichita Falls Jan. 19 he was treated to a hero's welcome. Along with scores of fellow veterans and members of the Patriot Guard, Karen, his wife of 42 years, their daughter Shannon Turnbo and son Mattheu, himself a retired Air Force officer with three tours in Iraq and the Middle East, were waiting with open arms.

"If I could go back to Vietnam, go back to my time there and change it, I wouldn't. Had I not been shot, had I not experienced all the things I did I wouldn't have had the life I had," he said, locking eyes with Karen from across his desk.

"There are some wounds that never heal but there were things that made me stronger."

Patrick Johnston/Times Record News Vietnam veteran Carl Gustafson reacts to a crowd of family, friends, and members of the Patriot Guard gathered at the Wichita Falls Municipal Airport to welcome him home. Gustafson was returning from a VFW-sponsored trip back to Vietnam and was greeted with the hero's welcome home he never received in 1968.

LATE OBIT

PAUL L. PETTIT FORMER MARINE & FATHER OF STAN PETTIT, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN E CO 2/26 KIA LZ MARGO VIETNAM 1968

By Lawrence McCartney E CO 2/26 Hill 861A

Learned Mr. Paul L. Pettit, a World War II Marine and the father of Corporal Stanley R. Pettit, U. S. Marine Corps, an Echo, 2/26, Hill 861-A, Khe Sanh veteran who was KIA on September 15, 1968 @ LZ Margo, passed away yesterday. The obituary, which appeared in the Thursday, February 16, edition of the Anderson Independent-Mail, is below.

Unfortunately, this obituary left Stan's name out, but the newspaper will run the obituary again tomorrow, with Stan's name included. In addition, there is an obituary in today's edition of the Greenville News. Many of you may recall an article in a past edition of 'Red Clay' which detailed how Mr. Pettit raised and lowered the American flag over Stan's grave, for as long as he was physically able, everyday since Stan's burial in 1968. A Marine—he wishes to remain unidentified—who belongs to the same church has continued that tradition, replacing the flag at his own expense when necessary. Since I only live three (3) or so hours away, I intend to pay my respects to the family tomorrow. God bless and keep you and all your loved ones Sir, may you now rest in eternal peace.

LIBERTY- Paul L. Pettit, 90, of 8234 Liberty Hwy, husband of the late Colleen Childress Pettit, died Wednesday February 15, 2012 at his residence. Born July 28, 1921 in Liberty, SC he was the son of the late John Fuller and Emma Baldwin Pettit. He served in the US Marine Corps and was a member of Flat Rock Baptist Church of Liberty. He is survived by his daughters, Paula Hendricks of Pawley's Island, Kathy Finley of Liberty, sons, Ray Pettit of Rock Hill and Rev. Eddie Pettit of Sunset, nine grandchildren, and twelve great grandchildren. He is also survived by sisters, Johnnie Niemeyer, of MD, Myra Winchester of Greenville, and brother Coke Pettit, of Liberty. He was preceded in death by a son, Stanley Pettit, grandson, Christopher Finley, sisters, Bonnie Carter, Leah Rankin and Lela Goetze and brothers, Spurgeon Pettit and Quinton Pettit.

Funeral services were held at 3 PM, Friday at Flat Rock Baptist Church of Liberty with Revs. Doug Goss and Eddie Pettit officiating. Burial followed in the church cemetery.

NO SMALL THINGS

by Mike Worth

Each year around Mother's Day, I try to visit my Mom in Asheville, North Carolina. Mom, the one who worried as she watched the nightly news, while I was in Vietnam. Wrote faithfully, sent "care" packages, and prayed for my safe return. As she counted the days, she also wrote condolence letters to other parents; those of my boyhood friends and those of too many Echo Company brothers. She said it was just a small thing and the least she could do.

This year I arranged to take a little side trip to Simpsonville, South Carolina to visit with one of my personal heroes, John "Doc" Lancaster, Echo 2/26. Some may remember Commander John Lancaster, USN (Ret) from the dedication at Jefferson Barracks last year--but he is always" Doc" to me. "My" Doc, who when I was wounded on 27 October 1968, ran through a hail of bullets to get to me and patched me up. We spent a day at Laurens High School where Doc Lancaster is now the director of the JROTC program. In his classes, Vietnam became the lesson of the day. The scars from where the bullet went through my arm (having fortunately missed my head), and Doc's fancy patchwork became the "show and tell" for these interested, pulled together and well mannered young people.

Part of our plan was to also visit the parents and the grave of another Khe Sanh Veteran, Stan Pettit, E 2/26, who survived Khe Sanh, but was Killed in Action later at LZ Margo. Stan was our friend and brother then, remembered still--and John is the Doc who tended to Stan when he was killed by machine gun fire as he walked point on 15 September 1968.

Stan Pettit. 3rd Sqd., 3rd Plt., Echo Co., 2nd Bn 26 Marine Regt, 3rd Marine Div June-July 1968, Con Thien area near the DMZ

And so, we traveled along Liberty Highway to a sleepy rural area between Easton and Liberty, South Carolina to visit Stan's parents, Paul and Colleen Pettit. Stan's brothers, Ray and Eddie and sisters, Paula and Kathy, were at a family wedding rehearsal this day, so maybe next time.

Mrs. Pettit is ill and confined to her bed, but we hoped the flowers brought a touch of cheer and a splash of brightness to her day. Sadly, Mr. Pettit tells us that Mrs. Pettit has never quite gotten over the loss of Stan, their oldest boy.

In a devastating set of circumstances, the Marine Corps failed to inform the Pettits in a timely manner of the death of their son. The Pettit family first learned of Stan's death when they received a letter of condolence from a Marine in Stan's squad. Hoping it was a mistake, it was only after Mr. Pettit asked his Congressman to investigate that they finally received the heartbreaking confirmation.

Mr. Pettit, a WWII Marine, who worked in Naval Intelligence and took jungle training in Panama, Central America, is a very warm and most engaging guy, with strong political views and an acute and accurate memory. Paul Pettit is also a loving father whose son fought and died for this country. This father's deep love is evident in the accompanying poem, inspired by a photo of Stan that was sent to the family by a buddy, and was written two days after he buried his eldest son, Stanley.

When we visited Stan's grave, which is in the very center of a small church cemetery near the Pettit home, the roots of the patriotism and sense of duty that was so obvious in Stan, were movingly clear. Rising to nearly 15 feet above the grave with the simple bronze headstone reading Cpl. Stanley R. Pettit, E Co 26th Marines, is a flagpole bearing an American Flag. This powerful symbol of freedom and sacrifice, standing vigil in remembrance of one brave Marine, has flown there for 32 years. For 32 years, Paul Pettit has maintained the grave, reinforced the flagpole, and replaced each fading or tattered flag with a new one. For 32 years, Stan's father has ensured that anyone who visits or drives by this humble churchyard will see this flag--and know that it proudly waves over the resting place of one who gave his life for his country. He says it is just a small thing and the least he can do.

For 32 years this flag tells of duty, honor and sacrifice. May it always fly. May Stanley R. Pettit and so many other brave hearts always be remembered. It is just a small thing and the least we can do.

GOD BLESS AMERICA

OBIT

ANNA L. "MICKEY MOM" ROBLE
KHE SANH GOLD STAR MOTHER &
"MOM" TO MANY KHE SANH VETERANS
HER SON, JOSEPH ROBLE E CO 2/26 KIA

Anna Louise "Mickey" Michel Roble, 88, of Latrobe passed away on Thursday, Dec. 29, 2011, at Excela Health Latrobe Hospital.

Association associate member Anna M. "Mickey Mom" Roble, widow of a World War II veteran, Gold Star Mother--Lance Corporal Joseph E. Roble, USMC--and mother of deceased Marine veteran, William A. "ZBumper" Roble, passed from this life on to her eternal heavenly reward @ approximately 3:45 PM today, Thursday, December 29, 2011. "Mickey Mom" had a most positive and lasting impact on all of us; she cared deeply for all the men who served with her son and greatly appreciated the love and support she received from the association members. She was a "rock" for many who needed a shoulder to lean on just as she relied on us to be her "rock." Please remember her and her family in your prayers. Rest in peace "Mickey Mom." God bless and keep you in his loving arms for all eternity. ~~

Semper Fidelis!!! . . .
Larry McCartney

The daughter of Ernest and Lillian I. (Burkley) Michel, she was born Aug. 20, 1923, in Columbus, Ohio.

She graduated from Blairsville High School in 1942 and went on to work at Kennametal. She was married in 1945 and raised her eight children. When her husband died suddenly she went back to work at Toyad in Latrobe (Derry Township). After her retirement, she also worked at Kenney's Bar and Papa Sal's in Blairsville.

She was a member of Holy Family Catholic Church, Latrobe Senior Center, American Legion Auxiliary Thomas B. Anderson Unit 515, St. Vincent Society and the Golden Agers of Latrobe; honorary member of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, and was a Gold Star Mother.

Mickey was an avid traveler who visited at least 28 of our 50 states, Mexico, most of the countries in Europe and also had the need to travel to Vietnam.

In these past years she enjoyed playing bingo with her many friends at the Latrobe Senior Center, American Legion, Fifth Ward Fire Hall and St. Vincent Grove. She also loved attending Mass at Holy Family Catholic Church. Her biggest love, next to God, was her family.

By the grace of God, she will join above, her husband, William Matthew Roble, who passed in 1971; two sons, Joseph Edward Roble, posthumous Bronze Star awardee who was killed in 1968 in the Vietnam conflict, and 'William Arthur "Bumper" Roble, who passed away while exploring in Peru in 2008; her parents, and a stepsister, Lorena Fisher.

She is survived by the following children whom she taught how to smile and stay strong through tragedy: Matthew Roble and his wife, Kathleen, of West Chester Steven Roble of Colorado Springs, Colo., Ann Louise Roble of Latrobe, Toni Apryasz and her husband, Stush, of Blairsville, Rita K. Roble of Latrobe and Beth Sundaram and her husband, Suyra, of Colorado Springs, and her grandchildren who will have the wonderful memory of a very involved grandmother, Charlie Roble, Joseph Roble, Holly Best, Rayymond Apryasz, Joshua Apryasz, Eric Roble, Daniel Roble, Dharninika Sundaram, Chandra Sundaram and Dhena Sundaram. She had five great-grandchildren who will miss their precious "GiGi" Maria and Jaxin Roble and Cecilia, Tyson and Finley Grace Best.

Rest now, Mummy, we've got it from here.

A funeral Mass was celebrated in Holy Family Catholic Church, Latrobe, with the Rev. Chester J. Raimer as celebrant. Interment in St. Mary's Cemetery, Unity Township. American Legion Auxiliary Unit 515, Latrobe, held a memorial service.

EULOGY
Read By Josh Apryasz

There was this skinny little girl who grew up during the Great Depression, she did the usual: went to school, graduated, got her first job and met and married her beloved soldier. She went on to raise their eight children. We could say that about any usual girl of that time, but this is the story of Mickey Roble; who was most unusual. She had much more in all these years to do, AND to offer. The Roble house was the meeting place for all the kids and relatives in the neighborhood because she welcomed anyone and everyone. The smell and taste of her cinnamon rolls and banana bread always proved welcoming to them.

Mickey would get a little upset with her kids once in a while, when they ate out of the middle of her fresh baked bread, when they sailed their little sister down those old Victorian steps, the frequent fights anyone would have when there are that many people under one roof. There were the times when they brought dogs home to stay, and when there was a fork or two thrown across the dining room table landing in a sibling's hand. But they always knew they were loved, and loved a lot.

She always demonstrated her love. There were many, many hugs and kisses for the kids and when the children married she shared that unconditional love with their spouses and then eventually her ten grandchildren, and five great grandchildren.

There were many happy times at the home and especially at the camp in Ligonier where there were always plenty of visitors by the many relatives. Mickey was not without her share of grief and tragedy, perhaps more than most people do in a lifetime. Ironically, it was at camp where she learned of her first-born son's death as Joe was killed in action in the Vietnam War in 1968. She would demonstrate to her children to be dignified in their grief. They were to be strong and not shed a tear, at least not in front of anyone. There were times when they did hear her crying, but she never would allow them to see it.

Sorrow would come again too soon when her husband of just twenty-six years passed away suddenly in 1971.

Mickey showed her strength when continuing to raise the four younger children while also returning to work. The older kids stepped In to help with the four younger ones, but only under a very watchful eye from Mickey.

After the children were grown, life was happy for Mickey who thrived on knowing her children were finding their own place and independence in life. She moved to Florida for a short time following retirement but learned quickly it was not the place for her. The children were blessed when Mickey followed this short move with extended stays to the homes of each one of her children. These are times her children will always look upon lovingly and with numerous cherished memories.

As always Mickey's faith and fortitude proved strong once again. She lost her youngest child Billy in 2008. When Mickey first learned of the tragedy she was naturally shocked and shed tears for the first time in front of one of her children. She quickly recovered and composed herself. She was going through a parent's worst nightmare of losing a child for the second time in her life. Once again Mickey went on living her life to the fullest; traveling the world, going to Mass, and playing BINGO at the Latrobe Senior Center, 5th Ward Firehall, St. Vincent Grove and the American Legion where she shared love and hugs with her dear friends. She played BINGO until she could no longer.

These are just some of the events that made Mickey into the person we knew and loved. She was hard, but fair, stubborn but caring, and strict but loving. She helped shape many of the lives of the people here today with the life lessons she learned and then passed on to all of us.

So, like her, now her children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren will do what she taught them, they will go on and share their love and strength because that is what she would want them to do.
No more goodbyes for you Mickey. We bid you farewell to be with your two sons and husband where there are no more tears.

WHAT A DIFFERENCE A DAY MAKES!

By Joe Oliver

I would like to introduce you to a childhood friend of mine Roger Michael Hurd. We both grew up in the working class neighborhood of East Cambridge, Massachusetts.

I met Roger in the first grade of Scared Heart Grammar School and we were friends from day one.

Growing up in East Cambridge was a good thing. East Cambridge was made up of second generation, Italian, Polish, Irish and Portuguese. Everyone I knew was Catholic, in fact while growing up I thought everyone in the world was Catholic. This impression was fostered by The Sisters of Saint Joseph.

If you were Polish you went to the Polish School and the Polish Church, if Portuguese you would go to the Portuguese school and church and so forth. Everyone, that is except us Italians, all went to Scared Heart, the Irish School.

So there I was an Italian going to Scared Heart Grammar School and their Irish church. I wish I had a dollar for every time the Nuns forced me to sing, If Irish Eyes were Shinning.

Growing up in the 50's was great, everyone got along. All of our parents worked, it seemed divorce was not an option and I knew of no one who was divorced.

The only exception to this was my friend Roger. His Mother had been divorced several times. He had three sisters and everyone one of them had a different last name. Also his Mother dated. These were all very strange happenings back then.

Roger and I, as well as my other friends, hung around together all through grammar and high school. In East Cambridge everyone was assigned a street corner to hang out on. I am not sure how this process worked, but my little group of friends from Scared Heart all ended up on the same corner. Maybe the Nuns had something to do with it? Maybe not.

Growing up in the so called inner city, we shared a lot of firsts together. We smoked our first cigarettes together, stole our first car together, and drank our first beer together and so on. We also received communion together and conformation too.

My birthday is the 15th of November and Roger's the 16th. If I was 100 pounds Roger was 80. When I was 130 pounds Roger was 100. When I was 5 feet tall Roger was 4 feet. All during this time we had this little saying between us, "What a Difference a Day Makes".

Along comes 1965 and our lives would be changed forever. One of my friends Mike Lopez and I joined the Marines, wanting to see the world and get out of East Cambridge. A month after I left for Parris Island, Roger also joined the Marines.

The last time I was with Roger was 1966, we were both home on leave. I was a Lance Corporal and Roger was a Private First Class, again we had our little saying going, "What a Difference a Day Makes".

Lance Corporal Roger Michael Hurd was killed in action at Khe Sanh, Vietnam during the "Hill Fights" of 1967. None of us knew how Roger was killed, only the date and the location. Trying to make contact with his family was impossible as his mother had remarried again and tracking down his sisters was impossible.

Several years ago I was reading a magazine from one of the two Marine Veterans Groups that I belong to and came across the following story in The Khe Sanh Veterans magazine "Red Clay".

The story was written just before Memorial Day. I thought I would share this with you. It was written by a fellow Marine that served with Roger, someone I have never met J. M. Kaheny.

The value of the story is the same no matter what day it is. I wanted all of you to know about my friend Roger. I thought how sad would it be if on Memorial Day or Veterans Day or any other day for that matter no one thought of those that have made the ultimate sacrifice?

I am hoping to keep my friends memory out there and I want to make sure that he is never forgotten. Over the years I have shared this story with many and I am honored to share the story with you. Maybe every once in a while you will have a good thought about my friend LCpl. Roger Michael Hurd. Here is that article;

A MARINE REMEMBERS ON MEMORIAL DAY

By John M. Kaheny

For most of us it is the sure sign of impending summer and it is filled with parades, picnics and beach parties. Children, enjoying the day with their friends, may occasionally ask why a tear forms in their father's eye at the sound of Taps or the sight of Old Glory waiving in the wind.

It is difficult for the young to truly grasp why we set aside this day to honor those gallant veterans who fell at Lexington and beyond, defending our freedom and protecting our lives. So far they have been spared the terrors of the night and the arrows that fall by day.

Not so for the aging warrior whose memory on this sacred day leaps time and space to find a grassy knoll four miles from Laos on another day in May of 1967.

Marines and corpsman on patrol, forty-three strong, are just five miles from the safety of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. To the north, they are the last free men between Hill 881S and North Vietnam. Suddenly, the Cat of Death jumps from a tree line on the exposed flank of the platoon. Two young riflemen, each but nineteen years old, shun available cover; stand up, stand fast and fire into the charging horde. Taking the full force of the enemy's assault, they purchase with their blood a precious gift of reaction time for their fellow Marines and corpsmen. Helmets fade slowly into chest high grass and soon disappear from view.

Eventually forty-one make it back to safety, some bleeding none broken, but the two go on home to rest forever beneath marble crosses. Their names, Private First Class Thomas Edward Hendershott and Lance Corporal Roger Michael Hurd, are now etched in stone beneath Lincoln's watchful eye.

The years have passed but every day I see their sacrifice reflected in the smiling faces of my children and grandchildren. For had not these two brave men held their ground with everything they had, Coleen, Meghan, John Peter, Olivia, Clara and Lauren simply would not be, because one of those they saved that day was me. Now you know why taps brings it all back and makes me think of those young heroes and where they are today and why I know, all too well, the meaning of that World War II epitaph:

And when he gets to heaven
To Saint Peter he will tell
"One more Marine reporting, Sir,
I've served my time in Hell"
What a difference a day makes!

Joe Oliver lives in Central Florida with his wife of forty three years Joanne. They have two sons and four grandchildren. Joe is a former Marine Combat Wounded Vietnam Veteran and a Life Time member of the Military Order of the Purple Heart.

John Kaheny lives in San Diego CA with his wife of 41 years. They have three children and three grandchildren. John is a retired municipal lawyer and a retired Marine Corps Reserve colonel with service in Vietnam and Desert Storm.

PBY "CATALINA" 5A 2487

By Craig Tourte

"The Makapuu Point Light house on the island of Oahu has the largest lens of any lighthouse in the United States." Makapuu Point is the southeastern most point of "Ohau." It's one of those tourist destination mentioned in the books and catalogs one finds in the lobby of the hotels and restaurants. People who have visited Oahu often ask others if they "visited the light house." There is a sign off of highway H1 that notifies the tourist of the location and directs the traffic into the parking lot. It is a walk of at least a mile up hill on a paved pathway to reach the light house. Most folks are attracted to the whale watching and magnificent views. You really can't get close to the structure but are able to mount a small steel platform to look down on it and out into the far reaches of the Pacific Ocean.

As I approached the platform I noticed off to the side a small cement block with a bronze or dark steel plaque. Upon further inspection I noted that the plaque was in reality a memorial dedicated to "PBY 5A 2487." The text on the memorial read: "Not far from here, on April 5, 1942 nine American naval aviators perished in the service of their country."

Ensign William H. Howe
Ensign George L. Doll
Orren A. Roberts AMM1c NAP
Joseph H. Hayman AMM3c
Jack Parish ARM2c
Billy B. Herrin AMM2c
Delbert G. Berchot AM3c
Charles L. Andrews RM3c
William F. Allen SEA1c

"They crashed their Consolidated Catalina PBY-5A, Serial 2487 seaplane, returning from 12.5 hours of patrolling the waters around Hawaii for enemy forces. They crashed trying to land in foul weather and darkness, mistaking the Makapu's light for Barbers Point light and hit the hillside during low attitude circling maneuver."

"You are not forgotten…"

I did what tourists do and took some photographs, climbed the platform and looked out into the beautiful Pacific. I then climbed back down and stood off to the side for a few minutes. There must have been fifty or so people come and go during the minutes I stood there. All eager to climb the platform and take photographs and then turn and start the long walk back to their automobiles. Less than a few actually glanced at the plaque and none for more than just a couple of seconds. I kept seeing the words "You are not forgotten" and thought of the roadside memorial in New Mexico honoring those fallen at Khe Sanh and wondered it they would be forgotten. I thought of all of the memorials, remembrances, parades and articles which promised that the fallen would not be forgotten. I wondered if Ensign Howe, Ensign Doll, Billy Herrin, Delbert Berchot and the others whose name are engraved on the plaque were remembered by their families and friends or if in the end they too were forgotten. I won't forget them now, nor the others, and perhaps that is enough….

MORE KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

By Robert A. Hall

A Des Plaines resident who served as a Marine in Vietnam will be honored later this month by a non-profit organization for his poetry, which captures the life of the Marines, their courage and what it means to be at war.

In his book, "Old Jarhead Poems," Robert A. Hall compiled pieces he has penned over almost 50 years, starting as a Marine in the 1960s. Though the majority of his work in the book focuses on the Marines, some are also about patriotism and the War on Terror.

"Sometimes, it kind of just forces its way out of me. I don't know how else to describe it," said Hall, 65, of poetry.

Hall will be honored with the 2012 Robert A. Gannon Award on April 21 by the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation at the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Triangle, Va. As many as 400 people from across the country are expected to attend the black-tie dinner and ceremony, which also honors others who have helped preserve and promulgate the history of the Marines.

"I think he's done an excellent job of sort of capturing what it means to be a Marine in war and peace," said retired Lt. General Robert Blackman, president and CEO of the organization. Hall's affinity with words began as a child. Growing up in southern New Jersey, he loved to memorize poems and recite them for friends and family at parties. When he wrote his first poem in fifth grade, Hall's father thought he plagiarized, because all the words were spelled correctly, he said.

After graduating high school, Hall quickly signed up for the Marines, which he felt was his patriotic duty. As a radio relay team chief, he spent time in places across the country, as well as Okinawa, Japan, and Khe Sanh, Vietnam. Through his travels, he carried a battered copy of Rudyard Kipling poems in his pack.

"I didn't have many books with me and it was something I could read and reread," Hall said, adding he still has the paperback book of poems, which are bound together by surgical tape.

In 1968, Hall returned home to attend college. After graduating from the University of Massachusetts, he was elected to the Massachusetts State Senate, where he served until 1982. He was also in the Marine Reserves for six years during that time, he said.

Hall, a published freelancer, has worked all over the country running various associations. He came to the Chicago area in 2008 to become the executive director of the Rosemont-based American Association of Hip and Knee Surgeons. Hall, who was diagnosed with pulmonary fibrosis in 2006, plans to retire in the near future and move to Wisconsin to be near family.

All the proceeds from the book go toward the Injured Marine Semper Fi Fund, a non-profit organization that financially supports inured and critically ill members of the U.S. Armed Forces. Hall said he is looking forward to the upcoming ceremony and is excited to meet other writers and Marines who have served the country.

"To be part of that group and part of that dinner will be the real honor for me," he said.

HOW I GOT TO VIETNAM

By Joe Oliver
HMM-163 S-2 Chief

I was stationed at Camp Smith Hawaii in the G-2 section; Hawaii was a two year duty station. When I finished my time there I would not have had the time for a Vietnam tour.

The Intelligence field was new to me and I was busy learning my trade. My responsibilities were keeping the friendly and enemy order of battle and statistics on Marine Operations taking place in Vietnam. We tallied every item captured during an operation. All intelligence was then briefed to the General.

The General at Camp Smith was the CG of FMF PAC, he received daily briefings from our G-2 as well as the other G sections.

I was the bottom man on the totem pole and made E-5 once my MOS was changed to 0211. So all the shit details fell on me, but there was a nice E-6 Women Marine with me and she helped with all the important tasks assigned an E-5 Intelligence Sergeant. My biggest responsibility was making sure the coffee was made before the lifers (sorry about that) showed up in the morning and of course empting trash cans.

It was interesting learning how to keep the Order of Battle and I was enjoying my new trade.

Of course every other weekend we were in the field doing real Marine stuff. I was also in the Color Guard, at Camp Smith they had a drill team/band we did parades and ceremonies at the Punch Bowl and Pearl Harbor. Not bad and getting out of the office was always nice.

Remember now I was 18. When I received word of my childhood friends death (LCpl Roger Michael Hurd) my first reaction was I wanted to go to Vietnam to avenge my friend's death. So I submitted a request and was turned down, the reason stated I was at a 2 year duty station and my 2 years were not up

On my second request I added if I did my 2 years in Hawaii I wouldn't have the time for a 13 month tour in Vietnam. I got turned down again and again and again.

Then I got the idea to just do one request after another, I wouldn't wait for the rejection I would submit a new request twice a week. I figured I would kill them with paper work and they would let me go.

Months went by and I was worried I would be stuck in Hawaii for the whole two years. Funny now that I think about this, I was worried about being stuck in Hawaii. I know you must be thinking too bad youth is wasted on the young.

I worked directly under a Master Gunnery Sgt and he was a great guy, a Korean Marine. He knew what I was doing and figured to let it run its course. One day we were having a heart to heart and I explained that my childhood friend and fellow Marine had been killed and I just had to get to Vietnam for my friend if for no other reason.

My Gunny told me to request Mast and directed me not to talk to the Company Commander in fact he told me not to talk to anyone until he gave me the word.

I like the good Marine, followed his orders. The Company XO put a lot of pressure on me trying to find out what the reason was for my requesting Mast. I kept silent and he passed me onto the CO, I was once again pressured, but I wouldn't discuss my problem with him. Up the chain of command I go, word spreading of my requesting Mast, When the Colonel in charge of my G-2 section called me into his office, wanting to know what was up. I should have told him I was tired making coffee for all the lifers, just to see what his reaction would have been! I told him I would not discuss the matter with him and he was sort of pissed. I then told him it had nothing to do with the G-2 section or my work within the section. This cooled him down and my journey up the Chain of Command continued.

I am working my way up, and now I am going to see a fullbird, my Gunny telling me that after this guy, I would be talking to the General. I was a little nervous about talking to a General, but was relieved when Gunny told me I could discuss my problem with the Colonel, and that he knew the Colonel and knew he would solve my problem.

I reported to the Colonel, the first time I am in a room alone with a Full Bird, he tells me Marine, whatever your problem is I will solve it here and now. He told me there would be no reason to go any further up the chain. The Colonel looks me square in the eyes (I can still see him giving me that death look), and again says Marine, whatever it is, let's get it solved right now.

I take a deep breath and say, "Sir I want to go to Vietnam'! He looks at me and bellows.....what!!!!!! I repeat myself and after he collected himself. He says no problem, you will begin checking out tomorrow. True to his word I started checking out the very next day.

I think he was relieved when I told him my problem, I am not sure what he was expecting but it wasn't that my request was to go to Vietnam. Remember this was 1967 and Vietnam wasn't that popular, although in Hawaii with all the military it wasn't bad. I don't remember any protests or anything like that going on.

I arrived in Country Nov 1967. It seems very childish now that I think back on my thoughts, but I was very sincere. I mean they killed my friend and there I was sitting on a tropical island. That just wasn't right.

After arriving in Vietnam to be honest with you, more than once had I wished I was back in Hawaii making coffee for those lifers!

Today if I met a Marine who was in during Vietnam and didn't serve in Vietnam I'd look at him differently.....know what I mean? I know he is still a fellow Marine, but not a combat Marine.

Ok that's my story and I am sticking to it!

IT CHANGED MY LIFE

By Joe Oliver

High School was coming to an end, the time June 1965. I gave no thought of what my next step in life would be. One day my friend Mike Lopez said a few innocent words grouped together into a sentence, "Hey want to join the Marine Corps"? What a question, join the Marine Corps?

I was never much of a joiner of anything; well there was the Cub Scouts and Junior Achievement. I really had a good time in both of those endeavors.

I figured maybe joining the Marine's would be the same. I mean who doesn't want to join a group and have a good time, right?

Off to meet the recruiters. I can still see them standing ramrod straight in this beautiful uniform. Later I would learn that this beautiful uniform had a name, "Marine Dress Blues"!

My first thoughts, remember I was seventeen at the time, was that the girls are going to love me in that beautiful uniform!

Being a city kid growing up in a row house in a wonderful Blue Collar neighborhood I was what you would call a greaser. Back then one was either a College or a Greaser. I had the DA, black leather jacket, pompadour hairdo, hung on a corner and well I was a city kid and I loved every minute of it.

All I could think about was that beautiful uniform.

Of course I should have maybe given the year 1965 and a little country in South East Asia some thought. Hey forget about the year and some country halfway around the world. My thoughts were of that beautiful uniform and the girls it would attract. My parents were the only thing standing between me and that beautiful uniform. I was only seventeen and needed their permission to join the Marines.

The recruiter arrives at our home and immediately recognizes my mother is in charge.

His presentation was spot on and lasted for forty five minutes. When he finished he asked my mother if she had any questions, she didn't.

My mother turned to my father who had not said a word or asked a question during the presentation and asked, "What do you think"?

My father looked at me and then back to the recruiter and asked, "Is he (meaning me) going to look like you in three months?" The Marine Recruiter answered "Yes Sir Mr. Oliver"! My father then asked the recruiter, "Can you take him tonight?

SOME OPINIONS WILL NEVER CHANGE

Walter Cronkite recently passed away, and someone mailed me the following article. It was printed February 1, 1998, in the Chicago Sun-Times, with the topic :

TET: A NO-WIN DEBATE.

It contained the following statement "Soldiers who fought 30 years ago in the pivotal battle of the Vietnam War call it a victory, but critics, including WALTER CRONKITE, remain troubled by the enemy's bold attack.

It Then posted an interview with Walter Cronkite with a question and answer format.

NEWSMAN STANDS BY HIS OPINION

You cannot discuss the Tet Offensive without discussing Walter Cronkite. Before an audience of 40 million, he questioned the wisdom of remaining in a war that increasingly appeared unwinnable. "It seems now more certain than ever that the bloody experience of Vietnam is to end in a stalemate," he claimed. Soon thereafter, President Lyndon B. Johnson was reported to have said, "If I've lost Walter, I've lost Middle America." A month later, Johnson announced that he would not seek re-election. Some still view Cronkite as a hero. Others-especially the soldiers who fought during Tet-look less kindly on the broadcasting legend. Cronkite spoke with the Chicago SunTimes in a brief interview.

Q. What still remains a mystery to you about Tet?

A. Well, the only mystery is the lack of [military] intelligence that permitted Tet to take place in the first place. I've yet to see an adequate explanation of that.

Q. Do you regret your role in Tet?

A. I don't think so. No.

Everything we the press, and I particularly, did was justified at the time.

Q. Do you come across veterans who are angry at you for your role during Tet?

A. Yes. I've made it a point to speak to vets and military groups. I've spoken at West Point about the need for understanding between the media and the military. I understand that they might have a different view of the Tet Offensive. I don't really understand the anger, however.

Q. They're angry because they feel certain they were "kicking the enemy's ass."

A. There was not a point at Tet that anyone in the military thought we were kicking ass. They overran most villages we liberated. It is true they had to eventually retreat because they ran out of men. But no one believed we were kicking ass.

The Author, Bob Kurson then wrote the following Article after interviewing Veterans of the Tet Offensive, including several South Vietnamese Soldiers. Several of those interviewed were Khe Sanh Veterans, Tom Eichler & our Founder Ray W. Stubbe.

THE BATTLE IS OVER

Except in the hearts and minds of those who survived.

"We devastated them during Tet," says a helicopter crew chief from Chicago. "They couldn't stand up to us. We kicked the enemy's ass."

"Look, that's ridiculous," counters retired CBS News anchor Walter Cronkite, long regarded as the most trusted man in America. "We weren't kicking their ass at all. That's a revision of history."

The Tet Offensive-the most dramatic and important episode of the Vietnam War-occurred 30 years ago this weekend, and emotions still boil over. But few dispute that the surprise attacks by the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese on 200 cities in South Vietnam continue to rumple tidy American notions of victory.

Ten years ago, you'd need the library to learn about the Tet Offensive; many of the men who fought still weren't talking. Today, on the 30th anniversary of the battle, things are different.

Today, you can discern admiration in the smoky voice of a Chicago Marine who concedes, "These were not a bunch of ragtags. It was magnificent, magnificently done. Complete silence, not a word was spoken. They fought silently and died without uttering a sound. We never knew we were being overrun."

Today, you can see angry veins bulge from the forehead of a Chicago helicopter crew chief who pounds his desk to insist, "We were unstoppable. Everywhere we went, it was an overwhelming display of how good we were. For the first 10 days it was just carnage. We were ecstatic. We knew we had won. We thought the whole war was over."

Vietnam Veteran Bud Harton stands in a UH-1 Huey Helicopter that is being restored at the Air Classics Museum at Aurora Municipal Airport.

You could always count on Cronkite for an opinion on Tet. Today, 30 years after the battle, you can count on Chicago soldiers for the same.

• • • "Listen to this tape. Guys love this tape. They die laughing. It's hilarious."

Bud Harton has warned you about this white cassette tape, reminded you a couple times that the soldiers who were at Tet can hear things, funny things, on the tape that a newspaper reporter never will.

From the boom box come the unmistakable strains of men among men. Laughing, swearing, Southern drawlers poking fun at Midwestern buddies. One guy keeps practicing a guitar song despite his buddies' negative "reviews." The banter is good-natured, but it's sure not hilarious. You glance to Harton and his pal, another Tet vet, and they aren't laughing, either.

So what's so funny?

Then you hear the explosions. Massive, booming concussions that devastate glass, wood and, one can only presume, flesh. The enemy has struck in the dead of night.

No more guitar, no more teasing. Just the sounds of Americans scrambling for their lives.

Now Harton and his pal are laughing. "This is hilarious!" Harton says. His friend agrees. "When guys who were at Tet hear this, they fall on the floor laughing. Wait ... listen ... now we're firing back."

It is 'an awesome-sounding response. American helicopter engines cough into action, machineguns spit retaliation, sirens cry and rockets zoom with a vengeance.

You want to share in the humor these men are reliving on the tape, but you can only muster a crooked schoolboy grin. "Aren't Americans dying?" you ask.

"Probably," Harton says.

"See, this is why Tet was an overwhelming victory," he explains. "Never mind what Cronkite said. You hear this? The enemy could not stand up to this.

We won that war. We waxed them. We're going to play this tape at our Tet party. The guys will be rolling on the floor. They'll remember this."

America still reels from Tet's political lessons. The United States lost 1,400 men, the enemy 40,000. Yet Tet deeply troubled opinion makers such as Cronkite, who couldn't fathom how the enemy pulled off such an audacious attack, even storming the U.S. Embassy in Saigon. He spoke his mind to 40 million Americans, and Tet became a U.S. disaster.

You expect the men who fought during Tet to describe surprise at the reaction back home or to provide the kind of layered political analysis that comes from 30 years of reflection.

Soon, however, you realize that they haven't spent much time analyzing politics, not do they feel compelled to answer such questions. To these guys, they did their job during Tet, which is to say that they kicked the enemy's behind in a major fashion. If Cronkite didn't get it, they . seem to say with quick shakes of their heads, that was-and still is-his problem.

"Am I a hero? Well, I was there and I did a few things." Hal Fritz is one of only 68 recipients of the Medal of Honor for service in Vietnam. The few things he did with the 11th Armored Cavalry Division defy every instinct that evolution built into sensible human beings.

"I was a platoon leader. I had 28 people with me and seven vehicles, and we were ambushed." Fritz says. "Two of us were killed immediately, and the rest were hurt badly enough so that we struggled to return fire. The enemy was only about 10 feet away .. We could see their faces with the muzzle flashes.

"They tried to rush us, but we managed enough return fire to keep them back. I'm not sure how, since it turns out they were a reinforced company with about 134 men and loads of weapons. The situation didn't look so bright ....

"After a while, I could see a platoon of five American tanks. But they couldn't tell who was American and who was NVA [North Vietnamese Army], since we were all covered with red dust. I had no choice: It was either get to that tank or we'd all perish. So I raced down the road to the lead tank. He had no choice either. He didn't know who I was. So he turned his cannon on me and fired. It blew me into the bushes, but somehow I got back up, made it to the tank and told them quickly what to do, then ran back to my unit . through enemy fire. That turned the tide, and the enemy retreated. That's what I did."

Now 53, Fritz is deputy director for the Illinois Department of Veteran Affairs in Springfield.

His platoon lost only two men that day, but killed 72 enemy soldiers and captured 20 more.

"You know," Fritz says with a chuckle. "It was pretty close. When the enemy retreated, we had less than 100 rounds of ammunition between us. Yeah, that was close."

Ray Stubbe watched hundreds of American teenagers lose limbs, absorb shrapnel and bleed to death on the jungle floors of Vietnam. Somehow, he still has a minister's smiling eyes. The retired Lutheran pastor was a 27-year-old chaplain at Khe Sanh during the Tet Offensive.

On the wooden kitchen table in his Milwaukee home, Stubbe offers for inspection a book he has compiled for the Khe Sanh Veterans Association. It lists the names and stories of those who died defending Khe Sanh.

"So many stories," Stubbe says. "But there's one young kid I remember particularly well: Jonathan Nathaniel Spicer. "Spicer arrived in January, and he looked about 13, very boyish. He came to me, told me he was a conscientious objector. He'd been deceived by recruiters; in those days recruiters told kids anything to get them to Vietnam ..

"I always supported conscientious objectors because I never wanted there to be any doubt they would do what they had to do to protect their fellow Marines. There was absolutely no doubt he was sincere about this; he had never hunted, never been in any fights. I told him I'd help him write petitions.

"A week later, the battle erupts. His first sergeant came to me and said, 'Chaplain, you've got to do something. The other men are beating this fellow up because he won't take up his rifle and clean it.' He asked me to square this guy away. I said, 'Transfer him to me.' I put him in the medical area. When choppers came in, he was one of the fellows who'd move people on stretchers.

"Well, this meek, mild Spicer turned into a real tiger. He would stay out in the field with wounded soldiers even during incoming mortar and rocket attacks. He'd comfort them, even lie over them to protect them. And we saw this constantly. People thought he was crazy.

"On the eighth of March, a mortar round exploded and wounded all the people who were carrying the wounded. Spicer got a piece of shrapnel. in the heart. The doctors did open heart surgery, but he died two weeks later. They gave him a Navy Cross, the second medal to the Medal of Honor, for his bravery. A conscientious objector with a Navy

Stubbe pats the cover of the gray book the way you picture him patting Spicer's back the day they met.

"He's in this book," Stubbe says. "Spicer. The eighth of March."

Tom Eichler still has don't- mess-with-me arms. Even at age 57 and carrying a barrel where his washboard stomach used to be, the Chicago police sergeant's forearms look as if they're wrapped with steel bands and leather. The faded green tattoo on his right arm-"To Die a Marine is to Live Again"- might be the last thing one North Vietnamese soldier ever saw.

Tom Eichler defied close-range fire to replace machineguns and carry wounded Marines while killing enemy soldiers during Tet.

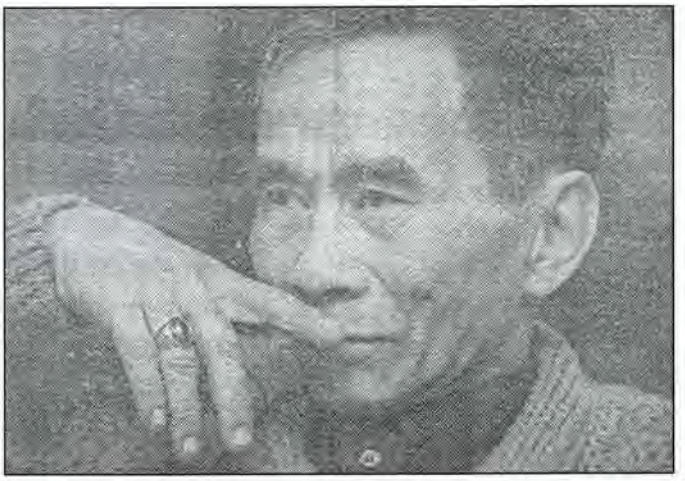
Eichler's heroics in the black fog and confusion of Tet's first morning have been well documented; Those present that day continue to tell Congress about how "Ike" defied close-range enemy fire to replace machineguns and carry wounded Marines to safety while killing enemy soldiers from behind with a grip no human throat could survive. Eichler won the Silver Star that morning, but witnesses won't rest until it's upgraded to the Medal of Honor.

Ask Eichler about those stories, and you hear modest accounts that drift into generalities such as "It was just a battle after that." Ask him point-blank whether he deserves the Medal Of Honor, and he talks instead about his pal Billy Drexel. Bill was my mortar man that night. I'll tell you a humorous story about him." " Eichler's already laughing as he reaches with that thick tattoo arm to remove a framed, yellowed newspaper clipping from his wall.

"Here's Billy," Eichler says, pointing to a man on crutches. "Billy looked at some of the wounded that night, and there was a guy lying there lost both his legs. Billy looked at me; he said-true story, he said, 'Ike, if that ever happens to me, I want you to kill me. I don't want to live like that.'

Some time later, on the next hill 861,-we're only up there about an hour, an incoming mortar takes of both of Billy's legs, below the knee. Before he passed out, the last words out of his mouth, in that crazy Texas drawl of his, he said, 'Ike, is it still there? Can I still [make love]?' He was all tattered and bloody, but I had to look, said, 'Yeah, Billy, you still got it.' He said, '%%@. it, then, I'm going back home.' Talk about heroes. Billy is a hero."

American veterans interviewed for this story were unanimous on two counts. First, that the United States decimated the enemy. Second, that their " South Vietnamese allies fought as, fiercely as any soldiers they'd ever seen.



South Vietnamese veteran Chap Khuc fought alongside American soldiers during some of the Tet Offensive's most difficult battles.

Inside a modest storefront on Broadway sit three South Vietnamese veterans, all current or former officers of the Vietnamese' Veterans Association of Illinois. Each fought alongside Americans during some of Tet's dirtiest battles. Collectively, they spent 24 years doing hard labor in "education" camps after the Americans pulled out of Vietnam.

"You may see this picture from a long time ago," says Chap T, Khuc, 54. Khuc pushes forward an endlessly photocopied image showing him kneeling beside two Americans, studying a map. A prisoner stands handcuffed behind him.

"This is me when I was first lieutenant in Tet Offensive. This is one Viet Cong prisoner here. We are going to investigate him."

Neither version of Khuc-the 24-year-old soldier in the photocopy or the 54-year-old gentleman on the couch, looks as if he takes no for an answer. "Was he cooperative? First of all, no. After a few minutes-" Khuc also says the South Vietnamese came up with a novel way of blunting the attack on Saigon: changing the city's street signs the night before so that the Viet Cong got lost.

Kiet Vo, 51, is president of the Vietnamese Veterans Association. In 1966, his parents forbade him from joining the air force, and instead sent him to college to learn English. But things changed after Tet.

"Tet changed my mind," Vo says. "The enemy killed a lot of civilians in Hue. That affected our ideas. I think that they are very, very cruel, not like I thought before. This is different to me. After my final examination, I don't mind if I fail or if I pass; I join the air force again, and this time my parents agree."

Qua Dran, 61, wants you to see a photograph before you leave the building. He guides you to a framed shot of the three friends shaking hands with Gen. William Westmoreland. You cannot help but be touched by the pride that lingers in these men 30 years after .Tet, but you also cannot help reminding them that the Americans left them for capture and inhumane treatment by the enemy. Surely, you insist, they must have some anger.

"No, no, no," Dran says, stepping forward toward the photograph and pointing toward Westmoreland.

"He told us we didn't lose."

A SMALL BUT WONDERFUL REUNION

By Tom Hanks B CO 1/26

I spent a weekend with two former Marine Vietnam platoon mates in FL. It was our second anniversary. Prior to last year we hadn't seen or communicated in 45 years. The internet helped us reunite.

I put a web site together with photos of our brief weekend in Florida. It's just pretty pictures and some beautiful museum pieces. No war shots. We are very close friends and we fought and almost died together, on more than one occasion. We all eventually spent time fighting the NVA at Khe Sanh.

The big guy is Bob Falk and the other is Bob DeVenezia, both machine gunners. I carried what is commonly called a bazooka, combat knife and a 45 Caliber pistol. I was also, a 106 Recoilless Rifle gunner on top of hill 881 outside of Khe Sanh, and I was trained in plastic C-4 explosives and flame throwers for killing bunkers and people.

My job description was 0351 "Anti Tank Man". Since the enemy didn't use tanks I had to take out bunkers and bring in air fire with my "bazooka's" White Phosphorus" rounds, and a do a few other fun things. The three of us trained together at Camp Pendleton and shipped over on the U.S.S. Iwo Jima LPH-2 helicopter assault ship. Our first 60 days off shore we made various helicopter assaults on Viet Cong positions in the south, Mekong Delta, etc

Finally we left the ship, settled in and built a company base near Hill 55 - 50 miles from Da Nang. In early 1967 they broke us all up, most were sent to other units as replacement for wounded or dead Marines, and we all headed for the worst place on earth at that time, Khe Sanh. There are 120 photos on my weekend reunion site and they all have a file number beneath them if you have a question about one, don't hesitate to ask. These are not military photos, just 3 old men having fun in Florida. Pictures are numbered, just look beneath them. Below are some brief descriptions of a few. The first group were taken while Bob DeVenezia and I were in Saint Augustine

Photos: 123 and 124 were the highlight of the trip. Bob DeVenezia had these wonderful gifts made for me and Bob Falk. They have all our awards, and unit patches. There are a few citations missing but they are on order and the paper name will be replaces with a bronze name tag. In photo 124, DeVenezia had the famous author and poet, Bob Chapin, also a wounded Vietnam Veteran with a Bronze Star. sign a copy for me and Bob Falk of his famous poem "The Wall" The Wall was displayed in The White House in 1983 and as a result received instant success when President Ronald Reagan personally honored Bob for his contribution to all Vietnam Veterans. To date, tens of thousands of copies have been sold. I hope you enjoy the web site pics of our fantastic weekend in Florida. http://bikeatlanta.net/tommyhanks/th/Reunion2012/index.htm

The dramatic story of Cimon & Pera (also called Roman Charity, or The Grecian Daughter, among others) has been a stock subject, although a marginal one, in Western Art since the Renaissance. Based on international cataloged paintings by subject matter, Cimon & Pera has well over two hundred entries, including a painting by Peter Paul Rubens (1577-1640).
Included here are examples of how other artists have interpreted Cimon & Pera:

A FEW PICTURES FROM THE LIGHTNER MUSEUM

MARINES DO NOT FORGET

By Donna Elliott

Dennis Chomel has been dead for close to 45 years. His mother and father, who never got to bury their son, are also gone. So is a brother Gary, who before his death had ordered a headstone made bearing Dennis' name. He had no grave on which to place that monument but he always hoped there would be a day when that opportunity would come to pass.

Dennis' only surviving siblings are a sister, Angela Higgins, who until recently had lived in Columbus but has since moved to northern Indiana and a brother Kirk, who lives in Guam. They were both children when the 1965 Columbus High School graduate was reported to be missing in action in Vietnam.

In a way that missing in action label was a bureaucratic designation, given because there was no body recovered. Eyewitness accounts surrounding the incident in which the young Marine private first class, six others on his squad and four crew members on the helicopter they were aboard on June 11, 1967 "disappeared" were pretty convincing.

The chopper had crashed in a hot zone known as Quang Tri province. The explosion that consumed the aircraft after it hit the ground was so devastating that there was no chance anyone could have survived.

Eventually the Defense Department changed the status of Dennis and the others on the helicopter to "Killed in Action, Body Never Recovered."

Still, the absence of any physical remains cast a lifelong pall over the Chomel family.

Bringing back the remains of those casualties from the Vietnam conflict was a national priority for several years but as times has passed and other wars have had to be fought, the memories of Dennis, his squad and all those who never returned from 'Nam have faded.

There's one small group of men, however, for whom those memories are still very fresh. You could almost say they're seared into their minds. They were members of another Marine Corps unit that was assigned to the same area in which Dennis' squad was wiped out.

Ray Sullivan, today a newspaper publisher in Clovis, N.M. was a member of that second squad and he had contacted me earlier this week in an effort to find the contact information on Dennis' surviving brother and sister. He and the few surviving members of the squad plan to hold a reunion later this year in Washington, D.C. They want Angela and Kirk to be a part of their gathering.

Kirk has never met Angela or Kirk. Actually, he never met Dennis but there is a kinship in these two Marine squads that transcends familiarity They have an unspoken bond which is as strong today as it was almost 45 years ago. It was forged in an unspeakable tragedy of war.

After the helicopter on which Dennis was aboard went down, efforts were made to send other units into the area to retrieve the victims but enemy resistance was fierce and those plans had to be abandoned.

It would be 18 days before a unit was given orders to go into that area. Ray Sullivan was a member of that squad.

It was a small team of a dozen or so Marines and they had to be inserted several miles from the crash site. The first few miles were covered in uneventful fashion. It was on the second day of their mission that they reached a point where the downed helicopter was almost visible.

They never got there. Ray and his squad had walked into an ambush. A firefight resulted with devastating results. Four men in Ray's unit were killed, seven others were wounded. Ray was one of them.

Relief forces were able to pull the decimated unit out, their original mission unfulfilled.

In some ways it would be understandable had the members of the retrieval unit felt a strong measure of bitterness about their fate. They had been sent to retrieve dead bodies and they became casualties themselves.

The opposite happened. The men in Ray's unit developed a bond with Dennis and his comrades that is especially understandable to Marines. Part of it has to do with the deeply held tradition in the Corps that you never leave anyone behind.

"It didn't matter that most of us didn't know them personally," Ray said earlier this week. "It's what we had to do."

Ray and other members of his squad stayed in touch with each other after the war and they began to hold small reunions to relive old times. But they had something much deeper to do than rehash old stories. They set out on a mission to make sure that those they couldn't bring back were never forgotten.

Ray started the process shortly after a reunion at the Vietnam Wall in 1987. One of his buddies had acquired a list of the men who went down in that chopper crash.

With that list he set out on a mission to personally visit the families of the 11 victims. In 1998 he traveled to Florida where Denny's parents were living and talked to them about their son and his unit's efforts to bring him back home.

He made a point of staying in contact with the Pentagon department assigned to recover remains from the Vietnam conflict and in 2006 he received the word he had waited 39 years for. The Pentagon had reclaimed and identified a set of remains as belonging to Marine Pfc. James Widener, a member of Denny Chomel's unit. In letters to his family in Columbus, Dennis referred to Widener as his best friend.

Some time later, Ray learned that a second set of remains recovered along with those of Widener was positively identified as those of a second member of Denny's squad, Jim Mosier. Ray attended the funerals of Mosier and Widener and invited their family members to a reunion of his squad.

The group will be meeting again this year at the Vietnam Wall in Washington. There will be five members of Ray's squad, and he's hoping that family members of the doomed unit will be on hand as well.

They will gather at a special place on the wall, in front of Panels 21E and 22E. "The names are all there," Ray said earlier this week. "Denny and all of his guys are all together on 21E. The four who were killed from my unit are on 22E."

"EVERY GENERATION HAS ITS HEROES"

...a place to find peace and be with those who gave us peace...

The Bartholomew County Memorial for Veterans is a tribute to all those, living and dead, who answered the nation's call in the conflicts of the 20th and 21st century.

The founding members Veterans Memorial

Located on the south lawn of the Bartholomew County Courthouse, imposing limestone columns serve as sentinels of honor for those of Bartholomew County who made the supreme sacrifice while in service of their country.

The names of 174 men and 1 woman are inscribed at the bases of the 40-foot columns so that their memory will be perpetuated for this and future generations.

The center columns contain messages from and about them, poignant reminders that they were more than names and numbers.

The columns are the centerpiece of a park dedicated not just to those who gave their lives but to all who proudly wore the uniforms of our nation.

The Atterbury-Bakalar Air Museum staff and the 95ers were tasked to raise a large amount of funds from the community to help build the memorial. This group has been the prime mover for many programs and ceremonies conducted at the memorial park including Memorial Day and Veterans Day programs.

As you walk through the Bartholomew County Memorial for Veterans you see the names and letters of the 175 who made the supreme sacrifice while in the service of our country. A visit to the Memorial is an emotional experience for most everyone who walk by the limestone columns. A quiet, personal visit at night is especially poignant.Jeanne

HUNDREDS HONOR BRAVO COMPANY HERO AT GEORGIA CEREMONY

By Bill Jayne
B CO 1/26

On May 26, 2011, hundreds of people gathered at the Georgia Veterans Memorial Park in Conyers, Georgia, to honor the memory of PFC Ted Britt, a Bravo Company Marine who died heroically attacking the enemy on March 30, 1968 (see "Red Clay" issue 78, Summer 2011, for coverage of Bravo's battles in February and March 1968).

The setting for the ceremony was extraordinary. The Georgia Veterans Memorial Park is an impressive, memorial amphitheater on the grounds of Black Shoals Park in Rockdale County, Georgia, just east of Atlanta. The ceremony was, if anything, even more impressive than the setting. Bravo Company veterans gathered and made presentations in the honored presence of PFC Britt's mother and younger brother, Tim, a retired Army National Guard General. Medal of Honor recipient Col. Harvey "Barney" Barnum, USMC, presented the keynote address. Marines of the Marine Logistics Center in Albany, Georgia, provided the music, presented the colors and attended in large numbers. A C-130 and a vintage UH-1 Huey helicopter provided flyovers.

The Atlanta Vietnam Veterans Business Association (AVVBA) sponsored the event. Each year AVVBA honors a native of the Atlanta area who gave his life in service to the nation in Vietnam. AVVBA member Wayne Witter proposed the memorial to Ted Britt after meeting Bravo Company veterans Ben Long, Ken Korkow and Bill Jayne at a retreat on behalf of active-duty Marines at the Korkow ranch in South Dakota. The ceremony and bronze plaque honoring Ted Britt marked the 25th consecutive year of AVVBA's admirable tradition.

AVVBA heard of Bravo Company's service at Khe Sanh and read of Ted Britt's heroism in his Silver Star citation: "While reorganizing to continue the attack, his squad was suddenly pinned down by hostile mortar and machine gun fire. Realizing the seriousness of the situation, Private First Class Britt alertly pinpointed the primary source of fire and unhesitatingly left his covered position to assault the automatic weapons emplacement. Fearlessly moving across the fire-swept terrain, he reached the fortified bunker and, delivering a heavy volume of accurate fire, killed four enemy soldiers and silenced the hostile fire. Continuing his determined efforts, he launched another attack against an enemy fighting hole, and while boldly advancing, he was fatally wounded." The Atlanta area veterans marshaled their resources and executed a memorable recognition ceremony.

LtCol. Ken Pipes, former Bravo Company commander led a contingent that included Mike "Mac" McCauley, Ted Britt's best buddy at Khe Sanh, Peter Weiss, Ted's platoon commander, Bill Jayne, a member of the platoon, Ted Golab, artillery F/O from A Battery, 1/13, who served with Bravo Company, and Tom Hanks, an original Bravo Company veteran who came over with BLT 1/26 on the USS Iwo Jima. Peter Weiss and Bill Jayne both spoke during the ceremony, with Bill discussing the Khe Sanh campaign and siege to set the stage, and Peter detailing Bravo's attack on 30 March, 1968.

Later, in an emotional presentation, Mike McCauley gave the family a Bravo Company flag that had flown at the USS Arizona memorial as well as several impressive, handmade pieces of woodwork made by Mike with great care and skill. Mike, a Boston native, spoke movingly of the way he and Ted teased each other about their accents and shared their hopes and fears. Mike also presented the family with an enlarged photo of Ted's squad (Mike, a PFC, was the squad leader that day). The photo is the one that is seen as the "cover" for Ken and Betty Rodgers' documentary about Bravo Company. The family and Bravo Company members also received red and gold baseball caps from Mike that say "Bravo Company 1/26 Khe Sanh" on the crown.

To all Khe Sanh veterans, if you find yourself in the Atlanta area, it's well worth the effort to visit the Georgia Veterans Memorial Park and reflect on the plaque honoring PFC Ted Britt. The memorial park is on the grounds of Black Shoals Park, 3001 Black Shoals road, Conyers, Georgia. It's off I-20 (exit 78) east of Atlanta.

"NOT ALL COMBAT IS HELL" THE BATTLE AT HAI-VAN PASS

By Jim Dalto
K CO 3/26

After leaving Khe Sanh I still had 10 months left on my Vietnam Tour. While guarding a bridge just outside of Danang, things got awful boring. Days stretched into weeks and still nothing happened along the highway. I do not remember even a traffic accident. Being on the line so long without any action, was a unique experience. It became very boring. But boring in a way that I found I could live with. I did a lot of recovering in that time; fattening myself up, sleeping as much as I could. Good as life was there, I knew deep down in my Grunt heart it couldn't last. Eventually, Murphy's Law would kick in, and something would happen to ruin it all. Sure enough, one day something did happen ... the Battle of Hai-Yan Pass.

The day started out typically enough. Just after breakfast, three of us ... Nanny, a BNG named Priddy, and myself ... were sent up to the last bunker in our Squad's area. We were to spend the entire day, guarding that particular sector of road, just like we'd done for weeks. Nanny, however, had other plans.

Within five minutes of our arrival at the bunker, he announced that he was going to hitch-hike down into Danang for the day. Priddy immediately volunteered to accompany him.

I didn't argue with them about it, even though it meant that I'd be alone at the bunker all day. It didn't bother me a bit. As soon as they started thumbing their way down the road, I crawled up on top of the bunker and quickly went to sleep.

I slept, basking in the sun, until lunchtime. I didn't want to miss lunch; our daily hot meal trucked down from the field kitchen at the top of the Pass.

After lunch, exhausted by the exertion, I climbed back on top of the bunker and feel back to sleep. An hour or so later, I was awakened by the noise of a huge convoy moving on the road. The convoy was miles long and too noisy for continuing my nap.

The convoy contained tanks, APCs, and ARVN armored vehicles. I noticed two six-bys suddenly slow down, then swerve out of traffic and pull into the turnaround next to my bunker.

About 30 Marines debarked. They were all attired in starched states-side utilities complete with blocked Soft covers.

A gunnery sergeant seemed to be in charge. I watched as he quickly lines up the men alongside the road and ordered them to load their weapons for test firing.

I noticed most all of them had M-14s fitted with Selectors for automatic firing. The gunny was the only one with an M-16. He the looked over the steep edge of the drop off on the side of the road, and made sure the Marines were locked and loaded.

He grinned when he saw all the big, black boulders scattered below him, jutting up out of the greenery.

He yelled at his men, "Let's ding those rocks" then put his 16 in his shoulder and started firing full-auto, his men immediately following suit.

I relaxed as they started firing, figuring, correctly, that they were just a bunch of new guys firing their weapons for the sheer hell of it. They were having a regular party, chattering and laughing like fools as their fire chipped white pieces out of the rocks.

One of the Marines fired his M-14 on full auto while standing on a small rock. He fell backwards every time he pulled the trigger.

I sat on top of my bunker and watched them cavorting around, smiling at their show of ineptitude. After they had run off at least three magazines, I noticed something ... M-14s fired full-auto made the same "Kak-kak-kak!" sound as an AK-47. With that one M-16 firing it sounded like a real firefight.

As this thought entered my brain, I swiveled my gaze a bit afield, wondering if anyone else had noticed the same thing. Sure enough several of the Army trucks pulled over and began firing down the same slope. Several of the tanks also stopped and brought their guns to bear on the same slope.

"Stupid Army" I thought to myself, and grinned at them. Then I noticed column of men running into sight around the curve 150 yards up the road from me. It was Guerrero and his Squad, complete with an M-60.

They also took up positions and started firing down the slope. I cracked up completely when the M-60 opened up and the rocket team started to break out their LAWS. The radioman began calling in a fire mission and two huey gunships arrived on the scene and began firing rockets into the rock filled slope.

I could not stop laughing, but the gunny who started the whole thing must have realized his mistake. He hurriedly ordered his men back onto the trucks and sped off down the road.

Guerrero noticed them preparing to leave, so he got up and ran down the road, waving and yelling at them to stop, but they were long gone before he'd covered half the distance. Guerrero stopped and watched them go for a minute, then he noticed me rolling on the ground next to my bunker. He immediately assumed that I was hit, yelled for a Corpsman, and ran over checking me for wounds.

It took him a few minutes to realize that the only thing the matter with me was that I was helpless with laughter. As soon as he realized that, he started to shake me, asking me where was the enemy.

"Isn't no enemy!" I finally managed to gasp out, "damn' pogues was test firing!"

Guerrero looked at me for a minute as the situation slowly became clear in his mind. He slowly turned and surveyed the entire scene ... the trucks, the APCs, the tanks, his Squad, the mortars, the Quad-40, and the Hueys ... all blowing the hell out of some completely innocent uninhabited rocks and trees. His jaw sagged down like it'd come unhinged; too shocked to curse. It took the roar of two approaching Phantoms to snap him out of it.

The sight of them starting to circle overhead, galvanized him into action. He dropped me and started running up the road as fast as his legs could carry" him, yelling "No more! No more!" at the Phantoms as I clutched my ribs in agony.

Guerrero's Squad didn't even notice him until he was close enough to scream in their ears. As they finally stopped firing, Guerrero clawed the horn away from the radioman and frantically began to yell check-fires trying to stop the Phantoms before they made their runs.

He managed to succeed at that, but it took him another 10 minutes to get all the firing stopped. It took even more time to get traffic moving on the road.

A few minutes after the road cleared enough for traffic to move, most of the Lifers in the Company converged on my bunker. They were all mad as hell, demanding to know what the hell I'd been firing at.

It took over a half hour to carefully explain everything to them. They just didn't believe me. I finally had to break down my M-79 and actually show them it hadn't been fired in weeks, before they'd believe me. It was the only thing that saved my young ass. It was tense City for me, all those Lifers glaring at me with Court Martial in their eyes.

By the time Nanny & Priddy wandered back from Danang, things had returned to normal. I was back on top of my bunker, and the Lifers had huffed back up to the top of the Pass.

"Hey Dalto ... how'd it go today?" Nanny called as he and Priddy walked up to the bunker.

"Aw, not too bad!" I replied, "Little bitta firefight, but nothin' serious."

"Whaddya mean, firefight? Anyone hit?"

"Nah ..... I replied, then lazily pointed down the slope, "just a couple-dozen confirmed VC rocks."

Nanny's gaze followed my pointing finger, his eyes widening when he saw all those dinged-up rocks and craters on the slope below us. After a minute, he climbed up on the bunker, sat on my chest, and made me tell him the entire tale.

MINI REUNION OF ECHO CO 2/26 HILL 861A AT MAJOR EARLE G. BREEDING'S HOME

By Dianne Jackson

The week of April, 2012, a group of Marines from Echo Company 2/26, friends and family gathered at the home of Major Earle G. Breeding and his wife Pat, or as the major calls her, "Sergeant Major Patricia Ann." In attendance were Major Breeding, wife Pat, daughter Cheri, and her husband, Skeet, Jim Kaylor, Bill Maves, Larry McCartney, Jim Carmichael, David and Rita McCall, Luis "Cisco" Reyes and his wife Sandy, Albert Miranda, Tom Strain, Lt. Don Shanley, Lt. Col. Shawn ????, Dianne Jackson, County Commissioner Tom Battin, and Free Press reporter Sue Hutchison.

Major Breeding had two ground rules for the four day get together: no discussion of politics and tell no lies. There were many stories of action, fear, bravery and pathos shared with bone chilling and heart warming details, mostly surrounding February 5, 1968, the day Hill 861A was attacked heavily beginning at 0300. A fierce firefight, artillery, bombing and hand to hand combat battle occurred and lasted until about 0730. In a previous quote regarding the incident Major Breeding said the following:

Capt Earle Breeding Company E, 2/26

Marines on the point of the 1st Platoon sector passed the word, "They're coming through the wire." That news spread up the trenchline to the right and left. All the way along the trenchline and up the chain of command, Echo Company was hearing, "They're coming through the wire." Nobody said which part of the wire, and nobody could see anything. The average Marine thought the NVA were coming through the wire in front of him because he had heard it from the guy next to him. So, all of a sudden, within seconds of one another, I got the word from all three of my platoon commanders. It sounded to me like they were coming through the wire all around the hill. I thought I was getting hit from all sides at once. I had the troops throw gas grenades, and I called for all the artillery support the combat base could give me.

My favorite story was one told by Major Breeding. When he was flown out of Khe Sanh on March 8, 1968, he was taken to Dong Ha. Upon arrival, Major Breeding asked for three things...a shower, a clean uniform, and a glass of scotch "in no particular order." His current "uniform" consisted of a green utility shirt, black Vietnamese peasant pantaloons, and no "scivies". The private at the desk of the uniform exchange post informed Major Breeding that he couldn't issue him an exchange as he didn't have the proper garments to return. Major Breeding answered "I don't think so" or "words to that effect, the first word beginning with an "f" and the second word beginning with a "y".

Again the private refused, at which point Major Breeding lunged over the counter, grabbed the man by the shirt collar and put a "45" to his head. A Sergeant standing nearby most intelligently said "Give him what he wants."

All those in attendance were there to show their deep and abiding respect for Major Breeding. I asked several people "What is it that makes him so special?" Some of the answers:

"I was willing to lay down my life for him that night because that was my job. I admired his leadership and professionalism. Because he was an enlisted man he knew how to take care of enlisted men. I am here today because of this man." Albert Miranda

[This was the first post-Vietnam gathering that Albert has attended.]

"He took care of his troops His primary concern was accomplishing the mission. How can I best do my job with the least amount of bullshit." Larry McCartney

"My father died when I was twelve. Major Breeding was like a father figure to me. When I showed up on the Hill there were dead bodies everywhere. I was scared to death. Major Breeding came to greet me. 'Do your job, remember your training, do not fall asleep on me and everything will be O.K.' He could calm you down. He personally checked the lines everyday and when he did, he would make idle chit-chat. You knew he was in control and it inspired confidence." Luis "Cisco" Reyes

On the second day of the reunion, Lincoln County

Commissioner, Tom Battin presented a written commendation signed by all the county commissioners which was dedicated to Major Breeding. He cited the major's extraordinary bravery and disregard for his personal safety and some of the specifics that are stated in Major Breeding's Silver Star citation. The Commissioner also thanked all the men of Echo 2/26 for their courage and their service.

Afterward, Major Breeding said a few words. With watery eyes he told the members of Echo 2/26 that they were the finest men he has ever known. He is proud to have had the chance to serve with them. Major Breeding thanked Lt. Don Shanley for "saving his butt" through his extraordinary leadership. The previous day Lt. Shanley had pulled out a small pocket sized notebook that was his Lieutenant's handwritten daily log. As I leafed through the daily record I asked why some of the names were crossed out. Don said those were the ones that were either KIA or WIA. He flipped to one page and pointed to a name...David McCall. David was injured on the hill and as a result is an amputee. David and his wife Sandy were at the reunion. This was the first time Lieutenant Shanley had seen any of his men since 1968.

In addition, Major Breeding mentioned Bill Maves as "the man who almost got him killed." Actually, the story behind the statement is that Major Breeding asked Bill, who was manning the radio, if they could bomb at the bottom of the Hill, which was about 40 yards from their position. Bill said "it can be done." Major Breeding..."Then do it." Bill called in for an airstrike but was told the order had to come from someone of higher rank as it was too dangerous. Major Breeding grabbed the radio and aggressively pressed the issue and finally the strike was called. Before the bombs dropped, Major Breeding had moved everyone back up the hill except a select skeleton crew including himself and Bill Maves. Several minutes later, the bombs dropped and the secondary effects rained huge boulders down on their trenchline, but none were injured. That instance basically described "The Skipper's" attitude...if you are going to fight a war then by God you are going to fight a war.

In addition to thanking the men of Echo 2/26, Major Breeding said "There isn't a day that goes by when you all don't think about Hill 861 Alpha. Privately he told me later..."make that an hour."

Thank you from the depths of our collective heart, to Major Breeding, his beautiful wife Patricia, and his loving daughter, Cheri, for their gracious hospitality and hard work. For those who weren't there, you missed out on some fabulous home made ham and beans, peach cobbler, decadent chocolate cake (from scratch), and the company of one of the finest Marine officers in history.

RESOLUTION NO. 2011-36
RECOGNIZING MAJOR EARLE G. BREEDING AND ECHO COMPANY SECOND BATTALION, TWENTY SIXTH, MARINES, THIRD MARINE DIVISION

WHEREAS, ,The Board of County Commissioners of Lincoln County wishes to recognize Major Earle G. Breeding and Company E, Second Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, Third Marine Division, who are conducting a reunion of the surviving members of Company E in Ruidoso, Lincoln County, New Mexico, April 23-24, 2012; and

WHEREAS, Major Earle G. Breeding 'is the recipient of the Silver Star for conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action while serving as Commanding Officer of Company E, Second Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, Third Marine Division, in connection with combat operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam.; and

WHEREAS, During the early morning hours of February 5, 1968, Company E was occupying a defensive position on Hill 861 near the Khe Sanh Combat Base when the perimeter came under a fierce attack by a North Vietnamese Army battalion supported by artillery and mortar fire; and

WHEREAS, Major Breeding re-deployed his Marines to strengthen the perimeter at the point of heaviest contact and coordinated the delivery of a large volume of concentrated fire at the enemy. During the ensuing firefight, he repeatedly disregarded his own safety as he moved from one position to another, directing- and encouraging his men. While his Marines pinned the advancing enemy down on the defensive wire with accurate small arms fire, Major Breeding advanced to a dangerously exposed vantage point and directed close-in artillery and mortar fires with expert precision, completely disrupting the organized attack, forcing the enemy to withdraw; and

WHEREAS, By his courage, extraordinary initiative, and unflagging devotion to duty at great personal risk, Major Breeding contributed significantly, to the accomplishment of his unit's mission and upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED, the Board of County Commissioners of Lincoln County wishes to recognize Major Earle G. Breeding and Company E, welcome them to our community, and honor them and those of their unit who gave the ultimate sacrifice in the defense of our great country.

PASSED, APPROVED AND ADOPTED this 17th day of April 2012. Board of-Commissioners, Lincoln County, State of New Mexico

SALUTE TO VETERANS:
" In Vietnam, I should have been dead 20 times over"
Written by Susan Canfora
Special to the times
Edited by Ray Updike

RAY UPDIKE
A CO 2ND PLT 3RD
ANTI TANK BN ONTOS

OCEAN PINES -- Sometimes Ray Updike thinks he should just write a book, record all the memories of Vietnam in the late 1960s, the horrors, the body parts, explosions, scenes he still clearly recalls. But he doubts anybody would believe it.

Ray Poses With His Honors

Youthful and talkative, the Ocean Pines resident is proud to have served his country, enlisting as a teenager influenced by the John Wayne image of the 1950s, a strong, patriotic man stout-heartedly facing battle.

And that's exactly where the Harrisburg, Pa., native ended up, in the heart of battle.

Updike remembers those tough moments, shaking his head as he sat in the office of the home he shares with his wife, Angela. Suffering from heart disease, ringing in the ears and muscle pain, he was exposed to Agent Orange and advised by his doctor to retire at age 53, 10 years ago. His heart couldn't tolerate a stressful lifestyle.

"In Vietnam, I should have been dead 20 times over," he said, giving a little laugh like he still finds it unbelievable. For a long time, Updike didn't speak about his service.

"I really didn't talk about Vietnam for 25 years," he said, leading a guest to a framed essay written by his 8-year-old grandson, Quinn Raymond Morrow of Roswell, Ga., calling Poppy his hero for fighting in Vietnam.

In conversation, Updike's memories come tumbling. The time on Jan. 1, 1968, that 40,000 enemies surrounded American soldiers. The king cobra snake he hit in the back of head and killed, the second one he saw. The rat as big as a pet cat that walked over Updike's chest as he dozed. He didn't have to open his eyes. He knew what it was and was grateful not to be bitten like some soldiers were. Attracted by decaying bodies, rats were prevalent.

"Khe Sanh was located about 150 miles , by road, northwest of Danang. We were just below the DMZ. It was a mountainous area. In January it would get so cold, if you left a container of water outside it would freeze overnight. Khe Sanh was one of the heaviest area sprayed with Agent Orange because of the thick foliage."

One of his most memorable experiences was, at the end of February 1968 while going on R&R." My lieutenant of second platoon and myself waited at the turnaround, at the west end of the runway, for the C-123 that was landing. We were told that the plane would not stop, be ready to run and jump in at the turnaround. We ran and jumped in while the tailgate was down and the plane still moving. We dove into the plane on top of 10-12 body bags. The tailgate went up. The plane traveled about 150 yds and a mortar round hit and the left prop began smoking & burning. The plane continued down the runway and lifted off. We then took enemy machine gun fire that shot up the rear of the plane, there were bullets flying everywhere.

Despite a burning engine, an Air Force Sergeant said we were still going to make it to Danang. In flight, Updike's lieutenant grabbed a bag he carried containing rosary beads.

"He started putting them on us and on himself. The engine was burning but we were still going. ... When we landed at Danang, there were about 10 yellow crash crew trucks following us down the runway, spraying the plane with foam. We had to exit the plane through the front since the machine gun fire had disabled the hydraulic system that operated the tailgate. I got out of that plane, I kissed the ground. I wore that rosary the next six months. I never took it off," he said, holding a little plastic bag that now contains the beads, still stained with red clay.

"We had incoming all the time. Mortars, rockets & artillery. A mortar landed right next to me and it didn't blow up. I'm telling you, I should have been dead 20 times over," he said, recalling the day an explosion caused shrapnel to spray a buddy's head and back. Updike was thrown back about 8 feet and thinks the roar led to the tinnitus he now suffers, but he wasn't injured.

After he enlisted, Updike went to boot camp at Parris Island, S.C., about 12 weeks of an often brutal experience.

"I thought I was in hell. People would not believe how bad it was. They were abusive as hell, but it prepared me for going to war. If I would have been taken as a prisoner of war, I could have survived anything. What I went through at Khe Sanh, I was thankful for that training," he said.

After boot camp, he had infantry training at Camp Geiger in Camp Lejeune, N.C., then was sent to Camp Pendleton in California for Ontos tank training. In August 1967 he landed in Danang, and departed for "A" CO, 3rd Anti-Tank BN,. He was in Khe Sanh from Aug. 12, 1967, until July 5, 1968. And was on the last convoy out of Khe Sanh. He spent the last 2 months of his tour at Con Thien, before departing Vietnam on September 11, 1968.

"There were times I was so scared I was shaking," Updike said. "Rockets & Mortars coming in. We're wearing gas masks. The Vietnamese had these screaming 122 mm rockets. They were so loud you couldn't believe it. Then there was silence. Then the explosion. I will take that sound to my grave. You would have to be scared. You do stuff in combat you would never do. I've seen guys blown in half."

Continuing his four-year enlisted period after Vietnam, he worked in an office at Camp Lejeune for a few months before being assigned as a top secret security guard for the president's chopper. At that time, Richard M. Nixon was president.

Following discharge, Updike worked in Pennsylvania in a military depot before starting his 30-year career with Bell of Pennsylvania, later Bell Atlantic and now Verizon. He retired in 2001 and is now involved with American Legion Post # 166, in Ocean City, MD, collecting & delivering clothing for homeless veterans.

"You think about those things. I was in hell for six months and I was in pure hell. Somebody was trying to kill me every day. But we had a lot of good times, too, in Vietnam, laughing with those guys," he said, nodding. "It made me who I am today. I appreciate everything I get. If I was 19, I'd go to Afghanistan and fight for my country, even in the condition I'm in today."

ANTHONY S. TISLER,
KHE SANH VETERAN
F CO 2/26

" MY CHOICE"

It was either play college football or go to war.

"I chose war," said Anthony S. Tisler, who will be inducted into the Ohio Military Hall of Fame for Valor on Friday in Columbus

"About 10 or 20 of us went down and joined the Marine Corps on July 4, 1967," he said.

Tisler was an offensive lineman and captain of the 1966 Campbell Memorial High School football team, which featured future college and professional football player Bob Babich.

Tisler said he had offers to play football from The Ohio State University, the University of Michigan and Youngstown State University but chose instead to enlist in the Marines."But we all wanted to go fight — that was the whole thing. We were gung-ho," he said.

Tisler quickly found himself in Vietnam, where he was awarded the Navy Commendation Medal with "V" for valor "for heroic achievement" in saving the lives of several Marines on April 7, 1968, while on a search-and-destroy mission assigned to secure Hill 700 near the Khe Sanh Combat Base.

According to his citation, Lance Cpl. Tisler was a fire-team leader with Co. F, 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, 3rd Marine Division, when his unit came under heavy mortar and automatic-weapons fire from a large, well-entrenched North Vietnamese Army force. Tisler saw several wounded Marines lying "dangerously exposed to hostile fire" and left his covered position and survived enemy fire to bring the casualties to a less-exposed position and "skillfully treated their wounds." But Tisler, who retired from Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. in April 1982, does not consider himself a hero. "The heroes are the ones who died," he said.

Nonetheless, he said tears came to his eyes when he received the call from the Military Hall of Fame for Valor telling him he was chosen to be among the Class of 2012 inductees.

"I feel real honored. I never thought I would get it," he said. Tisler has always had tough jobs.

At Sheet & Tube, he was a billet roller, turning the steel as it came out of the furnace, and a heater helper. Tisler, who started in the steel mill in 1969 when he returned and was discharged from the Marines, said working in the steel mill was worse than Vietnam. But his experience in Vietnam was anything but pleasant. He suffered shrapnel wounds three times. He was hit in the right thigh and head in the Battle of Hill 700 in April 1968. "We went days without eating much more than a few wild onions. We lost a lot of weight. We had to go back the next day to get the bodies. There were rats on the bodies, and they jumped all over us," said Tisler, who is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder and has 100 percent disability through the Department of Veterans Affairs.

His right foot and thigh were injured in another Hill battle in May 1968; and shrapnel hit his right hand and buttocks in November or December 1968, when his unit was ambushed near the Rock Pile.

The Rock Pile, an outcropping near the former demilitarized zone of South Vietnam reachable only by helicopter, was an important Army and Marine Corps observation post and artillery base from 1966 to 1968.

Tisler was point man when his unit was involved in an attempt to take Hill 700 from North Vietnamese forces."That's probably why I lived. They let me through so they could ambush the main patrol," he said. Most of the patrol was killed, with only eight or nine men left. "I asked myself what am I doing here? How did I get here and how am I going to get home?" he said. Tisler, married to the former Joann Berardi, a graduate of Western Reserve High School in Berlin Center, is a member of Disabled American Veterans Chapter 2 in Mahoning County and Tri-State Marine Corps League Detachment 494. He has two stepchildren, Michael Senchesak of Columbus and Nicole DeWitt of Youngstown, and a granddaughter, Theresa Senchesak. He is the son of the late Joseph Sr. and Anna Tisler. His mother, of Campbell, died Tuesday.

He has three brothers, the late Frank, who served in the Marines; and George Jr. and Joseph, both of Campbell. After leaving Vietnam, Tisler spent time rehabilitating from his wounds in the states and trained officers at Marine Corps Base at Quantico, Va. He also played a year of football for the Quantico team. When he was discharged in June 1970 at age 20, Tisler was highly decorated and a sergeant.

In addition to the Navy Commendation Medal with "V" for valor and three Purple Hearts, he had received the Combat Action Ribbon, the National Defense Medal, Vietnamese Service Medal, Vietnamese Campaign Medal and Presidential Unit Citation.

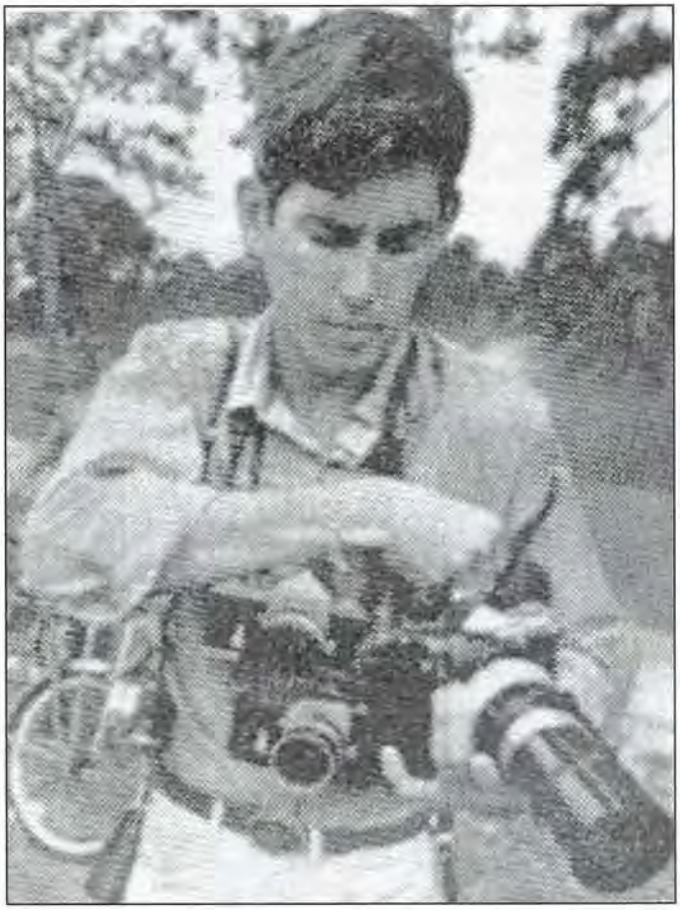
"I'm not sorry I went to Vietnam. I was proud to go fight for my country and proud to be a Marine," he said.

THE DUSTY AGONY OF KHE SANH

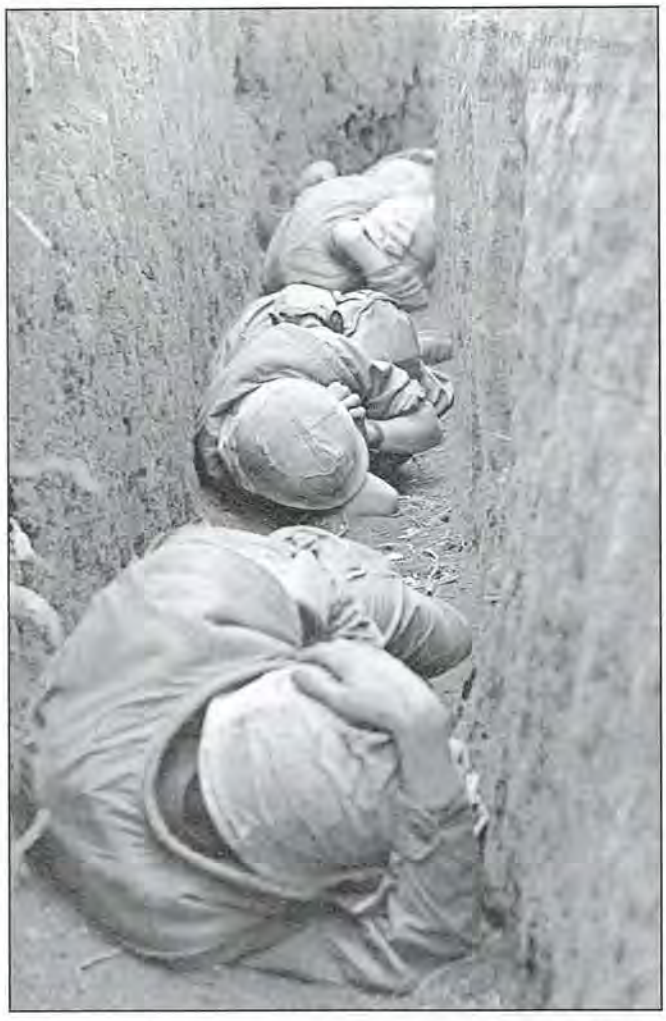
Newsweek. March 18. 1968

This article appeared in Newsweek Magazine on 18 March 1968. Someone recently sent it to me, and a lot of our members may not have seen it. A few of you might recognize yourself or a good buddy.

FEARLESS: Hugging the floor of their trench during a Communist artillery barrage, the young marines on the opposite page dramatically exemplify the grim realities of life at Khe Sanh. Sadly, this photograph, and the pictures on the pages that follow it, seem likely to prove the final heritage of Robert Ellison, a 23-year-old free-lance photographer. Ellison was returning to Khe Sanh last week after a brief respite from the battle when his plane was hit by enemy ground fire and crashed in flames beyond the Marine lines; Ellison and the other 48 men aboard it are missing and presumably dead.



ROBERT ELLISON



Robert Ellison was surprisingly experienced for a man so young. His photographs of racial violence in Selma, Ala., appeared in national magazines even before he left the University of Florida in 1966. A NEWSWEEK correspondent reminisced last week:

"Bob Ellison had the sixth sense of a great photographer for the most telling picture. He was absolutely fearless, but I never once heard him talk about his war experiences. Bob let his pictures speak for themselves."

War as the strategist sees it and war as it appears to the foot soldier are vastly different things. Last week, after a visit to the U.S. Marine base at Khe Sanh, Newsweek's Merton Perry cabled the following report:

The North Vietnamese are busy all around Khe Sanh. Borrowing from their own military history, they have begun to dig trenches that zigzag up to within a hundred yards of the Marine lines. So far, there are only a few trenches-nothing like the intri cate, spidery maze dug by the Viet Minh at Dienbienphu-but the marines suspect that the Communists have also started to tunnel down toward the base from the back slopes of the ridges that surround the Khe Sanh plateau. "These people are moles," declared Capt. Jack Egger, 28, of Columbus, Ohio, commander of a Marine company on the camp's northern perimeter.

No one knows just how many "moles" are actually outside-or worse yet, under -Khe Sanh. Higher headquarters says there are two North Vietnamese Army divisions in the immediate vicinity, but few of the enemy troops have been seen from inside the camp. From beyond the perimeter, an occasional sniper plinks away at the marines, and there have been five or six battalion-size probes against the defenses. The greatest danger, however, comes from the daily barrage by NV A mortars, rockets and artillery pieces, some of them dug in under the jungle canopy miles away from the base. The constant shelling is not enough to destroy the camp, but it is enough to make the men who live there wonder constantly about what is coming next. And the wonder and the waiting inevitably tauten the nerves of the 5,000 marines who crouch inside Khe Sanh.

Even though Marine morale is high, Khe Sanh is physically and emotionally a miserable place, a noisy, dusty, dangerous hell. The men who live there have a special gait known as the "Khe Sanh double step"-a crouching walk accompanied by a constant swiveling of the head. The point of the Khe Sanh double step is to make sure that there is always a hole within easy reach.

Red laterite dust clogs everything at Khe Sanh your eyes, your ears, your throat. A jeep drives by and the red dust settles on you like talcum powder, making you gag and choke. The longer you stay in Khe Sanh, the redder you get. A Khe Sanh veteran has red hair, red hands and feet and red clothes; when he blows his nose, his handkerchief is stained red.

Rats infest the camp. One marine walked past me with an armload of huge traps. "If these don't work," he said, "we've got this"-he held up a bottle of rat poison-"and if that don't work I got a .45 pistol, and as a last resort we use hand grenades on them."

Napalm: Now that the weather is clearing, jet fighter-bombers roar overhead most of the day, plastering the ridges with napalm that burns off the scrub, trees and elephant grass where the NVA are dug in. But somehow the enemy troops seem to survive, and during the day they can -be seen moving through their trenches. For weeks, one North Vietnamese, armed with a .500caliber machine gun and known to the marines as "Luke the Cook," has been ripping off his deadly bursts at low-flying aircraft from a foxhole barely 100 yards outside the lines. 0 amount of napalm has been able to burn Luke out.

Several times a day, the ground trembles with B-52 strikes that hit within a mile or two of the camp. During the daylight hours, helicopters flutter in, kicking up massive new waves of the devil dust. Almost everyone of them takes out wounded men. The attrition among the marines is not as high now as in weeks past, but there is still a steady trickle of casualties. The men who remain behind live much like their enemies, the moles. Most hunker down in sandbagged bunkers connected by a trench line that runs around the camp. Beyond the trench, concertina barbed wire lies in tangled coils, supplemented by a new type of German "razor" wire. The prickly strands are studded with explosive charges and Claymore mines-a deadly obstacle course through which the enemy will have to advance if he wants to get inside the camp.

Cold Nights: Along the perimeter, the men sleep in shifts, napping between watches. The nights are cold-when it is really chill, the men say "the hawk is out" -and no one has had a freshly cooked meal since the siege began on Jan. 21. The best meals available are C-rations: slimy chunks of franks and beans or turkey loaf cooked over heat pellets. They are not very good-and the coffee fortified with ascorbic acid (for Vitamin C) is even worse.

The 40 Seabees assigned to Khe Sanh are a little better off than the marines. Trained for engineering jobs, the Seabees have worked longer and more skillfully on their bunkers, and one of their dwellings, an elaborate fortification dubbed the Alamo Hilton, } as timbers and sandbags 6 feet thick overhead. It is the safest place in Khe Sanh and not surprisingly has become the unofficial press headquarters. The grateful journalists import beer and whisky for the Seabees, which does not sit at all well with the marines. "The Seabees have got more beer than we have water," gripes a leatherneck. The Seabees are not embarrassed, however. Says one sailor: "Before the siege began, marines sat on their tails when they should have been digging. They worked 9 to 4, knocked off and went to their beer hall. Charlie [the NV A] missed his golden opportunity - maybe many golden opportunities-by not attacking right away. Perhaps now the marines are dug in well enough." And perhaps they are not. Digging in is not the Marine way of war.

Most of the marines are pretty tough customers, and so far there have been only a few cases of men going around the bend. During my visit, an VA shell landed in a foxhole, killing five marines; the sole survivor was not even scratched, but after brooding all night, the young marine tried to make a desperate one man assault out through the perimeter. He had to be knocked down and carried back. Another marine was killed when he opened a latrine door and set off a grenade that had been attached to it as a booby-trap. "It was either a crazy marine who did it," explained a marine noncom, "or the gooks have got a tunnel in here."

Barbecue: Despite their isolation the vast majority of the marines at Khe Sanh -from the lowliest, tiredest grunt on up to Co!. David Lownds, the camp's 47 year-old commander-remain totally confident. A major factor behind this optimism is the awesome firepower of the U.S. forces. I saw this demonstrated in a sector of the perimeter defended by South Vietnamese rangers. The American adviser to the South Vietnamese, Capt. Walter Gunn, 31, of Columbus, Ga., ordered an air strike on the enemy trenches. His radioman, Pfc. John Burleeson, 22, of Chicago, called higher headquarters and announced: "Captain Gunn wants a barbecue." A while later, when the napalm splashed in on the NV A positions, Captain Gunn remarked to no one in particular, "I don't care what they say back in the States, I say God bless Dow Chemical."

So confident is Khe Sanh's garrison, in fact, that many of its members would almost welcome an all-out enemy assault. "I wish they would come in now," says Pfc. Charles Hughes, 20, of Chattanooga. "We'll kick them around a little, no question about that." The marines feel sure that the U.S. air and artillery attacks have damaged the enemy. "You can still see them out there," says Gunnery Sgt. Freddie J. Morris, 36, of Thomaston, Ga. "But not like we used to. They've had the hurt put on them some."

Optimist: Colonel Lownds, a 20-year Marine veteran who has raised an upswept British-style military mustache since taking over the Khe Sanh command, answers questions with firm, blunt optimism. Isn't it possible that the North Vietnamese could keep him pinned down with only a token force, diverting major units to a big attack on important northern cities, like Quang Tri, Hue or Da Nang? "I don't think so," he responds. "It's almost inconceivable to me that we won't get hit." Could the marines fight their way out of Khe Sanh on the ground if they had to? "I don't even think about that," replies Lownds. "My mission is to stay here:, damn it, and we're going to stay here.

Lownds, in short, is certain that the North Vietnamese will try to overrun Khe Sanh sooner or later. "It's only a question of how much Giap is willing to lose," he says. "I would hope it would cost him 40,000 or 50,000 men, maybe more. What's there to panic about? We're here to stay. That's our job, that's what we get paid for."

REUNION COMMITTEE

Well folks it is that time again. The 2012 Reunion in Washington DC is fast approaching. As usual, many members have not as yet submitted their registration forms, nor registered at the Hotel.

Remember, you can always cancel if you are not sure about actually coming. It makes it so much better for the reunion committee to plan each of our events, by you registering in an early timely fashion. We have to order food & drinks, for the hospitality room, place our order for the annual banquet, buses for the three planned trips, etc. All these things require prior notice and leaves little leeway when members wait till the last minute. so please help us plan accordingly

Russ & I recently returned from Washington DC where we met with the Hotel staff and ensured every thing we had contracted for had not changed. We also visited with the Staff from the Marine Corps Museum & the Heritage Foundation, in regards to having the Memorial Plaques for Colonel Dabney & Colonel Lownds placed in the Marine Corps Memorial Park.

Those Plaques had to be approved by the Marine Corps University. We met with the head of that committee and our submissions were well received and should be approved shortly. Once they are approved we will once again contact the Heritage Foundation to inquire if they would invite members of the Dabney & Lownds families to attend the ceremony on Thursday, 30 August 2012, at the Marine Corps Museum.

We also met with the staff of Henderson Hall (Former Marine Corps Headquarters), which is next door to the Hotel. They welcomed us to the newly remodeled PX & Club located at that facility. They also agreed to keep the Bar open later than usual, and if we show enough interest, even set up a few barbeques or other special treats.

Big John has been shopping & designing items for the PX and has plenty of new articles for sale. Please remember, if you have items to donate for the silent auction, mail them to Big John Pessoni, or bring them with you. All proceeds go to the Scholarship Fund.

KHE SANH VETERANS SCHOLARSHIP REPORT FOR 2012-13

2012-13 Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation

2012 marks the beginning of the 4th successful year of the Khe Sanh Veterans Scholarship Foundation helping children and grandchildren of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. members reach their educational goals. In 3 years we have awarded scholarship help to 24 young scholars totaling over $15,000 in school aid.

Many of the early applicants are now completing their degrees in higher education and looking forward to successful careers. All this is due to the generous donations of our Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Membership and proceeds from the annual KSV Reunion silent auctions. The Scholarship Review Committee, consisting of Larry McCartney (E 2/26), Dennis Mannion (K 3/26), Bruce "T-Bone" Jones (H&S 1/26) and Bill Jayne (B 1/26) have worked hard to score student applications and make this a rewarding and successful effort. The letters of 'thanks' I receive from each awardee are heartfelt and recognize the sacrifice of the Veterans of Khe Sanh and Vietnam.

School Year 2012-13 is off to a good start as appli cations are coming in to meet the June 1 deadline. A full report of scholarships awarded for 2012-13 will be made at the upcoming Reunion in Washington D.C. Thanks again to our Khe Sanh Brothers for their support.

Semper Fidelis
Dan Fisher – (D 1/26) Committee Chair

GET THOSE APPLICATIONS IN BEFORE THE JUNE DEADLINE

KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student or who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable organization. Your contributions are tax deductible.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 6/1/2012 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid- up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA in Vietnam and if family members are associate members of KSV, Inc. Children of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and financial need. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

THE AWARDS

The award will be $300.00 minimum per school year for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each year applied.

The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to:

Mr. Dan Fisher
Chairman, KSVSF Committee
6050 52nd St. No.
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

1.The money is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the candidate's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant.

3. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

4. The Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon proof of registration sent to the Review Committee Chairman when it becomes available.

5. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of July of the current school year.

6. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before June 1 of the current school year to be attended.

7. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

IN HONOR AND MEMORY OF

Colonel DAVID E. LOWNDS

United States Marine Corps

Commanding Officer 26th Marine Regiment

Khe Sanh Combat Base and Surrounding Hill Outpost

As all good Marines do, the "Lion of Khe Sanh", Colonel David E. Lownds, USMC (Ret) reported for duty on "heaven's scene." A veteran of three wars, Dave Lownds was wounded on Saipan and again on Iwo Jima; braved the enemy and elements in Korea; operated behind enemy lines in the Dominican Republic Expedition; and commanded the Twenty-Sixth Marine Regiment at the Battle of Khe Sanh during the infamous Tet Offensive of 1968 in Vietnam. For his actions at Khe Sanh, he was awarded the Navy Cross, our nation's second highest award for Valor.

The President of the United States of America takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to Colonel David E. Lownds (MCSN: 0-15530), United States Marine Corps, for extraordinary heroism while serving as Commanding Officer of the Khe Sanh Combat Base in connection with operations against the enemy in the Republic of Vietnam from August 1967 through March 1968. Upon assuming command of the vital combat base located in western Quang Tri Province and tasked with the responsibility of interdicting major North Vietnamese resupply routes and blocking any enemy invasion attempt from the west into the northern provinces of South Vietnam, Colonel Lownds immediately established combat outposts on Hills 881 South, 861, and 950, and launched extensive and highly effective patrol activities throughout his area of responsibility. Despite the hazardous, mountainous terrain, thick jungle foliage, and adverse weather conditions, Colonel Lownds' valiant combat leadership and indomitable command ability were the central instrument in achieving and maintaining the superb combat posture of the base. On 28 January 1968, when North Vietnamese divisions launched a coordinated attack on the Khe Sanh Combat Base with rockets, artillery, mortar, and machine-gun and small-arms fire, and with their main attack directed at Hill 861-A, Colonel Lownds' superb knowledge of and appreciation for the terrain and his aggressive utilization of all supporting arms minimized the effectiveness of the enemy attack and resulted in a large number of enemy casualties. During daily enemy rocket and artillery attacks, and on 23 February when the firing reached its peak with more than 1300 rounds impacting on the combat base, his superior tactical judgment, calm leadership, brave demeanor, and resolute endurance were an inspiration to all around him and were a prime factor in maintaining a high level of morale among his men. Giving no thought to his own safety, while exhibiting a compassionate concern for the welfare of his Marines, he gallantly and repeatedly exposed himself to hostile fire making daily visits to outlying units to observe tactical operations and to study conditions confronting his unit commanders. During the period 1 November 1967 to 31 March 1968, Colonel Lownds organized and directed Operation SCOTLAND, a highly effective search and destroy operation throughout the Khe Sanh tactical area of responsibility, which resulted in numerous enemy casualties, the capture of several enemy, and a large number of weapons confiscated. By his gallant leadership, distinguished personal bravery, and selfless devotion to duty throughout, Colonel Lownds upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

REUNION COMMITTEE

Well folks, we think the reunion went as planned, with no major miscues. The hospitality room was well stocked with food, snacks, beer, soft drinks, and hard liquor. Donna Elliott & Cathi Gaupreaux set up a complete bar inside the hospitality room and stocked it with top shelf Liquor. They operated late into the evening, serving special mixed drinks for every one. Funds for the liquor were provided by Mark Noah from "History Flights." The ladies then donated all their Tips to the KSV Scholarship Fund, in excess of $ 300.00.

On Wednesday KSV members went on a trip to visit the many monuments in Washington DC. (Pages 62-64)

We arrived on Thursday at the Marine Corps Museum to dedicate plaques to the defenders of Hill 881S, and the 26TH Marines Regiment for the wall of honor. We were surprised to be greeted by the entire command staff of the 22nd MEU, with their commanding officer, Colonel James Christmas, the grandson of Colonel David Lownds. (Article on page 49 & 50).

With presentations of the plaques completed, the Marines from the 22nd MEU shared their combat & life experiences with the KSV. Everyone toured the museum and viewed the many exhibits. (Pictures & Article Pages 51-54,68-70).

Friday night we travelled to the Marines Corps Barracks at 8th & I street, for the traditional Sunset parade held every Friday. Unfortunately we had to wait longer than usual, due to it being the last parade of the year, and many dignitaries were late in arriving. The Marines performed as wonderful as they always do.

On Saturday, at the annual Banquet, LtGen Ron Christmas and the daughters of Colonel David Lownds were honored by the KSV. Colonel "Bulldog" Smith, past president of the KSV, presented flowers to the Daughters, and gifts from our own PX to LtGen Christmas for both he and his sons, Colonel James Christmas C/O 22nd MEU and LtCol Brian Christmas. The Lownds' daughters honored us by lighting the POW candle during the opening ceremony.

PRESIDENT

From my own observations and comments from the membership, everyone enjoyed themselves. I have to personally thank all those involved it making the reunion a success. As always Kathy & Russ Turner, Dave Meyer & Wife Carol, John Pessoni our VP and PX Guru, Mike Fishbaugh & his assistants for taking care of the Hospitality room, Tom Ford & Wife Helen, Merle & Rita Moritz for helping out Big John, and all those others who gave of their time. A shout out to Mark Kramer KSV, and his staff at the Museum for all their help.

There were no elections held this year, as no one applied for those open positions. As a result, all current BOD members up for election, regained their seats . Our By-Laws stipulate that members have to notify our Secretary of their desire to run for any office on the BOD, PRIOR to the REUNION.

We also had as our guest many members of Big John's Boot Camp Platoon, 2085. There is a letter on page 46 from their spokesman Bill Simons, outlining how much they enjoyed the reunion. Many of their members have pledged to join us in Tennessee.

In this issue there is a brochure outlining the reunion in Tennessee. We have to know how many members want to go to the Grand Old Opry. The price for tickets on the Web-site with transportation comes to about $ 65.00 a person. Russ & I are going back to Tennessee to look at a few trips away from the Hotel. We know we can get a better price if we let them know we have 200-300 people, so let Russ or myself know if you would like to attend the Opry ASAP, by email . We have to have a firm commitment as we have to disperse KSV funds for tickets prior to the reunion.

WEB BRIEFS

"A PLACE THAT ALWAYS WAS"

By Craig W. Tourte

On Tuesday, November 10, 2009, the state of New Mexico dedicated and unveiled an Official Scenic Historic Road Marker honoring those who died at "The Battle of Khe Sanh, Vietnam 1968." The beautiful wooden marker is inscribe: "The Battle of Khe Sanh claimed the lives of 2,097 United States servicemen. This historic marker is dedicated to honor and preserve the memory of New Mexico servicemen who were killed in action or later died of their wounds. The Khe Sanh Vietnam veterans will forever live in each others' hearts." In addition, the marker is inscribed with the names of nine of those who were killed from the State of New Mexico. I am sure more names will eventually be included, as that information becomes available.

I, Tom Eichler, David Tonick, Bob Greenwood and numerous other Khe Sanh Veterans assembled at the ceremonial site, along with a gathering of several hundred, including but not limited to, Rebecca Montoya representing Transportation Commissioner Gary L.J. Giron, Sarah Cobb representing U.S. Senator Tom Udall, Dan Armijo representing Congressman Harry Teague and National American Indian Veterans Commander Don Loudner. It was a privilege and honor for me to have been introduced as a Khe Sanh Veteran and afforded the opportunity to offer a few remarks.

Along with Tom Eichler and David Tonick we assisted Harold Lockwood (National American Indian Veterans Sergeant of Arms) and Jackson Gibson (District Six Transportation Commissioner) with removing the American Flag from the marker and presenting the ceremonial flag to the New Mexico Department of Transportation in recognition of their dedication to Khe Sanh Veterans and to those Veterans from the great state of New Mexico whose loss will be forever recognized and mourned.

Tom Eichler emceed the ceremony and introduced the various speakers, honored guests and provided Certificates of Appreciation from the Khe Sanh Veterans Association to all involved with making this historic event possible. In addition to those mentioned, Tom's effort included recognizing individual transportation employees who worked so hard on this project along with the 377th Force Support Squadron, Kirkland Air Force Base and the Grants High School Marine Corps Junior ROTC program, along with many other participants and supporters.

Tom's generous effort as an ambassador and representative of the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, was nothing short of Herculean as he worked late into the evening hours coordinating speakers and honored guests, gathering those participating in the ceremony in preparation of the flag unveiling, obtaining the necessary material to be included in the various Certificates to be presented and reading the name's of the deceased inscribed on the Historic Marker. This event was a testament to Tom's dedication to our Association and I was proud to have been a participant.

The following is the text of my presentation as a Khe Sanh Veteran:

"A few years ago I drove to San Diego and visited the Marine Corps Recruit Depot where I had spent a number of grueling weeks in 1966. It was the first time I had returned since I earned the right to wear the coveted Eagle, Globe and Anchor of the United States Marine Corps. As I stood alone on the huge parade ground I was overwhelmed with memories recalling the young men I had trained with. They came from all over this great nation and were looking forward to becoming Marines and serving their country. It was evening when I started my drive back to Northern California and dark when I reached the West side of Los Angeles on the 408 Freeway. As my mind wandered back to the Recruit Depot, Quonset huts and drill instructors, I happened to glance to my right and noticed a road sign caught in the beams of my headlights that read "Little Saigon." I knew why the sign was posted there. It denoted a portion of that city which had welcomed the multitudes of Vietnamese who had settled there after the war. The Vietnamese prospered, raised their families, started successful businesses and sent their children off to the finest American Schools. I'm sure the ceremony was well attended when the "Little Saigon" sign was set in place, and there must have been quite a showing of politicians and proud community leaders, all saying wonderful things about the opportunities America had to offer. I wonder if anything was said that day about the thousands of Americans who made the ultimate sacrifice which allowed these new immigrants to live their American Dream."

"When I saw photographs of these Historic Markers honoring fallen Khe Sanh heroes erected along the roadway in this wonderful and great state of New Mexico, I thought of that sign I had observed near the Los Angeles freeway and I knew I had to come here and attend this dedication to America's finest. I had to stand alongside this highway and in some small way join the souls of those whose names are inscribe here. I had to hear their names recognized and I wanted their surviving families to know that the greatest sacrifice made by their loved ones truly mattered. The mention of Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy in the president's inaugural address, forever confirms to our nation and the world that the Battle of Khe Sanh holds a significant place in American history. Though many years have passed, we will always remember and we will forever mourn those we lost, from all branches of the military. We'll never forget the one's we stood shoulder-to-shoulder with in the trench lines, those who faced incredible hardships on the surrounding hills, those who flew above in desperate attempts to extract our wounded and dead and supply us with the critical material necessary for us to persevere. All will be forever cherished in our hearts. We survivors of that long and horrific battle will never forget the fallen. We will never forget how and why they sacrificed for us, for you, and for our wonderful country. We will never forget where they served or who they are. The fallen hero's of Khe Sanh will continue to be a part of who we are, for the rest of our lives."

"As a representative of the Khe Sanh Veterans, I am proud to have been a part of this special dedication - whose primary sponsor, recognition and driving force has been this area's Native American Community."

The location of the "Official Scenic Historic Marker" is identified as being at New Mexico 124, Mile Marker 16.5. In actuality, it sits along the old Historic Route 66 Highway, North of Interstate 40 at the 104 Exit in an area identified as Acoma, New Mexico. It was an approximate 50 mile drive along Interstate 40 from the City of Albuquerque to reach an area known as "The Sky City." The Sky City is actually an area where the Acoma people lived centuries ago atop a mesa to protect themselves from enemy attacks by neighboring bands.

The Native American's who live in the area are identified as the "Acoma" which means "Place of readiness." According to a little research, "Native American legend" describes Acoma as a "place that always was." Native history says "...it was first inhabited about 700 A.D." "Archaeologists agree that it has been continuously occupied from at least 1150 A.D. to the present." Acoma, New Mexico is generally considered "America's oldest continually inhabited city."

The drive from Albuquerque to "The Sky City" where the Historic Marker is located is not unlike any other drive I have taken along a desolated high desert highway. Long, straight and lonely for the bored and weary traveler who too often focuses attention on what's over the next rise. One could pass Acoma in the blink of an eye and never know anything was there except sand, sagebrush and red dirt. I wondered why a monument honoring these heroes would be erected in such a desolate location and not in a more densely populated area.

It was early evening when Tom, David and I drove out to the site of the Historic Road Marker where I met Harold E. Lockwood (HMH-CH-53 Sea Stallions) for the first time. Harold is a tall, proud Native American, former Marine and Vietnam Veteran who is the Sergeant at Arms of the National American Indian Veterans. We stood together as darkness approached, surrounded by red sky with a few wispy clouds off in the distance and tall red table top mountains rising up from the desert floor. Harold identified his house a quarter mile or so away from where we were standing. With the swing of his arm in a wide arc he told me about his cousins, friends, other relatives and Native Americans who lived nearby and identified those who had served and those who had made the ultimate sacrifice, all from the Reservations. We talked about the arrival of the early Missionaries, the Native American children who had been taken from their parents and even to this day, the hardships his people face.

We spent a few minutes talking about his service in the United States Marine Corps and the three years he served in Vietnam. The tragically brutal injuries and death he had observed as a helicopter machine gunner, too often recovering the dead and wounded. The missions off of ships made by young boys who eagerly entered combat for the first time, all dressed in new green uniforms and combat gear and his painful recovery of their remains after the battles. Harold remembered all of these events clearly and with great sadness as he looked up into that red evening sky, silently remembering the pain that is often overwhelming, as he searched for the words that would somehow explain to the outsider, the horrors he had witnessed. Remembrances I knew were still prevalent.

The following day during the dedication ceremony there were a group of young children from one of the local Native American schools who preformed a dance. Adorned in Native American costume, I observed they all had very intense looks on their faces. I realized that the dance these children performed was a serious cultural interpretation of events and beliefs that had been handed down from one generation to the next. The dance was significant to the Native People and fitting in that it was performed in memory of those who had sacrificed for their people and our country.

As I stood alone looking out across the Acoma, viewing the red earth color of the valley and hills, not so dissimilar in color to the red clay of Khe Sanh, I glanced up into the very wide open sky and understood why fate had brought "The Battle of Khe Sanh" marker here. Somehow fate had brought this remembrance marker to this spot, because this place is a "Place That Always Was," A "Place of Readiness" and in a way, a place of safety for those who we will never forget.

CORPORAL LYLE S. TATE USMC
FOXTROT CO 2/3
FOREVER YOUNG

by Eric Shierman

Yesterday 09 May 1967, marked the forty-fifth anniversary of the day Lyle Tate from Portland was killed in action on Hill 778 near Khe Sanh. Having just recently survived one of the most challenging battles of the Vietnam War, Cpl Tate was one of 24 Marines killed on a joint patrol of two rifle platoons, just over 60 men in size, which was ambushed by a substantially larger North Vietnamese Army force.

Cpl Tate was a fire team leader in the 3rd squad from the 3rd Platoon of Foxtrot Company 2nd Battalion 3rd Marines (2/3). Built like a fireplug, not tall but with thick shoulders and barreled chest, Tate also carried his squad's radio. Called "toad" by his buddies, they marveled at his ability to carry the heaviest load on the hottest days. Under the hardships they endured, enlisted Marines naturally bond with guys like Lyle Tate who could maintain a positive attitude that transcended the dehydration, fear, and exhaustion.

Together they had just endured one of the most pivotal battles in the Vietnam War, a battle almost forgotten by everyone but those veterans who were there that have been trying to forget it for the rest of their lives. Often called "The Hill Fights of Khe Sanh" this first major battle in that northwestern corner of Quang Tri province got less press at the time than the more famous siege of Khe Sanh did a year later, but this battle marked a major inflection point in America's role in that long war.

In 1966, the Vietnam War was still widely supported in the United States, but in North Vietnam by contrast, the toll of a seemingly endless war was having a material effect on popular support for the Communist regime. A new generation of impatient young guns on the Politburo demanded, over their defense minister's objection, to mount an offensive, seeking to annex enough South Vietnamese territory that could be seen as a tangible victory to raise moral on the home front. That cautious defense minister was none other than General Vo Nguyen Giap who famously defeated the French at Dien Bien Phu in 1954. Giap was wary of America's air power, a factor that would have prevented his victory twelve years before. The patient general was confident greater success would be found in supporting the continued agitation of the South Vietnamese population by political operatives and Viet Cong guerrillas.

Giap placated the orders of his civilian leadership by occupying the virtually unpopulated mountains just across the DMZ and the Laotian border. His plan was to infiltrate an entire invading army by thinly dispersing it in fortified positions across the vast square kilometers of dense jungle so that it could not be destroyed by interdictory bombing. By Giap's reasoning, at worst his superiors would eventually order him to start mounting assaults on nearby American bases, at best however, perhaps the American leadership would order its ground forces to attack his army and its elaborate network of defensive positions.

The commanding General of American forces in Vietnam, General William Westmoreland was no doubt the most brilliant and effective general of his generation. No other four star in the American military constellation of commanders was better prepared to defend Western Europe from a Soviet invasion, and thus all of Westmoreland's professional preparation prompted him to indulge his adversary with the very battle Giap wanted. The NVA were setting up camp in I Corps, the Marine Corps' tactical area of responsibility, so Westmorland ordered the Marines redeploy in defense of the Republic of Vietnam's northwestern borders and clear these remote mountains of the enemy.

Major General Lew Walt, commanding general of the 3rd Marine Division and Lieutenant General Victor Krulak Commander of Marine Forces Pacific objected. Both decorated veterans of the Pacific Campaign of the Second World War, Walt and Krulak did not flinch from a fight, but they understood the counterinsurgency nature of this conflict, warning Westmorland that every Marine sent to assault bunkers in those remote mountains was one less Marine committed to the Marine Corps' effective pacification program. The Marines pointed out that an effective counterinsurgency campaign that continued to protect the population from the Viet Cong would be able to annihilate NVA units that tried to advance beyond their mountain sanctuary, but if forces were deployed to clear the mountains, not only would the Marines be forced to waste manpower occupying indefensible land within easy striking distance from the Laotian border, but the NVA could infiltrate into the population areas with greater ease once the Marines were spread too thin.

General Westmorland's rank, and his vision of big land units fighting a pitched battle won out. The Marine leadership saluted and began building a more elaborate forward operating base at Khe Sanh. In September 1966 a rifle battalion (1/3) was deployed as garrison. As a perfect metaphor of the war, the moment the Marines arrived, the South Vietnamese withdrew their own First Battalion Second Infantry so that General Westmorland's demand for a Marine battalion merely resulted in the ARVN command withdrawing the same sized force from this dangerously exposed location. These Marines aggressively patrolled the area for six months, but the enemy showed no attempts to attack Khe Sanh's defenses. After the scheduled end of their tour, 1/3 was relieved by Bravo Company 1/9, Echo Company 2/9, and a Force Recon Company.

By the beginning of April, the new garrison of Marines at Khe Sanh began seeing more contact with the enemy, particularly around nearby Hill 861. It soon became evident that the NVA was occupying each of the surrounding hills with battalion sized units digging in fortified positions to command the high ground around the Khe Sanh base in preparation for an attack. The Second and Third Battalions of the Third Marine Regiment were rapidly deployed to Khe Sanh by April 27, 1967 and in a matter of hours began mounting frontal attacks to seize the surrounding hills.

These boys of 67 are second to no other generation of Marines. With discipline and courage they employed fire and maneuver against an entrenched enemy under the support of coordinated air and artillery fire. Cpl Tate, like so many Marine NCOs before him and after led by example; he led from the front. Though utterly terrified and exhausted, the Marines of Tate's fire team followed him up those hills.

While displaying the same common virtue of uncommon valor found on Iwo Jima, these Marines faced two additional challenges. First, some genius somewhere decided to make them the guinea pigs for the first Marine deployment of a new rifle, the M-16. This lighter weapon with its lighter ammunition would become the best service rifle ever made after a few glitches were corrected, but in 1967 the Marine Corps had purchased ammunition with ball powder rather than the IMR powder Colt had tested the XM16E1 prototype with. The carbon residue of the lower grade ammunition made the chamber too sticky for the bolt action to eject spent casings. The only way to clear that brass out was to use a cleaning rod, of which there was only one for every four Marines or to pick at it with a bayonet. This proved a frustrating disaster, and yet these Marines took the hills anyway, making their single shots count.

The second challenge was exactly what Walt and Krulak warned Westmorland of – after inflicting casualties on the Marines as they charged up the hills, the NVA escaped through tunnels. Unlike an island in the pacific where the defending Japanese had nowhere to go, the NVA could maneuver back into the jungle. Consolidating their victory proved impossible for the Marines. They occupied the hills, but the patrols they operated out of them were subject to ambush as the Marines' newly conquered real estate remained threatened by counterattack. Thus the greatest irony was that Cpl Tate's courage in the hill fights was followed by his death on a patrol two days before his battalion was scheduled to be withdrawn from the area.

The situation was so grim upon the end of the 2/3's deployment to Khe Sanh, patrols had to be large enough to survive contact with the large NVA elements they would encounter after leaving the Marines' recently secured perimeter upon Hill 881N. On May 9, 1967 Foxtrot Company ran a two-platoon patrol led by the company commander himself Captain Merle Sorenson consisting of Lieutenant Patrick Carroll's 3rd Platoon in the front followed by Lieutenant Jack Schworm's 1st Platoon. The patrol rout was only a distance of a few kilometers to their objective, the abandoned village of Lang Xoa, but the steep terrain and thick vegetation made the Marines take longer to cover that space than the short distance would otherwise imply. One had to wonder if the battalion's S3 operations officer failed to notice the contour lines on the military map as he created such an ambitious time table that the patrol inevitably fell behind.

Upon reaching Hill 778, the patrol was so far behind schedule that it was forced to take the risk of using the trail, as Edward Murphy in his excellent book The Hill Fights: The First Battle of Khe Sanh reports: Carroll's point man came upon a trail that led down the steep southwestern side of Hill 778 toward Lang Xoa. "Everyone knew we shouldn't go down the trail but we had no choice," Carroll recalled. "We had to take it to get to our objective on time."

After descending the hillside, Carroll's platoon entered a wide, flat ravine. A major ridge finger that ran northwest off Hill 778 paralleled their right flank. High terrain leading up to Hill 803 rose off to their left. Carroll halted in the center of the ravine to look at some footprints that one of his men had discovered. Another Marine pointed to a pile of fresh feces. At the same time, the point squad reported it had come to another ravine that intersected its own from the right about a hundred meters from Carroll's position.

"As I stood there I suddenly had this overwhelming feeling we were getting into trouble," Carroll remembered. "The intense feeling affected my entire body with a sense of impending doom. I knew I had to get those Marines out of that spot immediately."

Carroll whirled around. He pointed up the ridge finger running down from Hill 778. "Up there," he ordered his platoon. "Get up there."

Exhausted as anyone else, Cpl Tate led his fire team in a double time out of what was becoming the perfect kill zone. The NVA were in the process of forming a hasty ambush, but Carroll led his men away from the worst of it. Still, while some of 3rd Platoon was given a fighting chance due to their platoon commander's decisive foresight, Cpl Tate's fire team along with the rest of 3nd squad absorbed 10 – 15 minutes of intense NVA fire superiority at almost point blank range as they reached the top of that finger. Their effort prevented the enemy from sweeping down the side of the hill to the patrol's right, trapping both platoons in a turkey shoot from the high ground on both flanks. While leading his fire team's attempt to return fire and maneuver to a better position, Tate was hit by a heavy machine gun round through his arm and into his armpit. With the radio he carried and his customarily heavy load, Tate fell hard. His rapid heartbeat from the uphill sprint quickly drained his body of blood from a severed artery. He would eventually die in his platoon commander's arms when no amount of direct pressure could stop the bleeding.

This patrol of Foxtrot Company faced factors that seemed to guarantee their certain annihilation. They faced a steady rate of fire from NVA AK-47s responding with M-16 rifles that could only get off one or two rounds before jamming. They were surrounded by a numerically superior enemy force that knew every contour of this terrain, and the high ridgelines blocked the Marines' radio transmissions, preventing the assistance of air and artillery support. Twenty-four dead Marines was a high price to pay, but why was it not sixty?

These Marines lived up to the long tradition of the Marine Corps' discipline under fire. Their war fighting prowess showed through in six ways to win this fight. 1) The way 3rd Platoon quickly maneuvered to prevent the NVA from enveloping the patrol's right flank bought time for the rest of the patrol to react. 2) The M-16 failed them, but an M -60 machine gun team attached to 3rd Platoon, led by Cpl Albert Potts, aggressively maneuvered to a good firing position and preceded to mow down the advancing NVA sending rounds down range as fast as his proficient gun team could replace new belts. 3) Just as 3rd Platoon was running out of ammunition, a nearby patrol from Echo Company came to their aid, instantly assessed the situation, and laid down a danger-close base of machine gun grazing fire at NVA soldiers that were overrunning the position of Tate's wounded squad. 4) Despite all the confusion, the Marines managed to identify and take out the NVA mortar section. 5) A F-8 Crusader returning from a bombing run happened to be flying by. The quick thinking company radio man, Cpl Joe O'Connor, used the radio of a wounded Forward Air Controller lying next to him to make contact with the pilot. The Bomber had neither any munitions nor much fuel, but he agreed to brave the ground fire and make two threateningly low passes. Fear of an airstrike appears to have convinced several NVA units to break contact. 6) Ultimately the decisive factor that prevented a terrible situation that day from becoming far worse was the quality of leadership from NCOs like Cpl Lyle Tate and the officers above them. Marine officers and NCOs wear the famous "blood stripe" on the trouser seam of their dress blue uniforms to signify the tendency of Marine small unit leaders to have a higher casualty rate than the men they lead. Every maneuver element leader from the company commander to the fire team leaders earned the Purple Heart that day, many of them posthumously.

A few days later, A Marine detail and a Navy Chaplain notified Lyle Tate's parents that their only son had been killed in action. This somber moment was cut short when Mr. Tate suddenly suffered a heart attack in response. He recovered in time to attend Lyle's burial at Willamette National Cemetery.

The ceremony, featured former Portland Mayor (and former Marine) Bud Clark, Brigadier General Bruce Prunk, and the Oregon Air National Guard had a F-15 low flyby. For those of you who do not have a personal connection, I write this article so that Marines like Lyle Tate will be forever loved and forever remembered long after their generation of fellow Marines has passed from this earth.

Having attended these ceremonies so long ago as a boy, I remember when it was F-4s flying by. Indeed I was at the very first dedication of this memorial in 1987 with my father who checked into 2/3 just after the Khe Sanh hill fights and fought with them through the Tet Offensive in 1968. He knew many of the names on that wall personally, friends that will be forever young to him.

"FREEDOM IS NOT FREE"

Everyone who knew William Denman called him Buddy and that nickname appropriately described who he was. Buddy grew up in the town of Maxwell, located in Northern California. Maxwell is the quintessential example of rural small town America where everyone knows your name, family and most of your relatives if they had lived around those parts for a few generations. There would be no reason for the road traveler to take the exit off Interstate 5 and drive into the little farm community of 500 where most folks live in quiet obscurity. Some have come and stayed and raised their families while many others have moved along and are now mostly forgotten.

From the Virtual Wall - "Dau Tieng, Tay Ninh Provence, 03 Nov 1966 - elements of the 196th Infantry Brigade and the 25th Infantry Division got into a heated fight with entrenched and bunkered VC troops, a fight that grew into a full-fledged battle fought over a three-day period. Landing Zone Lima Zulu, slightly north of where 1st Bn, 27th Infantry fought on 03/04 Nov, drew some of the heaviest fighting beginning after C Company, 2/27 Inf, was inserted at about 1400 on 04 Nov."

Buddy was a popular kid, handsome and athletic with blond hair and light blue eyes and he possessed an independent and adventuresome spirit many admired. Buddy had a difficult and tragic family life; there were many challenges and hardships including a grievous personal experience between his parents that he witnessed at a very young age. After he graduated from high school Buddy volunteered for the Army and attended boot camp at Fort Ord located in Monterey California. He thrived in the Army life with direction, discipline and a sense of belonging. He found a new beginning, writing to many friends about the respect and admiration he had for the warriors he had met, respected and hoped one day to emulate.

In the summer of 1966 I was living with my aunt and uncle in Maxwell and looking forward to going off to Marine Corps boot camp. Going into the Marine Corps was an adventure I was looking forward to even though I knew I would be deployed to Vietnam shortly after my training was completed. Buddy had completed his Army training and was home visiting his mother and sister and preparing for his deployment to Vietnam. I went over to his house with my cousin and walked into his bedroom where a few of his friends were visiting with him. It was mid-morning and he was still in bed, stating that he wanted to rest as much as he could after all the training and before his deployment. He was in high spirits and looking forward to serving his country and all of what that entailed. We talked about his military training and what he expected while in Vietnam. I sensed that he too was in pursuit of action and eager for a new experience. I told him that he would be returning from Vietnam before me and when I returned home we would share and compare experiences. I wished him luck and was a little envious that he would get to the war before me. I left knowing he was doing what he wanted to do and I was looking forward to becoming a United States Marine. I entered Marine Corps Boot Camp (Platoon 1145) on October 29, 1966.

When Buddy arrived in Vietnam his Sergeant asked him what he wanted to be called, William or Bill. His response was "My friends call me Buddy." His Sergeant said, "Then Buddy it is." He was assigned to A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry (Wolfhounds), 25 Infantry Division. Within a short period of time he went into combat against the experienced, prepared and determined Viet Cong forces. Tragically only three and a half months after arriving in Vietnam he was killed in action.

"C/2/27 moved south from LZ Lima Zulu, intending to link with 1/27, but could go only a few hundred meters before being stopped by VC dug into a tree line. Unable to move forward, with enemy troops infiltrating to their rear, the battalion and company commanders dead, and under fire from three sides, C/2/27 pulled together after nightfall, using a left flank displacement to get out of the "horseshoe" and avoid encirclement. The maneuver worked, and C/2/27 held out through the night amidst sporadic hand-to-hand fighting. By 1030 on 05 Nov, Alpha 1/27 fought through and relieved C/2/27.""At the same time, HHC and A Company, 2/27, was coming into LZ Lima Zulu, intending to take the VC from the rear, pounding them against the anvil formed by A/1/27 and C/2/27."

"05 November 1966 - While the engagements cost the VC dearly, with several hundred known dead, the US infantrymen paid a high price with 50 men killed in action over the three day period. William (Buddy) Denman was one of the twenty Americans who were killed at LZ Lima Zulu on the 3rd day of the fight."

The community cemetery of Maxwell is located a mile west of town. William Luther Denman (August 25, 1946 - November 5, 1966) is buried near the flag pole; his final resting place is identified with a brass United States Military Headstone. He was the first to be killed from the small town of Maxwell and County of Colusa during the Vietnam War. He had the largest funeral ever attended with vehicles stretching for a couple of miles leading to the cemetery.

A number of years ago I placed a small note on the A Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry Wolfhound web site regarding Buddy, just so others would know he had someone who continued to remember him and his sacrifice for this wonderful country.

Similar to the Khe Sanh Veterans web sites - Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc & Khe Sanh Veterans Home Page - which have contributed to bringing together those who fought in the battles on the hills and the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh, the Wolfhounds web site is followed by those with comparable experiences.

A number of months ago I received an email in response to that little notation I had written on the Wolfhound web site. A former Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran Robert Park, contacted me and said that he was with Buddy during that particular battle and continues to remember Buddy's death with great sadness. Robert said he was the one who asked Buddy what name he wanted to be called. Having been in country longer and with more experience Robert felt an obligation to watch out for Buddy and has carried with him all of these years a feeling of responsibility for Buddy's death during the battle. A few years ago Robert had come to Maxwell to visit Buddy's grave and say goodbye, but was unable to locate his grave at the cemetery. He asked around town but no one seemed to recall who Buddy was nor were they familiar with the location of his grave. Robert has vowed to return someday to say his final farewell.

A few of weeks after my email communication with Robert I received an email from Chuck Dean, another Vietnam and Wolfhound Veteran who told me he had been in communication with Robert and that he had been with Buddy when he fell and was planning on driving to California and visit Buddy's grave. I shared both emails with people I knew were close to Buddy while he was growing up.

Email from Chuck Dean - "I plan on visiting Buddy's grave in May of this year (2012), something I have tried to face for 45 years. Buddy and I were very close friends in Vietnam. We were both Grenadiers in A Co 2/27 Wolfhounds. I was with Buddy when he fell. I only wish I could have done this years ago, but have only been able to come to grips with Vietnam the last couple of years. I have hooked up with some of the other "Hounds" such as Robert within the last year and have been steadily working my way out of the shadows. I will be in the Maxwell area to visit Buddy's grave site in May. Buddy will always be part of the band of brothers called the Wolfhounds, and will never be forgotten. His memory will live on as long as there is one Wolfhound alive."

"Freedom Is Not Free" Reads the program pamphlet provided at the Memorial Day Service held at the Maxwell Cemetery, May 28, 2012 - I attended the Memorial Day Service with 100 or more people from the community sponsored by American Legion Post 218 (Maxwell) - Ronald Azevedo, Commander. The Maxwell High School Band played the Star Spangled Banner and one of the high school girls sang the National Anthem. The service included a bugle playing taps and a rifle volley "Salute to Deceased Veterans." I didn't notice any politicians or back slapping significant officials, just local folks with moist eyes and heavy hearts who attended out of respect and honor for those who served and for those who had fallen.

Chuck Dean arrived for the service and was shown the location of Buddy's grave by Paul Richter (1st Lt. U.S. Army) and Gary Bowen (U.S. Navy) who were childhood friends of Buddy's,. There was a large floral wreath standing at the headstone sent by Robert Park in the name of all of the Wolfhounds Buddy served with. Chuck said that he had driven out from Alabama to finally say goodbye. We had a long conversation where he reflected on the battle and Buddy's loss. Chuck said that Buddy was just a few steps behind him when he was shot and killed. He walked over to Buddy, turned him over and saw that he was deceased. Chuck said that he had the canvas helmet cover Buddy had worn that day. I held the now faded green camouflage helmet cover and observed written in black ink Buddy's blood type, unit and the words "Pat" for his high school girlfriend Patricia. Chuck said that he had kept the cover locked away for 45 years and now it was time the cover should be with Buddy's home town, family and friends.

Chuck handed the helmet cover to Buddy's friend Paul Richter for safe keeping until it could displayed properly in a place of care and honor. I recognized that Chuck's act of presenting Buddy's helmet cover to Paul and the town of Maxwell was more than just transferring some possession of property. It was a spiritual release, a dedication, a shared memory and memorial of an item of hallowed significance to be forever treasured. It was part of Buddy's spirit and represented his life and sacrifice in battle and that significance had been tucked away for 45 years in a corner of Chuck's heart and soul.

Paul told me there were efforts under development to build an appropriate incased memorial with memorabilia dedicated to Buddy which would include the now gifted helmet cover along with his military Bronze Star, Purple Heart, military photograph and additional items relating to Buddy already on display at the American Legion. The new display would not only be a tribute to Buddy but also to the many who have served in the Armed Forces and a reminder to all that, "Freedom Is Not Free."

SOLDIERS LOST AND FOUND: STUDENTS REDISCOVER THE FALLEN

SOME PEOPLE DO CARE

Tracing the Stories of Fallen Troops

Article From Wall Street Journal

A generation of Tom Clark's high school history students have been tracking down the families of Indiana's war dead and creating an archive of their mementos, their letters, the stories of loved ones lost in combat and lives lived in grief. WSJ's Michael M. Phillips reports

ST. JOHN, Ind.—Soon after she finished her junior year at Lake Central High School last spring, Marissa Emery visited the American war cemetery in St. Avold, France. Walking in, she could see just the blank backs of the white marble crosses, a vast, grassy field of the anonymous dead.

Only when she was standing among the grave markers did Ms. Emery turn and see that the front of each one bore a name, including that of the man she was there to visit: Cpl. Homer "Binks" Gettler. The 21-year-old soldier was killed fighting his way across France in 1944, while pining for Betty, the fiancée waiting for him at home in Indiana.

Ms. Emery gathered a pile of small stones in her T -shirt. On top of Cpl. Gettler's cross she arranged them in the outline of a heart. She took one dark rock and threw it against the paved pathway until it broke in two. Ms. Emery placed half in the center of the heart. The other half she tucked into her backpack. That was for Betty.

Some 1,750 Indiana soldiers have lost their lives in Iraq, Afghanistan and Vietnam and many more in World War II. Ms. Emery's high-school history teacher, Tom Clark, wants his students to know that each one comes with a story.

For 27 years, Mr. Clark has had his students track down the families of the state's battle casualties. In hundreds of files jammed with letters, records, telegrams and photos, his classes have mapped the tides of the nation's relationship with its wars and its dead.

The World War II generation was revered. Men who served in Indochina often came home to hostility. Today, with U.S. troops gone from Iraq and packing up their gear in Afghanistan, the country's feelings have evolved again, with a support-the-troops ethic overriding political differences over the wisdom of the conflicts.

Mr. Clark's project began in 1985, when one of his students launched a campaign to erect a memorial for five Lake Central High School graduates killed in Vietnam. Mr. Clark had his students interview the men's families so the plaque could include details of their lives. The project swelled from there.

In August, Mr. Clark, 58 years old, handed out files and told his new students they had a semester to find out as much as they could about the dead servicemen. He held up a history book. "This textbook is going to say 58,142 died" in Vietnam, he told them. "Is that meaningful? No. That's why I do this."

His classroom is like a forgotten corner of the Smithsonian. Mr. Clark has a letter from a Marine asking his mother to mail rain gear to Vietnam, and a photo of the private sitting on a tank wearing the coat she sent. He later stepped off that tank and onto a land mine. Mr. Clark, an Afghanistan veteran himself, also has a disarmed bazooka, the uniform of a U.S. soldier killed in Iraq, a trove of Purple Heart medals and a pile of Afghan army helmets.

He has the golden lieutenant's insignia that one cash-strapped officer gave his girlfriend in lieu of an engagement ring before he died in Vietnam in 1966.

"Are you seeing the war?" Mr. Clark asked his new class. "The war is all around you."

WORLD WAR II

Mr. Clark and his students have been working on Cpl. Gettler's history for years. They spoke to his sisters, now deceased, and collected binders filled with letters to and from the front lines.

Last year, Ms. Emery's first three cases, all Vietnam casualties, went nowhere. Then Mr. Clark asked her to interview Cpl. Gettler's former fiancée, now Betty Kolodziej. The two of them—17-year-old Ms. Emery, with her bouncy enthusiasm and wavy golden hair, and the 87-year-old Mrs. Kolodziej, with her hunched shoulders and tinted glasses—talked for four hours, the teenager smiling over Betty's stories about her romance.

"Binks" Gettler was a star pitcher at Dyer High School, class of '41. He threw five no-hitters and signed with the Chicago White Sox, to the chagrin of his Cubs-loving father. Betty, whose parents owned an ice-cream shop, would gaze out of geography class and watch him play ball. The teachers frowned upon hand-holding.

"We passed a lot of notes in the hallway," she told Ms. Emery.

Binks and Betty became engaged before he shipped out for Europe with the 35th Infantry Division. Sometimes she would picture him overseas throwing grenades like baseballs.

On Sept. 22, 1944, he wrote to his sister Charlotte: Betty "should know by now that I am thinking of her at all times. All I do is pray for the day to come so we both can be together again, and married."
His letter must have crossed with one from Charlotte. "Write some," she said, "and I'm praying constantly for you."

The envelope, now in Mr. Clark's classroom, came back unopened and marked in red ink: "Deceased."

About a week after Cpl. Gettler had written to his sister, German troops penetrated the division's lines and drove the corporal and other American mortarmen out of position. Armed only with a pistol, he and a comrade pushed their way back to their mortar tube to repel the Germans. Cpl. Gettler was killed by enemy fire, earning a posthumous Silver Star medal.

His 15-year-old sister Paula was home alone in Dyer, Ind., when the taxi driver delivered the Western Union telegram that now resides, tinged in brown, in Mr. Clark's classroom.

"THE SECRETARY OF WAR DESIRES ME TO EXPRESS HIS DEEP REGRET THAT YOUR SON CORPORAL HOMER A. GETTLER WAS KILLED IN ACTION ON TWO OCTOBER IN FRANCE LETTER FOLLOWS. J A ULIO THE ADJUTANT GENERAL."

Paula screamed at the driver to get off her porch.
"I didn't believe it," Mrs. Kolodziej told Ms. Emery. Even a couple of years later, she thought perhaps he had just been wounded and hadn't returned because he was suffering from amnesia.

The corporal's mother, Alma Gettler, chose to leave his body in France; she didn't want him to come home like that.

"He left four lives here and to know that it wasn't in vain and he saved four people was just overwhelming."

"Thousands of names," Ms. Emery wrote in her journal after visiting the cemetery. "Thousands of soldiers who lost their lives fighting for their country. Thousands of mothers who lost their sons. Thousands of lives, just gone."

In August, after her senior year began, Ms. Emery brought the broken stone and a candle to Mrs. Kolodziej's house in Crown Point, Ind.

Putting her cane aside, Mrs. Kolodziej hugged Ms. Emery. Ms. Emery read from her journal, "so you could feel you had been there and been part of it."

Mrs. Kolodziej held out arthritic knuckles and showed Ms. Emery her wedding ring. The engagement diamond she had received from Cpl. Gettler was set among the stones from the man she ultimately married, Peter Kolodziej, who had fought in the Battle of the Bulge and survived a German prison camp.

"She's making me go back so many years, like I was young," Mrs. Kolodziej told Mr. Clark. She held a photo of Cpl. Gettler's tombstone at arm's length. "I don't want to get any tears on it," she said.

"You did something really very beautiful there," she told Ms. Emery.

VIETNAM

Yolanda Smith-Hess was five when her father, Spc. 4 Wardell Smith, was killed in Vietnam on July 4, 1968. He was 27.

Her mother and grandmother rarely spoke of his death. "I think my mom was just so devastated that her husband was killed over there," said Ms. Smith-Hess. Her uncles kept saying how her father, and the U.S., should never have been in Vietnam in the first place.

Ms. Smith-Hess's memories are blurry and faded: Her mother sitting on a chair across from his casket; of being distracted by a puff of smoke during the 21-gun salute, as the body was lowered into the grave; turning back to see that her father had disappeared. She thought it might be magic.

Relatives always described her father as a natural leader. She grew up angry he was gone.

"It makes you wonder about everything," said Ms. Smith-Hess, now 49. "I was just stuck in the fact that I was a child growing up, not having an opportunity to have her dad in her life."

Mr. Clark and one of his students began researching the case in the late 1980s. They contacted Spc. Smith's mother, Elnora Cast, who lent the class a small formal photo. He gazed straight ahead, betraying no emotion in his black tie and peaked Army hat.

By the time the class tried to return the photo a few months later, Ms. Cast had died, never knowing the circumstances of her son's death.

Mr. Clark eventually tracked down Ms. Smith-Hess. "I've never seen a picture of him in uniform," Mr. Clark recalled her saying. Her grandmother, she figured, had kept it in the wooden chest that she and her three siblings had always been told was off-limits.

Over the years, Mr. Clark's students pried Spc. Smith's military records out of the Pentagon. The records identified him as "negroid" and described his civilian work experience as distributing "sausages to different stores."

In 1997, the Smith case was in the hands of Melissa Wells, a 17-year-old 11th-grader who now describes her high-school self as a "girlie girl," with little interest in the military or history until she took Mr. Clark's class.

That year, she and her classmates discovered that Spc. Smith had earned the Bronze Star and Silver Star medals, and that they were never issued. In the spring, Ms. Wells and Mr. Clark drove to Ms. Smith-Hess's home in Gary, Ind., with the official military citations.

The Bronze Star was almost a pro forma consolation prize for dying in battle. But the Silver Star, the nation's third-highest military honor, was awarded for an uncommon act of valor.

Ms. Wells told Ms. Smith-Hess how her father had been at a base camp when it came under enemy attack. He left a sheltered position, braved a "fire swept area" and sped to the besieged perimeter bunkers, where he brought two wounded men to safety, according to the records she read. Hearing there were more injuries, he raced back to the perimeter, but was thrown to the ground by an explosion.

He got up and despite the "heavy volume of fire" reached the perimeter bunker to begin treating the wounded. Then he dashed to the adjacent bunker in search of more injured men. He was killed by an explosion as he entered the bunker.

Ms. Smith-Hess wept as the teenager talked. "I had actual documentation that I could read about who he was," Ms. Smith-Hess recalled years after the visit. Mr. Clark "was able to give me those last hours of my father's life."

She felt a little ashamed she had been so angry for so long. She wondered whether the men her father helped had made it out of Vietnam alive. She wished she could meet them.

"He left four lives here and to know that it wasn't in vain and he saved four people was just overwhelming," Ms. Smith-Hess said.

Ms. Wells, now Melissa Ferro, is a 32-year-old pediatric-oncology nurse in California. She also raises money for baby showers for the wives of soldiers overseas, volunteer work inspired in part by her experience with Ms. Smith-Hess.

"Every girl wants to believe her daddy is a hero," she said. "I gave that to her."

AFGHANISTAN

When Angie Wagner's father, a Marine sniper, was killed in Vietnam, strangers told her she should be ashamed of him. Ms. Wagner, then just a child, learned to lie and say she didn't know how her dad had died.

Twenty years ago, she received a call from Mr. Clark and his students, who wanted to know about her father. She remembers it as the first time anyone outside the family had said anything nice to her about her dad. Today, her own daughter, Allison, is a senior at Lake Central and taking Mr. Clark's history course.

MR CLARK'S CLASS

One evening in August, Allison Wagner, two of her classmates and Mr. Clark went to the childhood home of Staff Sgt. David Nowaczyk, determined to show the sergeant's parents that they weren't suffering alone. The soldier, a Lake Central graduate, was killed at age 32 on April 15 in Afghanistan.

For more than an hour, they sat in the living room, under Sgt. Nowaczyk's photo and Purple Heart medal, and asked Andrew and Patti Nowaczyk about their son. What was he like? How did he die? How has his death affected the family?

"He's not just another name to us," Ms. Wagner told them.

"Thank you," said Mr. Nowaczyk, a 57-year-old oil-company maintenance supervisor.

The 17-year-old girls—Ms. Wagner, junior Sarah Harnish and senior Natalia Ruiz—heard about the ups and downs of grief still fresh. They heard about the comfort provided by friends and neighbors who sympathized with the Nowaczyks' loss and respected their son for his sacrifice.

Mrs. Nowaczyk, age 54, an assistant in a law firm, told the girls about David's mischievous youth. How at age 6 he had disassembled the front-door lock. "He was all boy," she said.

That's about how old the girls themselves were on Sept. 11, 2001, when hijackers flew planes into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field. The attack got David talking about the Army. He was 22 years old and working as a truck driver. His mother begged him not to enlist, and he held off for a few years.

In 2005, he joined up, breaking the news to his mother at a restaurant so she wouldn't cry. After his first tour of Afghanistan, he met his wife, Rachel, a nurse with a young son, Conner, from a previous marriage. They had a daughter, Kiley, now 2 years old.

On his third combat tour, Sgt. Nowaczyk's vehicle hit a buried bomb in eastern Afghanistan. Of the five men inside, he was the only one to die.

The Nowaczyks were hosting a barbecue for neighbors in Dyer, Ind., when Mr. Nowaczyk saw a uniformed soldier and a chaplain walking to the house. He apologized to his guests and ushered them out the back, before he and his wife opened the front door to face the news they knew was coming.

The Army flew the couple to the Air Force base in Dover, Del., to meet their son's body. When they returned home, they found their street lined with hundreds of American flags. There was a heart-shaped wreath on the lawn with a photo of their son. Neighbors filled a cooler with ice and soft drinks, and kept it stocked for weeks. A stranger sent a handmade red-white-and-blue quilt.

The wake was a blur. "You want to go hide," Mr. Nowaczyk told the girls. "You want to go vomit. But you have to greet everybody."

At first, they thought they didn't want the attention. The Nowaczyks soon realized the outpouring of support meant their son wouldn't soon be forgotten.

Ms. Harnish asked how Sgt. Nowaczyk's death had affected the family dynamics. Mr. Nowaczyk said he often sleeps on the floor beside his granddaughter, Kiley. For a while, the little girl, having been told her father was in heaven, would let loose balloons and wave at passing planes.

"We're still at the stage where we're still tiptoeing around each other," said Mrs. Nowaczyk, who wears a memorial dog tag around her neck.

You have good and bad days?" Ms. Harnish asked.

"It's not even days," said Mrs. Nowaczyk, "it's moments."

The third student, Ms. Ruiz, had been mostly silent. Then she broke into tears. "I was 11 when my dad died," she said, "and I didn't have the courage to speak at his funeral."

This time the Nowaczyks comforted her: "No child should ever have to bury a father," Mr. Nowaczyk said.

Ms. Wagner told the Nowaczyks of her own grandfather's death in combat and of her mother's battle with bitterness and shame. The Nowaczyks recalled the cold reception that veterans and their families received during Vietnam and how different their experience has been.

"We carry a big black cloud over our heads, and it rains every day," Mr. Nowaczyk told the girls. "The fact that you came here is incredible."

Socorro residents want Vietnam War MIA's name on new SISD school

MAUNUEL R. PUENTES SSGT USA
B TROOP 1ST CAV 23rd INF DIV
'It's time to bring Manny back to life'
By Ramon Renteria

Leno Puentes still cries thinking of his younger brother whom everyone called "Pelon."

"He was a good kid who grew up picking and chopping cotton after school, weekends and holidays," he said. "On Jan. 4, 1971, he left for the war in Vietnam. He has not returned."

Socorro Independent School District officials in December are expected to decide whether a new public school will be named after Army Staff Sgt. Manuel R. Puentes, a Socorro soldier missing in action in South Vietnam since 1971.

Puentes' friends and relatives are urging the district's board of trustees to name one of two proposed new schools in honor of the Socorro native - and others missing in action - who dreamed of becoming a professional boxer. They describe him as a war hero with an infectious grin.

"It's time to bring Manny back to life or at least for his family to have something to remember," said Eugene Trujillo, one of about 20 friends and relatives lobbying to have a public school named after Puentes.

A district committee will recommend proposed names to the school board on Tuesday, according to a district representative.

Puentes, a 20-year-old Golden Gloves boxing champion, was an Army rifleman and part of a 12-man patrol in the rugged, jungle-covered mountains northwest of Khe Sahn, Quang Tri Province. North Vietnamese forces ambushed the patrol on March 25, 1971, with grenades, wounding Puentes and patrol leader Jimmy C. Johnson. Three other soldiers were killed - Staff Sgt. R.D. McDonell of Sweetwater, Texas, Cpl. Richard J. Rossano of New York City, and Cpl. Randall A. Thompson of Evansville, Ind. They were attached to the 1st Squad, Troop B, 1st Cavalry, 23rd Infantry Division.

Survivors said they saw the wounded Puentes, then a private first class, take cover. Outnumbered, the patrol retreated and left Puentes and the other casualties behind.

Search teams later found Johnson, badly wounded and alive, but no trace of Puentes and two soldiers killed. Thompson's body was recovered.

The Department of Defense reported Puentes missing and then declared him presumed dead a few years later. He was promoted posthumously.

Puentes is believed to be the only soldier from Socorro who did not return from the controversial war in Southeast Asia.

The National Archives lists 58,220 U.S. casualties in the Vietnam War. The war ended in 1975 as one of the most divisive wars in U.S. history.

Ricardo Puentes, Manuel Puentes' twin brother, remembers his brother calling from Seattle before leaving for Vietnam. "He was crying," said Ricardo Puentes, a retired educator in Arizona. "He wanted to serve the country and help my parents financially, but he really didn't want to go to Vietnam."

Ricardo Puentes advised his brother to go AWOL even if it meant having to serve a few years in prison for deserting the Army. Manuel Puentes ignored the advice.

The twins were among 15 children born to Mexican immigrant parents.

Maybe it was a strange coincidence but a car ran over Ricardo Puentes in Socorro the same week that his brother was wounded and reported missing.

"I also almost lost my life," Ricardo Puentes said. "They say twins have some kind of connection."

Manuel's father, Matias, died believing his son was still alive. Mother Gavina lost hope and died believing her son had died, according to family members. Ricardo Puentes tries not to think about his twin brother.

"It still hurts," he said. "But what happened to my brother made me stronger. I went back to school and got my GED, and I went to college." Manuel Puentes was drafted soon after graduating from Socorro High School.

Carlos M. Rivera, a family friend and commander of American GI Forum (Paso Del Norte), is optimistic the family will someday learn more about the missing soldier. He pushed for the return of remains of Eduardo Pedregon, a San Elizario soldier reported MIA in Korea in 1950.

"There's no solid evidence to show that he (Puentes) was killed," Rivera said. "I still hold hopes that he survived."

If he survived, Manuel Puentes would be in his early 60s now.

Cesar Rosales Jr. of Omaha, Neb., became acquainted with Manuel and Ricardo Puentes when both were boxers.

"Manuel was a genuine kind of person with an infectious grin and was just a good guy," Rosales said.

Diane McNamara, now living in the Boston area, wore Manuel Puentes' MIA bracelet (which honored MIAs and POWs) in high school in the 1970s. Her father was an Air Force pilot stationed in Vietnam.

"I started wearing the bracelet as my way of showing support for the soldiers who were sent to Vietnam and I think in some way as an expression of the angst I was feeling having my Dad in Vietnam for such a long period of time," McNamara said in an email. "When the war ended and the soldiers started returning home, we were living at Keesler AFB in Biloxi (Miss.). My mother would often take us to the air field to greet returning soldiers. It was such an emotional event and it brings me to tears if I think about it today."

McNamara kept the bracelet with Puentes' name. She often wondered about the soldier and tried to learn more about him over the years. "I could not bear the idea of getting rid of it (the bracelet) as it meant so much to me," she said.

McNamara recently searched for Puentes' name on the Vietnam Memorial Web page. "It was a bittersweet moment ... it confirmed that he didn't make it home safely," she said.

A few months before he disappeared, Manuel Puentes sent a short poem he wrote, thoughts lamenting that he was going to a distant war and leaving his large family behind. "I live each day in fear 'cause I know death is near," he wrote.

CORPORAL REGGIE MASON USMC H&S CO 1/9 KHE SANH

Facing death was a way of life for Marines in Vietnam, but for 77 days, Cpl. Reggie Mason had a front-row seat.

The Pocomoke City, Md., native joined the Marines in 1966 at age 18. He spent most of 1967 in DaNang, as a bodyguard and driver for a colonel. He had been putting in transfer requests to be in a combat unit.

In January 1968, he had re-enlisted and joined the 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, an infantry unit nicknamed "The Walking Dead" for having so many men killed in action.

"I'll never forget when I checked in," said Mason, 66. "The staff sergeant said, 'You're that crazy-ass bastard from division that wants to go in the field. Get your gear — you're going to see all you want to see.' At 1300 hours, I was on a chopper bound for the DMZ."

When they landed at Khe Sanh, Mason was given a new detail: Casualties.

His job was to shadow medics working with the wounded and dead, and bring them out of the Demilitarized Zone. He would radio in dog tags about who was wounded and how badly. For Marines killed in action, he would collect their personal effects from the body.

A chaplain once told him more than 500 were killed at the Battle of Khe Sanh, though official military casualty counts were lower."You're running from one to another, and you don't have time to think about it," he said. "Most times, there weren't much left of a lot of 'em."

He remembered one Marine's death in particular. "When they unzipped the bag, I said, 'What happened? Where'd he get hit?' They turned him over. One little piece of shrapnel in his jugular vein. He bled to death. One little piece. And when I took his wallet and stuff, he had two little kids and a wife. That one bothered me more," Mason said.

He said there were 1,000 men in his battalion when he arrived at Khe Sanh, and about 700 when they left. His battalion had to put its clerks, cooks and mechanics in the field to boost manpower and hold off the relentless attack by the North Vietnamese.

Mason remembers hearing the dying cries of his fellow Marines, crying out for their mothers. He said there were times when he, too, thought he would die at Khe Sanh.

"I thought I was a pretty tough kid until I got in the war and I found out how tough I really was. It's looking at wounded, dead bodies. Disease, guys coming down with dysentery. I about died twice from dysentery," he said.

For the entire 77-day engagement, B-52s dropped bombs on Khe Sanh. Mason said without that airborne firepower, they would have lost at Khe Sanh. As the bombers made their nightly runs, Mason said, "you're in a 6-foot hole and the Earth is shaking so bad, it's unreal. And you keep praying — don't miss your target."

He does have many other fond memories of time in Vietnam, many of which he chronicled with an Instamatic camera he took everywhere — the times he visited an orphanage, weekends at the snow-white China Beach, tuna sandwiches at a makeshift Thanksgiving dinner

Still, he's haunted by some of those memories. Sleeping, in particular, is a problem.

"Every noise, I get up," he said. "I say my neighbor's got the best bodyguard in the world. I would give anything to be able to sleep eight hours a night."

ACOMA SKY CITY

By Neil Kenny

Back in the early to mid ninety's I had the great chance to visit with the 'native' population of Acoma. We traversed the route to the mesa top by the very path that had been traversed for the 1200 previous years by the people who lived there then and now Atop the mesa was a small mission, church if you will; it was elaborately adorned with art work of 'the people' from as far back as any could recall. There was no photographs allowed, as to the Sacred nature of this place. It was refreshing to see that even in this hectic world within which we live -- some still choose to keep Sacred that which is so.

After a while in this quiet chamber, we were able to walk out into the courtyard and small graveyard I was overwhelmed by the sheer number of grave markers & crosses that denoted the branch of military service, and that so many had died while in that service while doing the bidding of this country. It was the fact that the overwhelming number of those graves were from as early as WWI, up to the Korean Conflict. The vast majority were from WWII.

I was reminded of the verse from Barry McGuires' song; "... old enough to kill, but not to vote..." Funny how connected I was at that moment in space and time to that land and those people. I was 18 when I arrived in Nam and 19 when I left both Nam and the Corps in January 1969. The first time I was able to vote was in 1972.

The first time the people of Acoma were able to vote was 1954 It makes me wonder if time and history will keep faith with those of us who have passed before the tides of tomorrow. I know that the 'Native People' have done so in a profound manner, which humbles me as I cast my vision upon tomorrow's tomorrow.

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS: KEN KORKOW B CO 1/26

A VIETNAM WAR HERO'S JOURNEY

By Lance Dixon
Capital Journal 19 July 2012

It's March 30, 1968, at a place called Khe Sanh, and a Marine named Ken Korkow from rural Blunt, S.D., is about to make the best shot of his career as a mortar man. He doctors the charge on a 60 mm mortar shell so that it dollops the mortar shell only a few feet away to explode on top of a spider trap where two Vietcong soldiers have been wreaking havoc on American troops with AK-47 rifles.

End of story for two NVA

WARFARE

It's what Ken Korkow was trained to do - take out the enemy. It's part of the reason why South Dakota Gov. Frank Farrar later named a day in his honor as South Dakota's most decorated Vietnam veteran.

But that's not the story Ken Korkow remembers most about Khe Sanh. What he remembers is putting aside his weapons to bring wounded Americans back out from a battlefield blistered with bomb craters, some as deep as two automobiles stacked on top of each other – the work of the B-52s overhead that were supporting the American troops. Korkow first lay down his mortar, then his rifle, then his sidearm, the better to drag wounded soldiers to safety. Finally he was going out to retrieve wounded soldiers with only the added weight of a knife that he could use in hand-to-hand combat or to cut makeshift bandages. Some of the wounded GIs were scared of dying. Korkow had a line that worked great for them.

"I'd tell them, "I'm a doctor. You'll be OK."

On his last trip out Korkow saw his commanding officer, Ben Long, and his radio man off to one side as he ran past them.

"I was invincible and I didn't care. I shouted, 'Come out and enjoy the war.' Famous last words," Korkow said.

The next moment the world exploded under his feet.

The pieces of metal they pinned on Ken Korkow's chest afterward included the Purple Heart for being wounded and the Navy Cross for being courageous. That's the second-highest military honor a soldier could win.

But the pieces of metal Ken Korkow was most concerned about there at Khe Sanh on March 30, 1968, were the shards of shrapnel from three 60 mm mortar shells that had exploded all around him. He was hit in both arms, in the right leg, and under one eye, where a piece of shrapnel is still embedded. Flak panties and a flak vest kept his trunk intact.

But he knew he'd been seriously hit. And what he remembers afterward is that he began laughing - laughing - when he realized what had happened. It seemed funny to him because he was a mortar man himself, and his weapon was the 60 mm mortar

I've got a strange sense of humor," says Korkow. "They'd hit me with the same thing I'd been hitting them with," he said.

SURVIVORS GUILT

He was a mess

They didn't use thread to hold me together, they used wire, I was blown apart so bad," Korkow said. "I had a doctor tell me at one point that I would never be able to walk again or be able to use my hands again, and I almost believed him."

But Korkow the skeptic didn't; he learned to walk again. Afterward, he returned to the States, to military honor, and to his young wife, Liz.

I met Liz when we were both 15. She was a cute 4 -H girl showing calves and we were putting on a rodeo in Wahoo, Nebraska," says Ken Korkow - part of the family that's famous for Korkow Rodeo stock.

Ken Korkow liked what he saw in Liz and eventually asked her to marry him. But, he adds, it amounted to a bait-and-switch routine for Liz. She didn't get what she thought she was getting. That became abundantly clear after Vietnam, and it was only partly because of the war, Korkow said. Instead, Korkow said a lot of what made him a really lousy husband is an old, old idea that Christian thinkers called "sin."

I'm amazed that Liz stuck with me through 10 years of hell," he said. "If there's been a way to make a mistake, I've pretty much done it."

Gradually, Korkow realized that part of what he was dealing with after Vietnam was survivor's guilt. Men have been programmed to lay down their lives in battle from ancient times - they're prepared for that, Korkow said. But nothing has prepared them for surviving the battle where their buddies were killed. And nothing had prepared him for an abrupt change back to civilian life where skills such as dropping a mortar shell just where you want it were no longer in demand.

Korkow returned to the States to earn a bachelor's degree in ag economics and a master's in business administration, then worked with the South Dakota Industrial Development and Expansion Agency. Afterward he began selling farm and ranch property - the only thing besides operating a mortar that he was ever any good at, he says now.

He's a former member of Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association; former president of the Central South Dakota Board of Realtors, and a former president of the North and South Dakota Farm and Land Institute.

Yet despite the success, something was missing. That's why at age 30, Korkow said, he gave his life to Christ.

SPIRITUAL WARFARE

Korkow went to work full time for the Christian Business Men's Committee USA in early 1984. He is currently regional director of CBMC Heartland, serving Nebraska, Iowa, and South Dakota. He lives in Omaha.

He and Liz have three children, daughters Cory and Kacy and son, Adam who serves as a pilot in the Marine Corps

In a strange way, Korkow says, the experience in Vietnam - temporary and terrible and unnatural as it was - was good preparation for the Christian life. Most Christians don't understand that they are at war. Korkow does.

In fact Ken Korkow, the Vietnam veteran, begins each day preparing for battle, and says American Christians are woefully unprepared for something he calls "spiritual warfare." Like the apostle Paul and the early Church, or figures in church history such as Martin Luther, Korkow is convinced not only that God is real, but also that the devil is real.

He begins each day by praying God's protection over friends and family for friends and family. He prays for Jesus Christ's purposes to be fulfilled in their lives.

It's the equivalent, Korkow says, of doing what Paul describes in his letter to the Ephesians - putting on the armor of God

The ranch in the Medicine Creek valley, just east of Pierre and south of Blunt, is still vitally important for Korkow.

This is where the wheels fell off of Grandpa's

Wagon, so this is home, "says.

It's also where Korkow now holds Christian retreats. In conversation he emphasizes prayer, Bible reading and - for men - being accountable to a band of brothers. Christians don't understand that as well as soldiers do, Korkow says.

Korkow still has close ties to Community Bible Church in Pierre, a church he helped to found. Community Bible Pastor Harvey Friez said Korkow's faith is deep and real.

Ken still struggles with issues, especially some from what he experienced in Vietnam," Friez said. "He's taken that experience to try to implement a whole program for others coming back from battlefield situations that the military can use to help those soldiers. A lot of it is faith-based, and that's where Ken's heart is."

Korkow said in his experience, God doesn't waste pain – no matter what the pain is.

I thought combat was the ultimate adventure — but now I know there's nothing more exciting than knowing Christ more intimately and living Him more intentionally," said Korkow. "All of life's past pains and experiences are simply His preparation so we might have a better life now and a greater eternal impact."

Vietnam veteran, Ken Korkow, now hosts Christian retreats at his ranch in the Medicine Creek valley, just east of Pierre and south of Blunt.

A PURPLE HEART STORY
By Joe Oliver

WHAT A DIFFERENCE A DAY MAKES!
Reprinted From MOPH, July/August 2012

ROGER MICHAEL HURD and I grew up in the working class neighborhood of East Cambridge. MA I met Roger in the first grade- at Scared Heart Grammar School and we were friends from day one.

Growing up- in East Cambridge was a good thing. It was made up of second generation Italian, Polish, Irish and Portuguese. Everyone was Catholic: in fact, while growing up I thought everyone in the world was Catholic. This impression was fostered by the sisters of Saint Joseph.

If you were Polish you went to the Polish School and the Polish Church; If Portuguese, you would go to the Portuguese school & Church, and so forth. Everyone that is, except us Italians; we all went to Sacred Heart, the Irish School.

So there I was, an Italian going to Sacred Heart Grammar School and their Irish Church. I wish I had a dollar for every time the nuns forced me to sing, "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling."

Growing up in the 50's was great; everyone got along. All of our parents worked, and I knew of no one who was divorced. The only exception to this was my friend Roger. His mother had been divorced several times. He had three sisters and every one of them had a different last name. Also, his mother dated. These were all very strange happenings back then.

Roger and I, as well as my other friends, hung around together all through grammar and high school. In East Cambridge everyone was assigned a street corner to hang out on. I am not sure how this process worked, but my little group of friends from Sacred Heart all ended up on the same corner. Maybe the nuns had something to do with it.? Maybe not.

Growing up in the so-called inner city we shared a lot of firsts. " we smoked our first cigarettes together, stole our first car together and drank our first beer together. We also received communion and confirmation together.

My birthday is the 15th of November and Roger's the 16th. If I was 100 pounds, Roger was 80. When I was 130 pounds Roger was 100. When I was five feet tall Roger was four feet. All during this time we had this little saying between us: "what a difference a day makes."

In 1965 our lives changed forever. My friend Mike Lopez and I joined the Marine Corps. We all wanted to see the world and get out of East Cambridge.
A month after I left for Parris Island, Roger also joined the Marines.

The last time I was with Roger was 1966, when we were both home on leave. I was a Lance Corporal and Roger was a PFC. Again we had our little saying, " What a difference a day makes."

Lance Corporal Roger Hurd was killed in action at Khe Sanh, Vietnam during the "Hill Fights" of 1967. None of us knew how Roger was killed, only the date and location. Trying to make contact with his family was impossible; his mother had remarried and we could not track down his sisters.

Several years ago I was reading a magazine article from one of the two Marine Groups I belong to. I came across the following story in the Khe Sanh Veterans magazine, Red Clay.

The story was written just before Memorial Day by a fellow Marine that served with Roger, someone I have never met. John Kaheny. I thought I would share this with those who did not read it. The value of the story is the same. No matter what day it is , I want to make sure that Roger is never forgotten,.

What a difference a day makes!

HERE IS THE ARTICLE

A MARINE REMEMBERS ON MEMORIAL DAY

By John Kaheny

For most of us it is a sure sign of impending summer and it is filled with parades, picnics and beach parties. Children, enjoying the day with their friends, may occasionally ask why a tear forms in their father's eye at the sound of taps or the sight of Old Glory waving in the wind.

It is difficult for the young to truly grasp why we set aside this day to honor those gallant veterans who fell at Lexington and beyond, defending our freedom and protecting our lives. So far they have been spared the terrors of the night and the arrows that fall by day.

Not so for the aging warrior whose memory on this cared day leaps time and space to find a grassy knoll four miles from Laos on another day in May of 1967.

Marines and corpsman on patrol 43 strong, are just five miles from the safety of Khe Sanh combat base. To the North, they are the last free men between Hill 881S and North Vietnam. Suddenly, the Cat of Death jumps from a tree line on the exposed flank of the platoon. Two young riflemen, each but 19 years old, shun available cover, stand up, stand fast and fire into the charging horde. Taking the full force of the enemy's assault, they purchase with their blood a precious gift of reaction time for their fellow Marines and corpsman. Helmets fade slowing into chest high grass and soon disappear from view.

Eventually 41 make it back to safety, some bleeding, none broken, but two go home to rest forever beneath marble crosses. Their names, Private First Class Thomas Edward Hendershott and Lance Corporal Roger Michael Hurd, Are now etched in stone beneath Lincoln's watchful eye.

The years have passed but every day I see their sacrifice reflected in the smiling faces of my children and grandchildren. For had not these two brave men held their ground with everything they had, Coleen, Meghan, John Peter, Olivia, Clara and Lauren simply would not be, because one of those they saved that day was me. Now you know why taps brings it all back and makes me think of those young heroes and where they Are today and why I know, all too well, the meaning of that World War II epitaph:

And when he gets to heaven
To Saint Peter he will tell
" One more Marine reporting , Sir
I've served my time in Hell"

Joe Oliver lives in Central Florida with his wife of 43 years, joane. They have two sons and four grandchildren. Joe is a former Marine Combat Wounded Vietnam Veteran and a Lifetime member of the Military Order of the Purple Heart. He is also a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans, serving with HMM-163, S-2 Chief.

John Kaheny lives in San Diego, CA., with his wife of 41 years. They have three children and three grandchildren. John is a retired municipal lawyer and a retired Marine Corps Reserve colonel with service in Vietnam and Desert Storm. John is a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans serving with HQ CO 1/26 S-3.

CHUCK HARVELL, USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN B BTRY 1/13

"Chuck Harvell passed away July 9, 2012. A memorial service was held at 3PM, Sun., July 22nd. at Rocky Creek Baptist Church, Greenville, SC. My heart is heavy today. I was thinking I needed to call Chuck. I called and did not get an answer. My heart kept telling me to get in touch with Chuck. That still, small inner voice told to go online to the Greenville News. There I found his obituary.

I GET MAIL

Tom;

I just received the Summer 2012 issue of Red Clay. Thanks for another great issue and continuing record of the valiant defense of Khe Sanh.

I was pleased to see that the Newsweek issue, March 18, 1968 was reproduced in Red Clay and that the members were able to see how challenging the siege was for all who were there. I have digital copies of the pages if you ever need.

It was I who sent the issue to you. At the time of the siege, I was at The Basic School and along with my classmates, closely watching the evening news and the siege of Khe Sanh. Many of us knew that we were on our way to Vietnam shortly.

I joined Fox, 2/26 in October as a Platoon Commander and had the honor of serving with many of the men in Fox Company that had endured the siege and subsequent I Corps battles, including LZ Margo. Captain Stan Hartman was Fox CO and Tim Sabo, XQ.

Thanks For A Great Issue.

SWOOPING FOR THE LIEUTENANT

By Dennis Mannion
KILO CO 3/26 F/O

It's two in the morning when I give my wife a gentle touch on the shoulder, ease out of bed and quietly head for the dark staircase. There is no need to wake Joan as she and I have said our goodbyes hours ago. I have always been able to wake from sound sleep and be in my car and on the road in a relatively short period of time and this early morning departure in October 2010 is no exception.

I dress quickly in the kitchen -- shorts, a sweatshirt, and flip-flops are easy -- small suitcase and travel items already in the car. Reaching into the frig for a small cooler with Arizona ice teas, I think about my Khe Sanh buddy Nick Romanetz and what he casually mentioned to me at the San Antonio reunion back in July. If it were not for his words then, I'd be sleeping now instead of easing my car down the driveway and aiming the headlights south toward Washington, D.C. Yet I'm not upset in the least; quite the contrary, I am elated to be "On the Swoop" while most of Connecticut dreams the night away. I'm about to begin a 24 hour, 600 mile, round trip drive to pay my respects to a Khe Sanh Marine killed on 15 April 68 in the shadow of Hill 881N.

Like many drivers in this day and age, I have a GPS unit, but there is no need to power it up on this trip because I've driven to D.C. countless times, and other than traffic concerns it is no more complicated than the short, daily commute I used to make during my thirty-year teaching career. It's the Merritt Parkway into New York State ... the Cross County and Henry Hudson parkways to the George Washington Bridge ... cross the Hudson .... New Jersey Turnpike south to the Delaware Memorial Bridge ... cross the Delaware ... I-95 toward the Baltimore tunnels ... and on down to the capital. Simple really, especially in moderate to light traffic. With luck and a single pit-stop for fuel and the bathroom, I most certainly will be there by mid-morning. The electronic car device that I do use constantly in the car is my XM satellite radio -- a Christmas gift from Joan. I first plugged it in a decade ago and I have not listened to an AM or FM radio station since. For me it's the commercial-free music from the 50's and the 60's that takes me back in time and allows the miles to ease by whether it's a long trip or running errands around town. Most of my adult life I had steadfastly believed that "my music" had its origins in the 60's, but once I began using my XM I came to understand that my music is more closely linked to the late 50's and the 60's.

I'm at the wheel early on this chilly Saturday and using the remote to alternate between songs from the 50's and 60's because Nick happened to mention that his Basic School Class -- BOC 5-67 -- was going to dedicate a plaque on the grounds of the Museum of the Marine Corps to remember and honor all the officers from BOC-5-67 who had lost their lives in Vietnam. My instant reaction was to ask if Lt. Steve Fordham had been in that class. Nick did not recognize the name, but he said he'd put me in touch with those who were organizing the event. Three emails exchanges later I learned that Lt. Fordham had been in that class, and as I stared at the information on my computer screen from Mike Sommers, I knew immediately where I'd be on that third Saturday in October. I had to make this swoop for Lt. Fordham; I just had to.

For the uninitiated, swooping was the term used by Marines who rocketed out of Camp Lejeune every Friday for destinations all over the east coast. It may have been called that by Marines on other bases as well, but my personal swoop meant Jacksonville, NC to Hamden, CT. Not a 4 day, 96-hour pass, swooping was a 60 hour, boomerang-weekend -- depart Friday afternoon when work secured, drive hundreds and hundreds of extremely fast miles to destinations like Boston, Buffalo, Miami, Cleveland, even Chicago, and return to Lejeune in time for Monday morning formation!

In late 1968 and most of 1969 my swoop meant 654 miles -- one way -- from the main gate to my parents' house. Gas was plentiful and cheap; roadways were not all that crowded; local and State police were the biggest threat -- although the red Lejeune sticker on the front bumper often helped, particularly in New Jersey and New York. I had a '68 Camaro then with just about every option Chevrolet offered and it easily handled all those weekend miles. The radio was the basic, 6-button, AM unit, and it became second nature to reach out and punch up a new station whenever a song concluded and the station went to a commercial or to a song I didn't like.

Swooping was always a two-act drama set against a backdrop of speed, miles, roads, and the clock. The first act was always up-tempo, lighthearted and giddy because seeing the main gate in the rear -view mirror late on a Friday meant a free weekend with absolutely no obligation to Uncle Sam's Misguided Children until Monday. Swoops generally began in the late afternoon when a continuous line of "muscle" and "pony" cars -- GTO's, Torino's, 442's, Charger RT's, Firebirds, Cougars and the like -- slowly eased down the long access road to the main gate. Starting in daylight was crucial since the first 110 miles were narrow, back country roads until Rocky Mount, NC and the limited access highways of 301 and I-95. On the radio it might be Love is All Around by the Troggs and then The Boxer by Simon and Garfunkel. A good start.

Sunset usually around Richmond, VA and the gradual change to night seemed to alter the mood somewhat...somber and more inner-reflective. Green River by CCR...that'll do. Topics of conversation -- cars, girls, sports, officers and senior NCO's -- discussed and discussed again until there was little left to say. The only reality now: 400 miles. With conversation eased and mostly empty I-95 out in front, it was pure speed and non-stop music that propelled us north. The Stones and Honky Tonk Woman followed immediately by the O'Kaysions and Girl Watcher...what a song! Three or four Marines somewhere in Maryland going 80 miles per hour and singing the words at the top of their lungs. Spooky performed by the Classics IV. Hearing that one was guaranteed to generate multiple discussions about Spooky in Nam and memories of that continuous line of red from the plane to the ground. The rest of the swoop tended to be even quieter as sleep overtook the passengers and now just cities, landmarks, and the last rest-stop of the New Jersey Turnpike as proof that you were getting close to home. A Beautiful Morning by the Rascals...the volume turned down. The Poor Side of Town from late 1966. Wow! Johnny Rivers' voice coming out the speakers and me hearing him sing that same song on my way to sign the enlistment papers in October 1966. How is it possible that it's only been three years when so much has happened since?

Depending on weather, traffic, speed traps, and passenger drop-offs, arrival time was generally around 4 in the morning. A few hours of sleep and then the freedom to do as little or as much as you wanted through all of Saturday and Saturday night. Sunday mornings were relaxed as well but always with an eye on the clock and the early afternoon departure and Act Two.

Returning always seemed to be heavier emotionally and more like performing a distasteful chore that had to be completed like it or not. The music always helped. Kind of a Drag by the Buckinghams sums it up for the driver and the passengers. Every southbound mile meant closer to the Lejeune and the iron reality where our choices and our decisions weren't entirely our own. Still there was some happiness in the return as our weekends got re-lived, compared, and savored. The DJ says, "And now, with one of 1968's big hits we have Bobby Goldsboro and Hon... Not a chance we listen to that one. The last 110 miles and the ungodly hour of the morning make that final stretch the toughest of the entire swoop. In those predawn hours the 2-lane country roads are deserted but danger still lurks beyond the high beam's range and you never know. Utmost care is needed because fatigue is at its greatest. Approaching the main gate and the ever vigilant MP's, the only realities are how much prep time do I have before morning formation and the fact that Friday can't get here soon enough.

My 2010 mini-swoop for Lt. Fordham was not an exact mirror image of those late '60's swoops, but the roadways and the landmarks were for the most part identical. Thanks to the XM radio, the songs emanating from the multiple speakers were exactly the same and help to transport me back to the last three years of the 1960's. I arrived in D.C. at mid-morning and met up with Marines who knew Lt. Fordham personally. Later on that Saturday we drove the 50 miles south to Quantico and the museum. Nowadays in D.C. those 50 miles can take over two hours despite 4 to 6 lanes of highway in each direction! There was an emotional, outdoor dedication ceremony followed by dinner in the expansive museum lobby. At both events I had the honor and the pleasure of sitting next to Barry Kowlaski -- Lt. Fordham's roommate during Basic School. The stories and the memories we exchanged were emotional, sometimes painful, and helpful. I got to learn a lot about Lt. Fordham as he was in that summer of 1967, and I was able to convey to Barry what a terrific officer Lt. Fordham turned out to be even in the most harrowing of times on 861, 881s, and 881n.

I would have gone anywhere for a dedication ceremony that included Lt. Fordham, but having the ceremony at Quantico seemed most appropriate to me. In the dozens of swoops four decades before, I'd zoom by the huge exit signs on Interstate 95 that proclaimed
Marine Corps Base Quantico.

Back then it hurt to see those signs week after week and know that Lt. Fordham would had to have seen them as well during his officer training months. Getting through that 10 mile stretch of interstate in Virginia was never easy for me no matter the mood in the car or the song on the radio. Whether northbound on Fridays or southbound on Sundays, it was always nighttime, and thankfully, the darkness hid the inevitable melancholy expression on my face and the occasional tear in my eye.

Safe swoop, Lt. Fordham. You're always missed and never forgotten.

HAPPY CARDS

By Chaplain Ron Rayner

Congratulations to the reunion committee for a successful gathering in Washington D. C.

Everyone that attended the Saturday night banquet at this year's reunion had a Happy Card tucked into their napkin in front of them. This card had an "Eternally Bonded" Khe Sanh Veterans logo printed on it. What made it a Happy Card was the fact that most everyone I saw at the reunion was smiling and having a good time. Hopefully, when the attendees see their Happy Cards in their wallets or purses, they will smile.

The purpose of a Happy Card is to pull it out of your wallet or purse and reference it when you are feeling down and your thoughts are headed in the wrong direction. A Happy Card could also be called a Thought Direction Card, Thought Stopping Card, Good Memory Card, or a Feel Good Card. Everyone needs to be cheered up every once in a while. People who suffer from Post-Traumatic-Stress-Disorder or just plain depression tend to isolate themselves from others with their thoughts sometimes going out of control. A readily available Happy Card can help fill their need to stop bad thoughts and change the direction of their thinking. A Happy Card can be made happier by writing the best memories of your life on it. Any thought that can bring a smile to your face can be written there. If you have a hard time thinking up something to put on your Happy Card try getting with your spouse or a friend and work on it together. If you have lost a spouse or good friend, review photographs or other objects that will revive good memories and put a smile on your face. Remember that your lost spouse or friend would wish you a long and happy life.

Khe Sanh Vet Larkin Spivey, in his book, Stories of Faith and Courage from the Vietnam War, has a series of POW devotionals for September. September 19th's devotion concerns a POW counting his blessings while being held prisoner. I believe we all are much better off than the POWs of the Vietnam War. Whether or not you received a KSV Happy Card, please count your blessings and write them down to help you keep your thoughts headed in the right direction.

Dear God, when we go through wintry days, please help us to see your many blessings so that we feel the warmth of your love. Thank you that everything in our lives can be turned to your purposes and our good. Please help us to cling to your faithfulness. Amen.

KHE SANH VETERANS MEET AGAIN HONORING THEIR HEROIC CORPSMAN

LAUREN COUNTY
Daniel J. Lauer Staff Writer

As 22 Laurens County veterans were inducted into the Hall of Heroes Saturday afternoon, one inductee was thinking about his upcoming retirement. U.S. Navy Commander John Lancaster Jr., a Vietnam veteran who has led the Navy IROTC program at Laurens District 55 High School for the past 18 years, will spend his last day on the job this coming Friday. I get a lot of satisfaction from this job," Lancaster said. "But I am ready to go."

During his 18 years as the naval science instructor at LDHS, Lancaster has seen the program grow from an average of 130 or 150 kids to well over 200 in recent years. This year, enrollment is up to 240 students.

"My main goal here is to show kids that there is more to the world than just Lauren ," he aid. 'There are big adventures out there if they are willing to go for it."

Lancaster had is own share of adventures through the years, stories he told to his students. He was a Combat Navy Corpsman during the Vietnam War, serving as a medic for the Marines. The Marines do not have medical personnel, chaplain, doctor' or dentists; those role arc filled by Navy personnel wearing the Marine uniform.

"The Navy Corpsmen actually had a much higher casualty rate, because when a Marine got hit, that Corpsman is going to get that Marine,"

Lancaster explained. "That is where lead is flying. For that year of my life, I was on the front lines."

Lancaster said too many lives were lost, names he recognizes every time he visits the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, DC.

Larry McCartney, Commander Lancaster and Jose Luis Reyes Jr., known as "Cisco."

"They are grouped by date, so in some places, I know everyone of them. I knew too many of those names."

Lancaster was instrumental, however, in saving many lives. During Saturday's Hall of Heroes ceremony he was surprised by two marines he help treat in Vietnam. Vietnam. Jose Luis "Cisco" Reyes Jr. choked up as he credited Lancaster with saving his life, allowing him to return home, get married and have a family. He was brought to Lancaster by another friend, Lawrence E. McCartney, for treatment. That was the last time Reyes had seen Lancaster until Saturday.

As Lancaster prepares to retire, he is proud of the program he has helped build at LDHS, and is confident it is in good hands with new Commander T.J. Linardi.

"I don't have a long bucket list," Lancaster said. "I can look myself in the mirror and know that I did the best I possibly could."

Now Lancaster joins numerous other Laurens County veterans in the Hall of Heroes.

"It was a very special evening," he said. "And stressful too. I guarantee all those memories (from deployment) were flowing."

RAYS CORNER

Dear Tom,

I'm attaching an article that appeared in the Wall Street Journal about the Marine Corps mascot bulldog at the Commandant's home on 8th and I who stood his ground when the dog of the Secretary of Defense met him. The wives of the senior officers were shaken. In the 19th Century, it would be said that "they swooned." The Commandant, however, was impressed and promoted the dog to Sergeant! It's a rather humorous story which I assume you'll find amusing.

I have a couple of unusual things that have happened to me recently. Soon after my birthday, I had an appointment with the eye doctor at the VA. (One of the reasons, along with my anxiety at crowds, especially at airports, but also, I'm sure, that were in DC, for not attending this year's reunion. In past visits to the VA eye doctor, I was told that I had cataracts as well as a hole in my retina, and that nothing could be done to improve my somewhat blurred vision-the reason I don't drive outside the local area, in unfamiliar places. I really dreaded the appointment, not being sure of transportation to and from the hospital. (A local Vietnam vet friend and a neighbor did say they would take me, but it would be an Imposition). Well, I went and the doctor said my cataracts aren't all that bad, that the retina has not deteriorated further, and that now I could be given a prescription for new glasses which would enable me to see better!). Obviously, I was very greatly relieved.

Then, about the same time, I was walking along that dirt bike trail along the river near my home. We once walked that several years ago. As I walked, I suddenly saw a young man in camouflaged clothing and with a rifle! He was slowly crouching down in some bushes. There were some others along the trail, not in the immediate area, but I was concerned about someone with a rifle-and, obviously, although I was completely aware of where I was and the situation, I still had feelings as though I were back in the Nam! Seeing a young man, in camouflaged uniform with a rifle did that! It's interesting what I did, as I now think back on it. Instead of running away, I instead slowly walked up to him! In a very n on-threatening, mild tone of voice, I said, "What are you doing?" (Obviously, if we were crazy or meant to do harm, I would have been shot dead!) He replied that he was part of a group of five others that were "playing war." I asked him if he were a veteran. No. I asked him how old he was. 23. I thought "he's too old to be playing war!" He then continued that they all shot bio-degradable pellets. I then walked away.

On the Labor Day weekend, I was enjoying a get-together with my neighbors. They all know me very, very well. We've been neighbors for some 20 or more years. I related this story and then-unfortunately!-said, "I felt like saying to the man (recalling my training with the Seals), "How quickly do you want to die? And how painfully?" Immediately, there was complete silence, an uncomfortable pause in the conversation. Perhaps they thought: he's really crazy. We shouldn't let our children near him. And things like that. I guess there are still some things that so dramatically affect our lives today even after over 40 years!

The night before my birthday (which fell on a Wednesday), I was, as usual, working out at the boxing gym. On this particular night, one of the trainers had some focus pads and I was throwing jabs, crosses, hooks, upper cuts as he moved the pads. Eventually, his back was against the ropes. The ring is larger than normal. Suddenly, he stopped. I turned around" and the ring was completely filled with at least 30 young men, mainly teenagers, and they immediately started to sing "Happy Birthday!"

I might add that a couple of Khe Sanh vets sent me Happy Birthday cards which made me feel very good. Like that singing of the young boxers, I was aware I have connections with those who care, a family. Some of these Khe Sanh vets haven't sent me cards in the past, and one I didn't even know. Realizing that I probably won't have many (if any) more birthdays to celebrate, cards obviously have taken on great significance for me. Some others called. A couple called from the reunion, and one, Chick Kelly (the chaplain who relieved me at Khe Sanh) wrote me. I was told that one of the recon Marines claims that I accompanied one of their patrols, despite my denials. But, I really didn't go out with recon. I tried to-after being with them after one of their Marines drowned in the river just to the north of the base, but was denied. (In fact, I spent so much time with them because of their losses, that my own CO, Lt Col James B. Wilkinson of 1/26, called me in and said, "I will remind you, Chaplain, that you are the 1/26 Chaplain, not the recon chaplain!" I suspect that many "stories" circulate about me-and about others as well!-that really aren't true, but somehow have become part of the "legends!" Well, I write too much. Take care, good friend. Semper Fidelis,

Ray

WASHINGTON-
TONGUES ARE WAGGING AFTER CHESTY'S MARINE CORP PROMOTION

After snub of Pentagon's Top Dog

The Marines won't say it out loud, but everyone knows that Cpl. Chesty got promoted to sergeant this summer not for being a good Marine, but for his in-your-muzzle confrontation with the top dog in the Pentagon.

Just two weeks before his promotion, the Marine Corps mascot, an English bulldog formally known as Chesty XIII, had a run-in with Bravo, Defense Secretary Leon Panetta's golden retriever. Chesty, usually known for happily mugging or photos with kids, revealed his inner grunt when he spotted the larger dog at the conclusion of a pomp-filled military parade held in honor of the Pentagon chief. Chesty growled, barked and ignored his choke-chain of command as he went nose to-nose with Bravo.

As Chesty's growl erupted into an angry bark, an officer urgently whispered in the ear of his handler, Sgt. Chris Harris: "'Keep the leash tight."

SERGEANT "CHESTY" XIII

Defense Secretary Leon Panetta and His Golden Retriever "Bravo" Run in with "Chesty XIII "

That kind of breach of decorum at the headquarters barracks, where the top generals and their wives reside, could have been career-ending for most Marines.

Chesty weathered the controversy and came out of it with a new stripe on his uniform. Privately, some wives of senior Marine officers, more focused on politeness than doggedness, let it be known they didn't approve of the promotion. A whispering campaign against Chesty reached the ears of Col. Paul Montanus, barracks commander. Some said Chesty was getting too fat. Some senior wives wanted Chesty relieved of duty in favor of a more pliable bulldog private serving in another unit. .

Other senior Marines worried about the message promoting Chesty might send. In military chain of command, Bravo is second only to Bo Obama, the president's hypoallergenic Portuguese water dog. The Constitution puts the military under civilian control, and some senior officers thought promoting Chesty might appear insubordinate.

"The standards in the barracks had lowered," said one senior Marine officer. "The dog didn't really deserve it."

Col. Montanus, who had the dog's fate in his hands, acknowledges that Chesty was wrong to shove his short snout in Bravo's face. "There absolutely was a protocol break," be said. "We don't bark at guests, whether they are human or the canine variety."

But, the colonel said, much of the opposition was baseless. A barracks spokesman says senior Marine wives love and support the current Chesty. And at 54 pounds, Chesty fits nicely in the dress blues he was issued as a younger dog, thanks to being served half the daily kibble ration of his chunky predecessors.

Nevertheless, in a speech at Chesty's June promotion ceremony, Col. Montanus acknowledged the decision was "touch and go."

"There are some Marines that are destined to be sergeant:' he said. "Then there are some whose conduct is ... questionable. Chesty is one of those Marines."

Col. Montanus said he had considered formally punishing Chesty for "disrespect to a superior commissioned dog." It is true that "Chesty made threatening gestures:' he said.

"But we decided the body of work for Chesty was enough he rated becoming a sergeant."

Left unspoken: The very act that made Chesty's promotion controversial also made it more likely. Immediately after the parade in honor of Mr. Panetta it became clear that going muzzle-muzzle with the 75-pound golden retriever was going to enhance Chesty's reputation in the ranks.

While Mr. Panetta was present, the top Marines displayed embarrassed grins and laughed nervously. But after the boss left, the high-fives and atta-boys broke out. Far from being denied his traditional post-parade Milk Bone, the bulldog found himself the object of warrior admiration. Even Gen. James Amos, the Marine commandant, approached Chesty and said, "Good job."

There is a reason the Corps has a bulldog for a mascot and that he is named after the famously gutsy Marine Lt. Gen. Lewis "Chesty" Puller. Even within a service that values discipline, there is a certain mystique about a Marine who's willing to poke a paw in the eye of power-particularly in defense of the homeland, or kennel.

Col. Montanus's successor as barracks commander, Col. Christian Cabaniss, made plain the current Chesty had only grown in his estimation.

"Chesty embodies Gen. [James] Mattis's saying about the Marines: 'No better friend, no worse enemy,'" Col. Cabaniss said. "Chesty's great. He is great with kids. Bu if you are impolite to him, if you are wrong, that is when he will defend himself."

Like Chesty, Gen. Mattis has risen through the ranks despite the occasional public display of machismo-comments such as "Be polite, be professional, but have a plan to kill everybody you meet"-that has raised eyebrows with civilians.

Gen. Mattis, who oversees operations in the Middle East and Afghanistan, said he considers Chesty a "kindred soul."

"He's a fine Marine dog," the general said. "Loyal, hard working and full of fun-while looking mean as all get-out."

Col. Montanus strenuously denies that the confrontation with Bravo helped Chesty's promotion. A well-trained Marine, he said, should be able to recognize a superior.

"I would say Chesty needs some threat-identification classes," he said. "I understand 'No better friend, no worse enemy: But generally we are talking about our enemies, not our superior officers."

Col. Montanus calls the clash with Bravo a minor infraction. Chesty, the colonel says, excels at his main responsibility: Accepting hugs from children with enthusiasm and without biting.

As for Bravo's master, there seem to be no hard feelings. "Chesty may bark a lot," Mr. Panetta said. "But he understands the chain of command:'

In an interview on a hot evening, Chesty was friendly and panted constantly. Although he didn't answer questions about Bravo, he did jump on a reporter's leg.

RAY, JUST DOING HIS THING

With music and narration, members of the 1st Brigade Band, a Civil War brass band, tell the history of the American flag at a Flag Day celebration at the Marcus Center's Peck Pavilion in Milwaukee. Ray Stubbe, a retired Navy chaplain who served with the Marines in Vietnam, shares a laugh with fellow veterans before the ceremony. Stubbe delivered the invocation.

UPDATE ON RAY
HE WRITES:

Dear Tom,

Our college class of 1962 has gathered at St. Olaf College this week, and one of my classmates just sent me a copy of the sermon he will be giving tomorrow at the chapel. The preacher is Rev. Dr. David L. Tiede. I didn't really know him well while we were together at college and I don't even recall talking with him. He eventually became the President of our large Lutheran seminary in St. Paul, Minnesota, which has several hundred students, and he called me a few weeks ago, encouraging me to attend. I told him that due to my problem with travel and especially with large crowds, that I wouldn't be able to attend, even though one of my "shrinks" at the local VA told me several years ago that I "must return to St. Olaf since it had such a positive influence on me."

Anyway, I sent Dave a copy of Pebbles and I guess he was impressed by some of what was in it, and the last page of the attached sermon mentions part of it. Interestingly, YOUR words that appeared on the back cover ("Lord give me the strength to watch over these brave men") are quoted! Tom, you had an amazing insight into my thought, feelings, and could capture in a few words the essence of everything that I was living at the time!

Of perhaps some interest is that I was as unable to attend this very significant college reunion (our 50th) just as I'm not attending our Khe Sanh reunion, nor going to the annual boxing tournament at Kansas City nor attended my high school reunion. It's all due to my nervous anxiety over crowds and travel outside the city-and even knowing what's going on doesn't seem to give me a handle on controlling it!

Anyway, I thought you'd be interested in that last page. You are such a good friend that you have a way of looking right into the depths of my soul! Your hand in getting that book printed obviously makes my gratitude to you very profound!

By the way, my legs seem to be fairly fully recovered. I don't have aches unless I walk more than two miles. Running is still out, but perhaps that may be possible in the future. I still go to the boxing gym and sparred on two different days last week, three three-minute rounds. The VA has had me on an antibiotic for about a month due to a blood infection, but physically, I'm doing quite well-for a man who will be 74 in August. I guess you are als0 72. We are both able to look at the rest of our Khe Sanh vets and regard them as "young pups!"(even if they are in their mid or late 60s!)

Take Care, Tom
Semper Fi,

The Last Page Which Ray Refers To:

Our classmate, Chaplain Ray Stubbe could not attend because of his Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. But we had a wonderful phone conversation, and he sent his book, Pebbles in My Boots. It is a stunning collection of letters, sermons, prayers, and poems of a chaplain in intense, prolonged combat, particularly when besieged for two months at Khe Sahn, Vietnam.

His stationery has a cryptic Greek quotation from St. Gregory of Nazianzen.

Ray picked this out of his reading of Gregory, in Greek, while on a troop transport. The gist of the quote is, "What is not taken up, is not healed." This was Gregory's witness against those who said Jesus was not fully human. If Christ didn't take up our mortal life, we could not be healed.

For Chaplain Stubbe in the horror of war and carnage of death, it meant God has taken it all up, even the worst. God is always with us. "If I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there"(Ps 139). "God is with us precisely on the cross, precisely in the midst of the horror of war, precisely with us in times when death looms ready to swallow us." (Pebbles, 226). Ray held worship as mortar fire rained slaughter, and he took soldiers in his arms as they bled to death. His prayer continued to be, "Lord give me the strength to watch over these brave men."

It is a wonderful privilege to be in on God's mission of love for the world, but God does not promise it will be easy, or bloodless. Holy Trinity is the story of God taking up our mortal lives that they may be healed and in order that we might be agents of this mission of healing in the world. And here we are together for reunion weekend. Classes from many decades, and God isn't done with us yet.

Come now to the Lord's table. God's love is embodied here in bread and wine. The Triune God has taken it all up, that you may be healed and the world may be healed, in part through your gifts and your struggles. Thanks be to God.

ROBERT M. CRABB, USMC KHE SANH VETERAN GOLF CO 2/26

IN HONOR OF ROBERT'S DEDICATION, GENEROSITY, AND COMMITMENT TO ENSURE THE KHE SANH VETERANS SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION CONTINUES, THE KHE SANH VETERANS HAVE NAMED THE KSV SCHOLARSHIP IN HIS HONOR.

IT SHALL NOW BE KNOWN AS:

ROBERT M. CRABB SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

On March 15, 2012, Marine Bob Crabb joined the honor roll of heroes who built the noble legacy of the United States Marine Corps reporting to his next duty station with our Supreme Commandant.

A Memorial Service for Marine Crabb was held on Friday, April 27, 2012. Robert M. Crabb was born December 21, 1947, in a small town located in southern Texas. On June 28,1967, Bob enlisted in the United States Marine Corps and subsequently served with the 3rd Marine Division, 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines, Company G in Vietnam from 1967-1968. In 1969, Marine Crabb reported to Camp Pendleton for medical treatment subsequently becoming a rifle instructor until July 25, 1969, when he was honorably discharged. Bob Crabb earned the National Defense Service Medal, Vietnamese Service Medal w/1star, Republic of Vietnam Campaign Medal w/device, Presidential Unit Citation, Combat Action Ribbon, and the Purple Heart Medal.

Marine Bob Crabb, a Vietnam Marine veteran, is a life member of Marine Corps League Casa Grande Detachment 901, Arizona, and a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans.

KHE SANH VETERANS CELEBRATE AT KOKOMO INDIANA, DURING THE ANNUAL VIETNAM VETERANS REUNION HELD IN HOWARD COUNTY, KOKOMO INDIANA, SEPTEMBER 13-16.

In 1981, local Vietnam veterans established the Howard County Vietnam Veterans Organization for the sole purpose of raising funds for a Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Howard County.

With a lot of support in Kokomo and Ho lard County, the funds were raised and the memorial was built on the, Courthouse Square,. After that major undertaking was completed, the group's officers and members were on the hunt for their next project. Someone said half-jokingly, Let's have a hog roast for Vietnam veterans ..... That was the beginning of the Vietnam veterans reunion now held each September on the Hearing Ground's, a 40-acre plot along Ind. 26, 8 miles east of U.S. 31.

Several of our members make the annual trip each year. While there they always manage to locate a few fellow veterans from Khe Sanh that were unaware of our organization. This year they signed up three more. Although it is called a Vietnam reunion, veterans from all previous wars are welcomed with open arms. I will be doing an article on the KOKOMO reunion in issue 82 of RED CLAY. There are a few pictures from this years reunion, on page 84

MARINE OBSERVATION SQUADRON SIX MEMORIAL DEDICATION CEREMONY NATIONAL MUSEUM OF THE MARINE CORPS
SEMPER FIDELIS MEMORIAL PARK TRIANGLE, VIRGINIA 17 MAY 2012

HISTORIC MARINE VMO-6 FLYING UNIT GONE, NOT FORGOTTEN

Marine Observation Squadron Six (VMO-6) can trace its origins back to the formation years of Marine Aviation. Active for slightly less than half of the century of Marine Corps aviation, the squadron served during the 1920s' Nicaragua Campaign, World War II, the Korean War, and finally through the 1960s in Vietnam. Thirty five years after it ceased operations, and in celebration of Marine Corps aviation's 100 anniversary, a monument to VMO-6 was dedicated in the Semper Fidelis Memorial Park at the National Marine Corps Museum, near Quantico, VA. It honors the 66 men from VMO-6 who died as a result of hostile actions during the four aforementioned conflicts. Not only was this ceremony a tribute to those who have given their lives for their country, but it was a reunion of many veterans who made VMO-6 more than just a page in a history book.

VMO-6's memorial service and monument dedication ceremony commenced on Thursday, May 17, 2012. A large group of Vietnam and Korean veterans, with many of their family and friends, joined several relatives of deceased squadron members at the National Marine Corps Museum. The first part of the ceremony was held inside the building, in its main atrium. Behind the speaker's podium was a Sikorsky HRS-1 helicopter, the type used in the Korean War. Nearby, a truly historic VMO-6 helicopter is displayed, the actual UH-1E helicopter that Captain Steve Pless flew when he earned the Medal of Honor hangs over the entrance to the museum's Vietnam gallery.

Retired Marine Colonel and VMO-6 helicopter pilot Larry Wright served as the Master of Ceremonies, with the local Marine Corps Base Quantico Color Guard and Marine Band supporting the program. Navy Chaplain Commander John Hannigan gave the opening invocation before Marine Brigadier General Michael Rocco recounted some key moments in Marine aviation history and reminded those assembled that the reason for Marine Aviation is to support the troops on the ground. Then three former VMO-6 members, Larry Wright, Dave Bushlow and Red Trivette read the names of the sixty-six squadron members who were lost in combat, grouped together by the conflict they died in. After each group of names was read, a Marine honor guard member rang a bell three times in a time-honored salute. The indoor ceremony was concluded with a prayer of remembrance and ceremonial music.

SEE PICTURES ON BACK PAGE

The program continued outside of the museum. After the attendees walked in a long rank behind bagpiper Norm Weaver to the black granite VMO -6 monument in the adjacent Semper Fidelis Memorial Park. The monument is shaped like an airfoil cross-section, and has all 66 names of squadron mates lost during conflicts and figures of seven important types of aircraft used by VMO-6 etched into it. The design is the work of Wayne Wright, who incorporated the airfoil because it "is essential to flight and it represents both the core and the vitality of the squadron. The wing has been severed at its tip and rests on edge, rising from the ground. This is meant to depict the disruption of flight; the loss of life and our eventual fall to a place of rest back on earth. While the base of the wing is earthbound, its tip projects skyward, suggesting the desire to rise again to the heavens. And so, through this structure we honor those squadron members who have fallen to rest on earth, but in memory and spirit still soar above."

SEE PICTURES ON BACK PAGE

A blessing as given by Chaplain Hannigan, and a wreath was laid next to the monument. A Marine bugler played "Taps" from afar, followed by a bag piped version of the Marine Corps Hymn. Shortly after this, a formation of three helicopters flew over the assembly low and loudly; the familiar "wop-wop-wop" of Huey rotor blades brought back memories - some with smiles, others with tears.

The striking black VMO-6 monument dedicated during May's ceremony stands in the Semper Fidelis Park near the birthplace of the squadron at Quantico more than 90 years prior. It represents a small but very important piece of VMO-6's history. The squadron's soldiers were at the forefront of many Marine Aviation firsts, from supplying ground troops during the Nicaraguan Campaign of the 1920s, to medical evacuation in World War II. Squadron members employed Marine helicopters tactically for the first time during the Korean War, and their armed helicopter escort operations in Vietnam paved the way for today's tactics. Although the VMO-6 squadron is inactive today, the people and their deeds haven't been forgotten.

PLANNING

The decision to plan, build and erect a memorial to honor and remember the 66 squadron members killed in combat operations was made at a squadron reunion in July 2010. Shortly thereafter a Board of Directors was formed including Gary Bright, Dave Bushlow, Tom Constantine, Art Friend, Red Trivette, Larry Wright, and Ed Kufeldt as the Executive Director. Bob Whaley volunteered to assist as an Advisor, Katy Stewart agreed to provide administrative support, and Wayne Wright was consulted to design the memorial. LtGen William R. Maloney and LtGen William J. White-who each completed a tour as a squadron commanding officer in Vietnam-agreed to be Honorary Chairmen of the project.

Several early concept sketches were evaluated broadly, from which many more iterations were then considered by the Board of Directors. The selection of the winning concept came unanimously-it was clear the design had embraced the Board's aspirations to properly honor those who had bravely served and died. The meaning of the design as envisioned by Wayne Wright:

"The sculptural shape of the monument is derived from the airfoil of an aircraft wing. This shape is essential to flight and it represents both the core and the vitality of the squadron. The wing has been severed at its tip and rests on edge, rising from the ground. This is meant to depict the disruption of flight; the loss of life and our eventual fall to a place of rest back on earth. While the base of the wing is earthbound, its tip projects skyward, suggesting the desire to rise again to the heavens. And so, through this structure we honor those squadron members who have fallen to rest on earth, but in memory and spirit, still soar above."

Etched into each side of the polished granite of the memorial are the names of those killed in combat operations who served in VMO-6. The design also pays tribute to the proud history of the squadron through the depiction of some of the key aircraft flown by its members.

The final component of the design is the walkway surrounding the memorial. This path not only allows the viewer direct connection to the sculpture, but also an implied connection with the squadron through the inclusion of commemorative bricks within that will bear the name of those who also served in VMO-6.

The memorial was sculpted from a single 3-ton slab of jet black granite, quarried in India. This stone is one of the finest materials used for monuments due to its purity of color, high contrast between etched and polished surfaces, extreme hardness and overall durability. Modlich Monument Company oversaw the shaping, polishing, and etching. They erected the structure with the assistance of the Firvida Construction Company who built the foundation and surrounding walkway.

The outstanding support and generous financial contributions from squadron members and VMO-6 family and friends were key in building the memorial. Thanks to the dedication of the many volunteers, the vision and commitment of the Board of Directors, and the donations made by over 225 people and organizations, the project became a reality in 18 months. As a result, today we are able to pay tribute to VMO-6 within our own lifetime and honor its legacy beyond.

ABBREVIATED HISTORY VMO-6

VMO-6 had a distinguished record and one of the longest combat histories of any squadron in the Marine Corps. It was always in the forefront, utilized new aircraft, tested new ideas and technology, and developed many "firsts" within Marine aviation.

VMO-6 antecedents reach back to 1920; activ ated as Flight E, 3rd Air Squadron and redesignated as VO-6M in 1927. In early 1928, the squadron embarked aboard USS Saratoga and began a nine month tour fighting the Sandinista guerrillas in Nicaragua. During combat operations, pilots flew in the roles of reconnaissance, aerial photography, light attack as well as aerial resupply. Two years later at Quantico, VA, the squadron formed six- and nine-plane flight demonstration teams called the "Helldivers." While the team was a favorite among spectators and the media, personnel and budget constraints caused the Marine Corps to deactivate the squadron on 30 June 1930.

As the need for aerial observation and artillery capabilities increased in the Pacific during WWII, the squadron was reactivated on 20 November 1944 and re-designated as VMO-6. From 1 April to 6 July 1945, the squadron supported the Battle of Okinawa on a variety of missions including artillery spotting, reconnaissance, message delivery, wire laying, and general utility missions. From October 1945 to January 1947, VMO-6 deployed to Tientsin, North China and flew similar missions -often under intense fire--in support of the occupation prior to the communist takeover.

On 2 August 1950, VMO-6 arrived in Korea with six helicopters and eight fixed wing aircraft. The following day, the squadron became the first to fly a helicopter in a Marine Corps combat operation. Within the first week in-country, the squadron flew the Marine Corps' first helicopter medical evacuation and night medical evacuation. Squadron helicopters immediately proved their combat capabilities and worthiness for medical evacuations, search and rescue, reconnaissance, and command and control. Fixed wing aircraft were flown as convoy escorts in addition to observation, artillery and Naval gunfire spotting, leaflet dropping, and reconnaissance.

Beginning 27 July 1964, VMO-6 received the first turbine-powered helicopters in the Marine Corps. From September 1965 through October 1967, the squadron was based at Ky Ha, Vietnam, in combat support of Marine Forces in I Corps. Flying helicopter "gunships" armed with air-to-ground rockets and M-60 machine guns, aircrews of four conducted missions to include: escort of transport helicopters, close air support of ground forces, Tactical Air Controller (Airborne) of fixed-wing aircraft, artillery spotting, Naval gunfire control, reconnaissance, and medical evacuation. In October 1967, VMO-6 relocated to Phu Bai and a month later to Quang Tri. In November 1968, the squadron converted its high wing aircraft to twin engine turboprop aircraft armed with air-to-ground rockets and fixed machine guns.

With the drawn-down of military commitments in Vietnam, the squadron relocated to MCAS Futenma, Okinawa in October 1969.

On 1 January 1977, VMO-6 was deactivated.

Platoon 2085

Platoon 2085, L Company, Second Recruit Training Battalion, MCRD Parris Island held its first Reunion since graduating in November, 1966. The gathering was held in conjunction with the Annual Reunion of the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. in Washington, DC in August, 2012. Of the nearly eighty Marines who graduated, twenty-one were able to attend at the gracious invitation of the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc.

Mike Boyle, Bill Simons, and Brian Vanderheyden were able to track down forty-seven of the 2085 Platoon members and at the suggestion of Big John Pessoni, invited all to participate in the get together. The Platoon was especially honored by the presence of First Sergeant Ben Leith, USMC Retired. First Sergeant Leith was Senior Drill Instructor for the Platoon and travelled from Kingman, Arizona with his lovely wife Jackie. It was universally agreed that while First Sergeant was in 1966 thought to be the meanest man alive, he may have softened just a bit. It was also agreed that the rigorous training at PI by then Staff Sergeant Leith limited the loss of life in Vietnam to but three Marines from Platoon 2085. At a Platoon dinner, a moment of silence was observed in memory of Davis A. Jones, Andrew M. Hudak, and William A. Markarian, KIA in Vietnam.

It was agreed that this would be the first of many Reunions. Phil Muth said, "I was most pleased with seeing how good everyone looked and how well everyone is doing." Jose Ruiz stated, "It was much better than I thought it would be." Ray Peterson said, "As much poking fun at each other and sharing tidbits of our lives since Vietnam with each other, I was truly taken by the amount of mutual respect we showed each other during the entire reunion. That was impressive!" Dan Depagnier to SDI Leith, "Thanks for showing us how to stay alive under such terrible conditions. Top, we owe it all to you." Art Caldwell, "Just to go back reliving those memories with the people you shared them with, was much more than I expected." Mike Boyle said, 'Top, thank you for making me the Marine I still am today."

In addition to First Sergeant Leith, 2085 Platoon Marines in attendance were: Michael Boyle, Arthur Caldwell, Daniel Depagnier, Patrick Devine, John Dezso, CWO 4 Peter Frederiksen, USMC Retired, William Genovese, Pasquale Guarino, Ford Kilgallon, Phillipp Muth, Edwin Olavarria, John Pessoni, Raymond Peterson, John (Chris) Rice, Donald Romeo, Jose Ruiz, William Simons, David Thompson, John Tirino, and Brian Vanderheyden; all of whom wish to thank the Khe Sanh Veterans Inc., with special thanks to Tom Eichler, John Pessoni and Russ Turner.

If invited back to future Khe Sanh Veterans events Platoon 2085 promises not to consume ALL the supply of The Glenlivet.

Sgt Amber Blanchard, USMC

In the early morning hours of 21 Jan ,1968, the North Vietnamese Army attacked the outpost of Khe Sanh with a shower of bullets and artillery that instantly killed 18 Marines and injured 40 more. Thus began the Battle of Khe Sanh, the longest and second deadliest battle of the Vietnam War. Marines, sailors and soldiers held the isolated airstrip in the Quang Tri province for 77 days before breaking through and allowing supplies to reach the siege-worn men.

Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. is an organization created to commemorate the service members who served in the Khe Sanh Combat Base and tactical area of operations from 1962 to 1972. Marines with the 22nd Marine Expeditionary Unit welcomed these veterans to their annual reunion at the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, Va., Aug. 30, 2012.

The Khe Sanh veterans and their families took the opportunity to share their experiences with the young Marines and sailors of the MEU.

"I would like to welcome you to your museum," said Ron Christmas. "This is dedicated to every Marine who has ever served and their heritage." When the Khe Sanh Marines, sailors and families arrived, the officers of Khe Sanh Veterans Inc. took a moment to recognize current members and remember the Marines who since passed.

"We remember these people that have passed away from our units, especially Khe Sanh," said Ron Rayner, chaplain for Khe Sanh Veterans Inc.

"There were over 2,100 guys killed from the Khe Sanh area from 1962-1972, and they did it for us … We owe it to them to live a good life."

After the opening ceremonies, Col. James D. Christmas, commanding officer of the 22nd MEU, greeted the Khe Sanh Marines and encouraged them to share their stories with the young Marines.

Retired LtGen. Ron Christmas, president of the Marine Corps Heritage Foundation greeted the Marines and sailors of the MEU.

"Most of my Marines have served in combat now multiple times," said James Christmas. "But they don't know the rest of the story. You are the rest of the story. You've been in combat, you came back from combat and you lived the rest of your lives, and you've lived them successfully … those in uniform today appreciate you, for you made us. You made us who we are and what we are today."

Marines of the 22nd MEU enjoyed interacting with the Khe Sanh veterans and exchanging stories with their brothers. It was a good time, it felt motivating and encouraging," said Sgt. Christopher Williams, a motor transport mechanic with the 22nd MEU, and a New York City native. "It makes you appreciate everything they did in the past so we can have the future we have today."

MARINE PILOT SAYS GOD PULLED HIM THROUGH VIETNAM CRASH

On June 8, 1967, Marine Capt. Boyd L. "Bo" Barclay was copilot of a UH-1E helicopter gunship assigned to a visual reconnaissance mission near Khe Sanh. His pilot said he saw something along a tree line and wanted to make a gun run. They made a strafing run on that area and came back around.

"As we were pulling up they opened up on us and the first burst got the engine," Barclay said. "We started going down."

Barclay switched radio channels and started calling "Mayday. Mayday."

"The next burst came through the ####pit and hit me in the hand, blew my hand up and I didn't see any hand there," he recalled. "And I said, 'I'm hit!'"

He reached over to grab a pressure point and the next thing he heard the pilot say is, "I'm dead. I'm dead." He turned and looked at the pilot who was hanging in his straps.

A pilot has procedures to follow if their plane is hit by gunfire and loses an engine, Barclay said. They were pulling up, and normally the action would call for the use of two hands. His hand was gone so he had to use what was left of it to begin the landing procedure.

"I knew I couldn't take it into a clearing so I was looking for some trees," he said. "We're in the mountains. I wanted to be as close to a valley as I could."

He used his leg as well and hung on as they descended through the trees to cushion the landing. They hit and rolled over. Barclay laid there for a minute.

When he smelled smoke he climbed out of the crippled helicopter. The two crewman were on the ground, in a daze. Barclay asked for a tourniquet to put on his arm. A crew member began working on it. Then the enemy began firing on them from the hills. A second helicopter gunship was shooting at the enemy position.

The survivors took cover and talked about getting the pilot out of their downed helicopter. Barclay intended to go get him out by using his survival knife to cut through the canopy of the helicopter, but he took a few steps and fell on his face, thinking his leg was broken (it turned out to be his ankle).

"They pulled me back and said, 'He's dead sir.'"

Barclay said two young Marines started dragging him up the side of the mountain on their hands. As he was being dragged, he noticed his mangled hand was not bleeding.

At the top of the mountain a helicopter landed to pick them up. Barclay was transported to California where he spent about three months in the hospital recovering from his wounds.

For his actions that day, Barclay was awarded the Silver Star and the Purple Heart.

"By his courage, exceptional presence of mind, and selfless devotion to duty in the face of extreme personal danger, Captain Barclay upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service," his Silver Star citation reads.

THE HIDDEN STORY

Barclay said there's a story behind the story. He spoke about the nature of special operations missions, about how he was told during a briefing about what usually happened to crew members if they were shot down.

A couple of weeks before he was shot down, he was in bed one night and started thinking, getting scared, not about dying, but about how he didn't want to let anybody down.

"So I started praying," said Barclay, who became a Christian at age 16. All of a sudden out of nowhere the 23rd Psalm came to him.

"Literally, in that hooch, there were about eight of us, a bright light came in. It was like the Lord came down, touched me and said, 'Never fear. I will be with you.' And the fear just flowed out of me."

When he was shot down, the valley of the shadow of death, words from the 23rd Psalm, were all around him, Barclay said.

"But I was never scared because a few weeks earlier the Lord had assured me that He was gonna take care of me," he said.

Barclay said when he tells people about the story he says he's alive for three reasons — for some reason God wanted him to be alive, his Marine Corps training and he was rescued by those two young Marines.

CHANGING TIMES

During leave back in the states, flying from airport to airport on his way to Oklahoma, Barclay was in uniform wearing a prosthesis on his arm and a walking cast on his leg.

"It was more or less like I was a leper," he said. "Nobody talked to me."

Today, Americans will go up to troops and thank them for their service, Barclay said. When he travels he wears a Purple Heart shirt and has been upgraded to first class on an airliner as a thank you. He receives thank yous for his service even.

"I'm really happy for these young troops today for the recognition that they're getting as far as what they're doing," Barclay said referring to troops who served in Iraq and Afghanistan. "These young men and women are 100 percent volunteers."

Barclay said they are well-trained soldiers who make sacrifices for their country including serving multiple tours in war zones.

About a month ago Barclay learned that he had been nominated for induction into the Oklahoma Military Hall of Fame.

"It's an honor. It really is," he said. "I'm proud of my service to our country and the Marine Corps. That's something special to be recognized in your home state. It makes you feel good."

Barclay said having been overseas, seeing the comparison, he tried to teach his children and his grandchildren about what a great country the United States is. He said he remembers the veterans who fought in previous wars to preserve the nation and its freedoms.

FOR LOCAL VIETNAM VETERAN WAR MEMORIES LINGER

By Kirsti Marohn

ROBERT HOLSCHER HQ BTRY 1/13

A half century has changed so much, but somehow not erased anything. When Bob Holscher describes the mountain plateau known as Khe Sanh where he spent 10½ months early in the Vietnam War, you can smell the dusty red clay, feel the booms of artillery fire, taste the rubbery C-rations.

He can tell you about the day his unit of Marines arrived after a long convoy at Khe Sanh, nothing but a sea of elephant grass. The order came: "Gentlemen, build your city." They began digging the foxholes and bunkers where they would live, and where some would die.

He can tell you the exact day — Jan. 21, 1968, his 21st birthday — when the North Vietnamese attacked the base, leaving craters, destroying the ammunition dump and setting off a chain reaction of earth-shaking explosions.

He can point to a faded Kodak Instamatic photograph of four Marines in dusty fatigues, name each one of his closest friends, tell you where they are now. Jake, injured when artillery hit their bunker, now a retired firefighter in Boston, sends a Christmas card every year. Robbie died two years ago of pancreatic cancer, likely from exposure to Agent Orange. Moose, last heard living in California but fallen out of touch, perhaps because he wants to leave the war behind him.

Holscher can relate. For many years, he never talked about Vietnam. Now he will, but only when asked. When he does, it's with clarity and insight that only time and healing bring.

"It was hard before, but it gets easier as I get older," said Holscher, 65, seated at the kitchen table in his home in Haven Township. "I remember a lot of the good things. I buried a lot of the bad things."

In May, President Barack Obama proclaimed a 13 year commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the Vietnam War that will last until Nov. 11, 2025. Obama called on the nation to "pay tribute to the more than 3 million servicemen and women who left their families to serve bravely, a world away from everything they knew and everyone they loved."

U.S. involvement in the conflict began in earnest in 1962, when American helicopters carried South Vietnamese fighters on a raid. It marked the first time American forces participated in major combat in that southeast Asian country. Eventually, the conflict escalated to involve more than 500,000 American troops in Vietnam. By the time the last U.S. troops withdrew in 1975, more than 58,000 had died.

There were about 7.5 million Vietnam-era veterans in the United States in 2011, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. Many still struggle with the effects of their wartime experiences, including post-traumatic stress. Like so many other veterans, Holscher's experiences fighting an elusive enemy in an unfamiliar country and the bonds he formed with his fellow soldiers left a lasting impact that helped shape the rest of his life.

Holscher never imagined himself a Marine, never imagined spending a lifetime helping other veterans. Growing up in tiny Earlville, Iowa, he'd assumed he would be a career Navy man, following in the footsteps of five uncles who'd served in World War II.

After graduating in 1965, he'd enrolled at the University of Iowa in Iowa City as a physical education major. But after a year, university officials told him if he didn't raise his grades, he wouldn't be welcome back.

The buildup of U.S. troops in Vietnam was beginning. Holscher had a high draft number, but he went to talk to a Marine recruiter. The Marine Corps was offering a two-year enlistment, and Holscher signed up. It was one of the smartest things he ever did, Holscher says, although he knew he'd likely end up in Vietnam.

"At certain times I was afraid. Other times, you get gung-ho and you say OK, let's go," he said. "They have a way of motivating you so you want to go out and do what you're trained to do."

He trained in San Diego, then was sent overseas to Okinawa, Japan, as part of an artillery unit. After two months, he was shipped to Danang Harbor, then to Quang Tri Province, then in a long convoy up to Khe Sanh, a primitive U.S. base near the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

In the beginning, it was relatively quiet.Holscher's photos show Marines dressed casually, no bullet-proof vests or helmets. That changed on Jan. 21, 1968, when the North Vietnamese attacked. From then on, the base was under constant assault One of Holscher's prized possessions is a bulging photo album his mother started while he was in Vietnam, filled with photographs he sent home of the barren landscape and grubby Marines grinning for the camera. There are also dozens of yellowed clippings about Khe Sanh from the local Iowa newspapers.

Photos also cover the wall of Holscher's office: Himself in a sharp Marine dress uniform, blond crew cut, black-rimmed glasses, mouth set in a determined line. Next to it, his son, also a Marine, like a mirror image. In another grainy shot, Holscher and two others huddled around a single bottle of booze smuggled in by a fellow soldier returning from leave, pretending to squeeze out the last few drops from the bottle. Holscher points to a smiling Marine leaning into the photograph. Wilbert "Willie" Stovall, killed just 11 days before he was scheduled to return home to Pennsylvania. Holscher was the one chosen to escort his body and stay with him while the officers went through his personal effects.

Some soldiers said they had a feeling they would be killed, or that a bullet had their name on it. Holscher never had those feelings. He never doubted he was coming back from Vietnam. The day he returned to the United States, his family met at the airport. His family wasn't the hugging type, but Holscher's father hugged him then, the only time he remembers.

No one spit on him or called him a baby killer. But there were no welcome-home ceremonies, either. Things are much different for today's returning troops, and Holscher is glad.

After the war, Holscher returned to the University of Iowa, but his future as a phy-ed teacher or coach looked bleak. After President John F. Kennedy's call for increased physical fitness, many students pursued phy-ed majors, and there were no vacant coaching jobs. Holscher switched his major to recreation, hoping to run an outdoors camp someday. As a class assignment, he helped organize an activity for disabled veterans at the VA in Iowa City. He impressed one of the administrators, who later offered him a part-time recreation job that eventually became permanent.

Holscher got married, divorced, quit college, started again. He finally graduated after 8½ years. He decided to reenlist in the Marines, shaved his beard and went to officer candidate school in Quantico, Va. But an old leg injury came back to haunt him, and a doctor declared him not physically qualified. For the second time, Holscher was honorably discharged.

Holscher asked the VA to give him the first recreation job that opened up, and was assigned as a recreational therapist in North Chicago. For the rest of his career, Holscher would bounce around the country to eight VAs, including Roseburg, Ore., Buffalo, N.Y., and St. Louis, first organizing recreation activities, then as the head of voluntary services.

He met his wife of 32 years, Julia. They had two daughters. Eventually, a job opened up in St. Cloud, and the family moved north.

Holscher worked with members of community organizations to donate their time working with veterans. Many of the volunteers are veterans themselves.

"They want to be useful again," Holscher said. "If they're a veteran, they have the inclination to do something for other veterans. So they come out of the VA saying, 'What can I do?' "

Holscher saw many Vietnam veterans struggle with the same problems, but many don't want to face up to them. He understands.

"When I came back from Vietnam, I put it out of my mind, too. And I tried to join society, because society was just going along the way it was.

"You go from living like a dog and carrying a rifle and waiting to kill people ... And all of the sudden, it's 'Yes ma'am' and 'no sir,' and you couldn't swear, and you had to do things like it was before. And that was a transition. So you just throw Vietnam out of your mind.

"As you get older, it starts coming back to you. And you learn to accept it."

Compared to other veterans he saw who struggled to walk or feed themselves, Holscher would think, God, I'm fortunate. Although his employers often encouraged him to get tested for post-traumatic stress disorder, he didn't feel the need.

When Holscher finally did, the diagnosis was a 30 percent service-connected disability due to PTSD. "My girls were always fond of saying, 'Dad, you're only 30 percent crazy,' " he recalls with a laugh.

Has it affected him? Holscher isn't sure.
"Do I want to go back and do things over? I'd love to do different things," he said. "But I'm happy where I'm at."

Now retired, Holscher has seen the VA's mission expand and change, from once an inpatient program to now almost all outpatient. He's seen new waves of veterans, young but struggling with serious problems, many of them National Guard and reserve troops with families. He worries about the vets who have served multiple tours in Iraq or Afghanistan, something that didn't happen during Vietnam.

He hadn't thought about 50 years having passed since the start of the Vietnam War. In his family, there's a more important date: April 19, the day Holscher returned home from the war. His mother made it family holiday and flew the flag every year on that day. His daughters picked up the tradition. They still celebrate it every year.

For many years, Holscher didn't talk about his war experience, didn't trust those who talked too much about it. His wife and kids bought him books and movies about Vietnam, but he hasn't watched or read any of them.

"Everybody has a different story," he said. "And I have my story, and that's good enough for me. I really don't need to hear about somebody else's story."

Holscher says he's extremely proud of being a Vietnam veteran, but calls it a terrible war and says the United States had no business getting involved.

He recalls that when people were getting killed at Khe Sanh, the leaders told the troops they were doing an important service.

"They kept saying, 'They died for a cause. They died for a cause.' Well, after the siege was over, they closed the base ... They kept making us think it was so important, and all of the sudden they said it wasn't important enough and so they closed the base. And that bothered me."

Still, Holscher never considered joining the protest movement when he returned home.

"That would go against all the people that served there. I want to think that they did something good," he said.

"You fight for your country. Whether your country is right or wrong, you fight for your country. I guess, when called on."

OUR ASSOCIATION

Craig W. Tourte

I have had the privilege now for a number of years of attending the Khe Sanh Association Reunion. I have to tell you that starting off it was extremely difficult for me emotionally, but in the end I knew it would be a positive once I was able to get through the tears and memories. Through this process I have had the opportunity to get know the various members and officers of the Association. Oh I know we all thank the primary officers for all of their hard work for putting the reunion, magazine and apparel exchange together, but I think many do not really understand the commitment involved. I'll mention Tom Eichler, Russ Turner and John Pessoni as the present driving force of this Association and what a finely toned machine of committed, long term directors and board members they are.

I'll crack the door open here just a bit and let you peek into a meeting of the Board of Directors. Now through these many years I have sat in on a number of various meetings on a variety of issue which have been chaired by hard charging CEO's, company presidents, lobbyists and politicians. I'll report the Khe Sanh Association Board of Directors meetings are as fair and committed to procedures, representation and excellence as any that I have attended. I can't say this strongly enough, the commitment of those mentioned in honesty, time and dedication is indefinable and I look forward to many more reunions and the comradely they provide.

COLONEL LOWNDS HONOR AND REMEMBERANCE BRICK

By Craig W. Tourte

The 2012 Khe Sanh Reunion held in Washington D.C. was not only memorable but also historic in terms of our place in American and Marine Corps history. Tom Eichler, President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. dedicated plaques at a ceremony honoring Colonel David E. Lownds and Colonel William H. Dabney held at the National Museum of the Marine Corps (NMMC), Quantico Virginia. The plaques can now be viewed by approximately 500,000 visitors to the Museum and the Semper Fidelis Memorial Park each year.

The location of the plaques placement is on the beautiful stacked stone memorial wall, a few steps from the General John A. Lejeune Rally Point. This dedication and the plaques will forever hold a special place in the history of our Association and the United States Marine Corps.

As those who attended the ceremony gathered together we watched and appreciated the entire Headquarters Unit from 22nd MEU stand in formation in our honor and join us for the dedication. At the entrance to the mile long winding paths at the Memorial Park and along the pathway, engraved bricks are placed with contain names of those others wished to honor or remember.

As I stood in the crowd preparing to walk to the dedication site, Steve Wiese who was standing next to me told me to look down at my feet. As I looked down I noted a brick with the engraving Col David Lownds, Saipan, Iwo Jima, Korea, Khe Sanh. In addition to the brick honoring Colonel Lownds I noted three bricks next to the Colonel placed in honor of Colonel Lownds family who were also in attendance at this dedication. Those bricks were engraved with the following:

Lt Gen Ron Christmas, 1962-1966, Hue City (Son-in-law),

Brian Christmas, Major, USMC (Grandson)

Jimmy Christmas, Col, USMC, (Grandson).

It was an honor and I was sure it was destiny to actually be standing near Lownds engraved brick and those of his family during this most historic occasion.

50 YEARS AFTER ITS START, VIETNAM STILL NOT HISTORY FOR ITS VETERANS

By Matthew Daneman

CHARLES MACALUSO E CO 2/26

For years, Chuck Macaluso lived with a secret.

The Rochester native served his country during the Vietnam War, fighting in the infamous Battle of Khe Sanh as a member of the 5th Marine Division, 26th Regiment, 2nd Battalion, Echo Company. He received three Purple Hearts for various non-life-threatening injuries. And when he came home in 1969, he shut up about it all.

"You didn't even want to wear your uniform home," said Macaluso, 65, of Greece. "In the airports, they used to have these groups, anti-war people, and the least hassle was just not to wear the uniform."

Other vets, meanwhile, "weren't backing Vietnam veterans because they said we lost the war," Macaluso said. "There were a number of (veterans') organizations that wouldn't let Vietnam vets join because they said it wasn't a real war. "So you just didn't say much, just kept everything inside."

Thomas DeMond Sr., who was drafted in 1970, ended up serving with the Army's 18th Military Police Brigade and was based out of the Long Bihn base.

"When I got home, I got told 'take that uniform, throw it away.' The attitude was forget about it," said DeMond, today a retired Rochester School District teacher and commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 9251 Pennington-Moye. "Vietnam wasn't a popular war."

The Vietnam War — which polarized and traumatized American society, even as it claimed 58,000 American lives — arguably kicked off 50 years ago this year with Operation Chopper, as Army-flown helicopters took South Vietnamese soldiers to fight near Saigon. That marked United States's first combat missions against the Vietcong. The first American combat troops would arrive three years later. And by 1975, when the last Americans pulled out of Vietnam, an estimated 28,000 Rochesterians had served there, and 280 were killed or went missing.

Today, Vietnam veterans are applauded when they march in local parades. Their sacrifice is immortalized at the Greater Rochester Vietnam Veterans Memorial at Highland Park. And they are remembered on Veterans Day alongside the dwindling numbers of World War II and Korean War vets, the Desert Storm/Desert Shield vets and the growing number of people returning from Iraq and Afghanistan.

But that moment was a long time coming. It took years for Vietnam veterans to shake the Deer Hunter/Platoon stereotype of the permanently damaged, borderline psychotic warrior.

"(Rambo star) Sylvester Stallone set us back probably 20, 30 years," said Dick Grube, 64, of Perinton, who served in Vietnam from February 1967 to September 1968 as a medic with the Army's 44th Medical Brigade. "The movies are funny. But everybody pictures you like that and we weren't like that. There were a lot of guys who came home, got a job. I'll be married 40 years next year. I help in the community. I'm a successful businessman. We didn't all come home and run up and down with a big hunting knife and live in the woods. But that wasn't news."

The twin Iraqi/Afghani conflicts of the past decade have created a generation of another 2.3 million veterans, according to Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America.

But there are significant differences between Vietnam-era veterans and veterans today, such as far more women among the ranks, said James McDonough, a retired Army colonel and former CEO of Rochester's Veterans Outreach Center.
Perhaps most significantly is the nation having an all-voluntary force since the end of the draft in 1973, said McDonough, who now is the New York State Health Foundation's senior fellow for veteran affairs.

For Vietnam veterans, McDonough said, "You're off to a foreign land not by your own choice and I think it affects you. It affects you as you watch others around you dodge the draft, as you watch others around you not get your number called. Vietnam veterans, this issue of the draft has a direct link their feeling of being mistreated coming home."

Today, a number of Vietnam veterans still feel they've never gotten their due. "We didn't start getting any kind of credence until the Gulf War," said DeMond. "Certainly when they welcomed all those guys home, that was hurtful. They never said thank you to us."

Unsurprisingly, Vietnam veterans also carry more scars from their time in combat. The Centers for Disease Control's Vietnam Experience Study, which looked at the outcomes of Army veterans in the 1960s and early 1970s, found that Vietnam veterans suffered more from hearing loss and — more significantly — from certain psychological disorders such as depression, anxiety and combat-related post-traumatic stress disorder than their Vietnam-era counterparts who never saw combat.

At the same time, McDonough said, "The majority of individuals who returned from Vietnam — and Desert Storm and Iraq and Afghanistan come back — I don't want to use the word fine, there are issues—but they don't come back (permanently) damaged. The majority return and do just fine."

In dealing with those wartime experiences, local Vietnam vets run the gamut from those who compartmentalize their experiences and go on to live their lives to "the other extreme, where that experience just rules their lives, controls their lives, leads to horrible problems of PTSD, drug addiction, alcohol addiction, homelessness," said Barry Culhane, a Vietnam-era veteran and former president of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial of Greater Rochester Inc.

"I'm worried we're going to have much worse than that with these men and women (involved in Iraq and Afghanistan) who've gone three, four sometimes even five deployments," said Culhane, a longtime veterans advocate who was inducted into New York state Senate Veterans' Hall of Fame in May "I can't imagine how they keep themselves together, how they can keep their families together, how they can keep a career together. Down the road were going to face a major crisis for a lot of these returning veterans."

Veterans returning today in many ways face a very different landscape than Vietnam veterans did, from the provisions of the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994, to a U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs that has become in recent years far more responsive to veterans needs, DeMond said.

"If you call the VA, in their message, before you punch in where you want to go, it says 'If you're a recent veteran, thank you for your service,'" he said. "We never got that before."

Grube said he spent much of his time in Vietnam as an ambulance driver attached to an Army hospital outside of Saigon, primarily supporting the 25th and 9th infantry divisions. Since returning, he's spent most of his time as a partner running an auto parts supply business. He also helped found the Rochester Regional Veterans Business Council.

I think because I was so young (Vietnam) became an adventure rather than an event," Grube said. "If I'd have been 21, 22, I think I might've had a lot of problems. It amazed me one human being could do this to another human being. I kept thinking 'this is insanity' — I looked at it that way.
"I came home, I never had a nightmare, never had a bad dream."

But, he added, "It's with you every day. At some point during the day, maybe for 10 seconds something will remind you of something."

Through the 1970s, Macaluso and his wife, Joan, raised their two children while Macaluso worked at Eastman Kodak Co. And it wasn't until the early 1980s when he and others began being out about their time in Vietnam. Macaluso has been part of Vietnam Veterans of America Chapter 20 since its founding in 1983. "It probably was in the '90s a lot of the bigger cities were putting in all their own Vietnam veterans memorials and we'd take trips for their openings," said Macaluso, vice president of Chapter 20 and president of the board of the Greater Rochester Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

Serving there "definitely affected your life," Macaluso says. "I go back to Vietnam every day. You can never really get all the things that took place out of your head. You think about it but you learn you have to cope and move on. Also it makes you more appreciative ... you realize how lucky you were you weren't killed.

"It made me more ... I don't know know if you'd call it religious, but I make sure to go to church. When you see a lot of people around you getting hurt or dying and it's not you, you figure someone's watching over you."

BILL RIDER USMC KHE SANH VETERAN C CO 1/9 A HERO TO VETERANS

By Jamie Reno
Reno Dispatch

I'm proud to know Bill Rider. A friend and mentor to America's veterans for years, Rider, co-founder of American Combat Veterans of War (ACVOW), has helped thousands of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans make the sometimes tough transition from combat to civilian life

And for his efforts, Bill is finally getting the recognition he deserves. The San Diego Human Relations Commission (HRC) has just announced that Rider is the recipient of this year's Keith M. Turnham Humanitarian Award.

Each year this award honors a veteran who continues to be involved in public service. Bill, a Marine veteran who fought at Khe Sanh, the site of one of the Vietnam War's bloodiest battles, has dedicated his life to helping his fellow warriors.

A no-nonsense, straight shooting kind of guy, but also a man of great humor and warmth, Bill cofounded ACVOW in 2001, and ever since the organization has provided a variety of services to veterans and active warriors, including mentoring, advising and assisting veterans as well as active-duty personnel and military families. Bill and his fellow ACVOW staffers are especially skilled at helping warriors that are suffering from post traumatic stress (PTSD) and traumatic brain injury (TBI).

ACVOW, whose motto fittingly is, "Because sometimes the fight continues... even after the mission is completed," now has three offices in San Diego County.

A worthy recipient of this award if ever there was one, Bill, who'll be honored for both his military service to our country and for promoting human and civil rights in our community, will receive the special award at the annual Human Relations Commission Recognition Reception on Friday, Nov. 16 from 5:50 to 7:30 at the Balboa Park Club.

In a letter to Rider, commission chair Bruce Abrams and executive director Danell Scarborough wrote, "The commission is inspired by the tireless work you have done to support and assist combat veterans. We would like to thank and appreciate you for your compassionate concern and service."

I second that. Thanks, Bill, for all you do for veterans and their families

As for the namesake of this award, Turnham was a World War II veteran, prisoner of war, and Purple Heart honoree who detailed his story in his book, Death Denied. Turnham's community service included eight years as a HRC commissioner, and membership on numerous community groups, including the San Carlos Community Council, Mission Trails Regional Park and Navajo Community Planners.....

ACVOW staff members also speak on behalf of military personnel and veterans through regular speaking engagements and media appearances. To book an ACVOW speaker for your organization, please email Bill Rider at wrider@acvow.org.

ACVOW has been literally a lifesaver for so many veterans. Its staff members are available to speak, one-on-one, with military personnel and family members to help individuals cope with battlefield related stress. ROBERT J. CRABB

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c) (19) charitable organization.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2013 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David A. Lownds Award – for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)

The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award – for 2nd place achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award – for 3rd place achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

2. The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF committee Chair and the treasurer of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full year's award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

MERRY CHRISTMAS & HAPPY HOLIDAYS KHE SANH VETERANS
MAY YOU HAVE A HAPPY & HEALTY NEW YEAR

HAPPY BIRTHDAY TO ALL OUR KSV MARINES & CORPSMAN

As we pause to celebrate the 237th birthday of our Corps, we reflect on the rich legacy of service handed down to us, we recommit ourselves to the tasks at hand, and we look forward toward a bright future in service to our country.

Marines exist to fight and win our Nation's battles. We are most proud of our well earned reputation for answering the clarion call first. This was never more evident than at the epic battle of Guadalcanal 70 years ago. Picked to lead the first allied counter-offensive of the Pacific war because they were the "most ready," Marines landed on 7 August 1942 in the Solomon Islands. They persevered through months of unremitting deprivation and bitter combat. By the time the veterans of the Blue Diamond, the Cactus Air Force, our legendary Marine Raiders, and initial elements of the Follow-Me Division gathered together to raise a canteen and toast the birthday of their beloved Corps some three months later, the battle was no longer an issue. The situation was well in hand ... victory was assured.

We carry that same legacy of resolute commitment and valor today. Over the past year, Marines have stood firm in the toughest of circumstances and on numerous occasions. We've taken the fight to the enemy in Helmand and to the Horn of Africa. We've manned the ramparts of beleaguered embassies in the Middle East and North Africa, fought alongside our allies throughout the world, while behind the scenes, afloat and ashore, other Marines did the painstaking hard work required to maintain our high levels of readiness and efficiency.

As we look toward the future, we know that our sentimental place in the hearts of our fellow Americans and critical role in the defense of our way of life are assured. America has always wanted a Marine Corps .. .it's always been that way. Now, more than ever, America needs its Marines as we confront a dangerous and unpredictable world. Faced with difficult days ahead, we will continue to draw strength from our rich heritage and the shared values of the Marines to our left and to our right. We know who we are ... we know what we stand for. As ever we will strive to be found worthy of the legendary trust of our fellow Americans.

I salute the enduring faithfulness of those who have gone before, of those who wear our cloth today, and of the families who stand so resolutely at our sides. Happy Birthday, Marines!

Semper Fidelis,
JAMES F. AMOS
General, U.S. Marine Corps

Dear Mr. Eichler
My Thanks to all the Khe Sanh Veterans for your honor to Colonel Dabney with the installation of Memorial Plaques at the National Museum of the Marine Corps. My thanks for your invitation to attend the dedication and the awards banquet following. Unfortunately due to hip surgery I am moving slowly and must regret the wonderful invitations, but I will be with you in spirit. My thanks and love to you all.

Dear Khe Sanh Veterans,
To all of you who came and wrote and called and gave in Bill's memory. This brings thanks from his grateful wife and children. Our memories and gifts keep alive the lineage he claimed with such faith and pride He was one of the lucky ones who truly loved his life and had fun living it. His greatest attribute was his faith in his "troops," whether they were his family, his cadets, or especially his Marines. I was privileged to share that life. He could have accorded me no greater honor, nor could you by your contribution to his legacy.

With Love and Gratitude
Virginia Dabney

Ron Rayner, the KSV Chaplain Opened the ceremony reading the Plaques hanging on the memorial wall, honoring the 26Th Marine Regiment & Officers & Men who defended Hill 881S. KSV President Tom Eichler presented a personal Plaque Honoring Colonel Lownds to LtGen Christmas, Son-In-Law of Colonel Lownds and the immediate members of the Lownds Family. The plaque honoring Colonel Dabney was presented to Tom Esslinger, and other KSV members who served on Hill 881S. Virginia Dabney could not attend due to a recent injury(Tom Eichler read a letter of thanks Virginia wrote to the members of the KSV.) Colonel James D. Christmas C/O of the 22nd MEU presented a plaque to Tom Eichler, thanking the KSV for their service at Khe Sanh.

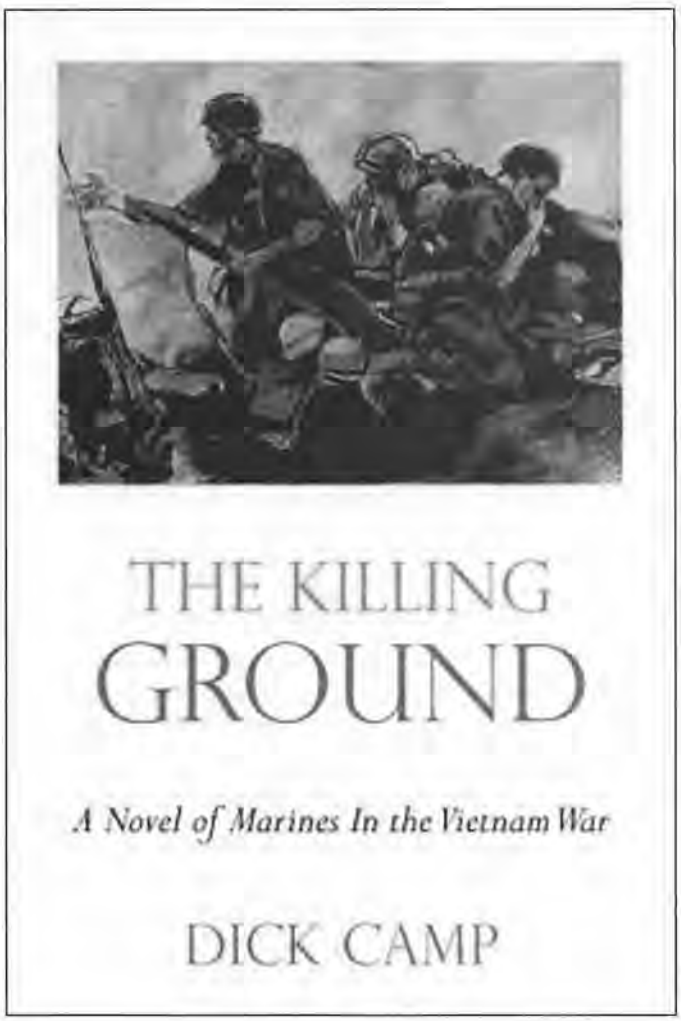
THE KILLING GROUND
A Novel of Marines in the Vietnam War
Dick Camp

Retired Marine colonel and military historian Dick Camp brings us an action-packed, edge-of-the-seat account of the early 1968 battles for Khe Sanh as follow-up to his first war novel, Echo Among Warriors. The narrative incorporates vivid fictionalized details of Camp's real-life experiences as an infantry company commander and assistant operations officer with the 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines, during the hard-fought assault and siege phases at Khe Sanh. It is an expertly drawn saga of war based on the author's expert knowledge of the time, the place, the techniques, and his fellow Marines.



The Killing Ground is a story of close combat in a life-or-death struggle between two opposing, equally committed adversaries. It represents a sequence of deadly encounters that reflect the reality of battle in the Vietnam War—intensely personal experiences that forever changed the participants. By incorporating intimate views of the "other side," this powerful fictional narrative, closely based on stark reality and written by someone who was there, making life-or-death decisions—makes it possible for the reader to experience both sides of the epic siege of Khe Sanh.

The book is available in ebook format at Amazon.com

The Killing Ground: A Novel of Marines In the Vietnam War

Excerpts

Lima Company
Defense Sector Red
Listening Post
01:30 2 January 1968

Halfway through his two-hour watch, LCpl Mike Redmond couldn't keep his eyes open. He was bone-tired and couldn't remember the last time he had gotten a good night's sleep. All he wanted to do was close his eyes for a second. The urge was overwhelming and he struggled manfully to stay awake, but gradually gave in to the impulse. His eyelids grew impossibly heavy, fluttering up and down, before finally closing. For a few seconds his head remained upright, then abruptly slumped forward, striking his chest and startling him to wakefulness. "Christ, I've got to stay awake," he groused and thought about waking one of his men but decided against it; they were just as tired as he was—and besides, it was his turn on watch. He forced himself to take another look around. His eyes swept over the ground in front of their hiding place, trying to pierce the darkness. Scattered clouds obscured the quarter moon but occasionally it broke through the cover and bathed the shrubbery in a pale light that formed bizarre shadows, which often took on the appearance of skulking intruders. The damn shadows played hell with his imagination. Once he frenziedly pulled the pin from a hand grenade when moonlight revealed several man-sized shrubs, swaying lightly in the breeze. He felt foolish and vowed not to let it happen a second time, as he struggled to replace the cotter pin.

As he continued to look, a shadow appeared at the head of the gully and he smiled—"I'm not going to get caught again," he thought, "It's just this tricky light." But this time he sensed it was different. A ghost-like figure materialized out of the darkness. Adrenalin surged through his system and he was instantly wide-awake. He broke out in a sweat—his heart thumped wildly—his mouth went dry—fear threatened to overwhelm him. Other shadowy forms emerged out of the ravine, almost invisible as they crept silently from shrub to shrub. "Gooks, gooks," his mind screamed and he reached out to alert his teammates.

Redmond and two other Marines of his fire team comprised the 2nd platoon's listening post—scouts positioned in front of friendly lines to give early warning. Redmond's team, radio call sign "Lima Two Two," lay hidden in a small clump of scrub growth some sixty long meters from the safety of the perimeter, near an old dead conifer, dubbed the "hanging tree" because of its odd-shaped, bent-up limb. Their concealed position overlooked a narrow ravine that emptied out directly in front of Lima Company's foxholes. The gulch formed a natural pathway, providing the enemy a concealed avenue of approach—and it was Two Two's mission to detect them—if they came. Now five hours into their watch, the enemy was here and the young leader had a job to do.

Redmond whispered a quiet warning to his men, praying that they didn't make any noise. Then he alerted his platoon commander over the PRC-25 radio that he had painfully jammed into his ear to muffle its static hiss. Faint man-sounds grew closer and he struggled to keep his imagination in check. A slight breeze rustled the grass sending a shiver of fear down his back. He imagined a rifle toting Vietnamese springing out of the darkness and fought to bring himself back from the edge of panic. "Calm down," he silently intoned several times. By sheer force of will, he regained control of his emotions and reached out to briefly grip the arm of the Marine at his side. The human contact steadied him even more and he turned his attention to the movement in the gulch. A ghostly form emerged out of the darkness and crouched down beside a bush, becoming invisible in its shadow. Redmond thought for a moment it was a figment of his imagination until other figures appeared, moving stealthily in a hunter's crouch, rifles at the ready. Suddenly the radio came alive, startling the hell out of him. At that moment he would have gladly smashed the damn thing to pieces, along with the operator who wanted a status report on the sighting. "Christ," Redmond thought, "If the gooks get any closer, I'll put'em on the radio and they can answer themselves."

CAPTAIN RICHARD D. CAMP JR. USMC

Redmond's heart thumped wildly and he was sure the North Vietnamese soldiers could hear it. They squatted in the grass only a few feet away. He could smell them—a combination of wood smoke and fish. A veteran of several close and personal encounters with the North Vietnamese, he immediately recognized the odor for what it was—gooks! He dared not make a sound, willing himself to remain motionless despite the myriad of nighttime insects that snacked on his face and arms. He desperately tried to slow his breathing but the adrenalin pumping through his system demanded oxygen. Sweat covered his face, stinging his eyes but he didn't want to run the risk of wiping it away—movement might cost his life. And, to add insult to injury, his rifle was lying by his side and he couldn't get it without moving. "What a f#####g mess," he bitched to himself. (END)

This photo was taken while he was MajGen Ray Davis' aide de camp in Vietnam. The general is facing the camera and he's on the right in a soft cover. The figure on the left is a company commander that is about to take his men on a helicopter assault. Note that he is not wearing a blouse, just flak jacket with a towel around his neck. This is the typical "uniform" of the 9th Marines in the Leatherneck Square area of the Northern I Corps. The figure behind the general is the Division's Sergeant Major...and if one looks closely, Marines can be seen in the elephant grass, just behind the Sergeant Major. As an aside, Gen Davis was the most highly decorated officer in the Corps...He had every personal decoration that one can receive for bravery in action...the Medal of Honor, Navy Cross, Silver Star, Bronze Star, Purple Heart...and a host of campaign medals and decorations for professional competence.

MINI REUNION, START OF SIEGE OF KHE SANH. 45TH ANNIVERSARY CHICO CALIFORNIA

JANUARY 21st PRESENTATION

By Craig Tourte
HQ BTRY 1/13

For those who are marking Jan 21st - with an occasion to remember, I thought it might be appropriate to POST the little introduction I'll be giving at our Chico gathering. It is written in a reading/speaking form so if it looks kind of funny with little comma's where they ordinarily would not be found that is the reason.

Thank you for joining us on the 45th Anniversary of the Siege at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. We are here to honor the over 2,000 who were killed and wounded in that battle and theater of operation. Some have likened that long and horrific Siege to the torturous Pacific hopping battles for Saipan, Iwo Jima, Tarawa and Okinawa. The battle at Khe Sanh stands as undeniable the longest and for those who survived, the most intense battle of the Vietnam War. The mention of Khe Sanh along with the great battles of Concord, Gettysburg and Normandy in President Obama's first inaugural address, forever confirms to our nation and the world that the Battle of Khe Sanh will forever hold a significant place in American History.

The Khe Sanh Combat Base was so remote, isolated and difficult to defend that Brigadier General Lowell English once said: "If you're at Khe Sanh, you're not really anywhere. You could lose it and you really haven't lost a #### thing." As President Lyndon Johnson sent off Marine reinforcements to I Corps from El Toro Marine Air Station on February 17, 1968, he told them: "This is a decisive time in Vietnam. The eyes of the nation and the eyes of the entire world, the eyes of all of history itself, are on that little brave band of defenders who hold the pass at Khe Sanh..."

Each year we sent aside the date of January 21st to remember those who stood in the trench line with us and to remember those who flew above in a desperate attempt to extract our wounded and dead, and we can never sufficiently express our gratitude to those who supplied us with the critical material necessary to persevere. We will never forget and are eternally grateful to those who made the dangerous, decisive and in some cases fatal, day and night bombing runs in their successful effort in preventing an estimated 20,000 enemy soldiers from swarming over the very thin defensive lines of concertina and shallow trenches occupied by the less then 6,000 exhausted, but determined defenders.

We are here to remember and honor those who fought and came home, as well as those who fought and didn't. I am sure I speak for all of the survivors of Khe Sanh when I say… I have never, ever, felt happier leaving anyplace in my life.

Today, let us also remember, not only those who fought at Khe Sanh but also those who have fought in all of our nations battles, and continue to fight this day for the freedom of all Americans. On behalf of Khe Sanh Veterans, thank you all for coming and God Bless America.

MAINE MARINES MARK 45 YEARS SINCE KHE SANH SIEGE

Henry R. Gagne, Ralph Sargent and Bill Witt recall 77-day battle at base near North Vietnam border

By Keith Edwards Staff Writer

AUGUSTA -- The last time Ralph Sargent and Bill Witt saw each other, 45 years ago, they were inside the U.S. Marine garrison at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, with about 6,000 other U.S. troops, under siege by some 30,000 of the North Vietnamese Army's best fighters.

Witt's job as part of what they called the pin cushion squad, keeping the base's wire communication system up and running, often left him exposed and unprotected from enemy fire. He had just been wounded for the third time.

Sargent, now of Augusta, gave a direct order to Witt, now of Harmony, to go home. Troops wounded three times were to be sent home, Sargent said. Witt, who said his third wound was a "minuscule" injury to his hand from debris from enemy rocket fire, didn't want to go. He wanted to stay and keep fighting with the buddies he had bonded with on the battlefield.

It was not a pleasant conversation, and Witt left angry.

When the two men were reunited recently, to discuss Monday's 45th anniversary of the start of the siege of Khe Sanh, one of the bloodiest and longest battles of the Vietnam War, they looked each other squarely in the eyes and exchanged a firm handshake.

"It's been a long time," Witt said to the man who rdered him out of Vietnam.

Later in the conversation, after fellow Khe Sanh veteran Henry Gagne, of Port Clyde, speculated that he had survived his time patrolling the surrounding jungle and hills of Khe Sanh because he was "just a lucky friggin' guy; I don't know why I'm still here," Witt spoke up about why he figures he survived the war.

"The only reason I'm still here is this guy kicked me out," he said of Sargent.

U.S. troops held off near-constant artillery and other attacks during the 77-day siege of the inland base just south of the North Vietnamese border. Other than inconsistent air support, they were stranded.

The seige officially started Jan. 21, 1968, and ended April 8 when U.S. and South Vietnamese forces reestablished an overland connection to Khe Sanh.

The number of casualties suffered by both sides at Khe Sanh has long been disputed. The official casualty figures released by the Marines include 205 deaths and 1,668 wounded. However, the Khe Sanh Veterans Association, founded by Vietnam historian Ray W. Stubbe, a Navy chaplain at Khe Sanh and founder of Khe Sanh Veterans Association, estimates 730 Americans killed in action in Khe Sanh. More than 2,500 were injured, according to multiple accounts.

After the battle for Khe Sanh, U.S. troops abandoned the base and leveled it in July 1968.

"That was a slap in the face," Witt said of giving up the base he and others had fought so hard to protect. "It was an exercise in futility. That's the way I look at it today. The loss of all those guys was a waste of humanity."

Gagne, an Augusta native, was in Khe Sanh from May 1967 to March 1968. He's still got shrapnel in his chest from an enemy mortar or grenade.

The point man and leader of a fire team, he spent much of his time outside the base, on patrol in the jungle -- so much so that the jungle, and the tall elephant grass he often had to plow through, rotted his clothes. Lacking supplies, he tied vines to his pant legs to keep them from falling apart.

The troops also lacked supplies, sometimes getting only one meal a day, sometimes two. Water was scarce as well, so much so that some would leave coats out overnight, hoping to catch dew to drink.

Because of the lack of water, the troops couldn't shower. Gagne said after he came out, after 77 days without a bath or shower, it took three showers to remove all the red clay and other dirt.

But some things you can't wash away.

Gagne spent many nights during the siege talking with a member of his fire team from Tennessee who, like him, was just 18 years old. One night his friend told him he had a feeling he wasn't going to make it home alive.

After Gagne took shrapnel in his abdomen, his team went out without him the next day. Gagne's friend took point, which was normally Gagne's position. The friend was killed on the patrol.

"I didn't believe he'd really been killed," Gagne said. "So I went to the morgue tent to see my buddy".

MARINE CORPS VETERAN HENRY R. GAGNE SPOKE ABOUT THE SIEGE OF KHE SANH

Some 30 years later, while he was at a Veterans Affairs hospital being treated for post-traumatic stress disorder, which had made him suicidal, Gagne and his wife went to visit the dead Marine's family and went to the cemetery where he was buried.

"It had been 30 years, and I hadn't cried once since I left 'Nam," Gagne said. "Seeing where he was buried, I cried like a baby. Khe Sanh is with me every day. You kind of take it a day at a time and do the best you can to keep our brothers' memories alive."

All three men said they're glad to see the warm reception veterans of recent wars have been getting upon their return from deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan. All of them also said they got no such welcome, returning from Vietnam. Sargent said he was once called a baby killer after he'd returned to the United States.

Witt said he has undergone treatment for cancer, which he thinks he got from exposure to Agent Orange in Vietnam.

They have each been recognized with various medals for their service, such as the Purple Heart and Silver Star.

Sargent was awarded the Bronze Star for his role in an attack, outside Khe Sanh, in which 35 Marines were killed while on patrol. He risked his own life to get wounded Marines to safety.

It was an award he didn't want to accept.

"At first I refused to wear it," Sargent said. "Now I wear it in honor of the 35 men killed that night."

Each of the three Marines said they have no interest in ever returning to Khe Sanh.

WEB BRIEFS

U.S.S. WASHTENAW COUNTY

By Craig Tourte

I'll admit I receive way too many magazines, pamphlets, advertisements, request for donations and the like. I enjoy reading the Vietnam Magazine I receive every few months and have admired the excellent writings of Khe Sanh Veteran Peter Bush through his many fine articles and even had the pleasure of meeting Peter at our 2011 Khe Sanh Reunion in Rochester, Minnesota. I was doing a quick glance through the just received February 2013 issue of VFW magazine when on page 30, I noticed - the now well published - photograph of the U.S.S. Washtenaw County. "The USS Washtenaw County cruises in Haiphong Harbor on June 29, 1973, proving the channel is safe for shipping..."

I had the pleasurable - sarcastic comment here - experience of sailing on this vessel from Okinawa to Vietnam sometime in the early weeks of July 1967. The U.S.S. Washtenaw Country (LST-1166) is a subject that has been covered a number of times on this board and Red Clay magazine but I continue to find the remembrance of that sail - now - humorous and interesting. Of course when I speak of the experience my stories seems to grow a little bit each time. I'll note just one here: I and another were way down below deck taking a nice long hot shower when a sailor of an unknown rank - brown uniform with one of those bomber hats - appeared and started yelling at us about using up all of the water. He said, "Haven't you ever heard of a Navy shower?" "Why no," we responded thinking perhaps it had something to do with a couple of sailors taking a shower together - you know how they are, those long cruises and all - anyway he told us to wet down, soap down and then rinse off. "Yes Sir" or something like that must have been our response. Anyway, after he leaves we continued with the last of the hot water from a pressurized shower we'd experience for a year. We did not know it at the time, but we were heading for a years long assignment to a small jungle outpost named Khe Sanh.

BROTHER OF MIA SOLDIER KILLED IN VIETNAM REFLECTS ON 2012 BURIAL

KHE SANH VETERAN SGT JOHN R. JONES TF1AE-SOG USA

ODESSA — At long last, James Jones felt "peaceful and calm" after 40 grievous years longing to embrace his valiant brother just as he has done symbolically at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Wall.

His brother's name is etched there in stately granite among the names of 58,200 fallen American warriors in the Vietnam War.

The peace that enveloped Jones in late 2012 was profoundly poignant at the Arlington National Cemetery four decades after his older brother, John Robert Jones, a 22-year-old Green Beret sergeant, had perished in combat on June 5, 1971. He had been missing in action (MIA) throughout those years.

"I always looked up to my brother," Jones, 58, said at his Odessa office of the Ector County Youth Center where he is facility director. "He has been my hero, being in (the United States Army's) Special Forces, something to be proud of, the best of the best."

John Jones was posthumously awarded the Silver Star for valor (gallantry in combat), the Bronze Star with Oak Leaf Cluster for heroic action and the Republic of Vietnam Gallantry Cross.

"He was my hero, the one I wanted to emulate, cool, laid-back, handsome young man," reflected Jones, who was 17 when his brother was declared MIA. "John was my big brother. We always looked up to him."

His brother, robust, stalwart and hearty at 5-foot-4 and 120 pounds, accomplished what James Jones, 5-foot-10 and athletically stoutly built, had envisioned for himself — honorably serving in the military.

Their late father, Samuel Houston Jones, served in World War II as a member of the Navy Seabees in building aircraft landing fields on Pacific islands and later became a career Army soldier.

John Jones was born in February 1949 in Kentucky and grew up in El Paso after his father was transferred to Fort Bliss.

SGT JONES WITH MONTAGNARD SOLDIER

James Jones' plans to serve in the military where thwarted when he suffered a serious high-school football injury that precluded military service but allowed him to serve in law enforcement.

His soldier-brother remained MIA until late in 2011 when two survivors of his outfit, platoon leader Jon Cavaiani and platoon radioman Larry Page, returned to the mountain-top post, site of Jones' last battle, with the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command (JPAC) to seek remains of Sgt. Jones. DNA markings confirmed his remains not found in previous searches and excavations.

Leading up to that two-day 1971 firefight in which he became MIA, Jones, an expert in light and heavy weaponry, and his platoon and the Montagnard commandos assigned to him were responsible for defending the top-secret "Explorer" radio-relay base atop Hickory Hill 950. The base was deep in enemy -held territory and overlooked the abandoned Khe Sanh Combat Base near the Demilitarized Zone.

The "Explorer" intercepted communist radio transmissions, including enemy troop movements, and was targeted by the enemy for destruction. Most of the platoon's soldiers had been evacuated by helicopter before the mountain-top post got "socked in," thereby leaving Jones, Cavaiani and Montagnard commandos to defend the "Explorer" post.

Cavaiani, who survived, was taken prisoner and later was awarded the Medal of Honor for "conspicuous gallantry" in the June 4-5 firefight.

"John was a real live hero, most definitely the best of the best," James Jones said of his brother. "He loved being outdoors, loved what he was doing (in the military),'" including training the Montagnards (Vietnamese mountain dwellers) commando tactics and skills.

"When he went to Vietnam, he was happy to be there. His whole attitude was he was a warrior. He wanted to serve his country."

Almost 42 years following his death, John Jones was accorded solemn rites at The Old Post Chapel and burial at Arlington National Cemetery across the Potomac River from the nation's capital. The imposing scene was of horseback soldiers attached to the celebrated Old Guard Caisson Platoon honoring the fallen warrior. Seven Old Guard soldiers fired three volleys each in honoring Jones.

"It is a fitting home for my brother, (being) with the other warriors and heroes," said James Jones, who was accompanied by his wife, Kathy, and his sister, Sammie Jones Rider.

The historic cemetery bears the watchword "Where Valor Proudly Sleeps" taken from the 19th-century haunting poem "Bivouac of the Dead" by Theodore O'Hara.

Especially affecting James Jones was meeting his "brother's (Green Beret) friends, great people, nice people, the type of people that this country would be proud of and are proud of, every one of them."

Among the platoon's survivors at the ceremony were Larry Page, platoon radio operator, who gave his John Jones MIA bracelet to the brother; Jon Cavaiani, Roger Hill, Skip Holland and Horace Boner.

For the 40 years after his brother was declared MIA, James Jones had never given up hope that someday his hero-brother would return home.

His faith in America's warrior ethos, expressed in the Soldier's Creed as "I will never leave a fallen comrade behind," remains ever hopeful. The JPAC estimated 88,000 Americans are MIA in the nation's wars since World War II and reportedly 1,200 of those are from the Vietnam War. JPAC's motto is "Until They Are Home."

"It is true," James Jones said gratefully, based on his brother's case, that America will "leave no one behind" and that its warriors "will never be forgotten."

ORGANIZER OF ANNUAL CHAPLAINS MEMORIAL IS RETIRING

EVENT HONORS SACRIFICE IN 1943 SHIP's SINKING

By Andy Fillmore
Correspondent

At least three Purple Heart recipients and three military chaplains who served in the Vietnam War under combat conditions were among the veterans helping conduct the Four Chaplains Memorial Ceremony at the Ocala-Marion County Veterans Memorial Park.

The ceremony commemorated four military chaplains who sacrificed their lives Feb. 3, 1943, to help others on a sinking ship transport troops during World War II. The ceremony was held at a memorial marker in the park dedicated to the "unity and sacrifice" of the clergymen.

The marker, placed Feb. 20, 2001, and sponsored by the Greater Ocala Ministerial Association, is the result of an effort spearheaded by Chaplain Lt. Cmdr. Elden H. Luffman U.S. Navy retired, who served in World War II and also was assigned to a U.S. Marine Corps ground combat troop regiment in the Vietnam War.

"In 2000, former county commissioner Tommy Needham, one of the designers of the park, asked me to install and dedicate a memorial to the four chaplains," said Luffman, who wrote the dedication litany for the monument and has organized the ceremony for 13 years.

A plaque on the monument describes the selfless act on the USAT Dorchester 70 years ago by the four chaplains, Lt. Alexander D. Goode, Jewish; Lt. George L. Fox, Methodist; Lt. Clark V. Poling, Reformed; and Lt. John P. Washington, Catholic; according to www.fourchaplains.org.

The men calmed the 902 servicemen, merchant seamen and civilian workers on board the ship as it sank after being torpedoed by German submarine U -223. Six-hundred-seventy-two lives were lost.

Survivors said the clergymen handed out their own life vests with no concern for denomination.

"They simply gave...to the next in line" according to the website, which also quotes survivors as saying the four chaplains were linked arm in arm in prayer as the ship slipped under.

"It was the finest thing I have seen or hope to see this side of heaven," said survivor John Ladd, according to the website.

Sunday's ceremony was the last organized by Luffman, 87, who said he is retiring from the volunteer effort because of his age and some health concerns.

Luffman said he was influenced by a chaplain when he first served in the Navy, but did not follow the calling to join the clergy until several years later. He joined the Navy in August 1943, first serving in Jacksonville as an aviation electrician's mate, and completed that leg of service in 1946.

Luffman returned to his native Ocala and married his wife Joyce - who he met at the McCrory's store formerly on the southwest corner of the downtown square - and worked at the Ocala Post Office.

"By January of 1956 I knew what I had to do," he said about being called to ministry.

He attended Stetson Universality in Deland and Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary in Wake Forest, North Carolina.

"I was a reserve Navy chaplain by 1961," he said. Luffman served at the Oceania and Norfolk Naval Air Stations and on Mediterranean and Caribbean sea duty deployments from 1963 to 1967. From January through September 1968, he was attached to the 1st Marine Regiment in Vietnam.

"The Battle of Hue City was perhaps the main battle of the Tet Offensive of 1968. It lasted one month (February 1968). After Hue City came Operation Pegasus, the joint operation of my regiment and the 1st Air Cavalry, to liberate the besieged Khe Sanh. My regiment was involved in a total of nine operations while I was attached," Luffman said.

"I saw far too many wounded and killed. We used to run out to meet the helicopters and help the casualties. I saw wounded Marines who were not religious pray like they never prayed before," he said.

"One soldier came in wounded. As I walked toward him, he started saying the Lord's Prayer. He didn't make it, but I'll never forget it. I can't think of a better way to go out," he said.

"The men made a sacrifice, especially rushing up into the hills around Khe Sanh, knowing they would not come back or come back whole," he added.

Luffman recounted many of his Vietnam War experiences in his book, "Bringing God to War," published in 2006 by Phillips Publications.

Chaplain U.S. Army Col. Lamar Hunt retired, also a Vietnam War veteran, has participated in local Four Chaplain ceremonies since 2001.

"Elden served during the Tet offensive in Vietnam, some of the most severe fighting," said Hunt. "Soldiers love mom and apple pie, but they fight for each other." some of the most severe fighting," said Hunt. "Soldiers love mom and apple pie, but they fight for each other."

Chaplain LtCdr Elden H. Luffman U.S. Navy retired salutes as the national anthem is sung during the Annual Memorial Service for The Four Chaplains at the Ocala-Marion County Veterans Memorial Park in Ocala, Fla., on Sunday February 5, 2012. Sunday's ceremony will the last organized by Luffman, 87, who said he is retiring from the volunteer effort because of his age and some health concerns.

During the ceremony, Purple Heart recipient the Rt. Rev. Arthur C. Rushlow of St. George Anglican Church of Ocala offered an invocation.

Charles F. Schmidt, a Purple Heart recipient with Military Order of the Purple Heart Ocala Chapter 466, and Comm. James A. Curley Sr. of the Brady-Owens Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 7193, gave the benediction.

Marion County Veterans Service Officer Jeffrey Askew introduced guests, including the keynote speaker, Chaplain Stan Beach of Leesburg, who is a retired Navy captain, Purple Heart and Bronze Star recipient, and National Chaplain for the Military Order of the Purple Heart.

Beach lost a leg in Vietnam in 1966 while serving in combat duty with the 3rd Battalion 4th Marines near Danang.

"The Marines love him because he was real and cared for them. He worked so close with the troops. Some of the Marines came by recently," said his wife, Ellen Beach, who assisted with a phone call to him because he has a hearing difficulty due to the effects of some early medication for his wounds.

"Stan will talk about the Four Chaplains being more of the heroes America needs today," she said.

A building housing the new U.S. Navy Chaplain School at Fort Jackson, South Carolina, has been named Stanley J. Beach Hall, she said.

"Usually, the names are used posthumously," she added.

GOLD STAR FLAGS PRESENTED TO FAMILIES OF FALLEN MARINES IN DULUTH

Dave Anderson

Northland's old soldiers. moved across the Great Hall of the Depot on Sunday to pay tribute to comrades who will remain forever young. This honor guard is helping to remember two Marines who fell in battle years ago.

"It's a gold star flag honoring our KIA's and their families." said Mike LaBelle.

The gold star has long been used to honor families who have lost loved ones in war. Mike Labelle is with a national group called "Honor and Remember Incorporated." His job is to give gold star flags to deserving families.

On Sunday, he delivered two banners to a pair of families who suffered loss. The first honoree was the family of Gerald Caldwell who lost his life in the Korean War. He joined Duluth's Marine Reserve unit at the age of 17. "He left and he was 18 on the ship going over to Korea." said Caldwell's sister, Patricia Breiland. Gerald Caldwell was killed in action a short time later.

The second family was that of Marine Lance Corporal Michael McKeever who fought in Vietnam. He was represented by mother LaVeryn and sisters Patty and Judith. "On his second tour just into a month he was killed at the Siege of Khe Sanh on the 23rd of February." said Judith McKever who was only 7 years old when her brother was killed.

Mike LaBelle of Honor and Remember Incorporated is a Navy vet of Viet Nam himself. That's why he finds it important to give these flags to families even 40, 50 and 60 years later.

"I lost seven of my buddies over in Vietnam when I was there and it's something that has to be done." said LaBelle.

For Gerald Caldwell's sister Patricia, it's something that she is glad is being done. She's touched that some of the vets from her brother's unit were at the Depot to see her get the gold star flag.

"I know they're remembering him, you know? But what else is there?" said Patricia.

Honor And Remember Incorporated is working to get their version of the gold star flag officially recognized by law. You can find out more at www.HonorandRemember.org

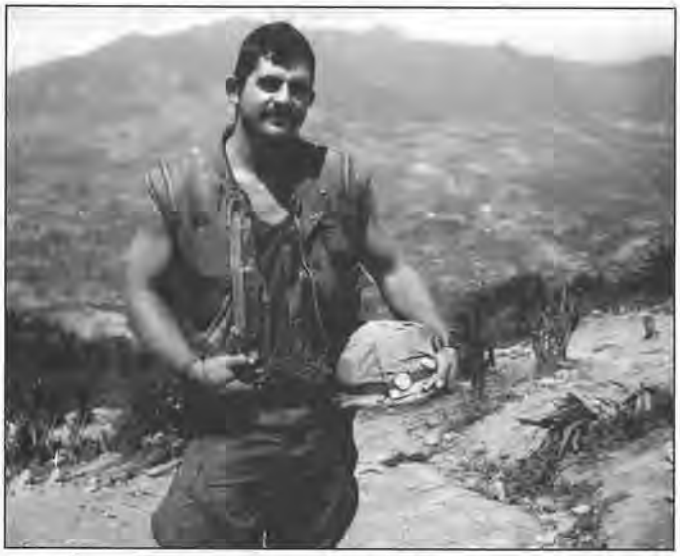
KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

DENNIS MANNION
USMC KILO CO 3/26 F/O

Sergeant Dennis Mannion has been selected as the Coginchaug football team's honorary captain for the Cromwell game on Thanksgiving.

Sergeant Mannion enlisted in the Marine Corps in January 1967. After boot camp at Parris Island, SC and infantry training at Camp Lejeune, NC, he attended Naval Gunfire School in Coronado, CA. In September of that year he departed for Vietnam and was assigned as an artillery forward observer with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 26th Marines.



SGT DENNIS MANNION

Kilo Company and other Marine Corps companies were sent to the remote Khe Sanh Combat base in December 1967 in response to a build up of North Vietnamese forces in the area. Kilo Company was tasked with the defense of an isolated hilltop outpost, Hill 861, where Sergeant Mannion was solely responsible for the artillery support for the base at Khe Sanh.

In January 1968, Khe Sanh was attacked by an estimated 40,000 North Vietnamese soldiers. During the 77 day Siege of Khe Sanh that followed, Sergeant Mannion conducted over three hundred artillery missions that helped thwart the NVA attempt to overrun the base and its 6,000 U.S. Marine defenders. Twice-wounded on that hill, Sergeant Mannion was awarded two Purple Hearts. He and the other defenders of Khe Sanh were awarded a Presidential Unit Citation.

When the 26th Marines departed Khe Sanh at the end of April 1968, he was sent to the 12th Marines located at Dong Ha. For the last five months of his combat tour he was part of a small Naval Gunfire team that operated along the coast of South Vietnam above the Cua Viet River near Dong Ha and below the Ben Hai River in the DMZ.

Home from Vietnam in October 1968, he served out the remainder of his enlistment at Camp Lejeune with 2nd ANGLICO. As part of that unit he spent four months in Guantanamo Bay and also took part in a 1969 summer Med-Cruise with Marine and other NATO Forces in Greece and Turkey. He was honorably discharged with the rank of Sergeant in December 1969.

Sergeant Mannion graduated from Notre Dame High School in West Haven in 1964 where he was a two year starter on the football team and a captain his senior year. He began his college career at the University of Notre Dame but he left South Bend after his sophomore year. After his stint in the marines he resumed his college career at the University of Connecticut where in 1973 he graduated with honors with a B.S. degree in English/Education.

That fall Sergeant Mannion began a 30 year teaching career at Sheehan High School in Wallingford, CT when he was hired as an English teacher and assistant football coach. In 1990 he became Sheehan's third head football coach and held that post until 2002.

In 1992 Sergeant Mannion was awarded the New Haven Football Officials Coach of the Year Award. In 2002 he was presented with the Distinguished American Award from the New Haven Chapter of the National Football Foundation Hall of Fame. In 2010 he was inducted into the Sheehan High School Hall of Fame and into the New Haven Gridiron Club Hall of Fame in 2011.

Sergeant Mannion is a lifetime member of the National Organization of the Purple Heart, the Disabled Veterans of America, and the Khe Sanh Veterans Association where he is on the BOD, scholarship and by-laws committees. His experiences at Khe Sanh have been documented on the History Channel, CBS TV, and the ABC Millennium Series as well as three books and one video documentary. He has made numerous presentations to high school and college classes about this topic.

Sergeant Mannion is the proud father of 4 children -- daughter Brooke (and her husband Charles Davis); sons Jake, Blake, and Devin and grandchildren Grace and Campbell Davis. His wife Joan -- who retired from her own 35 year career as an English teacher and Guidance Councilor at Sheehan -- and his children are visible proof that he has been fortunate all his life.

END NEARS FOR COLONEL-RALPH PARR AS UNIQUE PILOTS DWINDLE

By Scott Huddleston

Ralph Parr, a double ace in the Korean War and one of the most decorated military pilots in U.S. history, will soon "fly west," as military aviators say when a friend is near death. As Americans gather for parades, concerts and ceremonies this Veterans Day, Parr is terminally ill with cancer. His longtime friend and air-to-air flying companion, Frederick "Boots" Blesse, another double ace in Korea, died last month.

Today's increasing use of remotely piloted aircraft and advances in technology have all but eliminated the kind of gutsy, instinctive flying that made them legends among veterans and young aviators, said Gary Baber, a friend and former Vietnam pilot.

"A glorious chapter in aviation history is coming to a close. With modern technology, we will not see the like of Ralph Parr and Boots Blesse again," said Baber, who visits Parr at an assisted living facility in New Braunfels, bringing him a chocolate milkshake once a week.

In one of his last interviews, Parr, 88, recalled his first flight as a boy; the downing of a Russian transport on the last day of the Korean War; and lessons he taught to younger pilots in Vietnam, even while being scolded by commanders for "flying too much."

"I enjoyed flying whatever airplane I was sitting in," said Parr, who also flew in the Pacific during World War II.

Parr, a longtime New Braunfels resident and retired Air Force colonel, flew more than 640 combat missions in three wars and received more than 60 citations. He's the only person to receive the Distinguished Service Cross and the medal that replaced it in 1960: the Air Force Cross. He's one of only a few fighter aces still living in the San Antonio area, Baber said. Ralph Sherman Parr Jr., born July 1, 1924, in Portsmouth, Va., got his first taste of flying as a gift for his fifth birthday from his father, a Navy pilot. Even while being treated for cancer that spread from his lungs to his liver, he recalled moving the control stick of an open-cockpit Navy floatplane over Manila Bay.

"It sort of hooks me intensely" to think about it, he said.

Parr enlisted in 1942 and later recalled seeing Hiroshima and Nagasaki smoldering after atomic bombs were dropped on them to end World War II. His actions in Korea, where he was often outnumbered by enemy aircraft, made him a legend among U.S. fliers. Bob Laymon, a friend and military historian, said Parr faced off with 16 Russian MiG-15 fighters one day; he shot down two and damaged a third.

"In his words, he surrounded the 16 MIGs," Laymon said.

Parr and Blesse, who died Oct. 31 and was eulogized at a funeral last week Nov.8 in Florida, had trained together at Nellis AFB, Nev., going "one on one" in F-86 Sabres, a quick, agile aircraft that performed exceptionally.

"We spent a lot of time weighing the maneuverability of the fighters we were using," said Parr, who keeps a framed copy of a painting of Blesse shooting down a MIG in the room where he'll likely spend his last days.

In the final seven weeks of the war in 1953, Parr destroyed 10 enemy aircraft in 30 missions. He was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross after he confronted 10 MIGs, shooting down two before escorting a distressed friendly aircraft back to his base.

Parr was credited with the last kill of the war July 27, 1953, when he fired his guns at a Russian Ilyushin IL-12 twin-engine transport carrying officials over North Korea just hours before an armistice ended the war. While details were never officially released, unconfirmed reports have circulated among retired pilots that the incident infuriated the Russians, who were said to have had dozens of military VIPs aboard the plane.

Parr said he has "unofficially" heard similar accounts over the years. When the incident first occurred, he was "ordered not to tell a soul."

"Someone said, 'Why don't we call it a MIG?' I said, 'Why don't we just tell the truth?' said Parr, who has always maintained that he confirmed through his flight leader that the craft was in restricted airspace.

"They were just in the wrong place at the wrong time, doing the wrong thing," Parr said. He said he was proud that he "stayed in fighters and tried to teach" younger pilots in Vietnam. He remembered a call from Gen. Lucius D. Clay Jr., 7th Air Force commander, who bellowed, "My staff tells me you're flying too much."

"That's fine by me, General; I'll go any way you want," Parr recalled saying before pointing out the statistics.

"I said our loss rate dropped drastically, our success rate on sorties was improved and our relations with guys on the ground have vastly improved," he added. Parr received the Air Force Cross for protecting a supply corridor to Khe Sanh. He destroyed mortar positions and heavy-caliber weapons positions, in spite of heavy fire that damaged his F-4C Phantom II.

He retired in 1976 and moved to New Braunfels, where he has lived with his wife, Margaret. In 2008, Randolph AFB renamed its officers' club, now called the Parr O'Club, in honor of one of the last of a vanishing breed of veterans.

Parr remained weak and frail last week, but was thinking and speaking clearly, despite having probably days or weeks to live, Baber said.
"He wants to be remembered," he said.

Col. Ralph D Parr Ralph passed away 12-07-2012

The Air Force Cross is presented to Ralph S. Parr, Colonel, U.S. Air Force, for extraordinary heroism in military operations against an opposing force as an F-4C aircraft commander near Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam, on March 16, 1968. On that date, Colonel Parr participated in a flight providing cover for cargo aircraft. Upon arrival over the target, the forward air controller advised the flight that the airfield was under heavy attack by hostile mortar positions, which were located a few feet below a ridge line. Although the target area was covered with dense smoke and haze, Colonel Parr successfully destroyed one mortar position on his first pass, as six well-camouflaged heavy automatic weapons opened fire on him. Although sustaining severe damage to his aircraft, he pressed his second attack and destroyed another mortar position. Again, completely disregarding his personal safety and the withering hostile gun fire, Colonel Parr succeeded in destroying six heavy caliber automatic weapons positions. In between passes, his accurate and timely directions to his wingman effectively insured the accuracy of ordnance delivery in close proximity to the friendly forces. Only after delivering all of his ordnance at point-blank range in eight consecutive passes did Colonel Parr terminate his attack. By destroying these strategically located weapons, he not only impaired the hostile force's capability to impede the resupply of Khe Sanh, but also reduced further losses to friendly cargo aircraft and crews. Through his superb airmanship, aggressiveness, and extraordinary heroism, Colonel Parr reflected the highest credit upon himself and the United States Air Force.

One of America's most distinguished combat veterans, Air Force Colonel Ralph S. completed five combat tours in four different aircraft and flew 641 combat missions in three wars: World War II, Korean and Vietnam. Among his leadership duties were commanding the 12th Tactical Fighter Wing in Vietnam and serving as Chief of Staff of the Armament and Development Test Center, Eglin AFB, Florida. At his retirement (1976), Parr had earned more than 60 decorations, including the Distinguished Service Cross, the Air Force Cross, the Silver Star, the Bronze Star, 10 Distinguished Flying Crosses, and 41 Air Medals.

A WAR photographer's battered old camera has sold for a world record £1.18million at auction.

"Pictures taken during the battle of Khe Sanh in 1968 were included in the sale"

American David Douglas Duncan used his Leica M3D-2 while covering the Vietnam war for Life magazine. Pictures taken during the battle of Khe Sanh in 1968 were included in the sale.

The lightweight Leica was made specifically for press photographers, who liked it because it was fast and nearly silent to use. Duncan, 96, is among the most influential photographers of the 20th century.

He joined the US Marines during the Second World War and took photos while fighting the Japanese in the Pacific. His work was so impressive that after the war he was hired by Life.

He is best known for his dramatic combat pictures of the Korean and Vietnam wars as well as his work with his close friend Pablo Picasso. During his time at the magazine he also covered other major world events, including the end of the British Raj in India and conflicts in Turkey, eastern Europe, Africa and the Middle East.

The camera was sold to a -private collector at the Westlicht auction in Vienna.

The price is a record for a production model camera. It was the forerunner of modern cameras and was specially designed for Duncan.

Just four of the cameras were produced in total and were used by the photographer for many years. "

OBIT

CAPTAIN CHARLES V BUSH UNITED STATES AIR FORCE

LOLO, Mont., Nov. 30 (UPI) -- Charles V. Bush, the first black to serve as a U.S. Supreme Court page, and one of the first black Air Force Academy graduates, has died in Montana. He was 72.

Bush's wife, Bettina Bush, said he died from colon cancer Nov. 5 at his home in Lolo, The Washington Post reported Friday.

Bush, who grew up in segregated Washington, was 14 years old when he was named a Supreme Court page in July 1954. Bush worked primarily in the anteroom of Chief Justice Earl Warren, who sought the appointment of an African-American.

Bush was a member of the debate and rugby teams and a squadron commander at the Air Force Academy, before graduating in 1963.

Bush served in Vietnam from 1967 to 1968, overseeing intelligence teams during the Tet Offensive and the Battle of Khe Sanh, the Post said.

He left the Air Force in 1970 with the rank of captain. His son, Chip Bush, said the elder Bush left in part because he thought he was overlooked for a promotion due to his race.

Besides his work in the corporate sector, Bush was a diversity consultant to the Air Force and the Air Force Academy, the Post said. His corporate career included work in executive-level positions for companies, including Max Factor and Hughes Electronics.

Survivors include his wife, three children, his mother, a sister, nine grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren.

FAIRFIELD RESIDENT RECALLS VIETNAM EXPERIENCE

By Ken Gjerde

KHE SANH VETERAN AL LETTENGARVER KILO CO 3/3 USMC

Published: Tuesday, January 29, 2013 12:57 PM CST Like all truly grateful, non-bravado veterans I know, Al Lettengarver voiced real reluctance to talk about his war experience.

In his words:

"Without gentle probing, this story would have gone to the grave with me. But after thinking about it, I thought maybe this is something my family, kids, and grandkids might be interested in long after I'm gone, because there is no way I could have ever written this. Secondly, maybe this will help family members of other vets understand what their vet has been through and what it takes to transition back to being a civilian. You have this feeling you develop in your chest that is a hard frozen spot that won't let anyone get close to you so it's not so hard on you when they die. This is your armor plating that keeps you from breaking down into a sobbing, slobbering mess. This hardness is why you can look at your dead buddy and say, "Better him than me." It takes years for that spot to finally thaw out. It makes you withdraw from people, drink too much and sit in a daze and stare. It's funny how all the years of memories of your high school days, your wedding, your kids, their births and growing up, your career, all these memories start to fade, but after 47 years of trying to forget, those thirteen months at times can be so vivid. I was asked once what the toughest thing I had ever done was. I answered, "Being directly responsible for the lives of as many as eighteen men on patrol."

With these courageously honest words as a foundation, we go back in time with him to Vietnam.

The enemy weapons of ambush fall silent ...as do your squad's M-14's and M-60 after returning suppressive fire. You feel momentary relief, even as you listen for movement in the silent darkness. Not feeling hit you still check for wounds. "Third fire team check it out, " comes the dreaded, whispered command. You lift your face from the dirt and rise on shaky knees, hoping your fear-wrenched voice won't squeak as you order your team to follow you forward. On this night, you find nothing. No bodies, no weapons, and best of all no more firing or grenades. So it was for twenty year old Cpl. Al Lettengarver early in his tour of duty near the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) on the north boundary of South Vietnam.

At eighteen, in 1964, he enlisted in the U. S. Marine Corps after two marines, home on leave, taunted he couldn't survive Boot Camp. Orders to Vietnam came in August, 1966. After thirty days leave and brief training at Camp Pendleton they flew to Okinawa for two week's training specific to Vietnam. Aboard ship for Vietnam in October, they cruised off shore awaiting assignment. On a cold windy night of deck guard duty, he kept a trepid and steely grip on the railing as he nursed some heavy anxiety watching the flashes from artillery fire and explosions in Vietnam. He and four friends, who served together at the Bremerton Navy shipyards, were assigned to the Third Battalion, Third Marine Regiment (3/3 Marines) and flown to its headquarters in Dong Ha. Operation Prairie II was just starting and they were flown to the battalion forward base in the field. Al to Kilo Company, Third Platoon, Third Squad, near Route 9 and a hill, the "Rockpile", close to Hills 400 and 484 and a ridge between known as "Mutter's Ridge" where they would experience hard fighting.

Dug in for the night, a few mortar rounds fell but the first casualty he saw was a marine who accidentally dropped a live grenade in his foxhole. The mortaring would be a nightly ritual of the North Vietnamese Army (NVA) in bunkers on "Mutter's Ridge. " Next day their company moved closer and dug into a hillside next to the ridge from which they ran patrols and ambushes. One night his platoon was ordered to patrol up "Mutter's Ridge". Each man had to keep contact with the man in front to not get separated in the blackness of that night. As they crawled down and crossed a creek to start up the ridge it began to rain torrents as the monsoon season geared up. Al's squad stayed back in reserve as the other two squads went up. After being shot off the hill in two assaults they won a toe hold and third squad was called up to join the fight. It was Al's first combat and a soul rending awakening to "What have I gotten into? " Dug in under a tree that night, in rain and light fog, he heard something hit the tree above and thump down the branches. Fearing it was a grenade, he froze, cringing as it hit the ground beside him. But there was no dreaded explosion. It was a rock thrown by the NVA, trying to locate the marine positions by provoking rifle fire to spot the muzzle flashes. To remain concealed, they threw grenades at movement throughout the night. Returning to the Company perimeter they carried a dead marine down the hill, slipping and sliding in the mud. Reaching what had been the shallow creek they'd crossed earlier, they found it a raging torrent and neck deep. One marine crossed with a rope and secured it to a tree. Gripping that rope, they wrestled all their equipment, and the poncho wrapped dead marine with them. This was not the recruiting poster adventure they had thought about when they joined the marines.

When another short-handed squad was selected for a night patrol they needed a volunteer from Al's squad. It was either Al or a marine named Wilson whose feet were pained with immersion foot but who insisted on going. The patrol was ambushed and one man was killed., when third squad was ordered to assist. The terrain, and being under fire, forced them to crawl over the dead marine to reach the nearby patrol members. They dug in to wait for daylight. They called in illumination rounds (parachute flares) when they heard movement around them. As luck would have it, one of the flares malfunctioned and landed in the bushes right behind their position and started a fire. So, now with their position silhouetted in front of the fire, they burrowed as deep and motionless in their shallow holes as possible, captured in their own fretful suspense. The dead marine was Wilson and they learned he'd had a premonition of death and had told his buddy he wasn't coming back from the patrol alive. Still, he had insisted on being the volunteer. He was a quiet, responsible marine who always did his part. Was he the victim of a strong sense of duty; caught in the grasp of fate, or both?

Significant criticism of the bombing campaign, Rolling Thunder, caused a halt to bombing in North Vietnam and the Ho Chi Minh trail around Christmas, 1966. Al noted that prior to this halt the dead NVA soldiers carried very little food and had as few as 10 rounds of ammunition and no or very few grenades. After the halt, the dead NVA were found carrying a hundred or more rounds of ammunition and good supplies of grenades and ample food. They felt the NVA had used the bombing halt to rush arms and supplies down the Ho Chi Minh Trail. It seemed to make a difference in the stiffness and duration of the fire fights they put up. It may also explain why one night shortly after it they were hit by 100 mortar rounds. Miraculously, no one was hurt and one round had exploded very near the edge of Al's foxhole with a concussing, deafening roar. That was very different than the five or so rounds that had usually come in each night before the halt. The squad Al was in was sent out in an attempt to find the mortars. One man took a bad shoulder wound and was med-evacuated by helicopter.

His forty five man platoon operated on a three day rotation routine. Day one was work parties filling sandbags, improving the company or battalion defensive positions, stringing coiled wire, and policing the area. Day two was patrolling about sixteen klicks (10 miles) from their temporary field base, starting about 0700 and returning at1900 hours. Day three was for rest, writing letters, and personal tasks and then going out to set an ambush that night. When not on patrol or ambush, they occupied two man foxholes nightly on their defensive perimeter. Night discipline required smoking a cigarette deep in your hole or under a poncho as the smallest of light could be seen from afar and draw fire.

That area's monsoon season was late October to May but most intense at Hue, with 128 inches rain per year. The monsoon season included blankets of fog and temperatures that dropped from daytime 90's and 100's to a cold 40 degrees or less at night. During one period it rained on 39 days straight. The men humored themselves with the Bible promise that after the flood it would never again rain on earth for 40 days in a row and sure enough the fortieth day the sun shown with no rain. Rain returned the next day. Ponchos kept them partially dry while active but water soaked their foxholes, bunkers or improvised shelters and would penetrate their sleeping gear. They were always wet from the knees down from mud and crossing streams. "Immersion foot" and shriveling of hand skin created cracking sores as did the ever present leech bites. Any sore would get infected and medics would tape a sugary powder on them to draw out the infections. Mosquitos were a constant irritant and malaria a constant threat. Awareness of poisonous snakes was essential and Al did come across two Bamboo Vipers on his tour. I have read of two infantrymen in Vietnam pulled from their night defensive positions and killed by a large Bengal Tiger. A member of 3/3's Lima company was mauled at night by a "big cat" in April 67.

Before becoming a squad leader, Al would draw the eerie two to four man night listening post duty, usually about 100-150 yards out from their unit defensive perimeter. Turns to be on watch or to sleep were two hours. Always tired, some taped a straightened safety pin to their rifle muzzle and held the rifle (safety on) with pin just below the chin, hoping if they nodded off their chin would hit the pin and awaken them. Sleeping during your two hour watch could be a court martial offense and it happened once. Al finished his two hour watch, woke the next man, gave him the radio and went to sleep. So did the man now on watch. When they didn't radio the company command post at the designated time a man crawled out following their phone line and awakened them. Next morning all the Lieutenant. said was, "If you pull that stunt again, you'll be doing that same job for a lot less money. "

His platoon had good morale, partly due to the commanding Lieutenant. He was a "mustang" officer, (having previously served as an enlisted man), which could give these officers a first hand understanding of the grunt's situation and needs. The men felt they would have followed him anywhere. Overall, Al feels they had excellent, well trained officers who, though faithfully following orders, were careful with their men's lives. Contributing to high morale was the shared common understanding and attitude among the men that they were stopping the spread of Communism. He arrived in Vietnam a corporal and was assigned as fire team leader for three other men in a fourteen man squad. Not long after, when promoted to Sergeant he became the Third Squad leader. As Squad leader, he did a little less shooting with more time on the radio, maps and maneuvering the squad as ordered or needed. The grunt's existence was a grind of rigorously humping very heavy packs and equipment up and down very rough, rocky, hilly and muddy terrain, in thick and light jungle, razor sharp 12' high elephant grass, bamboo stands and open grassy areas, often shorting themselves in food in favor of ammunition. The tedious grind challenged their alertness to security and signs of the enemy's presence. They found grainy food bars on the dead NVA. Sampling it, they found it markedly increased their energy and so they looked for it whenever they found the enemy. Water was usually supplied, but halizone tablets purified water from puddles or creeks when needed. Even so, water was the least of his worries. His Christmas in Vietnam featured a hot turkey dinner with all the trimmings flown to the field by helicopter. It was good eating, but after a steady diet of cold C-rations, it really messed up digestive systems. Christmas spirit and joy came in a gift of a dozen heavy socks from his sister. He shared them with his squad. "Putting your foot in one of those nice, thick, dry socks was like going to heaven.! "

In early spring 1967, the Marines were relieved of their trusty M-14 rifles for the new, lighter M-16. With its smaller ammunition men could carry 400-500 rounds instead of the 100 or so rounds they carried for the M-14. Al was sent to be trained to familiarize his unit with the M-16. We won't go into the problem details of keeping the early M-16's jam free, other than to note it was more vulnerable to dirt and powder residue in the chamber than the M-14. He recalls being told at the training that you could "wash it in a river. " A good number of dead marines in the Khe Sanh "hill fights" were found with jammed M-16 rifles. In August 1967, the Defense Department finally noted there had been a serious problem with the early M-16's.

About six months into his tour, Al left his company for a week's R&R. It came in late April, 1967 exactly when six companies of the 3rd Marine Regiment were sent to Khe Sanh in support of the fights on Hills 861, 881N and 881S and suffered 160 killed and 746 wounded. Of those casualties, Al's Kilo Company lost 21 killed and 42 wounded in their day and a half attack and withdrawal. As a consequence, he has carried a hard reality known as survivor's guilt, perhaps best understood by veterans. It is intensified when you are absent from the action where buddies are killed. While on assignment in Washington D. C. with the Air National Guard, he wrestled with going or not going to see the Vietnam Veterans' Memorial Wall. Finally, feeling strongly drawn as if some force was pulling him to The Wall, he went. His time there, tracing the names of marines he'd known, provided a sense of healing during which he wept off and on for three days.

After his return from R&R, the Third Battalion occasionally provided security for supply convoys traveling Route 9 from Dong Ha to Khe Sanh. In the spring of 1967, his platoon leader was transferred to the Battalion Headquarters Company and shortly after Al was transferred to the same Company as a battalion scout. In this duty, he joined various units on patrols to gather immediate intelligence which entailed searching all enemy bodies they found. This was in the Cao Lu area near a large old French Fort, and put him in contact with the Montagnards, a tribal people living in the highlands and mountainous jungles throughout Vietnam. They had been abased and abused by the Vietnamese for years in much the same manner as Native Americans in America. Their life expectancy was about 35 years and they willingly fought with the Americans against the VC and NVA.

Al carries troubling pictures of war in the sights and sounds of accidental "friendly fire" casualties. On one battalion sweep, a squad of marines was in a tree line re-conning another tree line from where part of the battalion was taking fire. Air support was called and a mix-up occurred with the Phantom jet hitting the wrong tree line. Al saw it and you can still see the hurt and anger in his face as he shakes his head and speaks of this and other losses from friendly fire, "Twelve marines killed in 5 seconds of rockets and machine gun fire. " Though relatively limited in number, friendly fire accidents always seemed too frequent and were always very agonizing. On a battalion sweep three of the companies set their night defensive positions on line with Al's company in the middle. One company was mortared and the battalion mortars in Al's company fired where the enemy mortars were described to be. In response to this firing, a company of their own battalion called in artillery on Al's battalion mortars whose muzzle flashes they could see. Two rounds landed before it was stopped but seven marines were seriously wounded. Those two rounds sounded to him like a roaring freight train as they came in. Al dove in his shallow trench with the LT diving in on top. The LT received shrapnel in his backside. Nerves and tempers were on edge after ten to fourteen days of constant firefights. Next day, the battalion commander ordered them to walk to a place where trucks could pick them up. They started at 0700 and arrived at the trucks at 0200 hrs the next morning. In their exhaustion they felt they should have been flown out. What kept their weary bodies going on the 19 hour march was imagining their feet tramping on their Lt. Colonel's head. Such is the infantryman's right in hanging on to their own sanity and morale.

1st Lt. David Rogers, now of Arlington, Texas, was a forward artillery observer attached to M Company, 3/3 Marines at the same time Al was in 3/3's K Company. He wrote the following poem in 1967 after the rugged fight on Hill 881 S. It is inscribed at the Vietnam Veteran's Memorial Plaza in San Antonio, Texas which features a large statue of a radioman kneeling over a dying comrade and scanning the sky for a medevac chopper. That radio operator was Donald Hossack of Kalispell, Montana, the only radioman to survive the battle for Hill 881 S. 1st. Lt. Rogers already has a prophetic sense, as he writes, that the society to which they will return will not want to hear about this watershed experience of their lives, or afford them a welcome home in which they could take comfort. It is printed with the author's permission:

Death At My Door

Day is over and danger hastens

Young Marines at their battle stations

Instruments of war outline the sky

Means of death are standing by.

Can it be true on this high hill

Forces will clash only to kill?

Silence fills the near moonless night

Restless thoughts of a bloody fight.

Endless memories for those awake

Meaningful discussion experience would make

Though silent world in which we live

Permits only God's comfort to give.

Somewhere through the darkness creeping

A date with death is keeping

Alone I sit and question why

Life itself, to be born merely to die?

Al was no stranger to this poem and title. For the first couple months in Vietnam the thought of being killed or maimed was almost overwhelming for him. Then such thoughts seemed to become subconscious, less thought about, and the tasks of war more focused. What stuck in his mind, and never left was the time his tour would end and he could return home which would be early November. His weight dropped from 170 to 135 pounds in Vietnam. Arriving at the Great Falls airport direct from Vietnam, he saw his mother looking straight at him and walking towards him, or so he thought. She walked right past without recognizing him! Leaving for Vietnam, he and a friend tore a dollar bill in two, each keeping half, promising to have a beer together upon his return. You can see in the picture what Vietnam did to Al's half. It mirrors the scars Vietnam also gave to those who fought there as well. Of his four buddies assigned to 3/3 Marines with him, Blender, Smith, and Meyers were killed; Kuffer was wounded twice. Al alone was not hit. A full complement marine battalion had around 1300 marines, though they were never at full strength. In its 54 months in Vietnam, the Third Battalion lost 545 killed and 3,400 were wounded. 104 more were killed while serving second or more tours with other marine units. Early support for the war was wide spread. Just after Al's arrival in Vietnam the American National Conference of Catholic Bishops, on November 18th, 1966, confirmed support for U. S. action in Vietnam. But, less than one year later in October 1967, 100,000 people marched on the capitol in Washington D. C. to protest the war believing the draft favored those with money and connections to avoid the draft.

His Regiment received a Presidential Unit Citation for the accomplishment of its mission to keep the NVA from conquering Quang Tri Province and establishing itself in the villages and people.

Following his Vietnam tour he was assigned to the USS Freemont, a troop transport, as a member of the Marine Battalion Landing Force with the U. S. Navy's Mediterranean Fleet cold war operations against Communism. On one occasion a Russian battleship and The USS Freemont passed close by each other and for about two minutes the crews tossed cigarette packs back and forth. They enjoyed stops in Spain, Italy, France, Sardinia, Corsica and Gibraltar visiting the Greek and Roman ruins and the many cathedrals. He remembers a large marble statue of Jesus where the front part of a foot was worn off from so many people touching it through the years. During a war game exercise they made a practice beach landing with the French Foreign Legion.

Upon his discharge on November 15th, 1968, he returned home to Coffee Creek near Denton where he had graduated from high school. Al joined the Air National Guard in 1987, where he fulfilled his 20 years of military service in 2003 with the Red Horse Unit, a hitch he really liked and enjoyed. He values his careers in the military and hopes as our troops return from their battle zones, we will better understand the hardships they've seen and warmly welcome them home. He doesn't feel he did anything above and beyond the duty that every ordinary Grunt performed. What you've read in this story is what countless numbers of Grunts experienced.

Retired, Al lives with his wife, Vivian, on the Fairfield Bench raising a few cattle. His grown children are Steve (Glena) and their daughters, Lexie and Natasha, and Margie (Scott Andrews) and their children Allysa and Anthony. He also has two great grand daughters Penny and Raine.

REMBERING TET: LOCAL VETERANS RECALL THEIR TIME IN VIETNAM

In January 1968, enemy forces began a massive attack on Khe Sanh during the Vietnam War. Charlie Lehman of Great Falls was there.

He was in his early 20s then and was one of the "old men." Before that attack, his tour had been a picnic. "It was like having a walk in the park before that and going to you didn't know from day to day if you were going to be around or not, all your buddies were getting zapped," he said. ,But what no one realized was that the attack at Khe Sanh was a diversion for something much bigger — the Tet Offensive. Tet was the celebration of the lunar new year and the most important holiday on the Vietnamese calendar. For years, the holiday had meant an informal cease-fire during the Vietnam War.

But 45 years ago today, on Jan. 30, 1968, the Viet Cong attacked 13 cities in the southern region of Vietnam. Throughout the coming days and weeks, more than a hundred were carried out on Vietnamese cities, government buildings, U.S. military bases and those of American allies.

The first days of Tet were the bloodiest during the entire conflict in Vietnam with 246 killed on Jan. 31, 1968. The database of names on the memorial lists 16,899 who were killed in 1968, making it the deadliest year of the long war.

Lehman said that during his time at Khe Sanh, only one person in his platoon didn't have a Purple Heart. two or three, he said. Lehman has one from Tet. He was wounded during a convoy May 19, 1968. The lead tank in his convoy was hit with a rocket propelled grenade and the convoy was ambushed. "We lost a whole platoon of tanks that day," he said. One of the bolder Tet attacks was at the U.S. embassy in Saigon. Johnnie Sweeten was nearby at a base in Saigon when it happened.

He was with the 120th Assault Helicopter Company attached to the 1st Aviation Brigade. Sweeten had been in Vietnam since 1966 and was a gunner on the helicopters. The attack was "miserable," he said.

"We kinda had to shoot a lot of people and tear up a lot of buildings," he said. His was the only gun ship unit in Saigon, he said, and they stayed very busy during Tet. One helicopter was shot down, but the crew escaped By the time he finished his tour, he'd been in country for "three years, 23 days, 20 hours and 16 minutes." Bill Garberg was a few hours away at Camp Blackhorse in Long Giao near the village of Xuan Loc. He was a combat engineer with the 27th Combat Engineer Battalion. Camp Blackhorse was in an area of dense jungle and was surrounded by mines, Garberg said. When Tet started, they were hit with mortar rounds and rockets. The assault on Camp Blackhorse didn't involve waves of enemy troops attacking the base due to the mines, "But they pummeled us with mortars and rockets," he said. "We just dug in on the perimeter," Garberg said. They took heavy fire all night. The next morning, they took two or three tanks, a few armored personnel carriers and drove out to a village a few miles outside of Xuan Loc.

"We went to that village and formed a perimeter around it. The captain went in and said they had 30 minutes to clear out. They gathered their belongings and ran out past the edge of town," Garberg said. "We brought in a flame thrower, torched the town and then turned tanks on the buildings. We crushed that town. That's where the heavy VC sympathizers were living. We burned it, torched it, smashed it. We didn't kill any of the civilians, but that was their payback for letting those VC get in and rule them."

Garberg said no one really knew Tet was coming, but he thought his leaders might have suspected something because that day they were told to be prepared to move.

"I remember cleaning my weapon right before it happened," he said. "Nothing was a sure thing over there. War is ... kind of pandemonium. You take care of what's right in front of you, that's all you worry about."

He'd been in Vietnam for about six months when Tet started. He spent a year there all together.

When he got home, the Great Falls native said he wouldn't talk to anyone.

Unless you had been there in Vietnam, I wouldn't talk to you," he said.

That's a similar case for Sweeten and Lehman.

Neither talked much about their service in Vietnam and didn't wear their uniforms in public.

All three of them are part of a group of combat veterans who meets weekly to talk about their experiences. The group ranges in age and era of service, but it's helpful, Lehman said.

"It's really the only time that I feel comfortable talking about Vietnam," he said. "It's guys that went through the same thing, that walked down the same road."

KHE SANH MARINE ADDED TO WALL OF HEROES IN HIS HOMETOWN

PFC Jeffrey A. Thibault was a member of the 3RD Battalion, 4TH Marine Division, United States Marine Corps, during the Vietnam War.

He was assigned to the 1ST Platoon, M Co.

Thibault was from Pitman and left high school as a junior in 1968 and entered the Marine Corps in November under the Buddy System with his high school friend, David Dresh, who still lives in Pitman.

He excelled in football and baseball, following his father and uncle, who were stellar athletes during the '30s and '40s.Thibault was stationed at Khe Sanh, Vietnam.

On June 14, 1968, the Marines spent the day climbing hills and came back exhausted. That night the NVA kept probing their lines and at about 5:45 a.m. June 15, 1968, the area was hit with rocket, mortar and machine gun fire and the Marines had a lot of wounded and killed.

Thilbault's platoon was able to retake the lines that were overrun in the initial assault. Later that morning, Thibault and another Marine went down a slope to see if another Marine was there when a sniper shot the Marine who was with Thibault and mortally wounded Thibault.

Thibault was officially listed as killed in action on June 15, 1968.

His body was escorted to Pitman from Dover Air Force Base by a childhood friend, Barry Weatherby, United States Army, who worked with civilian morticians at Da Nang Air Base.

Barry's father owned the Weatherby Funeral Home in Pitman, where Thibault was to lie in state. At the graveside service at Hillside Cemetery in Hurfville, the United States Marine Corps Honor Guard handed the folded American flag first to Barry Weatherby, who then gave it to Thibault's parents.

The Wall of Heroes honors the Gloucester County men and women who were killed in action or missing in action while serving in the U.S. military protecting our freedoms and rights. The Gloucester County Freeholder Board unveiled The Wall of Heroes on Nov. 11 at the Gloucester County Justice Complex featuring the likenesses of 100 Heroes.

There are at least 350 Gloucester County residents who never made it home so there is more work to be done. The community's assistance in identifying those residents who may be eligible to be placed on the wall is crucial.

The Wall of Heroes consists of framed 5-by-8-inch translucent artistic renderings portraying reasonable likenesses of the persons whom the county is honoring. The wall represents all branches of the military and they are arranged by era.(See Photo)

Because The Wall of Heroes features artistic renderings of those who made the ultimate sacrifice, photographs are of particular importance. If there is no photograph that can be found of the person to be honored, only the name and other key information of the military personnel will be framed on the wall. Information, applications and eligibility can be found at http://www.co.gloucester.nj.us/depts/v/vaffairs/heroapp/default.asp or by contacting the Gloucester County Office of Veterans Affairs at 856 -401-7660.

A HEALING TRIP

KHE SANH VETERAN KENNETH R. MARTIN B CO 3RD RECON, USMC

The first time Ken Martin was in Vietnam, he was wounded three times in a month and a half, including being burned by a phosphorous grenade.

He returned to Vietnam last month with a group of veterans, and the country was nearly unrecognizable to Martin, 64, of Myrtle Creek.

Seeing a rebuilt Vietnam helped Martin make peace with the experiences he had there 45 years ago as a young Marine.

"I just wanted to see the country as it is and not as it was, and I was not disappointed in that way," he said. "It's not war-torn."

Last summer, Martin, a retired log truck driver, saw in a Veterans of Foreign Wars magazine an advertisement for a return trip to Vietnam. The VFW would cover all expenses for a two-week trip for Vietnam veterans who had received Purple Hearts. Martin's interest grew when he learned the trip included a visit to Khe Sanh, a former Marine base where he served during the siege of Khe Sanh in 1968.

With the encouragement from a veteran friend who'd found solace from returning to Vietnam, Martin applied for the trip.

In October, he learned he was one of 13 Vietnam veterans randomly selected from a pool of 6,000 applicants to go.

"It was my lucky day," Martin said.

KEN MARTIN AT HIS HOME IN MYRTLE CREEK

He and the other veterans toured Vietnam during the first two weeks of January with three VFW officers and a Vietnamese guide.

GROUP OF VETERANS WHOSE TRIP WAS SPONSORED BY THE VFW

They visited places they encountered during the war, including the cities of Hanoi, Da Nang and Ho Chi Minh City. The trip was very different from the last time the veterans were in Vietnam, Martin said. The fancy hotels and generous meals contrasted with the meager accommodations they had as soldiers, he said.

Martin's wife, Linda Martin, said when she heard he was staying in four and five-star hotels, she wished she could join him.

"I was kind of jealous," she said.

When the group traveled to Khe Sanh, it didn't look anything like the last time Martin saw it. A coffee plantation had replaced the trenches, sandbags and makeshift bunkers.

"It wasn't the Khe Sanh I remembered from the siege," Martin said. "It was just bomb craters. That was all gone."

Still, the impact the war made on Vietnam was obvious, he said.

"The one thing we thought was striking when we went through the country (was) there were no men our age," Martin said. "They had all been killed in the war."

KEN EXPLORING TUNNELS BENEATH TOWN OF CU CHI VIETNAM

Vietnam has changed dramatically, he said. Martin thought the landscape would at least stay the same, but in one instance a hill he remembered had been excavated and looked completely different.

"The country that I knew was gone," Martin said. "If you're looking for 45 years ago, it's not there. I think a lot of us exorcised the ghosts we had there."

KEN WITH THEIR GUIDE NGUYEN PHAI

Martin was in the Marines for three years as a young man. He spent a year serving in Vietnam between 1967 and 1968 with the Marines' Kilo Company. While stationed at the Khe Sanh Combat Base, the South Umpqua High School graduate turned 20.

KEN ON BRIDGE NEAR CAMP CARROLL

Before he left Vietnam in April 1968 for treatment for burns from a phosphorous grenade, Martin was wounded two other times.

The first time he was injured, a rocket-propelled grenade bounced off Martin while he and other soldiers were involved in a point-blank firefight.

KEN STANDING NEXT TO C-130 AT OLD KHE SANH BASE

"That I thought killed me. I lost consciousness," he said.

Two soldiers were killed in the firefight and everyone involved was injured, Martin said. "I was wounded everywhere, but not that seriously," he said. "It was a very bad, very dark day."

The second time Martin was wounded was when he was in a bunker that took a direct hit from a rocket round. Martin was one of 22 people in the bunker. Four soldiers died and 18 were wounded.

Shortly after he was wounded in the bunker attack, Martin was injured while he was in trench. A phosphorous grenade landed in his lap and burned through his pants.

"I ran through the trench screaming bloody murder, and there was a step I didn't see and I flat on my face," he said.

To put out the fire and treat his burns, the medics had to cut off his clothes and a new pair of boots he'd got days before. Losing his boots upset Martin more than the burns, because for most of his time in Vietnam, he'd worn a used pair of boots that were two sizes too big.

"I flat out lost it," he said. "They thought I was crying because of the pain."

It was an interesting experience to return with other veterans to Vietnam, a place where he had such traumatic experiences.

"This was a real journey for me to go back. I didn't know I wanted to go back," he said. "We all decided that this was the best way for us to get closure."

Linda Martin said her husband was fortunate to have the opportunity to return to Vietnam.

"This trip was kind of the luck of the draw," she said. "To go back 45 years to the day, I think that's just remarkable."

KHE SANH VETERANS ACCOMPLISH THEIR MISSION

DR BARRY BOOTH USN, AND LUTHER UPTON A CO 3RD ENGINEERS

EVERGREEN, Ala. – Two Khe Sanh veterans joined forces last fall to lead the dedication of a memorial honoring all those from Conecuh County who served in the U.S. armed forces.

Veterans Barry Booth of Spanish Fort and Luther Upton of Evergreen helped organize and commemorate the Veterans Memorial with hundreds of names engraved in the inspiring granite markers.

The central obelisk and American flag waving in the crisp air catch the eye along U.S. 31 North some 100 miles northeast of Mobile. On one side of the road, the small town's cemetery reaches into the distance marking the hundreds of lives that have changed this place in distinct ways.

On the other side, however, there's a new monument marking this area's contribution to the many times when deep divisions between nations led to the bloodshed of war. Conecuh County residents stood ready and willing to defend the United States of America and freedom the world over, according to local veteran and City Councilman Luther Upton, and this monument has proved a great uniter of area residents in rural Conecuh County where the population is just more than 13,000. Political battles in the small community can drag on for years with neighbors divided in bitter conflicts--but not when it comes to support for service men and women, not when it comes to honoring veterans according to local officials.

"I guess it was my idea," Upton, a Vietnam veteran said. "I saw the Uriah, Ala., monument and said if a small rural community like Uriah can do it, why can't we?"

Upton and other members of the local Andrew G. Faulk chapter of Disabled American Veterans traveled to see monuments in Andalusia, Ala., Baldwin County, Montgomery and other places and soon set out to raise the money needed.

They didn't use a designer or architect or engineer to build the structure, he said, but rather hired local contractors to do the work. The group called for area veterans, former service members and families to help out, with service members' names carved into granite walls at a cost of $100 each if the names were registered before construction. Now, Upton said, the engraving costs $200 per name.

In all, the organizers raised some $160,000 from private and corporate donations to build the monument that honors those who died in wars – names on the central obelisk honoring the war dead were engraved without charge. There are large granite walls honoring veterans of each major armed conflict or war with room to add more names as people come forward. Another pillar includes names of those who served in the military but not in time of war. So far, more than 800 names have been carved into the memorial's stone.

This covers all demographics," Upton said. "We have men, women, blacks, whites – even one Mongolian. Just about everybody knows someone on the walls."

Another feature at the memorial is an eternal flame made to honor those unknown servicemen who gave the ultimate price for our country.

The memorial was dedicated in a ceremony on Nov. 7 with veterans from across the area gathering with some 300 others. Retired U.S. Navy MCPO James Leon Windham was the master of ceremonies with World War II veteran Woodrow Windham, 96, in attendance as the oldest veteran and Willie George Woods, 87, present to receive a Congressional Gold Medal as one of the Montford Point Marines.

"It's the best in four counties," said local resident Johnette Jones. "All of our hearts and souls went into it. "We have so many here who have served honorably."

And the names jump from the surface as visitors to the monument recall stories attached to each, like Col. John Jones who served in the Korean Conflict, or Brigadier Gen. John Watkins, or Col. Janice McCreary Watson who served in Vietnam and Desert Storm. There's Commander Leslie Addicott, Jr., who served in three wars and J.D. Etheridge who disappeared after serving in Korea but later came back home. The stones record the names of survivors of the Bataan Death March and dozens more, all with stories attached. The project took hundreds of hours of research and planning by organizers with Theresa "Tess" Windham credited with verifying dozens of veterans' names.

Every day, Upton said, veterans come by to look for friends or for their own names on the walls, like Willie R. Salter one day last month

"It looks really nice," Salter said of the memorial, "nicer than I thought it would." Then after walking a few steps, he found his own name.

"It feels kind of funny to see it there. A lot of memories go with all these names. I remember we had all the equipment loaded on a train ready to go, and they called it off."

Arthur Ingram, who served in the U.S. Army from 1972 to 1982 said seeing his name on the wall makes him feel special, and proud that the community could come together to accomplish the project.

"I have given 10 years to the U.S. Army and served another 15 with the Alabama Department of Corrections," Ingram said. "I will never forget being in Scofield Barracks in Hawaii in 1973. Our unit was ordered to go to Vietnam the next day, but then word came they were ending the war and we didn't have to go. I threw my hands up and said 'Thank God!''

Baldwin County veteran and founder of the Honor Flight program Barry Booth attended the dedication, and said the memorial in Evergreen spotlighted the "overwhelming support" shown by the community for its service members.

"I was honored to get to meet Willie Woods who was very, very gracious," Booth said, "and I felt they did a great job showing all branches of service. Honoring veterans is something that unites people. I don't think race, creed or color or gender are valid divisions when support for our troops is universal."

KHE SANH MARINE POW HONORED

RONALD RIDGEWAY BRAVO CO 1/26

Big Game Gear honors ex Vietnam prisoner of war who was captured 45 years ago on February 25th.

Big Game Gear is honoring ex-Vietnam prisoner of war, Mr. Ronald Ridgeway Sr. next week in honor of his surviving his being captured almost 45 years ago.

There are some people in this world that are unstoppable even when the odds are stacked against them, and one of those people is Ronald Ridgeway, ex-Vietnam Prisoner of War Veteran. Ridgeway is known to be the only American Prisoner of war who has been declared killed in action and was officially buried. The Pentagon said the remains of what where believed to be Ridgeway and eight other members of his patrol caught in a North Vietnamese ambush were recovered and returned back to the United States for burial.

Ridgeway is a man who knows first-hand about sacrifice and hardships. Ridgeway was just seventeen when he joined the United States Marine Corp, and a year later he was serving in B Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment assigned to the 3rd Marine Division right in the middle of the Vietnam War.

On February 25, 1968 near Khe Sanh, he was on patrol when he and his entire patrol were surrounded and under attack. Ridgeway was wounded during the attack and taken prisoner by the North Vietnamese. He was moved during the next eighteen months to several POW camping sites and moved further into North Vietnam.

Ridgeway arrived at the famous Hanoi Hilton, POW Camp where captured American servicemen were held during the Vietnam War including Senator John McCain.

While Ridgeway was in captivity, he suffered like other POW's solitary confinement and other brutalities by his captors but remained steadfast through it all. On March 16, 1973, he was released and returned home. After all he went through as a POW Ridgeway says, "I believe I was more fortunate than thousands of others who were killed or severely wounded in Vietnam."

Ridgeway has spent most of his life, and continues to do so today. helping other Veterans that are still suffering from the effects of war. Recent retirement hasn't slowed him down; he stays busier now by volunteering to help other Veterans. He belongs to several service organizations that provide assistance and organized fishing and hunting trips for Veterans. Ronald Ridgeway has donated time and efforts in helping Big Game Gear and believes in the Give Back program that Big Game Gear offers. Ridgeway says, "A percentage of my purchases have gone back to a couple of Veteran programs and I like knowing my money is doing good for other Vets." He knows through experience how therapeutic a day spent outdoors hunting, fishing or just viewing Mother Nature at her best can be. "It's just good for the troubled soul," Ridgeway says.

Several times during the year, Ridgeway and other Veterans get together with disabled and wounded warriors for breakfast and a day of fishing. A grateful and good natured Ridgeway says, "It wasn't pleasant being a POW, but I do believe I am a better person today because of it. If I can help other men and women Vets come to the same conclusion I did and heal from the trauma they experienced by spending some time with their brothers and sisters fishing or hunting, I'd encourage them to go every day." Ridgeway's advice is, "If you know or have a family member that is a Vet that could benefit from spending time outdoors, invite him and a couple of friends to get together and head out to your favorite fishing hole or hunting site."

Big Game Gear is a Veteran Owned Business and wants to thank Ronald Ridgeway for his service and honor his bravery. Big Game Gear also honors other military men and women both past and present who fight proudly for our country.

Big Game Gear is an easy-to-use yet comprehensive site that puts it all in one place – outdoor outfitter products at great prices, information and outdoor education, giving back to organizations, amazing deals, and an experience shopping for the great outdoors.

MAJOR GEORGE QUAMO, SOG, and KHE SANH

2012 Peter Brush

Introduction and Background

In May 1968, President Lyndon Johnson presented the Presidential Unit Citation to the 26th Marine Regiment for their "extraordinary heroism in action against North Vietnamese Army forces during the battle for Khe Sanh." Officially, for the Marine Corps, Khe Sanh was one of the most crucial battles of the war, and their account of the battle "is basically a story about Marines." Although both Johnson and the Marine Corps acknowledge the role of supporting units, Khe Sanh is intimately associated in history with Marines. However, U.S. Special Forces (USSF) were the first American troops at Khe Sanh, and Special Forces and Special Operations Group (SOG) personnel were present throughout the battle. This article is about SOG Major George Quamo, one of the most important and interesting Americans at Khe Sanh. Quamo was described in superlatives by those who knew him, a "super man," athletic, brilliant, and charismatic, 'a kind of "Lawrence of Arabia of Vietnam."'

Originally, Khe Sanh was a village located on Route 9, the northernmost east-west highway in South Vietnam. In the early 1960s the Americans and South Vietnamese became concerned about Communist infiltration from the Ho Chi Minh Trail in Laos. On July 8 1962, a U.S. Army Special Forces A Team was sent to Khe Sanh. Their mission was to monitor enemy infiltration and train the local Bru Montagnards. They occupied an abandoned French position near the village just off Route 9. Later that year a Vietnamese engineer unit constructed an airstrip at Khe Sanh. In 1964, the A Team abandoned their original position and established a base near the airstrip. The Special Forces unit at Khe Sanh also established a presence at Lang Vei, six miles to the west along Route 9, next to the Laotian border.

The North Vietnamese Army continued to move troops into the area. In September 1966, a Marine battalion was sent "in response to an expected major offensive by the NVA to overrun Khe Sanh." The Marines constructed a base north of the village and Route 9. In April 1967, the Marines fought a major battle against NVA forces who sought to seize the base.

During December 1966, the Special Forces unit at Khe Sanh (Detachment A-101) relocated to Lang Vei. On May 4 1967, a NVA force attacked the Lang Vei camp, overcame its defenses, destroyed much equipment, and killed many personnel including the Special Forces commander and executive officer.

On January 24 1964, the Military Assistance Command, Vietnam, activated the Special Operations Group (later changed to Studies and Operations Group). The purpose of SOG was to conduct covert operations in order to deter the North Vietnamese from supporting the conflict in South Vietnam and violating the neutrality of Laos. In October 1965, SOG was authorized to send US personnel on cross-border operations into Laos. Forward Operating Bases (FOBs) were designated as launch sites for these operations.

FOB-1 was at Phu Bai, with a satellite launch site at Khe Sanh. The Khe Sanh SOG site was at the old French position constructed by Special Forces in 1962. It was too small and too "public" for SOG's covert operational needs. The decision was made to move to the nearby Marine base and construct a new position. This base, which became FOB-3, was built in October 1967 by Navy Seabees of Detail JULIETT from Naval Mobile Construction Battalion 10. FOB-3 became operational on November 1, 1967.

Major George Quamo

George Quamo was born on June 20 1940 in Lynn, Massachusetts, the son of Albanian immigrants. Quamo grew up in Averill Park, near Albany, NY. He was a standout athlete in high school, either MVP or captain of the football, basketball, and baseball teams. He was class president and colleges attempted to recruit him. Instead, Quamo enlisted in the Army on October 23 1958. He completed training at Fort Benning, GA. He attended Officer Candidate School, was commissioned a second lieutenant, and assigned to Fort Riley, Kansas, as an infantry officer. He subsequently attended Jump School, Ranger School, Vietnamese and Thai language schools, Special Forces officer training, parachutist training, Pathfinder School, and the Infantry Officer

Advanced Course.

In 1963 Quamo was sent to Vietnam as an advisor to the South Vietnamese Army. He was awarded a Silver Star for gallantry in action on March 27 1963 "while moving through heavy enemy fire to put a friendly machine back in action and rallying the Vietnamese troops he was advising." In March 1964, Quamo became a SOG team commander. He returned to the U.S. where he received a two-year college equivalency in 1966. He arrived at Khe Sanh the following summer, and was promoted to major on October 1 1967.

SOG Operations

The SOG unit at FOB-3 engaged in "Special Projects," a plan to create a guerrilla force that would operate in the area where the Ho Chi Trail entered Laos from North Vietnam. This force was to be made up Laotian soldiers from Bataillon Voluntaire 33 (BV-33), located at a camp in Laos along Route 9 just over the border, about 13 miles west of Khe Sanh. The force at BV-33 was financed by the Central Intelligence Agency. The South Vietnam-Laos border along Route 9 was porous and not well defined. SOG teams, code named PENNSYLVANIA, entered Laos to meet with BV-33 personnel and observe NVA units operating in the area.

Initially, Master Sergeant Charles "Skip" Minnicks was team leader of PENNSYLVANIA. Quamo was sent to replace him. Minnicks was 38, the oldest SOG team leader; Quamo was 27 and probably the youngest SOG major. According to Minnicks, Quamo "looked like a kid! Here comes this new Captain. I resented him! And I made it apparent. And he called me into his tent, and he just sat me down, and we just talked. And he made me aware of my short-comings! He really did." Eventually, Minnick came to admire and respect Quamo without limit, "as did everyone who came into contact with him." According to another soldier who knew Quamo, "The people around him were just magnetized by him, and if you didn't have the magnetism, he somehow transferred it to you."

The NVA buildup in the area continued. According to Minnicks, "We knew that there was a huge, strong force." NVA plans for the upcoming Khe Sanh battle included the establishment of fortified positions at Co Roc mountain, part of a ridgeline that ran roughly parallel to the border. In mid-January 1968, a SOG team including Minnicks and Quamo climbed to the top of Co Roc. From there they could see Khe Sanh Combat Base and Lang Vei. They discovered numerous caves and extensive NVA positions, but no NVA: apparently the enemy had already moved most of their forces closer to Khe Sanh. One complex contained 500 bunkers, including one large enough to be a regimental command post. While reconning the area, a team member was shot three times in the stomach by an NVA soldier. Major Quamo asked the Marines at Khe Sanh to send an evacuation helicopter. SOG was authorized to operate in Laos; the Marines were not, and their mission did not include crossing the border. The reply was "there will be no air extraction with the Marine helicopters at Khe Sanh." Quamo lost his temper, berating the Marines on the command radio network. A Marine pilot, Major Charles Upshaw, heard Quamo's profanity and launched his helicopter in a full fog. Although Upshaw and his H -34 crew successfully extracted the SOG team, that inability of the Marines and Army to coordinate their activities was but a portent.

The tactical area of responsibility of the Marines at Khe Sanh covered a large area, and included the base itself, adjacent FOB-3, various American military units in Khe Sanh village, several Marine hill outposts, and the new USSF camp at Lang Vei. During the period July-August 1967, NVA forces in the Co Roc-Lang Vei area were estimated to be at least one battalion. Due to its location on the Laotian border, the vulnerability of Lang Vei to NVA attack was obvious. Consequently, on September 18, the Marine command issued Operations Plan 5-67 which tasked the Marines with the mission of coming to the aid of Lang Vei if attacked: "a ground force of a reinforced rifle company would be committed" plus additional forces as necessary. In November 1967, the Marines sent a rifle company from Khe Sanh to Lang Vei to determine direct routes through the jungle. Selecting paths that avoided well-used trails in order to avoid ambush, it took 19 hours to make the trip.

By late 1967 NVA in the Khe Sanh area were estimated at 22,000. Counting additional troops in Laos and the central DMZ, total NVA strength was estimated at 35,000-40,000. Major General Rathvon Tompkins, commander of the 3d Marine Division, recommended the Lang Vei position be abandoned. US military headquarters in Saigon insisted it be retained. On January 6, a Marine forward observer was sent to Lang Vei to register artillery defensive fires. At 0530 on January 21, the NVA began shelling the combat base, beginning the famous battle. Khe Sanh village was overrun that afternoon, followed by the BV-33 camp on January 24. Flying overhead in a helicopter, Major Quamo observed the Laotian survivors of BV-33 as they moved down Route 9. This group included 500 soldiers, 2,200 dependents, and a number of water buffalo. Quamo arranged with Special Forces headquarters in Da Nang to have food, ammunition, and building materials sent to help rebuild the destroyed positions at old Lang Vei, which were occupied by BV-33 personnel. With Khe Sanh village in NVA hands, Lang Vei was cut off from Khe Sanh Combat Base via Route 9.

Khe Sanh and Lang Vei

When the fighting began, the Marine Fire Support Coordination Center was swamped with over 3,000 possible enemy targets within a 15 kilometer radius (artillery, headquarters, anti-aircraft weapons, bunkers, supply dumps). Major Quamo, at FOB-3, on his own initiative, went to the Marine command center to offer his assistance. He had a land line laid to provide a continuous flow of information to the Marines. Quamo knew the locations of NVA positions quite well. Deep inside the Tactical Operations Center at FOB-3 was a communications section. Here four North Vietnamese defectors monitored NVA radio networks and provided translations of intercepted messages. Although the Marines provided security for the soldiers at FOB-3, the two units followed different chains of command. Instead of forwarding information to Saigon, where it would be evaluated, condensed, and then sent to the Marines, Quamo was able to provide information directly and promptly. According to Marine Major Jerry Hudson, the 26th Marines regimental intelligence officer, "Quamo really saved us during the first few days of the attack by giving us all sorts of significant information."

The NVA shelled Khe Sanh continuously. 61 Americans were killed in the first 15 days. In the early morning hours of February 6 the combat base was receiving about six incoming enemy rounds per minute. By contrast, things were quiet down Route 9 at Lang Vei. According to the USSF camp executive officer, Lieutenant Miles Wilkins, "We had very little enemy contact. They basically just left us alone." The situation changed drastically just after midnight on February 7. NVA tanks began rolling over the Lang Vei perimeter defenses, driving into the camp along Route 9 from both directions. At the same time, NVA 152mm artillery at Co Roc was firing at the Marines at Khe Sanh. NVA forces attacked both the new Special Forces camp and the old position where the Laotians had dug in. The American soldiers put up a spirited and heroic defense against a vastly superior NVA force, but by about 0300 the NVA mostly controlled the camp. The USSF soldiers were essentially trapped in their command bunker, where they remained throughout the night. Captain Frank Willoughby, commander of A-101, radioed the Marines at Khe Sanh to fire an artillery barrage on his position, and to execute the relief plan.

The Marines at Khe Sanh felt any relief force moving down Route 9 would undoubtedly be ambushed (in fact, documents taken off a dead NVA office later in the battle indicated they hoped a relief column would be sent so they could destroy it). A helicopter assault was ruled out because the NVA had positioned their tanks to fire on the only suitable landing zone. Lastly, and most important, the Marines knew any force they could send would be vastly outnumbered by the NVA. Consequently, the Marines refused to provide a relief force.

Major Quamo had been up all night at FOB-3 listening to the fighting on the radio net. Quamo discussed the situation with the FOB commander, Major Lucius Campbell, who declined to become involved. At about 1000 hours Quamo went to the Marine Combat Operations Center where he learned no Marine relief force would be sent. Furious, Quamo returned to FOB-3 and asked for volunteers. He vowed, "We're going to do something. We're going to get something done!"

Fourteen USSF volunteers plus forty Bru soldiers went on standby. Several Marine CH-46 helicopters were at Khe Sanh preparing for a resupply mission. Without authorization, Quamo alerted the Marine helicopter pilots of his plan to launch a rescue operation into Lang Vei. At 1500 hours, official authorization was received. The resupply mission was cancelled and the Marine pilots went to FOB-3 for a mission briefing. At 1700 hours, the rescue force departed for Lang Vei, where they rescued the 16 Special Forces survivors. According to Minnicks, who was part of the rescue team, "I thought that Quamo should of got a Medal of Honor for what he did at Lang Vei. He coordinated the whole thing."

In March 1968, Lieutenant Colonel Roy Bahr became commander of FOB-3. Bahr had high praise for Quamo, describing him "one of the most outstanding officers with whom I have served" and "highly respected by seniors and subordinates alike." However, there was one exception to the high regard felt for Quamo. On April 5 1968, General William Westmoreland, commander of US forces in Vietnam, visited Khe Sanh and FOB-3. According to Bahr, it was obvious Westmoreland and Quamo knew each other, and there was "an intense, palpable animosity from General Westmoreland to Major Quamo," which puzzled Bahr.

The siege of Khe Sanh ended in April. The Marines began discussions on closing down the base. FOB-3 had been engaged in classified activities and possessed top secret documents. Colonel Bahr, having received no orders to relocate FOB-3 and its personnel, became concerned about remaining if the Marine force departed. He was afraid FOB-3 could become another Lang Vei. Bahr instructed his intelligence officer, Captain Hammond Salley, to write a top secret report. This report outlined the consequences of abandoning Khe Sanh and FOB-3 and asked for clarification of FOB-3's future mission. Bahr gave the report to Major Quamo with instructions to hand carry it to USSF headquarters in Da Nang. At 1535 hours on April 14, Quamo boarded a U-17 airplane with two Vietnamese pilots. The U-17 made contact with air control at Da Nang soon after departing. At 1645 hours, contact was lost in the vicinity of Da Nang. An extensive search was launched, with no results.

Speculation began soon after the disappearance. According to Minnicks, some overzealous CIA analysts considered Quamo might be a spy who had flown to North Vietnam. The CIA sent investigators to interview people who had worked with Quamo and search his belongings, which made Minnicks furious. Major Hudson and others wondered if Quamo was on a secret mission and not really dead. Quamo's remains, along with those of two Asians, were discovered in 1974 by a Vietnamese woodcutter in the mountains. He was quietly buried in Arlington National Cemetery on October 21, 1974.

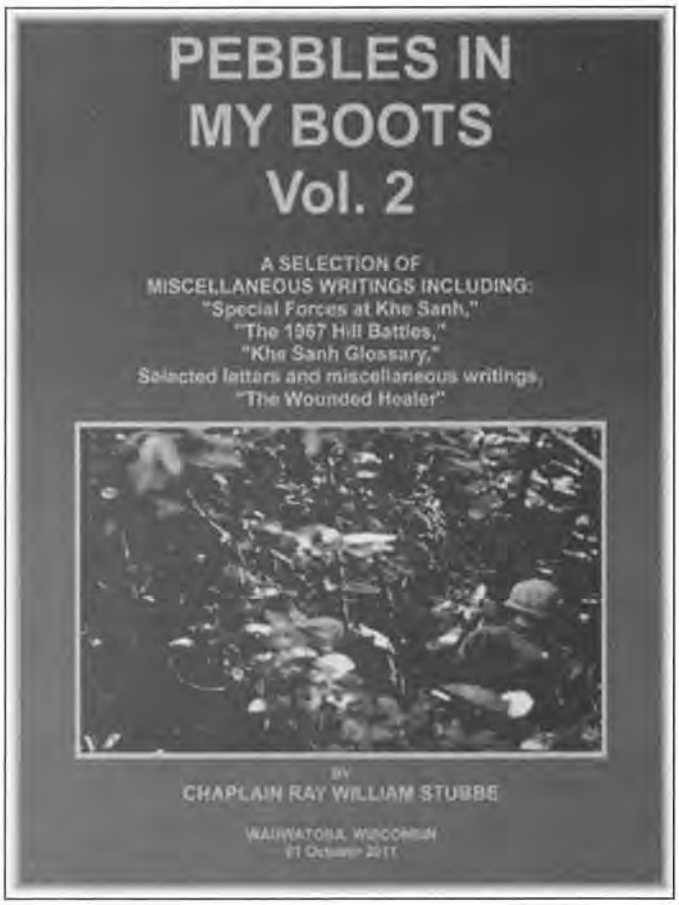
AFTERMATH

FOB-3 at Khe Sanh was demolished in June 1968. Remaining FOB-3 personnel were transferred to other FOB's at Phu Bai, Kontum, and Da Nang. USSF Detachment A-101 relocated to Mai Loc on June 24, 1968

Khe Sanh Combat Base was officially closed at 2000 hours on July 5 1968.

On April 14 2007, Senator Hillary Clinton attended a dedication in Averill Park, NY, of the Major George Quamo Post Office Building.

NOTE ON SOURCES: I relied heavily on the works of Rev. Ray W. Stubbe, especially Pebbles in My Boots, Vol. 2. (2011). Ray was a navy chaplain at Khe Sanh during the 1968 battle. Over the years he has amassed a 100,000 page archive of documents relating to Khe Sanh. Everyone interested in Khe Sanh owes a debt to Stubbe's research and scholarship.



SOME INTERESTING FACTS ABOUT THE CURRENT DAY VIETNAM

VIETNAM- A COUNTRY TO WATCH

By Joel Brinkley

A mystery pervades this part of the world.

In the Middle East, Africa, Russia, parts of Europe -- even the United States thousands of angry citizens· have stood up to challenge their governments over the last two years. In several cases, of course, they have thrown dictators out of office.

But here in Asia, home to some of the world's most authoritarian nations, we've seen none of that at all. Vietnam, however, may be setting a path for other Asian states. Late last month, the state's communist government arrested Le Quoc Quan, a well-known dissident lawyer who had been writing an anti-government blog.

His was just the latest in a rash of dissident arrests. Last fall the government sentenced three bloggers to between four and 12 years in prison for spreading what prosecutors called "antigovernment propaganda." That's a relatively new phenomenon here.

In China, Cambodia and several other regional states, people stand up and stage loud, angry protests about land seizures, local government corruption, illegal logging, pollution and other abuses that directly affect their lives. But nowhere in Asia recently have we seen large protests challenging the governments' legitimacy.

Even in Burma, where the leaders are making a careful, tentative transition to a more open, democratic society, the impetus for change is the government's own self-interest -- primarily the need to wean itself from near-total economic dependence on China.

Regional experts offer a broad range of explanations for this anomaly -- cultural, religious, economic ... there doesn't seem to be a single, consensus view. And the sudden rash of arrests here in Vietnam may turn out to be nothing more than a few lonely dissidents who get in trouble for challenging the government, like those in China. It's too early to know for sure.

But Vietnam is different from its neighbors. Born of China, a province of its northern neighbor until winning independence in 938 A.D., it's had to fight for survival ever since. The Khmer kingdom of Cambodia occupied southern Vietnam shortly after China withdrew. China has invaded this country 17 times, most recently in 1979. The French occupied Vietnam for six decades, followed by the Japanese during World War II. Then, of course, came the Vietnam War.

Look at historical sites where Vietnamese characterize their own history in drawings and friezes, and you'll see a bellicose people wielding swords, shooting arrows, firing slings -- slaughtering their varied enemies. That has been the nation's fate for millennia, helping to form its character.

So should it be a surprise that a people dominated and abused by invading and occupying forces for almost their entire history should resent a richly corrupt government that sometimes abuses them even now?

An almost invariable rule –governs debates like this. Significant social change in authoritarian states results from economic development. As people become more prosperous, with travel television, the Internet, social media, they begin to better understand how the rest of the world lives, and what they are lacking That' s when people grow dissatisfied . And That is what is happening ere now .

Visit Ho Chi Minh City (still widely ~own here as Saigon) and you'll see dozens of high end Western stores- Dior, Piaget, Louis Vultton. On Jan 3, Starbucks announced it would open its first Vietnam outlet in Saigon.

Much of this new Western retail business is for the fast -growing tourist industry -- more than 6 million visitors a year. But all of that also brings jobs and greater prosperity to one of Asia's most educated countries.

The closed, dictatorial government doesn't permit public dissent, but it's looser than many neighboring states. You can't write blogs, stage public protests or give speeches broadcasting your anti-government views. The press is not free. But otherwise the government largely leaves its people alone. And these ambitious, aggressive people prosper, just like their kin to the north -- in China.

Government health and education expenditures are among the highest in the region. Literacy is almost universal. Seventy percent of the population still lives in the countryside, growing rice, but at a rate of about 3 percent a year the rural young are moving to the cities, primarily Saigon, looking for better jobs.

Ironically enough, the United States is one of Vietnam's new best friends -- mostly as a counterweight to its historical and current day enemy, China. To that end, Hanoi is also befriending Japan, Russia, Indonesia, Taiwan and others -- understanding that making alliances, not war, is the most effective way to proceed today.

In my view, this is a country to watch -- and perhaps, one day soon, to admire.

DESPITE INCREASING PROSPERITY, VIETNAM'S APPETITES REMAIN UNIQUE

WHAT WE ALWAYS THOUGHT

You don't have to spend much time in Vietnam before you notice something unusual. You hear no birds singing, see no squirrels scrambling up trees or rats scurrying amongst the garbage. No dogs out for a walk.

In fact, you see almost no wild or domesticated animals at all. Where'd they all go? You might be surprised to know: Most have been eaten.

Of course, as with most states in the region, tigers, elephants, rhinos and other big animals are trafficked to China. At this, of course, Vietnam is hardly alone though the World Wildlife Fund describes the state as the world's greatest wildlife malefactor.

Various reports show that Vietnamese kill more rhinos for their horns than any other nation. Chinese value those horns for their mythical medical qualities like so many exotic-animal body parts.

Animal trafficking explains the dearth of tigers, elephants and other big beasts. But what about birds and rats? Yes, people eat those, too, like almost every animal that lives there. In Da Nang in January, I saw a street-side merchant with bowls full of dead rats for sale -- their fur removed but otherwise intact -- ready to cook.

Last spring, Conservation International reported that several varieties of Vietnamese gibbon, part of the ape family, "are perilously close to extinction" -- all but a few of them already eaten.

All of this raises an interesting question. Vietnamese have been meat eaters through the ages, while their Southeast Asian neighbors to the west -- Cambodia, Laos, Thailand and Myanmar have largely left their wildlife alone.

In each of these other countries you see flocks of birds that are absent in Vietnam along with numerous pet dogs and cats. There, people eat rice, primarily, and for many people in most of those states their diet includes little more than that.

Vietnam has always been an aggressive country. It has fought 17 wars with China since winning independence more than 1,000 years ago and has invaded Cambodia numerous times, most recently in 1979. Meantime, the nations to its west have largely been passive in recent centuries.

Many anthropologists and historians attribute the difference to the state's origins. Vietnam war born of China, while India heavily influenced the other countries two nations with drastically different personalities, even today.

Well, certainly that played a part. But I would argue that because Vietnamese have regularly eaten meat through the ages, adding significant protein to their diet, that also helps explain the state's aggressive tendencies and the sharp contrast with its neighbors.

Right now, the favored dish is dog. In fact, dog meat is particularly prized. It's considered a specialty because it is said to contain more protein than other meats. For Vietnamese, tradition has it that whenever you have bad luck you should eat dog meat to change your fate. But you shouldn't eat it at the start of the lunar month, or the reverse will happen. You'll actually bring on bad luck.

Now, however, tradition is clashing with modernity -- and the law has changed with it. Thirty years ago, it was illegal to keep a pet dog. The government held the view that dog meat was a nutritional priority that couldn't be ignored. That point of view still pertains, though the government repealed the law years ago.

In fact, still today, driving down the highway it's not unusual to see a flatbed truck hauling dogs curled up in little stacked cages, six cages high, eight deep, off to market -- similar to the way chickens are transported to slaughterhouses in the west.

But now, Vietnam is a rapidly prospering state; more than half the population was born after the Vietnam War (which they call the American war). Per capita income is about $3,400, which may not seem like a lot but is higher than in most neighboring states. And as the middle class grows, so does Western influence -- picked up from television, movies, Face book, Twitter and the rest.

With that has come a new desire among some to keep pets. So now you do see an occasional dog here and there, lounging on the front porch of someone's home but under the watchful eye of its owner. Even now, as Vietnam rapidly modernizes and matures, if the dog wanders too far from home, someone will grab it and then serve dog for dinner.

Visiting Vietnam, many Western visitors despair. As one Western blogger put it: "I can quite honestly say it's the most gruesome thing I have ever seen."

I could not agree more.

MARINE LISTED AS AWOL FROM 1974, NOW IDENTIFIED A MURDER VICTIM. HE WILL BE BURIED WITH FULL MILITARY HONORS

LONG BEACH — For the past 37 years, Oral Alfred Stuart Jr. was classified as AWOL and a Marine Corps deserter.

But his family never believed it. Even if Stuart had left his beloved Corps, which he voluntarily joined in 1974 and proudly tattooed on his arm, he never would have left his parents without so much as a goodbye.

"I always believed something must have happened to him. He loved the Marine Corps ... (and) he would have been in touch with our mother," insisted Carl Stuart, Stuart's older brother and one of only a few surviving family members.

Now, after all those years of uncertainty, Stuart's family Oral Alfred Stuart Jr. has been proven right through the work of the Long Beach Police Department's Cold Case Unit.

Stuart, who was from Des Moines and known to his friends and family as "Buddy," didn't desert the Marine Corps in 1974 - he was murdered.

His body was found on Nov. 10 of that year naked and dumped at The Lakes condominium complex on Spring Street, across from El Dorado Park and next to the San Gabriel (605) Freeway. He was classified as John Doe No. 155 until just last year, when they found strong evidence that the body was Stuart's.

Police officially confirmed his identity last week.

"We've notified the U.S. Navy's (Naval Criminal Investigative Service) ... that rather than being a deserter, he's a murder victim," said Long Beach Police Lt. Lloyd Cox.

"We never would have been able to identify him, and clear his record, without the National Institute of Justice Cold Case grant and (without) all of us - the coroner and NCIS - working together this last year."

Though DNA evidence was not available from the original case, it was one that came up for review by the Cold Case Unit, which has been funded by the national grant, Cox said.

Using that funding, police were able to work with Navy investigators to identify a missing Marine who was never found and who was near the Long Beach region at the time of the slaying.

Detectives then tracked the closest living relative, Carl Stuart, to his home in Phoenix, where detectives there showed the older brother an autopsy photo. They also used tattoos and other distinguishing features to identify the victim, Cox explained.

Long Beach Police Department detectives at the time of the murder also noted the close-cropped haircut and the tattoos on the 18-year-old victim indicated military service, Cox said.

The cause of death was initially classified undetermined, though the medical examiner who worked on the case in 1974 came out of retirement to help police and coroner's investigators rule the death a homicide last year with the cause listed as blunt force trauma, the lieutenant added.

The spot where Stuart was found, in public view, was processed for evidence at the time and it appeared as though the victim had been dumped there after being killed elsewhere. Detectives contacted military units in the region and looked for clues or some sort of connection to the body, but Stuart was never identified.

"Most of the coroner's files and our files from that time are missing," Cox said, explaining it isn't clear today why Stuart wasn't identified then, though Stuart had been reported AWOL by the Marine Corps on Nov. 22, 1974, "twelve days after we find the body."

Killer's ID still unknown

Those answers don't sit well with Stuart's older brother, who concedes there was no DNA technology available in 1974, but who insists the military had his brother's fingerprints on file and that police and military investigators could have identified Buddy had they tried harder.

"My parents both went to their graves not knowing what had happened to him and knowing (the Marine Corps) listed him as a deserter," Carl Stuart said. "Now I know he didn't desert, he was taken from us. But I've known that all along."

And though his brother has finally been identified, Carl Stuart said, he doesn't believe police will ever find his killer.

The odds aren't good, Cox admitted, given the length of time that has passed since the killing. Still, Long Beach Homicide Detectives are hoping the release of Stuart's name might jog a memory or strike someone's conscience.

"The chances, I know, are small, but we're hoping maybe someone knew who (Stuart) was with or who has some information about him will come forward," Cox said. "I'm amazed sometimes what people can recall even after that many years."

Carl Stuart believes his brother fell victim to serial killer Randy Kraft. Kraft, who was sentenced to death in 1989 for 16 homicides, is suspected of killing more than 60 young men, many of them military members, in the 1970s and 1980s.

At least one body was found in the Long Beach Marina and many more were dumped along Southland highways, though victims were also found out-of-state. Kraft also preyed on hitchhikers and young men in gay bars.

Kraft himself was discharged from the United States Air Force in 1969 for medical reasons, the same year he told his family he was gay. His victims were often found sadistically tortured and drugged before they were killed. Many were found with missing items of clothing or missing body parts.

Stuart was found nude and his body showed signs of trauma, Cox said, refusing to release further details due to the on-going investigation.

Carl Stuart identified his brother's body after he was shown an autopsy photo and said the grisly condition of the remains seem to fit many of the methods described in Kraft's confirmed murder cases.

An independent youth

It's a disturbing image to carry, Carl Stuart admits. The ailing Phoenix resident, who has emphysema, was quite close to his younger brother when they were growing up, especially after they lost their only other brother in a deadly car crash in 1965. They have a younger sister, who is still alive, and a half-brother, who never knew Buddy.

Carl Stuart said he still remembers the FBI tapping his phone lines for a few months after Buddy was listed a deserter, in case he was lying about not knowing where his brother was located. Buddy had just graduated from boot camp and was given several weeks leave before being shipped out when he disappeared.

Carl Stuart said he could understand why the military wouldn't report his younger brother AWOL right away, because Buddy "did what we wanted. ... He didn't like sitting around and being bored."

Buddy once hitchhiked from the family's home in Des Moines, Iowa, to California, and both brothers had a drinking problem, Carl Stuart said. It wasn't too long before he disappeared that the brothers went drinking and, full of alcohol, squared off in a fight.

"When he came home from boot camp, well, he thought he was tough," Carl Stuart recalled with a laugh. "I guess he thought he could finally take me." Some neighbors weren't amused, however, and called the police. Buddy Stuart was arrested for public intoxication with a blood alcohol measurement 26. His recruiter bailed him out the next day and gave him about a week to report back to base at Camp Pendleton, in San Diego.

"So I can understand why they wouldn't list him missing right away," Carl Stuart said.

What Stuart had a harder time coping with was the lack of interest the Marine Corps had in finding his brother once he was listed AWOL.

"But you don't push the Marine Corps," Carl Stuart said.

At least now, with the identification and homicide ruling, the Marine Corps has changed Stuart's status from deserter to honorable discharge, according to Carl Stuart and the Long Beach Police Department. The military will hold a full honor guard funeral service at the unmarked grave where Stuart, and so many other Los Angeles County murder victims, are buried, and will provide the surviving family with death benefits, though the amount hasn't yet been determined.

"We'll have the John Doe place maker taken out and a headstone put in so the grave will at least have his name," Carl Stuart said. "We have a family graveyard back in Iowa. Later maybe, I'll go back to Iowa and have a plaque placed with mom and dad."

OBIT

BILLY KEMP STEWART USMC KHE SANH VETERAN A CO 3RD ENGINEERS 11 OCT 1934 TO 28 APR 2013

Billy Kemp Stewart Sr. of 5304 Doles Road, Albany passed away at his residence 28 April, following a lengthy illness. Funeral services were held on Wednesday morning 2 May at 11am at Mathews Funeral Home. He was Buried at Olive Grove Primitive Church in Iron City, Georgia. Mr. Stewart was born 11 October 1934 in Vindex, Maryland to William Albert and Opal Tasker Stewart. He was educated in the Garrett County school system after which he enlisted in the United States Marine Corps. He graduated recruit training at Parris Island, South Carolina after which he went to Korea and mainland Japan. He spent many years at Camp Lejeune, North Carolina where in 1962 he broke the range record for rifles with a 244 out of a possible 250. For his efforts he was named Leatherneck of the Quarter and for which he received a cash award and a M-70 rifle. He was an Engineer by Military Occupation Specialty and operated all types of heavy equipment.

In 1967 he was sent to Vietnam. He cleared roads by sweeping for mines, graded for runways being built and excavated reservoirs. He helped construct a Vietnam village at MCB, Quantico upon his return. He earned a Navy Commendation with Combat V to add to his other medals. He was on active duty at Marine Base Quantico, Okinawa, Marine Corps Supply Activity, Philadelphia, and in 1974 retired from Marine Corps Air Station, Cherry Point, North Carolina. In 1975 he began work as a Civilian Marine and relocated to Marine Corps Logistics Base Albany where he retired again in 1989.

Mr. Stewart is a member of VFW Post 2785 where he served as Commander 1983-84. In that position he helped the post to become an All-American Post for the first time which caused him to receive a personal award as an All-State and All-American Post Commander. He is also a member of the Loyal Order of the Moose #1285; Disabled American Veterans #27; BPOE #2481; American Legion Post #71; East Albany Chapter AARP; the Marine Corps Engineer Association; Third Marine Division; the Khe Sanh Veterans; and the Marine Corps League #1260.

He is survived by his wife, Cherry Parker Stewart; daughter, Sandra (Wayne) Hancock, Albany; son, Billy Kemp Stewart, Jr., Anderson, Indiana; two step-sons, Joe (Gwen) Miller, Albany; Chuck (Polly) Miller, Iron City; sister, Kathy (George) Savage, Huntingtown, Maryland; brother, James (Sandy) Stewart, and stepmother, Kathern Stewart, all of Oakland, Maryland. Grandchildren are ayne Hancock, Jr., Albany; Danny (Kerri) Hancock, Sylvester; Ericka (Nick) Adams and Joey (Jessica) Miller all of Donalsonville; Amber Miller, Tampa, Florida; Jason Miller, Albany and Stacy (Kris) Hodges, Yokoda Air Force Base, Japan. Mr. Stewart also has seven great-grandchildren whom he loved dearly. They are Riley, Isabelle and Brodey Hancock, AnnaBelle and Beau Adams, Kabe Hodges and Maggie McCall Miller.

In addition to his parents, he was predeceased by a daughter, Cheryl Lynn Stewart; brother Franklin Albert Stewart; and sister Sandra Darlene Stewart.

A LITTLE NEWS FROM VIETNAM

Four pimps involved in a high-end sex ring of actresses, models, and beauties that has recently rocked Vietnamese showbiz were prosecuted Sunday on charges of providing prostitution services.

They are Miss Vo Thi My Xuan, 27, Tran Quang Mai, 40, Nguyen Huu Dat, 43, and Le Quang Tuan Anh, 27.

Actress Tran Thi H., 24, who is believed to be another of the ring's pimps, has been released on bail due to late-term pregnancy. Meanwhile, another suspected pimp named Huy has run away in his attempt to escape police arrest.

Previously, on June 2, police conducted surprise raids two big hotels in the city center and caught four high-class prostitutes having sex with their wealthy clients.

The sex workers were later identified as 20-year-old L.T.T.H, an actress, model, and lounge singer; 23-year-old N.T.M.N, a model; 20-year-old L.T.Y.D, a beauty queen in Ben Tre province; and 25-year-old L.T.H.D, a first-year student at a college in Ho Chi Minh City.

The prostitution ring run by Miss My Xuan has not only shocked local showbiz but also grabbed huge attention from global media outlets like MSN News, Times Live, Tengri News, and 21 CN in China, Britishbusinessfinder and BBC in the UK, and VOA (Voice of America), and Singapore's Straits Time, among others.

It has also attracted thousands of comments on social networking sites like Twitter.

Following a tip-off from the public, authorities in the central province of Quang Tri have dug up two bomb stores with a high number of UXO items situated close to residential areas.

After three hours of searching on January 21, demining specialists discovered 47 UXO items with their detonators still intact on an empty land in Khe Sanh town, Huong Hoa district.

Nguyen Van Cuong, head of the demining team, said they have yet to be able to identify the exact number of UXO items in the two stores – i.e underground holes that store the bombs. Local people said there are an estimated 400 to 600 UXO items in each.

But Cuong added the number could be much higher. It has been reported that 391,500 hectares out of 461,297 hectares in Quang Tri have been polluted with UXO but only 2,300 to 2,500 hectares of them are cleared per year.

More than 2,600 people have been killed and nearly 5,000 injured by UXO since 1975 when the Vietnam War ended, said the provincial Department of Labor, War Invalids and Social Affairs.

Many international organizations have funded the province in carrying out mine clearance to ensure safety for local residents.

WEB BRIEFS

B-52 "DIGGER" BOMBS AT KHE SANH

By Craig Tourte

I received my April 2013 edition of Vietnam Magazine some weeks ago, lightly perused some of the article and then put it down with the intention of taking another look at it in the future. I picked it back up this afternoon and read an article titled "My War" "William L. Doyle Jr. Major, U.S. Air Force, Strategic Air Command October 1967 - October 1968."

Mayor Doyle relates during WWII his father served on Saipan, also on the island at the time, commanding a Marine platoon, was Lieutenant David Lownds. During the Vietnam War Major Doyle became targeting officer for B-52's. His job was to, "...select points on the earth where ordnance could be dropped from the B-52 force in South Vietnam. David Lownds, now a colonel, was assigned to the Khe Sanh Combat Base as commanding officer of the 26th Marine Regiment..." "During late 1967 and early 1968, before the Tet Offensive... responding to NVA action around Lang Vei and Khe Sanh, we began targeting B-52s with standard 500-pound bombs...." "NVA troops were tunneling to come up inside the wire at Khe Sanh, a tactic that was probably necessary because strategic air employment denied the NVA close above-ground access to Khe Sanh."

"General Westmoreland...reviewed tunneling reports and told us to figure out a response using B-52." "...earth-penetrating 500 pounders...were on Guam." Westmoreland directed an immediate go." "...someone from MACV called Colonel Lownds at Khe Sanh Combat Base to brief him on the plan and ask how close to the Khe Sanh wire we could target. Lownds said to bring them as close to the wire as possible..." "The NVA tunneling effort stopped..." "In the wake of Khe Sanh, Colonel Lownds said the B-52 strikes were a godsend, a miraculous thing." "...according to James S. Robbins in This Time We Win: Revisiting the Tet Offensive," "It's almost scary when you think about it, said Lownds..."

The article concludes with Major Doyle relating that, "It wasn't until I read Robbins book on Tet that I learned...Colonel Lownds went ino Saipan along with my dad. For me, connecting the dots from Saipan to Khe Sanh has again reinforced my pride our armed forces."

We who served on and around the combat base will never be able to forget close air strikes by the B-52's. Steve Wiese once described his hearing the bombs fall as being like, "tears from angels." I thought his was a very profound description

MIKE FISHBAUGH WRITES:

Received this in a e-mail;" about how close the Arclight raids came to the base.

Attached is a photo taken by an HMM 262 pilot of a C-130 drop. Looking to the left, those little " puffs " of smoke are a 52 run at the same time as the C-130 air drop. Pretty dam close... RM

CHARLES ROST

I have a searing memory of being rudely awakened one night by dirt falling from the roof of our hootch, and the deep rumble and flashes of white light, and thinking them poor bastards in their tunnels will never know what hit them. I also remember once coming across about a 3 foot in diameter, very steep, hole in the ground, not 500 meters from the wire, that was so deep you couldn't begin to see the bottom ... could only have been a dud. I'll bet that sucker is still there.

DAVE DOEHRMAN

That wasn't a dud bomb hole - it was just the entrance or exit hole for one of the rats who came in to visit and hide in our bunkers when the NVA arty started.

INCOMING

R. SCOTT BERRY USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
A CO 2ND PLATOON, 3RD ANTI TANKS "ONTOS"

In the Summer of 1967, ("The Summer of Love" back in the States), I was one of the two Ontos crews at the temporary steel bridge being built by Engineers over the Rao Quan River, which connected Route 9 at the hair pin turn. We were there with a small contingent of Grunts for just about two weeks.

We had an Ontos crew on each side of the river at the bridge site. Not far away were the remains of an old steel permanent bridge that was down. There were a few memorable times that we had at the bridge.

One day artillery was getting the coordinates to put a "ring of steel" around us when their first rounds came in, they were close enough that the shrapnel was going over our heads through the trees. That was the only time that I took cover in my Ontos from friendly fire. I thought, would 1/2 inch of armor would keep me safe from any shrapnel.

While we were at the bridge site, three Marines came down with malaria within five days. They cooled them in the river awaiting a medevac chopper. I later learned one of the Marines died. Our supplies came in on a CH-34. The only landing place was a small flat area on top of one of the very steep hills. The chopper would hover with just one wheel on the flat portion at the top of the hill, and the supplies of cases of C-rats, five gallon metal water cans, ammunition, etc., would be dropped a few feet to the ground from the helicopter.

The Grunts had to climb up this long and very steep hill to the top, and carry the supplies down. The side of the hill was mostly loose dirt. A Grunt approached the Ontos Commander of my vehicle, and asked if he could take his Ontos up the side of the hill to the top, so they could load the supplies on to it to bring them down. I was the Ontos Driver, and I told my commander that the hill was too steep. I said if there was enough traction to take the Ontos up the side of that hill, there was not enough room in that flat area on top to turn around to bring it back down. The Ontos would have to be turned around, (pivoted), on the side of the very steep hill, and the hill was too steep to do this. There was also a good chance that once the Ontos was sideways on the hill, it could roll over and down the side of the hill.

I had heard about Ontos going over the side of a steep embankment, and rolling over sideways all the way down. On the way down, the turret came off, 106mm recoilless rifles flew off along with other equipment lashed to the outside. A past Ontos accident like that, killed one of the crewmen, and injured the other.

At the time I was a Lance Corporal, and my Ontos Commander was a Corporal. I was a pretty experienced Ontos Driver. And my commander decided the Ontos was capable. I stood my ground, even though he out ranked me, I knew the obvious danger. We came to an "agreement". I told him that if it, would climb it I would drive it up the side of the steep hillside.

But I would not turn the Ontos around on the side of the hill and bring it down. I told him that when I got to the top near the flat area, but still on the steep upgrade, I would lock the brakes on the Ontos, with the front of the Ontos still pointed up towards the top, get out, and he then could get in and turn it around on the side of the hill.

The M-50A1 Ontos weighs 9 1/2 tons. It will outclimb a Tank because it has a more aggressive track with better traction, plus it's a whole lot lighter than a Tank. You steer an Ontos by two control "sticks". They are not hydraulic, they are mechanical, so it takes some effort to operate. It's like the difference in a car or truck of having or not having power steering. You turn an Ontos by pulling back on one control stick, braking that side track, and accelerating. This brakes the track on one side, and the other track is accelerated. The Ontos turns by pivoting. I tried to talk the Corporal out of this, but he could not be persuaded, to recognize the danger.

He said that he would turn the Ontos around on the steep hillside and bring it down with the supplies. (Going down a very steep hill with an Ontos can also get hairy.) As you are going down, it takes a monumental effort to pull back on the mechanical control sticks to brake this 9 1/2 ton vehicle. As you pick up speed going down a steep hill, you have to make slight steering corrections to keep the vehicle going down straight. And in order to make these steering adjustments, you not only have to slow the track on one side, but you have to accelerate the opposite track to make the turning adjustment. This results in an increase in speed of the Ontos going down the hill.

You might have to make several steering adjustments going down the hill, and I'm talking steeper grades. And each time you make a steering adjustment, you have to accelerate, which just keeps adding more and more speed to your downhill trek. You can't just brake one track without accelerating the opposite track to make a turn or steering adjustment.

The Ontos has a six speed transmission with three forward range positions. There are two automatic shifting gears in each of the three range selections. If you are going down a long steep hill, sometimes the transmission gets to max rpms in the lower gear range when you are trying to accelerate a track to make a steering adjustment.

You need to accelerate to turn, so you have to shift up to the next higher gear range. This causes the Ontos to pick up more speed. It starts getting hairier. So turning that Ontos around on that steep hillside was not the only bad part, but bringing it down that long deep grade and making steering adjustments on the way down, could also not be pleasant.

If you get too far sideways on a steep grade, the Ontos will roll. So, I started driving my Ontos up that long, very steep grade. The ground was pretty solid, so the Ontos was getting good traction without any slippage. I was amazed that it was climbing this steep grade. Common sense said don't do it, but I had agreed to drive it up. When I got near the top, I locked the brakes back and took it out of gear, jumped out of the Driver's hatch. My commander jumped into the Driver's seat, and waited for the Grunts to load the supplies on to the Ontos. The commander started turning the Ontos on the steep hillside, locking one track, while accelerating the opposite track to pivot it on the side of the hill. With some effort, he managed to get it sideways on the steep grade. The track that was facing sideways toward the top of the hill, was the track being accelerated, while the track facing sideways toward the bottom of the hill was the one that was braked to a stop.

That's when it really got hairy. Standing on the hillside up from the Ontos, I saw the track that was facing up towards the hill, spinning and bouncing up and down. It was bouncing up about three inches from the ground, and having a hard time making good contact with the dirt ground to turn.

I looked at his face in the Driver's seat as he attempted to turn the Ontos. His demeanor had changed from self-confident and a little cocky, to fright. I think he finally realized that he was in a touchy situation, with the Ontos not responding very well to trying to pivot on that steep hillside, and it was ready to roll over and down the hill with him aboard.

I was scared for him, as I saw the uphill track bouncing up and down, and not getting enough traction to turn the Ontos. He was actually "getting air" between that track and the ground. I thought at the time, one could probably grab the top edge of the Ontos fender on the uphill side, and roll the Ontos over and down the hill. As the spinning uphill track bounced up and down on the ground, the Ontos started to very slowly pivot and turn, until he got it turned and facing downhill.

He managed to drive it down the hill without getting sideways and rolling it. At the bottom of the hill, he was pretty quiet. I just looked at him and shook my head, knowing he was lucky that he wasn't entwined in the wreckage of a mass of twisted 106 barrels and 9 1/2 tons of steel. Needless to say, that was the last time our Ontos went up that steep hill. I have seen later day photos of that area showing that steep hillside and I think how questionable it was for even driving it up that grade.

Another memorable time for me, involved left over in Vietnam. One afternoon, we observed that the long stretch of the side of a grass-covered hill, (on the other side of the river as steep as the hill climbed by our Ontos), leading up from the road, was on fire. It burned in a long horizontal line upwards, starting at the bottom of the hill. The flames weren't very high in the short grass, yet there were a couple of ground detonations in the burning area. We were then told that the side of the hill was mined with old French mines. Days before the fire, I had thought about taking a walk up the side of that hill. It was all open. Good thing I didn't. That area with the mines had no wire, warning signs, nor any indications at all that there were old French mines there.

I was at Khe Sanh with 2nd Platoon, Alpha Company, 3rd Anti-Tank Bn. from the middle of May 1967 to the end of the third week of November 1967 when my tour was up. My Platoon Commander, 1stLt. Philip Howard Sauer was KIA in a NVA ambush on Hill 861 on 24Apr67, at the start of the Hill Fights.

At that time, we had two of our Ontos at Khe Sanh, and two at Gio Linh, and short a fifth Ontos. I was with the two at Gio Linh, until we joined the rest of our platoon at Khe Sanh around 15May67.

I have a lot of color slides from my time period there. 81mm mortar crews, artillery guns and crews, a105 artillery gun with "Snoopy" painted on it, and a black Marine Grunt holding up a 6-7 foot long Black Cobra. After we patrolled through the area east of the base in the heavy undergrowth, we met a Black Marine Dog Handler with his German Shepherd, Bird Dog spotter planes,and Hueys in the revetment area and near the Hills.

I have color slides of a C-130on 15 Oct 67 just after it crashed and burned on the runway during the making a LAPES of pallets of sandbags. I think I have a photo or two of the "Air America" larger single engine plane that landed at Khe Sanh. One of the South Vietnamese crew was walking around the aircraft, checking it. The engine was still running with the prop spinning. The guy walked right into the prop, and of course it killed him instantly. And another "prop" or rotor incident. We had a bunker on the North side of the runway, near the west end of the runway. One day I was standing outside that bunker, gazing across the runway to a CH-34 that had just landed, and he kept the engine running and the rotors turning. I saw a Marine by the side doorway of that helicopter, and he was unloading five gallon metal water cans from the helicopters side door. Apparently this was a re-supply chopper that was ferrying supplies to the nearby hill or other nearby locations. The Marine was flinging those empty water cans out as fast as he could throw them. In his enthusiasm, he didn't let go of one fast enough, and instead of the can getting thrown out horizontally, it went up and struck one of the blades of the main rotor. The rotor blade was broken, and the unbalanced rotor started shaking the helicopter until the pilot cut the engine.

If there is any interest in these photos, I will scan them, and put them up on a photo site or here on this website. Too bad we didn't have digital cameras like we have now. I probably would have taken thousands of photos, but back then 35mm film and development was comparatively expensive for 20 to 36 prints or slides. Plus, getting it developed quickly and easily was sometimes a problem.

I first posted a "novel" on the Guest Book of the KSV website back around December1998. It was my first post to any website, as I had just gotten on to the Internet. Later that little "novel" appeared to my surprise, in Red Clay in 2001. I have only been to two KSV reunions, both in Chicago, one in July 2001, and the other in July 2005. Don't know if I will be attending more. At both the 2001 and 2005 reunions, I was amazed and delighted at the warm camaraderie among all who were there. I remarked to others when I got home, that it was the nicest group of people, all in the same place at the same time.

I felt a little awkward at those reunions, even though I was at Khe Sanh for 6 1/2 months, as I was not there during the Siege. If someone asks me where I was in Vietnam, I tell them the different places, including Khe Sanh, but I quickly tell them that I got out of Khe Sanh and Vietnam, two months before the 77 Day Siege started. I don't want to appear as a Khe Sanh "wannabee" or take anything away from those who were at Khe Sanh and the surrounding hills during the Siege. I think I have run out of bandwidth with this "message", so I will stop.

FOXTROT PAPPA 1 ALPHA: FORMER MARINE SALUTES HIS BUDDIES

PONTOTOC – These days, Scott Black is a family man and businessman. He's been renovating his house in Pontotoc to add another room. A few days ago, he was in the attic and found a box containing a special photograph.

All of the sudden, "these days" didn't matter nearly as much as what took place more than four decades ago in Vietnam.

"I volunteered," 66-year-old Black said. "I was at Ole Miss and decided I wasn't doing much with my life at the time. I thought, I'll join the Marine Corps."

Black had taken the photograph in 1967 near Phu Bai. He doesn't remember all of his buddies' full names, but he clearly recalls what they lived through together.

"I was up Sunday morning drinking coffee on our back porch. The picture was on the table behind me. It was still dark," Black said. "I was just standing there staring at the woods behind our house. I don't know why, but I began to cry out loud and uncontrollably. I don't know when I've done something like that. My wife was holding me and frantically asking, 'What's wrong? What is this picture and who are these people?'"

If you have the time on the day after Veterans Day, Black would like to answer those questions for you, too.

"They were just a bunch of 19- and 20-year-old kids who fought and some died in the mud paddies, the elephant grass and jungles of South Vietnam," he said.

Their radio call sign was Foxtrot Pappa 1 Alpha, and they were 1st Squad, 1st Platoon, F Company, 2nd Battalion, 26th Marines. Black said the word "grunt" applied. They were infantrymen, who took the fight directly to the enemy.

"They were real people from all walks of life across the U.S. They had names like Allday, Curley and Rau," he said. "They were heroes. Not movie heroes, but the real thing."

Morgan from Indiana was killed in action; Hangus from Utah was shot in the face but survived; Johnson from Tennessee earned the Bronze Star with a "Combat V" for heroism. The list of buddies includes Pachaco, Smith, Willie and "Doc."

"The names go on," Black said. "Those that were no longer there and those who came to take their place."

Sgt. Ronald T. Curley was awarded the Navy Cross for repeatedly exposing himself to gunfire to lead his platoon during a three-hour battle. He single-handedly assaulted two enemy bunkers, silencing the automatic weapons inside. After the battle, he made three trips under sniper fire to carry wounded to a helicopter landing zone.

(Curley) received a battlefield promotion and was sent back to Quantico, Virginia," Black said. "He served two more tours in Vietnam as an officer. Today, he has a wonderful family and lives in southern California."

Sgt. Jim Allday received the Navy Commendation Medal. He's a retired consultant living in the mountains of California, where he's a family man and "an old tree-hugger," Black said.

Not all homecomings went smoothly for the men of Foxtrot Pappa 1 Alpha.

"I found out that Arnie Rau had become squad leader and that one night there was a 'botched ambush' and five or six of our Marines had been killed," Black said. "Arnie felt responsible, something he never got over. Arnie Bruce Rau died homeless and an addict right here in the United States of America."

Black said he "often wondered how many hundreds of so-called 'normal people' had walked by or stepped over Arnie Rau, while he lay passed out on a sidewalk, never knowing who he was, what he had done and the great sacrifices he had made for this country."

Rau was awarded the Silver Star for Gallantry in Action for his service. Black wondered how many other veterans from Vietnam, Iraq and Afghanistan had followed Rau's path after combat.

"We all need to realize that there are heroes all around us. We just don't know," Black said. "They may be your neighbor or the young lady at the checkout at Walmart. They could be the police officer that gave you a ticket last week, or the guy that picks up your garbage, or the 20-year-old kid that works on the assembly line at the furniture market."

A photograph found in an attic inspired Black's thoughts about yesterday and today. That same photograph provides a partial explanation of why it can be hard for people to notice the heroes around them.

Curley and Allday are in that shot and received email copies the other day. Black said they saw the young kids they used to be. They didn't see heroes.

"Never crossed their minds," he said.

KHE SANH VETERAN JACK DAY, H&S CO 1/9, REFLECTS ON DAY HE JOINED THE MARINES WITH FOUR CLOSE BUDDIES

Veterans Day 2012 is a good time to pay tribute to five United States Marines who entered the Marine Corps together back in August of 1967 after graduating from Moores Hill High School that year, except Ebbie Roberts, who graduated in 1966. These young American patriots were carrying on a tradition that dates back to the beginning of our nation when they would volunteer to gain, protect and preserve our freedoms. Thank God there are men and women today who continue with that pride and patriotism and are willing to make tremendous sacrifices to serve in the Armed Forces of the U.S. The five are Tanne Burton, Jack Day, Loyd "Ebbie"

"YEP, SAME FIVE GUYS"

Roberts, Bob Wetzler and Frank Cummins.

TANNE BURTON

Tanne was born Oct. 24, 1948, to Ruth and Kirby Burton and grew up in Moores Hill and graduated from Moores Hill High School in 1967. His dad was a World War II veteran and was on a "Higgins Boat" (LCVP) which supported the amphibious landings in the South Pacific from LST's. Kirby Burton served as a sergeant and participated in many beach landings.

A Marine Corps recruiter came to Moores Hill to talk to students about signing up for the Marines and this got them to thinking about, it but they didn't make any commitments at that time.

would go to Vietnam. They could go in on a delayed entry program too so they could get their affairs in order.

Tanne said eventually Frank Cummins got in on the act too and became the fifth member of the group. It wasn't one of those pacts that kids make in school to do something after high school but it just all fell into place quickly. In August 1967 they went to Cincinnati and were inducted and officially became a part of The Few, The Proud, The Marines! They were off to beautiful San Diego, Calif., for boot camp at Camp Pendleton.

It was a very big change from home life in tiny Moores Hill.

Tanne said the usual 13 weeks of boot camp turned into only eight weeks of very accelerated training and involved a lot of running to get in shape. They stayed in tents instead of barracks too. They were preparing them for Vietnam. They took their Infantry Training Regiment at Camp Pendleton too and then Tanne went to El Toro for deployment to Vietnam.

Tanne was flown to Guam, Okinawa, and finally to DaNang, Vietnam. Tanne served with the 7th Engineers of the 7th Marines, 1st Marine Division in an Engineering outfit and they were exposed to everything you can imagine while trying to build bridges. The enemy frowns on such activities and they became known as the "Purple Heart" Division. Tanne said he was at Quang Tri, Go Hau City near the DMZ, Chu Lai and Hue, building the floating bridges. These emergency floating bridges were very important. He was even in Cambodia.

He participated in such operations as Meade River and Squirrel Hunt. He said he didn't realize it at the time but this was building his future for him too, once he would return to civilian life. He was in Vietnam from February 1968 to April 1969. He attained the rank of Corporal in the Marines and said there were many long and hot days spent in Vietnam. Tanne and Bobby Wetzler had talked about joining the Navy but wound up as Marines. They saw each other in Vietnam and were able to take an in-country R&R together at DaNang. Tanne took his regular R&R at Bangkok, Thailand, for eight days and another one in Taipei.

After his "Tour of Duty" in Vietnam, Tanne returned to Camp Pendleton, Calif., because his MOS was a 'critical' one until he was discharged Aug. 16, 1969. He went to work at the I&M Power Plant but decided after a year that wasn't for him. He went to New Orleans and used the skills he learned operating heavy equipment in the Marines to go to work building canals for 10 years and traveled all over the place and eventually became a superintendent overseeing the construction of the canals and pumping stations.

He traveled around the country after this job with Hamon Power as an explosive expert. He had to take schooling at Penn State University to become an expert handling these explosives. He decided to stop traveling and started working at the Aurora Terminal, then went to P&G for approximately 10 years working in the boiler house operating power plant equipment. He finally finished up working at Seagram's for about eight years in the maintenance department as a pipe fitter. Tanne said he worked in 48 states, only missing out on Oregon and Washington in his travels around the country.

Tanne said the best thing he ever did was to join the Marines because it gave him the confidence to do anything he set his mind to do. He looks back on those challenging days and knows that's what made him the man he is today.

Some of Tanne's awards include: Presidential Unit Citation, Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry, National Defense Medal, Vietnam Campaign Medal, Vietnam Service Medal and the Combat Action Ribbon. Tanne has a twin brother, Shawn, who served in the Army in Hawaii and another brother, Gevan. Tanne has two daughters, Cathleen and Karrah, along with two grandsons and a granddaughter. Today, he resides on Dutch Hollow Road in Aurora. He was honored to be able to go to Washington, D.C., in June with the other four who went into the Marines with him and it was the first time all five had been together at one time since they went into the Marines.

Tanne is also proud that he started going to the Aurora Elementary School in 1992 and enjoyed working with teachers Judy Ullrich and Phee Ellinghausen to promote Veterans Day and continued this Tanne is also proud that he started going to the Aurora Elementary School in 1992 and enjoyed working with teachers Judy Ullrich and Phee Ellinghausen to promote Veterans Day and continued this program for 10 years. It started out with Tanne and Nick Ullrich going to the classroom and showing military items and talking to the students and eventually led to programs taking place in the gym. Thanks to teachers like this they were able to get the word out why our veterans are so important and how many sacrifices they have made. He wanted to make sure the Veterans of today get treated better than when he came home from Vietnam.

Those in Desert Storm, Iraq and Afghanistan have so much support today and he firmly believes that's because of the dedication and support of the Vietnam veterans.

FRANK CUMMINS

Frank was born Dec. 16, 1949, to Rose and Carl Cummins. He grew up in Moores Hill and graduated from Moores Hill High School in 1967.

Frank said all five of them were together at Camp Onofre at Camp Pendleton, Calif., for boot camp and ITR. He said boot camp was such a challenge and so different from everyday life in Moores Hill, but it paid off when he officially became a proud United States Marine.

Frank said it's something you have to experience to understand but he felt so strong and invincible when the five of them were together at Camp Pendleton. Later, when they were separated, he felt like he was "left out to dry" and the close camaraderie they had was gone. But, after all, he was now a Marine and was ready to serve where he was needed. After leaving Camp Pendleton, Frank received orders to go to Vietnam but when his brother, John, was sent there, Frank didn't have to go to Vietnam. Frank is very proud of his brother, John, who volunteered to leave Germany and go to Vietnam. He's proud they both served our nation.

Frank worked in administration and was sent to Okinawa to serve with the 3rd Force Maintenance Regiment with the 3rd Marine Division for one year with ordinance maintenance. After his time in Okinawa, he returned to the U.S. and finished up his time at El Toro, Calif., after a nice 40-day leave back home. He had entered in August 1967, was discharged in August 1969, and attained the rank of Corporal (E-4) and also a NCO.

He has two brothers, John and Ernie, and one sister, Lana Ison, all of Moores Hill. He married his wife, Sara (Burton) ,from Moores Hill, in 1978, and they have three sons, Logan, Brent and Ryan. They reside on Ind. 350 in Moores Hill. Frank works for Monsanto in Addyston, Ohio, and is still employed there but the name of the company is now INEOS and he plans to work two more years and then enjoy retirement. Frank is proud to have served our great nation and fully supports those serving today, especially those in combat situations.

BOB WETZLER

Bob Wetzler is the son of Wanda and Charles "Skeeter" Wetzler and grew up with two brothers, Tommy and Doug, and one sister, Barbara, in Moores Hill.

Bob graduated from Moores Hill High School in 1967. Bob and Tanne Burton were great friends growing up and Tanne said Bob's cousin, Gene Moorehead, watched out for them so they didn't get into too much trouble.

Bob has a strong feeling for the U.S. and believes that patriotism is an essential part of supporting our country.

When Bob graduated from boot camp and ITR he went home on leave and then returned to Camp Pendleton for artillery training. He was ordered to Vietnam where he was assigned to G Battery, 3rd Marine Battalion of the 11th Marine Regiment - known as the "Cannon Cockers." He served as a Corporal at a place known as Hill 10 where they supplied fire support for the 7th Marines. This area overlooked a place known as "Happy Valley" which was a major staging area for the VietCong (VC) and North Vietnamese Army (NVA).

It was an area of intense battles and firepower. They participated in Operation Mameluke, which was a major offensive from May to October of 1968 involving many Marine forces, with many casualties on both sides. Hill 10 was located approximately 10 miles southwest of DaNang. The enemy forces were notorious for firing 122 MM rockets at American forces and camps and they were very powerful weapons. Bob served here from January 1968 until February 1969. He then returned to the U.S. to Camp LeJeune, S.C., until his discharge in June 1969.

Bob worked at Monsanto from September 1969 until his retirement in 2004. He and wife, Sally, were married in 1979 and reside on U.S. 421 at the edge of Versailles. Bob has two children, Sally has three, and they have one child together. They have 15 grandchildren and one great-granddaughter.

Bob said the trip to Washington, D.C., was an eye opener for him and he really enjoyed being with his old buddies to talk about the many interesting things that have happened to them. They sat up late each evening at the hotel discussing their exploits. To be able to be together again and see so many interesting places in Washington, D.C., made the trip exciting. The favorite part of this trip is watching the presentation by four members of the group when they set the wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns. It was tough to visit the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and see so many names you recognize.

LOYD "EBBIE" ROBERTS

Ebbie Roberts was born June 23, 1948, at Milan, to Curt "Shorty" and Aileen Roberts. He has two brothers, Benny and Randy.

Ebbie attended grade school and high school at Moores Hill and graduated from Moores Hill High School in 1966. Ebbie had checked to see where he was on the draft list in 1967 and discovered he was number one so he came up with the idea to join the Marines and went to see his buddies and as they say, "the rest is history." They were on there way to become Marines!

Ebbie and his wife, Louanna "Lana" (Goff), have been married for 20 years. Ebbie has a daughter, Christy, and three stepsons; Otto, David and Mike Grimes, along with nine grandchildren. Ebbie and Lana reside at 714 Nowlin Ave. in Greendale.

After graduation, Ebbie enlisted in the United States Marine Corps, along with four buddies, Tanne Burton, Bob Wetzler, Frank Cummins and Jack Day. Ebbie was inducted in August 1967 and was discharged as a Lance Corporal in August 1969.

He took his boot camp at Camp Pendleton, CA along with his ITR (Infantry Training Regiment). He was then sent to Vietnam for his 13-month "Tour of Duty" and was assigned to Alpha Battery, 1st Battalion, 12th Marines of the 3rd Marine Division (A-1-12, 3rd Marines).

Ebbie was wounded in action at Camp J.J. Carroll near the DMZ in Vietnam April 30, 1968, by shrapnel from an exploding enemy round. He had been in Vietnam for approximately nine months. He was evacuated to Okinawa for 33 days of surgery and rehabilitation and then was flown to Chicago for follow-up rehab for another six months. After he recovered, he returned to Camp Lejeune for one day and then was assigned to Vieques Island, Puerto Rico, as an instructor for the 155MM Howitzers.

After his discharge from the Marines, Ebbie returned home and continued working for Schenley Distillery for 20 years until it closed. He then went to work for Reliance Medical in Mason, Ohio, and continues in that job today after 23 years.

Ebbie is a member of the Disabled American Veterans (DVA) Chapter No. 75 and the Moores Hill Legion Post No. 209.
Ebbie and Lana's granddaughter, London, is married to local Afghanistan Purple Heart Recipient and American Hero, Brett Bondurant. They are presently in Texas as Brett continues his rehabilitation from his injuries. Ebbie is very proud of his service to our great nation and supports those serving today, especially those in combat situations.

Ebbie Roberts was presented with a Lawrenceburg Fall Fest Purple Heart Honor Award plaque in September 2012.

JACK DAY

Jack was born on March 21, 1949, in Mount Sterling, Ky., to Mr. and Mrs. Harley E. Day and moved to Lawrenceburg, Ind., and attended schools there until he transferred to Moores Hill High School for his sophomore year. Jack has three sisters, Kathy Day Ryan, Patricia (Patty) Day and Regina McConnell. He has two brothers, Harley Glen and Michael. Jack enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps in August 1967 along with four high school buddies. He took his boot camp (basic training) at Camp Pendleton, Calif., and then entered his ITR there also. He then completed four weeks of communication training as a radioman and field wire man.

Jack serve 13 months in Vietnam from January 1968 to February 1969 with the 1st Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment, 3rd Marine Division in the Northern I Corps, Quang Tri Province, near the DMZ. The 1st Battalion Marines were assigned to the 26th Marines at the Battle of Khe Sanh during the Tet Offensive of January 1968 to April 1968. During this 77-day siege of heavy mortar and rocket attacks, along with enemy ground attacks, Jack was wounded by shrapnel in his left hand from an enemy mortar round. Jack was awarded a Purple Heart for injuries sustained while in a combat situation against enemy forces. Jack was also awarded a Sharpshooter Rifle Badge, National Defense Service Medal with one star, Vietnam Service Medal, Vietnam Campaign Medal, Presidential Unit Citation, U.S. Marine Combat Action Ribbon and Vietnamese Cross of Gallantry. Jack was an E-4 (NCO) serving as a Corporal.

Upon his return to the U.S., Jack was stationed at Camp Lejeune, N.C., with the 10th Marines Artillery Battery until his discharge June 10, 1969.

On July 8 through 10, 2011, Jack was one of 50 veterans from Southeastern Indiana who went on a three-day bus trip to Washington, D.C., where he was one of the four wreath presenters at the Tomb of the Unknowns. It's a very humbling experience and such an honor to be able to participate in that ceremony. When the bus returned to Lawrenceburg Sunday evening, July 10, Jack was met by his family and taken to Lawrenceburg Speedway to watch the races.

While he was there, the announcer introduced him to the packed house of race fans as a "Vietnam Hero and Purple Heart Recipient who had just returned from Washington, D.C., where he had placed a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns" and the crowd went wild. They were giving him "high fives" and coming up to him and hugging him and shaking his hand. It was quite a tribute for a man who has given so much and is proud to be a United States Marine.

Jack and his wife, Marie, are the parents of two sons; Jack Jr. and Jason. Jack and Marie have one grandson, Wyatt, and two granddaughters, Jordan and Mariah. They have been married for 43 years and reside near Friendship, Ind., on the family farm of 61 acres.

Jack retired from the AEP, Indiana & Michigan, Tanners Creek Power Plant in Lawrenceburg, Ind., in 2008 after 38 years of service as a supervisor. Son, Jason is also employed there. Jack was also the recipient of a Lawrenceburg Fall Fest Purple Heart Honor Award plaque at the 2011 Fall Fest.

SCHOLARSHIP UPDATE
BY CHAIRMAN DAN FISHER

The fourth year of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation continues to be a growing success as shown by our history. (2009 - six scholarship awards, 2010 had seven, 2011 had ten awards and 2012 had 121) That's 35 applications and over $20,000 in awards. Membership donations and proceeds from the silent auction are the sources for the funding of our scholarship. The Scholarship Review Committee consisting of Bill Jayne, Bruce "T-Bone" Jones, Dennis Mannion and Larry McCartney worked hard reviewing applications. Thanks to Treasurer and KSV President Tommy Eichler for his timely approvals and support.

William Berry - 2nd year award. Grandnephew of SSgt. Jerry Elliot, USA, 282nd AHC, MIA 21 Jan. 1968, and grandson of Assoc. member Donna Elliot. "Sam" attends Central Baptist College planning for BS in education while participating in college wrestling.

Laura Haines - 2nd year award. Granddaughter of James Sluss, USMC, 26th Marine HQ Co. Laura plans to study nutrition science and optometry at the Kansas State Univ. and practice optometry in rural Kansas. Laura has achieved an outstanding academic and athletic record in high school and college.

Taylor McElroy - 2nd year award. Granddaughter of George Myrick, D 1/26. Taylor is a junior at Southwestern Oklahoma State University majoring in nursing and plans to become a nurse anesthesiologist. She is active in student government and plays basketball at the university.

Troy Moose - 2nd year award. Grandson of John Wolfe Sr. 3/26. Troy attends Crowder College studying agriculture science and alternative energy. Troy is active in community service projects and agricultural science clubs.

Mari Tibbetts - 2nd year award. Daughter of Arion Tibbetts, L 3/26. Mari attends the University of New Hampshire pursuing a degree in Child and Family Studies and dance. Mari continues her vocation in dance while volunteering in her community for food shelves and diversity awareness programs.

Stephanie Lownds _1st year award. Granddaughter of Col. David Lownds, CO 26th Marines. Stephanie will be attending the Univ. of Wyoming to study Communications and Journalism. She has a strong high school athletic background and involvement in civic projects.

Michele Patton _1st year award. Daughter of Shawn Patton, C Btry, 1/13. Michelle will pursuing a career in geriatric or surgical nursing at Texas Tech U. and is active in community, musical theater and choir.

Dillon Murphy _1st award. Grandson of Richard Donaghy, HQ 26th Marines. Dillon will be attending UCLA to study engineering. He is active in youth ministry and has achieved awards for academics and track.

Shannon Friel-1st award. Daughter of Thomas Friel, G 2/26. Shannon will be attending the College of St. Rose as a music major in performance with the harp. She excelled in athletics and academics in high school and travelled to Cambodia for mission work in 2011.

Shelbi Norden _1st award. Granddaughter of Russ Turner, A 1/26. Shelbi will attend Regeancy Beauty Academy to attain a career in cosmetology and the beauty products industry. She plans to operate her own private business someday.

Drew Turner _1st award. Grandson of Russ Turner, A 1/26. Drew will attend St. Louis Community College at Meramec in general studies courses. He plans for a medical career.

Satchel Wilkinson - 1st award. Grandson of Lawrence Wilkinson HQ Btry 1/13. Satchel will attend California State U to study Spanish. He excelled in athletics in high school and coached youth sports in his community.

THE 1968 EXHIBIT

By Dan Fisher

1968 THE YEAR OF THE MONKEY.

Few years in modern times capture a decade of turmoil and change as does the year, 1968. Because of the significance of 1968, the Minnesota Historical Society embarked on a project to capture the happenings of each month of that year and provide an interactive exhibit that allowed the public to better understand, remember or reflect on the changes our nation weathered in that decade.

Central to "The 1968 Exhibit" was the Vietnam War which focuses on the month of February, 1968, a month of intense combat during the so-called TET Offensive, when casualty lists reached an all-time high and the nation tore itself in apart at home. The other eleven months of 1968 would detail a family living room circa January, 1968 with a black & white TV set tuned to Walter Cronckite's nightly war news. March witnesses the beginnings of the radical and feminist movements. April is dedicated to Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. May describes the Civil Rights' 'Freedom' marches in Washington, D.C. Bobby Kennedy's assassination and long train ride back to Washington occur in June. The plastic look of American pop culture and hippie fashion occupy July. Riots explode at the Chicago Convention in August. Olympic and professional sports highlights are September and October. The 1968 political campaigns and elections are displayed in November and finally, in December the exhibit ends in another living room flanked by a full sized replica of the Apollo 8 module and a folded American flag in a case on the mantle. Since music and television were so prevalent in America there are interactive settings of the popular songs, movies and TV shows of those times looping for viewers (including huge bean-bag chairs to crash and watch from).

Artifacts for each separate monthly exhibit were donated or loaned by other historical societies, museums or private individuals.

Since Vietnam figured so centrally to the exhibit the History Center's staff decided that the iconic symbol of that war was the Bell, UH1 "Huey" helicopter. Not just a large picture of one, but a real one. Needless to say, by 2010 "Hueys" had become very hard to find or very expensive. So a search went forward to find a non-flying, Bell UH-1 "Huey" airframe. One was finally found at an aircraft boneyard in Washington State. Helicopter UH-1H 66-01008 was hauled by flatbed truck cross country to the Minnesota History Center Workshop in St. Paul, MN arriving on Oct. 14, 2010.

A group of volunteers (here-in called the "Working Party" or "WP") gathered to begin this restoration of "Huey" 66-01008. The "WP", growing to about 30 individuals, included civilian and former military aviation buffs, History Center Staff and a core group of Vietnam Veterans, including several Army "Huey" pilots, air and ground crew, two Navy SAR crew…and one Marine. Two members of the "WP" even shared time on the Khe Sanh Battlefield. Tom H. served as a UH-1B Army, gunship pilot escorting SOG inserts to points west and north of Khe Sanh while the author served as a "D" 1/26 rifleman in the hills and valleys around the Combat Base. During our long hours in the workshop Tom and I sometimes compared notes about our times at Khe Sanh but found our perspective to be 180 degrees opposite of each other, him being way up there and me being way down there.

Our "Huey" 66-01008 was built in December 1966 and entered service in Vietnam in May 1967 and served there until December 1970 as a utility and troop transportation helicopter or "slick" in the 765th Transportation Battalion and HHC 269th CAB. It then returned to the U.S. to serve in a variety of domestic commands. It again saw foreign service in Korea until December, 1975. After being mustered out of military service, "Huey" 66-01008 continued to fly for private owners before being bought for salvage purposes at the Washington State firm. The History Center felt itself lucky to get it.

The "Working Party" immediately dived into the restoration. Deadlines were set and the volunteers met early every Wednesday to share coffee, rolls (thanks to the History center Staff) and stories before starting on their six hour day. "Huey" 66-01008 quickly became a skeleton of itself, stripped of engine, wiring, cargo doors, gas tanks, wall blankets, multi-colored paint jobs, mice and bird's nests. Power washing, grinding and sanding gave its aluminum skin a buffed, dull shine. Missing parts were fabricated.

The restoration phase lasted four months and included new painted surfaces in 'official' Vietnam OD green and gray with detailed painting of aircraft numerals. Severely scratched windshields, green house and chin bubble plexi-glass surfaces were carefully polished out. Huge rotor blades and the rotor tower were reconditioned to look operable. Finally, there sat "Huey" 66-01008 in brand new 'clothes' looking ready to fly as a "medevac" chopper ("Dust-off" in Army terms) with red crosses, stretcher racks and all. The entire volunteer "Working Party" beamed and posed for pictures!

Now came the really hard part. How to dismantle and cut "Huey" 66-01008 into pieces so that it could be packed onto 4 - twelve x four foot carts, easily moved into one 40 foot truck trailer, moved up flights of steps, through standard sized museum doors, be reconstructed in one day and look ready to fly! Not an easy task, so the "WP" spent endless hours in front of a white board guesstimating with dry erase pens how it should be done (there were NO MANUALS for this operation). Deft work with saws-all cutters, plasma torches, hack saws and drills sliced and diced "Huey" 66-01008 into lengths resembling halved canoe hulls. The tail boom was removed and the rotor tower made to tilt down by hydraulic jack for easy removal. Windscreens were quickly attached and removed by Velcro tape. Sliced sections of fuselage were pinned and buckled together like a life-sized, model aircraft. Finally, after one year and 3000 man hours, it was done.

By fall, 2011 "Huey" 66-01008 was ready to make its debut at the grand opening of the "1968 Exhibit". On October15, 2011 the exhibit opened to much local fanfare and "Huey" 66-01008 was the success it was expected to be. In fact, the crowds around the helicopter became a chokepoint in crowd flow. Our "Huey" was modified to include a movie projector inside the air frame roof to show Vietnam footage on the opposite, closed cargo door. This was accompanied by voice over of eight Vietnam Veterans' personal vignettes. A nearby sealed display case contained artifacts donated by the "WP" including a unit of C-Rations, dog tags, 'boonie' hats, letters home, a folded American Flag and the author's well -worn, Ka-Bar knife and sheath.

ALL CUT UP

On my several trips to view the "1968 Exhibit" I noticed that the "Huey" was the most popular part of the exhibit and also the most respectful. The viewers would quietly walk up, stop and listen to the stories and movies, touch the "Huey's" skin and gaze into the pilot cockpits and troop compartment. Many times, middle aged men would stand apart, arms folded and just look "Huey" 66-01008 over in a knowing way. I only wish that the attendees to the

PAINT MASKING

DAN FISHER & VOLUNTEERS FINISH PAINTING PROJECT

2011 Khe Sanh Reunion in Rochester, MN had been able to view the "1968 Project" when it was ready.

After 18 very successful weeks in St. Paul the "1968 Exhibit" was deconstructed and packed (in one day) and moved to the Oakland Museum of California for a 34 week showing ending on Nov. 25, 2012. It has since moved to Heinz History Center in Pittsburgh and remains there until May, 2013. Other venue openings include National Constitution Center - June 2013, the Missouri History Museum - October 2013, Omaha Durham Museum - February, 2014 and on out to Texas in July, 2014, into Chicago - October, 2014, Denver, CO - February

COMPLETED PROJECT "GREAT JOB GUYS"

2015 and finally Bowers Museum in Santa Ana June 2015. Other museums are getting in line to host the "1968 Exhibit" at future dates. All venues are for roughly 13 weeks each. You can view details of the "1968 Project" and the Minnesota History Center at www.mnhs.org or http://the1968exhibit.org/ .The final word at each museum showing has been that the "1968 Exhibit" is as nice a tribute to the service of Vietnam Veterans as one could ask. It has been a privilege for me to be a part of it.

KHE SANH VETERAN SHERRILL BYRD USA 1/5TH INF DIV MECH

Sherrill Byrd now serves as pastor at church in Madison, Illinois.

SHERRELL BYRD
PASTOR SOUTHERN MISSIONARY BAPTIST CHURCH

SOUTHERN BAPTIST FIRST LADY MAURISTINE BYRD WIFE OF SHERRELL BYRD

One thing Sherrell L. Byrd Jr. knows for sure: God has been watching over him.

There was that time in Vietnam: Enemy soldiers stepped over his body, in the dark, and somehow missed stepping on him. And another time, in the darkness of a Vietnam jungle, he found himself face -to-face with four enemy soldiers who also failed to notice him.

More than once he got involved in firefights that lasted from daybreak to sundown, and lived to tell about it. Then there was the time at Khe Sanh when he and his colleagues in the A Company Fifth Infantry Division of the U.S. Army were surrounded and fought for their lives throughout the night.

Byrd, now a pastor at Southern Missionary Baptist Church in Madison, can't explain it, except to say that he feels God has been with him, even on the day he was blown to pieces after a soldier who was trying to commit suicide, wound up nearly killing them both.

That happened on June 13, 1969.

Byrd was born in 1948 in Oakland, Calif., the oldest of Sherrell and Bertie Byrd's four children. Growing up in Madison, he worked at the Chevrolet Assembly Plant in St. Louis and on Sundays he often drag raced. One day he received his draft notice in the mail, and Byrd came to Edwardsville where he was shipped off to Fort Ord, Calif., for training.

Shortly after landing at Bien Ho Air Base in South Vietnam, his unit found itself under attack, Byrd wrote on his church's web site. "I know what it's like to take a life, see men blown apart, crawl in leech infested rice paddies, see people suffer and die," Byrd wrote. "I've taken out ambushes, blown people away with mines and wanted more excitement. Shooting people was easy."

They made him feel powerful, like he was somebody. It was also scary. The enemy, he learned, seemed happy to die for the cause, and often there was a stench of rotting corpses in the air.

There were things Byrd saw that he hoped he would never see again: snakes, tigers, large poisonous insects, quicksand, apes, booby traps, mines. And an enemy willing to run at you with bombs strapped to their waist. So many ways to die.

Byrd still remembers June 13, 1969. Soon after he was shot, he realized things weren't right. "I could not see! So I used my left hand to feel my left leg. It was gone!" Byrd wrote on his web site. He reached for his right leg and felt bone: the leg was nearly gone at the knee. There was more. "I had no idea that the top of my right arm had been torn off and my chest torn up," he said. He found out later that his left eye was full of shrapnel and dirt and his right eye had been blown from its socket.

"My face was shredded, leaving a hole in my forehead. And I was dying. My life was about to end all because one of our men tried to commit suicide. He blew us both up!"

Recently Byrd was given the Living Legends Community Service Award by Madison County Board member Gussie Glasper, whose district covers Madison and Venice.

SHERRELL IN A MOMENT OF REFLECTION

But Byrd nearly didn't make it out of Vietnam that day. A friend, Douglas "Doc" Haney, reached him first. He stabilized Byrd and helped place him on a helicopter headed to the U.S.S. Repose. Doctors and nurses there sat with him, holding his hand and encouraging him for another trip.

"The battalion surgeon declared him dead on the evacuation helicopter but after landing at a Marine base he began breathing again," Glasper told board members. "He gives God the credit for saving his life."

Byrd, Glasper said, spent a year at Fitzsimons Army Medical Center in Denver. He endured 30 facial surgeries, from facial reconstruction to skin grafts to repairing his hearing loss.

In 1970, the Army granted him full retirement. But the trip back to civilian life was arduous. With the physical and emotional wounds still healing, Byrd found he wasn't up to working at Chevrolet Assembly Plant. "He said he was angry and filled with hate," Glasper said. "In enduring these hardships, he knew he had to change his life for the better." Education, he decided, was the key. Not that it was easy. When a university official informed him that he "wasn't college material," Byrd, Glasper said, "became more resolute in his pursuit of a better life for himself."

By 1975 he had enrolled at SIUE. The first quarter he made the Dean's List. But, ashamed of his appearance and the way he walked, Byrd soon began taking the "back lots and avoiding walking in the hallways," Glasper said.

LT PEABODY WHO HAD FAITH IN SHERRELL

He despised walking around campus, and his stump often bled. Byrd would have dropped out of school, but several instructors talked him out of it. He wound up taking art education classes, and images of the war began pouring out in his paintings and drawings. It was his therapy, and helped set him on the path to recovery, Glasper said. In some of those classes he began sharing his war experiences. "The classes became quiet as he opened their minds to reality," Glasper said.

After his graduation, in 1979, Byrd started teaching. He was at Lovejoy High School for four years, and later he was hired as an art specialist at Madison High School. His body still ached, but Byrd wasn't ashamed to use a cane when he needed to. Byrd got a two-pronged message from that: You can overcome any pain that comes your way; and it's not an option to simply give up and throw in the towel. Three years ago, he retired from the Madison School District.

Asked for his most memorable moments, Byrd names two: talking two students out of suicide, and convincing another to surrender a gun he planned to use on a family member involved in his brother's murder.

Byrd was Teacher of the Year twice at Lovejoy, and at Madison he received the Golden Apple Award for teaching excellence. He was twice nominated for SIUE's Excellence in Teaching Award. And Glasper says the federal government owns several of Byrd's paintings .

Today, Byrd stays in touch with several hundred students and former students. They call him Dad or Granddad. "He loves the people of the Madison area and they love him," Glasper said.

Last year, Byrd was given the Combat Infantry Badge, the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart. He was also awarded the oak leaf cluster along with a medal for gallantry and heroism. Years after his Vietnam injuries, Byrd learned that the battalion surgeon who helped rescue him – a man named Bernard Master - was curious whether Byrd survived. Eventually the two men met, and Master confided that Byrd had died on the floor of the helicopter that day. He had lost too much blood and gone into shock. And because his veins had collapsed, medics were unable to get another I.V. into him.

At the Feb. 20 Madison County Board meeting, before the start of business, Glasper called Byrd, his wife Mauristine, and several family members down to the front. Byrd wore a dark suit and tie. Glasper spoke first, then Byrd spoke briefly. It was good to return to Edwardsville, he said, the city from which he left to embark on a military career, and the city where he received training to begin his teaching ca-

OPENING UP FEELINGS AND EMOTIONS

Reverend/Sherrell:

From what I personally went through in Vietnam, and from how I was literally trained by my dad to face life and hide deeply my emotions, I have for over 50 years been extremely reluctant in accepting accolades or outwardly showing my feelings when someone offers them. However, your account of Vietnam; your near-death (and/or death experience); your incredible courage under extreme adversity; your heroic challenge to overcome what you have been through have reached so far into my soul and touched so many of my emotions that I am literally profoundly overcome. I thought before our discussions and emails that I loved and cherished our God through our Lord Jesus Christ with open mind and heart. This weekend I have been so proud and absolutely elated by the fact that you survived, that my love for God and his unending merciful glory reached a magnitude totally unequaled in my entire life.

DOUG "DOC" HANEY

It is extremely rare that a medic in the field will ever hear of his/her medical training having saved a life, or even patching up a wound again after the fact. And, I surely cannot accept the fact that I assisted in the saving of anyone's life. Instead, I tend to believe that God alone has restored and preserved one's life. In your case, I was simply his conduit at the right time and in the right place. However, this weekend your kind words brought joyous tears into my soul that filled my heart with warmth and a renewed sense of humble dignity. Though I was the first medic to reach you and begin working on you, God allowed Philip "Doc" White perform his magic as well. I wish I could find him and let him know what a hero he was that fateful day. He also knew exactly what to do and when to do it, and was an incredibly efficient medic. I have been trying to locate him for years now without any success. Even at that, our assistance was only a temporary fix to a highly critical and complicated medical situation. Major (Dr.) Bernard F. Master applied the full extent of his knowledge and skill literally through the direct hands of God himself to pull you through. And if there ever was a man I would fully entrust with my life in a medical emergency, it would be that magnificent medical genius! You should have known him as my Commanding Officer and that of all medics in the field. He is/was the very best officer I have ever had the absolute privilege of serving under. I am very proud that you would take the time to call him and be able to discuss your incredible journey with him. I truly admired you in the field as a true soldier's soldier, and I remember your sense of humor and extremely polite mannerism. You were deeply appreciated by all of the members of the 1/61st 5th Mech. A-Co., and as was Jesus Fuentes, highly respected for his natural skills in leadership and bravery, so were you also. It was very hard to replace you, and I do not to this very day believe we ever did. The men felt as badly about your tragedy as they did our temporary Company Officer, Capt. Robert W. Clirehugh on the day died so tragically. There was also a great deal of contempt and anger over both Abraham and Capt. Humphrey that might have cost the Captain his life had he not been forcibly removed from his command shortly thereafter.

I do want you to know that for the first time in a long time, I actually wept tears of happiness for you; for what you have gone through; for your very blessed family and wife; for your equally blessed congregation, and all of the most fortunate students you have ever been blessed to teach. When we do get to Heaven, and we will one day..., I want to face our God directly and tell him how deeply appreciative I am that on earth I was introduced and became brothers with one of His greatest human miracles. I want to tell him that we, "Band of Brothers" are truly grateful to be His "sons of the universe" through the Amazing Grace of Jesus Christ our Lord.

Thank you for being my valued friend, and I very humbly thank you for your testimony. I have never been so profoundly moved. May God continue to Bless you with a healthy lifestyle and a beautiful life.Your Brother in Soul; and, brothers forever.

Doug "Doc" Haney

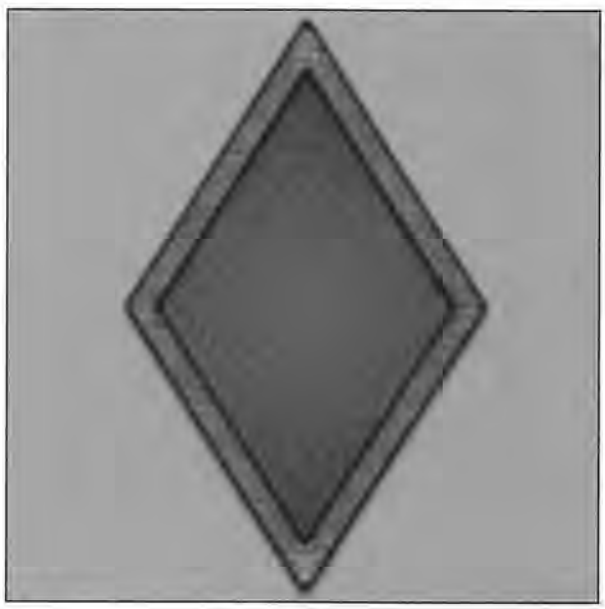
SHERRELL'S RESPONSE

Hello Doug,

This is my other e-mail address. I can upload larger documents on this one. First, thank you for giving me Major Master's phone number and address. We had a wonderful conversation. He opened my eyes to the seriousness of the situation. He told me that he remembered it just like it was yesterday. He remembered how the Claymore was set off and who had done it. He also told me, like you did, that it was the worst injury that he had ever seen. He tied off three extremities and started two I.V.'s. He tried to keep me alert by talking to me and asking questions. I remember that. But then he blew me away by his next statement. "Sherrell, you died on the floor of the chopper!" "We lost you!"

He said there were no vitals or anything. I had bled to death. He tried to resuscitate me but i did not respond. Then before landing in Quang Tri they had some vitals. After the Marine surgeons took me, he never knew the outcome. Now he does. Doug, he told me that hearing from me was the best Memorial Day gift he could have ever received. This had haunted him for 40 years. He thought he had failed me. You two have brought my life Full Circle! God is Good. I am also sending you my testimonial that was once on my church web-sight. I updated it today. Have a Blessed Day, Your Brother in Christ,

Sherrell



SHORT ROUNDS

With the Article on POW Ron Ridgeway B CO 1/26, I wondered how many veterans who were taken prisoner in Vietnam, ever escaped captivity. Here is a list of the 30 listed as escaping. All were awarded the POW Medal of Valor, as well as other decorations.

THE FIRST POW TO ESCAPE CAPTIVITY: ISAAC CAMACHO USA SFG

Wounded in action by a butt stroke to the head – lined up for execution during a 150KM march to the POW camp. Caged and chained for 20 months. Interrogated by North Vietnamese officials, a Cuban interrogation team, even an Australian journalist, Isaac Camacho never wavered in his quest to escape. He followed strictly the military code of conduct, encouraging other POW's to join with him. Having lost 60 pounds, deathly sick with Malaria, Beriberi, and Hepatitis, Isaac Camacho escaped his POW cage alone on 09 July 1965. Evading the North Vietnamese search patrols seeking to kill him. On 13 July 1965, he made his way to a US Army special forces camp. Finally to cherished freedom. He was awarded a direct commission by the Chief of Staff of the US Army, as well as the DISTINGUISHED SERVICE CROSS (DSC), in 1999 by governor George W. Bush.

Dieter Dengler was an American citizen who was born in Germany in 1938. His father was killed and the rest of his family fled the country during the World War II. He arrived in New York City in 1957, drifted to San Francisco and worked as a baker, a forest firefighter and a gold prospector before enrolling at the College of San Mateo and becoming a pilot. Lieutenant (j.g.) Dengler was a Navy pilot when his reconnaissance plane was shot down in 1966 over Laos near the Ho Chi Minh Trail. Captured by communist Pathet Lao forces, he was marched to a prison camp and tortured for five months until his escape on June 30, 1966. He later chronicled his experience in the book "Escape from Laos". He died on February 7, 2001, and is buried in Arlington National Cemetery. He was awarded the NAVY CROSS for actions prior and during his capture.

Buddy Wright was interned as a Prisoner of War in Southeast Asia after he was captured while on a long range reconnaissance patrol on September 22, 1968. He successfully escaped from his captors and escaped and evaded for ten days before finally reaching American forces on October 6, 1968.

(FIRST MARINE CAPTURED IN VIETNAM)

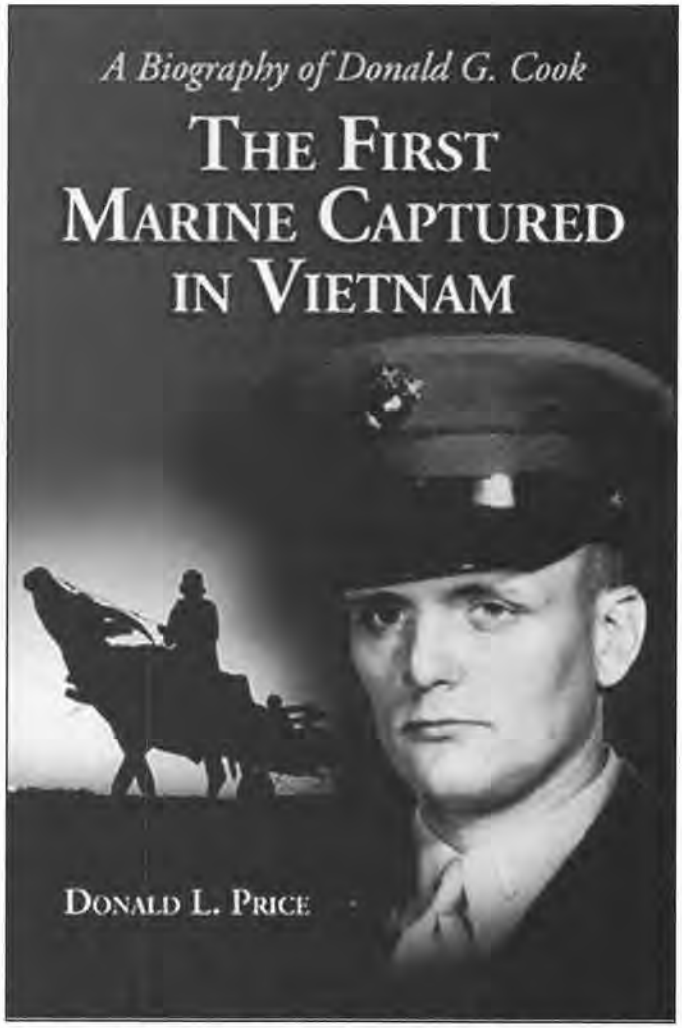
DONALD G. COOK USMC

Date of birth: August 9, 1934
Date of death: KIA as a December 8, 1967
Burial Location: Arlington, Virginia
Place of Birth: Brooklyn, New York
Home of record: Brooklyn, New York
Status: POW

Donald Cook was interned as a Prisoner of War in Southeast Asia after he was captured in South Vietnam on December 31, 1964, while serving as an advisor to a Vietnamese Marine Battalion engaged in an operation in Binh Gia, Vietnam. He was reportedly wounded in the lower extremities and taken by the Viet Cong as a live prisoner. In 1970 the PRG/DRV released a list of the names of 20 U.S. POWs who died in captivity, including the name of Donald Cook who it was alleged died on December 8, 1967 of malaria. His remains have never been recovered.
He was awarded the MEDAL OF HONOR for His actions as a POW.

Here are two books detailing the exploits of Captain Camacho and Colonel Cook.

An exciting first-person recounting, by Isaac Camacho of his WIA, subsequent capture, in the US CIDG Camp, of Hiep Hoa, SVN on 24 Nov 1963. 150KM march, with three other US Army Special Forces POWs, to the COSVN POW Camp B-20; where shackled by the leg, chained to a tree, caged like a wild dog - in the triple canopy jungle. He is worked like an animal; tossed into the 'punishment-hole' often; routinely interrogated by a COSVN Commissioner; Interrogated by two Cuban Officials, a Chinese Official, and interviewed by an Australian Journalist, Isaac Camacho suffered from Falcipurm Malaria, Hepatitis "C", and beri-beri, losing 50+ pounds of weight, while a POW for 21 months in the open jungle but – never lost his resolve, determination, or decidedness to escape his cage, for the purpose of living up to the Military Code of Conduct – and to 'fight another day' against an enemy of the United States. This book takes you into the very mind of Isaac Camacho, as he planned daily; then, when his leg shackle was removed to be placed on a new US POW, Isaac Camacho escaped through the upper bars of his cage; evaded search by a Viet Cong patrol with dogs; making his way 50KM to the south, to a friendly US Army Special Forces A-Camp – at Minh Thanh, SVN on 13 July 1965. This is the True Story of a fine American Hero, who should receive the Medal of Honor for his heroic deeds performed 45 years ago. This is the story of Isaac Camacho an American Hero as written by Billy. Website: http://isaaccamachoamericanhero.com



Colonel Donald Gilbert Cook was the first U.S. Marine captured in Vietnam, the first and only Marine in history to earn the Medal of Honor while in captivity; and the first Marine POW to have a U.S. Navy ship named in his honor, the USS Donald Cook (DDG-75). On December 31, 1964, while serving as an observer with a South Vietnamese Marine Corps battalion on a combat operation against Viet Cong forces, he was captured near the village of Binh Gia in South Vietnam. Until his death in captivity in December 1967, Cook led ten POWs in a series of primitive jungle camps. This first book-length biography concentrates especially on Cook's three years in captivity, and is the first book exclusively about a Marine POW held in South Vietnam. Throughout, Cook's adherence to the Corps' traditional leadership principles and knowledge of the Code of Conduct are highlighted. His biography provides a unique case study of exemplary leadership under extremely difficult conditions. Includes 68 photographs.

MORE POW'S THAT EARNED THE MEDAL OF HONOR

GEORGE E. EVERETT "BUD" USAF

Date of Birth: February 24, 1925
Date of Death: Still Living
Place of Birth: Sioux City, Iowa
Home of record: Sioux City, Iowa
Status: POW

Colonel "Bud" Day served 30 months in the South Pacific during WW II as an enlisted member with the US Marine Corps. He served as an Army reservist, and Army guardsman between WW II and Korea, and then in the Air Force during the Vietnam War (3 different services over the span of 3 different wars.) After being shot down on August 26, 1967, and serving 7 years in captivity, Colonel Day was repatriated in 1973. He is the only man to earn BOTH the Medal of Honor and the Air Force Cross. A recipient of virtually every other available combat decoration, he is widely considered the most decorated Airman in history. His autobiography is titled "Return With Honor" and he later expanded upon that book in a second autobiography titled "Duty, Honor, Country."

HUMBERT R. VERSACE USA

Date of Birth: July 2, 1937
Date of Death: September 26, 1965
Burial Location: Arlington, Virginia
Place of Birth: Honolulu, Hawaii
Home of record: Norfolk, Virginia
Status: POW

Humbert "Rocky" Versace graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, Class of 1959. He was captured in South Vietnam and taken as a Prisoner of War on October 29, 1963, and was held until he was executed by the Viet Cong. His remains have never been recovered.

LANCE P. SIJAN USAF

Date of Birth: April 13, 1942
Date of Death: Died in Captivity: January 22, 1968
Burial Location: Milwaukee, Wisconsin
Place of Birth: Milwaukee, Wisconsin
Home of record: Milwaukee, Wisconsin
Status: POW

Lance Sijan graduated from the U.S. Air Force Academy, Class of 1965, and is the only graduate of the U.S. Air Force Academy ever awarded the Medal of Honor. He was shot down on November 9, 1967, and escaped and evaded the enemy for 45 days before he was captured on December 25, 1967. He again briefly escaped but was re-captured and interned in North Vietnam, where he died in captivity on January 22, 1968. His remains were recovered and returned on March 13, 1974.

LEO K. THORSNESS USAF

Date of Birth: February 14, 1932
Date of Death: Still Living
Place of Birth: Walnut Grove, Minnesota
Home of record: Walnut Grove, Minnesota
Status: POW
Leo Thorsness was submitted for the Medal of Honor for heroic actions on April 19, 1967. Eleven days later on April 30 1967, he was shot down and interned as a Prisoner of War in North Vietnam until his release on March 4, 1973.

JAMES B. STOCKDALE US NAVY

Date of Birth: December 23, 1923
Date of Death: July 5, 2005
Burial Location: Annapolis, Maryland
Place of Birth: Abingdon, Illinois
Home of record: Abingdon, Illinois

Status: POW
James Stockdale graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy at Annapolis, Class of 1947. His cousin, Robert Dunlap, earned the Medal of Honor in World War II. On August 4, 1964, Squadron Commander Stockdale was one of the U.S. pilots flying overhead during the second alleged attack of the Gulf of Tonkin Incident. On a mission over North Vietnam on September 9, 1965, Stockdale ejected from his A-4E Skyhawk, which had been disabled from anti-aircraft fire. He was interred as a Prisoner of War in North Vietnam until his release on February 12, 1973. Debilitated by his captivity and mistreatment, Stockdale could hardly walk or even stand upright upon his return to the United States, which prevented his return to active flying status. Out of respect for his courage, and out of high regard for his intellect, the Navy kept him on the active list, steadily promoting him over the next few years before permitting him to retire as a Vice Admiral. In 1992 he was the Vice Presidential candidate for Third Party candidate H. Ross Perot.

JON R. CAVAIANI USA SFG

Date of Birth: August 2, 1943
Date of death: Still Living
Place of Birth: Royston, England
Home of record: Fresno, California
Status: POW

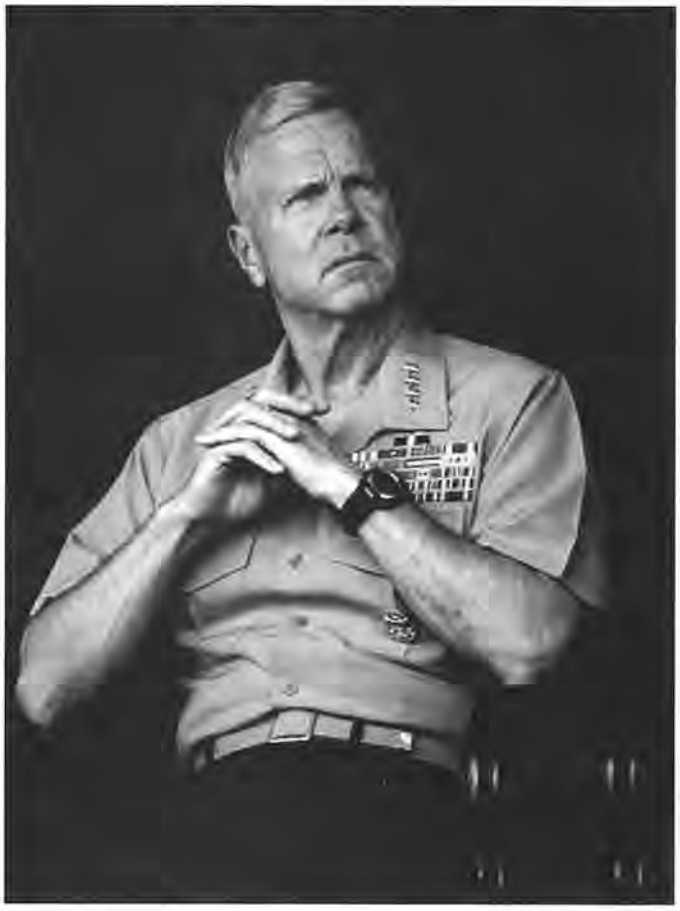
Jon Cavaiani, a member of U.S. Army Special Forces, was interned as a Prisoner of War in Southeast Asia after he was captured in South Vietnam on June 5, 1971, and was held until his release on March 27, 1973.

WILLIAM D. PORT

Date of Birth: October 31, 1941
Date of Death: Died in Captivity: November 27, 1968
Burial Location: Arlington, Virginia
Place of Birth: Petersburg, Pennsylvania
Home of record: Harrisburg, Pennsylvania
Status: POW
William Port was not killed in the action that earned him the Medal of Honor, but he was captured by the enemy. After ten months as a Prisoner of War, he died in captivity on November 27, 1968. His remains were recovered and returned in August 1985.

A BIG REMINDER IN CASE ANY MARINE MISSED THE ARTICLE

A Marine is a Marine. I set that policy two weeks ago - there's no such thing as a former Marine. You're a Marine, just in a different uniform and you're in a... different phase of your life. But you'll always be a Marine because you went to Parris Island, San Diego or the hills of Quantico. There's no such thing as a former Marine."General James F. Amos, 35th Commandant of the Marine Corps



GREAT AIR FORCE STORY

In mid-1967, as a junior Air Force Captain, I was detailed to 7th AF Hq in Saigon as an Air Technical Intelligence Liaison Officer, short name: ATLO (the "I" gets left out, as people look strangely at anyone who calls himself an ATILO, thinking he is somehow related to Atilla the Hun). My job was to provide 7AF and the air war the best technical intelligence support that the Foreign Technology Division of AF Systems Command (my parent organization) could provide, in whatever area or discipline needed. Also I was to collect such technical intelligence as became available. This was a tall order for a young Captain, and this assignment provided much excitement, including the Tet Offensive.

At that time, Operation Rolling Thunder was underway, the bombing of military targets in North Vietnam . The weather in NVN was often lousy, making it difficult to find and accurately strike the assigned targets, so a radar control system was set up to direct the strike force to their targets.

This system was installed in a remote, sheer-sided karst mountain just inside Laos on the northern Laos/NVN border. The site could be accessed only by helicopter or a tortuous trail winding up the near-vertical mountainside, so it was judged to be easily defensible.

The mountaintop was relatively flat and about 30 acres in size. On it was a tiny Hmong village called Phu Pha Ti, a small garrison of Thai and Meo mercenaries for defense, a helicopter pad and ops shack for the CIA-owned Air America Airline, and the radar site, which was manned by "sheep-dipped" US Air Force enlisted men in civilian clothes. Both the US and NVN paid lip service to the fiction that Laos was a neutral country, and no foreign military were stationed there, when in reality we had a couple of hundred people spread over several sites, and NVN had thousands on the Ho Chi Minh trail in eastern Laos. This particular site was called Lima (L for Laos) Site 85. The fighter-bomber crews called it Channel 97 (the radar frequency), and all aircrews called it North Station, since it was the furthest north facility in "friendly" territory. Anywhere north of North Station was bad guy land.

The Channel 97 radar system was an old SAC precision bomb scoring radar which could locate an aircraft to within a few meters at a hundred miles. In this application, the strike force would fly out from Lima Site 85 a given distance on a given radial, and the site operators would tell the strike leader precisely when to release his bomb load. It was surprisingly accurate, and allowed the strikes to be run at night or in bad weather.

This capability was badly hurting the North Vietnamese war effort, so they decided to take out Lima Site 85. Because of the difficulty of mounting a ground assault on Lima Site 85, and its remote location, an air strike was planned. Believe it or not, the NVNAF chose biplanes as their "strike bombers!"

This has to be the only combat use of biplanes since the 1930's. The aircraft used were Antonov designed AN-2 general purpose 'workhorse" biplanes with a single 1000hp radial piston engine and about one ton payload. Actually, once you get past the obvious "Snoopy and the Red Baron" image, the AN-2 was not a bad choice for this mission. Its biggest disadvantage is, like all biplanes, it is slow. The Russians use the An-2 for a multitude of things, such as medevac, parachute training, flying school bus, crop dusting, and so on.

The NVNAF fitted out their AN-2 "attack bombers with a 12 shot 57mm folding fin aerial rocket pod under each lower wing, and 20 250mm mortar rounds with aerial bomb fuses set in vertical tubes let into the floor of the aircraft cargo bay. These were dropped through holes cut in the cargo bay floor. Simple hinged bomb-bay doors closed these holes in flight.

The pilot could salvo his bomb load by opening these doors. This was a pretty good munitions load to take out a soft, undefended target like a radar site. Altogether, the mission was well planned and equipped and should have been successful, but Murphy's Law prevailed.

A three plane strike force was mounted, with two attack air-craft and one standing off as command and radio relay. They knew the radar site was on the mountaintop, but they did not have good intelligence as to its precise location, It was well camouflaged, and could not be seen ;readily from the air. They also did not realize that we had "anti-aircraft artillery" and "air defense interceptor" forces at the site. Neither did we realize this.

The AN-2 strike force rolled in on the target, mistook the Air America ops shack for the radar site, and proceeded to ventilate it. The aforementioned "anti-aircraft artillery" force - one little Thai mercenary about five feet tall and all balls- heard the commotion, ran out on the helicopter pad, stood in the path of the attacking aircraft spraying rockets and bombs everywhere, and emptied a 27-round clip from his AK-47 into the AN-2, which then crashed and burned.

At this juncture, the second attack aircraft broke off and turned north towards home.

The "air defense interceptor" force was an unarmed Air America Huey helicopter which was by happenstance on the pad at the time, the pilot and flight mechanic having a Coke in the ops shack. When holes started appearing in the roof, they ran to their Huey and got airborne, not quite believing t he sight of two biplanes fleeing north. Then the Huey pilot, no slouch in the balls department either, realized that his Huey was faster than the biplanes! So he did the only thing a real pilot could do -attack!

The Huey overtook the AN-2's a few miles inside North Vietnam , unknown to the AN-2's as their rearward visibility is nil. The Huey flew over the rearmost AN-2 and the helicopter's down-wash stalled out the upper wing of the AN-2.

Suddenly the hapless AN-2 pilot found himself sinking like a stone! So he pulled the yoke back in his lap and further reduced his forward speed. Mean -while, the Huey flight mechanic, not to be outdone in the macho contest, crawled out on the Huey's skid and, one-handed, emptied his AK-47 into the cockpit area of the AN-2, killing or wounding the pilot and copilot. At this point, the AN-2 went into a flat spin and crashed into a mountainside, but did not burn.

It should come as no surprise that the Air America pilot and flight mechanic found themselves in a heap of trouble with the State Department REMF's in Vientiane . (REMF is an acronym. The first three words are Rear, Echelon, and Mother.) In spite of the striped-pants cookie-pushers' discomfort at (horrors!) an inter-national incident (or perhaps, partly because of it) these guys were heroes to everybody in the theatre who didn't wear puce panties and talk with a lisp. They accomplished a couple of firsts: (1) The first and only combat shoot down of a biplane by a helicopter.

CHAPLAIN'S CORNER SPRING 2013

Chaplain Ron Rayner

I have sent my money in and I am planning on a big week of activities at the Khe Sanh Veterans reunion the last week in August. I am looking forward to seeing old friends and making new ones.

At last year's Memorial Banquet, President Tom Eichler mentioned the Khe Sanh Veteran's had twelve members pass away since the previous reunion. He also mentioned twelve new members joined during the 2012 reunion. I am prayerful that we do not have as many losses this year and have many more people at the 2013 reunion.

Anyone attending the reunion in Nashville, Tennessee can count on a friendly welcome. The hospitality room is as described, hospitable.

DO YOUR FAMILY A FAVOR

It is a fact of life that we Khe Sanh Veterans are not getting any younger. One of my ministries is I volunteer as a chaplain doing committal services at the Great Lakes National Cemetery in Holly, Michigan for out-of-towners and locals without clergy. I also perform funeral services for other individuals who have no clergy or church connections at other locations.

I have also attended funerals on the Oakland County, Michigan Vietnam Veterans of America's Honor Guard and funerals for homeless veterans. When I go to the cemetery I carry a short committal service with me in case the clergy doesn't show up or the people have no one. Three times I have filled in when no clergy has shown up. Once while attending a service for a Khe Sanh veteran.

When I talk to a family prior to a committal or a funeral service, one of my first questions is what the deceased's favorite scripture was. I realize talking about funerals is not most people's favorite subject but knowing what you believe can give great comfort to your family when you are gone.

I Corinthians chapter 13 are called the "Love Verses". Verses 4-8, 13 state:

"Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. It is not rude, it is not self-seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. Love does not delight in evil but rejoices with the truth. It always protects, always trusts, always hopes, always perseveres. Love never fails…
And now these three remain: faith, hope and love. But the greatest of these is love."

When your loved ones know about your beliefs they will better understand your faith and hope. I use I Corinthians chapter 13 quite often at funerals. The hope of most people is that they will see their loved ones one day in heaven.

Do yourself and your family a favor and let them know what you believe. Tell them your favorite scriptures from the Bible. It can open up some very interesting conversations.

I did a committal service for a Vietnam veteran that had been in the VA hospital for a long time. His son told me the hospital chaplain had left a note on the man's chart that said the vet was "spiritually confused." I pray that if any of the Khe Sanh Vets are "spiritually confused" they will seek God and that the following scripture and will help.

"You will seek the Lord your God, and you will find him if you search after him with all your heart and soul." Deuteronomy 4:29 (NRSV)

"The Lord is a shelter for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble.
Those who know your name trust in you,
for you,
'O Lord, you have never abandoned anyone who searches for you.'"
Psalm 9:9-10 (NLT)

"Ask and it will be given to you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives; he who seeks finds; and to him who knocks, the door will be opened."
Matthew 7:7-8 (NIV)

Thank you, dear God, for speaking to us through the Bible. As we earnestly seek your will for our lives, please help us listen for your guidance and follow your direction. When we seek You, open our eyes to find You. Amen.

"Now glory be to God! By his mighty power at work within us, he is able to accomplish infinitely more than we would ever dare to ask or hope."
Ephesians 3:20 (NLT)

REUNION COMMITTEE:

The KSV Reunion in Nashville TN is fast approaching. We expect a huge attendance by the membership. Tickets for the Grand Ole Opry and the Showboat cruise are going fast. Rooms of choice at the hotel are also dwindling. If you have not bought your tickets or booked your room, you should do so ASAP. Remember you can always obtain a refund if an unexpected situation occurs to prevent your attendance.

There will also be an election for the KSV BOD including the presidency. According to our by-laws you must contact our secretary and inform him of what office you wish to run for, prior to the reunion.

There are many things to do in Nashville while at the reunion. We have made contact with a tour company that will offer many trips to local venues at discounted prices.

Please try to send in your registration forms ASAP. Since we are purchasing the tickets to the Grand Ole Opry and the Showboat in advance, we only have a week before the reunion to obtain refunds. We could only afford to hold a few tickets to each event for those members through no fault of their own, were not able to purchase them in advance.

Our Vice President John Pessoni has again designed some nice new items for our PX. We will also have the calendars displayed on pages 80 to 82 for sale at the reunion. This years calendar for 2014 will include the years at Khe Sanh from 1966-1968. The following year we will print 1969-1972 for the calendar year 2015. They will be in color.

All the funds we earn from the PX and donations from the membership, go towards our scholarship fund.

There will also be a Luncheon for our beautiful Khe Sanh Ladies on Friday afternoon while we hold our general membership meeting. You do not have to sign up in advance, there is no cost, and you can sign up when you register. See you in Tennessee!

HOME FROM THE HILLS

By Dennis Mannion
KILO CO 3/26 F/O

The CP group from Kilo 3/26 barreled down the ramp of a CH-46 amid noise, swirling dust, and confusion and stumbled into a nightmare landscape. It was the early in the afternoon on the 15th of April 1968. Along with the rest of the company we had just been heli-lifted from the saddle of land between Hills 881S & 881N. I had last stood on the grounds of the combat base at Christmas, but the place I had departed from back then was totally unrecognizable to me now on Easter Monday. Hulks of wrecked planes, helicopters, and vehicles were visible in every direction. Fires burned in numerous places; junk and trash littered the landscape; dust sifted everywhere; there was no vegetation of any kind that I could see and except for Kilo Marines filling the trench line just off the helicopter ramp, there was no one around.

Personally, as a forward observer, I was also very self-conscious about not being able to see very far in any direction as the flat ground narrowed my perspective considerably. The hard-to-miss terrain feature of Hills 950 and 1015 loomed to my left, but seemed almost tiny out there on the horizon. Because of leap year, February had 29 days so I had been on the hills for 112 consecutive days instead of 111, but suddenly after all that hill-time, I had to deal with an abrupt change to a single flat, one dimensional viewing perspective. That was really weird but it wasn't going to kill me; however, NVA artillery -- which I had yet to experience -- might.

As we hunkered down in the nearby trenches waiting for someone to tell us where to go, two things happened simultaneously. A fast moving jeep approached from my right and slammed to a stop and a Marine jumped out and moved toward us.. At the same time, the final CH-46 with the last of Kilo's Marines settled onto the runway directly in front of me. More noise, more dust storms, and as the ramp opened, some visibly wounded Marines lurched down followed by two groups of 4 men carrying the bodies of two others: Kilo's last two Khe Sanh KIA's -- Lt. Steve Fordham and his radio operator PFC Pat Patterson. A scant eight minutes before I had been flat on the ground talking to Lt. Fordham while his platoon provided LZ security for the entire company. He actually shook my hand and wished me luck as I stood up to get on my chopper, and the mortar rounds that killed him and his RTO were probably being dropped down the tube as my helicopter lifted off for the combat base and his helicopter began to feather into the LZ.

Before I could even begin to process the loss of this fine officer who I considered a close friend, there was a hand on my shoulder yanking me around. It was the driver of the jeep yelling in my ear that he had been sent over from our artillery unit -- Charlie Battery 1/13 -- to take my radio operator and me back to the battery. I was in a daze as the two of us followed Glenn Prentice back to his jeep and then a high speed, zig-zag ride back to the command bunker followed. Glenn had provided no real reason why we were being taken away from Kilo so abruptly, but in the CP, I learned that we were being detached from Kilo and retained at the base while the 26th Marines departed Khe Sanh over the next 24 hours.

Someone higher up the chain-of-command had theorized that an experienced FO team might be of some immediate benefit to one of the newly arriving infantry companies. Crap, just our luck! We were offered no place to settle into -- we literally were on our own -- and the only thing we had to do was to check in at the CP every morning and every afternoon and "await further orders." We felt like hermit crabs pulled out of our shells and scrambling to find new homes. We were left to wander around in an unfamiliar, torn up, and dangerous landscape looking for places to sleep and rest. The two of us were essentially new guys and no one was around to offer help, solutions, or even advice. There had been no active arty fired at us that first afternoon, but holed up in an empty trench line that night, we twice heard large, thumping crashes in the dark that shook the ground at what seemed some distance from us. We checked back into the CP in the morning and were told simply to come back in mid-afternoon for "further word."With no place to go, the two we stayed on the western end of the base between the end of the runway and drop zone. Later, while walking out on the open to find a safer place to hole up, we heard a truck horn began blaring, followed in short order by three distinct booms out to the southwest. Incoming! The two of us scrambled for cover in whatever shallow depression we could find, and with arms over our heads we braced for impacts. Two nearby Marines standing -- standing! -- out in the open began to chuckle. The three rounds (from Co Roc) made a dry-leaves rustling sound as they passed overhead and impacted a few thousand feet away at the eastern end of the runway. "What are you two clowns doing on the ground," they yelled, "because it's obvious that those rounds weren't going to hit near us?" My response was that where we had just come from (Hill 861 primarily), any round of any size that detonated inside the wire had the potential to kill or injure anyone on the hill because of our relatively small perimeter. There would be a number of big arty hits in the next few days and no matter where they impacted they sent a chill through me that was almost palpable. There was never anything like these thunderous explosions or heavy impacts on 861.

To be sure, we had more than our share of 82's, some 120's, RPG's, snipers, and NVA troops in our wire and on our hill, but not the large millimeter ordnance. The NVA were on a ridgeline 500 meters to our immediate west and at the same elevation, so we saw them as much as they saw us. It was so common to see them, that using my binoculars to glass the ridgeline one day, I observed an NVA soldier next to a tree using binocs to look at us! Without taking my eyes away from the eyepieces, I gave him the finger and was stunned to see that he gave me the finger right back. It was just different up there....closer, I guess.

With the 26th Marines long departed we stoically waited on a new grunt company assignment. We endured two more days as a nomadic, homeless, FO team before it was decided that it was OK for us to rejoin Kilo Company in Quang Tri. There was one last trip through the approach trenches that bordered the helicopter pad and then the mad scramble to get on board -- a jammed packed CH-53 this time. My adrenaline was up -- like everyone else's -- but I was calm as well. I just knew that my Khe Sanh time was finally over and done with, and that fate -- not skill -- had been my greatest ally.

Semper Fi,
Dennis Mannion

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS

KHE SANH VETERAN
JOHN DEBOK USMC
BRAVO CO 1/26

At 4 a.m. March 30, 1968, Bravo Company Marines set out from their base at Khe Sanh to recover the bodies of 25 comrades killed Feb. 25 in a North Vietnamese Army ambush.

Pfc. John DeBok, fresh out of boot camp, had arrived just a week earlier. He volunteered for the patrol. At 19, he considered himself "bulletproof." He wanted some "payback."

Pfc. Robert Hanna, 20, carried 60 mm mortar ammunition. He knew DeBok from Chicago, where they had enlisted.

As the sun burned through thick fog, enemy troops who had pounded Khe Sanh since January opened fire from a nearby tree line. Hanna scrambled to move forward and came upon a badly injured Marine. Mortar shrapnel had blown away his left eye, ripped through his legs. Blood covered his face.

Hanna pushed muscle and tissue back into place and closed wounds with bandages. The Marine looked up at him and said, "Bob, don't you know who I am? It's me, John, John DeBok."

Twenty years later, Hanna described that battlefield scene in a moving essay for the Marine Corps Gazette. After treating DeBok, he suffered shrapnel wounds himself. He worried that DeBok didn't make it and said that after the Vietnam Memorial wall was completed in 1983, he visited it in Washington, D.C. "The relief of not finding DeBok's name on the wall was indescribable," he wrote.
The two men never saw each other again.

One morning in January 2008, a truck pulled up to John DeBok's house in Spring Hill. A large man with long gray hair and beard stepped out and knocked on the door.

He said he had noticed DeBok's car and, more specifically, the decals honoring the U.S. Marine Corps. He had noticed the Purple Heart license plate.

"The guy handed me a wood coin," DeBok recalled. "On one side it said, "School of Warfare Southeast Asia.' On the other, 'Pass It On.' He drove away."
By coincidence, DeBok had been thinking about a recent congressional resolution proclaiming March 30 a national day of recognition for Vietnam veterans.

"That's the day I got hit," he said. "This has got to be a sign."

DeBok, at the time vice commander of the Chester McKay VFW post in New Port Richey, set out to organize a celebration. He secured sponsors and bought food to serve more than 400 people. Veterans greeted each other with two words that have become standard for all those who served in the war, who returned to a divided country that often scorned them: "Welcome home."

On Saturday, 30 March 2013, 45 years to the day that DeBok's fledgling military career abruptly ended, he will preside over his sixth annual event starting with a color guard ceremony at 11 a.m. at VFW Post 10167 in Holiday.

DeBok, now 64, sipped coffee at the VFW this week and admired an old picture somebody took when he was presented the Purple Heart. "Good looking fellow, eh?" he joked. "All things considered."

His survival had been in question, even after his evacuation from Khe Sanh. He spent six days in a coma at the Da Nang air base. After he awoke, the enemy shelled the hospital. "The hospital staff piled mattresses on me and gave me a .45," he said.

He spent several more months in hospitals as surgeons repaired his legs and gave him a glass eye. He left the service in December 1968 and moved to New Port Richey, where his grandparents had spent winters since 1954. Rather than rely on disability payments, DeBok worked as a shrimper and laid concrete blocks. He was a bouncer at west Pasco nightclubs. "It was part of me wanting to show I was still a man."

JOHN, RECOVERING FROM WOUNDS AT HICKAM AFB, HONOLULU, HI APRIL 1968

The bar scene brought him trouble, including three DUIs. He went through three wives before finding Lynn 20 years ago. "She's my rock," he said. "I'm not always the easiest guy to live with."

He still has nightmares. He wakes up sweating. "I'm in the field and left behind," he says. "That never goes away." That helps him relate to other Vietnam veterans he counsels.

He doesn't blame the war for his missteps. They started at 14 when he dropped out of school and ran away from home, away from a strict father who had driven trucks during World War II for Gen. George Patton. The Marines gave him a reason to be proud. Only 44 of the 77 men who entered boot camp with him graduated. "I still consider that my defining moment."

His love for the Marines drove him to join several veterans organizations. He is currently vice commander for the largest VFW district in Florida and senior vice president of the Vietnam Veterans Association of West Coast Florida. He will be master of ceremonies at this year's Memorial Day service at Meadowlawn cemetery in New Port Richey.

Bob Hanna left the Marines and earned a master's degree in business at the University of Dayton. He has been married since 1974 and has six children and nine grandchildren. He works in the construction industry and spoke by phone Wednesday morning from his office in Cincinnati.
"I've thought of John many times over the years," he said.

ROBERT W. HANNA III BRAVO CO 1/26 IN HIS OFFICE IN CINCINNATI, OH

Unlike DeBok, he didn't join many veterans groups, but is a Life Member of the Khe Sanh Veterans. He said his personality enables him to "look at the better things and put away the bad things."

'But he, too, has recurring dreams in which he can't Find his weapon and ammo. "I have to catch my breath," he said.

He hopes one day soon to catch up with DeBok.
March 30 marks 45 years since that day at Khe Sanh, "he said.Time goes by so fast. We have a lot to talk about."

ROBERT J. CRABB
KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c) (19) charitable organization.

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2013 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the "Red Clay" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David A. Lownds Award – for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)

The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award – for 2nd place achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award – for 3rd place achievement in Application Review (6 awards)

2. The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF committee Chair and the treasurer of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full year's award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System /Maximum of 100 regular points or 115 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

GPA 4.0 x 10 = 40 points
GPA 3.5 x 10 = 35 points
GPA 3.0 x 10 = 30 points
GPA 2.5 x 10 = 25 points

b. Extracurricular activities. Max = 30 points total
Description of personal experience in the following type of activities (Be Specific!);

THE ONE-EYED UGLY ANGEL
A TRUE MARINE CORPS LEGEND

By Elaine Zimmer Davis
www.BringingJerryHome.com

An upside to searching for the remains of my first husband, Capt Jerry Zimmer, USMC, an F4 Phantom pilot shot down in the Que Son Mountains of Vietnam and MIA since August 29, 1969, is my renewed respect for Marines whose countless acts of bravery during the Vietnam War saved the lives of many fellow Marines. One of those heroic acts was recorded on April 30, 1968--the first day of the hard-fought, four-day Battle of Dai Do.

Stationed aboard the Iwo Jima—a Landing Platform Helicopter (LPH) ship, floating about five miles off shore, from the mouth of the Cua Viet River in South Vietnam, Capt Ben Casio and his crew of Ugly Angels (HMH-362) were on medevac standby when the call came from a unit with the 2nd Battalion, 4th Marines (2/4), requesting a medevac for five seriously wounded Marines. Within minutes, Ben and his wingman, 1st Lt Robbie Robertson, were at the controls of their H-34 helicopters, en route to Dai Do, a stone's throw from Dong Ha and approximately eight miles south of the DMZ. Flying in the dead of night with 850 missions to his credit, Ben was unaware that the mission they were about to undertake would become a true Marine Corps legend.

As I prepare to write this blog, Ben has one request: "Please don't call me a hero — this mission was a team effort." But even with the passage of time, many of his Marine Corps brethren still credit Ben with an enormous heroic feat that earned him the name, "The One-Eyed Ugly Angel" -- a moniker that Ben wears with pride. I think you'll agree that his story makes us all proud, no matter what we call him.

To put the story in perspective, medevac missions were always dangerous — even when a chopper was called in to pick up a victim with a combat medical emergency during the daylight hours, in what appeared to be a secure area. Nowhere was absolutely secure in Vietnam during that era. But the ante was raised when a call for medevac came at night — these missions were true emergencies, and pilots knew that they likely would be landing in a hot zone during a fire fight to evacuate recently wounded Marines. And although a moonless night could camouflage the big green workhorse, it did little to silence the H-34s huge Wright 1820 radial engine that emitted a loud guttural sound, announcing its arrival to our troops, as well as to the enemy. I asked Ben if he had a gut feeling that everything was going to blow up in his face — literally - on this particular mission. His response: "Doesn't make any difference — you go, no matter what. It's a matter of life and death."

Before Ben and his crew of Ugly Angels -- co-pilot 1st Lt. Larry Houck, crew chief Bob Bush and a gunner -- dropped into the zone, he radioed ahead to the troops on the ground when he was a couple of miles out, telling them to put a strobe light where they wanted him to place his right wheel. They were flying into the zone without lights, and this would become the pick-up point for the medevacs. Ben was told that there had been heavy fighting earlier, but it was quiet at the moment. "When I broke the coast, I told Robbie to stay high and cover," said Ben.

At 0300, Ben dropped into the zone, and Bush immediately began loading the wounded. When he had three to five guys aboard, all hell broke loose. "The enemy opened up, and we started catching fire from all over the zone."

Between the time when the VC opened fire and the wounded were loaded, a minute or two seemed like forever, said Ben, who was wounded also during the barrage. Although unable to see, Ben didn't realize that he'd been hit. "I never felt any pain," he said, describing the sensation as 'being hit with a cold steak.' "Meanwhile, Bob tells me we're okay, let's go. I still couldn't see. I called Larry, my co-pilot, but the noise was deafening from the automatic weapons and rocket propelled grenades. Larry didn't answer, so I reached over and still couldn't get a response from him. I called Bob, my crew chief, and told him that I thought Larry was hit, so I needed him to talk us out of the zone. Meanwhile, Bob is continuing to return fire, getting hit twice in the process." Bush ultimately received credit for 12 kills but was devastated when days later he saw that his plane had taken 500-plus hits and looked like Swiss cheese. Bush also saw something else that caught his interest -- the map case in the cockpit was destroyed. He realized that when Ben leaned over to get Larry's attention, a round came up through the front panel and went through the map case that was mounted behind the pilot's head. Had Ben not been leaning over, the round would have gone through his head and likely killed him.

Ben knew they needed to get moving quickly. His crew chief was yelling, "Sir, we need to get out of here, or we're all going to get killed." Ben took out his Kabar and broke the glass covering the critical gages on the instrument panel and started adding power. He used his fingers to feel the position of the needles but initially didn't have enough power to get the aircraft off the ground. At the time, he didn't realize that they had picked up eight medevacs, instead of five, and now had too much weight. Ben started rolling forward to get translational lift, with Bob telling him to go straight. There were trees on both sides, as they bounced along a dry, rocky riverbed, before finally getting airborne. I asked Ben if he felt as if they wouldn't make it out. "No, I never thought in those terms," he said.

Once in the air, Ben talked on the radio with his wingman, Robbie Robertson, telling him that he couldn't see and thought Larry had been hit. Due to the volume of fire, Robertson didn't think Ben would be coming out but now flew next to him. The two H-34s headed southeast to the point where the Dong Ha/Cua Viet River emptied into the Gulf of Tonkin. "Robbie had called ahead to the Cua Viet USN/USMC Base, and they refused to turn the lights on, so he told them, 'you either light up the area, or I'm going to fucking light you up.'" Apparently they turned on the lights, said Ben.

As the old saying goes, any landing you can walk away from is a good landing. Tucked in close to Ben, Robertson talked them down, and although it was a hard landing on the beach, it proved much less eventful than everything else that had transpired. At some point as they were getting ready to land, Ben could feel pressure fighting him on the controls. Houck evidently had recovered from being temporarily incapacitated and losing all radio communication during the firefight. When the shooting began, Ben eventually learned that Houck had ducked and ripped the cords out of his helmet and couldn't hear what was going on. Relatively new in-country, Houck had experienced his first medevac mission and first night mission in a baptism of fire. (Years later, Ben found out that co-pilot Larry Houck had not died as a result of wounds received during the Dai Do mission, as he had assumed, but rather in a mid-air crash not long after.)

Once on the ground, several other Ugly Angels arrived from the Iwo Jima to help transport all the wounded to the Repose, the hospital ship that was near-by. The squadron's corpsman, Master Chief "Doc" Jones, immediately performed emergency procedures to keep Ben from bleeding out. "Doc saved my life," said Ben, whose voice quivered for the first time, telling me that Doc and he had remained friends until his untimely death a decade ago, the day after Ben was inducted into the Aviation Hall of Fame in New Jersey.

When they arrived at the Repose, Ben was rushed into surgery, undergoing a serious operation to save his eyes. It was confirmed that shrapnel had entered both eyes. "I didn't know if I'd ever see again," said Ben, but thanks to a skilled Navy ophthalmologist, Dr. Barnebe Loreteemola, Ben underwent experimental laser eye surgery, and it was a partial success. Although the left eye was gone, Dr. Loreteemola was able to save the right one. After the doctor's tour of duty ended with the Navy, he returned to New York City, where he was on the staff of St. Vincent Hospital and opened a private practice in West New York, NJ — not far from Ben's hometown. "Dr. Loreteemola was my eye doctor for 45 years, and he never would send me a bill in all those years," said Ben, who credits Dr. Loreteemola with saving his vision.

Following the surgery, Ben spent the next seven days recuperating aboard the Repose, before they let him return to the Iwo Jima to gather his gear and say good-bye to his buddies - everyone was thinking the same thing, including Ben. Would the one-eyed Ugly Angel ever fly again? Enter Walt Casey, a favorite among the Ugly Angels with a wicked sense of humor. He and Robbie Robertson elected to fly Ben back to the Repose for the ride of his life. The guys knew that Ben was concerned that his flying career had come to an end. So Walt decided to shortcut the system. After all, how could the military say that Ben couldn't fly if he already had flown? "Especially if he put one on the back of the hospital ship (a little tricky even on a good day) without putting the struts through the rotor head or the chopper in the drink," wrote Walt in an email before his death in 2001, to fellow Ugly Angels, recounting the events of that day.

Walt, Robbie, Ben and the crew chief all climbed aboard the H-34, and Walt asked Ben, "Do you want to fly?" Ben pulled the bandages off his good eye and got into the co-pilot's seat, next to Robbie who was the Helicopter Aircraft Commander (HAC) for the mission. Ben could make out large objects, so he took over the controls, while Walt went down below to prepare for a little more drama. The crew chief wrapped Walt's body -- from head to toe -- in battle dressing. Approaching the Repose, Ben called and announced, "Medevac Inbound." The landing went perfectly. Ben greased it on with no problem. Meanwhile, Walt was spread out in the belly of the aircraft, wrapped like a mummy, when the stretcher crew ran over to remove him from the back of the plane. Instead, Walt stood up and started unwinding his bandages, telling them that they had the wrong guy. Out comes Ben, who climbs down from the cockpit, still in his pajamas with one-eye bandaged, and gets on the stretcher. Walt and Robbie made a quick getaway, which was a good thing. Ben said that the Commanding Officer of the Repose was apoplectic, but for Ben it was an unforgettable send-off, before his return to the states. Ben spent the next nine months in Philadelphia Naval Hospital recuperating, before his return to duty. Finally clearing all the red-tape, Ben got back on flight status and remained on active duty for another year, before his retirement in 1969, following a decade of service.

Ben's career may have been cut short because of his vision, but not his flying days. For the past several years, Ben and Capt Rusty Sachs, USMC, Ret. -- a fellow Ugly Angel from their Vietnam days — have been flying a restored H-34 (Ugly Angel, of course) to air shows and Marine Corps bases around the country. And more recently, the two Marines returned to Vietnam for the first time in over 40 years with Military Historical Tours, led by Capt Ed Garr, USMC, Ret. "It was a marvelous experience," said Ben, who spent a full day with Rusty and Ed at the Dai Do battle site, before visiting other areas where the Ugly Angels had left their mark. Although Rusty had left Vietnam six months before the Dai Do encounter, his two final in-country landings were at the exact same location where Ben had landed on the beach in a state of blindness, after the shootout at Dai Do.

Ben said that he never would have gone back to Vietnam had it not been for the invitation he received from Major General James Livingston, USMC, Ret, whose recently published, NOBLE WARRIOR has received excellent reviews for its recounting of the Battle of Dai Do for which he received the Medal of Honor. "When the General asks you a question, it's an order, and I said, "Yes, Sir." "The trip was perfect in every way," said Ben, who remembers that none of the Vietnamese people used to "Today, everyone smiles, and there is no animosity. Vietnam is an outstanding country."

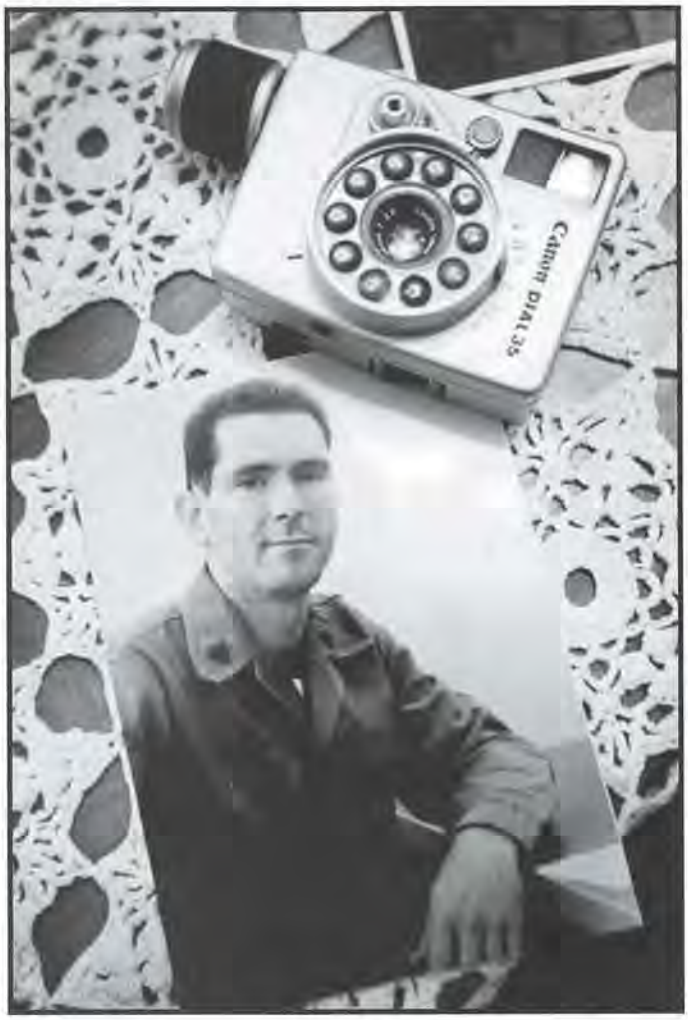
Postscript: For years, Ben wondered what had happened to his eight medevacs from the Battle of Dai Do. In 1978, Gen Weise, who was LtCol Weise, CO, 2/4, during the battle, invited Ben to their 10th reunion at Camp Le June. While there, he learned that all the medevacs had survived, and he had an opportunity to meet five of them during the reunion. Another surprise awaited him. The 2/4 made Ben one of their own, anointing him with the name, "One-Eyed Ugly Bastard" to complement the Battalion's nickname, "The Magnificent Bastards." Like Ben's two extra prosthetic eyeballs, one of which displays a USMC globe & anchor and the other a skull and cross bones, Ben now has use of two prestigious names -- The One-Eyed Ugly Angel, and the One-Eyed Ugly Bastard. "Sometimes it's a dilemma," laughs Ben.

EMPTY BUT MEMORABLE

Marine's Camera returned to family 45 years after Vietnam War

By Chuck Slothower Herald staff writer

The phone rang in Pete Ferrari's 1950s ranch-style home on Crestview Drive, and a man was on the other end of the line. He said he had served in Vietnam with Pete Ferrari's nephew, Sgt. Arnold Jay Ferrari, who was killed by a mortar shell on March 31, 1968.Jay Ferrari had given his given his camera to the man on the phone, once U.S. Marines Pfc. Donald J. Gillespie, now just Don Gillespie of the Philadelphia suburb of Erdenheim, Pa. Ferrari had been unable to find film in Vietnam for the Cannon Dial 35. Shortly before he died, Ferrari gave the camera to Gillespie to take to a rear base for safe keeping.



In his short time in Vietnam, Sgt. Ferrari, a 26-year-old volunteer from Napa, Calif., had earned the respect of his Marines. He was killed after less than three weeks in Vietnam when a mortar shell landed near him at the platoon barracks in Khe Sanh. After Sgt. Ferrari's death, Gillespie tried to put the camera in Ferrari's duffel bag to be sent home with his remains. When he was prevented access to Ferrari's surviving effects, Gillespie kept the camera.

I'm happy to be able to return this camera to you after 45 years. I can't believe it has been that long. It has sat in my dresser drawer for 40-something years and each time I saw it, I thought about that time in my life. For me it was another lifetime, but a time I have carried with me all these years. I'm very sorry for the loss your family suffered with the death of Sgt. Ferrari. For the short time I spent with him in Vietnam two things that I recall about Sgt. Ferrari was how he cared for his Marines, and he was the kind of NCO that never asked anyone to do anything he would not. I was a 19-year-old Pfc. when I met him. Sgt. Ferrari was the newly assigned platoon sergeant. I had been in country about four months when he came to our platoon in mid-March '68 and it was during the height of the siege of Khe Sanh.– Excerpted from Gillespie's letter to Pete Ferrari, Oct. 23, 2013

Gillespie volunteered for service out of high school. He wanted to prove himself in the mold of his father and uncles, who had served in World War II. Gillespie was sent to Khe Sanh, where the North Vietnamese Army was laying siege to a Marines position. The siege lasted 77 days, Gillespie later learned there were about 40,000 NVA soldiers surrounding 5,000 Marines. The NVA would lob in mortar shells and pepper the base with gunfire every night. He could hear NVA soldiers through the walls at night, attempting to tunnel their way into the Marines' base. Carpet bombing by American B-52 bombers kept the North Vietnamese at bay. "When Sgt. Ferrari arrived, he got there in the thick of it," Gillespie said. "When he got there, it was really, really bad."

Gillespie came to like Ferrari. In Khe Sanh, a small group of Marines would be sent to patrol outside the fence line at night to provide early warning if the NVA attacked. Most noncommissioned officers avoided the dangerous assignment, Gillespie said. Ferrari volunteered for it. "He was the kind of guy that wouldn't ask somebody to do something unless he'd do it himself," Gillespie said. "He was dedicated, and he cared for his troops. "Ferrari was killed when he stepped outside a bunker and was blasted by a mortar shell. "When he was killed, I couldn't put the camera in his bag because they wouldn't authorize it," Gillespie said.

"They sent all my stuff home. When I finally arrived home and started going through my things, this camera was there. "Gillespie searched in vain for Ferrari's family members for many years. Finally, he came across a mention of Sergeant Ferrari on the website of a California high school where Ferrari had graduated. A staff member at the high school was able to get Gillespie in touch with Sgt. Ferrari's surviving family. In Durango Colorado.

Jay Ferrari, who had previously served in the Marines Corps Reserve, volunteered for active duty and was sent to Vietnam in 1968.His uncle, Pete Ferrari of Durango, also is a veteran, having served in the U.S. Army in Europe during World War II. He was proud when his nephew volunteered for Army service. So was Bonnie Sawyer of Seattle, Pete's daughter and a cousin to Jay. "He felt a sense of duty, and he had friends there (serving in Vietnam)," Sawyer said. "He was very, very proud to be a Marine. "Pete Ferrari is 95 years old and has deep roots in the Durango area. He only rarely saw his nephew Jay, who grew up in Napa, Calif., on visits to Durango. Bonnie said Jay was like a brother to her. She received a letter from Jay shortly after he died. Gillespie's call to Pete Ferrari saying he had the camera seemed to come out of the blue. "We were both thrilled," Sawyer said. "After all these years, it's still emotional. "After finding Pete Ferrari, Gillespie hesitated for a few days before mailing the camera. "Sending the camera was kind of hard because I had it for so long," Gillespie said. "It was like something I could touch. I had a hard time actually mailing it off. I wanted to send it back, but I didn't want to send it back, you know? Now, I'm happy. I'm happy his uncle got it. "Pete Ferrari was glad to receive the camera and some photos and maps Gillespie sent along with it. "It gives you some background on what you're missing," he said.

The camera did not contain any film, so any photos Jay Ferrari took in Vietnam remain lost to history. Gillespie sent the Ferrari family some photos of himself at the platoon barracks near the spot where Jay Ferrari was later killed. Gillespie, a youthful Marine, stands in front of a wall of sandbags. Khe Sanh's Hill 861, an infamous site of bloody combat during the war, can be seen in the distance. Gillespie was wounded by a grenade on May 6, 1968, and was sent to Japan to recuperate. That September, the Marines shipped him back to Vietnam, where he was soon shot in the calf. That finally earned him a ticket home. Durango Colorado "If anything, I hope you get comfort in knowing Sergeant Ferrari is remembered by all who served with him. He did his duty without hesitation and with much devotion. He truly is an American hero.

"Excerpted from Gillespie's letter to Pete Ferrari, Oct. 23, 2013durango Colorado Gillespie went on to a long career as a Philadelphia police officer and later a Pennsylvania state investigator. Like many Vietnam veterans, Gillespie, now 64, has mixed feelings about the war. "I've always been proud that I served," he said. "I have some questions about it now. I was always proud to do my duty, and I was always proud to have been with those guys that I was with over there. I think about those guys every day. "In 2010, Gillespie returned to Vietnam along with his sons to visit Khe Sanh, where he had fought. Vacationing in Vietnam during peacetime, Gillespie said, was "very weird." "It's very peaceful up there now," he said. "It's beautiful up there – the mountains."

REPLIES

By Nick Romanetz

Because of the efforts of Don Gillespie to get in touch with the Ferrari family, I recently emailed Sgt. Ferrari's cousin with the details surrounding his death. I was his platoon commander at Khe Sanh and was in the immediate vicinity when he was hit and at his side when treated by our Corpsmen. Thanks to Don for bringing closure to this for the family..

KHE SANH VETERANS IN THE NEWS HOPE SOLDIER REMEMBERED

U.S. Senator Mark Pryor, D-Ar., and Senator John Boozeman, R-Ar., bestowed the honors during induction ceremonies in Little Rock on Friday for Sergeant First Class James W. Holt, of Hope, as a member of the 2013 Class of the Arkansas Military Veterans Hall of Fame.

U.S. Senator Mark Pryor, D-Ar., and Senator John Boozeman, R-Ar., bestowed the honors during induction ceremonies in Little Rock on Friday for Sergeant First Class James W. Holt, of Hope, as a member of the 2013 Class of the Arkansas Military Veterans Hall of Fame.

The induction ceremonies took place at the Embassy Suites Hotel before a crowd of more than 200 family, friends and other veterans who came together to honor the 15 inductees.

SFC Holt, of Hope, has been listed as Missing in Action since he was last seen during combat as he single-handedly attacked an NVA tank formation to draw fire away from other U. S. soldiers during the Battle of Lang Vei in February, 1968. The Battle of Lang Vei lasted two days and was the spearhead of the infamous Vietcong Tet Offensive, the deadliest combat engagement of the Vietnam War.

Holt was posthumously inducted into the veteran's organization "for exceptional military accomplishment" as he fought to repel the spearhead attack of the infamous Tet Offensive during the Vietnam War. Accepting the award in his behalf was his brother, George Holt, of Hope.

SFC Holt was posthumously awarded the Silver Star for gallantry in action, and the Purple Heart, as a result of his presumed death during the combat action on the evening of Feb. 6, 1968. His remains have never been located, according to military records.

WEB BRIEFS

By Craig Tourte

It was an honor and privilege, a few weeks ago, to have had the opportunity to have dinner with Mark Owen - author of "No Easy Day...the firsthand account of the mission that killed Osama Bin Laden." Mark was the team leader and second in line of the squad of Navy Seal Team 6 members who entered the house and climbed the stairs, confronted Bin Laden in the doorway of his bedroom and dispatched him to his reward of 77 virgins. Mark was the guest speaker at the dinner and provided a wonderful PowerPoint presentation of his extensive training - mentioning that he actually had to live in a tent and eat MRE's for a month (and inside joke for Khe Sanh Veterans) - the rescue of Captain Richard Phillips - an about to be released movie staring Tom Hanks in "Captain Phillips" - and a first hand account of his participating in the actually search, training for and dispatch of Bin Laden. His presentation was compelling, inspiring and even at times humorous. I was able to spend a few private minutes with Mark and presented him with a Khe Sanh Challenge Coin and the Fall Winter 2012, Issue 81 of Red Clay Magazine. On the inside cover I wrote - "On behalf of all Khe Sanh Veterans, thank you for your service and sacrifice - Craig W. Tourte."

Mark inscribed a couple of his books for me with a personal note and he was also kind enough to write in one of the books the following: "Khe Sanh Veterans - Thank you for YOUR sacrifice to this country! I'm honored to follow in your footsteps and serve as will!" "One Team, One Fight" "Mark Owen." I'll donate this book, addressed to Khe Sanh Veterans, at the silent auction next year at our reunion in San Diego. "No Easy Day" was a compelling read of which I thoroughly enjoyed and of course once again, it was a honor and privilege to have met Mr. Owen.

MY CHRISTMAS IN KHE SANH

By Bill Cowan
I CO 3/26

This Christmas my oldest son is serving his fourth combat tour overseas. With him in mind, my thoughts wander back to the vivid memories of one of my particular Christmases past.

Like most veterans of today's military, I served more than one Christmas season away from home and those I loved. It's one of the unwelcome prices of military service, yet servicemen and women somehow always seem to find a way to mold the sadness of being away from loved ones at special times into a way of sharing with new friends and comrades.

Never was this truer for me than one Christmas at an isolated combat base in the mountains of Vietnam.

My unit at the time, the 3rd Battalion of the 26th Marines, had endured a hellish September along the Demilitarized Zone dividing North Vietnam from the South. One particular battle had cost us 55 Marine and Navy lives and scores wounded, many of whom were evacuated for medical treatment. The losses rendered the battalion ineffective for combat operations, and we were shuffled to a safe camp along the coast to begin a rebuilding process. Besides those we had lost to the fighting, others had completed their 13 month tours of duty and were going home at last.

By December the battalion was almost up to full strength. Some of us were seasoned combat veterans, but most were new arrivals to Vietnam. As a consequence, we still weren't being given front-line duty. Instead we were moved to a small base along the mountainous border with Laos.

A few Montagnard tribesmen were the only civilians in the area, and an airstrip was the principal avenue of supply and refurbishment. I had already spent three months in the area before September's battles, and it seemed a suitable place for us to rebuild the battalion into an effective fighting force.

As Christmas neared, so did the holiday spirit. The war somehow seemed rather far away. We awoke each morning under cool mountain fog. By noontime it had burned off, revealing the green jungle atop the hills and mountains which surrounded us.

In the far distance, along the coastline, our fellow Marines were still skirmishing against the North Vietnamese units trying to surreptitiously move south. We could often hear the artillery and airstrikes which accompanied the battles, large and small. Somehow we seemed relatively safe at our small base

In our bunkers and foxholes, our small transistor radios would find Armed Forces Vietnam (AFVN), the military sponsored radio station which kept us abreast of the 'real world.' We would often have to point our antennas in every conceivable direction until we found a strong enough signal to hear clearly. In the mountains, when the signal was good it was really good. And, simply listening to a Christmas carol could wistfully take our minds away from where we were.

In the middle of December, Christmas packages from families and friends at home began pouring in. Most were wrapped in foils and papers which glimmered with reds, blues, and golds unfamiliar to our base existence. Other packages came from across America addressed simply to "Any Marine" or "Any American Serviceman in Vietnam." They were simple reminders that anonymous Americans back home still cared about those of us serving overseas.

When Christmas Day finally arrived, the division headquarters sent cases of hardboiled eggs and eggnog to our battalion. Our glee at these unexpected delicacies was almost childlike. Even so far away from home, Christmas again seemed quite real. A few of us were even prepared to successfully debate the existence of Santa Claus.

As the day went on, some of us sang along with the Christmas carols beaming over AFVN. Others broke out pictures of their families or loved ones and talked about home. Nearly all of us ate eggs and drank eggnog until we were sick.

As was customary, a holiday truce had been called between warring factions. Although neither side was known to be meticulous about honoring such truces, each of us shared a slight sense of relief in believing that we weren't at risk for at least one special day.

Amidst our joy, however, and unbeknownst to us, the enemy was amassing thousands of troops for an attack on our base and the small company outposts on the outlying hills. Even as we sang, talked, and drank eggnog, North Vietnamese scouts were peering down at us from the looming hills to the north and planning their strategy for attack. Within less than a month, the biggest battle of the Vietnam war commenced — the siege of Khe Sanh, our small mountain base.

For many servicemen at Khe Sanh, that Christmas was their last. It was also the last for thousands of North Vietnamese troops who, like us, were away from home serving their country.

Today, 46 years after that Christmas and as if it happened only yesterday, I can still see the smiling faces of my Marine friends, hear the holiday music of AFVN, and taste the eggnog.

This small story of mine can be echoed a thousand times over by other veterans who have served through World War II, Korea, Vietnam, Beirut, Iraq, Afghanistan, and a hundred other places where men and women stood in harm's way in service of their country. The particular place, time, faces, and events may be different, but the memories and feelings down inside won't be.

If you know a veteran, you might want to ask about one of his or her Christmases past. There's probably a story waiting to be told.

REUNION MEMORIES WHY EVERYONE SHOULD ATTEND

By Dennis Mannion

There is real rhythm and pulse to the reunion, and since I was there from mid-afternoon Tuesday to very early on Sunday morning, my recollections are limited to that window. I may not use full sentences throughout this, and if I mention some folks by name do not consider it a personal insult if you're not one of them.

The hotel & lobby is fairly quiet when I check in on Tuesday with Tommy Eichler and Russ Turner as well as Fish and their helpers...where do we get such great, tireless and dedicated people, I wonder, as I drape my name-tag over my neck.

PX open, I ask?" "Roger that, 4th floor." Have to see Big John, but before I can even hit the elevator button, Mike Fishbaugh is coming out of the Hospitality Room. The guy is everywhere all the time...doing anything & everything to HELP...and if the food & beverage station needs something, he's the man to see.

4th floor ...I hear that distinctive, high-pitched, New Joisey use of the F-word before I can even see him, and when I do, it's as if the PX in 2012's D.C. has been transported intact and en masse to 2013... hell, there is even more stuff on display than last year. A bear-hug hello from Big John and I know I'm "home" and I really and truly "dig" the warmth, the camaraderie, and the friendship.

It's such a comfort and a real joy to pass thru the lobby, the hallways, the sidewalk, the elevator, etc, and see a Khe Sanh themed shirt or just the name-tag. Don't even have to know (or have met) the person before...just the nod, the "hi," the "how'ya doing?" and we have that instant red clay connection that certainly separates us from most of the US population and even most Nam vets as well. It's a cool feeling.

Tuesday eve and it's time to get my maps, photos, and charts up on the wall in Hospitality...Tom Ford teases me about it every reunion. Calls it "Mannion's Classroom." Must be the teacher/coach in me, I suppose, as old habits die hard, and I have always felt that a picture is worth a 1000 words. By the time I have three or four up in place, someone -- friend from other reunions or someone new -- is asking about this pic or that. Takes a lot longer to get everything up, but it's worth every query...every nod of understanding...every bit of enlightenment from 45 years removed. I am no expert on ALL of it -- none of us are -- and I enjoy being "schooled myself. I want the facts to be as correct as possible.

Each day begins with the early birds up and on a quest for coffee and whatever. It doesn't matter if the hotel staff is picking up and vacuuming from the night before, the day has begun. Saw Ken Pipes in there just about every morning. Early arrivals find some goodies on the table as well. One morning it was Hostess Chocolate cupcakes! By noon the Hospitality Room really takes on a life of its own ...most round tables occupied....someone sitting solo? Not for long as those with many reunions in their past, make it a point to sit down and introduce....beverages and snacks mixed in with personal photo albums, albums of previous reunions, maps and best of all a cacophony of words, phrases, sentences, exclamations:

"I remember when the mess hall got crushed and ..."
"It was the 23rd not the 24th!"
"The rounds came from the west, I think..."
"Pete got hit and then..."
"The Lt. told us to..."
"D A M N Straight!"
"I ran for the bunker..."
"There were Army guys with us on the base? Really?"
"The runway ran east to west / not north to south" Went out to the water point a lot."
"Charlie Med.""B-52's...dusters...50 cal..mortars...rockets...bunkers....barbed wire...RPG's...snipers...outgoing & incoming...Arty! Arty, Co Roc!"
"I remember..."
"He most certainly did not!"
"152's, 105's, 130's, 175's, 120's, 81's, 82's, 106's, 60's..."
"I never knew that!"
"Say again?"
"My name is T-Bone Jones and doesn't anyone want to view my photos?"
"When the ammo dump blew..."
"I got hit..."
"I have pics of that C-130 on fire."
"The corpsman ran over and ..."

Just some of the sounds of the week ... many words and memories being repeated again and again, but that's what reunions are for, I think.

Roomed with Glenn Prentice -- been friends for years -- and he doesn't snore much, so that was a plus. (Many KS vets have been back to Khe Sanh, but I am not sure any of them can say that they overnighted in a tent on Hill 861, but we did back in July 00). We did not go on the river cruise or to the Grand Ole Opry, but it was nice to hear that Khe Sanh vets were recognized to great applause. Better than 8th & I in D.C. ever was. Doc Thomas (K 3/26 brother) kindly picked up our breakfast tab at Pucketts one morning. He was three tables away. Glenn & I saw plenty of Khe Sanh shirts there while having 3 breakfasts, 1 lunch and 1 supper.

Friday night when the buses returned from the Opry was a sight to be seen: Food Savages of every size, shape, religion, and race swarmed the Hospitality Food Table for hotdogs, popcorn, beer & soda. We could barely keep up! Even room temperature bottled water disappeared. Saturday, I liked the reverential tone at the Memorial Service, and the give & take at the membership meeting especially Savannah being voted for 2015. Congrats to Russell Wagner for being voted onto the board.

By 1500 on Saturday the Hospitality Room was almost deserted as many folks were getting ready for the dinner. Popcorn and hotdog machines already in their cartons. I took down my "classroom" and as I did, I wondered how much I will be able to bring to San Diego as I'll have to fly. Will have to cut down the size...just like the PX will have to do next year. Banquet was terrific...thought the food was excellent. Said goodbyes to many -- hand shakes, hugs and even a kiss or two -- after the meal as our alarm was set for 0330 on Sunday.

I loved the week and I love the Khe Sanh vets (and their families and friends.) I hope to see you next year.

MORE REUNION MEMORIES
SATURDAY REUNION
MEMORIAL SERVICE

Craig Tourte

I don't want to make this a long dissertation. For the purposes of this story related to the reunion in Nashville, I'll just hit on one point and perhaps sometime in the future I'll reflect on what I thought were a few other interesting experiences and events. Taking the whole reunion into consideration, the fine meals, new people I had the privilege of meeting, the business meeting, my trips to the Country Music Hall of Fame, the visits to the honkey tonks, the boat ride down the river and many more too numerous at this time to mention I'll address, what at least to me, was my most memorable and meaningful experience.

The memorial service at 0900 Hrs on Saturday to remember those who departed us this year is something that to this day I continue to ponder. After the usual prayer, formality and recognition of our departed brothers the podium and lectern where empty of speakers. I was staring at the floor waiting for the next speaker when I heard someone approach the podium and climb the stairs. I looked up to identify the next speaker and noted that the man now standing at the lectern was Lieutenant Colonel Kenneth Pipes (Ret).

I have been to many services conduced by those educated and experienced in religious services and remembrances. Without prepared notes or a practiced rote, Colonel Pipes presented one of the most genuinely sincere and soul-stirring remembrances I have ever experienced. I wish I could share with you his articulate words, his sincerity, his emotion and genuine feeling of love and loss for the men he knew, served with and for those who are serving now. But I am just not literate enough to write them, intellectual enough to remember adequately exactly what was said nor talented enough to convey his emotion and sincerity. But I'll never forget that moment or the emotion I felt while they were being spoken.

I'm trying to think of an adequate closing here, something to sum up this little article however all I am able to come up with is what a great and truly wonderfully man and leader Colonel Pipes is, and how fortunate we are as an Association to have him as a member.

REMEMBERING TOM HORCHLER'S DOG "LUCY"

Craig Tourte

I played golf today with three old friends who I had not seen for some time. The subject of dogs came up and the discussion of Tom Horchler's wonderful dog Lucy was discussed. One of the men said, "Will how is Lucy doing." I responded that Lucy passed away a couple of years ago. I was surprised as all three stopped in their tracks and just kind of stood there and in unison and said, "She passed away?" I was a bit taken back by three harden masculine individuals who were instantly surprised and saddened upon hearing that Lucy had passed away. Lucy had that effect of men, she loved them and they loved her…its difficult to describe that bond between men and dogs. If you have one, you'll understand how dogs affect ones life and how their loss is an emotional loss for us all. Below is the story I wrote about Lucy leaving us, I still think about her…she was not my dog but in her short life she touched all who knew her.

"I've had three dogs during my adult life and absolutely loved them all, to this day I morn the loss of each one of them. When Tom and I became reacquainted, some 35 years after Vietnam, I found him living by himself in a little one bedroom house tucked in an old and tired section of town. Not really wanting a dog, or pet of any kind for that matter, fate brought Lucy and Tom together. Lucy was there, not just there for Tom but for all of her "uncles" who visited Tom and grew to love and admire his little golden companion. Lucy only had friends, and I don't think she ever met animal or human she didn't like. For those of us who have pets, simply stating that we love our animals, are insufficient to describe our emotions or our attachment to them which is as strong and as it is to any human being. The ravages and painful memory of Vietnam took its toll on Tom, as it has on all of us. Lucy was not only his constant companion but his support, comforter, protector of emotions, guardian of his psychic and I think, one of his main reasons to preserver."

"I don't have any pets because I just can't take pain of their loss, but I loved going to Tom's house and to spend just a few minutes laying on the carpet next to Lucy, it brought me great comfort. She always seemed happy to see me, no matter if she remembered me or not, she always made me feel just a little special. Tom often brought Lucy out to the golf course with him and I enjoyed her company on many a fine course. She was well behaved and at times a much better golf partner than I was. I recall one afternoon when she was sitting on the grass and I was addressing my golf ball getting ready to hit and she walked up to my ball and placed it in her mouth and moved it about 5 feet closer to the pin and dropped it on the ground. It was the funniest thing I had ever seen and we all had a great laugh. I think she knew my game."

"I'll miss her smooth and shiny golden coat, the way she smelled, her smile and happy face. The way she seemed to remember who I was and her excitement in seeing me again. I'll miss lying on the floor with her; I'll miss the comfort she gave to me. I'll miss petting her and I'll miss seeing her on the golf course. She'll always have a very big place in my heart. But as painful as it is for me, I know Tom will miss her even more….."

OBIT

KHE SANH VETERAN
MAJOR DANIEL J. MARTIN (RET) USAF

Major Daniel J. Martin, USAF (retired) died at his home in South Windsor on October 25, 2013 after a two year battle with lung cancer. The irony of it being that he was never a smoker. A veteran of World War II, Korea and Vietnam, Dan was a proud native of Holyoke, MA who never forgot his roots or his experiences growing up in the city's Ward 4 section. He often recalled with pleasure his memories of playing baseball in the sandlots of the city, walking to the Boys Club for basketball and indoor soccer matches and swimming in and across the Connecticut River.

Dan was born August 9, 1924 into a loving Irish family, the sixth of eight children born to Timothy and Mary (Kennedy) Martin both from County Kerry, Ireland. He was educated in the Holyoke school system, graduating from Holyoke High School class of 1941. In January 1943, Dan enlisted in the U.S. Army Aviation Cadet Program and after rigorous training was commissioned a 2nd Lieutenant and awarded his navigator wings. By the end of his training World War II was winding down and he was released from active duty. Like so many returning veterans, Dan took advantage of the GI Bill to further his education earning a degree in Public Relations and Communications from Boston University in 1949. After graduation Dan worked in sales in Houston, TX until being recalled to active duty by the U.S. Air Force during the Korean Conflict.

He was re-trained as a Navigator on B 29s and flew combat missions over North Korea. For his service he was awarded the Air Medal and other decorations. After that tour Dan decided to make the Military his career. During his years of service he saw duty as a navigator on KC 97s and C 130 aircraft eventually earning his command navigator wings. He also held positions as a community relations officer at several air force bases in the US as well Wiesbaden, Germany. In 1963 Dan was assigned to the University of Connecticut ROTC as assistant professor of air science, a position he held for four years.

Dan's last tour before retirement was to Vietnam where he was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross. The citation accompanying his award reads: Major Daniel J. Martin distinguished himself by extraordinary achievement while participation in aerial flight as a C-130 B Navigator near Khe Sanh, Republic of Vietnam on March 17, 1968. On that date, Major Martin's crew was directed to air-drop vitally needed supplies to the besieged United States Marine Garrison at Khe Sanh. His calmness and courage under highly adverse circumstance were responsible for the perfect delivery of the cargo and the subsequent safe recovery of the aircraft and crew. Dan was also awarded another Air Medal with 5 oak leaf clusters.

Upon his retirement from the Air Force, Dan accepted a position as assistant registrar at the University of Connecticut which he held until the mid 1970s. His next career move was into the real estate business in the Willimantic area where he headed the Lawrence, Martin and Park Realtors. Dan is survived by his wife of 63 years, the former Mary Cadigan, daughter Barbara and husband Tom Laflesh of Hartford, Kevin and Susan Martin of Avon, Brian and Suzanne Martin of Wilmette IL, Daniel Sean Martin and Angela Caruso of Manchester, Barry and Ann Martin of Farmington and Stephen T. Martin of San Francisco CA. Also surviving are his brother Thomas Martin and Laura Birks of Chicopee, MA. Dan leaves his seven grandchildren, seven step-grandchildren and five step-great– grandchildren and many nieces and nephews.

OBIT

DR JAMES O. FINNEGAN USN
KHE SANH VETERAN
CHARLIE MED

James Owen Finnegan M.D., of Media, passed away October 13, 2013 at the age of 75 at his home from complications from melanoma. Jim was born July 17, 1938 in Pittsburgh to James and Elizabeth Finnegan. He attended Central Catholic High School in Pittsburgh, The University of Pittsburgh, LaSalle University and then graduated from the Hahnemann University School of Medicine. He later received a Master's Degree in Health Administration from St. Joseph's University. After completing his surgical residency at the University of Pennsylvania, Jim enlisted in the U.S. Navy Medical Corp and served as a combat surgeon for the Third Marine Division in Vietnam from 1967 to 1968 where he saved countless young lives.

Jim was awarded a Bronze Star and a Purple Heart for his service. Thereafter, Jim returned to the University of Pennsylvania and completed his residency in Thoracic and Cardiovascular Surgery. Jim was a well known expert and Professor of Cardiovascular, Thoracic and General Surgery for over 40 years and was the past Chief of Surgery at the Medical College of Pennsylvania, St. Agnes Medical Center and the Crozer Chester Medical Center. Jim was widely respected and adored by both patients and colleagues for his skill, wisdom, dignity and optimism

His treatment of all of his patients with compassion and respect was recently recognized when he was the recipient of the Healing Spirit Award from Our Lady of Lourdes Medical Center where he practiced for the past six years. Jim memorialized his courageous military service in his memoire In the Company of Marines: A Surgeon Remembers Vietnam in which he proudly recounted the bravery and valor of so many soldiers whose wounds he had the privilege to treat. Jim was loved and revered by his family. He was predeceased by his son Michael and his daughter in law Patricia.

He is survived by his wife Linda; his father in law Louis Pinola; his brother Jack Finnegan (Virginia); his sister Elizabeth Ward (Jack); his sister in law Barbara Nelson (Bert); his sons Mark (Joanne), Matthew (Kathryn) and Martin; his daughters Maureen Edelson (Mark) and Caitlin; and also survived by his 15 grandchildren Sean, Kevin, Daniel, Timothy, Owen, Ryan, Liam, Brendan, Genevieve, Bridget, Mary Katherine, Anne, Margaret, Michael and Angela. Interment with full military honors followed at Saints Peter and Paul Cemetery, Springfield.

Replies:

Dr. Finnegan wrote a wonderful book "In the company of Marines" which is currently sold in the Khe Sanh Inc PX. I enjoyed it so much I wrote a little review on Amazon. If you have the time you might order this fine story about anothers Khe Sanh experience.

This review is from: In the Company of Marines: A Surgeon Remembers Vietnam (Paperback) "Dr. Finnegan doesn't give himself enough credit for his many heroic and unselfish acts during the Siege at the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh. To some readers this will be merely another book written in the first person about a long ago war time experience. I am not sure many would or could ever imagine the intense terror and deprivation experienced by the men who survived that very long and intense siege. Dr. Finnegan opens up a door every so slightly and allows the reader a peak inside of Charlie Med. and the 24 hour struggles to save the lives of so many young Marines. I enjoyed his style of composition, a sort of diary of individual thoughts and experiences. A short but powerful read which brought back many memories for those few who are still around and survived those horrific awful months."

LOCAL VIETNAM VETERAN USES EXPERIENCES TO GIVE BACK

By Stephen Green Staff Reporter

HUNTSVILLE — On Aug. 28, 1967, Marine sniper Tom Fordyce was on routine patrol near Hill 861 southwest of Vietnam. The next day he was supposed to take 30 days rest before returning for another six months of active duty.

But it wouldn't end that way.

Hill 861, as well as Hill 881 North and 881 South, had been a major sites for Vietnam troop movement that Charlie Company, First Battalion, 26 Marines, and other troops had been assigned to take and protect.

The Marine base served as the western anchor for Marine Corps forces, which tactical responsibility for the five northernmost provinces of South Vietnam. The defensive system stretched below the Demilitarized Zone from the coast, alone Route 9, to Khe Sanh where Fordyce was stationed.

He was with his two friends, George Dockstader and Jerry Heard, when a bullet ripped through his left arm.

"When I got hit, it was so quick that you didn't have any pain," Fordyce said. "But when I looked down I saw my arm was pretty much mangled. This all happened in a matter of seconds even though it seems like longer than that. The corpsman came rushing over as quickly as he could and took my left hand. He folded it back up underneath my forearm and wrapped it up."

Fordyce now sits on the board of the Trinity River Authority and the Lone Survivor Foundation after being appointed by Gov. Rick Perry after retiring as the Director of Agribusiness in 2005. Before his appointment to the TRA, he also served on the TDCJ Parole Board for four years, and DARS under the Department of Health and Human Services.

He's also a supporter of the H.E.A.R.T.S. Veterans Museum located in Highway 75 North in Huntsville. He is one of the hundreds of veterans that will attend their annual Veteran's Day Banquet on Monday, Nov. 11.

"What the museum and Veteran's Day does for me is just give a reflection of what my friends and family went through so you and I could sit here and talk," he said. "It reflects back on the appreciation for all those that give back. And there's those that have spent a lifetime in the military and still do."

The museum, he said, has a strange way of bringing people together. One example of this is at a previous banquet, Larry Heard – his friend from the war – was flown in to surprise him.

"He and George were instrumental in saving my life in Vietnam and I hadn't seen him in 45 years," Fordyce said. "All of a sudden the doors open up and there's Larry. It was extremely emotional. I usually don't cry, but I was emotional that night. We were able to regain our friendship that we lost 45 years ago; and it was all because of the museum.

Fordyce joined the Marine Corp shortly after graduating high school in May 1966. From there he went through basic training in San Diego, Calif., where his trainers noticed his proficiency with a sniper rifle – something he said today's snipers could scoff at. "When I was in sniper school back then, it was nothing compared to the school today," he said. "I couldn't hold a candle to the snipers today." After finishing basic training and sniper school, he left for Vietnam, first to Hawaii then to Okinawa, Japan, before finally landing south of Da Nang where he was stationed from Nov. 4, 1966, until Apr. 15, 1967, as a sniper. "We would go out with the platoon," he said. "The platoon would leave and we would stay behind and look for any of the enemy that would come in and look at the area after they left." He, Dockstader and Heard took a week's R&R in Tokyo in April.

When they returned to catch a patrol back to Hill 55, their primary responsibility, they got a different call. "The officers said, 'No, Charlie Company, First Battalion, 26th Marines is headed to Khe Sanh,'" Fordyce said. "We didn't know what Khe Shan was." They took the Apr. 22 helicopter flight to Khe Sanh with the objective to take the three hills, 861, 881 North and 881 South. Fordyce was there from Apr. 22 to Aug. 28: the day he was hit. On Aug. 28, 1967, Marine sniper Tom Fordyce was on routine patrol near Hill 861 southwest of Vietnam. The routine patrol turned into a fight for his life when a bullet ripped through his arm leaving it completely useless. "I knew at that point it was probably going to be lost," he said. "He stayed with me until we got to Khe Sanh, which was a small air base. They took my jacket off and gave me some medicine to stop the pain." The main reason he survived was the help from his two friends, Dockstader and Heard, who carried and protected him until he was out of the area.

"When you get wounded and you have to get a helicopter come and get you out of a combat situation, you want to make sure (other soldiers) get you to the spot the helicopter is going to land," Fordyce said. "They help get you on the helicopter. And they provide security for that helicopter to leave without getting shot down." And that's what they did, he said. "They were very instrumental in making sure I was on the gurney and that I was protected from enemy fire while the helicopter came in. You could hear the enemy rounds hitting the chopper. All that's going through your mind is, 'Oh no. Are we going to get shot down?'" Dockstader and Heard stayed behind after Fordyce left the country. Dockstader eventually got his degree from Sam Houston State University and moved back to his home state of Washington. Heard now lives in Atlanta, Ga. He was rapidly flown from Khe Sanh to Phu Bai, a large-scale military hospital for which a bridge at the H.E.A.R.T.S. museum is named after. "I remember being on the gurney and coming off the gurney," he said. "There was a preacher (to his right) and there was a corpsman cutting my pants and boots off. Taking my shirt off. Next thing I knew I was completely nude on this gurney." He was going into shock. "I remember them taking me to this operating room," Fordyce said. "I was shaking." A doctor, whom Fordyce could only recall as Dr. Dorrin, greeted him in the room and began to examine his still bandaged arm. "Marine, can you stretch your arm out?" the doctor asked. "Yes, sir," Fordyce replied stretching his arm out. The doctor unraveled the hand and unfolded Fordyce's arm out and laid it on a metal plate. That was the first time he saw the wound since he was hit. "It looked like somebody had taken a butcher's knife and whacked it off," Fordyce said.

The doctor then turned to the 20-year-old Fordyce and said, "Marine, we're going to have to take your arm off." "Okay." Fordyce said the doctors gave him several shots to deaden the area and removed the flesh below the elbow, leaving the bone sticking out and exposed. "They took a saw and started sawing," he said. "I couldn't take it. It was hurting so bad. So, they put me to sleep and for how long I was out I don't know." When he woke up, Fordyce said his hand was bandaged up and he was elated that he could feel his fingers on the hand he thought he had just lost. "I started wiggling my fingers," Fordyce said, "and I said, 'Golly, I know he took it off. I saw him. I don't know what they did; they must've sewn it back on. Man this is great I can't wait for him to come back in.'" The doctor did return on his regular rounds, but didn't give Fordyce the news he anxiously wanted. "When he came back in to do his rounds he asked me how I was doing," he said. "I told him, 'Sir, I'm doing extremely well. I don't know what you did but I'm moving my fingers and I'm ready to go.' He said, 'No, Marine, it's not there. You will feel that sensation the rest of your life.'"

He was experiencing phantom pain, a condition where amputees can still feel their limbs long after it is no longer there. "Right now my hand is (sticking out) and I'm wiggling my fingers and this thumb," he said. "You kind of want to stretch (the missing hand) out, but you can't. There's nothing there." On his way out of Vietnam, the plane stopped in Guam for fuel on Nov. 4, 1967, exactly one year since he first entered the country. The island they stopped on was also the same island his father had defended years before in World War II. They landed at the now defunct Oakland Naval Base in California where he stayed until Mar. 18, 1968, before returning to his hometown of Katy, Texas. He visited the Center for the Intrepid, operated by the Department of Defense, where he received a prosthetic and saw other, much worse, amputees that experienced the same phantom feeling he did. Lucky for him, he said, his was not the worst. "Some of the soldiers said their (missing limbs) feels like it's turned sideways or there foot is turned backwards instead of forwards," Fordyce said. "So, when they try to walk, they're wanting to go this way and their foot goes the other way. I came out pretty fortunate." --

He eventually went to SHSU like Dockstader and got his Bachelor of Science in Agriculture in 1975. He said professors like Jack Parker, then associate registrar, agriculture professors "Dr. Little," Dr. Eddie Dye, David Mormon and Sonny Sikes are the reason he and other veterans could get their degree. "I would say, 'Professor Sikes, I got to go to Houston to take care of this arm and I'm going to have to miss class,'" Fordyce said. "Mr. Sikes said, 'You take care of your arm. I'll take care of your education.' And he did." The town of Katy, unlike other areas that despised the war and soldiers in it, "rolled out the red carpet" for Fordyce upon his return. But, he said, soldiers even today don't want the fanfare that is often given to them. "People today are so appreciative of veterans by doing small things like that," he said. "I don't know of any veteran that's asking for any handout. They just appreciate a pat on the back and a thank you."

Fordyce has his own way of thanking veterans as a member of the Lone Survivor Foundation board, an organization named in 2010 after fellow Huntsville veteran Marcus Luttrell's 2007 book on Operation Redwing in Afghanistan. They provide therapies for members and families dealing with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder; outdoor recreational activities to relieve stress; reduce dependency on narcotic pain management; family support; aide in speeding up government aid processes; and generally raising awareness. He also has served as the Director of Agricultural Business Land/Minerals, Commissioner Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles, charter member and present Chairman of the Huntsville Economic Advisory Council, charter member of the Huntsville Veterans Advisory Council, and member of the Texas Veterans Commission advisory board. In addition, he is a former member and Vice President Board of Directors for Brownfield Memorial Hospital, Board for Lease (minerals) Texas General Land Office, and former member of the Walker County Grand Jury. But more important than any accomplishment or group he's been a part of, he said, is his family. "Sometimes you need your family to keep yourself in perspective that this is what it's all about," he said. "You talk to your wife or kids and let them know what's going on. Every day when I wake up and I put this wooden prosthetic on, I think of Vietnam. It's a continual healing process."

OBIT

1ST LT LAWRENCE J. BOUDRIA
USMC KHE SANH VETERAN
(September 29, 1944 - November 9, 2013)

Lawrence J. Boudria, age 69, of Wellington, FL, formerly of Kinnelon, NJ passed away on November 9, 2013.

Born in Hartford, CT, Lawrence was the son of the late Alfred and Frances Boudria. He proudly enlisted in the US Marine Corps. during the Vietnam War and achieved the rank of 1st Lieutenant. He served as the commander of the 3rd Marine Division's Kit Carson Scouts in Quang Tri, Vietnam where he used his Vietnamese language skills to repatriate enemy soldiers who then served as scouts supporting the US combat Marines. As a Lt Marine Platoon Commander, he was awarded the Bronze Star for Valor for exposing himself to enemy fire in order to save the lives of his men during the siege of Khe Sanh on Hill 881; one of the fiercest battles of the Vietnam war.

Upon his return home, Lawrence earned his MBA from Columbia University and followed the route of an entrepreneur, where he was a pioneer and innovator in the telecommunications resale industry, starting his own successful businesses - Garden State Long Distance Telephone Company and Universal Car Phone.

Lawrence is survived by his loving wife, Nina; their daughter, Jacqueline; his sister Judith Gottsegen, her husband Michael; his brother-law Randolph Aversano, his wife, Jane and many beloved nieces and nephews.

MARINE RETURNS TO VIETNAM FOUR DECADES LATER

By Brian Livingston
Meridian Star

MERIDIAN — Not 10 minutes after a 20-year-old corpsman set foot in Vietnam in 1968, enemy fire began raining down. It didn't take David Schuurman but just one second to figure out he should be following many of the other U.S. Marines at Khe Sanh who were diving in holes and bunkers to get away from the deadly shrapnel. It was Schuurman's introduction into a war that has since been deemed the least popular conflict in American history and an experience of which he still has vivid memories.

Those memories were one reason why Schuurman decided to return to Southeast Asia earlier this year. Accompanied by his son, Jeff Schuurman, and his daughter, Sonja Girod, Schuurman traveled to the villages, cities and battlefields that for one year of his life left such a strong impression.

"What a difference 40 years makes," said Schuurman, who is a certified nurse anesthetist. "The people there are very friendly and I felt completely safe. It was an amazing experience and I would go back if I could afford it."

It was during a conversation with his wife, Rosie, that Schuurman decided to take the trip. His son, Jeff, is a historian of sorts and Sonja just wanted to go because it was a place her father had served. Schuurman didn't have any expectations when the trio took off from the United States in March of this year. But in retrospect he is glad he made the trip.

In 1968 it was a different story.

After graduating from high school, Schuurman admitted he didn't have very good grades. He didn't quite know what to do with himself but he was certain he didn't want to get drafted to Vietnam. It's not that he didn't agree with the war. Schuurman said he really didn't have a strong opinion either way. He just knew he didn't want to be fighting in the jungles so he tried to join the Navy.

Schuurman had a keen interest in medicine so he decided to stray from his original Navy course and join the Marine Corps as a corpsman, or medic. When he was running for cover on that first day "in country," Schuurman was kicking himself for allowing this to happen. Oh well, he thought, just make the best of the situation.

The siege of Khe Sanh lasted five months, 18 days from Jan. 21, 1968 thru July 9, 1968. It was the prelude to the Tet Offensive, the massive invasion of South Vietnam by North Vietnamese troops and Viet Cong guerillas that began January 30, 1968. Schuurman found himself in April of 1968 as a corpsman with a Marine artillery battery. Schuurman also found out quickly that fire bases where artillery units are based are magnets for enemy ordinance.

"It is kinda funny how when you get there and for the next five or six months you are running around jumping at every sound," Schuurman said. "After awhile you get numb to what is going on around you. But when you get "short," that is when your tour is nearing completion and you can go home, you get jumpy again."

On his recent trip, Schuurman wasn't jumpy. In fact, he found revisiting the locations where he once served enthralling. While standing on paved roads with modern automobiles zooming by, Schuurman could see the wasteland of a fire base with pock-marked holes where enemy shells had tilled the ground with the smell of cordite in the air. He remembered how he felt the stout hand of fear grip his soul each time he heard the whine of an incoming shell or the whoosh of a rocket before it impacted, throwing deadly shrapnel through the air at twice the speed of sound. Now, nothing but the smell of car exhaust and the honking of a horn.

"I don't suffer from PTSD (Post Traumatic Stress Disorder) like so many other veterans," Schuurman said. "I don't know why. I guess it was the way I viewed everything back then. But I understand why many vets do suffer from that. I just basically accepted that whatever happened to me, happened. There wasn't anything I could really do about it."

But some of it may have been fate or destiny.

On one occasion, Schuurman was supposed to join a convoy from the fire base to travel down a road to retrieve more medical supplies. He told the driver to stop by his hooch, or tent, to get something he forgot. The truck continued on without him and hit a mine that exploded right where Schuurman would have been sitting in the truck.

Schuurman didn't leave Vietnam unscathed, however. At another fire base, at a place Marines called the Rockpile, he earned his Purple Heart. The Rockpile was really a mountain jutting out of the surrounding green triple canopy jungle. At the top a forward artillery observer could call in supporting fire for many miles around. Naturally, the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong didn't like Americans being there.

"There was a fire base at the bottom of the mountain and on the fire base was a very good bunker where the fire control center was," Schuurman said. "This bunker was the safest place to be when we got shelled so naturally I always ran into it whenever it started raining explosives."

It was during one of these rain storms of rockets and shells that Schuurman and a young lieutenant decided to make some Kool-Aid. What else were they going to do, Schuurman said. A rocket hit the bunker dead center and Schuurman got shrapnel in his head. And the Kool-Aid spilled all over the floor of the bunker. Despite his injury, Schuurman said he went out after the shelling and tended to the wounded. When asked if this selfless act should have included another medal besides the Purple Heart, Schuurman said, "There were guys all over the place who did what was needed to be done. I was no different. I did what my country had trained me to do."

Even though he was a corpsman, his country taught Schuurman how to kill as well. During the trip in March he came face to face with scores of Vietnamese war veterans who had fought against the Americans and their allies. It was hard for Schuurman to think that decades ago these people were trying to kill him and his friends while Schuurman's friends were intent on doing the same to them.

"There was no animosity among us," Schuurman said. "We laughed, told stories, and drank together. We could be friends now and I think I made some friends while I was there. It is the leaders of countries who make the wars. If it were left up to us, the men on the ground, we'd just try to get along without all the fighting. I didn't then, and I certainly don't now, have a hatred for the Vietnamese people."

After his tour of duty, Schuurman, who was born in Iowa but grew up in Denver, Colo., was living in Wisconsin when he met his wife, Rosie. After graduating college, the couple moved around for a few years before settling down in Meridian 20 years ago.

In many ways the trip to Vietnam was the closing of one chapter and opening of another in Schuurman's life. He said he feels he is a much better person for going over to a place that, not necessarily haunted him, but preoccupied a part of him for so many years. He now feels the trip was well worth the effort and expense and he is pleased to have taken it with his son and daughter.

"I am glad I went," Schuurman said. "It really wasn't a priority for me to go but the closer we got to starting the trip the more I was looking forward to it. I really enjoyed it."

It is during this holiday season, Thanksgiving, that Schuurman said his experience there has actually given him reasons to be thankful in the here and now.

OBIT

KENNETH L. REINESCH USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN
BRAVO CO 1/26 3RD PLT

Kenneth Lawrence Reinesch was born on January 22, 1947 to Albert and Margaret (Kindred)Reinesch in Plankinton, SD. He farmed with his family on the family farm in White Lake until 1966, when he enlisted in the United States Marine Corps. Ken served two combat tours in Vietnam and was wounded in action on June 6, 1967. Ken was honorably discharged from the United States Marine Corps in 1971. He married Constance Moeller on October 2, 1971 in White Lake. From this marriage, his two children, Jodi (Ruden) and Joel were born in 1973 and 1976, respectively. He worked for the Chamberlain Police Department starting in 1971 until he was hired as a patrol officer with the Mitchell Police Department in Mitchell, SD. Ken was a Detective with the Mitchell Police Department for many years and was named the Law Enforcement Officer of the Year in 1979. Ken worked for the Mitchell Police Department from 1972 until 1988. Also in 1988, he married Sue Murley. He ran his own private investigation business and was a certified polygrapher. He then worked for Davison County from 1989 until his retirement in 2002. Never one to sit around the house, Ken then managed the Mitchell American Legion Post 18 shortly after his retirement and then went to work for Lifequest in 2005 and remained there until the time of his death. On December 31, 1999, Ken was married to Sherri Hildebrand.

Ken was a life-time member of Post 18 and the Mitchell chapters of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and Disabled American Veterans and the Military Order of the Purple Heart. He held nearly every executive position with Post 18, including Commander. He was honored with numerous Veteran of the Year awards and was named the District 6 Legionnaire of the Year in 2007. He was a past Chef De Gare of the Post 18 40/8. Ken also was a member of the Knights of Columbus and the Corn Palace Detachment of the Marine Corps League.

Ken was fiercely proud of his service in Vietnam, the title of Marine and his unwavering patriotism. He devoted thousands of hours in service to his fellow veterans and also to the community of Mitchell. Ken was instrumental is raising the funds for the first DAV van in Mitchell to be used for the transport of disabled veterans to and from their doctor's appointments. He also was very active for many of years in the Mitchell Exchange Club where he gained a number of lifelong friends through that association. He held, until his final breath, the most special kind of love for his fellow Marines whom he served with in Vietnam, especially all of the men of 3rd Platoon, Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines, many of which he reunited with recently in Mitchell. Semper Fi, brothers.

Ken loved his work in the woodshop at Lifequest and tremendously enjoyed working alongside the clients there. In his final years, he relished most his title of grandfather and loved his four grandchildren immensely.

Ken is survived by his wife, Sherri and his two children, daughter, Jodi (Corey Elward) and son, Joel (Liza) Reinesch, all of Mitchell and his four grandchildren, Shawn Ruden, Blake Ruden, Coy Reinesch and Emma Reinesch. The youngest of the family, he is survived by his three loving sisters, Betty (Dick) Vant Hul of Sioux Falls, Mary (Leroy) Persson of Mitchell and Leanne (Don) Bradwisch of Loomis. Ken also is survived by his mother-in-law, Doris Hildebrand, Mitchell, brother-in-law, Craig (Amy) Hildebrand of Mitchell, sister-in-law, Deb (Tim) Havrevold of Minneapolis, MN, and sister-in-law, Gladys Reinesch, Mitchell and 20 nieces and nephews. Ken also leaves behind his loyal companion, Peanut, with whom he spent countless hours side-by-side. Ken is preceded in death by his parents, grandparents, Christ and Susan Reinesch and Napoleon and Elsie Kindred, one brother, James, and father-in-law, Duane Hildebrand.

DOC TOPMILLER CEREMONY

By Steven Orr

"Doc" Robert J. Topmiller Memorial Dedication Ceremony
Veterans Day 2013
Eastern Kentucky University
Richmond, Kentucky

November 11th, Veterans Day, is a special day every year, a day for Americans to express their appreciation for and to recognize the service and sacrifice of all military veterans. It is a time when veterans remember and reflect upon their military experiences. I had the honor and privilege to share Veterans Day 2013 with three old friends, three Khe Sanh veterans, as we witnessed and participated in a dedication ceremony for "Doc" Bob Topmiller at Eastern Kentucky University (EKU)

Navy Corpsman and Khe Sanh veteran "Doc" Topmiller achieved his doctorate degree at the University of Kentucky and subsequently became a distinguished, respected, and well-liked History professor at EKU. "Doc" cared for so many in both his military and his civilian life, all the time himself suffering from post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). "Doc" took his life in 2008 as the demons of war snatched him away from us

Veterans Day 2013 brought together members of" Doc's" family, along with friends, colleagues, former students and teachers, as well as various campus and area dignitaries to EKU's Powell Plaza to witness the dedication of the Robert J. Topmiller Memorial.

The early afternoon ceremony occurred under a sunny, blue sky of a mild Kentucky Fall day. Students and faculty bustled about the EKU campus with many stopping to observe and listen to the EKU Veterans Day ceremony conducted on the deck above Powell Plaza. The Topmiller Memorial Dedication ceremony followed immediately in Powell Plaza.

Doc's wife, Terri, daughter Jamie, grand-children Ross and Aiden were seated as harpist Dr. Carolyn Dupont and violist Jeremy Mulholland provided a musical prelude. Khe Sanh veterans, Mike Archer, Michael Reath, Allen Ferg, and I, assumed our seats as Dr. Todd Hartch opened the ceremony.

Dr. Hartch spoke fondly of his personal and professional relationship with "Doc". Dr. Hartch informed the audience that the ceremony was to, not only recognize Dr. Topmiller and to dedicate the memorial that bears his name, but also to remember EKU student and Iraqi war veteran, Robert Hundley-Doria, who took his life in 2010 as a result of PTSD.

The program continued with three speakers, friends and colleagues of "Doc" Topmiller, Dr. Peter Alegi, Kirby Neil, and Mike Archer, each eloquently and poignantly shared stories and memories of "Doc" Topmiller's dedication, honor, courage, compassion, and sense of humor.

Dr. Ezra England of the Humanities Department shared his memories of Robert Hundley-Doria. As his advisor and mentor, Dr. England spoke of a fine young man with such great potential, but who struggled with the horrors and memories of war.

Members of the Topmiller and Hundley-Doria families unveiled the gray granite memorial plaque revealing the following inscription:

"Wars never end for those who participate in them"

Red Clay on My Boots: Encounters with Khe Sanh 1968 – 2005 Robert J. Topmiller/ (1968 – 2008) Professor 2000 – 2008)

Positioned in front of the memorial plaque are two long benches, the seats made of the same gray granite stone with bold, white lettering. On the front edge of the left bench is inscribed: Robert Hundley-Doria 1984-2010 and the front edge of the right bench reads: "for those who remain nameless".

The ceremony closed with the playing of "Amazing Grace" and "Taps". EKU hosted a reception immediately following the memorial ceremony.

The ceremony and the entire experience at EKU was such a rewarding and enlightening experience for me and, I think, for the other Khe Sanh veterans in attendance. "Doc" Topmiller was so very special to so many people in so many different ways and it is ever apparent that he is missed by all who knew him.

The vision to erect a memorial to Bob Topmiller and to other EKU veterans who ended their lives as a result of PTSD was brought forward by Lt. Col. Brett Morris (USA Ret.), EKU Director of Admissions and former Director of EKU Veterans Programs. Dr. Christiane Taylor, History Department Chair, embraced the project and joined Lt/Col. Morris in design development, selection of site, and dedication ceremony format. Faculty members supported the project and assisted in a variety of ways. Dr. Taylor expressed to me that Administrative Assistant Diane Tyer "...is a God-send when you have to organize events". Diane was involved in nearly every aspect of the project.

The memorial site is not yet complete. There are plans being designed and funds sought to erect a bronze missing man statue (boots, bayoneted rifle, and helmet) on the ledge just above the memorial plaque.

THANK YOU to everyone at Eastern Kentucky University who was involved in the Robert J. Topmiller Memorial and for bringing public awareness to the debilitating and often life-ending effect post traumatic stress disorder has upon our military veterans.

If you wish to contribute to the "Doc" Robert J. Topmiller Veterans' Memorial Fund donations may be sent in care of: Dr. Chris Taylor, Department of History, 323 Keith, Eastern Kentucky University, Richmond, Kentucky, 40475. Engraved commemorative brick pavers are also being sold to raise funds and order forms are available

REMEMBERING LLOYD SCUDDER BRAVO CO 1/26

By Craig Tourte

What and honor and privilege it was to have read several past articles I had written referenced in the latest edition (Issue 83) of Red Clay Magazine acknowledging the loss of Lloyd W. Scudder. Lloyd's courage, sacrifice and perseverance were certainly an inspiration in my life and I'll continue to tell his story of bravery and survival and to reference his character and his example of being extraordinary - I'll miss him terribly.

I drove up to Mt. Shasta/Weed California to attend the November 11th, 2013 Veterans Day Memorial Service at the "Living Memorial Sculpture Garden" of which "Khe Sanh Veterans Inc." is a sponsor with that name inscribed into the Granite Sponsor Wall - much appreciation to our President Tom Eichler. There is a memorial service each Memorial and Veterans Day attended by several hundred throughout the community. I last attended the Memorial Day Service on Monday, May 27th, 2013. Khe Sanh Veteran Paul J. Turnbull had recently passed and we attended to honor his name being placed on the Memorial Wall. Dennis Smith, Lloyd Scudder, Kenneth "Buzz" Sawyer, David Tonick, Tom Horchler, Steve Wiese and myself all stood next to Paul's inscribed name to honor his memory.

As I sat amongst those attending this Veterans Day Service my thoughts went back to what seemed like just a few months prior when Lloyd was sitting just a few feet from me and together we honored those who had too soon departed us. And now Lloyd was gone. I hadn't realized it at the time but after this service Dennis pointed out that Lloyd's name had been inscribed into the granite wall some years before and he directed me to that location. It was just and fitting that his name had been placed on the wall and that he had been able to view it inscribed in this most hallowed location. I'll add here that any living and/or deceased Honorable Discharged veterans name can be inscribed. I had my name along with my now deceased - veterans of WWII - father, uncle and father-in-law's name inscribed into the granite wall.

Those who attended our Khe Sanh Reunion in Nashville this year will remember the photograph of Lloyd placed on the table for all to sign. Lloyds wife Pam also attended the Veterans Day Memorial Service at the Sculpture Garden and proudly showed us that signed, framed photograph of Lloyd which she had received from the Khe Sanh Veterans. Pam was visible moved holding the photograph and I know she was very appreciative of all who signed in his memory.

AN AMERICAN HERO

Before he was a Pirate, a Brave and a Red Sox, Chuck Goggin was a Raider

By Steve Wulf ESPN.com

The first-time visitor to Cooperstown enjoyed walking through the Hall of Fame gallery last Memorial Day weekend with his two adult sons.

There were more than a few guys he played with: Don Sutton, Bill Mazeroski, Willie Stargell, Hank Aaron, Carl Yastrzemski, Carlton Fisk, Jim Rice, Juan Marichal. There was the plaque for Roberto Clemente, who got his 3,000th and last hit for the same team and on the same day that the visitor had gotten his first major league hit. There was Phil Niekro, whose no-hitter he saved with a diving stop at second in the eighth inning. There was Dave Winfield, who hit that ball. There were two of his managers (Eddie Mathews and Tommy Lasorda) and a player he managed, Rickey Henderson. There was even a player he was once traded for: Jim Bunning.

Vietnam Veteran Chuck Goggin Shared a Special Day with Roberto Clemente in 1972

"I made those guys," says Chuck Goggin with a laugh. "Seriously, it was wonderful seeing my teammates immortalized. You know, I also had hits off Bob Gibson, Tom Seaver and Steve Carlton."

Goggin certainly got a lot out of his 72 games in the three years he played in the majors. But the real reason he was in Cooperstown can be found on the back of his 1974 Topps baseball card (#457), the only one he ever had.

On the front is Goggin in his Atlanta Braves uniform. Turn it over, look at his lifetime batting record, and you will see "IN MILITARY SERVICE" for the years 1966 and 1967. And under his vital statistics, there's one of those little cartoons Topps put on the cards back then. Goggin's is of a player with two medals on his chest, along with this legend: "CHUCK WAS AWARDED THE PURPLE HEART & BRONZE STAR IN VIET NAM."

Charles Francis Goggin, born on July 7, 1945, is the most decorated Vietnam veteran in major league history, and the Hall of Fame had invited him to its Classic Old-Timers Game because The Wall That Heals, a replica of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, was being brought to Cooperstown as part of the Memorial Day festivities. "We lost 38 men in my outfit," he says. "Men who did not make it to the age of 21, all killed in my 13 months in Vietnam." That outfit was Lima Company, 3rd Battalion, 3rd

Marine Regiment — a legendary band that was known as Ripley's Raiders, after company commander Capt. (later Col.) John Ripley. Before Goggin was a Pirate, a Brave and a Red Sox, he was a Raider, and therein lies a story of resilience and determination and luck — not all of it good. His tale is as rich as any in Cooperstown, or Hollywood, for that matter. Think "Forrest Gump" meets "The Rookie."

Goggin in a rare moment in Vietnam with Legendary Captain John Ripley

Goggin grew up in Pompano Beach, Fla., using sports as an escape from an unhappy home life. "Baseball was my compass," he says. The Dodgers signed him as an infielder in 1964, right out of high school, and he split the year between Salisbury of the Western Carolina League and St. Petersburg in the Florida State League.

For someone born on 7/7, Goggin certainly had his share of misfortune. He hurt his knee that first season and had offseason surgery before reporting to Santa Barbara in the California League in '65. While there, he and some teammates, including Don Sutton, decided to join the Army Reserve, but Goggin was classified as 4F because of the knee surgery and told not to worry about being drafted. That November, after a season in which he hit 10 homers with 65 RBIs, he got his draft notice and discovered his 4F had been crossed out and replaced by a 1A.

As the Vietnam War intensified, the Marine Corps found that they had too few good men, so Goggin was drafted into the Marines and reported to Parris Island for boot camp in February 1966. At Camp Lejeune, he was trained to be an infantry rifleman, and by July, he was in Vietnam as a private first class in L Company, 3rd Battalion, 3rd Regiment. "The fact that I was a baseball player impressed nobody," says Goggin. "They hadn't heard of me."

In December '66, Ripley made Goggin, by then a corporal, a platoon radio operator. The position carried a lot of weight figuratively (he had to be his commander's shadow) and literally (the radio weighed 30 pounds).

Goggin, Right on Shoulder Played Key Role In Phil Niekro's No Hitter on August 5, 1973

In a yet-to-be-released documentary about the war, based on the book "Ride the Thunder" by Richard Botkin, Goggin describes an encounter near the DMZ on March 1, 1967, in which Ripley instructed Goggin's platoon to "Fix bayonets." Says Goggin, "I don't think troops have done this since the Civil War … Captain Ripley gives us the order to charge, and I've never been so proud of 45 guys in my life. One or two guys start yelling, like a rebel yell, and pretty soon all 45 of us are yelling. We walked right over that hill — didn't run — firing with our rifles at our hips. It would have been an awesome sight if you were making a movie out of this."

But that charge was only the precursor to a March 2 battle that Goggin described as "Frazier and Ali." L Company had happened upon an entire North Vietnamese regiment, and the firefight that ensued is described in harrowing detail in the Botkin book. Goggin, who had to assume command of his platoon that day, sums it up this way: "At 10 a.m., there were 250 of us and thousands of them. By 5 p.m. we were down to 15 men who weren't dead or wounded. And we won."

A few days later, the Marines read a newspaper account of the battle under a headline that referred to "Ripley's Raiders," and the name stuck. Goggin received a Cross of Gallanty from the South Vietnamese Army for his role in that battle and was promoted to sergeant. He was awarded a Bronze Star from the Marines for a later engagement.

But bad luck hit him again on April 13, 1967. On that day, he stepped on a land mine in the jungle along the Ho Chi Minh Trail. As he told the Louisville Courier Journal a few years later, "I heard this thing explode and could feel the shock hit me. It lifted me up in the air 8 to 10 feet. The first thing I could remember thinking was, 'Damn, I've stepped on a mine' ... Then I thought, 'What if I should come down on another one?'"

He didn't, but he did take 14 significant shrapnel wounds in his legs and back and left shoulder. He still had to walk three hours out of the jungle to Highway 9, where he was picked up and transported to receive medical treatment. Goggin spent several weeks aboard the hospital ship USS Repose, but that gave him time to steel his determination to get back to baseball. Once he recovered, though, he resumed command of his platoon.

At one point, Ripley offered Goggin a commission, but that would have meant putting baseball off for another year. His tour of duty was completed on Aug. 20, and upon his discharge on Feb. 10, 1968, he almost immediately traded in his Marine Corps uniform for one with "Dodgers" on the front. "The Dodgers did me a humongous service," says Goggin. "They allowed me to report with the pitchers and catchers on Feb. 19, which gave me extra time to get in shape."

Playing for Roger Craig in Double-A Albuquerque that year, Goggin hit .247 with 14 stolen bases, which was pretty good for a guy who would have to pull a long-lost shard of shrapnel out of his body every once in a while. Ray Lamb, who would go on to pitch in the majors for the Dodgers and Indians, was Goggin's roommate in the minors. "Some of us knew he had been in Vietnam," says Lamb, who still keeps in touch. "But if it ever came up, he never bragged, never came off as the hero he was. His back was sore because of the heavy radio he had to carry over there, but it was never an excuse."

Even in a baseball uniform, Goggin was a Marine through and through. In order to make himself more valuable, Goggin tried switch-hitting in the Instructional League for his manager, Tommy Lasorda, and indeed, he was hitting .336 and leading the league in stolen bases when bad luck intervened again. He broke his ankle sliding into second on a steal. "The doctor told me I would never play again," says Goggin.

"I remember driving him to the airport after the injury," says Lamb. "He had a cast up to his chest, it was so bad. Other guys might have thought about quitting, but not Chuck."

When he did return to the field, for Triple-A Spokane in the middle of the 1969 season, he hit .318 and made himself marketable enough to be traded, straight up, for Pirates pitcher and future Sen. Jim Bunning. But Goggin didn't have a good year for Triple-A Columbus in 1970, so, fearing that his value was slipping as a utility player, he went to Pirates farm director Harding Peterson with a proposal: Send me down to Waterbury to learn to become a catcher. "The only thing I asked for in return," says Goggin, "was two catcher's mitts. I couldn't afford them at $150 apiece."

He made the Eastern League All-Star team as a catcher in 1971 and was promoted to Triple-A Charleston, where he batted .316. The next season, 1972, he hit .297 for Charleston and finished second in the International League MVP voting to a guy named Dwight Evans. On Sept. 8, the Pirates called him up to fulfill the dream he harbored while on board the hospital ship.

But while the per diem sure beat field rations, manager Bill Virdon didn't use him much because the Pirates were still in a pennant race. On Sept. 30, with the division title clinched and Clemente stuck at hit No. 2,999, Virdon batted Goggin leadoff, playing second in place of Bill Mazeroski.

Goggin led off with a single to right off left-hander Jon Matlack, and second-base umpire Doug Harvey — another Hall of Famer — called time to give Goggin the ball from his first major league hit. He got another hit off Matlack but was erased on a force with Clemente in the on-deck circle. It was in the next inning that Clemente doubled off Matlack for No. 3,000.

After the game Clemente congratulated Goggin, who says, "I told him, 'At this rate, it's going to take me 1,500 years to catch you.'" A reporter suggested that a photographer take a picture of the two of them together, with their respective milestone baseballs. (The photo looks remarkably like one taken of Goggin and Ripley on a quiet day in Vietnam.)

Goggin played winter ball in Puerto Rico that offseason, so he saw and felt firsthand the despair on the island after Clemente's plane went down on New Year's Eve. His death impacted Goggin on the field, as well. Because the Pirates decided to move catcher Manny Sanguillen to right field for the '73 season, they bolstered their catching corps and reduced Goggin to an afterthought. Sent down to Charleston, he asked GM Joe Brown to trade him or release him, and Brown complied by selling him to the Atlanta Braves on May 24.

Goggin hit .289 in 64 games for manager Eddie Mathews that year, earning him that Topps card and inclusion in — ironically enough — the band of bench players known in Atlanta as "F Troop," after the TV sitcom about a comical cavalry unit. More significantly, Goggin got to participate in a little history: Phil Niekro's no-hitter against the Padres on Aug. 5.

"I was playing second as a defensive replacement for Davey Johnson," says Goggin. "Winfield hit a shot to my right to lead off the eighth, and I caught it on one hop and threw to first to get him. Davey was a much better player than I was, but I had better range at that time. Phil's always been nice enough to give me credit for saving that no-hitter for him."

Goggin also saw Hank Aaron hit his 713th home run, leaving him one shy of Babe Ruth, and Goggin was looking forward to witnessing a little more history with the Braves in '74. But wouldn't you know it? After surviving enemy fire, a land mine, a horrendous ankle injury and the caprice of baseball, he was done in by a situp. While warming up in the outfield during spring training, he ruptured a disc in his back. Traded to the Red Sox for catcher Vic Correll, Goggin struggled at Triple-A Pawtucket and got into only two games after he was called up to the Red Sox with Jim Rice and Fred Lynn that September.

That was the last time Goggin played in the majors. He hit .296 in his 72 games, while playing five different positions. He coached and managed in the minors, first for the Braves, then for the Reds — Yankees pitching coach Larry Rothschild was one of his players in Triple-A Nashville. In the winter of 1978-79, he won Mexico's Pacific League championship with the Navojoa Mayos, who had a young outfielder named Rickey Henderson.

Goggin says that "not too many" of his teammates or players knew about his Marine exploits. "You have to remember," he says, "I was playing at a time when America was trying to forget about Vietnam."

After moving into the private sector, he got into local politics in Nashville, and that led to his appointment by President Ronald Reagan as a U.S. marshal for the Middle District of Tennessee, a post he held from 1983 until 1995. He married a woman who had a son from a previous marriage, and he watched with pride as his wife, Wendy Goggin, became chief counsel to the Drug Enforcement Administration. They've been married 30 years, and their two sons have blessed them with four grandchildren.

In recent years, Goggin has devoted time and energy to building a memorial for Ripley's Raiders at the Marine Corps Museum in Triangle, Va. "We actually purchased four boulders from the area in Quang Tri Province between the Razorbacks and the Rockpile, and had them shipped over here," says Goggin. "We dedicated the memorial on March 7, 2012."

On the monument are the names of the Marines of Lima Company who were lost between 2/19/67 and 11/01/67: William Branock, Peter Liberati, Johnnie Mason, John Barker, Richard Blinder, Forrest Goodwin, Richard Graham, John Hanscom, Jackie Harris, Terry Heekin, Robert Martin, John O'Don-

"They may not be as famous as the men in Cooperstown," says Goggin, "but they're heroes nonetheless. I wish they could have walked through the Hall of Fame with me."

As for Goggin, he doesn't claim hero status for himself, or bemoan his fate.

"Not many men can claim to be a Marine and a major leaguer," he says. "If I do have one regret, it's this: I never got to show people the ballplayer I might've become. I was just too banged up, from the war, from the injuries and all, to answer the question of how good I could have been.

"But right now, I'm sitting in a chair on the North Carolina coast, looking at a beautiful sloop going down the Intracoastal Waterway, enjoying the day. And I'm talking to you about a life not many people have had. I am a very lucky man."

HAROLD W. JURY USMC
KHE SANH VETERAN A/1/13

Harold operated a 155 at Khe Sanh. He spent 13 years in the Corp. My wife and I were friends of Harold and his wife when we retired and moved to Panama. We were next door neighbors when they rented the home next to ours up in the mountains of Panama. I was USAF in Panama in 1968 and Harold had been stationed at Marine Barracks Rodman, CZ but we didn't meet till 2008 in Panama. Thanks you. Chester Oakes

Harold Wesley Jury, was born Oct. 2, 1946 in Oklahoma City. He was the 8th child of Joe and Linnie January Jury of Moore. He is preceded in death by his parents, two stillborn siblings, brothers Albert, LeRoy, and Clarence. Harold graduated from

Moore High School in 1964 and later joined the US Marine Corps. He served in Vietnam and retired as a Sergeant after 11 years of service. He began working at Dayton Tire and Rubber Co. in Oklahoma City in 1975 and retired from Firestone as a supervisor in 2007. Harold married the love of his life, Dolores Sanchez in Panama in February 1970. They were currently residing in Panama on their acreage in Moore, on the family home place. Harold loved to share his cooking skills with his large extended family, his brother's and sister's families, and many cousins and friends. We will miss the family celebrations he loved to host.

He is survived by his wife, Dolores, daughter, Lynnelle Murray and husband Randall of Edmond, and his son Michael serving in the US Coast Guard in Connecticut. Other survivors include his two sisters, Oleta Tolen and Zelma Young of Moore, brother, Kenneth Jury and wife Claudia of Houston, TX., and sister-in-law Genivia Jury of Oklahoma City. Lynnelle and husband and their four children, Colten, Gavin, Madeleine, and Michael and daughter, Avery were able to go to Panama for his funeral service on January 17.

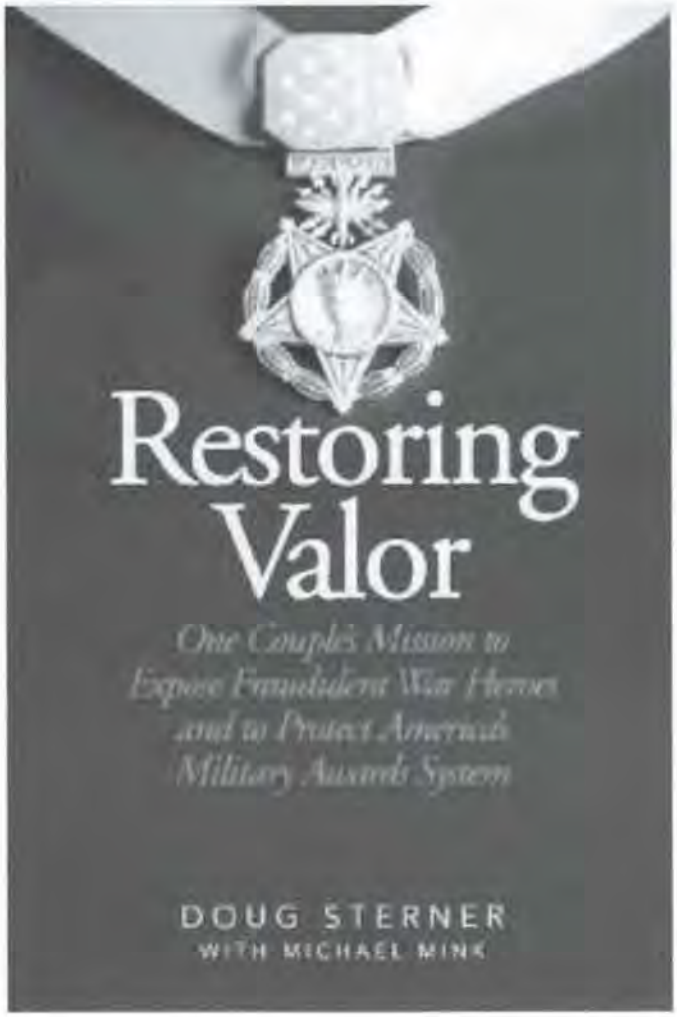
Restoring Valor: One Couple's Mission to Expose Fraudulent War Heroes and Protect America's Military Awards System Hardcover

by Doug Sterner (Author) , Pam Sterner (Author)



Stolen valor occurs when a person lies about receiving military decorations that he or she has in fact never earned. It has become a major societal problem that has been discussed numerous times in the news and, most recently, by the US Supreme Court. According to The New York Times, the Department of Veterans Affairs paid disability benefits to more than six hundred people falsely claiming to have been POWs in the Vietnam and Persian Gulf wars. The number of stolen valor cases reported to the FBI has tripled in the last decade. In fact, more imposters lie about earning high military declarations for battlefield bravery than the actual number of real -life hero recipients. These imposters trade on tales and the trappings of military valor to secure privileges such as career advancements and even unearned veterans' benefits.

Because officially recognized valor is a calling card of trust and courage, many of these imposters "steal" it to invade the lives of people and institutions, for personal gain and often with criminal results. In Restoring Valor, Doug Sterner provides riveting case studies of the stolen valor imposters he's investigated and exposed, and the serious crimes — including murder — they've committed. He chronicles the evolution of stolen valor from the inception of the republic to today. Sterner demonstrates why the federal law he and his wife Pam helped to enact, called the Stolen Valor Act, is necessary.

Dear Mr. Eichler,

With every magazine that arrives at our home Bill and I would sit down together and read the pages from cover to cover, and then he would share stories of his time in Khe Sanh. There were tears shed by both us and of course the "Why me?" I never had an answer for him but I held him close and together we cried and I consoled him to the best of my ability.

Today the magazine arrived and there was no Bill to share it with, however, I wanted to keep the tradition going and read each story, when I came upon pages 75 and 76, and saw the story of his death and obituary! Needless to say the tears began, and even though I had written his obit, it was as if it were for the first time.

Thank you for remembering him, he was a fine man whom I cherished in our 8 short years together. He was the love of my life.

God Bless you each and every one of you for your service to our country.

WEB BRIEFS

By Craig W. Tourte

I have read quite a lot about Khe Sanh, there is much information on the subject, the battles for, in and around the hills and of course the long and arduous Siege. Numerous books, essays and articles and well as web sites and now the documentary film "Bravo, Common, Uncommon Valor" is available for purchase to those who wish to educate themselves about that most difficult and significant battle, one even noted in President Osama's first inaugural address. Many who survived those trying times have been asked "what was it like" with the response being almost a wordless and personal emotional explanation not clearly understood by those asking. How can one explain the unexplainable to those who have never had that personal experience except from movies, books or the sometimes weird and mindless ramblings of pseudo heroes and questionable participants

I'll reference Mike Fishbaugh's POST of November 9th regarding the "Idaho Interview" in which a local commentator interviewed Ken & Betty Rodgers and Steve Wiese about the documentary and Ken & Steve's Khe Sanh experience. I have my own copy of the documentary but have not viewed it. I have seen the documentary twice and each time it takes a little something out of me. When I think I'll take another look at it, I find I just cannot. Steve asked me to view the Idaho television interview. I reluctantly did so because he asked me, but I certainly was not emotionally prepared to once again visit those emotional and descriptive interviews

The interviews contained statements, comments and observation that I have heard before, but out of respect for Steve I continued to watch because I knew it was important to him. Then the inevitable was asked of Steve in reference to his escaping the Ghost Patrol ambush and "what it was like" making his way back to the Khe Sanh Base. Steve's response was profound and direct and could not have been stated better by anyone else. He said, "Like crawling through the dark shadow of night." I sat there in a daze with tears in my eyes; it was an outstanding, not previously pondered and perfect answer to the question that has been asked of many of us. I don't know if Steve's response was meant literally or figuratively, I suspect it may have been a little of both. Never-the-less it was a perfect answer for many of us who have difficulty answering that painfully unanswerable question.

Response by John M. Kaheny

I left Khe Sanh on February 15, 1968 on my extension leave. My tour date had already past. I spent 30days at home watching the TV coverage and reading the news reports. I don't recall anyone asking me what it was like. I did observe that what was being told on the nightly news and the New York Times did not reflect the reality I had experienced. There were NO reports of valor, comradeship, determination, and Marine Corps esprit de corps. The closest thing to interest was the question "why are you going back". I simply said "that's where my friends are". The public really had no idea. That was the fault of the media. Ernie Pyle, Dickey Chappell, God bless them, had left the stage too early. Juarte Kazickas was never recognized for her valor and reporting. Sad but true. The public never knew. Good night Chet! Walter was a joke

OBIT

DENNIS E. BARNETT
USMC HOTEL CO 2/26
KHE SANH VETERAN

Born on July 14,1947 to the late Oman Barnett and Frances Hornsby Barnett in Graham, Texas. He has two brothers, Terry and Kelly Don Barnett. Attended Crestview Elementary School, Graham Junior High and Graham High School in Graham, Texas. Received training at the Marine Corps Recruit Depot in San Diego, CA. His first duty station was at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, where he was assigned as a Marine Guard at Makalapa Gate. He became the Squad Leader, supervising the honor guards assigned to the USS Arizona. They wore their dress blues, 24/7, directing VIP visitors while at the USS Arizona. On August 15, 1967 he arrived in Vietnam where he was assigned to Hotel Company, 2nd Battalion 26th Marines. He fought during the Tet Offensive at the Khe Sanh Siege. He was medivac to Danang on May 9, 1968 and later sent to Camp Pendleton, CA. In 1969, he then received his orders for his next duty station to Mare Island Naval Shipyard, Vallejo, CA.

In November 1968, he met Florie at her apartment on Florida & Sonoma when he was searching for an apartment rental. It was love at first sight for him. On February 21, 1969 they were married in Jacksboro, TX. Soon after they were stationed at Sangley Point Naval Air Station, Cavite City, Philippines from August 1969 until the base closure in November 1970.

He was sent back to Camp Pendleton until his honorable discharge. In 1971, Denny and Florie moved to Vallejo and started their career with the Department of Veterans Affairs until they retired. It took ten years to produce the love of his life ... their one and only son, Daniel Barnett. He enjoyed the annual camping with a bunch of longtime friends and relatives at Dillon Beach and fishing with his son Daniel and John Tyquiengco. The highlights of his life were receiving a yearly invitation to attend the December 7 Pearl Harbor Commemoration and the Vietnam Veteran Hotel Company Marine Corps Reunion.

Denny was an avid reader of Philippine history and novels relating to law enforcement. He enjoyed watching Filipino movies especially his hero, Dolphy. He became very active in civic as well as political activities in Vallejo. He loved to mingle with and assisted fellow veterans in applying for their benefits. Denny's life became complete when Daniel found and married his soulmate Rizalene (Zalee) at North Shore, HI last August 16, 2012. On top of it all, he was a fast food junkie and loved to hang out at the casino.

Denny joined the Lord Almighty peacefully on June 21 at 2:55 am, three hours after Florie's birthday, under his own terms.

God took the strength of a mountain,
The majesty of a tree.
The warmth of a summer sun,
The calm of a quiet sea.
The generous soul of nature,
The comforting arm of night.
The wisdom of the ages,
The power of the eagle's flight.
Then God combined these qualities,
There was nothing more to add.
His masterpiece was now complete,
He lovingly called it, Dad.

OBIT

WILLIAM JAMES MILES (RET. COL. USAF) AKA WILDMAN WILLIE, THE COLONEL 1923 – 2013

William James Miles' progressive outlook on life exhibited such curiosity, wit, and intelligence that chaplains admired him and waitresses swooned. He died peacefully on Wednesday, April 24 of natural causes. He was 89. Born and raised in Seattle, Bill graduated from St. John's grade school and Lincoln High School in 1941. He went on to earn a bachelor's degree in Business from the University of Washington and a Masters in Business Administration from Georgetown University.

As a boy he covered his walls with photos of Ginger Rogers, read comic books about WWI pilots, played with the neighborhood kids at Ross Playfield and called his mother by her first name. Following his dream of being a pilot, he graduated from Army Air Forces Pilot School in March of 1944. This was the beginning of his long and proud military career. During WWII he was stationed in Italy and flew P-38 missions over Eastern Europe. In 1948, he and his gregarious wife Madelyn met at the Cozy Corner Tavern on Whidbey Island and were married within two years. Bill was recalled to active duty during the Korean War and stationed in Japan with his wife and children. His military career also took him to Tacoma, Oklahoma, Alabama, and the Philippines/Viet Nam where he was Commander of the 29th tactical airlift squadron based at Clark Air Base, Philippines. The squadron operated from Tan Son Nhut Air Base, Viet Nam where he spent most of his time flying missions that involved personnel transport, equipment and supply airlift and airdrop, aeromedical evacuation and bombing missions. He was proud that none of his men perished.

"Those of us who served with and under him always felt that he enjoyed what he was doing and he enjoyed being associated with the rest of us.....especially those of us who were subordinate to him. He trusted us to do our job as best we could and he didn't impose his personal policies or procedures on us – all he asked was to get the job done. Needless to say, we wanted to get the job done for him."

– H. Delbert "Tasty" Frieze

Bill was also stationed in Ohio, and did two tours of The Pentagon where he was Deputy Director of Personnel Programs, regularly presenting at Senate/ House Defense sub-committee hearings. In 1975 he retired and moved the family back to the Northwest. He spent most of his days at the library reading political news, Rolling Stone Magazine, and checking out Tom Robbins' books and foreign films. His kids and their friends thought he was pretty cool and he was a great admirer of his grandchildren's antics and achievements. He was a very much loved husband, dad and (great) grandfather! Politically independent with Kennedy liberal leanings, he believed foremost in the common sense of compassion and human rights. His generous spirit is legendary among family and friends as is his practical thinking and quiet stoicism. In short, he was always there for you.

When Madelyn was diagnosed with Alzheimer's, he lovingly took care of her every need until he reluctantly accepted the fact that she needed to be in assisted living. Even then he was there with her at every meal, every day until her death. William was preceded in death by his parents Harry and Grace Van Well Miles, his wife of 57 years, Madelyn Baldwin, and his sisters and brother and their spouses Bette and Robert Murray, Mary and Guy Graham, and Harry and Florine Miles. His four children survive him: daughters Barbara Miles of Bothell, Sheila Breysse (Matt) of Bothell; Pattie Van Beuzekom (Erik) of Chimacum and son Jay Miles (Theresa) of Bristow, VA. Also surviving are four grandchildren: Chris Miles (Susan), Matt Miles (Dana,) Sarah and Elizabeth Breysse and six great-grandchildren: Hope, Garrett, Cade, Josiah, Makhi, and Malik. He also leaves behind his brother-in-law and his wife, Bill and Bobbie Baldwin, and a rich assortment of nieces and nephews.

A REMBERANCE

By Rich Delotto

SERGEANT WILLIAM "BILL" MALCOLM USA 101ST AIRMOBILE DIVISION VIETNAM KIA 05 MAY 1970

The story of Sergeant Malcolm starts with his birth in 1942. His parents were living in Clifton, NJ. Bill's father served in WWII and Korea as a combat engineer. Bill was an average student, graduating in 1960. He enlisted in the army right after high school. After four months of basic and advanced training he applied for and was accepted into the 3rd Infantry Regiment which guards the Tomb of the Unknown Soldiers at Fort Myers Va.

After less than 3 years of service he rose to SFC and was considered one of the more outstanding Non Commissioned Officers in his unit. Immediately after the assassination of president Kennedy, the 3rd Infantry was put on standby for the burial ceremonies.

On November 23, 1963 Bill was a member of the 24 hour honor guard at the presidents casket. He was relieved for 24 hours on Sunday, but spent the day organizing the 21 gun salute. On Monday November 25, Bill marched his unit into position and ordered the firing sequence at the culmination of the funeral. At the time when most of bill's high school classmates were either working or entering senior year of college ,bill was on national TV serving his country.

In early 1964 Bill re-enlisted and spent 3 years with the 2nd armored division under NATO in West Germany. In 1967 he returned to the states and served as a drill sergeant at Ft Campbell, Ky. In mid 1969 bill volunteered for Vietnam and the 101st Airmobile Division.

He arrived in Vietnam in September. During his combat tour, Bill was awarded both the Bronze & Silver Star Medals, and Combat Infantry Badge. 1ST SGT William Malcolm was killed in action on may 5, 1970 outside Fire Base Veghel, the action for which he was posthumously awarded the Silver Star. For the people who will always remember Bill Malcolm, he was a patriot in peacetime and a hero in wartime.

WEB CHATTER

By Craig Tourte

I was riding in the car with 3 of my male neighbors the other day. All of them are affluent, formally educated and in their late 40's. They are also aware that I am a Vietnam Veteran and a generation older. We are not good friends nor do I hang out with them or make frequent visits to their homes and I am seldom invited to participate in their ping pong, dice and pool games, which is fine with me. I am not particular gregarious and understand completely the lack of an invitation, but they were kind enough to ask me to play golf with them which I foolishly accepted and embarrassed and humiliated myself with my poor skill level against their outstanding play, an error in which I paid a rather high monetary price. Understandably there was not a follow-up invitation to join them in the future.

During the ride home the neighbor sitting next to me asks, "So did you kill anyone in Vietnam?" Now I realize they all had been consuming adult beverage at the golf club and I guess he was under the impression that he was familiar and comfortable enough with me to ask such a question, but frankly I was a bit stunned and just a little insulted, to me such things are not taken or discussed lightly with outsiders. I think it must have taken me a few seconds but I responded "war is a terrible thing." I could have said more, but given the circumstances, I thought that was enough. Feeling friendlier than we actually are, he gave it another attempt by asking the same question, my response was about the same but I added, "...I didn't do anything heroic, I mostly cowered in the trench line," with that, the subject was dropped.

I just hate boastful war stories and don't like to speak about my experiences to outsiders. War is a terrible experience and to be honest, it makes one just a little crazy for a very long time. Not crazy in the commonly understood civilian context of being crazy, but different than those who have not had that experience. I have heard and read the reflection of so many purported Vietnam Veterans that I often cringe after hearing or reading about their very colorful and boastful descriptions of bravely battling and preserving over the enemy. Few acknowledge fear or remembering those who did not survive, many in fact describe being a lone or one of the few survivors.

I thought about the question my neighbor asked and understood that most of the information he has ever received about war was via television. I walked over to his house and lent him a copy of "Bravo, Common Men, Uncommon Valor." I was very clear that I was not a participant in that patrol and that any experience I might have had was not reflected in the documentary, but I wanted him to hear the voices and personal reflections of legitimate brave men, to hear the horror of war in their voices and see the painful anguished remembrance on their faces. A few days later he came over and returned the documentary and didn't say a word, he didn't have too.

EDITOR NOTES:

Our KSV Researcher, Michael Fishbaugh located the back issues of the Sea Tiger Newspaper For the year 1967, in Vietnam. I for one, have never read one. I do not think many of the KSV ever had the opportunity read one either. I am going to republish some of the articles pertaining to KHE SANH. I will attempt to cover all of the units that served at Khe Sanh. In this issue most of the articles cover the Hill Fights, and supporting units.

BUSY SEABEES BUILD DEFENSES ON Hill 881 S

KHE SANH - Third Division Marines took Hill 881 South from the NVA. Now, it is up to a detachment of Seabees from Mobile Construction Battalion-4 to insure the Marines have defensive positions and a supply zone.

Under the guidance of Lt. Brent Mandry, USN (Ferguson, Mo.), the Seabees built a helicopter landing zone on Hill 881and 861."That was the first thing we did after the hill was taken,"Mandry said. "We also helped build defensive bunkers and artillery positions on the hill. "Their work is not yet completed.

They are building ammo pits and clearing trails on the hills for better mobility for the Marine units.
At the present time they are working on revetments for helicopters and planes that stay at the Khe Sanh airstrip overnight. "We've building them so that if the area ever comes under a mortar attack, they will be protected as much as possible."

NEW LIEUTENANT PLAYS A MAJOR ROLE IN THE BATTLE FOR HILL 861

By Sgt. Roger Ynostroza

KHE SANH--2ndLt. James D. Carter, Jr., arrived in South Vietnam, April 21 and assumed duties as platoon commander with a company of the Ninth Marine Regiment April 23, 1967

In the next four days, Lt. Carter was to play a major role in the battle for Hill 861, fast becoming the heaviest enemy contact to date in this far northwestern corner of South Vietnam.

Carter received his baptism of fire April 24,1967 his first full day with his 57-man unit. "We were part of a two platoon sweep of a North Vietnamese Army Cave complex about 1,500 yards from Hill 861," said the lieutenant. "Enroute there, we spotted about five NVA in Khakis. We opened fire and they ran from us, so we called in 81mm mortars and hit them with our own 60mm tubes. "

"My squad leader took a fire team around to try to block the NVA escape, but he was hit with a white phosphorous grenade and killed, and the smoke covered the enemy escape," said Lt. Carter. "We rigged up a stretcher and started for Hill 700, where our command group was 'located." Enroute, the unit was hit by fierce enemy fire and was pinned down. "My men reacted quickly an M-79 man killed several with his accurate shots, and another man handheld a 60mm mortar tube and put rounds on the enemy," said Lt. Carter.

An OE-1 spotter plane circling overhead marked the enemy positions for fixed-wing air strikes. High explosives battered the NVA positions while the Marines found better defensive positions. "They must have really been dug-in because the air strikes passed and they began firing at us again," said Lt. Carter. The platoon moved to a landing zone and were able to evacuate our wounded before the helicopters were driven off by heavy enemy fire.

The unit moved to a new LZ and another chopper evacuated more wounded before it, too, was driven off. "We had no entrenching tools with us so we dug in as best we could for the night, using canteen cups and whatever to dig holes," said Lt. Carter'. "Surprisingly we weren't assaulted that night. Air strikes and artillery pounded the areas around us and on 861 for most of the night."

Shortly after midnight, the platoon observed an NVA mortar tube and rocket flashes. Effective artillery fire was called in from "F" Btry.. Twelfth Marines, based here.

We set out the next morning on NVA trails toward 861 again and made sound contact with the other company," said Lt Carter. "But when we moved toward their position, we received heavy barrages of enemy 60mm mortar and automatic weapons fire from the top of 861.

That's when I was hit by shrapnel in the left arm." He said, "Thirteen of us were separated from the rest of the unit. We tried to get four more wounded out of the impact area but we could not reach them. They were later recovered safely by the rest of the unit. Meanwhile we finally linked up with the rest of the platoon.

While gunships pounded 861, we called for med evac choppers. A CH-46 chopper came in but was riven off by ground fire before it could take on wounded. One wounded Marine gained evacuation by hanging onto a strut of the chopper as it hovered Over the LZ.

Then NVA Mortar fire began raking the LZ. The Marines left the LZ, Crossing fields of Tall Elephant grass which afforded little cover from automatic weapons fire.

INFANTRYMEN PRAISE JET SUPPORT ON HILL 861

By LCpl. Woody Price

"When you're pinned down by heavy enemy fire, with wounded Marines who need medical help, there's nothing in this world that looks as good as a couple of Marine jets screaming out of the sun to tear up the enemy," says Cpl Arnett Lewis, Jr. The 23-year-old from Lexington, Miss., was on Hill 861 near the demilitarized zone when F-4B Phantom jets arrived to provide close air' support for the besieged Marines. "We were sent up the hill to reinforce a unit that had suffered casualties and were pinned down by enemy fire," said Lewis, a fire team leader with the 3rd Bn., Ninth Marine Regiment.

"We got part of the wounded out during the night, but when daylight came we still had a long way to go and the enemy was making it hot for us. We had wounded Marines who really needed help. but we couldn't get down the hill.

"Then we heard a helluva roar and looked up to see jets swooping down toward the hill top," said Lewis. "Once they started on that hill they didn't stop until it was just a mass of rubble.

"We got out okay, and for nearly two days Marine jets just kept coming in to pound that hill. When they were finished it looked entirely different than when we first went up. "When we went back up the hill, the top was practically bare and the enemy was gone. I guess we owe our lives to those jets," Lewis said. "Since I've been in Vietnam I've heard a lot of guys say the same thing," said Lewis. "When you're pinned down those jets are a beautiful Sight, andwhen you're wounded a helicopter looks like an angel

SEVEN MAN RECON PATROL FIGHTS OFF NVA COMPANY

KHE SANH-A seven· man Marine reconnaissance patrol aided by an armada of gunships, fixed-wing fighter bombers, and heavy artillery fought off an estimated North Vietnamese Army reinforced company for 12 hours in the heavy jungle west of here.

The NVA, operating from well-concealed bunkers, at times within two feet of the marines, were constantly driven back by the ring of fire. After three unsuccessful attempts the beleaguered patrol was lifted out by a Huey helicopter.

Four members of the patrol were killed, and three seriously wounded. A CH·46 pilot tried to extract the team and was also killed. Several crew members of other helicopters were wounded.

Although wounded four times, first time at the beginning of the fire fight, 18 year-old PFC. Steve P. Lopez, of Silver Springs, Md., maintained unbroken radio contact with his parent unit of the 3rd Force Reconnaissance Bn., and also directed air and artillery strikes.

"This kid was fantastic," said the company commander, Capt. A.B. Crosby of Annapolis, Md. "He was the coolest individual I have ever seen. He kept calling in artillery closer and closer to his position. Back here they were actually scared to drop them closer. But he kept repeating, 'drop it closer, drop it closer.'

"Throughout the fire fight Lopez never once mentioned that he had been hit. He kept saying, 'I'm alright.' "The first thing he said when he arrived back here was, 'check my camera I took some good flicks out there, and want to get them developed.' It was amazing."

Lt. C.A. Mumford, Francesville, Ind., pilot of the Huey gunship who patrolled the skies over the besieged Marines constantly for 12 hours, except for refueling, said, "Lopez was unbelievable. For 12 hours he was cool, calm, and never got excited. He told us where to shoot and passed on valuable information. The whole mission would have been impossible without him. He was the only one who could fight down there for several hours.

"He kept telling us he was alright and wouldn't admit he'd been hit in the head. He coordinated the whole mission." The patrol was inserted about 4: 50 p.m. on May 9,1967 eight miles from Khe Sanh, to check out trails in the area.

The Marines found several NVC bunkers, then returned to a nearby hill to look for the enemy. The patrol came under heavy small arms fire for the first time around midnight. At first they estimated the enemy strength at 30 to 50, but later increased their estimate to a reinforced company. Lopez, on his fifth patrol, said he was hit in the head as soon as the action began.

"I then received wounds in the chest, leg and head again," he said. "The enemy was about two feet from us at times. There was at least a company out there. They walked right up to us. " "I shot the first NVA and the last one. One of the ones I shot looked very young. like in his teens. He walked right up to me. I looked at him and knew if I didn't shoot him he would shoot me.

"I was laying down on the ground and he didn't see me until he was right on top of me. "They were all over the place. I saw at least 15 dead NVA in front of our position. A lot of credit goes to my M-16, it worked fine and never jammed once," he said. Crosby said at one time Lopez thought all his buddies were dead. but checked and found four of them still breathing.

For several hours Lopez was the only member of the patrol able to fire his rifle. At about 2:30 a.m. the patrol ran out of ammunition. Gunships had to drop bandoliers of ammo to the fighting Marines. The first gunship to arrive over the area was piloted by Mumford who pounded the hill with machinegun and rocket fire.

At 2:45 a.m.. a CH·46 made an unsuccessful attempt to recover the trapped Marines. "But the ship took a tremendous battering," according to Mumford. "Several crew members received shrapnel wounds.

Every time we stopped firing, the enemy would start moving up on the Marines." "When we opened up again they would retreat back to their bunkers. They were underground all over that hill. All they had to do was retreat into those bunkers. We couldn't kill anyone there." Several hours after the first rescue attempt, a second CH-46 tried to pick up the Marines.

It was waved off, but still took numerous rounds flying away, and the pilot was killed. The two crew members were wounded, but the co-pilot managed to bring the crippled chopper back to Khe Sanh.

When daylight came, fixed wing fighters were called in and they plastered the hill with ordnance. At midday, as several Huey gunships continued to hit the hill with rockets and machinegun fire, another Huey landed beside the Marines and extracted them.

ASSAULT AGAINST KHE SANH TOPS APRIL MARINE ACTION

By GySgt. Ron Harwood

Until the last six days of the month, April had few significant ground contacts between Marines in I Corps and enemy forces. From the 24th on, however, the action was furious as elements of the Third and Ninth Marine Regiments foiled the North Vietnamese Army's planned assault and take over of the Khe Sanh area.

In the action at Khe Sanh, the artillerymen and jet pilots were a prime factor in dislodging the North Vietnamese from their bunkers on Hills 861, 881 N. and 881S. The guns hurled more than 11,000 rounds at the enemy positions while Marine air was dropping more than 1,000 tons of ordnance in five days.

Other enemy attempts In the northern-most province of South Vietnam to silence Marine and Army artillery came almost nightly as they poured mortar shells and rockets into Gla Unh and other points south of the demilitarized zone. Their efforts failed, however, and the big guns continued their accurate support of ground units throughout the month. Enemy mortars and rockets also struck at Chu Lai, Dong Ha, Phu Bai and Khe Sanh during the month. Little damage was caused by any of the attacks.

In all, the Marine air-ground team killed 1,649 enemy soldiers during April. Also, 248 individual and 11 crew-served weapons were captured by Leathernecks. To the south, Task Force Oregon, a multi Brigade U. S. Army force commanded by MaJGen. William B. Rosson, started operating in Quang Ngal and Quang Tin province.

Four days later, Chu Lai based Task Force X-Ray, 1st Marine Division, was dissolved, and its operating elements moved northward to bolster other Marine units in the northern three provinces of South Vietnam. In significant small unit action, a company of the 1st Marine Regiment made contact with a large enemy force 20 miles south of Da Nang on April 22. Two other companies of the First Marines were lifted in to help as were elements of the Fifth Marine Regiment. With the arrival of reinforcements, the enemy broke contact. In the air, Marine jet pilots flew 369 missions north of the DMZ and 6,860 sorties in South Vietnam. There were 38,348 helicopter sorties flown by Marine Aircraft. Leatherneck C-130'S transported 27,448 Passengers and hauled 3,823 Tons of Cargo.

ENEMY FOUGHT REAL HARD

KHE SANH-" The enemy fought real hard, was well coordinated, well armed and a pro," LtCol. W. J. Masterpool (Solvay, N.Y.), operations officer for Marine operations west of here, said as he summed up the capabilities of North Vietnamese troops in the area. He compared the enemy's fighting qualities with those of the NVA that Marines opposed on Operation Hastings.

In 10 days of action Marines killed a total of 551 North Vietnamese near here. "The enemy used every weapon available," said LtCol. E. R. DeLong, commander of the 2nd Bn., Third Marine Regiment, following the assault against 881 North.

Capt. R. W. Swigart, company commander of 3rd Bn., Ninth Marines, who took part in the assault on 881 South, described the enemy as hard, hard core." "They had staying power that was unbelievable. They were good." Major W. E. Fogo, operations officer at Khe Sanh, said aerial observers had spotted well· fortified bunkers on almost every ridgeline in the area.

KHE SANH MARINES SUPPLIED; SUPPORT GROUP DOUBLES EFFORT

Intense enemy action began against Marine forces in the Khe Sanh area April 24, a Logistic Support Unit has been supporting the "in action"

Leathernecks with over 60,000 pounds of supplies daily. The Khe Sanh LSU, an extension of Force Logistic Support Group "Alpha" at Phu Bai, has been doubling their supply efforts to effectively support the battalions in addition to artillery batteries. Originally established in December, 1966, and designed to support one battalion, the LSU specialists, some 60 Marines, are meeting the needs of the Marines engaging the enemy forces in the northwest section of I Corps.

"The Marines were never out of anything," said Major John Weeks of Willard, Ohio, and officer in charge of the LSU, "and they were probably better supplied than any other previous operation." he added.

The initial supply and resupply operations to some 3,000 Marines in the field, was completely airlifted by Marine helicopter units operating from the Khe Sanh airstrip.

In addition to supplying the troops in the field. the LSU provides enough class "A" food to feed over a thousand people housed at the Khe Sanh compound. Most of the supplies received at the airstrip staging area were flown into Khe Sanh on a "round the clock" schedule by Marine and Air Force transport. The major portion of cargo came from the Air Force Logistic Command units at DaNang.

"This single mode of resupply by helicopter was the first time an operation was not provided additional means of resupply transportation," stated Major-Week's, "since the action was some 5,000 meters from our supply staging area, no vehicle convoys or surface ships could gain access to the troops in the field." he added.

"We could fully load a helicopter with old rations, water, individual equipment and ammunition and get it out to the action sites within 15 to 25 minutes," said Lt. Robert E. Johnson of Northfield, Minn., assistant officer in charge of the LSU.

"When the operation began, we had some problems trying to make stable LZ's (landing zones) for cargo deliveries," Johnson said. "The troops were moving at such a rapid pace the LZ's were changing constantly, stretching the supply route and requiring immediate supply needs as they moved ahead."

"We frequently had to pace our resupply runs in between artillery firing missions and helicopter medav ac flights," stated Johnson, "but we managed to meet all the demands from the field."

Capt. James Ross of Seattle, Wash .. an artillery battery commander for the Twelfth Marines, is a firm believer in the supply efforts made by the LSU Marines. "My artillery battery has been firing an average of 1,500 rounds a day and there seems to be an endless stockpile of ammo," he said. "It's a damn good feeling." Although the primary mission of the LSU was resupplying the troops in the field, another task equally important was the repair and maintenance of battle damaged equipment.

Increased combat activity dictated the increased need for rapid repair of weapons, communication equipment and disposing of captured enemy ordnance. Contact teams, consisting of explosive ordnance disposal specialists were brought into the area from Phu Bai and Dong Ha.

Other teams trained in the repair of artillery tubes burned out from constant use, arrived to "beef-up" the LSU's increasing commitments. After the equipment was repaired, it was immediately airlifted to the action sites.

"Nobody working with the LSU, counts the hours or even the days," said SSgt. Louis Hernandez of Bronx, N.Y. "We keep the gear moving as long as our guys on the hills need the stuff. If we can't get it done in 24 hours. we'll do it in 25."

BATTLE PRESSURES FELT BY FLIGHT LINE CREWS

The action was miles north, but ordnance and flight line crews of Marine All Weather Fighter Squadrons-232 and 235 felt the pressure along with the infantrymen battling North Vietnamese near Khe Sanh, just south of the demilitarized zone.

As the infantry units called for more and more close air support by F-8E Crusader jets of the two 1st Marine Aircraft Wing squadrons, the demand on ground crews who arm, refuel, and check each plane before it can return to action increased.

Sorties flown by VMF(AW)-232 on May 1, rose from an average of 24 per day to 38, while tonnage of bombs dropped on the enemy almost doubled. The battle "up north" gave the aviation Marines the "busiest day we have had since we got to Vietnam," according to GySgt. J. H. Howard. Middleburg. Fla.. and VMF(AW)-232 ordnance chief.

It was the kind of day when LCpl. Kenneth L. Heist. of Deland, Fla., "only had time to smoke a quarter of a cigarette at a time," between readying the jets for their next mission. The effort paid off. Throughout the period of the battle for Hill 861 and the twin peaks of 881, aviation and artillery units were credited with 75% of the enemy confirmed killed from April 24 to May 5.1967.

In all Marine jets from the 1st Marine Aircraft Wing Squadrons flew more than 790 sorties and expended more than 1,150 tons of ordnance in the 12 days.

AGGRESSIVE MARINE REACTION PREVENTS; NVA TAKE OVER

By GySgt. Ron Harwood

The aggressive reaction of Marine Corps units in the Khe Sanh area to the presence of a then unknown sized enemy force "undoubtedly foiled" a North Vietnamese Army attack and take-over of the Khe Sanh combat base, according to Marine Corps officials here.

Marine intelligence sources estimate that Leathernecks in the area have engaged a North Vietnamese Army regiment since the action started April 24. They further believe that an attack on Khe Sanh was to coincide with the mortar attacks of April 26 on Phu Bai, Dong Ha, and Gio Linh.

However, the enemy plans were thwarted when a reconnaissance element of the Ninth Marine Regiment made contact with the NVA units at 11 a.m., April 24, on Hill 861. Since that time almost constant contact has been maintained with the enemy forces. During the action Marines have killed 253 enemy soldiers while 96 Leathernecks have been-killed and 276 wounded. Marines have been supported by more than 11.000 rounds of 105mm, 107mm. and 155mm artillery and more than 1,000 tons of air ordnance, including bombs up to 2,000 lbs.

Chronological highlights of the action are:

APRIL 24-At 11 a.m. a forward observer team from the Ninth Marine Regiment made contact with an unknown number of enemy troops. A relief force was sent in and air and artillery missions called in to support them. Contact continued until 8 a.m. that evening. After the initial contact a Third Marine Regiment company and command group were alerted to move to Khe Sanh while another rifle company was placed on a four-hour alert. Weather did not permit the move to Khe Sanh that day.

APRIL 25-At 9:45 a.m.
The Third Marine Regiment units commenced to move by helicopter to Khe Sanh. At the same time, Ninth Marine Regiment units in the area consolidated and began a sweep toward the enemy. At 5:10 p.m a company from the Third Marine Regiment, enroute to join a Ninth Marines company, made contact with an estimated reinforced company of NVA. The two Marine units linked up and occupied defensive positions for the night. At the same time, another company of Ninth Marines arrived at Khe Sanh and took up positions there.

APRIL 26-At 7:00 a.m.
the two companies in the field began moving against Hill 861. the focal point of the battle. Both companies received heavy mortar and small arms fire during their attack. Shortly after noon, three more companies of the Third Marines arrived at Khe Sanh and started moving toward Hill 861 at about 3 p.m. They linked up with the other Marines at the hill at 7:30 p.m. There was no contact reported during the night.

APRIL 27-At 8:30 a.m. Ninth Marines units linked up with Third Marine Regiment units. At 11: 30 a.m., one battalion of the Third Marines returned to Khe Sanh while another battalion remained in the field.

There was no significant contact reported by ground units during the day, but Marine aircraft were used extensively against enemy bunkers and trench lines. The enemy was using many heavy automatic weapons, mortars and recoilless rifles as they put-up a stubborn defense.

APRIL 28--The "plan of the day" called for a battalion of the Third Marines to move out on two axis of advance from the south and southwest of Hill 861 and capture the hill. The battalion moved out on-schedule at 2:30 p.m. as air support and artillery fire pounded the objective. Enemy forces pulled back without making contact and the hill was secured at 4:30 p.m. by the Leatherneck battalion.

During the day, 1st Marine Aircraft Wing pilots were credited with killing 44 enemy soldiers on and around Hill 861.

APRIL 29--While one battalion made a thorough search of Hill 861, another battalion of the Third Marines moved out toward an objective northwest of the hill. Sporadic contact was reported throughout most of the day with the heaviest action taking place at noon when a company of the Ninth Marine Regiment came under heavy automatic weapons fire. They called in air strikes and returned fire with 60mm mortars and their organic weapons, silencing the enemy positions. In the action, which took place 7.5 kilometers northwest of Khe Sanh, two Marines were killed and 10 wounded. The night was quiet and no significant contact reported.

APRIL 30 - Plans for the day call for a battalion of the Third Marines to conduct a search and destroy mission of company size in the vicinity of Hill 861. Their remaining companies were to seize Hill 881 N. At the same time, the other battalions of Third Marines were to attack in the direction of Hill 881S., and be prepared to attack along the ridgeline southwest of the hill.

Action started quickly and by noon elements of both battalions were engaged with forces. Units from one battalion had reached their objective but were meeting stiff resistance from enemy forces fighting from bunkers with automatic weapons, mortars and small arms. A company from the Ninth Marines joined them to aid in the battle.

Meanwhile, on 881N, the other battalion also reached its objective and encountered heavy resistance from well dug in enemy forces. Both objectives were honey- combed with a network of bunkers and fighting holes, including bomb shelters.

By the end of the day, the positions remained about the same, both objectives had been reached, but not secured. Once again there was no significant contact during the night.

MAY 1 Both Marine units continued the fight to secure the hills from a stubborn, well- disciplined enemy force. Heavy air strikes were called in and by 3 p.m. a battalion reported that enemy troops could be seen running off Hill 881S.The battalion worked them over with their mortars and machine guns as the air strikes continued.

However, by the end of the day the relative positions of the Marine and NVA forces remained unchanged. Marines dug in for the night and the following morning (May 2) continued the assault on the enemy positions.

STORY FROM LEATHERNECK MAGAZINE CONCERNING KHE SANH & OPERATION PEGAGUS. JULY 1968

When the 26th Marines were surrounded by thousands of North Vietnamese at Khe Sanh, the only way supplies could reach them was by air. But the enemy was zeroed in on our aircraft. The problem was solved by a nearly incredible feat of engineering.

The Marines who manned the isolated base at Khe Sanh, South Vietnam, needed help. The members of the 26th Marine Regiment and its supporting units were surrounded by estimated tens of thousands of North Vietnamese regulars. For 77 days, commencing with the first heavy enemy bombardment on January 21, 1968, the Marines had been under the constant threat of an all out enemy attack. The only supply route was by air and, in landing and taking off, several fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters had been destroyed by enemy artillery.

But no one was sitting idly by during the crisis. In addition to the Khe Sanh Marines' own reply from the artillery pieces of the 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, U. S. aircraft strafed, bombed and blasted enemy strongholds in the surrounding hills. On April 1, Operation Pegasus was initiated with the mission of clearing the land supply route to Khe Sanh and easing the pressure on the Marines who were holding it.

Route#9 stretches from Dong Ha in the east, through Ca Lu and Khe Sanh, and eventually to the Laotian border.

From Dong Ha to Ca Lu the road was clear for convoys. But from Ca Lu to Khe Sanh it ran along the twisting and picturesque Quang Tri River and then over the mountainous hills to Khe Sanh. And ever since the enemy had planted an ambush on the road, January 13, 1968, the area had been considered hostile territory and the lifeline to Khe Sanh had been cut off from U. S. traffic. Removing the enemy forces from that area was the first objective of Pegasus.

After B-52 strikes and Marine artillery had saturated the hills adjacent to the road, the U. S. Army's First Air Cavalry Division began to sweep the terrain above the Route #9, moving toward Khe Sanh.

The Marine phases of the penetration began with the First Marine Regiment, composed of its own 1st and 3d Battalions and the 2d Battalion from the Third Marines. They moved directly through the valley, clearing out enemy positions which had escaped the onslaught of the air and artillery strikes.

Almost directly in the wake of the First Marines, the 11th Engineer Battalion began their work on the road. The Marine engineers had been given until April 12 to fulfill their mission: To improve and widen the road to accommodate traffic to Khe Sanh and, where necessary, to erect bridges capable of supporting the heavy vehicles which would soon be moving up and down the road.

Although the road bore the designation of Route #9, the 11th Engineers quickly posted their trademark signs as fast as they moved up the road. The signs, unofficially, renamed the 18 miles of winding highway "USMC 11."

The 3d Platoon from the 3d Bridge Company kicked off the engineering operation when they began putting up the first bridge, April 1. They were succeeded by Alpha Company, Bravo Company and Delta Company of the engineers, all of whom played a curious game of leapfrog in opening the road and building the bridges.

According to 1stLt Duncan Hoffman, executive officer, Alpha Company, as soon as the road was cleared far enough ahead one company of engineers would begin work on a bridge. Then, as quickly as another site was open, a second company would leapfrog the construction at the first site to begin work farther down the line. The pace quickened from there.

The11th Engineers provided bridges at 18 crossing, including several supplementary bridges called "by-passes," to complete the project by April 11, one day ahead of their deadline. Commencing with Bridge 9/17 (the 17th bridge on Route#9 and the first bridge past Ca Lu), they worked their way up to the Rao Quan Valley which precedes the hill route to Khe Sanh and planted Bridge 9/34 at the bottom of that valley.

The going was nearly always rough, the dust gathering on the Marines' sweat-soaked bodies like insects on flypaper. But one thing which added speed to the engineers efforts was the fact that the French had worked along the same route years before during the French Indochina War. Although the NVA. had blown up all the remaining French bridges during their activities of the past year, the sound masonry abutments still remained in most Cases and these provided a tailor-made foundation upon which the Marines could improve.

Even this, however, was not always possible. In several cases, at Bridge 9/34 for example, the French supports were too far apart to allow the engineers to construct a practical Bridge in limited time. In these cases, by-passes were constructed and the French abutments were turned into guard posts or used as parking spots for tanks.

The engineers constructed the by passes by first positioning several large cylindrical steel culverts lengthwise in the river bed, allowing the water to flow through them.

The culverts were then packed into place with numerous sandbags and covered with tons of dirt from dump trucks. Bulldozers carved out a supplementary road leading to the by-pass and smoothed over the dirt on top of the by-pass to form a driving surface.

In addition to the by-passes which were constructed at all sites where conventional "bulk" bridge was impractical, by-passes were also set up alongside the places where there were bulk bridges. Further, at a site where only a by-pass could be built, two by-passes were made.

This served a two fold purpose. First, the by-passes allowed an easier means of crossing for heavier equipment, such as tanks. Second, they imposed a double challenge to any enemy sneaking in to attempt to blow up one of the bridges.

More security came with the Marines of Fox Company, 2d Battalion, Third Marines. Men like PFC Richard Miller and PVT Richard Farnsworth were strategically detailed along the road at every bridge site to set up bunkers as guard posts and to defend the bridges if an attack materialized.

Another observation post against enemy activity was "The Rock Pile." This imposing rocky crag sits along "USMC 11" and the Marines who man it have an excellent view of several of the bridges near Ca Lu.

The guard duty was made easier, in places. Many of the bridges were built as little as 75 to 100 meters apart. Miles wound out between others.

Problems, of course, were bound to occur as the road work progressed. At two different areas, the steep cliffs into which the road was cut were severely cratered. Here, explosives had to be used to dislodge more dirt and the excess was then pushed around by the bulldozers to fatten up the road.

One factor which aided the 'dozers in their quick improvements on the road was the old surfacing laid by the French. In only a few places could the hard surface still be seen through the layer of brown dust which now covers the road and clouds up behind each passing vehicle. And, elsewhere, although parts of it had been broken up by artillery and other spots had crumbled from long use, the hard chunks still provided an excellent foundation upon which the 11th Engineers could build.

With the old abutments still standing and the road surface still evident, further earmarks of another era were found in abandoned French bunkers alongside the road. It was obvious that Route #9 had played a significant part in the history of the struggles of South Vietnam. One of the most vivid and tragic sites of French activity is present in the vicinity of Bridge 9/34, spanning the Rao Quan River deep in the valley of the same name.

The Rao Quan River is a tributary to the Quang Tri River, None of the 18 bridges, in fact, crossed the Quang Tri itself, but spanned the streams which lead into it. Evidence of French attempts to bridge the Rao Quang Tri within 150 meters of the present 9/34. At one point, the river is still somewhat bridged by the twisted wreckage of a now rusted steel suspension frame work which was blasted from its high supports, 50 feet above the river bed, by the enemy many years ago. Close by, a cement bridge with steel reinforcing cables protruding from its broken body, also lies in bits and chunks in the river where it met the same fate as its metal counterpart.

A third French bridge was never completed. Its supports jut out from both sides of the enclosing hills but the signs are apparent that the work was suddenly abandoned before completion. Why, no one seems to know.

The Marine version of 9/34 is a floating bridge. Which consists of a wooden platform resting across four rubber pontoon-type floats. The floats were helilifted in by the Army's CH-54 "Sky Crane."

Cooperation between the Marines and the Army had been outstanding all through Pegasus, and the 11th Engineers received a special commendation from the commanding general of the First Air Cavalry Division for their work on the road.

Army helicopters were used on other bridges too. Bridge 9/28, according to Maj Joseph C. Thorp,11th Engineers S-2 and S-3 officer, was fitted with a 30-foot platform atop the old French abutments. Bridges 9/31 and 9/33 both received 38-foot, four-inch spans. In each case, the bridges were lowered by the helicopter while Marine engineers on the ground guided the heavy platform into position with Guy lines.

But the action wasn't all on the bridges. PFC Kevin Rooney, of Fox Company, was guarding Bridge 9/32 and commented, "There hasn't been much action this close to Ca Lu but they get more further on up the road."

Rooney was right. Delta Company, 11th Engineers, was patrolling the section of road nearest to Khe Sanh and they were kept busy. A portion of the company, led by 1stLt Floyd Campbell, captured two NVA soldiers almost at Khe Sanh's doorstep and discovered several more enemy bunkers in the area which they cleaned out with Willy Peter grenades. PFC Larry E. Ramsey, a combat engineer with Delta, was usually the grenade heaver and PFC Larry E. Sherbert and PFC J. R. Albert were always close by with more handfuls of the hot stuff to back him up.

With the road finished by April 11 and officially opened April 12, the first vehicle rolled into Khe Sanh. It was a Jeep and its chief passenger was LtCol V. A. Perry, commander of the 11th Engineers. But a Jeep is a versatile vehicle and, with the road making treacherous curves in places, and plagued by bumps and dips, LtCol Perry knew that one final test had to be made before the road could be considered in satisfactory condition. He ordered his men to take the "low-bed" to Khe Sanh. "If that low-bed can make it," said SSgt Donald Thompson, NCOIC of the engineers' motor transport section, "anything can make it."

The low-bed was a large, cumbersome, 5-ton truck and, for a trailer, pulled a long flat-bed designed for hauling heavy equipment. At 9 :30 a.m. on Easter Sunday the low-bed rolled out of Ca Lu and, with SSgt Thompson and 1stLt Bud Westmoreland, motor transport officer, bouncing ahead in a Jeep, it began its slow, plodding journey up "USMC 11."

At 11 a.m. the low-bed rolled over the pontoon bridge at 9/34 and then up the steep hills toward Khe Sanh. The supply route to the Marine base was open and ready for business.

With convoys now going back and forth along the road, things began to slack off. Enemy shelling of Khe Sanh had picked up again but none of the enemy showed up along the road and it was assumed that the NVA. had vacated the area for the time being. No chances were taken, however. Marine artillery was called in on several of the hills near the bridges every night.

The Marines stood their guard posts with alert eyes. But now, with a little time off, members of Fox Company, like Cpl Terry A. Kelley and PFC David J. Gardner, took advantage of a job well done by going swimming in the ice cold waters of the Rao Quan River.

Cpl Frank Geramita found that the swift-flowing water beneath Bridge 9/32 enabled him to get a decent shave without cutting himself in a million places. And LCpl Tolbert McGlohorn could now brush his teeth in the clear stream with no pasty after taste to rinse out with the precious supply from his canteen.

The Marines found other sport in bicycles, apparently left behind by the enemy in their hasty departure. A good share of the engineers were still hard at work, though. Many of the supplementary by- passes were still under construction next to the bulk bridges. They had to be completed as soon as possible so that the convoys could use them while the professional type bridges were being moved elsewhere in Vietnam.

But the big goal had been achieved, that of opening the supply route to Khe Sanh. And, with Marines in Khe Sanh already branching out into the surrounding hills to chase down the enemy, it looked like the recent activities of Pegasus had served their purpose.

And, in addition to the road, the engineers could count several things at Ca Lu itself among their recent achievements. Upon arriving there they had built almost all of the bunkers, cleared fields of fire, set up ammunition and oil supply points, and had constructed the berms (fortified parking places) where the helicopters could land.

On the road itself, they had put in an estimated 40,000 man-hours in meeting their deadline and had used more than 5,000 equipment hours. And one piece of that equipment, now sitting back at Ca Lu, sums up the whole theme of the engineers' accomplishments on "USMC 11." On one side of the truck is painted the words: "If you can't swim it; bridge it." The other side reads: "Khe Sanh or bust."

Engineers often provided their own security while working on the road

GySgt Wade Hampton, the 26TH Marines Motor Transport Chief, took time out to mail a letter at the Khe Sanh post office.

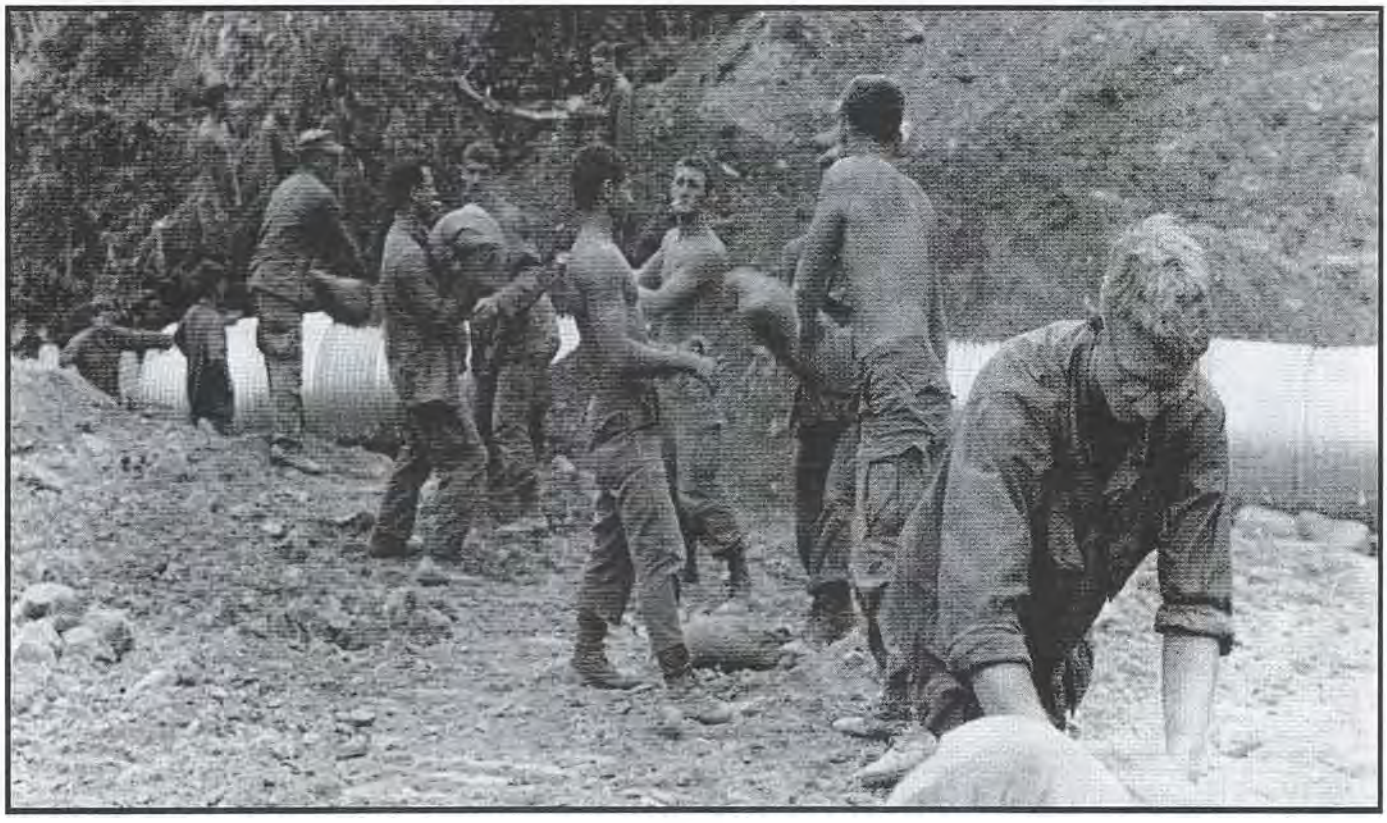
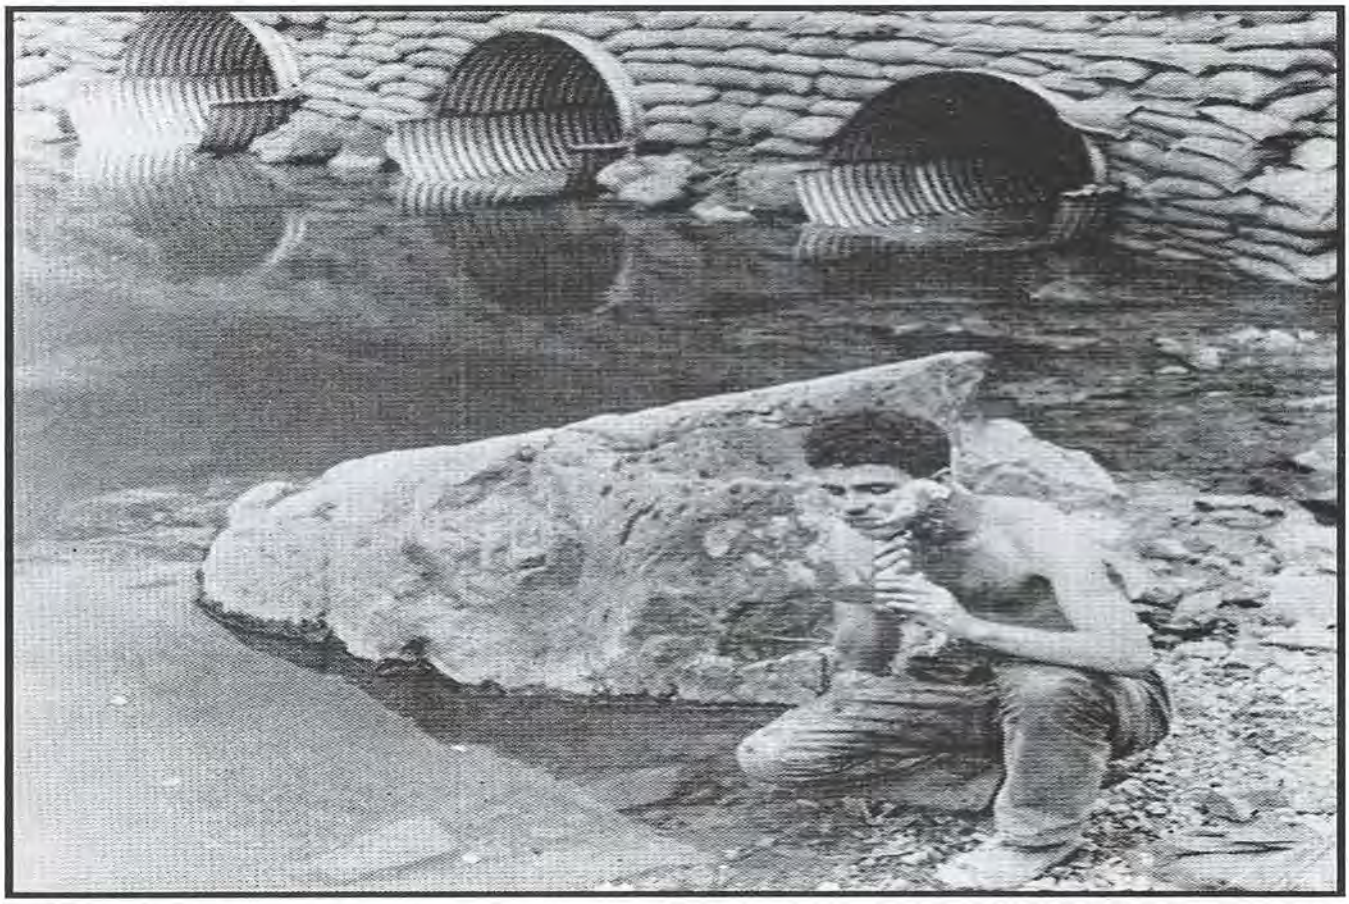
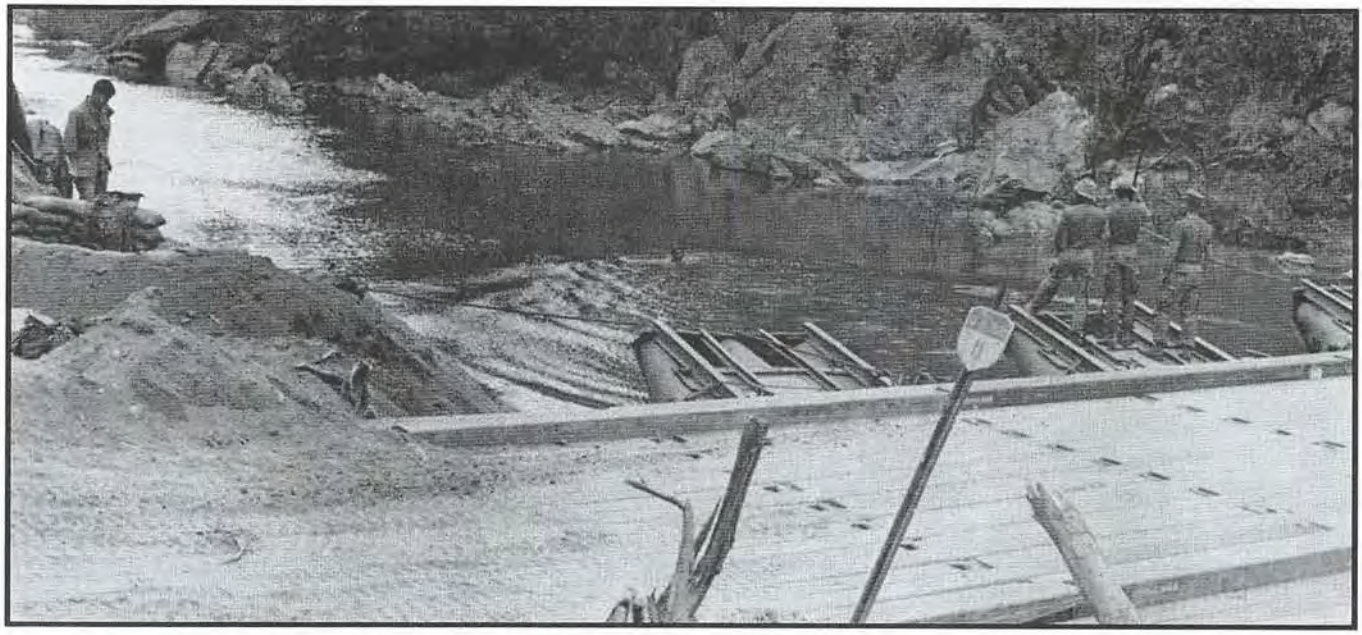
(BELOW) Sand bags were used in the construction of culverts beneath the improved roadway.





PFC Kevin Rooney found time to hack off several days' growth of beard during a break in the construction work.

Working from floats on a pontoon bridge, engineers gauged the depth of a river over which "USMC 11" would pass.



With a bridge completed and ready for heavy vehicular traffic, the engineers paused to survey their handiwork.

A bulldozer graded rough portions of the dirt highway that had been briefly controlled by Communist forces.

THE PROFESSIONALS

ROAD TO THE MONUMENT

by Phil Leslie, Bruce Oliver and Dale Williams

After more than 30 months from an idea to completion, it was both humbling and exciting for the Monument Committee, Officers and Trustees to finally see our monument dedicated on 8 November 2013 at the Memorial Park, National Museum of the Marine Corps, Quantico, VA. The Committee consisted Myself, Bruce Oliver and Dale Williams and three members, Jack Klimp, Bill White and Clyde Woods. We reported to the Board of Trustees who had the final say on every facet of the project. I was amazed that we sorted thru the myriad of concepts and designs to arrive at the most significant monument [My unbiased opinion] concept and design at the NMMC Memorial Park. Although I was "The Chairman", I had little to do because of the professionalism, dedication and perseverance of the team – all of them. These Gentlemen, are without a doubt, "The Professionals".

Initially, The Team met with Mark Joyce [MSgt USMC Ret], VP Museum Operations who oversees the Semper Fidelis Memorial Park adjacent to the museum where all of the monuments are located.

Mark informed us of the parameters for the monument, and that the design as well as each inscription would have to be reviewed by a committee which included a representative from the Marine Corps Historical Branch before we could obtain any approval to proceed. We then walked the entire park and viewed, photographed, and discussed each monument.

A few weeks after the initial meeting, Mark informed Clyde Woods there were only four unclaimed spots for a monument available at the park. Clyde paid the required $1000 down payment on the spot and secured the monument space. That was the first donation to the monument fund. Our members donated sufficient funds to complete the monument.

The team met several times over the next few months at the NMMC / Memorial Park and visited two monument businesses in the Manassas, VA area. Again, we took more photographs and found more attributes we did not want in our monument. However, at that time we had no idea of what we wanted except it had to be different from all the rest and had to represent men and valor of 2dBn, 1st Marines. "The Team" did none of these things in a vacuum. Each meeting at Quantico or each issue was also discussed with the whole Board of Officers / Trustees who had the final say on how to proceed. The initial design concept we all agreed on was that the First Marine Division Diamond had to be a part of the monument. Not just inscribed on granite, but somehow incorporated into the monument design.

The membership was asked to submit ideas, but only three were submitted. Trustee Dale Williams then made two almost full size cardboard mockups which we erected at the monument site pieced together with Duct Tape. One of Dale's designs became the form that morphed into the final approved design. Much debate and discussion then went into each word inscribed on the monument and it's placement including the dedication statement, 'To All Who Served Or Supported'.

Initially, we requested bids from four monument companies. Of those, one did not reply, another considered the work, but declined because of other work. Of the two remaining vendors, we selected Kline Memorials of Manassas, VA. Rick Burroughs was the project manager. All materials and workmanship are 100% USA. The monument is granite is "American Black" and was quarried in Pennsylvania, cut and polished in Elberton, Ga., and engraved in Manassas, VA.

A hearty Semper Fi to the significant contributors to the monument design, placement and dedication Program:

- Master Sergeant Mark Joyce, USMC (RET) – VP, Museum Operations;
- John Morgan: John Morgan Art, Charlotte, NC Created first designs of the monument
- Greg Jones, Greg Jones Design Portland, OR: Created first designs of the monument.
- Bill Guillot: OMNOVA Solutions, Inc., Monroe, NC: Large Scale prints of Monument concept.
- Tony Mills: L&M Granite, Elberton, GA. Cut and polished the monument stone
- Robert Firvida: Galicia Construction. Set monument and memorial bricks.
- Rebecca Joy Allen: Student Wingate Univ, NC Created Original Art of monument at no cost.
- Beth Crumley USMC Historical Branch, Quantico. Researched Unit Awards.
- Nancy Hoffman, Leatherneck Magazine. Proof Reader for inscriptions and dedication program
- LtCol Sean Smith, USMC. Dedication Program Bagpiper
- MGySgt John Rode USMC Ret. Dedication Program Bagpiper
- LCdr David M. Todd, CHC, USN. Dedication Program Chaplain

And, last but not the least are the members who contributed their money to make this dream a possibility

MONUMENT AND DEDICATION COMMITTEE

Phil Leslie led a review of the committee, the members, how it was formed and a host of other details that had been mentioned in previous updates and newsletters. The monument and the dedication ceremony was the culmination of the years of hard work put in by all those involved. He noted that ours was the most well attended dedication event held at the NNMC to date. It surpassed the numbers for the Chesty Puller statue. We had in excess of 400 at the ceremony. Phil reminded those who have purchased bricks that we have the second most purchases behind the Marine Corps League, which is a national organization, with a much larger membership than us. Not to be missed is the outstanding speech given by General Klimp. It was an awe inspiring message given by a Warrior, to Warriors. We love that humble guy, as he works very hard behind the scenes to help us in any way he can, and never wants any credit. He is the hallmark of many, many men who do the same for 2/1 every day. Many thanks to all of you

Rear Right - Origin of Ghost Battalion
Initially, units of the battalion conducted heliborne raids into enemy held areas. Because these assault units would suddenly appear, then disappear only to reappear in a different location, the enemy radio operators referred to the battalion as "Ghosts".

During May 1968 while operating in the Khe Sanh area, the battalion out maneuvered elements of the North Vietnamese Army. When the NVA Commander informed his HQ Command that he lost contact with the battalion. he was relieved of his command. The intercepted NVA message traffic referred to 2d Battalion, 1st Marines as a "Ghost Battalion".

"They learned not to rely on us; they learned to rely on each other. And they were special in another way: They chose to be faithful. They chose to reject the fashionable skepticism of their time. They chose to believe and answer the call of duty. They had the wild, wild courage of youth. They seized certainty from the heart of an ambivalent age; they stood for something. And we owe them something, those boys. We owe them first a promise: That just as they did not forget their missing comrades, neither, ever, will we." R. Reagan 1986

THE ORIGIN OF 'THE GHOST BATTALION'

In September 1965, 2d Battalion, 1st Marines [2/1] was the Special Landing Force [SLF] for the 7th Fleet with the mission of conducting amphibious raids against North Vietnamese Army [NVA] and Viet Cong [VC] infiltration and marshaling points in widely dispersed areas along the coast of South Vietnam. These raids were code named "Dagger Thrust".

The first of the five raids occurred on 25 and 27 September without any contact with NVA/VC forces. The third raid occurred on October 1 where some light resistance was encountered. Afterward, The 7th Fleet with 2/1 aboard sailed for Indonesian waters and did not return until late November when the last of the Dagger Thrust occurred. Here, the battalion was moderately successful in an encounter with VC forces. In December, the battalion participated in Operation Harvest Moon, a joint operation with the ARVN [Army of the Republic of Vietnam] forces. In early 1966, The Battalion operated in the area around Phu Bai as well as assisting an ARVN Battalion in the Phu Thu Peninsula. In June the Battalion was again on the move with the 4th Marines and ARVN units in Operation Jay. In July the battalion participated in Operation Hastings against NVA forces less than 2 miles south of the DMZ.

Afterward, it was reported that Hanoi Hanna, the English speaking voice of the NVA propaganda radio, referred to the battalion as "ghosts" because the battalion had been 'wiped out' during Operation Hastings but had reappeared elsewhere. Thus, in a period of less than a year, the battalion had been in action in widely scattered areas along the coast as well as inland areas of Vietnam, appearing and then disappearing only to reappear again at a distant location.

During December 1967, the battalion took control of the Con Thien Combat Base along the DMZ and conducted operations in that area until late March 1968. Afterward, the battalion became the "point of the spear" for ground attack in Operation Pegasus attacking along Route 9 to the Khe Sanh Combat Base. Operation Pegasus ended on 15 April 1968. The battalion assumed the role of the ground unit for the combat base.At that time, the NVA strength operating in the Khe Sanh area was estimated to be three regiments and 1 battalion.

In early May, the whole battalion was conducting a search and destroy operation 'outside the wire' in the areas around Hill 881 North when they came under intense NVA mortar and artillery fire. During this barrage, the Bn CO, LtCol. Billy R. Duncan [Texas Pete 6] was med-evac'd to a hospital ship. However, after it was determined that his injury was mainly concussion, he convinced the CO Marine Air Group 16 to fly him back to the battalion where we re-assumed command. During the next 18 hours, the battalion out-maneuvered the vastly superior NVA forces and returned to the Combat Base. It was also reported that the senior NVA Commander in the Khe Sanh area was relieved when he reported that the Marines were 'ghosts' and had evaded him. The CO, Mag 16 also reported that intercepted NVA communications referred to 2/1 as ghosts.

Thus the 2d Battalion, 1st Marines of the Vietnam era is "The Ghost Battalion".

JANUARY 21ST LUNCHEON IN CHICO, CALIFORNIA

By Craig W. Tourte

It is not a federal nor state holiday, it is not a time when the general public would normally honor those who have served and sacrificed, but each year January 21st is a time when those who fought in and around the Marine Corps Combat Base of Khe Sanh remember those who preserved, did not return and those who supported that gallant effort of survival. Khe Sanh Veterans Steve Wiese, David Lind, Tom Horchler, Marco Soto, David Tonick, Craig Tourte, Kenneth Sawyer, Charles Teasley, Ned Borlaug and Louis Raddigan gathered once again with members of the Northern California community to honor those who not only served at Khe Sanh but also to honor all who have served and are currently serving in our Armed Forces. It is a special day for many, just regular folks doing something extra-ordinary and so appreciated by the many veterans in attendance at the Eagles Hall in Chico California.

I am reminded of a recent Khe Sanh Board post made by Neil Kenny where he quotes an article written by Sgt Maj Dougherty. The last paragraph reads It is that sense of belonging to something that will outlive our own mortality which gives people a light to live by and a flame to mark their passing.

Veterans and community supporters gathered in Chico for a small simple luncheon because of that sense of belonging to a very small family. A family of veterans and friends who continue to care about each other and who gather to recognize the sacrifice of too many who were unable to return home with us. If they are now forgotten by their friends or family, they have not been forgotten by us. If their graves stones are overgrown and their names are no longer mentioned, we acknowledge their lives and deeds. Each January 21st we who gather are the flame to mark their passing.

KHE SANH MENTIONED AT HAWAIIAN PUNCH BOWL CEMETERY

By Craig W. Tourte

I was reading through the February 2013 edition of VFW Magazine when I came across an article titled "Vietnam Maps at Punchbowl. " The article read, "Courts of the Missing at the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific in Hawaii were made complete with the Vietnam Battle maps on Veterans Day. Designed by 90-year-old artist Mary Jacobs, who created the original WWII and Korea maps, the mosaic maps were installed in a pavilion at the monument's top. As VFW's Senior Vice Commander-in-Chief Bill Thien said, Vietnam veterans are getting up in age now - so it's a legacy for our children to be able to come here and see maps portraying their war."

"The maps constitute the first federal permanent tribute to the Vietnam War built exclusively with tax dollars. Inscribed on the Vietnam pavilion are the words of World War I - era poet Archibald MacLeish - We leave you our deaths, give them their meaning."

The memorial at the top of the cemetery contains a small chapel and tributes on mosaic maps to the various battles fought in the Pacific.

I had been to the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific (Punch Bowl) in the State of Hawaii on the Island of Oahu before. Each time I visited I was humbled just being on such hallowed ground where so many of American's war dead are interred, including many who served at Khe Sanh.

It was winter in California when the gentle warm breezes of the Islands called to me once again. I grabbed my golf clubs, a change of socks, a pair of shorts, an aloha shirt and took the red eye from Sacramento to Hawaii, landing on Oahu 5 hours later. After checking into the U.S. Army owned Hale Koa Hotel on the beach of Waikiki I rented a car and drove up the mountain to the "Punch Bowl."

Located in its own pavilion at the top of the Memorial are two battle maps of the Vietnam War. The mosaic map on the left or south side reads "The Vietnam War 1959-1973." The mosaic map on the right or north side reads "The American Ground War in South Vietnam 1965-1973." Each map has 5 paragraphs describing historic battles and events. The south map has them listed 1 through 5 and the north map 6 through 10. The north map paragraph 6 reads, "In South Vietnam's I Corps Tactical Zone (I Corps) the North Vietnamese attached across the demilitarized zone or with short hooks through Laos into Khe Sanh and the A Shau Valley. U.S. Marines beat back recurrent ground assaults and fought prolonged artillery duels with an entrenched enemy. Front-line combat complicated security efforts elsewhere. United States Army units reinforced the Marines, providing additional artillery and helicopters to assist with counterinsurgency."

Since the cemetery was dedicated on September 2, 1949, approximately 25,000 World War I, World War II, the Korean, and Vietnam Veterans who lost their lives were interred there.

The National Cemetery is truly an American treasure and I appreciated once again the opportunity to visit and pay tribute and honor those who served and sacrificed. The words Khe Sanh inscribed in that mosaic panel will forever confirm that the Battle of Khe Sanh was truly an important historic even and one in which the millions who visit the cemetery each year will read and remember.

OBIT

LAWRENCE R. LEON USMC
BRAVO CO 1/9 KHE SANH VETERAN

Lawrence Robert Leon was born on August 1, 1940 on the Tejon Ranch in Tehachapi, California to Marceline-Cordero Leon and George Lawrence Leon. Lawrence was a member of the Piute tribe of American Indians. After Lawrence Graduated from Bakersfield High and was quite proud to be member of the varsity football team.

After Lawrence graduated from high school, he immediately joined the United States Marine Corps where he proudly served until 1970.

While stationed at Camp Pendleton, he served as a drill sergeant and his love for football carried over here as well. Lawrence continued to play football on Marine Corps teams. While stationed in San Diego he joined the Camp Pendleton Rodeo Team and rode "rough stock".

During his 12 years of service with the USMC, Lawrence was in active combat in Viet Nam for a period of three and a half years. He was assigned to Recon and the famous 1st Battalion, 9th Marines, also known as the "Walking Dead". He was with 1/9 during the Siege of Khe Sanh. He also survived the Siege of Con Thien. In addition to being engaged in active combat, Lawrence also served as an Embassy Guard for the United States Embassy in Saigon.

Lawrence was not only a dedicated Marine, but he was recognized and decorated as well. He received a battle field commission as a 2ndLieutenant served several months as an Infantry Unit Leader. In addition, he was a respected small arms instructor known for his expertise with small tactics. Lawrence was awarded a Bronze Star with Valor for his bravery in combat along with a Purple Heart with 2-stars acknowledging his combat wounds.

After the Marines, Lawrence was able to return to the cowboy spirit at the Rankin Ranch in Walker Basin. There he met his wife Linda Leon. While married to Linda, Lawrence decided to become a professional big- rig driver and ultimately retired from Apex Bulk Commodities to live in Walker Basin, where he and Linda enjoyed the quiet life with their dogs and kitties.

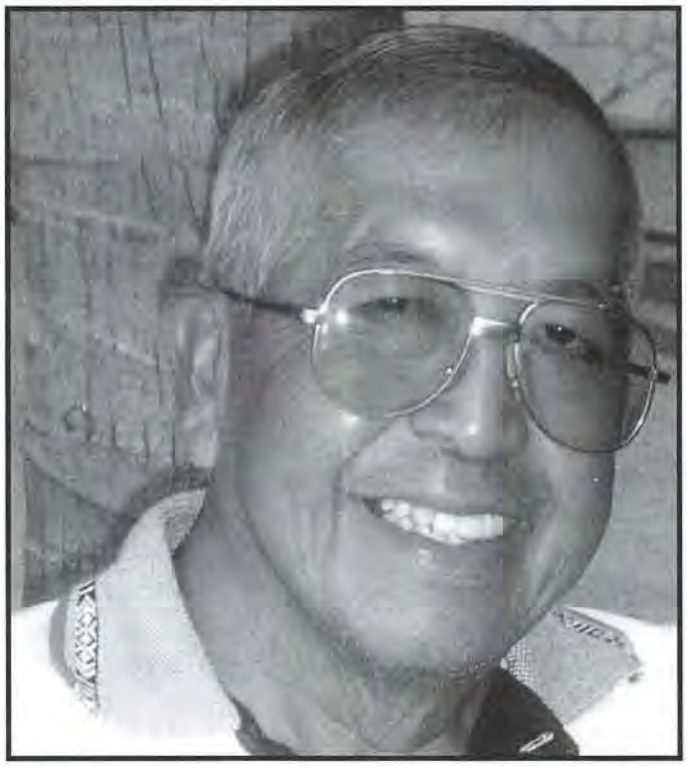
Lawrence was a man of few words. In short he was a good Marine, good cowboy, and good man. His nature was reminiscent of still waters however, we all know that still waters run deep.

Lawrence joined his parents, George Lawrence Leon and Marceline Cordero Leon, brothers, George Leon and John Leon, and two sisters, Frances Leon Price and Carol Leon Garza on October 5, 2013. Lawrence leaves behind his wife of 26 years Linda Leon, two stepsons Sean and Ryan Tejaratchi, sisters Marcelina Thelma Leon and Christine Leon Martinez, brother, Henry Leon along with a host of family and friends.



ARTICLE ON KHE SANH IN LEATHERNECK MAGAZINE JULY 1968. SEVERAL KSV ARE MENTIONED

Story and photos by Sgt John Martin

Although the few newspapers which had filtered in shortly before the Easter weekend declared that the threat to Khe sanh was over, the marines who were manning the base were taking no chances

True, they could now eat their own C-ration meals above ground and engage in outdoor activities without the fear of incoming rounds. But they still made it a point to keep their helmets on and their flak jackets tight about their bodies whenever they ventured far from the safety of their bunkers.

But there was a definite release of tension in the air. With the withdrawal of several battalions from the Khe Sanh base to go into the surrounding hills to seek out the enemy, and the knowledge that the road from Ca Lu was being secured by the infantry and made accessible by the engineers, the atmosphere was one of a big, inaudible "Whew!"

For 77 days, commencing January 21, 1968, the Marines had lived a life of constant harassment. It had been approximately two and one-half months of constant enemy shelling, day and night. For 11 weeks they had lived with filth, grime, red dust and rats. There had been uncountable hours, minutes, and seconds of fear, prayer, hope and death around the battle-scarred bunkers of Khe Sanh.

But in spite of it all, morale ran high. And Col David E. Lownds, the commander of the 26th Marine Regiment and its supporting units during the continual peppering of Khe Sanh, "never had a doubt" that, in the event the enemy had elected to attack, Khe Sanh could have been defended.

"I had the finest enlisted men in the world," Col Lownds stated. "And they had the best morale, under the conditions, that any commander could ask for. Since January 21," he recalled, "there was no hot chow, no beer, and no showers available. But every Marine I saw had a smile on his face. To them goes all the credit."

LtGen Robert E. Cushman, Jr., commanding general of the III Marine Amphibious Force in Vietnam, expressed his opinion as to why the North Vietnamese had never ventured to attack Khe Sanh. "Because they'd have been slaughtered," he said, "and they knew it!"

Gen Cushman attributed the let-up on Khe Sanh to three things. First, he pointed out, there was the fortitude and combativeness of the Marines there. Second, there was the tremendous air effort which blasted the enemy from their positions in their hills. And, third, there was the accurate barrage of artillery fire directed at the enemy by the 1st Battalion, 13th Marine Regiment.

"The trouble is," said Gen Cushman, "that everybody counts the incoming rounds. No one ever counts the outgoing. We replied a hundred fold to every enemy shell. We beat them down. The area was becoming untenable for the enemy."

The opinions of Gen Cushman and Col Lownds are shared by all the Marines who can say, "I served at Khe Sanh." Cpl Don H. Wiggins was "kind of disappointed" that the enemy had never attacked. And LCpl Timothy Wright, who had been flown into Khe Sanh as a replacement in early March, during the heat of the onslaught, told us that he didn't mind it a bit. "I knew what it was like when I found out I was coming here," he said.

With the bigger part of the threat to Khe Sanh diminished, it was evident that a smaller force could handle the base itself and that many of the Marines would move into the hills surrounding Khe Sanh to provide a greater area of defense. Some were glad about leaving their bunkers; others were not.

"I was scared out of my wits when I got here in February," said LCpl Joe Haggard, "but, now, look here's the place. We dug the bunkers and got the incoming, and now I might have to leave. There may be hot chow in other places but this this is home."

Sgt Johnny Baker shared Haggard's opinion. "I was shaky when I got here," he admitted. "But Khe Sanh is like any other duty station. If I'm going to get 'blown away,' I'll get 'blown away' no matter where I'm at."

All the Marines seemed to think of the incoming rounds in a philosophical manner. "If I get hit," said PFC Robert Reyna, a member of Alpha Battery, 1st Battalion, 13th Marines, "there must be a reason; because something is guiding my every step and movement. I'm proud to be here and glad to be doing my part."

And Lt Charles T. Kelly, USN, one of the chaplains at Khe Sanh, had words to that effect in his Holy Saturday services, held in a dingy bunker at Khe Sanh. "Men," he said, "we must consider ourselves dead to sin, but alive to God."

The men sang. "Rock of Ages" and "Holy God, We Praise Thy Name," and Chaplain Kelly gave the epistle to Cpl Jim Hill to read aloud and Cpl Dennis Finley read the gospel.

Faith, hope and sheer determination helped sustain the Marines' at Khe Sanh during those hammering days. They had faith in their own capabilities; hope that the supplies would come in; and the pilots had sheer determination in flaunting en emy fire to deliver their necessary cargoes.

Reminiscent of the Berlin Airlift in scope was the supply stream which flowed into Khe Sanh. In spite of heavy enemy artillery and hornets' nests of small arms fire, directed specifically at many of the incoming planes, the pilots got through to Khe Sanh. They either unloaded their cargoes in precious seconds on the runway before taking off again or dropped them from the air by parachute.

And the fact that not all the supply planes flew out again was dramatized in the wreckage of several helicopters and transport planes, lying in twisted metal graveyards along the airstrip.

But the planes rolled in despite the enemy, because. the Marines at Khe Sanh needed the supplies to keep them going. "They did a good job," remarked Maj W. T. Cook, assistant S-4 officer for the 26th Marines. "We received outstanding support from the Air Force planes, the Third Marine Division, and the Force Logistic Command."

Cpl Ernie Ross, a member of the open air post office section at Khe Sanh, also had praise for the mail drops. "Most of the time," he said, "the mail came in whenever they could get it to us. Once, more than a week went by with no mail. Then, they dropped in 40,000 pounds of it."

Looking at an aerial view of Khe Sanh is like looking at one-third of the base. The rest is underground. In small, one and two man hootches, to larger Lv shaped "office" bunkers, all the way up to the underground complex which houses the Combat Operations Center, the Marines lived and worked beneath the red dust carpet of Khe Sanh, their way lit only by candles and, in some places, electric lights that didn't always work.

One of the most vital and active points was "Charlie Med," the casualty treatment center operated by Charlie Company of the 3d Medical Battalion. Although Charlie Med treated upwards of 2,000 casualties during the siege of Khe Sanh, according to Lt Edward Feldman, one of the Navy doctors there, his own biggest challange came on the first day of the bombardment when PFC Robert Mussari was hit by an 82-mm. mortar fuze which lodged in his stomach without detonating.

"They brought him in with a large battle dressing on his abdomen," recalled Lt Feldman, "and we took him down inside Charlie Med and padded him with sandbags.

"We didn't know how much time we would have before the fuze detonated so SSgt Ronald Sniegowski from the 3d Engineer Battalion stood by to help if it looked like it would go off."

While HM3 Roger Tillotson, a Navy corpsman, stood by with four flashlights shining into the exposed area, SSgt Sniegowski handed the instruments to Lt Feldman who removed the tissue around the fuze and extracted it in a ten-minute operation.

The fuze, which was slightly smaller than a hot sauce bottle, was then buried outside until an EOD team could arrive to blow it up. "We had no anesthetic available for the operation," Lt Feldman said, "but he never flinched or cried once.

He said he wanted to comeback to Khe Sanh again."(Mussari is now receiving additional treatment in Pennsylvania.) "This is typical of all the Marines," Feldman went on. "They never cry out in pain. In all of our experiences, most of the casualties are more worried about their buddies than themselves. None of them wanted to leave Khe Sanh."

Pfc James C. Heard, who had arrived at Khe Sanh shortly before the hostilities began, was one such Marine. Heard was hit in the arm with shrapnel from an exploding mortar. His wound wasn't serious enough to warrant evacuation. However, he was the type who would have wanted to come back, if the injury had required him to be medevaced.

Heard shared the unanimous sigh of relief, however, after the threat to Khe Sanh had died down. "You feel real good after everything is over," he said.

The Army's First Air Cavalry Division, having finished its sweep up Route #9, had moved into Khe Sanh. But they were already in the process of mounting helicopters out again, to head for other parts of the war.

The Marine force, too, had been largely diminished, with field units swarming the hills around Khe Sanh to take enemy positions and provide a more mobile defense of the area. And, while the 11th Engineers put the finishing touches on Route #9, the supply route they had nicknamed "USMC 11," the enemy struck again at Khe Sanh.

All day on Easter Sunday, artillery rounds fell on the base. This time, the fire was thought to come from inside Laos, since Marines had captured most of the enemy gun points in the hills.

But incoming was nothing knew to Marines in Vietnam, especially those at Khe Sanh, and the possibility of the problems involved in an enemy ground attack had been eliminated.

Perhaps one of the biggest threats to Khe Sanh during the deluge was the fear of the unknown. Newspapers had suggested that the defenders of Khe Sanh might meet the same fate as the French had in the historic battle of Dien Bien Phu. On March 14, the 54th day of the Khe Sanh saga, the word went around that North Vietnamese General Giap, who was reportedly masterminding the attack on Khe Sanh, had finished Dien Bien Phu on Day 54!

But Khe Sanh is still there and the Marines are now certain that history will not repeat itself ....

REMEMBERANCES

by Mac - Milton McNeely

January 20, 1968 Khe Sanh

Today is January 20, 2014, and looking back to 1968 there is actually one thing that I remember about this day all those years ago. This was the day that I submitted a request for extension of my tour in Vietnam. We could request any duty station in RVN and get a free 30 day leave anywhere in the free world, if we would agree to extend our tour in Nam for an additional six months. I thought long and hard about my choice of possible duty stations and of destinations for that leave.

The crazy thing is that of all the exotic locations where I could have gone, the only place I really considered was home. Nope, it wasn't girlfriends. After ten months in Nam, I had already received Dear Johns from the three girls that I had kinda been dating and about a half-dozen others that I didn't even know that I was having a relationship with. Oh yeah, there was even a "don't ever write me again" letter from one of those high school let's be pen pals to a serviceman in Vietnam girls. Seems she graduated from high school and went on to the University of Wisconsin in Madison and was told by her classmates that she shouldn't be associating with us warmonger-baby killer types. Any way, home is where I wanted to go and that's what I put in the request.

A few of the guys knew I was extending . Crazy-nuts-etc., they said. They thought it even more foolish and senseless when I said I was going home on leave instead of maybe Denmark, home of beautiful, blonde-haired, blue-eyed vixens or maybe South America for some of those darker, hotter-blooded Latino ladies. Well, you know what the guys were thinking. But the kicker was that my choice of duty stations would be to remain with Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Marines. Proof enough of absolute insanity for just about everyone. In a few hours even I would doubt my sanity for extending but of course most of us knew we had to be a little crazy for enlisting in the Marine Corps during wartime in the first place. Enlisting in the Marines in 1966 might have been a little crazy but that's how I chose to avoid the draft. Just call me a creative draft dodger.

Sitting idle and contemplating the reasons why I extended my tour for more than a hour now and while I think of a number of reasons that I sold myself on and even a few shared with others back then, I really feel that deep down there was more and I can't seem to get it out. If I write maybe it will come, so let's see, there's the extra 80 or 90 dollars a month in combat pay. No, don't think so. After I got back to the states I had a number of moonlighting jobs and it was easy enough to make more than that. There is the 30 days free leave, but wait, 30 days or a permanent, until end of enlistment, back in the states duty station. Just doesn't work, does it?

How about a little guilt that I really hadn't done my part yet so a little overtime was in order and of course the whole survivor's guilt thing from friends lost especially those on June 7, 1967. Yep, there is that.

Then there is the fact that I was serving with men that I considered the best of the best. Men that I had great respect for and admired. I'll not start dropping names here as many of you reading this know those names and several reading are likely those that I speak of. The men I was serving with and that we were truly doing something worthwhile, is the one I haven't given enough consideration to in the past. This was a chapter of my life that I wasn't ready to end and ultimately the greatest of the real reasons that I chose to return to Vietnam when I didn't have to.

The Siege would begin in a few hours and those 77 days would be a chapter, no a book, in and of itself and really has nothing to do with my extending my tour except that a few days, maybe a week, into the Siege Lt. Ferral, 1/26 Battalion Adjutant, gave me the opportunity to withdraw my extension request. I was surprised by his offer and I think we were both a little surprised by my answer to let it stand. I mentioned this to my wife a few minutes ago and she said that it would not have been like me to withdraw or renege. I hadn't thought of it in that light but like to think that she is correct.

By now at least some reading this rambling have figured out that I really didn't intend to write about extending. My intention was to write about the events and my part and view of those events of January 21, 1968. Guess I'm stalling and rabbit chasing and that's normal for me for this time of the year. Yes, I have written about the 21st a little before and more often than not my attempts to do so have either failed completely or just kind of fizzled out. I'll even attempt to start with something I have never been able to write about or get past. It's not at the beginning but for me somewhere around the halfway mark of January 21, 1968. At least the halfway mark of leaving the Ponderosa and heading to the perimeter and Lt. Dillon's bunker.

January 21, 1968

The screams began as we once again raised to attempt running a few yards. We hesitated and listened and partially felt the unbearable pain and terror broadcasted by a single voice but with a volume that almost matched the rocket explosion that caused it. Screams amplified by the silence of a few seconds respite from incoming. There were two of us, Lance Corporal Lonnie Gipson and my-self. We hesitated and in that hesitation we communicated the unspoken question, "Continue on our quest to the perimeter or divert to the wounded man?" There never should have been doubt or question but the screams were so terrible as to cause hesitation and fear. Even as we turned to the screams, they abruptly stopped. So abruptly that we decided it was pointless to continue in that direction. We never spoke of it later except in inquiry, an attempt to learn who he was and verify our suspicions of his fate. The best I can account he did die within a few very long seconds after being hit. The rocket came straight into the open doorway of a very small above ground sandbag bunker. Our understanding was that he probably should have died instantly. Still and even though our assessment that it was pointless to try to give aid was probably justified, I am haunted by the screams and by not going just to make sure.

Note: It's taken 46 years to write this paragraph.

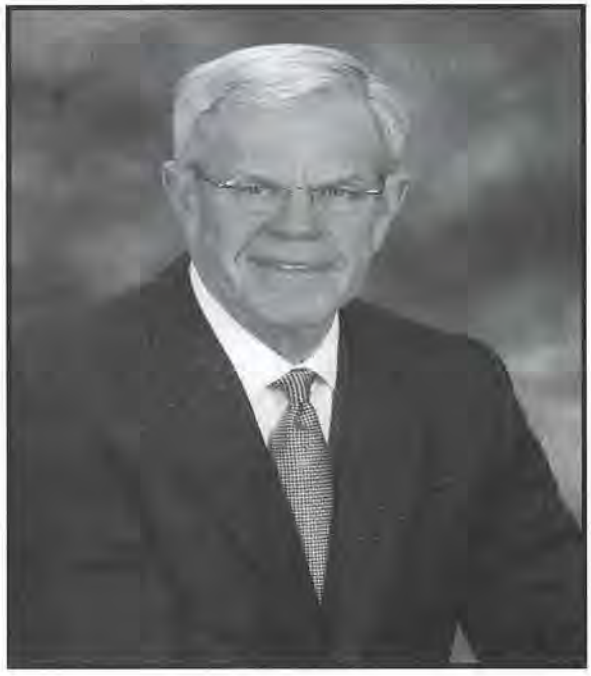
January 21, 1968

On this day in 1968 I arrive in Hawaii for R&R to meet my wife, Linda, who I had not seen for 8 months. This was also the day the siege of Khe Sanh began. I had orders to Khe Sanh upon my return Vietnam, and was not too excited about my new duty station considering all the TV news. In less than a week I was back in-country trying to find my unit and my gear. The TET Offensive was in full swing, even though TET was not until January 30. After quite an adventure, I arrive at Khe Sanh on February 5 by running down the ramp of a moving C130 as it threw out supplies. When it came to the end of the runway, it turned around and took off. Welcome to Khe Sanh -- what a great place to spend my next 70 days.



OBIT

KERRY BIGNALL USN KHE SANH VETERAN VO-67 JANUARY 21, 2014

Bignall served in the Navy's VO-67 Squadron as a flight engineer on a converted P2V-5 Neptune. Flying out of Thailand, their mission was to fly at at low level in mountainous terrain to drop motion, infra red and other sensors over Laos and North Vietnams Ho Chi Minh Trail. This enabled the Air force to hit the troops & supplies coming down from the North. The unit and its 12 aircraft, normally used for A.S.W. operations, took 25% casualties before it stood down from operations. It did force the NVA to adopt some unusual counter measures that included playing tapes of truck noises to fool the air controllers directing the air strikes. VO-67 never stopped the flow of supplies, but they did help make the NVA pay a heavy price and with their high risk 500 ft altitude missions, helped defend the Marine base at Khe Sanh in 1968. In 2003 the US Government corrected a long overdue omission and awarded Kerry the DFC for his missions.

In 1999 Kerry was the first Navy GOLD WING Combat Air crewman from the Vietnam era to be inducted into the ENLISTED COMBAT AIR CREW ROLL OF HONOR upon the USS Yorktown CV-10 at Patriots Point, SC.

Kerry was born Dec 16, 1944 in Trona, California (up above Ridgecrest in the high desert). He has a brother (William James) and a sister (Ginger Mary). Kerry: "His father (Kenneth Otis) was a Navy Chief sonarman in WWII. After the Navy, he went to work for Philco Ford Corp, Palo Alto, California. His mother (Mary Eileen) was a photographer and housewife.

CHAPLAINS CORNER

Chaplain Ron Rayner

TAKE CARE OF YOUR MIND, BODYAND SOUL

As Chaplain for the Waterford, Michigan Fire Department, I entered one of the fire stations and observed eight off-duty firefighters running flights of stairs with self-contained breathing-apparatus strapped to their back. They were working out to maintain a high level of physical fitness to do their job and prepare for a charity stair climbing event. Though at age 65, I am not ready to climb 72 flights of stairs for charity, I realized I needed to drop a few pounds. As Chaplain for the Khe Sanh Veterans, I am passing on some of the inspirational materials that I have discovered to help me on the path to better physical, mental and spiritual health.

"A prudent person foresees the danger ahead and takes precautions. The simpleton goes blindly on and suffers the consequences." Proverbs 27:12

"Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit, who is in you, whom you have received from God? You are not your own; you were bought you at a price. Therefore honor God with your body". "I Corinthians 6:1-20 (NIV)

I am not my own? I cannot change the past abuse of my mind and body or negligence of my spiritual side, but I can take better care of them from this point forward. Months before dying of cancer NCAA Champion Basketball Coach Jim Valvano stated the following; "I urge all of you to enjoy your life. Every precious moment you have on this earth. Spend each day with some laughter. Don't be afraid to feel … to get your emotions going. Be enthusiastic, because nothing great can be accomplished without enthusiasm. Live your dreams."

Now is the time to enjoy life. I know in my younger years I did not like grumpy old people. I have to do a daily evaluation make sure I am not one. I can't do anything about being old, but I don't have to be grumpy.

A group of dedicated firefighters inspired me to work on my mind, body and soul and it is my prayer that all of us Khe Sanh Veterans are looking out for each other. Phone calls, visits, gatherings, emails and snail mail can help inspire someone to a more fulfilling life. Use your Khe Sanh Veterans Directory. I have found that my worst symptom of PTSD is isolating from everyone. The Bible tells us in Proverbs 27:17 "As iron sharpens iron, a friend sharpens a friend."

We took care of each other in Vietnam and some of you have been doing it ever since. Others like me have been in and out of the loop. The message board at khesanh.com has been a great help to me as chaplain.

On a recent trip out west, I was out walking to help tone my body when I saw Mars come shining up over the horizon. A Cheshire cat smile moon soon followed. I thought, only God can create something that beautiful. That peaceful morning walk, the scenery and a prayer of thanksgiving gave nourishment to my mind, body and soul.

I now daily keep working at taking care of myself, my family and my friends.
" This is the day that the Lord hath made; let us rejoice and be glad in it."
Psalm 118:24

May all the Khe Sanh brothers and their families have a blessed 2014. Amen.

BOOK REVIEW

LAST STAND AT KHE SANH
By Gregg Jones

Seventy-seven days in 1968, amid fears that America faced its own disastrous Dien Bien Phu, 6,000 US Marines held off 30,000 North Vietnamese Army regulars at the remote mountain stronghold called Khe Sanh. It was the biggest battle of the Vietnam War, with sharp ground engagements, devastating artillery duels, and massive US air strikes. After several weeks of heroic defense, the besieged Americans struck back in a series of bold assaults, and the North Vietnamese withdrew with heavy losses.

Last Stand at Khe Sanh is the vivid, fast-paced account of the dramatic confrontation as experienced by the men who were there: Marine riflemen and grenadiers, artillery and air observers, platoon leaders and company commanders, Navy corpsmen and helicopter pilots, and a plucky band of US Army Special Forces. Based on extensive archival research and more than 100 interviews with participants, Last Stand at Khe Sanh captures the courage and camaraderie of the defenders and delivers the fullest account yet of this epic battle.

AUTHORS NOTE:

Dear Khe Sanh veterans,

As I write this letter, the book I have been working on for the past three years, Last Stand at Khe Sanh, is about to go to press. As many of you know, it is a narrative history of the three months of siege at Khe Sanh in early 1968. I hope you will be pleased with the final product. Even more, I hope that you will read it and be able to tell your friends and families: This is what it was like.

As I said many times during this journey—in long conversations with many of you, in brief encounters at Khe Sanh reunions, phone conversations or email exchanges with others—I had two objectives when I began this project: to write a book of exceptional historical integrity, and to honor your service at Khe Sanh. I have devoted myself to these ends for the past three years, and now, the deadline demands of my publisher have brought me to the end of the road.

For several months now, I've been on a succession of deadlines. I've completed and fact-checked and proofed a 400-page manuscript. I've gathered photographs and winnowed about 300 images down to a final lineup of 38 for a 16-page photo insert. I've designed and commissioned the creation of 8 pages of maps, There has not been time to reflect on everything I've experienced in this journey the past three years, so I have a jumble of thoughts and emotions as I try to get this letter to Tom Eichler before the Red Clay deadline.

I can tell you that having the opportunity to share your story with other Americans has been the highest honor of my thirty-plus years in journalism and book-writing. I began this project knowing only vaguely what you experienced at Khe Sanh. I stand in awe after learning in detail what you endured and accomplished. I had hoped to speak to hundreds of you about those experiences; ultimately, I interviewed about 90 Khe Sanh veterans and a few family members and friends before deadline demands forced me to begin shaping what I had learned into a narrative that would do literary justice to your real-life feats of courage and camaraderie. Among the many regrets I will always have is that I was not able to speak with more of you. It certainly is no reflection on the respect I have for you and your service. This comment applies as well to the men who served at Khe Sanh in the Hill Fights of 1967, and in the years before and after. To those of you who made time to speak with me: I can't thank you enough for your generosity and trust. I hope this book meets and exceeds your expectations.

Writing this book has been one of the greatest challenges of my career. When I stepped away from the interviewing process, I had hundreds of hours of interview tapes and transcripts to go along with thousands of pages of archival documents, as well as all the books that have been published on Khe Sanh since 1968. The discrepancies and inconsistencies I encountered in all this material numbered in the hundreds. I lost more than a little sleep as I tried to work through these discrepancies, build an accurate timeline, and arrive at the best version of the truth as revealed by the preponderance of the evidence.

The challenges of sorting through a muddled historical record pale in comparison to the anguish that mounted over three years as I tried to shape several hundred thousand words of information and interview transcripts into a compelling narrative that told the story of Khe Sanh between January and July 1968. The demands of artful storytelling required building a narrative around a relatively small number of characters and scenes. Everyone I interviewed is mentioned at least twice in the book—in the acknowledgments section at the front, and in the bibliography section at the back. But I had to make some very difficult choices in selecting the personal accounts and scenes that would convey the larger story of what transpired at Khe Sanh.

I wrote a first draft that was upwards of 150,000 words, more than 50 percent above what my very patient editor at Da Capo Press thought was a reasonable ceiling. I cut that manuscript to 125,000 words, and then proceeded to add a few thousand words here and there during the editing process as I conducted more interviews and tried to restore some of the material I had earlier cut. Still, hundreds of pages of accounts and scenes ended up on the cutting-room floor. Some of you will be disappointed (and perhaps angry) to find your accounts missing from the book. I can only tell you that I did not take any of these decisions lightly, and I apologize for not being able to include everyone's account at length. I also want to assure you that the information you imparted to me contributed greatly to my knowledge and to my ability to tell this story with authority. I've agonized over this, and even now, I continue to contemplate ways to share some of these experiences with a wider audience outside the book.

In the coming months, I'm happy to answer any questions you might have about the book. I hope I will get to see many, if not most of you, at upcoming Khe Sanh reunions or other stops along the way. I look forward to adding even more friends than I already have in the magnificent community of Khe Sanh veterans. Thank you all for this unforgettable experience, and for your service to our nation.

Sincerely, Gregg Jones

In a journalism career that spanned 30 years and five continents, Missouri native Gregg Jones wrote in-depth stories on such varied topics as revolutionary upheaval in Asia, steroid abuse among U.S. high school athletes and oil development in the Amazon rainforest. His many honors include four Texas Headliner Awards and a Sigma Delta Chi Public Service Award for online journalism, and he has been a finalist for the Pulitzer Prize and the Gerald Loeb Awards for Distinguished Business and Financial Journalism. He is the author of two nonfiction books: Honor in the Dust: Theodore Roosevelt, War in the Philippines and the Rise and Fall of America's Imperial Dream (NAL/Penguin, 2012) and Red Revolution: Inside the Philippine Guerrilla Movement (Westview Press, 1989). He is currently writing his third book, Last Stand at Khe Sanh, about the epic Vietnam War battle in 1968. He lives in Addison, Texas with his wife, Ali, their son, Chris, and two cats.

ROBERT CRABB SCHOLARSHIP
KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION

GOVERNING RULES FOR OPERATIONS OF THE KHE SANH VETERANS, INC. SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION:

1. The purpose of the Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. Scholarship Foundation (KSVSF) is to provide financial aid to high school graduates who plan to attend an accredited institution as a full time student OR who are currently enrolled full time in an accredited post-secondary curriculum.

2. Scholarships will be awarded to applicant students who have at least one parent, legal guardian, or grandparent who is a paid member in good standing of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., a 501(c)(19) charitable Organization

3. IT IS THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STUDENT TO SEE THAT THE SCHOLARSHIP APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS ARE FULLY COMPLETED AND SENT DIRECTLY TO THE SCHOLARSHIP CHAIR BEFORE 5/1/2014 AT THE ADDRESS BELOW;

Mr. Dan Fisher
KSVSF Committee Chairman
6050 52nd St. North
Oakdale, MN 55128-1317

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION

Applicants must be the legal child or grandchild of a paid up member of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc. (See member definition in the KSV Association bylaws.) This includes deceased, life members of KSV and those Khe Sanh Veterans listed as KIA/MIA in Vietnam if family members are paid up, associate members of KSV, Inc. Children or grandchildren of KSV associate members are not eligible.

Information provided by each candidate on the attached application forms will focus on the following qualities considered for selection to KSVSF financial aid: good grades, character, citizenship, leadership experience and personal essay. A point selection system is included in the application forms.
Examples of these above mentioned qualities could be in the classroom, in extracurricular activities or in service to the community, church or nation.

A Scholarship Foundation Review Committee will serve the President of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., and will accept, review and grade each correctly completed application. This committee will provide a scholarship financial report and short summaries of the selected candidates at the annual KSV reunion for publication in the " RED CLAY" Newsletter.

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS

The amount of financial award per applicant will be determined by the Review Committee's scoring results. The awards will be granted for a maximum of 4 years per student. A new application will be required for each continuous year applied.

Achievement Award Levels are:

The Col. David E. Lownds Award - for top achievement in Application Review (one award or tie)
The Sgt. Major James T. Gaynor Award - for high achievement in Application Review (5 awards)
The Col. William H. Dabney Award - for honorable achievement in Application Review (6 Awards)

The KSV Scholarship money will be awarded upon presentation of proof of registration for the appropriate term. Proof of registration should be sent to the chairman's address on page one of this application.

Scholarship Guidelines and Purpose

1. The financial award is to be used to help defray costs of tuition, fees and books at an accredited institution of the applicant's choice as a full time student.

2. If a recipient of the KSVSF scholarship does not enter a post high school institution during the next school year, the award for his/her benefit shall be cancelled and the money awarded to an alternate applicant. An alternate of each scholarship award is to be chosen at the time of selection of recipients.

3. The KSVSF Committee Chair and the Treasurer of Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., will send a check for the full years' award amount to the selected students upon final approval by the KSV President.

4. The recipient of a scholarship shall be notified no later than the end of the month of August of the coming school year.

5. Scholarship Applications must be received by the Committee Chair on or before MAY 1 of the school year applied for.  (This is an important, NEW change to previous years)**

6. KSV, Inc. Scholarship recipients must agree to maintain a standard of personal performance both in and out of school that conforms to the moral standards set down by Khe Sanh Veterans, Inc., members.

7. Criteria: Point Selection System !Maximum of 100 regular points or 115 with bonus points

a. Scholastic achievement / grade point average. Max = 40 points max. (please attach last school GPA transcript) example below:

A GPA of 4.0'x 10 = 40 points or a GPA of3.0 x 10 = 30 points

b. Extracurricular activities. Max = 30 points total

Description of personal experience in the following type of activities (Be specific!);

Student government = 10 points max.
Community related services = 10 points max.
Other (i.e. work experience, sports) = 10 points max.

c. KSV SCHOLARHIP ESSAY (250 words min.) on educational goals, career goals = 30 points max.
Over decades countless adjectives have tried to describe Khe Sanh Veterans and their historic accomplishments.

By using one of the six suggested adjectives below, select one that might relate to you in some manner to explain how this is evident in your life's experiences and will help you in meeting your educational and career goals.

TENACIOUS RELIABLE UNDAUNTED STEADFAST RESOLUTE INNOVATIVE

d. Bonus Points = 10 bonus points for being a military veteran
= 5 bonus points for an accredited college GPA (Grade Point Average) transcript

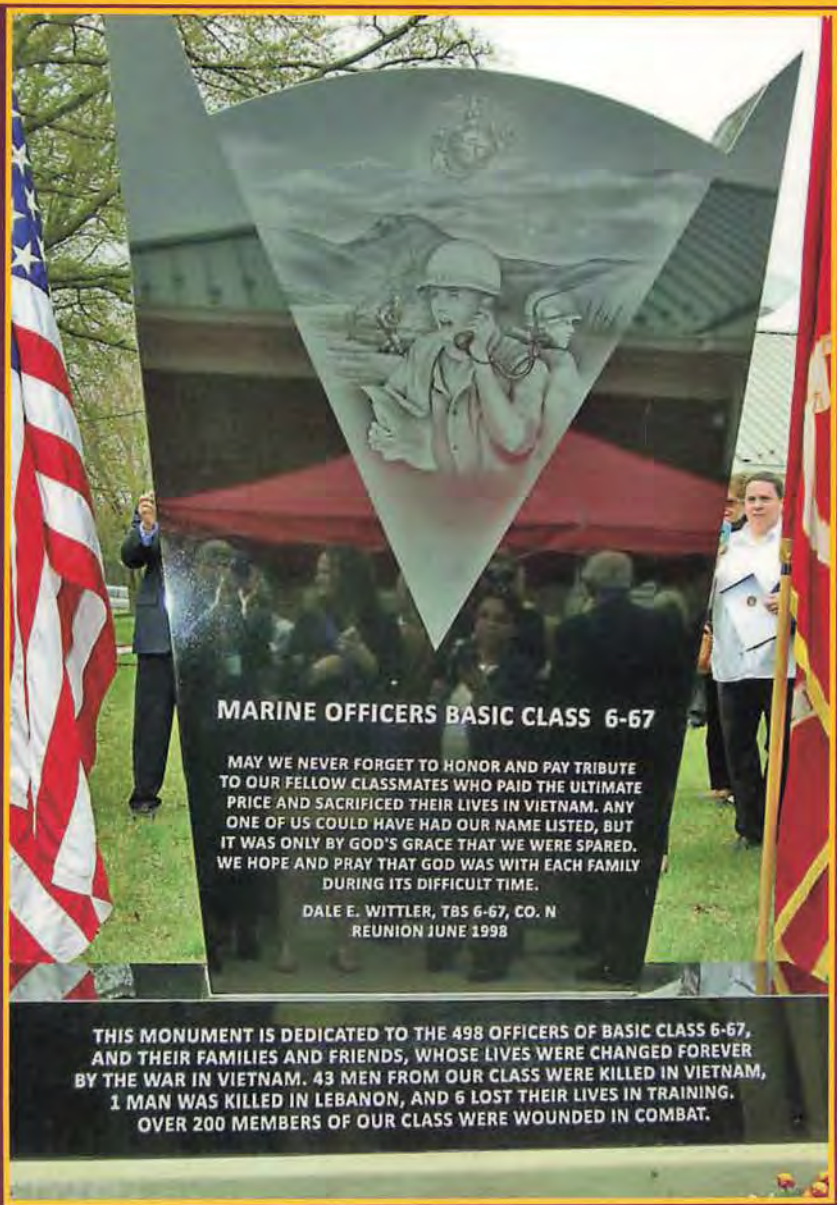
ISSUE 85

ON APRIL 25TH, 2014 CLASS 6-67 DEDICATED A MONUMENT TO THE 498 OFFICERS OF BASIC CLASS 6-67, AND THEIR FAMILIES AND FRIENDS, WHOSE LIVES WERE CHANGED FOREVER BY THE WAR IN VIETNAM, AT THE MARINE CORPS BASE, QUANTICO, VIRGINIA

THE INSCRIPTION ON THE MEMORIAL READS "FORTY THREE MEN FROM OUR CLASS WERE KILLED IN VIETNAM, ONE MAN WAS KILLED IN LEBANON, AND SIX LOST THEIR LIVES IN TRAINING. OVER 200 MEMBERS OF OUR CLASS WERE WOUNDED IN COMBAT."



FELLOW 1/1 MARINES;

We have secured the last available place on the Chesty Puller walk at the USMC Heritage Museum for the construction of an appropriate memorial to the 520 Marines and Corpsmen who perished at their posts serving with 1/1 Marines in Vietnam.

THE MEMORIAL DESIGN IS SHOWN BELOW:

SEE HISTORY & STORY ON PAGE 63

We truly believe that our design is elegant, moving, appropriate, and most of all respectful. We will utilize the engraved paver bricks design which is used throughout the Museum grounds to honor our Marines. The name and rank of each of our fallen brothers will be engraved on the brick, with three names per brick. The center diamond, crafted in reverse laser etched black granite, echoes the original 1st Marine Division patch from the Guadalcanal campaign.

At the threshold will be a matching granite slab announcing that it is we who are remembering our fallen brothers. The Memorial will contain a bench integrated into our memorial to match those throughout the Museum grounds. This will provide a place for quiet, personal contemplation of the sacrifices made by our brothers, and reflection. It is hoped that families and friends of our fallen will be comforted by the knowledge that we, their brothers, remember and honor their service. Semper Fidelis reveals its true meaning by all of us supporting this memorial. By creating this lasting Memorial, it is we, those that have survived, who honor them that have fallen.

Plassmeyer honored with others in his Marine Corps class nearly 44 years after he was shot down

After almost 44 years, lst Lt. Bernard H. Plassmeyer, along with the other U.S. Marine Corps officers from his class killed in Vietnam, were honored with a monument April 25 at The Basic School (TBS) at Quantico, Va.

"This monument is dedicated to the 498 officers of Basic Class 6-67, and their families and friends, whose lives were changed forever by the war in Vietnam," reads an inscription on the memorial. "Forty three men from our class were killed in Vietnam, one man was killed in Lebanon, and six lost their lives in training. Over 200 members of our class were wounded in combat."

Class 6-67 was the sixth class to graduate from TBS in 1967, and the memorial is adjacent to Lopez Hall at TBS. The veiling was witnessed by Plassmeyer's brother, Norb, who has for years wondered exactly-what happened to him.

"It means a whole lot to me," said Plassmeyer of the monument and the two-day gathering he attended. "My brother was declared dead in 1976, but it didn't really resolve anything about what happened to him." Bernie Plassmeyer's wife at that time, Carol (Knaus) Plassmeyer, now Eckert, did not attend the dedication, but said Saturday of last week that she is grateful for the effort that went into putting it together. "I think it's wonderful," she said. "It's gratifying to know people look back and remember all these people. We appreciate all the support we've continued to receive, especially from people who weren't really involved back then." Eckert is now the director of the nursing education, nurse assistant and ward clerk programs at Southwestern Illinois College in Belleville, III., near St. Louis.

Bernard H. Plassmeyer was born May 5, 1945, the fourth son of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Plassmeyer of Westphalia. He attended Belleville, III., near St. Louis. Grade School, Fatima High School ,and graduated from Parks College of Aeronautical Technology of St. Louis University in 1966 with a B. S. in Aeronautical Engineering. It was at St. Louis University that Bernie met Carol, and after she graduated with her Bachelors of Science in Nursing, the two were married in the summer of 1968. In early 1967, Plassmeyer joined the Marine Corps, receiving his commission as a Marine officer in June 1967, graduating at the top of his TBS class.

After the two were married, they spent time at various military bases before Plassmeyer went to Vietnam in 1969. The last was in Yuma, Ariz., when Plassmeyer went missing 16 days before the birth of his only son, Bernard William, who was born Sept. 27, 1970.

"My mom came out to help, and that was a godsend," said Eckert. "I don't know how I would have handled it if I was alone, with the baby and all.

According to the Marine Corps, 1st Lt. Plassmeyer departed Chu Lai Airbase in an A4E Skyhawk on a night combat mission against enemy targets in the infamous A Shau Valley. At 3:40 a.m., as he made an attack run on a communist target in the extreme southern edge of the valley, his Skyhawk was truck by anti -aircraft artillery (AAA) fire and crashed approximately three miles east of the South Vietnamese border, six miles west of Tu Bat and 60 miles west-northwest of DaNang, Thua Thien Province, South Vietnam.

Search and rescue (SAR) efforts were immediately initiated, but no trace of 1st Lt. Plassmeyer or his aircraft was located in the dense jungle covered valley or the mountain foothills just to the south of the target area. Because of the intense communist presence in the area, no ground search was possible. At the time SAR operations were terminated, Plassmeyer was listed as Missing in Action (MIA).

There was no evidence of a parachute, and no beeper signal was heard, according to the Marine Corps.

A later search located the wreckage and from its condition determined that Plassmeyer's aircraft had disintegrated prior to impact. That same day, a forward air controller saw a parachute and torso harness in some nearby trees. There appeared to be blood on the harness.

Norb Plassmeyer said he spoke with the commanding officer and another pilot who flew the mission with his brother. "They were confident he did not survive the crash in the first place," said Plassmeyer. "But there's still no real evidence. It's all circumstantial."

A Marine Corps investigation revealed that returning U.S. prisoners of war (POWs) had no information on Plassmeyer's precise fate, and he was later declared dead (body not recovered) based on a presumptive finding of death.

Eckert recalls that there was little information from the Marine Corps immediately after the crash with regard to her husband's fate, but the location was well known. "No body thought that even if he survived the crash that he would be found right away," said Eckert.

A casualty officer was assigned to Eckert to provide information, and help with any immediate needs. "It was really a waiting game," said Eckert of news on Plassmeyer. "Having a casualty officer really was nice. I didn't feel cut off from the military."

Eckert decided to rent out the house in which she lived in Yuma, and move back to Illinois to be with her family. That was in December of 1970, and between then and the time the Marine Corps declared Plassmeyer dead in 1976, Eckert spent a lot of time trying to raise awareness.

"I got involved about a year after he was shot down," said Eckert of a national association of families of MIAs and POWs. "We'd go to various countries we thought would be useful, and make presentations and explain our situation. "Based in Washington, D.C., one trip was to Geneva, Switzerland, to . speak to the Red Cross.

Letters, posters and petitions were circulated asking for information, and letting the public know that there were still missing military men. "I think people were interested," said Eckert. "We even sent letters to people in power in Vietnam asking for an accounting of those who were missing."

Eckert added that those people who knew the area and saw the crash site didn't think it "looked good" that Plassmeyer would have survived.

"I can't imagine that he survived, but there was no way to get in there for a more thorough investigation," said Eckert. "But the Marine Corps was not prepared to declare Plassmeyer dead without evidence. I don't think they would have made that declaration without people pushing them to do it."

Eckert said she went from one thought to the next regarding his fate. "In the back of my mind, there was always a sliver of hope," said Eckert. "I didn't absolutely accept the fact that he died in the crash, but there's no way to know that for sure. In the front of my mind, logically, I don't think I or anybody else was surprised when they declared him dead."

After six years, the Marine Corps asked Eckert if she wanted a review of the case, and she agreed. "I told them to review it and make whatever decision they thought best," she said. After the declaration, Eckert remarried and moved on with her life.

In March 1991, U.S. investigators in Vietnam located the crash site associated with this incident. They were unable to locate any witnesses to the shoot down and could not locate any remains. However, they did locate fragments of the aircraft's ejection seat and a face piece which indicated the pilot did not eject from the aircraft prior to impact.
